But although the United States has entered this war, we do not know how long it will be before the tremendous power of that nation can be translated into military effort. It cannot be done in a few weeks; it cannot be done fully in a few months. We know that from our own experience; the British government know it from their experience, and, therefore, it must not lead to any relaxation of effort on the part of the Empire, or on the part of any of the Allied nations.

I pause to say a few words about the submarine campaign. Perhaps its seriousness may not be realized by those who have not been brought closely in touch with events from week to week, and with confidential information which has been made available to those who have attended the Imperial War Cabinet.

I believe it will be met; I believe there is enough determination, enough resourcefulness, enough self-denial, and enough courage on the part of this Empire to meet it and to defeat it. But I would not be doing my duty if I did not emphasize its seriousness. I need not do more, in order to emphasize Germany's confidence in this campaign than to say this—that in order to carry it on she risked war with the United States of America. That indicates her belief that the submarine war would bring the struggle to a conclusion before the United States could throw effectively its power into this contest. That is what she is trying to do now. The losses in ships have been very serious indeed, and some of the losses of late have taken place under conditions which I cannot mention to the House, but which are sufficiently grave. The cry of Lloyd George, when he made his great speech in the Guildhall, was this: What we need in this war is ships, and then more ships, and then more ships still. It is the belief of the Germans that they can protract the war on the western front until their submarine campaign has made it necessary for Great Britain to accept terms of peace to which none of us would listen to for a moment at present. As I have said, I do not believe Germany's attempt will succeed, but it will require courage, resolution, energy, self-denial and resourcefulness on the part of the people of the United Kingdom, and of the Dominions, if that attempt is to end in failure.

I have no confident hope that the war will end this year. Any conjecture as to the time when it will end is almost valueless. The effectiveness of Russia's efforts on the eastern front, and the speed with which the power of the United States can be thrown into this struggle, will be great, if not determining factors.

Now, as to our efforts in this war—and here I approach a subject of great gravity and seriousness, and, I hope, with a full sense of the responsibility that devolves upon myself and upon my colleagues, and not only upon us but upon the members of this Parliament and the people of this country. We have four Canadian divisions at the front. For the immediate future there are sufficient reinforcements. But four divisions cannot be maintained without thorough provision for future requirements. If these reinforcements are not supplied, what will be the consequence? The consequence will be that the four divisions will dwindle down to three, the three will dwindle to two, and Canada's efforts, so splendid in this war up to the present, will not be maintained as we desire it to be maintained. I think that no true Canadian, realizing all that is at stake in this war, can bring himself to consider with toleration or seriousness any suggestion for the relaxation of our efforts. The months immediately before us may be decisive. They may be decisive even if the war should not end this year. Germany is bringing into play during the present season the last ounce of her manhood. What have we done in this war? We have sent 326,000 men overseas in the Canadian Expeditionary Force. Including reservists in British and Allied armies, and men enlisted for naval defence, 360,000 men at least have left the shores of Canada. It is a great effort, but greater still is needed. Hitherto, we have depended upon voluntary enlistment. I myself stated to Parliament that nothing but voluntary enlistment was proposed by the Government. But I return to Canada impressed at once with the extreme gravity of the situation, and with a sense of responsibility for our further effort at the most critical period of the war. It is apparent to me that the voluntary system will not yield further substantial results. I hoped that it would. The Government have made every effort within its power, so far as I can judge. If any effective effort to stimulate voluntary recruiting still remains to be made I should like to know what it is. The people have co-operated with the Government in a most splendid manner along the line of voluntary enlistment. Men and women alike have interested themselves in filling up the ranks of regiments that were organized. Everything possible has been done, it seems to me, in the way of voluntary enlistment.

All citizens are liable to military service for the defence of their country, and I conceive that the battle for Canadian liberty and autonomy is being fought to-day on the plains of France and of Belgium. There are other places besides the soil of a country itself where the battle for its liberties and its institutions can be fought; and I venture to think that, if this war should end in defeat, Canada, in all the years to come, would be under the shadow of German military domination. That is the very lowest at which we can put it. I believe that this fact cannot be gainsaid.

Now, the question arises as to what is our duty. I repeat once more, a great responsibility rests upon those who are entrusted with the administration of public affairs. But they are not fit to be trusted with that transcendent duty if they shrink from any responsibility which the occasion calls for. If the cause for which we fight is what we believe it to be, if the issues involved are those which have been repeatedly declared by all our public men and in all the press of Canada, I believe the time has come when the authority of the state should be invoked to provide reinforcements necessary to sustain the gallant men at the front who have held the line for months, who have proved themselves more than a match for the best troops that the enemy could send against them, and who are fighting in France and Belgium that Canada may live in the future. No one who has not seen the positions which our men have taken, whether at Vimy Ridge, at Courcellette, or elsewhere, can realize the magnitude of the task that is before them, or the splendid courage and resourcefulness which its accomplishment demands. Nor can any one realize the conditions under which war is being carried on. I have been somewhat in the midst of things at the front, yet I feel that I cannot realize what the life in the trenches means, though I know that I can realize it better than those who have not been as near to the front as I have been. I bring back to the people of Canada from these men a message that they need our help, that they need to be supported, that they need to be sustained, that reinforcements must be sent to them. Thousands of them have made the supreme sacrifice for our liberty and preservation. Common gratitude, apart from all other considerations, should bring the whole force of this nation behind them. I have promised, in so far as I am concerned, that this help shall be given. I should feel myself unworthy of the responsibility devolving upon me if I did not fulfil that pledge. I bring a message from them, yes, a message also from the men in the hospitals, who have come back from the very valley of the shadow of death, many of them maimed for life. I saw one of them who had lost both legs pretty well up to the hip and he was as bright, as cheerful, as brave, and as confident of the future as any one of the members of this House—a splendid, brave, boy. But, is there not some other message? Is there not a call to us from those who have passed beyond the shadow into the light of perfect day, from those who have fallen in France and in Belgium, from those who have died that Canada may live—is there not a call to us that their sacrifice shall not be in vain?

I have had to take all these matters into consideration and I have given them my most earnest attention. I realize that the responsibility is a serious one but I do not shrink from it. Therefore, it is my duty to announce to the House that early proposals will be made on the part of the Government to provide, by compulsory military enlistment on a selective basis, such reinforcements as may be necessary to maintain the Canadian army to-day in the field as one of the finest fighting units of the Empire. The number of men required will not be less than 50,000 and will probably be 100,000. These proposals have been formulated in part and they will be presented to the House with the greatest expedition that circumstances will permit. I hope that when they are submitted all the members of the House will receive them with a full sense of the greatness of the issue involved in this war, with a deep realization of the sacrifice that we have already made, of the purpose for which it has been made, and with a firm determination on our part that in this great struggle we will do our duty whatever it may be, to the very end.

Right Hon. Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Mr. Speaker, when, in the month of December last, the official news came from the other side that the Government of Canada had been invited to a conference, to take place at an early date in London, upon questions connected with the war, although at that time Parliament had been summoned to meet early in January, we on this side of the House at once decided that we would offer no objection whatever to the absence of the ministers who would go to London. We did not see that there was any special urgency for the conference, such as would interfere with the business of Parliament. Notwithstanding, we determined that we would not offer any objection, but that, on the contrary, we would, in so far as it lay in our power, facilitate the business of the House in order to permit of the absence of the ministers. Although we did not see the immediate object of the conference, although it would have seemed that there was no urgency, we thought that there might be questions of the organization of the armies, of the construction of ships, of the production of foods, of the supplying of munitions, which were of such consequence as to make it necessary or advisable for the Government of the Mother Country to confer with the Governments of the overseas Dominions. Therefore, we at once assented to the proposal that Parliament should adjourn to enable the Prime Minister and the colleagues by whom he was to be accompanied to attend the conference.

I have first to say to my right hon. friend that if I have any criticism to offer, it is simply this, that he did not exercise the best of judgment in his selection of the colleagues to accompany him. It seems to me absolutely according to the fitness of things that the attendance of two members of the Government would be indispensable for such a conference, and that one should be the Minister of the Naval Service and the other the Minister of Militia and Defence. The Minister of the Naval Service (Mr. Hazen) was selected, and the Minister of Militia and Defence (Sir Edward Kemp) was left behind and was replaced by the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Rogers). Now, the Minister of Public Works may be a warrior bold, but he did not show that he had had any experience in that line. The Minister of Public Works once said on the floor of this House that his specialty was winning elections, which is not at all like winning the war. In my humble judgment the presence of the Minister of Militia was indispensable when the Canadian Government was called upon by the Government of the Mother Country to discuss matters appertaining to the war. It may be said that we have a Minister of Militia in Great Britain. But, Sir, though we have a Minister of Militia in Great Britain, it seems to me all the more reason, since we have two heads of the department, that the Minister of Militia in Canada should have accompanied the Prime Minister, in order that the Minister of Militia in Canada and the Minister of Militia in England, the Canadian head and the English head, might confer together and not come into collision. We had that experience before when there was a collision between the late Minister of Militia and the gentleman who at that time had assumed the powers of the Minister of Militia overseas. That is all the criticism I have to offer as to the action taken by the Prime Minister in that respect.

Now, we have the result of that conference, and my right hon. friend will agree with me, as I am sure that every member of this House will agree, that the result of the conference, in so far as any practical action that has been taken, amounts to very little. My right hon. friend has told us that the only concrete thing which has come out of this conference is that we are to have an Imperial War Council. That seems to be a very ambitious designation for the assemblage of gentlemen, or the body, which is to be known by the name of the Imperial War Council.

It seems to me to be rather a misnomer, calculated to lead men to indulge in fancies and dreams, rather than to impress itself on the judgment of serious men. You have an Imperial War Cabinet composed of five members of the Imperial Cabinet, of one member of the Cabinet of each of the different overseas Dominions, and of representatives of India. My right hon. friend stated that the duty of the Imperial War Cabinet is to advise the Crown upon all matters of Imperial concern; matters which concern the whole British Empire. This Cabinet is to advise the Crown. What Crown? The Crown in Great Britain, the Crown in Canada, the Crown in Australia, the Crown in New Zealand, the Crown in South Africa, the Crown in Newfoundland and the Crown in India,—because under our present system of Government the Crown is represented by ministers who advise it in all these different countries. The Imperial War Cabinet can conclude nothing. We are familiar with the declaration made some weeks ago by Mr. Bonar Law to the effect that the Imperial Cabinet was at once executive and consultative. With all respect to the opinion of Mr. Bonar Law, this is a statement which cannot be accepted as it was uttered. The Imperial War Cabinet has no executive power; it can report, it can pass judgment, it can come to conclusions upon any subject; but its conclusions achieve nothing; they are simply reported to the Crown in Parliament in Great Britain; in the different countries overseas, and in India. And when such a report has been made it may be accepted by one Parliament and rejected by the other. We have already had such a case. In 1911, the last Imperial Conference of that year decided to adopt a system of naval zones to be patrolled by the navies of the different Dominions having navies. A navy was ascribed to Canada on the Atlantic coast, and another naval situation was ascribed to Canada and Australia on the Pacific ocean. This plan was adopted by the mother country, but it was rejected by the Canadian Government and by the Canadian people, and therefore this body is nothing more than a consultative body. I do not object to it as a consultative body. But I object to terms being used which, in their very nature, cannot accord with the rules of parliamentary government as it exists to-day in the British Empire, in the motherland, and in the Dominions overseas. But if I am told that there is to be a body which is to be known by the name of the Imperial Council, I am not disposed to quarrel with the name. I do not object to there being consultations, quite the contrary. My right hon. friend has stated that this body—so named, and misnamed—is to meet once every year. As to this, I have no objection whatever. This body can do nothing except discuss, come to certain conclusions, and report them to the different peoples whom its members represent, by them to be accepted or rejected. Well, Sir, for my part, I am very much of the opinion that a great deal of advantage is to be derived by frequent consultations between people and people. Ignorance has been, all through the ages, the cause of many discords, indeed, and very many wars also; and when peoples are living under the same allegiance and are part of the same Empire, undoubtedly nothing but advantage can come from frequent consultation. To that I have no objection.

My hon. friend has alluded to the fact that there were enthusiasts in Great Britain and in Canada also who had hoped that the British Empire would be reconstituted; in fact, it was stated in the press when the Conference was summoned that its chief object would be to reorganize the British Empire. Well, everybody who has had the slightest experience in public affairs must have known that such a hope was a delusion, that it could not be realized. As it has turned out, all hopes of reorganizing the British Empire have been adjourned to a Conference to be summoned immediately after the war is over. I attach very much importance to the belief, and I agree altogether with the view expressed by my hon. friend a moment ago, that no reorganization of the British Empire can bring about greater or better results than those which have been demonstrated by the present conditions. I cannot imagine that under present circumstances, so long as there is the disparity of population between the United Kingdom and the dependencies, any system can be organized or planned which will work more satisfactorily than the plan which we now have and upon which the Empire has grown up to its present solidity—I use the word " solidity " advisedly.

[Sir Wilfrid Laurier.]

But still, if there is to be a conference, as it is understood there is to be a conference, one thing at all events has been gained and one thing to which I at once tender my complete adherence; it is a fact that any conference, any reorganization, which may be contemplated will be based upon the principle of local autonomy and will not involve an impairment of the powers now vested in the Dominions beyond the seas. I understand that in the new constitution which is to be discussed when the Conference takes place the principle of monarchy is to be adopted. I have read a statement made by Mr. Long, the Secretary of State for the Colonies, in which I find:—

> The resolution with regard to the constitution of the Empire was made the occasion for striking expressions by the various speakers of attachment to the monarchical institutions of the Empire, and their value for the preservation of Imperial unity. In the words of one of the speakers, the monarchy is the keystone of the Imperial arch.

It seems to me that these phrases were altogether unnecessary. There has been a revolution in Russia. Revolutions have been threatened in many other places; but in the British Empire we are satisfied with monarchical institutions. There may be liberty and freedom under a monarchy, and there may be despotism in a republic. For my part I may say this, and I think that in this opinion everybody will agree, as a matter of abstract opinion it matters not what is the form of government, provided the people are free in their institutions and have the right of representation and petition. Under the British institutions we have been accustomed—and this is the reason why I read with some surprise such words as these—we have been accustomed to look upon, and we do look upon the Crown as a basis of union among the different parts of the British Empire, and as a guarantee of that union I am pretty sure that the British people to-day would not tolerate a monarchy such as existed in England at the end of the eighteenth century or the beginning of the nineteenth century; but so long as the British monarchy is maintained in the traditions which were inaugurated by Queen Victoria every British subject the world over will be quite satisfied to remain under monarchical institutions.

I wish to refer to the next resolution which was adopted by the conference and which has been made public. My right hon. friend had stated that many of the resolutions adopted by the conference have to remain secret. As to that I have no fault to find; so long as they remain secret they do neither good nor harm.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I did not say "many;" I said "some."

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Whether some or many, they do no good or no harm, it matters not whether they are published or whether they are not published. However, I shall deal only with those which have been published and, taking them in the order in which my right hon. friend presented them, the next to which I wish to refer is that in respect to India's representation at future Imperial Conferences. My hon. friend has read the resolution; I shall read it again.

That the Imperial War Conference desires to place on record its view that the resolution of the Imperial Conference of April 20, 1907, should be modified to permit of India being fully represented at all future Imperial Conferences.

Under the resolution of 1907, representation at the Imperial Conference was confined to the Government of Great Britain and the governments of the self-governing dominions. Henceforth, India is to take part in the Imperial life of the British Empire. For my part, I say without hesitation not only that I have no fault to find with this proposal, but that I highly commend it. It is not more than twenty years since Rudyard Kipling wrote the following lines:

Oh! East is East and West is West, and never the twain shall meet.

This might have been true as applied to conditions twenty years ago, but, Sir, in these days events move rapidly. The opinion of a man like Kipling, who knew both West and East fairly well, was that they would never meet; but now they can and do meet. The civilization of the East, which, as my right hon. friend has said, is older than our own civilization, and which is, in some if not in many respects, superior to ours, is being gradually invaded by the civilization of the West. The East and the West, which men at one time thought would never meet, are rapidly drawing closer together. It is now something like 22 years since Lord Lansdowne, then Foreign Secretary, concluded a treaty with Japan. Japan, emerging from a position of secular lethargy which had endured for ages, had moved up into the path of Western civilization, and it is greatly to the credit of Lord Lansdowne that he had prescience to realize what the approach of Japan towards the civilized life of the West would mean. We see the result to-day of his prescience in the splendid support which the cause of the Allies has received by the concurrence of Japan in the cause for which we are striving. And who would have thought twenty years ago that the old, antiquated institutions of China would drop almost as if my magic and be replaced by a republican system? But the East is moving towards the West, and in the principle that India ought to be admitted to the councils of the Empire I entirely agree.

Another resolution was passed by the conference which was not as concrete as this last; indeed, it was very vague. I read:

That the Imperial War Conference, having examined the memorandum on the position of Indians in the self-governing Dominions presented by the Indian representatives to the Conference, accepts the principle of reciprocity of treatment between India and the Dominions, and recommends the memorandum to the favourable consideration of the governments concerned.

What is the meaning of this? The meaning will be found in the fact that in British Columbia, Australia, New Zealand, South Africa and in many other establishments of the British Empire, Asiatics, Indians and Hindus are not permitted to come in to work as labourers. It was against this condition that representations were made in the memorial which was presented to the members of the conference by the Indian representatives. I call attention to this because it is one of the important subjects that we have to deal with in order to maintain the unity of the British Empire. If representatives of the people of India shall attend future Imperial Conferences, we must be prepared to give the subjects of India fair and proper treatment when they ask for it. This is a very serious subject, and I do not see how it can be successfully dealt with unless a very wise and prudent course is adopted. At the bottom of it there is an economic condition which we must not lose sight of. What is the reason why Asiatic and Hindu labourers, our fellow-subjects, have not been admitted into some parts of the British Empire? What is the reason why Sikhs and Gurkhas, who fought in the British Army, were not admitted into some parts of the British Empire, where they were seeking work as labourers? The reason is that they were accustomed to such a low wage and they could live so cheaply that they could compete with white labour on conditions which no white man could accept. We should not close our eyes to this situation. I approve the idea that we should endeavour to overcome these difficulties, but it is evident that nothing has been done so far at the conference to overcome them. But if, as I say, the leaders of India be admitted into the consultations of the Governments of the overseas dominions and of the Empire, we must be prepared to take up the other question, which is perhaps of greater significance, greater moment and greater difficulty.

The following resolution with regard to naval defence was adopted by the conference:

> That the Admiralty be requested to work out immediately after the conclusion of the war what they consider the most effective scheme of naval defence for the Empire for the consideration of the several governments summoned to this Conference, with such recommendations as the Admiralty consider necessary in that respect for the Empire's future security.

That the British Admiralty should be invited to consider the question of the most effective scheme of naval defence is quite proper; nobody can object to that. But it must bring up a question which has long been at issue in this Parliament as to whether the object had in view would be more effectively accomplished by local navies, as was advocated by hon. gentlemen on this side when they sat opposite, as well as by hon. gentlemen opposite when they sat on this side, but which was rejected by hon. gentlemen opposite when they took office. It is not to be forgotten that the last election in the province of Quebec was fought largely on this question. But I shall not re-open old sores; the question will come up again as to which is the best method.

I may be pardoned if I think our plan is the best, although perhaps the opinion will be the reverse on the other side of the House. We shall know afterwards what is the plan adopted, and whatever plan is recommended by the Admiralty will, as it ought to be, be subject to discussion by this House.

As to the trade and commerce of the country, the resolution is very mild and no fault can be found with it. On this side of the House we are certainly in favour of Imperial trade; we are in favour of giving preference to the Mother Country, and when at one time we heard it said on the floor of this House that we should bargain with the Mother Country and ask favour for favour and preference for preference, at least we on this side maintained that we should act of our own accord without making any quid pro quo, and I am glad to say that our friends opposite have now taken that view. But if we are in favour of the extension of our trade within the Empire, let it be recorded that we on this side—and, I hope hon. gentlemen on the other side also—are in favour of international trade, of trading with all the nations of the earth, of trading with every nation that is willing to trade with us, of trading with every nation with which we can have reciprocity, and of trading especially with our neighbours to the south, with whom is to be found the best market we have ever had. These are all the important resolutions which have been adopted at the conference.

There is one resolution, however, in regard to which I may say a word. It is the last one, and one which must touch the heart of every Canadian; it is that the committee had agreed to ask the King to organize a commission to look after the graves of our soldiers who have fallen in battle in France. My right hon. friend has stated that the French Government has placed at the disposal of the Imperial military authorities all the land necessary for these Imperial cemeteries. The idea is a pious and noble one, and certainly every Canadian will give hearty response to it. We hope the war may not last much longer, but many men have fallen and we know that before the war comes to an end many more must fall. Their remains will lie under the soil of France; but their graves will be kept green in the soil of France as the memory of our fallen brothers in our hearts, and the land will be visited by the people of all those countries who have sent men to France to fight, not only for the integrity of France, but for the civilization of mankind. We can well believe that the feeling of reverence, respect and affection will so continue amongst all the countries which have sons buried in the soil of France as to make it forever impossible that a word of discord shall ever be heard amongst those nations, because such would be a new agony to those who remember that lying in the soil of France are men who have given their lives, not only that France should live, but that the civilization of mankind should be preserved.

My right hon. friend concluded his observations by stating that we are certainly very far from the end of the struggle, and I am afraid that his words are only too true. Events in Russia have brought into the war a new feature upon which we had not calculated. We had thought that the new offensive which was to be undertaken by our armies this year, was to have brought our forces to the Rhine, but events in Russia have enabled the German Government to bring to France from the eastern front, perhaps nearly a million men, if not more. Under such circumstances, it goes without saying that the war must last a long time.

As to the methods which Canada must take with regard to the prosecution of the war, I have only this to say: that Canada intends to remain in the war to the end until victory has been won. As to the methods which we are to adopt in order to send more men to the front and to fulfil to the end the duty that we are all determined to fulfil, a good deal of consideration must be given before the traditional policy followed by this country shall be set aside. I make at present no observation on that. The Government tell us that they have a new policy to offer us and I have only this to say: that whenever that policy is made known to us, we shall receive and consider it in the same spirit that we have determined since the outbreak of the war to assume towards all the proposals of the Government, and that is, to give them due and fair consideration, reserving to ourselves the liberty of free British subjects to discharge our duties in the way we consider they ought to be discharged. I am not going to say we should adopt this or adopt that; that we should reject this or reject that. The only thing I say—and as to which I pledge the word and judgment of those who sit beside me—is that we have no intention other than to remain in the war to the end, and we are determined that we shall do our duty to the best of our judgment and in such a way as to insure that the best methods are adopted to bring about that victory for which we are all longing and which we all hope will certainly come, whether it comes early or late.

PRIVATE BILLS.

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READINGS.

Bill No. 7, respecting the Continental Heat and Light Company.—Sir Herbert Ames.

Bill No. 11, respecting The Canadian Order of the Woodmen of the World.—Mr. Glass.

Bill No. 25, to incorporate The Eastern Telegraph and Telephone Company.—Mr. Jameson.

ALLIANCE NATIONALE.

The House in Committee on Private Bills, Mr. Blain in the Chair.

Bill No. 44, to incorporate Alliance Nationale.—Mr. Achim.

On section 17—Investment of funds:

Mr. BOIVIN: I desire to move a slight amendment to this section. Besides this Bill for the incorporation of La Société des Artisans Canadiens Français, there is to come before the Committee Bill No. 44, to incorporate Alliance Nationale. They were considered together in the Committee on Banking and Commerce and were made as uniform as possible. Several amendments were made in this Bill which were afterwards included in Bill No. 44. But one amendment was made in Bill No. 44, which, owing to that Bill having been considered last, was not made in Bill No. 40, and, to make the two Bills uniform, this amendment is necessary. I present it at the request of the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Achim), in whose name both these Bills stand. The amendment is:—

That the first paragraph of clause 17 be amended by striking out all the words after "Canada" in the sixteenth line, and substituting the following: "or in accordance with the laws of such province, on property situated in such province."

This relates to the investments which may be made by the society.

Mr. ROGERS: Do I understand that the hon. member (Mr. Boivin) makes the motion on behalf of the mover of the Bill?

Mr. BOIVIN: Yes, and at his request.

Mr. HAZEN: Was this amendment considered in the Committee on Banking and Commerce?

Mr. BOIVIN: Yes. The societies to be incorporated by this Bill and Bill No. 44 are absolutely similar, and the Bills were made as uniform as possible. But Bill No. 40 was considered first, and this amendment, which was made in Bill No. 44, was not included in Bill No. 40.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Would my hon. friend explain briefly the effect of the amendment?

Mr. BOIVIN: The effect is to make the clause more complete.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: What kind of investment does it authorize? What line of the section is it proposed to amend?

Mr. BOIVIN: It is proposed to strike out the following words in the first subsection of section 17:—

—on property situated in such province and collectable by the municipalities in which such property is situated.

These are to be replaced with the words I have just read. The Banking and Commerce Committee discussed the matter and made this amendment in Bill 44, and it was thought it would be much better to have it in this Bill also. It is owing to the wish expressed in the Committee that I propose the amendment.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

Bill reported and read the third time.

SECCND READING.

Bill No. 48 respecting the British Columbia and White River Railway Company.—Mr. Clements.

THE PRIME MINISTER'S VISIT TO ENGLAND.

The House resumed the discussion consequent on the statement made this afternoon by the Right Hon. Sir Robert Borden (Prime Minister) as to the transactions of the Imperial War Cabinet and of the Imperial War Conference.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN (South York): Mr. Speaker, I wish to say a word or two with regard to what took place this afternoon and in regard to the matters which formed the subject of discussion and which are of the greatest importance to Canada and to the Empire. In the first place, I desire to congratulate the right hon. the Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden) and the Government on coming to the view that conscription must be resorted to in Canada in order that we may do our full share in this war. While the decision is somewhat delayed. I believe the people of Canada will appreciate the final determination at which the Government has arrived. Certainly this policy will be appreciated in my own province and, I think, all over the Dominion. The position in the country and in this House might be well expressed by a reference to the recent activities of the ginger party in Great Britain—the party that demanded that more ginger be put into the conduct of the war.

The result of the ginger movement in the Mother Country was a reorganization of the Cabinet, not only once but twice. New men were taken in, with a policy based on conscription and a more vigorous prosecution of the war, and a determination to do everything that possibly could be done by Parliament to bring the war to a successful conclusion. I take it that the announcement made here to-day means a more vigorous prosecution of the war by this Government. I congratulate the Government on what has been decided in regard to conscription.

The vigorous policy which has been foreshadowed in connection with conscription should also be applied to many other questions in connection with the war. I should have liked to have heard that the Government intended not only to take up vigourously the question of conscription, but also to take up what the ginger party brought in Great Britain, food control, the appointment of a food dictator and a very widespread control of all prices, especially those of the needs of life. The speech of the Prime Minister this afternoon also contained an intimation that more ginger might be put into the transportation policy of this country. The Prime Minister hinted at a policy that would mean the Government and Parliament of this country taking a more pronounced course in regard to transportation in relation both to railway and ocean traffic. The only effective way of improving transportation facilities is to have some kind of Government control of the railways and of the ocean liners. I shall not be surprised to see a transportation policy adopted by the Parliament of Canada that will produce a great shipping industry in this country, even if the Government have to own the ships. I hope for such a policy and through it we can improve the condition of Canada and of the farmers of Canada who are raising wheat for the Mother Country and the Allies. They have long had Government control of railways in Europe, especially in Germany, and I believe that the United States will have it now that they are in the war, that there will be public ownership of railways, as there now is provision for their absolute control. We shall have to do the same thing here and I hope I was not going too far in assuming from the Prime Minister's speech that we shall have more ginger at least in regard to railway transportation in this country; that the farmers of the West especially will be able to market their grain at lower freight rates, and that they will also obtain relief from the exorbitant tolls charged on freight by the ocean lines.

There are one or two other things in which we want a great deal more ginger in the policy of the Government.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Hear, hear.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN: The Prime Minister this afternoon said that he was surprised to learn of the experience of a friend of his who was told in Germany by a business man how much the Germans knew of the stores of iron ore in Belle Isle, off the coast of Newfoundland. The same knowledge that the Germans had of those iron ores in Newfoundland they have always had of the nickle deposits of this country. The time has surely come when we must have a national policy in regard to the control of those great natural resources of Canada and of the Empire. We must have a national policy in regard to our nickle. We must know before this war is over whether it is true that the Krupp Company really controls the nickle deposits of Canada. I believe that information is obtainable in the United States which will verify what has been said, that the nickle deposits of this country, which ought to be consecrated to the Empire and should be controlled by ourselves and used by the Empire, melted and refined in our own country, are controlled by hostile interests. Then we have the greatest asbestos deposits in the world in the province of Quebec. Yet the control of those great deposits is outside of Canada. It is absolutely necessary that we should have control of this product, and we must have some national policy in respect to it. There are two other things, petroleum and gasolene, two absolute necessities of war, two things that can be produced in this country—yet the control of our deposits of these great resources is not in Canada. We have the oil wells in Canada, and we ought not to allow a gallon of gasolene to be consumed in this country which is not refined and distilled within the country. These are things that are essential to war. They are natural products of Canada, and in the case of two or three of them we have a monopoly; yet we have not exercised that monopoly. I say that in this new policy, this progressive policy, which the Government are announcing to-day, and which tends in a good direction, we must go further and include other lines.

Then, too, we must have a more progressive policy in regard to currency and banking in Canada, a matter to which I have before referred in this House. That is essential in connection with the war. I hope we shall have an announcement of a more progressive policy in that respect before long. I trust that not only will we have conscription in this country and a far-reaching measure of conscription, but that it will be vigorously presented in this House and vigorously prosecuted and put into force, because the war is not won; it has to be won, and everything must be done to win it. There must be absolute co-operation and unity in this country to win the war, and if a progressive policy is adopted it ought to be supported by a united Parliament, as it will be supported, I believe, by a united people.

The Prime Minister also dealt with a question about which I have thought a good deal, that is the rearrangement of the various elements of the Empire and their standing, one with the other, and how far this war will lead us in the way of confederation or consolidation of our interests. I agree with what the Prime Minister said that he has not very much sympathy with that new school in England called the Round Table school, who are trying to land the Empire into some system of confederation.

I had not a great deal of faith in that. I believe in the principle laid down by Sir John A. Macdonald, and followed by the right hon. Prime Minister this afternoon, that while it is desirable that there should be an alliance and a consultation of governments of the Empire, we must retain our absolute autonomy, our absolute independence, and our right to pass on any question of Imperial policy before we are definitely committed to it. That is an important consideration which should not be discussed at this time but which, when a further conference is held and when the relations of the various parts of the Empire one to the other and to the union are dealt with, will be most carefully considered. I am confident that no step will be taken until each member of the Conference has had an opportunity of discussing it in his own Parliament. I support the Prime Minister in his going to the Conference and taking part in its discussions. His going there had a good effect upon him and he has come back with what I am quite sure is a progressive proposition with regard to the conduct of the war.

What I would like the Government to do, now that they have declared for conscription, is to go vigorously into it and do what the United States are doing. Conscription is practically in force there to-day, or will be as soon as the President signs the Bill; they purpose raising a draft of 500,000 men by this method. By employing the same method we can raise 100,000 or 200,000 men, or even more, if we have to—and I believe we shall have to. I hope that we shall have the assistance of all our Allies. I hope that Russia will soon come into line, but the burden of this struggle for liberty will fall upon France, upon Great Britain and her daughter States, and upon the United States, and the characteristic policy of these great nations in defending civilization and maintaining liberty is to be based upon conscription. When you have selective conscription, as the minister outlined it to-day, you get rid of all recruiting and its inconveniences. Many of the most patriotic men in the country never could quite see the reason why they should go out and tell the young men why they should go to the front. The law of conscription is based on the duty of each man to defend the country and to protect the rights of his fellowmen, and when you have that law you do not need to exercise persuasion or ask a man to go as a matter of reason. Many a man says: tell me it is my duty by law and I will go. That reply has often been met in recruiting campaigns. The Government should do what they have done in England—and it will require a great deal of work on the part of the ginger party to get it through. The United States came to it, not because they were more active than any one else, but because they had the experience of the Mother Country. We have the experience of both now, and it is the duty of a united Parliament to pass a law of conscription, selective conscription if you like, but, in any case, a law that will impose a duty upon the men of Canada. Probably the youngest men, those, say, of 21, could first be told that they must go to the war. The school boys will grow up under a system which tells them that it is the duty of those who are over 20 and 21 to go in the first draft, and that if more are required those who are older will be called upon. I am sure that when they know it is their duty there will be no objection. I do not care in which province they may live.

[Mr. W. F. Maclean.]

To my mind the only way to win the war is by adopting a vigorous policy of conscription. I hope that a measure to this end will be introduced into Parliament right away, and that it will be passed. I believe that the men will go gladly and that there will then be no trouble in filling up the ranks of the battalions we have there now. And we need more; as was pointed out this afternoon, those who are over there are calling to us to give them assistance, and we have to heed that call. This Parliament, then, will not be doing its duty unless it enacts a law of conscription and then enforces it. The result will be our ability to increase the number of our soldiers overseas by 100,000, or if necessary, 200,000 men and, carried out on the selective principle, the law will result in no man being sent forward who is more useful here in the munitions plants, as a grain grower, as a farmer, as a railroad man or as one who is engaged in anything essential to the ordinary life of the community. We have that principle recognized at last. I do not know what stand hon. gentlemen opposite will take in regard to it. But a good many of their supporters in my province, pronounced Liberals, are declaring every day that they want to see conscription in Canada. We have to have it to win the war. Now that the ball has been set rolling, the ginger policy—

An hon. MEMBER: What will they say now?

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN: Thousands of them are saying that they are in favour of conscription. I do not think all the loyalty is on the side of one party in this country; I would not want to live in Canada if that were the case. Anyway, you want to give every man an opportunity of saying whether he accepts the law—and it is the first law of any community that every citizen ought to be willing to defend its liberties. Some people have left our country because they feared conscription on the other side of the line. But that is one of the accidents of a condition of war; it is a common trait of humanity. I believe that Canadians irrespective of politics will support conscription just as the Britishers in the old land, irrespective of politics, supported it there. Among the most useful things they have in Great Britain in connection with the militia are the courts of tribunals which mobilize the men, size them up and find out those who are fit to go to the war and those who are necessary in munitions plants, the farming industry or other essential occupations. In that way the air is cleared—and that is the great thing, to clarify the situation with regard to the war. You clarify the situation with regard to the prosecution of the war through the adoption of conscription as you could do in no other way.

Conscription has been found to be absolutely essential in Great Britain and France; the United States have just declared themselves to be in favour of it, and now that we have taken the same attitude, there is a much brighter prospect of winning the war. We are engaged in a struggle against an organization of nations which depend absolutely on conscription for their war efforts. If, as the Prime Minister said this afternoon, Germany has brought into her armies a million men more than she had a year ago, that has been accomplished by reason of the law of conscription in force in that country. In a struggle against conscription as it exists in Germany, you cannot overcome Germany nor defend civilization, nor maintain the liberty of the world unless you fight the devil with fire, if conscription is the fire he uses against you. That view came home long ago to the boys who are giving their services at the front and many of whom have made the supreme sacrifice. It is going to come home to this House and to the people of this country. It is the view taken by the women of this country; it is the view taken by many a Canadian mother whose boy has been killed on the battlefield and who cannot understand why some other mother's boy should not take his place in the field, if the struggle is for the liberties, not only for this country, but of the world. I absolutely agree with what the Prime Minister and the leader of the Opposition have said this afternoon, namely, that this war must be won, and, if it is to be won, it can be won only by the adoption of the principle of conscription. And when we adopt that one principle of the ginger party in Great Britain, we shall have to adopt their principles in relation to other matters I have spoken about this evening. I wish, therefore, to congratulate the Government on at last adopting this policy. The Government have taken a good while to adopt it, and some reconstruction of the Government and more unity in this Parliament may be required to carry it into effect. I am, however, prepared to face any change that will give us a more vigorous policy, not only in regard to conscription, but in regard to everything necessary to win the war. The other question as to what our relations are to be between the component parts of the Empire need not concern us now; that will take care of itself after the war. The Prime Minister in the British House of Commons said yesterday, and it was also told us here this afternoon that the question would be discussed later on; but the question of the relations between the component parts of the Empire is not the question before us to-day. The question at issue is the winning of the war. We may as well recognize the fact that conscription is necessary for the winning of the war; that question faces us now, and I hope that the Government will not delay in bringing down their proposals in regard to conscription and that the House will not delay in carrying them into effect.

Hon. WILLIAM PUGSLEY (St. John): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend made the suggestion that there ought to be more ginger in the Government. This reminds me of the fact that some years ago a horse dealer in St. John had a horse to sell, and he loaded him up with ginger, and as the horse appeared lively and in fine condition he was able to sell the animal, but after the effects of the ginger wore away the horse was the same old horse.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN: Will my hon. friend say that Lloyd George is only a ginger horse?

Mr. PUGSLEY: This occasion gives me an opportunity of speaking concerning a subject which is very dear to my heart, and which has been suggested by my right hon. friend the leader of the Government. I refer to the subject of shipbuilding in Canada. The Prime Minister stated that the great cry of Lloyd George was for ships, more ships, still more ships. Those in this country who have given the subject any consideration whatever are not surprised that the demand should have arisen for more ships. That demand has been increasing ever since this war broke out. Any man with any foresight, any man whose duty it has been to look ahead to the interest of this country must have foreseen that the time would come when ships would be imperatively required in order to carry on the transportation business, not only of Canada so far as its coastal transportation is concerned, but between Canada and the Mother Country. Yet, to-day we are in this lamentable position, that—to the shame of the Government be it said—not one effective step has been taken by this Government for the building by the Government of ships in Canada, at the expense of Canada, for the assistance of Canada and of the Empire.

That condition of things is utterly inexcusable. We all know very well that it is difficult to build steel ships in this country because of the demand for steel for industries connected with the war, but there is no country in the world which offers greater opportunities for the building of wooden vessels. On the Pacific coast we have vast virgin forests where timber in abundance can be obtained for the building, not of a hundred nor a thousand, but, if need be, of ten thousand ships. We have on our far western coast many places where ships could be built. The same is true of eastern Canada at Quebec, Montreal, Three Rivers, and other points all the way down the St. Lawrence. In Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, and Prince Edward Island, there are abundant opportunities for establishing plants suitable for the building of ships, and yet not one step has been taken by the Government although three years have elapsed since the outbreak of war. The cry of Lloyd George is for ships, more ships and still more ships, and the British Government, through Mr. Balfour, when he arrived at Washington a few days ago, made an appeal to the United States Government to send them cruisers, destroyers, even tug-boats, wooden vessels, in fact, any kind of ships available in order to assist the Allies in this great crisis. The Minister of Finance stated some time ago that arrangements were being made with the Imperial Munitions Board under which this Government was to lend the money to build ships, and the Minister of Trade and Commerce stated the other day that the Imperial Munitions Board were arranging for the building of wooden ships in Canada, and he told me that I might inquire of the Imperial Munitions Board for information. I did inquire and what did I find? I found that the Imperial Munitions Board are not proposing to let any contracts for the construction of ships of less than 2,500 tons and 250 feet in length, or two and one-half times the tonnage of the ships for which the United States government has provided. Immediately upon the outbreak of war, the United States government gave an order for 1,000 wooden ships of capacity of 1,000 tons each. Yet the Imperial Munitions Board is not providing that any wooden ships shall be built in Canada unless the tonnage reaches 2,500 tons, thus utterly and absolutely debarring eastern Canada from the opportunity of building wooden ships. Because on account of the timber we have available in eastern Canada, we can only build ships running from 500 to 1,000 tons. Is the Government aware of this? When the Minister of Trade and Commerce made the statement a few days ago that provision was being made to utilize every shipyard in Canada for the building of ships, was he aware that the specifications of the Imperial Munitions Board would absolutely limit the building of these wooden vessels to British Columbia, where large timber is available? Is this reasonable? Is it in the interest of the country? Is it in the interest of the Empire? In eastern Canada there could be turned out hundreds and thousands of vessels running from 500 to 1,000 tons, which would be of enormous service in the transportation business. Norwegian wooden vessels are coming into the Maritime ports every week running from 300 to 600 tons; they are doing a splendid business and are of great service as far as transportation is concerned. And yet with these facts staring them in the face this Government sees the Imperial Munitions Board limiting the specifications to such a tonnage as will restrict the building of ships to our western coast, and making no provision whatever for the building of ships on the Atlantic coast and on the river St. Lawrence. I invite the attention of the Government now to this serious condition of affairs. Although three years have passed away, will they not even at this late date take steps to encourage the building of wooden vessels in eastern Canada?

When I heard my right hon. friend the Prime Minister speaking this afternoon, I wondered if my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Hazen) heard that statement of Premier Lloyd George. If he did, he must have had the nightmare as he crossed the Atlantic on his way back to Canada. He must have dreamed of Courtenay Bay and of the great shipyards which would have been created at St. John if the proposed contract arranged for by the Liberal Government had been carried into effect. In his dreams he must have seen the great ships that would have been under construction if that contract had been carried out. He must have seen these being followed by mercantile ships and a force of from 6,000 to 10,000 men employed in the shipyards. Later on in the night, there must have come to him a vision of Courtenay bay idle, silent, not a ship on the stocks, not a man employed, not a penny's worth of work being done, all still and silent as the grave. Having these visions, first, of what might have been, and secondly, of what is, my hon. friend must have regretted very much his own action or rather inaction, and the inaction of his colleagues, when they threw up the contract with the great shipbuilding firm of Cammell Laird & Co., and returned the security which my hon. friend had in his hands when he came into office as Minister of Marine and Fisheries. Why, Sir, not only have three years since the war broke out been wasted, but the six years since this Government came into power have been absolutely wasted so far as regards the establishment of one of the greatest and most important services of this country is concerned. Not only are the British Government and our Allies seriously affected by want of transportation facilities across the Atlantic, but our coastal trade is also in a horrible condition. In the city in which my hon. friend lives, for instance, the price of anthracite coal which comes from Pennsylvania is going up by leaps and bounds. During last winter our people paid three times as much for their coal as they paid three or four years ago, and I am told that owing to the scarcity of shipping to bring coal from the mines of Pennsylvania to the ports of the Maritime Provinces, the price will in all probability go up to $20 a ton next winter. You can realize, Sir, how seriously that affects the industries in that portion of the Dominion, and when I speak of St. John I am only speaking of a condition of affairs that exists in every seaport town in Canada. I appealed to my hon. friend the Minister of Labour a while ago to look into this question of the high cost of fuel, and all he said was, that he had made inquiries, but had no remedy to suggest. Sir, the only remedy is for this Government to engage at once, as a government, in the building of vessels not only for the carrying on of our Transatlantic trade, but for the coastal business of this country as well, so that something may be done to relieve the terrible condition of stress in which our people find themselves to-day. Will my appeal still fall on deaf ears? I and other hon. gentlemen on this side of the House have been making the same appeal for the last three years, but nothing has been done. May I venture to hope in view of the appeal which the Prime Minister says Premier Lloyd George has made to him for ships, more ships and still more ships, that the Government will wake up and display if only for a little while a little of that dose of ginger which my hon. friend from South York says has been infused into them, and take some effective measures along these lines.

My hon. friend the Prime Minister also spoke of the question of food supplies. Let me say to these hon. gentlemen who have been away from Canada for three months almost,—and in view of the report which has been submitted this afternoon and which shows no tangible results of their visit to the Mother Country, away, I am bound to say, from the post of duty where they ought to have remained—in that time the people of this country have seen the cost of foodstuffs going up by leaps and bounds and have appealed to this Governmen for relief, but without effect. The price of flour has gone up until it is now almost $16 a barrel, and unless something is done it will go up to $20 or $25 a barrel. The price of flour is a terrible hardship to the poor people of this country, and it is a matter to which the Government should devote its attention. We have urged the Government over and over again to take charge of the flour milling industry of this country, but nothing has been done. If the Government want to secure cheap flour for the consumers of Canada and of Europe, they must control its manufacture and prevent the millers from reaping the enormous profits which they are now taking out of the people of Canada and of the Old Country. The Government have been urged to do this. They have been told that it is feasible; every practical man will tell you it is feasible. But although all these appeals have been made in respect of flour, as in respect to shipbuilding, the Government seems to be deaf to the demands of the people of this country, deaf to the demand of the people's representatives in this Parliament on this side of the House.

My right hon. friend the Prime Minister made such an able and eloquent speech this afternoon that one hates to suggest any difference from him, or to make any criticism of what has been accomplished on the other side. But as I listened to his observations I was driven to the conclusion which I have just stated, that the three months they were away from this country was time in which they were away from the post of duty where their presence was required. One very important subject that came up for the consideration of those jingoists in England, who have a certain amount of influence with the present Government, and whose representative is, I think, a former citizen of Canada, Lord Beaverbrook, who himself advocated the scheme, and who, I have no doubt, had a great deal to do with these hon. gentlemen being invited to go to England at this time, was the reconstruction of the Empire, the question of Imperial federation. We know that there are a good many people in England who have been strongly agitating that question, and have been hoping that the Dominion would be drawn into an arrangement of that kind. But I believe that if that arrangement were consummated it would be the first step toward the breaking up of the Empire, instead of a step toward its greater consolidation. The Prime Minister tells us that that question was considered. He expressed his great thanks to the group of young enthusiasts in Great Britain who had been so earnestly agitating Imperial federation. But the Conference passed a resolution identical with the position taken by Sir Wilfrid Laurier when he attended the Imperial Conferences. I have here extracts from one of the leading English newspapers making reference to the speech of General Smuts. I think the people have a great deal to thank General Smuts for; I believe that he, more than all others, has prevented the idea of Imperial federation going into effect so far as the Conference was concerned. Here is what is reported in the Ottawa Journal of this evening, in a telegram from London:

London, May 18.—Editorially discussing General Smuts' speech, in which he regarded the British Empire not as a state, but as a system of nations, the Daily Telegraph says it is a difference which goes to the very root of the Imperial fabric. "The oneness of New Zealand or Australia with Great Britain," says the Telegraph, "must be different not merely from that of India, where there is no kinship of blood or community of language and ideas, but also from that of Canada and South Africa, in each of which are two sturdy different stocks which, at the present time, can hardly be said to desire complete fusion, even as an ideal.

"To ignore this great fact because it is an awkward stumbling block to the realization of a cherished political theory is not statesmanship, but the negation of statesmanship."

Referring to General Smuts' assertion, that the British commonwealth of nations does not stand for standardization or conventionalism, the Telegraph says: "There is one other great Imperial statesman who will certainly applaud and endorse that sentiment, namely, Sir Wilfrid Laurier. It is exactly the point he has always laid stress on when Imperial federationists have seemed to him to press forward at too rapid a pace."

[Mr. Pugsley.]

That is a striking tribute to the stand that Sir Wilfrid Laurier took during all the years he was at the head of the Government of Canada. The final action of this War Cabinet is the greatest possible rebuke to those who have been condemning Sir Wilfrid Laurier because he has always pronounced for the autonomy of Canada and other overseas dominions of the Empire. Then, again, what a striking endorsement it is of the position which the Liberal party has always taken in reference to the British preference. After many days of conference the Imperial War Cabinet came to the conclusion that the British Parliament should not impose any duty on foodstuffs, and that the overseas dominions did not expect Britain to give any preference upon foodstuffs coming from those dominions. But there was no need to go to London to have that declared. That was declared, so far as Canada was concerned, in 1897, when the British preference was established by the Parliament of Canada, at the instance of the Liberal party led by Sir Wilfrid Laurier. At that time the Liberal Government and the Parliament of Canada said to the British people: We give you a preference in the markets of this country for all the manufactures and other products of Great Britain; we give you that preference freely and voluntarily, exacting nothing in return; we do not ask the Imperial Parliament to tax foodstuffs and to make dearer the food of the British people. It would be interesting for you, Mr. Speaker (Mr. Blain) to look over the pages of Hansard and see how the party led by the present Prime Minister regarded that action of the Liberal party at that time. They condemned that action. They said it was entirely against the interests of Canada to grant any preference in Canada unless the Imperial Parliament also granted a preference to the foodstuffs of Canada in the markets of Great Britain. And, if I am not mistaken, it is on record that the right hon. gentleman (Sir Robert Borden) voted against a resolution in this Parliament approving the action of the Government of that day in granting the British preference. I know his party voted in that way, and I think his name is recorded with the others. There was no occasion for three members of the Government to go to England for the purpose of having that declared a proper policy, which was declared twenty years ago by this Parliament and approved of generally by the people of Britain.

If you eliminate these matters to which I have referred, what else is there of importance that the Imperial War Cabinet considered? They considered the question of the temptations placed in the way of our soldiers at the front. Sir George Perley is the acting High Commissioner for Canada, and Overseas Minister, receiving a very handsome salary. One would suppose that he could acquaint this Government with what is going on and that through him any action reasonably possible to take might be taken. This, surely, was not a subject making necessary investigation by these gentlemen for so many weeks, if not months. I can not at the moment think of anything else of urgent importance that was considered. The Prime Minister says that he has noticed in the papers suggestions that he and his colleagues were having a good time in England. We can not be blamed for what the newspapers say, and I am inclined to think that the newspapers can not be blamed for the reports they give. It was open to every one to see, day after day and week after week, what was going on. The Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Hazen) the Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden) and the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Rogers), we read, dined with His Majesty the King. The newspapers could not blind their eyes to the fact that the Prime Minister received the freedom of several cities in England, and that excellent speeches were made on these occasions. The newspapers must have seen that these gentlemen, during the Easter holidays and at other times, were having a good time—

Mr. JAMESON: Surely the hon. gentleman does not call that of which he has just been speaking "having a good time"?

Mr. PUGSLEY: A very excellent and pleasant time. But, as to real work, I would like these gentlemen to tell us what they have done that could not have been done equally well by correspondence or through the Overseas Minister, who is also the acting High Commissioner? When they went to England, I joined heartily with other members on this side of the House in wishing them Godspeed on their journey, and in expressing the hope that they would be able to accomplish something for Canada and for the Empire. They come back empty handed except with this beautiful mace that is now lying on the Table. My right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition was happy in the remarks which he made in reference to that a few days ago. Really that is the only tangible, the only substantial thing that they have brought back.

But just a word in regard to the very important subject which my right hon. friend has referred to and which, of course, has nothing to do with his visit to the other side of the water. That is the question of conscription. This House, I would suppose, would hardly be called upon to express an opinion on this important question until the particulars have been brought down. The statement has been made that it is to be selective conscription. As to whether the country will be satisfied with the measure of conscription which is proposed will depend very much upon how the selection is to be made. I could understand that in England, where they have a national Government, a Government free from all partisanship, a Government which is absolutely non-partisan in its character, selective conscription could be worked out to the general satisfaction of the people. But if, in this country, when the war broke out, this Government had created an absolutely national, non-partisan Government, and if the war had been carried on irrespective of party consideration and of party patronage, the Government would be in a very different position to-day to ask the country to trust them with the duty of carrying out selective conscription. We have no intimation from the Prime Minister as to how the duty of carrying out the selection is to be performed. If patronage is to enter into it, if partisanship is to enter into it, as it appears to have entered into everything connected with the war, then it is very doubtful if the people of the country will be satisfied with it. I agree with my right hon. friend the leader of the Oposition that the people are united in their desire to do everything that is possible to win this war. If conscription is necessary in order to have more men available at the front, I think the people will agree to conscription, but I also think, Sir, that the people will demand that there shall be conscription, not merely of man power, but of the accumulated wealth in this country as well. They will demand that. The people, and especially the labouring people, will not be content that the youth of Canada should be conscripted and sent by force to the front while the wealth of this country is allowed to go scot free. It will demand that conscription shall be applied so as to do equal justice to all classes in the community. I shall await with interest the bringing down of the measure providing for conscription before venturing any opinion as to whether it should be approved of by the House, but I, as one humble member of this House would say that a great deal will depend on the mode in which selective—because that word "selective" is a most important word in connection with it—conscription is to be carried out.

Hon. J. D. HAZEN (Minister of Marine and of Naval Service): Mr. Speaker, I think it will be admitted by every member of this House and by every person throughout the country wherever the speech of my right hon. friend is read, that this afternoon, dealing with a question of very great and far-reaching importance, that the Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden) made a deliverance that can be characterized properly and truthfully as dignified and statesmanlike. I think it may also be said that my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfred Laurier), in his short address, dealt with the matter in a way that was worthy of one occupying the high position he occupies in this House. The hon. member for South York (Mr. Maclean), who also addressed the House, spoke from the standpoint of the public interest, and it remained for my hon. friend from St. John (Mr. Pugsley) to deal with this transcendent Imperial question from the standpoint of petty party politics. It is to be regretted that an hon. gentleman possessing the ability and long parliamentary experience of my hon. friend should never be able to get away, in dealing with any question before this House, from a desire to secure party advantage. As a matter of fact, the hon. gentleman of late years has got so that he cannot deal with any question, I think I am within the mark in saying so, from the standpoint of the public interest no matter how important that question may be to the people of the country, but he thinks it necessary, with every question, great or small, to descend into the realm of petty, partisan discussion irrespective of what the public interest may be, his desire being to advance party interests first and the interest of the country afterwards. I think it is related of Queen Mary of England that she said that when she died the word "Calais" would be found engraved upon her heart. I am disposed to think that my hon. friend has taken Courtenay Bay so much to heart that when my hon. friend dies "Courtenay Bay" will be found engraved on his heart although, for personal reasons, I hope and trust that his demise may be postponed for a very long period. My hon. friend invariably, since the session of 1912, has repeated his speech on Courtenay Bay six or seven times during every session, and when he makes that speech I am always reminded of the story of the man who, to save time, instead of saying his prayers at night, had his prayer written on a card which he hung on a post at the foot of his bed, and when he got into bed he pointed to the card and said: Lord, those are my sentiments. It would save a great deal of the time of this House if the hon. gentleman would adopt some such course in regard to that speech which, I venture to say, nearly every hon. member of this House has by memory now and could get up and repeat in exactly the same words as my hon. friend has used here tonight and on many previous occasions. I must say, however, that there are some very notable omissions from the speech of my hon. friend. My hon. friend always puts it forward that had the contract been awarded for cruisers and destroyers, for which tenders were asked by the Government of which he was a member, they would have been built at Courtenay Bay in the vicinity of St. John. My hon. friend always forgets to tell this House, what I must remind him of, how these tenders were received nearly six months before the date of the general election of 1911, and how they were placed in a pigeon hole in one of the departments and never again saw the light of day. If the hon. gentleman had been in earnest, if he had been sincere, if he had ever believed that they were to be built in Courtenay Bay, would he have allowed six months, or practically six months, to pass without any action being taken upon them? When the hon. gentleman went out of power the tenders were resurrected from the pigeon hole to which they had been consigned. My hon. friend says that these vessels would have been built at Courtenay Bay. My hon. friend always forgets to tell this House that his honoured leader told this House that had his Government stayed in power these cruisers and destroyers would have been built at Montreal.

I have previously asked my hon. friend to reconcile the statement he so often makes with the statement of his leader, but that he has not been able to do and cannot do. For six months those tenders were pigeonholed and nothing was done; but when the elections took place it was held out as a glittering bait to the people of St. John, the people of Halifax, the people of Montreal, and the people of Sydney that if the Government was returned to power theirs would be the places where those cruisers and destroyers would be built. When I came into office as Minister of the Naval Service I found—

Mr. PUGSLEY: I wish to correct my hon. friend. My hon. friend says that for six months these tenders remained in a pigeon hole. I want to tell him that these tenders and specifications were taken by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries to England for the purpose of consultation with the authorities there, and brought back from England very shortly before the elections took place.

Mr. HAZEN: And that is the explanation my hon. friend made to this House before, an explanation that must be utterly unsatisfactory to this House and to the people of this country. Why were they taken to England? Why were they not dealt with here? To-night my hon. friend objects because members of the Government went to England at the request of the British Government. Why should this matter, a matter that should have been dealt with by the Government of Canada if they had made up their minds as to the policy they were to pursue, why, may I ask my hon. friend, who talks so much about Canadian autonomy to-night, should these tenders be taken to England? Parliamentary language might perhaps not permit me to say—

Mr. PUGSLEY: Does the minister want my answer?

Mr. HAZEN: —that the excuse is a mere excuse and is not a reason.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Will the minister allow me to answer, or does he desire an answer?

Mr. HAZEN: If the hon. gentleman waits until I have concluded my speech he may answer. The hon. gentleman has a habit of always interrupting when a member is addressing the House—

Mr. PUGSLEY: You asked me a question

Mr. HAZEN: And while that is the case there is no member so sensitive to interruption or who resents it so much as my hon. friend when he is on his feet. I say that my hon. friend when again addressing the House on this subject would do well to tell the facts of the case. It makes little difference, they have been told over and over again in this country and are well known to the people. My hon. friend can go on repeating his excuse for many years to come but he will fail to make any impression upon the people of Canada or on the people of the constituency which he especially desires to influence by the statements he is making in regard to this matter.

My hon friend (Mr. Pugsley) has to-night made the claim that this Government has done nothing to advance ship building in Canada. One would think from the statement of my hon. friend that really nothing was being done about the building of ships in this country. Let me point out, what every member knows, that every ship yard in Canada is full to capacity at the present time, building ships for the purposes of the British Government and for purposes of trade between this country and Great Britain. My hon. friend says that the Imperial Munitions Board will not award contracts for ships of less than 2,500 tons. Let us see what has been the connection of the Imperial Munitions Board, a Board responsible to the British Government alone, with this matter. The British Government, after the reconstruction of the Cabinet under the leadership of Mr. Lloyd George, appointed a controller of shipping, and for that position they obtained the services of one of the most experienced shipping men in the world, Sir Joseph MacLay, the head of a great shipping firm in the city of Glasgow, a firm known the world over. Sir Joseph MacLay has been wrestling with this question of acquiring ships since he came into office; it is admitted on all sides in the British Isles that no more capable man could be found for the task. When I was in Great Britain I spent many hours with Sir Joseph MacLay and his officers discussing these matters. I was at his office time after time, discussing with him and members of the Department over which he presides, the shipping situation, pointing out to them the advantages which were offered in Canada for the conctruction of ships, and I do not think I am speaking in any language of exaggeration when I say that I believe it was in part at least due to the efforts I made that many of those contracts upon which our Canadian ship yards are now working were placed in Canada. These ships are being built for Great Britain and for British trade. They are being built for the purpose of relieving, as far as may be, the serious condition of affairs that exists to-day, because, in consequence of the operations of the submarines, and of the fact that Great Britain has had to supply shipping not only to meet the requirements and wants of the people of the British Isles, but also the requirements of her Allies, there has not been available as much shipping as is necessary to carry to Great Britain the commodities required for use there. As a result of that situation, the greatest economy and frugality must be exercised, and that condition will continue to exist between now and the next harvest, in order that the people of the British Isles may have sufficient food for their wants. As a matter of fact, the condition is so serious that for three or four weeks before we left Great Britain no potatoes at all were served at the hotel where we were staying, or at any hotel in the city of London. Sugar was extremely scarce, and flour was scarce and had to be carefully husbanded. At the hotel where we were staying, under the order of the director of food supply, Lord Devonport, only a small portion of bread was served to the guests at each meal, and we saw no such thing as white bread, because the wheat flour was being mixed with rye and with meal made from barley in order to make the wheat flour go as far as possible. That is the state of affairs, and it has been brought about in consequence of the lack of tonnage to carry foodstuffs in large quantities to feed the people of the British Isles.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Hear, hear.

Mr. HAZEN: I do not think for a moment that there is going to be starvation in the British Isles. There is lots of food of certain sorts. There seemed to be no lack of meat or fish or other foods of that sort. Still, economy and frugality and prudence will have to be exercised, and Sir Joseph MacLay is doing his utmost, with a large staff of competent shipping men about him, to utilize the shipping facilities of Great Britain, Canada and all other parts of the world. In order to make good as far as possible the ravages and losses caused by the submarine campaign and by the diverserion of a large number of ships from commercial traffic in consequence of their being employed in the transport of troops and munitions to distant countries and theatres of war, these steps are necessary.

All these facts are in the mind of the shipping controller, who occupies a most responsible position to-day. In consequence of that, he is making arrangements for the building of ships in Canada, through the instrumentality of the Imperial Munitions Board, which is responsible to the British Government alone, the expenses being financed I believe, although I am not quite positive, in whole by the Government of Canada, who are making the advances for the purpose of carrying on this work. However, I make this statement subject to correction, because certain arrangements were made when I was away and I have not been able to catch up with my work since my return and get full information on all the subjects with which I should be familiar. As I say, those contracts are being made in Canada, but the shipping controller and his staff have decided that the ships they require are to be of not less than 2,500 tons dead weight capacity.

That is the decision that the British Government has come to through the responsible department of the shipping controller. It is for that reason that the Imperial Munitions Board cannot place contracts for ships that are smaller than 2,500 tons. There is no doubt that in different parts of Canada, along the coast of the Maritime Provinces, in British Columbia, on the St. Lawrence and at other places, many ships can be built and are being built to-day. In the province of Nova Scotia a large number of ships——

Mr. PUGSLEY: By private parties.

Mr. HAZEN: By private parties, and these private parties, at the present rate of freight, if they have any luck at all and escape the submarines, will make most handsome dividends and profits. Numbers of ships are being built to-day by private parties.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Could the minister tell me the highest tonnage of these ships?

Mr HAZEN: I am told that the ships being built in Nova Scotia run from 1,500 tons down to small vessels of say 150 tons. I believe that a large number of them are under construction in Nova Scotia. When I was in England I pointed out to the Shipping Controller the desirability of utilizing all the wooden shipping possible for the purpose of carrying foods across the ocean. Since returning to Canada I have again communicated with Sir Joseph Maclay and Right Hon. Walter Long, impressing the desirability of the matter upon them and asking for further consideration of it.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Why do they not accept smaller vessels?

Mr. HAZEN: What ground of criticism is there against the Government because the Imperial Munitions Board is not awarding contracts for the construction of ships of less than 2,500 tons, having regard to the statement of facts that I have put before the House to-night? In what way is the Canadian Government responsible or to blame for that? After all, if we have shipyards employed to their utmost capacity; if smaller yards are employed by private individuals who are enterprising enough to go into business and to build ships in very considerable numbers, in what way does the interest of the country suffer? though at the same time I would hope that the British Government would see its way clear as a matter of policy to decide that ships of less than 2,500 tons should be built for them in Canada under the control and jurisdiction of the Munitions Board. When my hon. friend addressed the House he should have known, if he did not know, that in what they were doing the Imperial Munitions Board were following the direction of the Shipping Controller of Great Britain. If he did know that, or if he did not know it—more especially if he did know it—it is evident that my hon. friend was not so desirous of assisting to advance the commercial and shipbuilding interests of Canada as he was to score a point against the Government, basing his argument on premises that were not substantial and on a condition of affairs for which the Government are in no sense responsible. These are the facts, and that is my excuse for replying to what my hon. friend said this afternoon.

Passing from what my hon. friend has said, I would refer for a few moments to the remarks that were made this afternoon by the right hon. gentleman who leads the Opposition. My right hon. friend had very little criticism to make with regard to the statement of the right hon. leader of the House as to what occurred at the meetings of the Imperial War Cabinet and of the Imperial Conference. My hon. friend did indulge in a little criticism of the hon. Prime Minister because the Minister of Public Works was one of the gentlemen who were asked to accompany him to England. The right hon. leader of the Opposition said that in his opinion the two ministers who should have accompanied him to England were the Minister of Naval Service and the Minister of Militia. The Minister of Militia declined to go to England because he had been in office only a few weeks, was overburdened with work, had upon his shoulders the responsibility of what is to-day the most important department of the Government, and had to acquire a knowledge of that department to enable him to administer it with the success with which, I am glad to say, he is administering it. Moreover, there is an Overseas Minister of Militia in the person of Sir George Perley, a very capable business man who is devoting himself entirely to the work of the militia and of the High Commissioner's office in London. Having all these facts in mind, it was considered that it would be possible to allow the Minister of Militia to remain in his office at Ottawa and that the hon. Minister of Public Works might accompany the Prime Minister in his place to the old country. When there we were in constant and daily touch with Sir George Perley; we were in constant and daily touch with the authorities in the War Office and with the authorities of the Admiralty Department. The right hon. gentleman, in making this criticism, did not press the point very much and was not himself, I believe, very strongly impressed with the force of the criticism that he was making.

The member for St. John says that the Conference and the War Cabinet were barren of result and he would have the country believe that the members of the Government who were over there were not engaged in serious work; that they were indulging in junketing trips about the country; that they were simply enjoying themselves in a social way and were not properly attending to the business of the country. I say, Sir, that a meaner insinuation was never made to this Parliament or to the people. In many respects I entertain a feeling of great regard for my hon. friend, but I say that it is not worthy of him to make a charge of that kind against the Prime Minister and two of the members of the Government. Not only is it unworthy of him, but it is another evidence of the fact that he views the questions that come before this House only from the narrow standpoint of petty politics and that he cannot rise to the position of a statesman and discuss big issues in a statesmanlike, dignified and proper manner as is fitting in a great Parliament like this. Let me tell my hon. friend that while I am in Ottawa during the session of the House, every moment of my time is occupied. Any man who has been in a ministerial position, as many of my hon. friends whom I see opposite have been, know that no man can discharge the duties of a minister of the Crown during a session of Parliament in ordinary times, without devoting his whole thought, time and attention to the duties of that office. But busy as I have been during the past sessions, more especially since the war broke out, and during the time when extraordinary work has been thrown upon the department of which I am the head, I never did a greater amount of harder and more exacting work during a session of Parliament in Ottawa than I had to perform during the time I was in Great Britain. It was a relief to me when we got on the steamer at Liverpool on our way to Canada to obtain a few days rest after the strenuous work that we had beeen undertaking. I am sure my hon. friend will realize how unfair it is that the suggestion should go abroad that men in responsible positions in the Government, when upon a mission which in point of importance was as great as any that Canadian statesmen ever went on, should be idling away their time, indulging in social pleasures and neglecting the business for which they went overseas.

My hon. friend is not satisfied with what the Imperial Conference has done; nor is he satisfied with what the War Cabinet has done. In this respect, my hon. friend differs very much from the gentleman who at the present time, with the general consent of all parties in the state, is Prime Minister of Great Britain. Mr. Lloyd George, in addressing the War Cabinet at its last meeting, gave us this message. Let me remind the House, however, in the first place, that three days in the week we had meetings of the Imperial Conference and, on the other three days, meetings of the Imperial War Cabinet. In addition to that there were committees on which we served, and it was my privilege to serve on two or three most important committees, one, regarding tonnage restrictions, on which I served along with members of the British Government and members of the Overseas Governments, another with regard to conditions which might arise when terms of peace were proposed, and on this latter committee there were four members of the British Cabinet and it was presided over by Lord Curzon, who himself was one of the five members of the British War Cabinet. Mr. Lloyd George, in saying farewell to us, said that the presence of the overseas representatives of the War Cabinet not only was an encouragement and a support to the Government of Great Britain, but had proved to them a real and genuine help. He further said that everything that the British Government knew had been unreservedly placed at the disposal of the representatives of the overseas Dominions, and that it would be a great mistake if the experiment that had been made in calling together an Imperial War Cabinet this year was not repeated and incorporated in the very machinery of the Empire. That, he said, was the opinion of every member of the British Government. For that reason Mr. Lloyd George said that in his opinion, war or no war, a session of the Imperial War Cabinet should be convened at least annually, for the purpose of reviewing, apart from the war, the general foreign policy of the British Empire. It was inconceivable, he said that after this war, the overseas Dominions should not be, not only fully informed as to all matters of foreign policy, but consulted before any such policy was agreed upon by the British Government, and he went on then to say that in his opinion, as the Prime Minister stated this afternon, the Imperial Cabinet should consist of the Prime Minister of Great Britain and certain other ministers, such as the Colonial Secretary, the Secretary of State for India, the War Minister and the First Lord of the Admiralty, whose duties would naturally bring them more closely in touch with Imperial affairs than others, and the Prime Ministers of the overseas Dominions. He did not refer to the overseas Dominions as dependencies, as I was sorry to hear my hon. friend on the other side refer to them to-night. The word "dependency" grates harshly on my ear. Mr. Lloyd George said that the Prime Ministers of the overseas Dominions should attend these War Conferences, and if the Prime Minister of any overseas Dominion was for any reason unable to attend, then a minister delegated by him and given extensive powers should attend and also such other ministers from the overseas Dominions as the Prime Minister considered would be of value at the conference, because of any information they might through their departments possess of matters of special import concerning the Dominions overseas and the relations of the Empire abroad. That was the opinion of Mr. Lloyd George, and he said that that was the opinion of every member of the Government. The Government of Great Britain to-day is composed of men of different political faiths. There are men who are Liberals, men who are Conservatives and men who are special representatives of the great labour interests of the country. The War Cabinet, for instance, consists of five men: Mr. Lloyd George, a Liberal; Mr. Bonar Law, a Conservative; Lord Milner and Lord Curzon, Conservatives, and Mr. Arthur Henderson, the representative of the labour interests of the country. The Government itself, outside of the War Cabinet, is composed of men of different political parties, and Mr. Lloyd George, speaking for them, referred to the services rendered by the overseas representatives at the War Cabinet in the language which I have used, and which is substantially correct, even, I think in many cases, to the words that he used. That being the case, perhaps those of us who accompanied the Prime Minister overseas and the Prime Minister himself will not feel so badly, as we otherwise might at the fact that the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley) thinks we are of no service and have accomplished no good.

Something has been said to-night about Imperial federation. I never knew exactly what was meant by Imperial federation, except this: there never was any hard or fast scheme to which any great body of people in this country committed themselves, and my understanding of the phrase Imperial federation did not necessarily imply an Imperial Parliament; it did not necessarily imply the sacrifice of a single iota of our autonomy or independence or liberty. If it did no man in this country would support such an idea for a single moment. What I have always understood by Imperial federation was that there should be a closer drawing together in the bonds of union, friendship, sympathy and common support, and the maintenance of a common Empire of Great Britain and its overseas Dominions and India and all the countries generally that make up the British Empire. Speaking from that standpoint, I believe that the result flowing from that meeting of the War Cabinet this year, with the declaration that no question of foreign policy will be embarked upon without the overseas Dominions being consulted and without all the information being placed before them, is the greatest advance in the way of linking together more closely for common support and for the objects that are dear to the hearts of the people throughout the Empire that has occurred since the British Empire was first known to exist. To-day we have the fact that on an equal footing, with Great Britain, perhaps, being primus inter pares—the first among equals—our statesmen, whatever party may be in power, are to meet year by year with the members of the British Cabinet for the purpose of considering and discussing questions that are for the interest and promotion of the cause of Empire the world over. Could there have been taken any more effective step without sacrificing one single jot or iota of our independence, political freedom or political autonomy? I believe, when party passion disappears, and the events of this year are viewed dispassionately, as they will be by the historian of the future, it will be admitted that one of the greatest steps ever taken for the advancement of the cause of this Empire and the uniting together more closely its component parts in bonds of friendship that in no way interfere with the independence of the Empire, was taken during the last few weeks, and it is one that I believe will, in the future, redound to the advancement of every part of this Empire and go a long way towards ensuring the future peace of the world. I did not intend to speak to-night, and I do not want to trespass much upon the time of the House, because there may be another opportunity for taking up in detail the questions that have been referred to. The resolutions that were passed at the Conference I do not intend to take up in detail, nor at any great length, but there are a few matters that have been referred to in the course of the debate this afternoon in regard to which I will crave a few moments of the indulgence of the House before I take my seat.

Reference was made in this House and we saw references in the press to the drinking habits of the Canadian soldiers in the different camps in which they were placed in Great Britain. I want to tell this House in regard to that matter a few facts, more in detail than the matter was referred to by the Prime Minister this afternoon. At one of the meetings of the Imperial Conference Sir Edward Henry, Chief of Police of the city of London, appeared before us, and he told us that in what he spoke of as the London area, there were from three to four hundred thousand soldiers every night; that many of them were on leave from the trenches, and many of them were going to or coming from the front. As a result, the streets of London were frequented in large numbers by these men.

Most of them were men without relatives or friends, and many of them naturally sought human society and human comfort, and yet Sir Edward Henry told us that of the 300,000 or 400,000 men who were in the London area every night, the largest number of soldiers who had ever been arrested in one night for drunkenness was 16, and the number hardly ever exceeded 10 or 13. I do not think anything could speak more strongly for the sobriety and good-behavior of the soldiers there. The soldiers Sir Henry referred to were not all Canadians; some were from Australia, or New Zealand; many of them were British; and there were others from almost every quarter of the globe. These figures, I repeat, are a splendid tribute to the sobriety of the soldiers who are fighting the battles of the Empire at the present time.

Coming more directly to the Canadian soldier, against whom I understand a charge was made in this House, the day before I left England I received a letter from General Steele, in command of the Canadian troops at Shorncliffe. This letter was not written at any solicitation of mine.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I wish to correct my hon. friend. He says a charge was made in this House against the Canadian soldier. If he is referring to the matter my hon. friend from Rouville brought before the House, I would point out that what the hon. member for Rouville did was to read a letter from an officer who had been in England, in which a complaint was made against the wet canteen, which the officer said was a temptation to the Canadian soldier.

Mr. CROTHERS: And a complaint against a dry canteen, too.

Mr. HAZEN: I did not have the pleasure of hearing the speech of my hon. friend from Rouville, but I saw in the English press—and it may have been an erroneous impression of what the hon. member said—that the hon. member for Rouville had criticised the wet canteen and alleged that as a result of it there was a great deal of drunkenness among the Canadian troops in England. I would not for one moment do the slightest injustice to the hon. member for Rouville, who is a friend of mine, and for whom I entertain feelings of very great regard. I am only stating that as a result of his speech that impression did get abroad, although, of course, the hon. gentleman may not have so intended.

Mr. PUGSLEY: He read a letter from an officer who had been in England.

Mr. HAZEN: I have here a letter which I received from General Steele, commanding the Canadian troops at Shorncliffe. I think everyone in this House knows of General Steele, of his standing as a soldier, of his record in the Mounted Police, and of his South African career:—

Headquarters, Shorncliffe Command,,
4th May, 1917.

Dear Mr. Hazen:—

Regarding the question of drunkenness among Canadian soldiers in England, I am enclosing herewith for your information, as I know the Canadian ministers are deeply concerned on this subject, copy of a newspaper clipping from a Canadian paper, copy of letter which I have written to the General Officer Commanding Canadian Overseas Military Forces in England, and a copy of memo from my D.A.A. & Q.M.G., showing the number and percentage of cases of drunkenness for the month of April, 1917.

This average has during the past year or more neither increased or decreased, although at times there have been from forty to fifty thousand troops in the Shorncliffe area.

Copies of these enclosures have been forwarded to Sir Robert Borden and Colonel the Hon. Robert Rogers. With kind regards,

Yours faithfully,
S. B. Steele.

Hon. D. Hazen, M.P.,
Minister of Marine and Fisheries for Canada, c/o Savoy Hotel, London.

I will now read General Steele's memorandum, which is based on the return furnished to him by Major L. N. H. D'Aeth, D.A.A., and Q.M.G. Shorncliffe Command:—

Headquarters, Shorncliffe Command,
2nd May, 1917.

General Officer Commanding,
Canadian Overseas Military Forces,

Argyll House, 246, Regent Street, London.

With reference to the enclosed typewritten copy of a cutting from a Canadian newspaper, regarding wet canteens in Canadian camps in England, I have received several letters from prominent ladies in Canada relative to the matter of alcoholic temptations to which Canadian soldiers are subject in this country.

With regard to the Canadian troops stationed in the Shorncliffe Imperial Command under my jurisdiction, I would like to state that the percentage of drunkenness during the past two years has been very minute, at the present time, the average works out at only one-third per man per thousand per day. The present strength of Canadian troops in the Shorncliffe area is thirty thousand, more or less, and this number of troops is equivalent to a civilian male population of military age of several hundred thousand. I can say without hesitation, that drunkenness amongut the soldiers in this command is very much less than amongst civilians, and that, in a civilian population of the number stated above, the cases of drunkenness would work out at a higher percentage in comparison with that of the troops. Further, it is observed that, as is well known, a soldier is considered drunk when he is unable to carry out a military duty, whereas a civilian may be even more under the influence of liquor than a soldier but would not be considered intoxicated unless he was unable to walk without assistance or was a disturber of the peace.

I daily see reports from my D.A.A. & Q.M.G., a very capable officer and a good disciplinarian, under whose province such matters come, and find that these reports are quite satisfactory in every respect. Colonel Burns-Begg, the town commandant of Folkestone, has told me personally that the behaviour of the Canadian troops in Folkestone and vicinity has always been of a high order, and that, in comparison with troops elsewhere, they are first in this respect. Ever since I have had this command, I have made it a special point to endeavour to reduce drunkenness to an absolute minimum and feel that efforts in this direction have been successful. At first, the percentage of drunkenness amongst the Canadian troops was higher, but for a long time past it has been as stated. At times there have been over forty thousand Canadian troops here, and cases of drunkenness have been just as rare as at present.

Regarding wet canteens, during the whole of my service I have been a strong advocate of dry canteens in camps in Canada and was the first officer to secure such; I have also made it a point to carefully watch the messes of any unit under my control to secure that moderation is observed at all times and that the iniquitous system of treating was not carried out. Dry canteens in camps removed from towns are practical and sound in Canada, but in camps—as in England—which are in close vicinity to towns where liquor can be obtained, wet canteens are, in my opinion, a safeguard and a help. These wet canteens are most strictly controlled, and sensible men can there secure good wholesome beer. No man, even if he desired (and the great majority have no wish to do so) can secure more liquor than is good for him owing to disciplinary control, and intoxication through the medium of wet canteens is not, therefore, possible.

Regarding public houses, these are also under the surveillance of the military police in addition to the civil police, and the town commandant watches these places very closely. The beer sold there is inspected by Government officials under the Pure Food and Drugs Act to secure that it is wholesome and up to the Government standard.

I would also add that, from my own personal observation, in and around the towns of Folkestone, Sandgate and vicinities, I have not seen any cases of drunkenness; had there been any, I would have noticed them as I have made it a special point to observe the troops in this connection. I feel that, as far as the Shorncliffe area is concerned, the charges made by the people in Canada in regard to drunkenness and the temptations which face the Canadian soldiers in this country are without foundation; rather, on the other hand, are their temptations greatly removed by the strict disciplinary control which is and has been exercised over the wet canteens in the camps at Shorncliffe and over the public houses in the towns adjoining. Personally, as G.O.C. Troops Shorncliffe Command, I have exercised my fullest powers in this matter and am satisfied that, as a result, this evil of drunkenness is virtually non-existent.

S. B. Steele, Major-General,
G.O.C. Troops Shorncliffe.

From other camps I have similar evidence in my possession, but, unfortunately, have not it before me to-night. These statements show a similarly gratifying state of affairs as existing. I certainly hope the press of this country will give as much publicity to the statements made by these responsible officers as has been given to the resolutions and reports that have gone abroad regarding the drunkenness alleged to prevail. It will be comforting to the friends and relatives of the soldiers overseas, and will no doubt relieve the anxiety aroused by the stories that have been circulated of indulgence in alcoholic liquors, to have these authoritative statements concerning the men of our overseas forces who are upholding not only the honour of Canada, but the honour of the Empire as well.

This afternoon the Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden) referred to a visit we had made to France and to the Canadian lines there, where we saw the work carried on at the Canadian headquarters and the British headquarters. He referred to the wonderful work being done by the Canadian construction corps under the command of General "Jack" Stewart, a member of the firm of Foley, Welch and Stewart. The Prime Minister told the House of the railway General Stewart built in four days which the army engineers said it would take six weeks to build. Over a district where the battle had been raging, and where every foot of land for miles and miles had been utterly torn to pieces, where whole villages had been wiped out so that not a vestige was to be seen, we travelled over that railway, and it was explained by the British officers what wonderful work had been done in the construction of these railways and what splendid service the construction corps from Canada had rendered the cause for which we are fighting.

The Prime Minister referred also to the railway men and forestry men as non-combatants. So they are. But, while they are non-combatants, railway men are not free from danger, and the casualties among them have been very great. In many cases these railways are being built actually under shell fire. Their positions are discovered by the Germans and shells are hurled amongst them, and deaths result. Another reason for many casualties is in the many shells that land that fail to explode when fired. These shells lie buried in the mud, and as the railway construction men are at work using ploughs or shovels, the impact upon one of these shells cause it to explode. A large number of casualties result from this cause. So, while they are non-combatants in a sense, at the same time the railway construction men are incurring a danger not very much less than that incurred by the men actually fighting in the trenches. One could not help feeling impressed with the wonderful cheerfulness of the men at the front, their wonderful physique, and the wonderful work they are doing. I never met a man in the trenches who had a complaint to make about anything. They were trying to do their duty for the honour of the Empire and of Canada. And in the different hospitals I visited—and I visited many of them; whenever I had a spare hour or two I went to some of the various hospitals to inquire for our Canadian soldiers, and I think I must have talked to thousands of them—I found the same spirit of cheerfulness prevailing. As far as I could judge from my own observations and from the statements made to me by the men in the hospitals, the Canadian hospital service is one that is a credit to the people of this country, and those who have friends at the front should have the satisfaction of knowing that those friends will receive in our different hospitals the very best of treatment. All these hospitals are equipped with operating rooms, X-ray apparatus, and instruments as modern as can be found in the best hospitals in Canada. The best of Canadian surgeons and doctors are there, and the best of Canadian nurses. And all over the land in England and France I found the women of Canada in the hospitals ministering to the wants of our soldiers who have unfortunately been wounded.

Let me tell a little story illustrating the spirit of the Canadian boys at the front. One night about ten o'clock, after I had returned from a visit to the military camp at Shoreham, I found a cable from a member of this House telling me that he had information that his son had been wounded, and asking me if I could ascertain where he was and what was his condition. It was just after the battle of Vimy Ridge, and many wounded were being brought across the Channel. I at once inquired by telephone among the different hospitals, and at length I found this young man was in the First London General Hospital, and the information I was given was that he had received a flesh wound in the leg, that his condition was not serious, and that he was getting along very well. I wired this information to his father, and the next morning, being Sunday, I went to the hispital to see him. And a more cheerful boy I never saw. Lying in the bed next to him was the brother of a member of this House, the hon. member for Centre York (Mr. Wallace), wounded, but I am glad to say, not seriously. And in another near-by bed was the Colonel of the regiment of the young man, the son of the hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Nickle). He told me the story of the fight. Referring to my hon. friend's son, he said that early in the day the young man was wounded in the head by a piece of shrapnel. The wound bled a good deal, and the young man was ordered back to a dressing station and to fall out. But he would not do so; he said that he would be disgraced forever if he did; that he was there to help to take Vimy Ridge and he wanted to go on. His Colonel allowed him to have his way. Later in the fight, the boy received the wound which caused his removal to the hospital. This is illustrative of the courage and spirit that characterizes all our Canadian boys at the front, so far as I could see, without one single exception.

Many members of this House have sons in the fighting force. I think that nearly every member who has a son of military age has that son serving at the front. Some have unfortunately lost their sons in the war. The Prime Minister referred to the fact that arrangements had been made that the graveyards in which the Canadian soldiers are buried would be kept in proper condition in perpetuity at the expense of the British Government and the Governments of the overseas Dominions, through the agency of a commission of which the Prince of Wales is chairman. That, I have no doubt, is gratifying news to all the members of this House as it is gratifying to myself. When I was in France I visited a graveyard in which I have a very great personal interest. Lying side by side with my own dear boy I saw the names of other Canadians—of General Mercer; of the son of the late General Cotton; and the sons of other prominent Canadians—all sleeping their last sleep. And extremely gratifying it was to me to see the way in which that graveyard was kept and to observe the evidences that the loving hands of companions and comrades of these men who had given up their lives had done everything that could be done to make their last resting place what their relatives and friends overseas would desire to have it.

All through the Canadian forces, on every side, I found that feeling of comradeship, that feeling of affection one for another, that feeling of sacrifice and I felt, as I looked over towards Vimy Ridge from Mount St. Eloi and was told that in a short time four Canadian divisions would be hurled against it, it would be little less than a crime if we in Canada did not see that these divisions were replenished, that all wastage was made good and that men would be kept going from Canada to sustain and strengthen the arms of those who had been fighting so valiantly for our cause over there. Whilst at the outset of the war I thought that the effect of men voluntarily coming forward to serve their King and country without any compulsion at all was a much grander and more inspiring sight than would be that of men being brought forward under compulsion, I also made up my mind that if the voluntary system failed it would be our bounden duty as Canadians to adopt methods similar to those which have been adopted in practically every other country in the world and to see that men went forward from Canada to fill up the ranks of those who had fallen in the fight and were incapacitated from further service. That is the reason that actuated me in giving my consent to a policy which might be described as compulsory service or conscription, or whatever you may choose to call it, such as was announced by my right hon friend the Prime Minister this afternoon, a policy which this Government intend to stand or fall by in the estimation of the people of this country.

There are many other matters that I might speak about in regard to our visit but I feel that it is unnecessary to do so; in fact at this late hour, time will hardly permit. There will be future opportunities of discussing perhaps more in detail some of the matters of interest to this country that we came in contact with on this trip abroad. Let me say, however, that grievously as we have been stricken by the war, great as is the sacrifice, personally, financially and commercially that the people of Canada have had to make, yet there is some satisfaction in knowing that wherever you go in France or England you find the praise of Canada, and what Canada has done, on the lips of every one. As a result of what Canada has done, Canada's name to-day looms larger in the opinion of the world than ever it did before and it has taken a war to make the people understand the wonderful resources of Canada and the wonderful vigour of Canadians of the present generation.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Will my hon. friend (Mr. Hazen) permit me to say that I am very glad that I made a reference to him because if I had not done so it would not have given us the opportunity of listening to the very eloquent, interesting and affecting speech that the hon. gentleman has made. The minister stated that every shipyard in Canada is occupied to-day in building ships for the Imperial Munitions Board. I would like the minister to tell me what number of vessels are being built and where they are being built. There are a number of shipyards in the Maritime Provinces where wooden vessels were built in the past, but where there are no ships being built now.

Mr. HAZEN: I cannot give the hon. gentleman that information at the moment, but I shall endeavour to get it and give it to him. I will have to go to the Munitions Board. When I say that every shipyard is filled to its capacity I do not refer to shipyards which were shipyards in the past, but where no ship has been built for many years. I refer to shipyards where people have a plant and are ready to receive proposals for the construction of ships. I refer to Mr. Davies at Quebec, the Canadian Vickers Company at Montreal, the shipyards of Collingwood, the Polson Iron Works at Toronto, Couglan & Son on the Pacific coast, and the Wallace shipyards on the Pacific coast. I believe that ships are being built at the present time at New Glasgow by the Nova Scotia Steel Company. These are shipyards I had in my mind. There are places, for instance, along the St. John river, amongst them Oromocto, where I was born, at which ships have been built. At Oromocto there were three shipyards, but no ship has been built in them for the last forty years. However, I will be very glad to get the information for my hon. friend.

Mr. D. D. McKENZIE (North Cape Breton and Victoria): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with a great deal of interest to the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Hazen), and I suppose it is only fair as a member of this House that I should extend to him my congratulations upon the very excellent presentation of the case which he has placed before the House, and also my sympathy with him in the trying ordeal of visiting the ground on which his beloved son has shared the fate of many other Canadians who have given up their lives for the sacred cause and for their country. I have listened with a good deal of attention to the whole of my hon. friend's speech, and, going back to the first of it, where he accused my hon. friend from St. John (Mr. Pugsley) of making the same speech so often, I am not going to join issue upon the fact as to whether the hon. gentleman has made that speech often or not, as I can say to the Minister of Marine and Fisheries that, no matter how many times the hon. gentleman has made that speech, the same reply exactly has been made to it by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries. If the short prayer "Those are my sentiments," applies to the one, it equally applies to the other. I am sure I do not find fault with the Minister of Marine for saying that the speech of the hon. member for St. John has been repeated quite a few times. It is a good speech; it is full of meat, and it is important to the people of St. John and of Courtenay Bay. He tells us that very likely the hon. member for St. John will find the words "Courtenay Bay" engraved upon his heart. The Minister of Marine and Fisheries had better take care that he will not find them engraved upon his political tombstone, because this is a very live issue in that part of the country, and the people may take care to point out that this was the finish of a man who had had a very happy career, but who fell at Courtenay Bay because he did not carry out schemes which were of great advantage to the people of the country and here he lies. The Minister of Marine gave us as the reason why they did not go on with shipbuilding in 1911 that the minister of that day thought it proper to consult the Admiralty. I think it was absolutely proper that he should consult the Admiralty in connection with the building of ships, and that the pattern that would be followed by shipbuilders of this country should be as much as possible the same as that followed on the other side.

But I am very glad to be able to quote to the Minister of Marine an authority on that line of action that he will not dispute; that authority will be himself. When he spoke in this House for the first time after the last election, speaking in the same capacity and office in which he is to-day, on the 22nd of November, 1911, he expressed the position in which he and his Government were with regard to consulting the Admiralty. He said:

> I think the people of this country will approve of the action of this Government in hesitating before rushing hastily into a policy which must involve an expenditure of so many million dollars every year. I think they will appreciate the course of this Government in doing what was stated by the Prime Minister in his admirable speech in reply to the right hon. leader of the Opposition, when he said it was the intention of the Government to consider with the English Admiralty this whole naval question from first to last. When we have done that, I think we will be able to come before this House and this country with a policy that will appeal to all Canadians as a policy that will be the best for the people of Canada and the best in the interest of the empire in which we live.

If it was wrong for the Minister of Pub-Works of the Government of Sir Wilfrid Laurier to propose consulting the Admiralty before launching upon a shipbuilding policy, was it right for the Government of the day? I think that it was quite proper in both Governments, but the hon. gentleman cannot now make any criticism against the former Government because we were consulting the Admiralty on this matter when that was also the policy of himself and of the Prime Minister under whom he holds office. I point this out to the minister in order that he may see that he is making a wrong line of criticism in adverting to the delay necessary to consult the Admiralty in the days of the Laurier Government and saying that it was time ill spent and that there was no necessity for it. If the Laurier Government had continued in power they would have followed out the policy which they had enunciated and we would have had a navy of our own; we would have been in the same proud position as Australia in defending not only her own waters but in extending defence to nearly all parts of the world where British interests are concerned. That is the striking difference between the two policies. I would remind the Minister of Marine that the Government has been a long time in getting to work, that from the date of his address, the 22nd of November, 1911, until to-day, they have done nothing, although he then promised that the Government would in a short time bring down a policy that would be absolutely satisfactory to the people of this country, and carry it out.

The minister has been telling us that they worked very hard while they were away. While I was looking at the Minister of Marine and Fisheries and the Minister of Public Works and the Prime Minister yesterday and to-day, and when I heard their remarks about the food that was given to them in England, my mind reverted to the ancient days of the three Hebrew children, Shedrac, Meshac and Abednego, and I am glad indeed that the same result is present in the countenances of our children who went across. Those Hebrew children refused to partake of the fat things from the king's table; they would only take such ordinary food as pulse, etc. They thrived on it and looked fat and wholesome, and I am glad to see our friends coming back in the same condition. But, after all, I am disposed to think it was a nice holiday they had away, the long trips in the fresh air and the excellent good time which the Minister of Public Works knows so well how to enjoy and to suggest. I think it was rather that than the conduct of the Hebrew children that has brought them back looking so well; and if they are given to work on the other side of the Atlantic, my advice to the country generally would be to keep them there, because our experience with those three gentlemen, except the Prime Minister, is that they do not break their necks working, and if the Minister of Public Works was put to the task to show the great things that he has done since the war began, I am sure he would find some difficulty in pointing out anything conclusive or effective towards carrying on the war. I am sorry that the Minister of Marine and Fisheries is not here; if he were I would point out to him that all I know that he or his department did since the war began was to carry on reckless, partisan extravagance all along the coast from the western boundary of New Brunswick to the frozen zones of Labrador, in putting every little, miserable craft lying rotting on the shore before the war began into active service, and paying for them at the highest prices. I challenge the minister or his department to place in the hands of members of the House a list of the boats, ships, scows and old tug boats that he has forced into the service of his department since the war began, and to tell the House and the country the owners of them, what they have cost the country and what they have been doing. If there is one scandalous thing in connection with this partisan war business from start to finish, it is that phase of the conduct of the department of the Minister of Marine. I intended to tell him that I do not blame him for it in any way, as he does not know; but his partisan agencies throughout the Maritime provinces know all about it, and if he will bring down the return I have suggested, the people of this country will know where millions of the money of this country is going. When we know that this is the extreme partisan way in which every phase of the war is carried forward, you will pardon us if we hesitate before we put the lives of our friends, under the rule of conscription, in the hands of hon. gentlemen opposite who have carried forward everything in connection with the war strictly and absolutely along party lines. If conscription is to come, we trust that it will come in such a way that we will not have the scandalous condition of things that officers will be sent through this country with the Tory brand, with the Tory heart, and the Tory intent, who will take away Grit boys and pass over the others by influences that certainly should not be brought to bear in this country. But when it is meeting us at every point, every turn of the road, in everything that they have touched in connection with this war, what hope have we that they will become righteous and high-minded all at once if this weapon of conscription is put in their hands? We can only judge their future by their past, and their past shows that there is nothing too strong, so far as party lines are concerned, to meet the approval and satisfaction of the members of this present Government.

My particular reason for replying to the Minister of Marine was to point out to him that the criticism he made in respect to shipbuilding and the delays that he alleges were committed and caused by the outgoing Administration, were justified.

I think I should make one more comment in respect to the information that the minister gives us in connection with the criticism made on the wet canteen on the other side. I want to point out to the House and to you, Sir, when the word drunkenness is used, that is no evidence that there is insobriety. I wonder whether the minister ever heard the real definition of drunkenness. A man is drunk when he holds on to the grass for fear that he may fall backwards from the ground. A story is told of a man who was holding on to a telegraph post on the side of the road. He was asked what he was doing there, and he replied, "I am standing here until my old house comes around again." These are the conditions found in men who are drunk. Another story is told of a group of men who were drunk, one of whom called out to Mrs. Brown, whose head was out of the window: "Come down and pick out Mr. Brown; the rest of us want to go home." They were so drunk that they could not tell Mr. Brown from the rest of the men in the group, and they knew that Mrs. Brown would be able to find him. I am not saying that the boys were drunk, but these illustrations supply an indication of what drunkenness is. I heard the speech of the hon. member for Rouville. He simply read a letter written by an officer of the Crown who is in the army, a man by the name of Captain Goforth, a Canadian officer, and published in a reputable newspaper in the city of Toronto, the Financial Post, the editor and proprietor of which, I understand, is friendly to this Government. The member for Rouville made inquiry as to whether or not it was true that temptation of this kind was put in the way of our boys. It does not follow, because the soldiers are not so beastly drunk that they must be put in jail, that intemperance is not thrown in their way. What we wanted was that temptation should not be put in their way at all. The fathers and mothers will not find fault with us for making inquiry as to whether the stories are true, and for suggesting that if such temptation exists, it should be removed. The Prime Minister told us to-day that one of the resolutions solemnly considered by the conference was that the temptation to which the soldiers are now exposed should be removed. Surely the mothers and fathers of our boys will not find fault with the Prime Minister simply because he, with the other members of the conference, considered that resolution. There are other temptations than drink, but I am sure that the temptation of the wet canteen and the means of becoming intoxicated were really the temptations which they had in view when they passed that resolution. If it was open to that conference to deal with it, I am sure that it was equally open to hon. members of this House to inquire whether anything of that kind was going on and, if so, to ask that it be stopped.

As far as the building of ships, particularly the building of naval ships, is concerned, the position of hon. gentlemen on this side is absolutely clear to the country. It is based upon a firm policy, and we are in the proud position of knowing that if our scheme for shipbuilding had been carried out we would be in infinitely better position than we are to-day. It is clear to my mind that this Government or the Government of any overseas dominion, in order to carry forward a policy that will be satisfactory to the dominions overseas and to Canada in particular, must come down to the policy that was established, maintained and carried forward by the right hon. leader of the Opposition.

Motion agreed to.

SUPPLY.

The House in Committee of Supply, Mr. Green in the Chair.

Progress reported.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Rogers the House adjourned at 10.53 until Monday, May 21.

The House met at Three o'clock, the Speaker in the Chair.

EXPENSE OF PARLIAMENTARY SESSIONS.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN moved:

That Messrs. Barnard, Girard, Jameson, Kyte, Marcil, Nickle, Northrup, Pardee and Turriff, be a committee to consider and during the present session, to report to this House the total cost including incidental expenses, of each session of Parliament, and the best way, if any, of reducing the same, with power to send for persons or papers.

He said: This is simply to give effect to the motion which has already been passed.

Motion agreed to.

INSURANCE ACT AMENDMENT.

Mr. W. H. BENNETT (East Simcoe) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 50, to amend the Insurance Act, 1910.

He said: Mr. Speaker, this Bill is in the same terms as a certain Bill which was introduced by the late Mr. Lancaster, member for Lincoln, three or four years ago. The purport of the Bill is this: Certain insurance companies have coalesced with other insurance companies, not only in Ontario but in other parts of the Dominion, and certain companies which have absorbed smaller companies have introduced terms into their policies which were not consonant with the terms that were in the policies of the companies whose affairs were taken over. That, at least, is the contention of those who are interested in one particular insurance company, the name of which I need not at present mention, as that will develop when the case is under consideration in the committee. In view of the fact that the Minister of Finance also has a Bill on the Order Paper for reference to the Insurance Committee, I would ask that this Bill be allowed to go to that committee, where the whole matter can be further discussed by the parties interested.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

Mr. McCRANEY:

1. Have any assurances of exemption from Military Service been given by the Government of Canada to immigrants?

2. If so, what are these assurances?

Mr. ROCHE:

1 and 2. On account of representations made in the United States that immigrants to Canada were likely to be at once drafted for overseas military service, the Minister of the Interior, under date of January 8, 1916, addressed a general letter to the press of the United States, reading in part as follows:

"I, therefore, beg to advise you that all troops from Canada for the war have gone voluntarily; that while the Government has the power to enforce conscription, such action has not been considered either advisable or necessary, and that even were conscription introduced it would apply to Canadian citizens only."

Those from the United States not British subjects nor alien enemies, entering Canada this year in response to the appeal for farm help in the Western Provinces, were furnished upon request with a certificate which stated that while they retained their present citizenship, they would not be called upon for military service. Since the United States entered the war the issue of this certificate has been discontinued, as has all advertising referring to the fact that there is no conscription in Canada. The members of any religious sect, such as the Society of Quakers, Mennonites, Tunkers or Doukhobors, who, on account of their doctrines of religious belief, are averse to bearing arms, have been given assurance that upon coming to Canada they shall be exempt from military service, in accordance with the existing legislation in this respect.

N.T.R.—FINANCIAL RESULTS OF ITS OPERATION.

Mr. GRAHAM:

In the Quebec Chronicle, dated May 8, 1917, the following statement appears, in reference to the Transcontinental Railway, viz.:—

"The railway has been in operation from Moncton and Quebec to Winnipeg, for over a year, and the return of its first year's operation is just appearing in the Government Blue Book, which shows that the gross earnings have amounted to the handsome sum of $5,798,516, and that a profit has been made in the very first year of $429,455."

1. Is this statement accurate?
2. If not, what is the accurate statement?

Mr. COCHRANE:

1. No. The figures quoted are taken from the Annual Report of Railway Statistics for the year ending June 30, 1916, at page 45. Page 99 of that report shows deductions, and the result for the twelve months is shown therein as a loss of $341,615.51. To this should be added the rental of leased line from Fort William to Superior Junction for twelve months, $600,000, making the total loss $941,615.51.

2. The railway was operating from Moncton through to Winnipeg as from May 1, 1915. Operating expenses, including rental of leased line from Fort William to Superior Junction for twelve months ending 30th April, 1916, were $4,960,434.11, and the net operating revenue $4,083,603.51, the result being a loss of $876,830.60.

Mr. REID:

1, 2, 3, 4. Silk velvets and silk cloths are subject to customs duties on importation into Canada. The additions to the invoice values thereof by the collector of customs or appraisers vary in amount, but are made for the protection of the revenue under the provisions of Section 43, Customs Act, which require the collector, or appraiser, as the case may be, to estimate and appraise the true and fair market value

(any invoice or affidavit thereto to the contrary notwithstanding) of the goods at the time of their exportation to Canada.

The first appraisements are open to appeal, and are usually adjusted by re-appraisement or production of other invoices so that if excess duties have been collected they are refunded.

CANADIAN EXPEDITIONARY FORCE.

Mr. DEVLIN:

1. Under what conditions did the Imperial Government accept the offer of the Government to send the 1st Canadian Division for Overseas service?

2. What were the terms of enlistment offered by the Government to the volunteers of the Canadian Expeditionary Force as contained in Militia Orders, issued August 17, 1914?

3. What were the actual terms of contract entered into by officers and men of the Canadian Expeditionary Force upon attestation?

4. Under what section of the Army Act or King's Regulations and Orders may officers and men of the Canadian Expeditionary Force be dismissed from the service?

5. Under what authority may officers of the Canadian Expeditionary Force be struck off the strength of the Canadian Expeditionary Force by officers of the Canadian Militia?

Sir EDWARD KEMP:

1. The offer was accepted unconditionally. See return, Sessional Paper 40 (a), pages 41 to 48, documents relative to the European war.

2. Terms as stated in Order mentioned.

3. As regards men—these terms are contained in the attestation paper M.F.W. 23. As regards officers—attestation is not necessary; these terms being in effect on the acceptance of the King's Commission.

4. Section 44 of the Army Act.

5. All officers of the C.E.F. are officers of the active militia, and all units of the C.E.F. have been made temporary corps of the active militia. All officers of the C.E.F. in Canada previous to embarkation are subject to the orders of the Adjutant General, and also those returning to this country for disposal of the Adjutant General.

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN.

Mr. DEMERS:

What was the cost of publishing the Blue Books for the years 1911, 1912, 1913, 1914, 1915 and 1916, respectively?

[Mr. Marcil.]

PROSECUTION OF THE WAR.

MOTION BY Mr. CURRIE, M. P.

Mr. J. A. CURRIE (North Simcoe) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, with a view to increasing the power of the Allies in the prosecution of the war, the Government should enter into immediate consultation with His Majesty's Governments in Great Britain, the other Dominions, India and the Colonies, in order, with their aid, to bring the whole economic strength of the Empire into co-operation with our Allies in a policy directed against the enemy.

He said: Mr. Speaker, this motion, which appears on the Order Paper, has been there for some time. It is almost similar in character to a motion that was passed unanimously by the British House of Commons on January 10 of last year. Since that motion was adopted in the British House of Commons, we have had a number of commissions and boards of inquiry dealing with matters appertaining to the subject which may properly come under the heading of this motion. In Great Britain we have had the Economic Congress at Paris which discussed matters coming under the heading of this resolution. We have also had Lord Farrington's commission on banking, which dealt with foreign banking. We have had the Royal Commission on Transportation, which dealt with transportation between the colonies and Great Britain, and also between Great Britain and foreign countries. Then we have had the recent commission to Washington, which dealt with matters pertaining to the war. We have had perhaps the most important commission of all the gatherings of imperial commissioners at London recently, a conference in which our own ministers took part; and no doubt we shall shortly have a report from that commission or conference laid before this House. Thus the motion might to some extent be considered superfluous, so far as discussion in this House is concerned, but as long as the war continues matters will continually arise pertaining to this question, and I think it would perhaps be just as well for the House to affirm its position in the matter of the war and our relations to the Allies. In the first place, I think it is advisable that we should affirm our position so far as our own people are concerned, and state to them clearly that this House and this country have a definite economic objective not only during, but after the war, that we intend to do something after the war. The people of this country must not consider that this Parliament is carrying on this war in a lackadaisical way or has neglected to take into consideration question of economics that may arise not only during the war but after it. In the second place, it is important to define our position towards the Allies. The Allies have an economic position as well as a position in the war. We have given them an assurance that we are with them so far as men and munitions are concerned, and we have granted aid in the way of money to assist the Allies in the war. We should define our position to some extent, and say that it is our intention to carry on a vigorous policy to the conclusion of the war, until we have an honourable peace. In the third place, it is as well for us as a House to make it plain that we are prepared to support the men we now have in the field and that this House is with them heart and soul, and is prepared to support them on every occasion. They must know that we have not sent them to the war to waste away and fritter their strength needlessly and without support, but that it is our intention to carry on the war vigorously, to raise further troops, to feed them and clothe them and support them in every possible way.

I should like the House to discuss this question without any partisan spirit. The resolution which appeared on the English order paper was in similar words and was discussed by both sides of that House and passed unanimously. I hope that the same measure of treatment will be accorded to this resolution, because I think that, taking all together, for the past year or year and a half we have had a little bit too much politics in this country. We have been carrying on under a supposed flag of truce, and at the same time carry on Prussian politics—that is shooting from under a white flag. I think it is a great mistake for this country and for the members of this House to take part in any political fights outside of this House or to participate in partisan discussions of any kind when matters are at such a critical stage. It is quite true that until a few months ago the full strength of the enemy was not realized; but anybody who reads the terrible lists of casualties that fill the columns of our papers every day and who remembers the fact that we have lost 25,000 men this year, that one whole division has been wiped out and that there has as yet been no definite issue to the war, must realize that this is no time for carrying on partisan warfare. We should settle down to business and united carry on the business of the country, supporting any measures that may come before the House affecting the war. Unless we win this war the loss to this country will be far greater than to any of the Allies or any of the other nations that are involved in it.

What is the position of Canada so far as this war is concerned? Canada is the only country or the only Dominion that has gone into this war without the hope of receiving anything from it. Let us look at the position of the Allies. Russia expects or expected to derive large acquisitions of territory. She looked forward to the time when she would receive Constantinople, supposed, in the language of Napoleon, to be the heart of the world. It has been the earnest hope of the Russians for centuries that the day would come when the Christian flag would fly over the great Church of St. Sophia and when the Holy Land would be under the dominion, possibly of the Czar, at least of a Christian nation.

Italy expects large accessions of territory, not only in Austria, but in Asia Minor. It is the hope of Italy that at the conclusion of the war Asia Minor may be part of Italy.

France went into the war, not because she desired war, or to win territory. In the language of one of her greatest statesmen: Better end terror than terror without end. That was the position of France. France also hopes to achieve some gain in the shape of her lost provinces.

Belgium is fighting for Belgium's liberty.

Great Britain is fighting for the integrity of Belgium and for the integrity of treaties.

Then let us take the dominions. South Africa will come out of this war with great provinces, with a vast acquisition of territory, a great empire, virtually stretching from the Cape to the Mediterranean; the better portion of Africa will belong to South Africa, with a great united people. One of the bright spots in this whole war is the magnificent manner in which the South Africans have carried on their campaign against the Germans, and the success which that great colonial general, Smutz, has achieved there.

We next come to Australia. Australia went into the war and has taken part in the war because she was threatened with the German terror as much as Belgium or any portion of Europe. Australia will emerge from this war in the dominating position in Australasia. It will have acquired vast territories, the colonies that formerly belonged to the Germans, and consequently Australia will receive something from the war more substantial than the mere glory of taking part in it.

India will have Mesopotamia, the cradle of the race, a region of great resources. There are areas there that may produce corn and wheat equal to what we have in this country, and great resources in oil and minerals.

Egypt will once more have Palestine. Palestine will again become a portion of Egypt.

So, of all these countries, Canada alone cannot hope for any accession of territory, or anything of that kind. The position of Germany and her allies is such that, so far as we are concerned, we cannot hope for any indemnities, and the only thing we might possibly hope for might be some advantage in trade. That question I shall discuss later on.

First let me speak as to the position of this country after the war. It is told of the Emperor Julian that, on an occasion when he was addressing a large gathering of German chiefs, he accused them of being turbulent and of constantly carrying on war. To his amazement, one of the leading chiefs rose and replied that it was in war that they found their greatest felicity; that war was their greatest pleasure. The Germans have held that theory for more than two thousand years. We did not go into this war simply for the sake of engaging in war. I must confess that some of the public men whom I met abroad seemed to have the impression that all the Canadians wanted was to get into a scrap of some kind; that they were hungry for war, and that nothing could keep them away from it. As one of those who went over with the First Contingent, I can say that all the officers and men that I met had a deep realization of the tremendous responsibility that rested upon Canada. We realized that if England should fall, if the Germans should succeed, Canada would become a German colony—the people of Canada would become a subject race of the Germans. One half of the wealth of the country—of our factories, farms, banks and other businesses—would become the spoil of the enemy. The farmer would have to pay for his farm over again. The merchant would have to pay for his goods over again. We know what the Germans would do. That, Sir, was one of the chief reasons why we entered this war. We entered the war also because we realized that the Germans were endeavouring to subjugate Belgium and the other smaller nations, and we felt that it was our duty, as one of the distinguished portions of the Empire, immediately to take part in this struggle for liberty. It would be a great mistake if the people of Great Britain or the Allies should think for one moment that Canada went into this war simply because it was a turbulent nation and desired to engage in battle.

The opinion is also frequently expressed in the press that Canada entered the war for the sake of getting an Imperial preference. While I am one of those members who are most strongly in favour of an Imperial preference, I contend that it would be a great mistake to give Great Britain or the other overseas dominions the idea that we entered this war in order to get an Imperial preference. Some writers in Great Britain, without any authority, are giving the impression that Canada, having gone into the war, wants an Imperial preference and a change in the constitution. It is a mistake to create that impression, because the heart of the Canadian people is not turned in that direction. Perhaps it would be just as well for us to avoid all these difficult topics during the war. This war has given a great demonstration of the unity of the Anglo-Saxon people. It has shown that it is not necessary for us to have written constitutions or hard and fast treaties among the various parts of the Empire in order to insure that each part shall do its duty in an emergency. This being the case, it becomes necessary for Canada to consider her economic position after the war.

What shall we face when the war is over? The war has brought great prosperity to certain lines of business. Large sums of money have been expended in the purchase of munitions in Canada. My studies of history do not convince me that it is wrong for a country to prosper during a war. Pitt made war pay; so did Asquith and, more especially, so did Lloyd George. If Lloyd George had not made this war pay, the Germans would have won long ere this. It is a great mistake, therefore, to foster a spirit of contention amongst the people on this point by saying that it is wrong to make profits out of a war. It is wrong to take profits out of the mouths of the widows and the children. It is wrong to raise the prices of food by speculation. But, as far as the carrying on of legitimate business and industry is concerned, it is exceedingly important that our country should prosper. However, we have prospered, and one of the biggest questions that we will have to deal with after the war will be that connected with the demobilization of the troops. Thousands of soldiers will be coming back, many of them men of the highest type—because there is no better man living to-day than the Canadian. The Canadians have demonstrated that in the face of the German army. There may be others just as good as the Canadians; I do not deny that, but there are none better. First, then, there is demobilization; that is one great danger.

The second danger that we confront is the persistent effort of one section of this community to destroy our manufacturing industries. How are you going to provide employment for the returned soldiers after the war is over if you destroy the factories? The Germans are aware that policies of this kind are being propagated in the colonies, and, with a view to carrying on their economic business and other affairs after the war, they had a conference in Vienna a little over a year ago, at which these matters were discussed. They passed a series of resolutions to the effect that they would unite to carry on an economic war as soon as the war of men and guns is over. Perhaps the House will bear with me patiently later on while I read the resolutions that were passed at that conference. Having heard them, we shall realize that if we want cheap boots in Canada, the Austrians will be prepared to supply them to us after the war. If we think our returned soldiers should go bootless, we shall be able to get a large supply of cheap boots from the Germans. I ask this House and the right hon. leader of the Opposition: where are you going to get employment for the men who come back from the war if you close up the factories, crush them down with taxation and obliterate them? Possibly not more than 30 per cent of the returned soldiers will go on the farms. Would it be better for these factories to be in the United States, where you expect such great markets, where they have taxation and where there is a tariff for protection which is fully 20 per cent greater than that which we have here? This is the serious question which gentlemen of this House will have to meet when these men in khaki return.

Mr. KNOWLES: The hon. gentleman suggested that there were people who wished to destroy the factories. May I inquire who it is that desires to destroy the factories?

Mr. CURRIE: The hon. gentleman himself is one of the members of this House who has been crying free trade from start to finish, and free trade means the abolition of our factories. If you destroy the agricultural implement factories, how will these returned soldiers be enabled to return to their business again? Hundreds of the men who were engaged in the agricultural implement factories in Canada have gone to the war—moulders, machinists and men of that description. If these manufacturers are such terrible men and if you are going to have free trade and thus destroy their factories, what are you going to do after the war so far as the returned soldiers are concerned? Are you going to get these men their jobs again? Are you going to leave them to charity? I do not think that policy will receive the endorsement of any one who has the winning of the war at heart and who is a lover of this country.

Mr. TURRIFF: Try it.

Mr. CURRIE: The hon. member will have an opportunity of trying it in the West, and he will find that the returned soldiers will not afford him very much support. He will have his opportunity; but if he and the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Michael Clark), who, I am sorry, is not in his seat, think that a policy of so-called free trade, which they are constantly preaching from platform to platform, and which would mean the destruction of the industries of this country, is a proper policy for Canada they are very much mistaken. Any one who studies the principles of economics knows that taxation, to be just, must fall equally upon every one. The soldier on the march carries a weight of approximately 86 pounds, which is distributed over his person, his knapsack and belts being so placed that he can carry his burden lightly and easily, whereas if the whole weight were put on one shoulder he would not be able to march as much as three miles. I give that as an illustration from one of the economists, and I do not think my hon. friend (Mr. Turriff) has studied economics deeply enough to say what principle of economy it illustrates. If he had he would know where the illustration comes from. The weight must be evenly distributed over the person of the soldier. Although the Manchester School of Economics proclaims free trade, only a very small proportion of the taxes of Great Britain are raised by income tax; a large amount is raised by customs duties, just as we raise taxes in Canada.

Mr. TURRIFF: Oh, no.

Mr. CURRIE: I do not want to waste much time over the figures, but if the hon. member will read the Blue Book he will find out that I am correct.

Mr. TURRIFF: Let us have the figures.

Mr. CURRIE: In the year before the war, the year to which my hon. friend from Red Deer (Mr. Clark) is always appealing as the year in which trade in Great Britain was normal, the amount raised by customs duties in that country was £33,596,645, and by income tax £44,000,000, out of a total of £185,000,000. That shows that the people of Great Britain even then realized that it would be folly to raise all the necessary revenue from one source. There are in this country, the United States and Great Britain a number of economists who say that all revenue should be raised by one form of taxation. The single taxer claims that all revenue should come from a land tax, the free trader says that all revenue should come from an income tax; but it seems to me that the proper method of raising revenue is to tax anything that will pay a tax, so long as such taxation does not interfere with the welfare of the people nor with the industrial life of the country. For that reason I, Conservative and protectionist as I am, see nothing wrong in a tax on income. Hon. gentlemen opposite say that we must do away with all taxation on manufactured goods; but I do not consider that to be a proper policy for this country to follow, and I am told that in the United States when a man talks single tax or free trade, the authorities lock him up in an asylum and procure a divorce for his wife. A few students from the Manchester School of Economics have come from England to this country and have tried to enlighten us on all questions of economics. The Manchester school of thought was in favour of two things—universal peace and universal free trade, and it carried its propaganda to such an extent that when this war broke out there was hardly a single soldier left to fight against the German enemy, because the first seven divisions were a mere nothing in comparison with the army the British people should have had. Had Great Britain adopted the policy of conscription that she has in force now and which we are to put into force in a few days, this war would never have taken place, and I place at the door of the so-called Manchester School of Economics those who are constantly preaching free trade and peace, the deaths, destruction and disasters of this war, because if England and her overseas dominions had been armed as France was armed, with a conscript army ready to strike at a moment's notice, the Germans would not have dared to declare war, at least not during the next fifty years. Therefore, that line of economics is distinctly wrong; it is not recognized any more in good society in England, and it is about time that we heard the last of it here.

The next thing that we shall have to consider after the war will be the policy of this country from an economic standpoint. If we look at the condition of other countries after they have been engaged in great wars, we shall perhaps derive some information as to what we should do. We find that in 1865-66 the United States passed through a very great war and that Germany in the early seventies also passed through a very great war. We find that both these countries when they emerged from a condition of war were saddled with huge debts; and when a country comes through a war with an enormous debt, it must, in order to pay off its war debt, sell as much of its raw material and manufactured goods as it possibly can and buy as little as possible. That is what happened in Germany and in the United States, and it is exactly what will happen in this country. Both the United States and Germany, when they emerged from those great wars, found themselves with an enthusiastic soldiery ready to take charge of the industries of their respective countries. Both countries emerged triumphant from those wars, and they both had vast resources in the way of raw material, but they had very little ready money, and they found that their raw materials had not been developed. That is exactly what we shall find in this country. No one in this House will deny that at the conclusion of this war we shall have some of the finest men in the world taking part in the affairs of this country, because the returned soldier is always a credit to his country. The American soldiers who returned from the Civil War became the leaders of the United States, and out of a wilderness they produced one of the greatest countries in the world. We in Canada expect that our returned soldiers will play an important part in the development of this country, and I do not think any hon. gentlemen opposite will deny that after the war we shall have men capable of taking charge of the affairs of the Dominion. We shall have everything in the way of raw material such as minerals, land, fisheries and forests, to develop our country, just as Germany and the United States had. We should adopt the same line of policy as the United States and Germany after their great wars.

What to do after the war has been a fruitful subject for economists, and they have studied it deeply. A pamphlet has recently been issued by a merchant in London, a Frenchman named M. LePersonne, in which he clearly shows how Germany carried on her policy so successfully after the Franco-Prussian war. As some hon. members may not have seen this pamphlet, it may not be amiss for me to quote a few lines of it. He says that after the Franco-Prussian war Germany made use of legitimate means, which he summarized as follows:

> She worked out with great care and attention and applied with continuity her protectionist tariff.

That is exactly what the United States did after the war of 1866. He goes on:

> She devised various means to encourage the output and to favour the exportation of her manufactures.

That is what we shall have to do in this country if we are not going into bankruptcy, if we do not wish to repudiate our debts. He says further:

> She utilized unceasingly her excellent system of education as well as her various agricultural, industrial, commercial and technical institutions in order to equip her people, each one in his sphere, with the necessary knowledge to render to his country the most useful and the most valuable services.

I think that applies to Canada just as much as it applied to Germany after their war, and to the United States after their great war. He goes on:

> She maintained the ancient custom of apprenticeship in the workshops and professions.
> Her protectionist tariff enabled her:—
> (a) to limit her imports to a strict minimum;
> (b) to give her undertakings full opportunity to establish themselves securely;
> (c) to provide permanent employment for her population.

That is the manner in which Germany carried on her business, and if there is any country in the world outside of the United States from which we should take a lesson in the development of our industries it is Germany. She carried on a protective policy and established bureaux. Germany is more bureaucratic than the United States, and was consequently better able to handle its business affairs than is the United States, where there is greater liberty. But no one will deny that the United States carried on its business under cover of a protective tariff, and no one complained because during the period of expansion the factories of the United States had to be duplicated every third or fourth year. In the biography of Mr. Carnegie it is pointed out that during the period of expansion the factories of the United States annual profit on industry was over 33 per cent, and this was re-invested in the industries. It was from these great profits that the United States obtained the great and wonderful workshops that she has to-day. The United States has not become a free trade country; they do not want free trade as they have it in England. To them, the leading protectionist country the Allies had to come finally for the money to continue the war. They are still carrying on their business just the same as ever. There may have been some slight modifications in their tariff, as there will be from time to time in this country. I do not think there is a protectionist in Canada to-day who is not prepared to make changes in the tariff when it is necessary. When we are constantly producing a surplus in various lines we must find a market for it, and if it is necesary to modify the tariff in order to get that market, as in the case of free wheat, then it is good policy to modify the tariff.

Mr. W. E. KNOWLES (Moosejaw): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. I regret to interrupt my hon. friend, but this is the last day for private members' business. I appeal to you, Sir, whether the observations which the hon. member is making are relevant to the discussion of the motion which has been placed in your hands. The motion is to this effect:

That, in the opinion of this House, with a view to increasing the power of the Allies in the prosecution of the war, the Government should enter into immediate consultation with His Majesty's Governments in Great Britain, the other Dominions, India and the Colonies.

I submit that a discussion of such an academic question as free wheat versus protection, which concerns our domestic business entirely, does not properly come within the purview of discussion of the resolution I have just read. My hon. friend's remarks in support of the resolution should be confined to arguments which are relevant to the subject.

Mr. J. A. CURRIE: The resolution deals with the development of the economic strength of the Allies, and perhaps I am discussing that a little too strongly for my hon. friend.

Mr. KNOWLES: The point of order should be discussed without personal references. For the hon. member to refer to how I receive his remarks is quite out of order. That is a second point of order, I think.

The DEPUTY SPEAKER: I think the hon. member should be allowed considerable latitude in discussing an economic question of this kind.

Mr. TURRIFF: Go on with your partisan speech.

Mr. J. A. CURRIE: I have not filled Hansard up this session with speeches like the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff) has done. I shall endeavour to curtail my remarks to the subject of the resolution, and if hon. gentlemen object that I am wandering slightly afield I think it will be rather because I am treading a little too hard on their corns. I think it is extremely important for this country to discuss its economic position both now and after the war. Unless we consider now what our economic position will be after the war, when hon. gentlemen opposite come into power, as they expect to do, what will they find? Will they find this country in bankruptcy, a broken country without business or population? That is apparently the doctrine that some hon. gentlemen opposite have been preaching. I have been endeavouring to show that the policy which has been adopted by the Conservative party since 1878 is the proper economic policy for this country. I think under that policy we shall be able to build up and make our country great after the war. If we want to get population into this country, it is just as important for us to get industrial workers as it is to get farmers. We must work out our own salvation. I am not one of those who are constantly looking for handouts from the United States or some other country. This country should be independent and carry on its business affairs with a view to the future regardless entirely of what any other country may do. Sir John A. Macdonald, one of the great leaders in this country, laid it down distinctly as part of his policy that he would let no other country interfere with the economic policy of Canada, and not so very many years ago the Canadian people endorsed that principle as the right hon. leader of the Opposition knows.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: No, no.

Mr. J. A. CURRIE: The people in 1911 said they were not going to allow this country to be tangled up with the economic policy of any other country. Sad to say, that is when the right hon. gentleman failed. If we are to develop our full economic strength, not only during the war but after the war, we must carry on the same line of policy that we are now carrying on. That is the policy that has made a great industrial Germany; it is the same policy as that which has made the United States such a great country.

What, then, are we to do? We have here great resources. One thing that is fundamentally necessary is that we should encourage agriculture. Agriculture is one of our basic industries. It has been treated too much as an accident, and not as a technical trade. Any man is supposed to be good enough to be a farmer. We laugh and sneer at the Huns, the terrible Huns. But Hungary is far ahead of this country in its agricultural progress. There is not one of these central states of Europe, with which we are at war, but has a great system of agricultural colleges and high schools. Hungary, for instance, has thirty-five agricultural high schools. Our agricultural development must be directed along the same lines. At present it costs us far too much to produce the things that are sold from our farms. We must develop our agriculture on technical lines.

We must develop our mines. We know that we have vast mineral resources, but what they are we are only discovering from day to day. After the war we should have thousands of men employed in our mines, not only our gold and silver mines, but our great coal-fields of the West. There are enormous coal areas in Alberta into which a pick has never been struck, as well as great areas of iron. I have no doubt that there are men now within the sound of my voice who will live to see Edmonton the Pittsburg of this country. At present, none of these mines are developed. Why should we go on simply growing and shipping wheat and pay so little attention to our mines? We must have population; we must have a mixed population; and in order to give employment to all classes we must have various industries developed.

Then, consider our forests. We have vast areas suitable for the production of pulp, and the pulp industry has received a great impetus within the last few years. At the time when the war broke out, Germany controlled almost entirely the printing and lithographing trade of Europe. Many thousands of people were employed in those trades—in one city no less than 15,000 people gained their livelihood in these industries. If Canada can produce paper more cheaply than any other country, why should we not become the centre of the lithographing and printing industries of the world? I am sure that every member of this House would gladly see such a state of affairs

4 p.m. brought about, but you cannot do that if you discourage our manufacturing industries. It is too much the habit of some people to find fault with our manufacturers. Take, for instance, our textile industries. They were starved for years because there was always a politician to raise a yell whenever somebody thought the woollen factories were making too much money. We have not developed the sheep industry and the production of wool as we ought to have done, and just for the same reason. Politics have been the curse of this country in many cases—

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Hear, hear.

Mr. CURRIE: —and the right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) knows that to be the case. If he had his own way there are many things he would not stand for that he does stand for now, many policies that his followers promote, which, if he expressed his own ideas, he would oppose.

Our fisheries offer great opportunities. They have not been developed as the fisheries have been developed in Great Britain. With the coming of the trawler the development of our fisheries will mean many millions added to the wealth of this country, and a great population carrying on this industry.

It is not necessary for me to go through the whole list of our industries. But there is one thing most important of all, which must not be forgotten, and that is our foreign trade. Only a few months before the United States entered the war—and I am sure we all welcome the accession of the United States in this war, as bringing about once more a great Anglo-Saxon union—an economic conference was held by the manufacturers of that country. I take the trade papers, and had the pleasure of reading the discussions of that conference. It was pointed out that it would be the duty of the United States, after the war, to organize their industries for the carrying on of a more extensive foreign trade than that which they now enjoy. The expansion of the United States up to this time has been such as to absorb almost entirely the manufactures of that country. But they look forward to supplying foreign countries after the war is over. The manufacturers of the United States made a careful inquiry into the question how they could carry on business with various foreign countries—how they could extend their trade with South America, how they could increase their dealings with Russia, and so on. They discovered that if they were to compete with the Central European powers in this trade, one thing the country would have to do would be to organize foreign banking so that they could afford the long-term credits that these countries require. They found also that it would be necessary to obliterate some of the legislation that had been placed on their statute books with reference to trusts, because the manufacturers in allied industries would have to combine for the purposes of foreign trade. They found also that it would be necessary to follow the example of the Germans in pooling freights, so as to put the manufacturers in different centres upon an equal footing in relation to foreign business. In Germany manufacturers before the war, were given the same advantage in freights whether their goods were produced in Dresden or in Hamburg. The railways and steamers absorbed the difference. What does that mean for us? It means that before the war ends our manufacturers must get together, and the country must co-operate with them, in order that means may be devised whereby our banking system will be extended to those foreign countries in which we hope to find markets. It means also that our manufacturers must be prepared to form unions, or committees, or commissions, to promote the sale of their products in foreign countries. And, if we are going to take over our railways—and we shall take them over or do something else with them—such arrangements must be made that the manufacturer at Winnipeg will have the same advantage in relation to foreign trade as the manufacturer at Toronto or Montreal. Then we shall be able to have great cities in these vast agricultural areas of the West, and the country will grow as it should. Otherwise, manufacturing in the West will be impossible, and the result will be disastrous to the country. Our industries will not grow as they should, and we shall not be able to pay off the great public debt we are taking on our shoulders.

Another thing to be dealt with is shipbuilding and our navigation laws. Shipbuilding is a problem that should receive our most earnest attention. Japan, for instance, by adopting a forward policy in shipbuilding and in shipping, succeeded in a few years in capturing all the Oriental trade. They built their ships and were able to take the trade from Great Britain, from the United States, and even from Germany, so far as the Pacific is concerned. The present moment is a very critical one for this country. We must endeavour to stimulate shipbuilding, including wooden shipbuilding. A wooden ship will last for fifteen years. There is still plenty of timber in Canada. It is a great pleasure to me to know that the Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White) has seen fit to hand over money to the Imperial Munitions Board for the building of ships in Canada. What is more, I hope that some laws may before long be passed, such as the old navigation laws of England. They are quoting the navigation laws of Cromwell in the British House of Commons, and the navigation laws of Cromwell are to the effect that British goods must be carried in British bottoms. We should adopt some such system, because if we do we will strengthen our trade and shipping, and we will be able to compete in the markets of the world with our surplus products. The sale of our surplus products and the increase of our foreign commerce will bring to the treasury of this country vast resources, and enable us to carry the burdens of the war very lightly.

The next subject I wish to discuss is the question of the returned soldier. The returned soldier will come back here filled with high hopes and courage, and he will be prepared to write the name of Canada commercially and industrially on the banners of the world just the same as he has done while fighting on the field of battle. It will be a great mistake for this House to continue idle discussion on economic topics or to consider proposals that will have the effect of thwarting the ambitions of these men upon their return home. They are the next generation, and in their hands will be placed the work of building up Canada. I am sure that there will be many hearty laughs when they read some of the speeches that have been delivered in this House during the war. Their eyes are opened. They realize what internationalism means to the world at large and particularly to their own country, and no doubt after the war is over we are going to have some form of union or of alliance between the nations which will be of some benefit to Canada.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: With the United States also?

Mr. CURRIE: I propose to speak frankly to the House. I have discussed this question so far without taking up the question of the Imperial preference at all, because I feel that, possibly, the United States having once more become one of the great English-speaking nations, if any special favour were given to Canada that were not given to the United States, it might give offence. Hide-bound protectionist as I am, I would not be one of those who would say that it would be wrong for the United States to get an Imperial preference along with the British colonies. We are the same people, speaking the same language, and I think it is the brightest feature of the statesmanship of to-day that it can change its mind. The great men of to-day in the Old World, the men who are doing things, like Lloyd George, are the men who are changing their minds. A politician, or a man who has anything to do with political affairs, who sticks constantly to one line of thought, is not the man who is cutting any figure in the world's history at the present time. The greatest men in England have cast aside the question of free trade. They have realized the necessity for a change. This world will not be the same again after the war, and if we receive an Imperial preference as one of the dominions of the Empire, and if the United States is desirous of coming in, there must be reciprocal advantages which we must all derive and it will not be wrong.

But, with reference to preferential tariff arrangements amongst the Allies, there is a great deal of alarm amongst some so-called economists as to what is going to happen with regard to this question. It is all very simple. A four-column tariff is proposed by the Allies in opposition to the German proposals. The nature of the German proposals, as given expression to at their meeting in Vienna, is indicated clearly by this paper which I have here:

A secret conference of delegates of the Central European Economic Associations was held recently in Vienna, at which detailed proposals were formulated with reference to the questions of German, Austrian and Hungarian economic union. Under the leadership of the three presidents of the associations—Duke Ernst Gunther zu Schleswig-Holstein, Baron Plener, ex-Finance Minister, and Herr Wekerle, ex-President of the Council of Ministers, and with the participation of the prominent agricultural, industrial and commercial representatives of the three States, the following resolutions were passed:—

1. Prior to peace negotiations being entered upon, the foundations are to be laid for the most comprehensive economic rapprochement between the German Empire and the two States of the Austro-Hungarian Monarchy.

2. This economic rapprochement is to be brought about on the basis of reciprocal preferential treatment and must embrace as far as possible all aspects of economic life. Thus it is not only the unification of the customs system which is to come into consideration, but also the improvement and development of a reciprocal system of trade and traffic in the widest sense of the word.

3. The basis of the customs part of the political reciprocal preferential treatment is to be—subject to full preservation of necessary protection of home production, including in exceptional cases even the raising of particular customs duties—that side by side with the reciprocally granted customs concessions, the free list of the customs tariffs is to be extended as much as possible and a periodic revision of the customs duties operative in the reciprocal trade undertaken, actuated by the spirit of rapprochement. Endeavours are likewise to be made to devise a unified customs tariff scheme and classification of commodities, as also customs administrative legislation which shall be as uniform as possible.

4. It is to be a condition precedent of the customs political preferential treatment that—particularly in the treaties of peace—the principle shall hold that such preferential treatment shall not be accorded to other States on the basis of most-favoured-nation treatment.

5. Commercial treaty negotiations with other States are to be carried out by the Allied Empires, subject to the preservation of their commercial political sovereign rights, in agreement with one another, and with mutual support and simultaneously; such treaties, too, being concluded simultaneously.

6. All measures of a legislative or administrative technical character which appear necessary for the development of the production, trade, communication, and financial economy of their countries are to be carried out in the free economic territories with expedition in the sense of rapprochement and unification.

7. The arrangements of the Allied Empires which eventuate in the sense of these proposals are to be made for a period which shall considerably exceed the duration hitherto customary for commercial treaties.

That is what they decided upon at Vienna. As far as the Allies are concerned, the proposal has been made and it is considered almost virtually as an established principle, that there shall be a four-column tariff. Many people ask: How is a four-column tariff to be applied? Let me give an example. First, there will be a general tariff, which will apply to neutrals and to everybody. While that general tariff will apply to neutrals and to everybody, there will be a reduction of, say, 10 or 15 per cent in favour of the Allied nations. Then, between the British Colonies and the Empire there will be an Imperial preference of say, 33 per cent. That gives us three rungs of the ladder. The fourth rung will be a surtax of 25 per cent against Germany and the Central Powers. That is how it can be carried out, and it is very easy to carry it out. As far as Canada is concerned, it will be very easy, because we are accustomed to preferential treatment as between this country and Great Britain. There is no great disadvantage, but, on the other hand, there is a great advantage, because, when we go into an alliance of that kind, our raw materials, such as grain and the products of grain, will cut a large figure. If any man will take the trouble to study the economic questions and results consequent upon such an alliance he will ascertain that the Allies, as constituted at the present time, contain within themselves all the elements that contribute to economic greatness. We are in a position to supply ourselves with all the grain that is necessary to meet the requirements of our peoples, and we will have 70,000,000 or 80,000,000 bushels to export to other countries, which will all work out to our advantage.

As a manufacturer, I realize the great advantage it is to the manufacturers of this country who are not making munitions to be able to export material to the four corners of the globe. I am one of those manufacturers, because I am interested in a factory whose products are going into South America, South Africa, and other countries where German goods at a former period supplied the demand.

It has proved a very profitable business. We are not alone in the enjoyment of that business; it is enjoyed also by the other manufacturers in this country. We enjoy that, and have had a taste of what foreign commerce means, and you have no idea what a great advantage it is in a factory to have an opportunity of disposing of surplus goods in a foreign country, instead of having to throw them on the markets of this country at reduced prices. It is a tremendous advantage, and it would be a tremendous advantage after the war if the manufacturers of Canada would take the place of Germany. Canadians are exceptionally able as factory employees; they are bright, intelligent, and become first class workmen, and Canada should be able to carry on foreign trade as well as Germany, the United States or any other nation. She should be able to carry it on better than the United States. We have a great advantage in cheap power; the white coal of Quebec and Ontario and the Maritime provinces is cheaper than coal, and enables small industries to be carried on in small buildings, upstairs, and in various places, in cities, towns and villages where formerly it was impossible to do any manufacturing without the installation of great steam plants. This will give us a great advantage, and if we get the advantage of a tariff from the Allies which will enable us to displace Germany in many manufactures, the burden of taking care of returned soldiers, so far as this country is concerned, will be very light, and the country will go ahead by leaps and bounds. I look forward to the period of the return of our soldiers with a great deal of anxiety. I think that we in this House should make it known to the people of Canada and to those who are likely to invest money in Canada, that, when the war is over, business will go on at the old stand in Canada, that the policy of destroying industry will not receive the endorsement, for instance, of the right hon. leader of the Opposition. It never did—

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Never.

Mr. CURRIE: Because he was always a good sound protectionist, in spite of the few free traders behind him. And it was to his credit because, after all, any one familiar with conditions in this country, must know that we cannot all be farmers or tradesmen or lumbermen; somebody must carry on the manufactures of this country, and it is from the manufacturers of Canada and the skill of its workmen and textile workers that our future glory and greatness must come.

As one of the Canadians who did a little bit, perhaps, in the war and who has at heart the feelings of those men who are gallantly fighting for us at the front, I feel that the only hope for them is for Canada to adopt such a policy. You cannot expect all of our soldiers to come back and go on the farms. Many of them will be minus a leg or an arm, but they can still go into a factory and work as well as if they were whole in body and limb. But it would not be possible under any conditions for more than 40 per cent or 50 per cent of them to go on the farm. It is essential that we should get behind them with the resources of the country. I am a great believer in the German system of state socialism, and I believe that we must develop a similar system; that we must have something to correspond particularly with their great system of rural credit banks, supplementing, not competing with, our present banking system. It is the rural credit banks of Germany, of Austria and of Hungary that are enabling the Central Powers to carry on the war to-day. The farmers of Germany, of Austria and of Hungary are buying the war bonds of those countries, and it is from them that the Central Powers have derived their financial strength and have been able to carry on the war. That is the great source of their economic strength.

I have no desire to enter into any lengthy discussion of the position of those gallant men who are fighting at the front, but I wish to say that I feel that this House is behind them at the present moment and that the people of this country are behind them. It is only a few days since it was announced that we are to have some form of conscription in Canada. The Canadians at the front have had anxious moments. They have covered themselves with glory because, let me inform you, the battle of Vimy Ridge was a far greater battle, to my mind, and more decisive in the history of the world, than the battle of Waterloo. These men have covered themselves with glory; they have been decimated again and again, and it is necessary that we in Canada should keep up their strength.

I have always been a believer in a system of conscription, or as I like to call it universal national service—I hate the word "conscript" because I do not think it represents the proper feeling that should be in the bosom of everybody desirous of defending his country. The old Militia Act provided for a system of conscription. The right hon. leader of the Opposition in 1904 inserted a clause in the Militia Act which enabled the soldiers, the militia men of this country, to be sent abroad for the defence of Canada as well as for service at home. The right hon. gentleman shakes his head; does he deny that? Yes? Well, I have no desire to discuss it, but section 69 of the Militia Act of 1902 was amended so that it now reads:

> The Governor in Council may place the Militia, or any part thereof, on active service anywhere in Canada—and these are the words added in 1904:

> —and also beyond Canada, for the defence thereof, at any time when it appears advisable to do so by reason of emergency.

Is that not correct? That means that the Governor General in Council at any moment when there is a war or invasion can declare that there is an emergency and call for a levy en masse of all the manhood of this country capable of bearing arms. That clause was put there because at the time of the South African war it was found that the Act did not permit a man to be called out under the Militia Act and sent to fight in South Africa. When the present war broke out, Canada was the only country in the Empire that had a conscription law on the statute book. I have read the clause, and if it is anything else than conscription I do not know what the English language means. The other countries of the Empire had what they called the old Militia Act, which permitted a man to be called out for home defence only. The territorial law in England permitted a man to be called out only for home defence. The Australian law permitted a man to be called out only for the defence of Australia at home within her own borders. Premier Hughes had to put the question to the people whether they would have conscription or not.

Mr. TURRIFF: A very good plan.

Mr. CURRIE: A very good plan, but it is not in accordance with the principles of British Parliamentary government because prerogative rests with the Parliament, not with the people, as was shown by the decision in British Columbia. Or if my hon. friend will read Walter Bagehot, who has studied the question fully, he will find that it is different from the American system under which prerogative comes from the people up.

Mr. TURRIFF: If the Militia Act confers on the Government full authority to raise men by conscription, why has not the Government, of which my hon. friend is such a valiant supporter, put it into force?

Mr. CURRIE: I am not the Government and I do not understand why, because, so far as I am concerned as a member of the House, when I served in France I understood that I was serving under the Militia Act and I thought I was a militiaman and one of the members of the militia of Canada. Only when I returned home to Canada did I find that the overseas force fighting to-day was not raised under the Militia Act, but under the Defence of the Realm Act, or the Act that was passed when the war broke out. Further—I wish to speak frankly—it is a matter of considerable pain to those who are engaged in the war to know that they are not a part of the militia of Canada. Officers who served overseas were notified that when the war ended and they returned to Canada, their rank would not be recognized under the Militia Act. The Order in Council which brought the Canadian Expeditionary Force into existence will be done away with simply by the passing of another Order in Council. I do not know why the Militia Act was not applied, unless because of the feelings of some hon. gentlemen opposite. I do not understand why the Militia Act was not invoked in the first instance. The matter rested entirely in the hands of the late Minister of Militia. All the requirements set forth in the Militia Act were present. The war was on; the militia was mobilized for war purposes; Parliament was called within ten days after the mobilization of the militia—but, strange to say, the Militia Act was not enforced. I do not wish to express any opinion in the matter; the fewer organizations we have in Canada dealing with military matters the better. I am sure that one army is enough for any country; in Canada we have several such organizations and, unfortunately, the most bitter enmity exists amongst some of them. The Expeditionary Force and the Permanent Force are not on the best of terms. For instance, a colonel who is fighting to-day in the trenches is getting $6 a day, while a colonel who has stayed at home, who has not even crossed the water, is drawing between $15 and $20. You can see, therefore, that anomalies have arisen by the non-enforcement of the law. The law as it stands now is all right. It provides for the organization of the troops, their enrollment, their being sent abroad.

It would be a disastrous thing for this country if we were to spend the summer discussing this Militia Act or the proposed conscription Bill. Whatever comes, let us support it, because the men at the front require support and assistance. To discuss this question at great length would, to my mind, be disastrous and a disgrace to the people who have sent such a magnificent army to the front. These men have distinguished themselves and are distinguishing themselves every day. It would be a great shame if their stars should be thrown into the sea as they came across, or into the waste-paper basket when they came home, and they were accorded no military recognition. Some amendment to the Act may be necessary before conscription can be fully carried out. But, instead of calling it conscription, let us call it universal national service. It would be disastrous in the extreme if the legislation enacted were such as to give ground for the opinion that the poor would have to serve, whereas the rich would escape, or that one part of the country would have to serve while another part would escape. Selective conscription was adopted in Great Britain because they wanted to omit Ireland from the scope of the legislation. I am sure that no part of this country wishes to escape its duty in connection with this war. Some people are mean enough to make insinuations about our good friends on the east side of the Ottawa river. I know differently, for I have seen them serve. The history of the French-Canadian people is such that they can very well be proud of it. They were not in any sense a conquered race when Canada was taken over. The French-Canadian militia never lowered its flag. When Canada was taken over the French-Canadian militia marched out of all the fortresses and positions with the full honours of war. They were fighting men, and, to my mind, their descendants are as brave, as national, and as strong for the Empire as the men of that day were.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I would remind the hon. member that he is wandering somewhat far afield. I would ask him to confine his remarks more closely to the subject of the resolution.

[Mr. Currie.]

Mr. CURRIE: Perhaps I am out of order in dealing with questions that will come up in the House later. However, I think this House should adopt a resolution showing the Allies that we are still steadfast in the war, showing our brave soldiers that we are still steadfast and that we are not going to desert them and leave them without reserves during such times of emergency as they went through on several occasions this year.

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE FOSTER (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to speak at length on this question which has been so well discussed by my hon. friend (Mr. Currie). He has certainly taken advantage of the liberty that was given him by the Deputy Speaker to make his discussion of the matter fairly broad. I felt a little sorry that the Speaker, who sits in the Chair now, drew the circle a little closer because I am afraid it had the effect of cutting off the latter part of my hon. friend's speech. I am certain that the House must be deeply indebted to him for the wide field he has covered and for the arguments he has adduced.

The proposition which my hon. friend sets forth appeals, of course, to all of us. It is a matter in respect of which, as my hon. friend knows, a great deal has already been done by the Dominion Government, by the British Government, and by the Allies, in the way of preliminary investigations, conferences, discussions, arguments, and to a certain extent, acts. The economic conference which met in Paris last June was one of the developments of the feeling which had taken deep root in the minds of the Allies that certain considerations outside of the struggle for political hegemony were involved in the world wide contest; that beneath it and along with it there was an economic aspect. The conference, which was attended by the representatives of all the Allied countries, with the exception, I think, of Montenegro, devoted a week to the general discussion of the subject, came to certain conclusions which were immediately put into operation and came to an agreement upon certain principles which should be applied during the period of reconstruction, as well as during the time after the reconstruction period shall have passed and what might be called the permanent period of peace shall have been entered into. The action which had been taken by the Allies in respect of trade treatment of the enemy during the war was about parallel to the course of action which was approved by the economic conference. Trade with the enemy, of course, is forbidden, and we are to take advantage of every reasonable means of curtailing the enemy's trade expansion in every respect, and to push to the very utmost limit, consistent with fair treatment of neutral countries, the blockade which should restrict, restrain, and gradually diminish the power of the common enemy. The principle was also laid down that in the war, naval military, and economic, the Allies should in every possible way co-operate with each other, making common issues and, if necessary, even sacrificing in some respects individual preferences and even individual benefits if in that way the general Allied cause were made stronger as against the common enemy. Various methods were suggested for such co-operation. Great Britain, as being the greatest owner and director of mercantile transport has, in connection with the transport business of the world, carried out this principle of co-operation and help, even to the point of self-denial of her own purely economic or commercial interests. In financial matters the Allies have co-operated with each other, the strong aiding the weak, the weak taking advantage of the strong arm of the strong, each bearing the other's burdens. No definite length of time was set for the duration of the era of reconstruction—it might be two years, three years, or more—but with reference to what should take place in the war of economic and commercial treatment during that period, there was reached an agreement which has been ratified by the Allied nations. That agreement was on this general basic principle: you protect your people with your arms, and with your blood and with sacrifices when you are in war; when war ceases, then you are to help each other in the work of reconstruction. The same principle of co-operation during the reconstruction period was affirmed in the resolutions of the Economic Conference, that is, that the strong was to aid the weak, and that the different resources, economic and otherwise, of the Allies as a whole, should be directed, not each one for its own special selfish benefit, but all for the general up-building and reconstruction of the Allied peoples who have borne their part of the war and many of whom have been very severely harmed and damaged by the actual course of the war.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Did that principle imply no commercial intercourse with the nations which at this moment are our enemies? I may remind my right hon. friend that the action of the Paris Conference was interpreted by the German Chancellor as implying enmity even after war, and he used it largely in order to prolong the war.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The interpretations of the German Chancellor are generally made with a view to strengthening the German cause with his own people, and I have no doubt he used that interpretation to the utmost limit. But if the Allied nations were at any time during the war to base their conduct upon possible interpretations of the German Chancellor, they would be reduced to inanity and weakness. What the Allied nations did do was to discuss the questions and come to conclusions as to what would be best for the Allied nations as a whole; and if the German Chancellor, in his appeals to his own people, chose to make capital out of their action, that was not the fault of the Allied nations, and they would have to take that disadvantage for the sake of the advantage on the other side.

Mr. MARCIL: In that Paris Conference, was any provision made for any new nation that was not at that time in the war, but that might become an ally—the United States is a case in point?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: No provisions were made except to lay down principles to apply to all the Allies that were in the war then, and those principles would apply equally to countries that might come into the war later on. I do not say—and I hope my hon. friend has not the idea—that the actual details in the working out of the principles were considered. That was not part of the duty of the Economic Conference; its duty was to get at principles that might be carried out with the cohesion and co-operation of the Allied nations. From now on until we reach the period of re-construction, experts and men of affairs in all the different lines will work out the methods so as to apply these principles. With reference to a remark of my right hon. friend, I may say that while every one felt that the economic resources of the different Allies countries should be used for the reconstruction and benefit of the Allies, there was no disposition in that conference, nor was there a hint of it, that there should be anything like non-intercourse or enmity towards neutral powers. Nobody at that conference, so far as I have heard, wished to do any harm commercially to neutral countries, and on two grounds: first, because friendship could be kept with all neutral countries, and, second, because the broad grounds of commercial development and progress would not be consistent with any attempt to make a close corporation amongst the Allied powers to the exclusion of trade with neutral powers. Therefore, I think that this criticism that has sometimes been levelled against the Economic Conference is one which has no foundation in fact.

As to what should take place after the period of reconstruction and in normal periods of peace, principles were laid down tentatively and carefully and along somewhat the same lines, especially as regards the retention of the same spirit of helpfulness and co-operation amongst those who had borne the burdens of the war and who had suffered its tremendous consequental damages. There again, however, there was no thought of the exclusion of trade with neutral powers. As far as I have studied the discussions, I think there was the general apprehension that trade and commercial development was a world-wide phenomenon, and that it was neither possible nor beneficial that an attempt should be made to divide it up into air-tight compartments. At the same time, there was a strong adhesion to that idea of comradeship in trade, commerce, and development after the war which had been cemented in the comradeship of battle and bloodshed on the fields of conflict.

My hon. friend (Mr. Currie) led us over a very wide field. As to the necessity for most things which he mentioned, I think we all agree. We want in the first place to do the very best we can, on his return to this country for the man who has gone out from our midst and has fought our battle against the German foe; I do not think on either side of the House there is the least difference of opinion in that respect. There may be difference as to the best methods of bringing that about, but as regards our treatment of the returned soldier in every state of health and condition —from the man who has been rendered incapable of future labour to the man who is partly incapacitated and has to be taught and helped, to the man in full possession of his physical vigour who takes up again his old profession or wishes to undertake some new branch of labour and of life—we all feel that we owe to these men a debt which must be paid, and it is for us who have for the time being the management of affairs to make for them the best and wisest provision possible. That feeling which prevails in this country and in this House will, I believe, be appreciated by the soldier. I do not think the soldier who comes back after fighting our battles will feel that he has simply to sit down and be nursed by the country because of the service he has performed. He knows that he has performed gallant service, service of sacrifice and of great peril. That consciousness is with him, but he comes back to this country with the feeling that he wants to do his part in the civil life of the country just as well and as nobly as he did his part in the military life of the country. He has a perfect right to ask for the sympathy and help of the country for which he has fought and suffered, and if that be given to him in reasonable measure we shall have little difficulty with him in his effort to adapt and adjust himself to peaceful life. The returned soldier will have received much teaching and instruction that is not to be obtained in schools or in colleges, and which is only to be learned in that great drama of life in which he has played such a part. In certain essential elements he may therefore be a better citizen than without that experience and training. So I look to the adjustment of the returned soldier to the duties of civil and peaceful life as a matter of great importance, but not of such tremendous difficulty, if the country itself does its duty, as I believe it is determined to do, and if the soldier himself takes up his part in civil life as I believe the great bulk of our soldiers intend to. So much for the soldier settlement.

As regards trade and commerce—we want employment; our people need employment. There is no country in the world which has resources more ready at hand, more rich, more varied, and more widely distributed than has Canada, and if we can direct the capital and labour of our country in wise and reasonable ways to develop the great resources of this Dominion, there will be great things in store for us. But I am not one of those who believe—I think it would be wrong if we tried to believe—that we are going to float from the period of war into the period of peace without trouble, without great anxiety, without possibly a great deal of sacrifice and of difficulty. After a three-year period of dislocation, such an adjustment on so vast a scale is not an easy matter, and we cannot expect to go through that operation on the flood time of prosperity. Prosperity will come afterward, in due time, but to my mind there will be a period in which difficulty, and lack of great prosperity will intervene and it is that period that will try the mettle and spirit of this country as much as the war is trying it to-day. You may put on tariffs until you are gray-haired and talk about them just as long and eloquently as you choose, but there are only two ways, either by internal commerce or by external commerce, in which this country can march to prosperity on the line of the development of its great natural resources, and that is along the line of wise laws, tariff and otherwise. We must have legislation to suit the time and the occasion. But even if we should have the best tariff legislation possible, we still need an accordant working of labour and capital on the basis of equal advantage to each, taking the circumstances into account, and without either one or the other wishing to gobble up the larger share. Labour and capital working together wisely, intelligently, and sympathetically is one thing essential in this country, and it will be necessary in all countries when the war ceases. Then it cannot be too often said that we cannot compete in the home field in this country with the man from outside unless we can make goods as efficiently, as cheaply, and as tastefully as our competitor, and we certainly cannot get into the foreign market unless we can do the same thing there. Therefore, we have got to have a working body which has received the best education possible on the lines of practical work and technical education and all that kind of adaptation of labour to the spirit of the time and to the object to be produced which is going to be one of the great factors of future development and future prosperity. So in these respects we have in the first place to get the wisest legislation possible. Then we have to get the closest co-operation between capital and labour. Then we have to get the most intelligent and best trained artisans and workers in the producing classes that we possibly can.

That is the object, I think, that my hon. friend has in view. His plan is to be carried out, in the first place in Canada for the development of Canada; in the second place in the Empire, for the development of the Empire as a whole; and in the third and fourth places for those outside of our own family who have the distinct relationship of ally or of neutral, with the bond of sympathy and co-operation, greater with the former than with the latter, as is natural and right. I think my hon. friend (Mr. Currie) is to be congratulated upon bringing this matter forward and treating it, as he has, so broadly and so well. The Government has no objection at all to the passage of the resolution. In fact, the Government has been working along in consonance with the Overseas Dominions and the British Government and, to a certain extent, with the Allies, for the years of the war, and it proposes to work along the same lines in the years of peace that are to come.

Mr. J. G. TURRIFF (Assiniboia): The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster) tells us that the Government has no objection to the passage of this resolution. I think I can safely say that no one on this side has any objection to it. But it seems to me it is altogether uncalled for; it declares for exactly what we have been doing all along. Can the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. Currie) point to any member of this House, either on this side or on his own side, who is not desirous of doing the best he can on lines indicated in the resolution? I do not complain of the resolution, but I do complain that the hon. gentleman has taken advantage of the moving of this resolution to make a most bitter partisan attack on members of this side, and has practically said that we have been sniping under a flag of truce. If any members of this House have been guilty of that sort of thing, I think the hon. member (Mr. Currie) himself is as guilty as any of the rest. Not very long ago there was a bye-election in Ontario, and of all the bitter partisan utterances I ever read, I think his speeches in that campaign were about the worst. This was during the war, and I was told—I do not state it as a fact—that he was in uniform when he made those speeches. I can hardly think it true, and I expect him to say that it is not true.

Mr. CURRIE: It is not true. It is like the rest of the lies they told about that campaign.

Mr. TURRIFF: But the hon. gentleman will not deny his own speeches, for I read reports of them in newspapers that support the Government. I had not intended to speak on this resolution, but as the hon. gentleman has selected some members on this side, myself included, as the objects of attack, I feel called upon to take part in the debate. The hon. member says that we are endeavouring to shut up the manufactories of this country. I never in my life advocated a policy to the detriment of our manufacturers, nor do I wish to hurt any manufacturer. The policy that I advocate is one which will give the manu-

5 p.m. facturer less tariff protection than he has now, when he has two or three times what he needs. But it will bring about such a condition of affairs that the workingmen, the farmers, and the consumers generally, will have money in their pockets and will be able to buy the goods that the manufacturer makes. And what better can the manufacturer ask? Can he expect to prosper under a policy that does not tend to prosperity of the common people? In my opinion, what the manufacturer needs is a market. At present, he has a market abroad, owing to special conditions that will end with the war. Why should it be said that one who wishes to reduce the tariff seeks to injure the manufacturers? Prior to 1896 the old Conservative Government made reductions in the tariff. Did that close up any manufactories? My hon. friend (Mr. Currie) is a manufacturer; can he point out a case where putting an article on the free list that previously had been subject to duty closed up a factory? I was talking to a manufacturer the other day, and in the course of the conversation he mentioned some lines of his production on which there were high protective duties. But as to these he complained of lack of business. Incidentally, he mentioned one class of goods that he was manufacturing, which is on the free list, but in the production of this line he was making better money than in any other line. I was talking to another manufacturer about a month ago—

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member (Mr. Turriff) has had an opportunity, of which he has taken advantage, to deny the imputations of the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. Currie). Having done so, I hope he will not enter upon a discussion of a subject that is not covered by the resolution.

Mr. TURRIFF: I bow to your ruling, of course, Mr. Speaker. But the hon. member (Mr. Currie) went far afield, and with the consent of the hon. member who was then acting as Speaker, and I think it only reasonable that I should be allowed to answer some of the statements he made against hon. members on this side, myself in particular.

Mr. SPEAKER: But the hon. member (Mr. Turriff) has already given denial to those statements.

Mr. CURRIE: With your permission, Mr. Speaker, I would remark that the hon. member (Mr. Turriff) brought it upon himself by an interruption.

Mr. TURRIFF: I bow to your ruling, Mr. Speaker, I probably have said enough on the point with which I am dealing. I take up another statement of the hon. member which no doubt comes within the terms of his resolution. He talks of preparedness and says that it was because of our unpreparedness and that of Great Britain that this war was brought on. Did preparedness ever keep any country out of war?

Mr. CURRIE: I might point to the Morocco incident, England was ready for war then, and Germany was not.

Mr. TURRIFF: Germany has been ready for war for the last twenty-five years, and has been preparing all the time. It was the preparedness of many nations for war that brought on the war. The hon. member went on to speak of those who were opposed to preparedness and said they should be put in the asylum. Well, Mr. Speaker, we do not treat the advocates of preparedness in that way; we make colonels of them. Instead of going to Britain for his ideas and ideals, the hon. member prefers to go to Germany, and all afternoon he has held up Germany as the nation that we should copy after. I do not think my hon. friend will get much backing up either on this side of the House or his own when he proposes that we should go to Germany for our model in carrying on the civilization or business of the world. Britain is good enough for me. With her mistaken policy of free trade in everything practically excepting liquors, tobacco and a few luxuries, she is able to conduct the big end of this war and to loan money by hundreds of millions of pounds to all the Allies, and all the countries borrowing from her are high protectionist countries. That, I think, is a sufficient answer to that part of his argument.

My hon. friend said that Canada should be the paper-maker of the world. Perhaps she should, but I can assure my hon. friend that as long as Canada has a high protective tariff on everything that practically goes into the making of paper, whether she makes the paper down on the Atlantic coast or up in the central portion of Canada, or out on the Pacific coast, she will not be the paper-maker of the world. By high protection you make the cost of machinery, wages and the feeding and clothing of the people so high that you cannot manufacture paper or anything else cheaply enough to enable you to compete with the other countries of the world that make paper under better conditions and with lower rates of freight.

Another idea that my hon. friend advocated as one which was going to solve all our difficulties was that we should take over the railways and carry manufactured goods from the manufacturers to the seaports at the same rate of freight for 2,000 or 3,000 miles as was charged for 25 miles. What would the people, who have to pay for keeping these roads up, think of carrying raw material from Montreal to Edmonton there to be manufactured and then shipped back to Montreal to be exported at the same rate of freight that the manufacturers in Ottawa paid to ship goods to Montreal? To my mind the suggestion is very, very unreasonable. It is not feasible at all, and bad and all as the railway situation may be in Canada, if my hon. friend undertook to remedy it in that manner, it would be just out of the frying pan into the fire, because he would make the situation much worse. There are some things you cannot do to advantage in the West. The manufacturing of many lines of goods is amongst those things that cannot be done to advantage. We can grow almost all kinds of farm produce to advantage. Let the manufacturing be done largely in the east under a proper tariff, not a protective tariff, but a revenue tariff. The tariff on many lines now is such that we do not get any revenue out of it. But, I am afraid I will get on the wrong side of your ruling, again, Mr. Speaker, so that I will not go any farther on that subject.

My hon. friend stated that he was pleased to congratulate the Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White) on having set apart money for the building of ships in Canada. I think he was mistaken there. I listened very carefully to the Minister of Finance in all the speeches he has made in connection with the matter and I do not think I heard him say that he had set aside one dollar of Canadian money for the building of ships. Hon members on this side of the House have advocated for the last two years that the Government should do something in connection with the building of ships, but they have not done so and the Minister of Finance did not say, as far as I understood him, that one dollar of Canadian money was being placed to the Imperial Munitions Board for the purpose of building ships. It is all British money that is being handled in that way.

There is just one other item that I wish to touch on before I sit down. The hon. member for North Simcoe made the statement that this Government was paying lieutenant-colonels—or colonels—I forget which—who were not at the war and who were not going to the war, from $15 to $20 a day, and that colonels who are bearing the brunt of the battle in the trenches are getting $6 a day. If that statement is correct it is the most scandalous charge I ever heard made against the Government since the House met. Why should a colonel in Canada get from $15 to $20 a day who is taking no risk, and who is going around with his frills and feathers while the man who has the courage of his convictions and who goes to the front and faces the enemy is getting $6 a day? If that is the case, Mr. Speaker, and I suppose it must be, because I imagine my hon. friend knows what he is talking about, there is an explanation coming from the Government, an explanation to the people of Canada, and there is more than an explanation, there is action coming from the Government that will put a stop and put a stop at once to that state of affairs. The fighting colonel gets $6 a day and the tea-party colonel gets $15 a day, to put it at the lowest figure. I am just drawing the attention of the Government to it. I do not know anything about it but I take the statement made by the hon. member and I say that if it is correct then there is action coming from the Government and that quickly. The Minister of Militia (Sir Edward Kemp) is out of the House at present or I would ask him if the statement is correct. We will expect the Government to make some statement in that connection and, if conditions exist, such as have been stated to exist, action must be taken and taken promptly to bring about a better state of affairs. If there is any advantage to be given it should be given to the man who is at the front and not to the man at home. My hon. friend the Parliamentary Secretary for the Department of Militia and Defence (Mr. McCurdy) is here and he will probably be able to give the information.

Mr. SPEAKER: I would suggest that my hon. friend put his question on the Order Paper.

Mr. TURRIFF: I have brought the matter to the attention of the Government, and if they are not able to answer it, or do not care to answer it, why, it is their responsibility. There is one other matter that my hon. friend dealt with, that I will not deal with to-day, and that is in connection with the returned soldiers. That is a wide matter and one that I intend to have something to say about at the proper time. But as there will be many other opportunities for the discussion of that question I will pass it over to-day, and I will not deal further with the remarks of the hon. member for North Simcoe than to emphasize that he was absolutely mistaken when he stated that I was in favour of the closing of any manufactory of any kind in Canada.

Motion agreed to.

WOMAN SUFFRAGE.

On the proposed motion of Mr. Pugsley:

That, whereas, in the provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta, the provincial franchise has been granted to women by legislative enactment, and in British Columbia the electors have voted in favour of similar legislation;

Whereas it is provided in the Dominion Election Act that persons entitled to vote for Members of a Provincial Legislature shall also be entitled to vote for Members of Parliament, but in respect to Alberta and Saskatchewan—alone of all the provinces of Canada—it is provided that only males shall be entitled to vote for Members of the Federal Parliament, thus creating an anomalous situation as between the provinces, which should be removed;

Whereas during the present Empire struggle the women of Canada have shown a most intelligent and patriotic interest in, and an unselfish devotion to, the welfare of the State;

And whereas it seems but just and right that they should be given a voice in the direction of its affairs:

In the opinion of this House it is desirable that provision be made either to grant to women who are qualified to vote for Members of a Provincial Legislature, the right also to vote for Members of the Dominion Parliament, or to grant to women throughout the Dominion the right to vote for Members of Parliament, subject to such provisions and limitations as may seem reasonable to Parliament.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Dropped.

Mr. SPEAKER: Dropped.

THE ROSS RIFLE.

On the proposed motion of Mr. Murphy:

That, having regard to the fact that the failure of the Ross rifle as an active service weapon was known to the Government in the early stages of the war, and that notwithstanding such knowledge the Government has continued to equip Canadian soldiers with the said rifle, this House is of opinion that the Government is deserving of censure for its conduct in the premises as well as for its prolonged delay in providing an efficient substitute for the Ross rifle.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Dropped.

Mr. SPEAKER: Dropped.

RETURNED SOLDIERS.

MOTION AS TO THE SCALE OF PENSIONS.

Mr. J. H. BURNHAM (West Peterborough) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, it is desirable that the Government should fully realize that this House, while approving largely its past efforts to provide fully and amply for returned soldiers, would favour legislation providing for those who have fought for their country so that they may not be compelled to resort to canvassing and other unsuitable measures to eke out a livelihood which should be provided by the country for those practically disabled and unable to find suitable employment; and that generally it be understood by the Government that this matter is one for immediate and complete consideration; and further that pensions and other provisions on behalf of soldiers and their families should automatically rise or fluctuate as prices do, so that the amounts thereof be not curtailed or decreased as at present to the detriment of those for whom Canada is under every obligation to provide.

He said: Mr. Speaker, my object in putting this resolution on the Order Paper was manifestly to give the House an opportunity of expressing its opinion up to date concerning a matter of the first importance. It will be remembered that last year, when the Pension Bill was foreshadowed, I put a resolution on the Order Paper of the same tenor as this. On investigating the Bill last year I found no less than 26 cardinal objections to it, and I did myself the honour of sending to some members of the House, notably the members of the Government and the right hon. leader of the opposition, a schedule of these, in order that they might be taken into consideration. However, later on a special committee was appointed to consider the question, and as I presumed it would deal with all the objections that I as well as others had made, I took no further practical interest in the matter with regard to the resolution itself. But I find that the pension scheme which was then brought down has a great many vulnerable points in it, of so serious a character that unquestionably the whole subject should be thrown open for discussion.

I have intimated in my resolution that there are three main divisions for reconsideration. One is that the men are not properly provided for; in other words, that the pension list is not sufficiently munificent. Another is with regard to the finding of suitable employment for those who will be out of employment; and the third is with regard to the fluctuation of prices, since a stated pension is manifestly greater or less according to the fluctuation of the prices which it is intended to meet. I am aware that the Government is actuated by a desire to deal with soldiers most generously. I understand that a Pension Bill is coming down that will be a great improvement on anything we have had before. I have no doubt of that. But it may be possible that we shall have some suggestions to make to-day that may help in a case like this, and we cannot afford to omit anything that may be of the least advantage to the soldier and his dependents.

The true basis of a pension scheme in a democratic country like Canada should be equality; that is, that there should be really no distinction between officers and men. The spirit of the pension scheme as outlined in this memorandum which was served upon us all recently would indicate, in fact it specifically states, that the pension shall have no reference to the previous occupation of the soldier. Well, it should have no reference to the subsequent occupation of the soldier. I freely admit my appreciation of discipline and of that halo of distinction that must necessarily attach to an officer in authority over a large body of men, who, like a magistrate, or like you, Mr. Speaker, is more or less clothed in a distinction which is perhaps, though very fitting, nevertheless somewhat artificial. I could therefore understand that when a colonel or any such officer is in the actual course of his employment he should have a larger salary, a larger pay, a larger wage, than a soldier. But when he comes out of the fight he should not have a larger pay. I can find no reason why he should. There is no reason why by reason of any distinction that he has acquired or any service that he has rendered or not rendered he or any member of his family should have a larger pay than any other retired soldier. If this House, or the country desires to reward him particularly it is open to the House to move that he should have a larger sum of money placed to his credit or some other distinction conferred upon him. It is open to the Government or to the authorities to decorate him with various medals. Those are the things provided for that purpose. But when we come down to a simple commercial consideration of the question, he has no title to richer food, better apartments, finer accommodations and generally better support by the country than any other man who has done his duty, because I am convinced that a sense of duty, a sense of self sacrifice, is the highest qualification for merit. Absolutely we are not civilized until we reach that stage. If any other thing, such as the acquirement of property or the leverage that a large income may give, is to be the climax of our democratic distinction, then all I have to say is that we have not reached that peculiar and subtle form of the true spirit of democracy which means that sacrifice is far greater than property. Therefore I would urge that this feature of the matter should be very carefully considered. I may say in general terms that the soldier and his family should be, so far as necessary, even to the straining of a point, wards of the nation. Therefore I give utterance to my absolute dislike of the provision that after a boy is 15 years of age and a girl 17 there should be no further payment of pension on his or her account. That is preposterous; it is absolutely improper. Wards in chancery are taken care of until they are 21, being the children of the court until they attain that age. It has never been suggested that a boy is of age when he is 15 or a girl when she is 17. We should try to find out, not how little we can do, but how much we can do without offending the soldier and his family. Let us be ever ready to help.

Another thing, I must confess, appears to me to be extraordinary. When a man is discharged from the Expeditionary Force he gets 15 days' pay and then he goes into the domain or the zone of the province, which is supposed to find him employment. I say that that is wrong. This man is taken out of the life of the country, in which, perhaps, he was earning a very comfortable salary. He may have been a plumber, a coal dealer, a man of that description, making money hand over fist. He dropped it all, dropped his prospects, dislocated his whole domestic system and went abroad to fight. Having done these things, he is told, when he comes back: we will give you 15 days' notice, to enable you to get into your proper sphere of civil life. That is my understanding of the procedure, and I certainly think it is improper.

Mr. McCURDY: With the permission of the hon. member for West Peterborough, I should like to correct his assertion with regard to the conditions under which soldiers are discharged when they become fit for return to civil life. The hon. gentleman speaks of their receiving 15 days' notice. As a matter of fact, under present arrangements, each soldier returning to civil life is entitled to receive three months' pay upon his discharge from the Expeditionary Force.

Mr. BURNHAM: I understand the hon. gentleman's reference; I will return to it in a few moments. The present pensions for the men are, I confidently assert, away below what they ought to be, especially in view of the fact that when the men set out prices were 50 per cent lower than they are now. Indeed, the necessities of life have advanced, roundly speaking, 100 per cent; yet the pensions remain the same. If we were paying a salary, or a wage, well and good. Then we might say caveat emptor—let the man who makes the contract look after himself. But it is not so. We have said to the soldier: Go and fight for us; we will look after you; do not worry about that. And the way we look after him is to give him a pension which is now only half what it was when the pension list was first made out; yet we do not purpose increasing it in any way. And, strange to say, a man who is totally disabled gets $480 a year while his wife gets nothing. His children are provided for, but his wife gets nothing, on the principle, I assume, that man and wife are one, and therefore the wife is not entitled to anything. Or it may be that it is supposed that she would like to take in washing or something of that kind, doing something towards the support of the family. I do not endorse that view. I think that single men should be provided for on one scale and married men on another, and certainly the wife should not be ignored.

Mr. BLAIN: My understanding of it is that when a man is totally disabled he gets $480 a year and a further allowance of $250 a year.

Mr. HAZEN: If he requires the services of an attendant.

Mr. BURNHAM: That is an entirely different thing. But even if a man be disabled to such an extent that he requires some one to look after him, the payment of $250 a year would not help him very much. When a man gets into such a condition as that, through old age or otherwise, he has to pay $50 a month or more for a male attendant, so that $250 a year is practically nothing.

The partial disablement pension is founded on an entirely erroneous assumption, namely, that finding employment is purely a matter of arithmetic. In other words, if a man is 80 per cent unfit, his chances in life are diminished by just that much. If a man who is 80 per cent unfit seeks employment, he will get very little, because there are mighty few people who would employ a man who was 80 per cent unfit. His salary is cut down accordingly, and he is, therefore, in far worse condition than if he were totally unfit. Strange to say, the scale stops when it comes down to the man who is 20 per cent unfit. That is to say, a man who suffers partial deafness, or the loss of an index finger, is considered 20 per cent unfit; but the man who is 19 per cent unfit gets nothing. I suppose many people will hardly believe that, but it is so. In other words, if a man has an injury like a scar across his face, which would make him look pretty tough and probably result in his rejection if he sought employment, gets nothing under the partial disablement plan.

The pay and provision of a soldier on active service is, to my mind, largely the criterion upon which we should go. The single man on active service gets $1.10 a day. His quarters and rations are valued by the Government at 60 cents a day—that is to say, were valued; I am taking the list as it is. Then we must value his clothes at $4.50 a month, and I am putting down his medical attendance, which is free, at 50 cents a month. This means that he gets a total of about $672 a year. It is not necessary for me to go into this in any involved way; I simply say that when a man who becomes totally disabled gets $480 his pay is reduced by $200. When he was well able to fight we could give him $672—which is a generous statement of the amount—and when he is not able to fight we give him $480. If that is equity I do not understand it. If he were a married man on active service his pay, quarters, rations, clothing, medical attendance, separation allowance and allowance for, say, five children, would amount to about $100 a month, or $1,200 a year. As I shall show, however, when I come to a consideration of the pension statistics as given in this memorandum, the pension such a married man would receive is very much lower than this figure. In other words, although I know that the Government are most anxious to treat the soldier in a fair manner, nevertheless we have taken him in his strength and heyday of life and have paid him one amount, and when he is of no more service to us we have cut him off with a very small pension. I know we do not intend to do that, but that is what our treatment amounts to.

I would like to call the attention of the under-secretaries to this point. After the fit man is discharged by the Government, he gets fifteen days' guarantee between his discharge and possible employment.

Mr. McCURDY: Three months.

Mr. BURNHAM: Three months when he comes back.

Mr. McCURDY: A soldier on his discharge from the Expeditionary Force is entitled to draw three months' pay.

Mr. BURNHAM: That is when he is discharged. After that is there any guarantee?

Mr. McCURDY: I do not know about a fifteen days' guarantee.

Mr. BURNHAM: This memorandum says:

> If fit for discharge, that is, fit to resume his civilian occupation with no lessening of his earning power in the general labour market, his discharge is post-dated fifteen days, to which date his account is settled, all pay due to him being paid. Case finally closed.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: What is the hon. member reading from?

Mr. BURNHAM: I am reading from a pamphlet with the heading:

> Memorandum showing rates of pay and allowances authorized for the Canadian Expeditionary Force, the active militia on home guard duty, and the active militia called out for active service, together with rates of pensions applicable in the case of death or disability incurred on service.

Mr. McCURDY: Since that book was distributed the regulations have been changed.

Mr. BURNHAM: This is the information that has been furnished to me. All I can say in that case is that the records of the House are incorrect.

Mr. McCURDY: There has been this alteration, that a soldier on discharge receives not fifteen days' pay, but three months' pay.

Mr. BURNHAM: I am glad to have that amendment made. So far, so good. We are advancing. I am making my indictment of the statement in this pamphlet, and the first indictment I have made with regard to the fifteen days' guarantee has been anticipated by its being changed to three months' pay.

Mr. HAZEN: By whom is that book published—by the Militia Department?

Mr. BURNHAM: This was sent to me by the Government.

Mr. HAZEN: Is it published by the Militia Department or by the Pensions Board?

Mr. BURNHAM: I cannot say, but I think it is published by the Militia Department. Colonel Winters sent it to me.

Mr. NICKLE: That red book which my hon. friend has was published before the recent Order in Council went into effect. Men who have not been overseas—and the same regulations did apply to men who had been overseas—receive fifteen days' pay; in other words, their discharge is post-dated fifteen days. Soldiers who have been overseas receive three months' pay when they are discharged. I believe the payments are made monthly, but their pay is continued for three months' after their discharge.

Mr. BURNHAM: Is this book correct in all other respects, because I do not want to spend time in discussing it if it is not?

Mr. McCURDY: That book was correct on the date it was issued.

Mr. BURNHAM: Does any one know whether it is correct now or not? I understand there is an intention of giving some good, fat salaries to some hon. gentlemen, and I fancy they are good, careful men and would spend their time in bringing things up to date. This is a time of war, and I would like to know what they are doing.

Mr. NICKLE: That book was correct on the date it was published, but there have been subsequent Orders in Council that have made alterations.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: My hon. friend will understand that an edition of the book cannot be published every day.

Mr. BURNHAM: As soon as the Government undertakes to serve people with notice of what the Government is doing, they become entitled thereafter to notice of every alteration. That is a principle well known to every lawyer.

Mr. HAZEN: Is the date of publication of that book printed on the first page?

Mr. BURNHAM: I really do not know.

Mr. HAZEN: My hon. friend can tell by turning to it.

Mr. BURNHAM: I do not see the date.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Is that book printed by the King's Printer?

Mr. BURNHAM: All I know is this. This book came to me with a letter and that letter was signed by Colonel Winter, the Military Secretary of the Department of Militia, and it purports to be a memorandum containing rates of pensions and so forth.

Mr. OLIVER: When did you receive it?

Mr. BURNHAM: About ten days ago.

Mr. MARCIL: I received a copy of the same book with a similar letter.

Mr. OLIVER: I did not receive a copy of any such book.

Mr. McCURDY: The Order in Council to which the hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Nickle) has referred, was passed more than a month ago.

Mr. BURNHAM: That does not make any difference as to the receipt of the book. Surely the book was not sent out after an Order in Council, making alterations in it, was passed. If so, then the Government is going to pieces altogether.

Mr. NICKLE: The Order in Council was passed subsequent to that book being distributed.

Mr. BURNHAM: I would recommend the matter to the attention of my hon. friend. There is a question I would like to ask the Government with respect to partially disabled men. Partially disabled men are liable to a recurrence of their ailments; their wounds may burst out afresh; there may be gangrenous affection besides. If a partially disabled soldier has to pay for additional medical treatment, all his meagre pension will be swallowed up. Is there any provision made for such cases? No. In this pension list, in the treatment of partially disabled soldiers, that fact is entirely ignored, whereas any one who has any knowledge of the human frame, or who has the slightest idea of pathology, must know that these wounds may burst out afresh at any time. The pensioner, however, must pay his doctor's bill; there is nothing that I can find here to the contrary. I would advocate strongly that for at least three years after discharge free medical treatment be provided for the partially disabled soldier, because there will be no graft on the part of the pensioner as no man wants to be medically attended if he does not require such treatment; no one wants his limbs probed or tampered with in any way unless there is something wrong with him and perhaps a piece of bone is working its way to the surface or something of that kind. The Government therefore need not be afraid that there will be any graft in such a case.

Mr. W. F. NICKLE: Provision has been made by Order in Council whereby a man who has been prematurely or improperly discharged may appear before the Medical Board, and if they are satisfied that his then condition is attributable to his services he is again admitted to hospital, his pay and allowance are immediately resumed, and he is treated by the state free of charge.

Mr. BURNHAM: That Order in Council is not in this book.

Mr. NICKLE: I cannot say as to that, as I have not read the book. I am only stating what the fact is.

Mr. BURNHAM: I am glad the Government has a lot of good things up its sleeve, because, upon my word, it seems to need them. These misapprehensions and misunderstandings on the part of members of Parliament may just as well be cleared up, because we want to know what is being done.

The next paragraph says:

> The Commission shall make provision for the vocational training of those who are desirous of taking advantage of it, and for the supplying, from time to time, of artificial limbs and appliances to those who would thereby be benefited.

I see nothing in this book to indicate that after they have received vocational training and become proficient, work will be provided for them. Some reasonable effort surely should be made in that respect. Let me give the House an illustration. A man came to me not long ago who had had his left eye blown out by a bit of shrapnel. He was given a glass eye. He had one ear hanging, not very bad perhaps, but still pretty ragged. He had also a wound in the back of his head, and had lost his left arm. The whole of his left side had also been gouged out—it did not appear until he showed it to me—and his left knee had been knocked to pieces. He said "I am a pretty looking object," and I said, "I agree with you. Were you in a railway collision." "No," he said, I was over in France, and am now a wounded soldier. If it were not for the Maclean Publishing Company I would be in a very bad fix, because my pension is not nearly enough. You know how things are yourself. I have got to eke out somehow, and this publishing company have given me and some other soldiers some work." Another returned soldier came in while he was talking. This one had a wooden arm, and I asked him how he got along with it. He said, "I could get along all right if it were not for the infernal pain. I am supposed to be a one-armed man, but most of the time I am half crazy with pain." The pension he got was on the basis of a one-armed man, but he was no more fit to do work than the man in the moon. The pensions of both these men were entirely inadequate, as I knew myself. But they were given work by the Maclean Publishing Company selling books. There were five or six other soldiers selling books for the same company in the immediate neighbourhood that day. Many people have said to me, "It is disgraceful that these poor fellows, many of them knocked to bits, should have to do this. Some of them were horrible looking objects because of their wounds, but their wounds, bad as they were, were marks of honour and distinction. These soldiers would go around to the same few men in the central part of the little city of Peterborough and ask, "Will you buy this book?" The man would buy it, of course, even if it took his last cent, and the soldiers would say, "We are sorry to have to come and ask you, but if we did not do this we could not possibly get along."

Now, I say that state of affairs is too bad. Even if a pension of $480 was sufficient some time ago, the price of butter, potatoes, coal, rent, clothes and every thing else has gone up so rapidly that the pension does not represent anything like $480 now, and this must be taken into consideration. People may say: If you are going to provide against fluctuation, what about it when things go down in price? Well, that is really alarming. Would it not be an awful thing if the soldier got a dollar or two too much? They have given their best for us; they have faced the cannon's mouth, and we are so frightened they may get a dollar or two extra in case of a fluctuation downwards that we will not run the risk of providing against a fluctuation upwards. That is really one of the most appalling things I ever heard. That kind of thing won't satisfy the people of this country and it won't satisfy the soldiers. I know this Government is most anxious to do what is right but these are concrete instances that have come before me. As the Minister of Trade and Commerce said this afternoon these men do not ask to be nursed when they return to civil life. Certainly not; I do not know any of them that want to be nursed. I have seen and talked with hundreds of wounded men. Imperial and Canadian, and, believe me, some of them are more like crazy men than anything else; they have been simply jarred to pieces. Between the hours of eleven and twelve they would be calm, perhaps, and would talk about themselves, but very often from one to two o'clock their nerves would be completely gone. Not only are the nerves merely affected in what are known as these distinctly nervous cases, but frequently the nervous system is permanently injured, and nobody can possibly tell how much or how little the man is injured; when you undertake to say that one man is 80 or 60 or 40 or 20 per cent injured and ignore all below 20 per cent, you are going pretty strong. Class 1 deals with total disability, 100 per cent, and reads:

> Loss of both eyes.
> Loss of both hands, or all fingers and thumbs.
> Incurable tuberculosis.
> Loss of both legs, at or above knee joint.
> Insanity.
> Permanent extreme leakage of valves of heart.

Insanity need not be mentioned in that list, because insane patients are sent to an asylum at the Government's expense. Anyone who is suffering from permanent extreme leakage of the heart is absolutely useless physically. Now, all that a man in this class gets is $480, and I say that won't do.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess.

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. BURNHAM: (Continuing) Mr. Speaker, I was approaching, with some degree of diffidence, the clauses dealing with the rates of pensions. I may say, before going further, and for the purpose of allaying any anxiety that may exist on the part of any of my friends, that I am going on with this resolution with the full knowledge and consent of His Majesty's Government who are always anxious to know everything that can be said on any question in order that they may turn out, no doubt, the best quality of legislation possible in the interests of the country.

The man in Class 1, total disability, receives $480 a year, I dealt with that. I now come to Class 2:—

Class 2—Disability 80 per cent and less than 100 per cent—pension 80 per cent of Class 1. For example:—
Loss of one hand and one foot.
Loss of both feet.
Disarticulation of leg at hip.

The man in this class gets $384 a year. Now, manifestly, $384 a year will never put that man where he was before, even supposing that where he was before was a very moderate condition of life indeed.

Class 3—Disability 60 per cent and less than 80 per cent—pension 60 per cent of Class 1. For example:—
Loss of one hand.
Loss of leg at or above knee.
Loss of tongue.
Loss of nose.

"Loss of Tongue." What man with no tongue in his head could get employment? This, to my mind, is absolutely extraordinary. The man who got up this list of pensions had a much keener sense of arithmetic than of anything else. The man in this class gets $288; his wife gets nothing.

Class 4—Disability 40 per cent and less than 60 per cent—pension 40 per cent of Class 1. For example:—
Loss of one eye.
Loss of one foot.
Total deafness.
Loss of two thumbs.

Total deafness is an extremely serious thing. If a man totally deaf came to us looking for appointment, we should certainly put him off, for we should have to communicate with him by writing. That man would be useless as a porter, as a janitor, as a clerk. I cannot understand some of these things:

Class 5—Disability 20 per cent and less than 40 per cent—pension 20 per cent of Class 1. For example:—
Loss of one thumb.
Anchylosis of elbow, knee, shoulder, wrist or ankle.

Class 6—Disability under 20 per cent, a gratuity not exceeding $100. For example:—
Total deafness in one ear.
Partial deafness in both.
Loss of index or other finger.

This man gets $100 and is thrown on the world. Partial deafness in both ears is differentiated from total deafness, yet it may come close to total deafness, and partial deafness is very likely to grow worse, and people would hesitate to employ this class.

16. If a member of the forces has been killed, or has died as the result of injuries received, or disease contracted, or aggravated while on active service, the widow, until re-marriage, shall be entitled to the equivalent of the pension in Class 2, and also be entitled to draw the allowance for children. On the re-marriage of the widow her pension shall cease but she shall be entitled then to a gratuity of an amount equivalent to one year's pension.

She is relegated to Class 2,—$384. It seems to me that is a very serious reflection upon the generosity of those concerned, especially in view of the fact, as I will cite later on, that when a widow is left with children and remarries, she gets a certain amount as a gratuity which comprises the allowance for herself and her children.

22. A widowed mother, step-mother, or grandmother, wholly or mainly dependent upon a member of the forces who is killed or dies as the result of injuries received, or disease contracted, or aggravated while on active service, if such member was without dependent children and unmarried—

Mark that. If a man increases his obligations, if he enlarges his sense of filial piety, by taking his poor old grandmother under his wing, she would get nothing.

—or a widower, shall be entitled to a pension of Class 3, provided, however, that no such woman shall be entitled to more than one pension.

Which, of course, is perfectly correct.

On the marriage of the woman such pension shall cease, but she shall be entitled then to a gratuity of an amount equivalent to one year's pension.

23. A father, wholly or mainly dependent upon the son who is a member of the forces, and who is killed or dies, as a result of injuries received, or disease contracted or aggravated while on active service, if such member was without dependent children and unmarried, or a widower, shall be entitled to a pension of Class 3.

Comment is unnecessary. On page 19, at the bottom, we have a reference to a widow with children. This paragraph is not dignified with a number. It comes in after a lot of others, and may be any old thing, I suppose.

Pensions may be paid to widows and children of those who have been killed in action, or who have died from injuries received, or illness contracted on active service, during drill or training, or on other military duty, at the following rates; provided, the soldier's death was not due to his own fault or negligence and was clearly due to the carrying out of his military duties.

All which, I may incidentally observe, he has got to establish, and establish with such accuracy and so beyond cavil that by and by, I can well understand, they got absolutely desperate. The Government should take upon themselves the onus of making immediate inquiries, most searching inquiries, in the most generous way, regarding these cases. As soon as they learn—as they should learn, should be bound to learn—that somebody connected with the man's family is in want, or may fall into want, or is entitled to something, they should send reliable officers to learn the facts. I do not believe the Opposition would object, and demand returns, and say that there were too many officers. If necessary, appoint returned soldiers, and then they would not say anything. These poor souls are blocked by routine. They do not understand the thing, they do not know what you mean, half of them. Now a widow and her children, if the husband belonged to the rank and file, would get $22 a month, and $5 a month for each child. If she had four children, that would mean $504 a year. Now, $504 looks a big sum to the man who is giving it, but it looks like a very small sum to the woman who is getting it, especially if she has to provide for those children and train them. I do not believe that that $504, if it were given to the widow and children of a soldier who happened to die elsewhere than on the battlefield, would send him to his grave in a very contented frame of mind.

(b) In the case of orphans, the rates shown above for children may be doubled, and the pension paid to legally appointed guardians.

This is on the face of it a very generous construction—it " may be doubled." But look at the files in the office of the Board of Pension Commissioners and you will find correspondence enough there to fill an ordinary filing cabinet. And at the end of it, what? Desperation. " May be doubled." And they immediately begin piling up objections. They begin to say " We must do this;" " we must do that;" " we must do the other." In Heavens name, let them do it. But they don't do it. And you have to keep attacking them, you have to keep pounding at the door. They do not do anything of the sort.

Mr. NICKLE: Does the hon. gentleman understand that he is not quoting now from the rules in regard to pensions applicable to members of the Canadian Expeditionary Force?

Mr. BURNHAM: Does this refer to militia? What is this?

Mr. NICKLE: The hon. gentleman will observe that after page 18, at section 27, it goes to another scheme of pensions altogether not applicable to members of the Expeditionary Force.

Mr. BURNHAM: What is the pension that applies to widows and children?

Mr. NICKLE: From the word "one" on page 14 to the words "to it" on page 18.

Mr. BURNHAM: This misapprehension would have been saved by the number I was looking for in this paragraph. However, this does not in any sense sidetrack my objection, because these are pensions that are supposed to be given to those who deserve them, and this is a case that must be analysed just the same as anything else. It says further on, and this is possibly to what the hon. member for Kingston points, that pensions may be paid monthly in advance. I say they should be paid monthly in advance. This book contains the whole system of pensions. I am not necessarily confining myself to the Canadian Expeditionary Force pensions. I am dealing with all the pensions which this Government propose to give to men who, at this period of the war, are supposed to deserve them for services to the state. It says that any pension to a widow with children will cease when the mother re-marries, but the mother's gratuity will include the children's pension for two years, in which case the children's pension goes. As a result of a conference held between the Dominion and the provinces, I understand that fit soldiers were to be looked after by the provinces and disabled soldiers by the Dominion. This newspaper, the Citizen, of a recent date, from which I am quoting, says:

The Dominion Government, on the other hand, assumed the responsibility of caring for and providing for soldiers incapacitated for employment, or those who required special training or treatment before undertaking employment. This division of the work has been followed since this conference. The provinces have formed committees to undertake the work of re-employment, while the Dominion has provided for all invalided and disabled soldiers, and the vocational training of returned men.

In that there is a very serious omission; for the vocational training and employment of returned men, it ought to be. The provinces do not look after the employment of these men at all, and neither, according to this statement, and I understand it to be correct, does the Dominion. I shall now quote from some evidence contained in the Proceedings of the Special Committee appointed to consider, inquire into and report upon the reception, treatment, care, training and re-education of the wounded, disabled and convalescent who have served in the Canadian Expeditionary Forces, and the provision of employment for those who have been honourably discharged, and the training and re-education of those so discharged who are unable to engage in their former occupation.

This is dated Friday, March 2, 1917.

By Brigadier General Mason:

Q. You get information concerning the returned soldiers in what way? A. Through the Military Hospitals Commission. We had a great deal of difficulty at first in meeting the returned soldiers because the train which would bring them to Ottawa from Quebec arrived here late at night, and the soldier, being treated so generously in Montreal en route by the Khaki Club, would prefer to leave there at 10 o'clock at night, thus reaching here at one or two o'clock in the morning. It has been the case that soldiers would not arrive on the train we were advised they would come on, but on a later train, with the result that there was nobody on hand to meet them, but that has not happened frequently.

It is not necessary to go farther with that to show that there is an entire lack of system. That is not the way the men went abroad. Everybody was down at the station to see them off. This is a difficulty that arose from the very haphazard and unsystematic methods that existed in Canada.

Mr. SPEAKER: Do I understand that the hon. gentleman is quoting now from evidence given before a special committee of this House?

Mr. BURNHAM: Yes.

Mr. SPEAKER: May I ask if the committee has yet reported?

Mr. BURNHAM: I think so. This has been furnished to members.

Mr. SPEAKER: If the committee has not reported it is not competent for the hon. member to refer to the evidence.

Mr. BURNHAM: I thought it had been handed to the members and that it was all right to refer to it. I got this copy from the table of the House. As my documentary evidence was somewhat called in question at the beginning of my remarks, I should like to read this letter:—

Minister's Office,
Ottawa, 19th April, 1917.

Sir,—

In view of the many enquiries being received regarding rates of pay and allowances for members of the Canadian Expeditionary Force overseas, the Active Militia on Home Guard duty, and the Active Militia called out for active service in Canada, as well as rates of pensions, separation allowance, etc., I am instructed by the Hon. Minister of Militia and Defence to enclose herewith for your information and guidance a pamphlet setting forth these particulars, and other information in regard to the Canadian Military Forces.

I have the honour to be, sir,
Your obedient servant,
Charles F. Winter, Colonel,
Military Secretary.

John H. Burnham, Esq., M.P.,
House of Commons,
Ottawa.

[Mr. Burnham.]

That letter was accompanied by this little red book.

Mr. GRAHAM: What is the date?

Mr. BURNHAM: 19th April, 1917, just a month ago. This memo is, therefore, I should fancy, duly authenticated. I shall not detain the House, but I would simply assert, if I have not done so before, that widows and orphans are not adequately provided for. At a recent meeting of the War Veterans' Association in Winnipeg it was held that the basis of pay should be $1,200 a year, or $100 a month, and that strikes me as right. I know what expenses are in this country, especially at this time, and no soldier can be adequately provided for in view of the enormous prices of everything and the fact that prices are likely to continue, if not quite at the present rate, very nearly at that rate, and I do not think that one can make a mistake in being decidedly generous. Where men have been allowed to eke out their pensions by going about selling articles and soliciting from the public I think their cases should be inquired into and the results reported to headquarters. I do not think they should be compelled to do this sort of thing by reason of their circumstances, and I do not think, if they have been properly provided for, that they should be allowed to do it. Whilst I have no complaint really to make in regard to the Board of Pensions, as I believe they are actuated by the highest sense of duty, I positively assert that the system of investigating pensions is entirely wrong, or nearly so.

I shall give you one instance, the case of a woman who had married again but had been very unfortunate in her second marriage in that she married a chronic invalid who was not able to earn a living, and who clearly came within the spirit and, I think, the actual letter of the pension law. This woman came to me to see what had become of her deceased son's estate. This son was her only child. He had sent to her each month a large sum, considering his pay; but he was one of those men who did not know the regulations and he had not returned it according to the regulations. Let me digress to say, without being unduly critical, that the frequent delay in the return of assigned pay—I will not say through whose fault—and the uproar occasioned from time to time by failure to pay the separation allowance, excited in the minds of many soldiers an apprehension that since their good people at home had nothing or next to nothing to go upon they could not afford to risk delay and sent the money home themselves, paying the cost of transmission. In the case to which I am referring there was nothing wanting that I could find. I sent the woman's application in. She could neither read nor write, and therefore could not be expected to decipher the regulations or to know anything about the routine. She was a woman well on in years and being illiterate would know little about things of this kind. I sent her simple application in. They sent us back forms in due season. I said to this woman, who was a Roman Catholic: You take this affidavit to your bishop and this to the chancellor of the diocese and this to your own rector and this to the surgeon in charge, who knew all about the circumstances of the family. I also made an affidavit. We all swore positively and gave a detailed account of the whole thing. I never put in as much evidence in anything. I got a letter saying: We will send to the Canadian Patriotic Fund Society in Peterborough and have them ascertain what the physical and pecuniary condition of this woman is. I said if the bishop of Peterborough and myself and the doctor and the chancellor of the diocese and the rector are no good, know nothing, are a lot of hoboes, why, go on? That is what I call red tape; it is something like a story from Dickens; it reminds me of "Bleak House." Is a member of Parliament for a constituency nobody at all? Has he got such a political reputation that it is worse than none at all?

Mr. McKENZIE: It looks like it.

Mr. BURNHAM: If that is the case, the Opposition has given us such a bad name that we have been hanged, that is all.

Mr. GRAHAM: So much good accomplished.

Mr. BURNHAM: If you call that good, look at the result of it. I made up my mind that, as I was coming down here soon, I would tackle the job myself; so I went up to the Pension Office, and I must say that the conditions there were enough to deter the ordinary applicant. Suppose, for example, I had been one of those people instructed to apply for a pension. Imagine me the poor woman. She is not bound to have a friend at court, she may have no friend at all. She may think that she can rely absolutely on the Government and the intelligence as well as the generosity of its officials. So I went upstairs and announced, in a very bashful but nevertheless formidable manner that I was a member of Parliament, according to the custom in that behalf. I was very sorry to find that it did not impress the man in the slightest. They were a lot of people there, and they said: You have to take your turn. I said: I haven't got time. This was a duly authorized clerk who said this. Somebody else came along and finally I was ushered in after a certain degree of delay to a very urbane, kindly gentleman, who said: Do you happen to know, Mr. Burnham, the number of the soldier? I said: I regret to say I did not charge my memory with it, I thought you would have some way of finding out. He said: We are all at sea, we do not know anything except by the number; if we have not the number we are absolutely buried. I had a private suspicion that that is what ought to happen to them anyhow. But at last one intelligent gentleman ventured to speak up, probably at the risk of dismissal, and he said: Perhaps we could find out from the applicant's name. So he dodged upstairs and brought down the file and the applicant's name was absolutely on record, and of course the file was attached to it. Imagine the woman going there, what could she have done? She would have gone back to Peterborough and on to her little village in the country, and given up her claim, she would never have heard of it again, and would never have got one red cent.

In closing I wish to say again that this is not generosity, it is not justice. To have 400,000 men upon our pension list at $1,000 a year would mean a charge of $400,000,000 a year, that would be more than we could afford. I admit that is rather serious; but we must face these things as they are and not allow the fact that it is a serious business to impel us, directly or indirectly, to do something that is not the square thing with those men and those they have left behind them. Let us, for goodness sake, remember that these people are in our charge and that when we said: You go to the war and fight, and we will look after those you leave behind you, we meant what we said and were worthy of belief.

Hon. FRANK OLIVER (Edmonton): Mr. Speaker, if the members of the Government or those who are at the head of the Militia Department do not think that the statements placed before this House are worthy of their attention, I shall take the liberty of intruding upon the time of the House for a few minutes. I am personally interested in the matter brought to the attention of the House by the hon. member for Peterborough to the extent that I was a member of the Committee of the House of last session which investigated the pension list hitherto in force and made recommendations upon which, I believe, the present pension list has been based. I am sensible of the fact that it is impossible to compensate by money payment those who have suffered personal or family losses from the war. We must, therefore, make our arrangements so that the burden shall be reasonable and within the ability of the public to bear it. I agreed to the pension system recommended last year, not because I believed that it was complete, adequate or fair in all particulars, but because I had hoped that, as it erred, if at all, on the side of being too small rather than too large, it would be administered with promptitude, generosity and due consideration for the fact that those who were to be its beneficiaries were citizens in the large and complete sense of the term, not merely soldiers as the word was understood in days gone by, when soldiering was a profession of itself. My experience in this matter has not been as wide as that of the hon. member for West Peterborough; not being in the confidence of the Government, I am not appealed to as I would be if I were one of its supporters. But facts have nevertheless come to my attention which compel me to support his contention that the Board of Pension Commissioners are not doing justice to those who have served their country at the front or to the people generally in their dealings with those men. As a member of the original pensions committee I protest against the manner in which the Board has dealt with the assessment and distribution of pensions. I will not bring forward the instances that have come to my attention in my own locality. I will, however, take the liberty of bringing to the attention of the House instances which have been made public by the newspapers of Toronto. Even those instances do not compare with those of which I have personal knowledge.

The Toronto Telegram, a supporter of the Government, has been so convinced of the existence of the condition of which I speak that it has given certain instances, as follows:

Pte. J. S., of the 4th battalion now earns low wages as a light munition worker. A bad gunshot wound in the chest keeps him from his old job. His gratuity was $50.

Pte. G. J. S., of the 3rd battalion had to be operated on after a year at the front. A gratuity of $25 does not quite make up for a 30 per cent decrease in his earning capacity.

Shell explosion deafened permanently Pte. S. J. B., of the 39th battalion. His earning capacity dropped 25 per cent. His gratuity was $75.

Pte. A. E. C., of the C. M. R., earns $8 a week less than he did before enlisting. Varicose veins burst while on a march at the front. His gratuity on discharge was $25.

Sergeant J. B., of the 3rd battalion, wears the Distinguished Conduct Medal. In the Imperial army that carries a permanent pension of 12 cents a day, but not in the C. E. F. His sergeant's pension is $8.50 a month, which does not pay for the specially cooked food which he needs, since part of his jawbone and a dozen teeth were carried away.

The new and improved pension scale cut Lance-Corp. N. W.'s pension from $192 to $96 per year. His heart was injured by strain and shell shock while with the Princess Pats. He now earns a little more than half what he formerly got as a ship foreman.

No pension at all for Sergt. J. W., of the 3rd battalion, despite gunshot and bomb wounds in left thigh and both feet, which reduce his earning power.

Gas poisoning permanently weakened Pte. W. F. M., of the 4th battalion, so that he can only earn half his old pay as a steamfitter. His gratuity was $50.

Pte. A. M. D., of the 3rd battalion was a skilled miner before the war. Now a strained heart and defective vision permit him only light and poorly paid employment. His gratuity was $25.

Of the same battalion, Pte. F. M., was discharged last December, and recommended for full pension. He has received neither pay nor pension for the past four months.

A gunshot wound in the leg, a crushed chest, and gas poisoning, is what Sergt. C. E. N., of the 1st battalion, got at the front. A $25 gratuity is what he got at home.

Pte. J. R. K., of the Princess Pats, received a first pension of $132 per year had substituted for it a gratuity of less than that amount. His wounds keep him from his former employment.

A gratuity of $75 went to Pte. A. E. P., whose hearing in both ears is badly affected by shell shock. He is now a temporary employee of the Postal Department at $2 per day. Before enlistment of the 37th battalion, he was a well paid glass cutter.

I quote two instances given by the Toronto Star:

Sergt. E. N. Ludlow, of the Canadian Mounted Rifles, whose shoulder is paralyzed as the result of a wound, was awarded $25 in full of all demands by the Dominion Pensions Board. He is a structural iron worker, and would now be earning $25 per week if fit. Instead, his former employer is giving him work at $13 per week, and that out of consideration for his necessities.

The case of Pte. W. Flood of the 35th, a machinist is similar. His right arm is wasting away and the same firm, out of consideration, has given him work at $5 a week less than his wages when he enlisted. He has been given a pension of $16 a month for six months. A recent medical examination cost him about one month's pension in lost time.

You will notice that in one of the lists of instances given, only the initials are mentioned. The Toronto Globe, commenting on the instances given by the Toronto Star, says:

> The Ottawa Pensions Board has notified the Soldiers Aid Commission and other organizations that all information with regard to pensions is confidential. This is accompanied by a complaint and a warning that too much information has found its way to the newspapers.

The Globe goes on to comment very truly:—

> With regard to returned soldiers secrecy cannot be imposed, neither can it be excused nor justified. Without newspaper publicity information regarding all such cases extends rapidly to their friends' friends, and thus out through widening circles. It cannot be suppressed even if the newspapers should fall short of their duty to keep the public informed.

I have only this to say in regard to the matters I have already brought to the attention of the Government, that, however far this country may have fallen short of its duty to men who have served and who have been dealt with as has been stated in this list; however great an outrage that may be, the undertaking on the part of a creature of the Government of Canada and of this Parliament to prevent from reaching the public the facts in regard to what our soldiers have suffered and how they have been dealt with is an even greater outrage and is such an insult to Parliament and to the people of Canada that I for one take the liberty of resenting it here on the floor of this House. I will say further, that the endeavour to conceal bad faith and wrongdoing by an attempted censorship in regard to the treatment accorded to returned soldiers is just as detrimental to the interests of the country in connection with the war as that censorship, which is used for the purpose of deceiving the people of Canada as to the events at the front, and thereby protecting from criticism incompetence that is exercised at that time and place, is injurious to the welfare of the country and to the winning of the war. During the past five years we have had a good deal of government by commission; in fact, we have had too much government by commission. There may be times and occasions when government by commission is better than directly responsible government; but it is possible to have too much of a good thing, and it is possible for a good thing to go stale, and I say that the administration of the Pensions Board, on the evidence that has been placed before this House to-night by the hon. member for Peterborough (Mr. Burnham) and myself, is evidence that government by commission has gone stale, and that it is time that it should be reorganized and brought into touch with public opinion, common sense, right and justice.

I desire to bring to the attention of the House an instance of injustice to which, while it has only an indirect bearing upon the award of pensions, I am sure, Sir, you will permit me to draw attention, and I am going to dare to use in full the names of the men concerned, and I am going to dare the Pensions Board or this Government to interfere with those men in not doing them justice. When I was returning from Parliament at the adjournment in February there were on the westbound train some fifty or sixty returned soldiers. On entering into conversation with them, I found that some of them were from Edmonton, and the following facts were disclosed. John Chorley enlisted at Edmonton on February 18, 1915, as a private in the 51st Battalion. He had been four years from 1896 to 1900 in the British Army in the Royal Engineers. He was promoted to corporal in July, 1915; he was promoted to lance sergeant on May 4, 1916, and was made full sergeant on June 5, 1916, immediately before leaving for France. He went to France on June 8, 1916, joining the 2nd Battalion and acting as sergeant until wounded. He went into the trenches at once and was wounded on June 13, 1916. Captain A. M. Deschene gave Chorley to understand that non-commissioned officers going to France would retain rank. Chorley however, was notified at Buxton on January 20, 1917, when clearing for Canada, that he was reduced to the ranks. He was allowed lance-sergeants pay of $1.30 per day from May, 1916 until June 5, when he left for France, but after June 5 was allowed only private's pay of $1.10 per day. He was boarded at Taplow, (Class 2) and required further medical treatment on reaching Canada. He has a wife and two children.

Sergeant-Major R. Malloy enlisted at Edmonton on June 9, 1915, as a private in the 51st Battalion. He was promoted to sergeant and then to company sergeant-major, and on December 12, 1915, to battalion sergeant-major. He arived in England on April 1, 1916, and went to France on June 6, 1916, in charge of a draft of 800 non-commissioned officers and men of the 51st Battalion as reinforcements. At Havre, the draft of the 51st Battalion was broken up into several drafts for different battalions. Malloy went to the 14th Battalion with 200 men, and he was in charge as battalion sergeant-major until the draft joined the 14th Battalion at Popperin. All the non-commissioned officers of the 51st Battalion were given to understand before going to France that they would retain rank, and Malloy has a letter from Colonel Harwood of the 51st Battalion stating that he would hold his rank. He was wounded on June 28, 1916. He drew pay of rank until November 14, 1916, when he was boarded for Canada. He first learned on November 14, 1916, when he got his last pay certificate, that he was reduced to private from June 6, 1916, the date of his landing in France. He had drawn on pay account as sergeant-major up to that time. His last pay certificate showed him to be $72.90 overdrawn. A battalion sergeant-major's pay is $2.30 a day, and a private's, $1.10 a day. He refused to accept the reduction of rank and pay until he ran out of funds, and was compelled to sign a receipt in full on January 20th in order to get transportation to Canada. He signed under protest. He believed he was drawing $69 a month, whereas he was only drawing $33, of which $22 was assigned to his mother. There was no entry in his pay book showing reduction in rank or pay.

These men were reduced to the ranks on leaving for France, and they will, of course, draw only the pension of a private, which is the rank they were holding when wounded. While these two men who held the rank of sergeant and battalion sergeant-major respectively, before leaving for France, get the pension of a private only, non-commissioned officers of the same battalion who remained in safety and comfort at battalion headquarters in England, retained their rank, and should anything unfortunately happen to them in England, they will receive the full pension pertaining to their rank. The men who went over to France lost their rank, lost their pay, and lost the pension to which their rank entitled them.

After the facts I have placed before the House, I do not think there is anything more for me to say. It is absolutely up to the Government to see that the Pensions Board, the creature of this Government, carries out the intent of this Parliament, which agreed informally to the pensions list as placed before the country by the Government. The list has not been embodied in an Act of Parliament yet, but only in an Order in Council, and the responsibility is therefore still more directly on the Government to see that the intent and purpose of the people of Canada, as expressed in that Order in Council, is absolutely carried out by the Pensions Board, as it certainly is not being carried out at the present time.

I wish to say one word in regard to the remarkable condition that has been revealed by the discussion between the hon. member for Peterborough (Mr. Burnham) and the hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Nickle), relative to information placed before the House by the hon. member for Peterborough which he derived from a Government publication received at the hands of an officer of the Militia Department. The hon. member for Kingston informed the House that this information was not up to date, inasmuch as certain orders in council had been passed subsequently either to the date of the publication of the book, or the date of its being received by the hon. member for Peterborough. The position taken by the Government through orders in council in regard to the responsibility of this country towards its soldiers, is a pledge on the part of the country to the soldiers, of which both the soldiers and the country are entitled to full knowledge without delay. To publish a document for circulation throughout the country such as my hon. friend from Peterborough has placed before the House, and then withhold from public knowledge modifications of that document—and these modifications have been withheld from public knowledge—is not playing fair with the country, is not playing fair with the men who are most directly affected, is not good business from any point of view, and is not creditable to the Government that is a party to it.

Mr. RICHARD BLAIN (Peel): I do not think the hon. member for West Peterborough (Mr. Burnham) or the hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) expressed the feeling of the people of Canada in regard to the Pensions Board's treatment of returned soldiers. I represent a county from which a large number of soldiers have gone overseas; many of them have been seriously wounded, and many have lost their lives in battle. For that reason I have had occasion to come in contact with the Pension Board, and I know something of the generous provision that has been made by the Government for those who have suffered in the great struggle. In regard to the statement of my hon. friend from Edmonton as to secrecy on the part of the board, I wish to say that every time I have applied to the Pensions Board for information it has been given to me promptly and fully; nothing has been withheld. To-night is the first occasion on which I have heard or read of any man in Canada expressing the opinion that there is anything secret about the Pensions Board. I have no hesitation in saying that the statements of my hon. friend with regard to secrecy are not well-founded, and I am sure the people of this country do not share his views.

Having many of these matters to deal with in my own county, I called a meeting a short time ago in my home town of the relatives of the soldiers, and I gave an explanation of the regulations in regard to assigned pay, separation allowance, pensions and other matters of that kind. The meeting was largely attended by people of all shades of politics, as it was entirely non-political, and at the conclusion of the meeting I asked whether there was any one present who had complaints to make about separation allowance, assigned pay or the Pensions Bill, and of the many persons present there was not one who rose to say he had not been treated promptly and fairly by the Government of the day. It would be impossible to expect there would be no complaints when the board is dealing with such a vast number of cases; some people complain for reasons of their own, but I am sure from conversations I have had and from what I have read there is very little criticism of the generous treatment the returned soldiers are receiving from the Government. Only the other day I received a letter from a friend of mine in the county where I reside. It said that a certain young man who had enlisted in October 1916, had assigned his pay to his sister. She had been complaining that the Government had paid her none
9 p.m. of the assigned pay. As soon as the matter came to my attention I immediately got in touch with the Assigned Pay Branch, and found that this young man instead of assigning his pay to his sister had assigned it to another person altogether. This young woman had been complaining for more than six months that the Assigned Pay Branch had paid no attention to her brother's order assigning his pay to her.

When it was brought to the attention of the Assigned Pay Branch they were able in a moment to explain. Instead of people going to the right quarter to get the information, which they could receive by telephone in a moment, they prefer to take up the attention of the House and spread their complaints broadcast. For my part, in such matters as this, I think it is the duty of every member in this House, instead of exposing these things in Parliament, to go to the proper sources of information. I do not say this in particular criticism of what my hon. friend from West Peterborough (Mr. Burnham) has said. He is a public man of note and importance, but I rather think he did not do himself justice in not informing himself up to date before he presented his case in the House. That is a matter of opinion, and, I am sure, my hon. friend will not complain, and he was generous enough to say that the Government were desirous of doing the proper thing.

Mr. BURNHAM: What I said was correct, and I have nothing to take back, and I regard the remark of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Blain) as impertinent.

Mr. BLAIN: I accept that from my hon. friend in the spirit in which it is given. I venture to say, however, that he could have obtained up-to-date information. He was corrected in the House by gentlemen of the Pensions Committee, but, when corrected, he was hardly willing to accept the correction, but rather preferred to read from a book that is out of date. There is only one thing I want to add, and it is this: as I understand it, the question of pensions was referred to a committee of this House last year. On that committee were members from both sides of the House. The hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux), the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald), the hon. member for North Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt), and other hon. members on that side, including, I think, the hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver), were named as members of that committee. The pension list was revised by the committee, and the committee's report was adopted unanimously by this House. I do not think it is very appropriate for the hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) to bring up such matters, particularly at this time, when we are making an effort as a Canadian people to enlist young men for the war. I do not think that such discussions help to increase enlistments, nor do they assist in the conduct of the war. Canada's pension allowance is the highest in the world.

Mr. J. D. TAYLOR (New Westminster): I congratulate the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Blain) on being in very great luck in his county in regard to the business of returned soldiers and their dependents. I am sorry to say that my experience has not been so happy, and I think that the gentleman at the head of the Militia Department would be well advised not to take it from the hon. member for Peel that everything is as it should be in connection with the Pension Branch of the Department, but that on the other hand he would be well advised indeed to give very serious attention to this matter. I have noted from the remarks of hon. gentlemen who have spoken that the pension system as it exists to-day is largely the result of the action of a committee of the House of last session unanimously adopted by the House. That being the case, it seems to me that we can afford to discuss the action of that committee without showing political feeling on either side. For my part I can plead innocence, because I was not present during that part of last session. Had I been present, there would have been at least one discordant voice in the matter of pensions and their administration.

I have risen to take part in this debate, particularly for the purpose of making a suggestion with regard to pensions. But before doing so, I should like to refer very briefly to the matter of the pay of non-commissioned officers laid before the House by the hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver). I may say from my own experience that the hon. member's complaint is by no means an isolated one. I feel just as strongly as he does that these non-commissioned officers should receive a protection from the Militia Department which is now lacking. I agree with the suggestion of the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Blain) that it is not in the interest of recruiting in Canada, it is not in the interest of the raising of an army, to ventilate more publicly than is necessary grievances in connection with soldiers' services. But we owe a duty to the gallant men who have gone to the front, and part of that duty is to see to it that complaints which they are not in a position, under the terms of their service to voice, should be voiced in this Parliament, not necessarily by way of complaint —not at all by way of complaint merely, or warning people of the grievances they may expect—but in the hope that, being brought to the attention of the Government, these causes of complaint will disappear. I have already brought to the attention of the Minister of Militia specific instances of the nature of those referred to by the hon. member for Edmonton, and he has promise. examination into these cases with a view to putting an end to the cause of complaint, if he finds, as I have no doubt he will find, that the complaints are well-founded. Fortifying what the hon. member for Edmonton says, I should like to lay before the Government what happens to the non-commissioned officers when they arrive in England from Canada, taking my own battalion as an example. As my battalion was found fit for the trenches, within two weeks after it arrived in England, I think I can properly say that I took to England a very fine battalion, complete in every detail, and with as well-qualified a body of non-commissioned officers as could possibly be got together. I have been a soldier for thirty-eight years, and I know something about non-commissioned officers. I had special pride in the quality of the men I had been able to get together, and the pains they took to make themselves efficient by taking courses wherever those courses were provided throughout Canada.

We arrived in England flushed with pride at our efficiency hoping that that efficiency would carry farther than an incomplete battalion might expect to be carried at that stage of the war. Judge of our disappointment, Mr. Speaker, at the very first message I got upon reporting to Brigade Headquarters at the camp where we arrived in England. The Brigadier had made no inquiry at all about the qualifications or efficiency of my battalion, and was in absolute ignorance concerning it, so much so that he greeted me with the salutation: "Oh, you are only 700 strong," just three-quarters of a battalion—while we were a complete battalion of 1,000. His first instruction was: "All your non-commissioned officers will revert to the ranks immediately and become privates." It is one of the terms of enlistment in the Canadian Expeditionary Force that non-commissioned officers are appointed only provisionally. That is a wise provision and is not taken exception to at all by commanding officers or non-commissioned officers themselves. They are instructed that as the battalion develops and as the result of the several courses they are to take are made known, it is quite likely that better men will come to the front than those on whom the stripes have been conferred at the outset, and as it is serious business in which we are engaged and not compliment, the less efficient man has to give place to the more efficient when the more efficient is discovered. The non-commissioned officers accept the condition that if they prove unworthy, or not so worthy, of their stripes than others they are to lose them. But, that does not contemplate a wholesale reversion to the ranks such as my hon. friend from Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) indicates and such as I refer to in the case of my battalion. I feel quite sure that the department and Government in Canada have not been made aware of the conditions and that they have been quieted when complaints were made to them, as I made a complaint, by the statement that there are too many non-commissioned officers in England and that some of them must give way. I know some must give way, and that they expect to give way, but not in the inconsiderate manner to which I refer. The non-commissioned officers qualify very largely at their own expense. They make their choice in joining according to the prospect of stripes in many cases. Where there are two battalions competing in some localities for recruits, a man will look over the respective battalions and find a place in some battalion which he thinks his talents qualify him to fill. He goes there and gets it and is entitled to hold it on his merit during the war and to draw the pay and emoluments which rightly go to him for the discharge of the duties of that position. To take it away without any excuse at all except that "we have the power," imposes a hardship on the soldier to which he should not be subjected. I brought this to the attention of the Minister of Militia (Sir Edward Kemp) a short while ago and he informed me that he would institute an inquiry. As a result of that inquiry I am hopeful that there will be a change.

With reference to the subject of pensions, it seems to me that the Pensions Committee of this House, in drawing up the scale to which so much exception was taken at its very inception, altogether ignored the fact that this war is not the same as any other war. On every other occasion when British armies have been called for, the service has been limited. There has been a rush to arms, actual competition for the honour, and distinction of serving in the army. At the outbreak of this war the same was the condition in Canada and it was natural that at that time no attention should be paid to the matter of pensions. What had been before was supposed to be good enough for the present occasion. But, with the development of this war of science, in which men are being called upon for a hundred times the service that any soldier was ever called upon to give in the history of the world, it seems to me that the nation should rise to the occasion and deal with these soldiers in a manner commensurate with the service they give and not in a manner based on the very limited service that any soldiers in the past have been called upon to give. I am probably extreme in my view, but I put it forward seriously and with the conviction that when these men come back from the front and commence to make their influence felt in the communities of Canada, this view will be put forward seriously from very many quarters. This view is that our duty to the soldier who is maimed, or to the dependents of the soldier whose body lies in France, is not to give them so much charity, barely sufficient to keep body and soul together, and to make them forever the lowest class in the community in the way of the comforts of life, but to place the soldier himself, if he comes back maimed, in a position of equal comfort to that which he occupied when he responded to our call to service or when, as we intend to do now, we laid forcible hands on him and took him into the service. If he survives the spirit of humanity should cause us to feel that nothing is too good for that man and that the least we can do is to make him financially as well off as he was before the war; or, if that man does not return at all, and his dependents are bereft, they should in their turn be put in just as good a position so far as the creature comforts of life are concerned as they would have been if their provider had not been patriotic enough to give his services to the country. This is plain compensation for the soldier's services. I am asking for compensation such as I would be called upon to give to a man who was in my employ. These men are in the employ of the state and the state owes a duty to them, the duty of the employer towards his workmen in civil life, and owes it in a larger sense because of the terrible hazards which they take while they are in its employ. The answer to that will be: Look at the terrible burden you will impose on the state. I admit the burden that must be borne, but if we do not restore the man or his family then that man or his dependents are called upon to carry for the rest of their natural lives the burden that we have refused to assume; and it will remain so long as they do carry it, in my estimation a reproach to the community or state which permits it. If there is an awful burden it is better that it should be divided amongst twenty or thirty able-bodied men or prosperous families than that one maimed man, or one bereft family should be allowed to bear it alone.

It seems to me that we would most easily dispose of the problem of our pensions and our Pension Board by throwing the whole present scheme into the discard and starting afresh on a new basis of even-handed justice to the men who have served, and who no doubt will serve us so splendidly, and to the helpless ones from whom we have taken the services of their bread-winners.

Hon. J. D. HAZEN (Minister of the Naval Service): When this war broke out there was a Pension Act in force in Canada with a pension scale, and the Act was administered by the Department of Militia and Defence. It was felt that the provisions of that Act were not of a character that met fairly the situation that arose when Canada sent troops overseas and took part in the European war that is now raging. The matter was brought up in this House and discussed. It was discussed last session during the debate on the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne. My hon. friend from Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) spoke, and I made some reference to the subject myself; and, partly as a result of that discussion, the Government submitted the existing pension scale to a committee of this House composed of gentlemen representing different political views. That pension scale was considered by the committee, of which I had the honour of being elected chairman. The other members of that committee were, Mr. Nickle, from Kingston; Mr. Green, from British Columbia; Mr. Scott, Mr. Macdonald, of Pictou; Hon. Mr. Oliver, from Edmonton; Mr. Claude Macdonell, from Toronto; the Hon. Rodolphe Lemieux, of Rouville, and Mr. Nesbitt, from North Oxford. The committee called witnesses, had before it representatives of the Militia Department, representatives of labour and other organizations in this country, and private individuals who had been taking a deep interest in this matter and had to some extent been forming public opinion on the subject. The committee gave to the consideration of the matter the very best attention it was possible for it to give, and the result was that it made a report to this House signed by every member of the committee and unanimous on all but one point; my hon. friend from Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) differed from the rest of the committee with regard to having one pension rate for men whether they were married or single. That report was submitted to this House and discussed here, and without a single dissenting voice it was approved, it was recommended to the Government, and we were asked to see that effect was given to it. Perhaps I should not be wasting time if I referred to a few things that were said by members of the committee at the time the report was submitted to the House. In the first place, in explaining the matter to the House, I said, among other things:

> The changes which we recommend involve a very considerable increase in the amount that the country will have to pay for pensions. Under the scale in force at the present time, it is estimated that for a force of 100,000 men of all ranks in the field for one year the pension list of Canada will amount to $5.481,500. It is estimated that, under the pension laws which we recommend, the total pensions for a similar force in the field for a similar length of time be $7,184,181 a year. So hon. gentlemen will see that, based on the estimate of a force of 100,000 men in the field for a period of one year, there is an extra cost under the scale we propose of $1,702,681.

This is the pension list that is in force at the present time For a force of 400,000 men in the field for a year, therefore, it would amount to about $29,000,000. That estimate is made up, as my hon. friend from Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) will recollect, from figures we obtained from the War Office showing what the casualties usually were in proportion to the number of men actually engaged in active service. That report came before the House and nearly all the members of the committee had something to say about it. My hon. friend from Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) said:

> In my experience in this Parliament I have never served on a Committee in which every gentleman on both sides seemed to be actuated by so sincere a desire to arrive at the best solution of a very important question as were the members of this Committee.

Similar statements were made by my hon. friend from Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) and the other members of the committee, all bearing testimony to the way the committee had tried to discharge their duties, to the harmony that prevailed, and to the fact that, from first to last, there never was a suggestion made by members of the committee on either side of politics that would for a moment imply that they had any political consideration, but that their sole desire was to arrive at a pension scale that would be fair to the dependents of the brave men, and to the men themselves, who were fighting the Empire's battles at that time and who are fighting the Empire's battles to-day.

The Prime Minister made a speech in reference to the matter, because the committee recommended that effect be given to this report as soon as possible. It was suggested that it might be possible to give effect to it by legislation at once, and the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) expressed regret that that had not been done. The report was discussed at the very close of the session, and the Prime Minister used words to this effect, that the Government had ample power under the War Measures Act to pass an Order in Council that would at once bring into effect and into operation the report of the committee, and that it would be better, in his opinion, to do that rather than to pass legislation because the experience of the commissioners in administering that report might lead to the conclusion that changes and amendments were desirable, and these could be embodied in a Bill dealing with the whole matter at the following session of the House. As a result of that report, the Government, at a very early date after the close of the session, passed an Order in Council under the provisions of the War Measures Act which brought the new pension scale into force, and without any alteration whatever, brought into effect the recommendations contained in the report of the committee of this House.

Among other recommendations in the report was one that a commission should be appointed for the purpose of administering this whole scheme of pensions. Up to that time the pensions had been administered by the Militia Department. To-day the Minister of Militia and the Militia Department have no more to do with the administration of the Pensions Act than has my hon. friend from Edmonton, or any other gentleman on that side or this side of the House. It is absolutely incorrect to refer to the Pensions Commission as a branch of the Militia Department, or as in any way connected with the Militia Department of this country, as some hon. gentlemen have done to-day. This is in consequence of the report of the committee at the last session. It was felt that in dealing with a matter like pensions the very suspicion of any political interference ought to be removed; that, therefore, the Pensions Act should not be administered by any department of Government, and that the Government should appoint a commission with independent powers who would administer the Act irrespective of political considerations. Let me read some of the recommendations of the Committee which have been made effective by Order in Council:

> That three persons, to be known as the Board of Pension Commissioners hereinafter called the Commission, be appointed to hold office, during good behaviour, for ten years unless removed for cause, and to this commission be entrusted the consideration, determination and administration of all military and naval pensions.

The report further said:

> That the Commission have full authority and responsibility to deal with and determine all matters pertaining to pensions, and from their decision there be no appeal; provision, however, should be made for any complainant so desiring to present his case, either personally or by counsel before the full commission sitting for the purpose of hearing the complaints of those who may have been dissatisfied with awards given in the ordinary course of administration.

In introducing the resolution recommending that the report be seriously considered by the Government, I used these words:

> The object which every member of the committee had in view was the establishment of a board that would be entirely removed from all considerations of a political character, and with that object in view they have provided that there shall be no appeal from the decision of the Board of Pension Commissioners, either to the Government or to anyone else. The only appeal that will be allowed is that of a soldier who is dissatisfied with the pension that has been awarded him in due course, on the documentary and other evidence that is produced in support of his claim, and that appeal will be heard by the full Pension Board; but from the decision of that board there shall be no appeal whatever.

The hon. member for Edmonton and other hon. gentlemen who were members of the Committee will remember that, after fully discussing the matter from every standpoint, the Committee finally and unanimously decided that the Pensions Board should be the final court of appeal. It was felt that if there should be an appeal from the decision of the Pensions Board to the Governor in Council, political considerations might have weight, and, whether those considerations had weight or not, there would be a suspision that the pensions received by the men were subject to the influence of political considerations. We came to the conclusion, therefore, that an independent Pensions Board should be appointed. Having by Order in Council adopted in its entirety the report of the Committee, the Government appointed a Pensions Board consisting of three gentlemen who are now administering the Pensions Act without any interference from the members of the Government, the Militia Department having not a word to say with regard to the matter. The gentlemen appointed were Mr. J. K. L. Ross, of Montreal, Major Todd, of McGill University, and Mr

Labatt, of London, Ontario. What is the ground for complaint? The Government carried out in good faith and without alteration the report made by the joint Committee, which met with the unanimous approval of members of the House at the last session. If there is any fault, it is, in the first place, that the report of the Committee did not make adequate provision. That is a matter of opinion. The Committee brought its best judgment to bear upon the question, and as a result they recommended the scale which is now in force. If the Committee erred, the mistake can be corrected. Either that is the grievance, or it is that the Pensions Board is not capable of performing properly and efficiently the duties that have been entrusted to it. I have no reason for believing that such is the case. I represent a large constituency from which a great many men have gone to the war. A great many men have gone from the province of New Brunswick, outside of the constituency which I represent, and I am satisfied that if any persons in my province felt themselves aggrieved with regard to the administration of the Pensions Act, I would hear about it. Soon after the Pensions Board was appointed and before the work was well organized, complaints came to me from representatives of men who were entitled to pensions. Since the Board has completed its organization, such complaints have not reached me. I think that a good many of the complaints at the outset were due to the fact that the organization had not been completed and that the machinery had not commenced to run smoothly. If the Pension Commissioners are not capable of administering the Act properly, then the Government erred in judgment when it appointed them. I do not, however, think that this is the case; I believe that the administration of the Act will proceed smoothly and successfully in the future. I cannot believe that men of the intelligence of the Pension Commissioners would say that the work of that body was of such a confidential character that information as to what they are doing should not be furnished. The fullest information should be furnished, and I should like to hear what they have to say on that subject before coming to a conclusion which would be condemnatory of their methods.

We must get away from the idea that the Government has anything to do with the administration of the pension fund. Following out the desire of the Committee and of this House, the matter has been taken entirely out of politics and the pension fund is administered by that Commission alone. The members of the Commission are not infallible; they may make mistakes. On the other hand, things may have been overlooked by the Committee in the report that they made to the House last year. The right hon. leader of the House said that in all probability the Pension Commissioners would find in the course of their work that certain things would need correction or alteration and that the time to deal with such matters would be at this session of Parliament, when it would be desirable to give force by legislation to that to which force has been given hitherto simply by the provisions of Order in Council. I understand that the members of the Pension Board have, in connection with the administration of the Act, found a number of matters which they think should be remedied and are of the opinion that certain changes in the pension scale are desirable. From what I have heard, I approve of some of these changes and disapprove of others. Some of the matters in respect of which a change is suggested were fully discussed by the committee; they are matters of judgment and opinion upon which the Committee came to an unanimous decision, which, however, is different to that which has been arrived at by the Pension Commissioners. It is suggested also, and properly so, that the Pensions Act to be introduced at this session should practically consolidate the different Pension Acts that are now on our statute-book. The report which the Committee made last year and which now, in consequence of Orders in Council passed, has all the force of a statute, applied only to members of the overseas expeditionary force. Another Pension Act applies to members of the militia and still another to the members of the naval service. It is desirable that these Acts should be consolidated and all administered by the Board of Pension Commissioners. There are other changes, which, as I say, are worthy of consideration.

I might state to the House that it is the intention of the Government to introduce a Bill embodying the provisions of the report made by the Committee last year, embodying some of the changes recommended by the commissioners and providing for the consolidation of the different Acts. While this Bill will, in a sense, be a Government measure, the Government does not wish it to be considered for a moment that it is presenting that Bill to the House with a desire to crowd it through the House without its receiving the very fullest possible consideration, because it is extremely desirable that in this matter of pensions there shall not be any party controversy and that a conclusion shall be reached that will commend itself to both sides of the House, because we regard this whole pension scheme as too sacred a matter to be used as a football for party purposes as might be the case. After that Bill is introduced, it is the intention of the Government to move that it be referred to a committee of this House, constituted as the Committee was last year of members from both sides, so that they may consider all its provisions; they may, if they so desire, bring before them the members of the Pensions Board who have been administering the Act; they may, if they care to, bring before them people who have been dissatisfied with the administration of the former measure, so that there may be the fullest possible consideration of the whole question and a conclusion arrived at that will be satisfactory to the country, and satisfactory, as far as possible, to the dependents of those men who have fought our battles and who are fighting our battles at the present time. No man can foretell the duration of this war, and if it continues and if we keep overseas as large an army as we have at present, the amount of pensions involved will be simply enormous, and for years to come a tremendous sum will have to be paid out of the treasury of the country for the purpose of providing these pensions even on the scale as it is at present. That, however, is neither here nor there; the disposition of every one in the country is to treat fairly, properly and with generosity the men who are fighting the battles of the Empire and the battle of liberty and civilization at the present time.

Mr. THOBURN: Is it a fact that the pensions which are being paid by the Dominion Government are higher than those paid by any other country in the world?

Mr. HAZEN: Yes, I think that is a fact. I think the pensions scale, taking it all around, that was laid before Parliament last year, reported on by the Committee and adopted by Parliament, is higher than the pensions scale in any other country with the exception, perhaps, of Australia, in which the pensions are a little higher in some cases and a little lower in others, there being some difference in the scale.

I will not refer to the other matters that have arisen in this debate. I rose only in order that there might be a clear and distinct understanding as to how the matter stood. I do not want the impression to go out to the country that this Government is responsible, either for the pensions scale or for the administration of the Pensions Act, although, as a member of the committee of last year, I am willing to take my full share of the responsibility, and to say, in common with my fellow-members of the Committee, that we tried to do our duty and what we considered was in the interest of the overseas forces and of the country. At this session of Parliament ample opportunity will be afforded to have the matter discussed by the same committee, or by another committee if it is thought desirable that the Committee should be changed.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries has placed the position of the matter, so far as the Government is concerned, very fully before the House. The idea last session which was conveyed to the Government, and which seemed to have a great deal of support behind it in the House and in the country was that the system of pensions, whatever it should be, ought to be administered by a commission that was not directly under the supervision or control of the Government. It was not suggested, so far as I can remember, that there had been, up to that time, any political interference in the granting of pensions, but it was apprehended that political pressure might be exercised against a Government, and, therefore, in the interest of the people of the country, in the interest of the men entitled to pensions, and in the general public interest, it was thought it would be better if the matter were removed from the control of the Government. We accepted that view; we placed the consideration of all these matters in the hands of a committee of five hon. gentlemen from this side of the House and four from the other side, and that committee brought in their report. Personally I think I ventured to offer some suggestions with regard to the terms of the report. I am not sure that the report commended itself in all its details to my own judgment; but it was a unanimous report of the committee; it received the unanimous endorsation of the House, and the question was as to how it should be enforced. At that stage of the session, we had not time to pass the necessary legislation, so we undertook to bring the recommendations of the committee into force by Order in Council and to introduce legislation at this session. We propose carrying that out.

I would like to point out to the hon. member for Peterborough (Mr. Burnham) and to the hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) as well, that a good many of the matters to which they have directed the attention of the House have been under consideration for many weeks past by a committee of this House. It is impossible for me to refer to the proceedings of that committee, even if I had them before me, because it would be against the rules of the House to do so; but I think I am justified in the statement that some, at least, of the instances, to which allusion has been made here, have already been investigated very fully and thoroughly by that committee. I am not disposed to minimize any of the considerations that have been brought forward; I do know, however, within my own experience, that whenever allegations of a very serious character with regard to one or another member of the Canadian Expeditionery Force have been brought to my attention and I have investigated them, I have in a good many instances found that the representations made to me in the first place were not borne out when I got to the root of the matter. I shall not be surprised if, when that report of the committee is presented to the House with the evidence on which it is based, the same result may be found as to some of the cases that have been alluded to, but I merely say this in passing and with regard to the whole subject, I have no desire to restrict debate. So far as a portion of these matters are concerned, they have already been investigated by a committee which has not yet reported. So far as the other portion is concerned, they must be under the consideration of a committee of this House as soon as a Bill is brought down which is to carry into effect the recommendations made by the committee of last year, with such further provisions as may be submitted to the Government by the Pensions Board and considered as appropriate to include in the legislation to be introduced. Therefore, the whole question either has been investigated or will be under investigation by a committee to be appointed before the session is over.

So far as other matters are concerned which may particularly affect the question of military administration, brought forward by my hon. friend from New Westminster (Mr. Taylor), I have no personal knowledge of many matters of administration in connection with the military forces, which is not a surprising thing considering the large forces that we have enlisted and the complexity and variety of the questions that are continually arising. I have no doubt that these matters will be taken fully into consideration by the Minister of Militia and Defence. I appreciate the force of the considerations which have been addressed to the House by the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Taylor). There is, however, perhaps one consideration which we ought to endeavour to keep before us in dealing with all these matters of administration beyond the seas. Sometimes there are occasions of very great urgency when reinforcements must be sent at once to the front, when it is a question of throwing men in to make up losses or to hold a position against which the enemy is driving with all his force. It must be apparent that under such conditions, which must continually arise in the greatest and fiercest war the world has ever known, sometimes there is not a great deal of time for dealing with administrative matters in a very deliberative way. The problem that confronts the men who are responsible at the front is to get reinforcements there at once, without the delay of one unnecessary moment, to get them there instantly in order that the line may be held and the enemy kept back. I do not say this for the purpose of minimizing the force of anything my hon. friend from New Westminster has said; I think that what he has urged must be taken into account and dealt with in some satisfactory way, if possible. But conditions overseas are from time to time very urgent. I was there myself during three or four weeks when there were great losses at the front, when counter attacks were coming all the time, when the important thing was to get the men over there, whether or not they went over as the units in which they originally crossed the ocean; —the important thing was to get them over there so that the enemy could not recover the ground we had taken from him. Under the circumstances, in view of the approaching report of the committee which has dealt with a portion of this question, and in view of the impending reference to a committee of this House of other matters which were referred to this afternoon, I think this debate might very well be adjourned, and I will undertake to have it resumed, if necessary, after the report of the committee if submitted, or after the committee to which I have alluded has been constituted. In any event, the subject could be discussed very thoroughly upon the report of the committee which is shortly to present its findings to the House.

Mr. BURNHAM: As there has been a pretty full discussion, I should be glad to withdraw the motion.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I was going to propose the adjournment of the debate, but as my hon. friend has accomplished the object of his motion, perhaps the House would have no objection to the motion being withdrawn.

Mr. GRAHAM: As the subject can be reopened later, I think there would be no objection to withdrawing the motion.

Sir HERBERT AMES: The committee that has been referred to will doubtless make its report shortly and will lay before the House not only its findings, but all the printed evidence, and on the presentation of that report there will be an opportunity for discussing any of these questions. As chairman of that committee, I would say that we are indebted to many hon. members for calling our attention to certain specific cases. I think there have been over 50 specific cases where soldiers or others acting on their behalf have represented that they had a grievance, and in every case the grievance has been thoroughly investigated. I think the case brought up by the hon. member for Edmonton has already been dealt with by the committee and will be found in the evidence. Before the committee complete its findings, if any member of the House wishes to have the case of any returned soldier investigated the committee will be only too glad to go into 10 p.m it thoroughly, and the case will appear in the evidence.

Mr. W. F. NICKLE (Kingston): The hon. member for Edmonton has referred to certain Orders in Council which I mentioned this afternoon as being secret. He seemed to think they had been passed after this little red book had been printed, and without the attention of the people at large being directed to them. Both the Orders in Council to which I referred this afternoon were published in the public press, and if they do not appear in this book the reason is that one was passed after the book was published and the other dealt largely with the treatment of soldiers by the Military Hospitals Commission, which is not related to the subject matter with which this book deals.

Motion withdrawn.

SHIPMENT OF STEEL RAILS TO FRANCE.

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. FRANK OLIVER (Edmonton): I wish to draw the attention of the Government to a question which I asked on May 16 as follows (Hansard p. 1542):

> How many tons of steel rails taken from sidings on the Transcontinental Railway have been shipped from Canadian Ports to France, to date?

The answer was:

> It is not in the public interest that this question should be answered.

May I give what appears to me to be good reasons why I was entitled to ask this question? It is because the rights of property and interests of a very large number of my constituents, several thousands in fact, are involved in the proposed action, and in view of the present condition of transport of supplies across the Atlantic, it appears to me that as the representative of these people in the House I have a right to know whether it has been found possible to transport the rails overseas that have already been taken from the Transcontinental. I think the House is entitled to this information before the Government proceeds to destroy the property value of my constituents by taking up the rails on the Grand Trunk Pacific. We are all anxious to win the war, but the taking up of rails, unless they can be transported, will not help to win the war, but it will injure my constituents. That is the reason why I ask the question, and why I desire to press for an answer.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I shall look into the matter to which my hon. friend has directed my attention. It might be very much against the public interest to give information as to the actual shipment of rails across the Atlantic in the conditions under which transportation has to be carried on. My hon. friend himself, I think, will appreciate that. I do not know that I can say more about it at the moment, but I will speak to the Minister of Railways and Canals about it, and perhaps he can give the hon. member privately information upon the subject that will be of service.

Mr. OLIVER: With permission, I desire to add a word. It is not necessary, in answering the question I asked, to give information that would be of damage to anybody. The only question is, has it been possible to make transportation of the rails already taken—are they in service now? Is it possible to transport the rails that are now being taken up or are about to be taken up? We have a right to know that, not privately but publicly.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I am afraid I cannot give the information at the moment.

Mr. GRAHAM: May I be allowed to add, in to-night's paper it is stated that certain material is being taken up from the Canadian Northern as well as from the Grand Trunk Pacific. Will the Minister of Railways be ready to tell us to-morrow if this is authentic?

CANCELLATION OF A MAIL CONTRACT.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. FORTIER (Lothbinière) (translation): Mr. Speaker, I put upon the Order paper a motion, on the 30th January, for the production of papers and correspondence concerning the cancelling of a mail contract.

Since the House resumed its labours, on the 19th April last I had the opportunity of seeing twice the acting Postmaster General in that connection and he gave me the assurance that these papers would be brought down as soon as possible. I have not got them yet and I should like to know when the Minister will give me satisfaction.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I will direct the attention of the acting Postmaster General to the matter to which my hon. friend has just alluded.

LABOUR STRIKE IN WESTERN COAL MINES.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. W. A. BUCHANAN (Medicine Hat) I would like to get some information from the Minister of Labour (Mr. Crothers) about the coal strike situation in western Canada. I have here a despatch sent from Ottawa on the 19th instant—last Saturday—in which this statement is credited to the Minister of Labour:

> "If negotiations for a settlement of the difficulties in the western mining areas prove unavailing, the mines won't be shut down. The Government will see to it they are run all right."

I understand also that a statement has been sent out to the Western press to the effect that the Minister of Labour has intimated that if the strike is not settled the Government will operate the mines. Further than that, I read a statement of one of the representatives of the Miners' Committee that the strike was due entirely to the high cost of living, and the difficulty lay in getting a settlement with the operators in that matter. They said that if the Government would regulate food prices, they were prepared to make an agreement and come to terms with the operators. They say it is up to the Government to control food prices. I have had a wire from Lethbridge stating that steam ploughing outfits which should be carrying on the Government's greater production campaign, have had to cease operations—they cannot operate because there is no coal. The situation is very serious and demands the serious attention of the Government. The trouble has been carried along for six or more months, and there seems to be no prospect of a settlement in sight; in fact, the situation is more serious than at any time since the trouble commenced.

Hon. T. W. CROTHERS (Minister of Labour): I am afraid my hon. friend from Lethbridge (Mr. Buchanan) is not familiar with the facts when he talks about there having been trouble for six months. There has not been trouble for six weeks. He is aware that the operators and the representatives of the miners, following out the provisions of the agreement which was to expire on March 31, met about the beginning of March to try to negotiate a new agreement to be effective on and after April 1st. While they were negotiating, an accident occurred at the principal mine, one of the mines of the Crowsnest Pass Coal Company, and 38 miners were entombed. Their fellow-workers did not like to go to work while the men's bodies were buried in the mine. (I am sorry to say that their bodies have not all been recovered even yet). The negotiations were more protracted than the men expected, and some of them became impatient and ceased work. The operators and the representatives of the miners finally reached an agreement which, under the rules of the United Mine Workers of America to which organizations most of the miners belong, would go into force only if ratified by a vote of the miners themselves. That vote was taken, being completed some time between the 5th and the 10th of this month. Then it was discovered that the majority of the miners had voted against the acceptance of the agreement made by their representatives and the operators. Since that time we have been giving the most careful consideration to the situation. We are not unmindful of the necessity of keeping these mines working, and have been doing every thing possible to secure a resumption of work. I am now in a position to tell the House that I hope—yes, I expect—that within the next forty-eight hours, work will be resumed in all the mines. I do not think it would be in the public interest to tell my hon. friend the details of the efforts that have been made and which, I am satisfied, will prove successful during the next day or two.

ARBITRARY FIXING OF PRICES.

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT.

Mr. W. E. KNOWLES (Moosejaw) moved the second reading of Bill No. 21, to amend the Criminal Code. He said: When I asked the House to permit the first reading of this Bill, I gave a brief explanation of its purpose—to prohibit in future the setting of a price by the vendor of an article arbitrarily fixed and binding upon the purchaser. For example, manufacturers of certain goods, very largely manufacturers of patent goods, will sell to the jobber at a certain price, calling upon the jobber at the same time to sign a contract that he will not sell for less than a dictated price. As a consequence, competition is removed with regard to that article. My point is that the consumer has a right to the ordinary benefit that comes from competition between different merchants, and in so far as you have a dictated price for an article you take away from the consumer that benefit and the industrious, vigilant merchant selling the goods becomes little more than the medium of passing the article along at a fixed price, just the same as you would sell a postage stamp. I wish to establish the fact that there is, to a very substantial extent, in Canada a system of this kind, that a very great many manufacturing houses have adopted the system of the dictated price at which the jobber and the middleman are permitted to sell to the retail dealer and the retail dealer to the public. I am going, for the purpose of putting them on Hansard, to quote extracts from a few of the price agreements, or selling agreements of the principal houses, the names of which are well known to hon. members, and it will be noted that the terms of the agreements are, in nearly all instances, practically identical. The first one, and I take it merely because it is on the top, is that of the Borden Milk Company of Montreal. I believe this is an American concern. The first provision of this agreement is that the purchaser shall not sell at any price less than the price dictated by the manufacturer, and the price may be changed by the manufacturer. The second is that he will not sell to any person whose name may be on a prohibited list. The prohibited list is supplied by the manufacturer from time to time. The third provision is that the manufacturer may call upon the purchaser to give a sworn statement at any time that he is obeying all these injunctions and on his not doing so there are certain penalties and liabilities for damages.

Mr. OLIVER: Does that company operate in Canada?

Mr. KNOWLES: Yes, the Borden Milk Company, Limited, of Montreal. I believe it is really an American concern. It operates in Canada. I think it controls practically all the condensed milk interests except one in Canada. It is certainly a tremendously large concern. Here is the way the agreement reads. I shall not read all of it, but it provides that the purchaser must not sell —at less than the prices set forth in the price list attached hereto, or at prices in force from time to time, or on better terms than 30 days net, no discount for prepayment.

The next clause deals with the trade discount:—

It is further understood that trade discount from Borden Milk Co, Limited is wholly contingent upon the margin of profit from other manufacturers of similar products not being less, and the terms of protection as to the keeping of prices being no less favorable. This includes private or special label goods as well as other competitive lines.

It is also agreed that upon request of Borden Milk Co., Limited, declarations covering the details of any sale of Milk Products will be furnished, same to be sworn to by one of our Principals and salesmen specified. Failure to comply with this condition will be considered a breach of contract.

The man signs this.

I have a statement here which will interest a great many hon. gentlemen present, and it is a very important one, too. It deals with tobacco. A letter was sent to me by Mr. E. A. Morris, a wholesale tobacco dealer in Vancouver and a reputable man, who writes me as follows:—

March 21, 1917.

W. E. Knowles, Esq., M.P.,
House of Commons,
Ottawa, Ont.

Dear Sir: —

I have noticed an article in our local paper re trade agreements for which you are endeavouring to amend the Criminal Code, the following information might be of assistance to you.

In October 1915, I was obliged to enter into an agreement (copy of which is herein enclosed) with the Imperial Tobacco Co. of Canada whose head office is in Montreal, not to sell their goods or any other manufactures of like goods below the various list prices. Later I was advised by their agent in this city that it was the intention of the said Company to place my travelling salesmen, who sell from Auto wagons, upon their oaths that they were keeping to this agreement. Now I feel that this is a direct interference with one's liberty who I contend should be permitted to carry on his business in quiet enjoyment. The object of this agreement was to stop competition among the Tobacco Jobbers and wholesalers, also to stop the giving of discount and general competition of other manufacturers. A manufacturer might have the right to dictate the price of his own manufactures, but why should he dictate the price of other manufacturers.

In the case of the Eddy & Co's agreement they say you must not handle like goods of other manufacturers. That very agreement stopped the going on of a competition match manufacturing business here. Who would buy stock in a concern which was barred from doing business with the wholesalers and jobbers? Consequently the enterprise fell through. Why should I or anybody else be dictated to, as to what I should charge for another man's goods, It seems to me that any one licensed to do business or manufacture in Canada should be compelled to sell to any one of the trade who is ready and willing to pay the list price.

Trusting this information will be of benefit to you.

I remain
Yours truly,
E. A. Morris.

He encloses a copy of the Imperial Tobacco Company's contract, a part of which is as follows:—

We understand this agreement is for the sole purpose of eliminating price cutting and giving special discounts, and the object of same is the handling of the lines referred to on a fair and equal competitive basis.

It is also understood that in the event of a jobber violating this agreement, and thereby losing his regular jobber's discount, no jobber will be permitted to supply him with tobaccos and cigarettes at less than retail price.

I have a letter which concerns me as a western man particularly and which I shall read. It is from the Merchants' Consolidated, Limited, of Winnipeg, a syndicate of some 500 retail merchants throughout western Canada, stating that as the Merchants' Consolidated, Limited, they are not allowed to buy a great many goods because they will not sign these price-maintenance agreements, which are dictated to them by the manuacturers. The letter, which is addressed to myself, is as follows:—

Dear Sir:

We have before us copy of a Bill introduced by you before the House of Commons at Ottawa, and marked "Bill No. 21", an Act to amend the Criminal Code No. 498 and also the comments on this Bill in a Bulletin issued by the Retail Merchants Association of Canada.

Our company, Merchants Consolidated Limited, is a joint stock company, incorporated under the laws of the province of Manitoba, registered in the province of Saskatchewan and also the province of Alberta. This Company is composed of some 500 retail merchants and we have reason to believe that they do not concur in the statements made in the Bulletin issued by the Retail Merchants Association of the Dominion of Canada.

They state that they do not like this bill.

Merchants Consolidated Limited is desirous of having just such legislation enacted as your Bill provides for, for the very reason that there are a number of Associations, such as the Grocer's Guild, and the Hardware Jobbers Association, etc, in the Dominion of Canada, who seek to have a re-sale price or price maintenance contract kept by the manufacturers, and the reason for this seems to be that they do not wish the manufacturers to sell to any Organization or Association who may not maintain that re-sale price, and in nearly every case that re-sale price carries with it an excessive middleman's profit.

Merchants Consolidated Limited has only been organized some eighteen months and already this Company has saved to its shareholders in discounts many times over their investment in the Capital Stock of the Company. The object for the formation of this Company was to enable the retail merchants of Western Canada to buy in a consolidated way to meet Mail Order competition by going direct to the manufacturers and buying goods in large quantities and for cash.

The next paragraph is unimportant, and I shall not read it. Then it goes on:—

We contend that there should be no price maintenance contract existing between the manufacturers and the jobbers. We believe if the manufacturer was left to his own discretion that he would sell to any organization properly constituted and allow such Organization to resell at any price bearing a fair margin of profit for so doing business. We think that the price maintenance contract as between the jobber and manufacturer is fully in protection of the jobber. We would be glad to go further into the matter upon request.

There was a house in Moosejaw called the Assiniboia Music Company which had signed one of these agreements with the Berliner Company, a long thing of six and a third closely written pages of typewriting, tying a man up as tightly as he could be tied in this world. It happened that the Assiniboia Music Company had on hand at a certain date a large stock of Victor records, all with labeled prices below which the records must not be sold. The labeled notice further stated that buying the record was an acceptance of the terms of sale. The Berliner Company arbitrarily took away the agency from the Assiniboia Music Company because that firm handled the Edison records as well, and left them with many hundred Victor records which they must not sell below the labeled price. They held on to the old records for quite a while. They could not sell them as people knew they no longer had the agency and would not come into their store to hear them, and by the terms of their agreement they could not sell them below the labeled price. At last they unloaded them on a jobber who took chances, and that jobber sold them to another and they to another, who then started retailing them out at a somewhat reduced rate, which was the only way in which he could sell them as they were very old records, some of them twelve and fifteen years old, quite old stock. And what did they do? The Berliner Company came to this company, the fourth holder from them, and sued them for, I think, $20,000 damages, a very large sum, and got an injunction forbidding them to deal in Berliner gramophone records except at the duly authorized prices. Let us suppose they were right in this, what an outrage it is that the law should permit a contract to be made that would enable the vendor to say to a man: Because you have signed a contract and we have your name, even if the records are 15 years old, you may not sell for less than the labeled price or we will get an injunction against you. That is a fair illustration of the way in which these people, who talk about using customers right, treat people when they get them under their thumb. They got an injunction and carried the case right to the eve of the court, with their bulleying methods, because they have any amount of money to fight such cases. I have here a report of the withdrawal of the case 24 hours before the trial, taken from the daily paper in Moosejaw, which I shall read because it shows the spirit in which these people dictate and bully when they have a man under their thumb on one of these price agreements. The report is as follows:

There came before Judge Lamont in Supreme Court yesterday the action of Berliner Gramo-phone Company, Limited, against Canadian Specialities Limited.

The plaintiff about two years ago had sold a large quantity of records to the Assiniboia Music Store and had secured from the Assiniboia Music Store a hard-and-fast contract that the records should not be sold less than the price dictated by the Berliner Company.

In the course of time the Berliner Company cancelled the agency of the Assiniboia Music Store and afterwards the records which were then in stock, came eventually into the possession of the Canadian Specialties Limited, who were selling them regardless of the dictated price.

The case is of especial interest inasmuch as there is at present before the House of Commons what is known as "The Knowles Bill," forbidding price fixing contracts, and in this case the Berliner Company sued on the contract and obtained an injunction some four months ago prohibiting the Canadian Specialties from disposing of the records at less than the dictated price.

When it came to the eve of the trial the Berliner Company abandoned its position, and yesterday moved before Judge Lamont for leave to have the action dismissed with the Berliner Company paying all costs. Mr. Knowles, K.C., on behalf of the defendant opposed this, maintaining that it should be subject to a condition that the damages incurred by the defendant should be paid by the plaintiff. Judge Lamont sustained this point, and entered a direction that the damages should be assessed by himself at a later date, to be appointed.

During the course of the argument an evidence point of interest came out, and there was read the examination of the Vice-President of the plaintiff company, in which he was forced to admit that the patent on which he sued was absolutely valueless inasmuch as it had expired two years before the issue of the writ. It was further valueless because the plaintiff had used the wrong patent number, and the number in question, which they had inserted on their records, was a patent of a device for cutting thistles, apparently some agricultural implement, and Judge Lamont jocularly asked the plaintiff's counsel if he would contend that his records had a practical use for the purpose of eradicating this well-known weed. It was further shown that the patent, which the plaintiff said should be inserted on the record, was not only one which had expired but was one which was made of entirely different material (hard rubber) than that used in the records in question, and according to the evidence even this patent was not the property of the plaintiff. The evidence of Mr. Berliner also admitted that the contract, which the Assiniboia Music Store had signed, might by the arbitrary conduct of the Plaintiff Company, leave the purchaser of records high and dry with a large stock of records which he would be unable to sell unless by special permission of the Berliner Company.

Mr. Knowles made the remark that the plaintiff's case was even tedious in the fact that one constantly searched and found nothing but foundationless points in the plaintiff's case, and Judge Lamont from the bench made the inquiry as to whether the Berliner Company's whole case was not a case of bluff, to which Mr. Knowles replied that his clients were positively of that opinion.

The Canadian Specialties' case had been carefully prepared by a special patent expert, whom they had engaged in the matter, and it was manifest that the whole case of the plaintiff must necessarily fall to the ground, and this, no doubt, explains the application of the Plaintiff Company for leave to have the whole action abandoned.

I refer to that case because it was largely through it that I became impressed with the fact that an injustice is done to men who sign these agreements, and the public suffer in consequence.

I have here next the agreement of the Henry K. Wampole Company, Limited, manufacturers of all kinds of medicines and chemicals, out in South Lanark, a riding we all know so well. I shall not read it as it is a long agreement in small type; but it ties the purchaser up completely.

Mr. CROTHERS: What do they deal in?

Mr. KNOWLES: They are well known wholesale druggists. I think a man should be protected if he has stomach ache, and that he has a right to get a remedy to relieve it at the lowest possible rate.

Then I have the agreement of the Nyal remedies.

Every Nyal remedy on this invoice has the selling price plainly printed thereon. In accepting the goods (whether charged or free) covered by this invoice, the purchaser for himself and his employees hereby agrees with Frederick Stearns & Company of Canada, Limited, Windsor, Ontario, not to sell any of said goods or permit the same to be sold at a less price than that printed upon the package.

I have another, in very much the same terms, of the National Drug and Chemical Company, commonly called the Na-Dru-Co. That is in the form of a regular contract in which they call upon a purchaser not to sell their products at less than the stipulated prices and terms set forth in the price lists of the company. The company reserve the right to change the prices, and the purchaser must agree not to sell the products of the company to any person who has violated their agreement, and to give a sworn declaration at any time that he has adhered to the agreement. It is like the treatment of a ticket-of-leave man. I have here our old friend the E. B. Eddy Company, Limited. That beats them all. That company has a wonderful system. It does not let the man who buys matches get his profit until he gets all through selling the matches and then it makes him give a sworn declaration that he has kept the faith, held the fort and been a good soldier of the cross with it, and then it gives him his 17½ per cent profit.

Mr. DOHERTY: Surely he is a soldier of Lucifer if he sells matches.

Mr. KNOWLES: In the grocery and provision trade 8 per cent or 9 per cent is a legitimate profit, and he is forced to exact just twice that amount as his regular selling profit. The agreement reads:

Nor are you or your agents or employees to buy, sell, barter, trade or deal in any matches other than those of our brands bought from us or from our agents or travellers, except in so far as, and to the extent that, we are unable from any unforeseen cause, to fill your orders from time to time, of which you will be promptly advised.

[Mr. Knowles.]

It is like letting a man out on parole and requiring him to report every six months. If he reports faithfully, he is allowed to retain his freedom. The agreement continues:

We will, on the 15th of January and July in each year, or as soon as possible thereafter, credit you in account with a further special Loyalty Quantity Discount equal to twelve and a half per cent on the net amount (after deducting all other discounts, freights and allowances), of all invoices of our matches.

First they give him a discount of 5 per cent; then they give him a special loyalty quantity discount of 12½ per cent for keeping faith. A copy of the affidavit required by Mr. Eddy is attached. They agree to give Macdonald, Crawford, Limited, 5 per cent before they give them the 12½ per cent—and they make them sign a contract before they sell them the matches.

I have contracts here along the same line, issued by the Aylmer Condensed Milk Company, Limited, and the Welch Grape Juice Company. Then there is one from the Channell Chemical Company, Limited. I do not know who the president is, or whether he was born in Hanover, Germany, or not, but he has quite a system. The letter reads:

1. We will not sell or offer for sale any of the said products to the retail trade or any person, firm or corporation (hereinafter referred to as the "customer") at a price other than thirty-three and one-third per cent off that appearing on the package in which the product is sold.

2. We will not give to any customer any cash or other discount or advantage reducing said price.

3. We will not sell or offer for sale any of the said products to any customer after receipt of written notice from you that you have suspended the supplies of such customer on account of underselling said products or otherwise.

4. We will not export any of said products supplied hereunder to any country outside of Canada without your written consent first had and obtained.

5. We agree to pay you the sum of one dollar for each and every article sold or offered for sale in breach of this agreement as and by way of liquidated damages (this being a careful pre-estimate thereof) and not as a penalty but without prejudice to any other rights or remedies you may have hereunder.

I have here a letter signed by the Channell Chemical Company, who deal in the O-Cedar products. Any person who keeps house knows what O-Cedar products are.

Mr. McKENZIE: Where are they manufactured?

Mr. KNOWLES: In Toronto. This letter, which is dated April 13, 1917, is addressed to Macdonald, Crawford, Limited, a Moosejaw wholesale house, and gives a list of dealers who are not to be supplied with O-Cedar products because they would not behave themselves. The list includes the following names: E. G. West, Ferrah Drug Company, H. & S. Smythe, Mr. Rosenberg, of Toronto; Binning's Fair, of Moosejaw; J. H. Morris & Company, Edmonton, and two in Montreal.

Mr. OLIVER: They are on the black list?

Mr. KNOWLES: Yes. The first paragraph of the letter reads:

> We beg to advise that the following is a complete list of those dealers who are not to be supplied with O-Cedar products owing to their persistence in cutting the price.

I have a letter dated April 18, from Mr. Binning, of Binning's Fair, Limited, in which he mentions having been struck off the book of life by the Channell Chemical Company. This is the letter:

> We have just been advised by Messrs. McDonald, Crawford, Limited, that the Channell Chemical Co., Limited, have instructed them not to sell us any more O-Cedar goods. We presume this is on account of our refusing to sign their contract.
> We beg to enclose herein two letters from them which still remain unanswered also the agreement in duplicate which they sent us to sign. We have not broken their price for one year, but do not care to sign a drastic agreement.

They were removed from the list, therefore, not because they cut prices, but because they refused to sign the Channell Chemical Company's contract.

I have here a copy of the contract covering the sale of the Proctor and Gamble Distributing Company's products. This company manufactures in Cincinnati, but does business also in Canada. The contract provides that in case a charge for violation of contract shall be made, the persons signing the contract shall give the name of the person who made the sale in question, and furnish other necessary particulars. Refusal on the part of the signors to do this shall be conclusive evidence that the charge is true, and will render them liable to the payment of $50 to the Proctor and Gamble Distributing Company as liquidated damages, without prejudice to any other remedies which it may have. This company manufactures soaps, washing powders and crisco.

Here is another contract sent out by Lever Brothers, Limited, the Sunlight Soap people. It provides for the usual affidavit which must be sworn to by any member of the firm designated by the Lever Brothers, Limited, covering the details of any sale of Lever Brothers' soaps.

Another contract in similar terms is that between the Canadian Postum Cereal Company, Limited, of Windsor, Ontario, and the Macdonald, Crawford Company, Moosejaw, in which the same penalty is provided as liquidated damages if conclusive evidence is not furnished upon request of the name of the person or persons who made sales in contravention of the agreement.

In a letter to Macdonald, Crawford Limited, the Canadian Shredded Wheat Company, Limited, quotes the following paragraph from an agreement previously made:

> And we further agree not to sell shredded whole wheat biscuit, triscuit or other preparations of the said company at any price to any person or corporation who has not signed and conformed to an agreement in the form B-2 below written.

I have here a letter concerning the Gillette Razor Company, but I shall not trouble the House by reading it. I may say in passing, however, that the House may be interested in the case of the Gillette Razor Company vs. Rea, which will be found in No. 1 Ontario Weekly Notes. The Rea people of the city of Ottawa had bought the goods from another party, who had really bought from the Gillette Company, and the Gillette Company tried to get an injunction against the Rea people, although they were not really the signors of the contract. In the volume above named Mr. Chancellor Boyd gives the reason why he refused that injunction.

This is the letter written by Macdonald-Chapman, Limited, wholesale grocers, with which Mr. Alexander Macdonald, a member of Macdonald, Crawford, Limited, is connected. It is dated Winnipeg, January 16, 1917, and is as follows:

> P. A. Macdonald, Esq., Commissioner for the Government investigating the H. C. of L., Parliament Buildings, City.
> Dear Sir:—
> There are to-day in Canada certain firms who take what we think to be not only a very high handed but illegal stand in the policy of distributing their goods. For instance, there is the E. B. Eddy Company, manufacturers of matches. These people compel every wholesale grocer to sell their matches at a fixed price, giving the wholesaler a profit of from 17 to 20 per cent or twice as much as any well conducted wholesale grocery business needs. If any wholesale grocer will not keep to this price Eddy refuses to sell them. Also refuses to sell any jobber who will handle matches made by any other firm either Canadian or American except those made by themselves. Our firm, for instance, here in Winnipeg, is unable to purchase any matches from the E. B. Eddy Company simply because we sell other matches which are just as good and at considerable less money, although we would be willing to adhere to the Eddy Company's price, which, as we stated before, is, we think, exorbitant.

Then there is the Canada Starch Company, also the St. Lawrence Starch and Sugar Company; these two firms control the manufacture of corn syrup and starches for Canada.

I fancy corn syrup is an article that is largely dealt in.

They also dictate a selling price at which the jobber is to sell and refuse to sell any jobber who will not agree by signing a selling price agreement to make the same margin of profit on any other manufacture of a similar line of goods they handle. These firms will not supply us with any of their goods whatever. We are willing to adhere to their selling prices, but their reason for refusing to supply us is that we handle Karo and crystal white corn syrup made by the Corn Products Company of New York. These goods we buy from the Corn Products Company and are shipped from Argo, Illinois. We pay 62½ cents per hundred pounds duty on the syrup, 25 per cent duty on value of the tins, 7½ cents war tax on the value of the goods as sold for home consumption, practically the same rate of freight, and we sell them delivered Winnipeg for fifteen to twenty per cent less than the wholesale grocers of Winnipeg are forced by the Canadian combine to sell their goods at.

So it looks as if we could cut out this dictating of prices in Canada. The letter continues:

The Shredded Wheat Company are an American firm with a Canadian factory, who will not supply us with their goods because we sold some shredded wheat to a retailer in Winnipeg who sold at a reduced price to the consumer, and the Shredded Wheat Company refuse to sell us because we supplied the retailer with these goods. Since that we have bought the goods elsewhere and have cut their price down with the result that they refuse to sell any connections of ours from Fort William to the coast, although they are separate and distinct companies from ours.

The Cream of Wheat Company, of Minneapolis, is another concern that takes the same stand, except that they do not try to dictate a price at which the retailer shall sell at. The Borden Milk Company of Canada to-day also have in force with the wholesale trade an agreement whereby no wholesaler can sell their goods except at the price dictated by them, nor can any wholesaler sell any other manufacturer's goods except at a price dictated by the Borden Milk Company, which we think exceedingly unfair and unjust.

The next papagraph is not of importance and I will not read it. The letter closes with this statement:

We have in our office here copies of all agreements referred to, and many letters showing, as in the case of the Shredded Wheat Company, where they have even gone so far as to write the Macdonald-Crawford Limited of Moosejaw, stating that if they supplied us with any shredded wheat, they would cut them off the jobbers' lists.

I have read the main part of the letter, and I am very much indebted to the firm of Macdonald-Crawford and to many other friends for information which has been furnished to me in these papers. After looking into the matter, I am able to make this statement that I have never met any person who can give an honest reason why this price dictation should be continued. Certain mercantile associations have passed resolutions, but they have given no reasons at all. I have in my hand an article showing the way in which a large association which met in the Chateau Laurier here in February last dealt with the matter. They had representatives from many of the wholesale organizations and retail merchant associations throughout Canada. They have only a word to say about the Bill. You drive a man who has a special privilege to the ground, and you will find he has no argument, but this is the report as distributed by the directors of the association:

Following this announcement a Bill was introduced by Mr. William E. Knowles, M.P., from Moosejaw, who is a solicitor, and consequently he has had no practical experience in commercial matters, and this measure is still before the House of Commons, awaiting the continuation of the session.

That is all they have to say about it. Their only reason is that I am a solicitor and therefore have no business in commercial matters. Therefore they dispose of the matter in, I am sure to them, a very convincing way. Further on they say:

The following is a copy of the Bill which was introduced by Mr. William E. Knowles, M.P., of Moosejaw, and which it is the intention of the trade to strongly oppose, and which they say places unfair restrictions on them and favours too much of the sort of legislation that the Kaiser has been imposing on Germany, and trying to impose on other nations.

God save the Empire! When you find a man with a special privilege and hunt him to the ground, he will generally shout loyalty, or something of the kind. Their two arguments are, first, that the Kaiser is doing it, and secondly, that the man who has brought in this Bill happens to be a very humble solicitor. The Printer and Publisher of March has an article on pages 15 to 17 opposing the measure, and the Printer and Publisher for April has an article on page 33. I have read these articles carefully and they give no arguments at all. Here is the whole of the Printers and Publisher's argument against the Bill:

Just here, is where Mr. Knowles and others fall into error; they declare that when a maker or seller has parted with his goods at an agreed upon price, his control over re-sale disappears; that he loses title in the goods when he sells them and is paid for them; and that re-sale prices are for the purchaser to determine and not for the maker to fix and enforce.

They say that it where I fall into error; I think that is where I rise into lucid vision. I may be very dull—and no doubt I am—but I am rather proud of the fact that I do believe that when a maker or seller has parted with his goods at a certain price, his control over the re-sale does disappear; I believe he loses his title in goods when he sells them and is paid for them, and I believe retail prices are for the purchaser to determine and not for the maker to fix and enforce. Their argument is no argument at all. Manifestly, if I pay for a Gillette razor, a price which pays the manufacturer for his invention, his patent, his control over the razor, his monopoly, because he takes all those things into consideration when he fixes his price, I have paid him for the charge he puts on all those things, and if they are things of value on the market, I have a right to cut that market price or not, just as if I owned a horse, I could sell it cheap. If I have bought and paid for a thing, it is the most Prussian thing in the world for any one to say what I shall do with it; I can give it away as a Christmas present if I like, because this is a free country.

The Minister of Labour the other day made up a list of some members of the House, some of whom, including my humble self, to whom he would not pay any attention, others, including the hon. junior member for Halifax (Mr. A. K. Maclean) to whom he would pay attention, I have here a copy of Industrial Canada which I would put in a class to which I would pay attention, and some day I will put the Minister of Labour in a class. Industrial Canada of March, 1917, has three full pages, 1284, 1285 and 1286, dealing with the measure, but I challenge any person to show that they seriously combat the Bill. They give their reasons in methodical order. They take the case of an Ingersoll watch and they say: If you allow it to be sold as cheap as a man can sell it, there will be no Ingersoll watch in the world because the price will be cut down so that no one will buy it. Because a thing is sold in the open market, the fact that a man is selling it as cheap as he can, does not remove it from the market. Men will buy Ingersoll watches if they are worth the money, and if they wish to buy those watches, they should have and always will have those watches if they are good buying and will compete with other watches. This article deals with the manufacturer's right to fix retail prices, and it is classified into three parts, the viewpoint of the manufacturer, the viewpoint of the middleman or the retailer and the viewpoint of the consumer. Here is all they say from the consumer's viewpoint in their article of three full pages, comprising six columns:

Consumers have declared themselves on this question of price maintenance, and have endorsed the position of manufacturers of standardized, identified goods in their desire and effort to have resale prices fixed and enforced. Let the following two illustrations of the consumer's attitude suffice for this time.

Then it goes on to say that Mrs. Christine Frederick of the Ladies' Home Journal gets some answers and the National Housewives' League some others, which convince them that the consumers did want it, and they rest their case entirely on the desire of the consumers that the dictation of prices should continue. We can assume that this is their strongest argument, and it would be well for any hon. gentleman who take an interest in this Bill to read what is to be found on page 1284 of Industrial Canada for March 1917. My whole point is this, in the labour market, in the market the farmer has to cater to, in the market the professional man has to cater to and every other market, there is no reason why men should not be allowed to sell goods as freely and as cheaply as they wish. If a man can sell his goods cheap, let him do so. If we carried out this principle of dictating prices, not only as far as in the agreements I have read, but universally, the consumer would get no benefit whatever, from the ability and cleverness of the merchant, and the merchant would have no motive to prompt him to reduce his overhead and develop a large trade by small profits. What we want in this country is to encourage in the widest possible way the merchant who makes up his mind to his business, to be more vigilant, to live more economically himself, and to attract the largest possible trade to his store. We want to encourage the man who will say, "My prices will be so attractive that people will come to my store. I will attract such a large volume of business and look after it so carefully that I shall be able to sell cheaper than my competitors. But if you eliminate that and allow the price at which the merchant can sell to be dictated, the consumer gets no benefit, and I say the consumer has a right to freedom of trade. If the Macdonald Crawford Company, to use as an illustration, or any other great wholesale house in Montreal or Toronto, desire to sell a little cheaper than other wholesale houses, why should not the consumer be allowed the benefit of that? Surely some merchants can sell cheaper than others. The clever merchant who attends to his business and is frugal can sell cheaper than the extravagant man who is not attending so closely to his business. If the price of all commodities is to be dictated like the price of a postage stamp, the consumer will get no benefit at all, and I repeat the consumer has the right to the benefit of competition in every article of trade. I have had resolutions from a great many labour organizations approving of this Bill. I believe the dictating of prices has been carried on to such an extent in this Dominion that it has become a source of peril. These price-dictators think they have a right divine, and that anybody who touches them is laying his hands on the Ark or something of that kind. I hope the House will be an iconoclast in that respect, and will see as I do that the dictating of prices is becoming a vicious system in this country. I therefore move the second reading.

Mr. BLAIN: Does the information that my hon. friend has go to show that the fixing of prices is carried on in Canada to any great extent?

Mr. KNOWLES: Yes, it is very general.

Mr. BLAIN: I differ from my hon. friend. I think it is caried on only to a limited extent, particularly in the province of Ontario.

Mr. KNOWLES: It is carried on very extensively, not always by way of signed contract, but by way of understanding. Take, for instance, the Jaegar Wool Company or any other large clothing house. I am told by merchants, and I have talked with many, that they get a list of the prices at which the articles are to be sold, and if they deviate in any way from those prices, they will lose the agency, and the same thing applies to a great 11 p.m. many kind of boots and hats and other articles of clothing. The way the price of sugar is dictated is an outrage. In Moosejaw we can buy sugar made in Vancouver cheaper than the people of Vancouver themselves. In Calgary the price is dearer than in Moosejaw, but cheaper than in Vancouver. The farther you get away from Redpath sugar the cheaper you can buy it. Some of these people seem to think they own the earth, and I feel it is my duty to do what I can to smash the system.

Hon. C. J. DOHERTY (Minister of Justice): I have followed the argument of the hon. gentleman with a great deal of interest, and if I have correctly grasped it he seeks to have this legislation enacted because he looks upon any agreement for the fixing of a resale price as unreasonably restraining or interfering with competition. As I understand the law as it stands at the present time, any contract that unreasonably restrains trade is already an unlawful contract, and is already covered by a provision of the Criminal Code, so that if the different agreements which the hon. member has read do, as he contends they do, unreasonably restrain competition in the sale of the goods concerned, why then the parties entering into them are under the law as it stands at present guilty of an offence. If I understand the effect of his amendment it will be to withdraw from the consideration of the court to whom the matter might be referred the question whether any particular agreement in which a resale price is fixed does or does not unduly or unreasonably operate in restraint of trade or to reduce competition—in other words, to prejudice the consumer and to determine absolutely by the law itself that the mere fact of a stipulation under any circumstances whatsoever fixing a resale price being contained in a contract makes the entering into that agreement an offence.

Mr. KNOWLES: What is the section my hon. friend refers to?

Mr. DOHERTY: Section 498, which says that every one is guilty of an indictable offence who does a variety of things, and the last one mentioned is the one I think under which my hon. friend's Bill would come, if it be true that any agreement under any imaginable circumstances for the fixing of a resale price operates to produce the consequences which he asserts it does. The section says that every one is guilty of an indictable offence who combines, agrees or arranges with any other person,

(d) to unduly prevent or lessen competition in the production, manufacture, purchase, barter, sale, transportation or supply of any such article or commodity.

Now, if I followed the hon. gentleman's argument rightly, he contends that any stipulation fixing the re-sale price of an article should be prohibited because it does unduly lessen competition in the sale of that article. If he is right in that contention, then the law already deals with the case that he has in mind. If I point that out, it is not because I desire to proceed to say that he is right in this contention; or, on the other hand, that he is wrong in that contention; I do not want this evening to discuss that question. But I would like to put quite clearly what the proposed legislation is. It asks this House to determine that in all cases, without regard to circumstances or conditions, the mere stipulation by a vendor when he sells his goods that the purchaser shall not re-sell them at less than a fixed price is something that unduly and unreasonably lessens competition and prejudices the consumer, and therefore should be prohibited, and the person who enters into such an agreement should be treated as a criminal. The question, therefore, that this House has to pass upon in considering this legislation, is whether it is justified in enacting that the stipulation of a fixed price is in all cases one which prejudices the consumer by unduly lessening competition or by unduly enhancing the price. If we pass this legislation, Parliament will hold that to be the case without regard to circumstances and conditions. The difference between the law as it stands to-day and as it would be should this Bill become an Act would be that, whereas to-day a man may be convicted of a criminal offence if he stipulates a sale price and this produces the result indicated by the hon. gentleman, after this law is passed he would be liable to punishment even though in that particular instance he could show that the stipulation of a resale price did not produce an injurious consequence. To justify the proposed legislation, therefore, Parliament ought to be convinced that in all cases, without distinction of circumstances, the mere stipulation of a fixed resale price operates wrong to the general public.

Now, I am not prepared to say that it does. The hon. gentleman seems to think that it does. I am not going to say this evening that he is not correct in saying that, but I have endeavoured to make it clear just what it is that Parliament is asked to do, for the purpose of impressing upon all who have to deal with it the importance of this proposition. This question, which the hon. gentleman dealt with in introducing the Bill, even before he introduced his Bill, had been engaging the attention of the Government in connection with the consideration of the general questions bearing upon the high cost of living. I think the Minister of Labour has given the matter very special attention, and I have given it some little consideration and some little study myself. Of course, like the hon. gentleman (Mr. Knowles), I labour under the disadvantage of being a solicitor, and therefore in a class that, according to some people, cannot be expected to know anything about business. But I have endeavoured to look into this question, both into the question of how the law stands at the present moment upon the subject, and the question whether or not the mere stipulation of a resale price necessarily and in all cases unreasonably enhances the price to the consumer, or unreasonably lessens competition in the sale of the article. I am free to admit that I have not been able to reach as clear and definite a conclusion on this subject as the hon. member seems to have reached. I do not wish to convey the idea that his proposal does not meet with a sympathetic reception on my part, so far as its purpose is to prevent unreasonable or undue enhancement of prices, or to prevent the doing of anything which will hinder or lessen competition in the sale of goods. If I could satisfy myself that in all cases and without distinction a stipulation to fix a re-sale price produces either of these results, I should be prepared to accept the principle of the mover of this Bill. I have not been able yet to reach that conclusion, nor have I been able to reach the contrary conclusion either. The matter is one which, in my judgment, calls for careful consideration. And, as I have said, it has been receiving that consideration. In considering the matter, one question has struck me as worthy of serious thought, and it is this—whether the best way to deal with such evils as may result from contracts of the kind the hon. gentleman has cited is to deal with them as matters of criminal law. What we want to get, after all, is the prevention of such evils as may result from contracts of that kind, and it is not quite clear to me that the best way to secure that prevention is to make the person who enters into a contract of this kind a criminal, and the entering into that contract a crime. Because, immediately your remedy is in the criminal law, that is when you depend upon means operating by the deterrent effect of punishment of particular people, you must depend upon public feeling against the man who enters into a contract of the kind that is prohibited. I think I am safe in saying that the practical experience of the criminal law as it stands, which makes it an offence to combine or enter into an agreement to unduly enhance prices or prevent or lessen competition, has not been of a kind to encourage people to have recourse to that method of correcting the evil. Juries, naturally, are apt to be slow to find guilty of crime persons who have entered into agreements of this kind, which by many, at all events a certain class of people, are looked upon as perfectly legitimate. It is not clear to me that it would not be better to legislate looking to the prevention of the carrying-out of agreements of this kind. That is a question which I only put forward for consideration. It is one in regard to which I will not go farther than to say that it seems to me that there is a good deal to be said in support of the proposition that it might be better to look to legislation to regulate and control the effects of agreements of this kind for the remedy of the evils which might result from them rather than to criminal legislation. It is perhaps true that it might be well to provide both remedies. I am not for the moment presenting any absolute opinion upon the question but I think it is a question that calls for careful consideration in connection with this legislation. I would like to say further that quite a number of people, representative of the different classes of the business community in this country, have, since the hon. gentleman introduced his Bill, in writing to me, asked for an opportunity to be heard. Probably a committee of this House would be the best method of hearing what they have to say upon the practical results which they believe would follow upon the enactment of this legislation. It is not unfair that that opportunity should be given to them. I fancy that all hon. gentlemen would agree in thinking that it would be fair that before we proceed to enact this legislation, which is going to create a new crime, we should give an opportunity to those who may be affected by it to be heard upon the question. Both because I and my colleagues would like to give some further consideration to the subject matter of this Bill, more particularly to the evils which the hon. gentleman thinks he is going to remedy, and to the question of remedying the evils in so far as they exist, and furthermore in order that we may have an opportunity of providing means by which the parties who may be affected by this legislation may have an opportunity of being heard, I would desire to move the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. KNOWLES: May I ask when we will hear anything more of it?

Mr. DOHERTY: It is not with a desire to prevent the matter being dealt with. It is not impossible—I make no promise in that regard— that legislation will be introduced to deal with this matter on the lines which I suggested a few moments ago and which will perhaps, even in the judgment of the hon. gentleman, meet the evils that he seeks to meet. If it proves to be so, perhaps his Bill might give place to that. But, if, on the other hand, it does not, I am quite prepared to assure him that I am not seeking to get rid of his Bill in any indirect way and in moving the adjournment of the debate, it is not for the purpose of getting rid of this question. It is sincerely for the purpose of enabling us to give it the study that it deserves and to give those who may be affected by the proposed lgislation the opportunity which they have asked for to be heard. If no other legislation is proposed and no other method is found of dealing with the matter in a manner that may be satisfactory, I would be disposed to give the hon. gentleman an opportunity to go on with his Bill again. There is no desire to get rid of his Bill otherwise than by having the question involved in the submission of this Bill passed upon by Parliament.

Mr. KNOWLES: I do not suggest that the minister is endeavouring to delay me in any manner at all. The only point is that I do not know whether I shall be here in the future. I may not be here after a week from now.

Mr. DOHERTY: I will be very glad to meet the hon. gentleman and do my best to arrange that he will have an opportunity at a time convenient to himself. But, frankly, I do not think the House will proceed to pass this into law without giving—

Mr. KNOWLES: The second reading is not law.

Mr. DOHERTY: It will not take a very long time to pass it through its second reading. We will not be very much farther advanced because it has had its second reading. The passing of the second reading is supposed to involve the acceptance of the principle of the Bill. The whole principle of this Bill is that under no conditions or circumstances—

Mr. KNOWLES: It is not the principle.

Mr. SPEAKER: There is a motion to adjourn the debate and it is not debatable. I had hoped that it might be terminated by natural process.

Mr. GRAHAM: If it could be understood that this matter would be taken up again it would be satisfactory to adjourn it, but without an understanding of that kind it disappears. As I understand, it is probable that the Minister of Labour (Mr. Crothers) will have a Bill on this line. If we could have an understanding that these two Bills would be referred to a special committee of the House when the Bill of the Minister of Labour came up, in order to give the people that the Minister of Justice mentioned a chance to be heard, there would be no difficulty.

Mr. DOHERTY: I do not think there will be any objection in agreeing to that. If the Minister of Labour should not deal with the matter by any other Bill, this Bill might be referred to the committee to be dealt with. If the hon. gentleman (Mr. Knowles) will look at the Order in Council that deals with the high cost of living he will find that, at all events with regard to the necessaries of life, the provision contained in his Bill is in effect contained in that Order in Council. I beg to move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to and debate adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE—WOMAN SUFFRAGE.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I would like to call the attention of the Minister of Justice to the fact that there are several orders standing upon the paper and among them this one:—

Resuming the adjourned Debate on the proposed Resolution of Mr. Sutherland,—That in the opinion of this House, the question of extending the franchise to women should engage the attention of the Government at the present session, and the proposed motion of Sir Robert Borden in amendment thereto, and the amendment to the amendment thereto of Mr. Pugsley.

Unless this resolution is disposed of this evening it goes into the dead pile, to-day being the last day for the consideration of motions by private members. I would like to say that I am not a believer at all in this practice of shutting off private members from discussion. I think that one day should be left for the entire session. It simply stifles all independent thought or action by private members of this House. I would be sorry to have this resolution go into the bone pile. The ladies of the country are extremely interested, and it should be either discussed to-night or some day should be fixed for its consideration.

Mr. DOHERTY: If the hon. gentleman had been present earlier in the afternoon he would have had an opportunity of disposing of his motion. This motion was called in its regular order. There can be no suggestion of it being choked off.

Mr. PUGSLEY: This was not called.

Mr. DOHERTY: No, but the resolution of the hon. gentleman himself on the subject was called and he would have had an opportunity of speaking on that motion when it was called in its regular turn. I do not think it is quite fair to talk about choking off the private members. This resolution was fully debated the other day, and while I am not in a position at the present moment to give any absolute undertaking on the subject, I think it is not at all improbable that if the hon. gentleman attaches so much importance to it, some arrangement may be made to allow it to be proceeded with on some future occasion. But if it is unfair to members to choke off resolutions, it is not quite fair to members to ask them to sit here all night.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Even for the sake of the ladies?

Mr. DOHERTY: I think the ladies ought to be so gratified with what they heard the other day that perhaps they might be just as well pleased that it should rest the way it is. After all, I think the ladies had a pretty satisfactory assurance the other evening, those who are desirous that votes should be granted to them, and that their minds are probably not in a very great state of anxiety at this moment.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The minister says that if I had been here this afternoon I should have had an opportunity of bringing up the question again. I am sorry I was not able to be here, I had an engagement in the Supreme Court; but owing to the ingenuity of the hon. member for South Oxford (Mr. Sutherland) in getting his motion in ahead of mine, it has been under consideration and I should have been debarred this afternoon from proceeding with my resolution as it would have been out of order. I think the Speaker will agree in that. Therefore, my absence would not make any difference. It was only this evening that the resolution we are considering would be reached, and I am very sorry that the Minister of Justice will not proceed with it so that we may have the opinion of this House upon it.

The women of this country want to know if the members of the House are prepared by a vote to say that the suffrage shall be granted to them.

Mr. DOHERTY: I have no doubt the hon. member will readily pardon me for its not having entered my mind to conceive that he ever could have been out of order, and that explains why I said he might have been here this afternoon.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I was put out of order.

Mr. DOHERTY: Still less would I imagine that if he was not out of order there existed any power in this world that would put him out of order. So I think I might be still more pardoned. However, as I said, while, without consultation with the leader of the House, I perhaps could not make any absolute undertaking on the subject, I think the hon. gentleman need not be unduly anxious as to there being an opportunity afforded to dispose of the motion to which he refers. I shall certainly bring his remarks to the attention of the Prime Minister.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Doherty the House adjourned at 11.30 p.m.

Tuesday, May 22, 1917.

The House met at Three o'clock, the Speaker in the Chair.

VICTORIA DAY ADJOURNMENT.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN moved that when this House adjourns on Wednesday, the 23rd instant, it stands adjourned until Friday the 25th instant.

Motion agreed to.

COLD STORAGE PLANTS CONTROL.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. McCOIG: May I again call the attention of the Government to a matter which I urged upon them the other evening, and which I consider of grave importance. I refer to the taking over of the cold storage systems of Canada. To substantiate my position, I wish to read the following telegram:

> The Davies Company, of which Flavelle is principal stockholder, are trying to cover insurance on food products for two million eight hundred thousand dollars which they hold in cold storage Toronto which can be occupied by any independent insurance company also includes subsidiary company going so far as to try the Perth Mutual, Stratford, for a beggarly two thousand.

[Mr Pugsley.]

I would ask the Government if they have, up to the present time, taken any steps towards taking over these cold storage systems, in order that the consumers of this country may be protected from such companies as are in charge of them.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I did not follow the remarks of my hon. friend, but I shall read them in Hansard and give an answer at a later date.

STEEL RAILS FOR FRANCE.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. OLIVER: Is there to be an answer to the question which I raised yesterday in regard to the transfer of rails from the Transcontinental railway to Europe?

Mr. COCHRANE: Nearly all the first order has gone forward.

Mr. OLIVER: Do I understand that the first three hundred miles of rails from the Transcontinental have been shipped to France?

Mr. COCHRANE: Nearly all.

PAY OF MILITARY OFFICERS.

On the Orders of the Day:

Sir EDWARD KEMP (Minister of Militia): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff) last evening asked me a question in regard to the pay of colonels. I was out of the House at the time, but I think that, in the interest of the public, I should reply to him. He asked whether or not colonels in Canada were getting $15 to $20 a day, while those at the front were getting only $6. The pay of the officers of the Canadian expeditionary forces is exactly the same in Canada as it is in England or at the front. A lieutenant-colonel gets $5 a day pay and $1.25 field allowance. When he reaches London, and when he is at the front, however, he gets four shillings a day extra. That is the exact position so far as the pay of the Canadian expeditionary forces is concerned, whether in Canada or abroad, with the exception I have mentioned, that if an officer is abroad he gets four shillings a day extra for messing allowance. There is a slight extra pay for officers who are obliged to reside in London because of the extra cost of living in London.

WAYS AND MEANS.

The House again in Committee of Ways and Means, Mr. Blain in the Chair.

On Resolution No. 1.

Resolved, that it is expedient to amend the Business Profits War Tax Act, 1916, by providing:—

1. That in any business taxable under the Act where the annual profits exceed fifteen per centum per annum the tax shall be increased to fifty per centum with respect to all profits in excess of the said fifteen per centum but not exceeding twenty per centum per annum, and where the profits exceed twenty per centum per annum the tax shall be increased to seventy-five per centum with respect to all profits in excess of the said twenty per centum, and such increases in the tax shall be levied against and paid by the person owning such business for each and every accounting period ending after the thirty-first day of December, one thousand nine hundred and sixteen.

Mr. GRAHAM: Taxes are usually unwelcome, and we are all more or less willing that our neighbour shall pay his full proportion. I have not yet found a man who is unwilling to pay his full share, but I wish to bring to the attention of the minister some of the conditions connected with this proposed extra imposition. Not a few industries engaged in the manufacture of munitions and other commodities influenced by the war assert that after the war there will be a very critical period of readjustment. Some of them fear that during that period of readjustment they will be able to do nothing more than pay running expenses. The most conservative of these have been preparing for that period by placing to one side each year a reasonable reserve, feeling that when their present large business ceases—as we hope it will very shortly—they will find themselves, under the new system of taxation, in a serious financial plight. They tell me that during the two or three years succeeding the war these reserves will be used up in their effort to readjust themselves to new conditions and to prepare for a staple business in the future. Some of them, I understand, think that the action of the Government in taking such a large proportion of the amount they now have on hand will cause them to come to a condition of practical bankruptcy during the period of readjustment. I feel confident that the minister, far from having that in mind, would like to protect our industries against this result. To my mind this is the most serious aspect of the matter; the figures that have been presented to me by some concerns lead me to believe that there is a good deal in the contention.

I was struck very forcibly the other night by the remarks of the hon. member for Dauphin. I agree that in order to produce a revenue in the years to come, a good many of our former theories will have to go by the board. Methods recognized as proper for the raising of revenue in years gone by will still be used, but they will have to be supplemented by others. What shall these others be? I think it is the consensus of opinion throughout Canada that these taxes should not be imposed on the producers of agricultural products. In fact, I am strongly of the opinion that we shall have to deal with the tariff from a different angle. The farmer must be enabled to produce as cheaply and in as large quantities as possible. If his output be restricted, none of the rest of us need look for any great prosperity, because, while industrial development is desirable, it will for a great many years be true of Canada that the basis of our prosperity must be found in the farms. We shall have to go a long way towards reducing the cost of production and giving the farmer the freest opportunity to sell where he can get the best market and to buy as cheaply as possible all the implements that he uses in production. In a recent trip that I had West, this view was impressed upon me more strongly than ever. Striking instances came to my attention of real hardship to the men who were trying to produce. In the future we shall have to do two things: first, assist the man on the farm so that he can compete with all others the world over who are engaged in the same business; and, second, readjust our tariff with a view to raising as large an amount of money as possible. That, rather than protection, should be the chief object in view. We shall have to go a long way in the scientific arrangement of our tariff in order to raise the greatest amount of money without restricting the ability of the man on the farm to produce. I know the minister will say that it is easy to talk in generalities, but the more we look into the financial situation, the more we are inclined to view it from a different standpoint. The time has arrived when the greatest good to the greatest number should be the object of the framing of tariffs, and the greatest good will come to the greatest number only when we enable those engaged in our basic industry, so far as it is possible to do so, unrestrictedly to produce and to sell.

Another remark in that speech which struck me forcibly was in reference to unoccupied lands in the West. I think we are under a kind of delusion as to the amount of good land available for homestead in the West.

I hear men speaking of the millions and millions of acres of good land remaining available for homesteading, but I believe that the estimate of many men will have to be revised as to the quantity of land still unoccupied. A large quantity of land may yet remain open for homesteading, but there is not so much as people imagine. In the years to come, under new conditions and under new methods, a great deal of this land may be brought under cultivation, but to my mind we have not available for homesteading at the present time such a large quantity of land as some of us think. If it be true, as the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Cruise) said the other night, that there are held in the West many million acres of land from which no revenue is derived, but the value of which is increasing rapidly on account of the improvement of other lands in the West, then under the new conditions we shall have to devise some scheme of dealing with these lands from a revenue point of view and from the point of view of general development. A large quantity of these lands is exempt from provincial taxation; and if normal conditions existed, I would feel it would perhaps be a dangerous thing to suggest that such lands ought to be taxed, when by agreement they are exempt from taxation; but we are at the present moment in a situation in which every man, woman and child in Canada has to submit to taxation to which neither he nor she ever before expected to have to submit, and we shall all willingly and even gladly offer to pay our share in order that there may be no difficulty from a financial point of view as to Canada being able to do her part in bringing the war to a final and conclusive victory. Those who hold these lands ought to bear their share of the burden, and I believe, whichever party may be in power, it is their duty to ascertain without delay some means whereby this land, which is now very valuable, may contribute its share of taxation for the carrying on of this great struggle in which we are engaged. No hardship will be suffered by anybody if we take part of the profits, or what we call the unearned increment.

Mr. JAMESON: Does the hon. member refer to railway lands as well as to lands held by private individuals?

Mr. GRAHAM: I certainly do; I refer to all lands that are unproductive and that are held for speculative purposes, whether they be owned by railways or by private individuals. These lands are at present of great value and most of them adjoin railways, whereas a settler coming in ordinarily has to go many miles from a railway and at times has to travel over mile after mile of such lands adjoining railways which land he can not secure as a homestead and which he would have to purchase at a very high figure. I know the objections that will be raised, such a violation of agreement and so on; but many years have passed since some of those agreements were made, and we are in a situation now where, while I would not advocate a violation of agreement, I would certainly call in every man interested in these lands and say to him: we propose to devise some means whereby these lands will contribute their share towards the carrying on of this war.

If taxation be imposed on these vacant lands a tendency will be created to dispose of them to men who will cultivate them. If these millions of acres of land in the Great West, now untilled and out of the hands of the Government, were made productive, the railway situation, which is serious, would soon be solved, because in our western country there is a sufficient acreage to provide for our transportation companies freight which would keep busy, not two railways, but the three transcontinental railways and many more branch lines than we have at present. The railway problem is a serious one and one not easy to solve, but it is worthy of the attention of the Government, and I want to repeat that such taxation would very materially aid our financial situation and would practically solve many of the difficulties that have arisen in connection with our railways, because, while at the present moment we may have in some directions a greater railway mileage than is warranted by the present production of Canada, we have not a greater mileage than is warranted by the developed productiveness of Canada, and if these acres are made productive much of our trouble in connection with the railways would be removed.

There is another point that I wish to urge again upon the attention of the Government. The more I think of it the more I am convinced that there is a source of revenue that we are not touching in this Bill that ought to be touched and touched now, and, if you will allow me, Sir, to say so, touched well. We have in the city of Ottawa and in every other large city in this country men who will not be taxed at all under this Bill, who are not assisting in the employment of men and who are not assisting in the production, directly at least, of anything connected with this war, while our young men, who, on the farms and in the shops, have been assisting in the productiveness of the country, are at present at the front fighting. The men who have their money invested in industries are paying liberally and are glad to pay their share into the national coffers for the carrying on of this war, but there are scores of men who have their wealth invested in mortgages and other securities, many of whom are not aiding in the development of any Canadian industry. Some of our wealthiest men have their cash invested in American railway securities and other investments which I could name, and these are not contributing anything, nor will they contribute anything under this measure, and I believe, therefore, that the Government will be justified even now in devising a scheme whereby the wealth of the country, as outlined in the few remarks I have made, will be taxed thoroughly. We speak of conscription of men, but there is another duty which the Government ought to undertake, and that is the conscription of wealth, in order that the two may go hand in hand for the carrying on of this great war. The Minister of Finance says rightly that taxation of incomes has been left to the provinces and municipalities. That is true, but the income tax collected by the municipalities throughout the province of Ontario, for instance, scarcely touches the fringe of what this source of wealth ought to contribute in this time of stress. The province touches this source to a certain extent by adding one mill on the dollar to the assessment throughout Ontario, but that is a mere pittance, and I again urge upon the Government that while nearly all classes are paying taxes, some being taxed very heavily, there is a class that is not touched, and for the duration of the war at least a tax ought to be imposed on this wealth wherever found, and, in particular, a tax ought to be imposed on the incomes of men who have their money invested in mortgages and in securities outside of Canada, on which investments they are taking practically no risk and which are not furnishing employment to a single man, woman or child in this country.

I submit that to the Finance Minister and trust that even at this late stage he will devise some means by which this concentrated wealth that is now untouched may be reached, in order that the burden of taxation may be more evenly distributed among our people. I can assure the minister that I have not met in this Dominion a single man who is not willing to pay his fair share of taxation in order that we may do our full duty in this war, because as I have said before, and it is worth repeating, if the Allies lose in this war it will in my view not be worth while being a Canadian any longer. We must leave nothing undone, and I again urge that one available source of taxation which should be reached is the incomes of these men of wealth, which under the present taxation are not touched at all.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: My hon. friend (Mr. Graham) has in a thoughtful speech discussed the question of the policy of taxation which should be adopted in this country to meet our requirements in connection with the war. The policy of any Government in a situation of this kind must necessarily depend upon the financial situation as it from time to time presents itself. I suppose when this war broke out none of us thought it would last three years. Some of us were of the opinion that it might last one year or perhaps two, but I think no one believed at that time that at the end of three years we should still be looking forward to another year or more of war.

Mr. MACDONALD: Kitchener said it would last three years.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: That is so, but I think that few in this country, and I know that few in England, believed that the war would last for so long a period.

My hon. friend has raised the question of the policy of taxation which should be pursued in connection with the financing of the war. There are two principles which I have endeavoured to follow in the financial administration of the country. In the first place I have thought it advisable to make long-date loans in order that the country during the progress of the war or in the possibly trying period following the conclusion of the war might not be hampered or embarrassed by short-date maturities falling due. I think that is a sound principle, and that we have been wise in adopting it. The second principle which I have adopted is this: that we should so aim by increasing our revenues and diminishing our expenditures for purposes other than war, to be able during each year to meet not only all current expenditure, including the interest on a rapidly increasing war indebtedness and a large expenditure for pensions, but at the same time be able to pay a substantial portion of the principal of our war expenditure. It strikes me that those are very sound principles in connection with the financial administration of the country in time of war.

I pointed out in the Budget speech that we had been able out of the revenues of the past year, which had been derived from the various modes of taxation which we have adopted, to pay not only all current and all capital expenditure—and in current expenditure I am including the increased interest amounting to some $20,000,000, on our increased national debt due to the war—but also to pay all pensions and at the same time devote $60,000,000 to the payment of the principal of our war expenditure. Now, if we can succeed in doing that, the war expenditure of the Dominion during the war would not be a formidable problem for the Dominion to face, and in that connection we must bear in mind that our expenditures for war are rapidly increasing, that they will be greater for the year 1917 than they were for the year 1916, and that they will be greater for the year 1918 than for the year 1917. I tried to make a perfectly frank statement to the House in my Budget speech. I said we could look forward at the end of next year to a national debt of $1,200,000,000—I think that is an outside figure, rather than attempt to minimize the seriousness of the burden which would be imposed upon us, and which I know we are all glad to bear in connection with the war.

The policy of any Government in war time as to taxation must depend upon the financial situation as it presents itself from time to time. It has appeared to us that the measure of taxation which we have brought down in this Budget is reasonably adequate to cope with the situation as it presents itself at the present time. I said during the debate that it was possible and even probable that we might have to resort to a measure of income taxation as the war developed and our financial requirements became greater. I also stated that we might have to consider, and I repeat it to-day, other sources of taxation different from those which we have adopted up to date. My hon. friend from South Renfrew (Mr. Graham) in his very thoughtful speech has put forward different methods of taxation, some of which he appears to favour, and all of which he desires the House to consider. In his closing remarks he referred especially to income taxation. Now, I have given this matter of income taxation my most careful consideration, and I have reached the conclusion, which I believe is sound, that at present it is not advisable to impose an income taxation. I hope the House will pardon me if I develop briefly some of the arguments which have led me to that conclusion; most of which were touched upon in the Budget speech.

Many statements have been made in this House by hon. gentlemen who have not had the opportunity of going into this matter as a Finance Minister is able to go into it, indicating an opinion upon their part that very large sums indeed would be raised by an income taxation measure. For instance, the hon. member for Dauphin, in the course of his speech stated that we should raise $50,000,000 from income taxation. I doubt very much if the hon. member has gone into the matter statistically to see whether any such sum could be realized by income taxation. I have no hesitation in saying myself that no such sum could be realized in this country by a measure of income taxation. You might ask me on what I ground that view. Well, in the United States, for instance, which has 12 or 13 times the population of Canada—and at least 25, and I should not be surprised if it were 40 or 50 times our wealth—they have had income taxation for some years. It is a pretty heavy tax, being 2 per cent upon incomes from $3,000 upwards. As soon as the income reaches $20,000 there is an increase of one per cent; when it reaches $40,000 there is an increase of two per cent, and so on upon a graduated scale running up to thirteen per cent on an income of $2,000,000. That is a fairly heavy income tax.

Mr. PARDEE: What is the initial rate?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Twenty mills on the dollar or two per cent, which is about the rate of municipal taxation in Toronto and most of the other cities in Canada. This tax has been in effect in the United States for some years, and consequently the machinery for collecting it—a very important matter has been perfected. Yet, the amount realized from this tax, which is imposed not only upon individuals but upon corporations in respect of their net profits, was, for the year 1915, only $80,000,000, and for the year 1916, $124,000,000. The population of the United States is twelve or thirteen times that of Canada, and the wealth of the United States is at least twenty-five times that of Canada, I believe. This matter has been gone into by my department, and we are familiar with the income tax assessments in the neighbouring republic; and the conclusion we have reached is that on the scale of income taxation in force in the United States today the Dominion of Canada could not hope to raise more than $5,000,000 or $6,000,000.

Mr. PARDEE: Do I understand that the man in the United States with an income of $2,000,000 pays two per cent—

Sir THOMAS WHITE: First, he pays two per cent, and then an additional thirteen per cent.

Mr. PARDEE: That is fifteen per cent on $2,000,000.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: That is as I understand it. So this income tax proposition is one to raise in the Dominion of Canada not more at the outside than $7,000,000 or $8,000,000.

Mr. TURRIFF: It is admitted, I believe, that there is greater wealth in the United States than in Great Britain. Why, then, cannot they in the United States collect as much by income tax as is collected by that method in Great Britain? Or why could not we collect as much in proportion to our wealth as Great Britain collects in proportion to hers?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: We have to consider first whether the wealth is concentrated or not. I think we do not realize the enormous amount of concentrated wealth in Great Britain. Well, suppose we should raise $7,000,000 or $8,000,000 by an income tax beginning at two per cent and running up to fifteen per cent—a very heavy tax—or even suppose we managed to increase it and to raise $10,000,000 or $12,000,000, we should even then have slightly less than the amount raised by the excess profits tax in the first year of its operation, which was the least productive year of all. In the first year of that tax we raised $12,500,000; and, as I pointed out in my Budget speech, we expect to raise more the second year, because the second year was on an increased business. So, I ask the House, when considering income taxation in the Dominion of Canada, to have regard to the comparatively small amount—that is small in terms of Dominion finance—that could be raised by this means. Reference has been made to certain gentlemen in Ottawa, Toronto, Montreal, and other large cities—

Mr. LEMIEUX: On several occasions the Minister of Finance has said that the cost of collecting an income tax would be very large?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Yes.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Has the hon. minister made calculations on that subject? Could he tell us about what it will cost?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I am glad my hon. friend called that to my attention, because I had intended to speak of it. It is not possible to make an estimate as to the cost, but I can say without hesitation that it would be very large in proportion to the amount of revenue that the tax would realize.

Mr. MURPHY: Has the hon. minister any figures showing the cost in the United States?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: No, I could get that, but I have not it here. This is one of the points that has been raised, and I want to deal with it fairly, and, I hope, in such a way as to afford information which will be available for members in reaching a conclusion. One difficulty in applying a federal income tax in Canada arises from the fact that we have a sparse population scattered over a territory at least as large as Europe. What does that mean? It means that we should have to cover the whole country, geographically speaking, in order to make sure that we were actually assessing the tax on all incomes down to $3,000, or $2,000, or whatever the limit of exemption might be. We should have to have a Civil Service, for that is what it would amount to, over the length and breadth of this country. We should have to cover every municipality, rural as well as urban, because in any township there might be one or more men with incomes greater than the limit of exemption. I do not mean to say that because the administration would be difficult that this tax should not be resorted to at all. But I do say that one test of the advisability of a tax is that the percentage cost of collection should be low. That is an axiom of taxation. But it is easy to see that in this case the cost of collection would be high. All that I say now is subject to this, which I have said before and now repeat: we may find it necessary to resort to an income tax, and if we find it necessary, for my part, I will not hesitate to resort to it.

Reference has been made to gentlemen in Ottawa, Toronto, Montreal, and other cities, who derive large incomes from interest upon mortgages or other sources, and who are exempt from taxation. It must be borne in mind that any tax in the Dominion must be general in character. I cannot bring in a Bill to tax A, or B, or C; the measure must apply to the citizens of the country generally, commencing, of course, at a certain minimum of income, and graduated to the highest income that is derived in Canada. I cannot bring in a Bill to tax a few wealthy men.

Mr. MACDONALD: Why not?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Well because, for one reason, the cost of administration would probably eat up the amount realized.

Mr. MACDONALD: That is not a reason.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: My hon. friend from Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) says that is not an answer. Well, I think it is, and we will let it go at that. He will object to anything I say, no matter what, so I hope he will not mind if I simply meet his assertion with counter-assertion.

Mr. MACDONALD: Don't get mad.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: No, certainly not with my hon. friend from Pictou. There is another phase of this matter. People in Canada to-day are giving very large sums to the Canadian Patriotic Fund, to the Red Cross Fund, and to other funds in connection with the war. The people, rich and poor, have been most generous in regard to these funds. My own opinion is that if a stiff income tax were added to the other burdens of the war it might result in a considerable dimunition in the amount subscribed to the Patriotic, Red Cross, and other funds. I do not put that forward as a conclusive reason why an income tax should not be adopted, but I do say that when we consider the expediency of an income taxation measure, it is wise to consider how much is being contributed voluntarily by the people, irrespective of class or rank, to the patriotic funds. That is all I purpose saying at the present time upon the question of an income tax.

My hon. friend from South Renfrew (Mr. Graham) has spoken of the tariff. I shall not deal with that at any length in answer to my hon. friend because the hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) has given notice of an amendment which he proposes to move on the second reading of the taxation proposals, and I think I shall reserve what I have to say on that head until that amendment is under discussion. But, I should like to say this to my hon. friend from South Renfrew in regard to the tariff, and I am sure the information will be of interest to the House, that the measures which we have adopted in regard to the tariff have been fruitful to the utmost extent of our expectations. I shall quote just three figures. The House will recall that we increased the tariff by 7½ per cent and 5 in the year 1915. Since then the revenue of the Dominion from customs duties has been as follows:

1917	147,000,000

There was an increase in 1916 over 1915 of $24,000,000 and an increase in 1917 over 1916 of $44,000,000. You must not forget, in considering this question of taxation, that the very backbone of the revenues of the Dominion is and is bound to be the tariff. We must look to the tariff to produce a very large amount indeed in order to meet the requirements of the Dominion for this war and other expenditures. I have a calculation as to the amount derived by the Dominion Government in respect to the 7½ and 5 per cent increases made in 1915.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Does my hon. friend distinguish between the 7½ per cent on free goods and the 7½ per cent on dutiable goods?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: It is on both. In 1916, under the 5 per cent and the 7½ per cent increases, we derived $25,000,000 from the customs duties war tax and in 1917 we derived $37,000,000 from the same taxation.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Is that from the tariff on free goods as well as the other?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: On both, because we impose 7½ per cent and 5 per cent on all goods.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I understand that.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: It is on both.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Will the minister state now what proportion of the $37,000,000 of revenue received from the 7½ per cent surtax came from free goods, or goods which were formerly free, and what proportion from goods which were dutiable?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: From free goods, $20,000,000.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: And $17,000,000 from dutiable goods?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: That would follow —$17,000,000 on dutiable goods. But the point I am making is that the increase in the tariff has produced very substantial sums towards the expenditures of the Dominion for war and other purposes.

The hon. member for South Renfrew referred to the business tax that is now before the House for consideration. He stated that after the war there would be a period of readjustment and that he shared the apprehension of some business men and friends that this taxation, by reason of it being so expensive, would cause them a great deal of embarrassment and even might force some of them into bankruptcy. I hardly see how that result could occur. In the first place, there have been three years since the outbreak of the war that the business profits war tax has been applied. In the first place, as I have stated, we realized $12,500,000, notwithstanding that there was a good deal of dislocation of business in that first period. In the second year I should be surprised if we should not realize $20,000,000 or more. The third year will probably be the best of all. It would have been the best of all if we had allowed the taxation which was introduced last year to stand, but we are increasing that taxation by the provisions of the measure now before the committee, and, therefore, the amount which will be realized from excess profits on business in this country for the last accounting period of the three years will be very large; how large I am not prepared to say, because I have not the figures touching this estimate.

Mr. PUGSLEY: On what does my hon. friend place that estimate of increased revenue? Is it on the prospect of increased business, or increased prices, or both?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: As the taxation is levied in respect of profits, it would be in respect of increased business, but I suppose you could hardly consider business without considering prices in connection with it.

Mr. PUGSLEY: If you had the same business with increased prices it would be to the disadvantage of the country.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I do not quite understand the hon. gentleman's point.

Mr. PUGSLEY: If the manufacturers were increasing their prices and if by reason of increased prices they have increased profits, it would not be a very satisfactory condition, because the consumer would have to pay those profits.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Abnormal profits are being obtained by many businesses in Canada to-day. I have no doubt they are taking substantially as much as the market will afford them. Their profits are abnormal. What the Government are doing is this: They are saying to them: Your profits are, say, 20, or 30, or 40 per cent; we propose to step in and take a certain amount of those profits, because we regard them as abnormal; they are greater than you would have made had there been no war. Let us see what the extent of this tax is. The measure is limited to three years. I stated last year that it would be limited to three years, and I state so to-day. For the first two years we allow a company 7 per cent and an individual 10 per cent profit. We say to them: We shall not touch your profits up to 7 per cent, or 10 per cent, but if you make 15 per cent we will take 2 per cent away from you. I am only using the amount of 15 per cent by way of illustration. I shall deal with an incorporated company rather than an individual in giving my illustration. We say to an incorporated company: If you obtain profits of 15 per cent we will leave you 13 and take 2. Under this new measure which we are now proposing we say to them that we will take 2 per cent up to 15 per cent and half of the amount which they make between 15 and 20 per cent, and if they make over 20 per cent we shall take three-quarters of the whole.

I admit that it is a pretty stiff tax, it is a heavy tax. But I would ask the House to bear in mind (because the tax has been criticised on account of its severity) that capital as defined in the Business Profits War Tax Act includes reserve and undistributed profits. I do not myself believe that the ordinary commercial company has any very serious ground of complaint.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Are borrowings treated as capital?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: No. As I said, I do not believe that the ordinary commercial company has any serious ground of complaint if, when it is earning 15 per cent upon capital and reserve, we say: We will allow you 13 per cent and tax 2 per cent; or if they make the additional 5 per cent we say that we will take one-half, or if they make over 20 per cent we say we will take three-quarters of the excess amount. It is a fact that there are concerns in this country that have been making 50 per cent, 75 per cent or 100 per cent in the way of profits in the last year, and this taxation is without question severe upon those firms and companies. There is no doubt about that. I pointed out the other day that this question had more than a business aspect, and although I was misunderstood, I was not indulging in rhetoric. I used the argument because I believed it had a real bearing upon this question of taxation. I stated that the people of this country were bearing great hardships, and making great sacrifices, owing to the war. I said that men were interrupting their employment, giving up their vocations and going to the war; that parents were sending their sons forward; and I said that I thought it was proper under those circumstances that, in the event of excessive profits having been earned owing to the war, a very substantial part of those profits should be taken for the State. I asked the House to believe and I, at all events, believe that it is a relevant argument. I think it is strengthened by the announcement of the Prime Minister the other day that it is proposed to introduce compulsory service into Canada. We must bear in mind that in the event of firms in this country getting abnormal profits, 30 per cent, 40 per cent, 50 per cent, 60 per cent or 100 per cent, the sentiment of the public is apt to be offended, and in that way our effort in the war likely to be diminished, if excess profits so great as that are permitted to private enterprise at a time when these sacrifices are being made by the people. I am the first to say in that connection that the men who have made these profits have made them under conditions that exist in this country, and that they are just as patriotic as the rest of us. They are among the leading citizens of Canada; they, too, have sent their sons forward and still continue to do everything they can to assist in the war. But the fact remains that very large profits have been made, and, so far as I am concerned, I have been unable to see that the Government would be justified in allowing those abnormal profits to be made without stepping in and taking a substantial part for the State. In other words, I believe that that argument, which might be criticised as a sentimental argument, is a real argument, having regard to the fact that we are carrying on this war and calling upon the people to make sacrifices of every kind in connection with it.

The hon. member for South Renfrew (Mr. Graham) has, as I said, expressed some apprehension lest the tax might be unduly heavy and force some of these firms into bankruptcy. Considering that we have taken only one-quarter of the excess profits in excess of 7 per cent during the years 1915 and 1916, and considering that this increased taxation applies only to the last accounting term of the three year period, I am of opinion that his apprehensions are not well founded, because most of the firms that made large profits last year made much larger profits in the previous year, and many of them made large profits in the year preceding that, which was a period of considerable dislocation of business. As the hon. member for South Renfrew said, we are on common ground in desiring that nothing should be done that would injure the industries of this country; but I am of the view that no such untoward consequences as he apprehends are likely to ensue.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The minister will remember that, some days ago, he was good enough to tell me that he would be willing to submit a statement of the excess profits of the flour milling companies of last year, from which the tax was taken. I should like very much to have them.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I stated last year when this matter was under consideration by the House that should returns be called for by the House we should, of course, be glad to bring them down. These returns deal with the private business of individuals and companies throughout Canada. If any member desires information respecting the assessments levied against them, I would suggest that he give his notice on the Order Paper, and it will then be for the House to determine whether, in any particular case, those returns should be brought down. I have no objection personally to bringing them down; I am in the hands of the House. But I think if any hon. member desires information as to the assessment against an industry or an individual firm in an industry, he should move for it in the usual way in the House, and it would then be for the House to discuss the matter and determine whether they should be brought down or not.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I am sorry the minister did not say that. I think the minister said that if any member of the House desired the returns they would be brought down.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I can quote almost my exact words. I stated to my hon. friend that if the House, as I said last year, adopted a resolution, the returns would be brought down.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The minister did not say that the other day.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: What would be the advice of my hon. friend to the House when this motion was made?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I cannot say in advance what my view would be except this, that if it developed that the House desired or the majority of the House desired information as to any particular assessment, or all assessments so far as I am concerned, the House would be entitled to the information because the House having imposed the taxation is entitled to know the result.

Mr. PUGSLEY: That is the majority of the House.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I would not say that. I reserve to myself the right to consider what the motion is. If it were aimed at an individual and for some purpose that I considered other than the public interest, I might give my expression of opinion that while I would be very glad to give to any particular member the information personally, I would hesitate to make it public.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I will tell the minister what I wanted. I think I explained my own view as being that the people of Canada and this Parliament have a right to know what are the excess profits of every manufacturer engaged in producing foodstuffs, such as flour, or other necessaries of life, the price of which has gone up to an inordinate extent, beyond all reason, and that the public have a right to know what are the excess profits out of which the Government is getting its share.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: If my hon. friend desires information along that line, I suggest that he move for it in the House and we will consider what action will be taken. I will say further that it was agreed last year on the part of almost every member of the House, that information of this character, which touched the business of individual firms and companies throughout the country, should not be made public unless called for by the House. If my hon. friend desires information concerning the assessment of any person, industry or group of industries, he shall have it. If any member of the House desired to know in a confidential way, for his own information, what the assessment of any individual was, I should feel that I would give it to him.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: When my hon. friend says that he is in the hands of the House in regard to this matter, I think that he evades the question. The House does not give guidance to him; it rather expects guidance from him. I should not say that his advice would be followed in every case, but certainly the House would not pass in judgment upon a matter of this kind until it had the advice of my hon. friend. A motion made with a view to inquisitiveness or with a desire to inquire into the business of any individual should not, perhaps, be granted without cause shown. No one desires to have specific information concerning the business of Mr. So-and-So. I make no insinuation, but it is conceivable that one firm may have obtained advantage at the expense of another, and if information is asked for in that connection, I think my hon. friend will agree that the public have a right to information concerning certain businesses of a general character, such as railways and shipping companies. The flour business is of such a character that I think the information referred to should be given to the committee.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I think I may substantially agree with what my right hon. friend has said, but it is unusual to ask a minister in advance what attitude he will take with regard to a motion.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: We have understood ever since this matter came up in the House last session that this information would be given without any question.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I will take opportunity during the course of this discussion to place before the committee what I did say last year. My recollection of what I said is that if the House desired information respecting these assessments, it was only reasonable, having regard to the fact that the House had authorized the taxation, that the information should be given. I do not desire to withhold any information from the House at any time, but I cannot state in advance what action I shall take with regard to any motion which may be put on the Order Paper. I shall have to consider the motion on its merits, and the arguments adduced in support of it.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: That means that the House is not entitled to the information unless it is moved for.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: My right hon. friend himself said a few moments ago that a request for information for merely inquisitorial purposes should not be granted.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Exactly.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: My right hon. friend says that if a motion asking for information is put forward for inquisitorial reasons, it should be opposed, but if put forward with the bona fide intention of obtaining information in the public interest, it should be granted.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I understood from the discussion which took place last year that the details of the receipts in respect of this taxation would be given. No one expects that the details of every particular assessment will be given. It is not expected that we should have a return showing that Mr. So-and-So paid $500, and somebody else $600; but we do think that we should have information as to the amounts paid into the treasury by different classes of industries. I think that information concerning industries of the character to which reference has just been made should be given without motion.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: If my right hon. friend will place on the Order Paper a resolution asking for returns with regard to taxation, I shall have no disposition to withhold any information, because I do not believe that my right hon. friend would bring forward a motion of that kind with any other than a proper intention.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I hope the minister does not suppose that I would do anything of that kind.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Not for a moment. The hon. gentleman is the last person I would think of in that regard.

Mr. PUGSLEY: A few days ago, when this matter was under consideration, I suggested that the committee was entitled to this information, especially with regard to the flour and the milling industries. I understood the minister to say then that he would bring down the information. If the minister is not prepared to do that, I think he ought to allow the consideration of this resolution to stand until the information is obtained. It is not mere inquisitiveness which prompts members of this Committee to seek information as to the excess profits, running all the way from 20 to 100 per cent, which the manufacturers of flour and the producers of other necessaries of life are obtaining, a portion of which goes into the treasury, and about which the minister boasts so enthusiastically every time he refers to his Budget. The country has a right to know what these enormous excessive profits are which are taken out of the people and what portion of them has gone into the treasury.

[Sir Thomas White.]

Sir THOMAS WHITE: As to what I stated the other day, I quote from page 1511 of Hansard:

> Mr. Pugsley: Could the minister not furnish to the House a statement of the excess profits which have been made by one industry as an example? Take the flour milling industries of the country.
> Sir Thomas White: I could give them if they were asked for. As I said last year, if a motion is adopted in the House for returns of the assessment of this business tax, the papers will be laid on the Table.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Read a little further.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: That is the answer that I made.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Oh, no.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Read a little further.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I stated the other day that if a motion were adopted, we should be prepared to bring down the papers.

Mr. PUGSLEY: If my hon. friend will read a little further, he will find that, whether he intended to or not, he led us to believe that no formal motion would be necessary.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I do not think I could have stated it more clearly than I did; that if the House adopted a motion, I would bring the papers down. In the discussion of this matter last year I said, as reported on page 2637 of Hansard:

> I do not think it desirable that publicity should be given in the way that my hon. friend suggests. I have already said that, if Parliament desires a return, such a return shall be brought down. This is a business tax dealing with private affairs of individuals, firms, and companies, engaged in business throughout the country, and while Parliament is entitled to any information as to the results of the tax, I do not believe the details should be advertised any more than is necessary.

That is what I said last year, and I stand by that.

Mr. PUGSLEY: When this matter was discussed a few days ago, the member for Carleton, N.B., (Mr. Carvell) said:

> The big milling companies publish their statements and the companies have a good idea of their profits. But there are hundreds, and I trust thousands of small milling companies and millers all over Canada, and I think the public have a right to know how much they are contributing and how this tax has been levied. That information should be brought down, I think, without Parliament demanding it.

To which the minister replied:

> That was discussed last year in the House, and I then made the same statement that I have made to-day.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: What was the statement that I made to-day? It was that if a resolution was adopted, the papers would be brought down.

Mr. PUGSLEY: No.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I have just read what I said.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Mr. Carvell said:—

Mr. Carvell: Would there be any objection to producing statements showing the persons, firms and companies, and the amount paid by them for the first accounting period?

Sir Thomas White: I would consider that. I do not know whether we have that information. We received some very large cheques in payment of these taxes.

There is no suggestion there of a formal demand. I said a little later on:—

Mr. Pugsley: The reason I suggested the milling industry is because the people are intensely interested in the increasing price of flour, and I think that before we pass the Bill we ought to have a statement from the minister of the excess profits of the milling industry last year. I think the public would like to have that.

Sir Thomas White: That matter can be raised at any time.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I agree entirely with what I said. If my hon. friend desires any information as to this let him put a question on the Order Paper asking for the information and the matter will receive consideration.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Now is the time, and I may say to the minister that I am asking for the information.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I am asking that the question be put formally.

Mr. PUGSLEY: With all deference to the minister, I say that I think the committee ought to have the information before coming to a decision in regard to this resolution.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: What I say in respect to that is this: the Business Profits War Tax Act imposes a tax of a certain definite proportion of the profits in excess of 7 per cent. The consideration of this measure has no necessary connection with the earnings of any group of companies, because the taxation is imposed having regard to their profits. There is, therefore, in my view, no reason why we should not proceed with the consideration of this measure as we are doing, subject to this, that if my hon. friend desires any information as to the profits of any particular business or industry I would suggest that he place a question upon the Order Paper, and the matter can then be considered by the Government. That is the position I shall take.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: My hon. friend has just stated that the object of this tax is to obtain a certain definite proportion of the profits in excess of seven per cent. That is a sufficient answer so far as it goes, but there is another aspect of the case. The complaint has been raised that certain industries are making undue profits; that they are profiting on the needs of the community, profiting and speculating upon the hunger of the people. That complaint has been asserted and it has been denied, but we have the evidence of its correctness. No one supposes that my hon. friend did not properly discharge his duty; that he did not collect all that was due, but he might furnish the public with information for which they are seeking and which might be of value at the present time in reducing the high cost of bread and other food.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: My right hon. friend is quite fair in his presentation of his views. He says that this information might be of use at the present time when the price of food is high, but that matter is entirely separable from what we are doing now in considering a taxation principle.

Mr. PUGSLEY: How is it separable?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: If my hon. friend will put on the Order Paper a question asking for the information he desires, that matter will be considered on its merits, just as this matter is being considered on its merits; but to say: Will the minister bring down the information regarding the amount of taxation imposed upon members of a particular industry, and then when the matter comes up again, to ask for similar particulars in connection with another industry, is not a proper method of dealing with this measure, because the two matters are separable. My right hon. friend is quite correct in saying that the people are interested in the profits of these companies from the standpoint of the high cost of food. If he will move on that ground, personally I should be prepared to give quite favourable consideration to his motion, but the matter does not necessarily arise in connection with the consideration of this measure, and therefore, I cannot concur in the suggestion that we should defer consideration of this measure until that and other information is brought down, because I do not believe it is cognate to this measure.

Mr. ROBB: It was stated officially about six weeks ago that there were still 102,000,000 bushels of wheat in Canada, and since that time the price of wheat has advanced by one dollar a bushel, which would mean an advance of $102,000,000. We know that the Minister of Agriculture was compelled to go to an outside purchasing commission to secure wheat for seed and that the price was fixed at fifty cents a bushel over the price in effect six weeks ago. Will this purchasing commission contribute of its excess profits under the Business Profits War Tax Act?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I do not understand the question of my hon. friend at all. I know nothing about the purchasing commission he speaks of. The Act is very simple in its application; if any firm engaged in business makes profits beyond a certain percentage, then the tax would apply. I am sorry that I can not answer my hon. friend's question, because I do not understand it.

Mr. ROBB: We are told that the Allied Purchasing Commission controls all the wheat in Canada to-day.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: That is the British Government.

Mr. ROBB: Yes, and Canada through her official representative had to go to this commission to obtain the wheat required for seed purposes.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I do not know that.

Mr. ROBB: And the price was fixed at fifty cents per bushel over the price in effect six weeks ago. It is apparent, therefore, that some persons have made $50,000,000 on this deal if the price remains at that level until they get rid of that wheat. Will they contribute under the excess profits tax?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I do not understand the question of my hon. friend, because in the first place I do not know that the Minister of Agriculture did go to the British commission, although he may have gone; nor do I know that he got the wheat and paid for it. I would be glad to answer my hon. friend's question if I had the information.

The hon. member for South Renfrew (Mr. Graham) referred to the question of conscription of wealth. That is a rather vague term, and I could not help but reflect that his remarks were somewhat inconsistent.

[Sir Thomas White.]

He started out by attacking this tax—and I must say that his criticism was of a moderate and fair character—as being too severe, and then he suggested that the time had come for conscription of wealth. Without using that term, the Government in connection with this excess profits measure, now before the House, is endeavouring to take a substantial portion of profits which might be regarded as abnormal and arising largely from war conditions. That is one of the principles underlying this new taxation.

Mr. PUGSLEY: With regard to the statement of the minister that he does not think the question of profits, which the milling companies and companies producing other necessaries of life have made, and out of which profits the Government has derived in the past year and expects to derive in the present year large sums, has anything to do with the resolution now before the committee, I respectfully beg to differ from my hon. friend; I think it has a great deal to do with it. The minister has stated that out of these taxes he expects to derive a certain amount of revenue for the purpose of carrying on the services of the country. In that connection, Parliament surely has a right to know as to whether that expected revenue is to be derived from enormously excessive profits or whether it is to be derived from reasonably excessive profits. This Parliament and this country have a right to know that; we have a right to know whether those excess profits out of which the minister expects to derive a proportion of his revenue, are 50 or 100 or 200 per cent beyond what are fair and reasonable profits. I am surprised that the minister should ask a committee to pass a resolution and at the same time refuse to furnish us with that reasonable information which we have a right to expect. I certainly understood the minister to state a few days ago that if any hon. member asked for this information, it would be brought down.

Now is the time to bring it down before this resolution is further considered by the committee. My views will not be potent with the minister, of course, if he has determined not to bring the information down, but I think the committee ought not to be asked to pass the resolution until we have that information. This is a question in which the people of this country are taking a most vital interest. The poor people of this Dominion are simply being ground to the dust by the high cost of living. Think of it, Mr. Chairman! In this country, which is capable of producing not only two or three or five hundred million bushels of wheat, but thousands of millions of bushels, the price of wheat to-day is $3.30 per bushel, and flour has reached the enormous sum of $16 a barrel. It is simply astounding. And yet the Minister of Finance says he will not tell the House what are the excess profits of the flour millers and other producers of necessaries of life. He wants us to put this resolution through in the dark, without any information at all. Surely it is of interest to this Parliament and to the people of this country to know the amount of these excess profits from which the Minister of Finance proposes to take his share and put it into the treasury. I think it is of vital importance that we should know whether these excess profits are such as might reasonably be expected to be made under war conditions, or whether they are exorbitant profits which this Parliament should not recognize at all, and against which we should take effectual steps in order to relieve the conditions from which the people of this country are suffering at the present time. Does not the minister think this a reasonable request? Does he not think he should tell us whether the excess profits of the millers last year were $100,000,000 or $200,000,000 or $300,000,000, so that we might know what his percentage was, because the minister is a partner with the millers in the business of boosting the prices. He has made himself a partner with them, and he has taken no steps since the beginning of the war to keep down the prices. From every million dollars of excess profits which the millers take from the consumers of this country the Minister of Finance takes his share and puts it in the Treasury, and, so far as this House and the country knows, neither he nor his colleagues, not even the Minister of Labour, has ever taken one effectual step to keep prices within reasonable limits. The Finance Minister has simply winked at the taking of these excess profits out of the people, and now he comes down to Parliament and asks us to authorize him to take a larger share of these excess profits without giving us the slightest information as to whether these profits are enormous, or simply such as might reasonably be expected under the conditions existing to-day. The minister should not treat this Parliament as a machine to do his bidding. It is not fair to the gentlemen who sit behind him. He ought to realize that they have judgment, as they undoubtedly have; he ought to realize that they are men of large intelligence, as they are, but he does not realize this. He treats them as automatons to do his bidding, and gives them not the slightest information upon which they can act intelligently with regard to the proposal now before the committee. If I had the power, I would not let the minister go one step further with this resolution until he had given the committee that information.

Mr. MACDONALD: I desire to support what my hon. friend from St. John has said as to the importance of furnishing this House and the country with this information, which certainly is as ordinary a piece of information as the House could ever seek from a minister. A certain measure of taxation is proposed, and yet the Minister of Finance practicaly declines to give the House and the country the names of the men who have made these excess profits and the amounts. My hon. friend suggests there may be some reason why that information should not be given. For myself, I cannot conceive of any such reason. The Minister of Finance, however, asks Parliament to authorize him to increase the taxation along these lines, because he says it is the best method of taxation at the present time to raise money to carry on the war. If excess profits have been made, as the Finance Minister says, why should he decline to give the House the information asked for by my hon. friend?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I am not declining to give the information. If my hon. friend will move for the information, we will consider his motion. My hon. friend has not yet told us what he wants, whether he wants the assessment of "A" or "B" or "C."

Mr. MACDONALD: The whole of it. The minister should lay on the Table, as every other minister does, a statement of his receipts and expenditures. Why should he not publish a bluebook showing just who are paying these excess profits and the amounts? My hon. friend by innuendo suggests that possibly some business may be injured by giving this information, but this legislation will certainly injure them to a far greater degree if they are making excess profits. Either this additional tax is warranted by some information which the minister has in his possession, and which he has not yet given to the country, or he has no reason whatever for imposing it. It is certainly not the gentlemen whom the minister proposes to tax that are asking that this information be withheld from the country, because the trade and financial papers throughout the Dominion are simply full of wild denunciations of the Finance Minister for proposing this additional taxation. Their position is that the House ought to know what the facts are, so that the country can see that the Minister of Finance is wrong in proposing this taxation. If this question involved some matter of state policy, or some interest vital to the war would be affected by giving this information, I could well understand the minister following the unwritten rule that its publication would not be in the public interest. But as my hon. friend from St. John has so ably pointed out, if there is one thing that strikes at the home of the plain people of this country to-day it is the enormous price which they have to pay for the right to live. That problem is at the door of every one, but this Government absolutely refuses to deal with the matter in any way. During the time this House has been sitting this session the price of flour has doubled in this country, and so has every other necessary of life. The minister tells this House that there are certain classes in this country who are making excess profits, and he is going to impose additional taxation upon them. The hon. member for St. John argues that if that is the case, the House should be told just who are making excess profits, and what those profits are, because the Minister of Finance is a partner with them in taking this money out of the pockets of the people. We should have that information so that we can tell whether it is wise and practical to extend this taxation on this particular class. I think the Finance Minister should give the House without any reservation the amounts he has received from this excess profits tax, and from whom, and then the House will be able to decide whether it is right to extend this particular taxation. I must confess that I was under the impression that my hon. friend would have asked this House to accept an amendment to this resolution, but apparently he is going to go on with it regardless of the representations that have been made.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I do not quite understand my hon. friend's allusion to an amendment. My hon. friend says that I should have considered an amendment.

[Mr. Macdonald.]

Mr. MACDONALD: I said that I was under the impression that my hon. friend would have proposed an amendment to the resolution in view of the representations that have been made.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Along what lines?

Mr. MACDONALD: Along lines that will readily occur to my hon. friend. Apparently, it has not occurred to him to propose it. When we point out to him that he is taxing industry, and to that extend checking the demand for labour as well as checking production of articles so essential to the country's welfare, that he is preventing capital from doing all that it might do for the development of the country, and ask why he does not tax accumulated wealth, he gives statements which, I submit, are not adequate reasons for the course he is pursuing. He declines to tax the accumulations of the wealthy men of this country who now escape taxation, who pay nothing to the war except an occasional subscription to the Patriotic Fund.

The fiscal argument of the Minister of Finance in the past has been that we cannot impose an income tax because incomes are the special subject of taxation for both municipal and provincial purposes. Sometime in the dim and distant future we may tax incomes, but in the meantime we cannot do so because the provinces and the municipalities impose these taxes. But he taxes corporations and firms, forsooth, and contends that this is the right way for him to raise revenues. I think he has forgotten that the capital invested in these corporations or firms pays provincial taxes and municipal taxes, just as accumulated wealth pays in the form of an income tax. The hon. minister has departed from the sound principles of taxation in dealing with this whole question. Instead of dealing with the matter so that all classes may be made to pay, he is putting off the evil day. He does not follow the example of Gladstone who, when Chancellor of the Exchequer, declared for the sound policy that Britain should pay as much as possible towards the expenses of the war while the war was going on. On the contrary he practically says: We will pay as little as possible while the war is going on, we will collect from capital invested in industry, but we will not touch accumulated wealth; we are going to leave to posterity the task of paying for this war. There has arisen in Canada, by reason of the demand that has come for many industrial products, a prosperity under which wealth is made and the accumulations of wealth increased. Yet the minister touches only the fringe of taxation, he takes from only one class, and leaves the payment for the war to the future, when the time of reaction comes, when we shall need people to come into this country and develop it, when they will probably be frightened away because of the taxes which it will be necessary to impose at that time. I say that is a wrong policy. The minister should be preparing now so that we at this time should all be doing our part, when accumulated wealth especially should be doing its part.

The hon. gentleman tells us that it will cost so much to tax these people with accumulated wealth. Why, he has in his own department machinery that is ample to reach the wealthy men of the country who are investing in his loans in order to escape taxation upon their accumulations. With this organization he has been able to reach firms and corporations from the Atlantic to the Pacific and to collect from them his business tax, and with no greater expense he could meet accumulated wealth in such a way that it will be made to pay its proportion toward the public revenue. He knows that a question of this kind is not settled by simply speaking of the cost. He could fix an amount of income beyond which taxes should be imposed in the most stringent way. This tax ought to be imposed, because, in this war time, when everything is at stake, when everything is in the melting-pot, there is no person who should escape the responsibility of contributing, to the extent of his wealth, toward our needs in this war. Our friends in the United States have not hesitated to strike in the most emphatic way at this class of wealth, and by the methods they have adopted they are raising enormous sums. But the hon. minister prefers to leave the burden to posterity. Nor does he give the House the information which would enable hon. members to form a fair judgment on the question, but he simply imposes a tax on business the result of which, according to those best informed on the subject, is to prevent the extension of industry in Canada.

The minister should be reminded that, before he taxes at all, he should economize, so as to put himself in a better position to provide more money against the expenses of the war. For instance, in public works, we have spent, since 1914, including capital account and consolidated fund account, no less than $47,000,000—practically fifty millions of dollars. Imagine, Mr. Chairman, our making so huge an expenditure in this war time. Even last year, according to figures given me from Hansard, no less than $15,000,000 was spent on public works. Why should such an expenditure go on and we leave it to posterity to pay these war bills? Why should the minister imperil the future of the country by failure to economize and by these vast expenditures? Consider how expenditures have increased within the last five years. In Dominion lands last year we spent about $1,500,000 more than we spent in the same service five years ago.

Is there anybody in this country who supposes that there is immigration coming into Canada which would warrant or justify in any way an expenditure of $1,500,000? So one goes through the various departments. In the Immigration Branch of the Department of the Interior there was an expenditure of $300,000 more than there was four years ago. Why should such extravagance exist? My hon. friend the Minister of Finance talks to the people of Canada about making sacrifices and says that this tax is justifiable because we are sacrificing our men and boys on the battlefield and that industry should also make sacrifices, but on what principle can he take this position when he and his colleagues in the Government make no sacrifices, but, on the contrary, dissipate the resources of the country without regard to the question as to whether there is a war on or not? My hon. friend last year asked this Parliament to support a proposition to give $8,000,000 out of the treasury when we are spending our blood and treasure in war, in order to get the support of the hon. member for Charlevoix and Saguenay (Sir Rodolphe Forget). Will the hon. gentleman have the temerity and audacity to come to this Parliament and ask us to permit him to take $8,000,000 from the treasury and hand it over to that hon. gentleman? If my hon. friend expects that the people are going to be impressed by the appeals made to them for sacrifice and patriotism in face of an action of that kind and repeated after fair warning was given by one of the judges in the courts of this country, I think he will find that he has misjudged the temper of the people. I could take my hon. friend through other avenues of expenditure. He has kept on expending. He has spent no less than $17,000,000 on the Hudson Bay enterprise.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Certainly.

Mr. MACDONALD: Certainly. Why should my hon. friend increase and not diminish that expenditure at this time?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: It is being decreased.

Mr. MACDONALD: It is being decreased?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Who started it? Who let the contract?

Mr. MACDONALD: Who started it? Who started the war?—I might as well ask my hon. friend. We are dealing with problems with respect to this year of grace 1917.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: We have reduced the expenditure on the Hudson Bay railway.

Mr. MACDONALD: In the face of a world war you are going on with that expenditure.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: We have reduced it.

Mr. MACDONALD: How much has my hon. friend reduced it?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I understand that practically there is only a handful of men employed on the road to-day.

Mr. MACDONALD: When did my hon. friend take that position in regard to it?

Mr. REID: Some time ago. The contractor has reduced to a minimum the work on the Hudson Bay railway.

Mr. MACDONALD: I asked a question in this House not long ago, in fact, since we came back, and some one representing some department gave me the statement that $17,000,000 was expended to 1917, and that the expenditure in the last financial year was in the vicinity of $4,000,000.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I see that they are asking $3,000,000 more for the Hudson Bay railway this year in the main estimates. There is not much reduction about that?

Mr. MACDONALD: The hon. Minister of Customs (Mr. Reid) had better explain what it is that he proposes to do with this $3,000,000. Is he going to take that out of this new taxation this year?

Mr. REID: It may not be spent.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: What is the use of asking for it if it is not going to be spent?

Mr. REID: The total amount will not be spent.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: What is the use of asking for that which it is not proposed to spend? How much of the sum that you are asking Parliament for do you not propose to spend?

Mr PUGSLEY: He says the total amount will not be spent; there may be $50 left.

Mr. MACDONALD: Apparently we are going to have that same old story which was given to us last year; when items in the estimates came up for consideration we were accustomed to hear hon. gentlemen say that they were not going to spend the money. We accepted the assurances of the Government last year in regard to a very large number of items and it was found that a great deal of the money was spent. We have the statement of the Minister of Customs that the work on the Hudson Bay railway has been stopped, but my hon. friend is an old Parliamentarian and he has the very ingenious way of throwing out a little aside like that for the purpose of breaking the force of an argument. But, in the face of the estimates which show that they are asking for $3,000,000 to spend this year on this road, there is no sense in this Government making appeals to the people to sacrifice themselves in the way of taxation and service. The Minister of Finance tries to justify his excess business profits tax by declaring that his programme is one that ought to appeal to a particular class in war time but while making this appeal my hon. friend displays the most absolute disregard of the economies, and he has failed to appreciate and take home to himself and his colleagues the lesson that he gives to the rest of the people. In view of that, I say once more that the minister ought to present a well-considered plan of taxation in regard to the people of Canada and not hit at one particular class, especially when he could deal with accumulated wealth. My hon. friend comes along when we are passing through the greatest period of stress in the war, and tells us that posterity will have to pay the bill, but that in the meantime he is going to tax industry and capital to a certain extent and along certain lines. He has no formulated plan, no policy, no organization, no proposal which he can present to this Parliament in a sensible and practical way. Had the hon. gentleman and his colleagues, instead of merely generalising the efforts of the people of this country, assigned to their proper avocations those different forces which the country possesses, they would have done something to make effective the country's efforts in behalf of the great cause in which we are engaged. The Minister of Finance falls short of his part. He says: Posterity will pay, but we will tax for the moment industry and capital. The Government go on spending just the same as they were doing in the past, and then they come to this Parliament, and when an hon. gentleman asks that Parliament should be given information as to where they got the money out of this tax, from whom they got it, and where excess profits were disclosed by the information collected by the Government, we cannot get that information though we desire it for the consideration of this question. It seems to me that the occasion is one that demands from the Finance Minister a reorganization of the whole financial programme and a consideration of the question as to the responsibility for our share of what we ought to pay for the war in this period of prosperity. My hon. friend ought to deal with this question in a systematic and practical way so as to place the burden on the proper shoulders. That broad way would have a better result and a more earnest application of effort upon all lines to the great questions that lie before us.

Mr. LOGGIE: I would like to point out to the minister what seems to be a hardship. Assuming that a munition man started business, say, last year, and had to invest half a million dollars in plant, and the war did not last more than a year, would the minister allow, in making out the statement, sufficient depreciation on that plant before the profits were declared to enable the proprietor to come out whole at the end of the year? How many years would he consider it fair to apply that depreciation on account of plant, because practically it will be of no value when the making of munitions ceases? If a company started last year with $200,000 or $300,000 capital, invested $500,000 in plant, and made a profit of 75 per cent on the capital invested, would the minister first allow a reasonable depreciation, so that in the event of the business being closed up at the end of the war, the capital would not be taken to make up the loss in depreciation? It seems to me that it is a fair proposition, and that the public and capital should know that from the minister.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: When I use the words "net profits" I mean net profits after taking off a proper amount in respect of depreciation. The question of depreciation is a matter of fact in each case, and industry, in making returns, should in connection with its statement, indicate the amount which, having regard to the nature of the business, should be written off, for depreciation. Then we have to consider whether or not that is a proper allowance. Each case must be determined on its own merits. In other words, the question of depreciation is one of fact.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: A statement was made by the hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. McCrea), I think on Tuesday last when the committee were considering the resolution. That hon. gentlemen discussed in a very interesting and forceful manner the action of the Government in fixing the price of paper to the public. It was an interesting statement to me, bcause certain features were disclosed which were before that unknown to me. That hon. gentleman made the statement that paper was being sold to the trade in Canada to-day at a loss. His statement has been confirmed to-day or yesterday by Mr. J. R. Booth of Ottawa, according to a statement in the press. I say that if that statement is correct, an injustice is being done to one branch of industry in this country, and I should like to have a statement from the Minister of Finance with respect to this matter. At least it would be fair for me to say that if their prices are fixed and it is true that they are selling to the trade at a loss, there should be some compensation to that industry in respect to taxation of their excess profits in other branches of the trade. I think that when the Government undertakes to fix the price of any commodity, that price, so fixed, should be just; if not it will work an injury to that particular trade and cause dissatisfaction. The member for Sherbrooke intimated rather plainly, I think, that the Minister of Finance was a little alarmed at the political influence of the newspapers if he did not succumb to their suggestions to fix the price. We have very excellent authority for that statement from another hon. gentleman. It might be said that the member for Sherbrooke is somewhat prejudiced in his statement because he is himself a manufacturer of paper, and that therefore his statement might not be entitled to very great weight in respect to this particular question. But the late Minister of Militia (Sir Sam Hughes), more than an ordinary individual, has had something to say about this matter, and when I find so disinterested a gentleman expressing the same view, I think it is time for the Minister of Finance candidly and frankly to explain his position. The late Minister of Militia publicly and in recent days has stated that the Minister of Finance and Sir George Perley, the Minister of Militia overseas, have attempted to create an atmosphere against him for the purpose of driving him out of political life; and one of the influences which was used by the Minister of Finance, according to the late Minister of Militia, was the newspapers. The hon. member (Sir Sam Hughes) says that one of the avenues by which the Minister of Finance hoped to secure this influence with the press was by fixing the price of paper. Perhaps it would be as well that I should give to the House just what the late Minister of Militia did say, because this statement does not come from an ordinary member of Parliament, but from one who has a national reputation in a great many respects. In speaking to his constituents, not very long ago, he said—and I should like to hear from the Minister of Finance as to this:

> Another plan or scheme seems to have been the sweetening of the newspapers of Canada by departing from the first principles of the National policy to secure printing paper at fixed price, and incidentally benefit to a considerable extent the Yankee newspapers. The rich advertisements by brokers, by the Government, paid for by the poor people of Canada in connection with loans, also tended to mollify criticism of the press, and secure neutral, if not favourable consideration and comment.

I should hardly like to believe that the Minister of Finance was a party to the dictation of paper prices from the motives designated by the hon. member for Victoria. If that is correct, I say it is unjust. If the Minister of Finance thinks the member for Victoria is incorrect, that this statement is unfair, I should like to have him say so.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I have too much respect for the press of Canada, both Liberal and Conservative, to seriously argue in this House a question as to whether they would use their great influence to obtain some business advantage for themselves. The representatives of the press of this country, without any distinction of political affiliation, came to me, as they had a perfect right to do, and asked me to consider a matter which was of the utmost importance to them in their business. They pointed out that the prevailing rates for newsprint paper were such that if they were obliged to pay them their industry would be ruined. That was a proper subject for them to bring to my attention, and it was a proper subject for me, as minister, to consider. It was considered, as I said, in the House the other day, and, after exhausting all the arts of persuasion in endeavouring to get the question between the manufacturers of newsprint paper and the press settled, we took the action that is known to the House. I may say that this action was taken after we had, through our Tariff Board, made as careful an investigation as we could as to the increased cost of manufacture to the newsprint producers. The situation in regard to cost in all manufactures is a changing one from week to week during the progress of the war. A short time ago, in order that we might have full information as to the situation, we appointed Mr. R. A. Pringle, K.C., for the purpose of investigating the cost of production and all the conditions surrounding the manufacture and sale of newsprint paper in Canada. I submit to the House that, in view of the conditions brought to our attention by the press, the action which we have taken was a proper course for any Government to take in the premises. I may say that the investigation which is now proceeding will, I believe, meet the wishes of the manufacturers themselves as well as of the newspapers, because they desired to draw to our attention facts which they regard as of importance in connection with the price which they may be permitted to charge for newsprint paper. As to my hon. friend's general statement with regard to myself and the press, I would point out that the ex-Minister of Militia had resigned before the decision as to fixing the cost of newsprint paper had been reached by the Government. There would be no connection, therefore, such as my hon. friend suggests as between cause and effect.

Mr. GLASS: In discussing the business profits tax, the hon. member for South Renfrew pointed out that the manufacturers who under the present extraordinary conditions were earning large profits could not tell when those profits would be cut off. Many of the factories now engaged in the manufacture of munitions and other war supplies were doing other business previous to the outbreak of war; they simply readapted their machinery and converted their plants in such manner as to make them capable of producing munitions. The amount of depreciation in respect of such industries would not be so great as in the case of those which went into business in the first instance for the sole purpose of manufacturing munitions and war supplies. I understood the minister to say that in submitting their statements to the department, firms were allowed to estimate the amount of depreciation, and it was for the department to determine whether the depreciation estimated was fair and proper. I was going to ask, before the minister answered the question regarding depreciation, whether a fixed ratio of depreciation was allowed by the department in all cases. I can conceive that such an arrangement would be hardly fair to such industries and factories as my hon. friend (Mr. Loggie) has referred to. I suggest, then, that the depreciation in respect of factories which have been equipped for the special purpose of manufacturing munitions or supplies which are peculiarly incidental to the conduct of the war would be larger than that of the factory which simply has to readjust itself to former conditions after the war is over. My hon. friend referred to the remarks of the hon. member for Pictou concerning the criticisms directed by the press against the tax rate suggested under these proposals. I agree that certain papers, which are behind the interests mostly affected, severely criticise the proposed taxation, but the press at large admit that the principle of the taxation is along the right lines. Whether or not it is excessive is a question for the House to determine. It is possible that in view of the increasing demand for the product of these factories, very large extensions to the plants may be necessary. These extensions will involve an investment of capital which will be productive of return only for a short period; consequently a very large amount may have to be written off for depreciation. Moreover, a firm might find itself embarrassed if, in order to pay these taxes, it had to use money that would otherwise be used for extension of plant. No matter what decision may ultimately be arrived at, it must be evident to all that it would be a very serious thing if, by reason of the imposition of a tax or of any action taken by the Government, any industry should be retarded or embarrassed. I am quite satisfied that the Government has no intention of taking such action, but I submit that this is a matter which should seriously engage its attention before the question is finally disposed of.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: When the Minister of Finance put into force the additional 7½ per cent duty, he promised us that the statistical departments would disclose in the annual statements just what amount came from free goods and what from application of the 7½ per cent to the general tariff. That statement has never very clearly appeared, and I think that it is in the general interest that the information should appear in the Customs and Trade and Commerce returns. I obtained some figures from the Customs returns and used them during the debate upon the Budget. Although they were not later contradicted, at the time I made the statement some hon. gentlemen opposite seemed disposed to question them. For instance I find that the total Customs war tax for the fiscal year 1915-16, as given on page 192 of the Customs return, was $21,814,000. I assume that that was the amount of revenue recovered from the 7½ per cent tax on dutiable and free goods. During that year there was an importation of $254,000,000 worth of goods formerly free. If those goods paid an import tax of 7½ per cent, the amount paid into the treasury would be $19,000,000. This would further show that the amount of revenue recoverable by the 7½ per cent tariff on dutiable goods amounted to only $2,000,000. The minister this afternoon stated that the total amount of revenue received from the 7½ per cent tariff tax for the year just closed amounted to $37,000,000, $20,000,000 of which was attributable to the tariff on free goods and the balance to the surtax on dutiable goods.

If the figures to which I have referred for the fiscal year 1915-16 are correct, I doubt very much the accuracy of the figures which the minister has given this afternoon. I have always doubted the wisdom of applying the 7½ per cent increase to the dutiable list; in fact, I have always protested against it. I have never believed it to be in the commercial interest of the country, and I doubt very much if it gives us any substantial revenue. The point, however, that I wish to make at the present time is to urge that those figures be carefully kept, and that they appear in a prominent place in our statistical returns, so that we may have an opportunity of knowing just what is the effect of the imposition of the 7½ per cent tax on dutiable and non-dutiable goods.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I have not looked into the matter especially, but it was my intention that the information should appear in the customs returns, and I think I so stated to the House at the time that I introduced the Budget in 1915 or in the discussions in connection with that Budget. Although my hon. friend usually presents his statements as clearly as any other hon.

member, I have never been able to follow him in what I take to be his assertion that we have derived no revenue in respect of the 7½ per cent increase in the general tariff. My hon. friend must know that we must get at least 7½ per cent upon all the volume of dutiable goods to which the 7½ per cent applies, as well as 7½ per cent upon the free goods.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Of course you get some revenue, but the general effect of the 7½ per cent increase is to prohibit importations, and the net result is that you would have secured more revenue if you had not applied the increase at all. That is what I mean.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I find in the report of the Customs Department for 1916, which is the last report available, that the amount derived from the war tax on the general tariff is there stated to be $21,814,000, and that on the preferential tariff is $3,442,000.

Mr. MACLEAN: Those are the figures I quoted.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: In 1917, the total was $37,800,000 or nearly $38,000,000. There is an enormous value of imports which were not free before on which we get 7½ per cent, the amount of the increase in the tariff. We also get 7½ per cent or 5 per cent, according to whether a commodity is on the general tariff or the preferential tariff, from a large list of free goods. It may be that my hon. friend has overlooked the fact that there is to-day a very considerable list of commodities that are free from the 7½ per cent and the 5 per cent tax.

Mr. MACDONALD: Will the minister tell us how much was collected during the last financial year from all the sources of what is known as war taxation?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I am afraid that I could not do so offhand except in very general terms. The war taxation under the tariff amounts to $37,000,000; the bank tax upon circulation would yield about $1,000,000; the loan companies and trust companies probably contribute $300,000 or $400,000, and then we have collected $12,500,000 in the first year under the Business Profits War Tax Act, and possibly $20,000,000 in the second year. We are not able to estimate the latter because we have not the figures before us. The total amount would be in the neighbourhood of $50,000,000.

[Sir Thomas White.]

Mr. LOGGIE: The minister is perhaps hardly accurate in that.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I do not suggest that I am accurate, because I have not the information.

Mr. LOGGIE: The minister has not mentioned the excess amount he gets from spirits and tobacco which would be between $6,000,000 and $7,000,000.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I am not sure if that amount is correct.

Mr. LOGGIE: He also gets about $37,000,000 from customs, about $15,000,000 from the business tax for last year, about $1,000,000 from banks and about $6,000,000 from extra postage, or a total of about $66,000,000.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I am much obliged to my hon. friend. I think $60,000,000 is nearer the correct amount.

Mr. SCHAFFNER: Is any separate account kept of what is collected from the banks and railways? Can that information be got in a definite form?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Yes.

Mr. MACDONALD: Will the minister let us have an estimate as to the actual additional amount he will secure from the business profits war tax this year? I cannot find that information in any statement he has given.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I am sorry that I am not able to give my hon. friend the information, and that is the reason I did not see the relevancy, if he will pardon me for saying so, of the argument which he put forward. My hon. friend suggested that we should have the information which would enable him to know the amount of taxation which we would take from companies upon excessive revenues or profits. The reason I am unable to give that information is because we have not the returns. This taxation applies only to the last accounting period, and the information as to that accounting period is not before the department and will not be for some considerable time. It will not be before the department in its entirety until July, 1918. I do not desire to withhold from the House any information I have, but it is not possible for me to give the figures to my hon. friend.

Mr. MACDONALD: My hon. friend must have the information for some years. What year is it for which my hon. friend has the information?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Practically the whole of 1915—two years ago.

Mr. MACDONALD: Is that the financial year which ended in 1916?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: No, the financial year which ended in 1915.

Mr. MACDONALD: Has my hon. friend no data gathered that would enable him to predict how much the application of this extra rate yielded in the financial year 1915-16?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I am sorry to say to my hon. friend that the data would not be useful to us in reaching the amount, and for this reason: in the first place, there were some concerns that made little or no money during 1914-15, because that was the period of dislocation succeeding the outbreak of the war, but some of those companies, I think, have done very well this last year. I reach that conclusion by reason of the conditions that have prevailed in the country, and I assume that those companies will make large profits. Other concerns that made large profits on the outbreak of war will not make so much during the last accounting period, for the reason that they had large supplies of goods or commodities on hand which appreciated in value when the war broke out. Some grain companies for instance, made large profits in the year succeeding the outbreak of the war, because their commodities appreciated in value very considerably on account of the war. As to how they will have done this year I am unable to say, because I have not the returns.

Mr. MACDONALD: It would be a matter of great importance to the House and to the country if the minister would give an accurate statement of the figures as to which my hon. friend from Northumberland (Mr. Loggie) has made an estimate. I think this committee, dealing with taxation and considering what is the best method by which the finances of the country in connection with the tremendous burdens imposed on account of the war shall be raised, and all the other matters which are germane to that, should know how much money the Minister of Finance has raised out of the extra taxes during the last two years. My hon. friend ought to be able to get that information without much difficulty, and I should like him to give us the assurance that he will place it before the House after dinner, or at some other time.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: It would have to be simply an estimate. In the first place we know that the tariff produced $37,000,000. In the second place we know that the first year of the excess business profits tax produced $12,500,000; I do not know what the figures for the second and last periods will be. My hon. friend also estimates about $66,000,000 from post office and excise returns. My own idea would be that from $60,000,000 to $65,000,000 would be a fair estimate, and which my hon. friend will not fail to observe is about the amount we set aside for reducing the principal of our war debt. In addition to that, we paid the increased interest, and the pensions.

Resolution agreed to.

On resolution No. 2:

2. That for the purposes of the said Act, the actual unimpaired reserve, rest or accumulated profits held at the commencement of an accounting period by an incorporated company shall be included as part of its capital as long as it is held and used by the company as capital;

That any enactment founded on this resolution shall be deemed to have come into force on and from the eighteenth day of May, one thousand nine hundred and sixteen;

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Why was that date fixed?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: This section is to remove any doubt as to the amount accumulated profits which would be allowed as capital. We allow the amount which has accumulated at the commencement of the accounting period. It was set up by a few firms that we should take accumulated profits into account, say every month or so during the period. That was not the intention when the Bill was introduced. we are allowing now as capital in the ordinary sense, reserve and accumulated profits as at the commencement of the period. The 18th of May is the date when the original Act came into force.

Mr. MACDONALD: Is there any change in the interpretation of the word "capital"?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: This is merely an amendment to the Act. I think my hon. friend was out when I explained why it was necessary to enact this second section. We defined capital last year as including unimpaired reserve and accumulated profits. We had in mind at the time that that would mean accumulated profits at the commencement of an accounting period, but one or two firms have set up that they should be allowed to take profits every month or so during the term, and compute the seven per cent on those. A company, let us say, at the commencement of an accounting period has a certain unimpaired reserve, a certain capital and a certain amount of accumulated profits. We claim that in calculating the profits the seven per cent should be upon those three things, capital, unimpaired reserve, and accumulated profits at the commencement of the term, and this amendment is simply to effectuate the intention we had at that time. The Act will be administered accordingly.

Mr. MACDONALD: I am sure that any one who read the debates last year must have got the impression that my hon. friend was proposing taxation which would last to the end of the three year period. I think if my hon. friend will read Hansard of last year he will find that he almost expressly said that the taxation he then proposed was final for the three year period. I am very much opposed to retroactive legislation except for the purpose of correcting a manifest mistake, and while it is within the power of Parliament at all times to pass legislation remedying conditions that may have resulted from previous enactments, I am sure my hon. friend will agree with me that the wisest policy for a prudent minister to follow is to avoid retroactive legislation if at all possible. I think the minister will be bound to admit that, whether intentionally or not—and I think it was with the very best intentions—he gave the impression to the country and to the parties directly affected that the scheme of taxation he proposed last year was a finality for the three year period, so far as this method of taxation is concerned. I will not repeat the arguments I ventured to make earlier in the day, but I think the minister should have presented to Parliament a comprehensive system of taxation dealing with all the necessities of the war at the present time. Retroactive legislation such as my hon. friend proposes is not wise or justifiable legislation, and I think the minister should explain to the House why he proposes retroactive legislation of this character.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I would not regard Section 2 as retroactive. It is quite common to pass an amendment making more clear the purpose of existing legislation. No hardship will follow from this. The Act has been administered on the basis that capital includes undistributed profits as at the commencement of the term. If one were to set up the contention that under the definition of "capital" as enacted last year, seven per cent should be taken, say, on daily balances of undistributed accumulated profits, my hon. friend can see that that would be a fantastic interpretation of the Act. In statements made by companies we usually find these three items placed under the heading of liabilities: Capital, reserve, and accumulated profits, or open profit-and-loss account. These terms have well-understood meanings. They mean that there is that amount of assets not distributed to shareholders. This Act has been administered upon the basis of considering undistributed profits as at the commencement of an accounting period, as a part of capital. No exception so far as I know has been made to that. I cannot imagine that any hardship will result from this section.

Mr. MACDONALD: The minister has dealt with only one phase of the subject. He has not told us whether I am correct in my statement that he had declared that this class of people would not be called upon for more taxes during the three-year period. Certainly, the impression one gets from reading Hansard of last year, as well as one's recollection of the debate, is that the minister was not coming back to this particular form of taxation during this period. I need not quote what I have under my hand; the minister repeatedly stated that later on the necessities of the country under war conditions might necessitate other forms of taxation, but he just as clearly indicated that he was not coming back to this particular class of taxation, that he would not increase the taxes upon these people within the term fixed by this law. I think he will admit that that is the effect of his statement, and I think he should tell us why he comes back to these same people for more money instead of seeking other avenues of taxation.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The hon. member (Mr. Macdonald) raises a wider question. My statement as I made it, and as it is reported in Hansard, is clear. I stated that this tax would be limited to a period of three years; I did not say that it would not be increased. The action now taken is not inconsistent with my statement of last year. But even suppose—though I do not admit it as a matter of fact—that my statement was as the hon. member understood it, the fact remains that this is a time of war. Governments in war time must, from time to time, take such action as they deem in the public interest. Personally, I should be the first to favour giving force and effect to any undertaking that a minister might give. I did state that this tax was limited to a period of three years, and I repeat that. The hon. gentleman may ask me: is it your intention to renew it next year? My answer is: No. And for this reason—I did undertake that the tax should be for a three-year term, but I did not undertake that it should not be changed and modified. In the nature of things, at the end of this year, even if the war is not ended, we must be comparatively close to the end of it. I stated when the subject was under discussion before that a tax of this kind, while an eminently proper one for war time, is not a good taxation measure for a peace time. It is not well that there should be fear of a business tax in time of peace, because that is the time when we desire capital to flow into the country and when a severe tax on profits may injure business. That is one reason why I do not share the apprehensions of those who say that this tax is going to do the country considerable damage. No Minister of Finance desires to impose taxation, even excess profits taxation. But an excess profits tax is a very fair tax, and, if limited to a certain period so that business men may know that it is coming to an end, it does no great injustice.

The hon. member for Pictou has contrasted our taxation proposals as to the money invested in business and as to the money invested for income purposes by individuals. But he has overlooked one very important point. So far as I know, there are very few men in Canada with a capital of, say, $100,000 who derive any more than six per cent by way of income upon that capital. Now, on capital invested in business we exempt the profits up to seven per cent, and from seven to fifteen per cent all we take is one-quarter. So that, logically, there is no discrimination against capital invested in business, because the tax applies only upon excess profits in business. If we were bringing down a taxation measure which took a portion of the capital invested in business, I would be the first to agree with my hon. friend that there was a discrimination against business in favour of those who have put their capital into some other investment.

Mr. MACDONALD: But money invested in business employs labour and helps on the industries of the country, while accumulated wealth from which an interest income is derived lies inert.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I do not agree with my hon. friend there. The revenue derived from investment by men who have large incomes does find its way back into productive industry. Very often, these men are holders of bonds and shares in industrial companies. Another thing which I pointed out the other night is this: an income tax would fall very heavily upon the men who are immediately affected by it. Suppose that my hon. friend is a majority shareholder in a company subject to this tax. I need not tell him as a lawyer that the amount paid to the Government under the provisions of this Bill could be distributed to the shareholders by the directors. Does it help a company that is subject to this tax if, in addition to taxing their shareholders, I impose an income tax upon those shareholders? This is ground that we have gone over two or three times, and I am sorry to bring it again to the attention of the House, but the statements of my hon. friend from Pictou seem to call for a reply.

Mr. MACDONALD: The fact remains that in all our cities there are men who escape taxation absolutely at present. That is the complaint of the country. What does the minister say to that?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The capital in industrial companies and in business of all kinds escapes taxation up to seven per cent, and over seven per cent we take only a percentage. This excess profits tax has been criticised, but we must remember that nearly all nations are resorting to this tax, as a proper one. In England, the excess profits tax is very severe. The principle is that, being excess profits made during the war, the state must take a substantial share of it. As I say, I believe that this is a good measure in time of war, but not in time of peace. I never would think of imposing it in time of peace; let the ordinary law of supply and demand govern then. In time of peace all the things that influence that law have full force and play; but that is not true in war time, for then industries make abnormal profits; they make, it may be, fifty or even a hundred per cent where formerly they made no more than five or six per cent. It seems to me sound to take the profits of companies which profits are undoubtedly due to war conditions. I think that is a principle recognized by all the belligerent countries.

Mr. MACDONALD: I do not say that the minister should not have a business profits tax; the point I make is that he should go further and open up other avenues of taxation. In Britain the business profit taxes are only a modicum of total taxation. Taxation there reaches accumulated wealth. They have reached landed proprietors and the hereditary wealth of the country. The United States scheme of taxation, while it has business profits included in it, does not rest upon that source alone. They deal with income, with accumulated wealth and with a great many new sources of taxation, an example of which my hon. friend would have been wise to have followed this year instead of practically going back upon the position which he took last year, namely, that the proposed taxation would last for three years. He should have gone to other sources this year because the taxation which is paid by the business people of this country is so extraordinary and unusual that it is bound to create an onerous condition of such a character as will impair and interfere with industries. That is the criticism I make in regard to the policy but not in regard to the principle of the Business Profits Tax itself.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess.

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. MACDONALD: I find, on looking into the situation in the United States, that, although they are proposing to raise very much more revenue from the business profits tax, they have not attempted anything like the excessive measure proposed by my hon. friend. In the United States the taxation Bill recognizes the right of the business man, corporation or firm to have 8 per cent of revenue on the amount invested, and the former business tax involved an imposition of only 8 per cent of the amount over that. Under war conditions this year the additional taxation imposed is only another 8 per cent, or 16 per cent of the amount, no matter what it may be. That is very much less than my hon. friend proposes. Not only that, but in England the taxation is placed upon the real excess profits. My hon. friend assumes that, in war times and in peace times alike, the manufacturer has no business to earn more than 10 per cent on his investment without giving some of it to the public. In England a comparison is made between the present profit of a company and the profit made by it in peace times, and the imposition is made upon the excess which comes as a result of the war, what might properly be called war profits. My hon. friend takes no consideration of the fact that there should be a difference between peace times and war times. He taxes without regard to the difference in profits during peace and war. For that reason, I submit that my hon. friend has gone too far in his proposal. A very wise writer on this question of taxation, particularly war taxation, lays down the principle that taxation should be economically wise and should be such taxation as is compatible with the continuance of active enterprise and is calculated not to slacken the industry or dampen the loyalty or patriotism of the citizen. To that proposition no exception can be taken. But my hon. friend's proposals do not come under that proposition, and the exactions he is taking will slacken the industry, impair the prospect of capital investment, and dampen the patriotic enthusiasm of the party who is being taxed.

In regard to income tax, upon which the minister has shifted his ground several times, it would be interesting to see how the income tax proposals of the United States work out. Under the original law for the taxation of incomes which has been on the statute book for quite a period of years, no income under $5,000 is taxed. An exemption was made of $2,000 for the heads of families. Under the law of last year, September 16, for the first time and in the face of the entrance of the nation into the war, we find provision for the taxation of incomes of $3,000, and from these $20 a year is taken. From the $4,000 man, $40 is taken, and from the $5,000 man, $60 is taken. The $10,000 man practically contributes $200, and then for each amount of $15,000, $20,000, $25,000, $45,000 and $50,000 a year the amount of taxation increases gradually until the $50,000 man pays approximately $4,000 a year to the state. As the income increases to $150,000, the tax increases to $24,220 under the new law, and parties in receipt of incomes greater than that amount pay on a very much higher scale, until the man with an income of $1,000,000 pays $380,000 a year to the state. My hon. friend could very well begin taxing people who are in receipt of $20,000 a year and over. My hon. friend has failed to approach the problem of taxation for the war on a scientific basis; he is outlining no definite plan by which all parties in the state should contribute in accordance with their ability to do so. He is simply dealing with temporary expedients, the effect of which we have already pointed out. But if my hon. friend is at all prepared to consider this question, there is no reason why an income tax should not be framed for dealing with amounts lower than that if it is to be made a matter of permanent policy, and I reserve all statements in regard to what might be done under a permanent policy. I want to point out to my hon. friend that there are hundreds of men in this country, if not thousands, who are in receipt of incomes of $20,000 a year and more, and there is no reason why my hon. friend should not, through the machinery he has at hand, reach those people and compel them to pay. He could take $1,000 a year from a man earning $20,000 a year or upwards. But my hon. friend has set his face against that for numerous reasons which he has given from time to time, and the only virtue one can have in referring to the matter is to point out what my hon. friend might do which he has left undone. There is another question: My hon. friend seems to think that he should not lay before Parliament a statement of the amounts he has received from the men who have furnished data in regard to the business tax, that all data in regard to it should be withheld from the consideration of this House and the country. I am at a loss to know why that should be so. Of course, my hon. friend intimates that if we move in the House for that information he will consider what he will do, but I have to point out that in the United States that data is made public. There is no such reservation there. For instance, I find in the papers of the United States information which could only be obtained from the public records dealing with business profits there, that for the year 1915, 366,433 corporations made income returns, of which, however, 172,532 reported operating deficits. The yield of this tax assessed on corporations, on the basis of returns filed, was $51,844,422. It is estimated that the return from the additional taxation would amount to at least $200,000,000 more. If, in the great nation to the south of us, with all its ramifications of corporation work, it is not found that an injury to the public interest is caused by giving to the world a statement of returns furnished by these corporations in answer to a taxing law, on what possible basis can it be urged that we should not have the same information furnished in Canada? The consideration suggested by my hon. friend from St. John (Mr. Pugsley) this afternoon seemed to be overpowering. In the United States, the great bulk of extra money required for the war is not expected to be made from the business profits source, as my hon. friend is making it solely in Canada, but from the income source, from the accumulated wealth; whereas they expect to get only $250,000,000 from the business profits source in the United States, the estimates of the income tax run from $500,000,000 to $700,000,000.

Before these resolutions pass, therefore, my hon. friend should consider the advisability of changing his proposal in some way. It is the very reverse of scientific. It is class legislation; it will interfere with industry and with the investment of capital and leave absolutely untouched the accumulated wealth of Canada—the source from which the nation should draw in such a time as this. Hundreds of millionaires in Canada ought to be made pay. My hon. friend will have no difficulty in reaching them; the efficient tax collector who had to do with the business profits tax will look after it if my hon. friend will give him the full authority.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: In referring to the proposed United States business profits tax, my hon. friend overlooks the fact that the United States has not been at war for three years. The United States has had three years of prosperity such as she never before experienced in her history. Congress is considering a taxation measure for present needs, but my hon. friend would hesitate to predict what degree of taxation the United States may resort to before the war is over, especially if it lasts another three years. Canada has organized an expeditionary force of over 400,000 men. If my hon. friend will multiply that number by 13 they having 13 times our population he will find that a corresponding effort on the part of the United States would result in the organization of a military force of 5,000,000 men. So that in criticising the taxation measure which the Government lays before the House, the position of the United States in respect to taxation, having regard to the stage at which they have arrived in the war, is no criterion by which we should be guided. When this war broke out I did not immediately propose an excess profits tax. In August 1914, we brought down a mild measure of taxation; we raised the excise duties upon liquors, cigars and tobaccos, as well as the duties upon sugar and certain other commodities. In 1915

we raised the tariff to 7½ per cent and 5 per cent—the United States proposes to raise the tariff 10 per cent at this stage. Then we introduced the other measures of taxation with which hon. gentlemen are familiar; so that we have been progressive in our taxation measures. The action of Congress at this time, therefore, is not a criterion by which our measure should be judged or upon which we should act. My hon. friend has suggested that we should tax incomes of $20,000 and over. I am positive that if I brought in any such measure my hon. friend would be foremost in criticising it as most unjust to a limited class of individuals. He would have the tax limited to incomes of $2,000 or $3,000. My hon. friend would oppose any measure of taxation that we should bring in; it would make no difference what it was. He has one advantage over most of us, whether on this side or on the other side: he was born a partisan. Any measure of taxation, therefore, proposed by the Government would meet with the opposition of my hon. friend. He complains that we are letting the millionaires off, but his criticism this afternoon has been largely —I will not say at the instance of, but he has had them in mind—in respect of large firms or establishments that can well afford to pay this tax. The Nova Scotia Steel & Coal Company is in my hon. friend's constituency; I should not be surprised if he had that firm particularly in mind. I know Mr. Cantley well enough to be sure that he does not mind paying taxes for war purposes upon the profits of the company which, I am glad to say, have been considerable since the outbreak of the war. My hon. friend has been trying to ride two horses this afternoon, and he has not been successful. He has been saying, during the course of this discussion, that he is in favour of the excess profits tax, but he has been criticising it because he knows that there is some dissatisfaction because it is fairly severe. Why does my hon. friend not say either that he is in favour of a severe excess profits tax, or that he is not? He will not do that, because he is attempting to ride two horses at the same time.

Mr. MACDONALD: What kind of horse is my hon. friend riding?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The only horse I am trying to ride is the horse that will win this war—a war-horse. That is a pretty good steed to ride.

Mr. MACDONALD: My hon. friend is not riding it very well.

[Sir Thomas White.]

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The hon. member for Pictou is trying to ride an election horse; that is the difference. My hon. friend referred to the British tax. The British taxation measure on excess profits realized about $800,000,000—and they have six times as many people as we have. The hon. gentleman says that our tax is excessive, yet the hon. member for Dauphin said the other night: why do you not take $200,000,000 out of the manufacturers? Why does my hon. friend from Pictou not criticise the member for Dauphin? On the one hand hon. gentlemen opposite say: you are taxing the manufacturers too much; and on the other: you are not taxing them enough. I will not say that that is the attitude of all hon. gentlemen opposite, because that would be unjust, but it is the attitude of some. In England the excess profits tax is levied, as the member for Pictou has indicated, on the difference between the profits in war time and the profits over a three year period preceding the war. As a result, a number of businesses in England that were making small profits before the war broke out, due to the unsettled conditions—because tight money had prevailed for a considerable period before the war—are bearing an undue proportion of the excess profits tax. Companies that were earning from 25 to 50 per cent before the war are paying nothing or very little, whereas companies which were earning only 5 or 6 per cent and are now earning from 25 to 40 per cent, are paying into the British treasury 80 per cent of the difference.

Mr. NESBITT: Would it not be reasonable to attribute to the war the excess profits of those companies which were not earning much before the war broke out and, vice versa, to attribute to the adverse effect of the war the decrease in the profits of many companies which were doing well before the war broke out?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: That is what I think they had in mind, but in the operation of the legislation the greatest injustice results to many businesses. I have been told by business men of the highest standing that the British tax is inequitable, unjust, and unfair for the reasons given. Only the other day at Washington a representative British manufacturer who was carrying on business in a large way said: We had a run of hard luck the year before the war; we are now taxed on a tremendous scale. He complained bitterly of the injustice of the British system and said that our taxation was much fairer. I am only giving hon. gentlemen the view of some of the business men of England with respect to the business profits tax over there. My hon. friend spoke of the furnishing of information with regard to the returns. The information in respect of this accounting period will not be available until 1918. With regard to the years 1915, 1916 and 1917, personally, I should favour bringing down a blue book, giving the names of the firms and the amount of their taxation, at the ensuing session of Parliament, but the taxation returns for 1914-15 are fairly complete. If any hon. member desires information with respect to a particular industry or a firm engaged in a particular industry, the proper course is for that member to place upon the Order Paper a request for the information which he desires, and then we can decide whether or not that information should be furnished. So far as I am concerned, I believe in the fullest possible disclosure in regard to any matter in my office unless the public interest stands in the way. In the administration of any custom tax or any other tax, if this House desires information and it appears that the request on the Order Paper is not contrary to the public interest, so far as I am concerned, I would be prepared to bring down the information.

Mr. NESBITT: Did my hon. friend take into consideration in the excess profits tax that when the war is over and things go back to normal, some of those firms which are at the present time making a large profit might be affected very adversely by the 75 per cent tax in accumulating a reserve that would assist in carrying them over, I shall not say the hard times, but the less remunerative times? It would be advantageous for a good many of those firms to pile up a reasonable reserve to carry them over the dull times that we may be approaching. When the war is over and when many of those firms which are making munitions have to turn their attention once more to their former lines of business, there will be very serious times for themselves and for their employees unless they have sufficient reserves to carry them over the transition period.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I am sorry my hon. friend was not in the House this afternoon, because I dealt with that matter very fully in reply to remarks of the hon. member for South Renfrew (Mr. Graham), but I will briefly rehearse the statement which I made. In the first place the Business Profits War Tax comes to an end at the end of this year, and the present taxation proposals apply only to the last accounting period of the three year period covered by the legislation. Secondly, with regard to many of the businesses in Canada, the last accounting period has already expired, and from this period, of course, their profits are not subject to the taxation. Thirdly, the tax has been levied for a period of three years. For the first year all we took was one-quarter of the net profits over seven per cent; for the second year, we also took only one-quarter over seven per cent, and the second year was a good year for all businesses in Canada. The third year has also been a good year for nearly all businesses in Canada, and it is from that third year's profits that we are taking this increased amount of taxation. It is not as if we were taking all their excess profits; we are leaving them very substantial sums. My opinion has been that the position of most companies in Canada is pretty liquid. There are many companies, however, which have made betterments and improvements, and a good deal of the profits have gone back into those betterments and improvements and into stock. If it would be proper to consider, in connection with depreciation, a reasonable allowance where plants have been unduly extended during the war period, that might be a fair subject of consideration. I have no particular cases in view. I simply say that if a plant has been built to a great extent over what might be regarded as the normal requirements in order to handle the business of the war, that might be a subject of fair consideration with regard to the amount written off for depreciation.

Then we come to the other aspect of the case as to whether the companies will be able to raise the money to pay the tax. This tax is not due until 1918, and as I say, the Business Tax comes to an end this year, and we are not pressing any firms unduly as to payment. We expect them to pay when the payments are due in accordance with the measure which was passed by the House last year, but the penalty is not a high rate of interest, and I am quite sure there will be no ground for the accusation that the taxation has been harshly enforced upon firms that could not raise the money to pay it. That is only a question of reasonable administration. I think, therefore, on all these grounds there is no reason for apprehension that firms are going to be forced into bankruptcy. I am sure that I would be the last man to consider favourably a measure that would have that effect.

Mr. NESBITT: I have not the slightest doubt that the minister fully intends that this tax will end in the accounting periods of those firms in this year, and that this later proposed tax will apply only for this year; but my hon. friend, like the rest of us, does not control the war, and there is no doubt that after this year there will have to be revenue derived from some source to pay the expenses of the war. While my hon. friend applies the tax only for this year and while perhaps for the moment he does not intend to apply it for a further period, still he can not cease imposing some excess taxation even if the war should come to an end this year. I do not therefore, see, although he may fully intend that the excess profits tax will cease this year and the payment cease next year, how he can promise that definitely. I do not grasp that at all, because he is in the hands of powers over which he has no control. Therefore, while he may give the companies an opportunity to pay, at the same time I fear that a great hardship will be imposed on some people. Had my hon. friend seen the wisdom of reducing the amount of taxation or of making every one pay their fair share, I would have suggested to him that, if he thought seven per cent was too low an amount for firms with a capital of less than $50,000, he might increase that to a certain extent, that is, he might allow them to earn eight per cent for instance, without imposing taxation. The other night he said in reply to me that the amount that a firm with a capital of $40,000 would earn at seven per cent would not be very great, but in answer to that I would suggest that perhaps he could increase the amount that would be allowed and still at the same time collect a certain amount of taxation from every one in this country who is engaged in business and making a profit. One man has as much right to pay taxes as another. I would suggest to my hon. friend that instead of having the fifty per cent tax apply on earnings of from fifteen to twenty per cent, he should make it apply on earnings of from fifteen to thirty per cent, and make the higher rate of taxation apply on profits over thirty per cent. At the same time I would advocate that there be a spread downwards, so as to take in everybody and make the taxation as equitable as possible. I know my hon. friend says that it would cost too much to collect taxes from firms with a lower capitalization than $50,000, but I do not think it would cost a great deal to send notices from the department to people in every line of business asking them to send in a statement of their business affairs. I believe the bulk of the people are perfectly willing to pay their share of taxation, and I think most of them would send in these particulars. I do not see why there should be any excessive cost in taxing firms with a lower capitalization than $50,000.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: As I stated this afternoon, next year we shall in all probability be on the eve of peace. There is this further fact: we shall get the revenue which this measure will produce in the year 1918. I also stated this afternoon that I did not regard this excess profits tax as a good tax in time of peace, though it is a just tax in time of war. It has been adopted, so far as I know, by practically every one of the belligerent nations. It is not the intention to re-enact this measure. Another reason that I think is entitled to some weight is this: when we introduced the measure we set a limit of three years, and that understanding was acted upon by firms and companies establishing themselves here, and I therefore feel we are under an obligation in that respect.

Mr. MACDONALD: I am sorry that the good-natured criticism I ventured to make this afternoon should have provoked so much resentment from the minister. Whenever the Minister of Finance gets into trouble, he does one of two things—he either mounts his aeroplane and soars into the realm of exchange, which he talks about in a mysterious manner as if it were a science that no other member of the House could venture to think about—

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I do not feel quite certain that I understand it myself.

Mr. MACDONALD: When my hon. friend shrouds himself in the mystery of that science he thinks he has completely escaped from his pursuers. His other course is to declare that he is winning the war. Let any one criticise the Minister of Finance and if he does not talk about exchange he will at once say that he is winning the war. He was winning the war when he gave Sir Rodolphe Forget $8,000,000 for the Quebec and Saguenay railway. The Minister of Finance pretends to be an economist, but in the last four years he has spent $40,000,000 on public works and he raised the taxes to pay for these works on the pretense that the money was to be devoted to the war. These are facts about which there is no question. Then he spent $17,000,000 on the Hudson Bay railway. When hon. gentlemen on this side of the House discuss the measures of my hon. friend in a reasonable way, without acrimony of any kind, it is somewhat unusual, I think, for the Minister of Finance to attribute personal motives to us. My hon. friend should not be so thin-skinned. I think he is entirely exceeding the courtesies of debate when he calls people partisan, and suggests that they are discussing his measures for the benefit of some particular industry. The views which I put forward this afternoon were based on arguments which I had a perfect right to present to the House, and there was nothing at all personal in my remarks.

The sum and substance of the whole discussion is this: My hon. friend intends to stand by this excess profits tax. My hon. friend says that the excess profits tax is a good tax in wartime, but not in peace time. Now, if the war stops next year the tax will come off. We all wish that my hon. friend's prophecy in regard to the conclusion of the war may come true, after these long sad years of waiting, but the present outlook, which is not altogether rosy, does not give one much hope that my hon. friend has any sound basis for his conclusion. Does my hon. friend say that if the war is not over next year the tax will be discontinued?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Yes, I stated that. I also said that if the war went on and our expenditures increased we should have to resort to new modes of taxation. My hon. friend has indulged in a little chiding, and he is the last man in the House who should indulge in that. When he gets up and talks about the expenditures of this country you would think he was a political Sir Galahad. You can almost see the wings sprouting from his shoulders when he gets up and talks about the expenditures this Government has made. My hon. friend knows perfectly well that since the war broke out this Government has gone on with only such public works as were absolutely necessary, and the greater part of our expenditure on public works has been on undertakings initiated in large measure by hon. gentlemen opposite when they were in power. I have no desire to discuss these matters from a political standpoint; I allowed a question of my hon. friend this afternoon to go unanswered simply because I did not want to get mixed up in a political discussion. When the war broke out there was an enormous amount of unemployment in this country, due to the dislocation of business. Money supplies for carrying on undertakings throughout the country were shut off at their source, and there was consequently a great deal of unemployment. Would it have been good policy for the Government to shut down on all public works at that time? That would have been most unwise. The policy we adopted was to go ahead with such public works as were under way; that was good sense; it was the right thing to do, and we did it. Just as soon as business conditions improved and unemployment decreased we adopted the opposite policy.

Mr. MACDONALD: You stated this afternoon in answer to a question that you spent $15,000,000 on public works last year.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: There are works going on in this country which should not be stopped. My hon. friend has referred to the Hudson Bay railway. The hon. member for South Renfrew, when he was Minister of Railways, let the contract for the building of that road, and I cannot recollect any session since 1911 when hon. gentlemen opposite have not urged the Government to continue with the building of that road. The road has been gone on with, so far as I know, with the consent of both parties in this House.

What does the hon. gentleman suggest? Here are terminals on Hudson Bay half finished and liable to go to pieces; here are rails lying rusting and a road unfinished and not used. Is the Government to stop work upon it altogether? Is that good common sense? We had to continue the construction of that road or suffer loss. It is wise, when you have an uncompleted undertaking, to go ahead with it at all events to the extent necessary to save wastage and loss. It would have been a most foolish policy to abandon altogether the Hudson Bay road.

Mr. MACDONALD: But the Minister of Railways tells us that he contemplates stopping the construction.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: It is not stopped. True, there are only a comparatively few men on the work, as I have learned from the contractor. We have been carrying on this enterprise only to the extent necessary to prevent national loss. The great part of our public works expenditures to which the hon. member refers are expenditures on ports and harbours. In this House last year request after request was made by hon. members opposite for the construction of this grain elevator, that dock, or the other pier—all necessary public works in their opinion. What we have done is to go ahead with necessary public works.

Mr. MACDONALD: What about the Quebec and Saguenay?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Who subsidized the Quebec and Saguenay originally? It was hon. gentlemen opposite. This Government found itself face to face with an uncompleted enterprise, and had to take action. The right hon. leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) did not oppose the measure that was passed last year. He knew that the city of Quebec and the district of Quebec were interested in the completion of that road. When we talk about burdens, I will say this—that the heaviest burdens we had were in connection with railways. We had to finish the National Transcontinental and we had to subsidize other roads to carry them on, but these roads were the result of the policy of the previous Liberal Government. Since the outbreak of this war we have continually reduced the expenditure of the Dominion both on current account and on capital account. So far has that gone that the entire expenditure of the Dominion to-day, outside of the war, is less than it was three years ago, notwithstanding that there are embraced in that expenditure charges of $25,000,000 for interest on increased national debt, and pensions. We have endeavoured in every way to cut down expenditure, but it is not wise to cut down expenditure to such an extent as to impair the efficiency of the public service or cause waste in connection with enterprises already undertaken. Close down the work on the Welland Canal, some have told us. But that is a great public work which has been supported by both sides. I do not desire to enter into political controversy; there is no use in talking of the past, and political recrimination is wholly out of place at a time like this. But I felt I must say something in reply to the strictures passed upon the administration by the hon. member (Mr. Macdonald) this afternoon.

Mr. TURRIFF: The hon. minister talks about cutting down the expenditure by $25,000,000 as compared with what it was two years ago; but he did not tell the committee that even when they are cut down by that $25,000,000, our public expenditures are fifty per cent higher now than they were when hon. gentlemen opposite took office five years ago. Speaking of the Quebec and Saguenay Railway, he evidently wishes the committee to believe that the Liberal party was responsible for that enterprise. But the Liberal party had nothing to do with the sixty-five miles of the Forget railway for which the Minister of Finance is going to hand out about $8,000,000—for before he is through with it the expenditure will amount to about that. This is to complete a road that never can hope to earn operating expenses. And the expenditure is made in the middle of a war. He tries to make it appear that this side of the House were responsible. We voted against that last year.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Some of you.

Mr. TURRIFF: I know that I did; I voted against it because it was an absolutely uncalled for expenditure, wholly unjustified in any way, except politically—to put millions of dollars into the hands of a few of the minister's political friends who sit behind him, and for nothing else. It could not possibly be for anything else, for the road can not possibly pay. And as to the other two small branches that have been tacked on to the Intercolonial, with the effect of increasing the capital cost of that line, this same request had been made to my hon. friend the former Minister of Railways (Mr. Graham) and refused by him time and again. Talk about economy! When hon. gentlemen opposite were in Opposition, they were never weary of talking about the extravagance of expending $78,000,000 for the Dominion in one year, that being the highest expenditure under the Liberal Government. The Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden), then leader of the Opposition stated time and again that the mere fact that the Government of that day were spending $78,000,000 was prima facie evidence of extravagance and corruption. In two years under the "economy" of which the minister talks, the expenditure was increased something like fifty per cent. But, because they have cut down the expenditure to $25,000,000 less than the terrible extravagance before the beginning of the war, he would have us believe that this is a very economical Government. I think he will have a good deal of trouble in making the people believe that the Government is an economical one, or to conceal from them the fact that a great deal of the present expenditure is absolutely without justification.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: As to our expenditure on ordinary and capital account being fifty per cent larger than when we came into office, in the first place the statement is not correct; and, in the second place, I would point out to my hon. friend (Mr. Turriff), that which he always overlooks, that, while in 1911 the total trade of the Dominion was about $800,000,000 in two years it rose to $1,200,000,000, and now it is over $2,000,000,000. This, of course, increases very greatly the work which must be carried on in administering the affairs of the country. I do not think it desirable or necessary to deal with what the hon. member has said with regard to the Quebec and Saguenay railway. I did not suggest that hon. gentlemen opposite were responsible for the measure that was passed last year, but I cited the fact that they subsidized the railway as showing that they were interested in the completion of a road in that district. It was pointed out last year that the roadbed was falling away and the wastage in connection with it would have amounted to a great deal in terms of money if the Government had not taken over the road. As to paying Sir Rodolphe Forget $8,000,000, my hon. friend knows that statement is not correct.

Mr. TURRIFF: I said that the total cost to the Government would be in the vicinity of $8,000,000.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: That statement is not correct. The Government is buying the railway, road-bed and rails and whatever money the Government pays for that railway in expropriation proceedings will have to go to the parties entitled to it according to law. The statement that the Government is giving $8,000,000 to an individual is absolutely incorrect.

Mr. GRAHAM: I do not wish to discuss the Quebec and Saguenay now. It will come up in time and then I will discuss it very thoroughly. As with scores of other railways, the late Government granted a subsidy under the statute to a company for the building of that road. Although it was approached several times, the Government never contemplated purchasing the road, and when it failed to be a success and went to pieces because there was no traffic on it, it was not necessarily incumbent upon the Government to come to the rescue, as it was not a Government railway. However, I do not want to go into details, but I will discuss it very plainly from my point of view when the question comes up. In times of peace it would be altogether wrong to invest in it and in time of war it is an outrage.

On resolution 3:

That the tax shall be paid each year within one month from the date of the mailing of the notice of assessment.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: That is a necessary provision. Under the Act as passed last year the assessment can be made up to the first of September and the payment is due on or before the first of November. There is a provision in the Act under which the time for making the assessment may be extended by the minister, and that has been done frequently, but there is no provision for extending it from November. Many assessments for the previous year are necessarily made after November because it is not possible to get the information earlier. The result is that the Act is inoperative. As far as the date for payment of the tax is concerned, it is felt that it will make the situation more flexible and more in the interest of the tax-paying community that a period of one month shall be allowed for payment.

Mr. TURRIFF: If the United States Government carry out the proposal to put a war tax on all imports, that will naturally apply to the wheat which was made free a little while ago by the Government and the farmer will be in a good deal worse position than he was before, because 10 per cent on $2 wheat is twenty cents a bushel and on $1.50 wheat, and that is the lowest it will probably be for a year or more, will be 15 cents a bushel. Wheat previously paid a duty of only ten cents a bushel when entering the United States. I would like to ask if the Government has any intention of doing anything to counterbalance that duty on wheat going into the United States.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I do not understand my hon. friend when he says "counterbalance." What does my hon. friend mean by that?

Mr. TURRIFF: The United States purpose putting a ten per cent duty on all imports. On wheat, that my hon. friend made free, there would be a duty of ten per cent going into the United States. It used to cost ten cents a bushel to get wheat into the United States, while, if they put this duty of ten per cent on, it will cost 15 cents, 20 cents or 25 cents a bushel, and I was asking my hon. friend if the Government proposed to do anything to counteract it.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I do not know what my hon. friend means by "counterbalance" or "counteract." Does he mean: Are we going to put duties on wheat and flour on this side to counteract it?

Mr. TURRIFF: No.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I do not understand it then.

On resolution 4:

That with respect to every business liable to taxation hereunder the period for which the returns shall be made and during which it shall be liable for assessment shall be at least thirty-six months, commencing with the beginning of the first accounting period ending after the thirty-first day of December, 1914, or for such less period as the business may have been carried on from the beginning of the said accounting period to the end of the period for which the said tax may be levied under the said Act.

Mr. NESBITT: Will the minister explain the latter part of that clause, "or for such less period," etc.?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Firms that have started business since December 31, 1914, would be liable for the three years provided for in the first part of this section if the last part were not added.

Mr. NESBITT: If they started business since that time you do not expect to assess them for the full three years, but you expect their assessment to cease at the same time that the other ceases?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Yes, that is right, and therefore they would not be liable for three full years.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Their assessment would commence in May, 1916?

Mr. NESBITT: No, from the year they commence business.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Yes, for their accounting period. The reason we find it necessary to put in section 4 is that a company might shorten its last accounting period in order to avoid this tax. Although in business for the last five years, they might not be liable to assessment for the full three years unless we in-9 p.m. serted this section. They might shorten their last accounting period from a year to six or ten months, and the purpose of putting in this section is to safeguard that.

[Mr. Turriff.]

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The minister stated that this excess profits tax ceases on the 31st of this calendar year. It has been stated, and I think quite correctly, that the effect of this tax proposed in the resolution has been to discourage the investment of capital in Canada, particularly capital from the United States. That statement has been made by several hon. gentlemen, and to my personal knowledge it is correct. I know of one or two instances in which intended investments have been abandoned. If the minister's statement is correct, might it not be wise to amend the resolution by providing that the tax shall not apply to business commenced this year, or from May, 1917, or perhaps from May, 1916, or to capital investment made since that date? It might possibly encourage intended investors to proceed, provided they were assured that they were to be relieved, not from the original 25 per cent tax, but from the taxation under this resolution. The taxation provided for under the resolution is payable in 1918, and it is to be hoped that that year will see the end of the war. I make this suggestion, not with confidence that it is absolutely wise, but in the belief that it is worth considering, and that it will encourage capital investment and lose nothing to the revenue of the country.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I believe there are some cases in which extensions were about to be made and the work was interrupted on account of apprehension as to the effect of this business profits war taxation; but there was a misunderstanding which, I think, has recently been removed. I have made it clear in the budget speech that this taxation applies only to the last accounting period, the third term provided for in the legislation of last year. I do not think it is necessary to insert a provision such as my hon. friend has in mind for this reason, as I think that has become pretty well known. But, apart from that the liability to taxation under this Act, including of course this amendment which we are considering now, comes to an end on the 31st of December, 1917, by section 21 of the Business Profits War Tax Act which reads:

The provisions of section 3 of this Act shall not continue in force after the 31st of December, 1917.

In other words, we are not extending the term of this Act, and the result is that by the next session of Parliament—that is if it is held after the term of this year—the operative part of this Act, the taxation section, will have ceased and been determined; and the only operative part of the Act will be that which authorizes the assessment and permits payment in the next year. The reason why I mentioned 1918 in my previous remarks was that I wanted to show that we would have the revenue from this measure in 1918, which we are considering now, and I hoped that that would be a substantial addition to the revenues of the country for that year.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I would like a little information with respect to the administration of the Act. In the settlement of accounts with a company liable to taxation under the Act, is an allowance made for a sinking fund where there is an issue of bonds? Supposing that the trust deed provides for a sinking fund and the company pays the sinking fund to the trustee, is that allowed as a charge against the business?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I think my hon. friend will agree that so far as interest upon the bonds is concerned that would be a proper expenditure, but in the other case, the redeeming of bonds, to that extent you add to the equity of the company in the security; in other words you add to the capital of the company.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The same thing would apply to the retirement of preference shares?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Preference shares are in a different class, because they belong to the proprietor.

Mr. NESBITT: I would like to draw attention to the wording of the last part of clause 4.

> —shall be at least 36 months, commencing from the beginning of the first accounting period and ending with the 31st day of December, 1918.

Would it not be well to add "and for three accounting periods?" They might not have three accounting periods; they might lengthen their accounting period instead of shortening it.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: There may be more than three; they may have one every six months. It is better to have 36 months, as that applies to all in business since the 31st of December, 1914; and then to deal with the case of those who have been in business for less than 36 months, the last part of the section has been inserted.

Mr. MACDONALD: Does this resolution cover all that the minister is submitting in the Committee of Ways and Means? Does he expect to move the House into Committee of Ways and Means in reference to any further tariff proposals, or in respect to assisting the construction of ships in this country?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: It is not my intention to bring down any further tariff proposals at this session. Any policy that the Government may determine upon in connection with ship-building can be dealt with without taking up the matter in Committee of Ways and Means. It can be done either by legislation or, if we have power under the War Measures Act, by Order in Council.

Mr. MACDONALD: In connection with the matter of shipping, a number of the ministers have said that any one desirous of building ships in Canada could have all the orders they could handle by applying to the Imperial Munitions Board, which was acting in conjunction with and for the British Government. I should like to have it clear whether contracts for ships given by the Imperial Munitions Board are financed by the Canadian Government, or whether the Imperial Munitions Board is dealing altogether with Imperial funds.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The Board is an Imperial Board, that is to say, the Government of Canada has no control over its operations. It expends the money of the Imperial Government, and not the money of this Government. If I allowed the matter to rest there, the House would not be in possession of full information. The Imperial Government is interested in the matter of shipping, as, indeed,this and every other Government in the world is to-day, on account of the scarcity of ocean tonnage. The Imperial Munitions Board has, I believe, placed orders for some twenty or twenty-two steel ships in Canada of a total tonnage of 160,000 or more. I am speaking from memory. The result is, so far as I know, that by reason of these orders and the orders given by private enterprise in Canada, the ship-building yards of Canada are full to capacity at the present time; in fact I understand they have orders which will keep them busy until about the middle of 1918. The Imperial Government sent over a representative, Mr. Perry, to work in connection with the Imperial Munitions Board. His mission was to inquire into the possibilities of wooden ship-building in Canada; that is to say, the building of wooden ships which would be suitable for the purposes of the British Government. As the Minister of Marine and Fisheries pointed out the other night, a certain design of wooden ship had been determined upon as being the proper kind of vessel for the purposes of the British Government. I have been interested in this question of shipbuilding, and when it was brought to my attention that the question of finance lay to some extent at the bottom of activities of the British Government in Canada in the matter of shipbuilding, it occurred to me that we could be of assistance. My hon. friend a little while ago spoke slightingly of exchange.

Mr. MACDONALD: Not at all; rather laudatory.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Let me tell my hon. friend that there is more in exchange than was ever dreamed of in his or in my philosophy. I think I can say, without getting my own head or any one else's in the clouds, that the British Government can buy nothing on this continent, on account of exchange conditions, unless they get the credits or the money with which to buy it. In other words, they cannot raise the money by selling in London exchange on America, because exchange has broken down. It occurred to me that the Government of Canada could be of real service to the Imperial Government in connection with its wooden shipbuilding programme in Canada and at the same time do Canada a good turn as well, because it is much to the advantage of Canada to have these wooden ships built here. So I offered the Imperial Munitions Board a credit of $10,000,000 to be availed of as required for the purpose of their shipbuilding programme. That money is to be lent by the Dominion Government to the Imperial Government. When lent to the Imperial Government it will, of course, be money of the Imperial Government and will constitute a set-off to moneys which the Imperial Government may lend to us in England. In other words, we facilitated the financing of the Imperial Government in connection with its shipbuilding programme in Canada. I received a message from the British Government through the right hon. Mr. Bonar Law, warmly thanking us for our undertaking to finance the British Government in this respect.

Mr. MACDONALD: The Minister of Trade and Commerce, in dealing with this matter,

[Sir Thomas White.]

certainly left it very far up in the air—about as far up as the exchange problem sometimes goes. But from the explanation made by the Minister of Finance, we know that the Dominion Government is not doing anything in the matter of the construction of ships in Canada, and that the Imperial Government, through the Munitions Board, are having ships built in this country. The Dominion Government, on account of the exchange situation, is simply making an advance of $10,000,000 to the Imperial Government and has no responsibility whatever for the doings of the Imperial Munitions Board in the matter of shipbuilding. The Minister of Trade and Commerce a week ago urged the view that the Government were doing something wonderful in the matter of shipbuilding, but the Minister of Finance and his colleague have made it clear that they are not. As to the assertion that the shipyards in Canada are filled, I have knowledge of the circumstances under which a communication was forwarded to the Imperial Munitions Board some four weeks ago by a certain firm which offered to engage in the construction of wooden ships. Reply was made to the effect that all the contracts for wooden ships had been let. In this shipyard and in others which are in the course of preparation in my province, ships of this kind could be built. The province of Nova Scotia appropriated $2,000,000 for the encouragement of shipbuilding and has appointed a commission for the purpose of arranging for the establishment of shipyards capable of constructing steel and wooden ships. Mr. Norcross, who is head of the Canada Steamship Lines, and who was employed by the Imperial Munitions Board or the Government lately in connection with this matter, in an interview which he gave the public press, urged the absolute necessity of the inauguration by the Dominion Government of a policy of assisting the construction and development of a mercantile marine in Canada—leaving entirely aside the question of the building of small naval vessels.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: After the war, or during the war?

Mr. MACDONALD: Now. Mr. Norcross is a gentleman who speaks with authority and with some knowledge of the conditions. What I would like to know is whether the Government of Canada intend to take any step towards encouraging the construction of a merchant marine for Canada. The ships to be constructed by the Imperial Munitions Board will, when they leave our shores, not be under Canadian registry; they will form no part of our transportation system. Lloyd George declared not very long ago that what the Empire needed was ships, and more ships, and more ships. The United States, while working in conjunction with the British Government along lines similar to those being followed by the Imperial Munitions Board, have inaugurated a programme for the construction of wooden and steel ships in order to increase the mercantile marine of the United States, provide means of transportation for the products of that country across the ocean and obviate the difficulty which has arisen through the destruction of vessels by submarines and the consequent depletion of the world's mercantile marine. Having regard to the suggestion of the Prime Minister of Great Britain as to the necessity of obtaining ships, and of the suggestion of Mr. Norcross as to the desirability of the establishment of a Canadian mercantile marine, may I ask whether the Government purposes doing anything by which encouragement will be given to Canadian builders of steel or wooden ships? Is it the intention of the Government to take steps to secure the construction of vessels which will form part of a Canadian mercantile marine which will give Canada a means of transportation on the ocean? We have our three transcontinental railway lines to carry our products to the ocean ports, but we have no means of transportation on the sea. The ships to be built by the Imperial Munitions Board are to be placed at the service of the British authorities. This Government should not stand still and do nothing to encourage the construction of ships in Canada which would form part of our ocean transport system and act in co-operation with our system of transportation by land. Will the minister be good enough to tell me the attitude of the Government in regard to the construction of ships in Canada?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I do not agree with my hon. friend that in supplying $10,000,000 of Canada's money for the financing by the Imperial Government of its shipbuilding programme in this country, we are doing nothing. That is a very substantial assistance, and it is so recognized by the Imperial Government. I do not see why my hon. friend should minimize the importance of what we have done. It means that the Imperial Government, which is working in co-operation with our Government in the prosecution of the war and to which it is an object of the utmost importance to provide transportation in order that the people of the United Kingdom may be fed, has proceeded with a large shipbuilding programme in the Dominion of Canada. Therefore, I submit that the Government should be commended and not adversely criticised for what we have done in assisting to finance the Imperial Government. So far as I am concerned, I am usually indifferent as to whether the Government is praised or not; the main thing is to get the work done whatever it may be, and what has been done is that the Imperial Government has already let contracts to the extent of $10,000,000 for wooden ships of the kind which it requires for the purpose of assisting in the transportation problem.

My hon. friend has raised the further question of establishing a shipbuilding industry in Canada and I am very glad to have the benefit of my hon. friend's views except that they are somewhat vague as indeed are the views of most men on this very important question of shipbuilding. I have been giving the matter, although it does not come immediately under my department, such attention as I have been able, and it is very difficult to determine the course which will produce the best results so far as Canadian transportation is concerned. My hon. friend has pointed out that before the war the railways carried our produce to our ports, and he emphasizes—and I think properly—the question of the importance of ocean transportation; but before the war we had Canadian ships; the railway companies had their shipping lines, and the produce of Canada was moved without difficulty to Great Britain and the continent. At the outbreak of war and since, our mercantile fleet has been to a large extent commandeered by the Imperial Government for the purposes of the prosecution of the war, and, of course, this Government is not to blame for that. If the Imperial Government desired the shipping belonging to Canadian lines, why, they desired it for the purpose of better prosecuting the war, and so far as I know, no exception can be taken to that course. My hon. friend has raised the question of what should be done to assist the industry of shipbuilding and the transportation problems, present and future. So far as shipbuilding is concerned after the war—and that is, to my mind, an exceedingly important subject, from the standpoint not only of that industry itself, but of the collateral enterprises, such as the steel industry and other industries connected with it —I think a shipbuilding industry cannot be built up in Canada except by bounty legislation. So far as concerns the peace period after the war, if bounty legislation or the granting of subsidies of reasonable amounts would facilitate the creation of a shipbuilding industry in Canada, for my part, I would have no hesitation in saying that I would favour that course. If a shipbuilder were considering the question of establishing a large plant in Canada, I do not think he would be very much bothered as to the question of subsidy during the war, because he would know that every ship that he turned out would sell at a very handsome profit. What he would be concerned about would be the period after the war was over, as to how he would get along during that period when with his plant and fixed charges he would have to meet conditions under which his ships would not sell at the prices they would realize to-day. I have had under consideration the matter of the best plan of assisting the shipbuilding industry, but the matter is not urgent so far as concerns the period immediately following the war, for this reason: I do not believe—and I shall be glad to learn if I am wrong—that private enterprise can establish a great shipbuilding industry in Canada at this time, because of the shortage of steel plate. I read the other day a statement by Mr. Mark Workman, president of the Dominion Steel Company dealing with that phase of the question and he pointed out—I am speaking from memory and I hope I am not misquoting his statement—that it would be a considerable period before the steel plate would be available for shipbuilding in Canada.

Mr. C. A. WILSON: What about building wooden ships?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I have pointed out that the British Government is giving orders for some ten million dollars' worth of wooden ships in Canada, and I may say with regard to wooden ships that while they will serve an emergency purpose, and I think may be useful for coastal business, at the same time the transportation of the future looking to a period considerably beyond the war is bound, I think, to be largely with steel vessels.

Mr. C. A. WILSON: Is not the United States building quite a number of wooden ships for transportation?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I understand the United States is building certain wooden vessels, but when I was at Washington I learned that the wooden vessel is regarded as an emergency vessel, and it is to steel vessels that transportation interests must look after the war is over. My hon. friend raises the question whether it would not be advisable for the Dominion Government to consider the establishment of a shipbuilding industry in Canada. Many considerations arise in connection with that, and I think it is a problem which must engage our attention. There is the shortage of steel plate, as my hon. friend knows, and there is the further question of whether it would be in the interest of the country for the Government to embark in shipbuilding in competition, say, with an enterprise which is ready to take up that industry as soon as it is practicable to do so. For instance, there are in this country some large steel industries which might consider the question, under proper assistance, of establishing a shipbuilding industry. That might be the best way of dealing with the shipbuilding industry, or it might be advisable for the Government to consider the establishment of shipbuilding plants, but on account of the difficulty of getting steel plate it is almost impossible to establish a shipbuilding industry in Canada, and, as I have already pointed out, almost every shipbuilding yard in the Dominion, as far as I know, is engaged in the building of steel ships. I would not controvert what my hon. friend says with regard to yards which might build wooden vessels, but I am speaking now of the steel shipbuilding industry. I have taken the matter up with certain of the best posted men in this country, and I find an extraordinary variety and diversity of views as to the best course for the Government to take to assist the shipbuilding industry. I shall have the matter under further consideration and I am endeavouring to ascertain what is the best policy for the Government to pursue.

I can assure my hon. friend that the Dominion Government is anxious to do what it can to promote the shipbuilding industry in this country. When the Government determines upon the policy which it believes will best effectuate that purpose, the necessary announcement will be made to the House, and if legislation is required it will be brought down. That is all I feel disposed to say on the question to-night.

My hon. friend (Mr. Macdonald) referred to ships built here being retained on the Canadian register. I am sure he will be interested to know that I raised this very question with the manager of one of the leading industries in this country. I had in mind that if the Dominion gave assistance in connection with shipbuilding, one of the conditions might be that the ships so built should remain on the Canadian register and be available for purposes of Canadian transportation. I thought that would be a desirable condition, and I was surprised to learn that in the opinion of this gentleman, who is a very outstanding man in the Canadian industrial world, such a condition would effectually nullify the action of the Dominion Government in giving subsidies and bounties, because he said the shipbuilding industry required to be absolutely free to sell ships, no matter where they were to be used, in order to compete in the markets of the world. It would seem, therefore, that if the ships built in Canada are to remain on the Canadian register they would have to be built and operated by the Dominion Government itself. I do not put forward these suggestions as mature views upon the subject, but as my hon. friend has raised the question I just put these observations forward as representing my state of mind regarding the shipbuilding industry at the present time. If my hon. friend has any suggestions to make of a practical character which will help to solve this problem, and will point out the best way of increasing the transportation facilities of Canada or of building up a great shipbuilding industry in this country, we shall be very glad to hear from him. This question has not escaped the attention of the Government. In the meantime all the shipyards in this country, so far as I know, are engaged in building ships.

Mr. ROBB: When the minister speaks of subsidizing the building of ships, does he refer to ocean tonnage only or to tonnage on inland waters?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I was using the word "subsidies" generally. We should, of course, have to consider the whole situation with regard to subsidizing or giving grants, and I am not prepared to go into details as to the proper policy to-night.

Mr. MARCIL: Where are these steel ships being built at the present time?

Mr. HAZEN: The difficulty about building ships in Canada before the war broke out was due to the fact that we could not compete successfully with the British shipbuilder. No protection was given to the Canadian shipbuilder. Labour was cheaper in Great Britain, and there were other conditions that made it possible for them to build ships much cheaper over there than we could in Canada. These ships built in Great Britain, whether they were on the British or Canadian register, could be brought into Canada complete down to their smallest fittings, such as glass, china, napkins and so forth, without having to pay any duty whatever. Under the conditions existing in the industrial world before the war broke out it was impossible for the Canadian shipbuilder to compete successfully with the British shipbuilder. As a matter of fact, the vessels that were engaged in the trans-Atlantic trade when the war broke out were practically all on the British register, with the exception of the Royal Edward and the Royal George, which were registered at the port of Toronto. The Allan liners and the Canadian Pacific railway boats and practically all other transatlantic liners were British-registered vessels.

Mr. C. A. WILSON: What about the White Star?

Mr. HAZEN: There is the Canadian White Star and the American White Star. I think I am correct in saying that with the exception of the two Canadian Northern vessels I have just mentioned, all the vessels in our transatlantic trade at the outbreak of war were on the British register, and they were nearly all commandeered by the British Government for naval purposes. The Calgarian and the Alsatian of the Allan Line had just been put on the Atlantic route. They were vessels of the most modern type, and were both commandeered by the British Government. The Calgarian is now doing service as a naval vessel, having been converted into an armed cruiser. I think the same is true of the Alsatian, which is being used somewhere in the east as a flagship for one of the squadrons. I think the Empress of Britain was also commandeered for naval purposes. Both the Royal Edward and the Royal George have been used for naval purposes, and one of them was torpedoed and sunk not so very long ago. That was the state of affairs when the war broke out.

I am by no means certain that we shall have the same difficulty in competing with the British shipbuilder after the war. Wages have gone up very much in Great Britain, and I doubt if they will come down again very rapidly after the war is over. I think even without any form of protection by way of bounty or tariff, our shipbuilders will be able to compete with the British shipbuilder more easily than before the war. Our shipyards are getting on their feet, so to speak. Since the formation of the coalition Government by Premier Lloyd George a Department of Shipping has been added to the British Government, and at the head of it is Sir Joseph MacLay, one of the leading shipping men in Great Britain, and a member of one of the leading shipping firms in Glasgow. He has a most intimate knowledge of shipping. I had the opportunity when in England of having many discussions with him and with the members of his staff with regard to this very important question. Hon. gentlemen know of the tremendous shortage in shipping that the British Empire has to face. Many vessels have been torpedoed and many have been mined, and it has been found impossible to replace the tonnage from British shipyards as fast as it is destroyed. Great Britain has also been supplying tonnage to our Allies for the transport of troops and munitions. I understand that in connection with the operations at Saloniki alone, several hundred British ships are employed all the time. The result is that there is a great shortage of tonnage for carrying to Great Britain the products from overseas which are so essential not only to the comfort but to the absolute existence of the people of the British Isles at the present time. The Shipping Board under the direction of Sir Joseph MacLay are doing all they can to meet that difficulty. All the shipyards in the United Kingdom are working at high pressure, but many of them are turning out naval vessels entirely. The result is that the merchant shipping which is being turned out is not as great as the shipping which is being destroyed by submarines and mines from week to week. In discussing the matter with Sir Joseph MacLay, I expressed the belief that a considerable amount of work might be done in Canada in building ships to take the place of those that are being lost to Great Britain at the present time.

Mr. C. A. WILSON: Are we building any?

Mr. HAZEN: At present ships are being built in Canada for the British Government, under the direction of the Department of the Controller of Shipping and under the management of the Imperial Munitions Board which, in Canada, is acting for the Shipping Department of Great Britain. At present the shipyards in Canada are doing a very great deal of work building ships for the British Government, for British trade, and for certain other purposes which I cannot mention to the House at this time. This is true of the shipyard at Quebec which is controlled by Mr. George Davie, the shipyard at Montreal belonging to the Canadian Vickers, the shipyard at Collingwood, the Polson yard at Toronto, the Thor Iron Works of Toronto, the shipyard at Port Arthur, the shipyard of Messrs. Coghlan and the Wallace shipyard in the province of British Columbia, and also the shipyard at New Glasgow, Nova Scotia, of the Nova Scotia Steel Company.

Mr. C. A. WILSON: What is the highest tonnage?

Mr. HAZEN: Ships are being built in Canada to-day up to 8,000 tons. But, if my information is correct, the Imperial Munitions Board, acting for the Controller of Shipping, is desirous that the ships they shall make contracts for at present shall not be as large as that, but shall be, at the largest, in the neighbourhood of 3,000 tons.

Mr. C. A. WILSON: What is the minimum tonnage?

Mr. HAZEN: Wooden ships are being built in Canada for the British Government and under the Munitions Board. The instructions that the Munitions Board have from the British Government is, that they shall not enter into a contract for wooden ships of less than 2,500 tons. The reason for that condition I do not quite understand. I took the opportunity of making representations on the subject to the Controller of Shipping and also to the Colonial Secretary, Right Hon. Walter Long. I pointed out that there were yards in Canada that could build wooden ships of a less tonnage than 2,500 tons, but that with their equipment and in view of the difficulty of procuring material and finding men to do the work, it would be impossible in the case of many of them to build ships as large as 2,500 tons. That is a matter that has to be decided by the British Government and the Controller of Shipping, as they are the ones for whom ships are being built.

So much for the shipyards that may be called standard or established shipyards, equipped for building steel vessels or equipped for building wooden vessels. There are many other yards in Canada in which wooden ships could be built. That is particularly true, I think, of the Maritime Provinces. I am told that there are being constructed in Nova Scotia 48 wooden ships, the largest probably of 1,500 tons and the smallest of 150 tons, or probably less. These are being built by private individuals, and from what I can learn of the conditions to-day, as soon as they are completed their builders will be able to sell them at figures that will be profitable, or, if they operate and manage these ships themselves, at the present rates of freight prevailing in the world, if the ships have the luck to escape being torpedoed or submarined, they will, in a few voyages, earn enough to pay for the entire cost of construction. With the impetus given to the building of ships in Canada by the conditions arising from the war, I believe that after the war is over our shipbuilding yards and shipbuilders will be in a better position to compete with the British shipbuilder than before the war broke out, and this entirely apart from the fact that I believe that conditions will have so changed, so far as cost is concerned, that the competition will be on more equal terms.

Something has been said this evening about the conditions likely to exist after the war. From what I can learn in talking with shipping men on the other side of the water and on this side also, I believe that, even if the war should come to a close during the present year—a matter about which I entertain very grave doubts indeed —the shortage of shipping will be so great that the shipyards in Canada and Great Britain, as well as in other parts of the world, can continue for a good many years turning out ships at their utmost capacity without overtaking what the normal quantity of ships should be and what it was when the war broke out. After the war an immense deal of shipping will be required for many purposes. Suppose, for instance, that Canada has 400,000 troops overseas at the conclusion of the war, it will take a ship a day for a year carrying 1,000 men each to bring these soldiers back to Canada. There are troops from Great Britain in all the theatres of the war who will need to be brought across seas. Then transportation must be provided for all the equipment, the guns and all varied articles necessary in carrying on the war. Besides, many countries are so depleted in stocks of goods essential for the carrying on of successful business and for comfortable conditions of living that after the war there will be an enormous traffic on the seas. I am assured by shipping men, who know far more about these matters than I do, that for a long time after the war is over freights will be very high, not so high as to-day, perhaps, but high as compared with what they were at the outbreak of the war and high enough to assure to shipowners a good return on their investment. Shipbuilders in Canada are alive to the conditions that exist and expect that the result will be the development of shipbuilding in Canada.

I agree with the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) as to the desirability of having ships registered in Canada. It is most desirable that we should have a large mercantile marine of our own. The position I have taken with regard to commandeering ships is this: as to ships of British register, I have regarded it as quite proper that the British Government should commandeer them for any purpose in connection with the war; but, as to ships of Canadian register, should the British Government require these ships they should ask us for them. An Order in Council to that effect was passed soon after the outbreak of the war, and that is the policy that is being carried into effect to-day.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Do I understand the minister to urge as a matter of policy that Canadian shipbuilders be allowed to dispose of the ships they construct to Canadians only?

Mr. HAZEN: Not at all, at the present juncture. I have never urged that, and would not think of putting forward such a proposition. What I did say was that when the British Government requires ships for any purpose in connection with the war, if the vessels are of British register, in my opinion they have the right to commandeer them without regard to us in Canada, even though Canadians may be owners of shares, or even owners of the ships themselves; but if the vessels are of Canadian register, then the British Government, while they may have the legal power, have not the constitutional right, to commandeer those ships, but if they are to be commandeered it should be done through the Government of Canada.

That position was adopted by the Government. Soon after the war broke out and before much consideration of the matter, they started commandeering ships of Canadian register. We drew their attention to the matter and put our views clearly before them. They accepted our views in effect. We passed an Order in Council on the subject and now, when Canadian ships are required for naval purposes in connection with the war by the controller of shipping under the British Government, they communicate with us and ask us to com-mandeer those ships and have them placed at their disposal. In connection with the matter very great difficulties arise. We will be informed, for instance, by the British Government that a certain vessel of Canadian register is necessary for the successful carrying on of the war and for the carrying of commodities that are necessary for the life of the British public. We will communicate with the owners of the vessel in Canada where it is registered. We, in many cases, will receive protests from them against the British Government commandeering the vessel, or it will be pointed out that vessel is necessary to Canada, that it may be carrying something that is necessary for the purpose of enabling munitions factories in certain parts to carry out their contracts successfully. From time to time our department is up against questions of that sort that we have to deal with, having on the one hand the desire of every Canadian to win the war and the desire of every Canadian also to see that Great Britain is not hampered in carrying on the war by getting those products from overseas which are esssential to the people of the Mother Country, and, on the other hand, considering whether any injustice will be done to Canadian interests if we allow the ships to go. These are questions that we are face to face with every day and which cause very great difficulty.

In dealing with that matter and applying our best judgment from the patriotic and practical standpoint, a considerable number of Canadian vessels were commandeered for the service of the Government of Great Britain, and unfortunately a number of these vessels have been torpedoed, as have Canadian vessels that have not been commandeered by the British Government, and the result is that great difficulty exists in obtaining a supply of tonnage sufficient for our own purposes at the present time. There are difficulties in connection with the coal-carrying trade that my hon. friend from Nova Scotia will understand. There is the difficulty of getting sufficient tonnage to bring the coal from the mines of Nova Scotia to the St. Lawrence ports and also to carry it to St. John and Halifax. In some cases that difficulty might be met by railway traffic to a certain extent. There are difficulties also in connection with the oil vessels that are required to bring oil to Canada for the munitions works.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Will the minister say if the Government have commandeered any vessels under the Order in Council of which he speaks?

Mr. HAZEN: Yes, we have. At the request of the British Government we have commandeered certain Canadian vessels in order that they might be available for helping in the prosecution of the war and in connection with matters that were represented to us by the British Government as being essential, and in some cases vessels vitally necessary, for the prosecution of the war.

Mr. SINCLAIR: The commandeering has not then been for the use of the Canadian Government but of the Admiralty?

Mr. HAZEN: For the use of the Imperial Government to carry on the war. That is the position of the matter to-day. The subject is one of tremendous interest and importance. I have not yet heard any one in this House suggest that we should pay a bounty for the construction of vessels in Canada. I do not think that is suggested at the present time or that we should, under existing circumstances—if we have the power to do it and I think we have—provide protection by means of a tariff so as to protect us against the ship-builders in Great Britain. There is no need of that at present because practically all the yards where steel ships can be built are busy and in addition, many yards where wooden vessels can be built are busy. In Nova Scotia there are forty-eight wooden ships building.

What we are more concerned with is the question as to what the condition of shipbuilding will be after the war. The matter is deserving of the greatest possible consideration and it is receiving that consideration. Although the war is costing us a tremendous sum of money, and although I know that my hon. friend the Minister of Finance has no easy task in financing the war at the present time and has tremendous responsibilities resting upon his shoulders, yet it is a subject worthy of consideration whether or not this country should not build ships to be owned by the Government of Canada and to be operated in connection with Canadian railways across the water even though it will involve a very large expenditure and an expenditure which might be difficult to finance at the present time. These are considerations to which the Government is giving consideration at the present time and I may say that if any hon. gentleman, on this or the other side of the House, has any suggestion to make about the matter, we will be only too delighted to receive his suggestion and give it our very best consideration.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Mr. Chairman, the matter of shipbuilding in Canada is one of great interest to all who would desire to see the establishment of an industry of this character. As far as wooden shipbuilding in Nova Scotia is concerned, I think it is about in the same position that it was in three or four years ago. I would assume that in normal times about the number of wooden ships mentioned by my hon. friend the Minister of Marine (Mr. Hazen) are under construction as are being built to-day.

Mr. HAZEN: Forty-eight.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The minister states that there are only forty-eight new ships under construction in Nova Scotia and I would say that in normal times there would be nearly that number under construction. I would hardly say that he was correctly advised in saying that there were ships being built of 1,500 tons. I would imagine that the largest tonnage would be somewhere in the vicinity of 500 or 600 tons. There are a great many obstacles in the way of building ships of from 1,500 to 2,500 tons in the Maritime Provinces. I doubt if it would be practicable anywhere in the Maritime Provinces. It would be very difficult to obtain timber suitable for the construction of vessels of that size. The minister stated that it was the policy of the British Government to construct wooden ships of 2,500 tons. I think that is an unfortunate policy to adopt and I am very glad that the minister saw fit to question the propriety of a policy of that kind in England. It may be possible to build wooden ships of that size on the Pacific coast but I doubt very much if it is possible to build them in the Maritime Provinces. I speak with some hesitancy in this respect because possibly I may be in error, but I doubt very much if the wood is available. There is also the question of the difficulty of obtaining labour in the Maritime Provinces. It is at the present moment extremely difficult for shipbuilders to obtain anything like the quantity of labour required. This has been aggravated recently by visits to Nova Scotia ports by representatives of American shipbuilding yards to secure labour. I received a letter only to-day from an acquaintance of mine who is engaged in shipbuilding protesting against the fact that representatives of shipbuilding yards in the state of Maine have recently been in Nova Scotia and have been offering wages of from $6 to $12 a day. He asked me to protest to the Government against the invasion of our labour market by people from the United States. My correspondent insisted that this be prevented just as the Dominion Government were asked to refrain from encouraging immigration from the United States into Canada. Probably this will soon pass away, because I think you will find that the wooden shipbuilding programme outlined recently by the United States is an impossible one, especially on anything like the scale contemplated.

Mr. HAZEN: They have got down now to 250; it was 1,000 before.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I do not imagine that they can build even 250. If the British Government are anxious to have wooden ships constructed in Canada their policy should be a practical one, and the tonnage of such vessels should be within the capabilities of Canadian ship builders. I quite agree with the Minister of Marine and Fisheries in respect to steel shipbuilding in the future. Prior to the war I doubt if anybody could have said that shipbuilding was a practical industry to be contemplated in this country for a great number of years to come, unless very substantial assistance was granted by the Government by way of bounty toward that end, and that policy would be a very doubtful one, indeed, for Canada to embark upon. I think the situation has changed entirely. As the minister has said, it is recognized in England that production costs in that country for the future will be greatly in excess of what they were prior to the war. The wages paid to labour for British shipyards will be much greater, probably, than they were in the days prior to the war. Shipbuilding labour was not as strongly organized in Great Britain as was other labour, but, having once become accustomed to a few years of higher wages, the shipbuilding labourers are not likely to permit their wages to fall. That is the history of wages in all countries, namely, when once they have risen from a low rate they are not likely to fall back again. So it is generally expected that the cost of producing ships in Great Britain will be much higher in the future than it has been in the past. If we wish to make a start in the construction of steel ships in Canada this is the opportune moment. I doubt if it is a practical way of dealing with the matter to say that some time after the war we may consider the policy of subsidizing shipbuilding.

I think the subsidizing of shipbuilding by bounty is a very doubtful policy, indeed, and I doubt very much if we should at the present moment commit ourselves to it. At any rate, it is not necessary to pay a bounty to-day to shipbuilders in Canada.

Mr. HAZEN: Hear, hear.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: They are not asking for it, and they do not deserve it. The obstacles to-day confronting shipbuilders are the cost of purchasing the plant and equipment, and, in fact, the difficulty of obtaining a plant at all. There is a further difficulty in obtaining plates. These obstacles render it almost impossible for private capital to engage in any extensive shipbuilding programme, and it has been suggested—I have heard it discussed by prominent shipbuilders in the United States, and by some Canadians—that if the Governments of this country, provincial or federal, desired to aid shipbuilding, they should do something in the way of advancing capital to competent persons to start shipbuilding yards. A shipbuilding plant costs 100 per cent more to-day than it would in normal times, and the cost of plate is also excessive. Therefore private enterprise could hardly be expected to engage in the commencement of a shipbuilding industry in these circumstances. In respect to the securing of plate, I was advised recently that the Imperial Munitions Board or the Canadian Government had made some arrangement with the United States Government whereby some of the steel plants in the United States would supply Canadian yards with all the shipbuilding plate required for the next two or three years. There may have been no such arrangement made, but if not I think it is an arrangement which very well might be made. I think the United States Government would be quite willing, if requested so to do by the Canadian Government, to make arrangements whereby some of their plants would be at the disposal of Canadian shipbuilding yards for the purpose of supplying plate. It would not be a very large quantity anyway. If there has been no such arrangement made, and there is any demand on behalf of Canadian shipbuilding yards for plate, I think this matter might very well be taken up. I agree with the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Hazen) that this is the opportunity for Canadians to commence steel shipbuilding. If they do not do so now, they are not likely to do so for a great number of years. If a company were ready to construct ships to-day, I think beyond doubt they could readily secure contracts which would keep them going for five or ten years.

Mr. HAZEN: Hear, hear.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: And by that time they might be able to liquidate their capital investment almost entirely, so that long after the war had ended and the demand for shipping had been pretty well supplied, these companies might be able to carry on their business without a subsidy. In substance, what I have to suggest as a proper policy is this: that companies, if properly organized by men who have had experience and are willing to contribute some capital, be assisted in some way by the Government. I do not intend to suggest details of the arrangement; I prefer to simply state it in general terms. I think it would have been better for the British Government to have assisted Canadian yards in this matter in preference to asking Canadian shipbuilding yards to construct wooden ships of 2,500 tons. I think it is quite possible to equip steel shipbuilding plants and turn out 100,000 tons of shipping in a year, and it is quite possible to equip yards for that purpose inside of six months. And if a few shipyards of that capacity were started, the total tonnage they could supply in the next two or three years would be very considerable.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. BLAIN): It is my duty to point out that rule 13 of this House provides:

> Speeches in Committee of the Whole must be strictly relevant to the item or clause under consideration.

I think the reading of the rule will be quite sufficient.

Mr. EDWARDS: Mr. Chairman, in view of the fact that two or three weeks ago I ventured to make a suggestion in regard to this matter, I feel disposed to trespass on your time for two or three minutes to-night. I said then that I should like to see this Government or any Government in Canada take from the public treasury of this country $10,000,000 or $15,000,000 if necessary to build ships to carry Canadian flour—I specified that as one article—from Canadian ports free across the ocean. From what has been said in the discussion here to-night, I am more than ever confirmed in my opinion that the Government would be justified in taking that course. Both parties have endeavoured to benefit the whole of Canada by building lines of railway. It was felt that the Canadian Pacific Railway was not sufficient, that the building of another line would result in competition which would give the lowest possible rates. I believe that our railway lines can compete with those of the United States in the matter of rates for the carrying of grain from the West to ocean ports. Why is it, then, that 60 per cent or more of our grain finds its way over American railway lines to American ports on its way across the ocean? The reason is simply that tonnage is more readily found at Boston and New York than at Halifax, Montreal and St. John. That condition will be accentuated after the war is over if no steps are taken to remedy it. The time is now opportune for the Canadian Government to embark on a scheme for building ships. We need not be deterred from taking that course because of the existence of privately owned shipyards. There could not be a better time for starting than the present, because the loss of tonnage has been so great that for many years the privately-owned yards will have more than they can do. If we are justified in taking from the public treasury money to build Government lines of railroad for the transportation of produce we are justified also in taking money from the treasury to establish transportation lines across the ocean. Moreover, I believe that the produce of Canada is discriminated against by the carrying of our wheat and flour across the ocean in vessels which represent the investment of British capital. Why should it cost three or four times as much to carry 100 pounds of flour across the ocean as it does to carry 100 pounds of wheat? I believe it is because many of the British millers, who have invested their money in vessels that are carrying our wheat across the ocean, place a high rate on flour in order to discourage the manufacture of flour in Canada and to have wheat carried across for their mills. That is a circumstance which justifies Government action. I need not point out the great advantage it would be to the whole Dominion if the Government would embark on a scheme of building ships to carry flour across the ocean free. Inducement would be held out for the carrying of our wheat over Canadian lines and there would be a corresponding benefit to our Canadian railways. Two of our transcontinental lines are finding it hard to get along.

Mr. HAZEN: Would my hon. friend have only wheat carried free, or would he have everything the country produces—lumber, cheese and so on—carried free?

Mr. EDWARDS: No, I would have flour carried free, but not wheat. Wheat, however, which had been carried over Canadian lines to Canadian ports, should be transported at as low a rate as possible; I would suggest that the rate be such as to hold out an inducement for the manufacture of the wheat into flour in Canada. The advantage which would result to the stock raisers and farmers of Canada is obvious. I do not think that lumber or cheese are in the same category as wheat. Reasons might be advanced why other produce might be carried free, but they do not occur to me. This scheme would be an advantage to the stock raisers and farmers generally in Ontario, Quebec and the Maritime Provinces. It would be an advantage to the farmers of the West, for they would obtain a few cents a bushel more for their wheat. It would be an advantage to the three transcontinental railway lines and to the men employed on them. The advantage resulting from the impetus to the shipbuilding industry would be more than it is possible to express in words. There will be a great shortage in tonnage after the war is over and unless a bold and vigorous policy is followed in the matter of building ships and providing shipping we shall have to depend on other more progressive countries for the transportation of our produce across the ocean. I merely wish to emphasize what I said on a former occasion: that I will endorse the policy advanced by any party of taking from the public treasury sufficient money to build Canadian ships under the supervision and control of the Dominion Government.

Mr. SINCLAIR: I am sorry that I did not hear what the Finance Minister said on this subject, in which everybody is so deeply interested. In listening to the discussion, I was surprised to have the idea forced upon my mind that the Government is still without a shipbuilding policy. We had a discussion a few evenings ago on this subject, and on that occasion the Minister of Trade and Commerce informed us that everything was being done; that the Government had adopted a shipbuilding policy; that it was in operation and working splendidly. It appears, however, that hon. gentlemen opposite are still at sea on this important question; that they have no policy in the matter. I am sorry for this, because it is a matter of vital importance to the people that a definite policy of shipbuilding should be inaugurated. We have an example of that in the proposal made by my hon. friend (Mr. Edwards) who suggests that the Government should build ships to carry flour free across the Atlantic. I must enter a protest against that proposal. I cannot distinguish between flour and other commodities that we have for sale in so far as they would be affected by my hon. friend's proposal. I see no reason why flour should be carried free. Indeed, I am told that you can buy Canadian flour cheaper in Liverpool than you can in Montreal or Winnipeg. If that is true, it would be more advisable for my hon. friend to advocate that vessels be built to carry flour across from England free, so that Canada could get flour more cheaply. But that is a question which I think we do not need to discuss. I have not a policy ready but I have no doubt that the shipbuilding people of this country would be glad to consult with the minister in regard to this matter if he would call them together. Let me suggest to him that he announce that he is ready to do something in the way of stimulating this industry in Canada and that he is willing to meet the people throughout the country who are interested in shipbuilding, and I venture to say that he will have them call on him readily and give him their views. This I have no doubt will be of some value to him.

Mr. HAZEN: I have met many of them and I have received many different suggestions.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: So have I.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Are we to hope that any of these suggestions are to be put in force or will they go in at one ear and out at the other and nothing be done?

Mr. HAZEN: My hon. friend is a man interested in shipping and perhaps he will give us some suggestions.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: He started out to do so.

Mr. SINCLAIR: As I have stated on many occasions, all articles entering into the construction of ships should be admitted free of duty.

Mr. HAZEN: They are nearly all admitted free now.

Mr. SINCLAIR: I beg my hon. friend's pardon. There are scores of things that enter into the construction of ships that are heavily taxed.

Mr. HAZEN: My hon. friend will pardon me. He will find that the plates, the knees, the machinery, nearly everything that enters into the construction of a steel ship is either admitted free, or entitled to a drawback of 99 per cent.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Everything?

Mr. HAZEN: Practically everything.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Everything that is imported.

Mr. HAZEN: Yes.

Mr. EDWARDS: That would not be necessary on what is not imported.

Mr. SINCLAIR: I can mention scores of things that are manufactured in Canada and that enter into the construction of ships and that are heavily taxed, and there is no drawback.

Mr. HAZEN: There is no taxation on the plates.

Mr. SINCLAIR: My hon. friend can easily turn up the tariff and read a list of things that enter into the construction of ships and which are taxed.

Mr. HAZEN: I have never yet met a shipbuilder who thinks that the admittance of such articles free would encourage shipbuilding to any extent. It is a mere drop in the bucket.

Mr. SINCLAIR: I have never met a shipbuilder who did not hold a view contrary to that expressed by the minister.

Mr. HAZEN: You must have met different ones from those I have met.

Mr. SINCLAIR: You can allow these articles that enter into the construction of a ship to enter this country free of duty so that the shipbuilder will have an opportunity of securing cheap material, because at present he cannot successfully compete with the shipbuilder on the other side of the water where the articles do enter free of duty. A large quantity of paint, for example, is used in the shipbuilding trade. In England, if a shipbuilder wants to buy paint he buys the paint in the cheapest market in the world. A shipbuilder cannot get paint in Canada at the same rate as he could in the old country; he has to pay a high duty. If paint is manufactured here, the manufacturer sees that the consumer pays the duty; if it is imported, the duty is paid at the customs house. That is only one example.

Mr. EDWARDS: Following out your suggestion, why not build the ships somewhere else entirely? You would argue that the ships should be built in England or in the United States or anywhere else where they could be built at the cheapest rate.

Mr. SINCLAIR: We shall never be able to build ships in Canada unless we build them as cheaply as they can be built elsewhere or unless the Government will make up the difference in the cost. When a ship is built, it has to compete with all the world for business.

If there is a cargo to be carried, that cargo is set up at auction by the brokers in London and the man who gives the lowest bid will get the cargo. If it is a cargo of grain to be carried from the River Plate, to Liverpool, the man who will carry it for one cent per hundred pounds less than the Canadian will get it, and if the Canadian ship costs $10, or $15 a ton more to build than the ship built on the Clyde, the Canadian in ordinary times can not earn the interest on his investment. That is the experience in the past and it will be the experience in the future. This is a vital question. If you give the Canadian builder an opportunity, he will be able to compete with the world. Free material is one of the things he must have if he is going to get along at all. It is a question for the Government to consider as to how that can best be done. The raw material which enters into the building of the ships costs more in Canada than in the Old Country.

Mr. EDWARDS: How about wages?

Mr. SINCLAIR: That question has also to be considered. The Government must solve the problem of how the difference in cost is to be made up, if they are going to help out the shipbuilding industry. My hon. friend (Mr. Hazen) has said that he has met many people and that they have given him suggestions. What I would like to see is that he should put some of those suggestions into practice and give us his policy. The fact that freights are high at present and that everything is abnormal does not relieve him from the necessity of doing something. This is the time to prepare for the competition in shipbuilding that is bound to come as soon as the war is over, and the sooner that he sets about doing something, the better. I trust that something will grow out of this discussion. We have already had many discussions on this subject, but they have all ended in the same way, that is, there has been no results from all that has been said. I am glad to know that my hon. friend has adopted the suggestion that I have made to him several times in regard to the commandeering of Canadian ships. Shortly after the war broke out, I brought this matter up in the House, and I took the ground that if ships on the Canadian register were to be commandeered, the commandeering should be done by the Canadian Government. That was not done at the first; it was not done in the year 1915, although I had brought the matter to the attention of the Government on several occasions. I am very much pleased, however, to know that the Government has arrived at that decision, because it is the proper decision: that if Canadian ships are to be used in the war by the Imperial Government, if they are on the Canadian register, they ought to be commandeered by the Canadian Government. In this matter the Government have taken a step in the right direction, and I wish to express my approval. If they will examine into the question they will find it is impossible in normal times for a Canadian shipbuilder to compete with the builder on the other side under present conditions. Let us hope that the minister will call together the shipbuilders from the different districts in Canada where they are engaged in this industry, and see what can be done in order to stimulate the industry and in order to start it in places where it has not been started so far. The minister knows very well the difficulty of getting material at the present time. It is almost out of the question to build any large number of steel ships at present, because you cannot secure the material with which to build them. I do not know what the minister's plan is in regard to wooden ships; if it is to build wooden ships with steel frames and wooden planks, I suppose we could do that successfully in eastern Canada. I do not know what the plan is, and I do not think that the offers that have been made by the Imperial Munitions Board are going to help the shipbuilders very much, because, so far as I can learn, they are not as good as the terms that can be obtained from ordinary merchants who want ships for ordinary trade. I am told that the proposal of the Imperial Munitions Board is to give a small percentage of profit to the builder; that the builder who invests his capital in the enterprise and produces the ships will have them purchased from him by the Imperial Munitions Board and a small amount such as eight or ten per cent will be given him as a profit for building. The ordinary shipbuilder who has the ordinary common business ability that these people have can make a much better profit by dealing with some merchant who requires a ship.

There is nothing in the proposals of the Munitions Board, so far as I can learn, to stimulate shipbuilding very much in Canada. The fact that freights are high has done something, of course, to stimulate the industry. It is up to the Government to deal with this question themselves, and not leave it to the Munitions Board. Some policy should be framed by the Government without delay, which will establish the shipping industry in places where it does not already exist, and develop it in places where it has already been started.

Mr. MACDONALD: Does the Minister of Marine and Fisheries know where the plates are being obtained for these steel ships?

Mr. HAZEN: I do not know.

HEALS STATION RIFLE RANGE.

Mr. MACDONALD: Before we leave questions, Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct the attention of the Minister of Militia to a reply given to a question with reference to a rifle range at Heals Station, British Columbia, asked by the member for Richmond (Mr. Kyte), and answered on Monday last. The answer given was:

Sir Edward Kemp: It is not clear what rifle range area is referred to. If the hon. member will more clearly designate the property referred to, the required information will be furnished.

May I ask what more my hon. friend wants in the way of designation? Is there no rifle range at that place?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: I am advised by the officers of the department that there is no rifle range at that place. They want more definite information as to the place itself.

For a copy of the Order in Council, if any, providing that preference in appointments to the Civil Service should be given to returned soldiers.

Mr. KYTE:

McLennan to said position.

Mr. BOULAY:

For a copy of the evidence on the inquiry held by Commissioners Wigle, Barkley and Ostell upon the matter of the insults alleged to have been offered by French Canadians to soldier passing through the Province of Quebec.

CROSSING AT INTERNATIONAL BOUNDARY.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. PIUS MICHAUD (Victoria, N.B.): I wish to direct the attention of the Minister of the Interior to certain conditions existing along the boundary line between the state of Maine and my constituency. The American immigration agents are closing up international bridges between St. Leonard's and Van Buren and between Claire and Fort Kent. Canadian citizens are not allowed to cross the international bridges, or to come across on ferry boats, the operations of which are suspended at 7.30 p.m. The result is that medical doctors, who are often called upon to deal with urgent cases, are not allowed to cross by bridge or ferry. May I ask the hon. minister if this can be remedied?

Hon. W. J. ROCHE (Minister of Interior): I am not sure that this is not a matter entirely under the control of the American immigration officers. However, I will read my hon. friend's remarks in Hansard, and, if the matter is one over which the Dominion immigration authorities have jurisdiction, I will make inquiries into it.

Mr. MICHAUD: The minister must remember that these are international bridges, and that the ferry boats ply between the two countries.

PAY OF MILITARY OFFICERS.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. J. A. CURRIE: In my address to the House the other day, I stated that colonels at home were receiving $10 a day, while colonels abroad were receiving $5 or $6. The Minister of Militia made a statement in the House yesterday, in which he gave the figures of the pay of the officers of the expeditionary force. In my address I referred not to officers of the expeditionary force, but to lieutenant-colonels attached to the permanent corps, many of whom are receiving from $3,000 to $4,000 a year, but never intend to go to the war. I think the minister will admit that this is true.

COMPULSORY SERVICE—MINIMUM AGE.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. S. FRANCIS GLASS (East Middlesex): I wish to direct the attention of the House to a communication which I have just received from the Local Council of Women, of London, Ontario, and which reads:

London, Canada,
May 21st, 1917.

Dear Mr. Glass:—

I have been requested to bring to your notice a lettergram sent to the Premier from the above association, consisting of some fifteen women's organizations and membership of about 6,000, which was sent this evening, and to ask you as our member to give the request your kindly assistance and consideration. We do heartily endorse the stand taken in favour of conscription, but deem the age of 18 years too young, in the interests of our boys, both physically and morally unfitted for the hardships—

Mr. SPEAKER: Does the hon. member purpose asking the Government a question? There is no objection to his laying the ground-work for a question, but otherwise he is not in order.

Mr. GLASS: I will follow this up by a question; I have just about finished. The letter continues:

—and temptations they have to encounter, therefore pray the age will be raised from 18 to 20-21 years.

Thanking you in advance for the kind assistance we know you will give.

Yours truly,
(Mrs.) E. Yarker, Secretary.

I have a similar communication from the Current Topic Club of London. I wish to ask the Prime Minister if a communication to this effect has been received by him. We shall know when the Conscription Bill comes down what the intentions of the Government are as to the age limit.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I do not remember having my attention directed to the matter, but very likely a communication has been received. I may say that it is not the intention to make the age limit as low as 18 years. It will probably be not lower than 20 years.

Mr. SPEAKER: Questions such as that asked by the hon. member for East Middlesex are not of such urgent character as to require their being brought up on the Orders of the Day. I see no reason why such questions should not be placed on the Order Paper in the ordinary course.

PROPOSED CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT.

On the Orders of the Day.

Mr. NESBITT: May I ask the Minister of Justice whether he is going to amend the Criminal Code along the line of about a million petitions that we are all getting? I have no doubt that he himself has received several of them; I get them every day.

Mr. DOHERTY: I have not received quite a million petitions, but I have received a very large number which deal with a great variety of subjects. Will the hon. member mention the subject of the petitions to which he refers?

Mr. NESBITT: With reference to consent by young girls.

Mr. DOHERTY: The question raised by these petitions is at the present moment under consideration, and I am not in a position to give a definite answer to-day, but I hope to be able to do so within a very short period.

EMPLOYMENT OF ENLISTED MEN ON FARMS.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. E. M. MACDONALD (Pictou): I would like to ask the Minister of Militia whether or not he proposes to permit any of the soldiers at present in training in the camps in Nova Scotia to engage in farm work for the spring season. I have received some requests from the people of my county who are desirous of having their boys home for a couple of weeks and who wish to ascertain if leave will be granted if they make application. Last year permission was given. In Nova Scotia the farm work has hardly begun yet, and the desire is expressed that the boys might be given leave to assist in it.

Sir EDWARD KEMP (Minister of Militia): This year the conditions in reference to giving leave to members of the Canadian Expeditionary force to engage in farm work are entirely different from those of a year ago. Last year we had a great many soldiers in the country; this year there are not many left, and most of them have been warned to prepare to embark for overseas. We have had a few requests similar to that to which my hon. friend refers, but owing to existing conditions we have not been able to see our way clear to grant permission. The time when our soldiers are expected to embark for overseas is not very far distant, and there will be very little time for them to go on the farms. In addition, the granting of leave for such work tends to demoralize the force, and also a great deal of difficulty has been experienced because of men contracting contagious diseases, such as mumps, measles, and so on. For all these reasons we have not been able to grant leave to our soldiers, and in that respect we have laid down one rule to apply throughout the Dominion. Many of the troops at Aldershot will be going overseas shortly.

WAYS AND MEANS.

AMENDMENT BY HON. MR. OLIVER.

On the motion of Sir Thomas White (Minister of Finance) for the second reading of the resolutions reported from Committee of Ways and Means.

Hon. FRANK OLIVER (Edmonton): Mr. Speaker, before the resolutions are read the second time, in pursuance of notice given some days ago, I desire to move an amendment, but before doing so, I wish to make a statement of my reasons for moving my amendment. In presuming to discuss the Budget proposals laid before the House by the Minister of Finance, I consider the outstanding fact is that the revenues during the past year are so very much greater than our revenues have been at any other period in the history of the country. The revenue raised during the year ended March 31, 1917, was $232,000,000, an increase of $60,000,000 over the revenue of the previous year and of $100,000,000 over the revenue of the year preceding last year; that is $100,000,000 more than was ever before collected from the people of Canada at any time in our history excepting last year. This is a sufficiently startling fact to warrant very close and careful consideration. If this enormous increase in the national revenue came in the ordinary way as the result of improved trade and increased development, then it would certainly be a matter for very great congratulation. If we had doubled our development as we have doubled our taxation, then as a country we certainly should be congratulated; we should certainly congratulate ourselves. But if we have doubled our taxation without increasing our development, then I am of the opinion that the circumstances call for very serious consideration and for anything but congratulation. As a matter of fact, at the present time, if we look through our cities, either in the East or in the West, there is no evidence of development; the situation is entirely the contrary. If we ask our working people— and it is the condition of the workingmen that is the real index of the prosperity of the country— we find from end to end of the Dominion complaint as to the conditions prevailing at the present time. If we look at our basic industries of fishing, lumbering, mining, agriculture, I have not seen in the returns the evidence of that increased development that, if it formed the basis of increased revenue, would be a matter for congratulation. If the conditions which I have set before the House are facts, it is desirable that we should inquire how it is that we have taken from the people such an enormous amount of taxation when there has not been amongst those people any corresponding development of the basic industries of the country.

The answer is that this enormous revenue has been possible because of the absolutely abnormal conditions, conditions brought about by the war, which must cease with the ending of the war; and the hope of every one is that those conditions will cease at the earliest possible moment. If we have not increased our taxing power as the result of development and the expansion of enterprise, when the happy day of peace comes we shall necessarily find ourselves with a burden of taxation which we shall have no adequate means of bearing. The Minister of Finance has been congratulated on the lucidity of his statements, and on his success in directing the financing of the country. If the business of Canada is of the same nature as a great financial or industrial enterprise, the minister is certainly entitled to all the congratulations he has received; but in my humble judgment the conditions are not at all parallel. If the manager of a bank, let us say, is able to declare a satisfactory dividend to his shareholders, and if the financial standing of the bank is good, it matters not to that bank, or at all events to the credit of the manager of the bank, what has happened to other financial institutions throughout the country. But the financing of our country is an entirely different matter. It is a matter of detail whether or not we have met our expenditure out of revenue this year. If we have not, then of course we can criticise the Minister of Finance. But the important thing is the financial condition of the country at large, whether the people of this country are in a position to carry the burdens that are now being imposed on them. Even more important is the question whether they will be able to carry the burdens that we know beyond question must be imposed upon them in the future. It appears to me that the question for consideration by the Minister of Finance and by this Parliament is not so much whether to-day we are able to balance expenditure by revenue, as to know whether our course has tended towards enabling our people to carry with greater ease the burdens that are now imposed upon them and the still greater burdens that must be imposed upon them later on.

We are raising to-day $232,000,000 from our people, and, as I have said, this enormous amount of revenue is made possible by the present abnormal conditions. The war has enhanced the price of our products, and has caused the establishment within our borders of tremendous industries engaged in the manufacture of munitions. These industries have given high wages to a number of our people, and thus have made possible the raising of this large amount of revenue. But if our basic industries of agriculture, mining, lumbering and fishing are not expanding, or if, as a matter of fact, their expansion is being restricted and they are being dwarfed by reason of the method of financing our country, then it is our business to draw attention to that fact and to attempt to secure as far as possible a change that will tend to permit, if not to encourage, the development of those basic industries upon which we must depend for our national revenues and for our standing as a state when the war is over. It is to that point I desire to direct the attention of the House and of the Minister of Finance.

We must levy an enormous burden of taxation in order to meet in any reasonable measure our present requirements. In comparing the system of taxation in Canada with the system in Great Britain, I find that in Great Britain, which shows an equally enormous increase in national revenue during the past year, 60 per cent of the total revenue of the United Kingdom was derived from the taxation of excess profits and the taxation of income and property, and only 22 per cent of the total was derived from customs and excise. In Canada we have raised 6½ per cent of our revenue from the taxation of excess profits. We have taken not a cent from income or property, and we have taken 69 per cent from customs and excise. I therefore arrive at this conclusion. If we are to judge by the experience of Great Britain we are not levying our taxation to the best advantage. We are taking too much of our taxation from customs and not enough from wealth and excess profits. I conclude that Great Britain is able to do as she is doing, as she has done and as she will do in the future, very largely because of her system of getting the bulk of the taxation from wealth and profits incidental to the war, and not from the poorer people; whereas in Canada, 69 per cent of our $232,000,000 comes from customs and excise, and 6½ per cent from excess profits. I am told that we have had $1,500,000,000 worth of war orders in Canada since the war began. We must allow also for the enhancement of the value of our products. If out of this enormous increase of wealth-production in our country we are able to derive only 6½ per cent of our total burden of taxation, I am compelled to say that the burden of taxation in Canada is absolutely inequitably distributed; and that it is in large measure because of that inequitable distribution of the burden of taxation that we find that lack of development of our basic industries of which I speak. If we do not develop these basic industries during the war, I tremble to think what the financial condition of Canada will be when the enormous war contracts are cut off and we are compelled to depend upon our ordinary trade, not only for our ordinary expenditure, but for revenues to enable us to bear the enormous extra burdens that necessarily will rest upon our shoulders by reason of the war.

In 1914, the year when the war began, we added to our previous burden of taxation special taxes amounting, as estimated by the Finance Minister, to $14,000,000. These taxes were levied in large measure upon the most intimate necessities of life, such as sugar and coffee, so that the burden of that taxation rested, in much the largest proportion, upon the shoulders of the poorer people. In 1915, the Finance Minister estimated that the increased taxation imposed by him in that year would yield $35,000,000. Part of it was in the form of direct taxes, and part in the form of a level increase of seven and one-half per cent in customs duties. This latter really meant an increase of one-quarter in the tariff burden that had been carried by the people of Canada up to that time. This burden was not adjusted to circumstances, or to the different classes of people who had to pay it, but was a level increase of one-quarter in all customs duties. This increased the burden upon the common people, those of less means and greater requirements, in immensely larger proportion than upon the people of larger wealth and less proportionate requirements. During the past year, the burden of taxation was increased by an amount which the minister has estimated at $12,500,000. This was in the form of a tax imposed upon excess profits. It is not in the same class with the seven and one-half per cent tariff increase or the special tax on necessaries levied in 1914. It can only be considered, however, as an addition to the general burden of taxation. It has not the special demerits of these other taxes of which I speak. On the whole, we find that in the three years the Finance Minister has increased the tax burden upon the people of Canada, according to his own estimate, to the amount of about $60,000,000. Strange to say, that is almost the exact amount which he estimates he will be able to pay for war expenditures out of the revenues of this year.

Now, if this $60,000,000 of extra taxation were the only additional burden that the people of Canada had to carry, they are wealthy enough, they are industrious enough, to be able to carry it without very great hardship—although I still maintain that, owing to the inequality of its imposition it is made unduly and unnecessarily heavy to be borne. In looking over the Labour Gazette, published by the Department of Labour, I find estimates of the cost of the weekly food supply for a family of five at different times. The estimate has increased from $6.95 in 1910, to $10.45 in 1917—in round numbers an increase from $7 to $10.50, that is $3.50, or fifty per cent. If there are a million and a half of families in the Dominion of Canada, this increase would mean that besides the $60,000,000 of additional taxation that the Government is levying upon the Dominion of Canada, the people are bearing an additional burden of $275,000,000 in the increased cost of living as compared with 1910.

Mr. BURNHAM: Is that money going out of the country?

Mr. OLIVER: No.

Mr. BURNHAM: How then can the people be bearing an additional burden?

Mr. OLIVER: Because they are, that is all.

Mr. BURNHAM: It is only changed from one shoulder to the other.

Mr. OLIVER: They have to pay the money. The people who are getting the money are not complaining, but the people who are paying it, and there are more people paying it than getting it. For instance, the Davies Packing Company have $2,800,000 worth of food products in their storage, and the people who buy it have to pay for it. But the Davies people are not complaining.

Mr. BURNHAM: I understood the hon. gentleman to speak of the people as a whole.

Mr. OLIVER: I am speaking of the people in the large majority. The statement of the Minister of Finance on increased taxation, and the statement of the Department of Labour on the high cost of living, indicate that the people of Canada are paying approximately $330,000,000 a year more than they were paying in 1910. I do not consider it remarkable, under these circumstances, that there is not a satisfactory development of the basic industries of the Dominion. I call the attention of the Minister of Finance to these facts with a view to suggesting to him that, instead of heaping up taxation without regard to its incidence, it is certainly for him to study the conditions and adjust the burden of taxation so that it shall be in accord with the ability of the people to bear it.

Naturally, Mr. Speaker, being from Western Canada, the conditions as applied to that part of the country appeal to me more directly than the conditions in other parts. May I be pardoned if I occupy a few minutes of the time of the House in dealing with the conditions there particularly? Whatever may be said of the great natural resources of Canada, its mines, its timber, its fisheries, or whatever else may be counted, it is admitted now that the great resource of Canada upon which the development and the greatness of Canada as it is to be must necessarily depend, is to be found in the Prairie West. In the thousand miles of fertility lying between the Red River and the Rocky Mountains, and in the development of that fertility and bringing it into a state of productiveness, will Canada find her greatness. So, it is a matter of deep interest to every citizen of Canada, wherever he may live, to know whether development is progressing in that part of the country or not and if it is not, why, and what can or may be done to improve or increase that development. The facts, shortly, are that in the Prairie West, in 1910, according to the Census and Statistics Monthly, there were practically 13,000,000 acres of land under cultivation. In 1911 there were 16,500,000 acres of land under cultivation, an increase of 3,500,000 acres as compared with 1910. In the year 1912 there were 18,318,000 acres under cultivation, an increase of 1,750,000 acres over 1911, and in 1913 the area under cultivation was 18,398,000 acres, an increase of less than 100,000 acres over the previous year. In 1916 the area under cultivation was 19,910,000 or an increase of 1,500,000 acres over 1912, a period of four years. We have an increase of 3,500,000 from 1910 to 1911, an increase of 1,750,000 acres from 1911 to 1912, and an increase of 1,500,000 from 1912 to 1916. To use a favourite expression of the Minister of Finance, the slackened development in the Northwest synchronizes with the application of his financial policy to the affairs of this country. I am bound to conclude that there is a most intimate connection between the two circumstances.

If I may be permitted to deal with a feature of this development that is not directly connected with the tariff but which is, I submit, most intimately connected with the Budget, that is to say with the development and revenues of the country, I would like to mention this fact. We have heard a great deal about the price of wheat that prevails at the present time and it is largely understood that the farmers of the Prairie West are practically holding up the rest of the Dominion and the British Empire in the matter of foodstuffs, particularly wheat. The Prairie farmer is supposed to receive $3 a bushel and the price of flour in the Maritime provinces is, I think, $15 a barrel as a result. The suggestion is that the Maritime province man is paying $3 a bushel to the Prairie farmers. As a matter of fact, the wheat crop of last year, except a few million bushels, left the farmers' hands at a maximum price, so I am credibly informed, of about $1.75 per bushel. That was the utmost he got and it ran down from that to possibly $1.30 or $1.20 —a good price, a price that was satisfactory to the farmer at the time, and he is certainly not complaining about it. Because of that price he is doing everything he can to extend his farming operations. The price of $3 a bushel for wheat is the price that fixes the cost of a barrel of flour in the Maritime Provinces and the farmers did not get the difference between the $1.75 and the $3. That was the result of market manipulation. As a result of market manipulation on the officially estimated amount of 70,000,000 bushels of wheat of last year's crop in dealers' hands, not in farmers' hands, and acquired by the dealers at a maximum of $1.75 a bushel, somebody pays a bonus to somebody of $70,000,000 and over, and the Maritime Province man who has to pay $15 a barrel for his flour is helping to pay that $70,000,000.

Mr. THOBURN: Are the consumers in the Maritime Provinces paying more for a barrel of flour than they are paying for a barrel of flour in any other country in the world?

Mr. OLIVER: I could not tell my hon. friend anything about that; I can only tell him that the farmer got $1.75 for his wheat, that the man who bought it was selling it at $3 and over, and that it was the selling price of wheat that fixed the price of flour.

Mr. CURRIE: Will the hon. gentleman tell the House the amount of grain in the hands of farmers on the first of May, when the $3 price obtained?

Mr. OLIVER: No, I cannot, nor can anybody else.

Mr. CURRIE: I notice that hon. gentlemen from the West are always clamouring for cars to move out the grain and claiming that the farmers in the West have not been able to get their grain out.

Mr. OLIVER: Nobody can tell how much grain there was in the farmers' hands at that time. There may have been much or little, but we know what was in the dealers' hands and we know how much that grain appreciated in value. And we know that that appreciation is what fixes the price of flour, and that the farmer does not get it. If I am within the rules I wish to carry this matter a little further, and perhaps my remarks may be slightly aside from the Budget discussion; but when $70,000,000 are in question and when the people of Canada are paying their share of that $70,000,000, they are entitled in this House of Commons to any information that they can get on the subject. It is an abnormal condition, it is a tremendous addition to the burdens carried by the people of the country, and they are entitled to know something about how it occurs that such burdens are being carried. To follow the suggestion of my hon. friend from Peterborough (Mr. Burnham), if the farmer got the $3 and the Maritime man paid the price for this flour, the money would be in the country just the same; but when the farmer does not get it and the Maritime man pays the price for the flour, then the farmers, at any rate, are interested in knowing who gets it and how it happens.

Mr. BURNHAM: Is it not a fact that on analysis of the statistics of the United States Congressional Board that was appointed for investigating these very things, also of the Minnesota Board and the New York Board, and of the Fruit Associations of Georgia, Alabama, Tennessee, Florida, California and Oregon, also of the Wheat Boards of Kansas and the Northwest, it has been ascertained that the farmer, allowing for the steadiest possible conduct of the trade in agricultural products, receives only from 57 per cent to 61 per cent of the final price of the grain after it has been manufactured?

Mr. SPEAKER: I regret very much to have to intervene, but the rule is that the discussion should be relevant to the resolution, especially on the second reading, and I would ask the hon. member to bring his remarks to a close as conveniently as possible.

Mr. OLIVER: I should think that very probably my hon. friend is correct. While I made my apology, I would ask your consideration, Mr. Speaker, because in the conclusion of my argument I want to assure you that the point I desire to make has the most direct possible bearing upon the condition of the revenue of this country, present and future, if that would bring me within the rules of the House.

Mr. SPEAKER: If the hon. member directs his remarks so as to make them relevant to the question, he is in order.

Mr. OLIVER: I wish to assure you, Mr. Speaker, that on the conclusion of my argument it will be found that I am absolutely speaking to the point; though it may seem that in laying the foundation of my remarks I am somewhat aside from the question. It is obvious that, if the consumers of Canada are paying an abnormal price for the first necessity of life, and the producers of that necessity of life in Canada are not receiving that price, an undue advantage is taken of the consumer on the one hand and of the producer on the other, and that the burden militates against the ability of both producer and consumer to carry on the ordinary affairs of life. The question of grain prices in western Canada depends largely upon transportation and manipulation, and when the exigencies of transportation can be turned to account by those whose business is manipulation, as they are systematically turned to account, then all the people of this country, both producers and consumers, suffer, and the well-being and the welfare of the country, and the revenues of the country, suffer correspondingly. Last fall, in the province of Alberta, served by three competing railroad lines, there was a grain embargo for a considerable period on all these lines, the Canadian Pacific, the Grand Trunk Pacific and the Canadian Northern. Those who are familiar with the conditions will know that when a railroad is unable or unwilling to transport the farmers' grain to the market, the result is a depreciation in the price of his grain. That must be obvious. And I am saying here in my place in Parliament and on my responsibility as a member, that in the earlier part of the last market season, 1916, those three railroad companies refused to haul grain from points in Northern Alberta. I am not saying anything about the rest of the country, I am speaking of what I know. And because they refused to haul that grain, the price of grain to the farmer was seriously depreciated. From time to time during the market season the newspapers have noted that one railroad company or the other, and frequently the three, had placed an embargo upon the transportation of grain to Fort William or to Minneapolis. They were willing to take the grain of Alberta to the storage elevators in Calgary or Moosejaw or Saskatoon, but they had placed an embargo upon the transportation of grain to Fort William or Minneapolis.

4 p.m.

I wish to draw the attention of the Minister of Finance, the Minister of Railways, and the Government of this country to the fact that, so far as I know, last season was the first season in the Dominion of Canada, or in the British Empire, when railways simply set the common carriers law of Britain at defiance, to the detriment of the farmers of the West in the price that they received for their produce. In the season of 1915 there was a very large production, and it was not possible for the railroad companies to carry that grain forward as it would be desired. They therefore placed embargoes, so-called, upon the carriage of grain. But these embargoes were of necessity. The embargo of last year, on the other hand, was not an embargo of necessity; it was an embargo of defiance of the rights of the people of Canada, a defiance with the authorization, I believe the active authorization, and knowledge of this Government. By no other means could it have been effected, We have in Canada three transcontinental railroads——that is, if the Government has not already torn up the rails of one or two of them. The Transcontinenal Railway was built for the sole purpose of providing an all-year-round market for the grain of the western farmer by giving him an all-rail haul to an open ocean port all the year round. The grain there, would not be held back in interior elevators under the control of professional manipulators, thus depressing the price to the farmer and making possible an increase of the price to the consumer. The interior storage elevators at Moosejaw, Calgary and Saskatoon were used last winter for the express and sole purpose of enabling the manipulation of grain prices.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Were held by whom? Who were the manipulators? I do not follow my hon. friend.

Mr. OLIVER: Those who manipulated the grain prices were able to hold quantities of grain in the interior elevators, thus keeping down the price to the farmer, while holding the grain against the eastern buyer. I repeat that that was the only purpose that these elevators were used for last winter. There was no shortage of rolling stock for the carrying forward of that grain as it should have been carried forward. No condition warranted the refusal of the railroad companies to carry the farmer's grain to any point that he wanted it carried to. It is the first time in Canada's history that a railroad company has dared to take that position. Certainly no railroad company ever dared to do it under the administration of the preceding Government.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Did the Railway Commission not order the railways to take the action which they did take? I do not follow my hon. friend's argument.

Mr. OLIVER: The Railway Commission must have consented to it.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Does my hon. friend seriously suggest that the members of the Railway Commission were engaged in a conspiracy with the grain manipulators to prevent the farmers from sending their grain forward to the markets of the world?

Mr. OLIVER: I am not making accusation against anybody; I am making a statement of facts. The Railway Commission, the Government and the railway companies can divide the responsibility among them, as suits themselves.

Mr. CURRIE: Was it not better for the farmer not to be allowed to sell his grain last fall at $1.75? Was it not better that he should have to hold it until this spring, when he is getting $3 for it?

Mr. OLIVER: Surely.

Mr. PUGSLEY: What about the consumer?

Mr. OLIVER: Of course the farmers would have won if they had been able to keep that 70,000,000 bushels. But they were able to keep only a trifling portion of it; the 70,000,000 bushels were taken out of their hands by the manipulators.

Mr. CURRIE: How could they take it out of the farmers' hands? They had no power.

Mr. OLIVER: Because this good Government built convenient storage elevators in which they could hold the grain at their convenience. It was said that this grain was not carried to Fort William because there was no storage capacity at that place. The returns of the Department of Trade and Commerce, however, show that the number of bushels of grain in storage at Fort William in October was 9,000,000; in November, 14,000,000; in December, 12,000,000; in January, 21,000,000, and in March, 23,000,000, whereas the capacity of the elevators is 41,000,000 bushels.

Mr. CURRIE: Is it not a fact that the bulk of the storage at Fort William is owned and held by the Grain Growers' Grain Company? Why did they not give accommodation to the farmers? Why did they not ask the farmers to bring the grain there for storage?

Mr. OLIVER: I know nothing about the Grain Growers' Grain Company; I do not know why they did not do as my hon. friend suggests. I am telling the House what happened to the farmer, and how it happened.

Mr. CURRIE: Why did the Grain Growers' Company not help them out?

Mr. OLIVER: The farmers of the West expect the Government to exercise in their behalf the authority which they possess. I am drawing the attention of the Government to these facts, and the Government, I am sorry to say, does not seem to be very sympathetic or receptive.

Mr. SCHAFFNER: Are not the farmers of the West entitled to store their grain in these interior elevators?

Mr. OLIVER: They are, if they want to.

Mr. SCHAFFNER: Would that not be exactly the same thing as storing it in Port Arthur? I do not see any difference. They did not have to sell.

Mr. OLIVER: If I want to ship my grain to Fort William I have a right to ship it there. When the railway company says to me: we have put an embargo on the shipment of grain to Fort William; we will take your grain to Saskatoon, but not to Fort William—I say that that is trespassing upon my rights. Further, that trespass is committed in somebody else's interest; it would be nonsense to argue anything else.

I have been referring to the enormous burden laid upon the people by reason of the appreciation of $70,000,000 in the price of grain. This increase was made possible because of the holding back of the grain. There was no reason why the grain should not have gone forward, because ample facilities existed for that purpose. This country has put hundreds of millions of dollars into the construction of railroads for the purpose of facilitating the transportation of grain. One of these railroads has for years been under the absolute and direct control of the Government. Held back, therefore, in the interior elevators or at Fort William, this grain was made the subject of manipulation against the interests of the farmers—and somebody gets $70,000,000 to which he is not entitled. Certainly the farmer does not get it. If the crop of the prairie West were carried forward from day to day to the Atlantic seaboard, as it can and should be carried forward, such stupendous manipulation of prices as took place last year and as has taken place in other years would not be possible. All that the farmer has asked is that he get the Liverpool price. Under present conditions the man in Liverpool ought to get his wheat at the price at which the Canadian farmer sells it, plus carrying costs and charges. When we permit a condition under which $70,000,000 is taken from the consumers, whether in Canada or in England, we are certainly not properly appreciating our responsibilities. The railroads have been built for the purpose of carrying the grain, but we refuse to use them for that purpose. When such abuses as this occur it is desirable that the country should know who is responsible.

If we find a lack of development, or a failure to develop, we must put the responsibility where it belongs; we must let it be known that it is because the money that was paid for that wheat did not go to the producers of the wheat to enable them to expand production, to increase development, and to increase the ordinary and regular revenues of this country, so that instead of having stagnation we would, to that extent, have development amongst our own peoples, or our Allies and friends in England would get their grain at a lower price.

The question of railway transportation is of enormous importance; it is as important as the tariff question; but the tariff question is the one that is most intimately associated with the resolutions before the House, and I desire to move an amendment to those resolutions having relation to tariff matters, believing that the time has come when it must be apparent to every man, no matter on what side of the House he sits, or what particular faith he professes, that we are in this country pursuing a fiscal policy that is absolutely to the detriment of the country, and that is liable to lead to the financial ruin of the country when the present abnormal conditions give place to those of ordinary life. We shall find ourselves then with the tax-paying power that we had before the war of $120,000,000 to meet interest charges on a total debt of $1,000,000,000. That is an impossible situation, and there must be some other recourse; we must devise some other means of increasing our development in order that we may increase our revenue, and we are not increasing our development under the fiscal policy that the Minister of Finance has imposed upon this country in the past five years. I believe we cannot expect to increase our development under that policy and the time has come to change that policy, to give our policy another direction that will lighten the burden of taxation upon our people and that will increase our opportunities for the development of the country, as the only means whereby we shall ever be able to carry the enormous burdens that are being laid upon us.

I will say just another word in regard to this matter. Having in view the enormous obligations that we must necessarily take upon ourselves in connection with the war, I must point out that the Government have not taken cognizance as they should of that fact in cutting down the ordinary expenses of the country. What is the answer when the Government is criticised for expenditure? Why, they say: We are spending only a little more or a little less than we did last year; we are spending only a little more than we did a few years ago. When this country is going behind at the rate of half a billion dollars per year for war purposes, is it a time to make comparison with what we did in time of peace? Is it not a time to enter upon a policy of economy in regard to ordinary expenditures such as was never thought of in time of peace? This Government do not seem to know that a war is on or that war conditions have to be met. So long as they can borrow money, they are satisfied to spend in any way that is convenient to them. The expenditure of Canada was about $120,000,000 in 1911, when there was no war, and when the country was enjoying a very high measure of prosperity. In this past year we have spent, if I understood the minister correctly, in the neighbourhood of $150,000,000 on current and capital expenditure exclusive of pensions, interest on war debt, and war expenditures, that is, we have spent nearly $30,000,000 more on ordinary accounts than we spent in the year 1911. When we spend more in a year when we are facing a war debt of over $1,000,000,000 than we spent in a year when we were enjoying the highest prosperity and when a war was absolutely unthought of, I submit that under those circumstances the Government are chargeable with absolute neglect of duty and lack of recognition of the terrible circumstances in which the country finds itself. While I urge upon them a policy of economy in the matter of expenditure, I desire to place before the House certain suggestions in regard to a change of tariff policy that, may and I hope, will meet the support of our friends on the other side. I desire to move, seconded by Mr. Carvell:

That all the words after the word "that" be struck out and the following substituted therefor:

"In the opinion of this House it would be in the public interest if the Customs Tariff Act were so amended as to provide:

1. That wheat, wheat flour, and all other products of wheat be placed upon the free list.

2. That farm implements and machinery, farm tractors, mining, flour and saw-mill machinery, and repairs for same, rough and partly dressed lumber, illuminating, lubricating and fuel oils, cement and fertilizers be added to the free list.

3. That staple foods and food products (other than wheat flour), domestic animals and foods therefor, be admitted into Canada free of duty when coming from and being the product of, any country admitting like Canadian articles into such country free of duty.

4. That substantial reductions be made in the general tariff on all articles imported into Canada, excepting luxuries.

5. That the British Preference be increased to fifty per cent of the general tariff."

In regard to the different items of this amendment, may I speak in regard to item No. 1? I am speaking for myself as a representative from the West, and in regard to item No. 1, the position that I would desire to see the House take is this: In the Prairie West we are producing the great basic food products of the world. We are producers of that product for export, as well as for home consumption. In eastern Canada there is no great production of wheat, but it is in eastern Canada where the bulk of our population is situated, where there is the greatest amount of industrial employment, and where the cost of food, and particularly of flour, the basic article of food, is the most important matter in the economy of the worker's family. Those who think with me are prepared to see that basic product admitted into Canada free of duty without regard to the action of any other country; that is to say, in order that our fellow citizens in eastern Canada may have bread as cheap as we can give it to them, we are willing to produce the wheat irrespective of the duties imposed against it by any other country.

Mr. BURNHAM: Does the hon. gentleman think that the free importation of wheat would greatly lower the price of western wheat?

Mr. OLIVER: I do not know whether it would or not; I am not arguing that. I am merely stating the position we take.

Mr. CURRIE: Do I understand that the hon. gentleman proposes to put coal on the free list too. It takes coal to make bread as well as flour.

Mr. OLIVER: It takes salt and water and elbow grease, and a lot of other things too. One thing at a time. My hon. friend and I are moving this particular item of the resolution on the principle that as this is our basic product, as it is the basic necessity of our fellow-citizens in eastern Canada. We desire to show good faith in our demands for a lower tariff by asking that this article be placed absolutely on the free list without regard to the duties levied upon it by any other country. Having taken that position, we then ask our friends of eastern Canada to consider this; that in producing wheat in competition with the whole world, which is our position, we must use machinery in very large degree, that without machinery we could not produce the wheat in quantity or at a price, that our wheat fields are situated in the heart of the continent, that our haul to the sea-board is longer than that of any other export wheat producing area in the world, that we have that handicap to overcome. We must have machinery in order to produce in quantity, because unless we produce in quantity we cannot produce at a competing price. So we ask our friend in the east to go so far with us as to give us these articles of basic necessity in the production of wheat free of duty, and as cheaply as they can give them to us.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Why did my hon. friend not place these articles on the free list when he was a member of the late Government?

Mr. OLIVER: I really fail to see what that has to do with the case.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I am merely asking a question. If my hon. friend does not choose to answer, all right.

Mr. OLIVER: I am sorry to say that I cannot answer it. I do not think it has anything whatever to do with the case. I may point out this, however: When the late Government was in office the production of the Prairie West was increasing at the rate of from 1,000,000 to 3,000,000 acres per year. Conditions were to that extent apparently satisfactory. To-day, under present conditions, production is not increasing, and I think it will appeal even to my hon. friend that under those circumstances, what might not have been necessary six years ago might be very necessary to-day, as it certainly is.

Item No. 3 reads:

> That staple foods and food products (other than wheat flour), domestic animals and foods therefor, be admitted into Canada free of duty when coming from and being the product of any country admitting like Canadian articles into such country free of duty.

That is a simple statement of trade for trade. We believe that the principle is sound when applied to the basic necessities of life. We believe that both east and west in Canada stand to benefit by that proposal, and that no part of Canada stands to lose.

Ws ask that substantial reductions be made in the general tariff on all articles imported into Canada excepting luxuries. We are asking the minister to reverse his policy. His policy has been to pile taxes upon taxes, to put tariff increase upon tariff increases, to hamper trade and increase the burdens of the people. We have shown him that under his policy there has not been that development of our basic industry which the country needs and we ask him to change his policy, not because this is our policy, but because it is in the interests of Canada that there shall be a change in policy.

Finally we ask that the British preference be increased to 50 per cent of the general tariff. It may be suggested that the British preference is a jug-handled arrangement—that we give, but we get nothing. I maintain that we do get, and we get for everything we give. I read just to-day that a careful calculation of the effect of the British preference upon our imports shows that it has lightened the burden of taxation upon the Canadian people by over $5,000,000 in 1910, by over $8,000,000 in 1913, and I think by nearly $8,000,000 in 1914. I submit that any feature of our tariff that lightens the burdens on our people to that extent is an advantage to us. The British preference is not something that we are only giving; it is something that we are taking for ourselves, and I maintain that an increase of that preference to 50 per cent would be a still further benefit to ourselves. And if it should be a benefit in any degree to the people or the industries of the United Kingdom, are we here to object to that? When we get our share of the benefit, surely we are willing that they should have theirs.

Mr. SPEAKER: I have considered the amendment of the hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver). May's Parliamentary Practice, 12th edition, p. 495, says:

> An amendment to the question that a resolution (from the Committee of Ways and Means) be now read a second time, must be relevant to a matter contained in the resolutions that await a second reading.

The subject matter of the resolution is the imposition of taxation upon profits, and the resolution has to do with that subject only. The amendment of the hon. member (Mr. Oliver) has to do with the general question of the tariff. It is, in my judgment, not relevant to the resolution and therefore not in order, and I so rule.

Mr. OLIVER: Do I understand you, Mr. Speaker, to rule that my amendment is not in order?

Mr. SPEAKER: I have ruled that it is not in order.

Mr. OLIVER: May such an amendment be moved at any stage of the proceedings?

Mr. SPEAKER: There will, I think, be other opportunity.

Mr. W. A. BUCHANAN (Medicine Hat): I have not occupied the time of the House in this debate up to the present time, but I wish to go on record in favour of the ideas advanced by the hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver), not because they are ideas that are favoured very strongly in western Canada so much as because I believe they are of national advantage. We must remember that we are here representing all parts of Canada. I do not want any legislation to be passed in this Parliament that would be of injury to Canada as a whole. At the same time, I want to see the part of the country from which I come given proper attention by this Parliament, and legislation adopted that will be helpful in the development of that section of the Dominion, and advantageous, at the same time, to Canada as a whole. I think I can advance some reasons why the tariff should be reduced, and certain articles placed upon the free list, because—

Mr. SPEAKER: I regret to be obliged to interrupt the hon. member. If I properly apprehend his remarks, he purposes addressing himself to the subject matter of the amendment of the hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver). That amendment I have ruled out of order, and consequently the remarks of the hon. member would not be in order.

Mr. BUCHANAN: I will try and meet your wishes as best I can, Sir. The taxation proposed by the Minister of Finance in his Budget speech follows lines with which I do not agree. In my opinion we should reach everybody in this country with forms of taxation properly adapted to that end; at the same time, I believe, that we should relieve the great body of the people from taxation as much as possible. In the West, from which I come, there is a continued demand for relief from some of the burdens of taxation that now exist, and that demand is inspired by a desire to improve the conditions of the farmer of the West and of the western people as a whole. We want to increase production in that country. We want immigration into western Canada to be increased; we want contentment to exist among the farmers of the western prairies. And we believe that the best way to increase immigration, to develop our resources, and to bring about contentment is to relieve the farmers from some of the burdens of taxation that now exist and to adopt other means of raising our revenue. Efforts have been made by the Government to increase production. You cannot increase production by taxing the implements of the farmer. Let me quote an instance from the city of Lethbridge. During the present year about 200 tractors were purchased by farmers in that district, usually through agents in Lethbridge. These machines are to be used for the purpose of increasing production at the call of this Government. In their efforts to increase production the farmers had to pay $60,000 in duties on these two hundred tractors. I say that is unfair to the farmers of western Canada. I have a letter here from a farmer in my own constituency. I do not say I am in favour of all the arguments advanced, but the letter will give some idea of the obstacles the farmer in the West has to face and of the ways in which, according to the opinions of those farmers, there obstacles should be dealt with:—

> If the Government is going to set the price of wheat, let them take off the duty on farm machinery and regulate the price of farm labour. Labour is $70 per month and board, where we formerly paid $35 for the same thing, and nobody knows what it will be by the day at harvest. Engines are so high we cannot afford to have them. I have a case of ourselves. We want to get an Aultman-Taylor 18-36 engine. It costs in the States $2,400; in Canada, $3,600. Is that right? They claim the duty and freight make up the $1,200 difference. Now, if the Government are going to tell us at what price we shall sell our wheat, let them take off the duty on all our engines and implements and regulate the price of farm labour.

The farmers are paying these exorbitant taxes on productive implements, and at the same time they are urged to be loyal and to increase production. I think it is generally the opinion of the people of western Canada, and I know it is the opinion of the organized farmers there, that our system of taxation should be changed so that we should raise most of our revenue by other methods. They are in favour of an income tax, they are in favour of a land tax and so am I.

I am in favour of an income tax because I believe that is the fairest method of raising the revenue. Under the present system very many men escape taxation who should not be permitted to do so. During the war we are endeavouring to raise money by compelling corporations to pay higher taxation but we are not getting at people we should get at and those are the wealthy individuals of this country. It has been my experience during patriotic fund campaigns in the southern part of Alberta to find some of the greatest shirkers with regard to patriotic giving to be men of the very greatest wealth. These men are not only shirking patriotic giving but they are not contributing the amount of taxation that they should. The only way they can be reached is by a form of income taxation. In the city of Calgary it was almost impossible to reach one of the wealthiest property owners for the first two years of the patriotic fund campaign or to get a cent from him for any patriotic purpose. That man was not being reached by the taxation of this Government as he should have been reached.

I am in agreement also with the agitation in favour of a land tax. We want the lands that are to-day undeveloped in western Canada developed and we can only have them developed by making the speculators who own them release them at a fair price and not hold them for a large advance. We can force them to release that land by imposing a tax on all undeveloped land.

We, from the West, come before this House frequently and advocate certain changes in the form of taxation. As a western representative I want to say that I do not want any taxation to be adopted by this country which is unfair to any other part of the country. In the minds of eastern men, on account of their association day in and day out with the industrial life of the East, there is the idea that the East would suffer if in any way industries were affected by a different form of taxation, or if there were greater freedom of trade, or a reduction in the tariff. But, they should get in touch with the conditions as they exist in the West. Many members of this House, members of the Government I know, have visited western Canada in recent years but most of their visits have been to the large and populous centres of the West. How many of them have gone out and visited the farmers in their prairie homes? How many of them have come into actual touch with the conditions that the farmers have to face in western Canada? I am afraid that not one member of the Government knows the things that the farmers have to face. If the members of this House got into touch with the conditions that the farmers have to face there they would be more liberal in their views towards the claims that the western farmers are presenting here, through their press and through their organized bodies and more sympathetic with them.

We must adopt some policy that will relieve the burden of taxation upon the farmer especially where the farmer is taxed so heavily on his productive implements. We must do these things to increase production, to add to our immigration and to bring about contentment amongst the people of the West. You know, Mr. Speaker, I am quite sure, that the cheaper the articles of production are, and the cheaper the cost of living may be, the stronger is the appeal to people to come and settle in this country or any other country for that matter. We want to have conditions that will appeal to people to come from other lands and settle in western Canada and help to develop our as yet undeveloped resources. That is one reason, and a very strong reason, for the views which we have been presenting in this House from session to session. I find the sentiment growing in the east in favour of a change in the present method of taxation. I find a newspaper of the standing of the Financial Post calling attention to the fact that there is a great sentiment in favour of the lowering of the tariff and the raising of revenue by other means. I will read just a paragraph from a recent issue of that paper dealing with the Budget recently brought down by the Minister of Finance. The Financial Post says:

> On the other hand, the decision in favour of free wheat is an admission of the growing strength of the low tariff element, and that element must be recognized to a greater extent in the future than in the past.

That is not from the Grain Growers Guide, that is not from a western publication, but it is from a strong financial journal in eastern Canada which supports protection through and through. It says that the sentiment in favour of a low tariff is growing, it gives as an evidence of the strength of that sentiment the action of the Government in putting into effect free wheat and it says that the Government must pay attention to this particular agitation. Then it goes on to say

> This brings the country face to face with direct taxation as a practical solution of raising the heavy revenue which will be required in the future during the period of liquidation of the war debt. This would seem to suggest income tax. Sir Thomas White avoids it, but there is reason to believe that he—or his successor—will in the future employ it.

We must pay attention to the opinion which exists, and which is increasing not only in the East but in the West, that we will have to raise revenue by different means from those which we have employed in the past when this war is over. We will have great obligations to meet and we will have to meet them, but we cannot meet them by increasing the tariff because if we do we will have an absolutely prohibitive tariff. If we increase the tariff we will discourage production and immigration and Canada will be in a worse position in the future than it has been in the past. So, we must resort to other means. The present system of taxation as proposed by the Minister of Finance has its good points and it has its bad points, but it will only last for the period of the war. As I understand the position of the Minister of Finance, it is that he objects to bringing into effect an income tax because it will be difficult and costly to operate, but I am of the opinion that if he is in his position as Minister of Finance when the war is over he will have to adopt an income tax and he will have to adopt the principle of direct taxation. That will be necessary and we might as well face the fact at the present time. Let us abandon the policy of increasing the tariff because it is unfair. It is favouritism for the few, and it is a burden for the many. Let us adopt a tax that will compel the people of this country of moderate and large means to contribute their share to the cost of maintaining the Government of the country. It is my view and I believe it will be the view of this Parliament in a very short time, that we must come to direct taxation in order to meet our obligations. Those of us who have had experience of larger markets in western Canada know that they have been to our advantage. One thing I would like to see provided for by the Finance Minister is greater accessibility to the markets lying alongside of us. The Government has gone as far as to provide an entry for free wheat into that country, but we want that enlarged because we have found that when we have had an opportunity to enter that market in other cases it has been to the advantage of the western farmers.

It is not my intention to say more on this subject than to emphasize my belief as a western member that the changes in our method of taxation which I have suggested would not be injurious to any other part of the country. I want at all times to take that stand; I want to be a member of this House always standing for national unity. And remember this, that we in the West have been criticised in times past—it even has been insinuated that our people were disloyal, that they were advocating things not in the interest of Canada or in the interests of unity or of our attachment to the Empire. But no part of this country, from the Atlantic to the Pacific has done its duty as have the western provinces since the war commenced. Those who have gone to the front were the very men who were called disloyal in times past because they favoured some methods of taxation that were not considered to the advantage of interests throughout the length and breadth of this country. I say that, knowing what I say. There have been men who have come to this country from other lands, who have left Alberta and gone to the front, men who it was said owed allegiance to other lands rather than to Canada; but some of these men left Alberta with every one of the contingents, and some of them have given their lives for the Empire. They are true Canadians. There is just as strong a patriotic spirit in western Canada as in any other part. We have proved it during this war, and we will continue to prove it until the war is finished. I ask this House, I ask the men who represent constituencies east of the Great Lakes, to try and become acquainted with those conditions they will become more liberal in their views toward the demands of the people of western Canada. It is only by a policy of give and take in this Parliament and this country that we can expect unity to exist between East and West. It is only by a policy of give and take that this can be attained, and I am prepared to favour a policy of that kind in order to have unity, and at the same time to relieve what I believe to be some of the burdens of the people of the West.

Motion agreed to, and resolution read the second time.

SUPPLY.

PROPOSAL TO AMEND THE CUSTOMS TARIFF.

On the motion of Sir Thomas White that the House go into Committee of Supply:

Mr. OLIVER: Before you leave the Chair, Mr. Speaker, I desire to move formally the resolution placed in your hands.

Mr. SPEAKER: Mr. Oliver moves in amendment:—

That all the words after the word "that" be struck out and the following substituted therefore:

In the opinion of this House, it would be in the public interest if the Customs Tariff Act were so amended as to provide:

1. That wheat, wheat flour, and all other products of wheat be placed upon the free list.

2. That farm implements and machinery, farm tractors, mining, flour and saw-mill machinery, and repairs for same, rough and partly dressed lumber, illuminating, lubricating and fuel oils, cement and fertilizers be added to the free list.

3. That staple foods and food products (other than wheat flour), domestic animals and foods therefor, be admitted into Canada free of duty when coming from and being the product of any country admitting like Canadian articles into such country free of duty.

4. That substantial reductions be made in the general tariff on all articles imported into Canada, excepting luxuries.

5. That the British preference be increased to fifty per cent of the general tariff.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Do I understand that my hon. friend does not intend to speak on this amendment?

Mr. OLIVER: No.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: In order to meet the wishes of the hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver), I thought it advisable that the remarks which I purposed making upon the second reading of the resolution should be made upon this amendment, which he now moves on going into Supply. My hon. friend, in the course of his remarks this afternoon, traversed a very wide field indeed. In many ways it was one of the most amazing speeches I have ever heard in this House. There is one thing for which I am really obliged to him, and 5 p.m. that is that he did not accuse the Government in general, and myself in particular, of having been the cause of this war. He certainly attributed to us most of the consequences that have flowed from the war, so far as Canada is concerned. My hon. friend, in the course of his remarks, dealt with the situation existing in the West, and, as I understood him, he seriously suggested that the Board of Railway Commissioners, presided over by Sir Henry Drayton, was in conspiracy with wheat manipulators in Canada, or in Canada and the United States. I think that was the most amazing statement I ever heard in this House. My hon. friend did not make it in express terms, but undoubtedly that was the inference to be deduced from his remarks. I need not say that it is not my intention to answer any such argument on the part of my hon. friend from Edmonton; it requires no answer. Knowing the character of the Chairman of the Railway Commission of Canada, who was called upon last winter to meet the most trying conditions of traffic that have ever affected the Dominion, owing to the war and to the movement of munitions and supplies in Eastern Canada, the members of this House will not for one moment credit the statement of the member for Edmonton that the Board of Railway Commissioners were actuated by any other considerations than those of the public interest and the public welfare.

There is another matter to which both my hon. friend from Edmonton and the right hon. leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) have referred on more than one occasion. My hon. friend from Edmonton referred this afternoon to the fact that we have taken up rails on the Grand Trunk Pacific or National Transcontinental railway, that this Government has torn up the rails of these railways and has had the temerity to send them to France. Well, that is true. But why have we taken such action? We have taken it at the express request of the Imperial Government, who need those rails in order to carry on their operations at the front. I have never been more surprised with regard to any statement made in this House in the course of my experience within its walls, than to hear the leader of the Opposition and the member for Edmonton, by implication, blame this Government for tearing up 100, or 200, or 300 miles of rails on the Grand Trunk Pacific or the Canadian Northern railway to send them forward at the request of the Imperial Government in order that they may be laid behind the lines to bring up munitions needed at the front. I am amazed that any responsible member of this House should blame the Government in any way for the action taken at the express request of the Imperial Government.

[Sir Thomas White.]

Mr. OLIVER: The minister says "taken at the express request of the Imperial Government." Did the Imperial Government ask this Government to tear up the rails of the Transcontinental railway?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The Imperial Government requested this Government to furnish 300 miles of rails.

Mr. OLIVER: Hear, hear.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Without the slightest hesitation we said: We will find the rails.

Mr. OLIVER: Sure.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: How did we proceed to find them? We asked the Chairman of the Railway Commission to determine which rails should be taken up.

Mr. GERMAN: Is it not a fact that at least 200 miles of rails of the Hudson Bay railway at Port Nelson are not in use, and will not be in use for some considerable time?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I am not sure as to that, but I imagine there would be great difficulty in getting these rails down, because the Hudson Bay railway is not completed.

Mr. PUGSLEY: You could get them down by water.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: My hon. friend knows the difficulties of navigation. The fact remains that responsible members of the opposition, including the right hon. leader of the opposition, criticised the Government for taking action asked for by the Imperial Government on account of high imperial necessities.

Mr. OLIVER: No.

Mr. MACDONALD: Not at all.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: How did the Government proceed? When the request came for rails, the Government did not hesitate for a moment. So far as I am concerned, I would take up half the rails of Canada if they were required at the front. We asked the Chairman of the Railway Commission, a judicial body commanding the implicit confidence of this House and of the Canadian people, to determine from what sections of Canadian railway lines the rails required could be taken. We have acted on their advice, and the rails have gone forward. These rails may be of sufficient importance to determine the issue of battles, or even the destiny of the Empire. I am not in the slightest degree overemphasizing the importance of steel rails at the front; I defy any man to deny their importance. One thing that has been brought to the attention of this Government and of individual members of the Government who have been at the front is the supreme necessity for steel rails behind the lines, in order to send forward the munitions necessary to win battles under conditions of modern warfare and ultimately to end this war. I hope that we shall hear fewer complaints against the Government for taking the action that we took.

Mr. MACDONALD: Why did you not take rails from the Quebec and Saguenay railway?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Mr. Speaker, I have the floor. I say, then, that we took this action at the request of the Imperial Government with a view to furnishing means of communication behind the lines. What other position could the Government have taken? Whom should we have asked to advise us as to the railway lines which could best spare rails?

Mr. OLIVER: The Canadian Pacific Railway have a double track along the north shore of Lake Superior which is not in use.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I have no doubt that the Chairman of the Railway Commission is just as well aware of the lines along the north shore of Lake Superior as is my hon. friend. I have no doubt that the Commission took the whole position into consideration and that the conclusion they reached was actuated by only one motive, that of taking action with due regard to transportation conditions in Canada and to the high Imperial necessities to which I have referred.

My hon. friend seriously suggested this afternoon that the Government of Canada, or the Board of Railway Commissioners, were engaged in a conspiracy with manipulators in Winnipeg or Chicago for the purpose of preventing the farmers of the West from getting out their grain. Did any hon. gentleman in this House ever hear such a suggestion as that? He says that the farmers of the West got only $1.75 a bushel for their grain and that somebody got $70,000,000. What impression will the public obtain from that argument of my hon. friend? The impression will be created that the farmer had been paid only $1.75 a bushel for his grain; that somebody had bought that grain at $1.75, held it until the price reached $3 a bushel, and then sold it all at a profit of $70,000,000. But my hon. friend overlooks the infinite number of transactions that take place on exchanges, at Winnipeg, Minneapolis, Chicago. He suggests that by connivance on the part of the Government some individuals have stepped in and taken the difference between $1.75 and $3 a bushel for the grain. I appeal to the common sense of members of the House as to whether my hon. friend had the slightest vestige of reason or logical argument to support the contention which he put forward. The argument has only to be stated to be refuted.

My hon. friend this afternoon made the Government responsible for all the consequences of war. I opened my remarks by congratulating ourselves that the hon. gentleman had not so far—although I do not know what he will do to-morrow or next week—charged the Government with responsibility for the war itself. He may endeavour to transfer the blame from the Kaiser to this Government or to the Minister of Finance, who is humbly endeavouring to do his duty in this great crisis. My hon. friend referred to the fact that we had a revenue this year of $100,000,000 more than we had in 1915, and he said that was no subject of congratulation. Well, I think that it is a real subject of congratulation; it means that the credit of Canada has been maintained. My hon. friend overlooks the fact that of all the belligerent countries at war, with the single exception of the United States, the credit of Canada stands the highest. Would our credit stand as high as it does if our revenues were the same as they were in 1915? We have taken such measures since the war broke out as have increased our revenues to $232,000,000. We have paid all current expenditure, all capital expenditure, all increased interest charges, and all pension charges, and in addition have paid $60,000,000 on account of the principal of our war expenditures. My hon. friend says: You deserve no credit for that; there is no cause for congratulation in that fact. What, then, would call for congratulation? Upon what set of facts or conditions could congratulation be offered? I venture to say that any country of the world in which this financial statement was presented would say that Canada had done well. And they are saying in New York and in London that Canada has done well. The highest tribute has been paid to the financial methods employed by this country since the war broke out, which are recognized as being of a most scientific character. They are saying this in Canadian financial circles and among the public generally; the only place where it is not being said is among hon. gentlemen opposite. I am content to take the judgment of London, of New York and of the financial and business community and the general public of Canada, even as against the criticism of the hon. member for Edmonton.

My hon. friend says that there are no evidences of development in cities, and he suggests that the Government does not realize that we are at war. What does my hon. friend expect of a country at war? Does he expect to see buildings going up, when the price of material is 50 or 60 per cent higher than it was in times of peace and when the prices paid for labour are as high as they are at present? Take the city of Toronto as an example: every house, so far as I know, is rented at a good rental. Not much building is going on, because the energies of the country are directed to the prosecution of the war—and this is true not only of Canada, but of the other allied nations as well. Is this Government to be held responsible because real estate booms are lacking in the cities of Toronto and Montreal—engaged, as we are now, in the greatest war in history? Is that a fair argument, I ask my hon. friend? He says that agriculture is not developing. He says: you had a certain acreage under cultivation in 1911, an increased acreage in 1912, a diminished increase in the acreage of 1913, and, at present, a diminished increase in the acreage under cultivation in the West.

What would you expect with a war on calling for the man power of the country, with 400,000 men in this country called to the colours? I want to say to the hon. member for Edmonton and to every other hon. member and to every man in the country that, notwithstanding everything that can be said, this Government and, in particular, the people of this country deserve the greatest possible credit for the mighty effort which they have put forth in this war. In Canada, over 400,000 men have enlisted. What would be the corresponding effort in the United States which has thirteen times our population? The corresponding effort on their part would be the enlistment of 5,000,000 men. We have raised those 400,000 men in a country geographically as large as Europe and with a population of 8,000,000 people of diverse nationalities. That has been the effort of the people of this country under the administration of this Government, and there is absolutely no room for national self-depreciation. I say that to all times it will be a matter of pride on the part of the people of this country that Canada, in the three years of this war, has put forth the mighty effort in men that she has put forth.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Why then, do gentlemen on the other side encourage people to say that Canada is in default?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I say more than that; I say that what has been done in Canada since the outbreak of the war, financially, commercially and agriculturally has been nothing short of a miracle. Let us see what the condition was. Up to the time of the outbreak of war Canada had never floated a loan of more than £6,000,000, and that in London, and she could not at that time have floated a loan of $5,000,000 in Canada, and what have we accomplished? We first asked the people of this country for a loan of $50,000,000, and they offered us $100,000,000; we next asked them for a loan of $100,000,000, and they gave us $200,000,000, and last March we asked them for a loan of $150,000,000, and the response was over $250,000,000. What does that indicate? My hon. friend says that there is no development in Canada. He says: You have not made any advance financially, commercially or agriculturally. Could this country, not having advanced financially, commercially and agriculturally, have found the money for these loans? If my hon. friend had looked at the returns of the savings banks, he would have found that during this war this country has added at least three or four hundred million dollars to the savings of the people in our chartered banks. In addition to that, as I have said, we have floated those loans, and more than that, we have arranged through the Government and the banks of this country for a credit of some $250,000,000 to the Imperial Government for the purpose of furnishing munitions so urgently required at the front, and in that way our industries have helped to win this war. My hon. friend speaks of the crop in the West of 1911 and the crop of to-day. Does my hon. friend seriously put forward the view that the crop of 1911 was as valuable as the crop of this year, of last year or of the year before? My hon. friend has overlooked the fact of the value of the crop. I know that war conditions have brought about the high prices of wheat and other commodities, and I said so in my Budget speech, but I cannot understand why my hon. friend puts forward the view that the Government is blamable in any way. If conditions, financial, commercial and agricultural, are not as they ought to be in this country in time of war, what would my hon. friend have them to be? Our people have increased their savings deposits in the banks; they have subscribed those loans to the amount of hundreds of millions of dollars, all sound finance, not carried by the banks, because the people have bought the securities which we issued to them. Our farmers to-day are enjoying prosperity, I believe, without parallel in this country. The western farmer is more prosperous than he has ever been. I was speaking not long ago to the general manager of one of the greatest banks in Canada, and he told me that of all parts of Canada in which the deposits had increased, the greatest increase was in Western Canada. I rejoice in that fact. My hon. friend spoke as if he had a monopoly of interest in the western farmer. I want to tell him that not only the western farmer, but the eastern farmer and the agriculturists generally throughout this country, are recognized by us to be at the very basis of the prosperity of this country, and this Government have shown more interest and have done more for the farmers of this country since we have come into power than the Government to which my hon. friend belonged did during the whole fifteen years they were in office. My hon. friend has the temerity, from his seat in the House this afternoon, to charge this Government practically with having erected internal storage elevators for the purpose of enabling the manipulators to fleece the western farmers. I have heard some extraordinary statements put forward in this House, but I rubbed my eyes this afternoon when my hon. friend made that statement. This Government established internal elevators at the points which my hon. friend mentioned for the purpose of serving the farming communities, and I believe they have served the purpose for which they were designed. But my hon. friend has said that some speculators have some grain in those elevators, and he suggests, although he did not say so, that the Government had erected them for the purpose of fleecing the western farmer, and, therefore, I suppose, he is objecting to the continuance of those western elevators. That is a most amazing statement put forward by my hon. friend. He has said: Your Budget shows Canadian trade to the extent of $2,000,000,000, but that is not real trade; you must remember there has been a great production of munitions and the prices of commodities of all kinds have gone up. That is so, and I so stated in my Budget speech.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Then it must be so.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I will not say it must be so, but it is very strong evidence that it is so if I said it.

Mr. PUGSLEY: That is what I was attempting to emphasize.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I am sorry I would not be able to pay quite the same testimony to my hon. friend.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I will not mind that.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: If I made that statement it is very strong prima facie evidence that it is true. My hon. friend said: You have nothing to congratulate yourself on the fact that you have a total trade of $2,000,000,000. Why not? Is it not real money? Before this war broke out the balance of trade against Canada was between two and three hundred million dollars a year. That whole situation has since been reversed, and in terms of money. The balance of trade to-day is in our favour to the extent of $400,000,000. The point I make is that if our exports are worth more money the people have that money. My hon. friend seems to hold the view that if the prices of commodities are higher than they were in normal times there is no advantage derived from that by the producer. But that, I believe, is not the case. Therefore, as I have stated, the argument of my hon. friend that the country is not to be congratulated upon its increased financial strength, upon its increased international trade and upon the increased value of its production generally, must fall to the ground. When this war broke out members of this Government, including myself, impressed upon the people of this country the necessity of production, more production and yet more production. That necessity has been continually drawn to the attention of the people of Canada, and I am happy to say that they have realized that necessity, and I think they would have realized it quite apart from the admonitions we gave them. But we did impress upon them the value of production, more production and again more production, and I believe it is by increasing production and by the exercise of national economy and national thrift that Canada, notwithstanding the war and the consequent increase in her national debt has been able to accomplish what I have mentioned to the House.

My hon. friend speaks of the tariff. He wants the tariff revised downwards. He has no belief in the tariff. He wishes to supply the revenues of this country by direct taxation. The inference from the remarks of my hon. friend from Edmonton and my hon. friend from Medicine Hat is that we could practically do away with the tariff and raise all the money that is required for the expenditure of this country by direct taxation.

Mr. OLIVER: I understood the minister to say that I and the hon. member for Medicine Hat had taken the position that there should be no tariff. I think the minister will find that that statement is not borne out by what I said.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Possibly my hon. friend did not say that there should be no tariff, nor do I recollect that I said he said that. I said that my hon. friend has no belief in the tariff. He brings forward a resolution for the revision of the tariff downwards. But his utterances in this House to-day and for a long time past go to convince me that he would rather the revenues of this country were raised by direct taxation, and that we practically had no tariff at all. Let me say that no matter how desirable that might be to my hon. friend we need not seriously consider it, because we simply could not raise the money that is required for the purposes of the Gouvernment, unless we had the tariff. The tariff is the main-stay of the revenues of this country, and must continue to be so, so far as I can see for an indefinite time to come.

We were speaking yesterday about income taxation, and my hon. friend from Medicine Hat has referred to it again to-day. It is easy to say that we could raise large sums of money by income taxation. Last night I sent a telegram to Mr. Bradshaw, Commissioner of Finance for the City of Toronto, I asked him what was the income assessment in the city of Toronto and how much they derived from it last year. Now, the city of Toronto is the second city in Canada, and there would probably be more income there liable to assessment than in the rest of the province of Ontario, and possibly also in one or more of the western provinces. We must remember that income is subject to taxation by the municipality of the city of Toronto with an exemption, I think, of $1,000, to a municipal tax of 20 to 25 mills on the dollar which is a little over 2 per cent. The reply I got from Mr. Bradshaw was that Toronto's income assessment in 1916 was $19,500,000, and the amount of income tax raised was $440,000. I lay those figures before the House without comment. They seem to be very illuminating as to the possibilities of income taxation. I stated yesterday, and I repeat again to-day, that I think it very probable that the Dominion Government may have to resort to income taxation if this war goes on, and at the present moment there does not seem to be very much evidence of an early conclusion.

Mr. MARCIL: Will the income taxation displace any other taxation?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I do not think it well to make announcements with respect to taxation so far in advance. I stated that if the war went on we should have to consider new modes of taxation, and that we might resort to the income tax.

My hon. friend has referred to the production of munitions, and he did not seem to think that the industry was of very much consequence to this country. I can tell him that from two standpoints the production of munitions is of the utmost consequence. In the first place the munitions business in Canada has reached dimensions that exceed, I believe, those of any other business on this continent, excepting possibly one or two of the largest American businesses and I do not know that I should except those. There are some 650 establishments in Canada making munitions. It was of the utmost importance to the Imperial Government that they were able to lay under requisition the industrial establishments of this country for the purpose of supplementing the British supply of munitions. The economic justification for the establishment and promotion of industries in this country has often been referred to. The industries which were of economic value in time of peace become real bulwarks of national security in time of war. All the industries of this country have been laid under requisition by the Imperial Government, and have been sending forward munitions on an increasing scale for the last two years. I think it is not too much to say that the supply of munitions which has gone from this country in an unending stream for the last two years has had much to do with the successful operations on the Somme, at Vimy Ridge and other points on the western front. So it was a great thing for this country from the standpoint of the prosecution of the war, that Canadian industrial plants were able to send forward in increasingly large quantities the munitions so urgently required at the front.

But apart from that, there is the economic value to Canada. Hundreds of thousands of people are engaged in the munitions business in this country; they are paid for their services, and in that way there has been a large distribution of money in Canada which has had a very considerable effect upon our economy. These munitions were needed; the British Government was willing to pay for them, and the business has been developed to the extent I have indicated. From an economic standpoint the industry has been of great benefit to the people of this country, but I consider that of secondary importance. The main thing is that we had the industrial plants to supply the shells and other munitions so urgently needed at the front.

My hon. friend seems to censure this Government; he has no word of praise for what the Government has done. I am indifferent whether we get praise or blame, so long as the work is done, but I will put forward for the consideration of the House that we have financed in large measure the expenditure which has made possible the manufacture of munitions in this country on such a large scale. The hon. member for Edmonton has said that we have no industries in process of expansion in Canada. Well, the country is engaged in war; the manpower of the country is being organized. In those circumstances, how can my hon. friend expect an expansion of business other than in industries connected directly or indirectly with the war? Was that a reasonable criticism of the Government? I submit not. My hon. friend says that we get too much from the tariff, and we are not taking enough from excess profits. Last night hon. gentlemen opposite censured the Government because the excess profits tax was too heavy. To-day, the hon. member for Edmonton says that the excess profits tax is much too light. Instead of raising $12,500,000 in 1915, and $20,000,000 in 1916, he would probably "guess," like my hon. friend from Dauphin, that we should raise $100,000,000 from excess profits. He had no figures to support his argument. He simply made the statement that we were not raising enough money from the excess profits. I would point out that this Government must not only raise revenue to meet its ordinary and capital expenditure, the interest upon its increasing debt, and the pensions, but we must have a large revenue in order to maintain our credit.

In 1916, we raised the tariff 7½ per cent and 5 per cent. It was stated at the time, and actually moved as an amendment in the Budget debate, that the House should put itself on record as declaring that the tax would not be productive. So productive has that tax been that I was able to say yesterday that the increase due to the war tax had been last year $38,000,000, and for the previous year $25,000,000. If ever there was a prophecy that was not fulfilled, it was the prediction of hon. gentlemen opposite in 1915 that we should realize no additional revenue by the increase in the tariff. To-day we find ourselves in the position, as to credit, as to financial standing and power, which I have indicated, and this is due largely to the fact that we met conditions as they arose from time to time, that we imposed the measure of taxation necessary in order to meet our coming requirements.

I would point out to my hon. friend from Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) that in the United States Congress to-day there is a measure to increase the tariff all around by ten per cent. I do not know what progress that measure has made. It was introduced, I believe, by the Ways and Means Committee, or at least it was the proposal put forward by the Ways and Means Committee for the raising of additional revenue for the United States to meet the requirements of the war.

The hon. member has asserted that this Government has increased the burden of taxation on the people of Canada. He puts that forward as a serious indictment of the Government. Of course, we have increased the burden of taxation on the people of Canada. Why? It certainly is not because we desire to increase the people's burden for the mere sake of doing so; it is the result of necessity arising out of the war. The measures we have taken have been such, I believe, as command themselves to the judgment of the people throughout the country.

The hon. member seems to think that the Government is not interested in the West. He spoke of the duty on agricultural implements. When I asked him, pointblank, why it was that when he was a member of the late Government he did not take the duty off agricultural implements, his answer was, "I don't know." I do not believe that is a sufficient answer. In the tariff of 1914, we reduced the duties on many of those implements in which the West is particularly interested—" harvesters, self-binders, reapers and parts thereof," to quote the tariff item. The duty on these machines was cut down to 12½ per cent. During all the time when the Government of which the hon. member for Edmonton was a member was in power the duties on these implements had been 17½ per cent. And he thought he had worked wonders because under the reciprocity agreement the duty was fixed at 15 per cent. This Government, which the hon. gentleman says has no interest in the western farmer, fixed these duties, not at the 17½ per cent at which he was quite content to have it when in power, not at the 15 per cent fixed by the reciprocity agreement which he has never ceased to praise in this House, but at 12½ per cent. And when we raised the tariff two years ago the increase did not apply to these agricultural implements. I think I have proved that my hon. friend is not quite sincere in bringing forward this motion. If he indicts this Government for not dealing with the question of agricultural implements he must explain to his constituents why, when he was in power, he did not do what he now says this Government ought to do.

The hon. member spoke about the wheat. He said that the farmers in the West had sold out at $1.75 a bushel. When he was asked how much wheat the farmers had in store, either on their farms or in elevators, he said he did not know. He had taken no trouble to inquire. I believe, in fact I know, that it is incorrect to say that the farmers of the West sold out all their wheat at $1.75 a bushel.

Mr. OLIVER: I did not say they sold it all out at $1.75.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: If the hon. gentleman did not say so, at least he created that impression. He was asked how much the farmers had in store—

Mr. OLIVER: I said that nobody knows.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: But the hon. gentleman created the impression that the farmers of the West by reason of a conspiracy—which he practically alleged—between the railways, the Board of Railway Commissioners and the grain manipulators, were actually deprived of the difference between $1.75 a bushel and $3 a bushel. If he did not intend to create that impression he succeeded in doing that which he had not intended to do. That is the impression he created in this House, and I think it is the impression he intended to create. He left out of account the myriad transactions in wheat in Chicago, in Minneapolis, in Duluth. He said somebody made $70,000,000. Why, all interests throughout the world are concerned in the buying of that grain from the time it leaves the farm to the time it leaves the elevators. Yet he blames the Government by implication, because we did not stop that mysterious somebody from making that $70,000,000. Who have been the great buyers of this grain? The British Wheat Commission. The British Government. It was the buying of the British Government that was particularly the cause of what has been called the corner in wheat.

Mr. OLIVER: Oh, no.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I know it.

Mr. OLIVER: It was the selling by men who had not the wheat.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The hon. gentleman is wrong. The British Wheat Commission bought in perfect good faith and with no intention of creating a corner—

Mr. OLIVER: Certainly.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The men who bought wheat in the ordinary course sold in the ordinary course, by what is known as "hedging."

Mr. OLIVER: They sold wheat that they did not have and could not get.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: But the hon. gentleman knows that in the course of business that is done.

Mr. OLIVER: That is what they did.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: They bought the grain and they were obliged to "hedge"—that is, they were obliged to sell. They sold in the ordinary course that is pursued in this country, in the United States, and, so far as I know, in every other country. They sold expecting that if the contract grades could not be supplied, they would be allowed to substitute grades at millable value. But the British Government, for reasons that I have already referred to, wanted the grades 1, 2 and 3, and not the lower grades.

Mr. OLIVER: Anybody who buys as the British Commission bought expects to buy nothing but contract grades.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I understand. But these men sold, as I have stated, in good faith.

Mr. OLIVER: They had no right to sell anything but contract grades.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Let me show my hon. friend that he is quite wrong. When this corner was formed—due, as I have said, to the buying by the British Wheat Commission in perfect good faith and in such immense quantities that the ordinary laws, so to say, went by the board—and wheat attained the price it did two or three weeks ago, we took the matter up at once with the British Wheat Commission. I cabled Sir George Perley asking him to take the matter up with the British Wheat Commission. I took it up with the representative of the British Wheat Commission at Washington. I know what I am talking about. Just as soon as it was determined that they would accept the lower grade in lieu of contract grades, which they were entitled to demand, the corner came to an end.

Mr. OLIVER: And the Government arranged to let the wheat speculator out.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Now, my hon. friend puts that forward seriously in this House. Here were the British Wheat Commission buying millions and tens of millions of bushels of wheat for the sustenance of the people of the United Kingdom. As a result of that buying, and as a result of innumerable contracts made on the Winnipeg exchange, and in Minneapolis and Chicago, wheat goes to a certain price and yet my hon. friend says that the Government, or the Railway Commission, and the railways are in a conspiracy against the farmers of the West. If that is not an absolute reductio ad absurdum I do not know what it is.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Under the circumstances, seeing that a corner had been created, did this Government take any steps under the War Measures Act to control the price?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: My hon. friend puts forward his usual insidious question. My hon. friend has a lot to learn about wheat if he does not know the dependence there is between wheat on the Winnipeg Exchange, wheat on the Chicago Exchange and wheat on the Minneapolis Exchange.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I know very well that this Government have the power, and that they had the power then, to control the price of wheat and keep it within reasonable limits.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: My hon. friend puts that forward and if the Government had done it my hon. friend would have come forward and suggested some other line of action, so that we are perhaps as far ahead in any event. The Government took the only action it could take in respect to the situation. The Government cannot control the world prices of wheat. My hon. friend knows that.

Mr. PUGSLEY: But it could control the Canadian price.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The Government of the United States could not control the world price of wheat.

Mr. PUGSLEY: They could control the price in their own country.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: They cannot even do that. The only possibility of controlling the minimum or maximum price—and the subject is full of difficulties—would be by joint action on the part of the two governments. That is recognized in the United States just as it is here. We might as well talk sense about this.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Will my hon. friend not get angry if I ask him another question?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Could any one get angry with the hon. gentleman?

Mr. PUGSLEY: If the Canadian Government could not control the price of wheat in Canada, how is it possible for Canada and the United States to control the price of wheat in these two countries when we know that wheat is produced largely in Argentine and other countries of the world?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: If my hon. friend had an open mind I would have no difficulty in answering his question but he has a mens clausa, a closed mind, I am afraid that I cannot give the hon. gentleman the answer that he wants. However, I shall try to reply to my hon. friend. My hon. friend knows the close connection geographically between this country and the United States and the tonnage situation on the Atlantic which affects Argentina, Australia, New Zealand and all other sources of supply.

Now, I come to this amendment. The amendment suggests a revision of the Customs tariff. My hon. friend (Mr. Oliver) acquiesces in that and he says: I want a revision now and I want a revision downward. If there ever was a time in the history of Canada when it was unwise to revise the tariff, it is this present moment. What is the condition? The condition, Mr. Speaker, is that owing to the unsettled values of goods in all foreign countries, it would be absolutely impossible to prepare a customs tariff that would meet the situation at the present time and for a period after the war. A proper revision of the tariff to-day would be an impossible performance, and would lead to the most profound dislocation of business in this country at a time when the last thing we want to see is the dislocation of business. Yet, my hon. friend from Edmonton seriously suggests that this Government, in the midst of this war, should revise the tariff. The wholesale values of two hundred commodities in the United States have increased by 55 per cent up to March, 1917, in comparison with the prices in July, 1914. I pointed out that the present Customs tariff is producing a very large revenue. That revenue is needed and it is going to be needed in increasing amount until the war is over. We shall have to face, as the United States had, the problems arising out of the war, an enormous increase in the national debt, interest charges and pension outlays and my hon. friend suggests that you can practically put the tariff out of consideration in dealing with these questions. How did the United States meet the situation, and no country ever recovered from a great war so successfully as the United States. How did the United States put herself upon a gold basis after the war? A dollar in 1863 was worth only about 40 cents in gold. How did the United States bring her dollar to parity, how did the United States not only meet the interest upon her great national debt but pay off that debt in a few years? She did it by the tariff. This country cannot dispense with the tariff at this time. I do not say that the tariff is perfect. I do not say that at the proper time the tariff should not be revised, but I do say that it is idle to suggest that you can get on without a tariff. At this time it would be unwise in the extreme to revise the tariff.

If it is unwise to revise the tariff, we need not seriously consider the question of revising the tariff downwards. The tariff was increased in 1915 by 7½ per cent and 5 per cent. In the course of time, I should imagine when the war is about over, it will be necessary to revise the tariff. I do not say it should be revised upwards, I do not say it should be revised downwards, but I say it should be revised having regard to the conditions that exist at the time of its revision. If a tariff revision takes place it will have to be necessarily in the light of the situation which exists as between the Allies in this war. There may be trade conventions; there undoubtedly will be treaties between the Allies. That is the general opinion and, if so, why should we revise our tariff now when the war is moving, we hope, towards its close, and when the situation that I have indicated will confront us at the conclusion of the war? What we should do is to maintain our tariff because it gives the revenues which are necessary for the purposes of the country and the prosecution of the war. At the proper time, on the conclusion of the war, and having regard to the situation which then exists, including the international situation between the Allies, be proper for us to revise the tariff. We shall know the labour and the industrial situation and the fiscal measures we take will be such as are in the public interest. I shall not discuss the question of placing wheat, flour, and wheat products on the free list. That has been done as to—

Mr. PUGSLEY: Oh, no, products such as bran, shorts and middlings are not free.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: No, but wheat and flour.

My hon. friend's amendment reads that:

> Wheat, wheat flour, and all other products of wheat be placed on the free list.

Wheat, wheat flour and semolina have been placed on the free list.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Your order does not place bran, shorts and so on, on the free list.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I understand that is to be covered by another amendment. I think the hon. member for Huntingdon (Mr. Robb) brought that up, and I shall not have to discuss it now.

Mr. CARVELL: That was ruled out of order.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Will it come up again?

Mr. CARVELL: It may.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Then I shall leave it until it comes up.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The minister says he is going to concede what Mr. Robb asked for.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: No, my hon. friend (Mr. Oliver) has gone further; he has taken a very far-reaching list of important commodities and articles which are subject to customs taxation, and he proposes to place them all upon the free list. As I said, this is not the time to revise the tariff. That being so, it is not necessary for me to discuss the particular amendments which my hon. friend brings forward with respect to the articles covered by the tariff.

My hon. friend has referred also to the British preference. Well, it is not expedient to deal with the tariff at the present time or with the British preference; but, when the war is over, when this question of preference, about which the Prime Minister spoke the other day, and which has been under consideration by the Imperial War Cabinet, is before the Government, and when we know the industrial situation that confronts us and the world, and when we have before us the agreements made between the Allies, we can deal with this and all other questions in such fashion as the interests of Canada and the Empire may require.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess.

The House resumed at 8 o'clock.

Mr. F. B. CARVELL (Carleton, N.B.): Mr. Speaker, I crave the indulgence of the House for a short time this evening to discuss what I consider to be one of the most important resolutions that has been proposed to the House in recent years. My hon. friend the Minister of Finance will not feel that I am discourteous if I do not follow him through all the by-paths and by-ways that he trod this afternoon, because, for some unexplainable reason, he took occasion to deliver to-day the same speech that he has repeated four or five times during the last three weeks. Possibly he felt sufficient justification for the performance; I hope that he is satisfied with the results. Before I enter upon a discussion of the real question involved in the amendment, however, I desire to refer very shortly to a few of the more outstanding statements made by the Minister of Finance.

When the history of this country is written, one thing that my hon. friend will not be charged with is a lack of due appreciation of his own services and of the services of his party. Outside of winning the war, I do not know of anything for which the hon. gentleman did not take credit this afternoon in a speech of one hour's duration. The Minister of Finance even went so far as to say that the successes in the battles of the Somme and Vimy Ridge were contributed to very largely by the immediate action taken by the Government in the matter of furnishing rails. One can almost say, therefore, that the hon. gentleman is taking credit for the winning of the war, as well as for almost everything else in the world. He said that the Government deserved very great credit for the mighty efforts that they had put forth towards the winning of the war. Mighty efforts? Well, he and his Government have done a great many things since the war started. I assume that my hon. friend is willing to take credit for everything that has been done, but for some of those things he is not entitled to a great deal of credit. Let me refer to a few of the things that he has done and for which he takes to himself so much credit.

The minister says that the Government have placed the finances of Canada in a better position than those of any other country in the world except the United States. He glories in the assertion, which he has made a great many times during the last three weeks, that when the Government wanted money from the Canadian people they were able to get it. When they wanted $50,000,000 they were offered $100,000,000; when they wanted $100,000,000 they were offered $200,000,000; when they wanted $150,000,000 they were offered $260,000,000. He said that he did not believe $5,000,000 could have been raised by loan in Canada before the war. But he did not tell us that no other Canadian Government had ever tried to raise an internal loan. He did not tell us that during the years from 1867 to 1915 the successive Governments of Canada deliberately and persistently went outside the borders of our country in order to raise money. This matter was discussed when my hon. friend's predecessor held office, as well as since the present Government came into power. I myself have more than once asked why the Government did not attempt to raise money by internal loan, and the answer was always the same: in a young country like Canada it was better to borrow money from outside than to tie up money of our own which was needed for the country's development. Accordingly, up to the year 1915 the Government never offered more than three per cent for money obtained in Canada; yet under the system of paying three per cent interest on savings bank deposits, hundreds of millions of dollars were deposited to the credit of the Government. But one of the most gigantic efforts for which the Minister of Finance takes credit is the raising of money in Canada. And how was this wonderful feat accomplished? By raising the interest rate from three per cent to five per cent and then selling bonds cheap enough to give the broker a small commision on the sale of bonds. Nobody but a real wizard of finance could do that. Does the minister realize that hundreds of millions of dollars were lying around this country before he took charge of the Finance Department? Does he realize that nearly $100,000,000 were deposited in the Dominion Savings Bank, and much more than $200,000,000 or $300,000,000 in the chartered banks at three per cent interest? Does he realize that hundreds of millions of dollars, earning no interest at all, were in the chartered banks, and that there were in Canada securities to the value of hundreds of millions of dollars bearing only 3, 3¼ or 4 per cent interest? Does he realize that the moment he raised the rate of interest to 5 per cent every woman who had money in a savings bank, every investor who had money lying round for which he was not receiving 5 per cent interest, came to the conclusion that by placing their money with the Government at 5 per cent, backed by the security of the Government, they would be making a pretty good trade? The minister admitted that one night last week when he said that a variation of one-tenth of a point would have defeated his purpose. He admitted that the money was obtained not by his financing but by his offering an increased rate of interest and a method of investment which caused the people to come forward with their money. Yet he says that the Government is entitled to the very greatest credit for the raising of $300,000,000 through internal loans under these conditions.

My hon. friend (Sir Thomas White) says, also, that the Government deserve an enormous amount of credit because they attracted such large sums of money into the country in connection with the manufacture of munitions. Well, the Government are welcome to all the credit they can get for the money that has come in for the manufacture of munitions. The late Minister of Militia takes all the credit for that to himself, but I happen to know something about this matter; I spent some time trying to find out about it. The Government so mismanaged the thing that the British authorities said: if you cannot manufacture these munitions at reasonable prices you shall not be permitted to manufacture at all. So they had to take the matter out of the hands of the Government, and put it into the hands of a board constituted by themselves. The British Government have spent, perhaps, a billion dollars in Canada since the outbreak of war for the purchase of munitions, but I do not see how the Government can take any credit for that. The allied armies were suffering from a lack of munitions of war more than anything else; they had to have them; they paid two prices for every dollar's worth of munitions they got from Canada, except, perhaps, for the munitions which they have obtained during the last six months or year. Many people in Canada are hiding their heads in shame because they had the nerve to charge the British and allied Governments the prices that they did. They charged such prices that the British Government were compelled, as I say, to send their representatives here and take the business out of their hands. Yet, hon. gentlemen opposite claim to be entitled to all credit for the manufacture of munitions in Canada.

My hon. friend says, further, that the tariff should not be revised during a period of war. But it did not bother my hon. friend to revise the tariff in 1914, when he added a few million dollars to the taxes.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: That was upward.

Mr. CARVELL: Yes, but he revised it just the same. It did not bother him in 1915, when he raised the tariff 7½ per cent and 5 per cent. It did not bother him a year ago, when his colleague the Minister of Agriculture, wanting a better price for his apples, put 75 cents duty on each barrel of apples coming into Canada, making the farmer of the West pay that much more for his apples than he had ever paid before. It is a simple matter for my hon. friend to revise the tariff upwards, but when he is asked to revise the tariff downwards and relieve the almost impossible burden upon the poor man who is trying to make a living he says that it is impossible to do it until the war is over.

The minister says that we have raised $60,000,000 or thereabouts by way of special taxes. It is a very simple matter to raise $60,000,000 in special taxes when you add 7½ and 5 per cent duty to the price of everything that the people bring into the country.

It is not only five and seven and a half per cent duty that you add. When you consider that the articles which are being brought in to this country are not very much greater in volume than they were before the war, but that they are in some cases twice the value and in some cases even three times the value, and when to the tariff as it was before the war, you add 5 per cent in one case and 7½ per cent in the other on a value in dollars two or three times as great as it was before, you are not doing a wonderful feat of financing in order to get additional revenue out of the people of Canada. I do not think the Minister of Finance is entitled to as much credit for raising this money as he thinks he is; but, of course, I know he has a right to his own opinion. I want, however, to point out some of the ways in which I feel he would be benefitting the people of this country if he were to adopt this amendment in his method of raising a revenue.

The Minister of Finance told the House the wonderful things the Government had done in stimulating production, but he failed to tell us the manner in which they had endeavoured to stimulate production. He said that they were constantly preaching production and more production. What have they done? Have they done anything towards producing more grain, more food, more cattle? The only thing I know which they have ever done was done within the last two months, when they put wheat on the free list, but up to the present time there has not been very much result so far as increased production is concerned. We hope, however, that measure will have, in this coming year and in later years, the effect of stimulating the production of wheat, and so far as that is concerned, we are willing to give the minister full credit for what he has done. That, however, is a matter which, properly, I think should have been discussed upon the Budget and which was discussed upon the Budget by my hon. friend and by many other members of the House; and as I said at the beginning of my remarks, I am not going to take up time discussing matters which should have been discussed on the Budget, but I am going to confine my remarks to the resolutions and the amendment before the House.

In asking the House to adopt this amendment we are raising a very vital question in Canada; we are raising a question of principle, which I am sorry to say has not been discussed in this House during the last fifteen years as much as it should have been. It is a question of principle that has been forgotten in Canada for a good many years and that should be revived now on account of the war, if for no other reason. My hon. friend says: You cannot revise a tariff during the war; you have to have more money and you must raise it by means of a tariff. There never has been a time in the history of Canada when you can revise the tariff downward as well as you can to-day. There has never been a time when you can discuss the question of the tariff with the people of Canada as well as you can to-day. Down to the beginning of the war things had been going fairly well; the people were fairly prosperous; we did not have to raise very much money; our taxes were low; we did not know as much as the people of other countries do about raising money; and when you discussed the question of direct taxation, there is no doubt that a great outcry would be raised against it, but the people have learned that you cannot raise a very large revenue by means of a tariff, notwithstanding that my hon. friend says that a tariff must, for many years, be the great means by which revenue shall be raised. He himself has adopted a policy of raising money in other ways than by a tariff. Supposing any Minister of Finance had before the war attempted to raise money by a business tax, as my hon. friend is doing now, one can quite understand what an outcry there would have been against it. My hon. friend, however, is raising money by means of a business tax, and the only criticism I have heard in regard to it is that he is not raising enough by it. For the last month we have been persistently telling the Minister of Finance that he must raise money by means of an income tax, and he has been, until this afternoon, persistently telling us that he cannot do it. Now he says: I am wrong. I think I can raise money by means of an income tax, and I guess I shall have to do so. That shows that even a hide-bound tariff politician like the Minister of Finance has lucid intervals, and if you im press truths upon him long enough and persistently enough, even he comes to his senses and has to admit that these matters are not so entirely theoretical as he would try to lead the House to believe. This afternoon he said: Yes, we shall have to impose an income tax, I am fraid, but it will not produce anything, because I sent a telegram to the controller at Toronto and that gentleman replied: "We collected only half a million dollars or a little less of an income tax last year." My hon. friend certainly, looks upon the members of this House as being very unsophisticated in the methods of taxation for municipal purposes in Canada. He speaks about collecting only half a million dollars from an income tax in the city of Toronto. I do not suppose that one-half or one-third of the incomes in the city of Toronto that are above $1,000 are taxed at all. If they are, Toronto is different from any other city or town in Canada that I know of. In my own province of New Brunswick we have an income tax for municipal purposes, and in that province there is not a man but, when he looks at the item of income tax on his tax bill, simply laughs in his sleeve to think of the small amount of income upon which he is assessed, and what is true of my province is true of the province of Ontario. The minister also admits that the tax only amounts to 2 per cent. A man with an income of $50,000 is assessed as having an income of $2,000, and then he is charged 2 per cent on $2,000 or a tax of the paltry sum of say $40. My hon. friend knows that if he went after the big incomes of this country as is done in Great Britain, France, and many other countries, he would be taxing the rich man, not 2 per cent of his income, but from 30 to 40 per cent of his income, and he knows that in Great Britain there are people who are paying as high as 40 per cent of their incomes. Let my hon. friend adopt a system of a graduated income tax as has been done in other civilized countries, and let him take the matter up in a big way and he will collect, not half a million dollars from Toronto, but three or four million dollars, and he will collect proportionate amounts from every other city and town throughout the Dominion. My hon. friend might just as well come down the whole way on this question of income tax and admit to himself and to the country that an income tax is coming; that it is a proper method of raising a revenue, and that it is not a serious matter at all, because it is not a novelty; it is not something that has not been worked out. It has been worked out to perfection in many countries in the world, and all that my hon. friend has to do is to adopt that method which in his judgment best applies to the condition of affairs in Canada and to apply it. If he does that, he will get money just as easily and much more fairly than he is doing by raising the duty 7½ per cent on the poor man who can barely make both ends meet and at the same time buy sufficient food and clothing for his family.

There is, however, another side to this question which, in my judgment, the Minister of Finance fails to consider, and which I think, my hon. friends opposite fail to consider when they are discussing this question of tariff. They say: Oh, but if you reduce the tariff, you will not have any revenue; you have to have a revenue in order to carry on this war, and the only way to secure that revenue is to keep up the tariff. I want to tell my hon. friend, in the first place, that that has not been the history of Canada, nor of any other country in the world. We know that in 1897 when the British preference was introduced in this country, which meant an enormous reduction in the tariff, the tariff revenue did not decrease, but went up by leaps and bounds at the rate of $10,000,000 a year. It is all very simple. The moment you take the duty off any article—I do not ask that everything be put on the free list, but I say reduce the duty—the moment you reduce the duty on an article of ordinary consumption, that moment you make it cheaper, and you put the average consumer in a better position to purchase. If he purchases more, then more goods come into the country, and more revenue comes into the coffers of the Government; that is a general principle which I do not think anybody will dispute.

But there is another side to it. My hon. friend fails to tell the House, though he knows it as well as any man in Canada, that our tariff with the 7½ per cent added to it, is in many cases so high that it absolutely prohibits the importation of the necessities of life; that is the difficulty. Instead of getting revenue you get none at all, because the duty is prohibitive, and at the same time you are increasing the burdens of the people by—100 per cent I was going to say, and I believe in many cases it amounts to that. You get no revenue, and you increase the cost to the consumer, because you have built up the tariff wall to such an extent that the consumer cannot import, and is compelled to buy from the local producer at a price which is just a cent or two below the imported article. I think perhaps the most glaring instance of that in the whole of our trade returns is the item of cement. I was amazed in looking over the trade returns for the year ending March 31, 1916, to see the figures for this item. I was not able to get the returns beyond that date, and therefore any figures I may quote this evening will have reference to the fiscal year ending March 31, 1916. According to the trade returns, we neither bought nor sold cement with the rest of the world; we simply lived within ourselves. Hon. gentlemen opposite said in 1911, "Let us trade within ourselves; do not let us go beyond our own borders; do not tear down the flag; do not become disloyal by trading outside this country, but let us just live within ourselves, and keep this little circle going," and, if ever there was an item where this idea was worked out to perfection it was in the case of our trade in cement last year, because the whole of Canada imported only $45,000 worth of cement, and we exported only $5,000 worth. We paid in duty the immense sum of $11,227 and if you add the 7½ per cent you have $2,000 more. Altogether we paid about $14,000 duty on cement. I do not know how many million dollars worth of cement is produced in Canada annually, but I do know that it would be a very great amount. I am very much of the opinion that it must be $20,000,000 or $30,000,000 worth; that is only an estimate, but the figure must be very, very large. But no matter whether it is $10,000,000 or $20,000,000 or $30,000,000 we are paying the manufacturers of cement in Canada practically 60 cents a barrel more than we should have to pay if we could import cement duty free. If the duty were taken off, the country would lose practically no revenue, but the consumer would be able to buy cement for 60 cents a barrel less. I think that is perhaps the most glaring case in the trade returns, but there is another case nearly as bad. It is an article which every man and every woman in this country consumes, and the poorer the man the more he consumes of it. I refer to canned vegetables. Perhaps there is no item of food in the Dominion to-day that plays a bigger part in the homes of the poor people than the two canned vegetables which are bracketed together in the trade returns, tomatoes and cooked corn. You would hardly believe it, Sir, but last year we received in duty on these two great articles in the diet of the common people the sum of $6,454 only; in addition to that straight duty, there would be the war tax of 7½ per cent, provided the goods came from any country outside the British Empire, which I presume they did. In this case again, the tariff is so high that we cannot import canned goods into this country. We simply have to pay the canners' combine the price which they ask, and that price is just a fraction of a cent below what the goods cost in any other country plus the duty. The poor man is accordingly compelled to pay to these people, I do not know how many hundreds of thousands or millions of dollars more than he would have to pay if these goods were on the free list, and if they were on the free list the revenue of Canada would only suffer to the extent of $6,454.

The next item is pretty nearly as important, but perhaps not so glaring as the two items of cement and canned goods. I come next to boots and shoes. Why, Sir, you cannot buy a pair of shoes in Canada to-day for your baby at less than $2 or $3 a pair, or for your child at less than $5 or $6, and you cannot buy a pair for yourself at less than $8 or $10. I realize that this is due in some measure to the increased cost of labour and production and to war prices; I want to be fair in arguing this question, for if a man is not fair in logic his argument amounts to nothing. We pay 37½ per cent protection on the boots and shoes we buy in Canada. The duty is so great that only a mere bagatelle of the boots and shoes we use in Canada are purchased from outside. I do not know exactly what the consumption would be, but there are about 7,500,000 people in this country, and I think about $5 a head is a very low estimate for boots and shoes; in fact, I think that is away below the actual figure. But at $5 a head, we are paying $40,000,000 a year for boots and shoes, and yet, according to the trade returns, we imported only $2,120,000 worth, and these would all be shoes of the higher grade, slippers and things of that kind from England, although a large quantity come from the United States. But 90 per cent of the boots and shoes used in Canada are made at home. Under our tariff we are compelled to pay 37½ per cent to the manufacturer of these boots and shoes, and last year we only received in revenue $775,000, including the 7½ per cent. Just think of it! Only three-quarters of a million dollars of revenue on a consumption of $40,000,000 to $50,000,000 worth of boots and shoes! Yet hon. gentlemen opposite tell us that we have to have this tariff to raise money to carry on the war. The Minister of Finance knows these things as well as I do. He knows all about these glaring inconsistencies, and how the poor man is being mulcted to make the rich man richer and to multiply our millionaires, but in discussing the tariff he very conveniently conceals these facts from the public. I could give illustration after illustration of the same thing.

Last year we imported $19,664,000 worth of woollen goods—practically twenty millions of dollars' worth. The duties paid on those goods ran up in some cases to 40 and even 42 per cent, and this on goods which the poor man must buy to clothe his family in this rigorous climate; without these goods, people can hardly live in Canada. And this is done in order to keep a few one-horse factories going in Canada. It would be better to close up every woollen mill in the country than to tax the people at this enormous rate for goods without which they cannot get along. But I do not want to close up any factory; it is not necessary. I would not advocate the placing on the free list of any article if I believed that by so doing we should close up an industry in Canada; but I would not allow any industry to exist, producing goods of vital necessity to the poor people of this country, if it were necessary to its existence to compel the people to pay a fine to the manufacturer of 40 to 45 per cent. If a woollen factory in Canada cannot get along with a protection of 15 to 20 per cent, I do not think that factory is very much good to this country. The only good reason for the Minister of Finance maintaining such a condition of affairs is the need of revenue. I admit that by the duty on woollen goods we raise a large revenue—last year it amounted to practically $6,500,000. I realize that if you reduced the duty to one-half or one-third of what it is to-day, you might not get so large an amount, but you would import more woollen goods. We have reached a point where woollen goods are practically out of the reach of ordinary people, they simply have not the money to buy them. But put those goods at reasonable prices and you will find that many people will buy them who cannot buy them to-day. I have strong reason to believe that if you had only one-third of the duty that you have to-day you would get nearly as much revenue as you do under the present rate of duty. There would not be so many woollen factories that would have to water their stock in order to cover up their earnings. Nor would these watered securities be selling at the price they are to-day. But that would only make the millionaires a little less millionaires than they are now, while it would be a wonderful benefit to the consumers of this country.

There is another side to this whole nefarious transaction, and it is being emphasized in the conduct of this war more than it has ever been emphasized before. It brings us back to the item of cement, one of the most glaring instances of all. It is well known that there are securities of the Canada Cement Company in the form of bonds. These are all right; they represent actual money on which interest should be paid. Then, there is a certain amount of preferred stock. This is in the doubtful class. But give it the benefit of the doubt; say that it represents cash—though I am very much of opinion that there is a good deal of water in it—and that dividends should be paid on it. Then you have $13,000,000 of absolute water in the form of common stock, which did not cost the promoters of the Canada Cement Company one dime. Up to the time of the war this stock was practically worthless. There was a little professional trading in it at around 21 and 22, but very little of the stock was filtering out on the market. The Canada Cement Company got a contract for manufacturing munitions; they got it under peculiar circumstances, circumstances which ought to make every member of the Government and every supporter of the Government hang his head in shame. The company wanted to manufacture a certain form of shell at $55. The powers that be said: we can't do that, but if you will take $68, we will give you a contract. The Cement Company said they did not want it at that, that they could manufacture the shell at profit at $55, and they wanted the contract at that figure. They had to take that to the Prime Minister of this Dominion and the representatives of the British Munitions Board in Canada, and, after putting up a fight for some weeks, they finally succeeded in compelling the powers that be to give them a contract at $55. And they have made so much money that the common stock is selling at 59 and 60; it has even been above that—I have not looked at the quotations for the last day or two. Large quantities of that stock are being sent broadcast over the country. It gets into the hands of men and women who have money to invest, and the company is earning so much money that it is beginning to pay dividends upon that watered stock. But wait until the war is over; wait until you want to reduce the price of cement; wait until you wish to take the duty off cement, when things are not in the flourishing condition they are in to-day, and see what the owners of this watered stock will say. They will say: We paid good cold cash for our stock, and if you take the duty off cement you are going to reduce the price of that stock to such an extent that we cannot pay dividends. In other words, you will be wiping out money which these people have paid in good faith, which they paid not knowing the conditions, which they paid because of the fact that the Parliament of Canada is keeping a duty of sixty cents a barrel on cement. I cannot conceive of a greater crime to be perpetrated on the investing public of any country than to continue a condition of affairs such as I have described. And you have the same principle in boots and shoes. You have $3,000,000 or $4,000,000 of absolutely watered stock in Ames, Holden & McCready. That stock, before the war, was not worth two cents; you could not give it away; no man would pay for it what it would cost to transfer it in the books of the company. But this concern has contracts with the Government to furnish shoes by the million dollars' worth, and to-day this watered stock is filtering out to the ordinary investor at 15 and 16 cents a share. There is not very much going out yet, but it is going out, and if the present condition of affairs continues very much longer you will find a million dollars' worth of this stock scattered broadcast over the country. Then, when the time comes when you wish to take the duty off boots and shoes, the holders of that stock will say that you are making worthless a stock for which they paid money in good faith. So you are providing in advance a strong argument in favour of maintaining the duty on boots and shoes. If ever there was a time when these things should be grappled with firmly to-night is that time. There never was a time when you could introduce a system of direct taxation as easily as you can to-day. There never was a time when the industries of Canada were as flourishing or were making as much money as they are to-day; there never was a time when as much watered stock was being scattered broadcast over Canada as to-day, and there never was a time when it was more fitting that Parliament should take this matter in hand and make it impossible for these companies to sell for good money that which represents nothing to them in the way of money, that which is merely watered stock.

There is another very far-reaching principle involved in this amendment, one that has been discussed to a great extent in this House during the last three or four weeks, one on which the hon. gentlemen opposite have turned more political somersaults than in all their experience since the inception of the National Policy. I refer to their action in regard to wheat and flour. It is not a year ago—why, it is not two months ago—that the Solicitor General (Mr. Meighen) stated that the agitation for free wheat was nine-tenths political and one-tenth bad economics. And he even says that now. I want to ask him, or to ask the Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White) why it was that, believing this statement of the hon. gentleman, they accepted the principle of free wheat. They told us that the adoption of free wheat was going to tear down the Union Jack from every flag-pole in Canada and raise the Stars and Stripes in its place; that it was going to convert our railways into streaks of rust; that it was going to drive the trade of Canada to run north and south instead of east and west. If they were right in their contention, or even if they believed what they said—and what the Solicitor General says even now—what are we to think of men who will make such a volte face as that which they have made, and without any reason for it?

But, I tell you, Mr. Speaker, they did not believe in it in 1911. They knew that it would not remove the British flag from a solitary flag pole in Canada, they knew it would not throw anybody out of employment and they knew they were putting up the greatest hoax upon the people of Canada that was ever put up upon the people of any country. They knew it would not turn the railways into streaks of rust and they knew that it would not divert traffic from the railways running east and west to railways running north and south. Hon. gentlemen opposite knew it, the railways knew it, the manufacturers knew it but yet they fooled the people and by that means they succeeded in getting into power. They had to pay back the people who put them in power by adding 7½ per cent to the cost of everything that they produced when this war came on instead of trying to raise money by more modern and scientific methods. When you ask them to do something to remove that iniquity they say: You cannot do it; you can only raise money in war time by means of the tariff. But, they did remove the duty on wheat and I am very glad they have done so. I have reason to believe, from the intimation made by the Minister of Finance, that they intend to go farther and remove the duty from wheat products.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I made no such statement.

Mr. CARVELL: Well, it is well to have the record clear. The minister certainly left the impression on my mind that he was going to implement his Order in Council.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Did not the minister state that he was going to amend the Order which was passed?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: My hon. friend (Mr. Pugsley) is surely not putting his question seriously?

Mr. PUGSLEY: I am.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The amendment before the House covers wheat, wheat flour, and wheat products.

Mr. PUGSLEY: No, seminola.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Wheat products —that is the amendment before the House of the hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver). What I stated was that the Government had placed upon the free list, wheat, wheat flour and semolina. That is done.

Mr. CARVELL: It is well to have this matter cleared up and to know that the minister does not intend to put wheat products on the free list by Order in Council. It is well that the men in this country who are trying to produce more should know that. The minister says: Production, and still more production; we want you to raise more cattle, more hogs; we want you to increase production if possible, but we are going to make you pay $3, $4 or $5 more per ton for the food of these animals than you would have to pay if we took the duty off. It is well that the people should know also that the keeping on of that duty does not add one dollar to the revenues of the country. It is well that the people of this country who have live-stock should know what the attitude of the minister is to-night. He is going to make these people pay to the millers, the men who are producing these goods in Canada, $4 or $5 a ton more than they would pay if he would, by Order in Council, remove that duty and let them come in free.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Does my hon. friend not know that it was admitted by the hon. member for Huntingdon (Mr. Robb) that these products are cheaper in Canada to-day than they are in the United States?

Mr. CARVELL: All I know is that my hon. friend from Huntingdon wanted to propose an amendment to make these products free and he was ruled out of order, I am afraid, at the instance of my hon. friend the Minister of Finance.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I beg my hon. friend's pardon. I am sure that he would not wish to make a statement that is entirely incorrect. It never occurred to me that the hon. member for Huntingdon was out of order, nor did I expect to-day, when I came to the House prepared to discuss the amendment of which I had received notice, that it would be ruled out of order.

Mr. CARVELL: I accept that statement from the minister, but that does not alter the fact that my hon. friend from Huntingdon has not had an opportunity yet of presenting his amendment, and anyway I do not think it alters the fact, that wheat products cost more in Canada to-day than they would cost if the duty were removed. If I am not right, if the millers are not making a profit out of the consumers in this country that they ought not to make, if wheat products are not $4 or $5 a ton more than they would be if the duty was removed, why does not the Minister of Finance remove the duty? He could remove the duty on wheat and flour because there was such a demand in the western country that he could not resist it, and I feel satisfied that that political nine-tenths was the thing that removed the duty from wheat and flour. If he could remove the duty from wheat and flour, why could he not go further and remove it from wheat products? The very fact that the minister does not remove that duty, when he has removed the duty from wheat and flour, answers the whole question and answers it in the affirmative, that if the duty were removed the men who use these goods would be getting them cheaper than they are to-day. I do not think it needs any argument because men do these things for reasons.

The next important matter has been so ably discussed by my hon. friend from Edmonton that I feel that I would be only uselessly consuming time were I to seek to devote much attention to it. My hon. friend the Minister of Finance, with his usual sophistry when discussing tariff questions, says: "Why did you not do these things when you were in power; look at what we have done; we have reduced the duties from 17½ per cent down to 12 per cent on mowers, reapers, binders and harvesters." If my hon. friend ever did very much farming he would know that mowers, reapers, binders and harvesters make a very small item in the list of machinery which the ordinary farmer uses.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Not in the West.

Mr. CARVELL: Yes, in the West, in the East and all over Canada. I know what I am talking about now because I buy some of this machinery myself. If this was all I had to buy I would not care very much whether there was a duty on it or not. If a man wants to raise potatoes you have not touched the duty upon the implements that he requires. You are making him pay 20, or 25 per cent on the machinery which he has to buy. Mowing machines and binders are very small things, but take tractors, manure spreaders, potato planters, cultivators, diggers, sprayers and all those things costing from $75 up to $125 and $150, articles which every man in the East must buy if he is going to raise potatoes in a modern way and which will cost from $500 to $700 per farm; the minister has not touched a cent of duty on these and the farmers down East are paying all the way from 17½ to 25 per cent on these goods. They are paying that no matter whether they are manufactured in Canada or not because, if they are not manufactured in Canada, they are paying to the revenue, but if they are manufactured in Canada they are paying not to the revenue but to the manufacturers. No matter from what source they come the farmer pays the duty because he has to pay it to somebody. Yet, my hon. friend has not touched this duty. My hon. friend has not touched the big machinery.

He has not touched the thresher; he has not touched the steam threshing outfit; he has not touched anything except three or four of the most ordinary and the cheapest articles which the farmer uses on his farm, unless you count hand forks and rakes, etc. So, after all, I do not think the Minister of Finance can take much credit to himself for having reduced the duty on agricultural implements. There, again, he is trying to get from the farmer a little credit to which he is not entitled. I should like to know by what logic you can say that the duty should be kept on farm machinery in Canada when you realize that every man who has been in the business, outside of a certain circumscribed territory in the province of Ontario, has absolutely been driven out of existence—and I speak again as a man who knows, as I paid some thousands of dollars in order to see if I could not manufacture a certain kind of farm machinery in competition with the Massey-Harris people, and I failed. I learned to my cost that they could drive me and everybody else out unless he was a man of their substance. I will tell you how they did it. They did not sell much cheaper than I did, but they would give the farmer three years' time without interest. We could not compete against that, and they drove us out of business, and they have done that with hundreds of people in Canada. We wanted to manufacture farm machinery and to manufacture it fairly and to sell to our neighbours at a reasonable profit, and, the moment these large concerns drove the smaller man out of business, up went the price and the interest, and to-day, if you buy a thresher down East—and it was threshers that I attempted to manufacture—you pay 7 per cent interest. But when they had some competition down there you could get three years' credit without interest. It is all very well for a little clique in a certain portion of Ontario to say: We manufacture farm machinery and we want protection; but I want to tell you that there are some millions of people who do not live in Ontario, who cannot manufacture farm machinery, and who do not want protection, that is, who do not want a protective duty, but who do want protection from the Government as against these men who are compelling them to pay two prices for machinery. There are a lot of us in Canada in that position.

And then take the trade returns. Last year we imported altogether, of agricultural implements and parts thereof, everything which you can possibly imagine, including scythes and hand rakes and all the little things used on the farm, only $1,673,000 worth. I have again no idea how many million dollars worth are consumed in Canada, but there must be a great many millions, tens of millions of dollars worth of farm machinery consumed and yet we imported only $1,673,000 worth in Canada on which the Government received only $309,000 in duty, a mere bagatelle. And yet, Sir, we paid from 12 per cent to 17½ per cent and 25 per cent on all these millions and tens of millions of dollars worth of machinery used in Canada. We paid this, not to the Government, but to a little coterie of manufacturers in Ontario, and that same little coterie of manufacturers in Ontario were able to sell to the rest of the world practically $4,000,000 worth of these same articles. The exact figures are $3,854,000.

Does any man tell me that you must have protection on farm implements in Canada when we are able to sell to the rest of the world from two to three times as much as we import, in addition to manufacturing for our people at home? We sold these goods all over the civilized world except in the United States where the sales were practically nothing, we sold them in the Argentine Republic, in Australia, in New Zealand, in Britain and in France, and before the war we sold them in Germany, Austria and Russia. I myself saw Massey Harris machinery in Germany and in France, and at a fair in Ipswich, in England, I saw their machinery for sale cheaper than you could buy it in Canada. I went there and purposely priced the machines to see. They are selling these goods all over the civilized world in competition with the rest of the world, and they can manufacture for home consumption and compete with and under-sell the rest of the world in the foreign markets, and then they will tell you: We must have protection on these goods; otherwise we will have to close down our factory. I was very much interested not long ago in discussing this question with a gentleman on a train. I very seldom talk politics on trains, but I overheard a conversation and finally took a hand in it. Years ago we used to hear the story: Oh, but we can not compete with the rest of the world, we are not in a position to compete with the world; and if you throw down the duty to any appreciable extent, let alone making goods free, we will have to close down our business, we will have to close up our shop and our men will be on the street. There has not been an election in Canada in my day that that argument has not been used, and, I am bound to say, used very effectively in certain parts of Canada. Of course, the whole thing was a farce from the beginning. Nobody believed it excepting the poor labouring man over whose head the bludgeon was held. But now a different idea has come in. These gentlemen realize that this thing will not go any longer. There is no use in the Massey Harris people saying: We can not manufacture in Canada without protection, when it is said that when the war broke out there was $8,000,000 or $10,000.000 owing to them in Germany alone, and when they are able to sell in every part of the world that requires farm implements. They can not say that any longer. But these gentlemen have another story entirely. They say: Yes, it is true that we sell in foreign countries, but we have to slaughter our goods to sell them there, and if we do not lose money we barely come out alive. But we have to keep our overhead expenses down, and in order to keep these expenses down we are compelled to manufacture in large quantities, and by selling to the home consumer at a good big price and by selling to the outsider at cost or a little less, we keep down our overhead expenses and are able to keep our factories going. That is the latest reason I have heard advanced, and a good many times in the last few years. When that is exploded it will be something else.

That brings us back to the main question, why on earth should the Canadian farmer be compelled to pay toll to the man who manufactures his machinery when that same man can supply the home market and compete with every other manufacturer in the world, in the foreign market, successfully? I believe that the Canadian manufacturer is doing a bigger business to-day in many foreign markets than all the rest of the manufacturers of farm machinery in the world combined. That is the real practical question, and that is the question that this House has to decide to-night, so far as that branch of the amendment is concerned. That is a question which I quite understand my hon. friend the Minister of Finance can vote down without any question at all, because he is constituted that way. It really comes natural to him, and I do not think he is violating any principles when he is voting against it. But I want to appeal to some of my farming friends on the other side, some of the men whose constituents are buying these articles; I wonder how they can vote down an amendment of this kind. It may be possible, but it seems to me that they will have to do a good deal of figuring on it in order to square this matter with their own consciences, let alone the best interests of the people whom they represent. I want to say again that I am the last man in this House who would by my vote advocate a tariff policy which would drive any man out of business. I do not claim to be a free trader; I do not claim to be a protectionist; I claim that, in a new country like Canada, it is the proper policy to meet conditions as they exist; and if you find that a certain manufacturer or firm of manufacturers has reached such a point of excellence, if they have made so much money that they can manufacture as cheaply as in any other place in the world, if they can exclude the foreign products from our markets, and are able to and do so manufacture and do so sell that we get no imports and get no revenue from customs duties on these articles, then, Sir, I can see no reason why that concern should be allowed to mulct the common people to the extent they are mulcting them. If you cannot make these articles free, then bring the tariff down as far as you can, so that it will give the manufacturers sufficient protection to enable them to live, but not sufficient protection to enable them to become multi-millionaires at the expense of the common people, who are compelled to buy their wares. I have no hesitation in saying that the time has come when the duty on farm machinery should be absolutely wiped out. No man need tell me that these people can in ordinary times sell their goods to Britain, Australia, New Zealand, Germany, Austria, Russia and France at less than cost; they are not fools enough to do that. No man need tell me that they are not making bigger profits out of the Canadian consumer than they have any right to make, or than this Parliament is justified in allowing them to make.

What is true of farm implements is true of the rest of the items enumerated in the proposed free list contained in this amendment. I have discussed cement; I wish, for a moment, at the expense of being tiresome, to discuss a matter which is of greater importance to my constituency, to my province and to the province of Quebec than almost anything else in this list, and that is fertilizer.

Before the war broke out we were buying the best grade of fertilizer—what we call 4. 8 and 10; that means 10 per cent potash—at about $40 a ton. On account of the duty the price has gone up. To the credit of my hon. friend, I may say that he did not apply the 7½ per cent duty to fertilizers, but a duty of 10 per cent still applies. We cannot successfully grow potatoes without fertilizers. While a few years ago the potato industry was carried on more largely in Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick, to-day the greatest producers of potatoes in Canada are the people on the St. Lawrence river, in the counties of Rimouski, Gaspe, Temiscouata, Kamouraska, Bonaventure. My hon. friend who sits opposite (Mr. Boulay) will bear out what I say in this respect. Hundreds of thousands of bushels of the finest potatoes in the world are grown in these districts. But to-day we cannot get fertilizer, containing potash; we are compelled to pay $55 a ton for fertilizer without potash. In view of the small revenue the minister gets from this source, he is not justified in compelling the producers of potatoes to pay the present duty upon fertilizers. He talks about production, and more production. He says that the Government have taught the people to produce more; yet he piles up the cost of producing that staple article of food by the imposition of a duty of 10 per cent, resulting in the farmer being obliged to pay from $5 to $10 more for fertilizers than he would otherwise have to pay. Perhaps I am speaking more warmly on this subject than is becoming, but I know the conditions. I buy the article myself; all my neighbours and constituents have to buy it and I know that they cannot produce without it. Yet we are told to produce more. When I was home last week, the great cry of the people was: we cannot get fertilizer on account of the enormous price which the minister makes us pay for it. The removal of that duty would be a great benefit to the people of Prince Edward Island, New Brunswick, and Quebec. If for no other reason, therefore, I am compelled to support this amendment because of the vital importance of this matter to my province.

Another principle which is set forth in this resolution is dear to my heart. I shall not call it trade for trade, as my hon. friend did this afternoon; I shall call it reciprocity. When the House met after the election of 1911 it was stated by some hon. gentlemen opposite that reciprocity was dead. I said that reciprocity was just as much alive as ever. Call it reciprocity, trade for trade, or what you will; the principle involved in reciprocity was good in 1911, and it is better to-day. The Minister of Finance has admitted that he has gone back on every word that he uttered on reciprocity. He has eaten crow with the best face of any man that I ever saw in my life, and he smacked his lips over it. He said, I know I was wrong in what I said in 1911; nothing is so good for this country as free wheat. And he has admitted that the member for St. Antoine (Sir Herbert Ames) was wrong when he said that if wheat be made free, the very cornerstone of our trade is removed. The member for St. Antoine a few weeks ago, meek as a little boy, said: free wheat is all right; we have to take it; it is a good thing. These hon. gentlemen, by advocating the adoption of free wheat, have said in effect that reciprocity is good in 1917 and that it was good in 1911. Millions of people in Canada say that reciprocity is right. In this amendment is embodied the principle that food and food products, animals and the foods therefor, should be admitted into Canada free of duty from any country which makes similar tariff provisions. Some gentlemen contended six years ago that if this policy were adopted, you would not be able to sell cattle. I do not know whether I could tell you what some gentlemen argued in the West at that time—they told so many different stories in different parts of the country—but one thing they said in New Brunswick was that if we had reciprocity, the Yankees would come over and steal our lumber. They are coming over now and paying $35 a thousand for our lumber, which we used to sell at $12 and $14. Of course, I do not say that that is entirely because the duty has been taken off lumber, but a large part of the result may be attributed to that cause. We have secured a certain amount of reciprocity by the removal of duties by the United States. I am going to watch some of my good Conservative friends with a great deal of interest so that I may see the wry faces they will make if the Americans put back the duty of 10 per cent on many of the articles going into their country from Canada. You will find out then whether hon. gentlemen opposite believe in reciprocity or not. It will also be a matter of interest and curiosity to me—possibly I may be animated by another feeling—to watch some of my good friends and see how they take the imposition of say $6 or $7 on a two year old steer, $3 on a thousand feet of lumber, and various amounts on other things now going to the United States and for which we are receiving magnificent prices. I am glad, Sir, that my hon. friend has included this principle in his amendment. I repeat that the principle is just as good to-day as it was in 1911. The items mentioned in the amendment are just as deserving of consideration as was free wheat. Free wheat is good for the farmer of the West. It is good for the farmer of the East, because it gives him cheaper bread, but free wheat does not mean so much to him as the removal of the duty on some of the items included in this amendment would mean.

The fourth paragraph of the amendment provides for a general reduction of tariff on all artiles imported into Canada except luxuries. With that principle I heartily agree. But one article which, in my judgment, has ceased to be a luxury—which, as a matter of fact, has become a real necessity to the farming community—is the automobile.

I realize that down to a very recent date automobiles were a luxury; and while I think a duty of 42½ per cent is outrageous, still there is no doubt there was a time when that duty was justifiable. The time, however, has now come when in the West and in the East and in all the farming communities of Canada, the people not only want the automobile for the pleasure of the thing, but really demand it and regard it as a necessity on the farms. Probably nothing has made farm life in Canada as pleasant and attractive as has the automobile and also the rural telephone, and I know of no greater pleasure than to see a farmer, after he has done his day's work, take his wife to town in his car and perhaps go to a picture show or a theatre and return home by ten o'clock. The automobile has become a necessity for a farmer taking trips into town for repairs for his machinery and for a hundred and one things that are required around a farm. When one realizes that an automobile which costs $1,000 in the state of Maine, ten miles from my home, would cost $1,425 on this side of the line, one can hardly credit it. I can go ten miles from my home and buy a car for four or five or six hundred dollars less than I can buy it in my own town. I would not mind paying a reasonable duty on an automobile because I know that we must raise a revenue, but why an automobile should be worth $100 more on this side of the Detroit river than on the other is something that I can not understand, and why on earth a better class of car costs $200 more in my town than in the town of Houlton in the United States ten miles away, is, something also that I cannot understand. There is another thing that makes the tax even more burdensome. This old story about infant industries is becoming practically exhausted in Canada. Up to a few years ago, one heard it said: You must encourage the infant industries. But some of those infants have stuck to the bottle for many years, and some of them will die upon the bottle, let alone live on it. I find, as regards the automobile industry, that not only do we manufacture a very large percentage of the automobiles which we use in Canada, but last year we exported $9,431,000 worth of automobiles and we shipped them to all parts of the world. When I first saw those figures I thought they referred to motor trucks and cars of that kind that were sent over to Great Britain on account of this war. That is not the case. A very small proportion went to Great Britain, but we shipped automobiles to the Argentine, Australia, New Zealand, Newfoundland, the West Indies, and other countries. Therefore, we are able to manufacture automobiles, not only for our own market, but to compete with the rest of the world, and yet you tell me you require a duty of 42½ per cent to-day in order to keep a few little automobile factories running in Canada. The Ford factory is the only one in Canada that is making automobiles; the other so-called automobile factories are only assembling the parts which are imported from the United States. I will admit that they manufacture a few bodies, but outside of factories manufacturing bodies and assembling parts, I know of no concern in Canada except the Ford which manufactures automobiles. There was one in Toronto, but it was sold out to an American firm which is now using that plant only for assembling parts. It is true that the parts that are imported are subject to a duty of 42½ per cent, but in the whole realm of commerce there is no article that is more susceptible of manipulation than an automobile part. Take, for example, the rear axle containing the differential. You take an ordinary $1,000 or $1,200 car, and you want to bring in that axle, and the factory will charge you $125 for it, but they will bring it in as a casting, and it will cost them only $15 and they will pay the duty on the value of that article as a casting. They bring these parts in at a nominal figure, and they pay duty only on that figure; they assemble the parts in this country and they sell them to our farmers adding 42½ per cent on the total value. For instance, they might pay $100 in duty on the parts of an automobile that they assemble, and they will charge the people $400 for doing so. That is a matter which comes as near to me as anything in the whole realm of commerce, and it is something which I am, in the most serious possible manner, calling to the attention of the Minister of Finance. It is true we get some revenue on importations of automobiles, but we shall get a good deal more revenue if you will cut the duty in half or even cut it down to a third, because in that case you will find that the people will import more automobiles. The farmer on the western prairie who cannot afford to buy a car now will be able to have one then, and a man down East who has saved up $500 or $600 and who says that he cannot afford to pay $1,000 for an automobile will be able to buy one. In that way, more automobiles will be imported and the Government will get as much revenue out of those importations as they will under present conditions, but the man or the American company who has a factory over in Canada assembling automobiles will not make as much money out of the business as he is making out of the people of Canada to-day. There is no doubt about that. As far as I am concerned—and I think I am voicing the sentiment of every man in this House, no matter on which side he sits—I am sure we would all like to see the ordinary farmer, and even the labouring man, if you will, be in a position to buy an automobile, rather than to see the dollars piled up in the pockets of the American manufacturer who assembles parts in the Dominion of Canada.

The last item of this amendment refers to the British preference, and I know there is nothing in the whole list which is so distasteful to the Minister of Finance as is the proposal to increase the British preference. I do not think my hon. friend feels that way towards it because he has any real objection to trading with Great Britain. I am not charging him with anything like that; I never charge any one with disloyalty, because I think the meanest thing on earth is for one Canadian to say to another: You are disloyal. I am not intimating that for one moment. The minister knows that there is no greater blow to high protection in Canada than the British preference. He knows that the British preference works out, not in one way, but in three ways. He knows that if you increase the British preference to 50 per cent, then any article which can be brought into Canada from Great Britain or any of the Dominions that have the same arrangement, will come in by paying half the duty which the same article will pay if imported from a foreign country, and if the matter would stop there, the minister would not feel so badly about it; but he knows there are two other phases to this question. He knows that if the foreigner wants to bring that same article into Canada he must sell it at a price which, with the duty added, will not make the cost to the consumer any more than the British article will cost with one-half the duty added, and he knows that he will probably derive less revenue unless he has a bigger importation. There is, however, a third phase of the question which is still more important to my hon. friend and to Canada, and that is that the home manufacturer must sell his goods at a price low enough to compete with the article which comes from Great Britain, with one-half of the duty chargeable against it, or with the foreign article cut down in price so as to meet the British preference. Therefore, every time you increase the British preference on an article you make that article cheaper, whether it comes from Great Britain or from a foreign country or if it is manufactured in Canada. You will find you are not only making it cheaper to the consumer, but you are stimulating importations, because if it is cheaper, people will be able to buy more of it; more of it will be imported and the result will be at the end of the year you will have just as much revenue with the British preference increased to 50 per cent as you have now with the British preference around 33 per cent.

I have gone over the paragraphs of this amendment a little more in detail perhaps than was necessary, but it is a very important matter to me. I do not want to leave this subject before trying to answer in a very hurried way the question which my hon. friend put this afternoon, and I knew it was coming, because the very moment you talk about reducing the tariff hon. gentlemen opposite ask: Where are you going to get the revenue? I tried to take down the minister's exact words this afternoon. He said: "We could not raise the money without the tariff; it is and must be the main source of revenue." He said the tariff could not be revised in war time, and that we could not get along without it. I have not asked him to do without the tariff. I have never asked and never will ask a government to remove the tariff on any article if by so doing they would prevent the article being manufactured in Canada under ordinary conditions. But I say and shall continue to say until common sense methods prevail with the government of this country that when an article is manufactured so cheaply in Canada as to prevent the importation of the foreign article, that article requires no protection; it is paying no duty, and it requires no protection. In the case of such articles I ask the Government to remove the duty entirely, so as to allow the people to get the benefit of the amount of money they are now paying to the Canadian manufacturer. When I find that the duty on an article makes the people of this country pay more than they should for their boots and shoes and many other items I might mention, then I say it is the duty of the Government to cut that duty down to such a point that the people will not be compelled to pay an exhorbitant price, and the country will get some revenue by the importation of the foreign article. I have already pointed out that in the case of boots and shoes the duty amounts to less than three-quarters of a million dollars, including the 7½ per cent. I would cut the duty down so that the people would have the choice of bringing the article in at a fair price or of buying from Ames, Holden & McCready at a fair price. I would put those people where they could not sell their watered stock for good money and they say later on: You must not touch the duty on these goods or you will render valueless the stock for which good money has been paid. And similarly with regard to cement and many other items, such as farm machinery and automobiles to quite an extent. My hon. friend will say: We must have these duties in war time, because we cannot raise money in any other way. I do not think my hon. friend does himself justice when he makes the statement that he cannot raise revenue except by the customs tariff. My hon. friend has a pretty good opinion of himself as a financier, and I admit that he knows quite a lot about finance; he understands the question pretty well.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Not any too well.

Mr. CARVELL: Fairly well. He knows more about it than I do, if that is any consolation to him, and I cannot understand why a man who knows as much about finance as he does, who can keep the finances of this country in a better condition than the finances of any other country in the world except the United States, cannot find some other method of raising the revenue except by customs tariff. My hon. friend has found out something. He has taxed the business interests of Canada. He has taxed the banks. My! but he hit them a gentle blow, one of those beautiful lovetaps that my hon. friend reserves for the big interests. He has learned how to tax the common people on every letter they send across the seas. He knows how to do all these things, and now he comes and says, I can do no more, I am done.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Oh, no.

Mr. CARVELL: My hon. friend is taking all these taxes out of the common people anyhow, and no matter whether he has to raise $230,000,000 or $330,000,000 in the future he realizes that it has to come out of the pockets of the people of Canada in some way or other, and does he mean to tell me that with all his knowledge of finance he knows of no way of raising the revenue except by custom duties? Never for a moment.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: He is too modest.

Mr. CARVELL: He is not as modest as all that. I will not go over the question of an income tax, as we have discussed that time and again in this House. I will not discuss the land tax, though personally I believe there is no tax in the world that is so equitable and just. They tried the experiment in the province of Ontario last year, imposing only a small tax,about 2 mills I think—it was a nominal sum any way—and they got more money than they knew what to do with. I am sure that the Minister of Finance by imposing a moderate land tax could raise half the revenue he now raises from the whole Dominion. But he only wants a tariff revenue, and he says that he knows of no other method. I can tell him that there will be some man in his seat before very long who will know what to do, and how to do it, and just as soon as the people of this country get a chance they will show him what to do. I want to tell him that all is not well in Canada, notwithstanding the very glowing statement he made this afternoon. Go and talk to the labouring man in the towns and villages in any part of Canada. I grant you that he is getting more money than he ever did before, perhaps $2.50 a day, or if he is a munitions worker from $3 to $5 a day. But go into that man's home and ask him what he thinks of present conditions. You will find that he has to pay $7 or $8 for a pair of boots for his wife which formerly cost him only $3.50 and $16 a barrel for flour and 13 and 14 cents for a loaf that used to cost him 10 cents. He cannot buy woollens at all, because the price has gone up out of sight, and my hon. friend has imposed a tariff of 35 or 40 per cent. Every trticle of food and clothing that the poor man uses in his home has been multiplied in price until he does not know how to make ends meet. The common people of this country are thinking deeply about these matters. To the ordinary labouring man or the clerk in the store, the man working for a daily wage or for a small salary, the problem of the cost of living is becoming—I was going to say almost a greater problem than the war itself, and it is men of this class who are winning the war; it is not the plutocrats who have shed their blood and spent their money to win this war. It is the common everyday people, the labouring man and the farmers' sons who have volunteered and gone to the front, and the question which is agitating the common people of this country to-day is the high cost of living. Wherever three or four women are gathered together, whether they be rich or poor, high or low, after discussing the latest hats you will always find them talking about the cost of living. The question is in everybody's mouth; the problem is with every man who has to earn a living for himself and family. No matter how my hon. friend may draw his cloak around this question, no matter what sophistries his monopolistic friends may preach to him, I can tell him that the common people are thinking of this question as they never thought of anything before since Canada was Canada, and the people will find a way if my hon. friend cannot; they will find a way, and they will find the man to get rid of this burden on the necessities of life. They will show my hon. friend how to raise the revenue, and how to make the man who has grown rich out of tariffs and out of the present war pay his fair share into the treasury of this country, not only while the war is on but after the war, when I believe terrible conditions will exist and additional taxation will have to be raised.

Mr. F. L. SCHAFFNER (Souris): I understand the argument of the hon. member for Carleton, N.B. (Mr. Carvell) to be that duties have very much effect upon the prices of goods. I desire to call his attention to several items with which I am familiar. First, I take agricultural implements—I speak particularly of the mowers and binders used in the west. The reduction of duty that has been made in agricultural implements has been made almost wholly by the Conservative Government. The duty was at first 35 per cent. A Conservative Government reduced it to 20 per cent. The succeeding Liberal Government reduced this duty to 17½ per cent, and under the Conservative Government it has been cut down to 12½ per cent. Yet we are paying more for agricultural implements to-day than we paid when the duty was 17½ per cent. Take the case of flour. The duty on this article has been removed altogether. We are paying more for flour than we did when a duty was charged. The hon. gentlemen referred also to boots. The duty under the Conservative Government was 25 per cent. Our friends on the other side, though they talk so much of low tariff, increased that duty to 30 per cent. I did not rise for the purpose of making any extensive remarks, but I wished to call the attention of the hon. gentleman to these facts, which he cannot dispute.

Mr. CARVELL: Why did not you ask the hon. member for St. Antoine (Sir Herbert Ames) to make that statement.

Mr. SCHAFFNER: I make my own statements without reference to any other man. It happens that the hon. member for St. Antoine sits beside me, but that has nothing to do with the matter. The question is, are these facts or are they not?

Mr. CARVELL: Is the hon. gentleman asking a question or making a statement?

Mr. SCHAFFNER: I was correcting the hon. gentleman's error.

Mr. CARVELL: Then he does not expect any reply from me.

Mr. J. M. DOUGLAS (Strathcona): No resolution has come before this House which it has given me greater pleasure to support than this amendment proposed by the hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver). The reduction of the tariff is an idea very dear to the hearts of the people of that part of the country which I represent, and for that reason as well as because it commends itself to my own judgment, I strongly support this amendment. The Minister of Finance this afternoon took great credit to the Government for the raising of 400,000 men and sending them overseas to take part in the war. From my knowledge of the methods of recruiting and equipping the Canadian army, I take exception to the hon. minister's statement. I come from a city which, I believe, has done more for recruiting, according to its population, than any other in the Dominion, and I think the same applies to the province of Alberta as a whole. I say that our success in raising a large number of men for the front was not owing to any action taken by this Government, but to the extremely patriotic feeling which pervaded all classes of the people. When the war broke out no government could have stopped the men in my province from volunteering and enlisting; in fact, when it was first known that war was on, the difficulty was to prevent men from going. I venture to say that if the Department of Militia had used business-like methods in recruiting the first contingent, and, later on, the rest of the men required for overseas service we should not to-day be confronted with the problem of conscription.

The Minister of Finance also took a great deal of credit to the Government for the way in which the Canadian war loans have been subscribed. I admit that these domestic loans were a new departure in finance, and the minister is entitled to credit for his acumen in resorting to them. But he must not overlook the fact that there is no investment in Canada which offers equal security and equal return on investment with exemption from war taxation. It would be poor business on the part of any man or woman in Canada who has money to invest not to buy a bond or more as their circumstances permit.

I was much disappointed when the Budget was brought down to find that no tariff changes were made. We are confronted with the terrible difficulty of providing foodstuffs for the Allies in spite of obstacles to transportation. We are urged on all sides to increase production and to do everything to enable the Allies to feed and care for the men at the front. In my province, where agriculture is a basic industry, and where conditions are excellently suited for the raising of all kinds of grain, one of the first problems confronting our farmers is the duty on agricultural implements. We believe that the western prairie provinces are bound to be the greatest grain-producing section in the whole Dominion. We believe, therefore, that it is absolutely essential that everything should be done that can be done to make production there as economical and as efficient as possible. For that reason I am strongly in favour of the amendment, which declares for the reduction of taxes on implements required for use on the farm. A commission has been appointed to investigate the high cost of living, and to learn what can be done to ameliorate the conditions under which the masses of the people are struggling at this time. We have also had a discussion in this House within the past few days as to price agreements which are to-day in effect as between the manufacturers and wholesale dealers. I understand that this commission, appointed by the Minister of Labour, has been investigating these matters from coast to coast, and that they have in their possession copies of such price agreements as were brought to the attention of the House by the hon. member for Moosejaw (Mr. Knowles) a few nights ago. And yet we are not informed that any action has been taken by the Government, or even by the Minister of Labour, to bring the parties to these agreements to time, and thus to effect a saving in the cost of the necessaries of life for the people. The combines between manufacturers and wholesalers have been in existence for a great many years.

One particular combine which I have seen in my province is the sugar combine. The sugar refining industry is in the hands practically of three or four firms in Canada.

The British Columbia Refining Company operate from Vancouver east as far as Brandon. From there the eastern manufacturers control the price and it is a straight combine price in every city and town between Vancouver and Montreal. The question of value apparently does not enter into the computation at all. Sugar is sold cheaper in Brandon than in Regina and yet it may be supplied from Vancouver. Sugar is sold cheaper in Yorkton than in Edmonton and yet the distance from the shipping point is from 300 to 500 miles greater in the former case than in the latter. The same thing applies with respect to a great many other lines of staple goods which are absolutely required by the people of this country. Yet, the commission which was supposed to deal with questions of this kind and to find a solution, if possible, has done nothing to alleviate conditions and to-day we are confronted with a terrible rise in prices of all food commodities. Prices have gone on increasing until we have reached a stage where it is practically impossible for people to live with any degree of comfort.

Another question in regard to which the Government has been derelict in its duty is that of supplying seed to the farmers for the increased production which hon. gentlemen opposite have been advocating. The cultivation of potatoes is a matter of very great importance to the country at the present time. I suppose there is no food product which is in more common use and which is of greater importance to the people of any country than the potato and the importance of a plentiful supply of this commodity is obvious to every one. The Government, through their Minister of Agriculture, or through the commission appointed to investigate the high cost of living, must have known that the supply of seed potatoes was very scarce and that the price was skyrocketing. Yet the Minister of Agriculture did nothing outside of making a few inquiries in the different provinces as to the number of bushels of potatoes which were available. The result of this inquiry must have shown him that the situation was extremely serious inasmuch as he was informed that only in three provinces had they a surplus. He took steps to provide seed wheat, oats and barley to the farmers of eastern Canada and yet he neglected to arrange for a supply of seed potatoes which his department could have secured for the farmers of Ontario, Quebec and other provinces who required that seed. The result of that policy of inaction is that to-day when planting is on, a large acreage which otherwise would have been planted with potatoes will go without the necessary seed being put in to ensure a satisfactory crop to our own people. Any one planting potatoes has to pay such an exorbitant price for the seed that it is very questionable, even if he has a good crop, whether he will get a sufficient return in the fall for the cost of the seed and his labour.

Last year a duty was added to a food necessity of the western provinces particularly which is obtained from British Columbia and the western states. I refer to apples. Apples have become a necessity of the prairie provinces. We are not able to grow them ourselves and it is absolutely essential that we should import them. This Government in its wisdom, last year, raised the duty on apples until to-day the duty is 90 cents a barrel. This was done at the request of the growers in British Columbia. I think that is a fair statement. I do not think that any growers in eastern Canada particularly urged upon the Government that this duty should be increased. We, in western Canada at least, thought that we were being mulcted for the benefit of the fruit growers of British Columbia. The result of that duty has been this: We were told at the time that the duty was put on that we would get as good a grade of fruit as we had been getting, that we would pay no more for apples, that the British Columbia growers would be able to produce and ship at a profit, and we would be encouraging industry in our own country and not doing ourselves any harm. What has been the result? I have lived in western Canada for twenty-two years and I have never yet seen as poor a quality of apples put on the market in Alberta as we had this year and we have never paid as high a price. The argument may be put forth that the apple crop was a failure in Ontario last year and that that was the reason why our apples were higher in the West. As a matter of fact, we do not bring apples from eastern Canada farther west than Regina or Moosejaw. The apples consumed in Alberta come from British Columbia or from Oregon. In spite of the fact that a duty of 90 cents per barrel was put on apples, importers were compelled to buy from Oregon and Washington quite a large quantity on which a considerable duty was paid. In answer to a question I put on the Order Paper I was informed that the total amount of duty collected from the importation of green apples imported into Canada from the United States during the fiscal year ended March 1917, was $250,155.90. That was the import duty on apples coming in from the United States. I also asked what was the total amount of duty collected on green apples imported into Canada from the United States at the ports of Calgary and Edmonton respectively during the year ending March, 1917, and I find that in Calgary we paid duty to the amount of $17,373.60 and in Edmonton to the amount of $20,038.90. When this duty of 90 cents a barrel was put on it was generally stated, by gentlemen representing British Columbia constituencies, that it was not a duty for revenue. It was absolutely a protective duty imposed explicitly for the purpose of shutting out American apples from Canada, yet, in spite of that fact, we in western Canada, in the two ports of Calgary and Edmonton, were forced to pay duty on American apples from the state of Washington and the state of Oregon to the extent of nearly $40,000, protecting the whole British Columbia crop to the extent of 90 cents a barrel. The way in which we were served was that we received the poorest stuff. The grading was the poorest it has ever been in my experience, and I question very much if the British Columbia grower is much better off than he was a year ago before that additional duty was put on. If the Minister of Agriculture were in his place I would call his attention to the way in which his inspectors have been marking and classifying apples under the pure food laws. The grading of apples coming in from the American side, I was told by importers who had no object in telling me this that except that it was the absolute truth, is entirely unsatisfactory; I am told that no matter what the grade of apples coming in from the other side might be, the inspector on the Canadian side marked the fruit number two. It is well known that the grading of apples on the American side in the Western States is higher in standard than on the Canadian side, and the object of marking all the stock number two is something that I do not understand.

Upon the amendment introduced by the hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver), I want to make a few remarks, even at the risk of repeating many of the arguments that have been so ably advanced by the hon. member for Edmonton and the hon. member for Carleton, N. B. (Mr. Carvell).

[Mr. Douglas.]

The subject is so dear to my heart, that I feel it my duty to discuss this question, even at the risk of such repetition. The first clause is that wheat, wheat flour and other products of wheat be placed upon the free list. This policy has been adopted by the present Government to a large extent, with the exception of bran, shorts, middlings and other products of wheat. The principle has been accepted by the Government, so that in asking that this clause be enlarged to include bran, shorts, middlings and other products of wheat, we are not asking anything which should not be granted if the Government are sincere in placing these articles of wheat, wheat flour and semolina on the free list by Order in Council a few weeks ago.

The second clause relates to farm implements and machinery and farm tractors. I have gone into the amount of duty which we have collected on the different lines of farm machinery during the year 1915-16, the last period for which returns are available, and I find that on nearly all the lines of farm implements that might be used on a western farm, including binders, cultivators, drills, rollers, harrows, hay loaders, hay tedders, horserakes, manure spreaders, threshing machines, ploughs, reapers, mowing machines and parts thereof, other agricultural implements and parts thereof, the total amount of duty collected was $446,111.49—less than half a million dollars collected on all those different items of farm machinery, articles which have got to be used by every farmer, not only in western Canada but also in eastern Canada, on which he is mulcted to the amount of that duty, no matter whether it is 12½ per cent or 25 per cent, although we are being urged, not only by the Canadian Government but by the Imperial Government as well, to conduct a policy of production, and yet more production, nothing is done on the part of the Government to assist the farmer in any way or to induce him to cultivate more land. It is well known that a farmer cannot bring additional land under cultivation in a day, or a week, or six months; if he is a business man, he must look ahead and see that he will have a market for his produce, that if he breaks up or acquires additional land and puts it under cultivation the transaction will be a profitable one to him, and that it will be to his advantage to raise more cattle, sheep, grain or whatever he is producing. If the Government had been anxious to assist in procuring more production, the removal of the duty on farm implements would have been a great assistance. It is what the farmers have insistently asked for for many years, and it would have had more effect in stimulating production than almost anything else that I know of. In relation to farm tractors, it is difficult to ascertain the exact amount of duty paid. These tractors are included in the customs returns with large and heavy tractors and it is almost impossible to find out the duty collected on these particular items which would be affected by this resolution.

As for flour—and saw-milling machinery, the amount of duty collected on these items is not very great, and if we place lumber and flour on the free list, it is only fair that the machinery which is used in the producing of these articles should also be placed on the free list. The amount of duty collected on sawmilling machinery for 1915-16 was only $36,825.27. The amount of duty on mining machinery, much of which is already free, including ore crushers, with which are included rock crushers (which are not properly mining machinery) was $90,587.

In going over the entire list, I find that on coal oil, kerosene oil, the amount of duty collected in 1915-16 was $160,534.41; and on the products of petroleum, which would include lubricating and fuel oil, another $155,993.63, which makes a total duty collected of $316,528.04. When you consider that practically every one in Canada occupying a position in the rural life of the country and every labouring man in many parts of the cities of Canada is a user of kerosene oil, it is surprising to find that we are forced to pay to a combine a duty of two and one-half cents a gallon. The Government receives only $316,000 from that source of revenue. While the duty of 2½ cents does not seem to be very high, on an ad valorem basis it means a protection of 45 per cent or over. This is a tariff not for revenue, but absolutely for protection. It is put on for the purpose of preventing the importation of oil, and it has the effect of enhancing the price to every user of oil in Canada.

Mr. CARVELL: What is the duty on the raw product?

Mr. DOUGLAS: The raw product is free, with the exception of 7½ per cent war tax. The hon. member for Carleton has gone into the question of cement, showing that we received less than $10,000 during the year 1915-16 from the duty on that article.

From the duty on fertilizers we received $59,986.25. I have given the amounts received during the year 1915-16 by way of duty upon the items included in the second section of the amendment submitted by the hon. member for Edmonton, the total of which amounted to $959,418.74. It would not unduly press upon the revenues of Canada to give relief to a large number of people and to aid production by the removal of these duties, because the revenue would be affected only to the extent of less than a million dollars.

The next principle set forth in the resolution is:

> That staple foods and food products, other than wheat and flour, domestic animals and foods therefor, be admitted into Canada free of duty when coming from and being the product of any country admitting like Canadian articles into such country free of duty.

This is the principle which was advocated in 1911 in the reciprocity pact. I was firmly convinced at that time that the principle was correct, sound and logical, and I have since had no reason to change my mind.

That substantial reduction be made in the general tariff on all articles imported into Canada except luxuries is another principle which we, as Liberals, stand for. I hope that the Government will, by adopting the amendment, carry that principle into effect.

I was able to observe some of the benefits of the British preference when it was first introduced in 1897. I was engaged in business at that time, and I saw the practical workings of the reduction of a straight 33 1-3 per cent in the duties upon all articles imported into Canada from Great Britain. From the consumer's standpoint, no act of any Canadian Government was ever of greater value than the putting into effect of the British preference in 1897. We were enabled to import manufactured goods of good quality at reasonable prices, giving to the consumers an opportunity of obtaining the finest line of cotton and woollen goods ever brought into the country. We were able to give more trade to the Mother Country than we have ever given since; our present trade returns with the United States show that that is the case. When the Liberal Government changed the British preference of 1897 they made a great mistake. If they had left the preference at a straight 33 1-3 per cent the consumers of Canada would have derived from it an untold benefit. I want to see that preference re-established and enlarged so that we shall be able to purchase cotton and woollens from the country which leads the world in the manufacture of those articles. While certain lines of manufactured goods in Canada would be adversely affected, we must not forget that the large body of consumers must be taken care of or they will not stay in the country.

I should like to make a few suggestions as to how the Government might raise the amount of money which would be taken away by putting on the free list the articles enumerated in this amendment. I am living in a part of the country which has a tremendous amount of unimproved farm lands. I am quite in accord with the view expressed by the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Cruise) that the Government would be well advised in putting a direct tax on all unimproved lands in Canada. I have not gone into the figures as carefully as the member for Dauphin with regard to the amount which could be derived from such a tax, but I am convinced that it would be substantial, more than enough to compensate any change made in the tariff to alleviate the condition of the working people. I would advocate, also, a graduated income tax. I would exempt incomes of $2,000 and less, for a man who earns $2,000 a year is not earning any too much. The tax on incomes exceeding that amount would, if properly looked after by the Minister of Finance and his department, result in the raising of a very large revenue. He has imposed a graduated tax on corporations and firms; I do not know that I would go any further than he has gone along that line. He is probably looking into the question carefully, and is, perhaps, getting as much money from that source as he can get.

As to the question of free wheat, I would urge the Government, if they do not accept the amendment of the member for Edmonton, to make the measure providing for free wheat a permanent tariff change. In the growing of wheat it is absolutely essential that the producer shall have some guarantee that his market will not be interfered with by the mere whim of any ministry which may be in power.

If he wishes to ensure permanency and stability on the part of the grain grower in western Canada, he can do that in no safer and better way than by enacting the legislation which he has brought into force by Order in Council so as to make free wheat a permanent item in the tariff law. I would also urge upon him the necessity of putting oats, barley and flax on the same level as he has put wheat. If he will grant these requests, he may even get a few votes from his Conservative friends who otherwise might vote with the Opposition.

Mr. THOMAS MACNUTT (Saltcoats): Mr. Speaker, I feel that I would be failing in my duty to my constituents if I did not support this amendment, as I, amongst others, received in 1911 a mandate from the people to support a policy along the same lines. and this mandate has not yet expired. This amendment, however, goes somewhat further than the reciprocity proposal, and I only wish that at that time the reciprocity proposal had gone as far, because although it was defeated, it would have suited me a great deal better had its scope been wider, as I have always felt that the development, not only of the West but of the whole of Canada, which it is always claimed depends upon the development of the West, depends on freedom of trade with the United States to a large extent. We, however, failed to obtain a majority in 1911, and we have been fighting for freedom of trade with the United States ever since. The hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) has now brought the matter up again. There are, in his amendment, one or two features which are not exactly as I would like them to be, and I will refer to them later. I would have been pleased had the amendment gone a little farther. The Minister of Finance stated to-day that this is a bad time to revise the tariff, but some hon. members have pointed out that the tariff has already been revised, although in an upward direction, with the exception of wheat, wheat flour and semolina. Why the Minister of Finance or the Government did, as the hon. member for Carleton stated, " eat crow " in this respect, I do not know. Some reasons have been given, one of them being that the United States are now our allies, which they were not before, and that we must pool our wheat with them. If that is good with regard to wheat and flour, it must hold good with regard to other food products.

But so far as wheat is concerned, wheat for export was always free, that is, it could be shipped through in bond and milled either in the United States, or in the old country, but under this Order in Council, we now have that great American market and we appreciate it very much, no matter what the motive may be. It is just possible for us to feel that the motive might not have been along the lines of the reasons given, and it is not an illegitimate conclusion to come to that there were other influences at work. The Financial Post, on April 28, 1917, says:

Further consideration of the free wheat legislation brings the conviction that it represents a change of policy brought about not so much by war conditions as by the influence of that growing force in Western Canada to which reference has several times been made in these columns. The recent tour of Hon. Arthur Meighen probably did more than anything else to open the eyes of the Government as to the importance of meeting the Grain Growers' demands.

In another article the Financial Post makes the statement:

Over all prevails the impression that western Canada is a growing force in politics.

Whatever the motive may have been, we are very glad to have wheat on the free list, but we would like to see a good many other things on the free list. In this regard we are not asking for a special favour; we are asking that our protection be taken away from us; we do not want it; we do not ask for it. We say: Remove the obstacle from our path; if we have anything to sell, allow us to sell it, and do not throw obstacles in the way that will prevent us from selling it. If it is important that the best market be obtained for manufactured products, why is it not important that the best market be obtained for natural products? Let us find the man who wants to buy our food products, and let us endeavor to get them as rapidly as possible to this man, whoever or wherever he may be. We do not ask for any favour; we simply want the privileges that are unjust to be taken away from those who have no right to them. We do not ask this as class legislation. The West is a new country; we have what was once Rupert's Land attached to Canada and it is now considered that it will become the most important part of Canada; but while it has millions of acres of fertile land which should be productive, that land will never produce as it should until some inducement is given to the people to go on the land and until they are made to realize that they can do so profitably. A man who has a family and responsibilities is entitled, when he engages in a life occupation, to some reward if he can secure it legitimately. It is all very well to say to a man: Go to the West and go on the land, but you must show him that he can make a permanent home there, make a living, bring up his family properly and become a good citizen. I would like to read a couple of extracts with regard to this question: In the Forest Free Press of February 1, I find this, referring to the appeal made by the Minister of Agriculture for production and more production:

In the tremendous strain yet to come a vital factor will be an ample and unfailing flow of food to England and France. No matter what difficulties may face us, the supreme duty of every man on the land is to use every energy in the direction of producing more, and still more.

Now, we hold the same view. The Government apparently does not, but at the same time they are appealing for more and more production. I have another quotation here along the same lines:

In the three last fiscal years the duty paid on imported farm implements was over six million dollars, while the taxes on home-manufactured implements was over twenty million. In the same three years Canadian manufacturers exported seventeen million dollars worth of farm implements. During these same three years the manufactures were refunded over five million dollars of the duty they had paid on their raw material. Of this amount nearly two million went in aid of the manufacturers of farm machinery and tools sold at home or abroad. The last official census shows that the total value of farm products in that year only 15 per cent on the capital invested, while the product value of farm implements manufactured was 46 per cent. on capital invested.

Under this odious and discriminating policy agriculture has become so unprofitable and has languished to such an extent that the Dominion and Provincial Governments are spending this year some two million dollars, (mostly contributed by the farmers themselves), in frantic appeals to the farmers to produce more food stuffs. The Barons are very much interested in keeping up production, for several good reasons—the Railway Barons enrich themselves in carrying those products at extortionate rates; the Implement Barons want the home market kept up, while both want the farmer to continue to pay their taxes as well as his own.

And it concludes by showing that Ontario is affected as well as the West. Mr. J. H. Pettypiece says:

The great need in this connection is the removal of every vestige of the fiscal taxation which is depopulating our Ontario farms.

That surely is not in the interests of production. It is the opinion of one who is particularly well qualified to speak on this subject. One of the worst features in connection with the tariff is that it allows the establishment of combines. There is a law against combines, I believe, but the only case that was ever proceeded with that I know of was some years ago against a lumber company at Edmonton. Combines have continued to flourish notwithstanding and to a considerable extent they are the cause of the high cost of living, and they can only exist and take shelter behind a protective tariff. I have here the opinion of Alexander Macdonald, head of the A. Macdonald Company, wholesale grocers, Winnipeg:

I am surprised at the statement in the Free Press, attributed to Mr. Carpenter, local secretary of The Canadian Manufacturers' Association, in which he says that he does not know of a single instance where any manufacturer dictates what price the retailer shall sell to the consumer for. This seems strange, particularly coming from a gentleman in Mr. Carpenter's position, who should be, but is evidently not, conversant with the facts of his office.

The Shredded Wheat Company, an American concern with a Canadian factory, not only dictates what the wholesaler shall sell shredded wheat at, but they stipulate what price the retailer shall charge the consumer, and if he does not adhere to their dictated price, they notify all wholesale jobbers that they are not to supply said retailer with shredded wheat, or if they do, they cannot procure any more shredded wheat from them. The margin of profit in this case is 40 per cent between the price paid by the jobber and what the consumer has to pay.

Then the Edwardsburg Starch Co., and the Borden Milk Co., of New York, which controls certain milk canning factories in Canada, dictates to the wholesale trade not only what price their goods shall be sold at, but goes so far as to say that if other lines of syrup and canned milk made by other manufacturers are not sold at prices dictated by them, they will not supply the wholesaler with any of their goods, which is, to say the least, a high-handed proceeding. The difference in the cost of the Canadian and the American syrup delivered in Winnipeg is 58 cents per case, or 18 per cent. The freight rate is about the same, but the duty on the American syrup, tins and war tax, is 32 per cent, and still it costs 18 per cent less than the Canadian. Then there is the Crystal White syrup, which shows even a greater margin, but we will not go into the details for the present. The wholesalers' profit on canned cream is over 16 per cent, and on Edwardsburg starch nearly 18 per cent.

The E. B. Eddy Company at Ottawa fixes the price at which the jobber is to sell their goods at and distinctly states in the agreement that if any wholesale grocery house sells matches other than those made by the Eddy Company, they will refuse to supply them with their goods. Said goods carry a profit of 20 per cent to the jobber, or over double the profit that any well conducted wholesale grocery house should get.

We understand there is in this city what is called a "Grocers' Guild," composed of jobbers, who are to some extent responsible for present conditions. They are always trying to get the manufacturers to make fixed selling prices and to refuse to sell to wholesalers who do not buy exclusively from them. When they meet the manufacturer, the question usually is, not what the manufacturer is going to charge for his goods, but what margin of profit the jobber is going to get. The manufacturer left to himself no doubt takes a good profit and in many cases allows the jobber a very liberal discount, and all this is done through the combines.

I believe that every manufacturer has a right to fix his price and terms, but I do not think he should have the right to dictate to the retailer what he shall charge, neither should any manufacturer be allowed to dictate to the jobber what he shall sell a similar line of goods for. As long as a wholesaler adheres to a manufacturer's selling price and terms, the manufacturer should be compelled to supply the jobber with his goods.

Canned goods just on the market furnishes a fair sample of the benefit of protection to the manufacturers and accounts in part at least for the high cost of living. Canadian tomatoes, 2½'s, cost $3.76 per case delivered in Winnipeg; California tomatoes, 2½'s, cost $3.67 per case delivered in Winnipeg, or 9 cents per case less than the Canadian, notwithstanding that the American goods paid duty of 69c per case, or equal to 30 per cent; war tax 17½c, equal to 7½ per cent; a difference in freight rate of 18c, or equal to 8 per cent, totalling in all 45½ per cent.

Liquid veneer, another United States product, shows a margin of 97 per cent between the price paid by the jobber and the price paid by the consumer. No wonder though our friends to the south put in a small cheap plant as the duty pays for the cost in less than two years.

Of course these small plants should be protected as they are of such importance not only to Canada but to the Empire.

Clause 2 of this amendment refers more particularly to farm implements and machinery and other articles of that kind. I have only two faults to find with it. In the first place, I should like to see wagons included. I think also that, as a matter of principle, raw material for the manufacturers affected should be provided for. I think it is only fair, when we are putting the products of these manufacturers on the free list, that their raw material should be placed on the free list also. While I criticise the clause in these respects, of course I support it, as it goes in the right direction and nearly as far as it is possible to go.

Clause 3 says:

That staple foods and food products (other than wheat and flour), domestic animals and foods therefor, be admitted into Canada free of duty when coming from and being the product of, any country admitting like Canadian articles into such country free of duty.

I suppose that would cover barley and oats, and potatoes as well, coming from countries that admit such articles from Canada free of duty.

The Council of Agriculture, which represents not the West only but at least the province of Ontario as well, considered very carefully this question of tariff, and after full deliberation produced a proposal somewhat similar to this amendment. They go a little further in some respect, and probably not so far in others. These men represent the great farming interests of Ontario and the West. They are able men, men who have the interests of the country at heart. Many of them have been heretofore supporters of the hon. gentlemen opposite.

To-day, I do not know that that is their position; they are taking a thoroughly independent stand. They believe that the most important matter outside those matters relating to the war is a very considerable reduction in the tariff. But they believe also that this has a very direct connection with matters pertaining to the war. I need not enlarge upon that. We hear it from every platform, we see it in every newspaper we know it ourselves, that it is as necessary to provide shells and munitions, and to provide food, as it is to send men into the battle line. There appears to be now a very great shortage of food throughout the world. Crop failures have occurred in many food-producing countries. And even when food is produced, there is great difficulty in getting it to the seat of war. Still we have every faith that if the food is produced means will be found to carry it to the places where it is needed.

Now, surely it will be recognized that in this matter the farmers are not advocating merely that which is in their own selfish interests. It has a much wider significance than that. It is only common sense to say that the Government should encourage in every way the occupying of our vacant land and greater production from the soil by the people now on the land. But there is no great encouragement to men to go upon the land at the present time. Prices of farm products are high, but we know that these are war prices, that they are abnormal, and only temporary. The farmer must consider not merely the conditions during the time of war but what the conditions are to be in the future. It has been often pointed out, and is easily understood, that a great burden will rest upon the country after this war is over. Our people are perfectly willing to bear that burden, there is no doubt about that; they are ready to sacrifice themselves in all ways, and to make every effort possible to put the full strength of the country into the winning of the war. There will be no complaint with regard to the taxation that the country must bear after the war, so long as that taxation is the result of efficient administration and, is equitably levied. Undoubtedly the best way to meet these burdens in the future is to encourage the people to go on the land and produce. We have the land, and with great population, an increase in the production of wealth, and a condition of general prosperity throughout the country, there will be no difficulty in meeting the obligations which we are now incurring. I am satisfied the farmers will never complain, no matter what the burden may be, provided that the weight of that burden be equitably distributed.

I revert for a moment to the platform of the Council of Agriculture in order to mention one matter which seems of importance. That platform has this clause:

> That the reciprocity agreement of 1911 which still remains on the United States statute book be accepted by the Parliament of Canada.

There is one point that was evidently overlooked when that clause was adopted. The reciprocity agreement only reduced the duty on agricultural implements to 15 per cent at the lowest. That fact was probably overlooked in the consideration of this matter. Of course, the whole is modified by the clauses in favour of placing a great variety of articles on the free list.

Now, I have some figures here compiled from the official reports and courteously furnished me by the Dominion Statistician. They relate to production. As I understand that the general wish is to adjourn very soon, I will go over these figures as quickly as I can:

	$68,135,000	$69,529,000
Increase		394,000

Now, I want to refer to Saskatchewan, where we get somewhat different results. There was an increase in that province. I will just read some of the totals:—

Saskatchewan.

Wheat.	Acres.
1916	7,352,000
1911	5,253,836
Increase	2,098,164

Therefore, it will be seen that an increase took place in the acreage under wheat in Saskatchewan. That increase was particularly in the two war years. The increase, under normal conditions, between 1911 and 1914 was only 90,164 acres, showing that there was evidently not proper encouragement given to the farmers to increase their areas under wheat. There was a sudden jump in 1915 to 8,425,600 acres from 5,344,000 acres in 1914, and in 1916 there was an almost similar amount under cultivation. This goes to show that the farmers made a greater effort. There were not as many farmers in Saskatchewan in 1915 as there were in 1914 or 1913. A great many young men had gone to the front and many settlers had left the country. Many families said: In the United States we can get our implements cheaper, we can get a larger market and we think we can make a better living there, and they went away. Notwithstanding this, there was really a greater area under crop. In oats there was a similar result. I would like to have these figures on Hansard, but there is not time to read them. There was a considerable increase in the area sown to barley. There was a sudden jump in 1914. Between 1911 and 1914 there were increases in the acreage of wheat, oats and barley.

[Mr. MacNutt.]

Mr. PUGSLEY: I understand that my hon. friend (Mr. MacNutt) says he would like these figures to be placed on Hansard, as he has not time to read them. Perhaps the Minister of Finance would allow that.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Yes.

Mr. SPEAKER: I think the hon. member should read them.

Mr. MACNUTT: I understand I must read them to have them placed on Hansard?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: May I ask my hon. friend what they are?

Mr. MACNUTT: They are comparative figures from the official returns, showing the number of acres under crop in each of the years from 1911 to 1916, and also from 1911 to 1914, showing what increases or decreases there were in normal years, and also the sudden jump in Saskatchewan and Alberta in 1915, though the farms were operated by a less number of farmers. My argument is that these men had risen to the occasion, but that in previous years, there was a comparatively small increase in acreage. We know very well that there was a less number of farmers in the West in 1915, but notwithstanding that the farmers who were there increased their area for war purposes. Are these men not worthy of being encouraged?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: If my hon. friend desires to put that on Hansard, unless it is contrary to the rules of the House, I would be very willing that he should do so.

Mr. SPEAKER: The rule is clear and the practice has been almost uniform. Only in very exceptional cases have figures, without being read, been put on Hansard.

Perhaps the hon. gentleman could read them.

Mr. MACNUTT: It will take me fifteen minutes to read them and there is a little more I want to say.

Mr. CURRIE: Is there anything there that is not contained in the blue books or the reports which have already been laid before the House?

Mr. MACNUTT: There is nothing on Hansard. The blue books are not put on Hansard.

Mr. CURRIE: The hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) put the same facts on Hansard this afternoon.

Mr. MACNUTT: Well, I will read them, and I will move the adjournment of the debate if necessary. It will only take up more time. There are some other remarks that I desire to make and some conclusions that I desire to draw; therefore, I beg to move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to and debate adjourned.

LABOUR STRIKE IN WESTERN COAL MINES.

On the motion of Sir Thomas White for the adjournment of the House:

Mr. PUGSLEY: What business will be taken up on Friday?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Either this debate upon the amendment of the hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver), or Supply.

Mr. BUCHANAN: Mr. Speaker, may I crave the indulgence of the House while I bring to the attention of the Government a matter of urgent importance. I simply want to read a telegram bearing on a very important matter in connection with the coal strike.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman would not be in order in bringing up a matter of that kind on the motion to adjourn.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Perhaps it would be sufficient if the hon. gentleman would bring the matter to the attention of the minister privately, and thus obviate any violation of the rules.

Mr. SPEAKER: I suggest that the minister withdraw his motion, because the adjournment motion is not debatable, and I do not wish to establish a dangerous precedent by allowing a debate on adjournment to arise.

Mr. CARVELL: The hon. member is not endeavouring to open a debate; he is simply calling the attention of the House to a matter of urgent public importance.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is it the pleasure of the House—

Mr. CURRIE: No, it has always been the custom of this House—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. CURRIE: I wish the rules of the House to be observed.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Buchanan) desires to bring a matter of urgent public importance to the attention of the House. If there be the unanimous consent of the House he may be permitted to do so, but if there is a single dissentient voice he cannot proceed.

Mr. BUCHANAN: I would be the last one to knowingly infringe on the rules of the House. I want merely to read this telegram which I received a few moments ago:

Calgary, Alta.,
May 23, 1917.

W. A. D. Buchanan,
House Parliament,
Ottawa.

The following wire has been forwarded today which is self explanatory. Hon. T. W. Crothers, Ottawa, Ont., having read your statement in the House, Monday, that coal strike would be settled in forty-eight hours, the Policy Committee of district eighteen, U.M.W. of A., respectfully inform you they have no information of any move of that kind, and being the only body authorized by the men on strike to negotiate a settlement, they are the only parties who can arrange the same.

Wm. Graham,
Chairman Policy Committee.

The reason I am bringing this up is that an announcement was made that the strike would be settled within forty-eight hours, and the parties concerned say that they know nothing about any negotiations in that direction.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I shall be glad to direct the attention of the Minister of Labour to the statement of the hon. member for Medicine Hat.

Motion agreed to, and the House adjourned at 11.05 o'clock.

Friday, May 25, 1917.

The House met at Three o'clock, the Speaker in the Chair.

RIGHT HON. A. J. BALFOUR.

RECEPTION TO MR. BALFOUR BY THE PARLIAMENT OF CANADA.

Mr. SPEAKER: For the information of the House, as well as of the public, I wish to announce that Right Hon. A. J. Balfour is expected to arrive in Ottawa on Sunday. That day will be observed by him as a day of rest. On Monday at 3 o'clock it is expected that he will address the Senate and the House of Commons. The members of the Senate will be our guests in this chamber on that occasion. Mr. Balfour will come here in procession from Government House by way of Sussex, Wellington and Metcalfe streets. As the space in this chamber is limited and as we wish to avail ourselves of it to the utmost, it is the purpose that the House shall meet at 2 o'clock on Monday, thus affording ample time for those who occupy seats on the floor and in the gallery to be seated when Mr. Balfour addresses the Parliament at 3 o'clock. It is hoped that the arrangement carried out on the occasion of the visit of M. Viviani will be carried out on the occasion of Mr. Balfour's visit, namely, that all those occupying seats on the floor of the House shall have the privilege of being presented to our visitor.

INSURANCE ACT OF 1910.

PROPOSED NEW ENACTMENT.

Hon. Sir THOMAS WHITE (Minister of Finance) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 53, respecting insurance.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: This Bill is introduced for the purpose of re-enacting the Insurance Act of 1910 and of making such changes as are necessary to remove those features of the existing Act which have been declared by a recent decision of the Privy Council to be unconstitutional. There are also contained in the Bill a few amendments of a non-contentious nature, which are, however, deemed necessary for the proper administration of the Act. Most of the latter amendments were contained in a Bill introduced in the session of 1914, but not then, nor since, proceeded with.

Mr. CARVELL: Will the minister explain the special provision referred to?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: By a decision of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in 1916 it was held that two most important sections of the Insurance Act of 1910, sections 4 and 70, were ultra vires. With regard to section 4, which prohibits persons and companies from carrying on the business of insurance in Canada without first obtaining a license from the Insurance Department, the Privy Council held that that section was ultra vires, but the decision does not indicate the extent to which the section is ultra vires, and consequently the validity of the entire section is so impugned that at present the department has practically lost its authority to carry out the intention of the legislation of 1910 respecting the licensing of British and foreign insurance companies doing business in Canada. Section 70 is the section of the Act which provides for penalties.

The matter has been most carefully considered by the Insurance Department, by the Department of Justice, and also by special counsel, and the conclusion has been reached that it is necessary—and I much regret to say it—to re-enact the entire Insurance Act of 1910, in order that the Insurance Department may have authority over such companies transacting business in Canada. I think it will be found that the judgment of the Privy Council relates more particularly to the authority which the Act purported to confer with respect to prohibiting provincially incorporated companies from doing business in Canada outside of the province in which they were incorporated, but the decision as it stands leaves the larger question in doubt except in so far as the view of the Judicial Committee can be gathered from the judgment as a whole. It is the opinion of the Department of Justice that if we re-enact the measure as now introduced, the Dominion Government will have full authority over British and foreign companies carrying on insurance business in Canada, as was intended by the legislation of 1910. There are some other amendments to the Act, but I believe they will be of a non-contentious nature, and some of them were embraced in an amending Bill which I introduced in the session of 1914. I am extremely reluctant to introduce this Bill at the present session, and I do so only because I believe it is in the public interest that these doubts should be cleared up and that the Act should be re-enacted so as to give the Insurance Department the authority which Parliament intended it should have over insurance companies carrying on business in Canada.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The minister has not stated what are the changes in sections 4 and 70. How is it proposed to get over the judgment of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I would submit that on the introduction of a Bill it is not usual to go so much into detail. I shall be very glad to do that on the second reading.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The minister has not explained the matter at all He has pointed out the difficulties but he has not stated how this Bill proposes to get over them.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I thought I had so stated.

Mr. PUGSLEY: You have only stated that this is a re-enactment.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: This Bill will give the Dominion Government, through the Insurance Department, authority to prohibit British and foreign companies from doing business in Canada except under license from the Insurance Department. That was the intention of the legislation of 1910, and the Act has been acted on in that sense since it was passed by Parliament; but the effect of the decision of the Privy Council is, as I have stated, to impugn the validity of section 4 which applies not only to Canadian incorporated insurance companies but to British and foreign insurance companies, and this legislation is to clear up the doubt and to re-establish the authority of the Insurance Department, that is to say, of the Dominion Government over such companies as we believe we can constitutionally take power to control under this new enactment.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

165th REGIMENT.

On the Orders of the Day.

Hon. WM. PUGSLEY (St. John City): I wish to direct the attention of the Minister of Militia to an article in the St. John Standard relating to a portion of the 165th Regiment. It appears that a certain number of the men of that regiment who were not deemed qualified to go overseas when the regiment went some time ago, were appointed to special duties at St. John, and were quartered in the Immigration Building. The account of their condition as given by this newspaper certainly demands the attention of the Minister of Militia. It is said they have not received any pay since March last, that they have not been supplied with underclothing, and their condition is such as actually to excite pity. A reporter of the Standard visited their quarters, and on the account in the newspaper reveals an extraordinary condition of affairs. I would ask the Minister of Militia and Defence to give this matter his immediate attention.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: My attention has not previously been called to the matter to which my hon. friend refers. I should be glad if my hon. friend would send me a copy of the newspaper.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I did not bring it with me because I did not want to spread the whole matter on Hansard. I am sure that my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries must have read the report.

Mr. HAZEN: I think the account appeared in the St. John Standard of Tuesday, and the paper I received yesterday said that the Militia authorities were dealing with the matter. I would suppose that their attention had been called to the article in the Standard on Tuesday.

WESTERN COAL MINING.

On the Orders of the Day.

Mr. W. F. KNOWLES (Moosejaw): Can the Minister of Labour give us any further information as to the trouble in connection with the mines in western Canada? On Monday last he said that he expected work would be resumed at all the mines within forty-eight hours.

Hon. T. W. CROTHERS (Minister of Labour): Last Wednesday night on the motion of Sir Thomas White for the adjournment of the House, the hon. member of Medicine Hat (Mr. Buchanan) when he would have been entirely out of order except for the unanimous consent of the House, read a telegram for the purpose of showing that the statement I made on Monday, and to which my hon. friend of Moosejaw (Mr. Knowles) has referred just now, was not well-founded.

Mr. KNOWLES: I am not referring to that. I was not present, and I do not know anything about it.

Mr. CROTHERS: On Sunday I received information direct that the gentleman whose name appears on the telegram that was read by my hon. friend from Medicine Hat on Wednesday night——

Mr. KNOWLES: I rise to a point of order. I submit, Sir, that in answering a question the minister should confine himself to the answer and not enter into an argument against an hon. member who is not present.

Mr. SPEAKER: I regret to say that I did not hear the remarks of the hon. member.

Mr. KNOWLES: You are greatly the loser, Sir.

Mr. CROTHERS: I am unable to answer my hon. friend's question without referring to what was said last Wednesday night. I was stating that on Sunday I received information that the gentleman whose name appeared on that telegram had been instructed to have the men return to work immediately, and it was upon the strength of that information that I said on Monday that I expected the men would resume work within forty-eight hours. The information I had received entirely warranted my making that statement, notwithstanding any telegrams that may have been received by my hon. friend from Medicine Hat or anybody else. My hon. friend desires to know if anything further has been done. We are in constant communication with the parties directly interested. We are as anxious to get the men back to work as any hon. gentleman can be, but I do not think it would be in the public interest to go into the details of what is being done. I said on Monday that I expected the men would be at work again within forty-eight hours. I can now only hope that they will be at work within the next forty-eight hours, and I am not so optimistic as I was on Monday because the instructions given to this man have not been carried out up to the present, but I hope they will be.

Mr. KNOWLES: Is it true that the Minister of Public Works has gone to the West in connection with this matter?

Mr. CROTHERS: The Minister of Public Works was in the city to-day. I am not aware that he is going West or has any intention of doing so.

CANCELLATION OF A MAIL CONTRACT.

On the Orders of the day:

Mr. E. FORTIER (Lotbinière) translation): Mr. Speaker, as the acting Postmaster General is now in his seat, I should like to know why the Post Office Department did not conform to the Order of the House and to the request made by me, a few days ago, for the bringing down of the papers and documents in connection with the cancellation of the mail contract awarded to Mr. Hippolite Lambert, of St. Antoine de Tilly, in the county of Lotbinière. I wish to be informed when the Minister will make up his mind to bring down those papers and documents.

Hon. Mr. PATENAUDE (translation): Those papers will be brought down within two or three days.

EMIGRATION RESTRICTIONS ON CANADIANS OF MILITARY AGE.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. G. H. BOIVIN (Shefford): I see in the press the announcement of new regulations concerning emigration from Canada to the United States of men of military age. It appears that by these regulations, which have already gone into effect, a man will have to have in his possession a certificate signed by a Canadian immigration inspector before he can cross the boundary. I have received quite a number of requests asking for the name and address of the immigration inspector in the city of Montreal who is competent to issue these certificates. I have not been able to supply the information. I think it would be well if the Minister of the Interior would supply the press with a list of the names and addresses of the immigration inspectors in the larger cities of Canada who are competent to issue these certificates. This would be of great service to the travelling public.

Hon. W. J. ROCHE: Any one of military age can secure these certificates from the immigration inspectors. The Dominion Government immigration inspector at Montreal is Mr. Regimbal, 172 St. Antoine street.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: These regulations are made by virtue of an Order in Council?

Mr. ROCHE: Yes. It will be laid on the Table.

DR. BRUCE'S REPORT.

Mr. MACDONALD: On Tuesday last, the Minister of Militia (Sir Edward Kemp) stated that he desired to read the report of Dr. Bruce before laying it on the Table. I presume that he has read it by this time, and I would like very much if he would bring it down.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: I confess to my hon. friend that I have not had an opportunity to read the report, and therefore it is not yet ready to be brought down.

Mr. MACDONALD: On reflection, my recollection is that my hon. friend said that as soon as he had time to have it copied the report would be brought down. Has it been copied yet?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: I think I added to that that I required to read it over and see whether it was actually an answer to the Babtie report to which the hon. gentleman had referred. I have not yet had time to read it.

Mr. MACDONALD: I do not quite understand my hon. friend. The report to which I refer is the report of Dr. Bruce in reply to the Babtie report. It does not require my hon. friend to read it to know whether it is a reply or not, it is stated to be a reply, I understand. Will not he tell us when he will bring it down? He may never read it, and never have it copied.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: I hope to give my hon. friend a definite reply not later than Monday.

SUPPLY.

PROPOSAL TO AMEND THE CUSTOMS TARIFF.

The consideration of the proposed motion of Hon. Sir Thomas White (Minister of Finance) for the Committee of Supply, and the amendment of Mr. Oliver thereto, was resumed from Wednesday, May 23.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: With the consent of the House, I desire to speak a word of explanation. An understanding has been reached with the hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver). We will proceed with the debate, as there are two members who desire to speak on the amendment this afternoon, and then we will go into Supply, the hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) withdrawing his amendment on the understanding that he will move it again on Tuesday on going into Supply.

Mr. SPEAKER: I think the course suggested by the hon. member is the solution of the difficulty. The amendment has to be disposed of before we can go into Supply.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I think that, under the rule, on Friday the House goes into Supply without motion put.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I understand that the order for Committee of Ways and Means has been called by the Clerk, in order to give my hon. friend (Mr. Oliver) an opportunity to withdraw his amendment?

Mr. OLIVER: No, Supply has been called.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Do you withdraw the amendment now?

Mr. OLIVER: No, not now.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Later on?

Mr. OLIVER: Yes.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: All right.

Mr. THOMAS MACNUTT (Saltcoats) resuming): When the debate was adjourned on Wednesday night I was quoting some figures relating to the area under crop in the several western provinces from the year 1911 to the year 1916, inclusive. So far as Manitoba is concerned, these figures showed a decrease in the area under crop of 788,933 acres. The value of the crops have increased only to the extent of $390,000, which would not pay for the advanced cost of labour and equipment. These figures go to show that there is something wrong, and we believe that this amendment, if put into effect, would, to a large extent, bring about an improvement. Now, I pass to Saskatchewan. These figures enable us to compare the acreage in 1911 with those of the succeeding years down to and including 1916. For convenience, the comparison between 1911 and 1916 is shown in summaries. But, as 1916 was a year of war, when conditions were abnormal, I make a comparison also between the two normal years of 1911 and 1914.

The total increase from 1911 to 1914 inclusive, is 563,525 acres. Increased acreage in the year 1915 is, I believe, to be accounted for very largely by the response of the farmers of the Northwest to the appeal for a greater production of food. In 1915 there was a larger crop all over the provinces, when wheat prices were low. In 1916 there was a big price, but the wheat was a failure in Manitoba because it was attacked by black rust, and a like condition prevailed in a large part of Saskatchewan. It was only in parts of that province that they had a fair crop. In Southern Alberta they were fortunate in having a very large crop and they enjoyed the benefit of greatly increased prices. These were practically the same people who about two years previously had to receive relief from this Parliament to the extent of a loan of nearly $13,000,000 because of the total failure of their crop, as a result of which they had nothing to eat. A great deal of this money was advanced for the purchase of provisions, but these people had the courage to remain there and give the country another trial, and they have received their reward. They have had two good crops since that time, and while they received a low price in 1915, they enjoyed a large price in 1916. But I would like to point out to the House that the total average price received by the farmers is not as great as it is believed to be by some people. The average includes the product of the farm of Mr. Noble, who has been quoted so often as having a thousand acres in wheat producing 54 bushels to the acre and selling at $1.87 a bushel. As I shall show later, the average price of wheat for the whole province, including that realized by Mr. Noble, is nothing like that figure.

The effect of the adoption of the amendment proposed in conjunction with a plan that I have for land settlement, and which I hope to submit to the House at the earliest opportunity, would, I believe, very much increase the population by offering greater inducements to people to settle on the land and would increase production to a large extent. But, there is one matter that I wish to speak about. We are often told that we should not complain when we are getting $3 a bushel for our wheat, and that we hardly know what to do with our money in the West. But, I want to show that the farmers are not receiving $3 for wheat or anything like that. In my own case, in 1915, I had a pretty large crop. I sold my oats for 26, 28 and 31 cents by the carload. I kept my wheat over until last year, and I was very glad to get $1.23 a bushel for it. It was good wheat, too. I did not receive $3. I do not want $3 a bushel for my wheat, if it is going to force the consumer to pay $7 or $8 a bag for his flour. This great difference between the price that the farmer receives for his wheat and the price of flour is occasioned by circumstances entirely beyond the control of the farmer. I have a few comparative figures on this subject. From the Fort William price of Saskatchewan grain we have to deduct 11 cents for wheat, 7 cents for oats and 9 cents for barley, taking my own shipping point for example and the charges are much more for points farther west.

Mr. NESBITT: What is the deduction for—freight?

Mr. MACNUTT: We pay 16 cents per hundredweight, freight, one cent per bushel for handling charges and commission. If we hold the grain over it is a cent a month for elevator charges. We averaged from 1910 to 1914, including same, 74 cents a bushel for wheat. 54 cents was the lowest and 69 was the highest outside of 1914, but in 1914 the price was $1.48. That price was occasioned by the light crop we had in the West. Including that $1.48, the average for those years was 74 cents a bushel. In 1915 it was 81 cents a bushel. That was the year of the big, high-grade crop of grain. In 1916 the price was $1.28 a bushel due to the poor yield and low grade resulting from an attack of black rust. Prices were good though, even for poor wheat. But the yields were so very small except in spots, with the exception of southern Alberta, that the farmers did not get anything like what they were supposed to have got, and they are certainly not responsible for the increase in the price of flour to the consumer.

Oats averaged at Fort William from 1910 to 1914, 29 cents a bushel; in 1915, 28 cents a bushel, in 1916, 46 cents a bushel. Had it not been for our oat crop in Saskatchewan a good many of us would have been pretty nearly on the rocks, so far as farming is concerned.

Barley averaged, from 1910 to 1914, 38 cents a bushel; in 1915, 43 cents a bushel; in 1916, 77 cents a bushel.

Flax averaged, from 1910 to 1914, $1.09 a bushel; in 1915, $1.50 a bushel; in 1916, $2.23 a bushel.

I am not complaining, but I want to show that there is no reason for the statement that the farmers are receiving abnormal prices for their wheat, that everything is going well and that they should not make any complaint but should be satisfied with what they are getting. I am not advancing these arguments for the sake of individual farmers, but because I believe that some changes along these lines should be made. We have the country, we have the land, and what we must do is to have the right kind of people go on the land and stay with the country. They will not do that unless it is profitable to do so. However, if this change were made it would mean that sufficient revenue could not be collected through the custom house. The people of this country must pay the cost of running the country. The cost of running the country does not come from any other people except of Canada. They have got to pay it in any case. It is merely a question of the method. I think that the method could be improved, that the country would go forward under a different system, that the people would not feel the burden of taxation to the same extent as it would be equally distributed; and immigrants would not be deterred from coming to the country on account of that burden.

A great many of the articles that now come into this country do not yield very much revenue to the Government. They yield an enormous revenue, however, to the manufacturers. The question is, is the country to continue paying tribute to the manufacturers? I do not think the people can afford to do both, not only pay the taxes necessary to run the country and defray the expenses of the war but also enrich the manufacturers and put them into the bulky millionaire class. We know something of their position, and we have a right to draw the conclusion that many of them, particularly the makers of agricultural implements, could do without the enormous protection which they enjoy. They are selling, and under-selling their rivals, in foreign markets. Surely if they can under-sell their competitors in foreign countries they can do so in this country!

I have already said that there is one feature of this resolution that I should like to have altered, and no doubt if it were adopted it would be altered; that is that there should be a provision that the manufacturers should get their raw material free if they were required to lose their protection on the finished articles. The best alternative would be direct taxation in some form or other. Under the customs system, the duty is paid by the consumer. If the importer, in the first place, pays the duty on a foreign-made article, he passes that charge on to the wholesaler and he to the retailer; the retailer passes it on to his customer, and it is ultimately paid across the counter. Many of the people hardly know that they are being taxed. At the same time they are taxed very heavily. If the goods are not made across the line or in some other foreign country, the wholesaler pays the tribute to the manufacturer and it is eventually passed on, in the same way, to the consumer. Therefore, the consumer is paying not only the taxes to keep up the Government institutions and bear the burdens that we all expect to bear but also immense sums in tribute to the local manufacturers.

I have been accused of being the first member to propose direct taxation in this House, in connection with the Budget speech two years ago when the Minister of Finance introduced his so-called war tax of 7½ per cent. Whether that is so or not, I certainly believe it is the proper and only fair method of collecting taxes to run this country. It is the principle that is followed by financial institutions and is the business method; and I do not see why the whole country of Canada cannot be administered along common sense lines. If the population increases, as I believe it will if proper inducements are held out to them, we would not only have more people but a more prosperous people to bear all these burdens; and there is no doubt that they would bear them willingly and without complaint as long as they knew they were only paying their share.

Referring to the income tax, I have heard it suggested that men receiving under $4,000 should be exempted from income tax. I think that any man who is earning any money at all, whether he is earning $2,000 or $4,000, is paying a heavy tax under present conditions. I do not see why any man should be exempted from income tax; he is a citizen of the country, no matter what his income may be. But the tax should be proportionate. Under such a system as I propose, every man would be relieved of a great many burdens, and probably a dollar earned under this system would be equal to one dollar and twenty-five cents with our present system of protective duties, and a man could then well afford to pay, say, five cents or so directly out of each dollar of his income towards keeping up the institutions of the country. As a citizen I think every man has a duty to do so, unless you come down to the very poor who are practically, to some extent, subsisting on charity. Under present conditions, every man who buys anything to-day is paying either a tax to the Government indirectly or a tribute to the manufacturer, and if he is relieved of these imposts he can well afford to pay a small portion of his income towards keeping up the institutions of the country. I feel that this is a very important matter indeed. I am not talking simply because I happen to be a farmer from the West, but I am looking at it from the standpoint of the necessities of the country and the welfare of the whole empire. I believe that, notwithstanding the arguments advanced against it which we have heard before, although they have not impressed me as being very good arguments, the best and proper method of obtaining funds from the people of Canada to keep up our public institutions, pay off our public debts, and so on, and to develop the country, would be to levy direct taxes of some kind that would be proportionate according to the ability of each citizen to pay. Feeling this way, I have no hesitation in saying that I will support this amendment.

Mr. D. B. NEELY (Humboldt): Mr. Speaker, I am aware of the fact that a discussion on the tariff is, perhaps, not as interesting as other discussions which the House will listen to in the near future, but I have no apology to make for taking up a few moments of the time of the House in supporting the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver). Some of the domestic problems which press upon our attention are, perhaps, as important as the furnishing of additional troops for service at the front. This great war has added new and very heavy responsibilities to Parliament and to this country, particularly by reason of the enormous debt that has been created and that will be created before and after the conclusion of the war. These responsibilities must be bravely met and squarely faced by the people, and it is not with any desire to make a special plea for the lightening of the lawful burdens of any section of the people that I give my support to an amendment which calls for a reduction of duties along certain lines. But Canada's present and future responsibilities must be met in a fair and equitable way; the burden of taxation should not press unduly upon any particular class of our population. The basic industries of Canada—mining, the development of our forests and fisheries, and so on—will have to produce the wealth necessary to meet the enormous obligations resting upon this country now and which will rest upon it in the future. Only by the development of her basic industries will Canada be able properly to bear the burden of meeting these obligations. I shall confine my remarks more particularly to the one great industry of Canada, agriculture.

In normal times agriculture is regarded as an occupation not as attractive as many others. Even in times of peace, one of the great difficulties of this country, which is so admirably suited to agriculture, is to get our young men to stay on the farm rather than go to the crowded town or city. That condition will be accentuated after the war is over. The soldier who has become accustomed to community life in his experience overseas will not be easily induced to go upon the land. The only remedy for this condition is to make farm life so attractive that not only the people at home, but many of our soldiers after their return from overseas, may be induced to go upon the land and thus increase the production of natural wealth which is so necessary to enable us to meet our responsibilities.

Two or three things are essential to make farm life attractive. I may be uttering platitudes when I speak about these things, but it is necessary that they be emphasized again and again. First, if we wish to make agriculture an attractive occupation for the young men of our country, both those at home and those now overseas, we must make it profitable. That, after all, is the one great thing. In normal times the acquiring of great wealth on the farm is the rare exception. The farmer who succeeds in meeting the ordinary obligations of life and in giving his family an education and a fair start in life is counted as a very successful man, from the standpoint of the agriculturist. These suggestions are not made with a view to having the farmer become a member of the millionaire class. Speaking more particularly for the newer parts of Canada, I can say that the average farmer finds his hands full in endeavouring to make both ends meet—and in a great many cases he is unable to do even that.

4 p.m.

If farming is to be made more profitable than it is at present there are two or three things that must be done. In the first place, it is the duty of this Government and of this Parliament to see that the cost of production is made as low as possible. The second section of the amendment deals with that when it says:—

> 2. That farm implements and machinery, farm tractors, mining, flour and saw-mill machinery, and repairs for same, rough and partly dressed lumber, illuminating, lubricating and fuel oils, cement and fertilizers be added to the free list.

No one can fairly say that it is just that the farmers, in the matter of the cost of production, should be placed at a disadvantage in comparison with the farmers of the great republic to the south. We know perfectly well, however, that they are placed at such a disadvantage in that they have to pay very much higher prices for the tools, so to speak, of their trade, and that is the direct result of the tariff imposed upon farm machinery coming into this country. The farmer of any part of Canada, when he advocates that farm machinery be placed upon the free list, does not thereby exclude himself from the list of the taxpayers of this country, because the farmer wears clothing, boots and shoes; he buys furniture for his house and harness for his horses, and on all of those things he must pay a tax, because, whether they are manufactured in Canada or in other countries, the tariff increases the cost to the purchaser. Therefore, like the rest of us, the farmer, even if farm machinery be put on the free list, will continue to contribute his fair share towards the maintenance of the revenues of the country. But when you come to tax the tools of the farmer's trade, that is to say, to put a heavy tax on farm machinery, then you are doing an injury, not to the farmer alone, but to the whole country, in that you are discouraging men from engaging in an occupation which we all believe to be, after all, the foundation of the future greatness and wealth of this country of ours.

We must cheapen the cost of production; we must also furnish the farmer with wider markets for the products of his farm, and in this connection I must express my very great pleasure at the action that has been taken by the Government in placing wheat and wheat flour on the free list. That has been done as a war measure, it is true, but nevertheless we believe the measure will be a permanent one, because I am sure that once the farmers of the country have enjoyed the benefits of wider markets, they will never willingly give them up, and there will be a very strong protest if any attempt is made in the future by any political party to take away this privilege. It is questionable how much direct benefit will accrue in the near future to the farmers of the country from that action, but even at the present time I am sure that the western farmer who had last year a very considerable quantity of the lower grades of wheat in his granary or in the elevators awaiting sale, will find that he has derived very great benefit. The permanency of this measure is one upon which I would very much like to insist. Wheat and wheat flour have been, as I have said, put upon the free list by Order in Council as a war measure, and I am happy to say that so far no great harm has resulted to other industries in this country from the Government's action in this respect. It is true there was a little flurry amongst the millers who made some slight protest to the Government in connection with its action in this matter, but I am sure there is no question in the mind of any member in this House that any real or lasting injury has been done to the milling industry of this country by the placing of wheat and wheat flour on the free list. In any case, it is surely true that the man who grows the wheat should be the man fited by having free markets for wheat or kind, and it is the most idle thing to argue in this House the question as to whether or not the western farmer would be benefitted by having free markets for wheat or wheat products, when the western farmer himself is fully convinced that he would so benefit. Surely he is the best judge, and surely if he says that he fears no competition from the wheat producers of any other country and that all he requires is reciprocity in the matter of the products of his farm, his judgment, as a man watching the markets of the world and knowing the value of his product, should take precedence over that of any other person, and his decision in the matter should be final so far as this Government, this Parliament and this country is concerned.

Another reason why I am glad to see the action taken by this Government in this matter is that, in my judgment, the placing of wheat and wheat flour on the free list is going to assist very materially in removing that situation that has in times past arisen not once but many times so far as the transportation of our farm products is concerned; that is to say, if the farmer is to get the best result from his toil, he must be able to market his product at the time most suitable to his own convenience. In the past that has not been the case; the farmer has had to suit his convenience to that of the transportation companies. We have a congested condition of traffic that means that the farmer who is ready to market his crop in a slack season of the year is not able to do so and has to wait sometimes for weeks and even months by reason of that transportation congestion. Now that wheat and wheat flour have been placed on the free list, that condition will be enormously relieved, in that, if the terminal elevators at Fort William and Port Arthur, the Government interior elevators and the private elevators elsewhere throughout the country are congested, I trust that we shall never again see that anomaly of our freight cars, not a few but hundreds and hundreds of them, that have brought settlers and their effects into western Canada during the early months of the year, going back to the United States without a single pound of freight. That has happened time and again in this country, and it was most aggravating to the farmers who were crying out for transportation facilities to see empty cars going across the International boundary simply because of the tariff on farm products. But fortunately, the congestion can never become so acute in the future by reason of the placing of wheat and wheat flour on the free list. The storage facilities of the great milling interests to the south will be available, and our railways running from western Canada into the United States will be able to relieve the congestion that hitherto has prevented our farmers from marketing their grain at the proper time.

The farmer is not averse to paying his fair share of the revenue of this country, but we all know very well that a protective tariff is not an equitable way of obtaining revenue. Something may be said perhaps in favour of a tariff based on revenue necessities, but no just argument can be made in favour of a protective tariff, because under a protective tariff a large part of the extra taxation that is borne by the people does not go into the treasury, but into the pockets of the interests receiving that protection. It will, however, be the policy of this country probably for many years to come to maintain a tariff for revenue purposes; probably we cannot get away from that. But a tariff for revenue, as I understand it, means the difference between the cost of production on the south of the line as compared with the cost of production of the same article on this side of the line. When you go beyond that, you are protecting an interest; it is not the public or the treasury that gets the benefit, but simply and solely the protected interests.

Clause 3 of the amendment of the hon. member for Edmonton, which seeks to have staple foods and food products, etc., come into Canada free of duty, touches a question that is vital to the hearts and minds of the people of this country at the present time. Coming back to this country only a few months ago from overseas, where the people are supposed to be on the brink of a food shortage, and where prices are considered extraordinarily high, it was a very great shock to me to find how high the prices of food products had gone in this country, which is supposed to be a country of production above anything else. It is a marvel how many thousands of people in this country are able to exist to-day in view of the prices they have to pay for every single article of food that goes on their table. If a wounded soldier returns to Canada, and is classed as 100 per cent incapacitated, he gets a pension of $480 a year. He is unfit to earn a living, and is supposed to keep himself and his family on that $480. Just think of the prices he has to pay right here in the city of Ottawa for everything he puts on his table: 50 cents a pound for butter, 50 cents a dozen for eggs, $4 to $4.50 a bag for potatoes, and so on. In view of these prices, does any one think that a returned soldier, out of business so far as earning his own livelihood is concerned, can live actually live on $480 a year? What is the reason for these high prices? Are prices high because there are no eggs or potatoes in this country? Are we paying 50 cents a pound for butter because no butter is to be found in this Canada of ours? Is the extraordinarily high price of meat due to a scarcity of domestic animals in this country? I have not had occasion to visit any of the cold storage plants in this country, but I imagine if one were to make a tour of inspection of them he would soon discover that there was no very great shortage of the food that the people require for their table. The fact is—I think we all know it; it is a conviction in the minds of the people, at any rate—that the men who deal in food products in this country are storing up food products, using the war as an excuse for so doing, in order that they may charge high and yet higher prices. Somebody may say: You advocated high prices for wheat, you want the farmer to get a good price, yet you complain about the high price of flour. Yes, there might be some contradiction there, if there were any equitable ratio between the increased price of flour and the increased price of wheat, but we know perfectly well that there is not. We know that if wheat is selling on the exchange at $3 a bushel, that is by no means the price the farmer gets for it; it is not the price the millers of Canada paid for the millions of bushels they now have in storage in their elevators throughout this country. But immediately the price of wheat jumps on the exchange up goes the price of flour, although the miller who is boosting the price of flour has in his possession at that very time wheat that cost him, not $3 a bushel, but perhaps not more than half that amount. If the price of wheat on the exchange were to drop from $3 to $2 to-morrow we know perfectly well there would be no such corresponding drop in the price of flour.

It has never been so; it is not so now. Something has to be done to meet the situation. We believe that when this war is over conditions in this regard may possibly be very much worse than they are to-day. We have our favoured class of workers, those in the munition factories. These people are getting high prices for their labour and consequently are able to bear the present high cost of living. But I ask you, Mr. Speaker, what about the soldier's dependents? We know what the pay of the ordinary soldier is—it is $1.10 a day. If he assigns half his pay, that much goes to his family, and they also get $20 a month of separation allowance from the Government and then a much smaller contribution from the Patriotic Fund. But add all these together, and consider the case of a soldier's wife with several children living in this city, or in Montreal, or in Toronto, or in Winnipeg. Ask yourself how are our soldiers' families actually living, or existing, in view of what they have pay for rent, for clothing, for food, and for everything else.

It is to be presumed that, unless something very radical is done, the cost of living will not be lower than at present, and may be greatly increased. But, immediately the war is over, there is going to be a great re-adjustment of industrial conditions. Munition factories will be closed, and their highly-paid workers will have to seek other employment. Wages are going to drop more to the normal level of the times before the war, but the cost of living will remain high for some time to come. Is not this a vital question, to be considered right now by the Government, and the Parliament, and the people of this country? I say quite frankly that I have very little faith in legislation or legislators as a means of breaking up these food combines that, we believe, now exist. There is only one way in which they can be broken up, and that is by competition, by allowing food products, as the amendment says, to come into Canada free of duty.

Mr. WRIGHT: The hon. member has dwelt especially on the prices of flour. He also says that to allow the free entry of goods will reduce the prices of those goods. Flour is now on the free list, yet the hon. gentleman complains of the high prices. How does he propose to deal with this particular evil?

Mr. NEELY: It is only a few weeks since flour was put on the free list, and so there has not been much time for results. It must be remembered also that since this change was made the United States of America have gone into the war, and similar conditions prevail over there to those that prevail here with regard to the price of flour. But I am speaking not only of war time but of the time to come when we shall tend again towards normal conditions. Placing wheat flour on the free list will, in my opinion, have great effect in reducing the price. For my hon. friend from Muskoka (Mr. Wright) knows very well that the people of Canada in pre-war times paid more for their flour than did the people of the adjoining states of the Republic.

Mr. WRIGHT: I do not know that.

Mr. NEELY: I am satisfied I am correct in that assertion. But wheat flour is not the only item. How about eggs, butter, meat and other products? We have other countries to draw upon for these things, which countries, at present, like ourselves, are engaged in war; but I confidently assert that the free exchange of food products between Canada and these other countries as indicated in the amendment, will have the effect of breaking up food combines in this country.

But, even assuming that I do not offer the right remedy, yet we must admit that we are face to face with a condition that must be dealt with. We are not going to pension our returned soldier at $480 a year and expect him to pay present prices for all that he has to buy. If the Government by legislation can effect a remedy, it is time the Government were taking the necessary steps to that end. For, as we see it, conditions are not improving, but are rapidly growing worse in this regard.

I support the last clause of this amendment also, but in a less whole-hearted way than I support the clauses which precede it. This last clause deals with the British preference, and the proposal of the hon. member for Edmonton is that this preference shall be increased to fifty per cent of the tariff. This principle of preference to imports from Great Britain is one which this House adopted years ago, but the fixing of the rate at the definite figure of fifty per cent is necessarily somewhat arbitrary. I presume, however, that if we are to deal with the subject at all, some figure must be agreed upon. Perhaps this is a subject that might very well be considered to greater advantage in the days to come, when the trade relations between the different parts of the Empire will undoubtedly form one of the great questions to be considered by the statesmen of Canada, the other self-governing dominions and the Mother Country. So far as this particular part of the amendment is concerned, while I give my support to it, I do it with that idea in mind—that, if the principle is to be maintained, perhaps this particular percentage is not too great a preference to give to goods coming into Canada from Great Britain.

In concluding my remarks, I feel that every one in this House is seized of the important problems that present themselves for our consideration at the present time and the very great responsibility that rests upon the Government of this country. Government, in ordinary times, is not the easiest thing in a democratic country where free discussion is the order of the day. Anything I have said to-day has not been in the spirit of adverse criticism of the Government but simply to call attention to certain conditions that actually exist and to urge upon the Government and Parliament the necessity of taking action in dealing with the same. I know that the farmer of western Canada does not get very much sympathy these days because of the comparatively high price that he is getting for his products. But, Sir, I have seen the same farmer in the lean years gone by when he should have had a good deal more consideration than he actually got from this Government and this Parliament. It is in view, not merely of present conditions, that I support this amendment, but the conditions to be provided for, of the conditions of the future. The Government are proposing some new legislation to deal with the question of the returned soldier and to provide for placing him on our western Canadian land; I presume that is where they intend to put him because they have not any land anywhere else and they are going to take ours in the western provinces. Under the very best of conditions and circumstances, they will find great difficulty in carrying out this project. Under the very best of conditions, as they have been in the past, we have found it very difficult. We have had to spend great sums of money to get people from other countries to come and settle on our splendid agricultural land. We have had to give a free bonus of 160 acres of the finest agricultural land lying out of doors anywhere. These conditions are rapidly passing away. We have not the free homesteads in the same abundance that we had in former days. The best of them have been taken up. You cannot go to Manitoba, Saskatchewan, or Alberta, and find first class homesteads nearer than 10 to 15 miles of the railway. You have to go beyond that if you want to secure Government land for future homestead settlement. These are the conditions that you are face to face with. I will venture to prophesy, and I am neither a prophet nor the son of a prophet, that the Government land settlement scheme for soldiers will absolutely fail unless the Government undertake to make farming conditions a great deal more attractive in our western provinces than they are at the present time. We hope to attract an increased population to Canada after the war for the purpose of settling on our agricultural lands in the West and for the purpose of increasing agricultural production so that we may be in a position to meet our enormous war bills. But, I venture to say that we will have an insurmountable, an impossible, task on our hands if we hope to secure that immigration or settlement and allow tariff and transportation conditions to remain as they are at the present time in this country. For that reason, and in order that the agricultural and other natural resources may be developed, in order that our returned soldiers may be induced to go on the farms, in order that a first class immigration may be attracted to this country and in order that Canada's future may be assured, I am here to-day to support, and I am prepared to vote for, the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Edmonton.

Mr. OLIVER: In accordance with an arrangement with the leader of the House, I beg to withdraw the amendment on the understanding that it will be moved again in due course on Tuesday.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The understanding is that on Tuesday the hon. gentleman (Mr. Oliver) may restore the motion which is now withdrawn so that this debate will be in precisely the same position as it is now.

IN COMMITTEE OF SUPPLY.

Amendment (Mr. Oliver) withdrawn and House went into Committee of Supply, Mr. Rainville in the Chair.

Mr. MARCIL: Before an item is called, perhaps the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Roche) would allow me to ask him if he has had any report with respect to a difficulty on the Caughnawaga reserve near Montreal. I saw in the Montreal papers a couple of days ago that some difficulty had arisen there in regard to the exchange of a piece of land for a school building. Has the minister any information with regard to that?

Mr. ROCHE: The only information I have is that which I obtained from an article appearing in La Patrie to-day. The information was only placed before me at noon and I sent it down to the department to get a report. I have heard that there was a disturbance on the part of certain of the Indians who objected to this land being utilized for the purposes of building a school. I gave instructions that, if it was believed there was anything in this article, to have an officer sent down to inquire.

Mr. MARCIL: I conclude that it is not very serious because otherwise the department would have heard of it.

Mr. ROCHE: No, we did not have anything brought to our attention.

Department of the Interior—Scientific institutions—Astronomical surveys—Investigations and demarcations, etc., including expenses of Dominion Astronomical Observatory at Ottawa and branch at Saanich Hill, B.C., and $1,000 to J. J. McArthur, as International Boundary Commissioner, $197,500.

Mr. OLIVER: What is the situation in regard to international boundary surveys now?

Mr. ROCHE: The international boundary surveys are drawing to a close. There is yet some work to be done on the Ontario-Minnesota boundary, according to article V of the treaty. The field work undertaken by the British Commission on this section of the line was finished during the past season. It has been decided, however, to improve the triangulation across the lake of the Woods. This will be undertaken by the United States Commissioner, and the Canadian Commissioner will co-operate to the extent of furnishing a motor boat and three men.

Then there is the Quebec and Vermont State line. Though the actual demarcation was completed in 1907, it was found necessary and agreed to, between the former Commissioners, "that a controlling triangulation should be executed along the 45th parallel from Hall's stream to the St. Lawrence river, and that the country along the portion of the boundary of New York state should be mapped." This item is to pay the expenses of a survey party to be employed in the execution of such a controlling triangulation, from Hall's stream to the Richelieu river, a distance of 80 miles.

Then there is the Quebec-Maine boundary under article III of the treaty of 1908. This article provides for the re-survey of the boundary from the source of the St. Croix to the St. Lawrence river. This section has all been completed with the exception of a comparatively small portion of so-called high lands boundary along the eastern side of the townships of Beauce and Frontenac.

Then there is the St. John and St. Croix rivers survey under articles III and II, for recovering, replacing and tying in of the original boundary reference marks of 1843-5 along the St. John river, and also to assist in executing certain topograph mapping, monumenting and triangulation along the St. Croix river from its source to Baring, Maine. This work along the New Brunswick-Maine boundary is to be undertaken by the United States Commissioner, and the Canadian Commissioner proposes sending a representative, with one man, to co-operate.

Mr. TURRIFF: As these surveys are made, are they definite and final? We have been paying hundreds and thousands of dollars every year for these boundary surveys, and we never seem to be coming to an end. Would a survey made five years ago on any part of that line be definite, or do we have to keep going over it every year and voting these hundreds of thousands of dollars for these surveys?

Mr. ROCHE: No, this is the last and final survey. I think there is altogether about ninety-eight miles to complete, and that will wind up the survey part.

Government of the Northwest Territories—Salary of Mr. Fred. White as Commissioner, $1,000.

Mr. TURRIFF: I was under the impression that Mr. Fred. White was superannuated.

Mr. ROCHE: He has been superannuated from his former position in the Northwest Mounted Police, but he has been retained as governor of the Northwest Territories.

Mr. TURRIFF: Is it customary, when a man has been superannuated as being too old to carry on his work in one position, to retain him in another position?

Mr. ROCHE: He was employed at this work, but he was also employed in the Northwest Mounted Police. The duties in connection as governor are not of a very onerous character.

Schools, $3,000.

Mr. TURRIFF: Where are the schools referred to in this item, located?

Mr. ROCHE: The Sacred Heart, Fort Providence; St. Joseph, Fort Resolution; Herschell Island; Fort MacPherson; Hay river; Fort Simpson.

Department of the Interior—Administration of the Yukon Territory, $320,000.

Mr. MACDONALD: How much is the Yukon costing?

Mr. ROCHE: $320,000 is the Estimate for this year, a reduction of $30,000.

Mr. TURRIFF: Are there not some other items in connection with the Yukon?

Mr. ROCHE: Not in this department. They would be in the Justice Department.

Mr. TURRIFF: Could my hon. friend give the committee any idea of the total cost of the government of the Yukon?

Mr. ROCHE: Offhand, I could not, outside of my own department. There are, of course, certain expenses in connection with the Customs as well as the Justice Department.

Mr. MACDONALD: I went through the Estimates last year and found that very little short of $1,000,000 was being paid by Canada for the 9,000 people, or thereabouts, in the Yukon. That is a huge figure. In going through the various items last year, I did not find that the slightest regard was paid to the changed conditions under the war; everything was being maintained at the same old clip, everything was being done without the slightest regard to any necessity for economy. It simply amounted to this, that it cost about $100 per head to keep those 9,000 people in the Yukon. When the proposition is put in that way it does not look very economical. Could the minister tell us whether there has been any consideration of the Yukon situation? Is the Government taking the matter up with a view to seeing whether some money could not be saved there?

Mr. ROCHE: I can only answer for my own department. I do not know that it is quite fair to estimate the expenses by taking the population and the amount of money expended and comparing them. The hon. gentleman is aware that a staff was placed in the Yukon for the administration of law and order and to carry on the different departments of Government. Although the population has decreased considerably, the people who still live there are a very good class of people—I can vouch for this, having visited the place during the past year. The Auditor General sends an officer to the Yukon each summer; I instructed this officer when he last went there to report as to any possible reduction or amalgamation of the staff connected with the Department of the Interior. The result has been that I have reduced the expenditure of this department by some $33,000, closed at least two of the mining offices and reduced the amount for the maintenance of roads. The mining in the Yukon is carried on by large companies who require expensive plants and who have to have the necessary roads, bridges and so on. The amount for the Council is the same as it was in previous years. In making a reduction of $33,000, I think I have done as well as I possibly could. I cannot answer for the other departments, but I have no doubt that the question has been looked into by the various ministers.

Mr. MACDONALD: Is anything contributed by the mining companies besides the royalties? In the provinces of New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island and Nova Scotia the amounts paid by way of subsidy in such cases are not nearly as large as the amount paid in the Yukon. I should think it is hardly worth while paying such a tremendous amount for the Government of 9,000 people in order to enable some American holders of mines to take gold out. What were the revenues last year?

Mr. ROCHE: In the neighbourhood of $175,000. In addition to royalties, the gold companies have to pay local taxes to the Yukon Council.

Mr. MACDONALD: These 9,000 people, less the women and children, must have a great time dividing that million dollars.

Mr. TURRIFF: Imagine, Mr. Chairman, spending $120,000 for the executive office in a community of 9,000 people. It is true that there is a reduction from last year, but in view of the enormous decrease in population I think the minister could have cut the amount down greater than he has. The minister does not seem to consider the need for economy. Officials must be dropping out now and then; why does he replace them? Why should some of the staff not be given work elsewhere if it is necessary to keep them on? There is something radically wrong when $120,000 are necessary in connection with the governing office alone. In view of the minister's proposal to make a total expenditure of $1,000,000 in a territory occupied by 9,000 people, the minister should take more drastic steps than he has taken.

Mr. ROCHE: The expenses to-day are much less than they were some years ago.

Mr. TURRIFF: Both population and revenues have decreased.

Mr. ROCHE: The expenditures of this department a few years ago amounted to about $270,000. The insane patients have to be looked after; they are brought down and maintained by government grant in the New Westminster Asylum. Some of the items are as follows: freight and express charges, telegrams, telephones, postage, and so on, $4,520; legal expenses, $2,500; commission to the Royal North West Mounted Police, $2,000;

5 p.m.

expenses in connection with export tax, $2,500; advertising mining regulations, etc., $5,000; printing and stationery, $5,000; travelling expenses of officials, $6,000; insane patients, $12,000; living allowances, $13,500; salaries, $66,980.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Does that include the salary of the commissioner of the Yukon?

Mr. ROCHE: Yes.

Mr. PUGSLEY: What salary does he get?

Mr. ROCHE: $6,000, with an additional $6,000 for living allowance.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Who is the commissioner?

Mr. ROCHE: Mr. G. N. Williams.

Immigration—Salaries of agents and employees in Canada, Great Britain and foreign countries, $580,000.

Mr. CARVELL: Does this vote include the salaries of all the immigration agents scattered throughout Canada?

Mr. ROCHE: It includes all the salaries of all the employees of the Immigration Department in Canada, Great Britain and foreign countries.

Mr. CARVELL: How many immigration agents are in the province of New Brunswick, where are they located, and what are their salaries? The reason I ask is that a number of times within the last year I have been told that there is living in my own town of Woodstock a certain gentleman who, I am informed, is drawing a salary of $2,000 or $3,000 a year from the Immigration Department.

Mr. ROCHE: What is his name?

Mr. CARVELL: Mr. A. W. Hay, and to my certain knowledge he is performing no services for the country. He is a gentleman who has occupied a position with the Government of New Brunswick; he is attending to his own business, which is a fairly important one, and I would like to know from the minister whether, as a matter of fact, this gentleman is drawing a salary from the Dominion Government, and if so, how much?

Mr. ROCHE: I understand that Mr. Hay has been for a few years in the employ of the Dominion Immigration Department and he has been acting in co-operation with the provincial Governments in the colonization scheme they have adopted. I have been given to understand that he has been doing very good work.

Mr. CARVELL: If all the other agents throughout the country to whom the minister is paying salaries, are doing the same quantity of work for the salaries they are receiving as Mr. Hay is doing, then this vote, instead of being $580,000, should be cut down to $25, because Mr. A. W. Hay is doing nothing in connection with the Dominion Government and nothing in connection with the Government of New Brunswick. He was on a board that was called the Farm Settlement Board. They started out with the idea of buying up abandoned farms and bringing in settlers from England, Scotland, and Ireland, but in the first year or two of the appointment of the Board, they brought in probably 30 or 40 persons of this class. Then they started to act as a land office and they used the money of the province in buying a farm from one man to sell it to another. There was also a political consideration. In the last election, to my certain knowledge, they went to men to whom they had sold farms and said to them: Now you vote right or we will drive you off your farms because you are in arrears. I do not believe Mr. Hay has brought a single immigrant into the province of New Brunswick in the last two years. It is a surprise to me and it will be a surprise to a good many people in New Brunswick to learn that this man has been drawing, not only a salary from the Dominion Government but a salary from the Government of New Brunswick, I would like to know how much he has been drawing from the Dominion Government.

Mr. ROCHE: He has been drawing a salary of $1,500 a year from the Dominion Government. As I have said, he has been acting in co-operation with the provincial authorities. Their land settlement scheme was in its infancy about the time of the outbreak of war, and that, of course, gave it a setback as might be expected, but Mr. Hay's services have been continued by the department, although we have dismissed certain of our officials, and I am not aware that Mr. Hay has been drawing another salary from the provincial government.

Mr. CARVELL: Does the minister say that he is proposing to pay Mr. Hay a salary of $1,500 this year?

Mr. ROCHE: Well, we have estimated for that salary for the coming year.

Mr. CARVELL: In that case, I will ask this committee to divide on this proposed vote unless the minister will agree to dismiss Mr Hay summarily.

Mr. ROCHE: The minister does not usually dismiss a man summarily upon the dictation of a member of the Opposition without making some further inquiries, and I think the hon. member will see that it would be unfair to Mr. Hay to do so. I will inquire into the matter, and if the circumstances are as set forth by the hon. member for Carleton, I certainly would not feel justified in retaining Mr. Hay in the employ of the department, if he is being paid by the provincial government and is doing no work.

Mr. CARVELL: He is certainly doing no work; he is drawing a salary.

Mr. ROCHE: If he is doing no work, I would not keep him on the pay-list, but at the same time—

Mr. CARVELL: Is he also receiving anything for expenses, and if so, how much?

Mr. ROCHE: If he has received any, it has been a very small amount.

Mr CARVELL: I would like to know exactly how much, even if the amount be small.

Mr. ROCHE: He received nothing at all for expenses last year.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The minister says that if the circumstances regarding Mr. Hay are as the hon. member for Carleton says, namely, that this gentleman is not doing any work, the minister will not feel disposed to pay him a salary. Will that same remark apply to all the other employees covered by this vote of $580,000, that is, if the minister is convinced that any of them are not doing any work? I do not think matters of this kind should require to be pointed out by members. Does not the minister keep in touch with his employees in order to see that they are working?

Mr. ROCHE: The minister does not carry on correspondence with all the 500 odd employees of the department. Those who are not at the front are doing good work, but many officials have enlisted and are still receiving salaries. A great deal of extra work that the House does not realize has been thrown upon our immigration officers by reason of the war, in the way of looking after boundary inspection in particular, and assisting the other departments in other work.

Mr. PUGSLEY: How many immigrants came into Canada last year?

Mr. ROCHE: A little over 75,000.

Mr. CARVELL: Will the minister say how many other immigration officials he has in the county of Carleton, where they are located, their names and their salaries? I ask this question for this reason: There was a time when foreign labourers were coming into the province of New Brunswick on account of railway construction, and at that time there were a few immigration agents whose salaries were justified. That, however, is all past and gone now, and I know there are, besides Mr. Hay, two or three other men employed as immigration officials, who, I think, are doing very little.

Mr. ROCHE: Can the hon. member give me their names?

Mr. CARVELL: There have been so many political changes in that country that I have forgotten the names. There is one at Debec, I think. A man died, and I have forgotten who has been appointed in his place, but in the immediate vicinity of Mr. Hay there must be at least half a dozen other immigration officials who are receiving fair salaries but who possibly may be doing something. I quite understand there may be some justification for these others, but for Mr. Hay there is absolutely no justification whatever except to furnish a good fat salary for a very earnest political worker for the Conservative party. I do not think this country in its present condition can afford to pay salaries of $1,500 a year to friends of the political party of my hon. friend for doing nothing.

Mr. ROCHE: The hon. gentleman must be misinformed—

Mr. CARVELL: I am not misinformed.

Mr. ROCHE: With the exception of Mr. Hay there is no other official in the county of Carleton in the employ of this department.

Mr. CARVELL: No others? I think there must be.

Mr. ROCHE: My information is that in the county of Carleton there are no other paid officials of this department.

Mr. PUGSLEY: What efforts, if any, have been made during the past year to secure immigrants from the United States? Has the minister made any trips to the United States in connection with immigration?

Mr. ROCHE: We have carried on a very active propaganda in the United States above all other countries. A year ago there was an active campaign in the press of the United States to prevent settlers from coming to this country. Conditions in Canada were misrepresented. It was stated that settlers who came over here would be enlisted in our army, that that was why we were anxious to get them over here, that they would be taxed to death by reason of the war, and that there were such heavy land taxes in the western provinces that it would be unwise for any settlers to leave the United States for Canada, particularly as certain of the states had enlarged the homestead allotments from 160 to 640 acres, though this was generally in the case of inferior land. It was, therefore, considered advisable to have a conference of all our immigration agents in the United States. They met at Chicago, and I attended personally. Before going I invited the premiers of the three western provinces to attend, and each of them were represented at the conference. We discussed immigration matters, found out the exact nature of the propaganda that was being carried on in the United States, and determined on active steps to combat it.

Mr. PUGSLEY: What steps did you take?

Mr. ROCHE: We carried on an extensive publicity campaign in the press of the United States. Their papers were very fair, and many of them were willing to insert articles giving the actual facts. We also carried on a more extensive advertising campaign than ever before, with such good results as to bring forth encomiums from the premiers of the western provinces, who personally complimented the department on the work we were doing. They realized that the slump in immigration from the United States was not due to any lack of interest or activity on the part of the Dominion Immigration authorities. We secured 75,000 immigrants last year, as compared with 48,000 the previous year, and of that 75,000, 61,000 came from the United States. Our campaign is still having good results, because the immigration during the present fiscal year has increased from 50 to 75 per cent, and from some of the States by 100 per cent. Considering that the war is on, I think we are getting quite a large number of immigrants from the United States.

Mr. PUGSLEY: That is the best country to obtain immigrants from at the present time?

Mr. ROCHE: Yes.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Will the minister state what means were adopted in the United States to prevent settlers from coming to Canada? What steps did the minister take to reassure intending immigrants about enlistments?

Mr. ROCHE: I think the hon. gentleman is quite aware what steps we took, because the papers were all brought down.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I do not remember. I saw statements in the newspapers.

Mr. ROCHE: In January or February, 1916, I contributed a letter over my signature stating that there was no conscription in Canada, that the Government did not think it either necessary or advisable, and that even if it should be resorted to, it would not apply to American citizens. This letter was spread broadcast throughout the United States.

Mr. PUGSLEY: They would not be liable to conscription if they became British subjects?

Mr. ROCHE: I did not say that.

Mr. PUGSLEY: They could not take up homesteads unless they were British subjects.

Mr. ROCHE: Oh, yes, but they would not be able to secure the patent. They could become British subjects before the end of the three years.

Mr. MARCIL: Were there any restrictions in regard to the nationality of these settlers from the United States? Were people of enemy birth or origin admitted?

Mr. ROCHE: We exercised discretion in that matter. We do not allow men of German nationality to enter Canada.

[Mr. Roche.]

Mr. MARCIL: What about men of German origin who have become American citizens.

Mr. ROCHE: We should not debar them if they were American citizens.

Mr. MARCIL: The suggestion has been made in this House to disfranchise those of enemy origin.

Mr. ROCHE: Has the Government proposed that?

Mr. MARCIL: I understand some hon. gentlemen have suggested it.

Mr. ROCHE: I cannot help that.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The gentleman (Mr. R. B. Bennett) who made the proposal to the House is reported to have gone to the United States some months ago, as Chairman of the National Service Commission, and to have succeeded in getting quite a large number of Americans to come over here to assist in farming operations. As the hon. member for Calgary (Mr. R. B. Bennett) is not present, perhaps the minister could tell us the results of his mission.

Mr. ROCHE: The chairman of the National Service Commission co-operated with the provincial governments and with our department in order to meet the demand for farm labour. We knew that a very large number of farm labourers would be required, and that it would be impossible to get them in Canada. So, acting in co-operation with the provinces, we added to our staff for the time being just the same number of men as the respective provincial governments appointed; for instance, Manitoba sent six agents to the United States, and we sent an equal number; Saskatchewan sent over ten, and we sent over ten; Alberta sent over six, and we sent over six. The campaign, I am glad to say, was successful in bringing in all the help that was desired. Between 8,000 and 9,000 men came in, and they were distributed over the different provinces through agencies appointed by the provincial governments. We had to issue instructions some time ago recalling our men, as the provincial governments had notified us they had all the labourers they wanted.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Were these labourers brought in temporarily, or have a number of them become settlers?

Mr. ROCHE: A number of them have no doubt returned, but we hope and expect that a number of them will become permanent settlers.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Has the minister any of the literature that was distributed when that campaign was on in conjunction with the National Service?

Mr. ROCHE: The papers were brought down and laid on the Table, at the request of the hon. member for Pictou.

Mr. PUGSLEY: All the literature?

Mr. ROCHE: Yes.

Mr. PUGSLEY: My hon. friend advertised in the United States for farm hands. Have these papers been brought down?

Mr. ROCHE: The advertisements were.

Mr. LEMIEUX: How many farm hands were got?

Mr. ROCHE: In the neighbourhood of 9,000.

Mr. OLIVER: How were they distributed?

Mr. ROCHE: Alberta got approximately 3,500, Saskatchewan 4,700, and Manitoba 800.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Do I understand the minister to say there are no restrictions as regards the nationality of these people?

Mr. ROCHE: Oh yes. Positive instructions were given to admit no one of enemy nationality.

Mr. OLIVER: Were there restrictions as to people of enemy origin?

Mr. ROCHE: If the person of enemy origin had become an American citizen, we admitted him.

Mr. TURRIFF: Were the agents that the Dominion Government appointed for this special work regular employees of the department or new men?

Mr. ROCHE: Some of them were on our permanent staff. Others were nominated by the National Service Commission; they were hired for one month only.

Mr. TURRIFF: When their work was over did they remain in the department?

Mr. ROCHE: No.

Mr. OLIVER: I should like the minister to state what inducements he offered to these immigrants in the way of taking up homesteads.

Mr. ROCHE: Any of these farm labourers from the United States could take up a homestead under our regular homestead laws. The only concession we granted was that the time spent as a farm labourer in Canada this year would be counted as residence upon a homestead.

Mr. MARCIL: Has the minister had a table compiled showing how many of these men were of enemy origin or nationality?

Mr. ROCHE: We did not keep tab on that, except by judging from the names.

Mr. MARCIL: Has the minister had occasion to read the Duke of Connaught's farewell address to the Canadian Club, in which he said the future of Canada rested with the importation into this country of people of British stock?

Mr. ROCHE: I heard it and read it with a great deal of acclaim. As the hon. member for St. John has said, the United States is practically our only field for immigrants at the present time I am sure the hon. member would not wish us to deny entrance to Canada to citizens of the United States, which is now one of our Allies?

Mr. MARCIL: Are any efforts being made to secure a larger immigration from the United States?

Mr. ROCHE: We have been carrying on a most active propaganda in the United States. We have had very little immigration from overseas since the war began.

Mr. TURRIFF: According to the minister, the chairman of the National Service Commission took an active part in securing these farm labourers from the United States. Many of these men were no doubt of enemy origin. The chairman of the National Service Commission is also a prominent member of this House, and only a few days ago he expressed the view that these people should be disfranchised. Does the minister think it is fair that the chairman of the National Service Commission should go over to the United States and induce American citizens of enemy origin to come to Canada and then advocate in this House that even if they become British subjects the franchise should be taken from them. That seems to me to be working at cross purposes altogether, and I do not think it will work out well. Was the hon. member for Calgary speaking on behalf of the Government when he advocated that these people should be disfranchised?

Mr. ROCHE: I suppose the hon. member does not speak with any idea that I am here to answer authoritatively for the hon. member for Calgary. That hon. gentleman fearlessly expresses his opinion irrespective of whether the statements he makes are authorized by the Government or not. I suppose the hon. member (Mr. Turriff) is not trying to fasten culpability on the Immigration Branch for having done what it could to help out the western farmer and bring in a supply of greatly-needed farm labour. Nor do I know on what information he bases the statement that a number of these men were of enemy-country origin. I am not aware that there were a number of that origin. I understand that a large number were Scandinavians, while many were American-born. Of course, I cannot be responsible for the hon. member for Calgary. I assure the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff) that that hon. gentleman had nothing to do personally with bringing in these immigrants, other than to visit the western provinces, interview the members of the provincial government, and facilitate the holding of a conference of business men and others in the city of Winnipeg to discuss this whole question. Whatever action was taken as a result of that conference was taken in accordance with the wishes of the governments of the three prairie provinces. I sent a couple of inspectors of the Immigration Branch to enter into conference with them. They decided upon a plan of campaign with a view to bringing in a supply of farm labour to meet the great demand. Alarm was felt at one time that we were not going to get a sufficient acreage seeded, in view of the necessity for increased production, by reason of the want of farm help. As the United States was the only place to which we could look for an additional supply, we assisted in the campaign, which was successful. The farmers were supplied, the wishes of the provincial governments were met, and, so far as I know, there has been no objection to what was done.

Mr. TURRIFF: I am in sympathy with the policy of the hon. minister as carried out; I think it was quite proper to help in bringing in a supply of farm help. But we cannot get nine thousand labouring men from the United States without getting quite a large number who are of enemy-country origin, though now of American allegiance. But I think it unfair to induce these men to come into Canada, holding out to them the hope that they may become Canadian settlers and British subjects, and then hold over them the threat that if they become British subjects in the West they are liable to have the franchise taken from them simply because they originally came from enemy countries.

Mr. KNOWLES: We find here a member of the House of whom ministers speak in extravagantly complimentary terms announcing a policy that affects hundreds of my constituents as well as hundreds of the constituents of other members of the House. That hon. member says these men should have taken away from them that consideration which the Dominion of Canada, or the British Empire, gave them in exchange for their oath of allegiance, and that it should be taken away wantonly and without reason. Many of my constituents have a right to ask of me as their representative, and we are their representatives, whether the Government is endorsing the view of the hon. member for Calgary. It is all very well to sidestep the matter and say that the hon. member for Calgary is a very independent man. I am not so sure whether he is or not, but that is absolutely beside the question. He is a Government official, a supporter of the Government, and I understand that he is very closely in the confidence of the Government. The Government has asked that we consider the matter of immigration, which comes very close to this question, and I ask whether the Government endorses the view of the hon. member for Calgary, and whether the member for Calgary spoke with the authority of the Government. The minister refuses to answer. The question is a proper one, and it will not do for the minister to sidestep it in that way. We have a right to know whether the hon. member for Calgary spoke with the approval of the Government and the constituents whom we represent have a right to know that. Let them be called diabolical Austrians, Germans or Turks, we are in a British country now, and we have a right to ask if the member for Calgary had the authorization of the Government in making that statement, and the question should not be sidestepped. If it is going to be sidestepped, we should not go on and vote money for immigration, but we should withhold our sanction for this expenditure until we have some statement from the Government with respect to it. The minister wrote that letter saying that conscription was not in force in Canada. He might as well have told them that they were living in America, for they all knew that conscription was not in force. It was absolutely true, but it was a mere platitude. He told them further that the Government was not going to conscribe Americans. What was the object in making such a statement as that? The Government has no power to conscribe Americans. If it conscribes Americans it means a declaration of war against the United States. Yet the minister spends his time writing letters declaring that he is not going to put conscription in force against American citizens who may be found within our borders. What an absurd thing! The minister must have meant something in writing such a letter. You might as well say that you are not going to take them for a flight to Mars or Jupiter as to say that you are not going to conscribe American citizens. You could not do so anyway. You might as well declare war against the United States at once. The minister should deal with us frankly when he asks us to pass this vote, and he should answer that simple and fair question whether the member for Calgary spoke with the authorization of the Government or did not. The minister should certainly know what the fact is with regard to that particular matter.

Mr. ROCHE: The hon. gentleman (Mr. Knowles) speaks as if the hon. member for Calgary (Mr. Bennett), when he gave this opinion to the House, was laying down the policy of the Government. The member for Calgary was giving the House the benefit of his views as to what the Government should do, but he was giving expression to his own personal views. I am not in a position to say if he spoke with the authority of the Government. On the contrary, I feel convinced he did not. I do not know if the hon. gentleman wants any more direct reply than that. The hon. member states that I have sent a letter all over the country saying that we would not conscript Americans, when they knew that we would not do so. If the hon. gentleman could have induced the American press to take that view, it would not have been necessary to have sent that letter. But in view of the fact that a portion of the American press carried on a grossly misleading campaign on this very point, stating that we wanted to get their men into this country to press them into military service, it was necessary to combat that propaganda, and for that purpose I sent this letter. My action did not provoke any criticism last year. I read the letter in the House last year, and it apparently received the endorsation of every member present. I shall read the letter again.

8th January, 1916.

Through either lack of knowledge or from some ulterior motive numerous papers in the United States have recently advised American citizens that by going to Canada they incurred the risk of being drafted as soldiers in the present world-wide war. Were these articles confined only to that portion of the pro-German press, which without regard to the truth, have been publishing fictitious news items intended to injure the trade or stir up friction between the States and Canada, the reports might safely be let go uncontradicted, but when responsible journals are misled into publishing erroneous information regarding conscription it seems advisable to make an official pronouncement upon the matter.

I therefore beg to advise you that all troops from Canada for the war have gone voluntarily; that while the Government has the power to enforce conscription, such action has not been considered either advisable or necessary, and that even were conscription introduced it would apply to Canadian citizens only.

For your information when dealing with this subject, I may say that many Canadians resident in the United States and many American citizens have crossed into Canada since the outbreak of war, have offered their services, been accepted, did valuable work and in some cases gave up their life in the cause of liberty and justice.

Any publicity you may care to give to this letter will be appreciated by,

Yours faithfully,

W. J. Roche,
Minister of the Interior.

That letter was included in the Canadian Atlas and in our immigration pamphlets that we distributed, and it was for the purpose of counteracting the propaganda that was carried on by a certain portion of the American press. If that letter was foolish and absurd, as the hon. member for Moosejaw says, I wish to say that I sent it for the reason which I have given. If I had not taken steps to check this misrepresentation that was indulged in among the press, and which brought the Department of the Interior many individual inquiries and letters, I would have been open to the condemnation that I had not taken the best means available for counteracting it. I do not see why I should be censured for writing that letter for the purpose of counteracting that misrepresentation that American citizens who came into Canada would be subject to conscription.

Mr. PUGSLEY: It seems to me that the letter is objectionable in that the minister, while he states what everybody knows, that American citizens would not in any circumstances be liable to conscription, yet goes farther and says that it has not been considered at all necessary or advisable by the Government of Canada. What was the object of making that statement? It was to induce American citizens to come in and become permanent settlers in Canada. It was to induce them to become citizens of our country and to take up or buy homesteads, and, in that connection, to allay their fears that the minister clearly held out to them the belief that conscription would not need to be introduced into Canada, that the Government did not consider it necessary or advisable.

Mr. ROCHE: Do not forget the date of the letter.

Mr. PUGSLEY: It was to allay that fear. The minister puts a double proposition forward. First, he says that American citizens would not be liable to conscription under any circumstances, and then he proceeds further to tell them what is the policy of the Government in regard to conscription. If the Government had any notion that conscription would be a justifiable and proper policy to pursue in this country he ought not to have made that statement, made, as it was, for the purpose of inducing people to come in from the United States, become permanent citizens of Canada and become also British subjects, because they would have to become British subjects before they could obtain homestead lands and obtain a patent therefor from the Crown. The minister will agree with me that in making that propaganda he intended to go to the extreme limit to allay all possible fears that American settlers might be subject to conscription. If the minister had in his mind, or if the Government had in their minds, at that time, that if this war continued they would introduce conscription into Canada, then the minister ought not to have allayed that fear by writing that letter, because settlers would naturally draw the conclusion from the minister's statement that the policy of the Canadian Government was against the introduction of conscription. I am very glad to learn that the minister has succeeded in getting a large number of immigrants from the United States into Canada last year.

Of course, the number is very small indeed as compared with the number of those who came in during the years preceding 1911. During the period when the late Government was encouraging immigration, settlers came in, not by the thousands but by the hundreds of thousands, from the United States. I should like to see that day return. That is what we want in our western country. But in our efforts to get settlers we ought to be very careful not to make any mistakes or misstatements as to existing facts, or as to the policy of the Government of the day. Nothing would do so much harm to immigration, nothing would do so much harm to Canada so far as immigration is concerned, as a general impression that the Government of this country had not absolutely kept faith with those who were induced to come into the country. I think that on reflection the minister will feel that in view of the announcements that have been made within the past few days in this House, his statement in regard to conscription was an unfortunate one if, by reason of it, settlers were induced to come into Canada.

Mr. ROCHE: My hon. friend, I am afraid is drawing a long bow. He overlooks the date of this letter, January 8, 1916.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The war was on then.

Mr. ROCHE: And we were in hopes that before to-day the war would be over.

Mr. PUGSLEY: On what did the minister base that expectation?

Mr. ROCHE: If I asked the hon. gentleman now, how soon, in his opinion, the war would be over, what would he say?

Mr. PUGSLEY: I may tell my hon. friend, and the Minister of Marine will vouch for the statement I make, that my opinion, given very shortly after the war began, was that it would last for a number of years. I never could understand on what ministers acted when they told the people of this country that it would probably be over in three months, nine months or a year.

Mr. HAZEN: The Government never told people that.

Mr. PUGSLEY: One of the ministers, the other day, said that most people expected that in three months it would be over.

Mr. HAZEN: That is a very different statement.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I have no conception on what anybody would base that idea. Here was a country, Germany, which, as the evidence has shown, had been preparing for forty years for this war, and how anybody could suppose that Germany could be crushed in one or two years or three years, be worn down or crushed out, tht Prussianism, monarchism in Germany could be is beyond my comprehension. Here, in 1916, when the minister is starting a propaganda in the United States to get settlers to come into this country, not merely getting people for temporary purposes, for the purpose of doing work on the farms, but in order that they might become settlers in Canada; and knowing that they could not acquire patents to homesteads without becoming naturalized citizens, the minister declares to those people in Chicago that the policy of this Government is not to have conscription in Canada. I say that unless the Government had determined upon that course of no conscription they should not have acted in a way which would be calculated to induce these settlers to believe there was a breach of faith in case conscription should be introduced. I repeat that, in my judgment, unless the Government had a settled policy on the subject, the minister's statement, made while the war was on, that there was no intention of introducing conscription, was neither necessary nor advisable. It was an unfortunate statement to make and one that might mislead the people and induce many to settle in this country under a misapprehension.

Mr. ROCHE: Has the hon. gentleman heard of any grievance on the part of those who came into Canada on that representation?

Mr. PUGSLEY: Do I know? It is too early to learn that, because conscription has not been enforced as yet. But I should rather suppose that any man who had been induced to come into Canada and had become naturalized in consequence of the statement which the Minister made in Chicago, with the authority of this Government, would have a very just ground of complaint.

Mr. ROCHE: It takes three years from the time the man comes into the country and applies for this homestead before he can become a naturalized subject. He cannot become naturalized in the country until he has been in the country three years.

Mr. PUGSLEY: He takes his first step by applying for a homestead.

Mr. KNOWLES: I would ask the minister whether in the spring of last year he became aware that conscription would almost surely be necessary in this country. The hon. member for Victoria and Haliburton (Sir Sam Hughes) has stated that, in the spring of 1916, the Prime Minister gave him instructions that recruiting was not to be keenly followed up, and we all know that has been the system for a year, go easy and recruit as few as possible; and, as a result, no recruits in any number were secured during the past year. I suppose the minister would know that conscription was going to be necessary as soon as the decision was reached by the Government that recruiting should be let up on. He would then know that in all human probability conscription would become necessary in order to secure the 500,000 men that had been promised. I ask the minister whether, in the spring of last year, he was also aware of the fact that the Prime Minister had reached a decision which he had communicated to the then Minister of Militia and Defence (Sir Sam Hughes), namely, that he desired that they should let up on recruiting.

M. ROCHE: I am not aware that the Prime Minister gave voice to any such instruction. In fact, on the contrary, I heard him in his place deny that he ever made such a statement.

Mr. KNOWLES: Has the minister not read the speech of the late Minister of Militia and Defence in which he so stated.

Mr. ROCHE: I am telling what the Prime Minister stated.

Mr. KNOWLES: Has he read the speech of the ex-minister?

Mr. ROCHE: Yes, I have read what the hon. the ex-Minister of Militia stated. On the other hand, we have the reply to that by the Prime Minister. I am going by the Prime Minister's statement.

Mr. KNOWLES: Then I ask if he contradicts his then colleague, the ex-Minister of Militia?

Mr ROCHE: Oh what nonsense.

Mr. KNOWLES: That answer "nonsense" is worthy the minister, but it is not an answer to my question. This is a serious question, whether or not a decision was come to a year ago to ease up on conscription. The Prime Minister says it was not; the ex-Minister of Militia and Defence says it was. I am addressing the colleague of both these gentlemen; he knows them both, and I ask him if he had any information communicated to him such as the ex-Minister of Militia states was conveyed to him in May, 1916. Did the minister have any intimation that there was going to be an easing up of recruiting?

Mr. ROCHE: I am quite well aware that no statement was ever issued on the part of the Prime Minister or any member of the Government to the effect that there should be an easing up on the recruiting.

Mr. KNOWLES: The hon. minister does not mean that there was no statement made by any member, because the Minister of Militia and Defence was a very important member of the Government, and he so stated.

Mr. ROCHE: Did he state that while a member of the Government?

Mr. KNOWLES: He has stated now that that intimation was made to him.

Mr PUGSLEY: Does the Minister of the Interior suggest that he would be more truthful when a member of the Government that he is now?

Mr. ROCHE: The hon. gentleman is doing the suggesting.

Mr. TURRIFF: I want to say that you have two statements, one by the Prime Minister and one by the ex-Minister of Militia, and only one of them is the truth, because they are directly opposed to each other. But all the corroborative evidence would lead one to judge that the ex-Minister of Militia was telling the truth. I will tell you why. Upon the return to Toronto of a delegation which had come here to interview the Prime Minister, some of its leading members made statements exactly along the line of the statement made by the ex-Minister of Militia. And there is this further corroborative evidence: at the time the ex-Minister of Militia received, as he says, instructions from the Prime Minister to let up in recruiting, recruiting dropped from 25,000 to 5,000 men a month. It looks, therefore, as if the ex-Minister of Militia was telling the truth. To my mind, explanations should be made not by the ex-Minister of Militia, but by some member of the Government, because there is no doubt that recruiting fell as I have stated. Why should recruiting fall so suddenly if word had not been passed around,—as the ex-Minister of Militia says, on the direct instructions of the Prime Minister,—that there should be a let up in recruiting?

Mr. PUGSLEY: I hope that the minister is not disposed to let a serious statement like this pass without notice. The truthfulness of the ex-Minister of Militia has been emphasized in another way. The ex-Minister of Militia, in a letter which he wrote to the Prime Minister in May, 1915, stated that for three whole months his operations had been blocked by a committee of the Cabinet; that he had not been permitted to proceed with the purchase of trucks because this committee were deliberating as to how the contracts could best be let in order to distribute as much commission as possible among its friends. That is, I think, as serious a charge as could possibly be made by one member of the Government against his colleagues; yet neither the Prime Minister nor any other member of the Government has ventured to question this statement of the ex-Minister of Militia. Whatever may be said of the ex-Minister of Militia, I do not believe he can be charged with untruthfulness, and it would require a good deal of evidence and the exercise of exceptionally good memory on the part of members of the Government before they could induce the people to believe that the ex-Minister of Militia deliberately misstated the facts in regard to this very important matter.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess.

The committee resumed at eight o'clock, Mr. Rainville in the Chair.

Mr. OLIVER: I asked the minister some little time ago in regard to advertising done in the United States to induce men to come to Canada for farm work, and he replied that the announcement was that those who worked for farmers this summer would be allowed six months' residence on their homesteads.

Mr. ROCHE: They would be allowed the time they spent on the farms to count as residence.

Mr. OLIVER: Is the minister sure that that offer applied only to one season's work and did it apply to two seasons' work?

Mr. ROCHE: To 1917 alone.

Mr. OLIVER: The minister is absolutely positive on that point?

Mr. ROCHE: That is what I am informed. That certainly was the intention.

Mr. OLIVER: I was given to understand that in a Seattle newspaper the immigration agent, Mr. Grieve advertised that two seasons' residence could be put in by working with farmers, so that a man taking up a homestead and working for two summers with farmers would have to put in only six months' residence on his homestead in order to obtain his patent.

Mr. ROCHE: That is not the intention.

Mr. OLIVER: That is not correct?

Mr. ROCHE: No.

Mr. OLIVER: By what authority was that privilege given?

Mr. ROCHE: I am inclined to think it was done by Order in Council. I am not just sure as to that at the moment.

Mr. OLIVER: I would like the minister to inform the House definitely at a later date, because I am under the impression that an Order in Council would not be sufficient; that the Act of Parliament is absolutely explicit as to residence duties to be performed by homesteaders; and my impression is that when the Government undertook to vary the terms of residence, as they admittedly did, they did so absolutely without authority. In my view such variation in regard to homestead duties was absolutely contrary to the public interest, to the well-being of the western country, and to good policy in securing its settlement. If there is one curse greater than another that the actual settler of the West has to put up with, it is that of the non-resident homesteader. That policy of the Government which undertakes to permit non-resident homesteading is not promotive of settlement, but is a most serious detriment to settlement and is a very positive injury to those who are actually in occupation of their homesteads and fulfilling their duties in accordance, not only with the letter, but with the spirit of the law, establishing homes in the country, building up the country, and handicapped in doing so by the holding of vacant land by transient homesteaders, not under the law, but under the authority of a minister.

Dealing with the question of the propriety of citizens of Canada, British subjects who are of alien enemy origin, being deprived of their franchise, I would point out that the Minister of the Interior and his colleagues in the Government, did, as a matter of fact, within the past few months vary the terms of the Land Act, arrogating to themselves an authority that did not belong to them for the purpose of holding out special and unwarranted inducements to people of alien enemy origin if such desired to take advantage of those inducements, and that they, or their supporters at any rate, are not in a position to question the right of such people to the franchise which they have acquired in our country under the laws administered by the minister. The minister has disclaimed all responsibility for the utterances of the hon. member for Calgary (Mr. R. B. Bennett). Technically I think it may be admitted that he is entitled so to repudiate those utterances, but as a matter of fact, the hon. member for Calgary occupies the same relation to this Government as does the hon. member for Shellburne and Queens (Mr. McCurdy) or the hon. member for North Bruce (Mr. Hugh Clark), except that he does not draw a salary and does not hold a title, but his duties are of the same character or are indeed more of an administrative character; and although when he does make a pronouncement on the floor of the House, the Government are within their rights when they repudiate it, they are not acting in good faith with the country in doing so. They must in fairness assume a measure of responsibility for that member of Parliament to whom they have delegated duties which at one time were supposed to be important and responsible, who is acting as special commissioner of the Government in regard to those special duties which had special connection with this very matter of the bringing people across the line and necessarily with their rights after they came. This very member of Parliament, occupying this position in connection with the Government, having those important duties and responsibilities, who belches forth on the floor of this House against the exercise of their rights by people who have acquired those rights in all honesty and fairness at the hand of this Government—this very gentleman is himself the active agent, in conjunction with this Government and for the Government, in bringing such people across the line and in offering them, contrary to law, inducements to come here.

Mr. ROCHE: My impression is that this procedure was taken by means of an Order in Council. Such procedure would be under the War Measures Act, and therefore within our jurisdiction. The hon. member says that the minister has repudiated statements made by the hon. member for Calgary. I have not repudiated statements made by the hon. member for Calgary; I was asked by the hon. member for Moosejaw (Mr. Knowles) if the hon. member for Calgary was authorized by the Government to make the statements he did in his speech when discussing another subject, namely, the Franchise Act. I stated that so far as I was aware the hon. member for Calgary was not authorized by the Government; that is as far as I have gone; that it is as far, I think, as I am called upon to go. I am not responsible for the personal views held on this or any other subject by the hon. member for Calgary or any other hon. member. The hon. member for Calgary has done good service for the Government as chairman of the National Service Commission and in other capacities. He has endeavoured to bring the man power of this country to bear on the war to the very best purpose, and as Chairman of the National Service Commission he took up with the various provincial governments the question of the best means of supplying the demand for farm labour. Apart from that, the hon. member for Calgary had nothing whatever to do with bringing these men in from the United States. No special inducements were held out to men of enemy nationality, as the hon. gentleman would lead the House to believe. On the contrary, we issued positive instructions that men of enemy nationality were not to be admitted.

Mr. OLIVER: I said of enemy origin.

Mr. ROCHE: The men who came in were citizens either of the United States or of an Allied country, and not citizens of an alien enemy country. There are in the United States citizens whose antecedents came from Germany or Austria, but we have these people in Canada as well, and many of them have become naturalized and taken up homesteads here. What would the hon. gentleman have had us do? Would he have had us keep the farm labourers out, although they were citizens of the United States, simply because their antecedents came from Germany or Austria? I do not think the hon. gentleman would have taken that stand; it would have been unreasonable for him to do so.

The hon. gentleman also spoke about the land laws and said we were not warranted in taking the action we did. I can tell him that we have been complimented on holding out this inducement to farm labourers no matter whether they came from the United States or from any part of Canada. There was such a great demand for farm help in the West, consequent on the heavy enlistments from those provinces, that some steps had to be taken to get farm labourers, and we have been complimented by the hon. gentleman's own political friends in Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta for offering to count the time these men spent with a farmer as residence on their own homesteads should they care to take one up. It is all right for the hon. gentleman to say that we were not warranted in offering this inducement after the demand has been supplied, but if we had not supplied the farm labour the hon. member would have been the first to condemn it, especially at a time when everybody is preaching and desiring to practise increased production. I do not think the hon. member can hold this Government responsible for any individual opinions the hon. member for Calgary may have expressed on the franchise question. As I have said before, if the hon. gentleman condemns us for holding out this inducement to farm labourers, he is certainly not in agreement with his own political friends in western Canada, for they most assuredly have endorsed the action of the Government in this respect.

Mr. OLIVER: I can only say in regard to that what the minister himself says in regard to his colleague: I am not responsible for the opinions of my friends. I take responsibility for stating in my place in this House my opinion of the action of the Government. That action is not only unwarranted and ill-advised, but illegal as well. And that action was taken in pursuance of a policy the logical conclusion of which is condemned by the very men who were parties to it. I did not suggest any condemnation of the Government because they permitted labourers of alien enemy origin to be brought into Canada. But I condemned the colleague of the Minister of the Interior who refused to recognize the same right of citizenship conferred by this Dominion under the authority of the British Government that the minister says here to-night, and says very properly, he ought to recognize when conferred by the United States of America. As to the assertion that the Government is not responsible for the utterances of their supporter, I reply that when their supporter occupies a responsible position in which he acts on their behalf it is not for the Government to dissociate itself from the utterances of that hon. gentleman in this House in regard to a matter of public policy. Technically, they may be able to do so, but as a matter of fact and as a matter of right they cannot do so. The Minister of the Interior must either shoulder responsibility for the utterances of the hon. member for Calgary, or he must, on behalf of the Government which employs that hon. member, repudiate that hon. member's sentiments, and this he has not yet done.

Now, I wish to ask the minister if the department keeps a record of the movement of people from Canada to the United States.

Mr. ROCHE: No. No statistics are kept by the Canadian authorities of those going from Canada to the United States.

Mr. OLIVER: Has it ever been the custom of the department to keep such statistics?

Mr. ROCHE: No.

Mr. OLIVER: I remember very distinctly that when my hon. friend (Mr. Roche) was in opposition his friends, if not himself, were very insistent that such statistics should be kept, and they were very strongly of the opinion that without such statistics the record of immigrants coming into the country was not complete or convincing. At that time the flow of immigration into Canada was very great, the settlement of the country was progressing rapidly and development was going on at a rate never heard of before and certainly never heard of since. At that time possibly it was not important that we should keep account of the people who went out. But, at a time like this, when immigration has languished, when our population is at a standstill, so far as we are aware, it would certainly be of the greatest interest to the Canadian public to know how many people are leaving Canada. I would suggest that, if the minister has not kept such records in the past, he should take means to keep them for the future. Further, while I would not wish to contradict the minister in a matter of his own department, I am still strongly under the impression that at some time such a record as I speak of was kept. Would the minister inquire about that?

Mr. ROCHE: I am informed that there has never been any record kept by the Canadian immigration authorities of those leaving Canada for the United States. Nor has any record been kept by the United States of the movement of their population into Canada. Sometimes they ask us for our figures, and sometimes we ask them for theirs. But both Governments act on the same plan—neither keeps a record of the exodus from its country.

Mr. OLIVER: I should be sorry to get into an argument with the minister on that point, but I think he will find on inquiry that the United States either did keep or professed to keep a record of the movement of their people into Canada. Such figures have been given in the American report.

Mr. ROCHE: They took our figures.

Mr. OLIVER: No, because it was said that their figures and ours did not agree, and this was brought to the attention of the House by friends of the hon. minister, then in opposition. However, we shall not get very far by arguing that question of fact. But I would point out that during the past year there has been an important movement of people from both eastern and western Canada to the United States. This movement must have been within the cognizance of the officers of the Minister of the Interior. My hon. friend and his officers were absolutely derelict in their duty if they did not take account of that movement. It was stated as a matter of fact that, owing to the announcement made by the Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden) and the Director of National Service, so-called, there was a very active movement of men eligible for military service from Canada to the United States during the months of October, November, December, and part of January. And, now that I think of it, that movement did come to the attention of the hon. minister and his colleagues. For on the day that Parliament met, or one or two days before or after, a despatch was sent throughout Canada on behalf of the Government, announcing that this movement having taken place because of the fear of military conscription under the so-called national service proposals, this was to assure the people that National Service did not mean conscription for military purposes, and they need not run to the United States in order to get away from it. This movement having been sufficiently important to demand the attention of the Government in the very prominent manner to which I have referred, I say again that the Department of the Interior and its Immigration Branch certainly was asleep at the switch if it did not take cognizance of the volume of that movement. And I say further that, that movement having been caused by the injudicious expressions and declarations of policy on the part of the Prime Minister and his Director of National Service and their newspaper mouthpieces throughout the country, they must take the responsibility for its existence as they took responsibility for attempting to stop it. I wish to point out—and I am sorry the Director of National Service is not here—that though a number of men were brought into Canada ostensibly for farm labour in the West, with a special inducement of non-resident homesteads and special assurance of freedom from conscription, yet the number was not nearly as great as the number of men of like age and capabilities who left the country in the months that I speak of because of the declarations and assertions of the same Director of National Service.

Mr. ARTHURS: Is the hon. member speaking of the West now?

Mr. OLIVER: I am speaking in large measure of the province of Ontario. I have in mind the fact that the newspapers of Detroit published an express welcome to 17,000 young Canadians who had recently taken up residence in their fair city.

Mr. ARTHURS: It was probably better for us that they should stay in the States, if they went away for that reason.

Mr. OLIVER: I quite agree with my hon. friend, and that is precisely why I am pointing out to the minister that it was not sound public policy to offer non-resident homesteading in the western provinces to the same men, or men of a like kind, to bring them back to reside amongst us. That is the policy and practice that I am speaking of, and I hope the hon. gentleman (Mr. Arthurs) will join with me in condemning it.

Mr ARTHURS: I had not intended taking part in this debate. But, in listening to the addresses I have gained the impression that hon. gentlemen opposite are barking up two trees at the same time. They are trying, apparently, to play for the German-Austrian vote in the West, and at the same time to condemn the Government for bringing citizens from the United States to help in the harvest. The whole trend of their remarks has been to condemn the hon. member for Calgary (Mr. Bennett), for saying that these men who had been only recently, if at all, British citizens, should not be allowed to vote I agree absolutely with the hon. member. I am not speaking for the Government, but for myself, and I have no hesitation in saying what I do though in my own riding there are a good many Germans. But I am not playing one game in one place and a different game in another place. The Minister of the Interior is perfectly justified by the results of the action he took. In the West they were greatly in need of additional farm help, and the minister was justified in bringing in citizens of the United States He could not possibly stop them under international law; the fact that they were citizens of a neutral country precluded us from debarring them from Canada. The point of this whole argument, so far as I can see, is only that some hon. members are anxious to secure the support of these men whom they are condemning the Government for bringing in.

Mr. OLIVER: My hon. friend (Mr. Arthurs) has a logic of his own.

Mr. ARTHURS: So have you.

Mr. OLIVER: I agree with that, but it certainly is not the same as the hon. gentleman uses. He says we are barking up two trees at the same time What is the Government doing? According to the announcement of their friends, they are going to disfranchise these people who are of Austrian and German origin.

Mr. ARTHURS: The Government did not announce that.

Mr. OLIVER: Through their director of National Service. And the Government have no right to repudiate those whom they trust with important duties of that kind. At the same time, they are claiming credit for disposing of their lands in the Northwest in order to bring back the very men which the loose talk of the Director of National Service was driving across the line. The Government and its friends should take either one side or the other. They should speak of what they intend to do, or they should hold their tongues. They should not talk of conscription unless they intend to enforce it; and if they intend to enforce it, they should enforce it not talk about it. And when they talk about disfranchising citizens of this country because of their origin, they should not at the same time offer special inducements to people of the same origin but of United States nationality to come in and occupy our lands on terms unfair to our own settlers.

Mr. ARTHURS: I would like to ask the hon. gentleman if any great proportion of those men who came over to work on the farms of the West were such citizens as he has described here?

Mr. OLIVER: I do not know who or what they were but there is no reason to suppose that they were not. The Minister of the Interior has assured my hon. friend that if they were of that character they would not have been stopped from coming.

Mr. ROCHE: They were American citizens.

Mr. OLIVER: They were American citizens. Why should not British citizenship be just as good and get the same rights as United States citizenship at the hands of this Government?

Mr. ROCHE: The hon. member for Kings, Prince Edward Island (Mr. Hughes) asked if we would extend the same privileges to Prince Edward Islanders who might go out West and I said: Yes, certainly. If they came from the United States they would have been United States citizens of British nationality but if they came from any of the other provinces of the Dominion they would have been given the same privilege.

Mr. OLIVER: A United States citizen of alien enemy origin was given by the Director of National Service, under the authority of the Minister of Interior, the special privilege of non-resident homesteading in the Northwest while the same Director of National Service was declaring that a man of British citizenship but of the same alien enemy origin should be disfranchised.

Mr. TURRIFF: Is the same privilege of non-resident homesteading given to men resident in Canada who might go out and work on the farms in the West?

Mr. ROCHE: Certainly.

Mr. MARCIL: Are any inducements given to residents of the other provinces to go West?

Mr. ROCHE: The same.

Mr. MARCIL: Was any advertising resorted to in order to make the facts known?

Mr. ROCHE: It was advertised in the press of the country. The privileges were extended to people from any province in the Dominion.

Mr. MARCIL: Does the minister know if any considerable number went from the Canadian provinces?

Mr. ROCHE: We did not encourage them to go from the other provinces for the reason that we were informed that in all the other provinces they were just as badly off as they were in the West.

Mr. PUGSLEY: How many homestead entries were taken up during the past year?

Mr. ROCHE: During the fiscal year ended March 31, 1917, the total number of homestead entries was 11,199.

Mr. PUGSLEY: It appears that 70,000 settlers came in, but only 11,000 homesteads were taken up. Has the minister any information as to whether the others only came temporarily, or whether they bought land, or went into the cities?

Mr. ROCHE: The 60,000 who came in from the United States included men, women and children, and, of course, children are not supposed to take up homesteads.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Still, immigrants as a rule do not bring in many children.

Mr. ROCHE: Yes, they come in with quite large families.

Mr. PUGSLEY: In what provinces were these 11,000 homesteads taken up?

Mr. ROCHE: The three prairie provinces and particularly in the northern part of Alberta.

Mr. PUGSLEY: In the Peace River district?

Mr. ROCHE: A great many went into the Peace River district.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Are there many available homesteads having good soil in that part of Alberta south of the Saskatchewan river?

Mr. ROCHE: South of that latitude there are no large blocks of land still available and not disposed of. There is land here and there, but no large amounts, such as a township. There is comparatively little in Alberta south of Edmonton.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I do not mean townships, but is there any considerable extent of good land still open for homesteading south of the Saskatchewan river?

Mr. ROCHE: Comparatively little.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The reason I ask the minister is that he has upon the Order Paper a proposal, of which a good deal of notice has been taken, and which proposal was put forward to a committee in England by the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Rogers) to assist returned soldiers to take up homesteads and give them a loan of money. What I was desirous of knowing was whether, in order to avail themselves of this offer, settlers would have to go north of the Saskatchewan. From what the minister says, I judge that will be substantially correct.

Mr. ROCHE: To get blocks of land of any extent they will have to go to the northern part of the province.

Mr. OLIVER: Did I understand the minister to give the number of homestead entries during the past year?

Mr. ROCHE: Yes.

Mr. OLIVER: How many?

Mr. ROCHE: 11,199.

Mr. OLIVER: I take it that the expenditure on immigration is primarily for the purpose of securing settlement on homesteads. Am I right?

Mr. ROCHE: We are particularly desirous of getting those who wish to locate upon the land and we are making a special effort to secure farmers, farm labourers and domestic servants.

Mr. OLIVER: The expenditure is largely for the purpose of securing homestead settlement. I think we all agree that that is right. We find that during the past year the efforts of the immigration department resulted in securing 11,000 homesteaders, and I find, on referring to the figures, that in 1910-11 and 1911-12 we had in the neighbourhood of 44,000 homesteads taken, or four times as many as we had in this past year. I suppose that that would argue that there was four times as much work done by the immigration department; at any rate, the results of the work done were four times as great as they were last year. I wish to point out, in the same line of reasoning, if my hon. friend over here (Mr. Arthurs) will permit me, that I used the other night in regard to the estimates of the lands branch, that the expenditure by the Department of the Interior in regard to immigration in this time of war, when we are voting half a million dollars for war expenditure, is extravagant beyond all reason, because we are spending this year, according to this estimate, considerably more money than we did in the year 1910-11, or the year 1911-12, when we were securing four times as many homestead settlers. I desire to emphasize that this Government in all its departments, and certainly in its Interior Department, does not know that there is a war on or that this country, in view of the extraordinary expenses of the war, demands that the expenses for the ordinary services of the country be cut down in accordance with the war conditions which reduce the possibility of results from those services. We have actually increased our expenditures for these services, notwithstanding the tremendous demands made upon us by the war. Here is this instance, the Immigration Department demands $1,215,000 for the year 1917-18, and in the year 1910-11 the demand was for $1,040,000, and for 1911-12, for $1,066,000. The only difference in the service is that in those years we paid $15,000 to the Winnipeg and St. Boniface hospitals, and in this year that sum does not appear, but there is $29,000 for Chinese immigration. The Minister of the Interior convicts his Government of absolute extravagance and of disregard of war conditions.

Mr. ROCHE: I may tell the hon. gentleman that he is away off in his figures. He states that we do not know that there is a war on, viewing it from the standpoint of the expenditure of the Immigration Branch, and that we have not been reducing our expenditure.

Mr. OLIVER: No, I say your expenditure is out of proportion to the result of your work.

Mr. ROCHE: The hon. gentleman is qualifying the impression that he conveyed to the House, that we have not taken any steps to reduce the expenditure because of the war being on. I beg to say that his figures are not quite accurate as to the actual expenditure in 1910-11. For the year 1911-12, which was the last year the hon. gentleman prepared the estimates for the Immigration Department, the expenditure was $1,354,736, and the expenditure of this past year has been $1,152,275.

Mr. MACDONALD: How many people came in 1910?

Mr. ROCHE: The people who came in 1910-11 were 311,084.

Mr. MACDONALD: And last year?

Mr. ROCHE: The number last year was 75,395, but the hon. gentleman must bear this in mind, that because the war was on it was not to be expected that we were going to close up the offices for which we had long term leases and to dismiss all our staff. Australia and New Zealand are not doing that. Our immigration agents in the United Kingdom are urging us to undertake a more active propaganda in the British Isles, to do something to promote immigration, particularly among the soldiers. Australia and New Zealand have been showing limelight views behind the trenches and carrying on a propaganda among the soldiers, and our people in England are afraid that Australia and New Zealand will have the advantage of Canada by reason of our expenditure along the same line being cut down considerably. We have our staffs in the old country. I think that every member of the immigration staff in Great Britain who is of military age and eligible has enlisted. We have been paying the difference between their civil and their military pay, and we have to keep our offices open with the other members of the staff. Quite a number of inquiries have been received, notwithstanding that the war has been on. In 1913-14, the year the war came on, the expenditure was $1,859,671. That has been reduced this past year by $700,000. So there has been a continual reduction in the expenditure, and the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) was the very member who last Monday accused the Immigration Branch of spending $300,000 more now than we did four years ago.

Mr. MACDONALD: I took my figures from the public accounts; I have them here.

Mr. ROCHE: I do not think the hon. gentleman will find such figures in the public accounts.

Mr. MACDONALD: I have them here. I compared the figures of 1910, which were $1,079,000, and those of 1915-16 which were $1,307,000.

Mr. ROCHE: The hon. gentleman said four years ago, my attention was drawn to his remarks in Hansard; he said that the Minister of the Interior was spending $300,000 more now for immigration than four years ago.

Mr. MACDONALD: The hon. gentleman must realize that I was referring to the last year of the Liberal administration

Mr. ROCHE: Four years ago. It is $700,000 less to-day. The hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) was quoting the estimates for last year and said we had spent $1,574,000.

Mr. OLIVER: I beg pardon, I did not quote the estimates of last year.

Mr. ROCHE: Was he referring to the estimates of the present year?

Mr. OLIVER: Yes, this year.

Mr. ROCHE: The estimates of this year are considerably below last year, nearly $300,000. So I think there cannot be any charge—

Mr. MARCIL: Will the hon. gentleman say how the deduction of $300,000 was made up?

Mr. ROCHE: By sweeping reductions all along the line. In some instances by the reduction of the staff. Where offices would become vacant in many instances we did not fill them, and we have had reductions all along the line. And it is a substantial reduction below last year, $300,000, and below four years ago, $700,000.

Mr. OLIVER: I find on reference to the public accounts that the expenditure on immigration in 1910-11 was $1,079,129; and in 1915-16, $1,307,480, an increase of $238,-351. I say that increase of expenditure, with the decreased business done, is absolutely indefensible, and I wish to say further that when the minister talks about decreasing his expenditure from one million eight hundred thousand down to one million whatever it is this year, I would respectfully ask him on what ground he increased it from $1,079,000 in 1911 to $1,800,000 in 1914. Under what possible state of circumstances could he justify that enormous increase at that time and in that period?

Mr. ROCHE: We had a very large immigration continuing until the outbreak of the war, and then immigration did drop; the overseas immigration since then has been almost a negligible quantity. But we have had other expenditures in connection with immigration which the hon. gentleman did not have to the same extent, because it is only of comparatively recent years that we have instituted this rigid system of boundary inspection. It was done before the hon. gentleman left office, but we have had to increase the boundary inspection and during the war we have had to put on an additional number of boundary inspectors to watch the boundary and assist other departments in their work. Our boundary inspectors have been called upon to do considerably more work since the war broke out, and that work has increased very materially. In England all our immigration agencies have been maintained, and we have carried on a much more active propaganda in the United States. The hon. member, being a journalist himself, realizes how very much more expensive it is to get out literature; paper is higher, labour is higher, our advertising is higher, and getting out literature is in every way much more expensive.

We have spent a great deal more money in the United States than we did prior to the outbreak of war. We have made special efforts to get immigration from the United States since we were shut off from overseas immigration.

Mr. MARCIL: Has the minister kept up the work of the repatriation of Canadians?

Mr. ROCHE: Yes.

Mr. MARCIL: What was done last year?

Mr. ROCHE: Colonization agents visit the New England states and bring back and locate in the various provinces French Canadians or their descendants who had gone across the line. These 9 p.m. agents, who report to the department from time to time, claim to have met with a considerable degree of success in their work. They have located some of these persons in Northern Ontario, Northern Saskatchewan, Northern Alberta and some in the province of Manitoba.

Mr. MARCIL: Has the minister any figures as to the number of persons brought in last year as a result of this work?

Mr. ROCHE: The figures are not separated from the general statistics. They are contained in the reports sent in by the colonization agents.

Mr. MARCIL: How many of these agents have you in the United States.

Mr. ROCHE: These are special colonization agents who visit the New England states and act in conjunction with our established agencies there. We have eight of them.

Mr. MARCIL: What are their names and their places of residence?

Mr. ROCHE: J. E. Robillard, Lanoraie, Que., $1,500; G. C. Poulin, St. Johns, Que., $1,200; Odilon Rathé, Henryville, $1,200; J. B. L. Bourassa, Montreal, $1,200; J. B. H. Giroux, Montreal, $600; J. A. Normandeau, Montreal, $600; O. Corbeil, Montreal, $600; Napoleon Poirier, Bellegarde, Sask., $600.

Mr. MARCIL: What kind of work does the hon. minister expect a man to do at $600 a year, in view of the high cost of living?

Mr. ROCHE: Is the hon. gentleman objecting to the salaries being so low? Does he desire that they be increased?

Mr. MARCIL: I was wondering what the minister expected a man to do at a remuneration of $600 a year.

Mr. ROCHE: I understand that they are satisfied with the salaries.

Mr. MARCIL: Are they expected to give 12 months of their time for $600?

Mr. ROCHE: They are allowed certain travelling expenses in addition to their salaries.

[Mr. Roche.]

Mr. MARCIL: What did these additional expenses amount to last year?

Mr. ROCHE: They are published in the Auditor General's report.

Mr. TURRIFF: The minister mentioned the name of M. Poirier of Bellegarde, Sask. What does M. Poirier do, aside from the work to which the minister has referred?

Mr. ROCHE: He is a clergyman.

Mr. NESBITT: What is the minister doing in the way of bringing labouring men for the farms into the province of Ontario?

Mr. ROCHE: The province of Ontario has received a fair proportion of the farm help that has come in; it has its own immigration organization as well. The special agents sent to the United States by the province of Ontario this spring have been acting in co-operation with our agents there. I understand that quite a number of farm labourers—I do not know how many—have come to the province of Ontario this spring.

Mr NESBITT: I do not know of any; certainly none have come into our section of the country. I was wondering if the minister was doing anything in this respect, because we have been very short of farm labour in Ontario. The department used to pay certain persons, who were not given a regular salary, so much for every man that they placed on the farms. Is that work still carried on?

Mr. ROCHE: Yes.

Mr. NESBITT: Who is doing that work in the county of Oxford?

Mr. ROCHE: Samuel Nagle, Ingersoll; F. W. Burgess, Woodstock; Thos. Milson, Tavistock; Messrs. Hollier and Walsh, Tilsonburg; John Pollock, Norwich; Sam L. Foe, Richmond, and Richard Hanson, Tavistock.

Mr NESBITT: Who in the world is F. W. Burgess?

Mr. ROCHE: I can not tell the hon. gentleman who he is, but his name appears as one of those colonization agents who is paid $2 for every farm labourer he places in the province of Ontario.

Mr. NESBITT: I do not know him. A man by the name of Burgess is engaged in the sewing machine business in Woodstock; surely it is not he?

Mr. ROCHE: I do not know, I am sure.

Mr. NESBITT: Such a man would not be in touch with the farmers.

Mr. ROCHE: Perhaps the farmers would be in touch with him.

Mr. NESBITT: They might be in touch with him the wrong way. A man by the name of Burgess was turnkey in the jail, but he is dead. A Mr. Irving was engaged in that work, but he died recently, and I was wondering who took his place. I wish my hon. friend would ask his department to make inquiries as to who F. W. Burgess is. I am not speaking from a political standpoint when I say that the minister should engage for this work men who are in touch with the farmers.

Mr. ROCHE: The work these men were appointed to do has fallen off very materially since overseas immigration ceased. They were largely engaged in placing men who had come across the ocean and located on the farms in Ontario.

Mr COPP: Can the minister give me information with regard to the work done by Mr. Wilmot of the Fredericton agency? The office there costs about $2,000 a year.

Mr. ROCHE: While Mr. Wilmot, I understand, has been doing a good deal of work along this line, he was not on the pay-list of the department during the past year.

Mr. COPP: Is he not now employed by the Government?

Mr. ROCHE: He is doing the work I understand. I am informed that he is very much interested in the work and he is quite willing to continue to work without salary.

Mr. COPP: He is doing work without salary now?

Mr. ROCHE: Yes.

Mr. COPP: There is no Fredericton agency at the present time?

Mr. ROCHE: No.

Mr. COPP: In regard to a matter that was brought up by the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Carvell) have you any report of work done by Mr. Hay, the Woodstock agent, during the past year?

Mr. ROCHE: Mr. Hay was under discussion here prior to six o'clock. He sends in to the department his diaries giving particulars as to his work. We have nothing here as to what he has done during the past year. My private information is that Mr. Hay was doing good work, acting in co-operation with the provincial land settlement board, locating settlers on the land. An hon. member stated this afternoon that Mr. Hay was in the pay of the provincial government. I was unaware of that fact, and I promised to make some further inquiries with regard to the matter.

Mr. COPP: I know nothing personally about this matter, and I was rather surprised when I heard the statement made by my hon. friend from Carleton regarding this man's salary, and I think the minister must have been mistaken or else I misunderstood him this afternoon when he said that Mr. Hay did not receive anything but his salary. I see by the Auditor General's report of last year that Mr. Hay received besides his salary four hundred and some odd dollars for travelling expenses.

Mr. ROCHE: What year is that?

Mr. COPP: The Auditor General's Report for the year ended March 31, 1916.

Mr. ROCHE: I was speaking of later than that.

Mr. COPP: I am referring to the year of the Auditor General's Report that is in the hands of hon. members, and from that report I find that last year Mr. Hay received $1,963.30 for his services. In view of what my hon. friend said this afternoon with regard to this gentleman's work—

Mr. CARVELL: Mr. Hay got $1,900 more than he was entitled to.

Mr. COPP: I know nothing personally about this man, but it seems to me that as this money is being spent in the province of New Brunswick, we should have some person doing some work in the interest of colonization and the money should not be thrown away.

Mr. ROCHE: I am given to understand that Mr. Hay has made a trip to the United States for the purpose of securing immigrants.

Mr. CARVELL: He made a special trip with his wife to California. He attended a fair of some kind.

Mr. MACDONALD: In war time?

Mr. CARVELL: Yes, in war time.

Mr. ROCHE: That does not at all contradict what I stated. The hon. gentleman is trying to leave the impression that Mr. Hay took his wife to California on a pleasure trip and charged up his expenses to the Government.

Mr. CARVELL: I do not think there is any doubt about that.

Mr. ROCHE: If I took the hon. gentleman as seriously as he takes himself, I do not know what might happen.

Mr. CARVELL: I am serious in regard to the matter.

Mr. MACDONALD: I would like to put on Hansard what the minister has been doing. In 1910-11, this country expended $1,079,129.85 on immigration and in that year there came to Canada 311,084 people. In the fiscal year ended March 31, 1916, my hon. friend spent $1,307,480.46 on immigration and with that increased expenditure of some $228,000 my hon. friend succeeded in getting 48,537 people to Canada. From my hon. friend's immigration work, it seems that the more money he spends the fewer immigrants he secures. I do not know whether that is a splendid rule to apply for the purpose of economy in war time or not, but perhaps the minister is acting according to the words of the Minister of Finance who always declares that no matter what shortcomings the Government have committed at any time and under any circumstances, everything is done for the purpose of winning the war. My hon. friend was throwing away the money of the people of Canada to the extent of $228,000 a year and he was getting only 48,000 immigrants, whereas, under the guidance of my hon. friend from Edmonton (Mr. Oliver), and with a much smaller expenditure, over 311,000 people were induced to come into Canada. My hon. friend was good enough to refer to my criticism with respect to these expenditures, and my figures, I think, are somewhat illuminating and will lead the House and the country to realize just what kind of reckless administration my hon. friend is carrying on in his department.

Mr. OLIVER: Has the minister the figures of the immigration for 1912, 1913, 1914 and 1915?

Mr. ROCHE: Yes; the immigration for 1912-13 was 402,432; for 1913-14, 384,878. Then the war came on and in 1914-15 the immigration was 144,789. In 1915-16 the immigration was 48,537,when the overseas immigration practically ceased and in 1916-17 the immigration, largely from the United States, amounted to 75,374.

Mr. MACDONALD: How many came from Great Britain in 1916-17?

Mr. ROCHE: 8,282.

[Mr. Roche.]

Mr. MACDONALD: And the balance from the United States?

Mr. ROCHE: Mostly, there were some from the Continent.

Mr. OLIVER: Has the minister the expenditures from 1912 and 1913?

Mr. ROCHE: In 1912-13 the expenditure was $1,399,954, and in 1913-14, $1,859,671. The expenditure has been considerably reduced every year since the outbreak of war. For the coming year the expenditure will be $700,000 less than it was four years ago.

Mr. OLIVER: There was an increase of about half a million dollars between 1912-13 and 1913-14, and a decrease of immigration of over 17,000.

Mr. ROCHE: It is impossible to figure immigration as costing so much per capita, because we have our standing expenditures that are running on. Some years, for instance, we have increased expenditure for literature. Our literature perhaps is going out in very large quantities this year, while next year that item will be considerably less, and it is impossible to judge accurately as to the expenditure being so much by reason of so many immigrants coming in.

Mr. COPP: I notice the estimate for immigration last year was $630,000. Was that whole amount spent last year?

Mr. ROCHE: No, of last year's estimate we expect to save approximately $400,000.

Mr. CARVELL: Before six o'clock I stated that I thought there were half a dozen immigration officers in the vicinity of this Mr. Hay, and the information I received from the minister was that there were none in the county of Carleton. I have here the Auditor General's Report for the year 1915-16. Of course, I do not know what may have taken place since the 31st day of March, 1916, but there has not been very much of a change unless it be upwards. I would like to call the minister's attention to this. I stated that I thought there was an agent at Debec junction, which is only eleven or twelve miles from Woodstock. There you have Mr. R. E. Kennedy, with a salary of $900, and expenses of uniform suit, $20; meals, $55.20; sundry outlay, $7.26, making a total of $982.46.

I come next to a place called Richmond, N.B., only six miles from Woodstock. There you have an inspector named Daniel Barrington, at $300. At Centreville, a few miles north of Woodstock, is A. C. Gibson, with a salary of $79.44. So there you have three men all around Woodstock. I think, perhaps, they are doing something, although there may be a little less to do than some years ago. These men, who are really looking after immigration business, are getting salaries ranging from $79.44 to $900, and yet this other man, who is simply a Conservative organizer, is getting nearly $2,000 a year; that is the objection I have to make. I think I am justified in bringing this matter up and asking the minister to cut this item out, or at least to make a thorough investigation before he proceeds with it. All along the boundary line, at Grand Falls, St. Leonards, Canterbury, McAdam Junction, St. Stephen, there are immigration officials receiving from $300 to $900 a year. I admit these men are doing something. They are at the proper location, and I am not asking that their services be dispensed with, but here is a man receiving this enormous salary and doing absolutely nothing. I am sure if the minister looks up this man's diaries he will find he has done practically nothing. I was sure when I made my statement this afternoon that there were other officials in that district, and I have now given the minister the names. He will find them in the Auditor General's Report for 1916, pages K-36, 38, 39, 40.

Mr. ROCHE: There must be a misunderstanding. We were discussing whether Mr. Hay occupied the position of colonization agent in the county of Carleton. The men whose names the hon. gentleman has mentioned are boundary inspectors. There are quite a number of them in the province of New Brunswick.

Mr. CARVELL: If there are any more in the county of Carleton I should like to have their names.

Mr. ROCHE: The list for the province of New Brunswick is as follows: Willard Tucker, H. G. Maloney, W. H. Smith, C. H. Maxwell, R. W. Whitlock, R. O'Shaughnessy, H. W. Cleland, R. E. Kennedy, D. H. Purinton, E. W. Larlee, C. A. Kirkpatrick, F. A. Roy, L. R. Belanger, W. T. Perron, Thomas Levesque, A. C. Gibson, W. H. Hawthorne, J. A. Newman, Alvin Parker, Jos. B. Porter, O. Robinson, W. E. Spike, J. Theriault, T. H. Wetmore, J. J. Walsh.

Mr. CARVELL: I am not finding any great fault with the appointment of these gentlemen because they are located at points where people might come into the province, and they are rendering some service for their salaries. I would like to know whether Mr. C. A. Kirkpatrick of Grand Falls has been receiving his salary during the past year. I see he received a salary of $900 and the ordinary perquisites for the year ending March, 1916.

Mr. ROCHE: Mr. Kirkpatrick's name is on the list of our inspectors, and he has been drawing his salary of $900 during the past year.

Mr. CARVELL: Does the minister know whether he has been performing the services of his office or not?

Mr. ROCHE: Most assuredly he has, if he has been drawing his salary.

Mr. CARVELL: The minister may be surprised, but I can tell him that this man has only been in Grand Falls once or twice in the last two or three years on a visit. I don't want to say anything unpleasant, but I will say this much; this man is an officer in the King's army who has belonged to various units since he enlisted, and he has never left Canada. I wanted to know whether he was still receiving his salary from the Immigration Department.

Mr. ROCHE: He would be treated on exactly the same terms as others who enlisted before November, 1915.

Mr. OLIVER: A few days ago I asked for information in regard to enlistments from the Interior and Indian Departments. Could the minister tell me when I may receive the return?

Mr. ROCHE: I am informed that it will soon be ready.

Mr. OLIVER: I should be glad if the minister would expedite it as much as possible.

Mr. ROCHE: I will.

Mr. COPP: I understood the minister to say that Mr. Hay was doing work with the Farm Settlement Board in New Brunswick. As I understand it, the Farm Settlement Board is purely a provincial organization, which is concerned with the placing of settlers on the land. I cannot understand how Mr. Hay, a Dominion official, should have anything to do with provincial funds expended under this board.

Mr. ROCHE: I do not suppose the hon. gentleman objects to the Dominion Government paying Mr. Hay for doing colonization work. We are paying other gentlemen for doing similar work in other provinces. If it is a fact that Mr. Hay is in the employ of the provincial government, I quite agree that he should not be drawing a salary from the Dominion Government as well.

Mr. COPP: I was not objecting to the salary at all. I had not heard of the gentleman until my hon. friend from Carleton spoke of him. My point was that the Farm Settlement Board was entirely a provincial matter, with which the Dominion Government had nothing to do.

Mr. CARVELL: Has any one been appointed temporarily in the place of Mr. Kirkpatrick at Grand Falls since he enlisted?

Mr. ROCHE: I cannot say offhand, but I can get the information for our next sitting.

Mr. DOUGLAS: Who is the immigration agent at Edmonton South?

Mr. ROCHE: Mr. Clegg is at Edmonton, Alberta. That is the only one at Edmonton that is given in the list before me.

Mr. MACDONALD: What duties are performed by Mr. Fielding, of Windsor, Nova Scotia, whose name appears in the Auditor General's Report as immigration agent there?

Mr. ROCHE: He is not now in the employ of the department.

Mr. MACDONALD: He is one of the men dropped last year?

Mr. ROCHE: Yes.

Mr. MACDONALD: Has anybody been appointed in his place?

Mr. ROCHE: No.

Mr. MACDONALD: Is T. J. Webb still in the employ of the Government at Antigonish?

Mr. ROCHE: He is not now in the employ of the department.

Mr. MACDONALD: I understand the Windsor office is abolished?

Mr. ROCHE: Yes.

Mr. OLIVER: Who is the immigration agent at Grande Prairie?

Mr. ROCHE: I have not in the list before me the name of any officer located at that point.

Mr. OLIVER: There is an immigration hall at Grande Prairie for which the department pays a rental of $65 a month. There are a considerable number of people going in, and I was curious to know to what extent the hall was being utilized. It seems strange that we should pay rent for a hall and have no one to look after it.

Mr. ROCHE: The hall is being utilized and a caretaker is in charge, but I have not his name before me.

Mr. OLIVER: A hall for immigrants will not take care of itself, and if the building is to be utilized—and I assure the minister it is desirable that it should be utilized, as a considerable number of immigrants are going in at that point—if there is not some person taking care of the hall the minister should make arrangements to have some person in charge. I believe that for some time the department was paying rental for this hall, and that, as it was not needed for immigration, it was being used for other purposes. But at present there is need for immigration accommodation at that point. I hope that the former condition does not prevail, but that the hall, which is not an unsuitable building for the purpose, is used and is properly taken care of.

Mr. ROCHE: The hall is utilized and some person is in charge, who is paid out of contingencies.

Mr. OLIVER: I have a question on the Order Paper, but, perhaps, the minister can give me the answer now. What number of people will this hall accommodate, and is sleeping accommodation provided?

Mr. ROCHE: It is a small building and not as suitable as we would like. I think there are nine beds in it. I understand the Public Works Department are negotiating for a more suitable place.

Mr. OLIVER: I did not inspect the building personally, but from the cursory view I had of it I should not say it was wholly unsuitable, and I should have thought that a larger number of beds than nine could be arranged in it. I suggest to the minister that he should take cognizance of the fact that there is a demand for immigration accommodation at this point, and that while he is arranging for his new building the present building should be utilized in the fullest reasonable measure. Grande Prairie is a railway terminal point in an area that is receiving a great deal of immigration attention and is a proper point for suitable immigration accommodation.

Mr. ROCHE: We do not desire to make an appropriation for a new building of this kind. Some negotiations have been carried on for the renting of the Empire hotel there, which, I understand, would be a very good building for our purposes. If it can be secured at reasonable rates we think it would be much better to take it for the next two or three years.

Mr. DOUGLAS: Following up my question with regard to Strathcona, I see by the Auditor General's Report that Adolphe Adam is named at a salary of $1,314. Can the minister inform me if Mr. Adam is still on the payroll?

Mr. ROCHE: I am inclined to think he is not. His name is not on the list before me as that of one of the officials at that point.

Mr. DOUGLAS: Is the minister aware of the reason why Mr. Adam is not on the payroll?

Mr. ROCHE: I am pretty sure his services were dispensed with.

Mr. OLIVER: While I do not wish to interfere with the minister's plan, I desire to say that in my judgment, if suitable arrangements can be made with regard to the Empire hotel at Grande Prairie, as it is a large building and moderately new, I think it would be wise to make arrangements for it as quickly as possible. Now is the time when the people are going in and the time when they need the accommodation. Two or three months from now they will not be going in. The present building, I should think, is not large enough to accommodate the people going in. So if there is to be a change the quicker the better.

Mr. ROCHE: I understand an officer was sent in there several days ago to try and get a building.

Mr. OLIVER: I am glad to hear it. I think there was an appropriation for an immigration hall at Spirit River.

Mr. ROCHE: I understand there is to be an immigration hall at that point. I think the Public Works Department have an appropriation in for its construction.

Mr. OLIVER: There are three points in the Peace River country that are receiving a very considerable immigration at the present time. There is, first, Grande Prairie, which is the terminal point of the railroads and from which radiates a settlement perhaps 60 miles in length by 25 miles in breadth. Then there is Spirit River, which is a smaller settlement and which is at the junction of the Grand Prairie branch railway. I do not know that there is any accommodation provided at the present time. I am under the impression that there is not, but I believe an appropriation was taken for the construction of a hall. I would be very glad to see a hall erected at Spirit River. The erection of the hall, if it is in progress now, will not be of very much present value. There are people going to that point at the present time and I would suggest that the minister take cognizance of the situation at Spirit River and secure, if possible on reasonable terms, immigration accommodation at that point without delay. I would like to say a word also regarding Peace River. Peace River is the terminus of the railroad on the Peace river and is the railway point for a settlement 60 miles in length and with prospects of growing up and down the river. I do not think there is any immigration accommodation at that point at the present time and I would urge upon the minister the desirability of securing, again if it is possible on reasonable terms, immediate temporary accommodation with the view of establishing permanent accommodation at whatever later date circumstances will permit. Grand Prairie, Spirit River and Peace River are all urgent in the matter of immigration accommodation during the present season.

Mr. CARVELL: I understood the minister to say that the Fredericton agency had been abolished. Am I right?

Mr. ROCHE: That is where Mr. Wilmot is?

Mr. CARVELL: Yes.

Mr. ROCHE: I stated that Mr. Wilmot asked to be allowed to continue doing his work but without pay.

Mr. CARVELL: I am not speaking of Mr. Wilmot alone but of the whole agency. I find a couple of names here in the Auditor General's Report—F. E. Fenety, assistant agent, $1,000 a year; a stenographer, Miss Thomas, $600 a year; a janitor, office expenses, etc.

Mr. ROCHE: I believe these are on the list yet.

Mr. CARVELL: That is what I think. What office do they rent in Fredericton and to whom do they pay the rent?

Mr. ROCHE: I will have to take a note of the question of my hon. friend as I am not personally aware of the circumstances.

Mr. CARVELL: While the amount is not very great, the remarkable thing about it is that there was a building erected in Fredericton some years ago as a post office and customs house. It was plenty large enough for a city the size of Fredericton for a good many years to come. But, a few years ago this Government, in its wisdom, erected another building immediately alongside of the old building at a cost of about $150,000. It seems rather remarkable that you have to go and hire an outside office to get public accommodation in the little city of Fredericton. It seems extraordinary that you have to pay $105 for office expenses and janitor when you have such splendid accommodation in Fredericton.

Mr. ROCHE: I have no personal knowledge of the building or as to who owns it, or what rent we pay for it, but I will take note of what the hon. gentleman has stated and make inquiries. Does the hon. gentleman know who owns the building?

Mr. CARVELL: No, I do not, but I have a very shrewd suspicion. I do not want to mention any names without feeling sure of them. I would be very much obliged to the minister if he would look into the matter and let us know who is receiving this small honorarium, because there is no office being occupied, and I doubt very much if there is any janitor being employed.

Mr. COPP: What position does Mr. Fenety hold there?

Mr. ROCHE: Assistant.

Mr. COPP: Last year he was assistant, but if there is no principal I do not see how there can be an assistant.

Mr. ROCHE: This gentleman has been there for some time and his services have been retained. Mr. Wilmot was informed that we would have to dispense with his services and we were about to close the office but the proposition was put up by Mr. Wilmot that he would be glad to give what services he could personally without charging any remuneration for himself. It is absolutely impossible to close the office entirely. I do not think he has any personal financial interest in having the office retained.

Mr. CARVELL: I have no objection to Mr. Fenety and Miss Thomas receiving their salaries, but it is an absolutely useless waste of public money. They are not doing anything because there is nothing to do and there never has been anything to do. There was a time when Mr. Fenety was interested to some extent in what they called the Farm Settlement Board, but it ceased to exist as an immigration factor three or four years ago. I do not think I am revealing any political secrets when I tell you that it will absolutely cease to exist in the course of a very short time because there has been a change in the affairs of New Brunswick within the last three months. As an immigration agency there is nothing doing, nothing has been done and nothing will be done, and unless my hon. friend wishes to keep these two people employed—the amount is not very great—he had better cancel the whole thing and get rid of the agency.

Mr. MACDONALD: In what foreign country has the minister Canadian agencies other than the United States?

Mr. ROCHE: We have no agencies now in any foreign country that I can recollect. We had one in Copenhagen. That has been closed since the war. We had one at Antwerp and that also has been closed. We had a Paris agency also. The foreign agencies have been closed except those in the United States.

Mr. MACDONALD: What is the expense of the Paris office?

Mr. ROCHE: In France there has been a very slight expenditure. We have a clerk, Mr. Martin, at $660 and a typist, Mrs. M. Martin, at $720, so that the total salaries there are $1,380.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I am glad that my hon. friend from Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) has raised this question about the different agencies in foreign countries. It seems to me that the Minister of the Interior should state the policy to be pursued by the department after the war as regards those European agencies. I concede that the best immigrants we can secure for the country are the Americans, although it is very difficult to draw a distinction between the American born and the foreigner who has settled in the United States. That may give rise to very serious difficulties in view of the problem which was raised a few days ago on the question of the franchise. The Government ought to have a policy for the period after the war. I put aside at once the question of encouraging immigration from the Central Powers to Canada. It would be a great mistake to attempt to attract to Canada people from Germany or from Austria. But, although the losses caused by this war will be enormous and although there will be, on the part of those countries devastated by the war, a desire to keep their nationals within their own boundaries, yet, with millions remaining and with the horrors that the present war will have left in the minds of the present and the coming generations, it is to be hoped that thousands and hundreds of thousands will, after the war, seek a refuge and a home in America.

Of all the countries that we as Canadians must rely upon for an excellent stock, I shall name first the British Islands. I do not know to what extent immigration will come from the British Isles, but I daresay it will be far easier to secure immigrants from them than from any other countries because it seems that after the Conference which has taken place of late during the visit of the ministers to London the tendency in England will be to encourage Britishers to settle in the various dominions and colonies. That immigration will, of course, be welcomed to Canada. But we have other countries also to which we may look as fields for immigration. I hope, in spite of what has been said, that we may expect a large flow of immigration from little Belgium. We all know that Belgium is too small a country, geographicaly speaking, to contain its relatively large population. We were given some months ago, during a debate in this House, a statement of the number of people per square mile in Belgium. It is something appalling to think of the number of people who have to dwell on the few thousands of acres which comprise the area of little Belgium. It seems to me that the Belgians, who are such hard workers and such excellent operators, and especially such good farmers and gardeners, should be encouraged to come to Canada. I am not sure that the Minister of the Interior should not take advantage of the fact that at the present moment there are thousands, and I may say hundreds of thousands, of Belgians in England, and try to get some of those good immigrants for Canada.

It is very difficult to expect a large flow of immigration from France. Before the war even, it was difficult to attract settlers from France, and after the war it will be still more difficult, because so many thousands of young men have been mowed down since 1914. But still, from what I learn from my correspondents in France, it is remarkable how many Frenchmen would be pleased to come to Canada if they could receive the necessary encouragement from this Government. Some years ago a policy was inaugurated by the Government which gave excellent results. I remember the day when immigration to Canada from France was practically nil. But with a system of advertisement and with good immigration officers in Paris and in the various centres of France, a relatively large number of French immigrants came to Canada.

There are also immigrants of the best quality to be had from the northern section of Italy. I do not say that the southern section of Italy would be a proper field for Canadian immigration effort, but I do say that the northern part of Italy is an excellent field for securing immigrants. There is a large body of good farmers in that section of Europe. Some years ago a number of them came to Montreal and settled on the island, and I may say that to-day the most prosperous gardeners, and indeed the most wealthy gardeners, in that district are Italians. They come from around Milan and Turin, and have been quite a success in their farming venture on the island of Montreal. I hope that my hon. friend will add a little more to his expenditure for immigration officers in Paris. A well-managed, well-equipped agency at Paris, which is an important European centre, which send to Canada quite a large number of immigrants. I hope that the Government will soon announce its policy concerning immigration after the war.

Mr. ROCHE: The hon. gentleman is probably aware of the fact that the French Government are not in favour of our carrying on an active propaganda for the encouraging of emigration. They do not like to see their settlers emigrate; what we have done in France, therefore, has had to be done very diplomatically. Unfortunately, the gentleman who was our agent there enlisted and was killed. We have not been spending much money on this work in France. We have been doing some advertising, but it has had to be done in such manner as not to attract too much attention. We would not be permitted to carry on an active propaganda such as we do, for instance, in the British Isles. I understand that a proposal has been made by or on behalf of Mr. Roy, who is acting under the Prime Minister's Department, that the immigration staff be merged with that of his office. The immigration authorities, however, find that it is better that matters affecting immigration should be dealt with by a separate branch. In London at one time the immigration business was largely handled through the High Commissioner's Office, but it was thought that the work would be done more advantageously and with less red tape and restriction if it was dealt with by a separate immigration branch. As to Belgium, it is not in favour of even the refugees coming across the ocean. The authorities there want to keep their own people in their own land in order to build up their devastated country after the war is over. Several offers have been made by Belgian priests to come over and act as colonization agents. By reason of communications which we had received from Belgium discouraging any attempts on our part to secure immigration from that country, I did not encourage this proposal. We have felt that we should not do anything opposed to the wishes of the Belgian people, especially with regard to attracting people from their own country during the war. As to an after-the-war policy, we have not yet matured any particular scheme. We think there is plenty of time, our information being that a large portion of the first year after the war will be occupied in bringing back our own soldiers, having regard to the facilities of transport. An after-the-war policy of immigration, however, has been under consideration, in respect not only of Britain, but of other countries as well. It will be formulated in due time; certain reforms may be adopted, and in connection with after-the-war conditions, the remarks of my hon. friend will be given full consideration.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Because of certain correspondence that I have received, I am aware that my hon. friend has done his best with regard to the French immigration office during the war. I hope that after the war he will see that the immigration office in France shall be properly equipped. Has my hon. friend been interviewed by a so-called delegate representing a Japanese company, and offering to get Japanese labourers to do farming work in western Canada?

Mr. ROCHE: I was interviewed by a representative of some company that was to be organized and incorporated if the Government viewed its proposals with favour. He did not in any capacity represent the Japanese Government, who were entirely unaware of his mission. The Japanese Consul here, to whom I referred the gentleman before giving the matter further consideration, did not, I think, view the proposal with favour.

Mr. OLIVER: Has the minister knowledge of an effort at Belgian colonization between Smoky river and Sturgeon lake in the Peace river country?

Mr. ROCHE: A Belgian priest waited on me some time ago, suggesting that he should be permitted to go to Belgium, bring some Belgians to this country and locate them on lands in Northern Alberta. I informed him that communications which we had received from the Belgian Government indicated their antagonism to the carrying on of any propoganda of that character. I did not, therefore, encourage the proposal any further.

Mr. MACDONALD: According to the Canada Year Book, there came from the United Kingdom, during the period from 1912 to 1916, a total of 483,225 people; from the United States, 476,965, and from other countries, 374,683. Adding to these figures those which the minister gave this afternoon as to the number of persons who came in during the last year, the approximate total for the five years and a half would be 491,000 from Great Britain and 916,658 from the United States and other countries. This disparity between the immigration from Great Britain and that from the United States and other countries is interesting, having in mind the suggestions made without due deliberation by some hon. gentleman with reference to the method of dealing with people who have come to Canada in large numbers in recent years, under the 10 p.m. tutelage and direction of this Government. I mention that simply because it is well that the figures should go on Hansard for future reference. I wish to ask the minister whether there is any truth in the rumour that a large settlement scheme is being arranged in Great Britain by certain well-known men who are said to be working in conjunction with this Government, under which certain lands in the Northwest are to be purchased and dealt with on a settlement basis.

Mr. ROCHE: If the hon. gentleman refers to the same report that I saw in the press, so far as this department is concerned there is nothing in it. No negotiations have been made with any company of that nature.

Mr. OLIVER: Is this project to which the minister refers the same concerning which I have a question on the Order Paper? The general manager of the company is a Mr. Fletcher.

Mr. ROCHE: I informed the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) that no negotiations at all have been conducted by this Government with any such company.

Mr. OLIVER: Has the department made any departure from the formerly settled policy to the extent of disposing of any land in the West by sale?

Mr. ROCHE: There has been no departure from that policy.

Administration of Chinese immigration, salaries, $24,000.

Mr. ROCHE: There is a decrease of $4,000.

Mr. OLIVER: What number of Chinese came into the country during the past year, and how does that number compare with the influx during preceding years?

Mr. ROCHE: In the year 1916-17, there were 121 exempt admissions and the head tax was paid on 272. In the year 1915-16, there were 69 exempt admissions, and the head tax was paid on 20.

Mr. OLIVER: Has the minister the figures of the last year in which the influx was large? I want to find out when the change took place between the very large influx of some years ago, and the present very small number of admissions.

Mr. ROCHE: In the year 1912-13, there were in round numbers 7,000 admissions on which the head tax was paid; in 1913-14, 5,274, and in 1914-15, 1,155.

Mr. OLIVER: Has there been some recent change in the imposition of the head tax in regard to any particular class of Chinese?

Mr. ROCHE: There has been no change except that embargo that was put on a couple of years ago by an Order in Council prohibiting the entry of labourers or artisans from any country into British Columbia, and, of course, that shut off the influx of Chinese into that province very materially, but there has been no change in the method of imposing the head tax.

Mr. OLIVER: That order is still in force?

Mr. ROCHE: Yes.

Mr. OLIVER: Was there not some recent change in regard to the admission of Chinese students?

Mr. ROCHE: There is legislation in contemplation at the instance of the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald), who brought this matter up before the adjournment of the House in February. That hon. member thought we were dealing harshly with a particular class of Chinese, and I informed him at the time that it was the intention of the Government to introduce at this session legislation waiving the head tax on Chinese students coming into Canada to attend educational institutions. The Bill has received its first reading and is on the Order Paper for second reading.

Mr. LEMIEUX: While I am raising no objection to the immigration of Hindus, which has been discussed by the Imperial Conference, because I am not so opinionated as are the members who represent British Columbia, yet I would like to have an expression of opinion from the minister in regard to that very important question. Since the news was spread broadcast that facilities would be given to Hindus to settle in Canada, bringing their wives with them, has the Government received any protest from the Government of British Columbia, or from the members who represent British Columbia in this House? Personally, I am not interested except from a sense of duty as a Canadian representative. I know that there is in the province by the Pacific ocean and in the other western provinces quite a sentiment against any more Hindu immigration. Let me give my experience to the minister. Some years ago it was my privilege to represent Canada at the inauguration of the new constitution in South Africa and I took that occasion to visit the cities on the coast of South Africa. I found that as a result of the immigration of Hindus, which had been encouraged by the then British authorities in South Africa, the cities and towns from Cape Town to the boundary line of Delagoa bay were filled with Hindus, and that they had practically obtained control of all the small trades in all those cities, towns and villages. I found the Hindus swarming throughout every part of South Africa. Now, if you go to Cape Town, Johannesburg or Durban, you find as many mosques as you find Christian churches. I do not raise this question to embarrass the Government as to the future; but in South Africa to-day, besides the ever-present problem of the blacks, you have the problem of the Hindus. Any man who has been in South Africa or any minister of the Crown in South Africa will tell you that a danger in that country to-day is the presence in such large numbers of the Hindus. Personally I have no objection to the Hindu, and I know he represents a very old civilization, but I am speaking for my hon. friends from British Columbia who some years ago were so intense in their efforts to prevent any immigration from the Far East into their province. My hon. friend knows what an outcry was raised against the late Government because, forsooth, that Government was not for a white British Columbia. I see some hon. members here from British Columbia. They know what the policy is to-day, to pave the way for Hindu immigration into British Columbia, and yet not a sound is heard from them. Surely the minister must have received from those representatives very loud and strong protests against this new departure. The Hindus are going to come in; they are going to bring their wives with them—

Mr. ROCHE: Is that the case?

Mr. LEMIEUX: —and the white labourer will be at the mercy of our new fellow-British citizens of that vast country of India.

Mr. ROGERS: Where did my hon. friend get all that information?

Mr. LEMIEUX: I got it from reading the report of the Imperial Conference.

Mr. ROGERS: My hon. friend had better read it again and read it correctly.

Mr. LEMIEUX: The report has not been laid upon the Table, but I know enough to say that this policy is to be encouraged, and as you have admitted India into the councils of the Empire, surely India is not going to sit silent and to be refused admission into the British dominions. The Government knows more than I do, and I would like to know what their policy is on this question.

Mr. ROCHE: I am afraid the hon. member has formulated a policy for himself on a newspaper report. I did not so understand what I read. I have not had the opportunity of discussing the matter with the Prime Minister, but I understand that at the conference certain proposals were made by the representatives of the various governments. Those proposals were not laid down as a policy, nor have they been acted upon by any government; they were simply to be referred to the respective governments for consideration, and they have not even been considered by this Government. So that when the hon. member talks about the Government permitting the almost indiscriminate immigration of Hindus into British Columbia, he is drawing pretty largely upon his imagination, for no such policy has been decided upon, and consequently no protests have been heard. I think it will be time enough for the British Columbia members to protest when they realize there is something tangible to protest against. There is undoubtedly a feeling in British Columbia against indiscriminate Oriental immigration. There are comparatively few Hindus in British Columbia at the present time. A few years ago there were from 5,000 to 6,000, but many of them have gone to their own country or to California, and now there are not more than 2,000 in that province.

Mr. OLIVER: In making his announcement to the House as to the proceedings of the Imperial Conference, I was surprised to hear the Prime Minister say, if my memory does not deceive me, that a resolution was passed that India should be represented at future conferences on the same basis as the other dominions, and that he had moved or agreed to an arrangement whereby the rights of Hindus in Canada would be measured by the rights accorded Canadians in India. Now that seems to be going very far towards assuming a direction and authority that certainly should not be assumed lightly, and which in my humble judgment should not be put forward except through this Parliament of Canada. The question of Oriental immigration has been serious in Canada in years past, and if the Prime Minister truly expressed the attitude of this new cabinet of the Empire towards the subject of Hindu immigration into Canada, I would say that our position will be very much more dangerous in the future than it has been in the past. I say nothing against the people of China, or Japan or of India. Their civilizations are older than ours. For them their civilizations may be better than ours. But they are not ours. Our civilization suits us just as their civilization suits them, I suppose. Our purpose in this country is to establish firmly, to build up and improve our civilization according to our best ideals, and we can only do that by retaining the control and direction of affairs in our own country so that we may direct them in the interests and up-building of that civilization. If, in dealing with those older civilizations which come amongst us, our hands are tied by Imperial authority, then we are handicapped in the purpose we had in view in establishing ourselves in this country. We claim that this Empire of ours is the most perfect fruit of the civilization of which we are a part. Our claim is that it stands today at the head of white civilization. It can only retain that position by being maintained by a white civilization, and that white civilization must be maintained in the self-governing dominions of the Empire, or this Empire cannot be maintained finally and completely as a white man's empire. There may from time to time be occasions when it seems for the moment to conduce to the welfare of the Empire to permit the projection of this Oriental civilization into the white civilization of this or that or the other dominion, but under no possible circumstances can it be for the ultimate welfare of the Empire to permit that projection of these Oriental civilizations.

We have here a country of vast extent, of marvellous resources, of tremendous possibilities, with a population of 8,000,000. Our Pacific province is just as well suited for occupation and exploitation by the people of China and Japan as by ourselves, and it is approximately just as well suited for occupation and exploitation by the people of India as by ourselves. There are 300,000,000 people in India, 400,000,000 in China, and from 40,000,000 to 50,000,000 in Japan. To permit the movement of people from any or all of these countries into Canada at their individual will or wish could, and ultimately, we may say, would, under certain circumstances, mean the submergence of white civilization, certainly in our Pacific province, and I see no reason why not from one end of the Dominion to the other, without the drain being noticed in either one of these three Oriental countries. A successful policy of peaceful penetration is conquest and destruction just as much as occupation by force of arms; and if we do not, as a country, and as an Empire, recognize that fact, then we are building for nothing and our hopes will not bear fruit.

It is held by some that a citizen of the British Empire should have equal rights with every other citizen in every part of the British Empire. That sounds well, and there may be conditions when it would be desirable. But in this British Empire, which includes a portion of every quarter of the globe, and every race of men, and every form of civilization on earth, however beautiful it may be in theory, it is not possible in practice. We need not discuss the theory. We may be well satisfied to consider our own circumstances and conditions and to guide our course accordingly. It is absolutely necessary for the preservation of our civilization that we should retain to ourselves the right to say who shall and who shall not be admitted to the advantages, the benefits, the occupations, or the citizenship of this country. There is no other way by which we can retain and control the civilization that we have established, that we enjoy, and that we intend to transmit to the generations that are to come after us, that they too may continue to improve it. There is no Imperial exigency, there is no condition of world politics, or of world war, that can be allowed to derogate from that right and the exercise of that right. It is a fact that there are soldiers from India fighting the battles of the Empire; and that the soldiers of Canada are fighting the battles of the Empire. They are both fighting in the same cause. But that does not say that the citizens of Canada may project their civilization amongst the peoples of India any more than it says that the peoples of India shall be entitled to project their civilization amongst the people of Canada. India is fighting for her liberty, to do what she pleases within her own area. Canada is fighting for the same purpose. The fact that we are fighting to protect our rights and interests in our own country gives us no right or authority to dictate to the peoples of some other part of the Empire what they shall do in their country and under their own conditions. So we say, however well the soldiers of India may fight, however much India may do in the cause of the Empire, we still have the same right to protect ourselves and our own country, to protect the civilization our fathers established here, civilization that we are giving our best endeavours to build up, and to-day are making sacrifices for, in order that we may transmit it to our children that they may carry the torch of liberty and civilization on down the ages.

Mr. ROGERS: The remarks of the hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) would tend to give the House the impression that some rights of this Parliament, or of the Canadian people, have been given away as a result of the recent Imperial Conference. Let me assure my hon. friend that no rights have been given away, that there has been no thought of any rights as likely to be given away. We did discuss with the Indian representatives the question of immigration, and we distinctly and clearly informed them that it would be impossible for us to hold out any hope of any particular change in respect to immigration to the province of British Columbia. The only thing that passed was a resolution to submit to the people and Parliament of Canada favourable consideration of the position the Indian Empire is taking in this great struggle, in which their soldiers are fighting side by side with the soldiers of the other parts of the Empire, while their people are assisting by large contributions of money toward the purposes of the war. We said that we would give favourable consideration to the requests they made, but we assured them that we had not any hope that these representations would meet with any success in the way of a change in the policy that Canada had adopted in the past with respect to immigration from the Indian Empire.

I rise to say this word in order that the statements that have fallen from the lips of the hon. member for Edmonton may not be misunderstood either by this House or by any portion of the country. I am sure he does not desire to create a wrong impression, and it would be most undesirable that a wrong impression should be created. We appreciate, I am sure, what the Indian Empire is doing in the war. At the same time, the hon. member (Mr. Oliver) correctly stated the condition when he said that we, too, are fighting for our rights, and that we in Canada have our rights, as they in India have theirs. We purpose to maintain the right that we have ever maintained, that of receiving and accepting those who, we think, will make desirable settlers in the building up of the great population of the Dominion. We discussed the matter with the Indian representatives, but we have promised nothing more than was stated to the House by the Prime Minister the other day. Nothing has been given away and there is no understanding that anything shall be given away in the policy with regard to foreign immigration coming to Canada at the close of the war.

Progress reported.

THE RIGHT HON. A. J. BALFOUR.

Mr. ROGERS: Mr. Speaker, with the consent of the House, I would move that when this House adjourns to-night it stand adjourned until two o'clock on Monday next. This is suggested in view of the fact that we are to be honoured by the visit of a very distinguished gentleman on Monday afternoon. I beg to move that this House do now adjourn and that it stand adjourned until two o'clock on Monday next.

Mr. OLIVER: Will there be any business besides meeting this distinguished gentleman?

Mr. ROGERS: Most of the afternoon, I presume, will be taken up by Mr. Balfour, and after that we will go on with Estimates or business of that kind.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 10.45 p.m. Friday until two p.m. Monday, May 28.

Monday, May 28, 1917.

The House met at Two o'clock, the Speaker in the Chair.

SITTING SUSPENDED.

Hon. ROBERT ROGERS (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that our guest of to-day, the Right Hon. Mr. Balfour, will not be here until three o'clock, I would suggest that the House rise, to meet again at that hour.

Mr. SPEAKER: I declare the sitting suspended until three o'clock. Let the doors be opened.

And the sitting of the House was accordingly suspended for one hour.

THE RIGHT HONOURABLE ARTHUR JAMES BALFOUR.

RECEPTION TENDERED BY THE PARLIAMENT OF CANADA.

The House resumed at three o'clock to receive the Right Honourable Arthur James Balfour, and to tender a reception to him by the Parliament of Canada, the members of the Senate of Canada with the Speaker of the Senate being present for the occasion in the Chamber of the Commons.

The Right Hon. Sir Robert Borden, Prime Minister of Canada, and the Right Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier, leader of His Majesty's Opposition, accompanied by Colonel Harry Smith, C.M.G., A.D.C., Sergeant-at-Arms of the Commons, met Mr. Balfour at the entrance to the temporary parliament buildings and accompanied him to the Chamber of the Commons.

In the Chamber, Sir Robert Borden, and Sir Wilfrid Laurier escorted Mr. Balfour to the dais and presented him to the Speaker of the Commons and to the Speaker of the Senate, beside whom he was seated.

The members of the Commons, the members of the Senate, and the audience in the galleries rose as Mr. Balfour entered and joined in the singing of "God Save the King."

ADDRESS BY THE SPEAKER OF THE COMMONS.

The Honourable EDGAR N. RHODES, Speaker of the House of Commons of Canada, addressing Mr. Balfour, said:

Mr. Balfour, on behalf of the House of Commons, I deem it a privilege as well as an honour to offer you a cordial welcome to Canada and to this House. We recognize in you a statesman who has enjoyed in marked degree the confidence of the people of the Motherland during a career of forty-three eventful years of most valuable public service, during which period you have occupied many offices of great trust, including the highest in the gift of the State.

We welcome you also because of the special circumstances surrounding your mission to this continent and the representative character of your visit.

It is our belief that the visit of yourself and your associates to our neighbour and ally, the United States, has been greatly helpful to the cause which we all have at heart, and our prayer is that your work there may be abundantly blessed.

May I express the hope that your stay here, though all too brief, may be pleasant, that you will carry with you agreeable memories of Canada; above all, that on your return to the Homeland you will feel justified in delivering this message—that we stand firmly with Britain, the other dominions overseas, and our Allies, in fixed determination that the great principles for which we are fighting shall be maintained, and that to the measure of our ability we are prepared, willingly, to bear our full share of the common burden.

ADDRESS BY THE SPEAKER OF THE SENATE.

The Honourable JOSEPH BOLDUC, Speaker of the Senate, addressing Mr. Balfour, said:

(Translation) Mr. Balfour, on behalf of the members of the Senate of Canada, invited for this memorable and epoch-making event, I deem it a great honour to join with the Speaker of the House of Commons in offering you a cordial welcome to Canada.

In your person we greet the eminent statesman who has been enjoying, for nearly half a century, the confidence of the people of the Mother-land and who, during that eventful period, has rendered the most signal public service to his country, having occupied many offices of great responsibility, including the highest in the gift of the nation.

We also welcome you as the worthy representative of the great British Empire, in view of the special circumstances surrounding your mission to this continent.

It is our belief that your visit to the neighbouring Republic, our Ally, will be most fruitful in mutual advantages to the cause which is dear to our hearts, and we fervently pray that your efforts in that direction may be successful.

We hope that your stay here, though too brief, may be pleasant and that you will take with you agreeable memories of Canada.

Above all we cherish the hope that on your return to the Home-land you may feel justified in delivering this message to the people of the United Kingdom: that in common with Great Britain, and the other dominions overseas and our Allies, it is our unalterable determination to hold fast, and never relax our efforts in upholding the sacred principles for which we are fighting, and in bearing our full share of the burden of the war.

SPEECH OF RT. HONOURABLE MR. BALFOUR.

The Right Honourable ARTHUR JAMES BALFOUR first spoke in French as follows: Messieurs les Présidents, honorables messieurs du Sénat, messieurs de la Chambre des communes: Il m'est inutile de dire combien je suis touché de l'accueil qui vient de m'exprimer le Président du Sénat et le Président de la Chambre. Je les remercie cordialement de leurs généreuses paroles de bienvenue.

Vous me pardonnerez sans doute si je ne m'exprime pas en langue française avec la facilité que je désirerais. Mais je m'en console en me souvenant que vous venez d'entendre un maître de l'éloquence, le grand Viviani, digne représentant de notre grande et chère alliée, de ce pays où se battent en ce moment les soldats des deux races, française et anglaise, menacées d'un péril commun.

Notre Canada a été créé par le génie des deux races—anglaise et française. Chacune de ces races a conservé sa langue, sa religion, son caractère national. Côte à côte, elles ont vécu, elles ont grandi, et à ce moment des milliers des plus braves parmi les fils du Canada sont allés outre-mer et ont prêté leur concours pour chasser les Allemands de la terre de France et pour délivrer le monde de la menace du militarisme prussien.

TRANSLATION OF MR. BALFOUR'S REMARKS SPOKEN IN FRENCH.

Mr. Speaker of the Senate, Gentlemen of the Senate, Gentlemen of the House of Commons:

It is not necessary for me to say how deeply moved I am at the cordial welcome which has just been tendered me by the Speakers of the Senate and of the House of Commons. I thank them most heartily for their generous words of greeting.

You will no doubt pardon me if I do not express myself in the French language as fluently as I would desire. But I am comforted by the thought that you have lately heard a master of eloquence, the great Viviani, worthy representative of our great and dear ally, that country where at this moment French and English soldiers, representing the two races, are fighting side by side and facing a common peril.

This Canada of ours has been created by the genius of those two races, English and French. Each has maintained her language, her religion and her national spirit. Side by side they have lived and have thrived, and at this moment thousands of the bravest sons of Canada are over the seas lending their aid to drive the Germans from the soil of France, and to rid the world from the menace of Prussian militarism.

The Right Hon. Mr. BALFOUR then, speaking in English, said:

Mr. Speaker of the Commons, Mr. Speaker of the Senate, Honourable Gentlemen: I turn to a language which I do not admire more than the one I have been somewhat imperfectly speaking, but one with which I am very much more familiar. Perhaps you will allow me to make the rest of my speech in accents that come more familiarly to my tongue.

Ladies and gentlemen, it is with the profoundest emotion that I enjoy this opportunity of meeting the two Houses of the Canadian Parliament in joint session. Many of your most distinguished members are, I think I may venture to say, personal friends of my own; I have seen them and have enjoyed their company in the Home land, and now that I come here and have again the opportunity of renewing my friendship with them it is not merely a personal pleasure to interchange ideas and to come in contact with them as those responsible for the government of this great community, but there is a special emotion in feeling that I come at one of the greatest crises not merely in the Imperial history of Great Britain, but in the world history of civilization.

Gentlemen, I do not believe that anything more unexpected to the outside world has ever occurred than the enthusiastic self-sacrifice with which the great self-governing Dominions of the British Empire have thrown themselves into this great contest. The calculation of the ordinary foreign politician, and especially of the German politician, was that the British Empire was but a fair-weather edifice, very imposing in its sheer magnitude and in the vast surface of the globe which it occupied, but quite unfitted to deal with the storm and stress of war; destined to crumble at the first attack, and, like a house built on the sand, to fall to a great ruin. I do not think myself that that was nearly so foolish, or so obviously idiotic a miscalculation as some of those others in which our German enemies have indulged. On the face of it, to those who are ignorant of the inner spirit which animates the British Empire from one end to the other, it would be impossible to conceive of a great State which apparently was less well fitted to deal with the terrible stress of war. Take up the map and you see large tracts of the world coloured red. They are separated by vast oceans, they encircle the globe; and while the fact that the sun never sets upon the British Empire may be proof of its magnitude, it is no evidence of its strength. Moreover, remember what the foreign speculators about the British Empire must have thought before the war began. They said to themselves: This loosely constructed State resembles nothing that has ever existed in history before; it is held together by no coercive power; the Government of the Mother Country can not raise a corporal's guard in Canada, Australia, New Zealand, or wherever you will; she can not raise a shilling of taxation; she has no power to do so. But, they forgot that power which a certain class of politician never remembers—the moral power of affection, sentiment, common aims and common ideals. Even those of us who most firmly believed that the British Empire, a new experiment in the long history of the world, was going to succeed; even those who, like myself, took a sanguine view of the future of our great Empire, must have felt—so loosely was it knit, so vast were the areas that it covered, so improbable that this immense body should be animated by one soul, or that the indirect thrill of a common necessity should vibrate, as it were, from pole to pole and everywhere meet with a response—that such a dream was difficult, and such an ideal hard to carry into effect. When, unexpectedly, without giving an opportunity for preparation or discussion or propaganda, war burst upon the world even those animated by such a feeling might well have doubted whether this great Empire—each unit of which had it in its power to hold aloof had it so desired—would act as one organization animated by one soul, moved by one purpose and driving towards one end. It seems to me almost a political miracle, but the miracle has occurred; and no greater event in my opinion has ever happened in the history of civilization than the way in which all the co-ordinated democracies, each one conscious of its separate life, each one not less conscious of its common life, have worked together with a uniform spirit of self-sacrifice in the cause in which they believed that not merely their own individual security, but the safety of the Empire and the progress of civilization and liberty itself were at stake.

Now, ladies and gentlemen, it seems to me to be interesting to compare the picture which I have just endeavoured imperfectly to draw of the British democracies working freely together, each under its own institutions, each according to its own lights, towards a common and unselfish end, with what is happening, and has happened, in the Central Powers of Europe. There you find also many communities, independent, or nominally independent, of any alliance, working together towards objects which they, at all events, conceive to be in their own interests. But how different is that bond which unites them, how different are the ideals which they pursue! At this moment, if all the stories which reach us from every source have the least grain of truth in them, you have Germany fighting for her own self-centred ends, encircled by a set of states which she has brought under her control, who love her not, whose interests are really not identical with hers but which she has got into her grasp, and which doubtless, if they could, would carry out their own policies in their own fashion. The greatest of all these powers is Austria; and yet we all know, or all of us who have access to authentic information know, that Austria is not working with Germany as we are working with France or as the different units and elements of the British Empire are working with each other. Germany has so contrived her diplomacy and has so arranged her material forces that Austria perhaps has not a will of her own; but, if she has a will of her own she is quite incapable of carrying it out. What is true of Austria is true, with qualifications and differences, of the other allies who are fighting on the side of Germany. It is true of Bulgaria and it is true of Turkey. All of these are animated not by a desire for legitimate self-defence, not by a desire for freedom, not by a determination to reach any common end or to carry on any great civilizing work, but they, one and all, are merely pawns in the German game, moved as the German military party desires, not allowed to use their own resources for their own ends, not permitted to have ideals of their own or to pursue them for themselves, but all dragged into this great vortex of German ambition; all designed in the first place to supply the forces by which the war may be won, and, if the war is won, as I presume there may be some in Germany who think it will be won, by the Central Powers, then predestined to fall into their ordered places as satellites of the central Prussian sun, as subordinate powers destined to minister to her greatness, to her economic wealth, to her economic control over all other nations, but always in strict subordination to the dominant power.

That is the ideal of the Central Powers, and it is because the world has begun to discover that that is their ideal; because the world now knows that the war was deliberately arranged by the Prussian military party that the provocation which was its nominal excuse was deliberately contrived; that the moment was carefully chosen, and that the ends were the selfish ambition of this military class—it is because the world has discovered this, that wherever you find a free democracy, wherever you find the spirit of liberty abroad, wherever you find that great spirit of self-development on national lines, there you will find friends of the Allies, there you will find enemies of the Central Powers.

Ever as the months go on, it becomes more evident that this is a world war between the powers of democracy on the one side and the powers of autocracy on the other side. We in this room, whatever shades of differences may separate us, can, in such a contest, take only one side. We can only be on the side of democracy.

We are convinced that for every human combination which has reached the degree of civilization and development that has been attained by all the great western communities, there is but one form of Government, under whatever name it may be called, and that is the Government in which the ultimate control lies with the people. We have staked our last dollar upon democracy, and if democracy fail us we are bankrupt indeed. But I know that democracy will not fail us.

I do not pretend, I do not think anybody who has ever studied the history of the past or has looked with impartial eyes upon the present which will soon be history, for a moment deceives himself with the idea that democracy is an easy form of Government. Gentlemen, it is the only form of Government, but it is not an easy form of Government. It has inherent difficulties; it has always had them, it always will have them, and I am not sure that every race is gifted enough to surmount these difficulties. That the great countries that represent western civilization not only can overcome these difficulties but have largely overcome them already, I think is assured. But do not let us imagine that the task, however successfully it may have been accomplished up to the present time, is one which does not require our constant efforts lest, where failure is easy, failure should occur. After all, when German militarism laid it down, as it has always laid it down, that democracy is not capable either of a far-sighted policy or of vigorous co-ordinated effort, it made a great blunder—but it made a blunder for which there is some excuse. It recognized how hard has always been found, —not now particularly but always,— the task of managing a great community of free men and directing and concentrating all their efforts and all their sacrifices, at any given moment, upon one great object. That can be done, no doubt, simply and effectively by a military autocracy. It can be done more easily; it can in appearance, (though I think only in appearance), be done much more effectively. But when democracy sets itself to work, when it really takes the business in hand, I hold the faith most firmly that it will beat all the autocracies in the world. But, it will not beat them easily; it will not beat them without effort; it will not beat them unless it is prepared to forego, temporarily it may be, those divisions which, in a sense, are the very life blood of a free, vigorous, and rapidly developing community. That is the paradox and the difficulty which lies at the root of democracy. You cannot have a democracy without a collision of opinions—at least I think not. You cannot have a democracy without parties, because parties are, after all, but the organization of differences of opinion, and the paradox and the difficulty of democracy is how this normal and this healthy habit is to be got over when, in moments of great national crises, the efforts of every section and every party must be subordinated to one overmastering purpose.

I am addressing a body of responsible statesmen who know how institutions are practically worked, who get their knowledge not from books but from experience; and they are the best audience in the world for dealing with matters which perhaps may seem to you too abstract to be proper subjects of discussion on such an occasion as this. But I, who have seen the democracy of the Homeland at work since the beginning of the war, who have then had the happy opportunity of seeing on this continent another great democracy girding itself for the struggle to which it is now finally committed,and who have the inestimable privilege of meeting this gathering of my fellow countrymen in the greatest of our self-governing Imperial elements—I who have had these advantages am deeply impressed both with the power of a democracy to overcome the difficulties of which I speak, and of the necessity for its overcoming them. I suppose you have your difficulties, as undoubtedly the United States has had its difficulties, and as most assuredly we in the Motherland have had our difficulties. If those difficulties seem at any given moment to be hard to overcome, do not for a moment let you faith fail you. You are worthy representatives of those principles of constitutional freedom which in their modern developments are the invention of the British race, and which, on the whole, have been practised with at least as much success by the British race as by any other race in the world.

That Canada is with the Allies through all difficulties to a final and triumphant conclusion of this great conflict is the message which you, Mr. Speaker of the House of Commons, and you, Mr. Speaker of the Senate, have asked me to convey to the Motherland. In the truth of that message I firmly believe. I know that the democracies of the old world as well as of the new—whether they belong to the British Empire, or are outside of it; whether they speak the English language, or the language of other free nations—will come out of this struggle not merely triumphant in the military sense, not merely conquerors where victory is essential to civilization, but strengthened in their own inner life; more firmly convinced that the path of freedom is the only path to national greatness; and with the lesson fully learned, that patriotism will always overcome the dangers and difficulties inherent to a democratic constitution, and that the strength which is derived from having behind effort the consent of a free people, is greater than all the strength that can be secured by the most elaborate, the most tyrannical, and the most well thought-out system of military despotism.

I most gratefully thank you for having listened to me. I shall carry back from this meeting the message which has been entrusted to me by the Speaker of the House of Commons and by the Speaker of the Senate. And I shall do more; for I hope however imperfectly, to convey to my friends in the Motherland the tidings that the spirit which animates their children here is not less ardent, not less resolute, not less firmly devoted to the achievement of a final victory than that by which they themselves are ruled.

Right Hon. Sir ROBERT BORDEN (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker of the Senate, Mr. Speaker of the House of Commons: It is wholly unnecessary for me to say that the Parliament of Canada has listened with the most profound interest and the most intense appreciation to the message which has just fallen from the lips of the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs in the Government of the United Kingdom. Perhaps we of this day and generation as yet only dimly realize the full significance of the great events which have brought about the presence of Mr. Balfour on this continent. It may be that those who come after us will see in the significance of those events something greater than we at present can discern.

It has been well said by the speakers who have extended the welcome of this Parliament and of the Canadian people to Mr. Balfour, that for many years he has given distinguished service to the Empire. We had the privilege of sitting with him in the Imperial War Cabinet beyond the seas, when he was called upon, shortly after the entry of the United States into the war, to undertake a mission of high importance to the great neighbouring republic. To them he has given his message many times and on many notable occasions, and on this the occasion of his coming to us, it is not inappropriate to say that this Parliament and the people of Canada have warmly welcomed the event which made the great neighbouring nation a participant with us in the fight for the liberties of the world. I have before referred to the fact that already in our own expeditionary forces there are fighting side by side with Canadians many thousands of those who were born on the other side of the boundary line and who owe their allegiance to the United States. To-day I say this further: in all that tends to the vigorous and effective prosecution of the war I am sure that the Parliament and the people of Canada will be not only disposed but anxious to co-operate in every effective way with the Government and the people of the United States. As streams from both countries, the tributaries of the great St. Lawrence, cast their waters into one noble river that flows and will flow for ever to the ocean, so, I am sure, the sympathies, ideals and efforts of both countries will join in a mighty stream of united endeavour towards the great common purpose of this war.

Mr. Balfour has brought to us a message of great moment, of much eloquence and of deep feeling. He has spoken of the part which the self-governing Dominions of the Empire have taken in this war. The people of Canada did not hesitate for a moment as to the part they should take. That question was settled once for all by Germany herself. She made the issue which this country, in common with the Motherland, the dominions of the Empire and all the Allied nations, have accepted; that issue we, in common with the other self-governing nations of our great Imperial Commonwealth, are determined to maintain until the end. The voice of this Parliament and of this people has been conveyed aptly and properly to Mr. Balfour in the message which has already been given to him by the Speaker of the House of Commons and the Speaker of the Senate.

No one should underestimate the difficulty in a free self-governing democracy of concentrating, to the exclusion of all other questions, however important, the intense effort of the people in the conduct of a struggle such as this. Mr. Balfour has said that democracy is more or less on trial in respect of its capacity, not only to make, but to maintain such an effort. While thoroughly conscious of the difficulties to which he has alluded, and which have already made themselves manifest in the Motherland and in other dominions of the Empire, and which may make themselves manifest in the great neighbouring republic, I am supremely confident with him that in this, the greatest self-governing Dominion of the Empire, those difficulties will be met and will be solved, and that the purpose of our people will be maintained until the cause for which Canada has entered this war has been abundantly established and safe-guarded. I agree with him that if democracy is not capable of that devotion and that sacrifice, then democracy will have failed to justify its existence. I agree with him also that we cannot for one moment contemplate any such event or any such outcome.

A few weeks ago this Parliament had the privilege of listening to a most eloquent address from a distinguished statesman and orator, one who brought us a message, as it were from the very heart of things, a message from France which has endured with such wonderful patience, such splendid heroism and such remarkable fortitude all the barbarities and horrors that this war and the methods by which it has been waged have laid upon the French people. From what I have heard of that message, I am confident that it would be imperishable in the memories of all who had the privilege of listening to it; but nevertheless it was thought proper, and indeed it was most desirable, that it should be inscribed upon the records of this Parliament in order that it might remain as a witness to us and to all who come after us of what that great statesman desired to convey to us on behalf of the country and the people for whom he spoke.

And so to-day, having listened to the very moving and earnest address with which we have been favoured by Mr. Balfour, I am confident that my right hon. friend Sir Wilfrid Laurier will join with me in moving that the message to which we have just listened shall be inscribed upon the records of our Hansard and shall in that way endure for those of the present day and for those who are to follow us as the words of one whose great experience, distinguished ability and close association with the events of this war for more than two years enable him to speak with a peculiar authority. I therefore move, seconded by Sir Wilfrid Laurier:

That the speech of the Rt. Hon. Arthur J. Balfour, delivered before the Parliament of Canada to-day, be published in the official report of the Debates of this House.

I conclude by conveying, as I am sure I may convey, the most grateful appreciation and thanks of this House and of this country for his message. I bid him God-speed in the work which still lies before him, and I repeat once more that he may take back to those in the Motherland beyond the sea the firm resolve and determination of the Parliament and people of this country to do our duty to the end, whatever it may be.

[Sir Robert Borden.]

The Right Hon. Sir WILFRID LAURIER (Leader of the Liberal party): Mr. Speaker, and Mr. President of the Senate, I certainly, with the very greatest pleasure, second the motion of my right hon. friend the Prime Minister. I do it with all the more pleasure from the fact that the thoughts which have been expressed in such noble language by Mr. Balfour to-day are not thoughts for this day only, but are thoughts that have laid down a rule of conduct for all Canadians, not only in this emergency, but in their every-day life. Even now, after the many ovations which have been accorded spontaneously and enthusiastically wherever Mr. Balfour has appeared, ever since he has landed upon the shores of this continent, and which have grown in magnitude from the day he crossed over the border and entered into Canadian territory—even after all these demonstrations, Mr. Balfour can scarcely realize the depth and the warmth of the feeling with which he is greeted. When a man has risen to the high position which he occupies to-day and which he has occupied for so many years in the government of his country; when he has mounted from summit to summit until he has reached the highest pinnacle of fame and reputation, he need not be surprised if, wherever he appears, he is received with pride and acclamation.

But Mr. Balfour, I am sure, would be the first to recognize that the warmth of the reception which he has received, especially in this country, is not due alone to his great name and personality, but is associated with an even greater name, the name of England, the Champion of liberty, the mother of living nations.

England, great at all times, was never greater than at this moment; never was greater, I repeat, and because of what? Because to-day England is the home of civilization and the terror of the enemies of civilization. In Germany to-day the cry is, "Gott strafe England." But everywhere else, on the seven seas, throughout the five continents, in the mansions of the great, and in the cottages of the lowly, there rises every day the fervent and ever more fervent prayer, "God bless England." God bless England for all the sacrifices she has made, for the duties she has undertaken, for the risks she has assumed.

Undoubtedly in this great war—Mr. Balfour referred to it eloquently a moment ago—the greatest sacrifice of all has been made by France. That was unavoidable, because by reason of her geographical position, France had to bear the first shock of battle. It was the good fortune of France at the battle of the Marne to shatter the plans of Germany; though it was not to be that she should win a decisive victory there. The war has gone on since and with varying fortunes, but we have reason to believe, and believe firmly, that victory, though it may be distant, is as sure as the rising of to-morrow's sun. Evidences are accumulating more and more, that after all the supreme battle, the final victory, will be won on the high seas. The strategy of Germany to-day is to starve England. The British people have accepted the challenge, and it is the British navy which will win the final victory. I pin my faith not on warships alone, but equally upon the merchant ships. Our heart goes out to the men on those merchant ships which day in and day out are sailing in and out of the ports of England with food, that she may continue her life. Every day sees these ships, insufficiently armed if not defenceless, putting out to sea regardless of the risk of being sunk by an invisible and cowardly enemy, and whenever one does get torpedoed she goes down with her sailors cheering to the last for England. This is the spirit upon which we rely for final victory, because we are confident that victory will be won not merely by cannon shots, but also by the living soul of man.

I have nothing to add to the message which you, Sir, will take back to England, and which has been expressed so eloquently by Mr. Speaker, but if I had to add one word, and one word only, it would be that you report to the people of England, to the people of Europe, to the people of the whole world that we Canadians stand to-day prouder of the British allegiance than we were three years ago.

The motion of the Prime Minister seconded by the leader of the Opposition that the speech of Mr. Balfour be published in the official report of the Debates of the House, was agreed to.

On the motion for Sir Robert Borden for the adjournment of the House.

Hon. Mr. PUGSLEY: Before the House adjourns I beg to propose three cheers for Mr. Balfour.

The members of both Houses and those present in the galleries joined in prolonged cheering.

Mr. BALFOUR: I thank you from my heart.

Motion agreed to, and the House adjourned at 4 p.m.

Tuesday, May 29, 1917.

The House met at Three o'clock, the Speaker in the Chair.

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT RESPECTING INSURANCE.

Hon. C. J. DOHERTY (Minister of Justice) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 54, to amend the Criminal Code respecting insurance. He said: This Bill is intended to complement the Bill introduced a few days ago by the hon. Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White), the new Insurance Act. It was considered that the carrying on of business not in compliance with certain requirements of that proposed Act would involve so serious public wrong as to justify its being dealt with as a matter of criminal law. Further, it is considered desirable that it should be made quite evident that in dealing with the matter Parliament was dealing with it as a matter of criminal law, and this because of certain views that were expressed in connection with the litigation arising out of the previous Insurance Act.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

PENNY BANK ACT AMENDMENT.

Sir THOMAS WHITE (Minister of Finance), moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 55, to amend the Penny Bank Act. He said: The object of this Bill is to authorize the boards of directors of penny banks to invest the funds of these banks in Dominion Government securities, subject to the approval of the Minister of Finance.

Mr. PUGSLEY: They do not issue any paper money?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: No.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

BANK ACT AMENDMENT.

Sir THOMAS WHITE (Minister of Finance) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 56, to amend the Bank Act. He said: This Bill is to authorize banks to loan money to farmers on live stock, taking a simple form of security therefor, under section 88 of the Bank Act.

Mr. GRAHAM: Does that lien rank ahead of an ordinary chattel mortgage?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Legislation is to be introduced by which the law giving authority to banks to make loans upon chattel mortgage upon live stock will be repealed.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

BUSINESS PROFITS WAR TAX.

Sir THOMAS WHITE moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 57 to amend the Business Profits War Tax Act, 1916. He said: This Bill is founded on a resolution which has already been concurred in by the House.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

PRIVATE BILLS.

FIRST READING OF SENATE BILLS.

Bill No. 51. An Act for the relief of Delbert Ralph O'Neil.—Mr. Buchanan.

Bill No. 52. An Act for the relief of Edward Austin Barnwell.—Mr. Bennett (Calgary).

TRANSCONTINENTAL RAILWAY.

REMOVAL OF RAILS FOR USE IN FRANCE.

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. FRANK OLIVER: I desire to read a telegram which has relation to the taking up of the Grand Trunk track:

Pochahontas, Alberta, May 25, 1917.
Hon. Frank Oliver,
Ottawa, Ont.
Section men have started uncoupling track. Advise how we shall be taken care of.
Jasper Park Collieries.

I desire to advise the House that the Jasper Park collieries represent a capital investment of $600,000. Their April output was 7,700 tons. The collieries have a capacity of 12,000 tons a month, They have 116 men on the payroll, and their April payroll amounted to $11,846. During the past year the Grand Trunk bought from the Jasper Park collieries 82,450 tons of coal, and that road will need from these collieries 100,000 tons, this year. I desire to ask the Minister of Railways how it is proposed to handle the output of this mine when the railway track is torn up.

Mr. COCHRANE: The collieries have been informed that they will be looked after and that their business will not be interrupted.

Mr. OLIVER: I give notice that on a later occasion I will ask for leave to move the adjournment of the House for the purpose of discussing this matter.

[Sir Thomas White.]

PURCHASE OF CHEESE BY BRITISH GOVERNMENT.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. JOHN ANGUS McMILLAN (Glengarry): Mr. Speaker, I wish to draw the attention of the Government, particularly that of the hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Burrell), to the question of the manufacture and sale of cheese. It appears that the Government appointed a commission a few weeks ago for what purpose I do not know, but although the commission has been appointed it is still, I believe, unorganized. We have been manufacturing cheese for the past seven weeks, but up to the present time we are not able to dispose of our cheese. The thing has become very serious. The factories have become so congested that they have no place to store their cheese and are not otherwise able to dispose of it, The Government, I understand, have undertaken through this commission, to have the British Board of Trade make an offer for the whole Canadian product, but up to the present time the Government has not succeeded in securing such an offer. New Zealand and Australia have already sold their cheese. The Americans are shipping out their cheese regularly from New York and several British ships have already carried United States cheese to British ports. Not a pound of cheese has left our ports up to the present time. Our farmers have become alarmed and it is a very serious matter for the business people throughout this part of Ontario.

Mr. SPEAKER: It is not in order to enter into a discussion. If the hon. member wishes to ask a question of the Government, there is no objection, in reason, to his laying the ground for that question, but he cannot discuss the subject.

Mr. McMILLAN: I will conclude by asking the Government if it is their intention to see to it that no further time shall be lost in having an offer made by the British Government for the cheese product of this country.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: My hon. friend the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Burrell) will doubtless give a fuller answer, but I may say that I am aware that certain communications during the past week or ten days have passed between this Government and the British Government in regard to the matter which the hon. gentleman has brought to the attention of the House. I understand from these communications that cheese is not being shipped from the United States as mentioned by my hon. friend. I am quite confident that that is the information we have received. However, I shall direct the attention of the Minister of Agriculture to the matter and he will be able to give my hon. friend, I think, a fuller answer. I can assure him that we have not lost sight of the matter and that some urgent representations have been addressed on the subject.

Hon. CHARLES MURPHY: This morning I discussed this subject with the Minister of Agriculture, on account of representations made to me by some of my constituents. The minister gave me to understand that he was going to have an interview with a representative of the British Government this afternoon, and that he would make some statement a little later on the subject.

EMIGRATION RESTRICTIONS ON CANADIANS OF MILITARY AGE.

SUGGESTED SPECIAL PERMITS TO MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I would like to ask the hon. the Secretary of State (Mr. Patenaude) if he would favourably consider a proposition to issue to members of Parliament a passport or a permanent pass which would enable them to enter the United States without going to the trouble of appearing before a photographer.

Hon. W. J. ROCHE (Minister of the Interior): I may say to the hon. gentleman (Mr. A. K. Maclean) that there are application forms to be had from any of the postmasters and which have to be filled in. The permits are issued by the Dominion immigration officers. These officers are located on the boundary line and they board the trains.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Cannot that be avoided by issuing special passports to members of Parliament?

Mr. ROCHE: Yes, they can be issued in the city from the office of the Superintendent of Immigration.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I understand that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Maclean) suggests that in so far as members are concerned, some more direct method might be devised so that they would not be put to delay or inconvenience. I will speak to my hon. friend the Minister of the Interior about that and he will endeavour to arrange it.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: It might not be necessary for those over forty-five years of age, but we do not all carry the family Bible with us to show the date of our birth.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: It might be more convenient if we were all so provided on every occasion.

Mr. LALOR: I have found that a member's railway pass is all that is necessary on the border.

CORRECTION OF NEWSPAPER ARTICLE.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. JAMES MORRIS (Chateauguay): Mr. Speaker, I would like to draw the attention of the House to an article that appeared in Hansard on the 10th May. The hon. member for Laprairie-Napierville (Mr. Lanctot), in the course of a speech that he made on that date, quoted an article from a newspaper that is published, I believe, in Montreal, by one Tancrede Marsil wherein he states that previous to the election of 1911 I went down on my knees to some of his friends and begged them to allow me to take part in a meeting they were holding. I wish to say, Mr. Speaker, that that statement is absolutely without foundation.

An Hon. MEMBER: Never on your knees?

Mr. MORRIS: Never to a man of that stamp. I shall not attempt to read this article and I shall not comment upon it farther than to say that this gentleman devotes a good deal of time to heaping abuse on the head of your humble servant. I much prefer abuse from a man of that kind than his approbation. The hon. member for Laprairie-Napierville made other statements in reference to myself that I shall not allude to farther than to say that if he is proud of his alliance with Mr. Tancrede Marsil I doubt if any of his friends around him are.

CONSTRUCTION OF WOODEN SHIPS.

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. WM. PUGSLEY: Is the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster) yet in a position to make any announcement to the House in regard to the construction of wooden ships in Canada? In the absence of the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Hazen) I may say that he confirmed a statement which I made that the Imperial Munitions Board are limiting the size of these vessels to

2,500 tons. In consequence of quite large timber being required, these vessels can only be built on the western coast but there is a very large number of shipyards in the Maritime Provinces where vessels of from 500 to 1,000 tons could be constructed. I have had quite a number of letters from people who say that there are shipyards available. The Minister of Marine and Fisheries stated that he has endeavoured to find out why the Munitions Board limited the size to not less than 2,500 tons but he has not been able to get any satisfactory reason. I may say to my hon. friend that there is—

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Be careful or you will be making a speech.

Mr. PUGSLEY: No, this is the reason for my question. There is a most urgent need of small vessels of from 500 to 1,000 tons in connection with the transportation business of Canada. In the city of St. John the question of anthracite coal has become most serious, the price is going up, the supply is getting very scarce and the dealers say that they do not know whether they will be able to supply coal to the people of St. John during the coming winter. That is owing to the scarcity of vessels. I do think that, while it is important to do what we can for the Allies in the way of transportation, it is important also to keep our own people from either starving or freezing to death. I should like to know if the Government have any communication to make in respect to the building of smaller wooden vessels in the eastern provinces.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I shall not imitate my hon. friend in making two or three speeches on different subjects, but shall confine myself to such answer as I can give, and make my answer as terse and brief as possible. The Imperial Munitions Board are building such vessels as they are building on the order of the British Government, and they build to the specifications that the British Government requires. The Canadian Government is furnishing no shipyards, making no contracts, planning and building no vessels other than the 2,500 tons vessels that are being built by the Imperial Munitions Board. My hon. friend knew that before, and I am afraid I have not added much to the sum of his knowledge.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Of course I knew that; but I want to know if the Government is going to do anything.

[Mr. Pugsley.]

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I may say that with a Government so active and of such ability as ours, if I undertook to tell my hon. friend all we were going to do, I should be making a speech instead of answering a question.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I appreciate the sarcasm of the hon. minister.

SUPPLY.

PROPOSAL TO AMEND THE CUSTOMS TARIFF.

On the motion of Sir Thomas White that the House do go into Committee of Supply.

Hon. FRANK OLIVER (Edmonton) moved in amendment:

That all the words after the word "that" in the motion be struck out and the following be substituted therefor:

"In the opinion of this House it would be in the public interest if the Customs Tariff Act were so amended as to provide:

1. That wheat, wheat flour, and all other products of wheat be placed upon the free list.

2. That farm implements and machinery, farm tractors, mining, flour and saw-mill machinery, and repairs for same, rough and partly dressed lumber, illuminating, lubricating and fuel oils, cement and fertilizers be added to the free list.

3. That staple foods and food products (other than wheat flour), domestic animals and foods therefor, be admitted into Canada free of duty when coming from and being the product of, any country admitting like Canadian articles into such country free of duty.

4. That substantial reductions be made in the general tariff on all articles imported into Canada, excepting luxuries.

5. That the British Preference be increased to fifty per cent of the general tariff."

Mr. J. P. MOLLOY (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, it is not my desire, nor is it my intention, to prolong this debate at any length, but as this is a matter affecting the tariff, which is of vital interest to everybody in Canada, and particularly to the people in the county from which I come, I desire to say a word. I am heartily in favour of the amendment of my hon. friend the member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver). His proposals are of vital importance to the people not only of western Canada, but of all Canada. In some sections of Canada, and in this House, the moment any one suggests any downward amendment to the tariff there are those who think that it is desired to injure the industries of this country, that is to say, the manufacturing industries of this country. We do not intend, nor is it our desire, to injure any one; but in asking for certain amendments and for reductions from time to time we do ask that the manufacturers of the articles which we use, day in and day out, should lower their prices, or, in other words, be a little more reasonable in their charges. The one thing that is asked for in Canada to-day is production and more production. Well, lower the tariff and cheapen production. If you raise the cost of production so that your people produce at a loss it will result in stagnation, the very thing which at present we must try to and will avoid.

One of the reforms asked for in this amendment, free wheat, has been granted, and we hope that wheat will remain on the free list permanently. Free wheat has come after a lot of education and after a long wait on the part of the people. However, the people of this country will appreciate it, and we all appreciate it, I am sure, in western Canada, because it will be of direct benefit to us. In the United States, the nearest market to the producer of grain in western Canada,they find it more profitable to raise cotton and corn than to raise wheat, and they desire our wheat also for the simple reason that it is the best wheat grown in the world, and by taking our wheat, as they will, and mixing it with their own, they will produce foodstuffs of better quality than they otherwise could.

Many of the other articles mentioned in this amendment are of great importance to the people of the West. For instance, cement, which has become almost prohibitive in price, is in very general use. In Canada to-day every one, particularly the farming population, are using cement, they find it more profitable in the long run to build with cement than to use any other form of foundation, and that for many reasons. So it would be in the interest of the people generally to have the duty removed from cement.

Many other things which might have been added to the list are not included in this amendment. However, we should be very glad if we could receive what is now asked for.

In replying to the hon. member for Edmonton, the Minister of Finance made the statement that the farmers of Canada were never so prosperous as at the present time. I hope that is true, although I cannot agree with the statement. Last year it did not apply to the farmers of Manitoba by any means. The wheat crop of that province was ruined by rust. Very few farmers raised grade number three; the greater part of the wheat raised in Manitoba last year was grades numbers four, five and six, and the price paid was not $3 a bushel as some people imagine, either this year or at any other time. In the first place, the wheat was not there; the wheat was disposed of before this abnormal increase in price took place. The price which wheat has recently brought is, I say as a farmer, too high; it is too much for any bushel of wheat that has ever been raised. Wheat can be raised at a profit for a much lower selling price than $3. But the farmers of the country, with very few exceptions, did not receive any $3 for their wheat, although the people of eastern Canada are buying their flour at a price based on a price of $3 per bushel for wheat. Speaking from my own experience and that of the majority of the people in the district in which I live, and I think also of the majority of the people in the province of Manitoba, I can say that the price which the farmers received for their wheat was $1.20, $1.40, $1.60 or $1.70, and not $3; and the millers who are selling to the people of Canada flour at $15 a barrel, purchased the wheat from which it is made at the prices I have mentioned.

None of this profit came to us. We in western Canada never objected to the prices that we got for our produce, but we have, and with good reason, objected to the prices that we have had to pay for the things that we have had to buy. This brings us back to the question of farm implements. In western Canada farming is carried on on a large scale, particularly when it is compared with farming in the East. Consequently, to obtain the necessary large machinery, such as four-horse binders, ploughs, harrows, and such articles, entails considerable expense. The average man who begins farming in the West starts as a poor man, and the expenditure of a large amount of money at the outset is necessary in order that he may be furnished with all the things that he requires for farming. The price of farm machinery is going up day by day. If a few months ago you had asked any gentleman dealing in farm machinery in the West what was the price of a gang plough or binder, he would have said: it is so much now, but the price will be increased on the first day of May. I have no doubt that if you inquire to-day in the West as to the price of a binder, you will be told that the price is a certain amount, but that it will be increased after a certain date. The same applies to every article which the farmer in the West uses, and to none does it apply in a more marked manner than to tractors, tractor ploughs and engines. It is very necessary that the duties should be removed from tractors, because labour is becoming very scarce. Never was the cost of farm labour so high in western Canada as it is to-day. A farm labourer is paid from $40 to $70 and, in some cases, $80 a month, board included. If the duty were removed from farm tractors and the people were enabled to buy them at a reasonable price, a great deal more work could be done, at the proper time, and for less money. If the duty were removed from the farm implements mentioned in my hon. friend's amendment, no injury would result to the manufacturer. The manufacturer would make a little less money; the farmer would save that much money, and be able to use it for some purpose connected with his work on the farm. In other words, the profits of the manufacturer would not be so great, but the farmer would be in a position to buy more goods, whether farm implements or otherwise.

The cost of labour, then, is increasing, as well as the cost of machinery, which has steadily gone up in western Canada during the last five years. The Finance Minister objects to interfering with the tariff in war time. He objects to a downward revision, but he has no objection to increasing the tariff during war time. As I have said, the majority of those who settle on land in western Canada are poor men, and the result is that in the prairie West the small farmer is leaving his land. Farms are becoming larger, because the man with little or no capital is not able to compete with the man of large means. Land, then, is becoming vacant; it is getting into a wild state; it is held by mortgage companies and speculators. It is not producing, at a time in our history when it is more necessary than ever that the largest possible amount of production should be obtained. The clearest statement that I have read or heard, and perhaps the most concise, regarding the situation in western Canada, was made by Hon. Mr. Brown, formerly Lieutenant Governor of the province of Saskatchewan. Mr. Brown, besides being a pioneer farmer, was one of the pioneer settlers in that country. Each year he pays out in wages between $7,000 and $8,000. Speaking to the Canadian Club in the city of Winnipeg, he pointed out that upon western Canada more than upon any other section of this country would fall the burden of paying the great war debt, which is leaping up in amount day by day—when it will end no man knows. He went on to prove that in the year 1915 the excess of exports over imports in the case of agricultural products amounted to $250,000,000. In the case of fisheries, the excess of exports over imports was $20,000,000; products of the forest, $42,000,000; products of the mine, $59,000,000; manufactures, $57,000,000. The excess of exports over imports pertaining to agriculture exceeded by more than 50 per cent the excess of exports over imports of all these other products combined.

The impression has gone out—I have heard the assertion made in this House—that the farmers of western Canada are all grain farmers. They are not all grain farmers; they are mixed farmers as well. They have been charged with mining the land. I admit that in years gone by, when the western lands consisted entirely of virgin soil, some of those who went there became dissatisfied and left as soon as possible for the East. But all those who to-day are farming in the West never before farmed as well, and they are carrying on the work just as efficiently as the farmers of eastern Canada. This is true of their work both as grain farmers and as mixed farmers. Of the $260,000,000 worth of live-stock sold last year, 42 per cent was raised in western Canada, 32 per cent in the province of Ontario, 16 per cent in the province of Quebec and from 8 to 10 per cent in the Maritime provinces and British Columbia. So that we are mixed farmers as well as grain farmers; we raise more stock than any other section of the country. The argument, therefore, that the farmers of western Canada are all grain farmers falls down. I submit that the burden of tariff taxation, which is much too great, could be removed without causing any particular loss to Canadian industries. As a western farmer, I purpose insisting on the necessary changes in the tariff until they become law. I should be remiss in my duty if I did not support the amendment of the hon. member for Edmonton, because I stood for these very things in 1911. Although the Canadian people thought fit to defeat the reciprocity proposal, I was elected on that issue, and I believe the majority of the rural constituencies and also some of the cities of Canada, when they are given an opportunity, will support that issue.

The people of Canada will have to pay the enormous debt which has arisen by reason of this war, and as the agricultural portion of Canada will have to pay at least half of that amount, some consideration is due to them. All the other interests in the country have this advantage over the farmers that they organize and keep organized, and while

I do not blame the manufacturers of Canada for insisting that the duty remain the same, if that suits them best, or for asking that the duty be increased if, in their opinion, an increase is advisable, I blame the people of Canada for allowing one class of the population to legislate for them. The farmers of the country constitute about 65 per cent of the population, and if they would look after their interests as the other great interests in this country do we would not have any difficulty in passing such legislation as we all believe to be in the interest of Canada as a whole. While there may be honest differences of opinions—and it is proper that there should be—this Parliament should legislate for the best interest of the whole country. In order to pay this war debt—and the tariff has a bearing on this matter—we shall require a large influx of immigration. In western Canada 120,000,000 acres of land have been alienated from the Crown, and as I have stated, a great deal of that is now vacant, being either land that has been abandoned or land that is now held by speculators. The Government of the day desire to place the returned soldiers on the land, and I will support legislation of that nature; but I would advise the Government to be very careful when they attempt to carry through that legislation, because, in my opinion, when the war is over, very few returned soldiers will want land or will settle on the land. Men who have been accustomed to mingle together by the hundreds of thousands are not going to settle on a homestead fifteen, twenty-five, or forty miles from a railway, and the best homesteads in Manitoba are considerable distances from railways. But whatever aid the Government sees fit to give to the returned soldiers I will certainly support that Government, as nothing is too good for those men; but in case they fail to go on the land we shall want in their places men to develop the land, and in order to secure such men, we shall have to make the conditions such as to encourage them to come in and settle in Canada. If it is a fact, as Mr. Brown states, that at Regina, the capital of the province of Saskatchewan, there is unloaded machinery from Omaha and other cities in the United States, at a price 25 to 30 per cent less than similar machinery can be bought for at Regina, that is certainly no inducement to any man to leave the States and come to western Canada. Mr. Brown, as a large operator, wished to buy kerosene for use on his tractors on his farm, and when the Canadian merchant quoted a price of twenty cents a gallon, he bought his oil at Chicago and had it landed at Regina for 13¼ cents a gallon. At the same time, he desired to purchase a tank to hold his oil, and as the dealer in Winnipeg asked $600 for a tank, he bought one at Chicago for $186, paid the freight and the duty and landed it at Regina for $384, thus saving enough on the price of the tank to enable him to pay the engineer of the tractor $100 a month. What is required to ease the burden of the people of Canada is immigration, and we cannot secure immigration so long as such conditions continue to exist, because people are not going to leave the western and middle states of the country to the South in order to settle in Canada, where they will have to pay tribute to the Canadian Government, and, through that Government, to the manufacturers of Canada. The manufacturers of Canada have had their day. In years gone by the manufacturers of Canada were spoken of as infant industries; they are still spoken of as infant industries, and I suppose the way things are going at the present time and from the support the manufacturers seem to be able to receive inside this House and out of it, they will be very willing, so long as they live in Canada, to continue to have their industries called infant industries. Let the manufacturers take the same chance as the grain grower or the cattle grower is doing. The grower of grain says: I am willing to compete with the whole known world. He says to the man in eastern Canada: We raise the best wheat in the world; we compete with the world, and all we ask is a fair and reasonable price. Three dollars a bushel is not a fair price; it is an abnormal price, and wheat should never have been allowed to rise to such a price in this country. It is not right that wheat should be bought and sold by manipulators and speculators at three dollars a bushel when the farmers who raise that wheat receive the prices which I mentioned a few minutes ago, and which in the majority of cases are less than two dollars a bushel. The consumer, however, in eastern Canada is charged fifteen dollars a barrel for flour, and some people would desire the impression to go out that the western farmer is prosperous; that he is getting three dollars a bushel for his wheat; that he has no complaint to make, and that the manufacturing interests of this country should be protected as against the advances and requests of the farmers of both western and eastern Canada.

In conclusion, I will say that all the people of western Canada desire might be summed up in the two words "fair play"; that they receive a proper and fair price for their grain; that they pay a fair and reasonable transportation charge, and that the railways of this country in the years to come be compelled to haul for a reasonable charge the produce of the grain grower and of the stock grower of western Canada to the markets of eastern Canada, and in that way be a benefit, not only to the producer in the West, but to the consumer in the East.

Mr. HUGH GUTHRIE (South Wellington): Mr. Speaker, I might be permitted to occupy the attention of the House for a short time. In regard to the amendment moved by the hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver), I would say that I find myself in the position of one who is desirous of accepting for the most part the amendment which has been moved, but who finds some difficulty in accepting certain clauses of it. As it is an amendment offered on a motion of this House to go into Committee of Supply, I understand that, according to the rules of the House, it cannot be amended; I must either vote for it in toto or vote against it, and that is the difficulty in which I find myself at the present moment, because to a large extent I support the contention of my hon. friend from Edmonton, but I cannot go to the extent to which he has gone nor to the extent to which his amendment goes. I believe the first clause of his amendment is properly brought to the attention of the House at this time and should receive the sanction of the Government. I refer to that clause in reference to the free admission into Canada of wheat, wheat flour, and other products of wheat. It is upon the words "other products" that the whole situation turns. The Government, very tardily, we must confess, has remitted the duty upon wheat, wheat flour and semolina, but there are other products of wheat which are very important to the Dominion of Canada and particularly to that part of the province of Ontario which I have the honour to represent in this House. To every one engaged in raising hogs or cattle or in the dairying industry, bran and middlings are of vital importance, and more so at this moment than ever before in the history of this country. Bran shorts and middlings are what we want; we want them in the worst way and at the lowest possible price, and why they were not put on the free list with wheat and wheat products I do not know. I was in the House on Wednesday last when the Minister of Finance, replying to my hon friend from Edmonton (Mr. Oliver), made the statement that bran and middlings were dearer in the United States than in Canada, and he based the statement on some figures that had been given to the House by the hon. member for Huntingdon (Mr. Robb). I accepted that statement of the Minister of Finance, but I could not help wondering why farmers in my country, who use bran and middlings to a very large extent wanted them placed on the free list if the price was higher in the United States than in Canada. I was home over the holiday, and I was confronted with that very question myself. Two farmers in particular told me that the statement of the Minister of Finance was erroneous, so with the assistance of others I undertook to find out the actual market conditions on the day this statement was made. I found that the price of bran in Toronto on that very day was $40 a ton, and in Buffalo $38 a ton. I cannot give the price of middlings for the same day, but I can give the price to-day between Toronto and Montreal, and Boston and Buffalo. These figures are taken from the Montreal papers, and were also received by telephone from the Boston Exchange. The price of bran to-day in Buffalo is 4 p.m. $32.58 per ton, and in Boston, $34.50. The price of middlings to-day per ton is $36.75 in Buffalo, and $38.75 in Boston. The Toronto and Montreal figures are the same for to-day. In Toronto bran is sold to-day at $38 a ton and middlings at from $46 to $50 a ton. It will be seen that the Canadian prices are considerably higher. I know these figures are right; I know the farmers who spoke to me on Saturday were right, and I know the statements made by the Minister of Finance on Wednesday in regard to these prices were erroneous, and likely to mislead the House and the country.

The importance of bran and middlings to the farmers of Ontario cannot be overestimated. Every farmer engaged in stock-raising or the dairying industry must have cheap food at the present time if he is going to increase his product, and it is for that reason I am particularly anxious that the Government allow, bran, middlings, and the like, which are almost a necessity to stock-raisers and dairying men in the province of Ontario at the present moment, to come in duty free. I cannot go very far in congratulating the Government on having removed the duty on wheat and flour. Had they done so when they took office four or five years ago they would have been entitled to great credit, but instead of doing that, they let the thing run on from year to year, until the question became critical, they did not move hand or foot to give the farmers relief. The need, I believe, was greater in 1912 and in 1913 than it is to-day, and far greater relief would have been afforded to our farmers if wheat and wheat flour had been put on the free list at that time.

I come now to the second clause of the amendment, which deals with farm implements and machinery. If the leaders of the Government mean what they say both in this House and outside, it is the duty of the people of this country to produce foodstuffs to the utmost possible extent for the use of ourselves and our Allies. There is, therefore, all the more reason for giving the agriculturist free farm implements now that production is so urgently needed. I do not believe the argument for free implements can be put as strongly to-day as it was put in 1913, when I myself had the honour of moving a resolution in this House for free agricultural implements, which resolution was promptly voted down by the Government and its supporters. For in 1913 the implement manufacturers in this country got their raw material practically free, whereas to-day they have a war tax of 7½ per cent at the one end, and their profits are taxed at the other end; they catch it both coming and going, and they did not in 1913. I believe the case then was stronger than it is to-day, but the case to-day is strong enough I believe, for the Government to grant what the resolution asks for. In order to allow of production in this country to the utmost possible extent, this relief should be given to the agriculturists, and it should be given all the more readily because the revenue which we derive from the tariff on agricultural machinery is almost a negligible item in our annual financial statement. I have not the exact figures, but from statements made in the House in the last two or three days I understand that last year we collected less than half a million dollars, something between $300,000 and $400,000 under a tariff which provides that mowers, reapers, binders and one other article, shall be taxed 12½ per cent, and all other agricultural machinery 17½ per cent, with an additional 7½ per cent war tax. Our whole revenue collection under that head last year was under $400,000, so we cannot say that we are maintaining the tariff on these items for the purpose of obtaining revenue. The amount is too small to give any support to an argument of that kind, and the only argument that can be advanced in favour of maintaining this tariff and it is largely an unsound argument—is that it is necessary in order that our manufacturers may go on manufacturing in this country to grant a measure of protection. As a revenue producer this tax should not be considered for a moment, only as a question of protection pure and simple, is it arguable whether the tax should be left as it is.

But in the stress of present-day conditions, when every man in this House and every newspaper in the country—yes, when every judge on the bench in addressing the grand jury—calls attention to the fact that there must be an increase of production in every way possible, is it unreasonable to ask the Government to tell the farmers that the duty on agricultural implements at least for the time of the war will be remitted? We put on taxes which are purely war taxes; why, then, cannot we give a remission of taxes? If that were once granted I know this House would make it permanent. I therefore favour that portion of the amendment which provides that agricultural machinery shall be upon the free list. I favour the whole of the free list as set out in paragraph 2 of the amendment. And when I look at the trade returns and find that in item after item which it is now proposed to put upon the free list the revenue collected is so small as to be negligible, it seems to me clear that the time has come when the relief asked for in this clause of the amendment should be granted.

To paragraph 3 of the amendment I have no objection. This is the one which, in broad language, provides for free food—that the necessaries of life shall, as far as possible, go untaxed. I have always supported that policy in this House, and intend to support it still. Whether the remission of food taxes would or would not give great relief in prices I do not know. On the whole, I do not believe that any great relief would be insured in this way, for, as between Canada and the United States, at the present time there are no great differences in the market prices of food. Still, I will support that part of the amendment on principle, because I believe it is right that the people should have free food. But in my opinion the proper way to regulate the food situation is not by a change in tariff items, but by some such action as they have taken in Great Britain, in the United States and in other countries, that is, by direct action on the part of the Government to eliminate all that pertains to speculation in regard to food commodities. I have no doubt that in Canada there is speculation of every kind in articles of food. I believe that the Government should take the matter up, and I trust it will do so. I believe that power should be given to a commission, or to a single individual—food dictator or whatever you choose to call him—as broad as has been given, or will shortly be given, to Mr. Hoover in the United States. Let the commissioner practically be himself the law in regard to food. Let him, if necessary, fix prices, conscript food, regulate everything in that regard. I do not say that he would have occasion to do all these things; but give him the power, and I have not a doubt that the prices of foodstuffs in this country will rapidly decline. I believe that the system of cold storage, as has been mentioned in the House, has a good deal to do with the high prices. People use the cold storage facilities in every country as well as in Canada for the purpose of taking advantage of market conditions, and a great deal of the speculation in food products results. Give your food dictator power in regard to cold storage, and I believe you will get more relief from such a course than by any present tariff proposals, good as these may be in the abstract.

Mr. BURNHAM: Considering that the basis of the hon. gentleman's argument is cheapness of production, is he in favour of the unrestricted admission of cheap labour to Canada?

Mr. GUTHRIE: I was not discussing the question of the labour market, but in answer to the hon. gentleman I say, certainly I am not in favour of the unrestricted admission into Canada of cheap labour.

Mr. BURNHAM: Then, where is your free trade doctrine?

Mr. GUTHRIE: I was asked a question, and I have answered it. Now, to summarize what I intended to say: We cannot maintain this taxation on the ground that it is necessary for revenue purposes, for the revenues from it amount to nothing. It can only be maintained on the ground that it is necessary for the protection of the people in Canada who are engaged in the production of these various goods. We are told that the war tax of 7½ per cent as against foreign countries and 5 per cent as against Great Britain has been productive last year of an increase of $38,000,000 in our customs returns, and for the preceding year of $25,000,000, and that it was absolutely necessary to impose that tax in order to raise the revenue to meet the requirements of the country during this period of stress due to the war. I agree that we must have the money, and I voted for the increase, because I did not dissent from it—and neither did any one in this House dissent from it—and I am not dissenting from it now, unless some better way of raising the money can be found which the Government will adopt. When I was elected to this House seventeen years ago, I was elected on a tariff policy which I believed in then and believe in now—a tariff sufficient to produce a revenue necessary to carry on the affairs of this country economically. I believe that for many and many a year to come the greater portion of the revenues necessary for the country are going to be raised by a customs tariff. But there are other ways of raising revenue which I think the Government has, to some extent, slighted. I desire to point out to the Minister of Finance one or two things which, I think, he has rather overlooked in considering the raising of the money necessary for the carrying on of this war. I am prepared to vote for a higher tariff if more money will come from it, and if that money is indispensable. But we may make the tariff so high that we shall get no revenue. I should like to see other means fairly tried before we have more increases in the tariff. I believe in the free list given in the amendment of the hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) for all the revenue we get from that free list can be supplied by other means of taxation if the Finance Minister and his Government will only look the facts in the face. The Finance Minister is a very able financier, one of the ablest, probably, we have ever had in the Dominion of Canada. But for some reason best known to himself he has not, I believe, squarely faced the question of direct taxation. I do not believe he has ever fairly and fully considered the question of the taxation of revenue from the invested wealth of Canada. I believe that invested wealth is something which one can legitimately tax; the rich man should be taxed; the invested wealth is employing practically no one and should be the first subject of taxation. I do not agree with the propositions the Minister of Finance has laid down in this House from time to time—or the excuses he has made from time to time—for allowing the largest incomes in this country to go practically untaxed during almost three years of the present war. I tell him in all fairness and all candour that when he goes away from the city of Ottawa, when he goes out into the rural districts, and towns and villages of Ontario, he will meet the question that the rest of us are often called upon to answer.

I have been one of those who has sat in this House during the three years of the war, and I have seldom interfered with the proceedings. But I have been asked time and time again: Why do you not propose this, why do you not object to that? The question which most frequently arises is: Why do you not attempt to tax the wealthy? I have voted for the business tax, or at all events I did not dissent, and that means that I supported it. I do not believe it is a fair tax at all. I believe that the munitions tax is an eminently fair one, and that it might be well to increase it, but I do not think that the business tax is a fair tax, although I supported it in the past, and will support it again if it is necessary for the carrying on of this war. But, the Minister of Finance has skated around the question of an income tax year after year. He has gone over it, he has gone around it, he has postponed it and he is still considering it. During the first year he said he did not think that it would yield sufficient revenue to justify the cost of collection. He postponed it the second year, and I think he is inclined to postpone it this third year. But, he should tackle this question of an income tax. The other night in this House he gave as one reason for not adopting an income tax, the fact that he had a telegram from the collector of taxes in Toronto saying the available wealth for taxation as income for Toronto was $19,500,000, on which the amount collected was $440,000. Consequently, he said: In the second greatest city of Canada that is all you get, and I do not think it is worth while seriously considering it, although we may have to come to it in the future. But the Minister of Finance should come to it now. Any one who lives in the province of Ontario knows that the income tax is more of a farce than anything else. It is not enforced. I do not believe there is any proper machinery for the enforcement of it. The question of the collection of income tax is looked on as a joke. There is no municipality in Ontario that gets a fair return from the income tax, and many of them have given up attempting to collect it at all. I have never heard of a prosecution in the case of a man who has given a wrong statement of his income. I have never heard that a penalty has been exacted from a man who did not pay what he should pay, the law is a dead letter and the tax is negligible in Ontario.

But, I can tell my hon. friend the Minister of Finance—and he knows it far better than I do—that there are millions and millions available in Toronto by way of income tax, and that if he applies the English rate to the big incomes he will get far more money in his treasury than he does out of the articles proposed to be added to the free list by my hon. friend from Edmonton. He could get far more money out of Toronto alone by an income tax than he would lose in revenue out of all the articles enumerated in this resolution. The rate in Toronto is only about 23 or 25 mills on the dollar. I do not propose anything like that. I think it is a joke. Why cannot we get down to something like the rates imposed in Great Britain and the United States? I am asking that seriously. Why do we not do it? Who is behind the curtain. Every one knows the high reputation of the hon. gentleman who is the Finance Minister of this country, and every one knows his great ability in matters of finance. Who is behind the curtain? What is withholding his hand? Why cannot we adopt those rates that they have adopted in England? Is there any reason for it? The Minister of Finance has been in England on one or two occasions since the war and he knows that the people there are actually feeling this war, that they are suffering from it. He knows that they are going down into their pockets to pay for it. He knows just as well as I do—every man in this House knows—it is a shame to confess it, but I have to confess it—that the people of Canada have not felt the stress of the war at all. We are more extravagant to-day than ever. We are spending more in this critical year of the war individually and by family than ever before. There is more extravagance and luxurious expenditure in this year than ever before. There are more automobiles being purchased and used for joy riding, more luxury, more fur sales, more jewellery sales. We have got into that sort of semi-mad condition which appears in any country where money has been piling up abnormally for a few years, as it has in Canada. We are not in as bad a condition in that respect as they are in the United States, I am glad to say, but we are fast tending towards it. In England they are suffering, in England they want money, in England, they are taxed. Why should this condition obtain in Great Britain and not in Canada? Why not say to the millionaires and the rich men of this country who have incomes of from $50,000 to $100,000 that they must contribute more to the cost of this war? There are some men who are spending lavishly and who have the right to do so because they have large incomes. Why not say to these men: This Government is going to curb you and take a large proportion of your income and put it into the treasury? There are other rich men who do not spend their incomes, or one-tenth of their incomes and who are thoroughly parsimonious. The Government might say to these: "You come across; the treasury wants a part of this income." The Minister of Finance knows that the people will support him in this. Who is behind the curtain, who is holding back his hand?

I have some experience as to conditions in my own city and every man in this House has the same experience as I have; I say that among men with very large incomes there are some of the meanest givers to the Patriotic and Red Cross funds, men who own very little land, but whose money is locked up in provincial and municipal securities and other bonds. These are not registered. It is true it is hard to get at them, but they can be got at. They do not pay a cent practically to carry on this war. We must get after these people. Why delay it any longer? Why should they not be taxed at the same rate that they are being taxed in Great Britain? We should pay the same rate. Why not? We should suffer to the same extent. Why not? Our extravagance should be curbed and our taxes increased. If we were taxed on the same principle as they are taxed in Great Britain, the Finance Minister would raise in Canada more than he does out of his 7½ per cent increase in the tariff and ten times more than he would lose if he had all the articles enumerated in this amendment on the free list.

I desire to place on Hansard the figures with regard to the British income tax and I believe they are accurate. There is exemption up to $650. I do not think that in Canada that would be a sufficient exemption. I would double that at least in Canada and let the amount of exemption be $1,200. Then, after that, we might well take the British scale. In Great Britain there is a little distinction made between earned income and incomes derived from investment but I do not think we need bother about that here. In Great Britain on an income of $1,000 in our money there is a tax of 4½ per cent, not that puny little income tax of 25 mills on the dollar which is imposed by Toronto and other municipalities. On an income of $5,000 there is a tax of 12½ per cent. We have lots of these $5,000 men all over Canada and 12½ per cent would produce a magnificent revenue. On an income of $10,000 there is a tax of 18 per cent. We have lots of them here, lots of them in Toronto, more of them in Montreal and in every city and town in Canada they are to be found. On an income of $20,000 there is a tax of 25 per cent. There are not so many of them but there are a great many. Of incomes of $50,000 and we find them scattered around, one-third is given to the treasury in Great Britain. Why not here? On incomes of $500,000 there is a tax of 42 per cent. That is the scale that Great Britain has adopted. We want to be placed in regard to this war, I submit, upon the same footing as our fellow British subjects in the motherland. They are making every possible effort to carry on this war, and we should do the same thing. If we are to have a system of taxation in this country which will include the extremely rich, then we are going about our taxation in the wrong way. And I can tell the Minister of Finance that nothing which he could do would be more popular from one end of Canada to the other than to introduce during the present session an income tax that will bear a fair resemblance at least to the rate charged on incomes in Great Britain.

I am sorry to have to say to my hon. friend from Edmonton that I do not approve of the last two clauses of his resolution. I do not believe that this is the proper time for a general revision of the tariff of this country. I believe that my hon. friend, should his amendment carry, would project into our national affairs a most unsettling and disturbing element. I do not believe at any time in the haphazard revision of the tariff. I think that such a revision should be gone about systematically and scientifically. I think the tariff should be revised from time to time, and I hope that when the revision does take place, after hostilities are closed, we will be able to revise it downward. But I think that of all times this is about the most inopportune to disturb the industries and business of this country. For that reason, I am not going to support the general revision of the tariff now. I find no demand for it in the province from which I have the honour to come. It is true that the hon. member for Edmonton says: the West brings you the great gift of free wheat and free flour. I have no doubt that the West did not put it that way when they agitated for it—they wanted it for themselves. They had a right to get it, and should have had it long ago, but it was for themselves and not for us that they wanted it.

I do not want to bind myself by anything I say now as to what my action may be after the war in regard to the reduction of the tariff. I hope it will be revised, but I do not want any Government to attempt it now; I do not want any unsettling of business; I do not want any disturbing element introduced at the present juncture in the history of Canada. I believe, and believe firmly, that, at the present moment, the members of this House should have but one policy, and if I am the only man in this House who believes it I am going to stick to it— and my policy is going to be: Win the war.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. GUTHRIE: And after the war is won we can take up our old fights just as we did before. I must say that the Order Paper from day to day has on it matters which in my judgment should be wiped off. If we are going to pursue in this country a policy of winning the war let us stick to war measures and let questions, no matter how important they may be, in regard to the nationalization of railways or the building of national highways—let them be swept aside and let us keep to war measures.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: Hear, hear.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Then, when the war is over, we can discuss the other questions. If we can come together on the matter, so much the better, but let us clear the Order Paper of all the old academic discussions and questions that drive us apart rather than bring us together. For my part, I feel and I believe that on this side of the House there is a feeling, a genuine honest feeling, that at the present time, of all times, our paramount duty is to discuss and enact measures that will insure victory for ourselves and the Allies, even if we have to allow other matters to stand until after the final victory is won. That is why I say to my hon. friend for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) that I cannot vote for his present proposal to revise the tariff.

I do not approve of his present proposal to revise the British preference, much good as that might do. We do not know what position we shall be in after the war. All our trade conditions may be changed. We may be making new arrangements of every kind with all people, and can we not wait a year or two, or even three years, before making such a revision? A tariff cannot be revised in three months, or six months. I believe that the revision of the tariff should be made as Mr. Fielding made it when he was Minister of Finance, that is, by direct consultation with all classes of the community, even if it require over a year to do it. That is the proper method of proceeding. If my hon. friend would eliminate from his resolution the last two clauses I should be happy to support it; otherwise, as I would have to take it all or nothing, I should have to reject it all.

Mr. W. E. KNOWLES (Moosejaw): The discussion of this proposition offered to the House by the hon. member from Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) has fortunately proceeded largely on the merits of the case and without any bitter partisan spirit. I shall endeavour to discuss the matter in the same way. I think it might be well to consider whether the proposition of the hon. member for Edmonton makes for the successful carrying on of this war or does not. If it could be shown to us that the proposition of the hon. member for Edmonton in any way retarded or handicapped us in our competency for carrying on this great war, the debate would be closed and the hon. member for Edmonton would be the very first to withdraw the resolution. But let us not think that, because from the lips of some people drop the words "I want to win the war," everything else they say is true. It is not difficult to say: I want to win the war. But it does not follow that that proves every conclusion to which the debater may come.

We find that our friends opposite, including the Minister of Finance, have paid scant courtesy to the merits of the debate. The minister, when he replied to the hon. member for Edmonton, did not enter into the argument. We find their main point is that now is an inopportune time to revise the tariff downward. I do not know what time to the minister is not an inopportune time to revise the tariff downward. It reminds me of a man under sentence to be hanged on Friday who, hearing some one say that it was unlucky to be hanged on a Friday, said that there were only six other days in the week on which it was unlucky to be hanged. That is the view taken by the minister on the revision of the tariff. He takes the same position, that now and all other times are inopportune times for the revision of the tariff downward.

We come to the question, would a revision of the tariff downward, as we advocate, in any way hamper or impede us in our ability to prosecute the war? I think that is the question now before the House. I have not heard any argument showing that it would in any way handicap us or impede us; we have heard implications and suggestions, but to carry conviction, hon. gentlemen who are opposing this resolution ought to establish some sort of proof that the passing of this resolution and the putting of it into force would in some way handicap or impede us in the prosecution of the war. I submit respectfully that no one has as yet established that in the slightest degree. The Minister of Finance swept the whole resolution aside. He said that the city of Toronto was satisfied with his conduct of the finances of the country, and that he had many congratulations from Toronto. He said that in Toronto rents were high and houses well filled, and all went merry as a marriage bell since Toronto was in that very fortunate condition. But I do not think that is replying to the splendid address of the hon. member for Edmonton in the debate. I listened to the Minister of Finance carefully, but I did not hear him give any reason why we should not have free agricultural implements, I did not hear him give any reason why we should not have free cement; I did not hear him give any reason why we should not have free foodstuffs in exchange with those countries granting us free foodstuffs. He dealt not at all with any of these specific items; he swept them aside by saying that the time was not opportune. My opinion is, and I give it only for what it is worth, that the time is exceptionally opportune for revising the tariff downward. The time to revise the tariff downwards is when those who are the wards of the tariff, are in the best position to stand that revision. We do not want to ruin any industries. Hon. gentlemen may think we do. Well, it does not matter what they think. But, even taking their side of it, when are you likely to injure the industries the most? Ever since 1878 or thereabouts, when we had a national policy, there has not been a time when our manufacturing industries could stand a revision of the tariff downwards as well as they could stand it to-day. Prices are high; competition is not keen—this is the greatest opportunity in Canadian history to see just how much the manufacturing industries would be injured by a downward revision of the tariff. From the viewpoint of the manufacturing industries, therefore—which none of us have a desire to injure, let people say what they like—this is an opportune time for tariff revision.

I wish to state another reason why this is an opportune time for tariff revision. Engaged as we are in this war, what we want more than millionaires' houses in Toronto, Montreal, London or Hamilton—more than money; more than anything else—is what the farmer will give us if farming is encouraged to develop and to expand. We want foodstuffs to win this war. The true war policy as laid down by Lloyd George is to produce to the utmost capacity and to conserve food supplies—which means what the farmer produces. The old academic argument of free trade versus protection has gone to the winds for the moment.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: No, no.

Mr. KNOWLES: I think the hon. member for Red Deer will agree that in an academic sense the argument has gone to the winds so far as my present remarks are concerned, because we have proved it academically so often that I do not need to deal with it. As a real, practical war measure, the proposal of the hon. member for Edmonton leads directly to the goal which Lloyd George says must be attained in order that we may successfully carry on the operations of the war to victory.

Unfortunately, for many years—not only during the war, but long before the war—an abnormal state of affairs existed in Canada from time to time. The financial boom which had been caused, in a measure, by the immense railway construction which took place in Canada, fostered industries in an abnormal way. This artificial prosperity ceased, even prior to the war. To-day a similar artificial prosperity, created by the war, prevails; it, too, will pass away, at the conclusion of the war. We shall have to bear the burden of a debt of great magnitude. We must face the task bravely. We must look into the future and ask ourselves how we shall meet, after the present condition of artificial prosperity ceases, the financial burdens arising out of this war. The Minister of Finance has been very much complimented on his knowledge. I hope he does not believe all the pleasant things that are said about him; if he would refer to the Grain Growers' Association they would tell him the other side of the story. On the one side, we have the artificial prosperity created by the war; on the other, the great debt that is being built up because of the war, the large amounts we have to pay out by way of pensions, and so on. Where is the minister to get the money for these things if he does not get it from the agricultural interests? If he does not lay down a policy that will make for large production of national wealth from the soil, where is he going to get the money? If he knows where he is going to get it I wish he would tell us. One of the reasons why we on this side say that the proposal of the hon. member for Edmonton should be accepted is that the carrying out of the principle which it asserts would result in men being attracted to the farms, and in large zones of land in the western prairies, now idle, being made productive. Thus we would have a maximum production of national wealth that would enable us to bear the great financial burdens which we shall be called upon to face after the war is over.

Mr. BURNHAM: Does the hon. gentleman intend that the agricultural interests shall pay all these burdens?

Mr. KNOWLES: I would use the word "afraid" rather than the word "intend."

Mr. BURNHAM: But my hon. friend adduces an argument.

Mr. KNOWLES: I fear that the burden will rest very largely on them.

Mr. BURNHAM: The hon. gentleman says that we have to develop wealth from the soil in order to pay these debts. You cannot eat more than a certain amount; let us hear how the thing is demonstrated.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: You will get all the money we will make.

Mr. KNOWLES: I do not understand my hon. friend's question.

Mr. BURNHAM: Suppose the agricultural interests of Canada should raise fifty times as much as they do now?

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: Ontario would take it all.

Mr. BURNHAM: The people of Canada could not eat it, though they might, possibly, dispose of it abroad. Production is represented by the hon. gentleman as the source from which we are to derive the money to pay these burdens, because the other industries in Canada cannot provide it. It appears to me, therefore, that the hon. gentleman intends the farmer to pay all these burdens.

Mr. KNOWLES: To the extent that we develop the farming industry we provide a source of national wealth, and only national wealth can pay off a national debt. If there is any other way of doing it, I should like to hear it.

I wish to refer to what I said and to some figures which I gave in my remarks last session on this subject, as they appear on page 3934 of Hansard. I said:

> Last year we had in the Provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan, and I speak of those two provinces alone, nearly 15,000,000 of acres of land under cultivation. I take the figures from the statistical departments of this Government. The total amount of arable land which is at our disposal in those two western provinces is 190,000,000. We had 15,000,000 acres, approximately, under cultivation, producing wealth for this nation, and 175,000,000 acres lying idle. There must be some reason for this.

I quote from the same page, a little further on:

> We are not developing in the direction of even gradually exploiting that great national asset which lies before us. Last year according to the statistics of the Government, and I have no reason to doubt their accuracy, the value of the crops produced on those 15,000,000 acres in those two western prairie provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan, was over three hundred million dollars. If we could apply the same proportion to these unused arable lands, we would have, not three hundred million dollars, but three billion, nine hundred million dollars. When we are through with this war we are going to have an enormous debt; it may be one billion dollars; it may be two billion dollars. The interest on it will be probably fifty million dollars per annum at the least. Here there lies in our hands and in our possession 175,000,000 acres of land which, if they were to produce at the rate the acres in use last year yielded, would produce in one year three billion, nine hundred million dollars worth of produce, a value four times as great as this terrible war debt that is staring us in the face.

Later, speaking about the condition of affairs when war broke out—how the men had ceased to go on the land, after the Government had been in power for three years—I said, page 3936:

> Then we saw that there was no encouragement for those two to be brought together.

I meant idle men and idle lands.

> The raw material was there, and the men were there ready to exercise their muscle on the raw material, but the conditions were not sufficiently encouraging to bring the two together. Surely we could make these conditions encouraging enough to bring these two elements together. You are bonusing every kind of industry. By protection you are bonusing them all. It may be hard to work out, but surely we can work out some system by which men will go on the land and use it for the purpose for which it was meant to be used.

I read these words in order to emphasize my conviction that it is the duty of this Government, quite apart from any academic convictions or prejudices with regard to free trade and protection, to devise a scheme by which the great unused resources of Canada shall be used. That is the way you will make Canada prosperous.

Sir Wilfrid Laurier came into power in 1896 when there was only a little handful of land in use in the West. People were not attracted to settle on the land as conditions were not inviting, and so they stayed away from the western provinces. The Government of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, however, by its immigration policy, its railroad policy and its grain commission policy, made conditions so attractive that men rushed out to the West and, where there had formerly been one acre under cultivation, there became ten, twenty acres under cultivation, and the whole of Canada responded to that great expansion and development in western Canada. The policy of reciprocity may be dead and gone now, but that policy of the leader of the Opposition, then Prime Minister, was simply this, that the day had come when it was necessary further to improve the conditions of the western farmer so that men would continue to go into the remoter districts and open up and develop further lands and in that way produce national wealth. The reciprocity issue was defeated, as every one knows, and the result has been that in the three years prior to the outbreak of war and since the defeat of reciprocity, the greatest stagnation has occurred since the early nineties. The Government now has this proposition staring it in the face, that the Dominion of Canada has all that land as a great national asset—and it is a tragedy that that land should be lying idle—and still the Government are doing nothing whatever to bring it under cultivation as the Creator intended it should be cultivated and should produce national wealth. In the boom days many people in the city of Moosejaw were very rich—we were all rich then—and then the bubble burst. It happened that many people had half sections somewhere or other in the West and they looked on them as very minor matters, as they probably had something like $100,000 or $200,000 worth of vacant lots; but when the bubble burst and those men had to turn their hands to making a living, they said: Well, we must go and use those farms that are lying idle, that we never thought of, and produce our living and our wealth out of them. In the Dominion of Canada at the close of the war we are going to be like men when the bubble has burst; we are going to face a desperate condition, with all our unemployed, with all this artificial prosperity gone, with all our soldiers coming back and with all the pensions to be paid. We shall be in the position of a man with an immense farm of 100,000,000 acres that to-day should have the plough turning them over, but that are not used at all, and this afternoon we advocate this policy; we say to the Government: You would encourage men to go on that land and produce wealth, produce $20 an acre, which amounts to an enormous sum when you multiply it by the millions of acres that are lying idle in the West, if you would make the conditions favourable so that our agricultural population would not hang around the towns and cities, but would go into the rural districts and be encouraged to cultivate this great heritage and produce national wealth. And if you produce national wealth, I repeat, you can pay national debt.

The tariff question is going to be a live issue in Canada, if not during the war, then not very long after the close of the war. We shall have to look very keenly into the financial condition of Canada, and after the war the question is going to be above all the question of finance which is altogether linked with the question of tariff. It is unfortunate that while the war is on we do not like, and it is not wise, to press too much the tariff question, and we do not receive an attentive ear if we do bring up that question; but I submit that the day is coming—and I think it will come very soon after the close of the war—when the outstanding issue in the Dominion of Canada will be whether the people want a lower tariff system in Canada so as to encourage agriculture. The Minister of Finance says that you must not unsettle things by lowering the tariff when the war is on, but that if you tack an increase of 7½ per cent on the tariff on to the farmer and the consumer they will work harder. That, according to the Minister of Finance, is the easiest thing in the world to do, war or no war; but if we presume to ask that the tariff be lowered, we are met with the cry: We want to win the war, and therefore, ergo, there must be no reduction in taxes. The war was on in Great Britain and the authorities there were in a pretty desperate state financially, but they wanted to encourage agriculture and they said quite frankly: We will pay the farmer to produce and we will guarantee him so many shillings per stone for his wheat for the next three years. They did not penalize the farmers, but they said: We want foodstuffs and we will encourage farming and we will give a guaranteed price for wheat for the next three years. The Minister of Finance knows about what happened in Great Britain, and yet he meets us with the cry: We want to win the war. I presume the British people want to win the war also, but they go about it in a different manner from that of my hon. friend. This is an opportune time for a revision of the tariff; the need of foodstuffs and the high prices make it an opportune time, and the future of the country, in connection with the great national burdens that we shall have to bear, makes it necessary that we should develop the agricultural industry of Canada.

Mr. A. VERVILLE (Maisonneuve): Mr. Speaker, I wish to say a few words on the amendment now before the House. I am strongly in favour of that amendment and I desire to support it for many reasons, a number of which have already been disclosed to the House. It is wonderful how, that every time we bring up a matter of this kind, we are met with the cry: We want to win the war. I should like to know if the fact that I could buy my shoes and clothes cheaper would prevent the winning of the war. I would like to know if the fact that the labour classes of the country could feed and clothe themselves more cheaply would prevent the winning of the war. Such language is ridiculous in this House, and the matter is too serious for such language to be used as has been used on far too many occasions.

Every one knows that in collecting taxation by a tariff the Government secures only about twenty per cent of that taxation and the other eighty per cent is paid by the people to the manufacturers, while by direct taxation the Government would get the eighty per cent. There is a vast difference, therefore, between the results that would be secured from those two methods of taxation. As I have stated before, every time the Government requires $20, I have to be taxed $100, whereas, if a tax were imposed on revenue, every time the Government would require $100, I would be taxed $20. The average earning power of the working man in this country to-day is about $800, and as the tariff averages at the very least about 30 per cent, that means that the working man has to pay $240 of indirect taxation before he can eat anything. If, however, taxation of revenue were imposed, there would be a very great difference, and one would not have to go to school very long to be able with a lead pencil and piece of paper to calculate the amount. The Minister of Finance has more than once said in this House that it would be a rather difficult proposition for him to establish a system of taxation of income. My hon. friend, however, has devised other methods of direct taxation, and I am sure he can establish such a system if he so desires.

As for the taxation of profits made in the making of munitions, I would not be content with 25, or 50, or 75 per cent, as my hon. friend suggests, but I would take the whole of it. I would not allow anyone in this country an income of more than $5,000 a year. Everything above that I would take, and I should consider that pretty generous treatment. This might be considered a radical proposal, but we shall come to it some day, because the people are not going to stand for the present system of taxation for all time to come. It has often been said in the House that working men who are engaged in the munitions business are making from $10 to $12 a day, but as a matter of fact, in a factory of 5,000 employees, you would not find more than 10, and perhaps not that many, making $10 or $12 a day. Go into the homes of these munitions workers, and see the prices they have to pay for their foodstuffs. Potatoes are becoming so expensive that we shall soon see the ladies wearing them in their hats as ornaments; they are becoming an absolute luxury. I maintain that foodstuffs should come in free, and if my hon. friend objects that he would lose a certain amount of revenue let him put on direct taxation, and that would bring in not merely the amount he would lose by wiping out these duties, but from 50 to 60 per cent more. I believe that foodstuffs should all be admitted duty free, and that is why I am supporting this resolution. I want it to be well understood that lowering the cost of living, giving the people cheaper food and clothing, will not prevent us from winning the war.

IN COMMITTEE OF SUPPLY.

Department of Finance—Charges of management, $535,450.

Mr. MURPHY: Is this item the same as that of last year?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Yes, it is a routine item.

Mr. TURRIFF: Does not the minister think that in view of the suggestions he has been giving us in favour of economy that he should be able to cut this down a little as compared with last year? I notice that the different items are exactly the same as last year. I think the minister would be able to speak with some force to the rest of us on the subject of economy if he would show a good example.

Mr. GRAHAM: Who has the contract for the printing of Dominion notes?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The American Bank Note Company.

Mr. MARCIL: In view of the approaching fiftieth anniversary of Confederation, is it in contemplation to issue a special commemorative bank note?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I had not that in mind, but I think it is a matter that might be considered.

Mr. MURPHY: Has it not been considered by a special committee?

Mr. GRAHAM: I was a member of the committee whose report was presented by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster). I was not present when that report was made, but I understand that its proposal was to issue a postcard or postage stamp commemorative of the fiftieth anniversary of Confederation. It was thought that it would be possible to issue a postcard with portraits of the Fathers of Confederation, and also a postage stamp with some other suitable commemorative design. I presume that that suggestion may be adopted, though the time is short. The report of the committee did not refer to a commemorative bank note.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Speaking offhand, the suggestion seems worthy of consideration. The matter of the postcard was brought to my attention, but, so far as I know, it was not proposed by the committee that a special bank note should be issued. Bank notes might lend themselves very well to representations of the kind suggested.

Mr. GRAHAM: The intention embodied in the suggestion of the committee was to avoid expenses as far as possible. The issues proposed, it was thought, would be of a kind that would sell in sufficient quantities to recoup the treasury for any expense involved.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I think the suggestion of my hon. friend from Bonaventure (Mr. Marcil) is well worthy of consideration, and I will give some thought to it.

Civil Government—Office of the Auditor General, $143,850.

Mr. GRAHAM: The Auditor General visited Great Britain to investigate certain charges in reference to the management of the Militia Department. Were his expenses paid out of this vote, or were they paid out of the war vote?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I am unable to answer offhand, but I believe they were paid out of the appropriation for miscellaneous expenses in connection with the department. The expenses were not large.

Mr. MURPHY: One of the salaries covered by this vote is for an Assistant Auditor General. Does that mean the creation of a new office?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: This is a new office, which is created by this vote. Mr. Sutherland was sent to represent the Auditor General in England, and it was recommended by the Auditor General and was deemed well that, in order that Mr. Sutherland might have the necessary authority to represent the Auditor General, he should be named Assistant Auditor General.

Mr. MURPHY: This vote creates the office and provides the salary?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Yes.

Mr. MARCIL: Is all the expenditure in Europe under the control of the Auditor General or is there a special audit office ever there?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The Auditor General has the right to investigate all accounts here, in England, or elsewhere. There is an obvious difficulty in the way of correctly auditing all the accounts in England. The Auditor General went over last Fall for the purpose of considering the system there and, among other things, the system of paying through the Pay Office. That is a very large establishment conducting very responsible business involving hundreds of thousands of accounts. He looked over the whole matter very carefully and when he came back he was of the opinion that if he sent over an officer from the department to represent him in England he would be satisfied with the situation. His recommendation in that respect was concurred in and Mr. Sutherland was sent over.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I suppose the reason for putting in this amount of $4,500 is to get over the provisions of the Civil Service Act.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: It is to give him a salary of $4,500 which he would not otherwise be able to obtain under the Civil Service Act.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Might I urge the objection that it seems to me that this is calculated to provoke great dissatisfaction in the different departments of the Government. We have a Civil Service Act which was arranged with very great care and consideration and the object of which was that the different officials in the service, after starting in at a certain salary, should, on their merit and length of service, rise from time to time until their salaries reached the maximum. This Government has persistently violated the provisions of this Act ever since they have been in power. They might as well have repealed the Act altogether. What is the use of keeping an Act on the statute book having for its purpose the perfecting and improving of the civil service while the Government of the day, with the approval of Parliament, continually violates its provisions? Here we have a gentleman who, under this vote, may be brought in without any length of service in the department and he is at once furnished with a position at a salary of $4,500 a year while there are quite competent men who have given years and years of their lives to the public service and who have only been able to reach a maximum of $4,000 a year. Engineers, accountants, experts of various kinds of ability, the great majority of them exceedingly good men, are obliged, notwithstanding years in the Civil Service, to remain at lower salaries while in this way by evading the provisions of the statute, men are put in at very high salaries. Perhaps, if this were the only instance of the violation of the Civil Service Act, it might be overlooked, but I find in the very next item that there are five officials who are in the same position and who are evidently named in order to get over the provisions of the Act. I think the minister ought to explain why it is necessary to go over the Civil Service Act, and to override its provisions as to positions which the men of the Civil Service occupy. I also think that he should see that these increases take place in the regular way and in pursuance of the Act.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The Civil Service Act, which my hon. friend (Mr. Pugsley) expresses so much admiration for, is no doubt a very ideal and perfect instrument, but there is nothing in this world that is quite perfect, and it does not always meet situations as they arise. There are many cases in which it is necessary to make appointments to meet conditions of administration. I think this is one. We have under consideration now the Estimates of the Auditor General. The Auditor General is not responsible to the Government, so much as he is responsible to Parliament, and, personally, when the Auditor General makes a recommendation and impresses me with the view that it is in the interests of the administration of his department such a change should be made, I feel I ought to recommend it to the Government. This recommendation in regard to the Assistant Auditor General is made by the Auditor General, having regard to the fact that this official was to go to England and live under new conditions, and he was of the opinion that the salary to be paid of $4,500 was proper under the circumstances. I agree in his view. We do not depart from the provisions of the Civil Service Act more than is necessary, having in view the business administration of the service, and I do not think many members of the service will object to this exception having been made or to those to which my hon. friend has drawn attention under the next heading, and which I shall explain when we reach the item.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Members of the Civil Service, to a certain extent, are in the position of men at the front; they cannot complain. It is not considered the right thing to complain. Some members of the Civil Service, while they see these cases of injustice and discrimination, will not complain, because they are rather glad to see some fellow-employee treated generously. But, there is injustice and dissatisfaction all the same. I happen to know, because I was once in charge of a very important department. In that department there are expert engineers of long experience and service. Some of them have given the best years of their lives to the public service, and their salaries have not been increased beyond $4,000. Yet, here by this vote, a man may be brought in simply because he is an accountant, but whose ability and necessity to the public service are not greater than that of an expert engineer or architect, and he gets at once $500 beyond the salary which these expert officers get in these other departments. I venture to say that in the Department of Public Works and the Department of Railways there are men who are just as well entitled to get $4,500 by reason of their ability, their length of service and their value to the public, and who are not receiving more than $3,500 or $4,000.

While that is the case, this man is brought in without having any experience in the department—

Sir THOMAS WHITE: He is not brought in.

Mr. PUGSLEY: At all events he is boosted to $4,500 a year, $500 or $1,000 beyond what is allowed to expert engineers in other departments. It is idle for the minister to try to excuse it by saying that there is no complaint on the part of other officials in the various departments. The point is that there is an injustice and, if you introduce injustice as between officials of different departments, you necessarily create dissatisfaction in the Service, and we have no right to do that injustice. I would ask the minister if this matter has been brought to the attention of the members of the Civil Service Commission.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: No.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Why not?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Because it did not seem to be expedient or necessary to do so. The recommendation of the Auditor General and the arguments advanced by him in his consultation with me convinced me that it was the proper course to take.

Mr. PUGSLEY: It is all very well for my hon. friend, in that bossy way which he sometimes assumes, to brush this matter aside; but I may say that I was minister for a number of years and that I never felt that I ought or that I could do such a thing as that. What is the use of having a Civil Service Commission for which this country pays out a large amount of money, a great many thousands of dollars, because it is supposed to be doing very effective work—

Sir THOMAS WHITE: What for? For examination?

Mr. PUGSLEY: For putting efficient men into the Service, carrying on proper examinations, and seeing that nobody is promoted unless he is qualified for promotion.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: What would be the function of the Civil Service Commission under the Act with regard to such a case as this? What have they to do with questions of salary?

Mr. PUGSLEY: They would, in the first place, consider the question of the length of service: They would consider which class he should be put into, and if he were put into the first class, having had a certain length of service, his salary would then, of course, be determined by the statute which provides for salaries to the members of the Service in different classes. Here the minister proposes, without having this gentleman examined at all as to his fitness, without any consideration as to the length of service, to ride rough shod right over the members of the Civil Service Commission and ask Parliament to fix this salary. He does not think it is necessary to give Parliament the slightest information as to why the salary should be fixed at this amount. I would ask, and I think I have the right to ask, the minister why an Assistant Auditor General who at most is performing the services of an accountant, should be receiving some $500 to $1,000 more than the officials of very high standing in the other departments, the Marine and Fisheries Department, the Department of Railways and Canals, the Public Works Department, where, as I have said, these expert engineers do not receive anything like the salary that is proposed to be given to this gentleman? It was in order to prevent injustice of that kind, to promote efficiency in the Service, that, under the Civil Service Act, a Civil Service Commission was appointed. It was to prevent favouritism; it was to prevent ministers picking out their friends and boosting them into these soft jobs. I do not care now whether this is suggested by the Auditor General or the Minister of Finance. I have a very high regard for both of these gentlemen, but if I had any voice in the matter I would not permit it in the case of the Auditor General any more than in the case of the Minister of Finance. I protest as much against it in the case of the Auditor General as if it were a direct act of the Government done without the request of that official.

Mr. BURNHAM: Do I understand the hon. gentleman to say that it is assumed that the ministers of the Crown or the members of this House are crooked and would boost their friends unduly? Is that the assumption?

Mr. PUGSLEY: The hon. gentleman asks a question which I should be very glad to answer if it were essential to the question under consideration. I do not wish to unduly press the point, but this gives to the ministers an opportunity to boost their friends—I repeat the words—and that is the opportunity which Parliament, by the Civil Service Act, intended to take away. I would move that the words "including Assistant Auditor General at $4,500" in item number 11 be struck out.

Mr. MURPHY: The minister asked the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley) what the Civil Service Commission would have to do with the question of salary. Under the Civil Service Act they would have nothing to do, because this amount is in excess of the highest amount provided under the Civil Service Act, and that is why the special item is put in.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: That is a reason for bringing the matter to Parliament, but not a reason for consulting the Civil Service Commission, whose functions are to pronounce upon the qualification of an official and no more. The amount to be paid to the official is a question for Parliament. Therefore, the argument of my hon. friend that we did not consult with the Civil Service Commission falls to the ground because no question arises as to the qualification of Mr. Sutherland. He was an official of the Auditor General's Department, qualified for this duty, and enjoying a salary of $3,750 per year. As I pointed out to the House, the Auditor General, who had gone to England, came back after having looked carefully into the situation there and having become convinced that it was desirable that the office of the Auditor General should be represented in London. In looking over his staff for a qualified man, he determined that Mr. Sutherland should be sent to England to represent him. He thought, also, that Mr. Sutherland was deserving of the title of Assistant Auditor General, and that the salary should be $4,500 per year. My hon. friend has mentioned the case of engineers. There may be some engineers in the Civil Service who are entitled to $4,000 a year or more, but it is to be pointed out in that connection that, so far as public works are concerned, instead of increasing the public works, we have been diminishing them; therefore the argument of my hon. friend that the engineer should be especially considered falls to the ground.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The minister has not at all answered the criticism which has been made. Either it is desirable to have these salaries fixed by the Civil Service Act or it is not, and the minister ought not to pass over the Civil Service Commission and give exceptional increases. I will press my motion, because, even if we do not succeed in impressing our views on the House, it is desirable to put ourselves on record on these matters of reform and economy. I would move that the words " including Assistant Auditor General at $4,500 " be struck out of item 11.

Amendment negatived on division.

Department of Finance and Treasury Board —Salaries, including Assistant Deputy Minister at $4,500; Comptroller of Dominion Currency at $4,500; Accountant of Contingencies at $3,000; Commissioner of Taxation at $5,000; Assistant Commissioner of Taxation at $3,500.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I really think that these items ought to be struck out. I venture to say that the salary of $4,500 which my hon. friend asks for the Assistant Deputy Minister is higher than that paid to any man of similar qualifications in the service. Simply because officials of his department want an increase, my hon. friend proceeds to act in violation of the Civil Service Act. We should either stand by the Act or repeal it. If the Government are determined persistently to violate the Act, let them repeal it, and then run riot in the salaries which they pay to their officials. In every one of the cases mentioned in this item there is a violation of the provisions of the Civil Service Act. How much does the Chief Engineer of the Department of Railways and Canals receive?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: $5,000.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The gentleman responsible for all the engineering work on Government railways—a gentleman who has been in the service of the department for years, and who is practically next to the minister—gets only $5,000; yet it is proposed to give the assistant Deputy Minister of the Finance Department, in violation of the terms of the Civil Service Act, an amount within $500 of the maximum salary allowed to the Chief Engineer of the Department of Railways and Canals. What does the Chief Engineer of the Public Works Department get? The salary used to be only $4,000.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Chief Architect, $7,000.

Mr. PUGSLEY: My hon. friend knows the special circumstances under which this princely salary was given to the chief architect. Mr. Ewart, who had been there forty years, never received over $4,000.

Mr. TURRIFF: That was a Manitoba touch.

Mr. PUGSLEY: In the first division, Department of Public Works, there are five men receiving salaries of $4,000. That amount must be the salary of the chief engineer of the Department of Public Works, a gentleman whose knowledge, judgment, experience and integrity are brought to bear upon the expenditure of millions of dollars of public money. It is of great importance that a first-class man be in charge of that branch of the department. I am not speaking for the present chief engineer. I know that he would not make any complaint with regard to the injustice that is done by this discrimination. Having been for years in the public service, under the Civil Service Act he cannot receive a higher salary than $4,000 a year. Possibly he has no friend to ask that he should get a large increase; presumably he is content to continue under the provisions of the Civil Service Act. But the Minister of Finance is asking Parliament to grant the large sums of money for the salaries to which I have referred. The Commissioner of Taxation, for instance, is to get $5,000, which is $1,000 more than the chief engineer of the Department of Public Works is allowed to receive under the Civil Service Act. This is the more inexcusable in that it is becoming the habit of the Government to ask Parliament to violate the provisions of the Civil Service Act. They are doing it every year, but this is the most glaring case of all. I certainly protest against it; I do think that the item should be struck out.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: There is no violation of the Civil Service Act. The Government thinks that these men are deserving of the respective positions and the salaries attached to them, and they are asking Parliament to vote the money. If the men mentioned in this item were paid 50 per cent more than the amounts stated, they would, in my judgment, be inadequately paid. At eight o'clock I purpose telling the committee what the Finance Department has been doing since war broke out. I must do it in justice to the men who have given of their time unreservedly, day and night, Saturday and sometimes Sunday, to the work of my department. No financial institution in Canada—I know them all fairly well—could have discharged the duties which have been discharged by the men of my department, faithfully working as they have, without regard to official hours, whether called upon night or day. Those men have done work that will redound to the credit of the Finance Department and of the Civil Service for all time to come.

I will take the opportunity, after eight o'clock, to make a statement to this House, not because I think it is necessary by reason of anything my hon. friend has said, but because I think it is only fair to the officials of my department that this House should know the duties they have been called upon to perform in connection with the loans and in connection with the financing in this country of the Imperial Government. If there is anything that has impressed me since I have been connected with the Finance Department, it is this—the absolute injustice done to men of conspicuous ability, men who in civil life would receive fifty if not a hundred per cent more money for similar work to the work they are doing for this Government. We lost one of the best men in the Civil Service, Mr. H. T. Ross, because under the Civil Service Act we were not able to pay him what he should have been paid long before, and at the present time we are unable to retain civil servants or to maintain the standard of the Civil Service in this country because of the kind of criticism we have been receiving this afternoon. I speak with some feeling in this matter, because I know personally that the efficiency of administration in this country depends upon the Civil Service. I say that men of the greatest ability in the Civil Service, some of whom have come under my attention in my own department, have, on account of the criticism which is offered from time to time with regard to salaries which outside would be considered entirely inadequate for the duties they perform, been prevented from being dealt with justly by Governments and by Parliament. I say that, and as far as the Finance Department is concerned, why should men who have carried on the duties they have performed since this war has broken out be paid half the amount or less than they would receive if they were working with financial institutions doing the same kind of work? There is a comradeship between myself and the officials of my department, and I have the highest possible respect for them as they have for me. So far from being over-paid, those occupying the most important positions are substantially underpaid, and it is a marvel to me that men such as those that I have in mind are content to remain in the service and to discharge so faithfully as they do the duties imposed upon them, having regard to the salaries they are paid. So far as I am concerned, I say that those salaries instead of being too high, are decidedly too low, and at eight o'clock, I will give the House a statement as to the work performed by the officials of my department who, the hon. member says, are not worthy of the salaries opposite their names in this estimate.

At six o'clock the Committee took recess.

After Recess.

The Committee resumed at eight o'clock, Mr. Rainville in the Chair.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: It had been my intention for the information of Parliament to make a statement as to the duties arising out of the war which have devolved upon my department during the last three years and the present seems to be a convenient opportunity when the item of salaries is under consideration by the committee. Prior to the outbreak of the war the staff of the department was engaged in the administrative work devolving upon it under the statutes and usages of the Dominion. It consisted of its chief executive officers, and of a staff of clerks and assistants, its organization in that respect not differing materially from that of any other department. But when the war broke out, by reason of the part that finance plays in all wars the duties of the Department of Finance were naturally very greatly increased. Not only were the duties usually transacted by the department increased, but the war brought additional duties of a very heavy character indeed. These additional duties may be classified under two headings: First, duties connected with the movement of currency owing to conditions arising out of the war, and secondly, duties arising out of the placing of our large domestic loans in the Dominion of Canada.

When the war broke out, the world was largely indebted to London, and as exchange was immediately affected, and as payment could not be made in the usual way by exchange operations, the outside nations proceeded to ship gold to London; that was the only means they had of liquidating their international balances. Among other nations immediately indebted to Great Britain was the United States. Bankers and merchants of the United States, endeavouring to pay indebtedness presently falling due in London, commenced to ship large quantities of gold to that city, but on account of the dangers of ocean navigation that was found inexpedient as the rate of insurance soon became unduly high and ultimately almost prohibitive. In order to meet the situation the Bank of England in the fall of 1914 announced that the Minister of Finance here, as trustee for the bank, would receive gold deposits from merchants and bankers in the United States, and that delivery of gold here for account of the Bank of England would be considered as the equivalent of the delivery of gold in London in payment of obligations there. That was a matter of convenience, having regard to the difficulties and dangers of ocean shipment, which made it impossible to send the gold to London direct. This action of the Bank of England was greatly appreciated in the United States and a large movement of gold took place towards Canada. In that movement over $100,000,000 of gold in coin and bars was shipped from the United States to Ottawa, was lodged in the vaults of the Finance Department and held there subject to the order of the Bank of England.

I should point out to the House that there is a very great deal of detailed work in connection with the receiving and handling of gold. Without going too much into particulars, I may say that the coin and bars must be weighed down to 1,000th of an ounce, that it can only be done by expert officials, that the greatest care must be taken in the handling of the gold to prevent abrasion, and that, altogether, work of that character can only be done by experienced men. On the first movement of gold from the United States to Canada over $1,000,000,000 of the metal was received and handled by the officials of the department. In 1915 the exchange situation changed. Instead of the United States being obliged to send money to liquidate obligations in Great Britain, Great Britain by reason of her enormous purchases on this continent, and by reason of the change in the international exchange situation, was obliged to reverse the situation, and that condition has prevailed up to the present time; in other words, Great Britain, being obliged to purchase on this side of the Atlantic great quantities of munitions materials and supplies, including foodstuffs and wheat, in addition to borrowing money in the United States and Canada for that purpose, has been obliged to supplement such borrowing by sending in enormous shipments of gold from Asia, from Africa and from Great Britain, and it is in connection with those shipments that I desire to occupy the attention of the House for a few moments in order to indicate the onerous duties that have devolved upon my department. This gold, as I have stated, has come from several continents, and has been carried in ships of war to Halifax or Vancouver. Those ships have been met either by my deputy minister or his assistant or by the comptroller of the currency or some other trusted official, who has exercised supervision over the transport of that gold to Ottawa. It will surprise the House and the country if it could realize the magnitude of the transactions involved when I say that the Department of Finance has handled for the Imperial Government and for the Bank of England in connection with these gold shipments since the outbreak of the war no less a sum than $1,000,000,000. Over $1,000,000,000 in gold coin and gold bullion have been received by a few officials of the Finance Department at Halifax and Vancouver, have been brought across the continent, have been weighed down to 1,000th part of an ounce for the most part, and have been held and disposed of for the account and on the order of the Bank of England or the Imperial Government.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Is that mostly in bars?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: It would, I think, be mostly in bars, because under modern conditions gold is handled more in bars than in coin, but the point I desire to make is that over this period of three years the officials of the Finance Department have handled that enormous amount of gold involving all that detailed work with no expense whatever to the Bank of England or the Imperial Government, with the exception of a few hundred dollars for cartage. I am not making this statement in order that any credit may devolve upon myself or the Government, but I do feel that I should make the statement in simple justice to the men of that department who have devoted themselves unsparingly day and night to the duties of their office.

In addition to handling that gold for account of the Bank of England the department has been indirectly concerned—and here I desire to pay a tribute to the officials of the mint rather than to those of my department—with the operations carried on by the mint at Ottawa. It will surprise the House, I have no doubt, to learn that we have in Ottawa Mint a refinery for the refining of raw gold which has the largest capacity of any refinery in the world. That is due to the fact that about a year and a half ago the mint was enlarged in order that we might treat gold from South Africa and Russia which had not been refined to a sufficient degree of fineness when it reached this country. Late in May, 1916, plans and preparations were made for an extension of the refinery, and in seven weeks the extension was completed and in operation. The present capacity is 250,000 ounces or $5,000,000 per week, and the method employed is what is known as the chlorine process. Since September, 1915, there has been received at the mint $225,000,000 in raw gold, practically all of which has been refined and delivered, which work has been done in addition to the regular work required at the mint.

The work of the officials of my department who have been immediately concerned has not ended there with receiving this gold. Under instructions from the Imperial Government, that gold has been moved, to the amount of hundreds of millions, to New York. Great care was required in weighing out, in shipment, and in the attention necessary in connection with the sending of this gold forward by express. As I have stated, over $1,000,000,000 of treasure has been handled and distributed, a staggering sum, I suppose probably twice the amount of gold in the United Kingdom at the outbreak of the war.

In addition to the service in connection with these transactions, an immense volume of detailed work and responsibility has devolved upon the officials of my department in connection with the domestic loans. Before the war broke out all our financing was done in London. The loans were arranged by our financial agents there, the Bank of Montreal, after cable communication with the minister or deputy minister. The detailed work connected with these loans was carried out, of course, by the staff of the Bank of Montreal in London. The House is aware that since the outbreak of the war we have placed three domestic loans in Canada. The first loan was for $50,000,000 increased to $100,000,000. The securities issued were in denominations of $100, $500, and $1,000. The next loan was for $100,000,000, and in connection with that loan applications to the amount of over $200,000,000 were received, with deposit payments in connection therewith, of course. In March of this year we issued another loan of $150,000,000 and in connection with that offer applications to the amount of $250,000,000 were received. Besides the deposit payments, of course, these several loans were subsequently all paid up. All this is well known to the House, but that which is not known, and could not be known except through a statement made by the minister or some one else on behalf of the department, is the enormous amount of work devolving upon the officials of the department in connection with these loans. Subscriptions might be sent in through any branch of any of the chartered banks of Canada, and there are about 3,500 of these branches. Not only did the department keep account with practically all of these branch banks, because subscriptions were received through nearly all, but it was actually necessary to keep an account, so to say, with each bond itself, in order that the transaction might be correctly handled. The banks, as agents of the Finance Department, issued provisional receipts. These receipts had to be prepared and sent to the banks by the department. Then scrip had to be issued as a provisional security. This was prepared in the department and forwarded to the banks ready for those who had subscribed to the loan. Then, as the instalments on the payments were made, the department was notified, and, of course, the necessary accounts had to be kept in the department. Ultimately, the bonds had to be engraved and forwarded to the several banks in exchange for the outstanding certificates. Take for example, the last loan. There were forty thousand subscribers, and over two hundred thousand separate pieces of scrip were delivered in connection with that transaction. Of course, a great deal of the routine work is done by temporary help; we have had to greatly increase our staff to meet the situation. But the heavy and responsible work in connection with these loans has been done by a handful of men in the department; the deputy minister, the assistant deputy minister, the comptroller of the currency, and the chief officials in the office. These men have given themselves to the duties of their position in a manner that has commanded my admiration, and I feel that I should be lacking in simple justice to the staff and to the Civil Service if I did not bear this testimony and have it placed upon record. To my knowledge some of these men have permanently injured their health,—I am not in the least exaggerating the situation. The public do not know and cannot know the strain imposed upon certain departments of the Government in time of war. I should like it to be known when this war is over that the officials of the Department of Finance have acquitted themselves in the manner I have indicated.

[Sir Thomas White.]

Let me say something of the staff itself. All this work has been accomplished with comparatively little increase in the number of the staff of the department; so far as the leading officials are concerned, there are actually fewer than there were at the outbreak of the war. The organization of the Finance Department when the war began included the deputy minister, the assistant deputy, of whom I shall say a few words in a moment, the accountant, Mr. Saunders, and the comptroller of dominion currency, Mr. Rourke. Of these principal officials all are there to-day with the exception of Mr. Ross, who has been lost to the department. He was a great official, being a man of high character and fine ability. When I was in England in November last I received a cable from Mr. Ross stating that he had received a very attractive offer. He was not willing to leave the service, but I think that he felt that in justice to his family he should submit the situation to me. Though I knew I should miss him very greatly, and though I knew that the loss to the service would be great, I felt that I should not stand in his way, and I so cabled him. The result is that Mr. Ross is now the secretary of the Canadian Bankers' Association, enjoying a much larger salary than he would have obtained in the service of the Dominion. The executive work of the Finance Department is carried on by the deputy minister, the assistant deputy, Mr. Saunders, and the comptroller of the currency, Mr. Rourke, and certain other leading officials to whom I have referred.

As to the particular item under discussion, I may say that Mr. Ross received as assistant deputy minister a salary of $4,500 a year. I filled the position by promotion. I did not go outside of the department. If I had gone outside of the department into the financial world to fill the position occupied by Mr. Ross, I have no hesitation in saying that I should have been obliged to pay $7,000 or $8,000 in order to obtain a man who could fill that position. I know something of the salaries obtained in the financial world and obtained for financial skill. I would have been obliged to pay much more than $4,500 in order to get a man to fill that position, and I am not sure that I could have got a man to properly fill that position, because the knowledge of financial administration in connection with the Government is not found except at Ottawa. So that Mr. Ross's position was filled by the promotion of Mr. Saunders, who had been for many years Dominion accountant, and who was thoroughly versed in the financial affairs of the Dominion. I submit that was an eminently proper course for me to pursue. A very deserving man was appointed to the position, and I gave him the same salary that Mr. Ross obtained, because there is one less official in the Department of Finance. Then, Mr. Rourke, who has had most to do with the movement of gold and who is an excellent official, assiduous in his devotion to his duties and highly skilled, was advanced also to the same salary of $4,500. In the re-arrangement of the staff I doubt if there is any increase in the total of the salaries of the executive officers as a whole.

If I have any fault to find with the Finance Department, it is that there are not enough principal officers. When I was in charge of a business I always used to insist upon an understudy for every important position, and I believe in plenty of help and well paid help. You will never have a highly efficient Finance Department, or any other highly efficient department of the Government, until you are willing to pay men reasonable salaries for skilled service. As far as this particular item relating to the salary of the assistant deputy minister is concerned, it is precisely the same as it was before. The controller of the Dominion currency has been advanced to $4,500, and my opinion is that he is underpaid to-day —substantially underpaid—for the service which he renders. Then we have another item, that of "Accountant Contingencies," at $3,000. The accountant of contingencies is Mr. Brittain. Mr. Brittain until last year was in the second division grade "A", and had gone up to the maximum of the division, namely, $2,800. The House may know that among the other duties which have developed upon me since the outbreak of the war are those connected with the position of honorary treasurer of the Patriotic Fund. Some $23,000,000 or $24,000,000 have been subscribed to the fund by the patriotic people of Canada, and there is a very great deal of work connected with the administration of the fund in my office. All the moneys are paid into the honorary treasurer and they are checked out by the Finance Department to the several organizations throughout the country for the purposes of the fund. The official who has had to do with that work is Mr. Brittain and Mr. Brittain has literally laboured day and night, in season and out, in connection with that work. The Canadian Patriotic Fund, about a year and a half ago, offered to give Mr. Brittain a gratuity of $1,000 in recognition of his patriotic service in connection with the fund. Mr. Brittain declined to accept that gratuity. He said that he preferred that his work should go to the fund, that that was his contribution. When I had under consideration the question of salaries this year, I thought it only fair to Mr. Brittain, who is an excellent official and quite entitled upon his merits as an officer apart from the duties devolving upon him in connection with the Patriotic Fund, that he should go into the first division of class "A" and should receive a salary of $3,000. I doubt if any hon. member of this House will raise any objection to Mr. Brittain being recognized by advancement to a position having a salary of $3,000. In addition, we have the commissioner of taxation at $5,000 and the assistant commissioner of taxation at $3,500. In connection with my department in ordinary times there is what is known as the Tariff Branch. It requires experienced and skilled men to be competent tariff officers and I believe I am fortunate in having two of the ablest tariff men in this country in my department. Both men had long experience in connection with the Customs before entering the Department of Finance. One is Mr. Russell and the other is Mr. Breadner. With Mr. Breadner, with Mr. Russell and with John McDougald, who is a great official, one of the greatest officials this country has ever produced, and who holds the office of Commissioner of Customs, this country is exceptionally well equipped in tariff officers. I doubt if any country is better equipped or served by tariff experts than Canada is by the Commissioner of Customs and the two gentlemen I have named. It is the duty of these men in the Tariff Branch to keep in touch with tariff matters, with general business and industry, with prices and with the tariffs of other countries so that we have at all times information in respect to matters that may be of importaance in connection with the tariff. Last year I introduced the Business Profits War Tax Act and its administration has devolved very responsible duties upon my department. In the organization which was created to carry out the legislation we appointed Mr. Breadner as commissioner of taxation and Mr. Russell as assistant commissioner of taxation. These men have had in addition to their ordinary duties the responsibility of administering the Business Profits War Tax Act, a very responsible duty indeed. They have had to organize, practically over the entire country, a staff for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of the Act and of levying and collecting the tax. I bear tribute to the faithfulness and ability with which they have carried out their duties. But the point I desire to make now is that there has been added to them since last year the administration of this Act. In recognition of that fact, and of the additional duties and responsibilities devolving upon them, their salaries have been increased by $500 in both cases, Mr. Breadner from $4,500 to $5,000 and Mr. Russell from $3,000 to $3,500. These are the circumstances with the increases which are indicated in this item in the Estimates now before the committee. I submit that the work of the department has greatly increased, that the staff have fully risen to the occasion, and that all the members of the staff whose names are mentioned here and with whose cases I have dealt in this brief statement before the committee are deserving of the appointments which they have received and of the salaries attached to the positions.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Without in any way diverging from the question, may I ask at this point if in the collection of the war tax there are many cases pending where people have refused to pay and action has been taken by the department, or if the administration has been smooth, and every one has paid?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The administration of the Business Profits War Tax has been most satisfactory. The public who have been subjected to the taxation have been more than willing to pay their contributions—they have been anxious to pay. There have been practically no cases of dispute between the department and those assessed. That arises from the fact that in most cases the capital is comparatively easily established; the profits are made known from the accounting statement, and the rest is a matter of mathematical calculation. But there are, of course, many cases in which a difference of opinion would arise and in which difference of opinion has arisen with regard to capitalization; and there have been some cases of dispute as to the amount which might reasonably be allowed for depreciation under the Act. A number of cases of that kind are always pending. But when the matter has been brought to my attention and we have gone into the facts fully and have had the parties to Ottawa and fully considered the situation, there have been almost no cases in which we did not reach a conclusion that was satisfactory to the department. There has been no disposition on the part of the public to resist the taxation in any way; in fact, the contrary has been the case; they have been anxious and desirous to pay, and I hope that it will not be necessary to litigate any cases in connection with that taxation. On the whole, I think the impression has been that the department has administered the tax very fairly and reasonably, always with a due regard to the provisions of the Act, which, of course, it is our duty to enforce strictly.

I do not know that it is necessary for me to say anything further. I am glad in a way that my hon. friend raised the question of the salaries, because it has given me an opportunity of making a statement which I feel that I should make in reference to the staff. I do not believe that any of these salaries are high, having regard to the skill required, the responsible nature of the duties devolving upon the officials. On the contrary, I believe they are considerably below the salares paid in financial institutions outside. I am positive as to that, and I make the statement again which I made this afternoon, that I do not believe there is any financial institution in this country which could have handled the gold shipments, of which I have made special mention, and the domestic loans, aggregating $350,000,000, as efficiently as the officials of the Finance Department have handled that business. Just in connection with the loans, let me point out that there were not only the $350,000,000 of war loan issues, but in addition to that, over 100,000 of the small war saving certificates have been issued. I am sure the House will be pleased to learn that within the last three months the public of this country have subscribed for over 100,000 of these $25, $50, and $100 war savings certificates, aggregating over $7,000,000 in gross amount. Those represent for the most part subscriptions by those of comparatively slender means. They were anxious to contribute of their resources to the Government in order to aid in the prosecution of the war. In addition to that, they will have their savings in that form of investment, and that may be a matter of considerable importance to the country, especially having regard to the conditions that may prevail after the war is over.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The Minister of Finance entirely misconceived the criticism which I made against his action in over-riding, as I said, the provisions of the Civil Service Act, and including these amounts in the estimates in the way he has done. The only answer he has made is that the department has had a great deal of important work to attend to. I do not dispute that. But other departments have also had very important work to do. Take the Department of Marine and Fisheries. I understand that its work has been very great, and necessarily it would be greatly increased by reason of the war. But I do not understand that the Minister of Marine and Fisheries is recommending that in the case of his officials the Civil Service Act should be disregarded. I do not understand that his officials are asking for that. I understand that they, having taken their offices under the Civil Service Act, have been quite content to perform their duties and to take the increases which the Act provides. So I thought that the Department of Militia had been very greatly worked and overworked during the war. I do not imagine that there is any official of the Government who has had a greater strain put upon him by the war than General Fiset, the Deputy Minister of Militia. But his minister is not recommending that the Civil Service Act should be overridden in his case. He is not asking for special consideration, or a special vote of Parliament. Apparently the Minister of Militia recognizes that in these times of stress, when everybody has to suffer, when many people have to do a great deal of work for very little pay, and everybody has to live on very much less than he required before the war, the officials of that department are willing to perform their duties without asking that the law should be violated. When the Minister of Finance, with his broad and generous views upon financial questions, accustomed to big salaries, many times beyound what this Government has been paying to its officials, comes in and asks that, with respect to his department, an exception shall be made, that the law shall be overridden, the reasons for the establishment of the Civil Service Act by Parliament shall be ignored, and that these gentlemen who have been in the service a very short time shall receive for limited service the same salaries as other officials who have been giving splendid work to the country for a great many years. My hon. friend the Minister of Finance speaks of the work that has been done; and I am willing to recognize the importance of it, and the splendid way in which it has been done; I am willing to join in testimony to the officials of the Finance Department for their energy, capability, and devotion to duty. But I desire, also, to say to the Dominion Government and the people of Canada that they ought to be proud of the Civil Service at Ottawa in all departments, and I have had occasion to know the way in which they perform their duties. I say that in all the departments the Government and people of this country are getting splendid service at, in most instances, a very low remuneration for the duties which are performed by the Civil Service.

But the Minister of Finance has forgotten to tell the committee that he has in his department now 117 employees, as against 104 last year.

While there is much responsibility in the handling of gold bars, I take it that the assistant deputy minister, the comptroller of dominion currency and the accountant of contingencies are not very much occupied in handling them. Very large responsibility rests upon the efficient Deputy Minister of Finance in connection with these matters, but he is getting no increase. Is there any official in the department who has the same degree of responsibility as the deputy minister? Under the Civil Service Act he is entitled to $5,000 a year; apparently he is contented with that. New men are brought into the department and given substantially the same—in one instance exactly the same—as the deputy minister receives, who has been in the department for a great many years. The deputy minister has grown old in the service; to my knowledge he has done splendid work. My hon. friend referred to the great work of the mint. His department has nothing to do with the mint, which is a department of the Imperial Government.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I paid a tribute to the work of the mint.

Mr. PUGSLEY: My hon. friend did so with the view of throwing a halo round himself and his department. The mint was established by the late Government, in the face of a great deal of criticism on the part of hon. gentlemen then of the Opposition. The mint is doing splendid work, but it is a department of the Imperial Government; therefore its work does not in any way add to the work which the officials of the Finance Department are performing. My criticism is that equally good and equally important work is being done in other departments; that it is contrary to the principles upon which the Civil Service Act was based and contrary to the spirit which ought to animate the Government in the administration of that Act that certain officials should receive exceptional treatment as against other equally hard-worked officials. The salaries proposed to be given to the assistant deputy minister and the comptroller of dominion currency, $4,500, and the commissioner of taxation, $5,000, are not warranted by the Civil Service Act. My hon. friend knows that he is acting contrary to the provisions of the Civil Service Act when he comes to Parliament and asks for this vote. He has referred to Mr. John McDougald, Commissioner of Customs, as a splendid official. So he is, but he has given his whole life to the service of the country, and, splendid official as he is, the Minister of Finance has not asked for an increase for him. Not one dollar is to be added to his salary, notwithstanding the length of his service and the great work that he has done. Yet this young man who was appointed commissioner of taxation, coming into the department only in recent years, receives the same salary as Mr. McDougald, whom my hon. friend has eulogized.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Does my hon. friend not know that Mr. Breadner has been thirty years in the Dominion service?

Mr. PUGSLEY: Well, I suppose Mr. McDougald has been fifty years in the service.

Mr. HAZEN: Oh, no, he was in this House not so very many years ago.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Pretty nearly fifty years, then.

Mr. REID: Twenty years.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Mr. Breadner was in a subordinate position in the Customs Department, while Mr. McDougald occupies a position next to the minister. Besides, Mr. Breadner was out of the service for a while, being employed by the Canadian Manufacturers' Association.

Mr. REID: He was twenty-six years in the service before he went with the Canadian Manufacturers' Association. He has been back about four years.

Mr. PUGSLEY: How many years was he out of the service?

Mr. REID: About four years, but he has been in the service about thirty years altogether.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I should not like to say anything that would even appear to be a criticism of Mr. Breadner, for I recognize that he is an excellent official. But the Minister of Finance is taking Mr. Breadner outside of the Civil Service Act, and he is leaving Mr. McDougald under its provisions.

Mr. REID: Perhaps the hon. gentleman does not know that Mr. Breadner was getting a salary of $4,500 a year from the Canadian Manufacturers' Association at the time he returned to the service.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I suppose he was, but he chose to come back to the service of the Government. There must be attractions in the Government service. Mr. Butler, who was Deputy Minister of Railways and Canals for quite a long time, could have obtained outside the Government service at any time twice the salary that he was receiving in the department. In the Department of Public Works, for instance, the chief engineer, the assistant to the chief engineer, or the superintendent of dredging would, I am told, receive from private companies or firms very much larger salaries than they receive in the service of the Government. But they are not treated with any special favour; they are compelled to accept the increases which the Civil Service Act provides. The comptroller of currency, to whom the minister referred, has not been a long time in the service.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Twenty-two years.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The Chief Accountant in the Department of Public Works, who handles millions of dollars every year, and whose duties are very heavy indeed, receives only $3,625. Since the Civil Service Act came into force he has been obliged to accept the increases provided by that Act. I mention him because I happen to know the very important duties which he has performed. He is not complaining—I am not speaking at his instance, for I have not been communicated with by anybody—but I am endeavouring to point out to the minister that great dissatisfaction is liable to be caused in the Civil Service by this discrimination—by applying the Civil Service Act to some officials and not to others. Hundreds of employees in the Civil Service, who are working at from $900 to $1,200 per year, are deserving of increases. They are hardly able to keep soul and body together in these days of the high cost of living, yet they cannot get any increase; they must remain under the terms of the Civil Service Act, getting increases through length of service only as the Act provides. I do not complain that the gentlemen to whom I have referred are getting more than they are entitled to or more than they would get if engaged with firms or companies carrying on business. What I object to is the discrimination which the minister is exercising towards these gentlemen as against others in the service who are equally deserving and who discharge equally as important duties. The minister sought to show that the issuing of scrip takes up an enormous amount of time. One would almost think that these gentlemen had to write the scrip in their own handwriting or on a typewriter. My hon. friend knows that this scrip is all printed.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I do not know anything of the kind.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Or lithographed.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: My hon. friend does not know what he is talking about when he says that.

Mr. PUGSLEY: How is it done?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Scrip is partly printed, but the names, payments, etc., have to be filled in, and this involves an immense amount of work.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Is that all?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Yes. That is enough, too.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Then it is all printed or lithographed, with the exception of certain blanks, which have to be filled in. This work could be done by any clerk receiving a salary of $500 a year. It is not work that requires any broad intellect.

I venture to say that my friend the deputy minister or those gentlemen who are receiving increases in salary would devote very little attention to that work, and that it would be done by some one of those hundred odd employees who are in the service of the department and who are receiving the smaller salaries. Let us take the Department of Marine and Fisheries, and let us take Mr. Anderson, the chief engineer as an instance. Mr. Anderson has been in the service for a great many years; he is discharging duties of a very important character; he is supervising the expenditure of millions of dollars of the people's money; he occupies a position where keen judgment, strict integrity and great devotion are required; yet all he receives under the Civil Service Act is $4,000 a year, and he cannot get one dollar beyond that amount because that is the highest salary attaching to the head of a department next to the deputy minister. Yet, notwithstanding the fact that my hon. friend has a full knowledge of the long service that Mr. Anderson and men like him have given to the country, my hon. friend here gives to this comparatively young man a boost of $1,000 over and above what he receives under the Civil Service Act. In the Department of Public Works, Mr. Ewart, the chief architect, who has been for forty years, perhaps longer, in the department and who is a most faithful official, cannot receive more than $4,000 a year. In the Department of Railways, the chief engineer, I think, although I am not quite sure, receives only $4,000 a year. Mr. Dufresne, who was brought to the Department of Public Works from Winnipeg receives only $4,000 a year, although he is doing work of a very important character, and the supervising engineer, Mr. Valiquet, receives only $3,600 a year. All these gentlemen are doing very important work, and work which I think might be just as well recognized as the work which is being performed by those gentlemen in the Department of Finance; but the Minister of Finance is generous; he is apparently looking after his employees all the time; he does not care what the Civil Service Act provides for; he apparently does not care how the employees of the other departments of Government are treated; he has broad and generous views in regard to his own department, and he asks this committee to favour certain officials in his department, and to leave the others to plod along as best they can, bound by the Civil Service Act. It is for that reason, I find fault with the minister and not because for the work those gentlemen are performing they are highly paid; it is because I think there ought to be certain general rules which should apply to all the departments, and the Civil Service Act having been brought into operation to prevent discrim-

9 p.m. ination taking place, to prevent favouritism, and to have one rule which should govern promotions and increases in salaries in all departments, it is because of all these things that I have said that the minister is violating the spirit of the Act, and that I have been endeavouring to criticise him in what I trust has not been in an offensive manner, but simply a manner that might be calculated to draw his attention to the undesirability of discriminating in this way and to stop such a course being followed in the future.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: As I have made an engagement to meet some of the members of the British Commission between nine and ten o'clock, I would be glad if the committee would oblige me by going on with some other item.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Certainly.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: There is no reason why the discussion should not proceed while I am absent from the chamber.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I wish to add a few words to what has already been said by my friend (Mr. Pugsley). I need not say that I am a friend of the civil servants. I have always shown my sympathy with the Civil Service in a practical way, because I know many of the civil servants; and while I do not begrudge the increases which have been given in the cases mentioned by the Minister of Finance, and whilst I also bear tribute to the officials whose salaries have been increased, I can not, however, help thinking that something should be done for another class of civil servants. On different occasions, since the beginning of this Parliament in 1911, the question of increasing the salaries of the lower officials has been mooted in this House. The House will remember that in 1913 the question came up before us and that a Bill was to be introduced by which the messengers, letter carriers and third class officials of the Civil Service were to have their salaries increased. I understand that with the war breaking out and with the heavy expenditure entailed thereby, the Government have found it difficult, if not impossible, to implement the promise that was made then; but with the buoyant revenue and with the liberalities, the largesses, that have been made in favour of some, indeed of many of the higher officials, it seems to me that the Government should, not later than this session, increase the pittance which the messengers, charwomen, letter carriers and generally speaking, the third class officials in the various departments of the Government receive. I need not say that in the present high cost of living, it is simply impossible for the messengers, letter carriers and others to live. Not a day elapses that I do not receive letters and petitions disclosing a state of things which should not be continued if the Government can prevent it. With the present price of the necessities of life, the price of food, the price of clothing, it seems to me that the Government should not hesitate, and that at this session a Bill should be introduced to give to those poor Civil Servants the increases to which they are entitled. I hope that before the committee adjourns we shall have a declaration on the part of the Government of their policy on this subject.

I quite agree with my hon. friend the Minister of Finance that Mr. Brittain is doing excellent work in connection with the Patriotic Fund. I happen to be a member of the Patriotic Fund Committee, and I can assure this committee that no man has given more unreservedly and more liberally of his time than has Mr. Brittain. While speaking of the Patriotic Fund—and I am here expressing only my own opinion, and I commit no one to that opinion although I have heard it expressed by many outside of this House—as this war may last for many months more, although we all hope it will not last so long, and as the demand upon the public will become more and more pressing, I think that instead of leaving the Patriotic Fund to the generosity of the public at large, the Government should impose a small tax on every Canadian in order to assist the families of our soldiers who are serving overseas. That opinion has already been expressed in the press, and even by some of the most influential members of the Patriotic Fund committee. At present some people are called on over and over again to give subscriptions to the Patriotic Fund, while hundreds of thousands who are well able to subscribe contribute nothing. The special tax need not be very heavy. A mill on the dollar might bring magnificent results. I know that some villages and towns and cities and counties have contributed very generously. I remember last winter I was asked to inaugurate a campaign for the Patriotic Fund in the county of Renfrew, represented by my hon. friend to my right (Mr. Graham), and I am proud to say that the town of Renfrew alone contributed $50,000 inside of a week, although on two previous occasions it had given a like amount. The county of Renfrew also subscribed $100,000, outside altogether of the town's contribution. That was a splendid example for the other counties, but I still hold the view that though there is in some cities and towns and villages and communities that broad patriotism which impels the people to do their duty towards the Patriotic Fund, the Government should make a point of seeing that the thousands and thousands who now escape are called upon to contribute, by imposing a small tax on every Canadian from one end of the Dominion to the other. Perhaps some members of the committee share my views on this question, and will speak this evening.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN: I have a great deal of sympathy with what the previous speaker has said about increasing the pay of the lower grades of the Civil Service, especially as regards making it operative in the case of the outside service as well as the inside service. I believe that none are more worthy of recognition than the letter carriers and the carriers on the rural mail routes throughout the country, and now that the Minister of Finance has somewhat loosened the bag in connection with his own department I hope that his generosity will extend to the other departments, with a view particularly to increasing the salaries of the lower grade officials.

One thing that interested me most of all in the remarks of the Minister of Finance was his statement with regard to the handling of the gold reserves of this country by the national treasury. The work has been done so well that I think the taking care of the gold reserves of this country should be left to the national treasury and its branches, and that hereafter the whole gold reserve of this country in connection with the operations of the Government and of our banks should be held in the national treasury at Ottawa. It is the beginning of a newer and a higher system of banking. It has already been adopted in the United States, where the banks now see the benefits of the gold reserves being in the custody of the Government. I think these gold reserves can be handled better and more cheaply in the national treasury than anywhere else. I think the gold reserves of this country, whether of our financial institutions or of the banks—there is a gold reserve in connection with the banks, though I cannot quite say where that gold reserve is—should be held in the national treasury and handled by the Finance Department. In speaking on this question before in the House, I have taken the ground that the nation should be at the head of the currency and banking institutions of our country, and I think the Finance Minister has given us a splendid illustration to-night of how well the nation can take hold and handle that part of our administration. When the minister comes to a revision of the banking and currency laws of this country I hope he will see his way to follow more closely the excellent example of the United States of making the national treasury the repository of all the gold in the country.

Administration of Justice—Salaries, including J. P. Bill, at $4,000, and Miss G. Avery, promoted to Second Division, Subdivision B, at $1,200.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Why is it necessary to name these officers?

Mr. DOHERTY: When Mr. Bill came into the department he had been in a good law practice which he had to give up. At the time he entered the service it was understood that should his services prove satisfactory he would be given $4,000 which is the limit of his class. He has been in the department for three years, beginning at $3,300, and now is receiving $3,600.

Mr. LEMIEUX: What are his duties?

Mr. DOHERTY: He is a law officer to the department. On a number of occasions his work has come under my personal observation and I have found it very satisfactory. If he conducted his legal practice with the same ability he has shown in the department he would certainly earn at least a sum equal to this. Miss Avery is doing secretarial work for the Solicitor General. She is very attentive and frequently has to work beyond the regular hours. I feel that she earns even a larger salary than this.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I do not wish to be unduly critical, but the very reason why these names have been given in the Estimates is that the Civil Service Act is not being complied with. I have made my remarks in that connection in discussing the Department of Finance.

Administration of Justice—Living allowance for Judge of Atlin District, B.C., $1,200.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Who is the judge there?

Mr. DOHERTY: Judge Young.

Mr. LEMIEUX: What salary is he receiving?

Mr. DOHERTY: The salary is $3,000, the same as was formerly given. The living allowance has been in force for many years.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Where does the judge reside?

Mr. DOHERTY: At Prince Rupert.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Why is it necessary to provide a living allowance for a judge residing at Prince Rupert?

Mr. NESBITT: It must be pretty expensive there.

Mr. PUGSLEY: It is on a line of railway and I do not see why living there should be more expensive than in Vancouver or Victoria.

Mr. DOHERTY: This living allowance is an inheritance from the previous Government, a Government which, according to hon. gentlemen opposite, did all things wisely and well. I have no information that the cost of living at Prince Rupert has decreased since this allowance was made.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I was told to-day of a living allowance that was made in the case of an official in Dawson City. But suppose a railway were constructed to Dawson City, the effect would at once be to reduce the cost of living probably to one-quarter of what it is to-day. Before the railway was built at Prince Rupert, it was necessary to take supplies overland at very large expense, but I suppose that to-day these supplies are delivered at one-tenth of what it formerly cost. The minister is hardly safe in taking as a precedent what was done long before the railway was built. The case reminds me of one that was discovered in the Palais de Justice in Paris. A man stood in the hall every day, and it was known that he was paid, but no one knew why. On inquiry, it was found that twenty-five years before they had painted the hall, and the man was put on to guard the fresh paint, and they had gone on paying him for twenty-five years.

Mr. DOHERTY: I shall make inquiry as to what the painting operations were in this case.

Mr. GRAHAM: It has nothing to do with this item, probably, but there is a matter respecting the administration of justice in Ontario on which, I think, the Dominion and Provincial Governments should get together.

The number of cases to be tried, as well as the voters' lists to be looked after in many of the counties of Ontario, does not give sufficient work for one judge. Still we find that when a vacancy occurs a second judge is appointed. In a time like this, particularly when we are trying to save every dollar that we can, when the Finance Minister is warning us to eat less, to have our clothes pressed more frequently and to buy as few new ones as we can, and all that kind of thing, the public in these counties think it is a somewhat peculiar attitude for governments to take in appointing a second judge when there is not enough work to keep one judge warm. Take the county of Renfrew, for instance; a vacancy occurred there, and that vacancy remained for many months—I imagine it ran into years—unfilled. The one judge was not overworked; he was not kept busy; he could have doubled his work and then not have broken any union labour rules. But we found the other day a second judge appointed. The difficulty these two men now have is to divide the work which was insufficient for one man into two parts nearly equal so that each of them can have something to do. Now, what the Minister of Justice will say in regard to that I think I know; he will say that the Provincial Government creates the office and we fill it. The Provincial Government has the power to say whether there shall be one judge or two judges in a district or county. For a good many years there have been two judges in Renfrew, and so long as the judges were there, of course, no person would suggest that either of them should be removed. The senior judge proved to be quite elderly, and in order to have the work performed it was necessary to appoint a junior judge to really do the work. But the senior judge having passed away, the work was continued as before by the junior judge until recently, when a senior judge was appointed. I know the Minister of Justice could decline to appoint a judge even although there was a vacancy, but I can quite see difficulties in the way of his taking that attitude when the jurisdiction of the province calls for another judge. Is there not some way by which the Minister of Justice can call the attention of the attorneys general of the various provinces to the fact that in many of the counties there is not sufficient work for one judge, and that matters might remain in statu quo where two judges are acting, but that when a vacancy occurs they ought to take into consideration the duties to be performed and ascertain if it would not be possible to have a judgeship left vacant or abolished altogether. In ordinary times it is of sufficient importance to call attention to it, but in a time like this, when every man, woman and child is expected to do his or her duty and to aid financially and in every other way in the carrying on of the war, I think the governments ought to consult together, and that where it is possible to convince the province that a judgeship need not be filled, that judgeship may at least be left vacant if not abolished altogether.

Mr. DOHERTY: No doubt there is a great deal in what the hon. gentleman (Mr. Graham says. The position is that we are face to face with a law enacted by the proper authorities determining the number of judges and it is a little difficult for us to step in and override the determination of the Legislature which is charged with that duty. In regard to the suggestion that is made, I may say that something over two years ago I did take up this matter more particularly in regard to the province of Ontario. I think it is more largely in Ontario than in the other provinces that there might be room for the suggestion that there are too many county court judges and that possibly in certain counties one judge might do the work. I took the matter up a couple of years ago with the then Attorney General of Ontario looking not to a system under which the position should remain in existence and not be filled by the Government but looking to a system whereby there might be a great reduction in the number of judges and, of course, making a reduction in such places as the hon. member referred to where possibly there would not be enough work for the number of judges provided for. At the time I made some suggestions of this kind upon the subject it appeared that they were looked upon favourably but they were never followed by action and I find myself face to face with the same situation. I certainly would be glad if the different provincial authorities would look into the matter and, where circumstances justified it, I would be very pleased if they would take such steps as might reduce the number. In the meantime it is not very easy for me to undertake to discriminate and determine whether the number of judges provided for would be justified and proceed to do the things which under the law they ought to do. I might be mistaken about it and if I were I would be in the unfortunate position of overriding the opinion of those who by law are charged with the determination of the question. But I will be very glad to act upon the suggestion again and request the provincial authorities to look into the question of the number of judges and the amount of work they are called upon to do.

Mr. NESBITT: I would like to endorse what my hon. friend from Renfrew (Mr. Graham) has said and I would urge upon the minister to take the matter up as he has suggested. What the hon. member for Renfrew said is true that in some of the counties where they have two judges they have no more work than one judge can properly do and not be hurried at that. Litigation of this kind has fallen off very materially recently in Ontario and there is no necessity for having so many of these judges.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Is any of this $10,000 for miscellaneous expenditure applied towards the making of the voters' lists in unorganized territories? The judges in the unorganized territories are supposed to prepare the voters' lists. There is a special provision in the electoral law to that effect. Is any of the amount spent for the revision of the lists?

Mr. DOHERTY: I believe not.

Supreme Court of Canada—Contingencies and disbursements, $15,500.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Where are those contingencies?

Mr. DOHERTY: They are indicated in the general terms of the item. I have not any details of the item but the hon. member will note that this is the same amount as was provided for last year. It includes books, stationery and printing, temporary employees engaged from time to time, telephones, telegrams, and many things of that kind.

Mr. GRAHAM: How much of this item was spent last year? The appropriation seems to be about the same from year to year, and if any of it is unnecessary it would be a good time to cut down the estimate.

Mr. DOHERTY: I have not the details, but the officer informs me that the amount is just about spent in each year.

Mr. GRAHAM: I see an item for sheriffs. With us in Ontario the sheriffs are provincial officers. How do we come to be paying them?

Mr. DOHERTY: I understand that while the sheriff is a provincial officer his services are required for our Federal Court, and the sheriff of the county of Carleton is paid, I think, $5 a day, for the days on which his services are required by us.

Mr. MACDONALD: I observed a newspaper report the other day that the Dominion Government had advised the Imperial Government that it would be unwise for them to pass an Act concerning certain legislation passed by the Legislature of British Columbia. My recollection of the circumstances is that the province passed legislation and the point was raised that, owing to the expiration of the term of the legislature, for some reason, the legislation was beyond the power of the province. An application was made to the Imperial authorities for confirmatory or declaratory legislation. The suggestion was made that the Imperial Government asked the Dominion Government for advice, and that the advice was given that it would be unwise to confirm the legislation.

Mr. DOHERTY: What happened was this: Certain legislation was enacted by the legislature of the province of British Columbia and it was sanctioned, I think, on the 15th of March. The question that arose was whether the term of the legislature expired on the 14th of March or the 15th of March. What happened was that the legislation went through the Chamber on March 14 and was sanctioned by the Lieutenant Governor of the province only upon March 15, and there was some question in the mind of the legislators as to the validity of that legislation. The province of British Columbia considered that the proper way to remedy it was to get the Parliament of the United Kingdom to ratify that legislation. They sent forward their petition for this legislation through the Secretary of State, who forwarded it to the Imperial authorities. The latter, whether in their own mind there arose any question on the subject or not, for some reason asked this Government its opinion as to the necessity for or desirability of this legislation, and this request, by some accident, did not reach the department as promptly as it might. The Imperial authorities repeated their inquiry and expressed great anxiety for an opinion. In compliance with their request, we did express an opinion on the matter on which we were asked to express an opinion, and substantially the opinion was that, whatever might have been the situation with regard to the existence of the legislature at the time of the sanctioning of this legislation, there was subsequently elected a legislature about whose power there arose no question whatsoever. This legislation, which had been enacted in that way, and which it was suggested had been sanctioned after the legislature had expired, was on a subject matter within the legislative competency of the Legislature of British Columbia, and assuming that the first legislature had expired and therefore those laws were not valid, the matter being one susceptible of being dealt with by the legislature of the province of British Columbia, it seemed to us perfectly clear that that new Legislature of British Columbia was perfectly competent itself to ratify and validate the legislation of the previous legislature. I am just giving a statement of the substantial question. More than one piece of legislation was affected by this doubt, because, if my memory serves me, the legislation concerning which the question arose was legislation extending the term of the legislature, and, of course, if that legislation extending the term of the legislature was not valid it would affect the validity of such legislation as was enacted during the extended term, and they desired to have all of that legislation ratified. But it seemed to us, with all respect to the advisers of the Legislature of British Columbia, to be quite clear that it was quite within the power of the new Legislature of British Columbia, concerning whose legal existence and competency there was no question, to validate that legislation and to give it retroactive effect. I do not know what action was taken by the authorities on the other side; I am inclined to believe that the Imperial authorities concurred in the advice offered to them. Upon that I do not speak positively.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I should think that all that this Government would have done would have been simply to transmit the request of the British Columbia Government to the Imperial authorities.

Mr. DOHERTY: That is all we did.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I understand that this Government did not suggest, in the first instance, anything to the Imperial Government, but that the Imperial Government asked for advice. In that I would be inclined to think the British Government erred. I should think that if they were going to deal with the subject at all they ought not to have asked for advice from the Dominion Government, because the Lieutenant Governor of a province represents the Crown.

That has been held by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, and I would think that the British Columbia Government would be entitled to have the Imperial Government take such action as might be deemed proper, independently of the Dominion Government. Perhaps it would have been better if this Government had simply transmitted the request to the Imperial Government, to be dealt with entirely by them. However, I may be wrong in that. Perhaps this Government was right in giving advice, but I would have thought differently, having regard to the fact that the legislature of each province occupies a sovereign position as to all matters within its jurisdiction, the Lieutenant Governor representing the Sovereign in provincial matters just as the Governor General of Canada represents the Sovereign in respect of matters pertaining to the whole dominion. As this matter, therefore, was entirely out of the jurisdiction of this Government, being a question as between the Imperial authorities and the Government of British Columbia, I would have supposed that this Government would have simply transmitted the request to the Imperial authorities.

Mr. DOHERTY: When we transmitted the request and it went forward, they rather assumed on the other side that we were asking that the request be granted, though the intention certainly was only to transmit the request. The question addressed to us by the Imperial authorities was why this Government thought that that legislation ought to be enacted. I shall not discuss the propriety of the action of the Imperial authorities in asking us that, or the question whether they should more properly have directed such an inquiry to the Provincial Legislature. They did ask us, and it seemed to us that it was only courteous that we should answer the question. But I am not quite prepared to accept the view of the hon. gentleman that the matter was no concern of the Dominion of Canada. The British North America Act concerns the Dominion of Canada very closely, and it is not desirable that the British North America Act, at the request of a province or anybody else, should be amended, or, if I may use the expression, tinkered with, unless absolutely necessary. The British North America Act is, in a sense, our common charter; it is the charter of the dominion and of all the provinces, and I think that it is not an improper view that the Government of the Dominion is interested in any amendment of the British North America Act. It would be unwise to create precedents for intervention by the home Parliament in the legislative action of provinces of this Dominion unless the circumstances rendered it absolutely necessary. One very important trust that the Dominion Government is entrusted with is the constitution of the country and, more particularly, the right to internal self-government within the Dominion, whether by provincial legislature or by the Parliament of Canada, under the British North America Act. It behooves the Dominion Government to see that precedents for interference by the home Parliament with matters within the Dominion of Canada that fall clearly within the scope of legislative power, either of this Parliament or of the legislatures, should not be encouraged. Of course, nobody disputes the legal power of the Parliament of the United Kingdom to legislate upon any matter of this kind, even though the power has been given to Canada or to the provinces. I refer to the legal power; but the constitutional right to do it is quite another thing. It is wise to have a careful eye that you do not allow precedents for such intervention to be created, and it did seem to us in this particular matter that it would be an unfortunate precedent to establish. The request by the legislature of British Columbia implied that that legislature had not the power which it seemed to us it clearly had. Acquiescence in the request by this Government through its law officers' approval of it and approval of it by the law officers of the home Government and by the Imperial Parliament would stand as creating a strong presumption that the legislature of British Columbia had not the power which we believed it had to deal with the matter. This precedent might be invoked against any other legislature within the Dominion as constituting authoritative recognition of the proposition that the different legislatures had not this power. It is a duty incumbent upon those who are responsible for the control of the affairs of this Dominion to protect the right to deal within Canada with the whole field of legislation so far as regards our internal affairs. I cannot quite agree, therefore, with the suggestion that it is a matter of indifference to us whether the provinces acquire the habit of going straight to the Imperial Parliament and asking them to legislate for the provinces in matters clearly belonging to the legislatures themselves. I do not know that any law imposes that duty upon us, but I do not think that it is a matter of reproach to us that we should feel, as I think all Governments have felt, that it is the duty of the Canadian Government to act as a jealous custodian of the right of self-government within the limits of this Dominion to the extent that that right is conferred upon us by the British North America Act.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I did not intend to reproach the Government at all: I simply suggested that the particular question which came up in this case concerned only the legislature and people of British Columbia. I did not assume for a moment that the Imperial Parliament had been asked to validate any assumed legislation except in so far as the legislature had the power to legislate, provided it was an existing body. I was taking it for granted that the legislature of British Columbia did not ask anything more than that, so that the question of legislation being ultra vires, or anything of that kind, would not be raised. I understand that the province of British Columbia thought that as the term of the legislature had expired, there was really no legislation at all, or that the whole matter was assumption. I quite agree with the Minister of Justice that the utmost care should be exercised to prevent any alteration in the British North America Act. As the British North America Act is the constitution under which the different provinces have come together, it should be jealously guarded, both by this Parliament and by the legislatures of the different provinces. I wish to explain to the minister that that was all I meant, not that the Imperial Parliament should confirm any legislation that might otherwise be ultra vires, but simply that it should confirm what the legislature professed to do and could have done if it had been a properly constituted legislature when it enacted the legislation.

Mr. DOHERTY: The point was that we considered that that very confirmatory legislation was legislation within the power of the legislature itself.

Mr. MACDONALD: There is this further point to be considered with regard to the matter. I quite agree with the minister that if the proposition was to amend the British North America Act with regard to any question that might trench upon the problem of jurisdiction of either the federal parliament or any of the provincial legislatures, the matter should be called to the attention of the Federal Government, but in this particular case it must be remembered that my hon. friend has, to a very great degree, created a precedent in regard to the matter. The proposition that was submitted to him was an amendment to the British North America Act, it is true, but it was not an amendment in regard to any matter which would conflict with the jurisdiction of the Federal Parliament, and I submit with all deference, that it would have been better, and would have probably avoided a question which might arise in the future and from which rights could be inferred and claims could be asserted as to the Federal Parliament expressing opinions with reference to provincial legislation, if the minister had refrained from expressing an opinion upon a question which in no manner whatever interfered with or had to do with the jurisdiction of this Federal Parliament. If the question to be dealt with was one where you had legislation trenching upon federal jurisdiction, the minister would be quite within his power to state the views of his Government, but in this purely internal matter, I question whether the minister has not made a precedent which will be invoked at some future time and which will probably result in a very complicated situation. I think the minister will agree with me in that.

Mr. DOHERTY: I must say that I am glad I made the precedent, and the more the hon. member will show me that that precedent is likely to be followed, the more glad I shall be that I made it. I cannot agree with the view that it is a matter of indifference to Canada whether or not we allow a practice to grow up of abdication by the legislatures of the powers conferred upon them by the British North America Act. I think that if the legislation had been passed by the Imperial Parliament, there you would have created a very unfortunate precedent, and when some other legislature, in the exercise of a power which the law advisers of this Government, would be perfectly clear belonged to it, would seek to ratify some previous legislation of its own, it would be exposed to the suggestion: But you have not such powers; and not only the legislature of British Columbia did not think it had power, since it asked for ratification at the hands of the British Parliament, but the law officers of the Dominion evidently did not think it had, because they passed that request on without observation, and when asked for an opinion, they declined to give any, but more than that, the United Kingdom Parliament considered that the legislature had not power to legislate on such a matter, since it legislated upon it itself, apparently considering such action necessary. All of the provinces are interested, and all of the provinces being interested, I think it is a matter of general interest to Canada in there not being created precedents that are of a nature to throw serious and grave doubt upon powers which they are entitled, as we believe they are, to exercise, and I think it is very much safer to leave to the courts the determination of whether a legislature has exceeded its powers than for that legislature to be in a hurry to admit that it has, and to run to the Imperial Parliament to ask for intervention. If we were mistaken in our view, of course that would be unfortunate, just as it is unfortunate when any legal adviser gives mistaken advice; but in this particular matter, I have no reason to doubt that the view expressed was correct, and that view being correct—and I thoroughly believe it to be correct—I think there was great public interest in Canada to prevent the making of the precedent that would have been made had the legislation been enacted by the Imperial Parliament.

Exchequer Court of Canada—Contingencies, etc., $6,000.

Mr. MACDONALD: I wish to ask the minister a question in regard to a matter relating to the province of Manitoba, the correspondence in connection with which has been asked for, but has not yet been brought down. I refer to the Jury Act, which was passed by the province of Manitoba, and in regard to which my hon. friend raised some exception to the right of the province to pass such legislation. I had an opportunity of looking into the matter in some slight degree, and I was somewhat surprised to find that the ground was taken by my hon. friend that legislation on the statute books of the older provinces of Canada governed trials by juries which should be drawn and empanelled in those provinces by virtue of provincial statutes in terms practically the same as that to which my hon. friend took exception. I would like to know from him as to whether that statute was disallowed or what is the position of the matter.

Mr. DOHERTY: The correspondence was brought down and laid upon the Table of the House some time ago. The Act was not disallowed. I might further say that it is my intention, as will appear in the correspondence, to propose an amendment to the Criminal Code that will meet the difficulty, and what seems to me still to be the possible abuse that might arise by the combination of the provision of that statute of Manitoba with a provision existing in the Criminal Code. Without the correspondence before me, of course, I do not pretend to speak with absolute exactitude; but the suggestion that was made to the Manitoba Government did not proceed at all upon the ground that there was not legislative power to enact this statute. What was pointed out was that, in view of a provision standing in the Criminal Code enabling the Crown to exercise indefinitely, to the extent of the entire panel, the right simply to "stand aside" the jurors as they were called, the legislation that made it possible to summon a very large number of jurors operative in combination with the provisions of the Criminal Code, placed the Crown in a position where it might exercise this right of "stand aside" to the extent of a very large number indeed. That seemed to us an undesirable condition to be in. I do not dispute at all that there has been legislation by other provinces which has created a similar situation, but I am quite free to admit that it had never been called to my attention. It was not legislation enacted since I have held the position which I now occupy, and I may say that I have spent my life in a province where there always was and still is a limitation upon the number of the panel to be summoned. I am perfectly free to admit that this indefinite number was quite new to me. The suggestion that was made to the Manitoba Government was merely that they should not exercise this new power until, this Parliament having met, there should be an opportunity to consider the situation created by the removal of the limitation on the number—a situation which had existed for some time with regard to the other provinces, but to which our attention had not been called. Perhaps there will be a better opportunity for discussion of this question when we come to discuss the Bill which is now on the Order Paper for amending the provisions of the Criminal Code, so as to put under the supervision of the judge the extent to which the absolute right to stand aside shall be exercised by the Crown. When that legislation comes down I shall have all the papers with me, and there will be every opportunity to discuss the matter, which certainly presents an interesting question with regard to criminal procedure, and as to what is understood by the constitution of the courts in the British North America Act.

Miscellaneous expenses, Exchequer Court in Admiralty, $500.

Mr. MACDONALD: I do not want to go into the matter to-night, because I have not the papers before me, but I should like the minister to give me an opportunity when his estimates come up again to discuss the question of the cancellation of the warrant appointing Mr. Justice Martin, of British Columbia, to be a judge in the Prize Court of that province.

Mr. DOHERTY: I am not quite clear how we can very well discuss that matter in this House. It is not a question of an Admiralty judge, though this same gentleman did hold the position of an Admiralty judge, but a question regarding the judge of a Prize Court, and a Prize Court is an Imperial Court. The judge was appointed by Imperial authority, and the action that was taken was by the Imperial authorities. No action in connection with this matter was taken by his Government, nor was there any action that this Government could take. The commission of all the Prize Court judges emanate from Imperial authority.

Mr. MURPHY: Did not the Deputy Minister of Justice appear in the case at some stage of the proceedings?

Mr. DOHERTY: It would be more correct to say that Mr. Newcombe appeared at one stage of the proceedings, under appointment of the Imperial Government. I cannot quite recollect the correct title of his position, but he appeared as the advocate of the Admiralty, and not as Deputy Minister of Justice at all. Frankly, I cannot see what we are going to discuss. There is a motion on the Order Paper, for instance, asking for papers and correspondence in connection with the matter. Now this department has not got the papers and correspondence. I do not mean to say that the legal advisor of the Admiralty has not the papers, but I do not think I am entitled to exercise any control over him in this matter, as he acts under the instructions of the Imperial Government, which also appointed Mr. Justice Martin to be a judge of the Prize Court, he being then local judge in Admiralty, and these commissions from the British Government for judges of the prize courts running to the local judges in Admiralty. For reasons sufficient to them, they revoked the commission they had granted. It was not a matter that we were concerned in at all, nor had any part in. When war broke out and it became evident there would be prize court proceedings in this country, the Imperial authorities asked us to suggest the name of somebody who might act in the capacity of legal adviser of the Admiralty, and we suggested the name of Mr. Newcombe, who is the Deputy Minister of Justice.

[Mr. Macdonald.]

Mr. MACDONALD: On the eve of war there was considerable correspondence between the Imperial and Federal Governments with regard to the constitution of prize courts in Canada. That correspondence is of course a matter of record, and indicates the action of the Dominion Government; I have copies of it. I quite apprehend the point of the Minister of Justice, that this is a matter of Imperial rather than Federal concern. Without my data before me I would not pretend to go into that question to-night. But if the minister would do me the courtesy of enabling me to bring this matter up at a subsequent date I think I might be able to show grounds why this Parliament has the right to know whether this judge signed in accordance with the previous arrangement made in reference to the constitution of the court, and that this is a matter of concern to the people of Canada.

Mr. DOHERTY: I do not want to make an absolute declaration that there is absolutely nothing in connection with these prize courts that might not be a proper matter for discussion in this House. I shall be glad if some proper opportunity occurs to discuss this matter, but I do not quite foresee to what item of the Estimates the matter would be pertinent.

Mr. MACDONALD: Perhaps on some Exchequer Court item, and I mention that because Judge alleges that Mr. Justice Cassels of the Exchequer Court, who is also a judge of the prize court, made an order which he had no right to make, and which interfered with a case before him.

Mr. DOHERTY: There is no doubt, there was a marked difference of opinion between the local judge of the prize court and the judge of the prize court, that is, Judge Cassels, who is also the judge of the Exchequer Court. Judge Martin is the local judge in Admiralty and a judge of the Supreme Court of British Columbia. If the matter can be shown to be one with which we in this Parliament are concerned, I will not stand on any technicality as to the item on which it is to be discussed.

Expenses of litigated matters conducted within the Department of Justice, $13,000.

Mr. MURPHY: What class of cases does this cover?

Mr. DOHERTY: It covers the expenses of conducting litigation by the department which is not provided for elsewhere. The amount spent in 1914-15 was $5,937.60, and in 1915-16, it was $11,778.70. The hon. member is probably aware that while quite a large portion of the litigation is carried on through agents appointed outside, a very considerable portion is carried on in the Department of Justice itself. This item is for expenditure in connection with the latter class of cases.

Expenses under the Pecuniary Claims Convention with the United States, $5,000.

Mr. MURPHY: What stage has that reached?

Mr. DOHERTY: I cannot give the exact number of matters in dispute heard by the commission, but there have been a number, and some of them disposed of. The operations of the Pecuniary Claims Commission have been suspended since the outbreak of the war. We are asking for this vote in case the war closes and the work can be resumed.

Penitentiaries—Dorchester, $108,800.

Mr. COPP: Has the minister received petitions or letters from the guards and other officials with regard to an increase of salaries? And, if so, what is he doing about it?

Mr. DOHERTY: I have had petitions for some allowance in view of what is represented to be the exceptionally high cost of living. So far as the guards and lower salaried officers are concerned, I expect to deal with that matter in the Supplementary Estimates.

Mr. COPP: I am very glad that the minister has taken the matter up, because I have personal information that the salaries paid there make it almost impossible for the men to keep their families in respectability.

Mr. MACDONALD: I was not in when the item with regard to the Yukon was discussed. With permission, I would like to get some information on the subject. I understand there is one judge only in the Yukon?

Mr. DOHERTY: Only one High Court judge. There is a stipendiary magistrate at White Horse. The High Court judge is at Dawson. There is only one judge. He also does the work that might perhaps belong to a magistrate if we had a magistrate there.

Mr. MACDONALD: There are not as many people as there are in a good sized town in the east.

Mr. DOHERTY: No, but we cannot leave them absolutely without any provision. It is only a few years since there were three judges. We arranged for the retirement of two of them when we found the situation to be as it is.

Mr. MACDONALD: There was an item for the Manitoba penitentiary. What is the position in regard to the Kelly case?

Mr. DOHERTY: Kelly is in the penitentiary in Manitoba undergoing sentence.

Mr. MACDONALD: What is the answer the minister gave to the clergyman who passed a resolution in regard to his special treatment?

Mr. DOHERTY: We explained to the clergy that Mr. Kelly is being treated under the advice of the surgeon of the penitentiary corroborated by the advice of an outside physician who has been summoned and that we have acted in accordance with what both medical men have recommended. The papers were brought down and I think the certificates of these medical men were included amongst them, but if not I shall be very glad to bring down the certificates as to Kelly's physical condition and the necessity of dealing with him as we have dealt with him by reason of that.

Mr. MACDONALD: Some of the papers in Manitoba contained statements to the effect that he does not wear the prison uniform and does not conform to the rules, but these facts do not seem to have any relation to his being in the hospital ward of the penitentiary.

Mr. DOHERTY: It is quite true that he does not wear the prison garb. The connection between that and his physical condition is this: The certificates of the doctors show that Mr. Kelly is suffering from nervous prostration, so much so that one of them went so far as to say that Kelly ought to have been discharged. But, I felt that that was a serious matter. At the same time I did not feel, in view of the professional opinions of these gentlemen who are both reputable and competent physicians, that I could entirely override their advice and precipitate possibly a condition in which this man might become insane if his nervous condition should become any further exaggerated which, in their opinion, might be brought about by his being put into the garb and put through the operation of clipping his hair and the rest of it. We have acted in regard to the matter on the advice of these medical gentlemen absolutely as we would act upon the same advice with any convict whomsoever who might be detained in the penitentiary.

Mr. MACDONALD: Will the minister bring down the certificates to which he refers?

Mr. DOHERTY: Yes, if they have not already been brought down. I brought down the papers in regard to the treatment of Kelly and my belief is that the certificates formed part of the file. If they did not I will be very happy to bring them down.

Mr. MURPHY: Will the minister also bring down the papers in connection with the case that I asked about some days ago; that is the release of Edward Levi Baugh which has attracted some attention in Toronto? I am somewhat interested in that case, and I would be glad if the minister would be good enough to bring down the papers similar to those in the Kelly case, the doctors' certificates and the trial judge's report.

Mr. DOHERTY: With regard to the trial judge's report, the established practice has been that the reports of judges in reference to clemency cases, other than capital cases, where the judges report in the performance of a statutory duty, have been treated as confidential. The judge is not bound by law to give us reports upon proceedings in cases of clemency under the Ticket-of-Leave Act and it has been a well established practice to treat these reports as confidential. We have had the matter up since I have held my present position and it came up under preceding Ministers of Justice. It has been the universal practice not to bring down papers in connection with applications for clemency and more particularly the judge's report, the view being entertained that we can expect more outspoken advice, that advice having nothing to do with the legal side of the matter, if the judge feels that his communications to us will be treated as being confidential. This House has sanctioned the proposition that papers of that kind should not be brought down. With regard to the medical certificate I will be very glad to think that over and bring it down. I brought down the papers in this case because they were asked for not from the point of view of any application for clemency but in connection with the question as to the manner in which this man was being treated in the penitentiary. However, I may say that I do not see any objection to producing the medical certificates if there were any. I will look into it and let my hon. friend know.

Mr. MURPHY: Could my hon. friend state, if he is unable to bring down a copy of the judge's report, whether the judge favoured the application for release or not.

Mr. DOHERTY: I am not in a position to state that. The case was dealt with in my absence and I have not had occasion to look it up since. I am not familiar with it.

Mr. MURPHY: When my hon. friend does look it up, will he be able to give me the information about that?

Mr. DOHERTY: Whether the judge was favourable or was not favourable?

Mr. MURPHY: Yes.

Mr. DOHERTY: We have proceeded on the principle that we should not communicate what the judge's view was. Perhaps my hon. friend will recollect that we had a motion a couple of years ago for the production of papers and I then went as far back as I could go and found that there had been a perfectly consistent practice on the part of different ministers of justice not to bring down these papers with the exceptions which I gave at that time and I understood the House quite to concur in the proposition that it was not desirable that they should be brought down. However, I will consider the question whether there should be any objection to saying whether the judge was favourable or unfavourable.

Mr. MACDONALD: What is the attitude of the Government in regard to the discharge from the penitentiaries of prisoners who desire to enlist? I understood the Solicitor General (Mr. Meighen) went west for the purpose of making some inquiry in reference to that. Has there been any policy adopted?

Mr. DOHERTY: The Solicitor General, when he went on his tour of the west did, I think, look into the question of what men there were available for military service. At different times there have been suggestions, although they have never materialized, that it might be desirable to organize a regiment or battalion from among the inmates of the penitentiaries. We have not adopted a general system of granting people tickets of leave conditional upon their enlisting nor have we said we never would do it but our experience has led us to be very sparing in the issue of tickets of leave of that kind. Proceeding with the voluntary system we found that a very strenuous objection came from the parents and relatives of boys going into regiments against the idea of their being put in as associates of men liberated from the penitentiaries and prisons.

One can readily understand an objection on the part of parents where it is forced on their notice that their boys are to be asked to associate with criminals. But more than that, and perhaps this is a more serious objection, there is a large number of these criminals whom no one would think it desirable to put into the ranks. There are certain classes of crimes of such a nature that it is quite undesirable to think of putting the men guilty of them into a regiment where they might corrupt their fellows. Then we have had some experience of releasing men on condition of enlistment, and in these few cases we have found quite a number of desertions. So that we have been very very sparing in the issuing of releases for enlistment. I may say that, where there existed other grounds making for the exercise of clemency, we have treated as one factor in determining a case a man's willingness to go into the service, not imposing any obligation on him. Where we thought the circumstances, taken altogether, justified release and where men have been released on ticket of leave pure and simple and have subsequently joined the forces, we have had very good reports on them, reports which have justified us in making their releases absolutely unconditional.

Repairs to Maritime Road, $1,000.

Mr. HAZEN: I should like to take up one item in the Marine and Fisheries Department in order to have my estimates before the House so that I could go on on Friday if necessary. I have suggested this small item.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I should like to say that it is rather doubtful policy to take an item as a matter of form, because it takes away from members of the House the opportunity to discuss on the motion to go into Supply questions which they might want to bring up. Perhaps the minister would waive that in case any member who is not present to-night should wish to bring up some matter for discussion on Friday.

Mr. HAZEN: Certainly, I should be most happy. This is really being done for the purpose of convenience.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: What is the Maritime Road?

Mr. HAZEN: It runs along the Gaspe coast towards Gaspè. By an arrangement that was made very many years ago, the sum of $1,000 has always been spent on that road. The justification for the grant was that a great stretch of the road runs through an unsettled country. Lighthouses were established along the coast, and in order to get to them with supplies it was necessary to have this road, and while a part of the expense of maintaining it was borne by the municipalities and the local authorities of Quebec, it has been customary for over forty years to give this sum of $1,000 a year.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Why is one part of the Maritime Road under the Public Works Department and another under the Marine and Fisheries Department?

Mr. HAZEN: I did not know it was the same road.

Mr. PUGSLEY: One is the continuation of the other.

Mr. HAZEN: I should like, also, to take one item in the Naval Department. All of the items seem to be large, but we might take item No. 67. We might have the item called and then have an understanding that it shall stand.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I think, on the whole, the minister had better trust us, rather than ask us to trust him. We may have an understanding with the minister that on Friday, if there is no objection and nobody seriously wants to discuss any matter, we will allow him to take up the item, even although the estimates of the Naval Department have not been under consideration on a previous day.

Mr. HAZEN: That will answer my purpose. The hon. gentleman understands my object.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The minister will see what a bad precedent it is, late at night, to get into an item in order to enable him to take it up on Friday, when there could be no discussion on going into Supply. It is rather better to adhere to the rule.

Progress reported.

BRITISH CATTLE SUPPLY CO.

Mr. OLIVER:

Referring to statement in the press of April 27, alleging that a deputation, consisting of Mr. F. C. Fletcher, General Manager of the Union Stock Yards, Toronto, and others, professing to represent the British subscribers of a company with a capitalization of $5,000,000, and with 492,000 acres of grazing land in Alberta, waited on the Minister of Agriculture and outlined plans for the development of the live stock industry for export purposes, and in which it is alleged that Hon. Mr. Burrell promised the co-operation of the Government in assisting production and marketing.

1. Is it correct that such deputation waited on the Government and that the minister replied as alleged?

2. What was the nature of the assistance in production that was intimated by the Department of Agriculture to the deputation of this corporation?

3. Did it consist of a promise to provide said corporation with free use of bulls?

4. What was the nature of the assistance in marketing, intimated to the deputation in question?

5. Where are the lands referred to situated?

6. How much, if any, of said lands are held under lease?

7. If any is held under lease, how many years does such lease run?

8. Has any arrangement been entered into between the Department of Interior and Great War Veterans' Association looking towards the cancellation of grazing leases on land suitable for farming purposes?

Mr. PATENAUDE:

1. (a) Yes. Such a deputation, consisting of the president and other officers of the British Cattle Supply Company, waited on the minister.

(b) No. No request whatever was made by the deputation of the minister in connection with their interview. A general statement only of the purpose of the organization of the company was given in connection with addresses by several members of the deputation. The minister intimated, at the conclusion of the interview, that, while he would be very glad to have his department assist any legitimate undertaking for the advancement and development of the live stock industry, he was in the unusual position of having been asked to receive a delegation which proved to have no specific request to make of him.

2. The nature of any particular assistance in production was neither defined nor discussed by the minister with the deputation of this corporation.

3. No.

4. The nature of any assistance in marketing was not considered at all.

5. No information.

6. The British Cattle Supply Company, Limited, does not hold a grazing lease covering any Dominion lands.

7. Answered by No. 6.

CONSTRUCTION OF ICE BREAKER.

Mr. LANCTOT:

In view of the declaration of the Honourable Minister of Marine, in the course of last summer, at Montreal, at the launching of the ice-breaker J. D. Hazen, built especially to prevent inundations of the St. Lawrence, particularly along the bank of the river in the Counties of Laprairie and Chambly-Vercheres, is it the intention of the Government to have another icebreaker constructed before the next breaking up of the ice?

Mr. HAZEN: The hon. gentleman (Mr. Lanctot) who asks this question is evidently under some misapprehension in regard to the facts. I was not present at the launching of the ice-breaker referred to and consequently did not make any declaration on that occasion. I think my hon. friend must have in mind some remarks I made on some other occasion although I do not know when it was. I may say, however, in answer to the hon. gentleman's question, which is affected very much by the earlier part of the statement, that the matter to which he refers is now under consideration.

GRAND TRUNK PACIFIC RAILWAY.

REMOVAL OF RAILS FOR USE IN FRANCE.

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon FRANK OLIVER (Edmonton): Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask leave to move the adjournment of the House under Rule 39, for the purpose of discussing a matter of urgent public importance, namely, the lifting of the rails of the Grand Trunk Pacific railway west of Edmonton, now in progress.

And leave having been granted.

Hon. FRANK OLIVER: Mr. Speaker, although the subject matter of this motion relates to a part of the country very distant from the Capital, I hope it is not considered to be less important by the people of this part of Canada than it is by those in the part of Canada directly affected. This matter has been brought to my attention by urgent telegrams, one from the Jasper Park collieries, which I read to the House yesterday, and the other from the secretary of the Board of Trade of the town of Edson. Both the Jasper Park colleries and the town of Edson are very intimately and directly affected by the action now being taken. It is nearly six months since notice was first given in the newspapers that the Government intended taking this action. That announcement naturally aroused considerable interest, especially amongst the people most directly affected. When the House was convened in January I took the liberty of asking my friend the Minister of Railways (Mr. Cochrane) if such action were contemplated, and was informed by him, if I remember correctly, that it was not. The people then rested easy and were satisfied that no such action was intended. It was a shock to them to learn that it was definitely and deliberately intended that the means of communication upon which they depended, the existence of which alone made it possible for them to be where they were and to do business, was about to be taken away from them without consideration of any kind whatever, and without information to the public or to the Parliament of this country. While I do not wish to speak in a controversial tone on this occasion, I am bound to say that I do not think it right that this country of Canada and the people of Canada should be governed in that way. Surely when, for good or bad reason, it is intended by the Government of the country to absolutely destroy the value of the property owned by citizens of this country, to take from them the returns upon the time they have employed in their present location, the least that these people and the country at large are entitled to its information as to how, when and why, the reasons for such action in absolute detail. This House of Commons, representing the people of this country, are entitled to that information at the hands of this Government. I am sorry to say that when I brought the matter to the attention of the hon. minister yesterday in the terms of a most urgent telegram from an enterprise that depends upon its business for its profits and to which a delay of only one day means a very considerable financial loss, I was given very little satisfaction. This House and this country are entitled to more than a general statement that this company is going to be taken care of; it is entitled to know how this company is going to be taken care of and when it is going to be taken care of. The amount of money that is invested in this enterprise is sufficiently great to mean that a large number of citizens are affected, and every man knows that in the case of an industrial enterprise of this character, any action that has the effect of discrediting that enterprise certainly must have an injurious effect upon the investment of capital in it. So the least the Government can do when it is taking such action is, by giving the fullest possible information at the earliest possible date, to minimize the loss by eliminating uncertainty. The Jasper Park colleries is an enterprise which was undertaken at the time of the construction of the Grand Trunk railway. The collieries are located absolutely on the line of the railway, they are most conveniently situated. The coal is of a character suitable for locomotive purposes and the enterprise of the collieries is absolutely dependent upon the enterprise of the railway, partly for the coal sold to the railway company for use in its locomotives, and partly by reason of the facilities afforded by the railway for the transportation of coal to other customers.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Is the colliery on the main line?

Mr. OLIVER: On the main line of the Grand Trunk Pacific railway. It is so fortunately situated that in the earlier stages of development it was possible to chute the coal down into the cars of the railway company. There is no doubt that the convenience of location was in large measure the inducement to people to invest their money in the enterprise, and when this Government, in broad, general terms, announces that as a part of its policy those rails are to be torn up and does not vouchsafe to this House or any one else any suggestion as to what else is being done in the matter, I say it is deliberately undertaking to wreck an important industrial enterprise in the province of Alberta—and that is not the business of any Government, no matter who is its leader or who compose it.

This subject has been before the public in the eastern press for a considerable period, and in order that the House may understand the facts, I shall have to ask the liberty of trespassing for a few moments to explain the actual situation. I have seen statements in the press that for two or three hundred miles the Grand Trunk Pacific and the Canadian Northern railway were duplicated, occupying the same territory, and without any reason for two lines of railway. In this particular case I want to say that the Jasper Park Collieries are situated at the foot of Mount Miette, one of the outer chain of the Rockies, on the south side of the Athabaska river. The valley of the Athabaska river forms the eastern part of what is generally known as the Yellowhead pass, and gives entrance from the prairies into the mountains from the east side. It happens that the Athabaska river at that point is spread into a lake, or rather a series of lakes, Jasper lake and Brulé lake, so it is not a matter merely of crossing the river but, if there is to be communication across the river, a matter of bridging several miles, which, of course, would be quite impossible. These lakes run for a length of a little over thirty miles, and it happens that the Grand Trunk Pacific goes up on the one side of these lakes and the Canadian Northern railway on the other, so that when the Grand Trunk track is taken away, as it is being taken away, there is no question that the Jasper Park colleries are left absolutely in the air. Commercially, they might as well be in Palestine as where they are. I have seen the suggestion that where the Government is going to tear up the Grand Trunk Pacific tracks—and where they are needed, if you please—the rails are to be replaced by Canadian Northern rails that are to be taken up. The Canadian Northern runs for thirty odd miles on one side of the Athabaska river and the lakes, and the Grand Trunk Pacific on the other. The Jasper Park colleries are on the south side, and the Grand Trunk Pacific depends largely on these collieries for its supply of fuel. Colleries are being developed on the other side of the lake, one set by the Canadian Northern and another by the Jasper Park Colleries company, so that no one line of railway can by any possibility develop the coal properties on each side of the Athabaska valley in that stretch of the road. When the proprietors of the Jasper Park colleries see the track being taken up, they are told in a most indefinite way that they are going to be taken care of—though they know that the removal of the Canadian Northern tracks on the other side would leave the collieries there in exactly the same position. I submit that the answer given to the question of the Jasper Park Colleries company regarding the removal of these rails is not by any means satisfactory.

I have received telegrams not only from the Jasper Park colleries, but also from the town of Edson, which is a divisional point on the Grand Trunk Pacific railway, 130 miles west of Edmonton. It is the starting point of a provincial wagon road to Grand Prairie, and it has roundhouses and all the equipment of a divisional point. Two branch railroads communicate with coal mines west of Edson, so that Edson takes care of the traffic not only on the main lines, but on these two branches which form a junction with the main line a little west of the town, at a place called Bickerdike—which makes the hon. member for St. Lawrence, Montreal, famous. The population of Edson is 600. The assessed value of the land in the town is over $1,000,000; its public buildings are worth $100,000 and other buildings $250,000. It has a debenture debt of $80,000. Surrounding the town of Edson is a rural municipality with 300 voters and with an assessment of $283,000. Beyond the municipality is a settlement which includes over 1,000 people, who settled there in the express understanding and belief that they were to have the benefit of the Grand Trunk Pacific railway as their means of communication. While there are portions of the line between Edmonton and Tête Jaune Cache where the two railways are very close together, for a distance east and west of Edson amounting to 36 miles, the railroads are not close together. The distance varies in some places from three to eight miles; at Edson the distance between the two lines is four miles, a tamarack and spruce swamp occupying the greater part of the intervening area. It is true that this swamp has been corduroyed by the provincial government, but it is not a satisfactory road, and cannot, without the expenditure of an enormous amount of money, be made a satisfactory road to those people who settled in Edson or north, northeast, or northwest of Edson, depending on the railroad to Edson as their means of communication. If these Grand Trunk Pacific rails are taken up the settlers must go four miles further through a tamarack swamp in order to reach railway communication. Not only the town of Edson, but other towns—Yates, Wolf Creek, Rosevear, Peers, Otley, Niton and Mackay, and the settlements tributary to them, north of the Grand Trunk Pacific track, will be affected. All the settlers in these places will be unwarrantedly, unjustifiedly and unnecessarily incommoded by the removal of these tracks. Their property will be depreciated in value and in some cases absolutely destroyed; the time that they have put in will be largely wasted because of the policy of the Government in removing that railway track. If it is the purpose to take up the Canadian Northern rails and carry them over to the Grand Trunk Pacific the condition is very much the same, though not quite so bad, because the Canadian Northern was built at a later date. But the large Carrot Creek settlement on the Canadian Northern line will be left in just the same position as the settlements along the Grand Trunk Pacific. Tollerton, a divisional point of the Canadian Northern Railway, where there is every facility for transacting the business of an important transcontinental railway, will be in the same position as Edson. In the case of the Jasper Park collieries, the town of Edson and adjoining settlements, the removal of the Grand Trunk Pacific tracks, unless they are replaced, means in some cases ruin and in all cases an enormous depreciation in the value of the property and of the earnings of the people affected. The course taken by the Government is without cause or reason from any point of view except the desire and intention to wreck, physically, the great Transcontinental railway enterprise of Canada, as they have already wrecked it financially.

[Mr. Oliver.]

It has been given out that not much traffic is going over these railroads; that their construction was not warranted. It is true that conditions have arisen since the roads were projected that were not contemplated and that as a consequence these railroads, like many other enterprises in Canada, have been injuriously affected. But at present there are passing over the Grand Trunk Pacific twelve passenger trains a week, equal to anything on the continent of America in the accommodation offered, and forty-four freight trains a week.

I have not the figures in regard to the Canadian Northern, but I presume that in a given time there are more trains running over the Canadian Northern than are running over the Grand Trunk Pacific, and I submit that when these roads show that quantity of traffic under present conditions, it is not fair, nor reasonable, nor patriotic, nor in accordance with common sense, to go deliberately to work and physically to wreck one or both of these roads absolutely without any possible reason.

Just a few words, if I may, in regard to the length of line involved and to the argument that these railroads parallel each other unnecessarily. The parallelling exists between Edmonton and Tête Jaune Cache, the western outlet of the pass, the total distance being 400 miles. Of those 400 miles, the country for most of the first two hundred miles from Edmonton west, although it is not exactly prairie country, is outside the mountains, but for the 200 miles from the point where the two roads enter the Athabaska Valley to Tête Jaune Cache where they leave the Fraser valley and divide, one going to Prince Rupert at the northern point of the coast line of British Columbia and the other going to Vancouver at its southern point, these railroads are traversing the only route that they could possibly traverse having regard to the point of starting and the point of destination. Therefore while I do not wish to introduce any question of policy, particularly in regard to the location of these roads, it must be remembered that the general policy of their location is put forward as an excuse for dealing with them as it is proposed to deal with them now. I have already pointed out that for 36 miles of the first 100 miles from Edmonton west, one road can not possibly serve the interests that the other road serves, and for the first sixty miles from Edmonton west, the Government are so well satisfied that one road can not serve the interests that the other serves, that they do not purpose interfering with it, so that the parallelling between Edmonton and the entrance to the Jasper Pass is reduced to a comparatively small amount, certainly not worth the while of the Government to tear up that portion of the road unless they simply wanted to do that. From the entrance to the pass on the Athabaska to the exit of the pass on the Fraser river the distance is 200 miles, and the railroads must take either that pass or other passes which would not be so suitable to their purposes, having regard to their starting point and destination, and would not serve the interests of the people of Canada so well. From Edmonton to Winnipeg, a distance of 800 miles, that great country, to the development of which Canada looks for its ultimate future and which is traversed by three parallel lines of railway with branches in both directions, with over 100 miles of tributary settlement north of these lines and 100 miles of tributary settlement south for a great part of the distance, can be served to better advantage by railways through the Jasper pass by reason of its gradients and geographical location than by railways through any other possible pass in the mountain. Therefore, I maintain that whether these railroads are together or far apart, the great fact that they are rendering the best possible service to the prairie country on the one side of the mountains and that they are giving the largest possible development to the country on the other side of the mountain is ample and sufficient justification for their location where they are and for their being left exactly where they are.

In answer to questions that I have asked it has been stated that the reason why these rails have been taken instead of rails in other parts of Canada was because the Government, having already taken rails from the eastern section of the Transcontinental, must necessarily send only rails of the same kind and character if the service that is intended is to be fulfilled. Would I be pardoned if I said that such a statement was the absolute acme of absurdity? These railroads are to be built in France, and the rails of the railways of France do not coincide with those of the railways of England nor with those of the railways of Canada any more than the rails of the Canadian Northern railway coincide with those of the Grand Trunk Pacific; and so, when it is asserted that rails of equal quality and similar make must be taken because we have already sent some of the rails of the Grand Trunk Pacific, I can only say that such a reason discloses the purpose in view in the action that has been taken. The Canadian Northern and the Grand Trunk Pacific parallel each other for those 300 miles. When the rails and ties are taken up the road is wrecked; the grades must deteriorate; the bridges must go out; the culverts must become useless, and the enormous expenditure made upon the construction of that road is, in large measure, lost. I have nothing to say against the Canadian Northern or their enterprise, but it is a matter of fact that in the construction of their railway west of Edmonton, while they have used identically the same weight and quality of rails as the Grand Trunk Pacific, they have not built the same character of road. The Grand Trunk Pacific roadbed has cost a great deal more per mile than the Canadian Northern roadbed has cost. The Grand Trunk Pacific railway is built on the principle of cutting out curvature and change of level wherever that can be accomplished; the Canadian Northern railway is built on the principle of taking advantage of curvature and change of level wherever they can be taken advantage of to the benefit of that company as they understand it; so that the Government, in making their choice as to which rails shall be taken up, have seen fit to lift the rails from the line that cost the most money and that is admittedly the best road, and to leave the rails on the line that is admittedly not as good a road and that admittedly did not cost nearly as much money. I am informed in answer to my questions that the British Government will have to pay for those rails; that they will have to pay for the damages that have been incurred as a result of the rails being taken up. The suggestion is that they are going to pay my constituents for damages resulting to them from the picking up of these railroad tracks. My constituents will have a great chance of collecting damages from the hands of this Government under those circumstances, but I say in fairness to the British Government, if there had been any fairness in this matter, surely the Canadian Northern rails should have been lifted and not those of the Grand Trunk Pacific; but the Grand Trunk rails have been lifted, and not the Canadian Northern. Why is it that we must go out to the Rocky mountains, two thousand and odd miles from the seaboard, to get rails to send across to France, when we have duplicate lines running through to the seaboard right here in this fair province of Ontario? These lines are duplicated just as uselessly as the lines west of Edmonton, and without the same excuse, because they do not run through any mountain pass but through an infertile country. I speak, for instance, of the Canadian Northern and Canadian Pacific lines from Parry Sound to Sudbury. Not one foot of ground in all that distance is capable of cultivation any more than is the top of that table, and those roads closely parallel each other. Is there traffic for them both? There is no more traffic for them both than there is for these roads west of Edmonton. But one is the Canadian Northern and the other the Canadian Pacific, and you must not lay hands on the Ark of God.

Mr. HAZEN: Which one is that?

Mr. OLIVER: I could not make the distinction. The Canadian Pacific has a double track from Port Arthur eastward. They were going to double track it all the way to Montreal, and they got it partially completed before the slump came before the war. Then they ceased construction, and the rails of that double track road are lying there still. The taking up of those rails would not affect injuriously the interests of any private citizen. It would, of course, be to the disadvantage of the Canadian Pacific, but the Canadian Pacific has other lines, and I submit that until they find it necessary to double track all the way through, that portion of the road is of minor importance and of minor usefulness. But we do not lay hands on the Canadian Pacific. It seems that the rails of the Canadian Pacific are bored a little differently from the rails of the Grand Trunk, although both are of the same quality and weight of steel.

The Canadian Northern and the Canadian Pacific are parallel from the foot of Kamloops Lake to Yale in British Columbia, a distance of over 100 miles. Does the presence of those two roads increase the development of that part of the country? Why no one who has ever gone through that section would ever suggest such an absurdity. Is there so much traffic over these two roads that one road cannot carry it all? That is not true, either. I am reminded also that from Port Arthur to Nipigon the Canadian Northern and Canadian Pacific are parallel, and the Canadian Pacific is double-tracked for that distance if I am not mistaken. There is no development there, and no possibility of development here or hereafter, now or in the future. So I say the conclusion is absolutely irresistible that this attack upon the Grand Trunk west of Edmonton is simply an attack upon the enterprise, and is made not with regard to the interests of the British Government and not in the interests of winning the war. It is not fair dealing as between the people that are affected, and the people that would be affected by the lifting of rails in other parts of the country. But because these rails are out in Alberta or in the Rocky Mountains, because they are not in the great province of Ontario, it does not matter. I hope we have a House of Commons here that is a House of Commons for Canada, and not a House of Commons for any one province of Canada; a House of Commons that realizes that the growth of Canada depends upon the growth of every part of this country and that connection through the Rocky Mountains by the best possible pass is an absolutely necessary factor in the development of this country both east and west of the mountains.

We are told that these tracks must be torn up in order to win the war; that these rails are required in France, and therefore they must be taken up at once because rails cannot be got anywhere else. Now, first of all, I am going to make an assertion, and it is this: the rails that have already been taken up on the 300 miles of the eastern part of the Transcontinental are not yet in France, nor is there any possibility of their being in France for a very considerable period. If rails are wanted in France, I ask you, Sir, and I ask this House, if they cannot be got, just as rails can be got to be used on roads in the Dominion of Canada. A short time ago I asked this question:

1. Are rails for renewal purposes now required on the Intercolonial Railway?

2. Will the rails so required, in all or in part, be rolled at Sydney or Sault Ste. Marie, under arrangements with the Imperial Munitions Board?

Mr. Cochrane:

1 Yes.

2. To be rolled at Sydney.

Now, if rails can be rolled at Sydney for the Intercolonial, I fancy they can be rolled at Sydney for use in France, if it is desired to roll them at that point. But never mind about Sydney. There are on the other side of the line enormous plants for the production of railway material, including rails, and every man knows that it is only a question of price whether those rails can be procured or not. If the price of rails to-day is $40 a ton, and rails cannot be got at that money, is there anybody who will say that they could not be got for $80 a ton on the other side of the line?

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: Yes.

Mr. OLIVER: Because anybody who says so certainly is not paying due regard to the facts.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: They cannot be got for less than $100 a ton.

Mr. OLIVER: My hon. friend has my answer already. I saw in yesterday's papers that the Russian Government is able to make a contract with firms in the United States for supplying locomotives. Could not they have made a contract for an equal value of steel rails if they had paid the price? I think they could. My hon. friend mentions $100 a ton. I ask you, Sir, will $100 a ton pay the damages to the Grand Trunk Railway Company, to my constituents, and to the people of Canada, resulting from the tearing up of these tracks? I say it will not begin to pay it, and an honest endeavour to do the best that could be done to help the war in France would have caused this Government to secure those rails from the United States at whatever price was necessary rather than tear up the rails in our own country, thereby discommoding our own people, discrediting our own enterprise, and in the end charging the British Government two or three times as much as they should have paid.

There are railways being built in Canada to-day, and there are many more that ought to be built. Rails are being bought for these railways. Rails are being laid now on a road 300 miles in length from Edmonton to Fort McMurray; were laid during the winter, and are being laid to-day. These rails were purchased somewhere, and I do not imagine that the management of that road have more resources with which to buy rails than has this Government. The Government is engaged in the construction of a railway on its own account, the Hudson Bay railway. We have been told that they have slackened construction on that road, that they are not going to push it to a finish. Well, if they are not going to push it to a finish, and at an early day too, I will ask these hon. gentlemen of what use under heaven are these rails that have already been laid, or the rails that are piled up ready to be used, but which will not be used? I am a supporter of the Hudson Bay railway; I believe that that road should be pushed to completion, and pushed to completion at the earliest day. But if the Government is not going to use these rails for the Hudson Bay road, and is not going to finish the road, then why not use these rails instead of tearing up the rails of the Grand Trunk Pacific west of Edmonton?

Hon. FRANK COCHRANE (Minister of Railways): I am more than surprised at the extravagant statements made by the hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver). He seems to know more about what rails are required and what rails should go forward for use at the front than the British Government do. These rails are laid under fire in many cases, and the British Government have asked us to send rails of the same borings and the same kind as before, so that they may be laid as easily and as quickly as possible. And now the statement is made again that we are bound to ruin the construction of the Grand Trunk Pacific and Transcontinental. It is all bosh—nothing but bosh. I have heard a great deal from the other side of the House to the effect that we have degraded the line and all that kind of thing. Why, that is all wrong; it is impossible. It is as good a road as ever has been laid; it has never been degraded in any sense of the word. I defy any one to prove it.

4 p.m.

Mr. OLIVER: Then why tear it up?

Mr. COCHRANE: I would tear up the whole Transcontinental, yes, and every other railway in Canada, to win the war.

Mr. OLIVER: Then why would not the hon. gentleman take a few Canadian Pacific Railway rails?

Mr. COCHRANE: Because, as I have told you, the British Government asked us to send rails of the same kind as those sent before. We sent over 300 miles of rails taken from the Transcontinental, taking up many of the sidings, and rails in terminal points, which are not necessary at present, because they were laid to provide for a larger business than the road is likely to have for many a year.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Are not the railways in France on which these rails are being laid narrow gauge lines carrying light engines for the purpose of moving supply trains?

Mr. COCHRANE: I do not know what railways they are used for—

Mr. PUGSLEY: That is the statement made.

Mr. COCHRANE: The statement made to us is that they want the same kind of rails that were sent before. The hon member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) tells the House, though he does not know anything about it, that the rails of the 300 miles already torn up have not been sent away. It is true they have not been sent across the ocean, but they are at Three Rivers, and the balance of them will go in a very short time. The authorities on the other side are urging us and cabling us day by day to get these rails ready at the seaboard, so that they may be got over as soon as transport can be furnished. The hon. member talks about the town of Edson. I have answered once before that I will look after the town of Edson.

Mr. PUGSLEY: In what way?

Mr. COCHRANE: I don't know. But I have two engineers out there who are laying out plans to that end, and they know more about it than does my hon. friend from Edmonton. I have also said that the Jasper Coal Mines will be looked after. I cannot tell the House just how, at this time, but I hope in a short time to have a map showing on paper exactly how the work will be carried on. I am not going to make a statement about something I do not know about. I am going to look after the different interests along that line, and I am going to carry out what the British Government want, no matter what it is.

Mr. OLIVER: But you don't ask something from the Canadian Pacific Railway?

Mr. COCHRANE: Because, I tell you, the Canadian Pacific Railway rails have different borings. I would like to send him to the front, by Heavens, to lay these rails.

Mr. OLIVER: I want him to understand that I am represented at the front. Is he?

Mr. COCHRANE: I know you are, but you don't talk as if you were. The hon. gentleman's talk is for pure politics, and nothing else. He thinks his chances for re-election are so bad that he will have to make use of everything, turning this whole war into a political game, instead of fighting it out as he ought.

Mr. TURRIFF: That is what the Government has done from the start.

Mr. COCHRANE: No, they have not. We had a lot of second-hand rails on the Intercolonial and Transcontinental, but we want to send over rails of the same kind as we sent before. We propose to take care of every interest along these different roads. If we cannot do it altogether, then the British Government have agreed that they will look after any damage that may occur.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Have the Grand Trunk Pacific been consulted about this and have they consented? Have the bondholders consented as well?

Mr. COCHRANE: The Grand Trunk Pacific has been asked.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The bondholders have a lien on these rails.

Mr. COCHRANE: But the Government are behind the guarantee, I am sorry to say.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I am afraid they will be behind it, if they take the bondholders' property without their consent.

Mr. COCHRANE: I hope in a few days to be able to lay on the Table a map showing how we will be able to take care of the industries along the Grand Trunk Pacific and the Canadian Northern. This is going to cost some money but nothing like the amount indicated in the extravagant statement of my hon. friend. He said we could buy rails in the United States if we paid for them. I say it can not be done; we have tried it. Nor can we buy rails in Canada unless we take the steel companies off the manufacturing of billets to make shells with; and it is necessary, by Heavens, to keep these going in order to win the war. It don't make any difference, anything they want for the war they will get it, no matter what it is.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I congratulate the House, and I congratulate the Government, upon the very admirable speech the Minister of Railways (Mr. Cochrane) has made. It is a delight to this side of the House to have the minister unbosom himself, to take the House into his confidence and let us really know what he has in his mind with regard to this matter.

The minister has done, I think, the very best he could, but in the end he tells us that he is going to look after Edson although he does not know how he he is going to do it. I would like to ask the House if it would not have been better for the minister to have asked for a day or two's delay before finally disposing of this matter so that he could have informed the House—

Mr. COCHRANE: Of course, nothing can be delayed on that side.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The minister says that he is going to tear up all the rails in Canada in order to win the war.

Mr. COCHRANE: No, I did not say that.

Mr. PUGSLEY: If necessary to win the war. That is a very laudable desire and I think we would all agree to it if it were necessary to win the war. We would do anything that could be done, but the question is whether the minister has done the wisest thing that he could have done having that object in view. What is the excuse that the minister gives? Here we have a condition in the West where the line which is being stripped of its rails is a part of the main transcontinental railway connecting the Atlantic with the Pacific and a railway which was built for the purpose of carrying on transcontinental business. It has been explained by my hon. friend from Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) that for a considerable distance in the section of the mountains where these rails are to be taken up, the Canadian Northern runs along one side of a lake, some 30 miles in length, and the Grand Trunk Pacific on the other side, and that there is a large colliery to which accommodation is being given whose development has been created by the Grand Trunk Pacific. I do not care how many engineers the minister gets out there, unless he can replace these rails on that portion of the line which runs past the Jasper collieries, he cannot give accommodation to them. It is absolutely clear from the statement which has been made by my hon. friend from Edmonton that unless the track is re-laid he would have to build a bridge three miles long across the lake in order to connect the Jaspar colleries with the Canadian Northern railway, so that it would be necessary that the rails which he is having taken up from this portion of the Grand Trunk Pacific shall be supplied by rails from some other source in order to give the accommodation that he says he is going to give. Just how he is going to give it he does not know. I think it is very unfortunate that the minister did not learn from his engineers how this accommodation could be given to the town of Edson, the Jasper collieries and all that section of the country before deciding to take this drastic measure of stripping this railway of its rails. The minister says that the British Government wanted these rails. These rails, I suppose, weigh 90 pounds to the yard. The minister will correct me if I am wrong.

Mr. COCHRANE: Eighty pounds.

Mr. PUGSLEY: There are many portions of the Government railway system where the rails are very much lighter.

Mr. COCHRANE: Have they the same borings?

Mr. PUGSLEY: What does my hon. friend mean by borings?

Mr. COCHRANE: Do you not know? Then, if you do not, you ought not to talk about it.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I do not know; I am ignorant upon the subject. What is the meaning of it?

Mr. COCHRANE: Different railways have rails with different borings. The rails of the Canadian Pacific are not bored in the same way as the rails of the Grand Trunk Pacific, or of the Canadian Northern. They particularly asked us to send rails of the same borings so that there would be no trouble in making the connections.

Mr. PUGSLEY: That strikes me as a most absurd statement. Do I understand by borings that the minister means the rolling of the rails, or does he mean the boltings?—

Mr. COCHRANE: Yes.

Mr. PUGSLEY: For making the connections? That is what I thought it was. Can the minister explain to you, Mr. Speaker, how, if 20, or 30, or 40, or 50, or 100 miles of rails were sent over there to be laid, it would make much difference as to what the borings were upon that 100 miles?

Mr. COCHRANE: Well, the British Government do not know what they want, of course, according to the hon. gentleman.

Mr. PUGSLEY: We heard the other day that the British engineers thought it would take six weeks to lay some few miles of railway track, but Jack Stewart, a Canadian, and his fellow officers did the business in four days. I am not disposed to place the judgment of British engineers above that of Canadian engineers.

Mr. COCHRANE: They are Canadian engineers who are laying the railway.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Surely, if there were 50 miles of rails taken from a portion of the Grand Trunk Pacific system, and weighing 80 pounds to the yard, and if there were 50 miles of other rails, all they would have to do would be to make one connection and the rest of the laying would be uniform. There is hardly a railway in Canada on which you will not see two or more classes of rails. You will see old rails, some 60, some 65 and some 70 pounds to the yard, and you will see new rails weighing 80 pounds to the yard, and in some cases 90 pounds. I am reminded by my hon. friend from South Renfrew (Mr. Graham) that some rails from the Canadian Northern railway are being placed on the Transcontinental railway and there is no reason in the world why it should not be done. I know that they have laid new rails on the Intercolonial railway and that there are many miles of the road where for years there was a different description of rail, a different weight of rail and a rail having different borings used from that which was used on other portions of the line. Men acquainted with the practical work of laying rails have no difficulty, and it is all moonshine for the minister to tell me, and to tell this House, that the British Government, or the engineers of the British Government, require that the rails should be of the same weight and of the same borings. It is too absurd and every man in this House knows it. It is not necessary to be Minister of Railways to know that. Any member of this House who knows anything about railways at all will know that the statement I make is absolutely correct. We have had it in our own experience and it is within the knowledge of every man who has lived alongside of a line of railway. I have heard it stated by gentlemen who have been at the front that what is required in France is rails for the building of light railways. I think they are narrow gauge railways as a rule. That is what I have been told. I have not had the opportunity —and a very great opportunity it would have been—of being at the front, but I have been informed by gentlemen who have been there that the railways are light railways and usually narrow gauge. Of course, necessarily, they are carrying comparatively light loads and a light rail would be all that would be required. I think the minister would have been better advised if he had taken rails weighing 60 or 65 pounds to the yard, which could have been got from many of the railways in Eastern Canada, and sent them to the front. But the minister, apparently without touching the Canadian Pacific, without touching the Canadian Northern, without touching the rails which are lying at Hudson Bay for the Hudson Bay railway, goes to the railway which this Government would like to discredit. I say that advisedly notwithstanding that the minister may deny it. This Government started in when the railway was nearly built to discredit it by changing the grades or rather by not making the grades up to the specification and not making the railway the first-class road which the late Government intended it should be. They have not provided proper terminals in connection with it. They have neglected altogether the national obligation which rested upon them insofar as Eastern Canada was concerned to create terminals for the Grand Trunk Pacific upon the St. Lawrence at Quebec and at St. John which was to be the eastern freight terminus of the Transcontinental railway. They have absolutely neglected their duty in that respect. They did not create the terminals at Quebec which they were to do. They made, at great expense, a change which will take away very largely from the usefulness of the Grand Trunk Pacific as a transcontinental road. They have done all this without the consent of the authorities of the Grand Trunk Pacific, and now they go to work, as a final step in the wrecking of a national railway, and take up the rails which are owned by the bondholders of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway, because, if the company is in default, these bondholders have a right to look to the railway, to its equipment, to its rails, to its entire property, as their security. The Government have done that without even saying "by your leave" to these bondholders, who are the ones immediately interested, not merely the first bondholders, whose bonds are guaranteed by the Government, but any second or third bondholders who may have liens against the road. They have no right to do that without the consent of these gentlemen. Therefore, I for one feel bound to say that, notwithstanding the statement of the Minister of Railways, he could have done much more effective service for the British Government in getting rails in eastern Canada where it would not have been necessary to make this break in a great transcontinental system; he would have been able to do it with less expense, and with much less likelihood of the British Government being called upon to pay heavy damages.

I think also it is to be regretted that the minister simply tells us to-day that he is going to look after this colliery and is going to look after Edson, but does not say how. There is another serious phase to this question. The interruption at this time of the operation of a great coal mine in western Canada is a matter of the most serious character.

Mr. COCHRANE: Will the interruption of the operation of that coal mine or the interruption of the prosecution of the war at the front be the more serious matter for Canada?

Mr. PUGSLEY: I should like to see both carried on. I should like to see no interruption of the collieries operation, and no interruption of the war.

Mr. COCHRANE: You do not speak like it.

Mr. PUGSLEY: But I think the interest of the people of Canada ought to be considered also. This Government does not seem to care one iota for the people of Canada.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. PUGSLEY: They think they can get great glory and kudos because our boys go to the front and perform heroic deeds. They think they can get great kudos by sending rails to England. They think they can get great kudos by lending money to the Imperial Munitions Board to build ships in Canada. But they have taken no single step, so far, for the benefit of the people of Canada. They have taken no step to improve transportation.

Mr. NICKLE: Does the hon. member not consider that the Canadian boys at the front, whose condition is going to be alleviated by the construction of railroads, are part of the people of Canada?

Mr. PUGSLEY: I certainly do, but I consider that there are people left in Canada too. We have to-day the spectacle of the interests of the people of Canada being entirely neglected by this Government. Let me give a few instances while I am on my feet. I do this because the Minister of Railways has spoken as he has done. Look at the cost of coal. I speak of this because keeping down the price of coal and supplying coal to our people in abundance is of great importance both in the East and in the West, and any interruption of a great coal mining industry in the West must prove a very great disadvantage. We have learned that several collieries in western Canada are closed. There is very great danger of people being short of fuel, and to be short of fuel in our Canadian West when the winter season comes on might almost bring the people to a state when many of them might freeze to death. Is that of no concern to the minister? Apparently not. Apparently he has not thought of that question at all; he tears up these rails, which are necessary in order to give that colliery an outlet for their product. So in regard to shipbuilding, if the Minister of Marine will allow me to say a word upon it. I do it because it is a question—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. member must confine himself to the subject under discussion.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I am referring to this because the Minister of Railways has made a charge against me, and has said that he would do everything in order to win the war.

Mr. SPEAKER: The Minister of Railways has no authority to vary the rules of the House.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The Minister of Railways interrupts the House so seldom that, perhaps, great privileges should be given to him when he does, and I might be pardoned for following him; but, Sir, I bow to your ruling cheerfully. I say to the minister as a last word, in all sincerity, that he can get an abundance of rails in eastern Canada without interfering with the operation of a transcontinental system. He can get them without interfering with any great industry. He ought to do that, and the fact that he has not disturbed the Canadian Northern railway or the Canadian Pacific railway—

Mr. COCHRANE: I am disturbing the Canadian Northern railway, and the hon. member admitted that we were disturbing it.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Where?

Mr. COCHRANE: We are replacing the Grand Trunk Pacific rails with Canadian Northern rails.

Mr. PUGSLEY: But the minister is not taking up any rails from the Canadian Northern railway to send abroad.

Mr. COCHRANE: No.

Mr. PUGSLEY: He is not doing that. He merely lays hold of the Grand Trunk Pacific railway, and that is evidence that he has but very little regard as to whether or not he interrupts the business of a transcontinental railway. To stop a great railway like the Grand Trunk Pacific while it is being stripped of its rails means a very great deal of damage which somebody will have to pay in the future. The taking up of the rails without the consent of the bondholders is also a matter of very great importance. Will the minister allow me to ask him to submit to this House, if he will, the correspondence which he has had with regard to the furnishing of rails, and also any correspondence or agreement which he has had with the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company with respect to the taking up of these rails. I should be very glad if the minister would do that.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT (Calgary): Mr. Speaker, I, like the hon. gentleman from Edmonton (Mr. Oliver), reside in the province of Alberta. I have received telegrams and letters asking me to investigate the circumstances under which the rails of the Grand Trunk Pacific railway are being lifted west of Edmonton. I have contented myself with making the most careful investigation possible, and I do not propose to enter into any discussion in this House this afternoon as to the past railroad history in this country. I shall tell the House shortly the story as I have obtained it after the most careful investigation. The authorities overseas requested the Dominion of Canada to furnish 300 miles of rails of a given weight. They asked at the same time that the abnormal number of 1,200 turnouts be supplied with the 300 miles of track. Any gentleman who is familiar with railroad matters knows that 1,200 turn-outs is out of all proportion to 300 miles of track. It is, as you will observe, four turnouts to the mile. I ascertained further, not only from what I have seen, but from what I have been told by engineers, that these rails were required to be of great weight, and the turn-outs of equal weight, because the rails are being laid at night under shell fire; they are being laid for a given, definite purpose, and that purpose is to enable us to fight the enemy with heavy artillery rather than with flesh and blood as we have done on previous occasions. These rails it is necessary to lay to save the lives of Canadian soldiers in France and Flanders. Those are facts that cannot possibly be controverted. You ask me why the abnormal number of four turnouts to the mile are required, and I have to say to you only this: I have been told by engineers of eminence now in France who have come here and gone back that a heavy rail is necessary properly to anchor the heavy artillery at a given point to shell the enemy. The heavy artillery requires the heaviest possible kind of rail, and those rails necessarily require the heavy turnouts, which, as hon. gentlemen know, are merely little breakings-off or turnings-out from the main line. Four turnouts to the mile are required in order that our gallant railway construction corps in France—working under conditions such as men have never worked under before; at night, with very little light, the shells of the enemy falling everywhere about them—may be able to provide for the proper anchoring of guns that weigh eighty tons and for the sending within the next hour of shells into the enemy's lines. In view of these facts, I am sure the House will have an adequate appreciation of why we were asked for 300 miles of rails and 1,200 turnouts.

Mr. PUGSLEY: By turnouts, does the hon. gentleman mean what we call sidings?

Mr. BENNETT: Not sidings. Sometimes they are called sidings in this country, but I have called them turnouts or switches. From the line extending towards the German front a short line of rail is laid—sometimes a quarter of a mile in length; sometimes half a mile. Heavy rails and adequate turnouts are necessary in order that the cars upon which are mounted guns weighing in some cases as much as eighty tons may be firmly held and shells weighing sometimes a ton may be sent toward the German lines. It is hardly necessary for me to say that the concussion—the kick, as we called it when we were boys—is very great, and that, consequently, the use of very heavy steel and the exercise of great care are necessary.

When we were asked for 300 miles of rails and 1,200 turnouts, what did we do? The Government of Canada, an integral part of the warring powers, a unit on the side of the Allies, replied: to the extent of our ability, we will supply these rails and turnouts. The Government did not go to the Grand Trunk Pacific, the Canadian Pacific, or the Canadian Northern. They went to the National Transcontinental railway, the property of the people of Canada, because it was felt, having regard to other means of communication, that the removal of rails from that line would cause the least disturbance to traffic and would be a representative loan from all the Canadian people of steel rails for this purpose. So, at various terminals and at switches and sidings, 300 miles of rails and 1,200 turnouts were taken up. These 1,200 turnouts were not all taken from the National Transcontinental; some were acquired by purchase; some were taken from other portions of the Canadian roads. Let me explain where the difficulty comes in. A turnout is bored with regard to the rail that is used on the line. If, it was merely a matter of laying a straight line and using 50, 60, 70, 90 or 100 pound rails, there would be no difficulty. When I went West the Canadian Pacific Railway was laid with 56 pound rails. On some portions of the New York Central between Ottawa and New York, 90 and 112 pound rails are used. If the line is a straight one, you can use different weights of rail as you proceed, but if the line is not straight, the turnouts are bored to match the particular kind of rail used. The rail of the weight and boring used on our lines and the turnout adopted thereto, were those that this Government, in response to the request of our Allies, procured by taking up portions of the National Trancontinental and by purchase.

It is quite true, as the member for Edmonton has said, that all of these rails are not in France. Would to God they were! We should all be glad if they were—but they are not. The German submarine is upon the high seas; transport is becoming very difficult. We have not been able to ship all those rails to France, but, to the extent of the ability of the merchant marine of England and France to carry them, these rails have been shipped to France and some of them that were taken from the Transcontinental line, together with the turnouts that were provided, are to-day making it possible for our artillery to hurl shells into the German lines.

Mr. OLIVER: Perhaps the hon. gentleman will give us the information that the Minister of Railways refused to give, and will tell us how many rails have gone to France.

Mr. BENNETT: It has been thought advisable in war that those charged with high responsibility should not disclose all they know. I do not pretend to know how many miles of rails have been sent or how many have reached France. All I know is that some have reached France, and I am sure, knowing the hon. member for Edmonton as I do, that he, for one, will rejoice that that is a fact.

Mr. OLIVER: The old story—the censorship to protect incompetence and ignorance.

Mr. BENNETT: Then it has been largely in use by my hon. friend during the most of his life. In the light of those facts, concerning which there need be no controversy, I am sure that many a gentleman on the other side of the House is proud that we have been able to supply the rails. I do not think that we should have any acrimonious contention concerning matters of this kind. Why should we? If I read aright the countenances of hon. gentlemen opposite, I do not think they are rejoicing in the fact that we had to take up rails. I feel that they, like myself, deprecate the fact that we are in the midst of a great war. But I am sure most of them believe, as I do, that the welfare of this State and our civilization are threatened. If, therefore, we can do this little bit to save our boys at the front and make it possible for them to become more effective, why in the name of Heaven should we not do it? Why in the name of Heaven should we not rejoice in doing it? Does any man in this House believe that we should not do it?

Having supplied 300 miles of rails and 1,200 turnouts, we were asked for further quantities of the same kind of rail and turnout. There was just one source from which that class of rail with the particular bore required could be obtained, and that was on the Grand Trunk Pacific. There were some, it is true, on the Hudson Bay railway, but they had not the adequate turnouts. So we went West. I was interested in this matter because I received telegrams from gentlemen asking me to look into it. The minister, unlike some of my hon. friends, did not arrogate to himself a knowledge which he said he did not possess. He said: I leave this matter to engineers who know much more than I. He said to them: Gentlemen, I want you to go West; I want you, under the direction of the Chief Railway Commissioner of Canada, who has knowledge of the traffic conditions, to determine how we can best serve our people overseas and at the same time do the least injury to traffic conditions in Canada. The judgment of engineers such as those who dealt with this matter is entitled to much consideration. They went to the Grand Trunk Pacific and they looked the situation over. They found that they could take up the rails to which my hon. friend has referred, and that 600 additional turnouts could be obtained, making a total of 1,800 turnouts, or switches, and 600 miles of track. And what happened? The rails on the Grand Trunk Pacific are being taken up. Rails are being torn up from the Canadian Northern grades and shifted over to the Grand Trunk Pacific grade near Edson in order that the Edson terminal may be maintained and the connection with the colliery insured.

I have friends who have large investments in those collieries. They wired me, and I started out with the assumption that my hon. friend (Mr. Oliver) and my learned and hon. friend from St. John (Mr. Pugsley) have, in that I thought a great injustice was being done. I am now assured, from the evidence of the engineers, that the rails of the Canadian Northern are being shifted to the Grand Trunk Pacific roadbed, and that there will be operated a joint section (which is not a new thing in railway life in Canada) whereby there will not be the disturbance of a single train on the Grand Trunk Pacific through to the coast, and the Canadian Northern trains will go through on that joint section just as the Canadian Pacific trains, in order to make the connection for Toronto, travel over a joint section down here, and just as the trains of different companies travel over joint sections in other parts of Canada.

What happened? We have first of all this requisition for rails, and we have an endeavour on the part of the Canadian people to meet it. If that were all, we could meet it, as I have said, without having regard to weights and borings, but we had also to supply the turnouts. We had to supply 1,200 turnouts with 300 miles of rails and the first turnouts having been supplied, we had to supply the remainder, having regard to the first that were supplied. I am filled with wonder at the marvellous intellect of the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley), who spoke this afternoon about narrow gauge railways, light railways and surface railways. I am sure my hon. friend is too good a patriot to think for a single moment, that any man in Canada would send over to France or England what the people there do not want. What we are doing is to try to send over to France and England what the authorities there say they want, and surely they, whose tracks are being destroyed day after day, know better than does that eminent lawyer from St. John, and I am sure he will so admit. Let us not hope to make a little political capital out of what is a matter of national necessity.

Having supplied these rails and these turnouts, having met these obligations, there was just one other thing to be done and that was this, to maintain traffic in Canada; and to do that, the rails of the Canadian Northern were shifted over on to the grade of the Grand Trunk Pacific, the terminals at Edson being maintained and the colliery connections being assured, and the joint section is now in operation. Let us now ask ourselves how much traffic is passing over that road, because that is a very important matter. Not a single pound of munitions nor a single dollar's worth of that which is a sine qua non to the winning of the war is being carried over it. It is only a new road in a new state of development, but the through traffic over that road has not been disturbed, and the road, by reason of the joint section, will serve the traffic necessities alike of the Canadian Northern and of the Grand Trunk Pacific. Should not that be a complete answer? If you are using the Edson terminals; if the traffic is assured of both the Canadian Northern and the Grand Trunk Pacific; if in order to accomplish that you have shifted the rails from the Canadian Northern to the Grand Trunk Pacific; if the colliery connections are assured, I should think every man in this House would rejoice. My hon. friend from St. John speaks about the bondholders. Was ever anything more pitiful than a great mind directed to so small a thing? Is anything more painful, more ludicrous, aye, more than that, more contemptible than that a great intellect should, in a moment of stress and strain like this, be used in such a manner?

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. member is exceeding the rules of debate.

Mr. BENNETT: I am asking the question.

Mr. SPEAKER: It is not in order for the hon. member to say, by indirect methods, what he cannot say directly.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I think my hon. friend knows a little better than to say what he has said.

Mr. BENNETT: I will put it in this way. Can anything be more tragic than that any member of this House should speak about the rights of bondholders, when the British Government and the Canadian Government have put the collective credit and weight of the resources of the British Empire behind 300 miles of track? That is really what this means. In the midst of a great struggle, we have on the one hand a few bondholders interested in 300 miles of track, and on the other, the combined resources of the British Empire to make good the damages, the making good of which is guaranteed by this Dominion, and by the obligations, not only of Great Britain, but of France. Such a condition of affairs simply beggars description. I cannot keep myself within the rules of order and adequately describe it.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Then the hon. member had better sit down.

Mr. BENNETT: I have no doubt my hon. friend would like me to do so.

Mr. PUGSLEY: No, I like to see the hon. member on his feet.

Mr. BENNETT: Nothing more remains to be said in relation to the question except one observation in regard to the collieries. The collieries have not been put out of business; it is not proposed to put them out of business, and it has not been suggested that they will be put out of business. The cold facts are that the lay-out has been arranged so that the collieries may continue to be served, and, as I have said, my assurance is that unless that could be done the rails would not be moved. I still think that the rights of the citizens of Alberta can be protected without any violent attack being made against individuals, who, at the moment, happen to occupy a place of responsibility under the Crown. I still believe that the interests of the Dominion of Canada are, at this moment, so inextricably involved with those of Great Britain and France that any service that we can render, however small or insignificant it may apparently be, involving merely the moving of a few miles of rails and a few hundred turnouts, should be done so gladly, so willingly, that in no Parliament that I can conceive of within the Empire would a thoughtful, responsible member of Parliament take up the time that might well be otherwise used in finding fault with the patriotic and willing service that is being rendered by the Government that happens, for the time being, to be placed in the position where it can respond to the reasonable demands that are made upon it by those who are directing military operations overseas?

Hon. GEORGE P. GRAHAM (South Renfrew): Mr. Speaker, the words of the chief of the National Service Board strike us with a great lack of harmony. He chastises members of the House for wasting its time in useless talk, but a good portion of his time was taken up in backing in and out of the rules of order of the House. He could not, in this time of stress, keep within the rules of debate, in referring to an hon. member on this side of the House who dared to discuss this question. As a member of this House, I am becoming heartily sick of the way in which every time a member on this side discusses any question, some hon. member on the opposite side challenges his loyalty, directly or indirectly.

An hon. MEMBER: Disgusting.

Mr. GRAHAM: My hon. friend, the Chief of the National Service Board—

Mr. PUGSLEY: What board is that?

Mr. GRAHAM: The late lamented National Service Board. My hon. friend (Mr. Bennett) has no right to lecture us on what is being done in connection with this war. We understand our responsibilities, and we are not going to be frightened from exercising our rights even by the imperious manner of the hon. member for Calgary. He says that we are all interested in the war. So we are, and for my part whatever is best for winning the war I am prepared to support. That is my way of thinking, but there is one thing that is not in the interest of this war, and that is the giving of lectures like the one to which we have just listened.

We should not boast of what we have done to win the war, for none of us has done too much, and none of us can do too much. I was particularly pained at a reference of the Minister of Railways to my hon. friend for Edmonton, for if there is a man in Canada who has done his duty in this war it is my hon. friend who sits to my left (Mr. Oliver). He is represented today by a living presence in the trenches, and he is also represented in a grave in France, and when he rises to discuss a question of this kind he does so because he feels it is in the interests of the people he represents. He has a perfect right to do so, and if sacrifice be the measure of that right he has the right to as full an extent as any man in Canada. We are not helping the cause by flinging these aspersions across the floor of the House about disloyalty. I take it for granted that the heart of the people of Canada beats true to the great cause in which we are engaged, and so long as we are actuated by that spirit let us talk like reasonable men, and not criticise each other as if disloyalty lurked in the breast of any one. The Canadian people are true to this great cause. However we may differ on other things, we stand united for the winning of the war, and we will not rest until that purpose has been accomplished.

Now what is this question over which the Government and the sub-Government have lost their temper? It is as to whether the rails should have been taken up in one particular part of Canada and from one particular railway. No hon. gentleman has suggested for a moment, and I should be ashamed of him if he did, that we should not hasten to comply with the request of the British Government for rails that were necessary to the winning of the war. The question of bringing up the heavy artillery is one we do not understand so well as those who have been to the front, but we are told that it is of vital importance, and I am sure that the history of the war during the last few weeks must have convinced us beyond all cavil, that a great deal of our success depends upon the use of heavy artillery. We all want to do our share, but are we doing it in the right way? I am not going to criticise the Minister of Railways unfairly, but this fact does undoubtedly stand out: the people of Canada are suspicious, and with some cause, that this Government has never attempted to make a success of the Grand Trunk Pacific and the Transcontinental, and when the minister at first blush and without consultation, so far as we know, rushed to that system for the rails that were required, the people began to suspect that that was tantamount to saying the system was no good. My hon. friend from Calgary (Mr. Bennett) says that the rails were of little use because the road had carried practically no war supplies, and that is one thing I am going to charge against the Government when the proper time comes. Having a railway of our own to carry supplies, running through Canadian territory from the Pacific to the Atlantic. the Government refused to use the road for the transport of supplies for the front, but gave the traffic to the other lines. The hon member for Calgary has told me in advance that I am right in that regard.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: I hope my hon. friend followed me. I said that the sections which were affected by the tearing up of these rails were not carrying supplies for the front or munitions of war. I think there are three passenger trains running.

Mr. GRAHAM: I admit one thing, that I am following my hon. friend. He again admits that this traffic in war supplies was given to other lines. When the Government were asked for rails, they went at once to the Transcontinental. Now if, as they intimate, that road was of little use before, they made it of still less use by taking up the sidings. I am not going to say that the Government did wrong; I want to be fair in my criticism, and I would criticise nothing that I thought made for efficiency in the winning of the war. But the long railway address of my hon. friend from Calgary as to the turnouts did not impress me. He says that the Transcontinental sidings did not have the number of turnouts to the mile that were necessary. My hon. friend is right as to the turnout itself, but you can take any rail and have a turnout to fit that rail. The moment the turnout is made, rails of any quality of steel or weight can be adjusted, the only change involved being at one joint.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: They asked for these rails.

Mr. GRAHAM: My hon. friend's argument as to turnouts was therefore no argument at all, so far as railway construction is concerned. His next point was that the British Government asked for rails with the same boring. I am not going to quarrel with that statement. though as a humble citizen I might be allowed to say that the fact of the British Government asking for a particular thing is not absolute proof that it is the proper thing to do under the circumstances, because they have changed their mind on several matters. It is therefore not a sine qua non that it is always right to leave it to the British Government. Why did they ask for these rails? It was for one of two reasons: either they were easier of construction and could be laid more quickly and with greater safety under fire. Now, I have not heard any one say there is any great difference between the time consumed in laying the Grand Trunk Pacific rails and rails of another pattern. The borings and the fishplates are of a different style.

Mr. COCHRANE: The bolts are different.

Mr. GRAHAM: A different boring would include a different bolt, of course.

Mr. COCHRANE: By using these rails there was less liability of a mix-up.

Mr. GRAHAM: I know the two styles of rails pretty well and I have not been told by any one that there is any great difference in the time it takes to lay them. If General Stewart tells me that he can lay these rails more quickly and with greater safety under fire than rails of the other kind, I will say at once that these rails ought to be sent, but I do not take any stock myself in that argument.

As to the paralleling of tracks, the hon. member for Calgary points out that the colliery is going to be looked after, and he chastised us severely for suggesting that we should look after the coal mine in preference to the war. My hon. friend shakes his head; somebody said that, and I think it was the minister. At all events the hon. member for Calgary admits that he looked after the coal mine first, and after that, he did the patriotic thing.

Mr. F. B. BENNETT: I do not know anything about the colliery except that I received a telegram from some one interested in it. I have no interest in it myself of any kind.

Mr. GRAHAM: I was not suggesting that my hon. friend was financially interested in it. But he first investigated as to whether this colliery of his friends would be injured or not, and, finding that it would not be injured—"All right, take up the rails." But here is the position: If the colliery on one side of the lake is to be looked after by taking up the Canadian Northern rails and placing them where the Grand Trunk Pacific rails are now, the colliery on the other side will be robbed of its transportation facilities. You cannot serve the two. I have been on that ground, and I know.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: My information is that all the collieries will be looked after.

Mr. GRAHAM: Then it can only be by taking up the rails and laying them down again in the same place. I have been on that ground within a month and a half, and I say that if the rails are taken from the Grand Trunk Pacific on one side of the lake, and replaced by rails taken from the Canadian Northern on the other side of the lake, the collieries on the side now being served by the Canadian Northern will have no transportation facilities. You cannot have the rails and not have them at the same time. My hon. friend from Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) is interested——

Mr. COCHRANE: But I tell him that in a day or two I will have a map here—

Mr. GRAHAM: But you can't draw coal on a map.

Mr. COCHRANE: You can draw rails on a map.

Mr. GRAHAM: The question has been raised why these collieries should object, as they are not going to be injured. But the hon. member for Edmonton has telegram after telegram to the effect that they are going to be injured. It is his duty, then, to raise the question. He would be doing less than his duty if he did not urge the minister to the fullest extent of his power to see if it is not possible, without interfering with the efficiency of carrying on the war, to avoid impairing the industries of the western country, particularly those engaged in the production of coal.

And now, let me say this as my closing word: Let us discuss these questions with one single eye to the winning of the war—that is the first thing, of course. But when an hon. member on this side of the House, who has done what the hon. member for Edmonton has done, raises such a question as has been raised here to-day, it ill becomes any member to insinuate that he is impelled or inspired by any other than the highest

5 p.m. motives. We want to accomplish what is before us, but we shall never accomplish it if we distrust one another in the matter of loyalty. We have our own ideas, and to these ideas we hold strongly; but for Heaven's sake, in discussing these matters upon which we are supposed to be united, let us stop accusing one another, on trifling provocation, of not showing as much loyalty on one side of this House as on the other.

Motion negatived.

SUPPLY.

House in Committee of Supply, Mr. Blain in the Chair.

Civil Government—Department of Trade and Commerce, Salaries, $133,700.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Will the minister give us some information as to the Commissioner of Trade and Commerce whose salary is provided for in this Estimate. I do not know that any statement that has been made in the House as to this gentleman. Who is he, how long has he been in the service, and what are his duties?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: First let me say with regard to this item that there is no increase in the number of officials; the increase in the amount asked for as compared with last year is due wholly to the regular statutory increases. It will be remembered that Mr. Richard Grigg, who was Commissioner of Trade and Commerce, died very suddenly about a year and a half ago. His loss, of course was very much felt by the department. Under the confused conditions of trade and commerce I have not felt in a position to make a new appointment, and am not quite sure whether I shall fill the position with an officer performing exactly the same duties as Mr. Grigg performed. But there will be an appointment of a man of superior class who will take over perhaps more extended and slightly different duties, in view of the reconstruction period that is upon us.

Mr. TURRIFF: Does the minister think it tends to the smooth working of a department to put men under the deputy minister with higher salaries than that paid to the deputy, who is the operating head of the department? I know that this has been the practice in some cases under the late Government, as well as under their present successors, but it always seemed to me a mistake.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: It does not seem to be fair that you should pin down the department, no matter what its possibilities or necessities were in the light of the service required, or that if you find a technical, or scientific, officer, some one who is required for a very special purpose, you shall be debarred from getting his services simply because you do not want to exceed the salary which is given for a deputy minister. If you took that position and made a hard and fast rule you would bar the possibility of securing the best service in certain particulars.

Mr. KNOWLES: I would like to make a proposition to the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce. I will not exact an answer to-day, but I will make the proposition. I have a Bill before the House, No. 22, which affects the minister's department in connection with the indemnity to be granted to workmen who are injured while in the employ of the Government in terminal elevators in the West. The minister is familiar with that question. Unfortunately, labourers or employees of any kind, who are in the employ of the Government in the elevators at Moosejaw, Saskatoon, or other places, on being injured, have no claim under the Workmen's Compensation Act. Employees of His Majesty should not be in an inferior position to that of employees in any other elevator. This matter has already been the subject of discussion. I doubt if my Bill will be reached. We have allowed the minister's estimates to go through pretty easily, and perhaps he will tell us if he would take the matter into consideration so that we might have the Bill discussed this session.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I have not really seen my hon. friend's Bill yet. Has the Bill been printed?

Mr. KNOWLES: Yes.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I have not looked into it, but I will be very glad to do so and let my hon. friend know.

Mr. TURRIFF: Some time ago I asked the minister if it was his intention to introduce a Bill to amend the Manitoba Grain Act, and my hon. friend told me that he expected to. I have been waiting for the introduction of the Bill. I wish to propose some amendments to the Manitoba Grain Act. I would like to have an assurance from my hon. friend that he is going to bring in a Bill to amend the Act; otherwise, I shall have to bring in a Bill myself to amend it and I would rather not do that.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I am afraid that I cannot give my hon. friend (Mr. Turriff) any more definite information than I did before and that was that I did expect to bring in a Bill. I am having very closely canvassed now certain representations that have been made in reference to the amendment of the Act. I may say with reference to amendments that the number proposed has been legion but not very many have survived the investigation that has been put upon them and these are not at present being pressed, but there are some three or four that I have had called to my attention and which are now receiving the consideration of the Grain Board. As soon as I receive the report from them I will be able to indicate what the proposed amendments are, if any. If it is possible at all to do without amending the Act this year I should be very glad.

Mr. MURPHY: When my hon. friend was discussing the Estimates, did he state to the committee who had been appointed to succeed the late Mr. Grigg.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: No appointment.

Ocean and River Service.—Maintenance and Repairs to Dominion Steamers and Ice Breakers, $1,180,000.

Hon. J. D. HAZEN (Minister of Marine and Fisheries): The appropriations for 1916-17 in this department were $6,355,998. The Estimates for the present year that I am submitting now are $4,894,792, there being a reduction of $1,461,206. The decreases and increases in the Department of Marine and Fisheries are as follows:

Service.	Increase.	Decrease.
Ocean and River Service..		$ 11,000
Public Works, chargeable to capital..		1,247,165
Lighthouse and coast service..		205,700
Marine Hospitals..		5,000
Scientific institutions—meteorological service.. ..	$7,080
Steamboat inspection.. ..	579
	$7,659	$1,468,867
Total decrease..		$1,461,206

Mr. PUGSLEY: These are the figures in the Estimates. Will the minister tell us what the figures are as compared with the actual expenditure?

Mr. HAZEN: These are the figures as compared with the total of the Estimates of last year.

Mr. PUGSLEY: How do they compare with the expenditure?

Mr. HAZEN: I think I had better explain that item by item. I will give the committee the exact expenditure last year in every case. The first item we have under consideration is Maintenance and repairs to Dominion steamers and ice breakers, $1,180,000.

The amount asked is the same as last year. The expenditure in 1915-16 was $1,124,708.21 and in 1916-17 we kept the expenditure down to $962,048.48. We are asking for the same appropriation as last year, although I hope to be able to keep the expenditure below the appropriation by nearly $200,000.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Does the minister not think that he might set a good example by reducing the Estimates to the actual amount that he thinks he will spend?

Mr. HAZEN: The officials of the department, those who are at the head of the different branches and charged very largely with the responsibility, subject, of course, to the minister's responsibility, do not like the Estimates to be cut down to the last dollar. They think it is wiser to have something to come and go upon and that seems to have been the policy that has usually prevailed in this House in connection with the Estimates.

In connection with this vote, for instance, there may be some unforeseen occurrence with some of the steamers that might require a considerable expenditure which we do not anticipate at the present time, and then if we had not a sufficient vote we would have to get a Governor General's warrant. In addition to that, we know that this year we will have to pay higher prices for coal, oil, paints and things of that sort for use on the steamers, as the prices of all of these commodities have advanced.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Is any part of this expenditure chargeable to the war vote?

Mr. HAZEN: No. There is no expenditure under the Marine and Fisheries Department chargeable to that vote, although, of course, there is a large expenditure in the Department of the Naval Service which is chargeable to the war vote.

Mr. MARCIL: Have you the same number of icebreakers as you had three or four years ago?

Mr. HAZEN: The Earl Grey and the Minto, which were used in the service between Prince Edward Island and the mainland, have been disposed of to the Russian Government. Of course, we expect that by next winter the service formerly rendered by these steamers will be performed by the car ferry, as the piers on each side of the strait are nearing completion. Then that service will pass from the control of the Marine and Fisheries Department to that of the Department of Railways and Canals.

Mr. MARCIL: Then they have not been replaced?

Mr. HAZEN: They will not be replaced at present.

Mr. MARCIL: Were the results of the icebreaking operations on the St. Lawrence this year satisfactory?

Mr. HAZEN: They have been about the same as in other years, and I think the results have been fairly good. I do not know that there has been any flooding of low lands, and I think that the icebreaking has caused navigation to Montreal to open at an earlier date than it otherwise would have opened.

Ocean and river service, examiners of masters and mates $16,500.

Mr. HAZEN: This is the same amount as last year. The expenditure for 1915-16 was $13,857.63, and for the year ending 31st March last, $12,880. Of course it is likely that some accounts will have come in since that date which will be charged back to the year in which they were incurred, so that the amount will probably be about the same as in the preceding year. The number of certificates granted was as follows: Seagoing certificates, 13 masters and 67 mates; coasting certificates, 115 masters and 35 mates; inland and minor waters, 131 masters and 67 mates.

Mr. PUGSLEY: What is the average salary paid?

Mr. HAZEN: Most of them are not large, and those who receive good salaries also discharge other duties. For instance, Captain Malcolm at Halifax gets $1,800. P. L. Lachance, at Quebec, gets the same amount. Alexander Cameron, at Charlottetown, gets $600. The gentleman at Vancouver gets $1,800. The others run from $200 to $600.

Mr. SINCLAIR: They have nothing to do with the teaching?

Mr. HAZEN: No, that is a different staff.

Ocean and river service, investigation into wrecks, $12,300.

Mr. HAZEN: That varies with the number of wrecks. The year before last, the cost was $12,241, and last year, $4,807. It will be rather gratifying to the House to know that last year, for the first time in 63 years, there was not a casualty between Quebec and Father Point. The wreck commissioner is Captain Demers, a permanent official of the department and a member of the Civil Service. We have also a wreck commissioner on the Pacific coast who receives $1,500. It was found that to have Captain Demers go to the Pacific coast every time there was a wreck there involved great loss of time and also a good deal of expense.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I think that Captain Demers is a very satisfactory officer indeed, and, so far as I know, he discharges his duties fearlessly and impartially. The custom of having assessors in inquiries is a long and well-established one. I think, however, that the chief examiner, in this case, Mr. Demers, should have absolute and full authority to select his own assessors. In Halifax, where many inquiries take place, it has become the practice of members of political patronage committees to insist upon the appointment of the assessors.

Mr. HAZEN: They have no business to.

Mr. MACLEAN: I think that political patronage should be absolutely eliminated in matters of this kind. A better practice would be to allow the examiner to select his own assessor; no outside persons at points where inquiries are instituted should be consulted as to assistants or asked to recommend them. I know of one or two instances where men who were not qualified were appointed assessors. I am glad that the minister does not approve of that practice; I hope that he will do everything in his power to prevent its recurrence. The investigation of wrecks is a very important matter. The responsibility of the chief commissioner is very great; the future of captains and officers of the ships involved in any disaster is at stake. The commissioner should have the assistance of strong, independent and impartial men; he, therefore, would be the better person to select his assessors.

Mr. HAZEN: I entirely concur in what my hon. friend has said. The wreck commissioner's court should be entirely free from any political interference. My attention was directed, within the last year or so, to the fact that in certain places suggestions were being made to the wreck commissioner that certain persons should be appointed. I at once gave instructions to my deputy that the wreck commissioner should exercise his own judgment in every case; that he should appoint men whom he thought qualified to act as assessors.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: That should be communicated to the wreck commissioner.

Mr. HAZEN: It has been communicated to him. When Mr. Demers is called, say, to some part of the Maritime Provinces to hold an inquiry, orders are issued, signed by myself, for the holding of the inquiry and for the appointment of assessors, the latter in blank. Mr. Demers, when he reaches the place of investigation, selects the best men he can find to act as assessors, and fills in the names on the order for the appointment of assessors. There is absolutely no interference with the authority of the wreck commissioner in regard to the matter.

Ocean and river service—Expenses of schools of navigation, $8,000.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Will the minister state what is being done in connection with the schools of navigation?

Mr. HAZEN: There is no change in the estimate from that of previous years. The amount spent last year up to March 31 under this head was $4,461, and in the previous year $4,067. The item is to cover all expenditures in connection with the department's free navigation schools for the fiscal year 1917-18. Free navigation schools are now in operation as follows: For the whole year, at Halifax, N.S., Captain John Simmons, instructor, $80 a month, and at St. John, N.B., Captain R. C. Cole, $75 a month. For the winter months only, at Quebec, P.Q., Captain P. L. Lachance, instructor, $600 per annum; North Sydney, N.S., Captain James Sutherland, $250 per season; Yarmouth, N.S., Captain J. E. Murphy, $250 per season; Charlottetown, P.E.I., Captain James Lumsdane, $75 a month; Collingwood, Ont., Captain George C. Coles, $250 a season; Kingston, Ont., Captain Steeves, paid by Queen's University; Vancouver, B.C. , Captain Charles Eddie, salary covered by yearly salary as examiner of masters and mates. We pay Queen's University $500 for the season. The university employs a competent professor, gives free instruction, provides class rooms, and pays all expenses. At Vancouver, Captain Charles Eddie receives no salary as instructor, his remuneration being covered by the yearly salary paid him as examiner of masters and mates. The school at Charlottetown is a new school, opened in December last. There was a very general demand for a school in Prince Edward Island, which has turned out a great many sailors.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Was the school there a success?

Mr. HAZEN: Last year three certificates were granted to masters of coasting vessels, four to mates of coasting vessels, and one to a master of inland and minor waters. Not many certificates were granted, but, perhaps, better results will be obtained when the school has been longer in operation. If not, we shall have to consider the desirability of continuing the school. At the suggestion of the hon. member for Bonaventure (Mr. Marcil), a school of navigation was established at Baie des Chaleurs, and the work was attended with some degree of success. Unfortunately, however, the gentleman who had been conducting it went away and we could not get any one else in the community who had the necessary knowledge to continue the school.

Mr. MARCIL: Would the hon. gentleman continue it this year if an instructor to carry on the work were obtained?

Mr. HAZEN: If the results of the experiment justified it, certainly we should be prepared to continue the school.

Mr. CARROLL: The minister referred to the fact that in Vancouver one gentleman acts as examiner of mates and instructor in the school of navigation. I think that that would not be a good system to follow definitely.

Mr. HAZEN: The hon. gentleman is quite right. That is the only case of the kind. I do not think it is desirable that the practice should continue, and we are making arrangements to discontinue it.

Mr. SINCLAIR: I regret that the minister has not taken this matter up with a little more vigour. The matter of enabling our young men to secure navigation licenses not only in Halifax and Charlottetown, but in the towns on the coast of the Maritime Provinces, on the Great Lakes and on the Pacific, is a matter of considerable importance. The question of doing something in connection with the technical school at Halifax was brought to my hon. friend's attention on several occasions, but he does not seem to have made any progress in that regard. We have an excellent technical school in Halifax and we have branches in various parts of the province where men qualify themselves in the coal mining and steel industries. In the town in which I live a large number of young boys, many of them apprentices in the steel works, receive training at nights in the technical schools which are affiliated with the Provincial Technical School at Halifax. There is no reason why in the larger Maritime coast towns some system should not be established by which the young men should learn to build boats, handle and repair gasolene engines and obtain navigation licenses.

This question of technical education is, of course, a big one; but so far as the maritime industries of this country are concerned, I think it could be developed by my hon. friend without very much expense. It is absurd to think that we are spending in the whole of Canada only $4,000 a year in educating our young men for maritime service. The fact is that they have to pick up their education elsewhere as it is not provided by the Government, and even in the city of Halifax where there is a school of navigation, there are private enterprises receiving no assistance from the Government where men are training boys to pass marine examinations. The same thing is occurring in other places throughout the country, so that what we are doing is not effective, and I wish the minister would take the matter up in a bigger way and, either in conjunction with the technical schools or otherwise, would give the young men in the towns along the coast an opportunity of receiving lessons in marine matters. That would be a great advantage to the country, because if we are going to build up a mercantile marine we must have sailors and officers. No later than to-day I received a letter from a gentleman in the province of Ontario stating that it was impossible for him to secure officers for an ocean-going ship. Officers are scarce; they are more difficult to secure now, I suppose, than they ever were before, so that we should be doing something in the way of training officers, and if the minister could think of any scheme whereby this opportunity would be given to young men of Canso, Shelburne, Liverpool, Lunenburg and other places that I might mention on the coast of the Maritime Provinces, it would be of great advantage to the young men of those localities and would enable them to get so far ahead with their studies that they could pass the examinations without going to Halifax or Charlottetown or any of those places to attend school. It is out of the question for a large number of those men who are not wealthy to go away from home in order to attend school at Halifax or any of those other places, and education of that kind should be brought to their doors by some method. That is the question with which I would like my hon. friend to deal.

Mr. HAZEN: In regard to what my hon. friend said in the first instance, I may say that at Halifax this work is going on in conjunction with the technical school. Mr. Simmons there is employed with the approval of the officers of the technical school, and the work is done in the technical college itself, so that we are in harmony with them and co-operating with them in regard to this matter.

My hon. friend says that there should be some general policy in regard to technical education. There is a certain constitutional difficulty in this country in regard to technical education. Education is, of course, assigned, under the British North America Act, to the provinces, and there is no doubt that there are certain provinces of Canada which are very jealous of their rights, and when communications were addressed to them on the subject by a previous Government, they gave their views with regard to the matter and were not prepared to say whether they would favour a Federal Government coming into the field of technical education. I think, however, that is a matter that should be disposed of, if possible, by mutual compromise, and I hope some day to see this country embarking on a large scale on a scheme of technical education, because I believe it would be of enormous advantage to the country from many standpoints, and I do not think any country can become great industrially unless it has a proper system of technical education. I think, however, a great deal of that work can be done by the provincial schools. The technical school at Halifax is a step forward in the right direction, and I understand there is at Toronto a school that is maintained by the city or municipality, and that is also a step forward. But the time will come when the question will have to be dealt with in a large way, and there will have to be a very large expenditure made in regard to it. I do not think it is desirable to have small technical schools scattered here and there throughout the country, but some broad policy will have to be adopted in the future. There has already been a good deal of discussion in this country in regard to this question, and a commission which was appointed has sent in a very interesting report. I refer to the commission of which Mr. James Robertson was the chairman. I have no doubt if conditions were normal, that report would have been considered and probably the question would have been dealt with, but at present, of course, it is not easy to consider such large expenditures as would be necessary in order to deal with the question in a broad manner.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Is the minister satisfied that nothing could be done through the technical school at Halifax?

Mr. HAZEN: The technical school at Halifax, from what I am told, is a very excellent institution, and perhaps something could be done; but it is a school, I understand, absolutely controlled by the provincial government, and as I have stated, under the British North America Act, the local Governments are charged with the duty of education. In this matter, we have co-operated with them just as we have done with Queen's University at Kingston where we have made a very excellent arrangement. As technical education is undoubtedly of great importance to the country, I have no doubt that when conditions become normal, the matter will have to be dealt with in a large way.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Has the minister asked the directors of the technical college at Halifax to develop some public interest in this phase of education? I know it is a very difficult problem, and I am sorry to say it is too true that there appears to be a much lesser interest on the part of young men to secure certificates of competency than there was twenty-five or thirty years ago. The mariners who occupy the high positions do not seem to be as well qualified as were the men of many years past, and that is rather strange, because there is a large demand for men and splendid positions are open for those who will qualify. I do not pretend to be able to give to the minister the solution of the problem. I know in my own province there should be hundreds of men willing to qualify for marine service, but the truth is that very few have any desire to do so. My hon. friend from Guysborough (Mr. Sinclair) has been for a long time developing the theory of establishing a number of small schools, thinking numbers might be induced in that way to qualify. I have always expressed a doubt; I think in a province like Nova Scotia, if there was one big school, then notwithstanding the expense you would probably have a very large attendance, and the association of seafaring men with one another in numbers is an incentive to proficiency and efficiency. I admit, however, there is a great deal in the position taken by the hon. member for Guysborough. This is an important matter and the minister need not be alarmed at interfering because education is a provincial matter. After all, this is more a Dominion matter than a provincial one. It relates to trade and commerce. I do not think a marine education would come under the heading of education in the British North America Act. If the minister would entrust the Director of the Technical College at Halifax with the responsibility of starting and carrying on a propaganda in the Maritime Provinces for the purpose of encouraging young men to qualify for the marine service, I think he would be more likely to achieve success than by any other means. I think the Technical College at Halifax is the most efficient in the Dominion. I know that Mr. Sexton, the director, is a highly skilled and efficient man, and very greatly interested in his work. I am sure he would carry out the work zealously and intelligently, and I think he might achieve some success.

Mr. SINCLAIR: I do not want the minister to think we are talking merely for a pastime, because we are really very much in earnest. I think this work could be done without much expense. The same work is being done successfully and with very little expense in connection with the coal mining industry. There are local schools in all the mining towns in Nova Scotia where young men can attend in the evening and qualify for positions of foremen, etc. By arrangement with the local authorities, the high schools are used for the purpose. No rental is paid, and I believe that a great many of the men who are teaching the scientific branches of the steel and coal industry are giving their services free. This form of education would be of immense advantage to the people in the larger towns in the province of Nova Scotia, and I hope the minister will get the Director of the Technical College at Halifax to work out a scheme in co-operation with the high schools of the province. That would be a first step. If the scheme were not satisfactory the minister could turn it down, but I think Mr. Sexton will be able to devise some scheme which could be worked at least along the coast of Nova Scotia. Will the minister do this?

Mr. HAZEN: I will give every consideration to what my hon. friend says.

Removal of obstructions in navigable waters, $20,000.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: How much is being spend on this item?

Mr. HAZEN: Our expenditure for the year ending March 31 last was $1,870. We have to have this item in the Estimates, because a large steamer might get wrecked at any time in an important channel, and the owners might be unable to remove it; in that case the department would remove it, and make the owners pay afterwards.

Inspection of live stock shipments, $5,000.

Mr. NESBITT: Will the minister explain this item?

Mr. HAZEN: Our department is responsible for seeing that proper accommodation is provided on board ship for live animals. At one time we had inspectors at different ports throughout the country, but there has been such a small shipment of livestock of late years that these inspectors have been withdrawn, and the vote is accordingly very much decreased. Our expenditure last year was $2,401, and this was mostly spent at Montreal in connection with the shipment of horses.

Mr. NESBITT: Was that amount paid to inspectors?

Mr. HAZEN: Part of it. Mr. Delorme, inspector at Montreal, receives an annual salary of $1,200; $300 was spent for office rent, and there were miscellaneous expenses. Mr. Delorme sees that proper accommodation is provided.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: What about the port of St. John?

Mr. HAZEN: There is practically no live-stock shipped from St. John.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Lots of horses have been shipped from there.

Mr. HAZEN: They were for war purposes and were looked after by Captain Lindsay, a paid official loaned to the Militia Department by the Marine Department. Captain Lindsay is superintendent of pilots on the St. Lawrence river.

Mr. NESBITT: He does not come in your estimates?

Mr. HAZEN: No.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Has the cattle trade died out altogether?

Mr. HAZEN: This matter was taken up when we were in England with Mr. Prothero, the head of the Agricultural Department. Only a few days ago he stated in the House of Commons that there is no justification for excluding Canadian live cattle on the ground of disease.

Mr. NESBITT: That refers to stockers. A great many cattle are shipped over there to be slaughtered on arrival.

Mr. HAZEN: Yes. Formerly, cattle used to be sent over and fattened in England. That was stopped by the Department of Agriculture, on the ground that there was disease among Canadian cattle. It has been proved time and again that there was no disease among Canadian cattle, that there was less disease among Canadian herds than among British herds. Mr. Prothero told us that there was no justification whatever for excluding Canadian cattle on the ground of disease.

Mr. NESBITT: The statement he made in the House of Commons a few days ago was published in the press.

Mr. HAZEN: Yes. There is no doubt that the exclusion of Canadian cattle was largely a measure of protection for the stock raisers and breeders of Great Britain.

Mr. NESBITT: Mr. Prothero practically admits that.

Mr. HAZEN: Whether they will exclude our cattle as a measure of protection for their own stock raisers I do not know, but the stigma on our herds has been entirely removed, and I presume it will be followed by the removal of the embargo.

Mr. NESBITT: I take it for granted that not many cattle are shipped, as the law calls for them to be slaughtered on landing.

Mr. HAZEN: Very few in the last year, I think.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I think this is a very proper expenditure for the Department of Agriculture, but it is so small as to make one fear that the inspection is a very careless one.

Mr. HAZEN: Oh, no.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: There should be a very rigid inspection in a matter of this kind.

Mr. HAZEN: The inspector goes very carefully through the boat, inspects the conditions provided for the animals, what arrangements are made for a proper supply of water, and so on.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Is there any control over him, or is it the case of a man who simply draws a salary, with nobody in the Government service to know or care whether he performs his duties or not?

Mr. HAZEN: He always reports to the department.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: What does the department do to satisfy itself that his inspection is a proper one?

Mr. HAZEN: I think the inspection at Montreal must be very strict, for we have had complaints from the steamship company that this man is too exacting.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I am glad to hear that.

Mr. McKENZIE: At the port of North Sydney a good many cattle are shipped that come by the Intercolonial. I suppose the inspector at Montreal would have nothing to do with these shipments. What care is taken by the Government that these animals shall be properly looked after pending their shipment on the steamer? Sometimes these cattle come in the latter part of March or April when the weather is still very cold. They are taken from the cars, but may have to wait a day or two before being put on shipboard. I know that people interested in the protection of dumb animals are much concerned to see that these cattle are not neglected. I presume that the accommodation on the boat is all right, but means to care for the cattle before they are put aboard the boat should be provided.

Mr. HAZEN: My attention has never been called to this matter before. This certainly would not be the duty of the inspector at Montreal, for his duty and that of the other inspectors is to see to it that there is proper accommodation for the cattle aboard the ships. I do not know who would be responsible in the case to which the hon. gentleman refers, but I will make inquiry.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The Railway Act provides for that, I think.

Mr. HAZEN: I believe it does.

Mr. McKENZIE: The inspector who was at North Sydney has gone to the war, and I am not aware that any officer has been appointed to replace him. Up to the time of his leaving, and for many years, inspection was carried on at North Sydney.

Mr. HAZEN: The inspector referred to was not an officer of my department. If a veterinary, he may have been an officer of the Department of Agriculture.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess.

Committee resumed at eight o'clock, Mr. Blain in the Chair.

Customs—Salaries and contingent expenses of the several ports in the Dominion, including pay for overtime of officers, notwithstanding anything in the Civil Service Act, and temporary Customs buildings and rentals, $3,590,000.

Mr. GRAHAM: I wish the minister would explain about this overwork and driving through the Civil Service Act. Of course, we know that the hon. Minister of Customs (Mr. Reid) thinks little of the Civil Service Act; but, as he has practically unrestricted sway on the outside where he has thousands in the employ of the Customs who are not under the Civil Service Act, could he not give an approximate compliance with the Act as regards the remnant in the inside service? Ordinary departments, such as that of the Minister of Railways and Canals, have practically nobody in the outside service, except the employees of the Intercolonial railway which is managed as a railway and not strictly as part of the Civil Service. As all hon. members know who want to place those who cannot pass the Civil Service examination, and to find niches for friends, the minister has had a chance to appoint thousands to the outside service without reference to the Civil Service Act, which he has a right to do, but having this advantage over his colleagues who are not able to do it, has he any excuse for violating the Act with reference to the inside service? What does this mean?

Hon. J. D. REID (Minister of Customs): This is not the inside service.

Mr. GRAHAM: It says, "notwithstanding anything in the Civil Service Act."

Mr. REID: As I understand the application of the Civil Service Act to employees of the Customs Department in the outside service——

Mr. GRAHAM: It is not like the inside service.

Mr. REID: It is in this way: the Civil Service Act was passed by Parliament many years ago for the outside service, and it placed the outside customs officers under that Act. The employees in Brockville or Prescott are what we call outside employees. Under the Civil Service Act; if the law had been lived up to, you could not have appointed a man to a position in either of these towns unless he had passed the Civil Service examination.

Mr. GRAHAM: He might be a temporary landing waiter or something of that kind.

Mr. REID: I was going on to explain how it was done. Employees in the office are supposed to be called clerks and they have to pass an examination. The employees at the wharves or stations are called landing waiters, and they had to pass the Civil Service examination to be employed as landing waiters. That was carried on for a number of years. By the Customs Act the positions of collector of customs and preventive officer are excepted. Preventive officers were exempt, for the reason that they were employees supposed to do other work than that of clerks or landing waiters. Our secret service is under the preventive service. You might have to employ some special man and so on. Then the Civil Service Act limited you so that you could not employ a person over 35 years of age. You can appoint a preventive officer at any salary and any age; he is exempt. It is the same as it is under the Inland Revenue Act; certain officers there are excepted, although they are all under the Civil Service Act. I do not know whether the law was violated previous to 1896.

Mr. GRAHAM: Previous to 1896—yes.

Mr. REID: However, it does not make any difference as far as that is concerned. When there is a vacancy in the outside service—in many cases, not always—the recommendation is simply that so-and-so be appointed, and he has been appointed as a preventive officer and in many instances we have required an examination. Since I have been administering the Customs Department, the line I have taken is this—

Mr. GRAHAM: A kind of crooked line—not straight.

Mr. REID: It is a straighter line than had been followed for some time previously. I have been living as near as possible to the Civil Service Act with reference to examination in the outside service. Previous to the war I tried in almost all cases to get young men. Then, I always had an examination made by the collector or by our inspector to see if, in the opinion of the inspector or the collector, the applicant was qualified. The doctor's certificate, of course, was necessary under the Civil Service Act. That has helped us to get men who were really qualified for the positions.

Mr. SINCLAIR: What about the patronage committee?

Mr. REID: In my county I am the patronage committee. That has been the policy I have followed and if any man passes the Civil Service examination he is promoted and given the position of clerk where the salary is higher than for a preventive officer. I think that answers my hon. friend's question.

Mr. MARCILE: While the minister seems to be in good humour, I would like to ask him if the time has not arrived to remedy an injustice done after the general election of 1911 on the recommendation of Mr. Tancrede Marsil of Montreal, who was my opponent in that election?

Mr. GRAHAM: Did the Minister of Customs accept his recommendation?

Mr. MARCILE: Yes.

[Mr. Reid.]

Mr. GRAHAM: It is worse than I thought.

Mr. MARCILE: He dismissed a man named H. Hamel from the position of assistant appraiser. Mr. Hamel had a salary of $1,300. He had been named a preventive officer at a salary of $1,000 a year, and a year or two afterwards he was given an increase of $200, and he remained in the same position as assistant appraiser, doing the same work as he had done before 1911, and he is doing to-day the same work as he had done for years and years. He is a good officer, he has passed the Civil Service and promotion examinations and I am sure that the Minister of Customs will be just enough to remedy the injustice that he did on the recommendation of Mr. Tancrede Marsil after the general election of 1911, now that Mr. Tancrede Marsil has returned to the old Liberal party with which he pretended to be associated, and now that he has finished with the Nationalists. I hope the minister will remember the recommendation I made to him a few years ago, will recognize that the service of Mr. Hamel is of value to the department, and will give him the position he had before.

Mr. REID: While at the moment I do not remember the circumstances of this case, I shall look up the case and if there has been any injustice it will certainly be remedied.

Mr. MARCILE: The reason for the minister's action was that after the general election in 1911 Mr. Tancrede Marsil convinced the minister that Mr. Hamel had canvassed some electors in Montreal to vote for me in Bagot. I had no electors in Montreal in 1911, and I can prove that statement at any time; the allegation was an absolute untruth. But Mr. Hamel was my brother-in-law and Mr. Tancrede Marsil recommended his dismissal as assistant appraiser apparently for that reason. But as they needed Mr. Hamel in the department in Montreal, they made him preventive officer, and he is still in that position with the same salary.

Mr. REID: Was he dismissed?

Mr. MARCILE: As assistant appraiser.

Mr. REID: He is still in the service of the Customs Department?

Mr. MARCILE: He was dismissed as assistant appraiser and nominated as preventive officer, but he was reduced from $1,300 to $1,000.

Mr. REID: There is a Hector Hamel drawing $1,200.

Mr. MARCILE: Yes, he was given an increase of $200 about two years ago, after I had represented to the minister the injustice that had been done him.

Mr. REID: I now remember my hon. friend speaking to me, but I thought that we had at least partially remedied the grievance of which he complained. The change from the position of assistant appraiser to that of preventive officer does not necessarily mean that the official has been degraded. However, if my hon. friend is not satisfied, I shall look into the matter again, and if any injustice has been done to Mr. Hamel I shall be glad to remedy it.

Mr. MARCILE: That is all I recommend.

Mr. GRAHAM: Will the minister say he will not be prejudiced by any recommendation Mr. Tancrede Marsil may make?

Mr. REID: I do not remember him making any.

Mr. GRAHAM: He was the defeated Conservative candidate, and so he would have the patronage in Montreal.

Mr. ROGERS: As he has returned to the Liberal fold, as my hon. friend has said, of course we have no choice in the matter.

Mr, MARCILE: The so-called Liberal.

Mr. GRAHAM: My hon. friend is trying to return him, but he is not deceived.

Mr. SINCLAIR: The preventive officer at Boyleston, in Nova Scotia, Mr. Arthur Steele, was dismissed, I think, last year. It was very convenient for people in that district to be able to register their ships without having to travel five or six miles to Guysborough to enter their vessels. Is it the intention to appoint another officer at that port?

Mr. REID: Since the commencement of the war I have been reducing the staff as much as possible, and where vacancies have occurred I have not filled them unless it was absolutely necessary. The money thus saved I have used to increase the salaries of customs officials in ports where the work of the department has been increased owing to the war. The cost of living has become so high that the salaries paid seem very small. Then it must be remembered that in many ports where there was some shipping before the war there is now little or none, owing to the scarcity of tonnage.

Mr. SINCLAIR: I am not urging an appointment; I am simply asking for information as to the minister's intention.

Mr. REID: I am not making appointments where I can avoid it.

Mr. SINCLAIR: I am glad to know that the minister is taking an economical view of these appointments, because, so far as I can learn, he has been very extravagant in this respect, possibly the greatest sinner among the ministers. From the public accounts he will find that in 1910-11 the expenditure of the Customs Department amounted to $2,187,174. During the last fiscal year, ended March 31, the expenditure in the same department was $3,685,399, an increase from 1910-11 of $1,498,225, or, roughly speaking, a million and a half of dollars. I do not think there is any justification for this enormous increase, which arises very largely, as I believe, from a reckless increase in the number of the staff. My hon. friend attempted to justify this last year and the year before, but I do not think that he succeeded. While there is no special increase this year, I should like the minister to explain the enormous increase, amounting to $1,500,000, in the cost of the administration of his department since he took office.

Mr. REID: In the year 1910 the customs revenue was $87,596,426, and the cost of collection was 2.79 per cent. In the last fiscal year the revenue was $147,000,000, and the cost of collection was 2.64 per cent. Last year we had to increase our staff very materially on account of war conditions. In addition to that, over 200 men who enlisted prior to November, 1915, are being paid their salaries by the Customs Department.

Mr. NESBITT: In the case of those whose salaries as Customs officials exceed their military pay, do you charge only the difference against the department, or is it the custom to show the whole pay in the departmental returns?

Mr. REID: We charge the difference against the department. Of course, in the case of those enlisted before November, 1915, the whole pay is charged to the Customs Department. Many of our men who have gone to the front were receiving quite large salaries in the Customs Department—probably more than they receive in the militia. One splendid man, our chief accountant, Major Rorke, who has been in the department a great many years, enlisted at the commencement of the war and is receiving his full pay as a customs official as well as his military pay.

Mr. SINCLAIR: I do not agree with the principle laid down by the minister that because of an increase in the revenue there should be a corresponding increase in the official staff. Unless new offices were established in various parts of the country, the fact that a larger business had been done would not justify my hon. friend in increasing the staff to such a large extent. The Minister of Finance handled a billion dollars of gold last year, but, as far as I know, he did not increase his staff. But I do not think the Minister of Customs has opened many new offices; I rather think that he is overcrowding the offices in the cities and small towns. Soon after he took charge of the department he dismissed a young man in my town for the reason that there was not enough for him to do, and shortly afterwards he appointed two stalwart men, friends of his own party, to fill the place formerly occupied by the man who had had nothing to do. Many instances of the kind could be cited in respect of other parts of Canada as well. I attribute a large part of the increase to things of that kind.

Mr. REID: At some of the large ports, especially on the coast, we had to increase the staff after the commencement of war. Moreover, our staff was increased through the employment of secret service men in connection with the war. I have already said that 232 men who enlisted prior to November, 1915, are receiving their full salaries. These men have had to be replaced, because they have come from offices from which they could not very well be spared. The hon. member refers to a case in North Sydney.

Mr. SINCLAIR: I was referring to New Glasgow.

Mr. REID: I do not remember that case, but I do know that I have not put on a man at any port unless I was very strongly urged to do so by the chief inspector, the inspector, or the collector. In every case I have tried to keep the number of men employed at the different ports down as low as possible, having due regard to the interests of the service. I do not think that the hon. gentleman can point to one case where I have put on a man whose services were not absolutely necessary, and any hon. gentleman who has had anything to do with the Customs Department will bear me out in that. I do not admit that at any port in the Dominion we have put on more men than are required.

Mr. NESBITT: I do not wish to take up the minister's time unnecessarily, but I would like to understand a little more clearly the position of men who have joined the army and that of men who have not done so. As I understand it, up to a certain time—and the minister did not mention the time—all men who enlisted were paid not only their salaries from the Customs Department, but their salaries from the Militia Department. The money that was paid by the Militia Department does not appear as salary in the Estimates of my hon. friend, but the money that was paid by his department to the men who have enlisted does so appear. My hon. friend paid the full salaries down to a certain period, and I would like to know what that period was. After that period, he paid the difference between the militia salary and the salary received from the Customs Department, if there was a difference in the favour of the man who enlisted, and he charged to his own department that difference, but the money paid by the Militia Department is charged up in the War Appropriations. Do I understand my hon. friend correctly?

Mr. REID: Yes, I think my hon. friend is right. I will explain the matter again and perhaps make it a little clearer. Shortly after war was declared, an Order in Council was passed by which we agreed to pay the full salary of any official, not necessarily of the Customs Department but of any department of the Government, who went overseas, in addition to his military pay. Suppose an official at Woodstock or any other port enlisted for overseas service, his name is kept on the paylist and the Customs Department continues to pay his salary just as though he were here.

Mr. NESBITT: Up to what date?

Mr. REID: We are continuing to pay it. I am discussing the position of the man who enlisted between August 4, 1914, when war was declared, and November 30, 1915, a period of over a year and three months. That man's pay goes on just as though he were working in the Customs Department. Of course, such men gave instructions that their cheques were to be handed over to some relative, and that was done. Two hundred and thirty-two men have enlisted in that way.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Have you appointed others in their places?

Mr. REID: In many cases we have done so. Many men enlisted from large cities, such as Montreal, Toronto, or Hamilton, where we had to have others to fill their places, but in other places we did not require to replace men who enlisted. Some time in November, 1915, an Order in Council was passed that men who enlisted after November 30, 1915, would be sure of their departmental salary. For instance, if an official employed in the Customs Department were receiving a certain salary and he enlisted in the militia as a private or a lieutenant, and the amount the Militia Department paid him for his services in the militia did not amount to the salary he was receiving in the Customs Department, then we would supplement the militia salary by an amount that would make his total salary the same as though he had remained in the customs service, and that difference that we pay we charge up to the port in which that man was employed when he went overseas.

Mr. NESBITT: That would appear in your Estimates?

Mr. REID: It appears in our Estimates as an expenditure under the Customs Department.

Mr. NESBITT: Will the minister give us the gross amount of that expenditure?

Mr. REID: I have not that this evening, and I cannot say what that amount is.

Mr. SINCLAIR: If the argument is to be used as an explanation of the large increase in the expenses of the department we would like to know how much that amounts to, and what expenditure has been incurred under that head. Perhaps the minister will bring us that when his estimates are up again.

Mr. REID: I shall be very glad to bring that information for the hon. member.

Mr. NESBITT: When those men who have enlisted come back and return to work, do their salaries from both the Militia Department and the Customs Department still continue?

Mr. REID: No. What happens is this: If an official of the Customs Department returns to Canada he will probably be invalided home. We have had some cases where men who have been wounded at the front have returned, and when they come back here they may go to the hospital and it may take them two or three months or more to regain their health to such an extent that they can resume their work. The Militia Department then give them their discharge, and they take up their positions again in the department and are paid only the one salary, the customs salary. Some of the men who return have been wounded and they may receive pensions.

Mr. NESBITT: What is the position if they are not wounded, but simply come home on furlough?

Mr. REID: I have not come across any cases of that nature. I know one case of a young man who was wounded who came home, and probably there are more cases like that. This young man was wounded in the leg and he received three months' furlough. He is at present at his home at London, but his salary is being paid just the same. He is returning to the front; in fact, I think he sails on Thursday. In a case of that kind, of course, we would pay the salary.

Mr. BUCHANAN: I wish to discuss with the minister the removal of Mr. F. D. Shaw from the position of Collector of Customs at Lethbridge on the ground of insubordination. I have not been able to get the papers produced in connection with the case, but I have some of the correspondence here, and it strikes me that the reasons for removing Mr. Shaw are not based on a very good foundation. Mr. Shaw had been in the customs service for over twenty years, and in August last he was removed from his position at Lethbridge on the ground of insubordination; that, without the sanction of the department at Ottawa he had placed a man in a position in the Lethbridge office. It is true that Mr. Shaw did place a man in a position in the Lethbridge office without the sanction of the department, but he did so on the recommendation of Mr. W. S. Ball, the gentleman who is in charge of the patronage in the constituency of Medicine Hat. This is the letter that Mr. Shaw addressed to the Commissioner of Customs in regard to the matter:

Lethbridge, Alta., 28 Aug., 1916.

Commissioner of Customs,
Ottawa, Ont.

Sir,—

The following was handed me on the 26th inst. by Mr. Victor McGuire:

"I wish to recommend Victor McGuire to fill the place recently vacated by F. G. Waddington.

(Sgd.) W. S. Ball."

Mr. McGuire reported here on the 26th inst., and I asked him to call Monday, which he did, and I have taken him on the staff of this office temporarily, subject to your approval. My action in doing so was that he might be posted in some of the port work as Officer Burnett will be applying for his leave shortly.

I called on Mr. Ball this a.m., but found him out of town and could get no further information, but his partner said Mr. Ball had probably received word to appoint Mr. McGuire.

Mr. Shaw appointed this man solely on the recommendation of the gentlemen in charge of the patronage, and he has been removed from office on the ground that he had no right to make this appointment. As soon as Mr. Shaw had been removed, Mr. Ball, the Conservative candidate, who had charge of the patronage, wired the department assuming full responsibility for the appointment of McGuire. This is his telegram to the Commissioner of Customs, Ottawa:

Sir,—

On August 26th, in reply to your letter asking me to recommend a man in Waddington's place, I wrote you recommending V. McGuire, and also wrote Mr. Shaw to same effect. I take full responsibility for this action and wish Mr. Shaw reinstated at once. There are no returned soldiers to fill Waddington's position.

(Sgnd.) W. S. Ball.

I understand that one of the reasons given by the department for removing Mr. Shaw was that they felt that any vacancies should be filled by returned soldiers. But there were no returned soldiers there at that time, and Mr. Shaw, acting on the advice of the gentleman in charge of the patronage, placed Mr. McGuire in the position. He advised the department that he had done so, and later on was notified that he had been removed on account of insubordination. As I have said, Mr. Ball immediately notified the department that he was wholly responsible, having asked Mr. Shaw to appoint McGuire temporarily, pending ratification from Ottawa. Those are the circumstances, and still Mr. Shaw is out of his position, and, so far as I know, there is no possibility of his being reinstated. It may have been a rule of the department that no person should be taken on the staff without sanction from the department at Ottawa. I understand, however, that there have been cases previously where the patronage committee had recommended certain appointments, and the men had been taken on, and the department at Ottawa subsequently ratified the appointments. Mr. Shaw was in this position: he had to please either the local patronage committee or the department at Ottawa, and from the experience all other officials in Lethbridge had had with the patronage committee, I am quite certain Mr. Shaw was anxious to please the patronage committee. Mr. Shaw was appointed, I believe, by the Government of the late Sir John A. Macdonald, and he had been in the Customs Department of Alberta from that time until last fall. In view of his long experience, and of the circumstances I have presented, I think it is only fair that he should at least be granted an investigation into the charges made against him, and I am sure that any impartial investigator with the facts before him that I have here, would not recommend his removal from office. Mr. Shaw had the reputation of being one of the best customs officers in the southern part of Alberta. He had been in the service for years, and had given satisfaction to the business community. But the department, without any regard to these circumstances, removed him from his position, and have not given him an opportunity of presenting his case before any impartial investigator. I am sure Mr. Shaw would be quite satisfied with an investigation into this particular case. From the evidence I have here, and from the conversations I have had with Mr. Shaw, I am sure that he could establish that he was not at fault, and was simply acting on the request of the gentleman in charge of the patronage in the city of Lethbridge.

I understand that it has been charged that Mr. Shaw took similar action in a number of other instances, but he assures me that no complaint had ever been made against any appointments he had made on recommendations of this kind, and that in no time during his service in the Customs Department had any complaint been made against him as a customs officer. Mr. Ball assumes full responsibility for having recommended McGuire, and naturally Mr. Shaw wanted to satisfy the gentleman in charge of the patronage. He followed the usual course of advising the department that he was taking this man on, and following that he was removed from office.

Mr. REID: Before I answer the hon. member, I might say to my hon. friend from Guysborough that the collections for New Glasgow in the fiscal year ending 1912 were $135,558, and the number of officers in that year was four. During the last fiscal year the collections amounted to $800,878, and the number of officers was six. On account of the Russian orders and so forth we had to put on extra men.

Mr. SINCLAIR: What were the figures at the time these additions to the staff were made?

Mr. REID: I can get that for my hon. friend. As regards Mr. Shaw, he was appointed by the Conservative party, so there can be no question of a dismissal for political reasons.

Mr. GRAHAM: Unless a younger and more up to date fellow wanted his job.

Mr. REID: The vacancy occurred some months ago, and I decided to follow our usual policy of appointing a returned soldier to the position. I am still holding the position open in the hope of getting a returned soldier to fill it; I think no one will object to that. The hon. member states that Mr. Shaw has been a satisfactory official, but I may say that Mr. Shaw did not give satisfaction to this department. I have had many complaints against him during the time I have been administering the department.

Mr. BUCHANAN: Has any complaint been made that he did not give satisfaction as an officer?

Mr. REID: Yes, parties have given me that information.

Mr. BUCHANAN: That was not the reason given for his removal.

Mr. REID: This was not the first time that Mr. Shaw had appointed any one he liked. If I remember rightly, my predecessor, through the Commissioner of Customs, reprimanded Mr. Shaw for appointing an official just as he did in this case, I think that a month or two before we did suspend him. He did not then carry out the instructions of the chief inspector. I understand from my officials that Mr. Shaw seemed to wish to run the port of Lethbridge irrespective of the department. Of course, you cannot run a department that way. So, Mr. Shaw was suspended. If I remember rightly, he wrote to the department, or to myself, a very insulting letter, at a time when I was considering the taking up of his case again.

Mr. BUCHANAN: Was not that letter written by a lawyer in Lethbridge?

Mr. REID: It may be that a lawyer wrote it for him, but I remember receiving a very insulting letter. Mr. Shaw certainly was deserving of suspension for the position he took after he was suspended. His dismissal was not for the purpose of putting some friend of the party into his position, but because the officials of the Government thought he deserved dismissal. I have not accepted the recommendation of any one for appointment to that office, but am keeping it open, as I am keeping other offices open, including some in my own county, for returned soldiers.

Mr. BUCHANAN: Did the minister take into consideration the wire that came from the gentleman handling the patronage, to the effect that he took full responsibility for the appointment of this gentleman to the staff?

Mr. REID: The hon. gentleman (Mr. Buchanan) knows that only the commissioner or the minister would have authority to say whether an official was required or not. I have always refused to take on an officer on the recommendation of any one without first having him examined to make sure that he is qualified for the position.

Mr. BUCHANAN: Had not the other course been permitted in the office of the port of Lethbridge?

Mr. REID: Not so far as I am aware. The position I have taken ever since I began administering the department is that there must be an examination by the inspector or, if deemed better under special circumstances, by some other high official, such as the Collector, before an appointment is made. If a man is appointed without an examination, he may prove to be not qualified for the office, and then there is difficulty in dispensing with his services. So far as my memory goes, we have never appointed an officer at Lethbridge without an examination. There may have been exceptions, but I do not recollect any.

Mr. BUCHANAN: I am pretty intimately acquainted with the business community in Lethbridge, and I never heard any complaints against Mr. Shaw as an officer, but since his removal I have heard many expressions of dissatisfaction with the Government's action in his case. The minister speaks of an insulting letter he received, written on behalf of Mr. Shaw. I think I can explain that without mentioning the name of the writer. There is in Lethbridge a very warm admirer of the Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden), an old acquaintance of his from Nova Scotia, and when Mr. Shaw was removed this gentleman was so indignant that he wrote not only to the

9 p.m.

Prime Minister but also to the department. He did not write as a lawyer representing Mr. Shaw, but as an indignant Conservative of Lethbridge, and he is so indignant that I doubt very much whether this Government will receive his support in the next general election. That is where the "insulting letter" came from. And the writer of that letter is not alone; there is great dissatisfaction amongst many leading supporters of the Government over the removal of Mr. Shaw. If there was any complaint in the business community of Lethbridge against the conduct of Mr. Shaw in office, I never heard of it. I have heard of a very powerful concern operating in Southern Alberta objecting to his actions, and they probably have made complaint, but I understand that those complaints are not to his discredit, for he was simply carrying out the regulations of the department. As to his removal, Mr. Shaw's position is simply this: They have in Lethbridge a patronage committee, and unquestionably he was afraid of that committee and was trying to do all he could to satisfy it. When he took this gentleman on the staff, on the recommendation of the patronage committee, I think he felt warranted in doing so; in fact he felt that should he fail to carry out their instructions they would use their influence at Ottawa to have him removed. And now the department dismisses him for that action. I venture to say that in any ordinary business concern a man who had acted as Mr. Shaw had acted, under the conditions that faced him, would be reinstated. I do not think the removal was fair. Mr. Shaw was entitled to an investigation, and, had his case been investigated by an impartial investigator, I am confident recommendation would have been made for his reinstatement.

Mr. GRAHAM: The minister has told us that he is keeping a number of offices for returned soldiers. In the town of Brockville he has made an appointment of one returned soldier, which appointment meets the approval of every person.

Mr. REID: I have appointed three.

Mr. GRAHAM: There is one that I remember. Can the minister tell us how many returned soldiers he has appointed, what is their status, and what is the aggregate of their salaries?

Mr. REID: I could not give the aggregate of their salaries, but up to the end of April 203 appointments of returned soldiers had been made, at salaries averaging $900 to $1,000 a year. And others are being appointed.

Mr. GRAHAM: There is one office, I have been told, which is being kept for a returned soldier—the collectorship of the port of Montreal. It seems to be a question whether the port of Montreal collectorship or the port of Toronto collectorship is vacant, for, on the resignation of Mr. White in Montreal, Mr. Bertram, of Toronto, was sent to Montreal. In my personal communication with people of Montreal, while they have no fault to find with Mr. Bertram as an official, yet they cannot understand why it is necessary to take an official from Toronto to succeed an official in Montreal. They have been told that Mr. Bertram is to return to Toronto, but there is nothing definite as to time or occasion. The situation is a very peculiar one, and if there is a precedent for it I cannot lay my hand on that precedent at the present time. When certain Conservatives of Montreal have approached the department as to whether there was any person in the province of Quebec competent to succeed Mr. White they have been told that the collectorship of Montreal was being reserved for a returned soldier. Could the minister give us any idea as to what soldier he has in mind?

Mr. REID: Montreal is the most important port in Canada and it is very important at the present time on account of war conditions. When it became vacant I suggested, that, like other vacancies, it should go to a returned soldier. It was my first intention to send Mr. H. C. Blair, who is one of our best inspectors, to Montreal.

Mr. GRAHAM: Where is he?

Mr. REID: He is from Ottawa. I sent him to Toronto for this reason: the man had just lost his son at the front and Toronto is not as hard a port to manage at the present time as is Montreal. I asked if Mr. Bertram could go to Montreal and take charge until a returned soldier would come back because it required a first class man. If the hon. gentleman knows Mr. Bertram, he will agree with me that there is no man in Canada better qualified to fill the position than Mr. Bertram. I explained to Mr. Bertram that I wanted him to take that place until a soldier came back. There is no man—no returned soldier—in my mind that I intend to appoint to that position. I am waiting until they come back.

But there are a number of prominent Montreal men who are qualified to fill that position and who are now over at the front. I have heard the names of one or two wounded officers who have been at the front, who have taken a great part and who have received honours for bravery. I have said that if one of these men—I do not care which—returns and is qualified to fill that position, he will be appointed and Mr. Bertram will then return to the city of Toronto. The hon. member knows that if you are holding a vacancy of that kind for a returned soldier, it is better to get some one from outside to fill the place temporarily than to ask one of the officials of the port to take it. If you promote him to the position of collector, it is hard to change him back to the position that he might have occupied before. In addition to that, the number of men on the staff in Montreal who may be qualified to fill that position is limited. While I am administering the Customs Department I will fill any vacancies in that department by the appointment of those who have been injured in France. No matter whether it is the position of collector of Customs of Montreal, which is the highest salaried position in the Custom service. I will hold it for a returned soldier.

Mr. GRAHAM: I am glad to hear the minister make that public announcement; really that is what I was after.

Mr. REID: I made it before.

Mr. GRAHAM: Not so publicly. I wanted to get it on record because these things are better when they are really official and the public understand them.

Mr. REID: I made this very same statement in the House and it is on Hansard.

Mr. GRAHAM: Perhaps I was not here, but the people of Montreal are still incredulous. There are certain Conservatives in Montreal who believe that the minister is keeping this position open for a wounded soldier, but it is to be a wounded political soldier who may now be in the Government and who is going to be wounded in the house of his friends politically. Some people think that this position is being retained with the idea that somebody, some minister—not necessarily my hon. friend—may find it possible to discover himself after readjustment time comes in the weeks that are to follow. I wanted to get the hon. gentleman to publicly admit that it is a soldier who, as he says, has been in France and has returned. I was delighted to hear the minister say that it was to be reserved for a soldier wounded on the European battlefield and that it was not being kept for a soldier wounded in the Government at Ottawa or something of that kind. Now that it has been so clearly defined, the people of Montreal can rest assured that Mr. Bertram is to stay there only until some returned soldier who is qualified, and is a resident of Quebec, will get the appointment.

Mr. REID: If he returns while I am administering the department, he will.

Mr. GRAHAM: He may have to come back very soon. My hon. friend's successor in office may be a person who is not in sympathy with the view of my hon. friend. I want to make sure that it is a returned soldier who is going to get this position in Montreal because that is what my hon. friend has said. What he has announced to-night will help somewhat to steady the feeling in Montreal which is not very sure—I am not positive that it will be sure yet—but in so far as the minister can say, his statement has limited the opportunity for appointment during the next few weeks because he gives us the assurance that it will be a returned soldier who will get the position. Can the minister give us the assurance that that is to be the Government's policy? I do not mean that it is only to be his policy because ministers may go and ministers may come but the Government may remain if it can do so by its own vote and I am anxious to know if that is to be the policy of the Government or if it is to be deviated from if the minister goes out. I want to commit the Conservative Government to this policy with regard to the port of Montreal and not the minister individually because he may not have the power.

Mr. REID: As far as the people of Montreal are concerned, I do not think they are very much troubled as to who will fill this position. I have not any doubt at all that if my health keeps good I will fill the position of Minister of Customs for many years. I am not a bit alarmed about what will happen.

Mr. GRAHAM: You mean you will attempt to fill it.

Mr. REID: I am satisfied that I will sit on this side of the House and fill the position of Minister of Customs.

Mr. GRAHAM: Not fill it—you do not mean that?

Mr. REID: As far as the Collector of Customs is concerned, when I say that as a member of the Government it will be filled by a returned soldier, it means that the Government will carry out that policy and fill it by the appointment of a returned soldier. I only hope and trust that if the hon. member comes into power, if he gets on this side, he will give the returned soldiers the same treatment that I am giving them as Minister of Customs.

Mr. GRAHAM: I am glad to draw that, too, because it is very illuminating. My hon. friend a moment ago, very carefully assured us that "so long as I am Minister of Customs," refraining from committing the Government to it as a matter of policy, he would do a certain thing. Now he has committed the Government and I am satisfied that, in so far as the Government of which he is a member will have power when the time comes, they will appoint a returned soldier to the position.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Does that apply to the other departments of the Government as well as to the Customs Department?

Mr. REID: So far as I know, it does.

Mr. McKENZIE: I wish to refer to the conditions in my own town of North Sydney. I am not going to say much about the number of officials appointed by the minister. He has increased the staff, I think, about 200 per cent. But I have another fault to find with the minister, and that is that he has not treated fairly in the matter of promotions the officials whom he found in office as compared with the favourites of the Conservative party who were appointed to office after this Government came into power. I think that when an old official is doing his work well he has a right to be treated exactly in the same way as the new man who comes into office under a different Administration. The minister told us that nobody was appointed to any position except upon the recommendation of either the chief officer of customs at the port where the appointment was to be made, or of some customs official or inspector. I can tell the minister how these recommendations were made, so far as the chief officers were concerned. They were made simply because those men in many instances were Liberals, holding their offices after the change of Government by the grace of the Minister of Customs and some Tory ward heelers who had the power of dismissal and appointment in their hands, as they believed they had and as I have no doubt they had. When they wanted anybody appointed they would simply go to the customs officer, take him by the throat and say: Here, I am told that if you recommend me to office I will be appointed. Then the customs officer had no alternative; he had no soul of his own; he was trying to protect his own head, and he would give that letter of recommendation that such and such a man should be appointed. That is the way those recommendations came to the minister, and he will find on inquiry that they were given simply because they were demanded by parties who wanted to be appointed to office. In North Sydney he will find that there were only five officials doing the whole work of the department in 1911 before the change of Government. To-day there are ten men doing the same work. I submit that there was no increase in the revenue at the port of North Sydney that would justify such a large increase in the number of officials appointed to do that work. My complaint is in reference to one of the oldest officers there, an officer named McDonald, a good official, a man against whom there has never been one black mark, so far as faithful service to the department is concerned. The moment the change of Government took place, there ceased to be any notice given to him or any advance in his pay. Younger men who came into the service nine or ten years after his appointment, are to-day enjoying larger salaries than he is enjoying, and they have been advanced in their pay year after year since their appointment. Since the change of Government, Mr. McDonald stands out as a marked man, and not one dollar of increase has been given to him. I submit that this is not fair treatment, I was going to say that it was not manly treatment, and if recommendations for increases of salary are made as the minister says, by officers in his own department, I want to know by what philosophy or what sense of smell, if I may use the expression, they can detect from the Customs Department here at Ottawa the difference between John McDonald and the other officials in the town of North Sydney, so that they can promote all others who are Tories and leave McDonald behind. This I feel should be brought to the attention of the minister, and I do not think he can defend conduct of that kind. I would also want to know why, when the offices were not enlarged, with the same buildings, the same work, the same offices, it was necessary to have ten men to do the work which was accomplished and satisfactorily performed by five men in 1911. At the town of Sydney Mines the same thing occurs. There was only one man there before and there has been an increase of 100 per cent; there are now two men doing the work of one, possibly on the recommendation of somebody who wanted to get a position, when one would have been sufficient. I submit that too many appointments have been made and that unfair treatment has been meted out to the Liberals who had been occupying positions before the change of Government took place.

Mr. REID: I hardly think the hon. member is fair in his criticism in so far as that port is concerned. He stated there were ten men on the pay-lists at that port instead of six. In counting the ten he is including Mr. Brennan, who is overseas, and of course is not at work at that port, so it would mean nine men, or an increase of three men. I find that on the 16th of May, 1912, the collector ot North Sydney wrote the department that the Reid-Newfoundland line intended placing an additional vessel on the route between Port aux Basques and North Sydney, making a daily service, and they wanted another man to attend to that service.

Mr. McKENZIE: That is just what I say, a man wanted the office and he made the collector write the letter.

Mr. REID: In addition to that, on the 29th January, 1915, the collector wrote the department asking for the appointment of "an officer whose duty would be to board all shipping and report same, and keep records and make annual reports to the department, subject to the collector as Officer Foran had to spend most of his time at inside work." Then, on account of war conditions, it was necessary to have extra employees at that port. So far as the treatment of officers is concerned, the hon. member states that I have not treated the Liberal officers fairly, or that I have given preference to those who have been appointed since the change of Government. I have before me the record of the staff at North Sydney. The collector is Joseph McPherson, who receives a salary of $1,600 per annum, overtime $295, and for services in connection with Inland Revenue, $347. Mr. Brennan is overseas; we pay him his salary, $950. Mr. J. H. Cameron was appointed in 1913 as appraiser and gauger at $1,200 a year. I would say that that is not a large salary for the position.

Mr. McKENZIE: How did you get along previously without that official?

Mr. REID: The Commissioner of Customs, who was there himself and looked into the matter recommended the employment of an appraiser and gauger at North Sydney. Mr. John Cogan was appointed in May, 1914, at a salary of $800; his overtime pay last year was $281.10. Mr. McDonald, who, with Mr. Cogan, is acting as landing waiter, receives a salary of $800; his overtime pay last year was $284.10. These gentlemen, one a Liberal appointee, and the other a Conservative, are receiving practically the same salary. Mr. David Edwards, clerk, receives $900 a year; his overtime last year was $292.80. Clerks rank higher in the service than landing waiters, and receive a higher salary. Mr. F. E. Jackson receives $1,000 and his last year's overtime was $308.10. He is a clerk in the long room. Mr. James McLeod, whose salary is $800, does not appear to have received any overtime pay. Mr. Hector W. McNeil was appointed in 1915; last year he received $900 as salary and $124.20 as overtime. His salary and overtime, therefore, amount to less than the remuneration given to Mr. McDonald or to Mr. Cogan. Mr. Angus Young, who patrols the harbour, boards vessels, and reports same, received $1,000 and $499.50 overtime. That is the whole of the North Sydney staff. The salaries paid to the landing waiters are the same as those paid prior to the war; they are the salaries of that class. I have taken up the matter of increasing the salaries of those who receive less than $900; if this matter had come up a few days later, the landing waiters at North Sydney would probably have been among those recommended for an increase. Having regard to war conditions, the salaries of many of the officials are really low. I feel very strongly that something should be done to help many of those who are getting these small salaries. In many instances we have been able to increase the salaries owing to the saving made in reducing the staff at certain places. Some proposed increases are now before Council, and from time to time we shall endeavour to increase the salaries of those who are in this $800 class.

Mr. McKENZIE: The minister did not explain the point of my criticism. He has not stated why every one of these ten men received an increase of salary except Mr.

McDonald, who is the only Liberal among them. This action shows that the partyism which has characterized my hon. friend's administration of the department ever since he took office has been visited upon this man McDonald. The man whom they got to perjure himself in an attempt to find fault against McDonald was committed to penitentiary for perjury. The minister did not explain who was appointed to meet the new boat. McDonald used to meet the boat when only one was running; if this man Mr. Edwards does anything outside he meets the other boat. McDonald has been in the service about 20 years, while Edwards has been in the service only a few years. Edwards gets a larger salary than McDonald simply because he is a pet of the Administration. McDonald is still in the service because those who were seeking to have him dismissed could find no other man to perjure himself against him. The minister cannot defend his position; he might as well say: yes, we have singled this man out just as we single out everybody who is not a Conservative and try to starve him out of house and home.

Mr. REID: I think that my hon. friend is hardly fair in his assertions. He says that I have increased the salaries of all those who have been appointed since we came into power. Mr. Cogan was appointed on May 18, 1914 at a salary of $800. This, with the overtime, is practically the same as the amount received by Mr. McDonald.

Mr. McKENZIE: Has length of service nothing to do with promotion?

Mr. REID: I think it is hardly fair for the hon. gentleman to say that we have promoted every man who was appointed by this Government and have allowed the Liberals to remain where they were. As to the additions to the staff, two of the new appointments were asked for, as I have said, by the collector of customs for the reasons stated. The collector wrote the commissioner urging that two men be appointed, but having regard to war conditions, we could not then see why they should be appointed at the present time. The commissioner, however, on his visit to North Sydney, after looking over the port, considered it was in the interest of the service that an appraiser should be appointed. All that I know about the matter is that the collector urged that two more men be appointed; the officials of the department acting on his advice, so far as I know, finally decided that those appointments were necessary, and we appointed the two men that I have named, and it was at the request of the commissioner that I appointed the appraiser. The hon. member is hardly fair in his criticism of me so far as filling the positions in that port or any treatment of the officers is concerned. As for Mr. McDonald, I cannot remember all the circumstances, but if Mr. McDonald was an appointee of the previous Government, he is still in his position, and if I had such a feeling as the hon. member states I have, I might have had him dismissed, but I retained him in that position.

Mr. McKENZIE: As I stated, you could not get any evidence against him except that of a man who perjured himself and who was sent to the penitentiary for perjury. You did not dare to try the case against him the second time.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Do I understand that the Minister of Customs does not permit any politics to enter his mind in the administration of his department? Is that the rule?

Mr. REID: Always the rule.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I wish the minister would consult me about customs matters in the port of Halifax, because I would be pleased to advise him, and I think I could give him very good advice. Might I have the promise that I shall be consulted about such matters in the future?

Mr. REID: I have no objection to that, and I shall be very glad to have the hon. member's advice.

Mr. GRAHAM: The minister will ask for your advice after an appointment is made.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I wish to make an inquiry for the purpose of eliciting some information in regard to a matter about which I know very little. In the British Columbia papers I have from time to time noticed that applications are made to the Department of Customs for the appointment of a customs official at the port of New York. I understand that the purpose of this requested appointment is to facilitate shipments originating on the Pacific coast to eastern Canadian points via American ports. To put the matter in a concrete form, I understand that if a shipper of Canadian produce on the Pacific coast desires to ship to the port of Montreal in the winter, he must tranship at some American port, and he desires that there be a Canadian customs official at that port in order to facilitate transhipments and to enable him to escape some onerous customs regulations and, I suppose, the payment of duty. I do not pretend to be well informed on the matter, and I am rather anxious to understand exactly the nature of the request made by the Vancouver Board of Trade and the boards of trade of various towns of British Columbia. I wish the minister would be good enough to explain the details of the request and the position of the department on the matter.

Mr. REID: For some little time there has been such an agitation in British Columbia. It was started, I believe, by the Maple Leaf line running from New York to San Francisco and Vancouver. What they asked the department to do was to place a customs officer at New York and allow them to ship their products, say from Ontario and the lower provinces, by rail to New York, where they would be placed in a vessel, for shipment to Vancouver. The Board of Trade, as I understand the matter, said that the shipments would be made only in British vessels. The bonding privileges between the two countries are carried on in this manner: the goods may be shipped from one point in Canada to another through American territory, but in such cases, the freight cars are sealed when they leave Canada, and when they re-enter Canadian territory, the seals are broken by a customs official, so that there is no question that the goods are in the same condition as when they left Canada. There were different reasons why I could hardly see that it would be in the interest of Canada to grant that request. One reason was that it would be difficult to carry it out in the way of bonding the goods, the same as we do in the case of goods shipped by rail, because when the goods left Canada they would be placed on a vessel, and the part of the vessel in which the goods were could not be sealed.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Might the goods not bear a mark?

Mr REID: You might put a mark on them, but still that mark might be obliterated. Another reason was this: we could not put an officer in the port of New York on the distinct understanding that the traffic between New York and Vancouver would be carried only by British vessels, because if we were to attempt to do that, we might create difficulties with the United States Government. Then again, it did not seem to me to be fair that our products in eastern Canada, products that we feel British Columbia should have, and the products in British Columbia that we should have in eastern Canada, that is, goods that should be transported by water on account of the cheapness of the article, should have to be shipped from one part of the Dominion to the other, on foreign vessels, or by means of other transportation in the hands of foreigners. British Columbia and eastern Canada should have every facility of water transportation, but in the summer time shipments should be made in vessels coming to Montreal, St. John or Halifax. The port would be Montreal, if the goods came from Quebec or vicinity, and St. John or Halifax, if the goods came from the lower provinces. From those ports the vessels would carry the cargoes around to Vancouver, and vice versa when the freight is from the West the vessels would come from Vancouver to those ports that I have mentioned. After the war broke out it was impossible to get vessels to engage in that trade. Freight rates have gone up enormously, and I do not think there is any possibility of getting either British or American vessels for that service while the war is on.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: That does not affect the principle at all.

Mr. REID: It is, therefore, of no advantage to consider the placing of an officer at New York at the present time.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I understand that British Columbia made a request for the appointment of such an official long before the war. The question is bound to come up again.

Mr. REID: A request was made a short time before the war, but there were the objections that I have stated. Believing that it would be in the interests of our Atlantic and Pacific ports, I suggested to the Government that we give a contract for two vessels to start this service.

Mr. GRAHAM: Will they be subsidized, or Government steamers?

Mr. REID: Government steamers.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: That will not meet the difficulty. In the case of a ship, for instance, landing at Halifax with a cargo destined for Toronto or Hamilton, the minister suggests that the cargo be landed at Halifax and proceed by rail to Toronto or Hamilton. Now the shipper might not be able to stand the railway rates. I am speaking of the winter season, when the ships could not proceed to Montreal.

Mr. REID: I understand that the Canadian Pacific Railway rate from Hamilton to St. John is exactly the same as from Hamilton to New York. The railways give exactly the same rates to our Atlantic ports as to New York, and if a vessel arrived at Halifax with a cargo for Toronto or Hamilton the rate would be the same as from New York to those points.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: But Halifax would not be so advantageous a port as New York for getting a return cargo.

Mr. REID: The railway companies have agents all over the provinces looking for traffic.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Not for westbound traffic via the Panama Canal.

Mr. REID: I mean return cargo for vessels.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The Canadian railways would not encourage that.

Mr. REID: There is a lot of cheap freight that must be carried in that way. In the summer time there is a water route, for instance, from Montreal to Port Arthur, and a rail rate beyond, and the railways are looking for that traffic.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The Canadian railways surely would not encourage competition by giving a special freight rate from eastern Canadian points to New York. That would simply be encouraging traffic by water from New York to Vancouver. The minister's scheme would be of immense advantage in developing traffic if the steamers could get a return cargo from Halifax or St. John, but they are not likely to get it.

Mr. REID: They are likely to get it from points in Ontario and other provinces. For instance, if a man had a cargo of timber at Vancouver which he wanted to ship to Hamilton, if we had an officer at New York he could get the American rate. The American railways have a rate right through to New York, and all the shipper would have to do would be to add the American rate to the water rate. The advantage to the railway companies is that they get the haul from Toronto or Hamilton to St. John or Halifax. The Canadian Pacific would get the traffic from Hamilton to St. John, the Government railway system from Hamilton to Halifax, the Canadian Northern or the Grand Trunk to Montreal, and the Intercolonial the balance. The railways must compete with that water traffic, and they do it in order to get a portion of the haul. This proposed service would encourage traffic between the Atlantic and Pacific ports through our own country, and it might also encourage traffic between the West Indies and Canada. I do not know the situation thoroughly, but it is possible that if a vessel had not a full cargo for Montreal she could take freight for the West Indies, and bring back sugar to this country. I do not think it will be possible to get vessels of any kind while the war is on. We have given a contract for two vessels, and I should like to see them built and in commission.

Mr. NESBITT: In what service?

Mr. REID: From Vancouver to Halifax and St. John in the winter, and to Montreal in the summer.

Mr. NESBITT: My dear Mr. Minister, if you want to assist in building up traffic between eastern and western Canada, all you have to do is to arrange with the United States authorities to put a Customs officer at New York, and they will do the rest, and they will do it a lot cheaper than you can, by any vessels you put on. I know what I am talking about, because I know the rates, and it is the New York rates that will bring the rate down and give us the accommodation.

Mr. REID: I am not taking issue with that. Notwithstanding what the hon. member says I think I know what I am talking about too, and I believe I am absolutely right. I feel very strongly, much stronger than the hon. gentleman does, that it is in the interests of Canada, in the interests of Halifax and St. John, where we are enlarging the harbours, and in the interests of Vancouver, that every bit of freight we can carry between eastern and western points should be handled by our own men, by our own ships, and by our own railways. I believe also, notwithstanding what the hon. gentleman says, that our Canadian vessels, our Canadian railways, manned by our Canadian citizens, can carry from Vancouver to Montreal as cheaply as Americans can.

Mr. NESBITT: I agree, but we are not doing it. I am as loyal to our people and to our carriers as is the hon. gentleman, but when they want exorbitant rates, rates so high that we cannot get our goods into the hands of the consumers at prices that they can afford to pay, then I say we want competition.

Mr. REID: I was not taking issue with the hon. gentleman on a question of loyalty, but I say that we can carry as cheaply as Americans can. He says we are not doing it, but I do not accept his statement; I believe we are doing it. I say that freight rates from Hamilton by our roads are the same as on American roads. We have never had a vessel route yet. It is all very well for the hon. gentleman to talk about rates being cheaper by way of New York, but he is speaking of the time before the war when vessels were running.

Mr. NESBITT: You can get them now.

Mr. REID: No, I have made inquiries, and I can tell the hon. gentleman that there are really no vessels there. To-day we are carrying freight on our railways at the same rates as via New York, and as soon as we get these vessels we shall have the competition just as there has been in ordinary times, and I am confident that our Canadian vessels will carry at equally low rates with the American vessels, and perhaps lower.

Mr. SINCLAIR: The minister says we have two vessels under construction that may be used for this trade?

Mr. REID: I said we gave a contract for two vessels.

Mr. SINCLAIR: To whom?

Mr. REID: To two shipbuilding companies in Vancouver.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Are they steel vessels?

Mr. REID: No, wooden.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Freight vessels?

Mr. REID: Yes.

Mr. SINCLAIR: The intention is to use them on the route from Vancouver to Atlantic ports by way of the Panama canal? Are they steam or sailing vessels?

Mr. REID: They have what is called auxiliary power. They run eight or nine knots an hour.

Mr. SINCLAIR: That would be a very slow service. I cannot understand the hon. minister's explanation. His main reason seems to be that because one cannot send a whole shipload at one time it would not be advisable to send packet freight. But we are now using the bonding privilege to send goods to the United States, and we do not need to send a whole carload, do we? One can send a locked trunk, can he not?

Mr. REID: It goes in a bonded car.

Mr. SINCLAIR: I would not object to that. But if you can send such a package without violating the customs regulations, why not facilitate the traffic by having an officer in New York? Then it will be possible to put goods aboard a steamer running between Halifax and New York, or between Quebec and New York, and tranship them to another boat running through the Panama canal, and perhaps tranship again in order to reach Vancouver. Why should not these facilities be granted? The minister's reasons, so far as I can understand them, do not seem to be sound. And the remedy he proposes seems to me ridiculous. He is going to have auxiliary-power wooden sailing vessels put on the route. That would be the slowest kind of a line that ever was and would never work up any trade worth while. I hope the minister is ambitious to do more than that.

10 p.m.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I agree that it is desirable to confine to our own transportation lines, as far as possible, our domestic traffic. But here is a special condition which requires special treatment. I do not see anything strange in appointing customs officials at the port of New York to facilitate transhipment from vessels laden with cargo from Vancouver and destined for eastern Canadian points. One would need to understand better than I do the cargo that vessels sailing from eastern Canada to Vancouver would be likely to carry. It might not be possible to get a west-bound cargo at a Canadian port at all—I do not know that, but I say it is probable. But a Vancouver steamer can secure a return cargo at the port of New York, goods originating in Canada and reaching New York in bond. All the Vancouver people ask for is the same facilities for their products destined for eastern Canada.

Mr. REID: No, they cannot ship to Canadian eastern ports through New York now.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: But that steamer on her return trip can be loaded with Canadian goods which have come through American territory on American rails in bond?

Mr. REID: No, they cannot do that.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Why not? Do I understand that Canadian goods cannot be shipped from a Canadian point to the port of New York, there to be loaded aboard a steamer bound to British Columbia without paying duty?

Mr. REID: No; if they could do that, they could do the same thing back again.

Mr. GRAHAM: I want to come back again to the appointment of returned soldiers. The minister will see in a moment why I was so anxious that he should commit himself and also commit his colleagues on this subject. I find in the London Advertiser the following despatch:

New Postmaster.

St. Marys Office Filled, But Not by Returned Soldier.

St. Marys, May 27.—Bert L. Lancaster has been appointed postmaster, vice T. O. Robson, who resigned through illness.

It was expected that Lincoln Rice, a Toronto University student and a returned soldier, would be given the appointment in view of the Government promise to give invalided soldiers, where qualified, such positions.

The Postmaster General, who is in uniform, and has been on a recruiting tour in Quebec, is responsible for appointing a man, undoubtedly at the request of political friends, and declining to appoint a returned soldier as postmaster in St. Mary's. You can understand why, with that kind of a disposition, he would not make a successful recruiting officer, and the minister will be able to see the necessity and wisdom of my committing the Postmaster General to the policy of appointing returned soldiers, which policy has been violated by him no longer ago than on May 27.

Mr. REID: The hon. member should bring it up on Postmaster General's estimates. I do not know anything about it.

Mr. GRAHAM: I certainly shall, but I wanted to point out to my hon. friend the reason why I pursued him till he committed the Government to the policy of appointing returned soldiers. His colleagues are not carrying out that policy.

Mr. REID: There may be some explanation of that case.

Mr. TURGEON: In order to make sure, as my hon. friend from South Renfrew (Mr. Graham) has done in the case of Montreal, I might call the attention of the Minister of Customs to the fact that there is a vacancy at present at the most important port in the county of Gloucester, caused by the death of Mr. John J. Harrington, late collector of customs at Bathurst, who died a few weeks ago. So far the position has not been filled. I would understand that it would be in order to appoint a returned soldier from the field of battle. I am willing to say that the Bathurst collector, although appointed by my hon. friend, was a very good officer, a good citizen, a good father and a man of high character, whose death caused regret to every citizen of Bathurst. The officer who was dismissed in 1911 by my hon. friend is to-day a minister of the Crown in the new Liberal Government in the province of New Brunswick, and I suppose he owes a debt of gratitude to my hon. friend for his dismissal at that time. However, we shall see what the course of the minister will be when a returned soldier is available for that position. I admit that there is not among any of the returned soldiers to-day one who would be qualified for that position. Unfortunately, of those who have gone from my county, more have made the supreme sacrifice on the field of honour than have come back with laurels either wounded or incapacitated. Meanwhile I would like to make sure, as my hon. friend made sure in regard to Montreal, that I can depend upon it that my hon. friend will defer action until a returned soldier qualified to fill the position comes back. There is more than one man at the front to-day who is qualified for that position and any one of these men, when he comes back, will be able to fill the position with honour and ability. There is one very young man who has returned with honours won upon the field of battle but he has not been offered the position. Of course, he happens to be the son of the dismissed officer who is now a minister of the Crown in the province of New Brunswick. My hon. friend is not aware, perhaps of all these details. Yet, in order to make sure as to what might take place in the future I want to secure the promise of my hon. friend that if he should be pressed by the politicians of Gloucester county, he will resist their demand until a returned soldier, able to fill the position, shall come back and that he will get the position.

Mr. REID: I would have liked the hon. member (Mr. Turgeon) to have told the whole story about Bathurst as I recollect it. From the speech of the hon. member one might infer that in case there was a vacancy at Bathurst I would not appoint a returned soldier. I do not know whether

I am right or not, but is it a fact, or is it not, that there has been a vacancy at Bathurst and that I did insist upon a returned soldier who was not a resident of the county at all getting that position?

Mr. TURGEON: Yes, but I referred to the collectorship. That is the assistant.

Mr. REID: Why did not the hon. member, in making these few remarks, explain the whole case because this goes to show that I am following up that policy right in the county in which he lives?

Mr. GRAHAM: Only with reference to the sub positions; he was speaking of the collectorship.

Mr. REID: What I am objecting to is that the hon. member was casting doubt in the minds of the members of this House and the people of this country as to whether I was adopting that policy in his own county. Yet, when there was a vacancy in Bathurst, right in his own county, I appointed a returned soldier who did not live in the county. The gentleman that he refers to was not in the county at the time of the vacancy and I brought in a returned soldier from another county who had done duty in France, who was wounded and who is occupying that position in Bathurst at the present time. There you see that I was trying to follow out that policy in the county which the hon. gentleman represents. As far as the man to which the hon. gentleman refers is concerned, I have not heard anything of him and he has not made any application. I would like to ask the hon. member if his attention has been drawn to the fact that as soon as the Liberal party came into power in New Brunswick they dismissed every Conservative official in the whole province. One of the first was the sheriff right in the town of Bathurst who, as the hon. gentleman knows, was one of the best officials in the county, a man that they could not say one word against, a man who had a son, or several sons at the front. Yet, they dismissed him without any investigation or anything else and they have not appointed a returned soldier to the position in New Brunswick. As far as the appointment of a returned soldier to a position in New Brunswick. the situation is this: Here is an official who had been 15 or 16 years in office, a man that no one in the county could point his finger at, a man who took no part in political matters and yet he was hoisted out of his office the minute the Liberal Government came into power. They did not appoint a returned soldier to the position. I have been asked, in view of the fact that no soldier, as the hon. members says, has returned from the front, in view of the many men who have gone from that county and the possibility of men coming back who might be injured to such an extent that they were not fit for any other occupation, a man with an arm or a leg off, or in view of the fact that the sons of this man who has been dismissed as sheriff of the county will probably return, perhaps invalided, whether I would not appoint him temporarily to that position until one of his sons came home or until some other man came home who would be able to fill it. This has been urged especially because of the fact that the Liberal government have taken the livelihood of a man 60 or 65 years of age by dismissing him in that way. I have refrained from appointing a returned soldier but in view of the fact that the Liberal Government in New Brunswick are dismissing officials without one word of warning, instead of following up the policy that I have been following with regard to the appointment of returned soldiers, I would ask my hon. friend, now that the matter has come up, if he thinks it would be an unfair thing to allow a man to act temporarily while his sons are at the front or until one of his sons, or some other man, comes back who is qualified to fill that position.

Mr. TURGEON: As to the appointments made by the Liberal Government of New Brunswick, I have no responsibility, although I will say to my hon. friend that if the son of that sheriff who has been dismissed, as he says, by the Liberal Government, were to return the first of them all, I would be in harmony with the minister for his appointment. Had he not mentioned the appointment of an assistant to the Customs Department of a returned soldier from outside of the county, I would not have mentioned this, because I had in mind simply the ensuring of the position now vacant for a returned soldier. As to the political conduct of the ex-sheriff, the man who has been dismissed, my hon. friend says he has never been an active politician. May I contradict him in that respect? I say that he has been a very active politician, active against myself in every election since he was appointed until the last election when, a few days before, seeing the approach of a change of Government, he became very decent and quiet. At the same time if his son were to return—and I have a great respect for his son whom I know perfectly well—if he would be the first to return wounded or incapacitated and my hon. friend should be in power and give him the position, I would be in harmony with him.

Mr. REID: I will give it to him anyway, whether you are or not.

Mr. TURGEON: All right, we might give it to him. At the same time I want to say that I wanted to secure from the minister, after my hon. friend's reference to the postmastership in St. Thomas, where no doubt there are a great many returned soldiers, some guarantee for one of the returned soldiers in my county; and if the son of the dismissed sheriff should return, I would be satisfied with him or any one else the minister might appoint.

Mr. REID: Would the hon. gentleman consider it fair that, pending the return of his son who is now at the front, the dismissed sheriff should be appointed temporarily to the position so that the son would have it on his return? Would the hon. gentleman agree to that?

Mr. TURGEON: I would agree to that.

Mr. REID: You will agree to appointing the son?

Mr. TURGEON: Yes.

Mr. REID: Then I will do it to-morrow.

Mr. TURGEON: He has a son at the front, and if he is appointed temporarily I accede to that.

Mr. REID: If the hon. member agrees to that, I do not know his name, but to-morrow I will appoint him collector of customs and his father will go on and act until he returns.

Mr. GRAHAM: See how quickly my hon. friend can change. Less than three minutes ago he was going to make the appointment whether my hon. friend agreed or not, and in less than three minutes he bases his appointment of the soldier on the agreement of my hon. friend. I wanted to ask the minister about conditions in his own constituency. The regulations to which I refer may perhaps come under some other department, possibly the Department of Immigration, but as the minister told us that he was the patronage committee in his own riding, he will understand the matter. I received a letter to-day saying that the international regulations under which men of military age are not allowed to cross between the United States and Canada were practically ignored between Prescott and Ogdensburg, down where my hon. friend lives. I know there is a good deal of traffic there, but I can scarcely believe that the situation can be as described in the letter I have received. If it is, then there is one port in Canada where the young men of Canada can practically go without restraint to the other side of the line. I should like an explanation from the minister.

Mr. REID: I should like to say that I read an item that has appeared in the press that I had gone to Prescott—

Mr. GRAHAM: I did not see that, it was some letters to me.

Mr. REID: When I returned home on Saturday morning I had to leave for New York on Saturday afternoon, and when I went to the ferry dock there was a complaint there that those wishing to go across the river between the ages of 18 and 45 had serious difficulty with one of the immigration officials who had interpreted the Order in Council, or the instructions, to mean that no one between the ages of 18 and 45 was to be allowed to cross. The other two officers interpreted the regulations as meaning that they were to be allowed to cross if they had the proper permits. The difficulty arose when the officer who thought that there was a total prohibition of crossing by those of military age was on duty. I explained to the one official that the interpretation of the others was the correct interpretation, and that unless the officers really felt that a man was trying to get away out of the country to escape military service, any man having the proper permit should be allowed to cross, as the Government desired to cause the least possible inconvenience. After that I understand there was no difficulty.

Mr. GRAHAM: Do the photographs of these men accompany the permits?

Mr. REID: Not in any that I saw.

Mr. GRAHAM: Of course, the difficulty about the permits without a photograph need not be explained.

Mr. REID: The difficulty was more with the local traffic. Men were coming from Brockville, Cardinal, Kemptville and other places back in the country, really between the two counties, and that is where the trouble arose. There did not seem to be any general complaint. I asked the customs officers if they had noticed any trouble, and they said there was no difficulty at all. I think the whole trouble was there, as at many other ports, that the officers were a little afraid, that they had not yet become accustomed to the working of the regulations. I do not anticipate trouble.

Mr. NESBITT: The minister has referred to the payment of overtime to customs officials. What are the official hours for customs officers in country ports, and do the same hours apply to all country ports?

Mr. REID: The regular hours are from 9 to 5. The officials are given overtime pay for work performed outside of those hours.

Mr. NESBITT: What is the rate for overtime pay?

Mr. REID: Thirty cents an hour.

Mr. McKENZIE: Would it not be better for the minister to do away with this overtime system and increase the salaries to provide for the extra work done?

Mr. REID: This system has been in force for a long time. I really do not think that the officials would favour the suggestion made by my hon. friend. In my town the men go on at 7 in the morning and work until 5 or 6. The ferry boats run until 12 midnight, and the men take turns in doing the overtime work. I think, therefore, that it would not be practicable to place the salaries at such a high amount as to provide for the overtime. The salaries, including overtime, run from $1,200 to $1,300 per annum; the hours are not very long. If we abolished the overtime altogether, we should have to increase the staff, because ordinarily the men would be employed only during the regular hours. In the town of Prescott about $2,000 a year is paid by way of overtime. If two more men were put on to take up the work otherwise done outside the regular hours, you would simply be taking it from the other men. Altogether, the system works very well.

Mr. McKENZIE: What I suggest is that instead of paying the men extra for overtime, a fair wage be arrived at and paid as a stated salary. The adoption of such a system would save much bookkeeping and much timekeeping. I do not know whether or not the men keep their own time, but if they do, they are all human, and they are apt to be not very strict as to the length of their overtime service. I should think that it would save much bother and be much more satisfactory generally if the overtime payments were abolished and the salaries increased to cover work after hours.

Mr. REID: The men would not work overtime if they received a regular salary; they would work from 9 to 5. As I say, the system has been very satisfactory, and I should not like to make any change without consulting the officials and going into the matter very thoroughly.

Mr. NESBITT: The minister did not answer my question as to whether the system of overtime applies to all ports.

Mr. REID: It applies to any port where a man is employed outside the regular hours.

Mr. COPP: In his anxiety to attack the governement in the province of New Brunswick because of a question asked by the member for Gloucester, the minister a few moments ago charged the present Government of the province of New Brunswick with discharging every Conservative official in the province. For the purpose, I suppose, of offering an excuse for the manner in which he has carried on the affairs of his department in the interests of his own party, he makes this assertion against the Government of the province of New Brunswick. May I ask my hon. friend upon what information he bases the assertion which he has made, and what were the names of the persons dismissed?

Mr. REID: That report has been in circulation since the present provincial Government came into power. The hon. gentleman can get sufficient evidence of that without asking me for it.

Mr. McKENZIE: The minister has not any.

Mr. COPP: I may tell the minister that I have not any such information.

Mr. REID: Have you been in New Brunswick since the election?

Mr. COPP: Yes, and I was there during the election. I had occasion to be at different polling booths in two different counties. At one of the places I attended a number of officials stood at the polls and worked against the government—and they are still holding office. The only evidence my hon. friend gave of officials being dismissed in the province of New Brunswick was the statement concerning the sheriff of the county of Gloucester. I may tell my hon. friend that no sheriff has been dismissed in the province of New Brunswick since the election. The sheriffs in that province are appointed annually. In some cases the old sheriffs are reappointed; in other cases they are replaced because they have outlived their usefulness. During an election in the province of New Brunswick the registry office in a certain county was closed up to ordinary business and used as a Tory consulting room on election day. On another occasion a sheriff of a certain county established a polling booth in the Conservative committee room. My hon. friend had no justification for making the charge that he did against the Government of the province of New Brunswick, because the sheriff to whom he referred was not reappointed to office after his term had expired.

Mr. GRAHAM: That matter has been settled by the minister appointing to the office a gentleman recommended by the hon. member for Gloucester. I was going to suggest to the minister that as at least some of us have worked very faithfully, we should pass the first item, although it is a large one, and then adjourn. Of course, we shall be allowed to discuss almost any matter on the other items?

Mr. REID: Certainly.

Progress reported.

On the motion of Hon. Mr. Rogers for the adjournment of the House.

Mr. GRAHAM: What business shall we take up to-morrow?

Mr. ROGERS: Whatever Bills are on the Order Paper and then we will go into Supply.

Mr. GRAHAM: Shall we take up all the Bills that are on the Order Paper?

Mr. ROGERS: All that are ready.

Mr. PUGSLEY: There is a Bill intituled The Military Service Act, 1917.

Mr. ROGERS: I cannot say as to that.

Motion agreed to, and the House adjourned at 10.45 p.m.

Thursday, May 31, 1917.

The House met at Three o'clock, the Speaker in the Chair.

HIGHWAYS BILL.

Hon. FRANK COCHRANE (Minister of Railways) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 58 to encourage and assist the improvement of highways.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Does this Bill differ in any way from the Bill introduced by the minister on two former occasions?

Mr. COCHRANE: It is a copy of the same Bill.

Motion agreed to and Bill read the first time.

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT.

DISQUALIFICATION OF ALIEN ENEMIES PROPOSED.

Mr. J. A. CURRIE (East Simcoe) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 59 to amend the Criminal Code.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Explain.

Mr. CURRIE: I shall read the Bill, which will explain itself. It is an amendment to Section 79 of the Criminal Code and reads as follows:

79. A. Any person who votes for any person, for any public officer, or who takes any active part in any election for any public office by becoming a candidate, speaking, writing, canvassing or driving voters to the poll, who was or is a citizen of any country, now or at any time during the past five years at war with Great Britain or her Allies; or who was a subject of any country not allied with Great Britain or her Allies, which does not permit its citizens the rights of expatriation, or holds the doctrine of dual citizenship or who was exiled or banished from any allied country, even though such person may have been granted naturalization in Canada or Great Britain, or may have his or her name on the Voters' List; shall be deemed guilty of an offence under this Act, and on conviction before a court of competent jurisdiction shall be liable to imprisonment for a term of not less than two years, together with forfeiture of civil rights and all property to the Crown.

B. The above provisions shall not apply to any person who is serving or has served in His Majesty's Forces, or has been a naturalized British subject resident in Canada for twenty-five years. The burden of proof as to such exception shall rest upon the Voter.

C. Any person giving such information as will lead to the conviction of any such person shall be entitled to one-third of all fines and forfeitures.

I informed the Minister of Finance sometime ago that I intended to introduce this Bill, and he asked me to defer its introduction until the return of the leader of the Government. I have done so, but unfortunately the time for dealing with measures introduced by private members has expired. I would therefore ask the Government to set aside a day to discuss this subject.

Motion agreed to and Bill read the first time.

QUESTIONS.

(Questions answered orally are indicated by asterisks.)

RAILWAY COMMISSION—APPEALS FROM.

Mr. SINCLAIR:

1. How many appeals were taken each calendar year since 1908 from decisions of the Board of Railway Commissioners to the Governor in Council?

2. What was the number of cases each year in which the decisions of the Board were varied or reversed?

Mr. DOHERTY:

1. 1908, nil; 1909, nil; 1910, 1; 1911, 2; 1912, 5; 1913, 4; 1914, nil; 1915, 2; 1916, 1; 1917, 1; total, 16.

2. 1908, nil; 1909, nil; 1910, nil; 1911, nil; 1912, 1; 1913, nil; 1914, nil; 1915, nil; 1916, nil; 1917, nil; total, 1.

BINDER TWINE.

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. FRANK OLIVER (Edmonton): Mr. Speaker, I desire to call the attention of the Minister of Justice to a letter which I have just received from a union of the United Farmers of Alberta, No. 383, in regard to the binder twine situation. The letter says:

> The Union has been trying to place its order for binder twine but has been unsuccessful so far. We have tried the Alberta Farmers Co-operative Elevator Company and the T. Eaton Company, Winnipeg. Both have sold their entire stock and find it impossible to get more from the manufacturers. The T. Eaton Company explains that raw materials for the manufacture of twine have been on the docks for months and that they have gone so far as to ask the Government at Ottawa to help out, but so far (May 1, 1917) have not been able to get any more cars moving.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: If my hon. friend will send that over to me, I will make inquiries.

PRIVILEGE.

STATEMENT BY MR. D. B. NEELY.

On the Orders of the Day.

Mr. NEELY: Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege. In the vote taken on the 29th instant on the amendment of the hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) I notice that my name is not recorded in the list of pairs. I was paired with the hon. member for East Elgin (Mr. Marshall), who, through a misunderstanding, voted on that occasion. In order to set the matter right, I may say, that had I voted I should have voted for the amendment.

PURCHASE OF CHEESE BY BRITISH GOVERNMENT.

On the Orders of the Day.

Hon. CHARLES MURPHY: In the absence of the Minister of Agriculture I wish to draw the attention of the Prime Minister to a matter that was mentioned a couple of days ago with regard to action that is alleged to have been taken in connection with the export of the surplus supply of cheese. My right hon. friend will recall that I intervened with a word on that occasion. I have since received representations from my constituents who are complaining about the continued inaction, as they describe it, and the storing up of the cheese in the curing rooms. I am obliged again to ask the Prime Minister if he is in a position to make a statement in the House with regard to this matter.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Owing to the indisposition of the Minister of Agriculture, I am not, perhaps, as fully informed as I should be on the subject. I did address a somewhat urgent communication on the matter two days ago, but I have not yet received a reply. I am under the impression that the British Government have decided to take over at a fixed price all cheese coming either from the United States or from Canada. This was done some time ago with regard to Australia and New Zealand; arrangments were made which were accepted by the governments of these Dominions and by the British Government. The difficulty here has been the ascertainment of a proper price. I think that the Commission that was appointed has found itself unable to act so far on account of the difficulty experienced by the British Commissioner in obtaining the necessary instructions from the British Board of Trade. There has been no inaction on the part of this Government, who have been endeavouring to do everything in their power, but as the British Government are to be the purchasers, certain conditions must be authorized by them and cannot be authorized by us. So far as I have gone into the details I have been speaking more from impression than from actual knowledge, and my remarks must be taken subject to that qualification. I have, however, given an accurate statement of the situation so far as I have knowledge of it at the moment. I shall inquire from the Minister of Agriculture whether he can give any additional information on the subject.

DR. BRUCE'S REPORT.

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. FRANK OLIVER: I understand that the Minister of Militia has received the report from Dr. Bruce. May I ask if it is to be laid on the Table, and if it is to be printed?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: The Minister of Militia has referred that matter to me and I have examined a report or memorandum with regard to it, so far as the demands upon my time would permit. It is not the intention of the Government to lay it on the Table without first submitting it to the Overseas Minister of Militia, to whom in the ordinary course it should be presented, as it relates to matters under his immediate jurisdiction. Whether or not the report will afterwards be laid upon the table, I am not for the moment prepared to say. I speak not of my own knowledge when I refer to the contents of the report, because it is voluminous and I have not had time to read it, but I understand that a portion of it is not responsive to anything in the report of the Commission over which General Babtie presided and that it is not made in respect of any matter upon which Colonel Bruce was asked to report. Whether that is the case I am not now prepared to say, owing to lack of time to make the necessary examination. I am thoroughly of opinion, however, that the report should first be submitted to the Overseas Minister of Militia. During the interval I shall have an opportunity of considering whether the document is of such character, having regard to the public interest, that it should afterwards be laid upon the table of the House.

Mr. OLIVER: In view of the fact that it will necessarily be a considerable time before Dr. Bruce's report can be printed or made public, as it has to take the course decided upon by the Prime Minister, is it the intention of the Government to have the reports made by Dr. Bruce, Dr. Jones and Dr. Babtie, which were printed in England, (a small number of copies being available in Canada) published in Canada for public circulation?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: At least forty of these reports were available for distribution to members of the House. I do not know whether or not they have all been called for. The expense of printing large numbers of the three reports would be considerable, and it was thought that forty would be sufficient. I shall make inquiries of the Clerk of the House, to whom the copies were sent, and ascertain whether or not they have all been distributed. The Clerk may still have on hand a sufficient number of copies for all members who desire to see them.

Mr. J. G. TURRIFF: When Dr. Bruce's report was first laid on the Table I got a copy of it for the purpose of making some extracts from it. The King's Printer, however, telephoned me two or three times saying that he wanted the report for the purpose of printing a number of copies of it, a month or six weeks ago, therefore, he got the report, a day or two after it was laid on the table. Obviously his intention was to print additional copies so that we should not have to secure a copy every time we wanted to make extracts from the report. These reports ought to be printed and available for members of the House. The Government would appear to be dilly-dallying with the report and delaying the printing of it and its being laid on the table.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: That is not the case at all. The reports are public property; they have already been laid upon the table of the House. I was under the impression that no more copies would be required than those which had been sent to the Clerk of the House. I shall look into it and see how many were sent out and whether some are still available for distribution. Perhaps the hon. gentleman himself has not lately ascertained that.

Mr. OLIVER: Do the remarks of the minister apply to the three reports of Dr. Bruce, Dr. Jones and Dr. Babtie?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: I do not remember as to that. The member for Assiniboia said that the report was laid on the table a month or six weeks ago. It was before that, however; it was during the first part of the session.

Mr. TURRIFF: Before the adjournment.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: If my memory serves me correctly, a number of copies of all three reports were printed. I shall look into the matter, and if sufficient copies are not available, I assume we shall have to go to the expense of printing additional copies.

Mr. TURRIFF: This matter has been brought up on the Orders of the Day half a dozen times during the past month, and we are not a bit further ahead than we were a month ago. My hon. friend is always going to find out.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: Permit me to correct the member for Assiniboia. The matter to which he refers as having been brought up half a dozen times during the last few weeks is the matter brought up by the member for Edmonton. The reports referred to by the member for Assiniboia were those brought down before the House adjourned.

Mr. OLIVER: Three printed reports, the Bruce report, the Jones report and the Babtie report, are in the hands of the Clerk. I have been favoured with copies of all three. Have all three been laid on the table, or was only the Bruce report laid on the Table?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: I am under the impression that all three were laid upon the table. However, I am speaking from memory. They are in the hands of the Clerk.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: That is my recollection.

Mr. OLIVER: I am informed that only the Bruce report was laid on the table. It is desirable that the other two reports should also be laid upon the table, in order that they may be made public.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Speaking from recollection, I am confident that the Bruce report and the Babtie report were laid upon the table by myself before the House adjourned in February. I have no recollection at all of the report of Dr. Carleton Jones; in fact, I do not think I was aware that there was any such report.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: My memory agrees with that of the Prime Minister, that the first two reports, those of Dr. Bruce and Dr. Babtie, have been laid upon the table. I do not know that the report of Dr. Jones has been laid upon the table in reference to this subject and the answer just given by my right hon. friend, was the second report, that is the reply of Dr. Bruce made by order or of his own motion?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: So far as I understand, that report was made of his own motion. I have no information to the contrary.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: As we have had the accusation, and the reply of Dr. Bruce, I would suggest to my hon. friend that in justice to Dr. Bruce, who is a responsible man, the reply should be made public.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: That is well worthy of consideration in so far as that report is in response to anything in the Babtie report. My right hon. friend, however, will agree that the subject is one that should be brought to the attention of the Overseas Minister of Militia.

Mr. OLIVER: Do I understand that it is the intention to lay the report of Dr. Carleton Jones on the table, and thereby make it a public document?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I know of no reason why that report should not be placed upon the table of the House. The minister of Militia so informs me.

Mr. LEMIEUX: This may clear the atmosphere. A few weeks ago I received the report on the Canadian Army Medical Service by Dr. Bruce, the interim report of Dr. Jones, and the report by Dr. Babtie.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: How did you get them?

Mr. LEMIEUX: I got them by asking for them from the Clerk of the House.

WESTERN COAL MINING.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. W. A. BUCHANAN (Medicine Hat): Might I ask the minister for a statement as to the present situation in connection with the coal strike in western Canada, and also to give the House information as to what the Government is doing to get the mines into operation again? The situation is very serious, and if necessary drastic action should be taken.

Hon. T. W. CROTHERS (Minister of Labour): Efforts are still being made with a view to securing resumption of work, and the executive officers of the international organization of the United Mine Workers are taking an active and earnest interest in those efforts. I hope they may be successful very soon; but if they are not, efforts will be made by the Government with a view to controlling the output of coal in that region.

FIFTIETH ANNIVERSARY OF CONFEDERATION.

PROPOSED CELEBRATION.

Rt. Hon. Sir GEORGE FOSTER (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, with the consent of the House, I would like to present the report of the special committee which was appointed conjointly by the Senate and the House of Commons to report upon the method of celebrating the fiftieth anniversary of the Federation of this Dominion. This is the report:

House of Commons,
May 31, 1917.

The special committee, appointed to consider and report upon the arrangements which should be made for the celebration of the fiftieth anniversary of the foundation of this Dominion, ask leave to submit the following recommendations as their first and final report.

That a topical pamphlet comparing and contrasting Canada of 1867 with Canada of 1917, be published for the purpose of drawing attention to the outstanding features of Canadian growth and development and giving direction to the thoughts which should animate the memorial services.

That the Government issue a proclamation inviting churches, Sabbath and day schools, colleges, municipal authorities, Canadian Clubs and other associations to co-operate in the working out of fitting commemorative services for the day.

That the Provincial authorities be requested to arrange for a special official celebration of the anniversary at the capitals of the several provinces.

That the Federal Government provide for the issuance of a commemorative post card and postage stamp, with appropriate design and legend representative of the work of the Fathers of Confederation.

That appropriate memorial services be held at London and Paris on July 1st.

That upon the central stone column, upholding the roof of the great entrance hall of the new Parliament buildings, the following inscription be incised:

JULY
1867 1917
ON THE FIFTIETH ANNIVERSARY OF THE CONFEDERATION OF BRITISH COLONIES IN NORTH AMERICA AS THE DOMINION OF CANADA
THE CANADIAN PARLIAMENT AND PEOPLE DEDICATED THIS BUILDING
THEN IN PROCESS OF CONSTRUCTION
AFTER DAMAGE BY FIRE, AS A MEMORIAL OF
THE DEEDS OF THEIR FOREFATHERS
AND OF THE VALOUR OF THOSE CANADIANS WHO IN THE GREAT WAR FOUGHT FOR THE LIBERTIES OF CANADA OF THE EMPIRE AND OF HUMANITY.

That the Government arrange a fitting ceremonial service for setting in place and dedicating this inscribed stone at 12 noon, on the 2nd day of July, 1917.

[Sir George Foster.]

Mr. MARCIL: Is it the intention to have the inscription in both languages?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The committee did not deliver itself upon that point.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I recommended that that be done at the first meeting of the committee.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I imagine that it could easily be done.

SALARY OF POSTAL CLERKS.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. W. E. KNOWLES: Will the Acting Postmaster General tell us what is to be done with regard to the prospective salary increases for the postal clerks, including carriers? The hon. gentleman is no doubt aware that the different associations have been asking for increases.

Hon. Mr. PATENAUDE: I shall probably be able to answer my hon. friend in two or three days.

SURGEON GENERAL CARLETON-JONES' REPORT.

On the Orders of the Day:

Sir EDWARD KEMP: As there seems to be some doubt whether the proper formalities have been complied with, I now beg to lay on the table the report of Surgeon General Carleton-Jones. The Clerk of the House has in his possession for distribution among the members quite a number of copies both of this report and of the other two.

GOVERNMENT RAILWAYS—PURCHASE OF COAL CARS.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. E. M. MACDONALD: I should like to call the attention of the Minister of Railways to the situation that exists in eastern Canada with reference to the delay in the transportation of coal. Transportation by water has been practically cut off and there is accordingly a greater demand for coal cars on the Intercolonial. I am informed by business men that there is a very great paucity in the supply of coal cars. I think the minister should provide not only for immediate needs but for our needs next winter, and I bring this matter to his attention with a view to asking whether it is his intention to supply the number of cars that are required for the transportation of coal on the Intercolonial.

Hon. FRANK COCHRANE: The only firm that has spoken to me about the moving of coal on the Intercolonial is the Dominion Coal Company. My officials have come to Ottawa, but I have not had an opportunity of discussing the matter with them yet. I can assure my hon. friend that we will do our best to get the cars. We have been trying to get cars in the United States, but have found it almost impossible to get even second-hand cars. I let a contract over a year ago to a manufacturer in the constituency of my hon. friend, but he has not delivered the cars yet.

Mr. MACDONALD: How many were ordered?

Mr. COCHRANE: Five hundred.

SUPPLY.

PROPOSED AMENDMENT BY MR. ROBB.

On the Order being called, "House again in Committee of Supply."

Sir THOMAS WHITE: In connection with this Order, the hon. member for Huntingdon (Mr. Robb) was good enough at my request the other day to postpone the moving of an amendment to the motion to go into Supply, on the understanding that the matter should come up to-day. So far as the Government is concerned, we are prepared to consent to his proceeding with his motion.

Mr. SPEAKER: The rule is explicit that on Thursdays and Fridays the Speaker shall leave the Chair without question put, but if it has been arranged between both sides of the House that the hon. member may proceed with his motion, I shall interpose no objection. I would point out however, that the rule must not be regarded as obsolete.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Perhaps it would be better if a formal motion were made that the rule be suspended.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Yes.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I beg to move, if my right hon. friend has no objection, that rule 17 (c) be suspended for this sitting.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I have very great pleasure in seconding the motion, but I would observe that there are certain rules more honoured in the breach than in the observance, and this is one of them.

Motion agreed to.

On the motion of Sir Thomas White (Minister of Finance) that the House do go into Committee of Supply.

Mr. J. A. ROBB (Huntingdon) moved in amendment:

That all the words after the word "that" be struck out and the following be substituted therefor:

That to ensure a plentiful supply of bran, shorts, and middlings for the farmers who produce milk, cream, butter and cheese, and for the raising and fattening of live stock, this House is of the opinion that bran, shorts and middlings should without delay be placed on the free list.

Mr. SPEAKER: I must point out to the hon. member that the subject matter of his amendment was discussed and passed upon by the House when it considered the amendment moved by the hon. member for Edmonton, whose amendment embraced all foodstuffs. The subject matter of the amendment by the hon. member for Huntingdon having therefore been considered and disposed of by the House this session, his amendment is not in order.

Mr. ROBB: Will you permit me, Sir, to point out what I think is a misunderstanding. In the first place, this amendment applies not to food but to feeding stuffs for cattle. I also——

Mr. SPEAKER: I must remind the hon. member that I have already ruled his amendment out of order.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I would not presume to discuss your ruling, Sir, at the moment, but might I ask for permission to bring the matter to your attention at a subsequent date? Because the House has disposed of an amendment for placing all foodstuffs on the free list, I do not think the House is bound to say it will not later on consider an amendment for placing one particular foodstuff on the free list. There is a great difference between placing all foodstuffs and placing one foodstuff on the free list. I would ask for permission to bring this point up at a later stage.

Mr. SPEAKER: I am quite content with the suggestion of the right hon. leader of the Opposition on that point.

Mr. J. A. ROBB (Huntingdon) moved:

That all the words after "that" in the main motion be struck out, and the following substituted therefor:

"Inasmuch as cotton jute, or paper sacks, when containing flour, now enter Canada from the United States free of duty, and inasmuch as Canadian millers employing Canadian labour are handicapped because they are compelled to pay on empty sacks and bags, a duty of 27½% on cotton and jute bags and sacks, and a duty of 35% on paper sacks. This House is of the opinion that such unfair discrimination should be removed, therefore it is resolved that in the opinion of this House, cotton and jute bags and sacks and paper sacks, when imported by millers for use in their own mills should be free of duty."

He said: Mr. Speaker, the amendment of mine which you ruled out of order was of greater importance to my constituents than that which I now move, and I would have much preferred had the House had an opportunity of discussing that amendment. Had I been considering my own business alone, perhaps I should not be so strongly in favour of free bran and shorts; but representing an agricultural constituency as I do, where the supplies of bran and shorts are used for the production of milk, cream, butter and cheese, and having in view the interest of producers in these lines throughout the country, I submit the present resolution. Owing to the recent Order in Council conditions are rapidly arising under which the farmers, especially those of eastern Canada, will be compelled to pay much more for their feedstuffs than they should pay. This resolution is necessary because in the revision of the United States tariff, the so-called Underwood tariff, included clause 644, which names certain articles as on the free list. That clause is as follows:

Wheat, wheat flour, semolina, and other wheat products not specially provided for in this section, Provided, That wheat shall be subject to a duty of ten cents per bushel, that wheat flour shall be subject to a duty of 45 cents per barrel of 196 pounds; and seminola and other products of wheat, not specially provided for in this section, 10 per centum ad valorem, when imported directly or indirectly, from a country, dependency, or other subdivision of government, which imposes a duty on wheat or wheat flour or semolina imported from the United States.

This clause means that Canadian wheat is subject to a duty of ten cents a bushel on entering the markets of the United States, unless Canada accepts a proposition prepared in Washington without consulting Ottawa, a proposition altogether different from the much-abused Fielding-Knox proposition of 1911. It gives United States millers special privileges in the Canadian markets, privileges which, in my judgment, will ultimately result in reduced production of flour in this country, and consequently reduced production of the bran and shorts so necessary for the farmers of eastern Canada. Under the proposition of 1911 precaution was taken not to interfere in any way with manufacturing in Canada, and especially was this precaution taken with respect to our milling industry, for a duty of fifty cents a barrel on flour was provided, which enabled the Canadian millers, in a measure, to offset the increased cost of bags in Canada as compared with the United States. The Canadian miller had a protection of fifty cents a barrel in a market that was growing at the rate of one new flour mill of a thousand barrels a day every year, and consequently there was a steadily increasing production of bran and shorts. It may be interesting for the House to know that while in 1895 Canada exported less than 250,000 barrels of flour, in 1910 our exports reached 3,000,000 barrels, and in 1915-16, 7,426,000 barrels.

In taking the position that the recent Order in Council will be injurious to Canadian millers, and consequently will lessen the supply of bran and shorts for the stock feeders of Canada, I am in good company. On reference to Hansard of 1916, I find that in the debate on a resolution presented by my hon. friend from Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff), which was opposed by the Government, the Finance Minister (Sir Thomas White) expressed about the same views on this question as I do. I may say quite frankly, I was never very much enthused over the proposition to admit our wheat to the United States on terms dictated by Washington. I am in favour of free wheat and of free grain generally; I am in favour of the proposition as presented in 1911. If there was any classes of our community who were "in on velvet" in that proposition, they were the Canadian farmers and the Canadian millers. But the present Order in Council is altogether different. Let me call to the attention of the House the views of the Finance Minister as expressed in the debate to which I have referred and reported in Hansard of 1916, at page 870:

Then we have had petitions from mixed farmers. The mixed farmers say that bran and offal are more expensive in the United States than here and that consequently, if this went into effect, both in the Northwest and Ontario the farmer would have to pay more for his bran and offal. It is put forward also that if we took the step contemplated by this resolution the milling industry would certainly not be extended into the Northwest. I have given that matter as careful consideration as I think I ever gave a question in my life, and I have come to the conclusion that if this were done the Canadian milling industry would not be extended further into the Northwest for this reason, that the markets lie to the east and south and while the milling would be done in Canada east of Winnipeg, to the extent that our millers might be able to carry it on with American competition, there is no likelihood, so far as we can judge at present, of an extension to the Canadian Northwest of the milling industry. I need not tell hon. members that upon the milling industry mixed farming largely depends for its well being. The offal, the bran which the farmers use for the rearing of their livestock, is of supreme importance to the farming community and this proposed change would have an important bearing upon the supply of bran and offal for the rearing of stock by those engaged in the mixed farming industry. I think the small miller would probably disappear and that the business of the large millers would be very seriously affected if not crippled, and that the extension of the milling industry in the Northwest would be prevented.

I think the Minister of Finance was on solid ground in 1916 when he advanced that argument. I may frankly say that the Canadian millers opposed the proposition of 1911. It was opposed by the Minister of Finance. We heard in this House arguments why, if Canada wanted to negotiate with Washington, we should not have sent down two old men, but these two old men made a better bargain for Canada than that which is presented in the recently passed Order in Council that has at last been put through after six years of apprenticeship. Every carload of flour that comes into this country from the United States bagged in cotton sacks brings in free of duty 875 yards of cotton, and the Government, in admitting this cotton free into Canada, admits the products of United States cotton bag manufacturers. If the Canadian miller who is employing Canadian labour wishes to import these bags, he is met at the customs house with a tax of 27½ per cent.

Mr. NESBITT: Plus 7½ per cent.

Mr. ROBB: No, 20 per cent and 7½ per cent. I have a quotation on bags from the Bemis Bag Company, manufacturing in St. Louis, Minneapolis, Kansas City and Winnipeg, and I find that the cost of bags is 8½ cents a barrel cheaper in the United States than in Canada. That means that on his flour bags the Canadian miller is discriminated against to the extent of $19.04 per car, and notwithstanding what my hon. friends say about the monopolistic millers, I wish to say that there have been millions of bags of flour sold in this country to Britain and her Allies during the last two years upon which the millers got little more than $20 a carload profit. That may be a surprising statement, but I know that flour has been sold at practically the commission going to the Allies of Great Britain on the other side, and it may be said that $20 is not very much on a carload of flour.

Let me point out to the Minister of Finance how it works with regard to bran and shorts. The Canadian miller is enabled by the tariff to put bran and shorts upon the markets of the United States, but when the Canadian farmer wishes to buy bran and shorts milled from Canadian wheat in United States mills, he is met at the customs house with a tariff of 25 per cent. Now, let us see how that works out. Bran at $30 a ton, with the duty of $7.50 per ton added, would cost $150 per carload duty. Canada, through its Government, says to the eastern farmer: for every car of bran you bring in here from the United States you must give us one of your best cows, and only when you have done so can you unload your car of bran. How can we expect the eastern farmer to increase the production of butter and cheese when he is met with such a tax upon the feed he requires for his animals? The Government recognize that bran and shorts are very important to the farming industry. I imagine that every hon. member in this House recently received from the Department of Agriculture special circulars Nos. 7 and 8 in which the department urged the farmers to feed more bran and shorts to their live stock. The Department of Agriculture is urging the farmers to feed bran and shorts and the Department of Finance is placing an additional tax on bran and shorts coming into Canada.

4 p.m.

Mr. EDWARDS: How does the price of bran and shorts in Canada compare with the price on the other side of the line?

Mr. ROBB: The price of bran at Buffalo on the 29th May, as quoted, was $32.50 and on the same day it was quoted at from $36 to $38 in Toronto. The price in Boston was $34.50 and the same quotation would apply to Montreal as to Toronto. The shorts are a little higher, the spread being greater in Canada than in the United States.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: What about the freight?

Mr. ROBB: As I understand, Boston freight points are $2 a ton over Buffalo and Buffalo freight points are just about the same as Toronto freight points. I know that upon wheat the freight rates to Port Colborne and Buffalo are exactly the same and I imagine the same applies to bran and shorts. Under the present tariff arrangements we are practically subsidizing the Canadian miller to export his product. He can buy bags cheaper in the United States, bring these bags into Canada, fill them with Canadian bran and shorts and export them and the Government gives him a rebate of 99 per cent of duty paid. I find here a quotation on bags for a carload of bran at $49.60. The duty is $13.40 and the refund, if the bran and shorts are shipped out of the country, is $12.25; in other words, we have now a policy in Canada whereby we are subsidizing the Canadian miller to the extent of 60 cents a ton to put his bran and shorts out of the country. That is not an unfair way of presenting it because that is exactly the way it works out. Bran costing $30 a ton, when it is imported from the United States, pays a duty of $7.50 a ton. The Canadian miller can get his bran into the United States free. There is nothing to hinder him from putting out bran enough to create a scarcity in this country and to hold up the price to the Canadian feeder to the extent of $6 a ton over what it is in the United States. On this ground I would plead with the Minister of Finance to carefully reconsider the matter and put bran and shorts on the free list. If the Canadian miller is to maintain his output on the basis of last year, the minister must make some tariff changes. He must put cotton, jute and paper bags and flour milling machinery on the free list or what he predicted in 1916 will come true sooner than he thinks.

Who is going to build a mill anywhere in Canada when he can buy bags to sack his flour cheaper in the United States? Who will build a mill in Canada anyway when he can build it much cheaper in the United States? So I say to the Minister of Finance that if the farmers of eastern Canada are to have a plentiful supply of bran and shorts for their cattle, and if the Canadian milling business is to continue to prosper, there must be some tariff changes.

Mr. EDWARDS: Has my hon. friend the figures showing the shipments of bran and shorts both ways between the United States and Canada?

Mr. ROBB: No.

Mr. E. W. NESBITT (North Oxford): I do not think it should require any argument to show the Minister of Finance that what my hon. friend (Mr. Robb) has just said is absolutely correct. It is absolutely unfair in the first place to make the miller pay a duty on his containers as against the American miller, who is not paying any duty on his containers. Bags can be purchased cheaper in the United States than here, and the Canadian miller has to pay a duty on them coming into Canada. The figures given by the hon. member for Huntingdon are not at all exaggerated. It is also unfair to ask us in Ontario, where more animal foodstuffs are fed than in any other part of Canada, to pay a duty on bran and shorts.

[Mr. Robb.]

We want to have an open market for bran and shorts necessarily, and to get the feed as cheaply as we can. Before the removal of the duty on flour, etc., that did not make so much difference, but now that the duty has been removed, I am quite sure it does not require an argument to show the Minister of Finance, with his ability, that we should have free of duty the articles that my hon. friend has mentioned this afternoon.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: My hon. friend from Huntingdon (Mr Robb) has managed, in the course of his remarks, to speak to the amendment which was ruled out of order, as well as to the amendment which is in order. I hope that I may be pardoned, therefore, if I reply very briefly to it—briefly because he has intimated that he may raise the question upon another occasion. He has referred to my remarks upon the subject of free wheat in 1916. The remarks which I made then, were, I believe, sound, having regard to the conditions which existed at that time. It is not my intention to go over the arguments which I put forward during the present session in support of the action taken by the Government in putting wheat upon the free list. It will be sufficient to say that the conditions now are fundamentally different from the conditions which prevailed in 1916 when I made the Budget speech referred to. We on this side of the House are just as much interested as my hon. friend from Huntingdon or the hon. member who has just taken his seat (Mr. Nesbitt) in the live stock industry, and we have shown it during our tenure of office by measures brought down for its development and increase. This Government may be depended upon to take such action at any time as may be necessary if the live stock industry of this country is in any way threatened with injury. I desire to say this: that bran and shorts have been and are to-day cheaper in Canada than in the United States. The hon. member for Huntingdon on the former occasion when he introduced this matter to the House during this session admitted it; he admitted that the prices in the United States were higher than in Canada. If that is so, it would not appear to me that there need be much apprehension on the part of the live stock industry in Canada that bran and shorts are going to flow from the United States into Canada.

Mr. ROBB: The Finance Minister is quite correct; I did say that bran and shorts were cheaper here than in the United States. But that was before the passage of this Order in Council.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: My hon. friend stated the matter fairly, and that was so, and it is so to-day. There may be local points at which bran or shorts are cheaper in the United States, although I do not know of any, but it must be borne in mind that freights play an important part in this matter. Take, for example, the district about Montreal served from the mills of Montreal. What about the freight rates? Any Canadian miller who desired to supply the United States market would have to pay freight rates on his bran and shorts going out of this country to the United States. I am informed that there are no traffic rates governing bran and shorts from Montreal. Consequently, so far as the Canadian farmer in that district in which my hon. friend is particularly interested is concerned, there would seem to be no reason why bran and shorts should be dearer than across the line, and I am satisfied that the contrary is the fact. I have here a statistical statement published under the authority of the Secretary of Agriculture in the United States showing that for the years 1915, 1916 and 1917, the price as a whole of bran in the United States, per ton was, in 1915, $28.96; in 1916, $26.05, and in 1917, $38.33. For the State of Maine, the prices were: in 1915, $31.70; in 1916, $29.70 and in 1917, $41.80. Whereas in Canada the price of bran at Toronto was on March 15, 1915, $28, which was lower than in the State of Maine and lower than the average price in the whole United States; it was $24 in 1916, which was lower than the price in the State of Maine and average price in the United States as a whole; and it was $37 in 1917, which was $1.33 lower than the average price in the United States; $4.80 lower than the price in the State of Maine; $3.60 lower than the price in New Hampshire, and $5.80 lower than in Massachusetts. The same is true with regard to other States, New York, Michigan and Minnesota, for which I have the prices here.

Mr. NESBITT: What was the price in Canada in 1917?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The wholesale price was $37.

Mr. NESBITT: We never bought any in 1917 at that.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: That was at Toronto.

Mr. NESBITT: We never bought any at that price.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: My hon. friend is not a good buyer.

Mr. NESBITT: I cannot help that. I tell my hon. friend that we are good buyers in our section of the country.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: What an unfair position hon. gentlemen take upon this question. They say: We are in favour of free wheat, and we were in favour of it in 1915. But now that it has been adopted they say: By reason of your putting wheat upon the free list, bran and shorts go out of the country and the result is that the price will be higher to the Canadian farmer. Is that a consistent position for hon. gentlemen to take? The inference is that wheat should not have been put on the free list. As I said, if any situation should arise by which the livestock industry might be injured by reason of there being a duty on bran and shorts, this Government may be depended on to meet it as it would any other difficulty. The figures which I have put forward are correct, and the situation at present is a sound situation so far as the price of bran and shorts in Canada and the United States is concerned. My hon. friend stated the other day that he was a miller, but so great was his love for the farmers of his district that, notwithstanding it would be a very serious thing to him as a miller, he wanted the duty taken off bran and shorts. That day he was speaking for the farmers; to-day he comes forward as a friend of the millers, and he is sitting cheek by jowl with the hon. member for Richmond (Mr. Kyte), the avowed enemy of the millers in this House. Hardly a day passes that the hon. member for Richmond does not tell us of the tremendous profits made by millers, and he puts questions on the order paper asking the amount of excess profits we have taken from the miller. Yesterday I was able to show him that in the year 1915 we took from one milling company alone not less than $380,000. The member for Huntingdon says that the unfortunate miller will be ruined if the duty on cotton and jute bags and paper sacks is not removed. The whole discussion on free wheat which has agitated the House and the country for years past is now reduced to the monstrous injustice of the duty of 27½ per cent on cotton and jute bags and paper sacks. That is what we have come down to in the Budget debate. Let us discuss the matter on its merits.

My hon. friend says: why should the miller have to pay duty on cotton and jute bags and paper sacks? He says that the Canadian millers are in competition with the millers of the United States. So they are as to flour, which comes in free of duty. But flour, cotton and jute bags and paper sacks are not the only commodities that come in. The milling industry is concerned in the manufacture of other things besides flour. My hon. friend has paid no attention to the other commodities on which the millers of Canada have a substantial protection. What are they? Buckwheat flour, general tariff, one-half cent per pound and 7½ per cent war tax; corn flour, 25 per cent; rye flour, one-half cent per pound and 7½ per cent war tax; oatmeal, three-fifths of a cent per pound and 7½ per cent war tax; rolled oats, three-fifths of a cent per pound and 7½ per cent war tax; wheat germ meal, 25 per cent; bran, 25 per cent; feed, 25 per cent—and only wheat flour and semolina on the free list. The principle involved in the tariff is this: if there is a protection of 25 per cent, as there is in some of these cases, that duty has been determined upon with due regard among other things, to the duties that the manufacturer has to pay upon his material coming in. My hon. friend admits that the millers, of which he is one, are protected to the extent that I have stated. I submit that nothing has especially been brought to our attention which would warrant the Government in removing the duty from cotton and jute bags and paper sacks. This matter is of as little importance as any matter ever raised in a Budget debate. To show the House of how little importance it is, I point out that no miller in Canada, so far as I know, except the member for Huntingdon, has asked for the removal of the duty upon bags. My hon. friend says that the Canadian millers are in competition with the American millers. In the first place, they have the freights in their favour, I am informed that the cost of a 25 pound paper sack is 2 cents, of a 50 pound sack, about 4 cents, and of a cotton bag about 10 cents. In view of the protective duties which the millers enjoy upon their products other than flour, they have not asked us to take any action with regard to the duty upon bags. But the member for Huntingdon is so convinced that a grave injustice is being done the millers that he brings forward this resolution. If at a time of a revision of the tariff, good reason was shown for the reduction of these duties, the Government would consider the situation. But this is not the time to consider it, nor has the Government been asked to consider it by any one except the member for Huntingdon. My hon. friend's motion, therefore, is very trifling and unimportant indeed. If the matter were of consequence, the millers would have brought it to the attention of the Finance Department.

I wish to call attention to another aspect of the case to which the member for Huntingdon has not adverted. Many industries in Canada are engaged in the manufacture of cotton and jute bags and paper sacks; they may be found in Winnipeg, Montreal, Toronto and other parts of Canada. These manufacturers have to pay duty upon the material which they import into Canada and upon all their machinery. Having regard to that fact, I think it would be most improper to remove the duties from their product. If, as I say, upon a general revision of the tariff and in the light of the circumstances then prevailing, it would be advisable for the Government to give consideration to the question of the duty upon these bags and sacks, the Government would do it, but in a proper way. It would have regard not only to the millers, but to the manufacturers of bags, some of whom are engaged in large industries. Consideration would be given also to the material which they import and to the conditions of their industry. That principle underlies the whole tariff and all the duties imposed by it.

I have shown that so far as bran and shorts are concerned, the Canadian farmer is not likely under present conditions to suffer from our action respecting free wheat. I have stated that if he does suffer, this Government can be depended upon to deal with the situation as its merits may warrant. I have shown also that the millers —I do not know that my hon. friend, although he is one of them, is authorized to speak for them all—have not deemed this matter of sufficient importance to bring it to the attention of the Finance Department. I have shown that they are protected under the tariff in respect of a great variety of their products. I have shown that the manufacturers of bags and paper sacks are interested in the duty upon these articles and that the matter should be dealt with, if it were advisable or necessary to deal with it, only upon a revision of the tariff. The amendment of the hon. member for Huntingdon should without hesitation be voted down, because it proceeds without regard to the duty upon the products of millers other than flour and without any regard to the industrial interests of those engaged in the manufacture of paper bags. Moreover, I know of no industry in Canada that is enjoying a greater prosperity during the war than the milling industry.

My hon. friend asserts that the milling industry will be seriously injured if the Government does not take the duty off cotton and jute bags and paper sacks. It will be very interesting to see how the hon. member for Richmond (Mr. Kyte) votes on this question. I would like to know what he has to say as to this. He says that the millers are making such tremendous profits that the Government should take possession of the mills, and his desk-mate (Mr. Robb) says that the milling industry is suffering to such an extent that if we do not take the duty off bags, irreparable damage is going to accrue to that industry. It will be difficult for the hon. member for Huntingdon and the hon. member for Richmond to reconcile their views on the matter. The same remark applies to other hon. gentlemen who have spoken, not as the champions of the millers, but as their enemies. Some hon. gentlemen opposite have declared that this Government has been in a conspiracy with the western millers to prevent the farmers from getting a proper price for their wheat. The hon. member for Huntingdon now asks hon. gentlemen opposite to vote in favour of taking the duty off bags, a duty which is a source of revenue to this country in a time of war, and the reason he gives is that the milling industry is suffering. When we come to vote on this matter, we shall see how hon. gentlemen opposite are going to reconcile these two points of view, which, it seems to me, are almost irreconcilable.

I have dealt with the domestic business, and I have pointed out that the Canadian miller has the advantage of the local market which is always the best market. So far as concerns the export business, if the Canadian miller pays a duty on bags and fills those bags with Canadian flour and exports them to the United States or any other country, then, as my hon. friend from Richmond has stated, that miller receives a drawback of 99 per cent of the duty paid on those bags. Therefore, as regards the export business, he is on a par with other manufacturers of flour outside of Canada. It would seem to me that the hon. member is attaching an entirely disproportionate amount of importance to this matter, and with all due respect I think he should not have taken the important step, although it is quite within his right, of moving what is really a vote of want of confidence in this Government, in respect of duties in regard to which, up to this date, no complaint has been made by any miller in Canada except himself.

Mr. HUGH GUTHRIE (South Wellington): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance has not dealt with this matter in the same spirit in which my hon. friend from Huntingdon introduced it, nor has he understood the spirit in which my hon. friend brought it before the House. It was the intention of my hon. friend to bring this question up directly as a question of the free entry into Canada of bran and shorts, and on account of difficulties which arose under the rules of this House in regard to bringing up that motion, the amendment was launched in its present form, practically in order to get over a technicality. I think my hon. friend understood that. If he did not, in my judgment, he should have.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Will my hon. friend allow me to state this? So far as I know there are two amendments before the House, one unconnected with the other, one ruled out of order, the other ruled to be in order. The latter is the one that we are discussing.

Mr. GUTHRIE: That is the one I purpose discussing. What I say is that the hon. member for Huntingdon, at the beginning of his remarks, made it clear to any one who desired to understand him, that he was bringing this matter before the House, not in the interest of the millers, but in the interest of the farming and dairying community in the county of Huntingdon. Had the hon. member been pleading his own case, I do not know that I would be willing to justify it.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Will my hon. friend be good enough to read the amendment?

Mr. GUTHRIE: I heard the speech of the hon. member.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The amendment is based on unfair discrimination against the millers.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I heard the amendment read, and I heard the speech of my hon. friend from Huntingdon, and I think the Minister of Finance understood it, and if he did not do so, it is because he did not pay any attention to it. The hon. member's speech was base entirely upon the fact that under the present tariff items there was an unjust discrimination against the farmers of Ontario, and no special plea was made in favour of the millers. Had the previous amendment not been ruled out of order, the present amendment would not have been moved. The Minister of Finance says there is no demand for any change in regard to these items. I will grant that there is no demand from the millers, but surely my hon. friend will not say he has no demand from the farmers of Ontario.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: None at all.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Well, the members in this House who represent the farmers of Ontario have certainly made strenuous demands upon the Minister of Finance, and have brought the matter to his attention as forcibly as we have been able to do so, and still the minister sits in his seat and does not intimate that there will be any relief. With all due respect to my hon. friend and to his great ability as a financier, I have this to say: that he has made a mistake in not making wheat products free as well as wheat. That is his mistake and he can rectify it without a general revision of the tariff. I will agree with him that this is no time for a general revision of the tariff, but he can rectify this slight mistake in regard to making wheat products free, just as last session he rectified what he considered an error in regard to apples. This is the situation in a nutshell. I cannot accept the Minister of Finance's statement in regard to prices. What he has given us is the average price for the year, and he has quoted the average prices in 1915, 1916 and 1917 up to the present date. The minister does not buy on average prices; the farmers of Ontario get the daily paper; they have the telephone, and when the opportunity comes to buy they do so, and they buy not on average prices, but the day's price. I believe the figures which I submitted to the House a day or two ago, and which I will repeat to the House now, are absolutely correct. I was spoken to on Saturday last by farmers on the question of bran and shorts for feed; I made the inquiry, and I know that the prices which I am going to give are correct. The prices on Saturday last, as between Toronto and Buffalo, were as follows:—

	Buffalo.	Toronto.
Bran	$32.50	$38.00
Shorts or middlings	36.75	44.00 to $50.00

Those were the figures on the 29th of this month. I take the Montreal Gazette for to-day, and I will give to-day's figures for Toronto: Toronto, mill feed prices, bran, $37 per ton; shorts, $43 per ton. I cannot give the Buffalo figures for to-day. The Toronto figures are per ton on track, Montreal freights, which applies to all points between North Bay and Toronto. There is, therefore, four or five dollars a ton difference.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: What is the difference along the boundary line east of Toronto? This tariff applies to the whole of Canada.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I do not understand the minister's question.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: My hon. friend has quoted prices at Buffalo and Toronto. Those are only two points. What about Montreal and places in the adjoining states?

Mr. GUTHRIE: I will give the prices at Boston and Montreal.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: And the freight rates.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Yes. At Boston on the 29th day of May bran was quoted at $34.50 per ton or $2 more than the price at Buffalo. Middlings were quoted at $38.75 per ton or $2 more than the price at Buffalo. On the same day the Montreal prices were bran, $38; shorts, or middlings, $44, with a spread up to $50. The freight rates are those which pertain to all points between North Bay and Toronto. I am not, however, going on the day's prices or on the prices given in the brokers' sheets. Men have come to me as recently as four or five days ago and have said: You are going to Ottawa, try, if possible, to get bran and shorts put on the free list. They know the situation and it has been brought to my hon. friend's attention by many hon. members on this side of the House so forcibly that he must have some reason for refusing to grant our request. Surely he can see that by making bran and shorts free, he is not going to injure anybody and he is going to help a very large number of people throughout the Dominion. Then why not take that course? See what an anomalous situation he has placed us in. We allow the wheat to go into the United States free, and yet we cannot get the bran from that wheat back into this country without paying a duty of 25 per cent. Our own wheat and our own bran go to the United States free, but we cannot get our own bran and our own shorts and middlings back free.

Mr. MORPHY: Is it not a fact that tremendous quantities of soft wheat come back to the Canadian miller from the Toledo district in Ohio, bringing the bran with it, under the free wheat regulation?

Mr. GUTHRIE: But there is not enough of it coming back, and the price shows that if the duty were removed $4 or $5 a ton would be the advantage the Canadian farmer would derive from it. As the hon. member for Huntingdon has pointed out, by reason of the drawback allowed on bags, there is a bonus of 60 cents a ton to the Canadian miller who exports his bran and shorts to the United States instead of selling them in Canada. This is a wrong that should be righted, and the Finance Minister with an assistant could right it in half an hour. We are not asking him to revise the tariff. We are simply pleading for a chance for the Canadian farmer to get cheaper feed for his hogs and for his cattle. As a matter of revenue this item amounts to nothing. I do not know whether the millers have asked for this or not, but whether or not, the farmers should be granted this relief; it is not going to hurt the millers. The figures I have given to-day are correct, or they were on the 29th. My hon. friend from Huntingdon presented the case in a very striking manner when he said that a man who imports a carload of feed has to pay in duty the price of the best cow in his herd. Under the strained conditions that exist to-day, $150 is a pretty heavy tax for a man to pay who is feeding dairy cattle to be used as food for ourselves and our Allies.

I know that this amendment is practically a motion of want of confidence, and perhaps it is not the most appropriate way of bringing the matter to the attention of the House, but if the Finance Minister will assure us that he will study this matter out and give the farmers this relief, not next year, but next month, or even this month, we shall all be satisfied on this side of the House, and it will be one step in the right direction.

Mr. J. W. EDWARDS (Frontenac): I am prepared to give my hearty support to any movement which has a tendency to reduce the price of mill feed to our farmers. But the motion which is before the House is not calculated to do that. Notwithstanding what my hon. friend from South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) has said, this motion is intended for the benefit of the millers of this country. It reads:

That inasmuch as cotton jute, or paper sacks, when containing flour, now enter Canada from the United States free of duty, and inasmuch as Canadian millers—

Canadian millers, you will observe, not Canadian farmers.

—inasmuch as Canadian millers employing Canadian labour are handicapped because they are compelled to pay on empty sacks and bags, a duty of 27½ per cent on cotton and jute bags and sacks, and a duty of 35 per cent on paper sacks, this House is of the opinion that such unfair discrimination should be removed: Therefore it is resolved that in the opinion of this House, cotton and jute bags and sacks and paper sacks, when imported by millers for use in their own mills, should be free of duty.

The farmer or agriculturalist is not mentioned from beginning to end of that amendment, nor is there any reference to him either direct or indirect, nor to the consumer either. It deals with the millers entirely, and in my humble judgment the millers in this country are not suffering, and are not entitled to any special consideration from this House. When the hon. member for Huntingdon was on his feet, I asked him for the import and export figures as between Canada and the United States for bran and mill feed, but he did not have them. I have now before me the figures for the years 1915 and 1916, which show that our imports from the United States of bran, mill feed, etc., amounted to $47,778 in 1915, and to $43,700 in 1916. Our exports of bran to the United States amounted to $778,626 in 1915, and to $1,602,158 in 1916. The Finance Minister this afternoon has given us the price of bran and mill feed in Canada and the United States for the past three years, and the figures indicate that the prices in Canada for the last three years have been uniformly lower than on the other side of the line. I think my hon. friend from Huntingdon admitted that. The hon. member for South Wellington has also given us the figures for one or two days at one or two points in the United States and Canada.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Those were governing points, both for Canada and the United States.

Mr. EDWARDS: We have the figures of the hon. member for one or two days at what he says were governing points in this country and the United States. In addition to that, and the statement of the Minister of Finance, we have our import and export figures for bran and mill feed, as between this country and the United States. If the hon. member for South Wellington is right in his statement that bran and shorts are cheaper on the other side of the line, then why in the name of heaven do the people of the United States, who are always supposed to have a pretty strong grip on the dollar, come over here and pay a higher price for our bran? We cannot overlook our export and import figures, and they emphatically indicate that the price on the other side of the line is higher than the price in Canada.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Then why maintain the duty?

Mr. EDWARDS: I have given these figures in controversion of what my hon. friend has said, and they indicate that the statement of the Minister of Finance is to be taken in preference to the statement of the hon. member from South Wellington.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Then why maintain the duty?

Mr. EDWARDS: Let me give the hon. member a reason why we should not interfere with the duty—a reason which he applauded until he almost raised blisters on his hands when the matter came up in the session of 1912-1913. Let me quote the words of his own leader, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, uttered in the House on that occasion (Hansard p. 30):

> Once a duty is imposed that duty should not lightly be interfered with.

He was referring to the duty on cement. The hon. member for South Wellington supported that; he said that it was perfectly right. The motion arose out of the Government's determination to cut the duty on cement in two. When hon. gentlemen opposite were in power, they did not show the farmers of this country much consideration in the matter of cement, which is used by our farmers all over the country, for they immediately raised the duty on cement coming from the United States. They immediately increased the duty on cement coming into this country from the United States. Under the National Policy of the Conservative party there had been a duty on cement, but bags containing the cement were free. But that did not suit hon. gentlemen opposite. Supported by the hon. member for South Wellington, they not only increased the duty on cement, but put a special duty on the bags containing cement. Why? Because they had such gentlemen as Senator Edwards and others in the cement merger, who are making hundreds of thousands of dollars out of the farmers by squeezing them on the price of cement. In this and scores of other cases that I could mention, where their friends are affected, their views about customs duties do not amount to a snap of your finger. If their friends can reap the benefit and take money from the pockets of the people, they will arrange the duties accordingly.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Is the hon. member (Mr. Edwards) in favour of removing or of maintaining the duty on bran and shorts?

Mr. EDWARDS: The hon. member (Mr. Guthrie) need not smile as if he thought he had asked me something that I would not answer. Hon. gentlemen opposite, including the hon. gentleman from Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) might smile when putting a question for information to hon. members on this side if we were like themselves and had as many policies as there are members. Every person knows that the Liberal party is a conglomerate, so far as their tariff policy is concerned of—

Mr. OLIVER: Not Nationalist and Tory.

Mr. EDWARDS: Where did the Nationalists learn their lesson? Let me tell the hon. member for Edmonton there is not a treacherous Nationalist utterance by Bourassa, Lavergne, or any other in the province of Quebec, but has its counterpart in the utterances of his own leader at different times in his career.

Mr. OLIVER: May I ask the hon. member to permit me to say that what he has stated is incorrect in substance and in fact?

Mr. EDWARDS: I do not know that the fact that the hon. member for Edmonton says that my statement is incorrect will materially alter the opinions of the people of this country. My word in this House or out of it is as good as his, and my record is as good as his. Now, to revert to the question asked by the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie). Could anything be plainer or fairer than the statement made by the Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White), that as soon as this Government perceives that the farmers can be benefited by a change of duties in regard to bran and shorts he is ready and willing to give that change? And he states the reason why there is no necessity for that change now—that the prices of bran and shorts in the United States are higher today than the prices on this side of the line. That is perfectly satisfactory to me, and I think that in so stating I answer the hon. gentleman. I am in favour of removing the duty on bran and shorts as soon as it can be shown that by so doing we shall benefit the farmers of this country, but I am not in favour of it merely because some hon. gentleman gets up and produces figures, or makes statements, which, in my humble judgment, when coming from the other side of this House, may always be taken with a liberal supply of salt. The hon. member for South Wellington, speaking in this House no longer ago than the day before yesterday, said:—

> I do not believe at any time in the haphazard revision of the tariff. I think that such a revision should be gone about systematically and scientifically. I think the tariff should be revised from time to time, and I hope that when the revision does take place, after hostilities are closed, we will be able to revise it downward. But I think that of all times this is about the most inopportune to disturb the industries and business of this country.

I agree with him; in fact, I might have quoted the words of the hon. member as an answer to the question that he asked me a moment ago; I went a little further in stating my opinion on this question of the duty on bran and shorts. But have these gentlemen any right to get up, and, under the cover of a motion intended for the benefit of the millers only, pose as the friends of the farmer? I say they have not. The whole course of the Liberal party in this country is one showing absolute disregard for the farmers except to try and hoodwink and blindfold them. Take their position in regard to farm implements, for instance. We had the spectacle here the other day of the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff), and the hon. member for Moosejaw (Mr. Knowles) advocating the removal of the duty on farm implements. Yet, a few years ago, when the proposition was made by the hon. member for Souris (Mr. Schaffner) to reduce the duty on these implements, the hon. member for Assiniboia, assuming to speak for western Canada, said that the motion of the hon. member for Souris ought not to be approved. And the hon. member for Moosejaw took the same position. But that is not all. These hon. gentlemen when in office did make a change which was nominally a slight reduction of the duty on agricultural implements. The duty on binders at that time was 20 per cent, and they cut it down to 17½ per cent. But at the same time they went to the manufacturers and said: You need not be a particle scared; we know what we are doing; we are simply doing this to satisfy the farmers, but we will fix it all right for you. And so they did. When the duty was 20 per cent the valuation for duty of a binder was $80, so that the duty was $16. But when they reduced the duty to 17½ per cent, they raised the valuation to $100, so that the duty collected was $17.50. That is the way they played the game of the manufacturers while pretending to the farmers that they were going to cut off the head of protection and trample on its body —that they were going to wade in gore, so far as protection was concerned. The whole object evidently was to hoodwink the farmers just the same as in the case of cement. They raved about the cement duty in their speeches in one part of the country, pretending that they would meet the wishes of the farmers. But they framed their tariff in such a way as to put hundreds of thousands of dollars into the pockets of Senator Edwards and other Grit heelers—excuse me, I would rather say, partisans of their own—whom they wanted to please. As a friend near me suggests, that is the policy they have pursued for fifteen years, a policy which differs in every part of the country. There are 221 constituencies in this country, and for the Liberal party there are 221 different tariff policies. That party, so far as tariff matters are concerned, is a thing of shreds and patches.

Down in one part of the country they want free potatoes. The hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Carvell) is for free potatoes, or he would fix the price of potatoes but only after he had sold his. Pure jealousy! He would put the price of potatoes down to $1.75 a bag when he had not any more to sell because he did not want his neighbours to get $3 or $2.50 just as he wanted to fix the price of hay. Then these hon. gentlemen come and plead that they are the friends of the farmer. I represent an agricultural constituency. I am certainly satisfied, representing the farmers of my part of the country, with the stand that the Minister of Finance has taken on this matter and the assurance that he has given the House this afternoon. I am satisfied that he will deal with this matter in the interest of the farmers as well as all other classes of the community fairly and at the proper time.

Mr. D. D. McKENZIE (North Cape Breton): Mr. Speaker, I have listened very carefully to the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards). He started out by being very careful to read the motion that was put before you, Sir. I thought that for once in his life he was going to hew to the line and stick closely to what is really the amendment before the Chair. But he was not very long speaking when the old spirit of slander crept upon him and he began to swing from the latitude which he had laid out for himself. It was not long before we heard him talking about Bourassa and Lavergne and all that stuff in which he delights to revel. Let me point out, by way of reply, some thoughts that ran through my mind as he was speaking about Bourassa and Lavergne. It is not very long ago that Bourassa was saying in his paper and on the platform that he had had enough of the English and England. He wanted nothing to do with them —not a man, not a dollar to support their cause or to forward English ideas. When he was, in his paper and on the platform promulgating his ideas in this country—

Mr. MIDDLEBRO: Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. I would like to know what Bourassa has to do with the duty on jute bags.

Mr. SPEAKER: The House will realize that I am somewhat embarrassed in that apparently the hon. member for North Cape Breton (Mr. McKenzie) is traversing something that was said by the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards) at a moment when I was not in the Chair. If the hon. member feels constrained to traverse the remarks of the hon. member for Frontenac, I would ask him to adhere as closely as possible to the subject before the House.

Mr. EDWARDS: I only spoke in reply to an interjection of the hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver).

Mr. McKENZIE: It is highly characteristic of the hon. gentleman who takes the objection (Mr. Middlebro). The chief whip was here during the divergence from the subject of debate and heard the expressions used by the hon. member for Frontenac and other speakers. That was perfectly all right, there was no harm in it.

5 p.m.

Rules to the winds, proper order to the dogs, as long as it is in the interest of the party of which he is a member, but the moment any one on this side of the House undertakes to reply to his observations, it is irregular and we must be called to order by the hon. member!

Mr. MIDDLEBRO: Does the hon. member not know that the remarks came from the hon. member for Frontenac because of a direct question asked him from the other side of the House?

Mr. McKENZIE: It does not make the slightest difference what gives rise to the discussion once it is permitted to go on. Once the observations are made, I submit there ought to be an opportunity given to reply to them. We on this side of the House are not to be taunted with Bourassaism, Lavergneism and Nationalism. It would be well for the hon. member for Frontenac if he could once get clear of the product of such ideas and doctrines as have been put forward by these gentlemen, and sweep his own house clean. If he got rid of the supporters of Nationalism in his own party and in the Government he would not have a corporal's guard in this House. If the hon. gentleman shows that he has the courage of his convictions and will declare himself to those he points out as traitors because they are Nationalists and friends of Bourassa, I will have the greatest respect for any statements he makes about matters of this kind. But, when Bourassa was at his worst, in his speeches, his papers and his propaganda in 1911, the great province of Ontario was financing him.

Mr. LALOR: I think the hon. gentleman is making a speech upon Nationalism and not on the question before the House, and I again call your attention, Mr. Speaker, to the fact that the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards) only replied to a question put to him by the hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver).

Mr. OLIVER: Will the hon. member (Mr. Lalor) say what the question was? I have no recollection of asking a question on any subject.

Mr. LALOR: It was not a question but an interjection. The hon. member raised the point, and the hon. member for Frontenac replied.

Mr. OLIVER: I raised no point and asked no question.

Mr. SPEAKER: The point of order is well taken, but if latitude is allowed to one hon. member, another hon. member on the other side should not be unduly restricted in reply. I ask the hon. member—

Mr. McKENZIE: I have almost finished my remarks.

Mr. SPEAKER: I ask the hon. member not to pursue that subject because it may lead to acrimonious discussion, detrimental to the orderly and proper consideration of the question before the House.

Mr. McKENZIE: I am not in the least degree acrimonious nor do I feel out of temper in the slightest.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: What would you be if you tried to be acrimonious?

Mr. McKENZIE: I did not quite hear the observation of the Minister of Trade and Commerce. If it is for the winning of the war I would be pleased to listen but if not it does not matter, I suppose. I have not often the honour of being interrupted by the Minister of Trade and Commerce and I am sorry I did not hear what he said because I would like respectfully to reply to him. But what I was pointing out—and I will be brief and cut it down—is that I am sick and tired of supporters of the Government, whenever they get on their feet, no matter what the subject is, turning to Nationalism and trying to represent that the origin and beginning and genesis of Nationalism is with the right hon. gentleman who leads the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). If Nationalism is bad, if Bourassaism is bad, if Lavergneism is bad, why did they take them to their hearts in 1911?

Some Hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. McKENZIE: Why are they hugging Nationalism to their hearts to-day and glad to have it?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order, order.

Mr. McKENZIE: They live with it.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. McKENZIE: They live with it; they try to keep it up; they sleep with it; they tried to breed it in 1911 and they have tried to breed it again. Now, that is all I propose to say on that subject. I promise my hon. friends opposite that every time they bring up this subject we will have something to say about it.

The resolution now before the House is a sort of double barrelled arrangement. There is a resolution that is said to be out of order and another resolution that is in order, and we have been to some extent discussing the one that is out of order on the one that is in order. I am not breaking my neck in trying to bring any great favours to the millers of this country unless they will show some fruit worthy of repentance and some fruit worthy of being cuddled and cared for by the Government of this country and by this Parliament. In the part of the country from which I come, we had always hoped that when the West was developed, when we had given them plenty of railways, when we had plenty of wheat, we in the far East, who are practically non-producers of flour, would have cheap flour and cheaper living. In Nova Scotia we produce large quantities of coal, iron, steel, fish, lumber and other materials, but we do not produce enough flour to feed our people. We therefore are very much interested in cheap flour. The Minister of Trade and Commerce and the Minister of Finance have done nothing to help out the situation in reference to the high cost of living and the cost of the product of the miller. The Minister of Finance makes the proud boast that he took $238,000 from one milling concern in Ontario. That milling concern immediately started to tax the fisherman, the lumberman, the farmer of the province of Nova Scotia and of other provinces until it could get back three times the amount which the minister is so proud of having taken from it. The hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Molloy) the other day informed us that the flour which is to-day bought in Sydney and by the working classes of Glace Bay, Sydney Mines and North Sydney at $17 a barrel was ground of wheat that was bought at $1.70 a bushel.

Mr. OLIVER: Less than that.

Mr. McKENZIE: And less than that. I think that the people of this country have a right to ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce not to allow the millers to pile on this enormous profit. Why does he permit the millers to rob the people of Canada by selling flour at $17 a barrel that could have been sold at $8.50 or $9. I want to point out to the Minister of Finance that the money he takes from the millers and other big concerns is simply taxed back by them upon the poor men of this country, and that it is a fallacy to say that it is taken from the wealthy men. We had an illustration of the same thing in the United States a few years ago. When that great financier Rockefeller gave $25,000,000 for the purposes of education to the federal treasury of the United States, he immediately turned around and added half a cent to the price of oil, and in less than a fortnight he had his $25,000,000 back. That is what is happening in the case of the millers, the money that he takes from them they tax back upon the poor people of this country. That is the explanation of flour selling at $17 a barrel to-day. If any favours are to be granted to the millers we, the common people of this country who have to buy the products of the millers, would like to see that we are getting some benefit from it. Something should be done by the Government for the relief of the poor man who is earning $2 or $2.50 a day, who finds it almost impossible to pay $17 for flour, 50 or 52 cents a pound for butter, and 40 or 50 cents a pound for beef. He cannot pay that out of the miserable pittance he receives in wages. I ask the minister to come to the rescue of the poor people and relieve them from the horrible and unbearable burdens which they have to carry by reason of the high cost of living, the exorbitant prices of many of the things they consume.

Mr. LALOR: Does the hon. member think that free flour has effected any relief to the people of this country?

Mr. McKENZIE: I am not talking about the tariff on flour. I say that the Government of this country, like those of other countries, should forbid the owner of flour, whether a miller or a middleman, from selling it at an exorbitant price. I know nothing to prevent the flour owners in the United States combining with the flour owners in this country and imposing a similar burden on the poor of the two nations. We are looking for some measure of real relief, not the haphazard measures that have been taken by this Government.

Mr. SPEAKER: A reply is allowed to a member who has made a substantive motion before the House, but not to a member who has moved an amendment. It is understood that the hon. member for Huntingdon is to be allowed the privilege of a reply by the consent of the House and in accord with an arrangement previously come to.

Mr. J. A. ROBB (Huntingdon): The Finance Minister said that I had introduced a resolution to help the millers, and then went on to point out that I made a speech to help the farmers in connection with free bran and shorts. But later on both the Minister of Finance and the member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards) laid stress on the fact that all our efforts this afternoon were to advance the cause of the millers, notwithstanding that the Minister of Finance had said that our speeches were altogether in favour of free bran and shorts. I am very much encouraged with the statements of the Finance Minister and the member for Frontenac. The Minister of Finance has said that the farmers may trust this Government to do what is fair and to put them in a right position, and the member for Frontenac has also said that just as soon as it can be proved conclusively that the farmers are wronged the Government will make it right. I want to explain the effect of free wheat on these prices. The Order in Council was passed on the 16th April. On the 14th April bran was worth $43.50 a ton in Buffalo and $38 a ton in Montreal and Toronto. On the 28th April it was $43.25 in Buffalo and $43 in Montreal. There was no advance in the United States, rather a reduction, but an advance of $5 a ton in Canada. That is what I complain of exactly. The Minister of Finance has given quotations for 1915, 1916 and 1917. He is living in the dead past. He gave quotations on bran and shorts under conditions that existed before they passed this Order in Council. But as soon as the Minister of Finance passed his Order in Council, which permitted bran and shorts to go free into the United States, but put a tax of 25 per cent upon them coming into Canada he reversed those conditions. The minister will find that in one or two years from now the conditions will be altogether changed.

Mr. WRIGHT: Does the hon. gentleman consider that the increase in the price of bran and shorts in Canada, to which he has been referring, is a hold-up by the millers?

Mr. ROBB: I am inclined to think that the hon. gentleman has guessed correctly. The tariff compels the millers to pay 27½ per cent duty on cotton and jute bags and 35 per cent on paper sacks. The Finance Minister has admitted that the figures which I gave were correct. He himself quoted figures in corroboration of what I said: that the cost of sacking flour in Canada was 8½ cents a barrel greater than the cost of sacking in the United States.

The minister lays stress on the assertion that I am the only miller who has complained. If he digs down deep enough into his own department he will find there a letter published in Canadian newspapers on Christmas Day, 1913, and signed, I think, by Mr. Black, of the Ogilvie Milling Company. Of that I am not sure; at any rate, it was signed by a large miller in Montreal, and it pointed out to the Government that if they passed an Order in Council accepting conditions imposed on Canada by Washington they would compel the millers to join those who were agitating for free admission of many articles into Canada, particularly of bags, sacks and milling machinery.

I was proceeding, when interrupted, to point out that conditions have changed since the Order in Council was passed. Bran and shorts to-day are worth $32.50 in the United States and $38 at points in Canada taking the same freights. These freights are what are known as zone freights. The price of bran or flour is fixed largely on the basis of blanket freights. In respect of goods going into the United States, Boston or Buffalo would be zone freight points.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Are there through freight rates on bran and shorts from Montreal to United States?

Mr. ROBB: I should not think so.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: If there are not through freight rates, then why should bran and shorts go from Montreal and surrounding districts into the United States? I am asking a question based on information which I obtained from one of the leading manufacturers of flour, bran and shorts in Canada, who told me that there were no through freight rates from the district in which Montreal is situated to the United States.

Mr. ROBB: That is quite right. The basis of all these prices is the rate on products coming from the West. In the Northwest, where the big mills are—Winnipeg, Moosejaw, Kenora, Fort William—or at Port Colborne, there are no cattle to eat the feed, which must be shipped east. The price is based on its value delivered at blanket freights. The production of bran and shorts in Montreal is only a bagatelle compared with what is required in this country; even in eastern Canada the supply is not sufficient. My complaint is that the millers can create scarcity by taking advantage of these through freights and shipping to the New England market via Buffalo and Niagara Falls. They are encouraged to do this by the duty on bags, which gives them a rebate on all bags exported. I think, therefore, that I have proved to the minister that conditions have changed since the Order in Council was passed. I am encouraged to believe that he will change his mind and make some tariff changes.

I know that the resolution which I have presented is out of order, but it was brought in to enable the House to discuss the question. With the permission of the House, therefore, I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is it the pleasure of the House that the hon. member have leave to withdraw his amendment?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I prefer that it should be declared lost on division.

Mr. SPEAKER: Amendment lost on division.

Motion of Sir Thomas White agreed to, and the House went into Committee of Supply, Mr. Blain in the Chair.

IN COMMITTEE OF SUPPLY.

Customs—to provide for expenses of maintenance of revenue cruisers and for preventive service, $100,000.

Mr. MACDONALD: How many of these cruisers are on Atlantic coast?

Mr. REID: Last year we chartered a boat to take the place of the Government cruiser Margaret, which we got two or three years ago, but which was sent to Halifax when war was declared. Last year we got a steamer, the Dollard, from the Marine and Fisheries Department, but this year we have been unable so far to arrange for a steamer, the Dollard having been sent to Halifax on naval service. The Government steamers are all in use. It has always been the custom to have an item of this kind for that service. We have another little steamer, the Alert, down at Sydney. I think that is the only steamer that comes out of that port.

Mr. KYTE: Has the Government recently chartered a steamer for customs preventive service in the St. Lawrence?

Mr. REID: Not that I know of. I do not know of any being under order.

Mr. KYTE: I am informed that Mr. W. M. Macdonald of Sydney recently purchased in the United States a steamer which he has chartered to the Department of Customs and which is at present undergoing repairs on the marine slip at Point Tupper. Has the minister any information to give to the committee on that matter?

Mr. REID: A charter would not be made until I had been consulted, and no charter or offer of that kind has as yet reached me. The chief officer of the Preventive Service, Mr. Wilson, who is in charge of such vessels, when we were informed by the Marine Department that we could not have the marine steamer, Dollard, has been making inquiries for some little time, and he may possibly have been discussing this matter with the gentleman mentioned by the hon. member, but if he has, I have never heard of it before nor has the matter been submitted to me.

Mr. KYTE: I was at Sydney a few days ago, and the statement was made that this steamer had been purchased for the purpose of chartering her to the Government for the customs service, and I want to know from the minister if any negotiations to that end have recently been on foot.

Mr. REID: I do not think I can make the matter clearer than I have done. No negotiations have as yet been submitted to me, and I have not heard of any; but negotiations may be going on with the officials of the department, and when they come to some decision as to what they think would be fair to submit to me for my approval, I would it of it then. Therefore, I am not in a position to say that no negotiotions heve been going on. It may be possible that the officials have been carrying on negotiations, but nothing has yet reached me.

Mr. McKENZIE: Are these cruising steamers in the preventive service supposed to see that American fishermen do not fish within the three mile limit? Has the Alert anything to do with that? I know, when the late Captain Borden was in the service of the Customs Department it was part of his duty at certain seasons of the year to see that American fishermen did not come within the three mile limit. While he was performing the same service that the Alert is performing now, he made several captures. The Alert is a very slow concern; she is supposed to overtake other vessels, and I suppose it is the intention that she will overtake them on the same principle that the lion catches the jackal; when the jackal makes a run all around the country, he gets confused and runs into the lion's mouth. If the Alert catches anything, it will certainly be on that principle, because I understand she is a very slow boat. It so happens, however, that while she is slow, she is owned by a very fast crowd, and that no doubt suits the ideas of the minister, and he will pass over all the sins of omission and commission of the Alert so long as the one great aim and purpose is served of putting money into the pockets of his Tory friends. I want to remind the minister that I hope this Alert will keep within her proper bounds. Of course, her speed is such that it is not difficult for her to keep within any bounds, but this boat was not always in the preventive service. She was hired for preventive work, but she was willing to do other things in the interest of the Tory party. She used to be chartered by this Government and by my hon. friend who presides over the department for carrying election rum down to different parts of Victoria county.

Mr. REID: She was pretty fast then. I am surprised that the hon. member says she was a slow boat, because I thought at that time she was pretty swift.

Mr. McKENZIE: She got her name into a code which was made by which the workings of the department in connection with the Alert was understood. It so happened that we discovered the code through the very name of the Alert. This code name was appearing so often in the code telegrams that at last we discovered that this boat was being referred to, and once we found out that this meant the Alert, of course, we unravelled the whole business, and I must admit that in that case she was swift in bringing destruction to the Tory party, because once we found out what those telegrams meant the results were startling. What I want to impress upon the minister is this, that there will be elections again, and there will possibly be by-elections, and I want, in all seriousness, to impress upon him that the money that comes into his hands and that he is expending in connection with the public service of this country is furnished by Grits and Tories alike, and I think that the minister will concede at once that it is most unfair to compel the Grits to supply the funds to carry on a Tory campaign, because, when we were furnishing the money to run the Alert and to pay her captain and crew, we were furnishing the money to fight against ourselves. I am sure the minister will rise to the lofty eminence of saying to the officers of the department that they must not prostitute the service and departmental property to such purposes as they used the Alert and everything belonging to it in those days. I am not speaking in a haphazard way, because all these facts were brought out in the Supreme Court of Nova Scotia, and it was shown that all facilities of Government were put at the disposal of the Tory party in that connection. Not only the Alert, but the telegraph system and the telephone system of the Government were put at their disposal in the same way. I wish to give the minister notice that if he should again commit such a reckless error as that we shall not promise to deal with him in such a mild manner as I am doing in bringing this matter before him now. I hope hereafter that each party will pay their own election expenses, and that Tories will not be permitted to put their hands into the public treasury and to take out Grit money for the purpose of fighting the Grits.

Mr. REID: I agree with the hon. member that Government steamers, or Government property, should not be used in such cases as the hon. member has stated. I do not think that is fair. I think the position taken by the hon. member is absolutely right. I remember the case that the hon. member mentions. I did not know, of course, at the time that a Government steamer had been used for any other purpose than that for which she was chartered.

Mr. MACDONALD: Didn't you get a telegram?

Mr. REID: No, not in any shape or form. I did not know anything about it.

Mr. MACDONALD: We were inquiring in the House about it.

Mr. REID: That was after the boat had started on the trip. As soon as the matter was brought to my attention, I had the boat stopped. They tell me—I don't know whether it is true or not—that Government steamers were used for this purpose when an election came on under the late Government.

Mr. MACDONALD: Who told you that?

Mr. REID: Not the hon. member. However, whether it was done or not, I do not think it is right.

Mr. MACDONALD: What does the Alert cost a month?

Mr. REID: $1,250. She is paid the same rate as the Gladiator, whose place she took.

Mr. MACDONALD: Where is the Dollard stationed?

Mr. REID: She runs anywhere on the St. Lawrence, from Quebec down to Anticosti, the Magdalen Islands, and all around those waters. She has taken the place of the Margaret, and is in the same service. We have not been able to charter any steamer so far this season, but we shall be glad to get one if we can.

Mr. MACDONALD: How many are on the staff at New Glasgow?

Mr. REID: There are six: J. Fred McDonald, H. W. Baillie, H. D. Gillis, S. T. McCurdy, S. M. McKenzie, and A. A Clay.

Mr. MACDONALD: Has Mr. Clay been permanently appointed?

Mr. REID: He has not been appointed permanently up to the present. He was put on as a landing waiter on August 16, 1915.

Mr. MACDONALD: He is not a returned soldier?

Mr. REID: I could not say.

Mr. MACDONALD: Is it intended to make his appointment permanent?

Mr. REID: Before taking a man on we generally have him examined by the inspector or collector as to his fitness for the position; if satisfactory, he is appointed on probation for six months, and if he makes good he is then appointed permanently. I know of no reason why Mr. Clay has not been permanently appointed, and now that my hon. friend has brought the matter to my attention, I will have an Order in Council passed appointing him if everything is satisfactory.

Mr. MACDONALD: It has been stated that Mr. Macdonald is going to retire. Has the minister heard anything of that?

Mr. REID: There has been no application from him for superannuation and retirement. He has been in the service since 1879. If he retires, he would be entitled to 70 per cent of his salary, about $1,260.

Mr. MACDONALD: If he retires, will a returned soldier be appointed in his place?

Mr. REID: Yes, but we might have to fill the position temporarily until we can find a returned soldier qualified for the position. At the present time we have a number of returned soldiers acting as relieving officers, taking the place of those who are absent on holidays or from sickness. If Mr. McDonald retired, and I was not able to get a returned soldier in that constituency to fill the position, I would get one from outside.

Mr. MACDONALD: There are plenty of returned soldiers there.

Mr. REID: He would have to be qualified for the position.

Mr. MACDONALD: Would he have to be recommended by the man in charge of the patronage?

Mr. REID: We take the best man we can get.

Mr. MACDONALD: I am speaking of returned soldiers.

Mr. REID: I have not heard of any patronage committee in that riding. I am the only patronage committee for the Customs Department.

Mr. MACDONALD: As the hon. gentleman has never heard of a patronage committee in my constituency, I might remind him that he has never asked me to recommend any appointments, and perhaps I may be said to represent the people there. Where does my hon. friend get his information about there being no patronage committee in my constituency?

Mr. REID: I make inquiries of my own. There is no patronage committee.

Mr. MACDONALD: Only some particular gentleman who happens to have your confidence, I suppose?

Mr. REID: I know a lot of people.

Mr. MACDONALD: I am a little curious about this. There was a vacancy in the postmastership at Stellarton a few weeks ago, but although the minister claims great credit for having always appointed returned soldiers, this position was given to a man who was not a returned soldier, but was recommended by the local chairman of the Conservative Committee. There were quite a few returned soldiers in the district who were quite competent to fill the position, which did not require any technical training. In view of the experience in my own constituency I do not know whether my hon. friend's protestations in regard to returned soldiers are to be regarded seriously. Perhaps a different policy is followed in the Post Office Department.

Mr. REID: I am following the Order in Council and appointing returned soldiers wherever possible. I understand the same policy is followed by all the departments. but I have enough to do to look after my own department. I have already appointed over 233 returned soldiers, and there are still a number of good positions vacant. When a vacancy occurs the people, of course, are very anxious that a returned soldier in that constituency should receive the appointment. Men are coming back wounded in much greater numbers than before. I had a letter to-day from a man in an Ontario constituency telling me about a young man who had occupied a splendid position and who is now back from the war having suffered the loss of a leg, and asking me if I could give him a position. I was pleased to be able to say that I could, and in his own constituency. That is the policy I have pursued. If, for instance, a vacancy should occur in the hon. member's constituency, and a soldier should return to that constituency who was qualified to fill the position, I should be glad to appoint him.

Mr. CARVELL: Is that the policy in the other departments of the Government?

Mr. REID: I have told the committee about the Order in Council on the subject.

Mr. CARVELL: It does not seem to be the policy of the Department of Public Works. In my constituency last September a returned soldier was appointed to the position of caretaker of a public building, a position not calling for very great skill or ability. The man got notice from Ottawa of his appointment. But there was an election, and a man there who was not a returned soldier, but who represented about a dozen votes, threatened to bolt the party unless he got the position, so they turned down the soldier and gave the place to the politician. I only wanted to know whether the hon. minister was speaking for himself or for the Government.

Mr. REID: I know that the Order in Council was passed, and I do not know that the other departments are acting differently from my own. At the same time, I am looking after my own department, and I suppose each head of a department will be able to speak for himself.

Mr. MACDONALD: Would the minister regard with any degree of interest or attention a letter that I might write to him with regard to a returned soldier?

Mr. REID: If there is a position vacant and a returned soldier fit to fill the position I will appoint him.

Mr. MACDONALD: Would the minister ask the attention of the Post Office Department to a case that I might lay before him?

Mr. REID: I am pretty busy attending to my own department.

Mr. MACDONALD: When another minister goes away, it seems quite the custom to call the hon. gentleman (Mr. Reid) to take temporary charge of the department. I think he has acted for almost every one of his colleagues except the Prime Minister. I am bound to say that he is one of the most competent men in the Government, and it is on that account that I appeal to him, because I feel that he could exercise a good influence upon his colleague, whoever he may be, who is Acting Postmaster General. A vacancy occurred in my constituency in April last, but there was not the slightest suggestion of appointing a returned soldier, though there are quite a number of returned soldiers any one of whom would be competent to fill the position. Will not the minister be good enough to call the attention of the Post Office Department to this matter? Who is Acting Postmaster General?

Mr. REID: Mr. Patenaude.

Mr. MACDONALD: Will not the Minister of Customs call the attention of the Acting Postmaster General to the fact that the provisions of the Order in Council which has been referred to have not been observed with regard to the appointment of a postmaster in the town of Stellarton, in my constituency. The hon. gentleman is in more direct communication with the Acting Postmaster General than I am.

Mr. REID: I had to go to the Acting Postmaster General a few months ago with regard to a vacancy in my own constituency. We had a vacant post office there—quite a nice position. I asked the Acting Postmaster General to fill it temporarily until we could find a returned soldier who could fill it suitably. Of course, the hon. gentleman said that that was the intention. That position in my constituency is held until there is a returned soldier to fill it.

Mr. MACDONALD: Who was appointed temporarily?

Mr. REID: A girl who has been in the department ten or twelve years fills it temporarily, with some assistance. The other day, the case was mentioned of the postmastership of Smiths Falls, in the constituency adjoining mine. The question was asked whether it was the intention to appoint a returned soldier, and the Acting Postmaster General replied that it was. I will mention the case of Stellarton, and will say that I hope that the same policy that I am following is being carried out in other departments.

Mr. MARCIL: Has the minister reached a conclusion with regard to the customs collectorship at Montreal?

Mr. REID: That was fully discussed last night, as the hon. member will see by referring to Hansard.

Mr. McKENZIE: There was an officer of the Customs Department in North Sydney, a Mr. Brennan, who went to the front as an aviator. He returned wounded, but, having recovered, has gone back to the front again. His position in the customs service has been filled, but not by a returned soldier. Can the minister tell me whether this appointment to succeed Mr. Brennan is only temporary, or whether the new man has been permanently appointed?

Mr. REID: Mr. Brennan, as the hon. gentleman has stated, is absent on active service. When a vacancy occurs in this way, the policy is, as I have stated, to put in a relieving officer, on the understanding that he holds the position only until the soldier returns, or until it is ascertained that he will not be able to return. That was the policy previous to the Order in Council. This may be the man who was appointed—Hector W. McNeill.

Mr. McKENZIE: That is the man who was appointed.

Mr. REID: He is on the list as an acting officer. If he had been appointed prior to the Order in Council, and if he has been acting since, I would not feel justified in dismissing him now until we see what is the result in so far as Mr. Brennan is concerned.

Mr. McKENZIE: I understand it is the policy in regard to the inside service that, if a man enlists, his salary goes on irrespective of whatever pay he gets as a soldier. Does that rule apply to the outside service as well? I am not begrudging Mr. Brennan anything he may be getting. I am asking if this young gentleman, who left his position in the customs at North Sydney and who is performing service at the front as an aviator, comes within that rule or gets the salary that he was getting from the department before he enlisted?

Mr. REID: The rule is the same for both services. The Order in Council passed first gave the full salary. Then, in 1915 it was provided that they would get the one salary. The Orders in Council apply to both the inside and outside services. As far as Mr. Brennan is concerned, he would come under the first Order in Council were it not, as I have been informed, that he enlisted in the Imperial flying corps, and not in the Canadian Overseas Forces. If Mr. Brennan had enlisted in the Canadian Overseas Forces prior to November 1, 1915, he would come within this rule of getting his full salary. But, if after that he would simply get the difference between his military pay and his civil service pay.

Mr. McKENZIE: I do not know the date of Mr. Brennan's enlistment but I know he took a course in aviation and enlisted in Canada. Evidently he put himself at the disposal of the powers that be and when he got across I do not know where they put him. We had no Canadian aviation corps at the time and I suppose he was willing to go wherever they put him. He certainly enlisted, received his commission and took his course in Canada before he went across.

Mr. REID: I remember that the Imperial Government had an aviation school and were enlisting for their own Imperial forces. Any official who enlisted in the aviation corps received a commission from the Imperial Government and not from the Canadian Government and, of course, he would not come within the Order in Council. Therefore, Mr. Brennan is not getting anything from the Customs Department but he would probably be getting more in the aviation corps than the amount of his salary here. I do not think there will be very much difference.

Mr. McKENZIE: I would like the minister to look into it. If Mr. Brennan, as a member of the outside service of the department, would be entitled to a continuation of his salary if he had enlisted in the Canadian service, he should not be deprived of that advantage because of the particularly useful and hazardous course he had to take or because he had to go into the Imperial Service, particularly in view of the fact that we had no aviation corps of our own that he could have joined.

Mr. REID: This is the first time this matter had been brought to my attention. Cases of this kind would be very few, as far as I can see, and I think they might be very generously dealt with. But, they would not come within the scope of the Order in Council as it now is. I will take that matter up. It is one that can be settled at any time by an application from Mr. Brennan or any one else that has enlisted in that way. It might open up a question though in quite a lot of cases because there are a large number of men from Canada who have gone over and enlisted in the same way.

Mr. McKENZIE: Mr. Brennan belongs to my town but he is not a supporter of mine at all. I wish the minister would remember what I am saying and that he would give me an assurance, that if an application is made on behalf of this gentleman, it will be considered.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

[Mr. McKenzie.]

After Recess.

The committee resumed at eight o'clock, Mr. Rainville in the Chair.

Indians, Ontario and Quebec—Relief, medical attendance and medicines, $28,000.

Mr. LEMIEUX: On this item I wish to express my gratitude to the hon. gentleman for what he has done towards maintaining a hospital for the Indians at Caughnawaga. For many years it was known that the Indians were exposed, especially to tuberculosis, until a certain lady from France devoted her fortune to help those poor unfortunates. Although she had quite a large fortune, yet the maintenance of a hospital at Caughnawaga required the help of the Government. I appealed not in vain to the present Minister of the Interior, and he very graciously acquiesced to the request to aid that hospital. I am proud to say that with what has been given annually for the maintenance of that hospital the lady in question has been in a position to grant a very considerable relief to the band at Caughnawaga. Now that my hon. friend has done so nobly for that cause, I would appeal to him again, this time not for financial aid, because I understand that for the present he has done well enough towards the institution. But for the last two years a quarry which, I think, belongs to the Government as it is on the reserve, has been exploited by a gentleman in Montreal, Mr. Giroux, in virtue of a contract passed with one of the departments. That quarry is in the neighbourhood of the institution and as a result of its exploitation there is, first, the noise which is very annoying to the patients, and, secondly, a dust which invades the institution much to the worry of the medical staff, the nurses and the inmates. May I press the minister to see that this quarry is not further exploited. I believe that stone can be extracted from another point on the reserve, and surely the welfare of the sick and the staff of the hospital should take precedence over the little profits which might be made from the operation of the quarry. I think the minister might safely put the matter into the hands of his deputy by whom it would be dealt with expeditiously. In fact, I have taken on myself to interview Mr. Scott on two occasions, and we have appointed ourselves a delegation to wait on the minister in order to see if this annoyance cannot be abated.

Mr. ROCHE: I understand there have been some negotiations between the company having the lease for the stone quarry and the department, and that some complaints have been made to the department regarding the noise, dust, etc. The company has promised to mitigate these annoyances to the greatest possible extent, although I do not know if the noise can be abated. If stone could be removed from another part of the reserve, I think that would be quite satisfactory.

Indians, Nova Scotia—Salaries, $4,400.

Mr. KYTE: What determination has been arrived at regarding the disposition of the Indian Reserve at Sydney? I think this was in the Exchequer Court a year or so ago.

Mr. ROCHE: In accordance with the Indian Act, Judge Audette, of the Exchequer Court, went to Sydney, took evidence and completed his report. Under the terms of the Indian Act, this report is to be submitted to the Governor in Council and then to be submitted to Parliament and to be approved or disapproved by resolution at the next ensuing session. I had the privilege of laying the report upon the Table some time ago, and the resolution is now on the Order Paper and will come up in course of time for discussion. It is not my intention to ask any appropriation at this session of Parliament for the purchase of a new reserve. Judge Audette has recommended that the Indians be removed from their present reserve in the town and that another reserve be secured for them, but it is not my intention to ask for any new reserve at the present session.

Mr. KYTE: Has any determination been arrived at as to where the new reserve is to be located?

Mr. ROCHE: Three alternative sites have been examined and reported on by Judge Audette. He recommends one of these three; but there has been no determination as to which of the three should be selected, as I thought it somewhat premature, during war time, to vote a sum for this purpose when the matter was not very urgent.

Mr. KYTE: How is the land in the present reserve to be disposed of?

Mr. ROCHE: By auction sale.

Mr. OLIVER: In regard to the removal of the Sydney reserve, how did it become necessary to invoke the terms of the Act? To what extent did the Indians make objection, and on what grounds?

Mr. ROCHE: I was informed that it was by reason of the circumstances connected with this particular reserve that my hon. friend introduced the amendment to the Indian Act in 1911. This reserve is on one of the main thoroughfares in the city of Sydney, which has a population of about 19,000. On several occasions agents of the department interviewed the Indians and endeavoured to get them to make a surrender. The Indians, however, refused to do so, largely on the ground that, as many of them work in the steel plant and the reserve is convenient to their occupations in the city, a change would be inconvenient. Some of them are quite agreeable to surrender provided they get another suitable reserve, but they do not wish to be moved any considerable distance from the town.

Mr. OLIVER: What was offered the Indians as a consideration for their voluntary removal?

Mr. ROCHE: Practically the same considerations and provisions as are offered now by the judge of the Exchequer Court: that we should sell their land to the best possible advantage, move them to another reserve as convenient and suitable as possible, erect their houses on the new reserve, and put them in possession.

Mr. OLIVER: As a general rule, when surrenders are taken from the Indians they are guaranteed a minimum valuation on their original property. Is there any such guarantee in this case, and if so, what is the amount?

Mr. ROCHE: No. We are to dispose of their present reserve by public auction.

Mr. OLIVER: And they are to have no protection in the way of a minimum price?

Mr. ROCHE: They would, no doubt, have the protection of an upset price on the land. We will rehabilitate them in their new reserve and place them under as favourable conditions as possible. We have always endeavoured to protect the rights of the Indians in the past, and shall do so in the future. It is only when they object upon what we consider to be unreasonable grounds that we invoke the terms of the Indian Act. We think they have every guarantee of getting value for their present reserve by our establishing an upset price and disposing of the land by public auction. In a city of that size there would likely be considerable competition for land in the middle of the city and on the main thoroughfare.

Mr. OLIVER: As I took some responsibility for placing this amendment in the Indian Act, I am interested in this its first application. While I appreciated at the time the necessity of some such provision, I did not fail to appreciate the right of property held by the Indians in their reserve, and I should be sorry if the minister has not retained that appreciation in his dealings with this Indian band. I know that the circumstances are such as to make it desirable that the Indians should be removed from this reserve, and I appreciate the fact that there may have been difficulties in the way of securing their consent. But when the strong arm of the law is invoked in dealing with the property of these people and with their personal rights, the Government should take not a less careful but a more careful view of the measure of those rights. They should be sure that nothing is done to derogate from the right of those people to the full value of the property. The property is well known to the public and it must have some measure of fixed value, if city real estate has any fixed value to-day in Canada. The services of the Commissioner should have been utilized to satisfy the Indians and those who wished to see justice done them that they would get a fair value for the land; and the sum so considered to be a fair value should be stated to the Indians as well as to the House. My hon. friend will understand that I make no suggestion of impropriety of action on his part or on the part of any of his officials.

But I can see very grave danger in the fact of the Government simply reaching out its hand and taking away their property from these people and selling it to the highest bidder without giving any assurance to them or to the country that they will be absolutely protected. I do not need to go into any further details as to what may occur in such cases, but it will certainly appear right to the minister that he should have availed himself of the services of a commissioner to place a valuation upon that village.

Mr. ROCHE: That has been done.

Mr. OLIVER: I have asked the minister for that valuation, and he has not given it to me.

Mr. ROCHE: I think the hon. gentleman must have misunderstood me. The commissioner did inquire and take evidence as to the value of the present reserve, and he has given his estimate of the value. I just forget the amount, but it was somewhere in the neighbourhood of $5,000. The hon. member knows that the reserve consisted of only a little over two acres.

Mr. OLIVER: Yes, I am quite aware of that.

Mr. ROCHE: The commissioner took evidence from several parties as to the valuation of the land, and he made a recommendation himself as to the value of it.

Mr. OLIVER: That, of course, clears the point provided that the department is prepared to stand by that valuation of the commissioner and to guarantee that amount as a minimum to the Indians. That is what I have been arguing for in my remarks. Now that the minister has stated the amount, it has become public, and while some may think the amount too small and some too large, unless the amount is fixed and publicly stated, I still maintain that the Indians are not receiving fair protection.

Mr. CARROLL: I understand the minister has been discussing the Sydney reserve?

Mr. ROCHE: Yes.

Mr. CARROLL: The minister has made the statement that there are three sites available; where are the sites?

Mr. ROCHE: A couple of weeks ago I laid the report of the judge upon the table of the House. I cannot carry all the details in my memory.

Mr. CARROLL: I will look into the matter myself. The minister will recollect that this subject was brought up a few years ago, and that I suggested to him then that the Indians of the Sydney reserve are in a somewhat different position from the Indians in other parts of the Maritime Provinces. The Indians at Whycocomagh and other reserves are following their ancient occupations of basket-making and tub-making, but the Indians of Sydney get work around Sydney and they do not follow the old occupations of the Indian tribes in that district. The only interest that I have in the matter, as representing the Indians, is that I should like the minister to take precautions to see that the Indians are not sent so far away from Sydney that they will not be in a position to follow the occupations in which they have been brought up, such as working in the mines or with private families. Apart from that, it would be for the interest of Sydney that the Indians should be removed.

Mr. ROCHE: I do not think there will be any interference with regard to their following their former occupations.

Mr. KYTE: I presume there will be a surplus left out of the $5,000 after paying for the new reserve. What is proposed to be done with that surplus?

Mr. ROCHE: My hon. friend means the surplus over and above the $5,000, that is, if we put the land up for sale and it fetches more than $5,000.

Mr. KYTE: Yes.

Mr. ROCHE: That would go to the Indians.

Mr. KYTE: Is the amount to be funded for them or distributed amongst the members of the tribe?

Mr. ROCHE: The hon. member overlooks this fact. We have to secure a new reserve, and the amount received for the land will not be nearly sufficient to place the Indians on a new reserve, and we shall have to come to Parliament for an extra appropriation. The surplus over and above the $5,000 will be applied to the expense of settling the Indians on the new reserve. We shall have to purchase a reserve, have buildings put up, remove the Indians and so on, so that the surplus over the $5,000 will be applied to that.

Indian Department—Miscellaneous and unforeseen, $9,162.

Mr. TURRIFF: How much of the vote for miscellaneous and unforeseen was expended last year?

Mr. ROCHE: In 1915-16, $3,758.

Mr. TURRIFF: Do the officers of my hon. friend's department not know approximately how much of the vote was expended last year?

Mr. ROCHE: The deputy informs me that it was nearly all expended.

New Brunswick Indians—Salaries, relief, medical attendance and medicines, miscellaneous and unforeseen, repairs to roads, and to provide for encouragement of agriculture, $16,284.

Mr. ROCHE: That is the same amount as last year.

Mr. COPP: How many officials are included in the salary item?

Mr. ROCHE: There is the superintendent of the northeastern division; there is an agent at Buctouche; there is an agent at Fredericton for the southwestern division; there is an agent at Perth for the northern division, and then we have constables at Big Cove, Kent County, Burnt Church, Northumberland county and Eel Ground, Northumberland county.

Mr. MICHAUD: Has the agent at Perth been changed lately?

Mr. ROCHE: Mr. Wootten is the agent there.

Mr. MICHAUD: There was a Mr. Waite there.

Mr. ROCHE: He was removed some time ago.

Mr. MICHAUD: For what reason?

Mr. ROCHE: The hon. gentleman will remember that either last session or the session before there was some discussion in connection with some timber cutting on the reserve, and as we did not think that Mr. Waite fulfilled all his duties on that occasion, we removed him from his position.

Mr. MICHAUD: It is very unfortunate that Mr. Waite has been removed from his position, because if he had remained as agent of the Indian reserve, probably the wood that the minister mentions would be preserved better than it will be now.

Mr. ROCHE: It was during Mr. Waite's regime that the wood was removed.

Mr. CARVELL: Surely the minister does not blame Mr. Waite for cutting timber on the Indian reserve. I know something about the matter, and I do not think the minister ought to make that charge against Mr. Waite, because Mr. Waite did all he could to preserve the Tobique Indian reserve, when a friend of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries went as far as he could go. I want to give the Minister of the Interior credit that when he found out exactly what the condition was, he stopped the cutting of timber. The minister is entitled to a good deal of credit for saving an Indian reserve from the political grafters who are after it. Do not blame Mr. Waite for this.

Mr. KYTE: Is it the intention of the Government to appoint a second superintendent of Indian agencies for the Maritime Provinces?

Mr. ROCHE: No.

Mr. MICHAUD: Is there a special appropriation for repairing the road on the Indian reserve at Edmundston?

Mr. ROCHE: Yes.

Mr. MICHAUD: I hope the grant will be sufficient to put this road in good repair, because every spring it is almost impossible to go through that Indian reserve, and as that road is the main highway along the St. John river, I hope the minister will give a good grant so that we shall have a pretty good road in the near future.

Mr. ROCHE: There has been some correspondence on that matter.

Mr. CARVELL: I should like to know if a certain gentleman by the name of Colonel Sheridan is still in the employ of the department as Indian agent in the province of New Brunswick.

Mr. ROCHE: Yes.

Mr. CARVELL: Does the minister remember that about a year ago I pointed out to him that this gentleman had been compelled to resign his seat in the Legislature of New Brunswick for wrong-doing. I do not want to go into the details again to-night, for I gave them to the minister a year ago, and the minister was very much surprised, I believe, when he got that information. He promised to investigate the matter, and I think he even went so far as to say that if the facts were as alleged Colonel Sheridan was not a proper man to occupy a position under the Government. So strong was the feeling against the conduct of this gentleman and his confreres in the county of Kent that at the last provincial election the Conservative majority of 800 was converted into a Liberal majority of 600. In the face of all these facts, will the minister still persist in keeping a man of that stamp in the employ of this Government at a big salary? It seems to me I am putting up a fair proposition. I believe the minister wants to administer the department fairly. I have always had the most courteous treatment from him, and have always found him disposed to do what is right and fair, and I therefore cannot understand how he can continue to employ this man in view of the very distressing circumstances which I pointed out to him last year.

Mr. ROCHE: I remember the hon. gentleman bringing to my attention certain statements of his own about Colonel Sheridan; I had never heard of the circumstances before, and I promised to make an inquiry. I looked up the judge's report, and if I recollect aright Colonel Sheridan was censured by the judge who tried the case for certain indiscretions. I think certain work had been done in the name of his son.

Mr. CARVELL: The trouble is that the work was not done, but his son drew the pay for it. Names were added to the pay list and the money was paid to Colonel Sheridan.

Mr. ROCHE: I understand that certain small amounts were paid. I knew nothing of the circumstances when I appointed Colonel Sheridan, and after looking into the circumstances related by my hon. friend, I did not think Colonel Sheridan had been guilty of impropriety such as would warrant me in dismissing him, as he was carrying out his duties as Indian Agent quite properly.

Mr. CARVELL: Does the minister think that a man who was not fit to sit in the legislature of New Brunswick, because of irregular practices, is a perfectly fit and proper person to act as Indian Agent in his department?

Mr. ROCHE: I do not know whether he was fit to sit in the legislature or not.

Mr. CARVELL: He got out.

Mr. ROCHE: Lots of men get out.

Mr. CARVELL: I am sorry for the minister. I want to say here publicly that I spoke to the minister about the raid on the timber on the Tobique reserve, and the minister did everything a minister of the Crown could be expected to do. I want to give him credit publicly for saving that reserve to the Indians, but I am sorry, after he has done so well in that respect, to see him allowing this condition of affairs to exist in another part of the province.

Mr. ROCHE: I am sorry my colleague from New Brunswick is not in his place, because he is better acquainted with the circumstances. I know he has a different idea from my hon. friend.

Mr. CARVELL: I think the minister's colleague is very glad indeed that he was temporarily called out of the Chamber.

Mr. MARCIL: I was not in the House when the Quebec vote for the Indians was passed. Was any road-making done on the Maria and Restigouche reserves last year, and is any contemplated for the coming summer?

Mr. ROCHE: Work was done last year, and we intend to do work on both reserves this summer.

Mr. MARCIL: How much work was done last year, and how much will be done this summer?

Mr. ROCHE: $500 was expended on each reserve last year, and we expect to spend about the same amount this year.

Mr. MARCIL: Will that complete the work that is contemplated?

Mr. ROCHE: We usually spread the work over a series of years.

Mr. MARCIL: Who is in charge of the work?

Mr. ROCHE: Nobody has been appointed for the work this summer.

Mr. MARCIL: Is the work being done by day labour?

Mr. ROCHE: Yes, I can get the foreman's name for my hon. friend later on.

Mr. MARCIL: Are Indians employed in this work, or any body at all?

Mr. ROCHE: We give Indians the preference.

Mr. MARCIL: Were any Indians employed on these reserves?

Mr. ROCHE: That is my impression.

Mr. MARCIL: Who is the medical officer in charge of the Restigouche Reserve?

Mr. ROCHE: Dr. Martin.

Mr. MARCIL: Who is the medical officer in charge of the Maria Reserve?

Mr. ROCHE: Dr. Boileau.

Mr. MARCIL: Do they receive a salary, or are they paid fees?

Mr. ROCHE: Dr. Boileau receives $300 per annum. Dr. Martin is paid on account and receives no stipulated salary.

Mr. MARCIL: Have any requests been made for seed grain to increase the grain production on the Restigouche Reserve? A petition was sent here some time ago asking that the Reserve be fenced in, so that the Indians could go in for more extensive production.

Mr. ROCHE: They made a request, and their request has been granted.

Mr. MARCIL: To what extent?

Mr. ROCHE: Whatever they asked for was granted. I think it was in the neighbourhood of $500.

Mr. MARCIL: Do you buy the grain?

Mr. ROCHE: The agent buys the grain.

Mr. MARCIL: Does he purchase from the Government or anywhere he likes?

Mr. ROCHE: He has a free hand.

Mr. CARVELL: Has the minister received any complaints from the band at Woodstock, New Brunswick, that they were not being treated fairly in the distribution of supplies? I have always had very grave doubts of the wisdom of the policy of supplying the Indians with a few pounds of pork or flour, but it has been the custom ever since Confederation, and I am not going to raise that question now.

I know that a great deal of fault is found with the giving of supplies, on the ground that the Indian is not treated fairly. I do not know whether that is true or not, but I know that representations to that effect have been made to the department. The charge is that when the Indian wants supplies he must go to a certain store with his order for two dollars, five dollars, or whatever it may be. The storekeeper, they complain, gives them some things, but will not give them others. The information I get is that they could not get pork or flour, but could get other things that they do not want. Also, they claim that they are charged such exorbitant prices that their order only lasts for a few minutes. I do not make any charge, but I draw the matter to the attention of the minister without mentioning names. Has he made an investigation, and if so, what is the result?

Mr. ROCHE: Complaints have been made along the lines indicated by the hon. member (Mr. Carvell). The deputy minister instructed the inspector to investigate these charges and this was done. The report of the inspector was favourable to the action of the agent, and showed that there was comparatively little in the charges.

Mr. CARVELL: Were the Indians given an opportunity to be heard, or was the investigation an ex parte one? If an investigation was ever held in which the Indians were allowed to be represented, I have not heard of it, and I may tell the minister that an investigation purely ex parte, under the conditions existing in New Brunswick to-day in his department, would be of little use. I did a little investigating myself, and came to the conclusion that there was reason to believe that the Indians were justified in the position they took. It is for that reason I bring the matter to the minister's attention. I certainly do not want to do injustice to anybody; I am making no charges, but there was sufficient evidence to satisfy me that there ought to be either a change of merchants or a change in procedure of supplying goods to the Indians.

Mr. ROCHE: My information is that the Indians were afforded an opportunity to give evidence. I will send the hon. gentleman a copy of the report.

Mr. CARVELL: And will the minister please send, also, a copy of the evidence on which the report is based?

Mr. MARCIL: With regard to the Restigouche reserve, has any application been made to secure any part of that reserve as a pulpwood limit and mill site?

Mr. ROCHE: No.

Mr. MARCIL: Has there been any move in that direction?

Mr. ROCHE: No.

Mr. MICHAUD: I understand that the province of New Brunswick will spend some money on the Indian reserve at Edmundston, and so will the Department of the Interior. Has the minister named a person to supervise the work? And, if so, has he appointed the commissioner of the parish, or has he appointed the commissioner from Edmundston, near which the land is situated?

Mr. ROCHE: We have not named any one.

Mr. MICHAUD: Is it the intention of the Government to employ either of the men I have suggested, or will somebody else be appointed?

Mr. ROCHE: That point has not been under consideration as yet, the money for the year not having been voted.

Mr. MICHAUD: I hope the minister will take into consideration the appointment either of the commissioner for the town of Edmundston or the commissioner for the parish of St. Basil. I know them both, and both are good men.

Mr. NESBITT: I was not in my place when the Indian Estimates for Ontario were going through. May I be permitted to ask if the minister will let me have the tenders for the sale of timber on the Shawgnaga reserve in January, 1917, and the prices at which the timber was sold?

Mr. ROCHE: I will get that information.

Mr. MARCIL: Is the same method followed in regard to the Indians of the Quebec reserves as with the Indians of the New Brunswick reserves in the matter of supplies? Is an Indian given an order for supplies?

[Mr. Carvell.]

Mr. ROCHE: The Indian is not handed the money to go and buy wherever he likes, but the agent directs where the supplies are to be purchased.

Mr. MARCIL: Are the charges for goods sold to the Indians supervised by the department?

Mr. ROCHE: Yes.

Mr. MARCIL: The purchases for the Restigouche reserve would have to be made in Campbellton, N.B.?

Mr. ROCHE: Yes.

Mr. COPP: How many Indian reserves are there in New Brunswick?

Mr. ROCHE: Twenty-six.

Mr. COPP: Is one located at Dorchester?

Mr. ROCHE: Yes.

Mr. COPP: The number of Indians there is very small, and I did not know whether it was a regular reserve, or whether the Indians had dropped in there themselves and were being looked after more or less by the agents in the province of New Brunswick? Following up what has been said by the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Carvell), I may say that from what I have been able to learn with regard to supplies furnished to Indians in my own county, no check at all seems to be kept. There may be a telephone message purporting to come from the Indian agent at some distance away, and on that authority supplies may be taken to the camp for the Indians. But there seems to be no check, the agent himself does not know what is actually supplied except as he is informed by those who furnish the supplies. The appropriation for this purpose for the province of New Brunswick is small, but for the whole country the aggregate is a very considerable one, and as this is a business matter, one would think that businesslike care should be exercised to have some check on the goods supplied, and the prices charged.

Some, of course, do such work as the loading of vessels in the harbour in that locality. We can understand that complaints might readily be made by those people when there are perhaps not very good grounds for them but I do know that the supplying of the Indians is done in a most offhand way by telephone message, or something of that kind, the goods are taken to the camp and nobody knows anything more about them till somebody sends a bill.

Mr. ROCHE: We must have confidence in the agent and he certifies to these accounts before they come to the department. We depend on his business capacity and honesty to see that these are proper accounts. I could quite well understand that if he was 25 miles away from the Indians who were going to be supplied he could not be present to check over the supplies and he would have to telephone to place the order. But, he is supposed, in the discharge of his duties, to see that the Indians are not imposed upon. If the hon. gentleman has information with regard to some individual Indians, or if he knows the Indian character well enough, he will know that they are not at all averse to putting up a kick occasionally and that if there is any ground, and sometimes if there is none at all, they grumble. But, we do trust to the reliability of our agents to see that they are not imposed upon.

Mr. COPP: I quite understand that the complaints of a very large class of them would have to be taken more or less with a grain of salt. But, we have an agent who has charge of the reserves in my county who lives not 20 miles away from the reserve but possibly 60 or 70 miles away. There are places in Westmorland where there will be only four or five families of Indians. I did not know whether they were regular Indian reserves or not or whether they were just small communities. At Dorchester there are only a few families and yet I understand, it is a regular Indian reserve. The minister says that the agent must certify to the accounts. Anybody who knows the conditions at all knows that when the agent certifies to the accounts he has no more information about these accounts than the minister has himself. These matters are small but I think it would be well to reorganize the system down there and have somebody in the different localities to see that the goods that are purchased for the Indian tribes are properly supplied and that they get value for the money paid. We should have some assurance that the goods are supplied at fair and reasonable prices. The agent has no information in regard to these matters that would enable him to certify to the accuracy of the accounts and he simply accepts the accounts from the merchants and those who supply the goods. These merchants might as well send the accounts direct to the department and do away with the agent altogether because he is absolutely of no use.

Mr. ROCHE: What would the hon. gentleman suggest?

Mr. COPP: I would suggest that, rather than have an agent there who does not know the value of the goods supplied, the merchants should send their accounts direct to the department.

Mr. ROCHE: The only thing about that is that the Auditor General could not pass them.

Mr. COPP: Unless you adopt some special plan to get around the Auditor General, I suppose we cannot expect anything else. But, I speak seriously about this matter. There is no one who has sufficient knowledge to certify to these accounts, and it is a matter of leaving the merchants to supply the goods to the different reserves. Whether they supply the goods or not they charge for them and they are paid.

Mr. McKENZIE: I was not in the House when the Nova Scotia items were up, and if you will pardon me, Mr. Chairman, for a moment, I would like to refer to a few little things appertaining to the Nova Scotia vote which has just been passed. Near the town where I live we have a small colony of Indians. They have no reserve and no land. There are a few 9 p.m. families, numbering about 20 or something like that. They have been living on the same land, I suppose, for forty years. It is only through the kindness and generosity of the people who own the land that they are permitted to reside on it. Some day these people will turn them off, I suppose. Often, in the old days before this Government came into power, I used to speak to my hon. friend's predecessor, the Superintendent General of Indian Affairs about this matter, but I could not get anything done. I think the Indians should be taken away altogether and put with the Indians at Sydney, or some other provision made for them. There is no agent or doctor there. The doctor at Sydney is the nearest doctor, and at a certain season of the year he has to go 17 miles to reach them. In the summer time there is a ferry and it is only five miles. But in the winter time, when the Indians would be likely to require the services of a doctor, the nearest doctor would be 17 miles away. The same care should be taken of this little colony as is taken of Indians in other parts. The land on which they live is not valuable land and it would not be expensive to get a few acres for them where they are so that they would be on their own property. I realise that it would be very difficult to get them to give up the place because they have become attached to the spot where they have been living for forty or, perhaps, fifty years. But they never had any organization or anything done for them.

I also want to say a word about the Sydney Indians. I have lived in Sydney for many years and I know many of these Indians personally. I took a great deal of interest in the report that I saw had been made with regard to their removal. I would suggest to the minister that instead of selling this land, for which he might get a few thousand dollars, he should give it to the city. We will call it Roche Park and it will commemorate the minister for all time to come. Sydney is quite a large city and in that end of the town where the reserve is located there is no land available for park purposes. It is right on the seashore, and it is valuable property for a park. It is outside of the commercial part of the city. I presume the water front is still the property of the Government, and it could be made a beauty spot and would be of great value to the city and people generally. The ordinary man in Sydney, with his wife and children, having the privilege of visiting that park, going to the shore and enjoying the magnificent bathing place there, would bless the memory of the minister if he made that reserve into a small public park. The money that he would get for it is a mere bagatelle and would soon be forgotten. To give this land to the city as a park would be an excellent and generous thing to do. Victoria Park, at the other end of the city, was practically given to the city for park purposes by the Imperial Government. It was Admiralty ground in the time when the island of Cape Breton was a province and Sydney was a garrison city. That park has been beautified by the city. About a mile and a half away to the south is this little bit of land occupied by the Indians, and it is rather a drawback to that part of the city. The Indians themselves would be better off elsewhere. I would suggest that it would be better not to hand the money to be paid to the Indians for this land direct to them, but rather to place it in the hands of trustees, such as the Indian agent, who is a very capable man, and Reverend Father McAdam, the priest there, who has been very kind to the Indians. In this way the money would be paid to the Indians at intervals when they needed it, whereas if it were given to them direct they would spend it very quickly and in a way which would not be to their own advantage.

[Mr. McKenzie.]

I would suggest also that the small settlement of Indians who have really squatted in the town of North Sydney should be removed. They occupy land really by the grace of the owners, and have been there for about thirty years. I know that it will be difficult to get them to stay in any other place as the Indian is peculiar in that way.

Mr. ROCHE: When I said that any surplus over the estimate of $5,000 would be handed to the Indians, I overlooked the fact that there would not likely be any surplus as it would cost a good deal more than $5,000 to secure a reserve for the Indians elsewhere. As to the suggestion that this land should be handed over to the city of Sydney for park purposes, I do not wish to say anything to prejudice the proposal, but this is the first time it has been made. The city of Sydney seems to be rather apathetic on the whole question; I do not think that any of the municipal officials even appeared before Judge Audette. It has been the intention, if possible, to place the Indians at North Sydney on the same reserve with those from Sydney when a new reserve is obtained.

Indians, Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta and Northwest territories—General expenses, $263,924.

Mr. TURRIFF: Why are the salaries not put by themselves in connection with this item as is the case of the other provinces?

Mr. ROCHE: I presume it is because, from time immemorial, it has been done in this way and the salaries have been paid from the item of general expenses. The same thing has bene done in Quebec and Ontario.

Mr. TURRIFF: How much of the item for general expenses is for salaries?

Mr. ROCHE: $145,542.

Mr. TURRIFF: What, in a general way, are the details of the balance of that item?

Mr. ROCHE: Rations, miscellaneous, fuel, feed, livestock, equipment and buildings.

Mr. SINCLAIR: What is meant by triennial clothing?

Mr. ROCHE: The chiefs' clothing, given under the terms of the treaty every three years.

Mr. OLIVER: There is an amount here for surveys. Are these surveys of new reserves, and if so, in what part of the country are they to be made?

Mr. ROCHE: The surveys projected for 1916-17 are as follows: Survey of certain reserves under provision of Treaty No. 8. A proposed exchange of the Pine Creek reserve. Small exchanges requested by the Indians and granted at the Blood Vein River and the Berens River reserves require to be surveyed. A small reserve containing a supply of wood and timber for the Norway House band is to be surveyed. Townplot of Fairford to be reposted and revalued. Small area of land due Indian band at Cumberland House to be surveyed. A small reserve for hay purposes for the Moose Lake band. An addition to the Chimawawin Indian reserve 32-F. A number of reserves under provisions of Treaty No. 10. Survey of land at Battle lake for the Riding Mountain band, Man. The defining of the limits between the marsh lands and the Brokenhead reserve at its northwest corner.

Mr. OLIVER: Has the department knowledge of any requirements in the way of further surveys in the Peace River country?

Mr. ROCHE: The reserves in northern Alberta have been practically all completed. We expect to finish the surveys in a comparatively short time.

Mr. OLIVER: Are some reserves located that are not surveyed?

Mr. ROCHE: Yes.

Mr. OLIVER: Where are those locations?

Mr. ROCHE: In the neighbourhood of Fort McMurray.

Mr. OLIVER: I had occasion to communicate with the department recently with regard to a small reserve in the neighbourhood of Fort McMurray. Are there many more in that vicinity?

Mr. ROCHE: There is a Treaty, No. 8, in that district. Some of the surveys are not yet completed. It may require a season's work to finish them.

Mr. OLIVER: Are any other reserves contemplated within a radius of 20 or 30 miles of Fort McMurray that are not already located and surveyed?

Mr. ROCHE: I understand that one has been requested, but our surveyors have not as yet been up to look at it.

Mr. OLIVER: I do not wish to criticise the location or the arrangment with the Indians; I am desirous of seeing the Indians treated with all fairness. But a railroad has been built to within 20 miles of Fort McMurray; it is anticipated that the rails will reach that place this summer. Many people of a more or less speculative disposition will then go into that country, and as there are mineral possibilities, they will desire to locate in various places. It is very disconcerting, confusing and unsatisfactory to a prospector who has gone into a new country and made his location to be displaced in the interests of the Indians. Where there is an immediate development resulting from railroad construction the question of Indian reservations should already have been settled; it should not be left until the railroad has arrived on the ground. If further reserves are to be located and surveyed in that locality I urge upon the minister the desirability of making those locations and surveys as early this summer as possible, in order to avoid confusion and dissatisfaction.

Mr. ROCHE: I understand that the reserves have been practically all located. The Indian branch has requested the Department of the Interior not to throw these lands open for homesteaed, the idea being to establish an Indian reserve upon them. I understand that the Interior Department have complied with that request. We will expedite the work with a view to meeting the condition which the hon. gentleman says is likely to arise through the completion of the railway.

Mr. OLIVER: This is a question not between the Indian Department and the Department of the Interior, but between the Government and the public. The reservation by the Interior Department of a section of land for a prospective Indian reserve may cause the greatest possible annoyance to the prospector and tempt him to make trouble for the authorities. I repeat that the question of Indian reservations should have been settled before the construction of the railroad and the coming in of prospectors. I would urge upon the minister the necessity of making these locations and surveys as soon as possible. It would be good for the Government, good for the prospector, and good for the country. Are any surrenders of reserves or parts of reserves in prospect in the prairie West?

Mr. ROCHE: I cannot recall that any surrender has been called for in any of the prairie provinces.

Mr. OLIVER: There are no negotiations going on?

Mr. ROCHE: We have already arranged to have a sale of a portion of the Blackfoot reserve that was surrendered some time ago.

Mr. OLIVER: Recently surrendered?

Mr. ROCHE: No, it is an old surrender.

Mr. OLIVER: Perhaps I am not in order to ask this question of the Minister of Indian Affairs, but if not, I will ask the Minister of the Interior what is the present policy in regard to the issue of scrip to Indians under treaty who, on pretense of being half-breeds, withdraw from the treaty and thereby become eligible under the original conditions for an issue of scrip.

Mr. ROCHE: The policy of the department is that we are not issuing any more scrip, and I hope we are done with that business.

Mr. OLIVER: I understood that to be the policy, but I would just like to have it as absolute and definite as the minister can give it. Do I understand him to say that no further half-breed scrip will be issued to any Indian withdrawing from treaty in the Prairie Provinces?

Mr. ROCHE: Certainly. It is not my intention to authorise any such issue. I will answer for myself so long as I am in the department.

Mr. OLIVER: From time to time, the question is asked me by constituents and others, and I wish to be able to make on the subject a formal statement in which I shall be supported by the minister.

British Columbia Indians—salaries, relief to destitute Indians, to assist Indians in farming, fruit culture and cleansing orchard, hospital, medical attendance and medicines, travelling expenses, office, miscellaneous and unforeseen expenses, surveys, $166,050.

Mr. ROCHE: There is a reduction of $16,600.

Mr. TURRIFF: Are the expenses in connection with the Commission on Indian Reservations paid out of this vote? I refer to the commission that has been at work in British Columbia for some years.

Mr. ROCHE: There is no appropriation this year. The commission has gone out of existence.

Mr. TURRIFF: The commission is no longer drawing salaries?

Mr. ROCHE: It is no longer drawing salaries.

Mr. TURRIFF: I notice in an answer given to a question on the 3rd of May last that Mr. N. W. White, K.C., had drawn just for himself alone, the sum of $35,183.37. Does the minister not think that is somewhat in the nature of—what shall I say?

Mr. A. W. CHISHOLM: Slightly extravagant.

Mr. PUGSLEY: That must have been before the war.

Mr. ROCHE: Mr. White was appointed commissioner under an Order in Council passed several years ago. He was chairman of the commission. I am sorry to say that the gentleman has since died.

Mr. TURRIFF: I am very sorry to hear that, but still I do not think that relieves the Government of a considerable amount of responsibility for the fact that one man in connection with a commission of that kind, that, to my mind, was practically unnecessary, should be allowed to dilly-dally the work along until he draws over $35,000 out of the department.

Mr. OLIVER: What is the result of the work of the commission?

Mr. ROCHE: The commission ceased their labours last July, and under the terms of the Order in Council appointing them, they were to make a report to the provincial government and to the Dominion Government, which report was to be adopted by the two governments prior to its being submitted to Parliament. The report was furnished just about the time that the old government in British Columbia were in the midst of an election campaign, and they were too busy with other matters to deal with this report. The new government, since it has come into power, has been busily occupied; it has held its first session of Parliament. We have had some communications with the prime minister of British Columbia to try to expedite the consideration of the report in order that we might have the matter taken up and action taken at this session. Mr. Brewster stated that he was far too busy to give the report his attention during the session of Parliament, but that he would have it taken up as expeditiously as possible and have it dealt with. We are awaiting the action of the British Columbia Government before taking any further proceedings prior to laying the report upon the table of the House.

Mr. OLIVER: What was the purpose to be achieved by this somewhat luxurious commission?

Mr. ROCHE: The hon. gentleman knows that the question of Indian reserves in British Columbia has been a great bone of contention between the Indians, the provincial government, and the Dominion Government for many years past, and this commission was appointed with a view to clearing up all these difficulties. It was claimed by the Indians that they were not in possession of sufficient land for their purposes, and the contention was made by the British Columbia Government that in many instances there was far too much land for the number of Indians, and in order to do away with those conflicting representations it was decided to have this commission investigate each reserve. That was done very thoroughly, and I believe a very excellent report was made. The country is mountainous and very extensive, and many reserves are difficult of access. The commission visited each reserve personally and that meant a great deal of time. They took evidence of all the Indians interested, and they have made recommendations that those reserves in which it was found that there was too much land for the Indians to occupy should be cut down to what the commission considered to be the requisite area, and in other reserves where they considered the land was too small in area for a reserve they have recommended that additions be made. It was with the reserves alone that this commission was occupied, and while I am not at liberty to divulge the nature of the report, because it is a very voluminous and exhaustive document, I believe they have made a most excellent report and one which I trust will commend itself to all parties concerned. From what little conversation I have had with the Premier of British Columbia in regard to the matter, I am inclined to think there will not be much difficulty in having his government approve the report, and if that is the case I am satisfied, from my slight perusal of portions of the report, that it should recommend itself to the Dominion Government as well. I cannot go into the details of the recommendations, because there is a separate report on each reserve, but the recommendations were along the lines I have indicated.

Mr. OLIVER: When was the commission appointed?

Mr. ROCHE: I think in 1913. I was in the Old Country at the time the commission was appointed.

Mr. OLIVER: What was the total bill?

Mr. ROCHE: The total bill, including salaries, travelling and all other expenses, amounted to $316,782, of which the province of British Columbia bears one half.

Mr. OLIVER: Did the closing of the work of the commission and the change of government in British Columbia merely synchronize, or had one any bearing on the other?

Mr. ROCHE: I would not venture an opinion on that.

Mr. TURRIFF: How many commissioners were appointed?

Mr. ROCHE: Five.

Mr. TURRIFF: The report would need to be good seeing that it cost over $300,000.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Has the report been printed?

Mr. ROCHE: Yes, but under the terms of the Order in Council appointing the commission, the report has to be approved by both governments before it can be laid on the Table.

Mr. OLIVER: Laying it on the Table will be merely a matter of form, as the subject has already been settled before it comes to the consideration of this Parliament.

Mr. ROCHE: It is not a mere matter of form. The people's representatives have a perfect right to criticise the report and to see how the money was expended, but we are not permitted to lay the report on the Table until it has been endorsed by the two governments.

Mr. OLIVER: That means that an effective criticism by Parliament would be the defeat of the Government. That seems to be going outside altogether of parliamentary procedure. It is taking the control of affairs out of the hands of Parliament very effectively. I think the conditions surrounding the issue of the commission are nearly as remarkable as the expenditure on its behalf.

Mr. TURRIFF: What is the object of laying a report on the Table when the time has passed for discussing it effectively?

Mr. ROCHE: It is only right that hon. gentlemen should have access to the information secured by the commission.

Mr. SINCLAIR: It would be interesting to get the names of the commissioners and the items making up that total.

Mr. ROCHE: That is a pretty large order, as the expenditure is spread over three years; the items are all shown in the Auditor General's reports.

Mr. SINCLAIR: What are the names of the commissioners?

Mr. ROCHE: The appointees of the Dominion Government were N. W. White, S. Carmichael and J. A. J. McKenna; and the appointees of the British Columbia Government, Mr. J. P. Shaw and Mr. D. H. Macdowall. Mr. White replaced Chief Justice Wetmore, who was the chairman originally.

Mr. SINCLAIR: What was the amount paid to each of these gentlemen?

Mr. ROCHE: The commissioners received a per diem allowance of $20, and the chairman $25 a day.

Mr. SINCLAIR: They received that amount for three years?

Mr. ROCHE: Yes.

Mr. OLIVER: I think it is a most fortunate thing for this Dominion of Canada that the Government of British Columbia changed. This arrangement seems to have been a deal between the Government of British Columbia and the Dominion Government to divide up, as they saw fit, certain valuable assets belonging either to the Indians or to the province of British Columbia, and charging the expense to the province and the Dominion without regard to the Parliament of the Dominion or the legislature of the province. As a specimen of autocratic government and disregard of the rights of the people and of their representatives, I think that stands absolutely in a class by itself.

Mr. SINCLAIR: I see that in addition to his salary Mr. White received a living allowance of $10 a day. Was that the case with the other commissioners?

Mr. ROCHE: Yes.

Mr. SINCLAIR: And travelling expenses too?

Mr. ROCHE: Just transportation.

Mr. TURRIFF: What is the object of allowing $10 a day for living allowance? If the commissioners stayed at the Canadian Pacific Railway hotel in Victoria all the time it would only cost them $5 a day. At the small hotels it would cost them much less, and in cases where they had to carry provisions with them, it would be less still. The minister must know that it never costs $10 a day to live in British Columbia.

Mr. ROCHE: Some of these gentlemen were engaged in professional life, and they had to throw up their professions. British Columbia is an expensive country to live and travel in. All these things were considered when the Order in Council was passed, and the Government came to the conclusion that $10 a day would be a reasonable allowance.

Mr. SINCLAIR: The minister seems to have raised the rate per diem. I see that from April 1, 1915, to March 31, 1916, the chairman was allowed 366 days at $25 a day, or $9,150; also a living allowance of $10 a day for 366 days, $3,660; and travelling expenses $121.75, making a total for Mr. White during that period of $12,931.75. He was paid for Sundays throughout the whole year.

Mr. ROCHE: Yes, the regular salary of $25 a day and $10 living allowance.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Were the commissioners all paid on the same basis?

Mr. ROCHE: Yes, except the chairman.

Mr. OLIVER: What is the position with regard to the Kitsilano reserve?

Mr. ROCHE: The Vancouver Harbour Commissioners wanted this property for harbour purposes and they expropriated it. The price was to be fixed by a board of arbitration. We were not satisfied with the judgment of the board, and the case is now being appealed.

Mr. OLIVER: What was the amount of the award?

Mr. ROCHE: $666,000.

Mr. OLIVER: What amount was paid for the reserve by the British Columbia Government?

Mr. ROCHE: The Indians got out of it something in the neighbourhood of $216,000.

Mr. OLIVER: Has the British Columbia Government been repaid that amount?

Mr. ROCHE: No.

Mr. OLIVER: Is it proposed to repay the British Columbia Government that amount?

Mr. ROCHE: Our future action will be decided after the arbitration is over. We place a higher valuation on the reserve than the arbitrators did. That is the reason we are not satisfied with the award, and we have appealed it to the judge. The appeal will soon be heard, and then we shall decide what to do as to winding up between the British Columbia Government and the Dominion Government in view of the amount they have expended.

Mr. OLIVER: Did the Dominion Government fix the amount they would be willing to accept for the reserve?

Mr. ROCHE: Yes, we considered that the reserve should be worth about $1,250,000.

Mr. OLIVER: And the arbitrator gave $660,000.

Mr. ROCHE: Yes.

Mr. OLIVER: And the Indians got——

Mr. ROCHE: They got $216,000.

Mr. OLIVER: There is some difference in the figures. This Kitsilano Indian reserve was presumably the property of the Indians. It was under the jurisdiction and administration of my hon. friend (Mr. Roche). While it was under his jurisdiction and administration, some person or persons presumably acting for the Government of British Columbia, without let or hindrance from the minister so far as we know, went in and made arrangements with the Indians under which the Indians were paid $216,000, and they vacated the reserve. There never was such a case in all the history of Canada before—that the Government of the Dominion neglected to exercise that jurisdiction and assume that responsibility that properly rested upon their shoulders for the protection of the interests of the Indians. They allowed the Indians to be dickered with by these agents, more or less responsible; they allowed them to be removed from the reserve; they allowed their buildings to be burned; and they allowed the Government of British Columbia, I believe, or the hirelings of that Government, to assume jurisdiction over that reserve as though it were their property and not the property of the Indians or under the jurisdiction of my hon. friend. I do not know whether I said at the time, but I say now —but, perhaps I am wrong in suggesting that this was under the jurisdiction of my hon. friend; I believe the undertaking originated under his predecessor—that I am unable to conceive that this conjunction of circumstances could have taken place without a definite understanding between the gentleman, whoever he was, then at the head of the Indian Department of the Dominion of Canada, and those who directed the affairs of the province of British Columbia, and interesting themselves in these transactions. What their purpose may have been I am not here to say, but I know what the purpose of the Superintendent General of Indian Affairs ought to have been, and that was to secure the Indians their rights and the full extent of those rights. Anything else than this was a dereliction of duty, and was a reflection on the good faith of the Dominion of Canada and behind the Dominion of Canada on the good faith of the British Crown. There were other moneys paid besides those paid to the Indians. I do not know whether the amount my hon. friend has stated to me is the total amount that was paid by the Government of British Columbia, but some money was paid to the Indians, and some was paid to friends of that Government, because these moneys afterwards became the subject of a lawsuit, and so of public record. Were the amounts so paid outside of what was paid to the Indians included in this $216,000?

Mr. ROCHE: I understand that moneys were paid by the British Columbia government, by way of commissions that were unwarranted. These are not included in the $216,000.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Was the amount about $100,000?

Mr. ROCHE: I do not know.

Mr. OLIVER: My recollection is that the amount was in the neighbourhood of $80,000. That would bring the total payments of the British Columbia Government to about $300,000, of which the Indians received $216,000, and the friends of the British Columbia Government, $80,000. This feature makes the transaction even more remarkable than it was in the beginning. Does this $216,000 include the expenses of removing the Indians as well as the cash payments made to them?

Mr. ROCHE: Only the cash payments.

Mr. OLIVER: So that besides the $216,000 there were the removal expenses and the commissions. All this money was paid, and all this transaction was entered into, either with or without the knowledge and consent of this Government through its then Superintendent General of Indian Affairs. If this transaction went on without the knowledge of the Superintendent General of Indian Affairs, then he was so utterly negligent of his duty that he should be condemned; and if it went on with his knowledge, there is no other possible suggestion that that he was a party to the transaction for reasons other than the public good or the benefit of the Indians. The Indians owned that property. If there was any question as to their ownership, it was certainly not the business of the Superintendent General of Indian Affairs to question that right; it was his business to maintain that right, to maintain it to the limit of his powers under the law. But instead of doing that he did not even exercise the ordinary supervision that his duty requires him to exercise, to prevent unlawful access to the reserve, unlawful trespass upon it, the unlawful destruction of property of the Indians upon it, and the improper and unlawful transactions with the Indians concerned.

There is no way in which the Superintendent General of Indian Affairs can justify his position in connection with this transaction. The Government of British Columbia, so my hon. friend says, went into this transaction. They put up this $216,000, they put up the moving expenses and they put up the commission. Why did they do it? Was it the Government that did it, or was it the members of the Government that did it, using the treasury of the province to enable them to do it? However, the transaction went on, and whether it was the exposure made in the House of Commons, or whether it may have been protests made on the Pacific coast, for some reason or other apparently it did not go through as intended. Now, the Superintendent General of Indian Affairs, who was asleep at the switch when these transactions were going on, has awakened. He is now doing business. He now claims that the Indians own the reserve and he is proposing to deal with the Harbour Commissioners of Vancouver for its sale. I think I remember that when this matter was considered before, my hon. friend from Vancouver (Mr. Stevens) had bright hopes that this reserve was going to be made a present of to Vancouver, or that in some way Vancouver was to benefit immensely out of these transactions, in which the Government of British Columbia was the chief actor, and to which the Superintendent General of Indian Affairs was a consenting party. Apparently these bright hopes of my hon. friend have been shattered.

[Mr. Oliver.]

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend is again in error.

Mr. OLIVER: Did not my hon. friend entertain such hopes?

Mr. STEVENS: No, my hon. friend is entirely and absolutely wrong in his idea.

Mr. OLIVER: Thank you. The present that the Superintendent General of Indian Affairs purposes not to hand to the city of Vancouver is the difference between $350,000, say, and $1,250,000, a difference of about $900,000. That certainly would be sufficient to make the citizens of Vancouver sit up and take notice and greet with enthusiasm the action of the late Government of British Columbia and the support that my hon. friend gave it in the House when the matter was up.

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend is again mistaken.

Mr. OLIVER: My hon. friend did not support it in the House at that time?

Mr. STEVENS: Not only did I not support it in the House, but I never supported the action of the provincial government My hon. friend is wrong in all his arguments.

Mr. OLIVER: Then, if I am wrong in that particular it is my hon. friend's privilege to correct me, but I am not wrong as to the actual facts, or as to their sequence apart from my hon. friend's action. There is no argument on that point.

Mr. STEVENS: I will show my hon. friend in a moment.

Mr. OLIVER: That will be his privilege also. Then, the arbitrator as between the Harbour Commission of Vancouver and the Department of Indian Affairs has decided that the property is worth a certain amount, and I suppose the Harbour Commission is willing—would I be right in suggesting that it is willing—to pay the amount that the arbitrator has awarded for the property, namely $660,000. Whether it is or not, a responsible arbitrator—I presume he is responsible—has decided, long after the real estate boom has burst and when property does not hold the value it did three, four or five years ago, even in the city of Vancouver, that the property is worth twice as much as the Government of British Columbia bought it for, assuming that they did buy it, and twice as much as the then Superintendent General of Indian

10 p.m.

Affairs was willing that they should buy it for.

Mr. STEVENS: That is wrong, too.

Mr. OLIVER: Well, at any rate, my hon. friend will agree that the late Superintendent General of Indian Affairs did not prevent them from buying it and that he might have done so.

Mr. STEVENS: He did everything possible to.

Mr. OLIVER: He had a right to prevent trespass upon that reserve. He did not take any measures to prevent trespass on the reserve, and I say again that I am bound to reach the conclusion, on the facts now laid before us, that he was a party to the transaction in the expectation of ultimate benefit to others than the Indians or the public.

Mr. STEVENS: That is wrong too.

Mr. OLIVER: It seems strange that, when the fall of the Government has occurred in British Columbia and when a king has arisen there who knows not Joseph, the price of this reserve suddenly rises from a little over $300,000, paid to the Indians, paid for their transportation and paid for commissions that were the subject of a lawsuit, to which figure the Superintendent General of Indian Affairs at that day must have consented, to the figure of $1,250,000.

Mr. STEVENS: Again my hon. friend is wrong. One million two hundred and fifty thousand dollars was the price fixed by the Superintendent General of Indian Affairs about four years ago and not since the accession to power of a king who knows not Joseph, as my hon. friend suggests.

Mr. OLIVER: My hon. friend will remember that when I asked the present Superintendent General of Indian Affairs what was the valuation of the land placed by his department—

Mr. STEVENS: That is the price placed upon the land four years ago.

Mr. OLIVER: —he said $300,000, and my hon. friend will agree, and the Superintendent General of Indian Affairs will not deny, that within the last fifteen minutes he has told us that the Government had refused the arbitrator's value of $660,000, which is more than double the total amount of money that was paid for the reserve by the British Columbia Government with the consent of my hon. friend and his predecessor, the Superintendent General of Indian Affairs.

Mr. STEVENS: The Superintendent General—

Mr. OLIVER: My hon. friend will have all the opportunity he wants.

Mr. STEVENS: But I was just going to correct my hon. friend.

Mr. OLIVER: My hon. friend can make his correction later. I am just about through anyway. I want to establish the fact that under one set of circumstances, when the prices of property were booming, this property was considered to be worth $300,000 or perhaps a little over, but in conditions of real estate collapse, it is now considered by a responsible arbitrator to be worth $660,000. My contention is that if it is worth $660,000 that money belonged to the Indians, and what I am desirous of asking the Superintendent General of Indian Affairs is: If he gets the price he should get for it, whether it is $660,000 or $1,250,000, or whatever sum it may be, what disposition does he propose to make of that money?

Does he propose to pay to the British Columbia Government the amount that they paid including this commission, and what disposition does he propose to make of the balance of the money? Has the question of the donation of this reserve to the harbour commissioners or the city of Vancouver come up at any time or under any circumstances?

Mr. ROCHE: My hon. friend asks me whether we are going to recoup the British Columbia Government for the money they have spent. What we have promised to do is to arbitrate on the value of the reversionary interest claimed by the province of British Columbia in this reserve. The British Columbia Government have always claimed a reversionary interest in this reserve, and we have decided to arbitrate, and if a certain value is placed on the reversionary interest coming to British Columbia, we will have to abide by that. The amount over and above that will certainly go to the Indians. As to the remark of my hon. friend that I placed a value of $1,200,000 or $1,250,000 on it, he did not ask me if that was placed on the reserve since the defeat of the late provincial government. That was placed several years ago.

Mr. OLIVER: The value of $660,000 fixed by the arbitrator was since the defeat?

Mr. ROCHE: The arbitration was decided within the last few months.

Mr. OLIVER: That was since the defeat of the late provincial government?

Mr. ROCHE: Certainly. Do you think that has anything to do with it?

Mr. STEVENS: Mr. Chairman, my hon. friend from Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) has, by a series of rather cleverly constructed statements, sought to involve the Superintendent General of Indian Affairs of the Federal Government in a transaction which he knows perfectly well has nothing whatever to do with this department. I have had a very close knowledge of this matter from the very commencement, and I wish to state that the greatest credit is due to the Superintendent General of Indian Affairs for the firm stand he has taken on this question from the beginning. The facts of the case are very different from the impression conveyed by the hon. member for Edmonton, and, I am surprised that he, with the opportunities he has had during the last three years of ascertaining the facts, should attempt to make the cheapest kind of political capital out of a question which reflects only credit upon this Government, whatever may be his estimate of the action of the provincial government of British Columbia.

The facts are briefly something along this line: About four years ago, the provincial government, as a result of a general feeling in the city of Vancouver that this reserve should be utilized for other purposes than that of an Indian reserve, undertook to get possession of it from the Indians. In order that the House may have a correct view of the situation, they should know the location of this reserve. My hon. friend from Edmonton knows perfectly well where the reserve is situated, practically in the heart of the city, at the mouth of False creek, in a very important and strategic point in the harbour.

Mr. OLIVER: I do not like to interrput my hon. friend, but I should like him to keep a little closer to the line. My hon. friend is hardly correct in saying this reserve is situated in the heart of the city. It is well situated, but it is not in the heart of the city.

Mr. STEVENS: It is in the heart of the city.

Mr. OLIVER: It may be in the heart of the city geographically, but it is not in the business centre.

Mr. STEVENS: It is in the heart of the business centre.

Mr. PUGSLEY: In the heart of the future city.

[Mr. Oliver.]

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend is not correct. I know what I am speaking about; it is within half a mile of the Vancouver hotel.

Mr. OLIVER: Across False creek.

Mr. STEVENS: And there is three miles of solidly constructed property in each direction from it except on the water side, both west and south. It is right on False Creek which is a hive of industry. During the past five, six, seven or eight years, there has been a tonnage of from three to five million tons of coastwise trade in and out of False Creek, starting at a point immediately adjoining the reserve and up the creek, and immediately across within 100 yards of the reserve on the other side. False Creek, of course, is a little arm of the sea, about two miles in length. It is a perfect hive of industry, and that is where the Kitsilano Indian reserve is. My hon. friend sought to lead the House to believe that the provincial government went on the reserve and in some subtle manner induced the Indians to leave, and then burned their houses and arbitrarily took possession. That is not the fact. My hon. friend knows it, or ought to know it. The Kitsilano Indian reserve was never a reserve of residents. It belongs to certain bands of Indians, part of the Squamish tribe. They live chiefly on the Capilano Indian reserve across the inlet, some miles away. They came to False Creek and Kitsilano occasionally, landed with their fishing boats, and went up to the city to make purchases, as they used to land at the old slip at the foot of Gore avenue. Indians generally have some one place where they land. On the reserve were a couple of old shacks, you would scarcely call them shacks, simply a few poles put up with a few old boards to keep them together, and occasionally the Indians used to stay there overnight, to no good purpose for themselves or the community. I think my hon. friend (Mr. Oliver) generally speaking, desires to be honest in his criticism, but in this case I think he has departed from his usual course. He knows perfectly well that there is no greater curse to the Indians of Canada than these reserves situated in the heart of a thickly populated community like Vancouver and some other cities in the West where Indians can come in and are subject to the evil influences of a closely settled city district. That is one of the problems with which the Assistant Superintendent General of Indian Affairs is constantly faced. It was exceedingly desirable that this reserve should be turned into useful industrial property and the Indians properly compensated. When my hon. friend (Mr. Oliver) was Superintendent General of Indian Affairs he was asked by the city of Vancouver time and time again, and he knows that the candidate representing the party which he represented in this House, on the hustings in Vancouver, promised the people of Vancouver that if returned to power his Government, that is the late Government, would make a present of this reserve to the people of Vancouver. That was one of the baits held out to the people of Vancouver. The statement of my hon. friend that I had made such suggestions is absolutely without foundation. Not only did I never make that statement, but I have always held, as my correspondence on the records of the department will show, that the Indians should be properly compensated for that property and that any transfer should be under the direction and control of the Indian Department. But here is what occurred. The old provincial government, knowing the sentiment of Vancouver desired to get rid of the Indians on the Kitsilano Indian reserve. They took the ground that they had a reversionary right, and that if the Indians left the reserve and abandoned it the reserve reverted to the province. But, four years ago, the moment I heard that action was being contemplated by the provincial government, I took the view that they had no such right and that the reversionary right as such did not exist. I hold that view to-day. I placed that view before the department who at once took cognizance of it, and the Prime Minister, on the floor of the old House of Commons, the first time it was brought to his attention, stated that this Government, under his leadership, had given no authority to the provincial government to take the action which they did.

Moreover, he stated on that occasion and on several occasions since that this Government had never recognized the right of the province to take the action that they did. Agents of the provincial government induced the Indians to accept $216,000 and $1,500 for the removal of some dead bodies which were taken to another reserve. The Superintendent General of Indian Affairs, the Assistant Superintendent General of Indian Affairs and I myself hold that the provincial government had not acted according to law, or according to their rights, and the action was never recognized by this Government. This Government deserves from my hon. friend not condemnation, but credit.

My hon. friend states that this Government stood aside and allowed the provincial government to take possession and remain in possession of that reserve. The provincial government had never been properly in possession of that reserve. My hon. friend infers that the Harbour Commissioners dealt with the provincial government or with some other authorities for the purchase of this reserve. This is what occurred. The Harbour Commissioners, recognizing the value of this reserve for harbour purposes, and acting under the authority of their Act of incorporation, expropriated the reserve. How did they expropriate it? They offered this Government $500,000 for the reserve about two years ago, but the Superintendent General of Indian Affairs refused the offer on the ground that the amount was not sufficient. They then notified this Government that they intended to take proceedings to expropriate. It was necessary to get the consent of the Government. The Government consented, and a board of arbitration was appointed, consisting of Mr. C. E. Mahon, alderman of the city of Vancouver; Mr. Boreland, a prominent citizen of about 25 years' standing in that city, and Mr. Pound, a gentleman of the highest standing in Vancouver on arbitration matters concerning real estate. Mr. Pound, by the way, is treasurer of the Liberal Association in the city of Vancouver—and he is a gentleman from the soles of his feet to the crown of his head. This board was appointed before the election last fall, so there can be no suggestion of political influence. They sat in arbitration for some months, after which they adjourned because Mr. Livingstone, representing the Indians and the Crown, had to attend Supreme Court in the East. Their finding, which was brought down, if I remember rightly, in January of this year, was that the reservation was worth the sum of $666,000. My hon. friend seeks to make capital out of this. He says that the Government allowed the reserve to be sold in boom times for $216,000, which is absolutely without foundation in fact. This Government not only opposed the action, but prevented it as far as it was able. Then, he says, in a time of collapse, the board of arbitration found that the property was worth $666,000. The facts in that regard are these: the board of arbitration, as by law they were bound to do, fixed a price as at the time of the filing of expropriation papers, which was about two years ago. My hon. friend knows that when expropriation is undertaken, the date of filing the original expropriation papers is the date at which the price is fixed. At that date and on that basis $666,000 was the award made. The Superintendent General, through his technical advisers in the department, claims that the reserve is worth $1,250,000. I say frankly that in my opinion the valuation of the Superintendent General is much too high. I will tell you why. There has been a difference of opinion between the Indian Department and the Justice Department as to whether this or any Indian reserve carries with it the ownership of the solum of the harbour abutting on the Indian reserve. If it does, it means a great increase in the value; if it does not, it means a great difference the other way. This reserve has a very important water frontage along a portion of the harbour. If the Indians have the ownership of the bed of the harbour out to the headline or the low tide mark. then the reserve is worth more than if their ownership extends only to the high tide mark. After careful thought I, with many others, came to the conclusion that the Indians own to the high tide mark, and that beyond that they have nothing but riparian rights—simply the right of access to and from the water, and nothing else. The riparian right carries with it no ownership; simply the right of access. The value of the ownership of the bed of the harbour and the value of the riparian rights are two vastly different things. The Superintendent General of Indian Affairs based his value of $1,250,000 on the premises, I believe, that the Indians owned the foreshore and the bed of the harbour. I contend that that is wrong; the arbitrator decided that that was wrong.

Mr. PUGSLEY: What is my hon. friend's opinion as to who owns the foreshore?

Mr. STEVENS: The Crown, represented by the Dominion Government. That has been decided in this particular case.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Then if it has been decided in this case, the Indians cannot own it.

Mr. STEVENS: The question was decided as between the right of the Crown as represented by the province and the right of the Crown as represented by the Dominion.

Mr. PUGSLEY: When?

[Mr. Stevens.]

Mr. STEVENS: A couple of years ago; I cannot remember the date.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I understand that the British Columbia Government has always contended that the foreshore of a harbour which at the time the province entered Confederation was not actually used for the purposes of a public harbour and on which no public improvements had been made, would vest in the province. Then the question as to whether the Indians own or not would depend on their title. Some Indians own to low water and some to high water.

Mr. HAZEN: The Privy Council decided that if a harbour was a public harbour at the time of Confederation, the foreshore is the property of the Crown as represented by the Federal Government.

Mr. PUGSLEY: When I was a member of the late Government and Sir Richard McBride was premier of British Columbia, his Government, when Prince Rupert was established, claimed all the foreshore in the harbour of Prince Rupert.

Mr. STEVENS: A case was taken to the Privy Council concerning part of the bed of False Creek, which is connected with this reservation, and it was definitely decided that the foreshore was in the right of the Crown as represented by the Dominion Government.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Could my hon. friend give me the name of the case?

Mr. STEVENS: No, but I will tell my hon. friend how the question rose. My hon. friend gave a piece of property, eighteen acres in extent, in False Creek, to Mr. John Hendry, one of his friends in Vancouver, for ten dollars an acre. Mr. John Hendry, two years afterwards, sold that property to the British Columbia Electric for $700,000. That is where the property lies which was decided by the Privy Council—

Mr. PUGSLEY: I have no recollection of giving Mr. Hendry any land whatever. As a matter of fact, the rule of the department and the course of practice governing the Marine and Fisheries Department and the Public Works Department ever since Confederation have been to give, at a comparatively nominal rental, leases of the foreshore to people who actually had the riparian rights; but I have no recollection whatever of giving Mr. John Hendry any such land.

Mr. STEVENS: I can bring the papers down to-morrow if my hon. friend so desires. My hon. friend not only gave this property to Mr. John Hendry, but, to give another illustration, he gave to Mr. Robert Kelly and Mr. McFeely for $3,600 a very large piece of property which was refused to a Mr. J. B. Tiffin who owned the foreshore, and that piece was, through the Exchequer Court, sold to this Government for about $360,000.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Would that be the piece of land which was sold by agents who obtained a very large commission on the sale to this Government?

Mr. STEVENS: No, it was sold by my hon. friend and his Government to Mr. Robert Kelly and Mr. McFeely, one an eminent Liberal gentleman in Vancouver.

Mr. PUGSLEY: For how much money?

Mr. STEVENS: As my hon. friend has diverted my attention to this matter, I will just digress in order to explain the transaction a little further. I am delighted to have the opportunity. My hon. friend year after year refused to give to Mr. J. B. Tiffin, who owned the Red Cedar lumber mill at that point, a lease of the foreshore. Mr. Tiffin had to sell that property and did sell it to the hon. gentleman's friends, and those gentlemen came down here and within about two months got that property for about one-tenth of its value. I do not wish to digress any further.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I would be glad if my hon. friend would give the facts and not draw on his imagination.

Mr. STEVENS: I am not drawing on my imagination.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Just a moment. Does my hon. friend say that the same property that was sold to those people for $3,600 was bought back by the present Government for $360,000?

Mr. STEVENS: I do say it, and I say it was bought back through the Exchequer Court. There was another very valuable piece of property at the sugar refinery that perhaps my hon. friend will remember. It consisted of some 3,000 feet, and about one-tenth of that property that was sold or given away for $4,000 was leased a couple of years ago for three times the amount for which my hon. friend gave it away. Not once since this Government came into office has any Crown grant been given, but simply leases are given, except when a piece of property has been occupied for twenty years or more for industrial purposes, and then grants are given on a valuation very much in advance of anything that my hon. friend ever thought of securing.

My hon. friend thought to divert my attention from the real question before the House, and I will now return to that question. The whole question is whether the Indians have the ownership of that foreshore. The Superintendent General of Indian Affairs fixes his valuation on the assumption that they did; the arbitrators went into the matter very carefully, and they decided that the ownership ceased at high-tide mark, and that from there on the Indians had riparian rights, and the amount of $666,000 has been fixed on that basis and premises. The Superintendent General still persists in his protection of the Indians' rights; he still persists in his valuation; he has appealed from the decision of these three estimable and able gentlemen to the Supreme Court of Canada, and the case is before that court at the present time and will be decided as to the matters of law, ownership and value.

So much for this valuation. This is the point I wish to make, that I think my hon. friend from Edmonton has done a grave injustice to the Superintendent General. From the very outset of this transaction there has never been one moment that the Superintendent General of Indian Affairs has not exercised care and solicitude for the rights of the Indians. My hon. friend asked what was to be done with the money, and the Superintendent General of Indian Affairs answered him partially, if not fully. My hon. friend knows perfectly well that the Indian Act provided that half of the money derived from the sale of Indian property is usually given to the Indians and the other half is placed in a fund and kept at Ottawa for the benefit of the Indians. That is exactly what the Superintendent General intends to do when this award is completed; he intends that the money shall go entirely to the use of the Indians.

Let me turn for a moment to the Indians themselves and to their action. The Indian accepted $216,000 for their interest in this reserve, and this amount was divided up amongst about twenty Indians. These Indians are satisfied with what they have received and they have given up all their rights. My hon. friend, naturally, in his endeavour to make a little political capital, tried to involve the Superintendent General in that transaction, and he said this: By the very fact that the provincial Government paid those Indians, the Superintendent General must have been a party to the transaction, and in some way or another, his friends benefited from it. That did not follow at all. I hold, and the Superintendent General holds that the provincial Government had no right to carry out that transaction, but the provincial government claimed—and they have some ground on which to base their claim—that they own these reserves the minute they are abandoned by the Indians, and they went to the Indians and asked them if they wanted to abandon this reserve. The Indians replied that they did; the amount was agreed upon, and the reserve was abandoned by the Indians voluntarily. The Indians were not put off the reserve; they went off it willingly, and the provincial authorities then said: This reserve is ours. I have explained to my hon. friend my reasons for saying that the provincial Government was wrong. The Indian is a ward of the Dominion Government; he is in exactly the same position as a minor, as a child under twenty-one years of age, and that child or that minor has no right to abandon a piece of property that belongs to him without the consent of his guardian, and therefore I think the position of the Dominion authorities is sound, and the Superintendent General of Indian Affairs was perfectly right in taking the stand that the provincial transaction was not sound nor right. The question now arises: Is it fair to reimburse the provincial government? I contend that it is right to do so, because if you do not, you will pay the Indians an additional sum. It is quite true that after all, we cannot ignore what the provincial government did. We may say to them: You have spent your money; you had no right to give it to the Indians; go and get it back from them. I suppose that could be done, but that is not a proper view to take of the matter. The Dominion Government naturally say that they are prepared to reimburse the provincial government for such rights as they may establish, and those rights will be established by fair arbitration, I presume by some independent arbitrator such as a Supreme Court judge, or an Exchequer Court judge, or some other authority agreed on between the two parties. I think that fairly well explains the situation. In my opinion, the Superintendent General of Indian Affairs, as representing the Dominion Government, has acted in good faith, and he deserves credit for safeguarding the rights of those Indians.

[Mr. Stevens.]

Mr. PUGSLEY: I would not have detained the committe but for the extraordinary statement which my hon. friend seemed to think it was necessary to make in regard to the action of the department over which I presided for some few years, in regard to a piece of property at the city of Vancouver. The matters to which he has referred have nothing whatever to do with the question under discussion, but thinking in some way to discredit the management of my department the hon. gentleman has stated that I practically gave away the foreshore rights in the city of Vancouver to friends, which foreshore rights were of very considerable value. It is nearly six years since I was minister, and I do not recall any of the cases to which my hon. friend refers. But I do know that ever since Confederation there has been a rule in the department that in respect to foreshore privileges leases will be given at almost a nominal rental to the riparian owners for the purpose of making improvements to the property, by way of erecting wharves, factories or other buildings. That was the rule long before I came into Parliament, and I have no doubt it is the rule followed by my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries.

Mr. HAZEN: The leases are given by Order in Council on the joint report of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries and the Minister of Public Works.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I think the matter is always initiated in the Department of Marine and Fisheries. The valuation whether rental or purchase price is fixed by that department, and not by the Department of Public Works. Then the engineer of the Department of Public Works reports whether there would be any objection from the public standpoint, whether there would be any obstruction to navigation, and so forth.

Mr. HAZEN: There is a report from the engineer of the Department of Marine and Fisheries that it would not interfere with navigation, and a report from the engineer of Public Works that the property is not required for public purposes.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I think the minister will agree that the valuation is fixed by the Department of Marine and Fisheries, and therefore my hon. friend from Vancouver is barking up the wrong tree.

Mr. HAZEN: I do not say the valuation is actually fixed by the Department of Marine and Fisheries. The report is signed by both ministers, but the matter certainly initiates in the Department of Marine and Fisheries. Then it goes to the Minister of Public Works, and if he approves he joins in the report; so both ministers agree.

Mr. PUGSLEY: But the signature of the Minister of Public Works is of a more formal character. He simply has to decide whether the property is required for public purposes. The matter always originates with the Department of Marine and Fisheries, which fixes the valuation. That was the practice when I was minister; it has been the practice ever since Confederation, and I have no doubt it is the practice to-day. So my hon. friend is barking up the wrong tree when he attacks me for making an arrangement with regard to the rental at which the foreshore rights in Vancouver City should be leased. It is a perfectly simple matter. The riparian owner, having land fronting on navigable water, can prevent any obstruction being erected which would in any way interfere with his access. He can have approach to his land by steamer, scow or any other vessel which can navigate to it. No person would be allowed to erect an obstruction in front of his property, and if any one attempted to do so the owner could obtain an injunction, compelling him to remove the obstruction. All Governments ever since Confederation have favoured granting foreshore rights to people who own the land facing the water, provided they required the foreshore for the purposes of improvement.

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend is perfectly correct in stating that the two departments co-operate in fixing the price. Would my hon. friend accept the valuation of the Chief Engineer of the Marine and Fisheries Department in signing his report?

Mr. PUGSLEY: The practice with me was always this: There would come to my department a report signed by the chief engineer of the Marine and Fisheries Department, and a recommendation to council signed by the minister, and I would accept the report of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries as to valuation.

Mr. STEVENS: Inasmuch as my hon. friend had to sign these reports in regard to this property which was given by Order in Council for $180, and two years afterwards sold for $600,000—

Mr. PUGSLEY: Was that a sale?

Mr. STEVENS: An absolute sale. The Crown grant was made, and the sale took place from John Hendry to the British Columbia Electric.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Did Mr. Hendry sell all the riparian rights as well in that transfer?

Mr. STEVENS: It was foreshore, which included riparian rights.

Mr. PUGSLEY: If it was solely foreshore how could they get access to it except by water?

Mr. STEVENS: It was exactly the same property that my hon. friend gave for $180. I wish to ask a second question. If my hon. friend accepts the valuation of the chief engineer of the Marine and Fisheries Department, why did he override at that time the valuation of $180,000 fixed by Colonel Anderson, chief engineer of the Marine and Fisheries Department, and sell the land for $10 an acre, or $180.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The answer to that is I do not believe I did anything of the kind.

Mr. STEVENS: I will bring down the papers to-morrow.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I wish my hon. friend would. I am satisfied he is entirely mistaken.

Mr. STEVENS: I am positive I am right.

Mr. PUGSLEY: With regard to the sale which Hendry may have made to the British Columbia Electric, I venture to say he sold not only the foreshore, but a large area of land fronting on the water, which of course would include riparian rights in the foreshore. The remark which my hon friend has made with regard to property being sold to this Government for $360,000 reminds me of rumours which I have heard from Vancouver, that certain friends of my hon. friend the member for the city of Vancouver had succeeded in getting an enormous sum from this Government for a property which was worth very much less than the Government paid for it. That perhaps accounts for the rumours I have also heard that certain gentlemen received large commissions in connection with the transfer of that property.

Mr. STEVENS: What property does my hon. friend refer to?

Mr. PUGSLEY: The property is said to have cost $360,000, and the rumours I have heard reflect very seriously upon my hon. friend and friends of his.

Mr. STEVENS: As my hon. friend has brought that matter up, I will tell him that the dock site in Vancouver was chosen by engineers of the department without any interference whatsoever; and what property did they chose? Did they go to friends of this Government? No, they bought a piece of property belonging to Mr. Robert Kelly and Mr. McFeely, two of the most prominent Liberals in Vancouver. How did they buy it? Not as my hon. friend has no doubt done, by means of a nice private transaction between the department and the owner. No, they took it to the Exchequer Court. There was absolutely no middleman of any kind whatsoever, and I defy my hon. friend to produce one scintilla of evidence to show that there was even a middleman, let alone him getting anything out of it. The matter was not settled even by arbitration, but was taken to the Exchequer Court, and as the award was not satisfactory to Kelly and McFeely, the case was appealed. My hon. friend has no right to insinuate that there is anything in the transaction reflecting upon me unless he is in possession of facts to prove it. The facts that I have given can be proved beyond all peradventure by Order in Council. Yet the hon. member presumes to stand up in his place and throw out what I consider the contemptible insinuation that I was mixed up in the transaction, and that I or friends of mine profited by it.

I again challenge him and defy him to produce one scintilla of evidence to show that there was even a middleman in the property, let alone any commission. He knows, if he knows anything about it at all, that what he says is absolutely without the slightest foundation in fact.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The hon. gentleman says I have no ground for the suggestion I made, and that neither he nor his friends were interested. If he knows that I gladly accept his word. The statement on which I was relying was contained in a letter which I received from Vancouver, in which reference was made to—

Mr. STEVENS: Will the hon. gentleman give me the name of the writer? Will he give it to the committee?—or to Mr. Speaker?—or to the Prime Minister?

Mr. PUGSLEY: I was speaking from memory. The letter was received by me last year or the year before. Whether I have it on file now or not I do not know. But the statement in that letter is corroborated by the statement of the hon. gentleman himself that these gentlemen paid something like $3,000 for a property for which they received from this Government the princely sum of $360,000.

Mr. STEVENS: Under award of the Exchequer Court.

Mr. PUGSLEY: These awards depend largely upon the counsel engaged and the witnesses called to give information to the judge. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Stevens) is too old a bird not to understand how these things are done. He may smile, but I think he knows how these things are done —with friendly counsel and friends all around who are not desirous of making too hard a bargain. The hon. gentleman speaks of Mr. Robert Kelly. Mr. Kelly is a very fine fellow; indeed, one of the best men in the city of Vancouver. But I have yet to learn that if Mr. Kelly had a property he wanted to sell to the Dominion Government, say for a wharf site, he would be averse to availing himself of the assistance of friends in representing the value of that property to the Government. I do not know that that would be a serious reflection upon his standing or reputation. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Stevens) has said that there was no middleman—

Mr. STEVENS: Absolutely none.

Mr. PUGSLEY: If he says that there was none, and that his friends were not interested, and that the Government agents first approached Mr. Kelly, or whoever owned the property, in the ordinary business way, and the case was tried out bona fide, and the full evidence presented, and that the Government got the land at a fair valuation, I am prepared to accept his statement.

Mr. STEVENS: And Mr. Kelly and his associates were dissatisfied with the award of the Exchequer Court.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I do not see why they should be greatly dissatisfied in view of the fact that for a property for which they paid $3,000 they got $360,000. Gentlemen in the part of the country from which I come would be greatly pleased with such a transaction. What was the frontage?

Mr. STEVENS: About 350 feet, so far as their particular part was concerned. Let me correct my hon. friend—he has had quite a little spell at it now, let me put in a moment's correction. Because the hon. gentleman has peculiar ability in misleading the House somewhat in matters of fact. Let me remind him that it was he who signed the Order in Council together with the head of the Marine Department in the Government of which he was a member, which gave this property to his friends for the remarkably low sum of $3,600. If any crime against public right was committed, the guilt lies at the door of the late Government. The value placed upon the property by the Exchequer Court was a fair value. But these gentlemen had a Crown grant from his Government, and it is the price that Government accepted on behalf of the people of Canada to which I was calling the attention of the Committee, and to which attention should be called. He is not going to get away from it by trying to slip it around to the allegation that the present Government paid more than it ought to have paid. They paid what the Exchequer Court awarded, after a hearing that was bitterly fought out.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The foreshore, the hon. gentleman says, was 350 feet. How much of that is actually occupied by any wharf, building, or other structures?

Mr. STEVENS: There was an old mill.

Mr. PUGSLEY: What was the depth of the property from high water to low water?

Mr. STEVENS: He is not going to get me tangled up in matters of that kind. The foreshore sold by his Government——

Mr. PUGSLEY: I am asking now about what was sold to this Government.

Mr. STEVENS: The hon. gentleman is not trying to find out the facts, but is trying to make the matter appear an involved one to the members of the committee and to Hansard. His Government presented Mr. Kelly and Mr. McFeely a property from high tide mark out beyond low tide mark—I have forgotten the exact distance, but I think it was 700 feet—for $3,600. From high tide mark to the inner boundary of the property was a comparatively short distance.

Mr. PUGSLEY: What distance?

Mr. STEVENS: It varies, as it was a kind of a bay. It might be 100 feet.

Mr. PUGSLEY: What was the distance between high tide and low tide?

Mr. STEVENS: That had nothing to do with it, because it was not from high tide to low tide, but he gave from high tide 600 feet out and beyond low tide.

Mr. PUGSLEY: If any one is trying to mislead the committee, it is the hon. gentleman (Mr. Stevens), unless he is speaking in ignorance of the law. He ought to know that no Government could give Mr. Kelly or any one else rights beyond low tide, for that is common to the whole world; it does not belong to the Crown, and I venture to say that this Government never undertook to grant it. If Mr. Kelly built out into the navigable harbour, he had no right to do so. I understand now that he built out about 600 feet.

Mr. STEVENS: No, I said that the area covered by the Crown grant recommended by the hon. gentleman in his report to council and by his associate the then Minister of Marine and Fisheries was approximately 600 feet.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The hon. gentleman said it went out beyond low water mark.

Mr. STEVENS: Certainly.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I say it could not do so, because the Crown has no right beyond low water mark. He says that in addition to these rights Mr. Kelly and his associates owned the riparian rights as well, and that these were sold to this Government in conjunction with the foreshore. There is the difference. The foreshore right is practically of no value whatever as distinct from the rights of the riparian owner, because the riparian owner could prevent any obstruction being placed in the foreshore; but with the two holding together he has something that he can dispose of as a joint property. The hon. gentleman will recognize that he is the one who has tried to deceive the committee because the foreshore rights acquired from the Government for about $3,000 were sold to the present Government for $360,000.

He now says that in addition to the foreshore rights, Mr. Kelly and his associates owned the riparian rights, the whole of which, with certain improvements upon the property, were passed over to the Dominion Government. That is all I have to say. I am sorry to have taken up the time and I would not have done so had it not been for my hon. friend digressing in order to make it appear that the Liberal Government had parted with that property in Vancouver for less than it was worth.

Mr. OLIVER: I am sorry to have to delay the committee, but it is so seldom that a statement such as I made finds such exact corroboration from the other side of the House as my hon. friend from Vancouver (Mr. Stevens) was good enough to give me this evening that I cannot help but draw attention to it. We find ourselves in absolute agreement on almost all important points. He is just as certain as I am that the absolute right to the Indian reserves in British Columbia rests in the Indians and is absolutely under the jurisdiction of the Superintendent General of Indian Affairs. He explains to the committee, and I entirely agree with him, the ostensible principle under which the then mittee. But they claimed the absolute right to all abandoned reserves. If they could secure the abandonment of this reserve, they would become its owners, and so they employed agents to deal with the Indians to secure that abandonment to the end that they might become the absolute owners. Now, we are absolutely in agreement upon this line of facts and there is no argument about the matter. We disagree when he says that the then Superintendent General of Indian Affairs in any way contested the action of the British Columbia Government at that time or in any way undertook to protect the interests of the Indians or the rights of this Government as protecting the Indians. He declares to the committee that this Government, through its Superintendent General of Indian Affairs, did everything it could to protect the Indians against this attack upon their rights, which he has described so accurately. He will remember that when this transaction was actually in progress, it was ventilated in the Vancouver papers from day to day and that it was brought by myself to the attention of the then Superintendent General of Indian Affairs. It was therefore absolutely within his cognizance. My hon. friend from Vancouver assures the House that it was absolutely within his jurisdiction and the facts as recorded in the Vancouver papers, and the facts as they occurred, are that the Superintendent General of Indian Affairs did not then or afterwards take any action to prevent this carefully planned, determinedly made and concerted attack upon the rights of the Indians. He admitted so much that there is no use in his attempting to deny what is such a patent fact. I said on a former occasion, and I repeat, that the British Columbia Government, peculiar though their ideas may have been as to the rights, powers and immunities of its membership, did not take $216,000, did not take $300,000 out of the treasury of British Columbia knowing what they did know as to the rights of the Indians and the authority of this Government, unless they had an understanding with this Government on the subject. They would not have risked the penitentiary to that extent.

With regard to the remarks of my hon. friend as to my connection with the matter, I certainly say that I was approached on numerous occasions to secure the surrender of the Kitsilano reserve. I took such measures as were possible to secure its surrender, and if my memory serves me aright, I found difficulties in the way. The legislation which was the subject of discussion between the Minister of the Interior and myself this evening, was brought into Parliament and put through under my auspices for the especial purpose of dealing with the Kitsilano Indian reserve. However, the people of Canada kindly took the responsibility out of my hands and I was not further concerned in it. That is my connection with the Indian reserve and I can assure my hon. friend that whatever any supporter of the Liberal Government may have said in Vancouver—and I would not like to be responsible for everything that everybody in Vancouver might say—he never had any authority from me to say that any such disposition would be made of the Kitsilano reserve when the rights of the Indians in that reserve had been disposed of.

I shall not delay the committee further than to point out that the set of facts that I have placed before the committee has been absolutely substantiated by my hon. friend from Vancouver who was on the ground and is familiar with the circumstances. There certainly has been a change of policy on the part of this Government from the time when they did consent, and must have consented, to the transaction of the provincial government with these Indians on the basis of $300,000 and it is interesting to compare that policy with the policy of to-day which refuses $660,000 as a fair price for the reserve. My hon. friend has told the House that the Superintendent General of Indian Affairs had said that the provincial government would be recouped for the money they had spent.

Mr. STEVENS: No, I did not say that. What I said was that the minister had said that arbitration proceedings would be taken to determine the nature of the rights that the British Columbia Government had and he assumed that the arrangement made would be fair and reasonable. I have taken this to mean that it would be fair and reasonable to recoup them for the money they paid to the Indians instead of paying the Indians a second time. These Indians usually get half and half goes into a trust fund for the benefit of the Indians. From the half that was given to the Indians, it would be fair to deduct the amount they had already received from the provincial government and return that to them. That is a matter that has to be determined by mutual arrangement and I understand that they have agreed upon arbitration.

Mr. OLIVER: It cannot be both ways, that the amount to be paid to the Indians is to be decided on the basis of the rights of the British Columbia Government as decided by arbitration and also on the amount of money that has been paid to the Indians. It has to be either one way or the other, and if it is one way it is not the other. That is to say, if the amount to be paid to the Indians is to be as the arbitrator decides and in accordance with the rights of the province in the reserve, then this Government does not propose to recoup the province of British Columbia. On the other hand, if they do propose to recoup the province of British Columbia, then the question of the measure of the rights of the province does not come into the transaction. If any evidence were needed to prove my contention, it is offered by this circumstance: the British Columbia government of three or four years ago did not pay $300,000 depending on an arbitration as to the measure of their rights in the reserve to secure its return. There was an understanding between the British Columbia Government of that day and the Superintendent General of Indian Affairs of this Government, to the detriment of the Indians and of the country.

Mr. ROCHE: That has been denied on the floor of Parliament by my predecessor.

Mr. OLIVER: Yes, yes.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The Indian Commission, so called, cost the country $330,000. They were in operation for about three years. There were five commissioners who received $20 a day and a living allowance of $10. That would account for $165,000 as against $330,000. There may be other items—

Mr. ROCHE: There are other items.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Should the minister not give them to the committee?

Mr. ROCHE: They will be found in the Auditor General's Report at pages H—42, H—43 and H—44.

Mr. TURRIFF: In connection with this allowance of $10 a day for living expenses, the chairman of the Commission must have been at home, or at least not travelling, for a great part of the time as his travelling expenses during the three years were $316, $325 and $121. Apparently the $10 a day was allowed whether the Commissioners were travelling or not.

Mr. ROCHE: The Chairman was not at home, as his home is in Nova Scotia. By Order in Council it was provided that the $10 a day for living allowance should be given to the Commissioners while they were engaged on the work. That was done as is usually the case with Commissions of this kind, instead of requiring them to keep tab of each item of expense as is done with subordinate officials of the Government.

Mr. TURRIFF: I quite understand that. But these men were apparently located in Victoria or Vancouver a great part of the time, if they were not at home.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I think the minister should allow the item to stand until members have had an opportunity of examining these detailed items which he has pointed out. For instance, there is the charter of the Union Steamship Company from the 22nd of September to the 5th October, 13 days, $3,400, to take the Commissioners up to the Naas Agency. Then the salary of the secretary seems to have been fixed at $11,000 a year, which seems enormous. Another extraordinary thing is that for the printing of the report there is an estimate of $21,000. There were advances of $8,000 or $9,000 against the printing of the report. The report must have been most voluminous when an estimate of $21,000 was made for printing it. I can hardly imagine any report costing so much unless thousands of copies are distributed. The minister will recognize that these items require explanation. Then there is the salary of Mr. White, the chairman, $12,000; that of the other commissioners, $10,000; the secretary of the commission, $10,980. When the secretary was appointed to the postmastership of Montreal, Mr. Gibbons, who was appointed in his place, received $900 for one month, so I take it that he received the same salary. Ten thousand dollars is a very high salary for the secretary of the commission. The member for Pictou wishes to speak about some of the items, and perhaps the minister would allow this to stand. It is now twenty minutes after eleven, and I suggest that we adjourn.

Mr. ROCHE: If the hon. gentleman will allow this item to pass I will bring down the information. I would like to go through with the other items, but if the hon. gentleman wishes to stop work of course we will have to do so.

Mr. PUGSLEY: There is no disposition on the part of hon. gentlemen on this side to block my hon. friend's estimates, or the estimates of any minister. This information ought to be before the public in justice to the minister and to the Government, if for no other reason, because if the public see these amounts and have no explanation of them they will think that there is something wrong. I am not making a charge that there is anything wrong, but the only way to show the people that everything is right is to give the information.

Progress reported.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Roche, the House adjourned at 11.23 p.m.

Friday, June 1, 1917.

The House met at Three o'clock, the Speaker in the Chair.

STRIKE AT SOREL.

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. RODOLPHE LEMIEUX: I understand that two or three hundred men in the Government shops at Sorel have declared a strike and that the Government have decided to close the shops for a fortnight. May I ask the Minister of Marine and Fisheries whether any arrangement has been arrived at?

Hon. J. D. HAZEN (Minister of Marine): We had some trouble there, but I am glad to say that the shops are now open and that work has been resumed.

Mr. LEMIEUX: What arrangements were made with the strikers?

Mr. HAZEN: The men have all gone back to work.

Mr. LEMIEUX: At the same pay?

Mr. HAZEN: We are considering the question of pay. We have granted increases in certain cases where increases were deemed right and proper. As a matter of fact, the matter was being considered when the men took the ill-advised step of striking.

SUSPENSION OF COASTAL REGULATIONS.

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. Wm. PUGSLEY (St. John): I am informed that the Government has by Order in Council suspended the provisions of the Coastal Act under which United States vessels are carrying grain for the use of the Allies. It is necessary, I assume, that those vessels should use more than one Canadian port. Can the right hon. Prime Minister inform the House whether any action has been taken in the matter?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: No action has been taken as yet.

SUPPLY.

The House in Committee of Supply, Mr. Blain in the Chair.

Ocean and river service—To provide for the construction of two steamers to replace the Quadra, $150,000.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Will those steamers be constructed in Canada and will they be built of steel or of wood?

Mr. HAZEN: When they come to be constructed, they will be constructed in Canada and they will be built of wood. The Quadra was lost in collision, and we find that we can do very much better by building two smaller vessels than by building one large vessel. We have managed to get along in the meantime by chartering a vessel, and in view of existing conditions, it is not likely we shall proceed with the construction of those vessels this year. That is a matter for consideration.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Has the minister any intimation to make in regard to the building of wooden vessels in eastern Canada. Early in this session we had an intimation from the Minister of Finance that the Government was giving some consideration to the question of constructing wooden vessels, and I think my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries rather held out the hope that an announcement on the subject might be made in the not distant future; but to my surprise, the Minister of Trade and Commerce, a few days ago, made the statement that the Government was not building and did not purpose building any wooden vessels in Canada. I am sure that statement will be a disappointment to a great many in eastern Canada who would like to see the question of building wooden ships actually taken up by the Government.

In this connection, I would also like to call the attention of the minister to the fact that I am informed that the Imperial Munitions Board, limiting, as they have done, to 2,500 tons the size of wooden vessels which they are having built for the Imperial Government, are discouraging people in the Maritime Provinces and in other parts of eastern Canada from the idea of utilizing timber from British Columbia, which timber, as the minister knows, is necessary for the construction of larger vessels. The ground on which that is based is, I believe, that it would be difficult to supply transportation for British Columbia lumber to eastern Canada. I am not sure whether the Imperial Munitions Board, in making that statement, has been influenced at all by the extraordinary action of the minister of Railways in taking up the heavy rails on the Transcontinental and the Grand Trunk Pacific. Of course, the taking up of those rails and the substitution of lighter rails would very considerably interfere with the facilities for the transportation of heavy material at low rates of freight over the Transcontinental road. I would have thought that the Imperial Munitions Board and this Government would be disposed to encourage the bringing of British Columbia timber for use in the shipyards of eastern Canada, and I was very much surprised to learn that the Imperial Munitions Board had taken the action they did. There is, however, in eastern Canada, plenty of material for the building of wooden vessels of smaller size, and it might be desirable to have those two vessels built at once so that something may be done in the way of establishing shipbuilding in eastern Canada.

Mr. HAZEN: Those vessels are for use on the Pacific coast. The Quadra, which they will replace, was used on the Pacific coast in connection with the Marine Department.

Mr. PUGSLEY: If those two vessels were constructed in eastern Canada, they could be taken to British Columbia via the Panama canal. Perhaps this is a good time to ask my hon. friend if anything has resulted from his suggestion to the representatives of the British Government that they should engage in the building of smaller vessels. Only the day before yesterday, at a branch meeting of the Manufacturers' Association, held in the city of St. John, the matter of building smaller wooden vessels came up, and very strong feeling was expressed in favour of the Government taking up the matter of building wooden vessels. Such vessels are very much required, as my hon. friend will agree. It is almost impossible to-day to obtain vessels for carrying on the coastal service of Canada, and it is almost impossible to secure vessels to bring anthracite coal from the Pennsylvania mines for use in factories, for heating dwellings, and for general use in the cities of the Maritime Provinces. The question is becoming a very serious one, and I would like to hear from the Minister of Marine and Fisheries whether any steps have been or are likely to be taken by the Government to engage as a Government operation—I do not mean by encouraging private individuals—in the building of smaller wooden vessels in Canada.

Mr. HAZEN: My information is not exactly the same as that of my hon. friend. I understand that the reason why the Imperial Munitions Board is not prepared to place contracts for wooden vessels of less than 2,500 tons is because that board has absolute instructions on that point from the British Government, and the vessels which the British Government wish are limited to 2,500 tons, and they are not, up to the present time, willing to authorize the building for them of smaller vessels. That is a policy, of course, which they have to determine; they are the owners of the vessels; it is for them that the vessels are being built; it is for them to declare what sort of vessels they require, and they have declared that at the present time they do not want vessels of less than 2,500 tons. The junior member for Halifax (Mr. A. K. Maclean) stated the other night in this House that vessels of that size could not be built in the Maritime Provinces, because it was impossible to secure the lumber to build such vessels. I took the occasion of communicating this statement both to the Colonial Secretary and to the Director of Shipping, Sir Joseph MacLay, pointing out that I trusted that they would reconsider the matter, and that in the public interest they would see whether or not vessels of a smaller size were desirable for their purposes, and, if they were, that orders would be placed in Canada for their construction. I have not received an answer to that communication yet. The question, of course, has to be decided by the British Government, through the Imperial Munitions Board. There are being constructed in the province of Nova Scotia at the present time by private individuals 48 wooden vessels, the builders believing that there will be a good margin of profit on vessels of that sort, and that it will prove a profitable undertaking. The information I got by letter was to the effect that the vessels were from 1,500 tons down to about 100 tons. The junior member for Halifax, however, said that he did not think any vessels were being constructed in the province as large as 1,500 tons. He said that the largest under construction in the province would be no more than 1,000 tons, and I think he even mentioned 600 tons. If that is the case, the information that was sent to me by a gentleman who I thought was very well informed as to conditions in Nova Scotia, must be erroneous.

The junior member for Halifax pointed out the very great difficulty there would be in building large wooden ships in the lower provinces on account of the difficulty in getting timber. Still, there is considerable activity in shipbuilding in Nova Scotia, as is evidenced by the 48 vessels now under construction. From the information I have received—and the hon. member for Halifax agrees with me—there is no need to give a bonus to encourage the construction of wooden vessels; the junior member for Halifax expressed the opinion that it was neither desirable nor necessary. The reason is that these vessels can be built and operated at a very substantial profit, providing they escape the submarines and mines, on account of the high freight rates.

The question of building ships in this country for use after the war, to be owned by this Government, is a very important one. Hon. gentlemen will, of course, understand that it would involve the expenditure of a very large sum of money, and at the present time when such very large sums have to be raised for the purpose of carrying on the war, the question of raising additional millions would cause the Finance Minister of this country a great deal of concern; it is a policy that cannot rashly be undertaken, but will require the most careful consideration. If private individuals are willing to go into the building of ships of this sort, the Government would not be justified, I think, in entering into competition with them. One of the difficulties in the past about private individuals entering into the building of ships in this country has been the danger of having the ships, after they were completed, commandeered for war purposes, and if commandeered by the British Government they would not earn the ordinary commercial rates, but what are known as approved rates, which have been fixed by a special committee in England and which are not as high as the ship could earn under private ownership. These are all matters of importance and require the most careful consideration. I have not the statement with me that my hon. friend asked for with regard to the number of vessels being built in Canada for the British Government through contracts placed by the Munitions Board, but it has been sent to my office, and I think I shall be able to let my hon. friend have it to-morrow.

Mr. E. M. MACDONALD (Pictou): I have listened with a very great deal of interest to the statement of my hon. friend and I am sorry that he holds out no hope of assistance to the ship building industry, which would mean the development of a Canadian mercantile marine. My hon. friend tells us that the Imperial Government has made arrangements through the Munitions Board for the construction of large ships, which, when constructed, will be under the control of the Imperial Government, and will not be available for our internal trade. The question of adding to the very few ships in Canada capable of looking after the transportation of our products on the sea is to be left over until after the war. That is not a very hopeful outlook. The minister will remember that the hon. member for St. John last year, and two years ago, and on several occasions since, has urged on the Government the absolute necessity of taking some action in this matter, and it is, indeed, disappointing, after all this discussion, to find that the Government have reached the determination to do nothing whatever towards the creation of a Canadian mercantile marine.

The situation in regard to our internal trade is a very serious one. The question of coal, for instance, and how the people of Canada are to be warmed next winter is a very serious problem indeed. At this moment we are absolutely dependent upon what coal we can get from the United States, and there the direct control of the production and output of the American collieries is under the American Government, along lines, which, in the judgment of men connected with the coal trade, creates a condition which the people of this country, having regard to the situation in western Canada, can only view with misgiving and alarm. So far as eastern Canada is concerned, to the great distributing point of Montreal there has always been sent a large quantity of coal, running from 3,000,000 to 4,000,000 tons, but this year practically no coal whatever can be sent along the ordinary channels, not because the coal is not there, for in a great many cases it is lying in the bank, but because of the lack of transportation facilities by water. Practically every collier that was engaged in transporting coal from Nova Scotia to the central part of Canada has been commandeered by the British Government, and the result is, as every business man knows, that the prospects of getting coal by sea from eastern Canada are very, very poor indeed. The only hope is that the Minister of Railways will deal with the situation by providing a very low freight rate on the railways, but every one will realize that that will not be at all equal to the transportation of coal by water. That is the condition with regard to coal, which is a very important item to the people of Canada. If the British Government, through the Imperial Munitions Board, commandeer our ships for war purposes, where are we going to get the necessary transportation facilities? The minister tells us that 48 vessels are being built in the province of Nova Scotia. Those may or may not be commandeered; they may be sold to the United States.

Mr. HAZEN: No.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I saw by the papers that one was sold only a few days ago.

Mr. MACDONALD: Of course, the Minister of Marine, under the plenary powers given him by the War Measures Act can control the disposition of these vessels. All the small vessels available will be needed to meet the local requirements along our own coast, and if all are of the small character indicated by him they will not supply the needs of the country for transportation covering greater distances. It seems to me the Government ought to take steps to provide for the construction of vessels. Let these vessels be constructed either by the Government direct or by private parties, under subvention or in some other way. The means to be taken should be the subject of consideration by the best technical experts who should advise the country how to deal with this very serious problem. I have made some inquiries myself, and, for one thing, I am advised that the statement made that it is impossible to get the plates for the construction of steel vessels is not an accurate statement. That is the advice I received from those to whose opinions in these matters great weight should be given. Against that advice I would not believe the statement that has been made without evidence of a most indisputable character. We cannot accept the dictum of an hon. gentleman who happens to think thus and so, when we have statements to the contrary from men engaged in the business.

One of the great mistakes we have made in regard to problems such as this is to accept the statement: You cannot do this, it will take too long. We have been saying that in regard to everything material to the welfare of Canada since the war began; and the time has arrived when we must face these problems and must mature a proper, sensible programme in regard to the whole situation. We have been hoping for an early end of the war, and now the conditions facing us are serious enough. It is a question whether we are not now too late, but certainly we are getting nearer every day to the time when it will be too late. The best way to avoid being too late is to start now. Transportation conditions in this country demand most radical action. It will not do to leave this problem to be settled after the war. If you cannot have the ships ready in six months, then lay down a programme to have them ready next spring. The days for the production of wooden ships have not gone by; and every one knows that if a programme were laid down now, before next spring we could place upon the ocean ready for service a huge number of these wooden vessels. And every one of them will be needed, no matter how many you supply. I was told by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster) ten days ago that every shipyard that could build wooden ships is busy building ships for the Imperial Munitions Board. Yet only two days ago I had a letter from a shipbuilder in my own country in which he told me he was trying to get a contract for a wooden ship, and if he got the contract he would start building at once, but he had not been able to get the contract up to that time. I see by the press that a firm in Sherbrooke have received a contract for supplying engines and other material to provide power for certain scows now under construction. These must be for vessels of a less capacity than the minimum of the wooden ships to be built under the authority of the Imperial Munitions Board. So much for wooden ships.

Now, in regard to steel ships, the House ought to know authoritatively whether or not the Government have made inquiries in the United States and Great Britain, and whether they have information of a definite character as to the production of steel plates. It is manifest that we ought to build steel ships if we can, because the same appliances, such as machinery, now being placed in wooden vessels will be of much greater value, as giving more permanent results, if placed in steel ships. Having regard to the great interests at stake, the Government should at once take action for the providing of a mercantile marine, and not leave this problem until after the war for settlement. We are now entering upon our summer season, and, even if we cannot have ships ready for the autumn, we ought at least to have entered upon a definite certain programme which will enable us to know that these vessels will be built, either of wood or of steel, so that when the season of 1918 opens we shall have ships enough to meet our transportation needs. The coal problem, I warn the minister and the Government, is at this moment so serious that the question may face us, for the first time in our history, of the possibility of Canada being compelled to rely solely on her own products which cannot be transported. This may result in conditions of the greatest possible hardship unless every effort is made to provide means of transport for the coal that is needed. The problem is to use coal from the ports of Nova Scotia near the points of production as a factor in helping to keep warm in winter the people of central Canada, and this problem is so allied with the question of shipping that the need for action on the line I have suggested becomes so great that it must not be disregarded.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Are the ships that are being ordered by the Munitions Board wholly of wood?

Mr. HAZEN: Many of them are steel ships.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Will the Board accept a ship built wholly of wood?

Mr. HAZEN: I understand that they will, if the ship is not less than 2,500 tons.

Mr. SINCLAIR: It is not necessary that the frame be steel?

Mr. HAZEN: I understand that it is not necessary.

Mr. SINCLAIR: What kind of wood is used?

Mr. HAZEN: British Columbia fir and pine, I understand.

[Mr. Macdonald.]

Mr. SINCLAIR: I am sure there are many people who would like to get that information.

Mr. HAZEN: I am sure the Munitions Board would be delighted to give it.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The Munitions Board do not encourage the building of ships in Eastern Canada in which British Columbia timber is to be used. Some one has told them that the timber cannot be transported. But if the Transcontinental Railway were given the order, I am sure they would be able to transport enough timber to build many ships.

Mr. HAZEN: I am not here to represent the Munitions Board, but I should like to know what authority the hon. gentleman has for his statement.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I have been told directly that the Board discourages giving contracts to persons who contemplate bringing their timber from British Columbia. I have a letter to that effect. I either have a letter or a gentleman who went to the Munitions Board with a view of getting a contract stated that that was represented to him; but I am inclined to think that I have a letter myself to the same effect.

Of course, the unjustifiable dismantling of the Transcontinental railway by the Minister of Railways and Canals may be a reason for lack of transportation facilities, but in northern British Columbia, in the Prince Rupert district, we know there are vast forest areas where long timber can be got in enormous quantities and which might be easily hauled over the Transcontinental railway for use in the shipyards of eastern Canada. Let me ask the minister if he will not see the Munitions Board and find out what the exact position of the matter is. If the minister will inquire of the Munitions Board he will find, I am sure, that that is the view which the Board take and that they discourage people from taking contracts to build wooden ships of 2,500 tons if they are relying on British Columbia timber. They speak of the difficulties of transportation. It was said here recently—I think yesterday—that the Transcontinental railway is not doing very much business in western Canada, and especially through the mountains. I do not know whether that is true or not, but if it is true, why should not that road be utilized to transport timber to the shipyards of eastern Canada where it may be used for the building of wooden ships?

Now, I will leave that question and I will take up what my hon. friend says in regard to the building of wooden vessels by the Canadian Government. Even at the risk of some foolish person, or some foolish newspaper, outside of the House saying that I am interfering with the carrying on of the war because I criticise the Government, I desire to say that the Government has not discharged its duty to the people of this country in not having long ago engaged in the building of wooden ships. It is not discharging its duty to-day in determining, as it was announced here that it had determined, that it will do nothing in that direction. My hon. friend speaks of vessels being built in the shipyards of Nova Scotia by private parties at their own expense. Why should the shipbuilders of eastern Canada be placed at a disadvantage by being obliged to finance the enterprise entirely themselves while tbe builders of steel ships in British Columbia are assisted by the Imperial Government or the Imperial Munitions Board? Is this Government afraid to do what the British Government is doing? Is this Government afraid to engage in the building of vessels when the British Government is doing so? When the United States entered into the war, the United States Government immediately appropriated $50,000,000 for the purpose of building wooden vessels. They did not require that they should be of 2,500 tons. They ordered that there should be a thousand wooden vessels constructed of a capacity of 1,000 tons each. That was the order which the United States gave to the proper officials—I think Mr. Goethels is the chairman of the United States ship construction board.

Mr. HAZEN: My hon. friend must have seen that they are not going to build them now.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I have not seen it. I suppose they are not going to build them because they have great opportunities for building steel vessels. My hon. friend from Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) has pictured the condition of the people in consequence of the high cost of transportation applying to fuel, foodstuffs, and everything which the people require, the cost of which is becoming so great that a condition of misery and almost of starvation has been created and there is danger almost of people freezing to death in some parts of this country. That might be prevented by the Government doing something with regard to the question of transportation . Why are they not doing it? My hon. friend says that they are going to do it after the war. After the war there will be no necessity for it.

Mr. HAZEN: I did not say so.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I thought the hon. gentleman said that after the war this would be a very important question to be considered. His colleague the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster), during the present session, said that he was utilizing his staff for the purpose of working out a scheme to engage in the building of ships after the war. It is not after the war that the people require such relief. It is now. It was two years ago, it was nearly three years ago that the Government ought to have taken the matter up. It is with regret that I do it, but I do make the charge that this Government has with respect to the building of wooden ships absolutely failed in the duty which it owes to the Canadian people. Our boys who are at the front have left their mothers and sisters in Canada. There are certain provisions made for them but if the cost of fuel and the cost of the necessaries of life goes up by leaps and bounds as it has been going up for months and months past it is going to render the condition of this class of the community, as well as of all the other people in Canada who are not possessed of very large means, very deplorable. Take the city of St. John in which my hon. friend lives when he is in his home town and to-day our people are paying $14 per ton for anthracite coal and the word I get from there is that the dealers refuse to enter into a contract because they do not know how they will be able to get their coal from the mines in Pennsylvania to St. John. Is that not a condition which ought to excite attention on the part of hon. gentlemen? Do they turn deaf ears to the appeals which are going out from the people in this particular?

Mr. BURNHAM: How is the Government going to deal with it? It is the same all through Ontario.

Mr. PUGSLEY: By building vessels and bringing rates down to a fair and reasonable charge. That is the way the Government is going to do it. I do not assume that if the Government do build vessels and engage in transportation they are going to keep the prices away up the same as the speculators keep them up. I do not imagine that if the Government were to take charge of the flour mills of Canada they would charge the same extravagant rates for the manufacture of flour as the private miller is doing. I would assume that if the Government built vessels they would give relief to the people in the way of transportation and keep the charges down to within reasonable limits. As far as coal and many other of the necessaries of life are concerned, it is the high cost of transportation that is increasing the prices to these exorbitant amounts, and which are imposing such burdens on the people to-day.

Mr. BURNHAM: Freight rates are under the control of a commission, are they not?

Mr. PUGSLEY: No, not on vessels.

Mr. BURNHAM: But they are on railways?

Mr. PUGSLEY: My hon. friend ought to know that transportation by water ought to be very much cheaper than transportation by rail, and yet to-day you cannot get transportation by water between the producing districts in the United States, where coal is mined, and mined in abundance, and the ports of the Maritime Provinces. Or, if the Government were to go into the building of vessels they would be able to place these vessels on the routes where they were most required and by charging fair and reasonable rates they would be able to keep down the cost of transportation and so give relief to the people who are, as I have said, in a very distressing condition to-day in many sections of the country, and whose condition will be deplorable in the near future if nothing is done by the Government for their relief. However, I have discharged my duty and it rests with the Government to say whether they will do anything or whether they will continue the do-nothing policy which they have pursued in this regard ever since the war began. My hon. friend says it would take money to build wooden vessels. But did not his colleague the Minister of Railways (Mr. Cochrane) only yesterday introduce a Bill which will authorize him to expend $10,000,000 of the money of the people of this country on the construction of highways, which are not needed in these times of war? What the Government ought to do is to take that $10,000,000 and build wooden vessels to assist in cheapening transportation at once and give relief to the people of this country in the direction in which relief is most needed. Let the construction of highways, which, after all, are largely for the use of the automobilists of this country, wait; these matters of necessity may well stand over until the settling of the war. Let the Government devote what money they have to what really can be accomplished for the purpose of relieving distress, and distress in many particulars can be best relieved by decreasing the cost of transportation in Canada.

Mr. A. A. McLEAN: When I saw in the newspapers that the Munitions Board were giving contracts in British Columbia for the construction of wooden ships, I went down to the Munitions Board and asked one of the officials if contracts would be given in eastern Canada, and he told me that so soon as the men who are conducting the business for the board in British Columbia and the West were through with their business in that part of Canada, they would proceed to the Maritime Provinces. I was informed that any person who would assure the board that he had a proper shipyard, properly equipped, and had competent men in charge of it, would be given contracts for 2,500-ton wooden ships.

Mr. MARCIL: Nothing less than 2,500 tons.

Mr. A. A. McLEAN: He said 2,500-ton wooden steamships. This information was given freely to me, and I do not think there is any secret about it.

Mr. MARCIL: Did the hon. member ask if any less than that tonnage would be constructed?

Mr. A. A. McLEAN: That is what I was told, that the ships were all of a standard tonnage of 2,500 tons. I do not think that, as the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley) has stated, the building of these ships is to be confined to British Columbia. I have applied to men in my own province and asked them to consider the matter and find out what quantities of wood were available there for the building of ships, and I am assured that, with the exception of certain portions of the ship, wood is available in the three Maritime Provinces.

4 p.m.

Mr. PUGSLEY: What I said was that to build these 2,500-ton ships in eastern Canada it would in most cases be necessary to bring timber from British Columbia, and while the Munitions Board would give contracts to build in eastern Canada, they would discourage the entering into contracts involving the bringing of timber from British Columbia. They put forward the difficulty of transportation. That is what I understood.

Mr. A. A. McLEAN: I do not see why the hon. member should wish the board to discourage the building of ships in eastern Canada.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The hon. member insists on misunderstanding me. They will discourage the building of wooden ships in eastern Canada if the builders wish to depend for their timber, or any portion of it, on British Columbia. That is what I said.

Mr. A. A. McLEAN: I do not think they will depend on British Columbia to get lumber.

Mr. PUGSLEY: For the large vessels they say they must.

Mr. A. A. McLEAN: There is a sufficient quantity of lumber in eastern Canada, Quebec, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island to build the ships, and I have no doubt that these gentlemen on their return from the West will offer contracts.

Mr. PUGSLEY: A gentleman was here the other day from New Brunswick who has facilities for shipbuilding in a portion of New Brunswick, the north shore, which is perhaps the best timbered section in the province. He was prepared to engage at once in the building of four wooden ships of a tonnage not exceeding 500 tons each. He said if he had to build larger vessels than that, up to the specifications of the Munitions Board, he would be obliged to procure a portion of the timber from British Columbia.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Why not from the Southern States?

Mr. PUGSLEY: That might be done, of course.

Mr. A. A. McLEAN: I have given the information which I received, and that information is that contracts will be offered after these gentlemen return from British Columbia. The Imperial Government will supply and pay for all materials for the construction of these ships, and give a fair profit, but the profit for eastern Canada has not yet been settled.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Is there a uniform price?

Mr. A. A. McLEAN: I do not know. I did not inquire, but I suppose it will depend upon the local markets what they will pay for lumber in different sections.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Is there a standard model or pattern of ship?

Mr. A. A. McLEAN: The hon. member can get that information at the Munitions Board; I did not go into it very particularly. I just wanted to know whether the information which was given in this House and the statements made in this House that the Munitions Board would not construct in the East were true or not, and I found out that they were not true, that the Board intended to offer contracts in the East.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Did they intimate when that would take place?

Mr. A. A. McLEAN: So soon as the gentlemen conducting this business returned from the West.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Who was the official whom the hon. gentleman saw?

Mr. A. A. McLEAN: If my hon. friend will consult Mr. Fitzgerald he will get the information which I received.

Mr. KYTE: I desire to point out the situation in Nova Scotia with respect to the securing of a supply of anthracite coal for which provision will have to be made in the course of a few months. It appears to be almost impossible to get tonnage to convey this coal from Boston or New York to ports in Nova Scotia. Some ten days ago, I think rates as high as $8 a ton were being offered in Boston for the carriage of anthracite coal from that port to ports in Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island. One can readily see that the imposition of such a charge as that for transportation would render it almost impossible for the ordinary consumer of anthracite to lay in a supply for the approaching winter season. The same condition obtains with regard to the carriage of soft coal. I know that in the island of Cape Breton large collieries are obliged to bank great quantities of coal that should be in course of transportation to the different places where local consumption of coal is necessary and where the supply of coal is very much shorter than it would ordinarily be at this season of the year. I do not know what immediate steps the Government can take to relieve this situation. I believe the conditions existing in the island of Cape Breton as regards the shipment of coal from those mines to other parts of the Maritime Provinces is due to the fact that the Government has commandeered a large number of steamers and has taken many vessels out of the carrying trade.

I regret very much that the Minister of Marine and Fisheries does not seem to be able to find a solution of the difficulty. Not only are the consumers of coal hampered by reason of the enormous freights being charged, but the producers as well are hampered by reason of their inability to get shipment for their coal to different points in the Maritime Provinces. There are ample facilities in the province of Nova Scotia for the construction of smaller ships than those to which reference has been made by the minister, and a large number of wooden ships would now be in course of construction in that province if some kind of encouragement had been given. The member for St. John has referred to the enormous expenditure proposed by the Minister of Railways and Canals under the Bill introduced yesterday. I agree with the hon. member for St. John that the expenditure of $10,000,000 for the improvement of highways at this time is absolutely unjustifiable and indefensible, having regard to the crying need for more vessels to carry coal and other necessaries of life from the different ports of the Maritime Provinces. Certainly the Government cannot refuse to take action upon the plea that money is not available.

Mr. BURNHAM: Why was coal not carried to the lake regions by means of vessels before the war?

Mr. KYTE: I know of no other way of carrying it up to the lakes—although a few years ago the member for West Peterborough was advocating the use of flying machines for transportation purposes.

Mr. BURNHAM: We are stuck for coal in Ontario, but they do not think of bringing it to this part of the country by means of vessels. It is said that coal cannot be cheaply carried that way, partly owing to inability to control the mines and operators. The result has been the high price of coal in Ontario—and it seems likely to continue. When it was suggested that the railways were overcharging, it was found that that was not the case.

Mr. PUGSLEY: My information is that the people of Ontario pay less for bringing coal all the way from the Pennsylvania mines by rail than the people of the Maritime Provinces are obliged to pay for bringing it by water. Transportation by water ought not to be one-quarter as expensive as transportation by rail.

Mr. BURNHAM: Then why have vessels not been used in the past for this purpose?

Mr. PUGSLEY: Because there have been so few vessels.

[Mr. Kyte.]

Mr. KYTE: Before the war there was no scarcity of vessels for the transportation of coal, but since the commencement of war the Government have commandeered a number of vessels that were previously engaged in that work. Coal has not, I think, been at any time carried from Nova Scotia to the Great Lakes by vessels, because the vessels were unable to pass through the canals. So far as our tonnage in the Maritime Provinces is concerned, therefore, conditions affecting the transport of coal to the lakes are not different now from what they were a few years ago. It is in the highest degree desirable that some active steps should at once be taken to relieve the present condition of affairs. This is the season of the year when hard coal is being purchased and held in stock for next winter, but the people of the Maritime Provinces are unable to lay in their supply of coal at this season, and thus take advantage of the reduced price, because of the prohibitive rates charged as a result of the scarcity of tonnage.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I wish to read a letter which I received from the Director of Steel Shipbuilding in answer to a communication which I wrote to the Munitions Board asking for information as to the standard of vessels. I did that because some gentlemen in New Brunswick were desirous of engaging in shipbuilding. This letter, which is not of a private nature, puts the Board's position very clearly. It is as follows:

May 16, 1917.

Wm. Pugsley, Esq., M.P.,
House of Commons,
City.

Dear Sir,—

In reply to your letter of May 15th.

The Board has been authorized by the British Ministry of Shipping to arrange for the construction of a certain number of wooden ships in Canada according to a standard type. The design and specifications can be seen at any time at the Board's office.

The vessels are of approximately 2,500 tons deadweight, being 250 feet long, 40 feet in beam and 21 feet draft.

The terms on which the Board is placing these contracts are the reimbursement of the contractor for the actual cost of building, including labour, material and overhead, plus a fixed sum by way of profit for each vessel constructed. Under these circumstances, and because definite results must be secured, the Board will examine closely into the capacity, resources and experience of each firm seeking a contract.

With regard to the plant, etc., employed in the construction, individual arrangements will be made in each case on the basis of allowing a reasonable amortization as part of the cost of construction, or in the case of an existing plant allowing a reasonable rental for the use of the plant as part of the cost.

With regard to any construction undertaken in Eastern Canada, the essential point will be for the contractor to satisfy the Board that he has or can obtain on reasonable terms a sufficient quantity of suitable lumber to build the type of ship required. It is not safe to reckon on obtaining lumber from British Columbia; firstly, because we expect that most of the lumber suitable for the purpose, which is cut there, will be taken up in wooden ship construction on the Pacific coast, and secondly because it is doubtful whether any large quantity of lumber could be brought across the continent in the present railway situation even if it were available.

You are quite at liberty to communicate the above information to your friends, and the Board will be very glad to give more detailed information to any one interested.

Yours truly,

William I. Gear,
Director of Steel Shipbuilding.

I was struck by the statement in the latter part of the letter that it is doubtful whether any large quantity of lumber could be brought across the continent, having regard to the present railway situation, even if the lumber were available. A gentleman who was desirous of forming a company to engage in shipbuilding told me that he had been informed by the Board that they would not give him a contract if he had to rely on British Columbia lumber. It ought to be possible for the Government to have lumber from northern British Columbia and the vicinity of Prince Rupert, where, I am told, there is an abundant supply, brought over the Transcontinental railway and used in the shipyards of eastern Canada.

Just a day or two ago I had a letter from a gentleman at Diligent river, Nova Scotia. He stated that he had a shipyard where wooden vessels could be built in large numbers, and that he would be very glad to place it, I think he said, free of charge, at the disposal of this Government for the purpose of building ships. My hon. friend knows that in the harbour of St. John, in the vicinity of St. John, along the Kennebecasis river, along the St. John river, at St. Martin's, at St. Andrew's and at St. George, at other places on the Bay of Fundy coast, at Richibucto, on the Miramichi river, at Bathurst, at Campellton, along the Baie des Chaleurs coast, along the St. Lawrence, there are thousands of opportunities for building wooden vessels, and at these places wooden shipbuilding was carried on in the past on a large scale. I wish to repeat what I said, that I think the Government ought to let contracts for the building of small wooden vessels of say 500 tons capacity, and to take measures, where it is necessary to bring timber from British Columbia, to have it brought east in enormous quantities for the purpose of assisting in the construction of wooden vessels. There are large quantities of timber in eastern Canada, but I think, to build larger vessels with southern pine or British Columbia timber would in most cases be required, and there is the same difficulty of getting southern pine to the Maritime Provinces as there is in getting coal carried, because it would have to be brought by water, but British Columbia timber, wherever it is required to be mixed with eastern timber, could be brought by the Government over the Transcontinental. Let the Government act and they will receive the enthusiastic approval of the members of this House and of the people of this country. Let them start in, as the United States Government has done, as the British Government has done, to build ships to assist in transportation, and they will be conferring an enormous benefit upon the people, and I am sure that if they will, even at this late hour, engage in this most important work, they will receive the approval of the people of Canada.

Mr. MARCIL: I would not like this item to pass without saying a word on behalf of the mother province of the Dominion. There was a time when the province of Quebec shared in the glories of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick in the building of wooden ships which covered the seven seas, and when Canada ranked as the fifth greatest shipbuilding nation in the world. I read to-day in the Montreal Gazette that the tonnage passing through the Lachine canal has decreased considerably since last year, and almost daily our inland tonnage is falling off. All the arguments that have been advanced on behalf of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick apply with ten times as much force to the St. Lawrence, because the St. Lawrence is the main artery of this country, and on the St. Lawrence, in the old province of Quebec, we have the largest city of Canada, which consumes more coal than any other Canadian city, and where last winter we had a coal shortage which was a very serious problem, and which problem is going to be ten times worse during next winter unless the Government wake up and do something. One of the clever moves which paved the way for a change in the administration of this country was when the present Minister of Trade and Commerce brought forward the idea of the creation of a Canadian navy, and ultimately the encouragement of shipbuilding in Canada. That was the starting point which led the then Opposition on to the road which ultimately brought them into office. It was the policy of the Opposition of that day to encourage shipbuilding. Last year the Minister of Trade and Commerce himself, if my memory does not fail me, advocated strongly the construction of ships in this country, and it stands to reason that Canada will never take the position which she should hold amongst the nations of the world unless she goes extensively into the building of ships. We have built hundreds and thousands of miles of railway throughout Canada; we have opened up every part of the country; we have given access to all our various industries, our mines, our fisheries, our lumber, but our domain ends when we reach the water's edge. We have not yet got properly on to the water; we are trusting to England and to foreign countries to carry our goods across the ocean. The number of ships on the Canadian register is practically nil and is growing smaller and smaller every day. Our inland tonnage is doing practically nothing. We hear some complaints—

Mr. W. H. BENNETT: Is the hon. member aware that last year a boat was launched at Collingwood capable of carrying a million bushels of grain?

Mr. MARCIL: I will give Collingwood credit for launching one boat last year.

Mr. BENNETT: There are a large number on the stocks.

Mr. MARCIL: I am speaking more particularly of the St. Lawrence, which is the outlet of Collingwood and of the lakes generally, and I am sorry to state that outside of some steel work at Vickers-Maxim and in the Government shops at Sorel, there is practically none of that work being done along the St. Lawrence, although it is one of the finest water highways in the world. The position we occupy in the city of Montreal at the present time is very serious, and if the railways were unable to handle the coal during last winter, they will probably be in the same position this coming winter. I take it for granted that this Government wishes to give Canada the proper equipment, and if we have our railways, we should also have a shipbuilding industry. Why should we not revive the building of ships on the St. Lawrence as it was in the old days? Before the days of iron or steel vessels, the glory of Quebec and of the lower St. Lawrence was the shipyards of Quebec, which sent out some of the finest ships afloat. I think this Government should take this question earnestly to heart, because it is one of the most important questions which we have to solve. At the present time, there is a shortage of tonnage in every part of the world, and that shortage will become more acute the longer the war lasts, and therefore the Government should see to it that the building of these large ships which are required by the British Government should not be the only shipbuilding work that is going on in Canada. If we cannot build ships of 2,500 tons, we should build smaller ships, ships that will be able to carry on the inland business of the country, to transport coal from Nova Scotia, to transport the magnificent products of Prince Edward Island to the great market at Montreal, and to handle the ordinary business of the country. This work might also be extended into the Great Lakes, but I am sure if encouragement were given by letting some contracts now, you could start building smaller ships all along the St. Lawrence, to the great advantage, not only to that part of the country but of the whole Dominion. The people require some assistance; they are passing through a great ordeal at the present time owing to the high cost of living. Those who are familiar with the cost of living in the cities know the difficulty of obtaining products of one kind or another; for instance, the difficulty of obtaining coal. In March and April last, especially in March, you could not get a ton of coal delivered in any part of the city of Montreal; you had to buy it by the half ton, and the poor people bought it by the bag, the price running up to $15 and $18 a ton. This state of things should not be permitted to continue in Canada, which has all the riches of Providence conferred upon it. We have coal, wood and fish in abundance; we have a magnificent soil, and we have a healthy population which should work together if the ordinary facilities were granted, and if ever we are going to take advantage of our natural resources. The St. Lawrence is a magnificent highway, easily navigable. The minister announced only yesterday, with great and legitimate satisfaction, that there had not been a single wreck on the St. Lawrence last year. It is well buoyed; it is magnificently lighted; it is in good condition; the dredging is being constantly done, and navigation can be carried on by night as well as by day. There is no need as in the old days for steamers to drop their anchors in the lower regions of the St. Lawrence at night; the largest steamer can reach the dock at Montreal at midnight with much greater facility than she formerly could in the noon-day sun. Why should we not take hold of this great question?

Why should we at this moment of national crisis be passing our time discussing petty politics? Why not handle one of these great questions in which the people of Canada are vitally interested, and in regard to which they are looking for guidance from the Government. The building of ships is an indispensable industry; it must come in this country. Why should we not make a start now, and not wait until next year or the year after or five years from now? A country like Canada cannot progress unless it takes advantage of its magnificent waterways and goes in for the building of ships. We have plenty of lumber, plenty of coal, and plenty of experienced mechanics—not only in the Maritime Provinces but all along the St. Lawrence river and the Great Lakes of Ontario. I think the minister, who hails from the old city of St. John and takes a sniff of salt air now and then, should be a mariner through and through; he should take hold of this question and impress upon his followers from other parts of Canada that the time has come for this country to embark upon a vigorous shipbuilding policy. If we cannot get the larger ships started this year, let us make a beginning with the smaller ships, and turn them out from the shipyards along our lakes and rivers.

Mr. SINCLAIR: We were informed the other evening by the Minister of Finance that by an Order in Council recently passed a shipbuilder gets a rebate of all the duty he has paid on materials entering into the construction of a ship. It is similar to the law in regard to agricultural implements, boilers and other manufactured goods. If you import boiler plates from the United States, and construct a boiler in Canada and then export it to some other country, you get a rebate of 99 per cent of the customs duties paid on the materials used in the construction of the boiler. If it is true that this rebate is now granted in regard to the shipbuilding industry, it is a step in the right direction. Prior to this Order in Council, a certain number of articles entering into the construction of ships were on the free list, such as plates and other articles that could not be made in Canada. I was led to believe in the discussion the other evening that the duty would be rebated on all articles entering into the construction of a ship, and I should like to know if that covers material that is manufactured in Canada. For instance, if I am building a steel vessel in Nova Scotia I naturally go to Dartmouth for rivets. The manufacturer in Dartmouth takes advantage of the tariff, and charges 27 per cent or whatever the protection is on rivets. Under the Order in Council, would I get that duty rebated, just as if the rivets had been imported from the United States or some other country?

Mr. HAZEN: I was not aware that we would have a discussion of this sort when my Estimates came up to-day, or I would have had more information on this subject. I think that my hon. friend from Bonaventure, who always speaks eloquently and in a way that is pleasant to hear, is better informed on other matters than on the subject he discussed here this afternoon. He spoke as though little or nothing were being done in the building of large ships in the province of Quebec. He said that some small construction work was being done at the Vickers works in Montreal. It may surprise my hon. friend to learn that there are under construction at the Vickers works in Montreal six cargo steamers of 7,000 tons each. Other vessels are also being constructed at that yard, one of 2,360 tons, and others of less tonnage. The shipyard employs over 2,000 men and keeps them as busy as possible. At the Davie Shipbuilding Yards, Levis, there is a vessel of 5,000 tons being constructed. At Sorel, in certain private shipyards, there is a great amount of activity in shipbuilding. Almost within sight of the city of Quebec, on the Island of Orleans, a company with which Mr. Playfair, who is known to hon. members in connection with shipping on the Great Lakes, is connected, is building four wooden ships of from 1,500 to 2,000 tons, and I am informed that a large portion of the lumber entering into the construction of these ships is being brought from British Columbia. Further, I may say that a gentleman was here to-day who is largely engaged in shipbuilding, and he states that he has made arrangements for bringing a large quantity of British Columbia lumber down to points on the St. Lawrence, where he is going to construct some 8 or 10 wooden ships, as large, I presume, as those that are being built on the Island of Orleans, from 1,500 to 2,000 tons each. Two of the ships that are being constructed at the Island of Orleans are well on the way to completion, and work has been commenced on two others. I think that is an answer to the statement of my hon. friend from St. John that there is great difficulty in getting lumber from British Columbia. Not only is some of the lumber that is going into the construction of these ships being brought from British Columbia, but I am informed that Mr. Norcross has made large purchases of lumber in that province, and is going to build ships of British Columbia lumber and lumber obtained elsewhere.

There are a large number of ships being built at the present time in Canadian shipyards, aggregating a very considerable amount of tonnage. Six are being constructed in the Vickers yard of 7,000 tons each, and I think they are all under way. The Davie Shipbuilding and Repairing Company, Levis, are building one steel vessel of 5,000 tons. The Nova Scotia Steel and Coal Co., of New Glasgow, N.S., have under construction three cargo steamers of a total tonnage of 6,800. The Shelburne Shipbuilders Company are building a wooden cargo steamer of 320 tons. Robert Rutledge, of Sheet Harbour, N.S., is building a wooden cargo steamer of 325 tons. The Quebec Shipbuilding and Repairing Co., Isle of Orleans, are building two auxiliary schooners of 2,490 tons, and a tug boat is being built at Sorel of 410 tons. In addition, there is a large amount of other construction which I do not care to speak about here, going on at the Sorel shipyards, at the Davie Works, Quebec; at Polsons, Toronto; at Canadian Vickers, Montreal, and at other shipyards throughout the country. On the Great Lakes the Port Arthur Shipbuilding and Repairing Co., Limited, are building four cargo steamers aggregating 9,748 tons. The Collingwood Shipbuilding Company are building one steel cargo steamer of 7,988 tons, and two steel oil tankers of 4,800 tons.

The Polson Iron Works, Limited, Toronto, are building two cargo steamers of 4,400 tons each and six cargo steamers of 3,500 tons each, in all eight steamers, in addition to other marine construction work which is going on there. The Thor Iron Works Limited, have two steel cargo steamers on the stocks of 5,000 tons each. The Georgian Bay Shipbuilding and Repairing Company, Midland, Ontario, as pointed out by my hon. friend from Simcoe (Mr. W. H. Bennett) recently launched a large steamer there, and other construction is in progress. On the Pacific coast a great deal of shipbuilding is carried on. The Coughlin Company has a contract for five large steel steamers of 8,800 tons each, and in the Wallace yards two steel vessels of 4,600 tons each are in course of construction. Hon. members will see from these figures that there is a great deal of activity in steel shipbuilding in Canada.

Now, with regard to wooden ships, I have here a list of wooden vessels being built at points on the Atlantic coast aside from those that are building under contracts placed by the Munitions Board. This list is complete so far as I know at present. In that connection it may not be uninteresting to call attention to the fact that the British authorities have issued an order excluding sailing vessels from the war area. This step has been taken because of the risk to which these vessels are exposed from submarines, through their inability to escape. In reaching this decision the authorities are moved I assume, by the consideration, not only of loss of vessels, but of the loss of cargoes as well. They have made a request of us to adopt the same policy and to exclude Canadian sailing vessels from the war area.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Does that order apply to sailing vessels with auxiliary power?

Mr. HAZEN: I suppose that the possession of auxiliary power by a vessel would make the danger much less, and I should think that would make a difference. The following is the list of wooden sailing vessels now under construction:

None of these vessels are large, but the list shows that there is a very considerable activity in shipbuilding. But the people of the Maritime Provinces, so far as I can learn, have not shown much anxiety to engage in the building of larger vessels.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Give them the contracts, and you will see how quickly they will build the vessels.

Mr. HAZEN: I was just going on to tell my hon. friend that six or eight months ago a gentleman who was interested in shipbuilding in Montreal came to me and told me he was going to proceed with the construction of ten schooners from 2,500 to 3,000 tons each, and that he would as soon build them in the Maritime Provinces as anywhere if there were people there to take the contracts. I communicated with the St. John Board of Trade and others in St. John, and told them of that proposition. After enquiry my correspondents wrote back to me that they could not find anybody who was willing to enter into a contract for the construction of such vessels at the present time.

Mr. PUGSLEY: It would depend on the price.

Mr. HAZEN: The question of price was not raised; the price would have been satisfactory. These people said that shipbuilding in the province of New Brunswick had become almost a lost art. It flourished years ago, as the hon. member for Bonaventure (Mr. Marcil) said. In those days there used to be ship carpenters, sail makers, caulkers, and other ship's tradesmen, but these have pretty well disappeared. At any rate, the parties with whom I communicated could not find any one willing to enter into a contract for the construction of these ships. I say this to show that at present there are difficulties in the way of constructing vessels of large size. This applies especially to New Brunswick. In Nova Scotia shipbuilding has been better maintained, schooners and other vessels have always been built in that province, and that accounts, probably, for the greater shipbuilding activity in Nova Scotia to-day. As I understand it, if there are builders who will build what the British Government requires—and they must be the judge of their own requirements—they will have no difficulty in getting contracts from the Imperial Munitions Board.

My hon. friend from Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) has drawn the attention of the committee to a very serious question in regard to the coal supply of Nova Scotia. It undoubtedly is a very important and serious question. I have had several consultations and interviews with people representing the Dominion Coal Company during the last few days. The Dominion Coal Company has been placed in a rather awkward position. The vessels which the company were using to transport their coal at the time of the outbreak of the war were, with one single exception, British registered vessels and were subject to requisition by the British Government. They had only one vessel which was a Canadian registered vessel. That vessel was also requisitioned by the British Government but I am taking steps to have it released. It will help to some extent to relieve the situation. They find it impossible—it is not a matter of price with them—to charter vessels for the purpose of carrying their coal not only to St. John and Halifax but to ports on the St. Lawrence as well. We have discussed the whole matter and we have taken steps which we think will go a long way towards relieving the situation in those two places.

Mr. PUGSLEY: By reason of restoring one ship?

Mr. HAZEN: Not by reason of restoring one ship. I have mentioned one step that we have taken but there are other steps that I cannot explain to the House at the present time. But that one ship will to a considerable extent relieve the situation and it will be an important factor in doing it. In addition to that, the Dominion Coal Company have had large contracts for supplying coal to ports in the United States and they have come to the conclusion that they will have to cancel these contracts and announce to the people in Boston and other places that they will have to look elsewhere for their coal, that their efforts will have to be directed to providing coal for places in Canada under existing circumstances.

These are the principal subjects that were touched on in connection with the discussion here to-day. There is no doubt that there is a greater development of shipbuilding in Canada than the country has known for many years. I believe as a result of what is going on to-day the shipbuilding yards in Canada will be placed in a considerably better position than they have been at any time during the past twenty-five or thirty years. I further believe that when the war is over they will be able to compete on more even terms with the shipbuilders of the United Kingdom. But up to the present time, as I pointed out in this House before, the Canadian shipbuilders have had no protection. British registered ships built in the Old Country have come into our ports to compete with the ships that were built in this country without paying any duty, even upon their equipment and the things that were necessary to enable them to sail their ships. But, there has been an enormous advance in wages in the United Kingdom. My belief is that wages in the United Kingdom, after the war is over, will never get down to the point at which they were before the war and which gave the shipbuilder of the United Kingdom an undue advantage in competition with the shipbuilders in this and other countries.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Will they come down in Canada?

[Mr. Hazen.]

Mr. HAZEN: I do not know that they will. Wages in the United Kingdom are quite as high as they are in Canada and I do not believe they will come down for some years because there will be great activity after the war is over in building ships. The troops will have to be brought back, the munitions and equipment will have to be brought from the front and in consequence of submarine attacks there will be fewer ships than there were at the outbreak of the war. To carry on the business of the world there will be a great demand for ships, in consequence of that the shipyards of Great Britain and Canada will have a great deal of work to do and they will require to build a good many ships for carrying on the business for some years to come. I expect the Canadian shipyards, with the impetus they are getting now, will be able to compete with the shipbuilders of the United Kingdom. You find shipyards with contracts for six and eight large ships and as a result their yards will be better equipped and in a very much better position to compete than they were before.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Are these ships being built for the British Government?

Mr. HAZEN: Some are and some are being built for others.

Mr. PUGSLEY: For British or foreign governments?

Mr. HAZEN: Some contracts were placed for neutral governments and let me say here that these contracts that were placed for neutral governments were placed in every case with the full approval and consent of the British Government. That consent and approval was obtained before the contracts were entered into. In most cases these vessels have in the course of construction been commandeered for the use of the British Government and instead of flying the flag of neutral countries they will fly the British flag and be used for the purposes of Great Britain in connection with the war and the carrying on of her trade. If the hon. gentleman had suggested that he was going to take this subject up to-day —I am not complaining that he did not— but if he had—

Mr. PUGSLEY: This is a subject that comes up unexpectedly.

Mr. HAZEN: Yes, but if it had been suggested—

Mr. PUGSLEY: I got word yesterday that it was hard to get coal in St. John.

Mr. HAZEN: If my hon. friend had suggested that he was going to bring it up to-day, I would have had an opportunity of giving fuller information to the House than I have been able to give in the remarks that I have just made. The situation in regard to tonnage is very serious everywhere. It is serious in Great Britain, in the United States and in Canada and one of the reasons for the great shortage in Great Britain is that Great Britain has practically supplied the tonnage for all the Allied nations. In connection with the operations at Saloniki, I understand there are 300 British ships employed. Take 300 ships out of the ordinary commercial business of the world in one zone, or theatre, and the result is a very considerable shortage. So serious is the situation in Great Britain that they had to put an embargo on the importation into that country of articles that are not of primary necessity for the people. They have practically put an embargo on the importation of lumber into the United Kingdom. They hope by that means to save 500,000 tons a month and make that much more room in ships available for other purposes. They are endeavouring to get along by cutting the lumber in France and Great Britain. They have put an embargo on apples from all parts of the world and on many other articles which, in ordinary times are considered necessaries, but which during the war have to be restricted or done without. These conditions are existing all over the world. They will have to be met in the best way they can be met and they are being met in the best way they can be met.

Mr. PUGSLEY: In what way is the Canadian Government seeking to meet them?

Mr. HAZEN: The Canadian Government have met these conditions very largely and it is largely due to the action of the Canadian Government that these contracts have been placed in Canada and to the representations we made to the Imperial authorities as to the facilities we had in Canada for the building of ships. Not one of these ships ordered by the British Government would have been contracted for in Canada had not Canada agreed to finance the operation and to get a credit for Great Britain in Canada in order that the work might be paid for as it was proceeded with. When the hon. gentleman says that the Government of Canada has done nothing, I think he himself will see on reflection that that statement is not justified by what has occurred.

Mr. PUGSLEY: My hon. friend says that Great Britain would not have given any orders in Canada if it had not been for the action of Canada in giving the British Government credit. I do not want to detract at all from what this Government has done, if I think it has done anything for encouraging transportation on Imperial account; but it seems to me that my hon. friend is claiming credit for something for which not very much credit is due. Did not the British Government give an order for one thousand ships to the United States before these contracts were given in Canada? Is not the British Government having ships built in the United States to-day? Did it not give an order for both war and commercial vessels? Take the order for five hundred submarines given in the United States.

Mr. BURNHAM: Is not the American loan an offset to that?

Mr. PUGSLEY: The American loan has only been made recently. The British Government gave its order for this large amount of tonnage long before the United States made to Great Britain an offer of a portion of its loan. But surely if the British Government has ordered ships built in Canada it is because the British Government want those ships, it is for the benefit of the Empire. The British Government is having ships built here because it requires them. What I complain of is that this Government is doing nothing. My hon. friend says that the British Government would not have given orders in Canada if it had not been that this Government gave a credit. Let him put it on that low ground if he wishes, although I do not believe one word of it. But when the British Government is giving orders to the extent of millions of dollars to the United States, would it not have given orders for the building of ships in Canada unless Canada had agreed to lend some money to it? That is putting it upon a pretty low ground indeed, to say that that is the reason which induced the British Government to give orders for the building of ships in Canada.

There is one great advantage which the House and the country will receive from the statement of my hon. friend to-day, and that is that we will get at the facts, because my hon. friend has read a list of ships under construction in Canada. We have had it stated over and over again by members of the Government, by the Minister of

5 p.m.

Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster), by the Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White) that every shipyard in Canada, every place capable of building ships, was filled with orders, and that there was no opportunity to build any more ships than were being constructed to-day.

Mr. HAZEN. That is true of every shipyard that builds steel ships.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Does not my hon. friend know that for the building of wooden vessels of 500 tons to 1,000 tons it does not take very long to put a shipyard, one that was formerly used, in good repair? You want a good location, and you can soon get the yard ready. If the Government would give an order for 500 wooden vessels of 500 tons each to be built in Canada, it would soon get offers by the score, offers by the hundred, offers by the thousand, to build those ships in eastern Canada, in Quebec, New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island. But my hon. friend's statement is valuable in another respect; it corrects the statement which he made upon another recent occasion in the House that forty-eight vessels were being built in the Maritime Provinces, and that the size of the vessels ranged from 1,500 tons down to 150 tons. My hon. friend has read a list to-day and has not mentioned, if I remember aright, a single vessel of a tonnage greater than 600 tons, and in order to make up his full list of forty-eight vessels, he puts in a little boat of a capacity of 38 tons, and many of them of 150 tons, little motor boats I suppose they would be. All of this shows the effort which has been made on the other side of the House to mislead the people of this country, to make them believe that there is a vast deal of shipbuilding going on in Canada. Why, with all that is being done to-day, when ships are demanded not only for the Atlantic and Pacific business, but for the coasting business of Canada, when there is a demand unparalled, such as never existed in this country before, all the vessels named by my hon. friend would not be one-tenth part of the tonnage that was being turned out in the old days of peace when wooden shipbuilding in Canada was at its height. They turned out more ships in the little province of Prince Edward Island, more wooden vessels in number, than all those mentioned by my hon. friend.

Mr. HAZEN: Giving my hon. friend the advantage of the small one, there are fifty-three ships, averaging 353 tons each.

[Mr. Pugsley.]

Mr. PUGSLEY: This is what I said, that this Government is doing nothing to encourage Canadian transportation by water. Has not my hon. friend proved it himself? Every one of those steel ships which is being built, he says, has either been contracted for to be sold to the British Government or to other governments—not one for the Canadian Government. The Government of every other country in the world deems it necessary to build ships to assist in the transportation in which it is immediately concerned. The British Government is buying ships in order to bring food to their own people, food to the armies, food to the Allies. Neutral countries are buying vessels to be built in Canada, but the Canadian Government gives no contract for a single vessel, buys not one single vessel, for the purpose of reducing the cost of transportation for the benefit of the Canadian people. That is why I say that the Canadian Government is doing nothing for the people of Canada. My hon. friend thinks that, because the ships are being built in Canada, that is a great thing for the Canadian people. All it does is to give employment, that is all; in these days, when men are scarce, it gives more employment. It does not reduce the cost of living, it does not reduce the cost of transportation, it does not give people cheaper coal, or cheaper flour, or cheaper foodstuffs of all kinds, which they would obtain if you cheapened the transportation of the country. Does not my hon. friend the minister see that the Governments of almost every other country in the world are either building ships or buying ships to be used for the benefit of their own people, while the Canadian Government stands all alone in absolutely refusing to do anything in this direction, absolutely alone? That is the record which Canada has to-day. My hon. friend has spoken of what is being done in the way of shipbuilding at the Vickers-Maxim plant. I am extremely glad that these ships are being built at the Vickers-Maxim works. The fact that that firm are able to-day to do so much is a tribute to the foresight of the late Liberal Government, which gave the contract which led to the building of the dock and the shipbuilding plant near Montreal by the Vickers-Maxim Company, and if it had not been for what we did, giving a contract which I had the honour of signing when I was Minister of Public Works, what would have been the position so far as that portion of Canada is concerned? Not one ship would be in the course of construction in the vicinity of the city of Montreal—not one. Then take the Collingwood plant. That was established under contract with the late Liberal Government. So was the Polson Iron Works of Toronto, and the Port Arthur Dry Dock and Shipbuilding Company, where my hon. friend says they are turning out four ships, that yard was established by the Liberal Government, and I had the honour of turning the first sod in connection with the building of the dry dock and the establishment of the ship repairing plant. Therefore, if it were not for what the Liberal Government had done my hon. friend would not have very much to boast of to-day. And this is what we complain of. We do it as respectfully as we can, we do it with the best feeling it is possible to show.

In the matter of shipbuilding the record of the Government is an absolute blank. My hon. friend talks about the difficulty of getting money, but the Government has millions to spend in the purchase of a derelict railway, the Quebec and Saguenay, and, apparently, millions to spend on the construction of highways. Not a dollar, however, is devoted to shipbuilding. My hon. friend will build ships for any country in the world that wants them, but as for building ships for the benefit of the Canadian people—perish the thought! He admits that the difficulties of the consuming population are very serious. They are more than serious. In many sections of Canada the people look forward to the coming winter with great anxiety because of the fear that they will not be able to get enough coal to keep their houses warm and avoid suffering and hardship. The prices of all the necessaries of life have gone up tremendously, much more than they would have gone up if the Government had, even in a small way, taken charge of the water transportation of Canada and provided for the building of ships. My hon. friend says that they are suffering hardships in England; that they cannot get potatoes; that they are living on allowances. Is that any answer to make to the people of a country that is 3,000 miles from the theatre of war, a country which is far richer in proportion to population than any other country in the world? There ought to be no distress in Canada, a country which is capable of producing enormous quantities of foodstuffs, which has an abundance of bituminous coal, and which is alongside the great coal mines of Pennsylvania. The people are in actual distress because of the high cost of the necessaries of life. My hon. friend, although he admits the condition to be serious, turns a deaf ear to the appeals which the people, through the members of this Parliament, are making to him and to his Government to take some steps to secure cheaper transportation. You may theorize as much as you like; the only course for this Government to pursue, if they wish to remedy this condition, is to give contracts for the building of ships and, by taking charge of water transportation, cheapen the cost of carrying the necessaries of life from the point of production to the point of consumption. Why do they not do it? Is it because they have a prejudice against the building of ships? Let me implore them to remember that it was only warships that they asked the people to believe they could not build in Canada. If they engage in the building of commercial vessels, they will not be regarded as having gone back on their policies. Let them not be afraid to do it; let them take a step which will be more advantageous to the people than anything else that they could do. Parliament would gladly ratify any proposal of that kind and I am sure that the country would be enthusiastic in its support of the Government's action. Indeed, they would almost —but not quite—forget many of the sins of which the Government have been guilty.

Mr. LOGGIE: I was informed a few days ago that a shipbuilding company on the Miramichi river, who now own a shipyard which was in operation many years ago, are ready to construct immediately 5 ships of 500 tons each if they can get a contract from the Government or from the Imperial Munitions Board. I should think that ships of 500 tons would be very useful, if not for ocean trade, certainly for trade along the coast between Canadian and United States ports. The minister has said to-day that the Imperial Government have intimated that they do not think it wise to construct sailing vessels for ocean traffic. I am willing to concede that there may be some question as to the wisdom of encouraging the construction of sailing vessels of that tonnage at this time. As sailing vessels are somewhat slow, they might find it difficult to get away from the submarines. But if the Government want ships of the tonnage I have mentioned, I direct their attention to this company which is in a position to enter into a contract for their construction.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Would they furnish auxiliary engines?

Mr. LOGGIE: I suppose they would.

Mr. MARCIL: Will these ships being built for the Imperial Government be used in the Canadian trade?

Mr. HAZEN: I assume that they will be used where they will be of most advantage.

Mr. MARCIL: Having regard to the shipbuilding activity that has taken place in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, and along the St. Lawrence without a national shipbuilding policy, it must be evident to the minister that if the Government gave some sort of encouragement to the industry, it would be very materially extended. What we need is ships to carry the products of the country inland. The first trip of a subsidized steamer last year on the Baie des Chaleurs route to Gaspé was made on the 5th of August, so that during the months of April, May, June and July not a single ship was available to convey to suitable markets the salmon caught in that vicinity, which are unparalleled in the world. In answer to questions which I asked on two or three occasions last year, the Minister of Trade and Commerce said that he was unable to get ships. This year he has put on a small river boat which had been hardly sufficient for the business on the St. John river, and which is not at all adequate for the business in which it is now engaged. It is unable to handle the trade, and along that whole coast there is practically no shipping whatever. The Baie des Chaleurs, on the Quebec as well as on the New Brunswick side, is one of the finest sheets of water on the North American continent. For tourists it is unsurpassed. There is an ocean trip in view of land, with an ever-changing scenic panorama. The resources of that peninsula have not been touched. There is enough pulpwood there to supply the North American continent for a century, but the Government has made no attempt whatever to develop those resources.

The time would be opportune to start a shipbuilding industry on that coast. The same thing applies to Northumberland, Gloucester, Restigouche and the whole northern coast of New Brunswick. That is a remote part of Canada, but it is a part of Canada from which communication with Europe is easy, and it might be utilized to supply eastern Canada with a great variety of things that are very much needed. Take for instance at the present moment the question of potatoes. The people of Ottawa are paying at present 45 cents a gallon of potatoes. I remember two or three years ago at a place where I spent the summer, potatoes were selling at 50 cents a barrel.

(Mr. Loggie.)

At Montreal, potatoes are selling now at $8 a barrel; I do not know what they are selling at in Toronto, but that is a condition of affairs which should not exist. If we had these schooners able to do the business of the Baie des Chaleurs and the St. Lawrence, just as in the old days, to transport the products of the country, the cost of living would be very materially reduced. I remember in the old days in Montreal, when I was a boy, we used to go down to the Bonsecours market and buy a peck of Malpeque oysters at 25 cents, and we could get them at $1.50 a barrel. That is an industry that has been allowed to go almost to the vanishing point, and to-day we are paying in Montreal $15 a barrel for oysters which bear the name of Malpeque, but I do not know whether they come from there or not. That is an industry that could have been developed easily by water transportation. Is it not ridiculous to see a magnificent waterway like the St. Lawrence and all its tributaries practically unused, because while the ships that navigate the St. Lawrence are used for ocean service, or communication abroad, none of the inland trade is developed? The minister has told us that an embargo has been placed on the importation of lumber into England. This would be an opportunity to have sailing vessels and smaller craft develop our lumber industry on the Baie des Chaleurs and the St. Lawrence. We have in those districts millions of acres of timber limits which are undeveloped on account of lack of communication. In my own constituency an important syndicate some five or six years ago purchased a large timber limit, 400 square miles, for, I think, over half a million dollars. There were three or four sawmills within reach of that limit; but they have been closed down, and the men who were employed in them had to leave that district and go to Bathurst and other places in New Brunswick where there was communication along the line of the Intercolonial. This large Robitaille timber limit, one of the finest timber limits in the whole of eastern Canada, is idle to-day for lack of communication. We have a small railway with one train a day, doing the best it can with practically no rolling stock and without locomotives able to handle the traffic. We have no sailing vessels. In the county of Gaspé we have a syndicate from Philadelphia which has spent three or four million dollars in the last few years to establish a large pulp industry in the endeavour to develop the natural industry of that district, but there is no way by which the products of that industry can be taken to Montreal. There are no bottoms by which they can be taken either to the American market or to the Canadian market, and this railway which should have been linked with the Intercolonial 25 years ago and which was intended by Sir Charles Tupper, when he received the first vote of Parliament for it, as a branch line of the Intercolonial, remains as it is to-day, and the people at Gascons say that the wharf is in such a condition that whatever sailing craft does go there is unable to stop at this wharf, and that the people have to drive twenty miles to Port Daniel to ship their products, as in the same old days of long ago.

The minister should realize that a vigorous shipbuilding industry is essential and indispensable in this country. The opportunity is furnished to him now to link his name with that great industry. Were he the representative of an inland constituency, and unaware of the advantage of shipbuilding, the matter would be different. Who is not aware that no country can be truly great unless it possesses a mercantile marine? What would England be to-day without a navy; what would she have been in peace time and what would she be in war time without a navy? Why should Canada, this young giant, which is doing such great things in the railway field, and which, in other enterprises, is second to none in the world, lag behind in this matter of shipbuilding when she has half of the fresh water of the continent at her disposal? I was amazed to hear the Minister of Marine and Fisheries practically admit that the shipbuilders of New Brunswick had lost their cunning and that shipbuilding there was almost a lost industry. My hon. friend from Northumberland (Mr. Loggie) corrected him on that score, and showed him that in that member's constituency the builders were prepared to go immediately into shipbuilding. The minister should take up this matter and see that it is brought to a conclusion, because, if he does not do it himself, the time is not far distant when the public opinion of Canada will insist on the Dominion Government coming forward with a truly national shipbuilding policy for Canada.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Will the minister be good enough to answer my question?

Mr. HAZEN: The hon. member asked me a question with regard to the tariff and an Order in Council. I do not want to answer the question off-hand without having that Order in Council before me, because I would like to be thoroughly accurate in regard to the matter. My understanding, however, is that the machinery, plates and boilers that enter into the construction of ships, if those parts are imported, they either enter Canada free of duty or are entitled to a drawback of 99 per cent of the duty paid upon them.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Does it make any difference where you buy them?

Mr. HAZEN: I do not want to speak positively on the subject; I will get the Order in Council and send it to my hon. friend.

Mr. TURGEON: No doubt everything that can be said on behalf of shipbuilding has been said, but still I might be permitted to make a few remarks to the minister, so far as northern New Brunswick, especially Gloucester county, is concerned. When speaking on the Budget a few days ago, I earnestly advocated shipbuilding in Canada, and particularly the building of wooden ships in the Maritime Provinces. My leaning towards the building of small wooden ships is based on the fact that while we may be building large steel ships either for Canada or for the Empire, and while our builders and steel manufacturers may be building steel ships after the war is over, Canada will be left altogether powerless as to her local water traffic in the future. The more steel ships we build, even if those ships are not wanted by the Imperial Government, they will, as fast as they can be built in Canada, be bought by France or other nations requiring them, and Canada will be left altogether without ships unless we start right away to build wooden ships for our coastwise and inland service, without which our trade will be crippled in the future. Wooden ships are the only kind we shall be able to preserve for ourselves after the war is over, and every possible effort should be made to build those ships. Perhaps the minister is aware that at Bathurst, which had formerly great wooden shipbuilding yards, there is one special company to-day which would be prepared to undertake the construction of wooden ships under any favourable conditions; 500 tons has been mentioned as the limit, but so far as Bathurst and that company are concerned—and I name the Bathurst company, with whose general manager I have had some conversation, not recently, but some months ago—they would be willing to build ships, not only of 500 tons, but up to 1,000 tons. The impression is that in northern New Brunswick the old wooden shipbuilders have gone to their graves, but I would say for the information of the minister that born carpenters who were able, two, three or four years ago, to build wooden ships of 125, 150 or 200 tons, which have taken the highest honour among the seagoers of the day, ought to be able to extend their genius to building ships of 500 or 1,000 tons.

Ships of the kind that are now being built in other parts of Canada were built at Caraquet a few years ago. Every year our fishermen build schooners of from 50 to 100 tons without any outside assistance. They cut their own lumber in the woods, and build ships which are as good as any that sail the seas. I think every possible effort should be made to encourage those who are in a position to build ships in northern New Brunswick. I am not asking that shipbuilding be confined to Bathurst. Every winter there is a large quantity of lumber cut on the Caraquet river, and ships of 500 tons could easily be built there, and at Tracadie. I think every effort should be made by the Government of the day and by succeeding governments to develop the shipbuilding industry in this country both now and after the war.

Mr. J. H. BURNHAM: Representing an inland constituency, I may say that we in Ontario have frequently been in somewhat of a fog in regard to the shipbuilding industry in Canada. We hear statements made pro and con. Our hopes are raised at one minute only to be dashed the next. We are all anxious to see the shipbuilding industry in Canada develop.

Mr. PUGSLEY: How can you develop it unless you begin to develop it?

Mr. BURNHAM: I appreciate the logic of my hon. friend, but I do not appreciate the logic of the hon. member for Gloucester when he says that if shipbuilding were started down there, the ships would be nabbed up in a minute. If that is the case, why on earth do they not start to build ships?

Mr. TURGEON: Give us encouragement.

Mr. BURNHAM: Is this the free trader who asks for bounties and subsidies? Is it any wonder we are in a fog?

Mr. MACDONALD: You are not, surely.

Mr. BURNHAM: We want to see these things encouraged. It is the policy of protection to maintain a balance or equilibrium, and we all recognize that the balance as between rail and water transportation in Canada has not been preserved; we have too many railways, and too few lines of ships. The Atlantic shipping pool and other things of that description have collared the freight, and the consequence is that Canada is very largely debarred from the ocean. All this certainly ought to be corrected, and we hope it will be. We have been looking to the men of the sea, who have done so much in the past, to go on and develop the shipbuilding industry.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I thought you wanted to encourage us.

Mr. BURNHAM: We do.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Why don't you do it.

Mr. BURNHAM: We don't want to buy you. The truth is that wages in other countries have been so low that it did not pay Canadians to go into the business. But these things must naturally correct themselves. There must be a certain amount of industrial skill, of course. It would be absurd to maintain that Canada should provide bonuses for the shipbuilding industry.

Mr. MARCIL: How were the railways of Canada built up?

Mr. BURNHAM: Largely by bonuses, for which I am afraid the hon. member voted in many cases.

Mr. MARCIL: Is there any difference in principle between bonusing railways and bonusing ships?

Mr. BURNHAM: Yes. If we bonused shipbuilding we should land in the same position we are now in with regard to railways, and we do not want anything of that kind.

Mr. HAZEN: I hope we are not going to discuss the railway question on this item.

Mr. BURNHAM: As these gentlemen are groping for light, and we are all doing that more or less, I thought an illustration would not be out of the way. We in Ontario, as I said before, are somewhat in a fog on this question of shipbuilding. We have shipbuilding firms in Ontario, at Toronto, Midland, Collingwood, Owen Sound and other places, and they are all thriving, and we in Ontario cannot understand why shipbuilding in the East cannot thrive too.

Mr. PUGSLEY: In nearly all those cases was not a bonus given for the establishment of a dry dock and for a ship repairing plant which could be used for shipbuilding as well?

Mr. BURNHAM: Do I understand my hon. friend to say that Parliament sanctioned the expenditure of money in the direction indicated by him?

Mr. PUGSLEY: Of course you do not want a dry dock or the plant connected with a dry dock for wooden shipbuilding, but Polsons, Vickers-Maxim, the Collingwood Shipbuilding Company, and the Port Arthur Company all received substantial aid from the Government.

Mr. BURNHAM: The whole matter simply comes down to this: the people of eastern Canada wish to see the development of wooden ships, and wooden ships alone.

Mr. PUGSLEY: That is for a starter.

Mr. BURNHAM: Aren't you doing pretty well with steel ships?

Mr. PUGSLEY: No.

Mr. BURNHAM: Well, what is the matter with you?

Mr. SINCLAIR: It is impossible to get steel.

Mr. BURNHAM: I thought one of our biggest steel works was situated down East. I think I had better drop out of this discussion altogether.

Mr. MACDONALD: There are certain facts with reference to the situation which are given a little more in detail in the report of the Department of Marine and Fisheries. I see in a report that was made to the minister by Mr. Robb an account of the legislation that has been passed in other countries for the assistance of shipbuilding. There is also a statement of Great Britain's losses in merchant shipping down to March 30, 1916, which shows that the British steamships lost up to that date amounted to 1,320,000 tons, and sailing vessels 19,000 tons. The total Allied losses in shipping since the outbreak of war to March 30, 1916, exclusive of trawlers, of which 246 were lost, amounted to 1,658,000 tons. In view of the activity of submarines since that time, the losses down to March 31, 1917, will probably be double that figure, which would bring the total to over 3,000,000 tons.

Then there is the loss of tonnage to neutral nations, amounting to 1,977,376 tons. Of course that amount also will be very largely increased. So we shall have a total destruction of vessels approximating 7,000,000 tons.

Mr. HAZEN: The latest statement I have is that on January 1, 1917, the net loss to the British mercantile marine was a little less than five per cent of the whole.

Mr. MACDONALD: Have you the tonnage?

Mr. HAZEN: No, only the percentage. I have the figures of tonnage in my office, but, unfortunately, they are not before me at the moment.

Mr. MACDONALD: I think the figures go to indicate that mercantile vessels of not less than 7,000,000 in the agggregate have been removed from seas. During the year 1915 Great Britain had added 344,000 tons as her contribution towards making up that loss.

The report contains a statement of what has been done by other countries in the way of promoting construction. In Austria-Hungary, they grant for steamships of iron and steel $8.10 for every gross ton. In the case of sailing ships of iron and steel, when more than half of the material employed is of home production, the bounty is increased by one per cent of its amount for every one per cent of such material in excess of fifty per cent. In the case of sailing ships of wood or mixed construction, for the hull they give $2.02 for every gross ton. In Denmark they give a refund of customs duties on imported materials used for the construction of new ships. In France, in 1906, the assistance toward the construction of steamships was fixed at a maximum of $33.58 per ton, to cover both hull and machinery, and to diminish gradually for ten years. This was divided up into various amounts for hull and machinery. There was a construction bounty for sailing ships of 150 tons and over at the rate of $7.78 a ton, and for vessels of less than 150 tons at $5.84 a ton. In the German Empire the bounties do not take the form of a premium on the construction of ships, but consist of special customs facilities for goods destined for use in shipbuilding yards, and, in the second place, of preferential railway rates. In Italy they give bounties in the form of navigation premiums, construction and repair bounties, and remission of customs duties, during a period of fifteen years. Japan, which now comes into the world's economy on the same plane with the western nations, began shipbuilding in 1910. They provide a bounty for steel vessels of 1,000 tons or over of $5.46 to $10.93 per ton of the gross tonnage of the hull. In Norway the assistance of bounties is to cover the amount of customs duty on imported material used in the construction of vessels. In Russia the estimates of the Department of Mercantile Marine included, for 1909 and subsequent years, a sum of $51,428.52 for the encouragement of shipbuilding.

An interesting statement is given of the tonnage of Canadian vessels from 1874 to 1916. This shows the transition of our registration. Comparing 1874 with 1915, the figures show as follows:—

Province.	1874. Tons.	1915. Tons.
New Brunswick	294,741	56,219
Nova Scotia	479,669	125,567
Quebec	218,946	267,897
Ontario	113,008	312,971
P. E. Island	48,338	11,518
British Columbia	3,611	144,835

It is rather surprising to observe by the figures showing where registration of vessels takes place. In Collingwood, Ont., which is a construction point, the registration in 1915 was only 15,500 tons. In Toronto the registration amounted to 64,000 tons. A large registration is found at Port Arthur and also at Ottawa, these, I suppose, being small vessels for use on the lakes.

There has been construction of steel vessels in Montreal, and also in certain Ontario ports for some time. Steel vessels are now constructed in British Columbia. Their supply of plates must be drawn from points in the United States. I see no reason why British Columbia should present special advantages for the building of steel ships over other portions of the Dominion, as there is no supply of steel plates there. The Minister of Marine and Fisheries has told us that steel plates for the construction of ships are not to be had in Canada. I know that they are not manufactured here, but I think it is imperative that the Government should assist the construction of steel vessels in Canada by taking up this question of the production of steel plates. The Government are not going to be in any better shape to launch a shipbuilding policy after the war if they do not, in the meantime, provide for the production of steel plates in Canada.

Everything that can be made in steel, with the exception of large structural steel, which is now only made in Pittsburg, is made by the various steel industries of this country, and the question of encouraging the construction of steel plates in our steel industry, which has reached colossal proportions, is one that the Government should direct their attention to now. It is no use talking of building vessels after the war if the Government is not going to move in the meantime in reference to assisting to develop the proposition of making steel plates in our steel industries. I am at a loss to know what the minister meant when he spoke about the Government assisting the steel industry in connection with the shipbuilding industry if the assistance that is required is not to be given until after the war. If they mean to do anything after the war in regard to steel shipbuilding, they will be about as far ahead in the matter as they are to-day unless they begin now to assist in the manufacture of steel plates.

With regard to the construction of wooden vessels, it is all nonsense for the minister to say that the Government want to do what the British Government are doing through the Imperial Munitions Board in connection with the construction of wooden ships of a certain class. If the Government want to do anything similar in order to get a merchant marine, they can start by building smaller vessels, for which they can get numerous contracts placed all over the Maritime Provinces. The minister does not answer this problem by reading a statement of the number of vessels that are being built, and telling us what the British Government are doing through the Imperial Munitions Board. The minister told us that the thing that was nearest to his heart was to have a Canadian mercantile marine. He is perfectly willing that Great Britain should build these ships through the Imperial Munitions Board, but he is not willing that the Canadian Government should do anything for their own shipbuilding industry. Why wait until after the war? Why, in view of the story of the wholesale destruction and disappearance from the sea of such a tremendous quantity of tonnage as 7,000,000 tons, should we in Canada not do anything to build either wooden or steel ships until after the war? What was the meaning of Mr. Lloyd George's appeal: Give us ships and more ships to win the war? Is Canada not going to do anything in regard to that matter? Are we simply going to guarantee the credit of Great Britain to the extent of $10,000,000 and say that our duty has been fulfilled, and all the aid that we can give in this matter has been given? When the minister said that no ships would have been built in Canada but for that credit, he made a statement that I listened to with amazement. Are we to be told that Great Britain had placed in the United States contracts for over a thousand vessels and that she preferred to go to the United States rather than to come to Canada? If so, it is time we found it out. When we are told the British Government would not come to Canada to build ships unless the Canadian Government agreed to provide a credit for them, I want to know why they went to the United States to build ships. They went without getting a credit from the Government of the United States. The reason they went there was purely a business proposition. Why should they not have come to Canada? Unless there is a move made by the Government we are in this unfortunate position that we will have no mercantile marine at all between what has been destroyed and what has been commandeered by the British Government. It will be almost impossible to handle our natural products on the sea or to carry on our interprovincial trade and the result will be that when the war is over, if we are going to do nothing, we will have no mercantile marine to build up our trade and the whole thing will be gone. We will have no provision in this country for the manufacture of steel plate which will enable us to undertake steel shipbuilding and under these circumstances the imperative demand is that the Government should move now and do something.

Public works chargeable to capital—To provide for construction and completion of dredging plant for St. Lawrence river from Montreal to Father Point, $216,550.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Where is the minister going to construct this dredging plant?

Mr. HAZEN: This plant is in connection with the shipyard at Sorel. The vote last year was $452,715, the vote this year is $216,550, decrease $236,165. The estimated expenditure for this year: Maintenance of shipyard, $63,550; improvements to shipyard, $3,000. There is now under construction by the Canadian Vickers a self-propelling sea-going dredge at an estimated cost of $150,000. The repair work in connection with the tugs, dredges, and fleet on the river St. Lawrence is done at Sorel. The shipyard there does a certain amount of construction work when new construction is required, but this year we have no new work. The yard is doing a certain amount of work for other purposes which I do not wish to mention publicly.

Mr. MARCIL: Is there any part of the work that the minister can mention?

Mr. HAZEN: It is the building of vessels which are not to be used in connection with the channel but in connection with the war.

Mr. MARCIL: Has the total number of employees increased?

Mr. HAZEN: The number employed is a little below 800.

Mr. MARCIL: Is that more than usual?

Mr. HAZEN: At times the number employed runs to 1,100 or 1,200, but it generally falls off during the summer.

Mr. MARCIL: I saw references in the Montreal papers to a strike that had taken place in the Sorel shipyard. It was stated that the men had been given an increase and that although the strike seemed to be settled there was still some grumbling.

Mr. HAZEN: Everybody is at work again and the shipyard is running as usual.

Mr. MARCIL: At increased pay?

Mr. HAZEN: The strike, in my judgment was a very improper one. The first I knew of it was that the men had gone out. Whenever representations are made to us we give them prompt consideration, and if representations had been made they would have been considered. As a matter of fact the scale of pay of some of the men was not, under the circumstances, as much as it should have been and after consulting with the Labour Department we got the matter adjusted.

Mr. MARCIL: Did the strike include all the hands?

Mr. HAZEN: It included enough to actually cause the shutting down of the shipyard. I think the great bulk of the men did not approve of the strike, because when I gave orders to close down the yard pending adjustment, many men came to the officers of the department and expressed regret at what had occurred and asked to be permitted to go back at once, as they were perfectly satisfied that the department would deal justly with any cases that might arise, as in all such matters, as a rule, the condition of affairs was not brought about by dissatisfaction on the part of all but on the part of a few, and some acted very unwisely and in a way calculated to bring injury on many others who were perfectly satisfied with the conditions existing. I am glad to say that the differences have been adjusted.

Mr. MARCIL: Would the minister give a statement of his programme on the St. Lawrence for the coming year, dredging, etc.?

Mr. HAZEN: We are going on with the dredging, but not on as large a scale as last year, because we feel the necessity of curtailing expenses. The channel is in good condition according to all reports. But we are not doing as much work. We are still continuing to straighten the channel at the points where it needs straightening, and we are deepening it down to thirty-five feet and widening it in portions where it is too narrow. But in doing that work we are not keeping as large a force as in previous years. We have practically cut off the night shift. That is where the saving of $500,000 largely comes in.

Mr. MARCIL: The work this year will be between lake St. Peter and Quebec?

Mr. HAZEN: Yes, and below Quebec.

Mr. MARCIL: On the north channel?

Mr. HAZEN: On the north channel.

Mr. MARCIL: Is that ready for navigation?

Mr. HAZEN: Not yet.

Mr. MARCIL: When is it hoped that this channel will be opened?

Mr. HAZEN: In the course of a year and a half or two years. The slackening of work this year will defer its completion.

Mr. MARCIL: Is there the same depth of water in that as in the south channel?

Mr. HAZEN: Yes.

Mr. MARCIL: What is the idea in having the north channel?

Mr. HAZEN: It is felt that it will be much safer. It is on the south side that the only obstruction to successful navigation below Quebec occurs. By opening the north channel we will have much safer navigation.

Mr. MARCIL: Has there been any trouble with water levels in the St. Lawrence lately?

Mr. HAZEN: No. We had the Commission which inquired into it and made a report recommending that the material taken out in dredging the channel be used in forming dams to keep the water back. Last year the water was unusually low in the St. Lawrence, but the largest steamers, drawing 27 feet, and vessels of that kind, passed up and down the river without any difficulty and in perfect safety.

Lighthouse and coast service—Agencies, rents and contingencies, $166,000.

Mr. MACDONALD: The junior member for Halifax (Mr. Maclean) desired me, in his absence, to ask the minister for the facts in connection with the dismissal of James Lovitt from the Marine office at Halifax.

Mr. HAZEN: Mr. Lovitt was dismissed on the recommendation of the Prime Minister, the representative of the constituency. I would suggest that the hon. gentleman ask the question when the Prime Minister is here.

Mr. MACDONALD: It would be in order that the papers in connection with the matter be brought down.

Mr. HAZEN: The deputy minister tells me that everything on file in the department in connection with the matter has been brought down.

Mr. SINCLAIR: When we discussed this matter on a previous occasion, we understood that the papers would be brought down when the Estimates were reached.

Mr. HAZEN: That must have been when I was away. If there are any other papers, I will see that they are brought down, and, if hon. gentlemen wish it, we will let an item stand so that the member for Halifax will have an opportunity of discussing the matter when he returns.

Mr. MACDONALD: Why was Mr. Lovitt dismissed?

Mr. HAZEN: I think it was on the ground of partisanship.

Mr. MACDONALD: It was a long time after the election.

Mr. HAZEN: The rule laid down by the right hon. leader of the Opposition was that if a member of Parliament asked for the dismissal of an official on the ground of political partisanship and was willing to take the responsibility for it, his request would be granted. I have never asked the chairman to enforce the rule that discussions in Committee of Supply should be absolutely confined to the item under consideration. I am always willing that there should be a great deal of latitude, so that this matter can be discussed on any other item.

Mr. MACDONALD: Last summer, without any apparent reason, the agency of the Marine and Fisheries Department in my county was suddenly closed and the agent, Mr. Noonan, summarily dropped. The reason given was that certain boats had passed over to the Railway Department. The office was subsequently reopened, and on the death of the person then in charge, a new officer was appointed at a reduced salary. Is this condition to be permanent, or is it only temporary?

Mr. HAZEN: My recollection is that the agent at Pictou was receiving $1,000 a year. His duties were largely in connection with the crossing to Prince Edward Island and the management of the boats during the winter months. In view of the changes which were made in that service, and acting on what I thought was the absolutely correct information given by my officials, I decided that the office should be closed. I did not think that the work done would be sufficient to justify the continuance of an agency there. Reports were subsequently made to me, however, by officials of the department, pointing out that this agent had been doing other work as well in connection with the Department of Naval Service, the remuneration for which was covered by his salary as agent for the Marine and Fisheries Department.

In consequence of those reports which I received from the Inspector of the Marine Agencies and other officials in my department, I decided to continue the office, but at a salary of only $400, which it occurred to me would be sufficient to cover the work which the agent would do. The policy of the department would be to continue the agency there but at the reduced salary of $400 instead of $1,000.

Mr. MACDONALD: Is the minister aware of the necessity of telephonic communication with Pictou Island? I understand that it was brought to his attention. There is an absolute necessity of having telephonic communication with the island if the life-saving station is to be made of any practical value. The life-saving station is at a point about ten miles away from the nearest telegraph or telephone, and there is no way of communicating in the event of a wreck. A cable was to be laid, I think, in conjunction with the Government; I understand that petitions have been sent to the department asking for that, and I am instructed that Mr. Nickerson, the late inspector of life-saving stations, recommended to the department the necessity of furnishing some means of communication with the island.

Mr. HAZEN: The papers in connection with that matter would be in the Department of Naval Affairs, and consequently I have not the papers, nor the information here to-night. If the hon. member will let the matter stand until the estimates of that department are brought up, I will then bring down all the papers.

Mr. MACDONALD: Certainly.

Mr. SINCLAIR: I asked the minister for information in regard to appointments in his department under section 21 of the Civil Service Act. Perhaps I had better read the section in order that he may fully understand what I mean.

Mr. HAZEN: I understand it.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Section 21 of the Civil Service Act reads:

> If the deputy head reports that the knowledge and ability requisite for the position are wholly or in part professional, technical or otherwise peculiar, the Governor in Council, upon the recommendation of the head of the department based on the report in writing of the deputy head, may appoint a person to the position without competitive examination and without reference to the age limit, provided the said person obtains from the Commission a certificate, to be given with or without examination, as is determined by the regulations of the Commission, that he possesses the requisite knowledge and ability and is duly qualified as to health, character and habits.

I discovered that a very large number of appointments were being made by the present Administration under section 21, and I was trying to ascertain from the various departments why they found it necessary to resort so generally to this section. There are not a very large number in the Department of Marine and Fisheries.

Mr. HAZEN: Six, I think.

Mr. SINCLAIR: I find from a return that there were two appointments after competitive examination and four without competitive examination in the Marine and Fisheries Department. In the Naval Service, there were four appointed after competitive examination and two without competitive examination, making twelve altogether.

Mr. HAZEN: Ten altogether, is it not?

Mr. SINCLAIR: No, twelve. The purpose of the Civil Service Act was that civil servants should be appointed wholly on their merits after competitive examination. and it is important for the efficiency of the service that this rule be strictly adhered to. I understand that occasionally a friend of the Government desires to obtain an appointment in some department, and he is perhaps too old to be taken in under the ordinary rules, or unable to pass an examination, and in that event section 21 is resorted to. This was never intended at the time the Act was passed. This section was intended for the appointment of officials with professional or technical ability. The explanation given when the Act was passed in 1908 was that occasionally the Government would require to introduce into the Civil Service some eminent man from abroad or perhaps from Canada who would not be willing to submit himself to an examination by the commission, or who, perhaps, would be over age. The Marine Department might want an engineer or some man of ability, and if such a one were appointed no one would complain; but when we find that the present Administration has appointed 174 men under section 21, it is clear to every one that there is an abuse. We want to ascertain who is the sinner who is perpetrating these abuses, and while I do not say that the Minister of Marine has perpetrated any, I would like to have from him the information as to whom he has appointed in his department, the name of each, age at the time of appointment, former employment, present employment, salary paid, and the reason why section 21 was resorted to in each case.

Mr. HAZEN: In the Department of Marine and Fisheries, during the period of nearly six years that I have been head of that department, there have been six such appointments, as is shown by a return laid on the table of the House. I do not know whether I can name the officials from memory, but I can name some. One is Mr. George Herbert Flood, who was appointed purchasing agent of the department. When I came into office, the purchasing agent was Mr. Cecil Doutre, who was a very satisfactory official. Mr. Doutre felt that he could earn a larger salary and improve his position outside of the department, and, very much to my regret, he resigned. The position of purchasing agent is one of great importance. After discussing the matter with my officials, I came to the conclusion that it was absolutely necessary to have in that position some one who had previous experience, not only in business, but in the business of the department itself. It occurred to us it would be proper to promote one of the agents, and, on looking over the list of agents, we concluded that the best appointment we could make would be that of Mr. George Herbert Flood, who was agent of the department in the city of St. John, and who had been appointed a few years before I came into office. Speaking offhand, I may say that at the time of his appointment he was a man of about forty-five or forty-six years, perhaps a little more. His record in the department was wonderfully good; we regarded him as a competent official, and we decided in the interest of the department that we could not do better than to appoint Mr. Flood. In consequence of his age, we had to appoint him under section 21. If I recollect aright, the Civil Service Commissioners approved of his qualifications. Another gentleman appointed under this section was Mr. McDonell, in connection with the shipping branch of the department. He had been in the department for five years when this vacancy occurred. An examination was held, which he passed most satisfactorily, and which showed that he possessed the necessary technical knowledge. His position is assistant to the chairman of the Board of Steamship Inspection, which requires considerable technical knowledge and skill regarding the construction of ships, boilers, and so forth. Another gentleman appointed under this section was Mr. Thomas Ferguson, the present chairman of the Board of Steamship Inspection. He had been in the outside service for a good many years, and was considered to be the best qualified man for this position.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Perhaps the minister could give me all the names and particulars later on.

Mr. HAZEN: I shall be glad to do so when the Naval estimates are before the House.

Mr. SINCLAIR: I see by a return brought down a few days ago that there has been practically no increase in the staff of the Department of Marine and Fisheries during the last four or five years, but that there has been a large increase in the expenditure of the department.

Mr. HAZEN: That comes under the Naval Department.

Mr. SINCLAIR: I am speaking of the Fisheries Department.

Mr. HAZEN: Yes, but the Fisheries are administered by the Department of Naval Service. My hon. friend will recollect that we have discussed this time and again in the House. About three years ago, in order to equalize the work of the two departments, one of which was heavy and the other comparatively light, the Fisheries were brought under the Department of the Naval Service.

Mr. SINCLAIR: The increase is therefore in the staff of the Naval Department.

Mr. HAZEN: Yes. There has been no increase in the staff of the Marine and Fisheries Department.

Mr. SINCLAIR: What increase has there been in the staff of the Naval Department?

Mr. HAZEN: I could not say offhand, but I shall be glad to give my hon. friend the information when the Naval Estimates are up.

Salaries and allowances to lightkeepers, $425,000.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Has any change been made in this service?

Mr. HAZEN: There is a slight change. The expenditure for 1915-16 was $449,961, and the expenditure for the year ending March 31, 1917, $460,999.74. As the service is gradually being enlarged from year to year, there is a corresponding increase in the expenditure, as more lights are established and more lightkeepers appointed. The expenditure by provinces, in round numbers, is: Nova Scotia $121,000, Prince Edward Island $16,000, New Brunswick $50,000, Quebec $69,000, Montreal district of Quebec $32,000, Ontario $94,000, British Columbia $65,000.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Is it intended to increase the salaries of the lightkeepers?

Mr. HAZEN: We have received requests from different parts of the country for an increase in the pay of lightkeepers, and we shall take this matter into consideration.

Mr. MARCIL: Will anything be done in that regard this session?

Mr. HAZEN: I do not think so.

Mr. MURPHY: I should like to draw the minister's attention to the lighting of the Rideau canal. I was under the impression that that was done by the Department of Railways and Canals. I brought to the attention of the Minister of Railways a few days ago the fact that the canal had been lighted above Smith's Falls, that is, that portion running through Leeds, Lanark, Grenville and Frontenac counties, but that portion running through the counties of Russell and Carleton had not been lighted this season. Possibly this is an omission, which will be rectified on the minister's attention being directed to it. I do not wish to delay the committee at all, and I will take the liberty of sending my hon. friend a small file of correspondence tomorrow, knowing that he will have the matter attended to. It is represented to me that there are about 1,000 power boats on this waterway, representing an investment of at least $1,000,000, and that by reason of the increased production taking place along the canal and the river there will be a great increase in navigation this year. The prospect is also held out that unless present conditions materially change, coal may be brought down this waterway as in years past. For these reasons, the lighting of what is represented to me to be possibly the most dangerous part of the channel is a very important matter, and if my hon. friend will be good enough to say he will have this matter attended to, I will send him the correspondence tomorrow or the next day.

Mr. HAZEN: I shall be very glad to attend to the matter. The procedure when lights are applied for is to send the applications to the Lighthouse Board of Canada, which consists of the deputy minister and the chief engineer of the department, the inspector of lights, and the Chairman of the Shipping Federation of Canada, and the Chairman of the Dominion Marine Association. The board meets regularly, and when an application comes before them for a light or a buoy or some other aid to navigation, the matter is referred to them and they get reports from the inspector of lights and other sources, and then decide whether the request shall be granted. There is also a gentleman on the Pacific coast, Captain Troup, who deals with these matters on that side of the continent.

Mr. MURPHY: That would be the procedure in case a new light or buoy was asked for, but in this case the lights have been in existence, but they have not been placed this season.

Mr. HAZEN: I will look into that.

Maintenance and repairs to lighthouses, $750,000.

Mr. HAZEN: This is to provide for the maintenance of aids to navigation, including the cost of supplies, such as fuel, illuminants, cleaning material and other supplies, with the delivery of the same, and also the cost of repairs to these aids to navigation. The amount spent in this service in 1915-16 was $604,000, and last year it was $654,000. The increase was mainly due to the higher prices of supplies. The expenditure was divided by provinces as follows. Nova Scotia, $125,000; Prince Edward Island, $13,000; New Brunswick, $94,000; Quebec $123,000; Montreal, $51,000; Ontario, $94,000; British Columbia, $77,000; General, $14,700. The cost of this work of maintenance cannot be predetermined, but the officer whose business it is to report on this matter says that the amount asked for will be ample for the year. We will keep the expenditure as low as possible, though it is difficult to keep it down on account of the increased cost of supplies.

Mr. McKENZIE: Is anything being done with regard to Ingonish harbour, in Victoria county? It was deepened twelve years ago, but before that it was rather a bar harbour. The entrance to the harbour is under the famous Cape Smoky, the highest peak in Nova Scotia, and I understand that the engineer sent report on the project, advised that range lights could not be placed there on account of the height and steepness of the mountain. There are aids to navigation there which are fairly useful in the daytime, but which do not help at night. This harbour is very much used, especially for fishermen and large vessels for shelter, and also by three or four steamers running between Halifax and Cape Breton and Newfoundland. I have advised putting lighted buoys at the entrance of this harbour. Three or four on either side would be much help.

Mr. HAZEN: I will refer the matter to the Lighthouse Board and ask them to make a report with a recommendation.

Construction of lighthouses and aids to navigation, including apparatus, submarine signals, and providing suitable boats for carrying on construction work, $600,000.

Mr. HAZEN: This is $150,000 less than was asked for last year. In view of existing conditions we have cut down our construction work to the lowest point consistent with the maintenance of this service efficiently. Last year our expenditure was $325,068. This vote is asked for to provide new aids to navigation, lighthouses, beacons, buoys, etc., including apparatus and machinery, as well as large repairs to existing buildings, the replacing of obsolete buildings and equipment for the safety of vessels of deep draught, the chartering of any boats temporarily necessary to carry on the work, the regulation of traffic in the Detroit river and the administration of the lighthouse depot at Prescott. The principal works proposed, all of which have been recommended by the Lighthouse Board, are as follows:

NOVA SCOTIA.

	$105,000

The item with reference to Anticosti Island is for the erection of two lights on the north side of the island. These are being erected there after consultation with the authorities of the British Admiralty, as it is thought that the northern channel, in view of war conditions, may be used to a much greater extent than in the past, and it is desirable to have the channel better lighted.

Minor and unforeseen works and repairs	10,000
	$75,000

While there is use for a lighthouse at Triple Island at the entrance to Prince Rupert harbour, and while it is work that will have to be undertaken in the near future, it may not be necessary to proceed with it this year. We have found, in connection with lighthouse work in British Columbia, very great difficulty in getting tenders and a good deal of trouble in getting men experienced in this class of work owing to causes created by the war. These are the principal items of work that will be undertaken this year.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Does it include aids to navigation in Hudson Bay?

Mr. HAZEN: We are not contemplating any additional expenditures in Hudson Bay this year.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Have you already some lighthouses in Hudson Bay?

Mr. HAZEN: Yes, buoys, lighthouses and beacons. If conditions were normal we would do more, but there is very great difficulty in getting ships to carry stuff or to work there.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Are there any lights in operation?

Mr. HAZEN: They are either in operation or they are ready to be put in operation the moment the necessity arises.

Mr. SINCLAIR: What has the minister done in the way of lighting Hudson Bay?

Mr. HAZEN: Down through the straits there have been placed ten or twelve lights —I think ten lights—and beacons.

Mr. OLIVER: Is there any light or beacon on Mansfield Island?

Mr. HAZEN: Yes.

Mr. MURPHY: Is the wireless station there under my hon. friend's department?

Mr. HAZEN: It is under the department of the Naval Service.

Mr. A. W. CHISHOLM: What amount was spent last year in Hudson Bay?

Mr. HAZEN: My deputy will look it up in the Auditor General's report.

Mr. MARCIL: Would the minister explain what it is proposed to do at Anticosti Island? I visited Anticosti some years ago and met Mr. Menier's representative, and he told me that they had negotiated with the department to take over some lights which Mr. Menier had erected. I understand it is proposed to render the north channel navigable.

Mr. HAZEN: Yes. The negotiations with Mr. Menier took place before I was in the department, but I have heard the matter discussed in the department and I understand the department took over all the lights on the island with the exception of one which they decided not to take over because they thought that Mr. Menier had erected that simply for his own personal benefit, and it was not in general use as an aid to navigation. The lights for which provision is being made on the north side of the island are to be erected so that ships can pass through the northern channel with safety. This is done at the suggestion of the authorities of the Admiralty, who believe that under existing conditions and because of the submarine danger, it may be necessary to use that north channel to an extent and in a way that it was never used before, and these lights are being established there as a guide to mariners.

Mr. OLIVER: Are there any lights indicating Churchill harbour on Hudson Bay?

Mr. HAZEN: I do not think so.

Mr. OLIVER: I suppose there are at Nelson harbour?

Mr. HAZEN: Yes, at Nelson. We sent a large number of buoys to Nelson two years ago.

Mr. NESBITT: Have they floated away?

Mr. HAZEN: No, they have been looked after and taken care of. They are taken up in the fall and put down again when navigation opens.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Is it the policy of the department to stop expenditure in Hudson Bay for the present or until after the war?

Mr. HAZEN: That is a matter that has not been decided. We will be guided by circumstances. With the great scarcity of vessels which was spoken of this afternoon it is very doubtful whether many vessels will go into Hudson Bay this year. But we have the straits fairly well lighted now. That is an enormous improvement and adds very much to the safety of navigation. We are prepared to do what is necessary if it is in the public interest that it should be done.

Mr. MURPHY: I observe that this item covers submarine signals.

Mr. HAZEN: That has nothing to do with submarines. There is a bell rung in foggy weather and it is heard on ships that are equipped with a corresponding apparatus.

Mr. SINCLAIR: How many of these submarine bells are there, and where?

Mr. HAZEN: At Fame Point, Louisburg, Point Lepreau, Halifax and Lorneville, on the coast of St. John county.

Lighthouse and Coast Service—Signal service, $60,000.

Mr. HAZEN: This service has been in existence for a good many years and was established to maintain communication between ship and shore by means of flag signals. It extends from St. John and Halifax to Cape Race and Belle Isle, and up the gulf and river St. Lawrence and the lakes as far as Sault Ste. Marie. The agents at the different points receive small salaries, some of them $200 and some more. These stations report the movements of vessels to Montreal, Quebec, Sydney, Halifax and St. John. They report water conditions daily to Montreal, Quebec, Halifax or St. John. Montreal, Quebec and St. John publish daily bulletins giving ice and weather conditions, and movements of vessels. Montreal publishes daily the depth of water in the various parts of the ship channel. The signal service offices at Montreal, Quebec and St. John are open day and night to furnish to the public information regarding shipping matters. The telegraph system of the Department of Public Works on the north shore of the St. Lawrence reports the movements of vessels engaged in the coasting trade, to the signal service at Quebec. The collectors of customs on the St. Lawrence and on the Atlantic coast and the bay of Fundy report the arrival and departure of vessels engaged in overseas traffic to Lloyd's agent at Quebec or St. John.

Mr. SINCLAIR: How does the information of the movement of vessels reach the public?

Mr. HAZEN: Before the war all of that information was published in the newspapers. Publication has ceased since the beginning of the war.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Has my hon. friend considered the importance to owners of getting this information about their vessels? The owner of a vessel whose head office is in Montreal may have a ship which passes Cape Race on the way to England, or inward bound. It would be very important for him to know that the ship had passed Cape Race at a given hour. The information might reach the Marine Department but not the owner if he did not happen to live in Montreal.

Mr. HAZEN: The agent or owner of the vessel is communicated with by the shipping office; that information is furnished to him by the signal officer at Montreal or whatever port it may be.

Mr. SINCLAIR: I suppose it would be an advantage to have the signal officer at Cape Race wire at once to the owner.

Mr. HAZEN: The way it practically works out is that the man, say at Cape Race, wires to the port to which he reports the names of all vessels that have passed inward or outward. He does that twice a day.

Mr. SINCLAIR: I know, as a matter of fact, that the agents at the stations the minister has mentioned do not report to owners of vessels when they pass these points; at least I know of cases where they have not done so. I also know of cases where the owners have made private arrangements with the signal officers to get the information when the vessels pass. This is a very important and useful service, and its administration might be greatly improved if the minister would investigate it and see that regulations are made that would give this information to the owners of the vessels, and, in ordinary times, to the public.

9 p.m.

Lighthouse and Coast Service—Administration of pilotage and maintenance and repairs to steamer Eureka, $56,300.

Mr. HAZEN: This is the expenditure in connection with pilotage on the St. Lawrence and the maintenance of the Eureka, which is kept at Father Point where pilots board and leave vessels. During a portion of the time they live on the steamboat. The vote is the same as last year, and we spent last year about $42,000.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Is the whole of this expended in the St. Lawrence?

Mr. HAZEN: Yes.

Mr. MARCIL: Are the pilots still taken on and off at Father Point?

Mr. HAZEN: Yes.

Mr. MARCIL: Was any effect given to the recommendations, made some time ago after the loss of a steamer there, with regard to the taking on and off of pilots?

Mr. HAZEN: Every recommendation made by the Pilotage Commission which was appointed some years ago was carried out, with the exception of that with regard to the pilots. In order to carry out that recommendation we have to have two boats instead of one, but so far we have not provided an additional boat.

Maintenance and repairs to wharves, $10,000.

Mr. HAZEN: After wharves have been constructed by the Public Works Department they automatically come under the control of the Department of Marine and Fisheries so far as ordinary management and the collection of revenue are concerned. The Governor in Council, on the recommendation of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, then appoints a wharfinger, whose business it is to collect the tolls and look after the wharves. Repairs amounting to $50 or over are attended to by the Department of Public Works; those under $50 are made by the Department of Marine and Fisheries. This sum of $10,000 is for that purpose. Last year we expended only $5,460 and in 1915-16 about $8,000.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Whose duty is it to look after the repairs to these wharves in the province of Nova Scotia?

Mr. HAZEN: If the wharf is out of repair, it is the duty of the wharfinger to report to the department. If the repairs required are of an extensive character, his report is forwarded to the Public Works officer in the province who is instructed to report to the Chief Engineer at Ottawa. This is a very old system. I rather think that the Department of Marine and Fisheries should have larger control of expenditures in connection with repairs, as it otherwise has complete control of the wharves.

Mr. SINCLAIR: How are the wharfingers paid?

Mr. HAZEN: Like the harbour masters they are allowed a certain percentage of the collections up to a certain amount. In some cases the collections are a negative quantity because some of the wharves used by the fishermen are exempt from tolls.

Mr. A. W. CHISHOLM: Is it the custom of the department to appoint a wharfinger when a wharf is handed over to it by the Public Works Department?

Mr. HAZEN: That is the custom, but the remuneration is so small that in some cases it is impossible to get a man in the neighbourhood who will act as wharfinger.

Mr. A. W. CHISHOLM: Last year a small expenditure was made at Margaree Harbour upon a pier which was constructed primarily for the purpose of directing the current of the Margaree river. Shortly afterward, the fishermen commenced to use the pier for the landing of their fish. The department subsequently appointed a wharfinger who proceeded to collect tolls from the fishermen—the first time that had been done in the history of the place. It is absurd that a wharfinger should be employed on that pier, and I would suggest that the minister cancel the appointment forthwith.

Mr. HAZEN: We will look into the matter.

Mr. SINCLAIR: What is the gross amount received by way of revenue from the wharves?

Mr. HAZEN: In 1915-16, $56,261, an increase of $23,037 over the previous year. $36,908 of that amount was collected in New Brunswick, of which $34,000 was collected at the city of St. John from the large wharves that were built by the Public Works Department a short time ago.

Mr. SINCLAIR: How much of that money was used in paying the wharfingers?

Mr. HAZEN: I think this was the net amount received.

Mr. SINCLAIR: What percentage was paid in St. John to the wharfingers?

Mr. HAZEN: There are three wharves at St. John. When I came into office there was one wharf, of which Mr. Elkin is the wharfinger. He receives $1,500 a year. When the second wharf was finished, Mr Cowan, who, I am sorry to say, died the other day, was appointed wharfinger, and he received a similar salary. When the third wharf was completed, I did not appoint a wharfinger; I made an arrangement by which the work would be done through the office of the Department of Marine and Fisheries in the city of St. John. I thought that was a better arrangement. As a matter of fact, we are at present considering the advisability of doing away altogether with these wharfingers and placing the responsibility of collecting the rents in the hands of the agent of the Marine and Fisheries Department. I have not yet come to a conclusion, but I have asked my officials for a report as to the advisability of taking that course.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I feel I should appeal to my hon. friend, the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, to have repairs done at Percé wharf in the county of Gaspé.

Mr. HAZEN: Would the repairs cost more than $50?

Mr. LEMIEUX: Yes.

Mr. HAZEN: Then my hon. friend should make his appeal to the Minister of Public Works.

Mr. LEMIEUX: As that minister is not in the House and as he is not very often in the House, I appeal to a gentleman who honours us with his presence. The wharf having been completed, has been transferred to the Department of Marine and Fisheries, and therefore, diplomatically speaking, the recommendation for the repairs should come through the Marine Department. This wharf was built some years ago when I had the honour to represent the county of Gaspé. Percé is the shire town for the whole district, and there is quite a steamer service between Quebec, Montreal, and the Baie des Chaleurs, as well as between Campbellton and Dalhousie. The Percé wharf is the most important in that district, and I am sure it pays its way, but during the last three or four years it has been completely abandoned; no repairs have been made to it, and, as a result—and I saw the wharf last summer—it has been cut in two by the seas. It is a great pity that a wharf which has cost in the neighbourhood of fifty or sixty thousand dollars should become a ruin owing to the indifference of the Department of Public Works. I would advise my hon. friend to represent to the Minister of Public Works that this wharf should be properly repaired, because the public are now obliged to travel in barges a mile or two out from the harbour to get on board the steamer.

Mr. HAZEN: I shall be glad to make representations to the Minister of Public Works.

Mr. MARCIL: I should like to make a similar request on behalf of the wharf at Gascons which is not very far distant from Percé. This wharf has broken in two and it has been utterly abandoned.

Mr. HAZEN: There is a question on the Order Paper about it

Mr. MARCIL: Yes. Gascons is an important point. The people there have to go about twenty miles to Port Daniel where there is another wharf, and that is a great inconvenience. The same remark applies to the wharf at St. Charles de Caplan and the wharf at Bonaventure. General repairs to those wharves are required. The policy, during the war, to put the case mildly, seems to have been not to spend anything in that district, and very little has been done, the result being that Government property is becoming dilapidated. I should like to ask the minister about the wharf at Miguasha Point off Dalhousie which was built by the Department of Public Works and which after remaining under the control of that department for some time, was transferred to the Department of Marine and Fisheries. After the appointment of a wharfinger, an attempt was made to collect tolls. The wharf is used largely by market gardeners who go to Dalhousie and who are unwilling to pay the tolls, and I understand that the ferry boat refuses to land at the wharf. Has the department abandoned the collection of tolls, or will it insist on collecting them during the present season.

Mr. HAZEN: My experience in regard to these small wharves is that the Government gets such a very small revenue out of them and it is so objectionable to the people to pay these tolls that the country would not be any worse off if we abolished the tolls altogether. You need a responsible man in charge of each wharf to see that it is properly conducted, and it seems reasonable that the country should pay a man for that purpose. I know that there is nothing that country people taking produce to market hate so much as to have to pay a small toll on their produce going over a wharf. I will make inquiries in regard to the wharf at Miguasha Point.

Mr. MARCIL: What arrangement is being made with regard to the collection of tolls at Baie des Chaleurs wharves Formerly the wharfingers were paid fifty per cent of the tolls collected, or, in round figures, about $50 a year. I understand that a few years ago an arrangement was made that the boat proprietor paid a round sum to the department and received permission to use free of charge all the wharves on the coast. What arrangements are to be made for the present season? We expect to have a boat this year which comes from St. John. The boat we had last year was very unsatisfactory, it was a very small river boat. The Minister of Trade and Commerce explained to me that he could not find anything better. It is a pure waste of money to put a boat of that kind on the Baie des Chaleurs; there are no cabins on it, and a passenger who wishes to take the whole trip, must have a cabin. Owing to lack of cabins, this boat goes only half the distance and returns. Last year it started its services on the 5th of August, and the whole season it carried only 150 passengers and about 200 tons of freight.

Mr. HAZEN: Even if there were a good boat on that service, is it not a fact that a great many people would travel by train? There is a train service each way each day, and I think the tendency of the people —I have been down there sometimes—is to patronize the railway because the trains run both winter and summer. Even a good boat would find difficulty in attracting enough patronage to make it a paying proposition. I will look into the matter of an arrangement for using the wharf. I know there has been such an arrangement as my hon. friend refers to.

Mr. LOGGIE: How many wharves are there under the department in Chatham, and what was the revenue last year?

Mr. HAZEN: I have a list here of the wharves that have paid revenue, but there is no mention of a wharf at Chatham.

Mr. LOGGIE: There is one wharf there under the department. There are three public wharves, but two of them are under the jurisdiction of the Railway Department. The other wharf, which is under my hon. friend's department, is in the rear of the Customs House and post office, and the storm signals and buoys are located on it each winter. I see no reason why there should not be some revenue from that wharf.

Mr. HAZEN: If the wharf was used simply for putting up buoys and chains and that sort of thing, there would be no revenue from it.

Mr. LOGGIE: It is used for general purposes.

Mr. HAZEN: I never heard of it before, and I am glad my hon. friend has drawn my attention to the matter. I will have it looked into.

Mr. McKENZIE: There are quite a number of wharves in the county of Victoria, and some of them at least are paying wharfage. There is a wharf at Baddeck, and another at Ferry Landing or Little Narrows, as it is sometimes called.

Mr. HAZEN: The wharf at Baddock pays something.

Mr. McKENZIE: Are there any wharves at South Bay, North Bay and White Point?

Mr. HAZEN: Baddeck is the only one that is mentioned here, but if my hon. friend would send me a list I could get him the information.

Mr. McKENZIE: Most of these wharves are in fishing villages. I understand that some local men tried to collect wharfage and tolls from the fishermen, and it caused a great deal of trouble. I think I heard the minister say this evening that where wharves are used for the accommodation of fishermen no tolls are charged. I would suggest to the minister that instead of appointing a wharfinger to look after these wharves, it would be better to leave it to some one who is in business near the wharf and has occasion to use it practically every day. Wharfingers have very often no occasion to go to the wharf unless something comes for them by boat, but there is always some one in business near these wharves. I have particularly in mind a place called Washabuck, where there has been a wharf for about twelve years. A gentleman named McNeil is in business at the head of the wharf and has occasion to use it practically every day. He takes as much pride in it as if it were his own, and certainly keeps it in good shape. I do not know whether anything is collected from this wharf, but it is certainly a first class one. I am sure that in all the villages along the coast the minister will find men of this sort who will take much better care of the wharf than wharfingers, who have no interest in the wharf except collecting a little toll and receiving any goods that come for themselves. These wharves were built in the county of Victoria for the accommodation of the different villages along the coast, and with no intention of collecting wharfage or tolls of any kind. A fishing wharf serves two purposes as a rule: it acts as a breakwater and shelter for the fishing boats, and serves also the general purposes of a wharf. They were put up to assist the fishermen. If the minister finds that tolls are being collected at any of these wharves, at White Point or any other place in the county of Victoria, I would suggest that he cut it out at once, because it is a great nuisance to the fishermen, and the revenue is of no consequence to the department. There is a good deal of dissatisfaction at Baddeck by reason of the collection of wharfage. There should not be a wharfage charge there at all. Right across the water from Baddeck there is a wharf at Iona, which I suppose is under the control of my hon. friend's department, and which is used in connection with the Intercolonial. The Railway Department has laid rails down to the wharf, and cars from the Intercolonial are shunted down, and the freight for Victoria county is carried by the Government railway to this wharf. The goods are put upon a fairly large ferry boat running between Iona and Baddeck. The Government, having taken the freight from the wharf, must land it somewhere, and I submit that the same rule should apply at Baddeck as applies at Iona. Although the railway is not in my hon. friend's department, it is all under the one Government.

If the man at Iona does not pay wharfage when getting goods over the Intercolonial, why should the man at Baddeck be called upon to pay? When I had more to do with the management of these affairs, there were no toll charges there. The people got their goods off the train and carried them away. We built a first-class warehouse there to shelter goods, and there was a man there willing to look after it because of some little advantages he got in landing his own goods and in the use of the warehouse. The system that was in use then should be resumed. The amount to be collected under the present plan is small, but it is annoying. The thing should be abandoned.

Mr. TURGEON: In corroboration of what my hon. friend (Mr. McKenzie) has said, I may remind the minister that in the session of 1908 or 1909 the present Mr. Justice Brodeur, the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, made the declaration that tolls should not be collected from the fishermen for the use of the wharves along our coasts. Of course, if a fisherman used his boat for business purposes for part of the season, toll would be collected. That has been the practice in Gloucester county, as the Minister of Marine knows very well.

Mr. HAZEN: Fishermen are not charged when using these wharves in connection with their work as fishermen.

Mr. McKENZIE: What does the minister say with regard to Baddeck wharf?

Mr. HAZEN: The law provides that in these cases a wharfinger must be appointed and fees collected, and until the law is changed I should not be justified in saying that tolls shall not be collected at Baddeck any more than in saying that they should not be collected at St. John, at which point they amount to over $33,000 a year. I notice that Baddeck pays something over $200, and is the third largest wharf in Nova Scotia, the largest being Digby, which, I think, pays about $1,700, and the second-largest Kingsport, about $600.

I agree that these wharves were built in most cases simply for the benefit of the people who had access to them, but I think Parliament thought it only fair that those who used the wharves should pay something toward keeping them in repair. Of course, in some cases, the amount collected is trifling, so trifling as to be hardly worth the trouble of collection. But if the principle laid down by the hon. gentleman is to be carried into effect, the question of where the line is to be drawn would have to be carefully considered, in order that the country might not be imposed upon and its proper revenues left uncollected.

Mr. McKENZIE: I agree that where a Government wharf is in competition with other wharves, or in the case of any Government wharf in a large commercial centre, such as St. John, Halifax or Digby, wharfage should be collected. But when goods come over the Government railway to Baddeck, freight is paid on them to that point. The Government has a wharf in connection with the road at Baddeck, just as it has a wharf in connection with the road at Iona. The Government must have a place to deliver goods, and for Baddeck the wharf is the place where they are delivered. It is a part of the system which must be used by the railway in delivering its freight

Mr. HAZEN: But would not this be a similar case: A Montreal merchant makes a contract for goods in Liverpool, to be delivered on the wharf at Montreal. Should the people from whom the goods are bought pay the wharfage charges, or would the hon. gentleman say that no wharfage charge should be made by the owners of the wharf, the Harbour Commissioners of Montreal?

Mr. McKENZIE: But if the Government railway undertook to carry the goods from Montreal to Baddeck and to deliver them at Baddeck, they, having a wharf of their own there, should not charge wharfage to the owner of the goods. In the case to which the hon. minister refers, if the steamship company whose vessel carries the goods from Liverpool to Montreal have a wharf of their own in connection with their steamship line, then, having charged a freight rate to cover everything, they should not charge wharfage for delivery on their own wharf.

The one charge is supposed to cover everything because when the goods are delivered on the wharf at Iona, there is no wharfage at all, but it is a wharf just as much as it is a wharf at Baddeck. The Railway Department recognize the fact and include the charge for wharfage there because it is necessary to the delivery of goods that they shall pass over the wharf.

Mr. HAZEN: It all depends on the contract they make with the people as to what they shall charge.

Mr. McKENZIE: I am only talking about a matter of fair dealing as between the Intercolonial railway and a citizen. That is perhaps the only case of the kind along the Intercolonial. I do not know of any other case where they take goods which have to go over the water before they are delivered. Where there is a Government wharf at which goods are delivered I always contended when the late Liberal Government was in power—and I almost succeeded in convincing the minister—they should not charge because it is part of their own system.

To provide for breaking ice in Thunder Bay and Lake Superior and other points deemed advisable for the good of navigation, $40,000.

Mr. SINCLAIR: How many icebreakers have you in Thunder Bay?

Mr. HAZEN: We have no icebreakers of our own in Thunder Bay. We have to make a contract to have the work done.

Mr. SINCLAIR: How much was spent last year?

Mr. HAZEN: Our contract is for $30,000. It is with the Canadian Towing and Wrecking Company with which Mr. Whelan is connected. I am not quite sure what we spent but $30,000 is the amount we have to pay every year.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Does the contract go on from year to year?

Mr. HAZEN: The contract is for three years from December, 1914, and expires in December of this year.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Will it be thrown open to the public?

Mr. HAZEN: Yes, we always put it up to competition and give it to the lowest tenderer.

Mr. McKENZIE: How could you get tenders for icebreaking when some years you have no ice at all. Some years you have lots of ice and other years you have thin ice.

Mr. HAZEN: Sometimes we have very thin ice. We have to take our chances.

Repairs to maritime road, $1,000.

Mr. HAZEN: That item was passed the other night.

Mr. McKENZIE: This is a road to a lighthouse?

Mr. HAZEN: It is a maritime road leading to a lighthouse in an out-of-the-way place. There is a long stretch of road with nobody living on it, it carries the Government telephone line and it is for the purpose of keeping it in repair that this $1,000 is given.

Mr. LOGGIE: Might I mention a road in my county that is in a very bad condition. It is the road between the lighthouse and the village of Escuminac, some four or five miles in length.

Mr. HAZEN: Is there anyone living on the road?

Mr. LOGGIE: No. During most of the season there is no person at Escuminac Point except the light-keeper. During the summer there are two fishermen and there are two lobster factories operated there. The road is practically impassable.

Mr. HAZEN: I suppose the lobster fishermen go there by boats?

Mr. LOGGIE: They do in some cases, but they would like also to use this road which is practically impassable.

Mr. HAZEN: Could you get over it in an automobile?

Mr. LOGGIE: You might, but there would be danger of getting stuck on the road. Some money was spent on this road by the department five or six years ago.

Mr. HAZEN: That seems to establish a precedent.

Mr. LOGGIE: Yes.

Mr. HAZEN: I will have the matter looked into. If the road is necessary for the lighthouse, and not necessary for other purposes, it is only fair that we should help to maintain it. But, if the road is used by the people who are interested in running the lobster canneries and the fishermen I do not say it would be unfair that the department should make some grant towards it but it would be only fair that they should at least contribute towards the expense as well.

Mr. LOGGIE: I think that was done before.

Mr. McKENZIE: If this road was built for the lighthouse it would be the duty of the minister to keep it up.

Mr. HAZEN: I fancy you will find that the road was there before the lighthouse was built.

Mr. MARCIL: I have a similar case at Pointe Maquereaux. The municipal council of Gascon applied for a grant to put in order the road leading to the lighthouse. The department sent an inspector down, he reported against the application and the department refused to make any grant. The last news I had was that the road was practically impassible. The road leads from the main Gaspé road to the Pointe Macquereaux light. A small grant of $200 or $300 would put the road in order.

Mr. HAZEN: I will make a note of it.

Amount required to pay pension of $300 each per annum to retired pilots, $8,700.

Mr. GAUVREAU: Are these the same pensioners that we had last year?

Mr. HAZEN: Yes, with the exception that two have died since last year, Charles Brown and Pierre Pipon. The arrangement under which this amount is paid is familiar to members of the late Administration as it was made during their tenure of office. It became necessary to decrease the number of pilots in the Quebec district and it was agreed to give these men, during their lifetime, $300 a year. Under that agreement it is necessary to vote this amount.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Will the minister explain how it is that if two have died there are still the same number as last year?

Mr. HAZEN: There must be two less.

Mr. SINCLAIR: I find that there are 29 in the Auditor General's Report for last year and 29 in this list.

Mr. HAZEN: How do you account for that?

Mr. McKENZIE: I suppose two others came on.

Mr. HAZEN: But we are asking for $600 less.

Mr. SINCLAIR: The amounts paid are not always the same because according to the Auditor General's Report some get $300 and some less than $300.

Mr. HAZEN: I understood $300. I gave the explanation that two had died and I understood that that explained the difference.

Mr. SINCLAIR: My hon. friend explained last year that when these pilots died we would get rid of this expenditure but I find two names on the list this year that were not on last year.

Mr. HAZEN: I think that some of the names were omitted from the main estimates last year, and were inserted in the supplementary estimates. That would account for the difference.

Mr. SINCLAIR: My hon. friend can see that it is difficult for us coming from other parts of Maritime Canada to defend pensions given to pilots on the St. Lawrence when they are not given to pilots in other places who are just as deserving. I am not complaining about the payment of pensions to pilots on the St. Lawrence if they are entitled to them, but I have in my mind men on the coast of Nova Scotia, in my county, at places like Canso, Isaac's Harbour and the St. Mary river, who have for many years done the pilotage work of that stormy coast, who have grown old in the service, who have always been faithful, and, so far as I can see, are as well entitled to some retiring allowance as those on the St. Lawrence river. If there is an agreement by which we are liable to pay these pensions to these pilots, of course we must carry it out.

Mr. HAZEN: That is the unfortunate part of it.

Mr. SINCLAIR: But if my hon. friend is going to add to the number year by year I must come in with certain pilots in whom I am interested, and ask to have them put on the list too.

Mr. HAZEN: I have some of my own. I think the criticism of my hon. friend is perfectly fair. It seems strange and incongruous, but this is not my infant at all; I have inherited this item as any future Minister of Marine and Fisheries will have to do, and I have no doubt that when the arrangement was made it commended itself to those in charge of the Marine Department as a fair and proper arrangement. They were familiar with the facts; an agreement was made, and there is nothing for us to do but to act in good faith. We cannot repudiate an agreement made honestly with the pilots by the Government.

Mr. SINCLAIR: What worries me is the two men who rose up and took the places of the two dead men.

Mr. HAZEN: We are asking for $600 less than last year. That means that there are two pilots less, at $300 each.

Lighthouse and Coast Service—To provide for telephones at different points throughout the Dominion in connection with aids to navigation, $500.

Mr. MACDONALD: That covers the item I spoke of earlier in regard to telephones?

Mr. HAZEN: No, I do not think it does.

Mr. MACDONALD: In this case it does, because the lighthouse and the life-saving station are alongside of each other. If there ever was a case where a lighthouse required to be connected by telephone it is this case. There are two lighthouses on this island. A cable passes close to the island, and the question is if it could not be utilized to give telephone communication to those two islands. In winter the lane of communication between the mainland and Prince Edward Island passes by these islands, the steamers go past there all the time. An ice shove or anything of that kind might occur and a steamer might be ashore there for hours and be destroyed by the ice without there being any means of communicating with the mainland and obtaining assistance.

Mr. HAZEN: There have been reports upon this, but all the papers are in the other department whose Estimates will be taken up later on. There seems to be little necessity for this item in my Estimates. For years a small amount has been voted each year to enable the more important light stations to be brought into telephone communication with the nearest settlement where this appears to be desirable in the public interest. The telephone enables meteorological and other observations to be sent in promptly, and is of great use in case of shipwreck. The expenditure under this head in 1915-16 was $1.50, and last year it was nothing, so I do not see that there can be any very pressing need for these telephone lines. If I do not find any need for it this year, I will not bring the item in again. I think it would take much more than $500 to carry out the suggestion of my hon. friend in reference to Pictou island.

Mr. MACDONALD: Would the minister say whether it is proposed to spend any money for the protection of the harbour lights in Pictou?

Mr. HAZEN: The matter has not been brought to my attention.

Mr. MACDONALD: I understand that some survey or observation was made last autumn.

Mr. HAZEN: I do not hesitate to say that if any expenditure is necessary in order to maintain the light, it will be made; but no report has been made to me on the subject.

Mr. MACDONALD: I think it was suggested that a large expenditure should be made which was not necessary.

Mr. HAZEN: No expenditure, so far as I know, has been recommended by the Lighthouse Board.

Mr. A. W. CHISHOLM: I wish to bring up the case of Margaree island, which is distant three miles from the shore. There is a lighthouse on it and a fishing station, and I think that it would come within the purview of this policy. I should like to see a telephone station there. There is a line of telephone along the coast of Inverness, and this is a very important station. The lighthouse keeper has great difficulty in landing during several months. I submit to the minister that the establishment of a telephone station there would be a great convenience to the fishermen.

Mr. LOGGIE: The harbour of Kouchibouguac in my province is a port of call during the whole season for fishing and trading vessels, but there is no communication by telephone or telegraph. If the present system could be extended some eight or ten miles along the shore, it would be a great convenience to that section of the country.

Mr. HAZEN: Whom does the line belong to?

Mr. LOGGIE: It is operated by the Government.

Mr. McKENZIE: Is it the intention of the department to take over the pilot system in the Maritime Provinces?

Mr. HAZEN: The system under which the pilotage service on the St. Lawrence has been taken over and placed under the authority of the minister has worked admirably, and there is a good deal to be said in favour of applying the same system at Halifax, St. John, Sydney, on the Pacific coast, and at other places where there are pilot commissions. I should like to have the matter discussed some time and obtain the views of gentlemen who are interested in it. Of course, opposition to the plan will come from certain quarters. I am disposed to think, however, without expressing a matured opinion, that a change along the lines of the system prevailing on the St. Lawrence would be a benefit to the shipping interests. I have had the matter in mind for several years, but since the outbreak of war it has been hard to get time to deal with questions of that kind. I hope some time to formulate a plan and submit it to Parliament.

Mr. McKENZIE: In the Auditor General's Report, the minister will find mention of two wharves, one at Grand Narrows, Victoria county, and the other at Grand Narrows, Cape Breton county. Victoria county is on the west side of Grand Narrows and Cape Breton is on the east side. These two wharves are utilized in receiving and discharging freight from the Intercolonial railway. Nothing is charged on either of them and, under the old order of things, the same applied at Baddeck wharf. Since the Conservatives came in, however, they have charged over $100 at that wharf. I think it should be placed in the same category with the Grand Narrows wharf, at which no wharfage is collected.

[Mr. Chisholm.]

New vessel to replace the Maisonneuve, $12,000.

Mr. HAZEN: This is a vessel of composite construction, being built at the Government yards at Sorel to take the place of a boat of the same name which has been condemned by the inspectors as unserviceable. The cost will be $30,000. We spent last year $17,861, and this vote is for the purpose of completing the vessel, which, we think, will be in commission this month.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Is she to be used on the St. Lawrence?

Mr. HAZEN: The Maisonneuve will be used on the Ottawa river for the lighthouse service, doing the work formerly carried on by the old boat.

Amount required for rebuilding of Scout, $12,000.

Mr. HAZEN: The Scout was built at Cardinal, Ontario, seventeen years ago. It is a wooden vessel and was employed in the lighthouse and buoy service in the upper St. Lawrence river. Quite extensive repairs were found to be necessary to the hull. We thought at first that we should have to have a new boat, but careful inspection demonstrated the fact that the boat could be repaired and made serviceable for a good many years yet. The repairs were made at Kingston.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Has the hon. gentleman any further details concerning the settlement of the strike at the Sorel shipyard?

Mr. HAZEN: The strike is settled. The men are all at work to-day, and peace and harmony prevail.

Mr. LEMIEUX: What were the conditions of the settlement?

Mr. HAZEN: We increased the pay in some cases where we thought increases were deserved, and some of the men who, we thought, acted very improperly, were asked to stand aside. From what I can judge by the representations made to me, the great bulk of the men in the yard feel that there was no justification for the extreme measures to which the men resorted, because the department was considering the whole question and was prepared to deal fairly and properly with it. We had two officials there and they said: We are prepared to look into the matter and to make a report, and in consequence of the changed condition of affairs, in regard to the wages to be paid, we are authorized by the minister to say that the department will pay them. This was not satisfactory to all the men and some of them shut down the machinery. When that occurred, I gave orders to close the works because I did not think we should be taken by the throat in that manner, but I learned the next day from many of the men that they deeply regretted what had taken place and that they were willing to return again and were quite sure that the department would give them every consideration.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Were any increases given?

Mr. HAZEN: Increases were given where they were warranted.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Did you give the men all that they asked for?

Mr. HAZEN: No.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Has any decision been arrived at by the department in regard to the land where the department is operating there?

Mr. HAZEN: You mean the McCarthy estate?

Mr. LEMIEUX: Yes. Has there been any settlement made with the estate? Some years ago a lease was entered into with the McCarthy estate; that lease has expired, and I believe the department is still a tenant although there is no renewal of lease with the estate. I understand that the Government intend to purchase the land. If a settlement has been arrived at, what amount has been fixed, and what terms generally have been made?

Mr. HAZEN: We were not able to come to an agreement with the McCarthy estate. We felt that in view of the lease we had entered into, the amount they wished for the property was entirely in excess of its value; we could not agree to pay them the amount they wanted and they could not agree to take the amount we were willing to pay them, and the result was that we have undertaken to expropriate the property through the Exchequer Court.

Mr. LEMIEUX: What is the margin of difference between the offer of the Government and the amount required by the estate?

Mr. HAZEN: My recollection is that the margin is very large.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Are the expropriation proceedings going on?

Mr. HAZEN: The matter is in the hands of the Justice Department, and I presume proceedings will be taken in due course.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Has the case been entered?

Mr. HAZEN: I do not know. I have not had the matter before me for some time, but my recollection is that we instructed the Department of Justice to take proceedings in the matter of expropriation; I think the papers are filed which would vest us with the control of the property, and I think the Department of Justice have taken proceedings to have the Exchequer Court place a value on it.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I hold no brief for the estate except that I happen to know casually the little difference of opinion there is between the department and the estate. One of the McCarthy's was a class-mate of mine, and that is how I happen to know of the matter. I believe the Government has taken the proper course in referring the matter to the Exchequer Court because the department must come to terms some way or another on account of the fact that you occupy the grounds which belong to the estate and which are very valuable, in fact, the department could not do otherwise than to have the shipyards there. The last time I had occasion to look into this matter, the department refused to agree to the price, but were still occupying the property, and the estate drew rent from the department.

Mr. HAZEN: Under the lease they were entitled to $1,200 a year.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Yes, but when the lease expired they refused to renew it, and for some time there was correspondence between the estate and the department.

Mr. HAZEN: The lease was a very peculiar one. One contention was that the lease was practically perpetual; that it never expired, and that as long as we chose to hold the property and pay $1,200 a year, we had the right to do so, and we kept tendering that $1,200 a year. After, however, having taken the advice of the Department of Justice, and having considered the matter, we decided it was better for all concerned to expropriate and thus get the absolute right to the property.

Mr. LEMIEUX: What about the marine railway at Sorel?

Mr. HAZEN: I have not heard of it for many years.

Mr. MACDONALD: In connection with the construction of the steamer Maisonneuve, where does the department get the engines and boilers for steamers that are constructed in Canada?

Mr. HAZEN: The boilers that we use at Sorel we make ourselves. I do not know where the engines for the Maisonneuve came from, but my impression is that they were built by a private firm after tenders had been called for. There are a number of private firms at Sorel constructing engines.

Mr. MACDONALD: In regard to vessels generally that are built in the department or for the department, is it possible to have satisfactory engines constructed in Canada?

Mr. HAZEN: Yes, we have found that to be the case.

Mr. MACDONALD: The theory used to be that we could not get satisfactory engines or boilers except in England?

Mr. HAZEN: The information from my officials, who know more about the matter than I do, is that the engines we have had built in Canada for our boats have been satisfactory.

Mr. MACDONALD: For quite a while, the boilers for the boats that were built in Canada were so constructed that it was impossible to use Canadian coal. The boilers used in connection with these steamers have no difficulty in that regard?

Mr. HAZEN: We use Nova Scotia coal altogether in connection with the St. Lawrence ship-channel work and with all our steamers.

Scientific institutions — Meteorological service, etc., $201,793.

Mr. SINCLAIR: What is the increase due to?

Mr. HAZEN: That is due to increases in salaries. The salaries are small, and we are giving the ordinary statutory increases of $50 or $100.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Where are these stations?

Mr. HAZEN: The head meteorological station is at Toronto, and that is where most of the expense is. The head man is Sir Frederick Stupart, and he has a staff of officials at Toronto. There are other stations at Victoria, St. John, Quebec, Moosejaw, Edmonton, Halifax, Fredericton, Montreal, Winnipeg Woodstock and Sherbrooke. There are also telegraph stations at Vancouver, Kingston, Chatham, Port Arthur, Charlottetown, Sydney, Yarmouth, Atlin, Swift Current Prince Rupert, Dawson and other places all over Canada.

[Mr. Macdonald.]

Mr. SINCLAIR: Does this item cover the expense of the telegraph service?

Mr. HAZEN: Yes.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Is it necessary to have this telegraph service?

Mr. HAZEN: It is necessary to collect the information in order that the probabilities may be sent out.

Mr. SINCLAIR: You do not own the telegraph lines, but simply pay for this service?

Mr. HAZEN: We pay for the service. The station at Bermuda costs $375. The station at Triangle Island, at the entrance to Prince Rupert, $250; Regina, $240. There are also stations at White River, Father Point, Sable Island, and places like that. The total cost of the telegraph stations is $17,000.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Are reports wired from Sir Frederick Stupart's office all over Canada?

Mr. HAZEN: Sir Frederick Stupart's office collects all the information, and then sends out reports as to the weather probabilities in the lake region, the Gulf of St. Lawrence, and so on.

Mr. LEMIEUX: What are the probabilities for the next political storm?

Mr. HAZEN: We have got to get the different elements together first, before I can tell you that.

Mr. A. W. CHISHOLM: Do storm drums come under this vote?

Mr. HAZEN: Yes.

Mr. A. W. CHISHOLM: I have a little grievance which I want to bring to the minister's attention. Who is the man in charge of the storm drum at Grand Etang?

Mr. HAZEN: His name is not here, but he gets $60 a year.

Mr. A. W. CHISHOLM: Are these yearly appointments?

Mr. HAZEN: Not necessarily so; they are made from time to time.

Mr. A. W. CHISHOLM: These are very important stations to us, as they fournish a great deal of information that is of vast benefit to the fishermen particularly. A man by the name of Cormier was placed in charge of the storm drum at Grand Etang some seven or eight years ago. He gave a first class service in every respect. He was in poor circumstances and in poor health, and my information is that he has been dismissed and another man appointed in his place. It is very important that I should know who his successor is, because I have a word or two to say in regard to this service, which has saved perhaps more lives than any other.

Mr. HAZEN: I should be very glad to give my hon. friend the information, but I have not got it here.

Mr. A. W. CHISHOLM: I think possibly I have the information myself. I have a very strong impression that this man was dismissed on account of municipal politics. It is a disastrous condition of affairs if the service of this country is to be prostituted at the instance of political demagogues scattered all over the country. The position that this man occupied was of very great importance to our fishermen, and he gave a first class service. We may have a municipal election again next fall and this man's successor, if he does not vote the right way, may be dismissed and some one else be appointed in his place. In my judgment the dismissal of this man is about as small a piece of business as I have heard of since I came to this House. I do not think the minister knows anything at all about it because he has too great a sense of fairness to allow anything like that to take place. I have no doubt that some under-strappers who control some portions of his department are responsible for this dismissal. This may be a small thing—the minister says the salary is only $60, but I can tell him that the service is worth a great deal more than that to the fishermen who are dependent upon the notices sent out from this station. It is a very rough coast down there, and these storm drums were put up possibly at my instance, and have given excellent service, but if the whole machinery is going to be put in the hands of local politicians I am sorry the storm drums were ever put up. Would the minister investigate this case?

Mr. HAZEN: I will look into it.

Mr. A. W. CHISHOLM: If the minister finds that this man gave perfect satisfaction, will he restore him? It is not often I make a request, but I feel that a great injustice has been done in this case.

Mr. HAZEN: The hon. gentleman must not press me too hard.

Mr. A. W. CHISHOLM: I have great regard for the minister's word, and if he says he will replace this man, I shall be content.

Mr. HAZEN: I will look into the matter.

Marine hospitals, including grants to institutes assisting sailors, $75,000.

Mr. HAZEN: The amount we spent last year up to the 31st of March was $57,540. There are some items for April that will have to be added to that. The amounts that have been spent for the last six years since 1910-1911 are resepectively $54,000, $52,000, $54,000, $65,000, $64,000 and $57,000. Owing to the increasing cost of living the hospitals have found it necessary to increase the per diem rate for hospital treatment at certain points. Arrangements are made in ports where there is a well-established public hospital for the sailors to receive treatment at a per diem rate. The rate used to be $1 a day, but the hospitals have had to increase that to $1.50. That includes nursing, attendance and everything else required. The hospitals represent that there has been a great increase not only in the price of food but in drugs and hospital supplies. It is expected that this amount will cover all expenditures during the coming year.

Mr. SINCLAIR: How is this vote administered at Canso?

Mr. HAZEN: The resident doctor there is Dr. A. McGarry.

Mr. SINCLAIR: How are patients provided for?

Mr. HAZEN: There is no hospital there, and patients are sent to a private house, under an arrangement made.

Mr. KYTE: What about the marine hospital at Point Tupper, closed some years ago?

Mr. HAZEN: I think the patients there in need of treatment are sent to the hospital at Sydney.

Mr. KYTE: Who is the marine doctor at the strait of Canso? Dr. McLeod, of Hawkesbury was the physician there, but he was dismissed by this Government, and Dr. McKenzie, of Port Mulgrave, was appointed.

Mr. HAZEN: The incumbent of the hospital having died, Dr. McKenzie has been appointed temporarily in his place.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Has the minister had a request from Canso in regard to an increase of the expenses there?

Mr. HAZEN: We have had correspondence about the matter, and have agreed to pay an increased amount.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Is it on account of the increased cost of drugs?

Mr. HAZEN: No, but we have to pay more to the house to which sailors are sent, just as we have to pay increased rates to the different hospitals.

Mr. SINCLAIR: I understand that the request from the medical officer was for an increase on account of the greater cost of drugs, and I heard a fear expressed that the service might be discontinued unless the minister paid attention to that request.

Mr. HAZEN: Dr. McGarry is paid $375 a year, and out of this supplies his own medicines.

Mr. SINCLAIR: What is the minister going to do about it?

Mr. HAZEN: If we increase the amount paid to one doctor on account of the increased cost of drugs, we could hardly refuse to make that increase general, because it is not in Canso alone that drugs are more costly. Before I increase their pay all over the country, I should have to give the matter very careful consideration.

Mr. SINCLAIR: At Canso there is no doctor available except Dr. McGarry. There is a doctor at Hazel Hill, but he is employed by the cable company and is not at liberty to attend to sailors. If Dr. McGarry withdrew from the service, it would be difficult to replace him. I think it is true that he is not getting enough, particularly since the cost of drugs has become so great. There are usually quite a number of calls upon him. I would like the minister to look into this matter and see if the physician's request is not a reasonable one.

Mr. HAZEN: There may be exceptional circumstances at Canso, as the hon. member seems to think. I will look into it.

Mr. KYTE: Who is the port physician at St. Peter's?

Mr. HAZEN: Dr. J. A. McDonald.

Mr. KYTE: What is his salary?

Mr. HAZEN: It is $250.

Mr. KYTE: Is that the salary at which he was appointed?

Mr. HAZEN: I do not know.

[Mr. Sinclair.]

Mr. SINCLAIR: Do these doctors report the number of patients they attend?

Mr. HAZEN: Yes, they report quarterly.

Mr. SINCLAIR: By looking at that report the minister could see what service is rendered by the port physician at Canso?

Mr. A. W. CHISHOLM: Who is the port physician at Cheticamp?

Mr. HAZEN: It is Dr. P. J. L. Fiset.

Mr. A. W. CHISHOLM: Is he permanently appointed, and is he paid a fixed amount?

Mr. HAZEN: Yes, $300.

Mr. A. W. CHISHOLM: I see by the Auditor General's Report that Dr. Fiset received $125.75 and Dr. Lablanc $115.

Mr. HAZEN: The change was made since the report from which the hon. gentleman is quoting was made. At one time there were two doctors there acting as port physicians, and each making a charge for the work actually performed by him, with the result that we paid a pretty large sum for the service. Now we have an arrangement with Dr. Fiset by which the whole serivce is performed for $300.

Mr. KYTE: Where the port physician is not available and a vessel comes in with a sick mariner aboard, and another doctor has to be called in, how are the fees provided for?

Mr. HAZEN: There is a fairly well established rule. Unless the port physician is able to give satisfactory reasons why he was not available, and why he did not arrange with somebody else to conduct his business for him while he was away, we pay the other doctor and deduct the amount from the salary of the port physician.

Mr. KYTE: It appears to me that the fact that the regular port physician is not on the ground to render medical service ought to be a sufficient reason for the department deducting the amount of the service from his salary. I do not think that any question ought to arise as to the reasons why the services of the port physician are not available. There are cases where hardships are occasioned when mariners pay sick mariners' dues. If a mariner is sick and the port physician is absent he will be obliged to call in another physician. Is it the invariable practice of the department to pay for the services of the other physician and deduct from the salary of the regular physician?

Mr. HAZEN: I believe that is practically the course pursued in almost every case. There may be some exceptional reason why it would not be just for the department to do that but in the great majority of cases that is done. As a rule, there is generally an arrangement among the doctors to take care of each other's cases during the absence of any one of them.

Mr. KYTE: A short time ago Capt. Poirier came into the port of Arichat very ill and he sent for the port physician, Dr. P. A. LeBlanc. For some reason or other, the port physician did not answer to the call. Captain Poirier was obliged to secure the services of another doctor, the doctor rendered his bill to the captain and the captain naturally looks to the department to indemnify him. I would like to know if that is one of the cases in which the minister would think that the port physician ought to be charged with the fees of the other practitioner.

Mr. HAZEN: I have not had an opportunity of looking into the facts. They ought to be submitted to us and then we could come to a decision about them.

Mr. A. W. CHISHOLM: Do I understand that Dr. McLeod has been permanently appointed as port physician at Hawkesbury?

Mr. HAZEN: No, he is acting temporarily.

Mr. A. W. CHISHOLM: He takes the cases as they come along?

Mr. HAZEN: Yes; under an arrangement with him and we pay him.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Does he look after the cases at Mulgrave as well as at Hawkesbury?

Mr. HAZEN: Yes.

Mr. SINCLAIR: How much was received for sick mariners' dues last year?

Mr. HAZEN: $75,545.

Mr. SINCLAIR: That covers the whole expenditure of this item and a little more?

Mr. HAZEN: It more than covers it.

Mr. SINCLAIR: So that we are not losing anything on this service?

Mr. HAZEN: No.

Mr. SINCLAIR: I understand that there is a considerable amount to the credit of the fund for past years?

Mr. HAZEN: Yes.

Mr. SINCLAIR: I think that is a reason why the minister should be a little more liberal with the port physicians. The fact that they are pressed down to the lowest amount is not a good thing for the service. The natural result is that the doctor who only gets $200 or $300 a year for this service does not take much interest in it and the sailor suffers. If the minister would look into the particular case of each port and ascertain the work that is done, and whether it is necessary to give a living wage to the doctor who is doing it, it would be better for the service, and it would give a fair chance to the men who are being attended. Sailors are apt to be poorly looked after if the department is not paying the parties who are looking after them fairly, or as they would be paid by outside people for the same service.

Mr. HAZEN: That is one reason why we endeavour, wherever we can, to get the sailors to go to the hospitals.

Mr. SINCLAIR: I am speaking now about places where there are no hospitals. I have drawn the attention of the minister to a case of hardship that occurred at the port of Canso in years gone by, partly because there was no proper place at which to attend sick sailors when they came in. They could not get proper attention because they had to go to some boarding house. If they come in sick with a contagious disease the appliances are very poor, and it could hardly be expected that a doctor would do his best work for the fee that he is getting at a port like Canso, where so many seamen and fishermen from the Banks come in, to say nothing of the medical requirements of the locality. There is a bright young doctor at Mulgrave by the name of Dr. Breen, a very capable young man, and I thought that at the time when Dr. McKenzie's death took place he would be his successor, as he took up Dr. McKenzie's work in Mulgrave and carried it on. He would have been the natural person to appoint for this service, and if my hon. friend is looking for a man to take the place permanently he could not do better than appoint Dr. Breen, who is at Mulgrave, who is well capable of doing the work and who is trusted by everybody.

Mr. A. W. CHISHOLM: This is an occasion when I have much pleasure on congratulating the minister on making the selection of Dr. McLeod, because he is situated at the port of Hawkesbury, most of the shipping is done there and I have no doubt that the minister will see his way clear to make the appointment permanent and leave Dr. McLeod where he is. They will have to come over from Mulgrave to Hawkesbury, because it is the main shipping point.

Mr. COPP: Who is the medical officer at Cape Tormentine?

Mr. HAZEN: Dr. Allen.

Mr. COPP: He left there some time ago and he has since died.

Mr. HAZEN: I am afraid my list is not up to date.

Steamboat inspection, $79,749.

Mr. HAZEN: We will let the item stand, with the understanding that it is open to hon. members to discuss any questions on it, as there are a number not present to-night who are interested in these Estimates. I might say to my hon. friend from Guysborough (Mr. Sinclair) that in accordance with his suggestion of last session I propose, on taking up the Fisheries Estimates, to make a general statement on the progress of the fisheries. I had perhaps better not start that to-night.

Progress reported.

On the motion of Hon. Mr. Hazen the House adjourned at 11 o'clock p.m.

Monday, June 4, 1917.

The House met at Three o'clock, the Speaker in the Chair.

LIBRARY OF PARLIAMENT.

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the House that I have directed the Clerk of the House to lay upon the table of the House the Report of the Joint Librarians of Parliament with reference to the appointment of Herbert Charles Stock as a messenger in the Library of Parliament at $800 per annum. Mr. Stock has received the certificate of qualification required by the Civil Service Amendment Act in that behalf, and I recommend that the said appointment be concurred in.

SELECT STANDING COMMITTEE ON AGRICULTURE AND COLONIZATION.

Mr. J. A. SEXSMITH (East Peterborough) presented the first report of the Select Standing Committee on Agriculture and Colonization as follows:

[Mr. Chisholm.]

The Select Standing Committee on Agriculture and Colonization present the following as their first report:

Your Committee reports for the information of the House, the following evidence taken during the current session of Parliament: The evidence of Mr. J. H. Grisdale, Director of Dominion Experimental Farms, on "Farm management of Dominion Experimental Farms", and on the "Feeding and Raising of Stock" and would recommend that 25,000 copies of said evidence be printed in separate pamphlet form, for distribution forthwith in the usual numerical proportions of English and French, and that rule 74 with reference thereto be suspended. Your Committee would further recommend that it be divided into the following numbers, viz. 22,000 to Members of Parliament, 2,800 to the Department of Agriculture and 200 to the use of the committee.

He moved:

That the first report of the Select Standing Committee on Agriculture and Colonization, relating to the printing of evidence taken before them during the current session of Parliament, be concurred in, in accordance with the recommendation of the committee in said report.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Will the hon. gentleman explain the tenor of the report?

Mr. SEXSMITH: We had before the committee Mr. Grisdale, Director of Dominion Experimental Farms, who addressed the committee on farm management of the different experimental farms throughout the Dominion. The committee invited him to come back and finish his address, and on the second day he addressed the committee on the breeding and feeding of live stock. It was the unanimous opinion of the committee that we should have some twenty or twenty-five thousand copies of the evidence printed, so that they might be distributed throughout the various ridings of the country.

Mr. CURRIE: As chairman pro tem. of the Printing Committee, I oppose this motion because we are trying to keep down the expenses of printing, and if this matter is left to the Printing Committee, we will seriously consider whether it is worth while spending eight or ten thousand dollars on printing this report. Many other committees are anxious to have their reports printed, but the expenses are being cut down. I hope the House will not consent to this motion until the matter comes before the Committee on Printing.

Mr. SPEAKER: This is a motion that should properly be passed only by the unanimous consent of the House, because if I understand aright the remarks of the hon. member for East Peterborough (Mr. Sexsmith) it is a motion to suspend Rule 74.

Mr. SEXSMITH: The hon. member for North Simcoe has mentioned the sum of $10,000 in regard to printing this evidence. Such an amount is entirely absurd. I think it is very important that this evidence should be printed. Of course, I am just speaking on behalf of the committee.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Mr. Speaker, before you dispose of this, may I remind the hon. member for North Simcoe that last year he presented a very important report from the Committee on Printing, and that that report was held up and has not yet been considered. As the matter is one of great importance, I hope he has not forgotten it.

Mr. CURRIE: No.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: That report was referred by resolution of the House to each department of the Government, and the deputy head of each department was instructed to make a report as to carrying it out, and to have that report ready for the present session of Parliament. I think my memory is correct in that respect. I do not know whether those reports have been made and referred to the committee or not, but I will make inquiry.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: My memory is at variance with that of the Prime Minister, but he may be correct. I understand the matter was allowed to stand over in the absence of the hon. member for North Simcoe.

Mr. CURRIE: Action has been taken by the various departments along the line mentioned by the Prime Minister, but this motion is an attempted evasion of Rule 74.

Mr. SEXSMITH: This is not an attempt to evade the rule; it is simply an endeavour to get the evidence printed in order that members may have copies of it before the close of the session.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: The Clerk of the House informs me that my recollection of what took place last year is correct.

Motion stands.

REPORTS PRESENTED.

Report of the Department of Trade and Commerce for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1916, part IV.—Sir George Foster.

Supplement to the Sixth Annual Report of the Department of Naval Service, Fisheries Branch, Contributions to Canadian Biology.—Hon. J. D. Hazen.

QUESTIONS.

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

SUGAR COLOURING.

Mr. CARVELL:

1. Has the Government seen an advertisement in the Toronto Telegram of the 4th of May, which also appeared in the other papers to the effect that ultramarine dyes have been used in the colouring of sugars?
2. Has the Government reason to believe that ultramarine dyes have been so used?
3. If so, what action, if any, has the Government taken up to the present time to prohibit the use of ultramarine dyes or other poisonous materials in the colouring of sugar?
4. If the Government has taken any steps, when did they take them?
5. What is the scope of such action?
6. If the Government has decided to prohibit the use of ultramarine dyes or other poisonous materials for the purpose of colouring sugar, what steps will the Government take in regard to the sugar that might be on hand in refineries or elsewhere which are coloured contrary to law?
7. If the Government have passed an order to the effect above suggested, will they allow this sugar improperly coloured to be sold in Canada?
8. If they do allow it to be sold in Canada, will the Government insist upon it being labelled so that the public buying the sugar may not be deceived in what they are buying?

Mr. SEVIGNY:

1. No.

2. Yes. During the months of December, January and February, 1916, our food inspectors made a collection of 175 samples of sugar throughout the country. These samples were analysed at the laboratory, and 169 were found to be genuine, and 6 were adulterated as containing a dye, without declaration of the fact, and in violation of the standards of sugar fixed by Order in Council on the 7th day of September, 1914, which declares that sugar which is sold as granulated, loaf, cut, milled or powdered sugar shall contain at least 99.5 per cent of sucrose, and shall be free from any artificial colouring matter. These six samples were found to conform to the standard, with the exception of the addition of the colouring matter.

3. The Chief Analyst of the Department has declared that sugar containing ultramarine may be regarded as being quite harmless to health, and there is no particular objection to this dye provided that its presence is declared to the consumer; in other words, as the dye is used to hide a less advanced state of refinement, this fact should be made known to the consumer in all justice to the more highly refined sugars. The six samples above referred to was bought from retailers, and they were found to come from stock bought at the same refinery. The attention of the retailers and refiners was called to the standards established for sugar in 1914, and they were warned that unless they conformed to these standards in future they would be prosecuted. The department issued Bulletin No. 343 containing the report of the chief analyst on the result of the analysis of the 175 samples, and containing also a list of the names from whom these samples were bought, the names of the manufacturers, the result of the analysis, and also remarks indicating as to whether the samples were genuine or adulterated, etc. Opposite each of the six cases reported as being adulterated, the following remark is printed, "containing a blue dye."

4. The bulletin above referred to was printed and distributed throughout the country in the early part of this year.

5. The collection of samples made last year and the distribution of the bulletin were the first steps taken in reference to this matter, since the establishment of the standards in 1914.

6. The fact that there is in refineries coloured sugar is not illegal. The illegal act is committed when this coloured sugar is offered for sale without a declaration of the fact on the label, etc.; therefore, the department can take no action in regard to coloured sugar on hand, unless it is offered for sale without declaration of this fact.

7. The standard declared in September, 1914, does not prohibit the absolute sale of coloured sugar, provided that the fact of the existence of the colouring is declared.

8. Yes.

MAJOR G. P. DILLON.

Mr. PROULX:

1. Is G. P. Dillon, Montreal, purchasing agent for the Dominion Penitentiaries?
2. If so, what is his salary?
3. Is this the same G. P. Dillon who was looking after the prisoners in the internment camps of Ontario, with the rank of Major?
4. Does he draw his salary of $3,000 as Purchasing Agent for the penitentiaries, and also his salary as major?

Mr. DOHERTY:

1. Yes.

2. Three thousand two hundred dollars.

3. Yes. Major Dillon has acted as purchaser for the internment camps, and in addition rendered valuable service in connection with transportation of prisoners and the establishing and maintenance of economy in connection with the camps.

[Mr. Sévigny.]

4. No. He draws the military pay of captain for his services as purchaser for the internment camps. This arrangement has the advantage of securing the services of an exceptionally qualified purchaser, and is much more economical than would be the appointment of a separate purchasing agent for the work of the camps.

MAPLEOL AND MAPLEINE.

Mr. BOYER:

1. Has the Government prohibited the sale of (a) Mapleol and (b) Mapleine?
2. If the same has not been prohibited, is it because the Government considers that the nature of these compounds conform to the law respecting adulteration?
3. What is the number of samples of (a) maple sugar and (b) maple syrup which have been analysed during the year 1915-16?
4. How many of these samples have been found adulterated?
5. Have proceedings been taken against those found offending?
6. If so, what is the number of such persons, and what are their names?
7. Have they been convicted and fined?
8. If so, to what amount?

Mr. SEVIGNY:

1. (a) Mapleol, nothing on record; (b) mapleine, no.

2. (a) Mapleol, answered by No. 1 (a); (b) mapleine, yes. This is an essence in no way resembling maple syrup.

3. (a) Maple sugar, 234; (b) maple syrup, 243.

4. (a) Maple sugar, 25; (b) maple syrup, 46.

5. (a) Maple sugar, yes; (b) maple syrup, yes, in 5 cases out of 46. Under the advice of the chief analyst no departmental action was taken in the case of 41 samples of maple syrup which were found adulterated, because the order for collection preceded the date (May 15, 1915), at which the standards for maple syrup became legally effective.

6, 7 and 8, answered by statement attached.

The following statement shows the number and names of parties who have been convicted and fined for having in their possession adulterated maple sugar and maple syrup:—Maple sugar: S. Smith & Son, fined $25; Bauld Bros., Ltd., fined $25; Coleman & Eisener, fined $25; John McIver, case stands; J. W. Philips, suspended sentence; J. A. Provencher, fined $25; N. Trudeau, fined $5; H. Pepin, fined $25; H. Robinson, fined $5; E. E. Biron, fined $25; P. J. Roy, fined $25; H. Brydge, fined $25; P. J. Frood, fined $25; L. Malette, fined $25; J. S. Ireland, fined $25; A. Fedy, fined $25; W. D. Stephens, fined $25; J. Cherpaw, fined $25; Willard & Co., fined $25; S. Bourgeman, fined $25; B. H. Walsh, fined $25; W. R. Cole, fined $25; W. H. Tricker, fined $25; Hardy & Buckanan, fined $25; Chaston & Treteau, case before the court.

Maple syrup:—The following cases are before the court: H. A. E. Morin, L. Archambault, Mont La Salle Grocery, C. H. Fournier, Choquette & Frere.

RECRUITING EXPENSES.

Mr. OLIVER:

1. What was the total cost to the Government in salaries, houses, rental and other expenses, over and above the pay and allowances of enlisted officers and men employed in recruiting for overseas service, from August 4, 1914, to May 1, 1917?

2. What was the total amount of money contributed by persons or organizations and not chargeable to the Dominion Treasury, which was used by the recruiting agencies of the Government in recruiting for overseas service from August 4, 1914, to May 1, 1917?

Sir EDWARD KEMP:

1. The claims for travelling expenses and transport in connection with recruiting have never been segregated from other items of war expenditure under the same headings, and to separate these charges now would necessitate wading through some hundreds of thousands of vouchers and would occupy the time of a very large staff of clerks for a considerable period.

2. This information is not available in the department

CAMPBELLTON-GASPE STEAMSHIP SERVICE.

Mr. MARCIL:

Is it the intention of the Department of Trade and Commerce to insist upon the steamer doing the service between Campbellton, N.B., and Gaspé, Quebec, to stop at way ports both going and coming?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: All steamship contracts made by the Department of Trade and Commerce stipulate certain ports of call. In many cases calls are not possible in rough weather. The department insists upon calls being made when possible. No complaints as yet this year have been received relative to the steamship service between Gaspé Basin, Dalhousie and Campbellton.

RURAL MAIL DELIVERY ROUTES.

Mr. EDWARDS:

1. (a) How many rural mail delivery routes were in operation October 1, 1911, (b) and how many boxes were served on such routes?

2. (a) How many rural delivery routes were in operation March 31, 1917, (b) and how many boxes were served on such routes?

3. How many new post offices were opened from October 1, 1911, to March 31, 1917?

4. (a) How many new money order offices, (b) and how many new postal note offices have been opened from October 1, 1911, to March 31, 1917?

Mr. PATENAUDE:

1. (a) 614 rural mail delivery routes; (b) 16,015 boxes.

2. (a) 3,586 rural mail delivery routes; (b) 165,043 boxes.

3. 2,682 new post offices.

4. (a) 1,335 money order offices; (b) 2,391 postal note offices.

THEOPHILE FISET.

Mr. DELISLE:

1. Has Theophile Fiset, of the Parish of St. Bazile, in the County of Portneuf, been paid the sum of $1,100, the amount awarded to him for land sold to the National Transcontinental Railway?

2. If so, when?

3. In whose name was the cheque made out?

4. If there was more than one cheque issued for the said sum of $1,100, in whose names were the said cheques issued and for what sum to each person?

Mr. COCHRANE:

1. Yes.

2. January 24, 1917.

3 and 4. One cheque was issued in the name of Theophile Fiset and Lucien Morand, solicitor for the Crown.

UNOPPOSED MOTIONS FOR PAPERS.

Mr. SINCLAIR:

For a copy of all letters, petitions, telegrams and other papers or documents in possession of the Government relating to the dismissal of Stanley McCutcheon of Senora, N.S., Preventive Officer, and the appointment of his successor.

Mr. BUCHANAN:

For a copy of all correspondence, telegrams and other papers in connection with the closing of the post office at Horseshoe Canyon, Alberta.

Mr. CHISHOLM:

For a return showing the names of persons in the County of Inverness who have been receiving separation allowance and assigned pay, from the year 1914 to the present date.

Mr. SINCLAIR:

For a copy of all tenders, correspondence, reports, telegrams, papers and documents in the possession of the Post Office Department bearing date after January 1, 1917, relating to the contract for mail service between the Intercolonial Railway station and the post office at Heatherton, N.S.

Mr. LEMIEUX:

For a copy of all correspondence between the chief of the Hansard translation staff of the House, the Clerk of the House and the Speaker, since April 19, 1917, to date.

RELEASE OF EDWARD LEVI BAUGH.

Hon. CHARLES MURPHY moved for:

A copy of the reports made by the trial judge and the penitentiary surgeons in connection with the release from penitentiary of Edward Levi Baugh.

Hon. C. J. DOHERTY (Minister of Justice): I notice that the motion asks for the production of the report made by the trial judge. I would point out that it has never been the practice to produce the reports of the judges upon these applications for tickets of leave. The matter has been discussed in the House on more than one occasion, and I think the consensus of the House has been that these reports should be treated as confidential. I therefore desire to enter my objection against that part of the motion being passed. As regards the reports of the penitentiary surgeons, I see no objection to their being produced. I am not suggesting that Parliament could not possibly order the production of these documents, but I am pointing out that it has been the well established practice of Parliament ever since the Ticket of Leave Act came into force, to treat such documents as confidential.

Motion stands.

BANK ACT AMENDMENT.

LOANS ON SECURITY OF LIVE STOCK.

On motion of Sir Thomas White (Minister of Finance) the House went into committee to consider the following proposed resolution, Mr. Rainville in the Chair:

That it is expedient to amend the Bank Act by repealing subsections twelve to twenty, inclusive, of section eighty-eight and the schedule thereto as enacted by section two of chapter ten of the statutes of 1916, and to provide in lieu thereof that the chartered banks may loan money to farmers, and those engaged in raising stock, upon the security of their live stock, that is to say, horses, cattle, sheep and swine, and the offspring of any such animals, and including wool, clipped from sheep while such sheep are subject to such security, and further to provide for the filing of the security and the priority of the Bank's claim, and entry, seizure, and sale in case of default in payments due, and disposal of the proceeds.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: It may be convenient for me at this stage to explain the reason for this amendment to the Bank Act. Last year, in order to facilitate the making of advances to farmers and others engaged in the raising of livestock, we amended the Bank Act by providing that banks might loan to farmers or persons engaged in the livestock industry upon the security of such livestock, taking as security bills of sale or chattel mortgages upon such livestock. It was provided in that legislation that such bills of sale or chattel mortgages should be registered in accordance with the laws of the several provinces in which they were taken. The measure was considered pretty carefully by the House and by the Banking and Commerce Committee, and it was thought at the time that it would reasonably meet the situation. That legislation was introduced at the request of the United Farmers of Alberta, who were interested in the matter of obtaining advances on livestock. But the legislation in its working out has proved to be cumbrous and expensive, and has not been taken advantage of to the extent we expected, for the reason that many farmers have a strong objection to executing chattel mortgages, and for the further reason that the drawing and registration of these chattel mortgages entailed considerable expense. During the past year I have had a further request from the farmers of Alberta to reconsider the matter and enact legislation enabling the banks to make loans upon the security of livestock, taking a simple form of assignment which might be registered at a trifling expense. I have given the matter a good deal of consideration with the result that when this resolution is adopted I purpose introducing a Bill enabling the banks to make loans to farmers or persons engaged in raising or feeding livestock upon the security of such livestock, taking an assignment in simple form of such livestock. The legislation will also provide that if under the provisions of any law in force in the province in which are the livestock mentioned in any security taken under the Act, any such livestock shall be exempt from seizure and sale under any writ of execution, then it shall continue to be exempt.

In this legislation, as in the legislation of last year, we shall have regard to the provincial law in force in the province in which the security is taken. There will be a further provision in the Act that in any province in which there are statutes or laws of the province in force relating to mortgages of goods and chattels or bills of sale, if the officer or person with whom or in whose office a chattel, mortgage or bill of sale may be registered or filed is authorized and empowered by the legislature of the province to receive and file the security taken under this resolution, then it shall be so filed. In other words, we purpose to permit the bank to make advances to farmers and others engaged in the live stock industry upon the security of the live stock, the bank taking a simple form of assignment. That form of assignment could not now be registered in any of the provinces, so far as I know. Nor have we the power to compel any provincial officer to register such assignment. In order that the province may, if it sees fit, protect the rights of creditors against the lien, we provide that the officers charged with the duty of receiving and filing mortgages and bills of sale, being so authorized, may receive and file an assignment given as security for a loan under this law. In this way the matter will really be in the hands of every provincial legislature. The subject has been an exceedingly difficult one to deal with; but I think that this Bill will meet the situation satisfactorily and will enable the farmers to obtain loans from the bank upon the security of their live stock, giving a simple form of assignment which, in the province so requiring it, may be filed in an inexpensive manner.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Do I understand that the main difference between this proposed legislation and the legislation of last year is simply the substitution of an assignment for a mortgage or bill of sale?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: That is one difference.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: That is the main difference?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Possibly it may be, but I should not like to say so without an opportunity to explain further.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I cannot see what is the object of making this distinction between a bill of sale or chattel mortgage on the one hand and an assignment on the other. There may be some technical reason for it, but I do not know what it is.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: So far as the bank is concerned, there is no difference. Under the existing legislation, the bank may make advances upon live stock and may take a chattel mortgage, which, in any province other than Quebec, has to be registered in accordance with the laws of the province. Provision was made in the legislation of last session that in the province of Quebec the loan might be taken without registration except, I think, publication in the Provincial Gazette; at all events, it was not possible to deal with Quebec as we dealt with the other provinces, as there is no chattel-mortgage legislation in the province of Quebec. The reason for the present legislation is that the farmers are unwilling to take advantage—at any rate they have not taken advantage—of the existing legislation, because, in the first place, they do not like to give a chattel-mortgage, and, in the second place, because it costs a substantial fee to draw a chattel-mortgage (which usually follows a well-known form) and register it in accordance with the laws of the province. The result is that the amendment of last session is not working out satisfactorily, and we have been requested to enact legislation which will enable the farmer to obtain loans upon his live stock by executing a lien note or assignment which may be registered if the provincial legislature sees fit to enact legislation under which their officers may receive and file the document.

Mr. PARDEE: And if it is not registered?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The lien is still valid.

Mr. PARDEE: And the bank becomes the holder of a lien, and subsequent creditors are not entitled to notice?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Not entitled to notice.

Mr. PARDEE: Why should that be? Why should not the farmer who mortgages his stock give notice like any other debtor?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: That is the effect of this proposed legislation in the event of the province not passing such legislation as is referred to.

Mr. PARDEE: But the province may pass that legislation or not, as it pleases.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: If the province thinks that the advantage accruing to the farmer from opportunity to borrow on his product, as the manufacturer borrows on his product, does not more than counterbalance the other interests affected, they will pass the legislation. We will leave it to the province to determine whether notice shall be given or not. If the province determines that this lien may not be filed, the responsibility, it seems to me, is theirs, for their jurisdiction covers this subject. All chattel mortgage legislation, so far as I am aware, is legislation of the provinces, not of the Dominion. If there is any better way to overcome the difficulty than this that I have suggested, I shall be only too glad to hear of it when the Bill is in Committee of the Whole, or better still, when it is before the Committee on Banking on Commerce. We are seeking to meet a situation in which the farmer engaged in the all-important subject of live-stock raising is vitally interested.

Mr. GERMAN: I doubt very much if the reason why the farmers have not taken advantage of the legislation of last year is that they do not desire to have a chattel mortgage filed. I am inclined to think that they have not required to take advantage of it; the farmers have not needed to borrow so much money from the bank as they did previously; they are better off than they were. The Minister of Finance must see that when he gives the banks preferential trade over ordinary creditors, without notice, he is going a long way to protect a class of people who, I think, do not need protection, at any rate not by legislation. What expense can there be attached to the giving of a chattel mortgage? The chattel mortgage is a very simple thing, equally as simple as any sort of an assignment which a man could contract. A chattel mortgage is simply an agreement on the part of one party to pay to another party a certain sum of money at a certain time and agreeing that certain chattel property which the borrower has is liable to be sold in default of payment. In any sort of assignment that could be devised the same conditions would be included as are included in a chattel mortgage. That assignment would necessarily have to be filed. There would be no authority on the part of this Government to enact that the assignment should be registered in any of the county offices throughout, at all events, the province of Ontario. That would have to be done by legislation on the part of the provinces. It would have to be registered. It would be absolutely unfair to other creditors to allow a farmer to pledge all his livestock to a bank without notice to any other person who might be inclined, or induced, to loan him money. That could not be the law. In so far as Ontario is concerned—I do not know what the law is in other provinces—it would be too unfair to either party to put such a law as that on the statute-book. The assignment would have to be registered as a notice to the world. Why should not a chattel mortgage be used just as well as an assignment? Every condition that is in the chattel mortgage would necessarily be in the assignment. All the stock, and everything that was covered by the security, would have to be recited in the assignment and that assignment would have to be registered. It would cost just as much as a chattel mortgage. The banks could have their forms of chattel mortgages so that when a farmer went to the bank to borrow money on the security of his live stock, the solicitors who are employed in every town and village where there is a branch bank and paid so much a year by the bank, could fill up the chattel mortgage and it could be executed without any expense. I think the Minister of Finance should hesitate before putting on the statute-book legislation which will allow any man to mortgage his property to a bank without putting the transaction in a position where the public generally will have notice of the encumbrance because he is giving a preference to the bank that does not need a preference, that is not asking for it and I doubt very much if the farmers, when they thoroughly understand it, will be particularly interested in the matter. I doubt the wisdom of such legislation.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I think there is very great objection to the Bill as it stands, even if it might be considered desirable to provide that it should not be put into force until legislation is enacted by the different legislatures. The trouble about this Bill is that it goes into effect at once and it would be operative in a province where there is no legislation allowing this memorandum to be filed and where, in the opinion of the legislature, it might not be desirable because they might not approve of the form that is proposed. The form is given in schedule 8. It is very meagre in its terms, but the difficulty is this: Suppose the legislature does not make provision for this at once and the Act goes into operation, what will be the result? Any farmer, or any man, possessing a large amount of stock, or a small amount of stock, possessing one cow or ten cows, one horse or ten horses, can go to a bank in any province of Canada and not only assign his stock but the offspring of his stock and also the wool which may be clipped from the sheep that the man may have. That is done without any legislation on the part of the province and therefore without any notice to the general public. Section 14 is very strong indeed. It reads as follows:

> The bank shall, by virtue of the security taken under subsections twelve and thirteen of this section, have priority over creditors of the grantor or subsequent purchasers or mortgagees in good faith for valuable consideration.

The result of that would be that a farmer down in my province, we will say, owning a small amount of stock might go to a bank, get a loan of $100 or $200, give to the bank a secret lien upon that property, because there is no legislation in New Brunswick which would authorize such a memorandum as this to be filed, and then the farmer might mortgage that property to somebody else and obtain money upon it. The mortgagee might lend the money in perfect good faith and yet the bank, under the lien would come in ahead of the man who bona fide had lent the money on the security of that stock. In the same way, a farmer might make a sale of stock to a bona fide purchaser for a valuable consideration and without any notice of this secret lien of the bank and the bank would cut him out entirely. It does seem to me that this legislation is of a very dangerous character. It is contrary to what has been the policy of nearly all the provinces in the provincial legislatures for a great many years. That policy has been adopted because of the public necessity for it. Legislatures have provided that all bills of sale must be registered in the registry office within a certain number of days from their execution and that otherwise they would be void as against a parchaser for a valuable consideration. This reverses that policy and gives to a bank a secret lien as against a purchaser for a valuable consideration, or a mortgagee, who, feeling himself secure under his bill of sale or chattel mortgage, would wake up and find the bank after five days' notice, wiping away the security by which he advanced money. It is dangerous legislation and I do not think it is necessary. I do not think it should be adopted. If it is adopted the minister should add to it a section providing that it should not come into operation in any province until the legislature of the province has passed legislation enabling a memorandum of this character to be filed. As my hon. friend from Welland (Mr. German) say, the expense of preparing a memorandum of this kind is nearly as great as that connected with a chattel mortgage, such chattel mortgages are always printed, the banks would keep the forms and there practically need be no expense connected with the matter.

Mr. CURRIE: Does this put the farmer in any different position from that of the ordinary manufacturer and is not the farmer one of the manufacturers of the country? We are trying to get him out of the clutches of the loan sharks and put him in the position of the manufacturer.

Mr. PUGSLEY: In the case of the manufacturer, it is different because of the largeness of the operations. It has been thought well to make provision in the case of the lumber manufacturers, because of the largeness of the operations and the important interests involved. Provincial legislatures have not made any provision to meet cases of that kind, but they have legislated in regard to ordinary bills of sale given by farmers and others. But this gets right down to the case of a farmer who might own ten cows. He would get a loan, he would give the bank a secret lien and he could go tomorrow and borrow money on that stock, the lender would lend the money in good faith, he would record his mortgage in the provincial registry office and he might wake up a fortnight or six weeks afterwards and find that the bank, under its secret lien, could take away his security.

Mr. CURRIE: What would happen to the farmer if he did that? Would he go to jail?

Mr. PUGSLEY: It would be very little satisfaction to the man who lends his money, to put a man in jail. It seems to be very objectionable for that reason. If it is desirable to introduce these forms in the Act, why should not the operation of this Act postponed until the legislatures of the different provinces have had opportunity to approve of the legislation?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: There is only one object in introducing this legislation, and that is to meet a real difficulty which has existed for years past, especially in the West, in connection with the live stock industry.

Mr. PUGSLEY: You do not limit it to the West.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I do not think it advisable that any legislation we pass here should be limited to any particular section of the Dominion. On the last revision of the Bank Act, and I think in some preceding revisions, this question has been raised on behalf of those engaged in the livestock industry. It has been pointed out, as the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. Currie) has stated, the manufacturer, great or small, can go to a bank and by a simple form of hypothecation of his product, under section 88 of the present Bank Act, obtain advances. That hypothecation constitutes a secret lien. I have myself always been of the opinion that Parliament should hesitate, unless on public grounds of the greatest importance, to extend that principle of the secret lien. But, on the other hand, we must remember that the great industry of this country to-day is agriculture, that we are asking the farmers to increase their production, and that it is our bounden duty to make such laws as will promote such production, that is to say, provided that the public interest otherwise is not seriously affected or injured. Until last year it was impossible for the farmer engaged in the raising of live stock to hypothecate or pledge his live stock to a bank and obtain advances on it. Last year, in response to most urgent solicitation on the part of the western live stock raisers, I introduced legislation under which the farmer can give a chattel mortgage or bill of sale upon his livestock. We desire to respect the laws of the provinces, because most of the provinces have desired that, in the case of a lien being taken upon personal property, notice should be given to the public through registration, and there is on the statute books of most of the provinces provision for such registration. The difficulty, therefore, with which we were confronted last year was how to permit the farmer to hypothecate or pledge his livestock and give a security and at the same time afford notice to the public that the security had been given. We thought then that the way out of the difficulty was to enable the banks to loan upon chattel mortgage just the same as an individual can loan upon chattel mortgage, and that the chattel mortgage so taken should be registered in accordance with the provincial laws. It seemed to me last year that it was the only way in which the Dominion could meet the situation, because it was not within the power of the Dominion to compel provincial officers charged under the legislation of the several provinces with the duty of registering bills of sale and chattel mortgages, to register a simple form of assignment such as we now propose in accordance with the laws of the province. Therefore, we enacted that the bank might take a chattel mortgage upon live stock, and that the chattel mortgage should be registered in accordance with the laws of the several provinces. That is where the matter rested. But it has been pointed out to me, not by the banks but by the livestock raisers, that the farmers do not like to give chattel mortgages—the very words "chattel mortgage" seem to cast some doubt upon their credit.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Nobody likes that.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: They do not like to give a chattel mortgage, and it is further pointed out that it costs the farmer a substantial fee to have a chattel mortgage drawn. It is a lawyer's work, and there is also a fee for having it registered in accordance with the laws of the province.

Mr. GERMAN: No more than this will be.

[Sir Thomas White.]

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I disagree with my hon. friend. Therefore I believe that some of the provinces will be quite willing that these liens should be taken and should not be registered. They will not fear that the ordinary creditors will suffer. They believe that the livestock industry is of such importance that the men raising livestock should have the right to hypothecate or pledge their stock in the same way as a manufacturer is to-day empowered to pledge his manufactured product. Let us assume that in New Brunswick it was considered inadvisable that the farmer should have the right to give a secret lien upon his livestock. Then, under this law, the legislature of that province could authorize the officers who now are authorized to receive and file chattel mortgages and bills of sale, to receive and file this assignment, and if that was not done in accordance with that legislation of the province, then the assignment would be null and void as against creditors or subsequent purchasers for valuable consideration. On the other hand, let us say that in Alberta, the Legislature was content that the farmer should have the right to give this assignment of his live stock to the bank and that such assignment need not be registered, then the province would allow this Act to operate without bringing in such legislation.

The hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley) has, however, raised a question which did appeal to me and which I am quite willing to have considered when the matter is before the Banking and Commerce Committee, and that is as to whether or not the Act should immediately become operative. I feel that it would be a mistake, although my mind is open to conviction, to enact that it should not come into effect until after the provinces have passed this legislation to which I have referred, because then the matter would not be advanced very much further than it is at present.

The assignment would then be taken in lieu of chattel mortgage, and would be filed in the ordinary way. I do think, however, that there is a good deal to be said for the view that the Act should go into operation on a date to be named, the legislatures of the several provinces being enabled in the meantime to enact, if they so desire, legislation to compel the registration of the assignments taken under this measure. I have brought this Bill in, as I did the Bill of last year, to meet the urgent requirements of the farming community, especially of the West, engaged in the raising of live stock. I should like the Banking and Commerce Committee to hear the parties interested; they will then be able to reach a better conclusion than we can reach by discussing the matter here. The live stock industry is a great industry in Canada, and we look forward to a much greater development of it. One of the chief complaints made against our banking system by the raisers of live stock throughout Canada is the lack of simple means of getting bank credit readily upon almost the best kind of security. Live stock raisers and manufacturers are engaged in raising or producing something that they require not for their own needs, but for sale in the markets of the world. In order to carry on business of either kind, it is absolutely necessary that there should be facilities for credit, and it is to meet that situation that this Bill is introduced. I should have hesitated to introduce it at this session, in the midst of the war, if I had not believed that it was highly desirable and in the interests of the live stock industry, which especially at this time we are endeavouring to promote and increase. If in the view of the Banking and Commerce Committee a strong case is made against proceeding with the Bill, personally I should be disposed to pay a great deal of regard to that opinion. I should like, however, in the interests of the live stock industry, the matter to go to the Banking and Commerce Committee, and there be considered on its merits.

Mr. MOLLOY: The only thing wrong with the legislation proposed is that it does not go far enough. The banks should be permitted to lend money to the farmer on his live stock without taking either mortgage or assignment. Last year in the district in which I live a sale of eight or nine thousand sheep was advertised. A great many men who had previously been grain farmers only wished to purchase a number of those sheep. Upon going to the bank, they were told that they could have the money, but would have to give a chattel mortgage on whatever stock they bought. As a consequence, they did not buy. Two persons whom I have in mind, however, did purchase the stock, misapprehending what the bank had told them. When they came to make settlement simply by giving a note for the amount borrowed, as they had done that year and many years before, they were told that they 4 p.m. had to give a chattel mortgage. The result was that the savings which they had put aside in the bank for operations in 1917 were drawn out and used to pay the amount of the purchase of the live stock. These men will be obliged now to borrow on their note from the bank in order to carry on operations this year. The farmer will not purchase live stock and give the bank a chattel mortgage, paying them, as one farmer said, from $8 to $10 to be advertised. I shall certainly support this legislation, but I repeat that it does not go far enough. Any man who is a bona fide settler and a worthy citizen should be able to borrow from a bank $1,000, $1,500, even $5,000, for the purchase of live stock. The banks will not lose, because they never lend money to anyone unless they expect to get it back with good interest.

Mr. McCOIG: I believe that the banks should lend money to the farmers for the purchase of stock, as is proposed, especially in this particular year. The farmers would buy a great deal of the stock that is on the market in the province of Ontario if they could get the money to purchase. But they protest against giving a chattel mortgage and advertising themselves, when they are endeavouring to do what is in the best interests of the country and of their own industry. The idea of the Bill, I believe, is to place the bank in the same position as the manufacturer when he disposes of his machines. The manufacturer has a lien on the machines that he sells; the bank has a lien on the stock which is purchased by the money which the farmer borrows. If I understand the Bill rightly, I am heartily in accord with the proposed legislation and should be glad to see it passed. I believe that it would have a very good effect upon the live stock industry of Canada.

Mr. CURRIE: This is one of the most important pieces of banking legislation yet offered to the House. The one great obstacle to successful farming in Canada is lack of credit. That obstacle has been largely overcome in Europe by the establishment of rural credit banks, and the United States is endeavouring to overcome the difficulty in the same way. There is no reason why the farmer, in regard to his product, should not be in the same position as the manufacturer, because, in a sense, the farmer is a manufacturer. Ninety-nine per cent of the farmers are honest, and will pay their debts. Failures among farmers are less numerous than among manufacturers. When the farmer wants a comparatively small amount of money he is up against the loan shark. Suppose a farmer who has a good deal of live stock, but is short of feed, wants to buy feed to tide him over the spring months. He goes to the bank for $100. As he has nothing to offer in the way of security, the bank sends him to an attorney, or a gentleman who lends money. This gentleman takes the farmer's note for $125 at the legal rate of interest, and a chattel mortgage, which is duly filed. The result is injurious to the farmer, who is not given a fair chance; many prosperous farmers have been ruined by the methods employed by loan sharks. If a farmer is out of debt and has good credit he should be able to finance his business the same as any merchant does. If he has a surplus of wheat which is of bad grade, as many western farmers have, he should be able to get money from the bank to buy hogs or cattle to which he can feed that stuff and make from 50 to 100 per cent on the money in a short time. The bank is secured, because it has a first lien on the property, just as it has on logs that are going through the sawmill. It is able to get all necessary information about the farmer's standing and his prospects of success. The farmer needs this legislation very badly.

The quantity of stock in the country is diminishing. Take a man who has a large farm and a large number of stock, and who, through no fault of his, has a crop failure. At present he is either compelled to sacrifice his stock or to borrow money from a loan shark at ruinous interest rates. Why should such a man not be able, on the security of one or more head of cattle, to borrow money from a bank so that he may be able to carry over his stock? In Kansas and other Western States several banks have been formed for that purpose, and they show the greatest expansion and success of any monetary institutions in the United States; in fact, they have been so successful that they are able to lend to farmers who have plenty of feed, money to buy stock, and after the feed is fed to the cattle, the banks still look after the farmers, and the latter are able to make lots of money and to get rid of the middleman in their banking just as they are trying to get rid of the middleman in their buying and selling. This is the most valuable banking legislation that has been brought before this House, and those who are making money drawing up chattel mortgages, and the loan sharks who are lending at fifteen per cent interest are not going to prevent this legislation from becoming law. Had I my way, I would not send this legislation to the provinces; this House can legislate on banking without any preference to the provinces. This is good legislation and it will enable the farmer to get rid of a great deal of stuff which is now going to waste around his farm.

Mr. D. D McKENZIE (North Cape Breton): I am not opposed to the farmer having every opportunity of borrowing money, but I think it is objectionable to create machinery that will enable people to borrow money from a bank and that at the same time will be different from any other methods of borrowing. If the Minister of Finance will give the banks power to lend money on such security as is mentioned in this resolution, letting them take such security as may be in compliance with the laws of the different provinces in which the banks are doing business, I think he is going as far as he can be expected to go, and I do not see any necessity for going any further. I understand the deficiency in the Bank Act was that banks were not permitted to lend money on security of this character. That being the case, of course, there is a handicap, but this legislation removes that disability and says to the bank: If your directors and managers are willing to lend money on security of this character, you have authority to do so, taking such security as you may deem advisable, subject to the laws of the province in which you are doing business. That is as far as we ought to be asked to go, and we should not be creating any machinery that will put the bank in a superior position to a private individual who may have money to lend. My hon. friend from North Simcoe (Mr. Currie) speaks of loan sharks. There may be such people, but there are other people who are honest, who have money to lend and who sometimes are willing to lend it out at a lower rate of interest than the banks. If a man who has a few thousand dollars in his possession is willing to lend it on security of this kind to a farmer, why should a bank have a private lien so that it is put in a superior position to the private individual? I think we are creating unnecessary difficulties. Banks are well equipped to do business. Their directors and managers are the very best men they can secure; they have the best legal advice obtainable, and if they have power to lend money on this class of security, that is all they should ask from this Parliament. They should bear the burden of looking after the security and complying with forms and proceedings just as other businesses in the various provinces must do. I am strenuously opposed to going any further than that. If you place an execution in the hands of a sheriff in any province of Canada, that sheriff, if he is a careful man, may go to the registrar and see if there is anything on record against the personal property of the man against whom the execution is issued. If there is nothing against the property, he has no excuse for not levying. but under this legislation, if it goes into force, there may be a private lien, and a man may go through the whole process of the sheriff's sale and the whole thing may be abortive because the sheriff could not give title, because there was no title in the man against whom he had the excution. This private lien renders the whole thing abortive. After the wool has gone through the factory and has been cut and tailored into a coat, it may turn out that the bank has a lien on the wool and a man may have his coat taken off his back because he had no title in it. This is most extraordinary legislation. I am not at all claiming that the minister has no power to compel or to ask the officers in the different provinces to file this lien, I will point him to a similar case in a different way; the registrar of deeds is under no greater obligation to the Department of Railways and Canals than he is to the Department of Finance, but if the Department of Railways and Canals wishes to take over land in the province of Nova Scotia, the engineer makes a plan of that land under Dominion legislation; he goes into the office of the registrar of deeds; that officer takes it; and puts it on record, and he in a way vests the title to that land in the Crown as represented by the Department of Railways. That is because the taking over of this land and the filing of the plan are incidental to the building of the railway. If the minister makes taking security on personal property an incident of banking,—and we have absolute power to deal with banking—I see no reason why the same argument would not apply, and when a man presents that authority from the Department of Finance, under legislation passed by this Parliament, I see no reason why an officer of any province would not be obliged to put it on record just as he is obliged to put on record the plan that comes to him from the Department of Railways.

Mr. CURRIE: The hon. gentleman knows it is a rule of banking that there is a difference between taking security on productive property and non-productive property. Non-productive property is personal property such as jewels, furniture, and that sort of thing, and a chattel mortgage is required in order to borrow money on it; but for productive property, such as cattle, that increase in value by being fed, I cannot see any difference between that and say logs, or pig iron, or raw lumber, and I think this legislation is along the right lines. A distinction is made by foreign banks which will not lend on jewels, furniture, or anything of that kind.

Mr. McKENZIE: The hon. gentleman had no occasion to interrupt me because I knew before what he told me. All that I ask is that the banks should look after themselves as to the kind of security they will take, and all that we are called upon to do is to authorize them to take such security, and, upon such security, lend money if they are willing. In the particular part of the province of Nova Scotia from which I come no substantial farmer has any difficulty in getting the money he requires. Of course we have no large cattle ranches such as exist in the West where such legislation would be serviceable.

As far as publicity of the form of security taken is concerned, there should be no discrimination in favour of the bank. If the minister comes to the conclusion that he cannot force the officers to put this form of security on record, this legislation should not go through at all, and the banks should be left to take security in any such form as they deem advisable, after consultation with their legal advisers.

Mr. TURRIFF: What is the opinion of the farmers' organizations with regard to this legislation?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I believe they are in favour of it. Speaking from memory, the matter was first brought to my attention by the United Farmers of Alberta. My hon. friend will pardon me, I hope, if I first reply briefly to the hon. member for North Cape Breton. I think he is probably correct in stating that the Dominion Government could designate a provincial official as the party to file the form of assignment provided for in banking legislation. The matter, however, does not rest there. In the legislation of the several provinces there are usually additional safeguards thrown around chattel mortgage transactions. In some of the provinces, for instance, it is provided that there must be an affidavit of bona fides, and filing must take place within a certain number of days. In some of the provinces it may be the clerk of the county court who receives and files the chattel mortgages, and in others a different officer. I hope my hon. friend will take it from me that we have considered that phase of the matter very fully, and that there are very great difficulties indeed in the way of drafting Dominion legislation providing for the registration of an assignment such as is provided for in this legislation, if it is to be in accord with the legislation of the several provinces. This matter has been given the best consideration by the farmers, I believe, and especially by the representatives of the banks at Winnipeg, who have had frequent conferences with the farmers, and who desire to promote as far as possible the livestock industry. I shall be very glad to have all these matters most carefully considered when the Bill is before the Banking and Commerce Committee. I do not want to be responsible for legislation that will do any harm to creditors, but I do think that our legislation must be more and more advanced as the country itself advances. I think that what were regarded as necessary safeguards to the public, say a few years ago, may be unnecessary to-day, having regard to the changed conditions in agriculture and in business. The farmer will more and more get into the habit of doing his business with the bankers, and paying his grocery and other bills by cheque, just as business men do; in other words, farming will become more and more a business. We must not conclude that what has been true of the past must necessarily be true of the future. I think our legislation must take a step forward from time to time to meet the changed conditions, if the country is going to do its utmost along the line of agricultural development.

Let me point out what happened two or three years ago. At that time banks, while they could loan on warehouse receipts, could not make a loan to the farmer upon a pledge of the grain on his farm. We introduced legislation, first of all for one year,—I think it was introduced in 1915—under which a farmer having grain upon his premises could pledge it to the bank, just as a manufacturer can pledge his product to the bank. The question was raised at that time. What about the farmer's creditors, what about purchasers of value without consideration? Precisely the same questions that are raised to-day were raised then. However, we enacted the legislation, first for one year, and afterwards permanently, and so far as I know no untoward results have followed; I have had no complaints from any creditors that they have been defrauded by the farmers. The legislation seems to have worked out satisfactorily, and as a result the farmers have been securing loans on grain which had not left their farm, and on which they could not obtain loans previously. The banker naturally has to protect himself. When he can get a lien upon grain he will make a loan that otherwise he would not make for fear the farmer might sell the grain or some other creditor seize it. Under the legislation that was passed at that time it would be fraudulent, and consequently criminal, for the farmer to dispose of his grain in violation of his pledge. What is the difference between that and live stock? The grain farmer can pledge his grain to the bank, but at present the live stock farmer cannot pledge live stock, and the question is, shall he be allowed to do so? This Bill will enable him to do so. But we are so solicitous of the rights and so regardful of the policy of the several legislatures of Canada, knowing as we do that most of them have placed chattel mortgage legislation upon their statute books, that we provide that if the legislatures of the several provinces, or any of them, enact that this lien shall be registered by the officers in that province whose duty it is to register chattel mortgages and bills of sale, then this security must be registered, and if it is not so registered it becomes null and void. That is the intention and effect of this measure.

Mr. TURRIFF: I have no doubt that the legislation may accomplish some good, although to my mind there are some very serious objections to it. I think it is undesirable to give the banks a preferred position over other creditors. This legislation will accomplish some good, no doubt, but I do not think the Government is going about it in the right way. We have heard a great deal of late years about credit for the farmers of the West, and the local governments have undertaken to find cheaper money for the farmer in the way of farm loans. In the three prairie provinces the legislatures have made arrangements to provide farmers with money at actual cost plus the cost of administration, thereby cutting out all profit. That is going to be a boon to the farmers. What they need more particularly at this time is a bank credit for short term loans, and it seems to me that that is purely a matter of banking, though it will never be accomplished by the present chartered banks. Our banks have branches all over the country. A young fellow will go from Ottawa, say, to take charge of a branch bank in the West. He understands banking all right but he knows nothing about farming and the raising of stock, and besides he is hampered by hard-and-fast rules from the head office. I think the time has come when the Dominion Government ought to do something in the way of assisting to establish farmers' banks throughout the country from which farmers could get short term loans. But I would point out to the minister that if that were done it would be absolutely necessary to protect these farmers' banks from the chartered banks. For there is no doubt that if a bank were started for the purpose of doing only this business with the farmer, it would be only a small bank, something along the line of the state banks in the United States; and if it were not protected in some way, so that its securities could be re-discounted, it would be an easy matter for the chartered banks to do with it exactly as they do now with any new bank which starts in a small way—they make it almost impossible for that bank to succeed. So, while this legislation may be all right, while it may be a step in advance, I do not know that it is at all a solution of the problem of short term banking credit for the farmer. While it is too late, I suppose, to attempt anything in this way this session, I would suggest to the minister that the matter should be looked into between now and next session with a view to evolving some system by which small banks may be established to supply the necessary credit for the farmers in their ordinary business, particularly for the very important object for which this Bill is introduced—to enable the farmer to buy stock, feed it, and sell it again. In many cases in the West a farmer will have a good deal of poor wheat which cannot be sold to advantage, but if he is in a position to buy cattle, hogs, or sheep, and feed this grain, he may be able to make more money out of it than if he sold a crop of first-class wheat. So, while this legislation is all right, I think it is not a solution of the question, and I would urge the minister to consider the whole subject between now and next session.

Mr. MORPHY: I congratulate the Finance Minister (Sir Thomas White) on having taken a step in advance in this matter. As I understand it, this law will enable farmers to be assisted to meet conditions that probably no bank, particularly in the province of Ontario, would help him to meet. The chartered banks will have the power to advance money by way of warehouse receipt or assignment, to take a first lien, without registration of any kind. Here is a Bill that gives to the farmer an advantage that he has not had before in any province of Canada under the Bank Act, viz., the power to borrow money from the bank upon chattels upon which the bank heretofore could not loan.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The bank could loan on this security under the legislation of last year.

Mr. MORPHY: Not in the way now proposed by this Bill. The whole question, to my mind, comes to this: If the provinces wish to aid the farmers they will bring their legislation into line with what this Bill provides, especially under section 17.
