7. A speaker of the Senate shall be elected by the Senators from among themselves in such manner as they may determine and shall hold office for a term not exceeding seven years.

8. The presence of at least fifteen Senators including the Speaker shall be necessary to constitute a meeting of the Senate for the exercise of its powers.

9. Questions arising in the Senate shall be decided by a majority of voices and the Speaker shall in all cases have a vote and when the voices are equal the decision shall be deemed to be in the negative.

10. Section 3 of Chapter 12 of the Revised Statutes of Canada is amended by striking out the words "or another speaker is appointed by the Governor General" in the last two lines and inserting in lieu thereof "or another speaker is elected."

11. Section 128 of the British North America Act, 1867, is amended by striking out the words "and every member of the Senate of Canada" in the eighth and ninth lines thereof and, the Declaration of Qualification in the fifth Schedule to said Act, is amended by striking out the words "Senate of Canada" in the second line thereof, and inserting the words "Legislative Council of Quebec."

12. Section 147 of the British North America Act, 1867, is repealed and the following enacted in lieu thereof:—

"In the case of the admission of Newfoundland the number of Senators shall be one hundred of which Newfoundland shall have four to be elected as provided by this Act."

13. All the provisions of The Dominion Elections Act, The Dominion Controverted Elections Act, The Corrupt Practices Inquiries Act, The Senate and House of Commons Act, and The House of Commons Act, wherein not inconsistent with the provisions of this Act, shall apply to the Senators, their election, qualification and disqualification in the same manner and with the same effect as to members of the House of Commons.

14. If at any time the Senate rejects a Bill passed by the House of Commons or so amends the same as to make it objectionable to the House of Commons and the matters in difference cannot be on a conference adjusted so as to make the same acceptable to the two branches of Parliament, the Government may advise a dissolution of Parliament and if such dissolution takes place with an election thereon and the Bill in the same terms immediately such election again is passed by the House of Commons, it shall become law on the approval of the Governor General and without being again submitted to the Senate.

15. This Act may be cited as the British North America Act, 1917, and the British North America Acts 1867 to 1915, and this Act may be cited together as the British North America Acts 1867 to 1917.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I rise, for many reasons with a great degree of diffidence, in an endeavour to explain to the House some reasons why this resolution should be adopted. One reason for my diffidence is that there may be a fair ground for many hon. gentlemen to doubt the sincerity of one who moves a resolution to change the system of constituting the Senate of Canada. I have noticed that on practically every occasion since Confederation when any one dissented from the present system of constituting the Senate as constituted, it was always some person or some party that was in Opposition. I cannot recall any instance of a government or any member supporting a government moving a resolution to alter the system of constituting the Senate.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: MacIntyre, in 1907.

Mr. GERMAN: I had forgotten him for the moment. He certainly was a supporter of the Government at that time, but evidently his resolution did not receive much support or was not pressed energetically, because it came to nothing. Notwithstanding the fact that one of the planks of the Liberal platform in 1893 was the reform of the Senate, during the whole fifteen years the Liberal party were in power, there was no reform of the Senate other than through the efforts of Divine Providence. No action along that line was taken by the Government or by any member supporting the Government, with the exception of Mr. MacIntyre. Consequently, rising now as I do on the Opposition side of the House, after having for fifteen years supported a Government and a party that was in a measure pledged to reform the Senate, but which had said nothing about it when they were in power, some one may say: I doubt his sincerity in moving this resolution. But, Mr. Speaker, whatever may have been done or left undone in the past, whether the Liberal party or the Conservative party should have changed the system of constituting the Senate, one thing is certain, and that is, that there has been no change, and further, if such a change is necessary, that change should be made now notwithstanding any dereliction in either side in the past. I think myself that a change should be made; not a reform of the Senate—the resolution I am moving does not propose to reform the Senate as at present constituted—but a reform of the system of constituting the Senate in the future.

At the time of Confederation it was decided that the members of the Senate should be appointed by the Government. Outside of that, a democratic form of government was established, but in that one respect there was engrafted on the democratic tree a sprig of aristocracy which was doomed from the beginning, in my opinion, to be barren of any useful fruit, as has been proved. I have no fault to find with the senators. To my mind, Hon. George Brown was the Father of Confederation more than any other man living in Canada at that time. Great credit has been given to Sir John A. Macdonald for establishing the Confederation of the British North American colonies, and great credit is undoubtedly due him, but to my mind the man to whom more than any other credit is due is George Brown, for without him Confederation could not and would not have been established. He was the man who moved for the appointment of the committee of members of the legislature of Canada who composed the Quebec conference. He was the man who from first to last began the agitation and carried it through to a successful conclusion, and as a humble follower of that great Canadian I have pleasure in giving to him what I believe to be the meed of praise to which he is entitled, namely, of being above all others the Father of the confederation of the British North American colonies which form at the present time the great Dominion of Canada. Speaking of the Upper Chamber, George Brown said:

> The desire was to render the Upper House a thoroughly independent body, one that could be in the best position to canvass dispassionately the measures of this House, and stand up for the public interest in opposition to hasty or partisan legislation.

The object was to have an independent body of judicially-minded men who would be free of all political influences. I am free to say that from Confederation down to the present hour the gentlemen who have been appointed to the Senate have been of the highest class of Canadians. In legislative ability, in business acumen, and in every other quality that goes to make up an excellent citizen, the senators not only compare favourably with the members of this Chamber, but, in some cases, in ability and financial position, they are our superiors, and would, if they were members of this Chamber, be an ornament to the Dominion. Then why, as a body, has not the Senate the confidence of the people of Canada? I challenge any hon. member of this House to assert that the Senate has the confidence of the people of this country as a legislative body to-day, although individually they have. Now, why is this? The answer is easily found. The senators represent a party, and not the people. They owe allegiance, or think they do, to the Government and party that appoints them, and not allegiance and responsibility to the people who should elect them. Look at our history since Confederation, and see what the Senate has done in notable instances, and the influence its acts have had on the public mind. The first notable instance of the Senate running counter to the action of the House of Commons, so far as I recollect, was when the Government led by the Right Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier passed the Yukon Railway Act, for the building of a railway into the Yukon district.

At that time the Senate of Canada was strongly Conservative. They threw out that Bill. Was there a man belonging to the Liberal Party throughout the length and breadth of Canada who believed, or at any rate expressed himself as believing, that the Senate threw out that Bill on public grounds? On the contrary, every one of them believed that it was because the Bill was introduced and carried by a Liberal Government and that the Conservative party did not want the Liberal Government to have the credit of passing a Bill of that kind. That is, every Liberal believed that the Senate acted as it did solely and wholly for partisan reasons. I am not saying that the Senate was governed in this matter by partisan considerations, but that all Liberals, and also many Conservatives, believed that it was so governed. It was stated by many, even before the Bill reached the Senate, that it would be defeated in that House.

Coming down to a later date, we find that this Government, I think it was in 1912, passed a Bill through this House called the Naval Aid Bill. That was a measure dear to the hearts of the members of the Government. No doubt they thought it in the interests of the people and believed that it would receive public support if the people had an opportunity to vote upon it. I have no doubt of their sincerity in presenting this Bill to the House and urging its adoption. Had the Senate been Conservative, the Bill would have gone through that House; but the Senate was Liberal, and the Bill was rejected, or at least it was so amended as to be absolutely unacceptable to the Government. I am not saying, and no man can fairly say, that the Bill was defeated in the Senate for any other reason than the patriotic regard for the public interest that should inspire the members of the Senate in their public conduct. But, did the people generally believe that? No. The people generally believed, and said, that that Bill was rejected by the Senate for partisan purposes. That is what the Conservatives said, and that is what many Liberals said. Whether that is true or not it is not necessary to the consideration of the point I am now discussing to take into account.

Another Bill passed by the present Government in the same session, was a Bill in aid of the construction of good roads. I voted against that Bill, or at least against the sixth and last clause of it, and I did so because I thought it should not become law. I voted against the Naval Aid Bill for the same reason, and voted conscientiously as I thought to be my duty as a public man and representative of the people. I have no doubt that the people had the same view of the matter as I had. But you cannot convince the people that when the Senate defeated that Bill it did so on public grounds. They simply say that, when the Senate is Liberal, it will support Liberal legislation and reject Conservative legislation, and when the Senate is Conservative it will support Conservative legislation and reject Liberal legislation. Now, I ask you in all sincerity and in all candor, is that a condition of affairs which makes for the best government of Canada? It is not a question whether or not the Senate on these different occasions has been right or whether it has been wrong, the question is as to the feeling of confidence that the people ought to have in our system of government. I say that the people of Canada have not to-day, and have not had for many years, confidence in the Senate as a body to regulate our legislation. If that be so then, I submit, it is time we had a change in the system of selecting Senators, so that the Senate might be more in harmony with public sentiment.

We have precedents regarding the selecting of members of an Upper House. When Upper and Lower Canada were united in 1841, two Chambers were provided, a Legislative Assembly and a Legislative Council. This was shortly after the Mackenzie Rebellion in Upper Canada and the Papineau

Rebellion in Lower Canada, rebellions arising out of the afflictions of the people under what was known as the Family Compact, ruling through Downing Street. The Legislative Council was to be composed of not less than twenty members, to be appointed by the Crown. That lasted until 1854—for thirteen years. By that time the agitation for a change had grown so strong that it was found necessary to have a Legislative Council elective instead of appointive. The Bill to bring this change into effect was carried through the Legislature by a Government led by one of the bluest of all the blue-blooded Tories whom Canada has ever known, Sir Allan McNab, who was supported by John A. Macdonald, then Attorney General for Canada West, and by George E. Cartier, then Attorney General for Canada East. That Conservative Government—and I think the last really Conservative Government that ever existed in Canada, because after that they called themselves Liberal-Conservatives,—passed this law providing for the election of a Legislative Council for the united Canadas to be composed of forty-eight men, twenty-four from Lower Canada and twenty-four from Upper Canada, to be elected in districts formed by the Government in power. We have that precedent to guide us in any arrangement we may make in the future. It may be asked: Why, after having an elective upper chamber from 1856 to 1867, was a change made in 1867? In 1856 George Brown, representing the county of Lambton, in the Legislature of Canada, was in favour of an appointed legislative council, and expressed himself so very strongly. John A. Macdonald was in favour of an elective legislative council, and that was the system which was adopted. But when Confederation came about a change had come over the feeling of the people, apparently. Confederation was brought about mainly by reason of the determination on the part of the people of Upper Canada to have representation by population. That was a scheme most dear to the heart of George Brown. He felt that Upper Canada at that time, having a large population over and above Lower Canada, and Upper Canada being very much wealthier than Lower Canada, it was not fair to the people of Upper Canada that they should be represented in the legislative council by only the same number of representatives as Lower Canada. Consequently, he made an effort to secure representation by population. That was the basis of the Confederation scheme. Mr. Brown, at that time, in speaking of an elective upper chamber, said:

> Our Lower Canada friends have agreed to give us representation by population in the Lower House on the express condition that they shall have equality in the Upper House. On no other condition could we have advanced a step and for my part I am quite willing that they should have it.

That appeared to be the crux of the whole situation at that time. Mr. Brown and his followers were endeavouring to get representation by population in the Lower House, the elective chamber. In the Upper House the statesmen of Lower Canada thought that they should have an equal voice with Upper Canada, and that in order to have that equal voice the senators, as they were to be called thereafter, should be appointed and not elected. Consequently, it was decided at that time to appoint the senators, and we have appointed them since then. I feel confident the whole sentiment of the country is behind the proposition that the Senate as constituted at that time has not worked out to the advantage of the country or as the founders of Confederation expected it would. In every other respect the Confederation of the British North American colonies has been a magnificent success. From the four small colonies which were federated at that time there has grown up a Dominion which extends from the Atlantic to the Pacific ocean. Population is increasing, wealth is increasing, the differences in language and in religion are being adjusted amicably and to-day we find this great Dominion of Canada, sprung from the Confederation which was brought about by these men, standing behind the British Empire in the greatest war the world has ever seen. We have seen our Canadian boys going from here and fighting the battles of the Empire and I am proud to say that the record of the Canadians in carrying Vimy compares well with the record of the glorious deeds on the historic battlefields of the world. We have a great and glorious country. It was only a few years ago that Canadians, going abroad, and being asked where they were from generally stated that they were from America. Canada was not known, but from now on it will be the pride and glory of every one going abroad from Canada to be known as a Canadian and as a fellow-citizen of men who have carried Britain's flag to victory on these hard fought battlefields.

Now, as I say, we have a precedent for an elective Senate. We have the Liberals, in 1893, deciding in favour, not of an elective Senate, but of the reform of the Senate. When they came into power the Senate was reformed and reformed speedily, but not by any act of the Government other than the appointment of new senators to fill the vacancies which had been created by Divine Providence. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that the time has come when we should actually make a change in the system of selecting senators. Government under a democracy requires that the people should govern. The people can only govern through their representatives elected by them to the legislative halls of the country. It was stated at Confederation that the legislative councils were really elected, that they represented the people, and why?—because they were appointed by the Government and the Government was responsible to the people. But that is beating about the bush to my mind in regard to so serious a matter. We have the precedent, in so far as the Conservative party is concerned, of an elective chamber by the Act passed in 1856 by the Tory Government of that time. We have the Liberal party of 1893 declaring in favour of a change in the Senate. If it was not so expressed in words, at any rate what it meant was that there should be a change in the system of constituting the Senate. So, if we are to follow the leaders of the past, this House must do exactly what I am suggesting should be done.

I am not so sure, Mr. Speaker, that it might not be a measure of retributive justice on the Liberal party if this change were made at the present time. They could have made the change when they were in power and had the advantage of their control of the situation to arrange the constituencies to suit themselves, as, it is said, has been done sometimes. Now, if it is done under the ægis of the Conservative Government, with a Conservative Senate in control, the Conservative party will have a very great advantage, because, when this resolution was enacted into law and came into force, the Conservatives would be in a very large majority in the Upper Chamber; they would have the right to arrange the constituencies in accordance with the provisions of the Act, and they would, therefore, have a very considerable advantage.

I should be quite willing that they should have that advantage if they would only accept this proposition and place it on the statute book as the law of the country. As I have said, we have a precedent for an elective Upper Chamber. We see why it was that an elective Upper Chamber was not established at the time of Confederation. It was not established then because it was impossible to do so. If it had been insisted on at that time Confederation could not have been consummated. We had to take what we could get, and we could not have got that without accepting all that it involved. We have the record of the Liberal party in favour of an elective Upper Chamber and consequently it seems to me that it ought to be easy sailing for this House to pass a resolution such as I have suggested. I do not pretend to say that this resolution is in all its details exactly what it should be, that there should not be amendments; but, in the main I submit that it embodies the principles that should be carried out. To my mind there are three distinct principles which should actuate this House in the establishment of an elective second Chamber: One is that the second Chamber should be elected by the people, and should represent the people. The second is, that its members should be, as far as possible, independent of politics and political feeling and political organization. And the third is that the senators should have an appointment for a term of office long enough to make the Senate a permanent organization, and not one to be affected by a dissolution of Parliament. There should be an election; there should be independence; there should be permanence. I never thought it was the part of wisdom or of good judgment to suggest that something which had been in existence should be torn down and destroyed without having the courage to suggest an alternative proposition. I could have confined my resolution to a suggestion that the change should be made in the constitution and the mode of appointment, and left it at that. But I felt that if I wanted to convince this House of my sincerity in this matter and to convince them that action should be taken, I should at least be in a position to suggest some sort of alternative proposition, and I have taken the liberty to suggest an alternative proposition. I submit that that proposition embodies the three principles which I have suggested and which, if embodied in legislation, would result not perhaps in a more intelligent or higher class of men than the senators we have at present, but in the creation of a Senate responsible to the people of the country and having their confidence. What the senators will do under such a constitution they will do as representatives of the people and not as representatives of a party, or as men who owe allegiance to a party.

I have suggested that the present senators should hold their positions during their lives. I submit that for two reasons: One is that I think senators really have a fair preemptive right to the positions to which they have been appointed, and that it is only fair to them that they should continue to hold their positions during the period for which they have been appointed, that is during life and good behaviour. Another reason is—and this is a very potent one—that I doubt very much if such a Bill would pass the Senate, as it would have to do, unless it did provide for the retention of their positions by the present senators. That is not an original suggestion of my own, because that same thing was said in 1856, when it was proposed to change the legislative council, at that time appointed, to an elective legislative council. The legislative council had rejected a Bill in 1854 for reforming their constitution, simply because it provided to wipe them out. Consequently in 1855, when the measure came up again, it provided that they should retain their places under their appointments and that new councillors should be elected twelve at a time, that is, twelve the first year, twelve two years later, another twelve two years after that, and a fourth twelve two years after that. The constituencies for which legislative councillors were to be elected were chosen by lot, the names of the different constituencies were put in a box and the first twelve that came out of the box were the first in which elections were to be held, and so on until the whole forty eight were elected. They were to be elected in that way and to hold their positions for eight years, twelve legislative councillors being elected each two years. That, you might say, was a very good solution of the problem. There would necessar-

4 p.m. ily be a party organization because with a legislative council of forty-eight twelve men might be sufficient to change the complexion of the council, and you would have politics entering into the matter. What I have taken the liberty to suggest is that the Dominion of Canada should be divided into as many senatorial districts as there are senators to be appointed; that each province should have the same number of senators as it now has under the provisions of the British North America Act; that the present senators should hold their positions during their lives according to the conditions under which they were appointed, but as vacancies occur from time to time elections should be held in the senatorial district concerned. What would be the result and the effect of that? There would perhaps be a vacancy in New Brunswick or Nova Scotia or British Columbia. Under the provisions of the Act an election would be held within the required time for the election of a successor. There would be no party organization throughout the country; there would be probably some political local feeling in regard to the matter, but generally there would be no party organization, and that senator when elected would not be under the control or in any way under obligation to any party organization. He would be elected by reason of his ability as a man capable of representing the people of the country. He would be a man known in the locality. He would be free and independent in politics and, whether he had previously been a Liberal or a Conservative, he would go to the Senate of Canada as a representative of the people, free and independent of political affiliation. That is the principle upon which the members of the Senate should be elected, and I should be glad to see that principle more prevalent in the House of Commons than it is at present. I have suggested that they should be elected for a term of seven years. In the old legislative council of Canada the members were elected for eight years, there being an election of twelve men every two years. The suggestion that the term be seven years is only an arbitrary one, but I think that seven years would be a term of reasonable length. Members of the House of Commons are elected for a term of five years; I think that senators should be elected for a longer term. In that event a senator would hold his position for seven years, and no dissolution of Parliament could affect his senatorship during that period. At the end of the term he would go back to his constituents, give an account of his stewardship, and ask them whether they would again trust him with their interests in revising or supervising the legislation of the House of Commons. By the adoption of this suggestion you would have an independent body of capable men, free from political influences, filling the highest position in the land as a revising body of the legislation of the lower House. Sir John Macdonald, in moving the adoption of the resolution for an elective legislative council in 1856, expressed himself as being strongly in favour of a revising chamber. He said that if there were no second chamber, half of the legislative assembly should sit on one side and half on the other, one to act as a revising body of the legislation passed by the other —not necessarily to throw out legislation, but to revise it. In common with other gentlemen interested in the public affairs of the country at that time, he felt that a second chamber was a necessary part of our legislative system. I submit that a second chamber is as necessary a part of our legislative system to-day as it was then. That being the case, we should have a legislative system as free as possible from political influence, representative of the people, a permanent organization having no fear of Government or Government control.

I have suggested that no qualification should be required of the person seeking election to the Senate. I do not see why qualification should be necessary in the Senate any more than it is in the House of Commons. No qualification is required of men seeking election to the House of Commons other than capability and honesty; nor should any qualifications other than these be required of senators. If a man is capable, honest, and trusted by the people, he is fit to represent the people, whether he is wealthy or poor.

It was said years ago that it would be difficult to get men to offer themselves as senators in large constituencies. But times have changed very much since that argument was advanced. At that time great difficulties were experienced in canvassing large constituencies, but in these days of good roads—with better roads coming—of railroads in every section of the country, of newspapers in every town, village and hamlet, of motor cars, what greater difficulty is experienced by the candidate in a large constituency than by the candidate in a small constituency? Moreover, a senatorial constituency composed of several counties would be so large that no man, whatever his wealth, would attempt to bribe the electors. The constituency would be so large that he could not go from house to house and conduct a personal canvass. His qualifications for the position would be the qualification that he could demonstrate to the electors on public platforms throughout the constituency; he would be known by his utterances rather than by his personal canvass.

I have suggested that there should be a remedy for any deadlock taking place as between the Senate and the House of Commons. I submit that that single reform should be made even if nothing else be done, and in that I feel that I have the support of hon. gentlemen opposite. We heard, in 1912, and have heard since then, that the Senate should be put out of business because they practically rejected the Naval Aid Bill of the Government. If the Conservative Government had been invested with such power as is suggested in my resolution, there being a difference of view between the Upper and the Lower Chamber, the Government would have had the right to appeal to the people, and if the people had approved the proposed legislation and the Act had been again passed by the House in the same terms, it would have become law without going to the Senate. I wonder if this Government would have appealed to the people. I am free to say that, irrespective of political feelings one way or the other, I would like to have had an expression of opinion of the people with regard to the naval aid policy of this Government as against the naval service policy of the former Government. If such a proposal as I have suggested had been in operation at that time the Government would have had an opportunity of obtaining that expression of opinion had they seen fit to accept the responsibility of dissolving Parliament and going to the country. It is just possible that under an elective system the political complexion of the Upper Chamber, if there was any, would not be as speedily changed as it is at present; under existing conditions a change is brought about rather quickly. At any rate, I would have no fear of the political situation with an elective Senate, for the senators would not be tied down by party affiliations, party prejudices, or party alliances.

This resolution may require modification. If the Government or the House see fit to accept it the matter can easily be referred to a committee who could put it in shape to go before the Imperial Parliament. Some such resolution should be adopted; such a change as is suggested should be made in the system of constituting the Senate of Canada. When that change shall have been made it is my opinion, Sir, that we shall have reached the highest position which can be obtained in any democracy: that of a government of the people, for the people and by the people. I beg leave, therefore, to move the resolution which stands in my name.

Mr. J. G. TURRIFF (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, there was one part of the remarks of my hon. friend (Mr. German) that I agreed with very heartily, and that was when he pointed out to the House that the election of a senator in a large district comprising three or four of our present districts would not be any more difficult nor any more expensive than the election of a senator in one of our present counties, and therefore I take it for granted that he is thoroughly in accord with the principles of proportional representation, as the question of expense is one of the great objections to the present system. Since I have been a member of this House, I have on many occasions heard this question, being brought up usually although not always by some one sitting in Opposition, and on most of those occasions hon. gentlemen who have brought the matter up have been thoroughly in earnest and honest about it, just as my hon. friend from Welland is to-day. But so far as I have been able to see, no scheme that has yet been recommended seems to appeal either to the House or to the country as being much better than the present system. I am not one of those who have favoured doing away with the Senate simply because on occasions it has gone diametrically opposite to the views expressed in this House. My hon. friend to-day suggests an elected Senate instead of an appointed one. In my opinion we would not be likely to get, by election, a Senate that would be less partisan than it is at present. You can not elect senators without having political organizations, and those organizations would be Liberal or Conservative and you would have your Senate composed of Liberals and Conservatives. In fact, I think the Senate would tend to be more partisan than it is at present, because under the prevailing system, when a man is appointed to the Senate, he is somewhat in the same position as a judge if he chooses to assume that position; he is not dependent on any organization, nor is he dependent on any party.

I quite agree with my hon. friend from Welland that the senators, even with their handicap of age, because they average considerably older than the members of this House, show up man for man to good advantage against the members of this House. I have frequently observed the manner in which they deal with legislation that comes before them. While all of the senators may not be skilled in legislative work, many of them are, having obtained their training in the local legislatures and in this House, and taking them all around, they are, with, of course, some exceptions, able and good men and they do their work expeditiously and well.

Another objection that I would have to an elective Senate is the matter of cost. Although a senatorial election would not cost quite as much as an election to the House of Commons (because my hon. friend proposes a longer term for senators), the cost would be great and, in my judgment, the class of senators that would be secured by election would not be worth the extra expense. There is also a general feeling that in elections to municipal councils, local legislatures, and the House of Commons, the people have a sufficiency of elections.

I wish, however, to mention a couple of changes that I would like to see made in connection with the Senate. These are views that I have held for a good many years. A year or so prior to the election of 1911, when we on this side of the House had no thought whatever of being in Opposition so soon, I discussed this matter with the present leader of the Opposition. I have never brought the matter up since, simply because my hon. friends on the Government benches have been in the minority in the Senate. It is to the credit of the Fathers of Confederation that they arranged for a Senate in such a manner that so far we, their successors, have never been able to find any satisfactory method of changing it, but I think it was never their intention that the Senate should be so absolutely one-sided as it usually is. When the Liberals came into power in 1896, there were, if I remember aright, only between twelve and eighteen Liberal senators—a very small number—out of 84. Within five or six years the Liberals had a majority in the Senate, and when we went out of power in 1911, the Senate was practically as one-sided as when we came into power in 1896. That is not a satisfactory condition for the Senate to be in, and I do not think it was ever expected at the time of Confederation that the Senate would become so one-sided as I have described. Should the Government remain in power for another term or two, the Senate would again be absolutely one-sided. In 1910, in discussing the matter with my right hon. leader, I took up the question of whether it would not be advisable, when we came to form the western provinces into a senatorial district, as was done later on by my hon. friends opposite, to make a change and provide that thereafter the leader of the Opposition should nominate to the Prime Minister, whoever he might be, every third senator of that particular senatorial division. For instance, when a vacancy occurred in the West, the Government would fill it; when a second vacancy occurred, the Government would fill that also, but when a third vacancy occurred, the leader of the Opposition would give the name of the appointee to the leader of the Government, who would appoint every third man from the Opposition. The same thing would take place in Ontario, Quebec and the lower provinces. In this way, neither party would lose any of its patronage—the patronage would simply be carried over for a little. To my mind this would have two advantages. During the earlier years that I sat in this House when we were in power, there were in Opposition several men—one of them is in the House still, my hon. friend from Halton (Mr. Henderson), the present senator George Taylor, and others, men who had spent twenty-five or thirty years of their lives working for the public, and who were going up in years, and I thought it would have been a splendid thing if the leader of the Opposition in those years had the power of every now and then nominating one of these men to the Senate. We would have lost a little of our patronage at the time, but we would have made it up to us now if that method of nomination were in force. We went out of power in 1911, and up to now I have never felt like giving voice to these views simply because hon. gentlemen opposite were in a minority in the Senate, and I would be the last man on earth to suggest that a party in a minority in the Senate should be asked to appoint any one but their own supporters in filling vacancies. But when the present vacancies are filled hon. gentlemen opposite will have a majority in the Senate, and I therefore throw out my suggestion for what it may be worth. If my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition were in power I would speak very strongly upon this subject, and insist as far as I could on the Liberal party making a change as soon as we obtained a majority in the Senate. If every third man were appointed on the recommendation of the leader of the Opposition, it would certainly prevent the Senate from being so one-sided. I say 1 out of 3 just to illustrate my argument; that might not be the right proportion, but it shows the object I have in view. I think such a change would be in the interests of the Senate itself, in the interests of the Government and in the interests of the country.

There is one other change I would like to see made in the Senate. I would provide that when a senator reaches a certain age, seventy-five say or any other age fixed upon, he should be superannuated and another man appointed in his place. In my opinion the Senate could be made a much more useful branch of the Government than it is at present. We all know that for weeks after this House assembles there is very little for the Senate to do until legislation goes up to them from this House.

Mr. MARCIL: They can initiate legislation.

Mr. TURRIFF: I was just coming to that. When a man attains the age of seventy-five or any other age that may be decided upon, and younger senators are appointed, I would give the Senate more work to do. Certain classes of legislation should be introduced in the Senate, and should come to this House thoroughly thrashed out and licked into shape. We know from experience that when legislation comes to this House from the Senate there is mighty little for us to do; it is a big help. If this suggestion were adopted I do not think there would be more than ten or fifteen senators that would have to be superannuated, and the cost would be trifling compared with the amount we would save in thus shortening the life of the session. I would provide by law that all legislation of a certain character, railway Bills, or all private Bills if you like, should be introduced in the Senate and thrashed out there before coming to us. I am satisfied that if something along this line was done, it would shorten the session by three or four weeks, and we would thereby save ten times as much as it would cost to superannuate the few senators who had reached the age limit. Even without superannuating any senators, I think more legislation should be initiated in the Senate with a view to shortening the length of the session.

Those are the two suggestions I have to make. As I said before, I did not want to make them until hon. gentlemen opposite had a majority in the Senate. The hon. member for Welland (Mr. German) has brought the subject up, and while I do not quite agree with his views, I would like to see something done along these lines, as I am sure it would be a step in the right direction, and would give good results. I trust that my hon. friend who is leading the House will take this matter into his consideration.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN (Halifax): I did not intend addressing the House on this resolution, but since hearing the hon. member for Welland I have a little more interest in the matter than I had thought I would have. I can well appreciate the befitting modesty of my hon. friend for Welland and his diffidence in moving this resotution by reason of the fact that resolutions of this character are largely academic and usually are made by members of the Opposition. Resolutions of this character as a rule receive but scant sympathy from the Government of the day. I remember in 1907 when a resolution for the reform of the Senate was moved by the late Mr. MacIntyre, the present Prime Minister, then leader of the Opposition, expressed the opinion that some reform was desirable, but that it was entirely in the hands of the Government. If that was true then, I suppose we upon this side of the House might to-day well urge that reform of the Senate is to some degree at least desirable, and that the power to reform that body is within the hands of the Government, and therefore they should take some action. However, that form of discussion does not carry one very far, and is not very likely to bring about reform.

I do not know whether I can fully endorse the resolution of the hon. member for Welland, but I am strongly of the opinion that there is great urgency for some reform in the constitution of the Senate. No doubt that body was patterned after the British House of Lords. Of course, we could not very well adopt the hereditary principle here, and it is very fortunate that we did not, but in my opinion appointments to the Senate for life are but little better than the hereditary principle which prevails in respect to the British House of Lords. I hope that one of the great reforms that will take place in England in consequence of this war will be the abolition of the hereditary principle in the House of Lords, which, after all, is but a relic of mediævalism, and does not tend to keep the British democracy in the position it should occupy.

I quite agree with the mover and seconder of the resolution in refraining from any attack on the personnel of the Senate, a course which has been very often departed from in this House in debating similar resolutions. It is quite true that the Senate has not accomplished that measure of usefulness which the founders of Canada expected of it; nevertheless, the members of the Senate have been eminently respectable and able men, always desirous of performing their public duties. The mover of the resolution has referred to three or four measures which have been defeated by the Senate.

I cannot at the moment say, nor would I care to speculate upon, what were the motives of the members of that body in defeating any of the measures to which the hon. member has referred. But I believe that in each case the Senate probably reflected public opinion. Looking backward upon the defeat of the Yukon Railway Bill—I was not in the House at that time—I am inclined to believe that it was probably in the interest of Canada. Perhaps it is easier to see that to-day than at the time the Bill was defeated. And it is quite possible that the motive impelling the Senate in its action was political. I think also that the defeat of the Naval Bill would have been endorsed by the public if the matter had been properly presented to them and time had been afforded for reflection. The Senate did not defeat the Highways Bill, but merely insisted upon an amendment which the Government did not accept. I have never had any doubt as to the propriety of the Senate defeating that Bill absolutely, for every measure involving the expenditure of public money should have behind it some policy, and this was a Bill without any public policy behind it. Only recently we had the defeat of a Bill for the relief of the shareholders of a defunct bank, the Farmers' Bank, a Bill in which I think you, Mr. Speaker (Mr. Blain in the Chair) were actively interested. That Bill was defeated by vote of the Senate, the majority including many of those affiliated with the Conservative party. I think this was one instance in which the majority of the Senate defeated a Bill which they believed to be wrong in principle, and in defeating it were not influenced by political considerations.

There is one feature in the constitution of the Senate which I do not hesitate to condemn, and that is the life tenure of office by senators. I do not believe there is in this Chamber to-day a single member, who, expressing his honest conviction, would say that he approves of that feature of the constitution of the Senate. The abolition of the life tenure would be in itself a very considerable reform, and would bring about so many advantages that there would be less necessity for radical changes in the constitution of the Senate. The suggestion of election of senators doubtless has features to recommend it. The idea is not a new one. It has been tried in the United States, perhaps in some instances with success, but in many to the grievous disappointment of the best citizens of that country. It may matter little what is the form of constitution of a parliament, you may get good results from a parliament which, in theory, is improperly constituted, and vice versa. "What's best administered is best." I am rather inclined to the view of the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff) at the moment, but am not inflexible in that view and would be quite willing to change it if reasons were given to prove that an elective Senate is the best. When a resolution on this subject was before this House in 1906 the present leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) quoted from Sir John Macdonald upon the subject of an elective Senate. I read what was then quoted, because it embodies a substantial objection that can be raised against the suggestion contained in the resolution. Sir John Macdonald said:—

> The arguments for an elective council are numerous and strong; and I ought to say so, as one of the Administration responsible for introducing the elective principle into Canada. I hold that this principle has not been a failure in Canada, but there were causes—which we did not take into consideration at the time—why it did not so fully succeed in Canada as we had expected. One great cause was the enormous extent of constituencies and the immense labour which consequently devolved on those who sought the suffrages of the people for election to the council, for the same reason the expense, the legitimate expense, was so enormous that men of standing in the country, eminently fitted for such a position, were prevented from coming forward.

The latter part of the quotation I think, gives a fairly substantial objection to the principle of the resolution submitted by the hon. member for Welland. A senatorial election on the basis outlined in the resolution may incur a vast amount of legitimate expense and would consume a great deal of time, and I fear that the result would be that the proper class of men would not seek election to a Senate so constituted.

It will be unfortunate if this debate should end without further action taken, as occurred in the case of other similar resolutions. I think the opinion that there is room for reform in the constitution of the Senate is as strong upon one side of this House as upon the other. This is a question on which, I think, we might well forget for the moment our political feelings, the Government might forget that they are in power, and that members might join together candidly and regardless of political feelings, with the hope of working our some solution of this problem. I would suggest that a committee of the House be appointed to consider the resolution, and I would give power to that committee to send for witnesses and for any documents which may be available and helpful. The matter being taken up by this committee, I should hope that the interest in it would be continued after the conclusion of this debate. A number of members of the House, and a number of senators also, might be summoned before the committee, and probably their opinions would be given to the committee with greater alacrity than they would be given in the House. I am not sure that the committee should not be composed of members of the senate as well as of members of this House. I submit my amendment. It embodies the view I hold, and if not absolutely correct in form, it can be amended later:

> That a select committee of seven members of the House of Commons be appointed to take into consideration notice of motion No. 16 on the notice paper, standing in the name of Mr. German and relating to the constitution of the Senate, with power to send for persons, papers and documents and to report from time to time.

Mr. W. F. NICKLE (Kingston): Mr. Speaker, when I came to the House this afternoon, I was not aware that this resolution was to be debated and, therefore, I have not got my thoughts in such order as I might desire. But, Sir, the question of the constitution of the Canadian Senate is one that has for many years more or less had my attention. I realize that in drawing constitutions one may plan ever so carefully and that in the actual working out of the scheme what was desired is not always attained. One of the most glaring examples, I suppose, in history, is the effort of the founders of the American Constitution in determining the methods that were to be adopted in the election of the president. They established it as a principle that the Electoral College should be chosen. They, no doubt, expected that it would be composed of the ablest and most far-sighted men of the time, that they would gather together at stated periods and that their combined wisdom would result in the most suitable man in the United States being chosen as president. But, if that was what they expected they signally failed in attaining that result because, as is well known, the election of the president of the United States is fought out to-day on party lines of the most well-defined and clean-cut edge.

I am quite ready to admit, speaking from this side of the House, that I do not believe that the constitution of the Senate, as it is now established, is altogether satisfactory. But, in saying that, perhaps, I only in a general way criticise the Senate as democracy has been criticised as being "of all forms of government the least objectionable." Perhaps our selective Senate is of all forms of choosing the least objectionable. But, as the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Maclean) said, that is best which is best administered. If it were possible to impress upon the governments of the day —I speak having regard to the appointments that the Liberals have made and I speak also taking into consideration the appointments that the Conservatives have made—that if less attention were paid to purely party lines, if we were not so keen to give recognition to men of our own political faith, but if we took a wider point of view and endeavoured to secure for the Senate men of outstanding capacity in the various walks of Canadian life, educational, industrial, agricultural, financial and political, the Senate of Canada would be a stronger body.

Now, the hon. member for Halifax has said that in the main he believed the Senate had expressed what the people were from time to time thinking, and he has directed attention to the Yukon Bill of some years ago, to the Naval Bill and the Highways Bill of a few years ago. As to the Yukon Bill, I cannot speak, because I am not acquainted with its peculiar terms, but I think the attitude of the Senate on the Naval Bill came as a tremendous shock to the people of Canada, because we know that there were Liberals who believed that the Conservative party were right and voted against the Bill and the Conservative party, and I do not think it would be amiss to say that there were Conservative senators who thought that the Liberals were right and still voted for the policy of the Conservative party. I believe that the senators should act more or less as political judges, that they should be publicists of the widest point of view, and that in the discharge of their duties their decision should be reached with regard only to the interest of Canada at large and without regard to the particular view of this measure or that measure as it appears to affect the fortunes of one party or the other for the time being.

But would my hon. friend from Welland (Mr. German) attain this ideal condition if this measure should be adopted by this House and if it should have legal effect? It does not seem to me that he would. He says: Let us have an elective Senate, elected for a definite term, and if we have that we will get an independent Senate. If one is to judge of what is going to be the effect of the resolution, or of the legal enactment of the proposition, there is no better school than the school of experience to enable us to determine the result. Let us see what has been the effect of an elective Senate. The great outstanding example is the Senate of the United States. I do not think the hon. member for Welland would contend that there party politics are not the predominant force that determines the election, and although party politics in the main do determine the election, there is one other characteristic that is a very important factor and that is the wealth of the men who stand for election to the American Senate. Wealth and party prestige are essential in the main to election to the American Senate. If you want to take a more recent example you have the example of the Senate of the Australian Commonwealth. There was a body of men speaking the same language as our own, taking the British Constitution and the ideals and examples well known to them and to us, and endeavouring to elaborate an ideal constitution. They decided that they would have an elective Senate, and how has it worked out? Party lines are drawn just as tightly in Australia as in other countries and in the case of an election to the Senate the same organization prevails for the election of senators as for election of members to the House of Representatives and party lines are to a great extent the determining factors. If we should adopt this method of election in Canada, I am afraid we would find ourselves in this predicament, that men standing for election to the Senate would necessarily have to declare their party affiliation and attitude to public questions of the day. Under our system of elections, many questions come before the people at the same time and a man might vote for his representative for this reason or that but I greatly fear that the election to the Senate being for a wider area, and an appeal being made to very many more men than would be made in an election of a representative to this House, we would find that wealth and party prestige would be the controlling factors.

I believe in manhood suffrage, I think that every man who lives in the country and is a citizen is entitled to a vote, but while I believe in manhood suffrage, I doubt very much if manhood suffrage has attained all that those who fought for it desired. The issues upon which elections have been fought in this country are rarely so clear-cut and well-defined as to make the popularity and influence of the candidate a negligible factor. If you are going to elect your senators not from a population of 30,000 or 40,000 but from a couple of hundred thousand and if manhood suffrage is to prevail, as it should prevail, then it seems to me that there is not going to be any chance for the man of moderate means because influences will be brought to bear that should not be brought to bear and the Senate that the hon. member for Welland desires to be constituted will be a Senate that would represent the wealthy men of the party in each district in which that party's votes predominated.

I think there is a good deal to be said for the amendment of the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Maclean) that a committee of this House should be constituted to look into the whole question and see if some way can not be devised by which the personnel of the Senate will be strengthened and in order that it may not be managed merely as patronage to be distributed by the Government that may from time to time happen to be in power.

Mr. O. TURGEON (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, I desire to say only a few words on the resolution of my hon. friend from Welland (Mr. German). I think it is well known in this House and in the country that I am one of the most sincere admirers of the constitution of Canada and of the Fathers of Confederation, who gave us that constitution. The reform of the Senate is a question upon which I have already expressed my mind, and no member of this House who has introduced suggestions for its reform has ever been able to convince me to change my opinion. I believe in the wisdom of the Fathers of Confederation, and I say that in the establishment of the two chambers the Fathers of Confederation proved their practical wisdom for the distant future, and more particularly for the near future, as we may describe the present day in relation to their time.

We must not conclude that the Senate does not fulfil its mission because it does not meet with the approval of everyone in the country. The hon. member for Welland (Mr. German) has made that point explicitly, as he does every point upon which he treats, especially on questions legal or constitutional. I agree with him in the admiration he has expressed for the members of our Senate. It is, perhaps, only one more evidence of the wisdom of the appointive as opposed to the elective Senate. The appointment remains upon the responsibility of the Government of the day, who have every possible interest in appointing to the Senate outstanding men of the day, who have proven their quality by their past records and their careers.

Hon. members speak of securing better conditions in the Senate by means of elections. As the hon. member who preceded me (Mr. Nickle) said, I believe that we have now enough elections in this country to interest the electors, between municipal, provincial and federal, and that with that consideration in view the Fathers of Confederation decided to make the Senate appointive instead of elective. The result will be practically the same. For instance, in my province, in which we have ten senators, and after the next election will have only eleven members of the House of Commons, the divisions will be practically the same. My constituency, being a large one, will be the same for the Senate as for the House of Commons, and I believe that I would have more chance at the hands of my electors than at the hands of the present Government. However, I am against the elective system as applied to the Senate.

One of the main reasons why the Fathers of Confederation, in framing the constitution, made the Senate appointive, was to secure the protection of minorities. The Senate has been created more for the protection of minorities than from any other consideration, political, industrial or financial. I well remember, some years ago, one of our regretted friends, Sir Richard Cartwright, in discussing this question in the Senate saying that he favoured an appointive Senate just because in his province of Ontario, where the large majority are Protestant and the minority Catholic, even with the best will of the different organizations of both parties in Ontario and every effort to give due representation in the House of Commons to the minority in the province, it had always been found impossible in practice to secure such representation for them, and that by the placing of the onus of such responsibility on the Government, the Governments of Canada, both Liberal and Conservative, had been able to give just representation to the minority in Ontario through the power of appointment to the Senate. The same thing might be said of Quebec where under an elective system of appointment to the Senate, even without any feeling, it would be impossible in many districts to have a sufficient number of English representatives from that province in the House of Commons. Similar conditions might arise in any other province where we have the Irish Roman Catholics, the French Roman Catholics and the English element, each anxious to have fair representation in this House, but in some cases unable to do so owing to the way in which the population is distributed. In such a case fair representation cannot be obtained at the hands of the electorate, but can be obtained through this power of appointment. Take New Brunswick for instance. I remember a few years ago, when my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) was at the head of the Government, and there was a Senate vacancy belonging, as we thought, to the French minority, he convinced me that I should let the vacancy be filled by an Irish Catholic because in the province of New Brunswick the Acadian people, the French population, had their fair share of representation in the House of Commons while the Irish Catholics could not send one of their own to this House; and therefore it was in the interest of justice that the Irish Catholic element should have a larger representation in the Senate and they had the right, so far as the Senate alone was concerned, to such representation. In that way both minorities in the Maritime Provinces did obtain just representation, just proportional representation, in the Senate. As I say, it is one of the reasons why the Fathers of Confederation decided to adopt the appointive system instead of the elective system.

The hon. member for Halifax (Mr. A. K. Maclean), has said that the elective system would be a very expensive one. No doubt it would, and that is another consideration against it.

It is said that the Senate has on many occasions shown partisanship. I agree with the hon. member for Welland (Mr. German) that when the members of the Senate in 1897 or 1898 rejected the Yukon Bill which provided for the construction of a railway in that country, we as Liberals perhaps thought at the time that the Senate might have been actuated by partisanship. It may be that the experience of today has convinced the population of Canada that, from a practical standpoint, the Senate were right in their decision. It has been said that the Senate showed partisanship in rejecting the Naval Bill of 1912. May I remind the House that the Senate at the time acted most wisely. They did not reject the Naval Bill, I cannot allow that statement to remain uncontradicted. The Senate at the time did what the constitution, in the pure spirit of democracy, permits them to do, force an appeal to the country; and if the country had supported the Bill the Senate was prepared at the next session to stand by it.

There is another point which I wish to raise. My hon. friend from Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff) has mentioned an age limit of seventy-five or about that age. Let me say that since I have been in this House and have had an opportunity to observe the Senate, I have found that in the Senate, without mentioning any names, it is those past seventy-five who have been most active in the Senate, and have given the most efficient service.

Mr. TURRIFF: Make the limit one hundred years.

Mr. TURGEON: It shows the wisdom of the Fathers of Confederation that with all our attempts to amend the constitution and reform the Senate, we cannot reach any solution. That simply means that they acted so wisely that we cannot amend their work. They foresaw that point also, and made the reservation that when a senator vacates his seat for two years he forfeits it, and therefore when he becomes incapable of attending the Senate and has stayed at home for two years the Government must appoint another man.

I am not opposed to the amendment which has been brought forward by my hon. friend: I believe, it would be a good thing for us to show the country that we take an interest in this suggestion. I believe, however, that very little reform could be made, except, perhaps the reform suggested by the member for Assiniboia—that more legislation should originate in the Senate, thus keeping the members of the Senate busier and doing away with their complaint that they have to wait for legislation coming from this House.

Mr. EDMOND PROULX (Prescott): I have no doubt, Mr. Speaker, that the fathers of Confederation adopted what they considered to be the best possible plan, having regard to their experience. As the hon. member for Welland (Mr. W. M. German) said, the elective plan in 1855 did not prove successful. At the time of its adoption they did not have a free hand, because the then members of the legislative council held office under the old system. The same difficulty would be experienced if the plan suggested by the hon. member for Welland were adopted; we would have to commence as they did in 1856, with a practically complete chamber, and deal with the vacancies according to the new plan.

I sympathize with my hon. friend's idea so far as the reforming of the Senate is concerned, but I doubt very much whether his plan would prove as successful as he imagines. As the member for Assiniboia (Mr. J. G. Turriff) said we have many elective bodies in this country—school boards, municipal councils, legislative assemblies, and the House of Commons—and perhaps it is just as well that we should have, as the highest legislative body in the land, a chamber appointed under the selective system. I am strongly in favour of the suggestion of the hon. member for Assiniboia, however, that a change should be made in the manner of making appointments. I think his plan is one that should commend itself to this House, because all the appointments should not be in the gift of only one party. The Conservative party remained in power for eighteen years previous to 1896, and the Liberal party was in power for sixteen years after that date. During the time that each party was in power, each party made all the appointments to the Senate. Members of a Government are human, and their preference always goes to members of their own party. If appointments are made by both parties, it is only just that the party in power should have the majority of the appointments. The mode suggested by the member for Assiniboia is, I think, a very good one; it is better to have the Senate more divided and more in touch, perhaps, with public opinion.

Another reform which ought to be adopted is one affecting the age limit of members of the Senate. The member for Gloucester (Mr. O. Turgeon) seems to think that the older senators are very efficient. No doubt there are exceptions, but I would point out that the age limit of county court judges, which formerly was eighty, a few years ago was set at seventy-five. If, therefore, there is an age limit for those who have to administer the laws, I do not see why there should not be an age limit in respect to those who make or revise the laws. When a man passes the age of eighty years, his mental powers are somewhat impaired. In this House there are very few men above the age of seventy-five years—I think there are not more than three or four—although I believe that these men are just as good as, if not superior to, those who are younger.

Another reform which I would like to see adopted is that of the appointing of senators for a term of years—say, ten years. They could be reappointed at the end of that term, but upon reaching the age limit they would have to vacate the seat. By appointing senators for a term of years, I think that more changes would result, more new blood would come into the Senate, and the Senate would be more in touch with public opinion. We do not want to see in Canada an Upper House, such as they have in the Old Country, which is a refuge for the aristocracy. We have no aristocracy in Canada, but if the creation of lords and the practice of conferring titles generally is continued, we may have an aristocracy before many years. This country is a democracy, and I think it is the wish of the people that it should remain democratic; that Canada should not have an aristocracy. The second chamber, which is a revising body, should keep in touch with the views and the wishes of the people. Although I want to see reforms adopted, I doubt very much whether the making of the Senate elective instead of selective would bring about the desired results.

Mr. BOULAY (Rimouski) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I regret to say I am not learned in the law, and I have not the slightest intention to discuss the motion introduced by my hon. friend from Welland (Mr. German); I beg, however, to be allowed a few remarks on the question now before the House.

It is to be deplored that the hon. member for Welland did not see fit to bring up this resolution when his party was in power; its chance of becoming law would then have been better. I feel, however, that I owe him my congratulations: Personally I am in favour of an elective senate such as he suggests. The scheme is fully in line with democratic principles and would be of great advantage in many cases. The system would allow every section of the population to elect its own representative to the Upper House, while at present senators are appointed from Quebec or Montreal to represent rural districts, such as the division of the Gulf, for instance. Such dealings are detrimental to the electors of the sections concerned; it often happens that senators are unknown to the people they are supposed to represent and are themselves unacquainted with the residents of their senatorial division. How then can they properly look after the interests of their constituency?

Even should the present system of appointment be continued, it seems to me that the government of the day should always pay heed to such requirements; but with an elective senate such as advocated by the hon. member for Welland and with senators elected for a period of ten years or more, as suggested by the hon. member for Prescott (Mr. Proulx), there would be no opportunity for such unfair treatment; the voters would always see that they elect to the Senate the man that is most agreeable to them.

I also think that age should be taken into account; old age affects a senator's efficiency and power just as it affects efficiency and power of a man in any station of life. An elective Upper House would also obviate that drawback.

Another point; I believe that the senatorial representation ought to be proportionate to the population of every province as is that of the House of Commons. Accepting 24 as the number of Quebec senators, I think it might be taken as a basis to determine the number of senators to which the other provinces are entitled; the system would then be the same as that whereby the number of representatives in this House is computed. It seems to me that in this way the whole of Canada would be more fairly represented. Of course, certain provinces would lose some of their senators, but it is only fair that their representation in the Upper House be in proportion to their population. At present the province of Quebec counts only one senator for every 83,000 people, while Prince Edward Island with a population of 90,000 or 92,000 is represented by four. In this way the province of Quebec is not accorded fair treatment.

I do think that the appointment of a committee, from both sides of the House, as suggested by the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Maclean) and the hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Nickle) to seriously investigate the question would be the most expedient method of arriving at a solution and satisfy all parties concerned. I hope the suggestion will be favourably considered by the members of the two political parties of the country.

[Mr. Boulay.]

Rt. Hon. Sir GEORGE FOSTER (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I have been interested in the discussion which has taken place on this subject, and, of course, I would have been all the more interested had a greater number of hon. members spoken. I do not think it at all follows that because nearly fifty years ago a certain method was adopted, under then existing conditions, to frame a political constitution, the time may not come when that constitution ought to be revised so as to conform with the social and political changes which have occurred in the interim. Of course, discussion and thoughtful consideration are necessary preliminaries to any such change. On such a subject as this, I always hail with pleasure a really earnest conversation in this House, and one bereft of any party animus. My hon. friend, the proposer of this resolution (Mr. German) has, in his remarks, offered a delightful opportunity for a little criticism, were I disposed to indulge in it, in that he accused himself of seeming inconsistency. We have all, however, been in that position, more or less, and it is hardly fair to animadvert in that respect. My hon. friend (Mr. German) seemed to be striving after an upper chamber, the members of which should have neither party bias nor political principles, but I think most people will agree that it is not necessary to delete political principles from a legislative body which has to deal with governmental and administrative measures. I am partly in sympathy with my hon. friend in that I would prefer a Senate that was less strongly partisan than a House of Commons. But to my mind the hon. gentleman is steering straight towards methods which would inevitably result in the election of senators who could not help but have party bias. How are you going to bring about such a change in the habits and opinions of men that, when they are elected to the Senate, they will at once forget the party principles and party affiliations in which they believe and with which they have been surrounded from their earliest years? How are you going to conduct a campaign in a large constituency unless you have a political organization? Will you have a "German" organization or a "Lemieux" organization or a "Copp" organization? Will your organization be personal or will it be political? To my mind it is bound to be a political organization, and being such, it will be a party organization. If you have only two great dominant parties, you will, of a certainty, have two candidates, one of whom will have drawn his support from one party, the other of whom will have drawn his support from the other party, and they will each look for further support to the political party organization with which they have been associated. As a result of a system based on this resolution you must get in the Senate party men. I do not think there is any escape from that conclusion. If you want to get a Senate with the least partyism in it, keep the appointive power. I do not say you will get a stronger Senate in that way, but by reason of the diminution of party strife and party principles due to freedom from future elections, the senators being in that House for the remainder of their life, and not having to cultivate party affiliations in order to make ready for the day when they shall have to account to the people and ask for another term of power, you will get a set of circumstances which will tend to eliminate strong partyism and tend to throw a man upon his own independence. There have been examples over and over again of men of both parties who have very largely lost their partyism in the Senate, and have acted in a way which would seem to commend itself to my hon. friend. If you are going to seek a method by which you will have the least partyism, it will be the appointive method, something such as we have now. I think, however, that by the appointive method, with our political training and methods, we get probably not so strong a set of men as we would get by the elective system. I bear testimony to what my hon. friend has said as to the general character of the Senate, and of the men who have formed our Senate from earliest times to the present. I think they have averaged well with the members of the House of Commons, and that on the whole we have had a Senate of which we need not in any way be ashamed. But I think it is also a fact that the elective method tends to make a stronger Senate, as you then have a Senate which lives closer to the people and studies more closely the trends of business and political thought. I think that has been proven by the system in the United States. I think it goes without saying that the most influential and most important part of the Congress is their Senate; and that body is the stronger and more important, because its members come from the people. They owe their election to the mass of voters they gather to their side, and they gather them to their side because of their own public spirited qualities and character. In the United States the elective senators have on the whole the most representative men.

But are you going to get rid of partyism by having an elective Senate? Australians and Canadians are not so different from each other and my hon. friend for Kingston very properly pointed to the lesson which is taught us by the slightest survey of the working out of the constitution in Australia. I am not saying it to the discredit of the Australians, but I am saying it because I think it is true, that there is not a more strongly partisan body as a Senate anywhere in the world than you find in the Commonwealth of Australia. Yet they are all elected. They were elected on the basis and with the thought—and that part of their constitution was framed on the basis and with the thought—that they would be non-partisan to the largest possible extent, and coming from all the different states would hold the balance equally and justly as between parties. But instead of that they are partisan to a degree; their elections are run on the partisan basis. They have the strength, in the opinion of my hon. friend, that their term is not co-terminus with the term of the members of the Lower House as we would call it. Theirs is a longer term, but they go back to the people periodically. So that, tested by these examples, it does not seem to me that my hon. friend (Mr. German) is by this method going to get the non-partisan body he desires in the Senate. I am not certain that a non-partisan body in the Senate, an entirely neutral body as regards party politics, would be a very workable branch of the governmental machine. In our governmental machine we work through the Government, which commands a majority so long as it does what is about right and holds to the principles of its party; and by the force and power of its organization it is able to get its measures through. But if you have in the Senate an absolutely neutral body politically you are transferring measures from a body which is strongly organized, where the Government and the party that supports it has the power to put through its measures and leaping into the midst of a body which has no organization of that kind, and over which the Government has no power other than the innate value of the legislation which it is seeking to carry through. You may say that that is an excellent test, that if a Government with a strong party behind it throws its strength into a measure and then sends that measure to the other House, if it is proper legislation you may depend upon its getting a fair show. But that may not be the case. I just throw out the suggestion that, looking at it from some points of view, it is not a demerit, but rather a merit that both sides of the House shall owe their fealty and loyalty, in a high and good sense, to the principles which unite and dominate their party. When a party outlives its principles, then some other principles have to be put in their place. That is the line of development in parliamentary and legislative institutions. Speaking as an individual, and not as leading in the House for the time being the party to which I belong, I would like to see some changes instituted so that the constitution of the Senate would in some respects be different from what it is in its general line of representation. It may be idealistic, but I would like to see in the Senate some special representation of great interests in this country other than political interests; for example, the great educational and scientific and moral interests of the country which tend just as much and perhaps even more towards making a country prosperous and great as do iron and copper and lead, and fish, and lumber.

To these intellectual, moral and spiritual forces, I should like to see representation given in the senatorial body; I should like to have those representatives mingle with the representatives of the more material, and in some respects more practical, interests. Could this be brought about, I think it would tend toward better legislation and improved tone in our political life.

These are just a few thoughts which have come to me as this discussion has gone on. What shall we do with the matter, now that it is here? The suggestion is made to send it to a committee of the House, to gather testimony upon the subject. Well, I have seen an infinite number of these committees appointed to gather testimony, and I ask myself what could such a committee gather on this subject that would be of great moment or would greatly help in the solution of this question? Is the country alive to the necessity of a change in the constitution of Senate? It certainly is not showing much interest in the matter. I am not sure but that the country has settled down to the idea that perhaps the system that we have is quite as good as any other. There is not a very wide interest in the subject in this House, so far as I have been able to judge by this debate and similar debates in previous sessions. So, I do not know of any particular good which will come from the appointment of a committee armed with power to send for persons and papers and instructed to collect information as to an ideal constitution for our Senate. The facts can easily be learned. There are the different senatorial bodies of the world with their several constitutions, and any man can within a short time get together the information as to these. This is a question which does not depend so much on information, it seems to me, as upon the careful consideration of the historic development of government in the world in general, and especially in our own country and countries similar to ours. Judgment formed in this way is what will weigh in future changes to be made in the constitution of our Senate. I do not wish to dictate to the House, but as we are few in number this afternoon, and as the subject is an important one and members may desire to consider it for a little time, I would suggest that when we have ended our present discussion, the debate might be adjourned to be taken up later, when we may come to the conclusion to appoint a committee, or to deal with the question in some other way, as we think best.

Rt. Hon. Sir WILFRID LAURIER: The tone of the remarks we have just heard from the leader of the House, Sir George Foster, is most commendable, and will be approved, I am sure, by every member of the House. As he has very properly said, the question is being treated academically, yet it is a very practical question, and I am more pleased than I can say that he has not closed the door to the suggestion of the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Maclean) to refer this matter to a committee. A committee composed of the hon. member for Welland, the hon. member for Halifax, the hon. member for Kingston, and the other hon. gentlemen who have addressed the House on this subject, would be able to collect, I am sure, valuable information on the subject, and to make very useful suggestions. I do not know that there is very much to be collected in the way of definite information, but a committee composed as I have suggested would be able to make a report to the House which would assist us in strengthening one of the weak places in our constitution. For, I have no doubt, if there is a weak point in the constitution of Canada it is in the way our Senate is formed.

The hon. member for Welland has gone back to the origin of Confederation. It is within the knowledge of everybody that from the very day our constitution was adopted, the form of the Senate has been the subject of criticism. If I may be permitted to make a personal confession, I might refer to the fact that the Liberal Convention which met in this city in 1893, suggested the reform of the Senate as one of the reforms to be carried out. When the Liberal party came into office this subject was prominently before it. The Convention, however, had not gone further than to suggest a reform of the Senate—it had not said what that reform should be; and when we came into office it was difficult to get Parliament to agree to this or that reform. The Committee, if appointed would have to decide whether to recommend the continuance of the present system of appointment by the Crown—with any modifications that they might think best—or whether we should adopt the method of electing members to the Senate. When Confederation was under consideration, the legislature of the two Provinces of Upper and Lower Canada had a second chamber which was elective. The Convention which was held in 1864, had to consider whether there should be a second chamber or only one. The unanimous opinion was that, especially as a federal system was to be adopted, a second chamber was indispensable. The question then was whether it should be an elective chamber or one nominated by the Crown. As the hon. member for Welland has said, when Upper and Lower Canada were joined in 1841, the second chamber was made up of members nominated by the Crown, but this had not been satisfactory, and was changed in 1854, and then followed elections in 1856, 1858, and so on, as the hon. member has stated. I cannot agree with the hon. member for Welland, for I think that the elective system adopted in 1854, brought to the House a very high class of intellect indeed. Among those who were elected to this Legislative Council from the Province of Upper Canada were Mr. Vankoughnet, Mr. Christie, Mr. Macpherson, and I think Mr. Aikins, father of the present Lieutenant-Governor of Manitoba. Among those brought to the Chamber from Lower Canada were Sir Etienne Paschal Taché, Mr. Dessaulles, and Mr. Lacoste, with quite a number of other of similar high standing in the community. In 1864, however, when the convention sat in Quebec to prepare for Confederation, we must remember that we were in the throes of the American Civil War, and there was an impression rather prevalent that democracy might not succeed, and that it might be just as well not to have an absolutely democratic Parliament, but to retain something of the more Conservative system of Europe and of Great Britain. The system adopted, whether it was wise or not, did not give full satisfaction. When the Liberal party came into office in 1896 we had that question before us and the difficulty that we had was to determine whether the elective or the nominative system was the better. I personally would have been in favour of the American system, which provided for the election of the Senate, not by the people, but by the legislatures. Under that system, extending over a period of seventy or eighty years, the American Senate was probably one of the most potent and able legislative bodies in the world. They had in it such men as Webster, Clay, Calhoun, Douglas and Chase, the very elite of all that was intellectual, dignified and able in the United States. But, whether right or wrong, the accusation was made afterwards that the Senate had deteriorated and had become an assembly of plutocrats. As a consequence the system has been abolished and now the senators are elected directly by the people. These views created their impression upon us and we did not do anything.

I am glad that this discussion has taken place and that it has been free from all party allusions. But I think we might say that the present system of appointment has given us a Canadian Senate of which we have no cause to be ashamed, whether on one side of the other. The appointments, on the whole, have been very creditable to both sides. The Government of Sir John Macdonald made some very good appointments, the late Government made some very good appointments, and the present Government have made some good appointments. They are not all equal; they cannot be all equal. As to the object which my hon. friend from Welland seeks to obtain—a non-partisan body—I quite agree with my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce that it is impossible to have a non-partisan body. It is not in accordance with our system of Government. Our Government is founded, and carried on, upon the party system and so long as we retain that system, and so long as we have a first and second chamber they must reflect the opinion of the community. It will be on one side or the other side of politics. Whether we are to have an elective system or not—and I would favour it very much—it is not free from the difficulties and the objections which have been mentioned by my hon. friend from Kingston (Mr. Nickle) but it is a question which is worthy of very serious consideration. I believe that if a committee were appointed, whether they decide in favour of an elective system or another system, or whether they decide a favour of the present system of appointment by the Crown, they would perhaps find it proper to recommend that the appointment should not be for life but for a stated period, say seven years, or perhaps ten or eleven years. There is a certain amount of work in a man and it is better that the members of a body of this kind should be replaced from time to time. What to do with the present members of the Senate is another question but I think we have a very wise precedent in that which was adopted by the Canadian Legislature in 1854. On the whole, I wish to express my satisfaction again to my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce that he has not closed the debate but that he has agreed that it should be adjourned and that it may be resumed. I favour having the matter referred to a select body to give us the benefit of their thought and consideration. I do not believe there is much to be gained by calling witnesses, but if you have men who can give us the benefit of their thought, experience, study and reading appointed to a committee of this kind, I believe that they would certainly be able to furnish us with a very valuable report upon the subject.

On motion of Sir George Foster the debate was adjourned.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess.

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

CAPITAL PUNISHMENT—WOMEN AND CHILDREN.

On motion of Mr. Bickerdike, That in the opinion of this House, the best interests of this young nation would be conserved by amending the Criminal Code so as to abolish the death penalty in Canada in so far at least as it applies to women and children.

Mr. SPEAKER: I find that I shall have to rule that this motion is out of order. Bourinot, at page 328, says:

It is an ancient rule of Parliament that no question or motion can regularly be offered if it is substantially the same with one on which a judgment of the House has already been expressed during the current session.

This subject in all its phases was fully discussed on the second reading of Bill No. 83, to amend the Criminal Code, introduced by the hon. member for the St. Lawrence division of Montreal (Mr. Bickerdike). The abolition of capital punishment as it applies to women and children was included in the objects of that Bill. The resolution of the hon. member is therefore out of order.

SEED GRAIN—EASTERN CANADA.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. C. A. GAUVREAU (Temiscouta): I would like to ask if there is any foundation for a statement which I find in L'Evenement, of Quebec, of Thursday last, as follows:

Owing to the foresight of the Federal Government, 400,000 bushels of seed grain has been purchased in the West for distribution throughout the eastern provinces. This grain has been inspected and selected by the Government inspectors from Ottawa, having at their head Mr. J. A. Simard, of Quebec. One million bushels of grain has been so inspected and nearly half of it will be allotted to the eastern provinces. Fifteen carloads have already been shipped into the Lake St. John district.

I should like to know if there is any foundation for the statement in L'Evenement.

Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Solicitor General): This matter properly comes under the Department of Agriculture, and I shall therefore make no reply beyond saying that I am aware that last summer a commission was appointed to take in hand the seed grain situation in the West. That commission had certain purchasing powers with regard to seed grain, the intention being to prevent the draining of the country of seedable wheat in particular, and also other grains. I shall bring the matter to the attention of the Minister of Agriculture, who will further answer the hon. member tomorrow.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Did I understand that that commission was empowered to deal with the seed grain question in the West, not in the East?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The commission was composed of Mr. Wilson of Indian Head, Mr. Govan of the same place, and Mr. Morrison of Winnipeg. Thus its personnel was western. I do not think the terms of the Order in Council confined their duties to the West. However, it was the seedable wheat of the West that was particularly in mind, as the reports of our seed grain officers were to the effect that there was danger that such portion of western wheat as was fit for seed would likely be purchased particularly by American seed commission merchants, and that we might find ourselves without sufficient seed. I should say that the intention was that the municipalities should do the purchasing, and in the main they did so, the efforts of the commission being directed to calling the attention of the municipal officers to the requirements of the time and urging them to take all possible means to see that there was sufficient seed for the municipality. I rather think the scope of the commission was later extended, but I shall leave that for the minister himself to define.

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT—DIVORCED PERSONS.

On the Order for the second reading of Bill No. 4, to amend the Criminal Code, Mr. Pugsley.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The hon. member for St. John asked me to move the second reading of this Bill. The purpose of it is to relieve from the charge of bigamy persons who have contracted marriage in a foreign country after a divorce procured in such foreign country, under certain conditions which are set forth in clause 4 (a). I was instructed by the hon. member for St. John that it was arranged with the Minister of Justice that the Bill should be referred to a select committee, and, that being the case, it is unnecessary that I should say anything further about it.

Motion agreed to and Bill read the second time.

ACT RESPECTING COMPANIES.

On the motion of Mr. A. K. Maclean for the second reading of Bill No. 43, respecting Companies.

Mr. MACLEAN: I desire to move the second reading of this Bill. As I stated on the introduction of the Bill, it was prepared by a committee of the Canadian Bar Association and I think all the members of that committee are members of the Bar in the western provinces; at any rate the Bill was submitted to me in the form in which it is now before the House, and I undertook, on behalf of the President of the Canadian Bar Association, Sir James Aikins, to introduce it and to ask the House to refer it to a select committee for consideration. Hon. gentlemen will see, upon looking at the Bill, that it is largely a compilation made from the Companies Acts of the western provinces, British Columbia, Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba, some sections being taken from the Ontario Act. I do not approve of a great many features of the Bill as it stands. Being a compilation, it naturally has the weaknesses which Bills prepared in that manner usually have. However, I am authorized to say that those who are responsible for the preparation of the Bill are not wedded to its exact provisions.

It is the desire of the Canadian Bar Associaiton that we endeavour to secure uniformity in company legislation throughout all Canada, and its provinces. There is also a desire on the part of the legal profession in Canada—and many others outside the profession as well—for uniformity in company legislation throughout the Empire. Such uniformity is desirable in the interest of trade and commerce. It would mean a great deal for Canada if our company legislation were, as far as possible, in conformity with the English Companies Act. It would facilitate business transactions and encourage investment of capital in Canada if British investors knew that our law respecting corporations was substantially the same as that which obtained in England. The matter of uniformity of company legislation has been considered by the Imperial conferences on more than one occasion. I have before me a memorandum that was prepared for the Imperial Conference of 1911 by direction of the British Board of Trade. At that conference the following resolution was adopted with regard to the uniformity of formation, management and winding-up of joint stock companies:

> That it is desirable so far as circumstances permit to secure greater uniformity of the company laws of the Empire, and that the memorandum and analysis prepared on this subject by the Imperial Government be noted for the consideration of the various governments represented at the Conference.

In the same memorandum I observe a resolution which had been passed by the Chamber of Commerce of Victoria, Australia. I should like to read this resolution, because it expresses what I wish to say concerning the desirability of adhering as closely as possible to the English Act. It is as follows:—

We strongly approve of the desire which has been manifested to assimilate our law to the English Companies Act, 1908, and consider that, except in certain matters referred to later, the more nearly our law is made to resemble the English Act the greater will be the advantage, as the legal profession and the courts will then have the advantage of the English text books and decisions explaining and interpreting the law. This in our opinion will make for certainty, and we deprecate anything in the nature of trifling deviations from the English Act that will tend to have an opposite effect.

The English Companies Act is well known to the legal profession in Canada, and in many of the provinces its main provisions have already been adopted. The first English Act was adopted, I think, in 1844, and there have been several amending and consolidating Acts since then. The existing Act is known as the Companies Consolidated Act, 1908. It has been the subject of many dicta and decisions by the English courts, which are more or less known to the Canadian bar; therefore, as the resolution passed by the Chamber of Commerce of Victoria very properly sets forth, it is very much in the interest of the public that we take advantage of the experience with the English by adopting it here insofar as possible. The provinces of British Columbia, Alberta, Saskatchewan and Nova Scotia have the English Act in its main features. The other provinces have as well many features of the English Act, though in many important respects it has never been adopted. There is one distinction which I should like to explain to the House between the company Acts of several of the Canadian provinces and which have adopted the English Act in principle and the company law of other of the provinces and the Federal law as well, and that is in reference to incorporation. In some of the Canadian provinces the principle of incorporation by registration has been adopted. That is, applicants for incorporation as a company file a document with the proper officer setting forth the purposes or objects of the company and the capital of the company, which document is known as the memorandum of association. Concurrently with the filing of the memorandum of association they file what is known as the articles of association, and then the certificate of incorporation issues as a matter of course. The memorandum is, in fact, the constitution of the company and the articles of association are the by-laws of the company. The issuance of the certificate of incorporation is purely a ministerial Act. It issues to the incorporators as a matter of right, not as a matter of grace; it cannot be refused. I think that principle is sound, and, for the sake of uniformity, should be adopted in all the provinces of Canada. We should adopt that principle in the Canadian Companies' Act; we have not now any provision to that effect. In the provinces of Ontario, Quebec, New Brunswick and Manitoba and under the Canadian Companies' Act, we have incorporation by letters patent, so called. That is, the applicants petition a person or body designated by statute to be incorporated as a company under a stated name. It is known to lawyers as a common law corporation, and it has been decided by our courts that a company incorporated by letters patent has the capacity of a natural person. That is to say, a company incorporated in the province of Ontario under letters patent has greater capacity than a company incorporated in the province of British Columbia under the registration principle, or greater than a company incorporated in England under the English Companies' Act.

The distinction is one that has not heretofore been generally understood in Canada. In fact, it was only recently determined judicially that there existed between companies incorporated under letters patent and companies incorporated by registration, such a broad distinction as to their powers and capacities. The theory is that a company incorporated under letters patent derives its existence from the prerogative of the Sovereign, and not from any statute. In England many years ago companies could be created only by charter granted by the Sovereign. Gradually Parliament undertook to create corporations, but they did so, not under the common law, but by changing the law. There should not be in Canada any such thing as incorporation by letters patent. In a democratic country like this, it should be the natural and inherent right of any body of men to associate themselves together as an incorporation for private business; that right to incorporation should not be dependent upon the discretion or grace of any sovereign, government or minister. It is an unfortunate principle to have in our law, and I protest against a further continuance of the principle in the company law of this country, at least insofar as the Canada Companies Act is concerned. This distinction was given emphasis recently by virtue of a case which arose in the Yukon in connection with a company incorporated under letters patent in the province of Ontario for the purpose of carrying on a mining business. The company made application for mining leases from the Yukon Council. Litigation arose by reason of the applcation, and the power of this company, provincially incorporated, to acquire a lease outside of the province of Ontario was questioned. The Canadian courts held that the company did not have the power to hold a license issued by any authority outside of the province of Ontario. The case went to the Privy Council, where it was held that the company, being a corporation created under letters patent, had wider powers than a company created under the registration system, and that therefore, being a common law corporation, it had the capacity of a natural person to receive licenses from the Yukon Council. Naturally this decision caused some consternation in Canada. If the decision is a good one—and I assume it is—a company incorporated by letters patent may, it is argued by some, carry on a business outside of the objects defined in its charter. Nothing is ultra vires of the company, and therefore the whole position of the bondholders and shareholders would be altogether changed if this extreme view of the law is correct. For the reasons I have already given; for the purpose of having uniformity of company legislation, I think it is desirable that incorporation under letters patent should be abandoned in the three or four provinces of Canada which still retain that principle, and particularly the Canada Companies Act, which is within our jurisdiction, should adopt the registration principle.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I understand that when incorporation under letters patent is asked for, at least in the province of Quebec, notices are published in the Official Gazette and in the press giving the purport and object of the company to be incorporated, and although the granting of letters patent is an old privilege of a king, as a matter of fact, letters patent are granted by the Secretary of State after the proposed incorporation has been considered by the Minister in Council, so that the public gets all the protection necessary, and it is not only according to the fiat of the King or the Lieutenant Governor for the King that letters patent are issued. The people are amply protected, it seems to me.

Mr. MACLEAN: If a company is incorporated by letters patent, the directors may exceed the powers granted by the patent and they may commit the shareholders to projects not contemplated in the charter and projects which the shareholders did not wish to embark upon.

Mr. LEMIEUX: When the Companies case went before the Privy Council, I think it was decided on a much broader basis than that. It seems to me that the Privy Council decided that certain companies incorporated by the provinces could have the whole Dominion as a domain.

Mr. MACLEAN: The Privy Council held that this company created under letters patent, issued by the Governor in Council of Ontario was a common law corporation and had all the rights of a natural person. That is, if the company had been created for the purpose of carrying on a mining business, they might, by virtue of the fact that their charter emanated from the representative of the Sovereign, go beyond their defined powers and commence, say an insurance business or any other business, that a natural person might engage in. That, perhaps, is rather an extreme interpretation of the decision but even in that case, we lack the legal machinery to prevent such a course, even if it was ultra vires of the company. It is true, as my hon. friend states, that in Quebec we see numerous lengthy advertisements in the newspapers, and in the Royal Canada Gazette, to the effect that certain individuals have been incorporated as a company, these advertisements setting forth as well the powers and objects of the companies. It is a most objectionable practise and means a great waste of money and of paper. It is something that we should have long ago been rid of. I understand that under the present Companies' Act of the province of Quebec, companies are permitted to publish an abridged advertisement. In respect of companies incorporated under the Canada Companies Act we solemnly go through the farce of compelling companies to publish in newspapers and in the Royal Gazette lengthy advertisements respecting their incorporation which accomplishes no useful purpose whatever.

This Bill provides for the adoption of the registration system and the abolition of the letters patent system. In that respect the Bill, the second reading of which I am now moving, is a departure from the present Companies' Act. I can hardly undertake to explain its further provisions, because it is a very lengthy Bill, and I am sure a detailed explanation on my part would not interest many members of the House.

It might be of some interest to members of the legal profession, but I am sure they do not now desire any lengthy explanation of the whole Bill. It is very important, I think, that we should have a new Dominion Companies Act. Our present Act was ill-conceived originally, and it has never been improved. It is hardly worthy of the name of a Companies Act. Structurally it is weak and incomplete, and it has not kept pace with the development of company law in this country. Company law, I think I may say with accuracy, is now one of the most important branches of our law. The greater volume of our business is done through the avenue of corporations, and without them we never could have reached our present stage of development. It would be impossible to mobilize money from all parts of the world for our purposes by means of unlimited corporations or partnerships, and it is inevitable that in the future the great proportion of our business will be conducted by and through corporations. In fact, it is the only proper method to conduct a business of any magnitude whatever. It is important therefore that we have a substantial body of statute law in respect to companies for the guidance of corporations and in order to safeguard the public. I have already stated that it should be the inherent right of men to become incorporated; for private purposes. There should be no such thing as solemnly presenting a petition praying the Governor in Council or any other body or person that certain persons may be incorporated as a company.

Mr. LEMIEUX: It is no protection to the public.

Mr. MACLEAN: None whatever, but the public should be protected in many other ways. The chief characteristic of a corporation is its limited liability, and for that reason we should take great care to safeguard the public against any fraud or abuse of the privilege of limited liability by corporations. Now, the present Canada Companies Act affords little protection to the public. I do not propose detaining the House to enumerate the many things which are lacking in this Act and which one would naturally expect to find there. For instance, there is nothing in the Act, I think, requiring the directors to call annually a meeting of shareholders. Nor is there anything corresponding to the clauses in the English Act relating to directors' liability, although most of the provinces have that provision.

The directors' liability clauses make directors liable for untrue statements in the prospectus. There are also provisions in the English Companies Act, and in most of the provincial Acts, relating to allotment of shares which we do not find in this Act. I do not think there is much that can be said in favour of the present Canada Companies Act, and it is very desirable it should be substituted by some other enactment which would be more in the interest of shareholders, the investing public and corporations themselves.

There is a feature which I should like to see introduced into our Act, and the only hope of getting it is from the Government. A great deal of doubt exists as to the capacity of a company provincially incorporated to carry on its business outside of the province in which it is incorporated. True there have been judicial decisions upon that point, but the public mind is very unsettled, with the result that most companies prefer a federal charter so as to escape the liability of an attack upon their powers to do extra-provincial business. I should like to see in the Canada Companies Act a provision making each province a separate district for federal purposes, and making the registrar of joint stock companies under the provincial Acts, a federal officer for the incorporation of companies under the federal Act. This would enable persons in the province of Nova Scotia or British Columbia say, to obtain a federal charter through the registrar of joint stock companies in their own province very quickly, The only difficulty would be as to the division of the fee for the incorporation between the province and the Dominion Government. There should be very little difficulty about that. I think in such matters the Government might treat the provinces generously, as doubtless the revenue derived from the incorporation of companies is an important matter to the provinces. I should like the Minister of Justice to take this matter into consideration and endeavour to make some arrangement with the several provinces by which companies can be incorporated at the capitals of the several provinces, the officer administering the provincial Companies' Act acting for the time being as a Federal officer. I think the provincial authorities would be disposed to assist in carrying out such an arrangement. I do not think I shall occupy the time of the House further. I would ask, in conclusion, that the Bill be referred to a select committee limited to, say, seven or nine members, and I trust that this suggestion will meet with the approval of the Government.

Mr. COPP: Has this Bill reference to the incorporation of companies under provincial charters?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: No, it is purely a Federal Act.

Hon. C. J. DOHERTY: I have glanced through the Bill, but I am not in position to discuss its terms or provisions at this moment. I think it may be freely admitted that there is great room for improvement in our present Dominion companies' legislation. A Bill was prepared in the last session of the last Parliament, if my memory serves me right, and was sent to the Banking and Commerce Committee.

At all events, it did not become law. Since then it has been given consideration at different times, but this has never resulted in the production of a Bill. The source from which this Bill emanates, not only as coming from the hon. gentleman, but also as being the result of discussion of the Bar Association, would give us assurance that its provisions had been well considered, and so there is good reason to hope that these provisions, if embodied in law, would be in the interests of the country. As I said, I am not prepared to discuss the Bill this evening, nor do I desire to do so. With regard to the suggestion in favour of adopting the system of granting charters that is in use in England, I am not prepared to accept the proposition that it would be a very much better system for us than the present system of issuing charters by letters patent. On the other hand neither am I saying that it would not be an improvement. I would not care to commit myself on that proposition at this moment.

One argument used in support of the change is that everybody ought to be free, without being obliged to make a petition, and without being dependent upon the consent of the Crown or of any minister to become incorporated in accordance with the law. Though, as I understand, the present procedure involves a petition and the issuing of letters patent by the Secretary of State, yet any person who makes such a petition and conforms with the provisions of the statute is, as a matter of right and not as a matter of grace merely, entitled to the grant of his letters patent.

Mr. MACLEAN: If the Secretary of State refused, he would not be liable to mandamus by the court. But in the province of British Columbia, or in Nova Scotia, if the Registrar of Joint Stock Companies refused to issue a certificate of incorporation, he could be enjoined by the courts.

Mr. DOHERTY: Personally, I am inclined to agree with the hon. member that the Secretary of State would not be subject to mandamus. But I do not think that the proposition that he would not be so liable is quite as unquestioned as the hon. member seems to consider it. We had some discussion on that question, connected with the issue of some charters for racing associations. The question was debated in the last Parliament, when some question arose as to the action of the then Government upon the subject. I have a clear recollection that the Secretary of State of that day took the position that it was not a matter of discretion, but was a matter of right of the parties petitioning for the letters patent. I would not like to make this further affirmation as positively, but the impression that remained on my mind was that he even took the view that the Secretary of State might be liable to mandamus. I do know that the question arising again after this Government came into power—with regard also to the issuing of letters patent to incorporate racing associations—I, following in the footsteps of my predecessor, took the view that it was not a matter of discretion but was a matter of right. And I may say that for that reason, and that reason alone, I advised that certain petitions which were lying in the Secretary of State's Department, and had been lying there for a long time, should be granted; though simultaneously we introduced legislation to prevent such a thing happening again in regard to racing associations in the future. I am under the impression that decisions were submitted to me, that came from the Secretary of State's Department, going so far as to hold that a mandamus might issue to compel the performance of the duty—treating the duty of the Secretary of State as a purely ministerial function. As to that proposition, I should like to make my own reserve, because I think there is a distinction to be made, perhaps, between even the ministerial duty when performed by a person in the quality of Minister of the Crown and when performed as a ministerial duty by any other public servant. I am not saying that a mandamus could not issue, but I am inclined to agree with the hon. member, Mr. Maclean, that it could not. But, there is a difference of opinion, and, if my memory is correct, I was furnished with authority, though I do not say that I was prepared to accept it, for the proposition that a mandamus might issue. However, I think we may anticipate that no Secretary of State will fail to perform the duty incumbent upon him in this matter. However, it is a legal question. Other methods could be found if it was thought desirable to make it quite clear that those who issue letters patent under the Companies' Acts enacted by the provinces or enacted by ourselves, would be governed absolutely by the statute and not entitled to fall back upon the, to my mind, not very clearly defined capacity that, in the case to which the hon. gentleman referred, it was held they derived from the fact that our system involves the issuing of letters patent. There was in the case the hon. gentleman referred to a question of provincial letters patent issued by the Lieutenant Governor of the province. It was contended that the Lieutenant Governor, being vested with the Crown's perogative in regard to the province, had powers not derived exclusively from the statute of the province, and not necessarily limited within the territorial boundaries of the province. If I correctly grasped the effect of the judgment when I had occasion to read it some time ago, and if my memory serves me, I did not quite apprehend that the judgment determined that the particular corporation thus authorized—in this case the Bonanza Mining Company—had power other than the power conferred upon it by its charter. I would not have been disposed to think as the hon. gentleman suggests, that the company being incorporated to carry on a mining business, might under the judgment, have carried on an insurance business.

Mr. MACLEAN: That is contended by some; but, of course, the view which the Minister of Justice is putting forward is held by others.

Mr. DOHERTY: I am not suggesting that my view should necessarily prevail, but I am trying to convey what I understood to be the effect of the judgment. I do not understand the effect to be that the corporation created by the province and under the provincial statute, though by letters patent issued by the Lieutenant Governor, would enjoy any power other than the letters patent themselves as authorized by the statute would confer. What I understood to have been held was that, in so far as the charter derived its effectiveness from being granted by the Lieutenant Governor in the exercise of the prerogative powers referred to, the created corporation became a person with the capacities of a natural person from which the conclusion was drawn, that that capacity as a person was not territorially limited, that the person that was so created under letters patent issued under the prerogative powers of the Crown was a person who might go to the Yukon, and, if, under the laws of the Yukon, or any other country or province that that person went into, those charged with the legislative power in that particular country chose to recognize him as an existing person and allow him to proceed to carry out his powers within their territory, he then could lawfully do so. I did not grasp the judgment as conveying the idea that the created corporation had more powers than its letters patent, or the statute under which they were issued, gave it, but merely as holding that its personal existence was not limited within the territorial boundary of the province in which it was created, and that therefore if it went out into another province, if that other province chose to permit, or not to interfere, it might proceed with the exercise of the powers that had been conferred upon it just as any corporation does that goes into a foreign country. All of our corporations, when they go into a foreign country, derive their existence from no legislative body or no authority which has power to confer upon them either existence or powers to be exercised within the foreign country, but under the ordinary principle of the comity of nations, a corporation, when it goes into a foreign country, is allowed, in the majority of cases, to carry on the business it was incorporated to carry on, but I doubt very much if it would be suggested that it could carry on a business for which it was never incorporated. However, it is perhaps not necessary to go into this discussion for the purpose of what I desire to say. I think we can all readily agree that there is room for improvement in our present company legislation and the source from which this proposition comes gives us reason to believe that it certainly calls for a great deal of consideration on our part. As regards the hon. gentleman's suggestion that this should go to a special committee, I would ask him whether he does not think it might be as advantageously dealt with by being referred to the committee on Banking and Commerce. I would not speak positively, but my impression is that when we dealt with the subject on a previous occasion, the Bill was referred to the committee on Banking and Commerce. I would suggest to the hon. gentleman that it cannot make any great difference because if the Bill went to the Banking and Commerce committee it might constitute another smaller committee to make a special study of the matter. If that were done we would have the advantage of a special study of the matter by a smaller committee and also the advantage of the examination of the whole question by the Banking and Commerce committee before it came back to this House. I do not want to be very insistent upon my suggestion but if it met with the approval of the hon. gentleman I think that would be as good a way as this bill could be dealt with.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I hope the Minister of Justice will not insist upon the Banking and Commerce Committee. I do not know how that committee is constituted at the present time, but I think if this Bill is to be considered by a committee at all it should go before a select committee. It will require the almost constant work 9 pm. of a committee for more than a month, perhaps more than two months, to go over its provisions; in fact, I should not be surprised if the committee appointed were unable to report at this session. I think it would be unwise to place the Bill before a general committee; I think it really should go before a select committee and I hope the minister will agree to that.

Mr. DOHERTY: Perhaps we might allow the Bill to have its second reading with the understanding that, of course, we are not binding ourselves to anything in it and with the further understanding that it will be referred to a committee. Perhaps we can come to some arrangement as to what is the best way to deal with the matter.

Motion agreed to and Bill read the second time.

INSURANCE ACT AMENDMENT.

On the motion for the second reading of Bill No. 45, to amend the Insurance Act.

Mr. W. H. BENNETT (Simcoe): I would ask that the order be dropped, reserving the right to re-introduce the Bill. The terms of it are not in accordance with the wishes of the parties interested. I beg to move, therefore, that the order be discharged.

Motion agreed to and order discharged.

DOMINION LANDS ACT AMENDMENT.

On the motion for the second reading of Bill No. 12, to amend the Dominion Lands Act.

Mr. G. E. McCRANEY (Saskatoon): Mr. Speaker, I have been advised that as this Bill purports to deal with property belonging to the Crown, it will be necessary to have the approval of the Governor General. I ask your ruling on that point, and if your ruling is to the effect that the assent of the Governor General is necessary I will move for leave to withdraw the Bill.

Mr. SPEAKER: I think there is no question that the purpose of this Bill is to dispose of the property of the Crown. While it is perfectly competent for an hon. gentleman to introduce a Bill of this kind, and while there would be no objection to the Bill having its second reading, it cannot receive its third reading without the consent of the Crown. Unless that consent is forthcoming there is no object in proceeding further with the Bill.

Mr. McCRANEY: In pursuance of your ruling, Mr. Speaker, I move that leave be granted to withdraw the Bill.

Motion agreed to and Bill withdrawn.

THE SOLDIER SETTLEMENT BOARD.

On the motion of Hon. W. J. Roche, for the House to go into Committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient to establish a board, to be called "The Soldier Settlement Board," consisting of three commissioners, and to provide for salaries and expenses in connection therewith, and to empower the Minister of the Interior, at the request of the board, to reserve such Dominion lands as may be required, and upon the recommendation of the board, to grant a free entry for not more than one hundred and sixty acres of such reserved lands to any person who has served in the naval or military expeditionary forces of the United Kingdom or of any of the self-governing British dominions or colonies, and who has left the forces with an honourable record or who has been honourably discharged, and the widow of any such person who died on active service, subject to such conditions as in the opinion of the Governor in Council are necessary to secure the use of the land for the purpose for which it is granted; and further to provide that the board may loan, upon such terms and conditions as may be prescribed, to any such settler an amount not exceeding two thousand dollars for acquiring land for agricultural purposes, payment of encumbrances on lands used for agricultural purposes, improvement of agricultural lands, erection of farm buildings and purchase of stock, machinery and equipment, the money to be expended under the supervision of the board, and all expenditure made under the terms of this resolution to be paid out of such moneys as Parliament may appropriate for the purpose.

Hon. W. J. ROCHE (Minister of the Interior): I presume the House will expect some explanation in regard to this resolution, the subject matter of which, the members will agree, is of very great importance not only to the returned soldiers whom it is intended to benefit and assist, but also to the people of our country generally. Canada is essentially an agricultural country. We have millions of acres of unsettled and unproductive land and we require agricultural population in order to reap the benefit of our great agricultural resources. We have been holding out as an inducement to secure immigrants for our western lands a free grant of 160 acres of homestead land, together with an additional 160 acres as a pre-emption in what is known as the pre-emption district, namely, certain portions of Alberta and Saskatchewan, at $3 an acre, subject to specified settlement conditions. This has resulted in attracting to our western prairies tens of thousands of settlers who otherwise might not have located in Canada. They have come from almost every civilized country in the world from which we cared to receive immigrants. They have, with but very few exceptions, made good, law-abiding citizens and successful farmers. Fortunately for us, however, in this period of national crisis, we have had the preponderance of our population Canadian and British-born. It is therefore, in my opinion, of the greatest importance, not only from a sentimental but also from a national and economic standpoint, that we should maintain, to as great an extent as possible, the British element in our population. Those countries that have experienced great wars in years gone by have found that after the signing of peace a period of unrest has followed, which culminated finally in an emigration to a greater or lesser extent from these countries. Having this in view, the British Government, although most desirous to retain their own soldier population in their own country and with this object in view have in contemplation a land settlement policy of their own, are desirous, in order to retain the British population within the British Empire, of securing the co-operation of the overseas British Dominions. About one year ago, Sir Rider Haggard, in an honourary capacity, representing the Royal Colonial Institute visited the overseas Dominions for the purpose of seeing first-hand what facilities, if any, were to be afforded ex-service men of the British Isles for locating upon lands in the British Dominions; and while his mission was in no sense an official mission in so far as the Government was concerned, still it was undertaken with their knowledge and consent, and, personally, I am of the opinion that the report of his mission played at least some part in the calling of the recent Imperial conference wherein representatives of the various British Dominions and the Imperial Government conferred on questions of great Imperial importance, chief amongst which was emigration and the various policies for settlement of returned soldiers. After the Boer war, the usual period of unrest followed in England, which resulted in 1903 in 259,000 of her sons locating in other lands. Of this number 123,000 located in the United States of America and were lost to the Empire. When the bugle call resounded throughout the Empire after the outbreak of the present war summoning her sons to the defence of those principles for which the British Empire stood, a comparatively small percentage of those so alienated responded to the call. And why? Because they had lost, in the meantime, their British citizenship, because another country had claimed them, because they had entered into large business engagements and contracted family ties with those of a country other than their own, and so had lost either the inclination or the ability to do battle on behalf of the country of their birth. How different it was with those who had located in the British Dominions, in Canada, Australia, New Zealand, and the other British possessions! The splendid response made by Canada, especially in the earlier stages of the war, was largely attributable to the British element of our population, and so it was in the other British Dominions. While we all earnestly hope and pray that this may be the last great war in which our Empire will be engaged—and this one has been thrust upon it—still we must realize that, so long as selfishness and misguided ambitions direct men's actions, so long as world-domination and conquest are the guiding principles of the life of any nation, so long as the pernicious doctrine that might is right is inculcated into any considerable number of people having both the inclination and power to enforce that doctrine, so long must we look for disturbances of the world's peace, in which, perchance, our Empire may be involved in defence of its national honour. It, therefore, becomes the part of British statesmen, using the term British in the widest sense, to do our utmost, in order to provide against a recurrence of a possible contingency of this kind, to retain our own British population within the confines of the British Empire.

As to the best methods to adopt in locating our own Canadian soldiers on our lands—and this, of course, should be our first duty—there undoubtedly is a great diversity and an honest difference of opinion.

Having had the benefit of the views of some of the representatives of the various provincial governments who were assembled at Ottawa in a conference at the invitation of the Prime Minister of this country some few months ago, having a knowledge of the ideas of these gentlemen, having learned of the legislation that has been adopted by some of the provinces regarding the location of returned soldiers and the contemplated legislation on the part of others, the policy decided upon by this Government is, in concrete form, before the House in this resolution, which will be further elaborated in the Bill to be founded on it.

But, before going into the explanation, permit me briefly to refer to some of the legislation, and some of the policies that have been adopted by other British Dominions.

In the session of 1915 the Legislature of New Zealand passed an Act which was confined solely to the locating of New Zealand soldiers who, resident in New Zealand at the outbreak of war, enlisted in the New Zealand Expeditionary Force. In the session of 1916 that Act was amended and widened so as to include those who, resident in New Zealand at the outbreak of war, enlisted in the British Expeditionary Force. It did not go as far as our contemplated legislation, which includes the forces of the whole British Empire. Their legislation provided that the Act should be administered by a Land Board, the regulations recommended by which should be approved by the Minister of Lands. It is estimated that in New Zealand they have about 500,000 acres of lands available, or which may be made available by the expenditure of a certain amount of money, for the locating of returned soldiers. This land is to be disposed of by two methods, not, as in our contemplated legislation, by a free land grant, but by a long term lease or by a sale. If a soldier in New Zealand, under their legislation, desires to secure his land by leasehold, he may do so by paying as a rental 4½ per cent of the total cost of the land as estimated by the Land Board. Should he desire to buy the land, he may do so by paying as a first payment 5 per cent of the total cost of the land, the balance of the payments to be spread over a term of years to be determined in each case by the Land Board, the unpaid balances to bear a rate of interest of five per cent per annum. There does not seem to have been any discrimination in the legislation of New Zealand as between the experienced and the inexperienced farmer, and no provision is made for giving agricultural education to the inexperienced farmer. While not at all desirous of criticising adversely the legislation of a sister dominion, I would go so far as to say that were we to introduce legislation by means of which we should grant money, $1,500, $2,000, $2,500, or whatever it might be, to an absolutely green hand and put him on the land, we should be courting disaster and wasting public money. This, then, is the manner in which the returned soldier secures land under the New Zealand legislation: either by lease or by purchase. But their legislation provides for financial assistance by way of loan not to exceed in any one case £500. This money advance, in the words of the statute, is to bear a reasonable rate of interest to be decided by the Minister of Lands. It is for the purpose of providing equipment and improvements on the farm, and the soldier who purchases stock and implements will give as collateral security a bill of sale upon the stock or implements. Briefly, this is the legislation that has been enacted by New Zealand, the administration of which, as I say, is to be under a set of regulations.

Australia also has had in contemplation a land settlement policy for returned soldiers. In February, 1916, a conference was held at the city of Melbourne which lasted two days, in which all phases of the land settlement policy of returned soldiers were discussed. It was participated in by representatives of the various state governments and of the Commonwealth Government. They passed a series of resolutions setting forth the views of that conference and these resolutions became the basis of a subsequent conference which has recently been held, at which the state governments were represented by their premiers and the Commonwealth Government by the Prime Minister, the Prime Minister of the Commonwealth Government having been in England at the time of the first conference. In effect, they practically adopted the resolutions of the first conference with but comparatively slight changes. The House is aware that the Commonwealth Government of Australia does not own the public lands, except some land in the northern country which is unsuitable for agriculture. The land is in the ownership of the various state governments, and while at that conference it was admitted on the part of the representatives of the state governments that there would be a very great advantage in having the whole question of the location of returned soldiers dealt with by one central government, still, so jealous were they of their state jurisdiction that they would not hand over their lands to the Commonwealth Government, even for this laudable purpose. It was recognized, however, that inasmuch as it would take a considerable amount of money to finance this enterprise —and they expected a considerable percentage of their soldiers to locate on the lands— —and inasmuch as the Commonwealth Government could go into the money markets of the world and borrow money at a lower rate of interest than could the State Governments, it was decided that the State Governments would supply the land, not as our legislation provides, by way of free land grant, but, under their local state land laws, by lease or by sale, and that the Commonwealth Government would supply the money. The Commonwealth Government lends the money to the State Governments and the State Governments, in turn, lend to the returned soldier to enable him to purchase stock and implements, the amount, as in the New Zealand legislation, not to exceed, in any one case £500. This money is to bear a rate of interest for the first year of 3½ per cent, rising by one-half per cent per annum until the cost price of the money has been reached, plus a reasonable amount for working expenses. The difference in the rate of interest—that is, the difference between the rate paid by the returned soldier and the rate paid by the State Government—is to be borne equally by the Commonwealth and the various State Governments. Agricultural instruction is provided under the policy settled upon by Australia, by two methods. The State Governments are to supply agricultural farms, where agricultural instruction may be received. These farms are to be subsidized, pound for pound, by the Commonwealth and the State Governments, and the soldier can receive, if he so chooses, his agricultural training on these agricultural farms, or he may receive his instruction on private farms approved by the State Governments. The policy decided upon by the Commonwealth Government of Australia provides, also, that similar assistance shall be granted to ex-service men of the British army. That goes a little further than the legislation of New Zealand, but not so far as our legislation, which includes the forces of the whole British Empire. This policy of the Commonwealth Government is to be administered by a Land Board, the personnel of which is to be composed of a representative from each of the State Governments and a representative from the Commonwealth Government. This, in short, is the policy which has been decided upon in Australia.

After the South African war we in Canada adopted the policy of issuing scrip to our returned soldiers to the amount of 320 acres to each soldier. Scrip certificates were issued to 7,340 soldiers, and of this number only 657 personally made entry for the land. It is a well known fact that a considerable percentage of this number did not remain permanently upon the land. The scrip was transferable; it became a matter of speculation; indeed, it largely fell into the hands of speculators. To put it mildly, the policy was not a success in placing the soldiers upon the land and keeping them there.

In the light of that experience I venture to say that there could not be found to-day members of any government who would ask a Canadian Parliament for a repetition of that form of recognition for our returned soldiers. In my opinion we can merely speculate as to the number of soldiers whom we may secure, even with the greatest inducements, to locate upon the land. We are informed, on the one hand, by those whose opinions are entitled to every consideration, that a great many returned soldiers who have followed indoor occupations, such as working in shops and factories and clerking in stores, will since their enlistment have become so enamoured of an outdoor life, and will have derived such physical benefits therefrom, that they will not care to return either to their former indoor or to similar occupations. This looks all right in theory, but how it will work out in practice is another matter. We are not in a position to make even an approximate estimate as to the number of those who will locate upon the land. On the other hand, we are informed by those whose opinions are also entitled to every consideration, even including some of the Returned Soldiers Associations that have been organized for the purpose of caring for our returned soldiers, that their experience thus far would lead them to believe that not only comparatively few of the soldiers who were never upon the land before would be induced to locate upon the land, but that many of those who were employed on the land prior to enlistment were determined not to return to the land—to use their own expressive words: the white lights are good enough for them.

However, we may differ upon this question, there is one point upon which we will all agree, and that is that of all the races of this globe, the Anglo-Saxon is the least amenable to supervision and State dictation, and possibly for this very reason our efforts in locating returned soldiers may not be as thorough and complete as those of other countries where the ideas of personal freedom are not so deeply engrained. With us, the returned soldier will himself largely decide the nature of his avocation in life, a State predilection that he should locate upon the land can be forwarded only by whatever educational propaganda we may be able to conduct, setting forth the advantages of an agricultural life, together with such financial and other assistance as we may be prepared to hold out to him.

At present we are protecting the homesteader, who has gone forth to fight the battle of the Empire, against cancellation of his homestead entry during the period of enlistment and for three months after he shall have received his discharge. We also allow to count on his homestead residence the time he has put in on active service. In the unfortunate cases where soldiers may not return by reason of being killed in battle, we, upon proof of death being furnished, at once issue patent to the legal representatives without requiring the performance of settlement duties. Similar concession is held out to the man who is disabled; he also will have his patent issued without the performance of further duties. The legislation contemplated by this resolution has in it three distinctive features: first, the setting aside of Dominion lands in such areas and in such localities as will be recommended by a board of commissioners that will be constituted for the purpose of administering this measure; secondly, the providing of agricultural instruction, by way of the different methods set forth in the Bill which will be founded upon this resolution, to the inexperienced soldier prior to his entry upon the land; thirdly, the providing of financial assistance by way of loans to those who are recommended by the board of commissioners as being possessed of the requisite skill in agriculture to give promise of a fair measure of success. These are the three features of our legislation which will be further elaborated in the Bill to be introduced.

The members of the House are aware that, with the exception of the Prairie Provinces of the West, the Crown lands of Canada are in the ownership of the various provinces. Those provinces have already enacted land settlement policies of their own, some with special reference to the returned soldiers, others with the idea of giving preferential treatment to the returned soldiers. We have considered it advisable, in connection with our legislation, to leave entirely in the hands of those provinces who own their own lands the disposition of their lands by whatever method each province in its wisdom decides upon, and we are confining our legislation, in so far as setting aside land is concerned, to Dominion lands under the jurisdiction of this Government, namely in the provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta. Financial assistance to the extent of $2,000, bearing 5 per cent interest per annum for the purpose of providing equipment and making improvements will be granted, not only to the returned soldier who locates on our Dominion land in the Prairie Provinces, but to the returned soldier who desires to locate upon lands other than Dominion lands whether in the Prairie Provinces or in any other province of the Dominion. Thus the soldier who has a little capital of his own, who decides to locate on land which he desires to purchase, will be granted financial assistance to the extent of $2,000, bearing interest of 5 per cent per annum, not only for the purpose of providing equipment and making improvements but to assist him in the purchase of the land.

This is in the main the outline of our legislation, and I am sure the Minister of Agriculture, whose department is also interested in this Bill inasmuch as it provides the agricultural training, together with the Minister of Finance, whose department is interested in providing the wherewithal to make the loans, will be only too pleased, in conjunction with myself, to enter into more elaborate explanations as to the various matters set forth in the Bill.

This legislation is not intended in any manner whatever as a substitute for any other form of recognition which may now or hereafter be extended to the returned soldiers; it is simply and solely designed to assist the soldier in locating upon the land and help him after he has done so. It has a two-fold object—to assist the returned soldier and to increase agricultural production. The members of the House are quite well aware that in almost every civilized country in the globe the trend of population for many years past has been to the large towns and cities, and I am sure we are all desirous of doing our utmost, so far as is possible by legislation, to stop that trend city-ward and to direct the flow of our population to the land in order to ensure greater production. If this legislation shall have the effect of attracting back to the land those soldiers, not only of Canada but of the rest of the British Empire, who originally came from the land, and of encouraging a great many of those others who have never had any agricultural experience to take the desired instruction and to locate upon the land, our object will have been attained. This legislation is not meant as an adequate reward to our brave lads who have so bravely acquitted themselves in the trenches at the front.

We realize that nothing this Parliament can do, whether by way of land grant or by financial assistance, adequately compensates those brave lads of ours who have gone from our country and who have been subjected to such terrible hardships. They have acquitted themselves in a manner that has won the admiration of the world. They have gone to the front and done their duty like men, and this offer is meant as some recognition on the part of a grateful country by way of preferential treatment such as has not been held out before to other settlers. If by offering this assistance we can place the soldiers upon the soil and increase our production we shall have accomplished what we have in view. This proposal is not presented as a model of perfection. It is a complicated question, and I have no doubt whatever that sentiment will play a very large part in a discussion of this kind, and very properly so. At the same time, there is a business side to it, and it is our desire to do our utmost to place the soldier in a position where he may help himself. I submit the legislation therefore, in this form to the House with the desire of getting the views of hon. gentlemen when we reach the committee stage, and I am sure the Government will be only too pleased to receive any suggestions, and possibly amendments.

Mr. GERMAN: I see that it is proposed to grant a free entry of not more than 160 acres to the soldiers. Is it proposed to grant this land without settlement duties?

Mr. ROCHE: Oh no, not at all.

Mr. GERMAN: What more are you offering to the soldiers then, than to an ordinary settler.

Mr. ROCHE: We are granting them financial assistance.

Mr. GERMAN: That is another thing. But so far as free entry goes, any person can enter for 160 acres and obtain his patent by doing settlement duties. I wanted to know if settlement duties would be dispensed with in the case of a soldier.

Mr. ROCHE: I forgot to say that it is the intention of the Government to have the administration of this Act placed under a commission, which will recommend a set of regulations to be approved by the Governor in Council. We do not think it would be wise to burden the Act with a lot of details, which experience might show the wisdom of changing from time to time. We think the personnel of this commission a very important consideration in the administration of this Act. The commissioners should be big men of great experience, who will command the confidence of the people of this country. They will draw up a set of regulations to be approved by the Governor in Council, by means of which the Act will be administered. The soldier gets an entry for 160 acres of Government land if he so desires.

Mr. GERMAN: But he can get that now.

Mr. ROCHE: Yes. Does the hon. gentleman mean to say we should charge him for it?

Mr. GERMAN: No, no. I wanted to find out what the minister is offering the soldier more than he is offering to any other person.

Mr. ROCHE: We are advancing him $2,000 at a very low rate of interest to carry on his farming operations.

Mr. GERMAN: As regards entry, the soldier has no advantage over any one else.

Mr. ROCHE :We could not be more generous than giving him the land for nothing.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: This is very important legislation, and I would suggest, and I suppose my hon. friend will have no objection, that we do not go into the details to-night. Apart from the loan of money which is contemplated, the Government, as my hon. friend for Welland suggests, is offering nothing more to the soldier than to anyone else who wants to become a settler. I certainly do not quarrel with that. I think it should be well understood that no grants should be made to a returned soldier or anyone else except upon the condition that he becomes an actual settler. I would suggest to my hon. friend, if he will allow me, that he have a map prepared of the land now available for settlement. It is very important to know where these lands are situated. As my hon. friend has stated, they can only be in the three prairie provinces, and my impression is that at the present time we have very little left of Government homestead land. There is a great deal of land still in the hands of private people, but of the land which belongs to the Government and is fit for settlement, my impression is that the acreage is very, very limited indeed. It will be interesting to know just how much there is of this land available for settlement. When I speak of prairie lands I do not apprehend that at the present stage of development in Canada we can expect any returned soldier to go into the bush and clear land there. We must expect that he will want prairie land. I think it is advisable that we should also know the distance these lands are from railways. It would not be fair to offer land beyond a certain radius from the railways to any soldier for settlement. Perhaps it is contemplated that there are some lands which, while not actually prairie lands, might still be made available for agriculture with very little labour. I wish my hon. friend would also have prepared a map of such lands to be laid on the table of the House, and with this information before us we shall certainly be very happy to give his Bill our best consideration. I understand from what my hon. friend says that he proposes nothing new beyond the loan of money.

Mr. ROCHE: And agricultural training for the inexperienced.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I do not understand exactly what is meant by that.

Mr. ROCHE: Similar training to what they are providing in Australia. We will have some agriculture training farms for the inexperienced soldiers who desire to receive agriculture instruction before locating on their holdings, or the instruction may be given on a private farm.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: That would be just as available to the ordinary homesteader as to the returned soldier, but that is a feature we can very well discuss at a later stage. Do I understand that the loan of money applies exclusively to the returned soldier?

Mr. ROCHE: Yes. I may say that I have already prepared a map such as my right hon. friend has asked for, and I meant to place it on the Table at the Committee stage. It shows the lands available for settlement within ten, fifteen and twenty miles of a railroad.

Mr. BUCHANAN: I would like to point out that it is very important to know whether it is the intention to locate the soldiers on Dominion land. At the present time we have a serious railway problem to solve, and if we put the soldiers who are desirous of availing themselves of this proposition on Dominion lands, we shall be forced to place them on lands at a great distance from railways. Then they will demand railway service, and we will be compelled to build new railway lines to meet their needs. At the present time there are very few, if any, Dominion lands available close to railroads, but there are lands occupied on lease and used as Indian reserves that would suit this particular purpose if these lands could be exchanged for Dominion lands further away from a railway. I know that in the southern part of Alberta some of the most desirable land is held as Indian reserves and on lease. I want to see the Indians treated fairly, but in nearly every case these reserves are far too large for the number of Indians now occupying them. In fact they are using hardly any of this land for agricultural or grazing purposes. In some cases the lands are leased to ranchers and others for grazing purposes. But if we want to attract the soldiers to the land, the farms they are going to occupy should be convenient to the railroad and to market facilities and as well settled as possible, and we cannot offer them what are known at present as Dominion lands. I do not know of very desirable Dominion lands in any part of Alberta, except the extreme northern part. True, railroads are going in there at the present time. But in the other parts of Alberta—and I assume that the same is true of Saskatchewan and Manitoba—there are no desirable Dominion lands suited for this purpose and close to a railway. We want to make this proposition beneficial to the soldier. We want to attract to the land the soldier who either has had experience as a farmer or is earnest in his desire to become a farmer. We want to put on the land men who intend to till the soil and remain upon the soil, and in order to do that, we must make the proposition as attractive as possible. I would ask the minister, if he has the information available, what land he has in view for this particular purpose, and what distance it is from a railway. I think the information is very important at this stage.

Mr. ROCHE: I told the right hon. leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) that when we got into committee I would provide a map showing where the land is located, and this will show also the distance from a railway. Of course, the proposition the hon. gentleman (Mr. Buchanan) makes would involve purchasing Indian lands. I do not suppose he proposes that we should do that. If we did it in the western provinces, the other provinces would have as good a claim that it should be done in their case.

Mr. G. E. McCRANEY (Saskatoon): We have had experience in dealing with soldiers and putting them upon Dominion land. We have issued scrip to them and have had in view the rewarding of the soldiers rather than the encouragement of agriculture and fitting the returned soldier to be an efficient farmer. The very fact that the minister is able to tell us that of the locations under the provisions for South African scrip, numbering 7,240, only 657 were located by soldiers themselves on the land, and of these some have not completed their term of residence, shows to what a small degree the plan effected the purpose for which it was made. After the South African war we believed that we had unlimited land, and that consequently we could give to each of our returned soldiers script for as much as 320 acres. It has already been pointed out on this side of the House that there is not now any great quantity of land available for such a purpose as this. We cannot have our cake and eat it, too; we cannot have given thousands of acres under South African script and still have great quantities of good land available for those returning from this war. I am glad to have the minister state that in his conception of this legislation it is not looked upon as a reward to the soldier but as a plan for making soldiers into efficient agriculturists. In addition to giving assistance to those who may go upon the land under the provisions of this legislation, the minister will also find, I think, that it will be necessary to give financial assistance to those homesteaders who, in 1914, left the land to join the overseas forces and have since returned to Canada. Perhaps the minister's attention has been drawn to the case of Private Baldwin, of Saskatoon, who, at the outbreak of the war, left his homestead, N.E.¼, section 17, township 34, range 14 west of the 3rd meridian. He comes back, and has no means of carrying on agriculture—the year 1914 was a year of no crop in that locality. He will need assistance on the land he has homesteaded just as much as will the men whom the minister puts on the land under the provisions of this measure. It is said that the experience is that war is so unsettling that, instead of returned soldiers wanting to go on the land, they are more likely to desire to congregate in the cities. And while it is desirable to make the most generous provisions for the settlement of returned soldiers on the land, it is my own view that not much advantage will be taken of this plan. Perhaps the minister has already in his mind the names of the commissioners whom he will recommend to administer this law. I only want to say to him that in the administration of laws of this kind commissioners are required with the most outstanding reputation for probity and judgment. The ordinary man will not do, for one of the most important requirements for the administration of this Act is public confidence. I urge this upon the minister, because so often in matters of this sort, the importunate party man who may know something about land will endeavour to secure the appointment; and the minister is going to make trouble for himself and for any Government that may succeed him, unless he has the strongest kind of commissioners to administer the law.

Mr. W. M. GERMAN (Welland): I give this Government every credit for their desire to work out the resolutions now before the House. But the minister has admitted that nothing in the way of a land grant will be made to the soldier under the provisions of the Act to be introduced in pursuance of this resolution other than what any one else can get. The soldier must do his settlement duty. Any individual, soldier or civilian, can go into the Northwest and take up his 160 acres of land and get free entry by doing the settlement duties prescribed by the statute. The soldier gets no advantage in that. The minister says: We are making provision to lend each soldier $2,000. That is the only difference, as I understand it, between the soldier and any other individual. The soldier is to have the advantage of a loan made to him under the provisions of this Act and under the supervision of the commissioners to be appointed under it, the sum not to exceed $2,000, and instructions in agriculture, which will be open to any one, as the leader of the Opposition has already stated. The only advantage that the soldier is to get will be the advance to him of $2,000. The minister says that this provision is being made not as a reward to the soldier but in the interest of settlement.

Mr. ROCHE: I said it was made for both purposes.

Mr. GERMAN: Very well; if it is in the interest of settlement, why is not provision made for an advance of $2,000 to any other person in addition to free entry to 160 acres of land? Why confine it to the soldier? If you appoint your commissioners and say: We will grant free entry to 160 acres of land to any person who will go and work that 160 acres, you will not be giving the soldier any advantage over any other person. We want to get soldiers and others. Then, why not make this further provision in order to induce settlement, in order to bring people here, soldiers or others, soldiers preferably if we can get them, but any other good, honest, intelligent working men who want to take up land, that they may have free entry to 160 acres of land? Say to them: Perform your settlement duties and you will obtain your grant and, further, we will lend you $2,000. Why confine it to soldiers if it is to be an act to increase population and to bring in settlers? It is not granted as a reward if I understand the minister right. It is not being suggested as a reward. It is being suggested—to help the soldier? Very well, we all agree with that. But, it is not being suggested as a reward. It is being suggested as an inducement to settlement. If it is an inducement to settlement, make it world wide. Give the $2,000, under proper restrictions, under the supervision of the commission you are going to appoint. Appoint men such as the hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. McCraney) has suggested, who are intelligent and proper men to administer such a law, and make a provision allowing $2,000 to every person in this country, unless you are going to limit it simply to soldiers. I would not say that there is an ulterior motive in this.

Mr. ROCHE: Then the hon. gentleman is not in favour of giving the soldier preferential treatment?

Mr. GERMAN: I am absolutely in favour of giving the soldier preferential treatment but the minister is not proposing to give this preferential treatment. He is saying this is not preferential treatment; he has already stated that. The minister has already stated that this is not preferential treatment but that it is to encourage settlement. If it is to encourage settlement, make it world wide, make it for settlement and not for soldiers. If it is for soldiers, give the soldier 160 acres of land without settlement duties. Then you are faced with the question that the minister referred to in connection with the South African scrip. The land may be sold next day after the beneficiary obtains the scrip. It must be put upon a business basis if it is to be made effective. I will support the minister in every effort he can make to bring about, not only greater settlement in the Northwest, but to confer a real advantage on the returned soldier. But let us have it on a business basis and let us put it in such a way that it will be effective and immediately available to the soldier upon his return.

Hon. RODOLPHE LEMIEUX: Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to discuss this resolution at any length. I must, however, congratulate my hon. friend the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Roche) on the measure which he intends to introduce, with a view, as he says, of giving the soldier a preference. I much prefer this legislation to the proposed land scheme which was launched in England, and which has been so much advertised in the press of late. Although the names in connection with that scheme were big names, I think there was too much speculation in it, and I am, therefore, very much pleased to see that this legislation is introduced. When my hon. friend gave notice of this legislation some time ago I asked him if it would apply to Canadian soldiers. He answered that it would apply to all of the soldiers who had served the King within the British Empire. So far so good. As my hon. friend has stated, this legislation has for its object primarily the settlement of the lands in the West, and as after this war Canada will need a very progressive policy of settlement in order to get not only the production that we need, but the population and the revenue which that population will bring to the Federal exchequer to pay the immense war debt which will have accumulated meanwhile, why not provide that this legislation shall apply to soldiers of the Allies as well as to soldiers who served under His Majesty the King? I would apply this legislation to soldiers of the Allies who have taken part in the war from the first and who wish to come as settlers to Canada. I know that the Department of the Interior would refuse to admit a certain class of settlers, but there is no objection to applying this legislation to the French, Belgian, or Russian soldier. Already we have a large number of Russians in the West. It seems to me that a policy for the settlement of the West is the foremost policy for Canada, and as we will require large revenues from that population after the war in order to pay our war debt, to pay for the sinking fund and for the pensions for our soldiers, if we wish to attract a large immigration to our western provinces we should, perhaps, enlarge the provisions of this Bill. I am only throwing this out as a suggestion, and I am sincere in making the suggestion.

Mr. DOUGLAS: Does this legislation permit of a second entry homestead?

Mr. ROCHE: It will not interfere with a man's homestead rights at all. If a man has a homestead he can come forward and get another 160 acres under this proposed legislation.

Mr. ROSS: A great deal of expense will be entailed by the education of soldiers for agricultural purposes. Could the minister give some details as to how the soldiers will be educated, whether by the Military Hospitals Commission or the Federal Government?

Mr. ROCHE: It will be done under a series of regulations which will be recommended by the Board of Agriculture. The training farms and instruction will be provided by the Department of Agriculture. But those details I have not included even in the Bill to be founded on the resolution. The operation of the Act is to be under a set of regulations, and I was leaving that in the hands of the commission itself.

On the motion of Hon. Mr. Roche, the debate was adjourned.

Industrial Disputes Investigation Act $25,000.

Mr. McCRANEY: In December last I wished to obtain some information with regard to the operation of the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act and I sent a wire addressed to Mr. Ackland, the Deputy Minister of Labour, who was at that time in the Old Country. I received a reply signed by Mr. Gerald H. Brown, who was then Acting Deputy Minister of Labour. That reply was as follows:

> There have been in all 215 applications received for boards under the Industrial Disputes Act since its enactment in March, 1907. The records show strikes were avoided or ended in all but 21 cases. In many of these last named cases ultimate settlement was on basis of board report. Thirty-two cases in all were settled without boards being established. Total number of employees affected by board applications was approximately 350,000. Nineteen applications were received from employers and 193 from employees, and 3 from both employers and employees.

Having that before me, I heard some discussions with regard to the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act, and in meeting labour men I found, what will not surprise the minister, that his department is not a favourite with the labour organizations of Canada. There has been growing for some time a restlessness on the part of labour men ever the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act. Labour Congresses have passed resolutions in condemnation of it; labour men speak strongly against it, and it is worth our while to devote some attention to examining why this should be.

When the measure was introduced in this House, it was claimed to be one likely to settle labour difficulties in Canada, as it was based on the principles which underlay the Hague Conventions, which it was hoped would ensure the peace of the nations. There are some causes which surely can be remedied, when, after the experience of ten years, we find restlessness instead of satisfaction. I had my friend from Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) ask the minister on Friday night how the cases in which the award was not accepted were made up, how many cases were refused by employers and how many by employees. I have myself gone through the reports, and while Mr. Brown, in his wire to me speaks of 21, I find 20. I have missed one in some way, and that is why I should like to have the figures from the department, because in going through a report unquestionably their knowledge of these events would enable them to speak with more certainty than I could.

I have analysed them in this way, that there are seven cases in which there were strikes and in which the employees refused to accept the report of the board appointed under the Act, but later settlement was made on the basis of the report. Those cases were as follows: Cumberland Railway and Coal Company, 1907, two strikes; Canadian Pacific railway trades, May, 1908; British Columbia Copper Company, March, 1910, two strikes; Canadian Northern Railway carmen; Alberta Coal Mining Company. In these seven cases the Act was effective, because, while it did not avert a strike at the time, it outlined a settlement, and the settlement adopted was on the lines of the board's report. There were six cases in which the employees refused to accept the report and in which the report was not followed in the ultimate settlement between the employers and employees. These cases were: Dominion Coal Company, strike of 1909; Cumberland Railway and Coal Company, 1909; Winnipeg Electric Railway Company, 1910; Hudson Bay Mining Company, 1911; McEnany Mines, Limited, 1912; Canadian Northern Railway Coal & Ore Dock Company, Limited, 1912. In the following six cases the employers refused to accept the report: Western Coal Operators Association, June, 1909; Grand Trunk Railway Company, June, 1910; Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company, October, 1911, Britannia Mining and Smelting Company, September, 1912; St. John Railway Company, July, 1914; Toronto Hydro-Electric Commission, November, 1915. I ran across one case in which the report was not accepted by either employer or employees: The Nicola Valley Coal & Coke Company, May, 1909. I have now accounted for twenty cases out of twenty-one referred to in the telegram. I find that of the strikes in which the men refused to accept the report, there were nine prior to 1911, and four subsequent to 1911, and of the cases in which the reports were not accepted by the employers, there was one before 1911, and five after, including the year 1911. As the men got to understand the Act better, they accepted the reports of the boards, and as the employers got to understand the Act better, they declined to accept the reports of the boards. In the figures which I have given, the minister will find reason for some of the dissatisfaction with which the men regard the administration of the Act. They see that in the early part of the administration of the Act they did make their mistakes, but of late they have been accepting the decisions of the board. The employers, however, have declined to accept the decisions, and that gives rise to a feeling of dissatisfaction on their part which it is desirable that Parliament should seek some means of remedying. We can not judge as to the rights and wrongs of these matters. The virtue of the Act is that it is not compulsory, and because it is not compulsory neither party to an award is bound to accept it. But, as that is the virtue of the Act, it devolves upon each party to the disagreement and upon the department which administers the Act to see that in every possible case the award should be accepted, even though at a loss to an accepting party and even though there may not be complete satisfaction with the award. I am not surprised that a number of men who are engaged as coal miners—most of the trades effected are coal mining trades—should not accept the award of the board of investigation. The mining trade has been very largely recruited from the foreign element which comes into the country and takes that form of labour which is among the most difficult and which our own people do not care to perform. If these men appreciate more than they seem to appreciate the value of the legislation, they would hesitate in rejecting the awards. On the other hand, one wonders that the employers, who are the owners of property which has the protection of law and who ought to be more intelligent than the men whom they employ, do not give the Act more support than they do, and that they put its future in jeopardy by making it a matter of uncertainty to submit controversies between employers and employees to the decision of boards of investigation. I am not suggesting any remedy by way of legislation. I think that the Act goes about as far as it can in showing the way of good-will and common sense between employer and employees. Although amendments could, perhaps, be made which would make the Act more workable, I do not think that the underlying principles of the Act could be improved by legislation. I hesitate very much to say that the Act should be repealed. I want to support the Act, as we support the wider efforts that are made to bring about peace among nations. Strikes and lock-outs are methods of war; we want to bring about methods of peace. The men are not satisfied that in every case the department is acting impartially between themselves and their employers. The Thetford case was discussed here on Friday night, and while perhaps in the interpretation of the strict law the minister may be correct that he need not interfere in that case, we are not interpreting the strict law in working out conditions of industrial peace. The men feel that the minister could give more sympathetic support to their request in such a case as that. I know they say that when the minister has to choose the third member of a board, he chooses a friend who is more likely to be in sympathy with the employer than with the employees.

Mr. CROTHERS: What class of men have you received this information from—the miners out West?

Mr. McCRANEY: No, not miners. My information was very largely obtained at an open meeting of the Trades and Labour Council at Saskatoon where the largest number of those present were railway men. That is the impression I gathered from those who are in touch with all labour matters. I have not discussed this question with miners, because I have not been brought into contact with them, but I have endeavoured to give to the minister the result of my observations in order, if possible, to impress upon him and his department the necessity of throwing the whole moral force of this Government behind an award when it is made.

Mr. CROTHERS: Behind what?

Mr. McCRANEY: Behind the report of the board appointed under the Act. Perhaps that is not possible, but I think a strong minister in a strong government could do a great deal more than has been done, could procure an acceptance of an award, and, especially when we find that the refusals to accept awards have of late been coming rather from the employers than from the employees; I think such a minister could use with the employers a much greater influence than he might be expected to use in dealing with employees with whom he might not get so closely in touch. I submit to the minister the views which I have set forth and the information which I have collected, because I want to see this Act a success. I want to see it have the most sympathetic administration of the department. I believe it can be made much more secure in the public confidence if greater effort is made by the department to ensure action on a report and the acceptance of it.

Mr. CROTHERS: We generally regard my hon. friend as a fair-minded man, and I think he desires to be fair-minded now, but I am very much surprised at his observations. I was not quite able to follow his logic. He started out by telling us that the workingmen were becoming more and more dissatisfied with the administration of the Industrial Disputes Act, and he wound up by telling us that they were becoming more and more inclined to accept the awards made under it.

Mr. McCRANEY: Surely the minister understands me. I will just correct him if he will allow me. The men are becoming dissatisfied with the Act, because they are finding that more and more the awards of the board are not being accepted by the employers. As they understand the Act themselves, they are accepting the awards.

Mr. CROTHERS: I understood my hon. friend perfectly, and still the admission comes from him that the men are less and less dissatisfied with the administration of the Act as the years pass by.

Mr. McCRANEY: I did not say that.

Mr. CROTHERS: That is what my hon. friend said in substance.

Mr. McCRANEY: I was not speaking in substance.

Mr. CROTHERS: If the men are accepting the awards more and more, that surely means that they are becoming less dissatisfied and more content with the administration of the Act. In my hon. friend's city, only one board has been appointed since I took charge of my department and since the enactment of the legislation regarding boards of conciliation.

Mr. McCRANEY: Yes.

Mr. CROTHERS: That case was between the civic authorities and their employees, so that the railway men in Saskatoon have had no board appointed, and neither have the coal men. The coal miners of the West have never accepted this Act; they always ignored it. Only one board has been appointed in connection with disputes between operators and miners, and that occurred shortly after the Act was first passed. The original object of the Act was to prevent labour disturbances in the different coal fields of Canada. While I am and always have been a great friend of the Act, I cannot say that it has worked well so far as the coal mining industry is concerned, because in the West the coal miners have only once attempted to utilize the Act. That was in 1907, if I remember aright, and the award was not accepted by them. My hon. friend knows very well that strikes occurred amongst the miners in the western coal fields in 1903, 1906, 1907, 1909 and 1911, the last being the most serious one, lasting for eight months. In that region of the coal mining industry there has not been anything like a prolonged strike since 1911, so that my hon. friend has not received, from the coal miners of the West, any information either for or against the Act, because it has not been used at all. It appears that he attended one meeting of the Trades and Labour Council at the city of Saskatoon, and there he heard somebody who knew nothing about the Act—because in Saskatoon there had never been an exercise of it but once, and that between the civic authorities and their employees—make certain observations, and still he comes here and denounces the administration of the Act, and speaks about our making some efforts to secure the observance of the Act by employers. Had he taken a few minutes to come to our office and inquire either from the deputy minister or myself, he would have found out something about the efforts that we do make and make successfully.

My hon. friend referred to a board that was appointed between the Grand Trunk Railway Company and their conductors when there was a serious strike, which was finally settled temporarily by an agreement signed by the late manager of the Grand Trunk Railway Company in June, 1910. When I was placed in charge of the Labour Department in the autumn of 1911 that agreement had not been carried out by the Grand Trunk Railway Company. Among other things, the agreement provided that all men who had been on strike and had not been guilty of any violation of the law would be reinstated within 90 days, and that all the men should be paid a certain advance in salary to date from the month of May immediately preceding the July when the agreement was entered into. A county court judge of the province of Ontario was appointed to ascertain how many of these men were entitled to reinstatement under the terms of the agreement who had not already been reinstated and he found there were 138. This judge was chosen by the Grand Trunk Railway Company, if I remember right, the Government approving their choice. But the Grand Trunk refused to reinstate these men. One of the first things I did after taking charge of the department was to urge Mr. Hays to carry out the terms of that agreement. But he refused to do it for me, as he had refused to do it for my predecessor. A few months afterwards, however, the Grand Trunk came to this House for legislation. I do not know whether my hon. friend was a member of the Railway Committee at that time or not, but if he was and was present he will probably remember that I took the position that the committee should not approve of the legislation they were seeking until the company carried out the terms of that agreement. I had an opportunity of discussing the matter with the late manager of the Grand Trunk Railway Company, Charles M. Hays, and I told him frankly, "You will get no legislation, if I can prevent it, until you have carried out that agreement," and I told him of the findings of Judge Barron, who had been appointed to make the inquiry. I mentioned that there were 138 conductors who had not been guilty of any violation of the law and were entitled to reinstatement. "Why," he said, "I never heard of such a report. I should like to see it." I said, "Come right along to the office and I will show it to you. I have it right in the judge's own handwriting." But he had to catch a train and could not come, so he asked me to send him a copy, and I did. The result was that in five or six months after this Government came into power, these men were reinstated. All were reinstated who wished to be, and not only that, but they received back pay representing an increase in wages from the 20th of May. I think it was, up to July. I have sent out bunches of twenty cheques at a time to these men covering their back pay. That is one instance where my hon. friend could have ascertained, if he had called at the office, that we had used what influence we had—and some of my friends thought I was very drastic—to coerce employers into accepting these awards.

There was another case not long since of a railway company refusing to carry out a unanimous award. The man who was chosen by the railway company was a railway man of long experience, and he joined with the other two in saying that the men should do so and so, and the company so and so. A high official of the company came to see me and pointed out how impossible it would be for them to carry out the award. I said "I won't discuss the matter with you. I do not know anything about it and you know all about it. All I know is that the man you appointed agreed with the other two in the award and that you refused to carry it out. Why don't you carry it out?" He said it was impossible for them to do so, and he returned home and issued a circular setting forth very elaborately the reasons of the company for refusing to accept the award. I saw the copy of this circular and wrote him that he would no doubt be coming to Parliament next session with some Bills and said that it would be very difficult for me to support them unless the company carried out the award. Just as soon as the wires could bring a message from the headquarters of that railway company, I got a wire saying " We have adopted the award."

We had a similar case with the Grand Trunk Pacific. There is no legal means of enforcing these awards so far as I know, but there has been no case where employers have refused to carry out an award that at the very first opportunity I did not use all the pressure I could bring to bear to induce them to accept the award. I do not think there has been a single case of that kind in which our influence has not been effective. I hope now that my hon. friend will think over his logic again, and see how it limps when he says that the wage earners of the country when the Act was new refused to accept the awards made by the board of conciliation while the employers adopted them, not in every case, of course, and that later under our administration the men had become so satisfied with the administration of the Act and the awards made that they were now accepting them in greater numbers than ever before, and my hon. friend then comes to the conclusion, so limp is his logic, that it is evident the wage earners of this country are becoming dissatisfied with the operation of the Act.

I have a few letters which I will not read to-night, as I may have another opportunity, from the leading labour men of this country, who are absolutely satisfied with the administration of the Act. There were some complaints before I was placed in charge of the Labour Department, about the delay in establishing boards after an application had been made. I gave instructions that there should be no unnecessary delay with the result that during the first year of our administration of the Act the number of days that elapsed between the receipt of an application and the granting of a board was reduced from fifteen to seven on an average. In the first year during which I had the honour to administer this Act there were a million days less of lost time by reason of strikes than there had been the year before. At $2 a day, that means $2,000,000 saved in wages. But one year might not be considered a very fair basis of judgment. Take the whole time the Act had been in force before I was placed in charge of the department, four years, and compare with that the five years since I was placed in charge. The number of days of lost time since I took charge has been about half a million less every year on the average than during the four years before. This is a saving of $4,000,000. Add to this the $2,000,000 already referred to and you have a total of $6,000,000 saved to the wage earners of this country by the avoidance of strikes and lost days. The hon. gentleman says that the Trades and Labour Congress voted to repeal this Act. That is so. But they started in to do that before we came into power. In Calgary, not very far from where the hon. gentleman lives, the annual convention of the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada was held in 1911—before we came into power— and voted in favour of repealing this Act. Does it follow from that that there is anything wrong with the Act itself or with the administration of it? I am not here to criticise my predecessor —we are on the best of terms— and I think it is no evidence at all of any defect in the Act or in its administration by my predecessors that such a vote was passed by the Congress. Now, without going into details or reading the great quantity of letters I have on the subject, let me read just one letter addressed to me by a man who has taken part in the coal difficulties in the western field. He is a member of the International Board, the only member from Canada I believe. His letter is dated 9th April last, and is in part as follows:

> I am very optimistic as to the final outcome of the negotiations. I feel that Wednesday night or Thursday at latest should see the sub-committee ready to report to the full conference committee, and in conference have an agreement to present to the miners for ratification. Permit me to say in all sincerity how deeply I appreciate the effort for the men I am feebly trying to represent at this time.

I was out there nine days, doing what I could to bring about an amicable adjustment between the operators and the men.

> I know of the general unsavory remarks—

And he had not heard my hon. friend from Saskatoon.

> —that are oft-times levelled at any Government, and the respective officials thereof. However, I wish to state very frankly that when an agreement is finally arrived at I shall feel both obligated and delighted to give every credit to the splendid part you played at Calgary. Your readiness to take up the question of reducing the hours of labour for outside men at my solicitation will ever be remembered by myself, more especially in view of the fact that it produced results, and it is results that count. Again thanking you for your assistance, and fully appreciating the delicacy of your position in appearing before employer and employee.

I have dozens of letters of that character coming from leading representatives of labour in Canada. And yet my hon. friend from Saskatoon picks up something that he hears the members of a labour council in Saskatoon had said,—men who have never had anything to do with the Industrial Disputes Act,—and talks about the labour people of Canada becoming more and more dissatisfied with this Act and feeling that they have not the sympathy of the Department of Labour. The hon. gentleman does not take the trouble to inquire at the source where he could have got the facts before speaking in this way.

Let me give the hon. gentleman one or two more instances. I had not been long in charge of the department before my attention was called to what purported to be a copy of an agreement which a large employer of labour required his men to sign, one of the provisions of which was that he would have no man working for him who was a member of a labour organization, and if he found one of his employees to be connected with such an organization, he would dismiss him. Without having received complaint from anybody, I wrote to the manager of this concern telling him that I had seen this document. I received a reply which was very amusing. Among other things, the writer said he never had had a member of a labour organization in his employ, and never would have, even though it meant that the wheels of his factory did not turn for forty years. I wrote back that a man was not to be discriminated against because he thought it in his own interest or in that of his wife or family, on intellectual, social or other grounds, to belong to a labour organization, so far as I could influence or assist in preventing it. About two and a half years after that I was informed that this same employer of labour had received a contract from the Government for the making of militia supplies. I wrote to him to this effect: When our former correspondence took place you were carrying on a private enterprise, but I am told that you now have a contract with this Government for the making of certain goods. Had I known at the time you would not have got that contract, if I could have prevented it, and I will take good care that you do not get any more contracts, if I can prevent it, unless you waive that obnoxious agreement which you insist upon your men signing. He came down off the perch as rapidly as the postal trains could bring a letter. He said: I have already advised my men that I will not require them to sign that agreement any more; and I hope you will do what you can to get more contracts for me

Mr. MACLEAN: The man changed his view because he had got a Government contract?

Mr. CROTHERS: Changed it to the benefit of his men.

Mr. MACLEAN: I do not understand that to be the case.

Mr. CROTHERS: Does the hon. gentleman understand that he waived that term of the agreement—

Mr. GRAHAM: Yes, because he got a Government contract.

Mr. CROTHERS: I do not care why it was, the men got the advantage of my action in securing their liberty to join a labour organization if they desired to do so. Let me give another instance which occurred a few weeks ago. I saw it stated in the newspaper that certain coal dealers in Montreal were selling coal in the central part of the city at $15 a ton and in the suburbs at $20 a ton. I did not wait to write a letter even. I wired to the Mayor of Montreal, told him what I had seen in the press, and asked him whether there was any truth in it or not. I did not wait. Yet, the hon. member for Saskatoon thinks that we have no sympathy with the poor working men in this country and that they do not think we have any sympathy with them. All I can say is that any information of that kind which he has got comes from men who know nothing about the Labour Department or about the Industrial Disputes Act. The men who do know appreciate it and appreciate the way it is being administered. They did so before I was placed in charge of the department and they have done so since. I have no doubt, after five years' experience, that the principles of the Industrial Disputes Act are good, and that they are in the interest of industrial peace. They have prevented scores and scores of strikes that the public hear nothing about. In the autumn of 1911 we had two fair wage officers, both having their headquarters in Ottawa. If a disturbance arose at Vancouver it had either to take its course or we had to send a man to Vancouver. If a disturbance arose at Sydney or Halifax the same alternative presented itself. It occurred to me that it would be a great advantage if we had a man on the ground in Vancouver. I found in the Labour Department when I came to it two men both experienced and capable. One of them gave me entire satisfaction while he lived. The other is living still. I sent him to Vancouver and I think it is no exaggeration to say that during the past years he has prevented, by reason of his being right on the ground, forty or fifty labour troubles that would have developed into very serious disturbances had he not been there. I appointed another man and located him in my hon. friend's city of Saskatoon because I found that Mr. McNiven, whom I had sent to Vancouver, had too large a territory to cover. He might be in Saskatoon and a disturbance would arise suddenly in Vancouver. As my hon. friend from Rouville, who has had some considerable experience in the Department of Labour, knows, these difficulties arise sometimes in a few hours. I came to the conclusion that Mr. McNiven had too large a territory and that he might be in Vancouver when he was needed in Saskatoon, Edmonton or Winnipeg. I appointed another man in Saskatoon, another in Winnipeg and another here. I attribute the great saving in time to the fact that we have a larger number of these fair wage officers whose duty includes the exercise of their best efforts to prevent disturbances of this kind. I attribute to the increase in their number and to their being on the ground and taking hold of the matter earlier than they otherwise could, the prevention of many labour difficulties. I am surprised that the hon. member for Saskatoon should have referred again to the Thetford Mines matter. It is too trifling to think of for a moment. We reached a settlement most satisfactory to everybody and there has been no disturbance for a year. There was another element in the Thetford Mines case that slipped my memory the other night, and it was that we had in Thetford Mines two rival, antagonistic labour organizations. One was a labour organization called the Catholic Association, a local association, and the priest of the town took a very great interest in the welfare of the men and in getting them into the organization. The members of that organization were perfectly satisfied with the conditions and they passed a resolution to that effect. They had some safe guidance from their spiritual adviser, who had their best interests at heart. The other was the Western Federation of Miners. They had about the same number of members. The priest exerted his influence in one direction. Then hon. member for Megantic (Mr. Pacaud), who addressed a crowd of these miners on Sunday afternoon, unjustly, and without any reasonable cause whatever, denounced the Minister of Labour and the Government for party purposes, and had the pleasure of a strike on his hands a day or two afterwards. I do not think I would be justified in taking up any further time. At almost every annual meeting of the Trades and Labour Congress since 1911, and before I was placed in charge of the Labour Department, we had a resolution denouncing the Lemieux Act. There was a meeting in Vancouver where they were two to one in favour of the Act. I took occasion to tell them about the good qualities of the Lemieux Act, and I said that so long as I was at the head of the Labour Department that Act would not be repealed. I think my hon. friend from Saskatoon, before he again unjustly attempts to criticise the labour or any other department, will take reasonable means to ascertain what the facts are and, if he does, he will save this House and the country a great deal of time. That does not apply to this particular case only; it applies to many other cases. If the committee will pardon me, I will just say that we have hours, days and weeks spent in talking in reference to a matter without any effort being made to get at the facts from the true source, and when the facts are brought down it is found that there is absolutely nothing in it.

Mr. COPP: How many fair wage officers have been appointed?

Mr. CROTHERS: I think six.

Mr. COPP: Any in the Maritime Provinces?

Mr. CROTHERS: The gentleman who deals with such matters in Quebec takes in the Maritime Provinces.

Mr. COPP: The fair wage officer in Quebec looks after the Maritime Provinces?

Mr. CROTHERS: Yes. Originally fair wage officers were appointed for the purpose of ascertaining what a fair wage would be to pay to workmen engaged on public work. That is why they are called fair wage officers. There has not been very much done in the way of public work during the last two or three years. We have no man now especially for the Maritime Provinces. We appointed one after the death of Mr. Dubreuil, but he resigned. Some one said the other night that he had been dismissed. Mr. Arcand was not dismissed at all. I had a letter of resignation from him in which he told me why he had resigned. It was on account of some domestic difficulty that it would not be proper for me to detail here.

Mr. COPP: With reference to the long lecture which my hon. friend the Minister of Labour has given to my hon. friend from Saskatoon (Mr. McCraney) in regard to the manner in which he has received information about labour troubles in different parts of Canada, I may say that I have always got information from sources where the men are themselves, and I have always found it just as credible as could be got from any other source.

One of the very best sources of information in regard to labour trouble must surely be the labourers themselves; from them it is possible to obtain first-hand information. I understand that the hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. McCraney) got his information first-hand in that manner. The Minister of Labour attempts to say to him that he should not accept information from the labourers themselves, but must go to some official of the Labour Department and find out the facts in regard to the labour organizations or labour troubles in his town. I can say to the Minister of Labour, and I say it without offering criticism at all, that I have had many labour men in whom I have had the greatest confidence and whom I see employed in work in various parts of the Maritime Provinces, tell me that they do not get proper treatment or attention when application is made to the Minister of Labour. I do not know any better source of information than the men themselves in regard to such matters. My hon. friend thinks it is conclusive testimony to read a letter from some official of a labour organization whom he has visited in the West; he advances that as a positive assurance that everything is well in the Labour Department, and suggests that the hon. member for Saskatoon has simply come here and worked up out of his fertile brain some matters of trouble or complaint by the labourers in his portion of Canada.

Mr. CROTHERS: Would my hon. friend give me a number of cases in his neighbourhood where they complain about delays in the establishment of boards of conciliation?

Mr. COPP: I could give my hon. friend privately many cases such as I referred to.

Mr. CROTHERS: Well, give me one.

Mr. COPP: I will give my hon. friend cases if he will give me an opportunity of doing it privately.

Mr. CROTHERS: Oh, privately, oh, oh.

Mr. COPP: My hon. friend laughs about that. Let me say at the outset that I am not here to criticise the department beyond saying that the labourers themselves in many instances complained to me that they were not able to get fair treatment, that the Minister of Labour did not seem to take any interest in his department in connection with matters of this kind, and that they had appealed to him and appealed in vain—they knocked at the door but the door was not opened. I have been informed that resolutions were passed to the effect that the Minister of Labour should not be a professional man but should be a labouring labour man himself, one who understood the labour question, and that a gentleman of the same profession and calling that I have the honour to belong to myself was not really able to sympathize fully with the labour element. I think that under those conditions my hon. friend from Saskatoon resorted to the best source of information when he went to the Trades and Labour Council. I think he is doing only right and justice to the ordinary labour men when he draws the attention of the Minister of Labour to conditions in his constituency, as a representative from that portion of Canada.

Mr. CROTHERS: I have no doubt that the man who was telling my hon. friend the sort of man who ought to be at the head of the Labour Department was perfectly satisfied with a labouring man like my hon. friend from Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) as Minister of Labour.

Mr. COPP: No, he was not satisfied with a gentleman like the hon. member from Rouville (Mr. Lemieux).

Mr. CROTHERS: I said I had no doubt he would be.

Mr. COPP: No.

Mr. CROTHERS: With a labouring man like the hon. member for Rouville or like my hon. friend.

Mr. COPP: He was not satisfied with either of you.

Mr. CROTHERS: No. I suppose not. There are men who are not satisfied with anything. I do not think the hon. member for Westmorland has treated me fairly in saying there were so many cases where complaints were made to him that labour men had applied for boards of conciliation and could not get them; and then when I asked him for one case he would not condescend to be fair enough to me to give one case so that I would have an opportunity of explaining why it was so if the board had been refused or denying the charge if the facts were not as stated. I do not think that is fair. If my hon. friend was not in a position to give a case, I do not think he should have referred to the subject at all.

Mr. COPP: I would be the very last one to say anything unfair to the Minister of Labour. I did not say that the gentleman told me of a number of cases where Boards had been refused, but he made complaint that the Labour Department did not give proper attention to the labour interests, such as they would expect from the Minister of Labour. I have no desire to throw the slightest reflection on the minister, but this is a question that is coming before the representatives very often. As the hon. members on both sides know; the labour question is becoming a serious one, and the men are looking to the representatives of the different constituencies to look after their interests as well as they possibly can. The gentleman who spoke to me was not satisfied with either the Minister of Labour or his predecessor.

Mr. CROTHERS: He was hard to please when neither of us would satisfy him.

Mr. COPP: He may be hard to please, but I can say to the Minister of Labour that if he would pay more attention to the ordinary labouring men and the claims they have upon the people generally throughout Canada, the labouring men would have a great deal more respect for the Minister of Labour. It would be better if he did not pay so much attention to the higher officials who come to him with such letters as he read to the House giving him a certificate and a reputation as being a great minister and doing his part so nobly in the interests of labour. The labour question throughout Canada, and especially down in the Maritime Provinces, is becoming more acute every day, and I think there is a very great opportunity for the Minister of Labour to go down there and spend some little time looking into matters for himself. He would find a great many complaints. I will give him the names of numbers of men in communities which he could visit with great benefit to himself, to his department, and to the Government, as well as to the labouring men in that portion of the constituency where I live.

Mr. CROTHERS: May I give some information to my hon. friend to carry to his friend? It may be of use to him. That is that the present Minister of Labour knows what it is to dig stumps and stones out of the fields, and work in the bottom of a ditch, and that he has worked for $11 a month and his board. Tell that to your friend and he will be perfectly satisfied.

Mr. COPP: I do not think the people in my county would be satisfied; if I told them that he worked for $11 a month, they might say he was well paid for the services which he rendered then if he did not do his work any better than he is now discharging his duties for the labouring people.

Mr. McKENZIE: I understand from the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) that he had some observations to make in connection with the particular item before the committee. Is it the wish of the minister that the committee should rise now?

Mr. CROTHERS: I think we ought to pass an item.

Mr. McKENZIE: I come from a part of the country, Mr. Chairman, where we have great bodies of labouring men, great industrial enterprises and a large amount of capital invested. We have our difficulties and our troubles. Sometimes we find fault with the minister—often justifiably—but I should like to have good and sufficient evidence before I tackle him directly. Just now, having no such evidence, I am not going to make any direct criticism of the minister. The Lemieux Act, as it is called, was a great step in advance of the conditions that existed before the passing of that Act. But, like every other step taken in a new direction, there is, no doubt, room for improvement and for better things in the future. I have had in mind for years, although I have not expressed it in the House, the idea that we should have better courts for the administration, not necessarily of the Lemieux Act, but of such disputes as arise between capital and labour. Permanent, trained and continuous knowledge is required of those who deal with matters of this kind. To have one court to-day and another to-morrow and another the next day, not necessarily any one of the men who was on the first serving on the others; to have raw recruits at each court who, perhaps, have had no training in dealing with this kind of dispute and no knowledge of the law governing the practice of the court or the case they have in hand—to have a court of this kind is not the best way of dealing with such vital issues as arise between capital and labour. It has long been my view that we should have a court trained, capable and continuous, to deal with question of this kind. The minister mentioned to-night a case where his officer was on the ground and prevented an outbreak of trouble. I submit that there should have been in that place a court—not necessarily consisting of many men; one good man might do—available immediately, without the necessity of a large amount of paraphernalia and procedure, with power to hear any person coming before it and to settle the dispute in the most effective and speedy manner. I have in mind the country-wide, effective benefits which are conferred upon us by the Railway Commission. I was never before that Board, but I am told that any man can get before it and tell his story in his own way; it can be approached without any particular procedure or ceremony, and it deals with the questions submitted to it speedily and on the spot. It is some such court that I have in mind to deal with labour disputes, not necessarily as expensive and as big a court as the Board of Railway Commissioners, but a competent body that could be simply and quickly approached and that would be in a position to prevent, as much as possible, the necessity of strikes and lock-outs. Suppose there are in a mine 300 or 400 drivers, one of whom is dissatisfied. This driver, who belongs to a drivers' association, calls out all the drivers and says: the boss put me off this morning improperly, and I am going to call the men out on strike. That is the only way he can remedy his grievance. If that driver could tell his story to a competent court and be compelled by law to make no trouble until his case had been presented to the court, his difficulties could be settled in a day. As it is now, his only remedy is the extraordinary procedure of calling all his fellow-labourers out on strike. The establishment of a court to deal with such matters would afford ample protection to the driver, prevent the necessity of a strike and secure a more peaceful settlement of the difficulty. The great aim of the country should be to get the confidence of the workingman. The great trouble is that the weaker element is inclined to think that it is imposed upon by the stronger; the workingmen think that in the eyes of the authorities they are not as important as the capitalists. We should go far to disabuse their minds of that idea and to make them understand that it is the first duty of Parliament to protect them at every point, and one of the best ways of bringing about that condition would be to establish courts of ample jurisdiction, presided over by the very best men obtainable, before which the miners could come readily and conveniently tell their story and get their remedy without the interference of lawyers or any difficult line of procedure. The man who owns a mine has his capital; the man who owns a big lumber concern or a railway enterprise has his money, but the only capital of the workingman is his head and his hands and that is all that his family and those depending upon him have to safeguard them. It is certainly as important to the workingmen that their capital should be secure as it is to the wealthy men who are interested in such industrial pursuits as I have mentioned. It is in the best interests of our country to create the best possible relations between capital and labour, and to have a business understanding between them and courts capable of carrying out that business understanding in the most effective and efficient way, so that any ideas of imposition by the one upon the other, or any lack of interest in the powers that be, as between them, should as much as possible be allayed and removed.

On the motion of Mr. Crothers that progress be reported:

Mr. McKENZIE: I presume it is understood that any remarks that any hon. member may desire to make in regard to this item may be said on other items that are not yet passed.

Mr. CROTHERS: I shall have something to say in reply to my hon. friend's speech which he has just finished, although I will not take the time to-night to do so. If there is any hon. member present who would like to make any remarks in regard to this item he will have an opportunity of doing so when the other items are under discussion.

Progress reported.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Crothers, the House adjourned at 11.30 p.m.

Tuesday, May 8, 1917.

The House met at Three o'clock, the Speaker in the Chair.

GRAIN FOR BREWERIES AND DISTILLERIES.

PROPOSAL TO DISCONTINUE THE SUPPLY.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. EMMANUEL B. DEVLIN (Wright) asked for leave to move the adjournment of the House for the purpose of discussing a definite matter of urgent public importance, namely, the necessity, owing to the high cost of living, and the importance of conserving all food products for the benefit of the consumers of Canada, the Empire, and our Allies, that the Government take steps under the War Measures Act to have the supply of grain to brewers and distillers immediately discontinued.

And leave having been granted,

Mr. SPEAKER: Before the hon. member proceeds, I deem it my duty to apprise the House that, inasmuch as this motion specifies the subject proposed to be discussed, discussion should be very strictly confined to the subject mentioned in the motion. I hope that hon. members who may speak shall confine their remarks as closely as possible to the subject.

Mr. DEVLIN: Mr. Speaker, I mean to take up very little of the time of the House in discussing the motion which I have now the honour to present. Since the beginning of the war I have tried as much as possible to confine my time and attention in this House to matters directly affecting our country, the Empire, and our Allies, in the interest of the war which is now being waged. The idea which came into my mind in bringing this matter before the House was prompted by a speech delivered by the Minister of Finance to the congregation of St. James Methodist Church at Montreal. In speaking upon the subject of self-sacrifice and self-denial, the minister used these words, which appealed to me, and which, I am sure, must have appealed to every man who has read the report of that speech:

> The duty of every man who can produce anything useful or essential for the national good is to strengthen the nation and put forth his utmost effort. Increased production is necessary, increased agricultural production especially. Every acre, every plot of land in the Empire, should be made to produce this year to the utmost of the human energy available for the purpose. The only reason the nation can sustain the burden of the war is because of the enormous expenditures in peace time for luxuries being discontinued; the cutting out of all but essentials, and there are comparatively few essentials in this world after all.

As I am not familiar as perhaps are others in this country with the use of whisky and beer, I was forced to look up an encyclopedia to find out what were the raw materials used in the manufacture of those liquors, and I find that they consist of barley, wheat, rye, sugar, corn, and molasses. It is imperative, owing to war conditions, that every country should see that its inhabitants are properly supplied with foodstuffs, and secondly that waste and unnecessary uses of foodstuffs are eliminated. Whisky, beer and similar liquors used as beverages cannot be considered as amongst the necessaries of life, but the raw materials used in the manufacture of those beverages are without doubt necessaries of life. Following out the advice given by the Minister of Finance, we must eliminate all waste and extravagance, and we must, if we want to be in a position to cope with the situation that faces this country and our Allies, produce from the land as much as possible, to supply not only the consumers of this country, but the Allies in so far as we are able to do so. If we desire to do that, we must do it by the elimination of waste and extravagance. The use of whisky, beer, and similar beverages constitutes waste and extravagance; the raw materials used in those beverages are wasted, and it is an extravagant use of those raw materials. Therefore, if whisky, beer and similar drinks are not necessaries of life, but the raw materials used in those beverages are necessaries of life, it becomes the duty of the Government, and the Government has that right under the War Measures Act, to eliminate from consumption in this country such beverages in order that the consumers may, in the way of foodstuffs, have the full benefit of the raw materials of which I have spoken.

I further want to point out to the House that it will be in the interest of the farmers of Canada that such action be taken because the farmers are complaining to-day that they are obliged to pay too much for their seed grain. I submit further to the House that the farmers are not getting the benefit of the increased prices of these materials through the consumption of whisky and beer; the benefit is all going into the hands of speculators. From the information which I have been able to obtain we have consumed—let me hope, not in this country—but there has been consumed in this country in the manufacture of liquor in the year 1916, 2,353,273 bushels of barley, 589,394 bushels of corn, and 123,801 bushels of rye, making a total of 3,066,468 bushels. I appeal to the House whether it would not be better that the consumers of Canada, those who seek food, those who actually need it, those who are earning small salaries to-day, should get the benefit rather than the distillers and the brewers, whose only object can be to gain large profits and increase their wealth at the expense of the people of Canada.

My last remark is that with more economy and less wasteful expenditure on the part of the Government there would be less taxation upon the consumers and producers, and more money in the pockets of our people to meet the increased cost of living. But unmindful of the real needs of the people, and thinking only on raising money to meet the necessities of the hour, the Government have gone on increasing taxation without trying to discover where they could curtail expenditure. I am now pointing out to the Government one way in which the production of this country can be saved from waste and used directly for the benefit of the people of Canada, and if only this one suggestion were adopted, the people of this country would not be called upon to pay quite as much for their foodstuffs; the distillers and brewers and speculators would not make the profits they are now making, and the people of this country would have more foodstuffs at their command.

The Minister of Trade and Commerce, who was in Washington recently, has given an interview since his return to the Montreal Daily Mail of May 7, 1917, as follows:—

Food supplies, labour, and ship building were the chief matters which were dealt with by Sir George Foster; finance and tonage production will be the principal matters which will engage the atention of Sir Thomas White.

Joint Action on Food Prices.

The Minister of Trade and Commerce states that as soon as Congress gives President Wilson the necessary authority, by the passage of measures now in the House of Representatives and the Senate, there will be joint action by Canada and the United States for the regulation of food prices, for co-operation in the supply of agricultural labour, and for co-operation in the production of tonnage required to offset the activities of German submarines.

Sir George said that the decision was reached early in the conference at Washington, but there would have to be joint action by Canada and the United States in order to most effectively solve the problems in which the North American continent is interested through the war. The War Measures Act gives the Canadian Government the authority which it requires, but Congress has to provide the American Government with similar power before anything effective can be done. Sir George expressed the opinion that Congress would pass the Bills unanimously.

There is a frank admission, and I have no reason to doubt the report that the Government have power under the War Measures Act to enact legislation immediately, by Order in Council, embodying the substance of the motion now before the House. The same thing is being done in other countries. Down in the Argentine Republic even more drastic measures have been taken. I quote from the Montreal Gazette of May 7, 1917:—

Ottawa, May 6.—A further report, in response to inquiries regarding an article stating that the Argentine Republic was seriously menaced by famine, has been received by the Department of Trade and Commerce from Mr. George Mallet, of Valparaiso, Chile.

Mr. Mallet says that the information contained in his first article was telegraphed from Buenos Aires to responsible newspapers in Chile, and was also published in papers in Argentina. In view of the subsequent abnormal exportation of wheat from Argentina, he says, the alarmist story of famine menace would almost appear to have been a hasty exaggeration of the actual facts, were it not for the supporting evidence which is everywhere apparent, on a careful review of the question. He points out that the Government of Argentina has found it necessary to issue a decree with astonishing rapidity prohibiting the exportation of grain so indispensable for home consumption. "The failure of the harvest in the principal grain zone lying between Uruguay, Paraguay and the Andes, naturally produced considerable alarm," he says, "totally eclipsing the favorable prospects of the Province of Buenos Aires, which have subsequently been brought to light. This is, however, not of sufficient importance to counterbalance the losses in the remaining provinces."

Without taking up unnecessarily the time of the House, I now submit this motion, trusting that it will appeal to the judgment and intelligence of every hon. member of this House.

Mr. J. J. HUGHES (Kings, P.E.I.): I wish to go on record as supporting this motion, though I would like to see it even wider. The Government has received this session a great number of petitions containing hundreds of names, and certainly representing the views of thousands of people in this country, praying for the enactment of a law this session prohibiting the importation.

Mr. SPEAKER: I regret to have to interrupt the hon. member, but it is not in order for him to now discuss the question of prohibition. The resolution before us is with respect to the conserving of the products used in the manufacture of liquor.

Mr. J. J. HUGHES: I did not intend to take up much of the time of the House, and I think that what I have to say bears directly on the motion before the House. I was simply leading up to my reasons for supporting this motion, if not a wider one, and I should like to have the privilege of addressing the House for a few moments. I was saying that the Government has received a large number of petitions this year praying for the enactment of a law this session prohibiting the importation, sale and manufacture of intoxicating liquors in this country. If ever there was a time when this question should be considered it is now. Members of the Government especially the Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White) and the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster), have held meetings in different parts of the country to explain to the people the gravity of the situation, and have told the people that, sooner or later—and much sooner than many expect—we shall have to give up seventy-five per cent of our luxuries, and perhaps twenty-five per cent of necessaries. Intoxicating liquors at their very best are certainly luxuries, and at their worst are one of the greatest evils from which the country suffers. I believe that public opinion at this time would sustain the Government in taking action along the lines suggested by this resolution, and in my humble judgment, will condemn the Government if something of the kind is not done during the present session. Last session Parliament passed an Act fixing very severe penalties for the carrying of liquor into prohibited provinces. I know that that Act has been violated extensively in regard to the province from which I come. I had a question upon the Order Paper early in the session, asking the Government if they were aware that the provisions of that Act had been violated by the carrying of intoxicating liquors into Prince Edward Island.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

[Mr. J. J. Hughes.]

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman (Mr. Hughes) should confine his remarks to the question before the Chair. We are not discussing the general question of prohibition—the resolution is a specific one against certain grains being used in the manufacture of intoxicating liquor.

Mr. J. J. HUGHES: I shall confine my remarks entirely to the subject you have indicated, Mr. Speaker. I say that at least the action proposed by this resolution would be justified, and more than justified, and that the people would approve such action by the Government. I believe that public opinion will not be met, and that a vast majority of the people will be dissatisfied, unless something of this kind is done.

Mr. D. D. McKENZIE (Cape Breton North): The hon. member (Mr. Devlin) who moved this resolution has put his case very strongly and clearly and has given the House sufficient data to justify the position he takes and the motion he has moved. If the only purpose in speaking were to give further information, it would not be necessary for me to occupy even a moment of the time of the House. But it might appear to be an expression of indifference on my part if I allowed the motion to go by without saying a word. I understand that this is a resolution that does not come to a division, but is made for the purpose of giving members of the House, and particularly members of the Government, an opportunity to express their opinion upon the subject. The figures given by the hon. member for Wright show that very large quantities of the very essentials of living are consumed in the manufacture of intoxicating liquors; and, while I am not fanatical on the subject, and have no desire to deprive any man of the right to take a drink when he so desires, I think it is time for us to deny ourselves such luxuries as intoxicating liquors and to take steps to stop their production. For, while the stoppage of production of intoxicants is not the object directly sought, the enforcement of the principle declared for in the resolution would have that effect. The direct object is two-fold—first, to prevent the use for other purposes of money which should go to the support of the people; and, second, to conserve for food purposes the grain which would otherwise be used in producing intoxicants. If any steps can be taken by the Government to make it certain that grains shall be used for food, and so improve our position in relation to the war, those steps should be taken.

Mr. J. H. BURNHAM (West Peterborough): I support the motion, both the principle involved and the statement regarding it made by the Finance Minister, upon whose statement, I believe the motion has been initiated.

Mr. HUGH GUTHRIE (South Wellington): As has been said, this motion comes before the House practically without notice, and consequently one is not so well prepared as one would like to be to discuss the question. I am satisfied that the suggestion of the hon. member for Wright (Mr. Devlin) is in the right direction. We in Canada, I think, are lagging behind our friends in the United States on this question. I see published daily in the New York Times and New York Herald almost whole sheet advertisements by the National Brewers of the United States, trying to justify their position at the present critical time in regard to food shortage, by showing the infinitesimally small quantity of grain they use. One has only to look into the records in our country, and I fancy in their country too, to see that it is not a small quantity of grain that is used by the brewers and distillers, but a large quantity —over 3,000,000 bushels of grain used in Canada last year to produce something which in seven out of the nine provinces is now practically prohibited. I fancy that the year 1915 showed a larger consumption of grain by brewers and distillers than last year, because in September last prohibition went into effect in Ontario, as it had gone into effect earlier in the year in other provinces. I think there is an easy way to meet the difficulty in this matter. A year ago last March the Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty) had a Bill before the House dealing with the question of the importation of liquors into various provinces. On that occasion I pointed out that the Government should go a step further and that, in the provinces where prohibition had been passed, the licenses of brewers and distillers should be revoked. The Inland Revenue Act provides that brewers' and distillers' licenses may be revoked in any year. That can be done now simply by a refusal to grant brewers' or distillers' malting and distilling licenses for seven of the nine provinces in which prohibition is in force. It would not apply generally throughout Canada but I am sure that such a course would undoubtedly be in accord with the views of the people of these seven provinces. I think the House is entitled to some expression on that question from the members of the Government. One can realize that in Ontario perhaps it is a difficult question for the present Government to deal with. One has only to cast one's eye at Walkerville, Ontario, with its tremendous distilleries, at Waterloo and at the Gooderham and Wort's distillery in Toronto to know that perhaps the Government may have some difficulty in meeting what I believe is a general demand at the present time. There are to-day in Canada, I believe, eleven distilleries and ninety-four breweries operating and it would be a very simple thing, and something that the people at this moment expect, for the Government, through the Inland Revenue Act, as it is at present framed, or by legislation, or by Order in Council under the War Measures Act, to entirely eliminate the consumption of the grain that is now used by these breweries and distilleries. Pass it, if you will, as a war measure because it certainly would be an appropriate measure at the present time. I feel confident that the whole country will support it.

Mr. EDMOND PROULX (Prescott): I know that some of the farmers have difficulty in procuring grain for seeding their land this year. I think public opinion would support the Government if it would take measures to relieve the situation. One way of relieving the situation would be by saving the grain which goes into the production of liquor. It is certainly wasted. What is the use of the Government preaching economy and self-sacrifice if the Government does not do anything to relieve the situation? Something has been done by the provinces. The Government has passed legislation confirming the legislation passed by the provinces and trying to help the provinces in having the law observed. But, that is not sufficient. We are certainly passing through a crisis which demands upon the part of the citizens a measure of self-sacrifice and I do not see why the distilleries and brewers should not have their sacrifices as well as other people are having theirs. I am strongly in favour of the resolution proposed by my hon. friend from Wright (Mr. Devlin).

Mr. E. W. NESBITT (North Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I think that something should be done during the war to curtail the amount of grain that is used for distilling and brewing purposes. The Government have an opportunity of showing that they are not only in favour of temperance but that they are in favour of conserving the grain production of the country for food purposes. In so far as my knowledge of the country goes, I think it will be necessary before the snow flies again for the Government to use every effort to conserve the grain in the country for food purposes and therefore I have pleasure in endorsing the resolution. I would ask the Government to take into their serious consideration the question of doing something along this line because that is a direction in which they can move and do the least harm and the most good.

Mr. J. G. TURRIFF (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I think my hon. friend from Wright (Mr. Devlin) has every justification for bringing this matter to the attention of the Government. I know that in so far as the people I represent are concerned, nine-tenths of them, Liberals and Conservatives alike, would support and justify the Government in taking action along the line suggested by my hon. friend. I do not intend to refer to this in the sense of temperance legislation in any degree whatever. I altogether agree with the view expressed by my hon. friend from North Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt) a moment ago, that we were facing possibly a much more serious situation than we have any idea of. We heard from the hon. member for Wright of the crop failures in some of the South American countries. There is the Republic of Argentina, which is not at war at all, but which has been compelled to take just such action as the hon. member for Wright has asked the Government to take. There never has been a time in the past, whatever the future may bring forward, when the Government could take this action and cause as little disturbance to the large interests, and there are large financial interests engaged in making whisky and beer. Many of the factories could be used to great advantage in manufacturing, not from grain, but from other sources, spirits to be used in connection with the making of high explosives. The grain and food supplies that are being used to-day in the manufacture of beer and whisky could be saved to the country. With the crop failure in South America, and with the possibility of a light crop in Canada, this saving would be all important. Remember that we are now at the eighth day of May and that this is one of the latest seasons we have ever had in Canada taking it all around. I know, speaking for the West, that the chances are that we are going to have a very small crop, we are going to have a much less acreage in wheat than we have had in the past and we do not grow a great deal of barley in the West. Our crop will have to go more largely to oats and flax. We are going to have a short crop in all probability of the grains that go to make human food. Then, what about the conditions that exist in England? I am afraid from what I have heard from men and women who have returned from Great Britain in the last month that the conditions there are considerably worse than we have any idea of, that they are extremely serious. When you find a country like Great Britain tearing up their parks and lands that have not grown food products for many years, something very serious is on. Here is an opportunity now for the Government to save many millions of bushels of food products for the people, either for ourselves, or for the Empire, or for our Allies, all in the interest of winning this war. If the Government does not take advantage of this situation, in my judgment, it will be neglecting the greatest opportunity that has ever come to the Government to meet the views of all the people of Canada. If they do take advantage of this suggestion they will meet the views of the great majority of the people and they will be doing something that the people of Canada want to have done. They have the expression of the views of the people on the general liquor question, and I am not going to discuss that. But that helps to justify them to-day in taking action to conserve this great amount of food product and thereby to make not only Canada but Great Britain, the Empire, and our Allies that much stronger. I feel that I would not be representing the sentiments of my constituency if I did not make these remarks. I trust that the Government will not be hampered, that they will not allow themselves to be hampered, by the consideration of any particular interest, distilling, or brewing, or any other, but that they will go forward and save this grain to the people, and not only the grain but the sugar and molasses as well. Sugar and molasses are as much food products as wheat, oats or barley. By the course suggested something can be saved, and in saving it no harm would be done to the country, rather a greater good would be done than by letting this grain be converted into whisky and beer. So there is everything in favour of this suggestion and nothing against it except the interests of a few brewers and manufacturers. Therefore, I hope that the Government will lend a kindly ear to this suggestion, and within a very short time issue the necessary instructions that, until the war is ended, no further grain shall be used for making whisky or beer.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN (South York): Mr. Speaker, I have attended some meetings in my own province of Ontario, the main object of which was to increase the agricultural production of that province. A great committee has been formed for that purpose, with the Lieutenant Governor of Ontario as chairman. Sub-committees are now at work to ascertain how the resources of the province can be best developed for the purposes of this war. I have read in the press, and I myself have written in the press and advised, that there ought to be a conservation of all our energies for the purposes of the war; and certainly we in Ontario are talking in the direction of increasing the production of food products in this country, not only producing them but using them efficiently. We are devoting barley, rye, corn and wheat in some cases to the production of these liquors and spirits. The province of Ontario has declared in favour of prohibition, while we have declared that we are in favour of increased production and efficient use of what we produce; and so I say that to be consistent with one's self one must support this proposal. Either there is to be a scarcity of food or there is not, and we know pretty well that there is to be from the way in which prices are soaring to-day. This Parliament will not be doing its duty unless it does everything possible in the way of preserving the food energies of the country. When we use grain like barley, rye, corn and wheat in the manufacture of spirits for drinking purposes, instead of devoting it to the feeding of the people and the maintenance of our soldiers and citizens, securing reasonable prices of food for the men working in munition factories, we are not being true to the protestations we make as to our loyalty and desire to win the war. All these grains can be used as ordinary foods. Barley and rye both make splendid bread, and while perhaps the corn which we largely import from the United States cannot be used for bread making, all of these grains can be used for the feeding of stock, and it is as essential to increase our production of livestock in Canada for food purposes as to increase the production of other foodstuffs. You are lessening the amount of food available for mankind, and you are also lessening the amount of food available for the production of these food animals. That being the case, I say it is the duty of the Government, and I think they will see it is their duty, to take action in this respect. Certainly it seems to be the logical conclusion of what they have said heretofore, that there must be conservation of these things. I only wish to say that I should like to see it done.

But we must always remember that while the distilleries are running at high pressure and are producing a great deal of spirits, a comparatively small proportion of these spirits goes into drink. These spirits are used for the production of glycerine and other things essential in the manufacture of high explosives. It may be necessary to continue the operation of the distilleries for the production of spirits for explosive purposes, but to permit the use of these grains for any other purpose except for food would to my mind be a mistake, and would not be living up to the views we are expressing publicly here, and that the Government has stated publicly. At meetings held throughout the country every one says: Conserve your energies. So to be true and just to ourselves we have to take the position that has been proposed here to-day and, as I said, I think the Government are ready to take that position, at least it is the logical position for them to take, and I trust that they will take an early opportunity of conserving grains of this kind. In a proclamation signed by His Majesty the King the other day it was stated that the greatest care must be exercised in the use of all kinds of grains in the Mother Country, especially in feeding stock. It was stated that even the horses, except those kept for the express purpose of carrying on and maintaining the breed, would have to go without oats unless oats were absolutely necessary for them as work horses. But even that was not mentioned, it was said unless they were essential for the maintenance of the breed, that is, the brood mares and the stud horses. The same thing was said with regard to all cattle; if they had to have superior food they must have it, but if food could be spared from the use of animals and was required for the maintenance of the people it ought to be conserved in that direction. With these soaring prices for food and with our farmers in great need of food for their dairy cattle, we must do everything in our power to conserve what food supplies we have. I was much impressed with what was said about the high price of food for dairy cattle the other day, and also by what my hon. friend from Brockville (Mr. Webster) said about the large amount of food used for the dairy herds in this province. We must make every effort to increase our production of butter, cheese, bacon and meat of all kinds in this time of war. The war is not over. It looks none too encouraging to-day in any quarter, and there may be a danger that Germany will get control of Russia and the great food supplies there, so that the Allies may not have the benefit of that source of supply. In view of all these things, this Government, I think, would be justified in adopting some such measure as that under discussion to-day.

Mr. H. H. STEVENS (Vancouver City): Mr. Speaker, I think that my views on this subject are pretty well known to the House. A year ago I suggested to the House and to the Government that the distilleries of the country should be devoted to the production of spirits for useful war purposes, and the suggestion of the hon. member from Wright contains the same principle, that is, that grains and other food products should be restricted to profitable and productive uses rather than to the production of what is generally looked upon as a luxury. However, in listening to the discussion to-day, I have not observed much effort to deal with some of the difficulties which must present themselves to every thoughtful person. It would be of little value for the Government to restrict or prohibit the use of grain or other food products in Canada for the manufacture of liquors if, by simply exporting the grain across the line, the same grain, or a similar quality, could be absorbed there in any large manufacturing institution for the manufacture of intoxicating liquor. In my estimation, we should go a great deal further. In fact, only yesterday I drew this matter to the attention of some members of the Government, and the suggestion was made that the Government should prohibit the exportation of any grains except to allied countries for food purposes. That would be going a step further than the resolution of the hon. member for Wright, but would, I think, not go far enough. Up to a day or two ago the Imperial authorities had not exercised much restriction with regard to the use of grains in the manufacture of intoxicating liquor, but I noticed in yesterday's paper despatches from the old land indicating that some action would be taken in that respect. I assume that the Minister of Trade and Commerce, who is now leading the House, will be able to give hon. gentlemen some information as to the possibility of an understanding being arrived at between Canada and the United States and the Motherland with a view to giving definite effect to this proposal. If by our example and by conference with the other Governments we could induce the exercise of similar restrictions in these three countries, some very definite and valuable results would follow.

I would like to have had some definite figures as to the quantities of grain that have been used for the manufacture of intoxicating liquors. As a matter of fact, I had intended to bring this matter to the attention of the House by proposing a motion; I have a copy of it in my pocket, and had intended to put it on the Order Paper. However, the matter has been brought up, and I regret that I have not the figures with me and that we are not in a position to know just what benefit would result from a restriction of this kind. I think we are all of the opinion that some such action as is suggested would be of definite benefit to the country. I would like to impress upon the Government the seriousness of the proposal and suggest that it receive their favourable attention at a very early date.

Mr. J. A. ROBB (Huntingdon): In presenting his resolution, the hon. member for Wright (Mr. Devlin) gave statistics to show that in the year 1916 over 3,000,000 bushels of grain were used in the manufacture of alcoholic beverages. Calculating an average of 25 bushels to the acre, it would take 125,000 acres to grow the grain required during one year for the manufacture of these alcoholic beverages. If that grain, instead of being diverted to the purpose of manufacturing an alcoholic beverage, which, as has been remarked by a previous speaker, is, after all, only a luxury, were devoted to the feeding and graining of cattle, it would grain 60,000 milch cows for one year, thus enabling the farmers to produce milk a little cheaper. Including the grain and molasses used, the value of the raw material diverted to the manufacture of alcoholic beverages in one year would be $4,250,000. I submit, therefore, in view of the fact that the hon. Minister of Finance, the Minister of Agriculture—indeed all the Government—are appealing to the people to exercise thrift and economy, that we would be amply justified in accepting the resolution presented by the hon. member for Wright. It looks to me as if the representatives of the people in Parliament are convinced that the proposal is a sound one, and I cheerfully support the resolution presented by my hon. friend.

Hon. GEORGE P. GRAHAM (South Renfrew): This is not a temperance proposal, although, incidentally, its acceptance would be a great step along temperance lines. The proposal, as I understand it, is the diverting of certain food supplies from channels that are non-essential to channels that are essential. I say that it is not a temperance measure, because unless we make the provinces which have passed prohibition bone dry, liquor will be imported. We are asking boys at the universities to go out into the harvest fields and help to produce. In the city of Toronto there is a suggestion that the schools be closed prematurely in order that the young men may go to the farms. In the United States they are taking measures to mobilize, in a way, all the young men between sixteen and eighteen, not so much in order that they may take part in the war at the front as to have them go out into the country places and help production. We are gladly permitting our sons to do this, but should we permit them to do it if the very thing that they are producing is to be diverted from the useful purpose to which the nation intended that it should be devoted?

If the proposal of the hon. member for Wright (Mr. Devlin) were adopted by the Government, a little jar might result to certain lines of business. But the winning of the war is the paramount issue, and all private interests, even though they be far-reaching, must come under subjection to this one great end. There is not a man in this House who does not feel in some way the effect of this war, and the Canadian people, including those engaged in the business affected by this resolution are, I believe, prepared for sacrifices. If the figures just given by the member for Huntingdon (Mr. Robb) are correct—and I assume they are—we see in this proposal an opportunity of carrying out in a marvellous way the declaration of the Finance Minister with regard to saving. Over $4,000,000 can by this means be diverted into channels contributing to the winning of the war which, to put it mildly, do not now tend to that end.

The question of the manufacture of liquor for explosives has been mentioned. Undoubtedly any measure adopted by the Government would have to exclude from its provisions the manufacture of liquor for explosives. As a matter of fact, several of the distilleries in Canada are manufacturing largely for war purposes, and no one would suggest that these industries ought to be interfered with; rather, they should be encouraged to the fullest extent. I am of the opinion that the use of grain for the manufacture of alcoholic beverages in Canada should be stopped and the grain sent into proper channels for the sustenance of the people, thus assisting in the great end which we all have in view, the successful carrying on of the war.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK (Red Deer): As the hon. member for South Renfrew (Mr. Graham) has very justly observed this is not a temperance or prohibition measure. Such measures, I understand, are to come before the House before the end of the session, and we shall then all have an opportunity of stating where we stand with regard to them. This is a purely economic proposal. If I were assured that the adoption of the resolution of the hon. member for Wright (Mr. Devlin) would shorten the war by ten minutes, it would have my very hearty support. I am not, however, at all clear in mind that that would be the effect of his proposition. It might have some effect upon the war; it is conceivable it might remove the excuse that no doubt some slackers are finding and thereby increase the number of recruits, but even that I think is doubtful. I am not clear that it would shorten the war by ten minutes.

There is an aspect of the case that has not been touched upon by any preceding speaker that I should like to place before the Government before they tell us their views upon the subject. My hon. friend from Assiniboia, (Mr. Turriff) very properly pointed out that we are threatened with a very short season this year in Canada. In the northern portions of Alberta that is particularly so; large districts around where I live, including my own farm, did not have a furrow turned ten days ago. In other years on the same date, most of my own seeding and most of the seeding in that district has been finished. The House will at once see that the question of the short season is one which will come very close to the mind of the farmer when he is deciding, at the last moment, so to speak, what he is going to do with his land. In Alberta barley ripens very much faster than wheat or oats. I do not think there is a remote chance of ripening wheat this year on my own farm—if I may mention it again—and the same remark applies to large tracts of land in the middle and northern portions of Alberta. Oats will be a difficult crop to ripen in my neighbourhood; the end of August we are liable to have frosts which freeze out the crop, and as oats, in an average Alberta season, require fully four months in which to ripen, very little calculation will show that only three and three-quarters months are left now even if the land were seeded. But the land is only being ploughed now. I do not happen to have accurate information which I can give to the House; I have not even definite information as to what has happened on my own land in the last few days, because a farmer has to make his decisions quickly; but it is conceivable to me that, having regard to the shortness of the season and the excellent prices that are being received for barley, a great deal more barley will be grown this year than in other years in the districts with which I am acquainted. If, one of the main outlets of barley happens to be through a trade which the Government takes upon itself under the War Measures Act to cut off in a moment—I undertsand that to be the proposition of my hon. friend—then I personally would have doubt about how far the farmers would go on with the extra cropping of barley that I think it is very conceivable and likely they will be undertaking. The War Measures Act is a very necessary Act or Parliament would not, in its wisdom, have passed it; but for the Government to act too rashly under that Act may very easily have the effect of producing results diametrically opposite to those intended by hon. gentlemen who urged the Government to take sudden and ill-considered action. Herbert Spencer, the great philosopher, is responsible in his books for saying that nine out of ten Acts of Parliament passed by any Parliament in Europe had diametrically the opposite effect of what the Parliament intended. That statement is not very complimentary to legislatures, but he produces a marvellous quantity of information in his books to prove the wisdom of his contention, and I think I have given to the Government good ground for seeing that it is just possible that a sudden dislocation of industry along this line may produce results disastrous rather than helpful, not only to the country but to the farmers. I do not know whether barley is used in this country as human food; we feed it on my place only to hogs and a little to cattle. It is used, however, as a food, and it may be, if the war lasts, that we shall require to use barley more than we are doing at the present moment.

The point I wish to make is that if the Government do anything too rashly under the War Measures Act, they may do more harm than good and may produce results diametrically opposite to those which I have no doubt hon. gentlemen on this side wish to ensue from the recommendations they are making to the Government. We are telling the farmer to produce, to put his land under crop. A farmer must be the judge in the main of what he produces; he knows the markets he has to deal in, and for the life of me I cannot understand a man going to a farmer and saying in one breath: Produce, and in the next: we propose to cut off under the War Measures Act a very important proportion of your market. I cannot understand the attitude of mind of one who does that. The other day we had a proposition to commandeer all the wheat in Canada, and that was right on the back of the Government having adopted a resolution to give free wheat to the States, for which boon we had been calling for five years. There is no logical connection between rejoicing over free wheat one day and asking the Government to commandeer wheat the next day, because commandeering, I need not tell this House, is a very serious interference with freedom, whether in regard to wheat or anything else. Commandeering is the autocratic action of Government. If you commandeer the wheat to-day and stop the market for barley the next day—well, farmers to my knowledge have had a very hard time for the last thirteen or fourteen years, but as a comparative amateur at the business who is just beginning to get his head above water, I should not know what to raise next.

Mr. W. B. NORTHRUP (East Hastings): Mr. Speaker, there are some questions which can be quickly elucidated, and on which after a single argument hon. members can vote intelligently; there are others which depend entirely upon facts which will assist hon. members in coming to a conclusion. The motion before the House at the present time is one of those which depend upon facts, and therefore there cannot be the slightest difference of opinion between any two hon. members except as to the standpoint from which they will view the question. At the present time, with this horrible war raging, I would have thought that every member would be on the side of the Allies, and that therefore there would be no possible question how his vote would go when it was simply a question whether he should vote for civilization or for barbarism, for the Allies or for the Huns. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Devlin) has asked the Government to take steps under the War Measures Act to have the supply of grain to brewers and distillers immediately discontinued, and if by any unhappy chance the Kaiser had been a member of this House of Parliament, he would hold up both hands and most cheerfully vote in favour of the motion. Many of our breweries have, under local provincial legislation, closed their doors so that the quantity of grain used by brewers is comparatively small. We have, however, a large number of distilleries—the Corbyville distillery, the Prescott distillery, the Montreal distillery, the Seagram distillery, the Gooderham distillery, two distilleries at Perth, one at Hamilton, and one in British Columbia—quite an array of distilleries which are certainly using up an immense quantity of grain. The hon. gentleman asks us to stop the giving of grain to these distilleries, not one of which is to-day turning out one drop of whisky, but is turning out what is known as acetone, which is used in the manufacture of ammunition for the benefit of those who are fighting for us.

I do not think it is necessary for me to say anything more after naming these nine distilleries, not one of which is turning out a drop of whisky. There are two small distilleries at St. Hyacinthe and Berthier, and also the Walkerville distillery which are turning out some whisky, but when we find nine of our largest distilleries engaged in turning out for the Imperial Munitions Board the acetone they so much require, I think I am justified as a supporter of the Allies in voting against the motion.

Mr. DEVLIN: I wanted to say before the hon. gentleman sat down that I would willingly consent to an amendment in regard to beverages.

Mr. NORTHRUP: If the hon. gentleman will amend his motion to express what he means, we can then consider it, but at present we are considering the motion before the House.

Mr. GRAHAM: It is not a motion at all.

Rt. Hon. Sir GEORGE FOSTER: As has already been said, this question can be argued entirely apart from any predilections we may have as to prohibition or non-prohibition, strict temperance or otherwise. The question involved in this motion is an economic one, and my hon. friend from Hastings (Mr. Northrup) has pointed out the cardinal lack in the motion. It would be impossible for the House, if it had the facts in its possession, to vote for the resolution as it stands. If such a motion were carried and put into effect the result would be the stoppage of a large proportion if not the main proportion of the preparations for war that are being carried on under the auspices of the Imperial Munitions Board in this country. It is well that the facts should be placed before the House, and I have here a statement prepared by the Department of Inland Revenue, giving the figures for the last three years. In the fiscal year of 1915, the distilleries used 83,288,969 pounds of grain, divided as follows, in round numbers: malt, 6,700,000 lbs.; corn, 61,000,000 lbs.; rye, 14,000,000 lbs.; oats, 500,000 lbs.; wheat, 1, 180,000 lbs. In 1916 the total amount used was 44,971,959 pounds of grain, not much more than half the amount used in the preceding year, and that was divided as follows, again using round numbers: malt, 4,800,000 lbs.; corn, 33,000,000 lbs.; rye, 7,000,000 lbs.; oats, 169,000 lbs.; wheat, nil. In 1917 the total rose to 88,007,019 pounds, divided as follows: malt, 8,000,000 lbs.; corn, 69,500,000 lbs., rye, 10,430,000 lbs.; oats, 131,000 lbs., and wheat 27,780 lbs. That shows that the production of 1915, probably most of which was for beverage purposes, fell by almost 50 per cent in the following year, but in 1917 the figures were a little above those of 1915. The figures I have given refer to the distilleries alone. Now for the facts in connection with the increase in these figures. For the purpose of making nitro-cellulose powder and cordite, 6,000,000 lbs. of alcohol in round figures were used monthly by the Imperial Munitions Board. Without detaining the House to give the figures in detail I may say that that amount is equal to, if not in excess of, the total producing power of the distilleries in Canada at the present time, and as long as the war goes on with its consumption of explosives on an increasing scale, and as long as Canada keeps the position she occupies in the making of explosives, then entirely apart from food considerations, you have to come to the conclusion that for the sake of the war ieself we could not shut down these distilleries by depriving them of what is necessary to make a very vital factor in the war.

On the other hand, when you come to the breweries, a different story to a certain extent is told. In 1915 the maltsters, who prepare the material for the brewers, used a total of 145,295,673 lbs. of barley, and in 1916 93,159,680 lbs., and in 1917 98,522,300 lbs.; that is, there was a very large decrease in the last two years in the amount of barley used. These are all the facts that need be given to place the matter in the light that I wish to place it in before the House. Clearly, the motion of my hon. friend could not receive the support of the Government in its present form, and probably the idea my hon. friend had in his mind in making this motion was a saving of grain for food requirements, and not the saving of grain for the making of the vital constituents of explosives necessary to the war.

With reference to the general question, I think this short debate has probably been of great use, and it certainly will be of great use if it leads us a little farther afield than simply to discuss the waste of food, if you choose to call it that, which is inevitable in the manufacture of grains into beverages. Every man settles for himself whether in ordinary times it is a proper, a beneficent, and an economic use to make of grains, our staple food, to turn them into another form which has arguably less nutritive properties in sustaining life. But at a time when food is a necessity, and drinks can be dispensed with without harm to the body or mind, the argument takes a different line, and if there is anything in the discussion this afternoon it is the appreciation that we have reached a stage in the world's history where this country does not stand isolated by itself on this question of food requirements, for it is one of the most important problems that the whole world has to face at the present moment. I am not an alarmist; I do not believe in trying to alarm people into doing their duty. But there are times when a man ought to be particularly truthful with himself and with his people, and truthful with the world so far as his influence goes; and I am here to state that it is not a trumped-up report made for a special purpose or by partisans of some special idea to say that, to-day the food question in this whole world of ours is a most important question. You have to view it not only from the point of view of the productivity of the world's food fields, but also from the point of view of transport. There lies Australia, eight or ten thousand miles away from the centres where food is required. A vessel, in order to make the voyage with her cargo of food to the place where that food is needed must consume as much time as she would consume in making nearly three voyages to nearer sources of supply. It is possible that the grain basket of the world will have to be emptied of its other contents for the use of the centres where their contents are needed, whilst Australia's millions of bushels lie there hoarded in her elevators or stored up along her lines of railway in those great picturesque, bulky packages which tower far above your head as you travel along. So that both transport and productivity are considerations of extreme gravity at the present moment. How can it be otherwise, with the whole world's commissariat turned upside down as the result of two and three-quarter years of war which has kept from thirty to forty millions of adult producers out of the fields of production, a large number of them from the farms, and which has carried along with it a surging tide of an even greater number of men and women, whom it has taken from producing fields in order to engage in the subsidiary services of the war? Add transport, add exchange, add financial difficulties, to these other two, and is it any wonder that after two years and nine months of such a world's movement, the world's commissariat should be thrown into confusion? Add to that the fact that you have not merely the common difficulties of transport but the uncommon difficulties which are injected into the situation by the fierce and all-too-successful work of the German submarine, the possibilities of which have probably not yet been reached. It is a moot question whether the surge of that undersea, piratical work will not grow in proportion to the attempts, successful attempts, to cope with it by means of devices for the destruction of the submarine.

We hope, and with reason, that the ingenuity of the Allies and the added ingenuity of that great country to the south of us that has joined the Allies, may provide the proper antidote. In the meantime, there is this menace, there is this injected difficulty in the situation. Looking at it from that standpoint, no matter what a man's predelictions are or have been if his heart is right, if he wants this battle pressed on to victory, knowing as he must know, that the soldiers and the men who stand behind the soldiers must be fed, a man must be driven irresistibly to the conclusion that wherever you can save what is necessary for human food you ought to save it, wherever you can produce what is necessary for human food, you ought to produce it.

Now, let us not make the mistake of dwelling entirely upon one side of this question. There is a deal of talk in the newspapers and elsewhere—and good talk and there is behind it a lot of earnest, practical endeavour—in favour of getting out the hoe, the spade, and the plough, and adding to the productive results of agricultural work. Everybody is engaging in this work and it is a splendid thing. But let me tell the members of this House, and all others whom my words may reach, that there is a way of adding to the contents of the world's bread basket even more effectively than by getting out your hoes and spades and ploughs and aiding by actual production. What is that way? That way is to save at least half of what we are wasting now. If the seven millions of people in this country would save half of what is being unnecessarily used you would have a larger effective contribution than you can have by any extra effort in this single year, by a spurt within the two or three weeks available in seeding and planting time. What we have got to do is not only to produce, but to save—to save everything that is savable.

So, again I say, and not as an alarmist, that if one thing is more grave than another in this whole situation, it is the question of feeding the Allies for the remainder of this war, and more particularly for the next six months. Consider the situation. The decrease of transport tonnage is constantly going on. Unfortunately, it is possible to sink a six thousand ton vessel in two minutes; unfortunately also, the shipyard can not produce the equivalent of that vessel inside of from five to nine months. With all the spirit that is being put into the construction of merchant shipping in Great Britain and Canada, and is to be put into it in the United States of America, there is not much chance of any relief until the latter part of 1917. The critical time is between now and then. What food we can save as a contribution to the Allied cause in these six months which are upon us and are passing rapidly, it is the essential duty of every man and every woman to save. Now, I am afraid I have been led into making a speech, but, I want to alleviate, if I can, the quandary into which my hon. friend from Red Deer (Mr. Clark) led the House. It was as to what might be the effect if we rushed into the exercise of our powers under the War Measures Act and suddenly stopped the outgo of the farmer's barley along the channel of making malt for brewers. The hon. gentleman asked a question; it was a pertinent question, and many farmers would ask: Why do you ask us to produce and then, with the next stroke of the pen, take away from us the market for the grain which this year, under present circumstances, we can most easily and most certainly produce; especially in certain sections? Why do you do that? After all the farmer must have his market, the manufacturer must have his market, and everybody else who makes things must have a market. But it is not necessary that anybody shall have a market if he has not something that is essentially necessary and which the community needs at the present time.

The first thing to find out is the essential need of the hour, for the community and for the world. The essential need of the hour for the community and for the world to-day is food in the shape of grain made into bread and not anything which has less value and which goes through more circuitous methods. I am not a farmer, but I am quite sure that the barley will be needed, and can be used in one of two ways. When I was a boy I had to eat barley bread. I owe a great deal of mental activity, such as I have, to the barley bread and the rye bread that I ate in my early youth. I think that I could go back to barley bread now and that I could relish it. The other use for barley would be to manufacture it into beef and pork, and so add to the food production.

Do you know that to-day in Great Britain—and I mention this so that it may shame some of us into some of the self-sacrifice that they are making at the present time—you cannot get a single ounce of white bread within the whole realm? No white flour is allowed to be made by the miller, no grain is allowed to him for any other purpose than to make a flour that takes from 81 to 85 per cent of the stuff out of the husks and that makes you a darker bread. They eat it on the King's table, they eat it on the duke's table, on the miner's table and on the millionaire's table, and they do not grumble about it. To-day, if you were in Great Britain and you took out your tooting horn automobile, you would have to get some ethereal thing or other to make it go; you would not get an ounce of petrol in Great Britain to carry it around for anything but an absolutely necessary purpose. To-day, if you were in the United Kingdom, you would have to go without your luxurious dining cars and dinners on the cars. The dining cars are taken off from every railway in Great Britain—there may be one exception or so on a long route. The Pullmans are gone as well. They are reducing themselves down in all these ways to the old, simple necessities and conveniences of life. They are sacrificing themselves in every respect. On this very question of brewing, months ago, the amount of beer that the brewers would be allowed to make in the United Kingdom was cut down to one-fourth of the average of the years past. Within three weeks a decree has gone out from the Controller of Food in the United Kingdom that no longer shall grain be given, or provided, or used for brewing purposes. They have come to it gradually. They do it, not because they do not believe in beer or whisky, or alcohol, but because the necessities of the case drive them to it. We are flesh and blood of the Empire. We are part and parcel of this great united Ally war. What it is so necessary to suffer in one country in the way of self-sacrifice it is equally necessary to suffer in another if we are to have equality of service and equality of distinction in carrying and bearing the burden of the great war we are going through.

I fear that my earnestness has carried me farther than I should have gone, but I do want again, before I sit down, to say that what we in Canada could do we have done in many respects but not in all. I was in the city of Washington for a few days very lately. I had been in the United States more or less since I was a boy, but I tell you that it warmed the cockles of my heart, it suffused me with a feeiing of infinite satisfaction to hear from high and low, from the President of the United States down to the man on the street, the woman in the home, so hearty, so undiluted, so absolutely wholesouled appreciation of what Canada has done in this war. I tell you the sacrifice, the heroism, the splendid gleams of real suffering and sacrifice that have been shown by Canadians in this war have cemented us as Canadians to the people to the south of us as they have to the people in all allied countries. Are we quite worthy of it? Some have gone and fought and died. Others have gone and fought and been maimed. Others have gone and have fought and will fight and come back whole in body and in mind. But the people of Canada, through and through, by and large, do not know the meaning of self-sacrifice and burden-bearing in this war. We must come up to the standard, and we can only come up to it by self-sacrifice, by saving and by producing that which is right and good for the necessities of the hour.

I am not going to say what the Government is going to do in this respect. It has not been brought to the attention of the Government for the first time to-day by my hon. friend (Mr. Devlin). It is a matter which has been at work in men's minds in this country, it is a matter which has been brought to the attention of the Government, and it is a matter to which the Government at the present moment is giving its serious consideration. What will happen, we shall see as future events uncoil themselves, but I, for one, stand by the argument I have made and it is a fair, sound argument which will prevail in our country. Then, I suppose, my hon. friend does not wish the House to adjourn?

Mr. DEVLIN: No, I am quite satisfied; I will withdraw the motion.

Motion withdrawn.

SEED GRAIN—EASTERN CANADA.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. C. A. GAUVREAU: Is the hon. Minister of Agriculture ready to give me the answer promised yesterday by my hon. friend the Solicitor General?

Hon. MARTIN BURRELL: My attention was called yesterday to the remarks made by my hon. friend the member for Temiscouata (Mr. Gauvreau), who cited a passage in L'Evênement respecting the distribution of grain in Quebec and in the east. That was answered, I believe, fairly fully by the Solicitor General, but my hon. friend and the House will pardon me if I give a little fuller information. The article quoted from L'Evênement was substantially correct. About last October, the investigations made by the department led us to believe that there would be a very great scarcity of first-class seed grain in western Canada, owing partly to the fact that there had been a great prevalence of rust, and also to the fact that the demand for the high grades was so strong that a very large proportion of it would likely go to the United States.

So, on October 7, an Order in Council was passed giving powers to appoint a commission for the purpose of purchasing seed grain and grading it, cleaning it and selling it to the municipalities and farmers at cost. It was intended at first to supply municipalities, for the reason that there were about thirty municipalities in the West which, from our investigations, we found would have practically no grain suitable for seed; and, accordingly, on the passage of the Order in Council, a commission was appointed and we commenced operations under that Order in Council. Under that Order in Council the selling was not confined to the West, although it was intended primarily to fill the needs of the West. It was also applicable to the East, and to some extent seed grain, wheat, was also shipped to the East. A little later on we anticipated an unfortunate condition in regard also to seed oats and barley, because there had been injury from frosts in some districts, and we had information which led us to believe that Ontario and the East might be short of seed oats. So in December another Order in Council was passed which enlarged the powers of the commission and enabled them to operate in regard to oats and barley practically in the same way as in regard to wheat, and during February and up until the 10th of March we carried on a propaganda in the way of advising the press and the banks and the large grain dealers all through Eastern Canada, Ontario, Quebec and the Maritime Provinces, as to what the facts were, and that if they applied they would be able to get oats and barley, and, to some extent, wheat, in carload lots. Later on requests came from Quebec, too late for transportation from the West, and we then were able, through our departmental officers, to locate seed grain in the East, in the elevators and at other points. We were able to get quotations on seed grain which we would, of course, grade and pronounce fit for seed, and we so advised the departments of agriculture and also large dealers in Quebec and the Maritime Provinces. As far as I know the demands have very largely been met throughout the whole of Canada. I may say that some farmers in the West lately have been getting the seed grain at even less than market price for this reason, that we conceived it to be absolutely essential to get in every acre of land we could this year with the best seed grain, and in one or two cases, where the municipalities and the local Governments guaranteed that the grain would be used for seed, we let them have it at a price that remunerated us, without giving us any profit, but was substantially lower than the market price. We have bought, cleaned, graded and sold to the municipalities and to farmers more than 600,000 bushels of seed wheat of excellent quality, and we have sent to Ontario and Quebec and the Maritime Provinces alone nearly 200,000 bushels of oats and a little barley. But that will give my hon. friend all the information he desires, although if he wishes it I shall send him a copy of the Order in Council.

THE POTATO SUPPLY.

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. MARTIN BURRELL (Minister of Agriculture): May I make a remark on a question raised by the hon. member for North Cape Breton, that is, the supply of potatoes. He read a telegram from somebody in Quebec complaining of the shortage and asking what could be done to get potatoes, as they could not get them from New Brunswick. I told my hon. friend that I would secure any further information. We have dispatched a large number of telegrams all over the country to the officials to try to obtain further information on that question. I have been informed by the Department of Agriculture in Nova Scotia that while there is no available surplus of potatoes there are probably enough for seed and for domestic use in that province. As to Saskatchewan, I have had a telegram from the Minister of Agriculture, in which he says:—

> We have ascertained potato supply approximately adequate. We know of a few carloads for sale, and no acute shortage.

I have a telegram also from the Minister of Agriculture for Quebec only this morning, because Quebec was supposed to be suffering from a shortage:

> I have not any precise information as to the exact quantity of potatoes in Quebec at present. Certain districts have slight surpluses, placing them in position to supply other districts where there is a shortage. But the quantity available to-day is very small. We have received several applications since a few days.

I have a telegram from Alberta which is not at all clear. Alberta reported a surplus in March of 800,000 bushels. The telegram I got was so vague that it did not make the matter clear, and I telegraphed again for further information.

The other western provinces, Manitoba and British Columbia, I have not heard from; I imagine that they have not more than enough for their requirements. The only provinces, therefore, which are left, apart from Ontario, which is short, are New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island. I am informed by telegram from official and unofficial sources that in New Brunswick there are probably now available for seed outside the province somewhere about 50,000 to 70,000 bushels, and that in Prince Edward Island probably 100,000 bushels will be available for the outside market, that is the rest of Canada. I have passed that information on to the ministers of Quebec and particularly to Ontario, where, of course, they are more or less in need.

It was stated the other day that we ought to take somewhat fuller steps, and I pointed out at that time that we considered the provincial machinery was so much more effective than ours in keeping them in close touch with the farmers through their district representatives, etc., that they would probably be able to deal with the potato question more effectively than we could, because it is entirely different from grain, which we can deal with through the officers of the Seed Branch. As a matter of fact, the Deputy Minister of Agriculture for Ontario was here early in March and informed us that he was taking steps, and I understand that recently they have been bringing in potatoes and doing what they can to relieve the districts which are short. It was stated in the paper the other day that Dr. Creelman, who has lately been appointed Commissioner of Agriculture, had said that I was trying to shift the responsibility from my shoulders. I very much question whether Dr. Creelman ever made such a remark. Indeed I understand that at about the time he was appointed he stated through the press some of the plans he had in contemplation in respect to these questions.

May I also say one word on a different phase of this subject, which the hon. member for West Middlesex (Mr. Duncan Ross) intended to bring up in the House. My hon. friend spoke to me personally about the matter. A great many inquiries have been made as to whether the Government would do something in the way of guaranteeing the price of potatoes. Of course, this raises a very large question which could hardly be discussed at this time. The question of guaranteeing a minimum price is a very difficult one. England has guaranteed a minimum price of potatoes of about $30 a ton, or about 75 cents a bushel. England is threatened with an extraordinary shortage. She is a very heavy importing country, whereas we are an exporting country of all agricultural products, including potatoes. In my province last year thousands of tons of potatoes sold at as low as $7 and $8 a ton, from 20 to 25 cents a bushel. If, therefore, under conditions of that kind the Government guaranteed a minimum price which would be regarded by some as fair, the Government might have to pay out on their guarantee from $10,000,000 to $20,000,000 on that one commodity. I think those who have looked into the matter agree that under conditions as they are now and promise to be, there is very little likelihood of the price of potatoes being such as not to afford ample remuneration to the farmer. With regard to the question as to whether we should fix a maximum price, I may say that I received to-day, from the same district as that from which my hon. friend's telegram came, a long letter affirming that the Government should affix a price of, say, $1.50 a bushel, which the writer thinks would be a reasonable price. The House must know that the fixing of a maximum price on commodities is an extraordinarily complex thing. England has not attempted it on any large scale, though she may come to it. In Italy it has broken down; in Germany it has, to some extent, broken down. In the United States they are giving the matter the most profound consideration. Secretary Houston admitted only the other day that the fixing of maximum and minimum prices for foodstuffs would not be a wise measure except as a last resort. The question presents many difficulties; as the hon. member for Red Deer has suggested, legislative action has often quite unexpected results, and fixing a maximum price might even tend to restrict production. After all, a high price is the very best spur to production, as it is also the very best spur to economy.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: By your leave, Mr. Speaker, may I ask my hon. friend whether the Government sends the seed grain to the municipalities, or to the farmers direct?

Mr. BURRELL: First of all to the municipalities, and to the farmer direct as well. It is sent to the dealers and farmers as well as to the municipalities. In the east it is sent only in carload lots, because that is obviously the only possible way.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Is this done by the Government itself, or through the commission which was appointed?

Mr. BURRELL: Through the commission, acting under the direction of my department. Of course, we sell for cash. So satisfactory have been the transactions and so whole-hearted has been the co-operation of all the provinces and municipalities, that up to May 7, the Receiver General has received through our commission, by way of amounts paid in for the grain, no less a sum than $898,000.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I observe that my hon. friend has cited two or three Orders in Council which have not been brought down to the House. I think they should be brought down.

Mr. BURRELL: I had an idea that they had been brought down. If not, I shall be very glad indeed to lay them on the Table.

Mr. PROULX: Has the hon. minister any more grain available for seeding.

Mr. BURRELL: Oats and wheat are still available, though it would be rather late to get in wheat now from the West.

Mr. NESBITT: By your leave, Mr. Speaker, I would like to point out to the minister that some time ago he gave an interview in the course of which he said that there were in the country one or two million bushels of potatoes more than were required. He said this afternoon that there were not enough potatoes. Is that the case? In a farming community we are paying as high as $1 a peck for potatoes.

Mr. BURRELL: My hon. friend could not have been in the House the other day when I spoke about that. A considerable surplus was estimated early in March, but since that time a large amount of potatoes has gone out, attracted by the high price in the United States. The condition in the United States is exactly as it is here. Potatoes in the United States are worth $3 a bushel and even more; there is a big shortage. Because of the high freight charges from British Columbia to the East on such a heavy commodity as potatoes, naturally there would be a steady flow of that surplus from my province into the United States. I can not tell my hon. friend the exact amount that has gone out though the amount is large, or what the surplus is now, because I have not received definite word from Alberta, which is supposed to have a considerable surplus. Unquestionably the surplus of a million and a half bushels has been steadily melting away, and I question very much whether there is now any or much of a surplus in the country. I think I have referred to the two provinces which have an available surplus.

Mr. NESBITT: My reason for making the inquiry is this: A great many potatoes were shipped to our section of the country from British Columbia and Alberta, but when the winter came on these shipments fell off, because the railway charge so much for a car for heating, and shipping becomes rather expensive. If there is still a surplus in British Columbia and Alberta, it would be a very good thing if the minister would let the country know about it. Potatoes are perishable, and any surplus might very well be shipped to the East.

Mr. BURRELL: I can only repeat what I have already said. We have given all the information that we have received up to date. I wired to the Ministers of Agriculture for Ontario and Quebec this morning, informing them as to the conditions, and told them that as soon as I got fuller information from Alberta, it would be sent to them.

SEPARATION ALLOWANCES.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK (Red Deer): I see my hon. friend the Minister of Militia and Defence in his place, and I should like to call his attention to a matter as to which I made a private communication to him. I have had a number of letters complaining of some apparent slackness in the way that the separation allowances arrive in the hands of the wives of men at the front. I understand that other members have had similar communications. In the case of one correspondent a reply was made from the department that when a married man at the front is reported missing the pay is cut off for three months. That seemed to me to be a very peculiar thing to do, because no one would miss the man more than the wife he has left at home, and there would be no moment in her life when she would need the assigned pay more than in those three months. If it is in the slightest degree inconvenient to the hon. minister to reply now I am willing that he should postpone his answer. I am sure that a number of people in the country would be glad to know, in a short statement, the way separation allowance is granted, and to have the assurance that no distinction is made between one person and another in the carrying out of the regulations.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: The administration of separation allowances and assigned pay is very intricate and difficult. It will interest all the members of the House and perhaps the public, if I make, with regard to the matter, a complete statement which will cover the whole situation as regards delays, alleged irregularities, and matters of a similar nature. The particular matter to which my hon. friend from Red Deer (Mr. Clark) has referred is that of a man who was reported missing and who had his pay cut off. No official notice would come that the man was missing until sometime after the event occurred, and just what action would be taken in this particular case, I cannot say. There are, in connection with the administration of separation allowance, almost as many combinations as can be made out of the alphabet. Perhaps that is an exaggerated way of putting the case, but it will convey the idea that I have in mind. This is the statement to which I refer:

Separation Allowance and Assigned Pay.

There are now being issued monthly from Ottawa 150,000 cheques for assigned pay, and 90,000 for separation allowance, in all, 240,000 cheques each month. In the past, there has been some delay in getting the separation allowance cards and assigned pay rolls. It is estimated that this delay has occurred in 10 per cent of the cases, and varies from two to six months. If the pay officers were authorized to pay every one on their own application, there would undoubtedly be fewer complaints, but if this were done, a vast amount of public funds would be improperly paid out, as hundreds of claims are received every month, which, on examination and inquiry, are found to be invalid, or outside the regulations, consequently care has to be exercised when placing new names on the list.

Delay has resulted from many causes, viz.,

(a) Inexperienced paymasters, particularly on formation of battalion.

(b) A sudden and large increase in the volume of business.

(c) Inexperienced clerical staff.

(d) Difficulty in getting accurate and quick information from overseas.

(e) Soldiers neglecting to fill up separation allowance cards or to make assignments of pay,—in a great many cases for personal reasons.

(f) Battalions suddenly ordered to proceed overseas, and embarking without leaving assigned pay rolls, or any information respecting them. This has happened in a great many cases.

(g) Instructions from overseas to stop payment; usually no reason being given.

(h) Change of address. Thousands of such notices are received every month, and some women change their abode every few weeks, and often without notifying the department.

(i) Incomplete information on the assigned pay rolls or separation allowance card, necessitating correspondence often with the authorities overseas, if the battalion has left Canada.

Many regimental paymasters failed to do their duty in not ascertaining from the men themselves, by personal interview, whether they had dependents or not. They left it to the men themselves to make application for separation allowance, and to assign a portion of their pay. The result was that quite a percentage of the men in these units, either through ignorance or carelessness, did not make any application. The wife or the mother in the meantime was expecting her allowance, and perhaps some months afterwards would write complaining about it. It would then devolve upon the pay branch at Ottawa to make inquiries, which always takes time, and hence delay.

There has undoubtedly been delay occasionally in the pay branch at Ottawa, owing to inexperience or carelessness of clerks in the pay offices. There has been a great deal of difficulty in getting a competent staff, and often during the past eighteen months, a half a dozen of the best trained would leave at once to join an overseas unit. Many left also to take up permanent positions elsewhere, or because they were offered higher salaries, consequently there was always a very large percentage of absolutely inexperienced clerks. As a rule, however, the clerks have worked long hours and very diligently, and a very small percentage of the delays can be traced to them.

In considering this matter regard should be had to the great distance the force overseas is from Ottawa and as already stated the difficulty in getting necessary information quickly when the soldier concerned is in France or England. Moreover, a great many complaints are received as a result of stopping assigned pay. The instructions to stop payments are received from the overseas authorities, and such cases are very numerous. We have to comply with these instructions, as the soldier's pay account is kept in London, and all assigned pay issued here is charged against him there.

Another grievance is that when a soldier is promoted, action is not taken here at once to increase the separation allowance. The reason for delay is that it takes a long time to get this information from overseas; in fact it is usually necessary to write for it. The soldier, of course, informs his wife or mother immediately he is promoted, which, as a rule, occurs in the field, but the officer dealing with the promotion does not take action so quickly, and when he does, advises London office, which in turn should advise this office.

As an instance of delay, the very last application for separation allowance and assigned pay may be given. This particular case was presented through Mr. F. L. Schaffner, M.P. The facts are as follows: It is the case of the mother of Private P. B. Smillie, whose father died after his enlistment, and consequently the mother claimed separation allowance from that date, on the ground that her son was her sole support. The first letter received from her was in December last in which she stated that her son had enlisted in the 46th Battalion. The records of the 46th Battalion were fully gone over, and no trace of Private Smillie could be found thereon, and his mother was so informed. In her reply dated 19th January, she did not state which battalion he was in, but in a subsequent letter received from her on the 21st January last, she stated he was in the 65th Battalion, not the 46th, as first stated. The nominal rolls of the 65th Battalion were examined, but there was no assignment shown thereon, and Mrs. Smillie was duly advised of this on the 1st of February. At the same time, the chief paymaster, London, England, was written asking if he would communicate with Private Smillie with a view of having him make such an assignment. On the 16th February last, a card for separation allowance from the chief paymaster, London, was received, and this card was forwarded to Reverend J. Hunter, Belmont, Manitoba, asking him to certify on the card that the soldier was the sole support of his widowed mother. On the 27th of March, authority was received from the chief paymaster to open an account for assigned pay at the rate of $15 per month from the 1st of February, 1917, and a cheque for February and March was forwarded by registered mail on the same day to Mrs. Smillie. Early in April last, the necessary certificate for separation allowance was received from the Reverend J. Hunter, Belmont, Manitoba, and separation allowance was granted from the 1st of April, 1917, and a cheque forwarded to Mrs. Smillie. On the 13th of April, Mrs. Smillie was advised that the matter was being considered as to whether separation allowance should be made retroactive. This is in accordance with the usual practice of the department.

Private Smillie evidently did not make any assignment until he proceeded overseas, and it was only after the chief paymaster, London, took up the question with him that he did make an assignment. This made it effective from the 1st of February, and not from a date prior to this, as claimed by his mother. Mrs. Smillie, moreover, in her communications to the department did not give her son's regimental number and corps, which, of course, necessitated a great deal of research, as without this information it is necessary to go through a great many thousands of files—there being some 300,000 of these in the registry. In her last letter, Mrs. Smillie makes the accusation that the delay in her case was undoubtedly due to their being a great number of "snobs" in the department, who were inattentive to their duties, whereas, the fault undoubtedly was due to her son not making any effort to obtain her separation allowance and assigning her half of his pay, until the matter was taken up with him personally by the chief paymaster, overseas. It will thus be seen that the department took a great deal of trouble in order to get the matter adjusted. This case is cited as a very fair sample of the difficulties which the department are up against in dealing with these cases.

I have in my hand a pamphlet containing four army orders of the British army for April, and the British authorities are having in respect of this matter exactly the same difficulties that we are having here, but their difficulties are less complicated as the British authorities are, so to speak, on the scene, having large numbers of soldiers in England and being near France, whereas we are far away. Nearly two pages of this pamphlet are devoted to explanations of difficulties in the way of administering separation allowance, and in some respects the difficulties are identical with those which I have just cited. We are all in the department very glad to answer any inquiries, but sometimes, before we can give a definite answer, we have to cable to Great Britain. The paymaster of a battalion may be a man inexperienced in keeping accounts; in fact, sometimes officers from the headquarters staff here follow battalions to Halifax to try to get their accounts straightened out and their separation allowance and assigned pay cards so arranged that the soldiers' relatives will get their money at the proper time. Sometimes we have to send officers over to England on the ships in order to get the accounts of some battalions straightened out, these officers returning to Canada on the arrival of the vessels in England. The soldiers arrive in England, then they change their abode in England; they go to the front and their address is changed again. If they are unfortunate enough to be wounded, they are taken from one base hospital to another, then from France to England and from England back to Canada. Their wives and relatives here also change their addresses frequently. Delays are also occasioned by mistakes made by inexperienced clerks. We have in the department many invalided men who have devoted their energies to straightening out the separation allowance branch and other branches of the department. In that branch at Ottawa there are about 600 clerks employed, and one or two of the heads of that particular branch have already broken down through ill-health caused by over-work. On the whole, however, I can assure my hon. friend from Red Deer that every effort is being made to improve the work of that branch.

AGRICULTURAL LABOURERS FROM THE UNITED STATES.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. J. J. HUGHES (Kings, P.E.I.): Mr. Speaker, I wish to call the attention of the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Roche) to this telegraphic despatch that has appeared in some of the newspapers published in Prince Edward Island:

> Chicago, April 26.—Five hundred students of the Agricultural College of the University of Illinois left here last night for Saskatchewan to help produce the war-winning wheat crop. The Dominion Government has guaranteed minimum wages of $50 a month and board, part of railroad fare, and 160 acres to all who serve six months in the fields.

I wish to ask the minister if the statements in this despatch are correct or partly correct. Perhaps he could tell me how many persons have been brought into western Canada from the United States for the purpose here mentioned, what privileges were extended to them, and whether similar privileges will be extended to persons who wish to go to the West from say the province of Prince Edward Island.

Hon. W. J. ROCHE (Minister of the Interior): Some of the statements contained in the despatch are partly correct. There has, of course, been a very great shortage of agricultural labour in the western provinces, and the National Service Commission in conjunction with the Immigration Branch of the Dominion Government have taken the matter up with the governments of Manitoba, Saskatchewan, and Alberta with a view to getting agricultural labourers from the United States. Our information was that there was a scarcity of labourers in other provinces of the Dominion, and we therefore could not look to the eastern provinces to supply labourers for the West, so an arrangement was made between the provincial governments and the Immigration Branch by which agricultural labourers coming from the United States could receive tickets at three points at the rate of one cent a mile. The three points were Duluth, St. Paul, and Spokane, and the balance of the fare was to be borne equally by the government of the province to which the labourer went, and the Dominion Government. The statement as to the granting of 160 acres is, of course, not correct. Any person has the privilege of taking up a homestead of 160 acres, and any person who does so this year will be allowed to count the time which he spends with a farmer as an agricultural labourer, as residence on his own homestead; that is the extent of the privilege with regard to homesteads. The despatch is wrong in saying that there were 500 students, as my information is that on the 2nd of May there were only 196 or 197 students. I do not think it would be wise to extend the same privileges to farm labourers in our provinces, as our information is that nearly all the provinces are short of labour themselves. Of course, farm labourers from Prince Edward Island, or any other province, would be allowed to count the time they spent with a farmer, just as would these labourers from the United States, but they would not be granted the same privilege as regards railway fare, because the railways in Canada would not make such an arrangement.

[Mr. J. J. Hughes.]

Mr. J. J. HUGHES: The telegram said that the Government was guaranteeing a minimum wage of $50 a month and board.

Mr. ROCHE: I omitted to say that the Dominion Government has not guaranteed any wage at all. The extra agents who have been sent to the United States by the Dominion and Provincial Governments, six of them from Manitoba, ten from Saskatchewan, six from Alberta, and a like number from the Dominion Government, would no doubt try to induce agricultural labourers to come here by telling them that the prevailing rate of wages was from $40 to $55 a month, but there was no guarantee at all.

THE BUDGET.

DEBATE ON ANNUAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE.

The consideration of the proposed motion of Sir Thomas White (Minister of Finance) for the Committee of Ways and Means, and the amendment of Mr. Turriff thereto, was resumed from Friday, May 4.

Mr. ONESIPHORE TURGEON (Gloucester) (resuming): With your permission, Mr. Speaker, I will now resume my remarks on the Budget, which were interrupted by the adjournment of the debate last Friday. I am confronted now by somewhat different circumstances, for, instead of the Minister of Finance leading the House, we have now the Acting Premier himself, just returned from the Capitol of the United States, where it has been his lot to take counsel with the representatives of the three great democracies of the world. I am sure that the name and fame of Canada have not suffered through their representative the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce. I am sure he has been able to meet with the dignity becoming a representative of Canada, those great statesmen and orators of our Allies, and I fear that in coming back to this House his first task of listening to me will fall very heavily upon him.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I will suffer that willingly.

Mr. TURGEON: I can not promise him that brevity which characterized the speech of the Minister of Finance in presenting the Budget. I have not that command of facts and figures that I can say much in few words. Moreover, I intend to deal with many subjects which are not in the Budget, but which, in my judgment, should have been. Although the right hon. gentleman who is leading the House is very properly giving his attention to international duties there are also duties for him in Canada, for we are not supposed to neglect our duties at home while we are fighting for the Empire.

The Minister of Finance endeavoured to show the great prosperity of Canada by export and import figures. He showed that for the year ending March 31, 1917, our exports and imports aggregated $2,043,000,000, and the amount of revenue for the last four years was also given. The revenue for the year ending March 31, 1917, amounted to $232,000,000, of which $134,000,000 was derived from customs, $34,000,000 from excise, and $12,500,000 from the business profits war tax, which latter figure the Finance Minister hoped would amount at the end of the accounting period to $15,000,000. Out of this revenue the Minister of Finance has paid off the ordinary and capital expenditure of the past year, and has been able to apply $60,000,000 to the payment of our war expenditure, or about 10 per cent of the war expenditure so far. Before the outbreak of the war, our National Debt according to the Minister of Finance amounted to $336,000,000. It now amounts to $900,000,000, and before the end of the fiscal year the Finance Minister thinks it will likely reach $1,200,000,000. The minister tells us that the most striking aspect of our affairs is the increase in our international trade. And he gives the total of that trade for the year ended March 31 last as $2,043,000,000. He did not give a statement of the imports and exports, saying that he would prefer to give these figures in committee. But the Solicitor General (Mr. Meighen) tells us that in 1916 we sold to the outside world goods to the value of $1,178,000,000, and bought from the outside world $864,500,000 worth, an excess of exports over imports of $314,000,000. He informed us also that our exports of munitions might be estimated at $300,000,000, and said that, even deducting that amount, our exports would amount to $878,000,000. But we must allow also for the greatly increased prices since the war, if we are to estimate fairly the increase in the quantity of goods exported. We find that our exports of breadstuffs to Great Britain for 1916 were valued at $198,281,735, while those of 1915 were valued at $113,140,435, an increase for 1916 of $81,141,300. But the quantity of grain exported in 1916 was not much greater than that of the year before. This shows that the value of such exports was inflated by the increased prices. If the prices of the days before the war still prevailed, the value of our exports would be represented by very much smaller figures than is the case to-day. The Minister of Finance regarded our great foreign trade as a sign of prosperity in the country. During the recess of the House many members on the Conservative side, addressing meetings in their several constituencies, have cited these figures as evidence that the country is now enjoying greater prosperity than ever before. I have no doubt that they have placed these figures and this conclusion before their electors in all sincerity. But when we consider the cause of our present prosperity, I claim that it is not a prosperity to gladden the heart of the true Christian, while it must sadden the mind of the economic thinker to contemplate the transition period which our country must face when the bugles sound for peace and we must seek a permanent basis for our manufactures and commerce. All winter in my own town I have observed the movement of the munitions trains on the railway toward our winter ports of St. John and Halifax. I could not but realize that for every one of these trains that was moving over our lines the Huns were moving ten trains carrying weapons of destruction against the sons of Canada and against all the soldiers of the Allies. And I said to my neighbours: These cars are not the signs of progress, prosperity and happiness, but of universal grief and mourning. So we must not depend upon the figures of our present exports of the weapons of destruction and the materials to make and load those weapons as assuring our prosperity, we must look to the future and not merely to present conditions which we know to be but temporary. As true Canadians we are willing to pay the debt which is now accumulating because of this war. We face our responsibilities with courage, still ready to carry our sacrifices to the limit of which we have so often spoken, "our last man and our last dollar," in order to insure victory for the Allies. When peace comes, we shall be ready, I hope, to do what the French people did in 1871 when they paid the immense indemnity which had been demanded of them, paid it in full and far in advance of the time allowed, in order that they might be under tribute to their enemy for as short a time as possible. Even though our public debt should amount to nine or ten billions, we will remain Canadians and animated with the same principle of justice and Christianity for which we have battled in this war. For this is a fight for our liberties, it is a fight for the principle of Christianity. And when the war has ended shall we leave the debt to be met by future generations? I believe that we should do everything in our power to meet, while we are living, as large a part as possible of the debt incurred in this war. To my mind, the additional war tax which the Minister of Finance has imposed should have been imposed last year, or two years ago, as was proposed by hon. members on this side of the House. In order that I may follow more intelligently the remarks of the Minister of Finance, let me read this resolution:

Resolved, That it is expedient to amend the Business Profits War Tax Act, 1916, by providing:—

1. That in any business taxable under the Act where the annual profits exceed fifteen per centum per annum the tax shall be increased to fifty per centum with respect to all profits in excess of the said fifteen per centum but not exceeding twenty per centum per annum, and where the profits exceed twenty per centum per annum the tax shall be increased to seventy-five per centum with respect to all profits in excess of the said twenty per centum, and such increases in the tax shall be levied against and paid by the person owning such business for each and every accounting period ending after the thirty-first day of December, one thousand nine hundred and sixteen;

2. That for the purposes of the said Act, the actual unimpaired reserve, rest or accumulated profits held at the commencement of an accounting period by an incorporated company shall be included as part of its capital as long as it is held and used by the company as capital;

That any enactment founded on this resolution shall be deemed to have come into force on and from the eighteenth day of May, one thousand nine hundred and sixteen.

What I regret most is that it has not been made to date from May, 1915, instead of May, 1916. It was then that the largest profits were made by those making munitions. We all remember that after the hon. member for Richmond (Mr. Kyte), in his speech in this House, made the accusation that excessive profits were being made by some contractors and Government agents, many of these profits were curtailed. If for nothing else, the hon. member for Richmond deserves the gratitude of the people of Canada in calling attention to these excessive profits. But this resolution, after all, allows the big corporations from 15 to 20 per cent on their paid up capital before they are touched by the Government taxation. In these strenuous times, and in the presence of this horrible war, the Minister of Finance should have grasped for the country the whole of the remaining percentage above that profit. Perhaps, as in the case of the war profits tax at the beginning, the imposition will fall most heavily on the companies that have been operating with a small capitalization, and which therefore show larger profits. The large interests that have operated from the first and made large profits have generally issued sufficient stock in all denominations to increase their outstanding capital to such an extent that they seldom show a profit of 15 per cent, and, therefore, they will not be affected by this new proposition.

We have had suggested—and I have myself suggested—to the Minister of Finance that he should introduce an income tax in this country. The answer is that the revenue derived from an income tax would not amount to more than the expense of collecting it. That might depend on the basis that you adopt for the adjustment of that income tax. Meanwhile, I may say that I believe there are many people, and many classes of people, who should pay an income tax, and that such a tax would give to the country a revenue which would be available for the elimination of the war debt. The railway corporations would not be affected in their corporate capacity, I know, because there is no profit for them in the operation of their railways under war conditions, but our railway magnates have large incomes from other sources, which would be taxable and which would give a good return to the country. The property owners in the cities, as well as in country districts, who are in comfortable circumstances, might also pay an income tax. Some say that the farmer is the one man who will not stand such taxation. The farmer is just as devoted and as patriotic as any one of us in this country. Give the farmer the markets of the world, give him what he needs for the operation of his great industry at the lowest possible cost and when he has reached the stage of comfort in his circumstances he will pay his income tax as well as his neighbour. Who has been more patriotic during the last three years than the farmer? Who has been of more service in carrying on the war, who has given more to the cause of civilization, than the farmers of Canada? Fifty or seventy-five per cent of the soldiers at the front have gone from the farms which, perhaps, to-day, are suffering from the want of their labour.

I claim that taxation is more advantageous than loans because it eliminates interest on the amount you raise. If you raise by loan $10,000,000 to pay one item of expenditure during twenty years, at the end of twenty years you have paid $15,000,- 000 to clear off that expenditure. If you pay it by taxation, you take $10,000,000 from the people, the whole amount is paid and their ability to pay further is reserved for further needs of the country. I believe that is a sound principle which could be applied with advantage to this country. If I buy a property for $5,000 or $10,000 and I have not the money to pay for it, I have to pay interest for ten years and at the end of that ten years I have paid out almost as much as the original debt. That same principle could be applied to all our expenditures and if it were you would avoid interest charges which equal sometimes the revenue the country collects. But, we have not been able yet to get from the Minister of Finance an answer with regard to this matter. May I be permitted to give an example from the United States now that our hon. friends the Minister of Finance and the Solicitor General who, I do not see in their seats, are willing to truck and trade with the Yankees, inspired, perhaps, by different motives. The Solicitor General may be prompted by his humane feelings for the farmers of the West whom he will assure of his hearty sympathy when next he returns to the western provinces and the Minister of Finance by a consideration of war conditions. There is no doubt that the Minister of Finance and his friends, the manufacturers of Ontario, may be comforted by the hopes of the future, hopes upon which some light has been thrown by the hon. member for Chateauguay (Mr. Morris). However, now that we are permitted to look in that direction, may I be allowed to give these hon. gentlemen and this House a few facts with regard to the new income tax under consideration in the Congress of the United States and which is to be put into operation as soon as it becomes law. It is a bill for the further taxation of the incomes of individuals, corporations, joint stock companies, insurance companies and other possible incomes. They are taxing incomes as low as $2,000 in the United States. In Canada there are a great many incomes of $1,000 which might be taxed. When a single man with no family to look after and no other responsibility but his own living, receives $1,000 under such conditions as prevail to-day, he will be proud, if he is a Canadian at all, to contribute out of his income a few dollars every year. If such a policy were adopted, the very minimum tax that you might place upon such incomes would represent a large amount of revenue every year. In the United States it is a graduated tax upon all incomes, for instance, there is a tax of one per centum per annum on the amount by which the total net income is $5,000 or over and within $7,500, and of two per centum if the income exceeds $7,500 and over and so on up to $10,000. If a citizen has an income of $100,000 he will pay an income tax of $10,000. A man having an income of $1,000,000 a year is taxed to the extent of $300,000. On an income of $500,000 a tax of $100,000 is paid into the treasury. This income tax, it is estimated, will provide for the United States Government $250,000,000 this year. You will see by the graduation of this income tax that every class will be called upon to pay according to its means. You will see that the United States have put a large income tax on millionaires. I might be told that millionaires in Canada are but few. I believe that they were not so few after all before the war. We had a good number, and I believe that since the war has commenced we have many more millionaires than before. It is only since the war that Canadian millionaires have been able to hand over hundreds of thousands of dollars to young lady stenographers for past services, and I believe that it was not only in one case that this was done, that it will be found that many others acquired equal wealth as suddenly. Therefore both the old millionaires and the new millionaires, the new especially, should be taxed heavily under the conditions in which we are living, and I believe that if the Minister of Finance will look into the millionaires and demi-millionaires he will find enough of them in Canada to produce millions of dollars of income tax. Britain is largely paying its war expenditure by taxation. Germany is meeting it by loans, because Germany can not impose any more taxation. She had imposed so much taxation in preparation for war during forty years that her people were near rebellion, and when she could impose no more taxation she declared war, the war which we are fighting to-day.

We have heard a good deal of discussion during the debate as to the relative merits of protection and free trade, or protection and tariff for revenue. It has always been a sad moment for me in this House when, on different occasions, I have heard members on the other side of the House, in order to propound the doctrine of protection, give us, for example, the great achievements of Germany under her system of extreme protection in every possible direction. Last year the hon. member for Calgary (Mr. R. B. Bennett) strongly advocated the imitation by Canada of German diplomacy in this respect, pointing to the wealth which the people of Germany had been able to amass through the facilities afforded to them for taking advantage of the opportunities for trade throughout the world. Lately the Solicitor General called the attention of Parliament and of the country to the great achievement of the German nation under her high tariff. Notwithstanding such pronouncements from the lips of those learned men opposite, I yet cling rather to the policy of Great Britain, which, during those same forty years, has built up a commercial and industrial activity which has enabled her, during the war, to save civilization. There is no doubt that in the first months of the war, civilization was saved by the superior tactics at the battle of the Marne by the great man whom we honour to-day on this side of the Atlantic, General Joffre; but we can still claim that since that day the free trade policy of Great Britain has enabled her to save the situation for the last two years owing to her ability to finance not only herself but also France and all her Allies. To-day, with her navy, she is still saving the situation, while Germany is crippled, unable to move, and keeps up the hope of her people only by the deceptive promise of the submarines, which we are bound to overcome with the assistance of the great nation to the south of us.

PRIVATE BILLS.

The House in Committee on Private Bills, Mr. Rainville in the Chair.

THE BOY SCOUTS ASSOCIATION.

Bill No. 27, to incorporate The Canadian General Council of The Boy Scouts Association.—Mr. R. B. Bennett—in Committee.

On section 1—Act of incorporation, 1914, c. 130, amended:

Mr. GRAHAM: What are the amendments?

Mr. STEELE: The Bill asks that the privilege of using all the badges and other special marks of the Boy Scouts Association shall be given only to the Boy Scouts. It asks, in effect, that these badges and other distinctive marks shall be a trade mark of the Boy Scouts Association.

Mr. GRAHAM: That is all?

Mr. STEELE: That is all.

Mr. GRAHAM: The Bill passed through the committee without any amendment?

Mr. STEELE: Yes.

Section agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

CANADIAN ASSOCIATION OF STATIONARY ENGINEERS.

Bill No. 10, to incorporate The Grand Lodge of the Canadian Association of Stationary Engineers of the Dominion of Canada.—Mr. Fripp—in Committee.

On section 1—Incorporation:

Mr. STEELE: This Bill is being asked for by the stationary engineers of Canada, both steam and electric.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Is there mutual insurance?

Mr. STEELE: No, nothing of that kind. They are not asking for any control of the education or training of engineers. They merely ask that the Grand Lodge of the Canadian Association of Stationary Engineers be incorporated in order that the stationary engineers may be joined together for purposes which will raise the standard of the profession. Certain amendments have been made, most of them of a minor character.

Section agreed to.

On section 2—executive officers:

Mr. McKENZIE: Is this an incorporating Bill coming before Parliament for the first time?

Mr. STEELE: Yes, this is the original incorporation.

Mr. McKENZIE: In the province of Nova Scotia, and, I assume, in each of the provinces, there is an Act dealing with stationary engines and stationary engineers. I think that there is in the province of Ontario an Act requiring stationary engineers to pass certain examinations, and so on. Would this Act in any way come in conflict with the provincial legislation?

Mr. STEELE: This proposed legislation gives to the Grand Lodge no power whatever to license engineers. The province of Ontario grants licenses to stationary engineers, but this Bill is prepared in such a way that it asks for no rights or privileges which will interfere with those held or conferred by the provinces.

Section agreed to.

On section 8—objects and purposes:

Mr. STEELE: In this clause the words "and electric" are inserted after the word "steam" wherever it occurs. The clause as amended reads in part: "the efficient operation of steam and electric power plants," and "steam and electric users."

Section agreed to.

On section 10—general meetings:

Mr. STEELE: There is a slight amendment to that clause. After the word "as" in the third line, the words "the executive officers of" have been inserted, making the sentence read:

> The first general meeting of the association shall be held during the year 1917 at such time and place and upon such notice as the executive officers of the association may decide.

Mr. GRAHAM: If I were a stationary engineer I would want that provision to be more explicit as to the time of meeting. Under that clause the executive could call a meeting within twenty-four hours. Were representatives of the stationary engineers who attended the meeting of the Private Bills Committee in agreement with that amendment?

Mr. STEELE: Yes.

Mr. McKENZIE: Is there any provision for the making of by-laws?

Mr. CHAIRMAN: Yes.

Mr. McKENZIE: Are they subject to the approval of the Governor in Council, or is there any safeguard of that kind?

Mr. CHAIRMAN: No.

Mr. LEMIEUX: It seems to me that notice of, say, eight days should be given before a general meeting is called.

Mr. STEELE: This clause refers only to the first general meeting of the Association, which is to be called by the executive officers of the Association. The subsequent general meetings shall be held annually as the by-laws of the Association may provide.

Mr. GRAHAM: That covers the point.

Section agreed to.

On section 12—by-laws:

Mr. STEELE: This section is struck out entirely owing to the fact that section 7 covers the matter. The section has relation to the making of by-laws.

On section 14—real estate:

Mr. STEELE: To this section an addition has been made of a clause which has been inserted for some years in Bills similar to this. This section has reference to the amount of real estate which the grand lodge may hold. There is added after the words:—

> Not exceeding in the aggregate the value of one hundred thousand dollars.

These words:—

> And may sell, mortgage, lease or dispose thereof, but so that the association shall apply all its profits, if any, or other income, in promoting its objects, and shall not at any time pay any dividend to its members; but the provisions of this section shall not prevent the remuneration of members of the board of directors or officers of the association for services rendered out of any surplus remaining after the ordinary expenses of the association have been met.

Section agreed to.

Bill reported.

BREIDERT AND MUDGE PATENTS.

Bill No. 38, respecting certain patents of George C. Breidert and Burton W. Mudge.—Mr. Rainville—in committee.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Who is the promoter of this Bill—Mr. Macdonell?

Mr. MIDDLEBRO: The Minister of Agriculture left a memorandum on his desk and requested me, if he were not in his seat when this Bill came up, to read it. This appears to be one of those cases where the application, through inadvertence, had not been filed in time, and the committee, after consideration, thought that it might go through. The memorandum is a long one, and I will not read it all, but it says in part:—

> In view of the foregoing facts and section 8 of the Patent Act, the commissioner has no power to deal with the applications. The object of the Bill is simply to empower the commissioner to deal with the applications as though they had been filed within the prescribed time. The facts as set forth in the preamble having been established by solemn declaration, and the committee being satisfied that the failure to file the applications within the prescribed time was due to an oversight of the Auto Utilities Manufacturing Company, considered that the petitioners were entitled to the relief asked for and reported the Bill. During last session a similar Bill, viz.: that of Mr. James W. Owen, was passed.

The minister says that the Bill has been gone over by the Deputy Commissioner of Patents, and that he is satisfied with it.

Mr. GRAHAM: Are any other rights interfered with?

Mr. MIDDLEBRO: No.

Mr. McKENZIE: What are the patents for?

Mr. REID: The Bill says that the patents are for ventilators.

On section 1—power to issue patents:

Mr. STEELE: A certain amendment to this section ought to be noted. The words after "on the" in the third last line of this section are all struck out, and the words "9th day of June, 1933," inserted, so that the date when the patent shall expire is made definite instead of being left indefinite as the original wording of the section left it.

Section agreed to.

On section 2—certain rights saved:

Mr. STEELE: There are certain amendments to this section. The dates in the Bill as drafted are not inserted. The section as amended reads:—

If any person has since the 9th day of June, 1914, and prior to the 13th day of January, 1917—

And so on. The words "or construction" are added after the word "manufacture" in the fifth line, so that it reads "manufacture or construction in Canada." After the word "manufacture" in the third last line the word "construct" is added, so that the clause reads:—

May continue to manufacture, construct, sell and use—

And so on.

Mr. MURPHY: Is the date mentioned by the hon. member the date on which the patent was indefinitely allowed to lapse; that is, the date in respect of which other rights may have been acquired which are to be protected?

Mr. MIDDLEBRO: In the memorandum to which I have already referred, the Deputy Commissioner of Patents says:—

The day fixed for the expiration of the patents in clause 1, viz.: 9th June, 1933, was determined by adding to the date of the first foreign patent, viz.: 9th June, 1914, nineteen years; eighteen years, viz.: the term of the Canadian patent fixed by section 23 of the Act, and one year allowed by section 8 of the Act. The date, 13th January, 1917, in the second clause of the Bill is the date of the first publication of the notice of the application to Parliament.

Section agreed to.

On the preamble:

Mr. GRAHAM: I am not objecting in any way to this Bill, but I am inclined to agree with the Minister of Customs that when a member allows a Bill to be put in his name, he ought to know something about it and be on hand when the Bill comes up in order to see it put through. The Acting Chairman of the Private Bills Committee has done very well in giving us what information he had, but he evidently is not posted on these measures. I think it is a good rule that the member in whose name a Bill stands or somebody who knows about the Bill should be in the House to explain these measures when they come up. Bills like that we have just been discussing, for instance, relating to patents have provoked more discussion in the House in the past than any other kind of Private Bill. I have no doubt that this one is perfectly all right as the Government has approved of it, but the House knows very little about it.

Mr. REID: I agree that it would be well if the member in whose name a Bill stands was present when his Bill comes up for discussion. I am sure, however, that this Bill has the approval of the Department of Agriculture for Mr. O'Halloran makes a point of examining these Bills very thoroughly. The Acting Chairman of the Private Bills Committee has told us that both Mr. O'Halloran and the Minister of Agriculture approve of the Bill, so I do not think there can be any objection to its going through. But here is the Minister of Agriculture himself.

Mr. LEMIEUX: The House would like to know whether any rights will be interfered with by this Bill?

Mr. BURRELL: The Department does not think so. We have no objection at all to the Bill.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

THE BUDGET.

The Order for Private Bills having been exhausted the House proceeded to Government orders and resumed consideration of the Budget.

Mr. TURGEON (resuming): When the House adjourned at six o'clock I was endeavouring to show the fallacy of the policy which Germany has pursued for the last forty or fifty years, and which has brought upon her the misfortunes from which she is now suffering. Germany's policy of extreme protection has been the ruin of her prosperity. Capital and labour have been diverted from their natural productive employments into unprofitable and unproductive lines. Protection, to my mind, spells selfishness, egotism and defiance. Selfishness, in that it wishes to get for itself every possible profit at the expense of every other country; defiance, because it lacks confidence to meet other nations in equal competition. Free trade in itself implies brotherhood among the nations. In times of peace when Napoleon Bonaparte, who was a great civic father as well as a great general, found time to conduct the trade affairs of his beloved France, he always tried to make reciprocal treaties with the other nations of the world, but although he required the goods of England as much as the goods of any other land, he always refused to make a treaty with England because he abhorred that country. Germany abhors every nation in the world that she is not able to shackle, and I would advise this House and the country not to seek inspiration from the policy of the German people. The great emperor Francis Joseph, who perhaps had a longer reign than any other sovereign, unfortunately allowed himself to be captivated by the alluring prospects held out to him by Bismarck in the early part of his reign. Bismarck held out a prospect of battle and conquest, and the first step was to Prussianize the universities of Austria, to divert the aims of education from the noble traditions of Austria-Hungary and adopt the system of education which has brought about the present catastrophe. This is no educational system for us. We should give no consideration to it at all or to their political, financial or industrial activities. We know what effect their education has had in corrupting the sentiments of the people and diverting them from humanitarian ideals. The industries developed under that education have marked their products " made in Germany." But though there was a great increase in industrial production there was no increase in Christian education. And consider some of the things that have been "made in Germany." Poison gas to be projected across their trenches to our lines where our soldiers fell by the thousand in agony; shells made to sink unwarned our hospital ships, with nurses and wounded, Germans among them; guns made to murder Edith Cavell because of her humanitarian activities—all these have been " made in Germany." Surely no lover of humanity, no Christian to-day who looks at the aims of education in Germany will hold up that country as an example to the world in any respect whatever.

I wish to refer to another remark of the Solicitor General (Mr. Meighen) whom I am pleased to see now in his place. It may be considered that I am not in my place in coming into conflict with the hon. gentleman. He knows the high opinion I entertain of his ability. That ability is now universally recognized, but I am proud to say that I have appreciated from the day when he came into this House. I cannot close my eyes to the fact that, as it seems to me, sometimes his skill and subtlety in debate have been used in directions the contemplation of which in the future will not always bring him pleasure. Upon him has been placed the task of pulling the Government out of difficulties into which, from time to time, they have fallen. While recognizing his great talents, I cannot agree with his views on many questions, but especially upon questions of the tariff. In the utterances to which I have referred he speaks of the increased duties made about a year ago, in Great Britain, on tea, coffee and chocolate, on clocks and watches, and on automobiles. As to the duties on tea, coffee, and chocolate, the object has been only increase of revenue, and not protection. When a tariff is imposed upon articles, whether necessaries or luxuries, the importation of which does not mean competition with home producers, the duties that are paid by the people go direct into the public treasury, while duties that are imposed for protective purposes go largely into the coffers of manufacturers. It is true also that duties were imposed on clocks and watches. But this was with a view of introducing economy. As to the duty on automobiles, it was designed to save shipping tonnage which even then was growing scarce, and which was needed for the transport of munitions and food. Another reason for this duty, as stated by Mr. Asquith, the former Prime Minister, was that the duty would discourage the buying of automobiles in many cases, which would have the advantage not only of promoting economy but also of saving gasolene and oil needed for the operation of automobiles used for war purposes. The Solicitor General also mentioned the dye industry and said that it could never be revived for the British Empire except by means of high protective duties. The modern method of producing dyes was the invention of an Englishman. This inventor could not convince the British Government of that day of the benefits that would result from his invention. So he went to Germany, and the Germans bought his secret and kept it as a secret. That has been their method in everything—to maintain secrecy. Their widespread secret service, for instance, was never suspected until war broke out. It was by keeping their operations secret that Germany was able to command the markets of the world in the dye industry. This was one of the mistakes made by the British Government, and governments make mistakes just as individuals do. It is only twenty-five or thirty years ago that the Liberal Government of Ontario offered to the Government of Great Britain control of the nickel properties of this province. But this was in a time of peace, and, unfortunately, the advantages to result from such a measure were not realized by the British Government of that time, and consequently the offer was refused. That such things will happen all history attests. Napoleon Bonaparte was approached by Fulton, the American inventor of the steamboat. Fulton went to France and securing the support of some of Napoleon's generals tried to convince the great Corsican of the benefits to be gained by the use of his invention, pointing out that by the use of steam the would-be conqueror of England could send ships across the Channel in a few hours, regardless of the weather conditions. But Napoleon replied that he had fools enough in France without importing them from abroad. Fulton went to England and had his invention adopted in that country, leaving to Napoleon only the remorseful recollection of an opportunity lost. As to the dye industry, when the war is over the scientists of France and England will seek out new chemicals which will be as advantageous and as profitable to commerce generally as the old secret has been to Germany.

I think the Solicitor General did not do justice to England when he compared its financial position with that of the United States. That I may not misinterpret the hon. gentleman let me quote from his speech as reported at page 889 of Hansard:

> We find the United States at this time not in the position in which Great Britain finds herself in this regard. We find the United States selling goods in volume away beyond the goods which she is importing, selling goods last year to an extent of double the imports of that country. The balance of trade in favour of the United States is over $2,000,000,000 as compared with a balance of trade against Great Britain of $1,500,000,000. That is the inevitable result of failure adopting systematic and well reasoned means of bringing to their full development within the country itself all the resources of the country before they are sold.

May I be permitted to say that this comparison is certainly, in my opinion very inappropriate. The Solicitor General has given the figures for the last year. He has compared the position of Great Britain, one of the principal belligerents, after two years of war, with that of a great nation at peace. Notwithstanding the fact that Great Britain has made all the munitions of war that her own people could possibly manufacture during the past year, and that she has had to import from other countries, mostly from the United States, a great part of the munitions that she was in need of, not only for herself but for her Allies, a great portion of these munitions being charged to Canada and for which we will have ourselves to pay, she is made the subject of comparison with one of the greatest manufacturing nations of the world, a nation at peace, a nation with a hundred million people and great resources and a nation which had been manufacturing and shipping to Great Britain everything that she could manufacture and not only shipping to Great Britain but to France, Russia and Italy as well. In consequence of that you might naturally expect an immense balance of trade in favour of the United States while England naturally could not expect any thing else than an adverse balance of trade.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Does the hon. gentleman not know that practically the same proportion of balance of trade against her has existed for nearly twenty years and that, on the contrary, the balance of trade has been in favour of the United States for almost that time, not so great as now, but nevertheless in their favour.

Mr. TURGEON: I have not the figures with me but I imagined that if my hon. friend the Solicitor General had brought in the figures of previous years in regard to both countries he would have found something more in favour of Great Britain. Of course, as I say, I have not the figures with me at the present time. The fact remains that Great Britain as I was saying this afternoon while my hon. friend was out of the House, with her free trade and expansion of trade, has been able to put her finances in a position to win the war by assisting her Allies as well as looking after her own interests.

But, for all of that, there is certainly a lack of fairness in the proposition of the Minister of Finance towards the manufacturer himself upon whom he placed an additional tax at the opening of the war to the extent of 7½ per cent, general, and 5 per cent on imports from Great Brtain. This is a tax of 7½ per cent on the raw material, thereby crippling the activity of the manufacturer from the start because this act interferes with his ability to compete with the outside world and places him under the necessity of exacting from the home consumer what he loses in dealing with the outside consumer, because, as the word goes abroad, it is always the poor fellow at home who has to pay for everything.

The hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Lalor), who spoke last Friday, said that after all the policy of the Liberal party and policy of the Conservative party were the same and that when the Liberal party came into power they merely adopted the policy of the Conservative party. I like sometimes to compare results and if you will cast up the results of the administration of the fiscal policy of the country for the last twenty or twenty-five years you will find that during the last years of the administration of the Conservative party before 1896 the country had come to a desperate condition of stagnation and that the financial and industrial position had become so intolerable that the people decided to make a change and entrust the future management of the affairs of the country to another Government. Therefore, they returned the Liberal party in 1896. From that time on until 1911 we saw Canada growing prosperous from year to year, building railways, among them the Transcontinental, promoting the prosperity of the people, and stimulating and maintaining the buoyancy of trade and commerce in every portion of the country, so much so, that when my right hon. friend, the then leader of the Government, and his friends behind him wanted to make a change in order to further advance the financial and commercial prosperity of Canada hon. gentlemen opposite had but one word to say and one recommendation to make and it was: Leave well enough alone; we are prosperous enough. If it is the same policy, I would suggest to the Canadian people never again to entrust it to a Conservative administration.

But permit me to see if it has been the same policy after all. When the Liberal party came into power they introduced a new tariff policy known as the Fielding tariff policy of 1897. That tariff established a British preference which was a boon to the Canadian consumer and a great advantage to the British manufacturer on the other side. It created a new feeling of brotherhood between the Dominion of Canada and the British Empire. The Fielding tariff or 1897 also had the advantage of bringing about the abrogation by the Mother country of the German and Belgian treaties, by virtue of whose favoured nation clauses, duties were being imposed against our products. That tariff also decreased the duties on many other articles and placed a great many others on the list of free goods greatly to the benefit of the people and being a step towards free trade. I do not say that we should have adopted free trade at once but I say that the Liberal party was working in that direction to as great a degree as the conditions of the country permitted. We are always moving in the same direction with all the rapidity possible in the changes that we make in order to secure greater prosperity for the people and to maintain that feeling of brotherhood which is now being established between the great nations and democracies of the world and in order that this brotherhood shall continue amongst the nations after the war is ended as well as during the war. The Fielding tariff reduced the duties on many articles and placed others on the free list. Barbed wire, binder twine, and corn were amongst the classes placed on the free list by that treaty. The duties on both flour and sugar were reduced, sugar by 22 per cent and flour from 75 cents per barrel to 60 cents or 50 cents. The drawback principle applied to raw material when used in the manufacture of finished products for home consumption as well as for export owed its application to the Liberal policy of 1907. In the same year a treaty with France was brought about which resulted in many benefits to the Canadian consumer. Then in 1911 we had the reciprocity pact or treaty, which was offered by the Liberal party. That pact was an agreement which, if it had been sanctioned by the people of Canada as it had been sanctioned by the representatives of the United States at the time, would have meant immense prosperity for the country from that time until now.

The Government a few days ago granted free wheat to the western farmers in order to secure their sympathy or, as the Solicitor General put it to the House, in order to remedy a grievance which existed; and, although according to the Solicitor General it might not have been the international interest to give free wheat, it had become a necessity for the Government to appease that grievance in the West. May I say to the Solicitor General that if every grievance in the different parts of the country is to be appeased in that way, he might have come down to New Brunswick and given us free potatoes also. The farmers of New Brunswick would have been better pleased to have received a little less for their potatoes and to pay less for the flour or the boots they have to buy. A farmer has to sell three or four barrels of potatoes in order to secure a barrel of flour, even today when he gets $3 or $4 for his potatoes. Then he has to sell two or three barrels of potatoes to get a pair of boots for himself, or his wife, or his son helping him on the farm. The Government, under the Underwood tariff, had power to place potatoes on the free list on the same conditions as wheat, and my hon. friend could just as well have included potatoes in the Order in Council. If that had been done, the people of Montreal, Ottawa and Toronto would to-day be paying perhaps a dollar a barrel less for their potatoes. If I may appeal to the sympathy of the minister, I would ask him to-day to pass an Order in Council in the morning to put potatoes also on the free list. If to-morrow morning potatoes would go down in the markets of Toronto, Montreal and Ottawa a dollar a barrel, it would not disturb the farmers from the southern part of New Brunswick, from the county that first brought into evidence the talents of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster), who must not forget that he is a product of the province of New Brunswick and of York county.

Mr. GRAHAM: Some potatoes!

Mr. TURGEON: If potatoes were on the free list the new potatoes from the Southern States could be placed on the markets of Toronto and Montreal to-morrow morning at a much lower rate than they are to-day, and the people of Toronto and Montreal would get their potatoes a great deal cheaper. This is a practical suggestion. The Solicitor General does not seem affected by my request.

Mr. LEMIEUX: The elections are over in New Brunswick now.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I was rather wondering how the request suited the hon. gentleman's friends who asked for an embargo on potatoes.

Mr. TURGEON: I believe my friends to-day would accept my suggestion very freely and be ready to vote for it. It would have the effect of admitting the new potatoes from the southern states in greater quantities, and the farmers of my province would be able to keep what they have for seed, of which they will be short within the next two or three weeks. It is true that the Minister of Agriculture tells us that in New Brunswick there are about 100,000 bushels of potatoes beyond what are required for seed. I believe that he has had that information, but I doubt very much its accuracy.

Mr. BURRELL: Of course, I cannot vouch for the accuracy. I got the information from the provincial Minister of Agriculture, who is one of my friend's friends.

Mr. TURGEON: Yes, sometimes such information is calculated a week or two ahead, and a week or two has made a big difference every time during the last month in the stock of potatoes. I know that before I came to this House in my own county one dealer alone held 1,500 barrels of potatoes all the winter because there was no means of transport. The Caraquet railway was blocked for from three to six weeks, and the merchants were unable to move their freight. The moment the railroad was again in operation that quantity moved up to Toronto at once, with practically everything that was in the stores of that part of New Brunswick, and it may be that that 1,500 barrels was included in the account which represents 100,000 bushels. However, I would not be greatly incensed if to-morrow I heard of an Order in Council being passed under the War Measures Act to admit potatoes free. Our friends have said, also, that the reciprocity treaty was refused by them because it took away the 9 p.m. fiscal independence of Canada. I should never submit my judgment to that proposition. I cannot understand it, and I really cannot understand men of the dignity of the Finance Minister of Canada to-day putting that argument before the people of the country. How could it interfere with the independence of Canada when Canada and another country come together and say: We will give you this product provided you give us the other product. It was a quid pro quo in every sense of the word. Canada gave what she chose to give and got what she desired to get in exchange. This pact was based on the idealistic aspirations of free nations for the interchange of the products of the earth. Certainly it was suggested by the most noble aspirations on the part of each of the contracting nations. The pact, or treaty, had to be ratified by the Parliament of Canada. But it would have been an obligation that could have been revoked by the Parliament of Canada at any session, and I cannot understand how it would have interfered with the independence of Canada. Hon. gentlemen opposite think that they have done better now, because they have given the farmers free flour, which was not a provision of the proposed reciprocity treaty. I would call the attention of the Solicitor General to this fact. If the reciprocity agreement had been passed, the farmers of the West and the consumers of the country would have the benefit not only of free wheat, but of free oats, free barley, free flax; everything the farmer produced would be free of duty. The country at large would have got free lumber and free fish from the United States. In the Maritime Provinces the people interested in the lumber business and the fish business suffered intensely during the two or three years subsequent to 1911. In 1913 the lumber export trade to Great Britain was reduced to practically nothing, and only for the dictum of Providence through the medium of the Underwood tariff legislation in that year, the lumber manufacturers of New Brunswick would have been bankrupt before war was declared. This was the condition until a year or two ago, when the trade with Britain was revived by the necessities of war. To-day England is not able to import our lumber, and she has resorted to her own supply, depleting the forests which have been preserved there for centuries. Only for the opening of the American market, I say, our lumbermen would have been bankrupt.

The consumer who formerly had to pay 50 cents a barrel duty upon his flour, under the new arrangement gets his flour free. Under the reciprocity pact the consumer would have got his meat, his potatoes and his vegetables free. It is a matter of necessity that the consumer should get his food free, particularly during those seasons when we do not produce the necessary food supplies in our own country. The advantages of that proposed arrangement have not been properly appreciated; only to-day are some of the people realizing what we have lost by not accepting it. The West has lost a large portion of its farming population. Immigrants who had come from the United States went back to their native land in hundreds and thousands. A large immigration would have been coming into Canada every year since 1911 but for the rejection of the reciprocity proposal. Its rejection caused a depression among the farmers of the West and a decrease in production has been apparent ever since. Had the reciprocity proposal been in operation when war was declared, we would have had an additional 100,000 farmers in the West to produce wheat and grain and food of all kinds. Through the rejection of reciprocity, the farmers of the prairie West suffered a loss of $25,000,000 on their crop of 1911, owing to congestion of traffic and lack of transportation, their grain remaining out and depreciating in value. In 1912 the Minister of Trade and Commerce himself had to make arrangements with the United States authorities for certain transportation facilities in order that he might allow the wheat of the West to reach the ports of the United States.

We are told that the reciprocity arrangement would have been an interference with the fiscal independence of Canada. I do not appreciate the force of that argument. The reciprocity agreement would have been adopted by the people of Canada but for the exploitation of prejudices in Ontario and Quebec, arguments having been advanced in these two provinces designed to influence the unguarded electors in each.

We are asking the Government, through the amendment of the member for Assiniboia, to give to the Order in Council granting free wheat to the farmers the effect of permanency. The farmer of the West always looks to the future. He is interested in the war as much as any one in the cities of Montreal or Toronto, his heart is set upon winning the war as quickly as possible. He is getting the benefit of the American market and of the markets of the world for his wheat, but he does not know what is going to become of that Order in Council when the war is over. We are told that it has the same effect as an Act of Parliament, but the farmer of the West will never believe that the same degree of permanency is afforded by an Order in Council under the War Measures Act as is secured by an Act of Parliament, which could only be abrogated by another Act of Parliament. If the war is over before the farmer of the West can reap his crop next fall, he will not know how he stands in the matter of a market for his wheat. He knows that if he has access to the markets of the world, he will be able to compete in them, but if he has to depend upon the markets of Canada he will be poor in the midst of plenty. It is said that it is better for the farmers to have the benefit of good prices temporarily, but what about the future? If the farmer of the West is assured that he will have free access to the markets of the United States and of the world, he will know that at all seasons he will be able to enjoy the benefits of those markets, and can govern himself accordingly.

Reference has been made to the fluctuations of prices in the markets of the world under conditions of war. I am not a farmer, but I follow with interest all things pertaining to the welfare of the West. I believe that the mind of the West is directed more towards the future than the mind of the East. The farmer of the West is looking to the future, and he has always under consideration the extensive markets of the world. In order to show why our western friends demand that this matter of free wheat be made permanent and not dependent upon the fluctuations that are occurring daily under war conditions, I will read a few lines from the same western paper from which the Solicitor General quoted certain figures the other day. This article was written in September, 1915, or nearly two years ago, when conditions were normal, as they are not to-day:—

Why free wheat is wanted.

During the summer, when the grain-growers of the West had no wheat to sell and quotations were really nominal, wheat prices in Winnipeg were higher than in Minneapolis.

Yet we are told that on such and such a day wheat is higher in Winnipeg than in Minneapolis, and that, therefore, the United States market is not worth while considering:—

Upon that unstable foundation the Conservative Press throughout the country built up the argument that the removal of the wheat duty on both sides of the border would result in the "flooding" of the Canadian market with American wheat.

Now that the season for marketing grain has again come round the Minneapolis price is, as usual, higher than that in Winnipeg. The difference is indicated by the following comparison of prices on Tuesday last:

[Mr. Turgeon.]

	Winnipeg.	Minneapolis.
No. 1 N..	81⅝	85⅝ to 86¼ No. 1 H.
No. 2 N..	80⅛	83¼ to 86½ No. 1 N.
No. 3 N..	78⅛	80⅛ to 83½ No. 2 N.
Oats.. .. ..33 to 34½		34½ to 37½ Oats
Barley .. ..42 to 45		50 to 67 Barley
Flax No. 1	118	138 to 141 No. 1 Flax

Canadian wheat is graded more strictly than American, and Winnipeg's No. 2 Northern is as good a grade as the No. 1 of Minneapolis. The American price is, therefore, about five cents a bushel better than the Canadian, and the grain-growers are clamoring for the removal of our wheat duties, which will automatically wipe out the American countervailing duty of ten cents, and let our grain in duty free to the Minneapolis maker.

The difference in the price of oats is not so marked, but it must be remembered that Canadian oats weigh 34 pounds to the bushel, the price being a little under a cent a pound, while United States oats weigh 32 pounds, and the price is a little over a cent a pound. As the United States duty is six cents a bushel, with no provision for its removal if Canada takes off her duty on oats, there is no immediate prospect of doing business in oats. Under the agreement of 1911 oats would have been duty free on both sides of the border.

When one considers this statement of conditions in normal times one sees why our friends from the West are demanding that the matter of free wheat be made permanent, and I hope, when this debate is concluded and a vote taken, that the amendment of my hon. friend from Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff) will be carried with a large majority.

I wish to refer now to the shipping industry, in regard to which the people of Canada are to-day very much agitated. We have recently heard a great deal of the necessity of reviving the ship-building industry in Canada. I wish that industry had been revived six or seven years ago; I wish it had been revived when the people of Canada and this Parliament were unanimous as to the project of building a Canadian navy in Canadian ports by Canadian workmen for the protection of Canadian commerce. Some years ago we heard our friends on the other side arguing as eloquently as any hon. member on this side for the establishment of a Canadian navy. When my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce introduced his resolution in 1909, we all listened to him as he waxed eloquent over his subject, and as his speech progressed and he was demonstrating the feelings of Canadians, he carried me with him into lofty heights of patriotism. He spoke of the miner carrying from the bowels of the earth, of the coal and the iron ore in the blast furnaces where Canadian engineers and Canadian workmen were transforming the iron ore into steel for the construction of Canadian ships, and he demonstrated to this Parliament the advantage of our commerce travelling side by side with its protector—a Canadian navy—across the sea. During the last six years, however, and more particularly during the last three years, Canada has produced the commerce but Britain has produced the protector. That is the state of things owing to the change of mind on the part of my right hon. friend and his supporters on the other side who refused to accept the Laurier Navy Bill, as it was called, and therefore refused to give Canada and the British Empire the advantage of those ten cruisers which were to be built. Although at that time they were looked upon as a tin pot navy, the experience derived during the war prove that they would have been the best possible gift to the British Empire and to the British navy. When war was declared, we would have had some of those cruisers ready to defend from German warships the Pacific coast, where the people took freight, removing their bonds and gold from the bank and hiding them in their cellars, and where the local Government rushed to buy two submarines in order to defend the coast. Had the Liberal policy been accepted by hon. gentlemen opposite, submarines would have been built in Canada by Canadians. It is with sorrow that I say that during these last three years of war the Government has taken no steps to remedy the position of Canada so far as shipbuilding is concerned, and that it has not up to this date made any effort to build a single warship for the assistance of Great Britain. We see Australia, who has a treaty with us whereby our cruisers were to assist theirs in defending our trade on the Pacific coast, doing her duty and carrying off the honours of the war, and at the same time, in the absence of our Canadian cruisers, having to call upon the cruisers of Japan to come to her rescue.

However, better late than never. Like many another step we have urged hon. gentlemen opposite to take, it has been taken at last, but very late in the day. At the very beginning of the war we suggested that the Government should take over the Transcontinental shops at Winnipeg, Quebec and Moncton for the manufacture of munitions of war at cost price, thus saving the British Government millions of dollars. But they refused to do it. The British Government sent out Lord Rhondda to investigate the shell business in Canada, and he endeavoured to persuade the Canadian Government to nationalize these shops, but nothing came of it. The Minister of Railways and Canals at one time seemed to have been influenced by the suggestions of Lord Rhondda, but after consultation with his colleagues, I presume, he told Lord Rhondda that he had no data on which he could fix a price.

I believe the time has come when we should give more attention to the building of ships. It is true that by an agreement with the United States, who have now become our Allies, that country is to build ships for the protection of commerce and to replace the tonnage sunk by the German submarines. The daily shipping losses are certainly large enough to attract the attention of this Government. I have always been in favour of shipbuilding in this country. I think that if from the beginning of the war the shipyards of Vancouver and Victoria and Halifax and St. John had resounded with the incessant reverberations of the smith's hammer, it would have had a most potent influence on recruiting. I would urge the Government to encourage the building not only of steel ships but of wooden ships. Wooden ships, of course, do not afford so much protection, but they will be of immense value to Canada after the war. When peace is restored other nations will be coming along to buy our steel ships as fast as we can build them, but the wooden ships will remain our own property to be used in our coastal and perhaps trans-Atlantic trade. I trust the Government will make every effort to satisfy the Canadian people that they are doing their utmost to win this war as speedily as possible. Every Canadian to-day is determined to do his part, but if we want to win the war we must not depend upon the patriotism of the people alone. Canadians command the admiration of the world to-day. In the first year of the war they enrolled in hundreds of thousands, just as fast as the militia authorities could accept them. Canadian women have also done splendidly, and have shown great patriotism. In this the third year of the war Canadian women from the Atlantic to the Pacific are making every possible sacrifice. After giving a son or husband to the cause they are working night and day for the comfort of our soldiers, helping the Red Cross and Patriotic funds, watching and praying for victory and the return of loved ones. Let me tell you, Sir, as a representative of the Maritime Provinces, that in this great harmonious concert of virtues the Evangeline of to-day in the Maritime Provinces has revealed herself a worthy sister in nobility, patriotism and devotion. Let us pray that that will continue.

I have to express one regret. I do not know where the idea originated, although the ex-Minister of Militia attributes it to the Prime Minister himself, but I know the opinion has been expressed in the Conservative and independent press, that the man who was working in a munition factory or on a farm was doing his duty just as much as the soldier in the trenches. I confess I admire the man who leaves home to work in a munition factory, but he is not to be compared with the man who voluntarily leaves his fireside and offers the supreme sacrifice of his life on the altar of his country; there is no comparison between them I want to see every man who cannot go to the front doing his duty on the farm or in the factory, but a man making munitions at $3 or $4 a day and sleeping in peace and quietness at night is not to be compared with his brother in the trenches who goes sleepless for nights and sometimes weeks. I think this idea has done much to hinder recruiting and accounts for the sudden falling off in enlistments. When I think of the 400,000 young men who have gone overseas, I am filled with admiration for the Canadian youth; they have done well, but I do not say that Canada has done enough. We must do our best every day until the war ends, every day and every night until the bugle calls for peace throughout the world. It makes me mad to see the number of young men going into our movie shows; hundreds of thousands are wasting their time in these places when they should be in the factories or at the front, and I think the Government should take some steps to empty these theatres of our young men, so that their brothers in the trenches could be relieved for a while.

I say that Canada has done well, but Canada must continue to do well until the end. As one who believes that Canada cannot do too much in this great cause, and who is willing to accept everyone who may have failed in his duty in days gone by, but is willing to tender that duty to his country now, I feel it my painful duty to mention the report that appears in the daily papers to the effect that there was disturbance at a public meeting in Montreal addressed by Hon. Mr. Blondin, now colonel of a French-Canadian battalion. With the many and varied elements in a great city like Montreal differences of sentiment and of opinion are not unlikely to be found. Yet I believe that the disturbance in the meeting to which I have referred was the work of a very small number of persons, as compared with the great audience that had assembled. I confess, however, that I fear the effects that the report of such disturbances will have upon the mind of the world at large and of Canada in particular. It will be said that the French-Canadians of Quebec have forgotten their duty. Speaking as a French-Canadian, I yield to no English-speaking person in my patriotism, and in my loyalty to British institutions. I realize that under Providence it is to these institutions and their successful working in Canada that the French Catholic subject owes the liberty of speech and of worship which he has enjoyed. It is to the effect of British liberty upon public sentiment that we owe the fact that the false doctrines of the French Revolution have not invaded our country. So, as I say, I fear that the reports of disturbance at the public meeting to which I have referred will be interpreted against my race. I am not here as a representative of Quebec, but I am of that province native born, and I am jealous of its reputation. As I have said, I am willing to accept the return of anyone who may have misinterpreted French-Canadian sentiment in the past and now has changed his opinion, but I cannot but feel that these disturbances at public meetings are the residue of the false doctrine propounded by certain hon. gentlemen on the other side of this House in 1910 and 1911, when they preached that Canada owed nothing to the Empire and should not participate in her wars, or give her assistance in time of danger. The effects of the sentiments then inculcated cannot at once disappear, but let us hope that these effects will not last much longer. I trust that this untoward incident will not be represented as indicating that French-Canadians do not share the loyalty of their fellow-citizens. I trust that when called upon they will do their duty by enlisting under the command of Colonel Blondin, or anyone else who is sent upon similar duties, and that the province of Quebec will no longer be afflicted with reports which convey so false an impression of the sentiments of the people of that province.

I have to apologize for having occupied so long in view of the fact that the House has been anticipating the more interesting speaker who is to follow me. I thank hon. members for the attention with which they have heard me, and if my words should have the result of sending even one more recruit into our overseas forces, or one more man into the factories by which those forces are equipped and supplied, I shall feel that I have not wholly failed in my purpose.

Mr. J. W. EDWARDS (Frontenac): If we gave due consideration to the figures of our trade with the world during the last fiscal year, I am sure we should all feel proud and pleased with the encouraging message presented to us by the Finance Minister. I feel that I might go further and say that in the facts and figures presented to us by the Finance Minister we have undoubted proof, at least to my mind, of the ability of this Government to successfully face difficulties and responsibilities, the like of which have never been placed upon the shoulders of any Canadian government since or before Confederation. The facts and figures presented in that Budget speech are also a tribute to the resourcefulness and energy of the Canadian people.

I have followed the speech of the hon. member (Mr. Turgeon) with interest and attention. With many of his sentiments I am in hearty accord. I do not agree with him in everything; particularly do I differ from him in regard to trade matters. I wish to say also that I sympathize most heartily with him in his feelings in regard to the prosecution of this war. I appreciate the position he is in, for I understand that he has the honour of having a son at the present time fighting for liberty and humanity, and as I am in the same position he and I can shake hands in a deep and common sentiment. I am sorry to see his countenance beclouded by what he regards as the tariff woes of Canada at this time, but I congratulate him, a man of his years, upon the vigorous manifestation he has given of the elemental forces of his nature. He has come out strong in denunciation of protection. I believe I state history correctly when I say that the hon. gentleman was a candidate for election to this House in 1896, and in that election was defeated. It is only natural to suppose that inasmuch as the Liberal party which he supports, had been denouncing protection for eighteen years, that in that election he also denounced protection. The result was disastrous to him; he was defeated. But he has been successful in the succeeding elections from 1900 down to the present time.

During all the time that he has had a seat in this House he has been an enthusiastic and loyal supporter of the leader of the Opposition who, during all his career as leader of the Liberal Government, advocated and backed up the principle of protection. That is the policy which he followed during the time he was in power. The hon. gentleman has said that he would like to see potatoes placed upon the free list. I do not know how he is going to square himself with the hon. gentleman who sits behind him, the member for North Cape Breton (Mr. McKenzie), who, in speaking in the House the other day, was very pronounced in that regard and was going to place an embargo on potatoes in order to keep them from going out of the country. So we find to-day, as we have found in all the years that have passed, the Liberal party has as many different policies as there are constituencies represented in this House by Liberal members. It is not to be wondered at when we look back over the career of the Liberal party and recall the fact that the right hon. gentleman who is to-day the leader of the Liberal party had as many different policies as he fought elections in Canada. He never had the same policy for any two elections in which he fought. He advocated free trade as they have it in England, unrestricted reciprocity and so on.

Hon. gentlemen opposite have had more practice than we have had on this side of the House in jumping from one policy to another and I congratulate them on their frequent exhibitions of acrobatic agility during the last fifteen or twenty years. The hon. member for North Cape Breton is something of a joker, something of a wit, and the hon. member for North Cape Breton has got off some very spicy wit at times in this House. He is always sure that he will have at least one person in the House who will thoroughly appreciate his humour and that is the hon. member for North Cape Breton. The hon. member for North Cape Breton and the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat have expressed some very decided opinions in regard to the record of the Liberal party and I am going to answer these hon. gentlemen by quoting the opinion of a gentleman who sat in this House as a Liberal member from the West, a man of very strong personality and a man who still occupies a very prominent position in the public life of this country and is now the manager and editor of a paper called the Winnipeg Tribune. I refer to

Mr. R. L. Richardson. I think I am correct in saying that he sat in this House at one time as a Liberal member. This gentleman makes certain comments in his paper on a statement made by the hon. member for Calgary (Mr. Bennett) regarding the promise supposed to have been made by the hon. member for South Renfrew (Mr. Graham) to Mackenzie and Mann with respect to the handing over of the Intercolonial to the Canadian Northern. The Globe says that the Liberal party would not follow any leader who would do any such thing.

I wish to read a few comments made by the Winnipeg Tribune upon that statement of the Globe in regard to the Liberal party:

If the Globe by the expression "Liberal party" refers to the parliamentary "rump" led by Sir Wilfrid Laurier, Hon. George P. Graham, "Big Mac" and the others, the Tribune will point out, in the first place, that any body of men which follows such leadership could not by any possibility be a Liberal party. Their assumption of the name would not make them such. That is so easy of demonstration that the Globe has only to refer to the administrative record of the Laurier party to convince itself.

Then again, if the following of Sir Wilfrid Laurier is the Globe's "Liberal party" what warrant has the Globe for saying or thinking that, if the leaders had made up their minds to alienate the Intercolonial, or, for that matter, any other public property, "the party would have refused to follow?" Is there anything in the record of the group which would justify such a declaration? Surely the Globe has not forgotten the Crow's Nest Pass Railway enormity? It has special reasons for remembering it. In that scandalous deal alone, there was alienated by the Laurier Government, entirely without any real consideration, public franchises, public cash and public resources of a value as great probably as that of the Intercolonial railway. Did the party as represented by the parliamentary rump, refuse to follow? Not that we wot of.

Then came the astonishing series of Mackenzie and Mann deals in which the Laurier Government not only alienated the franchises, cash, and credit of the Dominion, but aided and abbetted the Government of Manitoba in its even more nefarious alienations. These transactions were debated in Parliament, and thoroughly analysed and exposed in The Tribune and other journals. Did "the party" as represented by the parliamentary rump, refuse to follow? Not observably.

When that crowning hybrid monstrosity, the National Transcontinental Grand Trunk Pacific nightmare, in which hundreds of millions of public money have been literally wasted, was suddenly put before the public, it also was thoroughly dissected in the press and its criminal insanity demonstrated. Did that demonstration induce "the party" as represented by the parliamentary rump, to refuse to follow? Unhappily, no.

But why go on? In view of this record and much more that could be cited, does it not look like infantile folly for the Globe to talk about the "Liberal party" and of its assumed refusal to follow.

The Globe would be much better and more patriotically employed, if it would tell its readers the truth, that there is at present no organized Liberal party in Canada (although it needs one badly), instead of trying by false inference to cover up the huge incompetencies and scallawaggeries of the rump which arrogates the name. That is merely performing the function of the whited sepulchre.

I might remind the House again that that article, with all the adjectives it contains, was not written by me but by Mr. R. L. Richardson, a former Liberal member of this House. I commend it to the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat and to those who sit near him, who have tried to work up their courage to the point of finding something pleasing in the past record of the Liberal party, and I would ask them to compare carefully the statement made in that regard by a former Liberal member of this House with their own statements as recorded in Hansard, give the matter some further study and see which party is right. The date of the paper is May 1, 1917.

The hon. member for Gloucester invited comparison in regard to Canada's debt, revenue, expenditure, trade, etc., between the record made by the party which he supports when it was in power and that made by the party which is now holding the reins of Government. I wish to take up that challenge briefly and first let me refer to that which we have always had in Canada, namely, the national debt. The national debt of Canada was increased by the Liberals during the fifteen years that they were in power by $87,000,000. The national debt was increased during the last three years that the Liberals were in power by $62,250,000. There is some little explanation for that if you look back and note events in Ontario. In 1905 the Liberal Government in Ontario went out and the Whitney Government came into power. You might wonder how that would affect the Federal situation. It was in this way that the grafters and hangers on who had loaded themselves on the Liberal party of Ontario for the last ten or fifteen years they were in power, finding themselves out of a job in the provincial arena, proceeded to besiege the fortress in Ottawa, and the party in power, the Liberals, could not refuse them. The result was that, following the election of 1908, when the Liberal party, the Laurier Government were returned to power in this country, they thought that they were invincible, and they became absolutely recklesss in their extravagance and expenditures. With the fiscal year ending 1909 this party, which had denounced the Tory Government for extravagance, added $46,000,000 to the public debt of Canada in one year. In the next fiscal year, ending March 31, 1910, they added $12,500,000 to the public debt, and in the next year, 1911, they added $3,750,000, or a total addition to the national debt of Canada in the last three years of Liberal rule of $62,250,000. Then Providence very kindly intervened to save this country from those who were despoiling it, and up to March 31, 1914, the Borden Government had not only met its obligations, paid its expenses as it went along, but had shouldered some $120,000,000 of obligations incurred by the Grits while they were in power, and had reduced the debt from $340,000,000, what it was when they assumed the reins of office, down to $336,000,000. That was before the war broke out. Then the war came on and we have this to say, and I challenge contradiction of the correctness of my statement, that from the time the Borden Government assumed the reins of office, so far as the national debt of Canada is concerned, it has decreased that national debt by several millions of dollars, and that to-day we on this side of the House are in a position to say that not one dollar of debt has been added to the national debt of Canada since this Government came into power except through the war. During the last fiscal year not only did the Government meet all its obligations, current and capital expenditures, and meet a large pension call upon its funds, but it also paid the interest on the national debt, and do not forget that in paying interest on the national debt they were paying interest on some $87,000,000 added to that debt by the Liberal party. In addition to paying all this during the last fiscal year, this Government paid some $60,000,000 on war account.

A word or two in regard to the aggregate trade of Canada. In the fiscal year ending March 31, 1911, the aggregate trade of the Dominion of Canada amounted to $752,000,000, exclusive of coin and bullion. That was the amount of our aggregate trade for the last year the Liberal party was in power. The first year after the Conservatives came into power, that is the fiscal year ending March 31, 1912 the aggregate trade of Canada had increased from $752,000,000 to $841,000,000. The next year, 1913, it had still further increased to $1,063,000,000. The next year, 1914 it had still further increased to $1,090,000,000. Now that was before the war, when we might fairly well assume that conditions were about as normal as when the Liberals were in power. The next year, 1915, the aggregate trade was $958,000,000; in 1916 it was $1,309,000,000; and for the last fiscal year, 1917, it reached the enormous total of $2,043,000,000. These figures are exclusive of coin and bullion so that as regards comparisons along the line of our trade, I think we on this side of the House have nothing to apologize for and have very much to be proud of in the record made by the Borden Government.

But hon. gentlemen say that these figures representing the trade of Canada are entirely due to the war and to the enhanced prices caused by the war. I submit that that argument, whatever cogency it may have in regard to the trade of Canada for the years 1915, 1916 and 1917, cannot have any application to the figures I have given previous to that date, from the years 1911 to 1914. But, Sir, let us consider that statement for a moment. I freely admit that the figures representing the aggregate trade of Canada are enhanced or enlarged because of war conditions and of increased prices due to the war. But, at the same time, let me point out that the total trade of the United States for 1916 was $6,500,000,000. The United States has all the advantages, so far as we can call them advantages, from the trade due to the war that we have had. Any enhancement of prices that there was in Canada would apply in the same degree to prices in the United States. Their trade was $6,500,000,000, while ours was over $2,000,000,000. But their trade, according to population, should have been, not $6,500,000,000,000, but from $12,000,000,000 to $15,000,000,000. And let me say to those who may take objection to that argument, that the aggregate trade of England since the war has pretty closely approximated its increase to the proportion which England's population bears to ours, so I think there is something in that argument.

Let me refer to some of our exports, and I want to give figures for three years, the fiscal years ending on the 31st of March, 1911, 1914 and 1916. The exports from Canada of Canadian products in those years wereas follows:

Exports From Canada of Canadian Produce.

Mine..	$42,787,000	$59,039,000	$66,589,000
Fisheries ..	15,675,000	20,623,000	22,377,000
Forest	45,439,000	42,792,000	51,271,000
Animals and produce ..	52,244,000	53,349,000	102,882,000
Agricultural produce ..	82,601,000	198,220,000	249,661,000
Manufactures	35,283,000	57,443,000	242,034,000
Miscellaneous	285,000	122,000	6,792,000
	$274,314,000	$421,588,000	$741,606,000

These exports include products of the mine, forest and sea, animals, agricultural products and so on, so that hon. gentlemen cannot say that this increase is due to demands made upon us by the war. The figures of exports in 1914, under Conservative rule, when conditions were not affected by the war—in respect of all kinds of Canadian produce, whether of the mine, fisheries or forests, animals, agricultural products or manufactures—were larger than they were in 1911, and the total in 1914 was nearly double the total in 1911. Our exports of Canadian produce to the United Kingdom in 1912 amounted to $147,000,000, and in 1916 to $451,000,000. Of these amounts, in 1912, breadstuffs amounted to $78,000,000, and in 1916 to $198,000,000; provisions, $31,000,000 in 1912, and $63,000,000 in 1916. Our exports of Canadian produce to France in 1912 were valued at $2,048,000, and in 1916, $33,703,000. We exported to France, in 1912, cattle and horses to the value of only $11,520; in 1916 the value of the export was $1,530,000. Of breadstuffs we exported to France, in 1912, under Laurier rule, $6,169,000 worth, and in 1916 $16,016,000 worth. I am very much pleased that these figures show that since the beginning of the war Canada has rendered great assistance by supplying breadstuffs and provisions not only to the Mother Country, but to our heroic Ally, France, as well.

Our exports of Canadian produce, in 1912, to the United States amounted to $102,000,000—that was under the beneficent influence of Liberal rule—and in 1916 the value of similar exports was $201,000,000. Of living animals we exported to the United States, in 1912, $1,697,000 worth, and in 1916 $13,207,000 worth; of breadstuffs, in 1912, $5,676,000 worth, and in 1916 $14,000,000 worth. The value of the export of provisions, in 1912, to the United States was $12,325,000, and in 1916 $1,829,000. In 1912 we imported from the United States $4,708,000 worth of horses and cattle, and $1,747,000 worth in 1916. Of breadstuffs we imported from the United States, in 1912, $16,000,000 worth, in 1916 $25,000,000 worth, and of provisions $6,000,000 worth in the former year, and $12,000,000 worth in the latter year These comparative figures concerning Canada's trade during the years I have mentioned are, I repeat, very much in favour of the Liberal-Conservative party.

Let me refer for a moment to the question of bran and mill feed. Our average imports of wheat flour from the United States during the last five years was only 50,000 barrels. The value of our export of the same commodity in 1912 was $23,000 and in 1916, $1,259,000. Our imports of bran and mill feed in 1912 and 1916 were insignificant, a matter of $33,000 in the former year and $43,000 in the latter, while our export of bran and mill feed in 1912 were $444,000 and in 1916, $1,602,000. I ask the attention of the House particularly to the figures respecting our exports of bran and mill feed, because they have an important bearing on the question of free wheat. At the time of the reciprocity pact I was opposed to making wheat and flour free of duty, and was also opposed to it subsequent to that time. Hon. gentlemen opposite, of course, were also opposed at the time of the reciprocity pact to making wheat and flour free. In 1913 the United States passed a tariff Act by which they agreed to place wheat, wheat flour and semolina on the free list when these articles should be admitted from the United States into any other country free of duty. This Government thought it wise to avail itself of that offer. I submit that the relations between Canada and the United States were entirely changed by the entry of the United States into the war as one of our Allies. There was and still is a demand for wheat that can be carried from the United States or Canada across the ocean. I need not remind the House that the cost of transporting wheat is enormous, and it is only natural that those who buy wheat in North America for transportation across the ocean should buy only the higher grades. The cost of transporting the lower grades is just as great as the cost of transporting the higher grades, therefore purchasers naturally wanted to be supplied entirely with No. 1 wheat. The result was that there was no demand for the inferior grades of wheat. Several interests in Canada are directly affected by the removal of duty from wheat and flour. First, the farmers of the West, who expect to get a larger price for their wheat because it has free entry into the United States—though I do not think they will gain anything like what they expect to gain. Secondly, the millers, who are naturally interested in the matter; and, thirdly, the eastern farmers, who are directly interested. The interest of the miller is as to how the removal of the duty will affect the manufacture of the flour, but the interest of the eastern farmer is in regard to the by-products. The bran and the meal is obtained by grinding the wheat and it is in the interest of our farmers in eastern Canada, in Ontario, Quebec. and the Maritime Provinces, to have as much wheat as possible ground in Canada in order that they may be supplied with the by-products, to assist them in raising their beef cattle.

I am going to make a suggestion which, I hope, will receive the earnest consideration of the Government and the members of this House. My suggestion may not have much merit, but it may lead to some discussion or the presentation of some ideas which may be of general benefit. I desire to say, speaking as an eastern member from the province of Ontario, that I will hold up both hands in favour of this Government or any other Government that may be in power in this country taking ten, fifteen or twenty million dollars from the public treasury of the Dominion of Canada to build ships in this country to carry absolutely free Canadian flour from Canadian ports across to Liverpool. I would not be in favour of carrying Canadian wheat absolutely free, but I would be in favour of carrying on those ships Canadian wheat at just as low a rate as would still leave an inducement for the conversion of that wheat into flour in Canada.

What have we facing us in this country at the present time? We have three transcontinental lines of railway, one of which is quite able to pay its way, the other two of which have created what we call the railway problem of the Dominion of Canada. So far as these transcontinental lines of railway were concerned, the original idea not only of this party but of all parties in this country, was to bind the various provinces of this Dominion together, to have the trade of the East carried to the West and the trade of the West carried to the East over Canadian lines, in that way binding the various provinces of Confederation together with bands of steel. Have we been successful in that? We have spent large sums of money in endeavouring to induce immigrants to come to this country, to settle upon our western lands and to produce more wheat, although we had the certain knowledge that the more money we spent in order to induce immigrants to come to this country, the more immigrants we got to settle upon our western lands and the more wheat that was produced, the more the people in that western country were building up the railway lines and seaports on the other side of the border, while our own railway lines were going hungry and our own seaports were without work to keep their Canadian population busy. If it is justifiable to take from the public treasury money with which to build Dominion Government railways to transport products overland at less than cost, as has been done on Canadian Government railways for many years, it is far more justifiable to take from the public treasury to build ocean steamers to carry Canadian flour from Canadian ports across the ocean to Liverpool. By working along that line we would not only give tangible encouragement and support to our transcontinental lines of railway, but if we could divert some of that wheat from American lines to Canadian lines, we would give more employment to Canadians on our Canadian railways, and we would also give more employment to our Canadians in Canadian ports. I would stipulate that we would carry only Canadian flour, that is, flour manufactured in Canada from Canadian wheat and carried over Canadian railways to Canadian ports. In that way we would most materially assist the Canadian railway situation and we would also assist our Canadian millers by the encouragement we would afford them to manufacture larger quantities of flour. I need not amplify on the advantage that this course would prove to the farmers of Ontario, Quebec, and the Maritime Provinces in the by-products with which it would flood the eastern portion of Canada. All of these things justify me in placing this matter before the Government and before Parliament, and I trust it will receive the earnest consideration of the members of this House. It is passing strange that in years gone by, whenever the freight rates over our Canadian railways have been reduced, the ocean rates have been increased. I am not prepared to say just what the reason for that is. I have been told that many of the British millers are also financially interested in the vessels which carry either the wheat or the flour from this country to England. I do not make that statement as being correct, because I am not in a position to say whether it is or not, but I am told that such is the case. If that be the case, then this Government is still further justified in taking action that will prevent any combination of that kind from working against the interests of the people of Canada. It is needless to say what a great boon this would be to the people of Canada in encouraging shipbuilding in this country; it would be a great boon not only to the Maritime Provinces but to the various places in the provinces of Ontario and Quebec where ships could advantageously be built.

I desire to refer now to some statements which have been made by one or two hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House The hon. member for Moosejaw (Mr. Knowles) in his speech a few days ago stated:

> We want freedom of foodstuffs, freedom of fruit, freedom of lumber, of agricultural implements, and we want all the open markets of the world which we can get.

He was out and out for free trade. We have in this House the hon. member (Mr. Michael Clark), who is now and always has been, since I have known him, an ardent and consistent free trader. Although I differ entirely from his views on trade matters, I respect that hon. gentleman because I believe he is absolutely sincere in his views. I am sorry I cannot say the same with regard to the hon. member for Moosejaw and his associate from the West, the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff), because those hon. gentlemen have taken different attitudes at different times. For instance, the hon. gentleman from Moosejaw in his speech the other day advocated free trade all along the line, in agricultural implements and everything else. That was not the attitude of the hon. member for Moosejaw or of the hon. member for Assiniboia some years ago. In regard to agricultural implements, when the reciprocity pact was introduced in this House by the hon. Mr. Fielding, he stated that:

> They—

That is the farmers of the West.

> —would be glad to have them free of duty, but I must frankly say to them that we do not think that is fair. Like all others, they must be prepared to give and take; they must be prepared to bear their share of the burdens of the country.

He then proceeded to say that the duty which was 17½ per cent, had been reduced to 15½ per cent. The hon. member for Dundas (Mr. Broder) then asked this question:

> Is there any change to be made in the valuation for duty?

Mr. Fielding's answer was:

> Our negotiations have not touched the question of valuation; that must be left to the operation of the Customs authorities of the two countries.

I quote that because it shows the attitude taken by the Liberal party in regard to this matter of removing the duty from agricultural implements. For eighteen years up to 1896 they declared that protection was a curse and that if they came into power they would remove it entirely. But they made no move whatever from 1896 down to 1907 when they did make some minor changes which no one will say eliminated the principle of protection from the tariff; but while in 1907 they made a reduction in the tariff of 2½ per cent, they actually made an increase in the duty. The former tariff was 20 per cent, and the binder was valued for duty purposes at $80; 20 per cent on $80 is $16. But immediately the Liberal party reduced the tariff from 20 to 17½ per cent, they raised the valuation of a binder for duty purposes from $80 to $100, so that the 17½ per cent duty produced $17.50, as compared with $16 under a 20 per cent tariff. That is the way the Liberal party dealt with the farmers of this country in regard to agricultural implements. When the Liberal party in this House was undertaking to make some changes in the tariff in 1907, the hon. member for Souris (Mr. Schaffner) proposed that the duty should be reduced from 20 to 10 per cent instead of to 17½ per cent, but his motion to that effect was voted down by 56 to 22. Every Liberal member who was in the House when the vote was taken absolutely forgot the farmer and the pledges that his party had been making practically all their lives. Speaking on the same occasion, the hon. member for Moosejaw (Mr. Knowles) said:

> I shall give the Government hearty support for I believe the policy of the Government is in the interests of the country.

On that occasion the hon. member for Moosejaw not only voted against reducing the duty on agricultural implement, but ardently supported the Government in keeping the duty to 17½ per cent. On the same occasion the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff) said:

> The Tariff Commission got information all over the country. I do not think the farmers of the West at all events, asked for a great reduction such as is proposed by this resolution on agricultural implements. They asked that the duties be left alone. I shall give the Government hearty support on this question.

He talks very differently now. On the same occasion the hon. Mr. Fielding made this statement:

> Even suppose for a moment that he (the farmer) got everything free and had a duty of 17½ per cent on the implements, would that be an extravagant duty as things go in this country? I believe this proposal of the hon. member for Souris, if adopted, would do an injustice to an established industry. My belief is that if this motion were passed we would strike a severe blow at one of the great industries of the country. I believe the International Harvester Company would find it to its interests to close up its business at Hamilton, at least so much of it as is devoted to mowers and binders, and have them made at the American branch and bring them from the United States.

These are the words of the Finance Minister of that day in regard to reducing the duty on agricultural implements to 10 per cent.

As I said a moment ago, the hon. member for Moosejaw now declares that he is in favour of absolute free trade all round, free fruit, free agricultural products, free agricultural implements and everything else. How many hon. gentlemen opposite agree with those views of the hon. member for Moosejaw? Will the hon. member for South Renfrew (Mr. Graham) say that he is in favour of free trade in agricultural implements and everything else? Will the hon. member for South Cape Breton (Mr. McKenzie) say so? No. The first thing that would come into his mind would be coal, and the first thing that would come into the mind of my hon. friend from Northumberland (Mr. Loggie), I suppose, would be fish, and the other hon. gentlemen would have something else on their minds. Here, then, we have one member of the Liberal party who professes to represent his leader in his particular part of the country advocating free trade, and other hon. members of the Liberal party sit in the House here and dare not and will not say that they endorse the sentiments of the hon. member for Moosejaw in that regard.

The hon. member for Assiniboia, comparing the expenditures in 1910-1911 with the expenditure in 1915-1916, said, the other day, that there was an increase in the expenditure of the Labour Department of 32 per cent, and he quoted the figures for other departments to show the percentage of increase. He also stated that the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce had offered $1.20 a bushel to the farmers of the West for their wheat. The hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce stated in the House yesterday that the proposal to purchase at $1.30 per bushel, instead of $1.20, was made, not by the Minister of Trade and Commerce, but by the Imperial Wheat Commission, and was simply communicated to representatives of the Canadian Council of Agriculture by him; that was his whole connection with the matter. What object has the hon. member for Assiniboia in mis-stating the facts in that fashion? I do not think any person would say of the hon. member for Assiniboia that "he knew how to lie like a gentleman." Those statements of his have been shown to be not in accordance with the facts, and not only those statements, but dozens of statements in every speech that he makes are absolutely devoid of the truth. The hon. member for Assiniboia has had considerable to do with this country, to the country's sorrow. When the Laurier Government was in power he occupied a position as Commissioner of Lands, and he had some relatives and friends out in the West who are very thankful to-day that he occupied that position. There was supposed to be a man named H. B. Brown, who made an application for some 28,000 acres for grazing purposes while the hon. member for Assiniboia was Commissioner of Lands. In some mysterious way the figures were raised from 28,000 to 60,000. No one has ever been able to find any trace of Brown, but the relatives of the hon. member for Assiniboia appeared on the scene a little later and enjoyed the profits of the transaction. So we have this hon. gentleman figuring in deals which resulted in the stealing of the public domain, both forests and lands and the fish in the lakes, and now he has the effrontery to get up in this House and denounce the Government time and again for extravagance. Such is the hon. member for Assiniboia. But I notice that he has nothing to say in regard to the gentleman from the West who sits near him, the hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver), who took royalties on lands out in the West, royalties to which he was not entitled, and which he put in his pocket and has kept in his pocket down to the present. Yet hon. gentlemen opposite will get up and talk about profiteers and the exorbitant profits made on shells and so on.

We have another rara avis in this House, the hon. member for Carleton, New Brunswick (Mr. Carvell). One day he is in favour of letting all stock come into the country free, and the next day he is in favour of putting on an embargo to prevent any going out of the country. One day he denounces the Government because they do not negotiate with the United States for the free admission of potatoes into the markets of that country—this is when they have an extra crop and potatoes are low in price—and recently in this House he announced that he would force the farmers of New Brunswick and other parts of Canada to sell their potatoes at $1.75 a bag. And why? Because he had sold his potatoes at that figure, and had not any more potatoes to sell. He is so envious that he would not allow his neighbours to make twenty-five cents a bag more on potatoes than he had made himself. Well, for once the hon. gentleman was consistent with his former action. Some years ago, when he was purchasing hay, looking out for a profit for himself, $8 a ton was the maximum price he would give the farmers of Carleton for their hay. He took care to have a penalty in his agreement with those who bought on his behalf in case they should pay the farmers more than $8. The farmers of Carleton did not want to sell their hay at that price, and he determined to bring them to time. He sent to the province of Quebec to get a few carloads of hay, and then he told the people of Carleton that he could get hay elsewhere. He had them tight, and so they had to accept his offer. Yet now he sheds crocodile tears of sympathy with the farmers of this country, while at the same time he would force the farmers to sell their wheat at a certain price and their potatoes at a certain price. I venture to say that if this Government undertook to carry out suggestions made by the hon. member and certain other gentlemen on the other side, he would be one of the first to raise such a howl as could be heard from the Atlantic to the Pacific in protest against the Government's action.

A great deal has been said by hon. gentlemen opposite about the cost of food. I think that, to a great degree, the increase in the cost of food is due to natural causes, to the relation of supply and demand. The people in Canada to-day are paying the penalty of their action in past years. As was pointed out the other day by the hon. member for South Oxford (Mr. Sutherland), for years in this country, while the Liberal party was in power, there was an exodus from the farm to the city. People were leaving the farms because the farmers were not making one half of one per cent on the money they had invested. There was no encouragement for the boys to stay on the farm, and so they flocked to the towns and cities. As a result we have not more than one man to every hundred acres on the farms in the province of Ontario. Last year in that province we had 365,000 acres less under cultivation than the year before. I have had placed in my hands by the hon. member for Brockville (Mr. Webster) a short newspaper article which gives facts on this point that are very startling. The article is as follows:

Why food will be scarce.

Figures furnished by the United States Department of Agriculture, which is now as interested in promoting food production in the United States as is our own government here in Canada, place the number of men removed from productive pursuits by the war at 56,000,000. Of these, 6,000,000 men have already been killed; 4,500,000 are in prison camps; 15,000,000 have been wounded, of which number 1,500,000 have been permanently incapacitated. There are now 5,000,000 men in the hospitals. Those under arms at the front total approximately 35,000,000 men.

Think of it! 56,000,000 of the able-bodied men of the world withdrawn from the ranks of producers. Half the population of the United States, counting every man, woman and child; almost eight times the population of Canada. When we consider the small crops of the last year, the small surplus of food that there is now in the world, and the great reduction in the number of producers, it is easy to understand the worldwide dread of famine. Conditions call for the greatest production of foodstuffs that is humanly possible.

Let me give some figures to show the position in relation to the potato crop. There was an excess of production in 1916 over 1915 in certain provinces, as follows:

	Bushels.
Maritime Provinces	6,729,000
Manitoba	1,600,000
Saskatchewan	850,000
Total	9,179,000

There were shortages in the potato crop in 1916 over that of 1915 as follows:

	Bushels.
Ontario	6,250,000
Quebec	2,800,000
Alberta	500,000
British Columbia	1,100,000
Total	10,650,000

On the whole, the shortage in Canada's potato crop was over 1,470,000 bushels, as compared with the previous year. In the face of that shortage, where can we get our supply of potatoes? In the United States? In the nineteen northern states of the Union, which produces on the average sixty-one per cent of the total potato crop of the country, they were forty-four per cent short in 1916 of the production of 1915, and fifty-five per cent short of the average production of the previous five years. That is, in 1916 the potato crop in the United States was over 75,000,000 bushels short of the previous year. In Great Britain and Ireland there was a shortage of 77,224,000. On the whole in Canada, the United States and Great Britain and Ireland, there was a shortage in 1916 as compared with 1915 of over 153,000,000 bushels. Knowing that there is a shortage of potatoes, it is only natural for the people to turn to other things. But Canada's other crops were short to the following extent:

	Bushels.
Wheat	200,000,000
Oats	172,000,000
Barley	19,380,000

In the United States, there were shortages in the crops as follows:

	Bushels.
Corn	411,000,000
Wheat	386,000,000
Oats	249,000,000
Barley	147,000,000
Rye	6,000,000
Buckwheat	3,000,000
Total	1,202,000,000

When I make the statement that the increase in the cost of food stuffs is very largely attributable to natural causes, I think I am absolutely borne out by the figures I have given. In England and Wales the wheat crop was 12,000,000 bushels short of that of the previous year. Argentina, which has been referred to by the hon. gentleman who preceded me, and by others in this House, has found it necessary, because of the failure of its crop, to place an embargo upon the export of grains which embargo took effect in March of this year. The figures of the food grains of the world, I am informed, up to March 31 of this year, showed that they were 150,000,000 bushels short of the world's requirements up to the month of August. That is the situation that we are in and it does not seem at all remarkable that there should be such a marked increase in the price of grain.

With regard to the price of flour, if hon. gentlemen will take the statement made by the hon. member for South Cape Breton (Mr. Carroll), if they will take the statement made by the hon. member for Richmond (Mr. Kyte) and if they will look these statements over very carefully, or even casually for that matter, and compare the prices of wheat with the prices of flour at the various dates which these hon. gentlemen mentioned in trying to make out their argument and to show the House and the country that the millers were taking the people by the throat, they will see that the prices of flour in the instances in which they gave for last year and for this year conform to the advanced prices of wheat. If you assume that it takes five bushels of wheat to make a barrel of flour, the price of flour conforms very closely to the price of wheat. It is folly to talk of forcing the millers to sell flour at a certain price without touching the price of grain. In order to reduce the price of flour you have to go back to the man who raises the wheat and force him to sell his wheat at a certain price. There is not an hon. gentleman on the other side of the House who will dare get up and advocate any such thing and fix the price. These hon. gentlemen will travel all around the price, but yet they say that the Government should commandeer the wheat. They take mighty good care to steer clear of fixing the price. They are afraid to fix it too high because that would put up the price of flour and they would get hit on the heat with a brick when they went down East and they are afraid to fix the price too low because it would interfere with the chances of the man who wanted to get elected in the West. They are playing a double game in this as they have played a double game all along and as they played it in 1911 when they told the consumers that if they got reciprocity they would get everything for nothing and the producers that if they got reciprocity they would get higher prices for everything they had to sell.

I am in hearty accord with the statement made by the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Clark), and I think some other hon. gentlemen, with regard to the taxation of war profits. We are approaching the time, or we have come to the time, when wealth has got to contribute more largely than it has in the past towards the expenses of this country. I think that taxation of war profits is a step in that direction, and I hope that in the years to come those who have accumulated large quantities of wealth will by legislation be made to contribute more largely than they have in the past towards the running expenses of our country.

The hon. junior member for Halifax (Mr. Maclean) touched upon the Highway Improvement Bill which my hon. friend the Minister of Railways proposes to present to this House. He said the Government could not go to the money markets of the world and obtain money for any such purpose as that outlined by the Bill. I differ entirely from the hon. junior member for Halifax. I want to give it as my opinion that this Government, or any Government, could go to the money markets without going to the world outside of Canada, that they could make their appeal to the people of Canada for a loan for such a purpose and get it subscribed ten times over if they should see fit to ask for it. I am surprised that there should be any opposition to this idea. There certainly ought not to be any opposition from any hon. gentleman coming from the western part of the country who is interested in freight rates in so far as carrying his grain is concerned. You have, in carrying your grain, to consider the rate on the railways, you have to consider the rate across the ocean, but you should also consider what it costs to carry your grain from the farmer's granary to the elevator or to the railway track. I venture to say that in many cases it costs more to haul the grain of the western farmer who lives some distance away from the railway, 12, 15 or 20 miles, to the railway track than it costs to transport that grain from the railway track clear across the ocean to Liverpool. If any hon. gentleman thinks that is an extravagant statement, let him consider it for a moment, let him work it out and he will find that I am pretty nearly right. It is of the highest importance to the farmers that there should be highway improvement, and that some of the money of this country should be used for this purpose. I regret exceedingly that the Bill which was passed through this House twice should have been twice thrown out by a partisan Senate under instructions from the leader of the Opposition, because if it had been carried out it would have resulted in these sums of money being paid for highway improvement to the various provinces from 1912 to 1915.

Saskatchewan	377,259
British Columbia	300,684
Manitoba	349,048
New Brunswick	269,591
Nova Scotia	377,186
Prince Edward Island	71,811
Ontario	1,933,069
Quebec	1,534,311
Total	$5,500,000

This sum, between 1912 and 1915, would have been spent in the various provinces of Canada in improving the facilities of the farmers to carry their produce to the closest railway market. The $40,000,000 which was squandered by the Liberal Government in connection with the Transcontinental railway would have constructed thousands of miles of roads in the various provinces just as good as the state roads on the other side of the line and to the great advantage of the people.

There is another matter in regard to which I wish to say a word, and that is in connection with military service. The hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Carvell) made the statement in this House in 1914:

> Well, Sir, the militia is a different organization from what it was when I belonged to it if it helps anybody's morals, manners or religion.

I have told you what the hon. member for Carleton, New Brunswick (Mr. Carvell) did with his farmers down there in regard to hay, and what he would do with them in regard to potatoes. I call your attention to his own remark which refers to his morals. With regard to manners, well we have had a lot of discussion during the last eight years in which I have been a member of this House with regard to the Militia Department. That department has come in for some hard hits, but the toughest and hardest thing ever attributed to the Militia Department of Canada is this statement of the hon. member for Carleton. If his manners are the result of his connection with the Militia Department of Canada, I say that is the saddest and hardest thing ever said of the Militia Department of Canada. The hon. member talks about their expenditures for drill halls and armouries and the mistakes they have made, but this is the greatest burden the Militia Department has had to carry, if they are responsible for the manners of the hon. member for Carleton, N.B.

There is another member from the East to whom I wish to refer, who represents Guysborough (Mr. Sinclair). In the Montreal Gazette of yesterday, I noticed a report of an address by the hon. member to a Liberal Club in the province of Quebec, in Montreal I think. He had a perfect right to go to Montreal or to any place else and address a Liberal Club. If they can stand it, I have no objection to make. And I suppose he had a perfect right, if he so desired, to discuss politics. That is naturally what he would discuss at a Liberal Club. But, in the course of his remarks on that occasion, as reported in the Gazette, the hon. member for Guysborough took occasion to throw a sneer at the Orange Order of the province of Ontario, and it is to that I wish to allude. Mr. Speaker, I want to call your attention to this, that within twenty-four hours of the declaration of war, the heads of the Orange Order in Canada sent out a circular to their members calling upon them to enlist and fight in this war. I want to call your attention to the fact that there are at present in the trenches over in France upwards of 50,000 Orangemen from the Dominion of Canada. I want to call your attention to the fact that some 2,000 Orangemen from Canada are buried in France; they gave their lives for this cause. And when the hon. member for Guysborough refers to the Orange lodges in a sneering way let me remind him that these Orange lodges have been recruiting centres since this war started, and that they have also been collecting centres, that the Orangemen of Canada have put their hands in their pockets and given liberally to the Belgian relief fund, to relieve the condition of the Roman Catholics of Belgium, and have given their lives fighting alongside of French and British soldiers in defence of Belgium, and to maintain her rights. I say it ill becomes the hon. member for Guysborough at this time to throw out any sneers in regard to the Orange Order. The Orange Order is represented at the front by men who are risking and laying down their lives in defence of this great country, while men of the stamp of the hon. member for Guysborough descend to vilifying the Orange Order. I for one resent that, and I think I have a perfect right to resent it. I say it is unworthy of any member of this House, and that only a member who has a mighty small mind and takes a mighty narrow view of things would get up in any assembly in this country and at this time cast aspersions upon an order whose members to-day by the thousands are risking their lives at the front, while he, the member for Guysborough, is here in perfect safety in Canada.

Hon. gentlemen have been much concerned in regard to food production and in regard to conserving the food of this country. The hon. member for Laprairie (Mr. Lanctot) would go further. The hon. member, speaking in this House, said he would not send any more Canadians overseas; in fact, he says we have sent entirely too many men from Canada overseas. He would go further than that; he would place an embargo upon the food products of this country, and not allow them to go overseas. The hon. member for Laprairie is in this position: He refuses to allow, or, if he had the power, would refuse to allow, our men to go across and take part in this war, and he would punish those who have gone over by denying them even the means of keeping soul and body together. He would actually starve those who have gone to the front. That is the position he assumed in this House during the present session. Well, the hon. member is welcome to take that position if he likes. I do not think he is doing his province any good when he takes that position. There are those in this House, sitting on the other side, who frequently throw bouquets to their leader. That is all right, I do not blame them for doing that. Occasionally we find men on this side of the House who express their admiration for the right hon. gentleman who leads the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). If it is a matter of admiring the right hon. gentleman for his personal charm, for his eloquence, for his strict attention to his duties in this House, I can certainly express my admiration for him also. But I have to stop there. When it comes to expressing my regard for him as a statesman, I say I have to stop. I cannot express admiration for a leader who denounced an annual expenditure of $38,000,000 by the Conservative Government and promised better things if put in power, yet who succeeded in the fifteen years he was in power in raising that expenditure from $38,000,000 to $122,500,000. I have no particular admiration for a party leader who pledged his word to reform the Senate, but who used that body for party purposes to block useful legislation emanating from this Government. Nor have I any particular regard or admiration for a leader who denounced protection as a thing accursed of God and man, and promised free trade, and yet for all the time he remained in power maintained that so called curse in practically the same position as it was when he assumed the reins of office. I cannot admire a leader who pledged his word to conserve the public domain of this country and who allowed his party followers to rob and steal from the public domain grazing lands, timber limits, and so on. I cannot express any great admiration for a leader who said: No coercion, so far as Manitoba was concerned, and who fastened the shackles on Alberta and Saskatchewan. Nor do I approve the course of a leader who said "hands off" one province; and would take another province by the throat, as he gave evidences of doing last session. I have no great admiration for a leader who posed as a man desiring interprovincial amity and concord, and has encouraged his compatriots to the verge of revolution. Nor do I admire a leader who said that he would not seek to open the doors of office with a bloody key, and has smiled approval on tactics which have encouraged the enemy, retarded enlistment, and were intended solely to serve party ends. That, I think, is a fair indictment of the right hon. gentleman who leads the Opposition.

A good deal has been said as to whether or not we should have an election; as to whether or not there should be an extension of the life of Parliament. Well, Sir, if there is to be no extension of Parliament, the reason for not granting an extension must be found in such events as have taken place since the last extension of Parliament was granted. The first persons we should consider in this matter are the soldiers. The British Columbia elections demonstrated the impossibility of asking the soldier to vote over in the trenches. It would be a disgrace to the Dominion of Canada if an election were held at a time when it would be impossible to poll the soldiers' vote, because if there is one person more than another who has the right to express an opinion at the next election, it is the man who has gone overseas and is to-day risking his life in this war. But to any one who follows the press, other reasons are obvious why it would be inadvisable to hold an election at the present time. Speaking from a party standpoint, I would certainly say, bring on your election. But there is something bigger than party. Perhaps hon. gentlemen have read in the papers about what took place in the city of Montreal the other night at a meeting which one of the members of this Government tried to address. Any person who brings an election on in Canada at this time is assuming a grave responsibility, for I firmly believe that the adoption of such a course would result in bitterness which would not die out during the lifetime of any man who sits within the four walls of this building. Let those who wish to assume that responsibility assume it. One cannot help being saddened, as the hon. member for Gloucester said this evening, by the spectacle presented in Montreal the other night. A minister of the Crown seeks to impress upon the audience the importance of their duty in regard to the war, and he is hooted and jeered at and howled down by young men in that audience who evidently do not wish to listen to any appeals along the lines of recruiting or enlistment. The reason for this, Mr. Speaker, is clear. The man who is responsible for the condition of affairs that exists in the province of Quebec is the right hon. gentleman who leads the Opposition. Follow the right hon. gentleman's career back as far as you wish and you will find expression after expression, statement after statement, made use of in times past by the right hon. gentleman which had a tendency to weaken regard for British institutions in certain parts of Canada. The right hon. gentleman sowed the wind, and we are reaping the whirlwind. His teachings, more than any other cause, are responsible for conditions prevailing to-day in the province of Quebec —and sad conditions they are.

Almost fifty years have passed since Confederation. There were big men in those days, though they had their differences, just as men have their differences to-day. I suppose there were some little men in those days also, but a sufficient number of men were big enough to lay aside political differences and political ambitions in order to effect a great purpose. There is a great purpose before the people of Canada to-day, which demands that public men should lay aside their differences and their aspirations, and that purpose is the winning of the war. If the men who figured in the public life of Canada in days gone by could come upon the scene to-day what would they say? They would be filled with pride to see Canada taking its place side by side with Britain and France in this great struggle for liberty. I venture to say that men of the stamp of Howe, Tupper and Tilley would not approve the attitude of the Carvells and the Kytes. I venture to say that men of the stamp of Blake and Macdonald and Mackenzie would not endorse the attitude of men like the Turriffs. And, Mr. Speaker, men like Cartier would not endorse the attitude which the right hon. leader of the Opposition has taken since the war began. These men, I say, were big enough to bury their political differences and to lay aside their aspirations in order to effect a great purpose, the Confederation of the Canadian provinces. But to-day we have men who for party and partisan reasons are risking the future of the community by encouraging a condition which has brought a part of our population almost to the verge of revolution. This is not as it should be, and I greatly deplore it. It does not matter very much whether a Tory Government remains in power or whether a Tory Government gives place to a decent Liberal Government—and I am not going to say that you could not find, if you searched diligently throughout the country, enough decent Liberals to form a Government. But, Sir, what does matter is this: it is very material to the future of this Dominion that the next Government which holds the reins of office should be in sympathy with Britain and with the British Empire, and should not be composed of the anti-British and the foreign element in Canada.

Mr. ROCH LANCTOT (Laprairie-Napierville) (translation): Mr. Speaker, (the deputy speaker, Mr. Rainville, in the chair) I followed with close attention the address just made by the honourable member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards) and it is my intention in due course to reply to what he said about me in his closing remarks.

The Opposition had some cause for surprise in this year's budget. The Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White) gave us free wheat. My only regret is that he did not go the whole way. I welcome his repentance; it is something in the right direction. Last week the Minister of Finance stated that with wheat on the free list the western farmer might secure a higher price for his wheat and the consumer purchase it at a lower cost. My honourable friend from Frontenac does not seem to share that opinion, as for me, I do think, with the Minister of Finance that free wheat will be a boon to the farmers.

My object is to discuss shortly the situation of the farmers in the East. If, on his return from Washington, the Minister of Finance announced that hay would be allowed into the United States free of duty, I should congratulate him in the name of the Eastern farmers. This year free hay would be of more consequence than free wheat, because wheat is selling very well while the price of hay is very low, there being no market for it. The Department of Agriculture at the beginning of the war had bought large quantities of hay in Quebec, but this year very few orders were placed, so that with the British market closed, we have only the American buyer to look to. If the duty of $2 per ton were taken off, it would help that much the export of hay to the neighbouring states.

I am sorry that the Minster of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster) is not in his seat at present, but I hope that some of his colleagues present will advise him to take steps to obtain free hay for Quebec and a good part of Ontario.

I am always taken aback when I hear reciprocity discussed in this House. It is true, Mr. Speaker, that the Minister of Finance admitted that free wheat would result in more money for the farmers. On the other hand, he was taking to task the right hon. Leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfred Laurier) because in 1911 the Liberals had a different policy for different localities, because, said he, you told the farmers that with reciprocity the produce of the farm would fetch a higher price and in the city constituencies the candidates told the electors that goods would fall in price. The conclusion is quite logical, both the city and the farm would be benefited. The Minister of Finance states that free wheat means money for the farmers; he must then admit that free hay would mean the same to the Eastern farmer. If now butter, cheese, vegetables, all the fruits that we do not grow in winter, eggs, etc., were on the free list, the people in the cities would be the gainers. Is it not true that right now and through the winter, Canada has imported from the United States fruits and vegetables in very large amounts and millions of boxes of eggs, on which we have to pay a duty of three cents per dozen. So with butter and cheese. If there were no duties on such products, some kind of competition would be introduced, not against the farmers, but against the speculators, against those who store up those goods to raise prices. Consequently, reciprocity with the United States in the exchange of the fruits of the soil would be of equal benefit to the country and the towns.

To me the reply of the Minister of Finance to my hon. friend from Richmond (Mr. Kyte) on this question of free wheat was no small cause of surprise. The hon. minister apparently has a deep regard for the farmer's interests; nothing better; but I think the Government might have found a different answer for my hon. friend from Richmond. According to the minister's own statement, the situation is without remedy; the Government is powerless. The responsibility, said he, rests with the Imperial Purchase Commission. I claim, Mr. Speaker, that the Government could secure what they want if they had at heart the people's interest. But it must be taken into account that the common people who are in greater need of bread than the well-to-do, are not always in touch with the Government. It is not from the people that the Government springs, but the real rulers are the big wigs, not only the ministers, but the magnates that surround them. Could not an investigation find out in a very few days the quantities of wheat piled up in elevators, how long they have been stored and the prices at which it has been bought? Then, allowing for the cost of storage, the interest on the investment and a fair profit on the cost price, the Government would have been in a position to say: we commandeer so many bushels of wheat for the people of this country.

What difference does it make whether it is the Imperial Government, the speculators or the millers who corner the wheat? The Government's first care should be the interest of the people who appoint them and I submit that it is not fair to let the people of this country suffer for the sake of the Imperial Purchase Commission. If I am rightly informed, very few goods are shipped overseas, because we have no ships and there lie one hundred million bushels of wheat stored up or in the hands of the growers. Why not in that case take from those speculators twenty or twenty-five million bushels at a little over cost price and have it milled in order to distribute the flour among the people at a reasonable price? The thing is as simple as a, b, c. The matter, Mr. Speaker, is where it always is: the big fellows must not be interfered with. Here is an instance: during the month of December, 1915, the Government put an embargo on Canadian wheat, prohibiting its export to the United States. They had a right to do so and I raised no objection because the big speculators cannot corner hay as they do wheat. Hay is not listed on the Exchange, as it is too bulky and cannot be stored up like wheat, and it takes too long to make millions out of it.

On the 23rd of February, 1916, in the course of my remarks on the Budget, I warned the Government that they might be right in placing an embargo on hay provided they took over the supply of No. 1 hay from the farmers of the province of Quebec and elsewhere, otherwise the embargo was ill-advised. You know the facts, Mr. Speaker, and at the time you yourself inquired as to the quantity of hay purchasable. I told you then that there were 55,000 tons of hay ready for shipping in the Maritime Provinces and all the way to lake Superior, and the Government required 100,000 tons. I further stated that in my constituency and elsewhere there would be some hay left over from last year when the new crop was ready for the market. Have my calculations turned out true or wrong?

[Mr. Lanctot.]

Many members could find out from their electors that my statement is correct. The embargo was mainfained until June, 1916. The Government, apparently aware of their mistake, raised the embargo but for a few weeks only.

What was the effect of the embargo on the hay dealers? They lost large amounts; the time being limited, they exported too heavily to the United States. Hay is not like ordinary merchandise; the farmers must empty their barns to make room for the new crop. So with the dealers; their sales and consignments to the United States were too heavy and, as a result, they lost $50 to $75 on every carload. Many kept their hay, and it brings $10 a ton to-day. And all that time, Mr. Speaker, our Government was buying hay from the United States. They paid no heed to the suggestion I had made on the 23rd of February, 1916, but went to Ohio, Michigan and New-York State for hay for which they paid $20 a ton, although it was nothing but culled hay, that would have fetched barely $12 in New York and Boston or, I dare say, on any other American market. Hay sells well in the United States provided it is of good quality. The hay dealers of Ohio and Michigan arranged to sell to Canadian dealers who resold to the Government at a profit of $5 a ton. I state without hesitation that profits were made amounting from $100,000 to $125,000 to the detriment of the Canadian farmer who was debarred by the embargo from shipping to the United States.

Now, Mr. Speaker, all this talk by Government supporters, about the country's prosperity being greater than ever before comes to me as a surprise. Let us investigate the facts. For instance, the Minister of Finance heralded that $134,000,000 were collected in customs duties from the people of this country. Does that indicate that we have been buying more than before the war? I think not: an imported article valued at say $40 in pre-war days and paying 30 per cent duty brought into the treasury $12; that same article is now valued at $80, $90 or $100, so that the same duty of 30 per cent increases the revenue by $30 instead of $12 with the additional 7½ per cent war tax; thus three times more duty is paid on the same article than was paid some years ago.

Shall we quote the high price of living, which has doubled or trebled, as proof of the country's prosperity?

Again, the manufacture of steel for war munitions has greatly increased the total production, but that, I think, will end with the war. As a farmer and a business man, I claim that in our estimate of the country's business, we should not take into account our output of shells and munitions and other things necessary for our soldiers, the cannon fodder, as they were labelled in 1910-1911. When the war is over, the Minister of Finance and the Government supporters will find it impossible to boast throughout the country about the country's prosperity. The people see through the misleading statements made by the Minister of Finance and spread broadcast about the country.

Now for my hon. friend from Frontenac (M. Edwards), who saw fit to compare the liberal Government in 1896 with the present regime. It was terrible to have such a man as the Right hon. leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) at the helm for fifteen long years, from 1896 to 1911. Let us see. What was the national debt at the advent of the Liberal party in 1896? The net debt amounted to $258,000,000 and on the 21st of August 1911, it had increased to $318,000,000; in 1896 the gross indebtedness was $362,000,000 increasing to $474,000,000 on the 21st of October, 1911; so that during fifteen and one-half years of Liberal rule the net debt has increased by $60,000,000 and the gross indebtedness by $112,000,000. Will you call that extravagance? If so, it is far less than under the present Government, with a great deal more to show in development of the country. From 1878 to 1896, Canada remained at a standstill, while it made gigantic strides from 1896 to 1911, with no expenditure for military purposes. Hon. gentlemen opposite blame the war for their enormous Budget and claim all the credit for an increased revenue.

Suppose a farmer lives on his farm for twenty years, working every bit of it, ploughing it, harrowing it, weeding it carefully and then sells it, the purchaser is bound to reap good crops for some years to come; but if now the owner does not work the farm properly, the crops will fall off. Hon. gentlemen talk incessantly about the country's prosperity and a buoyant revenue; why not show alongside the increase in the expenditure? I will say openly that expenses cannot but increase with a minister in the cabinet like Robert Rogers who wherever he has been has squandered the public money. As one instance, look at the public works undertaken in the county of Laprairie, which had to be rebuilt three or four times. Were they intended to benefit the people? No, but to get votes. It is useless for hon. members to attempt to inspire faith in the present Government; our farmers are fully alive to what is going on here at Ottawa.

Now, in what position do we stand to-day? Last year, I predicted for this year a net indebtness of $850,000,000 and a gross indebtedness of $1,200,000,000. I fell short of the truth; the Minister of Finance puts the present figures at $900,000,000 and $1,365,000,000 respectively; and predicts for the end of the present fiscal year an increase in each case to $1,300,000,000 and $1,700,000,000 to $1,800,000,000. Who dare talk of prosperity when the expenditure exceeds three or four times our revenue?

You, Mr. Speaker, represent as I do a farming constituency; could you convince a farmer of Chambly-Verchères that a man is more prosperous when he borrows money than otherwise. Will you get a serious man to believe all the stuff that is meted out in newspapers such as " La Presse " and " La Patrie " of Montreal, papers paid by the Government to deceive the people? Do you think the electors are not better informed? At any rate those in my constituency know better and I take care that they be informed as to what is being done at Ottawa. With another year of war—I fear that unfortunately, it may last longer than we wish —what will our debt amount to? The people have a right to know the whole truth. I have no hesitation to state, knowing that I am stating to the House and to my electors what is true, that after the war the national debt will amount to not less than three billions of dollars. Are the munitions of war included in the figures given out by the Minister of Finance last week? Shall we not have to settle with the Imperial Government after the war? If I am rightly informed, there is an agreement whereby the Canadian Government will reimburse to the Imperial authorities for the upkeep of the Canadian soldiers an amount equivalent to six shillings per unit per day. In that case, how many millions shall we have to hand over to the Imperial Government after the war? To this expenditure, which will fill the people with dismay, add the cost of expropriating the railways for, according to the report of the commissioners tabled a few days ago, they are mostly all bankrupt and sooner or later the Government will have to take them over. No small sum to add to our Budget. It were better for the Government to rent the roads at one dollar a year for a period of twenty years or more and put at the head a capable manager like Shaughnessy and run the roads at reasonable rates. In any case, I do not blame the Government for taking steps to take over our railways as they will be an asset on account of the great development which is bound to come to the country after the war.

My hon. friend from Châteauguay (Mr. Morris) had a fling at me, when he made his little speech to the House, last week. He referred to a meeting I adressed at St. Rémi. The hon. member from Châteauguay would not say that it was held behind closed doors. However, Mr. Speaker, I do admit that I held a public meeting at St. Rémi, that Armand Lavergne and Tancrède Marcil were among the speakers, that the meeting was a success, although it had not been advertised in the big Montreal papers. They refused to advertise the meeting and yet we had present from three to four thousand people, while my hon. friend from Châteauguay, with all the daily press behind him, and a minister of the Crown to help, could not gather more than some 150 people. He stated that we made nationalist addresses. For my part, what I said at St. Rémi and elsewhere in my constituency is what I say in this House. I declared to the meeting that it is my wish to keep the electors informed of what is going on right here, at Ottawa, and that it were better if they knew the politicians as I know them. I stated distinctly that my personal opinion was that it was a mistake on our part to send so many troops overseas when the great newspapers of London themselves stated that it was an act of folly on our part.

I repeated that everywhere. I feel like paying a visit to my hon. friend's constituency during the summer and I should appreciate it if he would discuss this subject with me before his electors. I wish to discuss nationalism with him. How dare he say that nationalists are bad company? Does he forget what an ardent nationalist he was in 1911 and how he begged for the support of the leaders of that party? Let me read what Tancrède Marcil published, in his paper about my hon. friend from Chateauguay on the 3rd of May, 1917: You will find this interesting reading, Mr. Speaker:

> Mr. Morris, member for Châteauguay saw fit, Tuesday evening, in the House of Commons, to launch an attack upon Mr. Roch Lanctôt, member for Laprairie, because he had invited Mr. Armand Lavergne and Mr. Tancrède Marcil to give addresses at his meeting.
> Mr. Morris took occasion to make an onslaught on the nationalists. A short time before the elections of 1911, that same man Morris prayed to me on bended knees to allow him to speak from the same platform as myself, one Sunday when I was addressing a meeting in his constituency.
>
>
> At that time he found the nationalist creed quite palatable and he struck at Great Britain and the Laurier navy with all his might. He was then paving the way for his candidature.
>
> And now that same man Morris, who is perfectly stupid and whose face reminds one of the tombstones he sells, is intent on attacking us.
>
> That same man Morris is in my estimation the prototype of the Irish immigrant who has been kicked so often and so well by the English in Ireland, that his brains are besmirched with something that should remain lower down, and who nevertheless is always croaking like a windmill.
>
> How humiliating for a constituency that bears the historic name of Châteauguay to be represented by a fanatic of the Morris type...
> (Signed) Tancrède Marcil.

Now, Mr. Speaker, in 1911, there was another nationalist going around with my hon. friend from Chateauguay. At a meeting at St. Urbain, the present Secretary of State (Mr. Patenaude) sat on the same platform; and in 1911, Mr. Patenaude attacked vigourously Great Britain and the Laurier navy. To day Mr. Morris thinks it scandalous for another Canadian to be seen in the company of these same nationalists. Do you think he is right, Mr. Speaker? Let me just state where I stand. I say I deem it a great honour to be able to take my place before the electors on the same platform as, for instance, Mr. Paul Emile Lamarche, who resigned his seat in the House to keep his word to his constituents who had elected him for five years only. He refused to be a party to the unlawful cohabitation that is witnessed in this House. Messrs. Lamarche, Marcil and Armand Lavergne took a logical stand.

I did not invite Armand Lavergne to come into my consituency. Here is how it all happened: During the month of February, 1916, I went to Quebec for some business connected with certain roads in my county. While there, Armand Lavergne came over to me and shook hands, "Lanctôt", said he, "I congratulate you on the stand you are taking in the House concerning the War."

"Why do you not invite me to address some meetings in your county? There is a minister of the Crown, I could show up."

"Show up a minister", said I; "I never witnessed the operation; it would be just the thing for me. My dear Lavergne," I added, "you often come into my county, you know the way, come when you please".

Then I saw the Secretary of State ramble in the vicinity of my constituency accompanied by a little lawyer from Montreal, by the name of Chassé, telling the people the fine deeds of the Government and belching out all kinds of insults against the Liberals;

so I said to myself: "I'll get Lavergne and Marcil and won't think it a crime."

Perhaps my hon. friend from Frontenac (Mr. Edwards) was referring to that incident when he stated this evening that I was opposed to our taking part in the war. I never was opposed, Mr. Speaker, to Canada's participation in the war; I was in favour of it, but provided it were kept within bounds. Is there a man of common sense who will contend that there is such an urgent need for recruits that we are justified in paying as high as $9,500 for a soldier? Do you believe, Mr. Speaker, that the people of Quebec do not know more about business? The hon. member for Frontenac complained of the poor hearing given in Montreal to the Postmaster-General (Mr. Blondin), who is a minister no more although he draws the salary of the position. How could it be otherwise when one remembers his pre-war utterances? After such statements as he made and the salary he receives, do you think it fair, Mr. Speaker, that he should get $9,500 when the common private in the trenches receives only $1.10 per day? And in Ontario the Orange Sentinal, the News and my hon. friend from Frontenac will dare say that Laurier is responsible for the upheaval against Blondin in Montreal? In bygone days the cry used to be: "It is Papineau's fault."

Mr. Blondin left Ottawa to breathe the air of liberty; the flag he meant to wave was full of bullet holes; he went to Le Monument National to patch up his flag; he got a poor reception. But whoever sins must expiate. However, the subject may now well be dismissed.

Mr. Speaker, there is one hon. gentleman in whom I take special interest but who is never in his seat, the Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty). Some time ago I put a question on the Order paper asking how much the hon. gentleman had received since 1908, both his member's salary and his judge's pension. I well understand the uneasiness of the Government at the question and its shamefaced hesitation to reply. As I am not overbashful I shall reply to my own question. The hon. Minister of Justice has cost the country since 1908, exactly $101,666.60, made up as follows: Retiring allowance, $46,666.60; member's indemnity from 1908 to 1911, $7,500; member's indemnity for the last five years $12,500; minister's salary (five years) $35,000. And with all this, he dares be sick. Do you know when he takes ill? When the Irish hold meetings which he cares not to attend. He then takes a trip South for his health and stays away three months. I made a slight omission, Mr. Speaker. I left out the short session of 1914, namely, five days at $20 a day, which brings the total up to $101,766.60. And all for the welfare of the Empire.

We have another Empire saviour whose case affords some interest. He is really a retired judge. He gets $8,000 a year as a retiring allowance, though he never received such a salary while in office. He is Sir Charles Peers Davidson. He was appointed a commissioner to investigate the purchases of munitions, horses and boots on behalf of the Government. He rendered good judgments favourable to the Government. When he was appointed, the Conservative press said that he was giving his services for the Empire. Let us see his method of saving the Empire.

He worked from June 7 to November 30 inclusively, not quite six months; at any rate, he was employed 169 days. I took the information from the Auditor-General's report. I added the days beginning on June 7, which gives 177 days; he was paid for 169 days.

Mr. PROULX: He worked on Sundays.

Mr. LANCTOT: Apparently. I shall call the attention of the Dominion Alliance to his case. How could he have worshipped, when he worked every Sunday during six months? Another champion of the Empire at twenty-five dollars a day. It is readily seen that he does not work for nothing.

And they wish us to believe that we have a good economical Government !

Now, Mr. Speaker, I had a few more things to say that I expected would be of interest to my honourable friend from Châteauguay; as he is not in his seat, I shall cut my remarks short. A word about recruiting. I am quite aware that to-morrow the Ontario press, headed by the Orange Sentinel and the News, will publish that the member for Laprairie has made an attack against the Empire. I deny it. The member for Laprairie is just as devoted to the Empire as those who vilify and calumniate the member for Laprairie. For many months past we are told in the press that recruiting is at a standstill throughout the country; that immense sums are spent for the sake of a few recruits enlisted here and there. A host of recruiting agents are employed. The same thing takes place in the province of Quebec; lieutenant-colonels, majors, captains and others that I forget, not being versed in military matters, are making vain efforts. On this point, I have a final suggestion to make to the Government: If you wish to have a battalion to go to the front under Lieutenant-Colonel Blondin, it is all ready. Just gather together the recruiting agents, for whom there is no further utility and as an appreciation of their work send them overseas. There is Mr. Blondin's opportunity to satisfy his desire of going to battle.

I wish to express my thanks to the House for their kind attention, especially at such a late hour of the night.

On the motion of Mr. Morrison, the debate was adjourned.

THE HIGH COMMISSIONERSHIP.

Hon. GEORGE GRAHAM: Will the Government make any statement regarding the cable despatch signed by Windermere in to-night's papers stating that the Hon. Robert Rogers is likely to return to England to assume the High Commissionership?

Hon. MARTIN BURRELL: I know nothing of the cable and I have nothing to say on the matter.

On the motion of Hon. Mr. Burrell, the House adjourned at 12.05 a.m. Wednesday.

Wednesday, May 9, 1917.

The House met at Three o'clock, the Speaker in the Chair.

QUESTIONS.

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

WET CANTEENS AT CAMPS.

*Mr. LEMIEUX:

1. Has the Government received a petition signed by 60,000 wives and mothers of Canada, belonging to the Women's Christian Temperance Union, protesting against the wet canteen being introduced at the camps?
2. If so, what action has been taken by the Government as regards same?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: A large number of petitions have been received, I think, by the House and some by the Government, protesting against the wet canteen being introduced at the camps in Canada, to which it would seem this question refers. Action was taken by the Government long ago in regard to the wet canteen in Canada, and there is nothing in this question to lead one to suppose that it refers to camps other than those in this country.

[Mr. Lanctot.]

Mr. LEMIEUX: With your leave, Mr. Speaker, might I ask my hon. friend to supplement his answer. He says that action has been taken by the Government in regard to the camps in Canada. What action is being taken with regard to the camps overseas?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I did not take it that the question referred to camps overseas, but if my hon. friend would put his question in another form I should be glad to answer it.

DIRECTOR OF RECRUITING AT FOLKESTONE.

* Mr. DEVLIN:

1. Is there a Director of Recruiting at Folkestone, England?
2. If so, when was he appointed and what amounts have been paid to him for salaries to staff and office expenditure since his appoint-
3. How many recruits were obtained for the Canadian forces through the said Director of Recruiting since his appointment?

Sir EDWARD KEMP:

1. No.

2 and 3. Answered by No. 1.

Mr. DEVLIN: With the leave of the House I desire to ask the Minister of Militia (Sir Edward Kemp) if he has thoroughly understood the question, because the answer is misleading. I do not say that the minister intended to give a misleading answer, but that is the effect of it. The question is as to the Director of Recruiting at Folkestone, England. The minister has already laid on the Table a return which shows that there was a Director of Recruiting at Folkestone, and that certain expenditure had been made up to a certain time in 1915 on account of that office. Now he informs the House that no recruits were obtained and nothing was paid. Col. Reid was the recruiting officer.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: I am not conversant with the circumstances to which my hon. friend refers. We cabled his question to Great Britain and I have given him the reply we received. I will make further inquiry on the lines indicated by the hon. gentleman's remarks, and as soon as I get the information I will impart it to him.

OSCAR GRAVEL.

Mr. BOURASSA:

1. Has Oscar Gravel of the City of Levis acted as recruiting officer in the active militia of Canada?
2. If so, what is his rank?
3. How many recruits has he obtained?
4. How long has he acted as recruiting officer?

5. What sums have been paid him for travelling expenses and for other expenses?

6. Has his wife had separation allowance?

7. If so, how much?

8. Has the said Oscar Gravel gone to the front?

9. If not, why?

Sir EDWARD KEMP:

1. No.

2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8 and 9. Answered by No. 1.

LT.-COLONEL DR. F. W. MARLOW.

* Mr. MURPHY:

1. Has the attention of the Government been drawn to an alleged interview with Lieutenant-Colonel (Dr.) F. W. Marlow, published in the Toronto World on Wednesday, the 2nd instant, as follows:—

With reference to the articles emanating from Ottawa and appearing in the press on Saturday last, it may be said that there does not appear to have been any adequate reason why the parliamentary committee on returned soldiers should have been troubled with my letter of April 11, on the subject of an overseas appointment. It was directed to the officer in charge of administration at Toronto, and I presume a copy of it was forwarded to Ottawa, though not intended for public use.

Appointment Indefinite.

The reason for the letter was that in spite of reports from Ottawa that I was to go overseas to fill an important position in the Canadian Medical Service, I had been informed that no definite appointment could be given me before proceeding there, and that I might be given rank in the Canadian Expeditionary Force which, if accepted, would place me junior to a considerable number of medical officers who have entered the service since the war began, in spite of seventeen years of service in the Army Medical Corps and my two years of administrative work in the Toronto district.

It is unusual for medical officers proceeding overseas apart from organized medical units to be granted definite appointments before arrival there, but for nearly two years the vast majority of such as have gone over were newly appointed in the service and have gone over as reinforcements and with rank not higher than that of captain. On the other hand, in a few cases medical practitioners with little or no military experience have received definite appointments and high rank before going over. These also would rank senior to me, as two years' service on the staff at Toronto carried no standing in the Expeditionary Force towards the maintaining of which all the efforts of the staff were directed.

Considering such circumstances, and in view of my connection with the general problems of the medical service in Canada and also because of many recent events, particularly in connection with the problem of returned soldiers, I felt it my duty to defer accepting any overseas appointment until such time as the committee on returned soldiers reported to Parliament and likely discussions of the Medical Board were concluded, and especially as the appointment offered to me was of such indefinite and obscure character that its nature could not be revealed to me.

Statements to this effect were contained in my letter and an opportunity was sought for discussing with the proper authorities the matter of an overseas appointment, but as yet such has not been granted.

Letter Made Public.

There was, so far as I can judge, nothing in the letter intimating that I had any expectation of being recalled by the Parliamentary Committee. For some reason, however, my letter was referred to them and consequently made public, with the result that the first and only reply to date came in the form of the newspaper article mentioned above, and also a letter from the chairman of the committee. Information through such channels was quite unexpected.

Having resumed my professional duties and as recent events are not likely to encourage me to accept any position at the hands of those responsible for my present relation to the service without a very careful investigation of the opportunities such position would afford for rendering useful service, I feel it my duty to "carry on" as at present and await further developments.

Meantime I shall watch with great interest the establishment of an effective plan for dealing with returned soldiers and will hope for the early inauguration of a united medical service and the emancipation of the same and the medical profession of Canada from the bondage placed upon them by laymen and politicians who deceive themselves in thinking they can get along without the doctors in dealing with medical problems or by relegating them, if called in, to a subordinate position which will not detract from the loftiness of their own altitude, in respect to matters requiring much technical knowledge, which they have never endeavoured to possess.

2. Was Lieutenant-Colonel Marlow given an appointment in the Canadian Medical Service overseas?

3. If so, what was the date thereof, and what were to be Dr. Marlow's rank and duties?

4. In the above interview, what are the names and rank of the medical practitioners referred to in the following sentence:—"On the other hand, in a few cases medical practitioners with little or no military experience have received definite appointments and high rank before going over"?

Sir EDWARD KEMP:

1. This is the first time that attention has been drawn to the alleged interview.

2. Yes. Lieut.-Col. Marlow was offered an appointment as lieutenant-colonel in the Army Medical Corps of the C. E. F. overseas, and provision was made for him to sail.

3. March 27, 1917. Dr. Marlow's rank was to be lieut.-colonel. His duties were to be allotted by the overseas military authorities on arrival, with due regard to his rank and qualifications and to the military exigencies.

4. Hospital and medical units raised in Canada for the C. E. F. are provided with a specified establishment. Officers appointed to these units perform the duties of their appointment. Other officers not appointed to a specified unit, or to the staff, are detailed to the general list and allotted by the overseas authorities to duty in accordance with their special qualifications and to the best advantage of the service.

EXPERIMENTAL FARM POTATOES.

Mr. McKENZIE:

1. Are potatoes for seed or other purposes sold at the Experimental Farm, Ottawa?
2. If so, at what price per bushel?

Mr. BURRELL:

1. Yes, a limited quantity are being sold for seed.
2. Three dollars per bushel.

HOSPITAL ON PARLIAMENT HILL.

*Mr. MURPHY:

1. Has a hospital been established on Parliament Hill in connection with the Lyall contract for the reconstruction of the Parliament Buildings?
2. If so, who have been, and who are now, the attending physicians?
3. What is their remuneration, and how much, if any, have they been paid to date?
4. Is the amount that will be expended in connection with the said hospital to form part of the cost of the new Parliament Buildings?
5. If not, how is the expenditure to be borne or provided for?
6. Are there any patients or nurses in the said hospital at present?
7. If so, how many?

TRANSCONTINENTAL RAILWAY.

REMOVAL OF RAILS FOR USE IN FRANCE.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: By your leave, Mr. Speaker, may I inquire from the Government if there is any truth in the report in the press of to-day that the Government are removing the rails from the Transcontinental railway beyond Edmonton to send them to France?

Mr. MEIGHEN: In the absence of the Acting Minister of Railways (Mr. Reid), I may say that some time ago, at the request of the English Government, some 300 miles of rails were sent over, those rails having been taken from the sidings of the Transcontinental, where they could best be spared according to the report of the Railway Commission. Subsequently, a request for another 300 miles of rails reached us. On the recommendation of the same officials these are being taken, I believe, from the Grand Trunk Pacific beyond Edmonton.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I presume there is an Order in Council authorizing this proceeding; will it be brought down?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I have no recollection of an Order in Council, but if there is one it will be brought down.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Are we left to suppose that this thing is done without authority either of Parliament or of the Government?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Not without the authority of the Government, but I am not sure that there is a formal Order in Council.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I presume that it could not be done without the authority of the Government at least, and there must be an Order in Council.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If there is one, it will be brought down.

TECHNICAL EDUCATION.

Hon. RODOLPHE LEMIEUX (Rouville) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, action should be taken by the Government at the earliest opportunity with a view to give effect to the recommendation of the Commission on Technical Education.

He said: Last session I brought forward a similar motion, my object being to obtain from the Government a statement of its policy with regard to this very important question. I failed in my effort then, at least partly. But, as the war draws to an end—I hope—it is of the utmost urgency that the Government should now make a decision as regards the report which was placed in their hands by the commission appointed a few years ago to investigate this subject of technical education. I shall not dwell at length to-day upon this subject, because it has been pretty well exhausted in the many debates in this House in former sessions. Every one is seized of the need of a forward movement in this matter. The urgency of this question, its paramount importance, has been recognized by older countries. And, if it is urgent for older countries, it is still more urgent for a young country like Canada. Although very important strides have been made by Great Britain, France, Holland, and even by Japan, of late years, yet we must admit that it is to Germany we look as a model in this movement. A few months ago Lord Haldane spoke in England on this subject—and we know that Lord Haldane knows more about Germany than any of us in this House. He spent many years in German universities, and is a well-known authority on German education system generally. He said:

> I want to sound a warning of what is in store for us, I am more afraid of an engine for conquest in peace time which the Germans were busy preparing before the war, than I am of the 42-centimetre guns. This engine is educational. The most modern form of continuation school is extending itself over a large part of Germany, and it is planned to extend it over the whole Empire. It is a work school for imparting trade skill and general knowledge, rather than a mere book school, and it behooves us to be prepared for the shock of this competition which is coming after the war.
> Germany is training the youth of the land in special skilled trades, to outdistance competitors throughout the world.

Mr. Speaker, I say again, we must admit that Germany has led the world as regards technical education during the last half century. However, in England, and especially in Scotland, scientists and educationists have called the attention of the public to the necessity of a more perfected system of technical education. May I be permitted to quote the opinion of a famous scientist, engineer, builder and educator? I refer to J. Scott Russell who, as far back as 1869, used the following words which may apply to the conditions of to-day just as much as they applied to the conditions of England and Great Britain generally fifty or sixty years ago:

In every country—

Said Mr. Russell,

> —where technical education has taken root and had time to bear fruit I also find unquestionable proofs of the rapidity with which increased intelligence and enlarged knowledge bring increase in employment and remuneration. From my personal experience I may say that within the last twenty-five years I have seen large branches of commercial trade leave our country and plant themselves in another because the workers of the one were educated and those of the other uneducated. And I have watched nations rising into importance—

No doubt he was referring to Germany.

> —and power by education and by order, organization, and efficiency, which education bestows, and other nations lagging behind and losing their place by reason of their unwillingness to educate either the higher or lower classes of their people.

Knowledge and mental discipline alone do not constitute education. To be practical and useful to all those who must earn their livelihood, education must also afford physical dexterity with special reference to the industrial pursuits of life. That is, in a word, the object of manual training and, in the highest sense, of technical education. It contributes to the development of the country, to its increased wealth and to the perfection of its citizens. There is also, in regard to this question of technical education a moral aspect which must not be lost sight of and, in this respect, I am pleased to see before me my hon. friend the Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty) because I am sure that the statistics which are at his disposal in the department over which he presides, will enable him to corroborate what I will state here. If one will consult the labour exchanges and the labour bureaus he will learn that the unemployed are generally the unskilled labourers. In that connection let me recall that phrase of Carlyle's, "that for a man to die ignorant who has the capacity for knowledge is a tragedy." In modern society all facilities should be given to the poor man to get his manual training. I have said that generally amongst the unemployed are to be found the unskilled labourers. I think I am right in stating that criminals are generally to be found amongst the unemployed and therefore the diminution of crime would be one of the beneficial results of a better technical education. According to the criminal statistics, I am told, one-third of all criminals are totally uneducated and four-fifths are practically uneducated. From that point of view alone, it seems to me that it is the duty of the Government to see that manual training and technical education are spread as much as possible amongst the labourers so as to avoid such a condition of things as is revealed in the criminal statistics of this and other countries. From the national point of view, the protection of our political institutions demands that the industrial education of our youth be intensified so that they may carry with them our ideas of obedience to law and the principles of democratic government in the midst of the multitude of foreigners who crowd our factories and mines and perform much of our labour.

Coming back to the effect of technical education on the various industries of the country, let me say broadly that the manufacturer is aided by industrial education in the improvement of his product. His success depends on the demand for his goods at reasonable prices. His activities are regulated by the needs of his customers. They ask generally for durability of material, attractiveness of design, excellence of workmanship, and all these, Mr. Speaker, I contend, can be secured and secured only by the application of technical knowledge and manual training.

Let me say, en passant, that on various occasions the Manufacturers Association of Canada, a very powerful body, has passed resolutions asking the Governments, both Federal and Provincial, but especially the Federal Government, to implement what has been done in the various provinces in the way of improving the system of technical education.

Having spoken of the effect of technical knowledge upon manufacturing, let me say now what, in my judgment, would be the effect on the working classes. Aside from the moral and religious education which, of course, must be paramount, the technical education of the working classes has the inevitable result of elevating their condition. Industrial education dignifies labour. If labour has a noble end and purpose, if it employs intellect, if it abundantly rewards its servants, then it is worthy to be crowned. The perfection of our manufacturing, the facilitating of commerce, the unearthing of mineral wealth, the thorough exploitation of farms, the dissemination of practical knowldege, are the ends which are being served by technical education. Whilst the various provinces have of late years been responsive to the demands made by the Manufacturers Association and by labour generally, a great deal remains to be done. I must pay homage to the great province of Ontario for the remarkable progress it has made in technical education. I am told by my friends who represent that province, that the Technical Institute of Toronto is second to none; and I know, as a matter of fact, that many years ago Nova Scotia, that little province by the sea —little in size but great by the men it has sent to Parliament and has given to Canada—has also been a pioneer in technical education. When my late colleague, the Hon. Mr. Fielding, was Prime Minister of Nova Scotia, he, by the subsidizing of a Technical Institute, gave to the progress of that province, which is so rich in mineral deposits and in coal mines especially, an impetus which will never be forgotten; and he thereby incidentally gave to the country a corps of mining engineers second to none in America.

Having spoken of Ontario and Nova Scotia and knowing something of what is being done in the Western Provinces, I can say with pride that in the province of Quebec to-day, substantial progress is being made in that direction. It is not a party question with us; the two parties, and I am pleased to say the two races and all creeds in the province of Quebec, have united in support of a splendid system of technical education. We have the Montreal Technical School, the Quebec Technical School, the Beauceville Technical School, and the Shawinigan Falls Technical School and others. We have in those schools many hundreds of students, and it is remarkable that since the beginning of the war, where in the various shell manufacturing establishments experts and instructors have been required, the men who came out of the Montreal Technical School have taken the first places. Giving my own personal experience, let me say that a year ago I met, in the county of Drummond, a young man, the son of a well-to-do farmer of St. Germain de Grantham. He was introduced to me after a religious service on Sunday by the father, who said: "My lad has just received his diploma from the Technical School in Montreal, and I wonder what I will do with him now." I said: "You have many opportunities open for him at the present time because in every shell manufactory you can find employment for your boy." He went to Montreal and got his son into the shell manufactory of Lymburner and Co. Five or six months afterwards I received a visit from the young man, and I asked him if he was satisfied with his position and he answered that he was. I asked him how much he earned a day, and he said he earned $8 per day. Because of his technical knowledge he had become instructor to the army of shell makers in that large munition plant. This is only to illustrate what immense good technical institutes in our provinces and elsewhere can accomplish.

I am quite aware that there is a standing objection against this Parliament dealing with the question of technical education. I know that under section 93 of the British North America Act education comes under exclusive provincial jurisdiction, and you are well aware, Mr. Speaker, that I generally stand for provincial rights; that I would not have this Parliament encroach on any of the subject matters which are within provincial jurisdiction. But we have a military college which, apart from purely military matters, is heavily subsidized by this Parliament. We grant subsidies, at least we did a few years ago, to exclusively provincial railway companies. We have a naval school at Halifax in your own province, Mr. Speaker. The Department of the Interior receives from this Parliament a subsidy to spread the knowledge of the metric system in Canada. This Parliament has granted to the various provinces, towards the improvement of Agriculture, the sum of, I think, $10,000,000; so that on the whole the Dominion Government could find a way, if there is a will, to co-operate with the provinces and make grants towards industrial training and technical education.

I do not know that I should not address myself more especially this afternoon to the right hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce rather than to the Minister of Labour. Perhaps the Minister of Trade and Commerce would be more responsive than my hon. friend the Minister of Labour was last year. However, I shall address myself to the Government generally and to the House.

Sir, this matter affects primarily trade and commerce. It affects our manufactured products as to their quality, quantity, and the means of transportation, and, on the whole it is a question of national concern. The Dominion Government could, therefore, without encroaching on provincial rights, co-operate with the provincial authorities and thereby help to give a better technical training to our yeomanry. I may be told that the provinces have their own revenues which they may well apply to the cause of technical education. Well, the revenues of the provinces are derived virtually—I was going to say chiefly—from Dominion subsidies, nearly $12,000,000 being transferred each year from the Dominion exchequer to the provinces. I am pleased to say that the good old province of Quebec has apart from its share of subsidies, an excellent financial standing. As hon. gentlemen can see for themselves if they look at the figures in connection with the loans recently made by the Allied Governments on the New York market, the province of Quebec is financially in splendid shape. I noticed the other day with great pleasure and great pride that one of the loans launched by Great Britain and another one by France on the New York market were to have as collateral securities the bonds of the province of Quebec, which rank as high as the bonds of the Dominion Government, if not higher. Sir, the revenues of the provinces, being derived chiefly from subsidies, are, however, somewhat strained by provincial needs, and you cannot develop a system of technical education such as we require in order to deal effectively with the problems that will arise immediately after the conclusion of the war if the matter is left entirely to the provinces. From their comparatively slender sources of revenue, the provinces have to maintain public services of great importance, such as the administration of justice, the maintenance of civil rights, the care of the public domain, roads and bridges, the organization and supervision of municipal government, and the organization, administration and support of general education.

I have said that the provinces could not very well, from their slender revenues, organize as they should the system of technical education which we dream of for this country. Dr. James W. Robertson, of Ottawa, a good Scotchman—I have a weakness for Scotchmen—in an address delivered in the month of April, 1915, made the following statement with regard to the probable expenditure that the organization of a system of technical education in Canada on a safe basis would entail:

> In making a forecast of the probable cost of maintaining an adequate system of industrial training and technical education, the Commission considered the populations and need of 566 places in Canada, besides the rural population in the counties. These 566 places, ranging from great cities like Montreal and Toronto down to incorporated villages of over 500 people, contained a total population of 2,790,000. In these urban places the number of persons between 14 and 17 years of age who were not attending any day school is estimated at 150,000 young people. The population of Canada according to the last census, outside of the 566 places already indicated, amounted to 4,400,000, of whom 237,000 are young persons between the ages of 14 and 17 not attending any school. If the proportion of attendance of these 387,000 young people could be brought up to that of many areas in England, Scotland and Ireland, no less than 213,000 of them would be continuing their education at suitable classes after they had begun to earn their living.

From that statement made by Professor Robertson, it looks as if the cost of technical education, spread throughout all those localities in Canada, would be rather high if undertaken by the provinces. I quite grant that by section 93 of the British North America Act, education is assigned exclusively to the provinces and that there is actually no dividing line between technical education and what is generally called cultural education. But surely we can do something towards stimulating the interest of our people in this subject. If I mistake not, this is the broad conclusion reached by the commissioners who were appointed a few years ago to investigate this question.

Do not forget, Mr. Speaker—the figures given the other day by the Minister of Finance prove this—that Canada is, after all, during these years of war enjoying a fictitious prosperity. The time will soon come, I hope, when we shall revert to our ordinary vocations. The problem of the aftermath, it seems to me, is one which should arouse the attention of this Parliament and I do not see how we can better help our people to grasp that problem than by doing something practical for technical education and manual training in Canada.

Thousands of soldiers will soon return to Canada. Some of them, I hope, will settle on the land; but much as I would like to see our soldiers become sturdy farmers of the West and of the East, I have not much faith in soldiers as farmers, and I am here expressing a current opinion based on past experience. There were given in this House the other evening figures in regard to the returned soldiers after the South African war, and we know what was done with the land scripts which they received. At all events, thousands of soldiers will come back to Canada; they will find that the war industries have disappeared, let us hope, for ever and ever; they will also find the old industries of the country dislocated, and it will take all the grit and all the energy and all the statesmanship of our Governments to restore pre-war industrial conditions. It seems to me that the time is now ripe for Canada to look to the future and to do something to equip our returned soldiers for the battle of life.

Last year I quoted extensively from the report of a commission appointed by the Ontario Government and presided over by Sir John Willison, and one of the chief conclusions of that report was that Canada had to do two things in order to maintain its name, its traditions, and its credit after the war: first, to capture as much trade as possible, and second, to equip for the battle of bread winning our returned soldiers and our young men by giving them a first class technical knowledge. In Great Britain the Government is quite alive to this very important issue. The question came up in the British House of Commons in 1916 on a motion by Mr. Hewins. I have already quoted what was said in that discussion by such authorities as Sir Alfred Mond and Mr. Walter Runciman, who was then President of the Board of Trade, and I wish now to quote a few sentences from the speech of Mr. Lynch. He said:

In the course of time with the development of civilization, other nations have entered into the lists as competitors, and before this war, England was being hard pressed by Germany. The foundation of the prosperity which Germany enjoyed before the war was laid generations ago. I will take the turning point, that of the advent of Wilhelm Von Humboldt to the position of Director of Public Instruction, in the year 1809. He was not a politician in the ordinary sense, but a man of very wide learning and imbued with the scientific spirit. He was called by the Prussian nation to establish a system of education, and in two years he laid the foundation of a system of education which has been the real root and source of the prosperity which Germany subsequently enjoyed. I will here point out that those in this country who occupy a position corresponding to that held by Wilhelm Von Humboldt have never been chosen as great educationists. At the present moment it would be hard for any honourable member of this House to say who is our Minister of Education, for he is suspended, like Mohamet's coffin, between Heaven and, say, the earth. The man who held this position in Germany for two years exercised such a wide influence and power that the reverberations of his efforts are felt for a century afterwards, while some of our educationists, if they had been in power a hundred years, would not have left their reverberations for a succeeding two years. For that I blame the Government.

I have read very carefully the debate on the co-operation of the Allies in the war, and the minds of the British House of Commons declared that in order to capture the trade which before the war belonged to Germany,

England would have to repeat the history of Germany in the matter of technical education.

We have discussed this question on many occasions. In 1909, one of the ablest speeches I ever heard was delivered on that very question by my hon. friend the member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie), whom I am pleased to see back in his seat after having been absent because of illness. The hon. member on that occasion delivered a most elaborate address, which had quite an effect on the House and on the country. Several hon. members took part in the debate, amongst others the right hon. the Prime Minister.

The resolution introduced by my hon. friend for South Wellington read:

> That in the opinion of this House it is advisable that a commission of inquiry be forthwith appointed to investigate the needs of Canada in respect of technical education, and to report on ways and means by which these needs may be best met.

The Minister of Labour at that time was the Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King, whose knowledge on questions of this kind is admitted by all. He also delivered a very important speech, and as a result of that debate, in the session of 1910 an appropriation was made on May 3 for the expenses of the inquiry. An Order in Council was passed, and the commissioners were appointed. Correspondence also took place between the Minister of Labour and the provincial governments, which will be found in the report. The work of the commission was very exhaustive, and is contained in a voluminous report of four volumes which deals with the question in a most exhaustive way. The commission was presided over by Professor Robertson, who is a well known authority not only in Canada but throughout the world. The commission visited 100 places in Canada, held 175 sessions, heard evidence from 1,470 witnesses, men and women, some of whom occupied foremost positions in industry, agriculture, house-keeping, and technical education generally. The commissioners also went beyond Canada and pursued their investigations in England, Scotland, Ireland, Denmark, France, Germany, Switzerland and the United States. They were given the amplest opportunity for investigation; everywhere, as they say in their report, they met with courtesy and enthusiasm. They found an increased interest in technical education. The countries which had taken the deepest interest in the matter were striving to do better still; in a word, the most advanced were the least satisfied. It is useless for me to go into the details of that report, which is in the possession of every hon. member, but it may be well that I should remind the House that the published conclusions of the commission have not yet been acted upon, and my object in rising was to ask the Government and my hon. friend the Minister of Labour what they intend to do in regard to those conclusions. When the question was under discussion in 1909 the opinion of the present Prime Minister, then leader of the Opposition, was expressed in no uncertain language. Brushing aside the objection that had been raised by some hon. members, that the Parliament of Canada could not investigate matters of education, or appropriate funds for that purpose, because, forsooth, it was a question within the jurisdiction of the provinces, he said:—

> If the position of the Minister of Labour (Mr. King) be correct the Government has been violating the constitution of Canada for 35 or 40 years in the establishment of the Military School in Kingston. But I have not heard of any province raising any objection. But the hon. minister need not stop at the Kingston military school, let him look at the estimates of this year or any year, and he will find over and over again, where the Government has spent money by the million on matters absolutely within the jurisdiction of the provincial legislatures. Does not my hon. friend know that his own estimates which he has just brought down, contain dozens of items for aid to undertakings purely local and absolutely within the jurisdiction of the local legislatures? Local works and undertakings, except in so far as they connect one province with another or some province with a country outside Canada, are purely and absolutely within provincial control, yet you can take the estimates and on page after page you will find money given by the $5,000, $10,000 and $100,000 to undertakings of that kind. The Parliament of Canada has the right to vote money for any purpose that it may deem proper. It has voted money for purposes absolutely outside Canada. For example, to aid the sufferers at San Francisco, to industrial exhibitions without our own country, subsides to provincial railways which are purely works of a local character, and under provincial jurisdiction, aid to art schools, special lectures upon the advantages of the metric system, a grant to McGill university in aid of work of this kind, schools for the examinations of masters and mates, to keep up the school at Kingston and for the establishment of experimental farms.

He concluded as follows:—

> I have thought it desirable to place this aspect of the question before the House. I say to the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) that I am entirely in sympathy with the object he has in view, and I trust action will be taken along the line he has suggested, if no other action can be taken, but so far as I am concerned I would greatly and infinitely prefer that a more definite and practical and speedy action should be taken than that which has been suggested in this resolution itself.

So the Minister of Labour and the Minister of Trade and Commerce need have no scruples, because the Prime Minister, in the speech I have just quoted, practically gave him his fiat in 1909. To recapitulate. The resolution was introduced by my hon. friend for South Wellington, and the appropriation for the commission was voted at the following session in 1910. The commissioners were appointed, and visited nine countries. They heard 1,400 witnesses in Canada, and held hundreds of sessions both in this country and outside. They published a very voluminous report in four volumes, and in their conclusions asked this Government to co-operate with the provinces in this matter. Yet the report has been shelved. Nothing has been done. We are all looking forward to the cessation of hostilities; we expect this war to end soon, and our soldiers will then be returning by the hundreds of thousands; we know that it is our duty to equip these soldiers for the battle of life; we talk about capturing the trade of other countries, especially that of enemy nations. And yet, although all these facts are well known, the Government has done nothing. My hon. friend the Minister of Labour says that the report is in his department, and that he is awaiting instructions from the various provincial governments.

It seems to me this a most urgent question, and that the Government should, once for all, take action on this report which has cost so much money and labour—though not too much, in my opinion. The Government should declare that the spread of technical skill and knowledge will be subsidized by the Dominion in co-operation with the various provinces. At page 21 of the report of the commission appears the following:

The Underlying Principles.

The Commission is of the opinion that Industrial Training and Technical Education in order to be of greatest benefit to individuals, to industrial development, to localities, to the several provinces, and to the Dominion as a whole, should be organized and maintained in accordance with the following principles:—

1. It should be under provincial control and regulation.

2. It should receive financial support from individuals, from local authorities, from provincial governments, and from the Dominion.

3. Provision should be made for active participation in its control, management and direction by individuals in the locality who would represent industries as employers and employees, agriculture, women's occupations, particularly housekeeping, business, and organized education.

4. It should provide educational opportunities for those who have gone to work and also for those who are able to return and devote their time for some months or years, as the case may be, to a course or courses of instruction and training.

5. It should make provision to ensure, as far as practicable, equality of opportunity for all preparing for industrial, agricultural and housekeeping occupations, and for workers in such occupations.

6. It should be carried on in cordial co-operation with existing systems of education, and in such a way as to have the advantage of the use of existing buildings, equipment and teaching staff so far as these may be suitable and available.

Once more, in bringing this motion to the attention of the House, I sincerely hope that the Government will not fail to decide upon such a policy in this matter as will improve the opportunities open to our own people and will also help to settle some of the gravest problems which will arise after the war.

Last winter an address was delivered by Dr. H. E. Howe, to which was given the very apt title "The German Alarm Clock." In opening, the speaker said:

However alert we may be individually, it has required the efforts of the biggest alarm clock in history to arouse us collectively to the dangers which beset us, and to the methods by which we were being placed in a subordinate position.

As I said a moment ago, that which gave Germany its trade and industrial preponderance in the world was the technical knowledge which, for almost a century, has been given to young Germans. Dr. Howe proceeds:

Prior to the war, Germany was carefully, patiently and persistently conducting a successful commercial conquest of the world. Her agents were everywhere occupying positions of low as well as high degree according to the requirements of their particular task, learning the language of the country in which they worked, making themselves familiar with market and trade conditions, and reporting constantly to the great organizations at home, in order that no detail might be overlooked in giving them a firm hold upon world markets. I am informed that German concerns were even supplying the great bulk of chains, anchors and similar equipment to the maritime country of Great Britain. Through the co-operation which existed between the government, manufacturers, and banks, German salesmen were often able to make terms of credit quite impossible with a manufacturer not having such beneficent aid.

In another paragraph he said:

I hope this gives some idea of the condition of affairs when the war first broke out in August, 1914. As soon as the German fleet disappeared from the seas the various countries suddenly awakened as if by an alarm clock to the extent of their dependence upon German products. For the first time many people began to analyse the situation to learn the cause of Germany's strong position in many lines, and

I think all have come to the conclusion that the three principal causes at least are education, organization and scientific research.

I shall not quote any more. I think I have said enough to become myself the "alarm clock" of the Minister of Labour. I want him to give the House and the country the promise that he will take down from the shelf the report of this commission and apply himself during the coming holiday to finding a solution of this question by inviting—should there be any objection from that quarter—the premiers or the Ministers of Education of the several provinces, to confer with him, and, while co-operating with them, lead in this cause of technical education in Canada.

I hope I have not kept the House too long. But I sincerely believe that this is a most acute problem, that of giving to our young men, our returned soldiers, the arms and the weapons with which during the era of peace which will succeed the era of war, Canada, through them and by them, shall take its true place amongst the progressive nations of the world.

Hon. T. W. CROTHERS (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, in almost identical words, my hon. friend from Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) has reminded us of the speech delivered in this House just a year ago, which will be found at page 2177 of last year's Hansard. My reply will be found at page 2187 of last year's Hansard. I do not propose to follow his example and take up an hour repeating what I said a year ago. I think our attitude was made fairly clear at that time and it has not materially changed since as far as I am aware. I do not know where my hon. friend got the idea that I was not very enthusiastically in favour of technical and industrial education. I do not yield to him for one moment in that respect. I realize the great advantages that would accrue from a more thorough system of technical education and industrial training than we have at the present time. I think that if my hon. friend's memory had been a little more reliable he would have had in his mind something of what I said last year. It will be found at page 2187. I am only going to read a sentence or two:

> So that it seems to me that the question before us is not whether technical education and industrial training are desirable—indeed, are of the highest national importance, and should be brought within the reach of every youth in the land—but rather how best can these advantages be placed before them. The Government is quite alive to the importance of practical as well as cultural education, and realizes that inestimable advantages would accrue to Canada had every youth an opportunity of acquiring technical education and training in the particular vocation chosen for his or her life work. Especially, I think, do we owe it to the mechanic, the artisan, and other wage earners, to provide them an opportunity to qualify themselves for larger earning power and to take a more prominent and influential place in the various activities in which our people are engaged.

That was my view on the question at that time and I have not changed it since. As my hon. friend has said, there are difficulties surrounding this question. He has told us that education, under our constitution, is exclusively assigned to the various provinces. He knows from what I said last year that when the report of the Commission on Technical Education and Industrial Training, to which he has referred, was printed and bound, it was forwarded to each of the provincial governments with a request for an expression of opinion concerning the suggestions made in that report. I think I am safe in saying that in the replies that we got there was only one provincial government in Canada that approved of the system set forth in the report. That was, if I remember aright, the province of Nova Scotia, as represented by the premier of that province. Now, I am not going into the particulars as to these objections because there they are set forth in Hansard and I do not think I would be warranted in taking up the time of the House for an hour in repeating what I said last year. An Association exists in Canada that has for its special object the encouragement of technical education and industrial training. It held a meeting in Toronto a year ago last October and this was part of a resolution passed by that association specially interested in the development of this question:

> It is necessary and expedient that financial assistance be rendered by the Dominion to the several provinces for the service of technical education, as soon as the Government is freed from the pressing problems of the present war.

The men specially interested in this question thought that no such application should be made to this Government until they had become freed from the responsibilities and expenditures of the present war. We are not free yet; the expenditures are larger than they were a year ago. A great deal has been, and is being, done by the various provinces, as my hon. friend has already stated, more perhaps by the three provinces of Ontario, Quebec, and Nova Scotia, than the others. I think that last year my hon. friend from Winnipeg (Mr. Rogers) said that we were committed to the idea of rendering financial assistance in some way or other but not at that time. That is my position to-day. I sympathize as deeply as the hon. member for Rouville can sympathize with the idea of encouraging technical education and I realise the great advantage it would be to all classes in this country if we had a more extensive, a more thorough, system of technical education and industrial training, but I do not think this is the time to take it up. I do not think we would be warranted in doing so and I can only say now that I sympathize with the idea of extending and making more thorough the system of technical education and that we will be prepared to render assistance of some sort, in some way, when the proper time comes, but in our judgment we would not be warranted in making such a large expenditure as is recommended in this report while the war is on.

Mr. A. VERVILLE (Maisonneuve): Mr. Speaker, the hon. Minister of Labour (Mr. Crothers) has repeated to this House what he said last year. Of course, he does not go over all the letters that he had last year from the different provinces, stating approval or objection to the proposals. I admit that he is right in not doing so. I notice on the Order Paper to-day that there is a Bill to be introduced for good roads. I do not know how much it is proposed to devote to this object but I suppose it will be $10,000,000. We are at war at the present time and will be at war for a long time to come. From a financial standpoint, we are going to be at war for a great many years. If we wait until the finances of the country are in an absolutely settled condition before we grant a sum of money to each province for technical education, none of us will see it, because we will not live that long. There is a generation at present growing up who are absolutely in need of technical education. Nothing is so important to-day as technical education. We have to look to the future, and it is clear that we must have greater production from our men. We hear every day in the House of the number of producers who are giving their lives in the war, millions of men. If that is so, then we are justified in saying that we will need more production from the young boys who are now ready to receive technical education. In the past we have had to go across the water to get professors and men of technical knowledge. It is unnecessary to enter into details as to the need for technical education, because that is admitted by both sides. The present Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden), when he was leader of the Opposition, acknowledged as one of the greatest lawyers in the country, said that this Parliament would be within its rights in granting aid to technical education. We are just as entitled to do that to-day when my right hon. friend is at the head of the Government. Furthermore, I do not know that there is anything in the constitution of the country which would prevent any Federal Government making grants to the provinces for such a purpose.

Without going into details of what happened in the House last year when the Good Roads Bill was under consideration, it was proven then that it would have been adopted by the House had the money been granted to the different provinces according to population. What is to prevent the Government following that plan in respect to technical education? The Minister of Labour says that according to some resolution which has been passed we should concern ourselves about technical education until we have settled our financial problems. But surely if there was a grant to each province according to its population, the association which has passed this resolution would surely be only to glad to see that it was put into operation.

The hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) has spoken of different technical schools. I happen to know something about one because I am a member of the commission having charge of the Montreal school. The difficulty which that commission has in securing the funds necessary for the administration of the school going to the city and going to the provincial government to secure money, is far beyond the imagination of many of the members of this House. We have to gather money for the war from many different sources, we are doing that to-day, and we still have to gather money for technical education. As I have said before the recommendation of the Royal Commission was that $3,000,000 should be voted for the promotion of technical education. The Minister of Labour will never make me or any other man of common sense believe that if a sum less than this was granted a province would not accept it. Let the Government show their willingness to do something to assist technical education. If we are going to wait until this Government or any other Government is in a position to settle all the financial affairs of the country, to put them on a solid footing, before dealing with technical education, we are going to make the greatest mistake of our lives in reference to the future of the country.

Mr. J. H. BURNHAM (Peterborough West): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman who has just spoken summed up the whole matter in his reference to the fact that both sides of the House were of opinion that technical education was a matter of first importance, and something that must be dealt with as soon as possible. He overlooks one matter, however, to which I expected the Minister of Labour to refer, that the Prime Minister of this country (Sir Robert Borden) was the means of having appointed, since last session, a body of experts for the purpose of looking into this matter from a purely Canadian point of view. The report which we had laid upon the table of the House last year was very voluminous, very thorough, and enabled all those who took an interest in the subject to thoroughly inform themselves. This being the case, after a required period for digestion, it was agreed upon by everybody that if Canada desired to continue doing well and intended to do better, she must take further steps. But in scientific matters it is not possible to proceed by sudden fits and starts; it is necessary to consider these things thoroughly and carefully, and they can only be properly and adequately considered by those who are thoroughly qualified to consider them. That being the idea actuating the Prime Minister, and quite properly so as I am sure we all agree, he appointed a board presided over, I think, by Professor Mackenzie of Toronto University, to look into this very matter and to suggest what ought to be done, not only to look into it theoretically but also to give practical suggestions. There can be no question that an educated people is not only a better people mechanically considered, but intellectually and morally as well. If education is the basis of our advance and of the progress of civilization, why then it goes without saying that we should furnish for our people, especially for the great mass of our people, that intelligent and comprehensive understanding of their duties which alone makes success assured and life itself really worth living.

I do not like to hear such frequent references to the captures we are going to make; this capturing of trade and capturing of other people all the time is repellent to me. Let us do our duty in the premises. Let us make ourselves better men and our country a better country, and we will have succeeded to the best of our ability and in a way that will leave us open to no criticism.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Hear, hear.

Mr. WILLIAM THOBURN (North Lanark): Mr. Speaker, I regret that I did not hear my hon. friend from Rouville this afternoon. I should have liked to have heard the course he has suggested that Parliament should take in this matter. I do not wish to say anything in reference to technical education to embarrass the Government at this particular time, because the one burning question with which we have to deal is this terrible war. But since this question has come up this afternoon, I wish to say that it is one that has puzzled me many and many a time. I have felt the need of technical education very severely in connection with the business in which I am now engaged. Just when and where to apply it puzzles me a little. May I put my difficulty this way: has our present system of education been the means of depleting the farms of agricultural help, and the factories of its mechanics? I would say candidly that it has. I shall never forget a statement made to me by a judge shortly after he had been appointed to the bench. He said that one of the most difficult things he had to contend with was the necessity of dealing with lawyers brought before him for debt. Would that not lead you to believe that our present educational system is depleting our supply of all kinds of mechanics and is over-crowding the professions? I want to give you the experience of the county in which I live. I cannot say that more than 5 per cent of the young men who went through our high school ever went back to the farms or factories. Why was this the case? It is a problem that I cannot solve. I never could understand why a high school education should not better fit a man for work on the farm, and I know very well that a high school education would better fit him to go back to the factory. But they do not go back, and that is one of the reasons why I am puzzled to know just where technical education should be applied. Whether it could be imparted in our public schools or high schools. I do not know. At any rate, it has to be applied somewhere, because at present our educational system, although it is said to be one of the finest in the world, is not supplying the farm and the factory with the help that they so much need.

Mr. D. D. McKENZIE (North Cape Breton): I have listened with interest to the speech delivered by the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat (Mr. Thoburn). It is rather difficult to follow my hon. friend's reasoning. Followed in one direction, his argument suggests that we should have no education at all; that the man who is in absolutely raw condition is the best for the country's greater needs; that if a man has no education he will stay on the farm and work in the factory. Therefore, he should be given no education, in order that he may be kept in the factory or on the farm. I am sure that that is not what the hon. gentleman means; but that would be the substance of one line of his reasoning, because he suggests that if young people are given an education, they forsake occupations and activities which must necessarily be kept up.

As to my hon. friend's difficulty with regard to when this education should be given, all I can say is that I come from a country where we do give that education, not in its highest form, of course, but in a sort of primitive way. We have, it is true, a technical college in the province of Nova Scotia, where, during the past seven or eight years, the highest forms of technical education have been given, but the technical education that is of vast importance to the steel maker, coal miner and mining engineer is given in night schools. Professors of our colleges and academies are at the head of these night schools and are furnished with the necessary appliances and machinery by the use of which they give instruction in the making of engines, the production and application of electricity and the generating of power. In these schools we have trained an army of technical miners, technical steel makers, men who can handle and apply power, such as electricity; men who understand the proper production of power from coal. All the necessary work that is done in a coal mine and in connection with the production of iron and steel is taught in these schools. I assume that the same sort of thing is being done in the province from which my hon. friend comes. We should like to be carrying on this work on a larger scale, though we have, of course, taken an advanced step by establishing a technical college. This college is working in co-operation with other educational institutions. When a young man has taken two years in Dalhousie, for instance, he gets credit for them in the technical college, and after an additional two years in the technical college he may be graduated as a mechanical, electrical or civil engineer, according to the line that he may have followed. From this plan we have obtained very practical and very useful results. I think one of the reasons why young men leave the farm, or refuse to stay in the factory, is that they are kept at unproductive and what they consider to be uninteresting work. If they were able to secure a scientific knowledge of farming, of fisheries, of work in the factory, they would find these activities more congenial and more interesting than they find them now.

I submit to the Government, and particularly to the Minister of Labour, that it is not a sufficient answer to the suggestions of the member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) to say that last year and the year before the matter was before the House and the minister refused to do anything. It is not sufficient for the minister to look back to the years in which nothing was done and say: that is my record, and I am standing by it. That should not be a satisfactory answer if the Government as a whole are anxious for progress. Technical education is as much a war measure as anything else that is done in connection with the war. We cannot have too much technical knowledge of the elements entering into the various products and manufactures by the use of which we are assisting in carrying on the war. The making of shells, the proper production of power and of everything that enters into the manufacture of shells, guns and other war necessaries, can best be carried on by men who have technical education. This being the case, even under the War Measures Act, moneys could well be applied for the encouragement of technical education in Canada.

We are wasting millions of dollars worth of property in this country from year to year because of the lack of technical education and fine tastes as to what uses can be made of our raw materials. If there is in this House a lumberman or a man who has knowledge of lumbering in some parts of this province, he will know the horrible and awful waste that occurs in our forests by reason of the fact that proper technical knowledge is not brought to bear upon lumber. Any one who knows anything about the fisheries of this country and the crude way in which we handle fish knows that although we secure millions of tons of fish and own millions of dollars worth of property connected with the fishing industry, we throw away a great deal, probably a third, of the values that can be produced from our fisheries because we really do not know how to handle fish and do not know how to deal with the by-products. Technical education along the line of teaching the people what are the by-products of fish, how to handle fish and how best to put it on the market, would make our fisheries ten times as valuable as they are to-day. I have been told that in Newfoundland, where for years they had copper mines, they are reviving them again, because it has been found that millions of dollars worth of copper were thrown away simply because the people there had not the proper appliances to deal with the copper products. Our coal mines and our steel works are in much the same condition; we are not equipped with the men nor the machinery to get the most out of these things. While we have in this country abundance of raw material, it is a sad fact that most of it goes out of the country practically in a raw state because we are not equipped for the proper handling of it, nor the handling of it in such a way as to give the maximum of employment and money to our own people. Since the war broke out we have heard a great deal about the handling of nickel in this country. It was brought out last year that our nickel leaves this country practically in its raw condition, because we have not the technical knowledge nor the machinery to put it into an advanced stage of development. As nickel is a metal that is largely used in connection with the war, is it not a duty that devolves upon the Government, and a matter that comes within the scope of technical education, to see that we are in a position to handle that valuable commodity in such a way as to keep its ownership and its production within our own lines and in the hands of our own people?

The subject of technical education is very inviting and it is one upon which a great deal can be said. As I have already said, it is not a good answer for the Government to say: We have been speaking about this matter already and we will continue to do nothing in regard to it. Even as a war measure, moneys of this country could not be better utilized than in educating our people to make the most of themselves and the most of the raw material that we have within our reach in this great country of ours.

[Mr. McKenzie.]

Mr. RICHARD BLAIN (Peel): I rise to express my approval of the question that is now before the House. This is a matter that has received the earnest consideration of more than one Government, and the conditions of the country now are such that it is calling for the help and sympathy of every class of people in Canada. My hon. friend (Mr. Lemieux) is to be complimented for bringing this question to the attention of the House and of the country, and for many years no question has come up for consideration that seems to receive such unanimous approval as the question that we are dealing with now.

It is sufficient answer, however for the Government to say that its whole effort is now connected with the war and problems that come up for consideration in connection with the war. We have noticed the progress and development of the manufacturing industries of this country and I am sure the people of Canada agree that we have made great strides in that regard. Had the manufacturing industries of Canada not been in such an advanced position, we would have been unable to cope with the great questions that have come up and it would have been absolutely impossible for our manufacturing establishments to take hold of the manufacturing of munitions and other articles required in the war. I recall when the question of manufacturing in Canada was a very heated one in the province of Ontario. A

5 p.m.

Government in power many years ago in that province allowed trees to be cut into logs in the province and then allowed them to be sent over to the United States to be cut into lumber. The question became a live issue in the Legislature in the province of Ontario, and later the Legislature agreed that such a policy was not in the best interest of the people of that province, and the result was that shipment of logs out of the country was prohibited and those handling them were required to cut the logs into lumber in the province in order to give employment to the people of Ontario. All that is along the line of progress in manufacturing, and I am pleased to say, looking over the House and having had some experience and listening to this question being discussed, that every hon. member is interested in this question, and I think almost every hon. member will agree with me and also with my hon. friend the Minister of Labour when he says that in his opinion and in the opinion of the Government, the war is of such importance that this matter can be delayed a little longer. For my part, I approve the question; I believe it is worthy of our best consideration. It is a matter that has engaged the attention of the Legislatures of the different provinces throughout the country and it is one which should receive the consideration of this House and of the people of Canada and must be dealt with by this Government in the near future.

Mr. E. M. MACDONALD (Pictou): Mr. Speaker, the House might profitably discuss this question with great seriousness and care for some time with a view of having early action taken by the Government in regard to it. One of the problems which are continually engaging the attention of the press is the question of what Canada is going to do after the war, and a great many ideas have been put forward from a great many sources as to what will be the groundwork of the prosperity and advancement which we hope will come to Canada some day. Some hon. gentlemen tell us that immigration will come here, but immigration depends to a large extent on the question whether Canada is a cheap country to live in and whether we are able to offer to those who come from other lands such inducements in regard to satisfactory conditions of life as will enable them to come to this country with the feeling that they are able to do better here than elsewhere.

There is, entirely apart from immigration, a question that intimately concerns every citizen of Canada at this time, and that is whether we are doing our full duty with reference to our institutions so that we may prepare conditions in such a way that the young men who are growing up and who have not been able to go to the war may be fitted in the best possible manner to take their place as citizens of this country, and that those who have gone and fought and who have returned may be equipped in the best possible way for pursuing satisfactory avocations which will enable them to earn a living and be of some assistance in increasing the wealth of the country. We can eliminate from the consideration of this question the elaboration of agricultural conditions, and we must approach the consideration of what is best to do in order that the industrial life of Canada in the future may be prepared for and made certain.

There is only one way of meeting future conditions, and that is by preparing for the education of the young men who are growing up to-day, and giving them the best facilities for the development of whatever ability they possess. Are we doing our best in that respect in Canada? This Parliament, as the national body, is bound to assist in every possible way, and if we are not doing our whole duty then it is well that we and the people of this country should realize it. I think the motion of my hon. friend that the time has come when we should implement the recommendations that were made by the commission three or four years ago is a very proper one, and should receive the approval of this House. This is not a matter on which the parties should divide. The Government should not hesitate for one moment in accepting the principles of my hon. friend's resolution. Either technical education is a paramount necessity, or else it is of lesser importance than other things. It may be that it is more important to build the Quebec and Saguenay railway and to make arrangements with my hon. friend for Charlevoix (Sir Rodolphe Forget) by which $8,000,000 is paid out of the treasury of this country, than to do anything for technical education, and if that is the view of the Government it is just as well that the people of this country should realize it. It may be that it is more important to this country to spend over $14,000,000, as the Government has done in the last four years on the Hudson Bay railway, in regard to which we have the report of the commissioners who investigated the general railway situation in this country, and to keep on spending $4,000,000 or $5,000,000 every year on that road, which when completed will under existing conditions only add to the seriousness of the problem that confronts the whole people of Canada, than to provide money for the development of technical education. For myself, I do not think so. Last year we spent on capital and ordinary expenditures $15,000,000 on public works in this country, and about $7,000,000 of that was spent under the Public Works Department. It is true that my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce comes to us and talks of thrift and cannyness and care in our personal expenditure, and that the Minister of Finance devotes a large portion of his time to giving homilies to the people of this country on thrift. I am not dealing particularly with that, except to point out the moral that if this country can afford to spend $7,000,000 on public works it can surely afford to spend something on preparing for the technical education of the youth and men of this country. We have seen that it is not a question of money with the Government. They have no trouble at all in raising money for certain purposes. They have placed upon the Order Paper a Highways Bill with all the expenditures it involves, and if the Bill is to be on the same lines as the one submitted to the House some years ago the Government surely need conjure up no difficulties about the expense of a technical educational scheme. If technical education is as important as hon. gentlemen concede it to be, surely it is possible for the Government to save money in one of the two avenues I have indicated to assist the provinces in the development of technical education. Last year it was objected that there would be difficulty in the way of this Government giving any aid to the provinces for technical education, because there might be a conflict of jurisdiction. It does seem to me that that argument is most far-fetched. The Minister of Agriculture some years ago brought in a Bill for the development of agricultural instruction schools in this country. A sum of $10,000,000 was set aside, and a certain proportion of that has been granted to the various provincial agricultural institutions in Canada every year. Each province has its agricultural schools and systems of education, but the Minister of Agriculture has never found the constitution going to pieces when the Federal funds were thus diverted. If that is so, upon what ground can it be urged that a similar arrangement with the provincial governments with regard to technical education would give rise to a constitutional difficulty? My hon. friend admits that technical education is a splendid thing; he has no doubt at all about its value, but for the time being he cannot do anything on account of the war. Now, I have given one or two instances where the Government notwithstanding the war have found time to devote their attention and give assistance to projects not so meritorious as the cause of technical education. It seems to me, therefore, that their time might well be employed in working out a scheme of assistance for technical education similar to the plan which the Minister of Agriculture has adopted with regard to agricultural instruction, and which he has been able to carry out without prejudice to the performance of his regular duties, and without detriment to the interests of the country.

[Mr. Macdonald.]

We hear a great deal about the necessity for increased production in this country. But increased production should not be confined to agriculture. In all those industries in which our young men are engaged, and which might be called natural industries because they are indigenous to the country and we have special facilities for their development, there should be increased production. Many of these industries provide staple products which enter into the consumption of every home in this country, and from these industries tens of thousands of our young men have gone forth to fight. Many of these men when they come back from the war will be unable to resume their former occupations, and where are we going to get the trained men to take their places except through a system of technical education? The Government very properly have taken advantage through the Hospitals Commission of the facilities existing in the various provinces for vocational training and the poor boys coming home maimed from the front are being given technical instruction so that they can earn a living in another and perhaps less onerous line of work. This, besides giving them an opportunity to lead a useful life, adds to the products of the country.

If we had not had the way prepared by the technical schools that are to be found in every province of the Dominion, where should we have been in Canada in regard to fulfilling our great duty to our young men who are debarred from returning to their former employments? In view of the conditions, what greater duty could be laid upon the country, what higher opportunity could be afforded it, than to assist, if not to the fullest extent suggested by the commission at least to some extent, in order that there may be given in each of these institutions instruction and training to fit our young people for the battle of life, and also to develop industries which will be of the greatest value to the country? One does not need to elaborate the facts which have come to us in these latter days of the marvellous development achieved by Germany under its system of technical education. That nation, though cribbed, cabined, and confined practically within its own boundaries, as the result of the naval supremacy of our Empire, yet has been able, up to this time, to maintain itself by following lines of scientific production. Mr. Hoover, who has recently returned to the United States, and has been given the task of dealing with production in that country, and who is familiar with the condition of affairs in Germany, tells us,—and the facts are enough to astonish us—that, as a result of the internal conditions of Germany they are able to supply themselves through their own productiveness for six months longer, notwithstanding that their country has been for three years encircled by hostile forces. The only reason for this condition is that they have applied science to every walk of life by means of technical education. Through this system they have reached the plain people in every part of their nation, and have enabled them to work out intelligently the scientific principles in reference to production which their investigators have discovered. What, then, is the lesson for us? We are a comparatively sparse population in this vast country, but our aim and ambition always has been that we might make in Canada those things that our people need. Are we going to give notice now to the younger men who are growing up and who have not been able to take part in the war that we are going to do nothing to fit them for the great economic struggle upon which this country must enter in the time of keen competition that is likely to come when the war is over? Or shall we see to it that our coming citizens shall be equipped to be efficient members of the working force of a nation within the Empire in competition with the rest of the world?

In view of these considerations, I say that the duty which my hon. friend from Rouville urges upon this House and this Government is one of such character that we might well refrain from expenditures, such as those to which I have alluded--expenditures which, if this were the time to discuss them in detail, I could prove to be unnecessary at this time--and devote ourselves energetically to the work of equipping the men of the next generation, those who within the next twenty years will have the destinies of Canada in their charge. We are told that the Government has appointed a commission of experts to inquire into the best lines of industry for our people to engage in. But that commission has practically only got under way. The practical value of any recommendations that they may make will depend upon having the skilled workers to carry those recommendations into effect. If in a year from now we are still discussing this question, we shall face it under greater obligations in the way of increased public debt and so with greater difficulties before us. If this committee of experts is to report within a reasonable time, why should not we prepare the men by technical training so that they may be ready to put into effect by actual production and in the quickest time those recommendations which we hope will be made as to lines to be followed for Canada's industrial development? I venture to say that there is no question which, among thoughtful people, interested in Canada's future, is regarded as of greater importance than that submitted by my hon. friend (Mr. Lemieux). Members of this Government must have heard from men who have given thought to this question as to its importance, and the vital, imperious necessity for action. As they are guardians of the public interest, and guides of the destinies of the country in this crucial time, I submit, the Government will fail in their duty unless they provide at the earliest possible moment financial assistance for technical education; this they can give without unduly burdening the public by simply putting off such expenditures as those. In this way we shall in some measure prepare for the conditions which will face us when the war is over.

Mr. CLARENCE JAMESON (Digby): I shall only detain the House a moment. I am sorry that the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) thought it well to import what might be regarded as a slightly partisan tone into a purely economic discussion. This question of technical education was brought before this House eight years ago. I do not think there is any question in the mind of any hon. member that technical education in some measure at least lies within the power of this Parliament. This question is as to what we are going to do. Eight years have elapsed and I think it is now time that some action should be taken.

As an illustration of need for action, I met the other day the head of a large industrial concern in this country and he told me that some short time ago he had required an efficiency expert for his business; being unable to get one in Canada, he had to go to the United States, where he found a former Canadian who had secured his technical training in that country and who was most efficient in his special line. To talk of not being able to afford the expenditure which would be involved in taking the necessary steps to put into effect technical education in this country on a broad and liberal plan, is not, I think, a proper view to take. I do not think that a few million dollars expended for such a purpose should be considered at all when compared with the value of the return which this country, and the generation which is now growing up, will derive from the investment. We are asked to wait—to wait until the war is over. Mr. Speaker, opportunity and time do not wait and opportunity and time are now with us. I do not think this is a case in which we should wait. I do not think we are doing our duty if we do wait. We did not prepare for this war; we could not prepare for it because we did not foresee it but, in the name of Heaven, let us prepare for the peace which we hope and believe is soon coming.

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE FOSTER (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I do not suppose there is a member on either side of the House who would controvert the view now very widely acquiesced in, that scientific education, technical education and manual training are necessities of the age. Then if they are necessities of the age, they are certainly necessities for young and growing countries like ours which have to arm themselves in every possible way for the keen contest of competition which lies before them, the extension of trade and the development of resources. We are not to-day ranging ourselves on opposite sides as regards the necessity for this kind of education, and the benefits that will arise therefrom. We are not controverting the principle therefore, should we take a little different position from that of my hon. friend (Mr. Lemieux) who moved this resolution. The resolution is:

That confines action of the Government to that one particular channel, which has been hewn out by the commission of experts which was appointed to investigate and which gave a very thorough investigation to the question, taking a wide range of countries and a wide range of experience, and embodying within the report a vast deal of most useful and practical information. But no matter how gifted that commission may have been, no matter how wide the investigation it may have carried on, we cannot assent to the proposition that all wisdom lies with any selected set of men. They have embodied in their report, as the result of their investigation, an immense amount of the most useful information, and then they set themselves to make recommendations as to the methods which shall be employed, or the channels along which the assistance to be given shall flow. There arises an opportunity for honest difference of opinion. The Government after it has thoroughly considered the report and availed itself of the information they have gathered, may agree with many things that the commission recommend, or on the other hand, it may disagree with certain others. If we pass this motion as it has been placed before us by my hon. friend from Rouville, there is no latitude given to the Government for the exercise of its own judgment in reference to the methods to be adopted or the assistance to be given. We are tied down absolutely to give effect to all the recommendations of the Commission on Technical Education. That is why we, or why I, myself, in speaking on this matter, take an opposite view to that taken by my hon. friend.

No man, on this side of the House, has raised a voice against the necessity for, or the advantage of, technical education and manual training in this country. I am not going to take up the time of the House in speaking on the reasons for this, for I think we have passed the stage when argument is required in support of that principle. It is a question now as to how it shall be done, as to when it is to be undertaken, and as to how much assistance shall be given. We must not shut our eyes to two facts bearing upon this subject. One is that technical education and manual training are as much, if not more, the function of the provincial parliaments as they are of this parliament. By the Act of Confederation, the provinces were given the controlling power over education; but that has not been held to preclude the Dominion Parliament assisting them along this and other lines of education. The provinces themselves, I have always contended, and I think so yet, have the major interest in this matter of technical education and manual training, and provincial effort has not been altogether wanting in this respect. We find throughout this Dominion that provincial, local and municipal authorities have in later years taken hold of this question and have advanced it very materially. In Toronto one of the finest temples of technical education and manual training to be found in any country has been erected by the civic authorities, and it is now in full operation and doing most excellent work not only for the citizens of Toronto, but for others who may take advantage of its facilities.

I know of my own knowledge that in the province of Nova Scotia very effective steps have been taken towards the promotion of technical education and manual training in different parts of the province. In Halifax there is a notable instance of the activities which are going on. The theory, I think, is a tenable one: that the provinces have the prime interest; but the Dominion is also deeply interested through several departments of its Government. Trade and commerce depend upon the development of the resources and the production of the country, and so the branch of the Dominion administration over which I have the honour to preside has a very keen interest in the prosecution of this education. The Department of Labour also has an interest in the subject. Technical education and manual training undoubtedly affect production and commerce, but they have an even greater influence upon the character and prospects of the labouring men, particularly artisans, of the country. That is why the Minister of Labour has an interest in this matter. In the Department of Agriculture the same thing applies. The Department of Agriculture, in its desire for intelligent, scientific productivity—and I think we have long since passed the stage of thinking that agricultural productivity can be carried on in any adequate way unless you get down to the scientific principles which underlie it and have worked them out in the development of your agriculture—is also keenly interested in this subject. These are the reasons why different departments of the Dominion Government have a live interest in this matter, and why Dominion aid and the sustenance and support of this Parliament ought to be given to technical education.

Technical education and manual training looked at as instrumentalities towards better production and better development of our resources, and consequently the making of wealth in this development and production, is a fine thing and worthy of the support of provincial and Dominion Governments. But there is another phase which to me seems to be as important, if not more important, and that is the effect of technical education and manual training upon the character and development of the men who are trained under such a system. The difference of character, the difference of stimulus, the difference of ideal, which lies between the man who works mechanically and the man who works because he understands the principle upon which he is working and is creatively and constructively carrying out his work on those principles, is as marked as the difference between the two poles. The man who simply works mechanically may do a good job, but he has dullness instead of alertness, he has lack of stimulating interest and force, and the effect upon the character, the work, the life, of the man who works from educated, scientific foundations and principles, creatively and constructively, can hardly be adequately measured. And so by the very fact of bringing the artisan, the labourer, down to the principles of his work and inducing him to work upon them constructively, technical education is a force added to the development of the country in the character of its workers and the character of the children and families of these workers.

I have no desire to prolong the debate, but I have a desire to keep the freedom of the Government in this matter. I do not think that we should be tied down to the narrow limits within which the resolution of my hon. friend does tie us. I propose that instead of taking this resolution of my hon. friend and tying our hands to a certain method which has been laid down by the commission, the Government should be allowed to retain its freedom of action, while not going one whit behind my hon. friend and the spirit of his resolution as regards the importance and the necessity of what he has advocated. I therefore move that all the words after "that" be omitted, and that the following be substituted therefor:

> In the opinion of this House the promotion of technical education and manual training is essential to the proper development of the resources of Canada and the extension of her internal and foreign commerce, and that reasonable assistance should be given thereto at the earliest practicable opportunity.

That preserves an equal stand as regards advocacy of the principle itself, and an equal adhesion to that principle, but keeps what I think it is important should be kept; it keeps to the Government freedom of action as to the lines along which it should give assistance, and it also mentions and provides for the practicable opportunity when that can be given.

I have a word to add. I am not making a plea that, because the war is on and is not finished, therefore the Government is entirely absolved from giving assistance towards technical education and manual training. If this amendment is passed, it does not preclude in its terms, the Government, when it has the opportunity, fully considering this subject, as we shall have to do when the Prime Minister and other members of the Cabinet who are not now here, return. It does not preclude in any way the giving, even at a very early period, of assistance with reference to this matter. The main point, I think, is clear to my hon. friends on both sides of the House, and that is that the purpose of my amendment is to preserve the freedom of the Government as to the methods and lines along which it may give assistance.

Hon. MARTIN BURRELL (Minister of Agriculture): The Minister of Trade and Commerce has covered the ground pretty well; I wish to say just a word or two in support of the amendment. The fact that the Government could not accept the resolution of the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) should not, I think, imply any lack of sympathy or consideration on the part of the Government for the subject of technical education. Nor would it necessarily mean that the Government would not move in that direction. The hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) said that this was a non-party question; to that I think we all cordially subscribe. He urged that it was the duty of the Government to adopt the resolution of the member for Rouville and to accept the principle therein stated. I maintain that if the amendment is carried we shall be accepting the principle of the resolution; moreover, it would not have been advisable to accept the resolution in its original phrasing. The resolution states that we should give immediate effect to the recommendation of the Commission on Technical Education.

Mr. LEMIEUX: At the earliest opportunity.

Mr. BURRELL: It states that that report should be adopted. The member for Pictou, although he wanted this resolution to be adopted in its entirety, let drop a sentence that showed the impracticability of adopting it. As a matter of fact, I remember very well that the discussion which took place in the House on this subject in 1909 was entirely on the question of industrial and manual training. I remember going over the discussion subsequently; not a single word said by any speaker during the whole course of that discussion had relation to the question, for instance, of agricultural training; yet more than half the report of the Commission on Technical Education deals with the question of agriculture. I do not say that that question is not equally important, but the recommendations of the commission did not amplify or carry out the intent of the discussion that took place in the House, which related entirely to technical education as applied to our industries. This I conceive to be the great want.

A further remark I wish to make—because it ought to be emphasized in our acceptance of the amendment instead of the resolution—is that it was specifically acceptance of the amendment instead of as stated by many of the premiers of the provinces that they accepted the Government's suggestion to appoint that commission only if its purpose was to be the gathering of information. The strongest possible argument was made on that subject by the Premier of Quebec, Sir Lomer Gouin, who said:

> We are of the opinion, my colleagues and myself, that anything pertaining to public education—whether the subject be special teaching or general teaching—belongs to the provinces exclusively, and I want to write you so, in order that there may be no misunderstanding on that point. As, on the other hand, you give me the assurance that the federal authorities, in instituting a commission of investigation, would simply do it with a view to help the provincial governments by having collected information which they would later on put at the disposal of the latter, we see no objection to the appointment of such a commission.

Later, when the commission was appointed, it was specifically stated that the report of the commission was obtained in order that it might be put at the disposal of the various provinces, who might deal with it as they saw fit. It was placed at the disposal of every province and my recollection is that not a single province has stated in definite terms to the federal Government whether they approve the adoption of that report. How, then, in the face of that fact, the resolution of the hon. member for Rouville could be accepted by this House, I cannot very well see. For instance, the report recommended an elaborate scheme for carrying out this work, involving the constitution of a Dominion development conference, a Dominion development commission, a Dominion development fund, a provincial development commission, a provincial development council, local urban industrial development boards and local rural development boards. It is quite obvious, therefore, that we should not, as the Minister of Trade and Commerce has said, bind themselves to the specific recommendations contained in that report.

One word with regard to what the hon.

member for Pictou said in reference to agriculture. It is perfectly true that we are helping agricultural education. We are doing this by recognizing the jurisdiction of the provinces and giving large grants in aid of the educational work of all the agricultural colleges in Canada. It is true that the same method might be adopted in regard to technical education, but it is quite evident that the provinces themselves—and I think the federal Government would not want to force it upon them against their wish—would not desire that this Government should lay down specific methods in regard to education, even if it were technical education.

The hon. member for Pictou laid a good deal of stress on a matter which is of great importance, and that is in respect to technical education for returned soldiers. I assume my hon. friend knows what has been done in that regard; ample provision is made under the Hospitals Commission, the various provincial Governments co-operating, for the complete technical education of any of our boys who come back from the front—as rightly should be done. The matter of what further steps the Government might commit itself to is one that merits a certain amount of consideration. There is certainly not a member of this Government—and I am sure there is not a member of the House—who is not in hearty accord with the principle enunciated in the amendment introduced by the Minister of Trade and Commerce, and, to some extent, in the resolution of the member for Rouville. For my part, I do not see how we could accept the resolution, but I am quite sure that the whole House will be in sympathy with the amendment, which, after all, adopts the principle which my hon. friend speaks of.

Mr. MACDONALD: May I ask the hon. minister if his interpretation of the resolution anticipates action by the Government this session?

Mr. BURRELL: I do not think my hon. friend would expect me to answer that question, after what the Minister of Trade and Commerce has said with reference to the return of the Prime Minister and others of the members of the Government.

Mr. SINCLAIR: If the Government would give some assurance on that question, I would feel like supporting the amendment. If we get an assurance from the Acting Prime Minister that something will be done during the present session, I think that would be satisfactory.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I will be perfectly frank with my hon. friend. I am not the Prime Minister of this country; I am only the acting Prime Minister. The Prime Minister and two of his colleagues have been away for a couple of months; we have not had an opportunity of discussing this question lately, and I do not purpose binding myself or attempting to bind the House down to any particular course. If it is specific definiteness that my hon. friends on the other side are after, they will find as much in my resolution as they will in the resolution of my hon. friend. He asks that action be taken at the earliest opportunity. Who is to say what moment is opportune for taking action? The Government, of course. I think my amendment is a little more specific, more practical and less academic than the resolution of my hon. friend. I bring it down to "the earliest practical opportunity," and I have already stated that that does not preclude the possibility of its being done this session.

Mr. MACDONALD: The earliest opportunity meant during this session.

At six o'clock, the House took recess.

After Recess.

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): Just before six o'clock I endeavoured to extract a promise from my hon. friend (Sir George Foster) who leads the House, that some action would be taken on this important matter during the present session. I am not sure that I caught what he said. He addressed honeyed words to the House which probably meant that he fully intends to take some action. I think it would be in the public interest that he should do so, for the delay has been altogether too long. I have had the honour of a seat in this House for twelve years, and I think that nearly every year during that time this question of technical education has been before the House in some form or another. It became an urgent question with the last Administration and was pressed upon them by supporters who felt an interest in it. The result was that some time before they went out of office they appointed a Royal Commission on the subject, which commission has done honest and useful work. We have had in this country many Royal Commissions—as my hon. friends will agree, they have been as thick as blackberries in autumn. But many of them have not been productive of great results. This one, however, is an exception. The Royal Commission dealing with the question of technical education has done splendid work and has brought in a report that has been recognized by every one in this country as a very able document. I do not say that this Government should adopt everything that the Royal Commission has proposed. Nor would the resolution proposed by my hon. friend from Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) make that necessary. It is rather a technical view to take of the resolution to say that if it is adopted there is only one course for the Government, and that is to carry out all the proposals of the commission. The Government, of course, would be free to adopt a policy and that is what we want—we want action in this matter. Prior to the war, one excuse or another was given for doing nothing, and last year the Minister of Labour, as I recollect it, gave the war as the excuse. He spoke of difficulties on account of the revenue. I do not regard that as an answer. The Government have been free with the country's money in many other directions. Not later than last year we voted a very large sum—some $6,000,000—to the extension of the Quebec and Saguenay railway. I am not saying whether that enterprise is a proper one or not, but in importance it does not compare with technical education. I might mention also the Hudson's Bay Railway, on which we have already spent $17,000,000. Yet that enterprise is not urgent compared with technical education. It is evidently not a question of funds that is troubling the Administration. Besides, I do not think that much money would be needed for some time. I presume that a policy something like that which is carried out in the United States could be adopted here. The state is required to equip a technical school before any assistance is given by the Federal Government. Probably years would pass before some provinces would be able to claim a grant made with those conditions. So, the question of providing a large sum of money at once does not enter into the problem. I know my hon. friend will agree with me that as a war measure this resolution is particularly important. It is admitted by everybody that, next to winning the war, the greatest question before the people of Canada to-day is the development of the country's natural resources we must have trained men; captains of industry are what we want in this country, and we have splendid raw material from which to make them if we give our boys and young men a chance to learn the duties of such leaders. The manufacturers themselves have recognized this, and some have taken practical steps to meet the situation. The town in which I live is the headquarters of the Nova Scotia Steel and Coal Company. That company encourages its boys to attend the local technical school, and even goes so far as to say to a boy: If you will put in so many nights in a week in that school, it will count on your working time, and you will be paid for it as an apprentice. The boys get through their apprenticeship earlier by attending technical schools. I suppose the same method is followed in other places. This shows the great importance that the manufacturers themselves attach to technical education. I shall not weary the House by dwelling on that, because every one admits that this matter is of vital importance to the people of this country. Both sides have agreed that it should be taken up, and the only question that remains is as to when a start should be made. I can see no reason myself why there should have been such a long delay. While my hon. friend may not be able to tell us to-night, without consulting his colleagues, that he will bring down an estimate this session for the development of technical education, if he will say that he will recommend such an appropriation to his colleagues and will use his great influence at the council table, I shall be satisfied, and I have no doubt that he will be successful. But I am very loth to part with him on this occasion without something definite because we do not want to have to go home and tell our constituents that the question of technical education has been brought up in the House again, and again postponed to a more convenient season. I think that is all I have to say. I am heartily in sympathy with the movement. I felt at first that if my hon. friend did not agree to a prompt step being taken it might be necessary to move to strike out the last words of the amendment and substitute therefor "during the present session of Parliament." But I do not wish to divide the House on this question, as we are all agreed on the general principle. I trust that my hon. friend will give us some more definite assurance than he has given us yet, that something will be done this session in this direction.

Mr. H. BOULAY (Rimouski) (translation): Mr. Speaker, I feel like congratulating the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) for the courage and the extraordinary steadfastness of purpose he displays on all occasions, as well as for his activity at every session; his example should be followed by all the members of this House.

I have always taken a great interest in education, and I think the present question, should draw, at this time especially, the attention of the whole country. More than ever before, should we all realize the great necessity of education as an asset in life. The idea should be spread throughout the length and breadth of this country, and no more ought we to hear in some remote parts that the people should refrain from electing educated men as school trustees because forsooth they know too much. Those ratepayers may be of the same mind as the judge of whom a member from the province of Ontario spoke this afternoon. This colleague went almost to the length of stating that he had heard the judge in question say that all members of the Bar were thieves. In that case, if that be true, I thank Heaven that I never was minded to become a lawyer.

To return to the point, I examined to some extent the report of the commissioners who investigated the question of technical education. It is so voluminous that I have not yet been able to go through the whole of it. But from what I heard this afternoon from speakers on both sides of the House, the commission has made practical suggestions which may help us to develop a system of technical education. After being elected to a seat in this House, I made inquiries from the heads of the various departments and was informed that in many instances men had to be brought from outside countries to fill positions that required technical ability. I was both surprised and grieved that in this country we had to seek elsewhere for men that we should be able to educate ourselves. That explains why I was impelled after the outbreak of the war to call the attention of the House to the fact that there were Germans in our Civil Service.

Hon. Mr. LEMIEUX (translation): Hear, hear!

Mr. BOULAY (translation): I contend that in our educational institutions, where men are prepared for scientific pursuits, less time should be given to the study of the Greek and Latin authors and more to science proper.

All the members, those at least who have taken part in this debate, agree upon the necessity of our taking some action along the lines proposed by the hon. member for Rouville. At the same time it was suggested that it might be better for the present to devote our efforts to the objects of the war and postpone until after the war the question raised by this resolution.

On that account I believe the amendment of the Minister of Trade and Commerce should be adopted without a dissenting voice. The hon. member for Rouville himself will acknowledge, from the fact that the Government willingly accepts the principle of his motion, that the amendment is timely and should be concurred in unanimously.

Mr. S. F. GLASS (East Middlesex): I was interested in this question when it was before the House last session, and I wish to say just a few words now. I have seen some of the benefits of technical education in the province of Ontario, where the Department of Agriculture has established a system of district representatives, and I am glad to know that this system is being extended to the other provinces. Seeing the benefits that have accrued to agriculture, the Dominion Government has thought it wise to give specific grants to the provinces, to be used for certain definite purposes. I have here the report for 1915 of the Ontario Department of Agriculture, by which I see that $114,000 was spent through the district representatives. I presume that that amount represents the cost to the provincial government of maintaining the representatives in the various districts. In addition to that, $20,000 was expended to encourage agriculture in schools within the province. This sum I presume came largely from the aid given by the Department of Agriculture. It seems to me that my hon. friend the Minister of Agriculture acted very wisely when he introduced his Bill to give agricultural aid to the provinces and, in connection with it, to direct, as far as possible, the expenditure of that money along lines that would be educational. I take it that the Department of Agriculture has appreciated the need of practical education as applied to agriculture and we have seen good results from the expenditure of this money. In the province of Ontario, during the short time these appropriations have been available and district representatives have been prosecuting their work, increasing interest in improved methods of agriculture has been shown by the farmers. I remember that when it was first proposed to undertake such work within the county of Middlesex, the county council, at three successive sessions, refused to accept the conditions under which a district representative might be placed in their midst because it would require a paltry appropriation of $500. I do not think it was the size of the grant that affected them at all but I believe that the farmers at that time had the impression that a district representative amongst them would be more of a nuisance than a help, that he would not be of any real value and they did not seek to encourage the movement. But, when finally it was presented to them, they adopted the principle and asked the Government of Ontario to place a representative there. It was soon found that the demands on that representative's time were so great amongst the farmers of the district that a second man had to be appointed to assist him and within two years a third man was necessary. The more the farmers avail themselves of the opportunities extended to them through the district representative the greater will be the demand for assistance of this kind. I am sorry to say that as a result of the war, possibly through enlistment of those who have been engaged in this work, although the need is as great as ever, it has been found almost impossible to get enough men properly trained and equipped to satisfy the demands of the different counties. In Middlesex to-day one man is doing the work, and he is quite unable to satisfy the demands made upon him. He can only skim over the surface of the work. But, no doubt, when the war is over and more men are trained for this work, we will find that the Government will be willing to give the farmers further help by supplying more men where needed.

In connection with technical and scientific instruction in agriculture in Ontario and the appointment of district representatives, a very important movement has taken place in the initiation of the acre profit competitions within the province. During the winter season classes are held in the high schools at which young farmers and the older ones too, if they care to attend, have the opportunity of hearing lectures on agricultural subjects by the district representatives. To encourage the movement further the Government of the province established the acre profit competitions. A significant thing in connection with these acre profit competitions is the great difference between the minimum production and the possible maximum production even amongst those who took part in the competitions. In an acre profit competition in which the crop grown was potatoes, I find that in the Muskoka district one young lad produced, in 1915, 514 bushels of potatoes at a cost to him of $42.02. With the good prices prevailing that year he was able to reap a net profit of $336.72. In Renfrew county, Percy Wright in the township, I presume of Westmeath, produced 421 bushels of potatoes at a cost of $42.09 and with a net profit of $269.81. It runs from 514 and 421 bushels down until the minimum production is reached in the county of Frontenac where 51 bushels per acre were grown by Roy Ewing of Elginburg, with a net profit of $9.87. What I wish to point out is the great difference between the possible maximum production and the minimum production. That shows that in order to secure the possible maximum production in root and other crops instead of the average production we must adopt scientific methods of cultivation and the use of proper fertilizers. Therefore, scientific farming and properly applied methods would produce a very much larger proportion of wealth to our country if information on these subjects were more generally disseminated and acted on throughout the province. In connection with these classes of instruction at the high schools five competitions in growing silage corn were held in which young lads attending these classes took part. On the five different plots the average profit was $85.56 at a time when silage corn was worth $3 a ton.

When we take the maximum under that, which reached $100.95, and the minimum, which was only $21.32, again there is an illustration of the enormous difference between the maximum and the possible. It is not necessary to elaborate along these lines. I rise to say that I shall support the amendment of the Minister of Trade and Commerce and acting Prime Minister (Sir George Foster), because I believe he is sincere in what he says, and I do not think it is said with any idea of postponing action. I believe he is fully seized with the need for as early action as possible in connection with this movement. To support and justify that opinion, I have before me a copy of a speech delivered by the Minister of Trade and Commerce on the 18th of April, 1916. He was discussing the matters that were pressing on us at that time, and referring to the activity in our industries, and as a result the large amount of our exportable products. He said:

Whilst we are glad to see the munition works doing their part in supplying the Empire with that which is necessary, whilst we are glad to have the money which comes as a sequence to the employment, yet all this is not beneficent and productive work and when it stops—yes, before it stops—well before it stops—the people of this country should be putting on their thinking caps, sizing up the situation and getting ready for the inevitable and important change that is to come. The first duty of this House and of the people of the country is simply to face that situation, to get right down before it, face it, think it out and be prepared with plans and organization as to what shall be done when the time arrives. That is the first duty of us all. In the next place, will you allow me, Mr. Speaker, to call your attention to another phase of the question, and that is: what are the practical things that can be done and to what extent are we doing these practical things?

One of the things that I think we ought to do, and we may well do, is to take stock of the situation in Canada as it will probably be when peace comes. What is it in the Dominion of Canada that we shall consume, that we shall find necessary for our daily wants? To what extent can that be produced in Canada, and to what extent must we depend upon outside countries for these supplies? First—and I am not going to labour the point, for I wish to finish my remarks by six o'clock—I think that the thing we ought to do is to sit down and take stock of the resources and of the wants of the country. And with this idea—that, knowing what we require, and knowing how much is produced by ourselves at the present time, and for how much of it we have to depend upon foreign countries, we may, in a business way, set ourselves as Canadians to the solution of the problem of our wants.

I think that in these expressions the minister at that time had in view the movement which he later put in operation for the establishment of a research department. I am pleased to say in connection with that department, and I congratulate the minister on his choice, that when it became necessary to find a chairman to preside over that commission they had to get a man born and bred in the county I have the honour to represent, the county of Middlesex. Professor MacCallum has a good reputation. He has, if I may use the phrase, made good; and I believe that the choice the minister has made will be found to be a wise one, and that much good will result from the development of this work. The minister further found that it was desirable, and I think that this was essentially part of the technical training, to arrange to train and equip men to look after our foreign commerce, to train men in languages and in the science of trade and commerce. He said:

At the present time I am contemplating the sending of a special trade commission to the United Kingdom, to France and to Italy. These will be different from our trade commissioners. I am trying to select four or five business men of Canada—men of capacity, of practical experience, to a certain extent of expert knowledge in the different lines of industry to which they are or have been attached—who will form an honorary commission.

All through the speech he made at that time there is evidence that there was in his mind a keen sense of the needs of this country along the lines of industrial development, and, in connection therewith, of technical and manual training.

The minister further said:

An attempt will be made to co-ordinate the scientific and engineering factors of Canada along the lines of research and technical requirements intimately connected with production and with distribution. I think this is of prime importance to us in Canada. There is to-day in our universities, in our colleges, in scientific societies, and in individual laboratories, excellent resources and ability for chemical research, for all that kind of research which transfers from the laboratory to the factory what is absolutely necessary for the factory at this time, and what will be more necessary for the factory when the period of unexampled competition comes within three or four or five years from now. Science, knowledge, and information are as essential to a well-ordered and successful business as they are to the profession of the doctor or the engineer or any scientific man. Germany's great point of vantage was that her technical and scientific instruction had advanced to such a pitch and had disseminated itself so widely that it worked itself into the very grain of Germany's production and made them the powerful competitors that they were. Britain, Canada, Australia and other countries must not merely take a leaf out of Germany's book; they must sit down before that question and solve it by bringing the aid of scientific research, of engineering capacity, of technical power and expertness into the region of the farm and the factory and the business establishment, and incorporating together those essentials which ought never afterwards to be disjoined.

Then, I think something else should be done, and should be done soon. It may be that I have been criticised for not thinking that it should have been done sooner, for I have had many statements and suggestions made to me on that score. Men have written to me and men have said to me: What is your department doing all this time? Should you not get people together, and should you not have them thinking, making plans, mobilizing for the work of the future? Now, I looked upon that in a somewhat different light from some other people. My view was that there was a time at which such an attempt would have been premature. But things have developped by the very force of necessity. The work in Canada had first to be devoted to the furnishing of munitions and war supplies. That took all the energy, and, for the time being, all the thought, all the enterprise, and all the capital, that could be got. The demand was less in normal lines, and consequently less enterprise could successfully be devoted to ordinary production.

I attended a meeting in Toronto in February last of textile manufacturers from all parts of the Dominion where textiles are manufactured. At that meeting different manufacturers spoke of the difficulty they experienced in getting properly trained men to manage the departments of the various factories. The problem was before them just as it is before the House now of properly training and equipping men to take charge of the different branches or departments of their factories. They proposed that textile institutes should be established in different sections in proximity to the factories. The idea was that the country should be divided into sections and that textile institutes should be established, not in each factory town, but at convenient central points. It occurred to me then, and I am still of the same opinion, that in such a case as that, some action might be taken by this Parliament similar to that of the Minister of Agriculture in appropriating a sum to help the agricultural industry.

In the city of London, Ontario, we have just completed a technical school which will cost about a quarter of a million dollars, and as a result of the development of technical education in that city the cost of education has increased to such an extent now that the school taxes of the city amount to 33⅓ per cent of the total taxation.

I fully appreciate the fact that the matter of education is left entirely to the provinces, but I argue that, as we have found a means of assisting the provinces in the matter of agriculture, arrangements might be made, before a general programme of technical education is provided, to assist such organization, for instance, as the textile industry in Canada. The Minister of Agriculture has evinced much interest in the flax industry, and has given it much assistance. I rather think that the Department of Agriculture might even assist the Flax Growers' Association and help them to secure an increased interest in the production of flax. In most of the provinces—I do not say in all, but in a number of them—technical education is a live question, but the present arrangements for carrying on technical education are largely due to local endeavour, with a certain measure of assistance from the provinces. I do not believe in the principle of granting sums to the provinces on a per capita basis; I believe aid ought to be granted by the Government in proportion to the endeavour made in the respective provinces. It would be inadvisable that any grant from the Government should cause the provinces to reduce the grants they are at present making to the local districts to which they are giving assistance, but rather to supplement them.

From what the Minister of Trade and Commerce said this afternoon, I have not the slightest doubt that this matter will occupy the attention of the Government when the Prime Minister returns. A reference to the speech delivered by the minister in April last satisfies me that the Government will give the fullest attention to the subject, and I am hopeful that as a result of their deliberations some action will be taken during the present session. I believe that it would be unwise to accept the resolution of the hon. member for Rouville as he has placed it before the House. I trust that as a result of the discussion which has taken place, my hon. friend will not deem it necessary to press his resolution. If his faith in the Minister of Trade and Commerce, who has suggested the amendment, is as great as mine, he will be satisfied that the Government is fully seized of the need for speedy action in reference to this matter and that effective aid will be given.

Hon. RODOLPHE LEMIEUX (Rouville): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with very much interest to the able speech which my right hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce has delivered on this subject. His remarks, contrasted with those made by the Minister of Labour, are very striking indeed. I must say that the Minister of Labour has not done justice to himself or to the importance of the subject which was brought to the attention of the House this afternoon. The great argument used by the Minister of Labour was that the member for Rouville had brought the question again before the House and that he had repeated this year what he said last year on the same question. The minister said that he had nothing to add to what he had said on the same question last year. I submit in all candour and honesty that this argument is not worthy of the debate which has engaged the attention of the House. It is quite possible that I repeated myself, for nothing new can be said as to the urgency of this matter. It is just as urgent and just as important this year as it was last year. The Minister of Labour has evidently forgotten that under our system of parliamentary government, reforms are brought about and progress is obtained by the repetition of arguments. Take the question of free wheat, which has been solved, if not permanently, at least for the while, by the Government. Two months ago, a year ago, two years ago, five years ago, no one on the ministerial side would have thought that free wheat would be given to the west; we are all familiar with the array of arguments which was advanced by hon. gentlemen opposite when that question was mooted in the House or on public platforms. But the Opposition and the westerners, by pounding their arguments in favour of free wheat, have succeeded in awakening my hon. friends opposite, who have practically stolen the clothes of their political opponents on this question. I am pleased to see, however, that the Minister of Trade and Commerce thoroughly understands the importance and the urgency of technical education. I was right when I said this afternoon that the question of technical education should, perhaps, come under the purview of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, rather than of the Minister of Labour. It is a question which affects trade, commerce and transportation, and in that respect should come under the Minister of Trade and Commerce. By his amendment he has clearly demonstrated that he believes in the principle of technical education—it is quite reasonable that he should believe in that principle, being an educationist of every high standing—and he believes also in the urgency of the question. The Minister of Trade and Commerce is generally imbued with good intentions. For instance, last year, in a moment, not of weakness, but of expansion, he spoke with vigour against the abuse of patronage, and his words have been repeated, much to his credit, from one end of the country to the other, but he is surrounded by gentlemen who do not seem to take as high a view of the patronage question as he does.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: On that side of the House.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I mean on my right hon. friend's side. I am afraid that his good intentions on this question of technical education will receive just about the same support from his colleagues as his good intentions on the question of patronage received last year. When this question was brought before the House last year we had the same pious promise made—not by such a pious gentleman as the Minister of Trade and Commerce—but by the Minister of Public Works, who listened to the debate and who closed it by asking the member for Rouville to drop his resolution and to accept the promise which he made on behalf of the Government that his colleagues would look into this question with a favourable eye, and that at no distant date a substantial amount would be placed in the Estimates in order to give full effect to the principle of my resolution.

Mr. CROTHERS: I am afraid my hon. friend is putting into the mouth of my colleague words that Hansard will not show that he said.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I would read from Hansard what the Minister of Public Works said, but at the moment I have not the volume here. I remember quite distinctly, not the ipsissima verba of the minister, but that he asked me to drop my motion and to accept his assurance that the Government would see to it that the question of technical education would receive full consideration at the earliest moment.

Mr. CROTHERS: The Minister of Public Works did not put it in that way.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I have not his exact words because I have not the volume of Hansard before me. I will, however, give a better authority than the Minister of Public Works. This question is not a new one before the House, and I could give my hon. friend scores of names of my Conservative friends who, when they were in Opposition, were asking the Government of the day to take immediate steps and prompt action in the matter. I have here the report of a speech delivered by a gentleman who is now removed from this sphere of activity to the Senate. I refer to Mr. Crosby who was member for Halifax. Speaking on this question in 1909, Mr. Crosby said:

> Shipbuilding has been referred to by the mover of this resolution. One of the good reasons for instituting a technical school in Nova Scotia is that we expect to have a shipbuilding plant there very shortly and we hope—because our people are very apt and quick to learn—to have men competent to take charge of the principal positions in connection with that industry.

And in 1909 he urged upon the Government of the day to vote a large sum of money so as to give technical education the proper standing it should have in the country. My hon. friend from South Toronto (Mr. Macdonell), speaking in the same debate, dismissing all the objections that were raised against a grant being given to the Government of the day, said:

Even if the Government acted upon that suggestion and issued a commission, and then chose afterwards, in accordance with the recommendations of that commission, to go further and embark on an expenditure of money for the purpose, it could still be done in conjunction and in connection with the various provinces or municipalities in different parts of Canada, whose moneys or other assets could be joined with federal assistance.

Let us now take the case of another very prominent member. I gave this afternoon the very weighty opinion of the present Prime Minister who said that he was entirely in sympathy with the object that the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) had in view, and he added:

I trust action will be taken along the line he has suggested, if no other action can be taken, but so far as I am concerned, I would greatly and infinitely prefer that a more definite and practical and speedy action should be taken than that which has been suggested in this resolution itself.

Mr. CROTHERS: You did not think so much of that opinion then as you do now.

Mr. LEMIEUX: The Minister of Labour of the day, the Hon. Mackenzie King, if I mistake not, moved in amendment, that a commission be appointed and the House voted on that amendment, and shortly afterwards, in 1910, an appropriation was inserted in the Estimates, and in the same year after the appropriation had been voted a commission was appointed and the best men in the country were 9 p.m. selected to compose it. That commission went to work in Canada and in about nine other countries, including Great Britain, the United States, France, Germany, Holland and, if I mistake not, Italy, and it reported. When the report was received, my hon. friend (Mr. Crothers) was in office and, as I stated this afternoon, instead of action being taken the report was shelved.

Mr. CROTHERS: My hon. friend is quite mistaken in saying that the report was made and shelved. The report was used as it was intended to be used when the commission was appointed. The commission was appointed expressly to gather information for the benefit of the provinces, and that information, when put in the form of a report, was sent to the provinces, and the provinces said: We do not approve it.

Mr. LEMIEUX: That is not the conclusion arrived at by the commissioners, and it shows that my hon. friend has not even read their conclusions.

[Mr. Lemieux.]

Mr. CROTHERS: My hon. friend must have misunderstood what I said. That must have been my fault in not making myself clear. I did not say anything about what the commission said. I said that the commission was appointed by my predecessor, Mr. King, solely for the purpose of gathering information for the benefit of the provincial governments. My hon. friend said that when the report was made I shelved it. I sent it out to the provinces just as Mr. King said it was intended should be done, and I asked them what they thought of it and they replied in substance that they did not approve it.

Mr. LEMIEUX: My hon. friend is simply playing upon words.

Mr. CROTHERS: No.

Mr. LEMIEUX: The commission was appointed to investigate and report, and when such a gentleman as Professor Robertson, not to speak of others, takes the trouble of preparing a report comprising four volumes with an additional volume giving recommendations, that report should receive more attention than it has received from my hon. friend. Not one of the recommendations made by the commissioners were followed by my hon. friend.

Mr. CROTHERS: Or accepted by the provinces.

Mr. LEMIEUX: What was the result of that investigation? This Government spent $150,000 on the inquiry. The principle has been approved by both parties in Parliament. It was approved by the present Prime Minister of Canada himself, as I showed from one of his own speeches this afternoon. And what has been the result? Mark my words, Mr. Speaker. We have here the Estimates of the Department of Labour for 1918, and we find "Industrial training and technical education, $1,000." One thousand dollars! That is the whole result of that long investigation. My hon. friend the Minister of Labour is willing to promote the cause of technical education to the extent of $1,000, and yet in the dying days of last session—

Mr. CROTHERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. LEMIEUX: My hon. friend may sneer. He sneered the other evening and got his answer from the other hon. member for Brantford. In the dying days of last session the Government, without consulting the rank and file of the party, came before the House with a scheme involving the expenditure of $6,000,000 to help some distressed financiers in the province of Quebec.

Mr. GRAHAM: And in Ontario.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Six million dollars to relieve a few financiers in the province of Quebec and only one thousand dollars for technical education! I do not attach much importance to the statements made this afternoon by my hon. friend the Minister of Labour, because he has not given this matter the attention he should have. His own friends this afternoon showed clearly by their speeches that they are not satisfied with his attitude on this question. They know that in spite of all the Boards of Trade, in spite of the Manufacturers' Association, and in spite of the Labour Congress, the Minister of Labour has shelved this question again. When they clamour for bread he gives them a stone, or one thousand dollars. But there are other people more alive than he is in this question. Last winter a series of addresses was delivered in Montreal before the Mining Institute, by men who are not Ministers of the Crown and are not like the Pooh-Bah of the Labour Department, but who follow intelligently the movements of the day and think of the future. At the opening meeting Mr. Cole spoke on this very question:

> Mr. Cole also said that there was a crying need in Canada for some strong, central organization to take command and organize our industries, to bring about concerted action, and to make headway against our present appalling unpreparedness. The information and the valuable men in Government departments and universities should be made more generally available for the interests of the whole country. Societies such as the institute, corporations and individuals ready to assist should gather around such a re-organized Government department or war industrial council.

Another speaker before the Institute was Professor Frank Adams, Dean of the Faculty of Science at McGill University. Speaking on the question of scientific and industrial research, he said:

> One of the most remarkable and perhaps unexpected results of the great war is that there has been in every country of the English speaking world a sudden awakening to the importance of scientific research, and a recognition of the necessity of applying it to the whole range of problems which present themselves in both war and peace.
> The reason for the awakening is quite a simple one—The Hun is at the Gate. Great Britain developed as an industrial nation long before Germany had achieved any success in this sphere of effort, and the British system of manufacturing and her industrial expansion was developed by the independent and competitive efforts of a multitude of relatively small enterprises built up on the basis of the artificer and trader, and in methods of the olden times. In the last decades, however, Germany, having realized her national existence through successful war based on study and good organization, became possessed with the idea that she could become equally successful by the application of similar methods to the more insidious warfare of industry and trade. The note of her success was, as has been said, knowledge and organization, both to a national extent. By knowledge obtained through research on a most extended scale, and by wise organization of all, her powers, she proceeded to take from the other nations one after another of the productive industries.

This Commission on Scientific and Industrial Research was created by the Minister of Trade and Commerce, who is the only member of the Cabinet, I think, who has thoroughly grasped the subject. I do not know whether in his travels he has been able to follow the work of this commission presided over by Professor McCallum, whom I know very well, but one of the matters which is engaging the attention of the commission is this very question of technical education. Professor Adams says in this same address:

> The matters on which the council has already taken action are the following:
> (1) It has drawn up and has had printed four sets of questionnaires for distribution to the following:
>
> (a) The managers and directors of Canadian industries,
>
> (b) The members of scientific, professional and technical societies,
>
> (c) The Universities of the Dominion.
>
> (d) The Government Departments both Dominion and Provincial.
>
> (2) It has advised the Government, in order to encourage research, to establish twenty studentships each having a value of $600 to $750 per annum, and several scholarships each having an annual value of $1,500 at the Universities or technical colleges of the Dominion. These will be given to men carefully selected for the promise and capacity which they have shown in the prosecution of research work.

In conclusion, Professor Adams says:

> I would remind you that the encouragement of research and the application of science to all our industries and undertakings is a great national work which must be carried forward along many lines and in many ways. The members of the Council will use their best and most strenuous efforts to secure results commensurate with the importance of the work, and they ask you one and all to aid and assist in every way in your power this great work with which the future of our Dominion is so largely bound up.

I quite agree with the conclusion of Professor Adams, and I simply ask the Government to implement the recommendations which are made by Professor Robertson and those made by the Commission for Scientific research which has lately been appointed by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster).

As to this recommendation of financial aid made by Professor Robertson, let me illustrate, for the benefit of hon. members who represent the several constituencies of Ontario, what it would mean for each of the industrial centres of that province to have the money spent according to the recommendations of the commission. In an address on "Education for Occupations," delivered in 1915, Professor Robertson said:—

The people of Ontario could draw from these funds to the extent of over a million dollars annually, besides receiving from Dominion authorities the co-operation and advisory help of highly-trained and experienced counsellors in starting new kinds of schools, as for example for textile workers—

I call the attention of my hon. friend from Middlesex East (Mr. Glass) to this:—

—and in the development of new industries. In Ontario there are thirty-nine towns and cities each with a population of over 5,000. These contain a total population of 953,896. It is estimated that within seven years after the policy was well begun there would be in these thirty-nine places about 30,000 pupils in the schools for the education for occupations of those over fourteen years of age. These towns and cities would draw from the Dominion Development Funds up to $380,000 a year.

Then he goes on to give a list of the cities and towns of Ontario and what they would draw from this Federal fund. Ottawa would receive $34,000; Kingston, $7,500; Belleville, $3,900, and so on. I wish to tell the Minister of Labour (Mr. Crothers) that his city, St. Thomas, would gain something if he were to give a little of his attention to this important question. The city of St. Thomas would receive annually out of the Federal fund $5.500.

An hon. MEMBER: What would London get?

Mr. LEMIEUX: It would get $18,500; Brantford, $9,000, and Hamilton, $32,500.

Mr. GLASS: I have not seen the report. Would the hon. gentleman please state on what basis these amounts are apportioned? Is it on the basis of population, or on the basis of expenditure by the local authorities?

Mr. LEMIEUX: Professor Robertson says:

Under the policy recommended by the Commission, there would be two Dominion Development Funds to aid technical instruction and training; one of $350,000 a year to promote prevocational training by means of experimental science, manual training, drawing, domestic science, and nature study; and the other of $3,000,000 annually to supplement local efforts in providing education for occupations for those who are past public school age.

[Mr. Lemieux.]

I am glad to see the leader of the House (Sir George Foster) take some interest in these matters. I have lost all hope that the Minister of Labour will study the question and give it due consideration. A year ago I heard an address by Mr. D'Amour, who was at the head of the commercial mission from France that visited Canada and the United States. In that address he dwelt upon this very question of technical education, showing how France had lost and how Britain had lost, against their common competitor Germany, during the last twenty-five or thirty years. I remember very well that he declared that the French Government and the British Government were aware that it is not too soon to give to technical education all the necessary aid and assistance to assure its success. And he added: "The British and the French Governments will not be taken unawares when peace comes, as they were taken unawares when war was declared." Would that not naturally be the motto of a progressive Government? I am glad to perceive by the statesmanlike remarks made this afternoon by the right hon. leader of the House (Sir George Foster) that he will give to this question the attention it deserves. Under these circumstances, and hoping—in fact being absolutely confident—that during the present session a substantial amount will be placed in the Supplementary Estimates to promote the cause of technical education, I accept the amendment of the right hon. gentleman.

Amendment agreed to.

Motion as amended agreed to.

THE CIVIL SERVICE.

EMPLOYMENT OF MEN IN HIGHER OFFICES.

Mr. HERMENEGILDE BOULAY (Rimouski) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the Government should decide that in the future, men only shall be employed in all branches of the Civil Service where the salary is $800 or more, and that a Commissioner should be appointed to supervise the work done by the employees in each Department.

Mr. H. BOULAY (translation): Mr. Speaker, this is no new motion; it was placed on the Order Paper last session and seems to me to have taken even more importance by this year. On the 7th of February last, it was once more inserted in the Order Paper and as the months passed it acquired greater import by reason of the constantly increasing cost of living. The Government, to my mind, should set the example in bettering the position of the small wage-earners; by raising the salaries of the employees in the lower classes of the Civil Service. At present, those salaries are barely sufficient to allow the civil servants to provide for the most pressing needs of their families, and, if the present situation continues will not only entail considerable inconvenience but positive starvation.

The resolution states that it would be expedient to employ no others but men in all branches of the Civil Service where the annual salary is $800 or more. The meaning is that there are at present two distinct classes of government employees, men and women. It is in the ordinary course of things that men be employed in the departments, to perform the brain work and the physical labour as well; but women are on a different footing. These last should be employed only in exceptionally urgent cases, because woman has not been created to take the place of man but to be to him a helpmate. The employment of women is a constant danger and from the standpoint of morality, inadvisable.

No civil servant of the female sex should receive a greater salary than $600 a year. Every additional dollar above even $500 a year is wasted in theater tickets, extravagant dress, pleasure jaunts, and living beyond their station and means. Those ladies in general rival with one another in buying the most expensive dress, the brightest powders and the sweetest perfumes.

The country gets no benefit from what is wasted in paying women excessive salaries; most of them are not ratepayers, contribute nothing to the support of their parents and squander their money uselessly. A great number do not even think of saving anything as a safeguard against accidents, infirmities and old age.

Those young ladies moreover do not seem to consider married life and the bringing up of a family as at all likely and to be reckoned with. Still quite young, they begin to prepare for the Civil Service, discarding all household duties, cooking, housekeeping or anything pertaining to domestic science.

As I see it, Ottawa suffers from two great evils; the theatres and moving pictures is one and the employment of women in the public service is the other.

I am told there is a marked improvement and that the service is not as bad as it used to be; that may be true. But as the whole aim of the young ladies is to study to pass the examinations required for a position in the public departments, they generally neglect everything else. That ambition prevents their acquiring what they should know to become man's companion; the household duties have no attraction for them; they do not wish to marry and educate children as others do and as should be the rule; their only thought is comfortable living and expensive dress, that is, when they remain within bounds. It seems unnecessary that I should have to urge any stronger arguments in favour of my contention; all the members of this House are as familiar with the question as I am; and I trust that there is a strong public opinion behind this resolution.

I have no objection to the employment of a widow who has a family to support; but a voluntary widow, the woman who gets rid of a husband to secure a government job, is not entitled to any consideration.

A few words now concerning the other class of civil servants, the men. I maintain that no man in the Canadian service should receive less than $700 a year if he is a bachelor, or less than $800 a year, if he is married. And a distinction in salary should be made between those two. Every unmarried man should receive $100 less for every thousand dollars salary than he would receive were he married. The higher pay would be an inducement to marry, a kind of reward for those who desire to serve the State in every way. The man who refuses to marry is a society evil unless he has strong reasons to remain single. Not only should he receive less encouragement from the Government but he should be made to pay a special tax.

I hold that $800 is the smallest salary, even initially, which a married man ought to expect, for it is impossible for any one today to support a family on less, no matter how small is the family. Our public servants are entitled to receive an allowance that will put them beyond the reach of starvation and will allow them to give those dependent on them their daily sustenance. I am as much oposed to excessive as to starvation salaries. The difference between the work done by both classes of the service is not so great as to warrant allowing one to live at the expense of the other. My personal experience gathered in the departments is that the highly paid officials are those who work the shorter hours.

When young ladies assert that they cannot live properly on $500 a year, surely the poor fellow who has to support a wife and children has a grievance. In support of my contention I may read a short statement from a government employee who earns $500 a year; he puts the situation in clear light showing that $50 and even $600 or $700 are not sufficient at the present time to enable him to provide properly for his family. Here is a part of his statement published in a local paper:—

"My salary is $500 a year, and as I had the misfortune of having been ill in the course of the year, I have received much less than that to live with, during twelve months.

I have been wearing the clothes with which I am clothed for three years and I have no better ones, and but for the close care of my wife, who is sewing and patching constantly, you would see me in tatters. Yet those clothes bought on credit three years ago, are not all paid for.

As long as I could get credit, the distress was less cruel, but now the creditors seeing no indication of any rise in my salary, refuse to advance to me any more, and even despair to ever recover what I already owe them. As a consequence, I am forced to beg from my friends, my relatives and my neighbors to make up the deficit in the pressing needs of my household.

I have my old octogenarian parents, to whose existence I am bound to contribute; I am deprived of the possibility to accomplish that sacred duty, and the poor old ones are suffering thereby.

We are often prevented from going to mass on Sunday, owing to the lack of the required fee.

I have to walk an average of fifteen miles every day to attend to my work and I cannot once dispose of five cents to take a car to allay my fatigue.

I cannot, as every citizen is called upon, and is bound to do, contribute to the various relief funds and to other charitable organizations, being myself a beggar; I cannot, in short, fulfill my obligations towards my religion, my family and the community—I am an outcast.

In addition to my duties as messenger, I am compelled to work assiduously as a clerk, but I am not paid one cent for that extra work.

My wife is sick and in constant suffering, since several months, and I can't provide any medical assistance to alleviate her painful condition.

Oftentimes in cases of sickness in my family, the doctor whom I could call without having any ready cash for him, prescribed some medicines that I could not get for want of money, and I still have in my possession several prescriptions not filled, to testify to this assertion."

I then asked this man what would be the monthly cost for the strict necessaries of his family, and here is the synopsis he prepared, and which I found very modest and without exaggeration:—

Rent	$14.00
Fuel	7.50
Groceries	12.00

[Mr. Boulay.]

Now, this messenger has no children going to school, what can be the situation of the one who, with such a salary, has three or four of an age to attend school?

Again, we must not forget the clothing, the shoes, the hats, the doctor and the medicine in case of sickness, and which are not mentioned in the above statement. Alas! If death should happen to strike at such a door, in what distressing condition would that family be situated?

In what sad circumstances would this poor wretch leave his wife and children if he happened to die; his salary being insufficient to enable him to live, he is far less in a position to pay insurance premiums on his life, or contributions to any benefit societies.

And that is, Mr. Editor, the deed of a Government whose mission is to protect its subjects, a Government having established a department to look after the welfare of the working classes in protecting them against the ambition and the injustice of the employers and contractors, and who itself turns a deaf ear to the lamentation and the pressing solicitations of its own functionaries, here in our Capital, in denying them what they have so legitimately the right to claim, their living and nothing else.

What efficient performance of his duties can we expect from a half starved and half clad servant deprived of all indispensable comforts of living? Here I will protest most vigorously, not only in favor of the messenger, but in the name of the whole community, because the country cannot be getting the efficiency in the public service as it would get from well paid men, free of all moral and physical care.

This state of affairs is inconceivable, it is barbarous, and moreover it is a disgrace for the country, and especially when we consider that certain classes of the same service are so liberally paid and live so sumptuously.

Now, come, honorable ministers and members, stop for a moment and reflect, look from the midst of your abundance into that chilly and denuded home of your servant who is giving all his time and all his intellectual and physical energy to the country, and if you have a soul and a conscience susceptible of compassion and equity, you will be eager to do justice and at the same time perform an act of humanity by granting to that neglected portion of civil employees a sufficient stipend to enable them to live and thus bring into the homes of these families relief and happiness, peace and cheer, and you will be praised.

Mr. Boulay continues in French: (translation): I am aware that the Government intends to do something for the employees who earn small salaries; there are too many highly paid officials to maintain in a state of poverty numbers of their fellow-workers. Let us take from the salaries of the women, if necessary even from the salaries of the higher officials; I do not believe in paying excessive wages. We could dispense with the services of any one who thinks his salary is too low when he gets $4,000 a year; put some one else in his place who will be satisfied with a fair remuneration.

I repeat what I said; those who get the higher pay are those who have less work to do. They reach the office about eleven o'clock in the morning and work only four hours a day. In cutting off from some salaries and adding to others, the Government would be really helping the unfortunate ones who live in hard circumstances and who are after all the real painstaking employees and who give to the country not only their money but very often their life. The highly paid official is not anxious to enlist.

As I said, the Government intends to raise the salaries in the lower classes of the service; well the sooner that is done the better for those employees who have suffered too long already. I know some married men who are paid $650 and who have told me they could not meet their monthly expenditure. The cost of living has abnormally increased especially this year and there is no doubt that those employees should receive at least $800, if not more.

My resolution calls for the appointment of a commissioner to supervise the work done by the employees in the various departments. It may be objected that there is no necessity for such an official as there are supervisors in the different branches of the service. My personal experience enables me to say that much time is wasted; I have seen with my own eyes some officials, with their feet on their desk, reading quietly a newspaper. I hold that the office hours during which they are paid to work should be devoted altogether to the public service; that is my reason for asking that a special commissioner be appointed to go the rounds and supervise the amount of work done by every one of the employees in each department.

I hope my hon. friends who speak another language have understood the plain meaning of my resolution which has reference only to the employment in the departments of ladies at high salaries. I have nothing to say about stenographers and young ladies who are ready to accept small salaries. I speak particularly of those who are receiving wages which would permit a man to support a family. That is the main point of my resolution and I think it should be earnestly supported. I know that I will not have the pleasure of being favourably looked upon by the ladies concerned.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: You are a married man, are you not?

Mr. BOULAY: I am, but I propose this sincerely and in good faith because I think it is in the interest of our country.

Mr. GRAHAM: What is the Government's policy on this question? I assume that, as the hon. gentleman (Mr. Boulay) has just stated, he is married and is not in the matrimonial market, he has no object to serve by being friendly with the ladies and certainly he does not expect woman suffrage to reach his constituency. Those of us who come from other parts of Canada where the women have been given the right to vote, have altogether a different viewpoint from that of the hon. gentleman. If that viewpoint were not superinduced by any other reason it would be by the fact that a large and highly respected population, which the hon. gentleman wishes to decapitate officially will probably have in the near future the opportunity of marking their ballots for or against the members of this House. As all thinking men are very susceptible to public opinion I take it for granted that no member from the provinces where woman suffrage has been established would think for a moment of supporting my hon. friend in his resolution. The question which he raises as to the ladies taking the places of men would have sounded better some years ago. To-day we have arrived at a situation in Canada, and in various countries of the world, where women are taking the places of men, and I am free to admit that in many instances they are taking them with as great ability as the men have displayed. I would go further and say that in many offices where the business of the country is transacted men will have to brace up or they are going to lose more of their positions. There is no business man who has in his employ ladies in different positions but will agree with me that during the past few years they have risen to such a high eminence in these positions as to make their services almost indispensable. My hon. friend raises another point as to the moral standing but there his argument limps. He argues that the presence of ladies in various public offices is not for the best interest of the country. Then he cripples that rather by saying that the standard will be higher if they are not allowed to get better wages, that a lady will be all right at $800 but that if she should get $1,200 the temptations would be greater. I take absolutely the opposite view. Then my hon. friend also says that the higher the salary the less the officials work. Consequently he is going to give the high salary to a man and the low salary to a woman, let the woman do all the work and let the man have the high salary and none of the work. There is something in the contention that men with families ought to be given positions and I agree with him if they are fit for the positions. But the time has gone by when a man can sit around and say: You must give me a position because I am a man, if there is a woman in sight to fill that position more efficiently. As to the salary, I am rather of the notion that work should be paid for irrespective of the party who performs the work and if a public office sees fit to engage a lady to perform certain services and she proves efficient, there is no reason under the sun why she should not receive the same salary as the man who performs the same work. I am just simply taking some of the things mentioned by my hon. friend but I would point out to him that he will have to catch up with the procession by the time woman suffrage gets to the province of Quebec or he will find himself without any seat in this House at all. Now, what will the Government's policy be?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Mr. Speaker, I suppose that my hon. friend (Mr. Boulay) has accomplished the object which he had in view and which was to call the attention of the Government, the House and the country to the principles of the resolution which he is advocating and, having done that, he probably does not wish to press it to a vote in the House.

Mr. GRAHAM: He is not strong in his position.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Whilst my hon. friend (Mr. Boulay) was speaking, I noticed the interested look on the face of my hon. friend from South Renfrew (Mr. Graham) and the idea came to me of asking him to answer the argument of my hon. friend from Rimouski. My intuition proved true and my hon. friend from South Renfrew came to the mark in right gallant style. But I had always had the idea that a Frenchman was the embodiment of gallantry and it really took me quite by surprise that my hon. friend, here, who is a good looking man and a Frenchman, should have had such an heretical opinion in respect to the ladies and especially to the young ladies. That is why I asked him whether he was a married man or not. I wanted to solve that difficulty. But I have another question to put to my hon. friend. The young ladies, he says, spend their money on the toilette, they buy things to make themselves look nice and to keep them warm. What do the men do? If I had a man in my office and he did not keep himself very well dressed and buy things that would make him look respectable, I think I would ask him, for the benefit of the office, to spend a little more on his personal outfit.

My hon. friend, who is not so young as he once was, was once younger than he is now. I wonder if he, in casting his eyes over the young ladies of his locality when he was looking around for a wife, was not a little taken now and then with those who were rigged out nicely, who wore nice hats and nice dresses. I venture to say that if we could go back and analyse these times, a little distant in the past now, we would find that he had an eye for the beautiful in that way just as all Frenchmen that I ever knew anything about have had.

Mr. GRAHAM: I bet he used hair oil, when he had any use for it.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: My hon. friend (Mr. Boulay) has placed his views before the House. I think I am not stating what is incorrect when I say that the Minister of Finance is cogitating over a measure by which at least the lower grades of the service shall have some addition to their salaries, and when that Bill comes before the House, as I think it will, my hon. friend can advance his arguments to the Minister of Finance. But I am afraid I will have to tell him that he will not get far with the Minister of Finance if he pursues exactly the same line of argument that he has pursued to-night as against the young ladies.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Kamouraska) (translation): Mr. Speaker, I would be untrue to the best traditions of my race were I to leave it to an English-speaking member to enter the lists as the champion of fair ladies who have been subjected to attack by a representative of my own province, the hon. member for Rimouski (Mr. Boulay). My hon. friend is opposed to ladies being employed in the Civil Service. Why draw a line between the government service and the many other fields of activity in this country of ours? In every branch of industry, in all commercial pursuits, in professional avocations, in the offices of insurance companies, are to be found young girls and ladies employed as stenographers, clerks and accountants; hon. members who belong to the legal fraternity especially will bear me out when I state that women always give entire satisfaction, that they are even looked upon as the most efficient workers. Why then should they be debarred from entering the service of the Dominion Government?

I wish to point out to my hon. friend that most girls do not seek employment to shut out the men. In most cases they are impelled to look for work by pressing conditions. Their situation is not of their own choosing, and many of them, should a man offer marriage, would willingly leave their position to which they cling from sheer necessity.

There are many young ladies who are alone to provide for the support of a widowed mother and younger brothers and sisters, for whose education they also pay out of their salary. Why, I repeat, in the Dominion Civil Service should they be discriminated against any more than in commercial, industrial and professional spheres?

I would, however, feel disposed to support the hon. member on his stand regarding determined bachelors. I do not go the full extent with him and suggest they be dismissed from the service. I am not in favour of taking such drastic action, but if he moves to have them taxed or visited with some other like punishment, I shall not stand in the way of his motion. The hon. member takes a wrong position when he puts the unmarried men on the same footing as the unmarried women of the Civil Service. The men have the choosing of their career and can change it at will; many girls on the other hand would readily take to matrimony if they had the choice.

In a word, I believe the hon. member made a false move when he brought in this resolution and he must now be satisfied that it will not enlist the support of the House or obtain approval in this country. As stated by my hon. friend for South Renfrew (Mr. Graham), women on many occasions proved themselves the equals of men; they are now proving it by the material help they are giving in connection with all the undertakings of the war in Europe and especially in Canada. To my mind, the hon. member for Rimouski's motion is most untimely.

Mr. PROULX: Mr. Speaker, I sympathize with my hon. friend in only one phase of his remarks, that is with reference to the salaries of the lower grade civil servants, especially the married men of those grades. I have said on other occasions that I could not see how it was possible for a man to bring up a family on a salary of $500 or $600 a year, and I am glad that the leader of the House has announced that the Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White) is contemplating bringing in some legislation in the near future to relieve the situation for the lower grades of the Civil Service. I believe there is too much disparity in the salaries of civil service employees as between the higher and lower grades. There should, of course, be some disparity because the work done by the higher grades is more important and is deserving of better remuneration. But still the salary of any civil servant should be sufficient to provide a living wage, and a man should not be crippled, should not have his family almost starved, because he is in one of the lower grades of the service. I shall say nothing further now, but shall wait until the measure is brought down by the Minister of Finance. I hope he will make sufficient provision in that measure for the lower grades of the Civil Service.

Motion withdrawn.

THE EXPENSE OF PARLIAMENTARY SESSIONS.

Mr. W. B. NORTHRUP (Hastings) moved:—

That, in the opinion of this House, in consideration of the present pressing need for national economy, a Committee of nine Members of this House be appointed, five to be named by the Acting Leader of the Government and four by the Leader of the Opposition, who shall forthwith consider, and during the present session report to this House the total cost, including incidental expenses, of each Session of Parliament, and the best way, if any, of reducing the same, with power to send for persons and papers.

He said: I do not think, Sir, that it is necessary for me to occupy the time of the House at any length in supporting this resolution. In the absence of the Finance Minister I may say that I spoke to him about the matter. He was in accord with the suggestion, and promised, if here, to speak in its favour when it came up.

Without making any charges against anyone, I think that at such a time as this, when thrift is being preached from the housetops, it is well that we should look into the question of whether we can in any way reduce the expenses of our meetings. Personally, I have a strong suspicion that in half a dozen different directions these expenses might be decreased. I happened to hear in the House the other day an answer to a question with regard to the expenses of Hansard; I merely give that as an illustration. The information given was that Hansard cost the country about $76,000 a year, the translation costing $36,000. I am sure that it is possible in some way to reduce such an expenditure as that. Without going into details which are well known to every member of the House, I beg to submit this motion in the hope that the House will see fit to take this means of securing what has been so much clamoured for throughout the country—economy—in our national expenditure.

Hon. RODOLPHE LEMIEUX: I think we all agree that the motive behind this motion is a worthy one, and for my part I would not object, being an old member of the House, to acting as a member of that committee with a view to shortening, if possible, the length of the session, which is admittedly too long. I am quite sure that my hon. friend has not in mind the curtailing of the privileges enjoyed by those of us in the House who speak in the French language. There is nothing in his motion which suggests that the outcome of any such investigation as is proposed will be the curtailment of the privilege of the minority to use the French language and to have the translation of the official documents and of Hansard. I have noticed in the press some apprehension that the House might, in its wisdom, decide to do away with the translation and with some of the official documents. With the understanding that this will not be the case, I heartily support my hon. friend's motion.

As regards Hansard, I do not know how we could do without it, though it might be possible to do away entirely with the reporting of the committee stage of the House, having only the main discussions, the debate on the Budget, for instance, reported. In that way you would reduce materially the size of Hansard and make it a little more accessible even to those who have contributed to the filling of its pages.

I wish to add this with regard to Hansard. I have had some experience in various countries, and I believe that when you compare our Hansard with the English Hansard and with the Congressional Record which contains the reports of the proceedings in the United States House of Representatives, and the official report of the debates in the French Chamber of Deputies, you will realize that we have a staff which can compare with that of any parliament in the world. But I am free to admit that the report is far too bulky and that it could be materially reduced in size, in the best interest of the country. Some of the blue-books, too, might be reduced in size. I pay this compliment to the King's Printer, Mr. J. de la Broquerie Taché, a gentleman whom I heartily recommended a few years ago as successor to the late Mr. Parmelee. I believe that Mr. Taché, and his assistant, Mr. Cook, have of late accomplished a very important reform. As you are aware, in former years a copy of each blue-book issued was addressed to each member of the House of Commons. Many of these blue-books, which were costly, did not reach the members to whom they were addressed, or were not regarded as being very important. Many were neglected and, perhaps, finally sent to the waste-basket. Two years ago, Mr. Taché and Mr. Cook decided that upon the issuance of each blue-book a card should be sent to each member stating that the blue-book was available and that it would be forwarded upon application by the member. I think that was a very good reform, and it has worked wonderful results. Many members did not wish to have some of the reports which were issued by the King's Printer, and by the adoption of the new system the Government has saved a large amount of money. I dare say that other reforms of a similar nature could be made, in the matter of stationery, etc. On the whole, I think that my hon. friend is quite right in moving for the appointment of a committee to look into this matter. In these war times it is a worthy object to endeavour to decrease the cost of administration by reducing as much as possible the expense incurred in carrying on the affairs of this House.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Mr. Speaker, so far as this resolution goes, I think I may say for the Government that not only have they no objection to it, but they will be under an obligation to the hon. gentlemen who will form the committee, if that committee will devote a portion of their valuable time to the work and give us the result of their deliberations and investigations. The figure that was named to-night by my hon. friend who proposed the resolution is certainly somewhat startling, and I have not the least doubt in the world that if the committee, when appointed, set themselves to work, they will be able to find ways and means by which the efficiency of this House will not be diminished, but the cost of carrying it on, which now amounts to such a large figure, may be very materially reduced. I do not wish to debate the question.

Motion agreed to.

PARCELS FOR SOLDIERS OVERSEAS.

COMPLAINT AS TO THE RATE OF POSTAGE.

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. RODOLPHE LEMIEUX: Might I call the attention of the Government to a matter which is of the utmost interest to the families of our soldiers. I have received this letter from a gentleman in Montreal whose son is at the front, and who is well known in public life as an advocate of land reform. I refer to Mr. Henry Timmis.

Westmount, 7th April, 1917.

My dear Mr. Lemieux,—

A matter which I should like to see you bring to the attention of the House is that of postage on parcels going to our men in England and France. By merest coincidence, the son of the woman who does char work around our house is in the same battery as our boy, the 79th. Since her boy enlisted, her husband's health has broken down, her daughter has become an invalid, and so it has become necessary for her to work out two or three days each week for $1.50 per day. It is her custom to send over a box of comforts to her boy each week or two. On some occasions the postage on these packages at the rate of 12c per pound amounts to nearly a dollar. If parcels were carried absolutely free there might be a disposition to send over unnecessary articles, but surely the charges should be reduced by two-thirds.

I wish my right hon. friend would take up this question with his colleagues, because there is a hue and cry throughout the country against this rate of 12c. per pound upon parcels sent to our soldiers abroad. If my hon. friend will tackle this postal rate with his usual acumen and with his good heart, he will certainly receive the blessing of thousands of mothers, wives and sisters, who cannot afford to pay such a high rate of postage for sending comforts to their sons, husbands or brothers, or even sweethearts, on the other side.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I shall be very glad to call the attention of the Postmaster General and of the Minister of Militia to the matter, and consult with them in regard to it.

THE CANADA TEMPERANCE ACT.

PROPOSED REPEAL IN NEW BRUNSWICK.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. F. B. CARVELL (Carleton, N.B.): I wish to call the attention of the right hon. gentleman who is leading the House this evening to a matter which I know will interest him. I wish to ask him if the Government will not consider the passing of a Bill to repeal the Canada Temperance Act in those eight counties in New Brunswick in which it is in force. I could introduce a Bill myself to that effect, but, of course, at this stage of the session it would never reach a point where it would be discussed. A year ago the legislature of New Brunswick passed a prohibitory law very much after the lines of the Manitoba and Ontario Acts, and it became effective on the first day of May of this year. There are eight counties in which the Canada Temperance Act is in force, and for its repeal the law requires a petition to be signed by twenty-five per cent of the ratepayers; then this Government orders an election to be held, and if a majority of the electors vote in favour of a repeal of the Act the Act is repealed; but that entails a great deal of time and expense, and I believe that it would be well received in the province and would not do violence to any principle if this Parliament should repeal the Act so far as those eight counties are concerned. I therefore throw out that suggestion to the right hon. gentleman and ask him if he will not consider the matter, and, if he thinks advisable, if he will not take the necessary steps to pass the required legislation.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I have had my attention drawn to this matter before, but it has always seemed to me that there are two difficulties in the way. In the first place, the Canada Temperance Act goes into force by virtue of the people's own vote upon it; they call for a vote under certain forms and they get it. It is the action of the people themselves and not of the Government, and therefore, it is a question of some importance to know whether, if the Government arbitrarily undertook, by passing an Act, to get rid of the law and repeal it, they would be acting in conformity with the wishes of a majority of the people in the county or electoral district that had taken steps to put the Act into force. In the second place the law in New Brunswick, for instance, I suppose supersedes in Scott Act counties, the Ssott Act provisions.

Mr. CARVELL: No, that is just the difficulty. It does not.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Then the situation is this: in those eight counties in the province of New Brunswick the provincial law has no force owing to the Canada Temperance Act being in force there, but I suppose the provincial law is of some assistance in enforcing the other Act.

Mr. CARVELL: No, it is entirely neutral

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: That remark of mine then may be left for what it is worth and it does not seem to be worth very much, so far as that is concerned. This, however, may take place—it may be possible that the New Brunswick law, having been enacted by the New Brunswick Legislature can as easily be repealed, and then the Scott Act would remain and would be for the use of the people of those counties. There is a method by which the people themselves can get rid of the Act if they wish to come under the provincial law. It takes some trouble and it takes some expense, but in that way we should know it was the wish of the people themselves. That has been the consideration that has always come up when this question has been discussed before.

Mr. CARVELL: There is something in what the right hon. gentleman says, that in these eight counties this particular law was brought into force by the votes of the people, but he should not forget the fact that the prohibitory law was brought into force by the representatives of these counties. Therefore it is fair to assume that the votes of the people through their representatives enacted a law which they would like to have supersede the Canada Temperance Act, but unfortunately, as the Canada Temperance Act is in force by virtue of an Act of this Parliament, they have no power to repeal it.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: That consideration goes a certain distance. It would be quite possible for prominent men in a county to form themselves into a committee calling for the enactment of the New Brunswick law, for instance, and yet they might not represent a majority of the county. When the voice of the people has been legally expressed, you have no right to say that that voice does not still prevail until the people themselves take the legal methods of informing Parliament and the country that they now wish otherwise. On the other hand, this matter is before the Government and we shall certainly give it our consideration. If there should be some strong expression of opinion from these counties that would convince the Government that they really wanted to get rid of the old law and come under the new, the difficulty would be practically eliminated.

[Sir George Foster.]

CHANGES IN THE UNITED STATES TARIFF.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. E. M. MACDONALD (Pictou): In view of the fact that the Committee of Ways and Means in Congress has reported a Bill proposing to raise the general tariff of the United States by 10 per cent, and to impose a duty of 10 per cent on all items in the free list, it is a matter of importance for Canada to ascertain as soon as possible whether this provision will apply to free wheat, for instance, and the other ramifications of that proposal. Has the Minister of Trade and Commerce any information on that?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: As my hon. friend knows, the process of law-making in Congress is different from our process. I should judge from the newspaper reports that this is a recommendation of the Committee of Ways and Means to the House. The legislation, of course, will not be completed until it receives the approval of the House.

Mr. MACDONALD: Does my hon. friend know any more about the proposal than what is contained in the newspaper reports?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: No, but as soon as the Bill goes through copies will be sent here.

Mr. MACDONALD: Perhaps the Minister of Finance, who is in Washington, could ascertain exactly what it is proposed to do.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: It will be easy to find out what the proposal is, and I will act on my hon. friend's suggestion.

On the motion of sir George Foster, the House ajourned at 10.30 p.m.

Thursday, May 10, 1917.

The House met at Three o'clock, the Deputy Speaker, Mr. J. H. Rainville, in the Chair.

QUESTIONS.

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

AUSTRO-GERMANS IN WESTERN PROVINCES.

Mr. CURRIE:

What are the figures of the population, according to the latest census, of Austro-German origin in each of the new Federal constituencies in the Provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta and British Columbia?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I think it has already been stated that these figures are not made up, and it may be some considerable time before they are available. The enumeration is going on. I think this question might drop, and I will see to it that the information is brought down as soon as we get it.

Question dropped.

GRAIN GRADING—SEALS ON CARS.

*Mr. TURRIFF:

1. Is the Government aware that up to 1914, grain commission firms had the right to be present at the grading of all grains consigned to their order, but since that date the railway companies refuse to allow any but official graders in their yards?

2. Since the above date elevator companies have ceased to use the car seals provided by the railway companies and instead use seals with their names embossed on them, thus identifying their cars from those shipped by farmers.

3. Is it the intention of the Government to remedy this unsatisfactory state of affairs?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER:

1. No grain commission firms are present at the grading of grain, that being done in the inspectors' offices in Winnipeg and Fort William, and the inspectors do not know who the owners are. If the sampling of cars is inferred, the Board of Grain Commissioners state they are not aware that grain commission firms had the right to sample cars consigned to their order in the yards.

2. The Chief Grain Inspector reports that grain firms are using their own seals at places only where there are no railway agents.

3. The matter is one which does not come under the administration of the Canada Grain Act, but is a question for consideration of the railway companies.

MAJOR J. C. MILSOM.

Mr. DEVLIN:

1. Were there any defalcations by Major G. C. Milsom, assistant director of supplies and transport at Camp Borden?

2. If so, what was the amount?

3. Has any portion or all of it been recovered by the Government?

Sir EDWARD KEMP:

1, 2 and 3. This matter has been investigated by a Military Court of Inquiry, and, as the proceedings of the court have not yet been completed, it is not considered advisable to answer these questions at the present moment.

MAJOR REV. A. H. MOORE.

Mr. VERVILLE:

1. Is Major Rev. A. H. Moore, of St. Johns, Quebec, in the employ of the Department of Militia at the present time?

2. If not, was he at any time since the beginning of the war in the employ of the said department

3. If so, (a) in what capacity, and (b) what salary did he receive?

4. Did he, while in the employ of the department, receive any amount from the Government in addition to his salary, for travelling expenses, separation allowance, etc.?

5. If so, how much?

Sir EDWARD KEMP:

1. No.

2. Yes.

3. (a)Chaplain at Valcartier Camp, 1916. (b) $6.50 per diem, 18th July to 12th October, 1915.

4 and 5. Yes. Expenses, $250.37; no separation allowance.

MR. HUGH LOCKHART.

Mr. TURRIFF:

1. Is Mr. Hugh Lockhart of Emmaville, Saskatchewan, still employed as a fire ranger?

2. If not, when did his services cease?

3. Is Daniel Anderson of North Battleford, still employed as homestead inspector?

4. If not, when did his services cease?

Mr. ROCHE:

1. No.

2. 11th January, 1917.

3. Yes.

4. Answered by No. 3.

ROSS RILFE FACTORY—VALUATORS.

*Mr. MURPHY:

Referring to the Order in Council of March 23, 1917, providing for the taking over by the Government of the Ross rifle factory and business, what are the names and addresses of the competent valuators referred to in the following paragraph thereof:—

"The minister further recommends in view of the inventories, expert valuations and reports which have been obtained from competent valuators, and which are separately submitted for consideration, that the total compensation to be fixed, ascertained and allowed for or in respect of the premises taken, having due regard to the principles or method of computation and ascertainment hereinbefore recommended, shall be fixed in the execution of the powers vested in Your Excellency in Council at the maximum limit of three millions of dollars, which under no circumstances shall be exceeded."

Sir EDWARD KEMP: The Canadian Appraisal Company, Hospital street, Montreal.

TRANSCONTINENTAL RAILWAY.

REMOVAL OF RAILS FOR USE IN FRANCE.

On the Orders of the Day:

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Can the Government give me an answer to-day to the question I asked yesterday as to authority for the removal of rails from the Transcontinental railway and their shipment to France?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I have laid on the table of the House the Order in Council relating to this matter. I intimated to the right hon. the leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) yesterday that I thought the whole of the 300 miles that were to be shipped overseas in the form of rails would be taken from the Grand Trunk Pacific west of Edmonton. I am informed that the amount provided to be taken so far from there is only in the neighbourhood of 218 miles. As to the balance of the 300 miles, I do not think it has been decided where the rails should come from.

WESTERN COAL MINING.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. W. A. BUCHANAN (Medicine Hat): I desire to ask the Minister of Labour if there is any recent information from the coal-mining districts of Alberta and British Columbia, regarding the operation of the mines. I notice in the Montreal Gazette of this morning a statement to the effect that the operators had wired the minister asking him to take some action to keep the mines in operation. I take that to mean that the proposed agreement between the men and the operators has not been accepted by the men, and that the mines in that district are closed. I would like a statement on the matter.

Hon. W. T. CROTHERS (Minister of Labour): My hon. friend (Mr. Buchanan) is quite right in his understanding that the agreement entered into between the operators and the representatives of the men, was not accepted by the men on the vote begun a few days ago. I do not think the voting is quite finished yet, but a sufficient number had voted to make it almost certain that the agreement would be rejected. So satisfied of that were the leaders of the men that they called a meeting of the representatives of the local unions in the district, to be held in Calgary to-night, with a view to determining what course they will now take. I am in hopes that they will determine to-night to return to work. I do not think it is quite correct to say that they are all out, but most of the miners had quit work. I think there were some working in three or four mines.

CANTEENS IN CANADIAN CAMPS IN ENGLAND.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. E. M. MACDONALD (Pictou): Mr. Speaker, some time ago, I asked the hon. Minister of Militia and Defence (Sir Edward Kemp) to give me some information as to the arrangement that is in existence with respect to the canteens in the Canadian camps in England. The statement was made by the ex-minister that they are not there under the direction of the Canadian authorities but by reason of an arrangement made by the British authorities. The minister promised to give us that information and I think it is about time that we had it.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: I have no doubt that the report which I asked for by cable, and which is to come by mail, will have the prompt attention of the overseas authorities but it has not reached me yet.

Mr. MACDONALD: Has the minister any information in the department here in regard to this matter, or is the whole thing entirely run by the Minister of Militia overseas.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: All the information that is in the department has been given to the House.

Mr. MACDONALD: When?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: At the time the question was asked a few days ago.

Mr. MACDONALD: Not in reference to the matter to which I was directing special attention, namely, the arrangement by which these canteens are permitted to exist in Canadian camps under the direction of contractors who have nothing to do with the Canadian Government. On that phase of the question the minister might have something in his office here.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: Yes.

Mr. MACDONALD: If he has, will he look into it and bring it down without waiting for the report?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: I did not understand that that was the question that my hon. friend asked me a few days ago. I thought it was in regard to the question of wet or dry canteens. If the hon. gentleman will look it up I think that he will find that his question was as to whether these were wet or dry canteens.

Mr. MACDONALD: Not at all.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: As I understand now, he desires information as to the commercial, or financial arrangements with respect to the carrying on of the system of canteens in England. I will find out what information is to be had in the department on that subject.

Mr. MACDONALD: My hon. friend remembers that I put a question on the Order Paper with regard to the reason why these canteens are permitted to remain in Canadian camps without any authority from the Canadian Government. The minister answered two of the questions and in reference to the other two he said that he would get the information from England.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: I will look the matter up.

Mr. MACDONALD: The minister must surely have some information in the department here as well, and if so I would ask him if he would bring it down.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: Yes.

TAX ON FOREIGNERS ENTERING UNITED STATES.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. PIUS MICHAUD (Victoria, N.B.): I wish to ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce, who is just back from the United States, if he has any information to give in reference to the head tax of $8 imposed by the United States on all Canadians who go across the boundary line.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I can say to my hon. friend (Mr. Michaud) that I was not called upon to pay a head tax when I went in. I will refer my hon. friend for his answer to my hon. friend the Minister of the Interior, in whose department the matter is.

Mr. MICHAUD: I understood the minister was to bring us some information from Washington on his return.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I suppose my hon. friend has a copy of the Act. It gives all the information as far as the law is concerned. Then, I would be very glad to give him a copy of the regulations. I have an extra copy, and I think he will be able to satisfy himself as to the regulations. If he wishes any more information I will be glad to implement it if I can.

THE BUDGET.

DEBATE ON ANNUAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE.

The consideration of the proposed motion of Sir Thomas White (Minister of Finance) for the Committee of Ways and Means, and the amendment of Mr. Turriff thereto, was resumed from Tuesday, May 8.

Hon. T. W. CROTHERS (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I am reluctant to take any part in prolonging this debate, which, as I view it, has already become unwarrantably protracted. We are now in the third week of this discussion of the Budget, which, it seems to me, should have been disposed of in as many days. I believe that the people of this country have the conviction that we are spending a great deal of time in talking which could be better employed in doing. The times call for deeds rather than words. While of our best and bravest thousands are falling weekly in a great and noble cause, while the destinies of mankind are trembling in the balance, two hundred of us here are talking about matters that have no relation to the war, and are of the most trifling importance compared with the herculean task which calls upon us for our best and undivided attention. Questions by the hundred and motions by the score are placed upon the Order Paper, questions and motions that have no relation whatever to the war. I think it would be well to give the public a sample of a few of these questions and motions. I take one which was placed on the Order Paper on the 20th of April:

1. How many permanent civil servants or officials were in the employ of the Department of Militia and Defence on the 10th day of October, 1911, and how many on the 31st of March, 1917?

2. How many temporary civil servants and employees of all kinds were in the employ of the said Department on the 10th day of October, 1911, and how many on the 31st of March, 1917?

3. How many permanent civil servants or officials were appointed by said Department since the 1st of August, 1914?

4. How many temporary civil servants and employees were employed by said Department since August 1, 1914?

5. What was the gross amount paid by said Department for salaries and expenses to both permanent and temporary civil servants and employees for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1914?

6. What was the gross amount paid by said Department for salaries and expenses of all permanent and temporary civil servants and employees for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1917?

7. How many civil servants were appointed by said Department since October 10, 1911, under the provisions of Section 21 of the Civil Service Act?

Seven questions in one. That is just one question of thirty questions, in about the same words, that have been placed upon the Order Paper for each of the twenty departments of Government here at Ottawa. Here is another, a little shorter:—

May 1—1. What number of names has the National Service Commission received in answer to cards sent out?

2. How many of these names are classified as military, agricultural, shipbuilding, and munitions prospects, respectively?

3. How many are engaged in work that is regarded as non-essential in war time?

Here is another one:—

April 27—1. How many persons have been appointed to permanent positions on the Canadian Government railways from January 1, 1916, to March 31, 1917, who were not previously employed on the said railway?

2. What are their names, their salaries and the positions to which they were appointed?

That question might have been amplified a little and a little further information elicited if the hon. gentleman who put it had asked whether each of these men had hair on his head or not, and if so whether it was red or black. Here is another sample:—

May 1—For a copy of all letters, petitions, telegrams and other papers or documents in possession of the Government relating to the dismissal of ———— and the appointment of his successor.

That relates to a position of which the salary is insignificant, and the place concerned is an obscure hamlet. Here is another:—

May 8—For a copy of all letters, reports, communications and documents passing between the Minister of Labour and the Department of Labour and the officials of District No. 18, United Mine Workers of Alberta, and the officials of the Alberta and Eastern British Columbia Coal Operators' Association, concerning the requests made by the miners for an increase in wages due to the increase in the cost of living, between September 1, 1916, and the present time.

I notice a new one to-day:—

1. Who is the Indian agent of the Indian Reserve at Bear River, N.S.?

2. When was he appointed, at what salary per year, and what are his duties?

3. Has he any authority for disposing of wood, piling and logs on said reserve?

4. Has he authority to allow outside persons to cut and take wood off the reserve?

5. Has any wood been taken off this reserve in the last five years by any persons other than Indians? If so, by whose authority?

6. Has any work, including repairs, been done to any and all buildings on the reserve during the last five years?

7. If so, what are the names of all persons who have performed said work, the amounts paid to them, and the dates on which respective amounts were paid?

8. Is the Indian agent allowed to do carpenter work or any other kind of work on reserve and charge for same over and above his salary?

9. If so, has the Indian agent performed any such work?

10. If so, what is the character of said work, dates on which same was performed, and the respective amounts charged?

11. Were any orders given by agent to Indians during period from October, 1911, to May, 1917?

12. If so, what were the names of Indians, and dates and amounts of said orders?

13. What were the names of Indian doctors on this reserve from October, 1911, to May, 1917, when were they appointed, and at what salary?

14. If not on salary, what rate of pay did they receive?

Just one more:—

1. Has the Minister of Militia or any of the authorities of the Militia Department, official statistics as to the recruiting of soldiers in Canada for overseas service?

2. If so, what are the correct figures of enlistments in the different overseas regiments raised since August, 1914, to date: (a) Canadians speaking the French language; (b) Canadians speaking the English language and born in Canada; (c) British subjects by birth born outside of Canada; (d) British subjects by naturalization; (e) French Canadian soldiers in regiments commanded by officers speaking the English language raised in the Province of Quebec; and (f) French Canadian soldiers in battalions raised in the other provinces of Canada?

These questions, as I said, come in to us by the hundred, motions by the score, paralyzing the ordinary work of the clerks in the various departments, because it takes weeks, and in some cases months, to copy out all these vast returns, and perhaps it is not an exaggeration to say that in nine cases out of ten, after all this work has been performed, the returns are thrown into the waste basket—and this at a time when the destinies of mankind are trembling in the balance. What has proportional representation or the reform of the Senate to do with the great war in which we are engaged? Yet we spent two days on those topics. Do hon. members realize that there are two hundred of us in this House, and that a day misspent—and we have had lots of them, talking about academic questions that have no relation whatever to the war—I ask do we realize that one day misspent means two hundred days' work of the 200 members of this House lost to this country? Why, Mr. Speaker, a friendly stranger unfamiliar with party traditions, looking down upon us from the gallery, might be pardoned if he reached the erroneous conclusion that there are men more anxious to win the treasury benches than to win the war.

I would not at this stage say one word were it not that sneering references to and groundless accusations against the administration of the department over which I have the honour to preside have been made in this House. At this time, when the good offices of the department are sought daily from all directions, such vulgar sneers and false accusations only tend to frustrate the efforts so successfully exerted before, as since, the commencement of the war. Had such references and accusations and insinuations been limited to the hon. members for Richmond (Mr. Kyte), Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff), Moosejaw (Mr. Knowles), and West Kent (Mr. McCoig), I would not have paid the slightest attention to them. I would not have considered them worth noticing, because I believe that they would have no more influence without this House than they have within it. But when a member of the standing of the junior member for Halifax (Mr. A. K. Maclean), without cause or knowledge of the facts, so far forgets the dignity of his position as to impute dishonesty and lack of integrity, I cannot permit him to escape without a protest, even at the expense of a little of the valuable time of this House. On many subjects the junior member for Halifax is well informed, and he is generally regarded as being as fair as the ethics and discipline of the Opposition permit. Certain it is that the hon. junior member for Halifax has not the faintest knowledge of the activities of the Department of Labour and his guilt lies in indulging in wanton and ignoble criticism in profound ignorance of the facts. His legal training, anything like common fairness, and a reasonable regard for justice and for the rights of others, should have prompted him to seek the truth before making such sweeping and insulting imputations. Let me, Mr. Speaker, give the junior member for Halifax and his three or four partners in guilt a little light concerning the workings of the Labour Department.

During the last five years there has been no advertising branch in the Labour Department. We choose rather to do our work as promptly, efficiently and unostentatiously as possible, leaving the results to speak for themselves. I have no intent or desire to criticise adversely my predecessor in the office which I have the honour to hold. He had and I have a most difficult task to perform, perhaps the most difficult and most trying of any department of the Government. I wish to show, therefore, by referring to some of the things that have been done in the Department of Labour, that we rather do things than advertise things. I repeat that but for these insulting imputations I would not have taken up a moment of the time of the House, because I do not think that such a course would have been justified.

What has been the record of the Labour Department during the last five years? Before I was placed in charge of the department some complaints had been made of alleged delays in establishing boards of conciliation after application had been received for such boards. I at once gave instructions that there should be no unnecessary delays, with the result that in the first year the average number of days elapsing between the receipt of application and the establishment of a board was reduced from 15 to 7. During the first year that I had the honour of presiding over the Labour Department we appointed several additional men known as fair wage officers—although their work has relation, to a very large extent, to matters other than that of fair wages. I was satisfied that it would be to the advantage of the Government and to the country if we had a larger number of these men stationed at different points throughout Canada. In 1911 we had but two, whose headquarters were in Ottawa. Labour disturbances often come up suddenly, the first thing you hear of the trouble being a telegram saying: we are going to strike to-morrow. If, therefore, we had to send a man all the way from Ottawa to Vancouver or to Sydney to deal with trouble which had suddenly arisen, very serious difficulties might develop before he could reach the ground. I therefore sent a man—a very good man indeed—to Vancouver, which he has made his headquarters ever since. His work has been most satisfactory. He has been on the ground; he has been in a position to be aware of the first intimation of any labour trouble and to go at once to see the employers and the employees. It is no exaggeration to say that during the last five years his presence there has prevented dozens of labour disturbances which would otherwise have developed in very serious manner. I appointed another man whose headquarters were at Saskatoon, another at Winnipeg and one more here, so that there were six in all—one or two dropped out and I have not yet filled their places. The result of this course was that during the first year that we were in power the number of days lost by wage-earners was reduced by nearly a million. What did that mean to the wage-earners of Canada? Taking it at the low sum of $2 a day, it meant that the wage-earners received in wages $2,000,000 more than they would have received but for our special efforts to keep them at work as much of the time as possible. It might be said that there were some peculiar circumstances connected with that year and that one ought to examine the conditions during a longer period of time. I have done that. I have taken the last four years when our opponents were in power and the first five years since we came into power, and I find that during the latter period of five years the average number of days lost by reason of strikes or lock-outs has been nearly half a million less than the average number during the four years preceding the time that we came into power. At $2 a day, you have $4,000,000, which, with the $2,000,000 I have mentioned, makes $6,000,000 which has been saved to the wage-earners of Canada by reason of our endeavours to see that they were kept at work as much of the time as possible. During the past five years we have had a number of insignificant strikes, but just one serious strike. Hon. gentlemen will remember that in the year 1909, before the people had an opportunity of smiling upon us benignly, there was in Nova Scotia a strike which continued for twenty-two months. Much rioting occurred and the militia had to be called out and stationed at different points to restore and maintain order. I am not blaming any one for what took place; I am only stating the facts. In 1903, a strike occurred in the West in district No. 18, comprising the mines in the southeastern part of British Columbia and the southwestern part of Alberta. Strikes also occurred there in 1906, 1909 and 1911, the one in 1909 continuing five months, and the one in 1911 eight months. Shortly after October, 1911, however, an agreement was entered into to continue from the 31st of March, 1912, for three years; that agreement providing special means for determining any differences which might arise during that period between the operators and the miners. During those three years we had no difficulties whatever in district No. 18. In March 1915, prior to the expiration of that agreement, in order that there might be no cessation of work at the expiration of it, we succeeded in securing another agreement to continue for two years from the 31st of March 1915, that agreement also containing a proviso for settling any material differences that might arise during its life. That agreement worked with perfect satisfaction, just as the previous one had for three years, until July last, since which time there has been some unrest in that district. The miners thought, in the circumstances, especially owing to the rapid advance in the cost of living, that they ought to be paid what they called a war bonus, in addition to the wages provided for in the agreement of 1915. They insisted upon that, probably owing to the fact that a somewhat similar war bonus was given to the miners in Wales after the war broke out. The operators assented to that demand and the men continued to work under that arrangement and a subsequent one until a short time ago. That arrangement also provided that 30 days before the expiration of the agreement, that is about the 1st of March, 1917, the operators and miners should get together again with a view of negotiating a new agreement to become effective on the first of April of this year. They did meet and spent three weeks at Calgary negotiating, and they finally reached an agreement that was satisfactory to the representatives of the men and also to the operators. Under the constitution of the United Mine Workers of America—the organization to which the majority of the miners belong—before any such agreement made by their representatives can become effective, it must be referred to the miners themselves and a vote taken upon it. That, accordingly, was done, with the result that I mentioned this afternoon to my hon. friend from Lethbridge (Mr. Buchanan), namely, that the miners refused to accept the agreement. The men are holding a meeting to-night, and I hope they may arrange a modus vivendi so that operations may go forward.

One sometimes hears it said that the labour laws of Australia are far in advance of ours, and I wish to say a word for the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act. Although that Act is not a child of mine, I have never lost an opportunity of giving credit to those who succeeded in getting that Act placed upon the statute books of Canada. I believe the principle involved in it is good, and I am sure that it has been the means of preventing large numbers of strikes. Just let me give an instance. Last Monday a large employer in one of our largest cities came to see me and told me that his men were all going out on strike on Tuesday. In two other large munition factories in the same large city a similar condition existed . I at once sent a wire to a leader of the labouring people in that city, with whom I have always been very friendly, stating: " Have the men continue work and have them apply for a Board of Conciliation under the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act." Hon. gentlemen, of course, know that since the outbreak of the war we extended, by an Order in Council, the provisions of the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act, so as to take in all enterprises and factories making munitions of any kind for our own army or that of Great Britain, or that of any of the Allies. I asked him to visit the three different shops, see the men and the operators and use his influence to endeavour to have the men continue to work, and apply for a Board of Conciliation. He acknowledged my telegram at once and said that he would be glad to do what he could. Last night I received another message from him, in which he said:—

The men have decided to continue work and apply for a Board of Conciliation and to wait until an award is made them.

That is just one illustration. This Act has saved the wage-earners of this country millions and millions of dollars; it has maintained industrial peace in scores of cases where very serious troubles would have developed but for the provisions of that or some similar Act.

We have had, as I have already stated, but one serious strike during the last five years, and that was not in any way attributable to any want of diligence or want of effort on the part of the Department of Labour. Australia, with all her drastic labour legislation, with a population of 5,000,000, had 330 strikes and lock-outs last year, whereas in Canada we had only 75, and the year before only 40. In the United States, with about twelve times our population, there were 3,300 strikes and lockouts last year. In proportion to our population they should have had 800 or 900; we had only 75.

Some hon. gentlemen have said—the hon. member for Saskatoon mentioned it the other night—that there have been a few cases where employers have not carried out the awards made by these boards. That is true, but such cases have been very few. When I was placed in charge of the Labour Department early in October, 1911, there was an outstanding difficulty between the conductors and the management of the Grand Trunk Railway Company. If I remember aright the award had already been made by the board, and the company had refused to carry it out. The difficulty was finally settled by an agreement made in the month of July, 1910, whereby the company over the signature of its general manager agreed to reinstate within ninety days all the conductors who had been on strike but had not been guilty of any violation of the law, and to pay all the men who had been on strike and the non-striking conductors as well an increase in wages to date from the 1st of May, 1910. I found that a number of these men had not been reinstated under the terms of the agreement, and I took the matter up with the company. The Grand Trunk appointed a county court judge of the province of Ontario, before this Government came into power, I think, to inquire into the case of the striking conductors who had not been reinstated, and he found that there were 130 conductors who had been guilty of no violation of the law and were therefore entitled under the terms of the agreement to be reinstated. Notwithstanding that, the company refused to take these men back. I went personally and saw the general manager, but he would not take them back. I told him that the company would not get any concessions from this Parliament, if I could prevent it, until these men were re-instated. A few days afterwards his representative had a couple of Bills in which the company was specially interested before the Railway Committee, and I asked the committee not to approve of them until the company had reinstated these men. The result was that the company reinstated every man who wanted to go back, and paid every one who was entitled to it his back pay. Ask the labour men of Canada whether the Labour Department has been administered during the last four years in their interests or not, and see what they will tell you—those who know about it, I mean, and not those who are more concerned about politics than the interests of the working people of this country.

There was a case not long ago where a unanimous award was made by a Board of Conciliation. The representative of the railway company, a railway man of long experience, agreed with the other two on the board that the men should do so and so, and the company so and so; but the company refused to carry out the award. One of their high officials came to see me and said that it was impossible for them to carry out the award. I said, "I won't argue the matter with you, because I do not know anything about it except that the experienced railway man your company chose as your representative on the board agreed with the other two members that you should do so and so, and you are stopped for refusing to do it." Well, he went home and issued a printed circular setting out a great many reasons why the award could not be carried out. When I saw a copy of it, I said to the company, "You will probably be asking Parliament for something in the future. I shall find it very difficult to give you my support unless you carry out that award." The very next day I received a wire to say, "We have adopted the award."

I will not detain the House by giving other cases where we have used all the influence we possess to get these awards carried out. In many cases we can use no direct influence. Every hon. member knows that we have no legal means of enforcing these awards. They have tried that sort of thing in Australia, and the result has been that last year they had 330 strikes and lockouts with a population of 5,000,000, as against 75 strikes in Canada with a population of 8,000,000.

As I have already stated, we now have six fair wage officers. We have also appointed a number of female correspondents to the Labour Gazette; we have greatly improved the Labour Gazette, as every hon. member who reads it must have noticed. We have had prepared several very important new reports concerning labour organizations and wages, and we have added one or two very important inside officers to the Labour Department. But notwithstanding all these additions, we have managed to reduce the expenditure of the Labour Department. It was stated in the House that there had been a great increase in the expenditure of the department. The hon. member for Rouville said that the expenditure had increased by 50 per cent, and the hon. member for Assiniboia, after investigating a little further perhaps, put the figure at 32 per cent. If he had investigated a little further still, he would have found that instead of there being an increase of 50 or 32 per cent there was an actual decrease of 17 per cent. Any one who has sufficient interest in the matter to look up the public accounts will find that at the end of the first full year we were in power —I am not going to split years, to blame anyone—there was a decrease of 17 per cent in the expenditure of the department as compared with the last full year our opponents were in power. And hon. members will find, if they look a little further, that last year it was fifteen per cent less than it was for the final year of office of our friends on the other side of the House. How has it been possible to add all these officers that I have mentioned and improve the different publications of the department, and still reduce the expenditure? It was done by the use of the pruning-knife—carefully cutting off what we regarded as unnecessary. I hope, and I know, that no hon. member of this House who is listening to this statement to-day will go out and say that the expenditure of the Labour Department has increased, having heard the facts as I have given them.

Now, I wish to say a word or two with regard to the wage-earners of this country. There are 160,000 members of the various labour organizations in Canada, and they form about one-fifth of the total number of wage-earners in the country. Of the members of labour organizations, 30,000 have shouldered the rifle and gone to the front to protect the rights we enjoy in this country and to save the liberties of humanity. And those who have remained behind have kept in good standing the insurance of those at the front, and they have seen to it that when one of their brothers has fallen in the fight his widow and orphans have not been left to suffer because their breadwinner was gone. The same rate of recruiting maintained for those wage-earners who are not members of labour organizations, means that 150,000 men engaged in manual labour have put down their tools and shouldered the rifle to go out and risk their lives for the cause of liberty. That is a record of which I am proud. When this war broke out I publicly made an appeal to the employers as well as to the employees, pointing out to them the necessity while the war was on of avoiding labour disturbances as far as possible. And I am proud to know that the workingmen of Canada have generally responded to that appeal. With very few exceptions—none serious, though in some cases they have had provocations—they have stuck to the bench because they felt it their duty to do so. And this is true not only of the men but of the women. I had the pleasure and advantage of visiting several of the munitions factories in Toronto a few weeks ago and there met with some remarkable cases. I met a woman whose husband is fighting at the front. I asked her: "How much do you get from the Patriotic Fund?" "I don't get anything," was her answer; "they offered me something from the Patriotic Fund but I would not take it, I can earn my own living." I asked her what she was earning, and she told me that she earned four dollars a day. And she would not accept anything from the Patriotic Fund. This is the kind of patriotism one likes to see. I found in that same factory several women who could well live without working, but who were actually going down there and putting in eight or ten hours a day, and devoting every cent they earned to the support of poor families whose heads had gone to the front to fight. That makes one feel proud to be a member of the human race.

Speaking generally, the employers of this country during the war have treated their employees generously—there are exceptions, of course. I am glad to know that the two parties of capital and labour have worked patriotically in the interest of the great cause that we all have at heart. One thing that I have observed in these munition factories has greatly surprised me, and that is the rapidity with which the employees have picked up this new work. There are now about 300,000 people employed in over 600 factories, and two and a half years ago, the great majority, like myself and some of my fellow members here, had never seen a shell. Some of the women of whom I have spoken had never seen a shell a month before they were earning large sums of money by helping to make shells. I found one lady working in a fuse factory who was executing one little process on a fuse. I asked how much she was paid, and she told me she was paid by the piece—twenty-eight cents a hundred. "How many can you make?" "Two hundred an hour." "And you get 56 cents an hour?" "Yes, and I work ten hours a day, and make $5.60." Any hon. member who has followed the making of a fuse knows that it is a very delicate mechanism, and it is really marvellous that this woman should have been able to pick up in a few weeks, under instruction, the knowledge and skill to enable her to carry on this work. One little girl who had been out from Holland only four months was making four dollars a day in completing one particular part of that little fuse. Another girl was sewing straps together with which to carry the shell, and was making three dollars a day. These women are working in these factories by the hundred, and they are doing splendid work, as the men are doing splendid work. If we could only look at the bright side of things, and not always at the dark side, we should be much happier. You can find a dark side to almost anything; you can find defects almost anywhere, and perhaps nowhere more noticeably than if you make a microscopic examination of yourself.

One point I wish to speak of, though a reference to it may not be strictly in order. A question was raised the other night about the establishment of boards of conciliation at Thetford Mines and several other places. I gave it as my opinion then that the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act did not lend itself to the appointment of a Board of Conciliation where there were two or three employers. In fact, there were six employers in that case and two rival and antagonistic labour organizations. I had never heard of this opinion at that time and I never saw it until to-day. This is an opinion given by the present Deputy Minister of Justice, and it is dated 15th March, 1910. It is in reply to a letter written him by the present Deputy Minister of Labour. The Deputy Minister of Justice, amongst other things, says:

> Referring to your letter of the 14th instant, enclosing application and other papers in regard to a proposed Board of Conciliation and Investigation under the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act, 1907, as to a dispute between employees of the Grand Trunk, the Canadian Pacific and the Toronto, Hamilton and Buffalo Railways respectively, to which you desire an immediate answer, I am of the opinion that said Act does not contemplate a joint application of these employees or that the disputes which they have with their respective companies should be investigated by a single Board. I do not think that such a joint proceeding could be worked out under the Act. Whether or not the proceedings might be facilitated by the naming of the same arbitrators in each case, and the proceedings consolidated, will depend on the consent of the parties.

That was the opinion of the Deputy Minister of Justice, expressed in the year 1910, and which I never saw or heard of until to-day.

Something has been said about food prices and about the Order in Council which was passed a few weeks ago. I think I should say something in that regard before I sit down. My hon. friend from Richmond (Mr. Kyte), the other night, quoted some figures as to prices in Australia. There are some conditions surrounding that which I think should be brought to the attention of the House. In the first place, when it is winter with us it is summer in Australia. We had a good crop in 1915; they had a very poor crop in 1915. We had a very poor crop and they had a good crop last year. There are seasonable prices; quite a large number of articles are cheaper in summer than they are in winter. I need not refer to anything beyond eggs. You can get eggs in the summer time for half the price that you pay in the winter and in January here, when we have midwinter, eggs are very dear. In January they have summer in Australia and then eggs are very cheap. But, when next winter comes around eggs are dearer there. Then again, in Australia they are unable at the present time to get their crop across the ocean to market. They are three times as far away from the market as we are, and they cannot get tonnage to get their products there. I think that hon. gentlemen sitting behind me said the other night that there were 400,000 boxes of cheese at one place which they could not get away. They have millions of bushels of wheat which they cannot get across to the market. What is the result of all that?—a lowering of the price. They have a large quantity of products awaiting shipment, and the supply is greater than the demand—I mean demand that you can utilize, they being so far away from the market. Prices rose more rapidly in Australia when they had a poor crop than they did in Canada when we had a good crop. That is very natural. Now, we have some figures. We have in our list 26 foodstuffs, 7 of which are meats. They have in their list in Australia 46 items of foodstuffs, 27 of which are meats. Meats were plentiful and cheap there when that list was made up. They were very dear here. It is almost impossible to make a just comparison between prices in Australia and in Canada.

I am going to take this opportunity of repeating what I have said before, because, perhaps, it will stand repeating. We have to-day, in all probability, 40,000,000 men under arms who have been withdrawn from productive work and who are now engaged in destructive work. It is said that as soldiers they consume about 50 per cent more than they would as civilians. That means, if these figures are anyway near right, and they are only approximate, that 60,000,000 are eating and producing nothing, 40,000,000 of them fighting and destroying everything in sight, human life as well as property. There are 60,000,000 consuming and 40,000,000 producing nothing and destroying wherever they go. Before this war broke out we did not have any foodstuffs to spare. Nobody thought of dumping shiploads of them into the ocean because we had more than humanity required. We had about enough to go around. Well, then, you remove 40,000,000 men, not all of them agriculturists, but a great many of them agriculturists, and employ them at destructive rather than productive work and the result is inevitable. In addition to that we had last year a shorter crop the world over than we had had for a great many years, a thousand million bushels of wheat less last year than the year before. Millions of tons of food have been sent to the bottom of the ocean. What do we reasonably expect to result from all that—a falling off of 40,000,000 workmen consuming 50 per cent more than if they were civilians, and a short crop the world over? We felt it, perhaps, as much in the province of Ontario as anywhere else in the world, because in many respects we had no crop at all last year outside of hay and fall wheat that grew on the higher land where it was not drowned out. Here you have, I submit, the great factors causing the rapid advance in the cost of foodstuffs. I admit there may be—and there is—some ground for holding that to a slight extent cold storage and combines, or something of that kind, may affect the prices, but to a very slight extent. That is something that we attempted to deal with by passing the Order in Council.

We did not pass it without consultation. We had amongst other delegations, quite a large number of the leading representatives of labour in this country, and they approved of an Order in Council such as we have here, or rather I think I should say they suggested it, and this Order in Council was passed. A good deal has been said about its inefficacy and the city of Montreal has been referred to. The hon. member for Richmond (Mr. Kyte) read a large portion of a letter written by one of the officials of the city of Montreal, pointing out the impossibility of employing it to any advantage. If any hon. gentleman has read his letter he will notice that he devoted most of it to a discussion of the second part of the regulation. The regulation is as follows:

1. No person shall accumulate or shall withhold from sale any necessary of life beyond an amount thereof reasonably required for the use or consumption of his household or for the ordinary purposes of his business;

2. Every person who shall at any time hold any necessary of life beyond an amount thereof reasonably required as aforesaid, and every person who shall hold, for the purpose of sale, whether as manufacturer, wholesaler, jobber, retailer or otherwise, any stock in trade of any necessary of life, shall offer for sale the said excess amount, or the said stock in trade, as the case may be, at prices not higher than are reasonable and just.

Now, that official of the city of Montreal in dealing with that special provision—and that does not refer to any investigation by a municipality or by the Department of Labour, just with the question of the excess amount—left out these five words: "Or the said stock in trade," and he went on for half a column of newspaper space to show the impossibility of proving the excess amount over what he required for the ordinary operations of his business, leaving out altogether "or the said stock in trade." That is the main point of the regulation, the necessity of selling not only the excess but "the said stock in trade," and he is bound to sell it at a reasonable and just price. Thus when coal dealers, as mentioned by hon. gentlemen opposite, were selling coal at $6 a ton profit, that is selling it at $15 in the centre and $20 in the suburbs of the city of Montreal, any citizen of Montreal had a right to take action under that section, and under section 9 which provides:

Any person who contravenes or fails to observe any of the provisions of these regulations shall be guilty of an indictable offence and liable upon indictment or upon summary conviction under part 15 of the Criminal Code, to a penalty not exceeding $5,000, or to imprisonment for any term not exceeding two years, or to both fine and imprisonment as specified.

Any citizen of Montreal, knowing that anyone refused to sell his stock in trade at a reasonable and just price, might have applied to the Attorney General of the province of Quebec for leave to prosecute, and if he could establish his charge in the police court of Montreal, the man guilty of violating that section would be liable to be fined $5,000 or to be sent to prison for two or three years. I think there is no getting away from that.

Mr. CARROLL: Does the minister think it is quite fair to put the onus of prosecuting under this Act on the people who are affected, that is the poor people? They are the people who are affected, and in eleven cases out of twelve they are certainly not in a position to lose a day or even half a day or an hour, or to employ a lawyer and go to court to prove their case. Does the minister not think that the Department of Labour, and I am speaking quite seriously, should appoint some person in these large wholesale centres a lawyer or some one like that, to take up these cases if necessary?

Mr. CROTHERS: I am glad my hon. friend from Glace Bay has mentioned this matter. I will come to that in a moment. I was going to point out the course we took with reference to Montreal. I noticed in the press one day that they were making these excessive charges for coal in Montreal. That was on the 27th of February, when the weather was pretty cold. I did not wait for an application from Montreal, from the mayor, or controllers, or the city council. I sent this telegram to the mayor of Montreal, off my own bat as it were:

I am informed that anthracite coal is selling in Montreal at from $12 to $15 per ton. There is no reason why price should be higher in Montreal than here where coal is selling at from $8.50 to $9.00 delivered. Is the information correct, and if so, has your municipality investigated conditions or applied for leave to prosecute any dealers charging unreasonable prices? I tender full support of this Department to any municipal action rendered necessary by the condition.

I received a reply from the mayor of Montreal the next day in these words:

You have been well informed. Anthracite coal is selling in Montreal as high as $20 a ton for delivery in the suburbs. In the centre of the city coal is selling as high as $15 a ton, and people have to beg to get it. The city of Montreal pays presently for coal $9 a ton taken in the yard. The city has done nothing up to now to put an end to this situation, and would welcome any suggestion you may make or any power the Government may give to prosecute those responsible for this state of affairs. If required I will send a municipal officer to meet you in Ottawa and discuss whole matter.

(Signed) MEDERIC MARTIN.

That was on the 28th of February. On the same day I sent a telegram to the mayor of Montreal:

Re anthracite coal situation. City has full investigating power and also power to cause prosecutions under existing regulations. I suggest that you send one of your city solicitors here to discuss means of improving Montreal situation.

He never sent any one. Now these regulations from which I read a moment ago contain a provision empowering the municipalities to make an investigation into matters within the boundary of their own municipality. We do not think that the Minister of Labour could undertake to make investigations, for instance, as to the price of milk in Nanaimo, on Vancouver Island. We thought it would be convenient to give the municipality power to investigate anything within its own boundaries. My hon. friend from Glace Bay, who is a lawyer, knows as well as I do that, speaking generally, it is the duty of the provincial governments to enforce the criminal laws made by this Parliament. There are substantially no exceptions; there are two or three under the Customs Act and so on, but, speaking generally, there are no exceptions under our constitution. You would not think of writing to the Minister of Justice in Ottawa if somebody stole your horse; you would go to an officer of the provincial government, because it is the duty of the provincial government and of its Attorney General to see that these criminal laws are enforced. This is a quasi-criminal law. We give the municipality this power:

Whenever the council or any municipality shall declare by way of resolution that in its opinion excessive prices are being demanded within the limits of such municipality for any necessary of life, such council may, by notice in writing under the hand of its clerk or other authorized officer, require any person dealing within the municipality in such necessary of life, and locally situate therein, to make and render unto such council within a time set in such notice, and such person shall make and render unto such council, precisely as required by it, a written return under oath or affirmation, showing in detail—

(a) The amount of such necessary of life held by such person for sale or disposition within such municipality at any indicated time or times including any time preceding the making of these regulations;

(b) The time when any or all of such necessary of life was acquired, produced or bought within or into such municipality;

(c) The cost of such necessary of life, including all charges of an overhead or other nature affecting such cost;

(d) The price at which such necessary of life is held for sale or at which any sales of part of the same or of a similar necessary of life have been made by such person within such municipality at any indicated time or times, including any time preceding the making of these regulations.

Mr. CARROLL: Does the minister not see a difficulty in enforcing that regulation in the case of rural municipalities?

Mr. CROTHERS: I do not think you would have much difficulty in rural municipalities. It is a very rare thing to find a number of farmers combining.

Mr. CARROLL: Suppose the farmers themselves had a grievance against a merchant who was asking $20 a barrel for flour?

Mr. CROTHERS: Would it be an unreasonable thing for one having such a grievance to go to his township council and tell them of these high charges?

[Mr. Crothers.]

Mr. CARROLL: In the case of all municipalities in our province outside of the town governments, the council meets but once a year, and any one having a grievance might have to wait almost a year before he would be able to bring the matter to the attention of the council. I would suggest that the Order in Council be amended so as to give the reeve or the warden of the municipality power to order an investigation.

Mr. CROTHERS: These councils must have power to hold special meetings. In fact, my recollection is that in one case they did call a special meeting. I do not think it would be a hardship for any one who felt himself aggrieved by what he considered to be excessive charges for coal, flour or anything else, to bring the matter to the attention of his representative. Unless the representatives in my hon. friend's province are different from those in Ontario, they would be only too glad to help out one who had a grievance, because they would want his vote and influence the next year, when election came on. Under this provision the municipal council has the right to pass a resolution to the effect that a man against whom overcharges are alleged, be required to make a statement under oath setting forth all these particulars.

Mr. CARROLL: Will the minister consider my suggestion of transferring that power to the clerk or warden of the municipality?

Mr. CROTHERS: I shall be very glad to consider any suggestion that my hon. friend may make, and I will consider this one. If it is possible to improve these regulations in any way, in the interests of the people at large, we shall be glad to do so; that is what we are here for. Under the powers given the Minister of Labour by this Order in Council, we deal generally with the kind of goods being used all over a given province, not in a particular municipality alone—although we have dealt with particular municipalities, right here in Ottawa as well as in a few other places. We have gone very thoroughly into the matter of coal. We sent 400 copies of written questions to the leading coal dealers of Canada and we got returns from them, submitted under oath. We have established a system of getting reports from every one of them each month, setting forth all necessary particulars. On my way to the House this afternoon I went into the office and selected four cards from the hundreds that we have there. Here is the card sent in by an Ottawa coal dealer. The first question is as to the quantity on hand on the first of the month and the cost per ton. This man said that he had on hand 31 tons of egg coal, which cost him $6.78 a ton. He had on hand 325 tons of stove coal, and that cost him $7.01 a ton; chestnut, 91 tons, costing $7.10. Answers are given also as to the quantity received during the month and the cost per ton. Here is a card returned by a leading company of coal merchants in Montreal, Farquhar, Robertson Company, Limited. We have a very full statement from this firm. The cost of the coal, not including overhead charge or cost of delivering, is stated to be $7.10, and the selling price $9.50. A reasonable overhead charge and cost of delivery would bring the amount up to $9, leaving a profit of 50 cents. I have a case in my own town in which the cost was $6.69 and the selling price $8.75. In two cases in St. John, N.B., and one at another point, the returns showed that the companies were selling coal at about $13. We took the matter up with them at once, stating that the price was too high—and we are going to bring them to time if possible. The reports which we get monthly from the Canadian coal dealers enable us to tell exactly how much coal there is in the country, and this applies to the leading foodstuffs as well, because we have investigated the coal storage conditions. Our inquiries in that direction have not yet been completed; it is a herculean task to go into all the details throughout the whole country, but we are working at it. We have got on further with coal than with anything else, and we are pretty well through with the investigation of the question of sugar.

Mr. MACDONALD: What did you find about coal?

Mr. CROTHERS: We found that, speaking generally—I have mentioned two or three exceptions—those who are engaged in the retail coal business are not getting more than a reasonable profit.

Mr. COPP: Do I understand that the returns submitted to the hon. minister showed that coal was selling in St. John at $13 a ton?

Mr. CROTHERS: That is my recollection.

Mr. COPP: What time was that?

Mr. CROTHERS: I have not the card with me, but I think that it was in March or April.

Mr. COPP: That would be hard coal?

Mr. CROTHERS: Yes.

Mr. COPP: Did the minister refer this matter to the council of the city of St. John in order that it might be dealt with by the local authorities?

Mr. CROTHERS: I do not really know whether we did or not.

Mr. PARDEE: While the minister is discussing the question of coal and foodstuffs, may I draw his attention to a report that comes from the Hamilton council—

Mr. CROTHERS: I do not think that that is a question upon which I should give way to my hon. friend.

Mr. PARDEE: Then may I ask the minister if he has returns from Hamilton coal dealers, and whether it is true that coal costing them $8 a ton is being sold at $12? Has he looked into that matter?

Mr. CROTHERS: We have looked into that.

Mr. PARDEE: Is it true?

Mr. CROTHERS: As I was coming to the House this afternoon my attention was called to the matter by an hon. gentleman from the city of Hamilton, who told me there was an article in the Hamilton Herald referring to coal conditions: I said to him: "I will read it, but I cannot read it now." I have not had an opportunity of reading the article yet, but I shall be very glad to read it. We have had a man in Hamilton.

Mr. PARDEE: For how long?

Mr. CROTHERS: I do not know—for several days.

Mr. PARDEE: Has he made any report on the matter?

Mr. CROTHERS: I presume he has. I am not familiar with all the reports that come into the department, as we receive them by the hundreds. I will have a special interview with him when he returns. I have a report here on the coal situation and it may include Hamilton. My deputy handed it to me as I was setting out for the Council Chamber, and I have not had an opportunity of looking at it yet. We keep tab on things.

Mr. MACDONALD: That is all you are doing—keeping tab.

Mr. CROTHERS: You do not know what we are doing. That is the trouble with the hon. member for Pictou; it is the trouble, not only with him, but with some other hon. gentlemen opposite. They come here and make statements without having definite knowledge of the facts.

Mr. MACDONALD: What are you doing?

Mr. CROTHERS: If you will devote half an hour of your time coming to my office and looking over the reports, you will know something about what we are doing. You do not want to know what the Labour Department is doing. You want to be in a position to make charges against the Labour Department.

Mr. MACDONALD: You want to keep up prices.

Mr. CROTHERS: You want live grievances. Just as soon as one grievance is settled, you start to dig up another. We all know the hon. member for Pictou, and he is well known, not only in this House, but throughout the country, and we do not care very much what he says, either in this House or outside of it.

Mr. MACDONALD: That is childish talk.

Mr. CROTHERS: That is perfectly true. We have taken up the matter of sugar refineries and we have succeeded in breaking up what we regarded as an illegal agreement existing between the manufacturer of sugar and the middleman. We unearthed one particular case where a large manufacturer of sugar had a monopoly of the whole business in two provinces and we secured original documents showing that when a certain individual wrote asking him to send him so many carloads of sugar, the manufacturer replied, saying: "I cannot send you any sugar; you must become a member of a certain organization, and when you satisfy me that you are a member of that organization in good standing, then I will send you sugar." This gentleman went to the secretary of the organization and what did he find there? He found that he had to put up so much money and give a guarantee that he would invest $50,000, not all in sugar, but in groceries, to be put into a business that he was speaking about going into. There were only 52 men in the whole two provinces who could buy a pound of sugar from that refinery. We sent the report to the Attorney General of the province and he said that he would consent to a prosecution. The refinery came down off its perch and said: "Tell me what you want me to do and I will do it, whatever it is." And there is no such agreement existing in those provinces to-day. That is one of several instances of what we have done. We do not contend that we have succeeded in reducing the price of anything very considerably, but we have attempted to do so. We are securing facts and we have given publicity to what is going on. I have great confidence in publicity. I can satisfy any man in this country that, speaking generally, with very few exceptions, no retailer of coal in Canada to-day is selling it at an exorbitant profit.

Mr. PARDEE: That refers only to coal.

Mr. CROTHERS: Yes, that refers only to coal. We have made considerable investigations in regard to sugar, cold storage and canneries, but my hon. friend from West Lambton (Mr. Pardee) knows that this is a very large country and we have not a large staff in our department. I might, of course, have taken on fifty or sixty more civil servants at an expense of $100,000 or $150,000.

Mr. PARDEE: Even if this is such a large country, when special facts are brought to the notice of the department, do they act upon them?

Mr. CROTHERS: Yes.

Mr. PARDEE: Why did you not act in the Hamilton case?

Mr. CROTHERS: We did.

Mr. PARDEE: You did not act.

Mr CROTHERS: That will do now, if you please.

Mr. PARDEE: It will not do—the hon. minister cannot do that.

Mr. CROTHERS: Mr. Speaker, I submit that my hon. friend from West Lambton has no right to speak without my consent.

Mr. PARDEE: Then you will not answer the question?

Mr. CROTHERS: I have not refused to answer the question; I have answered the question.

Mr. PARDEE: No, you have not.

Mr. CROTHERS: Yes, I have. The question, Mr. Speaker, was—and I submit the matter to you—whether, when complaints were made to us, we took action or not, and I said that we did take action.

Mr. PARDEE: But you did not take action in the Hamilton case.

Mr. CROTHERS: Wait a moment.

Mr. PARDEE: You cannot bluff me.

The ACTING SPEAKER (Mr. Blain): Order.

Mr. CROTHERS: And you cannot bluff me. This is an old business of my hon. friend from West Lambton. What I know, I know, and I know that I sent a capable man to Hamilton.

Mr. MACDONALD: Oh, no.

Mr. CROTHERS: I ask you, Mr. Speaker,——

The ACTING SPEAKER (Mr. Blain): Order. I would ask hon. gentlemen to keep order.

Mr. CROTHERS: My hon. friend from West Lambton asked me if, when special facts were brought to our attention, we always looked into the matter. I told him that we did. He also asked about Hamilton and I said that we sent a man to Hamilton to look into the matter.

Mr. PARDEE: You did nothing in the Hamilton case.

Mr. CROTHERS: That will do from my hon. friend.

Mr. PARDEE: Mr. Speaker, I object. This hon. gentleman cannot tell me: "This will do." It will not do.

The ACTING SPEAKER (Mr. Blain): Order. The rule of the House, as I understand it, is that when an hon. member has the floor, he cannot be interrupted without his permission.

Mr. PARDEE: I quite appreciate that, Sir, but I will not be told by any hon. member that "that will do," without having your ruling.

Mr. CROTHERS: You have been told that, it has been done. I sent a man to Hamilton and he inquired into this matter. I have not had an opportunity of going over it with him, but I am satisfied that if at all possible, he will make right anything that is wrong. It was not necessary that we should send a man to Hamilton, because the Hamilton city council is composed of intelligent men and I suppose they have an intelligent solicitor, although I do not know who he is. It was quite within their province and it was their duty, under that Order in Council, to work out their own salvation in fear and trembling.

Mr. PARDEE: And without the help of the department which kept away from the matter.

Mr. CROTHERS: We have endeavoured to do something. We have prepared a set of regulations which are of great value. I do not mean to say that they are perfect. After an Act is passed by this Parliament and after we have attempted to administer it for any length of time, we find defects in it and we amend it, just as in the case of the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act defects were revealed to my predecessor and defects have been revealed to me under our administration of it. That is our experience of administering the law. We pass an Act here for a certain purpose; we expect it to operate in a certain way; but we find, when we come to apply that Act, that it is defective. We come back to Parliament and ask that those defects be remedied. I do not contend that these regulations are perfect, but I do contend that two or three other gentlemen with myself have spent a long time in preparing them, and we did the very best we could. We shall be very glad to make any amendments that may be suggested towards their perfection by my hon. friend from Glace Bay (Mr. Carroll) or by any other member in this House, or any one outside of this House. We are attempting to do something in the direction of helping the poor people.

The prices of the necessaries of life are very high, but owing to the fact that our working people are employed throughout this country at high rates of wages, there is no suffering in this country. Our working pople, I am told, have more money than they ever had before. I do not say that is a reason why we should not do anything further for them in the way of a reduction in the prices of foodstuffs, but I say that the working people of this country are better off to-day than they have ever been before. They are getting higher wages and many of them are putting money in the bank. I remember the time—I am only a boy yet—when the right hon. leader of the Opposition was a member of a government in this country, and when soup kitchens had to be opened and carried on in every great city and town in Canada to feed the people, and when the people went to the Government of which my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition was a highly respected member, what were they told? The Government told them through its great Minister of Finance " The Government can do nothing. The Government is merely a fly on the wheel. The only remedy is for the people to work harder and eat less." That is what the people were told at that time. But we have made an effort to do something, and we have done something. I am satisfied that the publicity that has been given to these regulations has achieved something. We are administering them as well as we can; we have not had much experience in this particular line; we do not claim that they are perfect; we are ready to amend them if they can be improved. But we have done something by publicity. The wholesale men, the retail men and the consumers know that there are men in the Labour Department watching prices in the interests of the people of this country. The cards that come in set forth the exact truth, I believe, and where there is anything suspicious as to prices we get after them right away, and we propose to do so on every occasion.

With regard to Hamilton, let me repeat that we sent a capable man down there. I do not know what he did, as I have not had an opportunity of talking it over with him since; I have been so very busy looking after the hundreds of questions and scores of motions that hon. gentlemen opposite are putting every day. On account of our time being thus taken up, important questions concerning this country are not receiving the attention they otherwise would. If hon. gentlemen opposite would drop these petty motions and questions and rise to the occasion it would be very much better. Let them follow the example of Elihu Root, or Teddy Roosevelt, and other leading men in the United States, who said to the President, "You are on the other side of politics, but that does not make any difference; we will stand behind you to a man; we will do everything that it is possible to do." Elihu Root said, "There is no coalition in the United States; we do not want any coalition; there is a coalition in every individual who is standing behind the President." If hon. gentlemen opposite would act in that way towards this Government we should have more time to look after prices in Hamilton and in the little town of Sarnia, in the constituency of my hon. friend from Lambton.

Mr. W. S. LOGGIE (Northumberland, N.B.): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with a good deal of pleasure, and sometimes regret, to the remarks of the hon. Minister of Labour. He set out with a grievance. He said that the time of the House was being taken up by trivial questions from members of the Opposition. Mr. Speaker, I thought this was a free assembly, and that it was the duty of every hon. member of this House to get such information as he desired in the interests of the public. The hon. Minister of Labour used what I think was a very unfair innuendo when he said, "Men are more anxious to win the treasury benches than to win the war." I ask you, Mr. Speaker, if it is fair for a minister of the Crown to speak in that way of His Majesty's loyal Opposition?

Mr. CROTHERS: I did not make any accusation of that kind against you.

Mr. PARDEE: Oh, yes.

Mr. CROTHERS: No. Look up what I said in Hansard.

Mr. LOGGIE: I took the minister's words down at the time. He said, "men more anxious to win the treasury benches than to win the war."

Mr. McKENZIE: We will win both.

Mr. CROTHERS: The hon. gentleman has only taken down part of what I said. I said that friendly strangers sitting in the gallery and looking down upon us might be pardoned if they reached the erroneous conclusion that there were men more anxious to win the treasury benches than to win the war.

Mr. McKENZIE: Hansard will have to be changed to show that.

Mr. CROTHERS: Hansard will show what I said.

Mr. LOGGIE: That is a very flimsy explanation. But the minister went further. He used unbecoming language towards the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff), the hon. member for Moosejaw (Mr. Knowles), and the hon. member for Richmond (Mr. Kyte), when he said that he would have taken no notice of what they had said had it not been for the remarks of the hon. junior member for Halifax (Mr. A. K. Maclean). I think it is not becoming for a minister of the Crown to speak in that way of His Majesty's loyal Opposition. We expect a back bencher to say things like that sometimes, but a minister of the Crown ought to be above it. The Minister of Labour tried to make out that His Majesty's loyal Opposition was responsible for unduly delaying the work of the House. Why, the minister himself has spoken for nearly two hours this afternoon and almost ninety per cent of what he said was already on Hansard. It is practically all contained in the eleven columns of Hansard from page 1217 to page 1233, which is the report of the minister's speech the other night. Then my hon. friend went on to talk about the days when there were soup kitchens in Canada. If he had stopped there I would not object so much, but he said that these soup-kitchen days were when my right hon. leader was leading the Liberal party. Now, I have followed the affairs of Canada pretty closely from the time the present leader of the Opposition was leading the Government in 1896 down to 1911, and I do not know of a single occasion during all that time when there were soup kitchens in Canada. But I do know of an occasion since then, when Sir Robert Borden was Prime Minister.

Mr. CROTHERS: My hon. friend misunderstood me. I did not say that it was when my right hon. friend was leading the Government, but that he was a member of that Government. Everybody knows the time I refer to, 1877.

Mr. LOGGIE: I am very glad to accept the hon. minister's explanation that he did not mean to say that.

Mr. CROTHERS: I did not say it either.

Mr. LOGGIE: He is so busy, that is the minister's plea. Busy? Why, he has spent two hours to-day simply repeating what he told the House the other night. There is one thing he said this afternoon which I think I can quote accurately: "I have great confidence in publicity." Well, I think the minister will be fairly well published. I am glad to learn that the department is busy—and as thy servant was busy here and there, he was gone. I wondered what the minister was blowing about, if I may use that expression, regarding the work of his department. He is administering an Act that was put on the statute book by the Liberal party. I am glad to know that he is amending it, and doing what he believes to be his part, although, as has been well said, it is more talk than real good work. He has added that Order in Council—that is what I have in mind.

Mr. CARVELL: Putting the burden on the municipalities.

Mr. LOGGIE: Yes. We had that brought up in the council in my own town, and did not get very far ahead with it. We found it was not working out very effectively. I do not know that I can say more regarding the minister's address, for he did not say much that really touched the matter of the Budget. Of course, the hon. gentleman was quite within his rights in speaking on these matters in an address on the Budget.

I regret that I was not here to listen to the Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White) make his statement, and to hear the reply of the critic (Mr. A. K. Maclean) on this side of the House. I have read the two speeches with some interest, and I may say that the reading of the Finance Minister's speech was a mingled joy and sorrow. I rejoice that we have been able to secure the necessary money to do our part in this great war. I rejoice that so many of our men had voluntarily taken their lives in their hands for the defence of home and liberty. I rejoice because of their heroic achievements. I rejoice that it is my privilege to make this statement on the floor of this House. But I sorrow, at the same time, because the Government has not been able to implement its undertaking to have 500,000 men in training or at the front. I regret that we seem to be unable to do our full part. I sorrow for the bereaved relatives of our fallen and maimed heroes. I sorrow because we lose their help in the development of this great country of ours. I make this further remark, and I make it entirely as a personal remark—the Government has tried in vain to fulfil its promises; but they are responsible for this failure and ought now, even now, to call others to their aid and, together with the Opposition party, form a government that would get the men, voluntarily or otherwise. If there were more unanimity of action, the complement of men would probably be forthcoming.

We learn from the Budget speech also that $60,000,000 of this fiscal year's receipts are available for war expenditures over and above the expenditures on consolidated revenue and capital accounts, including interest and pensions. It is interesting to me, and I suppose it will be interesting to other hon. members and the public at large, to know the sources from which the money expended during 1917 came. I may not have all the items, but I think the statement I shall make is practically correct. We find that for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1917, war taxes were collected through the Customs amounting to $38,000,000. About $1,000,000 was collected through the Inland Revenue Department in bill stamps and other stamps on medicines, etc., and about $6,000,000 on spirits and tobacco—that is, in excess of what would have been collected under the rates of duty in existence before war was declared. Then, we collected about $6,000,000 in extra stamps through the Post Office Department. Besides there is $15,000,000 business tax. According to the Minister of Finance we had $60,000,000 to apply to war expenditure. But the figures I have given show that we have received from the people no less than $64,000,000 for war taxes paid in support of this glorious cause. I am glad to be able to congratulate the people upon the fact that, though so many other calls were made upon us, it was possible to raise this great sum by the contributions of rich and poor alike. This $64,000,000, divided among the families of Canada, and assuming five members to each family, means that the average family in Canada paid as a war tax last year no less than $40. That, to my mind, is greatly to the credit of our people. But it is not to be forgotten that, while we collected through the Customs $38,000,000 of war tax, we collected also the fabulous sum of $110,000,000 which was used to defray the ordinary expenses of departmental administration, public works, and interest. That $110,000,000, divided amongst all the families in Canada, as I have already indicated, would mean a further tax on every family of not less than $75. I repeat I am glad the Canadian people have the means of paying such taxation and thus helping to win the cause for which we are fighting and which is so dear to us. It has been well said that silver bullets will win the war. When the war started that statement was made by the present Prime Minister of England, then Chancellor of the Exchequer. Thus, it is important that we do our part not only in regard to men and munitions, but in regard to money, because silver bullets are perhaps as much required for the winning of the war as are men and munitions.

The Government have increased the customs taxation, as they say, for a worthy cause, and I am not finding any fault with it in that respect. They have increased the tariff by five per cent on British goods and seven and a half per cent on importations from foreign countries. That means that while $84 on a given value was levied in 1915, $100 is being levied in the fiscal year 1916-17. The Government, in doing this, were within their rights and they had the good will of the Opposition, but there was this difference between the Government and the Opposition: the Opposition thought it was unwise that the products of the Mother Country should thus be hindered from coming into this part of the Empire. They accept responsibility before the country for the stand which they have taken in regard to this matter, and they say that some other means should have been found for raising this extra money, rather than the imposition of an increased duty on commodities coming from the Mother Country to Canada.

There is another thing regarding customs taxation that should be borne in mind. I have told you what the taxes are, that we have paid the equivalent of about $115 per family into the treasury by way of customs duties. But we ought not to forget that only about 25 per cent of the goods consumed in Canada are imported from abroad. The other 75 per cent is represented by our own Canadian manufactured goods. What I allege is that, while we consume Canadian goods, we pay —I will not say the whole—but a very large portion of the duty that would be collected if these goods were imported. We pay in duties which go into the treasury, together with what we pay the manufacturers because of the tariff, perhaps $300 or $400 per family annually. Thus we have in this country a tax so much of which is paid to the manufacturers and so much directly to the treasury. I think our slogan at the present time should be: reduction in the cost of food products, with lower tariff on imported food products, especially those not indigenous to Canadian climate and soil.

Mr. BURNHAM: Cheaper fish.

Mr. LOGGIE: Yes, cheaper fish, if it is possible to get it by reducing the duties on fish. I will stand by my hon. friend from Peterborough (Mr. Burnham) on that doctrine. Take the duties off fish, take the duties off all natural products and reduce the duties on food products, even if they are manufactured in Canada, to the lowest minimum consistent with the necessary expenditure of the country. I think that is sound doctrine. I think the country will prosper under a tariff along those lines very much more than it will under a tariff the basis of which is what I call class legislation. I think the party who put that class legislation tariff on the statute book are responsible for a good deal of the trouble that we have in this country. We stand for a tariff that does not imply or include class legislation.

With regard to the Budget speech of my hon. friend the Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White), I have really not a word to say against the proposals he made. Very many of them, I realize, are necessary under the circumstances. The minister put it to the people of Canada how the extra revenue was to be raised. He indicated several sources of further taxation. He gave reasons why it was not, perhaps, wise to impose higher taxation on luxuries, and I agree with a good deal that the Finance Minister said. With regard to the increased taxation on business profits, I do not see how he could very well do any better under the circumstances. Therefore, I have very little criticism to make in that regard.

Now I come to another matter, and I regret that I cannot speak in the same terms with regard to this. I think I might as well take up the criticism of the Finance Minister first. I had the pleasure of listening to the Minister of Finance while he addressed the House on the amendment which was proposed, and I regret to say that it was a heated, partisan speech that he made, so much so that I wondered if an election was in sight next week or in ten days. The first passage in the minister's address to which I wish to refer is to be found on page 982. The Finance Minister was speaking of the right hon. gentleman who leads the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) and he used these words:—

My right hon. freind notwithstanding his free trade professions in 1893, when he got into office followed in the footsteps of Sir John Macdonald and Sir Leonard Tilley——and so on. The reference to 1893 is to the Liberal platform which was laid down that year. I want to read another clause from the minister's speech. This is also in reply to a remark by Sir Wilfrid Laurier. The remark was:

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: He did nothing of the kind. The policy of Sir Leonard Tilley in 1879 was that reciprocity of tariff would conduce to reciprocity of trade.

And then came the minister's reply, and certainly it was a very heated partisan reply:

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I am sorry that my right hon. friend has not got over 1911. He tried upon that occasion to prove the impossible. He tried to prove that under reciprocity the farmer would get more for his product but that the consumer would pay less.

Note the words. And then he goes on:

We all know that when my right hon. friend attempted to prove that to the people of Canada he was fore-doomed to failure. Not even my right hon. friend could do that. He could not prove the impossible.

And then later on, when the hon. member for St. John came into the House:

Mr. PUGSLEY: And the Minister of Finance argued the other way then.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: My hon. friend was out of the House when I pointed out that among other reasons why my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) signally failed in 1911, was that he attempted to prove to the intelligent people of this country that the farmer would get more for his product and the consumer would pay less.

Do you notice that this is a pet phrase. There is not one word different, except that "and" is substituted for "but." He told my hon. friend:

My hon. friend would hardly expect me to embark upon that undertaking after the example of 1911.

The hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Lalor) spoke somewhat along the same lines. At page 1152 of Hansard he said:

It is the same old thing to-day as it was in the time of the reciprocity campaign, an attempt to deceive the people of this country. In my county on the day of the official nomination we always have a big public meeting in order that the candidates may express their views to the electorate. I remember that at the last official nomination during the reciprocity campaign a friend of mine handed me a leading Liberal paper of Toronto. One edition of that paper was issued for the farmers to read and the other for the people in the towns and cities. One told the farmers that if they had reciprocity they would get higher prices, that everything would be worth more, butter, eggs, wheat, stocks of all kinds—everything would go up. The other edition told the people living in the cities and towns that they would buy everything cheaper. Well, it was amusing.

I shall not attempt to answer in detail the allegations of the hon. member for Haldimand. I should like, in the first place, to see the Liberal newspaper that made the statement in the words as there presented to the public through Hansard. I venture to say this, that the words are not accurate. I might enlarge on my reasons for thinking they are not accurate but I shall not do so now. But if they are accurate, they are only the opinion of an individual writer, and not the opinion of the Liberal party as a party, nor are they the findings of the present leader of the Opposition the Right Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier. But I think I ought to reply to the allegation of the Minister of Finance. The words to which I want particularly to address myself are:

That the farmer would get more for his product and the consumer would pay less.

I want to tell the House, if I can, what is involved in that statement. In the first place, the statement on its merits, using the exact words as there presented to the country and to the House, are not accurate so far as the policy of the Liberal party is concerned; and they are not accurate as a statement of what was involved in the reciprocal trade relations that were under the consideration of the country at that time. I wonder if the first allegation of the minister is correct. It is divided into two parts, that the farmer would get more for his product is the first statement. I ask myself that question and I ask you that question, is it true that, under the reciprocal trade relations the farmer would get more for his product? Do I need a witness after the speech of the Minister of Finance? I have his testimony for it, because he was so pronounced that it would be most unfair eight, five, or four weeks before, to have free wheat passed as part of the Budget. Why, he said, there were possibly 50,000,000 bushels in the West, and, at 10 cents a bushel, it would be $5,000,000, or if there were only 25,000,000 bushels, it would be, at 10 cents a bushel, $2,500,000. What about the $2,500,000? Why, he said, it would be just that much out of the pockets of the farmer in the West. Do I need another argument to buttress my case that the farmer does get the benefit of natural products going free into the American market, and that if his product is subject to duty, the farmer pays the duty?

If this is true regarding wheat, it is equally true regarding such products as fish, hay, potatoes, shingles, laths and so on, commodities which were mentioned in the proposed reciprocal trade arrangement with the United States. Do I need any other argument than this to prove that the allegation of the leader of the Opposition and of the Liberal party is correct: that under the proposed trade arrangement, the producer of natual products in Canada, having the American market free, would get the benefit?

I see the Minister of Trade and Commerce before me. Would he say that the Canadian consumer would, under reciprocal trade arrangements with the United States, pay less for the products that he purchased? My hon. friend, for whom I have the greatest respect, would, no doubt, say in reply to that question: You had better be a little more definite; you had better not tease me by asking me something to which either "yes" or "no" would be a correct answer.

Mr. McKENZIE: He says that it is taken out of the realm of trade now.

[Mr. Loggie.]

Mr. LOGGIE: That is a pet phrase, if I may so express myself, of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, because you will notice that, with the use of the word "and" instead of "but," he repeats it later in his speech. Half a truth is the very worst kind of misrepresentation; the very worst kind of lie. I say that that statement made by the Minister of Finance on behalf of the Tory party is a deliberate, wilful misrepresentation of the facts as presented to the people of Canada during the election of 1911. At that time I stumped my county from one end to the other, and I made no such statement as that, leaving it where the minister left it. I made the matter clear, as I shall make it clear to this House in a few moments; yet the Tory press came out with head lines something like this: Heads I win, and tails you lose. Let me paraphrase that statement of the Minister of Finance and give it as my right hon. leader made it and as the intelligent people of Canada understand it:

> The farmer would get more for his product and the consumer would pay less for United States products imported under the reciprocal trade arrangement from the United States.

It is true that under the reciprocal trade arrangement with the United States the farmer would get more for his products, and it is equally true that the consumer, buying American products coming into Canada free or under a reduced tariff, would get those commodities for less money.

The question was asked, in a local paper in my district, how I could argue that the United States consumers would not get the benefit of duties taken off goods entering the United States, whereas Canadian consumers would get the benefit of duties taken off goods entering Canada. This is true, and I will tell you why. On general principles, the country that imposes taxes on imported goods simply asks the consuming public to pay that tax. But there are exceptions to all rules; let me tell you that this is an exception to the general rule. First, it must be remembered that we have to the south of us a population of 100,000,000, in round numbers, and we have in Canada 8,000,000 people. When we buy a commodity in the American market, we must buy it at its market value in the United States, because we are not a sufficient factor materially to change the price. The United States market is a world market, and we must buy at their market price, or not buy at all. Let us examine the conditions of our selling in the United States such commodities as I have named. When I was running my election, I contended that I was not sure that hard wheat would receive any benefit if the United States took the duty off, because I considered that the price on the Liverpool market largely determined the market value of wheat in the United States. Of course, I had reference to hard wheat. Now we have the minister saying that on low grade wheat the farmer will receive an additional 10 cents a bushel by reason of the removal of the duty. As I say, if we market goods in the United States, we must accept the conditions that exist there. If I have no other market for, say, 10 carloads of fish, I must send them to the New York market and accept the New York market price. If the weather is cold and if fish are scarce, I get a better price, and whatever the duty is, I get that much less for the commodity that I market. That is true of potatoes, shingles, laths, hay, and of practically every commodity that was mentioned in the reciprocity trade arrangement.

If we were having an election at this time and if this statement of my hon. friend were made on a public platform, I would not mind it so very much, but I say it is unfair criticism for a minister of the Crown to repeat it in this House, using this slogan: "The farmer gets more and the consumer less," which on the fact of it is ridiculous. With a proper and true interpretation it is absolutely the case that on our home products that we would market under the reciprocal trade relation, the increased price would inure to the benefit of the farmers of Canada, and on the imported goods that would be marketed under the same trade relation, the reduced duties would inure to the benefit of the Canadian consumers. How much benefit would the Canadian consumer receive? On the basis of the imports for 1910, the reduction in the duties would amount to $2,200,000; that is, under the reciprocal trade relation, the Canadian consumers would have paid $2,200,000 less than he actually had to pay for those imports in 1910. That is not all. I do not need to remind the Minister of Trade and Commerce of this fact, because I know that his mind is acute on these matters, even if he is not a practical business man, but let me remind other hon. members of it. The Canadian consumers pay $2,200,000 into the customs house of Canada, but do they pay more than that? In the first place the goods, after having been taken out of customs, are received by the wholesale merchant who adds on a profit of not less than fifteen or twenty per cent. The hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Lalor), speaking about the Dominion Canners Limited, the other night, said that they sold their goods at a profit of ten per cent, and the hon. member was quite correct in that statement, but he did not tell the whole story. Up to a certain point, they do sell their goods at an advance of ten per cent, but that is when they are delivered practically from the factory to the retailer without being taken into the wholesale warehouse, but for later delivery the price is raised 2½ cents. That, however, is a digression. The point I wish to make is this, that the saving to the Canadian consumers would be practically $3,000,000, because the wholesale distributor adds fifteen or twenty per cent profit on to the $2,200,000 and then the retail merchant adds his percentage of profit on to what he has paid to the wholesale merchant. Therefore, I say that if we had had this trade arrangement for the last four years, the consumers of Canada would have saved no less a sum than $12,000,000. There is, of course, a reasonable answer to my statement, namely, that in these war times we must have money and the treasury would be minus that amount if the reciprocal trade relations were in force. That would be perfectly true, but what I think is right is that the country ought to know that these allegations of the Tory party are absolutely unfounded.

I wish to refer to just one more matter in regard to the reciprocal trade relation, because the Minister of Finance was again very partisan in regard to it. On page 983 of Hansard of this year, the minister said:

> The chief objection was the fact of the agreement. It is true that on its face it was stated that it was not a treaty but in substance and in fact it was a treaty and when it was entered into the late Government lost to a considerable degree the control of its own tariff.

I do not consider that to be a fair criticism. I will read the words of the agreement and I will leave it to any hon. member that listens to my voice to judge if that is a fair criticism of the words of the agreement. That is the kind of criticism that helped to win the election of 1911, and it looks to me as if it will be used again as a slogan. No contract can be broken without the consent of both parties unless there is a clause in it empowering either party to break or change it, and that is exactly what is in this agreement, the words of which are as follows:

Nevertheless, it is distinctly understood that we do not attempt to bind for the future the action of the United States Congress or the Parliament of Canada, but that each of these authorities shall be absolutely free to make any change of tariff policy or of any other matter covered by the present arrangement that may be deemed expedient.

That means that after the agreement has been passed by Parliament, Parliament, on any occasion, the next day if they choose, can amend it. According to the words of the contract they can do anything they please regarding what they have done. What more can you do to-day regarding wheat that you have put on the free list? You put it on to-day and you can take it off to-morrow. The power that made wheat free can unmake it. The power that made that agreement can unmake it, according to its terms. I may be dense; I may not understand the situation; I may not have the acute mind that the Minister of Finance has, but I fail to come to any other conclusion from the reading of the words of that agreement. I do not know that I can say anything further regarding the Finance Minister's address to the House or the amendment before the House.

I was surprised at the heated argument he made. He talked just as if an election were coming on next week, and "free wheat" was to be the slogan of his party; and incidentally they would ridicule reciprocal trade relations just as they ridiculed them in 1911. Suppose I were to ask the Minister of Finance: "Do you realize that you have taken out of the pockets of the farmers of Western Canada from $6,000,000 to $10,000,000 during the last three years?" I am sure that if he were in his seat he would say: ("Why how have I taken $6,000,000 or $10,0000,000 out of their pockets)" Let me answer him in his own words.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess.

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. LOGGIE (resuming): The words of the Minister of Finance to which I referred are to be found in part on page 988, as follows:—

Well, ten cents on fifty million bushels means $5,000,000, and on twenty-five million bushels, $2,500,000. Does my hon. friend mean to say that if this is a proper course for us to take in the national interest at this time of war conditions, the farmer in the West is not entitled to that ten cents.

[Mr. Loggie.]

That is a question put by the minister to a member on this side of the House. Later —page 989—he said:—

They say we should have included this free wheat measure in the Budget, and debated it for a month or six weeks, and two months from now the proposals would be enacted into law. Supposing we had done that? It would mean that the farmer of the West would have been deprived all that time of ten cents a bushel in respect of the low grade wheat he exported to the United States.

Thus we have the testimony of the Minister of Finance, that, if there be 25,000,000 bushels of wheat in the West to-day for export to the United States, the removal of the duty will mean that the farmers will put $2,500,000 in their pockets. If the farmers of the West will be $2,500,000 better off because we put wheat on the free list at a certain time instead of two months later, how much better off would they be if wheat had been put on the free list in 1914? It is fair to say that the party in power to-day has deliberately and without good reason taken from the pockets of the farmers of the West a sum of not less than $6,000,000 to $10,000,000, and this with practically no benefit to any industry in Canada and no advantage to the treasury of Canada, the whole sum accruing to the benefit of the treasury of the United States, according to the testimony of the Minister of Finance himself.

Mr. BLAIN: How does the hon. gentleman reconcile the statement made by his friends from the West, that taking the duty off wheat would mean a higher price to farmers of the West, and the statement of his friends from the East that the same change would result in enabling the mechanics of the East to buy flour at cheaper rates?

Mr. LOGGIE: I do not believe the hon. member (Mr. Blain) was in the House this afternoon when—

Mr. BLAIN: I was.

Mr. LOGGIE: Then I am afraid the hon. gentleman is very dense—I hope I may be pardoned for saying so.

Mr. BLAIN: Does the hon. gentleman deny that his friends have made the statements to which I have referred?

Mr. LOGGIE: No, but if the hon. gentleman would state the whole case he would get at the truth of it. It is demonstrated by the Minister of Finance that the farmer gets the benefit of the removal of the United States duty. Now, if the effect be to put up the market value of that class of wheat in Canada, and if that class of wheat, made into flour, is consumed in Canada, then, of course, the consumer must pay accordingly; the consumer, every time, pays the value of the article on the market where it is consumed.

Mr. BLAIN: I do not wish to interrupt the hon. gentleman, but how does he explain the statements of his friends to which I have referred?

Mr. LOGGIE: I thought I had made myself clear enough for the hon. gentleman to grasp the situation. If the farmer gets more for his wheat, and if that wheat is converted into flour and sold in Canada that flour is worth just that much more to the consumer. But, on the other hand, if the hon. gentleman will consult the figures of imports into Canada under this free wheat system, he will probably find that in certain parts of the Dominion American flour is used. That flour will come in free of duty, and the consumers will benefit to the extent of fifty cents a barrel as compared with what they would have had to pay had the duty been maintained. No argument can be used against this, except that it will be alleged that this affects adversely the Canadian miller. But do you mean to tell me that the millers of Canada, are not able to compete with the millers of any other country? We can export our wheat to all the markets of the world. Will anybody tell us, then, that we cannot compete in supplying our own market—that we cannot feed our own people? Do you mean to say that we need a bounty, or that our people must be compelled to pay more for flour than that flour is worth when we send it abroad? Now, if I have not made myself clear, I shall be glad if the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Blain) will ask me any other question.

Mr. BLAIN: If that is the best the hon. gentleman can do, I accept it.

Mr. LOGGIE: That is very kind of the hon. gentleman. If I had explained it to him that two and two make four, I suppose he would have "accepted" it as the best I could do, but would really be dissatisfied because I had not said that two and two make five.

Now, I wish to deal a little more at length with a statement of the Minister of Finance to which I have already referred. The minister made the allegation that in 1893 the right hon. gentleman who leads His Majesty's loyal Opposition, laid down a platform of free trade. And, the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards), speaking the other evening, said:

> Nor have I any particular regard or admiration for a leader who denounced protection as a thing accursed of God and man, and promised free trade, and yet for all the time he remained in power maintained that so called curse in practically the same position as it was when he assumed the reins of office.

That is a rather serious charge that the hon. member for Frontenac has made and perhaps there is not another hon. gentleman in this House who would make such an allegation as that. Let us see if that was the platform of the Leader of the Opposition in 1893. I was a delegate to the Liberal Convention of 1893. It was held in Ottawa three years before the general election of 1896. I had the pleasure of attending every one of those meetings. I heard the right hon. gentleman address the convention, I heard the speakers from different portions of the Dominion, and I say here and now to every hon. gentleman in this House that it is absolutely beyond the truth to tell the House that the policy of the Liberal party in 1893 was free trade. Such a statement can only be made with malice aforethought. If hon. gentlemen consult the minutes of the convention, they will find no such words in the platform of the Liberal party as laid down in 1893. It is unfair criticism for a Minister of the Crown to insinuate that the policy of the Liberal party in 1893 was free trade. It was on that platform that the Liberals went to the country. What was the platform of the Liberal party at that date? I need not tell hon. gentlemen because I am doubtful if there is any one in this House who does not know what that platform was. That platform was a tariff for revenue purposes and reciprocal trade relations with the United States in natural products. The latter part of the platform was favoured by the Conservative party, and it had been their platform from the time of the abrogation of the old treaty. When hon. gentlemen send such innuendos as that across the floor of the House there must be something doing. I leave them to conjecture what it is. Now, Mr. Speaker, I would expect you to ask: have the Liberals carried out that platform? We have the innuendo from the other side of the House that we have not done so. I am not going to say that it was carried out in full. Perhaps it was not, but this was done and it can be demonstrated by the blue book: In 1881, as a result of Sir John Macdonald's ministry which went into effect in 1879, as you will see by the Trade and Navigation Report issued by the Department of Customs in 1916, the average rate of duty was 20·19 per cent on dutiable and free goods. This means that two years after the Conservative tariff came into force 20·19 per cent was collected on imports dutiable and free. The Liberals came into power in 1896 and the Fielding tariff was adopted in 1897. In 1899, or two years after the Fielding tariff came into force, 16·17 per cent was collected on all goods dutiable and free, or 3·49 per cent less on the value of invoices for home consumption, or equal to about 17 per cent reduction in the amount of duty collected. On a given value, under the tariff of 1879, $100 was collected, while on the same amount in 1899, under the Fielding tariff, only $83 was collected.

Mr. WRIGHT: Is it not a fact that a reduction in the 1879 tariff was made by the Conservative administration before they went out of office?

Mr. LOGGIE: I must emphatically tell the hon. gentleman that there was nothing of the kind.

Mr. WRIGHT: And I just as emphatically state that it is a fact.

Mr. LOGGIE: If the hon. gentleman will permit me, I have it in the blue book and in the blue book it reads as follows:—

In 1881 percentage of duty to total value of goods entered for consumption, dutiable and free—20.19.

That is two years after the Conservative party came into power on their protection platform. In this same blue book, in 1899, the rate of duty collected on the average, dutiable and free, is given as 16·70 per cent. I cannot give the hon. gentleman any better evidence than the blue book issued by the Department of Customs.

Mr. WRIGHT: I do not wish to interrupt the hon. member in his speech, but what I was asking him was as to whether it was not a fact that there was a reduction between 1879 and the advent of the Liberal party into power, which he does not take into consideration.

Mr. LOGGIE: There has been a reduction. I would say in reply to my hon. friend, that has nothing whatever to do with my argument. I tell you that when we came into power we reduced the tariff by 17 per cent and kept on reducing it from then until we went out of power? And what did we find when we went into power? We found that the expenditure of this country on consolidated account was $2,000,000 more than the total revenues. We had to borrow on capital to pay the ordinary running expenses of the country. That is one reason why we could not very much further reduce the rate of taxation. But there may be a more difficult question than that for me to answer; if my hon. friend had asked me the other question that is perhaps pertinent to the matter, I perhaps could not have given him such a good answer. But I shall forestall the question myself. The innuendo has come across the House that the Liberal party came into power on tariff reform unfairly, that we preached free trade which is not true. My honoured leader may have said that he was in favour of freer trade, add but one letter to the word " free " and you have a truth. That is his doctrine. We were in favour of freer trade than existed in 1896, and we put that platform into practice. I have pointed out to you that we immediately reduced the taxation for where, before we came to power, the taxation levied on any article was $100, we reduced it to $83. But the more difficult question I have to answer is: Did you altogether eliminate the principle of protection? And now I am into perhaps more or less deep water. We eliminated it to the extent that I have pointed out by a general reduction of $17 on every hundred dollars of duty previously collected. But we did more than that; we eliminated much of the protection on several very important commodities. Let me illustrate two or three of them. When we came into power in 1896, we found that grey cotton, unbleached cotton, used by the poor people of this country, was taxed a specific duty as well as an ad valorem duty. The duty at that time was one cent per square yard and 15 per cent ad valorem. On shirtings, no matter if they cost only five cents per yard, there was a duty of two cents per square yard and 15 per cent ad valorem. On hosiery of all kinds there was a duty of two cents per pound and 15 per cent ad valorem. We wiped out the specific duty entirely, and we fixed an ad valorem duty very much reducing what these goods cost to the consumer—because all duties on goods coming into Canada are paid by the consumer. Then let me illustrate another article. When we came into power we found a specific duty on coal oil, burning oil, of seven and one-half cents per gallon. We reduced that immediately from seven and one-half cents to five cents. Thus you will find that, under the protective tariff, coal oil paid 50 per cent more duty than it paid after the Fielding tariff was put into operation. And then molasses was subject to 15 per cent on the cost at point of shipment. This was reduced at once to one and three-quarter cents per gallon. When we came into power we found that ready-made clothing had to bear a duty of ten cents per pound and 25 cents ad valorem. We immediately removed the specific duty and put that commodity under an ad valorem duty of 35 per cent. The same thing applies to woollen goods practically of all kinds which were subject to a duty of seven and one-half cents per pound and 20 per cent. The specific duty was removed, and these goods came under an ad valorem rate of duty. If I were asked: Does this altogether fulfil your pledge of 1893, included in the platform adopted at the convention which you say you attended? I do not know what answer I could make except this: All free assemblies make blunders.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: This one included.

Mr. LOGGIE: This one included. While we did very materially reduce the rate of duty and made the tariff practically a revenue tariff, it is to be regretted that here and there in that tariff we find that class legislation of which I spoke this afternoon, protection for a certain interest at the expense of the public. I would say first of all that in this country a moderately high tariff seems to be a necessity. We have a large expenditure, and a moderately high tariff, based on proper principles, on principles of fair play to everybody affected, is perhaps something we cannot do without. We cannot do without it at the present time, at any rate, nor can we avoid it unless something happens in the future which we can not now foresee. But I do say this, that it is unfair to tax the consuming public, say 40 per cent, on a food commodity, because that 40 per cent means 60 per cent when it reaches the consumer. I say it is most unfair to do that, and if blunders have been made in the past, hon. gentlemen opposite ought to rise to the occasion and correct the blunders. In these days when we are talking about high prices, the high cost of living, it is an opportune time for bringing food commodities down to a proper rate of duty. Of course we have the war expenditures to meet, and it may be that at the moment it is not opportune to effect this reform. But the principle that ought to be laid down in Canada today is the principle of the Liberal party, tariff for revenue purposes; and I say this, that in normal times, under ordinary conditions, no item of food product ought to be taxed under the tariff at over 20 per cent. I said, and I repeat, that a tariff for revenue purposes involves more or less protection.

It is incidentally a protection to every maker of the same kind of commodity. Moreover, if the maker of a commodity cannot, with a protection of from 20 to 25 per cent, compete with the maker of a similar commodity in another country he ought to divert his energies to some other field of activity. I do not believe in the doctrine of unduly taxing any commodity at the expense of the whole people; I believe that is not treating the people fairly. I pointed out this afternoon that perhaps every family in Canada is paying $300 or $400 a year into the treasury, or to the manufacturers of Canada, and I say that we should reduce that taxation as far as it is practicable to do so.

The hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Lalor) made some reference to the Dominion Canners Company the other night. I have not a word to say as to how the business of the Dominion Canners Company is conducted or as to what prices they charge to wholesale grocers or to the consuming public. That is their own business, and it does not fall to me to criticise them. But it is up to the Government to see that the Dominion Canners Company charge the consuming public a proper price for their products. Let me illustrate what I mean. There were imported into Canada during the fiscal year 1916 about $222,000 worth of canned fruits. What duty do you suppose went into the treasury because of that import? No less a sum than $87,000. In other words, the Dominion Canners Company are protected to the extent of 40 per cent on the canned fruits that they put on the market. I refer to the report of the Department of Customs, page 106, in which I find these figures:

> Fruits in air-tight cans or other air-tight packages, imports, general tariff, $222,940; duty collected, $87,672.06.

Thus, under the present tariff, the Dominion Canners Company are protected to the extent of practically 40 per cent, which, I say, is costing the consumers of Canada not only the 40 per cent, but the amount of the distributor's profit thereon—another 20 per cent.

The hon. member for Haldimand further said that every dollar of the capital of the Dominion Canners Company had been paid in hard cash. What I would like to know is whether the hon. gentleman meant the preferred stock only, or the common stock as well. I venture to say that the hon. gentleman told only half the story. I presume that he had reference to the preferred stock only and that the common stock when it was distributed, was gratuitous. That means that if the Dominion Canners Company earned more than a reasonable dividend on the preferred stock, the common stock would get a dividend at the expense of the consuming public, whereas no actual cash may have been paid for that common stock. Let me say that if the Government would take the matter in hand, I would not be a bit afraid of improper or undue prices for canned goods. I would not care whether the Dominion Canners owned every factory in Canada, provided the Government would see that they are not protected beyond a reasonable duty. In 1915 there was a very large crop in Canada. There were in that year several independent factories and there was a large pack. Among the factories there was undue competition and fairly low prices prevailed. This is what happened, and this is what the Government should guard against: What I would call a holding company was formed, and the small canners came in under the Dominion Canners Company. Can you not understand, then, why they had a good year in 1916? The Government was at their back with a 40 per cent duty on fruits—it is not so much on vegetables. I am sorry that the hon. member for Haldimand is not here. I would not even hint at anything which I knew to be inaccurate, and if I have said anything that is incorrect it will give me a good deal of pleasure to withdraw it, and I shall endeavour to withdraw it as publicly as I have stated it.

I have incidentally referred to the speech of the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards). I never in my life heard a more bitter or more partisan speech than I heard from the lips of that hon. gentleman the other night. I have read one of his statements; I wish to read a few more lines of what he said. I do not think that another gentleman in this House would make the assertions that were made by the hon. member for Frontenac. Listen to these words, Mr. Speaker. Take them under consideration as I read them.

I do not believe they represent the sentiments of the electors of Frontenac; I do not believe there is another gentleman in this House that would utter them. Listen to these words:

> A minister of the Crown seeks to impress upon the audience the importance of their duty in regard to the war, and he is hooted and jeered at and howled down by young men in that audience who evidently do not wish to listen to any appeals along the lines of recruiting or enlistment. The reason for this, Mr. Speaker, is clear. The man who is responsible for the condition of affairs that exists in the province of Quebec is the right hon. gentleman who leads the Opposition.

And further on the hon. member says:

> His teachings, more than any other cause, are responsible for conditions prevailing to-day in the province of Quebec—and sad conditions they are.

What can I say to remarks of that character? They are without truth in fact; they contain an innuendo that ill becomes the strongest party man in the Tory party in Canada, for, if Sir Wilfrid Laurier has done any one thing more than another in Canada, it has been to cement the races rather than to cause division. When we came to Parliament in 1914 and the leader of the Government made known the sad conditions of war, the leader of the opposition voluntarily and promptly made the statement that he would uphold the hands of the leader of the Government in everything regarding the war, and since that time he has practised what he has preached. Yet the hon. gentleman from Frontenac has the audacity to throw that innuendo across the floor against my right hon. leader and his followers in this critical time of war. Such an innuendo ill becomes the hon. member for Frontenac, and I am proud to believe that such are not the sentiments of the people of Frontenac, but simply his personal feelings—and he is a very caustic critic. If the criticism had been a fair one, I would hardly have taken up the time of the House in replying to it.

I wish to make another reference to what the hon. gentleman said. On page 1270 of Hansard, he made use of this language:

> I venture to say that men of the stamp of Howe, Tupper and Tilley would not approve the attitude of the Carvells and the Kytes. I venture to say that men of the stamp of Blake and Macdonald and Mackenzie would not endorse the attitude of men like the Turriffs. And, Mr. Speaker, men like Cartier would not endorse the attitude which the right hon. leader of the Opposition has taken since the war began.

I ask you, Sir, if it is a fair criticism towards my hon. friend from Assiniboia

(Mr. Turriff) who has sent his son to the trenches in France where his blood now mingles with the soil, for such an innuendo to come across the floor of this House when we are in this dreadful struggle and the Liberals as well as the Tories are doing their full part in the interest of home and liberty? In these dreadful days, criticism is ill becoming on either side of the House, and I am glad to repeat that I do not believe that such are the sentiments of the people of Frontenac, but I believe it is matter of undue partisan criticism with the idea that some party capital may be made out of it.

Mr. McKENZIE: Hear, hear. Nothing else.

Mr. LOGGIE: In the early part of my address, I stated that I thought the Government had not fully done their part. They have not been able to implement their promise to place 500,000 men in training or at the front. Even now, although it be perhaps too late for them to make overtures, they are the party in power; they are the party that have the power to move the world— we may look upon Canada as the world for a moment—they have the power to move the world if we are to do away with this miserable partisanship that exists in Canada to such an extent at the present time. The innuendo, of course, comes over to this side of the House that the Liberal party are responsible for that partisanship; but if the Liberal party, when the innuendo is thrown at them, put up a defence, is not that within their right? Do hon. gentlemen opposite expect the Liberal party, when they are struck on the right cheek to turn the left cheek as well? That is hardly the doctrine of my hon. friends opposite.

Mr. McKENZIE: That is not politics.

Mr. LOGGIE: The criticism regarding my right hon. leader is altogether uncalled for and should be regretted by every member to your right, Sir, as I know it is by every member to your left. The hon. member further on states as follows:

> But to-day we have men who for party and partisan reasons are risking the future of the community by encouraging a condition which has brought a part of our population almost to the verge of revolution.

Those words, if they were true, would be fraught with terrible consequences. If we have a revolution or if we have a condition of affairs verging on to that, it is not my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition that is responsible for it. If I were asked who it was that started the ball rolling, I would say it was my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. LOGGIE: I wish you would call order, Sir.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. LOGGIE: It is not my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition in this House who is responsible, as the hon. member for Frontenac charges, but my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce. He it was who set the ball rolling.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Hear, hear.

Mr. LOGGIE: What did the Minister of Trade and Commerce do? There was an election in Arthabaska once, just about the time a certain movement in the province of Quebec was noticeable. The Liberal party had a candidate in the field, and the Nationalist party put up an opposition candidate. It was then up to the Minister of Trade and Commerce, and what did he say?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Be careful now.

Mr. LOGGIE: You know what he said, Mr. Speaker, and my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce, knows too. "Anything to beat Laurier," that is what he said, and he did defeat Laurier. He started the ball rolling, and it has rolled and rolled ever since until the meeting at Montreal the other night, which was certainly not very creditable to the people of Quebec, and now the innuendo comes across the House that my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition is responsible for this condition of affairs. It is a slander; it is absolutely unfair criticism, and I do not believe that criticism of that kind will carry much weight in the country. It is calculated to set one province against another, and if there is one person more than another who has helped to put down this spirit of race against race it is Sir Wilfrid Laurier.

There is just one other criticism I have to make of the speech of my hon. friend from Frontenac. He says:

> It is very material to the future of this Dominion that the next Government which holds the reins of office should be in sympathy with Britain and with the British Empire, and should not be composed of the anti-British and the foreign element in Canada.

What shall I say to criticism of that kind?

Mr. MIDDLEBRO: Nothing.

Mr. LOGGIE: That is what it deserves. It ill becomes my hon. friend from Frontenac to impute disloyalty to the right hon. gentleman who leads the Liberal party in this House. Without saying it in so many words, the hon. member for Frontenac suggests that the right hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier should show his loyalty to the British Empire before he gets the confidence of the people, and that we should not have a Cabinet composed of an anti-British element.

Mr. EDWARDS: Does my hon. friend disagree with that?

Mr. LOGGIE: No, I guess I do not. But I will tell my hon. friend what I do disagree with, and that is the insinuation that there are men on this side of the House who are not in sympathy with Britain and the British Empire, but compose an anti-British and foreign element in this country. I take second place to no one in my loyalty to the British Crown.

Mr. McKENZIE: There are no holes in our flag.

Mr. EDWARDS: Your Saskatchewan musket could not have gone off then.

Mr. LOGGIE: I am really sorry that so much levity should be displayed, because I think this is a solemn occasion. I am sorry that hon. gentlemen opposite seem to enjoy the kind of criticism that is made by the hon. member for Frontenac. To me it is a very serious thing that when reference is made to a criticism of the hon. member for Frontenac imputing disloyalty to the Liberal party, hon. gentlemen opposite should lightly laugh.

There are just one or two other matters I wish to deal with. To my mind there are commodities just as important to the consumers of this country as wheat, which the Finance Minister recently put on the free list, and I want to give notice now that at the proper time—I cannot make the motion now as there is an amendment already before the House—I shall move that:

Potatoes, and potatoes dried, desiccated, or otherwise prepared, be put on the free list.

In conclusion, the war situation to my mind is such that we should endeavour to implement the promise of the Government, and if that cannot be done in the ordinary way, other means of doing it should be found. But the Government of the day are responsible. I should like to see all parties, if not the representatives of all views in this country, united in a common effort to implement the promise of the Government. The affairs of Canada, however are in the hands of the Government. They are all powerful; they are responsible to the people and to Empire, and it is up to them to make the overtures.

It is up to them to make the move; it is up to them to implement their promise. Even in fulfilling that promise we are not doing any more than our duty, and as a people we should not shirk any part of our duty in this crisis. We are fighting in a noble cause; we are fighting for liberty and right against oppression and wrong. It is the prayer of every one of us that the good cause may prevail. That prayer we should put into practice. With our "silver bullets," with our bodily strength, in every way, we should aid the Empire in this noble struggle for liberty and right.

Mr. JOSEPH EDMOND MARCILE (Bagot) (translation): Mr. Speaker (the Deputy Speaker, Mr. Rainville, in the chair), I followed very closely the several addresses on the Budget delivered by the Minister of Finance, his colleague of the Cabinet and the hon. members on both sides of the House.

The hon. member who preceded me (Mr. Loggie) discussed the tariff at sufficient length to allow me to leave that question aside and devote my attention to other fiscal matters.

The Minister of Finance claimed a large share of credit because on the 31st of March 1917, the trade of the country had reached the two billion mark. If you take into account the very great increase in the price of every article since 1911, and especially during 1917, it can be stated that our trade, both our imports and exports, has made no progress since 1911-12. During the year 1911-12 our business totalled near to one billion dollars. Consult the statistics of every market and you will find that not only have prices doubled, but have increased in some instances three and four-fold. Take the wollen goods from England as an example: they used to sell at $1.75 to $1.90 a yard; to-day they cost $4.25, $4.50 and up to $5.50. If the claim of increased trade of the hon. member were substantiated, our imports and exports should amount, not to two billions, but to over three billions of dollars.

In 1911-12, Mr. Speaker, we were exporting nothing for war purposes; this last year, although the Minister of Finance did not give us separately the figures relating to the munitions exported, it is well known that there have been exported from Canada during 1916-17 munitions to the amount of at least two hundred millions of dollars.

I view with alarm, Mr. Speaker, the tremendous increase in the public debt. We are told by the Minister of Finance that at the end of the last fiscal year our debt exceeded $900,000,000, and that we could expect to see it reach by March 31, 1918, $1,500,000,000, on which nearly $75,000,000 will have to be paid for interest alone; add to that the soldiers' pensions estimated at $20,000,000 to $25,000,000, and you have a total of over $100,000,000 quite apart from the amount required for the ordinary expenditure, which cannot be less than $75,000,000. All that we shall have to pay not less than $150,000,000 to $175,000,000, which somewhat exceeds the ordinary and extraordinary revenue before and after the war.

When we are confronted by such alarming conditions, is it not time to take notice? All members of this House, whatever their politics, have at heart the welfare of the citizens of this Dominion. Again I say, Mr. Speaker, that in order to secure this welfare we must stop to reflect and see whither the present Administration is leading the affairs of the country.

Since the advent of the present Government in 1911, secured by methods most reprehensible, hon. gentlemen on the other side have constantly contrived to stir racial antagonism, not only in the province of Quebec, but especially in the province of Ontario and in one other province in the West, by representing the people of the province of Quebec as disloyal to the Crown and opposed to Great Britain as a whole. In this regard it may be contended that the poor welcome given at Montreal last Monday to the Postmaster General is proof of our disloyalty. I wish to say, however, that the Postmaster General only got what is coming to him in Montreal, and deserves to be dealt with similarly in every locality where, after preaching nationalism in 1910-11, he returns to advocate Imperialism.

I claim without fear of any contradiction that His Majesty George V has no more loyal and devoted subjects than the French Canadians of the province of Quebec. It is recorded in our annals that but for the French Canadians, Canada would have been lost to England long ago. It is well known that at the time of the declaration of America's independence, in 1774, had the French Canadians consented to side with the thirteen revolted colonies, the Stars and Stripes and not the Union Jack would float to-day over our Parliament buildings. The position taken at the time by the French Canadians, not known to all and purposely ignored by others, was prompted in the main by the Roman Catholic clergy of the province of Quebec, who called upon the French Canadian people to give their lives, aye, the very last drop of their blood for the maintenance of that British dominion which was the bulwark of our rights and liberties in the province of Quebec, then the whole of Canada.

Later, in 1812, our friends from the other side of the line again invaded our territory. Who prevented the Americans conquest if not, to a large extent, the French Canadians of the province of Quebec?

It seems to me a marvel why our countrymen of Ontario, and in some western provinces, chiefly Manitoba, are so much opposed to my race. No other race in Canada is subjected to such obloquy and abuse; even the Germans, the fiercest foe of Great Britain in the present war, would receive better treatment. This country is peopled by many different races, there are Russians, Italians, Jews, Austrians, Syrians, and Germans; they all seem to be accorded due respect by the English-speaking element of Ontario; it is even proposed to replace French by Russian in the schools of that province. The population of Quebec is represented as made up of ignorant slaves, without energy, incapable and unworthy of constituting a desirable nation. We are despised, Mr. Speaker; we are even pilloried and yet, notwithstanding those insults, we remain loyal subjects of His Majesty when the bugle calls, summoning to the colours the descendants of those disloyal subjects, our youth leave home and friends, close their ranks around their country's flag, ready to defend it with their last breath and the last drop of their blood. How many of those noble sons have I not seen myself, leaving fine positions, promising careers, their parents and their friends to run to the defence of the Allies and especially England? Even I myself had two sons who were my pride and my hope; they crossed overseas to fight for the liberty of the world and to secure to the small nations a place under the sun and some measure of freedom. One of my sons is already at the front and the other is in England training until the day when he shall join his brother. Thousands upon thousands of our sons have responded to the call, and yet must we be told by a portion of the press in Ontario that we have done nothing. If the French Canadians have not enlisted, as the people of Ontario would have you believe, how is it that thousands of them have fallen on Europe's battlefields and that there are more of them ready to capture difficult positions that others cannot take. Let us not be deceived. It is an established fact that if the Germans have not taken Calais, all honour is due to the glorious 22nd battalion. At the battles of St. Julien, Festubert, Ypres, Langemarck, Courcelette and Vimy, our sons have given freely of their blood; and those battles are proofs to the whole world that the youth of the province of Quebec have remained worthy of their forebears, the discoverers, settlers, and defenders of this large and magnificent country of ours. More of them are wanted, Mr. Speaker; and still more of these brave scions of the French settlers in Canada.

Before doing more in that direction, should we not rouse to consider whether really we have not gone far enough and whether our more sacred duty is not to strive to the utmost to secure the results asked of our efforts, that is to put under cultivation as large an area as possible and work to intensify production? How is it possible to reach that end? We first must seed the land and that requires, not only stocks of seed, but hands to put it in. How can we procure the necessary seed when the railways do not supply us with cars? Are you aware, Mr. Speaker, that the conditions are worse than they are thought to be? Last year there was a complete failure of the crops in the province of Quebec and in other provinces to some extent. The Quebec farmer must buy almost all his seed for this spring. At the present time it is impossible to get the potatoes or grain that we need. Notwithstanding the exorbitant prices, the farmers are willing to buy, provided the railway companies and the Department of Railways at Ottawa produce the necessary cars. Should not the Government take the same steps regarding those different products of the farm as they have done on behalf of the newspapers when they fixed the maximum price of newsprint? My idea is that it is the Government's duty to settle a maximum price for potatoes, oats, barley and wheat, whatever at least is needed as seed for this spring.

The plea is put forward that there are no available cars; but it is well known to those who travel on the different railways in Canada that the sidings are filled with empty cars; you, Mr. Speaker, who live in the town of St. Lambert, know that such is the case in the Grand Trunk yard in that locality. The same occurs at Point St. Charles and Turcot; also on the Canadian Pacific, at both Viger and Windsor stations, and on the Intercolonial, I believe, Mr. Speaker, that with very little exertion on his part, the Minister of Railways could furnish enough cars to allow the shipment of potatoes from New Brunswick to the farmers of my county, who need them for seeding purposes. It has been found impossible to proceed with seeding operations through lack of transportation facilities. Judging from what is taking place and from the utterances of men who are fully aware of the requirements of the Allies, men like Lord Shaughnessy, the Hon. Mr. Balfour, Lloyd George and our own Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Foster) I must come to the conclusion that what is wanted most by the Allies is not more men and yet more men, but more food and still more food. That is what we are asked to furnish, but a large number of hands will be required to put in the crops, this spring, and to harvest them next fall. To secure farm help such salaries are asked that it will be impossible for the farmers to pay them. What is the remedy? I see only one possible suggestion: stop all recruiting for the army; keep in Canada all those who have enlisted; form battalions with available men who are willing to work on the land; give them a soldier's pay, and thus the farmers will secure the necessary help to sow the land and take in the crop, while paying a reasonable price; otherwise they cannot get the results expected of them.

The question of recruiting brings to mind the Postmaster General. No worse recruiting agent could be secured, because the people of Quebec put no faith in him whatever. Better try to recruit farm help than to enlist soldiers to help him to patch up the British flag which he claimed our ancestors had been forced to bore full of holes in order to breathe the air of liberty. If the Postmaster General's patriotism goes to the length he would fain have us believe, why not give up his salary to help recruiting farm hands for the province of Quebec?

We were told by the Minister of Finance on behalf of the Government that the fiscal year ending on March 31 last brought a surplus of $60,000,000. That money, Mr. Speaker, has been taken from the people in the form of duties and taxes. Speaking personally, I should have preferred to see that money applied to prepare the aftermath of the war, keeping the war expenses by themselves to be reclaimed from Germany in the treaty of peace.

During the whole of forty-one years, Mr. Speaker, I, as a merchant, sold articles of all kinds. I am sorry to say that during the later years most of what I sold was imported from Germany. Why not see to it that industries having to do with the manufacture of similar articles be established in this country? We are particularly well situated for the purpose, because Canada has a boundless supply of raw material.

Yesterday I listened to the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) on technical education. If, instead of applying to war purposes our surplus of sixty millions, a portion of it had been used to promote technical education in Canada, such a policy in my estimation would have been the part of wisdom and in the interest of the Canadian people.

The Government has appointed a commission to inquire into the country's needs after the war and suggest the best methods to adopt. The return has been brought down but I fail to see what measures the Government is taking on the lines suggested. The country's development calls for urgent and immediate action; let the Government be up and doing, or else at the next election the people will put into their places men capable of fostering the interests of the nation. During the recess, I had occasion to visit a portion of the province of Quebec which had been criticised by hon. gentlemen opposite when the right hon. leader of the Opposition thought fit to build the Transcontinental. I visited, Mr. Speaker, the Abitibi region, which had been represented as being altogether unproductive and inhabitable; it was claimed to be a waste of money to build a railway from Cochrane to Quebec. I was anxious to see for myself. Let me state that in insisting on the Transcontinental being built from Cochrane to Quebec the right hon. leader of the Opposition showed great foresight. When the resources of Canada's granary, the great western prairies, shall have been exhausted, we shall find in the North of the province of Quebec, in the Abitibi fields, another granary that will furnish, not only to the province of Quebec, but to the whole world, the wheat required for the sustenance of the peoples of the earth.

There is a defect, however, in the Transcontinental line from Cochrane to Quebec. The service is a poor one. For the last couple of years there has been some improvement, but the service is still unsatisfactory. There are two trains per day three times a week. Why not have only one train a day every day in the week? The men on the road are exceedingly careless. Freight cars are allowed to stay whole weeks at stations next to the points they are billed for, and if the owners protest, they are laughed at, if not given worse treatment. A little good will in the Department of Railways, and some fairness towards the province of Quebec, would soon secure to that favoured region thrifty settlers living happy and contented on fertile lands and in an ideal climate. Although I made the trip during the winter, I could see that the railway had been fairly well constructed, except for some slopes and curves between the Fitzpatrick and O'Brien sections, which have doubtless been changed with the object of injuring the road. Elsewhere the road is perfect. I hope the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Cochrane) will take my remarks in good part and do his utmost to right those conditions.

Well, Mr. Speaker, I think I have stated in all frankness and without prejudice, the situation as I view it and as many citizens view it also. And the situation being such, is it wise to continue recruiting for the war, when there is no necessity of more soldiers, unless it be to permit some people to cross to Europe for the purpose of patching the British flag bored full of holes, that French Canadians may breathe the air of liberty, as was stated in 1911, by my hon. friend, Mr. Blondin, at a meeting at St. Hyacinthe, where I had the pleasure of replying to him. In my opinion, it would be too costly to send over certain persons who are not wanted on the one hand and who would be of no use if they went.

I wish to add also that, in view of the urgent needs of the country, the Government should take the necessary steps to repatriate as soon as possible all soldiers who have been declared unfit for the service and who are paid $1.10 per day and fed in the military camps in England, where they are of no practical value to Great Britain or Canada. There are nearly one thousand of those in England. There are others whose names should be taken off the pay-list, colonels, lieutenant-colonels, captains, majors, lieutenants, who are merely good to show off in military parades and walk the streets of London. Even here in Canada we have quite a number of those officers whom we pay out of the public money drawn from the people's tax money, who are of no service whatever in the trenches and have lived in sloth long enough at the public expense.

We are being preached to practice economy, Mr. Speaker; I agree with the preaching, but I disagree with the preachers, who lack faith in their own teachings. They practice the very opposite of what they advocate. The returns from the various departments of the inside and outside service furnish ample proof of that fact. There has been a scandalous number of extraordinary appointments since 1911. On a visit to the Montreal post-office last winter, partly through curiosity and partly on business, I was astounded to see the large number of clerks in the various offices who had nothing else to do but order one another about doing nothing.

We have had also, Mr. Speaker, a return showing the number of Liberal employees discharged under the present Administration and the number appointed in their places. Can it be believed that, according to the return, ten thousand Liberals were discharged and twenty-one thousand friends of the Government appointed in their stead. Appointments have been made without any respect for the Civil Service Act, in fact in direct violation of the Act. Positions have been given to persons who can barely read, even on the staff of the Library, where surely of all places educated men are required. That employee was given a fat salary of $1,200, his appointment was made to date back six months before he entered on his work and he was granted an indemnity for lodging for six months prior to his taking up his duties because the Parliament buildings were burned down. We have here, Mr. Speaker, a sample of the manner in which the affairs of the country are administered by ministers who go into the cities and throughout the country clamouring for the strictest economy by the people. I was right in stating that those preachers lack faith in their own teachings.

A word as to National Service. If the desire was to obtain the information which we are told was aimed at, that is to find out how many people were disposed to work in the munition factories or on the land, the only way was to put the questions frankly, honestly and without any reticence. The cards had two queries which left a great deal to conjecture; they are questions 23 and 24. Many electors asked me if they should sign the National Service card. "Do so," I said, "but beware how you reply to the last two questions. If you are willing to go anywhere and in any capacity, answer 'yes'; if not, say 'no.' If you are ready to work in Canada in the munition factories or on the farms, say 'yes'; otherwise, write 'no.'" It may be that only a few cards have been returned from the county I have the honour to represent; the people are not to blame, because it is a constituency made up chiefly of farmers. A farmer with 125 or 150 acres in cultivation and often with only one son to help cannot be expected to leave his own work and go on some other farm, especially in view of the fact that we are requested to intensify production.

Before 1911, the Government led by the present right hon. leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) spent $98,000,000 for the administration of the country. We were taken to task then for our extravagance, our wasteful methods. What shall be said of a Government who spend for the same work the enormous sum of $172,000,000 in round numbers? Is it to be wondered that the people are complaining under the burden of taxes and repent of their sin of 1911? I do feel, Mr. Speaker, that when, at the bugle call, the officers will review the ranks, calling upon the electors to rally around the colours—not those of war but the Liberal standard—there will be among the hon. gentlemen opposite many bitter tears and gnashing of the teeth. We on your left, Mr. Speaker, have cause for congratulation when we see the very principles advocated and defended by the liberals in 1911 and condemned, censured and vilified by those who attained power by means of those tactics, recognized to-day by their erstwhile opponents as sound; for now that they are in power, the Conservatives adopt and apply those very Liberal principles, in connection with such questions, as the navy and reciprocity.

Doubtless you remember, Mr. Speaker, how the electoral campaign was conducted in Quebec in 1911. You recall the terrible scarecrow that was made of the Laurier navy, the terror that was struck into women and children by the description of the horrors of war and how mothers were terrified because their sons would be snatched from their arms and sent to be butchered on the seas of China and Japan. More than any, I know the terrors which were spread during the campaign of 1911 in the Province of Quebec by Nationalists; my opponent in the election was one of the strongest adherents of Nationalism. Previously I had the opportunity especially in Drummond-Arthbaska, of meeting some of those self-styled Nationalists, as the Hon. Mr. Nantel, ex-Minister of Inland Revenue, who accepted a commissionership on the Railway Commission, knowing full well the chastisement which the electors of Terrebonne had in store for him when he should seek re-election. Those who had such a dread of the tin-pot navy, as it was called in 1911, are quite satisfied now to have those vessels protecting the Atlantic and Pacific seaboards against possible invasion. To such an extent did they go in their acceptance of the Liberal policies, that at the opening of hostilities they bought two submarines that had been built for the Chilean Government but refused as being defective. Our Government bought them in spite of all, hoping to use them in the defence of the Pacific coast, but unfortunately the two boats behaved in Canadian waters as they behaved before the Chilean experts; when they attempt to submerge they plunged to the bottom and it will be necessary to use torpedoes in order to raise them. If we are in a position to-day to build ships in Canada for the Allies of Great Britain, it is due to the policy inaugurated in 1910 by the right hon. leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). As a matter of fact, if the Canadian Vickers established their shipyards in Montreal, it is because Sir Wilfrid Laurier had decided in 1910 upon a programme of naval construction, the ships to be built in Canada, by Canadian labour, for the benefit of Canada instead of handing over, as was this Government's policy in 1903, $35,000,000 for the construction of three dreadnoughts for Great Britain, who did not require them.

I could take hours to dilate on the bad administration which the Canadian electorate accidentally voted to power in 1911, but not to-day. The people are only waiting for a chance to correct that mistake. I do hope, Mr. Speaker, that the time is not far off when the opportunity will be given the people to make amends by placing at the helm of the state men who have the people's interest at heart, men able to govern without stirring racial and religious animosities between the different nationalities that constitute the Canadian people. To that end, Mr. Speaker, there is only one thing to do: it is to recall to power that great Canadian, that greatest of Canadians, the Right Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier, who for fifteen years has led the country through an era of prosperity.

Mr. EUGENE PAQUET (L'Islet) (translation): Mr. Speaker, the remarks of the hon. member for Bagot (Mr. J. E. Marcile) call for a reply on my part. I respect and admire the noble sentiments expressed by the hon. member in favour of the great cause which we are all defending. I congratulate him on the most noble of sacrifices, giving his sons for the safety of his country. But I deplore his strictures against Lieutenant-Colonel Blondin. There is then to be no let up in his attacks against a man who has given his best service to the national cause! My sympathies for the sons of the hon. member for Bagot are deep; but why should I not entertain the same feeling towards a minister of the Crown and a father who has made the same sacrifices. Last Monday, I attended the meeting at Le Monument National; I wish to point out to my hon. friend that he forgot to tell us that Mr. Descarries, a Liberal member of the Gouin Cabinet, was ridiculed by hecklers during his address.

Last night Mr. Blondin got a very sympathic hearing at St. Hyacinthe. This also the hon. member failed to mention. All Liberals do not view the action of Lt.-Col. Blondin in the same light. My hon. friend states that at the Montreal meeting the hon. Mr. Blondin got his desserts. I am sure that the leader of the Liberal party does not see eye to eye with my hon. friend. The St. Hyacinthe meeting was presided over by the mayor, Mr. René Morin. The distinguished first magistrate buried all political differences to shake the hand of a patriot who is making immense sacrifices for the safety of Canada and the cause of liberty. His Honour the mayor, a staunch Liberal, congratulated Mr. Blondin on his noble action, remarking how the minister was not content with words but followed his words by deeds. Mr. Blondin was the recipient of a remarkable ovation. He deserves the respect and admiration of all those who forget political dissensions when the country's welfare is at stake. The great and noble action of the hon. Mr. Blondin redounds to the honour of our race at a moment when the country is threatened by many foes.

The hon. member for Bagot has given his views on the social conditions of Canada. I may be permitted a few words on the subject.

In 1867, the Fathers of Confederation gave us political unity. They agreed to a constitution under which all British subjects would enjoy equal rights as regards language, religion and property. Under that constitution, interpreted in the spirit of its founders, there is no superior race and no conquered race. Racial divisions, however, have not wholly disappeared. And yet, the loyalty of the French Canadians in Flanders, at Courcelette and Vimy, should win them that equality of rights intended by the Fathers of Confederation. Our sons are fighting, suffering and dying on the battlefields of Europe. I weigh their sacrifices in the scales of right and justice. They have an immense weight and deserve the respect of all other races.

During the month of October 1916, distinguished citizens of Ontario, came into the province of Quebec to partake of our hospitality as the representatives of an important branch of the great Canadian family, to exchange friendly greetings and promote an entente cordiale and establish a bond of sympathy that should exist between all the children of a common country. The delegates from Ontario learned how better to appreciate the province of Quebec, "That daughter of French thought, which gives its love to Canada, its admiration to France and its best loyalty to the Mother Country." The delegates of the bonne entente, now they have witnessed our attachment to British institutions, will be able to treat us with more fairness. Sir G. E. Cartier said: "My policy is respect for all rights." The delegates have found out that the French Canadians live up fully to that motto. The province of Quebec allows the minority the widest freedom of worship and perfect control of their schools. The success of these delegations in Ontario and Quebec is to be greatly commended. The distinguished visitors will realize the necessity of a dual race in Canada. In the words of an orator: "In this Canadian dualism Providence intended that French and British live side by side as brothers since she has brought them together in one country. English-speaking and French-speaking Canadians have crossed the seas and they fight together alongside their European brothers. Their blood flows in one stream for Christian civilization and triumph of the two great races to which they belong." Those great citizens understand the value of Canadian dualism. They know that Canada's future is dependent upon the union and solidarity of the different groups of the population.

A famous lecturer once said: "The tears and the blood shed in so many Canadian families will cause flowers of charity to blossom on Canadian soil and from them there shall spring and mature fruits of justice and peace."

As all the members are likely desirous that the debate should come to an end during the present sitting, I shall add but a few remarks on the financial, commercial and agricultural conditions prevailing in Canada.

After thirty-three months of war the financial standing of the country is well established, perfectly re-assuring and such as to give us a clearer conception of our immense resources. Our trade and our credit have retained a degree of stability which exceeds the most optimistic previsions and redounds to the credit of the Canadian Government. The constantly increasing revenue is a striking proof of the country's development. For the year ending on March 31, 1917, $232,000,000 have been received into the Treasury, an increase for the year of 60 millions, enabling the Government to meet its ordinary and extraordinary expenditure and apply $60,000,000 to war purposes. That result must be held as most satisfactory, if we take into account the sparsity of the population and the absence of old and solid wealth such as is to be found in other countries. In the difficult circumstances we have to meet, it is right and just to return thanks to the Government for having piloted the country with such a firm and skilful hand.

On January 11, 1917, the manager of the Royal Bank declared that the financial and economical power developed in Canada since the declaration of war was simply astounding. Before the war we went along on borrowed capital. Every year the Dominion Government, the provincial governments, municipalities, business men and directors of large industrial undertakings, went to foreign money markets for the hundreds of millions required for the development of our trade, our industries, and our national highways. With the war and the ensuing dislocation of commerce, the Canadian people grew alarmed. But the ability of the Minister of Finance and the patriotic efforts of the nation, have shown that during the war Canada could hold its own financially. Before the war Canada was a borrowing country, since the opening of hostilities, the Government has issued loans to the Canadian people to the extent of 350 millions

For the last two years, the minister has succeeded in establishing equilibrium in the Canadian budget without having recourse to the British market, owing to the wise and enlightened response of the people who readily entrusted their savings to administrators whose ability and integrity are above suspicion. It has well been said: " It will be a glorious page in the history of Canada whereon it will be recorded that the Minister of Finance having called for 50 millions, received 100 millions; and having asked 100 millions, secured 200 millions, and his appeal for 150 millions brought him 250 millions." It was a wise and courageous move to take advantage of the greatly improved financial situation to issue Canadian loans. The ready and satisfactory response of the people must have been a deadly blow to those who lack confidence in the prudence and ability of the members of the Government. To pursue the war to a glorious end, the State may well count upon the active co-operation of all its subjects. The success of the Canadian loans is a matter of which we may well feel proud. It is high honour for the country and expression of great confidence in the Government. We need not feel undue alarm at the increasing national debt, if we realize how boundless are our resources and what development awaits our trade and our industries. Our foreign trade has increased beyond all expectations since 1911. At the last session under the Liberal Administration, the Hon. Mr. Fielding announced in enthusiastic terms that Canada's commerce had reached $750,000,000. In 1913, it reached the billion mark and by quick stages it creeps in 1916-17 to over two billions of dollars. Those figures throw a vivid light on the course followed. It is matter for congratulations to find that our exports exceed our imports by 314 millions. Until 1895, the balance of trade since the year of Confederation, except in 1881, has been against us. During the last fiscal year of the old Conservative régime, the balance of trade was in our favour and continued so until 1901. In 1902, the balance of trade turned against this country right up to 1916. During that period, where did we obtain the money required to buy foreign goods? We have taken the deposits in the banks and sent the money to foreign lands. Then we stopped buying and began to sell. From such conditions we can gather why we have been able to make a big military effort without appealing to the Mother Country for financial aid.

Victory in the agricultural, commercial and industrial fields is ours, provided we bring to the effort the same devotion, energy and will which characterize our soldiers. Some one has said that " Industrial Canada is developing in the midst of agricultural Canada." Manufactured goods amounted in 1900 to $481,000,000, and in 1910 to $1,165,000,000; the first time the billion mark is reached and we saluted it with enthusiasm, as it was the reward of our labours and a great promise for the future. In 1916, the output of our manufactures was $1,400,000,000. Our exports of manufactured articles were as follows:

1916	191,000,000

In an epic of war, our minds revert first of all to the heroic deeds wherein are manifested the noble ideals of the human soul. But munitions are an essential factor of final victory. When the tremendous tornado of 1914 swept over the world, the munitions industry scarcely existed. Those who have criticised the work done since 1914, have shut their eyes to the gigantic task with which the Canadian Government had to cope. An immense organization had to be brought into being at a moment's notice. The ministers and their ready helpers were equal to the effort and the munitions industry has produced wonderful results. The labour organizations, the industrial forces, the financial institutions were welded into a supreme effort to secure a maximum of production. There are now 650 shell factories turning out 800,000 shells every week. We have shipped to France 500 millions of dollars' worth of munitions, while the total orders received reach $800,000,000. Three hundred thousand workmen are turning out munitions and occupied at labour connected with the making of munitions. The production of steel, zinc, lead and brass has received a corresponding impetus. We are now producing chemical products of great importance. An orator exclaimed in the course of his address: "In the month of August, 1914, no one could foretell what inexhaustible reserves of forces and virtues would spring up from the Canadian soil."

With the coming of peace, the immense capital accumulated in the banks will help in establishing new industries and our artisans will apply their newly acquired experience and knowledge to the industrial progress of Canada. Those Canadians who during the war have turned their factories to war purposes will be able to apply them once more to objects of peace.

May I be allowed to quote the eloquent words uttered by the president of the Bank of Montreal in December, 1916:

"Canada bears admirably the effort made necessary by this world war, and its sacrifices will be amply compensated by increased confidence in our own strength, and, from a nation relatively obscure heretofore, it will take its proper place among the nations.

"The future, as I have said, will evolve new problems and is not without financial anxiety; but a young nation, possessed of a great national spirit, a territorial empire and boundless natural resources, can look forward with confidence and hope."

The revival of agriculture should reach its climax during and immediately after the war. The right hon. Sir Robert Borden at the first session under the present Government, granted a generous and special grant to the provinces as an aid to agricultural education. In 1913, the Dominion Parliament at the request of the Minister of Agriculture, adopted a new agricultural legislation. The provisions of the Act were made applicable during a period of ten years. Ten millions will have been spent meanwhile. Those millions are put at the disposal of the provincial governments to promote and develop agricultural training and as a help to the farming industry. The Act of 1913 and a wise expenditure of the moneys so voted should greatly tend to improve farming and raise its level to the place it should occupy in this young land of ours.

I take great pleasure in congratulating the hon. Mr. Burrell for his intelligent efforts on behalf of the farmers. It seems to me that as he furnishes the money to help the farming industry in the province of Quebec, he should have a direct say in the methods whereby the farmers interests are to be promoted. While stupendous events devastate Europe and affect very materially our own country, we appreciate more deeply the greatness, the loftiness and the importance of the farmer's profession. We recognize the undeniable merit of our settlers, of the tillers of our soil, of our agriculturists. We pray to them to intensify their production to meet ever-growing needs, realizing that thereby we are opening unbounded treasures. Canada's future rests largely in the strength and patriotism of the farmers. As a token of sympathy and thankfulness towards the agricultural profession, the different classes of the people are uniting in an organization to celebrate the coming of the first settler in New France. Soon will be unveiled the statue of Louis Hébert, the pioneer Canadian farmer. Before his noble figure, the words of Sir George Etienne Cartier will be appropriate: "French Canadians, let us not forget that to consolidate our national existence we must cling to the soil. We must every one take all possible means to preserve our territorial heritage. Any one without a parcel of land should use the fruit of his labour to acquire one, however small; we must bequeath to our children not only the blood and language of our forefathers, but also property in the land. Attachment to the land is the secret of the future greatness of the French Canadian people. Much is heard as to nationalities. Let me say that the race which will triumph in the end is the race that has held fast to the land."

So, let us retain in agricultural pursuits those who were born to agriculture, and, in order to increase production, let us bring back to the farm those who have deserted them.

Mr. F. N. McCREA (Sherbrooke): Mr. Speaker, I wish to take up a little of the time of the House to discuss that part of the Budget speech which has reference to the taxation of industrial profits. When the hon. the Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White) delivered his Budget speech last year and singled out the manufacturers as fit subjects for taxation, it appeared to me then as an unjust and unwise procedure. When this measure was before the committee, I think the minister assured the House that it would be in force for three years and would not be disturbed. I have not consulted Hansard, but I think if you will look up the record you will find that when this measure was going through the committee the minister so expressed himself, stating that this taxation of 25 per cent upon profits over and above 7 per cent on corporations and 10 per cent on partnerships, would not be disturbed for three years. But, unfortunately, the minister has changed his mind. If it was an unjust tax in the first instance, I am very sure that it has not been modified any by this new departure of coming back again and imposing a further tax of 50 per cent on all profits between 15 and 20 per cent and 75 per cent on all profits over 20 per cent. Industrial companies of all kinds are subject to fat and lean years, periods of prosperity and periods of great depression when it is a hard problem for them to keep afloat, meet their obligations and pay dividends. Many of them pass their dividends. We are told in sacred history of a king of Egypt who, at one time, had a dream that troubled him. He consulted all the wise men of the realm, and finally he found one who could interpret the meaning of his dream. The interpretation was to the effect that they were then to have a number of years of great prosperity and abundance, to be followed by another period of years of great leanness, no prosperity, no crop, nothing. The king, in his wisdom, provided out of the rich years a fund to carry his people and his country through the period of lean years. It would have been wise if the Minister of Finance had looked up a little sacred history and if he had done so perhaps he would have thought it wise not to put the whole burden on the manufacturers, because we are going through a period of some prosperity. It cannot be denied, and I am not here to deny, that the manufacturers in most lines are prosperous. But, it is also true that the managers of nearly every industrial concern, if they make any money, instead of paying great big dividends and pocketing the money, generally invest it in extensions and additions to the plant, thereby increasing production and building up the country. This measure of taxation placing the whole of the burden of providing revenue to meet the war expenditures on the manufacturers alone is striking a blow at industry. It is striking a blow at the men of energy and ability who are willing to put their best efforts and their money into industrial enterprises. The minister said that he had collected from this source last year some $12,000,000, and he expected to collect, I think, $25,000,000 or more next year. He thought that everybody was perfectly happy because he had not received a single protest. Because people do not protest, because they do not kick up a row, because they are willing to bear a certain amount of the burden, is that a reason for soaking them a little more? I for one am not here to protest, find any fault or make any objection, as a manufacturer, to paying my fair share of the burdens of this war, providing the burden is laid upon all, rich and poor. The poor will pay according to their means and the rich will do the same. Take, for instance, the case of two men, the sons of a rich father. The father divides up and gives each of them a large fortune. One of the sons chooses to go into industrial business, into manufacturing, and he puts every dollar of his money and all the energy he has into the enterprise, and possibly injures his health by overwork. The other son takes his money and invests it in good securities. He sits back in his easy chair, clips his coupons when they come due; he is found in the South in the winter and in the North in the summer at a fashionable watering place or a place of recreation. What I ask is, is this man a special favourite who should be treated with special consideration? He does not do anything, he does not employ anybody, he is simply living on the energies of his father before him. He has put the money he inherited into investments, and has in this way made some money. But the other man has put his money in industry; he employs a large number of people, he pays good wages, perhaps ruins his health in doing so, and builds up a business and made interest on his money, but he is made the goat because he cannot get away. The minister has said: It is true we might resort to income tax and many other sources of taxation, but it would require a lot of machinery and work, and it is hard to get at them. Again I ask, suppose that two men are walking down the street, one a manufacturer and the other a professional man, or some other man, and they commit a crime that is punishable by penitentiary. Warrants are got out and the authorities seek for the offenders. They find the manufacturer—he cannot get away, he is tied down to his business. The other man skips to Mexico or some other place. They know where he is, but it is going to be a trouble to get him. What would you propose doing with the man whom you have? Would you hang him and make him suffer the penalty of the two because the other man is a little hard to get? There is just as much logic in that as there is in the minister saying that because it is a little hard to reach the man who spends his time clipping his bond coupons and looking after his income, because it takes more machinery to reach him we will leave him alone; but the man we have got we will hang or crucify, or do anything else to him we like, and make him bear the whole burden. A striking case came under my notice a couple of years ago. A man in the pulpwood business had got out a large stock of pulpwood, he got his drive in, and started up his dressing or rossing mill. The first week he was operating the mill it took fire and was burned down. He had a big lot of wood on hand, but no mill to dress it. He went to his bank to borrow the necessary capital to rebuild. The bank said: In the first place, would we have furnished you money to make your drive and you have exhausted your line of credit? In the second place, it is not customary for the banks to loan money on long terms. You want money to build a plant; we cannot lend it to you. He looked around and came across some of these gentlemen whom I have described, who had some money. He told them his story. He said: I have my limit, a large tract of freehold lands; I am willing to give you a first mortgage on it; I want to raise $50,000 to build my mill; my limit is worth at least five times the money I want to borrow. They said: Very well, we will loan you $50,000 and take a first mortgage on your property, but we will take the first mortgage for $62,500, and we will charge you eight per cent interest on $62,500. There was no other remedy, he had to build his mill, he could not help himself. He borrowed the money, he gave a mortgage for $62,500 and received $50,000 in cash. These gentlemen are not touched by this legislation, they are not affected. I want to know from this House if that appeals to the members as anything like honest or sound logic, or sound taxation. I for one do not think it is. I am not opposed to paying 25 per cent, or 50 per cent, or 75 per cent, or the whole profits if necessary, provided that everybody else is treated in the same way, but I see no reason why I should be singled out. It is said by some: Oh, the manufacturer is making big money and he can afford to pay this taxation. Yes, we are making some money but what about the farmer? What about the price of wheat, $3 a bushel while the normal price is about 90 cents? What about the price of pork and cattle and other lines of agricultural produce? I was talking to a man in Montreal last week on this very question, and this gentleman told me that there were two firms of lawyers in Montreal, each man representing his own individual firm, and the income of each of these men was considerably over $100,000 this year from the office alone. I admit that they were probably the leading lawyers of the city, but this was their income from their office alone, to say nothing of their investments—and I am sure they would have investments because men of that income generally have some—I want to know from this House if there is any reason why men of this class, why men of all classes, should not contribute their fair share to the taxes that are necessary. We have got to be taxed, we are at war and it is every man's business to contribute his share and to do it cheerfully; but it is not right, it is not just, it is not honest, on the part of the Government to put the whole burden on the manufacturer alone. The minister does not seem to be quite satisfied, it is his second dose to one particular branch of manufacture. A short time ago the minister thought it wise on his part to fix the rate of newsprint at two and one-half cents, which is at least a cent a pound less than it can be produced for.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Hear, hear.

Mr. McCREA: The minister, I assume, would deny this, but the way he figures the cost of paper is the cost, taking it from the tree until it is delivered in a sheet of paper. The way I figure the cost of news print is as follows: The selling value of sulphite pulp is not less than $100, say an average of $100, and it requires 500 pounds of sulphite pulp for the manufacture of a ton of news print. In addition to that about 1,600 pounds of ground wood pulp is required for a ton of paper. That is 2,100 pounds, as there is about 5 per cent of waste in the conversion of pulp into paper. That pulp is worth to-day at least, selling retail as fast as we can make it, $40 to $50 a ton, put it at the lowest figure, $40; and 1,600 pounds of ground wood pulp at $40 is $32. You have $25 worth of sulphite pulp and $32 worth of ground wood pulp before you go to your conversion at all. Add to that your coal, labour, size and resin and the other necessities, and it will bring your pulp up to at least $70 a ton before you get a cent of profit out of it. I maintain that the cost of your paper is the value of the pulp that you can quickly sell for cash and not have to wait for your money or ship it, simply load it and get your money. That is the condition of the paper business at this present moment, and the minister, in his wisdom—no, I think not in his wisdom, I think he listened to the stories and the arguments of the publishers and did not wait to hear what the manufacturers had to say before he made up his mind and passed judgment on the question—fixed the price at 2½ cents. If he had been patient and had waited until he heard the arguments on both sides, he would have seen the wisdom of being a little fairer in the matter than he has been.

the right hon. leader of the Opposition, if I remember rightly, asked the minister the other day if an Order in Council had been passed fixing the price of newsprint paper, to which, I understand, he replied that no such order had been passed; that the parties had come to an understanding among themselves. Let me tell you how they came to an understanding. I was not at the meeting, but I was told about it by our manager, who was there. The minister simply told those present: if you do not accept 2½ cents, I will make it 2¼; so you had better accept what has been proposed. That is how they consented to it—with a club over their heads. They had to accept it. Perhaps the minister understands all about the conditions respecting the pulp and paper business, and perhaps he does not. I want to tell this House something about it. Prior to the month of March, 1916, some of the biggest paper industries on this continent had to re-organize; they were unable to pay even the interest on their preferred stock. In March, 1916, approximately 100,000 tons of ground wood pulp were piled in Canada, and there was, besides, a large amount on the other side. Trade had not been very good, the mills were running only four or five days a week; there was an over-production of ground wood pulp. The increased demand and the increased price commenced about March, 1916, and although the water condition last year was a good one and water was plentiful, that whole surplus of ground wood pulp has disappeared, together with whatever additional wood that could be ground. There is at present very little surplus ground wood pulp. Sulphite pulp and chemical pulp of all kinds is manufactured by a chemical process requiring but little power, and if there is a shortage of it the manufacturer can force his production and thus meet the difficulty. But ground wood pulp, 75 or 80 per cent of which goes into newsprint, is manufactured by a mechanical process and cannot be economically or successfully made by any other power than water-power. For instance, it requires 70 to 75 horse power working 24 hours to grind one ton of pulp, and if you generate power by steam or coal to grind pulp it will cost you so much that you cannot make newsprint of it. It has to be made by cheap power, and if the Almighty does not give you water you cannot grind pulp. This surplus that was piled out last March, together with the additional output, having been exhausted, what will happen if we have a dry season this year? I doubt very much whether the newsprint people will get all the paper they want, no matter what legislation the Finance Minister may adopt to help them out, because legislation cannot produce water, and nobody can make pulp without water. Although the price of nearly every commodity has gone up very materially, the manufacturers, of their own free-will, before any demand was made upon them by the Government, offered to supply the Canadian publishers with paper at 3 cents, which certainly would give them no profit. Under present conditions I do not know what induced the minister to take the course that he did; I know that in other lines of business the profits are very much higher than in the newsprint paper business. These he has not seen fit to touch, and wisely so; I am sorry that he was not as wise in respect to the newsprint business. Anyway, the general effect will be that capital will hesitate to put money into anything connected with the paper business, or into any other business in respect of which the Government sees fit to fix prices, especially unreasonably low. I was talking to a man in Montreal last week, a man of big means, who has the ear of many of the financial people of this country. He told me that he had made all necessary arrangements for the construction of a very large pulp and paper mill, but he said that when he went to New York and told his people that the Government had practically fixed the price of newsprint and was taking a big part of the profits he could not get them to listen to him for a minute. I believe that this Government is sincere and wants to build up the country, but I want to tell hon. gentlemen that interfering with the prices of commodities and putting the burden of taxation on a few people is not the way to build up the country. I candidly believe that the minister's apparent willingness to place all the burdens on the manufacturer alone and to let everybody else go scot-free has not been heard the last of. I notice that this measure of taxation, strange to say, is fairly popular, and one reason for its popularity is that it will touch only about 5 per cent of the population. If the minister has the courage of his convictions —and I believe that he has—he will frame up some tariff or some legislation whereby everybody in Canada will bear his fair share of the burden. If he does that he will not hear a whimper from anybody; every one will cheerfully bear his share of the burden and do his share. Let us consider what has occurred in the case of the American people since the war started. At the beginning of the war they were under just as much obligation as England was to protect Belgium, but they did not fulfil their obligations under the Treaty. That was the first thing that made them feel rather ashamed when they began to realize that they had held back and allowed Belgium to be ruined by Germany. After the sinking of the Lusitania occurred, if you met Americans and spoke to them, you would find that they had rather a feeling of shame and that they would make excuses for the notes that were written by their President. But since the Americans have come out and said: We will do our share from now on, every American is smiling; he feels happy; he feels that he is no longer living securely at his ease behind other people's energies and efforts. The same thing applies to the taxation that is necessary for the carrying on of this war. If the Government had the courage they should have and fixed the burdens that should be borne by every one equally, every one would be happy and contented. But under present conditions there is not very much happiness amongst the manufacturers, whether of paper or of anything else. I suppose people will say: "Well, McCrea is speaking because this touches him." McCrea is no slacker. I will stand up and do my share, but I do not want to do some one else's share. I want every man, woman and child who have the ability to do it, to pay their fair share, and I think they will be perfectly satisfied to do so.

Mr. W. A. CHARLETON (Norfolk): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend (Mr. McCrea), whom we know is a large manufacturer of paper and pulp, has said some things which made me feel it my duty to mention a concrete case in order to illustrate how the proposed increase in the taxation of profits will affect the employment of new capital in this country. The pulp and paper mills in Canada are working day and night and some of them on Sundays and yet they are unable to supply the demands.

Mr. McCREA: Actions have been instituted against four or five of them for working on Sundays.

Mr. CHARLTON: In the province of Quebec, actions have been instituted against four or five of these mills for violations of the Lord's Day Act. The condition that I have described shows that we require more manufacturers in this line of business, and I wish to mention a concrete case in order to illustrate how difficult it is likely to be to get capital invested in this particular industry. I know of an instance where Canadian capitalists were intending to create a plant which would cost not less than $5,000,000. They have spent $10,000 in surveying and laying out the plant and in laying out a town to accommodate 5,000 people, and the expectation was that the capital invested would amount to nearly $10,000,000. Immediately after the 11 p.m. Budget speech in which the Minister of Finance announced that the tax on profits over fifteen per cent and up to twenty per cent would be fifty per cent, and on profits over twenty per cent would be seventy-five per cent, these capitalists immediately said: We will go no further, and they threw up their hands. That is the way in which the proposed increase in taxation affected that enterprise. One gentleman who was deeply interested in this case went to New York ten days ago to negotiate with some people there who control about $36,000,000, and who had intimated that they intended to invest largely in the manufacture of paper and pulp in Canada. The result of his interview with those capitalists was that they simply said: "We are afraid to invest in Canada; we might figure out how we could get along and pay this tax; but we are afraid of something the Government might do which would tie our hands; we have our money in our pockets and that is where it will remain." If legislation frightens away capital, if it does not encourage capital especially in an enterprise in which it is very much needed as in this particular one of paper and pulp, there is something wrong which should be remedied. I do not rise to complain in regard to the Government; I think perhaps the Minister of Finance has done the very best he could in studying out this matter, because we certainly need more revenue. I am stating this case to show what the effect is. I could mention other cases and it seems to me that when the effect is what I have stated, some remedy is necessary.

Mr. F. F. PARDEE (West Lambton): Mr. Speaker, the hon. Minister of Labour this afternoon delivered a speech in which he eulogized himself and the Department of Labour in every way that he possibly could. With that I have no fault to find. He is satisfied with himself, and perhaps the rest of us ought to be satisfied with him; perhaps the country ought to be satisfied with him, but strange to say, even although he will admit himself that he has made a most excellent Minister of Labour, the country will be loath to agree with him. There were some things that he particularly laboured upon, namely, the price of various commodities, such as coal, foodstuffs, etc., and yet when I questioned him, it appeared to me that the Minister of Labour sidestepped in answering those particular questions which are pertinent—although he did not seem to think so—to the carrying on of the war and to the welfare of the people of Canada. He sidestepped as only the Minister of Labour can; for the pure and simple reason, in my opinion, that he had no other course to pursue, because he had done nothing in regard to the matter. In his address this afternoon, his defence of the Department of Labour was that he had sent out many questions to many dealers; that the questions had been answered; that the dealers had told him that they had so much produce on hand; that it had cost them so much money and that they could sell it for so much money in order to make a profit. The minister, however, did not tell us that they sold it at a reasonable profit.

The minister sent out 'questionnaires' as he called them; I am not familiar with the word, but I suppose it answers the purpose. These cards were sent out, and the answers came in. The minister found out what a particular thing cost and what it was being sold for, and then, to use his own words, he 'got after them.' The Minister of Labour may have got answers, but by this Order in Council he shifted the responsibility on to the shoulders of the township councils. From the time the Liberal party went out of power in 1911 down to the present day of grace there has been no government in this or in any other country that has appointed the same number of commissions in order to avoid responsibility, as has this Government. The Minister of Labour has followed this thing out in a way that he thinks is commendable to himself and to the Tory party, but the people do not think so. What did the Minister of Labour say this afternoon? He said they had looked up the cost of foodstuffs all down the line, and in every case they had taken care of the matter. But, Mr. Speaker, the proof of the pudding is in the eating. Never has the Conservative party lacked leadership so much as at the present moment, when we are at the greatest crisis in our history.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. PARDEE: My hon. friends may laugh, but let them tell us what they have done. They may laugh in their complacency, but the question the people of this country are asking is the very question I am asking to-night. The hon. Minister of Labour entered into a long dissertation this afternoon as to what this Government had done in the interests of labour and the common people of this country, and my hon. friend from Northumberland (Mr. Loggie) said truly that the minister was only reiterating and reiterating what he had been telling the House ever since the session opened in twenty-one columns of Hansard. But, as I said before, the proof of the pudding is in the eating. The minister tells us he has sent out his men, that they have looked into these things, and that he has read such cards as he has picked up here and there in his department. But does the fact that the dealers have filled in the cards showing the amount of stuff they have on hand, prove that they are selling their goods to the people of this country at only a fair profit? The minister mentioned Hamilton. He pointed to that city as if everything there was as it ought to be. Let me read to the House from a report of the last meeting of the Hamilton City Council:—

> Some startling information regarding the holding of food and fuel supplies in this city was given to-night to the City Council by Alderman Langes, chairman of the High Cost of Living Committee. Alderman Langes presented a report of the Committee's activity that showed some men were holding potatoes in large quantities here, and how indifferent the Government appears to be regarding the situation. Following this statement, he submitted a resolution that the facts be submitted to the Government, and that it be asked to prosecute these dealers under the Order in Council passed last fall. This was carried unanimously.

Might I say, in passing, that although the Minister of Labour said that his policy was to get after the dealers as soon as he found they were charging exorbitant rates, up to this very day the Government, although they have the power, have not entered one single prosecution against dealers who have been charging exorbitant rates; not one. The report goes on:—

> Alderman Langes said that they had learned that one firm alone in this city was holding between 4,000 and 5,000 bags of potatoes, which it had bought at from $1.03 to $2.00 per bag. They also had information that some coal dealers were holding large quantities of coal from last winter that could be sold at slightly above $8 per ton and for which they asked as high as $12 during the coal shortage. Bakers were also acting contrary to the Combines Act.

The Minister of Labour would not allow me to go on with my questions in the House this afternoon as to whether this report was true or not. He appealed to you, Sir, and I was ruled out of order. Let hon. gentlemen listen to what follows:—

This information was placed before W. T. O'Connor, K.C., representing the Labour Department. Mr. O'Connor complimented the Committee (Hamilton Committee) on its activities, and stated that no other city in Canada had gone so far under authority of the Order in Council. He left for Ottawa, promising that some one from the department would be here in two or three days. The Committee waited two weeks, but no one came. Word was sent to Ottawa and J. C. Imlay came to the city from the Department at Ottawa. He promised that necessary action would be taken but no word has since been heard from the Department. Alderman Langes said that he believed that both Mr. O'Connor and Mr. Imlay were sincere, and he did not like to blame the Government but felt they should demand an explanation. He then presented the resolution referred to. "We have gone as far as we can," he added, "and the Government must either take action now or refuse."

Has anybody heard a noise like the Government taking action? I have not heard it; the people have not heard it; Hamilton has not heard it. As is usual with the Department of Labour, nothing is being done; the whole matter is in abeyance, but some day, no doubt—not now, because there is no precedent for it—the Minister of Labour will wake up and look into the matter. The report goes on:—

Mayor Booker said no person in that Council could fail to regret that the Government had been so slow in taking action on food and on other conditions. It did not appear to have the backbone that was shown in the United States.

Where is the Solicitor General (Mr. Meighen) who wanted—

Mr. MEIGHEN: Here.

Mr. PARDEE: He is here? Let him speak up.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What action has the United States taken?

Mr. PARDEE: The action of saying that they would take food under control and would see that excessive prices were not charged.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Had not the hon. gentleman (Mr. Pardee) better wait until they do that?

Mr. PARDEE: Wilson has plainly laid down the policy, and the hon. gentleman (Mr. Meighen) need not quibble. And Wilson has not been at war three years before laying down that policy.

[Mr. Pardee.]

It did not appear to have the backbone that was shown in the United States.

Strange, that the friends of the Government in Hamilton should compare them with the United States!

They were merely asking it to protect the people instead of catering to manipulators.

If the Solicitor General can get a grain of comfort from this report upon the action of the Government—and no doubt that report was made regardless of friend or foe politically—he is welcome to it. While what I have read shows the state of affairs existing in the city of Hamilton to-day, it is only a sample of what exists throughout the province of Ontario and throughout the whole Dominion. It only goes to show, more strongly than anything I might say, that it is high time this Government waked up and exercised some kind of control over the prices of fuel and of food and prevented the holding of excessive quantities by dealers. The Solicitor General smiles. I knew he would; he always smiles when he has nothing to say. But the fact remains, and the Solicitor General and the rest of the Government would do well to bear it in mind, that the common people are looking to the Government for relief from the present excessive prices. The Minister of Labour this afternoon, in his own easy way, and without knowing what was doing here or what was doing there—just trying to get over the hill with the least inconvenience—said: "The working people have more money than ever before; they are better off than ever before." They have more money, but they are not better off. They have more dollars, but a dollar does not purchase the same quantity of food and fuel that it purchased five years ago. Large wages are paid? Who said anything to the contrary? But the average worker is not as well off to-day as he was five years ago with a much smaller wage. The Government cannot get away from this fundamental truth, that what is needed to-day, as it never was needed before, is some direction as to foodstuffs and fuel; what is needed to-day is that the Government should afford that direction even if they have to name a food dictator as has been done in England, or even though they should take these products and regulate their distribution. And they should do that irrespective of whether the effect is to hurt or help their political friends. This is what is needed for the good of Canada, and nobody will admit it more quickly than the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster) himself, for he realizes as no other member of the Government, or the Government as a whole, realizes, that what the country wants to-day is guidance on economic lines. You may say what you like, you may use what sophistry you like, but the fact remains that, irrespective of the Minister of Labour's—I cannot call it a speech, but I will call it an attempted explanation—what the people are looking for is for the Government to give them some lead, in order that they may be relieved from their present necessities which are dire. The people of Canada are facing a crisis, and the sooner the Government realize that fact, the better it will be for the country. You cannot have a cataclysm such as that which has come upon the world to-day without having it affect every nation and every dependency of every nation that is engaged in war—and Canada is in it to the hilt. The sooner the people and the Government recognize that fact, and the sooner they realize that every step that is possible must be taken to conserve every resource we have, the greater will be the help that we can give to the Empire, the more effective will be the sacrifice which we are making of our best blood and best fibre for the upholding of all that we believe to be just. I doubt that the people of Canada, wealthy, prospering as they are, realize that their present condition is a superficial prosperity and that the day of reckoning must come. But such is the fact, and the sooner we prepare for that day of reckoning the better for the Dominion and for the Empire. These are plain truths.

I have one word to say in conclusion. The hon. member for L'Islet (Mr. Paquet) spoke of the Bonne Entente. It would be far better for all elements in this Dominion if they would recognize and live up to a real bonne entente. This country is great, perhaps one of the greatest under God's sun. But if we are still to keep up in the years to come the schisms that certain elements have fostered in the years past, we cannot get the best results from the whole people.

There are elements, and every sane man knows it, that cannot be absolutely controlled in this country. But there are certain other elements which ought to be big and broad enough, and Canadian enough, to see that the fires of these certain other elements are not fanned into flame but that instead they ought to be met in a way that will promote the best Canadianism because, by promoting the best Canadianism, you promote the best Imperialism. These flames ought not to be fanned or nurtured but every man who has the interests of the country at heart, ought to sink these miserable differences for the good of the whole, stand by Canadianism, and Canadianism only, and make this country what it ought to be and what my leader has attempted to make it—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh.

Mr. PARDEE: I was sure I would get a response from the other side; they could not help it. Let us try, I say, to make of Canada what my right hon. leader has attempted to make her: one united Canada, irrespective of any class or creed, in order that our country may become absolutely a nation within an Empire, and a prop and stay of the British Empire.

Mr. ARTHUR B. COPP (Westmorland): Mr. Speaker, during the progress of the debate it apparently has been in the minds of hon. gentlemen opposite that hon. gentlemen on this side of the House should not take up time in offering any criticism, making suggestions or discussing public matters generally. That is not new on the part of hon. gentlemen opposite, but more emphasis has been placed upon it during this debate than I have ever noticed before. If I had no other reason for saying a few words on this occasion I would have a good text in the pamphlet which I received through the mail this afternoon. I find this pamphlet endorsed:

> Address delivered by Lt.-General Sir Sam Hughes, K.C.B., M.P., to his constituents of Victoria and Haliburton counties at Lindsay, Ont., April 28th, 1917.

I have not had an opportunity, Sir, of reading this speech through very carefully but I have scanned it hurriedly and some of the paragraphs in the address have appealed to me as a very good reason why not only hon. gentlemen on this side of the House but hon. gentlemen who were the confreres of the ex-Minister of Militia and Defence might consider carefully and sincerely what is their duty in regard to the public matters that are now occupying the attention of this House and the country. Hon. gentlemen opposite say that the members of the Opposition offering criticisms are, to a certain extent, wanting in loyalty and patriotism and they go so far as to suggest that while we are offering these criticisms we are adding fuel to the fire and giving confidence and assistance to our enemies in this great war.

This afternoon we were treated to an exhibition rarely, if ever, witnessed in this or any other deliberative assembly, not by one of the ordinary members of this House but by a minister of the Crown (Mr. Crothers) who took us to task for taking up so much of the time of the House unnecessarily and wasting not only the time of the House but of hon. members who are sent here as the representatives of the people. He was so careful that he figured out how much time was actually wasted in the discussion of public affairs by hon. gentlemen on this side of the House. He figured out that we were wasting so many hours per day for so many days. That hon. gentleman during the address he delivered in this House a few evenings ago, took up about two hours of the time discussing the administration of the Labour Department, of which he is in control. To-day he saw fit to take two hours more discussing the very same question, as pointed out by my hon. friend from Northumberland (Mr. Loggie) this afternoon. Therefore, we have four hours of the time of the House taken up and to follow the mode of calculation of my hon. friend this afternoon, 200 members of this House were each kept here for four hours, which would mean 800 hours altogether, and as the House sits about six hours a day, the minister consumed 133 days of the time of the members discussing one question in this Parliament. In spite of the self-adoration of the minister, I doubt very much whether the information he gave to the members of this House and the people of the country is worth 133 days' time. But the hon. gentleman took that time, and while he took that time he complained that we should take any time whatever discussing these public questions. I would like to ask my hon. friend what the Opposition are here for if they are not to make any statements, offer any criticisms or make any suggestions, or to represent the minority of the people. I contend, Sir, that it is not only the right but the duty of hon. members of this side of the House to discuss public questions, because it is only through criticism and discussion by hon. gentlemen on this side of the House that public matters get to the people through the public press giving reports which are taken from what takes place in this great theatre of public discussion. My hon. friend was very much alarmed because of the time that we have taken up, but I would point out that the hon. member for Brantford (Mr. Cockshutt) took up the time of the House the other evening criticising the Government of the day more severely than any member on this side of the House has done, and that he made the statement that the Department of Labour had absolutely done nothing to help the people by reason of the policy which they had pursued in past years and particularly during the present Parliament. But to go further back than that, what do we learn from the hon. the ex-Minister of Militia and Defence (Sir Sam Hughes)? In the speech he made to his constituents, earlier in his remarks, I find this statement:

Since then, however,—

That is since making his speech in the House in the early part of the session.

—several members and others have learned a few of the facts, and they regret that I did not inform them at the time, so that prompt and decisive action in the premises could have been taken by the party.

Now what does that mean? The ex-Minister of Militia and Defence says that his own confrères told him that they were sorry and regretted that he had not made known to them circumstances that had been taking place and conditions that were affecting the public welfare of this country while he was one of the members of the Cabinet doing the business of this country. Well, Sir, they have those facts now. I would ask my hon. friends if the statement made by the ex-Minister of Militia and Defence can mean anything but that there have been bickerings, dissatisfaction, pulling in opposite directions, among the members of the Government in regard to the business of carrying on the war, instead of their working harmoniously together in the interests of the people and the conduct of the war to a final triumphant conclusion. The ex-minister says that these bickerings occurred not only recently, but two or three years ago.

But let us go a little further. We find that the ex-Minister of Militia makes certain charges against his colleagues in the Government. Those charges have been read to the House on different occasions, and I do not propose to put many of the quotations on Hansard that I see before me in this pamphlet that has been received by me to-night. But there are one or two to which I wish to refer. He refers in one place to trouble in the Cabinet when he returned from Valcartier. A sub-committee of the Cabinet had been appointed to look after some purchasing contracts, and he says:—

When I had informed the proposed committee of their appointment and of my plans I suggested that they should immediately secure options on all commodities known to be wanted. Prices were then normal. At once options were secured on large numbers of horses on woollen goods, and on certain powder commodities. It was therefore rather a rude shock to my proposed committee to find that authority had been given to a sub-committee as stated; but there was nothing to be done but frankly inform the parties from whom the options had been received of the change in plan and to cancel the options.

What does that mean? It means as plainly as the English language can convey any meaning that the ex-Minister of Militia and Defence had made arrangements and secured options on the requirements of different supplies of horses and all of these things quietly, while prices were normal and before they commenced to soar on account of the war. He tells us in a statement to his constituents that this was all swept away, that the options that had been taken for the purchase of these goods at normal prices were set aside, and we all know how the prices soared and what enhanced prices we were obliged to pay as compared with those that we would have paid had the suggestions and undertakings of the minister been carried out. In another place he says, along the same lines:—

All this action never cost Canada or Great Britain one dollar. Further, had the options on goods in the ealier part of the war been accepted at the time I had recommended the Committee, the saving to the British Government in the first six months of the war alone, would have been upwards of one hundred million of dollars.

That is a pretty concise statement made by a responsible minister of the Crown at that time, and he charges this Government, those having the responsibility of conducting the purchases on behalf of the British Government in this country, he charges against them, without any equivocation, that had these recommendations been carried, out, and had the goods and supplies been furnished on the options he had obtained in the interest of the people generally, the British Government would have been saved in the first six months of the war upwards of one hundred million dollars. Then our hon. friends opposite hold up their hands in holy horror and shed tears because we on this side of the House take the opportunity of bringing these matters to the attention of the Government and to the people, through the avenue of this forum where these matters are properly discussed. I say that no member of the Opposition has ever made so strong a statement in regard to the weakness and the recklessness of the Administration who had charge of the purchase of supplies, as is made by the ex-minister himself. He says:

Let us now turn to another aspect. At the outbreak of the war, as I have stated, Canada had practically been brought to the verge of bankruptcy.

Now hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House during this debate have charged that at the time of the defeat of the Liberal Government in 1911 Canada was on the verge of bankruptcy, and one hon. gentleman opposite said something like this: But the good Lord stepped in and intervened just in time to save Canada from bankruptcy. If the defeat of the Liberal Government in 1911 was the result of the intervention of the great Creator, then that old-fashioned Methodist hymn appeals to me more strongly than ever: "God moves in a mysterious way, his wonders to perform." If the Lord intervened in this case and put my hon. friends opposite in possession of the treasury benches to save the country from bankruptcy, then I want to ask my hon. friends opposite what answer they make to the charge of their colleague, their supporter, the gentleman with whom they have lived for so many years and have worked with hand in hand. He says:

At the outbreak of this war Canada had practically been brought to the verge of bankruptcy, and my fear then was that we would not be able to maintain more than one division in the firing line.

Because why? Because we had not the money to supply other divisions. On the verge of bankruptcy! We had not the money to supply the men, to supply the divisions, according to the hon. gentleman. He says further:

I had on two previous occasions pointedly drawn the Finance Minister's attention to the fact that his function was to produce a revenue, keep the business of the country buoyant, and thus, everything being prosperous, money would be easily obtainable. In this, however, success did not attend his efforts; or, rather, my suggestions were not accepted by that gentleman.

The hon. gentleman goes on and gives his warning. He speaks of the Nationalist party and the sorrow it gives him to have to offer these criticisms of the record of his own friends. Hon. gentlemen opposite as well as hon. members on this side of the House have, during this debate, as in all other debates in this House, referred, and properly so, to the responsibility resting upon Canada as part of the British Empire in the conduct of this war.

I do not know any better slogan that can be adopted in Canada than one which is now being used more or less throughout the country, and that is: "Win the war." I understand that during this month delegates from all over Canada will hold a win-the-war meeting in the city of Montreal. I do not for one moment insinuate, as our friends opposite do, that there are disloyal men in this House, on either side of the Speaker's chair. I do not want to say to hon. gentlemen opposite that they are not doing the best they can. While some people in the country may not have done as much as they might have done, I believe that the feeling uppermost in the mind of every loyal Canadian is that of willingness to do his best to assist in winning the war. But while the people can do their part; while individual members of Parliament can do their share, yet the lead must be taken and the trail blazed by the gentlemen who occupy the treasury benches, because only by them and through them can the country's efforts be best directed to assisting the Allies in this great conflict. I have said that there are three great elements entering into our participation in the war: we must have men, we must have money, and we must have munitions and supplies. Hon. gentlemen upon whom rests the responsibility for the conduct of our part in the war must come to Parliament and get money for that purpose. I want to ask hon. gentlemen opposite if they can offer one word of criticism against hon. gentlemen on this side in that they have refused to vote any of the money asked for by the Government in connection with Canada's part in the war. I have yet to learn, Sir, that any such criticism could successfully be made against the attitude of the Opposition in this respect since the outbreak of the war. Money has been voted in three sessions of Parliament; in the session which is now proceeding, part of the supply has already been voted. The burden rests upon the shoulders of the Government to spend every dollar of that money economically and in the best interests of the people of Canada and especially of those who are engaged in the war. We are not here to offer carping criticism in regard to small matters, but the financing of the war is a serious responsibility, and those who have charge of the expenditure of the money voted by Parliament should see to it that every single dollar goes into the proper channel and is devoted to serving the best interests of the people. If the statements made by the ex-Minister of Militia and Defence, extracts from which I have read, are correct, a serious condition is revealed. He charges that in the first six months of the war alone, hon. gentlemen opposite wasted $100,000,000 of the money of the British Government. When we see that hon. gentlemen opposite are unable to work together in the interest of the whole country; when we see that they have thrown away in six months $100,000,000 of British money, is there not fair ground for the suspicion that money that has been taken from the people by way of taxation has been wasted? We know from investigations held, evidence adduced and findings made in different parts of Canada—I speak more particularly of my own province and the Maritime Provinces—that money has been wasted; that money has been taken from the proper channels and been diverted to the pockets of middlemen who had no business to act in that capacity. Not a few paltry dollars, Sir, but hundreds of thousands of dollars have gone into improper channels, and, this being the case, it is the duty of every hon. gentleman to bring the matter to the attention of the public. We do this not because we desire to embarrass the Government, but because we believe it is our duty to serve the best interests of the people who sent us here and who have not the opportunity of coming here and discussing it themselves. We in this House are only saying in a mild way what the people of the country generally have been saying in regard to the wasteful and extravagant expenditure that is going on. Should we be any more subject to the criticism of hon. gentlemen opposite for discussing these matters than the public press? You can scarcely pick up a newspaper which does not contain criticism of the Government and articles pointing out the blunders and mistakes made by hon. gentlemen opposite. Not only newspapers friendly to the Opposition, but newspapers friendly to the Administration are offering criticisms and making suggestions with the idea not of embarrassing the Government, but of bringing about efficient administration and serving the best interests of the people generally. Newspapers are finding fault with the Government; individuals are writing thousands of letters in regard to these matters; yet we are charged with being disloyal because we bring the attention of Parliament to them.

Why, Sir, we have charges of extravagance made in our municipal and town councils, and not only that, we have them from the pulpits. During the past year it was rather a miracle if when one of us went to a divine service on a Sunday morning, the minister did not preach a sermon against graft, wastefulness and extravagance, and single out the very men who had been feeding at the Government trough during the past five years and becoming rich at the expense of this country on war contracts; yet, we as members of Parliament, are told that we should come here and having eyes that see not and ears that hear not, and, to go a little further, voices that speak not, because forsooth, something might drop that might cause some embarrassment to the Government in doing their part in the conduct of this war.

We have given the Government money and they must accept the responsibility for the proper expenditure of it. The next question is with regard to the men. When the war first broke out, and the first call was made, a large number of our heroic young men immediately volunteered for service abroad and were at once hurried to Valcartier where they were placed in training camps in order to prepare for their duties in the field. I do not want to detract any of the credit that is due to the Government or due to the Minister of Militia at that time for the part they took in getting those men in training ready to go to the front. The first contingent sailed in the latter part of September, 1914. After these men had gone, others were enlisting; recruits were being asked for and thousands were being hurried forward to do their parts. Finally recruiting officers were appointed in different parts of Canada; recruiting meetings were held, and recruits were asked for to step into the ranks and enter training camps in order to fit themselves for service at the front. Shortly after that, a hundred thousand men were asked for, then up to two hundred thousand men, then up to two hundred and fifty thousand men, and finally, I believe, on the 1st of February, 1916, the Premier of the Dominion promised that Canada would supply 500,000 men. Unfortunately for Canada, unfortunately for the Empire, and more unfortunately still for the Canadians who are already at the front doing their part, the enlistments have not yet reached that total. I sincerely trust that some action will be taken by which the young men of our country may be induced to realize what is their duty in defence of their country and in recognition of what our boys have already done, and go to the front to fill the gaps that are unfortunately too often occurring. All who have gone across the water to fight the battles of the Empire are of the best blood of Canada, and wherever we have had any report of any engagements in which our Canadian boys have taken part nothing but the very best word has been received of their 12 p.m. valour. We know of the grand stand they have made in different places, and last, but not least, of the magnificent stand they are making now at Vimy Ridge, where the fight has been raging for so many days, and where so many of our boys are falling. The casualty lists are large and let us hope that many young men in this country will come forward and fill the gaps. We sincerely trust that the Government will take some action in the matter, and I am sure I am voicing the sentiment of every hon. gentleman on this side of the House that anything we can do to assist the Government in recruiting and assist the Empire in winning this war we have always been prepared to do if the Government are prepared to take the responsibility of doing their part.

Even after we have the men, men are absolutely useless at the front unless they have munitions and supplies of food and clothing. Here is where an opportunity occurs for the Government to do the noble thing, the grand thing, the big thing, and to hand this matter over to a commission, which will be prepared to make the necessary purchases in the interest of the country and not in the interest of a few profiteers. During the time this war has been going on, and where purchases have been made in the different parts of Canada, there has not been exercised that care that is becoming to the ordinary capable business man who would see to it that he purchased the necessary supplies in the economical way that we believe was the duty that this Government owed to the people of Canada. We have been accused of disloyalty; we have been accused of wasting time; we have been accused of not doing our duty in regard to recruiting and other matters in connection with the war; but fortunately for this side of the House we have one loyal man left, and that is my hon. friend from Red Deer (Mr. Michael Clark). Hon. gentlemen opposite always pay him the very high compliment of putting him almost on the same high pedestal and plane in which they place themselves in regard to the conduct of the war. They went so far the other day, I believe, as to offer an invitation to my hon. friend to come over, saying that he would be more happy with them than he would be with us. In fact, they prepared a chair trimmed with fine purple and gold lace and urged the hon. gentleman to come over and occupy it. I can imagine my right hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce, and my hon. friend the member for St. Antoine (Sir Herbert Ames), the archangels of protection, leading my hon. friend, the archangel of free trade, over to the other side of the House to hobnob with them in regard to the conduct of the war. We are glad to know that we have on this side of the House one man who appeals to the loyalty and the good feeling of my hon. friends opposite. While we respect the hon. gentleman's opinions in regard to this war, I do not think there is a gentleman on this side of the House but is just as loyal, has just as much sympathy and just as much desire to see the Allies win this war as our very eminent colleague on this side whom we all respect.

There has been a good deal of criticism in the newspapers because recruiting has been slow, and many reasons have been given for that condition of affairs. One reason is that it is due to the extravagance of the Government, but I think one of the strongest reasons that can be urged as a cause of the slow recruiting in the Dominion of Canada is because throughout every province where recruiting meetings have been held, where officers have been appointed, where supplies have been purchased, everything that has been done in connection with the enlisting, training and equipping of our soldiers has been conducted along a purely political patronage arrangement, and the people in the various provinces have come to realize that they are not being properly treated, because they feel that the war and the expenditure in connection with it should be carried on without this political patronage.

But even at this late date I believe that if the Government were big enough to do their part our young men would come forward by the thousands and fill up the gaps in the ranks. Why does not the Government follow the preachments of the Minister of Trade and Commerce? That hon. gentleman was very eloquent last session and again this session on the subject of political patronage, and I really believe he meant what he said at the time. "Political patronage," he said, "I hate it." Yet in spite of the influence one would think he would have with his colleagues, the same thing goes on day after day and week after week and year after year. Only a few days ago the Minister of Trade and Commerce made a statement in the House in regard to the high cost of living. He said that we must produce more, and save more. As this is the hon. gentleman's opinion, I would ask him first of all to have a heart to heart talk with the Minister of Finance, pointing out to him his duty under present conditions. Then let him have a talk with the Minister of Militia and every other member of the Government. We always listen to the hon. gentleman with a very great deal of pleasure, but when this Government does not act up to his preaching, when we realize that his words are simply words and nothing more, we may well doubt whether this Government intends to do any better in the future. The Minister of Trade and Commerce took the right attitude in regard to production and still more production, the necessity for thrift, and the avoidance of waste. It is, of course, the farmers of this country that we must look to for greater production. What encouragement, I should like to know, is this Government giving to agriculture at the present time? We have heard a great deal about the farmers of the West, but very little is said of the farmers of the East. At last, after many years, and in spite of the arguments practically throughout the whole history of the Conservative party that it would be suicidal to this country to open up trade avenues with the great republic to the south, in spite of their determination to have no truck or trade with the Yankees, they have at last granted facilities for the free interchange of wheat and wheat products between this country and the United States. Wheat, of course, is grown largely in the West, but a large number of farm products are also produced in the Maritime Provinces and in Quebec, and our people would have been glad to see the Government go a little further in this matter of free trade with the United States, and give our farmers in the East free bran and shorts to feed their cattle. They would have liked to see the Government give them cheaper feed for their dairy cows, and then we would not have to pay 50 cents a pound for butter. A great deal has been said about the high prices the farmers are getting, but it is a fallacy to suppose that they are reaping much extra benefit from the present high prices of farm products. Practically the only farmers who are reaping any benefit at the present time are those who were fortunate enough to have a fairly good supply on hand when prices began to soar. For instance, a man with a barn full of cattle a year ago would certainly profit by the present high prices, but when he wants to replenish his barn he has to pay a high price himself for his young cattle, and for their feed, and consequently on this second lot he will be making no more profit than in ordinary times, and the same thing is true in regard to other products of the farm. A man who is getting 40 cents for his eggs is really no better off than he was a year ago when he was getting 25 cents. The high prices for farm products are discounted by reason of the fact that it takes more money to buy feed and flour and all the other commodities that the farmer needs.

A great deal has been said in this House on the high cost of living; we had a debate on that subject only the other day. The hon. member for West Lambton (Mr. Pardee) has referred to the remarks of the Minister of Labour on that subject this afternoon. The Minister of Labour would have us believe that the Government have seized every opportunity to bring down the high cost of living. Judging from the minister's remarks, he has been very busy looking into these matters. With the exception of a short recess we have been sitting here continuously from January, and there has been hardly a day in all that time when the necessaries of life have not been rising at an enormous rate. Only the other day flour went up by $1.20 a barrel, and that was rather a staggering blow for hon. gentlemen in this House, and for the people of this country.

Some hon. members on this side asked the Minister of Labour what action had been taken. It then appeared that a jump of $1.20 a barrel in the price of flour in one day had awakened the minister from his slumbers, and that he had taken action. He stated that he had grappled with the situation and had done all that could be done. And what action had he taken? He had sent Mr. O'Connor to Montreal to inquire into the cause. And Mr. O'Connor must have done good service, for the next day the price of flour went up sixty cents more. The Minister of Labour took a great deal of time to explain what he had done. It appears that he has received reports and has had these tabulated, and that a great deal of other work has been done in the department. But while this has been going on the prices of the necessaries of life have been advancing and are advancing to-day, and we are getting beyond what is reasonable and beyond what the ordinary people can afford. When it was suggested by my hon. friend from Richmond (Mr. Kyte) and others on this side that we should commandeer wheat, or commandeer the flour mills, or take some either action, what was the reply of the Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White)? That hon. gentleman figured out that there was in Canada 100,000,000 bushels of wheat and that if we commandeered this at $3 a bushel, three hundred millions of money would be required in order to take charge of it. Does the Minister of Finance really think that the people can be hoodwinked and fooled in this way? It does not require the raising of $300,000,000 to commandeer wheat for the people. All the minister would need to do is to repeat what he did in regard to newsprint paper, or what the Minister of Labour said he had done when certain railway corporations refused to accept the finding of the board of conciliation. In this latter case the Minister of Labour simply said to these people: You will be coming to this Government and asking for privileges some of these days, and unless you pay the men the wages reported by the board, you will not get any privileges. If the Minister of Finance should go to his friends the millers and to his friends who control commodities in this country, and tell them that unless certain things were done he would take action, that action would never need to be taken. These people would simply do what they believe to be in the interests of the country, as led and directed by the minister.

I have said that the prices of the foods that are required on the table of both rich and poor alike are going beyond what is reasonable. It is very well for us who, possibly, are in such circumstances as to be able to supply our tables with all we want irrespective of the high prices, to gather here and offer our tribute of sympathy to those who are less fortunate. But let me tell the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Labour, who give such loud assurances that the people of Canada were never so well off as they are to-day, that, while they may represent the condition of affairs existing in their own constituencies or in those sections of the country which they know best, they are not setting forth the condition of affairs existing in many of the counties, towns, and villages known to me and in which I have been within the past year. The unskilled labourers, the men who have to go out with pick and shovel to earn a livelihood, are not getting a full supply of even the necessaries of life to-day. I do not charge the Government with bringing about this condition, but I say that this condition exists—that many wage-earners are not receiving enough to furnish their tables with the food necessaray for their families. And, this being so, something should be done if it is at all possible. The Minister of Labour tells us that he is keeping tab on the coal dealers of St. John and of Montreal. But I do not need to ask the Minister of Labour when I need certain information with regard to food prices and the causes of inflated value. Go to the grocery store or to the market, right here in the city of Ottawa, and ask why eggs are at their present price. You will at once receive the information that eggs are being bought up by gentlemen who are putting them away in cold storage with a view of enhancing the prices and making the people pay more than eggs are worth. And what is happening in regard to eggs is happening in regard to other food products. The people of this country must have that which will keep body and soul together. And when the Minister of Labour says wages are high in this country, he is probably referring to the wages of skilled labour. It is true that in the manufacture of munitions and in other skilled employments high wages are paid. But the wages paid to the common labourer are not sufficient to enable him to meet the rise in the prices of foodstuffs. The $1.50 or $1.75 a day that the ordinary labourer used to receive three years ago, had greater purchasing power than the $2 or $2.50 he receives to-day. And, while I sympathize with anybody who has to pay extortionate or extravagant prices for the food or clothes required for his family, yet I realize that the man with the high salary can afford it, and does not need much sympathy. When flour could be bought at $5 and $6 a barrel, the labourers could get along very well without much meat, for flour was a cheap food for the family table of the poor man. That is past and gone, and it is the duty of the Government, of the Labour Department and of all concerned, to make any suggestions that will assist the ordinary man to get along better on what he has and to live happily and in a more contented way.

My hon. friend the Minister of Finance brought down his Budget the other day in a few well chosen words, and wound up by telling us that the country was very prosperous. He proved beyond peradventure that the country was prosperous because of the war. Trade and revenue had improved, and we were better off to-day than we were in 1913. If Canada is better off to-day than in 1913, she can only be better off because of the war. Therefore, if we want prosperity, I suppose it is better to have the war continue as long as possible; that would be the logical conclusion one must come to from the reasoning of hon. gentlemen opposite. We take the hon. gentleman's statement, and we find that in 1913 the revenue was only $130,000,000. That increased a little in 1914, and it increased again last year, when the revenue amounted to $232,000,000. That is a wonderful increase in revenue, and therefore the country is prosperous. I am glad to know that Canada is getting on so well from the financial standpoint, and that she has been able to finance this war. But I would draw the attention of the minister to the fact that this increase in revenue and trade represent an illegitimate prosperity, and one that cannot be permanent. Very soon after the close of war we must get back, not only to where we were, but very much below where we were when the war broke out, because trade will be dislocated, and we will be undergoing a very rapid and necessary change. Under these conditions I do not think we have very much to be thankful for. He says that while we have spent $172,000,000 on ordinary and capital account we have the large and magnificent sum of $60,000,000 to devote to war expenditure. Hon. members on this side of the House have, during the last two or three years, and especially when the estimates have been under consideration, tried to point out to hon. gentlmen opposite that it was their duty to curtail and stop unnecessary expenditure, to get down to hard pan, where the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster) would have us if we would judge by his remarks and his estimates. We should keep the expenditure down to as low a point as possible. I find that in 1911 we only spent $118,000,000 on ordinary and capital account. Just previous to the war, when our revenues were buoyant and everything was prosperous, the Government spent $118,000,000. Last year, when the war was at its very worst, when everything was looking black and everybody interested in the outcome was advising economy, this economical Government, this Government that preaches economy and practices extravagance, spent $172,000,000 on ordinary and capital account. Now it takes great credit that it was able to apply $60,000,000 to the war expenditure. As was so well pointed out by my hon. friend from Northumberland, the extra taxation that they placed upon the people last year more than made up the $60,000,000, and that amount that they have taken credit for having applied to the war expenditure was simply taken out of the poor people of this country. I do not say that the war expenditure should not come out of the people because there is no other source from which it can come. But a very serious question arises and it is as to how much of this money should be provided by increasing customs duties and how much should be taken from the people by direct taxation. The Minister of Finance takes a very great deal of credit because the loans that he has asked for have been over-subscribed. When he asked for $100,000,000 he got $150,000,000, and when he asked for $200,000,000 he got $100,000,000 more than he asked for. That is all very well, and it speaks well for the patriotism of the people but men who have money lying in the savings bank drawing three per cent, when they have an opportunity of handing it over and taking securities from the Government at 5½ and 6 per cent, naturally come forward and take up these bonds. I am not casting the slightest reflection upon the people that do that, but it is a very easy thing to be patriotic when you are being paid well for it. In my opinion there is an opportunity to find out where the money is and where the millionaires are. The banks took up a large part of the first loan but the banks were not allowed to take any of the last loan, although they were willing to take $60,000,000 of it. We have had to raise $600,000,000 for the carrying on of this war. We are told by the Minister of Finance that we will have to raise at least $600,000,000 more. The question that arises in the mind of every business man in this: Is it a proper thing to borrow all this money and extend the repayment of it over a long term of years, or will it be a proper thing to finance some of this war out of a present levy of taxation upon the people. I contend that under the present arrangement when we are gathering in a large part of the revenue from the customs tariff, we are taking more than a proper share out of the poor men of the country. The Minister of Finance said that the question of taxing incomes and taxing wealth has been considered by the Government and that because of the fact that there is very little concentration of wealth in the Dominion they thought that it would not be a wise thing to tax wealth. I for one believe that the greater part of the financial burden of this war should be carried by the wealth of this country. While my hon. friend says that by the business war tax he is placing an impost upon the wealth of the country, to my mind he is not placing it altogether where it should be placed and gathering the revenue from the people who are best able to pay. The hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. McCrea) to-night showed by two or three very apt illustrations how unfairly this taxation falls on different individuals. I would not go so far as to say that we should pay the whole costs of the war by direct taxation, but I do think that we should be paying more than $60,000,000 per annum. If the Government had expended last year only what the old Government had expended in its last year of office, then out of the revenue which this Government raised of $232,000,000, they would have had something over $100,000,000 to apply to the expenses of the war. But they did not do that, and now they have borrowed the greater part of the money required for carrying on the war. I do contend that in a crisis such as this the wealth of our country should contribute more than it has contributed up to the present time. The Minister of Finance says that it will be well enough to tax incomes when we get to the length of our tether and have not any other revenue; then he says we will tax the income of the rich man. Let me remind my hon. friend that when this war is over and business is dull, when things are not going as they are to-day, when we are beginning to dismantle the munition plants, when munition workers who have been working at high salaries for the last two years are thrown back on our hands, when the soldiers are returning maimed and wounded and in need of a great deal of money to assist them, then will not be an opportune time to impose the extra taxation. Now is the time, when money is plentiful, when our friends are getting on well and making money, not only out of their regular business but out of the manufacture of munitions of war. I would offer a slight criticism in regard to my hon. friend's mode of extra taxation. I think he should distinguish between taxation on regular business profits and profits made from the manufacture of munitions. The reason for that, to my mind, is that the ordinary business man, who has been in business, possibly as a corporation, for years, has had his lean years, has had his hard times, has had his struggle; he has had to work day and night to build up a trade, and possibly now he has got a very good business established and is making a good return on his investment. That is all very well, let him pay a certain tax on his profit. But the man who is making big profits out of the manufacture of munitions is in a different position. He has been practically financed from the beginning by the Government. He has had no financial struggle or difficulty, as his machinery was provided by the excessive prices paid him by the Government for their first order of munitions, as was abundantly proved in this House, and as is known to every man familiar with the subject. I say that a very much higher tax should be placed on the profits made from munition work than on ordinary business profits. While I grant that the ordinary business has profited to a certain extent and been encouraged because of the war, it has not been encouraged nearly so much, nor has it received so much assistance from the Government, as the munition workers, who have been making great profits.

I wish to speak briefly upon the operations of the Intercolonial railway. That is a subject that is very dear to all men from the Maritime Provinces, and, according to hon. gentlemen opposite, the people from Ontario and the West, who have now a part of the Intercolonial, claim that it is no longer a child of ours, and is therefore interesting to the whole people of Canada. I am glad hon. gentlemen are taking such an active interest in the Intercolonial in our part of the country. As to the credit which is to be taken for the operation of the Intercolonial in the past year, there may be some difference of opinion. Hon. gentlemen opposite claim that credit because the road has earned almost double the revenue of past years. That is very easily explained. It is not because the operation of the Intercolonial has been of a particularly business-like character. The increased revenue results from the raising of the tariff rates and freight rates. Then, during the last year the Intercolonial earned large amounts of money by the transport of munitions and troops. These services have been charged for at the highest prices, and the money to pay for them has been borrowed by the Government. That is why the Intercolonial has earned such a large income during the past year.

The amendment moved by the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff) is very interesting to members on this side of the House. We have always followed that line, we have always aimed to get as near as possible to free trade, and we congratulate the Government very heartily, indeed, for at last having had their eyes opened and having come to the realization that the farmers of the West must have this free interchange of wheat and wheat products between Canada and the United States. I hope it is permanent. Some question has been raised and very fine legal points have been argued by hon. gentlemen who have addressed the House. I sincerely trust that the opinion given on this matter by the Deputy Minister of Justice is correct, and that the arrangement is permanent and will be lasting.

It is evident that there is a doubt in the minds of eminent lawyers as to whether the Deputy Minister of Justice is correct in his view, but, whether he is correct or not, we want to make sure that this provision of free wheat shall be a permanent arrangement. Under the circumstances, therefore, the Government should accept the amendment of the hon. member for Assiniboia and thereby make it plain to the people that this arrangement is a permanent one, that there shall be no more tinkering with this part of the tariff and that there shall be free exchange of wheat and wheat products between Canada and the United States. We sincerely hope that this will be the thin edge of the wedge; that more products will be placed on the free list and that there shall be a freer exchange of commodities between the two countries. As a matter of fact, we hope that we shall get what we should have had in 1911, reciprocity with the United States, which would be beneficial to them and beneficial to the people of Canada generally because of the resulting increase of trade.

The House divided on the amendment of Mr. Turriff.

Amendment negatived.

Mr. PROULX: I was paired with the hon. member for West Peterborough (Mr. Burnham). Had I voted, I would have voted for the amendment.

Mr. C. A. WILSON (Laval): I was paired with the hon. member for Wentworth (Mr. Gordon Wilson). Had I voted, I would have voted for the amendment.

Mr. CARVELL: I was paired with the hon. member for York, N.B., (Mr. McLeod). Had I voted, I would have voted for the amendment.

Mr. McCOIG: I was paired with the hon. Minister of Labour. Had I voted I would have voted for the amendment.

Mr. J. A. ROBB (Huntingdon): Mr. Speaker, in pursuance of the notice which I gave on the 1st of May, I beg to move, seconded by Mr. Tobin:

That all the words after the word "that" in the main motion be struck out and the following substituted therefor:

To ensure a plentiful supply of bran, shorts and middlings for the farmers who produce milk, cream, butter, and cheese, and for the raising and fattening of live stock, this House is of the opinion that wheat, bran, shorts and middlings should, without delay, be placed upon the free list.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Lost.

Mr. ROBB: As there are some hon. gentlemen who may wish to speak on this amendment, and as it is after one o'clock, with the consent of the leader of the Government, I move the adjournment of the debate.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I think the understanding was that we should finish this debate to-night. It has been running for a long while and bran, shorts and middlings have been discussed pretty freely already, I do not think much would be gained by further discussing the subject.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I am not aware that there has been any arrangement, but if there has been one between the Whips, I have nothing more to say. There are a couple of more amendments to be moved. My hon. friend from Northumberland, N.B., (Mr. Loggie) gave notice of one and whether we move this to-day or whether we have discussion at some future date, I think at this stage we had better adjourn. I appeal to my right hon. friend.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: All right.

Motion agreed to and the debate adjourned.

M. VIVIANI TO ADDRESS CANADIAN PARLIAMENT.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER (Acting Prime Minister): Before the House adjourns, I wish to make a short announcement, after consultation with my right hon. friend, the leader of the Opposition. Two very important missions from Europe have been in the United States for the last fortnight, one representing the British Government and the other the French Republic. Both of those Commissions have been invited to make at least a short visit to Canada as the guests of the Government and of the people. We have to remember the very honourable and responsible position held by the members of both missions, representing their respective countries as the guests of the Government and people of the United States who had the first call on their time. The members of those missions, however, have been very anxious if they could find it at all possible to visit Canada. The time set for the French mission was much shorter than that set for the British mission and they are obliged to leave at a certain fixed date. I am, however, very happy to be able to announce that the French mission will make Canada a short visit, necessarily very short, but none the less hearty and sincere that it is short, and that on Saturday we shall have in Ottawa for a few hours M. Viviani, the former premier, and at present the Minister of Justice of the French Government. He will, whilst here, make the acquaintance of members of both Houses. M. Viviani, who is a most noted speaker and orator, has addressed both Houses of the Congress of the United States and he has consented to address both Houses of this Parliament. With the consent of the House, I shall ask to-morrow night that instead of adjourning we shall suspend the sitting, with the understanding that Mr. Speaker will take the Chair at twelve o'clock noon on Saturday, about which hour M. Viviani will be present and will deliver an address to both Houses of Parliament.

With reference to Marshall Joffre, it is impossible for him to come to Ottawa, but he will be able to visit Montreal on Sunday of next week, also as the guest of the Government. We all feel the very great honour of a visit from these gentlemen and I am sure that our reception of them will be most cordial. That they have not been able to make a longer stay with us is due to the imminence of their departure and their pressing duties. I may say that later on we shall have a visit to Canada of the British mission headed by the Right Hon. A. J. Balfour.

Rt. Hon. Sir WILFRID LAURIER: The announcement which has just been made by my right hon. friend will certainly be most welcome to all Canada. There would, indeed, have been great disappointment if the French and the British delegation had not visited our country, and I am sure that my right hon. friend has voiced the sentiments of this House in particular in stating that on Saturday at 12 o'clock we shall have the privilege of hearing M. Viviani, the chief of the French delegation. I am glad that my right hon. friend has made this announcement, because it will be made public to-morrow, and I am sure that in consequence we shall have a very large attendance.

On motion of Sir George Foster the House adjourned at 1.20 a.m. Friday.

Friday, May 11, 1917.

The House met at Three o'clock, the Deputy Speaker, Mr. J. H. Rainville, in the Chair.

VISIT AND RECEPTION OF M. VIVIANI.

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. Sir GEORGE FOSTER (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think it might be well to make a short statement as to the arrangements that have been made for to-morrow. The hour at which our guests will be here is not exactly known, but the House will go into session at twelve o'clock, and I suppose they will be here at that hour. On the arrival of the train I should like to have at the station the members of the Cabinet, and members of the Privy Council who have been members of preceding Cabinets, to informally meet the guests. They might put on their top hats and look as well as they possibly can. I am making that intimation for members of the Privy Council who do not belong to the present Government. From the station the guests and others will come directly to the House of Commons. M. Viviani will be given a seat at the side of Mr. Speaker, and the members of the House and senators are requested to fill up the first seats and to raise no objection to those who are not members of Parliament occupying the remaining seats and the galleries. Admission will be by special card. All members of Parliament and their wives and—I was going to say daughters, but I hope not many daughters—all members of Parliament with their wives and daughters will receive cards. The purpose is that we shall make ourselves the hosts of the distinguished guests and make it possible for as many representatives as possible to have an opportunity of being here and hearing the address that will be delivered. That will require a little self-denial on the part of members of Parliament, which I hope they will practise. After the speech, I propose to make a motion that the speech that is delivered by M. Viviani be printed in our Hansard, to become a part of our permanent record. I shall ask my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) to second the motion in that respect. Whatever I may do myself, I shall hope that my right hon. friend will make some remarks appreciatory of the distinction conferred upon us by the visit of our distinguished guests. After that the members of Parliament and those who have admission to the House will be asked to file in at the right, and to file out at the left of Mr. Speaker, and Mr. Speaker will present all to our guest. I omitted to state that Mr. Speaker, if he will be kind enough, will tender an address of welcome to M. Viviani.

The tickets will be delivered to the members and to the invited guests, and we will see that they are properly distributed. After that, I suppose I might say, the Governor General will have the visitors to luncheon, and if there is any time left we shall try to show them the beauties of Ottawa, both the beauties which at present exist and are visible, and as our guests are men of some imagination, we will try to stimulate that faculty to take a still greater and larger view of what the future possibilities of our capital are. I think that takes in the whole of the programme as arranged.

Mr. NESBITT: Do the members require tickets?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: They will be given tickets, as admission will be by card. We will send them cards.

THE BUDGET.

MR. ROBB'S AMENDMENT RULED OUT OF ORDER.

On the Orders of the Day:

The DEPUTY SPEAKER (Mr. J. H. Rainville): Just before the adjournment of the last sitting of the House the hon. member for Huntingdon (Mr. Robb) moved a second amendment to the motion "That the Speaker do now leave the Chair for the House to go into Committee of Ways and Means." A previous amendment having just been negatived, I find from a careful study of the authorities that this amendment was irregular and should have been declared out of order. The rule as laid down by Bourinot and May makes this abundantly clear. I quote from Bourinot, pages 419-420:

> "Only one amendment can be moved to the question, 'That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair'. If that amendment is negatived, a discussion on other questions may be raised but no other motion can be proposed. If the amendment is withdrawn, however, another amendment can be at once submitted to the House."

And also from May, 11th Ed., page 610, as follows:

> "When an amendment to the question for the Speaker's leaving the chair has been negatived, as it has been decided that the words proposed to be left out shall stand part of the question, no further amendment can be moved thereto; though, general debate on the main question can be maintained by those members who have not moved or seconded an amendment thereto, or spoken on the main question before an amendment was moved; and if an amendment be withdrawn, members who have spoken to the amendment, may speak again after another amendment has been proposed."

Accordingly, the main motion is the only question now before the House and may be debated, but no further amendment may be moved.

I therefore declare the amendment of the hon. member for Huntingdon out of order.

SHORTAGE OF SALT FOR FISH CURING.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. O. TURGEON (Gloucester, N.B.): I wish to call the attention of the Acting

Minister of Marine to a serious condition which threatens the fishing industry in the county of Gloucester, owing to a salt famine. Until lately our fish dealers were under the impression that they could possibly secure contracts for vessels to bring salt across the ocean, but lately they have been advised of the impossibility of securing such contracts. The hon. member for Guysborough (Mr. Sinclair), a few days ago, called the attention of the House to the same subject with reference to the province of Nova Scotia. I wish to add that northern New Brunswick is practically in the same condition. As to the scarcity of tonnage, I might make the suggestion to the department that last fall the French Government had to allow a large cargo of lumber to remain in Bathurst, as they could not get the necessary steamer there in time, and I am under the impression that the cargo is still there. A vessel bringing salt from France to Caraquet could take back that cargo of lumber from Bathurst. An arrangement might be made between the two Governments so that when the transport for the French Government comes for that lumber it might bring a quantity of salt which would be sufficient for all Caraquet and northern New Brunswick.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The matter has engaged the attention of the department for some months and the British Admiralty is quite willing that transports coming to Atlantic boards—if the loading point of the salt is reasonably near and the loading does not cause too much delay—should carry salt to the ports to which they come, charging for it a reasonable rate. I have no doubt that the French Government would be ready to do the same thing with its transports. But my hon. friend will see that the time of these transports cannot be taken up making long voyages in order to get some salt.

Mr. TURGEON: So far as the Caraquet district is concerned, very little loss of time would be involved, as boats from Caraquet could go on to Bathurst for that cargo of salt.

COAL PRICES IN OTTAWA.

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. RODOLPHE LEMIEUX: I have been requested by certain consumers in Ottawa to ask the Government if they are aware that coal is being sold to-day in Ottawa at between $9 and $10 a ton, whilst it has been established by the Federal Trade Commission at Washington that coal at the mine is delivered at $3.60 and $4 a ton. It is true that transportation possibly might affect the price to some extent, but it seems to me that it should not to that degree. Would my right hon. friend inquire as to this, and ascertain if relief can be expected?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Yes, I shall make a note of that.

THE SUBMARINE MENACE.

Mr. E. M. MACDONALD (Pictou) asked for leave to move the adjournment of the House for the purpose of discussing a definite matter of urgent public importance, namely the menace to the national interest by the submarine campaign and the necessity of meeting it, and what Canada should do to deal with the situation.

And leave having been granted.

Mr. MACDONALD: I have no apology to make to the House for asking the members of this House to consider for a few moments the position which Canada should take with reference to this great national menace, a menace to the whole Empire and to all our Allies in the war. The situation on land has been of the most encouraging nature so far as our plans are concerned, and the brilliant results which have followed the attacks under General Haig by our men in France have created a position there so menacing to the Germans that during the last few months they have decided to resort to the use of submarines in a ruthless manner in order to cut off food and other supplies, which would go to Great Britain and the Allies from the sister nations on this side of the water. This menace has reached a very serious stage. The development of the U boats by expert German scientists reached a point not thought of before the war, indeed hardly conceived of up to a very late period. A few years ago it was thought to be an impossibility that submarines competent to cross the Atlantic could be constructed; yet last year the Deutschland, a submarine built on commercial lines for the purpose of carrying supplies, more than once reached the United States then a neutral nation. Last October, when the weather permitted these long voyages of submarines, we had news of their sinking various vessels including, several British bottoms, off the American coast in the north Atlantic. In the seas surrounding Great Britain, the extent of the baneful operations of the submarines during the past few months has been serious indeed. It has interfered with the avenues for the transport of men and supplies from Canada to the Motherland, and in addition it has created such a feeling of apprehension in Great Britain, that the Homeland has come to look with expectancy to the possibility of producing within her own borders the food and other supplies necessary to sustain her people should the blockade necessitate this. I have therefore no apology to make for calling the attention of the House to the situation, and to what Canada ought to do in the premises. Only this week, on Tuesday, the matter was discussed in the Imperial House of Commons, and the task which was laid upon the Lords of the Admiralty in dealing with this problem, together with all the means that might be put into effect by the nation herself for the purpose of meeting this menace, were fully considered. When we realize the extent of the U boat depredations, as we can from looking at the latest figures, we begin to grasp the exceeding importance of the question. I have before me the latest report of the submarine situation which says:

> The German submarines succeeded in destroying a larger number of fishing vessels last week than has been reported for several weeks past.
> Vessels of nationalities: Arrivals, 2,374; sailings, 2,499.
>
> British merchantmen over 1,600 tons sunk, including five not reported previously, 24; under 1,600 tons, 22.
>
> British merchantmen unsuccessfully attacked, including six previously not reported, 34.
>
> British fishers sunk, including one not previously reported and thirteen sailers, 16.
> In addition to the British vessels reported by the Admiralty to have been sunk by submarines or mines, fifteen British ships had been reported overdue since January 1 and no information had been obtained in regard to them. It was impossible to say how many of these were marine casualties and how many represented losses inflicted by the enemy.

Further information as to the extent of the submarine menace comes from the United States. The attention of the Government of our great sister nation of the Anglo-Saxon race has been directed to this matter by the delegates from England and France, one of whom we are to have the honour and privilege of entertaining to-morrow. Mr. Denman, chairman of the Shipping Board of the United States, in announcing the Government's programme for exercising more direct control of shipping and shipbuilding facilities, said that estimates had reached the board showing that 300,000 tons of shipping were sunk in one week. He goes on to say:

> The present world's ship tonnage is estimated at less than 50,000,000 tons. In 1916 the entire loss in tonnage due to war causes was put at a little more than 2,000,000 tons, or some 162,000 tons a month. At present the Germans are sinking considerably more than that each week.

In other words, while 160,000 tons a month was the extent of the loss due to submarine depredations last year, that amount of tonnage is lost in one week under present conditions. Speaking in the British House of Commons the other day, when the matter was fully discussed, Mr. Macnamara, speaking for the Admiralty, said:

> It was not in the public interest to disclose what proportion of vessels sunk had been armed. He said, however, that merchant vessels were being armed as rapidly as possible. All possible steps were being taken by the Admiralty, Mr. Macnamara continued, to accelerate the entry of the foodships into port. He regretted that the resources at the disposal of the navy did not permit of an individual escort for every vessel conveying foodstuffs, but said the Admiralty had done everything which was possible and practicable to protect them.

It will be noted from Mr. Macnamara's statement that additional injury is liable to be inflicted on Great Britain as a result of the submarine menace because of the withdrawal from the North Sea and the English Channel of vessels, for the purpose of protecting ships that are sailing on the North Atlantic with food and with men. The withdrawal of these vessels from the immediate scene of action, where their presence is required in order to keep the Germans confined within the Kiel canal, will impair the efficiency of the North Sea fleet, possibly give the Germans an advantage which they do not now possess, and, to some extent, release them from the blockade that is being maintained against them.

That this condition is of a most serious character is evidenced by the utterances of American public men, who are acting in consequence, no doubt, on information imparted by Mr. Balfour and M. Viviani. For instance, so conservative an American public man as Mr. Lansing, United States Secretary of State, made this statement as published in the press:

> There is no use of our closing our eyes to the fact that the situation is very serious.
>
> Secretary Lansing in a statement during the day declared that the seriousness of the submarine situation could not be exaggerated, and that it was time the country awoke to the facts. Reports to the State Department give a total of eighty vessels lost in one week—figures much higher than any contained in recent British announcements.

In response to further questions, Mr. Lansing stated that this Government was ready to throw its full strength into the joint task of curbing the war aims of Germany, and he probably regarded it as important for the American people to know what the country and its allies were facing.

Thus, Mr. Lansing, speaking authoritatively to the American people, deems it of utmost importance that the United States should fully realize the seriousness of submarine warfare.

It is our bounden duty, therefore, as Canadians and British subjects, to realize, just as our American brothers realize, the seriousness of this condition, and to consider what we can do to help in the matter. Mr. Lansing further said:

It would be preferable on all sides not to have to make public the increasing power and effectiveness of Germany's present submarine campaign, which is bound to spur the Teutons to renewed efforts and to encourage the peoples of the Central Powers. But facts must be faced in the present emergency according to officials of this Government and officials of the Entente. The only visible remedy to the danger is to strike down the U-boat menace within a comparatively short time or make it ineffective as a starvation policy until it finally can be disposed of. It is a question of the next six or eight months according to the consensus in authoritative circles.

Mr. Lansing met the question "What are we going to do about it?" with an immediate rejoinder showing that the nation was going to do anything and everything it could to win the world battle of democracy, but the all important point to be emphasized at this moment was that this battle was not yet won nor was there any legitimate assurance that it would be won.

Mr. Secretary Lane, who is Canadian-born, spoke as follows in regard to this matter:

It is no small thing. We might as well wake up and make up our minds that the situation is serious.

The war will be fought on this side of the Atlantic, if we do not beat the Germans to it. We must supply many ships to overcome the great number the Germans are sinking. And, surely our ship-yards can speed up.

If this keeps up for any length of time it would lay England and France prostrate, unless we are able to come to their support, or some measure is devised to put the submarine out of business.

The report continues:

Mr. Lane asserted that the havoc wrought by the German submarine, which he described as the new harpy of the war, was threatening not only the existence of Great Britain and France, but that of the United States, and he added that when the representatives attending the conference returned to their states they could not too strongly emphasize that the need for prompt action to enable this Government to exert the full measure of its force against Germany was vital to the welfare of the nation.

These utterances indicate the viewpoint of the public men of Great Britain and of the United States. Let us look for a moment at what the Germans say. Admiral Von Eappele, Minister of the Navy, speaking in the Reichstag this week, said:

"The Reichstag has begun its second reading of the navy budget. Dr. Pfleger, naval reporter of the Budget Committee, asserted that the submarine booty for April would not be less than 1,100,000 tons, and added that the Reichstag looked forward to the activity by the German navy with a confident hope of a speedy and victorious peace. Vice Admiral von Capelle, Minister of the Navy, who followed Dr. Pfleger, said:

'This recognition is new stimulus to us to fulfil Germany's expectations regarding the U-boats, which have faced enthusiastically the great task of decisively intervening alongside our victorious army. I assure you that the U-boats will persevere until the end. We have the necessary boats, a trained personnel, fuel, and all accessories.'

Thousands upon thousands of hands are actively engaged in producing new U-boats and new material for torpedoes and mines. Not only is the number of U-boats continually increasing, but the boats are always improving in quality. They are always better types and of greater efficiency. Officers and men are crowding forward for submarine service.

Of course, losses also occur. Our enemies' defences are increasing in quantity and quality, but there is no radical remedy against U-boats.

In England it was said: 'We must smoke out the bases; that is the sole means of mastering the U-boats.' Let them but come and try; they will bite granite. Our U-boats are rapidly adapting themselves to the peculiarities of submarine war; they are gaining an ever-greater experience and are receiving ever-better armament and equipment.

A decisive factor is the continually increasing monthly successes, which are such as we ourselves hardly expected. The reports in the enemy press about the number of U-boats lost are false. Our losses are small beyond expectation. In addition, weather conditions are improving. Summer nights are shorter and the stormy season of the year is ending. Every new submarine crew that sails is buoyed up with the consciousness that all is at stake.

Three months' war experience is of more value than three years' peace experience. The U-boat crews are equal to all demands. We expected an average monthly U-boat booty of about 600,000 tons. Actually the result for three months totals 2,800,000 tons. This is 55 per cent above our expectations. Altogether, in three months, 1,325 ships have been sunk.

How long this will continue is the enemy's affair. The U-boats guarantee our holding out. We all have a clear impression that English voices sound to-day quite different from those heard three months ago. They have become much more modest. Even England perceives that our U-boat war has not been a blow in the air, but a heavy blow against the vital centre of our fiercest enemy. We have the firm will to conquer and rock firm confidence that we shall perform our task."

That is the situation as outlined by an authority which, it sems to me, cannot be questioned and which warrants us in facing the situation with the feeling that a duty which cannot be disregarded is imposed upon us. Only a few days ago the President of the United States called in consultation a body of leading Congressmen representing both parties, and he laid before them the facts which he had obtained in regard to this matter. He then stated that he proposed to ask Congress at once to grant the sum of $800,000,000 to provide ships and other means of combatting hostile submarines; that he intended to submit to the Congress legislation of the widest character under which extraordinary powers were to be conferred upon the Government, so that with this tremendous appropriation of money every possible step might be taken and every method utilized to meet and overcome this danger.

I have already referred to the effect of the submarine warfare in imperilling of our base in the North sea wherever since the war began the British naval authorities have carried out in the most splendid manner the task thrown upon them of bottling up the German navy and rendering it useless as a factor in the war. In these days of submarine activity, there can be no doubt that there have been drawn from the North sea base many vessels, large and small, which are necessary for the escort of the food ships and the ships which carry our men from various parts of the world to engage in the fray, and not only that, but there is another situation which naturally occurs to one's mind, and that is, as to the necessary importations of food supplies for the men at the front, not only of the Allies, but of Great Britain as well.

The statement of Lloyd George to which I have already referred as to what the people of Great Britain have to look forward to with reference to the necessity of production, is evidence of how serious he regards the situation. In addition to that, I understand that one proposition has been that, in order to solve to some extent the food problem, all the German prisoners taken by Great Britain and France—and the number of them must be very great—should be transported across the ocean to the United States where they could be fed more easily than on the other side. In that way the duty of feeding them would be taken off the shoulders of Great Britain and France. Although, ever since the beginning of the war we have had marvellous success in regard to the safe transport of our Canadian troops—and this is not a matter in regard to which there need be any privacy—we have known of sailings from this side having been postponed and of vessels returning to this country having been delayed for a month or two, whereas such conditions were unheard of in the earlier months of the war. Although so far no Canadian transport carrying troops has been sunk, we have learned with sorrow that from the far off Dominion of Australia within the last week or so a troopship has gone down in the Mediterranean as a result of submarine warfare.

In addition to the general situation I have outlined, there is another situation in regard to Canada. Our northeast Atlantic coast is liable to attack at any moment during the coming summer. Fortunately, as the German ships were cleared off the Pacific ocean at an early period of the war, there is no probability of any danger to that portion of our Dominion; but it is a fact that it has been well recognized by naval authorities in Canada and by those who live down in the eastern part of the Dominion that for the past two years there has been a great probability that at any time a submarine might attack our eastern coast. That probability is apparent owing to the fact that the Deutschland was able to come across the Atlantic and that a fighting submarine sank the Stephano and other vessels off the American coast. It has been pointed out by those who have to deal with these questions and who have some naval experience, that it is quite within the bounds of probability—and when one speaks of things being within the bounds of probability one can readily realise that so far as this war is concerned the probable is very likely to happen—that German submarines could come, with the assistance of other vessels, to points along the western coast of Newfoundland and what is known as the Labrador coast, and there form bases for the supply of oil and other necessaries for their operations. All along the western coast of Newfoundland there are to be found bay after bay and harbour after harbour of the most isolated character, near which no people live, and in which it would be possible for the German naval authorities to establish bases and furnish supplies to fighting submarines.

Indeed, it is a common belief that along the little frequented shores of Maryland, north of Norfolk and Newport news, during the past year there has been established a German base for submarines. If it is possible to conceive of such a thing being so along the coast of the United States as far south as eastern Maryland, when we come to think of the conditions that apply on the coast of Labrador or the coast of Newfoundland, any one who has had an opportunity of visiting those coasts will readily realise that there would be no difficulty whatever in establishing such a base unless the greatest possible precautions were taken against it.

It will be noted from the remarks which I have read and the statements which have been made, that the Germans look forward to summer weather conditions to render it more easy and possible for submarines to operate. We can therefore look forward to the possibility or probability of German submarines coming across; and if in addition to the menace to the transportation of men and supplies across to Great Britain, we have the possibility of an attack upon our own shores, the necessity of Canadians wakening up to the situation becomes all the more apparent. The very latest papers intimate that steamers arriving at New York report that a submarine has been sighted 300 miles west of that part of the ocean which is considered the danger zone on the other side, so that German submarines may be working towards this side already. What has been the condition of affairs in the past in regard to that? Some of our transports, in leaving our Canadian shores and going across to the other side, have relied upon their speed. The magnificent work done by the great steamer is a matter of common knowledge, and the tremendous service she has rendered in taking men across from this side to Great Britain has been largely due to her great speed, which has carried her from the coast of North America as far as the danger zone on the other side where an escort awaits her. There have been times since the war began when the chief vessels in control of our defences were the Australian ships the Sydney and the Australia. I think there is no manner of doubt that at this moment Canada's defence upon the sea is being carried on by American torpedo boat destroyers. Years ago we used to discuss here in an academic way the Monroe doctrine, but now without any talk about the Monroe doctrine our neighbours to the south are giving us the protection of their cruisers.

What should we do in this regard? I have submitted questions to the Government with regard to the establishing of a naval aeroplane station on the Atlantic coast, and I gather from the answers that have been given that they have considered this proposal and turned it down. I submit that it is the imperative duty of the Government to proceed first to establish a naval aeroplane station in eastern Nova Scotia, with auxiliary stations in Newfoundland and in the province of Prince Edward Island. This is a matter about which there is no reason for secrecy; we should look the facts in the face and discuss them in the frankest possible way. The United States had no secrecy or misgivings when they were considering what ought to be done. It is all very well for us to have an aeroplane training school in Toronto and other places in Canada, but I submit that in view of the dangers that I have indicated as likely to come from the sea, and in view of the fact that a similar course of defence has been adopted by Great Britain and all the other nations, an aeroplane station should be established somewhere along our coast at a point to be decided upon by the proper investigating authorities, with auxiliary bases in Newfoundland and Prince Edward Island.

If we had such a station the airships would be able to ascertain whether there was a possible base for German submarines along the Newfoundland coast or elsewhere, and would be able to supply very valuable information as to the approach of vessels of different kinds. They could also be used for the observation of submarines possibly in Cabot Strait and the Gulf of St. Lawrence, and could work in conjunction with the vessels from Great Britain and the United States and other countries that are looking after our defence.

It may be that there are reasons that I cannot conceive of which have led the Government to believe it would not be prudent to establish such an æroplane station, but I submit that if there is to be any attempt whatever by Canada to look after her own defence this is a preliminary step which ought to be taken, and should not on any account be disregarded.

There is also the matter of ship construction. From the information I have been able to gather from answers to questions in the House and from statements that have been made by hon. gentlemen opposite, I understand that the Imperial Munitions Board is making expenditures in this country for the building of vessels for the Imperial Government. I assume that these vessels are not for the Government of Canada, because, as we have been reminded more than once in this House, the Imperial Munitions Board is not a Canadian institution per se, and owes no duty and is not responsible to the Canadian Government. If the Canadian Government are going to take any steps to replace the tonnage that is being sunk day by day I assume they would do it through the regular and natural channel, and that they have not done this I gather from the fact that the Minister of Finance, in answer to a question from myself only a few days ago, said the matter of giving aid to shipbuilding was under consideration.

I could give the House statistics, if it were necessary, to show the absolute necessity of providing ships, firstly, for purposes of defence, and secondly, for the building up of a merchant marine in this country, and to replace the tonnage that is being destroyed in the fleets of our Allies who have been doing our carrying trade during the last two or three years. I do not think any one will doubt the need for ships in view of the feverish energy with which Great Britain is turning out vessels from every possible shipyard; and then we have also the wonderful spectacle of the great American people being so impressed with the need for ships that three weeks after joining the Allies they are prepared to spend the enormous sum of one billion dollars to provide the ships so urgently required. Not only that, but President Wilson in his statement to Congress the other day announced that by agreement with the British Government they were taking over the contracts for the ships that were being built in the United States, and that whereas there had only been one shift of men per day, there would now be three, so that the work could proceed without a moment's delay. In addition to that, the President asked Congress for plenary powers to enable the Government to take over existing shipyards so that every nerve might be strained to attain the desired results. I submit that this is a matter that should not rest under the consideration of the Government for one moment longer. The question of what Canada should do in regard to shipbuilding has been discussed in this House several times both last session and this. Without any encouragement from the Government we find that men have gone along by themselves and engaged in the building of ships in different parts of Canada, in Nova Scotia, for instance, and on the Great Lakes and in British Columbia. We have not been yet able to produce in Canada the steel plates that are required in the building of steel vessels, although in almost every other avenue of steel production Canada is on a par with any other nation. But we have not a mill in operation in this country capable of turning out the necessary steel plates for steel ships, and we have had to get them from the United States or anywhere else where they could be obtained. Vessels of three thousand and four thousand tons are now in course of construction in my own province; some of them will be launched in the next two months, some indeed have already been completed, and all this has been done by private enterprise without aid or encouragement of any kind from the Government. It seems to me that it is time for the Government to do something, and there are two classes of ships to which the Government should devote its attention. The first is made up of such ships as are necessary for the immediate defence of Canada working in conjunction with the Mother Country. We have two submarines on the Pacific coast. For the time being, the necessity for their operation has fortunately gone. Down in Montreal, in the Vickers-Maxim concern, they are producing submarines. They produced some of them last year, and these were seen by those of us who live at the gateway of the Dominion in the Maritime Provinces, making their way out as though to cross the ocean, and no doubt to-day they form part of the defences of the Mother Country. Why do we not produce more submarines in the Vickers-Maxim works? Why did not the Government act long ago, when the subject was urged upon them, instead of sitting supinely? We can build destroyers. There is no magic about the construction of a steel ship. Any hon. gentleman who has looked into this matter knows that we have the artisans here, and that the conditions exist in Canada under which these vessels can be constructed. We should be constructing them, so that we may provide for our own defence and also make ourselves real auxiliaries upon the seas to the Mother Country and the United States and all the Allies. This has been urged upon hon. gentlemen opposite, and I urge it now once more in the strongest way I can.

It is said, we have no plate mills in Canada. Why, then, should not we provide conditions under which a plate mill might be started? You may say, it will take six months before a plate mill can be put into operation? Suppose that to be true, what then? The thoughtful man, he who has looked ahead in regard to the conditions under which Canada may help the Mother Country in this great struggle, and may play her part for freedom and right, has found his every proposal since the war began met in this same way. And so, we have done nothing in these things. If we had moved last year we could have had an ample supply of submarines for our protection, and we could have produced destroyers besides. Last year, there was no difficulty about getting plates from the United States. Even now it is open to hon. gentlemen opposite, if they worked in conjunction with the United States Government, to ask for a supply of plates from mills which are practically under their control. Bringing those plates to Canada an industry can be initiated which will assist us in the protection of our own country and will enable us the better to play our part in the war.

Then, over and above this question of defence upon the sea are we not to use some part of the vast expenditure we are making in connection with this war for replacement of the vessels lost to our merchant marine? Our merchant marine has not been so great that we can afford to lose any of its numbers; it is not greatly to our honour that the transportation of our products across the seas has been for years largely in the hands of Norwegians. We have in a most liberal manner provided for the transportation by land of the products of our country including those of our wonderful West. But a strange blindness seems to have fallen upon us in regard to future conditions. We have three transcontinental railways, over which we bring down our products to our ports on the Atlantic and on the Pacific, and yet we are dependent upon, and seem content to be dependent for all time upon, other nations for the carrying of these products upon the sea. And, if the destruction of our merchant marine that goes on to-day is maintained for any considerable length of time, in addition to danger that we shall be unable to find means of transportation for the food supplies needed by those at the seat of war, there will be very serious effects in lowering the exportation of the products which it is necessary that we should dispose of in the world's markets in order to maintain the economic strength of the country which is essential in view of the great obligations we have assumed.

I would like the Minister of Trade and Commerce to tell me why we cannot do that which Great Britain has done, is doing, and is going to do. I would like him to tell me why we cannot do what the United States has done, is doing, and is going to do. Has the genius of the people down by the sea from which my right hon. friend (Sir George Foster) himself has sprung, completely gone so that the young men are no longer to look forward to a career upon the sea in vessels constructed upon Canadian soil? It seems to me that cannot be so. We should do what other nations are doing, having regard to our financial capacity having regard to the obligations we have assumed, and having regard to the duty that rests upon us to relieve Great Britain, as far as we can of the necessity of the defence of Canada. Why should it be necessary for Great Britain to take from the North Sea a single destroyer or cruiser and send her to this side escorting the transports containing our men, or the supplies that we send across the Atlantic? We should have thought of this, we should have prepared for it. I engage in no recrimination as to the mistakes of the past; I do not wish to discuss the question from that standpoint, but only from the standpoint of the serious duty that is thrown upon us as Canadians to play our part now, even if we failed to play it before. Had we started a year ago, we should not now be worrying about the submarines being dangerous. We should not now, as a proud nation, be awaiting word of what course the United States intends to take in these matters. We are glad of their noble and generous assistance in this war; but the spirit of our people calls for leadership here, calls for a clear conception of our own duty, and demands that there should be no further delay in taking such action as will provide for our own defence, and will also supply the deficiencies in our merchant marine caused by the sinking every day of some of our ships. I submit that the great danger that threatens our nation, and through us the cause of the Allies, calls upon us imperatively to act now, if we have not acted before. It is not too late to begin. The Government should outline a programme of a generous character which would enable us, first, to produce steel plates in Canada. Pending their production, and so as to avoid even short delay, plates should be brought from the United States. We should proceed immediately with the construction of smaller vessels of the trawler type, which are said to be of the greatest possible assistance to the navy—"the eyes of the navy" they are called. We should build the submarines for the defence of Canada on the Atlantic coast. We should proceed with the construction of torpedo boat destroyers. We should provide for the manufacture on our eastern sea-coast of naval aeroplanes, which would enable us to use for our own protection that wonderful new discovery. We should have a comprehensive scheme to make up for losses in our merchant marine, and to lay the foundation of a merchant marine suitable for our future needs. These things seem to be lessons that one naturally and apparently draws from noting the conditions that exist in other parts of the Empire. Shall the Government act? The duty seems to me to be one which they cannot escape. I believe that they must have appreciated that they should have acted a year ago, or should have acted long before that. Notwithstanding that, let us act now; let us act boldly and promptly, let us act in such a way that it will be said of us that we have at last attempted to fulfil our duty to the great cause with which we are associated in the face of this menace which threatens us and all the allied nations.

Mr. A. A. McLEAN (Queens, P.E.I.): Mr. Speaker, a stranger listening to the remarks made by the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) would imagine that Canada has done nothing in this war. I believe the opinion of the thinking men of this country is that Canada has done everything within her means.

Mr. MACDONALD: I did not discuss the question of our assistance to the cause of the Allies upon land at all. I confined myself to the question of what we should do with regard to the submarine menace.

Mr. A. A. McLEAN: The accusation which the hon. gentleman has made is more injurious to the cause which he is attempting to forward than I thought at first. The submarine is a menace on the other side of the water, and, to a certain extent, a menace on this side, and I think the people of the Maritime Provinces should appreciate the fact that it may be a great menace to that part of Canada. But it is not submarines that we want down there; it is boats to repel submarines. We want protection on land and we want protection on sea, but we do not want submarines. Take, for instance, the different ports in the Maritime Provinces. Some of the remarks which the hon. gentleman has made are very appropriate and proper and the Government should take heed of the warning so as to give protection to every great port in the Maritime Provinces at which large quantities of gasolene, kerosene and other materials are stored. Take, for instance, the ports of Charlottetown and Pictou. Charlottetown is a distributing centre for the Imperial Oil Company. We have guns there and we have gunners, but we have not the guns placed and it would be easy enough for a submarine to come into the city of Charlottetown and replenish her fuel. The same would apply to Souris, Georgetown, Pictou and many other ports in Nova Scotia and the lower Gulf of St. Lawrence. But I want to remind the hon. Minister of Militia and Defence (Sir Edward Kemp) that plans were sent to him last year, accompanied by the suggestion that these guns should be mounted at different places along the coast in order that if any submarines should come they would be in a position to repel them. Supposing one of these submarines should come into the city of Charlottetown; we have no protection there whatever. We have seven or eight banks there in which large quantities of money are on deposit, and I think it would be an appalling disaster to the business interests of that part of the country if a submarine came there and attacked and looted these banks. I would therefore direct the attention of the Minister of Militia to the fact that immediate steps should be taken to have the guns at the disposal of the department, and which are lying idle in the city of Charlottetown, placed in a position so that the attack of a submarine could be repelled. This is not a matter which should be left because we saw last year, as the hon. member for Pictou has stated, submarines coming to the city of New York, and vessels being sunk off the American coast. The same thing has happened this year and I think the Government should take timely warning and have men and guns placed at all the ports where the supplies of these submarines could be replenished. I have no further remarks to make on this subject because I think I have made a sufficient statement when I say that the Government should take immediate steps to remedy the neglect, not only of this Government but of past Governments, in not manning and protecting the different ports of the Atlantic and lower gulf border.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend from Queens (Mr. A. A. McLean) has evidently become converted to the views of hon. gentlemen on this side of the House in regard to the necessity of a Canadian navy. If there is danger of the capital city of this province being attacked by submarines, I wish to tell him that the protection against submarines is destroyers, and if he and his party had voted, as they should have done in 1912, to adopt the policy of the late Government, he would be quite safe in the city of Charlottetown and on the Atlantic coast in regard to this menace. I did not understand that my hon. friend from Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) was expecting to extract any promise from the other side of the House in regard to commencing the work of building up a Canadian navy. Instead he referred rather to the necessity of mercantile ships to meet the menace of the submarines and the destruction of tonnage at the present time. I think that was the main purpose of my hon. friend from Pictou in bringing this to the attention of the House. We all understand that hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House are pledged against doing anything in the way of a Canadian navy. As long as they maintain that position it would be idle for us to endeavour to persuade them that it would be a proper course to take. But, everybody admits that at the present time there is great danger in the scarcity of tonnage to carry the products of this country to the battlefields of Europe and to feed the millions of people over there who are unable to produce enough to feed themselves. If it is true that 300,000 tons of shipping is sunk in one week, that loss must be met or else the end must come and the consequences will be that the Germans must win. That is the last card that our enemies are playing and the last hope they have is that they will be able to destroy the mercantile tonnage of the Allies so that they will be able to starve out England and her Allies and the war will end in that way. That is the hope that they have, and that is what they are striving for at the present time. It is up to the Canadian people to do something to meet that difficulty. Are we content to allow the United States to do everything? We are told that immediately after the United States threw in their lot with the Allies in this war, the Government of the United States made up their minds that they would build a thousand wooden ships of a standard pattern. The reason is plain why they have selected wood and why they have adopted the idea of a standard ship. A standard ship can be constructed much more rapidly and cheaply than a great variety of different kinds of ships.

Once a model is made that will be satisfactory for all the ships of the series, the one model will do, the one specification for wood will serve, the one type of marine engine, the one type of boiler, and the yards and shops of the country could, by obtaining a blueprint get to work to produce that particular kind of ship. That appears to be the idea that is abroad in the United States, and it looks to me like a practical one. It is rapid production of ships that they are after there, and the question for Canada is: Are we willing that the American flag shall alone be seen on the seas and that the Canadian flag shall disappear? Are we too proud, if I may put it that way, to allow all this to be done by the United States? We are a maritime people in this country. We are accustomed to sea life. We have succeeded well in building wooden ships in the past, and if it is necessary to revive the construction of wooden ships as a war emergency measure just now, why should not Canada take a hand in it? That is the way it strikes me, and it is up to the Government of Canada to give us a lead in regard to this important matter. It would hardly be expected that private enterprise would embark on the construction of wooden ships. Everybody knows that wooden ships were discarded a good many years ago, because it was found that the steel ship was more economical; in fact, there were many reasons why steel was adopted in place of wood, and in normal times a return will be made to steel construction. If we build wooden ships now it is only to meet the emergency before us, and we can build them in Canada. I have no doubt that there is ample wood in Canada with which to construct wooden ships, and we can build them as quickly as they can be built in the United States, if we are assisted, as we ought to be assisted, by the Government. The question of financing the construction of those ships, I suppose, is the main question. That is a question that ought to be dealt with by the Government. There are two ways of doing it. The Government could let the contracts, build the ships themselves, and own them, which would perhaps be the neatest and best way to deal with the question; or they could, under some system that might be worked out, guarantee private owners that they would not lose their capital if they embarked in the construction of wooden ships for the purpose of meeting the present emergency. If the ships are necessary as a war measure, the Government ought to build them. We are calling on the farmers of Canada to increase their production, and I have no doubt they will strain every nerve to meet the call made on them and that production will be largely increased. One of the main objects in increasing production is, not to feed ourselves, because we would have ample food for ourselves provided we went along as before; our main purpose is that we may be able to contribute something to the food supplies of our Allies across the water. It is of first importance that we should have tonnage to carry it over; to-day this question is more important even than the manufacture of munitions. The Allies have succeeded in reference to the big guns and ammunition. It is stated by authorities on the other side that we have now the absolute control in artillery at the front, that we have won so far as that is concerned; that is, we are better equipped than our opponents are. I have no doubt that on the question of munitions the difficulty has been solved, and that if Canada stopped her manufacture of munitions the war could still be carried on successfully. I suppose that is true. But this is a matter in which we can help. The construction of ships is right in our line, and it might be that the Government would not lose any money by undertaking the construction of these ships. The chances are that after the war is over there will be a great call for tonnage for several years to come. Millions of tons have been sunk and likely much more will be sunk before the war is decided, and, if so, tonnage will be very scarce and very costly. It might be that the Government could embark in the construction of one hundred ships of a standard pattern and put them into trade, and that within a couple of years after the war they might get out without losing a dollar. I think it is possible that would be the case. It is a little courage and administrative ability that we want to deal with this question. It is up to the Minister of Trade and Commerce to find a solution of this problem. I do not think our people will be satisfied that we should depend altogether on the United States in regard to this matter. The Canadian people will expect the Government to give a lead, and make it possible to use our own ship yards to produce a certain amount of tonnage to help in the present crisis, and my opinion is that if we do less than that we shall not be doing our duty.

Mr. W. F. CARROLL (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, we all, I think, agree that Canada has done a good deal towards helping the Allies in the present world crisis, so far as sending our brave boys overseas is concerned; but I think it is quite apparent to us all that Canada and Canadians have not done so much on the sea as we should have done, and not so much as is expected of what might be termed a semi-maritime nation. I do not think it was the purpose of the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald), who introduced this resolution, that it should be any criticism on the Militia Department for the way in which they have carried on their work during the present war. The Militia Department does not enter into this at all. I think the thanks of this House are due to the hon. member for Pictou for bringing this matter to the attention of the House. Personally I consider it an emergency matter, and a matter with which the Government should grapple immediately. Two years ago, about this time, I had the pleasure of saying a few words in the House on the same subject, introduced also on that occasion by the hon. member for Pictou. Almost every member in the House at that time took an active part in the debate, and all were inclined to the opinion that Canada should do something towards ship building, towards equipping the shipyards, and that the Canadian Government should, in a measure, finance some such project. The great emergency, as I understand it to-day, the great menace to the success of the Allies, is the work of the submarine as it has been carried on for the past three or four months; as a matter of fact, carried on for the past year or so. There is no doubt in the world that Great Britain with her navy is doing a wonderful work in combatting the destruction by the submarine, but it seems that since the month of January of this year the destruction wrought by the under-water craft is such as to more or less frustrate the measures which had hitherto been taken by the British navy. The British navy in this war has, of course, proved itself the wonder of the world, as was pointed out in a previous speech. The German navy is practically bottled up around the Kiel canal. The flag of Germany has been brushed off the seas. British commerce, apart from the submarine menace, is free to come and go, and all of this is due to the British navy. Personally I was never so proud of being a British citizen and a British subject as on the morning when we steamed into Liverpool harbour, surrounded by four submarine destroyers, which, like wasps, circulated around the bows of the ship in which were eight thousand Canadians. I never was so proud of being a British subject as I was on that morning. It was splendid to hear thousands of Canadian voices about 8 o'clock in the morning sing "Rule Britannia, Britannia rules the waves." Notwithstanding the fact that German commerce has been swept from the seas by the British navy and that the British navy and British genius has been most successful in combatting this menace, it is borne in upon the British people, as upon the rest of the world, that the menace has now reached such proportions that it cannot be successfully combatted by the ordinary means adopted by the British people and their Allies. Britain felt a month ago that there was a possibility of the submarine menace effecting the starvation of the British people. The shipbuilding interests of Great Britain were implored to rush the building of ships as they never did before, in order that vessels might be sent upon the seas to take the place of the commerce carriers which had been destroyed. They were doing all this, but Lloyd George came to the conclusion that there was another, and, perhaps, a more effective remedy. He stated in the House of Commons that England would never be starved by German submarines, because England had the remedy in her own hands: that of growing sufficient food to maintain her own population. While that may be within the range of possibility, the result might be an impairing of the efficiency of Great Britain's fighting forces. If Great Britain undertakes to feed her civilian and military population she will have to withdraw large numbers of soldiers and put them on the soil, thus rendering less efficient the forces with which she is combatting the efforts of the Germans on the western front. I understand that there is in Canada a large amount of surplus grain which it is almost impossible to convey across the Atlantic under present conditions. I say, without any political prejudice, that the Government is deserving of criticism for not having tackled this problem two years ago. The matter was brought to their attention not only by members on this side of the House, but also by gentlemen of high standing in their own party. The matter was then argued not from a political standpoint, but from the standpoint of national interest. There was no political bitterness or prejudice in the discussion which took place in the House two years ago last March or April, and it looked then as if something would be done. The matter may have been under consideration by the Government, but so far as we can see, that is all. No doubt there are difficulties in the way of rendering effective assistance to shipbuilding in Canada in order to supply means of conveying our foodstuffs to the old land, but I have no doubt the hon. gentleman who leads the House will enlighten those who do not know the workings of the Government as to whether or not something will be done. I think it is fair to say that the Government is justly subject to at least a mild form of criticism, not only for not having taken this subject up two years ago, but also for not doing something substantial to turn out ships in Canada, which would be of immense importance to the Allies in the winning of the war. I do not believe that any of us know exactly the extent of the destruction that has been wrought by the German submarines upon British, allied and neutral commerce, but we do know enough to realize that the menace is a most dangerous one and to have a clear conception of what our duty is in the premises. Apparently there is only one way of overcoming the disadvantage incurred by the sinking of so many vessels, and that is by furnishing a new vessel to take the place of every one that is destroyed. I am happy to say that while the discussion of this matter was proceeding, news was flashed across the wires to the effect that 13 Austrian submarines had been destroyed in the Mediterranean Sea. That is evidence of the fact that Britain and her allies are not asleep and that they are effecting by torpedo boats and other contrivances the destruction of many enemy submarines. Although up to January of the present year Britain had been comparatively successful in combatting the attempts of the submarines to starve her people, yet the danger of the menace now stares us in the face and one of the principal things being discussed by the allies to-day, including our new ally, the United States, is how further to overcome this difficulty—and the way seems to be by means of supplying a large number of vessels. The Government of this country should do something. Perhaps they are doing something; perhaps they are going to do something, but I do not think they will blame us if we urge them to quicker action. This danger must have been foreseen, and steps should have been taken to subsidize, if you will, the building of ships in Canada. I feel that all Canadians are willing and anxious to assist the allies in every possible way, but the question is, are we doing it? Are we rendering every possible assistance to Great Britain in the way of getting our surplus supplies of foodstuffs across the ocean? I think, Sir, that we are not, and I feel certain that the Canadian people generally are of the same opinion.

The hon. member for Pictou said that the securing of a supply of steel plate would be a difficulty in connection with the building of steel ships. I think that difficulty would continue only a short time. When steel shipbuilding is established in Canada and we have large steel works on the Atlantic seaboard, those steel works, if they see an opportunity of obtaining a market for their steel plate, will undoubtedly establish mills and put in apparatus to enable them to manufacture the necessary steel plate to fill the void which we feel at the present time. Of course, we can get steel plate from the United States, but the United States may have more demand for it than they can supply in the near future. If the Minister of Marine and Fisheries or the Prime Minister will take the matter up with our steel works with a view to seeing that some tangible efforts shall be made with a view to pushing along the construction of ships, they will have a flood of steel plates in this country, and I have no doubt in the world that not only loyalty to the cause of the Allies, but the matter of business will force the manufacturers of steel in this country so to equip their factories that they will have no difficulty in manufacturing this particular article. In passing, I might say —and I have no doubt that this has come to the attention of the right hon. gentleman who leads the House at the present time (Sir George Foster)—that the Government of the province from which I come has taken up the question and has appointed a commission into whose hands it has given the sum of two or three million dollars to encourage and assist shipbuilding in the Maritime Provinces. If my recollection serves me aright, the provincial Government of Nova Scotia was going to give the privilege to the Dominion Government of naming one of the members of that commission. Although I am not quite sure, I think there was some talk of that a short time ago in the province of Nova Scotia, so that it might be worth while for the Minister of Trade and Commerce, or whoever is looking after the Department of Marine and Fisheries at the present time, to take up this question with the Government of the province of Nova Scotia.

The matter was also taken up of an aeroplane station on the Atlantic seaboard. I understand that we have three aeroplane stations and perhaps three aeroplane schools in Canada, one of them on the Pacific coast and two in the province of Ontario. While that is all right and while we desire to congratulate the Government on their efforts in that regard, the province of Ontario and the rest of the centre of Canada are not in the same position to-day as regards the menace we are discussing as are the Pacific coast and the Altantic coast. There is an aeroplane station on the Pacific coast; there is none on the Atlantic. I did hear some rumblings and whisperings a few months ago to the effect that the British authorities were desirous of having this country establish and equip an aeroplane station on the Atlantic seaboard somewhere on the island of Cape Breton. I do not know whether or not that report is correct, and I do not know whether or not the matter has ever come to the attention of the Government, but the authority from which I got the information seemed to be fairly good and fairly truthful, and perhaps the matter is under the consideration of the Government at the present time. Outside of the Pacific coast and British Columbia, there is no place where an aeroplane station would do so much good and where the necessity is so apparent as it is on the Atlantic seaboard. Let us take Sydney harbour and Louisburg. Louisburg harbour is the winter shipping port of the Dominion Steel Company and the Dominion Coal Company; it is an open port and is one of the best harbours in the world, notwithstanding the fact that it is not very well equipped for general commerce outside of the shipping of coal and steel. On the shores of Sydney harbour are the steel works of the great steel corporation. These are two industries which are vital to the welfare of the country, and it is very necessary that they should be successful in their output both of coal and steel. I consider, therefore, that an aeroplane station and a few torpedo boats in that section of the country will be a wise precaution if we are going to have any maritime defence in Canada, although let us hope that they may not be required either in this war or in any wars to come. As regards the equipping of an aeroplane station, this section of the country has many advantages. It has the advantage, first of all, of being in a district where coal and steel are, comparatively speaking, cheap at the present time and where labour is not dear. There are also two Marconi stations near at hand, one at Louisburg and the other in the town of Glace Bay, so that an aeroplane station there is very necessary. While it is quite right to have aeroplane schools and to construct aeroplanes in Ontario, the point which I wish to make is this: that the present submarine menace does not materially or directly affect the interior of the country; it is the seaboard we have to look after at present. If the Government give this question of an aeroplane station in Cape Breton their attention, they will certainly arrive at the same conclusion as the British authorities have arrived at, that is, that an aeroplane station there, if not actually necessary, would be a wise precaution. I am not arguing the point because of the fact that I happen for the moment to represent that particular district, and I hope my hon. friends will do me justice in accepting my statement. My position, of course, may lend a certain stimulus to me in arguing the matter; but I am arguing it purely from a national standpoint and I think I have in my possession sufficient knowledge and sufficient facts to warrant me in saying that the British authorities were of the opinion that it would be a great thing, not only for a national defence but for the defence of the Empire, if steps were taken to establish an aeroplane station somewhere in the island of Cape Breton.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Is my hon. friend advocating an aeroplane station or a hydroplane station for Cape Breton island?

Mr. CARROLL: Probably a hydroplane station would be the better. That, of course, is a matter that experts would have to decide. I am not an expert in either branch myself. We shall not, however, quarrel on that phase of the subject.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The distinction is a very important one.

Mr. CARROLL: Perhaps I have taken up more time than I intended when I started to speak on this very important subject. I feel that a fair discussion should take place on it and I feel that the Government will not be doing their duty unless they take the matter up in an energetic manner and do something tangible that will tend to offset the menace with which the cause of the Empire and of the Allies is threatened at the present time.

Mr. O. TURGEON (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, I would like to make one remark on this subject. I have already expressed my opinion in this House as to the construction of all possible ships, and at this late hour, Canada in conjunction with the United States can not build too many transports and commercial ships.

Every time I see a report that one of our ships has been sunk by a submarine I regret that the ship has gone to the bottom, but I still more deeply regret the food that has gone down with her. If the Germans increase their submarine activities it may be that after a certain length of time we shall be left without ships to transport our food. The hon. gentleman who has just sat down has drawn attention to the fact that during the last three weeks thirteen Austrian submarines have been sunk in the Mediterranean by the Italian navy. Great Britain and the United States are combatting the submarine not only by replacing the ships that are lost, but by directly destroying the submarines themselves by means of destroyers of all kinds. If the view of my right hon. leader in 1911, that small vessels and destroyers should be built in this country, had been acted upon, it would have been of immense value in meeting the attacks of the German submarines. Italy is the best equipped of all the Allied navies, in proportion to her total strength, in the matter of small destroyers of all kinds. The war has shown that vessels of this kind are most important. While I would urge the Canadian Government to do everything possible in the way of building merchant ships, both steel and wood, they should also build destroyers to attack the submarines. It is quite possible that more good would be done by sinking ten or twelve submarines than by building an equal number of commercial vessels to replace the tonnage that has been sunk. My purpose in rising was to call the attention of the acting Prime Minister to this very important consideration.

Mr. D. D. McKENZIE (North Cape Breton): The question that is before us to-day is by no means a new one, and if it had been discussed this afternoon in an acrimonious partisan way, I do not think I should have taken part in the discussion, as I would regard the time as inopportune for discussing a question of this great importance from the standpoint of party politics. I am glad that every hon. gentleman who has spoken on the question this afternoon has avoided as much as possible the introduction of keen party spirit. I was pleased and proud to hear the very able speech of the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald). We have heard him often on various questions, but I do not know that I ever heard him to better advantage than this afternoon. It is true to say that I never before heard the question of naval affairs so ably presented in this House except on one occasion, the speech on that particular occasion transcended everything that has ever been heard in this House or perhaps ever will be. The honour and glory of putting the case in that admirable way belongs to the right hon. gentleman who to-day leads the Government (Sir George Foster). On the 29th of March 1909 we heard him present this case in a way that could not be excelled, and this afternoon I wish to remind him—I say remind, because Paul when writing to some of his people was so delicate and careful in his language that he did not like to say they were bad, so he simply reminded them that there were certain things which they had acknowledged and of their duty in that regard—I simply wish to remind the right hon. gentleman of that celebrated and famous speech of his, perhaps the best in his career of many able speeches, in which he laid down the principles which actuated himself and which should actuate the Government in regard to naval affairs. If the Government of which he is a distinguished member would only carry out in a small way the principles which he then advocated my hon. friend from Pictou and the rest of us would be amply rewarded for any efforts we have made this afternoon. It is quite unnecessary for me to take up any time in pointing out the necessity for some action being taken. The necessity has been clearly demonstrated; indeed, it was not necessary for it to be demonstrated, for we all knew it. The hon. member for Pictou did not bring this matter up to-day, and we are not making these speeches, because we think there is anybody in this country who does not fully realize the great necessity of taking steps to protect this country. Our object is simply to stir up the Government to speedy action.

It may be said, although I do not think it is strong ground to take now, that the Government might fear adverse criticism from this side of the House, but we are disarming ourselves by throwing everything into the pot, so to speak, and giving to the Government the full weight and authority of whatever arguments we put forward, and our sympathy and support of any action taken by them along this line. As I said before, this is not a new question. When the present Minister of Naval Affairs addressed this House for the first time as a member of the present Government he said, speaking on this very question (Hansard Nov. 22, 1911):

> I think the people of this country will approve of the action of this Government in hesitating before rushing hastily into a policy which must involve an expenditure of so many million dollars every year. I think they will appreciate the course of this Government in doing what was stated by the Prime Minister in his admirable speech in reply to the right hon. leader of the Opposition, when he said it was the intention of the Government to consider with the English Admiralty this whole naval question from first to last. When we have done that, I think we will be able to come before this House and this country with a policy that will appeal to all Canadians as a policy that will be the best for the people of Canada and the best in the interest of the Empire in which we live.

That is getting to be quite a while ago now. That speech was delivered on the 22nd day of November, 1911, when there was no war in sight. The Minister of Naval Affairs said that the matter was under consideration, that they were going to take it up with the British Admiralty, and that a policy would be evolved that would be satisfactory to the Canadian people. I am impelled to say that in at least one respect this Government bears a semblance of divine grace, for one day is to them as a thousand years, and a thousand years but as one day. They were going to start immediately. But now it is pretty well on to six years since this plan was made, and there is not a ripple upon the surface to indicate any action on their part. I hope this debate will be the means of stirring them up. I realize that the Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden) is not here, that the Minister of Naval Affairs (Mr. Hazen) is not here. Still, we have an Administration and "the King's business must go on." I trust that the Acting Prime Minister (Sir George Foster) and the Acting Minister of Naval Affairs (Mr. Reid), knowing that there will be no opposition to any proper action on their part, will take courage, will gird up their loins, and will do something for the protection of the country and the advancement of our merchant marine.

How this shall be done is a matter for these hon. gentlemen to propose. I would suggest that we have in this country great concerns that, war or no war, will require many ships, and that it might be a good plan to associate these concerns with the Government in shipbuilding. Take, for instance, the Canadian Pacific Railway. The great transportation requirements of that concern make it necessary for them to use many ships. If they could be induced to undertake shipbuilding in this country, with the capital at their command, the facilities they enjoy and their great connections, their co-operation would be of the greatest advantage, and their interest in the matter would be a guarantee that, war or no war, the vessels would be used. There is in my own county and in that of my hon. friend from South Cape Breton (Mr. Carroll) a great concern, the Dominion Steel and Coal Company, Ltd. They require a great number of ships, and if the Government could enlist their co-operation in shipbuilding it would be a great advantage to the country. Another company which has its headquarters in Sydney Harbour is the Nova Scotia Steel and Coal Company, which is much in the same position, and which is now actually engaged in building ships. It is not as large a concern as the others I have mentioned, but a large concern nevertheless, and the men connected with it are men of vision in the affairs of the country. But, even should these people refuse to engage in this business, we have money of our own, and this Parliament is ready to vote for these purposes any reasonable sum. We have plenty of talent in Canada to enable us to build these ships. I understand that in Montreal there is already a shipyard which can turn out destroyers. The minister should take the full power of that concern for our own purposes, so far as the naval part of it is concerned.

As to wooden shipbuilding, every creek and cove along the Atlantic coast in New Brunswick and Nova Scotia is a potential shipyard, and shipbuilding in these places can be encouraged. The Government of Nova Scotia is starting in that direction, and I hope that this Government will co-operate with them or any other provincial government that will move effectively along business lines in this important matter. I trust that the Government will be stimulated to such action as will result in the solution of this problem so far as our own interests are concerned and will enable us to give assistance to the Empire which shall be a worthy expression of the ambition and pride of Canadians.

Mr. J. J. HUGHES (Kings, P.E.I.): It is universally admitted that we face a crisis in the history of the world and a crisis in the history of Canada because of the scarcity of ships. While present conditions exist our trans-Atlantic trade will be injured, and our interprovincial trade as well. One factor that has caused scarcity of Canadian shipping is the Norwegian-built and Norwegian-manned ship which for many years has received and is still receiving all the privileges of our coasting trade while not subject to restrictions put upon British and Canadian ships. For instance, British ships that are condemned can be purchased by Norwegians, they can be manned more cheaply, and outfitted more cheaply in Norway than in Britain or in Canada, and they are given all the coasting privileges of this country. The competition of these vessels has been so keen that the Canadian flag has been practically driven off the water. That should have been prevented, or at least considered. But now we are confronted with a condition under which our trans-atlantic trade and our interprovincial trade will be handicapped unless the scarcity of ships is remedied. And it seems to me that this cannot be remedied under present circumstances unless the Government comes to the assistance either of corporations or private concerns which take up the building of ships. The Newfoundland Government has grappled with this question. There was a scarcity of shipping there such as in Canada. I understand that the Government there is giving a bonus of $20 a ton on wooden ships. And it is stated by those who have some knowledge of this subject that $20 a ton bonus would be sufficient to induce men with capital, men of experience, to undertake the building of wooden vessels in the Maritime Provinces. Years ago, the industry of building wooden ships was a very important one in the Maritime Provinces, but owing to conditions which I need not mention, for they are known to everybody, wooden ships practically disappeared from the seas, except ships flying the Norwegian flag.

At present, and while the war is on, the Government, no doubt, has to consider carefully the ways and means. I have a suggestion to make on that point which may be worthy of consideration. The Government has now on the Order Paper notice of a Bill standing in the name of the Minister of Railways (Mr. Cochrane) "An Act to encourage and assist the improvement of highways." I understand that it is the intention of the Government to appropriate $10,000,000 for this purpose. That, I think, is a matter that is not nearly so pressing at this time as the construction of ships. I think it will be a contentious and controversial measure.

I doubt the propriety of the Government introducing highly controversial legislation at this time and under the prevailing circumstances. If the Government would devote to shipbuilding the $10,000,000 proposed to be spent under this Act, if it is passed, it would meet with the general approval of the House and the people of Canada. If $20 a ton is sufficient to attract capital, skill and labour, in the colony of Newfoundland, perhaps a similar amount would be sufficient to attract capital, labour and machinery for the construction of ships in this country. I say that $20 a ton would build 500,000 tons of shipping, a very considerable quantity, that would probably meet all the needs of Canada for some years to come. The question of building standardized ships for ocean transportation, of course, would have to be considered and would likely be considered in connection with this subject. But the question of building smaller ships that could take part in the interprovincial trade, which is just as important as the trans-Atlantic trade and should not be overlooked. The building of smaller ships would establish an important industry and these ships would be useful as feeders to the trans-Atlantic trade. The industry would not only give employment to the mechanics who were building the ships, but employment to the carrying trade which at the present time is in a serious position in the Maritime Provinces. We have not the ships or the coasting schooners to-day to do the trade which is so essential in that part of the country. It is going to be a serious matter for the people living along the coast, where there is no railway communication, to carry on the ordinary business of the country. It is certainly a matter that the Government should take into consideration. The amount necessary to meet the conditions is well within the resources of Canada. I would again urge upon the Government the advisability of considering whether or not this more pressing need might not be taken in hand before they proceed with the Highways Bill which stands on the Order Paper. I wished to make these remarks on this question because it is the most pressing question which Canada has to face to-day, and a most important question to the whole of Canada, and particularly to the people who dwell upon the coast of British Columbia and the Maritime Provinces. I hope the Government will make an announcement on this subject.

Hon. Sir GEORGE FOSTER (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend from Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) has certainly taken generous advantage of the provision of the rules of the House under which he has made the motion. I do not think I would be travelling outside of the record if I stated that this particular rule was framed for the purpose of giving facility for discussing on sudden emergencies very urgent questions, which the ordinary leisurely rules of the House would not permit. I do not think it was ever meant that this rule was to be used as a channel by which discussions were to be brought on without regular notice, upon subjects of general policy such as this, and which have been before the House again and again and again. The statement of my hon. friend—I am just making this criticism by way of commencement—upon which he gets his opportunity to address the House and initiate this discussion is that he desires:

> —to discuss a definite matter of urgent public importance, namely, the menace to national interests by the German submarine campaign and the necessity of meeting it, and what Canada should do to deal with the situation.

On any fair interpretation of the rule, that would mean that there had rapidly developed in the mind of my hon. friend such urgency in reference to submarine warfare that he could not wait on the general rule which allows debate in the ordinary parliamentary way. In so far as my hon. friend kept himself to the discussion of the submarine peril, and to what we should do to grapple with it and destroy it, he was entirely within intention of the rule he invoked, and so far I have no objection to find.

But this is really a very delicate question to launch into the House for general discussion. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Macdonald) says that such-and-such is in peril; that we are doing nothing to counteract it, or, he asks: What are you doing to counteract it? To defend ourselves against such an attack, I would have to detail to the House just exactly what has been and what is being done, which, of course, it is impossible to do if we are to exercise commonsense prudence in this war time. One hon. gentleman opposite detailed to the House that there were certain localities in the Maritime Provinces where there was absolutely no protection, and where there are banks filled with money. The Kaiser has long ears, as it has not taken the world three years to discover. He gets information, and so do his minions, all the world over. If you should make sufficient answer to the man who tells you that this is a peril and that you have done nothing against it, you would have to say just where the strong points are and what they are, and thus advertise to the German Government that these are the points that they have to avoid; or if one points out that there are defenceless places which could be easily attacked, the German Government would be very glad to know. Their submarines sail under the sea, they are hidden from human ken, and information of this kind would doubtless help them in the effectiveness of their operations.

So that it is a delicate matter to take into a legislature. Much criticism has been made in Britain—some of it perhaps fairly just, much of it certainly unjust—as to the amount of publicity which should be given to those matters, and there have been heated discussions on it in the Houses of Parliament and outside. But that there is danger in public revelations of what is being done, no member opposite will deny. If I understood my hon. friend, his plea was that the transports for troops and munitions and food provisions that went from Canada were in peril because there was not sufficient provision for defence against possible disaster from submarines; and if I caught one sentence of his aright, it was to the effect that these transports went over without being properly convoyed. Now, not a transport has left a Canadian port which has not been under the supervision, under the direction, under the guidance of the British Admiralty, from the time it started until it reached its destination, and the British Admiralty commands the greatest naval force and facilities of any country in the world, as great as almost all other countries combined. It is not fair to create the impression amongst the people of the country, a great many of whom naturally enough do not have the facilities for understanding these questions, that our troops and our supplies for the troops are really passing across the sea in peril and ungarded because the Canadian Government has not done thus and so. My hon. friend speaks about the Deutschland having come over to this side of the ocean. We all know that there are possibilities. The U boat of the present time is a wonderful ingenious machine of great power and of wide scope as to the zone of its operations. It is a peril, but nobody will deny that the peril of the submarine has up to the present been and even at the present time is mainly on the other side of the Atlantic and not on this side, so that the defensive and offensive machinery against the submarine have been put into force where they are most effective and are most largely called for. There is a peril on this side of the Atlantic, but it is a possible peril rather than an extremely probable one, and it is one which, if probable, is not at all the serious peril that it is on the other side of the Atlantic. I can not go into detail because it would not be wise to do so, although I know that some will say: "Oh, that is a subterfuge." It is not meant as a subterfuge at all. I am absolutely honest in making that statement. It is impossible for me or for any member of the Government to go into the matter before the House and to show to the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) and the other members of the House just what has been done and what is being done in order to protect our Atlantic coast from the peril of the submarine, probable only although it be.

Mr. MACDONALD: Does this statement relate to what is done by this Government or by the British Government?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: In this matter the Canadian Government does not feel that it is incumbent on it to look after the whole naval protection of this side of the Atlantic ocean any more than it feels that it is incumbent on it to look after all the land forces and power necessary to secure a successful conclusion of the war. It does not arrogate to itself that duty. It works in conjunction and complete and close unity with the Government of Great Britain, and the naval and military authorities of Great Britain; and every step that we have taken, and every step that we have avoided, has been taken or avoided after consultation with and on the advice of the British Government, through its admiralty and navy. My hon. friend need not be in too much trepidation as to what has been done and is now being done and will be done for the protection of these coasts. I can not go into particulars, but I may say to my hon. friend that to-day every ship-yard in the Dominion of Canada which is able to build ships and has an equipment therefor, has not only the opportunity but has the actual contract for building every craft that it can possibly build; that to-day the building of vessels in this country for the specific purpose of warding off and fighting against the submarine peril is engaging the activities, is employing the labour, and is being carried out by the supervision of the ship yards in this country. The statement I made a moment ago covers the whole ground.

As to wooden ships, an arrangement is now completed and is being carried out whereby anybody or any company that can undertake in a bona fide way to build wooden ships and to deliver them within a certain time, will get the opportunity of building the ships and will be assured that the ship will pay for the cost of construction, with a reasonable profit. That is being done along the line of the co-operation that I have spoken of. We are working together, in and in with each other. These ships and vessels—let me be perfectly frank about it—are being financed in the main by British capital but they are being helped as well by the Dominion Government, and the operative work is being done by Canadian labour under Canadian supervision. So if the position is taken that the problem of meeting the submarine peril includes the finding of finished ships to fill the shortage of tonnage that has been caused by the submarine destruction, we can say that everything is being done that can be done in Canada to-day, taking into account possible labour, possible material, and ship building equipment. Every ship that can be made in Canada is being constructed as rapidly as possibly can be in order to help to fill the shortage of tonnage caused by the submarine destruction.

If what the hon. gentleman (Mr. Macdonald) is looking for in the first place is, that the submarine peril shall be met and grappled with, then it is being met and grappled with. If what the hon. gentleman has in his mind is that, if the submarine continues to put a large number of ships to the bottom, the shortage shall be made good as speedily as possible—that is being grappled with. It will be met by the construction of British ships with British money, many of which are being built to-day and will be built this year and next year in Canada.

Mr. MACDONALD: Are they to be Canadian registry ships, or are they not?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: My hon. friend is acute and shrewd. There was no need for that question, because I said as explicity as the King's English could put it that these ships were being built by British capital.

Mr. MACDONALD: Then you are not doing anything in the matter of building ships.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Whom does the hon. gentleman mean by "you"?

Mr. MACDONALD: The Government.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: What is the special anxiety of my hon. friend? Is it as to the work which he says he wants done, being done under British capital expenditure, and in British dominions, of which this country is one? Is that what he is after when he looks upon conditions resulting from the submarine war and expresses a desire that its ravages shall be repaired? If that is what he is after, he has a sufficient answer—that is being done. Or does he want to launch the accusation against the Canadian Government that they are not putting their own money into this; that they are not doing it with their own particular means? Does he say: I acknowledge that that accusation, even if well founded, has been fully met by provision for reparation to the extent that we can make it with British capital in this country, but I want to make a case against the Government itself and so it does not satisfy me that the void is being filled; I want it filled by you, and because you do not fill it, I shall have a grievance. He asks for leadership. Is the member for Pictou a heaven-born leader? Is he erecting himself into a naval and military critic who knows more about what ought to be done on this coast with aeroplanes, with submarines, and with all the machinery for coast protection, than do the British Admiralty, with their brave and skilful officers, and with their centuries of experience? My hon. friend may be justified from a party point of view, but hon. gentlemen will have observed that he told us he started out with the idea of saying nothing in a partisan spirit. It was his immense apprehension of the submarine peril and his immense desire that that peril should be met and that the vacuum of ravage should be filled up, which induced him to make the representations that he did. Now he is not satisfied; he wants to know why another fellow did not take the necessary steps rather than the fellow who is doing it.

I do not know that I ought to go any further, because this is not the time for a debate upon the commercial marine of Canada. I frankly acknowledge that it is a fair subject for discussion whether the building of ships should be done entirely by British capital in this country to the fullest extent of our capacity to assist in that building, or whether we ought as a Government to be building ourselves and consequently to be making up gradually a commercial marine for Canada, having regard to our future needs. That, I say, is a fair subject for discussion, and probably there would not be very much difference of opinion between us on the principle itself. But the member for Pictou acknowledged that there were some difficulties; that ways and means have an important bearing on the matter. The member for Guysborough (Mr. Sinclair), however, was as light as air. I mean in this sense, that there did not seem to be any responsibility from above resting upon him when he stood up and said in a light and airy way that the Government ought to build 200 ships.

Well, Canada is doing a great deal. She is lavishing a vast amount of money, as well as her blood, upon the operations connected with this war. It is impossible for this country to do everything. Two hundred wooden ships of 4,000 tons each would cost from $60,000,000 to $70,000,000; and if they were steel ships they would cost nearly $150,000,000. It is a question whether the best thing is not being done—British capital building the ships for British commerce, and Canada devoting her energies to other kinds of work—costly enough, heaven knows, but borne cheerfully by the people.

I want to caution the House. Maybe hon. gentlemen do not need it; some of them are older than I am, and some are younger. But there is a disposition on the part of hon. gentlemen in this House to cite things that are not done as having been done, and things that are simply rumoured in the papers as being matured decisions of Governments. My hon. friend spoke of the United States having made up its mind to build 1,000 wooden ships. I am not aware that the United States has made up its mind to build 1,000 wooden ships. I know that reams of paper have been given to the dissemination of that idea in the American newspapers, but my latest information is that no decision has been arrived at as to the number of wooden ships that shall be built. My hon. friend thought that there would be no difficulty in our building steel ships. Let me tell him this: for the ships which are being built in Canada to be delivered in 1917, sufficient steel plate has been secured or is in store. For vessels which are to be delivered in 1918, most of the steel plate that is necessary is under contract, and, it is hoped, will be delivered. But you cannot go to the United States to-day —the only place where you can get plates for steel ship building—and make a contract for delivery within a year's time at even the enormous prices which they are charging. Steel plates for shipbuilding could be bought in normal times at 2¾ cents and 3 cents a pound, whereas to-day they cannot be got at less than 9 cents and even 10 cents a pound. But recollect this: whereas heretofore we have been able to place orders for steel plates in the United States and get deliveries gradually at the increased prices, to-day the United States is commencing to build up the machinery of a mighty offensive effort against the common enemy of us all, and her steel producing activities will be tried to their very utmost in order to meet the necessary demands. It is not and it will not be an easy thing to get steel plate for shipbuilding purposes.

I think one of the members of the House intimated that we might now divert our efforts from munition work to the building of ships. I would not endorse that idea at all. We are all thankful that British activity, organization, scientific skill, and method have increased the small proportions of explosives that were made and the small supplies of guns that were possibilities during the first period of the war, until to-day in explosives and in heavy guns Great Britain is well supplied. Great Britain, however, has Allies and these Allies must also be well supplied if the war is to be carried on to a successful conclusion. Guns wear out and explosives are shot away by the million dollars' worth every day that this war lasts, and the same gigantic, scientifically constructed organization which, working with a will, has brought about the splendid condition as regards explosives and heavy artillery that Great Britain, fortunately for herself, is in to-day must keep vigorously at work on the same scale because of the wastage that takes place and the necessity of constantly implementing what is used. Therefore, I could not say that the war would go on just as well if Canada stopped the making of munitions and turned her attention to the building of wooden ships. The situation would be fraught with peril if we were to shut the doors of our munition factories and were to turn our attention instead to the construction of wooden ships which could be of little service for five, six, or even seven months. I do not think we could justify such a step for a single moment.

Let us not get into a panic in regard to the submarine menace. The submarine is an awful, piratical, destructive engine of war; it has done immense damage; it is doing immense damage now, and it will do immense damage during the whole course of the war, but the British fleet, with the experience and devotion of its leaders and its personnel, in conjunction with that magnificent fishermen's fleet, 100,000 strong in men whose daily occupation before the war was the sweeping of the seas for the harvest to be garnered therefrom, who have given their services to the Government with a courage, a discipline and a coolness unequalled by the trained men on the battleships, has swept those dangerous seas for the safety of the commerce of the whole world. That fishermen's fleet has swept those dangerous seas and is sweeping them every hour and every day with sometimes not a hair's breadth between those gallant fishermen and sudden and certain destruction. It is that less splendid but not less serviceable part of the British naval work—the fishermen's mine sweeping and trawling work—that, added to the British navy, and backed up and supported by newer methods of fighting submarines which are every day coming to the front has done and will continue to do that important work that make us feel that although there is tremendous peril and great destruction of life and of property still ahead of us, it is not sufficient to break the confidence of the Allies and of the British Empire, as a part of the Allies, in the coming final real victory for which we are all working.

Mr. SINCLAIR: I understood the minister to say that British capital is now available for the construction of Canadian ships in Canadian yards. This is news to some of us as it has not been made public before and it is very important news. Will the minister, therefore, be kind enough to tell us on what terms a builder can secure British capital?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: A builder does not personally secure British capital, but if he makes a bona fide offer and shows that he has the financial capacity, equipment, and the labour to build those vessels, he will be given a contract up to the extent of his capacity.

Mr. SINCLAIR: I understood the minister to state further that a guarantee would be given that no loss would occur to the parties undertaking the building of ships.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I stand by what I said. That will be the case.

Mr. MACDONALD: Does the Imperial Munitions Board give that guarantee?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The Imperial Munitions Board acting for the British Government.

Mr. SINCLAIR: It is curious that they did not give that information to the public.

Mr. MACDONALD: Mr. Speaker, unless any other hon. gentleman desires to speak, I will now proceed to close the debate.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: If any other hon. member wishes to speak on this subject, he must do so before the hon. member for Pictou speaks again.

Mr. E. M. MACDONALD (Pictou): Mr. Speaker, my right hon. friend, desiring to evade the question, has indulged in that warmth of speech of which he is such an admirable master. As my right hon. friend has reproached me for introducing this subject in the way in which I did, I may say that I was well within the rules and absolutely justified in bringing this question before the House; and if I were not justified, then no other matter can be conceived that can be brought before the House on the consideration of a motion that the House do now adjourn. This is a most important question for the consideration of Parliament; it is one that was discussed in the Imperial Parliament on Tuesday of this week when there were none of these suggestions or whisperings or insinuations that you must not say this or that or the German Kaiser will hear what you say on the floor of the Imperial Parliament. Instead of that, the members were told: You are the free representatives of Great Britain discussing this, the greatest menace of the war. Yet my right hon. friend suggests here to-day the bugaboo that we, the representatives of a free people in this country, must not look the situation in the face and must not ask this Government whether they are realizing the menace that the Imperial Government have realized; we are told we must not speak except with bated breath. When my right hon. friend indulges in statements of that kind by way of pretext, I reject any such suggestion. This matter is one of the greatest importance before Great Britain or any of her Allies. It has been discussed in their Parliaments; it forms the common subject of discussion in the press of the United States. The President of the United States, the Secretary of State, and the Secretary of the Interior deal publicly with this question and the part they are going to play in order to meet and overcome this great menace; but when we come to this Canadian Government, it clothes itself with holiness and declares that nobody must venture to suggest that with its omniscience it can do wrong, and that no one in this free country must venture to suggest that it should do or not do anything. That is the atitude of my right hon. friend. If he fancies that the people of this free country, the red-blooded men of Canada, are going to submit to that kind of dictatorial Kaiserism, he is making a great mistake. Either there is a menace or there is not one; and if there is, what is this Government doing to deal with it? I said nothing with regard to the situation in the Maritime Provinces or anything else that required any homilies from my right hon. friend. He has told us that the British Navy has been wonderfully successful in giving us protection and in transporting our men and supplies across the ocean; I cordially agree. But here was a new menace. The British Admiralty admitted in the House of Commons the gravity of the situation. Yet in the House of Commons here nobody must say anything about it. If we do, we are helping the Germans! Such ridiculous absurdities can hardly stand the light of day in this twentieth century in our free Parliament. What does my hon. friend say that he is doing about this menace? He wound up with a peroration paying a glowing tribute to the British Navy which we all admire; but although the United States are spending one billion dollars to build up a merchant marine the minister says that Canada should not do anything. He says that the Imperial Munition Board is building ships in this country with British money, to which the Canadian Government are contributing; everything that is proper to be done is being done; it is treasonable to ask any questions about it; that is what my hon. friend said.

Mr. LEMIEUX: What about the overseas Minister of Militia?

Mr. MACDONALD: Yes, the great overseas Minister of Militia, who is so much admired by the ex-Minister of Militia, the man on whom Canada pins her faith. But I will not turn aside to discuss that gentleman's capacity and record, as we shall probably have an opportunity at some other time except to say that everybody who has been in England knows how little fit he is to guide the destinies of Canada's overseas forces. My hon. friend says that the Munitions Board are building wooden ships in Canada with British money, to which the Canadian Government is contributing, and that we must not ask anything more about the matter. We are not going to build ships. I asked the Minister of Finance the other day what this Government was doing in the way of building ships, and he said: "The matter is under consideration." Now we have the statement of the Minister of Trade and Commerce that even if the matter was under consideration, nothing is going to be done about it, because the Imperial Munitions Board are building wooden ships. My hon. friend from Guysborough tried to get some information, but he was no more successful than I. The minister tells us Canadian money is being given the Imperial Munitions Board, a body that is not responsible to the Canadian people, and that the Board is going to build ships for somebody. We cannot tell you anything more than that, he says. We must take it for granted that these things are being done. I say that we will have to have a full statement from my hon. friend at some later date as to just what the Imperial Munitions Board are undertaking to do, what ships they are building, and where they are being built. My hon. friend intimates to the House that the Government, as a government, do not propose to insist upon the construction of either steel or wooden ships in this country. The Government of the greatest overseas dominion of this Empire, living adjacent as we do to our great Anglo-Saxon neighbour, are going to do nothing as a government in the way of building ships. The United States realized the necessity of filling up the gaps created in the merchant marine and in the navies by the German submarines, and that country is doing splendidly, but this Government does not propose to do anything. We are going to let the British Government do it all through the Imperial Munitions Board. We are not going to give one dollar, although vessels of Canadian registration, flying the Canadian flag, and transporting Canadian goods, are being sunk week after week. Our whole merchant marine may be obliterated before the war is over, and yet the Minister of Trade and Commerce of the greatest dominion in the Empire is responsible for the statement that Canada will not do a single thing or give a single dollar towards shipbuilding.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The Minister of Trade and Commerce is not responsible for any such statement, for he never made any such statement, and he is not at all responsible for any inferences that my hon. friend chooses to draw.

Mr. MACDONALD: What is the Government doing?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Hansard will give you exactly what I said. I generally am able to make my meaning plain. If my hon. friend will see what I said in Hansard to-morrow, and will put that side by side with what he has just said, if he is fair, he will be crying " peccavi " to-morrow afternoon.

Mr. MACDONALD: If my hon. friend has made any statement indicating that the Government are contributing a dollar by way of bonus, or subvention, or in any other way towards the construction of ships in this country then I am sorry, for I must have misunderstood him. If he has indicated that this Government, as a government, is providing for the construction of ships in Canada, I did not so understand him, and if he did make any statements of that kind I pause for a moment to see if he will repeat them.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I do not know whether or not I can succeed in enlightening my hon. friend. I made a statement with regard to certain things that were being done. I did not make any statement as to what the Canadian Government proposes to do in the future with reference to shipbuilding. I am not called upon to make any such statement. There will be a time when the Government will make known what it proposes to do in that regard. If I did not say in my remarks that the Canadian Government was expending its own money in the construction of a number of these vessels, then I probably did not go as far as I should have done—but, that is the case.

Mr. MACDONALD: Where are they being constructed?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: In Canada, at different shipyards.

Mr. MACDONALD: Have contracts been let?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Contracts have been given, and some of the vessels will be ready to take the water in June.

Mr. MACDONALD: Where are these vessels being built?

Mr. HANNA: Is there anything else you want to know?

Mr. MACDONALD: If my hon. friend thinks that this free Parliament is run by the decrees of an internal body, well, he may be Tory enough to believe it. The Minister of Trade and Commerce knows that this Parliament has a right to know whether contracts have been let for these vessels. He is too old a parliamentarian not to know that.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Certainly this Parliament has a right to know, and if my hon. friend wishes to know he will get his information. I am not quite sure—and here again I shall offend the democratic susceptibilities of my hon. friend—when he will get exact information as to the number of patrol vessels and mine sweepers that are being constructed by the Dominion of Canada at the present time. I am not sure that he will get that information; I am not sure that it is wise that he should.

Mr. MACDONALD: We have succeeded in getting some information at all events, but I would say to my hon. friend, if it is possible for the British Government and the Government of the United States to give to the people who supply the funds to enable them to administer the affairs of the country, information such as has been given to them in this regard, I see no reason why my hon. friend should not give similar information to this House.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Let my hon. friend be fair. Will he point out any particular time within the last two years when either in the United States or in Great Britain the men who have charge of this matter of building vessels for the purpose of meeting the enemy's warships, either under the sea or on the sea, have detailed the places at which they were being built, the kind of vessels which were being built, or the number? I was in England last summer and by the courtesy of the British Government I had the opportunity with others who were with me to see the inside of the building and operating work which was going on there, to meet the German peril both undersea and overhead. I was shown these things under the seal of secrecy, and not a note could I take, not a note did I take, during all that time. I want my hon. friend to point out where, either in the United States or in Great Britain, this particular information has been given.

Mr. MACDONALD: My right hon. friend (Sir George Foster) knows very well that, while in the Government circles these things are regarded as matters of secrecy, in the shipyards of the country the number and character of vessels under construction is a matter of common knowledge, both in Great Britain and the United States. He knows that if he will turn to the English Hansard he will find there statements given in regard to the shipbuilding that is going on. He will find that, repeatedly, Lloyd George himself has made statements as to the number of vessels of various classes under construction and their tonnage. But all we have been able to extract from the right hon. gentleman (Sir George Foster) is that some mine-sweepers are being built. But he will not permit me to say, and I hope he will take no exception to my way of saying it, that on the question of assisting toward making good the deficiencies in our merchant marine, caused by the action of the enemy, we are left to infer that the Government are doing nothing.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: My hon. friend will allow me to be definite. He has stated that both in the United States, in the Congress or outside of it, and in Great Britain, in their Parliament or outside of it, those in authority have repeatedly given information as to the war vessels under construction, their kinds and dimension and where they were being built. Will he substantiate that by something more than a general statement? Will he show me his authority?

Mr. MACDONALD: I shall be glad to give it at the proper time—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

[Sir George Foster.]

Mr. MACDONALD: The right hon. gentleman comes to us—

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I will give my hon. friend any time he likes, if he will only do it.

Mr. MACDONALD: I am glad the right hon. gentleman accepts the suggestion. I am sure he appreciates the fact that this Government, naturally and properly, should accept it under the circumstances. He has very promptly drawn the discussion away from the main subject to a side issue. He has evaded the substantial question, whether this Government proposes to do anything to assist in the construction of merchant vessels in this country to fly the Canadian flag and to fill the vacancies which take place in our merchant marine day by day. The policy of the Government under consideration a week ago is still under consideration, and nothing is done. He utterly misapprehends my motive in bringing this matter to the attention of the House. I have urged, as it was my right to do, and as has been urged in England and elsewhere, the necessity of the Government dealing with these matters in some definite way. So far as our merchant marine is concerned, we are left to understand that nothing will be done. We are told that arrangements are being made in some other way. But so far as the great question which has been dealt with by both the British government and the United States government, where they faced the issue openly and fairly, and made their announcement as to what they were going to do, the right hon. gentleman evades the question. We have no policy of this Government in regard to assisting the construction of merchant vessels in Canada, either by the Government themselves or by subvention or other assistance. We are not told that the Government is grappling with that phase of the question or undertaking to deal with it in any way.

As it is six o'clock, Mr. Speaker, and as I cannot be here when the House resumes, I ask leave to withdraw my motion.

Motion withdrawn.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess.

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

UNITED STATES TARIFF ON WHEAT.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. J. G. TURRIFF (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I would like to get a little information if possible, from my hon. friend who is leading the House (Sir George Foster). I have the following telegram from Winnipeg:

Try and get something definite on import duty on wheat and wheat products under new proposed tax in the United States. Great uneasiness here owing to large cargoes lying over there which were either released from bond or have been left over ever since supposedly free wheat.

I presume the information that is wanted is as to the position of wheat cargoes that were released from bond over there, but probably not disposed of. I am not sure of that but that is what it appears to be. In the meantime there is a duty of 10 per cent on wheat going into the United States as a war duty and I presume they desire to know if the Government has any information as to whether that duty would cover cargoes of wheat which have been released from bond and not disposed of.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The Bill in reference to which my hon. friend (Mr. Turriff) speaks is only at present a Bill which has been reported from the committee to the House. There has been as yet, in so far as I know, no discussion of it in the House and no one knows how that Bill will come out of the House. My hon. friend has just as much information as I have, or as can be got, until the Bill is acted upon and becomes law in one form or another.

Mr. TURRIFF: It is not law at the present time?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: No.

DR. BRUCE'S REPORT.

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. FRANK OLIVER (Edmonton): I deside to draw attention to a statement appearing in Hansard on February 7. Hansard says:

Sir ROBERT BORDEN laid on the table of the House a report by Colonel Bruce on the Canadian Army Medical Service.

He said: This is the only copy that is available on this side of the ocean at the present moment. I have, however, decided that it had better be laid on the table of the House, as further copies are coming in the immediate future. I should explain that it is marked "confidential, for official use only." Under ordinary conditions, I should think it ought not to be brought down; but it would appear that it has been made public, wholly or partially, through the press, I do not know in what way. Further, it seems to me that to avoid any misconception and understanding which might arise, if it was not brought down and laid upon the table of the House, it is better to take that course than to refuse to lay upon the Table a document which was intended only for confidential official use in the first instance.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Will it be printed during the recess?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: It is being printed now, I understand. Some forty copies, I think, are coming from England by mail. These will be available, and we will have further copies printed if necessary.

I am also laying upon the table of the House the report of the Board of Inquiry of which Sir William Babtie was chairman. This report deals with practically the same matter as the report I have already laid upon the table of the House, and it is proper that if the one report is placed before the House and the country, the other report should also be made public.

Understanding from the statement made to the House on February 7 that it was the intention of the Government that this report should be printed for the information of the public, I applied at the distribution office yesterday for copies of this report and was informed that they were not available for distribution and that the report was not being printed. I would like to ask the Government if that is the position of affairs?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Whether the report is being printed here or not I do not know, but we have a number of copies which have come over, as intimated, from England, and my hon. friend can be served with a copy on application to the clerk.

Mr. TURRIFF: I may say in connection with this matter that when the report was first laid on the Table I got a copy from the clerk in charge and was getting some extracts from it for later use when the King's Printer was very anxious to get it and sent for it. He told me that there was quite a number being printed and that there would be no trouble in getting all the copies we wanted.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I will make inquiry as to whether it is being printed and how far it has got on. There is no objection to its being printed, if it is necessary.

Mr. OLIVER: In this connection, I wish to draw attention to a statement which appeared in the press that Dr. Bruce made a defence, if I would understand it in that way, or a reply, to the Babtie report which was placed by him in the hands of the Minister of Militia. I would ask if it is the intention of the Government to make public this reply or report of Dr. Bruce.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I will make inquiry in reference to that and let my hon. friend know.

SUPPLY.

The House in Committee of Supply, Mr. Blain in the Chair.

Department of the Interior, Dominion Lands and Parks—Salaries of the outside service, $465,000.

Hon. W. J. ROCHE (Minister of the Interior): This is to pay the salaries of all the outside staff numbering 447, the same number as last year. This includes the salaries of the staffs of all our land agencies in the West, timber inspectors, homestead inspectors, inspectors of land agencies, ranches, and sub-agencies.

Mr. OLIVER: I wish to repeat the criticism I made last year that, in my humble judgment, the condition of the business of the department of the Interior in the West does not warrant a large expenditure of this kind. It is being urged upon the country that there should be saving in all lines on account of the heavy drain on the resources of the country because of the war.

I desire to take the responsibility of saying here and now that in my judgment—and I speak as one having some knowledge of the subject—this is an absolutely unwarrantedly large expenditure at this time and under these circumstances, and that this item should not be as large as it is.

Mr. ROCHE: My hon. friend's criticism, I presume, refers to the expenditures of the Interior Department generally. This particular item, of course, is for the Outside Service.

Mr. OLIVER: I refer particularly to this item.

Mr. ROCHE: That would mean that the hon. gentleman thinks that our staff is over manned?

Mr. OLIVER: Absolutely over manned.

Mr. ROCHE: My information is quite the contrary. We have 160 of those men who are doing duty at the front. The places of many of these we have not filled, in fact that has only been done where it was absolutely essential to do so. These men are drawing an average of about $1,000 apiece, which is a small salary, comparatively speaking, taking the whole outside service, in this period of high cost of living. Our land offices have been extremely busy in connection with the extra work entailed by the seed grain advancement. We have been using our land office staff, our homestead inspectors, etc., during the winter months, and they have been kept very busy. In fact in certain classes out there it is almost impossible to secure help at the present salaries, particularly in the case of clerical help and stenographers. Some of our staff are leaving because of the low salaries. I am inundated with applications for increased salaries from the outside staff, because they are underpaid. There are many in the Inside Service at Ottawa drawing $700 to $900 and the hon. gentleman will realize, I am sure, as he is a western man, that the cost of living there is at least as high as it is in Ottawa. It is considered essential to introduce legislation at this session to increase the salaries of the lower grades of the Inside Service, and I was seriously considering doing the same thing in connection with the outside service, applying the increase on the same basis to those getting $60, $65 and $75 per month. I do not think it is possible to cut down our staff at the present time. They have been very busy, and I disagree with the hon. gentleman in his statement that we should dispense with their services, in view of the fact that fully 160 of them have enlisted and gone to the front.

Mr. OLIVER: Does the minister mean to say that there are 160 of the employees of the Interior Department who are at the front and are drawing their salaries from the Interior Department as well as their military pay, and rendering no service to the Interior Department?

Mr. ROCHE: I do not say that. I say there are about 160 who have enlisted from the outside service. Many of those are overseas. Some of them enlisted prior to the Order in Council which provided for the pay of the civil salary less military salary. That is, they are drawing full salary. Those who enlisted prior to November 1, 1915, are drawing their full civil service salary, and those who enlisted since then have their military pay deducted from their civil pay. In some instances we have had to replace those men, but we have been trying to avoid filling their places unless it was absolutely essential to do so.

Mr. OLIVER: Is there some difference in the quality and constitution and responsibilities of a gentleman who holds a position in the Government and one who is a plain citizen of the country, that the one should be guaranteed his civil salary while he is rendering patriotic service, while the other must lose whatever civil advantages he may have in order to render such service? I did not know that the gentlemen who are fortunate enough to be civil servants of our country are of such superior flesh and blood to other citizens that they should be so especially differently treated, and, especially as I have said, at this time when we are all called upon to exercise economy. It appears to me that the Government which calls upon the country to exercise economy should give leadership in that exercise of economy, and should deal with due regard to the services rendered and to the requirements of the services. I do not wish to prolong the discussion, but I humbly submit that there is no evidence in these Estimates of any due consideration by the Government of the special circumstances in which the country finds itself at the present time. I go so far as not to contradict the minister, but to say that I do not agree with him, and to declare that there are no circumstances which fully warrant this continued large expenditure under present conditions.

Contingencies, advertising, etc., $270,000.

Mr. ROCHE: There is a reduction of some $30,000 here below the Estimates last year.

Surveys, $776,300.

Mr. ROCHE: There is a reduction of $200,000 from the Estimate of last year.

Mr. OLIVER: Where are these surveys being made principally?

Mr. ROCHE: Surveys of base lines and initial meridians, three parties; sub-division surveys, sixteen parties; miscellaneous subdivision surveys in Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta, one party; sub-division surveys in the railway belt of British Columbia, five parties; inspection surveys, six inspectors and one party for general business; retracement surveys in Manitoba, Alberta and Saskatchewan, two parties; retracement surveys of old initial meridians and base lines, one party; miscellaneous surveys by travelling parties, four parties; stadia surveys of lakes in western provinces, said to have dried up, eleven parties; survey of the Alberta and British Columbia boundary (one-third share), two parties; Yukon surveys. That is practically the subdivision of the work for the ensuing year.

Mr. OLIVER: In regard to this survey Estimate, the minister did not say just in what part of the country these surveys were being made. I shall not press that point. I wish to point out that the men employed on these survey parties are of necessity of the identical quality of physique, age and other requirements that make for eligibility for military service, and I cannot think that the Government is well advised in pushing the surveys unless those surveys are urgently required at such a time when it must be done at such cost in the employment of men who, as I have said, by their age and physique, are the men who are most eligible for military service.

If we are looking for more men for military service, we might very well restrict our endeavours in the matter of pushing surveys, particularly at a time when there is no very great pressure of settlement in any direction. The need for men who are physically fit for military service is, of course, great, and the men who are employed on the surveys are necessarily of that class. They cannot be serving in France and working on the surveys at the same time, and, looking at it from that standpoint alone, I submit that the Government are not well advised in pressing the surveys as strongly as they are doing just now.

Mr. ROCHE: I myself was of the opinion that it was not necessary to push the surveys as rapidly as heretofore, taking into consideration the war conditions. For that reason, during the past year, we cut down our expenditure by $200,000, and this year we are estimating an expenditure of $200,000 less than last year. There is, therefore, really a very great reduction in the expenditure. As for those who go out on the survey parties, instructions have been issued that whenever possible, returned soldiers be employed for that purpose. The Surveyor-General has pointed out to me the difficulty in getting many returned soldiers who are able to endure the hardships of the survey, but they are to be given the preference in every instance.

Mr. OLIVER: Is the amount that is being asked for equal to the amount expended last year?

Mr. ROCHE: Practically what was expended last year.

Mr. SINCLAIR: I have observed a good deal of discussion in the press about the amount of land available for returned soldiers; it has been questioned whether we have very much land suitable for that purpose in the title of the country. I am quite sure that it would be interesting if the minister could tell us how many acres of arable land in the northwest and the prairie provinces are in the hands of the Government and available for homesteading.

Mr. ROCHE: Much the same information was asked for by the right hon. leader of the Opposition when I explained the soldiers' settlement plan as laid down in the resolution which I brought before the House, and I promised to have a map here when the resolution is again under consideration, showing the location of lands, within ten, fifteen or twenty miles of a railway, which are suitable for agriculture. A statement has been prepared as to the amount; I did not bring it with me to-night, but I promised to give the information as fully as possible when the soldiers' settlement resolution is again before the House.

Mr. OLIVER: What parties will be working in the Peace River country, and in what localities?

Mr. ROCHE: I do not think I have the detailed information here.

Mr. CARVELL: In a time like the present this seems to be an enormous sum of money to expend on the surveying of land which is not being settled. Putting it at $1,500 a man, which would probably be the maximum, you have 500 men employed in surveying western lands during the year. But during at least half the year these men could not be employed in surveying lands; therefore, you have an army of 1,000 men employed in surveying lands in western Canada during six months of the year. It seems a large amount of money to be expended—I was going to say thrown away, but I assume that these surveys may be of value some time in the future. To the man living in the eastern portion of Canada, however, the question arises why it should be necessary to expend this large amount of money when the public debt is mounting up by $200,000,000 or $300,000,000 a year. I think the minister ought to take us into his confidence and tell us how many parties and how many men are being employed and what they are doing.

Mr. ROCHE: The hon. gentleman is rather extravagant in his assertions when he says that we have 1,000 men employed on this work during the year. He must remember that surveyors are technical men, and draw a fairly good salary, particularly when out in the field.

[Mr. Sinclair.]

Mr. CARVELL: But many cooks and labouring men are employed in this work who do not draw big salaries.

Mr. ROCHE: The hon. gentleman knows, too, that aside from the expenditure for salaries, the outfit for work of this kind costs a considerable amount. There is a man in charge of each survey party; there is an assistant, and sometimes a second assistant. There are the chain men, so many in each party—ten men in one party, twelve in another. They have to go into the wilds; they have to be provisioned, and transportation costs something. We exercised due economy in cutting down the expenditure of last year by $200,000, and, as I have said, we mean to cut down the present appropriation by $200,000. It is essential that that part of the country particularly be opened up. The hon. member suggests that not many people are going in there. Well, I have word from the northern part of Alberta a short time ago that immigrants are going in there very rapidly from the United States. Some of them are going away disappointed because the lands are not at their disposal. I did not throw open any large blocks of land, pending the legislation with respect to land for returned soldiers, as it was my intention, wherever possible, to keep the lands that were close to transportation facilities for the returned soldiers. I have given information as to the number of parties that will be sent out, but I have not detailed information as to the parties going into any particular section.

Mr. CARVELL: How many parties did the minister say were going out?

Mr. ROCHE: In the surveys of base lines and initial meridians, two parties. Some of these parties consist of 8, 10 or 12 men. On subdivision surveys, 16 parties. A lot of our survey work is subdivision surveys, that is subdividing the townships. There are five parties working in subdivision surveys in the railway belt. As the work of those parties that are out has to be inspected, we have inspection surveys, and there are six inspectors and one party for general business. We have two parties engaged in retracement surveys in the wsetern provinces, and one party doing retracement survey work of the old initial meridians and base lines. There are four parties for miscellaneous surveys and eleven parties for stadia surveys of lakes reported to have dried up in the western provinces. Many of the homesteaders who, when they secured patents for their lands had a certain quantity of water on them, have since found that the water has dried up and they apply to have the dried-up area added to their homesteads. This requires surveying and we had eleven parties out for that purpose. Then there are two parties engaged in surveys of the British Columbia-Alberta boundary line. That is done by the Governments of the two provinces and the Dominion Government, each bearing their share of the expense. There are three parties engaged in levelling. There are other expenditures in connection with the manufacture and storage of iron posts and bench marks, printing and stationery, lithographers' and printers' wages, freight, express and telegraph charges, purchase of instruments and canvas boats for use on the surveys. Then there are surveys unprovided for which may be urgently required during the season, carpenter for surveys laboratory and special surveys division. In the Outside service there are thirty-four office employees at $1.50 per day. All these expenses amount, in the aggregate, to a very large sum. I do not know exactly the number of those who will be engaged in survey work; I simply know the number of parties that will be engaged, and as the number of men employed on each party differs considerably, I cannot give the details.

Mr. CARVELL: The minister has answered the whole criticism. I took down rough notes of what he said, and, as I figure it out, there are 24 or 25 parties who are going over old work, retracing old lines, seeing how much water has receded and how much land can be reclaimed. The minister has in his employ 250 men whose salaries probably amount to $250,000, which is an absolutely unnecessary expense. The people in the western provinces can do just as we do in the eastern portion of Canada, where if two neighbours cannot agree upon their lines, they fight the matter out in the courts; they look after their surveys and pay their own bills. It is just as I thought; the minister, in my judgment, has answered the whole criticism. Here we have half a million dollars being thrown away.

Mr. ROCHE: The hon. member is comparing the little province of New Brunswick with the western provinces where we own land.

Mr. CARVELL: The province of New Brunswick will compare favourably with the western provinces, and if the minister will follow out in the western country the conditions that prevail in New Brunswick, he will do a great deal better than he is doing. The province of New Brunswick has done well in many ways.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: That remark holds for the late Government.

Mr. OLIVER: Might I ask the minister to revert to the first item, "Salaries of the Outside Service?" I wish to ask a question in regard to a gentleman whose name was mentioned here last year or the year before. I refer to the gentleman who holds the position of superintendent of Jasper park and who, I believe, was appointed a colonel in the overseas forces. I wish to ask if this gentleman is still drawing salary as superintendent of Jasper park and if he is still drawing pay as a colonel in the overseas forces.

Mr. ROCHE: I can answer for my own department; I cannot answer for the Militia Department. He is not on the pay-list of the Interior Department.

Mr. OLIVER: Since what time has he ceased to be on that pay-list?

Mr. ROCHE: A short time—I do not know just how long after he returned from across the ocean, he was struck off the list. I may say that the request did not have to come from the head of the department. He asked to have his name struck off.

Mr. DOUGLAS: Is that policy being carried out generally throughout the department, of returned officers being struck off the Civil Service pay-list?

Mr. ROCHE: If they have a military duty assigned to them, of course they will be kept on the pay-list, but if they have nothing of a military character to do, they have either to return to their civil duties or be struck off the list.

Mr. DOUGLAS: In the case I had in view, the officer, on returning from the front, had military work assigned to him in the way of instructional work during the past summer; but under the present state of recruiting, there is not very much of that sort of work going on at the present time, and I understand he is still drawing military pay as well as civil pay. I understand the minister made it a policy that if a man returned from the front he ceased to draw civil pay even if he was on military duty in his country.

Mr. ROCHE: If we receive word from the military authorities that a man's services are absolutely necessary for the Militia Department, we keep him on the pay list. We do not strike him off the pay list if we get that assurance from the military authorities; we treat him just as we treat a soldier in Canada who has not yet proceeded overseas.

Mr. DOUGLAS: The difference in the case of the soldier in Canada is that he is just drawing from his department the difference in pay between his civil and his military pay, whereas, all soldiers enlisted prior to the 1st of November, 1915, are drawing full civil pay as well as full military pay. Does the minister intend to carry out that policy in its entirety of paying in full a soldier who enlisted prior to the 1st of November, 1915, whether he requires the money or not?

Mr. ROCHE: I am given to understand that we have very few in our department who are drawing full pay; that is, very few who have returned who had enlisted prior to the 1st of November, 1915, but in each instance we must get an assurance from the military authorities that a man's services are required by the Militia Department before we retain him on the pay roll of our department.

Mr. OLIVER: In regard to the late superintendent of Jasper park, has the minister not received an assurance from the military authorities that the gentleman is in military employment now? I understood the minister to say that he had no knowledge of the facts.

Mr. ROCHE: I did not say that I had no knowledge; I said that Colonel Maynard Rogers, who is the gentleman I presume the hon. member refers to—

Mr. OLIVER: Yes.

Mr. ROCHE: —was struck off the pay roll at his own request. My hon. friend would not ask me to keep that gentleman on the pay roll against his desire.

Mr. OLIVER: Certainly not. That much may be counted as merit to the Minister of the Interior, and if he would follow that policy from now on, he would acquire more merit in the eyes of the taxpayers of Canada. Has a permanent superintendent of Jasper park been appointed?

Mr. ROCHE: A temporary appointment has been made. The name of the appointee has escaped me for a moment, but the gentleman whom the hon. member has in mind has been appointed temporarily during Colonel Maynard Rogers' absence. Just the same as in the case of all civil servants who enlist, we make temporary appointments to fill their places. We are merely making a temporary appointment.

Mr. OLIVER: As Colonel Maynard Rogers' connection with the department has ceased, it would be in order, I presume, for a permanent appointment to be made.

Mr. ROCHE: Colonel Rogers is still in the employ of the Militia Department.

Mr. OLIVER: I understood the minister to say that when he was satisfied the Militia Department were continuing in their employ an official of the Interior Department who, under the terms of enlistment, was entitled to full salary in both departments, he was continued in both services. In the case of the superintendent of Jasper Park, although he is in military employ, his civil service has ceased. What I am asking is whether a permanent appointment is to be made. I am not asking out of mere curiosity. Summer is now approaching, and I am sure the minister will agree that it is desirable that whoever is to be permanently in charge of the park should be appointed now. If the gentleman who has been in charge for the last two years is to be appointed permanently it would be entirely in order for the appointment to be made now, and he would then be able to carry out his ideas in regard to the development of the park. I do not think it is well for the park, if the minister will pardon me for saying so, to be without a permanent superintendent.

Mr. ROCHE: When Colonel Rogers is released from his military duties he will be without a position, and it would appear to me to be a breach of faith to make a permanent appointment in his absence on military duty. He has been overseas and is now retained in the service of the Militia Department. He asked to be taken off the pay-list of the Interior Department, and when he went away we appointed Mr. Driscoll temporarily. He is from the hon. gentleman's own city of Edmonton, and has been acting superintendent of the park for two or three years. Mr. Driscoll quite understands that he was appointed temporarily. I am informed that he has done excellent work, and there is no uncertainty about following out development work as my hon. friend seems to think. Mr. Driscoll is an excellent officer, and is doing very good work, and I am sure he will continue to do so until the time comes when Colonel Rogers will be released from his military position and resume his duties.

Mr. OLIVER: I am very, very sorry that it is not possible to place the park under permanent administration. If it is the intention to reappoint Colonel Rogers I think he should resume his civil duties without delay. I do not wish to be understood as offering any objection to Colonel Rogers' resuming his duties as superintendent of Jasper Park, but I want to urge that there should not be the uncertainty that has prevailed in regard to the administration of the park during the last couple of years. It should be thoroughly understood who is to be permanently in charge, so that he may develop the park along his own lines. The present temporary superintendent is, I believe, entirely satisfactory, but he certainly is handicapped in not having the assurance of being able to carry out any policy he may undertake. I think, in fairness to the development of the park, the minister should decide who is to be permanently in charge, and get him established there now, so that he can proceed to develop the park along his own lines.

Protection of timber in Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta, the N.W.T., and the Railway Belt in B.C., tree culture in Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta, and inspection and management of forest reserves, $650,000.

Mr. OLIVER: I think this is another case where the minister might have made a saving. I will not press the matter further than to emphasize what I have already said, that I consider this and other items in the Estimates entirely extravagant under present conditions. Would the minister tell me what is included under "tree culture in Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta"? Is it tree culture on forest reserves or in connection with the Forestry Farm?

Mr. ROCHE: I have the following particulars:

Trees are supplied to farmers for planting on prairie farms in the provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta. The species distributed are mainly Manitoba maple, elm, ash, cottonwood, Russian poplar and willow. Some spruce, tamarack and pine have also been distributed. The reports of the inspectors show that these plantations have a high average of success. There are two nurseries for this purpose. One was established at Indian Head in 1903, and one at Sutherland in 1912. The increased demand from farmers for trees made necessary the increase of accomodation for furnishing the supply. The new nursery is now supplying trees for distribution, and this supply will be largely increased in the next few years as this nursery develops. The number of trees distributed in the last two seasons is as follows: 3,861,000 trees were distributed in 1915 to 3,459 applicants, and 4,460,000 trees were distributed in 1916 to 5,072 applicants. The total number of trees distributed to date is 37,539,105. The number now ready for distribution in the spring of 1917 is 8,881,500.

Hon. gentlemen will see that the demand for the trees is increasing very largely, and I am sure we are all pleased to see that, because trees are beneficial in more ways than one in that prairie country. The new nursery at Sutherland is doing excellent work.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Are these trees for use on private lands?

Mr. ROCHE: They are distributed gratis to the farmers all through the western provinces, on demand.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Will the minister do the same for the eastern provinces?

Mr. ROCHE: These are Dominion lands.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Not after they are homesteaded or purchased.

Mr. ROCHE: In the hon. gentleman's province the lands and timber are owned by the provincial government, and I presume the provincial governments do similar work to what we are doing for the West.

Mr. SINCLAIR: I think the minister should draw a distinction between land owned by the province and land owned by the individual. The arable lands will all be under private ownership very soon. Why should not trees be given free to the other provinces?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: These provinces are "treeless."

Mr. ROCHE: And probably the supply of trees would not be suitable to the other provinces.

Mr. TURRIFF: What does this branch of the work cost?

Mr. ROCHE: The amount estimated for this year is $58,000, and the amount for last year was $67,030.

Mr. OLIVER: What proportion of the balance of this vote is required for the administration of the forest reserves as compared with the proportion for the protection of timber not included in forest reserves?

Mr. ROCHE: For forest reserves we have an item of $299,000, and for fire-ranging $193,000. The total for forest reserve, fire-ranging, and the forest products laboratory is $650,000.

Mr. OLIVER: My information is that there is an entirely unreasonable proportion of expenditure on the so-called forest reserves as compared with that for the protection of timbers not included in forest reserves. The Government has been very liberal in including large areas in forest reserves. These areas are forested to a certain extent, of course, but in a country that is all forested it seems to be hardly necessary that areas should be specially reserved, especially when they are made a preserve rather for the maintenance of friends of the Government in the guise of protectors of public property than to serve any particularly useful purpose. The forest reserves, in my humble judgment, are unnecessarily large, and there is excessive expenditure in the so-called protective service within those reserves.

Mr. ROCHE: Of course, an area is first surveyed and temporarily set aside before being included in the forest reserve by legislation. The hon gentleman (Mr. Oliver) knows that there has been great destruction of timber in that country—as has been the case in the East also—by fire. Land that on inspection is ascertained to be not suitable for agriculture is included in the forest reserves and comes under the charge of the officials, part of whose duties is to protect the forest from fire. It would not be right to have homesteaders go upon land from which they could not make a living. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Oliver), as minister, had experience, as I have had, with so-called settlers who have no intention of living on the land after it is cleared, but who simply squat and, when the timber is gone, vacate the holding. Of course, there are some areas included in forest reserves that are timbered lightly or not at all, but these lands are suitable for reforestation and are not suitable for agriculture.

Mr. DOUGLAS: Who is in charge of the Cooking Lake forest reserve?

Mr. ROCHE: Mr. Bailey.

Mr. TURRIFF: How many officials are employed in connection with the Moose Mountain reserve? I was there two months ago and heard a good many complaints of the amount the officials were charging settlers for firewood.

Mr. ROCHE: The amount charged for firewood is fixed by regulation, and I do not think more is charged on the Moose Mountain reserve than on any other.

Mr. TURRIFF: I heard of a couple of cases in which men were charged $2.50 when they got their permits. I do not know whether this was for the permit alone, or whether it covered a certain amount of wood. How many officials are employed there?

Mr. ROCHE: Two permanaent and one temporary. Mr. White is in charge.

Mr. SINCLAIR: How many officials are employed in the forest reserves altogether?

Mr. ROCHE: The number employed in all reserves is 181.

Mr. TURRIFF: Does that include the forest rangers and timber inspectors?

Mr. ROCHE: Yes.

Mr. TURRIFF: The hon. gentleman has not told me how much he paid the men on Moose Mountain reserve?

Mr. ROCHE: The man in charge gets $100 a month, and the others $75 a month.

Mr. OLIVER: How many fire-rangers, inspectors and other protectors of timber are employed on the Swan Hills forest reserve, and how many on the Martin Mountain forest reserve?

Mr. ROCHE: These two are included in the reserve called the Lesser Slave lake reserve. There are two permanent and six temporaries.

Mr. TURRIFF: Would the minister say why the salaries for part of the outside service are put under the heading of "Salaries of the Outside Service $465,000 " and a lot more of the salaries put in the item we are now discussing under " Protection of Timber in Manitoba?" Why are they not altogether so that we would have some idea of what these salaries amount to?

Mr. ROCHE: The first item is for Dominion Lands, while the other is separate and has no connection with it.

Mr. TURRIFF: They are all under Dominion Lands.

Mr. ROCHE: They are sub-divided. The timber inspectors are included in the Dominion Lands vote but the forestry officials are not.

Mr. TURRIFF: I would suggest that it would be better to put them all together and then we would know what we are paying for salaries in connection with this branch.

Mr. SINCLAIR: There is a matter that the minister promised he would furnish information about some few days ago. When we were discussing some appointments made under section 21 of the Civil Service Act, by referring to the return which was laid on the Table of the House, it appeared that 82 civil servants were employed under the provisions of section 21 after competition and that 159 were employed under the provisions of that section by the present Administration without competition. In looking over the items I find that in the inside service, Department of the Interior, 15 civil servants have been employed by the present Administration after competitive examination and 11 without competitive examination. At the time this question was up and when the vote for the inside service of the Department of the Interior was being passed, I asked the minister if he would furnish the House with the names, post office addresses, ages, and present duties and salaries of those civil servants who were employed in his department under the provisions of that section, and he was good enough to say that when his estimates were before the House again he would furnish the information.

Mr. ROCHE: I understood that these questions were asked by way of a return. The hon. gentleman moved for a return?

Mr. SINCLAIR: No.

Mr. ROCHE: I think I have the information with pretty nearly all the detail that the hon. gentleman asked for. I have the names of quite a large number of those who have been appointed to the inside service under section 21. The statement is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Will the minister say why he resorted to the terms of section 21 in order to appoint men whose salaries were $1,000, $1,200 and $1,300 without competitive examination and why they were not appointed in the regular way under the Civil Service Act?

Mr. ROCHE: Some were above the age. As the hon. gentleman knows, section 14 of the Civil Service Act provides that a person to be appointed under the Act must be less than thirty-five years of age. If he is over thirty-five he cannot be appointed, but if he is a technical man the Civil Service Commission will issue a certificate in the case of a man who is over thirty-five. There is another provision of the Civil Service Act that a man should be in the country three years before appointment. Some of these men came from the old country. They were Edinburgh and Glasgow University men and they had not been in the country three years at the time of their appointment. That is the only way they could be appointed under section 21. All these are technical men although their salaries are not very large. They satisfied the Civil Service Commission that they were perfectly qualified and that was the only way in which they could be appointed to their respective positions.

Mr. TURRIFF: I should like to know from the minister the policy of the department. I am quite well aware that where an official joins the army he draws his civil salary and also his military salary in full if he enlisted prior to the 1st of November, 1915. I have no objection to make in the case of a man who goes to the front and fights for his country, but I would like to know if it is the policy of the department to continue paying these civil servants who joined the army prior to the 1st of November, 1915, where they are simply appointed to clerkships in Ottawa or in England and do not go near the front, who take no more risk than they did up in the civil service offices on the hill?

Mr. ROCHE: It is not the policy of this department to have men who joined prior to the 1st of November, 1915, but had not crossed the ocean, continue to receive their full salary. I do not think we have a single instance of that nature. We had one case of a man whose services were especially asked for by the Department of Militia. He was doing some particular work at Halifax, and we were asked to allow the Militia Department to retain him on their pay list. We have since ascertained that his services were not as essential as they had been, so, at our request, he has returned to his civil duties.

Mr. TURRIFF: That answer is quite satisfactory. Is the same rule followed by all the departments of Government? Perhaps the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster), who is leading the House, may be able to answer that question.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I am sorry to say I was talking with my friend when the subject matter was brought up. I think my hon. friend knows pretty well what is done.

Mr. ROCHE: I have heard that this was the policy generally. Whether there are any exceptions to it or not, I do not know, but I think the policy I have adopted in my department is the policy that is universal throughout the service. There may be some individual cases that I am not aware of.

Mr. OLIVER: The minister told the committee just a few minutes ago the superintendent of Jasper park was drawing his salary from the department, although his military duties were entirely confined to this side of the water; and the minister gave us to understand that he would have continued to draw his salary as superintendent of Jasper park, and would, in fact, be drawing it to-day, although his military services are entirely on this side of the water, if he had not himself requested to be taken off the pay list. Therefore in that instance the minister's policy was to pay the full salary when the duties were on this side of the water and did not involve service at the front.

Mr. ROCHE: The difference is that Colonel Maynard Rogers did go across the ocean; he did not remain in Canada. It was only after he returned to Canada that he was struck off the pay roll. He enlisted prior to November 1, 1915, and was in the enjoyment of his full salary. He went across the ocean and was paid full salary until after he came back, and he was still retained in the Militia Department; but he voluntarily came and asked to be stricken off the pay roll and we did not want to keep him on when he did not desire to be retained. We would not have kept him on the roll if we had not been especially informed by the Militia Department that his services were required.

Mr. OLIVER: That puts the thing differently. The minister gave us to understand a few minutes ago that Colonel Rogers was removed from the pay roll at his own request, and not as a matter of policy of the Interior Department.

Mr. ROCHE: I did not say the latter, I said at his own request.

Mr. OLIVER: The minister gave the committee to understand that had he not requested to be taken off the pay roll he would still have been on the pay roll. That was the impression conveyed to my mind, and I think to the House. As to his having crossed the ocean, while he did cross the ocean, I am not aware that he ever rendered any active military service; but, in any case, the point is that he is not rendering any active military service now, and that is the condition mentioned by my hon. friend from Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff).

Mr. TURRIFF: I think the minister put too limited an interpretation on my question. My question was with respect to civil servants who were working either on this side of the water or as clerks in the paymaster's and similar offices in England, the men who never went to the firing line, who took no more risk whether in England or in Canada than if they had remained in their offices on the hill. I shall not press for an answer to-night, but I should like to know if those men who enlisted prior to November 1, 1915, and have been employed in clerical positions in England or in Canada, are receiving two salaries. I think it is absurd that a man drawing a big, fat salary should serve in the Department of Militia or in England as a clerk and draw two large salaries at the expense of the people. I would like a clear, definite answer as to the policy of the Government in that matter.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Before November 1, 1915, the man who enlisted did so on the understanding that he should enjoy both salaries. Would my hon. friend say that because when he went overseas he was found to be more useful or necessary in the clerical part of the militia work, we should violate the condition upon which he enlisted? To the man who enlisted after the date mentioned, that condition not being part of the contract, so to speak, the double pay would not be given. The question rests a good deal upon whether or not the man enlisted upon the condition that he should get both salaries.

Mr. TURRIFF: When the man enlisted he was supposed to go to the front and fight for his country, but in hundreds of cases, through influence and political pull, men have secured appointments to clerical positions, say, in England, and have been there ever since the war started. Those who do that are not carrying out the agreement that was made, because they enlisted to go to the front and they have not done so. They are drawing two fat salaries, without taking any risk whatever, whereas the man who enlisted later, goes to the front and risks his life, gets only $1.10 a day.

Mr. ROCHE: In many cases we do not know what work these men are doing after they cross the ocean. We are not in a position to know who is and who is not doing clerical work in England. Besides, I believe that the policy over there is to appoint to such positions men who have been at the front and who have returned wounded or invalided, thus allowing men physically fit for military duty to go to the front. I agree with my hon. friend who is leading the House that we made an agreement with these men who enlisted prior to the date mentioned, and it would be rather a breach of contract were we now, simply because they were detained in London to perform certain work, to strike them off the list and not pay them according to the arrangement made.

Mr. TURRIEF: A man drawing $2,000 a year in Canada gets a commission, goes to the old country and through influence secures a position there, where he is absolutely safe from any danger except mere chance of a bomb falling from a Zeppelin. He draws $3,000 or $4,000 for work that can be done just as well by the man getting $1.10 a day. I ask the minister if he thinks that is fair.

Mr. ROCHE: I do not think that there are such cases; I have not heard of any.

Mr. TURRIFF: I have heard of a great many.

Mr. SINCLAIR: The question is, is he on active service? If I understand the militia rule, he enlisted for active service, and if he is employed as a clerk in an office in London, I do not think it can be said that he is on active service.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: He enlisted for overseas service.

Mr. SINCLAIR: The evidence that there are a great many men in that position is found in the statement of the ex-Minister of Militia, who tells us that he was able to run the London office with 30 employees, but that since the matter was taken out of his hands over 600 employees have been required, costing the country an enormous sum of money each year. I assume that most of those employees are soldiers of the kind mentioned—Canadian adventurers, who, professing to go to the front, found their way into the London office. If we can believe the statement made by the ex-Minister of Militia, this is a matter of great importance. The principle cannot be laid down that these men are employed on active service, when they are simply doing clerical work in a London office, and a man doing that kind of work is not, under the contract that was made with him, entitled to two salaries.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I had the idea, before I went to London, that our Records Office was costing us a very large amount of money, and I think I expressed that sentiment. When I was there I made it my business to go through those offices, and I do not care who states that the clerical work there can be done by 30, 40 or 50 men, I say that it is absolutely impossible. A complete record has to be kept of the men that we have at the front and in different parts of England, of their pay and of all other details; their transfer from one regiment or from one division to another—everything has to be taken cognizance of and becomes a matter of record. I went through room after room; I examined their books and saw their methods of doing things, and I came away with the impression that these men were busily engaged at a necessary work. The army must be looked upon as a whole. You must have good subsidiary officers and workers as well as good fighters. The man who enlists for overseas service enlists for whatever service the army officers and authorities consider that he is best fitted for. Men are brought back from the front because of their special ability to perform what we call clerical work, but what is so important and affects so vitally the well-being of the army that the very best men are required. I should be very sorry to have the impression going out that we are employing thousands of men over there where 30, 40 or 50 could do the work. I do not think that would be a right impression to go to the country. This much I do know: that of late the offices have been combed out over and over again in order that every man who can be spared from that absolutely necessary work may go to the front and take his part of the burden of active warfare, in his place those that have had their turn at the front and have had the casualties, are brought in to do the work. The impression that exists now that there are so many able bodied men who have never gone to the front, who do not want to go to the front and yet who are able enough to go to the front, but that are kept in London through favour or anything else—that impression is a wrong one.

Mr. SINCLAIR: The impression did not originate on this side; it originated with my right hon. friend's colleague who made the positive statement. Perhaps if my right hon. friend knows that that statement is not true he will tell us just how many men he has employed in the London office and how many of those men are soldiers who have volunteered for active service at the front. We do not know; we are going only on the statement made by the ex-minister, a gentleman who had the information and who ought to know. If there is any man in Canada who ought to know these facts, it is the ex-Minister of Militia.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I have not seen that statement.

Mr. SINCLAIR: If the minister will look at the ex-minister's statement, he will find that the ex-minister had made that statement.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I would not be inclined to think that he had made that statement.

Mr. SINCLAIR: I have no doubt he made the statement that, in an office where there were formerly thirty men—and he gave the name of the man in charge of the office—now, under the influence of the Minister of Finance and the management of the Minister of Militia Overseas, the number had grown to over 600, costing the country $6,000,000 a year. That is not my statement, it is the statement of the ex-minister. I do not know whether it is true or not.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I have not seen that statement.

Mr. SINCLAIR: It has also been stated publicly that no less than 45,000 or 50,000 men who have gone overseas, were not able to go to the front because they were medically unfit. If any of those men who were medically unfit have found their way into the offices in London, I think their doing so would disqualify them from getting the double pay. It is for the Government to clear up the statements of the ex-Minister of Militia and not we on this side of the House.

Mr. OLIVER: The question is not how much work is required in the offices in London; it is whether the men whom we are paying here in this Dominion of Canada for the services they are rendering us, are drawing pay for other services that they are rendering and that are not the services we understood or expected they would render when we made the bargain with them. There is no question at all that this Government did not make a bargain with its officials that it would give them double pay for the purpose of enabling them to do clerical work in London. There is no doubt but what my hon. friend from Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff) has said is the absolute root and basis of the understanding that these men were going forward to risk their lives for the welfare of their country, and that it was because of that consideration alone that they were given this extra remuneration. If for any reason, whether on account of their own fault or that of anyone else, they have not fulfilled that condition, this country has no right to give them double pay, and when we are giving them double pay, we are doing an injustice to ourselves and to those who are honestly trying to serve their country. It may be true that these men are good men in the clerical offices in London, but there are others just as good men who are able to do clerical work; and if they are able to do clerical work and not able to go to the front, then their place is here and not in London, that is, if we have need of their services in our departments. They should be either here or at the front if they are drawing double pay. If they are not able to go to the front, then they should be drawing only single pay and they should be here if they are going to draw pay from us for the services they are rendering us. We cannot undertake to provide for the exigencies of our Civil Service here and also for the exigencies of a Civil Service over in England. The latter is a matter that can be attended to by itself. Our business here is to see that the work of the Civil Service is attended to and to pay for that civil service, and if we have made extra bargains with some of our civil servants in regard to military services, when they fulfill the necessary conditions, they are entitled to the extra consideration we promise them, but if they do not fulfill those conditions, they are not entitled to that extra consideration. I for one call upon this Government to take measures to see that only those men who fulfill the condition upon which they were promised that extra pay, receive that extra pay, and to see that those who do not fulfill that condition do not get that extra pay. I have already mentioned here to-day the case of a gentleman drawing $2,400 a year as superintendent of Jasper Park, who takes a position as colonel in the overseas forces, goes to England and draws pay as an overseas colonel, but who never does a day's duty at the front, never renders any valuable service to the military authorities, and who comes back to Canada and still draws that double pay.

Mr. ROCHE: Is the hon. gentleman quite right in stating that he did not render valuable military services?

Mr. OLIVER: I am quite right.

Mr. ROCHE: What work was he doing?

Mr. OLIVER: I do not care to bring it up here in the House, but he was like a great many more so-called military men, who went over to England, who had neither right nor reason to be called military men and who did not render good service. This man comes back to Canada and still draws double pay although on the evidence he was not considered fit for military service at the front. If such a prominent case can occur, we can easily believe that hundreds of such cases have occurred, and we call upon the Government not to defend that condition, but to take measures to see that that condition does not exist because it is absolutely a breach of faith with the people of this country.

Mr. ROCHE: It is only right that I should make this statement in regard to the gentleman whom the hon. member is criticising. I remember, after the hon. gentleman discussed this question last session, having taken the matter up with the military authorities, and the information received was that Colonel Maynard Rogers had rendered very valuable military service in England in that, as I understand, he was engaged in training troops in some of the large camps. The report from the Militia Department was that he had rendered splendid service. It is only right that I should make that statement in justice to the gentleman.

Mr. CARVELL: The minister would not expect any other kind of report from the Militia Department.

Mr. ROCHE: In regard to other men going overseas and doing clerical work, I understand that the paymaster of a battalion does not go to the firing line, yet we pay him double pay if he goes over with his battalion. Does the hon. gentleman think that because a paymaster is doing some clerical work or looking after the financing of his battalion and not engaged in the firing line, he should not be paid his full civil pay if he enlisted prior to the first of November, 1915?

Mr. OLIVER: Is the paymaster of a battalion in France resident in England?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Why does the hon. member differentiate between England and France if soldiers are not engaged in the firing line?

Mr. OLIVER: A paymaster is with his battalion; it does not matter whether he is at the firing line or not; he is on active service. I am very sorry to find that the leader of the House and the Minister of the Interior take the attitude to-day of defending a condition that is absolutely indefensible, defending an absolute breach of faith with the people of this country. I am very much surprised that they should take that attitude.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: My hon. friend need not expend any of his sorrow on me with reference to that. The position I take is simply this: In respect to those men who under certain conditions enlisted to go overseas for such service as was required and who have fulfilled these conditions, there is an obligation upon us to fill our part of the bargain. The difference between my hon. friend and myself is, I suppose, this: he says that the condition of their enlistment before that date was that they should go to the firing line.

Mr. OLIVER: No, pardon me.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: That they should go into active service, then.

Mr. OLIVER: Our undertaking to continue their pay was on the understanding they were risking their lives in our behalf.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I do not know that they entered into a contract to risk their lives. They entered into a contract in this way: they enlisted for active service overseas, whatever that service might be. I do not think there was anything in the contract that they were to risk their lives in going over. Whatever was the duty which was assigned to the man who enlisted for overseas, that was the duty he was to perform, and if he performed that duty under the conditions laid down before November 15, he was to receive his full pay. If we were to set out anew and the question was brought up as to whether men should receive double pay who were simply doing clerical work in London, I would not hesitate for a single moment to say that it was the man who went right into the trenches that should get the double pay.

To pay expenses connected with Water Power investigation and reports in Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta and the Railway Belt in B.C., $159,000.

Mr. OLIVER: This is a time when there is certainly very little likelihood of important investments in the development of water power. It seems to me this is another item in the Estimates of the Interior Department that might very well be eliminated or very greatly reduced under present conditions. If we are pursuing a policy of saving with a view to meeting our enormous war obligations, I think it is only right that I should take the responsibility of pointing out all those instances where it seems to me the Government have fallen very far short of their full duty.

For surveys and works under the Irrigation Act, etc., including $400 for P. Marchand as auditor of disbursements made by companies acquiring lands under the Irrigation System, $174,000.

Mr. OLIVER: What is the nature of this expenditure?

Mr. ROCHE: The following are the particulars:

For the fiscal year 1916-1917, the estimate was reduced by $68,350, or 25 per cent, while the estimate now submitted shows a further reduction of $26,000 or 13 per cent; the present estimate is thus 35 per cent less than the appropriation for the year 1915-16. The sum asked for will provide for carrying on only that work that is considered absolutely essential, including:

1. The maintenance of the permanent office and field staff at Ottawa and Calgary. The reduction in appropriation will necessitate the discharge of several present members of the staff and the rearrangement of the work so as to provide for its efficient conduct with fewer men.

2. The inspection of existing and proposed irrigation and water supply projects. Such inspections are required by law to determine the feasibility of proposed projects and to ascertain whether or not those who have been authorized to construct works are proceeding with due diligence and whether licenses are utilizing, or are in a position to utilize, the water to which they are entitled by license. A considerable saving will be effected by combining in certain districts the duties of stream measurements and irrigation inspections. This is an innovation, but it is believed that these duties can be combined without loss of efficiency.

3. The continuation of hydrometric or stream measurement work. The determination of the quantity of water available in the streams of the prairie provinces is the basis of all irrigation and water supply development and is absolutely essential to the proper administration of the Irrigation Act. Stream measurements must be carried on continuously for a long period of years in order to be of real value, and any interruption seriously affects the value of the records. This work has been carried on systematically since 1908 and has been gradually extended so as to cover practically all streams in the southern part of the Provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan and the principal streams in the north. Regular measurements are made of the flow of all streams during the summer, or open water period, and after the winter freeze-up the districts are re-arranged and the flow of the principal streams is measured under ice conditions throughout the winter months. The department has frequently been urged to extend the scope of this work and it is believed that the public interest warrants its continuation and expense in spite of the necessity for the strictest economy. The plans for the coming year do not provide for any expansion of the work, but on the contrary some stations are to be temporarily abandoned and the work will be so arranged as to effect a considerable saving without materially affecting the efficiency of the service.

4. The continuation of experimental work to determine the proper "duty of water," and to demonstrate the benefits of irrigated farming. This experimental work has not yet been carried on for a long enough period to yield definite or reliable data upon which to base any revision of the "duty of water." The existing duty is acknowledged to be too low and should be raised, but it is believed to be unwise to attempt revision without reliable data obtained under Canadian conditions of soil and climate. For this reason our experimental work should be continued.

5. The continuation of the work of soil analysis in order to determine the suitability of certain soils for irrigated agriculture. This work has now been carried on for several years in collaboration with the Dominion chemist of the Department of Agriculture. It was begun, primarily for the purpose of excluding from irrigation projects areas so strongly impregnated with alkali as to render them unfit for cultivation, but it has been found necessary to extend the scope of the work to include a systematic study of the changes in soils due to the continued practice of irrigation, so as to determine what crops may be most profitably grown and how certain soils may be treated so as to preserve their fertility and prevent their becoming waterlogged and sour. In general, it may be said that no new work is being undertaken. The scope of permanent work is being somewhat restricted and so arranged as to effect a considerable saving. Very few salary increases have been provided for, and these only in exceptionally deserving cases (six in all). No general salary increases have been granted since the outbreak of the war.

[Mr. Roche.]

Mr. OLIVER: Are any of the private schemes mentioned in the memorandum under construction at the present time?

Mr. ROCHE: I have not that information, but I could get it for the next sitting.

Mr. OLIVER: As regards private applications for the use of water and the establishment of irrigation systems, I quite agree that the expenditure is necessary, whatever it may be, but a great deal of the work mentioned in the memorandum is something that I think could be postponed for a time at any rate. That is something that can be postponed for a time at any rate. I wish to know what is the really necessary work of development in that country. I fancy it could be paid for with a small proportion of the vote.

Mr. ROCHE: We have a trained staff, and it would not do to disband that staff. We must keep them at work. Last year the hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Buchanan) strongly urged us, notwithstanding our declaration for economy, to extend this work considerably in connection with some projects for irrigation in his district.

Mr. OLIVER: I have nothing to say against expenditure for actual irrigation work, but I wanted to know what amount was required for that.

Mr. TURRIFF: How much land was granted last year under the Irrigation Act?

Mr. ROCHE: I think a return was asked for on that subject, and that it was brought down. But I do not recollect the figures.

Canadian National Parks, $300,000.

Mr. ROCHE: This is a reduction of $49,670 from last year.

Mr. OLIVER: About what amount is appropriated for Jasper Park?

Mr. ROCHE: Fifty-four thousand dollars.

Mr. OLIVER: What are the items of expenditure?

Mr. ROCHE: Fire and game protection, fire-fighting, maintenance of roads and trails, new buildings—

Mr. OLIVER: What new buildings?

Mr. ROCHE: This is not a large item, it is for stables.

Mr. DOUGLAS: Are there any revenues from the park?

Mr. ROCHE: Of course the principal return from our national parks is the tourist trade. I quoted figures last year showing, as I recollect them, that about 100,000 tourists had visited the national parks last year. This traffic, of course, brings in a great deal of money. Our parks are very attractive and advertise Canada everywhere. They are becoming very well known in the United States. Since the outbreak of the war in Europe many American tourists are coming to Canada.

Mr. OLIVER: Has the department considered what effect it will have on the tourist traffic to have the rails of the Grand Trunk Pacific to Jasper Park taken up and shipped away?

Mr. ROCHE: I do not know from what portion of the road the rails have been taken. I understand that the Canadian Northern and the Grand Trunk Pacific run side by side for miles, two lines where one would serve all purposes.

Mr. OLIVER: The beautiful scenery of Jasper Park, of course, is a great attraction. But tourists do not live on scenery; they have to eat and they have to sleep. In order to have a successful tourist traffic there must be accommodation for the tourists, and up to the present time the hotel accommodation for tourists in Jasper Park has been very limited and inadequate. I am given to understand that one reason has been that the departmental authorities set a standard of hotel buildings that the business does not warrant. I quite agree that proper buildings should be erected in the park, but until business is established judgment must be exercised in imposing restrictions. You can only get such investment of money in buildings as the business is likely to give a return upon, and to impose too onerous restrictions is simply to prevent any accommodation being provided, and so to prevent the park from being used for the purpose for which it was intended.

Mr. ROCHE: The hon. gentleman, I suppose, refers to a minimum value for the hotel buildings. I may say that no minimum value is fixed for hotel buildings in Jasper Park, but there is a minimum for private residences.

Mr. OLIVER: I am afraid the hon. minister is under the wrong impression. In any case, there is urgent need for tourist accommodation in Jasper Park. A moderate measure of accommodation would be a great advantage, but that moderate measure of accommodation cannot be secured if undue requirement is made in the matter of expenditure, and so the usefulness of the park is to a great extent lost.

Mr. TURRIFF: What is being done with the surplus of buffalo being raised in Buffalo Park?

Mr. ROCHE: There has been no disposition of the surplus as yet.

Mr. TURRIFF: Last year I asked the minister if he was going to fulfill the undertaking that was given some years ago about sending some buffalo down to the Moose Mountain reserve. The Government bought the land and paid for it and the reason given last year why the buffalo had not been removed to it was that some one had reported that the land was not suitable. There is no use of any person reporting that to me because I know all about the land; it is perfectly suitable. The Government bought and paid for the land some years ago, they advertised for tenders for putting up the fence, but it was never gone on with and the land is lying there idle. The department have more buffalo in Northern Alberta than they need and it would be a good work to send 20 or 30 of them down to the park. There are no buffalo in southern Saskatchewan at all. Formerly that was the home of the buffalo. When, on occasion, the minister is asked to do anything of this kind he pleads economy. I notice that he has reduced his estimates by quite a sum this year and I give him a considerable amount of credit for it although I think the reduction could have been carried very much further on several items. It seems to me that to ask for a vote of $2,879,000 under this head is not showing a great deal of economy. The putting of some buffalo in the park is a matter of a very few miles of fence, and it would not cost much money. The minister has three men now working on the reserve as forest inspectors and fire rangers where formerly one was considered sufficient when there was a great deal more timber than there is at the present time. It would not entail any additional cost to the Government to keep some buffalo there. I would like to ask the minister if he has forgotten his promise that he would take this into his very favourable consideration.

Mr. ROCHE: The reason I have not actively taken it into my consideration, that is acted upon it practically, is simply the desire to economize. The hon. gentleman has given me credit for having reduced my estimates. So I have. I have reduced them very materially on nearly every item. I have reduced my estimates for this coming year by not far from $1,000,000, or over $900,000. It would cost considerable money to move a portion of the herd of buffalo down to where the hon. gentleman wants them. It would involve the building of a fence, the employment of the necessary men and a superintendent and the providing of winter food, etc.

Mr. TURRIFF: My hon. friend has men there now with practically nothing to do.

Mr. ROCHE: There is nobody on salary.

Mr. TURRIFF: The minister told us half an hour ago when we were talking about timber reserves that he had three men there. They could look after the buffalo. Their principal job in connection with the timber is to draw their pay. While my hon. friend has done fairly well in cutting down his estimates by $400,000, he could very well have cut off an extra $800,000 and left his expenditure at $2,000,000 which would be ample in these times when we are supposed to have economy in every place but the Government departments.

Mr. ROCHE: But you are asking me to increase the expenditure.

Mr. DOUGLAS: How many buffalo are there in Wainwright park and also in Island Lake part?

Mr. ROCHE: Nearly 2,400 in Buffalo park.

Mr. DOUGLAS: How many in the other one?

Mr. ROCHE: In Moose park 17. These are the figures: Rocky Mountain park, 13; Buffalo park 2,399; Elk Island park, 134, making a total of 2,546.

Mr. DOUGLAS: How many other animals are there?

Mr. ROCHE: Moose, 73; elk, 153, and mule deer, 180.

Mr. TURRIFF: The Moose Mountain reserve, which is in southern Saskatchewan, is the only place for some hundreds of miles in two or three directions where there is any considerable body of timber or water. It is a great resort for people in the southern portion of Saskatchewan. I have been at the reserve on a Sunday and I have seen 200 automobiles there in which people have come for a distance of 50, 75 and 100 miles to spend the day. I would be satisfied if my hon. friend would fence what was necessary to take care of ten or fifteen buffalo. I do not want my hon. friend to do much but surely he could spare ten head of buffalo out of the 2,000 he has. It would not cost very much.

Engraving, lithographing, printing and preparation of maps, plans and kindred publications of the Dominion, including necessary materials for same, $66,100.

Mr. ROCHE: There is a reduction of $10,050.

Mr. OLIVER: Does this lithographing include the cost of making homestead maps?

Mr. ROCHE: Yes.

Mr. OLIVER: How soon may the edition of the homestead maps for this year be expected to be available and which section is likely to be out first?

Mr. ROCHE: The edition is in course of preparation but I cannot exactly tell the date at which it will be available for distribution. It will be expedited as much as possible.

Mr. OLIVER: I have an inquiry from the Alberta Association of Municipalities in regard to taxation on lands held in reservation for the Hudson Bay Company. The association protests against this reservation of lands to belong to the Hudson Bay Company inasmuch as that reservation prevents them levying taxation on those lands. I have addressed the resolution of the association to the minister, but possibly he will be able to make a statement to the House in regard to the situation as to this reservation of the Hudson Bay lands and their freedom from taxation at the present time.

Mr. ROCHE: The hon. gentleman wrote me and I am having the information prepared in the department and will send it to the hon. member in a day or two. I understand that there is a considerable reservation from which the Hudson Bay Company is to select land. There have been a number of their lands in some of our forest reserves and we have been getting them to exchange those lands for other lands, and have placed a certain reservation on the lands from which they are to make selection. There has been a little hitch in this respect: In the past it has been their privilege to go and make their selection of other Dominion lands from reservations irrespective of what their value might be. The members of the Council were of the opinion that there ought to be a little better investigation into the nature of those lands and their value before having any exchange made and they suggested that we should take it up with the Hudson Bay Company to see if we could not get them to accept lands of a similar value. In the past it has been lands of similar area, but we might be receiving in exchange lands much inferior to those that they would select. For that reason we have taken the matter up recently with the Hudson Bay Company to see if they would not accept lands of similar value. The Hudson Bay Company are not anxious to do that. In the first place, they say it would be more expensive, having to value the lands; they would have to put on a valuator and so would we. They think that, inasmuch as the exchange is being made at our soliciation, they ought to be free to select any available Dominion lands irrespective of value. The matter is being taken up now and will be dealt with as expeditiously as possible.

Mr. OLIVER: From the same source there is a resolution in reference to the accumulation of taxes against pre-emptions or homesteads which have reverted to the Crown. As I remember the purport of the resolution, it asks that where local taxes have accrued against a pre-emption or homestead that has finally reverted to the Crown, those taxes be held as a lien against that land, to be met by the subsequent entrant. That is, in effect they ask that the local taxes be put in the same position as improvements made by the original entrant who forfeits his homestead.

Mr. ROCHE: That might result in leaving a lot of land on our hands.

Mr. OLIVER: The suggestion has been passed on by me to the minister, and I have asked him if he could make a statement upon it.

Mr. ROCHE: I have not given that point much consideration. I can see certain difficulties in connection with it, but I will give it consideration.

Progress reported.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: According to the arrangement we made last night it will be in order for you, Mr. Speaker, to give the House a recess until twelve o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: I suspend the sitting of this House until twelve o'clock to-morrow.

The sitting of the House was accordingly suspended at 10.25 p.m. Friday, until twelve o'clock to-morrow, Saturday, when Mr. Viviani, chief of the French War Mission to the United States, will be tendered a reception by the Parliament of Canada.

Saturday, May 12, 1917.

The sitting of the House of Friday, May 11, was resumed at twelve o'clock to-day, the Deputy Speaker, Mr. J. H. Rainville, in the Chair.

THE FRENCH WAR MISSION TO THE UNITED STATES.

SPECIAL SITTING OF THE HOUSE ADDRESSED BY M. VIVIANI.

M. Viviani, Chief of the Mission from France to the Government of the United States, and Minister of Justice in the French Government, entered the House at 12.15 o'clock, and was escorted to a seat of honour beside Mr. Speaker's chair by the Right Hon. Sir George Foster, M.P., Acting Prime Minister of Canada. A reception was tendered to him by the Parliament of Canada.

M. Viviani was addressed by the Deputy Speaker (Mr. J. H. Rainville), first in English and then in French, the Senators and Members of the House of Commons standing during the address.

The DEPUTY SPEAKER (Mr. J. H. Rainville) (Speaking in English):

Monsieur Viviani: I am proud to be in the position as Deputy Speaker of this House to express the welcome of the people of Canada to you on this happy occasion. We all appreciate the fact that you have not missed the opportunity afforded by your important mission in America of visiting Canada, now a great democracy, thanks to the genius of Great Britain, and upon which a deep imprint has been left by the France of old days.

Allow me, in the absence of His Honour the Speaker of the House of Commons, who deeply regrets his inability to be present, to thank you and to say that your presence in our midst stimulates our desire to help in the war, whilst it also carries with it a lesson of the highest significance. We cannot forget that love of freedom and the desire to promote all generous causes have ever been among the basic principles upon which your country has built its civilization. There are no people in the world who more than those of France love truth, justice, equality, and have more strenuously fought for their triumph.

Your arrival in Ottawa has assumed the importance of a public festival. You will find here nine provinces federally united under the same flag, having three oceans for their boundaries and enjoying complete liberty under the ægis of the British Crown and under the political institutions which have been established by the British constitution.

The admirable verse of your poet Henri de Bornier. "Every man has two countries his own and France," seems peculiarly to apply to us now that our sons have blended their blood in the struggles and successes of bitter warfare. Our eyes are turning more and more towards your country, where thousands of Canadian volunteers have made the supreme sacrifice on the altar of liberty and fraternity. One of our youngest colleagues, Colonel Baker, member for Brome, has fallen on the field of honour. Another, Dr. Béland, who was formerly a minister of the Crown, is now lingering in a German prison; twelve others are now at the front; the sons of about fifty senators and members have enlisted, and some of them will never return.

It is a long martyrdom that France is now suffering, but her energy, pertinacity and heroism will bring victory to her flag in this brutal war which has been cruelly thrust upon her. In the darkest days, your glorious nation has ever held the proud position which the genius and intellect of her sons have secured for her in the world's civilization. Their portion of the common sacrifice is indeed very large, but we hope and know that it will result in a victory which shall not only be glorious but permanent.

You will in a few days leave the American continent and return to your partly devastated France, where Canadians of different origins are now fighting shoulder to shoulder with your fellow citizens. Kindly convey to France the testimony of the admiration and sympathy which this war has inspired in our hearts for her noble ideals; tell her that you have seen on this Canadian soil a young nation which has stayed its material development for the purpose of assisting the world to vanquish that militarism which has already produced terrible results in Europe and has so seriously threatened the freedom of mankind.

We welcome you most cordially among us and wish you personally happiness and prosperity, trusting that your visit to Canada may be one of the pleasant memories of your mission.

In this welcome I feel confident that I express the united sentiment of all the people of Canada.

(Translation into English.)

Mr. VIVIANI: As has been said by your Speaker, Mr. Rainville, in his eloquent address, we could not possibly have passed so close to your country without having an ardent wish to visit it and to pay our respects to its citizens, with whose history our own is so intimately connected.

Hardly had we reached Canada than we, the members of the French delegation, were the object of the most enthusiastic welcome. And as a crowning success, gentlemen, you were so kind as to confer on my fellow-citizens and myself the supreme honour of a reception within the precincts of this House, and there could be no greater boon, no higher honour, no greater joy, than this provisional adoption into your community.

You may rest assured that our fellow-citizens in far away France, when they are apprised to-morrow or the day after, of the honour which has been conferred upon us, will have towards you a high feeling of gratitude.

You have just requested us, Mr. Speaker, not to forget the reception now tendered to us, and through us, to France; allow me, Sir, to thank you. That debt of gratitude which we owe to your great country, and which the great historical events in which we have participated in common, can only have the effect of increasing—that debt impressed us particularly on that day when we saw passing through the streets of Paris your admirable Canadian soldiers proudly bearing on their helmets the Maple Leaf. (Cheering). At that tragic hour we realized that your motto of former days—"I remember"—was no vain formula, no mere catchword.

Yes, you have remembered, and indeed it is something that strikes one with admiration to witness how this feeling of gratitude, as a rule a personal feeling lying in the depths of the human heart and conscience, diffuses itself throughout democracies and becomes a collective feeling which makes for the greatness of the nation as a whole. I remember, and we have proof that you have also remembered. First of all, your generosity towards France is unfathomable. Of course, I could not but omit important facts and be perhaps unfair were I to attempt an enumeration of your generous deeds, and of all that you have done for France: field hospitals without number; the hospital at St. Cloud, in which you have reserved 1,300 beds for French patients, and other hospitals everywhere established, with a staff of Canadian nurses and medical superintendents.

I need not point especially to the supreme sacrifice, to which you have just given a pious thought in recalling that some members of this House have fallen at the front in this holy cause; that some are held prisoners in Germany, that you gentlemen of the Parliament of Canada have given fifty of your sons who, without hesitation have gone over to resist in the name of truth and justice the most formidable avalanche which barbarity has ever let loose on the civilized world. (Applause.)

Yes, Sir, your Canadians have fought along with English and French troops, without paying any heed to racial differences. Under the flags of all the Allies they have all shown a similar courage. It must not be forgotten that in the month of February of 1915, at Ypres, in the north of France, near the Belgian frontier, in a country devastated by floods, after the terrific assault of the German soldiers by means of asphyxiating gases—Germany, the country that has caused science to swerve from its true ends, and, instead of pouring its benefits upon mankind, has visited humanity with manifold evils and crimes—that same Germany has had to meet your Canadian soldiers. On that terrific day, your sons, rising in their might, saved the situation. (Cheering.)

And throughout many battles, throughout numerous and recent victories, the soldiers of Canada stood up heroically against the foe. Even at this moment, we have before our eyes your boys, so alert, so athletic, so brave, the first to storm, victoriously carrying their flag to that ridge of Vimy which was reputed to be impregnable. (Cheering.)

Hail, to all these soldiers; let us bow our heads reverently before those who fight, those who suffer and those who have laid down their lives for their country. They had a clear perception of what their action meant; when they left this country they were well aware that it was not only Great Britain that they were called upon to defend, that it was not only France that they were going to protect against the attacks of invaders;—their clear vision upturned towards Heaven, detected the higher object; they were well aware that it was the sacred cause of humanity, of democracy, and of justice that they were defending. (Cheering.)

Still labouring under the impression left by such glorious and recent events, we have come here to pay you a visit. Your enthusiastic welcome only serves to increase the bitterness of my regrets, as I reflect on its inevitable brevity; but I am confident that you will be at one with me when I state that depth of feeling should not be measured by the length of a visit, but rather by the persistence of the feelings which are thereby instilled in the heart and in the mind. Such assurances of our feelings which I bring to you, I would much have liked, after visiting your beautiful Capital, to carry to other cities; it would have afforded me great pleasure to have visited Toronto, Quebec, Montreal, but our time is limited, and I beg that you may excuse the shortness of our stay, thinking only of the sincerity of the feelings expressed in our message to you.

It would have been a great satisfaction to me to travel at leisure over this admirable country, thinking and dreaming over past events in your history which, at many points, is interlocked with our own national history.

In coming to this country I desire to pay a tribute to Great Britain, that land of freedom, whose sons, wherever they go, bring with them emancipation and liberty; under every sky her mission is not to reduce men to slavery, but to awaken consciences and arouse determinations. I should have assured Great Britain, our noble ally, of our gratitude for having rallied to a man to the rescue of France in this, her supreme hour, because forsooth British statesmen had been parties to a treaty guaranteeing Belgian neutrality; because England's pledge was not to be denied; because a nation's honour has not two codes, nor a double morality, and because every country should take up arms and fight with all its might to redeem her promise.

I desire also, to recall the memory of our ancestors, those Frenchmen who came to this country in olden times and who seem to have brought to this soil all the elegance of manners and the beauty of France and Normandie. I am happy to note in their scions the ancient and strong qualities which are the reputed and proud characteristics of our race. To them I owe my thanks for having maintained in all its purity and perfection that noble French, which language to-day resounds throughout the universe, which you, Mr. Speaker, speak so admirably, and which you know in its absolute purity, partaking as it does of the limpidity of a stream and the resistance of a metal. (Applause).

It would have been a pleasure to me had I time to note on the bronzed faces of your country people the familiar traits of their brothers, our French peasants; and bow acknowledgment to the virtues which they share in common; thrift, assiduity to the daily task, steadfastness, and everything which contributes to the strength, the valour, and the fame of a nation.

My time is limited, and I must beg your pardon for abbreviating my remarks. However, I would not be doing justice to the utterances which fell a moment ago from the lips of your Speaker if, at this very moment, and from this time, from this high situation you have assigned to me, though a stranger among you, I did not, following in the footsteps of the speaker who preceded me, attempt through time and space to solve the serious problems brought on us by the war, including the very carrying out of that war.

In the first place, what was the origin of that war? Who is responsible for having started it? You mentioned it in your speech, Mr. Speaker, that bloody war was let loose on us by the whim of an absolute ruler, a ruler whose will is the only law, who governs heedless of parliament or ministerial responsibilities. It was let loose by the pride and madness of a whole people. It was let loose to destroy the free democracies and peace-loving peoples of the world.

Who among the peoples of the earth were more attached to universal peace than Great Britain and France? France had been vanquished in 1871—and it is no longer an humiliation to us to recall that defeat, since in the meantime we have retrieved ourselves and find ourselves once more in a position to face our enemies. (Prolonged applause). Such was our liking for peace that while with tearful eyes we looked over the war-ridden boundary, while we peered over the border at our provinces of Alsace and Lorraine, and while we carried in our breast a bleeding wound which could not be healed, yet so as not to trouble the world's peace, though not forgetful of the past, we kept still. Such was our attitude.

Then, as regards Great Britain, which German slanders charged with having brought on the war, she had not even thought of establishing military conscription; she had not provided a fighting machine, lacking which war becomes impossible; she was thinking of universal peace only, and of providing work for and insuring the freedom of nations.

Both these nations were attacked, France, Great Britain, and also Russia. It was a challenge sent out to the whole civilized world, and then it was a question, not as to whether we were going to fight for the acquisition of territory, not as to whether we should recover sections of provinces, but as to whether free men would be allowed to enjoy the warmth and light of liberty. (Applause).

Such is the great struggle that is going on between an arrogant autocracy, which already we have struck down on the battlefield; an autocracy, bent on ruling over the world, and democracy, whose sole aim is to regenerate it. Such is the great struggle between absolute rulers, who consider as mere possessions the peoples over whom they hold sway, who aim at enslaving men's bodies, and democracy, whose object is to uplift the mind, the conscience and the soul.

And notice what wonderful changes have taken place in Great Britain and France. Some time previous to the war those two nations had come closer to one another and had concluded, many years ago, the entente cordiale. This reference to the entente cordiale concluded between France and Great Britain reminds me necessarily of your former governor, Lord Lansdowne, whom I had the honour to meet in London some years ago, one of the keenest and most refined minds in Great Britain, and who, no doubt, because he had long lived among you and because he had come to know France through knowing Canada, came back to Great Britain with a desire to establish l'entente cordiale and bring the two countries closer together.

Here I am bound to pay my respects to the memory of Edward VII who was the enthusiastic medium of bringing together those two great democratic and free nations, because his clear insight into conditions generally had satisfied him that such a result was possible and in order. Neither can I proceed any further without paying homage to his successor on the throne who with a strong hand in that tragic moment of history brought about the practical results implied in the entente cordiale as formerly concluded.

What an admirable example was set to us by those two countries. Great Britain had remained aloof from conscription; she had applied her whole activity to forwarding industry, trade, and building up her navy. And when the hour of danger came, when she felt that a few thousand men would not be sufficient to resist the onslaught; when she realized that the war would be won not solely through the bravery of her children, through the courage of her soldiers, but that munitions, guns, and munition factories would be indispensable; then as by a miracle at the call of the Government, not only in Great Britain but in Ireland and throughout its possessions and colonies—for the British colonies to Germany's great surprise rallied to their mother country in the hour of danger—not only munition factories and guns and projectiles, but thousands and thousands of men, five hundred thousand, one million, one million and a half British soldiers, including your own Canadian boys, stood up and entered the fray alongside their French comrades. Such is the admirable spectacle which Great Britain presents to the wondering eyes and consciences of the world.

I am quite aware that German calumnies must have reached this country; it is even likely that they have found their way to your minds and hearts; we do not feel humiliated because before the war you may have thought, on the faith of what was so often repeated, that France was a lost country, corrupt, dissolute, frivolous, catering solely to its pleasures, and so much rent by political dissensions that when the great struggle would come, Germany would be facing not men but a divided army, easy to scatter. Well, you have been witnesses of what France can accomplish; that wonderful France, standing undefeated because her sons keep up both with the traditions of the past and the traditions of the Revolution. You have seen what her genius can effect, the same genius that has emancipated a large section of humanity. We had arms; we had an army. But what could our army do, with only 40,000,000 of inhabitants to draw from, in a struggle against the Germans who for the last 45 years have been perfecting their war machine in order to hurl it against our country. We gave way at first, both British and French; we gave way before the storm; we were not in sufficient numbers but we righted ourselves after the battle of the Marne. (Long applause.)

How has that been possible? It is because the world's estimate of France was not true.

There are political parties in France; every free democracy is made up of parties who struggle for supremacy, who hold different views, who do not servilely copy each other's gestures and expressions. What counts, after all, is that at the supreme hour all citizens unite in a common sacrifice on the altar of their country; what counts is that every citizen should remember that before belonging to any political party he owes allegiance to his country; as the preservation of the country is essential to the very existence of any party. (Applause.)

Well, what country could have done better than France to bring about this great sacred alliance? Everlastingly shall I remember, as the greatest honour that was mine in all my career, that eventful 4th of August, when I entered into the French House of Representatives with the declaration of war that had been communicated to me, as President of the French Cabinet, by Mr. de Schoen on the previous day. My colleague, the Marquis de Chambrun, a member of the French Parliament, will also recall the occurrence. There were all the members standing, quivering with emotion, all the galleries filled with wives and mothers who were going to send to the front their husbands or their sons; everybody standing; no more political parties; no more groups; none but Frenchmen reconciled in their devotion to their country. And as days followed days, all parties rallied to the same flag and put on the same uniform. Catholics no more; free-thinkers no more; Socialists no more; Radicals no more; Conservatives no more, but all children of the one France. All Frenchmen, leaving aside their old disputes, came to the common conclusion that there was no necessity to arouse political differences; that before fighting between ourselves it was first of all necessary to keep under our feet a free soil, an undivided France. As one man, we shouldered our guns, and it is that wonderful unity, that sacred unity, that has given us and will give us victory.

I join with you, Mr. Speaker, in hailing this victory. It should by all means break forth to the full knowledge of humanity; indeed, if this great effort of ours should not be crowned by victory, then I must say there never was waged a war so disastrous to the nations of the world. In former days nations have suffered grievously through defeat; but such wars were struggles between armies, and differences were settled through a treaty of peace; while in this war we are the spectators of a struggle between conflicting types of minds and nations. At present, I repeat, what is at stake is not territorial aggrandizement—it is more than that—it is the freedom of the world. (Applause).

You Canadians who listen to me, you freemen who sit in this Parliament, pray mark my words. I realize that you are farther away than we are from the battle-fields; the roar of guns does not reach your ears; you do not see the return of large numbers of wounded men; but morally speaking, you are just as close as we are to the fray. Confronting one another we have autocracy and democracy, and should, perchance, the freemen fail to win the war, democracy and universal justice would be defeated at the same time. It was in the cause of justice that at all epochs we drew the sword; it was in the cause of justice that Great Britain and France, together with their noble Allies, entered the war; it is to enable the children of men to enjoy after the war the advantages of a well assured and prolonged peace that we are fighting.

Mothers who now listen to me, it is for your children's freedom, it is to prevent the recurrence of any wars and to secure the peace of the world, that a whole generation is now giving its blood, and making to-day the supreme sacrifice.

Let a pious thought accompany those who go to the front. All laudatory epithets have been exhausted; there is nothing left to say in their praise but that some have given their lives for a sacred cause while others are fighting for the liberty of all mankind. Soldiers of Justice, soldiers of Truth, soldiers fighting for the right, your fame and your courage shall ever be an undying example to Man.

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE FOSTER (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I rise for the purpose of making a motion—it may be allowable, although all persons sitting within this room are not members of Parliament—in order that each one who is here may give his vote thereon, silent or expressed. Would to heaven that the speech to which we have just listened, so full of heart and fire, so full of the loyal spirit that beats true to humanity's best aspirations, could have been heard by every man in our Dominion. I wish to move, Sir, that this speech, as taken down by our reporters, be inserted in the Official Report of the Debates of this Parliament, in order that it may become a part of the imperishable records of this country. Would that to those pages, which will record the words of our distinguished visitor, there could also be transferred the fire, the spirit, the human force and vitality which to-day have entered into those words and have given to them an import and a meaning that the printed page is all too weak to carry.

Sir, this is a most unique occasion. Have we quite an adequate sense of how unique an occasion it is? Look at this bunting, which decorates the chamber. There are the flags of Britain, of France, of the United States of America—if we had had time, we should have had the flags of our other Allies as well. Looking at these flags on this historic occasion, what memories of the past do they invoke, what anticipations for the future! Our distinguished visitor of to-day, who has done us the extremely great honour of paying a visit to the Capital of our country, may have addressed far larger audiences and may have spoken to multitudes in comparison with which this assembly is but a small number, but he has never had a truer response to his burning words than that which has been given him to-day by those here assembled.

Not only have we with us to-day a man of marked personality and extreme brilliance and force of expression, but, in that chair to-day, in his personality, sits France—the France of many storied centuries, the France which, emerging from the dimness of past ages, has, by virile force, by artistic power, by the clear adaptation of great ideals, waged nobly and well her part of the world's warfare and achieved her part of the world's progressive work. The representatives of that other flag have in the past fought on many a field against the representatives of the French flag. To-day those two flags are intertwined; to-day those two great nations represent one struggle, one contest for one great world-ideal of liberty and of equality. As we hear these burning words and realize that France sits there, we can see the heroic bravery of her peasant soldiery who for two years and ten months, in brown trenches and on bloody fields, have stood off the attacks of despotism, the might of German power and domination, and have saved not only France, but the world, and liberty, and freedom. We see, too, the unexampled heroism and the cheerful, self-denying suffering of the women of France, who, behind those trenches, have done the work formerly carried on by that soldiery, on farm, in field, and in all the avocations of life. The matchless soldiery and the devoted women of France are present with us to-day as the burning words which we have heard break upon our ears.

But, Sir, we see more than France sitting in that chair. This occasion is but the indication and registry of something wider far and deeper still which is finding birth and incarnation in the fierce struggle of to-day. Above us poises the spirit of the other mighty allied nations, whose hearts beat in unison with the heart of France and of Britain, who have caught the radiance of the same high ideal, and are pursuing it through blood and sacrifice to a victorious realization, fused together in the white heat of a fervour that burns away all previous misunderstandings, all old time feuds, all the misapprehension and ignorance of the past, and leaves the spirit of these nationalities free to knit itself together for the greater world-work which shall come after the war.

And that great work shall be the reconstruction of that which has been destroyed, the laying anew of the foundations of a world of liberty, freedom and justice; of a world which, bathed in these fires and purified in this great struggle by self-denial and sacrifice, shall be raised to higher planes, on which generations yet unborn shall flourish and flower.

And, if Canada can be allowed one small word, in that Chair we see the representative of one of the two parents of this country. Among these flags is one which is representative of Canada's other progenitor and parent. And they show you Canada, but a child, drawing its inspiration in part from France and in part from Britain, and true to the best traditions of both.

After this war, Canada can never be what she has been. The blood of her children mingles with the blood of Frenchmen and Englishmen on the soil of France. Her sympathies have been drawn towards the same ideals, comradeship has been welded in the fierce heat of battle, and a fusion of thought and sympathy and love has come which will bind this country to France and to the Allies as it never could have been bound but for the uniting power of death faced in a common cause.

It is not for me to prolong my words. Not for an instant would I attempt to set an estimation on the oration which has been delivered to us. I called it a speech at first, but that was a feeble word by which to describe it. It was an exhibition of thought, of feeling, of fire, of high ideal and strong purpose; it was not only an exhibition of the spirit of our distinguished guest himself, but it was a translation of what his country means and is. In the years that lie before us the memories of a great and glorious past will intertwine and play their inevitable and inexorable part, and that part can only be one of united forces making for progress and of betterment in all the long ages of the future. The old misapprehension and prejudices of the past will have passed away in the cleansing fires of war, washed away in common blood shed for a common cause, and the spirit of our countries will emerge united for a higher ideal, and a stronger civilization.

In the name, Sir, of the Parliament of Canada and of the people of this country, I tender to you, Mr. Viviani, our sincere thanks for your visit to us, and for the admirable words you have spoken. This audience is small but your words, Sir, will go to the very confines of our country; they will be read by millions of people, and they will accomplish a great and beneficent work.

Right Hon. Sir WILFRID LAURIER (Leader of the Liberal party): Mr. Speaker, —and may I add, though it is hardly parliamentary but justified by the occasion: Ladies and Gentlemen—a very happy thought is embodied in the motion which has just been placed in your hands by the leader of the Government. It is my honour, and still more my pleasure, to second that motion, and to that motion not only the members of Parliament here assembled but all within sound of my voice will, I am sure, be only too glad to give an unanimous assent. It was a very happy thought, indeed, that we should crystallize the events of this day in some undying manner, and what manner could be more appropriate than to incorporate in the official records of our House the message which M. Viviani has brought from the French people to the people of Canada—a message which has been expressed with eloquence unsurpassed, and in words of fire which have burned to the very core of our hearts. M. Viviani has been kind enough to say in his speech that he was bringing to us the thanks and gratitude of the French people for what we have done for France in the present struggle. I am sure that I am voicing the feeling of every Canadian when I say that, we ask for no thanks and no gratitude. What we have done, we have done for the cause of freedom, that cause for which France has already borne such a heavy burden and made such heavy sacrifices. I am proud to say to M. Viviani that what we have done we have done willingly, freely, voluntarily, and through no sense of compulsion. It was, indeed, the belief in many parts of the old world where the virtue of British institutions was not understood, that as soon as England became engaged in a war the result would be very different from what actually happened when this war broke out. It was the calculation of the German Emperor, of the German militarists, and of the German people, that if England became engaged in a war there would forthwith be civil war in Ireland, insurrection in India, and the British colonies would seize the opportunity to sever their connection with the Mother Country. Sir, we are not surprised that those views were entertained in Germany, because the German people have never understood the spirit of liberty. Contrary to all their calculations this paradox of an empire of free peoples has become a living thing under British institutions.

M. Viviani has also expressed to us the thanks and gratitude of the French people for the part borne by our soldiers on the battlefield. That testimony of gratitude we accept; we accept it for our noble boys who have done their part in a manner to do credit to themselves and bring glory to their country. When we faced the thought of war, there may have been those amongst us who were apprehensive as to what might be the conduct of our young soldiers, soldiers not enured to war, not previously trained for military life, and for whom the first shock of battle might be a severe ordeal. Thank the Lord, we know to-day, and it is our pride to know, that they have borne themselves in a manner which proves that the blood in their veins has not degenerated. Not only that, but more. Many of these young soldiers, our boys, who crossed the ocean, never shall re-cross it. They have shed their blood on the fields of France, their bodies lie for ever in that sacred soil. We mourn their loss. But even those who have lost them will find consolation in the thought that under the mighty scourge of war will come a union between England and France of perpetual peace and amity. These countries linked together in mutual regard are an example to the world; and, now that they have been joined by the United States, we may see in this alliance the dawn of the day long hoped for, long prayed for, but long despaired of: the realization of glory to God in the highest, peace on earth, and good will among men.

The Rt Hon. Sir WILFRID LAURIER (Translation): Mr. Viviani, in the person of her distinguished visitor, Canada today hails the official representative of France, France at all times wonderful, but who during the last three years has held and is now holding ever increasingly the world in amazement; France, of whom you have spoken with such eloquence; France, united in a sacred union, which has put an end to all feuds, differences or shades of opinion, everything that disunited her sons; and which has placed her where she stands to-day, the champion, not only of her own freedom, but of the liberties of the world.

We greet you as the representative of France, and that greeting it is particularly pleasing to me to express in the French language, of which you have just spoken with such eloquence, a language which has the limpidity of a stream and the resistance of metal, which our forefathers have brought with them from the country of your ancestors and kept as their most, sacred heritage.

You visited the United States, accompanied by that illustrious general. . . .

by that illustrious general who at the beginning of the war had been entrusted with the destinies of France, and who was successful in breaking the German offensive, and destroying for ever the enemy's plans for establishing German supremacy. You have visited all the great cities, and everywhere you have been greeted with a spontaneity, an outburst, an enthusiasm that must have sometimes astonished you and always exceeded your hopes.

You now cross from one country to another, from the land of the United States to the land of Canada, a British soil. Many are the historic ties that bind you to the United States; but stronger are those that unite you to Canada's soil; because if you have met everywhere in the United States the feeling of admiration which the mere name of France evokes here, on this British soil, you will find not only admiration, but along with our sympathy you will find national pride; you will meet two million citizens of French descent who have kept alive the cult of France, a cult, that honours France, for inspiring it, Canada for fostering it, and England for respecting it.

But I hasten to add that, if we keep up the pride of our origin, we are equally proud of our allegiance. I say our allegiance; the word has somewhat fallen into disuse in France, but it was brought from France into England by the Normans and brought from England into Canada. We are proud of our allegiance, because wherever rights exist duties are born. We enjoy the rights of our origin, we have the duties of our allegiance, and for both we have an equal respect.

Mr. Viviani, your stay amongst us is too brief; you will soon depart; let me tell you that you leave behind a souvenir never to be blotted out of our memory, and that whatever happens, we shall remain true to the cause we are fighting for. We shall persevere until final victory, be that victory at hand, as we hope, or be it distant, as may be; we are in the struggle to the end. And we have no doubt of a victorious outcome, because we, in Canada, as you, in France, have the common resolve never to lay down arms until right and justice have again taken their place under the sun.

The DEPUTY SPEAKER: Sir George Foster moves, seconded by Sir Wilfrid Laurier:

That the admirable and eloquent speech just delivered by M. Viviani be inserted in the Official Report of the Debates of this House, and that it form a part of the permanent record of this Parliament.

Motion agreed to by a standing vote.

Hon. Sir GEORGE FOSTER moved the adjournment of the House.

He said: Before the adjournment, I beg to say that if the ladies and gentlemen present will be kind enough to walk in at the right of Mr. Speaker, and out at his left, M. Viviani will add to the gracious debt under which he has already placed us by giving them a personal greeting.

The audience then sang La Marseillaise and God Save the King, and in response to the call of the Deputy Speaker cheered "Vive la France."

Motion agreed to and House adjourned at 1.20 p.m.

Monday, May 14, 1917.

The House met at Three o'clock, tne Deputy Speaker, Mr. J. H. Rainville, in the Chair.

FINANCIAL ARRANGEMENT BETWEEN BRITISH GOVERNMENT AND C.P.R.

Hon. Sir THOMAS WHITE (Minister of Finance) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 47, to facilitate certain financial arrangements between the Government of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland and the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, and for other purposes.

He said: The object of the Bill is indicated in the title which I have just read. I may explain further, for the information of the House, that the Government of the United Kingdom, for the purpose of making financial provision for the prosecution of the war, has taken over and acquired, and proposes to take over or acquire, by compulsory purchase or otherwise, from persons resident in the United Kingdom, certain securities of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company and of the companies whose lines are leased to that company. The purpose of the British Government in so taking over these securities is to make them available for raising money on this side of the Atlantic; in other words, to assist the exchange situation, which for a considerable time has been adverse to Great Britain. In order that the British Government may have securities which can be sold on this side of the Atlantic, they have requested the Canadian Pacific Railway Company to issue collateral trust bonds of the company payable in United States currency. These collateral trust bonds are to be exchanged by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, if and when requested by the Government of the United Kingdom, for the consolidated debenture stock and other securities payable in sterling which shall have been acquired by the Government of the United Kingdom in London. That, in brief, is the transaction, and it is in order to empower the Canadian Pacific Railway Company to issue these collateral trust bonds to an amount sufficient for the purpose of exchange with the British Government for these consolidated debenture and other sterling securities that this Bill is introduced.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: As I understand the Bill as outlined by my hon. friend, it contemplates not to add to the liabilities of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, but simply to substitute one class of security for another?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: That is the object of the Bill. The Canadian Pacific Railway Company has asked that the Bill be introduced in order to facilitate arrangements which it has been specifically requested by the Imperial Government to enter into.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I am under the impression that in the report of the proceedings of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company the president is reported as having stated that, owing to the entry of the United States into the war and the loan to Great Britain by the United States of $7,000,000,000, the carrying out of the proposal as originally made was not now contemplated. Perhaps my hon. friend will be able to inform the House whether or not that is so.

Of course, if it is so, it would not be necessary to proceed further with this proposed measure.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: When I first placed this Bill upon the Order Paper the matter was quite urgent, because an issue of these bonds was about to be made in New York. On account of the financial situation which developed by reason of the entry of the United States into the war, it was found inadvisable to proceed. No such issue is now in immediate contemplation, but I know that the British Government has asked the Canadian Pacific Railway Company to proceed with this legislation in order that it may be available if required.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

PRIVILEGE.

STATEMENT BY MR. J. D. TAYLOR.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. J. D. TAYLOR (New Westminster): I rise to a question of privilege and to call attention to an unusual episode which occurred during the debate in this House on the 1st of May., the speaker being the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Levi Thomson), who is reported in Hansard, page 1021, as follows:

> I would not like to charge any man with disloyalty, not even those political colonels who strut around our country in the King's uniform, drawing big pay, and who have been on a free trip across the Atlantic to England or France, but who, the moment they smelt gunpowder, turned tail and skipped back home, leaving their men to go to the front without them.

If the audience to whom this is addressed, that is, the Canadian public, had been present in the chamber and could have visualized the scene, it would not have been necessary to make any remarks in answer to the hon. gentleman; but unfortunately, such is not the case, and his remarks, going to a public uninformed as to the source of a statement of this kind, are very mischievous and insulting to the commanding officers in His Majesty's army, of whom I have the honour to be one. I am sure, Sir, you will recognize that this statement is doubly out of order; in the first place as a flagrant breach of Rule 19 of this House, and in the next as a breach of that most particular rule of parliamentary debate which prohibits any reflection on the honour of officers of the naval or military forces. The hon. member for Qu'Appelle has not been present in the chamber since I arrived from British Columbia a week ago. but on a later occasion, when he is present, I purpose, with the permission of the House, making a motion which I think will be in order, namely: that that hon. member be ordered to withdraw these remarks and that they be expunged from the Hansard for the day named.

In the meantime, however, I think I am in order in making a personal explanation—at least personal to myself—as to how I, one of these political colonels, who no doubt was referred to (because the passage is meaningless if it does not refer to colonels who are members of the House of Commons) come to be here to-day.

I may say that I had as clear an understanding with the Department of Militia in this country as any commanding officer could have, that I was raising a battalion with which I would serve at the front so long as the battalion served. As I have said in the House before, I recognized that military exigencies, when we arrived in England, made it seem necessary to break up the battalion and to remove, not the commanding officer from the battalion, but the battalion from the commanding officer, which is the real process there. The brigadier in a case like that takes command of the whole battalion, calls out the officers, directs his sergeant-major to march away the men in accordance with the notice already given that those men are to be attached to a reserve battalion to go forward as drafts, and the commanding officer is left to wind up the affairs of the battalion. That is what occurred to me and to several other members of Parliament in command of battalions who arrived in England at the same time as I did. Subsequently we received, through military headquarters, a specific invitation from the Government of Canada to return to Canada to attend to our parliamentary duties. When that invitation was extended to me I replied in writing that I would be pleased to accept it provided that I was not required for military service. The rejoinder to that was information to me that my passage had been booked on a steamer sailing a couple of days after I received the notice, and I think the same explanation applies to every other of those so-called political colonels. May I suggest, in conclusion, that if we desire to have His Majesty's uniform respected in Canada, by the people of Canada, it would not be out of place for the House of Commons to give the lead.

SHIPBUILDING IN CANADA.

CONTRACTS BY IMPERIAL MUNITIONS BOARD.

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. Wm. PUGSLEY (St. John): I had not the pleasure of being present in the House on the 11th instant when my right hon. friend, the Minister of Trade and Commerce and acting leader of the Government (Sir George Foster) made a statement with regard to the building of ships, in particular, of wooden vessels, a matter which is of very great importance and which is exciting a great deal of interest, more especially in the Maritime Provinces. My right hon. friend is reported to have made this statement:

> As to wooden ships, an arrangement is now completed and is being carried out whereby any body or any company that can undertake in a bona fide way to build wooden ships and to deliver them within a certain time, will get the opportunity of building the ships and will be assured that the ship will pay for the cost of construction, with a reasonable profit.

It would be desirable in the public interest that certain details, which are wanting in the observations of my right hon. friend, should be given to the House and to the country. As my right hon. friend is aware, there are in New Brunswick a large number of places, for instance, in the city of St. John, and at other points along the St. John river, the Kennebecasis, the Miramichi, the Restigouche, and other points in the counties of Kent and Gloucester where in former days wooden shipbuilding was carried on very extensively, and where there are admirable sites for the building of ships. I think the only thing that is wanting is that definite information should be given to people who are interested as to the terms upon which contracts would be let and as to the standard of vessels which would be required, in order to induce quite a large number of persons to engage in wooden ship building. At present they have no information upon the subject; they do not know to whom to apply; they do not know the standard of vessels required, and it is desirable that such information should be made public. My object in bringing this matter to the attention of the House and particularly to the attention of my right hon. friend is that that information should be furnished as early as possible.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: It is not an unreasonable demand that proper publicity should be given in relation to the question which has been brought up by my hon. friend. In the first place I may say that inquiries addressed to the Munitions Board will bring all the information of the kind hinted at by my hon. friend. In the second place if it should seem advisable to make an announcement to the public in a fuller or perhaps a more speedy way the Government will confer with the Munitions Board as to such an announcement.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I would presume that in a matter of this importance there must have been correspondence between the Imperial authorities and the Dominion Government. Perhaps the best way of making the announcement would be to bring down the correspondence.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Such correspondence would be between the British Government and the Imperial Munitions Board, which is entirely under the British Government. If any correspondence in reference to this matter has passed between the British and Dominion Governments, that of course could be brought down.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: One would not suppose that correspondence is taking place between the Imperial Government and the Munitions Board, of which this Government have no knowledge whatever; it would not pass over the head of this Government.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Bless the heart of my right hon. friend! Surely he does not adhere to the position that the British Government either through an agent or otherwise cannot make a purchase or close a contract in this country without coming to the Dominion Government.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Bless my heart to this extent: the British Government can, but I do not suppose that they do.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: They would bother this Government to death if we were consulted every time.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I dare say they have done so, and that is why I want the correspondence.

SHIPBUILDING IN CANADA.

QUESTION AS TO AID BY CANADIAN GOVERNMENT.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. WILLIAM PUGSLEY (St. John City): Has the Government given any aid either by loan of money or otherwise to the Imperial Munitions Board for the building of wooden ships in Canada?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I have given all the information on that head that it is possible to give. If my hon. friend requires the specific information he has detailed to-day, I will see how far his wishes can be met.

Mr. PUGSLEY: My hon. friend stated in his remarks on the 11th instant that ships were being built in Canada and that every available shipyard was being utilized. I beg to differ from my hon. friend because I know of a number of shipyards where absolutely no work is being done. Would the minister be good enough to state to the House at an early date where shipbuilding is being carried on under the arrangement he has spoken of?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: It is not the first time my hon. friend has differed from me, and found himself in the wrong in the end. I will try and get him all the information for which his ardent soul so longs.

Mr. PUGSLEY: It is a reasonable soul too.

WESTERN COAL MINING.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. W. A. BUCHANAN (Medicine Hat): Has the Minister of Labour any further information regarding the coal mining camps in the West? I read in the Montreal Gazette this morning that the District Union has called out the miners in all the camps in Alberta and Eastern British Columbia. The United Mine Workers of America control all the coal mining camps in Southern Alberta and Eastern British Columbia, and if this report is true the mines will all be closed and there will probably be a shortage of coal, because I do not think there is any coal stored in the West at the present time. It is also stated in the despatch that the Minister of labour has suggested a Royal Commission, and that the parties are considering it. The coal mining situation in the West is very serious, and I should like to know just what the Government is doing. The minister might also state whether a communication has been received from the operators in regard to keeping open the mines and operating them; I saw a telegram to that effect in a western paper the other day. I would also remind the minister of what purported to be an official statement from the Government in the latter part of January last when this trouble began. A proposition was supposed to come from the Government that if the difficulties between the men and the operators could not be settled, the Government would take over the mines and operate them for the benefit of the people. I should like to know whether this is correct, and what action the Government purposes taking.

Hon. T. W. CROTHERS (Minister of Labour): The representatives of the miners were in session in Calgary some five or six weeks, negotiating a new agreement. They finally came to an agreement, subject to ratification by the miners. It seems there is a certain provision in the constitution of the United Mine Workers of America whereby their representatives can only make a tentative agreement which becomes final on ratification by the miners. In this case the agreement was rejected by the miners by a large majority. The representatives of the miners then called a meeting of the local lodges to be held in Calgary last Thursday night, to decide what action should be taken, and so far as my information goes they have not yet reached a conclusion. I sent a message to the president of the organization on Saturday night, but have not yet received a reply, so I am not in a position to say what course they intended to take.

REMOVAL OF RAILS FOR USE IN FRANCE.

On the Orders of the Day:

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I beg to call the attention of the Government to the following telegram which I have received:

Edson, Alta., May 12, 1917.

Sir Wilfrid Laurier,
Ottawa, Ont.

Proposal to dismantle Grand Trunk west of Edmonton would destroy town of Edson and large settlement north of Grand Trunk which Canadian Northern could not serve. There is no settlement on Canadian Northern which Grand Trunk does not serve. Townspeople have submitted facts to engineer but outside settlers only learning to-day that serious proposal is made, many of them sending telegrams to Drayton, Cochrane and Foster. Will try to get copies and mail same to you.

F. U. LAYCOCK.

May I ask the Government if they have received this complaint, and whether they intend taking any action to save this rising town?

Hon. FRANK COCHRANE (Minister of Railways): We received three telegrams this morning, but I do not know whether they were from Edson or not. We have a man out there to see that no towns will be deprived of railway communication. The Grand Trunk Pacific rails were taken up in this case because we received a request for rails of the same pattern and boring as were sent over before.

SHORTAGE OF SALT FOR FISH CURING.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN (Halifax): I desire to refer for a moment to the question that was brought up the other day by my hon. friend from Guysborough (Mr. Sinclair) as to what arrangements the Government are making for securing tonnage for the transportation of salt from Mediterranean ports to ports in the Maritime Provinces. A serious condition is likely to prevail in the Maritime Provinces shortly on account of lack of the salt which is required in the fish business. In the Maritime Provinces 15,000 or 20,000 pounds of salt are required annually in the fish business, and it looks at the moment as if there will be great difficulty in securing the necessary supply. I would point out that Admiralty transports are frequently arriving at Halifax from Mediterranean ports without cargo. Many of them arrive with mud ballast, which must cost the ship money to load and unload. Many of these ships have been offered as high as 35 shillings a ton to bring salt to the maritime ports, but they have declined to do so.

It happened just recently that a ship left the Mediterranean in ballast, having passed quite close to a port where a cargo of salt might have been procured. The situation is extremely grave in the Maritime Provinces, for the reasons I have given. It seems to me that the matter is not being fairly dealt with by the Admiralty, or by some person who should exercise authority. There would seem to be no reason why ships coming from Mediterranean ports to the Maritime Provinces in ballast should not carry salt for which they receive very favourable freight rates indeed. I hope the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster) will be seized of the importance of the matter and will do everything possible to secure ships to carry salt.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Everything that can possibly be done from this side has been done with that object in view. The authorities at home are fully seized of the necessities of this side, and the transport authorities are quite willing that vessels should bring salt to their ports of destination. But they can not be expected to waste too much time going distances in order to reach the points to which the salt is consigned. That is the only difficulty that intervened. The matter has been thoroughly represented; the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Hazen) while in London has taken the matter up with the authorities themselves, and I have information that they are perfectly accordant with the idea and will in every case carry it out. There may be some difficulty with regard to freight rates, I do not know about that; but I imagine they are not unreasonable in the freights they charge.

SENTENCE ON A RECRUIT SUSPENDED.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. OLIVER: I desire to draw the attention of the Government to an item that appeared recently in an Ottawa paper as follows:

> George Shore, 131 Slater Street, who pleaded guilty before Magistrate Askwith to a charge of horse stealing was allowed to go on suspended sentence this morning when he produced attestation papers showing that he has been accepted for overseas service with the Canadian Engineers.

If I am not out of order I desire to say in my judgment this is neither in the interest of justice nor in the interest of military efficiency.

INQUIRIES FOR RETURNS.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): I draw attention to the fact that a very large number of orders for papers which have been passed by the House, some over a year ago, have not been complied with. I looked over the book and found that no less than thirty-eight orders for papers passed in the year 1916 have not yet been fulfilled, and that a large number ordered this year are in the same position. For example, there is an order moved for by myself and passed by this House on 31st January last, relating to the commandeering of Canadian ships. Another related to Orders in Council imposing restrictions on the Minister of Militia, and was passed by this House on 31st February last. I hope the ministers concerned will look into this matter and especially with regard to those returns ordered more than a year ago. In order to make the matter more definite, I will read a list of the returns ordered last year and not yet brought down:

I am going by the record in the book kept in the record office, which shows that no return has been made to any of this long list of motions that were moved and passed in 1916. I hope the matter will receive the attention of the various departments. There may be some returns which have been made since this list was prepared—I am not sure—but I know a good many have not been returned of which I have personal knowledge.

Mr. McCRANEY: On the 31st of January this year I moved for a return of the correspondence connected with the exemption from military service of the Doukhobors, and also the correspondence in connection with the withdrawal of the Northwest Mounted Police from Alberta and Saskatchewan. I would direct the attention of the Government to these returns, and I would ask that they be brought down as soon as possible.

Mr. OLIVER: I mentioned the other day that it had been stated in the press that the reply of Dr. Bruce to the report of the Babtie Commission had been placed in the hands of the Minister of Militia. I wish to know if it will be laid before the House, if so, how soon, and will it be printed?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: In answer to my hon. friend from Edmonton (Mr. Oliver), I may repeat what I said a week or two ago in the House. Dr. Bruce wrote me a letter saying that he had mailed or sent his reply to the Babtie report. His letter did not bear any date, nor was it made clear by the letter where he mailed it from. But the report itself, which he said in his letter he had sent, has not reached the department. The moment it reaches the department I will have it laid on the table of the House.

PRIVATE BILLS.

THIRD READING.

Bill No. 10, to incorporate the Grand Lodge of the Canadain Association of Stationary Engineers in the Dominion of Canada.—Mr. Fripp.

GRAND TRUNK PACIFIC BRANCH LINES COMPANY.

House in Committee on Bill No. 41—Mr. Blain in the Chair—respecting the Grand Trunk Pacific Branch Lines Company—Mr. J. A. Currie.

On section 2—extension of time for completion of certain authorized railways:

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I am very pleased to see in the House my hon. friend from Simcoe (Mr. Currie), who is in charge of this Bill and who takes an interest in the Grand Trunk Pacific railway. These lines mentioned in the Bill are intended to be feeders of the Grand Trunk Pacific. Is my hon. friend aware that at the present time the Government are dismantling the Grand Trunk Pacific and destroying it east and west? Since my hon. friend takes an interest in the road, I hope he will see that the Government do not carry any further their nefarious operations, but keep up the railway. Otherwise these branches if built will be of no use.

Mr. GERMAN: As this Bill, if passed, will very largely affect the railway situation as reported on by the Royal Commission appointed some time ago to investigate the whole railway and transportation situation in Canada, I think we should know from the minister whether or not he has considered the majority and the minority reports made by the Royal Commission, and if he is prepared to inform the House whether or not he will advise the adoption of either of those reports; and if not what the Government propose to do in connection with the railway situation in Canada, which is certainly in a very serious condition, to my mind a very dangerous condition, in relation to the best interests of Canada. I think that, at least before this Bill is read the third time, we should hear from the minister the policy of the Government, as this Bill gives the Grand Trunk Pacific Company further large powers for building branch lines, many of which will come directly into competition with branch lines of the Canadian Northern in that locality. The majority of the Royal Commission recommend that the Government should acquire both of those railway systems and thereby do away with the necessity of duplicating these branch lines. Before anything further is done in regard to the construction of branch lines, I think we should know what views the Government have, if they have yet arrived at a conclusion in the matter, and what is likely to be done to alleviate the very serious railway situation in Canada.

Mr. COCHRANE: I beg to say that I have read both the majority and the minority reports, and an announcement will be made in the House very shortly of what we propose to do.

Mr. CURRIE: I was asked to take charge of this Bill, having had charge of some of these Bills before for the Grand Trunk Railway. I recognize the force of the remarks of the right hon. leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). At the same time, as the Government are going to bring down a policy on the railway situation very shortly, I hardly think that policy should be discussed in connection with this Bill. So far as I know, no action is going to be taken by the Government. These charters are expiring and this company comes to this honourable House and asks the House to renew them. A large sum of money is involved even in the passing of this Bill. I am well aware that the roads referred to here are perhaps not in as good a position financially as they might be. All of these matters, however, are questions beyond the scope of this Bill, and all I can do is to ask the House to pass the Bill. Should the Government see fit to take over the road before this Bill reaches its third reading, I am satisfied the House will remit the fees to the Grand Trunk Company, and that no further action will be taken. All I can do as promoter of the Bill is to forward it in good faith to the company that asks us to renew it.

4 p.m.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I did not make these remarks with any view of opposing the Bill; on the contrary, I am quite in sympathy with it, and with the building of branch lines of the Grand Trunk Pacific railway. I still believe it is a good enterprise. What I had in mind was to enlist the sympathy of my hon. friend, who is a supporter of the Government, and to ask him to see that they did not dismantle and destroy that property which he is now asking us to make better and more useful. My hon. friend is aware that in the East the Grand Trunk Pacific railway has been largely damaged and destroyed. The grades have been destroyed, and now the rails are being taken up from the sidings. In the West the rails are being taken up from the main line. If the road is further subjected to this process of destruction, it will not have the same value. Therefore it is that I urge on my hon. friend to do all in his power to prevent that process going any further, and to see that the Government keep the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway going. I hope that my appeal has not fallen on deaf ears.

Mr. CURRIE: My hon. friend's remarks have not fallen on stony soil, I can assure him.

The circumstances of each particular case have been considered as occasion necessitated.

GOVERNMENT RAILWAYS—PURCHASE OF CARS.

Mr. GRAHAM:

Was duty paid on the 595 cars which the Minister of Railways says were purchased by the Canadian Government from the United States since January 1, 1916?

Mr. COCHRANE: Of the 595 cars purchased by the Canadian Government from the United States since January 1st, 1916, the following have been delivered and duty paid thereon: 1 day coach, 2 baggage cars, 1 diner, 1 tourist, 1 diner.

Duty will be paid on the balance of the cars as they arrive.

Mr. GRAHAM:

In reply to a question, the Minister of Railways informed the House that there had been purchased in the United States for the use of the Canadian Government railways since 1916, 500 coal cars, 18 tourist cars, 2 baggage cars, 50 sleeping cars, 23 first-class and 2 mail and express cars. What was the total cost of these cars?

2. 15 days, pulling pontoon off ways, handling grain elevator, putting tug Diver on ways, etc.

DEATH OF PTE. J. F. MITCHELL.

*Mr. LEMIEUX:

1. Has the attention of the Government been called to the following despatch which appeared in the Evening News of Montreal, on Wednesday, March 28, 1917:—

Wet Canteens Responsible.

London, March 27.—In the House of Commons last night, Mr. Macpherson said an inquiry was being held into the death of Pte. J. F. Mitchell, aged twenty, a Canadian, from alcoholic poisoning in a Surrey camp. A private member protested against drink temptations being put in the way of young Canadians in camp. Mr. Macpherson said that wet canteens were introduced in camps at the request of the Canadian authorities.

2. Are the alleged facts herein stated correct?

Sir EDWARD KEMP:

1. Yes.

2. Depositions at coroner's inquest show clearly that any liquor which Pte. J. F. Mitchell may have received was obtained and drunk at public house two miles from camp where Mitchell was quartered.

The General Officer Commanding Canadians, in October, 1914, believing that it would be more in the interest of Canadian soldiers to have the sale of intoxicating drinks under better control, sent a despatch to the War Office containing the following:

"I have just arrived back from Plymouth and find that it is absolutely necessary that there should be canteens for the sale of beer in camp. The men, as I anticipated, finding no liquor in camp canteens, go to the neighbouring villages and get bad liquor."

MR. J. T. ROBINSON.

Mr. TURRIFF:

1. Who recommended J. T. Robinson, of Kamloops, B.C., as a recruiting officer?
2. When was he appointed?
3. To what regiment was he attached?
4. What rank did he hold?
5. How long did he hold the position?
6. How much money did he receive for pay, allowances and expenses, respectively?
7. What results did he achieve?

Sir EDWARD KEMP:

1. J. T. Robinson was appointed January 29, 1916, upon instructions of the Minister of Militia and Defence.

2. Date of appointment—January 29, 1916.

3. Recruited for 172nd Battalion and other units.

4. Held rank of Honorary Captain, Canadian Militia.

5. Held appointment until August 2, 1916.

6. Pay and allowances of his rank, $824.25; travelling expenses, $104.70.

7. It is impossible to tabulate the exact results obtained by regimental recruiting officers. Captain Robinson was employed on general recruiting work for the battalion, organizing recruiting meetings and concerts. There is no doubt that he obtained a considerable number of recruits for the battalion through the meetings and concerts which he organized, and also through his personal influence.

COLONEL JOSEPH GLEN.

Mr. CRUISE:

1. What amount, if any, has been paid by the Government to Colonel Joseph Glen, who crossed to England from Saskatoon with the 98th Battalion?

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT—DIVORCED PERSONS.

On Notices of Motions being called:

Hon. WM. PUGSLEY (St. John): Before proceeding to Notices of Motions, I would like pro forma to have Public Bills and Orders called for the purpose of making a formal motion for a committee to consider Bill No. 4. This was the understanding with the Minister of Justice, and no doubt my hon. friend the Solicitor General is aware of the circumstances. It was understood when this Bill was given its second reading that it would go to a special committee.

The House proceeded to Public Bills and Orders and went into committee on Bill No. 4, to amend the Criminal Code (Mr Pugsley), Mr. Rainville in the Chair.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I beg to move:

That a select committee of seven members of this House be appointed by Mr. Speaker to whom shall be referred Bill No. 4 to amend the Criminal Code, the duty of which committee shall be to consider the provisions of the said Bill and report its opinion thereon to this House, together with such amendments, if any, as the said committee may deem it desirable to make thereto.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am aware that it was the desire of the Minister of Justice that this Bill be referred to a committee. I presume that the wording of my hon. friend's motion is the usual wording for reference to a special committee.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Yes.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Then I have no objection to the motion carrying. I do not think the members of the committee have been discussed yet. I think that was left over for the Minister of Justice?

Mr. PUGSLEY: Quite so. Perhaps the Minister of Justice will suggest some names.

The House resumed and proceeded to Notices of Motions.

VOTES FOR OVERSEAS SOLDIERS.

PROPOSAL TO ENFRANCHISE EVERY MAN ENLISTED IN CANADA.

Mr. MICHAEL STEELE (South Perth) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the Government should introduce legislation at this Session which will extend the franchise to every British citizen who enlisted with the Canadian Forces for Overseas Service, and who was a resident of Canada at the time of enlistment.

He said: Mr. Speaker, matters relating to suffrage are always of considerable interest, not only to Parliament, but to the country generally. Some one has said that the destruction or salvation of states depends upon the matter of regulating the suffrage. For that reason I think it very important at this time to have the matter discussed and dealt with by this House which is referred to in the resolution I have the honour of proposing. The main object of this resolution is to grant the suffrage to all soldiers who are under twenty-one years of age, and thus to put them on a parity with all others who are fighting for our country. From the days of ancient Greece and Rome, when suffrage was first introduced, there has been a gradual extension of the privilege, being at first very restricted, but gradually growing wider and wider as the years have passed. All countries, however, still have their restrictions on suffrage. For instance, every country requires that the voter shall be a subject or citizen of the country in which he votes. Also, that every voter shall be a resident of the country. Many countries still retain the property qualification, limiting the suffrage to those citizens who possess a certain amount of property. All countries, I think, have an age qualification, although this varies much in the different countries. In Denmark the age at which one is first allowed to vote is 30 years; in Belgium, Japan and Norway, 25 years; Austria, 24 years; Hungary, 20 years. I think that in all other countries the age is fixed at 21 years. Other requirements are provided in various countries. Some countries, for instance, require that the voter shall be able to read and write. In some countries—and strangely, I think, although probably there is good reason for it, in three of our allies, Russia, Italy and France—soldiers are not allowed to vote at all, unless the law has been changed since the outbreak of the present war.

In general terms, granting the suffrage to any person presupposes that that person is possessed of sufficient intelligence to be able to give a vote which will be for the benefit of the country, and that he will bring sufficient knowledge and intelligence to bear on the process of voting to enable him to do that which is best for the country. It also presupposes that the voter has sufficient interest in his country's affairs to be willing to cast his vote and to cast it in a way in which he, at least, believes to be in the best interest of that country.

It seems to me, however, that while all these qualifications may serve a good purpose, and while some of them may be absolutely essential, at this day there is a higher qualification which has been established by the present war, and that qualification is the ability and willingness to give service to the state. I believe that we in Canada especially should add that qualification to the others which we have in force and that the suffrage should be granted to many of those who have shown their willingness and ability to serve the state, and especially those who are in our army to-day and are giving us such splendid service. It was these young men under twenty-one years of age, who at present by our Franchise Act are deprived of the privilege of voting, that I had specially in mind when introducing this resolution. The Soldiers' Voting Bill, passed in 1915, has this for its first clause:

> Every male British subject of twenty-one years of age or upwards serving in the military forces of Canada in the present war (hereinafter called "volunteer"), who, within six months immediately preceding the date when he was appointed to or enlisted in such forces, had been resident in any electoral district in Canada for a period of not less than thirty days, shall be entitled to vote in the electoral district in which he was last so resident in the manner hereinafter set out, notwithstanding his absence from such electoral district or from Canada: Provided that if any person was, at the time he was so appointed or enlisted, qualified to vote in any other electoral district in Canada, he shall vote in such other district only.

You will note that in that clause several restrictions which apply to other voters have been removed in the case of the soldier. For instance, the soldier who is twenty-one years of age or upwards may vote even though he is absent from the country, which the civilian is not allowed to do. He may vote notwithstanding that he has no fixed residence at the time of enlistment, and no civilian is allowed this privilege. So we see, by the Soldiers' Voting Bill some of those in the army were given special privileges which those not in the army do not enjoy. So, when I ask by this resolution that the franchise shall be extended to include others in the army, I am not proposing anything that is so very radical.

In 1915, there were few who thought that the needs of the war would be so great as they have proven to be. At that time, judging by the discussion in this House, it was generally thought that if Canada supplied 50,000 men she would not require to supply more. No person, I think I may safely say, thought that within two and a half years Canada would have an army of over 400,000 men. When we have such a large number enrolled in the overseas forces, it means that there is a correspondingly large number of young men under twenty-one who are giving the best service to this country that it is possible to give, yet who are denied the privilege of taking part in the affairs of this country when they return home, or when an election shall come on. Among those who are twenty-one years of age, I think I may safely say, are some of the best boys Canada has produced. And not only that but I think I can well say that, accordingly to the view of our people, the Canadian boys under twenty-one years of age are equal in intelligence and ability to the young men of any other counry in the world. Amongst these are several thousand students from our colleges and universities, young men who cannot be said not to possess sufficient intelligence to be able to vote, or young men who take so little interest in the affairs of their country as to be disqualified from voting. I believe that these young men have all the qualifications, intellectual and other, that are required to make them voters of the very first class.

When the call came in 1914 for men to serve our country, there was no question then regarding the ability of boys under 21 years of age to serve. When the call came for men to protect our country, our homes our property and our lives, and to maintain the integrity of the British Empire and preserve the freedom of Canada, no person would stand up and say: We can not accept the services of any man under 21 years of age. Why should we apply that rule after they have fought and endured, and yea, sacrificed even their lives? Why should we apply that rule, after these men under 21 years of age have done such splendid service for their country, why should we say to them: You can have no further active participation in the affairs of this country. Many of them will not return, many of them will leave their bodies on Flanders fields, but large numbers will return to this country, large numbers will be residents of Canada, large numbers will be residents of the various electoral districts, every one of them will be British subjects, and how can we say to them: We are quite willing that you should fight for our land, we are quite willing that you should face the enemy, we admire what you have done at St. Julien, Courcelette, and Vimy Ridge, we give you all honour for your splendid services in France and on the continent of Europe, but we can not see our way clear to granting you the right and the privilege of marking the ballot when you return to Canada until you have become a year, or two years, or three years, older and until you have convinced us that you possess sufficient intelligence to mark that ballot properly. Is that the treatment that we are going to give these splendid boys to whom we are so deeply indebted when they return? I can not believe it is. These young men have assisted in making a new Canada. They have assisted in preserving the freedom of the institutions of Canada but they have also done splendid service in creating a nation that is going to be a new Canada. We are looking forward to greater opportunities and privileges among the nations of the world and we are looking forward to being a Canada with a history of sacrifice and heroism that will be a source of pride to our people for generations to come That Canada is possible partly as the result, at least, of the exertions, the efforts and heroism of the boys fighting in France today who are under 21 years of age, and this Parliament should not, say to these boys: We are indebted to you for the service you have performed there but we can not extend to you the rights of citizenship when you return home.

The next Parliament of Canada will have largely to deal with problems and questions which have been created by this war. It would be only fair and right that the men who have created the conditions which that Parliament will have to deal with should have the right to say who shall be the representatives of the Canadian people in the Parliament which has to deal with these problems which they, by their splendid efforts, have created. I think we should not say to these young men that we are willing that they should direct the bullets intended to destroy the enemy but we are unwilling that they should mark their ballots which will be the instruments by which the welfare of Canada shall be maintained for the next few years at least. Each man who has fought should have the right to say how the fruits of his efforts are going to be dealt with. For that reason I hope that this resolution will be passed and that the franchise will be extended to these young men. I believe they will exercise their franchise with at least as much intelligence as the average elector in the country, that they will exercise it with as deep an interest in the affairs of the country as the average elector will, and I would feel disposed to go further and say that they will be amongst the most intelligent and the most interested young Canadians that we will have in this country.

Mr. J. H. FISHER (Brant): I have listened with great interest to the remarks on this resolution that have fallen from the lips of the hon. member for South Perth (Mr. Steele). I am glad to have the opportunity of saying a few brief words in support of the resolution, which I trust will commend itself to the House. In round numbers, probably 400,000 of the men of Canada have enlisted for active service overseas. A considerable percentage of this number is possibly composed of young men under the age of 21 years, who, therefore, are not entitled to vote. Many of these young men, some to my personal knowledge, had taken an active part in all matters relating to the welfare of Canada previous to their enlistment. In regard to their loyalty, there can be no question. The way in which they rushed to enlist at the beginning of the war makes it clear that every one of them is intensely loyal. Many have returned to this country maimed and wounded, many have laid down their lives, and many more to-day are fighting our battles in France. It seems to me that if there is any one class in this country who are entitled to a special right to be consulted, and to express their views on the affairs of this country at the present time, it is these young men who so willingly volunteered, and were ready to lay down their lives for their country. More particularly, it seems to me, at a time when we are confronted by great war problems—and after the war these problems will be even more difficult than they are now—should these valiant young patriots have some voice in the settlement of these questions. If they are old enough to fight, and if they are old enough, if need be, to die for their country, they are old enough to vote. These young men have matured, not by age, not by years, but by hard and bitter experience; and I think it would be a hardship of the worst kind not to allow them the right to exercise their franchise when they return to Canada.

The resolution as introduced by the hon. member for South Perth (Mr. Steele) includes all men of British birth who have enlisted for overseas service, and this, of course, includes the Indians in this country, who have again shown their loyalty by enlisting in large numbers from all parts of this Dominion. From the reserve of the Six Nations, in the county I represent, some 400 young Indians have enlisted. One of the first from the county of Brant to lay down his life for his country was a young Indian, Lieutenant Cameron Brant, a member of the 114th Regiment, and a direct descendent of the Great Indian chief, Joseph Brant, after whom the city of Brantford and the county of Brant are named. As you are aware, none of these Indians are now entitled to the franchise, and it seems to me that it would be a mere act of justice that those at least who have enlisted should be allowed the right to vote. But I would go further than this; I would say that the Government should, at a very early date, take into their earnest and serious consideration the matter of restoring the franchise to the Indians of this country, the franchise which was given to them by a former Conservative Government and which was taken from them by the late Administration for, possibly, some reason, but for what good reason I cannot imagine. I do know this, that there are no similar number of white men in this country or in any other country who would exercise the franchise more intelligently or more honestly than the Indians of the Six Nations reserve, and I believe that what I say in regard to the Indians of the Six Nations will apply also to the Indians of all other reserves in this country. I should be very glad to know that the full franchise was to be restored to them. But, in any case, I trust that the franchise will at least be given to those who have enlisted. I should like in this connection to apply to these brave young Indians who have gone forth to battle for the Empire, the words of the late gifted Indian poetess, Pauline Johnson, herself one of the Six Nations. In a poem composed by Pauline Johnson, the following words occur:

> Few of them have the blood of kings,
> And few are of courtly birth,
> But none are vagabonds or rogues,
> Of doubtful race and worth.
> And each has one credential,
> Which enables him to brag,
> He fought for right and Canada,
> And upheld the British Flag.

I should be remiss in my duty if I did not say a word in regard to the splendid work that has been done along patriotic lines by the Indian women on the reserve. I would simply say, in a word, that the work they have done has not been surpassed in any part of this Dominion, and I trust that when woman suffrage comes, as I have no doubt it will come, the Indian women on the Reserve will be accorded equal rights with their white sisters. They are well deserving of it, and I believe they will exercise the franchise just as well as the white women could or will. I am quite sure that this resolution of the hon. member for South Perth (Mr. Steele) will commend itself to the members of this House, and I also feel quite sure that the Government will give it their very earnest and careful consideration.

5 p.m.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, I should like, in a word, to put myself on record as being very heartily in favour of the resolution before the House. The qualification for voting in Federal affairs is that of manhood suffrage. We have an arbitrary method of defining the time at which a male reaches the point of manhood. I do not think that any of us would seek to apply that artificial method to the men who have gone to the front and say that there are men in the trenches from Canada who have not reached the age of manhood. I do not think that any one would deny the possession of manhood to every man who has voluntarily gone to fight for Canada at the front. So that if manhood suffrage be our test of the right to exercise the franchise, we certainly have men who, although they are not twenty-one years of age, have lived amply up to that qualification. I have not the slightest hesitation in giving adherence to the resolution, and I support it most heartily.

Mr. GEORGE A. ELLIOTT (Middlesex North): Mr. Speaker, I wish to join with the hon. member from North Brant (Mr. Fisher), and also the hon. member from Red Deer (Mr. M. Clark) in saying a few words of appreciation of the resolution introduced in this House by the hon. member from South Perth (Mr. Steele). I appreciate the meaning of the resolution more fully than I have words to express. When we take into consideration the fact that over 400,000 of Canada's sons have responded to the call for service for our King and country, and that many of them are under the age of twenty-one, we realize that these men, though under twenty-one years of age, should be entitled to the same privileges as other citizens of our land. When the British Government and the Canadian Government appealed to their subjects throughout the Empire and asked for volunteers, they called for men between the ages of eighteen and forty-five years; they fixed the minimum age at eighteen years. No doubt the authorities felt that many a young man under 21 throughout the Empire was just as fit physically and mentally to be a soldier as were older men. I believe that fully one-third of the men who enlisted in the Middlesex regiment from my county and who have gone overseas, are under twenty-one years of age. Many of our young men, as has been stated by previous speakers, have made the supreme, the greatest possible sacrifice. Some of them will never return to the land from which they went. I could, if I so wished, mention several mothers in the community in which I live who are to-day mourning the loss of their sons, many of them under twenty-one years of age. I remember well, during August of last year when our home regiment was leaving our county, that a great many people gathered at the station to bid our boys farewell. I can see at this moment the anxiety shown by those mothers and parents on behalf of their sons. I can also see them bidding their sons good bye—some of them for the last time—and sending them away with their good wishes and their prayers. I listened the other day with a great deal of regret to the remarks made by two or three members of the Opposition, in which they attempted to reflect upon the character and habits of those young men while in England and France. During the six years that I have had the honour of being in this Parliament, I have never appreciated anything more than the words of the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Michael Clark) when he said, a few days ago, that it was not for us as Canadian citizens who had stayed at home to dictate for a moment as as to what our boys should do. Would any member of the Opposition—indeed, any man in this House or out of it— dare to say to the mothers who had sent their boys of eighteen overseas—boys who had gone voluntarily; boys who had the spirit to go and fight for their country—that these young men were not entitled to the privileges which other men of Canada have?

I wish to say a word—I was glad that the member for Brant (Mr. Fisher) mentioned it—regarding the Indians of my county. In the county of Middlesex we have a number of Indians, many of whom were among the first to respond to the call for service overseas and a number of whom have laid down their lives for their country. For a number of years those men have not had the privilege of the franchise such as the rest of us enjoy. They are an intelligent race of Indians, having their schools and their institutes. They are capable; they are good business men. An indication of their worth and their efficiency is found in the fact that although our reserve is a small one, nearly 100 of them have joined the colours and have gone overseas. I do think that those men should have the privilege of a franchise; I do think that they deserve it. We have in Canada many foreigners of all nationalities who really do not know anything about Canadian affairs or Canadian institutions and who, in a sense, are not helping to build Canada up or to make it great. They have not contributed to any extent to the different patriotic funds, nor yet have they enlisted. Yet these men, after they have lived in this country a certain length of time, are allowed to vote. Under the present Franchise Act our young men under 21 years of age cannot vote. Let me say, in conclusion, that I am perfectly in sympathy with this resolution. I believe that every man who has a uniform on, and is serving his country, though he be a boy in years, is entitled to the same privileges which the rest of us enjoy.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I am sure that the hon. member for Bonaventure (Hon. Charles Marcil) must feel extremely gratified because of the very strong expressions which have fallen from the lips of hon. gentlemen opposite this afternoon in reference to the extension of the franchise to all our soldier boys. The House will remember—you, Mr. Speaker, will especially remember—that on the occasion of the consideration of the Soldiers' Voting Bill the hon. member for Bonaventure and other members on this side of the House very strongly took the ground that any man who enlisted, whether he were under or upwards of 21 years of age, should be allowed the privilege of voting. The hon. member for Bonaventure contended that if the Canadian boy was fit to be a soldier and to go to the front; if he had sufficient maturity, physical and mental, to engage in the battle for the Empire, he was qualified to exercise his franchise and to have a voice in deciding how the affairs of Canada as a part of the Empire should be conducted. The hon. Minister of Justice, who had charge of the Bill, strongly opposed the proposal made by the hon. member for Bonaventure, a proposal which was embodied in the form of an amendment. The Minister of Justice urged very strongly, indeed, that the age limit should be 21. The Solicitor General also urged very strongly that the Bill was right; that there was no reason why Parliament should fix the age for exercising the franchise at less than 21 years; that the law applying to civilians in the matter of voting should apply also to those who were engaged in the military service. Perhaps I may be pardoned if I refer to the speeches that were made on that occasion. I do so because these gentlemen who to-day are arguing in favour of extending the privilege to our boys under 21 years of age then took a different view; they stood behind the Government in voting upon the amendment moved by the member for Bonaventure. If I am not mistaken, all the gentlemen who have spoken so warmly to-day in favour of this change in the law supported the Government in the view which they took on that occasion. At page 2,344 of Hansard, 1915, I find the following:

> Mr. MARCIL: Is the minister in a position to tell me what is the youngest age at which these volunteers are accepted? Is there an age limit fixed by the department?
> Mr. DOHERTY: I cannot say absolutely that there is an age limit fixed by the department, although I think that ordinary soldiers enlisting are accepted at 18 or 19 years of age, but there are buglers, drummers and boys acting in different capacities.
>
> Mr. LEMIEUX: Are there any scouts?
>
> Mr. DOHERTY: There are no boy scouts that I am aware of.
>
> Mr. LEMIEUX: I think there are.
> Mr. DOHERTY: There may be; I only say that there are none that I am aware of. But there are quite young boys in the position of doing military service, in regard to whom I think the general consensus of opinion would be that they would hardly be of an age at which they could be expected to exercise a mature judgment.

I am not sure whether the Minister of Inland Revenue expressed any opinion on that occasion, but he has recently argued that a man must attain the age of thirty years before he can safely exercise his judgment in such matters. The Minister of Justice proceeded:

> Unless for very strong reasons to the contrary, it seemed to those who were responsible for the introduction of the Bill that we must have some degree of maturity, and although it may perhaps be a little beyond what is absolutely required, we thought it the safer course to adhere to the age fixed in the law generally as being the age limit.

Then the member for Bonaventure said:

> Eighteen is the age fixed in the Militia Act for enlistment; I am speaking of the volunteer and not of buglers, drummers or boy scouts. In this case you may have a large number who have enlisted, but who, not having taken the oath as to age, would not become voters. An injustice is being done to the boy of 18, 19 or 20 years, who has enlisted, and who undergoes all the hardships and risks of war, if he is cast aside. I think he will feel that injustice very much, because he knows that he can get the Victoria Cross, the highest distinction for valour, no matter what age he is. I am in favour of the principle of giving the soldier a vote if he is a voter. I am also in favour of giving him a vote if he is not a voter, because the service he is rendering to his country entitles him to that consideration,

One would have thought that that argument, made so eloquently by the hon. member for Bonaventure, would appeal to the hon. gentlemen who have addressed the House in support of this resolution. Mr. Marcil continued:

but I am opposed to the Bill, because I do not think it guarantees that the ballot which the soldier casts will be the ballot which we will receive here. A very great injustice is being done to the boys of over 18 years of age by depriving them of their votes. The minister knows the old verse:

"Mais aux âmes bien nées, La valeur n'attend pas le nombre des années."

Boys of 18, 19 and 20, who have the spirit to enlist for the defence of their country, ought to be trusted to cast an intelligent vote. Napoleon Bonaparte was a general in chief of the army at 25. A young man of 18 should be given this right.

The following are the words of the Minister of Justice in reply to what many of us would regard as a very convincing argument:

Mr. DOHERTY: The boy under 21 years who, being a soldier, is not given the right that is given to a soldier who is over 21, suffers exactly the same injustice as the boy in civilian life of 19 or 20 suffers as compared with the man over 21 who may be in precisely similar circumstances of merit or demerit and who has his vote while the boy under the age of 21 has no vote. It is not only in military careers, but I think we have had cases of early maturity in civil life, one very prominent case being that of a gentleman who became Prime Minister of Great Britain at the age of 21. If the reason of the hon. member is right as regards military circles it ought to be equally right when applied to civilian circles. If it be a good argument that, because we find exceptional cases of maturity developed beyond what one's years would apparently lead one to look for, we should make a general rule departing from the age of 21 years, it would be as applicable to civil life as to military life. I am sorry to hear the expression used that any injustice is intended because after all from the voting point of view all that is to be said is that the boy of 18 does not gain something as compared with the soldier of 21 which he would not have gained had he not been a soldier as compared with any other man in the ordinary walks of life and 21 years of age. Perhaps we have not given, but we have not taken away.

Then Mr. Marcil says:

Mr. MARCIL: My sole reason for saying that we should give these boys the right to vote is because they have enlisted. That is the main reason for the wrong, if wrong there be. I do not see why a boy who is capable of bearing arms and serving his country at the age of 18 or 19 years should be debarred from exercising the franchise. The issues of the election may be more fully comprehended by the young man than the man of maturity. I am sorry that the minister has not extended common justice to those in the ranks above 18 years of age.

My hon. friend the Solicitor General was not convinced by the argument of the hon. member for Bonaventure, because on page 2347 of Hansard he is reported to have said:

What I arose chiefly to do was to put before the committee my own view as to the question raised by the hon. member for Bonaventure (Mr. Marcil) and repeated by the hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver), as to the extension of the franchise to all soldiers although they have not reached their majority. I take the view that the Bill in that respect is right. I do not look on the extension of the franchise to the soldiers as in any way a quid pro quo, as in any way a benignant action on the part of the state to him in virtue of his soldiership. It appears to me that in regard to the British franchise the law presumes, that if the individual man has a real patriotic interest in his country's affairs, and secondly, if he is competent to express that interest, that man is entitled to vote. We take certain precautions to ascertain whether he lives up to these two requirements—whether he has a real patriotic interest in his country's affairs and whether he is competent to express that interest. We say that he must be a resident, that he must live so long in a certain locality. If he is a rolling stone, we cannot presume that he has that fixed and determined interest that he otherwise will have. On the other hand, in order to ascertain whether he is competent to express his vote or not, we fix the age of twenty-one as the age of maturity at which he arrives at competency. Then we say that a judge by virtue of the restraints of his office is incompetent to express his interest. Then we come here and make an extension of the franchise in one respect; that is, we do not insist upon the condition of fixed residence. To that extent and no more, there is in this Bill an extension of the franchise.

The question came to a vote on April 14, 1915, as hon. gentlemen will see by a reference to Hansard on page 2538. Mr. Marcil then moved, seconded by the hon. member for Sunbury and Queens (Mr. H. H. McLean):

That this Bill be not now read a third time, but that it be referred back to the Committee of the Whole House, with instructions that they have power to amend the same by striking out the words "twenty-one" in the first line of section one and by inserting the word "eighteen" in place thereof.

Mr. Marcil made this further appeal to the House:

The House has already heard the arguments in support of this suggestion. I contend very respectfully that a man who has attained 18 years of age, who has undergone medical inspection, who is mentally and physically qualified to take up arms in the service of his country overseas, and who is willing to make the sacrifice of his life, if necessary, to defend the cause which he has at heart, should be on an equal footing with men of the age of 21. If the soldier who has attained the age of 21 years is to have the advantage of exercising the franchise, then it is an unjust and unfortunate discrimination that others who are serving their country should be deprived of that right. I think that this view will appeal to the whole of young Canada, which is taking a deep and patriotic interest in this matter.

This amendment was negatived on division. If I spoke at all upon the subject on that occasion—and I think I did—I took the view that the franchise should be given to young men of 18 years of age. I know I entertained that view, but I think all the members on the other side of the House who spoke on this subject expressed views in support of the position taken by the Minister of Justice and the Solicitor General, opposing the amendment moved by my hon. friend from Bonaventure. I am glad indeed to see that some hon. gentlemen opposite have changed their minds and that they are now entirely in accord with the views which were then put forward by the hon. member for Bonaventure. It will afford me great pleasure to support the resolution which has been moved by the hon. member for South Perth (Mr. Steele) who has spoken so eloquently, and I think the speeches which have been delivered so far have presented unanswerable arguments in favour of the resolution.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Mr. Speaker, the difficulty of reaching absolute fairness in the framing of any law is perhaps beyond the capacity of mortal man. In the framing of a franchise law the difficulty of approximating absolute fairness is greater perhaps than in any other sphere of legislation. The resolution introduced by the hon. member for South Perth covers a subject which in its wider scope had been under discussion in Parliament about two years ago. The hon. member's resolution refers only to one branch of the subject that was then before us for legislation, namely, as to whether we would be justified, in view of the very great services rendered their country by those of our military forces who are under the age of 21, in assuming they were both capable of exercising and entitled to the exercise of the franchise. At that time, differences of opinion were expressed in Parliament, and at that time, let me frankly say, I expressed the view that we could not assume both of the qualifications which I thought we should assume before we admitted to the franchise any class of our population.

We undoubtedly could assume that all who had enlisted for service overseas had at heart the best interests of their country, and from that standpoint they are undoubtedly entitled to all in the way of franchise that their country can give. I did not feel, however, that we could assume further, that they had by the fact of enlistment reached that age of maturity or that stage of mental development that we could differentiate them from the rest of our population in regard to the franchise. There seems, so far as the debate has gone, to be rather a general impression that we might have well gone farther, or at all events, in view of the far greater sacrifice than was then anticipated by many, we might now reconsider our position and do even more for the soldier than we were prepared to do then. That is undoubtedly the earnest and sincere desire of the mover of the resolution, who has stated his case briefly, concisely and fairly, and the desire in the main of those who have supported him. I do not intimate for one moment that the hon. member for St. John was not sincere in his position that these of our soldiers should be entitled to the franchise. But I do dread what seems to be the manifest truth, that he is not afraid to raise party divisions and antipathies in this House, even though they might result in the wreck of the legislation that he deems so dear. He endeavours to intimate that we on this side of the House took a very, very strong stand and argued most strenuously against this proposal, while on the other side of the House the case was entirely different. Two years ago he tried to make the same question of it, tried with all his might and all his ingenuity; he even went so far as to say that those who took a different position were occupying absurd ground, were arguing absurd contentions in the House. It may surprise hon. members who have not looked up the debates to learn that it was not a party question by any means, that there were differences of opinion on both sides of the House, and that on this side of the House the most pronounced, and may I say, the most emphatic, opinion that was expressed in agreement with the present position of the hon. member for South Perth was expressed by the Prime Minister himself. It may surprise even the hon. member for St. John to know that his own distinguished leader who sits to his left (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) spoke words consistent only with the then reading of the Bill, saying on that occasion that the Bill was right and should not be amended. I noticed the hon. leader of the Opposition applauding the hon. member for St. John in his reference to myself this afternoon, but I think it would be well for him to read Hansard, 1915, at page 2207, where he gave utterance to the following words when this very point was under discussion:

> We have laws and regulations the result of the wisdom and experience of ages, which have determined that we may expect the blood and the sacrifice of the soldier and yet that the soldier is not entitled to cast a vote in the administration of the country. That is so in this country; it is so in Great Britain; it is so in the United States. There are uniform laws governing the exercise of civil and political rights which no nation has yet contravened.

True words, and at no point in his utterances did he even intimate the opinion that it would have been wise for us at that time to contravene those laws and to admit men under 21 years of age to the franchise.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Hear, hear.

Mr. MEIGHEN: But it is still more interesting in view of what has just been said by the hon. member for St. John, to read the opinion given at that time by another very distinguished member of the Opposition, the hon. member for South Renfrew (Hon. Mr. Graham). He did not disguise his view at all. He expressed it very fairly, and certainly just as strongly as did any hon. member on either side of the House. The hon. member for South Renfrew used the following words on page 2350 of Hansard, 1915:

> I am strongly of the opinion that 21 is the proper age. I have not heard any good reason...

Although he had heard the hon. member for St. John on several occasions.

> I have not heard any good reason advanced why we should change from the age limit that we have always had. After mature deliberation it has been decided in this country that a man has not reached the proper years of maturity at which he is able to vote until he is 21. I do not think the fact of his going to the front changes the principle at all, for a man of 21 years of age is the same at the front as he is at home, loyal and brave and patriotic though he may be.

I do not need to go any further, to make it clear to the hon. member for St. John that in the former debate it would have been scarcely safe for him to characterize those who held views different from his own as absurd, or for him in this debate to endeavour to part the two sides of Parliament on such an issue as this; whether we ought to admit men under 18 to the franchise because they are serving their King.

It may be recalled that the Bill introduced in the old House was not a Government measure. It was introduced by another member and was referred to a committee, which committee, if I recall correctly, dealt with all subjects then before Parliament having to do with the franchise, and on the report of the committee the Bill was taken up by the Government and became law.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Taken up as a Government measure.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Became a Government measure, but it was not introduced as such. On the introduction of the Bill, and later during the debate on this point the Prime Minister expressed the view that the other would have been the better course, but undoubtedly he assented constitutionally to the Bill in the form it is in now. I have not the committee's report before me, but while I am on the point let me proceed to the vote described by the hon. member for St. John. It was a vote that was not a vote. There was no vote in Parliament. Why did the hon. member say that to the House of Commons?

Mr. PUGSLEY: I said the amendment was lost on division.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. member said there was a vote. I remember when this discussion was up before, I criticised the hon. member for St. John for characterizing those who expressed views different from his own as absurd, and he met me by saying just as he does now, that he had said no such thing. I recommended him to read Hansard on that occasion, and he saw I was right. Let him read Hansard again to-morrow and he will see I am right again.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I quoted from Hansard and I used the words "the amendment was lost on division." I used those very words.

Mr. MEIGHEN: We will just have to leave it to the great arbiter that always decides. Hansard will show that the hon. member at one stage of his remarks said that the question came to a vote.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Not a recorded vote. Every question is decided by a vote, but not necessarily a recorded vote.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I have never understood that when a motion is lost on division it is the same as when a motion is actually voted on and lost. For example, would the hon. member for South Renfrew (Mr. Graham) want it recorded that he had voted against his expressed convictions?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: The only difference in the deciding of questions in this House is, not that some are decided by a vote and some are decided otherwise, but that, while all are decided by a vote, in some cases the vote is recorded, and in other cases it is not recorded.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not think that is the theory at all. A motion may be lost on division without a vote. The effect of that is to declare that large numbers do not vote. There is only one way by which a member can vote, and that is by recording his vote. Mr. Speaker comes to the conclusion according to the number cast for or against—

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: The Speaker calls for an expression of opinion, and on the basis of that expression he says "I think the yeas have it; I think the nays have it." That is a vote, but it is not a recorded vote.

Mr. MEIGHEN: As I understand it, that is not a vote. It is a motion decided on division, but it cannot be argued that a number voted "yea" and a number voted "nay." That is the difference between a vote and an unrecorded division. The point is important, because, if it were decided by a vote, then the party division would be there which the hon. gentleman sought to establish, but there is no such record. It seemed to be the consensus of opinion of the House at the time that this was the course to pursue, and that is all about it.

With regard to the general scope of the legislation, it was deemed that, inasmuch as there would be a very great delay and very much to be done in order to take a vote of those who would be overseas, legislation should be provided in advance to take care of these contingencies. The legislation provided that the franchise should be given to those soldiers overseas, who, but for the fact that they were soldiers, would not be entitled to vote at all. It abolished in large degree the residential qualifications. It assumed that because a man was a British subject and fighting for his country, he had that permanent stake in the country which otherwise residential qualification was necessary to prove. And it went further in one respect than even this resolution. This resolution states that in order to qualify for—

Mr. ROSS: Will the hon. gentleman, before he goes further with his explanation, please state whether in his opinion an enlisted Indian twenty-one years old has a vote under the present law?

Mr. GRAHAM: If he is twenty-one years of age.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes. But in one respect the legislation went further than does the resolution of the hon. member for South Perth (Mr. Steele). The resolution calls upon us to give the franchise to soldiers of the overseas forces who are below the age of twenty-one, provided they are British subjects and were at the time of their enlistment resident in Canada. Under the law as it stands now a man in the overseas service has the right to vote even though, at the time of his enlistment, he was not a resident of Canada, provided that, six months prior to his enlistment, he had, during any thirty days, resided in any electoral division in Canada. He might have been a resident for thirty days six months before, and ceased to be a resident, but he would nevertheless be entitled to the franchise by virtue of his being an overseas soldier of the country. We did not, however, go to the extent of admitting to the franchise those below the age of twenty-one. Under the clause of the Act, once a man becomes an overseas soldier he is released from the limitations imposed upon the civilian and is entitled to vote, be he Indian or be of any other origin, so long as he is a British subject.

Mr. FISHER: With regard to the Indian vote. A moment ago it was stated in answer to the hon. member for West Middlesex (Mr. Ross) that the Indian soldier had a vote. That would only apply, as I understand it, in case an election should take place during the war. But if the soldier returns to this country he would not have a vote, would he?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I think that can be answered directly: No. But, it can be more usefully answered in the following way: The Soldiers' Voting Act as it is imprinted on my mind contemplated only the enfranchisement of soldiers while soldiers, and made no provision for their having the vote on their return to Canada. I recall that at the time that matter was brought to the attention of the House by the hon. member for North Bruce (Mr. Hugh Clark) and it was explained then that all that the Bill contemplated doing was to extend this franchise, in the manner provided, to the soldiers enlisted for overseas service, and that it did not go on to make any special provision for soldiers after they returned. Consequently, speaking without the careful preparation on the subject that I should like to have made, I think the effect is this—that the benefits accruing under the Act terminate just as soon as a man ceases to be a soldier in the overseas service. Then he rests for his right to the franchise, as to everything else, upon the ordinary law. Consequently, the Indian, not entitled to vote under the Dominion Elections Act as soon as he ceases to be a soldier overseas would cease to exercise the franchise. It may be a question whether we should or should not legislate, at the proper time, with regard not only to the right of the Indian, and perhaps to others who are ordinarily excepted, and who have ceased to be overseas soldiers, but also with regard to the overseas returned soldiers generally. For it would be just conceivable that under the law as it stands now the returned soldier, having, by the fact of his discharge, lost his special rights under the Soldiers' Voting Act, and perhaps not having had time to qualify under the Dominion Elections Act, might find himself debarred from exercising the franchise. That is a subject, however, not covered by the motion of the hon. member for South Perth (Mr. Steele), and so I will not deal with it further at this time.

Now, as to the questions specifically covered by the resolution. It is argued by the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Michael Clark) that manhood is the basis of the franchise after all, and that it is to be presumed that manhood is fully reached when enrolment to fight in this great war has taken place.

That argument must have its appeal. It may indeed be a better statement of the case to say that mental maturity is the qualification for the franchise. It is only natural, as this war progresses and as its horrors multiply and its perils increase, that hon. members of this House, as indeed citizens of this country generally, should feel more and more inclined to overcome all restraints, to throw aside all traditions and to do more and more for the soldiers. That is natural. At the same time we must be careful that we do not go too far. This resolution as it stands, for example, does not place the restriction that was in the mind of the hon. member for Bonaventure (Mr. Marcil) when he moved his amendment two years ago. The resolution would affect even those under 18 years of age serving perhaps as buglers and trumpeters. We might go to the extent of admitting those between 18 and 21 years. This subject is worthy of consideration and in view especially of the opinions expressed in this debate it will receive the consideration of the Government.

Mr. E. M. MACDONALD: I understood the Solicitor General to say that he thought that Indians who were wards of the Government and were not citizens of this country but who were overseas would have the right to vote because they might be said to come within the definition of British subjects 21 years of age. But does my hon. friend think when he uses that language that he will be able to reconstruct his ward and make of him a citizen, a subject or a legal person, in the sense in which the word as used in the statute, which would give him the status of a person having the right to vote?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The Act does not use the term "citizen"; nor do I know of any legal finding to the effect that an Indian is not a person. I think I know what is in the mind of the hon. member for Pictou.

Mr. E. M. MACDONALD: He is not a person in the legal sense.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I know in the courts of England, in their construction of franchise legislation have, in one case, at all events, found that a woman was not, in the sense of the franchise act in force at that time, a person. I do not know of any finding to the effect that a ward of the Government, such as a Canadian Indian, is not a person or is not in a position to be known as a subject of Great Britain. I have always understood that an Indian is a subject of the British Empire, that he is a British subject and my opinion, whatever it may be worth, is that under the Act as it stands defining a person entitled to the franchise as a British subject of the age of 21 years, all British subjects, including Indians, while they are enlisted for overseas service, are entitled as such to the franchise.

Mr. MACDONALD: I would not personally be desirous of being understood as being absolute on that point. I think a ward of the State is a person or subject within the meaning of this law and I do not think it was ever intended that he should have a vote at the time the matter was discussed.

Mr. DUNCAN C. ROSS (West Middlesex): It is a customary thing in this House now-a-days to hear the Solicitor General (Mr. Meighen) advancing views, as he has done this afternoon, which are a refutation of opinions which he has put forward during the last four or five years. It is also an ordinary occurrence to see him struggling to make a defence, but I do not think I ever saw him struggle so vigorously as this afternoon. Some one has stated that consistency is a virtue. I would not like to say that inconsistency is a vice, Mr. Speaker, but with our friends on the opposite side of the House, in recent times, it has certainly become a habit. Their inconsistency in regard to the Canadian navy is well remembered—I do not want to make party capital out of that—their inconsistency in regard to free wheat is fresh in the memory of the House; their inconsistency in regard to the soldiers' votes is so fresh that it cannot be forgotten, and now we have this new inconsistency of the Solicitor General in regard to this question. I cannot quarrel with the resolution. If a man is courageous enough; if he is patriotic enough; if he is man enough to offer to fight in freedom's cause; if he is strong enough to fight his country's battles, he should have the right to say how the country shall be governed. I for one shall be only too glad to have the verdict of the soldiers who are fighting our battles at the front in regard to how this Government is administering the affairs of Canada. I believe that when the result is known the Government will not be very glad, if I can judge from the letters I have received from the front, and from what I have been told by returned soldiers..

However, that is in passing. There is one feature of the resolution which is not made clear, nor do I know if the mover made it clear in his speech. I would ask the hon. member for South Perth (Mr. Steele) if he intended to include women nurses in his resolution because it does not say "male" subjects of the British Empire.

Mr. STEELE: No, I did not intend to include them in the resolution, but I will be prepared to support a proposal that nurses should get the franchise, when the question comes up for discussion.

Mr. D. C. ROSS: I think it is only just that if British soldiers are going to be given votes because they are British soldiers, British nurses should also be given votes. However, there was a point made by the hon. member for South Perth that I desire to refer to, and that is in regard to the right of the enlisted Indian to vote. There should be no exception made of the enlisted Indian in such a matter. No distinction is made between the Indian and any other man with regard to the terms of enlistment. It may be true that the Indian is a ward of the state, but my contention is that when a ward of the state becomes the valiant guardian of the state, as many of the Indians in my own riding have, he is entitled to the vote at an election for members of this House. The Indians in the southern part of West Middlesex have enlisted in large numbers. Before the war they were a very important part of the 26th Battalion Middlesex Light Infantry, and one of the best companies in that battalion was comprised of Indians. They were amongst the best drilled and best officered of the Canadian militia, and they conducted themselves as Canadian soldiers should. They have gone to the front, they have covered themselves with honour in more than one fight, and some of them have given their lives for their country. My contention is that if you are going to give enlisted soldiers the franchise you have no right to make an exception of the Indian. I would point out to the Government that two years ago I asked whether the Indian soldier would be given a vote in case he enlisted, and the Government gave me a very evasive answer. It is the duty of the Government, if they desire to be sincere in this matter, to amend the Soldiers' Franchise Act, if necessary to make it absolutely clear that enlisted Indians are entitled to the vote. It may seem clear that they have a vote, but when I read the Soldiers' Voting Act there is a grave doubt in my mind. The body of this Act leads you to believe enlisted Indians have a right to vote, but the oath in the schedule of the same leaves the matter in doubt. I would suggest, therefore, to the Government that this point be cleared up. For my own part, I cannot see why any person can take any very strong exception to the resolution of the hon. member from South Perth (Mr. Steele), and I am prepared to support it.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess.

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. ONESIPHORE TURGEON (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, I merely wish to put myself on record as supporting the resolution now before the House and to state the chief motive which actuates me in supporting it, as well as that which caused me to support a somewhat similar resolution brought before the House two years ago by the hon. member for Bonaventure (Hon. Charles Marcil.)

I shall not enter into an argument as to differentiations relating to a division or a vote. When I rise in this House and answer the Speaker "yea" or "nay," I rise with the determination of giving my vote publicly and having it on record. When this matter was before the House two years ago I, for one, advised the Minister of Justice to delay his Bill until the next session. There was no occasion for hurrying at the time; there were two long years within which to frame a Bill which would be more perfect than the one presented by the minister at that time. Had this advice been accepted, the provision which we are now urging, as well as others advantageous to the soldier, might have been inserted in the Bill.

The chief reason why I support this resolution is that our enlistment has been carried on not by conscription, but by voluntary enlistment. The soldier 18 or 19 years of age who is in the trenches to-day went there voluntarily, thus giving indication of his intelligence and of his patriotism. The age of 21 has been recognized all over the world not only as that at which a man may commence to exercise his franchise, but, in every line of business, as the age at which the ordinary human being is capable of assuming the duties of citizenship. A young man has to wait until he is 21 years of age before he is able to administer an inheritance left to him by his father or left to the family of which he is the head. This does not mean that at the age of 18 or 19 a young man is not capable of assuming such duties. It means that Governments have in ordinary cases no evidence upon which they may make a distinction and extend these privileges to any one under the age of 21. But when a young man of 18 is impelled by a sense of duty to fight for his country, thus giving evidence of his intelligence and patriotism, the Government has direct evidence of his capacity to exercise the rights of citizenship as well as the duties pertaining to his family life. It is not only in the universities and colleges that we find young men who are gifted with that degree of intelligence and patriotism. In other walks of life we find them; among the workmen and in our industries, where they rise rapidly by the intelligence with which they have been gifted. Many young farmers at the age of 18 are able to assume the duties formerly carried on by their fathers, and to administer the business of the farm with as much intelligence and success as if they were 21. The young man, therefore, who gives expression to his intelligence and to his willingness to make the supreme sacrifice for his country, furnishes a criterion upon which a Government may act. To grant these young men the privileges of the franchise would be a recognition of their spirit of sacrifice as well as an encouragement to those who have not yet gone. It is, therefore, with the view of expressing our gratitude to the young men who have gone, as well as to encourage those of 18 and 19 who have not yet gone, that I ask the Government to forget the past and have a measure passed at once, based on this resolution, which will give the vote to every young man who has gone to fight or who is to go. This is one of the reasons why I support the resolution; concerning many others of less importance, I shall not now take up the time of the House.

Mr. DONALD SUTHERLAND (South Oxford): Mr. Speaker, it is rather refreshing to hear the hon. gentleman who has just sat down (Mr. Turgeon) advise the House to forget the past and to deal with questions as they confront us to-day. I do not know that a more stinging rebuke was ever addressed to members on his side of the House than that which has been administered by the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat. In reading the resolution I thought it was one that would appeal to every hon. member of this House. I think it is advisable that I should read it again, in view of some of the remarks that have fallen from the lips of hon. gentlemen who have already spoken. It is as follows:

> That, in the opinion of this House, the Government should introduce legislation at this session which will extend the franchise to every British citizen who enlisted with the Canadian forces for overseas service, and who was a resident of Canada at the time of enlistment.

This is the question before the House, as introduced by the hon. member for South Perth (Mr. Steele), a man who has the reputation of being very fair and very moderate in his views and who does not speak in the House unless it is on a question that he feels is of vital interest to the country. I believe that his realization of its importance is what caused him to introduce this resolution.

Several other members of the House spoke along similar lines to those followed by the mover of the resolution, but, much to my-surprise, one of the oldest and most experienced parliamentarians in this House, the hon. member for St. John, had his desk piled up with authorities in an endeavour to fasten something of a recriminatory and political nature that happened two years ago upon hon. gentlemen on this side of the House. When we assembled here on Saturday last and listened with breathless attention to the words of liquid fire that were uttered by the eloquent French statesman who was with us on that occasion, I could not help feeling that during the remainder of this session there would be less party recrimination, less waste of time, a greater consciousness of the stern duty with which we are confronted, a desire to deal with matters in a fairer manner than we have done in the past. I do not like to recall these things, but just before the House rose at six o'clock, the hon. member for West Middlesex (Mr. Ross) indulged in remarks that were quite uncalled for. He endeavoured to make it appear that we on this side of the House were inconsistent in supporting a resolution of this kind. I wish to say on my own behalf that when this question was up on a previous occasion I supported it as strongly as possible. I urged on the Government the advisability of extending the franchise to the men who had been more fully seized of their duty to the State than those who remained at home. There are in the ranks of the Canadian forces to-day grim, silent, battle-scarred veterans of this war who went over with the first contingent and who are not yet 21 years of age. That is something that we did not have two years ago when the matter was before the House; that is something that is well known to every hon. member, and it is a reason why we should carefully consider this resolution which has been introduced by the hon. member for South Perth. Is it right or fair that should an election occur in this country, those men, after two years of hard fighting and undergoing terrible hardships, should be deprived of their right to vote? I am more fully seized of the necessity for a Dominion Franchise Act, universally applicable and uniform throughout the Dominion of Canada, than I have ever been before. If my memory serves me aright, as I have not gone through the records as the hon. member for St. John has done, with a view to finding out certain things that appeal to him, one of the reasons why the age was fixed at 21 years, was that the age of 21 was fixed in the provincial lists, which are used in Dominion elections.

[Mr. Sutherland.]

There are other matters to be considered in a Franchise Act than merely extending it to our soldiers at the front. We must also put in that Act safeguards that will not render futile the desires and wishes of those men who are fighting on our behalf. Owing to the cosmopolitan character of the population of this country, there are many men in Canada who have not yet become thoroughly Canadianized, men who cherish yet in their breasts a strong sympathy for the countries from which they came, and at the present time we and the Allies are gripped in a death struggle with the countries from which these men have come. There is this question to be considered in connection with the resolution. Other resolutions affecting the franchise will come up in the course of this session and these matters ought to be taken into consideration together and, as I have stated before, a uniform Act enacted which will meet the requirements of the country. A gradual evolution has been taking place in this country during the past few years. During the last two years we have been confronted with conditions such as have never before been experienced. The wide disparity that exists to-day in the franchise between the different provinces must be removed in Federal elections; we must see that safeguards are enacted that will prevent an injustice being done to ourselves, to our country, and to the cause for which we are fighting. This resolution is so reasonable and fair that I regret very much that it has not appealed to every hon. member, and that some have, instead of expressing themselves in favour of it, rather left the impression that they are in favour of it but have stated that somebody on this side of the House or somebody somewhere else had opposed something of a similar nature on a previous occasion. This measure has never been before the House before, and we are in a better position to-day to realize what is right and fair by those men who are waging this battle on our behalf than we were at any time in the past. I am heartily in favour of the resolution and I believe this resolution and other motions of a similar nature affecting the franchise should be considered and an Act enacted, which will do justice to the occasion and provide safeguards for the interest of our country against the enemy who may be within our gates.

Mr. D. D. McKENZIE (North Cape Breton): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend (Mr. Sutherland) seems to take pleasure in supposing that he has not been speaking in a partisan manner. If I understand partisan talk, the keenest and most vivid lightning partisan talk that has been given in this House this afternoon has been given to us now. There is no reason why this question should be discussed from a partisan standpoint; it should be discussed in a cool, calm, deliberate fashion. I venture to suggest quietly, from the attitude of the group of gentlemen on the other side of the House who spoke about the enfranchisement of Indians and others, that it is just a little play as to who will get the good feelings and good intentions and good will of the Indians in this country. That is about the full force and effect of this resolution so far as I understand it.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Does the hon. gentleman imply that most of the men who have gone from Canada are Indians?

Mr. McKENZIE: They are not all gone yet anyway. I am sorry that I should be interrupted in this way. In considering questions of this kind, most of us think we ought to pay some attention to what the law of the country is to-day. It is easy enough to introduce resolutions, and I have no doubt in the world that the hon. member for South Perth (Mr. Steele) who introduced this resolution this afternoon, did so in good spirit and with a view to conferring the franchise upon the soldiers; but my hon. friend and other hon. members must understand that for the last 20 years or more this House and the Senate of Canada have dealt with this question of the franchise and have practically placed the whole question in the hands of the provinces and have denuded themselves of any power in connection with it. That question has stood the battle and the breeze for over 20 years, and it is not a light matter to come now as we are doing to disturb the whole machinery of government in connection with this matter. Section 10 of chapter 6 of the Revised Statutes of Canada 1906, says:

> The qualifications necessary to entitle any person to vote at a Dominion election in any province shall, except as herein otherwise provided, be those established by the laws of that province as necessary to entitle such person to vote in the same part of the province at provincial election.

That is the law of Canada to-day. Each province has the right to say what the franchise shall be, and once that franchise is established by that province it becomes the franchise of the Dominion. I take it that the representatives of the different provinces of Canada in the different legislatures are just as loyal as we are and just as appreciative of what belongs of right to the soldiers at the front as we are, and the power is theirs to extend that franchise to the soldiers if they so desire. They have the machinery for the preparation of the lists; there will be no disturbance of the present conditions in any province of Canada if the provincial legislatures so desire to extend the franchise, and I think we should be content with passing resolutions in this House recommending that the different Parliaments in the nine provinces of Canada should do so. If we pass this resolution to-day how are we going to deal with the lists? We have no machinery belonging to us in any province in Canada to deal with the lists. For some years we had in this country a Dominion Franchise Act, and I think both Liberals and Conservatives got tired of it. It was repealed by the late Government and a new condition of things brought into play. I was not in Parliament at the time that the Dominion Franchise Act, or the Revising Barristers' Act, as it might be called, was repealed, but I do not think there was any strenuous opposition to its repeal. I have been here for a good many years and I have never heard any Conservative, either a member of Government or a supporter of Government, saying that the old Dominion Franchise Act should come into force; everyone seems to be perfectly content with the present condition of things. Some of the provincial Governments may be Conservative and others Liberal in their politics, but everyone seems to be content that the preparation of the lists and the conduct of the franchise are carried on fairly and honestly in this country. If the resolution of my hon. friend consisted in a recommendation to the provinces for an extension of the franchise in any way that would commend itself to my mind I would be more in favour of it, but we are taxing ourselves with a great deal of responsibility if we are going to pass a Franchise Act for the soldiers and furnish all the machinery necessary for that purpose. It is not the intention that the votes of soldiers shall be taken at the front, and, therefore, the resolution of my hon. friend is not so important as it appears to be on the surface, because the intention of the Prime Minister is evidently that the soldiers shall come home before anything is done, and after they return they will be subject to the conditions of the provinces in which they live and the provincial authorities will deal with the subject. At page 41 of Hansard of this year the Prime Minister is reported as having said:—

I know something of the conditions at the front, and I venture to put this thought before the House and the country; the men at the front will be not only practically, but actually, disfranchised if an election does take place in this country while they are in the trenches. That is my conviction. I say they would be actually disfranchised because, although I render every tribute to my hon. friend the Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty) and the committee which had in hand the preparation of the Soldiers Voting Act of 1915, I am not disposed to think that the arrangements made in that Act or in any other act that could be devised are such as to enable those men to vote, or at least any considerable number of them. You cannot predict what conditions may exist. Supposing an election came on in this country when the fiercest drive of the war was taking place. Do you imagine that the paymasters of those regiments and their commanding officers could busy themselves with handing out ballots to men whose souls were engrossed and whose lives were at stake in the enterprise in which they were engaged? There is something more than that. I say that those men at the front have not it in their heart or their soul to consider matters of party controversy under the conditions with which they are there confronted. I believe those men would want to put aside any one who came to talk to them about political issues or partisan controversy, under conditions of life or of death, of victory or of defeat such as confront them in the trenches or while making a drive to bring this war to an end. Further than that, there may be perhaps a hundred thousand men not in France. You might be able to have some of those men to vote for Government or for Opposition, not for a candidate, as provided in the fact alluded to; but do you imagine that those men who are putting their lives to the supreme test in going overseas to fight for their country, will be greatly interested in political issues, or that they will desire to hear political speeches, or that they will welcome the distribution of partisan literature?

This was the Prime Minister's idea of this thing. He thought the men should not be bothered with political matters at all, that they would not stand for speeches or political literature of any kind being distributed among them; they should be left to discharge their duties which they were so worthily discharging. When our soldiers come back from the war, I am sure they will submit themselves to the laws of the different provinces to which they belong, and if this resolution was confined to a recommendation by this House to the different provincial governments to make what changes in the franchise they deemed advisable on behalf of the soldiers, leaving it to them to decide upon the qualifications as to age and so forth, I would have nothing but commendation for it. But I do not think it is necessary to ask this Parliament to start the huge machinery that would be necessary in order to do something which in the end would amount to nothing, because it is not the intention to take the votes of soldiers while they are away; and when they come back they will of course be satisfied to accept the law as it stansds on the statute -book of the different provinces.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, when I hear so much being said and suggested on the other side of the House as to amendments to the franchise Acts, I fear there is in contemplation some very substantial and radical proposals in respect to the franchise law of the Dominion. As the hon. member for Cape Breton (Mr. McKenzie) has pointed out, as matters now stand, the creation of a federal franchise is entirely governed by provincial statute, and so long as that is the case it seems to me a resolution such as is here proposed is hardly a practical one. However, I did not rise particularly to say that. I yield to no one in my admiration of the gallantry and heroism of the Canadian soldier. I hope when he returns to Canada there will be a warm spot in every heart and a place at every fireside for him. But I do not see any necessity at this moment for considering seriously the proposal of the hon. member for Perth (Mr. Steele). I think the soldier is more concerned about other matters at the present moment than whether or not a soldier under 21 shall be entitled to vote in the event of a war-time election. The soldier, even though he be not 21, is a manly man, and I do not think he expects us to reconstruct the established laws of this country to meet his particular case. So far as I know there is no demand from the soldiers concerned for such a change in our law as is proposed in this resolution. After the legislation of 1915 was enacted, I came in contact with a great many soldiers in the city in which I reside, and availed myself of the opportunity to ascertain their opinions on the practicability and advisability of that legislation. I found, of course, differences of opinion, but a great number of them were entirely opposed to the legislation.

I think a more practical question and one far more likely to engage the sympathy and intelligent consideration of the young soldier at the front would be, how are we going to provide men in this country to take the place of those who have fallen? Or, what are we going to do to provide for our soldiers who will return to Canada after the cessation of the war? I do not think there is any demand for such legislation as this resolution seeks. I think it would accomplish little good. I have listened very carefully and attentively to the remarks made by hon. gentlemen who have spoken to this resolution, but I have heard nothing which would justify me in expressing my adherence to the principle of the resolution.

Mr. J. G. TURRIFF (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat has said, it would seem from the remarks of hon. gentlemen opposite that some change in the franchise Act is in contemplation by the Government. If there is not going to be any change this session or before the next election, what is the object of our passing this resolution? If there is going to be a change we ought to know it now; we cannot deal intelligently with this question until we know whether or not there is going to be a change. I did not get up for the purpose of continuing this debate, but rather to ask the Government if it is their intention, as has been suggested by hon. gentlemen opposite, to make a new election law for the Dominion with a uniform franchise for the whole country, instead of continuing to use the provincial system which has worked so well for a great number of years.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I can answer the hon. gentleman at once. There is no change in the Franchise Act in contemplation at all. This resolution merely affects the Soldiers Votes Bill, and consideration has been promised in the usual way.

Mr. TURRIFF: It will affect more than that if this Government are going to make a voters' list for the whole Dominion as has been suggested by hon. gentlemen opposite. I repeat that we should know whether there is going to be a change or not before we can discuss this resolution intelligently.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I have given the answer.

Mr. E. M. MACDONALD (Pictou): I would ask the mover of the resolution if his intention is to ask the Government to introduce an amendment to the Soldiers Votes Bill of 1915, so as to include those in the overseas forces who are under 21.

Mr. STEELE: Not being a lawyer I would not like to detail the method which should be followed in order to give every soldier who has enlisted for overseas service the right to vote. The thought that impelled me to introduce this resolution was that if a general election takes place either during the war or within a couple of years afterwards many of the men who are fighting our battles in France to-day so ably and so gallantly will be unable to cast a ballot to say how the affairs of Canada shall be run.

Mr. E. M. MACDONALD: I intend to say a word or two before my hon. friend closes the debate, and I merely wished to ascertain before speaking how he expected the resolution to be put into effect. I would like to direct my hon. friend's attention to the wording of it:

> That, in the opinion of this House, the Government should introduce legislation at this session which will extend the franchise to every British citizen who enlisted with the Canadian Forces for Overseas Service, and who was a resident of Canada at the time of enlistment.

Is this resolution intended to embody a request to the Government to amend the Act of 1915 so as to put this provision into effect?

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. Do I understand that the mover of the resolution was proceeding with his reply?

Mr. E. M. MACDONALD: No. He was merely answering a question of mine.

Mr. STEELE: In answer to my hon. friend, I am merely asking the House to enunciate a principle, and am leaving it entirely to the Government to decide how that principle shall be put into legislation. I am not a lawyer, but I imagine that an amendment to the Soldiers' Votes Bill of 1915 would not be sufficient to carry out the intention of this resolution.

Mr. E. M. MACDONALD: Unfortunately, my hon. friend really does not know what he wants, judging from the answer which he was good enough to vouchsafe to my question. The attitude which hon. gentlemen would take towards this resolution would naturally depend somewhat upon what my hon. friend really has in mind. The Solicitor General told us a few moments ago that it was not the intention of the Government to introduce any legislation of a general character dealing with the franchise.

My hon. friend proposed the resolution which I read a few moments ago. This resolution purports to ask the Government to introduce legislation this session to extend the franchise to members of the overseas forces under twenty-one years of age. If he wished to effectuate the desire he has expressed in moving this resolution, there is no reason why he should not have introduced a Bill to amend Chapter 11 of the Statutes of 1915 by simply striking out the words "of twenty-one years of age or upwards." He has gone a very long way to work if he really wishes to attain results. Though not a lawyer, he is a professional man and is Chairman of one of the Committees of this House; and I am afraid he is altogether too modest when he puts forward his supposed lack of legal knowledge as a reason why he did not take the direct course to the object he has in view. His speech to-day showed that he has read the statute. He is aware that it was passed by this House at the instance of the Minister of Justice, and that its introduction was the result not of a mere whim but of a well-considered policy, and that it was fully discussed in the House before its enactment into law. By the method I have suggested he could have proposed the amendment of this statute, and, had he done so, it is probable that by this time his Bill would be before us for second reading and could be crystallized into legislation at once. So I am at a loss to understand what he means by the circuitous method in which he has submitted this matter to the House. If it had been presented in concrete form as an amendment to the Statute of 1915, so far as I am concerned, the proposition would have had my zealous and hearty support. There could be no question of it passing, for it was made perfectly clear by my hon. friend from St. John (Mr. Pugsley) this afternoon, that my desk-mate, the hon. member for Bonaventure (Mr. Marcil) in 1915 moved an amendmend providing that every one over eighteen years of age should be entitled to a vote if he had enlisted for overseas service. So, had the hon. member for South Perth followed the course that I have suggested hon. gentlemen on this side who voted in 1915 in favour of the resolution of the hon. member for Bonaventure (Mr. Marcil) would have supported him. Notwithstanding the characteristic argument of the Solicitor General (Mr. Meighen) it was hon. gentlemen opposite who voted in 1915 that the hon. member for Bonaventure was wrong when he proposed to give the franchise to members of the overseas service under twenty-one years of age. No doubt the hon. gentleman (Mr. Steele) forgot that the issue had been raised. Of course, the Solicitor General must needs attempt to show that my hon. friend from St. John (Mr. Pugsley), in calling attention to the fact that my desk-mate had proposed this change two years ago, was playing politics. Of course he does not mean these little pleasantries—

Mr. MEIGHEN: I did not say that.

Mr. E. M. MACDONALD: Then, perhaps the hon. gentleman will tell us what he did say?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I said that this was not a matter of politics now and had not been two years ago; that each side was divided, their members taking contrary views.

Mr. E. M. MACDONALD: And what did the hon. gentleman say about my hon. friend from St. John?

Mr. MEIGHEN: That to-day he was endeavouring to make it so.

Mr. E. M. MACDONALD: That is, that the hon. member for St. John was endeavouring to make this a political question, because he called the attention of the House to the fact that two years ago hon. gentlemen on this side had proposed this very thing—

Mr. MEIGHEN: Some of them.

Mr. E. M. MACDONALD: —which hon. members on the other side have now discovered, apparently for the first time, ought to be done. At that time they did not want it done. Let me remind the Solicitor General, with regard to the homilies he is fond of delivering concerning hon. members on this side, of the old proverb, evil is to him who evil thinks. He must not believe that because he happens to sit on the treasury benches that he alone is the embodiment of statesmanship, and that he could not possibly descend from his high pedestal and himself engage in talking politics. He knows that he makes that descent often; that he has to; that when hon. gentlemen opposite get into trouble he is the Moses who is called upon to lead them out of that trouble. Of course, he thoroughly believes that on such occasions he is not playing politics, but is performing a high and patriotic duty. And equally, of course, when my hon. friend from St. John, in that kindly manner of his, suggests in all candor that we on this side were prepared to put this amendment on the statute books which the hon. member for South Perth (Mr. Steele) wants us to support to-day, the Solicitor General deems it his patriotic duty to rise in his might and denounce my mild and kindly friend on the ground that he is endeavouring to introduce politics. I think the Solicitor General had better refrain from these homilies, for wisdom will not die with hon. gentlemen opposite, nor patriotism either.

I regret that this proposal has not been brought before the House in the form of an amendment to this Act. Let me point out that my hon. friend from Cape Breton North (Mr. McKenzie) is right in his criticism. The unquestioned policy of this country for many years has been to accept the franchise as laid down by the provincial legislatures, having in view the fact that they are in touch with local conditions and have control in matters of municipal organization. Many years ago there was a question between the parties as to a federal franchise, but that has long since disappeared. We now follow the system which obtains in every great federation of states, the franchise of the several states being accepted. As has been suggested, that is our position with regard to woman suffrage. Certain provinces have decided that their women shall have the right to vote, while certain other provinces have not so far accepted the principle of women suffrage. The right to vote given to females in certain provinces is recognized under our statute so far as those provinces are concerned. The only exception to our legislation upon that subject was made in the Bill introduced by the Minister of Justice in 1915, and now appearing in our statute book as chapter 11 of the statutes of that year. We were then creating machinery under which the votes of the men who were overseas, or congregated in camps in Canada, Bermuda or elsewhere, might be recorded. We were not so much making a new franchise law but rather a new electoral law. But incidentally to the providing of machinery for the taking of this vote, there was introduced a clause to give the franchise to every man of the overseas forces, twenty-one years or over, who was a British subject, no matter what his residence or his property qualification. This, I say, is the only exception that has been recognized in this Parliament for a long time to the principle that the provinces shall fix the franchise. I am glad to know from the Solicitor General that it is not the desire to depart from this accepted principle.

I am inclined to support the resolution of my hon. friend (Mr. Steele) on the assumption that it is his desire to ask the Government to introduce an amendment to the Act of 1915, so as to provide that every member of the overseas forces who is a British subject shall be entitled to vote. It seems to me this is a proposition concerning which there cannot be much question. As to the position, in this relation, of the Indians, that is a very large question, and one involving grave considerations. There may be provinces in which, though the Indians are wards of the Government and dependent upon the bounty of the citizens of Canada for their support, the argument might be in favour of extending to them the right to vote. But in other provinces there are conditions which make it impossible to give to these people, who are the children of the state, the right to exercise the franchise jointly with the citizens. I do not wish, therefore, to be understood as acceding to the proposition that this amendment, providing that those who are under 21 years of age shall have the right to vote, can be made so general as to give recognition to the proposition that Indians shall be given the right to vote. The conditions are entirely different. It is questionable whether there is any necessity for this legislation at all. In some of the provinces—I know of two already—legislation has been passed which provides that every person who has gone overseas shall have the right to vote. Two of the western provinces have, by amendment to their Franchise Acts, provided that that shall be done, and in at least one of the Maritime Provinces a similar provision has been made.

Mr. D. C. ROSS: So has Ontario.

Mr. E. M. MACDONALD: Therefore, the proposition narrows itself down to a very fine point, indeed, and it is questionable whether the House is called upon to interfere at all except in so far as it may be that the Government would recede from the position which they, through the Minister of Justice, took two years ago and amend the Act of 1915 so as to strike out the words " of twenty-one years of age."

Mr. A. B. COPP (Westmorland): Mr. Speaker, I desire to draw the attention of the House for a moment to the question that arises in the minds of several hon.

gentlemen as to whether it is the intention of my hon. friend from South Perth (Mr. Steele) merely to amend the Act to give votes to soldiers while reducing the age at which they are entitled to exercise the franchise from 21 to 18 years, or whether it is the intention to change the electoral machinery entirely and take the privilege of providing the voters' lists away from the different provinces. In several of the provinces they have already taken action with regard to the exercise of the franchise by soldiers. Last year the legislature of New Brunswick made an amendment to the Elections Act providing that all soldiers, whether overseas or at home, and whether their names were enrolled on the voters' lists or not, should be entitled to vote at elections. The section reads as follows:—

> Who at any election held during the present war, or within the calender year next succeeding the declaration of peace, if he shall have served in the Canadian Expeditionary Force, or in the British Army or on Home Service in the present war, was at the time of his enlistment a bona fide resident of, and domiciled in the province of New Brunswick, and is at the time of tendering his vote a bona fide resident of, or domiciled in the district in which such vote is tendered; provided that no person discharged from service because of misconduct shall be qualified to vote under this sub-section.

So, the province of New Brunswick provided that all soldiers should be entitled to vote whether they had served overseas or in home defence? During the election held in New Brunswick in February a number of soldiers came to the polls and cast their ballots. Their names were not on the lists but they came there according to this Act and exercised their franchise. There was some question whether, under the Act, a soldier under the age of 21 years could vote, but both parties, anxious that the soldiers should exercise the franchise, offered no objection and any soldier who appeared at the poll was allowed to cast his ballot. I understand from my hon. friend from West Middlesex (Mr. Ross) that they have made provision for the soldiers' votes in Ontario, they have done so in the western provinces, I do not know about Nova Scotia, but I have no doubt that the different provinces will enact legislation with regard to the soldiers' vote. It seems to me it is interfering with provincial rights when we attempt to legislate with regard to the franchise and that the question had better be left to the respective provinces. In so far as I have been able to learn, the experiment in my own province has worked out most satisfactorily.

[Mr. Copp.]

Mr. R. B. BENNETT (Calgary): Mr. Speaker, I do not purpose making any extended observations on this resolution, but I desire to say that I shall support it. There is a certain amount of principle involved in the resolution and I think we should steadily keep in mind the principles that should govern with respect to the granting of the franchise either for federal and national purposes or provincial and local purposes. If history has taught us anything it has taught us at least that the exercise of the franchise is a matter of very serious import to the life of the state. It has taught us that we have men within the state who have now the right to exercise the franchise who, at least, are not the supporters of the state and its great enterprises to the extent to which they should be. Now, I lay down two principles that must govern in a matter of this kind. First, in respect to local and provincial matters, the provinces should be the best and, in fact, the only, judges as to who should vote. Men and women can vote and vote freely upon local issues, on matters that are not beyond the competence of a provincial legislature but when it comes to matters affecting the national well-being, the life of the state, the very existence and destiny of this Dominion. I submit that only those persons who are nationals, using the word "nationals" in the sense in which it is used in the books, should be permitted to exercise the franchise. In matters of life and death to the state, in matters of the existence of our identity as a nation, only those persons who are nationals should be permitted to vote. Who are nationals? The first among all nationals are those men who have offered their lives in defence of our common country and our civilization. I do not care whether they are 21 years of age or not; they have offered their lives upon the battlefields of Europe in defence of our civilization, of our institutions and of our lives and surely they should not be denied the vote. On what principle should they be denied the vote? Could any man give any greater evidence of love of country or devotion to its institutions than to offer his life as every man did who joined the expeditionary forces? I repudiate in toto the doctrine of the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) who said that an Indian shall not vote who offers himself for service overseas. Whether it be right or wrong I state it as my own personal view that any member of an aboriginal tribe who leaves Canada and offers his life in defence of our liberty should not be denied the right to say something as to what shall be the destiny and the future of this great Dominion. I merely say that is my personal view as it strikes me at the present moment.

The first of those who must be acknowledged as Nationals are the men who offer their lives, by reason of having volunteered for overseas service; the second classification of those who are Nationals and entitled to vote on Federal or National affairs, are those who are British subjects; the third would be those who are naturalized, plus probably something more, because the exercise of the Federal franchise, the exercise of the power to determine the national destiny of Canada, involves, as we have learned by studying the history of this country during the last three years and the history of our friends to the south and of our people overseas, something more than mere naturalization—it involves some assimilation to the institutions of our country, some knowledge of the history of our traditions, some love and reverence for the great names that have given us our civilization, liberty and freedom—and that can come, I submit, only from something more than mere naturalization, something more than merely living three years in the state and swearing before a Justice of the Peace something which a man does not understand, and does not care whether he understands or not. We at least should learn something from this war, and if we have learned anything I repeat, Sir, it must be that the life of the state can be entrusted only to those who are Nationals in the sense in which that word is used. Therefore I classify them once more as (1) those who have gone overseas, offered themselves for service overseas, offered their lives, if need be, in defence of the state; (2) those who are British subjects; (3) those who are naturalized within the state and have had a training that has enabled them to have assimilated something of our institutions and some love for our traditions and history.

And then a further question arises, whether or not you shall place a limitation upon that right; and it seems to me that no thoughtful man who has read the history of this country will for a single moment deny that you should refuse the Federal franchise to those who owe allegiance to a foreign state of a military character. In other words, the reservists of a foreign state should never be permitted to exercise the Federal or National franchise.

Mr. LEMIEUX: You include the Allies?

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: The Allies have nothing to do with the principle, nothing at all. The men who are interested in the preservation of Britain are British subjects by birth or naturalization, and those who have given the further indications that I have mentioned. It well may be—I pray it may not be—that in this country we may again see, as I saw some years ago, men rush to the colours of a foreign country, not our ally. I saw men from Canada rush to the colours of Serbia when she was not an ally of Great Britain. They had become naturalized in this country, but when the call came from overseas, they rushed to the defence of their civilization on the plains of Serbia and in the Balkans. That is unsound, so far as the exercise of a national franchise is concerned. No man who owes allegiance to a foreign power of a military character, no man who can be summoned at the call of a foreign power, whether allied to this country or not, should be permitted to exercise a voice in determining the national destiny of this Dominion.

I submit those principles as being principles that should govern with respect to the exercise of the franchise in this country, and if these be sound principles—and I submit that this is a sound statement of the case—then all men, whether they be eighteen or nineteen or twenty or twenty-one years of age, it matters not, who have fulfilled the first requisite of indicating by their conduct and their action, by their splendid patriotism, and willingness if need be to sacrifice life itself in defence of the liberties of this country and of our common civilization, should be granted the franchise.

I therefore do most heartily support this resolution, remembering further that this matter engaged two years ago the attention of a parliamentary committee of which I happened to be a member. The consensus of opinion in this House then was that the limit should still be maintained at twenty-one years of age. I was not one of those who then so thought; nor have I changed my opinion. I can only reiterate the statements I have made. that any man, whatever be his age, if he be physically fit and old enough to be accepted for service overseas, if he has shown that he has such a stake in our destiny, such an interest in our future, such a great and abiding faith in our civilization and destiny, that, if need be, he is willing to offer life itself in defence of our liberties, should be granted the fullest rights of citizenship. If, while we gather in this Chamber and discuss paltry resolutions and display bitterness and strife, this man is willing to make the supreme sacrifice, are we to deny him the greatest of all privileges that a free man can exercise, that of expressing his will with respect to the destiny of the State?

There are other matters that might be discussed upon this resolution. I was not present this afternoon and do not know what has been said. I have heard only the observations of the hon. gentleman from Pictou (Mr. Macdonald), of the hon. gentleman from Westmorland (Mr. Copp), and a few words from my hon. friend from South Perth (Mr. Steele); but I desire to place myself on record as being heartily in support of a resolution which will grant to my fellow Canadians overseas who have offered their lives in defence of the liberties we enjoy in this Chamber, the right, by their voice and vote, to determine what shall be the future of this great Dominion. We should be less than men if we should endeavour to deny that right to any man, black or white, red or yellow, who is a citizen of this country by birth or naturalization, who has shown his patriotism to be of such a type that he is willing to sacrifice his life for our country. That is the view I take of the principles that must guide us in deciding who should exercise the franchise within this country upon great national questions involving the life, the integrity, the destiny of Canada—and more, of that Empire of which Canada is to-day the most prominent dominion.

Mr. F. B. CARVELL (Carleton, N.B.): Mr. Speaker, I have listened to the hon. member for Calgary (Mr. R. B. Bennett) with a great deal of interest, as we always do. So far as the first proposition which he puts forward is concerned, I do not think there has been very much division among the members of this House who have spoken since the debate commenced this afternoon. Of course, there is always this question, whether a man under twenty-one years of age has given matters of state sufficient attention to be enabled to cast an intelligent vote. There is a great deal in what the hon. member for Calgary said, that a man who risks his life should have a right to say what the policy of this country shall be. I do not quarrel with my hon. friend in that, but, in my judgment, the hon. member for Calgary has opened up another phase of discussion which I should like to see elucidated, to have a little more light thrown on it, because there is something behind his remarks that has hardly been made plain. He lays down the principle that a man who is a British subject by birth or naturalization shall have the right to vote, but he seems to have an idea that there is some other class of men who are really British subjects who should not have the right to vote. I should like to know to what class he refers. He has spoken of the Serbian reservist who is a British subject as one of this class. That is not the fault of the Serbian reservist, but of the naturalization law. This country has invited into it people from all parts of the earth, and we have had a law that a man who has resided in Canada for three years with the intention of settling in it and has complied with certain conditions, taken the oath of allegiance and fulfilled conditions of residence, is entitled to naturalization, and once he is so entitled, so long as he is in Canada he is entitled to all the rights of a British subject. How is my hon. friend going to take from that man his right to the franchise?

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: The Privy Council so decided in the Japanese case. The Privy Council has decided that it was competent for the Legislature of British Columbia to say that a Japanese should not exercise the franchise, although he was a British subject.

Mr. CARVELL: I suppose that Parliament is all-powerful in anything over which it has jurisdiction. Under the present law, the legislature of a province is all-powerful in the matter of who shall have the rights of the franchise. But take the case of a man who has complied with all requirements, has lived in Canada for three years, has taken the oath of allegiance and has become a naturalized British subject. It is monstrous that some person like the hon. member for Calgary should say: it is true that we invited you into this country under certain promises and conditions, but, for some reason, I do not want you to vote; therefore I am not going to give you the right to do so. I am glad that the hon. gentleman has made himself a little plainer. I think I am in the judgment of the House when I say that he stands practically alone in the position which he takes; anyway, I hope that he does. If there is fault anywhere, it is in the naturalization law. The naturalization law was amended a couple of years ago, making it a little harder for a man to be naturalized—and I would not mind if it went further still. But I do hope that my hon. friend is not forecasting a change of policy on the part of this Government, this Parliament or this country. I know of no greater misfortune that could happen to Canada than that she should violate pledges made to the people of Europe in by-gone years when she invited them here.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: The Privy Council has said that there was no such promise and no such pledge. The franchise is neither a promise nor a pledge. It is a privilege which the legislature—

Mr. CARVELL: Notwithstanding my hon. friend's learned remarks, I do not care a straw for what the Privy Council said. The people of Canada know the conditions under which these people have been invited here, and they will know if the rights which were promised to them are withheld. But, Sir, we are travelling far afield. I thought that it was not right to allow such a revolutionary statement to go by unchallenged, and I hope that if my hon. friend or his friends have any such ideas in their minds, they will state them openly and not in veiled manner, as did the hon. member for Calgary.

Subject to what has been said in this respect, I do not think that there is much difference of opinion as between the two sides of the House or among individual members as to the motion that is now under discussion. As has been pointed out, provision has been made in a number of the provinces by which soldiers may vote, regardless of their age. With that provision I have no objection. As was pointed out by the hon. member for Westmorland, it worked all right in the New Brunswick elections in February last, and I assume that it will work all right wherever it is tried. But, as was remarked by the member for Pictou, I do submit that if the House is going to take any action in the matter, it ought to be done simply by an amendment to the Act of 1915.

On the motion of Mr. A. A. McLean (Queens, P.E.I.), the debate was adjourned.

THE SUPPLY OF FUEL.

PROPOSED UTILIZATION OF CANADIAN FUEL RESOURCES.

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG (East Lambton) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, it is of great importance that the increased and increasing demand for fuel for manufacturing and residential purposes be supplied in larger quantities and at cheaper rates than are now possible; that the deposits of bituminous and anthracite coal in Canada, located in the extreme eastern and western portions thereof, be more fully and thoroughly utilized for the benefit of the residents of the central provinces; that the enormous peat and lignite deposits so widely distributed through all portions of the Dominion be also scientifically made use of for the same purpose and further that the Government of Canada make a special effort, through legislation and otherwise, to have these valuable deposits more fully and rapidly developed to the end that the people of Canada may be adequately supplied with these fuels.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the resolution which I present to the House is one which is worthy of the closest attention of every member. We have in Canada the most wonderful undeveloped mineral resources of any country in the world. We have connected with the Mines Department at Ottawa an excellent staff which is capable of undertaking any work that may be assigned to them, and, while I find that there is some overlapping in the work done, much good is accomplished. I am glad that the Minister of Mines has furnished rooms where the specimens of our mines, gathered over the last seventy years, can be exhibited. The samples of materials and of products from different parts of our country which are on exhibition deserve our attention. These specimens were, until a few weeks ago behind closed doors, locked in vaults, boarded up in cellars and in places where it was impossible to have them properly displayed—through no fault of the Minister of Mines.

It is my belief that, at the close of this war no branch of industry in Canada outside of agriculture will receive as great a stimulus as will the mining industry, and I respectfully urge upon the Government the need of devoting its best energies to render every assistance it can to the development of the industries which are connected with the Mines Department. Important matters of research and constructive work connected with the Mines Department must not be left in abeyance.

Since this war began, every nation has been compelled to re-examine and investigate her material resources. Canada possesses tremendous resources in forests, fields, and mines. Let us commence at once to investigate and utilize them.

While investigating this subject, I have been greatly impressed by the number of products manufactured in the United States and England out of the raw material that has been taken from Canadian mines

Education, organization, and scientific research are needed in connection with this department, and a general speeding up of the whole organization is desirable. When the war is over, we should have, and I believe will have, a properly co-ordinated mineral survey of the Empire, and Canada should lead the way. Canada should have some means of demonstrating just what Canadian mines can and do produce. Research and constructive work must be carried on with greater energy than ever before. Educational work regarding our mineral resources should not be confined to our high schools and collegiate institutes, as it is to a large extent to-day, but public schools should make the subject attractive.

The chief statistician of the Department of Mines, Mr. John McLeish, reports that the value of the mineral output of Canada last year was $33,000,000 greater than in 1915. The advance was not mainly due to the rise in prices, for the tonnage also increased remarkably. In 1886 the value was $10,221,255; in 1896 it was $22,474,256; in 1906, $79,286,697, and ten years later, $170,000,000.

At the present rate of development we may expect that during the year 1917 the output of the mines of Canada will exceed $200,000,000. The stimulus given to Canadian mineral development by the war is great and probably permanent. One of the problems which confront Canada to-day, is to devise the best means of rendering available the various supplies of low grade fuel.

Last winter every great city in Canada was within 48 hours of starvation owing to lack of fuel. In recent years we have had two coal famines, first in 1901-2, the year of the coal miners' strike, and secondly, this year, when the severity of the weather and the extraordinary prosperity in the United States caused an unprecedented congestion of freight. A survey of conditions in the United States demonstrates that in the future there will be more coal famines than in the past, and that they will occur at shorter intervals. The current issue of Coal Age, in New York, says that the reserves of coal usually held over by the big companies are completely exhausted.

Dr. George Otis Smith, Director of the United States Geological survey, commenting upon the world's supply of coal, and with particular reference to the reserves in his own country, states:

> This glance at the world's reserves of coal shows plainly not only that the United States leads all other countries in production, our annual output being nearly 40 per cent of the total, but also that it possesses the greatest reserves. Yet in respect to no mineral is there greater need to emphasize the folly of exporting the raw material. Let us keep our coal at home, and with it manufacture whatever the world needs.

The people of Canada just now are gaining an impression, at considerable inconvenience, of what it would mean were the United States for any reason to cut off Canada's coal supply. Presumably there are insufficient facilities and motive power for coal transport. Cities and towns in Canada are keeping fires alight with practically a day-to-day supply of coal, and the time may come when the United States may deem it expedient to reserve her supply of coal for her own use.

Many reasons are given for the making of the coal congestion, namely, zero weather, heavy snow falls, difficulty of obtaining men on the railroads and in the shops, shortage of motor cars and enlistment of men. Railroad officials appear to be doing their best to meet the difficulties. The industries of Toronto, Hamilton, and western Ontario, seem to be the greatest sufferers and universities and schools have closed owing to the shortage of coal. The situation is most serious and an adequate remedy must be found.

I have taken a number of clippings from newspapers which have appeared within the last few weeks, and the headings on some of these articles are:

About three years ago the head of the Geological Survey Department of the United States sent a strong recommendation to Congress urging that the export of anthracite coal out of the United States should be stopped, giving as a reason that about two-thirds of the deposits of anthracite coal in the United States had already been exhausted and that the people of the United States were facing a condition which if carried on at the present rate of consumption of this coal would deplete the mines available for this supply of coal within the next hundred years. This statement has been discussed with a great deal of emphasis in different parts of the United States. It has been favourably commented upon by many prominent men, and the condition is such as to warrant our immediate attention.

If the United States were to place an export duty on their coal to Canada, we would be then compelled to do what we ought to do to-day, to look about for a source of supply of fuel to take care of our great requirements in this regard. We would then begin to realize that some effort should be made for the development of the poorer grades of fuel that are available almost at our very door.

The attention of geologists and mine owners, also the general public, especially during the past year, have been directed to the questions of the coal supplies and reserves in Canada, and on the Continent. The large increase in the consumption of coal in recent years makes this question of vital importance to this country. Only last year, for instance, we imported $42,000,000 worth of coal into Canada. Considering the constant increase in our imports I think hon. gentlemen will agree that this matter should receive our closest attention.

Canada has large supplies of coal situated in the Atlantic and Pacific regions; in the mountains of British Columbia and in the Plains regions of the Central Interior. On the Atlantic and Pacific seaboards, bituminous coals are extensively mined. The interior fields supply coals of various kinds, the coals of the mountains being the most important and of the highest grade. The province of Alberta forms Canada's largest coal reserve. The coal areas of Canada have an estimated total surface extent of one hundred and nine thousand one hundred and sixty-eight square miles.

In summing up the reports of the coal deposits in the world, Canada stands second among the nations in regard to her deposits. Canada has 1,234,269 millions of tons available; the United States has 3,838,659 million tons available. Great Britain has only 189,000 millions of tons; Germany has 423,000 millions of tons available. At Pictou, N.S., coal fields show an actual available supply of 390 million tons. In addition to this, the small fields and the estimated coal area in Nova Scotia will amount to 400 millions of tons. The present output of coal for Nova Scotia is about 3,000,000 of tons per annum. The coal is largely consumed in the East, much is exported, and a large quantity comes to Montreal.

We have only two deposits of anthracite coal worthy of mention in Canada. One is located in the Rocky Mountains, and the other in the Yukon. Neither of these is easy of access, nor capable of very great development. We use anthracite in our homes because of less smoke and smell. In the West they manage to keep fires in the houses all night with low grades of coal. If our furnaces were changed to consume the smoke, we could use the lower grades of coal with comfort. Mr. Dowling, Canada's coal expert, says this can be done, and we can use $5 coal instead of $8 or $10 coal and get more heat units per ton out of it by adapting our furnaces and heating appliances to its use. From Brandon, Manitoba, east to the Atlantic coast, we are almost entirely dependent upon the United States for our anthracite coal for cooking and heating purposes.

The anthracite coal deposits of North America are fast becoming exhausted. The Americans admit that they have used two-thirds of their total supply, and so we must expect that anthracite will increase in value as the years go by. We must therefore, investigate more closely our soft coal deposits and make every effort to develop them economically. We must also induce our people to make use of the tar-products taken from soft coal which are most valuable. One of the principal products taken from soft coal is ammonium sulphate, which is used extensively as a fertilizer. We are now making a lot of toluol from Canadian soft coal taken out at Sydney Mines. This same firm has been making coke for the steel plants for years past. Soft coal can be transported from two ports in Nova Scotia, namely, Sydney and Pictou. This coal could go through our canals up the lakes to Port Arthur, and might be able to compete in price with the soft coal brought from the United States, which is delivered to the ports along our inland waters. This subject requires immediate investigation. Should an embargo be placed on coal coming into Canada from the United States this seems the most feasible way of supplying the cities on our inland waters. The Government should inquire into the feasibility of handling grain east and coal west.

To obtain coal of a similar grade to that mined in Nova Scotia we have to go to the Rocky Mountains eight hundred miles west of Winnipeg. For lower grades of soft coal, nearly the whole of the province of Alberta and the southern part of the province of Saskatchewan can be called one immense coal field. Some districts in southern Saskatchewan contain soft coal from ten to thirty feet in thickness, but it is of such a nature that when it is exposed to the air it dries to a powder.

Some definite effort should be made to develop the immense soft coal area in southern Saskatchewan. The Department of Mines know where the seams and exposures are located in the bulk of this immense coal field. Experiments have been made in Ottawa by the Mines Branch within the past few years which have gone to show that lignite coal similar to that located in Saskatchewan, when used in a gas producer, can be as economically handled as regards power as if it were anthracite, provided it is used in the localities where the coal is produced. The day may come when the power used in the great cities of our West will be produced at the mines. How can we make that coal in a shape that it can be shipped to other parts of the Dominion? We have demonstrated that it can be economically produced and used in the area where the mines are located, but what can be done to prepare it for export to other districts? Across the line from Saskatchewan, in Dakota, they have the same product. The University of Dakota took up the question of coal development. They tried to dry the coal and briquette the dust. Their early experiments were not successful, when exposed to the moisture in the air these briquettes would go to pieces. The next examination was to test the possibility of treating the coal to make charcoal and then briquetting it. The result of this experiment is satisfactory and some effort should be made to develop this idea in Canada. Mr. Dowling is satisfied that a proper handling of soft coal in Saskatchewan could be made with briquetting it, and that this fuel would soon take the place of anthracite for home consumption, and would also take the place of fuel for power purposes on the railways and in the manufacturing plants that are not already provided with gas.

As to the question of substitutes: For years in Germany there has been an absolute embargo on the soft coals and the lignites. They compel these all to be roasted and the tars and ammonium compounds extracted, before the charcoal or coke can be burned. The residue is a heavy coke, which takes the place of anthracite. This is one way of using the poorer grades of coal to advantage. The limit for hauling soft coal advantageously by the railway in the West at present is about Brandon, Manitoba. Ohio soft coal comes by water, and is handled at Port Arthur, the railway haul towards the west is cheaper than the railway haul towards the east, with grain and products being shipped from the West, the briquettes could be handled with advantage as far east as Winnipeg or Port Arthur.

Between Winnipeg and Montreal there are, generally speaking, no coal deposits. Therefore, the supply to the people and industries between Winnipeg and Montreal must come from the United States or be shipped in from Nova Scotia by boat up the lakes. Nova Scotia coal is a good grade of soft coal, and by the treatment just referred to, namely, the coking treatment, would form a good substitute for anthracite.

We have only one small area of lignite coal in Ontario and Quebec, and that is of a very inferior quality. It is located on the Moose River, James Bay slope, not far from the Transcontinental. It is in clay about twenty feet below the surface. The seams are only about three or four feet in thickness and would be most expensive and difficult to operate.

Electricity has given tremendous assistance in conserving our coal. It is said that if the electric power already established in Canada were dispensed with it would be necessary to import twice as much coal as is at present consumed in order to supply our people. By developing electricity we have made enormous savings in fuel, and we should investigate at once and see how much farther we can go in this regard. If we nationalize our railroads the Government may feel justified in electrifying large portions of our main lines, and in this way conserve the coal for other purposes. The Chicago, Milwaukee and St. Paul Railway hauls by electric power freight and passengers over 440 miles of its road, and is at present electrifying an additional 250 miles.

The officers of the road claim to have solved the coal supply problem, and the cost of operation by electricity is only one-third that of operation by steam. In addition to this, one-third of all the equipment formerly used for the transportation of fuel has been released, and they claim to have doubled the capacity of the single line. Snow troubles, they also say, are nearly eliminated and extreme cold has little effect on operation. Canada, with her immense water powers in the East and Central Provinces, and abundance of cheap coal in the West, may soon electrify the main lines, thereby conserving her fuel, and use her steam equipment for branch and short hauls.

The British Empire is now known to possess very large reserves of coal. It is estimated that its share is very nearly one-quarter of the world's reserve. As one-half of the world's supply is estimated to be in territory owned by the United States of America, the present known supply for all the remaining nations is about equal to that of the British Empire.

The coal reserves of the various portions of the Empire are given in the following table:—

	Anthracite coals.	Bit. coals.	Sub-bit. coals, brown coals and lignites.	Totals.
	Million tons.	Million tons.	Million tons.	Million tons.
Canada	2,158	283,661	948,450	1,234,269
Great Britain & Ireland	11,359	178,176	.....	189,533

Canada appears to be an important storehouse, but, although it has large reserves, much of this is not available for the commerce of the Empire. Important supplies are, however, to be found on both the Atlantic and Pacific seaboards and may compete with foreign fuels.

The cretaceous rocks exposed in the western part of Manitoba are all marine deposits. Thin streaks of coal occur in this sandstone formation. Light-coloured shades appear in Turtle Mountain near the interior boundary line. In the lower slopes small lignite seams have been discovered. Professor Dowling claims that an estimate of the amount of coal covers a very small area of the slopes on the west of these hills, where the lower seams are workable.

The estimate given of coal areas in the different provinces of Canada is as follows:—

	Metric Tons.
Nova Scotia	9,718,968
New Brunswick	151,000
Ontario	25,000
Manitoba	160,000
Saskatchewan	59,812,000
Alberta	1,072,627,400
British Columbia	76,034,942
Yukon	4,940,000
Northwest Territories	4,800,000
Arctic Islands	6,000,000
	1,234,269,310

The ordinary growth of our provinces calls for cheaper power and cheaper fuel; and the development of our western provinces will depend to a large extent on the supply of cheap fuel and power. For, notwithstanding the existence of the enormous deposits of coal in the extreme eastern and western portions of Canada, certain of the provinces are dependent on foreign sources for their supply. Conditions, however, may not continue as they are to-day. They may change suddenly and we may find ourselves deprived of fuel from the United States without warning. For such an event, we have made no provision; we have accumulated no extra store to meet such an emergency, but import only what is needed annually. For some time past, the strikes in the coal mines of the United States have demonstrated that conditions such as I have mentioned must be reckoned with, while other causes than strikes, such as the great development of industries, and the demands of the railways for supply during the war, may deprive us for long periods of this outside source of fuel. It is, therefore, wise for us to make provision for an emergency and seek within our own territory the means of supplying this all important necessity. Fortunately, nature has provided a substitute for coal and wood in the peat bogs scattered throughout our central provinces.

The population of our towns and cities is composed largely of wage earners. Our climate, for at least four or five months of the year, requires a large amount of fuel for family use; cheap and abundant fuel is a necessity of existence. There are cities in Canada where families are herded together with insufficient space for health and civilized life, because of the cost of fuel in the winter.

It may be safely said that there will be no permanent reduction in the price of coal; rather it is reasonably certain that there will be a gradual but steady increase. Fuel will become higher as the years go by. The cost of development of heat from water power, in addition to maintenance and management, does not encourage us to believe that we will be able to use electricity as a poor man's fuel for many, many years to come. The price of anthracite and other coals is advancing largely because of exhaustion of the thicker beds, and increased costs of working, freight and transportation facilities. Anthracite coal is fast becoming the fuel of the rich.

In addition to this, manufacturing establishments are bound to increase and the coal consumption for power purposes will likely develop more rapidly. As coal becomes dearer, the difficulty and uncertainty of the supply becomes more accentuated, and the importance of a substitute fuel becomes more urgent. If, therefore, the great peat bogs of Canada could be successfully converted into fuel which would be cheaper than wood or coal the advantages thus conferred upon the future inhabitants of Canada and the United States could hardly be overestimated. The difficulties to be overcome do not appear to me to be very great when the attendant benefits are taken into consideration. The kinds of fuel available in Canada are:

The wood still standing.
Our oil deposits.
The oil contained in oil shales.
Gas.
Lignite coal.
Water powers (or white coal).
Anthracite coal.
Bituminous coal.
And our peat deposits.

Peat is incipient coal. It is made up of the more or less thoroughly decomposed and carbonized remains of plants accumulated under conditions that have prevented their complete transformation into gaseous and mineral matter. The successive stages in the process of carbonization, as it is reported in nature, is first peat, then lignite coal, anthracite and graphite, a form of carbon. For centuries, peat has been extensively used for domestic fuel by the peasantry of northern Europe. An important source of additional fuel for the more immediate future in Canada exists in our extensive peat bogs. These, and the great lignite areas of the northwest occupy a middle ground between coal on the one hand and such vegetable fuels as wood, etc., on the other.

With the reduction in our forest area, due to settlement and other causes, and the consequent rise in fuel prices, the development of these latent resources has become a matter of general and immediate concern. The development of these resources should proceed along such lines, and by such methods, as will secure the maximum of economic return.

For many years past efforts have been made to develop the peat areas in Ontario and Quebec. A large amount of money was frittered away by careless and useless endeavours to produce this material in a manner in which it might be marketable. However, some six years ago the Government decided to make a practical investigation into the peat producing areas of our country, and, if possible, demonstrate the advantages to be derived from peat production. They sent representatives to Holland, Sweden, Denmark, Germany and Russia to gather data and material that could be utilized to advantage in Canada. On the return of these representatives the Government purchased 300 acres of the peat bog at Alfred, about forty miles out of Ottawa, and prepared to demonstrate the commercial feasibility of the manufacturing of peat fuel by the employment of a process which is well known in Europe, and which was the only process for manufacturing peat economically. The Government manufactured 2,000 tons of peat in that bog; they sold this peat in Ottawa and vicinity to householders and manufacturers for the purpose of introducing that form of fuel to the public and to obtain expressions of opinion regarding this fuel for domestic purposes. The various users of this fuel almost invariably expressed their satisfaction with peat as fuel. They further expressed their keen desire to continue the use of this fuel. I have 150 letters from people who used peat as fuel, and, with the exception of two or three, all speak in the highest terms of its heating qualities, its economy and efficiency.

After the completion of their experimental work, the Mines Branch felt that they had accomplished all that they should do, i.e., the demonstration that this peat could be manufactured at a low cost and transported economically, and that as a fuel it was satisfactory. The Mines Branch felt that further development should be left to private individuals. They disposed of the plant and acreage to a firm who commenced the development of the industry. The private individuals then made some improvements to the plant, and during the year 1914 expected to carry on extensive developments. They were well under way with this work when the war broke out, but being supplied with a limited capital, they were seriously handicapped, and were compelled to close down their plant for lack of money to continue its operation. I regret to say that the plant is now in the hands of a receiver.

Mr. CARVELL: I do not want to interrupt my hon. friend (Mr. Armstrong), but I am very much interested in the statement he makes as to the result of this experiment. What would be the price of coal as compared with the price of peat for heating purposes?

Mr. ARMSTRONG: I will give that information a little further on. As far as I can learn, this was the only real live effort on sane lines in Canada for the development of the peat industry, and after I have explained to you the enormous areas of excellent peat bogs that are available, I feel confident that you will agree with me that some decided effort should be made at the earliest possible date to develop this industry. I believe that the Government should take over this bog immediately and continue to operate it. Manufactured peat at cost should be supplied to the municipalities convenient to the bog, and since the local Government of the province of Ontario have provided means whereby a city like Ottawa could purchase this fuel, the city should arrange for at least 5,000 tons of peat to be stored for use next winter. Other cities should be placed in a similar position. What an advantage it would have been to the people of Ottawa this winter had the corporation of this city stored 5,000 or 10,000 tons of this fuel for distribution at cost to the poorer inhabitants of the city. I sincerely hope that the Government will see to it that a decided effort is made at the earliest possible date to place within the reach of the people in Canada an abundance of this fuel for residential and manufacturing purposes.

From the Government's development of the peat bog at Alfred, it was proven conclusively that peat could be manufactured into blocks suitable for use in industries and in private homes at an actual cost of $1.75 per ton.

Mr. PARDEE: Was that the retail price?

Mr. ARMSTRONG: That was the price manufactured on the ground. Indeed, this was the actual cost of the production of the 2,000 tons of peat referred to. The railway charged one dollar per ton for its transportation to Ottawa, a distance of forty miles.

However, the peat was delivered at $5 per ton to manufacturers and householders, and from many sources I have obtained definite information sufficient to assure me that for residential purposes, in grates, in cookstoves, in the ordinary heater, this has proved to be an ideal fuel. This is a practical demonstration of what can be accomplished, and a good reason why the Government should act. It is true that anthracite coal has more heat units per ton, but the use of anthracite coal entails greater wastage, owing to incomplete combustion, and a larger percentage of ash. This is not necessary in the consumption of peat. Peat fuel is easily lighted, and it is not necessary to use a greater quantity than is required for cooking or heating at one time, while, on the other hand, anthracite undergoes very great wastage in this regard.

The European countries for centuries have been forced to use their natural resources. Some of these countries, which have not been richly endowed by nature with fuel resources, have been very generous in their interest towards the peat fuel industry. Large grants of money have been made annually in Sweden for the purpose of experimentation and research work, and sums of money set aside to be distributed as loans to persons desiring to engage in some phase of the peat industry. The Government of Sweden spends sixty thousand dollars per annum in the encouragement of peat production. The Swedish Government are running their locomotives on the railways with peat powder. In Denmark, during the year 1913, 64 peat factories with 94 peat fuel plants were in operation. The demand for peat fuel in Denmark is very great.

The European war had an extraordinary effect on the peat market in Denmark. From the beginning of the war no coal has been imported, so the price of stored coal has increased all through the country. As the price went up, the demand for peat fuel developed into gigantic proportions. Dairies, brick manufactories and other manufactories started to use peat fuel, and seemed to be satisfied in spite of the increased cost per brick for manufacture. In Russia, during the last few years, the peat fuel industry has been greatly developed. This is shown by the fact that peat fuel takes second place in the fuel consumption of the country. In 1909, 44 per cent of Russian crude oil, 33 per cent of air-dryed peat fuel, and 23 per cent of coal was used. Since then the production of peat has increased. As the cost of coal, crude oil and wood increases, the peat industry continues to develop.

The sale of machines for the manufacture of peat in Russia in the years 1912 and 1913 shows an increase of 400 per cent. It is estimated that Russia is producing annually 10 million metric tons of peat fuel, out of which seven million tons are manufactured in the seven central Russian Provincial Governments. The United States, exclusive of Alaska, is estimated to have 11,200 square miles of peat bogs, averaging 9 feet in depth, and containing nearly 13,000,000,000 tons of fuel, worth, at $3 a ton, $39,000,000,000. Canada has 37,000 square miles of known peat bogs, but these form probably but a small fraction of the total, constituting a potential national asset of enormous value. The peat resources of Canada exceed those of any other country with the exception of Russia. During the period from 1908 to 1914 the Mines Branch in Canada located, mapped and investigated 140,000 acres of peat bogs in Ontario, Quebec, Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island and Manitoba, all convenient to railways and markets, estimated to be capable of yielding 115,000,000 tons of fuel and 10,500,000 tons of peat moss litter. Why do we not make use of the information obtained by our Government experts? Seven Ontario Bogs within convenient shipping distance of Toronto will yield 26,500,000 tons of fuel. Four bogs within a few miles of Ottawa are estimated to contain over 25,000,000 tons. Seven bogs in the Montreal district could furnish that city with 23,500,000 tons of fuel. Five bogs along the St. Lawrence, below Quebec and convenient to that city by water, could supply 16,250,000 tons of fuel and 5,750,000 tons of peat moss litter. Nova Scotia Bogs examined in Yarmouth, Shelburne and Lunenburg counties will produce 6,250,000 tons of fuel and 500,000 tons of litter. Six bogs investigated in Prince Edward Island can furnish 1,250,000 tons of fuel and over 1,000,000 tons of litter. Seven bogs examined in Manitoba will produce 2,000,000 tons of fuel and 2,500,000 tons of litter.

Apart from the potential value of our peat bogs as a subsidiary source of fuel supply and for the production of sulphate of ammonia, there are numerous other products such as moss litter, peat dust, alcohol, acetic acid, acetone, tar, tar oils, creosote, gas, etc., which might form the basis of paying industries, giving employment to many people, where now we have only waste lands.

As to the comparative heating value of peat fuel as delivered to the consumer, it may be said that, comparing the actual heating values, one ton of hard coal is equivalent to 1½ tons of peat with a moisture content of 25 per cent; but, in order to arrive at a fair comparison, it is necessary to understand and carefully consider certain factors which, under certain conditions, would turn the scale in favour of peat fuel. As a fuel for cook stoves, ranges, etc., peat fuel will prove more economical than anthracite, since, with coal, the fire must be burned continuously, and, moreover, the refuse, i. e., ash, contains a very large proportion of combustible matter.

The manufacture of sulphate of ammonia is a matter of great importance to the people of Canada. Our peat bogs in Canada are high in nitrogen, running about 2 per cent. In Italy they are running their peat bogs with a little over 1 per cent of sulphate of ammonia. Ammonium sulphate is a very valuable artificial fertilizer, for which there is a continually increasing demand in almost all parts of the world, and a ready market could be found for all the sulphate of ammonia that could be produced in Canada.

At a time like the present when stock is being taken of the natural resources of the country, the importance of these investigations will be readily recognized. The estimated yield of 19 bogs in Ontario and Quebec, if used to produce ammonium sulphate, would give a production of 81,696,416 tons of fuel. With a production of sulphate of ammonia amounting to 4,025,525 tons which at a valuation of $65 per ton, which is a very low estimate, the value would amount to $261,659,775.

Intense agriculture has filled the granaries of the world, but fertilizers have become absolutely necessary. Soil fertility is urgently demanded. Appetite has come with eating and our demands and wants are increasing day by day. Inoculation of soil has become an established success. Bacterized peat has been used most successfully as a medium for this purpose. Experiments in England made by Professor Bottomley, Botanical Laboratories, University of London, Kings College, as described in a book entitled "Spirit of the Soil," written by C. D. Knox, shows that treated peat gives as much as 50 to 80 times greater results than the best rotted stable manure, that it is free from smell, dust, weeds, disease spores and insect pests, is clean and pleasant to handle. After seven years of experiments, the American Board of Agriculture are distributing a similar preparation to farmers and recommending its use. Bacterized peat opens a field for every farmer and gardener to undertake important scientific work, in order to increase the yield from the land.

In addition to this, Dr. Eugene Haanel, the head of the Mines Branch, makes the following estimate:

> that the gas available in working the large Teefield bog for sulphate of ammonia would produce 4,000 H.P. continuously for 86 years, a total of 344,000 H.P., the total power gas available in conjunction with the utilization of all the bogs in Canada would amount to over 5,000,000 B.H.P.

Peat burns with a much smaller air supply than coal, consequently less heat is wasted than with the greater draft required to burn coal.

I believe it is the duty of this Government to take over certain peat bogs and lignite mines and furnish the material at cost to our people. Greatly increased prices for the coming winter must be expected, and unless some immediate action is taken, great hardships are bound to ensue. The peat bog at Alfred, Ont., is capable of immediate development, and at least 1,000 tons of peat per month could be manufactured in this bog during the summer and fall. It is estimated that there are 3,000 interned Germans in the camps in our country; a sufficient number of men from these camps could be employed on our peat bogs, near London, Toronto, Montreal and Quebec, to produce a supply of fuel. After the material is manufactured, it is up to the municipalities to purchase the peat and see that it is delivered at cost to the artisan or the farmer. The mayor of this city should have at least 5,000 tons of this material on hand for distribution during the coming winter. Similar amounts, only larger, should be stored in Toronto and Montreal, and other cities.

In the western provinces, lignite coal should be made available for distribution to the farmers and others, and I believe that a sufficient quantity of soft coal should be brought from the mines at Sydney or thereabout, up the St. Lawrence, and distributed to the municipalities, if for no other reason than an experiment. The day may soon come when elevators will be built in Sydney harbour and boats carry coal west and wheat east.

I cannot urge too strongly on the Government the need of immediate attention to this subject. The more I investigate it, the more convinced I am that, unless some radical steps are taken, serious suffering and hardship will be the lot of thousands of our people. During our long winter we are dependent upon artificial heat in our homes. Owing to the continual increase in the amount of fuel required for industrial purposes, and the yearly advance in the price of fuel, I respectfully urge that the Government should take over the peat bog at Alfred at once, and also commence operations near Toronto, Montreal and Quebec, in order to establish the confidence of the people of Canada in the value of peat as a domestic and industrial fuel, and to stimulate activity in the development of our peat resources. In addition to this I respectfully urge the Government to investigate all other means of supplying our people with an abundance of fuel.

It is important that we take this matter up for the following reasons: The outlook for sufficient fuel from the United States is uncertain. We are dependent for a large portion of our fuel on American resources. It would mean the development of other profitable industries in Canada. The development of our peat bogs and other mines will furnish additional employment to Canadians in Canada.

The statistics which I have furnished have been gathered with greatest of care from the departments of the Government connected with the advancement of these industries, and I submit them for the careful consideration of the House.

Mr. W. A. BUCHANAN (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, the resolution moved by the member for East Lambton (Mr. J. E. Armstrong) is of considerable interest to the part of Canada from which I come. This House may be surprised to know that the province of Alberta has the greatest coal resources of any province in Canada; indeed, its coal resources are very much greater than those of British Columbia or Nova Scotia, the provinces whose production ranks next to that of Alberta. It is estimated in the report of the Department of Mines that Alberta's coal resources amount to 1,072,627,400,000 metric tons. If the Alberta coal mines were operating the year round, they would produce far more than would be consumed in western canada, but owing to the various labour troubles which we have almost annually the mines do not operate regularly and the supply of coal is not such as the resources are able to furnish or even sufficient to meet the demands of the western consumers. We cannot get beyond Winnipeg with Alberta coal because of the competition of Pennsylvania coal. The freight rates interfere; and there is the difficulty of storing lignite coal from the prairies. If the proposed treatment of western coal is successful, it will make a very great difference in that respect, but one of the great difficulties at present encountered in handling western coal is the impossibility of storing it for any great length of time. The reason why the competition of Pennsylvania coal comes so close to the supply in western Canada as Manitoba is found almost wholly in the cheap transportation rates by water.

Vessels moving the grain down the Great Lakes require traffic in return, and they offer a very cheap rate for the transportation of Pennsylvania coal to Manitoba and the head of the lakes. It is almost impossible for those handling Alberta coal to meet that condition. It would be of great value to the labour market in the mines of the West if there was a steady market all the year round; production would be increased, and steady employment would be assured. Uncertainty of employment is one of the difficulties experienced in the mines of the West. At present we have a very serious strike in all the mines of British Columbia. I have a wire to-night from Lethbridge stating that the steam coal situation is extremely serious and may affect some of the railroads in western Canada because sufficient steam coal has not been stored to meet the urgent demands being made at present. We have these difficulties from time to time. If it were possible to carry out the idea that the member for East Lambton has in mind and to find a market for the coal throughout the various parts of Canada, it would be of great assistance to the coal industry in western Canada and, I assume, in other parts of the Dominion as well. But I am not very confident that that can be done. The only thing that can be hoped for in connection with the domestic coal mining industry on the prairies is a rapid development of the West so that the consumption of coal will increase sufficiently to warrant the operation of more mines and the production of more coal. In my part of the country the coal mining business has not been profitable to those who have invested in it. In some cases the coal mining business has been overdone, and I do not know of any very large dividends being paid by any coal mining company in the southern part of the province of Alberta. This is due to a great extent to the lack of a steady market, of a steady demand for the coal and of an all-year-round operation of the mines. We have in Canada sufficient fuel resources to meet all our needs for years to come, if the supply could only be directed to the various parts of our own country—the coal resources of the West brought further East than at present, and those of the East brought further West.

I should like to see something develop from the proposal of the member for East Lambton, but I am not very hopeful that it will be of any benefit at present to the coal resources of western Canada unless some treatment can be devised which will permit the storing of the coal and enable it to be transported further away from its present source of supply.

Mr. J. G. TURRIFF (Assiniboia): I think that the thanks of the House are due to the hon. member for East Lambton (Mr. J. E. Armstrong) for bringing this matter up and for putting so much information before the House. I do not know that the members of the Government present have taken that active interest in the matter which would lead us to believe that anything may come from the resolution in the near future. But I wish to emphasize, if I possibly can, some of the remarks made by the member for East Lambton.

I happened to be one of the persons in Ottawa who bought some peat a few years ago and used it in their houses. It is no doubt a very good fuel for cooking stoves and for grates. I did not try it in the furnace and do not know how it would act if used in that way. Up to a couple of years ago it could be sold at prices comparing reasonably with the prices charged for coal. It cannot be sold at $5 a ton, but there is no reason why it should be placed on the market at that price in Ottawa. If it can be made at the factory or peat bed for $1.75 a ton, allowing $1 a ton for freight, it should be delivered at about $3.50 or $4 a ton. At that price I think it could compete fairly well with soft coal in this part of Canada or at any place within 100 or 150 miles of where it was made. As there are peat bogs all through Quebec and Ontario and the province of Manitoba, there ought to be a fairly good supply for fuel purposes.

But what I wish particularly to speak of is the lignite coal of Saskatchewan. Unlike the province of Alberta, we have not a very great supply, at all events, in eastern Saskatchewan. In the western part of the province there are many millions of tons. In the eastern part, in the constituency which I have the honour to represent, and within 275 miles of the city of Winnipeg, we have a large supply of lignite coal. We have working seams there that are 9, 10 and 12 feet thick, and from them 300,000 or 400,000 tons are shipped out annually and consumed chiefly by the farmers in the prairie country west and northeast of the coal fields. A good deal of it goes into Winnipeg, Brandon and other cities for public purposes and for heating the large blocks, where it is used in the furnaces. But, as the hon. member for East Lambton pointed out, this is a poor quality of coal. It is a lignite, which does not stand the weather well. If you mine it and store it in the summer it crumbles up into more or less fine dust and is not then suitable for burning in cook-stoves or ordinary furnaces, so that you have to mine it in the fall or the winter and it has been used to best advantage within two or three months after it is mined and shipped. But the quality of lignite that we have in Saskatchewan is a great deal better than the lignite found in Germany, where tens of millions of tons are used and a first class fuel produced from it. In that process there are extracted the by-products that, to a large extent, if not altogether, cover the cost of handling the coal and converting it into a much better fuel. Of course, a ton of common lignite, after the tar and other by-products have been extracted, will not give a ton of this good fuel, but it will probably give half a ton equal to hard coal. At the town of Estevan, in my constituency, within 275 or 300 miles of Winnipeg, an experimental plant was established a few years ago, and it was found that the lignite there could be carbonized and made into a fuel equal to anthracite, taking from 1½ to 1¾ tons of this coal to make a ton of the fuel. This war is teaching us that we ought to produce more of our requirements in Canada. Now we have the lignite, and it only requires thorough experimenting to prove that that lignite can be made into a first class fuel, in the preparation of which there are extracted many of the by-products referred to by my hon. friend from east Lambton (Mr. Armstrong), such as tar, aniline dyes, acetic acid, and other products that are worth a great deal of money. My hon. friend spoke of experiments that had been made in Dakota, just south of the line. It is true that experiments have been made there; but as frequently happens in the case of private enterprises, the first men who took up the business spent money foolishly and lavishly and were not very successful. The plants there are briquet plants. I have seen the briquets made at the Canadian Pacific Railway mine at Bankhead of what is supposed to be Canadian anthracite coal, but in Canada anthracite is only semi-anthracite; it is not nearly of such good quality as the Pennsylvania anthracite. The Canadian anthracite is made into briquets, which, as I have found, make a fairly good fuel; but probably on account of the lack of sufficient binding, before you have finished using the briquets in your furnace a quarter of them have been reduced to dust. The coal at Estevan, however, if a proper plant were established, could be made into first class fuel, and the plant could supply customers within a radius of two or three hundred miles, even as far as Winnipeg; but in its present shape it is the poor man's fuel. The rich man will not burn it because it is a smoky fuel and makes quite a lot of ashes, and therefore is not such a satisfactory fuel as the bituminous coal that comes from Lethbridge and Taber, but it is much nearer to the people who want it. Between Estevan and Winnipeg, a distance of 275 to 300 miles at the outside, there is a vast plain well settled by a class of farmers who require fuel and many of whom are buying and using the coal that comes from Pennsylvania, whereas we have at our own doors the making of a first class fuel if we had someone to take hold of the business who would be prepared to spend a little money in making experiments and putting in the necessary plants. I agree, therefore, with my hon. friend that the Government should take hold of this matter and experiment. The provincial government of Saskatchewan put in an experimental plant which has proved to a certain extent what can be done, but that Government has not gone far enough; whoever takes hold of the business must go further and spend more money in making experiments. We have there such vast deposits of lignite that we could shut off the importation of several million dollars' worth of hard and soft coal from Pennsylvania and other eastern States and give a fuel equally as good in every respect. The fuel that is produced out of this lignite is a carbonized coal something like coke, and it will furnish as much heat to the ton as anthracite. I trust, therefore, my hon. friend who is leading the House will give this matter proper consideration and see if something cannot be done. This is an economic question for this country. Every million dollars' worth of material that we can produce in this country and that we can use in this country is a million dollars saved to the people of Canada. If this fuel is produced, those who are living in the vicinity will have this advantage that they will get the quality of fuel they want at a lower price than they are paying at the present time, because although coal is cheap in that district in its present shape it costs anyone using large quantities of it very nearly as much as to send further away and pay extra freight and get a higher quality of coal. If this lignite is going to take the place it should take, it should be put into smaller bulk so that there would be less freight and less handling. I am absolutely sure that some day not in the very distant future, in the coal fields in the southwestern end of my constituency, within less than 100 miles of the province of Manitoba, there will be established plants which will use that cheap coal for generating electricity, and throughout southern Saskatchewan from Moosejaw south and throughout the southwestern corner of Manitoba electric power for lighting and cooking will be generated from that coal

Mr. SCHAFFNER: We are going to get our heat from straw, I understand.

Mr. TURRIFF: I am not posted on that, so I shall not say a word against it; it may be a good scheme. I am talking of these deposits of coal. I am sure that they could be very easily mined, and power cheaply developed by means of a generating plant. All you would have to do would be to run a shaft into the wheel, coal it out, and dump it right into the boiler room, and one of these days that will happen. But I want to impress on the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Labour that it will not happen of itself; some one must take hold of the thing and give it a start. I trust that the Government will look into this question thoroughly and see whether the statements I have made are not perfectly justified. I have lived within a few miles of these coal fields for many, many years. I have visited them hundreds of times, and I know something about the extent of coal that is there. I am certain that if the experiments were continued a great enterprise would soon be under way and millions of money would be kept in this country that is now going to the United States in payment for coal for our well-to-do people in the cities and in the country too.

Mr. SCHAFFNER: Has any estimate been made of the quantity of coal at Estevan?

Mr. TURRIFF: There is an estimate in the report of the Department of Mines. The report gives the figure for the whole province as 59,812,000,000 tons; the great bulk of that is on the western side of Saskatchewan, and not in the part of the country I am speaking of. I have no doubt that in this report, if I had time to look through it, I could find an estimate for this particular part of the country, but I know of my own knowledge they have been mining there for twenty or thirty years, and there are dozens of sections that are underlaid with coal all the way from six to twelve feet thick. A twelve-foot seam gives about 12,000 tons to the acre of saleable coal, outside altogether of waste and what is left in the ground, and I do not think there has been a square mile of coal mined in all that territory yet; we are taking up only from three to four hundred thousand tons a year. There is coal enough there to last as long as our grandchildren; the extent of it has never been gauged. A farmer twenty miles beyond the supposed limits of the coal area will very often strike a seam from six to ten feet thick if he goes down 300 feet. West of Estevan are what were formerly called the Dirt Hills, which were not supposed to be good from an agricultural point of view, but which are now settled and growing good crops of wheat, and which contain considerable deposits of coal. In the country south of Moosejaw there are outcroppings of coal right along, and the settlers dig the coal up and keep themselves in fuel all the year round. This applies to the whole country south of Regina, but more particularly to that country about forty miles south of Moosejaw. Then, again, about 200 miles west of the Estevan coal fields there are out-croppings of coal near the Wood Mountain. In fact, there is coal practically all through the southern portion of the province. In the western part of the province the quality of lignite is better, and is called by some people Galt coal. At Taber there are huge deposits, and also at Medicine Hat, where they mined coal in the old days twenty-five years ago. So my hon. friend need not worry about the extent of the coal deposits. The coal is there, and is only awaiting the hand of man to dig it up. If these deposits were in Germany, or France, or any other of the thickly populated countries of Europe a fine fuel would soon be made out of this lignite, which is about the poorest quality we have in the West, and they would be able to make enough out of the by-products alone to pay for the expense of mining. All I ask is that the Government look into this matter thoroughly, and I am sure that if they will continue the experiments they will see that the enterprise is well worth going into.

Mr. G. E. McCRANEY (Saskatoon): Most of the discussion that has taken place so far on this resolution has been with regard to lignite. My hon. friend from Souris (Mr. Schaffner) has raised another matter which I wish to discuss for a few moments, and that is the use of straw for fuel. It must appeal to any one who has been through western Canada and seen the great quantities of straw that are burned on our farms during the fall season, what a tremendous waste is going on of material which could be devoted to some economic purpose. Straw is of no value as a fertilizer, and various experiments have been made with a view to its utilization either as a fuel or in some other manner. My attention was directed especially to it a couple of months ago when I was in Moosejaw with Mr. Knowles, a member of this House, also Mr. George W. Brown, formerly Lieutenant Governor of the province, and Professor R. D. McLaurin of Saskatoon University. We visited a machine shop where experiments were being conducted by a Mr. Harrison, who is the inventor of a process for extracting gas from straw. The method is by means of a retort in which the straw is placed, and, under heat the gas is driven out into a receptacle called a scrubber, which contains water and iron filings. There the gas is cleansed, and then it passes into a gasometer. In the process of passing through the scrubber a tar is given off which runs, I understand, some ten gallons to the ton, and which is black in colour and heavy in composition. It contains the elements of coal-tar, and is consequently useful in the manufacture of by-products of coal-tar. While any straw may be used in this process, it is said that flax straw gives the best results. I saw cooking being done, stoves heated, and gas engines run by means of this gas. The gas is a blue flame, and a mantle is used for lighting. Apparently it is a very pure gas, for after being under a vessel for some time very little carbon is shown. It is estimated that twenty tons of straw a year would light and furnish heat for cooking for a seven-roomed farm house. I am told that one hundred tons a year would provide all the heat, light and power that would be used about an ordinary farm. Mr. Harrison said to me that he could use a tank of the same size as a gasolene tank of a Ford car and, by compressing the gas in it, could carry enough gas to run a Ford car for 100 miles. If that would work out, it pretty well solves the power problem in the West. When one bears in mind that straw runs about two tons to the acre, it is easy to see what tremendous quantities are available, what practically unlimited quantities are in the possession of every farmer.

The apparatus to which I have referred is very simple in construction. I do not know that it is yet being manufactured for sale. Fortunately it can be used in small plants, and so individual farmers may have it, and I have every reason to believe that for less than $1,000 it can be installed, covered and ready for use. From the retort the residue is the carbonized straw. It is said to run about 1,400 pounds to the ton, and the suggestion is made that it might be used in briquetting. I have not seen any briquetting done, and do not know how successful it would be. From what I saw the whole thing had every appearance of having passed the experimental stage. If it works out successfully, it would be the greatest boon to the farmers of the West to have such means of light, heat and power immediately available. It will revolutionize farm conditions to a very great extent. I suggest to the Government that in considering this question of fuel it give some attention to the uses of straw for fuel.

Mr. D. D. McKENZIE (North Cape Breton): The question raised by the hon. member for East Lambton (Mr. J. E. Armstrong) is a very important one particularly to the part of the country from which I come. The most practical problem involved is the opening of the ways of transportation between the far East of Canada and the West. In the East we have coal in abundance, and other commodities also that are required in the West, while Ontario and the West has abundance of things that we need. To make possible the exchange of these commodities is the problem. Of course, this is not a new question with myself, coming as I do from the coal fields of Nova Scotia and having realized long ago the importance of being able to send our coal, our lumber, and other products, into Ontario and the West in competition with the United States and other places which may seek the same markets.

It would seem that the deepening of our waterways is the true solution of the question. If steamers can be loaded at Port Arthur for Atlantic ports or any ports intervening, and, reversely, steamers can be loaded at Atlantic ports for the trip up the St. Lawrence and the Great Lakes to Port Arthur and intervening ports, the problem will be solved. I submit to the Minister of Finance and the Government that nothing more deserves their attention than the deepening of our waterways. I submit that the construction of the Hudson Bay Railway or the Georgian Bay canal should not be considered in comparison with the practical question of deepening the canals of the St. Lawrence. If it were possible for us to load coal in Sydney for Port Arthur and intervening ports, we should be in a position to give to the people of Ontario excellent fuel for all purposes. It has been represented by some that Nova Scotia coal is not a good coal for domestic purposes. I can assure hon. members—and many people in the Maritime Provinces can bear me out—that it is a very excellent article for domestic purposes. And if it is necessary to convert it into coke, it has proven its worth in that way; we have large steel works in Nova Scotia depending altogether on coke from our own coal. If facilities were placed at the command of our people we should be able to land our coal, our iron, our steel, our coke, as well as tar and chemicals produced from coal, our potatoes, lumber, and other articles which we have in abundance, in Ontario ports, and even send them to points in the West. In return, we would take from Ontario flour, wheat, corn, bacon, and manufactured goods, and from the West the products that they have in abundance there. The use of our coal would afford cheap power for the manufactories of Ontario. On the other hand, we would be able to lay down in these sections cheap coal of a most excellent quality. Instead of thinking about storing wheat in elevators on Hudson Bay, if you deepened the canals and opened up a way from Port Arthur to Atlantic ports, such as Halifax, North Sydney and Louisburg, your elevators would be built at Halifax, North Sydney and Louisburg, where you have the open ocean without a speck of ice to interfere with you all the year round. You can store your wheat there and you are not under the necessity of having your wheat in elevators at Port Arthur, Montreal and other places for the greater part of the year ice bound. The ships that would bring up coal, lumber and other articles as well would carry wheat back and a profitable trade would be established through the Great Lakes. Store the coal for winter purposes in convenient places in the West. There is no trouble in your erecting elevated chutes or pockets by erecting trestles over railways and alongside of wharves from where you discharge your coal, so that your cars would run under these chutes at any time in the winter and it would be easy to handle the coal. That is the way they store coal in chutes at the great coal centres of Nova Scotia. The coal is ready in two or two and a half hours to load the largest ship that comes alongside the pier. In like manner you could store coal at central places in the West, and your coal cars could run under these chutes and get the coal. You have the opportunity of storing your wheat on the Atlantic coast and storing your coal at whatever places in the West may be found convenient by this interchange of traffic once the canals are deepened. I may be talking without knowledge. I have no great knowledge of what is necessary to deepen these canals, but we do know that they are now down to a depth of 14 feet. It is expected that the Welland canal will soon be down to a depth of 25 feet, and if that can be done on the Welland canal, and if they have been able to go to a depth of 14 feet on the various other canals, there is no reason why they should not be brought down to the proper depth. It would be a magnificent boon to the country and something that would redound to the general advantage of all Canada.

We have a supply of coal, iron and steel in Nova Scotia which is inexhaustible, and there need be no fear that great expense will be put on the canals and that the facilities will not be profitable because we have not a sufficient supply. I do not know that it is any exaggeration to state that the coal belt of Nova Scotia is 250 miles long, extending from Louisburg, on the Atlantic, away down around the sinuosities of the Gulf of St. Lawrence to Cumberland, about 250 miles of coast, averaging between 10 and 25 miles wide. That magnificent belt of coal has only really been touched here and there although millions of tons are being taken out of it. With these great opportunities for the development of coal, iron and steel, lumber and other forest products and with the capabilities of Prince Edward Island, New Brunswick and Nova Scotia in the production of root crops that would be available to our friends in the West, a magnificent opportunity would be established for a permanent and profitable trade within our own bounds, making us forever independent practically of anybody outside of Canada. I felt that it was incumbent upon me, in view of the great interest that is taken in this matter by the people living in the part of the country from which I come, to make these observations. I feel under a debt of gratitude to my hon. friend from East Lambton (Mr. Armstrong) for having brought this very practical and important subject before the House and the country.

Sir THOMAS WHITE (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I am sorry my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster) is not present this evening because it had been his intention to speak on this resolution. I join in the expression of gratitude of the hon. member who has just taken his seat (Mr. McKenzie) towards the mover of this resolution, the hon. member for East Lambton (Mr. Armstrong) for his very able exposition of the subject and for the painstaking attention that he has evidently bestowed on the preparation of the speech in which he has brought it to the attention of the House. I followed his remarks with the closest attention and all who have spoken are unanimous in their view as to the extreme importance of the question of the fuel supply of the Dominion. My hon. friend from East Lambton has truly pointed out that our supplies of bituminous and anthracite coal—or more properly bituminous coal, because we have comparatively little anthracite developed—lie on the extreme east and west and that, in so far as the central provinces are concerned, Quebec and Ontario are largely dependent for their coal supply upon the United States to the south. The province of Ontario is dependent at the present time for the bituminous coal supply used in connection with its great industries upon the United States. The hon. member for East Lambton has pointed out that this is a situation which might at some time give rise to apprehension. In that connection I might mention the great importance to the province of Ontario of the development of her unexcelled water powers. These water powers, I think, will play an increasingly important part in the economy of Ontario and Quebec and of other provinces as well in the future, and in the electrical development of the country as applied to production. I think that Canada has the greatest resources in water powers of any country in the world, and certainly the future will witness a very great development in that connection. The hon. member for North Cape Breton has pointed out the great resources of Nova Scotia and Cape Breton Island in coal. He has stated, and I think truly, that their resources in that respect are practically inexhaustible. In Nova Scotia, and especially in Cape Breton Island, there are available for the production of coke and steel all the natural elements required comprising the iron ore which is procured from Belle Isle, limestone in practically unlimited quantities, as well as immense resources in coal, the coal areas extending out underneath the sea. So that, so far as Nova Scotia herself is concerned, her industrial future would seem to be assured. But there is coal there in amounts more than adequate for even her increasing industrial requirements, and my hon. friend to-night has expressed the opinion that if the St. Lawrence canals were deepened that coal might be made available for the requirements of central and western Canada. I think there is a great deal to be said for that view. The deepening of the Welland canal had been proceeding apace before the outbreak of the war, and I have no doubt that upon the conclusion of the war, as soon as it is financially practicable to resume work, the deepening of that canal will be completed. And I should look forward myself to the deepening also of the St. Lawrence canals, as my hon. friend has suggested. I think that is bound to come in the development of Canada. The war naturally interrupted many of these projects which had engaged our attention before its outbreak. How long it will last, of course, we do not know, or how much expense it will entail upon the country. Until we do know that it is premature to express an opinion as to the undertaking of these large works, no doubt of national importance, all of them, which engaged the attention of this and preceding Governments in the past, and will undoubtedly engage the attention of Governments in the future, after the war is over.

The question of the development of our peat resources has been touched upon. There is no doubt that these resources are vast. I have no practical knowledge as to peat, but so far as my experience has gone, up to date its commercial development does not appear to have been practicable. The industry has always appeared promising, and yet when capital has been invested in it, with the outlook, so far as one could judge most favourable, conditions have arisen under which success has not been possible, and money has been lost. The result is that, so far as Ontario is concerned, the peat industry has not attained any considerable dimensions or its development met with any considerable degree of success, at least that is my impression. But while that is so, it by no means follows that the future development of the peat industry is destined to such a fate. It is quite possible that, with the progress of invention and with the increase in population, peat may play a large part in our future domestic and industrial economy. I think that very probable. So far as the West is concerned, it has been pointed out by the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff) to-night that the coal or lignite areas there are practically inexhaustible. I think that is so. In Saskatchewan and Alberta we know there are many deposits of coal and lignite. The difficulty, it appears to me, at the present time, is that you have a comparatively sparse population, and as success in mining coal of that character will depend on demand and demand immediately at hand, because transporation difficulties have to to be taken into consideration, notwithstanding the best efforts that might be put forth, the development of the fuel areas of Saskatchewan and Alberta as well as the southern part of Manitoba must proceed rather slowly. The hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Buchanan) has pointed out another reason which inclines me to the same view. So far as British Columbia is concerned, we have got the bituminous coal there from which is produced the coke which is indispensable in connection with the industries of southern British Columbia. All these considerations indicate the extreme importance of the question of coal and other fuel for the industrial development of Canada. Of almost as great importance, though not quite as great, is the question of the supply and cheapness of fuel, soft and hard coal, and lignite if it can be made available, for domestic use. The question will probably become more acute as the population of the country increases, and I myself would hope to see, apart from any action of the Government, a progressive demand for fuel, such as soft coal and lignite, for these purposes. But my hon. friend is right in urging that the Government should give special attention to the whole question, because it touches vitally our production and the comfort of our people, and is therefore one of the larger problems of Canada.

So far as I can see, the resolution is one which might well be adopted by the House. I shall make it a point to bring it to the attention of the Minister of Mines and the department under him. I would suggest to the hon. member for East Lambton (Mr. Armstrong) that the resolution be amended to read instead of "through legislation and otherwise," "through legislation or otherwise." It has not been shown that legislation is necessaray in this connection. Of course, if any legislation is necessary, the Government could bring it down. If the hon. member will make that slight change, I think that, so far as the Government is concerned, the resolution may be accepted. We are all as one as to the extreme importance of the matter, and while the energies of the Government must necessarily be engrossed by the war, still I see no reason why the department should not go carefully into the matter, and if there is anything which the Government can do at the present time, we shall be only too glad to do it.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Mr. Speaker, I am very glad to hear the remarks of the Minister of Finance with regard to the importance of the development of electricity. That, of course, would be a very important matter for Ontario, and I think also for the province of Quebec and the western provinces. I happen to know from engineering work which was carried on when I was Minister of Public Works, that there are on the Saskatchewan river splendid opportunities for enormous water power development. We all know what has been done upon the Winnipeg river about one hundred miles from the city of Winnipeg, and I believe that the development which has taken place there and has resulted in giving the people of Winnipeg electricity at a very reasonable rate, is only a tithe of the development which could take place.

The same observation, to a large extent, applies to the province of British Columbia and, to a lesser extent, to the Maritime provinces. I think that a great deal could be done in the way of supplying the people of many of our cities and towns with electricity, not merely for light and power purposes, but also for heating purposes, at a rate which would compete with coal. The committee that has to do with the reconstruction of the Parliament buildings took up the question of heating the new building with electricity. Arrangements have been made so that if in the future electricity can be furnished at a price to compete with coal, the boilers which are to be placed in the building can be supplied with an electrical current to heat the water which would be carried to the boilers and distributed throughout the building. From inquiries which I made from electrical engineers, I became convinced that if the Government were to take hold in a large way of the development of power in the city of Ottawa by completely damming the Ottawa river, an enormous electrical development could be secured. Electricity could be furnished at a price in the vicinity of $10 per horse power, which would compete successfully with coal. If that result could be brought about, electricity could be used with very great advantage for heating not only public buildings, but also residences and ordinary places of business. The same remark, I am sure, would apply to the heating of the buildings in many other cities and towns throughout the Dominion.

I should like to see the resolution broadened. Its weakness is that it is limited to anthracite and bituminous coal, peat and lignite. I do not think that this House ought to commit itself specially to urging the Government to proceed with the utilization of peat deposits, because, as the Finance Minister has said, experiments which have been made at considerable cost have not shown that peat can be manufactured in Canada on a commerical basis. I think that we ought not to specify then from modes in which work should be done by the Government. The resolution is too narrow because it eliminates altogether the development of electrical energy by water powers, which, I think, is of the greatest possible importance for heating as well as for other purposes. It ignores altogether the enormous deposits of oil shale which are to be found in Canada, in some parts of Ontario and very largely in the Maritime Provinces. I think that there are large shale deposits in Cape Breton, in the province of Nova Scotia—the member for North Cape Breton will correct me if I am wrong—and in the province of New Brunswick the deposit of shale is colossal in its magnitude. Experts of the Mines Branch say that these deposits would yield from forty to fifty gallons per ton of shale. In the extraction of oil from the shale there could be produced vast quantities of sulphate of ammonia, which could be utilized advantageously for agricultural purposes, perhaps taking the place of the potash which we are now unable to get from Germany, which we may be unable to get for a great many years and which would therefore be of enormous benefit to the farmers of Canada. I am told by experts that from those shale deposits a great many thousand tons of shale per day could be mined, which would yield enormous quantities of oil suitable for fuel purposes. It seems to me that this resolution ought to be broad enough to cover deposits of that character as well. The resolution is a very important one. It urges that the Government give favourable consideration to matters which are vital to the future welfare of the country. If my hon. friend is not prepared tonight to enlarge the resolution by an amendment along these lines, I would suggest that he allow the resolution to stand over, in order that, perhaps after a conference with the Government, he might make it broad enough to include these various resources, which might be developed to great advantage.

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: I appreciate the generous treatment which the House has given this resolution, and I appreciate also the words of the hon. member for St. John city. He has called attention to the development of electricity in Canada. I do not think that he was present when I was referring to that subject. I called attention to the fact that were it not for the present development of electricity in Canada, we should be compelled to import from the United States and other outside points an amount of coal equal to the amount which we are importing to-day, and I urged the Government to see if it was possible to find other means of developing electrical energy in Canada. What I am particularly urging on the Government is the need of investigating the fuel resources of Canada; that steps should be taken to see whether the available fuel supply—electricity and oil shales included, if you like—in our country can be developed along scientific and practical lines, in order that our people may be able to secure fuel at a more reasonable rate than that at which they are now securing it. I feel that we should dispose of the resolution to-night, because the days are going by when private members have the opportunity of taking up such resolutions. If the Finance Minister would agree to have the resolution include electrical energy and oil shales, I have no objection whatever. I call attention to the fact that we have a commission appointed for scientific research, composed of a number of prominent men from the different universities, including Professor MacCallum, who is at its head. It would be their duty, I think, to take this matter up and see if they could develop it along practical, rational and common sense lines.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: In order that this motion may be disposed of, I would suggest that the hon. member for East Lambton amend it by inserting after the word "peat" on the seventh line the words "Oil shales," and after the word "deposits" on the seventh line the words "and water-powers."

Motion as amended agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT FOR HOLIDAY.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Next Thursday being Ascension Day and a holiday, I move:

That when this House adjourns on Wednesday, the 16th instant, it stand adjourned until Friday, the 18th instant.

Motion agreed to.

On motion of Sir Thomas White, the House adjourned at 11.20 p.m.

[Mr. Armstrong.]

Tuesday, May 15, 1917.

The House met at Three o'clock, the Speaker in the Chair.

PRIVATE BILL.

FIRST READING.

Bill No. 48, respecting The British Columbia and White River Railway Company.—Mr. Clements.

EXCHEQUER COURT ACT.

AMENDMENT PROPOSED.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE (Kamouraska) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 49, to amend the Exchequer Court Act.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this Bill is to amend section 20 of the Exchequer Court Act, which gives jurisdiction to the Exchequer Court to entertain certain claims against the Crown. Subsection (c) of section 20 reads:

Every claim against the Crown arising out of any death or injury to the person or to property on any public work, resulting from the negligence of any officer or servant of the Crown, while acting within the scope of his duties or employment.

As you are aware, Sir, the Crown is not liable for any wrong committed by its servants except when its liability is so provided by statute; and it has been decided by the Supreme Court of Canada, in two or three instances, especially last year in the case of Piggotts vs. the Crown, that no claim can be entertained for an accident arising on a public work if the property or the person injured were not on the public work itself. For instance, in the case which I have just mentioned, the owner of a dock which had been destroyed through an explosion of dynamite on a Government wharf was denied all claim to compensation because his dock was on an adjoining property instead of being on the Government property itself. Judges of the Supreme Court have stated especially that the section as it stands constitutes a stupid enactment, and that justice has often been denied thereby. The amendment I propose is to insert the words "on any public work" after the words "while acting," so that the subsection will read:

Every claim against the Crown arising out of any death or injury to the person or to property on any public work, resulting from the negligence of any officer or servant of the Crown, while acting on any public work within the scope of his duties or employment.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

Sir THOMAS WHITE moved:

That on Wednesday, the 16th day of May, and subsequent Wednesdays until the end of the session, Government Notices of Motions and Government Orders shall have precedence after Questions and Notices of Motions for production of papers.

When this motion was moved yesterday by the Minister of Trade and Commerce, the leader of the Opposition asked that it be allowed to stand until to-day so that he might make some inquiries.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Mr. Speaker, the House is aware that many notices of motion from private members have been allowed to stand until the return of the Prime Minister. The Prime Minister has now, I am happy to say, returned safely from his trip, and we may now take up these motions. If my hon. friend will agree to have the date changed to Wednesday, the 23rd of May, I shall have no objection to the motion.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The original motion was to take Wednesday, the 9th day of May, and now it has stood over until the 15th and we desire to make it apply from to-morrow; but if my right hon. friend is not ready to indicate the motions which have been allowed to stand, I think we shall comply with his request.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I will agree that the Government take Wednesday, not of this week, but of the following week. To-morrow we will take up the questions which have stood in the absence of the Prime Minister.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: We will meet the request of my right hon. friend. I ask to be allowed to amend the motion to read: "Wednesday, the 23rd day of May" instead of "Wednesday, the 16th day of May."

Motion as amended agreed to.

CORRECTION.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. PUGSLEY: I would like to make a correction in Hansard. In a remark that I made yesterday upon the discussion of the resolution moved by the hon. member for East Lambton (Mr. Armstrong), I am reported to have used these words, having reference to the oil shale deposits in New Brunswick.

Experts of the Mines Branch say that these deposits would yield from $40 to $50 per ton of shale.

That conveys the impression that the results would be such as to astonish the world. What I said was:

Experts of the Mines Branch say that these deposits would yield from forty to fifty gallons of oil per ton of shale.

WESTERN COAL MINING.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. W. A. BUCHANAN (Medicine Hat): Has the Minister of Labour any information to-day concerning the matter I spoke about yesterday when I intimated that the United Mine Workers of America had called a general strike? I understood the reply of the minister to be that he had no official information to that effect. I have since seen in the press that the report is correct, that all the mines have been closed; that already there is a shortage of steam coal, and that the Granby smelter has been forced to close down because of want of coal. Has any action been taken by the Government to assist in bringing about a settlement?

Hon. T. W. CROTHERS (Minister of Labour): Since I replied to my hon. friend's question yesterday, I have received a message to say that the miners have all ceased work in District No. 18. Beyond the telegrams that have passed between the miners and myself nothing has been done in the matter.

M. VIVIANI'S SPEECH.

EXTRA COPIES TO BE PRINTED FOR CIRCULATION.

On the Orders of the Day:

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Just before the adjournment last evening the hon. member for South Renfrew (Mr. Graham) requested that a number of additional copies of Hansard containing the speech of M. Viviani should be printed by the Government. I have caused instructions to be issued this morning for 25,000 additional copies to be printed, and these will be available at the Distribution Office for such members as desire to send them to their constituents. Should a further supply be required I shall be glad to give it my attention.

THE BUDGET.

NOTICE OF AMENDMENTS.

On the Order being called for resuming the adjourned debate on the motion of Sir Thomas White, that Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair for the House to go into Committee of Ways and Means.

Hon. FRANK OLIVER (Edmonton): Mr. Speaker, I desired to move an amendment to the resolution, but as it was ruled out of order by the Deputy Speaker, I beg now to give notice that on the second reading of the resolution I shall make a motion suggesting the desirability of a revision of the tariff downwards.

Mr. J. A. ROBB (Huntingdon): The amendment which I presented last Friday morning having been ruled out of order, I now beg to give notice that on the second reading of the resolution I shall present a similar motion.

Mr. F. B. CARVELL (Carleton, N.B.): On behalf of the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Loggie), who is unavoidably absent to-day, I beg to give notice that on the second reading of the resolution he will move the amendment regarding the free entry of potatoes into Canada, of which he gave notice last week.

DEBATE ON ANNUAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE.

The consideration of the proposed motion of Sir Thomas White (Minister of Finance) for the Committee of Ways and Means, and the amendment of Mr. Turriff thereto, was resumed from Thursday, May 10.

Mr. W. F. CARROLL (South Cape Breton): Although the debate on the Budget has been somewhat extended, I desire to make a few remarks on certain features of it. From many standpoints the Budget is very satisfactory, and perhaps the most satisfactory feature in connection with it has been the splendid response which has been made by the people of Canada to the domestic loans which were floated by the Department of Finance. I think some $350,000,000 was contributed by the people of Canada to these war loans, and that speaks well, I think, not only for the generosity of our people but for their patriotism also, and augurs well for what I conceive to be the policy that should be followed by future governments in this country in placing loans. I believe that we should continue in the future to try and meet our indebtedness by domestic loans, as that will keep the money in this country, and give to those of our people who may have money to loan the advantage of a rate of interest which hitherto has been offered to foreign countries.

Free wheat has been a live issue in this country for very many years. It was a very live issue during the reciprocity campaign of 1911, and I am happy to say that although on that occasion there was a distinct party cleavage on the question, to-day the people of Canada, irrespective of political creed and affiliations, have come to realize that free wheat is a good thing. To-day it is no longer a matter of theory but an actual fact, and probably the Government's policy in this regard will be perpetuated. The Government are responsible for the statement that free wheat has been brought down as a war measure, but I think the people of this country will be hard to convince that such is the case. If it was a war measure, why was it postponed until the third year of the war? If free wheat were a necessity during war time, it should have been given a little earlier, say two years ago. To my mind it is simply a death-bed repentance on the part of the Government: they are endeavouring to fulfil their obligations to this country, especially to the people of the West.

Another feature of the Budget which has my most hearty approval is the taxation of war profits and other profits. I think this is a step in the right direction. Notwithstanding the fact that we may look for a speedy termination of the war, I trust that this Government or any other Government that may succeed it will continue to raise money by taxation of exorbitant profits arising not only out of war business but in any other business. If I have any criticism to make in regard to that feature of the Budget, it is that the Finance Minister has not gone far enough; he should have made the percentage a little higher. If we may judge from the circumstances and facts surrounding this feature of the Budget, the Government look on taxation of profits as merely a temporary expedient, and when the war is over they will probably resort to the ordinary taxation methods. Personally, I do not think they should do so. I think that we should look for a decrease in the tariff in the future, and if we are to have a low tariff it will be necessary to raise the new revenue by taxation of profits.

I am sure the people of this country will condemn the Minister of Finance for not introducing an income tax. The Finance Minister tells us that an income tax would be unworkable in Canada at the present time, and I have no doubt there would be many difficulties in the way of raising income tax in Canada at the present time. But difficulties will arise in all reforms of this nature. Governments must expect difficulties, and must face them in no cowardly fashion. They had difficulties in Great Britain, no doubt, when income tax was introduced there years ago, and they had similar difficulties in the United States, and certainly the difficulties the United States had to face about a hundred years ago, when income tax was introduced there, were quite as great if not greater than the difficulties we should have to face at the present time. The Minister of Finance says an income tax should not be resorted to by the Government until the necessity becomes clearly and unmistakably apparent. Well, Sir, if ever there was a time in this country when the necessity for an income tax was unmistakably apparent, it is now when we need such a large revenue to meet our obligations. If I am correct in assuming that taxation of profits is merely a temporary measure, then we must look to some others means of taxation in this country for the future.

And I do not know any more expedient means of taxation than the income tax. Many people say that this system would be unfair to the persons who have small incomes, especially with the prices of necessaries so high as at present. That depends on how the tax is levied. It would be unfair to put a high income tax on the man whose income is only $1,000, but any man who has an income of $3,000 or upwards could well afford to pay an income tax. But these are not the only persons who would be affected. The income tax would raise revenues from the people who now are not touched at all by any form of special war tax, the half-millionaires, millionaires, multi-millionaires, who derive large incomes from money invested in various channels where it is now untaxed. I hope that when the next Budget comes down the foundation will be laid for an income tax system for Canada. Though the people of Canada have contributed $350,000,000 towards war expenditure by domestic loan, and $40,000,000 for patriotic purposes, yet the time is coming when the country will have to face, unaided by these special contributions, very large expenditures, and we who hope for a downward move in the tariff must look for other means of raising public revenue; and I say that the only legitimate other means in sight is that of an income tax.

Many hon. members who have taken part in this debate have congratulated the Minister of Finance on the large revenues which he was able to report in his Budget. They have congratulated him also on the fact that the value of our exports is greatly in excess of the value of our imports. Well, this may be a matter of congratulation or it may not. If we were sending $100,000,000 out to pay interest on our public debt, that would appear as an export, but it would not be a matter on which Canada should be congratulated. The system of domestic loans, if it were extended, would mean a smaller amount of interest paid outside our own borders, and this would show in the form of a relatively smaller export of goods. In this sense, a reduction of exports may be a sign of prosperity and of sound finance.

We have been asked to practise thrift and economy. The natural presumption is that those who call upon others to practise thrift are practising it themselves. There is an old saying that charity begins at home, and the Minister of Finance and hon. members of this House may be reminded by those to whom they give such good advice that thrift is like charity in this respect. I am not in a position, I am sorry to say, to declare that the Government has taken the lead in the matter of thrift and economy. Consider, for instance, the increases in expenditures by the Dominion. I have compared the figures for 1911 with those of 1915, and they work out as follows:

Percentage of increase of expenditures, 1915 as compared with 1911.

	Per cent.
Justice	13
Arts, Agriculture and Statistics	300
Civil Government	88
Fisheries	91
Mines and Geological Survey	92
Immigration	50
Indians	65
Lighthouses and Coastal Service	30
Miscellaneous	151
Mounted Police	32
Public Works (Con. Fund Account)	233
Public Works (Collection of Revenue)	67
Customs	72
Yukon	14
Excise	18
Post Office	114

It will be noticed that there is an increase of 50 per cent in the expenses on account of immigration. If there is any one branch of government of which it may be said more than any other that its expenditure should not have increased, it is the Immigration Branch, and, indeed, the whole Department of the Interior. I shall refer later on to the matter of the exodus and shall show by conclusive figures that more people are leaving this country than are coming in. Why the expenditure of the Immigration Branch should increase 50 per cent in four years under such conditions is more than I can understand. As to the increase in expenditure in the Mounted Police, I do not know whether that takes in the police expenditure of the West or not. If not, then as the Mounted Police can hardly be the necessity they have been in the past, the expenditure ought to be going down instead of going up. There is an increase of 12 per cent even in the expenditure on the Yukon. This is another instance which goes to prove that this Government is not practising business economy but is rather taking the other course. For in the Yukon—and I am making no reflection on that country—there should not be the same burden of expense upon the Dominion treasury that there formerly was, because it is well known that the population of the territory has declined very much indeed. Besides the department I have named there are Dominion Lands, Railways and Canals, Weights and Measures. There has been a very great increase in the Militia Department. Of course it has been necessary greatly to increase the number of employees in that department. I shall have something to say about that later on.

But here is a Government that is telling the people that they should practise thrift and economy. Of course, the Minister of Finance is only doing his duty when he gives that advice. I think that the Government which gives that advice—gratuitous advice—should certainly make some attempt to practice the virtue that it commends to the attention of others. But, until the contrary is shown me, I am compelled to believe that the Government is very far from practising thrift. The hon. member for St. Antoine, Montreal (Sir Herbert Ames), I think it was, made the statement in this House that the appointment of additional employees is discouraged, as well as any increase of salaries.

While the appointment of additional employees should be discouraged, nevertheless the appointment of additional employees is going on. I had it a day or two ago, on what I consider to be fairly reliable authority, that the hon. the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Roche) during the present year has appointed 400 new employees in the Forestry Branch of his department. While the hon. gentleman says new appointments are being discouraged, new appointments, nevertheless are being made. In regard to the statement of the hon. member that the advancement of salaries should be discouraged, I desire to say that if there ever was a time when the salaries of low paid officials, either in the employment of the Government, or of corporations, or of private concerns, should be advanced, it is the present. I do not think it is necessary to extend that argument farther than to say that the prices of commodities, of the necessities of life, have gone on increasing until in some cases they have advanced 100 per cent, while the average increase is 45 per cent. In view of that fact, if there ever was a time when not only the Government of this country, but all the employers of labour should advance the salaries of their servants, that time is the present. Therefore, I do not agree with the hon. member for Montreal, St. Antoine, when he makes the statement.

As far as the Militia Department is concerned, before the war, that department had 103 employees, and since the war it has 2,078. I would not say that these employees are not necessary. Since the war the Separation Allowance and Assigned Pay Branch has been established and the employees number 604; the Records Office is also a new branch, with 634 employees; the Estates Branch is a new branch with 31 employees; the Paymaster Casualties Branch has 41 employees; the Audit Branch, 5; the Record Branch, 48; and the Deputy Chief Censor's Branch, 8. These are all new branches and there is reason for the appointment of these employees. But in the other departments, where business has not increased, possibly with the exception of the Customs Department, I cannot see the necessity of the very large number of new employees who have been added to the staffs of these departments.

The hon. the Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White) and the Government have been congratulated by their friends and others because of the good times which prevail at present. There is no doubt that, compared with the years 1912 to 1914, there are good times in this country, but I do not think that the Government of the day should take very much credit to themselves for having brought about these good times. During the years from 1912 to 1914 Canada faced a very serious situation. Factories were closed down and thousands of men and women were out of employment and walking our streets. Then the war came and the munition factories grew up. It is a good thing, and the people are to be congratulated upon the fact that to-day they are able to turn out millions and millions of tons of war munitions with which to fight the common enemy. That is all very well, but the situation, as far as prosperity is concerned, arises alone and altogether from the fact that these large industries have sprung up. They are a blessing, therefore, but as far as the rest of the country is concerned, as far as our ordinary industries and manufactories are concerned, outside of those which are manufacturing the necessities of war, the country is in no better position, it is not in as good a position as it was in 1910. As a matter of fact, it is in a worse position. The labouring man has a harder time to exist, a harder time to live, a more difficult task not only to provide for himself, but to fulfil his obligations to his children and those dependent on him. I know that is true in the part of the country from which I come. While it pleases the hon. the Minister of Labour (Mr. Crothers) to say that there is no distress in this country, I say that there is a large measure of distress due to the exorbitant prices which are being asked for the necessities of life. If the Government is to be congratulated on the fact that we have good times, I say that is true to a certain extent, but that it is as false as false can be to a still greater extent. The Minister of Labour the other evening criticised us on this side of the House for daring to say anything which would reflect in any way upon his department, or upon the manner in which he was conducting, or misconducting, that department. We, on this side of the House, as hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House representing constituencies, like to voice the grievance of the people in these constituencies, and the greatest grievance we have to voice in this House at the present time arises from the fact that the prices of foodstuffs have been allowed to soar so high that to-day it is practically impossible for the ordinary labourer to provide for the actual and bare necessities of life. That is not an exaggerated yarn. Any hon. gentleman who will take the time to go into this question must come to the same conclusion. The cost of labour has not gone up very much. In our own part of the country it has gone up perhaps fifteen or twenty per cent and I am looking to a still further increase, but when we look around and find that the cost of living has gone up 45 per cent we see that the people are suffering an actual hardship in the effort to sustain themselves and their families. A man who was getting $2 a day two years ago is perhaps getting $2.20 at the present time. How far will that go towards maintaining a large family?

When the Minister of Labour says there is no distress he does not know this country, he does not take the trouble to know it and I am afraid he does not take the trouble to investigate the facts in connection with the cost of living. He tells us, of course, that he did certain things, that he was responsible for the passing of the Order in Council by which the excessive cost of foodstuffs, and other commodities, could be investigated. He tells us of the sleepless days and nights he has spent over this matter. He makes two speeches in this House in the last two weeks, on this important question, one a duplicate of the other, but while all this is going on, while the minister is taking credit for having succeeded in passing this Order in Council, and while it takes two speeches to try to satisfy the people that he is doing something, what consequences are flowing from that Order in Council and from what the Minister of Labour has done? The price of foodstuffs is still soaring. Can the Minister of Labour point to one single commodity the price of which has not been raised in the last two years? Can the minister point to one commodity the price of which has been decreased through the Order in Council which he succeeded in passing? That is a fair test. Can the minister show that the price of one of the necessities of life, which an ordinary family has to use, has decreased through his labours or through his Order in Council? He cannot, and that is the test of the efficiency of the Order in Council which the Minister of Labour has passed. It reminds me of a friend of mine who was speaking of a neighbour and who said that he had a large supply of very inaccurate knowledge. There may be this difference between my friend's neighbour and the Minister of Labour, that while my friend's neighbour had a large amount of information of a very inaccurate kind, the Minister of Labour apparently has no information at all, and, further than that, his activities are misdirected, and his labours are useless, because if he is unable to point out any good that has come of these labours, then I say they are misdirected and useless and a waste of time. Two years ago, the hon. member for Brantford (Mr. Cockshutt), who is a valued member of the other side of the House and who always takes an active interest in public affairs, introduced a resolution in this House warning the Government and calling upon them to give some attention to the price of foodstuffs in Canada. Everybody who had anything to do with either the commercial or political life of this country knew that the price of foodstuffs was bound to increase during war time. I had the pleasure at that time of supporting the resolution as warmly as I possibly could. I suggested then, as I think the hon. member for Brantford suggested, that this Government should take certain control of foodstuffs, that they should appoint a food controller who would be keen and alive to his job, who would go about the country investigating, and at whose instance the Government would place certain maximum prices upon foodstuffs. The Government did not heed the warning. I remember quite well that the Prime Minister at that time said it would be an impossibility; it would be running against a rock of Gibralter; it would interfere with the commerce of this country The Australian people did not think so. The result is that to-day, as the hon. member for Brantford foretold, living is almost an impossibility to the ordinary men; and yet the Minister of Labour says there is no distress in this country, and he promulgates an Order in Council whose affect has been nil—it has accomplished absolutely no good. If I am wrong in this statement, I should like to be put right, and to have it pointed out to me in what direction this Order in Council has made good. Has the work that has been done in connection with this Order in Council reduced by one iota the price of any foodstuff or other commodity that it was intended to affect?

The Order in Council is rather extended, and I shall not read it to the House. It provides a method by which certain things may be investigated. For example, it provides a method by which the council of a municipality, a town council for instance, may investigate the prices of commodities in its immediate neighbourhood. I pointed out to the Minister of Labour the other day that this was a most absurd proposal in many instances. In our own province, for example, we have municipal councils covering in some cases hundreds of miles of territory. They meet once a year, I think in February, in some municipalities twice a year, in February and April. If the people of those municipalities have to wait for a whole year in order to place before the council of the municipality any grievance that they may have as to existing high prices of commodities in their neighbourhood, you can see what the value of the Order in Council is as regards those localities. In cities and towns that is overcome by the fact that councils meet once a week at least, in some places more frequently. That is one instance. But why did the Minister of Labour, apart from that phase of the question, place the onus upon the councils of municipalities? Why did he not himself tackle this subject? He is not a very busy man; his department are not very busy people. Why did they not tackle this proposal themselves? The retail merchants of this country—and I think I am voicing the sentiment of the great bulk of the people when I say this—are not responsible for the high prices of the commodities which they sell. As a matter of fact, I know of retailers who are selling below the price they are paying to wholesalers in order to accommodate, in some small measure, those who deal with them. In many parts of this country we have no large wholesalers. In the town from which I come, I do not think we have any wholesalers. If then we find that the price of flour is enormously high and we want our town council to investigate, where are they to investigate that question? They know quite well that the retail merchants are not making the profits on flour that they made several years ago, and they are allowed to investigate only those matters within their own jurisdiction. We have no wholesale dealers within our jurisdiction. What is our town council to do? They cannot go to Montreal, they cannot call upon the wholesaler in Montreal, Toronto or Halifax to appear before them and show cause why the price of flour is so high, because these people are outside the jurisdiction of that council. Surely the Minister of Labour and the Government can see that in those cases the Order in Council is absolutely useless. In ordinary times an Order in Council which would require, first, that the Minister should investigate, second, that the town council or council of the municipality should investigate, and then that the report of this town or municipal council's investigation should be sent back to the Minister who would then confer with the municipalities, and the municipalities would then refer the matter to the Attorney General of the province, surely that would not be the way to deal—I might say dally—with a question of primary importance in this country, as the high price of food has been for the last year, yes for the last two years.

I am not one of those who think that every other country is better than Canada, or that every other country is better governed than Canada. I believe that we have the greatest country in the world and one of the best governed, irrespective of what political party controls the political destinies of the country for the time being; but in the matter of controlling food prices, I think we lag behind all our Allies, for every one of them has tackled this subject in a practical way, and has done something to retard what I may call the awful increase in the cost of the commodities of life. This Government is the only one that has failed in this respect, and I think it should be severely criticised and brought to task for its lack of action. I hope the criticism which has been made on this question, if it will not waken up the Minister of Labour, will at least waken up the other members of the Government and make them alive to the fact that they are face to face with a very critical situation in Canada, the most critical in our history since Confederation.

The Minister of Labour, in two speeches of two hours' duration, tells us that through the joint labours of the Labour Department and the labouring people of Canada this Order in Council was drawn up. I repeat that if he or any member of the Government, or any man in this country can show us any good that has come from this Order in Council I shall be the first to bless him. But the good is apparently not there, because, although the Order in Council has been in existence several months, the rise in the price of the necessities of life during that time has been marvellous. Some of the other members of the Government should tackle this question in a live way. If they do they will have the blessing of the people, and I can assure the Minister of Finance that he will have my blessing, however much that may be worth.

The criticism which has been directed against the Government has not all come from this side of the House. The most cutting criticism that I heard in this House against the attitude of the Government on the question of the high cost of living came from a gentleman who occupies a seat on the other side. The hon. member for Brantford (Mr. Cockshutt) a few nights ago said:—

> Every country that professes to have a government has taken steps to control food prices.

No hon. gentleman on this side of the House made any such severe criticism as that.

It is not only the Liberal press which is criticising the Government in this respect. I picked up yesterday the Halifax Herald of May 12, 1917, which is the political organ of the Conservative party in the province of Nova Scotia. It quotes an advertisement appearing in the Winnipeg Tribune concerning the high price of flour in Winnipeg at that time, $14.50 a barrel, and, in the editorial comment, it says:—

> We appreciate the difficulties under which the members of the government have labored, and which still confront them in the prosecution of a great task. It is safe to say that no government in the history of Canada has accomplished more than the present Administration. The magnitude of the task, the well-nigh overwhelming nature of the crisis which suddenly confronted Canada in August, 1914 can scarcely be estimated, and the results achieved are universally recognized as being magnificent.
> We have no wish to harass the government, but it is our belief that the time is now fully ripe for the Administration at Ottawa to deal firmly and speedily with the question of the alleged hoarding of food supplies.
>
> In every nation, and every community, there are unfortunately a certain class of individuals who are quick to seize upon any opportunity which a crisis may afford for the sole and selfish purpose of enriching themselves at the expense of their fellows. The present food situation has been readily taken advantage of by unscrupulous food speculators to hold up various food commodities thus artificially inflating the price, the burden of which obviously falls on the masses. Such a course of action is shamefully unpatriotic, and certainly not worthy of any Britisher. Letters of protest in the press, strong invective poured forth in some platform utterance are utterly powerless to touch either the conscience or the manhood of the food-hoarder whose only god is GAIN. The strong arm of the government is alone capable of dealing with this problem in an effective manner.
>
> At this present hour in Halifax the price of flour has soared to over $17 per barrel; potatoes cannot be purchased under 70 cents per peck; it is therefore not to be wondered at that rumours are current to the effect that Nova Scotia itself is not wholly free from the grasping hand of the food speculator. We think it is high time to call—Halt!

This is the opinion of a Conservative organ in the province of Nova Scotia.

The labour organizations of Canada have taken up this question. They have passed resolutions—copies of which, I dare say, are now in the hands of the Government—calling for speedy action. The Halifax District Trades and Labour Council has endorsed a resolution adopted by the Sydney Trades and Labour Council with reference to Government control of food. The latter part of the resolution reads:—

> Be it therefore resolved, that the executive council ask for Government control of all foodstuffs until it is positively ascertained that our domestic needs are fully provided for and the cost of living reduced to normal conditions.

Perhaps it is rather too much to ask that the cost of food be reduced to that which prevails in normal conditions, because we are not now living under normal conditions. I do not think, however, that the ordinary people are asking that the price of foodstuffs should be brought down to what it is under normal conditions. But what they are asking and what they will continue to ask is that the cost of the necessities of life should be kept down under an abnormal amount.

I said a few moments ago that there was no apparent reason why the expenditure of the immigration Branch of the Department of the Interior should have increased about 50 per cent during the period from 1912 to 1915. When hon. gentlemen are told that an actual exodus of people is taking place from our country, they have food for reflection, and they are impelled to give some thought to the reasons why the expenditure in connection with immigration should be so large. I shall not go to the political press for the figures which I am going to give. The following paragraph from the April number of the Labour Gazette may very profitably engage the attention of the Department of the Interior:

> Of persons other than citizens of the United States, 1,043 left the United States in February, 1917, to take up permanent residence in British North America, as compared with 1,206 in January, 1917. On the other hand, 7,304 persons, other than citizens of the United States, departed from British North America in February, 1917, to take up permanent residence in the United States, as compared with 10,557 in January, 1917, indicating for British North America an outward balance of 6,261 in February of this class of persons as compared with an outward balance of 9,351 in January, 1917.

So that during the months of January and February of this year, there was, not taking into account American citizens, an outward balance of 15,612 persons. That does not indicate that there is that condition in this country which the Minister of Finance would lead us to believe. If the conditions were similar to those which prevailed before 1912, the figures would not be such as they are, because in that year the inward balance was far in the preponderance.

Another thing which the Immigration Branch of the Department of the Interior should take steps to inform itself about is what kind of people are going out, where the exodus is greatest and what is its cause. Are these people going out to escape military service? I do not think that they could be going out at that time to escape military service, because there was no conscription. Are they going out because of the fear of conscription in the future? I do not think that they are, because in the United States they are nearer to conscription than we are in Canada. The Government should obtain full information concerning this exodus, and should find out what kind of people are coming into the country and replacing those who have gone away. With regard to the Budget, that is all I have to say.

[Mr. Carroll.]

On reading Hansard of May 8, I was personally aggrieved to see some references made by the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards) concerning the right hon. gentleman who leads His Majesty's loyal Opposition in this House. Had those words come from the lips of the hon. member for East Simcoe (Mr. W. H. Bennett), I do not think I would pay very much attention to them; but as they come from a gentleman who for half an hour scored hon. members on this side of the House for their narrowness and their bigotry, I think some attention should be paid to them. This is what the hon. member for Frontenac is reported in Hansard to have said on May 8, page 1269:

> I have not great admiration for a leader who posed as a man desiring interprovincial amity and concord, and has encouraged his compatriots to the verge of revolution. Nor do I admire a leader who said that he would not seek to open the doors of office with a bloody key, and has smiled approval on tactics which have encouraged the enemy, retarded enlistment, and were intended solely to serve party ends.

In a time like this, when the people of this whole Empire are doing their utmost to keep the Union Jack floating, and to be in a position in the future to sing that song we are all so fond of—"Britannia Rules the Waves;" when Canadian families have been giving of their resources and of their blood to ensure that in the future the Union Jack shall fly as freely as it has done in the past, it is wrong that a right hon. gentleman who has led a political party successfully for some twenty-one years should be pointed out and painted to this country practically as a rebel, and that the intimation should be thrown out to the people of Canada by an hon. member, that the conduct of my right hon. leader has encouraged the enemy and retarded enlistment, and that he has encouraged his compatriots—I presume that refers to the French Canadians—to the verge of revolution. Those are generalities and I challenge the hon. member for Frontenac to attempt, in any future utterances which he may care to make in this House, to prove by one fact or by one utterance, the statement that he has made. It is high time that the hon. member (Mr. Edwards) should realize that this Empire is engaged in a serious war; that we are in the greatest crisis in which we have ever found ourselves, and that those sentiments to which he gave utterance the other day are not calculated to heal any sores that at the present time may be running in this country, but are calculated, on the contrary, to mark him as a man of very narrow vision, of very narrow ideals, and as a man who is attempting for political purposes to keep these sores open. We on this side of the House—and I do not think it should be necessary to reiterate this—are as loyal to the cause for which many of our friends have shed their blood as is the hon. member, and with the exception of the hon. member for Frontenac and the hon. member for East Simcoe who charged me with running away in order to escape the bullets of the enemy and with returning to Canada unscarred, there are few on the other side who would give utterance to such sentiments. We want it known in this country that we have a leader who, from the moment the gauntlet was thrown down by Germany and taken up by Great Britain, has done his utmost to fulfil the duty that is his by virtue of his being leader of the Opposition. Had he not done that and had we not confidence in him that he was doing his duty, he would not be our leader to-day; we would see to that ourselves. We have every confidence in the loyalty, not to speak of the integrity, of the right hon. gentleman who has successfully led the Liberal party for upwards of twenty-one years. Any man who introduces such questions and who tries to cast aspersions on my right hon. leader is not acting in the interest of this country at this or at any other time. Further on, the hon. member (Mr. Edwards) said:

> A minister of the Crown seeks to impress upon the audience the importance of their duty in regard to the war, and he is hooted and jeered at and howled down by young men in that audience who evidently do not wish to listen to any appeals along the lines of recruiting or enlistment.

The hon. gentleman is no doubt referring to the reception which the hon. Mr. Blondin received in Montreal. No man in this House condemns the action of those young irresponsibles more than I do myself, and I think the same condemnation will be meted out to them by every hon. member. But he goes on to say:

> The reason for this, Mr. Speaker, is clear. The man who is responsible for the condition of affairs that exists in the province of Quebec is the right hon. gentleman who leads the Opposition.

I think I am within the truth when I say that the leader of the Opposition was the first public man of note in this country who took the recruiting platform shortly after war broke out in August, 1914. Did the hon. member for Frontenac make any great efforts towards recruiting?

It is a crying shame, Mr. Speaker, and such tactics as those resorted to by the hon. member for Frontenac should meet with the condemnation of every right-thinking member of this House. I might have something to say, if I were so inclined, as to the cause of the reception that was given to the Hon. Mr. Blondin in Montreal the other day, but I shall say nothing about that now, except that the Militia authorities in this country have allowed a gentleman in the province of Quebec to wear the uniform of a colonel for the past four years notwithstanding the fact that he had the audacity to get up in the legislature of the province of Quebec and use the most seditious language. I understand that that gentleman, Armand Lavergne, still wears the King's uniform of a colonel, and is now recruiting for home defence in Canada. I do not know whether that is correct or not.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: He is not recruiting.

Mr. CARROLL: He has charge of Home Defence in some way or another. In view of the sentiments he has expressed, I say that the Militia authorities in this country should not allow him to wear the King's uniform, and I would advise my hon. friend from Frontenac to devote his energies to seeing that the King's uniform is not disgraced in that manner. Armand Lavergne was the same gentleman who at a public meeting at St. Stanislaus, Quebec, on November 7, 1915, said:

> If I had wanted to be a Cabinet Minister I could have been one four years before Blondin. The late Mr. Monk of Quebec, head of the Borden Government, offered Mr. Bourassa and myself porfolios. We refused, for we wanted to be free men. They wanted to know then in what way they could recompense me, whether with money or with a position, but I told them my reward was to have them keep their word of honour. They have not done so.

There is a long story connected with that, but the present is not a fitting time to go into it. When the hon. member for Frontenac makes such accusations as he did the other night against the right hon. leader of the Opposition I can tell him that the people of this country know something about a coalition that has existed in this country since 1911. The people are not blind; they have eyes to see, and ears to hear, and are of fairly good judgment and understanding, and when the time comes they will probably show how they resent the utterances of the hon. member for Frontenac and of other hon. gentlemen in regard to the responsibility for the small number of recruits that are being obtained in the province of Quebec, and kindred questions. I would not have referred to this matter at all had it not been for the statements of the hon. member for Frontenac the other day. I think his statements were entirely uncalled for; they were not compatible with truth, and certainly not compatible with British fair-play, and I think such statements should be frowned on by every man who is deserving of the name of Canadian.

Mr. S. FRANCIS GLASS (East Middlesex): I have listened with a great deal of interest to my hon. friend (Mr. Carroll) who in the course of his address has laid considerable stress on the rapid increase in the price of foodstuffs in this country, devoting special attention to the price of wheat and flour. I do not wish to continue the debate, but I should like to ask my hon. friend first of all, whether in his opinion the price of wheat bears any relation to the price of flour. Secondly, whether he is of the opinion that the price of wheat is controlled by any powers in this country. Representing a constituency of agriculturists, I should also like to know whether in his opinion the Government should have taken steps to fix the price which the farmer should receive for his wheat. Without such an arbitrary price for wheat I am unable to see how the price of flour could be regulated in this country. I should like to be able to tell my constituents just what the attitude of the hon. gentlemen opposite is in regard to these matters, so perhaps my hon. friend will answer these questions.

Mr. CARROLL: If my hon. friend wants me to answer these questions, perhaps it would be better for him to put them in writing. His first question, however, I think entirely frivolous because every one knows that the price of flour is controlled by the price of wheat. Replying to the second question, there is a power in this country that could control the price of foodstuffs, and that power is the Government of the day. Replying to the third question if the hon. gentleman had followed my remarks he would have seen that I was arguing all along for a maximum price for foodstuffs We have a precedent for that in Australia and in Great Britain; the United States have also taken strong measures in the same direction.

Mr. GLASS: If I understand my hon. friend aright his argument is that the Government should fix the price which the farmer should receive for his product.

Mr. PUGSLEY: And the miller also.

Mr. CARROLL: Yes. I do not know whether it is out of order for me to answer these questions, but the fault is not mine. The British Government wished to buy up the whole wheat supply of this country, and through the Minister of Trade and Commerce offered the Western farmer $1.35 a bushel for the whole year's supply. The farmers were not satisfied with that, but said they were willing to sell the year's output at an average of $1.55 per bushel. If our farmers were willing to sell for $1.55, how is it that wheat is selling to-day at $3 per bushel? Why did not the Government step in and say, we will fix the price at $1.55 on the average?

Mr. GLASS: My hon. friend would fix the price at $1.55.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: All these questions can come up in committee, not now.

Mr. GLASS: I want clearly to understand——

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. ROBERT CRUISE (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with surprise to hon. gentlemen opposite praising this wonderful Budget of the Minister of Finance. In my humble judgment, the Budget is no compliment to the intelligence of the people of this country. A Budget was brought down in Great Britain a few days ago. They know they are at war in that country, especially do the rich. While the British Chancellor is taking 80 per cent of the gross war profits and raising enormous sums, the Canadian Minister of Finance runs a small tooth comb through the fringes and raises the paltry sum of $12,500,000. It is time our rich men were making sacrifices commensurate with those of the boys in the trenches. There is a great contrast between that $12,500,000 and the twelve thousand casualties at Vimy Ridge It is time our manufacturers disgorged. Lloyd George, at the commencement of this war, said that men and money would win the war. Canada has given over 400,000 of her brave sons to fight the battles for freedom and justice in France. And when I think of the hardships that these men have to undergo, in the trenches with water to their knees, and sometimes to their hips in mud, sometimes going for days and nights without food and sleep—when I think of the sacrifices these men are making on the fields of France and Flanders, and then think of the paltry sum of only twelve and a half millions taken from the wealth of this country toward the expenses of the war, I think it time that some change were made in the matter of raising money to meet war expenses. As I speak there comes to my memory instances of the sacrifices that have been made. In the principal town of the constituency I have the honour to represent are a number of widowed mothers. One of these mothers had two sons; both those sons went to the front and gave their lives cheerfully on behalf of this country. And the widowed mother must put in the rest of her life on $22 a month, the gift of a grateful country. Another woman lost her husband in a Canadian Northern wreck several years ago. She had three or four sons. Of these, two went to fight our battles, and they will never return. Still another woman lost two of her five sons in defence and for the maintenance of the world's freedom. When I think of these sacrifices and then of the fact that the wealthy men of Canada have given only twelve and a half million dollars, I am compelled to say that is not a square deal for the common people. And in my constituency—and I presume that the same is true of every other part of Canada—the noble women have worked night and day, sewing, and knitting, and raising money in every way to give to the Patriotic Fund, Red Cross, and Soldier's Aid Society. These people give every dollar in their power, and the wealthy men of Canada have been left practically untouched. In calling for volunteers to fight, we do not take the weak men; if a man is not physically sound, he is turned down. If we want men who are physically strong to fight our battles, surely it is only square to the people that we should look to the men who are strong financially to pay for the war. The Solicitor General (Mr. Meighen) has told the House that the war orders last year amounted to $300,000,000. If our Minister of Finance had taken of war profits to anything like the same extent as in Great Britain, he would have had a great deal better showing to make in taxation. Instead of $12,500,000, he could have shown war profits taxation of $100,000.000. Hon. gentlemen opposite have asked us how we propose to raise revenue if not by tariffs. I have just pointed out one way in which a large sum could be raised. Further, there is no reason why the Finance Minister of Canada should not follow the example of Great Britain and the United States in the matter of income tax. Again, certain calculations have shown that a tax of one per cent on land values in Canada would yield large revenues. Mr. Henry Timmis, of Montreal, in a speech reported in the Montreal Herald and Daily Telegraph of March 28, 1917, estimated that the land values of Canada total $8,000,000,000—five billions in the towns and cities and three billions in the rural districts. A tax of one per cent on this valuation would bring revenue to the amount of $80,000,000 per annum. I have already shown where the Minister of Finance could have got $100,000,000 in war taxation, and I think that my estimate is a very moderate one, for men who pretend to know say that instead of $100,000,000 he could have taken $200,000,000 from the manufacturers during the last fiscal year. Then, if he had imposed an income tax, I feel satisfied he could have raised at least $50,000,000 by that means. I am not sure of my ground in this respect, having no means to make more than a rough calculation. The minister has financed the war from the revenues of the year just closed to the extent of $60,000,000. Now, taking all these items together—$100,000,000 direct war taxes, $80,000,000 land value tax, $50,000,000 income tax and $60,000,000 surplus revenues of last year, and we have a total of $290,000,000. I submit in all fairness that if the methods I have suggested had been adopted, we could have financed the war as we went along, which would have been much more satisfactory to the Canadian people than to balance our accounts by borrowing money, thus leaving future generations to pay the bill. Had the Minister of Finance the courage to follow these methods, he could have accomplished two things. In the first place, he could have removed some tariff taxation. For instance, he might have taken the tax off agricultural implements, and this would have given a tremendous boost to production. There is no further excuse for this tax, for our manufacturers now have free entry to the United States, of which they have taken advantage —many agricultural implements made in Canada are now sold more cheaply in the western States than in our own country. These patriotic gentlemen are making production easier in the United States by robbing our own farmers. Let me dwell on this point for a moment to show what the western farmer is called upon to endure. When he buys agricultural machinery he has to pay a duty of from 25 to 27½ per cent. Let me cite my own specific case. I bought a gasoline tractor and a separator, and, as nearly as I could figure, I paid duties amounting to $500.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: What was the price?

Mr. CRUISE: I paid $1,275. I do not know what the valuation is in the United States.

Mr. C. A. WILSON: An American machine?

Mr. CRUISE: Yes, if you want to be loyal to your country buy American machinery, because then the revenue goes to the Crown. We have to pay more for every thresher, binder and mower, and yet we get no more for our products than does the American farmer, and so the American farmer is given an advantage over us by our own laws. If the Minister of Finance could only see his way clear to adopting this method of raising the revenue, he could remove a burden from the western farmers and put them on a fair competitive basis with the American farmers. In that way he would increase the production of western Canada. Speaking from memory, we produced $600,000,000 worth of grain last year in the three western provinces. That is $600,000,000 of clean, hard-earned money and if the burden were lifted from the farmers' back and markets opened up to them to encourage settlement, there is no doubt in the world that instead of producing $600,000,000 worth of grain we could produce twice that amount in a short time.

Before we get away from the war situation, let me say that the most important thing that we have to do at the present time is to win this war. There are four essential things in connection with it that require organization and support. First, there is the question of our men in the trenches, next the munition factories, then the farmers and producers, and lastly the transportation question. Our men in the trenches are no good without munitions with which to face the Germans. They can not face them for any length of time without food. Food and munitions are no good in Australia or Canada or the United States without means of transportation to get them to the men. I feel as if the Government had risen to the occasion in connection with practically everything but the finding of men to take the places of our brave soldiers who are in France. Our distinguished Prime Minister promised 500,000 men to Great Britain. He has failed so far in getting those men. I think it is up to every man on both sides of this House to do everything in his power to fulfil the Prime Minister's pledge to the British Government.

Another point I want to make while I am on this subject is that it appears to me as if this Government were centralizing the wealth of the country. Before the Prime Minister went to England he made the statement in this House that we were getting $700,000,000 worth of war orders. The Minister of Finance made the statement in Toronto that he believed after the war was over Canada would come out of it in a better financial position than that in which she was when she went into it. I would like to ask the Finance Minister and hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House, as well as on this side, who is going to come out of this war in a better position? It is not the common people of the country, it is not the men who are fighting our battles, but it is the men who are making millions out of the manufacture of munitions. It has been stated that they are making from 25 to 900 per cent. I do not know what they are making, but they are certainly making large profits, and they are allowed to invest them with the Minister of Finance in the war loans, with the result that they are exempt from taxation. In this way the Government are centralizing the wealth of the country. These men are making large profits, a good deal larger than they should make, and they are investing them in Government bonds, which cannot be taxed, so that, in my judgment, the Government are centralizing the wealth of the country in the hands of probably 3,000 or 4,000 people, which is a great mistake and a great hindrance to the progress of the country.

There has been a great deal said about the way in which this Government are financing the war. I would like to give a few figures bearing upon that question. The total expenditures, apart from the war, for the last three years, were as follows:—

Expenditure.

1915-16..	170,317,847
1916-17..	173,000,000
Total..	$525,509,880

Now we will take the receipts for the corresponding years, and which were as follows:—

Receipts.

1914-15..	$133,073,481
1915-16..	172,149,393
1916-17..	230,000,000
Total..	$535,222,874

If you subtract the total expenditure from the total receipts you get the sum of $10,712,994. If I am correct in my figures, and I think I am—I do not want to mislead this House or the country—all that has been used to finance the war since it was started is $10,712,994. When hon. gentlemen are talking about financing a great part of the war as we go along, it seems to me that they are misleading the House and the country.

I would like to submit a few more figures in connection with the claim that the expenses of Government are not increasing. In the last year of the Liberal Government, 1911-12, the total disbursements were $137,142,082. In 1915-16 the expenditure of the present Government for a full year, apart from the war, was $170,317,847. If you subtract $137,142,082 from $170,317,847, you get $33,175,765 as the sum that it cost this Government during the last fiscal year to carry on the affairs of the country more than it did in 1911-12, the last year that the Liberal party had anything to do with the running of the country.

I come now to free wheat. I do not intend to dwell upon the question of free wheat to any great extent. It has been said that the farmers of western Canada are pleased to have free wheat. We are pleased to have free wheat because we have asked for it and we have fought for it. We have got it from the present Government, and we appreciate it very much. But we regret that when the Government, or the Minister of Finance, were turning a somersault they did not also give us free oats, free flax and free barley.

The Minister of Finance, when he made his last speech, mentioned the Highways Bill, and claimed that hon. gentlemen on this side of the House were against that measure. If I understand the situation, that statement of the minister is unfair. When the Highways Bill was under discussion, an amendment was moved that when any province got its allotment according to population, every other province should get its proportion on the same basis. That amendment was moved to prevent the hon. the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Rogers) from taking power to create an organization in each of the provinces to spend that money. Wherever there was a Liberal Government in power this Government would create another organization to spend the money, and the people of Manitoba know what the late Roblin Government did in connection with the building of roads. In some provincial constituencies they spent as much as $90,000 to win a by-election. We do not want that to occur again.

The hon. gentleman also mentioned the extension of the boundaries of Manitoba. We appreciate very much the extension of our boundaries, but every one in western Canada knows that the territory allotted to the province of Manitoba by this Government was the same as that offered by the late Government. The amount of money paid over may have been a little larger, but the territory was the same. In extending the boundaries of Manitoba, this Government gave Ontario a five-mile strip across the northern part of our territory and a strip ten miles down the Nelson river, half a mile wide; so that Ontario owns the townsite and this strip of land across the northern territory. The amendment moved by the right hon. leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) was to the effect that while the House favoured the extension of the boundaries of Manitoba the terms proposed were unfair and unjust to the people of Manitoba and the other provinces of the Dominion. That was the amendment moved, and for that I voted. When the Minister of Finance mentions Manitoba and what has been done for western Canada, and when hon. gentlemen cast insinuations across the floor of the House to the effect that the Opposition, when in power, did not carry out their pledges to the people, I would remind hon. gentlemen that when the present Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden) was in western Canada previous to 1911, he told the people of the three western provinces that one of the first things he would do if he was returned to power would be to restore to the three western provinces their natural resources. I would remind hon. gentlemen that this pledge has never been fulfilled. I hope that it will be fulfilled in the very near future.

WAYS AND MEANS.

Motion of Sir Thomas White agreed to, and House went into Committee of Ways and Means, Mr. Rainville in the Chair.

On resolution No. 1.

RESOLVED, That it is expedient to amend the Business Profits War Tax Act, 1916, by providing:—

1. That in any business taxable under the Act where the annual profits exceed fifteen per centum per annum the tax shall be increased to fifty per centum with respect to all profits in excess of the said fifteen per centum but not exceeding twenty per centum per annum, and where the profits exceed twenty per centum per annum the tax shall be increased to seventy-five per centum with respect to all profits in excess of the said twenty per centum, and such increases in the tax shall be levied against and paid by the person owning such business for each and every accounting period ending after the thirty-first day of December, one thousand nine hundred and sixteen.

Mr. NESBITT: I presume that the reason why my hon. friend the minister made his tax in this way was because it touched the least number of people and was most convenient.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Hear, hear.

Mr. NESBITT: I know that it will be a detriment to the obtaining of capital in this country for industry. I presume it would, perhaps, be unwise and also not in accord with the general feeling of the people of the country if I were to say that it would be unwise taxation to endanger the investment of capital in this country. I do not know what the minister's aim is exactly, whether he aims to make this country a pastoral country altogether, or a farming community altogether, or if his aim is to stop big business in this country. If his aim is to stop big business in this country he is going the right way about it. If it is not to stop large business in Canada he is going the wrong way about it. The financial papers, as the minister knows, are protesting, some of them very strongly, against this taxation. A man named Kelly Dickinson, writing to the Financial Times, quotes three firms which have cancelled important contracts for enlargements of plant, etc. One Montreal company abandoned as contemplated investment of an additional $1,000,000 in their business. An American firm abandoned its intention to establish a Canadian subsidiary company with an initial investment of $2,500,000. Another firm, which had contracted for a number of new lathes to replace worn out lathes, cancelled the order and decided to do the best it could with the impaired and worn out plant. So far as I am personally concerned, I think there is no one thing that we want in this country more than capital. We cannot possibly develop the natural resources of this country without it. We hear a great many people talking, both after dinner and before, about the wonderful natural resources of Canada, but we cannot develop them without encouraging capital to develop them. My hon. friend, I think, is discouraging capital by his peculiar legislation here. I appreciate that it is absolutely necessary to get more revenue, but why my hon. friend should relieve all the people of this country who do not have $50,000 invested in their business from paying their proportion of the revenue is more than I can comprehend or could comprehend last year when the original resolution imposing this business tax was passed.

I do not think any of these manufacturers or business men would complain about paying the additional tax if my hon. friend would only make it equitable. But he does not make it equitable; he applies it only to businesses of a certain size, and the others he does not tax at all. Again, many professional men earning very large incomes entirely escape this taxation. I do not think that is fair. Having regard to the seriousness of this war and the absolute necessity of a large revenue, every business should pay its just proportion of taxation. My hon. friend may know of many people who would object to paying the tax, but I think that the great mass of the manufacturers put in honest statements in connection with last year's taxation, and I believe that the great mass of the people carrying on businesses in which less than $50,000 is invested would also submit honest statements. I do not think it would cost the minister very much more to collect the taxes from all of these businesses than it would to collect only from those which have a capital investment of over $50,000. Yet my hon. friend this year increases the taxation on those who are earning the larger profits. As I have said, I am quite sure that if the minister would spread the taxation over a larger area, as it were, and make everybody pay a share of the taxation, there would be no unwillingness on the part of the people to assist in this way to met the huge expenditure that is being made in connection with the war.

I have to find fault with my hon. friends of the Government for not assisting the people during the last year. The Minister of Agriculture and the Minister of Labour had a golden opportunity, which, perhaps, will never come to them again, of rendering a very important service to the masses of the people. For instance, the Minister of Agriculture allowed it to be stated in the papers without contradiction that he had said that there were 2,000,000 bushels of potatoes in Canada more than were necessary for the ordinary consumption of the people. That was his opportunity to have seen that these potatoes were equitably distributed in those parts of the country in which they were required.

Mr. BURRELL: My hon. friend's statement is not quite correct. He says that I made a certain statement and allowed it to go uncontradicted; I am prepared to stand by the statement which I made as it is reported in Hansard. What I stated was that early in March, at a conservative estimate, there was a surplus of a million and a half bushels, and so there was. But I stated that a large number of potatoes had gone out of the country since that time, and I specifically stated the other day that that surplus did not now exist, or at all events, had greatly diminished, and that the provinces had all been advised of the facts and had taken action.

Mr. NESBITT: An hon. gentleman near me says that the million and a half bushels was the amount exported. As a rule, I am opposed to coercive measures on the part of a government, but that was a time when the Government would have been justified in using coercive measures. In other words, they would have been justified in placing an embargo on the export of potatoes. I am strongly of the view that the law of supply and demand should govern such matters, but conditions arise which justify a government in going to unusual lengths. Under conditions that are exceptional, the people are the first to be considered. In our section of the country—I do not know about other sections—during the last three or four months potatoes have been out of the reach of people who are working with their hands or who are receiving small salaries. My hon. friend says that his statement was that the surplus of potatoes was only a million and a half bushels. There is no reason why he should not have grasped the opportunity of distributing those potatoes in the areas where they were required. That would have been justified, having regard to the interests of the people. If the matter was one which came under the Labour Department, then the Minister of Labour would have been justified in taking that course. There are many other things that the Government would have been justified in doing during the last few months, but I have no wish to delay the committee; I simply wish to put my views on record before this measure is passed without amendment. I hope that the minister will see his way clear to enlarge this proposed legislation so as to make it just and equitable. My hon. friend says that he leaves the income tax to the provinces. He may be justified in that, to some extent; some of the provinces are adopting an income tax. I noticed the other day that the province of British Columbia proposes to have an income tax. In my opinion, this form of taxation is bound to come and we may as well face it first as last.

5 p.m. Certainly the scope of the profits tax legislation should be enlarged, because many men who have less than $50,000 invested in their business are, proportionately speaking, making more money than the men with from $50,000 to $100,000 invested. These men should pay their fair proportion of the unusually heavy expenditures which are being made during this time of war. I congratulate the country on the amount of business which is being carried on; it is an exceptional business, but the export of goods has been at an exceptionally high price. An increase in the value of imports does not necessarily represent an increase in tonnage of imports. In many instances the value of imports has doubled or trebled, whereas the tonnage has not appreciably increased. In a business with which I am connected, the tonnage of imports did not increase, while in the case of some of the imports the value was trebled.

Therefore, you cannot always judge the amount of business actually done by the total in dollars and cents of the imports and exports of this country during the last year or two. Although I have no doubt this item will pass from the committee and will become law, at the same time, I simply enter my protest against its scope not being enlarged.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Before the minister answers the hon. member for North Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt) I would like to have the minister give approximately, if he can, the revenue he anticipates from the additional taxation provided for in the resolutions before the committee. In delivering his Budget speech, the minister, if I remember correctly, did not venture to make any estimate of the amount that would probably be derived from this taxation, and I should like to have some idea, even if it be a rough one, of the revenue which the minister hopes to secure from this source.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Listening to my hon. friend from North Oxford, I could not help but reflect upon the Protean character of the Opposition. My hon. friend from Dauphin (Mr. Cruise), just a few minutes before, had been attacking the Government as a whole and myself in particular because we were not taking more money out of the manufacturers. Only the other day, as I saw by the Press, my hon. friend from Sherbrooke (Mr. McCrea), in my absence, launched a violent attack against me for taking too much money out of the manufacturers.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: No, not the manufacturers.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Well, let us say the paper manufacturers.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Hear, hear.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: My right hon. friend, however, will not fail to have observed that another of his followers, the hon. member for North Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt), whom we are always glad to hear in debates of this kind, has taken the ground that the taxation is so severe that it is likely to drive capital out of the country and prevent new capital from coming in.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: The taxation is strong all around.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Does my right hon. friend object that it is strong all around? My right hon. friend is behind his usual lines of Torres Vedras. He has become so accustomed to that position that I rarely, almost never, expect to see him depart from it. He always likes to have a double policy; he likes, as they say, to play both ends against the middle. My hon. friend from North Oxford has said in the course of his remarks that this tax will be a detriment to obtaining further capital for industries, and he has made his own the articles which have appeared in the Financial Times of Montreal, violently denouncing me for introducing this excess profits tax, so that I find myself in the position of being attacked by some hon. gentlemen opposite for not being severe enough in the taxations and by others for being too severe. That is a position to which we are not unaccustomed in the course of debates in this House.

My hon. friend from North Oxford, in developing his argument, stated that there is nothing in Canada we want more than capital. If we were in times of peace, I might not be disposed to wholly agree with him, because there might conceivably be things that we require more than capital; but on the whole I think I would have agreed to him, to this extent at all events, that capital is a great desideratum to this country; more than that, it is a necessity for its development. But this is not a time of peace; this is a time of war, and there is at least one thing which is more necessary to Canada at this time than even capital, and that is that we win this war, or do what we can to help to win this war.

Mr. NESBITT: Is capital not required to win this war?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I submit that what I have stated is correct.

Mr. NESBITT: How are you going to win the war without capital?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: At this time the winning of the war is more important than the attracting of capital. If my hon. friend would like me to develop that argument a little, I am quite prepared to do so.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Go on.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: There are in this country some industries which directly and materially assist in the prosecution of the war. They are absolutely necessary and we could not conceivably carry on the war without them. We have derived and the Empire has derived an enormous advantage from industries in this country which have by their output contributed directly to the winning of this war. In addition to that, there are in this country other industries which contribute indirectly to the winning of the war, and those industries are also valuable to the country. There are others which contribute to the support and maintenance of the people during the war, and again there are other industries which, neither immediately nor indirectly, contribute towards the winning of the war, but which nevertheless do contribute to the financial strength of the country during war time by exporting their products and in that way helping to create a favourable financial balance which is of advantage to the country in the winning of the war. These might be classed as industries in a way assisting in the winning of the war. At this time it is an important thing to Canada to secure capital for the development of industries. It by no means follows—I do not say it is not desirable—that it is the most necessary thing. The most necessary thing in this country to day is to make available the man power of the country for the winning of the war, that is to say, for the replenishing of the ranks of our expeditionary force, for the production of munitions and other supplies, including of course food—

Mr. NESBITT: If my hon. friend means to say that he does not require capital for that purpose, that is nonsense.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: —in order economically to develop the resources of the country so that we may the more effectually carry on the war. As to the attraction of capital, I would agree at once, that it would be a very desirable thing that capital should flow into this country. Notwithstanding the fact that we have had to impose taxation, it is desirable that capital should flow into this country provided that it be used for the development of our resources, for the carrying on of the war or for making us strong financially. But I say this, that if capital is going to be prevented from coming into this country by reason of taxation which is necessary in order that this country may maintain the burden of the war, we might better impose the taxation and not have the capital than have the capital and not impose the taxation. That is the position I take with respect to this matter. It is no pleasure for any Government or for any Minister of Finance to have to impose taxation; but I do not know of any country that can carry on war without imposing taxation, nor do I know of any country that should attempt to carry on war without imposing taxation.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: No one takes exception to that.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: My hon. friend from North Oxford——

Mr. NESBITT: I did not take exception to anything of the kind.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: My hon. friend from North Oxford says that this taxation will prove a detriment to obtaining capital for industries. I have taken down my hon. friend's words. He produces the Financial Times to support his argument.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: He did not mean to say that he was opposing the taxation.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: He was opposing the excess profits taxation, which I have submitted to the House. Otherwise his words are meaningless.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: That may be true; that is another thing.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Does capital flow into England to-day? England is taxed to the very bone; every industry in that country is taxed.

Mr. NESBITT: Does the minister think it would do any harm if capital did flow in?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The excess profits tax in England raises $800,000,000.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: About £200,000,000.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: $800,000,000. That excess profits tax is severe to the last degree. Only recently has it been increased by the Chancellor of the Exchequer. If my hon. friend is right in his argument that capital will not flow into this country by reason of our excess profits tax, will capital flow into England with their excess profits tax?

Mr. MACDONALD: They have income tax in England.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: They have both excess profits tax and income tax; I want to make that clear, and I am glad my hon. friend has brought the point up. I have seen tax bills both with respect to income and excess profits in Great Britain, and I give you my word that on this continent we do not know what taxation means.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Nobody is fighting that.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: My hon. friend from North Oxford has brought up an article in the Financial Times condemning this excess profits tax on the ground that it would be a detriment to obtaining special capital for industry.

Mr. NESBITT: I read what the Financial Times said; I did not say it myself.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Do you agree with what the Financial Times said?

Mr. NESBITT: Yes, I do.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: My hon. friend agrees with it. He says that the excess profits tax will have the effect of preventing capital coming into Canada, and will be a detriment to obtaining capital for industry, and on that ground he says this taxation is objectionable; in other words, he is against it. We have at least found out my hon. friend's position on this matter. He is opposing the excess profits tax on the ground that it is too severe, that it will be a detriment to Canada's obtaining capital for industry, and will prevent capital coming into Canada. I submit to this committee that neither of those are good grounds for not imposing an excess profits tax at this time. Let us see what it amounts to. The excess profits tax which I introduced last year was limited to three years, to three yearly accounting periods expiring after December 31, 1914. Reference has been made here this afternoon to the fact that only $12,500,000 was obtained the first year. But the first year was the year following the outbreak of war, when business was completely dislocated in this country. I stated, when introducing that taxation, that we should derive a much larger amount for the second accounting period. Now, the present taxation applies to the last accounting period; in other words, to the accounting period ending after December 31, 1916.

Mr. MACDONALD: You are making it permanent, whereas last year it was temporary.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The three-year term is not interfered with.

Mr. MACDONALD: I was just asking whether my hon. friend intended to make this permanent, or would it cease at the end of the war?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: This excess profits tax applies to the last accounting period; that is to say, to the accounting period of every company which ends after December 31, 1916. The accounting periods referred to are accounting periods under the excess profits tax which I introduced last year, and which was limited in its operation to December 31, 1917. We are not extending the term.

Mr. MACDONALD: You are not?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: No. Let us see what we are doing. Instead of taking 25 per cent of the profits in excess of 7 per cent, which is the amount allowed incorporated companies, from 15 to 20 per cent we are taking one-half the profits, and from 20 per cent upwards 75 per cent of the profits. Now, that is a very heavy tax; there is no question about that. It has been brought to my attention that some companies are making from 75 to 100 per cent on their capital, and, of course, the taxation they will have to pay will be very large, but I submit that that is not the real question before the committee and the House. It is not a question of whether the tax is high, but whether it ought to be paid at this time. This is a time at which the people of this country are making immense sacrifices.

Mr. MACDONALD: It is a time when you should tax more.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: My hon. friend suggests that we should tax more. The hon. member for North Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt) did not make that suggestion.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Oh yes, he did.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: We will come to that in a moment. The hon. member for North Oxford has distinctly stated that he agrees with the Financial Times that this excess profits tax will be a detriment to obtaining capital for industries in Canada. I would point out to my hon. friend from Pictou that when he suggests this taxation should be more severe, he is not in agreement with my hon. friend from North Oxford, who thinks the tax so heavy as to keep capital from coming into this country. This is a time in which the people of this country are making the greatest possible sacrifices. Men and women are sending their sons to the front. The men who have gone forward have interrupted their careers; they have left their hearth and home and everything they held most dear; they have given up everything and gone to the front, and unless what we have said from the beginning is meaningless these men are fighting for you and for me. Now in a situation such as we and all other belligerent nations are in to-day, mere money, while of great practical importance, is in reality of secondary importance. The making of profits, highly desirable in time of peace, and not undesirable, within bounds, in time of war, must take an entirely secondary place; that is the opinion, I think, of all thoughtful people in this Dominion. A mere money question becomes of secondary importance; it is of paramount importance in time of peace, but of secondary importance in time of war. The loss of money or the taking of money by taxation is as dust in the balance compared with these other losses that are taking place in the homes of this country. I do not believe myself that a man who is making 100 per cent has any right to complain if the Government steps in and says it must have 50 or 60 per cent of their profits, and I believe that public opinion will sustain this taxation measure on these grounds, even if some capital that might have come into Canada does not come in by reason of the imposition of this tax.

Let me say another thing. There is no reason why capital seeking investment should not flow into this country to-day notwithstanding the taxation. Look at the taxation of the United States, actual and prospective. I think the business man of the United States, as one of their leading men told me over there the other day would not be deterred by this taxation measure from coming into Canada, because he is going to be pretty heavily taxed at home anyway. So that argument is not of very much weight, even from a business standpoint. I am discussing this matter at some length because it has been discussed in the press, or in a certain portion of it, and I say that the people of this country demand that men shall not be permitted to make undue profits in time of war. I say undue profits; I believe the public are quite willing that men should make reasonable profits. It has been said that men will not put forth an effort if we are going to take away 50 or 75 per cent of their excess profits. I do not believe that is so. I do not believe that any patriotic man will relax his efforts because the Government intends to take fifty per cent, or seventy-five per cent, of his excess profits; I have too high an opinion of the people of this country to believe it.

Mr. MACDONALD: Why do you not tax accumulated wealth as well?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I will come to that in a moment. The hon. gentleman always anticipates. He is the most anticipatory member we have.

Mr. MACDONALD: But the minister finishes without dealing with these matters.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I will finish all right. The hon. member for North Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt) asked: what about the income of the professional man? That is a fair subject for argument. But, if we are to compare Canada with England in this matter we must bear in mind one respect in which Canada differs from England. There they have only one income tax, that imposed by the Imperial Parliament; but in this country it is possible to have three different income taxes, that of the municipality, that of the province, and that of the Federal Government. The income tax is peculiarly within the jurisdiction of the province and is a suitable tax for the purposes of the province and the municipality. In my opinion the Federal Government should not resort to an income tax until it is indispensably necessary in the national interest that it should do so. Suppose that a man is taxed on his income for the benefit of the municipality. He may be taxed 20 mills—two per cent. There may be a further income tax for the province. If you add to these a Federal income tax, the total impost may be very heavy. I pointed out in the Budget speech that the incomes of the professional and salaried classes generally have not increased since the war broke out, in many cases their incomes have actually diminished. On the other hand you have the high cost of living—higher than ever before in Canada. To levy an income tax upon these people under these conditions does not seem to me just. Of course, if it becomes unavoidable, if the Dominion Government finds itself in a position where it must have an income tax, I would not hesitate to resort to it. I believe that it is quite possible, even probable if the war goes on for another year or two, that the Dominion Government may have to resort to an income tax.

Now, my hon. friend has asked why the tax has not been broadened and applied to all corporations, even those that have a capital of less than $50,000. We discussed that at length last year. I admit there is a good deal to be said in favour of that view. But there are considerations on the other side as well. In all taxes on income, there is an exemption of a greater or smaller amount. But suppose that in this case you make no exemption, and consider the case of a company with a capital of $40,000 and making seven per cent profit. That means a total profit of $2,800 for the year. Having regard to the taxation by the municipalities, there is not a very great margin to go on in the case of these small companies. For that reason, and also for the reason that the expense of creating the staff and of collecting from these small concerns would be so great that we should probably not be further ahead by including them, we decided in favour of an exemption of corporations with a smaller capital than $50,000. That is the position taken last year, and I see no reason to change our views.

This brings us to another consideration concerning the income of the professional man referred to last year and also in the present debate. The tax on corporations is a tax on excess profits. The tax on income would affect not merely professional men but those having incomes from investments, such as mortgages and securities of various kinds. Men who derive incomes from mortgages and other securities rarely net more than five or six per cent. But under the excess profits tax the profits of corporations up to seven per cent are exempted. Suppose that a man with a capital of $100,000 invests in the bonds of an industrial company. He will derive an income of $5,000 or $6,000 a year. He is still below the $7,000 which is exempted under the excess profits tax. Therefore, there is not the glaring anomaly that has been suggested in exempting the income derived from investment and amounting to less than seven per cent.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: But if a man has an income of $50,000 a year from such investments, why not tax him?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: If we bring in an income tax, it must be general in its application. It must be remembered that under the excess profits taxation we are not taxing capital, the very principle of this measure is the taxation of profits. If profits are abnormal, it must be owing to war conditions—that is, money is being made out of the war, or notwithstanding the war. But take the case of the man with investments which yield him an income of $50,000. That would represent five per cent on an investment of $1,000,000. Now, if you have a company with a capital of $1,000,000, its annual profits would be exempted up to $70,000—that is seven per cent on its million-dollar capital.

Mr. GRAHAM: But what would be urged is that the money in the joint stock company would give employment to a large number of men and women and would mean the circulation of money for the benefit of the community, which is not the case with the capital of the men who derive an income in the way suggested.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The money of the individual invested may be in the very enterprise to which the hon. gentleman refers. He may be the owner of its bonds, and in that case his capital is just as much employed in keeping that industry going as is the money of the man who has contributed to its share capital.

Mr. GRAHAM: But without risk.

[Sir Thomas White.]

Sir THOMAS WHITE: No, not without risk. The bondholders do not always escape without risk. Now, my hon. friend from Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) asked why we did not tax capital.

Mr. MACDONALD: I asked why you did not tax accumulated wealth.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The hon. gentleman said "capital" and I said I would come to that point, though he thought I would not. Now, let us see how far the hon. gentleman will go. Capital, in the sense in which he uses the term, that is, accumulated wealth, may consist of real estate, or it may consist of personal property, such as bonds and stocks. My hon. friend asks: why do you not tax that property, that capital? Well, that is arguable. The Dominion Government some day may have to extend, as I stated in my Budget speech, the basis of taxation. My hon. friend has in mind: why do you not tax land, farms, and the real estate in towns and cities? Why do you not tax, in addition to that, the capital of those who have bonds, stocks and other securities, which are personal property? That is not the principle of this Bill, and they have not adopted that principle of taxation in any of the belligerent nations, so far as I know. They may have done so, but, if they have, it has not been drawn especially to my attention. The principle of this tax, I submit, is sound, that if there are firms, companies or businesses in Canada which in war time are making large profits, they must give a substantial portion of those profits to the Dominion Government for the purpose of assisting in carrying on the war. That is the principle. If a company has a capital of a million dollars and is not making 7 per cent, we do not tax that company, notwithstanding that it has a capital of a million dollars. I think that is just, for this reason, that that company may have a capital of a million dollars and yet it may have a thousand shareholders, each shareholder being interested only to the extent of $1,000. We know that that company is an entity, but it is made up of a thousand individual shareholders. We are not taxing that capital if they are making less than 7 per cent, but if they are making 40 or 50 per cent, we say: You are making a profit away beyond what we think you should be making in war time; you are making it out of munitions, or out of material which goes into the production of munitions, or out of supplies or other business, and you are making abnormal profits.

We say: if you make so much money as that, we propose to take part of it for the purpose of carrying on the war. That is the principle of the Bill, and even if it had the effect of preventing capital from coming into this country in war time, which I do not admit, I would still say that it is a proper tax because it is more important that this money should be raised in war time than that even capital should come in. What about after the war? This tax is limited to three years. I am free to say that an excess profits tax is not a good tax in times of peace because I think then it would have the effect which my hon. friend suggests and that effect would not be good for the country. But this tax is limited by its terms to a three year period. If this war goes on—and I confess it looks to me as if it would go on—it might go on for another year, or even longer—then we would have to consider broadening the basis of our taxation. We might have to resort to other modes of taxation, some of which were suggested in this House when the Excess Profits War Tax Bill was under consideration last year, and which have been mentioned in the course of this debate. But it is not necessary to consider these now. We are taking one step at a time in our taxation, and I submit that it is sound. When the war broke out, it would have been a great mistake to have suddenly developed a formidable scheme of taxation. The effect would have been bad upon industry and upon the public.

Mr. MACDONALD: Is my hon. friend aware that the financiers of the United States announced it as their purpose to make the men of the present day pay their full proportion of the cost of the war and not leave it to the boys after they come home from the front?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Let me point out the distinction between the case of the United States and Canada. We have been bearing the burden of this war for three years. In the case of the United States, one of the wealthiest countries in the world—

Mr. MACDONALD: What about England?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I will come to England in a moment—and one of the greatest, they enjoyed a period of prosperity for the past three years. When this war broke out, the immediate effect in Canada was a dislocation of the business of the country. To have imposed a heavy burden of taxation at that time would have been unwise from every standpoint. The result was that when the war broke out we imposed a moderate measure of taxation and in the following session raised the tariff by 7½ and 5 per cent and imposed special taxation calculated to realize a substantial sum. Last year we imposed the excess profits tax and this year, as these profits have become greater, we have increased the excess profits tax. Our taxation from the beginning, has been, I submit, scientific, and has progressed in such a manner as not to unduly disturb the industries of the country, but rather to promote business and not to discourage our people. To have imposed as heavy a burden of taxation as we have to-day upon the people at the outbreak of the war would have been disastrous from the business standpoint and would have discouraged the people.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Will not my hon. friend withdraw the word 'scientific''?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I will be prepared to argue that if my hon. friend desires. As to the excess profits tax, I would call his attention to the fact that we are in very good company.

Mr. MACLEAN: How would one conceive of the methods of taxation adopted by the Government as being scientific?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The burden has fallen upon those who are best able to bear it. We have not taxed those engaged in the basic industry of the country—agriculture; we have imposed no direct taxation upon the ordinary citizen or artisan. Whom have we taxed? We have taxed those who can afford to ride in Pullman cars, like the hon. member for North Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt).

Mr. NESBITT: What?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I say we have taxed those who can afford to ride in Pullman cars like the hon. member for North Oxford.

Mr. NESBITT: I always take the smoking car ahead.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: My hon. friend has been found in a Pullman car, and I am quite sure he does not sleep in the smoking car. We have taxed banks, trust companies and loan companies; we have taxed them all; we have taxed excess profits; now we are taxing excess profits some more, and if that is not scientific all I have to say is that it has been found to be a pretty good system of taxation. It has met with the approval of the people.

Mr. McCREA: You will find out what the people of the country think about it.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: My hon. friend says that we will find out what the people of the country think about it. I do not believe that my hon. friend, in these matters, is the spokesman for the people of this country. My hon. friend, I know, is annoyed about this measure. There is no question but that the industry in which he is interested will be hit by it, but there is no doubt, also, of the fact that the industry can stand it. Here is another point: it will not be hit by this measure unless it is doing well. Unless it is making profits it will not have to give any profits to this Government. That is the particular merit of this Bill. A man will pay only if he is making big money. If that is not a scientific measure of taxation I do not know what is.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The minister has not answered the question that I put to him before he rose.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: As to how much will be realized?

Mr. MACLEAN: Yes.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: It is not yet possible for me to give even an estimate.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: You have the statements given to the department by those who were taxed last year.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: We have the statements given to the department by those who were taxed for the first accounting period, and by some who will be liable for the second period, but not all. So far as the third accounting period is concerned, we have very few of those reports in. The result is that I am unable to make an estimate. But this is to be pointed out that it was last year that the large profits were made. That is to say, of the first three years I think last year was probably the best. Therefore this new taxation measure will apply more particularly to the larger profits of the third accounting period, and so substantial sums should be realized from it. It is not possible to make even a rough estimate, as we have no figures to which to apply the 50 per cent and 75 per cent taken from the excess profits.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Could the minister not furnish to the House a statement of the excess profits which have been made by one industry as an example? Take the flour milling industries of the country.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I could give them if they were asked for. As I said last year, if a motion is adopted in the House for returns of the assessment of this business tax, the papers will be laid on the Table.

Mr. CARVELL: Would there be any objection to producing statements showing the persons, firms and companies, and the amount paid by them for the first accounting period?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I would consider that. I do not know whether we have that information. We received some very large cheques in payment of these taxes.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The millers and the ministers are partners in boosting the high cost of living.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I do not see how that is.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The greater the cost of flour the greater the revenue received by the minister.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The excess profit tax comes second in point of time. The excess profit must exist before I can take the tax.

Mr. CARVELL: The big milling companies publish their statements and the companies have a good idea of their profits. But there are hundreds, and I trust thousands, of small milling companies and millers all over Canada, and I think the public have a right to know how much they are contributing and how this tax has been levied. That information should be brought down, I think, without Parliament demanding it.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: That was discussed last year in the House, and I then made the same statement that I have made to-day.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The reason I suggested the milling industry is because the people are intensely interested in the increasing price of flour, and I think that before we pass this Bill we ought to have a statement from the minister of the excess profits of the milling industry last year. I think the public would like to have that.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: That matter can be raised at any time. I do not think it need be discussed in connection with this resolution.

Mr. MACDONALD: Would the minister say why he is going to take only so much taxation from the people of Canada to-day? In view of the tremendous obligations we are assuming, is he not simply putting off the evil day? If the country is prosperous to-day, why does he not provide for a system of taxation that will be scientific in its character and put the burden on the people to-day, and not leave everything until the boys come home again?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: What I said to-day will still apply, that at present we are not only paying our pensions and the increased interest on our national debt, which is very large, but we have been able to pay $60,000,000 of the principal of the war indebtedness.

Mr. MACDONALD: The hon. member for Northumberland made the point that my hon. friend had taken $65,000,000 but had applied only $60,000,000 towards paying the debt created by the war. Did the minister have $5,000,000 more?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: No, because if he had he would have applied it. We pay our ordinary expenditure, our capital expenditure, and then whatever balance there is is applied in reduction of the war debt.

Mr. MACDONALD: The point made was that the minister derived $65,000,000 out of extra taxation but that he applied only $60,000,000 to the war debt, using the other $5,000,000 for the extra expense of ruling the country.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I think that is entirely inaccurate.

Mr. MACDONALD: The hon. member gave the details.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: But even supposing it was so, does my hon. friend say that we should default as to $5,000,000 of ordinary expenditure?

Mr. MACDONALD: You should economize; you are not economizing at all.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Not economizing? If we had applied that $5,000,000 to the ordinary expenditure, we would have been able to apply only $5,000,000 in respect of $25,000,000 of increased interest and pensions due to the war because the increased interest and pensions are charged to our ordinary expenditures.

Mr. MACDONALD: You should have spent less last year; you are extravagant.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: We have devoted $60,000,000 to the payment of the principal of our war expenditure. It seems to me that that is a sufficient answer to the hon. member for Pictou. If this war goes on, as I stated in the Budget, and if our expenditure increases, as it probably will increase with the increase in our militia, necessitating additional taxation to raise more money, then $60,000,000 is a very substantial amount to have paid in time of war on the principal of our war expenditure. In 15 years, at the same rate of payment, $900,000,000 of indebtedness would be liquidated.

At six o'clock, the House resumed, and then took recess.

After Recess.

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVATE BILL.

THIRD READING.

Bill No. 41, respecting The Grand Trunk Pacific Branch Lines Company.—Mr. Currie:

WAR TAXATION.

WAYS AND MEANS.

The House resumed Committee of Ways and Means, Mr. Rainville in the Chair.

Mr. E. W. NESBITT: When the House rose at six o'clock the Minister of Finance had been replying to various comments that had been made with regard to this resolution. This afternoon, when I read what the Financial Times had to say with reference to certain companies that were deterred by reason of the resolution from investing in this company, I simply gave the statement made by the Financial Times for what it was worth. I do not know as to the correctness or incorrectness of that statement. I did say that I believed if this measure were enacted it would deter capital from coming into this country, if the tax were not more equitably distributed. I said that I did not see why every person who made over seven per cent profit in his business should not be subject to paying his proportion of the tax. I said that so far as I knew the companies which would be affected by the fifty per cent tax and the seventy-five per cent tax would have no objection to paying their proportion of the taxation provided that every one else paid his proportion under the seven per cent clause, or under any of the other clauses of the resolution. My hon. friend argued, of course, as he did before, that it would be inconvenient to collect the tax from a person or company whose capital is only $50,000, and that a capital of $50,000 at seven per cent would earn only $3,500. That is no reason why such persons or companies should not pay their fair proportion of the tax. Every one in this country is willing to bear his fair share of the burden of taxation necessary to bring this war to a successful conclusion.

My hon. friend said that the main thing after all was the winning of the war, and with that we all agree. He said that if, in order to win the war it were necessary to do without capital coming into this country, he would be in favour of doing without the capital. If he carries that argument to its logical conclusion, why have these taxes? Why raise any tax? What is capital for but for the Government to use in carrying on the war? If his argument were carried to its ultimate conclusion, we would carry on the war without any capital or without any revenue. Such a position is, of course, absurd. We cannot get too much capital into this country to promote our industries and resources. That statement held good before the war and it will hold good during the war and after the war. We need in this country population and capital more than anything else. My hon. friend says that this tax will be limited to three years. I am afraid that he is not in a position to prophesy how long this tax will be exacted, and I do not think the people will grumble at how long it will be exacted so long as the revenue derived therefrom is properly used in the carrying on of the war. No one that I know of is grumbling at having to pay this war tax; what people are grumbling at is being selected as the only ones to pay the tax. I made that statement last year and I make it again now. My hon. friend, when he said that if, in order to win the war it were necessary to go without capital coming into this country, he did not care whether capital came in or not, knew that he was simply talking to the grand stand. We all know it is absolutely necessary to have capital to carry on the war. When in my boyhood days I used to play lacrosse, the boy who was disliked by the other boys was the one who played to the grandstand, that is the boy who kept the ball to himself and would not pass it along to the others.

Mr. GRAHAM: There was no team play.

[Mr. Nesbitt.]

Mr. NESBITT: Yes. I was surprised to see the Minister of Finance playing a good deal to the grandstand.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Was my hon. friend engaged in team play with the hon. member for Strathcona (Mr. Douglas) in his attitude towards this taxation measure?

Mr. NESBITT: I certainly was not; I did not even hear that hon. member's speech.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Then there was no team play on that side?

Mr. NESBITT: Not so far as I was concerned. I was speaking with reference to the interest of the country and without reference to party at all. What I objected to in the minister's grand stand play was this: he said that the men and women of this country who were sending their boys to the front were doing more than any one who was paying taxes in this country. I was discussing the financial end of the matter; I was not discussing the sentimental nor the moral end. My hon. friend is not the only one in this country who feels for the men and women who have sent their boys to the front. Many a man in this country who is paying excess profits taxes has sons who are fighting at the front, and some of whom have died at the front, and yet there is no grumble on their part. If what the minister said was not grand stand play, then I do not know what grand stand play is. I had no intention of mixing up the question of the men who have risked their lives with this financial discussion this afternoon.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: May I interrupt my hon. friend, because I should not like him to misunderstand me. I had not in mind to suggest that the hon. member was actuated by any such motive; but the article which he read to the House, it seemed to me, unduly emphasized the money aspect of this excess profits tax, and it was rather to that than to the remarks of my hon. friend that I was addressing myself. I entirely acquit my hon. friend of being actuated by any other motive than that of discussing this subject in this House in a business way.

Mr. NESBITT: I thank the minister, and I freely accept that explanation from him. So far as the article in the Financial Times is concerned, I am not accustomed to quoting newspaper articles, but I gave it for what it was worth. I did not say that these companies were deterred from investing capital in this country, because I was not aware of anything of the kind. I would like to say one word with reference to income tax. My hon. friend complains that he cannot impose an income tax conveniently owing to the municipalities and the provinces also having the right to exact an income tax. I would suggest to him that the matter could be worked by excepting the amount paid to the municipalities and the amount paid to the provinces, that is to say, by giving the person who is paying under the Dominion tax credit for what he had already paid on account of the municipal and provincial taxes. I do not know that I have anything further to say in regard to the matter. I give my views honestly for what they are worth, without regard to party in any manner, shape or form.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I have a few observations to address to the committee before the adoption of the resolution. The consideration of a taxation resolution is a matter of business, and I quite agree with my hon. friend from North Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt), that there is not much necessity for exhorting hon. gentlemen to unite for the winning of the war when a matter of this kind is under consideration. As to the winning of the war, we are all agreed. But the consideration of taxation proposals in committee, is ordinarily, a time when we come to close quarters in discussion, and when there is more or less frankness. The Minister of Finance referred this afternoon to the fact that some hon. gentlemen on this side of the House had approved of the taxation proposals now under consideration. That is quite true. The hon. member for South Cape Breton in discussing the Budget this afternoon openly and very emphatically approved of the taxation proposals. On a matter of this kind one would naturally look for differences of opinion. There should not be a tendency to discuss taxation proposals from a point of view altogether partisan. There is a differenue of opinion, for instance, among hon. gentlemen on this side of the House as to the desirability of the proposals of the Minister of Finance, and it is desirable to have hon. gentlemen express their views, whether favourable or otherwise. On the other side of the House there are hon. gentlemen who will probably support the proposals of the Minister of Finance; at least, I can safely say they will not oppose them. Nevertheless, it does not follow that in their best judgment these proposals are altogether wise, and just, or necessarily in the interests of the country. It is more difficult perhaps for hon. gentlemen opposite to indulge in the same freedom of criticism as hon. gentlemen upon this side of the House. I think it is very important indeed that we should have the utmost freedom in discussing a matter of this kind. I do not pretend to insinuate that the Minister of Finance does not entertain that view.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I invite the utmost freedom of discussion, because it will be of the greatest benefit to us.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Litigation in court for instance is justified on the ground that from the conflict or shock of opposing views the court may reach the truth approximately. Similarly, through the conflict of opinion that may arise in this committee, the Government may reach the best possible system of taxation fitting the circumstances.

There is another matter I wish to refer to, and my attention was directed to this by a reference of the Minister of Finance this afternoon to the fact that in several of our provinces there is already a certain form of income tax. It has often struck me that there should have been a conference between the Dominion and provincial governments in reference to taxation. During the last two or three years it seems to me that many of the provinces have practically exhausted every method of taxation within their powers. The province of Ontario, particularly, has initiated very wide taxation schemes; perhaps they were necessary, and perhaps they were not. But it is just possible that the province might have avoided such extended taxation by economies or reforms of some kind, and if so, it was their duty to have done so. I think it would have been desirable for the Minister of Finance to have met the provincial governments in conference a long time ago, and asked for their co-operation in the matter of financing the war. This would have given him an opportunity to present to them most clearly and forcibly the probable obligations that will rest upon the Federal Government in the future, and I think in that way he would have gained the co-operation of the provinces.

I would not undertake to say that the fresh taxation proposals of the Minister of Finance are altogether unpopular. They will be unpopular with the men who will have to pay; there is no doubt about that. But, after all, that applies to such a small proportion of the population of Canada that these proposals are bound to be very popular with the great majority, who will not have to pay them. I suppose that if a man were viewing these proposals purely from the standpoint of political safety he would rather take the position that the proposals on the whole were pretty good, because the great majority of one's constituents shall not be affected by them. However, I do not consider that is a fair method of considering a matter of this kind, particularly on the part of public men who must assume the responsibilities attaching to their position. We do know that persons and corporations liable to taxation under these proposals are protesting in large numbers and quite vigorously; perhaps it is true that in many cases their complaints are hardly justified, because the additional taxation to be imposed would mean very little beyond what they have to pay under the Act of last year. To some, however, it will be quite a serious matter, and it is easy to understand there may well be an honest difference of opinion as to whether or not it is desirable to increase the business profits tax, and obtain additional revenue from other sources.

The Minister of Finance justified all his taxation schemes this afternoon on the ground of their being scientific. Of course, if they are scientific, they are absolutely sound. I suppose, however, the minister was using language rather loosely when he employed the term "scientific." He said that he started out by having recourse to one source at one time, and to another source at another time. But it might turn out that all these sources shall be exhausted or dried up when he turns to them later when his financial necessities are urgent. Our obligations this year are probably as heavy as they will be in any year in the future, no matter how long the war continues. The country is fairly prosperous. The average citizen is in rather happy circumstances to-day. Therefore, I say, this is the time to apply all possible forms of taxation, this is the best opportunity we shall have to secure for Canada the largest possible revenue in order to lessen the total of our public debt upon which the people will have to pay interest after the war. That there is an element of fairness in the business profits tax no one will deny. It may be true, also, that the Act of last year was on the whole a justifiable method of taxation and was perhaps quite popular in the country. The only objection I had to it—and I expressed myself so at the time—and the only protest I have heard from other citizens, is that it should be applied more widely. It was pointed out by hon. members on this side last year, and events have proven the soundness of their contention, that in some localities you will find a firm or partnership earning, it may be, $50,000, and paying a substantial tax, while in the same place there may be another concern with earnings of $100,000, yet paying nothing. I think that inequalities of this kind irritate the community and render that form of tax unpopular. It would have been better, had the business profits tax had a wider application, not only because it would have been more in accordance with justice, but because the treasury would have benefited. The increased business profits tax will yield but little additional revenue; will impede industrial expansion, prevent the inflow of foreign capital. It would have been better to adopt some other form of taxation. I am not, however, referring to concerns engaged in purely war supplies.

There is another aspect of the case which makes me think that you cannot infer the desirability of a business profits tax for Canada by showing that it applies well in England. In Canada there are very few businesses with enough capital. Many have sufficient invested capital, but the working capital, as a rule, is borrowed. Our business concerns are usually very heavy borrowers from the banks. In England, not only is there an abundance of invested capital, but the great industrial concerns there, as a rule, have large reserves. I read pretty regularly a financial journal published in London, The Statist, a journal which the Minister of Finance knows very well. Each issue gives the proceedings of annual meetings of important companies. In reading these reports, I notice that invariably they disclose a very substantial cash reserve accumulated in the course of years of operation of these concerns. Consequently, these concerns are not borrowers from the banks. On the conclusion of this war, there will be a period of anxiety for industrial concerns in this country. Many of them to-day carry contingent accounts, that is, they are setting aside a portion of their profits to meet contingent liabilities that may arise on the cessation of war. The cost of raw material may go up, or there may be many contributing causes to lessen profits. Therefore, they feel that a cash reserve is desirable against the time when a business depression will come and when the banks may find themselves not in a liquid position to justify large loanings to industrial concerns.

My substantial objection to the resolution, is that which I voiced last year against the business profits tax, and that is that the efforts of the Government to secure revenue to meet our heavy obligations are too restricted. As I pointed out when speaking on the Budget, we are not paying enough of our annual war expenditure. It is eminently desirable that our national debt be kept down to the lowest figure possible, so that the country may be able, without distressing itself, to take care of its fixed charges and have sufficient revenues to carry on public services with efficiency. There are many people, I am sure, who would be quite happy to be compelled by law to pay something to the treasury who are not paying anything today. So, I say, the tax proposals contained in the resolution are too restricted, and also they are unjust to the small number who are obliged to pay. The result is that the treasury is not receiving the volume of revenue which could easily be had and which the country requires so much, and will require so much in the future. I put the case to the minister this afternoon that, if a man were in receipt of an income of $50,000 from invested capital, there was no reason why he should not be compelled to pay something toward the public revenues for war purposes. I can not conceive of any answer to that proposition. His income arises from capital which he has invested, and is more than he requires for his personal purposes. Most persons in that position would be willing to contribute a very substantial portion of that income to the treasury for war purposes.

Mr. W. H. BENNETT: Have these people, who are so anxious to pay taxes, ever heard of a Patriotic Fund, a Red Cross Fund, or any similar institution to which they are free to contribute and by which their money would be cheerfully accepted?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I have no doubt that that class of people do contribute very generously to the Patriotic Fund and other similar causes. And so they should. The Minister of Finance stated this afternoon that if a business concern earns over fifteen per cent, it should not complain if the country takes fifty per cent of its surplus earnings. But even if men of the class to which I refer had contributed generously to the Patriotic Fund, that does not answer my contention that out of the very handsome surplus remaining above that which is actually required for their private purposes they should contribute a very substantial portion to the country for war purposes.

There is another point which I urged against the business profits tax last year, and which I still believe in. In England the business profit tax applies to profits earned over and above the average amount earned for the three years prior to the war. I do not recollect at the moment what answer the Minister of Finance made to this point last year, but I remember that he did make some reference to it. That always struck me as being a very fair provision, and there is a very strong feeling among business men of this country who are liable under the Business Profits Tax Act, that this same provision should be applied to companies and individuals liable under our Act. I think it is only a fair and just provision. The imposition of a tax upon profits earned above the average profits prior to the war is justly and truly a war business profits tax. The title of the Act at the present time is a misnomer, because it does not apply merely to profits earned by reason solely of the war, but it refers also to profits which would be earned in peace times. These, in a general way, are the observations which I wish to address to the committee at this time upon the resolution.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: There are a few more points which my hon. friend referred to, and which I desire to deal with briefly. But, before doing so, I should like to say that so far from deprecating criticism upon any measure which I have in this House, and especially a taxation measure, I invite it. I am pleased to say that I have derived, in connection with my measures in the House, a great deal of assistance from the criticism which has been offered. I would also like to believe that I am willing always to make concessions when it appears proper to do so, as the result of the criticism to which measures are subjected. Last year when this business profits War Tax Bill was under consideration in this House, I received many valuable suggestions and the Bill was very much improved by them. As far as this amendment is concerned, I should like to have the frank opinion of every one in this committee and, if it appears that the Bill is too severe or that it is going to work out disadvantageously, having regard to the national interest, I am prepared to consider that criticism. But I rather did resent in connection with the bill—probably that is not the word, because I do not think a man should resent anything that occurs in the House of Commons—being criticised, on the one hand, because the bill was not nearly severe enough, and, on the other, because the Bill was so severe that it would injure capital, drive out capital, and prevent capital from coming in. That did not appear to me to be fair criticism from the Opposition benches, because the one attitude is entirely inconsistent with the other.

I gave the reasons pretty fully this afternoon why I thought it was inadvisable that we should resort to a federal income tax at this time. I do not propose to go over that ground again but under the existing law in most of the provinces in this Dominion, a man is fairly heavily taxed today upon his income (that is, if the law is administered), and if we imposed a federal income tax it seems to me it would be an additional impost upon him at this time when the cost of living has greatly increased. There is another feature in connection with this that is put forward and that is, that companies are severely taxed by this excess profits tax. At the same time it is suggested that there should be also an income tax. I believe that if we imposed an income tax in addition to the excess profits tax it would fall to a large extent upon those who are already taxed by this excess profits tax. Take managers and other officers of the companies that are taxed by this measure; they derive their salaries, and those salaries are subject to taxation under income legislation in at least certain of the provinces in which they live. If we added on a federal income tax, we should be taxing these men upon their salaries notwithstanding the fact that many of these officers are interested in the companies which are taxed under this excess profits tax Act.

There is another feature of it. Income is derived from personal earnings, or from interest on mortgages, bonds, and other securities and dividends upon stock. Insofar as income is derived from dividends on stock, the recipient of such income is already taxed by reason of the fact that he is a shareholder in these companies subject to the excess profits tax. That has to be borne in mind. What I stated this afternoon, and what I desire to repeat, is, that we may come to the time when we shall have to resort to income tax. The hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Maclean) said: why not do it now? The reason I think it inadvisable to do it now is that incomes are already subject to taxation by municipalities or provinces, and it does not seem to me that the burden should be placed upon the average citizen deriving income which would be subject to taxation, until the necessity is absolutely clear and until it is indispensably necessary in the national interest that we should impose such taxation. Take the lawyers in Canada, and I only speak of them as one class who are subject to income tax by municipalities and provinces; I do not believe that the income of lawyers has been increased since the war broke out. I believe rather that the contrary is the case. I do not believe that the income of physicians has been increased and I do not believe that the incomes of most of those who derive salaries from their employment has been increased. That is on the average; I suppose some of them have been increased and others have been reduced. But, the cost of living has gone up. Is it indispensably necessary at this time to tax all those who may derive incomes throughout the country? You could hardly select nine or ten large incomes and make them a special object of taxation. You could not introduce a Bill for the taxation of half a dozen or a dozen or twenty men in this country. Your income tax would have to be general. I am only pointing out these aspects of the matter because it seems to me that they are relevant to the question as to whether an income tax should be imposed now. My view has been that it should not be imposed now. My hon. friend has said, and his words are true, that people have paid this business tax gladly. I bear cheerful testimony to that. The spirit in which the excess profit tax has been borne has been admirable. Men have not been anxious, so far as I am aware, to avoid taxation; they have been desirous of contributing, and have willingly paid the taxation against them. That taxation, in many cases, has run into very large sums of money. The hon. member for North Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt) is always a valuable contributor to a debate, and I certainly had not in mind, when I spoke this afternoon about the sacrifices the people of this country are making, anything that he himself had said. But there has been a criticism of this measure which I do not believe is just, in that it emphasizes the large sums of money which will have to be paid into the federal exchequer. I do not believe that that is a sound criticism of the measure. It would be a sound criticism to say that it is not fair, if that is the view of the critic, that only those having a capital of $50,000 or more should be assessed. That is a criticism that may fairly be put forward, to be met by us who believe that the line has to be drawn somewhere, and that if it is not drawn at $50,000 it would have to be drawn at $40,000, for the reasons which I gave last year. But I do not believe that it is fair to say at this time that the measure is objectionable, and to severely criticise the Government on the sole ground that large sums of money are taken from the industries of this country; because in a time of sacrifice such as this, money becomes of entirely secondary importance. It is very important, but it is of secondary importance. It is needed and will be needed for the prosecution of the war, and I have been unable to see, and I am still unable to see, why, if firms or companies are making huge, even abnormal earnings, a very substantial portion of those earnings should not be taken for the treasury of the state engaged in the prosecution of this war. That is what I had in mind this afternoon when I referred to the sacrifices which are being made in this country, and I think it desirable from time to time to emphasize that feature, certainly not in censure or criticism of any member of this House, but only because we are taking extraordinary action on account of extraordinary conditions. I assure hon. members that it is no pleasure to me to incur the criticism which I undoubtedly do and will incur in connection with a measure of this kind, which does take a heavy toll from many of our industries. It is no pleasure to bring it down, and it is not brought down with any object of political aim or advantage, although I do believe that public opinion will support a measure that, at a time like this, takes a substantial part of large earnings made, and honestly made, for the purposes of the war.

The soundest criticism I have heard of this measure has been that it may take so large a sum from a firm or company that the company may not be able to raise that amount of money readily, and that it may, to a certain extent, make the position of the company unliquid. That is the soundest argument I have heard against this measure, but I do not agree that the amount taken, although large, is unduly large in war time.

My hon. friend from Halifax (Mr. A. K. Maclean), who, as usual, made a very temperate speech and put forward his ideas and criticisms very fairly, raised the question why we did not adopt the English policy of establishing the average earnings of a company for the three years preceding the war, and then take only a portion of that excess profit earned now over the average profit earned for those three years. We gave that matter a great deal of consideration, and I have discussed the English income tax with many who are subject to it. I believe that our tax is a better tax, and that is the opinion of many from the United Kingdom to whom I have spoken about it. What has happened in the United Kingdom is this: Those companies that did the largest business before the war, that were earning 25 per cent, 30 per cent, or 40 per cent, are in many cases earning that amount to-day and yet are paying nothing. Their average, we will say, was 25 per cent or 30 per cent before the war. Since the war they may earn only the same amount, and yet they are going scot free. But companies that earned only 4 per cent or 5 per cent before the war, which perhaps had a run of hard luck, or were engaged in a business that was not thriving at that particular time, but are now making perhaps 40 per cent, find themselves mulcted to the extent of 80 per cent of their excess profits. In my opinion, it is very much better to fix a rate of 7 per cent or 8 per cent or ten per cent as a standard for all companies, and then, if they make excess profits over that rate, to take a proportion of those excess profits. It must be borne in mind that we are not taking all these excess profits. We did not confine the companies to 7 per cent under the Business Profits Wax Tax Act of last year. We took only one-quarter of the amount earned over 7 per cent upon capital as defined in the Act. This year we take one-quarter over 7 per cent and up to 15 per cent. That is to say, if a company is earning 15 per cent, we leave it 13 per cent and we take 2 per cent. Then, between 15 per cent and 20 per cent, we take one-half, that is 2½ per cent. So that a company earning 20 per cent gives 4½ per cent and keeps 15½ per cent. Then we take 75 per cent over 20 per cent. That is a heavy tax, but we are here getting up to the point where the dividends are abnormal. Take the industrial companies listed on the stock exchanges of this country, and it is not very often that in peace time they show more than 15 to 20 per cent profit. I am aware that many commercial companies that are not listed do show very much larger earnings than that, but probably not when you take into account, what we do take into account in connection with this measure, namely accumulated profits and unimpaired reserve as part of their capital.

As I have said, I invite fair criticism of this measure. We do not want to unduly tax industry; we do not want to drive capital out of this country, and we do not want to prevent capital coming in. But I do feel that we have a duty towards the public, and that in connection with the prosecution of this war, if abnormal profits are being made in munition supplies or in any industry, which on account of the war enjoys exceptional advantages and is making abnormal sums of money, it is our duty to take a substantial part of that money for the use of the State.

It may be that the Bill is too severe. I have always been willing, if that is shown to be the case, to make concessions, and I want to assure the House that instead of depreciating criticism I invite it.

Mr. CARVELL: If the hon. gentleman is so anxious for criticism possibly he will pardon me if I give him my view. I do feel like criticising the Finance Minister, not so much on account of the actual provisions of this measure as upon his general policy. I do not think that he is taking enough out of the people who are earning money and who are financially in fairly good condition. It is said that Canada is prosperous to-day. There is, no doubt, a considerable degree of prosperity among certain classes of people, though I am afraid that if the minister went into the ordinary labouring districts he would have a somewhat different story to tell. However, so far as the financial world is concerned, there is a great degree of prosperity. But my hon. friend must realize that that prosperity is the result of abnormal conditions and of the influx of an enormous amount of borrowed money that is being scattered all over the Dominion. I suppose my hon. friend himself is spending $300,000,000 or $400,000,000 yearly in the Dominion which is absolutely borrowed money and upon which interest must be paid next year and the succeeding year and during the years of our children's children. Then, another $300,000,000 or $400,000,000 are coming in from the Allied countries for the purchase of munitions alone, and hundreds of millions are coming in for the purchase of natural products over and above what would be the legitimate price that we would ordinarily receive for those articles. This is making a false prosperity which is not equally distributed among the different classes of people. It seems to me, therefore, that it is the duty of the Finance Minister to take as much of this money as he can get his hands on, in order to avoid borrowing too much money and rolling up the public debt to too great an extent. I do think that in some cases he should make a distinction between the different classes of industries from which he is taking money by way of taxation. I do not think that my hon. friend is justified in taking the same percentage of profits from the regularly established companies that are carrying on the same business that they carried on before the war broke out as he is taking from the mushroom companies which have been established as a result of the war, are making money out of the war and are doing nothing but a war business. There are hundreds of such companies in Canada. Hundreds of companies in Canada have never put a dollar of their own money into their business; or, if they did, they were allowed such prices that within the first five or six months of operation they got all the invested capital back again and are now making enormous profits upon invested capital furnished them by the Government. That class of industry should pay a much higher rate of taxation than the well-established Canadian industry which was in business before the war commenced and which hopes to be in business after the war is over. An instance of an industry which my hon. friend has taken by the throat and forced to sell its product at a certain price is that of the newsprint paper industry. Industries such as this which were here before the war and have been carrying on a legitimate business, are, no doubt making large profits and are contributing a large proportion of excess profits to the Government. But surely it is unreasonable to say that an industry of that kind should contribute the same proportion of its earnings or profits to the state as the munition maker, who never put a dollar into the business and who is taking out of it 40, 50, 60, 100, 300, and as high as 900 per cent—and this in a case where you do not fix the price of the product.

Another criticism that I wish to make is one that has been reiterated in the House a good many times. In fixing the minimum amount of capitalization in respect of which taxation shall be imposed, the minister has not, I think, gone far enough down in the scale. He says that one has to stop somewhere. I admit that, but instead of stopping at $50,000, I would go down to $25,000, and even lower. Every man must make some sort of sacrifice in order to furnish money with which we may take our part in winning the war. The sacrifice being made by the company that is losing 25 per cent of its excess profits over and above 7 per cent is a mere bagatelle compared with the sacrifices that are being made by the people who are contributing to patriotic purposes. Why should not a company capitalized at even $25,000, and making profits of 7, 8, or 10 per cent, be compelled to contribute its proportion of the war taxation? My hon. friend says that you ought not to tax the dividends on stocks because the company has already contributed a portion of its profits. That may be true, but if I have $1,000 coming in from one industry, $1,000 from another and similar amounts from others, and am getting a total of say, $10,000, why should I not contribute a portion of that amount to the State? The reason given by the minister is that the companies in which I have my money invested have already contributed a certain proportion of their excess profits to the State. I do not think that the argument is logical. I think that we should go down the scale as far as it is possible to go without involving too great a cost of collection. The minister will say that if too many small companies are included in the taxation, the cost of collection will be greater than the amount received, but I think you can go away below where the minister is to-day before you reach the point where the cost of collecting will exceed the receipts.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: My hon. friend will recollect that there is no exemption of companies and firms engaged in the munitions business.

Mr. CARVELL: I am aware of that, but I have companies in mind which, with a capitalization under $50,000, are earning handsome dividends. This war has made it possible for hundreds—I think I may safely say thousands— of companies to get rich indirectly as the result of the war, though not engaged in manufacturing munitions. That is another criticism that I make in all sincerity. I could give the minister instances which have come within my own personal knowledge, and I am satisfied that every hon. gentleman could give similar instances, of companies capitalized at less than $50,000, which are making big profits as a result of the war, but who are not contributing towards the war expenses. As to the question of incomes, it is not my purpose to discuss that at length, because it has been discussed a good many times in the House. But there is hardly a city or a country district in Canada which does not contain a number of men who are in receipt of big incomes which go scot-free so far as taxation is concerned. I am sorry to say that a large proportion of those people do not even contribute to patriotic funds, Red Cross funds, or anything else of that nature, and I do submit that this class of people should be taxed. I make a more severe criticism of the minister for allowing these men to go free than I do of all the other things put together. I suppose there is not a man within the sound of my voice to-night who could not pick out half a dozen or a dozen persons in his own constituency who have accumulated a large amount of money, who never spend a five dollar bill unless they have to in order to purchase the actual necessities of life, and who salt their money away in bonds or stocks or stockings or banks—and contribute nothing in the way of taxation. The Legislature of New Brunswick a year ago imposed a direct tax in order to raise $500,000 for the Patriotic Fund; this method of raising the money was adopted in order to get after the men who would not contribute voluntarily. These people ought to be compelled to contribute a very large proportion of their incomes in order to assist in carrying on the war. The minister says that we should not tax these people because they may be managers of a corporation which is paying a large proportion of its excess profits. That has nothing to do with the matter at all.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I indicated that some of those who are receiving salaries from the companies were also shareholders in the companies. I agree if the manager is also a shareholder in the company—

Mr. CARVELL: That is worse. He enjoys a big salary.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: A company is as I said subject to the tax, and the shareholder would also be liable to taxation upon income.

Mr. CARVELL: Why should he not be liable upon income? The most severe criticism I have to make to the minister in this whole business is the fact that when he issued his first call for an internal war loan —and he has repeated the offence in every war loan down to the present time—he persistently and deliberately provided, and advertised it to the world, that the man or woman who invested his or her money in that war loan would not be called upon to pay any tax which the Dominion might impose upon incomes. He has proclaimed this to the people of this country: You invest your money in this war loan and you will not have to pay an income tax. If the minister at any future time wishes to impose an income tax, he will have $350,000,000 of the savings of the people of this country exempt from taxation, and he has practically made it impossible to work out an income tax in this country in a fair and honest manner. I am not going to impute motives; I do not wish to impute motives to the minister or to any other man; but the result of his conduct and of his advertisements in the handling of these war loans is that he will meet with a great deal of difficulty in arriving at a fair and equitable income tax in Canada. There are cases of rich men investing a hundred thousand dollars, five hundred thousand dollars, a million dollars in these war loans, which are the greatest cinch that I know of in the financial world to-day. A man invests a million dollars of his wealth in war bonds, and when the income tax collector comes around to him and says: I want you to pay income tax, he replies: My money is invested in war bonds and I go scot-free. My hon. friend says it is open to argument whether or not we shall have an income tax and things are certainly looking serious; but he has spiked his guns before he comes to that position; he has put himself in a position where he cannot collect income tax on $350,000,000 of the savings of the people of this country, and I know no class of investors would be in a better position to pay taxes than those persons who have raised the $350,000,000 of these internal war loans. My hon. friend may think my criticism is not as gentle as that of my hon. friend from Halifax (Mr. A. K. Maclean), but it is just as sincere and it is given with just as good grace and with no more bitterness than has been that of my hon. friend from Halifax. I have presented these things as I view them; I trust the minister will take some notice of them, and I hope my views will benefit him and, together with the criticism of the rest of my friends around me, the result will be that Canada will raise more money to carry on this war as she goes along, and when money is plentiful, and that she will not borrow so much money now and have to pay more interest when the time of peace comes. I do not think I was ever charged with being a pessimist, but I do look with the very gravest apprehension upon the affairs of this country when peace comes. When I think of three or four hundred thousand soldiers returning to Canada—and I hope that number does return—and of three or four hundred thousand munition workers being practically thrown into the streets; when I think of the tremendous debt and of the enormous interest charge that must be met; when I think of the pensions that must be paid to our soldiers or their dependents—a debt that must be met even if we have to sell all our land and property to meet it—when I think of the falling revenues that will occur, I feel it is the duty of every man in this country, no matter whether he be a financial magnate or not, to try to see if we cannot keep this debt down to something like reasonable dimensions and collect as much money as possible out of the people to-day when they are well able to pay it. Every million dollars we take out of the people to-day in taxes means one million dollar less on which we shall all have to pay interest for all time to come.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: My hon. friend stated that he was more severe than our genial friend from Halifax (Mr. A. K. Maclean). He was a little more severe, but he was not quite as well informed. I do not think my hon. friend from Halifax will put forward the argument which my hon. friend (Mr. Carvell) stated was his main one, in criticism of this measure, namely, that we had exempted the war bonds which we issued from any income tax imposed under the authority of this Parliament. I would agree with my hon. friend as to the extreme undesirability of issuing bonds subject to that condition, if it could be avoided, but I say to my hon. friend that I know this opinion will be confirmed by any financial man in this country or in the United States, namely, that we could not conceivably issue a loan to the people of this country and the United States unless that provision exempting them from any income tax was inserted on the face of the loan.

Mr. CARVELL: My financial transactions are, of course, very small compared with those of my hon. friend, but I have a good many clients who invest money, and I have never in my life had the question asked me by a client whether bonds were exempt from income tax or not.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: That may be, but my hon. friend is thinking about peace time conditions, and I do not think the question would be asked under peace time conditions.

Mr. CARVELL: I am speaking about the war loan.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Precisely, and we are in war times. I do not think the public or we in this House realize the magnitude of our issues. It is not a question of issuing a loan of five or ten or twenty-five or thirty million dollars in an issue. Before the war broke out the largest loan ever put on by the Dominion was £6,000,000; now we are putting out hundreds of millions of dollars of these war loan issues, and we shall have to continue to put them out during the remaining period of the war. When you are seeking money on this scale and when it is in the mind of the people that the Government may have to resort to extreme measures of taxation, measures never resorted to before, then the investor raises the question: What about income tax? When I made the issue of $45,000,000 in New York in August of 1915, and when I made an issue of $75,000,000 in March of 1916, the first question that arose was: "What about income tax; are those loans subject to income tax or not?" You could not have sold in New York or elsewhere in the United States an issue of bonds which might be liable to income tax of the issuing Government for the reason that men buy these down to a percentage of a point having regard to the prevailing market conditions. You can put out an issue at 5.40 where you could not put it out at 5.25 or 5.30. If the purchaser is uncertain as to whether there is going to be an income tax of two per cent, three per cent, or five per cent upon the interest derivable from an investment, he will probably not purchase. Scores of people might purchase, but you will not get the investor who is in the habit of investing large sums of money to take your securities in time of war unless they are exempt from income taxation.

Mr. CARVELL: What about internal issues?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The same is true of them. You take those loans which we put out internally. The average citizen probably does not stop to inquire, but his investments are only a fraction of the whole. It is the man who is accustomed to invest who considers his investments carefully, and it is the insurance companies, the loan companies and these other companies, which are most careful in regard to their investments.

It is an attraction, a necessary attraction in connection with war loans that they should be free of income tax. The issue that the United States is putting out to-day is free of income tax, but not free, I believe, of succession duties. In England, the very home of income tax, in order to meet the situation in connection with their last loan they had to make a double issue, so to speak, one free of income tax and the other subject to income tax, with a very substantial difference in price between the two issues. If we had put out our loan without the provision of exemption from income tax, we should never have been able to sell it on the same interest basis. Consequently it is as broad as it is long. What we might have realized hereafter by way of income tax legislation would have been lost at the time of the issue. I stated when presenting the Budget that if we had an income tax it would fail to reach a large proportion of our population by reason of that unavoidable provision in our bonds. I agree with my hon. friend that it is desirable to avoid such a provision if we possibly can, but it could not have been avoided, and I submit that to the judgment of this House.

My hon. friend has raised the question of the paper industry, and I do not desire specially to discuss that matter to-night except to say this, and I do not know that these remarks will apply exclusively to the paper industry. It is of course a great industry whose development and success we are all interested in, but it would not be possible for me to look at it differently from any other industry. We have unlimited resources of the raw material which is the basis of the paper industry, and it is a great industry to be encouraged and developed. The situation in regard to the paper business was abnormal and exceptional. Why? Because of the limitation upon the supplies available at the present time The supplies of sulphite from Scandinavia are shut off by the war, and the result is practically a monopoly in newsprint. I do not say that it is an intentional monopoly; I do not for one moment say that the men engaged in the manufacture of newsprint are attempting to monopolize the situation, but a virtual monopoly does exist on this continent by reason of the limitation of the supplies, and the result is that the price of paper has gone up by leaps and bounds.

Mr. LEMIEUX: The cost of transportation too.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: It was admitted in my office that the price could practically be fixed as was desired by the manufacturers, but they claimed that the prices which they were charging were reasonable. It is true that their costs have gone up. They had gone up last fall when the matter was drawn to my attention, and they have gone up, I believe, since. In order to deal thoroughly with the situation, the Government on my recommendation appointed a commissioner who is engaged to-day in investigating the cost of production and the conditions in connection with that industry. I might say here, that there is no question in this country or the United States that has given the governments of both countries more trouble than this difference of opinion existing between the press and the newsprint manufacturers. This matter has been adverted to so often in this debate that I take this opportunity of saying that in November last I was waited upon by representatives of the press of this entire country, all sections being represented from Halifax to Vancouver, Liberal and Conservative alike. They drew my attention to the fact that under the prices then existing—and they pointed out what was open to them in the way of increasing the price of their newspapers and the charge for advertisements—they were threatened with ruination. It was not difficult to figure; they used so much newsprint; the price had jumped from such a figure to such a figure, and there was the net result. In many cases the earnings were wiped out completely, and in others they were substantially affected. I did not go out for the purpose of inviting the press to ask me to take up this question; the press came to me as they came to the authorities in the United States, and asked that the question be taken up as it was vitally affecting their business. This was in November. I called a joint meeting and the matter was so urgent that I called it on a holiday, Thanksgiving Day. I asked the newsprint manufacturers and the newspaper publishers to send representatives to Ottawa, and they came and we held a joint meeting. I said: "Gentlemen, I do not want to interfere in this matter at all; it is an invidious task interfering in matters of this kind; I realize how complex this situation is, and I want you to appoint a committee of three from each side and see if you cannot reach a basis that will be fair." I pointed out that the war had created an exceptional condition, that supplies were hardly available from Scandinavia, that the situation was such that a virtual monopoly existed, that the profits of the sulphite and paper companies appeared to be large—and I had figures in substantiation of that placed before me—that on the other hand the newspapers were very hard hit and some of them threatened with ruin. I pointed out that the press was not a private enterprise, that although privately owned it had a quasi-public character, and that I did not think any government in this country could stand by and see the destruction of the press on any substantial scale, and I stated that representative newspaper men in this country had represented that unless something were done that would be the inevitable effect of the increase in prices. The committee that was appointed failed to reach a working basis. They continued their negotiations, I believe, during my absence in England in November, and on my return the matter was again brought to my attention by the press. It had become still more urgent, and finally, having regard to the public interest and the desirability, as I conceived it, that the press of this country should be continued and not be ruined, we looked into the matter further and an Order in Council was passed which gave us power to deal with the situation. I differentiate that case absolutely from an ordinary business, because as I have said the press is quasi-public in character, especially in war time, and also because of the exceptional circumstances surrounding the paper industry by reason of which supplies ordinarily available in peace time were not available then, and the price had risen to a figure very much in excess of what at that time, at all events, appeared to be justified by the increased cost of production. We were not alone in that action, though we dealt with the Canadian situation only. At the same time the situation was being dealt with on the American side, and there certain prosecutions were instituted. I pass no opinion upon these, as I do not know the facts. But what I say is that an extraordinary situation existed in the United States and in this country, so extraordinary that the Government there is concerned about it and action has been taken there looking to the relief of the press, and action was taken on this side, having a similar object in view. The hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Carvell) asks why the paper industry should not be put in the same category as the manufacturers of munitions. We are not discriminating against any industry by this taxation, for practically all industries in Canada are subject to it. But the paper industry has enjoyed exceptional profits by reason of the limitation upon the usual supplies of sulphite on this continent. I do not know what the situation is to-day, we are investigating it. But I know that the profits made in some cases have been exceptionally, abnormally, large.

Mr. McCREA: Have these exceptional profits been made from the manufacture of newsprint or from other branches of the industry?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I could not say as to that. The businesses are different. It was brought to my attention when I had this matter under consideration that some newsprint manufacturers produce their own sulphite, while others buy their sulphite from the manufacturer of that product. Some sell exclusively in the United States, some exclusively in Canada, and some find markets in both countries. The investigation of the newsprint business would inevitably involve an investigation of the sulphite industry. I dealt with an association, the Pulp and Paper Association, and, certainly, precipitate action was not taken. It was only when all the resources of persuasion had been exhausted that we took the action we did. I believed that they had the power, by adjustments among themselves, to bring it about that reasonable prices could be granted to publishers of Canadian newspapers. I felt more justified in taking the attitude I did because they had the American market—and the Canadian market is only about one-sixth of the entire market. They could afford to deal reasonably, very reasonably, with these customers here, who are hard hit by the war, and who have been their customers for many years. The action we took, I think, was absolutely justified as a war measure. I believe that if we had not taken it the effect upon the press of this country would have been most serious—I use no stronger term.

Mr. CARVELL: I assure the Minister of Finance that I would not set my knowledge of finance against his, or that of my hon. friend from Halifax (Mr. A. K. Maclean). Yet, notwithstanding his very laboured explanation, I am not satisfied. It is very easy for him to advance theories which he has never worked out in practice, and to argue from these theories. But I would like to have seen him try to raise an internal load without attaching to it the statement that it would not be liable to income taxes. According to his ideas of finance, this would not do. But he has not tried it out. In view of what he has said, what becomes of all the newspaper articles we have seen for the last year about the patriotism of our financial people in raising victory loans? If what the hon. minister says is correct, these people were making a shrewd business bargain, and if they had seen a fifth of a point, or even a tenth of a point, of advantage in placing their money elsewhere, they would have placed it elsewhere. I do not believe that; I believe the financial people of Canada have more patriotism than he gives them credit for, and that they would have invested in the war loan, even if he had not put in that rider about income taxes. I think he should have taken the chance, even if he had had to sell the bonds at a little less than he received for them. The revenues he might have received by taxes on the income of these bonds would have been much greater than the small discount he might have had to allow in selling the bonds. As I say, I do not put my knowledge of finance against his, but I am simply putting forward the views of a man from the country who has given some thought to these matters.

As to the paper business, I had no object in referring to what the minister did in relation to this business, except to compare with the way in which he has treated these concerns whose profits are regulated by the open market and the way he has treated his friends, the munition manufacturers, some of whom have made nine hundred per cent profit. I do not know, nor care, very much about the manner in which the price of newsprint paper is fixed. But if it was such an easy matter, and involved so little harm, to take these people by the throat and say, "You should not charge more than so much for paper," why could he not have applied the same doctrine to the people who are selling wheat at $3.25 a bushel and making millions and hundreds of millions out of it to-day? Why could not he apply these measures to the dealers in many other products that are being sold at fabulous prices? This is not germane to the subject under discussion, yet I could not help reminding my hon. friend of some of the powers conferred upon the Government by the War Measures Act. We have discussed this before, and I suppose we should have nothing more to say about it now. But, if the minister be in a receptive mood, I hope that before these resolutions are acted upon, he will give these matters serious consideration and see if he cannot in some way get more money out of the moneyed people during the times of present prosperity. He should invoke some new measure of taxation, and make the man who has a large income contribute a portion of that income to the state and put our finances in a better position than, I am afraid, they are in at the present time.

Mr. J. G. TURRIFF (Assiniboia): Criticism has been levelled at this excess profits tax ever since it was enacted. The two main criticisms that I have heard during the past year have been dealt with to a certain extent by my hon. friend from Carleton (Mr. Carvell). One of these criticisms is that the hon. the Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White) has made no distinction whatever between the ordinary, regular business concern that had been in business for five, ten or perhaps fifty years previous to the war, and which was doing a fair and legitimate business, and those companies that have been established for the purpose of supplying war munitions to the Government. In many cases, especially in connection with these larger companies, the Government has supplied all the capital for these enterprises. They granted them contracts running into the hundreds of thousands, millions and tens of millions of dollars for the manufacture of shells and—I am not complaining of it—they gave them prices on the first orders, three, four and five times the amount that it cost to manufacture the shells, for the express purpose of enabling these companies to pay for their plants and buildings and to give them a handsome profit the first year. Granted that that was all right, on what ground and justification does my hon. friend put that company on the same level as the legitimate business enterprise that may have been struggling for ten, fifteen or twenty years and which, when times became good owing to the war, has made a profit, although it had not been making one dollar of profit for three, four or five years previous to the war? Why, I ask, does the minister put a legitimate business enterprise of that kind on the same footing as a war munitions profiteer? That is the criticism that has been heard all over the country. I do not believe that the men who are paying these war taxes to-day are complaining because they have to pay them, but their ground of complaint is that only one man with money in ten is being taxed at all. It is not the amount of taxation that is being taken out of the manufacturer that is causing him to complain. The main ground of complaint is that he is singled out and all the moneyed people are allowed to go scot free.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Who are singled out?

Mr. TURRIFF: I say that the manufacturers and business men of the country paying this excess war tax are not complaining about what they have to pay, but what they are complaining about is that they are singled out and called upon to pay it while nine others who are making an equal or a greater amount of money are not even asked by the Government to pay one dollar.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Who has my hon. friend in mind when he speaks about men who are making an equal or greater amount of money than the munition or other manufacturers?

Mr. TURRIFF: Let me give my hon. friend an instance. There are in the city of Ottawa, and in every city in the Dominion, men walking around the streets who are making from $100,000 to $200,000 clear cash every year out of their investments, and they are not called upon to pay one dollar. My hon. friend knows it perfectly well. That is not fair.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: If they are in business—

Mr. TURRIFF: But they are not in business.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Well, then, we must have an income tax to reach them. You could not single them out by a special Act. Are they not subject to income tax in Ontario? For instance, they have an income tax in Ottawa ; are they not subject to it?

Mr. TURRIFF: There is no income tax in Ontario for war purposes.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I do not mean for war purposes.

Mr. TURRIFF: My hon. friend is raising this tax for war purposes and he singles out one man in ten and imposes this heavy tax on him, while the other nine men who are making money much more easily, who are not employing anybody and who have incomes ranging from $5,000 up to $200,000 escape. My hon. friend says to them: we do not ask you to pay a dollar. That is what the men who are paying this tax complain of. They do not complain of the amount they are called upon to pay, but they do complain because they are singled out. One-tenth of the population has to pay $12,500,000, and all the millionaires and multi-millionaires are allowed to go scot free and are not asked to pay one cent.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Are not the incomes of most of these men derived from dividends on shares in companies which are subject to this tax? I believe they are.

Mr. TURRIFF: Supposing they are, is that any answer to the argument? Take, for instance, the case of a man who has money invested in bank stocks. The banks do not pay any tax under this Act, but they pay a tax under the Act that was put in force previously, the Act imposing taxation on loan companies, insurance companies and banks. Supposing that a man has money invested in bank stocks.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Banks are liable to this tax if they make sufficient profits.

Mr. TURRIFF: The tax is so fixed that it does not reach the banks as it reaches the manufacturers, except such as the little bank in my constituency which has a paid up capital of $250,000. The banks pay the tax that my hon. friend put upon them a year ago. But take the case of a man who has 100 or 1,000 shares in the Bank of Montreal. The Bank of Montreal pays whatever tax my hon. friend has put upon it and it is a very mild tax, but does the paying of that tax keep the bank from paying the dividends that give the man who is walking around the streets of Ottawa an income of $50,000 or $100,000? Because that man gets that dividend from the banks which pay this small tax is that any reason why the man receiving probably $100,000 a year should not pay anything? It is the most absurd thing that I ever heard of. This excess business tax is a tax made for the one and single purpose of letting nine millionaires or rich men out of ten escape altogether without even being asked to pay the tax. That is what my hon. friend from Sherbrooke (Mr. McCrea) objected to, not to the tax that he had to pay. I do not think I heard one word of objection from my hon. friend to paying the amount he had to pay provided there was an even tax all round and that other men who had an income equal to his should pay their share.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: My hon. friend is contending really for an income tax? Is that not really it?

Mr. TURRIFF: Yes.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Oh.

Mr. TURRIFF: My hon. friend can call it what he likes.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Is my hon. friend then in favour of an income tax?

Mr. TURRIFF: Certainly; I think it is absurd that a man who is working hard in business, employing hundreds or thousands of men and women, helping the development of the country and who makes, say, $50,000 a year should be discriminated against. The manufacturer who makes $50,000 a year should undoubtedly pay heavily out of it in taxes, but why should the man who has $1,000,000 invested in bank and railway stocks and bonds that pay 5 per cent, who is doing nothing except cutting off and cashing coupons, but who makes $50,000 a year cash income, pay not a dollar towards the cost of prosecuting the war? Why should the one man pay $10,000 or $15,000 in taxes and the other pay nothing? If my hon. friend is trying to avoid taxing this class simply because he sees that it will be difficult to collect the income tax, that is simply begging the question. As has been pointed out by the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Carvell), the Minister of Finance has so placed his loans in Canada that when another $500,000,000 that is now lying in the banks drawing 3 per cent is put into Canadian bonds for the carrying on of this war, and we have altogether one thousand millions of Canada's savings invested in war loans, none of it paying one cent of income tax, guaranteed by the terms of the bonds against the imposition of such a tax, then my hon. friend in two or three years, if he is still in power, will come forward and say: Well, the time has come when we ought to have the income tax, but unfortunately there is one thousand million dollars of the investments of Canada on which we cannot collect an income tax. My hon. friend from Carleton never said a truer word than that if the loans had been made in Canada without any exemptions from income tax it would have made a trifling difference only in the cost of these loans. This money is lying in the banks drawing 3 per cent, and why would not the people put it into war loans, Canadian Government bonds at 5½ per cent, even if it might be subject in the years to come to an income tax. They are getting almost double the rate of interest that is paid by the banks. Thus this tax is the most unfair tax that ever was levied in any country.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Not quite so bad as that.

Mr. TURRIFF: Well, if it is not quite so bad as that, my hon. friend must have it in his mind that it is pretty bad anyway. This discrimination is undoubtedly a source of dissatisfaction. I have never yet heard one man in Canada object to paying the tax; but I have heard hundreds object to paying the tax and having others get off scot free. I think my hon. friend should take into consideration a change in his system of selling bonds, in making future loans. Let him leave these bonds subject to income tax. The time is coming and is not far distant when we shall have difficulty in raising the revenue necessary to pay the pension fund, the interest on the war debt, the sinking funds, and all the expenses of running the country. I have noticed during the last day or two, in the discussion of this measure, that my hon. friend lays great stress on the necessity of winning the war. We all agree that we must win the war, and my hon. friend, of course, wants to keep the financial matters of the country right. Let me ask the minister if when, last year, he gave his authority and sanction to the handing over of $8,000,000 to Sir Rodolphe Forget for his railway, which he knew then and knows now will never, as long as my hon. friend or the youngest boy in this House survives, earn one cent of interest on the money—

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Is my hon. friend not talking about the National Transcontinental Railway?

Mr. TURRIFF: I am talking about the $8,000,000 which my hon. friend gave to his political associates, and I am asking him if he thought that he was helping to win the war by giving that $8,000,000 to Sir Rodolphe Forget. There is no man in this country—because I have a great respect for my hon. friend's ability——

[Mr. Turriff.]

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I doubt that sometimes.

Mr. TURRIFF: I have a great respect for his ability; but I should like to see him a little more free from the influence of some of his associates. My hon. friend would never have given that money of his own free will, I know him better than that. All I wanted to ask him was, did he think then and does he think to-day, that in giving that $8,000,000—because it will cost Canada that much anyway, he was helping to win the war? That is a question my hon. friend has to consider.

Now let us see how much we are doing to pay for this war. This war has been going on practically within two or three months of three years, and during that time we have put $10,000,000, in round figures into winning the war—$10,000,000 of revenue, with all the taxation that has been put on the people. Do not let my hon. friend forget that at the first war session, the short session of five days, in August, 1914, he put on new taxes to the extent of many millions of dollars. Do not let my hon. friend forget that in the following session we amended the Customs Act again and imposed taxes of many million dollars on the people. Do not let him forget that, in addition to his custom taxes, he taxed everybody, poor and rich alike, by means of the stamp taxes and the railway ticket tax. My hon. friend from North Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt) is accused of travelling in pullman cars. No doubt he does sometimes, but each time he pays his five cent tax on his ticket.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: That was only a joke.

Mr. TURRIFF: But the man who has to buy a railway ticket, the labouring man who buys his ticket from here to Aylmer, ten miles, pays the same.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: He does not pay a cent.

Mr. TURRIFF: Well he did.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Only when the ticket costs over a dollar.

Mr. TURRIFF: Well, if he goes thirty-three miles he pays the same as the wealthy man who starts from here and goes to Vancouver and back. He pays practically the same amount. That is a tax on the poor man, and as usual, the rich man is favoured. But with all those taxes that have been put on, the direct taxes and the custome taxes, my hon. friend has put only $10,000,000 to the good towards the war in three years. That is the position Canada is in to-day. It is all very well to boast about what Canada is doing, but I agree absolutely and entirely with the statements that have been made here this evening, that during this time, when we are getting in $1,000,000 a day for munitions of war, when orders to the extent of $1,500,000,000, practically, have been placed in Canada, on which probably $500,000,000 of money has been made in profits, out of those huge profits made last year and the year before, we have got in taxes from the wealth of Canada the paltry sum of $12,500,000.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: How much does my hon. friend say has been spent on munitions? Did he say $1,500,000? If my hon. friend will go to the Munitions Board, he will find that it is not much more than one-third of that amount.

Mr. TURRIFF: I have heard hon. gentlemen opposite boast of the hundreds and thousands of millions of dollars that have come into the country for munitions of war. How much did come in? Taking the orders from Russia, France and Britain, and including orders for munitions and supplies for the Canadian troops, certainly the amount was over $1,000,000,000. Taken all around, the profits on that amount would be at least one-third, and out of the vast profits made, the wealth of Canada last year produced only $12,500,000 in taxes, which my hon. friend expects to increase to $15,000,000. So that we are doing practically nothing; we are piling up a burden of debt that is going to exceed $1,000,000,000 and the boys who are risking their lives at the front for Canada will, when they come back, after having saved the Empire, have to shoulder the load and pay the interest on this money, a great deal of which should be collected at the present time. If my hon. friend would collect the same amount from all the wealthy men in Canada that he is collecting from the business men and the manufacturers, he would be able to pay tens of millions of dollars each year towards the expenses of carrying on the war and would avoid piling up so much debt for the soldiers to pay interest on when they come back. That is the weakness of the system that the Finance Minister has adopted for the collecting of war taxes. We are not carrying on the war with the taxes we are collecting; we are using that money to run the business of the country. During the last year we have paid the interest on the war debt and the pension fund, but if we do our duty as Britain is doing hers and as the United States is preparing to do hers, we will change the system and tax everybody alike. Why should not a man with an income pay taxes? He is not paying any war tax to the province or to the municipality; he is going scot free. Unfortunately, often it is the man who escapes taxation by law who refuses to contribute to the Red Cross and the Patriotic funds. There is no use depending on the voluntary subscription of a man of that kind; you have to impose a tax. Nobody will object if the tax is made equitable, and an income tax can be evenly and equitably applied. A man with an income of $5,000 or $3,000 will not pay the same percentage as the man whose income is $15,000 or $20,000 a year. In Britain the man who is vastly wealthy, with an income, say, of £100,000, pays, I think, 33⅓ per cent. Many men in Canada have an income of $500,000; why should they not pay one-third of it, or some large percentage, in time of war? Why should the manufacturers and the business men be called upon to contribute part of their profits while these men with equally large incomes, who do not do as much to earn the money, are not even asked to pay anything? Let me give the Committee an idea of what the British Government is doing. Great Britain's total revenue for the year ending March 31, last, amounted to the enormous sum of $2,867,000,000, which is an increase of $1,183,000,000—I am giving only the round figures—over the total for the preceding year. How was this tremendous increase brought about? The taxation on excess profits netted the sum of $699,600,000 or 24·43 per cent of the total revenue secured. Taxation on incomes and property netted the sum of $1,025,000,000, or 35·77 per cent of the total revenue secured. Customs taxation netted $352,000,000, or 12·21 per cent of the total revenue secured. Excise netted $281,900,000, or 9·77 per cent of the total revenue secured. The remainder was secured from various minor sources. It will be noted that from excess profits and accumulated wealth and incomes, 60.23 per cent of the total enormous revenue of the United Kingdom for the past fiscal year was secured. A large part of the small proportion contributed from Customs represented impositions upon luxuries. Let us contrast with these figures the proportion under which Canada secured her revenue. I quote from a press report:

> The contrast between the above revenue statement and the revenue statement of Canada for the same period is startling.
>
> Canada's total revenue for the fiscal year just ended amounted to the sum of $228,217,270, the percentage of increase over that for the preceding year being almost equal to that of the United Kingdom. But what a difference there is in the sources from which it was obtained.
>
> In Canada the customs tariff accounted for $133,531,155, or 58.33 per cent of the total revenue secured.
>
> Excise accounted for $24,253,632, or 10.52 per cent of the total revenue secured.
>
> Railways and canals accounted for $25,018,997, or 10.96 per cent of the total revenue secured.
>
> Post office accounted for $20,031,627, or 8.77 per cent of the total revenue secured.
>
> The masses contributed the greatest proportion of the above amounts. But out of the total revenue of $228,217,270, excess war profits contributed the insignificant and paltry sum of $14,552,383, or only 6.58 per cent of the total revenue raised.
> In Britain excess profits and accumulated wealth contributed 60.23 per cent of the total revenue. In Canada excess profits contributed 6.58 per cent.

It will be seen, therefore, that Britain gets the great proportion of her revenue from her wealth, whereas in Canada the great proportion of the revenue is taken from the poor people, and the wealthy go free. The system of my hon. friend taxes the poor and lets the rich escape. And, because my hon. friend is taxing only a few of the wealthy people of Canada, under the proposed provision that we are now considering, the rich will continue to escape taxation.

I hardly think my hon. friend is quite fair in this proposed legislation. I do not want to do my hon. friend any injustice. When he brought down last year the legislation that he is now amending he said that the legislation would be operative during a period of three years. Any one reading his speech would come to the absolute conclusion that that was a fixture for three years. My hon. friend now goes back on what we understood him to mean last year and is now putting an extra burden of taxation on the same shoulders on which he put it last year, after stating, as every one thought, that that was the end of that system of taxation.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: What I did say was that the Bill would last just the three years. I do not believe I said that the measure would not in any way be changed.

Mr. TURRIFF: My hon. friend did not say in specific words: I will not come back and augment those taxes. I will acknowledge that, but the general tenor of his remarks was that the tax was a fixture to the end of the three years, and no one looked for any changes along that line. Let me quote just a few of the remarks made by my hon. friend. While he was speaking on the 16th of March, 1916, he said:—

> This is a temporary measure, and the operative part of it comes to an end at the date mentioned in the Bill, that is to say, the 31st day of December, 1917. It is true that in the succeeding year there will be a payment in respect of the accounting period falling due during the year 1917, but the Bill is designed to last only three years, and it will not last longer than that.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Did not my hon. friend, when he was introducing this Bill, say that we might expect some further taxation later on?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: No, I did not. Further taxation is possible, but I do not consider it necessary now to make any announcement along that line.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: What is the matter with that? I say that further taxation is possible.

Mr. TURRIFF: Later on in the same address, my hon. friend said this:—

> This tax is, as I stated last night, for a limited period. My hon. friend questions whether I was justified in making that statement. I certainly was justified in making that statement, because it represents the intentions of the Government. . . That statement is in no way inconsistent with that which I made last evening, namely, that this particular measure is for a period only. The principle of the resolutions, it would appear to me, indicates that. . . Therefore, it would seem to me that I am perfectly justified in stating, as I do, on behalf of the Government, that this is a temporary tax. In making that statement, I largely meet the argument of my hon. friend that capital might be discouraged from embarking upon Canadian enterprise.

My hon. friend gave as a reason why capital would not be afraid to invest in Canadian enterprises, that he had fixed the rate and that it was only a temporary rate. Now my hon. friend comes back over the same ground and loads up the same people after they have invested capital, and says: Instead of taking 25 per cent, if you make big profits, we will take 50 or 75 per cent. While my hon. friend did not specifically say that he would not do this, he let the people believe and let capital believe that he would not do so, and no one could come to any other conclusion than that.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: In what my hon. friend has read did I not say it was possible there would be further taxation?

Mr. TURRIFF: Yes, my hon. friend said it was possible there would be further taxation, and no doubt he was speaking then as he is speaking to-night to the effect that it might be advisable or necessary to impose an income tax. But there was nothing in the speech of my hon. friend last year that would, for one moment, lead any one to any other conclusion than that the tax he was then imposing on certain industries was a final and definite tax for three years, and that it would not be raised before the end of that time. That is the only conclusion that any man reading that speech could come to.

Mr. MACDONALD: And that capital need not be scared because the tax was going to be only 25 per cent.

Mr. TURRIFF: Later on in his remarks, my hon. friend said:—

> This measure, therefore, being a temporary measure, it is not conceivable to me, when it is understood, that it will have any effect in retarding the flow of capital towards this country.

If, when my hon. friend made this statement, he had said: Well this tax is for three years; I am putting it on now, but possibly next year I may have to come forward and say that I am going to raise that tax of 25 per cent on profits over 7 per cent to 50 per cent or 75 per cent, does my hon. friend for a moment think that would not deter capital from being invested? No man in Canada or elsewhere, after reading the report of the debate and the answers of my hon. friend could have come to any other conclusion than that, at all events for three years, there would be nothing more levied than 25 per cent on profits in excess of 7 per cent. It seems to me that my hon. friend is not doing himself justice on this occasion. I quite agree with him that more money must be levied. I would support him if he levied a tax that would enable us to collect $200,000,000 every year over and above the cost of running the country and if he put it into the carrying on of the war. He could get an extra $200,000,000 a year if he taxed every man of wealth in the same way as he is taxing men of wealth who have money invested in business or manufactures.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Do not you believe it.

Mr. TURRIFF: That is what my hon. friend ought to do. Let him bring forward an income tax. Let him tax every one alike; let him take not only the extravagant amount that he allows his colleagues to spend but the pensions fund and the sinking fund and so on, but an extra $200,000,000 out of the people as the war is going on, and there will be very little objection if it is done, not as my hon. friend is doing it now, but in a fair, even way, so that the man who has $100,000 a year will pay more pro rata than the man who has $5,000. Let the minister do that and he will have all the income he needs and he will keep the finances of Canada in good shape; and let him also, when he makes further loans, eliminate that clause, that the bonds will not be subject to income tax, so that when we come to levy an income tax—and there will be an income tax in Canada in a few years no matter which party is in power—we shall be in a position to say that every dollar of money invested in Canada shall pay its fair share towards paying the debt of the war in adition to the cost of carrying on the affairs of the country.

Mr. McCREA: The Minister of Finance said this afternoon that last week I had been guilty of making a violent attack upon the Government, and especially upon himself. I wish to say that it was not my intention to be impolite or unreasonable in criticising the minister, although I criticised his method of taxation. I have no desire to be impolite or to use towards the minister or the other members of the Government language other than to criticise justly what I consider is entitled to criticism. The minister also stated that my criticisms were opposed to the tax.

If he will read my speech he will see that my criticism was of the inequality of the taxation; I said it was a tax bearing directly on but about five per cent of the population of Canada. If it were necessary, I said, I would be willing to be taxed 25, 50, 75 per cent, or even all my profits, provided everybody contributed in the same proportion; that was my attitude then, and it is my attitude now. I am still of the opinion that it is unfair and not in the best interests of the country to single out any one class and make it bear the whole burden. I have seen some criticism in the papers, and also heard some in the House, to the effect that, as I was a manufacturer, my complaint was purely an interested one. I do not suppose I could convince this House that such is not the case. Nevertheless, I wish to say that I have a very great interest in the welfare of this country. I have spent my life in doing a great deal of hard work, building up an industry with which I am still connected. But before my personal interests, I place the interests of my country. I believe the effect of this taxation will have the effect of keeping capital out of this country, and I could not use a better argument than the one the Minister of Finance used a few moments ago when he told the House that it was absolutely necessary in floating the loans recently to specify in the prospectus that they would be free from taxation. Otherwise, he said, it would have been impossible for him to get anything like the same price for the issue. Well, if that applies to the selling of Government bonds, does it not also apply to the securing of capital for the development of this country? Comparisons have been made with the system of taxation in England. In my humble judgment, there is no comparison between this country and England so far as capital is concerned. This is an immense country, of untold wealth still undeveloped, and what we need for its development is, first, population, and secondly, capital, and if the Government by legislation frighten away capital, they will certainly not be helping to build up the country.

I said a moment ago that not over 5 per cent of our population would be directly affected by this taxation. But, indirectly, it will affect everybody, because if capital is driven away from the country our industries will become dormant or die from lack of capital, and then everybody suffers. I think it would be wise even at this stage for the minister to reconsider his measure of taxation with the object of devising some scheme for distributing the burden of taxation more evenly between all classes.

In his remarks this afternoon the Finance Minister stated that the first consideration was to win the war; he laid great stress on that. I hope that is what he had in mind when he was preparing this taxation. I hope I am wrong, but I fear he must have had in his head some thought of winning an election as well as winning the war. The minister said himself that this taxation was very popular. The reason it is so popular is because it is so unjust.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I did not say it was popular. I said that I thought public opinion would sustain the measure. I did not use the word popular, so far as I recollect.

Mr. McCREA: The minister said this afternoon that the people did not like taxation. Consequently, he exempts 95 per cent of the people from the tax, and puts the whole burden on the other 5 per cent. This will please the people, and will probably be remembered when the proper time comes. I would like to say a few words about the paper business. I think in no other industry in Canada has so much energy been displayed and so much progress been made as in the production of paper of all kinds. To illustrate my meaning, I shall have to go back in history a little. Some thirty-three years ago I supplied the fuel and paper wood for the Canada Paper Company, and I remember in the spring when I was receiving my cheque Mr. Thomas Logan, the president, said to me almost with tears in his eyes, "I do not know what is to become of this business. I am paying 50 cents a cord more for wood now than I ever did in my life before, and I am selling my paper for 1½ cents per pound less than a year ago." I knew what price he was paying for his wood, and I was curious to know the price he was selling his paper at, so I asked him, and he told me that the year previous the average price was 10 cents a pound, but that he could only get 8½ cents at that time, and he almost had tears in his eyes at the thought of going into bankruptcy. To-day, before the war came on, newsprint was selling at about 2 cents a pound, and wood cost at least three times the price Mr. Logan had to pay then; that is, we were paying three times the price he was paying for his wood, and twice as much for labour and material, and yet the paper was selling for less than one-quarter the price he got thirty-three years ago. Yet he thought he would go into bankruptcy. I think this little story shows the great development that has taken place in the paper industry in this country, when newsprint can be produced so much cheaper than a few years ago. Down at Berlin in New Hampshire you will find a very large building in which are twenty or twenty-five men experimenting. If a man in the employ of a paper mill strikes an idea that seems to him an improvement in the processes or equipment of the works, he explains it to the manager. If the manager thinks there is anything in it he sends the man down to the building where the experimenting is going on. There the man finds draughtsman and all necessary assistance to put his ideas on paper. If the idea works out, well and good; his improvement or invention is adopted, and the inventor is rewarded. These are the methods employed by the paper manufacturers throughout the country, to produce paper at cheaper prices. The publisher wants all the benefit of this, he wants to get paper at less than cost. Let me tell you the conditions in the paper trade prior to the war. You would think that when a man had cut his timber, driven it, and carried it through all processes of manufacture to the finished paper and delivered that paper f.o.b. cars at the station, he had completed his part, and that the publisher to whom the paper was sold should pay freight and handle the product at destination. But that was not the case. The manufacturer had to prepay freight, and even prepay customs, and deliver the paper at Philadelphia or elsewhere, store it, and pay storage, and then deliver it to the publisher at the sidewalk each day for his next day's requirements. Now, nothing but keen competition would have driven men to such a position as that. The war came on, and everything in connection with the manufacture of paper went up in price. Fourdrinier wires, one of the big items, went up eight hundred per cent taking into consideration both cost and the life of the material. Is there any reason why the publisher, instead of crying baby and telling the Minister of Finance his tale of woe, should not have passed on his increased price as men in other lines of business have done? There was no reason why he should not have done it. Does any man believe that because you have to pay two cents for a paper that you used to buy for one cent you are going to stop reading the paper? Or that because you have to pay fifty per cent more for advertising space, you are going to stop advertising? That might be so if everything were dull and dead. Two years ago the clerks were standing behind the counters with folded arms and nothing to do. But to-day, business is good. I am not referring to such conditions as those in Vancouver—you people there were in the land speculation business——

Mr. STEVENS: I was smiling, but it was to see the leader on that side (Mr. Graham), who is a publisher, and is suffering under the hon. gentleman's (Mr. McCrea's) remarks.

Mr. GRAHAM: Not badly.

Mr. McCREA: The Minister of Finance says that he has had more trouble over this than over all the rest put together.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: No doubt about it.

Mr. McCREA: I sympathize with the hon. minister, but the difficulty has not been caused by the manufacturers. They have not been trying to get unreasonable prices. Whatever may have been done in other branches of the paper business, the demands in regard to newsprint have been very moderate.

Mr. EDWARDS: What is the price of newsprint now compared with what it was before the war?

Mr. McCREA: It was two cents a pound before the war, and now it is two and a half cents—an increase of twenty-five per cent.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: What is the actual price to publishers in the United States to-day?

Mr. McCREA: It was three cents to three and a half cents, and in some places more.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The hon. gentleman mentions a price of two and a half cents. That is the price existing as the result of the Government's intervention. But what would the price have been had it not been for the Government's action?

Mr. McCREA: I think the minister himself gave the proper answer when dealing with the other branches of the paper business—that supply and demand should govern. That is what should have governed in the newsprint business as in everything else. And it would have been wisdom on the part of the publishers to have paid a little more for paper for the time being. There was a movement to start new industries in paper manufacture by men who were imbued with the idea that there was all kinds of money in the business. They were looking out for new locations. But the moment the minister fixed the price of paper, he put the idea of big profits out of their heads, and they have gone home with their capital, and will stay there for some time. The publishers made the mistake of their lives when they undertook, through the influence of the minister, to fix the price of newsprint at a cent a pound less than the article could be made for legitimately. No man can go into the business to-day and make paper for less than one cent a pound more than the price that has been fixed. The minister may say that, taking a mill that is equipped, to manufacture from the standing tree to the finished product, there is a margin of profit. But the average price of sulphite pulp is not less than $100 a ton, and it requires 500 pounds of sulphite for one ton of newsprint. That represents $25 for your sulphite alone. Then it takes 1,600 pounds of ground wood pulp, which is selling—and quick sale, as fast as you can make it—at not less than $40 a ton. That is, for 1,600 pounds, the cost would be $32. Add this to the cost of your sulphite and you have $57 for this material alone. Then take the high price of coal, the high price of labour, and other necessary expenses, and the total will run to $70 a ton before you touch profits at all, or three and one-half cents a pound.

Mr. EDWARDS: This is a matter I know very little about, but with the hon. gentleman's permission I would like to ask a question in order that I may learn something about it. Am I correct in saying that the output of newsprint in Canada is about 1,800 tons a day?

Mr. McCREA: It is somewhere around that.

Mr. EDWARDS: And the price before the war was two cents a pound, and now it is two and a half cents a pound? Assuming a year of 300 days, that would make a profit at present prices, over and above what they were before the war, of $5,500,000 a year, would it not? I presume they were not selling at a loss when they sold at two cents a pound?

Mr. McCREA: They were not making any money.

Mr. EDWARDS: There is this difference of $5,500,000—

Mr. McCREA: What about the raw material?

Mr. EDWARDS: That was the point I was coming to. Whether the price is just or not can only be ascertained by estimating the cost of production. The hon. gentleman (Mr. McCrea) knows the facts. Does he contend that it costs the manufacturers of paper that extra $5,500,000 to produce paper for one year now as compared with what it cost before the war, and that the manufacturers are not making any money at two and a half cents a pound?

Mr. McCREA: No, they are not making any money. The cost of raw material and of labour have increased very materially. Coal alone is costing us about 100 per cent more, and it requires one ton of coal to make one ton of paper. Coal that used to cost $5 a ton is to-day costing $10 to $11. Fourdrinier wire is a big item of expense. It cost $212 prior to the war, and the life of it was about five weeks. We figured that out, taking it from the time we started using this material to the time the price increased, and that was the average cost. To-day the cost of the same wire is $490, and the life of the wire is 12 days. The cost of the wire is $490 as against $212 originally.

Mr. STEVENS: What accounts for the difference in the life of the wire?

Mr. McCREA: The life of the wire is 12 days as against 5 weeks. The reason for the shorter life of the wire given by the manufacturer is that he cannot get the material. I presume also that he was forced by over production.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Does my hon. friend produce, or buy, sulphite?

Mr. McCREA: We buy sulphite.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Then sulphite enters into your cost?

Mr. McCREA: We make sulphite, but sulphite does not go into newsprint. The sulphite we buy. All the other items have increased in the same proportion. You ask me how it is that we cannot make money now that the price has been increased from 2 cents to 2½ cents a pound, or $10 a ton? My reply is that $10 a ton does not begin to meet the additional cost of raw material. Pulp wood alone is selling at twice what it sold for a year ago.

Mr. EDWARDS: How much do you save by your improved methods?

Mr. McCREA: We have got it down as low as it can be got by improved methods. Take the case of the International, the largest industry on the continent, having some 30 odd mills; that company has been reorganized two or three times in the last ten years. It had not paid a dividend on its preferred stock up to the time that the increased prices came after the beginning of the war and when the increased prices caused by the war took place it was owing almost an amount equal to 50 per cent of its preferred stock in interest on its preferred stock. The minister said this afternoon that 7 per cent was a fair rate of interest to make on your investment. I agree with him. But, how many factories and industries are there in the country which, during the past ten years, have been obliged to pass their dividends? If it happens now that we are making large profits, if you like, what about the years when we made no profits at all? What about the years when the industries of this country were not able to pay dividends on their preferred stock to say nothing about their common stock? What about the years to come when our industries will probably be very badly crippled?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Supposing we had applied the English method, what would have happened to the pulp and paper industry?

Mr. McCREA: I am not advocating applying the English method.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The English method is to take the average profits of the three years before the war, and then take 80 per cent of the excess profits over that in time of war.

Mr. McCREA: I am not advocating the English method; I am advocating a common sense method which will apply to everybody equally and alike and under which the rich man will pay according to his means and the poor man will pay also according to his. If you apply that method I am satisfied the people of Canada will be better pleased than they are now. I do not believe there are any people in the country who want to be slackers with regard to paying their fair and legitimate share of the expense of winning this war, rich and poor alike. But, let me finish this question of newsprint. The price of flour to-day is $16 a barrel, wheat $3 a bushel, potatoes $3 to $4 a bushel and pork 17 to 18 cents live weight. Then, take half fat cattle; I saw some sold a short while ago. A farmer drove in a bunch of ten steers weighing about 1,050 apiece and he got $1,150 for the lot or 11 cents a pound live weight. The price of potatoes should only be 75 cents a bushel at the outside; to-day they are $3 to $3.50 a bushel. The price of wheat should not be over 90 cents to $1 a bushel; to-day it is $3 a bushel. The price of flour is $16 a barrel. The minister says that the press of the country must be sustained because it is one of the necessities. If a poor man has a big family and they are crying for bread will they be satisfied with the evening paper? Does it not appeal to the minister that there are other things as well as newsprint that ought to be regulated? The minister says that the winning of the war is the one and the main thing to which we should give our attention but I cannot help thinking that when this delegation from the press came down with their stocking full of printers' ink and told him that they would knock his political head off if he did not listen to them he said: hold on, gentlemen, I do not want to be disfigured that way, I will listen to you; what will you have—paper at 2½ cents a pound?—all right, gentlemen, you shall have it; the manufacturer can squeal all he likes but he has got no printers' ink and he cannot hurt me very much with his tongue. I am sorry to believe these things but I leave it to the judgment of the House and the people of the country to say if there is any just reason why the price of newsprint should be fixed at 2½ cents a pound, which is one cent less than it can be made for when other branches of business are left untouched. I noticed a short time ago in the Financial Times that a company making sulphite pulp were describing the profits they had made during the last year when the average price was so much; they stated what they expected to make next year when the average price was going to be so much and they ended up by saying that "our business is not affected by the price fixed for newsprint." Why should this condition exist? Why should this one branch of the industry be left so that they could boast that they could make such large profits because they were not affected by what affected another branch of the same industry? I am not jealous of other people. I wish I could say for the minister and for the Government that they had treated the manufacturers of newsprint as they treated other branches of the industry. I think it would be to the advantage of the Government and for the publishers if that were the case. The publishers are going to suffer for it later on, because they have prevented the construction of additional plants which would have afforded the only remedy for their complaint. If they had patience for about twelve months from the time they started to make the kick, the position would have rectified itself, as there would have been such competition that they could have again dictated the prices as they had done for the past ten years. Simply because we reached a period where for a few months they had to pay an additional price, they had not the foresight to see what would happen in the future. They made their kick at the wrong time, and will be sorry for it later on. The American publishers are sorry for it now. They started to fix the price, but they saw where they were going, and thought it best to wait and see what would happen. The Canadian Government would do well, even at this late hour, to change their position, and say to the publishers: Let supply and demand govern these things, it is the best regulator of prices on the face of the earth. And the minister would be wise to consider well before imposing additional war taxes on the manufacturers of this country, and see if he cannot find some other way of levying taxes so as not to drive capital away and prevent its investment in Canada. We who are here will stand it as best we can, but the man outside will do as the man to whom you are trying to sell bonds, who will not buy bonds unless he has some assurance that the bonds will not be loaded down with income tax. The same thing applies to the man with money in his pocket; he will not invest in a plant in this country unless he has some assurance that it will not be singled out and made to bear the whole burden of the war and other expenses of this country, while other men, equally able to pay, go scot free.

Progress reported.

On motion of Mr. Thomas White, the House adjourned at 10.55 o'clock p.m.

Wednesday, May 16, 1917.

The House met at Three o'clock, the Speaker in the Chair.

THE NEW MACE.

VOTE OF THANKS TO THE LORD MAYOR AND SHERIFFS OF LONDON.

Rt. Hon. Sir ROBERT BORDEN (Prime Minister): I beg to move, seconded by Sir Wilfrid Laurier:

That this House do accept the Mace presented in 1916 by Colonel the Rt. Hon. Sir Charles Cheers Wakefield, then Lord Mayor of London, and by Sir George Alexander Touche, M.P., and Sir Samuel George Shead, then Sheriffs of London, and that the warm thanks of the House be conveyed by Mr. Speaker to the donors.

The House will remember that shortly after the fire which destroyed the Parliament Buildings we were in receipt of a communication from the then Lord Mayor and the Sheriffs of London in which they asked to be permitted to present a mace to this House to take the place of that which unfortunately had been destroyed in the fire. I consulted with my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) at that time, and we agreed that the offer should be accepted. The mace has been prepared by the Goldsmiths and Silversmiths Company, Ltd., and during my recent visit to England it was presented to me in order that I might transmit it to Mr. Speaker and obtain the formal assent of the House to its acceptance. The mace is now on the Table, and hon. gentlemen have had an opportunity of examining it. I am sure they will all agree that it is a very beautiful piece of workmanship, and that the warm thanks of the House are due to Sir Charles Wakefield, Sir George Touche, and Sir Samuel Shead for their generous gift. This gift and its acceptance form a new link of association between the Parliament of Canada and the great city at the heart of our Empire.

I might perhaps with advantage place on Hansard a description of the design of the mace, which has been prepared by the Goldsmiths and Silversmiths Company:

The general design of the Mace is on similar lines to that used in the English House of Commons. The vase shaped head is divided into four panels by female figures with acanthus leaf terminals. These panels contain the following beautifully embossed emblems. The Arms of the Dominion of Canada, the Rose for England, the Harp for Ireland, and the Thistle for Scotland; above each emblem is the Royal Crown and the initials G. R. are placed on either side. In the spaces above the figures is shown the Beaver executed in bold relief. The Head of the Mace is supported by four ornamental brackets and is surmounted by the Royal Crown, indicating the Royal Authority; beneath the arches where the cushion is usually placed, there is a raised circular space on which appears in relief the full blazon of the Royal Arms of Great Britain and Ireland. The Staff is divided at intervals by two spiral fluted knops, and the whole length is richly chased with the Rose, Shamrock, Thistle and the Maple Leaf. The massive foot of the Staff is decorated with Roses, Thistles and Fleur-de-lys, the plain space above bearing the following inscription:—

'This Mace replacing the original Mace of the House of Commons of the Dominion of Canada, destroyed by fire on February 17th, 1916, was presented by Colonel the Rt. Hon. Sir Charles Cheers Wakefield, Lord Mayor of London, and the Sheriffs of London, George Alexander Touche, Esq., M.P., and Samuel George Shead, Esq., June, 1916.'

In its design and execution the Mace forms an emblem of authority well worthy of the great country for which it is intended.

It will be observed that the date of the destruction of the Parliament Buildings is incorrectly stated in the inscription. I am at a loss to know how this mistake could have occurred, but I have no doubt it can be easily rectified. The Lord Mayor of London placed the Council Chamber of the Guild Hall at the disposal of the donors for the purpose of presenting the mace, and he himself attended and presided over the ceremony. Each of the donors spoke and their expressions of goodwill to this country and of appreciation of the part which Canada is taking in the great struggle in which we are now engaged were all that any of us could desire. I am sure there will be a perfect unanimity of feeling in the House in assenting to this resolution, and I trust that Mr. Speaker will convey in fitting terms to the donors the appreciation and thanks of the House, together with a copy of the resolution which I am now proposing.

Right hon. Sir WILFRID LAURIER: On Friday, we shall know exactly what my right hon. friend (Sir Robert Borden) has brought back from his visit to England. Yet even to-day we see and must acknowledge that he has not come back empty-handed, but on the contrary he has brought in this mace a very substantial evidence of the work he has accomplished on the other side of the water. This emblem and its presentation are evidences of our connection and growing relations with the Motherland. For my part, though I am a democrat to the hilt, I certainly appreciate all these evidences of our parliamentary history as it has come down to us through the ages. All these symbols and ceremonies have their uses. It may be that when a new member comes to this House, he may think it somewhat archaic when he sees the sergeant-at-arms with the mace preceding the Speaker, but when he becomes better acquainted with Parliament, he finds that each of these customs has its significance. One of England's historic personages called the mace a "bauble," and ordered it out of the Commons, but its restoration signified the restoration to England of constitutional government as it exists to-day. Parliamentary government has come from England to Canada, and this gift to us is an emblem of those parliamentary institutions which are so highly prized, especially now that we are under fire in the present world war.

Motion agreed to.

1. It is not considered advisable to publish any information with reference to movements and operation of H. M. C. ships.
2. Answered by No. 1.

Mr. W. H. NICKERSON.

Mr. SINCLAIR:

1. Was W. H. Nickerson, Superintendent of Life-saving Stations, dismissed?
2. If so, when and for what reasons?
3. Was there an investigation? If so, by whom?
4. Who was appointed as his successor, and on whose recommendation?
5. What salary was paid to M. H. Nickerson, and what salary does his successor receive?

Mr. HAZEN:

1. Yes.

2. By letter from the Department of the Naval Service, dated August 28, 1916, upon representations by the officers of the department that the work could be performed by the officers of the Fisheries Protection Service.

3. No investigation was held.

4. The office of inspector of life saving stations was abolished, the work being performed by the officers of the Fisheries Protection Service.

5. Eighty-five dollars per month paid to M. H. Nickerson.

"DEFEAT OR VICTORY."

* Mr. LEMIEUX:

1. Has "Defeat or Victory," a book published by Arthur Free and J. Stewart Holden, of England, been prohibited?

2. If so, why?

Mr. PATENAUDE:

1. No.

2. Answered by No. 1.

SEED POTATOES AND BEANS.

Mr. TURRIFF:

As it appears the farmers in many parts of Ontario are having difficulty in securing potatoes and beans for seed, does the Government intend to take any action towards assisting farmers to secure the necessary seed and enable a large acreage to be cropped this season that otherwise would have to go idle?

Mr. BURRELL:

The province of Ontario, Department of Agriculture, intimated to the Federal Department early in March their intention to take care of the seed potato situation within the province. They report having purchased and distributed substantial quantities of seed potatoes and are still attending to the demands.

The Department of Agriculture has completed arrangements whereby a quantity of seed beans, sufficient to take care of the estimated demand, will be available for that purpose. The department has secured the co-operation of the large canning companies who hold considerable quantities of beans, but who recognize the desirability of planting a large acreage this year.

SHIPMENT OF STEEL RAILS TO FRANCE.

Mr. OLIVER:

1. How many tons of steel rails taken from sidings on the Transcontinental Railway have been shipped from Canadian Ports to France, to date?

2. Between what points on the Grand Trunk Pacific west of Edmonton is it proposed to remove the rails for shipment to France?

3. When is the proposed removal of rails above mentioned to begin?

4. Is the Government aware that there are several hundred miles of double track on the Canadian Pacific Railway main line from Fort William east?

5. Is the Government aware that from Parry Sound to within a few miles of Sudbury, Ont., the Canadian Pacific and Canadian Northern railway lines closely parallel each other for a distance of one hundred miles through an entirely unproductive country?

6. Is the Government aware that from Kamloops, B.C., to Yale, B.C., a distance of one hundred and forty miles, the Canadian Northern Railway closely parallels the Canadian Pacific Railway along the Thompson and Fraser Rivers, through a territory furnishing a minimum of local traffic?

7. Is the Government aware that the traffic upon the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway west of Edmonton is much heavier than on the Transcontinental Railway from Lévis, Quebec, to Moncton, N.B.?

Mr. COCHRANE:

1. It is not in the public interest that this question should be answered.

2. Between Imrie, on the east, and Resplendent, on the west. The whole of the tracks in this district will not be moved, but the tracks will be moved to the full extent possible, having regard to the requirements of the district.

3. Just as soon as possible, having regard to the character of the work, the issuing of the necessary supplemental Orders in Council and the necessities of providing for the requirements of the district.

4. Yes. The rail, however, is not interchangeable with Transcontinental rail already shipped, and does not meet the requirements of the military authorities. Over and above this, the Government is also aware of the fact that last winter traffic congestion on the Canadian Pacific east of Fort William was severe and the capacity of the railway, double-tracked as it is, taxed. The Government is also aware of the fact that service on the Grand Trunk Pacific and the Canadian Northern to Yellowhead Pass is very light, and that the whole traffic can easily be accommodated by one line.

5. There is an unfortunate duplication. It is also true that, to some extent, the territory is unproductive, although not wholly so. The rails that might here be available again do not meet the military requirements, and traffic conditions in Ontario last winter, speaking generally, were much congested.

6. Yes. The rails that might be here available again do not meet military requirements.

7. No. While the contrary may well be the fact in normal times, owing to war necessities and the movement of troops, munitions and supplies, the Intercolonial has been overtaxed and the Transcontinental railway is to a much greater extent than the Grand Trunk Pacific line west of Edmonton.

SALARIES OF LETTER CARRIERS.

Mr. MEDERIC MARTIN:

Is it the intention of the Government to increase the salaries of the letter carriers during the present session?

Mr. PATENAUDE: The question of increases to letter carriers and other members of the Civil Service is under the consideration of the Government.

Mr. BUCHANAN:

1. Has the Government received any request from the letter carriers of Canada for an increase in salary?
2. When was an increase last granted to the letter carriers of Canada?
3. What was the average salary, maximum and minimum, of letter carriers in Canada during the years 1911 up to the present time?
4. Is it the intention of the Government to grant an increase to the letter carriers, to meet the present increase in the cost of living?

Mr. PATENAUDE:

1. Yes.
2. April 1, 1913.
3. For the year 1911 and up to April, 1913 the minimum was $1.75 a day, with an increase of 25 cents a day at the end of a probationary period of three months and an increase of 25 cents a day every two years thereafter until the maximum of $2.75 a day was reached. On April 1, 1913, the minimum was raised to $2 and the maximum to $3 a day, with an increase of 25 cents a day each year.
4. It is under consideration.

OTTAWA BRANCH OF ROYAL MINT.

Mr. TRUAX:

Referring to item in Auditor General's Report, F—41 "Ottawa Branch of Royal Mint," $123,000. (Salaries and Maintenance).

1. Does the Canadian or Imperial Government pay this amount?
2. If the former, where can the items be found?
3. Who has the appointing or recommending of employees to the Mint, (a) to the clerical and technical staff, and (b) to the labourers' and helpers' staff?
4. Is there an employee named Snyder?
5. If so, was he recommended by the Minister of Finance?
6. What was the occupation of said Snyder before his appointment?
7. If the department concerned has no information on this point, will it endeavour to obtain same?

Sir THOMAS WHITE:

1 and 2. The amount is expended by the Imperial Government, but provided under statute by the Canadian Government.

3. Appointment made under Mint regulations.

4. There is an employee named Albert Snider.

5 No.

6 and 7. No information.

HOPETOWN POST OFFICE.

Mr. MARCIL:

Concerning the mail service at Hopetown, Quebec, and the answer made by the Acting Postmaster General, recorded in Hansard of May 2nd, as follows:—

"The original contract, which provided for a semi-daily service between Pasbebiac and railway station and for a daily service between Paspebiac and Hopetown, was entered into at the rate of $260 per annum, but, owing to the fact that one train per day which carried mail to Paspebiac was cut off, the service between Paspebiac and railway station was reduced to six trips per week, and a corresponding reduction was made in the rate of payment to the contractor, thereby bringing the present amount paid him to $208 per annum. The contract was awarded on April 12, 1915?"

1. Is there now a double daily service by the Matapedia and Gaspé railway to that post office?
2. If so, does the Post Office Department intend to re-establish the double daily service at that office? If not, why?

Mr. PATENAUDE:

1. No.

2. The question of a semi-daily service to Hopetown has not been under consideration.

REMOVAL OF RAILS TO FRANCE.

GRAND TRUNK PACIFIC AND TRANSCONTINENTAL RAILWAYS.

Mr. OLIVER:

1. Is the Government aware as to whether or not the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway west of Edmonton is more substantially constructed and with less curvature and less variation of level and has cost more to build than the parallel Canadian Northern Railway?
2. If so, why has the Government authorized the dismantling of the more expensive and better constructed railway of the two above mentioned?

Mr. COCHRANE:

1 and 2. The reasons for the Government's action in this matter are set out in a letter from the Chairman of the Railway Commission, as follows:

BOARD OF RAILWAY COMMISSIONERS FOR CANADA.

Ottawa, May 7th, 1917.

Dear Sir:—

I have your letter of to-day's date raising the question as to why the rails of the Canadian Northern through the Yellowhead Pass be not taken up in place of the rails of the Grand Trunk Pacific.

While I admit that the Canadian Northern construction through the Yellowhead Pass is of a high order and with low grades, nevertheless, they have a sub-summit on their track. This the Grand Trunk Pacific has not. The Grand Trunk Pacific, of course, are subject to a considerable operating expense in removing sand from their tracks which regularly blows over them when the water in the river is low. The Canadian Northern is not subject to this disability, which, according to the Grand Trunk Pacific, entails an extra cost of some $25,000 a year for maintenance.

Bearing in mind, not only the character of the Canadian Northern track, but also the disability the Grand Trunk Pacific suffers from, owing to the sand, in my view there is no doubt but that the Grand Trunk Pacific is the better line of the two.

I have gone carefully into the matter of train resistance and economies of operation; and there is no doubt that, on the economic ground, the Canadian Northern rails should be lifted instead of the Grand Trunk Pacific. The difficulty is that I am unable to make any recommendation from a purely economic standpoint. Indeed, from this standpoint, no rails whatever ought to be lifted and transferred to France from the Yellowhead. The long railway haul itself and the use of railway equipment would forbid any such action on economic grounds. Further, this country is itself in need of rails, and when unnecessary duplications are removed, they can be usefully used in the Prairie sections which are to-day in need of railway construction.

The difficulty is that the question cannot be so approached. Canada, having acceded to the request of the Imperial Government to supply rails urgently required for military purposes in France, it became the duty of the country to supply these rails with as little cost as possible to the Imperial Government. This, of course, meant lifting rails in eastern territory, so as to reduce the cost of the railway haul, and also lifting rails where the least damage would be occasioned, not only to the public, but also to the companies owning and operating them, not only in the interests of the companies, but also in the interests of the Imperial Government, who would be expected to recompense the companies, not only for their rails, but also for the damages which the companies suffered.

The first request of the Imperial Government was finally confined to 300 miles of track. This amount the management of the Government railways were able to furnish, and at the same time carry on the business of the line. The rails of the Government lines fulfilled the requirements of the Imperial Government; they were in eastern territory; and, speaking generally, did not necessitate a long penalizing rail haul. The rails could also be lifted without creating liability for damages.

The Imperial Government required rails of a high class. Fortunately the rails of the Transcontinental answered in every respect. The Imperial authorities also required absolute standardization, owing to the fact that the laying of the rails in France would, in many instances, require the greatest despatch, and be laid under conditions of danger and often at night.

Their request for an additional 300 miles of track, to which request, as I understand it, the Government has acceded, requires that the additional supply of rail should be similar in all respects to the rail already supplied.

While the rail of the Canadian Northern through the Yellowhead is of the required type and weight, unfortunately the engineers of the different lines in their specifications have for reasons best known to themselves, bored the rails used by their respective companies at different points. This requires, of course, different angle-bars, and does not permit the different lengths being interchangeable, as I am informed for military reasons is necessary.

As personally I would somewhat sooner lift the Canadian Northern than the Grand Trunk Pacific rails, the question of re-boring, practically slotting, the Canadian Northern rails has been looked into. I am advised that this is impracticable, owing to the weakening of the rail. The matter was looked into by one of the engineers of your department, and Major Bell so reports; and Mr. Fitzgerald, of the Imperial Munitions Board, with whom I took this matter up, gives me the same advice.

Under the circumstances, I can only advise the removal of the Grand Trunk Pacific rails, interchangeable as they are with the rails already supplied by the National Transcontinental.

In my view, the proper final solution in the Yellowhead is, however, the retention of the Grand Trunk Pacific right-of-way rather than the Canadian Northern, and that the rails of the Canadian Northern, if these companies are in future to run in joint operation, should be placed on the Grand Trunk Pacific right-of-way.

The Grand Trunk Pacific rails ought to be lifted with care, so as to not injure the roadbed, and the sleepers should be left as they are at present embedded in it, so that other rails, may be there again laid with a maximum of expense.

Yours faithfully,

(Sgd.) H. L. Drayton,
Chief Commissioner.

The Honourable the Minister of Railways and Canals, Ottawa, Ont.

Mr. OLIVER:

1. What payments or allowances are to be made to the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company for (a) rails taken or to be taken from their tracks west of Edmonton for use in France; (b) for loss occasioned by any destruction of ties that may occur consequent upon the removal of rails; and (c) for deterioration, if any, of grade, culvert, bridges or buildings consequent upon such removal of rails?

2. What would be the cost of new rails as compared with the total cost and damage, if any, resulting to the railway company for removal of tracks as authorized by Order in Council P.C. 1183 of April 28, 1917?

Mr. COCHRANE:

1. Compensation will be made to the company under the provisions of the War Measures Act.

2. The cost of new rails will be less. The necessity for an immediate supply of rails on the continent is urgent and cannot await their manufacture. Rail mills also are not in a position to accept contracts; their equipment has been changed in order to manufacture steel for munitions. Orders cannot be obtained for immediate delivery of rails from American steel mills any more than from Canadian steel mills. The munition requirements of both countries exhausted the supply of steel available.

Mr. OLIVER:

Referring to the Order in Council of the 28th of April, P.C. 1183, laid on the Table of the House on the 10th day of May, authorizing the granting of three hundred miles of rails for use in France in connection with the war.

1. Is the Government aware as to whether or not damage will be by such action occasioned to property and business of private individuals dependent on the operation of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway west of Edmonton?

2. If so, by what means will the amount of damage be defined and who will pay the same?

Mr. COCHRANE:

1. The Government has taken all steps possible to minimize all damage occasioned to property and the business of private individuals. It is not thought that much, if any, such damage will arise; but in view of the national necessity such considerations can not be considered—the country is at war.

2. By the Exchequer Court, and the provisions of the War Measures Act.

INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY PENSION FUND.

*Mr. GAUVREAU:

1. Is it the intention of the Honourable Minister of Railways and Canals to have the medical examination for pension funds on the I.C.R. performed by a physician from Fraserville, for that portion of the railway which extends in the Province of Quebec, instead of sending the employees to be examined by an English physician of Montreal?

2. If not, why?

Mr. COCHRANE:

1. It is the intention to have a physician to perform medical examinations for pension funds appointed from some point along that section of the Intercolonial railway in the province of Quebec.

2. Answered by No. 1.

12. If so, what are the particulars of the arrangement made?

WOMAN SUFFRAGE.

Mr. DONALD SUTHERLAND (South Oxford) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the question of extending the franchise to women should engage the attention of the Government at the present session.

He said: Mr. Speaker, in speaking on the motion now before the House, I desire to state that I have been very largely actuated by a consciousness of the need of a uniform Dominion Franchise Act for the whole of Canada. For many years past, the voters' lists of the various provinces have been used as the lists upon which the members of the House of Commons have been elected and they are so used at the present time. That a gradual evolution has taken place since the adoption of these lists is quite evident when you consider the uniformity that existed when the present Act was adopted about twenty years ago and contrast it with the wide disparity which now exists between the franchises of the various provinces. The troublous and trying times through which we are passing have doubtless had a good deal to do with the rapid change that has taken place in the sentiment of the people during the past few years. The present is, I may say, a testing time when the essential qualifications entitling a person to the full status of citizenship become apparent.

The motion before the House refers only to the extension of the franchise to the women of Canada. That this would be a somewhat radical step I am free to admit but we are living in an age when radical changes are taking place on every hand, when old traditions and conventions are being brushed aside, when despotism and democracy are being tested and tried, and when we are called upon to exert every energy in the critical struggle in which we are now engaged. It is significant that the newer provinces of western Canada peopled with a young and virile population have blazed the way in the matter of extending the franchise to the women. In the province of British Columbia woman suffrage is now an assured fact. In the great provinces of Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba the franchise has been extended to women. The legislature of the older province of Ontario at its last session adopted similar legislation. Today, from the Capital where we are at present assembled westward to the Pacific, the women of all the provinces exercise the full legal status of citizenship. Yet, from the Capital eastward to the Atlantic, that privilege or right has not as yet been conferred upon them. While it is undoubtedly the prerogative of the provinces to enact legislation regulating their municipal and provincial franchises, I feel it to be the duty of this House and of the Government to see that a uniform Franchise Act is adopted for the whole of Canada.

The whole of the people of Canada go to make up the state. The need of the state and the duties of citizenship were never more clear or well defined than at this hour. I would also embody such provision in the Elections Act as would safeguard the rights of the state and prevent any one who is not a loyal British subject from exercising the right to say how the affairs of this Dominion should be conducted. When you think of the people who have come from many of the European countries and settled in our midst, when you realize the cosmopolitan character of the population of Canada, some regulation, some safeguard, is necessary at this particular time with regard to the exercise of the rights of citizenship. I would also provide that no loyal British subjects should be debarred from the right of polling their votes in Canada and that is exactly what I have in mind in the introduction of this resolution.

While it may be true, and it undoubtedly is true, that many women do not desire to have the franchise extended to them, we cannot close our eyes to the fact that many women in Canada do desire to have this right conferred upon them. When you reflect that half the people of this Dominion arrogate to themselves the status of citizenship and deny that right to the other half, physically weaker but intellectually their equal, you cannot close your eyes to the fact that Prussian despotism is not confined to Germany alone. Freedom and liberty are the watchwords of the hour. Deny to our women the right to be a participating factor in the affairs of our country and you are in duty bound to see that they have become wards of the state. The Indians of Canada have become wards of the state and have been disfranchised and an Indian Department has been established with the view of providing for their wants and requirements. The Indian is, in the eyes of the law, an infant, yet the Indian, by severing his tribal allegiance, can obtain the status of citizenship.

Our women are not wards of the State, nor yet are they the recipients of any favours or consideration that should bar them from receiving the rights which men have appropriated to themselves. It is true that Indians, women and children are the only classes in Canada who have not had conferred upon them the full legal status of citizenship. The Indian, by renouncing his tribal allegiance, can come into that state. The child, if a male, through the passing of time will eventually reach that condition where he becomes a full-fledged citizen of this country with a legal right to a voice in the affairs of state. It is only the women of Canada who are barred from reaching that condition. You cannot close your eyes to the heroic self-denial, the devoted services, that have been rendered by the women of this country to maintain our laws, and to uphold the traditions of our country, and the devoted services which they have rendered since the beginning of this war. While I say since the beginning of this war, the women of Canada have, since the earliest days of our history, devoted themselves to making Canada the country which it is to-day. I believe, though, that during the past few years the heroic services which have been rendered by them have broken down the prejudice which formerly existed against extending the franchise to them. I believe that their part in this war has established in the minds of every one a belief in their right to be a participating factor in the affairs of our country. It is surely a sad commentary on our discretion and judgment that we extend to the ignorant and illiterate foreigner, centuries behind us in moral and intellectual development, who comes to our country, concessions that are not given to all the people of Canada, and allow him to establish himself in any community, and, by a short residence among us and compliance with what is to him a very simple condition, give him the full legal status of citizenship. And yet, in the face of that, we deny to these loyal, patriotic, God-fearing women of Canada equal consideration, when we deny them the consideration that has been given to those people who come here, who very often are not in sympathy with our laws or the traditions of our country. I say that it is a sorry reflection upon the people of this country that such a condition as that can exist, particularly at this time.

I could cite the examples of other countries in which the franchise has been extended to women, but I will not do so; I am going to confine my few remarks this afternoon to our own country. We know the conditions of our own country, and if we want a precedent, there is to my mind one country to which we are justified in looking for a precedent, that is the Mother Country. We find that the women of Great Britain have been promised the franchise by the Government of that country. The full extent of the franchise which is granted to them I do not as yet know; but we may rest assured that when Britain, the mother of parliaments, the champion of freedom and liberty, the champion of the weak, takes the part she is taking in granting to the women of that country the franchise, this is surely a precedent that we can well follow in the Dominion of Canada. I have already stated that the time of trial and stress through which we are passing has possibly made more clear to our minds the injustice which has been done to the women of this country by withholding from them the franchise. I would not for a moment argue that any special treatment should be given to them. But I do say that we must endeavour to see that a truly national spirit is cultivated and developed among the people of this country, and that the conditions under which we are living at the present time make it necessary for us to enact legislation which under ordinary conditions we would hesitate to enact. There are people living here within the borders of Canada but who have not yet become truly Canadianized. Natives of countries with whom we and our Allies are to-day contending are granted the franchise, and I believe some provision should be embodied in the Dominion Franchise Act to see that these people shall not have the opportunity of injuring or destroying in any way the work that is being done by the men who are waging battle for us at the front. I want to say further that when you think of the costly and immortal sacrifice that is being daily offered up on the altar of freedom, we must realize that we are called upon to look on these matters from a new viewpoint. We must realize that it is the duty of Parliament and of the Government to deal with these questions with a firm and strong hand. We must also realize that there are many homes in Canada whose bread winners have already given up their life blood for the cause of freedom, and that many more will do so. That being the case, there are and there will be many widows and female relations of those men here in Canada who will become responsible for the families of these men, it is just and right that these women should be enabled to exercise the franchise? Yet, under present conditions, they are barred from doing so. I say that justice, humanity and the best interests of society demand that our present Election Act shall be changed, and that provision shall be made so that our women shall have a voice and a fair share in the government of the country. Further than that, I also wish to say that, if some provinces of Canada lag behind in the matter of granting the franchise to the women of those provinces, it makes it all the more imperative on this Parliament and Government to see that equal justice is done to the women of all the provinces of Canada. The old system, under the present Election Act, of using the provincial voters' lists, is, under present conditions, an absolute impossibility, if we are to have equality and justice extended to the whole people of Canada. If, for none of the reasons which I have so feebly endeavoured to advance, or if the chivalrous instincts of every hon. gentleman in this House do not compel him to vote for the measure now before the House, let me say, if for none of these, then for very shame's sake let us remove the stigma and reproach of despotism from our escutcheon. Let us prove ourselves worthy of the compliment that was paid us by that great French statesman who was with us on Saturday last, M. Viviani, when he stated that the sons of Britain, wherever they go, bring emancipation and liberty with them. I beg leave to move the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. WILLIAM WRIGHT (Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, in rising to endorse the motion of the member for South Oxford (Mr. Sutherland), let me at the outset say that I am well aware that a great difference of opinion prevails among the male voters of Canada as to the wisdom of granting the franchise to our momen. I am no new convert to the principle of allowing the ladies to have the vote. A proposal was made last year, and a similar proposal has been made during this session, that the women of certain provinces be given the right to vote. I am opposed to the idea of singling out a particular province that may have granted to its women the right of the franchise. I believe that the women of the whole of the Dominion are entitled to the franchise; more than that, I believe that they have always been entitled to it. I have been in public life for upwards of thirty years and, having given some thought and attention to this subject, I never could see the justice of men arrogating to themselves the sole right to vote.

What are the objections that are urged against granting women the franchise? We are told that the women should stay in the home. Well, I think that a little break in the monotony of the lives of our wives and mothers would not be any very great detriment to them, to the homes that they live in, or to the people with whom they work from day to day. When I think of the devotion to duty of our women; when I think of the wives of the labourers and the farmers, getting up betimes, even before the stars disappear, or working into the weary hours of night, I realize that they well deserve the franchise, and should always have had it.

We are told, too, that woman is the weaker vessel; that the men have to do the fighting. Well, since when have we adopted a system of avoirdupois in qualifying men to vote? Do we weigh them on the scale, measure the size of their biceps, wrists, ankles, fists, and so on, in order to determine whether they shall have a vote? If we did, where would the Minister of Trade and Commerce be? I am afraid that he would be entitled to only half a vote, and that the right hon. leader of the opposition would be entitled to only three-quarters of a vote. As to the Solicitor General—well, I would hardly like to say just what portion of a single vote he would be entitled to. My idea is that there are just as good brains in the heads of our women as there are in those of the men, and it does not make very much difference whether the head is covered by a creation from a millinery shop or whether the top piece was purchased in a gents' furnishing store. Among the thoughtful men of our country who have considered the question and who are animated by a spirit of fairness, there has been a willingness to grant to our women the right to vote. The only thing lacking, I think, has been the expression of a well-defined desire for it on the part of the ladies themselves. It is true that we have a number of women in this country who disclaim any desire to have a vote. Such women have not had the opportunity of cultivating any taste for exercising the franchise. How did the men learn political games; how did they learn to take part in politics? Simply by exercising their right to vote, and the same effect which resulted from the exercise of the franchise by men would follow from giving the vote to the ladies. They will think about these things; they will study them just as the men did, and bye-and-bye they will exercise the franchise with just as great a measure of intelligence.

I was in a house not very long ago in which the younger members of the family and the father were discussing the question of votes for women. The young men and the young women said: mother does not want to vote; she does not care anything about it. Well, when I thought of the poor mother and the opportunities she had had of studying this question, I came to the conclusion that it was not much wonder that mother had no taste for exercising the franchise. I do say that it would make a very desirable break in the usual routine of her life if she was allowed to exercise the franchise and was compelled to step out of the rut into which may years of hard work had placed her.

I believe in the equality of men and women. While a divine and beneficent Providence has not created them exactly alike, or intended that they should follow the same sphere of life, each has been given a work to do. With regard to the enactment and enforcement of laws which affect them so vitally, the women have just as much right to have a vote in public affairs as the men have.

Now, how can this be done? I believe it would be found necessary to have a Dominion-wide franchise. We ought to have a Dominion voters' list that would cover all parts of the country from the Atlantic to the Pacific. We are met with the objection that this would be expensive, that it would cost more than the present system. As one who has been connected with municipal life during a great many years, and who has a working knowledge of such matters as they affect the province of Ontario, I want to say that the present system costs just as much as the proposed system would cost.

I have had experience with voters' lists under both systems. The only difference would be that under a Dominion-wide franchise the expense of the compilation of a voters' list would fall upon the Dominion, whereas under the present system it falls upon the municipalities and upon those who are seeing that the lists are properly prepared. One system, then, is just as expensive as the other. One lamentable defect in connection with the compilation of the voters' list in the organized parts of the province from which I come is that, inasmuch as we usually hold our elections in the late summer, or in the fall, the voters' lists that we use are practically a year and a half old. A few years ago the late Mr. James Conmee, then member for Rainy River, introduced into this House a measure, which was duly passed, empowering the Dominion Government to compile the voters' lists.

So that we have in the part of the country in which I live, in some of the townships which are not yet organized, the anomaly of having the Government compile a voters' list, and that method seems to work out all right there. Frequent compilations appear a little unnecessary if two elections take place in close succession, but if they are a year apart there ought to be some method of getting the voters' list more up to date. In the back-woods of Ontario, in those townships that are not yet organized, the voters' lists are more up to date than in the organized parts of the country where many thousands of men, who have moved away or who have come of age after the assessment lists have been made out, are deprived of the right to vote. Some method, therefore, ought to be devised to bring the lists up to date so that when an election comes every one will have an opportunity of exercising the franchise. I think that can best be done by having a Franchise Act passed by this Parliament and the compilation of our voters' lists placed in the hands of some branch of the service.

The general trend of affairs has been towards extending the franchise to women. Every hon. member is aware that the storms that sweep over this country generally commence in the broad regions of the Pacific and move in an easterly direction, and this storm, if I may call it such, that has arisen has come from the far west and is sweeping eastward so that it will not be long before the ladies have the vote throughout the whole Dominion, and I think we should bring about that result by enactment of this House so that no stumbling block may be thrown in the path of this movement. British Columbia, Alberta, Saskatchewan, Manitoba and Ontario have passed legislation for votes for women. The suffrage has been extended to women in Australia, New Zealand, the Isle of Man, Finland, Norway, Denmark, Iceland, Yucatan, and the women have municipal suffrage on the same terms as men throughout the British Isles and in Sweden, and a certain measure of municipal franchise rights in some of the British possessions, such as the city of Belize, in British Honduras, Rangoon, Burmah, and Baroda and Bombay in British India. In the United States, the women possess the franchise on equal terms with men at all elections in Wyoming, since 1869; in Colorado, since 1893; in Utah, since 1896; in Idaho, since 1896; in Washington, since 1910; in California, since 1911; in Arizona, Kansas and Oregon since 1912, and in Nevada and Montana since 1914. In the year 1913, the Territorial Legislature of Alaska granted full suffrage to women. Under the state law of 1913 in Illinois, it was construed that women could vote for Presidential Elector, members of the State Board of Equalization; Clerk of the Appellate Court, County Collector, County Surveyor, members of the Board of Assessors, members of the Board of Review, Sanitary District Trustees and all the officers except police magistrates, of cities, villages and towns, and so on. Women have the right to vote in regard to matters connected with the schools, etc., in Connecticut, Delaware, Kentucky, Massachusetts, Michigan, Minnesota, Mississippi, Nebraska, New Hampshire, New Jersey, New Mexico, New York, North Dakota, Ohio, Oklahoma, South Dakota, Vermont, Wisconsin and Alaska, which I mentioned before. In Iowa, the women may vote at all school or municipal elections upon any proposition to vote bonds or increase the tax levies. Viewing the question from every standpoint, I consider that the general trend throughout the world is in the direction of extending the franchise to women; I do not know of a single country that, after adopting and trying out woman suffrage, has since discarded it, and I think we shall be quite safe in this country of ours in putting upon the Statute Books a law whereby women and men shall have equal rights in regard to the franchise. I trust, therefore, that this Parliament will see its way clear to place upon the Statute Books of this country a law extending equal franchise rights to every woman in every province of the Dominion.

As mentioned by the mover of this resolution, we have in this country a large number of people from foreign lands, many of whom know practically nothing of the affairs of this country, who have not the same ideals that we have, who come from a different civilization from ours and who apparently place no value on the franchise except what may be expressed in a form that may be very objectionable, and that I will not discuss in this House. Under such circumstances, we ought to discriminate; and if I had my way, speaking for myself, I certainly would have an educational test, but I know that would meet with objections from men on both sides of the House. I think, however, that some educational test ought to be applied before we grant the franchise to any one whether he comes from Canada or from some foreign land because I submit that before a person receives the tremendous power of the franchise, he ought to be able to read and write in one of the official languages of Canada and know something of the affairs of this country. In Germany, I believe the franchise is based upon property qualifications; a man there exercises his franchise according to his financial condition; if he is worth a hundred thousand dollars, his vote is worth perhaps a hundred times as much as a man who has ten dollars. In that way the wealth of the country commands the situation, and that probably is primarily responsible for the great world struggle in which we are now engaged, because the common, every-day people of Germany have very little voice in determining what the country shall do. I believe we would escape from that result by granting equal franchise rights in every part of Canada; one man or one woman, one vote. The franchise that prevails in one province should prevail in every province, and the ladies should be put on an equal footing with the men. I heartily endorse the resolution moved by the hon. member for South Oxford (Mr. Sutherland).

Hon. WILLIAM PUGSLEY (St. John City): Mr. Speaker, it will perhaps be remembered that at the last session of Parliament I moved a resolution having in view the removal of the anomaly which now undoubtedly exists in the different provinces in respect to the right of women to vote for members of this House. I am not quite sure whether in order to have the views which I entertain properly presented to the House, it may not be advisable for me to move an amendment to the motion of my hon. friend, because there is a possibility that the motion, which I have renewed at the present session and which stands upon the Order Paper with some alterations and in some wider language than my resolution of last year contained, may be deemed to be out of order under the rule of the House which prevents the same subject matter being twice considered.

I would suggest to my hon. friend who has made the motion and to the leader of the Government, whether it might not be better for my motion to be incorporated in some way with that of the hon. gentleman, and then if it were passed by the House it would be an expression of opinion that the anomaly should be done away with by placing the women of Alberta and Saskatchewan in the same position as the women of Ontario, Manitoba and British Columbia, or if that were not deemed desirable, the Government could introduce legislation to extend the franchise to women subject to such limitations as Parliament might impose.

Mr. ROGERS: Where does the difference come in between the two motions that my hon. friend refers to?

Mr. PUGSLEY: The difference comes in in this way. The motion now before the House simply recommends to the Government the extending the franchise to women all over Canada. The motion is very general in its terms; it is not definite, but simply urges that the question of extending the Franchise to women should engage the attention of the Government during the present session. Now, my resolution is more definite in form; it declares that the anomaly existing as to the right to vote between the women of the provinces of Saskatchewan and Alberta and those of the other three provinces where the women are granted the franchise should be done away with, or a general law be introduced.

Mr. ROGERS: Would my hon. friend mind explaining the anomaly he refers to?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I should be very glad if my hon. friend would go into that pretty fully, because the view which he set forth is not the view entertained by the Minister of Justice or the Solicitor General.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I am glad my right hon. friend has drawn my attention to that. I think the House has been somewhat in the dark as to the opinion of the Minister of Justice on the subject ever since a question was put to him in the session of 1916 as follows:

Q. Is it the opinion of the Minister of Justice that women who are on the voters' list in the province of Manitoba, which province has granted the franchise to women, will be entitled to vote for members of the House of Commons?

The Minister of Justice replied:

It has never been the practice to answer questions of law.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: That is quite correct.

Mr. DOHERTY: Does the hon. gentleman question that?

Mr. PUGSLEY: I do on a matter of this kind. I would think that the Minister of Justice ought to advise Parliament as to how the law stands on the subject. If the Minister of Justice is not to advise Parliament on questions of law, upon what subject is he to advise Parliament? Surely not on financial matters, or agricultural matters, or matters affecting the Department of Marine and Fisheries, for these belong to the Minister of Finance, the Minister of Agriculture and the Minister of Marine and Fisheries. I would rather suppose upon a question such as this, which has excited so much public attention and which is almost vital for the women of Manitoba, British Columbia, and Ontario to be informed upon, that when a member of Parliament asks the Minister of Justice in the House as to how the law stands in the matter, it would be only reasonable for him to give his view, because undoubtedly his view would be the view of the Government. The Minister of Justice must advise somebody. Even to-day I presume the question must be up before the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery in connection with the printing of the voters' lists. I presume that the lists for Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta and British Columbia, if not Ontario as well, are now in the office of the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery. If the local officials have done their duty, those lists must contain the names of those women who under the provincial laws are entitled to the provincial franchise. It is the duty of those officials to include all provincial voters on the lists which they send to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, and then it is right up to the Minister of Justice, I would say, to advise the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery as to whether under the Dominion law he must erase from those lists the names of all women voters; that is a question which I would suppose the Minister of Justice must decide. However, the Minister of Justice must be the judge of that. I will invite him now, however, or before this discussion is through, to advise the House as to whether or not the women of Manitoba, Ontario and British Columbia are entitled to vote for members of this Parliament by reason of their being on the provincial lists. I do not see very well how the Minister of Justice can avoid giving an opinion upon a question of that kind.

From the study which I have given to the Dominion Elections Act, I have come to the conclusion, and I give it for what it is worth, that women who are on the provincial voters' lists for the three provinces of Ontario, Manitoba and British Columbia, are entitled to vote for members of the House of Commons; I think there can be no doubt about that. Nor can there be any doubt, I think, that women to-day are entitled to be candidates for the House of Commons and become members, if the people desire to elect them.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: In all the provinces?

Mr. PUGSLEY: In all the provinces.

Mr. GERMAN: Women are not on the list in the province of Ontario, and cannot be put on the list except by legislation of this Parliament.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Yes, I think it would be ultra vires of the provincial legislature. It seems to me this Parliament must say as to whether or not women should have the right to vote for members of this House. Section 69 of the Dominion Elections Act declares the qualifications of candidates, and will be found on page 17 of Volume 1 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1906. It says:

Except as in this Act otherwise provided, any British subject may be a candidate in an election for a seat in the House of Commons.

These words are as broad as words can be. It will not be denied that women are British subjects, and in the list of disqualifications there is no provision that the candidate must be a male.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Might I ask a question purely for information? Upon what ground does my hon. friend base the proposition that women can be candidates for the House of Commons, but that they cannot vote?

The language is different in the two statutes, no doubt, but is it sufficiently different to justify the distinction the hon. gentleman has drawn?

Mr. PUGSLEY: That is, as to Alberta and Saskatchewan.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: But as to the others?

Mr. PUGSLEY: As to these, no distinction. That is my contention. In Ontario, Manitoba and British Columbia, there having been created a provincial franchise, and the names of those entitled to vote being placed on the provincial voters' list, these parties are, by that very act, entitled to vote for members of this House. But it happens that, in the cases of Alberta and Saskatchewan, the Dominion Elections Act limits the right to vote to male persons.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: So far as I know, the view expressed by the hon. member is a novel one, and I desire to know whether I follow his argument correctly. As I understand it, the hon. gentleman is of opinion that in all the provinces of Canada women have the right to become candidates at elections for this House?

Mr. PUGSLEY: Yes.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Then, on what does he base the distinction, which he evidently draws, between their right to become candidates at elections for this House, and their right to vote at an election for this House? He does not admit that they have the right to vote in every province. The distinction he makes must be based on a comparison of the legislation in one case and in the other.

Mr. PUGSLEY: In the provinces until recently only the names of male persons could be placed upon the voters' lists. That was a limitation in the provincial law. Therefore, not being on the provincial lists, they could not vote for members of the House. But recently the legislatures of Ontario, Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta and British Columbia have altered their laws and have struck out the word " male," so that a British subject, whether male or female, having the qualifications of residence and age, is entitled to vote for a member of the provincial House, and therefore is placed on the provincial list. Having got that far, we come to the Dominion Elections Act, which many years ago adopted the provincial lists as the lists upon which the election of members of this House shall be run. Now, my view—and I am absolutely clear upon it—is that women in all these provinces of Manitoba, Alberta, Saskatchewan, British Columbia and Ontario, their names being upon the provincial voters' lists, are entitled to vote for members of this House unless there are some disqualifying words in the Dominion Elections Act. But there are these disqualifying words as to Saskatchewan and Alberta, though not as to any other province.

Let me ask the patience of hon. members while I call their attention to the provisions of the law affecting this matter. Some persons reading the Dominion Elections Act and seeing the masculine " he" or "him" in many sections, might assume that that fact alone would indicate that Parliament intended in all the provinces to limit the vote to male persons. But that does not follow, because of the Interpretation Act, which will be found in the Revised Statutes on page 8, section 31, paragraph (i) it is provided:

> Words importing the masculine gender include females.

Therefore no inference is to be drawn from the masculine term. The word "he," if the context permits it, means also "she," and "him," would mean "her" just as much as if the feminine term had been used. Now, I call attention to the Dominion Elections Act, section 2—the interpretation section—paragraphs (d) and (e):

> "Elector" or "voter" means any person entitled to vote at an election under the provisions of this Act.
>
> (e) "Voters' list," or "list of voters," includes any official list of persons entitled to vote at an election, and, when provincial lists are referred to, includes any official list of persons entitled to vote at a provincial election.

Now, we come to Part I of the Dominion Elections Act. Section 5 sets forth the following limitation:

> This part dos not apply to the Provinces of Saskatchewan and Alberta or to the Yukon Territory.

And section 6 provides:

> For the purposes of any Dominion election held within the limits of a province, the voters' lists shall, except as herein otherwise provided, be those prepared for the several polling divisions established, and which on the sixtieth day next preceding the day fixed for the nomination of candidates for such Dominion election, were in force, or were last in force, under the laws of that province, for the purposes of provincial elections.

And section 12 is as follows:

> Within ten days after the final revision of every list of voters for the purposes of provincial elections, and within ten days after any change or alteration in or substitution for any such list under the provincial law, it shall be the duty of the custodian thereof to transmit to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, by registered mail, a copy of such list or change of alteration therein, or substituted list, as the case may be, certified under the hand of such custodian, and having every alteration, addition, or erasure therein identified by his initials.

I think it is absolutely clear that it is the duty of the local official, within ten days after the final revision of the list of voters for the purpose of a provincial election, to transmit to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery simply the list of voters entitled to vote for members of the Provincial Legislature.

Under the provincial laws as they are to-day in those five provinces, those lists must include all the voters whether they are male or female. Every man and every woman entitled to vote for members of the provincial legislature must be on those provincial lists and those lists must be transmitted to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery. Section 14 says:

For the purposes of Dominion Elections, such certified copy shall be deemed to be the original and legal list of voters for the polling division for which the list of which it is a copy was prepared, so long as that list remains in force, subject, however, to such changes and additions as are, subsequent to revision, made in such list under the provisions of the provincial law.

Section 19 makes provision for any changes which have been made in the voters' lists since the final revision, being added to the original lists. Section 21 provides:

So long as and whenever, for any reason, a certified copy of any list of voters as finally revised has not been transmitted to or received by the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, pursuant to the provisions of this Act, the original and legal list for Dominion elections shall be the same as that for provincial elections.

You see, Mr. Speaker, that in the sections to which I have referred there is no limitation as to whether voters are male or female.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN: Would the hon. gentleman state where he gets his legal sanction for a woman being a candidate?

Mr. PUGSLEY: I gave that. Perhaps my hon. friend was not in when I quoted from the Dominion Elections Act, section 69. I hope I will be pardoned, Mr. Speaker, for digressing a little from the consideration of the law relating to the voters' lists to answer my hon. friend. He will find that by section 69 it is provided:

Except as in this Act otherwise provided, any British subject may be a candidate in an election for a seat in the House of Commons.

No one will deny that a woman is a British subject or may be a British subject just as much as a man, or that if a woman is born within the British Empire, or becomes naturalized, she is a British subject just as much as a man.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN: The legal right is not based on the fact of being on the voters' list, then?

Mr. PUGSLEY: Not at all. A person may be a candidate although not on the voters' list. There used to be a property qualification for candidates for Parliament, but that has been done away with and a free choice is left to the electors to elect whomsoever they please in the House of Commons, irrespective of qualification. However, there are some disqualifications which will be found in section 70 but which I need not refer to because that section has no bearing on the question of the right of a woman to be a candidate for Parliament.

Now, I have shown to you, Mr. Speaker, that there is no limitation whatever in Part I of the Dominion Elections Act, which applies generally throughout Canada, which would prevent women from having the right to vote provided they are on the provincial list. The sole condition, speaking in general terms, which the Dominion Parliament has imposed is that they shall be upon the provincial list. Then, to repeat my argument, it is that unless in the Dominion statute itself we find some disqualification, some limitation, of the right to vote for the House of Commons, every person, whether male or female, who is on the provincial voters' list and is entitled to vote for a member of the provincial legislature in any of the provinces, may also vote for members of the House of Commons. If there were no limitations in the Dominion Elections Act in regard to two of the provinces of Canada, I would not have spoken to-day, I would not have presented my resolution, I would not have brought this matter before this House.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I will call your attention to Part II of the Dominion Elections Act which deals especially with the provinces of Saskatchewan and Alberta and the Yukon Territory. The first section to which I shall refer is section 3, which provides that this part of the Act applies exclusively to the provinces of Saskatchewan and Alberta and the Yukon Territory. Then section 32 says:

In the provinces of Saskatchewan and Alberta, except as in this Act otherwise provided, every male person shall be qualified to vote at the election of a member under this Act, who, not being an Indian, is a British subject and of the full age of twenty-one years, and has resided in either of the said provinces for at least twelve months, and, in the electoral district where he seeks to vote, for at least three months, immediately preceding the issue of the writ of election; Provided that, except as hereinafter provided, an elector may only vote at the polling station of the polling division in which he is a resident at the time of voting.

There is the same provision with respect to the Yukon. Section 33 says:

In the Yukon Territory, save as in this Act otherwise provided, every male person shall be qualified to vote at the election of a member under this Act, who, not being an Indian, is a British subject and of the full age of twenty-one years—

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN: Can my hon. friend tell us why that limitation was put in the Act?

Mr. PUGSLEY: No, I cannot. It would be very difficult to say with certainty what influenced Parliament at that time. It probably was that there were no provincial lists and Parliament was called upon to create a franchise as to these provinces. In the judgment of Parliament at that time it was thought desirable to only give the vote to male persons. I presume that was the reason. No doubt, the different provinces entertained the same view with regard to their provincial lists and I think in all of them it will be found that until recently the word "male" was used instead of simply the word "person", so that the right of the franchise was limited to males. I can think of no other reason than that which influenced Parliament. To make it absolutely clear that only males can vote in Saskatchewan and Alberta, I would call attention to the form of instructions to voters which will be found on page 82:

Information for Electors.

The following is the qualification of electors as prescribed by the Parliament of Canada:—

Every male person shall be qualified to vote at the election of a member under this Act who, not being an Indian, is a British subject, and of the full age of twenty-one years, and who has resided in the [province of Saskatchewan or Alberta, or the Yukon Territory (or as the case may be,) for at least twelve months immediately preceding the issue of the writ of election].

Then provision is made for the oath which the elector may be required to take in those provinces. It will be found at page 89. It is as follows:

You do swear that you are of the male sex and a British subject, that you are not an Indian, that you are of the full age of twenty-one years and that you have resided in the province of Saskatchewan or Alberta or the Yukon Territory (as the case may be) for at least twelve months, and (in case of the provinces of Saskatchewan and Alberta) in this electoral district for at least three months, immediately preceding the issue of the writ of election, and that you are now resident in this polling division.

I can not think that there is any doubt about the right of women, if their names are on the provincial lists in the provinces of Manitoba, Ontario and British Columbia, to vote for members of this House. Neither can I think there is any doubt that the disqualification contained in part two of the Dominion Elections Act as to Saskatchewan and Alberta will prevent the women of those two provinces from having the same right which the women of Manitoba, Ontario and British Columbia will have. The question is, should that anomaly be done away with? In considering this question, it seems to me we have to bear in mind that a great many years ago, in 1898, the General Dominion Franchise Act was repealed and it was provided that the provincial lists should be the lists which would govern in elections for the Dominion House. Parliament then came to the conclusion that it would be desirable to entrust the preparation of the lists to the local authorities, and that the Dominion elections should be run upon provincial lists. That has continued to be the law from that time to the present. It has been thought that it was in the best interest of the country to have the elections run upon the provincial lists. If that is a correct view to take, and it seems to have been regarded as correct by both of the great political parties of this country for a period of nineteen years, then it seems to me that there should be uniformity. It would be a strange anomaly that, of the persons who are on the provincial lists and entitled to vote for members of a provincial House and who, except for an express disqualification contained in a Dominion statute, would all be equally entitled to vote for members of this House, the women of two provinces of this Dominion should be debarred by the law of this House from that right, while the women of three other provinces, being in the same identical position so far as the provincial lists are concerned, should have the right to vote for members of this Parliament. Let me repeat that, in respect to the provincial legislatures, the women of Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta, Ontario and British Columbia are in exactly the same position; they are entitled to vote for the members of the provincial legislatures. They are entitled to be on the provincial lists. It is the duty of the local authorities to transmit their names as provincial voters to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, and, under the law, it will be his duty, or if not his duty it will be the duty of the returning officer if the law is allowed to remain as it is, to strike the names of women voters off the provincial lists of the two provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan, and to leave them on the provincial lists for the three provinces of Ontario, Manitoba and British Columbia. It is that anomaly which I think ought to be removed. I think the conditions of the franchise may well be left, as they have been during the past nineteen years, to the provincial legislatures. The law has worked very satisfactorily, and I see no reason why there should be a change.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO: Is the hon. member aware that under the Provincial Act in Ontario the lists are prepared only shortly before a general election in that province, and that, therefore, those lists could not be forwarded here, except in a year in which an election in that province had occurred, and that we could not compel the provincial authorities to prepare a list when we were going to have a general election for this House?

Mr. PUGSLEY: That would depend on when there would be a general election.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO: The federal election would have to come in the same year as the provincial election.

Mr. PUGSLEY: It might be that this year, if there was an election before the provincial lists could be forwarded here, the election might have to be run on the lists of last year. But after next year, when women will be on the provincial lists in Ontario, there will always be a provincial list with the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery here containing the names of women, on which list a Dominion election would be held, and these women would be entitled to vote. Whether the names of all women would be properly on the list is another question; but in Ontario women would be entitled to vote just as men are entitled to vote.

In the motion which I have placed on the Order Paper, which is definite in its character, I would say, with the permission of the House, that I ask the House to declare specifically either that the disqualification contained in part two of the Dominion Elections Act as to the women of Saskatchewan and Alberta, should be done away with, or that they should all be put on the same footing, and that the women of other provinces whose names are on the provincial lists should be placed in exactly the same position. Or, if that should be deemed by the House not to be desirable, then that Parliament itself should grant the franchise to women, subject to such limitations as may be thought desirable. If my hon. friend (Mr. Sutherland), upon consideration, would consent to incorporate the resolution which I have had the honour to submit to the House with his own, that, I think, would enable the members of this House to express their views, if it is their opinion that this absurd anomaly should be done away with. It would enable members generally who are in favour of granting to women the right of franchise, to say that it should be done in either one way or the other. I cannot help thinking that if the franchise were still left with the provincial legislatures it would be better. Neither can I help thinking that if, as the result of so leaving it to the provincial legislatures and doing away with this anomaly as it exists in Saskatchewan and Alberta, the franchise should be granted to the women of all five provinces, the legislatures of the four remaining provinces, Quebec, New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island—when they would see that the legislatures of the other five provinces had given women the right to vote for provincial legislatures, and thereby, ex necessitate, for members of the House of Commons, would not be long in following suit and extending to women in those four provinces the same right to vote for members of provincial legislatures, and, as a result, for members of this House. I would suggest to my hon. friend, if I may be permitted to do so without being out of order, that instead of pressing his resolution, which is a very admirable one except that it is too general in its terms and too indefinite, and that it does not commit the House, or, if it is passed, does not commit the Government to anything except that they should give the matter attention—I would suggest that he strike out of his resolution all the words after the word "that," and substitute my resolution as follows:

That, whereas, in the provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta, the provincial franchise has been granted to women by legislative enactment, and in British Columbia the electors have voted in favour of similar legislation;

Whereas it is provided in the Dominion Elections Act that persons entitled to vote for members of a provincial legislature shall also be entitled to vote for members of Parliament, but in respect to Alberta and Saskatchewan—alone of all the provinces of Canada—it is provided that only males shall be entitled to vote for members of the federal Parliament, thus creating an anomalous situation as between the provinces, which should be removed;

Whereas during the present Empire struggle the women of Canada have shown a most intelligent and patriotic interest in, and an unselfish devotion to, the welfare of the State;

And whereas it seems but just and right that they should be given a voice in the direction of its affairs;

In the opinion of this House it is desirable that provision be made either to grant to women who are qualified to vote for members of a Provincial Legislature, the right also to vote for members of the Dominion Parliament, or to grant to women throughout the Dominion the right to vote for members of Parliament, subject to such provisions and limitations as may seem reasonable to Parliament.

If my hon. friend will not consent to incorporate this resolution with his, it would not be incompetent for me to move it by way of amendment. Perhaps my right hon. friend will let me know what he thinks about that.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I will do so later.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Perhaps it might be also understood, as I do not wish to prolong my remarks, that if such an arrangement could not be agreed to, I might be permitted later to move an amendment, after having heard from my right hon. friend, without making any further remarks. To keep myself in order, I will move the following amendment, with the understanding that I shall withdraw it if my hon. friend who has moved the resolution will agree to incorporate in it the resolution which I have upon the Order Paper:

That all the words after the word "that" be struck out and the following be substituted therefor:

The Dominion Elections Act should be so amended at the present session as to make uniform the right of women to vote for members of the House of Commons in those provinces which have granted to them the provincial franchise.

This amendment is along the lines that I have endeavoured to direct the attention of the House to as being the most desirable. I would prefer that we should agree upon a unanimous resolution in favour of extending to women the right, to which they are clearly entitled.

I was exceedingly pleased to hear the hon. gentleman who moved the resolution and my hon. friend who seconded it speak so strongly in favour of conferring the franchise upon women. The only respect in which I differ from them is in their argument that instead of adhering to the provincial franchise, this Parliament should adopt a general Franchise Act. This would mean dealing with the franchise generally, and not alone with the immediate subject which we are called upon to deal with. One hon. gentleman has said that a good many people in this country are opposed to extending the franchise to women. That assertion presents a very strong reason in favour of leaving the matter to the provincial legislatures. The extension of the franchise is a matter of education, and the safest way to deal with it is to leave it to the provincial legislatures, which are the best judges of the sentiments of the people in the particular provinces which they represent. I am sure that in the long run this method would result in greater satisfaction and better legislation.

I do not intend to argue at any length in favour of extending the franchise to women; I think that the time for argument has passed. The action of the most civilized countries in the world in granting this measure of justice to women ought to be convincing to this Parliament that it is the right thing to do. The fact that the great provinces of Ontario, Saskatchewan, Manitoba, Alberta and British Columbia have, either with perfect unanimity or by an almost unanimous vote, granted the franchise to women, ought to be a convincing argument to this Parliament that it is the right thing to do. The fact that in the United States 149 women belong to the Electoral College, that 7,000,000, in round numbers, is now the total of the women's vote, and that other strides have been made there in granting the suffrage to women, ought to be convincing proof that no evil has resulted from granting to women the franchise. The hon. gentlemen who have spoken in support of the resolution have pointed out that it would be impossible to overestimate the tremendous sacrifices which the women of Canada have made in the great struggle in which we are now engaged. Their sacrifices have been great, but, what is of equal importance, their work has been intelligent. They have combined skill and judgment with patriotic devotion to their country; they have given magnificent service, which has done a great deal to enable Canada to take the noble part which she is taking in this great war. Shall it be said that the women who have shown such intelligence, such good judgment, such energy, such devotion to their country, shall not be permitted to say how their country shall be governed; shall not be permitted to take any part in the direction of its affairs? As I have said, the time for argument has passed, and to-day the burden is upon those who hold that the franchise should not be granted to women. I do hope that this House will express the opinion that the Government should, at the present session, bring down a measure which will wipe out the disqualification of women so far as the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan are concerned, and will give to those women whose right to the franchise has been recognized by their legislatures the same right which their sisters in the other provinces of Ontario, Manitoba and British Columbia have; that the women in all the provinces upon whom the provincial franchise may be conferred shall, by virtue of that fact, their names being on the provincial voters' lists, have the right to vote for members of the Dominion Parliament.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Is my hon. friend in favour of extending the franchise to the women of all the provinces or only those in which the franchise has been extended to them by the provincial legislatures?

Mr. PUGSLEY: I would leave the provincial franchise to govern just as now. I think it would be proper to do so. It may be said that this Parliament ought to throw around the extension of the franchise to women certain restrictions; that they ought to extend it to women who are unmarried and to women who have property. To that I say, No. If we are going to extend the franchise to women, we ought to do what the provincial legislatures have done, that is, place them on an equal footing with men. We ought to give to every woman, married or single, possessing the qualification of residence the same as is required in respect of men, the same right to vote as a man has. While the British people have moved along pretty rapidly in the direction of woman suffrage, after a very hard struggle they have fixed the age at thirty years.

Mr. NESBITT: Twenty-five years.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Thirty years, I think it is. That strikes me as absurd. Mr. Lloyd George, the Prime Minister, in receiving a delegation of women recently in England, stated that the extension of the franchise had been a matter of compromise, and he also called attention to the absurdity of fixing the extreme age limit of thirty years instead of fixing the same age as for men, but he said that no doubt very soon the anomaly would be done away with.

Mr. NESBITT: Do you think few women would vote if the age limit were thirty years?

Mr. BURNHAM: Will the hon. member say why, having dilated upon the absolute right of women to vote, he proposes by his amendment to exclude women in certain provinces?

Mr. PUGSLEY: The reason is very simple; it is that Parliament has left to the provinces the right to say who shall exercise the franchise and who shall not.

Mr. BURNHAM: Is that a justification?

Mr. PUGSLEY: The provinces have the right to say that no man shall be allowed to vote unless he owns one thousand dollars of real or personal property or unless he has a certain income. The provinces are given by this Parliament the absolute right to fix the conditions of the franchise. The provinces have the right to extend the franchise to the Indians.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: That is hardly the case. We have simply for the time being adopted the franchise conditions which the provinces have established. Nevertheless, this Parliament is and always has been invested with the fullest possible jurisdiction to determine who shall vote at elections of members of this House.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I grant that; I grant at once that Parliament in its wisdom has determined that, upon the whole, the best judges are the provincial legislatures and that it is better to leave the question of the right of the franchise to the provincial legislatures. Whether rightly or wrongly, that has been the view of Parliament for the past nineteen years, and as I have said, under this law, one province, if the legislature chose so to enact, might prescribe property qualifications which might be entirely different from the qualifications in another province; one province might prescribe a condition of residence which might be entirely different from what was prescribed by the legislature of another province; but all the same, only those to whom the province gave the right of voting for the election of members to the provincial House would be entitled to have their names placed upon the lists which would qualify them to vote for members of the Dominion Parliament. It is upon that ground, as I have pointed out, that the present law has worked with great satisfaction during the past nineteen years, that I would still continue to leave to the provincial legislatures the question of whether women should be on the voters' lists or not.

Mr. WRIGHT: Is it not a fact that a few years ago this Parliament expressed its dissatisfaction with the voters' lists provided by the provinces and exercised the right from that day to this of compiling the voters' lists over large parts of the province of Ontario, and I think, of some of the other provinces?

Mr. PUGSLEY: I think my hon. friend is mistaken as to that. I do not think Parliament, during the past nineteen years, has ever declared itself against depending upon the provincial franchise and using the provincial voters' lists, and it has certainly never taken any steps which would show any disapproval of the present law.

Mr. WRIGHT: This Parliament did as I have stated, and for years now, under the authority of this Parliament, the Dominion Government has been compiling the voters' lists in the northern parts of the province of Ontario.

Mr. PUGSLEY: My hon. friend is surely wrong in speaking in general terms. He is referring entirely to the unorganized districts of Ontario in regard to which it might be desirable to have special provisions. I shall not take up any further time, but shall conclude by moving the amendment which I have read, with the understanding, if my hon. friend prefers something different, I shall be glad to draw up another one along somewhat different lines.

Mr. SPEAKER: Without giving a ruling on the amendment of the hon. member for St. John city (Mr. Pugsley) at this stage, as it is entirely new to me, I feel it my duty to point out that the hon. member has upon the Order Paper a resolution, No. 6, following this, and it seems to me that that resolution, although it is not the same in terms, is substantially the same as that which he now submits by way of amendment. Bourinot, at page 301, says:

> Nor is it regular to move as an amendment to a question a motion of which notice has been given and which appears in its place on the Notice Paper.

If the amendment submitted by the hon. member for St. John is substantially the same as his notice of motion—and I am inclined to think it is—his amendment would not be in order, in that it is not competent for him to do by an indirect method that which he cannot do directly. I merely point out to the hon. member that I am inclined to the view that his amendment is out of order, but as the debate will probably proceed for a time, I shall be able to give a more definite ruling before it is concluded.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I would like, Sir, if in considering the question, you would keep in mind the fact that the amendment simply expresses the one view without any reference to any proposed legislation of a wider scope.

Hon. C. J. DOHERTY (Minister of Justice): It had not been my intention to take any part in the debate upon the motion moved by the hon. member for South Oxford, nor is it now my intention to deal with the merits of the question raised by that motion. I rise simply because the hon. member for St. John has expressed so insistent a desire for an expression of opinion upon my part upon the question of whether or not there exists that anomaly, to remedy which, I understand, is the purpose of the amendment which he has proposed. I might refer in the first place to his criticism of the answer which was given to the question put at the last session of the House as to what the opinion of the Minister of Justice was upon the question which arises upon his motion, namely, whether the fact that a certain province has conferred the electoral franchise on women, operated in view of the provisions of the Dominion Elections Act, to give women the right to vote in elections for the Dominion Parliament.

The hon. gentleman found fault that in response to that question the answer was given that it was not the practice to answer questions of law. The hon. gentleman would not dispute, surely, that that was a question of law nor that my answer stated the universal practice. He went on to suggest that it was the duty of the Minister of Justice to advise the House on questions of law, and he asked who is it that the Minister of Justice is to advise if not the House of Commons? He suggested that the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery must at the present time under the direction of the Minister of Justice be proceeding to strike names off the provincial lists. I would like very respectfully to say that in all these suggestions the hon. member for St. John is labouring under an entire misapprehension. If the hon. gentleman will look at the statutes governing the function of the Minister of Justice he will see that the Minister of Justice is constituted—I do not pretend to give the exact words—the legal advisor of the Government, and of the different departments of the Government—not the legal advisor of the House of Commons.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Is not the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery an officer of one of the departments?

Mr. DOHERTY: He is an officer of the House of Commons, and I think it is a very serious question whether it would be a proper thing for him to take upon himself to act upon the advice of the Minister of Justice alone, and to proceed under his direction to strike names off the voters' lists without the intervention of anybody else, because after all the Minister of Justice might sometimes, though not always, be a political partisan. So far as I know no such procedure ever takes place. I did not come prepared to speak on this subject to-day, and I have not specially looked at the provisions with regard to voters' lists, but I would be surprised to learn that the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, under anybody's advice or direction, strikes names off the voters' lists. I speak subject to possible correction, but I think there is really no room for correction when I say that I do not think there is vested in the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery any discretion to strike names off voters' lists. In the voters' lists as they come to us from the provinces, quite irrespective of the question of woman's franchise, there may be, and sometimes there undoubtedly are, large numbers of names of persons who are not qualified to vote in a Dominion election, but I do not know of any authority under which the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery can strike those names off.

In giving the answer I did last year, the well-established practice was followed. In saying that as Minister of Justice I am not the advisor of the House of Commons, I only repeated what I have heard said many, many times by my predecessor in this office. I am not quite sure but that when I first took office I myself suggested just what the hon. member for St. John has suggested this afternoon. But whether it was I that put forward that proposition or another, I have the clearest possible recollection of the very distinguished gentleman who was my predecessor in office taking distinctly the position that he had no function to act as advisor to the House of Commons. We are all here as members of the House of Commons, and the opinion of the gentleman who happens to be Minister of Justice is worth just what it may be worth as the opinion of one lawyer sitting in this House, and I have no doubt, in fact I would anticipate, that any person seeking light on the law would give at least equal respect and consideration to the opinion of other members of this House as they would to my opinion. If the Minister of Justice be the legal advisor of the House of Commons, it would seem to follow that the House of Commons ought to accept and act upon his advice, and it would be confiding to a member of the Government very large powers indeed, if his office gave him the right to speak authoritatively to this House as to what the law was, and this House was under any obligation to accept his view. I fancy the hon. gentleman himself would not be prepared in this particular case, or generally, to accept as conclusive whatever view I might express.

I am quite willing to express to the House my view upon the question of law that arises in the case, but as I did not come with the intention of discussing this question, and indeed it is one that apparently would not have presented itself upon the motion of the hon. member for South Oxford, my hon. friend and the House generally will perhaps pardon me if I am not as clear and concise as I might otherwise have been in the setting forth of this opinion.

The proposition of the hon. gentleman that an anomaly exists by reason of the fact that women in those of the older provinces where the legislature has conferred the franchise are now entitled to vote in Dominion elections, whereas in the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan where the legislatures have also conferred the franchise on women they are not entitled to vote, is, I think, a mistaken one. He rests his proposition, if I followed his argument rightly, upon the terms under which the Dominion statute recognizes that the voting qualifications prescribed by the different legislatures shall be sufficient to confer the right to vote in a Dominion election, and upon the provisions which recognize that the voters' lists prepared by the provinces shall, subject to certain conditions which are not now material, be used in Dominion Elections. I understand the hon. gentleman to base his contention on the fact that our statute, in describing the qualifications of those entitled to vote, says that every person who is a British subject, and so forth, qualified to vote in provincial election, shall be qualified to vote in a Dominion election as well. His contention is that because the statute does not create a disability upon any particular class of person, that the words "every person" must be taken as including all persons of any kind or description, and I think he finds an added strength for that argument in the fact that in that portion of the Election Act which deals with the persons for which the Dominion itself provides the qualifications, the words used are, "every male person."

That part of the proposition of the hon. member with which I do not agree is this: he contends that because by the statute itself no distinction of persons is made, it follows that the word "person" is to be interpreted as including all kinds of persons, even those labouring under existing legal incapacity at the time of the passing of the statute. If I follow the hon. member, he contends that if that statute does not impose any disability, there is no need of that statute in any express way removing any previously existing disability. Now, previous to the enactment of the Dominion Elections Act, the Dominion determined its own franchise and made its own lists; and, for the purpose of determining what a "person" was with regard to that franchise and the making of the lists, we had a provision defining a "person" as being a male person. So that, under the provisions of an immediately pre-existing law dealing with the subject of the franchise, the law for which the present law was substituted, "person" for franchise purposes, was a male person and did not include women. It is not impossible that we may find there the explanation of the insertion of the words "male person" when this Parliament came to make an Act defining the franchise, which it does in that part that deals with the province of Saskatchewan and Alberta, where when dealing with the other provinces it was merely the provincial franchise as regards the question of qualification —and I insist a little upon that, because I think it is well to bear in mind that all that Parliament declared itself willing to accept from the province was that persons who had the qualifications which the province described——

[Mr. Doherty.]

Mr. GERMAN: Does the hon. minister say that in the provinces of Saskatchewan and Alberta, as the Dominion law stands at present, a woman could vote in an election to this House by reason of the Franchise Act in either of those provinces?

Mr. DOHERTY: No, I thought I had made it clear that my view was that they would not be entitled to vote in a Dominion election. Consequently, I say there is no anomaly, that their position as regards voting in the Dominion elections is the same as the position of women in the provinces where the province has not recognized the right of women to vote.

I lay stress on the fact that the matter with regard to which our law declares the readiness of Parliament to accept the decision of the provincial legislature is the matter of the qualification which will entitle a person to vote. But there is nothing in our statutes which hands over to the legislature of the province the power to determine who is and who is not, for the purposes of the franchise, a "person." Parliament, when it used the word, used it, no doubt, with a clear understanding of its meaning. I am not going to suggest that in the abstract a woman is not a person. I would not dare to say it even if I thought it, which, of course, I do not. But I submit that "person" in the Act of 1906 means to-day what it meant when the law was enacted, and that there is no power in the legislature of any province to make the word "person" in that Act mean something different from what it meant at the time it was enacted. And I think the hon. gentleman will agree with me that there are words which, with regard to special enactment, as a matter of law, have a meaning sometimes broader and sometimes narrower than their meaning in ordinary parlance. My proposition is that in that statute of 1906, when the legislature said "every person" it meant every male person, and that because it was not creating any capacity to vote, but was dealing with a "person" from the point of view of voting, and did not confer a capacity upon people who, up to the time of that enactment, had not the capacity to vote, and that we are not justified, in the absence of clear provision by the legislator intimating his intention to create an entirely new class of persons with capacity to vote, in inferring that he meant to do that merely because he spoke of "every person." In other words, the legislator, when he was enacting how were to be determined the qualifications of persons entitled to vote, must have had in contemplation those persons who at the time—and from all previous times—had been the only persons capable of voting at all.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Assuming what the hon. minister says to be correct, can he suggest any reason why Parliament, in dealing with Saskatchewan and Alberta, where they have no provincial lists, should have used the words "male person" and in dealing with the provincial lists which are provided for in some provinces, said simply "person?"

Mr. DOHERTY: I think I can suggest an explanation of how that happened. But, even if I be not in a position to offer any explanation, I submit that, as a matter of law, if the word "person" standing by itself had at the time of that enactment a perfectly clear meaning excluding the idea of a female person, you could not, by mere inference from the fact that in this other portion of the Act the legislator used the words "male person," safely conclude that he meant to alter the meaning attached to the word "person" as it was well recognized to be at the time he used the word in connection with that particular subject matter.

In a moment I shall show to the hon. member an authority which I think he will recognize as a very respectable authority where precisely the same thing occurred and where, notwithstanding it having so occurred, it was held in England that the word "person," as applied to the Franchise Act, did not include a woman. We have to take it as the starting point that our Act limits itself to accepting the determination of the provinces as to qualifications. As far as these lists are concerned, it defines the lists but I do not think my hon. friend will find anything in that statute saying that the mere fact of a person being on the list makes of that person an elector. In fact, there are numerous persons on these lists who are not qualified to vote at our elections. The question, therefore, is not whether a woman is or is not an elector under the provincial statute. So far as qualifications are concerned, if the province changed the qualifications of a person, without this Parliament changing its law, such person would become qualified to vote at a Dominion election. But until this Parliament undertakes to say that some one who, for the purposes of the Act which it enacted, would not be a person within the meaning of the Act when it was enacted, has become a person and has become so entitled, the province cannot impose that person upon this Parliament as being recognized under the legislation of this Parliament as being a person capable of voting.

Mr. BURNHAM: Would the Minister of Justice say what right this Parliament has to define the status of the province in regard to that particular question? Has not this Parliament to take the definition as handed out by the province?

Mr. DOHERTY: This Parliament is not under any obligation to take the enactment of the province in regard to the qualification of voters. This Parliament has absolute power to determine who shall vote in elections and if persons, who are upon the provincial lists and are recognized by the provincial authority, vote in a Dominion election, it is not because the province says so but it is because this Parliament has said: We will take over your list and make it ours. By simply being on the provincial list a man does not vote, properly speaking, because he is on that provincial list; he votes because this Parliament has taken that list over and made it the Dominion list. He votes because this Parliament has said that he may vote, and not because the legislature has said so. That is only one way that this Parliament takes, of exercising its absolute power to determine who shall vote in Dominion elections.

Mr. GERMAN: But if his name is on the list he can vote?

Mr. DOHERTY: Not necessarily.

Mr. GERMAN: If he is otherwise qualified under the Provincial Act?

Mr. DOHERTY: There are classes of disqualification in our own Act. For a number of years my own name stood upon the voters' list but I was disqualified from voting because I held an office that, under the Dominion Elections Act, disqualified me.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Those are personal disqualifications.

Mr. DOHERTY: Yes; so that the fact of your being on the list is not conclusive evidence that you are an elector.

Mr. GERMAN: If women are on the voters' list for Ontario, does the minister contend that these women cannot vote for Dominion elections?

Mr. DOHERTY: That is my view.

Mr. GERMAN: That they cannot vote?

Mr. DOHERTY: That they cannot vote, that the mere fact of their being upon the list does not make them voters.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: What is the difference between them and men?

Mr. DOHERTY: Because every "person," within the meaning of our statute, who has the qualifications prescribed may vote, but my proposition is that a woman within the meaning of our statute is not included within the meaning of "person."

Mr. PUGSLEY: What is a woman if she is not a person?

Mr. DOHERTY: Within the meaning of the statute, I say. The hon. member can say hosts of funny, and amusing, things, if he wants to and he can suggest that I am saying that a woman is not a person, but what I am saying is that when the legislators said that every "person" might vote he did not say anything to the effect that a woman should vote. I will point out to my hon. friend an authority that I think he will not laugh at. He may say that I am wrong, he may feel justified in laughing at me, but when I show him this authority I do not think he will laugh at it.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I was not laughing at my hon. friend but rather at the suggestion that a woman is really not a person.

Mr. DOHERTY: The hon. gentleman finds it necessary to say "really not a person," whereas the hon. gentleman would be more correct if he quoted me as saying that a woman was not included in the word "person" within the meaning of the statute. That is all I was saying. I think I am quite safe in taking it as the starting point that at common law, woman was incapacitated from voting. And I think I am just as safe in taking it that, at common law, woman is equally incapacitated from being a member of Parliament.

Mr. McKENZIE: I understand the minister to mean that the word "person" in our Act must be interpreted in view of the conditions that existed at the time the legislation was passed?

Mr. DOHERTY: Precisely, and in view of what the law understood to be a person from the point of view of the capacity to vote and what therefore we must assume Parliament understood when it used the word. I think I am perfectly safe in saying that at common law a woman was not capable of being a voter for a member of Parliament. At common law— and I think this answers the hon. gentleman's suggestion about a woman being a candidate for this House—a woman was not capable of being elected to Parliament. My proposition is this, that that incapacity will only disappear in face of legislation absolutely and clearly removing it and to say simply that every "person" shall be entitled to vote in face of the fact that there existed a positive incapacity in a particular class of persons, or persons of a certain kind, does not justify the conclusion that Parliament meant to create a new class of capable people.

Mr. GERMAN: The Ontario statute says that every person shall be entitled to be on the voters' list. It does not say "male and female;" it says "every person." Does the hon. gentleman mean to say that it does not include women and that under the provincial Act as it stands now women cannot vote in Ontario at a provincial election?

Mr. DOHERTY: I am not familiar with the provision but I understand that previously the statute said "every male person" and that now the legislator has come in and said: I do not want to say "male person" but to make it clear now that I mean every person, male and female, I am striking that out. What we have got by that is the perfectly clearly evidenced intention of the legislature to exclude the idea of a male person. My proposition goes no further than this: that, unless there be such clearly expressed intention, I do not think there is room for serious dispute.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: We have not the same distinction in our own statute in regard to Alberta and Saskatchewan?

Mr. DOHERTY: At no time did we strike out the word "male" as used in any part of the statute. What happened in regard to our statute is that, with regard to the old provinces where Parliament was accepting the qualifications as prescribed by the provinces, it used the words "every person." In that portion of the Act where Parliament was enacting a Franchise Act of its own for Saskatchewan and Alberta, it used the words "every male person." And if I am not mistaken, that was subsequent legislation, not being enacted at the same time; it was not a matter of comparing the two sections one with the other and saying: Shall we use the word "person" here, and shall we use the words "male person" there? Because in one statute enacted subsequently to that portion of the law the words "male person" are used, because Parliament sought to be even more clear and distinct, that does not modify the meaning of the word "person" used in previous legislation; whereas in the case of the provinces they are making subsequent legislation, and making a deliberate change, substituting one provision for another, and striking out the word "male," thus making the whole provision utterly nugatory, unless the change give capacity to women, as it could not mean anything else than that the legislature wanted to get rid of the limitation in regard to sex. But in our legislation there never was any getting rid of a limitation in the legislation that was being dealt with, which said "every person." When Parliament was making a Franchise Act, it made use of a defined term, "male person," which was only following out and making perfectly clear the well accepted meaning of "person" up to that time.

I said that the question was not new, that I would be able to cite respectable authority, indeed I might say conclusive authority, in support of the propositions I have been setting forth. In England the question has arisen in two cases, the case of Chorlton against Lings, Law Reports, Common Pleas, page 374; and the case of Nairn against the University of St. Andrews, one of the Scotch universities, to be found in Appeal Cases 1909, page 147, House of Lords. The latter case is especially striking as dealing with a question as nearly as can be on all fours with the question we are considering here. In the case of Chorlton and Lings, what was held was that:

> Women are not entitled to vote in the election of members of Parliament, because they are by reason of their sex subject to a "legal incapacity" within the meaning of the enfranchising clauses of the Representation of the People Act 1867. By section 3 of the Representation of the People Act 1867 it is enacted that "every man" having certain qualifications shall be entitled to vote; and by Lord Romilly's Act it is enacted that in all future Acts words importing the masculine gender shall be deemed and taken to include females, unless the contrary is expressly provided.
>
> Held, that the words "every man," in the Representation of the People Act, did not include females, because what is necessarily implied from the language of an Act is "expressly provided," and the Legislature, in the Representation of the People Act, were dealing not with the description of persons entitled to vote, but with their qualification, and therefore used the word "man" in the sense of "male persons."

Mr. PUGSLEY: Hear, hear, that is not very much against our position.

Mr. DOHERTY: When it used the word "man" it was not dealing with qualifications, but with the description of persons entitled to vote, dealing with descriptions, not with qualifications; and so it used the word "man," although there is an express Statute saying that "man" includes woman.

Mr. PUGSLEY: No. Is not the language of the Interpretation Act: that the masculine shall include the feminine where the context requires it?

Mr. DOHERTY: I am not dealing with our Interpretation Act. Perhaps my hon. friend did not follow me when I read the provision.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Would the minister kindly repeat it.

Mr. DOHERTY (Reading):

> It is enacted that in all future Acts words importing the masculine gender shall be deemed and taken to include females unless the contrary is expressly provided.

Not unless the context otherwise requires, but unless the contrary is expressly provided and in the face of that, with a statute that says that every man should have a right to vote and no express provision to the contrary, the court held that for the purpose of the franchise it did not include women. The word " man " is treated as being the equivalent of our word " person" for general purposes. But the reason why it does not include woman is that according to inveterate usage, woman was incapable of voting, and that you could not assume, that by the mere use of a generic word as "man," or "person," Parliament intended to remove that general incapacity.

The other case is perhaps more absolutely similar to this case. There we are dealing with the word "person." and likewise with the effect of a person being on the specific list which is defined as being the list of persons entitled to vote. Perhaps before we pass to the other case I might give a citation or two from the remarks of the judges in the case I have been speaking of. Two reasons were given why the word "man" in that case did not include woman: First the subject matter and general scope of the language of the Reform Act showed that the word man was not intended to include woman, and second because at common law women were under a legal disability and were incapable of voting, a condition which the statute had not relieved. Justice Byles said that it was impossible to suppose that Parliament when dealing with qualification and with qualification only, intended by the variation of a phrase to admit to the poll the other half of the population. Chief Justice Bovill said:

I do not collect from the language of this Act that there was any intention to alter the description of the persons who were to vote, but rather conclude that the object was to deal with their qualifications; and if so important an alteration of the personal qualification was intended to be made as to extend the franchise to women, who did not then enjoy it, and were in fact excluded from it by the terms of the former Act, I can hardly suppose that the Legislature would have made it by using the word man.

The case of Nairn vs. the University of St. Andrews bears, perhaps, more directly upon our present question, because the word in question is "person," and the question passed upon is the effect of enabling women to be included in the class of persons which, under the existing law, had been declared capable of voting. The question was that of the right to vote for a member to represent the University of St. Andrews. Without going into the exact words, the qualification to vote for a member to represent the University of St. Andrews was that of being a member of the council. At the time that was enacted, women were apparently not entitled to be members of the council, just as, at the time of our enactment, neither in the provinces nor anywhere else were women entitled to vote. Subsequently, under authority conferred upon them by statute, the authorities of the university recognized to women the right to become graduates and thereby to become members of the council of the university. Women, therefore, found themselves absolutely within the exact description of what was a lawful voter entitled to vote for the representation of the university in Parliament. Yet the court held that they were not entitled to vote.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Would the minister give the citation?

Mr. DOHERTY: Law Reports, Appeal Cases 1909, page 147. Here is the description of what was a lawful voter:

"Every person whose name is for the time being on the register of the general council of such university, shall, if of full age, and not subject to any legal incapacity, be entitled to vote in the election of a member to serve in any future Parliament for such university in terms of this Act"; and by s. 28, sub-s. 2, the following persons shall be members of the general council of the respective universities: "All persons on whom the university to which such general council belongs has after examination conferred" certain degrees, "or any other degree that may hereafter be instituted."

The report continues:

The appellants were five women graduates of the University of Edinburgh, and as such had their names enrolled on the general council of that university, and they claimed as graduates and members of the general council the right to vote at the election of a member of Parliament for the university.

Held (affirming the decision of the Extra Division of the Court of Session), that the appellants were not entitled to vote in the election of the parliamentary representative of the university.

There is no evidence of any ancient custom for women to vote in parliamentary elections.

Some of the things said by the judges in this case are startlingly applicable to the present question. Lord Loreburn says:

In regard to the alleged right of voting the appellants assert that, if ancient records are explored, there is evidence of women having enjoyed this right, and no adequate ground for affirming a constitutional or common law disability on the score of sex; and, further, that the Representation of the People (Scotland) Act, 1868, taken with the Universities (Scotland) Act, 1889, and the ordinances made under the last-mentioned Act, do upon their literal constitution confer upon women, if they comply with the requirements, a right to vote for university members.

Now, my Lords, it may be that in the vast mass of venerable documents buried in our public repositories, some of authority, others of none, there will be found traces of women having taken some part in parliamentary elections. No authentic and plain case of a woman giving a vote was brought before your Lordships. A few equivocal cases were referred to. I was surprised how few. And it is the same in regard to judicial precedents. Two passages may be found in which judges are reported as saying that women may vote at parliamentary elections. These are dicta delivered from an ancient manuscript of no weight. Old authorities are almost silent on the subject, except that Lord Coke at one place incidentally alludes to women as being under a disqualification, not dwelling upon it as upon a thing disputable, but alluding to it for purpose of illustration as a matter certain. This disability of women has been taken for granted.

It is incomprehensible to me that any one acquainted with our laws or the methods by which they are ascertained can think, if, indeed, any one does think, there is room for argument on such a point. It is notorious that this right of voting has, in fact, been confined to men. Not only has it been the constant tradition, alike of all the three kingdoms, but it has also been the constant practice, so far as we have knowledge of what has happened from the earliest times down to this day. Only the clearest proof that a different state of things prevailed in ancient times could be entertained by a court of law in probing the origin of so inveterate an usage. I need not remind your Lordships that numberless rights rest upon a similar basis. Indeed, the whole body of the common law has no other foundation.

I will not linger upon this subject. If this legal disability is to be removed, it must be done by Act of Parliament. Accordingly the appellants maintain that it has in fact been done by Act of Parliament. They say that the Act of 1868, while confining to men the franchise described in other sections, adopts different language in s. 27, using in that section the word "persons." I agree that the word "persons" would prima facie include women. But, in speaking of "persons," this same section limits them to those who are "not subject to any legal incapacity." I cannot doubt that by this limitation, if not otherwise, are excluded all such persons as may by law be disabled from voting. Peers are excluded, as are women. So, also, are others.

If the word "persons" in s. 27 of the Act of 1868 is wide enough to comprise women, then they are shut out by the exception of those subject to a legal incapacity. If the word "persons" is not wide enough to include women, then there is nothing in any Act of Parliament that gives the smallest foothold for the appellants' contention.

I do not want to take up the time of the House by reading citations, but I wish to read from Lord Ashbourne's opinion. He speaks of what the Legislature had in contemplation when it used the word "persons."

Then he says:

In 1868 the legislature could only have had male persons in contemplation, as women could not then be graduates, and also because the Parliamentary franchise was by constitutional principle and practice confined to men.

Now when the legislature said that every person on the register of the university should be entitled to vote, there is what the court said that that meant every male person, because at that time no female persons were entitled to vote anywhere nor could they be graduates. When our Parliament said that every person that has the qualifications provided by the legislatures shall be entitled to vote, it necessarily excluded women because at that time and for all time previously, nobody had had women as voters in contemplation at all and women could not be on a provincial list. Lord Ashbourne continues:

The Appellants strongly relied on the use of the word "man" in some earlier sections dealing with counties or boroughs.

There is just the suggestion made here with regard to the use of "person" in one place and "male" person in another. In this they use " person " in one place and " man " in another.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Does not the hon. minister think that makes it stronger, "person" in one place, and "male" in another?

Mr. DOHERTY: There may be a shade of difference, but the difference of effect in both instances must rest upon the contention that the use of different words necessarily implies different meanings, and I think that it is a pretty light shade of difference. If it is an inevitable conclusion that because in one place I use the word " person " and in another " male person ", I mean different things in the two places, the distinction is very finely drawn if I can say: Well, I used " person " in one place and " man " in another, and I meant just the same.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess.

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Hon. C. J. DOHERTY (Resuming): I should just like to add two further citations before leaving the case of Nairn and the University of St. Andrews, to which I was referring when the House rose at six o'clock. Lord Ashbourne, after saying what I read before the House rose at six o'clock, in which he made it quite clear that he excluded a woman in that particular case on the ground that she was not a person within the meaning of the statute, went on to say:

I can, then, entertain no doubt that, when examined, "person" means male person in the Act. The parliamentary franchise has always been confined to men, and the word "person" cannot by any reasonable construction be held to be prophetically used to support an argument founded on a Statute passed many years later.

I do not think any language could be more directly applicable to the present case. To hold that within the meaning of the statute of 1906 "person" included a woman, we must hold that it was prophetically used to support an argument founded on a statute passed twenty years later.

I should also like to cite a few words from page 161 where Lord Loreburn says:

It would require a convincing demonstration to satisfy me that Parliament intended to effect a constitutional change so momentous and far-reaching by so furtive a process. It is a dangerous assumption to suppose that the Legislature foresees every possible result that may ensue from the unguarded use of a single word, or that the language used in statutes is so precisely accurate that you can pick out from various Acts this and that expression and, skillfully piecing them together, lay a safe foundation for some remote inference.

Before passing from the English cases I might mention the case of Bebb and the Law Society, where the question was whether a woman was eligible under the statute providing for the admission of "persons" as solicitors or attorneys. It was there held that:

Before the passing of the Solicitors' Act, 1843, women were by the common law of England under a general disability, by reason of their sex, to become attorneys or solicitors. That disability can be, and is, proved by inveterate usage. It could not be removed by a mere interpretation of the clause, such as the Solicitors' Act, 1843, s. 48, which provides that words importing the masculine gender shall extend to a female. There is nothing in the Solicitors' Act, 1843, or any amending statute which can be construed as giving women any new right to become solicitors. The disability therefore continues, and the Law Society cannot admit any woman to their preliminary examination with a view to her becoming a solicitor.

I refer to this in connection with what was said about the provisions of our Interpretation Act, where the masculine is intended to include the feminine. The quotation I have just cited is directly applicable in that regard. No doubt that the provision of our Interpretation Act would render it impossible for us to draw any inference from the words "he or him or his" being used throughout the Election Act in reference to an elector or a voter, but it leaves untouched the question of the meaning of the word "person" and it may be well to mention in passing that while we have a section in our Interpretation Act which is intended to clear up what is meant by "person" it does not refer at all to the question of sex. It includes within the definition of "person" corporate bodies and companies and so forth, but does not touch one way or the other the question of what may be meant as regards sex in any particular statute by the word "person." So we have no statutory disposition as to the proper interpretation in this regard to be given to the word "person." In this case of Bebb which I think bears directly on the suggestion of the hon. member for St. John, that because our statute says that any British subject of 21 years of age may be a candidate, and therefore a woman may be a candidate, Lord Robert Cecil in opening the case quotes from Maitland's History of English Law, (and it is referred to later on with approval by the judges) as follows:

As regards private rights women are on the same level as men, though postponed in the canons of inheritance; but public functions they have none. In the camp, at the council board there is no place for them.

The learned counsel declares that he accepts that statement, but arguing as he was that a woman might be a solicitor, he goes on to claim that the words "public function" must be defined narrowly. It goes without saying that to be a candidate or member of this House, or to vote is a public function. It is hardly necessary to cite anything in support of that proposition. In view of what is conceded all round in all the cases to which I have referred, a woman at common law was not capable of voting, and merely because the statute used the terms "every person" it appears clearly impossible to conclude, in the absence of any such expressed intention by the legislature, that it intended to remove entirely that disability, or as one judge says, "to add to the voting body the other half of the population which never had voted before." On the strength of these authorities I think one can safely say that the mere use of the word "person" does not justify one in assuming that it was intended to effect this far-reaching revolution.

One of the cases I have cited is directly applicable to the present question. The meaning of the word " person " used under analogous circumstances is under consideration, and that word it is declared cannot by any reasonable assumption be held to be prophetically used to support an argument founded on a statute passed many years later. So here, to sustain the argument of the hon. member, we must look upon the word used at a time when everybody knew that when speaking of persons in connection with voting no one thought of women, as used prophetically, and Parliament as having in mind that possibly at some future time somebody would so alter the law that a woman would become a person capable of voting, and intended then that at any such time in the remote future, which might never come, women were to be included in the word " persons " and entitled to vote.

As regards the argument that my hon. friend has sought to make based upon the lists, I do not see that it leads to the conclusion that the hon. member has come to. The sections dealing with the lists and with voting provide that the provincial lists shall be used and these come from the provincial officers as being the lists of voters entitled to vote at the various polling divisions. As I understand the procedure—I do not like to be too positive about it—but I do not think it is open to much question, the clerk of the Crown in Chancery has not the power to sit down and cut this man and that man off the list. He simply takes the list and gets it printed and then that becomes the list. But that does not mean that everybody on that list is entitled to vote in a Dominion election. Among the affidavits required to be taken and for which forms are provided, you will find one for the case of a man on the provincial voters' list who is disqualified under the Dominion statute. Sections 67 and 69 give quite a list of people who are disqualified under the Dominion Act. The procedure that is adopted is this: When a man who is on the provincial list presents himself to vote at a Dominion election he may then be sworn as to whether or not he is disqualified under the Dominion Act, which demonstrates that being on the list is not conclusive of the right to vote, and that merely having his name on the list would not entitle some one who did not come within the designation of "person" within the meaning of the statute, to vote.

In our country we have had this question of the meaning of the word "person" or other general words in statutes dealing with capacity for holding office or position —I do not know that we have had it in connection with voting. There has arisen quite recently in the province of Quebec the case of Langstaff vs. the Bar of the province. This court of first instance rejected the claim of the lady to be admitted to the Bar, and the Court of Appeals confirmed that judgment. I have before me only the report of the Superior Court, and it does not give the exact text. The reporter, when he comes to the place where the judge read a section of the Act, simply indicates the section read, and does not give the wording, and I have not the statute before me. I am not clear that the question is as to the word "person." But in effect the claim was that a candidate complying with certain things would be entitled to be admitted to the Bar, and, though the candidate was spoken of as "he," yet under the interpretation which they have there as we have it here, the masculine form of expression included the feminine, unless incompatible with the context, and that because no exception was made excluding women, a woman was entitled to become a member of the profession. The Court of Appeals held, in accordance with the principles which I have been trying to make clear, that women were not included and that a woman was not entitled to become a member of the profession. This is an addition to the English case which has been cited. I am also aware of a case in the province of New Brunswick, in which as I recollect it an endeavour was made by a lady to compel the Bar of the province to admit her to the profession, but her application met the same fate as that of her sister in Quebec. I have not had the advantage of reading the case, but I am told that the question was dealt with very fully and in a very conclusive manner by Chief Justice Barker of that province.

So, I think one may safely say that, in the present condition of the law, women in all the provinces stand upon the same footing, and that women in none of the provinces are entitled to vote in a Dominion election. While I think one may safely say that, I do not wish to appear dogmatic or to suggest that what I have said is the last word on the subject and that the subject is not open to discussion. But I have been asked to give my opinion, and I am very happy to give it for what it is worth. I have little doubt, if any, that what I have just said, namely, that women in all the provinces stand on the same footing, and that in none of the provinces are women entitled to vote in a Dominion election, is sound. At all events, this can be said with a very great degree of certainty, that woman's claim to the right to vote in Dominion elections, no matter in what province she may reside, is very far from being sure under the present state of the legislation. I should imagine that any one who desires that women should be given the right to vote would realize that the only way in which that can safely be brought about would be, not the way suggested by the hon. member, but by direct action of this Parliament.

As I said, I do not desire to intervene in the debate on the question whether or not the vote should be given to women. The question, to my mind, is so many-sided, and calls for the consideration of such numerous, varied and important matters, and it is one whose decision is fraught with such very grave consequences, that I certainly would not attempt to speak upon it without much more careful preparation than I have had in this case—for I had not contemplated taking part in this debate. On that question, then, I abstain from taking part in the discussion. I have given what I believe there is to be said in favour of my view on this other question, in the hope that, whether I am absolutely right or not, I may at all events have served the good purpose of giving to hon. members some useful information bearing on it.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: No one could find fault, I am sure, with the views expressed by the learned and hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty). Whether we agree with his conclusions or whether we dissent, the argument he has presented is certainly one well worthy of consideration.

The motion of the hon. member for South Oxford (Mr. Sutherland) has been supported, altogether on the statement and assumption that woman is the equal of man, and that she is entitled to all the rights and privileges given to man under our constitution. No one at this date will dispute such a statement; it is accepted everywhere, I believe, if not in all its consequences, at least in its principle, as beyond doubt or controversy. Everybody admits that woman is the equal in intelligence of man. Yet, my hon. friend from South Oxford (Mr. Sutherland) will admit that this is a proposition of very recent growth. The Minister of Justice has just presented to the House a very learned argument to show that at common law the position of woman was not the position of man, and she could not claim the privileges which have been, ever since the origin of the British Constitution, the privileges and the rights of the male sex. In fact, it is only within a very recent period, not anterior to the last days of the eighteenth century, that the declaration was heard in the civilized world that in no way was woman the inferior of man.

I think the man who, in the last century, brought the matter more forcibly to the attention of the civilized world than any person else was John Stuart Mill. Other writers before him had taken the same position, but he it was who brought it to a climax by promoting a very active and very important agitation in Great Britain in favour of extending to women the same rights, particularly in regard to voting, as were extended to men. The agitation has been of long duration; everybody knows that the idea has been of very slow growth and that in England it is only within the last year or so that the principle has been at last conceded that women ought to have the same privileges as men in regard to the franchise. As has been stated by my hon. friend from St. John (Mr. Pugsley), the recognition of the fact that women should have the same rights as men was made subject in England to a qualification by which women are still placed in a position of inferiority in that a man can become a voter at twenty-one years of age, but a woman must reach the age of thirty years before she can exercise that right.

[Sir Wilfrid Laurier.]

In the outlying parts of the British Empire the idea has made much more rapid advance; in fact, in Australia and in New Zealand for many years past women have exercised the right to vote and as far as my information goes the system has worked satisfactorily. In our own country the idea has also progressed, but it has progressed on geographical lines, so to speak. In the West the idea is universally accepted. In British Columbia, in Alberta, in Saskatchewan, in Manitoba, in Ontario, in all of these provinces, women are to-day granted the same privilege as the male sex with regard to voting. East of the province of Ontario the idea has made no progress whatever. In Quebec, while women have the right of voting in municipal elections under certain conditions, in so far as provincial and Dominion elections are concerned, the idea has never been entertained or even agitated. The same condition, I think, prevails in New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island. In Nova Scotia, while the idea has been agitated, by a recent vote of the legislature, the privilege has been denied to women. It is only within the last six or seven weeks that a resolution was introduced into the legislature of Nova Scotia to give to women the same rights as men in political matters and the motion was voted down.

Now, the question arises, to which I shall come in a moment, whether or not the privilege having been given to women in five of the provinces of the Dominion, women have the right to take part in Dominion elections as well as they have to take part in provincial elections. But whilst I shall come in a moment to the argument which has been presented by my hon. friend. I would say that the debate is not confined to the proposition whether or not women in the provinces in which the franchise has been granted, that is to say British Columbia, Alberta, Saskatchewan, Manitoba and Ontario, have a right to vote in Dominion elections, but the question goes much farther. The resolution is to the effect that the privilege of voting should be given to the women in every province of the Dominion. This is the resolution of my hon. friend from South Oxford (Mr. Sutherland):

> That, in the opinion of this House, the question of extending the franchise to women should engage the attention of the Government at the present Session.

I would observe immediately that whilst everybody would agree that it would be right, in view of the argument of my hon. friend from South Oxford, that women should be given the same privilege as men, they should not be given more privileges than men. The idea which would prevail if this resolution should pass would be that this Parliament would give to women the right to the franchise when Parliament has refused to give the same right to men because it has accepted the franchise in regard to men from the provinces.

This debate presents to our consideration the question as to the body which, under our constitution, should be given the privilege of regulating the franchise. Should it be the Dominion Parliament or the local legislature? It goes without saying that every legislative body should have the right to determine the franchise under which it is elected. Every legislature has that right, as an historic right, unless it is deprived of it by the letter of the constitution itself. I would call the attention of the House to the fact that the United States Congress has no authority at all over its own franchise, and that it cannot legislate as to who shall be the electors to choose the members of Congress. That right is relegated to the state legislatures. Here is the American constitution:—

All legislative powers herein granted shall be vested in a Congress of the United States, which shall consist of a Senate and House of Representatives.

Section 2:

The House of Representatives shall be composed of members chosen every second year by the people of the several States, and the electors in each State shall have the qualifications requisite for the electors of the most numerous branch of the State Legislature.

I would like the House to remember that the great legislative body of the United States, one of the most powerful legislative bodies on the face of the earth, has no control whatever over its own electors and must take them as they are provided by every state. There may be a different franchise in each of the forty-five states of the Union. In some they have woman suffrage, in others they have not; in some they may have a wide franchise and in others a restricted franchise, but the fathers of the American Constitution were of the opinion that after all the body best suited to determine the qualification of voters was the local state legislature. Under our own Constitution it is very different. Our own Constitution gives us absolute power in this Parliament to determine what shall be the franchise under which the members of this House shall be elected. Section 41 of the British North America Act says:—

Until the Parliament of Canada otherwise provides, all laws in force in the several provinces at the Union relative to the following Matters or any of them, namely:—the Qualifications and Disqualifications of Persons to be elected or to sit or vote as Members of the House of Assembly or Legislative Assembly in the several Provinces, the Voters at Elections of such Members, the Oaths to be taken by Voters, the Returning Officers, their Powers and Duties, the Proceedings at Elections, the Periods during which Elections may be continued, the Trial of Controverted Elections, and Proceedings incident thereto, the vacating of Seats of Members, and the Execution of new Writs in case of Seats vacated otherwise than by Dissolution,—shall respectively apply to Elections of Members, to serve in the House of Commons for the same several Provinces.

Nothing is clearer than that language. Until the Parliament otherwise provided, all the laws of the provinces with regard to franchise, not only those which existed at that time, in 1867, but those which might be enacted from time to time, we were to form the franchise which would apply in every province for the elections of members to this House. These laws were to constitute the provincial franchise, and were also to be the franchise on which, in any of these provinces members of this House were to be elected. This provision remained in force until 1885. The members of this House, from the 1st of July, 1867 until the session of 1885, were elected under the provincial franchise, such as it was in every province. In 1885 this Dominion Parliament passed a Dominion Franchise Act and constituted a franchise of its own for the election of members of this House. This law remained in force until 1898. In 1898 it was repealed. I may say—and I do not know whether or not this will meet with the approval of hon. members opposite, although I think they will agree—that to a large part of the population the Act of 1885 was not satisfactory. It was not found to work harmoniously. In 1898 it was repealed, and we returned to the provincial franchise, and I am not aware that there has been since then any objection to the franchise. From 1898 up to this date the franchise for the election of members of this House has been the franchise of each province, as it might be enacted from time to time. Everybody is aware that the local franchises were not like the laws of the Medes and Persians, they were frequently amended. Let me recall an amendment with which the members from the province of Ontario are very familiar. At one time, when we had the property qualification for voters, before we had, as we have now in almost all the provinces, universal manhood suffrage, an important amendment was passed in Ontario to give the sons of farmers the right to vote. It so happened that, in many a household, the farmer had one or two sons, grown up men, working with him on his farm, who had not the franchise. The law very properly gave it to them, and they qualified on the real estate of their father.

I listened with interest to the speech of the hon. member for South Oxford (Mr. Sutherland). It was on a very broad scale and a very high plane, and I have no fault to find with the sentiments he uttered. But I would ask my hon. friend and every member of this House to agree with me that the place to regulate the franchise, bearing in mind the provision of the British North America Act that this Parliament can exercise powers for the peace, order and good government of this country, is not in this House but in the local legislature. The franchise is a right which can not be granted upon a universal scale. Our peace, order and good government depend largely upon the local conditions in each community. There are communities in which woman franchise can be exercised properly and others in which it could not. Let me take one or two cases. In France, for instance, where assuredly women have reached a very high mental level, just as high as in any other country, there has never been any demand from any body of men or any large body of women to have the franchise granted to women; while on the other side of the channel, in England, there has been an agitation which has lasted for years and which has sometimes taken a very acute form, sometimes has gone very far, to a dangerous extent even, to have women given the franchise. Why is that? It is a matter of education; and by education I do not mean simply the intellectual development of the mind, I mean social conditions, domestic conditions, and all those things which lead a class of the community in a certain direction. In England, where representative institutions have been in force for centuries, women to-day and for a long time past, at least since the middle of the last century, have taken a very active interest in political matters. In France women have not taken the same part, and so while you have on the two sides of the channel two of the most civilized nations of Europe, on one side there is the desire, which has taken a very acute form, to have the franchise given to women, and on the other side, in France, the question has never become a matter of serious discussion, although some ladies have attempted to bring it up.

Another consideration which goes to show that the franchise is largely a matter of education is this: I shall contrast what has taken place in Ontario not later than a few months ago, during the last session, when women were granted the franchise, and what has taken place in some states of the American Union. After all, we are very close to the United States. Their conditions are very much our own, their people are of the same birth and blood and of the same education as we are. In Ontario, where the franchise was granted to women a few months ago, only a few weeks ago a motion was made to make women eligible for membership in the legislature, and the very same legislators, the very same men who five minutes before had given the franchise to women, refused to make them eligible for membership. I do not say that was wrong, but it is the case. On the other hand, in the Congress of the United States there is a lady who is a member of Congress from the state of Montana. I believe that in several states of the Union women are eligible, as well as being electors. In Ontario they consented to make them electors, but would not make them eligible. What argument do I take from this? The argument I take from this is that the franchise and all the consequences of the franchise are largely matters of education, of local conditions, of local sentiment, and that it is therefore better to have these matters determined by the local legislatures than by this Dominion Parliament. May I give another example to which I alluded a moment ago? I referred to the province of Nova Scotia, as bright and intelligent a community as there is on this continent—everybody will agree in that. The province of Nova Scotia would not do what was done in the province of Ontario. Just about the time that the province of Ontario voted to give the franchise to women, the province of Nova Scotia voted not to give it. I would ask my hon. friend from South Oxford if under such circumstances, he would think it would be conducive to the peace, order and good government of this country that we should force on the province of Nova Scotia woman suffrage when that province has declined to grant it for local purposes?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Did the legislature vote on that matter, or was it submitted to the people?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: It was the legislature, I understand.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: The ladies themselves had no say in the matter?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: No, they did not have any say in the matter, because the local legislature refused them the right. After all, these matters have to be decided by the legislature. While I admit the broad principle that the franchise is a provincial matter, I go further and say that in every province where the legislature has given to women the right to vote in provincial elections, they should be allowed to vote in Dominion elections also. The hon. Minister of Justice presented a very able argument to show that while in the provinces of Ontario, Manitoba and British Columbia the women have the right to vote in provincial elections, they have not the right to vote in Dominion elections. As the hon. member for St. John city has stated, though the women in the provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta have the right to vote in provincial elections, they have not the right to vote in Dominion elections. With all respect to the Minister of Justice, may I present this view: in my humble judgment the contention which he has made is too narrow and of too technical a construction. My hon. friend, basing his opinion upon very learned authorities, argues that at common law women had not the right of suffrage, and that when in 1898 we reverted to the franchise adopted by the respective provinces, we could not have contemplated that in the future women might have that franchise. The answer to that is to be found in two sections of the Act which are reproduced in chapter 6 of the Revised Statutes, and which define the qualifications of voters in Dominion elections. I quote section 10:

> The qualifications necessary to entitle any person to vote at a Dominion election in any province shall, except as herein otherwise provided, be those established by the laws of that province as necessary to entitle such person to vote in the same part of the province at a provincial election.

My hon. friend argues that at that time Parliament could not have contemplated the extension of the franchise to women. I say that Parliament did contemplate that, because in section 32 of the same Act these words appear:

> In the Provinces of Saskatchewan and Alberta, except as in this Act otherwise provided, every male person shall be qualified to vote.

In the first section which I read, it is stated that every person, other than persons who are excepted, shall have the right to vote. If in any one province, only persons who are males have the right to vote for members of this Parliament I would say that in every other province, only persons who are males should have a like right. That would seem to me to be a reasonable conclusion, it makes our franchise to this Parliament uniform in that respect.

The Minister of Justice stated with much candor that he has not given to the matter all the thought which he would have given to it if he had expected to take part in this debate. There is another view, therefore, which I should like to present. In 1898, exercising our supreme and sovereign power to define the nature of the franchise to be exercised in Dominion elections, we determined to accept the provincial franchise. We decided that the franchise under which every member of the House of Commons should be elected should be the franchise of the province from which he came. If he comes from the province of Ontario, the franchise shall be that of the province of Ontario; if from the province of Quebec, the franchise under which he is elected shall be the franchise of that province. I submit, not as a violent legal supposition, but as a matter of common sense, that, having chosen to accept the franchise created by the respective provinces, we decided to take the franchise not merely as it existed then, but as it might exist at any time in the future. If therefore the franchise of any province is different to-day from what it was in 1898, under the legislation then enacted, we take the franchise as it is to-day, and we have said that we shall accept it as it exists to-morrow, next year, or at any time. It seems to me that this is a reasonable interpretation of the statute. It may or may not be a legal interpretation. I was a lawyer in my day, and I know that it is rather presumptuous to interpret the law, because the law should be interpreted by the courts. But if my hon. friend has any doubt on this point, the peace, order and good government of Canada require that we should make it clear that in all the provinces which have given the franchise to women in respect of provincial elections, the franchise should be given to women for Dominion elections as well. I would not go beyond that. I do not care, for instance, to give the franchise to the women of my own province. I belong to a gallant race, which, I think, always takes a fair view in matters pertaining to the female sex, but I do not want to give the franchise to the women of my own province, because they do not seem to desire it. But in Alberta, Saskatchewan, British Columbia, Ontario, we should give the franchise to women in respect of elections to the House of Commons. As to Saskatchewan and Alberta, the franchise has been granted to women in respect of Dominion elections.

In this debate, and also on a previous occasion, when the matter was discussed, I heard the opinion expressed that we should have in Canada a double electorate, one for the Dominion House of Commons, which would decide national issues, so to speak, and another to dispose of local matters. In my estimation, nothing would be more detrimental to the unity of our country. We have already too many divisions, and it would be most inadvisable to create another. Moreover, the constitution does not contemplate anything of the kind. The constitution contemplates that there should be a Dominion Legislature, and provincial legislatures representing the same electoral body. In one legislature certain classes of questions are to be determined; in the other domestic questions are to be determined; but it is not one electorate to deal with certain questions and another electorate to deal with other questions; it is the same electorate to dispose of the different classes of questions, one class being assigned to one legislature and the other being assigned to the other legislature, and it is in this view that I think we must persevere. Up to the present I believe nothing but the best effect can result from having the same electorate determine all questions, great or small, which come before it. I would for my part depreciate it extremely if we were to say to one class of the people of this country: You are good enough; we can make you British subjects, but we will not give you the privilege of British subjects. In my judgment nothing could be more detrimental to the future of Canada than that. I throw out this suggestion en passant. I hope the question will not come before the House; but on the present occasion, it is sufficient to suggest that if there be any doubt at all, the law should be amended so as to put it beyond doubt that in all the provinces of the Dominion in which women have the franchise in provincial matters, they should have the right to exercise the franchise not only in provincial matters but in Dominion matters.

[Sir Wilfrid Laurier.]

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Mr. Speaker, if I may deal for a few moments with some of the contentions which my right hon. friend has advanced, I will then proceed to the general question which was discussed at some length by the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley). My right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) in his opening remarks, said that whether or not women should have the same right as men, they certainly should not have greater rights. I do not quite understand the significance of that remark, because if the franchise should be extended to women in all the provinces of Canada, they would not be exercising any greater rights than the men; they would be exercising precisely the same rights by having a voice in the selection of members of this House. My right hon. friend also alluded to the fact that the constitution of the United States is different from our own in this respect: that this Parliament has complete and absolute power in the determination of the electorate which shall select its members, whereas in the case of the United States Congress the electorate is determined by the law of each State. I do not know whether my right hon. friend intended to suggest by that that although our constitution gives to this Parliament greater powers in that respect than that enjoyed by Congress, we should nevertheless follow the principle embodied in the constitution of the United States rather than that embodied in our own constitution. If my right hon. friend intended to suggest that, I for one would not be inclined to agree with him. He also alluded to the fact that in the British North America Act there is to be found a provision which says that, until the Parliament of Canada otherwise legislates, the qualifications of electors shall be those which were in force in the several provinces at the time of Confederation as amended from time to time by the provincial legislatures. Provisions of a similar nature with regard to other subjects are to be found in the British North America Act; provisions of a similar nature are to be found in the Constitutional Acts of Saskatchewan and Alberta. The purpose of those provisions is perfectly obvious; it was to prevent any hiatus during the period which must intervene before the newly-created legislature could exercise its functions. That and nothing more, so far as I understand, was the purpose of those provisions.

In answer to the Minister of Justice my right hon. friend took the ground that sections 10 and 32 of the Dominion Elections Act make it perfectly clear that the view put forward by my hon. friend from St. John is the correct view and that the opinion given by the Minister of Justice is inaccurate for the reasons stated. My right hon. friend said somewhat definitely and distinctly that women were clearly in contemplation when the Dominion Elections Act was passed, and he cited those two sections which I will take the liberty of reading again. Section 10 says:

> The qualifications necessary to entitle any person to vote at a Dominion election in any province shall, except as herein otherwise provided, be those established by the laws of that province as necessary to entitle such person to vote in the same part of the province at a provincial election.

When my right hon. friend bases an argument upon that, he begs the question, because the question raised by the Minister of Justice was as to the meaning of the word "person." If the argument of the Minister of Justice is correct in that respect, then the view put forward by my right hon. friend falls to the ground, because it comes back to the meaning of the word "person" as used in the Statute; and when he bases upon section 10 the view that qualifications are to be established by the province in respect of women as well as men and that the qualifications so established shall be binding upon this Parliament until it otherwise legislates, he leaves entirely out of view the fact that all that argument depends upon the meaning which you are to give to the word "person" as used in that section.

Then he alludes also to section 32, and he founds an argument upon the fact that in that section the expression "every male person" is used. It can hardly have been within the contemplation of Parliament, when this legislation was passed, that women should be entitled to vote in one part of the country and should not be entitled to vote in another part. It seems to me that the argument which my right hon. friend conceives to be in his favour is entirely against him, because it is abundantly evident from this statute that no such distinction as that which my right hon. friend seeks to draw was ever intended. The use of the words "every male person" in section 32 strengthens rather than weakens the argument of the Minister of Justice with regard to the word "person." It cannot have been in contemplation by the Parliament of Canada in enacting this legislation that if provincial legislation in Ontario or British Columbia should grant the franchise to women, they should become entitled to vote at federal elections, whereas, if the provincial legislatures of Saskatchewan and Alberta should do the same thing, the women there should not be entitled to the franchise, in both cases it being presumed that no further legislation had been enacted by this Parliament. I venture to think that the argument advanced by my right hon. friend in that regard is not an argument in his favour, but is an argument in favour of the view put forward by the Minister of Justice.

My right hon. friend seems to be under the impression, as the hon. member for St. John also seemed to be, that we have adopted absolutely the qualifications established in the several provinces of Canada. I would like to point out that we have done nothing of the kind. We have accepted their qualifications for the time being, and in accepting those qualifications, we have been acting under the provisions of the British North America Act. We have simply taken for the time being the qualifications established by the provincial legislatures, but we have not taken them in their entirety, because section 11 makes this provision:

> No person possessed of the qualifications generally required by the provincial law to entitle him to vote at a provincial election shall be disqualified from voting at a Dominion election merely by reason of any provision of the provincial law disqualifying him from having his name on the list or from voting,—
>
> (a) the holder of any office; or,
>
> (b) any person employed in any capacity in the public service of Canada or of the province; or,
>
> (c) any person belonging to or engaged in any profession, calling, employment or occupation; or,
>
> (d) any one belonging to any other class of persons who, although possessed of the qualification generally required by the provincial law, are, by such law, declared to be disqualified by reason of belonging to such class.

My right hon. friend says that this ought to be a matter for local consideration and determination in every instance. The legislation which he brought down in this Parliament and which was enacted lays down a different principle altogether. It declares that notwithstanding the determination of a provincial legislature, certain persons shall have the right to vote although the provincial legislature declares they shall not enjoy that right. This Parliament, in dealing with the question, looked at it from a broad federal standpoint, and not from a provincial standpoint alone. It accepted the qualifications established by provincial legislatures with certain exceptions, which I have just read, and as to those exceptions it said that the will of this Parliament should prevail and not the will of the provincial legislature.

But I do not stop there. I have dealt with a portion of this enactment, which says that certain disqualifications which may from time to time be enacted by a provincial legislature shall not prevail so far as the right to vote for members of this House is concerned. I can turn to another section and show, as was pointed out this afternoon by the Minister of Justice, that certain persons whose names may appear on the provincial list shall nevertheless not be qualified to vote at elections of members of this House. I allude to Section 67, which declares:

67. The following persons shall be disqualified and incompetent to vote at any election:—

(a) the judges of every court whose appointment rests with the Governor in Council;

(b) Persons disfranchised for corrupt practices under this Act;

(c) Persons disfranchised under the Disfranchising Act;

(d) Any person who at the time of an election is a prisoner in a gaol or prison undergoing punishment for a criminal offence, or is a patient in a lunatic asylum, or is maintained in whole or in part as an inmate receiving charitable support or care in a municipal poor house or house of industry, or is an inmate receiving charitable support in any institution receiving aid from the government of the province under any statute in that behalf.

Then follows a provision disqualifying any person who hires a horse, cab, or other conveyance to carry voters to the polls. So that even in the legislation alluded to the provincial enactments have not been followed precisely. Certain exceptions have been made by which persons disqualified under provincial enactments are permitted to vote at elections of members of this House. There are also certain disqualifications which prevent persons whose names appear on provincial lists from voting at a Dominion election.

To come more particularly to the general question, my hon. friend the member for St. John has paid a very glowing tribute to the women of Canada for all that they have contributed to the national effort in this war, and I am sure that all of us will agree with the very eloquent expression of appreciation which fell from his lips. He followed that up by saying that this service to the state made it abundantly clear that the women of Canada were entitled to a voice in the government of the country. But after making those eloquent references he followed with the somewhat lame and impotent conclusion that we should not give them the franchise for this Parliament unless their province had given them the franchise for provincial purposes. Now, if the principle which my hon. friend laid down is a good one, it seems to me that by no means does it lead to the conclusion at which he ultimately arrived, and I was very greatly surprised that a gentleman of his great legal acumen and thoroughly logical mind should have followed up such a premise with such a conclusion. So far as that is concerned, if the franchise should be granted to the women of Canada, I would not put forward the view that it is to be given to them as a reward for service. Their service has been given from the heart, from a sense of duty, from devotion to their country and to the cause which it represents. They gave that service with no idea of seeking any such reward as this, or any reward at all; they gave it from a sense of duty. I would put forward their claim to a voice in the government of this country because in the great national emergency which confronts us at this time, and which involves not only the effort of the men fighting at the front, but the whole national effort of the country from men and women alike, they have showed themselves worthy to take a part in the government of this country, and they have thereby made abundantly clear what I believe was clear before, their right to a voice in the government of the country in which they live.

My hon. friend from St. John has alluded to the experience of other countries. We have the experience of other countries, of Australia and New Zealand, for instance. The right hon. gentleman himself stated that the result of granting the franchise to the women of Australia and New Zealand had, as he believed, been satisfactory; I myself have never heard anything to the contrary. He took the point that this is more or less a matter of local concern, a matter on which public opinion is slowly being educated, and he seemed to apprehend grave consequences from the granting of the franchise to women in those portions of our country where the question of their right has not been greatly agitated. I do not appreciate the force of that view. My right hon. friend spoke of the peace, order and good government of Canada. What disorder, what injurious results are to be apprehended from giving to the women of Canada the right to exercise their franchise? It does not appear to me that there is any grave danger of public disorder if we should give to the women of every province of Canada the right to vote in federal elections. I know that a great many reasons, more than I would venture to recall to-night, have been put forward against any such proposal. The inability of women to bear arms in defence of their country, the supposed loosening of family ties, the view that it is the head of the family who should represent it, the danger of emotional legislation—all these and many other considerations have been put forward against the view that women should be given the vote. But for my part, I do not think that any serious danger is to be apprehended on any such score. If we should deny the right to vote to all those incapable of bearing arms in defence of the country, we should cut out a great many men, even men of military age. But no one would pretend for a moment that any such principle as that should be followed. And so I think, with regard to all these considerations I have mentioned and which come to my attention at the moment, they might safely be disregarded. More than that, in the English-speaking countries and communities of this Empire, which enjoy democratic institutions, I believe there is an irresistible tendency to give to the womanhood of the Empire the right to have an adequate voice in government, and I believe that that tendency will act with increasing force until all the women of the Empire shall have the right to vote in the selection of those who are to represent them in the Parliaments of the nation and the Empire.

In this country we have a very peculiar position. The Parliament of Canada has seen fit, in the exercise of its complete and absolute power over this subject, to say that for the time being the qualifications which are established in the various provinces shall govern in Dominion elections. Five provinces of Canada have given the franchise to women in provincial elections. I shall not go further into the question as to whether women have the right for that reason to vote in Federal elections, because that has been dealt with by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty) whose view on that point must be accepted by the Government.

The question then comes before this Parliament as to what is to be the situation in the future. Are we, as suggested by hon. gentlemen on the other side, to make any necessary legislative provision that the women of those provinces, but not in any other province of Canada, shall be entitled to vote at Federal elections, or shall we say that in dealing with questions of this character we ought to act upon some principle, and not commit ourselves blindly to follow what may be the popular opinion in any particular province at any particular time? I do not know how far my hon. friends opposite who have spoken would go in that direction. If Manitoba or British Columbia should repeal the enactment granting the franchise to women, should this Parliament immediately follow suit and deprive them of the right to vote in Federal elections?

Mr. PUGSLEY: No danger of their ever going back.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Are we to surrender our conscience and our opinions entirely to the dictates of the provincial legislatures in this regard? We have not done so in the enactment already quoted, because there is a distinct provision in one of the sections that no person shall be disqualified by:

> —belonging to any class of persons who, although possessed of the qualifications generally required by the provincial law, are, by such laws, declared to be disqualified by reason of their belonging to that class.

I venture to say that this question is one that must be dealt with on the basis of principle, and not on the basis of surrendering our views absolutely to the dictates of any provincial legislature. It has been considered convenient, and it may be convenient so long as the qualifications established generally in the various provincial legislatures concur with the view entertained by this House, to leave these matters subject to our supervision from time to time, to be determined in that way. I do not say that this has always been the view of my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) —for I remember very well that in 1907 he brought in a Bill which made provision for disregarding the voters' lists in the province of Manitoba and the northern part of the province of Ontario. He proposed to depart from that local view which he now advocates so strongly, by providing that the lists prepared in Manitoba should not be taken into account in the Federal elections, but that absolutely new lists prepared by officers under his direction should be the lists in Manitoba for Federal elections. And so with regard to the unorganized districts in northern Ontario. He was not content to accept the local view at that time, but desired that the broad Federal view should be taken with regard to these districts. So I am not sure that the local idea is as firmly embedded in the right hon. gentleman's mind as he thinks it is.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: The local idea then was in the mind of my right hon. friend (Sir Robert Borden). He may have changed since.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I took the ground very deliberately, and I repeat it now, that if the provincial lists were to be accepted in all other provinces of Canada there was no reason why they should be disregarded in Manitoba and the northern part of Ontario. I do not think any good reason was ever advanced by my right hon. friend for taking that course, and eventually, after a very protracted fight, he withdrew his proposal so far as Manitoba was concerned, and accepted certain modifications, so far as northern Ontario was concerned.

I entirely agree that this question of enfranchising women is one that ought to engage the serious attention of Parliament. I am not going to commit myself with regard to the necessity or desirability of a Dominion franchise. I hope no such act may be necessary. I do not say that it may not become necessary. I have not brought forward any measure since we have been in power, to interfere with the Act of 1908; we are content to leave matters as they are. But I do think that the question now under debate is a very important one, and one that ought to engage the attention of Parliament before any appeal is made to the country. I entirely agree with that, but I am not quite satisfied with the terms of the resolution which my hon. friend from South Oxford (Mr. Sutherland) has proposed. His resolution is in these words:

> That, in the opinion of this House, the question of extending the franchise to women should engage the attention of the Government at the present session.

All questions as to the electorate which shall elect the members of this House are peculiarly questions for Parliament itself. The legislation in such matters is generally, and naturally, introduced by the Government of the day but it is a question in which Parliament itself is primarily concerned. I would therefore suggest the following amendment which will be an amendment to the original motion, if the amending motion proposed by my hon. friend from St. John should be declared out of order, or, if it is declared to be in order, it will be an amendment to his amendment:

> That all the words after the word "that" in the proposed motion be omitted to the end thereof and the following substituted therefor:
> In the opinion of this House the question of extending the franchise to women should engage the attention of Parliament before an appeal to the people is made.

I do not think there can be any question as to the propriety of that resolution whether the view which has been put forward by my hon. friends on the other side of the House, or the view which has been put forward by this side of the House, should be accepted. In either case it is abundantly clear that the subject should engage the attention of Parliament and I think it should engage the attention of Parliament so that the legislation which Parliament in its wisdom may see fit to enact should go into force before any general election is held. I therefore leave the matter at that with this motion which I propose either in amendment to the original motion or in amendment to that proposed by my hon. friend from St. John depending upon the decision that you may give, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. SPEAKER: This amendment having been submitted by the right hon. the senior member for Halifax (Sir Robert Borden), it becomes necessary to give a decision upon the amendment submitted by the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley). I indicated this afternoon that in my judgment, for reasons then given, the amendment of the hon. member was not in order, and having taken some time to reflect upon the matter, I see no reason to change my mind. Therefore, for the reasons indicated, in my opinion, the amendment of the hon. member (Mr. Pugsley) is not in order and the right hon. member (Sir Robert Borden) is in order in submitting this amendment to the House as an amendment to the original motion.

Mr. W. M. GERMAN (Welland): Mr. Speaker, in view of your ruling, I am not quite sure whether or not it would be in order to discuss the questions which have been discussed during the afternoon and so far this evening. I might encroach upon the time of the House, with your permission, to say a few words on the line of the discussion as it has taken place so far. The right hon. the Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden) has moved an amendment to the motion of the hon. member for South Oxford (Mr. Sutherland) which it seems to me is rather meaningless, with all due deference to the right hon. gentleman. The original motion is that the question of female, or woman, suffrage should receive the attention of the Government. The amendment of the right hon. gentleman is that the question of female suffrage should receive the attention of Parliament before the next general election. If it is to receive the attention of Parliament before the next general election, I apprehend it should receive the attention of Parliament now because it is very questionable to my mind as to whether or not there will be another session of this Parliament. Now is the accepted time, in my opinion. However, I did not rise to discuss that phase of the situation but I wish to say that if the legal opinion expressed by the hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty) this afternoon and to-night is good law, it will come with a great degree of astonishment to the people of Ontario. The legislature of Ontario at the last session passed an Act giving votes to women. If the opinion expressed by the Minister of Justice is correct, those women will not have a vote for members of the House of Commons in the Dominion elections. The right hon. the Prime Minister rather skated around that proposition quietly and easily and I am not surprised because I understand—I have been told—it may be incorrect—that he stated to a delegation of, perhaps, not suffragettes, but ladies who were interested in securing votes, that they must go to the provincial legislatures. Consequently his opinion was not in accordance with that of the Minister of Justice. But I can easily understand that the Prime Minister, in speaking to a delegation of ladies, might not depend altogether on his legal acumen to endeavour to placate their peculiarities. The Minister of Justice has cited some authorities in support of the contention that he made. But how any one could hold that a person legally entitled to vote in a provincial election, barring the exceptions and disqualifications which are made by statute, cannot vote for a member of the Dominion Parliament, I cannot understand. This is section 6 of the Dominion Elections Act:

> For the purposes of any Dominion election held within the limits of a province, the voters' lists shall, except as herein otherwise provided, be those prepared for the several polling divisions established, and which, on the sixtieth day next preceding the day fixed for the nomination of candidates for such Dominion election, were in force, or were last in force, under the laws of the province, for the purposes of provincial elections.

The provincial voters' list is the list that is to be used for the purpose of the election.

I quite agree with the Minister of Justice that that only pertains to the voters lists, and that on that list there may be names of men who are not entitled to vote, who are disqualified by statute, because the Dominion Elections Act itself suggests who are disqualified:

> The following persons shall be disqualified as incompetent to vote at an election.

Those are disqualified by Act of Parliament. There are certain persons disqualified by Act of the legislature who cannot vote. But women are not disqualified by Act of Parliament or by Act of the legislature. Then what is the qualification for a Dominion election?

> The qualification necessary to entitle any person to vote at a Dominion election in any province shall, except as herein otherwise provided,— "Herein otherwise provided" refers to the disqualifications mentioned in this Act.

> Except as herein otherwise provided, be those established by the laws of that province as necessary to entitle such person to vote in the same part of the province at a Provincial election.

The provincial legislature has the right to say who shall be entitled to vote, and their names are on the voters' lists. Those lists are adopted by the Dominion Parliament, whether properly or improperly it is not necessary to say now, nor is it necessary to decide whether there should be a Dominion Franchise Act or not. The question that we have to discuss now is, are the women who have been enfranchised by the provincial legislature of the province of Ontario entitled to vote at a Dominion election. I say most emphatically that they are, and if they are not, then I say to the right hon. the Prime Minister of this country (Sir Robert Borden) that he must not wait, so far as the province of Ontario is concerned, for a further discussion of this matter, but must make it emphatic by legislation at this session of Parliament that these women are entitled to vote, because that is the intention of the people of Ontario, whether it is right or whether it is wrong. I am not saying—whether I am in favour of women suffrage or against women suffrage—that is another question. But the people of the province of Ontario are in favour of woman suffrage; they have by their legislature unanimously enacted that the women of the province of Ontario shall vote, not only in provincial elections, but also in Dominion elections and for Dominion candidates. If, under the law as it stands at present, those women will not be entitled to vote for Dominion candidates, then it is incumbent on this Government to make that absolutely clear during this session of Parliament, and not to wait for any other session of Parliament to discuss this question or the further question of whether we should have a Dominion Franchise Act, if it is the intention of the Government to introduce such as an Act at a later stage. That we can discuss later on. So far as the vote for women is concerned, every one admits that the intelligence of women is equal to that of men; that women have just as broad a grasp of the political situation and the business situation of the country as men have, and that, so far as intelligence goes, they are equally capable of exercising the franchise with men. The Legislature of the province of Ontario saw fit to give these women the franchise, and if there is any doubt about it, as the Minister of Justice has expressed a doubt this afternoon, then it is incumbent on this Government to remove that doubt, and to remove it at once.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Hear, hear.

Mr. GERMAN: It would be a catastrophe, to my mind, if a Dominion election should be held and in the province of Ontario a doubt should exist, as one will exist after the speech of the Minister of Justice. It did not exist before, because every one believed that women would have the right to vote. The Minister of Justice has thrown into the matter now that measure of doubt, and that measure of doubt must be removed, should be removed at any rate, and this Government should remove it. What would happen if a Dominion election was held and nothing further had been done, matters standing exactly as at present? The voters' list in the province of Ontario would be made up with the names of all the women of the province of Ontario over twenty-one years of age upon it. Those women would go to the polls and demand the right to vote; they would be told by the deputy returning officers at the different polling places: You have no right to vote, and you cannot vote because the Minister of Justice of the Dominion of Canada has announced from his place in the Parliament of Canada that it is contrary to law for you to vote. That would be a most absurd proposition. I have nothing further to say on the question than that, and it is, to my mind, sufficient to put the Government on inquiry. The women have the right to vote or they have not. It was the intention of the legislature of the province of Ontario to give them the right to vote. If, by reason of the interpretation of the law as expressed by the Minister of Justice, they have not the right to vote, then I call on the Government of the Dominion of Canada to rectify that and to give them the right to vote, and to give it to them now.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT (Calgary): Mr. Speaker, no question has more engaged the attention of Parliaments than that affecting the franchise. In England parliamentary history is filled with reminiscences, if I may use that word, of debates on the franchise in by-gone days. Whether it be the famous observation of "dishing the Whigs" by extending the franchise in one Reform Bill, or the declaration of Disraeli of that principle of household franchise which he thought would settle the whole matter, or the last Bill introduced by Harcourt for one man one vote, the franchise has always been a subject matter of much controversy and discussion. Nor has this country escaped that controversy and discussion. But it does seem to me that there are certain fundamental principles, notwithstanding what has been said here this evening, that well may guide us, that may well be kept in sight in determining how we shall decide who are to have the right to vote on national questions, or for members who shall sit in this House. There are certain fundamental matters that have been settled by statute history in this country. The first is that, when this Confederation came into existence, it was necessary to provide some franchise whereby members could be elected to this Parliament, and naturally, as in other matters, it was necessary to take the established franchise lists of the provinces that comprised Confederation. That was period number one. The second period in point of history was that period that commenced in 1885 and terminated in 1898, a period comprising some thirteen years. That was the time when we had in force a Dominion Franchise Act passed by this Parliament. During that time it was written upon the statute books that the Parliament of Canada would itself determine what should be the qualification of the electors who sent members to it. That was a Dominion franchise Act. That was an Act whereby, for national purposes, it was determined that certain men should have the qualification of electors for Parliament. The third period in our history commenced in 1898, and extends up to the present time. In that period the franchise of the provinces was adopted, but the provinces did not make the franchise whereby members were elected to this Parliament. This Parliament determined what the qualifications of an elector should be, but for the purposes of determining those qualifications it was enacted that the various qualifications in force in the provinces should obtain with relation to the election of members to this Parliament. But, unfortunately, another period intervened between 1898 and 1917. That was the period during which hon. gentlemen opposite, for reasons that seemed good and sufficient to them, introduced, in 1907, and threw into this Parliament for discussion a Bill whereby it was declared that with respect to two portions of this Dominion the principle that they had laid down in 1898 should no longer obtain and that a new principle should be introduced and followed. That Bill did not pass; it was withdrawn, except with relation to the unorganized portions of Ontario. But it is valuable to look back upon that history of 1907, because it establishes a principle for which I contend, namely, the recognition on the part of hon. gentlemen opposite of the absolute right—not only the right, but the duty—of Parliament to determine the qualifications of electors who should send representatives to this Parliament. Therefore upon that point we are on common ground. The Liberal party of 1907 enunciated a principle similar in terms to the principle enunciated by Sir John A. Macdonald in 1885, namely, that for the purposes of selecting members to represent them in the House of Commons the qualifications of electors should be determined in the Parliament in which they sat. That principle, therefore, seems to be common ground. Speaking for myself only, I desire to say that I have never for a single moment changed my view since I have been old enough to think logically on the subject, and that view is that this Parliament should fix and determine the qualifications of those who elect members to this body. I said the other evening and I desire to repeat it, that it is perfectly clear that for the purpose of selecting members to a municipal council or to a provincial legislature, it is competent for and the duty of the municipal council or the provincial legislature to fix the qualifications of its electors. Under the British North America Act, section 92, defining the powers of the provinces, the provinces are charged with responsibility with respect to matters of local interest. It is no concern of the province to deal with those matters of national import upon which must always rest the destiny and future of this nation. But with respect to the federal powers, it is only necessary to turn to section 91 of the British North America Act, where we find that this Parliament is charged with responsibility for the peace, order and good government of Canada, not in respect to one province or to another province, but in respect to all the provinces, whether it be British Columbia in the west or Nova Scotia in the east. Its legislation should be of universal application and aimed at the supreme purpose of providing for the peace, order and good government of the commonwealth. That being so, it is necessary that we should legislate for the defence of the realm, for the safety and liberty of our citizens, for the defence of their property and their rights. These are national matters, for the life of a citizen in British Columbia is just as important as the life of a citizen in New Brunswick, and property, in the broad sense of that term as used in section 91 of the British North America Act, must be the subject matter of preservation by the state just as much in the central prairie provinces as in the provinces by the sea. So that our duty is national; our obligations are Dominion-wide. That being so, I submit, Mr. Speaker, as I did the other evening, that we should lay down a principle and, in the words of Disraeli, let that principle work to the end, being confident that, having declared for the principle, in its application it will work no hardship to individuals, however much it may effect this class or that. And in seeking for a principle upon which to determine national franchise—not a provincial or a local franchise; not a municipal franchise, but a national franchise—which will effect the well-being of the State as a whole and of its citizens as a whole, I ventured the other evening to lay down a principle, which, I submit, is founded upon the common history of mankind, running through the text-books and through all literature upon the subject since civilization began to emerge from barbarism, namely, that nationals should determine national issues; that nationals should determine national existence; that nationals should fix and determine national destiny. I will not to-night repeat the classes of men whom I believed were nationals: men who were British subjects, and naturalized citizens under certain limitations. Whatever may have been the view of individuals in this House before 1914, we at least now know, having regard to the history of the United States, to the history of some parts of our own country, and to the trend of events overseas and on this continent, that there are men who have taken the oath of allegiance either in the United States or to our own Sovereign, in whom the ties of blood and nationality are so strong that in the midst of a great conflict in which the existence of the fatherland whence they came may be at stake and who, for reasons that to them seem good, but to us seemed bad, show no sympathy for and give no support to our ambitions either as a State or in connection with the war that we are carrying on. They have seen fit to indicate, sometimes clandestinely and sometimes openly, a preference for the well-being of the land from whence they came rather than a desire to support by their conduct and their purse the campaign that is being carried on by the land of their adoption. No man who reads the history of the United States during the last three years or, for that matter, who will read with me the history of my own country as I have seen it during the last three years will, for a single moment, question the fact that naturalization alone is not sufficient to constitute a man a national in the sense in which that term is used. I went further, because I pointed out—and now I have the opportunity to elaborate it—that when the Privy Council had to deal, in the Japanese case, with that point, they laid down this doctrine, that the exercise of the franchise is not a right, but a privilege conferred by the State that grants it, and far from being a right, it is a privilege of such importance that too great care cannot be exercised in its grant. Therefore, the legislation of the province of British Columbia that denied the right to the Japanese to be placed upon the register, notwithstanding the fact that he was a British subject, was upheld by the Privy Council, because, in the words of the court delivering judgment, it was felt that the legislature of the province of British Columbia must be at all times the best judge as to what would be for the interest of that province. In the same way this Parliament, speaking in the same terms for Canada as a whole, must ever be the best judge as to what is for the benefit of Canada as a whole, and not for any portion of Canada that is now called a province.

If the principle, then, for which I contend—and I submit there is a principle—be declared, then it follows that no provincial legislature can declare that principle. That principle can be declared only by this sovereign Parliament, and as that is the case, and as it is essential that a principle should be of universal application, it follows that the mere adoption by this Parliament of the ever changing franchises of nine provinces can never be regarded as an application of a principle that is sound from a national standpoint. My hon. friend from Red Deer (Mr. Michael Clark) the other evening spoke of manhood franchise, believing apparently that there was such a thing throughout Canada as a franchise law universal in its character. That is not the case; there are in Canada as many franchises for the election of members to this Parliament as there are provinces. That is unsound, because it represents no principle, and unless there be a principle of universal application there should be no law based upon it. Therefore, I say: Why should a gentleman representing a constituency in the province of British Columbia be sent here by an electorate differently composed from the electorate of a constituency in the province of Prince Edward Island which sends a representative here? That is the neat question. Should a gentleman who represents, in this Parliament, a constituency in Ontario be chosen by an electorate registered upon a register upon different qualifications from those of an electorate in a constituency in Quebec which also has the right to choose a representative? Should one who comes from the province of Alberta or Saskatchewan represent a body of electors chosen by qualifications for national purposes different from the qualifications of a body of electors in Nova Scotia who also send representatives to Parliament? That is the neat problem. What makes for the peace, order and good government of Canada as a whole? It is the laying down of a principle of universal application with reference to the selection of members of Parliament. And I contend that a gentleman who represents in this Parliament any federal constituency does not represent an inferior or a superior body of men merely because he happens to be chosen from a province where in the one case there is manhood franchise, and in the other, restricted franchise.

What have we had in the province in which I have lived for many years? In the province of Alberta since 1905 and in the province of Saskatchewan since 1905 we have had a franchise made by whom? by the legislatures of Alberta and Saskatchewan? No, by this Parliament, and once the franchise is made by this Parliament, in fulfilment of its rights under its constitution to legislate for the peace, order and good government of Canada as a whole, I say: Why should not the principle that governs with respect to Alberta and Saskatchewan, whereby in those provinces this Parliament fixes the terms and conditions under which a man shall exercise his franchise for federal purposes, be extended to every part of this Dominion? That is the principle for which I contend. It cannot, I believe, be successfully contended for a single moment by any hon. member that a principle shall have application in Alberta and Saskatchewan and at the same time find no operation in Manitoba or British Columbia. That, I submit, cannot be so, and if this Parliament was sound in the exercise of its undoubted jurisdiction in legislating as to who should vote for members to be elected in those two provinces, it is doubly true that at this moment when the great issues of life and death and the future existence of this country are at stake, it should legislate fully; it should legislate with a principle; it should legislate having regard to the conditions under which we live and in such a way as will ensure the continued existence in this Canada of ours of British institutions. That is the principle which I lay down and for which I contend. It is for that reason I submit, that this Parliament should deal with matters of federal franchise and not leave it in the way in which it is now.

We should look at this matter fairly in the light of history. There is no getting away from the history of the matter. Let us take the province of Nova Scotia. During the time that the ex-Minister of Finance was Prime Minister of Nova Scotia, he placed upon the statute books a measure whereby all Dominion civil servants could not vote.

Mr. McKENZIE: My hon. friend is absolutely wrong. That measure was on the statute books of Nova Scotia since Confederation, long before Mr. Fielding was ever heard tell of.

Mr. BENNETT: I will accept my hon. friend's statement as I am bound to do, but I desire to say that he is in error.

Mr. McKENZIE: Not at all.

Mr. BENNETT: During the regime of the Conservatives in Nova Scotia that section to which my hon. friend refers was repealed, and it was re-enacted by Mr. Fielding when he became Prime Minister. Those are the facts.

Mr. McKENZIE: No, those are certainly not the facts.

Mr. BENNETT: If my learned and honourable friend will permit me to send for the books, I shall be able to show him what the facts are.

Mr. McKENZIE: I shall be very glad if my hon. friend will do so. He cannot get away from the statute.

Mr. BENNETT: My hon. friend's memory, as he has just reminded me, extends back to pre-Confederation days. Mine does not, so I accept his statement as being more correct than mine, but I am giving the facts as I have read them.

Mr. McKENZIE: The Prime Minister is quite familiar with Nova Scotia legislation and I will leave the matter to him.

Mr. BENNETT: I am quite content that it should be left to him.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I will send for the book.

Mr. BENNETT: It matters not for my purposes, but strengthens my argument to accept the statement of my hon. friend. He says that since Confederation there was in the province of Nova Scotia an Act whereby federal civil servants were not permitted to vote in provincial elections.

Mr. McKENZIE: Certain ones—not all.

Mr. BENNETT: Certainly. Certain ones were precluded from voting, but that section has been repealed. It no longer obtains in Nova Scotia.

Mr. McKENZIE: As a member of that legislature, I introduced the Act that repealed it.

Mr. BENNETT: That is what I was advised, and the reason my hon. friend introduced that Bill repealing the section was because a Liberal Government had come into power at Ottawa, and it was after that that he did it.

Mr. McKENZIE: Evil be to him who evil thinks.

Mr. BENNETT: That being so, I should think much evil should fall on the head of my hon. friend because he evidently thought evil of civil servants voting under a Conservative Government and thought well of them voting after his friends came into power in 1896. In any case the facts are that in Nova Scotia there was a statute that precluded civil servants of a certain class from voting in provincial elections, but after the advent to power of the Liberal party in 1896, my learned and honourable friend introduced into the legislature a Bill whereby he repealed that section, there being a Liberal Government in power at Ottawa. Then what happened? In 1898 a Dominion Franchise Act was passed by this Parliament, and it specially provided that the men who could not vote in Nova Scotia because they were civil servants should be able to vote for Dominion purposes.

Mr. McKENZIE: It was repealed long before 1906.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: 1898 was the date it was passed. There you have one form of franchise in Nova Scotia, another in Prince Edward Island, another in Quebec, another in Ontario, another in British Columbia, and another in the western provinces, fixed by this Parliament, and I submit to the House that it cannot possibly be said that any principle is being applied in a case of that character. Every man who sits in this House should represent electors of the same qualifications from ocean to ocean. Every hon. gentleman who votes on national issues should be himself elected by electors of the same class. There should be no distinction, no question of one having superior or inferior qualifications with respect to the national franchise. I leave that thought with the House for its consideration.

Some reference has been made to American cases. The right hon. leader of the Opposition referred to the American constitution. As is well known, under their constitution the residuum of power rests with the State. The Jeffersonian contentions with respect to democracy found expression in the constitution of that day, and the rights of the separate states to sovereignty was recognized, and the war of secession took place because of that very fact. But here no such condition prevails. After the mistakes had been made we introduced into our federal constitution those provisions which confer upon this Parliament the jurisdiction of determining who shall be the electors and what shall be their qualifications. If that principle which I have enunciated should prevail, we then come to the further question of the right of women to a place upon the register. That involves an extension of the franchise very greatly over what now obtains. The old Mosaic doctrine with respect to man and wife, that they two shall be one, is to be set aside. We have learned much and travelled far in the last five hundred years. I have never been one of those who believed that the granting of the franchise to women would be a panacea for all our ills. I have never been one of those who believed that domestic relations would be improved; I have never believed that. But I am always willing to learn by the march of events. The principle on which such men as Lord Crewe and Lord Curzon opposed the granting of the franchise to women was this: that in the ultimate analysis every unit in the state must, if needs be, be called upon to defend the state, its liberties and its existence. Women could not be called upon for that purpose, and therefore they should not determine the national destiny of the state; that was the old argument. Let us look at the question now in the light of recent events. If this war has taught us one thing more than another it is this: that for the preservation of the life of the state and the liberties of its people it is essential that every unit in the state, men and women alike, should give some service to the state, and it has further been made clear to us that the victory which we believe will come to our arms by reason of the exertions of our valiant men on sea and land is not achieved by fighting alone, but also by the service that may be rendered by those who stay at home. In this great war it has been the privilege of women to sacrifice and suffer and serve, and no page in all our national history will record a finer story of heroic devotion to a great principle, of more willing sacrifices, or more splendid service, than the page that will record in undying terms what our women have done for this country and this Empire since the war came upon us. That I concede to be absolutely certain. Their duty it has been to remain behind and keep the home fires burning while those whom they held most dear have gone forth with their blessing to the battlefield, and many of them have offered up their lives a willing sacrifice for the preservation of our country, of its rights and liberties. They have worked in munitions factories, in Red Cross work, in every avenue of industrial activity and in every form of patriotic work, and it is to them in no small measure that we are indebted that our armies are maintained on the battlefield and our sailors upon the sea. They have taken their place and are discharging their full duties with respect to service, in the large and broad sense of that word. They have shown that they are essential to the well-being, safety and existence of the state. So the old argument fails, and the women take their place side by side with the male population, as being entitled to exercise the highest rights and the highest functions of citizenship, namely, that of selecting their representatives in Parliament, who in turn must determine the destiny of the country.

But because that is so, it does not follow that the franchise should be extended without restrictions or restraints. The Local Council of Women in the constituency which I have the honour to represent in this House, have been giving this matter very great consideration and attention, and recently they favoured me with the views they had arrived at after mature consideration. The following are the suggestions of the Local Council of Women, Calgary:

1. That votes of men of alien enemy birth be withheld during the period of the war and for five years after its close and in granting the Federal Franchise to women the same restrictions to apply to them.

2. From now on, to qualify for the federal franchise an educational test be applied to both men and women of alien birth.

(a) That they must be able to read and speak English.

(b) And five years residence be required.

Those are the views of thoughtful and intelligent women representing those who have sent their husbands and sons to fight at the front, many of whom have already died in Europe. Their view is that in the exercise of the franchise, restrictions should be imposed of the character I have mentioned. They realize that there are problems of amazing difficulty in connection with granting the franchise to the women of this country; problems, for instance, with relation to the status of the wife, of the change of her nationality by marriage, of the woman who marries one of alien birth, and many other problems all of which are complex in character and must be carefully thought out. They are prepared and anxious to accept the responsibilities which the granting of the franchise would impose, but only upon condition that there be some restrictions in the granting of it. Therefore, I submit that it is the duty of this House to recognize at once that by reason of intelligence and training, by reason of their sense of responsibility, and of their ability to discharge great and useful and essential service to the state in time of national peril, the women should be enfranchised. What limitations should be imposed upon it, it is not for me to suggest. It is not for me to say whether the limitations imposed in England should be followed here. I do not undertake to deal with matters of that kind to-night. But I do submit that by reason of the experience of other states, and the light of knowledge we have obtained especially during the war, we must be satisfied now that women should exercise the franchise with respect to national matters and the selection of members to represent Canadians in this House.

That is all I have to say. I do submit, in conclusion, that nothing is more clearly established than that we should have one guiding principle in connection with determining who shall select representatives to sit in this Parliament, and that in the application of that principle no difference should be made between men and women.

Mr. W. A. BUCHANAN (Medicine Hat): I am not going to discuss this question from a legal or constitutional standpoint; I am not a lawyer, or the son of a lawyer, or the brother of a lawyer. But I believe in giving votes to women. I believe that the women of Alberta should have a vote in provincial affairs, but I believe also that they and all other women throughout the Dominion should equally have the vote in both provincial and Dominion affairs. I think they have won the right to it since this war commenced at any rate—though I was a believer in and advocate of woman suffrage prior to the war. I entirely agree with the view expressed by the hon. member for Calgary (Mr. Bennett). The sacrifices made by women throughout the length and breadth of this country since the war commenced have been rightly commented upon by the hon. member. The other day we were discussing a resolution declaring that every one who has gone to participate in this war as a soldier should be given the vote. I agree with that entirely, and I agree also that the women who have made such great sacrifices, who have given their sons and husbands to the country in this critical time, should have the right to participate in the solution of the problems which the country will face at the conclusion of the war. I say without hesitation that the women should be given the vote immediately. I am satisfied that in my own province, as the result of the franchise being given to women, public life will be improved and elevated. This being true of the provinces, let us give the women the franchise in the Dominion elections, from British Columbia east to the Maritime Provinces. I have no constitutional reasons, no legal arguments to offer. I am simply in favour of women suffrage throughout the Dominion because I believe that the women have earned the right to the franchise since the war commenced.

Mr. D. D. McKENZIE (North Cape Breton): I had not intended to say anything upon this question, but having heard the learned and eloquent address of the hon. member for Calgary (Mr. Bennett) I think some explanation is called for from myself as to the way in which I understand some of the principles to which he has referred. I do not think he is going to carry out in practice the broad principles which he chooses to lay down to-night. He said early in his speech that every representative body should have the full say as to the qualifications of those who shall elect its members. On that principle every municipal council must have the right to create the franchise under which its members shall be voted for, and the same is true of every school board. I do not think the principle laid down by the hon. gentleman could be carried out successfully. I think the hon. gentleman forgets that the same voters are represented in the municipal council, the local legislature, and this Parliament. It is the same conscience, the same intellect, the same power in each case. That being so, why should not the man who is qualified to vote for members of the municipal council or for members of the legislature be qualified to vote for members of this House as well? Why should there be separate enactments in these cases? For the last twenty years the present Franchise Act has worked successfully from the Atlantic to the Pacific, and no one has any quarrel with it so far as I know. I would ask the hon. member for Calgary whom would he suggest as proper parties to be left off the list? Would he suggest the man who has no property of his own? Would he suggest the man who lives with his parents and who has no separate property upon which to qualify? Will anybody stand up in this House and say that there is any person left off the list by their province who should be put on, or put on who should be left off?

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: Yes, all those who own a dual allegiance and are under military obligations to an enemy state should be left off.

Mr. McKENZIE: That is a state of things that is not known in this country, so far as I am aware.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Are not there aliens fighting for Canada in the trenches who owe a double allegiance?

Mr. BENNETT: They have lost that by reason of their fighting. That is the point I made the other evening.

Mr. McKENZIE: That is a condition of things which, so far as I know, does not exist in this country. It may exist in the mind of my hon. friend from Calgary, and he may have evidence to back it up. But if there is any person who has been put on the list who is engaged in some traitorous conspiracy against the King and against the country he should be disfranchised, and the sooner we deal with such cases the better. No person who is an enemy of the state should exercise any right in the management of the state. But, so far as we know, there are no such people in Canada. The hon. gentleman says that under the law passed in 1898 this Parliament made a fixture of the franchise.

I must say to my hon. friend that if we intended to do that we carried it out very poorly. The franchise has been extended in different provinces. Men were given the right to get their names on the lists and vote since 1998 who had not that right at that time. But, if it was the intention to make a fixed qualification, we did not follow it up at all. I submit to you, Mr. Speaker, and to my hon. friend from Calgary that it is impossible to create a population in a country which is varied in geographical conditions and otherwise, such as this Dominion is, that will appear like a handful of ten cent pieces and that will think, vote and do everything the same. If such were the case my hon. friend would not have a seat in this House. He would find himself in the same position as the Irishman who was riding with the judge. The judge said to him: You would be a long time in Ireland before you would ride with a judge, and the Irishman replied: You would be a long time in Ireland before you would be a judge. If my hon. friend were down in Nova Scotia, or if he were in other parts of the country, and attempted to make conditions uniform, he would make it absolutely impossible for himself to get here at all. But, he lives in a country where different conditions exist and he worthily represents the views that prevail in that part of the country. I do not think it is well to try and get universality. I think we should try to live and let live and get along as well as we can according to our ideas of things.

What I particularly rose for was to remind the Prime Minister and the hon. gentleman that those broad, sound, Rock-of-Gibraltar principles which were put forward tonight were not always the same with them. My hon. friend from Welland (Mr. German) has pointed out to the Prime Minister that when his office was besieged not very long ago by an armed force of suffragettes, he escaped by just telling them that he had no responsibility in the matter, he had no jurisdiction and that they would have to go to the place where power lay, that is to the provinces. If that be true, and he did not deny it and therefore we have to take it for granted that it is true, then he did not think at that time as he does to-night when he says that we should take the matter up and give the women the franchise. He says that we have the power, the universal jurisdiction, that we should take cognizance of the question, and that we should carry out what we think right. In that connection I wish to remind the hon. gentleman that only in the session of 1916 an Act came up in this House, chapter 19 of the Acts of 1916, "in aid of provincial legislation prohibiting or restricting the sale or use of intoxicating liquor." The Liberals, sitting on this side of the House, and I think Conservatives, wanted to make that law universal all over the country. I forget exactly what the right hon. the Prime Minister said but I presume his remarks were in conformity with the ideas of other hon. gentlemen on that side of the House who said that we should not force our will upon any province which had not prohibition, that we would apply the law to any province in which there was prohibition but that in any province in which they had not passed prohibition, we would leave it to the sovereign sway of the legislature and the people of that province. That was the gospel then, that was the principle last year, but this year hon. gentlemen say we will give the franchise to women whether the provinces grant it or not. Where is the principle there? The principle is the same. If the will of the province as expressed by the legislature is to be recognized in regard to temperance, which, I submit, is just as important a question, if not more so, and a more practical question than the question of granting the franchise to women at the present time and during the stress of war, why should not that same rule apply in this case? If hon. gentlemen took the ground a year ago that they would recognize the will, for instance, of the provinces of Quebec and British Columbia, and would not impose this law upon them, how can they say that they will take no stock at all in what the different provinces may think with regard to the franchise? I merely point this out to show that there is an inconsistency in laying down one principle and then, afterwards, as soon as circumstances and conditions change and there is a prospect of getting some votes, abandoning that principle and adopting a new one to suit the circumstances as they appear.

I do not intend to say anything about the right of women to vote, because it was only to answer these points of the Prime Minister and the hon. member for Calgary that I got up. If I would have any objection at all to giving votes to women it would be because of the high and sacred regard which I have for the place occupied by women in this country. There are sacred things in this country, there are sacred things about the home, there are sacred things about institutions in connection with which we have been brought up from our childhood. The place of the mother in the home, the quiet restfulness of the home, the home to which the man returns from his work and in which he is received into the bosom of his family, the place which the mother and the wife occupy in the home, are very sacred and very high. If I would have any trepidation at all about disturbing these conditions, it would be that I fear that the pulling, or dragging of women away from the sacred precincts of the home and from that high and lofty position which she holds in our estimation to-day would not perhaps produce the results that the advocates of woman suffrage hope for. It might result in the neglect of that high position which the mother, the sister and the daughter occupy and the general effect on the country might be different from that which we would expect. I am not expressing any opinion. I am not prepared to do so, but if I would have any fear at all about granting the franchise to the mothers, the sisters and the women of the country generally, it would be the fear that the present high and sacred position which they occupy should be invaded, coupled with the reflection that we have really nothing to take the place of the home. These are the only questions that appeal to me. As to what has been discussed by the Minister of Justice and the hon. member for St. John I do not wish to offer any opinion.

Mr. J. G. TURRIFF (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I shall only occupy a very few minutes of the time of the House. As to the legal arguments that we heard this afternoon from the hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty), if he had anything clear in his mind, or if he was able to make anything clear to the other legal lights in this House, he certainly was not able to make anything clear to the ordinary layman because when the hon. member was through it seemed to me that the matter was more muddled up than it was when he started. However, not being a member of the legal profession myself, I am probably not competent to pass judgment on a matter of that kind. The few remarks that I have to make will be altogether aside from the legal end of the argument. In the province from which I come women have been given the vote for the legislature. That was the first province in the Dominion to grant the right of voting to women. The women, and the men too, in Saskatchewan are very anxious that the women should be given a vote for members of the Dominion House. That can be accomplished, as I understand the matter, only by an amendment to the Dominion Elections Act that is in force so far as the elections in the provinces of Saskatchewan and Alberta are concerned. By a very sligh amendment, women can be given the vote in those provinces. But it does not seem to me that it is the intention of the Prime Minister to give women a vote at the present time. This is the resolution that we are discussing; proposed by Mr. Sutherland, the member for South Oxford.

That, in the opinion of this House, the question of extending the franchise to women should engage the attention of the Government at the present session.

My right hon. friend the Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden) moves an amendment to this motion exactly in the same words until you come down to the words "the present session," and my right hon. friend then suggests that it should read "prior to an appeal to the country." Nobody in this House, or in this country, knows any better than my right hon. friend that the term of this Parliament ends on the 7th day of October next, within six months; so that if my right hon. friend wants or intends to give votes to the women, either of the provinces that have given the local franchise to women or to the women of all Canada, he must take action at this session; if he is going to accomplish anything action should be taken now. But my right hon. friend seems to be taking a very quiet, smooth way of doing the women of Canada out of a vote for the next Dominion election. That is how his attitude looks to me; I cannot take any other view of it. If that is not a correct view, perhaps my right hon. friend or somebody else on that side of the House will explain.

Just a word as to what the hon. member for Calgary (Mr. R. B. Bennett) said about restricting the franchise. I should like to ask him what he would do in the case of an alien, a man from an enemy country, Austria, Germany, or Turkey, who came to Canada years ago, settled here, became a British subject and brought out his young sons with him. These sons have since grown up and have, perhaps, gone to the front to defend Canada and now lie buried in France and Flanders. Is my hon. friend from Calgary going to take the franchise from that British subject, the father of those boys who have sacrificed their lives to maintain the British Empire and to maintain Canada? Why, the matter is too absurd to be considered. We have heard interminable talk about cultivating a strong national sentiment. Are you going to cultivate a strong national sentiment in Canada by disfranchising the fathers of men who have gone to the front to fight for you? Is that going to build up a British sentiment? To my mind it is absolutely absurd.

Then the hon. member for Calgary talks about an educational qualification. He should have consulted the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Rogers). My hon. friend the Minister of Public Works had a hand in applying an educational test in Manitoba when he was a minister in that province; but he repealed that legislation very shortly after he had put it into force. If my right hon. friend the Prime Minister should adopt the same course he would be compelled, if he should be in power to do it, to repeal the legislation before it went very far. That is not the way to cultivate a good British sentiment, and no one knows it better than the Minister of Public Works, because they had to repeal their Act in the province of Manitoba. It certainly looks to me, and I am sorry to have to say it, as if my right hon. friend the Prime Minister is taking a very smooth way of getting out of giving votes to the women.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, I hope I shall follow the example of my hon. friend from Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff) and not detain the House very long at this late period. I intervene, however, to say that this debate has been a genuine surprise to myself. I have been engaged in some capacity or other in helping in extensions of the franchise all my life; and I was engaged in that process of enfranchisement under the name of Liberal. So, you can understand my surprise when I find in a debate like this a party which is called the Conservative party standing for a general measure of enfranchisement all over the Dominion of Canada; and a party which is called Liberal, apparently rather anxious to restrict this extension of the franchise. It simply shows that it is possible for men to betray the qualities with which the names of the parties to which they belong have usually been associated in history. Take my hon. friend from Cape Breton (Mr. McKenzie) who has just spoken. I never heard a better old-fashioned Tory speech in my life than he has just given. Why, he says, we have had this franchise for twenty years, how can you improve it? Well, that was just the kind of argument that was put up in Great Britain against every proposed extension of the franchise there, the old fashioned Tories of Great Britain always said that—

Mr. McKENZIE: I must say that my hon. friend misunderstood me. I was referring to the method of preparing the lists, or getting the names on the lists, not to the question of who should go on the lists; and if my hon. friend understood me as saying that I did not wish to extend the franchise any further, I must say that he did not understand what I meant. I was referring to the machinery by which the lists were prepared.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: I must protest. I think I understood my hon. friend well enough. He may not like my description of him, but he said that something that was good for twenty years was good enough for now, and I challenge that statement—he does not deny that.

Mr. McKENZIE: He does deny it. He said the machinery for preparing the lists was good enough for twenty years, and if my hon. friend wishes to misunderstand that, he can do so.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: My hon. friend gets up and repeats what I said, and says if I misunderstood what he said I can do so. I leave it at that. I thought he was betraying a Conservative frame of mind, because almost in the next sentence he went on to jibe the Prime Minister because he did not hold the same view to-day as he held twenty years ago. That was another betrayal of a Conservative frame of mind. We have seen changes in the views of public men in England. Mr. Asquith was a determined opponent of woman suffrage until a few years ago. The stolid and strong Englishman that he is, he did not give way to intimidation and violence of the worst kind. But other things have arisen in the history of the world. This war has revealed a new side of the question to him, and he has changed his views. I do not know that I have any brief to defend the Prime Minister in this way, because there is no real inconsistency in arguing that so long as this is a provincial matter it should be done by the provinces. But when you are dealing with an anomaly created by an extension of the franchise in certain provinces which has not been made in others, you are brought up against the question of whether or not you will have a general franchise all over the Dominion. I have not the slightest hesitation in supporting views which I have enunciated previously in this House, which are in accordance with the views expressed by the hon. member for Calgary and which are in accordance with the opinions of the vast majority of the people of Western Canada: that this is an anomaly which cannot be allowed to continue; that it should be put right, and that the only way of putting it right is by giving the franchise to women all over the Dominion. My hon. friend from North Cape Breton is a good-natured debater; he enlivens our proceedings with most interesting anecdotes from time to time, and I am sure that he will not mind my reviewing the remarks that he has made and arguing with him, if I may do so—for no Scotchman resents an argument, I am sure.

Mr. McKENZIE: It must be an argument, though.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: Well, I have met Scotchmen who thought that nobody could argue but themselves. That, of course, is a peculiarity of the race. In regard to the general subject, I have not the least hesitation in supporting the view that the franchise should be extended all over the Dominion. The hon. member for North Cape Breton differed from the hon. member for Calgary as to the power of a legislative body to arrange the franchise under which members should be elected to that body. I understood my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition to take exactly the same ground. I understood him to concede that in his opening remarks; I think that if Hansard is consulted it will be found that he took exactly the same position. But whether he did or not, I must say that I agree on the subject with the hon. member for Calgary, and not with my hon. friend (Mr. McKenzie) near me. I do not think that the argument with which the hon. member for North Cape Breton supported his view is a sound argument. He said that the law under which a municipality elects its members is not made by the municipality. But a municipality is not, properly speaking, a legislative body; it is largely an administrative body. I do not think, therefore, that it is on all-fours with a provincial legislature or with this Parliament. So that the position is unmistakably sound and unshakeable that a legislative body has the power to make the franchise under which its members are elected. It has been conceded —and I do not think that this view, which was stated in very clear and lucid terms by the member for Welland (Mr. German), has been differed from by anybody in the House—that women are the equals of men in intelligence and in every other quality by which we test the right of an individual to vote. If we take those two positions—that a legislative body is the proper body to constitute the franchise under which its members are elected, and that women are the equals of men in intelligence and in all other qualities which go to make a good citizen—then there remains no further argument on the subject. The franchise for the Dominion should be created by this legislature, and it can be very well extended to all human beings, irrespective of sex, who have arrived at that age at which they can exercise the franchise rationally and sensibly.

I listened to the speech of my right hon. leader without the slightest wish to differ from it, but it did not carry my mind in its logic. I could not follow the arguments; they were not convincing to me. He contended that it would be wrong—I think he almost went that far—that it would be unfair or improper to force a franchise upon the women of Nova Scotia which had been turned down by the legislature of that province. I do not think, Sir, that that is a sound argument. It is notorious that many men who have been given the franchise under a general extension do not care to exercise that franchise. That is so notorious that a large section of the population of all countries in which these matters are dealt with are in favour of compulsory voting at elections. We have no sympathy with that view, but where would be the hardship of conferring upon the women of Nova Scotia the right to vote? They would be in exactly the same position as the men who have that right now, but who do not care to exercise it. I do not see anything in that argument. The view is shared, as I understand, by the hon. member for North Cape Breton. They did not always in Nova Scotia—I have had my own troubles with them from time to time—my Liberal friends in Nova Scotia did not always grumble at things offered to them from other parts of the Dominion. I remember an occasion upon which they were provincial in another matter than that of the franchise—extremely provincial. And their Scotch characteristics came out especially on that occasion, because when it was a matter of steel bounties they were like Oliver Twist; they always took them and were always looking for more. Well, this Parliament, thinking that that was a very unjust method of dealing with the financial and fiscal affairs of the country, thought fit to stop that kind of gift. But the gift of another bounty in the shape of a vote for the women of the province should not, I think, be resented.

Mr. McKENZIE: A Nova Scotia Finance Minister stopped the bounties.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: Some of my hon. friends are so provincial that they never get away from their own province; he was a Dominion Finance Minister who came from Nova Scotia. I am sure that a little more study of this question and a little broadening out of views in the matter will bring all Liberals, anyway, to support the views which have been so well expressed by the right hon. Prime Minister and by the member for Calgary. I said at the beginning that this debate had been a surprise to me. Perhaps the greatest surprise about it is not the one that I expressed to begin with, but the one that I have just given a hint of—that I am in absolute agreement with the speech of the member for Calgary. I should not, perhaps, put it so strongly. We have had many differences, but so far as the main portion of his speech, anyhow, was concerned—the votes for women—I am in absolute agreement with him, and I think he made to this House an admirable argument on that question.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Mr. Speaker, I wish to address myself for a few moments to the amendment moved by the right hon. leader of the Government. I have been very much surprised at the amendment that he has moved. It is difficult to understand the reason which animated the Prime Minister in moving it. One is naturally led to wonder what is behind the amendment, because ordinarily the Prime Minister would not move an amendment to a resolution presented by a supporter of the Government unless there was very good reason for doing so. The resolution says:

> That, in the opinion of this House, the question of extending the franchise to women should engage the attention of the Government at the present session.

My right hon. friend proposes to strike out the whole of my resolution and substitute for it the following:—

> In the opinion of this House the question of extending the franchise to women should engage the attention of Parliament before an appeal to the people is made.

Now, just what was deep down in the mind of my right hon. friend when he moved that amendment I am unable to understand. Does he mean that it is not the duty of the Government to deal with this question, but that it is the duty of some private member to deal with it? And is it the view of my right hon. friend that if some private member does not deal with it the responsibility is removed from the members of the Government and they will say: Oh, it was open to Parliament to deal with the subject; it was the duty of a private member to bring it up just as much as it was the duty of the Government, and no private member introduced a Bill. It seems to me it is the duty of the Government to deal with this very important question. The Dominion Elections Act is an Act over which the Government naturally has charge; it is an Act which involves public expenditure. The Dominion elections necessarily involve a charge upon the public treasury, and, therefore the Dominion Elections Act is a statute with which the Government ought to deal and the making of amendments to that Act is peculiarly entrusted to the Government. Therefore, I apprehend that it is primarily the duty of the Government to take this matter into consideration and to submit to Parliament a Bill providing for amendments.

For some reason or other, my right hon. friend, in his amendment, has said that the question of extending the franchise to women should engage the attention of Parliament—not at the present session, as has been proposed by the hon. member for South Oxford (Mr. Sutherland)—but at some time before an appeal is made to the people. As one who wants to see the franchise extended, either to the women of those five provinces in which their names are placed upon the provincial lists, or to all the women of Canada, I am not prepared, as one member of this House, to allow the matter to be disposed of in this way.

Mr. MORPHY: What difference can it make to the hon. gentleman if before an election the matter is submitted to Parliament; the franchise will be extended to women at the earliest possible moment.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The difference is this, that, as has been pointed out by the hon. member for Welland (Mr. German) the life of Parliament will expire in October next. In the ordinary course of events, there can be no further session of Parliament after the present one, and therefore if we are in earnest in regard to the matter, we should say that this change should be made at the present session of Parliament. Who knows that there will be any other session? Who will suggest that there will be any other session?

Mr. MORPHY: Does the hon. member assert that there will be no other session?

Mr. PUGSLEY: I can assert that this Parliament has no power to hold another session after October of this year. I can assert that this Government has no power to call this Parliament together for another session. This Parliament absolutely will die by lapse of time in October next.

Mr. MORPHY: Is my hon. friend speaking for his leader?

Mr. PUGSLEY: I am speaking for myself and, as my hon. friend knows well what the law of Parliament is, no one knows better than does my hon. friend that the life of this Parliament will expire in October next and this Parliament has under the British North America Act no power to prolong its life. What may be done by another body, I do not know; but is the right of the women of this country to receive the franchise to depend upon whether or not another body may extend the life of this Parliament? Is the right of the women of this country to have justice done to them to depend upon this question? If we are all in favour of extending the franchise to women—and we seem all to be, because there has been no expression of dissent from either side of the House—the only question is as to whether the extension should be to the women whose names are placed upon the provincial voters' lists, or whether there should be a broad Dominion measure extending the franchise to all women whether they have the right to vote for members of the provincial legislature or not. Why not let this House express the view—why should it not express the view that this measure should be brought down at the present session? It will not take long to prepare a Bill; it will not take long to put it through. It apparently will not be controversial, if controversial at all in its character. Then why has the resolution been altered by the declaration that this change should be made, not during the present session of Parliament, but before an appeal to the people is made? I would almost think that my right hon. friend drew up that amendment through an oversight. In order, however, to put the matter beyond any doubt, I would move as an amendment to the amendment:

11 p.m.

That there be added to the amendment the words "and it is therefore desirable that a measure having this object in view should be submitted to Parliament by the Government during the present session."

Mr. MORPHY: Does the hon. gentleman mean by what he has said that this Parliament in this session has no power to extend the life of Parliament for another year?

Mr. PUGSLEY: I mean that this Parliament has no power to extend its life. That power does not rest with this Parliament nor with this Government.

Mr. MORPHY: The hon. gentleman would say that this Parliament had no right last year?

Mr. PUGSLEY: It had no power last year.

Mr. MORPHY: The hon. gentleman agreed to the extension last year.

Mr. PUGSLEY: This Parliament was extended last year by the Imperial Parliament.

Mr. MORPHY: Can not that be done again this year by a similar process? Will the hon. gentleman give me an answer?

[Mr. Pugsley.]

Mr. PUGSLEY: If my hon. friend desires an answer, I would say that the question as to whether it can be properly done from time to time and under the circumstances which exist to-day, is one which requires most careful and earnest consideration.

Mr. STEVENS: Mr. Speaker, do I understand that the amendment to the amendment is in order?

Sir HERBERT AMES: I rise to a point of order, namely, that the amendment moved by the hon. member for St. John differs in no way from the original motion and is consequently out of order.

Mr. SPEAKER: As I have just at this moment seen the amendment moved by the hon. member for St. John, I do not think I should give an opinion offhand. There is nothing to prevent the hon. member for Vancouver proceeding with his remarks, and I will deal later with the point of order raised by the hon. member for St. Antoine.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I would ask that we be permitted to debate the point of order.

Mr. H. H. STEVENS Vancouver): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to delay the House at this late hour, I simply rise to place on record my entire support to the amended motion as presented by the Prime Minister. My hon. friend from St. John finds himself in somewhat of a quandary because of this amendment. He suggests that the intention is to deprive the women of Canada of the opportunity of voting. As I read the amendment offered by the Prime Minister, it assures to the women the decision of this Parliament prior to an election, and as they cannot exercise the franchise until an election comes on, their rights in that respect are safeguarded.

I might also add this, that my hon. friend from St. John, the leader of the Opposition and others who have succeeded in dragging into this discussion a very much disputed question of whether or not the provincial lists, as they stand at present with the names of women included on them, will be the Dominion franchise list. That questiion is disputed by the ablest legal minds in Canada and is one which I think will be debated at an indefinite length.

I do not think that is a point for this Parliament to decide. To my mind the point is whether or not the franchise should be extended to the women of Canada. I am entirely in accord with the view that this Parliament should extend the franchise to the women of Canada from the Atlantic to the Pacific, including every province. I rise simply for the purpose of recording my support of the motion.

Sir HERBERT AMES: Mr. Speaker, my point of order was in effect that the sub-amendment was only another way of moving the previous question, as it would put us back where we were before.

Mr. PUGSLEY: My hon. friend is in error. I presume he has not read the resolution carefully. The resolution says that in the opinion of this House the question of extending the franchise to women should engage the attention of the Government at the present session. The amendment proposes that the question of extending the franchise to women should be considered by Parliament, as Parliament is the only body that can deal effectively with it. My amendment to the amendment is that legislation should be introduced to Parliament by the Government at the present session. Neither the amendment nor the sub-amendment are at all in effect like the original resolution.

Mr. JAMES MORRIS (Chateauguay): I feel I should be remiss in my duty as representing the constituency of Chateauguay if I did not give my views on this question, particularly as I have received several communications from women's organizations in my county with respect to the subject now under discussion. We have heard it said in a good many quarters that women do not desire the franchise. The hon. member for North Cape Breton intimated in his remarks that the women of his province did not desire it. Be that as it may, the women of the county of Chateauguay do desire the franchise, and as the representative of that constituency I feel that it is my duty to give expression to their views and also to my own. There are a great many women's organizations throughout this country, and perhaps the most prominent is the Women's Christian Temperance Union, which for the last 30 or 40 years has been quietly working for the advancement of humanity. Some of the communications to which I refer came direct to me from the officials of a branch of that organization. If there is any organization in Canada that should be recognized I think it is the Women's Christian Temperance Union, and if they desire the vote they should have it. There are other women's organizations in this country which are doing great work to-day, the Red Cross, for instance, which was fostered and has been nurtured by women. I feel that the women of this country who are working for the advancement of the country should be recognized by this Parliament, and I trust that the resolution as amended will be passed and become law before this Government goes out of office.

Mr. SPEAKER: Between the motion submitted by the hon. member for South Oxford, and the amendment submitted by the right hon. the Prime Minister, and the amendment to the amendment submitted by the hon. member for St. John, we seem to be moving in a circle. The question whether the amendment to the amendment is in order is rather a delicate one to determine on such short notice, and in deference to the hon. member for St. John, —and I think it is also due the House— if it should meet with the approval of hon. gentlemen I would suggest that the debate be adjourned so that I may have opportunity to look into the matter, before giving a decision.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I have no objection to that, providing an opportunity will be given for resuming the debate.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: We will resume it at some other time.

On motion of Mr. Murphy the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Sir Robert Borden, the House adjourned at 11.15 p.m.

Friday, May 18, 1917.

The House met at Three o'clock, the Speaker in the Chair.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN moved:

That on Monday, 21st May, and on subsequent Mondays to the end of the session, Government Notices of Motions and Government Orders shall have precedence after Questions and Notices of Motion for the production of Papers.

He said: I present this motion now, on account of the urgency of public business. I understand that there has been an opportunity for all the items on the Order Paper to be brought forward at least on one occasion.

Hon. CHARLES MURPHY: With your permission, Mr. Speaker, I desire to call the attention of the Prime Minister to the fact that an arrangement was made with the acting Prime Minister that one or two motions standing in my name should be put over to a convenient day.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Among the public Bills and Orders are some which were delayed owing to the absence on account of illness of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty). I refer particularly to Bill No. 4, which was to be referred to a special committee, the members of that committee to be chosen by the Minister of Justice. The Minister of Justice is in his place, and I would like very much to have that Bill considered.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Any special case of that kind shall receive the best consideration possible. Under the circumstances, I would be inclined to alter the motion so as to make the proposed change begin with the Monday after next.

Mr. SPEAKER: The motion now reads, "On and after Monday, 28th May."

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I have no objection to the motion, with the amendment that has been made. But we have a right to expect—and in regard to this I appeal to the Prime Minister's own experience—that the Government will state whether they have introduced all the legislation they propose to introduce this session, or whether there is more to come. The passing of this motion will mean that, beginning with the week after next, the Government will have all the sitting days for their own business. If the right hon. gentleman is not prepared to give us now the information to which I have referred, we shall expect it at some future day, say next week.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: The request of the right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) is a reasonable one. But he will appreciate the fact that I have only just returned, and therefore I am not quite so familiar with Government business as I otherwise should be. I will make it my business to inform him as to the proposals of the Government at the earliest possible moment.

Mr. KNOWLES: The passing of this motion will leave only next Monday for the second reading of public Bills introduced by private members. I happen to have a couple of Bills standing in my name. I may remark that during the twelve or thirteen sessions I have sat in this House I have not before introduced a public Bill, and I should be sorry to see these that I have introduced this session fall by the wayside. I think neither of these Bills is contentious, and as to one of them the Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White) was kind enough to say that I should have an opportunity to deal with it.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: My recollection is that I agreed that as the hon. member (Mr. Knowles) was absent, the matter should be held over until his return.

Mr. KNOWLES: I am afraid there has been an absolute misunderstanding between us. What I understood was that I should have an opportunity to proceed with the matter, and certainly that is what I intended. However, there will be opportunity to discuss this point elsewhere than on the floor of the House, and, no doubt, to arrange the matter.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: If the hon. member will confer with the Finance Minister I think he will be able to make some arrangement.

Mr. KNOWLES: Am I right in understanding that there will be no opportunity after next Monday to propose the second reading of public Bills standing in the names of private members?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Not unless they be called up specially.

Motion as amended agreed to.

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT—RE MARRIAGE OF DIVORCED PERSONS.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I move that the Special Committee to consider Bill No. 4, to amend the Criminal Code, consist of the following members:—

Messrs. Jameson, Middlebro, Nickle, Northrup, E. Lapointe, A. K. Maclean, and Pugsley.

Mr. DOHERTY: The hon. gentleman submitted these names to me and they are quite satisfactory.

Motion agreed to.

INSURANCE ACT OF 1910 AMENDMENT.

Mr. W. H. BENNETT moved for leave to introduce Bill to amend the Insurance Act of 1910.

He said: This Bill is in the same terms as one introduced in this House by the late Mr. Lancaster. It relates to the interests of one or more insurance companies in Ontario, who claim that they are infringed upon by other companies—

Mr. SPEAKER: Will the hon. member please submit his Bill before making his explanation?

Mr. BENNETT: I have not the Bill before me, but would ask permission—

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member is not in order in making his explanation before introducing the Bill.

Order stands.

MR. BRUCE'S REPORT.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. OLIVER: May I ask the hon. the Minister of Militia and Defence (Sir Edward Kemp) if he has yet received the report of Dr. Bruce which he mentioned having received notification of, although not having received the report itself, when I brought the matter to his attention a few days ago?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: The report to which my hon. friend refers has not yet been received by the Department of Militia and Defence. I have made several inquiries since my hon. friend brought the question up.

Mr. OLIVER: Have inquiries been made of Dr. Bruce as to what has happened to his report of which he notified the minister but which has not yet been received?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: No inquiries have been made of Dr. Bruce. I do not know where Dr. Bruce is; he may be in England or he may be in France.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: In France.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: It may be that the report may have gone down with one of the vessels which has been sunk by a submarine. I will, however, make some inquiry along the line which my hon. friend indicates with as little delay as possible.

Mr. OLIVER: Was the report supposed to have been mailed from this side of the ocean or from the other side?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: I received a letter from Dr. Bruce, but the letter did not have any date or any place written or stamped upon it which would indicate the point from which it had been written. When the letter came into my possession and I noticed it, I asked if the envelope from which the letter had been taken could be found. We made search for the envelope, but we were unable to find it, so that I have no means of knowing where the report was sent from.

CANTEENS IN CANADIAN CAMPS IN ENGLAND.

On the Orders of the Day:

Sir EDWARD KEMP (Minister of Militia and Defence): My hon. friend from Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) has inquired of me on one or two occasions in regard to canteen arrangements in England. I may say that army canteens in Great Britain, both for the British and Canadian armies, are under the control of the Imperial Canteen Committee, upon which Committee Canada has a representative. Ten per cent of the profits on all sales to Canadians goes to the benefit of their regimental fund, and 2½ per cent to the Canadian Soldiers' Relief Fund. All final profits on canteens in England over and above the 10 per cent referred to are divided proportionately on the basis of turn-over between the British Soldiers' Relief Fund and the Canadian Soldiers' Relief Fund.

THE PRIME MINISTER'S VISIT TO ENGLAND.

STATEMENT BY RIGHT HON. SIR ROBERT BORDEN AS TO TRANSACTIONS OF THE IMPERIAL WAR CABINET AND THE IMPERIAL WAR CONFERENCE.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I would suggest to my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) that we might suspend the rule, so that I might make my statement as to my recent visit to England on the motion to go into Supply. Some discussion of my observations may be desired and I suggest this procedure to give the necessary opportunity for that discussion

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Hear, hear.

Speaking on the motion that the House go into Committee of Supply.

Right Hon. Sir ROBERT BORDEN (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as hon. members of this House are aware, on the 20th December last the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom summoned the Prime Ministers of the Overseas Dominions to meet in London with the members of the British Cabinet in conference. The proposed gathering was designated the Imperial War Conference. The purposes of the Conference, as detailed in the telegram which was received, were to take counsel with each other:

First, as to matters connected with the prosecution of the war;

Second, as to the terms upon which peace might be made;

Third, as to the problems which would arise immediately after the conclusion of peace.

Parliament was summoned at an earlier date than was at first intended in order that the representatives of Canada might arrive in Great Britain at the time designated. It was at that time proposed that the first meeting of the Imperial War Cabinet should be held during the last week of February. We left Ottawa on the 12th day of February and arrived in London on the 23rd day of that month. Unfortunately, through delay in the arrival of the representatives of India and of South Africa, the formal proceedings of the Imperial War Cabinet did not commence until a somewhat later date. We left Canada at a very interesting time. Germany had announced, just two weeks before, the commencement of an unprecedented and ruthless submarine campaign, and we had the experience in crossing the Atlantic of driving through fog at full speed without lights and without the sound of any fog horn, a course which in time of peace, would be regarded as madness itself, if not absolutely criminal. I mention this to indicate to hon. gentlemen in this House the conditions under which ocean travel must now be undertaken, and as an object lesson in the perils to British and Allied shipping through the waging of this campaign of which I shall have something more to say at a subsequent stage of my remarks.

We all greatly regretted the fact that Australia could not be represented in the Imperial War Cabinet or in the Imperial War Conference. For some time after our arrival it was expected that the representatives of Australia would arrive before the proceedings had been concluded, and it was proposed that the consideration of all important matters, in which Australia was especially interested, should be delayed until their arrival. However, as it turned out, the representatives of Australia were not able to attend, and under the circumstances the best that could be done was to inform the Australian Ministry from day to day of the proceedings of the Imperial War Cabinet and the Imperial War Conference, and especially with the nature of any resolutions or proposals in which the Commonwealth of Australia might be especially concerned.

Although there was some delay, the Canadian representatives did not find the time hanging heavily on their hands. There were certain meetings of the British Cabinet which we attended before the formal meetings commenced on the 20th March; and in the meantime we utilized every opportunity to visit Canadian camps and hospitals, to visit the troops in France, and to take up very many matters of importance, and some of them of urgency, in connection with the prosecution of the war.

The first meeting of the Imperial War Cabinet was held on Tuesday the 20th March and the first meeting of the Imperial War Conference was held on Wednesday the 21st March. Six meetings were held in each week, three of the Imperial War Cabinet and three of the Imperial War Conference, and except for a short recess at Easter, this continued until our visit was concluded. I am not confident that it was originally intended to hold an Imperial War Conference as well as an Imperial War Cabinet; but after the proposal for holding an Imperial War Cabinet had been launched, it became obvious that there were certain matters more or less connected with the war which might, with advantage, be thus discussed in conference between the representatives of the United Kingdom and representatives of the overseas Dominions and of India.

The genesis of the Imperial War Cabinet is to be found in the events of this war. Every one has realized the somewhat anomalous position of the self-governing nations of the Empire in respect of questions which concern foreign policy and foreign relations. It is abundantly clear that the self-governing Dominions are vitally interested in those questions which involve the issues of peace and war. In the event of a great war, threatening in any way the existence of our Empire or its status, the self-governing Dominions being at war when the Mother Country is at war must inevitably take their part, and thus they are directly concerned with the causes out of which war may arise. If we take an example from the events which have been transpiring during the past three years, we observe that some at least of the causes out of which this war sprang arose before this Dominion had an existence. We observe further that some of the causes for which our Empire took up arms were concerned with treaties and understandings in which the overseas dominions of this Empire had no voice and no part; but Canada and the other Dominions engaged in this conflict, because they realized that the issues involved transcend all others within our experience, and concern the future of every Dominion and of the United Kingdom, the future of the Empire as a whole, and, indeed, the future of the world.

And so, without any hesitation whatever, every self-governing Dominion took up arms, and India as well, and their participation has been whole hearted. Two years ago, in London, I said that the overseas dominions of the Empire had sent to fight for the cause of justice and of liberty in this war not less than 250,000 men. I said with equal truth in London not more than a month ago that these Dominions have called to arms in the present struggle not less than 1,000,000 men. So, under those conditions, and having regard to the part which the overseas dominions of the Empire have taken, it was obviously necessary that the pledge given by the British Government in the early months of the war to consult the Dominions as to the terms of peace, must be fulfilled in substantial measure. And, as that question was to come under consideration, so also it was desirable and necessary that questions of co-operation in the prosecution of the war and problems which will arise on its conclusion should also come under consideration by the British Cabinet and the representatives of the dominions assembled in the first Imperial Cabinet ever held. The flexibility of the British constitution permitted this to be done. That constitution is based on usage developed slowly and gradually into convention. The Cabinet is not known to the formal enactments of the law, nor is the office of Prime Minister; and yet all of us realize how important, how supreme a place the Cabinet of Great Britain or of any of the dominions has in the Government of the country. And so with the office of Prime Minister of the United Kingdom. To it is attached a power and authority which, in events such as those through which we are passing, permit him to exercise that power and influence for great purposes made necessary by great events. And so, the Prime Minister of Great Britain and Ireland called together the Prime Ministers of the overseas dominions to sit in Council with the five members of the British Cabinet. In taking that course he absolutely disregarded precedent. As he himself said most eloquently in his address at the Guildhall: This is not a time in which one could justify too rigid an adherence to precedent, or even to tradition. It is a remarkable fact in our history that constitutional development has seemed to depend more upon events than upon men. The events of this war made it absolutely essential that the Dominions should have the voice to which I have alluded, and, having that voice, it was natural, and more than that, necessary, that they should be assembled in an Imperial War Cabinet.

It was a remarkable body that was gathered together. First there were the members of the Cabinet of the United Kingdom, the five men who constitute that Cabinet, but who call into counsel with them other members of the British Government whenever necessary. These five men, with representatives of India and of the Dominions, met for the purpose of dealing with matters of common concern touching the whole Empire. While we were in London and in the very early days of the sessions of the Imperial War Cabinet, a further remarkable development took place. It also arose out of the necessity imposed by events, and I am thoroughly confident that it was not premeditated or designed when the Imperial War Cabinet was first summoned. The Crown acts in the United Kingdom and in all the self-governing Dominions of the Empire; it acts in the United Kingdom upon the advice of the ministers of the United Kingdom; it acts in each of the Dominions upon the advice of the appropriate Ministers;—in federal affairs, upon the advice of federal ministers; in provincial and state affairs, upon the advice of provincial and state ministers. It is the same Crown throughout, acting upon the advice of different ministers. That tie of allegiance to the Crown is the tie which chiefly binds together the Empire to-day so far as constitutional considerations are concerned.

We sat on alternate days in the Imperial War Cabinet and in the Imperial War Conference. On days when the Imperial War Cabinet did not sit the war did not wait; therefore it was necessary that the British Cabinet itself should sit on those days to deal with questions arising out of the war. This result, therefore, very early obtained: that the Imperial War Cabinet was differentiated from the British War Cabinet; that the Imperial War Cabinet sat for the purpose of dealing with matters of common concern to the whole Empire, and the British War Cabinet sat for the purpose of dealing with those matters which chiefly concerned the United Kingdom.

There was for the first time in London an Imperial War Cabinet. But there was more than that. There were two Cabinets advising the Crown, one an Imperial War Cabinet advising the Crown in respect of matters of common Empire concern, and the other a British War Cabinet advising the Crown in respect of matters which chiefly concerned the affairs of the United Kingdom. I do not mean to suggest that this differentiation was absolute; it was carried out as best it could be carried out. I ventured to bring the subject to the attention of the statesmen of the United Kingdom and the people of the Empire in an address which I delivered in London before the Empire Parliamentary Association in the early weeks of my arrival there. The idea has so impressed itself upon the people of the United Kingdom, and upon their statesmen, that at the very last meeting of the Imperial War Cabinet a definite offer was made to the overseas Dominions that this experiment should be continued in the future; that it should develop into a usage and into a convention; and that annually at least, and, if necessity should arise, oftener, there should assemble in London an Imperial Cabinet to deal with matters of common concern to the Empire.

It is perfectly obvious that such a proposal cannot include the large cabinet to which Great Britain may revert after this war is over. It is idle to speculate or to conjecture as to whether the present system of a very small number of men in the Cabinet will continue; I think it likely that it will not continue. Therefore the future of this proposal will be a cabinet of governments rather than of ministers; a cabinet in which the Government of the United Kingdom, the Governments of the Dominions, and the Government of India will be represented. Having regard to the declarations of the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom and his colleagues, the proposal will carry with it much of advantage to the overseas Dominions. I say that for this reason: it is not proposed that the Government of the United Kingdom shall, in foreign affairs, act first and consult us afterwards. The principle has been definitely and finally laid down that in these matters the Dominions shall be consulted before the Empire is committed to any important policy which might involve the issues of peace or war. The language in which the Prime Minister of Great Britain conveyed his proposal to the ministers from the Dominions made that abundantly clear. So, as I understand the proposal—and I think I understand it correctly—the British Cabinet shall continue to discharge its functions in respect to all matters relating to the United Kingdom, but there shall be also an Imperial Cabinet, in which not only the United Kingdom, but all the overseas Dominions shall be represented by their Governments.

The representatives of the United Kingdom will consist of the Prime Minister, the Foreign Secretary, the Secretary of State for India, the Secretary of State for the Colonies, and very probably the Secretary of State for War, and the First Lord of the Admiralty. The representatives of the overseas Dominions will be their Prime Ministers, and if the Prime Minister is unable to attend some minister of first rank must attend in his place, who, for the time being, shall possess the authority and exercise the functions of the Prime Minister for that purpose. It is idle to have an Imperial Cabinet unless those who assemble around the council board are possessed of the authority for the time being to carry out the proposals which may be agreed to. It may be said, in criticism of this proposal, that what the Prime Minister of one of the Dominions might there agree to, he could not afterwards carry out because the assent of Parliament might be withheld. That criticism, however, is equally applicable to any policy that a government might bring down, and, therefore, it does not seem to constitute a grave objection to the proposal which has been outlined by Mr. Lloyd George.

We all know that the future constitutional relations of the Empire have been a matter of much discussion in parliaments, in the press, and by constitutional writers and others. We also know that men who have given thoughtful and careful study to the subject have been much perplexed as to what those future relations may be. We have, on the one hand, self-government enjoyed by each of the overseas dominions; we have that autonomy of which they are rightly jealous. We have, on the other hand, the necessity of consultation and co-operation; and how to reconcile the aspirations of the overseas dominions on the one side or on the other, to bring about unity and concentration of purpose in great matters of common concern and at the same time to safeguard the rights of self-government which the overseas dominions at present enjoy, has been a matter involved in much difficulty and complexity. It seems to me that many of the difficulties are likely to be cleared away by the proposal of Mr. Lloyd George. I do not pretend to prophesy that this will be the ultimate form in which necessary consultation and co-operation will be brought about. It would be idle to pass any conjecture on that subject; so many prophecies have failed of fulfilment that one is naturally unwilling to commit himself to any prophecy on the subject. But this at least may be said of Mr. Lloyd George's proposal: it does not sacrifice in the slightest degree the autonomy or the power of self-government which is possessed by each of the dominions. The ministers from overseas go there as the heads of their governments. They are responsible to their own parliaments; as the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom goes there responsible to his parliament.

They go there as the representatives of autonomous governments, each responsible to an independent Parliament. They meet there for the purpose of consultation, co-operation, and united action, but that action can be taken only with the sanction and authority of the representatives of the various nations of the Empire assembled in their own Parliaments. Therefore, there is no sacrifice of any existing power of self-government. There is, on the other hand, opportunity for consultation, co-operation and united action, which I venture to think will prove of great advantage to the Empire as a whole.

The deliberations of the Imperial War Cabinet were necessarily secret. They covered almost every conceivable subject connected with the prosecution of the war, the terms of peace, and the problems to arise after the conclusion of the war. I was greatly impressed with the enormous variety and vast complexity of the problems that have to be taken into consideration by the British Government from day to day. I made it my business, when I first went to London, to go to the offices of the British War Cabinet for the purpose of examining the correspondence just for a single day. Before we arrived in London, all precedents had been cast aside in the methods of the British War Cabinet. When, in 1915, I sat for the first time in that Cabinet, it was an unwritten law that no record should be made of its proceedings and that no member of the Cabinet should make any note of the conclusions arrived at. In Great Britain administration is not carried on in the same way as here. Our Cabinet is a committee of the Privy Council. Matters are dealt with in recorded form. We pass Orders in Council, sitting as a Cabinet, sitting as a Committee of the Privy Council. The meetings of the Privy Council in Great Britain are formal affairs, and the meetings of the Cabinet are absolutely apart and distinct from the formal meetings of the Privy Council in which no debate takes place and in which the proposals placed before the Privy Council are accepted as a matter of course. The British War Cabinet, as constituted when we arrived in Great Britain, kept a complete record of its proceedings; it had half a dozen secretaries at least, several of whom attended each meeting, resolutions were passed and conclusions were recorded in writing. All precedents of the past had been put to one side, and entirely new methods had been adopted. Voluminous records are kept in the offices of the War Cabinet. The day I examined the correspondence of the War Cabinet, I suppose there were at least 200 telegrams dealing with every conceivable subject, with matters arising in almost every country in the world, neutral, allied, or enemy. There were questions arising in all parts of the world—from every country in the world there pours in from day to day correspondence regarding matters requiring the attention, not only of the Foreign Office, but of almost every department of the British Government. I am bound to confess that my visit to London gave me a wider and clearer view than I could otherwise possibly have obtained of the tremendous duties and responsibilities imposed upon the British Government in this war.

So far as the deliberations of the Imperial War Cabinet are concerned, I can speak of them only generally; they will be alluded to in my subsequent remarks. I might, however, be permitted to read to the House a letter which I addressed to Mr. Lloyd George on the 30th of April, shortly before my departure from England, and the reply which I received from him. My letter reads:

Dear Mr. Lloyd George,—

As we are about returning to Canada I desire to express the thanks of the Canadian ministers for the courtesy and consideration extended to us on all occasions and for the opportunities afforded to make ourselves fully acquainted with the highly important subjects which have come under consideration in the Imperial War Cabinet. The deliberations in which we have taken part have made us realize more fully the vastness and complexity of the problems involved in the successful prosecution of the war and in the determination of the conditions on which peace might be made.

While our absence from Canada has been greater than we anticipated or desired, we realize that the purpose for which we crossed the Atlantic could not have been accomplished within a shorter period.

The step which you have taken in summoning the Imperial War Cabinet is a notable advance in the development of constitutional relations, and I am confident that the usage thus initiated will gradually but surely develop into a recognized convention.

I pray that the united effort of our Imperial Commonwealth may speedily be rewarded with such decisive victory as will assure an abiding peace. Believe me,

Yours faithfully,

(Sgd.) R. L. BORDEN.

To which Mr. Lloyd George replied on the 2nd of May:

My dear Sir Robert,—

I am very much obliged to you for your kind letter of April 30.

I should like to say how much we have appreciated the promptitude with which you accepted our invitation to attend the meetings of the Imperial War Cabinet under circumstances which involved a grave measure of risk for yourself and your colleagues, and our request that you should delay your departure until all the important business which had to come before us had been concluded. I feel, however, that you will agree with me in thinking that the work which the Imperial War Cabinet has done has amply justified the requests which we have made of you. I cordially agree with what you say about the importance of its meetings. If they have been of value to you, we have found them of not less value to ourselves.

It has been of immense advantage to bring to bear upon the vital problems of war and peace, fresh minds and fresh angles of vision from the Overseas Dominions. I believe that this new experiment will prove, as you suggest, a permanent convention of our constitution, for its recent meetings have unquestionably contributed not only to unity of purpose among the peoples of the Empire, but to the vigour with which we hope to prosecute the war and the clear-sightedness with which we shall enter upon the negotiations for peace.

Yours sincerely,

(Sgd.) D. Lloyd George.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I do not understand from my right hon. friend's remarks the duties or the functions of the present British Cabinet. As I understand it, there is an Imperial War Cabinet, a British War Cabinet and a British Cabinet. What are the functions of the British War Cabinet as distinct from those of the British Cabinet, and the Imperial War Cabinet?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: The Imperial War Cabinet advise the Crown in respect to all matters connected with the prosecution of the war. The British War Cabinet advise the Crown more especially in matters concerning the work of the United Kingdom in the war.

Sir SAM HUGHES: That is not the British War Cabinet.

[Sir Robert Borden.]

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: We call it the British War Cabinet. The "British War Cabinet" and the "British Cabinet" are interchangeable terms. In Great Britain it is called the War Cabinet. I alluded to it as the British War Cabinet for that reason.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I understand that ministers who are not members of the British War Cabinet are nevertheless members of a general British Cabinet.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: My hon. friend overlooks the fact that in Great Britain all the members of the Government are not members of the cabinet.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I know that.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: The cabinet has been made a very small one of only five members, two of whom have no portfolios.

Sir SAM HUGHES: That is the point I want to make clear.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: The other members of the British Government are not members of the British Cabinet, but they are called into consultation in the British Cabinet whenever matters especially concerning their departments come up for consideration. In the future, however, when the British Cabinet will probably be larger than it is to-day, the Imperial Cabinet will include, not the whole British Cabinet, but certain selected ministers, that is to say: the Prime Minister, the Foreign Secretary, the Secretary of State for War, the First Lord of the Admiralty, the Secretary of State for the Colonies, and the Secretary of State for India. They will represent the British Cabinet in the Imperial War Cabinet, and the Dominions will be represented in that cabinet by their prime ministers.

As to the Imperial War Conference. Some of its deliberations and resolutions are for the present confidential and will not be published at once, but the greater portion has been made public. A blue book is now in preparation, and as soon as it is received it will of course be placed upon the table of the House and printed for the use of members. The subjects under consideration included the constitution of the Empire, the development and control of natural resources, Imperial preference, co-ordination of military equipment and stores, production of naval and military munitions and supplies, naval defence, care of soldiers' graves, naturalization, representation of India at future Imperial Conferences, the position of Indians in the self-governing dominions, removal of temptations to which overseas troops are now exposed, the trade commissioners' service, patents and other subjects.

The question of constitutional readjustment naturally came up for consideration. I think it is advisable that I should speak of that in the first instance, although it was not the first resolution passed. I shall not speak in detail of all the resolutions, but I shall allude to only the more important ones, and if any discussion is required as to the others, it can more conveniently be had after we have the full record of the proceedings of the conference so far as they can be made public. I called into informal consultation the ministers from the other dominions and we discussed the question of constitutional readjustment pretty fully and carefully among ourselves. In the end we found that we were not very far apart in our views, and in the net result I had the honour of moving in the conference this resolution. I should say at this point that all the proposals which have been put forward by the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom with regard to an Imperial Cabinet are subject to the conclusions which may eventually be reached by the conference mentioned in this resolution, which is as follows:

4 p.m.

The Imperial War Conference are of opinion that the readjustment of the constitutional relations of the component parts of the Empire is too important and intricate a subject to be dealt with during the war, and that it should form the subject of a special Imperial Conference to be summoned as soon as possible after the cessation of hostilities. They deem it their duty, however, to place on record their view that any such readjustment, while thoroughly preserving all existing powers of self-government and complete control of domestic affairs, should be based upon a full recognition of the Dominions as autonomous nations of an Imperial Commonwealth, and of India as an important portion of the same, should recognize the right of the Dominions and India to an adequate voice in foreign policy and in foreign relations, and should provide effective arrangements for continuous consultation in all important matters of common Imperial concern, and for such necessary concerted action, founded on consultation, as the several governments may determine.

Now, I am aware that some criticism from a certain standpoint may be made of that proposal, because it may be urged that it does not lead to a sufficiently close organization of the Empire. There have been proposals put forward for an Imperial Parliament which should have taxing powers for certain purposes over all the Dominions as well as over the United Kingdom. As far as I am concerned, and I think the other members of the Conference thoroughly concurred in this view, I regard that proposal as neither feasible nor wise.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I venture to think that the Dominions have done more for the common cause that we all have at heart in this war than could have been accomplished by any Imperial Parliament possessing the powers to which I have alluded.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: And I think that the best guarantee of what the Dominions are prepared to do for a great common purpose in the future, is the record of what they have done during the past three years. I should say this, however, in justice to those who have been advocating different views with great ability and with great earnestness, that I do think all the parliaments and peoples of the empire are greatly indebted to the groups of young men in the Mother Country and throughout the Empire who have taken up this subject and studied it and issued many able publications with regard to it. Their work has been most earnest, unselfish and devoted, and it has had this good effect; it has concentrated the opinion of the great mass of the people upon these problems of great common concern. So while I am unable to accept some of the conclusions which they have reached, I nevertheless feel that the Empire lies under a debt of gratitude for the work which they have done in that regard.

This resolution was accepted unanimously by the Conference. I am happy to say that from first to last in all the proceedings of the Conference there was not one dissenting voice from any conclusion which the Conference reached. Every conclusion was absolutely unanimous, and I think this was perhaps due to the fact that certain subjects which did involve difficulty were first taken up informally in private discussion, and a conclusion was thus reached.

I should say this, further: A special Imperial Conference is to be summoned immediately after the war for the purpose of considering constitutional readjustment. I raised the question, and so did others, as to the constitution of that conference. I entertained the view, and I know that it was shared by others, that such a conference should include representatives of the recognized political parties in all the Dominions of the Empire. This is too great a question to be made a matter of party controversy, and if I should have anything to do with the selection of the representatives of Canada at that special conference I desire now to say, without any qualification, that I should ask the leaders of the opposite party to go with me to that conference, so that we might take counsel with each other and with the other members of the conference as to these vital questions.

The next subject to which I shall allude is the development and control of natural resources. This resolution was regarded as of some importance. I proposed it to the Conference, and at the request of the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom it was brought into the Imperial War Cabinet and discussed there. It was unanimously adopted both by the Imperial War Cabinet and by the Imperial War Conference. Its terms are as follows:—

Having regard to the experience obtained in the present war, this Conference records its opinion that the safety of the Empire and the necessary development of its component parts, require prompt and attentive consideration as well as concerted action with regard to the following matters:—

1. The production of an adequate food supply and arrangements for its transportation when and where required, under any conditions that may reasonably be anticipated.

2. The control of natural resources available within the Empire, especially those that are of an essential character for necessary national purposes, whether in peace or in war.

3. The economical utilization of such natural resources through processes of manufacture carried on within the Empire.

The Conference commends to the consideration of the Governments summoned thereto the enactment of such legislation as may assist this purpose.

It is beyond question that when this war broke out the Germans were utilizing for their own purposes—their own national purposes, the building up of their industries—natural resources from many parts of our Empire, and in some instances natural resources which could not be obtained in the same abundance and of the same quality elsewhere. I venture to think, and I have so stated in the United Kingdom, that Germany had a better knowledge and conception of the natural resources of the Dominions of this Empire than was to be found in the United Kingdom itself before the war. I have little doubt of that, and if you had the opportunity of hearing what was recounted to me from other Dominions you would have little doubt. I will give one incident with regard to our own country which was brought to my attention the day I left Canada. The president of a Canadian company which has vast mineral resources on the island of Newfoundland told me that about two months before the war he was in Germany and had occasion to call upon one of the managers of Krupps. Reference was made to these mineral resources, and the gentleman to whom I have referred spoke of their development. The manager rang a bell, called in a clerk, and to the Canadian's great surprise, the clerk placed before them a plan of the workings at Belle Isle, which not only showed those workings as they were when he had left Canada a month or two before, but even showed the developments which had taken place during his absence. This gives one an idea of the thoroughness with which the Germans watch the development of our natural resources, and of their methods. I venture to think that this resolution, which has commended itself to the Imperial War Cabinet and the Imperial War Conference, will also commend itself to the Parliament and people of Canada. We have resources so varied and abundant within this Empire, that we need not fear any effort Germany may make to dominate the world commercially or industrially after the war. But I have absolutely no doubt that such an effort will be made by the Germans, and, indeed, there is the most reliable information that systematic arrangements for that purpose are being carried on in Germany to-day. If we have anything like the same resourcefulness, the same thoroughness, the same self-confidence, the same courage as they have put into their efforts in the past and will put into their efforts in the future, we have nothing to fear. The resources of this Empire are beyond all comparison greater than any that Germany can command. She cannot dominate the world commercially or industrially any more than she can dominate it by her military power.

The next resolution to which I call attention is one concerning Imperial preference. This resolution was brought forward by Mr. Massey, in the first instance, at the Imperial War Conference and was afterwards with some amendments approved by the Imperial War Cabinet.

The time has arrived when all possible encouragement should be given to the development of Imperial resources, and especially to making the Empire independent of other countries in respect of food supplies, raw materials, and essential industries. With these objects in view this Conference expresses itself in favour of:—

1. The principle that each part of the Empire, having due regard to the interests of our Allies, shall give specially favourable treatment and facilities to the produce and manufactures of other parts of the Empire.

2. Arrangements by which intending emigrants from the United Kingdom may be induced to settle in countries under the British flag.

I should say at once that this resolution does not necessarily purpose, or even look to, any change in the fiscal arrangements of the United Kingdom. It does not involve taxation of food; it does not involve taxation of anything. As far as the fiscal system of the United Kingdom is concerned, I followed when in England precisely the same course that I have carried out in this Parliament and in this country—I decline to interfere in matters which are of domestic concern and should be the subject of domestic control in the United Kingdom. I declined to invite them to change their fiscal policy. These matters are within their control, as our fiscal policy is within ours. And I would go further and say that the people of Canada would not desire the people of the United Kingdom to change their fiscal policy for the purpose alone of giving a preference to the producers of this country, especially if the proposed fiscal changes should involve any supposed injustice, should be regarded as unfair or oppressive by a considerable portion of the people of the United Kingdom. But what this proposal looks to, as I understand it, is this—that we can within this Empire establish better and cheaper facilities of communication than we have enjoyed up to the present time. That, I believe, is the line along which the change indicated will proceed. The question of transportation has been a very live one, a very important one, to the producers of this country, especially those of the western provinces. We know that before the commencement of the war the cost of transportation across the Atlantic increased twofold or threefold. There was sometimes a dearth of ships. I hope and believe that there will be concerted action and co-operation between the government of the United Kingdom and the governments of the Dominions, by which speedier, better, and more economical transportation will be provided between the Mother Country and the Dominions, and between the Dominions themselves. So, in this light, I am confident that the resolution passed by the Conference will receive favourable consideration by the people of this country.

The next resolution I will take up deals with the question of naval defence. The resolution unanimously adopted is as follows:

That the Admiralty be requested to work out immediately after the conclusion of the war what they consider the most effective scheme of Naval Defence for the Empire for the consideration of the several Governments summoned to this Conference, with such recommendations as the Admiralty consider necessary in that respect for the Empire's future security.

It would be impossible to do that during the war; the Admiralty frankly told us so. In the first place they are too busy, and, in the second place, they desire to learn thoroughly the lessons of this war before they reach conclusions that they would commend to the overseas governments. The development of submarine warfare during the past three years has been so important and so serious as to cause the authorities of the Admiralty to reconsider more or less the whole position. But we do believe that after the war is over it will be necessary for the United Kingdom and the Dominions to take up this question in co-operation and with a view to concerted action. For that purpose the Admiralty will prepare, with the least possible delay after the war is over, a scheme by which we can act together for this great common purpose.

I do not need, I hope, in the presence of hon. gentlemen in this House, to emphasize the importance and necessity of this. It is obvious that if the communications of this Empire on the ocean are cut, the Empire cannot hold together. That is apparent and clear to all. It is a matter of congratulation to us that although there is a serious menace in the submarine campaign which Germany has carried on, this has been met with at least some success up to the present and I hope it will be met with still more success in the future. Outside of the submarine campaign, we all rejoice that the ocean was swept practically clear of the German flag within a few months after war broke out. That is a great achievement. It means as much for us as it does for the people of the United Kingdom. What enables our producers, what has enabled them during the past three years, to send their products at greatly increased prices across the ocean for the sustenance and comfort of the people of the United Kingdom and for the purpose of carrying on this war? It is the organized power of the British Empire in the Navy—that, and that alone. What is it that keeps Quebec, Montreal, Halifax, St. John, Victoria and Vancouver from being raided by enemy cruisers, from seeing women and children murdered in their streets by German shells and from all the horrors and barbarities that even some of the towns in the United Kingdom have suffered? I say again that it is the organized power of the Empire in our Navy. Therefore, it is a matter of concern to us, as to the United Kingdom, that the naval power of this Empire shall be kept up and increased in such measure that the ocean paths shall not be closed to us whether in peace or in war.

The next resolution to which I invite your attention relates to the care of soldiers' graves, a most sacred duty devolving upon the people of the Empire. The resolution which was passed in regard to that is as follows:

The Conference, having considered the minute addressed to the Prime Minister on the 15th March, 1917, by His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales, concurs in the proposals made therein, and humbly prays His Majesty to constitute by Royal Charter an Imperial War Graves Commission for the purposes stated by His Royal Highness, and along the lines therein set forth as embodied in the draft charter submitted to the Conference. The Conference places on record its very deep appreciation of the generous action of the French Government in allotting in perpetuity the land in that country where our men are buried, and urges that similar arrangements should be made, if possible, in the terms of peace with all governments—ally, enemy, or neutral—for a similar concession in Gallipoli, Mesopotamia, Africa, and all other theatres of war. The Conference desires to record its grateful appreciation of the work already done by the Prince of Wales and his Committee in caring for the graves of those who have fallen in the common cause of the Empire, and its satisfaction that His Royal Highness has consented to become the President of the permanent Commission.

The Commission will be constituted of representatives of the United Kingdom and the overseas Dominions and they will be charged with the care of the soldiers' graves. I should say that France generously offered to undertake the care of the graves of all the soldiers of the Empire who were buried within her territory. With the most grateful appreciation of that fine, that splendid, offer on the part of the French nation, it was thought better that we should ourselves undertake that sacred duty. So it is to be. The Commission will have full power and jurisdiction to deal with all these matters. It is hoped that territory in neutral or in allied countries where our men are buried, may be secured, and it is proposed that whatever expense is necessary for this sacred purpose shall be undertaken by the Mother Country and by the Dominions upon some satisfactory basis. In the early future, the Royal Charter will be issued, the Commission will be constituted and the work, which has already received care and attention, will be carried out upon the lines indicated.

The next resolution is that relating to the representation of India. I moved this resolution, and I have no doubt that the course which the Conference took was absolutely wise. The resolution is as follows:

That the Imperial War Conference desires to place on record its view that the resolution of the Imperial Conference of 20th April, 1907, should be modified to permit of India being fully represented at all future Imperial Conferences, and that the necessary steps should be taken to secure the assent of the various Governments in order that the next Imperial Conference may be summoned and constituted accordingly.

I should read in connection with that another resolution in regard to India as to which a word might be said. It is this:

That the Imperial War Conference, having examined the memorandum on the position of Indians in the self-governing dominions presented by the Indian representatives to the Conference, accepts the principle of reciprocity of treatment between India and the Dominions and recommends the memorandum to the favourable consideration of the Governments concerned.

As far as the representation of India is concerned, I am absolutely confident that it will be productive of good. I had more than one illustration of that during the Conference itself. The Indian representatives were the Maharaja of Bikaner, one of the native Indian princes and a man of splendid loyalty and devotion who governs his country along progressive lines, and who has contributed in every possible way to the winning of this war. Another Member Designate of the Viceroy's Executive Council of the Governor of Bengal, a man of notable learning, experience and ability and of great fairness and moderation as well. The third was Sir James Meston, Lieutenant Governor of the United Provinces, who has had a distinguished career as a civil servant in India, and who also is a man of commanding ability and wide experience. I found it of very great advantage in discussing matters of common concern to India and ourselves that we had the representatives of India at the Conference. I invited the members of the Conference to meet informally at the hotel at which I was staying, and we had a free, full and frank discussion of the whole situation insofar as the Dominions are concerned. India has had matters of difference, matters sometimes of controversy with South Africa, perhaps also with Australia and New Zealand, and on some occasions with Canada. Sir Satyendra Sinha stated the case from the Indian standpoint with great ability and fairness, conspicuous moderation and very deep feeling. His address to us was not the less impressive because it was so fair and so moderate. On our part, we spoke with equal freedom, equal frankness, and, I hope, with equal moderation. The net result was the resolution at which we arrived, and which I have read. Its basis is the idea that the self-respect of India shall be maintained by an agreement that whatever measures we enforce in regard to the emigration or the visits of Indians to Canada shall also prevail with regard to the emigration or visits of Canadians to India.

I do not think that anyone in this House can dispute the fairness of that proposal. Upon certain other matters which we discussed I need not dwell to-day. I see nothing but good in the presence of India at that Conference, and I believe that there will be no objection in this House or in this country to having that great dependency of the Empire represented at future meetings. India has been splendidly loyal in this war and has contributed of her manhood and of her treasure for the purpose of enabling us to win it. We must take that all into account. Her civilization is different from ours; it is more ancient, in some respects it may be said to be on a higher plane, perhaps—

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Hear, hear.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: There is more of idealism in their civilization; more perhaps of materialism in ours. I am not disposed to discuss the question as to whether one or the other civilization is superior; but I do say that the Indian civilization is entitled to our respect, and that we must do our part in making the inhabitants of that great dependency of the Empire feel that they are not treated with contumely or injustice by the people of any of the Dominions. I believe that purpose will be carried out; I believe it will be materially assisted by the Conference which we had with the Indian representatives.

The question of double income tax was also taken up. I need not read the resolution, which has been made public. It was very fully and forcibly discussed, and in the end a resolution was adopted which looks to action by the British Government immediately after the conclusion of the war.

We took up also the question of protection to overseas soldiers from certain temptations, and to the lack of adequate action on the part of the home authorities. If there was one subject on which I did express myself with unusual vigour, it was on that particular subject. I am bound to say that I do not think sufficient care or attention has been given to this subject by the Imperial authorities, and I very frankly told them so. There was an earnest promise of redress in that regard, a promise of more adequate protection, and the removal of temptation; and I venture to hope, with considerable confidence, that the action which we took in the Imperial Conference on that subject will be productive of good results.

In the Imperial War Conference we also took up the cattle embargo, which has been a source of irritation to the people of this country for many years past. I do not hesitate to say, what I said in the Conference and what has been many times said, that if the United Kingdom desire, for the protection of any industry in the United Kingdom, to keep Canadian cattle out of that country, we have not the slightest objection to their doing so. But we want them to do it directly, and not indirectly. We consider that, if the embargo is maintained for any such purpose, as I took the liberty of asserting, it is a great injustice to Canada that it should be maintained, and it ought to be removed. I said to them: If you desire to keep our cattle out pass a law to keep them out; keep your own course with regard to your own fiscal matters, with regard to your industries, with regard to your productions; we do the same with regard to ours, and we are perfectly content that you should do the same with yours; but do not, on the pretense that our cattle are diseased, keep them out for any such purpose. I am not at liberty to make any announcement on the subject to-day beyond this, that the representations which we made were received as favourably as we could have expected by the head of the Department of Agriculture, Mr. Prothero. I must allude, in that connection, to the great service which was rendered in this matter by my colleague, Mr. Rogers, who, at my request, took the subject up immediately on his arrival in Great Britain. He was indefatigable in carrying out the purpose that we had at heart; he brought it up in the Conference, argued it with great earnestness and ability, and eventually succeeded in having the Minister of Agriculture come to the Conference for the purpose of a frank discussion of the whole question. After that discussion had taken place we received the very favourable indication to which I have already alluded.

In addition to the Imperial War Cabinet and the Imperial War Conference, we were very actively engaged in many other matters relating to the war. There were all conceivable questions with regard to its prosecution, to which I have already alluded. We had to take up the question of naval protection during the war, we had to take up many questions with regard to the Canadian Expeditionary Force, with regard to the provision of shipping, food supply, the restriction of imports, and a score of other questions which arose from time to time and which kept us most actively engaged. I believe that there was some suspicion in this country that the overseas ministers were occupying their time in enjoying themselves, and were not very actively engaged. I have been accustomed to reasonably hard work all my life, but I venture to say to the members of this House and to the people of this country that I never worked more incessantly or more actively during any like period than I did during the period I was in England. That, I think, is equally true of my colleagues. Mr. Rogers attended the meetings of the Empire Land Settlement Committee, to which not only he, but representatives of all the provinces of Canada were appointed while we were in London. He took up also questions relating to the purchase of Canadian wheat and cheese, the provision of dry docks in Canada, and other important subjects, and in connection with many good progress was made.

Mr. Hazen was in continual conference with the Admiralty and the Minister of Shipping with respect to the provision of tonnage, Atlantic coast patrol, restriction of imports from Canada, and the requisitioning of Canadian ships by the Admiralty. He served on a very important committee of the Imperial War Cabinet. Both he and Mr. Rogers interested themselves actively in all matters affecting the welfare of the Canadian forces.

Sir George Perley attended all the meetings of the War Cabinet and of the War Conference and was of invaluable assistance throughout in all the matters to which I have alluded.

We also were in conference with several departments of the British Government and with General Macdougall, of the Canadian Forestry Corps, as well, respecting the utilizing of certain Canadian products, such as cars, locomotives and lumber. General Macdougall took a very keen interest in all such matters and credit should be given to him for his zeal and activity in promoting Canadian interests in that way. We also took up the question of exchanging Canadian soldiers and civilians interned or imprisoned in Germany and the amelioration of their lot, and we did everything that seemed possible of accomplishment.

I have spoken of my visit to France. It might interest members of this House if I should say a few words about the Canadian Army Corps and its achievements during the past six months. After our visit to France, all the members of the Conference were invited by the French Government to visit Paris, where they proposed to receive and entertain us; but owing to the necessity of returning to Canada with the least possible delay, we were unable to accept the invitation, and, so far as I know, none of the representatives of the Dominions will be able to accept. I regret this because I should greatly have liked to take a message from this Parliament and from the people of Canada to the French Government and the French nation, assuring them of our admiration of the splendid courage, patience and fortitude with which they have endured this war and all that it has meant to that nation. No one can realize it who has not been in France and has not seen the devastation that has been wrought there. I was opposite Vimy Ridge early in March with the Canadian Army Corps. I went in the first place to visit the Canadian Corps, and afterwards I was at British headquarters and at French headquarters. On a third or fourth day I was on the Somme battlefield and saw there some of the territory that had been wrested from the Germans by the valour of the Canadian troops. When I was in France in July, 1915, there was one Canadian division at the front. I then had the honour and privilege of seeing the Canadian troops and of speaking to them at that time near "Plugstreet," opposite Messines. When I was in France on this occasion, twenty months afterwards, there were four Canadian divisions at the front, a full army corps—up to strength, and then 6,000 over strength. There were 130,000 Canadian troops in France when I was there, if one includes the lines of communication units, the Canadian Railway Corps and the Canadian Forestry Corps. I need not speak to you of their record; the record speaks for itself. I was there during the preparation for the Vimy fight and I saw the men rehearsing the work which they were to undertake. It was a splendid compliment to the Canadian troops that they were selected to make that attack upon a ridge which had been assaulted many times, but had never been taken; and it is even a greater tribute to the valour, the discipline and the resourcefulness of those troops that they took Vimy Ridge without being stopped once in their attack. I saw the plan of the operations. We knew that the attack was coming, but we did not know when it was coming. We were full of apprehension, because, as I have said, the ridge had been assaulted many times, but every attack had been repulsed with great loss. It must be said, however, that never was an attack upon Vimy Ridge or upon any other position preceded by such tremendous artillery preparation as that which preceded the Vimy attack. General Smuts, distinguished both as a soldier and as a statesman, who was in France on the day when the artillery preparation began and during part of the following day, told me that in the history of modern warfare there was nothing approaching the bombardment with which that attack was heralded. He said something further which may be of interest to this House: that he had called for the records showing the amount of munitions on hand after that bombardment had proceeded for 24 hours, and he had been astonished to find the arrangements so excellent that they had more shells on hand than when they commenced the bombardment. Canadians at the front, in the British Islands, and I hope, everywhere, have learned the value of discipline. They have learned that discipline is necessary in an army, and I believe that it was because of their good discipline, as well as of the confidence reposed in them by their officers, that that attack was so successful. The plans which I saw showed the German trenches extending very far back, our own line of trenches not extending to anything like the same depth. One plan showed the objectives to be attained. Another showed the arrangements for the barrage, beginning at 5.30 in the morning—zero, they called it— then proceeding at intervals of five minutes until the division on the right was to attain its final objective at half past two. They went on with the barrage in front of them —just as I had seen them rehearsing it; going on behind a line of men with rifles at the slope, representing the barrage. They went on, and at 2.26, the division on the right, which had the furthest to go in gaining its objective, was able to telephone back seven miles, over wires laid while the battle was being waged, informing those in charge of the guns that they could lift the barrage, as the troops were all ready to occupy their final objective at half past two. Behind one of the divisions a number of pioneers were going forward laying their wires. They found a German tunnel. It was safer inside than outside; they went in. While laying their wire in the tunnel they discovered a number of Germans. The pioneers are not supposed to be a combatant force, but they are always ready for a fight; so there was a fight, with the result that the Germans were overpowered. It is recorded that a sergeant of the pioneers marched proudly back with 16 German prisoners and claimed from the enclosure a receipt showing that they had been taken by the pioneers. In the tunnel mines were found ready to be exploded until the pioneers cut the wires.

I may, perhaps, be pardoned if I give to the House a short extract from a document which was placed in my possession by an officer who came over with me on the ship. It is a fairly full report from a German intelligence officer of the 79th German reserve division, and it contains information that the Germans had gathered with regard to this proposed attack. I shall read only one paragraph of it:

> Spring Offensive. The spring offensive of the Entente that was to be expected will most probably be staged in this vicinity, perhaps with the intention of turning the Siegfried Line (Drocourt-Queant Line) and thereby defeat its purpose. North of Arras the British will be forced, according to the nature of the ground, to deliver a joint attack on the long narrow Vimy ridge, the possession of which gives them command of the high ground in this vicinity and would also be a safeguard against German attacks on the left British flank near Arras.
>
> Opposed to the Division (79th Reserve) are Canadian troops. The 3rd Canadian Division on the right flank of the Division (79th Reserve Division) came into the line about the middle of March. Recent identifications place the 2nd Canadian Division on the left divisional flank. The extreme flanks of the Canadian Corps have closed in towards the centre so that the Canadian Corps now occupies a smaller front than it did a few weeks ago. The corps is now echelonned in depth and this formation points to operations on a large scale. Behind the front line near Mont St. Eloy extensive billets for troops have been erected and this also points to a strong concentration, and that troops are holding the front in depth. The Canadians are known to be good troops and are, therefore, well suited for assaulting. There are no deserters to be found amongst the Canadians.

I went to see Sir Douglas Haig at headquarters, and I discussed with him matters of more or less importance relating to the Canadian Expeditionary Force.

When I proposed to return to England the next day, Sir Douglas Haig said to me: "I want you to go and look at the battlefield of the Somme, and I am sure you will come back convinced, as I am, that troops who could capture those positions, can take any position in the world. I want you to go there because some of your own troops have played an important part in that field of operations." I went there. We went through the town of Albert, which has often been spoken of in this House, where the Madonna and Child on the spire still lean over the roof of the ruined church. Among the peasants there is said to be a belief that the war will not end until the statue falls. The Germans deliberately turned their artillery on that church for weeks and finally struck the spire and the church itself is in ruins. We then came to a light railway which was built by the Canadian Railway Construction Corps under the command of General Jack Stewart, and I would like this House and the country to appreciate, more perhaps than they have yet done, the work that has been performed by the Canadian Expeditionary Force. The Canadians have played an important part, not only as combatants at the front, but in every sphere of operations. General Jack Stewart was sent for by the headquarters staff of the Fifth Army not long ago. It was very important that a certain line of railway should be constructed with the least possible delay. The estimate made by experts as to the time required was that it would take six weeks, and if anything like that time should be necessary, the plan of operations would be absolutely interfered with. General Stewart said that he would examine the ground. He went and looked at it; he came back and said: "If you will give me two battalions of the Canadian Railway Construction Corps, I will undertake to build it in a week." He went on with the work and he built that line of railway in four days.

I went forward to the front on a light railway built by the Canadian Railway Construction Corps across land that had been "no man's land," but that is now French land in the possession of the Allies. I have not the power to describe the condition of that country to the House; one must see it in order to realize it. We left that railway and then on a narrow tramway we entered small ammunition cars just large enough for a man to stand up in. We went up to the front past Courcellette, past Thiepval to a plateau beyond. To the right beyond Courcelette was Bapaume and immediately in front of it was the Loupart Wood. To our left was Irles which had been taken the day before after a sharp fight. The guns behind us were bombarding the Loupart wood and it was thought to be almost impregnable, but two days later the Germans scuttled out of it and it was ours. Courcelette was on our right. We afterwards returned to Thiepval which had been a beautiful French village. I can not describe its present condition better than in these words, that it was simply a mass of churned-up mud. There was no sign of street, or house or habitation, no indication that a human being had ever dwelt there, except that in one or two places in the side of a shell crater one might see part of the foundation of a house. The whole country is like that. General Smuts in describing it to me said that the lip of each shell crater touched the lip of another. I am absolutely unable to understand how the British ever got their big guns over land in such condition or how our own men went forward when they took Vimy Ridge. It must be remembered that these shell craters were full of water and men slipping in stood in danger of losing their lives and, I believe, some of them did lose their lives by drowning. The country defies description; it is churned-up earth and mud with a confusion of all kinds of debris. I saw six abandoned tanks to the left of the plateau beyond Thiepval. In Thiepval itself, there were German helmets lying around here and there and points of shells and every kind of debris, barbed wire and all the objects that are used in warfare under modern conditions. I was particularly proud to have the privilege of seeing Courcelette, because the Canadians distinguished themselves in its capture, and in that attack and on other battlefields, no regiment bore itself more worthily than the 22nd French-Canadian regiment which did splendid work in every engagement in which it participated.

The Canadian Railway Construction Corps is performing work of the most vital importance. As far back as 1915 it was, I believe, suggested to the war authorities that railways could be constructed behind the fighting line and utilized to great advantage. The matter was not taken up immediately; but it has been taken up since, and one of the chief requests that we received from the War Office while we were in England was for additional men for the Canadian Railway Construction Corps and for the Canadian Forestry Corps. What I have said of the Canadian Railway Construction Corps applies with equal force to the Canadian Forestry Corps. The work of these units is not so impressive, but is almost equally important as that of the combatant forces. It is absolutely necessary, as things are at present, that Great Britain should cut down to the utmost the tonnage for the conveyance of articles other than food supplies, and timber takes up an enormous quantity of tonnage. Therefore, in Great Britain and France forests are being sacrificed to-day on every hand in order that the necessary timber for the prosecution of the war may be provided. It is universally admitted on the other side of the Atlantic that the Canadian Forestry Corps is most highly efficient, and the request to us is that we shall send men in as large numbers as possible to assist in the work which they are carrying on.

In Great Britain I visited eight camps in all: Shorncliffe, Crowborough, Shoreham, Seaford, Witley, Bramshott, Hastings, and in Windsor Great Park, a camp of the Canadian Forestry Corps. I found the men in good spirits, in good physical condition, and undergoing careful and effective training; at least it seemed to me excellent. I visited hospitals in Great Britain and France, and everywhere I found our men receiving, so far as I could see, the best of attention. I did not hear a complaint from any man in hospital, except from one man who complained to me that the Germans were not fighting fairly, because, he said, "when the Canadians climbed the Vimy ridge, the Germans did not stand up to them, but ran away instead of fighting like men." I deemed it not only my duty, but my very great honour and privilege, to utilize every spare moment in seeing our men in the hospitals; and I saw only two men from Vimy ridge who did not smile with great satisfaction when I spoke of their having driven the Germans back. Those men could not smile with their lips by reason of their wounds, but they did smile with their eyes. Let me say to the members of this House and to the people of this country that no man wanting inspiration, determination or courage as to his duty in this war could go to any better place than the hospitals in which our Canadian boys are to be found. Their patience, pluck and cheerfulness are simply wonderful. I saw some of those who are near and dear to members of this House in one of the London hospitals after that fight, the brother of one hon. member and the son of another, and I can tell those members that those young men were in fine form, in splendid spirit, proud and happy to have rendered the great service to their country which they were able to accomplish when the Vimy ridge was captured.

There is another thing that should be mentioned, and that is the very, very great kindness of the British people to all our Canadian troops. I have been among them in camps and hospitals and elsewhere, and there was hardly a place I visited where I did not find visitors at the hospitals giving great care and attention to our wounded. The troops themselves realize with the greatest possible gratitude and appreciation the kindness and attention of all those among whom they are thrown, and I know the people of this country, when they realize it in the same way, will be inspired with the same sense of gratitude.

Certain representations have been made to me and also to the overseas authorities from time to time that the Canadian troops contract drinking habits while overseas. I made it my special business to inquire as to that. I inquired of General
5 p.m. Turner, General Steele, and of General Child of the War Office, who has to deal with such matters, and I shall place their reports upon the Table afterwards, I shall not stop to read them now. It is enough to say that these reports indicate that such representations are almost absolutely without foundation. The Canadian troops are not addicted to the habit of drunkenness. It was represented to me by General Steele, in whose word I have absolute confidence, that there is less drinking among the Canadian troops than among any other troops in the United Kingdom, and I thoroughly believe that. Drinking is almost at a minimum. I think General Steele said that three men per thousand per week in the area under his command had been brought up on such a charge during a particular period, and that was a fair average. General Steele said that he believed it was better to utilize the wet canteen than to permit the men to go to public houses near at hand. When troops go to the canteen they are necessarily under discipline and supervision. If there is no wet canteen, and the men go out to the public houses—and you cannot very well prevent them—they are not under the same discipline or supervision, and almost all the difficulty has arisen in that way, and not through the wet canteen.

So far as general war conditions are concerned—I am sorry to have had to trespass so long on the attention of the House, but I am dealing with an important subject, and some of these matters that seem trivial may yet be of interest—all realize that there were great developments during our visit to Great Britain. We started almost immediately after the submarine campaign commenced, and while we were there the fortunes of war in many theatres of operations were very largely in favour of the Allied nations. There was a great victory in Mesopotamia. The offensive was assumed with marked success by the British armies in France and substantial advances were made. But I hope that hon. gentlemen in looking at the map will realize that the territory won by the offensive which commenced this spring is only an insignificant part of the Allied territory that is still held by the Germans. The overwhelming power of our artillery impressed me as very much greater in the fighting this spring than it was on the Somme. But a great struggle still lies before us in this war; that is the message I bring back to you from Great Britain and from the front.

A great struggle lies before us, and I cannot put that before you more forcibly than by stating that at the commencement of this spring's campaign Germany put in the field 1,000,000 more men than she put in the field last spring. The organization of the man-power of that nation has been wonderful. Awful as are the barbarities and methods which she has perpetrated and used, one cannot but admit that the organization of the national life of that country throws into the field absolutely the full power of the nation.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Does that 1,000,000 include troops of other nations besides Germany, or Germans only?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: It includes Germans only. Germany has managed so to organize her national life that she was able to put in the field at the commencement of this spring's campaign 1,000,000 more men than she put in the field at the commencement of her campaign last spring. That is the information that was given to me, and which I think it is my duty to place before the House, in order that the conditions at the front may be realized and understood.

[Sir Robert Borden.]

Now, I desire to speak with discretion and moderation in these matters, but I cannot too strongly emphasize my belief that a great effort still lies before the Allied nations if we are going to win this war, and it is absolutely inconceivable to me that we should not win this war. The unsettled political conditions in Russia undoubtedly have handicapped the effort on the eastern front, and thus enabled Germany to make a greater effort on the western front.

Against these considerations there is the fact that a great kindred and neighbouring nation has entered into the war on the Allied side, the United States of America. That important event, which took place during our absence, must exercise a tremendous effect not only upon the issue of this war, but upon the future of the world. The fact that citizens of the United States are to fight side by side with the soldiers of our Empire cannot but have a splendid influence on the future of the two nations. Although the relations of the two countries have been good for many years, this notable event must do much to wipe out certain memories, and I know that the Canadian forces at the front will be delighted to fight side by side with those from the great republic to the south. There are in the Canadian Expeditionary Force more than 9,000 men who give their next of kin as resident in the United States of America. I do not say that all these men have come directly from the United States; some of them may have emigrated to this country, leaving their relatives, or next of kin, on the other side of the line; but 9,000 who were undoubtedly born in the allegiance of the United States are now fighting in the Canadian Expeditionary Force.
