There is another aspect to this matter which it is not inappropriate to comment on when debating a resolution of this kind. Canada withdrew from her peacekeeping role in Vietnam because she became convinced that the exercise had no possibility of succeeding. I suggest that Canada, and all the other nations concerned with the situation should be under no illusions as to the very slim hope of success which attaches to the present efforts to establish a lasting peace in the Middle East. The demands of the Arab states on the nation of Israel, and the similar demands contained in the earlier United Nations' resolution, are such that anyone acquainted with the geographic boundaries of the nation of Israel as they were before the six-day war must surely understand why that nation would find it almost impossible to accept those demands. The situation has been rendered even more serious by the interjection of a new element that up to now has not been present in the long, troubled history of conflict in the Middle East. I refer to the oil boycott, which can only be described as the use of economic blackmail by the Arab states, to try and force other nations, dependent on their oil, to pressure Israel into accepting conditions which Israel has made abundantly clear she is not able to accept, because her survival is dependent, to a large extent, on her rejecting those conditions.

• (2100)

This use of economic blackmail contains the seeds of strife and animosity between nations that was not among the factors involved in the Middle East conflict before. Taking this new element into account, along with the fact that Israel, for obvious reasons, has repeatedly rejected the demands of the United Nations and the Arab states for a complete withdrawal to the position she occupied before the six-day war, in my view it is unrealistic to pin our hopes on any success coming out of the present attempt to establish peace in the Middle East. If this conclusion is valid, I hope the Government of Canada took these factors into account before committing Canadian forces to a peacekeeping role where the hope of success is certainly no greater, and may well be less, than the hope of success in Vietnam, from which Canada withdrew because we were not able to serve a worthwhile role. I hope time will prove that this conclusion is wrong, but I am very much afraid, in the light of history, that such will not be the case.

Hon. Sidney L. Buckwold: Honourable senators, I had the privilege of being attached to a Canadian delegation as a parliamentary observer during the week of October 14 to 21 of this year at the United Nations, in New York. Some of my colleagues have also had that privilege, and I am certain they found it a very interesting and stimulating experience.

It was perhaps my good fortune, from the point of view of what was going on, to be there during the height of the Middle East crisis. Although I was not there in person on the night of Sunday, October 21, when the Security Council met in the late evening, and continued well into the early hours of the morning, I watched it completely on television. The meeting was called at a time when I did not know that we would be there. I did, however, listen to the entire debate, and I experienced, along with some of my parliamentary colleagues the underlying pressure, the feelings of frustration, and then the glimmer of hope, that pervaded the atmosphere at the United Nations during that very tense week.

It was a week that could easily have ended in worldwide disaster. I do not think any of us were naïve enough to believe that it was not an explosive situation. It was very quickly obvious to all there that we were not just dealing with Israel and the Arab nations but, in fact, the superpowers, the U.S.S.R. and the United States, who were very much involved in this great, almost international, confrontation. Therefore, it was with a feeling of real relief that I and others who were there finally heard, in the early hours of that tense session of October 21-22, a cease-fire resolution adopted.

In answer to Senator Grosart's observation, the Chinese position was one of completely ignoring the vote. They refused to participate; they did not like the resolution. They made it quite clear that they did not like what the U.S.S.R. had to say, and they did not like what the United States had to say. They certainly did not like what Israel had to say. They just did not participate.

My feelings, as I listened to this and experienced the relief produced by the fact that the shooting war was, hopefully, over, were that it was important, as soon as possible, to have a peacekeeping force in the area to protect the very tenuous and fragile situation which existed—a situation which momentarily, even with the ceasefire, could have broken out again into an open conflagration, and one which would have been perhaps beyond the power of the United Nations, or anybody, to stop. This was obvious from the recognition by the U.S.S.R. that they wanted to have troops present. Perhaps the United States was not far behind. It was a very tense situation.

The point I am really leading up to is that I, for one—and, as I say, perhaps some of my colleagues—felt immediately that Canada had a role to play there. Canada, of all the nations, had a contribution to make, and I was hopeful that as soon as possible Canadian troops, with their vast experience in peacekeeping roles around the world, especially in that particular area, would be there, using their experience and their judgment to protect the situation. For this reason I was happy when the Canadian government saw fit to accept the invitation of the United Nations to participate in a peacekeeping role.

I was a little disappointed in Senator Grosart, because I know how anxious he is for peace. Yet he kept referring to "the criteria," as if saying, "We've got one, two, three: these are the kinds of things we hope will happen."

It seems to me, forgetting all the commentary, that the major objective is that we have Canadians, and others, there, who will use their good offices and their facilities to maintain that peace. I think this is really the role that Canada has. It is a reflection of our sincere desire to do our very best to contain what could be a dangerous situation, and to make a contribution to peace in the area.

I appreciate the comments of Senator Manning. He has pointed out that permanent peace is very difficult to negotiate. The United Nations Resolution No. 242 really depends on how it is interpreted. To secure borders, defensible borders, recognizable borders, for all of the participants is a very debatable point, and this is where that solution has had difficulty. Nevertheless, as the government leader has pointed out, the results have led to a glimmer of hope.

I am the first to say, along with Senator Manning, that it is a long, difficult road, but the very fact that the two parties, Israel and Egypt, have met together for the first time in 25 years, and that there has been an exchange of prisoners, shows, I think, that both sides have now come to appreciate the gravity of the situation in a much more realistic manner than they did before. The fact that they are now prepared to negotiate previous intransigent positions does lead to some hope that that peace for which all have searched can be achieved. At any rate, I am sure we all hope so.

Honourable senators, it is certainly better to have it this way than simply to say, "There is no hope, give it up." That would be a terrible attitude on the part of Canada, on the part of the United Nations, or on the part of the participants themselves. Somehow or other these problems have to be worked out. We cannot continue to have a war that is a danger not only to the parties involved but to the whole world, every few years, as has been the case in the past. Therefore, I believe the resolution in front of us deserves support.

It could be argued, as has already been pointed out, and depending on which party is in power and which party is in opposition, that these things should not be carried out in this ex post facto manner. In fact, my learned colleague, Senator Flynn, has pointed it out. But when we look at the actions of governments, both Liberal and Conservative, which have used this method, I would suggest that there are times when action is required immediately. It is possible to have a situation in which a period of two or three days can make the difference between peace and war. This, in my view, constitutes the difficulty in adopting the resolution that Senator Grosart would like to put in front of us. Sometimes this action takes place at once. My memory may be wrong, but when the situation in Cyprus arose—notwithstanding the ambivalent speech we heard from Senator Grosart, in which on the one hand he criticized and on the other hand he extolled—the Cyprus force came into being very quickly and again, I believe, on the instigation of the Canadian government to a very large extent. This was done because the situation was urgent, and because it was urgent it was done at once. I think that that is the weakness in the argument put forward by members of the Opposition.

So, honourable senators, I feel the Canadian government has once again shown its leadership in this field. It has shown that it does care, and is prepared to make its contribution as a government and as a country to the peace and future security of the world.

Hon. Paul Martin: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I wish to inform the Senate that if Senator Martin speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on this substantive motion.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Honourable senators, a number of questions have been asked, and all on the Opposition side have been united in their criticism of the government because the government has placed before Parliament a resolution somewhat after the event. They have thereby concluded that there is a violation of constitutional practice in that, before the government should permit the despatch of troops outside the country, there should be prior approval by Parliament itself. I wish to address myself to this problem first, honourable senators.

I would remind the house that on February 8 of this year we had a discussion of this problem. This will be found at pages 223 and 224 of Senate Hansard of that date. I refer particularly to the observations made by Senator Forsey, who pointed out among other things something which I hope to be able to show is the constitutional position, when he said that:

> Parliament . . . has, of course, power over the executive. But that is another matter. Parliament can advise, instruct, and limit the executive, both by statute and also by resolution. The House of Commons can remove the government, or force it to appeal to the people of the country. But Parliament cannot, and the House of Commons cannot, perform executive functions.

I understand fully the reasons for the argument put forward by the Leader of the Opposition, and also by Senator Grosart. I can very well understand at a time when the process of democratization is greater than perhaps at any other time, even this traditional executive function should be exercised only after Parliament has expressed itself, and not before the executive has taken action in accord with its constitutional responsibility. In every situation where we had established a peace force under the United Nations, or an observer force under some other auspices such as that in 1954 in sending observers and members of a truce commission to the three Indo-China countries, the action, in every case, was preceded by executive action. Parliament has not been called upon to approve the sending of observers, but where substantial numbers of armed forces were involved, the executive has made its decision in accordance with its executive function and authority, and has given Parliament an opportunity to approve or reject that decision.

In recent years this first came to the attention of Parliament in 1950 when the then Prime Minister of Canada, Mr. St. Laurent, a constitutional lawyer of great note, said:

> The intention of the government is that if any other service should be required of this special force, . . .

He was referring to the force in Korea—

> . . . which of course is not being created solely because of the Korean incident, if any police action, for instance, that has a warlike character should be required of it, elsewhere than Korea, the government of course would have to make its decision, but it would immediately call parliament, make that decision known and leave it to parliament to approve or disapprove of it.

That is exactly what we are doing here. Senator Flynn asked; "Why couldn't Parliament have been consulted before we get involved?" Senator Grosart said that Parliament should approve first. Senator Manning said it was an affront to Parliament for us to present this resolution at this stage, after the executive had taken its decision by Order in Council and announced to Parliament.

When Mr. St. Laurent made these observations, which can be found at page 495 of House of Commons Hansard of September 8, 1950, the Honourable Howard Green, who later became Secretary of State for External Affairs, asked the Prime Minister:

> May I ask the Prime Minister whether there will be a resolution authorizing the sending of troops to Korea?

And here is what Mr. St. Laurent, the then Prime Minister, replied:

> No, sir; that would be something which has never been done. The government announces to Parliament what its policy is, and asks Parliament for the ways and means to carry it out. It is for that reason that we have our appropriation bill. If Parliament does not authorize the ways and means to carry out the policy, it cannot be carried out. If Parliament, on the other hand, on any motion of non-confidence, expresses its disapproval of the conduct of the government, of course the government resigns and some other group forms a government to carry out the will of the Canadian people as expressed by their representatives in Parliament.

And I would say the same. There is nothing to prevent the House of Commons, where the tenure of the government can always be tested, from expressing its disapproval of a foreign policy decision, particularly one involving the sending of troops outside the country.

What happened in 1956 when the emergency force was set up in the Middle East? Mr. St. Laurent on that occasion—and his words will be found in Hansard of November 26, 1956—pointed out that an Order in Council had been passed by the government on November 20, several days before Parliament was called upon to deal with the matter. He then restated the view that he had expressed and which I have just quoted, a view which had to do with the Korean conflict, and continued as follows:

> That has always been the constitutional requirement and the constitutional practice, that the government has to take the responsibility of making a decision and then put itself in the hands of Parliament so that Parliament may determine whether it will provide the funds to implement that decision or whether it will refuse to provide the funds and get another government to carry out the policies that Parliament wants to have carried out.
> That has always been the position and that will always be the position so long as this party has the responsibility for public affairs in this country.

Then we had another peacekeeping operation in 1960, in the Congo—the most serious of all of the peacekeeping operations of the United Nations, and involving many thousands of troops. This happened during the time of the government of Mr. Diefenbaker. Mr. Diefenbaker had an Order in Council passed committing the Canadian government, pursuant to a General Assembly resolution, to participate in the Congo force. When Parliament debated the motion calling for approval of the government's decision there were in the Congo 700 Canadians, part of that force that had been dispatched as a result of a decision of the Government of Canada. Mr. Diefenbaker said—and his words are to be found at page 7328 of Hansard for 1960:

> Those are the two resolutions upon which action is now invited and the approval of parliament asked. The constitutional position in this regard—

And I ask Senator Grosart to listen carefully.

> —was set forth by the former Prime Minister, Right Hon. Louis St. Laurent, on November 20, 1956, when an order in council was passed which authorized the maintenance on active service of not more than 2,500 officers and men as part or in immediate support of the United Nations emergency forces in the Middle East.

Then he went on to explain why this was the case and why he found himself in full agreement as, indeed, he had been earlier with this declaration of the constitutional position, which is prevalent in this country, in the United Kingdom. I cannot conceive of any country in the world where it is not. How else could the foreign policy of the country be conducted? Mr. Diefenbaker concluded as follows:

> What have we done? What has been Canada's contribution? I simply outline it for the record without going into particulars. Following the initial request the government authorized the secondment of five Canadian officers who volunteered from the United Nations truce supervisory organization in Palestine. Three of the five are now in Leopoldville.

This was before the resolution had been decided upon in the House of Commons. Mr. Diefenbaker continued as follows:

> When it was reported that there was the risk of a food shortage the government decided to provide pork and dried powdered milk, to which reference has already been made. Then there was a request for signals and logistic support.

Just as we have in the situation before honourable senators tonight. Mr. Diefenbaker continued:

> On receiving that request, Canadian and United Nations authorities consulted as to the precise needs to be met in the Congo.
> On July 28—

This is before the resolution had been submitted to Parliament—a situation which Senator Manning said was an affront. If it is an affront tonight, it was an affront then. Mr. Diefenbaker stated correctly the constitutional practice and position. He said:

> On July 28 Canada authorized provision for the United Nations force in the Congo of up to 500 Canadian armed force personnel including a signals detachment numbering some 200, as well as a small Canadian headquarters detachment. Arrangements for sending the selected personnel to the Congo are going forward—

"Are going forward," and then these words:

> —and Parliament is now being asked to approve the action in this regard.

That is the constitutional position.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: It is not the same. The honourable Leader of the Government is mixing up the whole thing, as usual, because Mr. St. Laurent said it was not necessary to seek approval of Parliament. Now the Leader of the Government is taking the position of Mr. Diefenbaker, who was asking Parliament, but not after the whole thing had been decided.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Not after the whole thing, but after troops had been sent to the Congo.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Oh, yes. That is quite different.

Hon. Mr. Martin: No, the situation is precisely similar, because we have not yet completely complied with the request made of us by the Secretary General, any more than Mr. Diefenbaker had.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: But we have complied with most of it.

Hon. Mr. Martin: The point is that Senator Flynn says I have not stated the situation correctly. The fact is, as I have read, that Mr. Diefenbaker concurred in the position taken by Mr. St. Laurent.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: But he did more.

Hon. Mr. Martin: He concurred in respect to the situation in 1956 and then, when he was confronted with the situation in 1960, he took exactly the same course, and the only course that could be taken, as Senator Buckwold has said. If we wish to deal with a situation such as this, how else can we do it? We must act as quickly as possible, and in accordance with the request, if we wish to accept it, made of us by the Secretary General in order to make it effective just as quickly as possible.

The question was raised during the debate in question, I believe by Senator Forsey: What happens if Parliament is not sitting? This is covered in section 32(1) and section 33 of the National Defence Act, chapter 184, Revised Statutes of Canada, 1952. Section 32(1) provides:

> The Governor in Council may place the Canadian Forces or any Service, component, unit or other element thereof or any officer or man thereof on active service anywhere in or beyond Canada at any time when it appears advisable so to do
> (a) by reason of an emergency, for the defence of Canada, or
> (b) in consequence of any action undertaken by Canada under the United Nations Charter, the North Atlantic Treaty or any other similar instrument for collective defence that may be entered into by Canada.

Section 33 covers the question of prorogation, reading as follows:

> Whenever the Governor in Council places the Canadian Forces or any Service, component or unit thereof on active service, if Parliament is then separated by such adjournment or prorogation as will not expire within ten days, a proclamation shall be issued for the meeting of Parliament within ten days, and Parliament shall accordingly meet and sit upon the day appointed by such proclamation, and shall continue to sit and act in like manner as if it had stood adjourned or prorogued to the same day.

● (2130)

The purpose of that, as Mr. St. Laurent went on to explain, because it was his administration that brought in—

Hon. Mr. Flynn: What year was that?

Hon. Mr. Martin: In 1952.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: It was after 1950.

Hon. Mr. Martin: We are dealing with 1952. He brought that in, and he explained why—so that Parliament could, in such circumstances, be given the opportunity to ratify or reject the decision of the government within the terms of sections 32 and 33. This is what Mr. St. Laurent said:

> When this bill is passed—

That is, the bill amending the National Defence Act.

> —and becomes law it is the intention of the government to comply with the letter and spirit of section 33 in so far as its policy has been announced with respect to Korea. The intention of the government is that if any other service should be required of this special force, which of course is not being created solely because of the Korean incident, if any police action, for instance, that has a warlike character should be required of it elsewhere than Korea, the government of course would have to make its decision—

I repeat, "The government ... would have to make its decision."

> —but it would immediately call parliament, make that decision known—

As Mr. Diefenbaker did.

> —and leave it to parliament to approve or disapprove of it.

What could be clearer?

> I think that is the only way the Canadian people would feel they were getting the protection they expect from their representatives.

So there can be no doubt about the constitutional position. I respect the right and the view of those who say that that constitutional practice is wrong. I respect the suggestion of Senator Grosart that it should be corrected. However, I say to him that it is not possible in these situations to deal with the demand placed on the government by the Secretary General of the United Nations unless this constitutional practice, well-known and long-established, continues to be the practice in Canada.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: May I ask the honourable Leader of the Government a question? He has quoted from the National Defence Act, after the 1950 speech of Mr. St. Laurent telling us about the constitutional practice. However, under this act the government has the obligation to recall Parliament within 10 days. If Parliament is sitting at the time the government makes a decision, why not seek approval right there and then?

Hon. Mr. Martin: We have already dealt with that.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: No, you have not. You have mixed up the situation.

Hon. Mr. Martin: The Leader of the Opposition asked why Parliament could not have dealt with this matter before the government acted.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I did not say that.

Hon. Mr. Martin: The honourable senator asked why Parliament could not have been consulted before the government became involved.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: That is right. At that time it was the duty of the government to seek the approval in principle of Parliament. It did not do so. A month and a half has passed.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Senator Grosart asked me about a reduction of forces in Cyprus. There has been some misconception. I believe I saw something in the newspapers about this. The fact is that our forces have not been reduced in Cyprus because of the Middle East situation. Our forces are up to strength. The total number of troops is approximately 540.

It is true that because of the Middle East situation, Swedish, Finnish and Irish troops were despatched from Cyprus to the Middle East. It is also true that Canadian troops, together with British troops, replaced them in Cyprus. This did not in any way affect the normal responsibilities of the Canadian force, and its strength to day is up to required capacity.

With regard to the question of payment for the operations in Cyprus, it is true that some contributors pay more than others. The British are the only ones who pay their own expenses. We recover a portion of the cost of maintaining a contingent in Cyprus. Admittedly the Cyprus financing situation is not ideal, but we had no alternative. There was no money in the United Nations exchequer.

It became clear that there was going to be a war in Cyprus. Indeed, it had already begun. Turkish bombs were about to be dropped on Cyprus the very day that Parliament approved the government's decision to establish a force, which had already been acted upon, some troops having already left that afternoon.

The only way that a force could be established—and no one knows that better than I, because I was the one involved, being at that time Secretary of State for External Affairs—was for a voluntary fund be set up to be contributed to by Canada, Great Britain, the United States and some other countries, and to include participation in the force of Irish, Finnish and Swedish troops.

In order to enable the force to come into being, we were prepared to bear a disproportionate share of the cost. Looking back on that event, I consider that we did the right thing, and I believe the Canadian people agree.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: For nine years?

Hon. Mr. Martin: Yes, for nine years. Nine years is a long time. That fact disturbs me. As one who has devoted a good deal of time to peacekeeping, I say it is not good to maintain a peacekeeping force for an endless length of time. However, we were faced with a fait accompli. We are still faced with the fact that discussions between Greece and Turkey have not resolved the matter; nor has it been possible to reach an understanding between the Turkish and Greek Cypriots on the island.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: May I say—because I know that the honourable the Leader of the Government has no wish to either misunderstand or misinterpret me—that my interjection of "nine years" was not an objection to the force being there for that length of time. My view is that a peacekeeping force should remain on the job, and is completing its mission as long as it is keeping the peace. My point was that in the whole of that time we have continued to bear that heavy expense without, apparently, being successful in getting others to do the same. I am not referring to the British, because they are in an entirely different position. They are on their own sovereign bases, which is not the same league as the UN force.

Hon. Mr. Martin: I agree. Senator Flynn complained, as did Senator O'Leary the other day, that we found our association with the Poles on the International Control Commission difficult. There is no doubt that is true. Our points of view were different. However, this is not a related matter.

Poland is a member of the United Nations. It is up to any member of the United Nations, and particularly a member of the Security Council, to cast its vote as it sees fit, and, if it is a superpower, to make the non-exercise of the veto dependent upon the components of the force.

An objection to Canadian participation was taken in the first instance by the Soviet Union because Canada was a member of NATO, and there was no member of the Warsaw Pact group. The Soviet Union has a right—even though we do not agree with it—to take that position. She insisted, in the final stage, before agreeing to Canada's participation, that Poland should be represented on the force.

Were we to say to a sovereign power, a country whose vote and power of veto could have destroyed the whole effort, "We are not going to be represented on the force because Poland is a member of it?" We could not have adopted such a position. We are now consulting with Poland and the Secretary General with regard to arrangements for joint participation in bearing the responsibility for logistics. I indicated in my statement in chief the division of responsibility for the logistic operation to be maintained by Canada and Poland.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Why establish criteria?

Hon. Mr. Martin: Criteria have nothing to do with this.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: You are saying that there are no circumstances under which Canada could have said no.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Canada could have said no at any time, but I do not think Canada could have said no given all the circumstances and the criteria which we postulated, all of which, admittedly, were recognized as criteria that may be difficult to fully observe at every moment. They will be difficult. No one is going to say right now that there is full freedom of movement. There isn't. I do not know of any peacekeeping force situation that has presented absolute freedom of movement of the forces. I well remember that for two years in Cyprus, in spite of the terms of reference agreed to by the Government of Cyprus, it was not possible to get full freedom of movement.

It is true, as Senator Grosart pointed out, that one country on the Security Council has said it would not pay. That is what happened in UNEF itself. The Soviet Union and France always said that they would not pay for certain peacekeeping operations, unless the decision to establish the peacekeeping force was one undertaken by what they thought was the only body that had authority to establish such a force, the Security Council. Nevertheless, that did not prevent an advisory opinion of the International Court of Justice to the effect that this was an obligation on the part of all members. There will, undoubtedly, be some member countries that will not bear their share of the cost. It will then be up to the whole membership to consider the implications of article 19 of the Charter. That may be, as we found in 1964-65, a dangerous thing to undertake, but it may well be a position that some countries would take.

I believe I have dealt with most of the questions. Senator Manning closed his speech by saying that there was no hope for peace. Senator Manning is a man of considerable experience. He is entitled to that judgment. I must say that my nature does not cause me to take that ultimately pessimistic view. I do not think that any human situation defies solution. I believe that there are indications that in this particular set of circumstances, particularly because of the attitudes of the two superpowers, something that was not present in 1967, there is some basis for thinking that there will be negotiations between the parties; that there will be influences brought to bear that might lead to a just settlement. That is the point of view that I have with regard to this measure.

In any event, whether it is hopeful or hopeless, I believe that the course the United Nations has taken, the course that Canada, once again, has taken in pursuit of its commitment to the Charter of the United Nations, is a move calculated not only to maintain our prestige as a peace-minded country but to strengthen the peacemaking capacities of the United Nations itself.

Motion agreed to.

The Hon. the Speaker: Ordered: That a message be sent to the House of Commons to inform that House that the Senate has adopted a resolution approving the Government's decision that Canadian Forces participate in the United Nations Emergency Force in the Middle East and has filled up the blanks therein with the words "Senate and".

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Hon. Paul Martin tabled:

Statement showing Classification of Loans in Canadian Currency of the Chartered Banks of Canada as at September 30, 1973, pursuant to section 119(1) of the Bank Act, chapter B-1, R.S.C., 1970.

COOPERATIVE CREDIT ASSOCIATIONS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—THIRD READING

Hon. Maurice Bourget moved the third reading of Bill C-183, to amend the Cooperative Credit Associations Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Tuesday, November 20, 1973

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Hon. Paul Martin tabled:

Report of the Economic Council of Canada, including financial statement certified by the Auditor General, for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1973, pursuant to section 21(1) of the Economic Council of Canada Act, chapter E-1, R.S.C., 1970.

PUBLIC WORKS

ART ADVISORY COMMITTEE—NOTICE OF INQUIRY

Hon. Mr. Forsey: Honourable senators, faint yet pursuing, I wish to give notice that I will inquire of the government on Thursday next, November 22, 1973:

1. Who are the members of the Art Advisory Committee of the Department of Public Works?
2. When were they appointed?
3. For what terms of office?
4. What is the remuneration of each member?
5. What are the qualifications of each member?

I was tempted, honourable senators, to say "presumed qualifications," but I thought that would probably be out of order.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: You are always tempted; I know that.

Hon. Mr. Martin: But he is never able to do anything about the temptation.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: He doesn't know what to do about it.

Hon. Mr. Martin: He is not alone.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

MEETING BETWEEN MR. SHARP AND MR. GROMYKO—NEWSPAPER ARTICLE—QUESTION

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Honourable senators, may I ask the Leader of the Government whether he has anything to say about the news that appeared in this morning's Montreal Gazette about the meeting between the Secretary of State for External Affairs and Mr. Gromyko?

Hon. Mr. Martin: Yes. Mr. Sharp met with Mr. Gromyko and, as we know, also he is going to meet with Premier Kosygin. Mr. Sharp has had a discussion about immigration policy problems, unification of family problems, matters having to do with the Middle East. Knowing Mr. Sharp as I do, I am sure there was a very satisfactory exchange of views.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I have a supplementary question. Does the Leader of the Government think that he would have been able to avoid the answer Mr. Gromyko gave Mr. Sharp?

Hon. Mr. Martin: I saw the headline in the Gazette. I do not think it was supported by the story.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I see.

Hon. Mr. Martin: I do not think I can add anything to it.

CRIMINAL CODE (CAPITAL PUNISHMENT)

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from Thursday, November 15, the adjourned debate on the motion of Senator McIlraith for the second reading of Bill C-2, to amend the Criminal Code.

Hon. Allister Grosart: Honourable senators, my comment on the bill will be brief, which is not to say that I am not aware of the very great importance of the substance of the bill—the question of the abolition or the retention of capital punishment for certain kinds and degrees of murder.

I do not myself have strong opinions either way at the moment. I have listened to the evidence and have tried to weigh it as carefully as I could, but I must say that the arguments on neither side have fully convinced me that at the moment there is a definitive answer to the question that can be given by law. That might suggest, therefore, that I should be voting for this bill.

The bill is a compromise between viewpoints and if it were an honest compromise I would be voting for the bill. Compromise is often the best answer to a difficult question in a situation where politics is, as always, of course, "the art of the possible." However, my predisposition is to vote against the bill for a number of reasons. First, Parliament decreed that there should be a trial period when murders should be designated as capital murder or non-capital murder and that there should be certain sentences carried out under certain circumstances in each case. I, for one, welcomed that trial period. I thought at that time it was a good answer; I think it would have been a good answer if certain people, Cabinet ministers, had not frustrated the will of Parliament, which was that there should be a trial period and that there should be certain consequences for different kinds of murder.

I believe that if the Cabinet had not thwarted the will of Parliament we would be able to solve this problem today. We would have known the results of the compromise which was made, a compromise between the two kinds of murder. It is true that we might have had, and probably would have had, some executions, if such executions were warranted by the law and the very far-reaching safeguards provided by the law at the various levels of jury, judge and the Cabinet itself. I cannot, naturally, say that there were no cases in that time when the law should not have been carried out, but the evidence indicates that there was a definite decision, or a series of decisions, by the Cabinet that they would not carry out the law as it stood. The result is that we have not had a trial period.

Hon. Mr. Martin: That is not correct.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: And now we are asked to approve another trial period. It indicates to me that this bill is not the compromise that it appears to be on the surface. I said it was not an honest compromise. As I read the bill, for all practical purposes it provides for the abolition of capital punishment regardless of the law as it stands. That has been the record of the government. I must say that I would not want to be one of those who would have to make the decision in Cabinet not to commute the sentence, even where there has been no recommendation for mercy from either judge or jury. Obviously, it is a grim responsibility to place on a Cabinet, but it is a responsibility which must be there under our system of law where there will always be an appeal to the foot of the Throne. I say I would not like the responsibility, but there are many responsibilities of high office, particularly of executive office, which are onerous; the fact that they are onerous does not justify avoiding them.

There is also, it seems to me, considerable evidence that the will of the public is not in favour of this kind of back-door abolition of capital punishment. I do not want to over-stress that, because I know that we do not have in our country a system of government by plebiscite, although plebiscite has been resorted to under some extreme circumstances, at least on one historic occasion. I am not saying that opinion polls are always necessarily correct, but the evidence that I have seen indicates that a very high proportion of the public will is that the present law be carried out, that capital punishment be retained for certain degrees of murder.

Now, my eloquent seatmate has put one position, and I have great respect for it. He has said, I think publicly, but certainly to me, privately, that he will not subordinate his conscience to the "tyranny of democracy." As I say, I respect that opinion. On the other hand, we are living under a system which we call, "representative parliamentary democracy," and the assumption there is that the will of the people is to be carried out when clearly expressed through their elected representatives. I know there are other views, but it seems to me that this is what democracy is all about.

I do not deny that it is the responsibility of government—of the governors—to lead the governed and to attempt to guide public opinion in the directions which the government think are proper. I do not deny that. It is a responsibility. It seems to me, however, that if they fail in that, as they have failed at this particular time, then they have a responsibility to carry out the will of the people if they believe it to be clearly expressed. They have not carried out the will of the people, the will of the public, or the will of Parliament, so far, and there would appear to me, then, to be no reason to believe that they will do so in the future under the terms of this bill.

I have been very much impressed by the arguments put forth on both sides. I have been impressed by the evidence that the majority—the vast majority—of criminologists and social workers do not favour the retention of capital punishment. On the other hand, I have been impressed by the opinions and facts brought forward by law enforcement officers—humane law enforcement officers—and some judges, that in certain circumstances the law should provide for capital punishment for certain degrees of murder. I was particularly impressed with the arguments put forward by Senator Hastings. It was one of the finest speeches I have heard here. I was not in full agreement with him, but he came very close to persuading me to become an abolitionist. However, I went upstairs and started to think about it, and perhaps some of the old arguments came back to me, so I was not, and am not, quite convinced.

I have not always been impressed with the arguments put forward by abolitionists. It seems to me that very often, in their zeal and eagerness and emotional commitment, they have gone too far. We have had the argument, for example, that if a certain kind of murder is committed, society is to blame. Well, of course society is to blame. Society is to blame for every breach of the law, no matter at what point in the law the breach may occur. So, I am not impressed with that argument. Society is to be blamed for every theft; society is to be blamed for every illegal sit-in and taking over of somebody else's property; society is to be blamed if there is illegal picketing; society is to be blamed if we park our cars irresponsibly where they should not be. I repeat, that argument does not impress me, nor am I impressed with the argument that if capital punishment is carried out, then the government, our government, associates itself with violence. Of course our government associates itself with violence, every time it encounters violent crime. Every policeman who finds it necessary to arrest a man with a gun associates his government, whatever it may be, with violence. He is going to meet violence with violence.

I am not saying that that is an argument for meeting the crime of murder, the most serious of crimes, with violence. I am merely saying that as an argument against capital punishment it does not impress me. I would really be more impressed if those who are so concerned about violence—violence on the part of the government in executing capital punishment—were doing much more than they seem to be doing and if they were much more emotionally involved in the question of violence on television. I would like to see this tremendous drive, this tremendous enthusiasm, this zeal which has gone into the abolition movement turned against violence on television. My own feeling is that if this were the case you would save many more lives than the drive for abolition will save.

I may be asked if I am against the bill and if I am not going to vote for it, what then would I substitute? I have given this a good deal of thought, and I am afraid I come back to the position that the decision under the law should still be left with the judge and jury. I have mentioned safeguards in the law as it stands, and there are a great many safeguards. I still believe that the jury and the judge are closest to the facts, closest to the persons involved, and they are more likely to have, and, indeed, will have all the necessary evidence as to any emotional disturbance on the part of the accused, his problems, society's responsibility for the act he has committed, and so on. And in judging the man, honourable senators, they will also hear a great deal about the victim of the murder.

The main reservation I had was when Senator Hastings gave us those excellent examples which proved to me conclusively that certain murderers, who under a retentionist law would probably have been executed, can be reclaimed and rehabilitated. I accept that evidence, and I accept his plea that where this is possible a second chance seems to make a great deal of sense. But then I found myself thinking of the victims. They had no second chance. And this, it seems to me, is the kind of look at this problem you will have when a case is considered by a judge and jury.

I am all in favour of the retention of all the present safeguards, but under the circumstances existing and for the reasons I have given, my disposition remains, and will remain until I hear the final speeches on this bill, to vote against it.

Hon. Josie D. Quart: Honourable senators, may I first of all congratulate the sponsor of this bill, Senator McIlraith, for his clear explanation of its provisions. It was a very difficult assignment, and, I might add, a very thankless one, because Bill C-2 has not received general approval of Parliament or of the public.

Honourable senators, I assure you that I am no expert on the controversial issue of capital punishment, and with all the discussions pro and con, right or wrong, and all the quotations from the Bible being used right and left, one becomes very confused. However, one must arrive at a decision and vote for or against the bill according to one's conscience.

There is no new viewpoint that I can present which has not already been used repeatedly in the speeches in this chamber, the House of Commons, surveys, public forums, et cetera. All the traditional discussions for and against the death penalty have been aired. The debates on capital punishment have raised deep-rooted emotional feelings. Even members of the same family, such as my own, have different convictions. In my opinion, one of the strongest arguments against a return of capital punishment is the danger of executing an innocent person. No miscarriage of justice could be more dreadful and frightening to contemplate. But what shocks me most in many cases is the misplaced sympathy for the murderer, who does not deserve any, and the apparent lack of concern for the victim or victims and their families. The families are the ones who are left to mourn the loss of a loved one. They are the ones who deserve our sympathy and consideration, yet they are rarely mentioned. We talk about the value of life, yet what about the value of the life of the person who has been murdered?

In reviewing the suspension of capital punishment it would seem that according to the most recent polls and surveys the general public, the ordinary citizens, strongly favour restoration of the death penalty. I understand the latest survey indicates that 80 per cent are for capital punishment. It is undoubtedly the opinion of those who favour the death penalty that convicted murderers are a menace to society and rather than imprisonment for life with the cost to the taxpayers, it would be preferable to execute them and be done with it. That sounds very callous, but I have been told by those who deal with prisoners and parole that the murderer sentenced to life imprisonment, which now would be approximately 20 years, would prefer the death penalty. That seems difficult to comprehend, for my choice would be that while there is life there is hope. Capital punishment should not necessarily mean hanging, the electric chair, or the gas chamber. A more humane method should be adopted, such as an injection, as was suggested in the other place by Mr. Allan Lawrence.

Despite the fact that this bill is considerably more stringent than that passed in 1967, it is still the belief that in the future the Cabinet will continue to commute all death sentences, as has been the practice for the past 11 years. Early parole, at approximately 10 years, is now also taken for granted.

It is true that the person who commits a murder of passion because of jealousy, drugs, alcohol or fear for one's own life is guilty of a crime, but no reason whatsoever gives anyone the licence to commit murder. However, if the judge and jury recommend clemency in certain cases, the government would be justified in giving such recommendations sympathetic consideration. The retentionists claim that the death penalty is a deterrent, and I believe it could be a deterrent. However, it is an accepted fact that in the case of many murderers it is quite impossible to deter. They cannot be prevented from committing murder by either the threat of death or life imprisonment. These are the murderers who are guilty of deliberate, premeditated killings of the most brutal type. However, according to an eminent criminologist, Professor Bachelor of the University of Toronto, the death penalty has failed as a deterrent.

I recently read an article in which the author endeavoured to prove the failure of the death penalty as a deterrent. He referred to the reign of Henry VIII of England, during which over 72,000 thieves went to the gallows. Yet there was no reduction in crime. The penalty for pickpockets was death, and they were hanged publicly as a deterrent. But when the public thronged to the gallows to witness a hanging, the pickpockets in the crowd did a thriving business.

Perhaps it would be logical to defeat this bill in the Senate and recommend that a committee be set up without delay, with authority to examine fully qualified experts and to study all ramifications of this controversial problem. One wonders why the government did not set up such a committee at least two years prior to the expiration of the amendments to the Criminal Code in December 1972. Most studies argue that statistics provide inconclusive findings to judge the deterrent effect of the partial ban on capital punishment. This has been contested by others, but no final consensus exists to date.

Bill C-2 satisfies neither the abolitionists nor those who believe in capital punishment. It is an attempt to bridge the gap between abolitionists and retentionists, but without much success. Therefore, after serious reflection on the numerous viewpoints, I cannot support this bill for renewal of the five-year plan.

Hon. John M. Macdonald: Honourable senators, it is not my intention to speak at any length on this bill. When practically the same bill was introduced in 1967, I voted in favour of it. However, I am not in favour of the present bill, and I propose to place on record the reasons for my voting against it.

As honourable senators will recall, at various times I have spoken in this chamber against capital punishment. I am wholly and totally opposed to it and have been for many years. I recall the first time that I heard a man condemned to death. I was a law student at the time, and in those days we were encouraged to attend the courts as much as possible. On one occasion a man had been convicted of murder. The judge informed him that under the law he had no alternative but to sentence him to death. The sheriff then placed on the head of the judge a small square of black cloth, and the judge uttered those dreadful words which were used at that time and which may very well be in use today. He said, "Prisoner at the bar, you shall be taken hence to the place of execution,"—here he mentioned a certain day—"and you will there be hanged by the neck until you are dead." The judge then added a pious good wish that God might have mercy on his soul.

It was at that moment that I began to say to myself, "This is wrong." I felt that no one man should have the power to condemn another to death, that no human being should be condemned to be led to execution like cattle in a slaughter house.

Honourable senators may say that this was an emotional reaction. I agree. But that emotional reaction served to awaken in me an interest in the subject. I have studied the subject to the best of my ability, and after examining the facts I have reached the conclusion that capital punishment is wholly wrong. I have listened to the speeches made in the Senate. I have read those that I did not hear, and those that were made in the House of Commons. Honourable senators, none of those speeches have weakened my conviction that capital punishment is wrong. Indeed, if anything, they have strengthened it.

Mention was made of sympathy being accorded the victim. Certainly, I have no sympathy for murderers. I have no sympathy for criminals. I have no sympathy for the viewpoint which says that society is responsible, that our educational system or our social system is responsible, or that we all share in the guilt of the murderer. Nothing of the kind. There is no validity in that viewpoint.

I believe that each man is responsible for his own actions. If he is responsible, he must, of course, bear the consequences. But the consequences should not be death. We have heard it argued that society, by executing criminals, is seeking vengeance. Again, I say, there is no validity to that argument.

I hesitate to say anything about some of the speeches made in this debate, but we have heard it said that there should be a more humane way of killing people. That leaves me cold. There is no such thing. It is not the act of killing, in any event; it is the mental anguish which is present between the time the sentence is handed down and the execution carried out.

A humane way of killing people! I remember reading where one of the states in the United States did that very thing. They were going to give some kind of poisonous injection. They did it all right, but the poor wretch they executed had gone mad because he was afraid to sleep. I have read about the gas chamber executions in the United States where the poor wretches were afraid to take a breath; they were half dead trying to hold their breath so that the poisonous gas would not get into their lungs. That is a humane way of executing people? Perhaps a humane way would be to hit them on the head with a heavy object when they are not looking. I know of no other way.

Honourable senators, I am not going to go into all the reasons which made me an abolitionist. However, I do say that nothing is gained by executing a murderer, and nothing is lost by allowing him to live. From listening to the speeches already made in this debate, the one thing that we must realize is that both sides are actually motivated by the same principle. Both sides want to protect human life. We believe in the sanctity of human life. Those who are retentionists and those who are abolitionists have the same purpose, but we hold different views as to the method.

This bill is a compromise. For five years now we have had this partial ban in effect. Yet, we say we know no more now than we did in 1967. In another five years on ten years or more we will be in exactly the same situation. Let us have no more of these trial periods. Let us make a decision now. We are told that the public opinion polls point to the retention of capital punishment. I do not believe that for a moment. If these polls say that the people of Canada want to kill murderers, then let's go right to the people themselves. Let's have a referendum on it. Then we would know just what Canadians want. If you take a poll in an area shortly after there has been a particularly brutal murder in that area, everyone is going to say, "Yes, hang the so and so." Public opinion changes practically from day to day. If we were to have a referendum, then those on both sides could carry their case right to the people.

As I said before, this bill is a compromise. It brings to mind the old saying that half a loaf is better than none at all. I suppose that is the most incorrect assumption that has been given in a long time. I was reading just the other day in another connection that to go on the principle that half a loaf is better than none at all is fatal for great causes, because the half loaf destroys the appetite; it destroys the keenness of interest in obtaining the full loaf. This is what has happened in regard to capital punishment. Over the last five years the drive to abolish capital punishment has bogged down. We no longer have that keenness of interest. My view is that if we defeat this bill and go back to the law as it was before the first moratorium—and as it is right now, for that matter—there would be a new vigour put in the drive to abolish capital punishment, and all those who are interested in the abolishment of capital punishment would work harder than ever to bring about that worthy objective.

Hon. Donald Cameron: Honourable senators, my remarks on this bill will be brief. I do not think that any debate in the Senate has been of a higher standard than the one to which we have listened over the past couple of weeks on capital punishment. It has been a fine example of the members of this chamber speaking from the conviction of their consciences, regardless of what point of view they took.

I was particularly pleased with the presentation of Senator McIlraith, who gave an excellent analysis of the bill. I was equally impressed with the presentation of Senator Lang, and when he was speaking I felt that I might support the position he took. I have also read with interest the presentation of my good friend from Calgary, Senator Hastings. There are none in this chamber, and very few people in Canada, who have made it their business to examine our penal system, with all its defects, more thoroughly than Senator Hastings. We owe him a great debt for what he has done.

I have waivered back and forth trying to determine what position I would take if it came to a vote on this bill. One of the conclusions I have come to, although I know there are people who hold a contrary view, is with regard to capital punishment as a deterrent. Unquestionably, it has been demonstrated over and over and over again that capital punishment is not a deterrent. If we accept that thesis, why go on with capital punishment, even in limited cases? One can understand the emotional involvement of people who have suffered because of a murder committed by some individual, whether in his right mind or not, but I return to the thesis that if it is demonstrated that capital punishment has not been a deterrent, then I think at this stage of the twentieth century we are not justified in carrying on with it under any circumstances.

I have therefore come to the reluctant conclusion that I am in favour of abolition without any qualifications. If this bill happens to be carried in that context, I think we will come up with a new set of rules with respect to the treatment of people who are convicted of capital murder, with a view to determining what is the most effective and best kind of penalty for them to expiate their sins against the state. That is all I have to say.

[Translation]

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, this bill invites us to go back to the situation we were in between January 1, 1968 and December 31, 1972, pretending that an additional trial period is needed.

Such is the substance of the bill, as the sponsor recognized it himself; here are the words of Senator McIlraith, which I quote from page 1072 of our Hansard:

[English]

> Dealing with the subject matter of the bill itself, it will be understood from what I have said that basically this is an attempt to return to the state of the law as it was between 1967 and 1972, and by instituting a further 5-year trial period.

[Translation]

Incidentally, I wish to congratulate Senator McIlraith wholeheartedly for the exhaustive explanation he gave us. His experience in that matter enabled him to deal admirably with this subject.

To evaluate the bill, we should recall that the act, which was in force prior to 1968 and again from January 1, 1973 created two kinds of murder: capital murder, that is premeditated murder, and non-capital murder, that is non-premeditated murder or a crime of passion.

The act specifies that capital murder is punishable by death; in all other instances, it provides for life imprisonment.

The legislation adopted in December 1967, implemented through 1968 to 1972, abolished the distinction between capital and non-capital murder. It has been replaced by another based upon the personality of the victim, where capital punishment is imposed in the case of policemen and prison guards. This is an arbitrary and unwarranted distinction since the victim is often chosen by accident.

However, we should recall that this legislation was introduced as a first step towards total abolition of capital punishment. That was the position I took at the time and that is why I supported the bill although I criticized its presentation and its procedure.

I quote from page 669 of the Debates of the Senate for December 14, 1967, which summarizes my opinion:

> Now, because I am not convinced of the deterrent effect of capital punishment, because this penalty is so irremediable that it is absolutely final and definitely without appeal, because the value of the principle that grants society the right to put an individual to death may be questioned, I prefer abolition. The slightest doubt as to the principle should, in my humble opinion, dictate this conclusion.

I have not changed my mind. On the other hand, how can I support a new trial period for a system which I find, as I have said, absurd in its principle? How can I accept a second trial period when, in practice, the first period involved no trial since the government commuted all death sentences?

The government is telling us: this bill does not involve politics since all parties have agreed that the vote would be free for all members of Parliament.

This is true, but what is equally and clearly true, as was shown in the other place and as will be shown here when we vote, is that the government does not wish this bill to be defeated. This bill is a compromise to prevent Parliament from really expressing its opinion about the principle of abolishing or retaining the death penalty.

The government obviously fears that, in order to reflect the opinion of the Canadian public, the Senate and the House of Commons will refuse to abolish the death penalty. The public is in favour of retention while the government is in favour of abolition, not only in practice but also in principle. This is indicated by the efforts made in committee by the Solicitor General to move an amendment which would have resulted in abolition.

The government is afraid to show its true intentions.

Unlike in 1967, this bill can no longer be considered as a step towards abolition. It is the 1968 to 1972 status quo which is favoured not only for another five-year period but the bill provides that it might become permanent since clause 10—which nobody mentioned to date—states that Parliament could, through a joint resolution of both Houses, extend for an indefinite period of time the duration of the provisions requiring the death penalty for the murder of a policeman or of a prison guard.

I repeat that this is a situation contrary to the principle of abolition which will be added to a policy of automatic commutation of the death penalty and which permits the government to violate the law which we are requested to adopt.

I hope to force the government to show frankness, I will therefore vote against the bill.

Someone might ask about the consequences of the bill being defeated.

We would be back to the logical distinction between capital murder and non-capital murder. However the government will keep on commuting all death penalties because I do not see how any government could allow an execution to take place when we recall the commutation granted over the last ten years to the most heinous murderers: for instance, Marcotte who dressed as Santa Claus and killed policemen in cold blood and loathsome Dion who sacrificed four young boys to his lowest instincts.

Inevitably the day will come—which doubtless is not so far away—when the government must accept that the law be fitted to reality since reality can no longer submit to the law.

The government will then have the courage which it does not have today and submit legislation that will definitely abolish the death penalty.

If an amendment adopted by the committee could have this result, on third reading I would support the bill thus amended.

In the meantime I cannot admit the absurd, hypocritical and unlawful solution proposed by the government.

[English]

Hon. Norman McL. Paterson: Honourable senators, I should like to say a few words, though I cannot speak too strongly against this legislation. I think every senator would like to do something to prevent murder. In my opinion, murderers are generally cowards; they murder women, they murder children and they murder defenceless old people. Anything we can do to prevent that should be done.

We have had a considerable number of years of absolute abandonment of capital punishment. No evidence has been produced, that I know of, to show whether capital punishment is a preventive or not. Why give this a trial for five years more to see what happens?

Hon. Mr. Flynn: We have tried it.

Hon. Mr. Paterson: That is the way I feel about it. I propose to vote against this bill.

Hon. Andrew E. Thompson: Honourable senators, I should like to have an opportunity to explain why I shall vote against this bill. I shall do so because I am an abolitionist. On the basis of reading some of the abolitionist speeches, I can agree completely with Senator Grattan O'Leary that his fundamental basis for voting against the bill is his strong conviction for the sanctity of life.

[Hon. Mr. Flynn.]

Every senator in this chamber is concerned to ensure the protection of society and, therefore, as the last speaker said, to try to prevent murder. I am not convinced, as other speakers have said they are not, that capital punishment is a sufficient deterrent to murder. I myself question that the fear of capital punishment weighs heavily with those who value human life cheaply. Indeed, some of their actions show that they value their own lives cheaply. I think of such murderers who with flashing guns will try to hold up a bank and almost enjoy the excitement of gun battles during a dramatic holdup. For them the question of an effective deterrent may be the sentence to a long period—and I mean a very long period—in jail, with hard labour.

It seems to me that few of us have been completely convinced by statistics concerning the deterrent effect of capital punishment. It would be a complex job for us to analyze the statistics. Some senators suggested we should continue with this present bill, and do some real in-depth research studies. The last speaker suggested we should retain capital punishment and conduct research. I am an abolitionist so I would say, let us do away with capital punishment and then engage in such research study.

I certainly have been swayed by the argument towards compromise. As realistic politicians, in that sense, we are aware of the mechanics of government and that compromise is the art of the possible. I am fairly sure that my vote against this bill will not cause its rejection. There is a point where each one of us must stand by his own convictions, even though that may not be the will of the people of Canada. There is a fundamental point where we have to stand up and vote according to the way we feel in our own consciences. Even if this should not deter the will of the retentionists of Canada, I still feel that it is my duty as an abolitionist not to vote for any measure of capital punishment. Therefore, I shall not vote for this bill.

Hon. George J. McIlraith: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: I remind honourable senators that if Senator McIlraith speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate.

Hon. Mr. McIlraith: Honourable senators, in closing the debate on second reading I am quick to acknowledge the intensity of thought that was given to this subject by those who spoke, and, furthermore, the intensity of their feeling. It must be obvious to all that each senator has his own convictions. In nearly all cases, each personal conviction has been slightly different from that of any other senator.

I wish to congratulate my colleagues on the thought they have given to this question, and I thank them for expressing their views on it. I am quite sensitive to the fact that I will not be able to change their vote on the bill by any argument. Nevertheless, I would feel remiss in my duty if I did not make some comment on the debate, in the hope that we may get a clearer and better vote than sometimes was indicated by some honourable senators. In other words, there were many excellent speeches on capital punishment, but some seemed to contain a slight departure from the logic of their argument when the honourable senator concluded his speech by a statement as to how he intended to vote on the bill.

In any event, while recognizing the quality of the debate on the question of capital punishment for murder, we must come back to what we are actually considering now. We are considering a bill which, if I may say so, is somewhat narrow in scope.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Narrow or broad?

Hon. Mr. McIlraith: This bill respecting capital punishment is not simple in form. I do not know if abolitionists or retentionists would agree on that. It is a request, if you like, for the continuance of a law on the subject which was in force for five years, from the end of 1967 to 1972. In essence, it is really simply a request for Parliament's approval of the continuance of that law.

Indeed, I see that in presenting the bill I went to some length to explain why the bill was not in a simple form. I pointed out that before the date of expiry of the original law could be changed and a new date substituted therefor, the expiry date passed because of the intervention of an election. I indicated that we could not correct that omission simply by extending the term of the earlier bill retroactively, and therefore we had to re-enact the whole bill clause by clause. But that does not alter the fact that this bill is merely a request for a continuance of that law for a further five-year period.

Incidentally, I notice in re-reading the debate that I was guilty of saying "for another five-year period," and I think some of my colleagues were equally guilty of saying that. Actually, it is a continuance from the expiry of the last five-year period for another five years, which in fact means that it will expire four years from now.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: It would have a retroactive effect?

Hon. Mr. McIlraith: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Well, that is five years.

Hon. Mr. McIlraith: Yes. I wanted to draw your attention to the fact that this bill will expire four years from now, not five years from now, should there be any misunderstanding on that point, but the honourable Leader of the Opposition is quite right in his interjection.

I have noted that a great many honourable senators stated that the bill is a compromise. I suppose in all man-made laws there is a bit of compromise. I do not know how the democratic process would work otherwise than by some kind of reconciliation process to get a consensus of duly elected or duly appointed parliamentarians. That is really what all legislation is.

It is quite true and quite fair to say that this bill is a compromise. I hope I do not see the day when in this country we have bills which are not capable in some way of being expressed as a compromise, because that would imply a dictatorship.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: But this one is a repetitive compromise.

Hon. Mr. McIlraith: Well, that is something else; but to say that legislation is a compromise does not mean that it is therefore bad legislation, because the democratic process, which I believe we all share in valuing very highly, of necessity involves us in the reconciliation of conflicting opinions after debate in order to get the best possible solutions. That is really what our process is.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I agree with that, but the honourable senator would not say that a compromise is always a solution?

Hon. Mr. McIlraith: No; I quite agree with that. What I am saying, and will say, is that the mere assertion—as was made once or twice here—that the bill is a compromise and therefore bad, and should be voted against, is not a valid or logical approach to this kind of difficult legislation. That is what I say, and I think honourable senators will have to agree with that.

If I may, since the honourable Leader of the Opposition is seeking to interject once or twice—

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Which is highly unusual.

Hon. Mr. McIlraith: I would like to do something a little unusual myself, and refer to his remarks for a bit. He went on to say that he was an abolitionist. I listened as attentively as I could, but, regrettably, for the last sentence or two of his speech I missed the translation. If I understood him correctly, however, after asserting with his usual eloquence that he was in essence an abolitionist, and then going on to make his remarks critical of the government rather than of the legislation, he said that because he was an abolitionist he was going to vote against the bill.

Well, I just do not understand that because, according to my way of reasoning, the bill, if it is defeated, returns us to a situation where capital punishment is applicable to a wider category of cases than that provided in this bill.

• (1510)

Hon. Mr. Flynn: But a more logical category.

Hon. Mr. McIlraith: I can well understand a retentionist saying, "I do not believe in this bill; I am going to vote against it," because the consequence of such a vote would be a return to a situation in which the punishment in all cases of capital murder, as it is presently defined, would be capital punishment. A retentionist can make that argument logically, because that is what retentionists believe in; but an abolitionist's making that argument is something I cannot understand—forgive me, but I cannot.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I can easily forgive you, and all the others who took the same stand that I did.

Hon. Mr. McIlraith: Senator Macdonald made what I thought was an outstanding speech on the subject of capital punishment pertaining to another bill. I recognize that it is not proper to refer to another bill, although perhaps in the circumstances I can. I listened with great interest to his speech and, indeed, eloquence on that occasion. Yet, knowing his convictions in favour of abolition, and knowing the impeccable integrity of his views on this subject, I must say that I was considerably jolted to find that he was arguing—if I understood his remarks correctly at the end of his speech today—that notwithstanding those views he expressed on the subject of abolition, he was going to vote against this bill, so that we would return to a situation of imposing capital punishment for a wide variety of murders—very much wider than is proposed by the bill—and then, in the resulting horror, get some kind of reaction against the application of capital punishment to persons to whom it will not be made applicable if this bill is passed. He would do this to get a reaction which would cause an abolition bill to be enacted. I thought that was pretty—

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Do you want me to clarify this, since you did not understand the translation?

Hon. Mr. McIlraith: It was to Senator Macdonald's speech that I was referring.

I must say that the conclusion of that argument disturbed me, because I know his main argument was in favour of abolition. I must say that I have great respect for his main argument to this point of departure.

I am going to make the simple, though perhaps unusual, direct request of those persons, who asserted clearly and strongly a view in favour of total abolition, not to vote against this bill, because if they vote against the bill they will be returning us to a situation where we have capital punishment for a wide category of cases. I do not believe that that is their position.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: It does not exist.

Hon. Mr. McIlraith: I invite them, even at this late hour, to consider and reconsider their views, or their intentions, most carefully, in voting on the bill.

Some, of course, argue—perhaps I use the word ineptly—that capital punishment is not a firm deterrent, and so on. I think I said in my opening remarks, in presenting the bill—at least, I intended to say this—that the statistical data give no help at all. Indeed, I found the studies using statistical data shockingly unhelpful. What we have today, however, is a bill which is trying to deal with a problem where there is reason to believe, at least in a certain category of murder cases, that retention of capital punishment is a deterrent. I do not refer to the large number of murders that are committed on the spur of the moment, in family quarrels, and that sort of thing, but, rather, those murders committed by persons who have, by the nature of the event or the nature of their life habits, come to take up a criminal way of life. It is my firm conviction that to that type of person whose mind has deteriorated from those sensitivities of judgment, feelings for other human beings, and respect for other human individuals, capital punishment is a deterrent. In this regard I can only repeat what I said earlier, that that belief is based on actual experience in various aspects of the law, and on an examination of the actual circumstances of certain arrests and certain murders. That is not a statistical thing. This kind of information does not appear in the transcripts of trials, and cannot be extracted by the researchers in the universities looking at the records of trials years later. It simply is not there.

You might ask, "If that is the situation in which you are seeking to retain capital punishment, why do you not express it that way?" I do not know how it can be expressed in that way, but I do know that society thrusts two classes of people into contact with that class of murderer. The first of those two classes of people are the policemen who have to do the patrolling on the beats, and go into dark alleys and stores that have been broken into, in the middle of the night, where there are tempting circumstances, for anyone who is insensitive to the taking of human life, to shoot them or do away with them. Society expects policemen to do that kind of work. That is what they are hired for, that is their task. We have put them into those conditions where they are susceptible—overly susceptible—to being murder victims.

We have also put another type of worker in our society, into contact with these persons after they have been convicted. Murderers, after conviction, are contained in institutions along with convicted criminals generally. We have the whole gamut, if I may use the term, of penitentiary guards who are charged with the responsibility, on our behalf, of doing their duty around and in those institutions.

At the same time we have—and I am happy to say it—abandoned the old practice of putting those convicted murderers and other criminals into cells from which they cannot gain access to the guards, because the guards are always outside the door. We have now a more civilized situation in which we release the inmate within the institution, and permit him to move about during recreation periods, and even to have contact with the outside. These are things that are considered to be proper in the eyes of the public generally, whether retentionist or not.

Surely those two categories of persons we have thrust into the milieu of the criminal, and who are constantly dealing with the criminal mind, are entitled to the protection afforded by capital punishment, if we believe that for those categories its retention is a deterrent. That was the principle of the first bill introduced to change the law in 1967. Admittedly it was a compromise, and that is what the compromise was all about.

In summing up the arguments made in the debate on second reading, honourable senators, I feel there are two or three further remarks I should make.

There was one thing that troubled me considerably in the course of this debate, and here I refer specifically to certain points made by Senator Lamontagne. He spoke about the royal prerogative of mercy, and then went on to discuss commutation. The royal prerogative of mercy is something in the nature of a free pardon, and is not really applicable in this situation. I do not know offhand of a case in recent times where the royal prerogative of mercy was used in a murder case. As I have said, it is rather in the nature of a free pardon, and there was a case in recent years which rather illustrates this point. A young boy pleaded guilty to a certain offence and later it was discovered that he had done so to protect his brother who, in fact, had committed the offence. When this was discovered, the royal prerogative of mercy was used to release the innocent person. That, honourable senators, is the nature of the royal prerogative, and it has no bearing in the type of legislation we are dealing with.

It was commutation that Senator Lamontagne was talking about. In the discussion on this point I felt that perhaps some basic misunderstandings may have been put forward to the Senate. There is one thing I want to make clear about the exercise of the power of commutation by the Cabinet, no matter what view one may have as to whether it should or should not be exercised in a given case, and that is that the most intensive work possible is done to ensure that all the evidence, all the court records, all the records on appeal procedures—and an appeal is almost automatic in all murder cases now—and all supplementary information that may be available is gathered, together with psychiatric reports—usually three, which are very helpful in some cases. All of this constitutes the material that is laid before the Cabinet when it is considering the question of commutation.

Honourable senators, there is a further point which I want particularly to deal with in connection with Senator Lamontagne's remarks, and I do so because it is a point which really troubled me. He was speaking about the material that is placed before the Cabinet in the circumstances, and he went on to say—and here I am reading from Senate Hansard, page 1098:

> Given these circumstances, everyone must live with its own conscience; you cannot blame cabinet ministers, who have assumed this responsibility for not respecting the wishes of Parliament. Such a charge would be extremely unfair since it would amount to a misunderstanding as to the nature of the royal prerogative.

Then at another point he went on to say:

> It is quite easy when one is not a member of the cabinet to say "You will have to restrict yourselves; you will have to set aside your conscience and your responsibility and you will rigidly carry on the will of Parliament as expressed in the legislation." Such a position is unacceptable.

That is a view of the law and of the duty of a parliamentarian that I cannot accept. That statement is wholly acceptable, and if any Cabinet minister feels he cannot accept the will of Parliament as expressed in legislation, then that member has an obligation to remove himself. Every minister of the Crown whom I ever saw working on these cases, including ministers of other governments with whom I have spoken, applied their minds to dealing with these difficult cases—and admittedly they are difficult—with the complete acceptance that they had to rigidly carry out the will of Parliament as expressed in the legislation, whatever the circumstances.

I wanted to clear up that point just in case anyone reading the record might assume that the point had gone uncorrected.

In closing, honourable senators, let me say that if it meets with the approval of the Senate, and if this bill should receive second reading—and I would ask you to ensure that it does—I shall move that it be referred to Committee of the Whole, because I think that would be the better way of dealing with it rather than sending it to a standing committee. I say this because the very nature of the legislation is something that must be of considerable concern to all honourable members.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, it is moved by Honourable Senator McIlraith, seconded by Honourable Senator Buckwold, that this bill be now read the second time. Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Senators: Yes.

Some Hon. Senators: No.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, as there is in my mind uncertainty as to agreement, I am going to ask those who are in favour of the motion to please say "yea."

Some Hon. Senators: Yea.

The Hon. the Speaker: Will those who are against the motion please say "nay"?

Some Hon. Senators: Nay.

The Hon. the Speaker: In my opinion, the "yeas" have it.

And more than two honourable senators having risen.

The Hon. the Speaker: Please call in the senators.

The Hon. the Speaker: I declare the motion carried.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time, on division.

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

The Hon. the Speaker: When shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. McIlraith: Honourable senators, I move that this bill be referred to a Committee of the Whole.

Motion agreed to and the Senate was accordingly adjourned during pleasure and put into a Committee of the Whole on the bill.

Hon Alan A. Macnaughton in the Chair.

The Chairman: Honourable senators, the house is in committee on Bill C-2, to amend the Criminal Code. May I suggest that it is usual, although it is not necessarily part of the rules, that the title stand.

Hon. Senators: Stand.

The Chairman: Clause 2. Shall clause 2 carry?

Hon. Mr. Argue: Honourable senators, I have a speech to make on this point. It would be convenient to me if the committee would rise and report progress. I am wondering if Senator McIlraith will agree to that.

Hon. Mr. McIlraith: I am quite agreeable to rising, reporting progress, and asking leave to sit again at the next sitting.

The Chairman: It is moved by Senator McIlraith, seconded by Senator Argue, that the committee rise, report progress, and request leave to sit again. Is it your pleasure to adopt the motion?

Motion agreed to.

● (1550)

The Hon. the Speaker: The sitting is resumed.

Hon. Mr. Macnaughton: Madam Speaker, the committee to which was referred Bill C-2 has taken the said bill into consideration, has made some progress thereon, and asks leave to sit again.

The Hon. the Speaker: When shall this committee have leave to sit again?

Hon. Mr. McIlraith: Next sitting.

The Hon. the Speaker: It is moved by the Honourable Senator McIlraith, seconded by the Honourable Senator Perrault, that the committee have leave to sit again at the next sitting of the Senate. Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Motion agreed to.

CANADIAN COMPANIES IN REPUBLIC OF SOUTH AFRICA

WAGE PRACTICES—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Eugene A. Forsey rose pursuant to notice:

> That he will call the attention of the Senate to the wage practices of Canadian companies operating in the Republic of South Africa.

He said: Honourable senators, I am prepared to go on with this inquiry now, but I am not sure what the disposition of the house is. It seems to me, from what has been said, that honourable senators might prefer to adjourn now, and if so I do not wish to be an obstacle to that view. I would be grateful for any enlightenment that might be offered, but I am quite prepared to go on now.

An Hon. Senator: Stand.

[The Hon. the Speaker.]

Hon. Mr. Martin: I do not think that the honourable senator proposes to take too long. In any event, I think the matter is one which is in his hands.

Hon. Mr. Forsey: If no one has any objection, I am prepared to go ahead with this inquiry now.

This matter was first drawn to my attention by some articles in the Manchester Guardian Weekly on the subject of wage practices of British companies in South Africa, followed soon afterwards by an article from the Guardian's Ottawa correspondent on wage practices of Canadian companies in South Africa.

Perhaps because of at least a semi-academic background, I want to begin by defining my terms. First of all, wage practices: I shall take that to include what the trade union movement calls fringe benefits as well as actual wages paid. Second, I have said in the terms of the inquiry, "in the Republic of South Africa." On consideration I was a little sorry that I had limited it to that extent. But there it is. I do not propose to go beyond the terms of the inquiry as stated, except perhaps to a very limited and, I think, pardonable extent. In other words, I am not talking about wage practices of Canadian companies in southern Africa generally, including the revolutionary regime in southern Rhodesia. But I am going to include—and I think this may be allowable—southwest Africa, or Namibia, as it is called by the inhabitants and the black people of Africa generally, because while the writ of the Republic of South Africa does not run there legally, de facto that territory is unquestionably under the authority of the Republic of South Africa.

That leaves out a great deal that might be said on the general subject of the behaviour of Canadian companies in the Republic of South Africa and the former territory of German Southwest Africa. That, I have done deliberately. I want to limit myself to this particular aspect of the subject. It may well be that on some other occasion it may be appropriate to discuss other aspects of the general subject. For the moment, I restrict myself to what I have put down here.

I start my discussion of the merits of this question from the assumption that all of us in this chamber disapprove of the policy of apartheid. I am confident that that assumption is, in the main at all events, justified. There may possibly be one or two honourable senators who would wish to qualify the assumption that I have made, but I think it is a fairly safe one for the great bulk of the members of this chamber. I am going to assume, then, that we all disapprove of apartheid. After all, that is Canada's official policy. I think that has been made perfectly clear at the United Nations and elsewhere.

I am assuming, also, for the moment, without prejudice, as I believe the lawyers say, that we are going to continue to invest in South Africa, and I am assuming further that Canadian companies which do invest in South Africa will, at any rate, not violate the laws of South Africa; that they will conform to that extent with the laws of South Africa. I deliberately did not say simply, "will conform with the laws of South Africa," because that might be taken to mean that they would conform in the broadest spirit and not simply in the letter. I am suggesting that any Canadian company that invests in South Africa must necessarily not break the laws of the Union of South Africa.

I am assuming, fourthly, that capitalists will be capitalists, that when they invest somewhere they expect to get a return on their money, and the highest return that they can get, within pretty broad limits, at all events. There may be limits, and I am going to suggest in a moment or two that there ought to be limits and can reasonably be limits expected by the government, the Parliament and the people of Canada. All that being said—I am not suggesting for a moment that I wish to argue with those who say we should not have any Canadian investment in South Africa or that we should boycott South African goods, and things of that sort; I am simply not discussing that—but all these assumptions being made, I venture to suggest that there are some things that we may surely expect, reasonably expect, of Canadian companies which invest in South Africa; certain decencies which we may expect such companies to observe and which, in fact, some Canadian companies which have invested in South Africa do observe, in whole or in part.

Now, what is the situation to which I wish to draw attention? I am basing myself here, first of all, on a report, a voluminous report, from a committee of the Young Women's Christian Association of Canada published this year entitled Investment in Oppression, a report which, I may add, covers a great deal more ground than I propose to deal with today.

Second, I am basing what I have to say on the report in the Manchester Guardian Weekly and, third, on some articles appearing in the Toronto Star by Mr. Nangle, a reputable Canadian correspondent who visited South Africa and investigated these matters and, indeed, if I am correctly informed, was subsequently barred from further entry to the Union of South Africa, partly as a result of what he had to say in his reports.

There are a number of Canadian companies which are particularly concerned. One is Alcan Aluminum Limited; a second is Massey-Ferguson Limited; a third is Falconbridge Nickel Mines Limited; another is the Ford Motor Company of Canada. All of those, I think, are in fact investing in the Republic itself. There are also certain others that have investments in South West Africa. These are Brilund Mines Limited, New Wellington Mines Limited and Syracuse Oils Limited. Falconbridge Nickel Mines Limited also has investments in South West Africa.

A number of other companies are concerned to some extent in investing in South Africa, though on these it is difficult as a rule to get much in the way of information. The International Nickel Company is involved to a very small extent in South Africa. I understand that it has a very small staff there engaged only in exploration, and I do not propose to say any more about that. Consolidated Bathurst Limited, De Leuw, Cather and Company of Canada Limited, Manufacturers' Life Insurance Company and Sun Life Assurance Company are also there in one way or another, but it is very difficult to get information on those, except on De Leuw, Cather, whose record appears to be rather good.

I want to add that I think the reports on which I am basing my remarks are, on the whole, balanced and moderately stated. I do not think you will find, if you look at them, that they are couched in extreme terms, that they sound like the opinions of fanatics or of people who are out to get these companies, or to engage in muck-raking. I think they show a serious concern, and they are moderately and carefully stated.

Before going into the actual conditions, I want to make clear the basic ground on which I am going to be dealing with this matter. It is arguable that we ought not to invest in South Africa at all. The strongest argument against that, it appears to me, is the argument that Canadian investment in South Africa will lead to a liberalization of the regime there, will lead to a relaxation in the policy of apartheid. I myself think that if substantial evidence could be produced that Canadian investment in South Africa was having this effect, or even was likely to have this effect, there would then be some ground for the argument, the view, that is held in many quarters, that investment in South Africa is a beneficial activity. What I want to do is to examine the facts in this case to see whether really Canadian investment in South Africa is leading to a liberalization of the regime, or is likely to lead to such liberalization.

How are these companies in fact behaving? Are they in fact behaving in such a way that the burden upon the coloured inhabitants of South Africa is likely to be lightened, and the harshness of the regime of apartheid likely to be mitigated? I think the answer is that in some cases they are and in some cases they are not. In the majority of cases it would appear that the contribution they are making to the lightening of the burden of the coloured population in South Africa is, to put it mildly, very modest indeed, if not altogether invisible.

The standards that have usually been employed for judging the wage policies of either British or Canadian companies operating in South Africa are, first of all, something called the poverty datum line, which I think is the result of investigation by research people at the University of Cape Town, the poverty datum line being a bare subsistence minimum, and secondly, the effective minimum level, which is 50 per cent higher than the poverty datum line. There is also a subsistence level of wages, which is the result of calculations by the Johannesburg Chamber of Commerce.

Let me take up these particular companies in order. First, Alcan Aluminum Limited had at the date of these reports, which date from earlier this year, some 706 black employees, of whom 703 were below the poverty datum line. None were up to the emergency minimum level of wages. Incidentally, the company made a full reply to the inquiries of the YWCA committee, but it was delayed and therefore the committee was not able to publish it in its published report and I have seen nothing further about it. If somebody asks, "Why didn't you investigate further?" I think my reply will appear rather later.

Secondly we have Massey-Ferguson, which made a full reply to the inquiries of the YWCA committee, and which in the opinion of the observers I have mentioned appears to occupy a sort of middle ground among the Canadian companies investing in South Africa; some of them are worse, some of them are better. In its case, at its Vereeniging plant it had 733 black employees, of whom 642 were below the poverty datum line. On the other hand, it had a non-European employees' committee of elected representatives, and it provided pensions, holiday bonuses and sick pay, and it had opened 21 semi-skilled and skilled jobs to black employees. It was also considering adopting the subsistence level. It had, so the YWCA report says, an average wage for black employees marginally above the poverty datum line. There may be some inconsistency between those two reports, but nothing very substantial. I assume that any such inconsistency results from the fact that they were based on figures at somewhat different dates.

The company supports an organization of, in my judgment, rather dubious character, the South African Foundation, which is a general supporter of the South African Government's policy of apartheid. This is one of the blacker marks against the company in the opinion of those who have been reporting on the subject.

The Ford Motor Company of Canada made a full reply to the YWCA committee, and by South African standards may be considered to be reasonably liberal in its behaviour towards its black employees. It has a committee, a six-man black council, of its employees. It negotiates with a union representing the non-European employees. It provides pensions and retirement benefits, sick pay, medical aid and a tuition fund, and it is trying to secure a policy of non-discrimination between white and other employees, with equal pay for equal work. It says there, with justice, that one of its difficulties is the behaviour of the union of white workers, which has a very restrictive policy, and in general supports the policy of the South African Government. So it does not feel that it is an entirely free agent in these matters, and I think this is obviously true.

In the opinion of the observers to whom I have referred, it pays the best wages to non-white workers and has the most progressive approach to assisting in the education of the children of such workers.

Its lowest wage is the equivalent of about 79 cents an hour, 18 cents above the agreed minimum. The basic weekly wage of black employees amounts to the equivalent of about $34.56, the poverty datum line by comparison being $29.96. The company pays for the primary education of the children of black employees, including the books that they need, and it pays a percentage of the cost of the uniforms the school children must wear. It provides help towards the post-primary education of the children on the basis of merit. It provides scholarships for post-matriculation education, including provision for the board and lodging of the students. It provides on-the-job training, to improve the skills of non-European workers. It got off the National Industrial Council in South Africa in 1968 and so secured total exemption from the regulations dealing with job determination. This was a progressive move. On the whole, it has a reasonably good record. I think it is safe to say that if the other companies were doing as well, the case against Canadian investment in South Africa would be substantially weaker than it is.

Falconbridge Nickel made a full reply to the YWCA Committee but unfortunately marked it confidential, so the committee felt unable to make any comment on it.

A Manchester Guardian writer, Mr. Sanger, says that the average for Falconbridge, the average wage for black workers, is below the subsistence level. He has a good deal to say about the rather bad conditions at the mine which the company has in South West Africa. I am tempted to read that but probably it would be better, at this rather late hour in the afternoon, not to go into it. I think, however, that anyone who is interested in it may look it up in the Manchester Guardian Weekly of May 26 of this year, or in the YWCA report at page 45.

Honourable senators, I want to refer to some of the other responses that were received by the YWCA committee. Consolidated Bathurst replied, and at page 44 of the report of this committee there is this observation—

[Translation]

Hon. Mr. Deschatelets: Would Senator Forsey entertain a question at this time?

He bases his intervention on studies or research contained in a report he mentioned—I did not fully understand—but does the research contained in that report refer only to the practices of Canadian companies in South Africa, or does it also refer to American companies?

Is that report you mention based only on studies of practices of Canadian companies?

[English]

Hon. Mr. Forsey: Honourable senators, the documents I am quoting from are restricted to Canadian companies. There have been previous documents on the subject applying to British companies. I dare say there are documents applying to American companies; I do not know about that. I was interested solely in what there was on Canadian companies. What the Americans do is the Americans' business; what the British do is the British business. My understanding is that there is a select committee of the British House of Commons which is now inquiring, or has recently inquired, into the practices of British companies in South Africa. I confined myself simply to the subject of Canadian companies because it seemed to me that that was the only thing that was germane to our business here.

I hope nobody is supposing that I am suggesting that Canadian companies are particularly guilty in this matter or that all the others are lily white. Anyone who has read any of the articles on British companies in South Africa will realize that this would certainly not be true, that there is a great deal to object to there and, as I indicated to begin with, it was the report on the activities of the British companies that started me on this. I said to myself, "I wonder how the Canadian companies, those investing there, would show up."

Shortly afterwards, there appeared this article in the Manchester Guardian Weekly saying that Canadian companies were just as bad. I pursued this further. That article referred to the report of the YWCA committee. I got hold of that and went through it fairly carefully. I followed also the reports from Mr. Nangle. I get—how I do not know; I never asked for it, but it comes to me regularly—a bulletin called "South African Information" from the South African Information group or some such organization which is here in Ottawa, I understand. It was there that I ran across Mr. Nangle's article. I am confining myself to these companies not because I think that Canadian companies are worse than other foreign companies in South Africa—

Hon. Mr. Deschatelets: That is not my point.

Hon. Mr. Forsey: —but simply because these are the ones I am interested in, and these are the ones I think we are concerned with. It is not our business at all to hold forth here, or to pass judgment in any way, on the behaviour of companies from other countries. At least, it is not our primary duty. We may comment, if we see fit, of course. I am grateful for that intervention by Senator Deschatelets.

On page 44 of the report of the YWCA committee there is this comment on the reply from Consolidated Bathurst:

> Mr. W.I.M. Turner, Jr., president of Consolidated Bathurst Ltd., conceded that 'South Africa along with many other parts of the world, including Canada, have social, economic and political problems.' He went on tendentiously to warn the committee about '... a certain smugness in one imperfect society judging another by its own standards' and to advise that 'if the main objective of the exercise is to see the Republic of South Africa evolve into a more racially equitable society then I would argue that any program designed to put pressure on the government of the day simply hastens their resolve.'

The word "hastens" is apparently a misprint in Mr. Turner's communication, because the committee adds in brackets the Latin word sic. That is the way he wrote it. What I suppose he meant was "simply hardens their resolve," but somebody taking the dictation muddled it.

The committee goes on:

> Mr. Turner appears to have had difficulty in conceiving that a national organization like the YWCA of Canada (or presumably, like the Churches and other agencies that are co-operating in the publication of this report) could take seriously and seek to modestly implement its policy resolutions on racial equality and social economic justice. He chose therefore to comment upon the motives of the committee by observing 'I must question the propriety of using the YWCA for such a vehicle in respect to South Africa.' Mr. Turner did not answer our questionnaire and did not provide any information on wages and working conditions of black South Africans employed in the South African operations in which Consolidated Bathurst Ltd. holds a controlling interest.

I do not feel that this is a very satisfactory kind of reply from that particular company. It is possible that the company has something better to say than that, and I should be very much in favour of its having an opportunity to say it. I will come to that later.

On the subject of De Leuw, Cather and Company, the committee has this to say, that it was one of the companies "which replied fully to the questionnaire." The questionnaire was a very comprehensive one and had 20 questions which are set out in the last page of the committee's report. The YWCA committee says:

> Mr. W. S. Malone, president of De Leuw, Cather and Company, a firm of consulting engineers, took the most consistently liberal position of those who replied to us. His firm alone supports the South African Institute of Race Relations, the major liberal research organization in South Africa which concerns itself with the documentation of race issues and the pursuit of causes which alleviate human suffering. Mr. Malone was also the only respondent who offered a rationale for investing in South Africa which went beyond an affirmation of the value of the employment thereby provided—

And he took the line that I have mentioned before, that investment from Canada is bound to be a liberalizing force in South Africa, and said that the South Africans were extremely sensitive to outside comment and they were likely to be influenced for the better by a liberal Canadian approach. I think that is all to the good.

The Manufacturers' Life Insurance Company also replied to the questionnaire of the YWCA committee:

> Mr. E. S. Jackson, president of Manufacturers' Life Insurance Company confessed: '... that I have always wondered why the YWCA has concentrated its attention on South Africa ... there are many other areas in greater need of your attention.'

● (1620)

The Sun Life Assurance Company also made a reply. Mr. T. M. Galt, President of the Sun Life Assurance Company of Canada, said the committee:

> —appears not to recognize that there are any special issues or questions relating to investments in South Africa.

This again does not seem to be a very satisfactory position for a company to take.

I want to say something very briefly about the question of ability to pay. This has not, I think, been raised by any of the companies or their defenders. I think it is safe to say—and I can give some evidence of this, but I do not think it is necessary because I doubt if anybody will challenge the statement—I think it is safe to say that the Canadian companies which have investments in South Africa are not poverty stricken. They are not saying that they cannot pay better than subsistence wages simply because they are too poor to do so. I think it is fairly evident that the facts that we have—and they are by no means complete, of course—make it fairly clear that the liberalizing effect upon South African policies of the existence of the Canadian companies and their policies in the Republic of South Africa has not been, shall I say, very marked. It seems to me it is fairly evident that they have not gone much beyond—in some cases they have not gone at all beyond—what is simply required of them by the laws of the Republic of South Africa.

There is nothing to prevent them doing rather better. They can perfectly well abide by the laws of South Africa and pay rather better than subsistence wages, as some of them do. They can perfectly well, as some of them do, set up committees of their black employees and negotiate with them or at least discuss with them their wages and working conditions and so forth. But not all of them, by any means, appear to have done so. And on the whole the record seems to me to be rather against the argument that there is a liberalizing effect of their presence in South Africa.

Finally, what do we do about this? Obviously we cannot force Canadian companies to do certain things in other jurisdictions altogether, although I suppose in a pinch we might impose some kind of discriminatory taxation upon them, or something of that sort, but it does seem to be that it is possible that this is a subject which might well be investigated by our excellent Foreign Affairs Committee following the example of the Select Committee in the British House of Commons. That investigation would not only serve to establish the facts, but conceivably it would give some of the companies which were coy, shy, reticent in their responses to the inquiries of the YWCA committee a chance to put their case fully to the public. It seems to me that this is one thing we could possibly do.

It is possible also that we could get the government to set down certain guidelines for the behaviour of Canadian companies in South Africa. I understand that this has been done in the United States.

But, myself, I feel that the situation, so far as I am able to discover, is one that is disquieting to even a moderately sensitive Canadian conscience and one which deserves further investigation, and I should very much like to see that investigation pursued by a responsible, independent, impartial, knowledgeable and competent body such as the Foreign Affairs Committee of this chamber.

On motion of Senator Martin, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Wednesday, November 21, 1973

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

CUSTOMS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Hon. Salter A. Hayden, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, reported that the committee had considered Bill C-189, to amend the Customs Act, and had directed that the bill be reported without amendment.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Hayden moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

AGRICULTURE

CHANGE IN COMMITTEE MEMBERSHIP

Hon. Sidney L. Buckwold moved, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(i):

> That the name of the Honourable Senator McNamara be substituted for that of the Honourable Senator Lawson on the list of senators serving on the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture.

Motion agreed to.

CRIMINAL CODE (CAPITAL PUNISHMENT)

BILL TO AMEND—FURTHER CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, pursuant to the order of your honourable house, I leave the Chair. The Honourable Senator Macnaughton will please take the Chair of the committee.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure and was put into Committee of the Whole to further consider Bill C-2, to amend the Criminal Code.

Hon. Alan A. Macnaughton in the Chair.

The Chairman: Honourable senators, the house is again in Committee of the Whole on Bill C-2, to amend the Criminal Code.

Honourable senators will recall that when the Committee of the Whole rose yesterday afternoon the title and clause 1 were read and postponed. Clause 2 was read and after debate the committee reported progress and asked leave to sit again.

Shall clause 2 carry?

Hon. Mr. Argue: Honourable senators, I feel that the Senate should take a clear-cut position on the question of abolition of the death penalty. I was pleased yesterday that the Senate approved this bill in principle by a substantial majority, and thereby assured that, by and large, there will be few if any persons who will suffer capital punishment during the period provided for in this legislation.

I think every argument that can be advanced in favour of abolition has been advanced. It seems to me that progressive nations in the world are moving toward complete abolition of the death penalty. I believe that we should take the position that the death penalty should be totally abolished under this legislation. In my view the death penalty has not proven to be a deterrent, and although this clause under consideration provides for the exacting of the death penalty in the case of murder of police officers or prison guards, even in this instance there is no convincing evidence that this particular provision constitutes a deterrent. There is the further consideration that as long as capital punishment is provided for, no matter how small the area covered, there is always the possibility of error and of innocent people being hanged. All who have taken part in this debate in this chamber have expressed interest in the protection of the public. But Senator Hastings did the Senate a great service when he placed certain facts on the record, and I can do no better than to quote his own words which are to be found at page 1127 of Senate Hansard for November 14:

> The National Parole Board has released 152 men with death-commuted sentences, and 56 men for non-capital murder, making a total of 208. Of that number 21 have had to be returned to custody, not for murder or for any act occasioning loss of life but for violation of their parole, which carries with it many restrictions. It is well to remember that these men released on parole are, in fact, on parole for life and can be returned to the institution at any time. As I have said, 21 were returned to custody, and that amounts to about 10 per cent of the total, which is a far better average than that of any other area of inmate parole. Seventeen died on parole. That makes a total of 38, which means that in Canada 170 men remain on parole who have served their sentences for murder or non-capital murder, and not one, let me repeat, not one, has inflicted any injury or caused loss of life since.

The arguments in favour of complete abolition by an appropriate amendment to this clause and the consequential amendments that would flow through having removed the death penalty—

• (1410)

Hon. Mr. Walker: Mr. Chairman, may I ask my learned friend a question? We do not know what you are talking about. We have discussed this question of capital punishment at great length. Would you be good enough, if I am not mistaken, to follow the rules and move your amendment, then we will know what you are talking about.

Hon. Mr. Argue: Well, my honourable friend has had great parliamentary—

Hon. Mr. Walker: Have you any objection to doing that? Never mind about being personal.

Hon. Mr. Argue: I am not being personal. My honourable friend has great parliamentary experience, but I suggest to him that in discussing the arguments against the death penalty one is very much in order on clause 2 of the bill.

Hon. Mr. Walker: May we have a ruling from the Chair?

The Chairman: Senator Argue, may I suggest that it would be helpful to the Senate as a whole if you would move your amendment and then, perhaps, give some reasons why you think it is in order?

Hon. Mr. Walker: Then get personal, afterwards.

Hon. Mr. Argue: I am quite happy to comply with the Chair.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a point of order. I do not like to interrupt my honourable friend and neighbour, but clause 2 substitutes for the previous section in the act, and starts with these words:

Murder is punishable by death . . .

And I suggest that, the principle of the bill having been passed by the Senate, it is not in order to discuss the question of abolition or retention at this time.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: It is covered by rule 65(1)(c).

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Oh, no.

The Chairman: Senator Argue and honourable senators, it is a little difficult to rule on something which theoretically we have not seen.

Hon. Mr. Walker: What are you talking about?

The Chairman: In point of fact the honourable senator was kind enough to distribute copies of his proposed amendment. Particularly, he sent a copy to me yesterday, but I do think it would be helpful to the house if he were allowed to at least introduce the amendment, following which we will see whether or not it is in order.

Hon. Mr. Argue: I am quite prepared to follow your suggestion, Mr. Chairman, but I do wish to affirm that since this particular clause is the penalty clause for murder in certain instances, it would be unheard of to attempt to cut off the statements of an honourable senator with respect to the particular clause. I have been arguing against this clause. I am quite happy to take the suggestion of the Chairman but I wish to say that I feel that I was very much in order, and the rules certainly would suggest that such is the case.

I wish to move an amendment which would carry the abolition of capital punishment completely and without any question. We now have before us clause 2, and an amendment to clause 2 having to do with the complete removal of capital punishment would require consequential amendments to a number of clauses and the tidying up of the whole bill. This would involve a number of further motions if this should carry.

I move, seconded by the Honourable Senator Forsey, that in clause 2 of the bill the committee strike out the words following the word "repealed". Once you put the motion, Mr. Chairman, I will be quite happy to speak to the question of being in order.

The Chairman: It is moved by the Honourable Senator Argue, seconded by the Honourable Senator Forsey, that in clause 2 of the bill the words following the word "repealed" be struck out.

Is it the pleasure of the committee to adopt the motion?

Hon. Mr. Argue: I believe you suggested, Mr. Chairman, that I should comment on the question of this amendment's being in order.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: But the chairman has to put the question.

Hon. Mr. Argue: I understood that he had.

The Chairman: I have a copy of the motion before me. For the instruction of the house as a whole, it refers particularly to clause 2. It says:

Strike out the words following the word "repealed".

In effect, it repeals the whole of clause 2. The other parts of the honourable senator's amendment are really consequential, if we succeed in striking out the words after the word "repealed". It would be helpful if the honourable senator would explain why he thinks the amendment is in order.

Hon. Mr. Argue: I wish to state a number of reasons why I believe the amendment to be in order. Under the bill, we are providing for the abolition of capital punishment in perhaps 95 per cent of cases of murder. My amendment would merely extend that provision to provide for complete abolition of capital punishment.

It has been stated that the principle of the bill lies in the reinstatement of a provision which had changed the law for a period of five years—a so-called trial period. That trial period has elapsed. We are now endeavouring to provide for a new set of circumstances with a new bill, one that is so new and so far reaching that it requires some 10 pages of amendments to effect what one senator said was merely a simple extension of that trial period.

I have studied the ruling of the committee chairman in the other place, and noted that the Solicitor General stated that in his opinion the amendment before that committee was in order. I suggest to honourable senators who may be worried about the position of the government that the government was, by way of the Allmand amendment, in fact, in favour of the total abolition of the death penalty. I suggest that my amendment is in order because for many years the Senate has not hesitated to be master of its own rules, or to make its own decision on the matter of rulings, even though from time to time it has been contrary to the decision of the House of Commons.

On one occasion, Senator Sparrow introduced a bill amending the Farm Improvement Loans Act. That bill had the support of the Senate. It was in order in our chamber, but was ruled out of order in the other place. I suggest, therefore, that we can and should follow our own rules, and interpret them in our own way. The Senate has not hesitated over the years to pass many substantial amendments to government legislation. According to the volume entitled The Modern Senate of Canada 1925-1963 by F.A. Kunz, this was done to a total of 289 bills that were amended. There were 36 contentious amendments, which were resolved by various means. Fourteen were resolved by compromise, one by yielding of the House of Commons, 13 by yielding of the Senate, five by free conference, and three by being lost.

My point is that over the years the Senate has not hesitated to move important and far-reaching amendments. That, of course, is the very reason for the existence of the Senate. The life of the Senate depends upon the Senate's being able to take an independent position. I believe we can take an independent position—we can have a vote—under the rules that govern our procedures.

A letter was written by Senator Martin to the newspapers recently in which he made reference to the work of the Senate and the way in which the Senate has brought about major amendments to legislation. I believe that what he said in that letter has a very important bearing on the question of whether or not the Senate should in fact make major amendments. I quote, in part, from his letter of October 12, 1973, to the Editor of the Ottawa Journal:

> In the 1968-69 Session, the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee, under the chairmanship of Senator Hayden, examined and reported on the White Paper on Anti-Dumping and a bill introduced in the Senate entitled: "An Act respecting Investment Companies". The amendments to this bill, recommended by the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee, were so extensive that an entirely new bill emerged. Subsequently, it was introduced in the House of Commons in the session of 1970-72 in the form suggested by this Senate committee and it was passed by both houses.

So, the Senate is prepared at times to move far-reaching amendments, as Senator Martin points out in his letter. It may be argued that this amendment is beyond the scope of the title of the bill. The bill is entitled, "An Act to amend the Criminal Code." The scope of the bill is very far-reaching. It is not confined to a narrow principle.

I have in my hand May's Parliamentary Practice, 18th edition, in which the author makes comments on the powers that the house has to deal with amendments. I quote:

> Again, notwithstanding the rule which forbids the moving of an amendment which is destructive of the principle of the bill, there is nothing to prevent a Committee of the whole House from negativing a clause or clauses, the omission of which may nullify or destroy the bill, and reporting the bill, as amended, to the House.

I do not believe the amendment I have suggested would in any way destroy the bill, but this citation says that, even if it did, such an amendment could be moved.

The Chairman: Would you give the reference, please, Senator Argue?

Hon. Mr. Argue: This is at page 495 of May's Parliamentary Practice, 18th edition, Mr. Chairman. I should also like to read from pages 496 and 497 of the same edition:

> "The Manner of Proceeding of bills in the House of Commons" . . . states that "committee on private as well as public bills can admit no provisions which do not come within the scope of the title. If any provisions foreign to the title are intended to be added in the committee, instruction for that purpose must be obtained from the House." Again, on p. 96, the author states that "if it be proposed to insert in the bill any new or additional matter foreign to the bill, or not within the scope of its title, or to leave out of the bill any subject matter expressed in its title, the committee must be expressly empowered to make provisions for all such purposes by previous instructions from the House."
> The rigidity of this rule was found to be inconvenient, and in 1854 the House, by S.O. No. 42, gave a general instruction to all committees to which bills were committed, empowering them to make such amendments therein as they should think fit, provided that the amendments were relevant to the subject matter of the bill—

Certainly the subject matter of this bill has to do with penalty for murder.

> —if such amendments were not within the title,—

If they were even beyond the title.

> —the title was to be amended and reported specially to the house.

I feel from this citation that the Senate itself obviously has the power to take a decision on a proposed amendment, even if such amendment were not within the title, if the title was to be amended and reported specially to the house. Bourinot is also clear.

Hon. Mr. McIlraith: Before the honourable senator leaves the point he was just making, would he give the reference for the last part of his argument? He gave the reference only for the first part.

Hon. Mr. Argue: Page 496, the last ten lines, and the first three lines at the top of page 497.

In the Fourth Edition of Bourinot quoting from page 522 and on to page 523, it says:

> According to strict English practice, which is generally followed in the Senate, new clauses should be brought up and discussed after the consideration of the original clauses of the bill; but in the Canadian Commons, the practice is not rigorously followed, and the committee is generally guided by what is most convenient in each particular case.

It gives instances of the practice in the Commons and in the Senate. It goes on to say how a title may be handled, and sometimes handled differently in the Senate from the Commons. I want to read this portion, which I think is of great importance with reference to an amendment in committee:

> A committee of the whole have now power to make amendments not within the scope and title of the bill. The rules of the English Commons provides that any > amendment may be made to a clause, provided the same be relevant to the subject matter of the bill—

When we talk about being relevant to the subject matter, I think it is obvious that it is.

> —or pursuant to any instructions, and be otherwise in conformity with the rules and orders of the house—

I draw the attention of honourable senators to these words in particular:

> but if any amendment be not within the title of the bill, the committee are to amend the title accordingly and report the same specially to the house.

Hon. Mr. Forsey: What page is that?

Hon. Mr. Argue: Page 523. This says to me very, very simply that the Senate in Committee of the Whole has the power, if it wishes, to make far-reaching amendments to any legislation that is before it beyond the title of the bill as long as it has to do with the subject matter of the bill. How could it be otherwise? Otherwise, the Senate could not operate.

I make an appeal to you, Mr. Chairman, on the basis of the practice we have had in this Senate over the years, on the basis of what is in the interests of the Senate, and I suggest to you that we would be placing ourselves in an impossible position if, by way of ruling, we tied our own hands and prevented ourselves, not necessarily from passing an amendment but from standing up and making our own decision on the merits or otherwise of an amendment. I am not at all impressed by the ruling in the other place of a chairman of a committee, who cited no authority, gave no quotations, but merely said that in his view a particular amendment was out of order and even went on to allow certain other amendments.

I do not know whether what I am about to say should be said, but I am going to say it anyway. I can tell you that I am no great authority on rules, but I tried to check with those who are. Recently I had the good fortune to happen to meet Mr. J. F. MacNeill, who for 13 years was Law Clerk and Parliamentary Counsel of the Senate, and for another 12 years was Clerk of the Senate. On the question of whether an amendment along these lines, to provide total abolition of the death penalty, would be in order, in the company of others, Mr. MacNeill made, I thought, quite a long statement. He emphasized his points with vigour, and he said that such an amendment, in his opinion, was entirely in order.

I bring this amendment to the Senate, in no way apologizing for having done so, not only as to the substance of the amendment but believing that the authorities say, as indeed they almost have to say, that the Senate has it within its powers to make such a decision.

Hon. Mr. Fournier (De Lanaudière): May I ask the honourable senator a question? There is no doubt that we have the right to amend any legislation coming from the other place except when that amendment involves public expenditures. So, I do not think we have the right here. I do not need to discuss the merits of the amendment. To my way of thinking, public expenditure is involved if we are to keep murderers in prison for life, at $10,000 a year each.

[Hon. Mr. Argue.]

The Chairman: Before making a decision, the Chair invites other honourable senators to give this the benefit of their views.

Hon. Mr. McIlraith: Honourable senators, I do not have the benefit of having the text of the amendment before me, but I assume from the formal part that was read out that in addition to the simple negation it must substitute some other text for section 214 of the act.

In my discussion now, I will interpret it in that way. The actual amendment read out was a simple negative. It would not require an amendment at all; it would require simply a vote against the bill. I assume that is not what is intended, that there is a substitute coming immediately afterwards to the later parts of the text.

The text of the whole amendment as in existence was not read or was not put in that form in the amendment read, but I make nothing of the point.

There are one or two other preliminary matters I should like to clear up. I cannot understand how any reference could be made to the rejection by the House of Commons of a Senate bill or another subject presented there. The bill for the total abolition of capital punishment is not similar to the Senate bill that was ruled out of order earlier this year in the other place on a different ground altogether. I think the grounds for criticizing that decision in the other place are good, but it does not seem to be germane to this discussion at all.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Let us forget it.

Hon. Mr. McIlraith: The point in that case was whether or not that House had the power to pass a rule they have in existence, and merely relying on the rule had the effect of amending the British North America Act which governs the presentation of a bill of the kind passed by the Senate.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: On a point of order, that was the very point made by Senator Fournier.

Hon. Mr. McIlraith: I do not think that reference to the earlier Senate bill this year, which was rejected by the House of Commons, is a valid argument with respect to this type of bill. It is a different point altogether.

By the way, on the reference to the amendment by the Senate of bills from the House of Commons, of course the Senate has a right and duty, if it sees fit, but that is not the point at issue. What is at issue here is a much narrower point—whether or not the honourable senator has the right to present this amendment in this form or in any other form to this particular bill.

As for the argument he was starting to make, I could not help thinking that he might have advanced the argument if he were merely asking us to reject the clause. It may have been that he could have advanced an argument on the point of total abolition in that way, so that he may be heard in committee. But to follow that by an amendment of the nature proposed by him is not acceptable.

By the way, I noticed that reference was made to an opinion apparently given in committee in the other place by a successor to myself in the position of Solicitor General.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: No, no; against the successor of yourself.

Hon. Mr. McIlraith: The ruling was given, but as to the opinion given by the present Solicitor General, I would respectfully draw attention to the fact that the chairman of the committee, who overruled the opinion of the Solicitor General, was also a lawyer of some considerable significance and was the chairman of the committee of that other place. So I do not think that was conclusive one way or the other.

The real point we are concerned with here is whether or not this amendment is within the scope of the bill and whether it comes specifically within the four corners of our bill. It is one thing merely to delete a clause. That can be done by a simple negative vote. Here the amendment does not come merely within the scope, it rejects the principle of the bill. The principle of the bill we voted on yesterday was whether or not we should continue in operation, for another period of five years, a law that we had in operation for a period of five years, from 1967 to the end of 1972.

Reference was made to the length of the bill. The bill is lengthy because an election intervened. A simple bill, extending the date, could not be submitted because Parliament was dissolved and the period expired before such action had been taken.

You cannot by that method retroactively enact legislation to cover the intervening period. There was no other way to extend the period of operation of the law for a further five years than by dealing with it clause by clause at length. Nonetheless, it was a simple continuance bill, seeking to continue the law. The Senate has taken its decision on that point. I respectfully submit the amendment is squarely within—or, rather, contrary to the principle—

Hon. Mr. Flynn: You were doing all right at first.

Hon. Mr. McIlraith: The honourable senator quoted references from Erskine May's Parliamentary Practice, 18th edition. It is quite interesting. May I read parts of what he was quoting? He was dealing with the English practice and he went on to say, at page 496:

> Again, on p. 96, the author states that "if it be proposed to insert in the bill any new or additional matter foreign to the bill, or not within the scope of its title,—

And what is at issue here is not within the scope of the bill.

> —or to leave out of the bill any subject-matter expressed in its title—

That is not part of it.

> —the committee must be expressly empowered to make provisions for all such purposes by previous instructions from the House."

No motion of instructions has been obtained from this house permitting the committee to extend by an amendment beyond the principle of the bill that we dealt with yesterday.

Hon. Mr. Forsey: Would the honourable senator read the words which follow, which I think Senator Argue quoted?

Hon. Mr. McIlraith: Yes. I have been reading rather carefully in the last day or two. He goes on to say:

> The rigidity of this rule was found to be inconvenient, and in 1854 the House, by S.O. No. 42—

I do not know what more Senator Forsey wants me to read.

Hon. Mr. Forsey: Read the whole thing.

Hon. Mr. McIlraith: But if it were applicable, it is not applicable here. Incidentally, that reference was made to the British House of Commons rules, and even if it is applicable in our House of Commons, our rules in the Senate are much more strict.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Where do you find that?

• (1440)

Hon. Mr. McIlraith: You will find it in the 18th edition of Erskine May's Parliamentary Practice, at page 497.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: But we have revamped our rules several times since that was published.

Hon. Mr. McIlraith: I have given the reference to the honourable senator.

Going on to the point raised by Senator Forsey, even if that English standing order, where they provided a general instruction instead of special instructions, as required formerly, were applicable in Canada, it does not cover the amendment before us.

In the first clear paragraph on page 497 May says, "The effect of this standing order . . ." and then goes on to deal with that. The honourable senator omitted to emphasize the reference in what he was reading to the requirement for an instruction when the principle of a bill is changed. That requirement is reiterated in the very words he read. That is the point I wish to make. There is always the need for an instruction of the whole Senate, sitting as a Senate, before—

Hon. Mr. Flynn: How would these instructions be worded?

Hon. Mr. McIlraith: I cannot give you the wording offhand, but there was such a case a few years ago in the House of Commons. In that case it was an instruction to divide a bill, and deal with it as two bills. There was a good precedent there. But such instructions have been given. There is a precise wording for them.

The Chairman: The flag bill?

Hon. Mr. McIlraith: Yes, it was also used in the flag debate. There was an instruction given to the committee in that case.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: To a committee?

Hon. Mr. McIlraith: Yes, there were instructions to a committee. And there were one or two other cases within my own recollection.

Hon. Mr. Forsey: May I ask the honourable senator a question at this point? Surely the reference to the debate on the flag bill is quite irrelevant, because, to the best of my knowledge and belief, there was no bill at all. It was a resolution. There was no legislation. There is no act on the statute books dealing with the flag.

Hon. Mr. McIlraith: I quite agree that the proceedings in the flag debate are quite irrelevant. I was asked if I could give an example of the language, I think it was, that is used in an instruction, and in answering that question I said I could not quote the exact language but I could give an example of where an instruction was given. An instruction was given in that debate, but there were so many proceedings concerning the flag that I am not sure which it was on.

Returning to the argument here, the point, then, is that the amendment rejects the principle of the bill, and goes beyond the scope of the bill. The house having taken a decision on the principle of whether or not to continue this measure, this amendment seeking to bring about total abolition is away beyond the scope and effect of the bill.

The Chairman: Are there other honourable senators who would like to advise the committee?

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I am quite sure it would be helpful to the Senate if Senator Martin were to indicate the position of the government. If the government is prepared to allow an expression of opinion on the very point raised by Senator Argue, despite the problem of procedure, I am sure we would resolve the difficulty quickly. If Senator Martin is prepared to give that permission to his followers, I am quite sure all will go very well.

The Chairman: Are there other honourable senators—

Hon. Mr. Flynn: If the government leader has nothing to say, as usual, because he has given his followers their orders in private, I have a few things to say.

Hon. Mr. Croll: No, no.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Have you some objection?

Hon. Mr. Croll: When you talk about his giving directions—

Hon. Mr. Flynn: He does not have to give them to you, because you know what is expected of you, without being reminded.

Hon. Mr. Croll: Now, just a minute. When you talk about directions, you realize that eight of our members voted against the bill, and none of your members voted against the party.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I was expecting Senator Perrault, the neophyte member from British Columbia, to applaud first, and he did it again. His record is perfect. He is going to follow the path of Senator Buckwold. He will probably become assistant whip in no time. I am quite sure Senator Martin has an eye on him.

An Hon. Senator: Move over, Buckwold.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: The point that has been raised by Senator Argue is a most important point, and I would hate for the Senate to cower from having to make a decision on it. As far as the method of dealing with this subject is concerned, you could argue one way or the other. Senator McIlraith is an expert. He says that the principle of the bill is the continuation of the legislation which was in effect between 1968 and the end of 1972. Well, if it is, why did the government prepare a bill entirely new in its wording? If it was merely the continuation, it could have said, "The legislation in effect between 1968 and 1972 is put in force again for another period of five years," and that would have been a clear continuation.

[Hon. Mr. McIlraith.]

I agree that in substance it is, but in practice it is not, and because we have changed the words we are now changing the law which was in effect before 1968.

Hon. Mr. McIlraith: I wonder if I could be permitted a question?

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Certainly.

Hon. Mr. McIlraith: Would the honourable member agree that by using the method he has suggested, we would be attempting to legislate retroactively for the period between the expiry of the previous law and the present time, and that that can only be done, as indeed it is done in this bill, by direct reference to the period, and direct enactment?

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I cannot see the difference. I cannot follow this argument. According to you, this bill has a retroactive effect to the 1st of January 1973. Isn't that what you are saying?

Hon. Mr. McIlraith: I am saying that that has to be achieved in a certain way because, between the expiry of the five-year period and now, trials have taken place under the law that was in existence. So, you must deal specifically with those trials. You cannot simply say that the law shall be the same from the end of 1972 until the enactment of this bill in that terminology, or by the method, that the honourable member suggested. Those trials have, in fact, taken place, and they must be specifically dealt with. You cannot do it by reference to a time. That was the point. I thought I made that point clear. I thought I made it clear in my remarks on presenting the bill for second reading.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: You tried before, and you have tried again, and I do not think you have succeeded in making anything clear yet; because if you really have this idea of the continuation in force of the existing legislation, from January 1, 1968, to the end of December 1972, you could say, "This legislation is continued in existence for another period of five years," or whatever are the terms, "and is deemed not to have expired as of January 1, 1973."

Hon. Mr. McIlraith: You cannot do that.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: You are doing it exactly in those words in this bill, and don't tell me that because you say it in a certain way that you cannot say it in another way. That is childish. I am suggesting to the honourable senator that, in effect, this argument is merely calculated to avoid the point which we are considering here.

Let us go back, for instance, to the legislation we adopted in 1967. That legislation had the effect of abolishing the death penalty for all murders except those of policemen and prison personnel. Well, at that time if someone had said, "You are not going far enough; we want to abolish it entirely," it would have been relevant in the context or in the perspective that the Honourable Senator McIlraith gives now, as he tries to hide behind the principle which supports the continuance or the putting back into force of the legislation which we had until January 1 this year. I am quite convinced that we are just avoiding the issue.

The amendment put forward by Senator Argue at this point is difficult to assess in itself because there have to be some consequential amendments. But if the bill were really to do what I suggested, not only to abolish the distinction between capital and non-capital murder, as we had it in 1967, but to go further and say that all murders are punishable by imprisonment for life—if we were to say this, whatever the terms used might be, I think it would be in order. But if you try to isolate an amendment at this stage, then I think you are doing the wrong thing. It may be that if the amendment were allowed by the speaker and we were going to discuss it, we might want to do it in another way. We might want to have different wording. But asking the Chair to rule this amendment out of order at this time is merely avoiding the issue. I am quite convinced that the Senate as a whole wants to make a decision on that and wants to express its opinion on this very important matter.

That is why I was hoping that the Leader of the Government would not hesitate to say, "I would rather have the views of the Senate on the principle." Then if there were any difficulty as to procedure, we might adjourn and have advisers from the Department of Justice tell us what we should do and how we should proceed to send the bill back to the Commons with an amendment which would result in the complete abolition of the death penalty. But I do not think the Senate should hide behind a problem of procedure to avoid making known its opinion as to the essence of this bill.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: Mr. Chairman, I am not greatly concerned with whether or not the amendment as proposed is put by you. I am inclined to agree—in fact I do agree—with Senator Flynn that it would be just as well for us to have the amendment before us and to express an opinion on it. However, I do presume that we are concerned in this house with remaining within our own rules. Therefore, for what it may be worth, I draw the attention of the Chair to rule 54(2) which says:

> In a bill amending any statute or part thereof, the amendments shall be made by clauses which re-enact the section, subsection or other minor division as it is amended and shall not ordinarily be made by clauses which add or leave out words or substitute words for others.

I am not suggesting that this is a substantive matter at this time. The amendment as proposed by Senator Argue could very well, if some change is necessary, be quickly brought within that rule. On the other hand, rule 65(1) says:

> The rules of the Senate shall apply in committee of the whole with the following exceptions:
> (c) arguments against the principle of the bill shall not be admitted.

Note the words "arguments against the principle of the bill". Now, if the principle of the bill is, as it seems to me, that murder is punishable by death or is punishable by imprisonment for life—if that is the principle of the bill, and that is for Your Honour to rule—then I would submit that rule 65 (c) may well apply.

Also, as far as the principle of the bill is concerned, we have had some discussion about the rules in the other place. But I would suggest that any decision under the rules in the other place has no bearing whatsoever on the matter before us. I suggest to Your Honour that we are concerned only with our own rules, and my concern is that on this occasion, a very important occasion, we do stay within our own rules, whatever they may be, as interpreted by Your Honour. I would hope that the decision that Your Honour makes will make very clear, (a) whether the proposed amendment does, in effect, negative the bill, and (b) whether the negation of the principle of the bill under our rules automatically disqualifies the amendment. I think it is important for future debates and discussions that we have a very clear ruling on those points. Let me repeat that the first question is: (a) does this amendment negative the principle of the bill? In other words, is it outside the scope of the bill, and (b) if it does negate it, does that disqualify it as an amendment that can be put by Your Honour?

Hon. Mr. Lamontagne: May I ask a question of the honourable senator? I do so because I am the least expert in this field. How could an amendment which would negative the principle of the bill be entertained at this stage when this chamber has already accepted, by giving it second reading, the principle of the bill?

Hon. Mr. Grosart: Perhaps I did not make myself quite clear, but that is exactly the point I was making. The honourable senator asked how, if the amendment did negative the principle of the bill, it could be considered at this time. That is exactly the question I am seeking the answer to, and I am in no position whatever to give the answer. I hope we will get it.

Hon. Mr. Forsey: Mr. Chairman, there are just a very few points I should like to make on this question of the admissibility of the amendment. If I understood the honourable Senator McIlraith correctly, he appeared to be suggesting that this amendment was not required, that the same end which we have in view could be attained simply by voting against the bill.

Hon. Mr. McIlraith: No.

Hon. Mr. Forsey: Did I not understand you correctly?

Hon. Mr. McIlraith: No.

Hon. Mr. Forsey: Or against the clause, I was going to add.

Hon. Mr. McIlraith: I was pointing out that the form of the amendment before us, and which had been read, was not complete, and that I assumed there was more coming with it and was prepared to treat it as if it was an attempt to do the necessary things to achieve total abolition.

Hon. Mr. Forsey: I thought the honourable senator was also suggesting that merely by voting against the clause, without any amendment, we could have achieved the same end as is proposed by this amendment. However, it seems to me to be quite clear that that would not be so. If we merely voted against the clause we should not attain the end we had in view.

The second point I should like to make is that it seems to me that the title has some bearing, at least, on what is really the subject matter of this amendment. One of the questions at issue is this: what is the principle of the bill? What is the subject matter? Then, does the amendment go beyond the principle of the subject matter of the bill? I should like to draw attention to the fact that the proposed short title is Criminal Law Amendment (Capital Punishment) Act. Now, surely this amendment does deal with capital punishment.

I am not emphasizing—indeed, I am not mentioning—certain other points that I think Senator Argue made very clear in the citations from May and Bourinot which seemed to me to be conclusive, subject only to one reservation, which was raised, in a sense, by Senator McIlraith, if I remember correctly, or possibly by the Leader of the Opposition. However, I think it was Senator McIlraith who suggested it. Anyway it was suggested that our rules are more restrictive than those which are covered by the citations from May and Bourinot which in the one instance refer to the British House of Commons and in the other instance to the House of Commons of Canada, and not directly to the Senate. Well, all I can say is that I would very much like to have the citations from our rules which would show that they would be more restrictive in this matter than the rules and practice which are cited in May and Bourinot. Now, it is true that Senator Grosart very obligingly supplied certain citations from our rules, rule 54.(2), for example, which he read in full. The most relevant portion of that rule, I suggest, is:

> . . . shall not ordinarily be made by clauses which add or leave out words or substitute words for others.

I do not know what precisely the significance of the word "ordinarily" is. That would seem to leave some discretion to the Chair or to the Senate itself. I merely raise this question, is there any exception provided from rule 54.(2) by that word "ordinarily"? I am not altogether sure either that merely deleting the rest of the words after the word "repealed" is what is really intended by the words "or leave out words." Cutting a proposed section short, does that, or does that not amount to leaving out words?

Then the honourable Senator Grosart referred to rule 65.(1)(c): > arguments against the principle of the bill shall not be admitted.

Well, this, after all, is again the question at issue. What is the principle of the bill? Is this amendment contrary to or beyond the principle of the bill? If so, then clearly under our rules it would appear to be out of order, but this is the whole question that is at issue.

I venture to point out also, in relation to Senator Grosart's remarks in connection with applying our own rules and our own rules having, for us, precedence over any rules that may be valid in the other place, that we have in rule 1 of our own rules the following:

> In all cases not provided for hereinafter, or by sessional or other orders, the standing orders, the rules, usages, forms and proceedings of the Parliament of Canada, in force up to the day on which the present rules go into operation, shall be followed so far as they can be applied to the proceedings of the Senate or any committee thereof.

I have been uneasy for some time about the wording of that rule and have contemplated raising it, because where it says " . . . the Parliament of Canada," we are a part of the Parliament of Canada. This is, in effect, saying where our rules do not apply our rules and the rules of the House of Commons shall apply. Suppose they differ, where are we? I assume that it is intended that this should mean the rules of the House of Commons; that where our rules do not provide, the rules of the House of Commons shall apply. I do not know how you can talk about the rules of the Parliament of Canada and the rules of one house when the Parliament of Canada includes both houses. What do you do about a conflict?

Hon. Mr. Molson: May I ask a question? Rule 1 reads:

> In all cases not provided for hereinafter, . . .

So I suggest, with respect, that that does make a little difference.

Hon. Mr. Forsey: But is this " . . . provided for hereinafter"? That is one of the questions I am raising. That is exactly the point I am trying to raise and I say we do not get a great deal of guidance from rule 1. It seems to be curious, to say the least. But if it means that where our own rules do not provide we follow the usages, practices and rules of the House of Commons of Canada which, in their turn, contain, I think, a section saying that in cases not provided for the rules of the House of Commons of the United Kingdom shall be followed, if that is so, then it seems to me to be possible that this might have some bearing, and that the citations from May and Bourinot might have some bearing, on the admissibility of this amendment from a procedural point of view. If there are other sections of our rules which are more restrictive and which would make the citations from May and Bourinot inapplicable, I think it would be useful for the house and, possibly, even for the learned occupant of the Chair, to have those sections of our rules cited.

Hon. Mr. Rowe: Mr. Chairman, I am sure that all honourable senators share my own desire that this matter be dealt with as thoroughly and expeditiously as possible. Nevertheless, I think we need to remind ourselves that, no matter what action the Senate takes on what is contained in the bill itself, we shall not be solving the problem. This is going to be a continuing problem confronting the Canadian nation, confronting society and confronting our consciences for the foreseeable future, because no one really knows what the answer to it is. However, I would like to say this in connection with the point of order which we are still debating. Perhaps I am making use of a cliché here, that we are quite literally dealing with a matter of life and death. I would judge, although I am not competent personally to comment on the technicalities involved in this point as to whether or not Senator Argue's amendment negates the principle of the bill itself, there is obviously some room for doubt if one may judge from the points which have been made here today, especially by those senators who are lawyers. I do feel, however, that if there is any margin of doubt as to whether or not the amendment is admissible, in the resolution of that doubt I would respectfully suggest that since we are dealing with a matter of life and death, the more debate, the more expression of views that we have, the better. I would respectfully suggest, Mr. Chairman, that in the event it is a grey area and not black or white, then the decision be given in favour of admitting Senator Argue's amendment.

The Chairman: Are there other honourable senators who wish to speak?

Hon. Mr. Lamontagne: I should like to address myself, although I wish to repeat to my honourable friend, Senator Molson, that I am not a lawyer, to what is apparently the main question: What is the principle of the bill? As the Honourable Senator Grosart is aware, I am in the habit of endeavouring to think in terms of systems, and it seems to me that in this area we have three different systems to face. The first is the one under which we lived until, let us say, 1962, when capital punishment was the rule. Then we had one from 1962 up to now, under which we began to restrict the application of the principle of capital punishment. There is a third system possibly, which is complete abolition, which would be the exact opposite of the system obtaining before 1962. It seems to me that at this moment we are discussing a modification of system two, restricting the system of capital punishment. To move from one system to the other would require a bill quite different from the one before us. My views are well known. If this amendment were in order—and I do not think it is—I would vote for it.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: Perhaps, on a point of privilege, I should make an explanation. On looking again at rule 54(2), which I drew to the attention of the house, it occurs to me that it probably applies only to an amending bill and not to an amendment to a bill. I do not wish to mislead. There is quite a difference.

Hon. Mr. Godfrey: Mr. Chairman, I did not speak on this bill during second reading, but I should like to say that the Canadian people, had they listened to the debate, would have thought that the principle of the bill is whether or not we are going to abolish capital punishment.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: No.

Hon. Mr. Godfrey: As a total abolitionist, I had no difficulty in voting for the bill on second reading. The fact that the death penalty is retained in a few minor exceptions does not affect the principle of the bill so far as I am concerned. I found the arguments of Senator McIlraith to be both artificial and unconvincing. I support the remarks of Senator Flynn and Senator Rowe, and shall not repeat them.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: For a newcomer, you are very good.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I do not wish to be too procedural about this matter. Perhaps, Mr. Chairman, you would allow the amendment to be put and the senators to vote for or against the total abolition of the death penalty. I know that some honourable senators on my side of the chamber oppose the bill because they are in favour of retention. Others oppose it because they are in favour of abolition. If the amendment were to carry, we could then move the adjournment of the committee in order to consider the consequences of such a decision and the consequential amendments. We would at least have the opportunity of making a decision on the principle, subject to modifying any subsequent amendments which might be required. By so doing we would be acting wisely and courageously.

The Chairman: Senator Argue in effect moved an amendment to clause 2, which is under discussion. By legal interpretation, he developed his theme with regard to the other clauses which are included in his general amendments. It might be called a package deal.

It was important for the honourable senator to explain his proposed amendment of clause 2 and what he had in mind with regard to the other amendments. He was given leeway in order that his presentation could be full, and brought to the attention of the house.

Might I suggest at this stage, in view of the fact that the honourable senator presented an argument in toto on the whole of his amendments, including the consequential subclauses, that his amendments be printed as an appendix to Hansard and to the Minutes of the Proceedings of this day, otherwise this discussion may not have any relation to what has taken place this afternoon.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(For text of proposed amendments, see Appendix p. 1206.)

The Chairman: We will simply print the amendment as moved by Senator Argue, which includes clause 2, and the balance of his amendment which he has not read to the house. Is the house now ready for an opinion from the Chair?

Honourable senators, I have not been taken by surprise, because Senator Argue was kind enough to send me a copy of his amendment yesterday. I have since done a fair amount of homework on the question. My duty as chairman is to render an opinion on whether or not the amendment to clause 2 is in order. With your permission, I shall proceed to present the views of the Chair.

I am called upon to consider and rule on the admissibility of a package amendment to Bill C-2, moved by Senator Argue and seconded by Senator Forsey, which would have the effect of completely abolishing capital punishment.

The issue is whether such amendments are consistent with the principle of the bill, as agreed to by the Senate on second reading. I emphasize the words "consistent with the principle" as opposed to "within the scope of" for very good reasons.

Bourinot's Parliamentary Procedure, at page 523, reads:

> A committee of the whole have now power to make amendments not within the scope and title of the bill. The rules of the English Commons provides that any amendment may be made to a clause, provided the same be relevant to the subject-matter of the bill, or pursuant to any instructions, and be otherwise in conformity with the rules and orders of the house; but if any amendment be not within the title of the bill, the committee are to amend the title accordingly, and report the same specially to the house.

However, Bourinot goes on to qualify that statement on page 525 by saying:

> Though a committee has full power to amend, even to the extent of nullifying the provisions of a bill, they cannot insert a clause, reversing the principle affirmed by the second reading.

The question thus becomes the definition of the principle of the Bill C-2 as read a second time by the Senate.

I have read the Debates of the Senate respecting the second reading of Bill C-2 up to and including November 15, and have noted that of the 28 senators who have spoken so far 24 mentioned that Bill C-2 is not an abolition bill but a compromise bill, a continuance bill.

In introducing the bill on November 1, Senator McIlraith indicated that it was regrettable that the bill, as reprinted in the Senate following passage in the other place, did not include the explanatory notes that were in the bill following first reading in the Commons. I refer honourable senators to Debates of the Senate, page 1070.

The first explanatory note in the bill as introduced in the other place was:

> The purposes of this Bill are, by amendments to the Criminal Code, to provide for
> (a) the reinstatement of the law relating to capital punishment that existed prior to December 30th, 1972, for a period terminating on December 31st, 1977, and
> (b) the elimination of the use of the terms "capital murder", in relation to murder that is punishable by death, and "non-capital murder", in relation to murder that is punishable by life imprisonment.

In reviewing the Debates of the Senate, I quite naturally wanted to see what honourable senators had said in this regard. Senator Choquette on November 1, as reported, at page 1075, said:

> After all, we are being asked to renew a bill which was passed in 1967; we are asked to renew it for a further period of five years.

● (1520)

He went on to say, a few lines later:

> It is neither retentionist nor abolitionist.

Senator Carter on November 6, at page 1085, said:

> In moving second reading of the bill, Senator McIlraith made it very clear that its principle did not concern the question whether the death penalty should be retained or abolished, but rather whether the legislation in effect from 1967 to 1972 should be extended for a further period of five years.

Senator Manning on November 7, at page 1092, said:

> —the major point at issue in the legislation before us is whether the partial ban on capital punishment should be extended for another five years.

Senator Lang, on November 8, at page 1103, said:

> —the bill before us extends for another five years a principle established in 1967 that capital punishment be confined to murders of police and prison guards. In other words, the bill is a retentionist bill, not an abolitionist bill.

And further on he said:

> —any amendment to the bill which would remove the capital penalty against murderers of policemen or prison guards would violate the principle of the bill and, in my opinion, would be completely out of order.

Senator Desruisseaux on November 13, at page 1120, had this to say:

> We are now being asked, in effect, to extend this experiment for another five years.

On November 14 Senator John Connolly indicated how important the recognition of the continuance as the central principle of the bill is if honourable senators are to be able to make clear, rational decisions. At page 1130, on November 14, he is reported as saying:

> Honourable senators, in 1967 I had in my own mind no definitive solution to the problem posed by the use of the death penalty for murder. In 1973, I confess, I am in the same position. Six years ago I could not assess its value as a deterrent; today I am really no better off. If I did know I would not vote to approve another trial period of virtual abolition. It may be that five years hence I shall have developed more wisdom on this most agonizing issue.

It is clear—at least it is clear to me—from the debate on this bill that virtually every senator recognizes that Bill C-2 is a continuance bill. Indeed, some honourable senators opposed it because it is a continuance bill rather than an abolitionist bill. Senator O'Leary is a shining example of such a view. At page 1145 of Hansard of November 15, he is reported as saying:

> —as an abolitionist, who believes sincerely in the abolition of capital punishment without any qualification whatsoever . . . I must oppose the bill. I do so because it does not abolish capital punishment. It entrenches capital punishment.

The fourth edition of Bourinot's Parliamentary Procedure, at page 524, also says:

> On the other hand, it has been decided that it is not within the scope of a committee to which a continuance bill has been referred, to amend the provisions of the acts which it is thereby proposed to continue, or to abridge the duration of the provisions contained in those acts.

Again in Erskine May's Parliamentary Practice, the eighteenth edition, at page 494, under the heading "Functions of a Committee on a Bill" there is this:

> The function of a committee on a bill is to go through the text of the bill clause by clause and, if necessary, word by word, with a view to making such amendments in it as may seem likely to render it more generally acceptable. The rules as to the admissibility of amendments are explained in detail on pp. 507-10 below, but the general powers of a committee and the limitations by which it is bound should be clearly borne in mind.
> (1) A committee is bound by the decision of the House, given on second reading, in favour of the principle of the bill, and should not, therefore, amend the bill in a manner destructive of this principle.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: And it does not.

The Chairman:

> (2) The objects of a bill are stated in its long title, which should cover everything contained in the bill, as introduced . . . Amendments, however, are not necessarily limited by the title of the bills, since a committee is empowered by S. O. No. 42 to make amendments "relevant to the subject-matter of the bill," provided that, where such amendments are outside the title, the committee extends the title so as to cover them.

(3) An amendment which is outside the "scope" (as described on pp. 508-9) of the bill is out of order and cannot be entertained, unless a special instruction has been given by the House to the Committee.

Again at page 495 Erskine May says:

Doubts have arisen whether the committee, to whom a bill has been referred, can by amendment so change the provisions of the bill, that when it is reported to the House, the bill is in substance a bill other than that which was referred to the committee. As stated above, a committee can negative every clause of which the bill committed to them is composed, and can substitute for those clauses new clauses, if relevant to the bill, as read a second time, and otherwise in order.

And again in the same edition, at page 509:

(5) An amendment which is equivalent to a negative of the bill, or which would reverse the principle of the bill as agreed to on the second reading, is not admissible. Where the scope of a bill is very restricted, it is not always easy to grasp the full effect of this rule, but the method of its application can be judged from the two following examples—

I have only taken one:

The scope of the Parliamentary Elections (No. 2) Bill, 1880, being restricted to the repeal of a section in a statute, an amendment which proposed the continuance and extension of that section was ruled out of order. The chairman stated that, though the committee had full power to amend, even to the extent of nullifying the provisions of a bill, they could not insert a clause reversing the principle which the bill, as read a second time, sought to affirm.

Senator Grosart was kind enough to bring to our attention rule 65(1)(c) which, to me, seems to bear this out. It says:

(1) The rules of the Senate shall apply in committee of the whole with the following exceptions: . . .

(c) arguments against the principle of the bill shall not be admitted.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: And they have all the time.

The Chairman: Bill C-2 continues, with certain modifications, a law that was in force for five years. One may argue that the amendments intended to totally abolish capital punishment would not be amendments to the continuance bill but would be, in effect, amendments to the permanent statute—that is to say, the Criminal Code.

In summary, then, the admissibility of total abolition amendments in the Senate is governed by the definition of the principle of the bill. If that principle is the continuance of the five-year experiment, I cannot see how such amendments can be admitted. Therefore, as the principle of this bill has been approved on second reading, the amendment as proposed, in effect asking for the total abolition of the death penalty, is contrary to the general principle of the bill and is, in my view, out of order.

Hon. Mr. Argue: Honourable senators, as I feel this ruling is fatal to the function of the Senate, and would destroy the authority and responsibility of the Senate, with respect, I appeal the ruling of the Chair.

The Chairman: It is moved by the Honourable Senator Argue, seconded by the Honourable Senator Forsey, that the ruling of the Chair in Committee of the Whole be not accepted. Is it the pleasure of the committee to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Senators: Yes.

Some Hon. Senators: No.

The Chairman: All those in favour of the motion will please say "Yea."

Some Hon. Senators: Yea.

The Chairman: All those against the motion will please say "Nay."

Some Hon. Senators: Nay.

The Chairman: In my opinion, the "Nays" have it.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: We want you to report to the Speaker and have a formal vote.

The Chairman: All those in favour of the motion will please rise.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I would ask you to report to Her Honour the Speaker that there is an appeal from the decision of the Chair.

• (1530)

The Chairman: Honourable senators, the procedure is to take a standing count in the Senate. All those in favour of the motion will please rise.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: What is the motion?

The Chairman: The motion is an appeal against the ruling of the Chair.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I think that question cannot be put.

Hon. Mr. Argue: Mr. Chairman, when your ruling is challenged, I suggest that challenge in itself by two honourable senators means that you automatically go to Her Honour the Speaker and ask her to deal with this. The whole chamber, with Her Honour the Speaker in the Chair, can then deal with it. It would be an unheard of practice, I would think, to do it on any other basis.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: It is an appeal to the Senate.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Honourable senators, I have discussed this matter with Senator Langlois, who on some aspects of the bill is not in accord. Other honourable senators, who have had long experience, hold the view that the way the matter is dealt with here is not as it is in the other place. Here I am now told it is dealt with in committee by a vote.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Where do you get that?

Hon. Mr. Martin: It is not covered in the rules, and the practice has been that it is done by a vote in Committee of the Whole, as was proposed by the chairman. We are now in a position to deal with this appeal by a standing count while we are sitting in Committee of the Whole.

The Chairman: Honourable senators, on this question we are in committee, and I would call your attention to that. While it is perfectly legal to appeal any decision of the Chair, it is nevertheless understood in this house that we deal with it in Committee of the Whole.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: With respect, Mr. Chairman, you have been Speaker in the other place and I have been Deputy Speaker. The first ruling I made in the other place as deputy chairman of the Committee of the Whole was appealed on the suggestion of my honourable friend, Senator Martin.

Hon. Mr. Martin: And I succeeded, I think.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: No, you did not succeed.

Hon. Mr. Lamontagne: It was a bad ruling.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I am speaking only on the procedural aspect. An appeal from a ruling of the chairman is to Her Honour the Speaker. The chairman reports to the Speaker that there has been an appeal against his ruling, and Her Honour asks the Senate whether the decision of the chairman shall be sustained or not. The vote then is on whether the Senate is in favour of the ruling of the chairman, or against it. The way the chairman is putting the question to us is whether we are in favour of an appeal against his ruling, which is completely the reverse. I submit there is nothing in our procedure to suggest that the decision be taken when the chairman is in the Chair. As was pointed out by Senator Forsey and Senator Molson, rule 1 provides:

> In all cases not provided for hereinafter, or by sessional or other orders, the standing orders, the rules, usages, forms and proceedings of the Parliament of Canada, in force up to the day on which the present rules go into operation, shall be followed so far as they can be applied to the proceedings of the Senate or any committee thereof.

We would need a definite text to proceed otherwise than we would in the other place on a question like that.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a point of order. I point out that rule 15 is:

> The Speaker shall preserve order and decorum, and shall decide points of order, subject to an appeal to the Senate.

While this does not entirely cover the situation, I point out that this is in the form of a point of order. We are dealing with a point of order on whether the appeal should be taken in committee, or to the Speaker. We have before us, as a committee of the Senate, a point of order, and I suggest that our rules make it very clear that points of order shall be decided by the Speaker, subject to appeal to the Senate, and there is nothing in our rules that provides for an appeal to a chairman of a committee.

The Chairman: Honourable senators, I have had the advantage of the Clerk's pointing out to me that Bourinot, at page 396 of the fourth edition, says:

> In case of an appeal to the house it is the duty of the chairman of the committee to report in writing the point of order which he has decided. The Speaker must then submit the matter to the determination of the house in the language reported to him, and put the question, "That the decision of the chairman be confirmed." No discussion is allowed on the appeal.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: That is the point.

Hon. Mr. Argue: That is the clear practice.

[The Chairman.]

Hon. Mr. Lamontagne: Except that it is not a point of order.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: It is.

The Chairman: Honourable senators, with your permission, I shall report to the Speaker of the Senate.

The Hon. the Speaker: The sitting is resumed.

REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

Hon. Mr. Macnaughton: Madam Speaker, I have to report that an amendment of the Honourable Senator Argue, seconded by the Honourable Senator Forsey, has been ruled by the chair in Committee of the Whole to be out of order. That ruling has been appealed to the house, and I so report.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, do you wish me to repeat the report of the Chairman?

Some Hon. Senators: Dispense.

The Hon. the Speaker: Shall the decision of the chairman of the Committee of the Whole be sustained? All those in favour please say "yea."

Some Hon. Senators: Yea.

The Hon. the Speaker: Will all those who are against please say "nay"?

Some Hon. Senators: Nay.

The Hon. the Speaker: I declare, the ruling of the chairman of the Committee of the Whole sustained.

And more than two honourable senators having risen.

The Hon. the Speaker: Please call in the senators.

Ruling of the chairman of the Committee of the Whole sustained on the following division:

FURTHER CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is it your pleasure that the house again go into Committee of the Whole?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

● (1550)

The Senate adjourned during pleasure and was put into Committee of the Whole to further consider Bill C-2, to amend the Criminal Code.

Hon. Alan A. Macnaughton in the Chair.

The Chairman: Honourable senators, we were discussing clause 2. Shall clause 2 carry?

Hon. Mr. Forsey: Honourable senators, I should like to move an amendment to clause 2. I move that clause 2 be amended by striking out paragraph (a), and, in line 25, by deleting the letter (b). The motion is seconded by Senator Argue.

Senator Grosart asks what clause. It is clause 2, and the proposal is to strike out paragraph (a), beginning at line 19, and to eliminate "(b)" in line 25.

I do not know whether an explanation is called for at this point, or whether I should allow the Chairman to put the motion formally, before I say anything in support of it.

The Chairman: Have honourable senators heard the amendment? It has been moved by Senator Forsey, seconded by Senator Argue, that clause 2 be amended by striking out paragraph (a), and, in line 25, by deleting "(b)".

Hon. Mr. Forsey: Honourable senators, the reason for moving this amendment is that, in view of the ruling which has just been made, and sustained by the Senate, it is impossible to get a straight abolitionist amendment carried, and it seems, in my judgment, that an amendment of the sort I am now proposing, which merely narrows the scope of the bill, does not run into the procedural objections which were raised against the previous amendment moved by my honourable friend, Senator Argue. I trust that this amendment will be ruled in order.

It gives those of us who would like to see the scope of this bill changed a chance to vote for at least a partial improvement in the bill, which, in my judgment, can scarcely be said to run counter to the principle of the bill. It merely narrows the scope of the exceptions to the general rule laid down by the opening words of the section.

Hon. Mr. Argue: Honourable senators, I feel that this is an important amendment that is being put forward by Senator Forsey.

We had a decision on another matter which, I take it, is not a subject for debate at this time. However, it was stated that it was not within the competence of the chamber to consider total abolition.

Now, one may say that an amendment like this is not logical, because it would merely reduce the area of capital punishment by removing the murder of police officers as an offence—punishable by death. However, those of us who sincerely believe in total abolition would feel that if we could go this far, we would be making a very important step forward, by removing one area of crime that would carry the penalty of capital punishment. I really do not think anybody is going to say that this kind of an amendment is not in order, because surely the principle of the bill is not that capital punishment should occupy a certain area, and that any diminution of the area for which capital punishment could be obtained could not be reduced.

Even in the committee in that other unmentionable place an amendment that would, if it had passed, have increased the application of capital punishment where murder arises in association with rape or kidnapping, was declared to be in order. This will give honourable senators, abolitionists and others, a chance to vote on the proposition, while we are not able to provide total abolition under this bill, that we can make one further step forward, and then the Governor in Council will be required to consider the question of commutation only in reference to the murder of a prison guard.

I would therefore hope, therefore, that this amendment will receive majority support.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Honourable senators, I am very much of the opinion that this amendment is in order. I was of the opinion that the former amendment ruled out of order by the Chairman, whose decision was overwhelmingly sustained by the house, was also in order. It was really marvellous to see how disciplined the government troops are.

An Hon. Senator: On both sides.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I know that I am not in order now, but occasionally I like to do the same as some on the other side. However, when I come to the amendment—the substance of the amendment—I have to say that I regret very much not being able to support it. I will vote against the clause itself. Since I can't bring myself to accept the continuation of an absurd system that makes distinctions as to victims, rather than as to murderers, which I think was logical and was what existed before the amendment of 1967 was adopted, since we really have not tried the so-called experiment of 1967, I would rather go back to the system of capital murder and non-capital murder, and force the government, as I said when discussing the matter at the second reading stage, to come clean and give the Senate a chance to make up its mind. Since the Senate does not seem to want to do so, I will vote against the amendment, but I will vote against the clause too.

Hon. Mr. Perrault: On a point of clarification, as I understand it the amendment would remove subclause (a) of clause (2). I think the statement was made by Senator Forsey that (a) and (b) would be deleted.

Hon. Mr. Forsey: I am sorry. It is paragraph (a), and the letter "b", in brackets, so that the effect would be simply to have the wording, "in causing the death of a warden, deputy warden". All that would be left out in (b) would be the single letter, because if you strike out (a), there is no (a) for the (b) to be (b) to, so to speak.

Hon. Mr. Perrault: If I understand it, Mr. Chairman, Senator Forsey is suggesting a re-lettering of the appropriate clauses, rather than a deletion.

Hon. Mr. Forsey: I do not mean that, either, because you would not need any lettering if it simply reads, "(2) Murder is punishable by death in respect of . . ." et cetera, ". . . a warden, deputy warden . . ." You do not need to say, "(a)". There would not be anything but (a). You would not need it.

Hon. Mr. Perrault: But in asking this question, Mr. Chairman, I can see no reason why the Chair's ruling on this proposed amendment should be any different from that on the original amendment. I fail to understand any line of reasoning that would bring me to the conclusion that the Chair should consider this amendment—

Hon. Mr. Forsey: If I may speak on a point of order—

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I do not know if one has been made or not.

Hon. Mr. Forsey: Is there no point of order by the honourable gentleman? In that case, I have nothing to say; but I thought he had raised a point of order on the admissibility of this amendment on the basis of that previous ruling. If there is no point of order, I will not say anything. If it is not seriously raised, I do not wish to take the time of the committee with superfluous verbiage.

● (1600)

The Chairman: The point has been raised. Perhaps you would make your argument.

Hon. Mr. Forsey: I can do so very briefly. In substance, it seems to me that your ruling, Mr. Chairman, on the other amendment was that it was contrary to the principle of the bill and therefore was inadmissible. Now, there were refinements to that, I know, but I think that is substantially the effect of it.

The argument we are making now for the admissibility of this amendment is that it is not contrary to the principle of the bill. It is merely a modification of the scope of the bill, which seems to me to be another matter.

That is the argument that I should advance for the admissibility of this amendment.

The Chairman: Is the committee ready for the question?

Some Hon. Senators: Ready.

The Chairman: I may say in passing that I have a reference here, a short reference, again from the 18th edition of Erskine May's Parliamentary Practice, page 508. Dealing with inadmissible amendments at section 2, it says:

> An amendment cannot be admitted, if it is governed by or dependent upon amendments which have already been negatived.

[Hon. Mr. Perrault.]

In the present circumstances, it does seem to me that the honourable senator covered himself by leaving in "warden, deputy warden, instructor, keeper, gaoler, guard or other officer or permanent employee of a prison, acting in the course of his duties . . ."

The purpose of this amendment is to eliminate, as I understand it, paragraph (a) and leave in those purposes mentioned in what is new paragraph (b). I think in the circumstances that this should be admitted. The house can reach its own conclusion, and so the Chair accepts the amendment.

It has been moved by the Honourable Senator Forsey, seconded by the Honourable Senator Argue—shall I read the amendment?

Hon. Senators: Dispense.

The Chairman: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the said amendment?

Some Hon. Senators: Yes.

Some Hon. Senators: No.

The Chairman: Would those in favour say "yea"?

Some Hon. Senators: Yea.

The Chairman: Would those against say "nay"?

Some Hon. Senators: Nay.

The Chairman: In my opinion the "nays" have it.

Hon. Mr. Argue: Let us have a standing vote. Why not?

Hon. Mr. Langlois: We are with you.

The Chairman: Will all those in favour of the motion please rise?

The Clerk of the Senate: Eight.

The Chairman: Will all those against the motion please rise?

The Clerk of the Senate: Forty-seven.

The Chairman: In favour of the motion eight, and against the motion 47. I declare the motion lost.

Shall clause 2 carry?

Hon. Senators: Carried.

The Chairman: Clause 3. Shall clause 3 carry?

Hon. Senators: Carried.

The Chairman: Clause 4. Shall clause 4 carry?

Hon. Senators: Carried.

The Chairman: Clause 5. Shall clause 5 carry?

Hon. Senators: Carried.

The Chairman: Clause 6.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Wait a minute until we see what these are.

The Chairman: Clause 6. Shall clause 6 carry?

Hon. Mr. Croll: I think Senator Molson wanted to speak on this.

The Chairman: Shall clause 6(1) carry?

Hon. Mr. Molson: Honourable senators, I propose to move a simple amendment. Would you like me to read it, Mr. Chairman?

The Chairman: I understand, honourable senators, that copies of the amendment have been distributed.

Hon. Mr. Molson: I think every senator has a copy. Unless there is someone who has not read it, I will let it be taken as read. Is that agreeable?

The Chairman: But it should be placed on the record.

Hon. Mr. Argue: I would think it should be read either by the mover or by the chairman when the motion is being put.

Hon. Mr. Molson: My amendment is as follows:

Page 6: After clause 6.1 insert the following as clause 6.2:

"6.2. Subsection 684(1) of the said Act is repealed and the following substituted therefor:

"684. (1) The Governor in Council may commute a sentence of death to imprisonment for life, where and only where

(a) the jury has made a recommendation that an accused be granted clemency,

(b) the jury has reported to the judge that it was unable to agree upon a recommendation either in favour of clemency or against it, or

(c) in the case of a trial without a jury, the judge has included in the report required by subsection 671(1) a recommendation that an accused be granted clemency."

Before going any further, Mr. Chairman, do you wish to put the motion?

The Chairman: I should like to have it seconded.

Hon. Mr. Desruisseaux: I second the motion.

Hon. Mr. Molson: Honourable senators, before the question is put, I should like your indulgence to make just one or two comments.

First of all, you will remember that on second reading I urged most strongly that an immediate and active effort be made to find a method of execution other than the rope, which is abhorrent to every one of us. The death penalty is still present in the bill, and absolutely no consideration has been given to a more humane approach to its execution.

Secondly, I lay stress on the fact that there is a type of crime which is significant enough to merit a different approach. This I have described as the cold-blooded, premeditated, gangland, execution-type murder which has become more and more frequent. I said there were 33 such cases in the greater Montreal area in the first ten months of this year. Speaking later, Senator Neiman said she had information from the big cities, including Montreal, showing no serious incidents of this type of crime. She explained that her figures were only for the central core of the City of Montreal and only up to the end of June of this year.

To demonstrate the real danger which exists I want to read from two recent press clippings. From these you can judge for yourselves whether or not I was trying to create needless alarm.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Not the Gazette, I hope.

Hon. Mr. Molson: I am not sure which papers these clippings came from.

Senator Neiman spoke on November 14 and two days later, on November 16, the headline which I have here appeared. It reads: "Police here fear killings start of underworld war". The item goes on to say:

> Police fear a new round of underworld bloodshed has been sparked by five recent killings in the Montreal area.
> "... everyone in the underworld is becoming paranoid," a police spokesman said yesterday. "They're worried they will be the next to be bumped off. To offset this, they'll probably act to protect themselves."
> On Wednesday night the bodies of Edouard Chiquette, 36, of 8507 Chantenay St. in St. Leonard, and Robert De Courcy, 32, of 6085 Place Desgroseillers, Ville d'Anjou, were found in the trunk of a burned out car.
> Both had been shot in the back of the head a total of seven times with a .38 calibre pistol equipped with a silencer.

● (1610)

I might add that the car had then been set on fire.

Incidentally, I saw in another newspaper article that one of those two men was known to have been involved in thefts from the Montreal harbour, which might be of interest to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce. During its sitting this morning we were discussing the problems of control in Montreal harbour.

The second newspaper clipping is dated four days later than the previous article, November 20. The headline for this is "Man slain with shotgun, 22-year-old arrested." The article is as follows:

> A 33-year-old man was killed by a shotgun blast last night when he answered the doorbell of a home at 5202 Drolet St.

I am skipping a paragraph. The article continues:

> Lieut. Boire said Laplante was known to police and that drugs appeared to be involved in the slaying, the 10th in Quebec in the last two weeks.

Honourable senators, I think you will agree now that the figures I quoted earlier are not entirely figments of the imagination. We have a serious situation of gang involvement, gang rule, in Montreal and, much as I respect the other cities of this country such as Toronto, I would not be too surprised to hear that once in a while they have a little trouble with the gang element which rules by the bullet, the knife and the garotte.

Honourable senators, I thank you for your patience. I wish now to deal with the amendment which I propose.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Mr. Chairman, before the honourable senator proceeds, could he tell us how many of these murderers have been apprehended and, if apprehended, how many have been tried and convicted?

Hon. Mr. Molson: I cannot, I am afraid, answer the honourable senator in this regard. I do not believe the Montreal police catch them within two weeks too often. They are happening so very rapidly there. There have been 10 in the last fortnight. I believe I saw that perhaps four had been apprehended.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: It was the 33 I had in mind.

Hon. Mr. Molson: I have not followed the careers of the other 33, Senator Macdonald. I do not know.

Honourable senators, I wish to return to the amendment I proposed. Section 684(1) provides the power of commutation to the Governor in Council. My amendment does not deal with any of the sections of the Criminal Code referring to the royal prerogative of mercy. The amendment would have the effect of limiting by statute the powers of the Governor in Council to commute death sentences to cases in which there have been recommendations of clemency. I am not a lawyer, but it is my understanding that the supremacy or sovereignty of Parliament is the key principle of the modern British Constitution, and that what Parliament has enacted it may freely amend. It is also my understanding that if this amendment were to be enacted by Parliament it would probably be binding on the Governor in Council in the field of commutation and, notwithstanding that the royal prerogative of mercy, would in other respects remain unchanged, the clear intention of Parliament as expressed in this amendment would probably prevail so far as commutation is concerned.

Honourable senators, I commend this amendment for your consideration.

Hon. Mr. Manning: Mr. Chairman, I am in full sympathy with the point made by Senator Molson, which is embodied in the proposed amendment. I can see, however, some rather serious practical problems in the application of this. I would like to mention the point which is in my mind, and perhaps Senator Molson will enlarge as to how he feels this could be met.

Under the proposed amendment the Governor in Council can commute a sentence only where, in the case of a jury trial, the jury recommends clemency or, alternatively, if the jury cannot agree as to whether they should or should not recommend clemency. It does seem to me that in practice this would result in very few cases in which the situation as it now exists would be altered.

In the first place, I think we would all agree that the majority of jurors, unless they have very strong feelings, would incline toward recommending clemency because their recommendation does not oblige the Governor in Council to commute, but merely gives him the discretionary power, which he has today, to decide whether he will or will not commute the sentence. So, jurors being human, it is a rather obvious course for them to recommend clemency, knowing that the Governor in Council is under no obligation to grant it because their recommendation is only that it be granted if he so wishes.

The case in which the jury cannot agree as to whether clemency should be recommended, it seems to me, would pretty well cover all cases except those in which they were prepared to recommend clemency. It would be pretty hard to imagine a jury of six or 12 men and women in which there would not be someone taking one position or the other, which would result in lack of agreement as to whether they would recommend or not recommend clemency.

So in all of those cases the section becomes inoperative in practice, because juries simply would not agree. The power of the Governor in Council would, therefore, be exactly as it is today. While the concept, in my opinion, is commendable as far as trial by jury is concerned, I believe the proposed amendment would have very little effect, if any, on changing the situation from what it is today.

Paragraph (c), which relates to the case of a trial by judge alone, bothers me from this standpoint. I do not like to see a situation created in which the fate of a condemned murderer depends to a large degree on the personal convictions of one man. We would have to recognize that that would be the case as far as this provision applies to a judge. If he is a man who has very strong conviction against capital punishment, his natural inclination would be to recommend clemency, and once more the Governor in Council does not have to accept his recommendation. The judge clears his own conscience, but again we are back exactly where we are today. On the other hand, I have some fear with respect to a case in which a judge might be a very strong retentionist and feels that all murderers should be hanged, which would influence his judgment. If he does not recommend clemency the hands of the Governor in Council are tied, and the sentence could not be commuted even if it was felt that it should be. In other words, does it not become a matter of quite serious concern when we leave the question of commutation to the judgment of one man, no matter how learned and eminent a judge he may be?

As much as I disagree with the policy of the Canadian government in commuting all these sentences, which I think is completely wrong and contrary to the will of Parliament, I do suggest that there is some merit in having the decision made by a group, a cabinet of 25 or more, representing various viewpoints, rather than resting on the decision of just one who may be a strong retentionist, or a strong abolitionist.

There is another point in connection with the jury recommendation. Before a Cabinet decision is made, we are told that a great deal of information is gathered. They have time to make an assessment, and they then render their judgment. That is not the same as locking up a jury and saying, "Now, we want you to bring forward a verdict." The jury will not have the mass of information that the Governor in Council would have on which to base a judgment. A jury is also under pressure of time in being required to bring forward a verdict of guilty or not guilty.

I am not opposed to Senator Molson's amendment. The concept is excellent. However, I would be interested to hear his views on the concern that I have expressed in respect of this amendment.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Mr. Chairman, may I refer to paragraph (c), which was so well explained by Senator Manning? Unless the law has changed since I was in active practice, and in view of the fact that we are still dealing in this bill with murders of policemen and prison guards, I know of no case that could go before a single judge without a jury. Therefore, in my opinion, paragraph (c) in this proposed amendment is absolutely out of order. I do not think a murderer can go before a judge alone, and plead guilty. He would be told, "You cannot do that, my man. You will have to go before a judge and jury." Therefore I fail to see why we should waste too much time on paragraph (c).

Hon. Mr. Phillips: I do not profess to be a lawyer, but one point that comes to mind is the fact that a court martial can impose sentence of death, particularly in wartime. How does paragraph (c) affect a court martial?

Hon. Mr. Croll: A court martial consists of at least half a dozen officers. Although a jury at a murder trial consists of 12 jurors, a jury could consist of six members under certain circumstances, but a court martial requires a minimum of six officers.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: I do not believe that a court martial requires six officers. It did not in my day, but perhaps it does now. However, my question still applies: what effect would paragraph (c) have on the sentence imposed by a court martial?

Hon. Mr. Buckwold: Mr. Chairman, I cannot support the amendment put forward by my colleague, Senator Molson, because I believe that once again it is an attempt to move further towards capital punishment.

There may be justification in the mind of the honourable senator, and there may be occasions when the senator's viewpoint in this connection would be correct. However, many of us who support the bill as it now stands are abolitionists. We are prepared to accept the compromise that the death penalty shall apply for the killing of policemen or prison guards, on the basis that it is an acceptable compromise and one that can be reasonably accepted by the Canadian people.

I hope that we shall not lose the element of mercy. I am speaking now of the royal prerogative. I have mentioned that in this bill there is provision for a jury to impose parole limitations, under which a man can be denied consideration for parole for up to 20 years. Surely that is punishment enough, without taking a man's life.

For this reason I believe that the honourable senator's amendment is a backward step, and that it would not be proper for me to support it.

I particularly wish to endorse the comments of Senator Manning, who referred to uneven justice. One jury might bring in a verdict which another jury would not. One judge might do something which would not be done by another. We could have people hung for the crime of murder because one court dealt with the case differently from another court in a different jurisdiction.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Is the honourable senator talking about a hung jury, or the sentence of hanging.

Hon. Mr. Buckwold: Sometimes I get hung up on the word "hanged". If I used the word incorrectly, I apologize and ask that it be corrected.

In my opinion, I believe this amendment to be a retrograde step considering the spirit of what we are trying to do.

Hon. Mr. McIlraith: Honourable senators, I should like to place on record the commutation provision as it exists in the Criminal Code. Section 684 (1) provides:

> The Governor in Council may commute a sentence of death to imprisonment in the penitentiary for life, or for any term of years not less than two years, or to imprisonment in a prison other than a penitentiary for a period of less than two years.

I oppose the amendment. First, I would draw the attention of the committee to the fact that the clause in the amendment offered has no bearing on most of the horrible murder cases about which the honourable senator spoke when presenting his amendment. Under the law we are now considering, those murderers would not be convicted of the type of murder that carries with it the sentence of capital punishment. Therefore, there could be no commutation.

I am not familiar with all of the examples that he gave, but in nearly all of them—

Hon. Mr. Molson: Let us say "some".

Hon. Mr. McIlraith: Capital punishment now applies only to cases of murder of policemen or prison guards. It has no bearing on the type of murders about which the honourable senator spoke, unless one of them happened to be the murder of a policeman. There is that weakness in his argument.

There is also another weakness, in that it does not deal with capital cases where the accused is not tried by a judge and jury. There are still offences for which capital punishment may be imposed other than murder.

Hon. Mr. Molson: Where? Would the honourable senator explain?

Hon. Mr. McIlraith: Treason is a good example.

Hon. Mr. Molson: Have we had a treason trial in Canada?

Hon. Mr. McIlraith: Not for many years, that I know of. But there is always the first time. In any event, that is a defect in the wording.

• (1630)

But there is another defect in it. It restricts the power to commute by the Governor in Council to those cases where a jury has made a recommendation for mercy, or where a jury has been unable to agree. That is clear. However, it does not deal with those cases where a jury has made no recommendation for mercy, but the judge has. That is one example of a case where there would be no power in the Governor in Council to commute the sentence.

The defect in paragraph (c) has already been mentioned. I would point out that there are those cases where the judge makes a recommendation for mercy, notwithstanding the fact that the jury has failed to make such a recommendation. That would also have to be dealt with.

I would also point out the consequence of the absolute loss of the right to commute a sentence in cases such as the one referred to by Senator Hastings in his remarks on the second reading of this bill, the Lurvey case. In that case, if I remember correctly, there was no recommendation from the jury. There may have been one from the judge, but I am not certain. In any event, there was a commutation in that case, as the man was suffering from a terminal illness. This amendment would take away the power to commute in such a case.

Some years ago there was a case—I am not now referring to a murder case—with which I, as a minister, was directly concerned. Again the individual was suffering from terminal cancer. I hesitate to think that anyone would want the Governor in Council to be powerless in that circumstance.

What I am trying to indicate is that the power of the Governor in Council to commute a death sentence should be retained, however critical many honourable senators may be of the way that power has been exercised in some cases. I would hate to see honourable senators restrict it in this way. To me it is unconscionable that we should accept a concept here that there is no power whatever in the Governor in Council, or some other place of last resort, to commute before the penalty of capital punishment is carried out. It seems to me that there must be a place of last resort—something beyond the trial and the court.

For that reason, honourable senators, I would hope that we reject the amendment, although I appreciate the point the honourable senator was seeking to make in putting it forward.

Hon. Mr. Beaubien: Honourable senators, I will vote in favour of Senator Molson's amendment. I should like to remind you that for 11 years now every death sentence has been commuted. In my view, that is uneven justice. I do not think there is any question but that in the future every sentence is going to be commuted. After all, if I were the Prime Minister I would certainly commute every sentence. Would I want to be called by the mass media and everybody else a hanging Prime Minister?

It must be 10 years since Marcotte shot that policeman. He is probably dusting off his Santa Claus suit now, and hoping to wear it this Christmas. If I am right, that officer's wife has been a widow for 10 years, and his three children have been orphans for 10 years.

Honourable senators, I cannot see how we can logically pass a bill which says on the one hand that there is capital punishment, when we know very well that there is not going to be capital punishment. I do not say this to be critical of any of the cabinet ministers who have ruled this country over the last 11 years. That is not their job. When we talk about uneven justice, I ask: What could be more just than having an honest, hard-working experienced judge, with 12 citizens sitting as a jury, doing their very best to arrive at a reasonable and accurate verdict? After all, nothing is perfect in this world. If any of us were in the Cabinet, do you think we would have a better idea of whether this man should hang or that one should go free than the judge who has devoted his life to that sort of thing, and who has the evidence before him? I do not think it makes any sense at all.

I feel we should pass this amendment of Senator Molson's. Otherwise we will not be making any sense at all.

I say all these things even though I am very conscious of the sanctity of human life. I just want to remind you, honourable senators, that in the last 11 years hundreds upon hundreds of people have died violent deaths, and not one drop of the blood that has flowed came from a murderer. If we are talking about the sanctity of life, let us look at it from that angle. I think it is about time we made some sense by accepting this amendment. If it turns out that too many are being hanged, then let us have abolition. But let us not say we are doing one thing when in fact we are doing something else.

Hon. Mr. Perrault: Mr. Chairman, the essence of commutation is surely that it is an extrajudicial process outside the vagaries of juries, outside of the vagaries of judges and courts. It is a fact that we have imperfect justice in our society, that there are some judges more inclined towards capital punishment than others. There are some juries which could be called hanging juries. Also, there are attitudes towards capital punishment in some parts of the country that are not held in other parts of the country. It is also a fact that there is an unequal amount of justice distributed to those of limited economic means in Canada today. The situation is improving, but I find remarkable the statistics which show that those on the lower end of the economic scale all too often are convicted of crimes, whereas those in better economic circumstances are able to hire more proficient counsel who are often successful in having their clients acquitted or their punishment mitigated.

The process of Cabinet commutation is outside all of this. It provides the Cabinet with the right to exercise the quality of mercy after all the facts are made known, and many of those facts emerge only after a court has dealt with a particular case.

Senator McIlraith has talked about instances in which a terminal illness has come to light after a murderer has been convicted. Society certainly would not tolerate the prospect of a convicted murderer in the final stages of a terminal illness being dragged or carried on a stretcher to the hangman's noose.

I oppose this amendment. I am persuaded by the eloquence of Senator Manning, when he pointed out the unequal nature of justice in Canada today. In so far as it is possible, I think we should attempt to dispense justice for all, regardless of economic circumstances, and I prefer to see a continuation of the right of the Cabinet to commute as an integral part of their responsibility. Thus, I shall oppose this amendment.

● (1640)

Hon. Mr. Hayden: My friend Senator McIlraith and I do not disagree very often in our points of view, but I am wondering whether he has given full consideration to the import of this amendment. In effect, what the proposed amendment does is impose a condition upon the exercise by the Governor in Council of the power of commutation. It applies only to those who have murdered police officers, prison wardens or prison guards. In those circumstances, the quality of mercy, so-called, that may be involved in the commutation of a death sentence to one of life imprisonment would, under this amendment, if it became law, mean that there must be a condition in existence before the Governor in Council could exercise that power of commutation. The condition is that the jury recommend mercy.

I can tell you, honourable senators, that in the years before 1967, when the Cabinet still reviewed death sentences, one of the first things they looked for was whether there had been a recommendation to mercy by the jury. I would think that in almost 99 per cent, perhaps 100 per cent, of the cases where there was a recommendation to mercy by the jury the sentence of death was commuted to life imprisonment. In all other cases the facts were fully and independently inquired into.

The only change that is proposed here is to prevent the 100 per cent commutation of the death sentence in the case of the killing of prison guards or policemen. In other words, there must be some factual basis that must be met, other than a universal rule that all death sentences will be commuted to life imprisonment. On that basis, I am prepared to support the amendment.

Hon. Mr. Everett: Honourable senators, I would like to support the amendment, for I think that an on-going policy by the Cabinet to commute all death sentences is nothing more than a frustration of the act. However, both Senator McIlraith and Senator Perrault raised a point that bothers me a great deal, and it arises out of the Lurvey case. If indeed no recommendation for mercy is made, and if additional facts are adduced that would normally cause the Cabinet rightfully to commute the death sentence, then according to this amendment they would be powerless to use that power.

There is section 683(2) of the Criminal Code, which gives the Governor General the right to grant what is called a conditional pardon. There is also a saving section, section 686, which states:

> Nothing in this Act—

The Criminal Code.

> —in any manner limits or affects Her Majesty's royal prerogative of mercy.

I shall find it easy, and indeed I shall desire, to vote for the amendment if Senator Molson can assure me that either of those sections—the conditional pardon section or the royal prerogative section—allows either the Governor in Council or the Governor General not to wipe the sentence off the record, not to act just so as to free the person, but rather to act in the same way as under the commutation section, to reduce the sentence from a death sentence to a life imprisonment sentence. I wonder if Senator Molson could assure me that that is the way those sections will operate.

Hon. Mr. Molson: Honourable senators, there have been a great many points thrown at me, some of which will test my legal knowledge and training. I have already pointed out quite clearly that I am not a lawyer. I would, however, like to express my appreciation for the views that have been put forward, starting with Senator Manning.

First, let me say that, regardless of what the press made of me when I spoke earlier, I am not in favour of brutality, or corporal punishment, or hanging people by the neck, and all such horrible things. I am very much opposed to them. As I said at the beginning of my remarks on second reading, I believe that capital punishment is a deterrent.

I also said that I believe there are certain types of people in this world whom we describe as brutes, very often bullies, nearly always cowards, who simply do not respond to normal humanitarian efforts to bring them back into the fold. I have seen some of those people in my civilian life and in the armed forces. I am sure you have all seen them. You can reason with these people, you can argue with them, you can support them, you can help them, but every time you are let down by this minority of people who are brutish, and who will not respond to anything but a tough approach.

I do not favour hanging. I never have favoured hanging. I think it is horrible. However, I think capital punishment is a deterrent for certain classes of people.

Senator Forsey validly raised the point, which Senator McIlraith also mentioned, that my belief that brutal executioner-type murderers should be put to death is not achieved by the amendment. All I can say is that I was trying to deal with something practical. For years we have had discussion and debate on capital punishment for premeditated and brutal murder, and that has now been definitely discarded. The only compromise we have had so far is in respect of prison guards and policemen. I was trying to stay within what seemed to be the possibilities of the situation.

Senator Manning referred to his fears about the way in which a jury reacts, and the way in which a judge reacts. With respect to a judgment by a judge alone, I was told before presenting this amendment that it was redundant; that in fact no murder case would ever be heard by a judge alone. Again, I am ignorant of the law, and I can only repeat what I was told in the course of reasonably serious inquiries. I cannot talk about treason.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I wondered whether there is a mistake, and what you mean is "in the case of a trial with a jury, the judge has included . . . " I wondered whether "without" is a mistake. If you say "with a jury", it makes sense.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: That would go with the explanation given by Senator McIlraith, when he said a judge could do that notwithstanding the fact that a jury omitted to do it.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: It is "with a jury".

Hon. Mr. Molson: Thank you, honourable senators. I would point out that I am not a legal draftsman. In view of the points that have been made, particularly the small ones, on this amendment, I would be very pleased if something emerged that had the general effect of getting rid of these apparently minor faults in the drafting. Perhaps this should be included in a second subsection, paragraph (b) should read differently, or a paragraph (d) should be added to refer to the recommendation of a judge. Any minor change of that sort would be perfectly acceptable to me. In fact, I am very grateful for that help.

● (1650)

Coming back to Senator Manning's reservations, which I thought were expressed excellently, I point out that we are dealing, under the present conditions, with a very small number.

In the first place, any question of insanity today seems to be dealt with pretty well. I understand that the question of whether a person is insane or not, it is all gone into in the court. I do not think that it presents a problem when we come to commutation. If it does, I do not think I have ever heard of it. So that eliminates quite a good number of them.

Senator Hastings gave us a good analysis of types and numbers of cases. I think that either he or somebody else in the debate mentioned that in all the various circumstances over the years there are only very few people in respect of whom there was an element of doubt, or who would not have had a recommendation for mercy.

I do not know where I got the number of seven but it is in my head that it is a very small number. Marcotte and Dion are names I happen to remember but there were a few others. There were also cases of mental instability or mental health that were exceptions, but frequently there were extenuating circumstances. We heard that among all those cases we missed there was one person who had terminal illness, but that was three years ago. I do not know how that person is today. If the illness was factual and the termination of life was imminent, it is inexcusable to me that that man was not properly examined medically and this fact known. I do not think that is an excuse for having another condition in the law. It is simply perfectly rotten administration that a man with a terminal illness is in custody for I do not know how long—before his trial was over I would be terribly surprised if it was less than six months—with no one knowing he was dying. I find that inexcusable and ridiculous, and we had better wake up and find out if people have a terminal illness before they come up for trial on a charge of a major offence, particularly one like murder.

Secondly, there is the point made by Senator Buckwold that a sentence of 20 years' imprisonment should be enough. I cannot argue with him. I do not know what is enough and I am not trying to tell you what is enough. I have very grave reservations about our having too much opinion on what is enough, when a man has taken a life. Circumstances in every case are different. I am not sure that we should say that in no case should the sentence be less than 20 years' or 25 years' imprisonment. I do not think we can sit here and make that decision. I believe that the full power of the maximum punishment for taking human life should be available, and then the way that power is handled is what we are interested in and what we are capable of influencing.

Senator McIlraith made the point that it is not a good principle to limit power of commutation in the Cabinet to certain aspects, or to a certain extent. He read subsection 684(1) to which I was suggesting an amendment. That subsection has been there now since 1967. It provides that the Cabinet or the Governor in Council may commute the death sentence.

Well, you know how effective that has been. It means nothing. As a matter of fact, it could be written in Greek, because the fact remains that in every instance—every instance—including the Marcottes and the Dions they have been commuted.

All I am trying to say is that in such cases of extreme brutality the load should not be on the Cabinet to say, "Well, we commuted all the others; we must commute this one, too"—especially in cases of mad dog killers like Marcotte, who, after wounding a policeman, who was lying bleeding on the ground, comes up and lets him have about four more shots. There is no place for mercy in cases like that.

[Hon. Mr. Molson.]

Now I come to the question raised by Senator Everett about the royal prerogative. I am afraid it is beyond my competence to give him an answer. My understanding of the matter is that the power of mercy, the power of appeal to the foot of the throne, has always applied, and I was led to believe that this is available, in general terms, in connection with any conviction; but you really should not pay much attention to my saying that. I do not know.

Hon. Mr. Everett: Would you like me to remind you of the question, Senator Molson?

Hon. Mr. Molson: Please.

Hon. Mr. Everett: Really, the operative part of that is whether or not the royal prerogative, or, indeed, the conditional pardon, is available to reduce the sentence from capital punishment to life imprisonment. If in the event that the recommendation for mercy has not been granted, and in the event that additional evidence comes to light on which the Cabinet would commute, if it has the right, the power to do so, which it would not have under your amendment—and all Canadians, in conscience, would want to see that sentence commuted—is it your belief that the royal prerogative would be sufficient to reduce the sentence, in that particular narrow case, from death to life imprisonment?

Hon. Mr. Molson: I cannot answer Senator Everett, but I would ask Senator McIlraith if he would give us an answer, because he is the most competent person to tell us about it.

Honourable senators, I have taken up too much of your time now. Really, as I said before, what bothers me most about this bill is the fact that we are passing it and saying that if you kill a prison guard or a policeman you can be sentenced to death, when we know there will be no such sentence carried out. As far as I am concerned, I just cannot see why we do it. It is terribly hypocritical. An amendment like this, where a death sentence could be commuted when there has been a recommendation for mercy, would change the whole complexion. It would also do something Senator Lamontagne referred to. It would put the Cabinet in a very different position—at least, I hope it would because that is the intention. It should lighten the burden on their consciences.

So, I think we should either be voting for abolition or for retention, but if we insist on this compromise then I really feel that it is not unreasonable to set some very modest conditions under which the Cabinet may exercise its prerogative of the power to commute. There would be many cases where there would be a recommendation for mercy, and in the relatively few cases where there was no such recommendation the Cabinet could say, "This is the law. This is what Parliament has ordained, and we can only follow the dictates of Parliament."

Hon. Mr. Hayden: Senator Everett, may I point out to you that section 686 of the Criminal Code, on your question of the royal prerogative, says:

> Nothing in this Act in any manner limits or affects Her Majesty's royal prerogative of mercy.

Hon. Mr. Everett: Yes, indeed, senator. That was one of the two sections I was referring to, and I am asking for your opinion as an eminent lawyer as to whether that would operate in the narrow case I have given the facts on, to allow the Crown—

Hon. Mr. Hayden: The words, as far as I am concerned, are very simple and very clear.

Hon. Mr. Everett: But would they allow the Crown, in the case which I have given, to commute the sentence of death to imprisonment for life.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: By the exercise of mercy?

Hon. Mr. Everett: Under section 686, that is right.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: Well, I have read section 686.

Hon. Mr. Everett: I am asking, is it your opinion that that section would operate to allow the Crown to reduce the sentence?

● (1700)

Hon. Mr. Hayden: Even after the limitation on commutation proposed by Senator Molson's resolution was effective, yes. I would say the royal prerogative would override that.

Hon. Mr. Cook: There is no limit to the royal prerogative.

Hon. Mr. McIlraith: I find myself in an awkward position, when I am beleaguered with requests to deal with an argument which must of necessity involve an interpretation of the law. Much as I dislike giving a legal opinion, and in this case I am not able to give a complete legal opinion, I must point out to my greatly respected friend, Senator Hayden, whose legal opinion I respect most highly, that the matter is not quite as simple as he indicates. I am in a similarly awkward situation with my friend Senator Cook.

The royal prerogative of mercy is set out in the Letters Patent to the Governor General, and they are quoted in Senate Hansard in this debate. The relevant section is quoted in the speech of Senator Connolly (Ottawa West), of November 14.

The royal prerogative of mercy has always been regarded in practice as something in the nature of a pardon, and it will be seen that members will have to put their own interpretation on the article quoted. However, I feel I must point out one or two things about it. It starts off in formal language dealing with the question of pardon, and reference is made to that. The only part that would preserve its applicability to capital cases is near the end, and even this is pretty obscure—

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Leave it as is.

Hon. Mr. McIlraith: This is what it says:

> . . . to remit any fines, penalties or forfeitures which may become due and payable to Us. And We do hereby direct and enjoin that Our Governor General shall not pardon—

Notice the reference to "pardon," which is a different thing.

> —or reprieve any such offender without first receiving in capital cases—

And that is the only reference to capital cases.

> —the advice of Our Privy Council for Canada and, in other cases, the advice of one at least, of his Ministers.

Now, in interpreting that, notwithstanding section 686, we are caught in a situation where the Cabinet and the members of the Privy Council are specifically limited as to their powers, in another section. Where the Governor in Council's powers are limited specifically in the light of this limiting clause in the proposed amendment, I am not prepared to adopt so easily the rather direct and simplistic view which Senator Hayden adopted. The Governor in Council is limited by section 684, and the Governor General, exercising the royal prerogative of mercy, is required to take the advice of those men whose powers in capital cases are limited by section 684. There you have it. It is not very clear, but it seems to me that the Governor in Council, being limited in its powers on the subject by the proposed amendment, cannot give contrary advice to the Governor General under the royal prerogative of mercy provision in the Letters Patent, et cetera.

Hon. Mr. Molson: You can see now how simple it is for us.

Hon. Mr. McIlraith: I admit very frankly the difficulty the case presents.

Hon. Mr. Croll: Have you considered in your disagreement with my opinion the effect of section 683(2) of the Criminal Code, which provides that:

> The Governor in Council may grant a free pardon or a conditional pardon to any person who has been convicted of an offence.

Hon. Mr. McIlraith: Yes, but I do not believe that free pardon is relevant in connection with a section dealing directly with commutation of a capital sentence. With great deference, I have to preserve that difference of opinion. I have, of course, been known to be wrong, but a great many judges over the years have also been known to be wrong in cases before them.

Hon. Mr. Everett: What, then, is a conditional pardon?

Hon. Mr. McIlraith: A conditional pardon is a pardon in which a condition is set. I am not sure whether we actually used it or not in those cases dealt with immediately before the Criminal Records Act was enacted. We may have, in that type of case.

In any event, I wish to clear up one small matter. I made reference to the Lurvey case a few minutes ago. I find in referring to that case I had told honourable senators that there was no recommendation of mercy. I am now advised that in that particular case there was a recommendation of mercy by the jury and no recommendation of mercy by the judge. There are many cases in which one has recommended mercy and the other has not.

Hon. Mr. Molson: That would fit in with the proposed amendment.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Senator Molson, would you care to confirm or not the suggestion made by Senator Flynn to the effect that the first line of paragraph (c) of the proposed section 684 should read "with" instead of "without"?

Hon. Mr. Choquette: That is right.

Hon. Mr. Molson: I think I will have to consult my lawyer.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: It is very important, though.

Hon. Mr. Molson: I must be quite honest and say that in looking at that section myself and discussing it, when I was told that this will never happen I did not read the wording carefully.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: It is "with".

Hon. Mr. Molson: But if an amendment to the amendment is moved, I would be perfectly happy.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I move that the letters "o-u-t" be deleted.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Yes, let them go out.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Chairman: Are members ready for the question?

Hon. Mr. Everett: I am sorry, but before we get to the question, Senator McIlraith did raise a point on the royal prerogative. At page 1128 of the Debates of the Senate, Senator Connolly (Ottawa West) in his speech quoted from the royal prerogative, which provides that the Governor General shall have the right to:

> . . . grant to any offender convicted of any such crime or offence in any court, or before any Judge, Justice, or Magistrate, administering the laws of Canada, a pardon, either free or subject to lawful conditions, or any respite of the execution of the sentence of any such offender, for such period as to Our Governor General may seem fit—

It further provides that in the case of capital punishment he must have the advice of the Privy Council. So I would have to respectfully disagree with Senator McIlraith. It would seem to me that section 686 would act to override any other section, and that in a case like the Lurvey case, the Cabinet, through the Governor General, could act to reduce the sentence in the event that facts came to light after the non-recommendation of mercy but before the execution. Because of that possibility, I shall vote in favour of the amendment.

● (1710)

Hon. Mr. Martin: We have to consider the difference between commutation of a sentence for murder and a reprieve for some kind of crime.

Letters Patent of 1947, conferred on the Crown, include the limiting language that Senator McIlraith read out:

> And We do hereby direct and enjoin that Our Governor General shall not pardon or reprieve any such offender without first receiving in capital cases the advice of Our Privy Council for Canada and, in other cases, the advice of one at least, of his Ministers.

As Senator McIlraith pointed out, the Governor in Council has the further proscription, as the authority capable of giving a commutation in a capital case, the restriction that he may commute a sentence of death to imprisonment in a penitentiary for life or for any term of years not less than two years or to imprisonment in a prison other than a penitentiary for a period of less than two years.

In 1956, in the case of a very young boy in connection with a crime, not murder, the Governor General did act. It was not murder, because the Governor General does not have that automatic power. Is it conceivable in this country, with the law that exists, both with regard to the Letters Patent and to the criminal law itself in which has been enshrined the act of executive clemency, that it would be possible for this matter to be resolved simply by an act of the Governor General acting on behalf of the monarch? This is the realism of the present situation.

On the merits of this resolution, I know of no country where there does not reside, as I said the other day, the residuum of action regarding clemency by the ultimate authority. That, in our country, is the legal fact of the executive.

To assume that we can put in the law final dispensation of mercy in the case of unknown situations would just not be practical. I am sure we will recognize the importance of leaving this power in the hands of the executive, unrestricted, and to presume on its responsibility and honest judgment.

Hon. Mr. Everett: But it has not been an honest judgment.

Hon. Mr. Martin: There was a royal commission in England on this subject, which was concerned about the exercise of clemency by the executive. It recommended restrictions, but not in the case of murder. I mentioned this the other day. I am sure that we could not do otherwise in this country.

I am one of those who favour the abolition of capital punishment. I would have liked the bill to have gone further than it does, but we all know why it does not do so. There is no secret about that. It was the only way that we could move forward in this matter of capital punishment, on the theory that half a loaf is better than none.

Those who argue in favour of this amendment, sincere as is the intention of Senator Molson, are putting an obstacle in the way of avoiding the application of capital punishment in particular situations. That is what those who are in favour of the abolition of capital punishment must recognize in dealing with this amendment. I say it would be a serious thing to take away this right of commutation.

I have sat in Cabinet for a long time, over many years, as has the Leader of the Opposition—

Hon. Mr. Flynn: For many years! Six months.

Hon. Mr. Martin: —as has the former Solicitor General and as have other honourable senators who have been ministers, and they will all attest to the fact that every Cabinet takes this matter of commutation seriously. There is no Minister of Justice, there is no Solicitor General, where there is both a Solicitor General and a Minister of Justice, who does not make his recommendation or presentation to the Cabinet with the utmost concern and seriousness.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: You mean that you are trying to convince us that for 11 years those people who took themselves so seriously and this question so seriously never made one mistake? They have consistently commuted.

Hon. Mr. Martin: I did not say that they did not make mistakes. I do say that in every such meeting in which I participated—and I have participated in all but one—speaking for myself and from what I could see of my colleagues, they acted towards those matters in the most objective and honourable way possible.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Martin: The Prime Minister has said that we will recognize the law, and we have recognized the law.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: When?

Hon. Mr. Martin: Well, my honourable friend—

Hon. Mr. Flynn: When?

Hon. Mr. Martin: My honourable friend has sat and examined all the evidence. Here is what happens when a capital case it brought forward—

Hon. Mr. Flynn: We know all about that.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Well, my honourable friend does not seem to recall. Here is what happens. The Solicitor General, if he is the one charged with the matter, or the Minister of Justice, brings forward the recommendation. He then teils us all about the case. We have a large dossier—

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Just words, just words. Tell us when the government has allowed the law to be applied? Tell me when?

Hon. Mr. Martin: I will explain—

Hon. Mr. Flynn: You don't have to tell me about the files and everything.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Why does my honourable friend not allow me to finish? No one interrupts him when he is speaking.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I don't know why.

Hon. Mr. Martin: We examine the evidence. We examine the evidence of psychiatrists who have visited the prisoner, and all the circumstances that have been gone into by officials of the departments concerned—matters that were not brought up at the trial for one reason or another, either because there might have been professional incompetence—and that often happens—or because of some prejudice on the part of the jury or judge. The matter is gone into with the greatest care and attention. It does not take us just 15 minutes. I recall, as Senator McIlraith will, one case that took more than a full day to consider. There is the fullest examination, following which each of us comes to a conclusion, in the exercise of our responsibility as Privy Councillors and our oath as to what we think should be done in the situation.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: And it has been identical for 11 years. It has been identical!

Hon. Mr. Martin: In every case I rendered a decision in accordance with my conscience. I did not defy the law. As the Prime Minister said, not one of us has defied the law in the exercise of this highest responsibility, no matter what the results might be. In the future, if this bill is passed in the form in which it is proposed, and again we have to consider cases, we will consider them not in defiance of the law but in pursuit of our own individual consciences.

If there were a case where I felt there was no reason for commutation, even though I stand for abolition, I would not hesitate to express my view that the punishment as handed down should be administered, as provided in the law for such situations. In two cases that was my view. Let no one say I have acted deliberately against the law. It is a serious thing to say to any minister that he has acted deliberately against the law. In the other place, Mr. Stanfield did not say that to the Prime Minister, and he was one who supported this bill. He simply asked the Prime Minister, "Will you act in accordance with the law?" The Prime Minister said, "We have and we will continue to." Mr. Stanfield accepted that.

● (1720)

Hon. Mr. Flynn: There is no evidence of that.

Hon. Mr. Martin: I always understood that would be accepted in any parliamentary system, in Canada or in other areas where there is a similar parliamentary system.

I say that to accept this amendment, notwithstanding the fact that it is put forward by a man for whom I have great friendship and respect, would in my judgment be to delay the progress that is being made towards the achievement of the abolition of capital punishment. That is the fact for consideration by everyone who feels strongly on this matter. Of course, I understand those who are opposed to capital punishment. I understand them fully, and I respect their views. I ask them to respect ours. I ask those who share this view not to permit a delay to take place, as it inevitably would if this kind of amendment were to pass. What would happen? It would mean a return to the status quo ante-1962.

Hon. Mr. Molson: No.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: No. 1967.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Excuse me, 1967. The Cabinet would be in a position where it could not have the liberty of judgment it is enabled to have under this bill.

Hon. Mr. Everett: I disagree.

Hon. Mr. Martin: My honourable friend says he disagrees, and that is the free right of anyone who sits in a deliberative assembly. However, that is my view based on long experience, on a strong belief that this bill, imperfect as it is, brings us forward to the abolition of a punishment that we do not find acceptable in this day and age. It does not mean that we are going to be easy on those who have killed. It means that we are going to be more severe, we are going to impose a form of punishment that we hope may acquire a deterrent value.

Honourable senators, those are the views that I put forward on this amendment. I ask that we turn it down and that we support this bill.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: For the record, I want to make it clear that the eloquence we have just heard from the Leader of the Government was merely an appeal to the faithfulness of the Liberal senators here not to bring in any amendment which would create problems for the government. It meant nothing else, because otherwise it was meaningless. It was a discussion beside the point. This amendment does not touch the royal prerogative.

Hon. Mr. Martin: I want to say one thing. I am sorry that Senator Flynn has made that statement.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I am not sorry to have made it.

Hon. Mr. Martin: There have been many statements that I am sure, when Senator Flynn has read them the next morning, he was sorry he had spoken.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: That has not happened yet.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Senator Langlois has taken issue with the view I take, and so have other honourable senators on this side, so why should Senator Flynn think that is the case? I could say to him that he should look at the way his supporters have reacted. Was he not taking a party position?

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Not at all.

Hon. Mr. Martin: I have not made that charge, and I am not going to lower myself by making it. I am sure Senator Flynn will regret having said what he did.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: No. You said it was a free vote.

Hon. Mr. Molson: Honourable senators, I thought it had been decided that this was not a party matter, but perhaps my party should intervene at this stage. Let me say to Senator Martin that I do not think there has been any suggestion—at least I hope there has not been—that members of the Cabinet have not carried out their duties to the best of their ability and their consciences. I do not think that is the question at all.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Nobody has discussed that.

Hon. Mr. Molson: Nobody has made any such comment.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: No.

Hon. Mr. Molson: I do not think we have any doubts about that. I am not going to be very long on this argument either. Senator Martin's eloquence is, of course, so moving that I am rather afraid it may influence too many of us, but that is what we would expect.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: No, no.

Hon. Mr. Molson: He says that the Cabinet has only, and always, lived up to the law. That is all right. I am not quarrelling with that. All I am suggesting is that we slightly change the law so that they can continue to live up to the law.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: They are slipping.

Hon. Mr. Molson: When we think of one of these five, six or seven brutal murders over the five years, like the Marcotte case, I suggest we say that the Cabinet is not under an obligation to treat such cases in the same way as the average killings we hear about, where there is no premeditation and where they are not brutal. We are simply trying to make the Cabinet's lot a little easier and simply make them do as Senator Martin says, live up to the law.

The Chairman: It has been moved by the Honourable Senator Molson, seconded by the Honourable Senator Desruisseaux—shall I read the amendment?

Hon. Senators: Dispense.

The Chairman: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the said amendment?

Some Hon. Senators: Yes.

Some Hon. Senators: No.

The Chairman: Would those in favour say "yea"?

Some Hon. Senators: Yea.

The Chairman: Would those against say "nay"?

[Hon. Mr. Flynn.]

Some Hon. Senators: Nay.

The Chairman: In my opinion the "nays" have it.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: It is just that they were louder. You might as well have a vote.

An Hon. Senator: A standing vote.

The Chairman: Will all those in favour of the motion please rise?

The Clerk of the Senate: Fifteen.

An Hon. Senator: Party discipline.

The Chairman: Will all those against the motion please rise?

The Clerk of the Senate: Forty-one.

The Chairman: In favour of the motion fifteen, and against the motion forty-one. I declare the amendment lost.

Shall clause 6 carry?

Hon. Senators: Carried.

The Chairman: Clause 6.1. Shall clause 6.1 carry?

Hon. Senators: Carried.

The Chairman: Clause 7. Shall clause 7 carry?

Hon. Senators: Carried.

The Chairman: Clause 8. Shall clause 8 carry?

Hon. Senators: Carried.

The Chairman: Clause 9. Shall clause 9 carry?

Hon. Senators: Carried.

The Chairman: Shall clause 10 carry?

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Mr. Chairman, on clause 10 I will not detain honourable senators very long. I mentioned that this clause will not only continue or revive the state of the law between 1968 and 1972, but will provide for an indefinite continuance of this legislation, by providing that before December 1977 a joint resolution of both houses—not a bill, a mere resolution of both houses—may direct that "the said subsection 214(2) . . . shall continue in force."

In other words, we may continue this absurd method of dealing with murders, indefinitely, by a mere resolution of both houses. Therefore, I move the following amendment:

Strike out lines 37 to 40, inclusive.

● (1730)

Hon. Mr. McIlraith: As I understand the amendment, it simply takes away the right of Parliament to deal with the possible extension of the period—

Hon. Mr. Flynn: By way of resolution.

Hon. Mr. McIlraith: By way of resolution. I am not sure whether the honourable member made the argument, but some made it here, and certainly I sought to deal with it in my original presentation of the bill, as to why that was not done instead of this bill being in its present form. I would hope that honourable senators would not restrict Parliament in this way, if by any chance they should want an extension of the bill in the simple form provided by this clause.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I want to make it difficult for the government to continue the status quo—or this thing. I want the government to be in a position where it will come clean and present definite legislation which will be appropriate.

Hon. Mr. McIlraith: I would point out to the honourable senator, that in seeking to make it difficult for the government he is in fact limiting the authority of Parliament, and I do not think that that is what he intended.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Not at all.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: Is it not a fact, and also the law, that at the next session of Parliament a bill could be introduced making changes in this bill?

Hon. Mr. McIlraith: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: So what are the restrictions that exist, because you talk about a joint resolution instead of a bill, or instead of some other form of legislation? There is nothing in this bill which would interfere with Parliament's taking a different course of action next year.

Hon. Mr. McIlraith: That is right.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I agree with that point, mind you, but I think that by leaving it there we are suggesting that this kind of legislation may become permanent. That is what it means.

Hon. Mr. Martin: No, no.

The Chairman: I will put the question. It has been moved by Honourable Senator Flynn, seconded by Honourable Senator Macdonald—shall I read the amendment?

Hon. Senators: Dispense.

The Chairman: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the said amendment? Would those in favour say "yea"?

Some Hon. Senators: Yea.

The Chairman: Would those against say "nay"?

Some Hon. Senators: Nay.

The Chairman: In my opinion the "nays" have it. I declare the amendment lost.

We have just voted on the proposed amendment to clause 10. Shall clause 10 carry?

Hon. Senators: Carried.

The Chairman: Shall clause 11 carry?

Hon. Senators: Carried.

The Chairman: Shall clause 12 carry?

Hon. Senators: Carried.

The Chairman: Shall the title and clause 1 carry?

Hon. Senators: Carried.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I want to say that after this exercise this afternoon I am not very happy with what we did, or the stand we took, and I will vote against the bill in committee, as I did on second reading.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: I think we should report progress.

The Chairman: Shall I report the bill without amendment?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: On division.

The Hon. the Speaker: The sitting is resumed.

REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

Hon. Mr. Macnaughton: Madam Speaker, the Committee of the Whole, to which was referred Bill C-2, to amend the Criminal Code, has considered the said bill and has the honour to report the same without amendment.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read a third time?

Hon. Mr. Argue: Now.

An Hon. Senator: With leave.

Hon. Mr. McIlraith: At the next sitting.

Hon. Mr. McIlraith moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

APPENDIX

CRIMINAL CODE (CAPITAL PUNISHMENT) BILL C-2

PROPOSED AMENDMENTS BY SENATOR ARGUE

1. Page 1: Strike out clause 1 and substitute therefor the following:

"This Act may be cited as the Criminal Law Amendment (Punishment for Murder) Act."

2. Page 1; clause 2: Strike out the words following the word "repealed".

3. Page 2: Strike out clause 3 and substitute therefor the following:

"3. Section 218 of the said Act is repealed and the following substituted therefor:

"218. (1) Every one who commits murder is guilty of an indictable offence and shall be sentenced to imprisonment for life.

(2) Notwithstanding anything in the Parole Act and unless the Parliament of Canada otherwise directs, no person

(a) upon whom a sentence of imprisonment for life in respect of murder has been imposed after the coming into force of this section,

(b) upon whom a sentence of imprisonment for life is deemed by section 8 of the Criminal Law Amendment (Punishment for Murder) Act to have been imposed, or

(c) in respect of whom a sentence of death in respect of murder has been commuted after the coming into force of this section to imprisonment for life, shall be released pursuant to the terms of a grant of parole under the Parole Act unless

(d) at least ten years of that sentence calculated in the manner described in subsection (4) have been served, and

(e) the National Parole Board, by a vote of at least two-thirds of its members, has made a decision that parole under that Act be granted to that person.

(3) Notwithstanding paragraph (2)(d), the judge presiding at the trial of an accused who is or was convicted of murder or, where such judge is unable to do so, another judge of the same court may

(a) at the time of sentencing of the accused, in a case referred to in paragraph (2)(a), or

(b) at any time on application made to him within a reasonable time after

(i) the coming into force of this section, in the case referred to in paragraph (2)(b), or

(ii) the execution of an instrument or in writing mentioned in subsection 684(2) declaring that a sentence of death has been commuted, in a case referred to in paragraph (2)(c), having regard to the character of the accused, the nature of the offence and the circumstances surrounding its commission, and to any recommendation made pursuant to section 596.1, by order substitute for the number of years specified in paragraph (2)(d) a number of years that is not more than twenty but more than ten.

(4) In calculating the time referred to in paragraph (2)(d) or the time substituted therefor pursuant to subsection (3), there shall be included any time spent in custody between,

(a) in the case of a sentence of imprisonment for life, the day on which the person was arrested and taken into custody in respect of the offence for which he was sentenced to imprisonment for life and the day the sentence was imposed or was deemed by section 8 of the Criminal Law Amendment (Punishment for Murder) Act to have been imposed, or

(b) in the case of a sentence of death, the day on which the person was arrested and taken into custody in respect of the offence for which he was sentenced to death and the day the sentence was commuted.

(5) Notwithstanding the Penitentiary Act and the Parole Act, in the case of any person described in paragraph (2)(a), (b) or (c), no absence may be authorized under section 26 of the Penitentiary Act and no day parole may be granted under section 10 of the Parole Act until the expiration of all but three years of the time referred to in paragraph (2)(d) or the time substituted therefor pursuant to subsection (3), as the case may be.

(6) For the purpose of Part XX, the sentence of imprisonment for life prescribed in subsection (1) is a minimum punishment."

4. Page 5: Strike out clause 4 and substitute therefor the following:

"4. Section 511 and subsections 538(3) and 589(2) of the said Act are repealed."

5. Page 5: Strike out clause 5 and substitute therefor the following:

"5. The said Act is further amended by adding thereto, immediately after section 596, the following section:

"596.1. Where a jury finds an accused guilty of murder, the judge who presides at the trial shall, before discharging the jury, put to them the following question:

"You have found the accused guilty of murder and the law requires that I now pronounce a sentence of imprisonment for life against him. Do you wish to make any recommendation with respect to the number of years he must serve before he is eligible for release on parole? You are not required to make any recommendation but, if you do, your recommendation will be considered by me when I am considering whether I should substitute for the ten year period, which the law would otherwise require the accused to serve before he is eligible for release on parole, a number of years that is not more than twenty but more than ten."

6. Page 6: Strike out clause 6 and substitute therefor the following:

"6. The definition "sentence" in section 601 of the said Act is repealed and the following substituted therefor:

"sentence" includes a declaration made under subsection 181(3), an order made under section 95, 653, 654 and 655 or subsection 218(3), and a disposition made under subsection 662.1(1), subsection 663(1) or subsection 664(3) or (4);"

7. Page 7: Strike out lines 23 to 40, inclusive, and substitute therefor the following:

"8. Where, either before or after the coming into force of this Act, a person has been convicted of having committed a murder that

(a) was alleged by an indictment to have been committed on, or on or about, a day that is within the period from December 29, 1972 to the coming into force of this Act, or between two days within that period, and

(b) was, at the time alleged by the indictment to have been the time when the murder was committed, punishable by death,"

8. Pages 8 and 9: Strike out clauses 10 and 11, and renumber clause 12 as clause 10.

THE SENATE

Thursday, November 22, 1973

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

THE ESTIMATES

REPORT OF NATIONAL FINANCE COMMITTEE ON SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES (A) PRESENTED AND PRINTED AS APPENDIX

Hon. Douglas D. Everett, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance, presented the following report of the committee, to which was referred supplementary estimates (A) laid before Parliament for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1974, and asked that the report be printed as an appendix to the Debates on the Senate and the Minutes of the Proceedings of today and form part of the permanent record of this house.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is it agreed that this report be printed as an appendix to the Debates of the Senate and the Minutes of the Proceedings of today and form part of the permanent record of this house?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(For text of report see appendix, pp. 1218-1224.)

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Hon. Mr. Everett: Honourable senators, I move, seconded by Senator Cook, that this report be taken into consideration at the next sitting of the Senate.

Motion agreed to.

AGRICULTURE

CHANGE IN COMMITTEE MEMBERSHIP

Hon. John M. Macdonald, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(i), moved:

That the name of the Honourable Senator Yuzyk be substituted for that of the Honourable Senator Haig on the list of senators serving on the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture.

Motion agreed to.

AIR CANADA

ABORTED LANDING AT OTTAWA AIRPORT—QUESTION

Hon. Mr. McElman: Honourable senators, I have a question which I should like to ask of the Leader of the Government in the Senate and of which I have not been able to give him notice, so I assume he will take this as notice for future reply.

If I may, honourable senators, I should like to give some background to my question. On Tuesday, November 13, Air Canada Flight No. 637 out of Montreal, landing in Ottawa at approximately 2 p.m., was waved off in the last stages of its approach to the runway. The airport was then under an extremely low ceiling of mist and heavy fog, and visual contact with the ground had just been attained.

The first officer advised, after rapidly pulling up into the cloud layer again, that the landing had been aborted because, and I quote, "a truck was on the runway." He stated that another attempt to land would be made, but because of the low ceiling it might be necessary to arrange for an alternate airport for landing. Therefore, my question is this:

1. Has the Ministry of Transport received a report that Air Canada Flight No. 637 out of Montreal had its initial landing attempt at Ottawa Airport, at approximately 2 p.m. on Tuesday, November 13, 1973, aborted?
2. If so:
   (a) What was the reason for such action?
   (b) Have the person or persons responsible for the cause of such action been identified?
   (c) What has been done to insure against any repetition of the cause or causes of such action?

Hon. Mr. Martin: I shall take the question as notice, as Senator McElman asked, and, as Senator Flynn might have said, this is a technical question and this is what I would be expected to do.

PUBLIC WORKS

HIGH COST OF DECORATING FEDERAL GOVERNMENT BUILDINGS—QUESTIONS ANSWERED

Hon. Mr. Martin: Honourable senators, on October 31, Senator Molson asked some interesting questions having to do with the decoration of government buildings, and Senator Forsey added a supplement about the "scrap iron in front of the buildings."

I have a long reply here, and I wonder if it would be agreeable to honourable senators for me to table this for the scrutiny of honourable senators.

Hon. Mr. Molson: Will it be printed in the proceedings of the day?

Hon. Mr. Martin: Certainly, if that is agreed.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(The answers follow)

1. DND

It is noted that the Honourable Senator Molson's question relates to potted plants and external Art Work only and the reply therefore is structured accordingly.

(1) The potted palms were purchased direct by the Department of National Defence at the time they purchased their furniture. The Bureau of Management Consulting Services were engaged by DND to design all of the interior layouts and they prepared the specifications for all internal furnishings.

(2) There are three pieces of externally placed sculpture, two of these are constructed in metal and one in fibreglass on a plywood frame. The total cost of the three works of Art is $123,000.

2. CONFEDERATION BUILDING

This portion of Senator Molson's question relates to $1 million spent in refurbishing the Confederation Building for the use of 88 members and five ministers.

(1) 85 members and 7 ministers are accommodated on floors 2 to 6 inclusive along with their administrative staffs.

(2) The cost of renovating these floors amounted to $475,000.

(3) The allotment of funds expended on this contract are accounted for as follows:—

Area	Cost	Status
(1) Floors 2 to 6	$475,000	Completed
(2) Support areas	$587,800	"
(3) Furniture	$300,000	"
(4) Cafeteria-lounge	$693,000	"
(5) Recreation wing	$165,000	"
(6) Other items	$ 60,000	"
Total	$2,280,800

3. EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

This portion of the question relates to the costs involved in connection with the "absolutely oriental splendour of the External Affairs Department."

(1) Construction cost of building by DPW, including partitions and carpets—$27.2 million (i.e. $25 per square foot).

(2) Plants for the cafeteria cost $1,110 and were purchased by DPW. Monthly maintenance cost is $60. These are the only plants in the building.

(3) The Department of External Affairs supplied all moveable furniture.

(4) Fine art work piece (Haida) which is located in front of External Affairs costs $35,000 and was part of the approved fine art allowance of $217,000 for the building.

OFFICIAL REPORT

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE

Hon. Mr. Argue: Honourable senators, I rise on a question of privilege to point out an error in yesterday's Debates of the Senate, an obvious and indisputable error. The appendix at page 1206 contains the total amendments that I would have moved at various stages had proceedings gone as I anticipated. However, the title of this appendix is as follows:

Speeches delivered on the occasion of the dedication of the Newfoundland book of remembrance in the Confederation Room, West Block, Parliament Buildings, Ottawa, October 21, 1973

What a dream world this is. The date on the page is October 30, 1973. It has been pointed out to me quite accurately that this error was not made by our staff, the amendments having been sent to the Printing Bureau in the correct form and with the correct title. Presumably, however, it was fed into a computer which changed the heading and the date.

There is a further error, which I cannot blame on the computer but must take the responsibility for myself. Clause 3, which proposes amendment to section 218.(2)(c) of the act, contains a series of words which appear twice in the same paragraph. I do not have to explain it, but if that paragraph is read it will be seen that there are words which are not required and are in fact repetitious and should be deleted from the standpoint of accuracy and good drafting.

[Editor's note: p. 1206 corrected accordingly.]

CUSTOMS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—THIRD READING

Hon. Salter A. Hayden moved the third reading of Bill C-189, to amend the Customs Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

CRIMINAL CODE (CAPITAL PUNISHMENT)

BILL TO AMEND—THIRD READING

Hon. George McIlraith moved the third reading of Bill C-2, to amend the Criminal Code.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Jacques Flynn: No. I think I should say a word. I read Hansard this morning and it occurred to me that the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole had yesterday indicated a method whereby we could have the Senate decide whether it wishes to make a decision in connection with the vital and essential question which this bill implies—that is, whether we are in favour of the total abolition or retention of capital punishment.

The suggestion, as I understand it, was that we proceed by way of a motion that would return the bill to the Committee of the Whole with specific instructions to make amendments which would bring about total abolition. I see that Senator McIlraith nods his head. In fact, it was his argument against the admissibility of the amendment moved by Senator Argue.

• (1410)

On the other hand, after reading Hansard and remembering the votes, I thought this would be an exercise in futility, because there is obviously no disposition on the part of this house to take the bull by the horns and make clear its opinion on the subject of abolition. It would rather have the bill pass as is and not create any problem either for the Government of Canada or for the House of Commons. I am so convinced of this view that I think we should completely forget about it and let the bill go.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed, on division.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

EXPANDED EUROPEAN COMMUNITIES—CONSIDERATION OF REPORT OF COMMITTEE—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the consideration of the Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs, entitled: "Canadian Relations with the European Community".—(Honourable Senator Carter).

Hon. Mr. Martin: Honourable senators, I wonder if Senator Carter would agree to letting this matter stand until later this day?

Hon. Mr. Carter: I agree.

Order stands.

[Later:]

Hon. Mr. Martin: Honourable senators, earlier in the day I asked Senator Carter whether he would mind allowing Order No. 7, which is the resumption of the debate on the consideration of the report of the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs regarding Canadian relations with the European Community, stand until later this day. The order does stand in Senator Carter's name, but I know he does not wish to go on today. It had been my intention to proceed, but because of the hour I will not do so.

I simply wanted to make the observation that I do not think there is anything on the Order Paper that is more important than this question of Canada's economic and trade relations with countries of the European Community.

A month ago we had a conference in this city in which senators and members of the House of Commons participated, along with representatives of the European Community, and I would say, particularly to the news editors, that if they really want to get their teeth into something, this is the subject.

As a member of the government I certainly intend to participate in this debate. However, for the reasons mentioned, I do not intend to go on today. I simply wanted to take this opportunity to bring the attention of the Senate to this matter.

Order stands.

PUBLIC WORKS

ART ADVISORY COMMITTEE—INQUIRY STANDS

On the Inquiry of Honourable Senator Forsey:

That he will inquire of the Government:—

1. Who are the members of the Art Advisory Committee of the Department of Public Works?
2. When were they appointed?
3. For what terms of office?
4. What is the remuneration of each member?
5. What are the qualifications of each member?

An Hon. Senator: Stand.

Hon. Mr. Forsey: Honourable senators, I hear somebody say "stands". I think I can take it as affirmation of the fact that I have risen and am now standing.

I shall be brief on this subject. Some honourable senators may recall that some time ago I drew attention to the monstrosity known as "Traffic", that so-called sculpture, that manufacture of fibreglass, in the square opposite the Lord Elgin Hotel. I endeavoured to find out at that time how much had been spent on this trash.

I was fobbed off with the outrageous statement, as I consider it, that it was not "policy" to reveal what was spent for these things.

Somebody else has evidently been more successful than I in discovering how much is spent on this kind of thing. I see Honourable Senator Molson smiling at me, and I recall that I suggested that he add something about these concoctions to the questions that he asked the other day about certain government expenditures.

Somebody else has been more successful than I in finding out what is spent on these things. I noticed, in the Ottawa Journal on Wednesday, November 7, and again, I think, in the issue of the next day, illustrations of the performance—I find it difficult to use parliamentary language about these things, and possibly I am outraging the dictionary in calling it a performance—in front of the National Defence Building. I think there is more than one of them. There is also, of course, the thing outside the Pearson Building, the External Affairs Building, which I believe was described by a high personage, who cannot be mentioned I think under the rules of the house, as, "Hello, what's this? Something left behind by the builders' labourers?"

Well, somebody has found out what some of these things cost, because the Ottawa Journal heading says, "What's blue, tubular and costs $50,000?" It goes on to describe something about the so-called sculpture and says that it was commissioned after approval by the Public Works Advisory Committee on Art. Later it says that the expenditure for this particular affair was $50,000 and that the other things surrounding the Defence Headquarters, including the Robert Murray "Tundra" object—which I have not had the dubious advantage of seeing—on the canal side of the building, have cost the Canadian taxpayer a total of $201,000.

Well, this takes my curiosity a stage farther. I not only want to find out what these things are costing the Canadian taxpayer—I think we are being hoaxed and played practical jokes on to a most astounding tune for the benefit of people whose qualifications in the field of art seem to me extremely dubious—but I find this is being done on the basis of recommendations by some, as far as I know, anonymous committee known as the Art Advisory Committee of the Department of Public Works, or the Public Works Advisory Committee on Art. I may not have the title exactly right, but I trust there will be no attempt to say that the question is so ill-phrased that it is impossible to know what I am driving at.

So I am asking now, who are the members of this committee; when were they appointed; for what term of office; what is the remuneration of each member; and what are the qualifictions of each member?

If we can get that information we may be in a better position to decide whether, as I believe, we are being "had," hoaxed, trifled with, fooled, swindled by these people, who, I suppose, are avant-garde and people whom most persons of cultivation and education would hesitate to blaspheme against.

Well, I still think that "the intelligentsia, though God knows why they're called so", as the late Healey Willan once said, sometimes make asses of themselves. I suggest that on this occasion they may have done so also, and that this, in fact, may be a conspicuous illustration of that. The bien-pensants and the cultivated are sometimes afraid to say anything against these distinguished people because they are afraid of being called boobs and idiots and back-numbers.

Well, I am willing to risk all that. I should like to find out who these people are who are advising on these kinds of things and what qualifications they have. I suspect their qualifications may be very open to question.

When we have this information we may be able to pursue the matter further and prevent the Canadian taxpayer from being swindled, hoaxed, fooled, trifled with, and mulcted in the fashion in which it seems to me he is now being "had" in connection with these excrescences which are flourishing, bursting forth, all over the landscape of this city.

Hon. Mr. Molson: I wonder if my honourable friend would permit a question? When he refers to this object that cost $50,000, is he alluding to the item which I think on an earlier occasion was described as being a very great or large intestine?

Hon. Mr. Forsey: No, honourable senators. That was the large fibreglass affair opposite the Lord Elgin Hotel, in what was formerly a very pleasant little park, now ruined for anybody with any aesthetic sense at all. This is something of wrought iron—I don't know—a steel affair that is stuck in front of the new National Defence building. There are two illustrations in the Ottawa Journal referring to two different things. One of them appears to be more or less hollow and we have a delightful picture of one of the workmen sticking his head into the thing with the caption, "Anybody home?" A very appropriate inquiry, I think.

It reminds me of a student of mine who once answered a question on an examination paper on the House of Lords by saying, "The House of Lords has a total of about 700 members, but they are usually not all there." I am inclined to think that possibly one of those personages may have had something to do with the designing of this, and this skeptical-looking workman who was peering into it—doubtless a very uncultivated person, like me—is asking what this is supposed to be, and whether the people who put it up there have taken leave of their senses and ought not to be at large. Sometimes when I see these things I am inclined to wonder whether perhaps the public pillory should have been abolished.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: Honourable senators, I perhaps should say at this moment that I would not like to let the impression get abroad that Senator Forsey's views are shared by all senators. The very extravagant language he has used reminds me very much of the language that was used when the Group of Seven first broke upon the Canadian scene.

Hon. Mr. Forsey: Don't be silly. Don't give us that again, please.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: I could quote the exact things that were said. It was called the "Hot Mush School" by the most eminent art critic of the time. That is my immediate answer to Senator Forsey, who says, "Don't give us that again." At a later date I would be glad to give him some more quotes from that time, and some more quotes about the French Impressionists in much the same kind of extravagant language that we have just heard.

I rise to say that in my view this is merely Senator Forsey's opinion. I dislike certainly the one so-called art item that he referred to every bit as much as he does, perhaps more. But I do not condemn it on that account. It so happens that I myself have been collecting paintings for many, many years. I find myself reaching a point of lack of understanding of a great deal of modern art. There is a great deal that I dislike. My own personal opinion of it might be couched in the same kind of language as Senator Forsey has used if I were talking to myself.

Having in mind, however, the long history of, if you like, art appreciation, art understanding, I think it is a mistake for anybody, who merely does not understand or appreciate modern art, to condemn it out of hand in the kind of language we have just heard. I repeat that I have not and, as far as I know, will not buy a so-called avant-garde modern painting; I do not want to have it in my house. However, I have some knowledge of the bridges that have had to be gone over between one school of art, one period of art, and another. Anybody who has crossed those bridges almost inevitably finds the land on the other side more inhospitable than the land he has just left. But on reflection that person is likely to find that he regards this new land as inhospitable only because he does not understand it. Persons entering a new land and finding it inhospitable, almost immediately find it ugly just because it is inhospitable.

I make these remarks because I would not want to be associated with such an extravagant, one-sided and vehement a criticism of some of the works that Senator Forsey has referred to. Although I am not a modernist in art, I do not have the same reaction that he does to the art work in front of the External Affairs Building, the Lester B. Pearson Building. I find it difficult to understand, but I do not find it, as I do the piece opposite the Lord Elgin Hotel, ugly, and I think I am beginning to understand it.

Inquiry stands.

ADJOURNMENT

Leave having been given to revert to Notices of Motions:

Hon. Leopold Langlois: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), I move that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until Tuesday, December 4, 1973, at 8 o'clock in the evening.

This, of course, is subject to the usual reservation as to recall.

Motion agreed to.

TRANSPORTATION

NORTH SYDNEY-PORT AUX BASQUES FREIGHT AND PASSENGER SERVICE: PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND-MAINLAND FERRY SERVICE—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Frederick William Rowe moved pursuant to notice:

> That in the opinion of the Senate, the Government of Canada should, in future, guarantee and ensure the continuous maintenance, at all times and in all contingencies, of a freight and passenger service between North Sydney and Port aux Basques, and an efficient ferry service between Prince Edward Island and the mainland of Canada, in accordance with the Terms of Union of Newfoundland with Canada and the Order of Her Majesty in Council admitting Prince Edward Island into the Union.

He said: Honourable senators, in 1948 the people of Newfoundland by a small majority—an extremely small majority, as it happens, barely over 50 per cent—elected to throw in their lot with the Canadian nation. Accordingly, Terms of Union were negotiated in the succeeding months, and those Terms of Union were adopted by a statute at Westminster and became part of the British North America Act. From the standpoint of the Newfoundland people, one of the most important terms in that document was term 32, paragraph (1), which provides:

> Canada will maintain in accordance with the traffic offering a freight and passenger steamship service between North Sydney and Port aux Basques, which . . . will include suitable provision for the carriage of motor vehicles.

Honourable senators, I am going now to make a categorical statement. I do this with all the emphasis at my command, because it is most important that this body, and others whom we hope to influence, and the Canadian people generally, appreciate the fact that I am going to state now. Without that term, it is extremely doubtful that the Newfoundland people would have agreed to becoming part of Canada.

Let me interject at this point that what we are talking about is not a single thing. To take as an example the Province of Ontario, for purposes of comparison, we are talking about every road and every railway line that connects that province with the other provinces of Canada and the United States of America. That is what we are talking about. It is very easy to single out a ferry service, but a disruption in the ferry service to Newfoundland is the equivalent of closing off every single highway and railway line that goes into or comes out of the Province of Ontario. I repeat, without that term the people of Newfoundland would not have agreed to becoming part of the Canadian nation. That fact must be clearly understood by the rest of Canada, although I am afraid it has not been properly appreciated.

Honourable senators will notice that the term makes no provision for disruption of service, and this for a very simple reason. Apart from the normal short delays of a few hours or a day that might be occasioned by what we call acts of God—for example, a hurricane—it was never envisaged by the Newfoundland signatories to that agreement, or by the people generally, that any disruption in that service would ever be tolerated by the party responsible for maintaining it, and that party, let me say now, is not the Canadian National Railway services; that party is the Government and the Parliament of Canada. That is the party responsible for maintaining that service.

Let me interject here and say that the fact that the Canadian National Railway is operating the service is purely incidental. In this case, Canadian National was the chosen instrument of the Government of Canada, and it was chosen as a matter of convenience and practicality. The method used by the Government of Canada and the Parliament of Canada to meet its responsibilities, however, is not the concern of the people of Newfoundland. It is not my concern now, and I am not going to discuss it at all. What is the concern of the people of Newfoundland, and my concern and, I hope, the concern of the Senate, is that Canada shall not renege on its responsibilities. But this is what Canada has done, and we have had repeated trouble since 1949 concerning this matter. I do not refer to any one administration. This motion, if adopted, will, I hope, influence all administrations.

Last summer, at the height of the passenger traffic to and from Newfoundland, this service was disrupted, directly or indirectly, for practically the whole of the summer season. It is true that the actual period of cessation of service was just less than two weeks. There were two weeks when nothing happened. The service was suspended for two weeks, which, in the case of the Province of Ontario, would have meant that every road and railway line leading into or out of that province would have been cut off. Just picture in your minds, honourable senators, that situation obtaining in the Province of Ontario for two weeks.

I said that the period of actual cessation was just under two weeks, but the threats and the uncertainty that preceded the actual date of cessation, and the inconvenience subsequent to the resumption of service that resulted from the backlog that had built up, meant that for all practical purposes there was either partial or full interruption of that service for most of the summer.

Newfoundland is an island. I do not need to tell you that. However, it has more than a half a million people on it, and although there is a reasonably good air service between Newfoundland and the rest of Canada, the fact is that the real lifeline of Newfoundland is that ferry service between Port aux Basques and North Sydney.

I might interject again and draw attention to the number of ships involved in this, and the size of those ships. I am sure that most honourable senators do not have any idea of the magnitude of that service, or of the size of those huge ferries. There are not one or two but, at times, a dozen operating back and forth, carrying thousands and tens of thousands of motor vehicles, thousands and tens of thousands of people, and, of course, thousands and tens of thousands of tons of freight.

As I said earlier, the cutting-off of that ferry service for any period of time is analogous to completely isolating any other province on the mainland of Canada by cutting all its road connections and all its railway connections simultaneously. This has never happened with any other province of Canada. It has never happened with Ontario. Why has it not happened? There is a very simple reason. It would not be permitted to happen. No Government of Canada would sit idly by, and no Parliament of Canada would sit idly by, even for 48 hours, and allow a province like Ontario to become completely isolated in every respect.

Let us consider just one aspect of this incredible injustice—because that is what it is—to Newfoundland. I am confining my remarks to Newfoundland, because I am quite sure my honourable colleague, Senator Bonnell, and perhaps others, will wish to speak on this motion, particularly in so far as it refers to Prince Edward Island.

In 1950 the value of the tourist trade to Newfoundland was between $1 million and $2 million. Over the succeeding 20-odd years, by building and improving the roads, by encouraging the erection and operation of hotels and motels, and other catering services, and by extensive promotion and advertising—in other words, by investing hundreds of millions of dollars that was badly needed for schools and universities, trade schools and hospitals, and a hundred other services—by investing our money in those things that I have just enumerated, we have been able to build up the tourist trade. I am very happy to say that this has been done with the active participation and co-operation of the Government of Canada, particularly with respect to building up and improving the ferry service across the Cabot Strait. I do not need to tell you what one of those huge boats like the William Carson would cost if we had to build it today. If we had to build it today that one boat would cost $20 million. But, as I said earlier, there is more than one boat involved here.

By investing the money of the people of Newfoundland and by making that sacrifice—and it was a sacrifice—we have been able to build up a tourist trade which, this past year, was projected to reach $100 million.

I remember, when I was chairman of the governing committee of "Come Home Year" in Newfoundland in 1966, that in 1965 the value of the tourist trade in Newfoundland was $40 million. Largely through our efforts, in a variety of ways, in 1966 we drove the figure up to, I think I am correct in saying, $60 million. That was in that one year, and it has been increasing ever since, and would have reached $100 million this year.

That may not sound very large to people in Ontario, but let me remind this house that it means that the tourist industry is the single biggest industry in Newfoundland today; it is bigger even than the fisheries, and bigger even than our paper mills—and we have two of the largest paper mills in the world. It means that the tourist industry is of more value to the Province of Newfoundland than are those two great paper mills.

I might say that this estimate of $100 million is not my figure at all, but is based on authoritative records. For example, the gross value of the tourist industry to Newfoundland in 1972 was $85 million—incidentally, that was 22 per cent higher than it had been the previous year. The tourist authorities had projected a 25 per cent increase for 1973. Please note that figure. In 1972 the gross value was actually $85 million, and projected for the following year, 1973, was a 25 per cent increase, particularly for the three months of July, August and September which, of course, comprise the high season for us. Instead of being 25 per cent higher than it was the previous year, the actual gross value for those three months of July, August and September was 10 per cent lower. Translated into bodies, this means that in that period alone there were 30,000 visitors who would have come to Newfoundland but did not come.

Each one of those visitors would have spent an average of approximately $200. These would have been people from all over Canada and the United States. Indeed, there would have been people from other parts of the world, but mostly our visitors come from the mainland of North America. If those 30,000 people spent $200 each the total would amount to $6 million. The generating capacity of tourist money is considered by economists to be greater than that from any other source. The multiplier effect in the case of tourist money is higher, but even those figures, if used, do not tell the full story.

Honourable senators, during that period of acute disruption thousands of visitors from every province of Canada and from every state in the United States were stranded, most of them in the Port aux Basques area, without hotel accommodation. Port aux Basques is a lovely little town of about 7,000 people and it has some very nice hotels, but it certainly does not have the capacity to accommodate thousands and thousands of people. Those people—men, women and children—through no fault of their own, were stranded, and most of them were deprived of the obvious amenities of life. Some of them were even deprived of the necessities of life. The Port aux Basques area became almost a ghetto.

Picture a family from California, their money gone, worried, perhaps somebody in the family is sick, children not ready for school—and bear in mind that this was almost the end of August—stranded on the rocks at Port aux Basques, more than 4,000 miles from home, with a car and possibly a trailer, and not knowing whether they would be forced to stay two days, six days or six weeks. The majority was there for two weeks, and some for more than that. It does not require very much of an imagination to understand what kind of goodwill ambassadors they will be for Newfoundland for the next 20 years. We can readily understand what their advice will be to other people in California, British Columbia and Alberta about visiting Newfoundland. The multiplier effect here will be almost astronomical. What it really means is that for year after year Newfoundland will be deprived of millions of dollars that would otherwise have been brought into the province.

So far, honourable senators, I have mentioned only the tourist industry. But the disruption in freight services caused, and is causing, further financial loss and hardship. At this moment there is not a construction project on the island of Newfoundland that has not been hamstrung by a failure to get necessary supplies. Two days ago, on November 19, I contacted the railway authorities who informed me that they still had at North Sydney, and destined for Newfoundland, a backlog of 424 cars of freight. This figure has remained constant ever since the disruption in August. When you consider that priority has to be given to perishable goods, you can imagine what this backlog has done to the people in the construction industry. Asbestos and steel will not rot in two or three days.

Furthermore, honourable senators, consider the fact that in August of 1972, 39,000 tons of freight came across the Cabot Strait into Newfoundland. That was in just one month. The projected increase, according to Canadian National authorities—these are not my own figures—for this year was 12 per cent. In other words, approximately 44,000 tons of freight should have come into Newfoundland. This freight was needed; people were waiting for it. But in the month of August this year the actual amount that arrived was just over 22,000 tons, and we have not been able to catch up. At this moment there are actual shortages in Newfoundland because of this disruption.

Honourable senators, historically, Newfoundland has had a continuous struggle in trying to overcome the handicaps caused by geography, by climate, and by a limited economy which is extremely vulnerable to changes and fluctuations in world markets. In the last 25 years we have made enormous progress, thanks, in part, to the help and goodwill of the rest of Canada—and I know of no Newfoundlander who does not appreciate that fact. We, in turn, have been able to make some contribution to the Canadian nation. But Newfoundland's progress and that contribution cannot be maintained if, in addition to the other natural obstacles I mentioned, we are going to be subjected to periodic severance of our lifeline.

Such a severance cannot be justified under any condition. It becomes all the more regrettable, indeed all the more incomprehensible, when it is realized that the people of Newfoundland accepted, in good faith, the pledge of the Canadian Parliament—and that is what it was, honourable senators, not of the government but of the Parliament of Canada—that this ferry service, this lifeline, would be maintained without any ifs or buts.

Perhaps I should interject at this point that even without those Terms of Union, section 91 of the British North America Act specifically declares that the operation of ferries between the provinces, and between Canada and other countries, is completely, wholly and solely a federal responsibility. So, let me point out that in our case we have a double assurance. We have the Terms of Union that were negotiated and signed in good faith back in 1949, and we have section 91 of the British North America Act. We in Newfoundland hold that at all times and under all conditions there is a constitutional and a moral obligation and responsibility on the part of the Government and Parliament of Canada to maintain this service, and because of this I have no hesitation whatever in inviting all my colleagues in the Senate to support this motion.

Hon. Mr. Deschatelets: Would the honourable senator permit a question? You are asking in your motion that in future the Government of Canada guarantee and ensure the maintenance of the services you have mentioned at all times. At the end of your motion you say that you would like this in accordance with the Terms of Union. Are you asking for something that is not provided for in the Terms of Union?

Hon. Mr. Rowe: No, the Terms of Union are quite specific and quite clear. What we are asking is that the Government and Parliament of Canada live up to its obligations in this regard. I am not thinking of any particular administration. I am thinking of all administrations in the future, for as long as Canada is one nation and Newfoundland is part of that nation.

Hon. Chesley W. Carter: Honourable senators, I should like to say a few words in seconding the motion just introduced by my colleague, Senator Rowe. As I listened to what he had to say, I could not help but think what a sad commentary it is on the state of affairs in Canada that a motion such as the one now before us should become necessary. I say that because, in its essence, this motion, as Senator Rowe has just pointed out, calls on the Government of Canada to obey the Constitution.

The Terms of Union, drawn up under the authority of the British North America Act, were incorporated into and became part of it. Term 3 of the Terms of Union states as follows:

> The British North America Acts, 1867 to 1946, shall apply to the Province of Newfoundland in the same way, and to the like extent as they apply to the provinces heretofore comprised in Canada, as if the Province of Newfoundland had been one of the provinces originally united, except in so far as varied by these Terms and except such provisions as are in terms made or by reasonable intendment may be held to be specially applicable to or only to affect one or more and not all of the provinces originally united.

The Terms of Union then are not merely an agreement between two countries. They are not a treaty. Even a treaty would be binding upon both parties to live up to its terms, but the Terms of Union are a part of our Constitution, which is the guarantee of our rights and freedoms. If any one part of our Constitution can be disregarded, then every other part can be disregarded, and the Constitution becomes only a scrap of paper with no real significance. It becomes mere window dressing, which sounds nice to the ear and looks nice in print, but is actually worthless as a safeguard of our rights and freedoms. This is a matter with which this chamber, the Senate of Canada, as a watchdog of our rights and freedoms—particularly the rights and freedoms of regions, provinces and minorities—should certainly and most properly be concerned.

Senator Rowe, therefore, is to be commended for bringing this matter to our attention, and providing a means whereby we can discuss it and urge upon the Government of Canada the necessity of taking such steps as will ensure that the Terms of Union will be lived up to in the same way as any other part of our Constitution.

Senator Rowe stated that the Terms of Union require the Government of Canada to take over and operate certain services in Newfoundland. The exact term that deals with this is term 32(1), which I should like to put on the record. It provides:

> Canada will maintain in accordance with the traffic offering a freight and passenger steamship service between North Sydney and Port aux Basques, which, on completion of a motor highway between Corner Brook and Port aux Basques, will include suitable provision for the carriage of motor vehicles.

I will not quote the other provisions of term 32, as the essence of the commitment is contained in paragraph (1).

Hon. Mr. Martin: May I ask Senator Carter, just so that I can follow, to read term 3, to which Senator Rowe referred? What are the provisions of term 3?

Hon. Mr. Carter: Term 3 provides that the British North America Act shall apply to the Province of Newfoundland in the same way as it applies to all other provinces, and as it had applied to all other provinces before Newfoundland became a part of Canada. That is all it says. In other words, the British North America Act is Newfoundland's Constitution also, as well as Canada's.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Carter: And just as all other parts of the Constitution are important, so is this particular part important and ought not to be disregarded, or allowed to be disregarded.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Yes. Thank you.

Hon. Mr. Carter: Under term 31, in accordance with the commitment to provide certain services, the Terms of Union provided:

> At the date of Union, or as soon thereafter as practicable, Canada will take over the following services and will as from the date of Union relieve the Province of Newfoundland of the public costs incurred in respect of each service taken over, namely,
> (a) the Newfoundland Railway, including steamship and other marine services;
> (b) the Newfoundland Hotel, if requested by the Government of the Province of Newfoundland within six months from the date of Union—

The term continues to list ten other services from paragraphs (c) to (l) inclusive, which I shall not read because they do not relate to the motion we are now debating.

The motion before us emphasizes that the Government of Canada should, in effect, guarantee and ensure the continuous maintenance, at all times and in all contingencies, of a freight and passenger service between North Sydney and Port aux Basques. The operative words in the motion are "guarantee and ensure" but term 32 of the Terms of Union, which I just read, goes beyond that, providing that not only should it guarantee and ensure the services, but the services themselves should be commensurate with the traffic offered. That part of the Terms of Union has never been honoured.

Perhaps, as I have quoted several Terms of Union, I might be permitted to quote one more. Term 33 reads as follows:

> The following public works and property of Newfoundland shall become the property of Canada when the service concerned is taken over by Canada, subject to any trusts existing in respect thereof, and to any interest other than that of Newfoundland in the same, namely,
> (a) the Newfoundland Railway, including rights of way, wharves, drydocks, and other real property, rolling stock, equipment, ships, and other personal property;
> (b) the Newfoundland Airport at Gander, including buildings and equipment, together with any other property used for the operation of the Airport;
> (c) the Newfoundland Hotel and equipment—

Term 33 continues and lists six other classes of properties, facilities and assets, from paragraph (d) to paragraph (j). Therefore the whole communication service of Newfoundland, particularly the rail and ferry service, and the facilities connected therewith, became the property of the Canadian government. They are the owners.

● (1500)

The Canadian government appointed the Canadian National Railways as their operating agent for the Newfoundland railway service, the gulf ferry service, the coastal steamship services, and the railway express service. Nevertheless we must not lose sight of the fact that ownership of those facilities rests with the government of Canada, and, as Senator Rowe pointed out, it is their responsibility to see that satisfactory services are maintained. That responsibility cannot be sloughed off on to another party, and certainly not on to the operating agencies.

In my humble opinion, it was a mistake to turn those services over to the CNR to operate. The CNR had no experience in operating coastal steamship services, and the company was not enthusiastic about operating the Newfoundland railway. It treated it from the beginning as a poor orphan, and it has downgraded the services to the point where they are now worse than they were 25 years ago when Newfoundland first became part of Canada.

Although a rail and car ferry service has been provided, and the number of ferries increased, yet the service on those ferries is deteriorating considerably. Records will show that when I was a member of the other place, I complained unceasingly—

Hon. Mr. Martin: You were a very good member, as I recall.

Hon. Mr. Carter: —about this state of affairs, about the type of service being provided by the CNR. I did not receive a satisfactory reply. In response to my questions and correspondence, I always received the stock answer that the CNR operates under the Railway Act and the federal government could not interfere in the management of the CNR.

That does not make sense. Any government or person can interfere in the operations of their agents. However, I must be honest and say that one of the reasons I did not have more success was because the provincial government itself did not express much concern about this state of affairs. To some extent I was a lone voice in the wilderness.

Had there been a breach of the British North America Act with regard to education, the welfare service, or anything else, there would have been an immediate uproar on the part of the provincial government. But as it concerned railway services there was no outcry, and, in my opinion, the provincial government was a little too quiet, which encouraged the CNR to continue in the pattern it was following.

The stock answer that I always received was that the CNR was operating under the Railway Act, and, as an independent body, could not be interfered with in any way. But the Railway Act did not compel the federal government to use the CNR as their operating agent. Neither was there any other legislation that prevented the Canadian government from taking those Newfoundland services from the CNR and setting up another operating agency for that purpose.

As a result, the CNR continually downgraded the railway passenger service and finally discontinued it, and replaced it by a bus service. I have travelled by the CNR bus from Port aux Basques to St. John's, a distance of over 600 miles, and while I recognize that it is a faster service than by rail, it is a cruel and hazardous experience, particularly for elderly or sick people, and mothers travelling with young children. The winter before last one of the buses became lost in a snow drift and was missing for, I believe, almost 24 hours before being located.

Hon. Mr. Buckwold: Did they miss it?

Hon. Mr. Carter: It might appear to be funny to some honourable senators, but they should consider the unpleasant experience of the people concerned. The bus carried between 60 and 80 passengers, and it was lost on the highway in winter without food, heat or means of communication. The passengers had to wait until a bulldozer operator from the Department of Highways located the bus and pulled it back onto the road. That is the sort of hazardous experience that Newfoundlanders are called upon to undergo. It is no laughing matter for a little child to be cooped up in a bus lost for 24 hours during the winter.

Hon. Mr. Martin: That, of course, is one thing that the honourable senator will not become.

Hon. Mr. Carter: This is not a subject for wisecracking. It is a miracle that no disaster has occurred to date. However, there have been many near misses, and sooner or later one is likely to occur. Perhaps the current fuel shortage will compel the CNR to reinstate the rail passenger service.

With regard to the express service, I should like to relate a story that I read in one of the St. John's newspapers a short time ago. The newspaper contained a letter to the editor, written by a someone I know personally.

The story, as related by the letter, was about a person in Grand Bank, Newfoundland, who wrote to a mail order house on the mainland for some goods. It takes from six to seven months to receive freight from Toronto, and the person about whom I am speaking requested that the goods be sent by express.

When nothing was received after a period of seven or eight weeks, inquiries were made, and it was found that the parcel had been returned to Toronto because there was no express office at Grand Bank. The parcel was re-addressed to St. John's, and arrangements had to be made to get the parcel from St. John's to Grand Bank.

Hon. Mr. Laird: How far is that?

[Hon. Mr. Carter.]

Hon. Mr. Carter: It is nearly 200 miles by road, and practically the same distance by sea. There used to be an express service at Grand Bank. I recall that in days gone by I could always express a parcel to Grand Bank, and have it delivered. But apparently they have discontinued the service.

Senator Rowe emphasized the hardships to Newfoundland's economy when our lifeline is cut. The ferry service is our lifeline. We could not live without it. Last summer the ferry service was disrupted for two weeks. As Senator Rowe pointed out, when freight becomes congested and piles up for two weeks in the terminal at North Sydney, all kinds of problems occur, and when goods start to move, preference must be given to perishable items. Consequently, the goods which do not perish get very low priority, and move much more slowly. As a result, the cost of building houses in Newfoundland has skyrocketed in the last two or three months. I myself know a person in St. John's who started remodelling his house in June. The contractor expected supplies to arrive within two weeks—by the middle of July at the latest. That remodelling is still not completed because the supplies are not yet in. As Senator Rowe pointed out, these supplies would not be perishable and, therefore, are moved at a much slower rate. Goods such as building supplies have to wait, and God knows how long they will sit there before being moved. The result is, of course, that the whole building industry is disrupted, and the cost of living goes up. This is all taking place at a time when the cost of living in Newfoundland is already higher than in any other part of Canada.

What disturbs me most in connection with this matter is that I do not see any measures being taken as a result of what happened last summer to ensure that it will not happen again. All that has happened so far is that an announcement has been made that the ferry services are going to be consolidated under a single management. But it is still the CNR management—the same corporation which acts as a buffer between the people and the government, the same corporation which was involved in the situation that caused the disruption, the same organization, the same corporation, which is responsible for the poor service and the downgrading of the service which I just described.

The motion is that Canada in the future should guarantee and ensure service. I do not know how the Government of Canada can guarantee and ensure continuous maintenance of freight and passenger service, but at least they could show that they are trying to do something in that direction. As of this moment they have not shown that they intend to deal with the problem at all, that they intend to do anything other than continue what has been going on over the last 25 years.

There are certain things which could be done. A separate operating agency could be set up outside the Canadian National service. That would be one solution. Another solution would be for the Ferry Corporation, which is now the body which is going to manage all ferry operations, should have as part of its employment conditions a provision dealing with the non-interruption of the service. In other words, when people sign on for a job with that company they should do so under the condition of employment that they will not interrupt the service or allow the service to be interrupted.

Another solution would be to use naval personnel. Perhaps there could be a provision that in the case of a recurrence of what happened last summer, naval personnel would take over and operate these ferries.

Those are three possibilities. Personally, I think this problem should be studied by a Senate committee, possibly by the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications. To simply get up and sound off in the Chamber is not going to accomplish anything. It will simply evaporate in words which will come out in print, and that will be the end of it.

To some extent it is going to be an exercise in futility unless some concrete action results from this debate. I do hope that we will take this seriously; that we, as senators, will regard it as part of our duties and obligations to impress upon the Government of Canada that every part of the British North America Act is sacred; that every part of our Constitution should be lived up to. It should not be regarded as a mere piece of paper. We should go a little farther than that and make suggestions to the Government of Canada as to what can be done to prevent a recurrence of the disaster, as I view it, which occurred last summer.

On motion of Senator Inman, for Senator Bonnell, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, December 4, at 8 p.m.

THE ESTIMATES

REPORT OF STANDING SENATE COMMITTEE ON NATIONAL FINANCE ON SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES (A) FOR FISCAL YEAR ENDING MARCH 31, 1974

WEDNESDAY, November 21, 1973.

The Standing Senate Committee on National Finance, to which were referred Supplementary Estimates (A) laid before Parliament for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1974, has in obedience to the order of reference of Thursday, 8th November, 1973 examined the said Supplementary Estimates (A) and reports as follows:

Witnesses heard by the Committee were the Honourable C. M. Drury, President of the Treasury Board, and Mr. B. A. MacDonald, Assistant Secretary, Program Branch, Treasury Board.

These Supplementary Estimates total $1,004,716,768 of which $8,783,522 are non-budgetary items, that is to say, loans, investments or advances. Budgetary expenditures total $995,933,246 of which $527,662,840 are statutory items. The total Estimates for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1974 are increased to $20,291,231,533.

The Committee notes with concern the increasing size of Supplementary Estimates in recent years. The following table indicates this trend:

Recent History of Supplementary Estimates
(Millions of Dollars)

	Supplementary Estimates (A)				Supplementary Estimates (B)
Fiscal Year	Voted	Statutory	Loans Investments Advances	Total	Voted	Statutory	Loans Investments Advances	Total
1967–68	111.0	0	65.8	176.8	281.6	0	6.4	288
1968–69	0	0	0	0	151.9	0	70.4	222.3
1969–70	66.4	0	24.8	91.2	216	0	41.6	257.6
1970–71	293.1	195.8	172.2	661.1	28.9	43.0	196.6	268.5
1971–72	361.9	198.1	312.0	872	231.0	35.0	5.0	271
1972–73	473	0	817	1,290	203	122	110	435
1973–74	468	528	9	1,005

Of the budgetary expenditures, the larger statutory items are as follows:

1. Finance—$147,290,000: Additional fiscal transfer payments to the provinces under the British North America Act, the Federal-Provincial Fiscal Arrangements Act and other statutory authority because of higher tax yields.

2. Finance—$59,000,000: Additional charges on the public debt due to higher interest rates.

3. National Health & Welfare—$222,000,000: Increases in the Family Allowances and Youth Allowances Programs to $12 per child.

4. National Defence—$78,640,000: Payment towards an actuarial deficiency in the Canadian Forces Superannuation Account based on the regular five-year assessment of the actuarial deficiency of that account.

5. Transport—$27,200,000: Payments to the railways for maintenance of passenger services and uneconomic branch line services pursuant to the provisions of the Railway Act.

Of the budgetary expenditures, the larger voted items are as follows:

1. Manpower & Immigration—$151,900,000: The carry-over and extension of the 1972-73 Local Initiatives Projects and for the costs of the 1973-74 Local Initiatives Projects to be borne in this fiscal year.

2. Veterans Affairs—$65,000,000: Increased pensions and allowances to veterans.

3. Agriculture—$52,790,000: Payments to subsidize the price of fluid milk and milk powder to the consumer.

These Supplementary Estimates do not include the additional increases to an average of $20 per child in family and youth allowances previously announced by the government, nor do they include the cost of the program subsidizing the price of bread.

The Committee examined various items contained in these Supplementary Estimates and received answers to their questions from the Treasury Board officials. In the case of eight items, answers were not immediately available and the Treasury Board officials agreed to provide material as soon as possible. The questions for which answers are to be supplied are as follows:

1. With regard to the Department of Justice allowance, are the beneficiaries of this allowance being paid now or is payment being held up until passage of these supplementary estimates? How many people are being held up in terms of being paid this allowance or, in general, how is this situation being met?

2. Could the Committee have a tabular breakdown of the Estimates between federal transfer payments to other governments and direct federal payments to individuals? Could you also show the total federal expenditures on its own programs, i.e., payments from the federal purse to the private sector for goods and services?

3. Unemployment Insurance benefits are now taxable. Can you forecast how much additional tax revenue this will generate?

4. With regard to the new Family Allowances, could Mr. Drury present a precis of the whole scheme?

5. There was a press report that a Kitchener group of homosexuals were funded by Opportunities for Youth to produce a manual on homosexuality. Is this true and, if so, what excuse is there for it? Please provide full information on this project.

6. What percentage of LIP projects funded to date have resulted in unsatisfactory audits?

7. The Minister of the Environment undertook to amend existing legislation under which fishing vessels subsidies are made. Does the first item in the Supplementary Estimates under "Fisheries and Management Research Contributions", on page 30 of the Supplementary Estimates, mean that the Minister no longer intends to amend the legislation?

8. What is the present deficit in the Unemployment Insurance Fund?

The Committee discussed with the President of the Treasury Board the recent report of the Economic Council of Canada and more specifically the following two recommendations contained therein:

> 1. We recommend that the growth of government transfer payments to individuals not exceed an average yearly rate of approximately 11 per cent during the period 1973-76.
> 2. We recommend that the federal and provincial governments establish, for themselves and for the public sector as a whole, one or more indicators of the desirable level of increase in public expenditures for a three-year period. To this end, we recommend that they entrust the preparation of background documents to the continuing committee of officials on fiscal and economic matters or to the Economic Council of Canada.

The President of the Treasury Board stated that the government was examining the feasibility of these recommendations but noted that their implementation would require an agreement with the provincial governments. Such an agreement is presently being sought in respect to the escalation in hospital and medical care costs.

The Committee discussed with the President of the Treasury Board the Local Initiatives Program, the Opportunities for Youth Program and the Company of Young Canadians. The Committee is concerned that many items in these programs constitute unnecessary expenditures of public funds and that some of the sillier items tend to create a public attitude that government money is available for almost any project as a matter of right. The President of the Treasury Board reported that the departments concerned and the Treasury Board are studying the cost effectiveness of the Local Initiatives Program and the Opportunities for Youth Program as well as the grant procedures. The President of the Treasury Board indicated that he would consider a recommendation of the Committee to add the Company of Young Canadians to this study. Your Committee is of the opinion that following its present study of Information Canada, serious consideration should be given to a detailed examination by the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance of the cost effectiveness of the Local Initiatives Program, the Opportunities for Youth Program and the Company of Young Canadians.

The witnesses filed an explanation of the $1 items in the Supplementary Estimates (A), which is attached as an appendix to this report. The Committee expressed its repeated concern that in Schedule E of the explanation of $1 items the Supplementary Estimates are being used to amend existing legislation. The Committee strongly recommends against this practice and suggests that in the majority of cases amendments to legislation should be carried out by the normal parliamentary procedures.

Respectfully submitted.

D. D. EVERETT,
Chairman.

Estimates Division
November 1973

SCHEDULE A

ONE DOLLAR ITEMS AUTHORIZING THE DELETION OF DEBTS DUE THE CROWN—3 ITEMS.

Indian Affairs and Northern Development

Vote 25a—Authority is requested to delete an uncollectable debt of $6,295.44.

Explanation—It is proposed to write-off a debt incurred by the Department in its Northern Natural Resources and Environment Activity. The Department has been unable to collect this debt due to the financial condition of the company. This amount has been examined and approved by the Standing Interdepartmental Committee on Uncollectable Debts due the Crown.

Veterans Affairs

Vote 5a—Authority is requested to delete certain debts due amounting to $74,580.53.

Explanation—To write-off the accounts of some ten debtors. Six of these are for debtors who have died with no known estate, three are for debtors who are considered to be indigent and one is for a liability which is not admitted and for which further collection expenses are not justified. The write-off of these accounts have been approved by the Standing Interdepartmental Committee on Uncollectable Debts due the Crown.

Vote 45a—Authority is requested to delete a debt amounting to $31,090.21.

Explanation—To write-off an outstanding debt of a debtor who has died leaving no known estate. This write-off has been approved by the Standing Interdepartmental Committee on Uncollectable Debts due the Crown.

SCHEDULE B

ONE DOLLAR ITEMS FOR GRANTS—7 ITEMS.

Environment

Vote 25a—To authorize grants totalling $46,000.

Explanation—The additional funds will be used to provide for the following grants:

(1) Chemical Institute of Canada—to provide a grant to assist in the cost of a symposium to be held on the Control of Insect Pests $ 1,000

(2) Creston Valley Wildlife Management—to provide a further $30,000 to this authority in order to effect a more equitable Federal-Provincial distribution of costs. The Department has already provided a grant of $25,000 to assist the authority with its operating expenditures $ 30,000

(3) Festival of Forestry—to provide an additional $15,000 to assist with the cost of the Festival (formerly the British Columbia Festival of Forestry). The Department has already provided a grant of $5,000 $ 15,000

Source of Funds—Vote 25—Contributions provided for Environment Management Services will be less than originally forecast.

External Affairs

Vote 10a—To authorize grants totalling $69,500.

Explanation—Additional funds are requested to provide for the following grants:

(1) Emergency Fund for the Westman Islands—to provide assistance to the volcanic disaster relief fund for the Westman Islands in Iceland $ 62,500

(2) Atlantic Council of Canada—to provide an additional $5,000 to assist the Council in meeting its higher costs for public information and conference activities. The Department has already provided a grant of $2,500 $ 5,000

(3) An additional $2,000 is requested to provide for gifts to countries attaining independence and to mark special occasions $ 2,000

Source of Funds—Vote 10—Contributions under the United Nations Voluntary Fund for the Environment are less than was originally anticipated.

External Affairs—Canadian International Development Agency

Vote 25a—To authorize the payment of grants totalling $752,050.

Explanation—It is proposed to provide additional grants to the following United Nations Organizations:

(1) International Planned Parenthood Federation—to provide an additional grant to assist with the Federation's work. The current Estimates provide for a grant of $1,230,100. $252,050

(2) United Nations Relief and Work Agency —to meet higher costs incurred in caring for Palestine refugees in the near East. The current Estimates provides for the payment of a grant of $650,000. $500,000

Source of funds—Vote 25—Funds are available as a result of less than anticipated payments to International Organizations.

Indian Affairs and Northern Development

Vote 35a—(This item is also included in Schedule C) To authorize the payment of a grant and contributions totalling $754,700.

Explanation—It is proposed to pay the following grant and contributions:

(1) Yukon Prospectors Association—to assist with the preparation of briefs in connection with proposed amendments to the Yukon Quartz Mining Act $ 1,000

(2) Government of the Northwest Territories —to assist in the provision of an arena for the community at Frobisher Bay $300,000

(3) Government of the Northwest Territories —to cover the cost of completing its 1972-73 Federal Labour Intensive Projects Program $238,700

(4) Government of Yukon Territory—to cover the cost of completing its 1972-73 Federal Labour Intensive Projects Program $215,000

Source of Funds—Vote 25—$453,700.—Funds are available due to the deferral of certain Constitutional Studies and Territorial Municipal Services Impact Studies and reductions in the level of operations elsewhere within the program.

—Vote 30—$300,000.—Funds are available due to a delay in the construction of the Resource Management Building at Yellowknife.

—Vote 35—$999.—Forecast expenditures for the amortization portion of the Transfer Grant to the Northwest Territories will be less than expected.

Vote 70a—To authorize grants totalling $40,000.

Explanation—The following grants are proposed:

(1) It is proposed to provide assistance in the form of scholarship to assist university students selected by the Department for post-graduate studies in resource conservation, outdoor recreation and other similar fields $ 30,000

(2) National and Provincial Park Associations in Canada—to provide financial assistance to a non-profit organization which assists the Department in the promulgation and comprehension of Parks Canada Policies and Plans through its participation at public hearings $ 10,000

Source of funds—Vote 70—funds are available due to the operating costs of certain parks being less than anticipated.

Vote 45a—To authorize a grant of $100,000.

Explanation—It is proposed to provide an additional grant for family planning services. The number of applications for financial assistance received has been greater than was expected. The present Estimates provides for grants totalling $1,150,000 to assist in the family planning services and other projects in this area.

Source of funds—Vote 40—Funds are available due to contracts having been cancelled or delayed for the production of information materials. Some of this information is now being provided by the various applicants.

Secretary of State—National Museums of Canada

Vote 90a—To authorize a grant of $55,000.

Explanation—to provide a grant to the University of Toronto Press to meet the deficit which is expected to be incurred in the production of "Mammals of Canada".

Source of Funds—Vote 90—Funds are available due to the delay in negotiations for grants with qualified students engaged in graduate courses in the history of Canada art, and lower than expected expenditures for catalogue assistance.

SCHEDULE C

ONE DOLLAR ITEMS AUTHORIZING TRANSFERS FROM ONE VOTE TO ANOTHER—4 ITEMS (INCLUDES ONE ITEM FOR INDIAN AFFAIRS AND NORTHERN DEVELOPMENT WHICH IS ALSO LISTED IN SCHEDULE B).

Indian Affairs and Northern Development

Vote 35a—(This item is also included in Schedule B) Amount of the transfer to this vote $753,700.00.

Explanation—The additional funds will be used to provide for payment of the following contributions.

(1) Government of Northwest Territories—to assist in the provision of an arena for the community of Frobisher Bay $300,000

(2) Government of the Northwest Territories—to cover the cost of completing its 1972-73 Federal Labour Intensive Projects Program $238,700

(3) Government of Yukon Territory—to cover the cost of completing its 1972-73 Federal Labour Intensive Projects Program $215,000

Source of Funds—Vote 25—$453,700.—Funds are available due to the deferral of certain Constitutional Studies and Territorial Municipal Services Impact Studies and reductions in the level of operations elsewhere within the program.

—Vote 30—$300,000.—Funds are available due to a delay in the construction of the Resource Management Building at Yellowknife.

Industry, Trade and Commerce

Vote 1a—(This item is also included in Schedule D) Amount of transfer to this vote $1,764,931.

Explanation—The additional funds are required for the following reasons:

(1) Metric Commission—the additional funds will be used to hire staff and to provide for associated expenses which are required to meet the increased workload resulting from the promotional work necessitated by the Commission's program $626,800

(2) Additional funds are required to provide for the operating expenses and staff required by the Canadian Trade and Tariffs Committee in order that it may obtain the views of all interested Canadians including Provincial Governments, Businesses, Consumers and Labour as part of the process of developing Canada's objectives for the multilateral trade negotiations which is currently underway $127,500

(3) Defence, Industry and Productivity—Industry Modernizations for Defence Exports Program—funds are requested for the deletion of the unpaid balance of a loan provided to a firm under this program. This contract has now fallen into the default $ 55,831

(4) Regional Offices—Additional funds are required to cover the cost of upgrading and expansion of the existing Regional Offices and the opening of a new office in St. John's, Newfoundland $338,000

(5) Trade Commissioner Service—Additional funds are required as the result of the devaluation of the Canadian dollar and the increased cost of operations abroad $616,800

Source of Funds—Vote 10—Funds are available from the PAIT Program disbursements which are now forecast to be less than was expected.

Vote 32a—(This item is also listed in Schedule D)—Amount of the transfer to this vote is $1,699,999.

Purpose—This additional amount will be used to provide for payments under the two-price wheat program based on the bushels sold for human consumption in Canada in 1972.

Source of Funds—Vote 35—funds are available as the forecast contribution to the Brazilian Government for construction of grain silos at grain importing and distribution points in Brazil will be less than expected due to construction delays.

Regional Economic Expansion

Vote 11a—Amount of transfer to this vote was $14,999,999.

Explanation—These additional funds are requested to provide for forecast contributions required as the result of the extension of economic expansion and social adjustment assistance to all areas of Canada rather than the designated areas.

Source of Funds—Vote 10—contributions within this program are expected to be less than originally forecast.

SCHEDULE D

ONE DOLLAR ITEMS WHICH AUTHORIZE AMENDMENTS TO PREVIOUS APPROPRIATION ACTS—9 ITEMS (INCLUDES TWO ITEMS FOR INDUSTRY, TRADE AND COMMERCE WHICH ARE ALSO LISTED IN SCHEDULE C).

Finance

Vote L13a—To authorize an extension to the vote wording so as to permit Loans made under the Winter Capital Projects Program which are to be consolidated after March 31, 1976 to include interest accrued thereon to the date of consolidation.

Explanation—This extension is requested to enable the Government to capitalize interest which may accrue on loans made to the same debtor and to permit the consolidation of these loans into one loan. If these loans were not consolidated, the interest in some cases could prove to be a financial burden to the debtor.

Indian Affairs and Northern Development

Vote L81a—To authorize an extension to the vote wording so as to extend the purposes of the Working Capital Advance Account to cover the acquisition and management of stores required for the operation and maintenance of the canals.

Explanation—This extension is required since the present National Parks Act does not permit the use of the Working Capital Advance Account to finance the stores operations under the Canals Activity.

Industry, Trade and Commerce

Vote 1a—(This item is also included in Schedule C)—To authorize through an extension to the vote wording the reimbursement of the Department for the unpaid balance of a loan totalling $55,831.40.

Explanation—The proposed revision to the vote wording is requested to authorize the write-off of a loan provided for the purchase of equipment to assist an industry under the Defence Industry Productivity Program. The equipment has been repossessed due to the termination of the contract by default and the Department has not been successful in finding a purchaser for this equipment during the past fiscal year.

Vote 32a—(This item is also listed in Schedule C)—To authorize additional funds required for payments to Canadian Grain Producers in 1973-74 based on the number of bushels of wheat sold for human consumption in Canada in 1972.

Explanation—The original estimate for 1973-74 as to payments under the two-price wheat program was made prior to the receipt of official figures. As a result, the number of bushels sold for domestic human consumption in Canada in 1972 was higher than expected.

Labour

Vote 1a—To authorize through an extension to the vote wording the expansion of the Adjustment Assistance Program to cover displaced workers in the leather footwear and tanning industries.

Explanation—Authority is requested to enable the Department to enter into agreements to provide Adjustment Assistance Benefits to displaced workers which become unemployed as a result of implementation of the Leather Footwear and Tanning Industries Adjustment Program.

Regional Economic Expansion

Vote 1a—To authorize through an extension to the present vote wording the transfer without cost of the Bow River and St. Mary irrigation projects to the Province of Alberta.

Explanation—This authority is requested so that the Minister may transfer without cost to the Province of Alberta all assets of the Bow River and St. Mary irrigation projects. This transfer is in accordance with negotiated Canada-Alberta agreements signed earlier this year, in which it was agreed to transfer to Alberta all rights and interests in the property.

Treasury Board

Vote 7a—To authorize the deletion from the Accounts of Canada of the Reserve for Retroactive Salary Increases.

Explanation—Authority is requested to delete the Reserve for Retroactive Salary Increases for 1969/70 and 1970/71 established by the Treasury Board from the Accounts of Canada. This Reserve is no longer required since collective bargaining procedures are now developed to a point where retroactive salary payments can be provided within annual appropriations.

Vote 15a—To authorize an extension to the vote wording so as to permit payment to the Unemployment Insurance Commission of the cost of developing bilingualism in that Agency.

Explanation—Authority is requested to enable the Commission to be reimbursed for the cost of developing bilingualism in accordance with the Government's announced policy.

Vote 20a—To authorize an extension to the vote wording so as to permit the payment to employees of their share of the premium reduction under the Unemployment Insurance Act.

Explanation—Authority is requested to amend the wording of this vote to permit the payment to employees of their share of the employer unemployment insurance premium reduction to be charged against it. This reduction is granted under the Unemployment Insurance Act in respect of employees who are entitled to accumulate sick leave credits, the payment of which would reduce the liability of the Unemployment Insurance Commission to pay sickness benefits.

SCHEDULE E

ONE DOLLAR ITEMS WHICH SPECIFICALLY AMEND EXISTING LEGISLATION OTHER THAN APPROPRIATION ACTS—3 ITEMS.

Justice

Vote 1a—Authority is requested through this Vote wording so as to enable the Minister under the Judges Act to reimburse District Court Judges for all travelling expenses incurred in performing duties at a place other than that at which they are obliged to reside.

Explanation—The present Judges Act provides for the payment of a maximum travelling allowance of $500 per annum to district Court Judges in Ontario. This was found to be insufficient to cover travelling expenses of District Court Judges who regularly travel to judicial centres which are located some distance from the centre at which he resides. It is therefore proposed to reimburse these judges on the same basis for travelling expenses as county court judges.

National Health and Welfare

Vote 50a—To authorize an increase of $2,000,000 in the Statutory aggregate amount of payments that can be made under the Fitness and Amateur Sport Act.

Explanation—This increase in statutory ceiling is required to permit the provision of additional assistance to foster increased paticipation of Canadians in sport and fitness activities at all levels of endeavour, whether competitive or not.

Veterans Affairs

Vote 30a—To authorize an amendment to the Pension Act so as to enable the Canadian Pension Commission to accept and administer property and money bequeathed or donated in trust to the Commission for the benefit of pensioners and their dependents.

Explanation—The present Pension Act does not enable the Canadian Pension Commission to accept and administer properties and moneys bequeathed or donated in trust. Authority is requested to enable the Commission to accept and administer properties and moneys conveyed to the Commission in trust for the benefit of pensioners, their dependents and any other persons.

FOREIGN INVESTMENT REVIEW BILL

FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-132, to provide for the review and assessment of acquisitions of control of Canadian business enterprises by certain persons and of the establishment of new businesses in Canada by certain persons.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: With leave, honourable senators, I move second reading now.

Hon. Mr. Molson: Honourable senators, there is nothing I am more anxious to do than hear my worthy friend explain this bill. I feel, however, that, the bill having been read the first time just now, there should be some explanation given to the chamber as to why it is considered necessary to go into second reading immediately without the usual notice. As honourable senators are well aware, second reading of a bill requires two days' notice.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: The reason I am asking for leave is that I would like to avoid what we have humorously termed "Christmas closure." I thought that if I explained the bill this evening, it would leave a fairly generous amount of time for debate of the subject matter and the principle of the bill on second reading. It means we would gain an extra day, and I am prepared to proceed on that basis. It is up to the Senate to decide whether I shall have leave to do so.

Hon. Mr. Molson: I would have no objection if the extra time would make a difference. I believe that is an excellent reason, but I would only say to my honourable friend that when we are asked to proceed with leave, some indication as to the reason is well worth while and I appreciate his giving it.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Honourable senators, as far as I am concerned I have no objection to giving leave to the sponsor of the bill to proceed with the explanation tonight. As a rule, however, when we grant leave to proceed, it should be leave to proceed when the Orders of the Day are called. I do not believe that the second reading of this bill with leave should take precedence over the other items we have to deal with, such as presentation of petitions, the question period, and so on, but should be proceeded with as the first item of the Orders of the Day.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: Is my friend suggesting that this particular item be placed as No. 1 on the Orders of the Day, to be dealt with later tonight?

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Yes.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL FISCAL ARRANGEMENTS ACT, 1972
FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL FISCAL REVISION ACT, 1964
INCOME TAX ACT

BILL TO AMEND—FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-233, to amend the Federal-Provincial Fiscal Arrangements Act, 1972, the Federal-Provincial Fiscal Revision Act, 1964 and the Income Tax Act.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read a second time?

Hon. Mr. Cook: With leave of the Senate, I move that the bill be read a second time later this day. My reason for asking for leave is the same as that given by Senator Hayden for the previous bill, that it could become a victim of Christmas closure.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Senator Cook is adopting the line followed by Senator Hayden. I would point out that we have three weeks until Christmas. We have rarely taken that length of time to pass a bill, even one of this importance.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: What about next Monday?

The Hon. the Speaker: It has been moved by Honourable Senator Cook, seconded by Honourable Senator Paterson, that the bill be read the second time later this day. Is it agreed?

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Next sitting.

The Hon. the Speaker: As unanimous leave has not been given, this bill will be set down for second reading on Thursday next.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: With leave, next sitting.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed that, with leave, the bill be set down for second reading at the next sitting of the Senate?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

ELECTORAL BOUNDARIES READJUSTMENT ACT

BILL C-228 (LASALLE)—FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-228, respecting the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. Mr. Denis: With leave, I move that the bill be read the second time at the next sitting.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Thursday.

The Hon. the Speaker: As unanimous leave has not been given, the bill will be placed on the Order Paper for second reading on Thursday next.

ELECTORAL BOUNDARIES READJUSTMENT ACT

BILL C-232 (OTTAWA EAST)—FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-232, respecting the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. Mr. McIlraith: Honourable senators, this being a simple bill to change the name of the constituency of Ottawa East to Ottawa-Vanier, I shall not ask for unanimous consent to waive the rule.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is the honourable senator moving that the bill be set down for second reading on Thursday next?

Hon. Mr. McIlraith: Yes.

Motion agreed to.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Hon. Paul Martin tabled:

Copies of joint communiqué on the visit to the U.S.S.R. of the Secretary of State for External Affairs of Canada, November 18-24, 1973.

MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT

CONFLICT OF INTEREST—PROPOSED REFERENCE OF GREEN PAPER TO SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE—QUESTION

Hon. Mr. Croll: Honourable senators, my question has reference to the Government Notice of Motion in the name of the President of the Privy Council:

> That the Green Paper entitled "Members of Parliament and Conflict of Interest", tabled July 17, 1973, be referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections.

It appears in House of Commons Debates of November 30, at page 8300. The Green Paper was also tabled in the Senate on July 17, 1973.

My question to the Leader of the Government is: Has he taken steps to recommend to the government that the Green Paper be referred to a special joint committee of both houses?

The title of the Green Paper is somewhat misleading, but it is clear that it extends to honourable senators as well as to members of the House of Commons. Here is clearly a joint interest. The interests and concerns of many honourable senators are involved and, indeed, may be seriously affected by the legislative outcome. This being the case, it would seem both logical and desirable that the Green Paper be considered jointly by both houses.

In addition, there would appear to be no good reason why the Green Paper should be considered separately by each house in view of the added expense, duplication of effort and repetition of debate that would be necessitated by that course.

For the foregoing reasons, I urge the Leader of the Government, if he has not already done so, to seek through the government the establishment of a special joint committee on the Green Paper.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Honourable senators, I have had some discussion respecting this question, but I feel that before taking any steps it would be interesting and perhaps useful to have the opinion of members of the Senate. Perhaps it would be desirable for Senator Croll to allow me to take his question as notice so that I can confer with the Leader of the Opposition and get his views, following which we could deal with the matter.

ECONOMIC COUNCIL OF CANADA

TENTH ANNUAL REVIEW—PROPOSED STUDY OF ECONOMIC SITUATION—QUESTION

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government, but before putting it there is a preamble. We are used to that in this house.

The Economic Council of Canada recommended in its Tenth Annual Review:

> —that the House of Commons assign to an appropriate committee the task of periodically reviewing the overall economic situation of the country in the light of performance indicators and debate the committee's report.

The Economic Council recommended the review be carried out by a committee of the other place and that the committee's report be debated by that place. I am wondering if this is not the very type of review that might not be usefully undertaken by the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance.

Would the Leader of the Government inform us as to whether or not he has given this idea any thought and, if so, what his conclusions are?

Also, has he given any thought to the idea that as a matter of course the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance might be requested to study the Economic Council's annual review with its recommendations, and formulate its own conclusions?

Hon. Mr. Martin: Honourable senators will remember that a few years ago the Economic Council of Canada suggested that there should be an examination of the question of poverty by the Senate. This time the council suggests that there should be an examination of the economic situation by a committee of the other place.

I agree with the Leader of the Opposition that the Senate, because of its record with regard to such inquiries, would be as appropriate a body as the other place, and perhaps the chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance, having listened to the question and the response, might be prepared to give the matter consideration. There could be further discussion of the proposal.

● (2020)

Hon. Mr. Everett: I should be very pleased to give the matter consideration.

MIDDLE EAST

UNITED NATIONS EMERGENCY FORCE—STATEMENTS BY CANADIAN MEDICAL OFFICER—QUESTION

Hon. Mr. Molson: Honourable senators, I have a question that I should like to address to the Leader of the Government. I wish to ask him if he would enlighten this house as to the circumstances of, and what has subsequently happened in respect of, the situation that arose in Canada's contingent to the United Nations Emergency Force in Cairo. If I am not misinformed, apparently the chief medical officer we sent there was a gynaecologist and obstretrician. I do not know whether that has any significance. I would ask why this particular medical officer was chosen for a task that he obviously found repugnant.

I would also ask the Leader of the Government if the allegations made by that officer to the press, in which he criticized the armed forces of Canada, the Department of National Defence, the Government of Canada and the United Nations, were founded in fact. I would further ask if the press report is true, that when this officer came home he had a chat with an understanding Chief of Staff, and has resumed previous duties.

I think many people in the country are concerned about this episode. It makes any normal Canadian feel unhappy, upset, and perhaps a little ashamed, that after all the build-up and all the problems of sending a force of some 500 or so men to Cairo, they are then housed in inadequate quarters on the racetrack in which this particular medical officer says they live like pigs, and his statement goes round the world. I wonder if the honourable leader would get the full story, and enlighten the Senate?

Hon. Mr. Martin: I have already asked if I can be furnished with an explanation. In the meantime, as Senator Molson himself has noted, the officer in question did make a statement which appeared in last night's paper, and I do not want to add anything that would in any way do injustice to him. However, he did make a statement, and it may be possible that there will be a further statement from the responsible minister, which I might be able to give the house at the proper moment.

In the meantime, I am sure that Senator Molson has noted the observations made by the commander of the force himself, who referred in the highest terms to the work of the Canadian component.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question to that put by Senator Molson. Various reports and comments of the Chief of Staff indicate that Poland was responsible for providing hospital facilities for the United Nations Emergency Force. Did the Government of Canada commit approximately 1,000 Canadians to serve in this area while depending on another country to provide hospital facilities?

Hon. Mr. Martin: As I indicated a week ago yesterday, the division of responsibilities in the logistics field has been divided by the Secretary General of the United Nations between Poland and Canada. When I spoke then the disposition of these functions had not been finalized. I think they have been since, and I will give a supplementary statement later.

HONOURABLE MARTIAL ASSELIN, P.C.

FELICITATIONS ON RETURN TO CHAMBER

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Honourable senators, may I ask the Leader of the Government and other members of the Senate if they have noticed the return of our good friend, Senator Asselin? I am sure we all wish to say how happy we are to see him looking so well.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

[Translation]

Hon. Mr. Martin: I wish to join with the Leader of the Opposition in saying to Senator Asselin that we are very happy to see him here in such good health.

Hon. Mr. Asselin: I thank the Leader of the Government, as well as my leader, for their very warm welcome here this evening.

My doctors told me that the year I was appointed senator by a Liberal prime minister was an unlucky one.

However, I expect to come back to the Senate with as much energy as possible, to co-operate with my colleagues in order to preserve this institution's well deserved reputation.

ENERGY RESOURCES

OIL SHIPMENTS—NAVIGATION AND POLLUTION HAZARDS—QUESTIONS ANSWERED

Hon. Daniel A. Lang inquired of the government pursuant to notice:

1. What quantity of oil does the government expect will be shipped during the next six months through the Strait of Juan de Fuca and destined for Eastern Canadian ports?

2. Under what flag or flags are those ships likely to be sailing?

3. Will those ships be by design or installation less vulnerable to oil spill hazards than the average single-hulled tanker?

4. What steps, if any, is the government taking or contemplating to minimize the navigational dangers involved in the passage of those ships through the Strait of Juan de Fuca?

Hon. Mr. Martin: Answered.

(The answers follow)

1. Shipments as high as 50,000 barrels per day may be sent from Vancouver via the Panama Canal to eastern Canadian ports but the length of the period cannot be determined, at this time.

2. In the event that Canadian ships are not available, foreign flags will be used subject to meeting Canadian standard regulations.

3. No.

4. The federal government is ensuring that standards for the safe movement of ships through the Strait of Juan de Fuca will be maintained.

TRANSSHIPMENT FOR DOMESTIC HEATING—TEMPORARY STORAGE—HEATING OIL SHORTAGE—QUESTIONS ANSWERED

Hon. Mr. Lang inquired of the government, pursuant to notice:

(1) Has the National Energy Board denied permits which would allow the transshipment at Montreal of Venezuelan oil to be used for domestic heating in Northern New York State, such transshipments to be effected either by

(a) transfer from oceanic tanker to seaway draft vessels,

(b) landing in Canada for temporary storage pending forwarding,

(c) landing in Canada for temporary storage in bond pending forwarding?

(2) If so, for each instance under (a), (b) and (c) above, under what authority, how often, under what circumstances and for what reasons?

(3) If so, to what extent, if any, has each or all such denials ameliorated the heating oil shortage in Canada?

Hon. Mr. Martin: Answered.

(The answers follow)

(1) (a) (b) & (c) The National Energy Board has not denied any applications for export of United States owned material stored in Canada or en route to Canada for transshipment or temporary storage.

(2) Not applicable.

(3) Not applicable.

GOVERNOR GENERAL OF CANADA

INSTALLATION OF MR. JULES LEGER ON JANUARY 14, 1974—ANNOUNCEMENT

Hon. Paul Martin: Honourable senators, I wish to announce, as the Prime Minister has announced, that the installation of Mr. Jules Leger as Governor General of Canada will take place on January 14, 1974. The ceremony will be in the Senate chamber and will be attended by members of the Senate and House of Commons and other guests.

[Translation]

His Excellency Roland Michener and Mrs. Michener will leave Ottawa on January 9, but His Excellency's term of office will expire on January 14 only.

[English]

En route to Canada from Brussels, Mr. and Mrs. Leger will stop in Britain for a call on Her Majesty the Queen, and will arrive in Ottawa on January 11.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Will we be sitting?

[Translation]

Hon. Mr. Martin: I do not think so.

[English]

Hon. Mr. Langlois: We will be "sitting" on that day.

PUBLIC WORKS

ART ADVISORY COMMITTEE—INQUIRY STANDS

On the Inquiry of Honourable Senator Forsey:

That he will inquire of the Government:

1. Who are the members of the Art Advisory Committee of the Department of Public Works?

2. When were they appointed?

3. For what terms of office?

4. What is the remuneration of each member?

5. What are the qualifications of each member?

Hon. Mr. Forsey: Honourable senators, may I ask the Leader of the Government whether the replies to my questions about the "masterpieces" have yet been received?

Hon. Mr. Martin: I know that they are somewhere within the precincts of this portion of Parliament.

Inquiry stands.

SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Salter A. Hayden moved the second reading of Bill C-132, to provide for the review and assessment of acquisitions of control of Canadian business enterprises by certain persons and of the establishment of new businesses in Canada by certain persons.

He said: Honourable senators, it would now appear that all the ritual has been observed and therefore I may proceed to give an explanation of Bill C-132, the Foreign Investment Review Bill.

I should tell you that there is in the process of distribution now a copy of the report of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, which was made to this house on July 12.

I should tell you also that there are being distributed copies of the bill as reprinted after the House of Commons Finance Committee had made its report preceding third reading. The purpose in distributing this copy of the bill is that in it you will find the amendments which were made in the committee of the other place. The black underlining, gives you an indication as to what the amendments were. I thought it might be a convenience to members of the Senate to have this material readily available.

Honourable senators, the objectives of the bill, as presented, are to secure for Canada and Canadians the maximum possible economic benefits of foreign investment in Canada. Whether the bill will achieve those objectives is a matter for some consideration by this house.

The principle of the bill, so far as I can gather, is something that is supported by a majority of the people in Canada.

I should point out that right after the bill had been introduced in the House of Commons, and before it was officially before the Senate, we sat in committee considering this bill. We heard quite a number of witnesses, and quite a number of briefs were filed. The objections in the main centered on particular provisions in the bill, and were addressed as well to a lack of certain provisions which appeared to be necessary for its fairness in actual operation.

I should, first of all, indicate that its purpose is stated in the bill itself, and you will find that in clause 2 under the heading "Purpose of Act." The reason I do this is that it is a well-known expedient that, when there appears to be any question as to whether or not there is validity in the proposed piece of legislation, you will find a preamble, longer or shorter as may be necessary, in order to support the constitutional authority of the government to proceed in the fashion in which it does. For instance, I think in terms of the Oleomargarine Act of 1885 where there was a fairly lengthy preamble reciting the deleterious nature of the article as a basis for the assumption of jurisdiction by the federal authority.

In this case we have as clause 2 of the bill the enunciation of the purposes of the bill. I would think its inclusion in the bill is to emphasize the validity or the presumption of validity or constitutionality. It reads:

> 2.(1) This Act is enacted by the Parliament of Canada in recognition by Parliament that the extent to which control of Canadian industry, trade and commerce has become acquired by persons other than Canadians and the effect thereof on the ability of Canadians to maintain effective control over their economic environment is a matter of national concern, and that it is therefore expedient to establish a means by which measures may be taken under the authority of Parliament to ensure that, in so far as is practicable after the enactment of this Act, control of Canadian business enterprises may be acquired by persons other than Canadians, and new businesses may be established in Canada by persons, other than Canadians, who are not already carrying on business in Canada or whose new businesses in Canada would be unrelated to the businesses already being carried on by them in Canada, only if it has been assessed—

And these are the critical words.

> —that the acquisition of control of those enterprises or the establishment of those new businesses, as the case may be, by those persons is or is likely to be of significant benefit to Canada, having regard to all of the factors to be taken into account under this Act for that purpose.

You can hear the ring of phrases which occur in the many constitutional cases where the subject matter has come up—the test of "national concerns," for example. So that you have a presumption of validity as the basis for proceeding with this legislation.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: May I ask the honourable senator a question? It seems to me that the English text is wrong. It says, "may be acquired by persons other than Canadians". I think it should be "may not be acquired".

It seems to lack the word "not", which exists in French, "que le contrôle des entreprises commerciales canadiennes ne puisse passer aux mains de personnes autres que des Canadiens".

It seems to me there is something wrong in the English text.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: I do not think so.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Well, "may be acquired"—

Hon. Mr. Hayden: It will appear as I proceed, but I do not mind interjecting now, and telling you what I think the answer is. This bill does provide a basis upon which people other than Canadians may acquire investments in Canada, and it provides a formula under which they may do so. For the moment I will continue to elaborate, and I will keep in mind—

Hon. Mr. Flynn: If you did not see it, it may be I am wrong.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: —the problem which you have raised, and see if I can get that negative approach out of your mind.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: If you take it out of the text, it would be better.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: I know that sometimes it is. However, it is worth the effort, and I shall make the effort in the hope that as a reasonable man you will see that my explanation is an intelligent one.

I should tell you that the purpose of this bill, as recited in the long title, is to regulate what we call "foreign takeovers"—that is, where a non-Canadian, described here as a "non-eligible person," makes a bid for shares of a Canadian business enterprise. It is also intended to deal with the establishment of new businesses in Canada.

The scheme, or plan, of the bill—and you will find it on page 2—and the plan that has been followed, is to set out the factors which the minister must consider in arriving at a conclusion that the approval of the acquisition of control of a Canadian business enterprise by a non-eligible investor is "of significant benefit to Canada."

Now, the words, "significant benefit to Canada," have been the cause, or the occasion, of much discussion in the representations that have been made to us. There is no definition in the bill as to what is meant by "significant benefit," but there is the formula which the minister must follow in his review of the application and the facts, and in his decision on the assessment as to whether the acquisition of control should be allowed in the particular case which he is considering. You will see those items set out as (a), (b), (c) and (d) on page 2, and (e) on page 3.

I do not propose to read them all, but I suggest to you that a fair reading of them would appear to relate those factors more to the manufacturing industry than any other industry. There is, however, a particular one that I would call your attention to, and that is (e), because it brings in the position of the provinces. One of the factors that the minister must consider, or must take into account, in making his assessment is:

> (e) the compatibility of the acquisition or establishment with national industrial and economic policies, taking into consideration industrial and economic policy objectives enunciated by the government or legislature of any province likely to be significantly affected by the acquisition or establishment.

It has been said that paragraph (e) requires consultation with the province. It is not my view that it requires such consultation. The minister must gather, in whatever way would be best and most intelligent, an understanding of the industrial economic policy objectives of the province which may be affected by the establishment of this particular enterprise within its borders.

An additional provision which you will find at the top of page 21 was put in the bill to assist in providing for some consideration of this particular aspect of provincial policy by the minister. This is found in clause 9 of the bill, starting at the bottom of page 20, which provides for the review and assessment by the minister of the application for permission to carry through a takeover bid, for instance, and is part of the material which is taken into consideration by the minister. Paragraph (d) is:

> any representations submitted to him by a province that is likely to be significantly affected by the proposed or actual investment to which the notice relates—

Therefore, honourable senators, if there is in existence, or if a province prepares and submits, a statement of its economic and industrial policy in relation to the government of such an operation as is envisaged in the particular takeover bid, the view of the province would get before the minister. But there is nothing in the bill which requires the province to make such a submission.

One would expect, however, that a province likely to be affected by the location of a business enterprise of this kind in that particular province, and being desirous of having it established, would be anxious to do everything that it could to influence the decision of the minister in that direction so that he would recommend approval to the Governor in Council, because it is the Governor in Council who makes the actual decision.

[Hon. Mr. Hayden.]

I should tell you, honourable senators, that these are the preliminaries in connection with the bill, and I shall very quickly get into the detail of it.

The bill provides that the legislation shall come into force by proclamation.

Honourable senators, in connection with the first part of the bill—which is what I call the takeover provision—an amendment was added on third reading in the House of Commons to clause 31(1), and that amendment provided that following the words "this Act shall come into force on a day to be fixed by proclamation" there should be added the words "such a day to be not later than 180 days after Royal Assent." You will see that by virtue of that amendment there is a projected time limit within which the proclamation has to be made after the bill has received Royal Assent. In other words, the minister cannot dally with the date of proclamation; it must be within 180 days after Royal Assent.

So far as the establishment of a new business is concerned, the legislation is also to come into force by proclamation—and this you will find at clause 31(2)—but here there was no amendment, and the provision concerning this second portion of the bill dealing with the establishment of a new business or a non-related business is that it may be proclaimed at any time after the date or proclamation of the takeover part of the bill, and it is not subject to the 180-day limitation.

It has been indicated by the minister in the course of statements he has made that it would not be possible, and that it is not intended, that the second portion of the bill—that is the portion dealing with the establishment of new businesses—be proclaimed within less than a year after the bill receives royal assent. I think the answer as to why it would not be proclaimed earlier than that may well be that, having regard to the mechanics and the work involved in dealing with the takeover portion of the bill, the department and its administration might suffer from a case of gigantic indigestion in trying to bring the second portion of the bill into operation at an earlier date.

Honourable senators, there is no definition of "significant benefit," and there is no definition of "unrelated business." The point I should like to make in connection with that is that where you have a non-eligible person proposing to establish a new business in Canada, then there must be the screening process. But if the non-eligible person is already in Canada, and the new business is related to the business then being carried on, then the screening is not necessary. If the non-eligible person has not heretofore carried on business in Canada, or is seeking to carry on a business which is unrelated to the business that he has previously carried on, then there must be a screening, but the "unrelated" part is not defined in any way.

Having dealt with that, I should tell you, since I have been using the expression "non-eligible person" that this term has been defined, since, as one might expect, one cannot go on forever without some definitions. The definition of "non-eligible person" is that it means a person who is neither a Canadian citizen, ordinarily resident in Canada, nor a landed immigrant. It means also a government of another country, and a corporation, wherever incorporated, controlled directly or indirectly by non-eligible individuals.

● (2050)

That is the category of non-eligible persons. These are the persons who are required to have their transactions, their takeover bids, or the establishment by them of a new business or a non-related business, screened—that is screened by the minister. When I use the word "screened" I mean examined by the minister in the light of the responsibility imposed on him by the act to determine whether the acquisition of control in those circumstances would be of significant benefit to Canada.

There are certain exceptions. A trader or a dealer in securities in the ordinary course of his business is not required to submit to the screening process, and, under prescribed conditions, a person carrying on a business of providing in Canada venture capital is also not required to submit to the screening process.

The next step, as you go along, is the review process. This is the technical and perhaps better language than that which I have used, "screening process," but whether "review" or "screening" is used it means the same thing. The screening—I almost said "screaming," and I think at different times some have been doing that—process is required if a non-eligible person is proposing to acquire a Canadian business enterprise with gross assets of more than $250,000, or gross revenues in excess of $3 million. One might be inclined to say that $250,000 of gross assets is a pretty low level at which to start processes as involved as this. It is a figure, however, upon which some of those who appeared before the committee made adverse comment, but I would not say that generally there was adverse comment.

The procedure then is by way of the establishment of an agency to be known as the Foreign Investment Review Agency, the sole function of which will be to receive notices from those non-eligible persons who are subject to the screening process. The agency in turn will pass notices on to the minister who, when he has a communication which he wishes to make to the non-eligible persons, does so via the agency. The agency has no participation in the determination of the question at issue, and no other such authority. Therefore, if the minister is not able to make a decision favouring the application and consequently grant the right to purchase the shares in question, the applicant must be notified of the unfavourable decision, and invited to make his submissions as to why the application should be granted. He may also make additional representations and add conditions in order—I suppose this is one way of putting it—to sweeten his purpose and intent in the operation of the business which would be taken over in the event of a favourable decision being made.

I should tell you also about the acquisition of control, which has been the subject of much debate. The condition as a result of which in a takeover bid an applicant is deemed to have acquired control is that the acquisition of shares of a Canadian business enterprise to which are attached more than 50 per cent of the voting rights is conclusively deemed to constitute acquisition of control. There is nothing mysterious or surprising about that, it being the usual situation. If in excess of 50 per cent of the voting shares are held, unless those rights are given away in some fashion, voting control is achieved. This is important. The acquisition of less than 5 per cent of the voting shares of a publicly traded company, or less than 20 per cent of the voting shares of a corporation whose shares are not publicly traded, is deemed not to constitute acquisition of control. The provision which caused the protest we received from many of those who appeared before us, is that between these two limits—that is, between the 5 per cent of the voting shares in the case of companies whose shares are publicly traded, and the 20 per cent in the case of companies whose voting shares are not being publicly traded—a non-eligible person proposing a takeover of in excess of 5 per cent in the one case or in excess of 20 per cent in the other case shall be deemed to be acquiring control unless the contrary is proven.

I can tell you what the objection was. A delegation from the Toronto Stock Exchange appeared before us, and I also recall immediately the delegation from the Province of Ontario. On this point they both suggested that the 5 per cent should be 10 per cent, because they said it would be more in line with provision in the security laws of the various provinces of Canada under which the determination of whether you are or are not an inside trader is made on the basis of ownership of 10 per cent or more of the voting shares. One who possesses more than 10 per cent of the voting shares is deemed to be an insider. Mr. D'Arcy McKeough, who headed the delegation from the Government of Ontario, and who, I may say, made a very interesting and fairly impartial statement of that government's position, said that Ontario felt it should be 10 per cent because that would be in line with the security laws and their provisions. The same view was expressed by the delegation of the Toronto Stock Exchange, and that of the Investment Dealers Association.

I can relate an incident which occurred when the staff employed by the committee and I were having an interview with two representatives of the minister. I asked how they had arrived at the figure of 5 per cent, and why would it not be 6 per cent, 7 per cent or 4 per cent; how had they picked on 5 per cent. The answer I received was to me an astounding one. It was that voting shareholders of large companies are notoriously apathetic in exercising their voting rights in relation to their holdings. I mentioned the names of banks and companies like the CPR and Bell Canada. I said, "You mean that if some non-eligible person purchased voting shares of such a company, it would so endanger the matter of control, putting it into the hands of the non-eligible person, that you fix a limit of 5 per cent for that purpose?" I then asked, "Do you know what the proxy appearances were at the last annual meetings of the banks, Bell Telephone, and CPR? How many shareholders appeared personally?" The answer was no. The figure of 5 per cent was arrived at because it was assumed that the shareholders in large companies were apathetic.

This is one of perhaps two or three issues which I would call pretentious. We made about 10 recommendations in our report some of which contained two or three subdivisions. I would say that about seven of our recommendations were carried into the bill following consideration by the Commons committee. So that a reasonable effort was made to meet the recommendations of the Senate committee—although I do not know, frankly, what else could have been done other than to incorporate them because they were so necessary, so well supported, and so sensible.

The following points have not been recognized: provincial participation in the decision-making in connection with the acquisition by non-eligible persons of control, as stipulated in the bill, of a Canadian business enterprise.

Secondly, appeals. There are no appeals provided for in the bill, except certain appeals at the stage of court proceedings, where the non-eligible person, or a person who is thought to be non-eligible, does not comply with the directions of the minister and an order is secured from the court to compel that. There is a right of appeal there. This is the only right of appeal, even though civil rights, and serious civil rights, are involved. The Canadian Bar Association made a very specific recommendation on the question of the right of appeals, the rights of people, and the opportunity to have a review of the minister's decision as a matter of law.

Transactions in real estate was a third matter which was not dealt with in what our committee would say was a reasonable way. There was nothing in the bill dealing with real estate transactions. The bill apparently recognized this as a business, and therefore if it met the conditions stipulated in the bill, if the gross assets were in excess of $250,000, or more than 5 per cent of the voting shares were involved in the acquisition of shares, it was subject to screening. An exception was provided for in one of the amendments made in the Commons committee. It was that the acquisition and development of raw land for personal use and enjoyment would not be subject to the screening process.

Let us say that non-resident persons purchase an office building or apartment house for in excess of $250,000, and the shares involved exceed 5 per cent of the voting shares in the case of a corporation the shares of which are publicly traded, or 20 per cent in the case of a corporation the shares of which are not publicly traded. If you try to set that kind of transaction against the factors enumerated in clause 2(2) of the bill for the purpose of determining whether or not there is significant benefit, you come up at least with a neutrality. If it is a neutrality—we had briefs submitted on this point—it does not meet the significant benefit test and fails. Let us take the factors in clause 2(2) of the bill and apply them to such a transaction. If you take subclause (a) on page 2 of the bill—certainly in the acquisition of an office building or apartment house—in those circumstances the level and nature of economic activity in Canada, including employment, would not be affected unless efficiencies were to be introduced resulting in a lessening of employment. Certainly a property acquired from another non-eligible person would not affect the degree and significance of participation by Canadians, and if acquired from a Canadian it would reduce the degree of such participation by Canadians. There would be no effect on productivity, industrial efficiency, technological development, product innovation, and product variety in Canada. There would be no effect on competition, and the national industrial and economic policies of Canada would be equally unaffected.

It was the recommendation of your committee that, in neutral situations of that kind, these transactions dealing with real estate should be exempt from the provisions of the bill. This was one of the recommendations we made which has been acknowledged only in relation to raw land, which is relatively insignificant. Yet I wonder whether, in any strict sense of the word, the acquisition of an office building or apartment house by non-eligible persons could be said to be a business.

A way out of the dilemma, short of an amendment, could easily be by the route of binding rulings or guidelines or regulations. We did recommend the establishment of guidelines to be issued by the minister and to be binding on him, and that has been done in the bill. We did recommend guidelines. That has been done, although they are not binding. I would say, based on my experience over quite a period of time in dealing with ministers, that if there is a guideline issued in connection with a certain transaction, whatever the provision in the bill is in relation to that, it would be observed. Then, of course, there are regulations which could be passed under the bill. But this is a matter that the committee will have to consider. The committee has staff and they will seek the advice of the staff. The committee will hear the minister and find out what he has to say in support of these matters and why he did not deal with these questions. The minister, of course, will have an opportunity to bring his experts to support this.

All I am doing now is pointing out the situation at this time. Some of the things that we said in our report will have to be qualified because of the fact that they have since been dealt with by way of amendment. To make it convenient for honourable senators, I have had prepared two tables. Table 1 contains the headings "Subject," "Senate recommendations," and "Commons amendments". Table 2 contains a list of clauses amended by the House of Commons and not discussed in table 1. I suggest that it would be useful to have these tables printed as appendixes to today's Hansard.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(For tables see Appendix "A", pp. 1239-1240.)

Hon. Mr. Hayden: We now come to what I regard as the critical portion of the bill. I should like to make a comment or two on the provincial participation and on the constitutional feature of the bill. I should tell you that your committee did not express any opinion on the constitutionality of the proposed legislation. However, as we have said in our report, and I quote:

> Rather, the committee would sound a note of warning in view of the apparently precarious foundations of the bill and suggest the possibility of referring the bill to the Supreme Court of Canada prior to its enactment. Otherwise, a climate of uncertainty as unsatisfactory for the federal and provincial governments as for potential investors and owners of Canadian businesses will prevail, since the constitutional question is bound to arise at some stage.

On this question of constitutionality, we were told in committee by the representative from the Department of Justice that that department had advised the minister that the bill was constitutional. We cross-examined him at length, discussing the various constitutional aspects, et cetera. He enunciated certain principles which certainly fell far short of what were regarded as necessary by the members of the committee in order for them to make a statement that the bill is constitutional. Therefore, we felt that at that stage, since we were not a court, what we should do is simply sound a word of warning.

Many problems arise. For instance, if the takeover is in relation to a federally incorporated company, the federal authority would have jurisdiction to deal with such a takeover. That would be conceded. However, if the takeover is related to the shares of a provincially incorporated company, then certainly on balance it would appear that the authority to deal with the provincially incorporated company would be the authority that created it, unless there is some element inherent in the legislation which would rout out of that provincial jurisdiction what is apparently within it and within the subject of property and civil rights. There are legal decisions for it under the Peace, Order and Good Government sections of the Constitution. Therefore, we felt that we would not be justified in going beyond the point of raising the issue of constitutionality.

I can tell you that representatives of the Province of Quebec appeared before your committee and presented a brief. I put a question to that delegation as to whether or not it was likely that the provincial authorities there would support an agreement by legislation whereby an American business enterprise came to Quebec wishing to make a takeover bid, and I think their statement was to the effect that, "Well, if such a request were made, to show the complete support of the government to the enterprise, that might well be done." Then some members of the committee said to the leader of the delegation, who, I believe, was the deputy minister—

Hon. Mr. Flynn: It was Mr. Lalonde who is now a minister in the Bourassa government.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: Yes. The committee's response then was: Well, you see where you end up. If the federal minister comes along and requires that this non-eligible person—whose deal with Quebec has been ratified by statute—screen the transaction federally, then there is an issue. One of two things can happen. The provincial government can challenge the validity of the federal statute, or the individuals concerned, the non-eligible person or persons, can refuse to file a Notice of Compliance on the direction of the minister that they screen the transaction, in which event the minister has the right to prosecute. In either case, validity or constitutionality would be the issue, and would get into the courts.

It therefore seems to me that, rather than immediately say we should abandon this legislation because of these difficulties in it, we should see if there is any way in which harmony can be achieved. Ontario has said, "We think this legislation should go forward," and they used some very strong arguments and clear language. Ontario is a province that would likely be substantially affected.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: It would be affected, but not adversely.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: No; it would be affected. This is what the Honourable D'Arcy McKeough said:

> As an underlying theme to the Ontario position, we believe the primary objective of the proposed review process should not be to restrict foreign investment per se but to ensure that future investments by foreign corporations make an effective contribution to the achievement of national economic and social objectives.

He went on to develop the contribution that the federal authority can make by virtue of its position in negotiating in connection with any such transaction. In dealing with the role of the provinces, since they seem to mesh together, Mr. McKeough had this to say:

> With respect to the consideration of provincial policy objectives by the federal government, it is of serious concern to Ontario that there be clarification of the manner in which the federal government proposes to ascertain the nature and status of provincial policy objectives for the purposes of the review process. In this regard, Ontario stresses that the provinces should alone be responsible for articulating their policy positions to the federal government, as an integral part of the process of federal-provincial consultations.

Quebec, in its brief, made a statement that, if anything, was a little stronger. I am meshing together the questions of constitutionality and the provincial role because they seem to fit together. What Quebec said was this:

> Indeed, we have reason to be satisfied with the commitment of the federal government and the minister who would eventually be responsible for carrying out the act to consult the provincial governments and take into account the needs of regional economies. But consultation, especially if dependent on good will only, would be clearly insufficient if the federal government were to have the authority of deciding alone on the objectives, priorities and needs defined by the provincial governments themselves.
> To take on real significance, the reference made for form's sake by the federal government, under Section 2.2e, to "the industrial and economic policy objectives of the provincial governments" should be followed by a procedure for the participation of each government in the elaboration of policies or their application standards . . . and in the evaluation of actual cases. As the control of foreign investments has vital effects on a number of provincial policies and determines to a large extent the development of regional economies, it should therefore be the object of parity decisions between both levels of government.

May I add these words. At first blush it may be felt that there are too many problems involved in the constitutional aspect to take the time and make the effort to see if it can work. Ontario has praised the leadership taken in the effort by the federal authority. Quebec has not been critical of the leadership by the federal authority, but it has been critical of what appears to be the inferior position of the province in relation to articulating what is its economic objectives, et cetera.

In those circumstances, it might be well to consider what the alternatives are. It is true that foreign investment capital is still a very necessary thing for Canada. It is true that we should not deal with foreign investment capital and those who are the non-eligible persons in a way that would cause them to lose confidence, to be concerned about the stability of the country, but we should rather keep encouraging them, in proper cases, where we would exercise a fair measure of control. This seems to be the attitude of the day, that there should be more and more in the way of control, not exercised like swinging a big stick, but exercised in a more subtle and agreeable way that would be acceptable to the non-eligible persons. Many countries in the world are doing this sort of thing today. I do not mean necessarily in the form in which we are doing it, but they are doing it.

Therefore, in these circumstances, before saying that this bill presents these problems of constitutionality and, particularly, provincial participation, and it is too big a load to try to work out and we should thus abandon the idea, it should be remembered that nothing was ever done by simply giving in. I think there may be a way in which to resolve for the present the provincial problem, and thus resolve the constitutional problem, because if the provinces are satisfied it is not likely that they will raise the constitutional issue.

If the non-eligible investors are fairly treated and they present a substantial case that can stand on its own feet—in other words, a legitimate case—then I do not think from that avenue you would be likely to have the decision of the minister and the Governor in Council attacked on the constitutional basis. In those circumstances, my reaction would be that these non-eligible persons taking that kind of position without having what I would regard as being the proper kind of case would not enjoy the support of the people of Canada, or the Government of Canada. There are so many areas where that support is necessary. It is one thing to acquire control of a Canadian business enterprise, but then you have to operate it. If you are subject to control and direction, such as policy direction, trade policies, taxation, et cetera, then the desire to retain good will might be overpowering and might carry the day.

Perhaps I should not express a personal view, but let me put it this way. My own view is that we should look very carefully and exhaustively into the areas, short of rejection of the bill, of the binding rulings, guidelines and regulations to see in how many directions we can satisfy ourselves on points that we think are essential to the proper carrying out of the purpose of this bill.

We may conclude that there are several items that, in the state in which the bill is, we cannot subject to that treatment. One that bothers me at the moment is how to establish appeals. There is a great variety of public opinion, all going the one way—that is, that there should be the right of appeal, open to an applicant against whom the minister has made a decision. At the stage when the minister makes the decision, he makes the recommendation. True, the final decision is made by the Governor in Council. True, the Governor in Council can reject the recommendation of the minister. True, the Governor in Council is entitled to have before him any submission that the provincial authority chooses to make. The Governor in Council therefore may come to a contrary decision. But while I point out all these things that exist, we also have good will and a desire to promote something that may have many beneficial aspects. It is true that in some areas they may have over-reached in their provisions, but that is a fault found in a lot of legislation, and time catches up on these things. If you run into a flock of legislation and slow up the whole procedure, why, then you are going to affect Canada adversely if you do anything that will stop the legitimate flow, even under this bill, of foreign investment capital.

I recognize that we have quite a problem here. The problem is in trying to resolve the conflict that exists between two desires. On the one hand, we want to assure a sound and solid economic position for Canada and an economic involvement for Canadian investment. That is one side of the picture. On the other hand, we have a need for the input of capital for purposes of our operation.

Honourable senators, I might take about two minutes to give you an illustration. We have been assuming that all the decisions of the minister and the Governor in Council are going to be against the proposed takeovers by non-eligible persons, or the proposed establishment of new business.

One of the provinces we heard from was Newfoundland. Newfoundland gives us an example, for it says that if it had not been for their ability to get foreign capital they could not have reached any stage of development. I shall cite five examples given in a letter from Mr. Doody, the Minister of the Department of Industrial Development of Newfoundland:

1. First oil refinery at Come-By-Chance, total investment, $160 million; Government of Newfoundland contributed $30 million; foreign investment money, $130 million; Canadian money, nil.

2. Second oil refinery, Come-By-Chance, total investment, $308,500,000; Government of Newfoundland $78,500,000; foreign investment money, $230 million; Canadian money, nil.

3. Linerboard mill at Stephenville, total investment, $162 million; Government of Newfoundland, $73 million; foreign investment, $89 million; Canadian, none.

4. Churchill Falls hydro development, total investment in hydro facility, $920 million; foreign investment, $500 million; Canadian investment, $420 million; of the $420 million Canadian funds, only $50 million was raised on the private capital markets; the remaining $380 million was provided by the Government of Quebec, Newfoundland or company equity.

5. Twin Falls Hydro Development, total investment $60 million; foreign investment $52 million; Canadian equity, $8 million.

These developments that I have referred to are of tremendous magnitude and are of such importance to Newfoundland, and, therefore, to Canada, because Newfoundland is part of Canada—and I do know some of the background, certainly in connection with the Churchill Falls development—that the decisions in those cases, without any doubt, would be that they were of significant benefit to Canada.

Even saying that, if you ask me to define "significant benefit", I would have trouble doing so. I would prefer to use the language which the Australians use when they talk about "in the national interest." I can understand that and I would say therefore that if anything is "in the national interest" it should be of significant benefit to Canada. It may be that in the guidelines it could be tied in in that way. Whether it will or not, I do not know.

Honourable senators, I have taken more time than I expected, but this is what happens when you get wrapped up in a subject. I have not developed all these areas, nor have I indicated all the various subject matters covered in our report. There were many recommendations that we made which were accepted by the House of Commons committee, and which were reasonable recommendations. For instance, one was that if a non-eligible person gets a clearance by satisfying the authorities that the transaction is of significant benefit to Canada, and he then wants to go out and buy some more shares, he should not have to be screened again.

These are things which I would think were so obvious that they would only need to be stated, but somebody had to study them. The committee certainly did a wonderful job. I was only one member of the committee, being the chairman. We had good staff and we think the report is, by and large, a good report. We think the report should be read in conjunction with the amendments which have been made, and with the tables which I have filed to show the extent to which our recommendations have been acted on.

There is a hard core that we are going to have to wrestle with and, quite obviously, the bill should go to committee. It will be up to the committee to give the minister the opportunity to explain the situation in relation to what I call the hard core items. It will be up to the committee and its staff to see what answers they can work out, and then come back to this house and tell you what the story is. Then it will be up to the Senate to make the final decision.

On motion of Senator Grosart, debate adjourned.

COMMONWEALTH PARLIAMENTARY ASSOCIATION

CONFERENCE HELD AT LONDON, ENGLAND—DEBATE CONCLUDED

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Connolly, P.C., calling the attention of the Senate to the Nineteenth General Conference of the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association, held at London, England, in September, 1973, and in particular to the discussions and the proceedings of the Conference and the participation therein of the delegation from Canada.—(Honourable Senator Macdonald).

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Honourable senators, when I adjourned this debate it was for the purpose of keeping it alive, as it were, in order that any other senators who might wish to speak on it could do so. I am now informed that so far as this side is concerned no other senator wishes to speak on this matter. Unless there is someone on the government side who wishes to speak on it, I would ask that it be removed from the Order Paper.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

SCIENCE POLICY

The Senate resumed from Wednesday, November 14, consideration of Volume 3 of the Report of the Special Committee of the Senate on Science Policy, tabled in the Senate on Tuesday, 11th September, 1973.

Hon. Allister Grosart: Honourable senators, Senator Lamontagne on an earlier occasion gave us an excellent overview of Volume 3 of the Report of the Special Committee of the Senate on Science Policy. It is my intention on this occasion to deal with one section only of that Volume 3 of the report which is described as "The Interfaces of Science Policy." Perhaps, to put my remarks in context, I should review very briefly the earlier reports of the committee.

Volume 1, as honourable senators will be aware, I am sure, was called, "A critical review: Past and Present," of Canadian science policy, which reached certain conclusions, namely, that we had arrived at a point a few years ago of what the committee called "science policy by accident," and which was documented by charts and tables. Certain conclusions were arrived at as to the dreadful state of Canadian science policy at that time, and those basic conclusions have not, to my knowledge, been controverted.

Those conclusions were that in Canada today we are at the bottom of the list of comparative OECD and other countries in many essential aspects of science policy, including our funding of science at the national level and at the government level. We found at the same time that we were at the bottom of the list in the very important matter of the transfer of scientific discoveries into industrial innovation.

I say this because Volume 3, the report which is before us, deals with the very important subject of the government organization of science, the science policy decision-making in the seventies.

It is necessary of course to give this background to indicate why government reorganization is as immediately necessary as Volume 3 of the science policy report indicates.

The first two parts of Volume 3 deal with the broad subject of reorganization of the government structure, and Senator Cameron will, I believe, in due course deal with the second part, following the very full explanation of the first part which has been given by Senator Lamontagne.

The interfaces of science policy are, in broad terms: federal-provincial relations; international relations at the government level; private international relations; relations of the government with Parliament and parliamentarians; relations with the science and engineering community; and, finally, the report has a footnote on the lamentable situation in regard to French-language scientific and technological terminology.

On the important question of the interface of national science policy with federal-provincial relations, our report points out that the present status of federal-provincial relations in national science policy has created, and perhaps deepened, the very great danger that our now very weak innovative capacity will become even weaker. When I say the "innovative capacity," I again refer to the finding of the committee that we are at the bottom of the list of comparative countries in the transfer of scientific discoveries into industrial and commercial innovation.

The committee hopes in its recommendations that flexible compromises between decentralized needs and the desirability of co-ordinated and coherent R & D programs undertaken at the proper scale will inspire the building of an industrial R & D and innovative ability in Canada, the development of social innovations, and our smooth entry into the post-war industrial revolution.

The problem that we found here is that we are not altogether sure that we are going to make a smooth entry into the post-war industrial revolution. As honourable senators are aware, a crucial problem in Canada is: Where are we going to stand in the international science and technology race? So far we have not scored very highly in that race. The finding of the committee is that it is of the utmost importance to the entire economy of Canada, to our social development, and to our cultural development that we remedy this situation as soon as possible. This means that we must embark, according to the committee, on a reasonable decentralization of our scientific activities. This has not been the case in the past.

One of the findings of the committee was that no comparable country had centralized its national scientific activities, particularly its research and development activities, to the extent that we had in Canada. Of all countries in the world none was even close to us in the very high level of the performance of research and development that we were doing in house—that is, in government laboratories. And this in itself was one of the main reasons why we had this very low level of transfer of science into invention and innovation.

Perhaps I should say at this time that in none of our reports has the committee been critical of the Canadian science effort as such. Over and over again we have found that Canadian science, through the NRC and other agencies, has reached a high level—certainly, in the judgment of the peers of our scientists around the world. The problem we found was that our science was not transferred into innovation.

The committee, to resolve this problem of too much centralization, recommends the formation of an inter-ministerial federal-provincial committee on science and technology to meet at least once a year before the federal annual estimates for science activities are finally approved, and that the committee be presided over by the Minister of State for Science and Technology.

This goes to what is perhaps the central recommendation, the most important recommendation, in Volume 3. Senator Lamontagne spoke of this, and in the context of my remarks it should perhaps be repeated. That central theme is the necessity of bringing our federal science policy decision-making under the Minister of Science and Technology, and a Cabinet Committee on Science and Technology.

At the present time the role of the minister is largely advisory. The committee finds this an intolerable situation. It is a situation in which science policy decisions are still being made by the Treasury Board which, under no possible assumptions, is capable of making the necessary science policy decisions that we must have if we are to make our way in the science and technology race.

The committee recommends, first of all, that there be a visible science budget; that is to say, that each department, in presenting its estimates, should separate its proposed expenditures on science activities, including research and development, of course, and present them separately in the budget so that the science activity expenditures will be visible. Honourable senators will appreciate why that is important when I say that at the present time our national funding of R & D runs over $1 billion.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Federal alone, or—

Hon. Mr. Grosart: Federal alone. Federal funding alone is over $1 billion at the present time. It has risen from about $300 million ten years ago to its present level of $1.2 billion.

The committee recommends that when these items are shown separately in the departmental and agency budgets, they then be brought together and presented to the Ministry of State for Science and Technology, which, as honourable senators will remember, was established as a result of one of the recommendations of our committee. The purpose of this is to bring together into a macro-decision situation all the micro-decisions that are made in the departments and agencies, so that we will have a single, visible science budget.

Honourable senators will realize that this is a fairly revolutionary departure in the handling of estimates, because it means that this part of the budget—the science part of the budget, this $1 billion which at the moment would be one-twentieth of our total federal expenditure—would be examined in a different way from all the other items in the department and agency budgets.

It would be looked at by the Minister of State for Science and Technology, who would then pass it on to the Treasury Board. The Treasury Board will, of course, still have its present right to decrease the total, and to say, "This is too much;" but it would not have the right to say which items are to be cut. If the Treasury Board decided that this $1 billion or $1½ billion should be reduced for reasons of national economy, then it would go back to the Minister of Science and Technology, and ultimately to an inter-ministerial committee of the cabinet, which would be comprised, of course, of the ministers heading the heaviest spending departments in science and technology.

This, as I say, is revolutionary in Canadian terms, particularly in view of our concept of ministerial responsibility. However, it would not require any constitutional change; merely an order in council.

It is not entirely revolutionary in international terms. It is very similar to the French system, sometimes called the "enveloppe frappée," in which exactly the same thing happens. The science budget is brought together, examined at the top level, and then the "enveloppe" is "frappée", and the items go back into the departmental estimates, which is exactly what the committee recommends here.

I will not go into all the items that we dealt with in the committee, but the committee does recommend that the rather interesting new institute, now known as the "Institute of Public Policy," have its name changed to "Institute of Social Policy," and be brought under the federal-provincial ministerial committee on science and technology which I have already referred to. The reason for that is that the committee finds a very large gap in our decision-making in the realm of social policy.

As honourable senators are aware, it is often said that we are now in the "second generation" of science policy. The first was the generation when the emphasis was on defence and economic factors. Today the swing is over to the social consequences of science policy, which take in such things as fall-out pollution, and more importantly, perhaps, the great problems of health, welfare and education, where we are all aware that we have just bungled along up to now—not only Canada, but almost every country in the world.

Here is an area in which we are spending billions of dollars in Canada. For example, of our total government spending of $40 billion today—that is, all governments—no less than $10 billion is accounted for by transfer payments to provinces and individuals. Almost a quarter of the whole budget of all governments is transferred to individuals.

We have done practically no research in this area. Nobody really knows whether we are spending the money efficiently in housing, education, health, or in hospitals, because there has been practically no research into the matter. In this second generation of science policy, informed people all over the world are saying, "Here is an area where we must apply the same rules of research and development that we have applied in other areas."

The second interface is in our international relations. The committee finds:

> —the Canadian government has neglected these relations and has shown itself reluctant to make the investment required to get the maximum benefits from them.

I am aware, that we have made bilateral agreements in this area of science and technology, but the fact is that it has not been realized in the past that there is no possibility of the whole of the Canadian science and technology effort, in research and development, and invention and innovation, contributing more than about two per cent of the world's total of scientific discovery and invention. This means that 98 per cent of scientific innovation in the world takes place outside Canada.

At the present moment we have completely inadequate structures to obtain an input of this. Obviously, nothing could be more wasteful than for Canada to attempt to do the whole job of scientific discovery that we might need for our national requirements. We shall have to look around the world for at least 98 per cent of it, and that means a much better structure of information-gathering than we have at the present time.

For example, we have science attachés now in Washington, London, Bonn, Brussels and Paris, and that is all. By and large, they are not at important levels of the embassy hierarchies. The committee recommends that these science attachés should have the rank of ministers, so that they can deal with the science communities in those countries at the kinds of levels that are necessary if they are to do the job that the committee feels they should do for Canada.

The committee also suggests that we immediately set up science attachés in other countries, certainly in the European Community, and in Japan, Holland, Sweden and Switzerland, for starters. There is a sub-area to our international—

Hon Mr. Desruisseaux: Would the senator permit a question?

Hon. Mr. Grosart: Of course.

Hon. Mr. Desruisseaux: Have we any science people in the United States of America?

• (2200)

Hon. Mr. Grosart: Yes, we have a science attaché with the rank of counsellor in Washington. I hope I did not forget to mention that.

There is a sub-area which is sometimes called Private International Relations but we do not have at the moment any adequate structure for dealing with this important input source for new science and innovation. The committee recommends that the Royal Society of Canada should be charged with this important function. The Royal Society has not been in the past as active as other comparable bodies around the world such as the Royal Society in England or the National Academy of Sciences in the United States. But it has come to life very recently, and the committee is satisfied that the Royal Society as presently constituted could set up the necessary structures for the very important contact between private scientists and engineers and their societies around the world.

The committee makes in this area a rather interesting suggestion which it calls the "marriage bureau suggestion" dealing with this problem of critical mass in scientific production. As honourable senators are aware, the more sophisticated the scientific innovation is, the more expensive it is and therefore the greater the requirement for a mass market. The committee makes the somewhat novel suggestion that facilities be provided by the government by which small firms and middle-sized firms in Canada could enter into partnerships with similar firms in the same field of production abroad so that between them they could increase their size, increase their innovative capacity and increase their markets.

Another area of interface between the government and science policy is in its relations to Parliament. Of course, the first and most important step would be the visible budget I mentioned earlier. The fact of the matter is that there is no debate in our Parliament today, other than the debates which have taken place in the Senate, on science policy as such. Occasionally there are quibbles about some science activity item in the estimates of a particular department, but there has never been a full-scale debate on science policy in the House of Commons. Perhaps it is not quite true that there has never been one, since we had debates on nuclear policy a number of years ago and also one or two others on a small scale, but these were not in any sense of the word full-scale debates on national science policy. In other countries there is very active debate in Parliament on national science policy. In other countries, parliamentarians are well aware of the total funding, at the gross level and the national level, on science and scientific activities. They are well aware of the distribution by various performance sectors, government in-house, industry and others, but this is not the case in Canada. It is a matter of some regret that no party in the other place, in my opinion, has a person who could be described as an informed spokesman for the party on science policy. Here, I should, of course, except the Minister of State for Science and Technology, Madame Sauvé, and her predecessor, the Honourable Alastair Gillespie.

The committee also recommends that Canada take the initiative in setting up an interparliamentary association of science and technology. I had the privilege of making this same recommendation to the Science Conference of the Council of Europe, and it was accepted, and the Council undertook to take the initiative in due course. We have since been in touch with them and they have not moved on it as yet. The committee now recommends that Canada take the initiative. I think it would be a very important initiative and it would be a feather in the cap of Canada if we were to do that.

The committee also recommends that we set up the equivalent of the Swedish RIFO. This is an acronym of the initials for the Swedish equivalent of the words parliament and science. I know that the Riksdag is the Swedish Parliament but I forget what the word for scientist is in Swedish. We had the opportunity of observing the work of RIFO in Sweden. It is a remarkable organization, where about 200 members of Parliament and 200 scientists meet regularly in discussion and inform themselves on important questions. There are two important aspects to this. Scientists often say that parliamentarians do not understand science, and parliamentarians often say that scientists do not understand parliamentarians. Anything that would bring about a change in this situation would be to the national advantage.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Scientists are not the only ones who don't understand us.

Hon. Mr. McIlraith: Some do; Dr. MacKenzie, for one.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: We have two qualifications of my statement. The Leader of the Government says that scientists are not the only ones who don't understand parliamentarians, and Senator McIlraith says that there are some scientists who do understand parliamentarians only too well.

Hon. Mr. Martin: He said that Dr. MacKenzie was one, and I fully agree with him.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: That would take me back to Volume 1 of our report, and I am afraid I shall need all the time at my disposal to complete my remarks on Volume 3.

Another interface of science policy, honourable senators, is that between the Canadian government and the Canadian scientific and technological community and others responsible for innovation. There are something like 119 scientific associations in Canada. One of the beneficial results of our committee work was the formation of SCITEC. It is an extraordinary thing that until we prodded the science community into forming an overall association, Canada was probably the only comparable country in the world that had no academy of sciences. SCITEC may not completely fill that role, which may be the reason why we have recommended in our report that the role of representing the science community at an overall level be divided between the Royal Society and SCITEC, and particularly that they be adequately funded by the government, as occurs in other comparable countries.

Finally, honourable senators, and I add this by way of what I might call a footnote, in dealing with the interfaces the committee draws attention to this important problem—the very inadequate state of science and technical terminology in the French language. It is said that at the moment there are about 5,000 English-language scientific terms that have no equivalent in the French language. The committee recommends that here again Canada, because of our special position in the world in relation to the two major languages, English and French, take the initiative in setting up in Canada an institution, suggesting the name SITEST, Service international de terminologie Scientifique et Technique, which would undertake the responsibility of bringing up to date the status of scientific terminology in French.

The committee has concluded that these matters I have raised and the other matters that are raised in Volume 3, the total re-organization of our governmental science structure, are of very great urgency. The discussion of our national science policy has been going on now since 1969, since our committee started its deliberations and began its hearings. We feel it is time now for a decision. Actually, after years of hard work, years of input from the whole science community, thorough discussion at all levels of the matter of national science policy, we still lack an adequate mechanism, an adequate structure, for the making of good decisions in our national science policy. The committee believes that the time has come to stop talking and for the government to act.

On motion of Senator Buckwold, for Senator Carter, debate adjourned.

PUBLIC WORKS

ART ADVISORY COMMITTEE—INQUIRY ANSWERED

Hon. Eugene A. Forsey inquired of the government, pursuant to notice:

1. Who are the members of the Art Advisory Committee of the Department of Public Works?
2. When were they appointed?
3. For what terms of office?
4. What is the remuneration of each member?
5. What are the qualifications of each member?

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Answered.

(For text of answers see Appendix "B", pp. 1241-1244.)

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

FOREIGN INVESTMENT

TABLE 1

Subject	Senate Recommendations		Commons Amendments
	No.	Summary	Clause	Summary
Provincial participation in review process.	1.	Mandatory consideration of policy objectives of provincial governments; copies of notices and information received by the Agency to be sent to the relevant province; province must concur in a recommendation that the investment not be allowed.	9(d) and 11(2)	Provincial representations must be submitted to the Cabinet.
Binding rulings	2.	Binding ministerial rulings to be given, on application, within fourteen days on all questions under Act except application of 2(2) criteria.	4(1)	Binding rulings to be given valid during such period not in excess of two years as the facts related in the application remain unchanged.
Appeals	3.	Statutory appeal to Trial Division of the Federal Court from ministerial rulings and decisions to recommend that an investment not be allowed (see Senate Report, pp. 876-877).		Nil.
Delays	4.	Reduce delay within which Cabinet must decide from ninety to thirty days and impose limit even in situation where parties have been given opportunity to be heard because the Minister was about to recommend that the investment not be allowed.	10, 11(1), 12(2), 13(1)(a)	Delay reduced to sixty days but still unlimited where parties have been heard.
"Significant benefit" test	5.	It was proposed that in order to allow the Minister some flexibility, he be permitted to apply a less stringent test in the case of certain transactions (see Senate Report, p. 877).		Nil
Exemptions:
Real Estate	6(a)	Complete exemption in view of virtual impossibility of establishing significant benefit and because criteria are designed to evaluate manufacturing and industrial businesses.	3(9)	Applies to acquisition of raw land and certain limited expenditures thereon and improvements for personal use only.
Investment companies	6(b)	Establishment of should be exempt because of impossibility of meeting criteria.		Nil
Amalgamations	6(c)	Clarify intra-corporate amalgamations not covered.	3(3)(e)	Clarification amendment made.
Other non-arm's length transactions	6(d)	See Senate Report, p. 878.		Nil
Presumption of control	7.	Change 5% to 10%.		Nil
Similar provisions in other Acts	8.	Foreign control regulation of banks, insurance and trust companies should be confined to provisions in special Acts governing these institutions.		Nil
Other amendments:
Subsequent acquisitions	9(a)	Exemption recommended.	3(3)(d)	Acquisition of over 50% of the shares not subject to screening if the acquirer already had de facto control.
Rights issues	9(b)	Receipt of rights to subscribe to shares should be exempted.	(3)(6)(c)	If exercise is stated to be subject to screening, mere receipt of right is not screenable.
Foreclosure by security holder	9(c)	Taking possession of property the subject of a NEP lender's security should not be screened.	3(6)(d.1)
Status of borrowers	9(d)	A borrower should not be "contaminated" with NEP status merely because the lender is a non-eligible person.	(36)(d.2)
Powers of court	9(e)	Removal of the word "nugatory" and limitation of court powers to those set out in clause 20(2).	20(2)	The nugatory concept remains but provision has been added requiring that no court order can direct the doing of anything by a person who was in good faith and who was not involved in the investment or in any subsequent transaction.

List of clauses amended by the House of Commons not already discussed in Table 1

Amendments proposed in Commons Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs

2(2)(a)—Elaboration of criteria.

3(1)—Definition of non-eligible person

(a) Restricts classes of non-resident Canadians who would otherwise not be non-eligible.

(b) Ambiguity corrected.

(e) "Control in fact" emphasized.

3(3)(f)—Non-eligible trusts.

3(5) Consequential on amendment to 3(1).

3(6)(b.1) Relaxes somewhat provisions regarding control where a corporation is controlled by a group.

3(6)(h) Consequential upon amendment to 3(1).

3(7)(c) Reduces to some extent the number of cases which fall into the definition of non-eligible person.

4(2) Enables the Minister to issue guidelines.

8(3.1) Self explanatory.

15(1) Rewording?

16(1)(b) Typographical error corrected.

16(e) Delay to return documents reduced.

30 Substitute "within 180 days" for the words "as soon as possible".

31(1) Add at the end: "such a day to be no later than 180 days after Royal Assent."

Mrs. Joan Lowndes:

Member of the Department of Public Works' Advisory Committee on Art representing the Pacific Region.

Mrs. Lowndes is art critic for the Vancouver Sun. Mrs. Lowndes is fluently bilingual, having graduated in modern languages from the University of British Columbia with a French Government scholarship. This enabled her to travel to Paris where she studied for three years, obtaining her Ph.D. with very honorable mention from the Sorbonne.

Mrs. Lowndes is a steady contributor to Arts/Canada, which commissioned her in June 1973 to go to Paris to give an account of two important Canadian shows: Canada: Trajectoires '73 at the Musee d'Art Moderne de la Ville de Paris and Selections from Art Bank at the Centre Culturel Canadien. In 1968 Mrs. Lowndes was one of six critics picked by the National Gallery to similarly fly to Paris to review Canada: art d'aujourd'hui at the state Musee d'Art Moderne. Immediately following this assignment she was awarded a Canada Council short term grant to familiarize herself with contemporary art in Paris, London and New York.

Mrs. Lowndes was invited by the Canada Council to Stanley House in 1969 to help prepare the agenda for the meeting in Canada of the International Association of Art Critics. She attended the sessions of the association the following summer in Montreal, Quebec, Ottawa and Vancouver. Mrs. Lowndes was for many years art reviewer for the C.B.C.'s Critics at Large and has so written for Vie des Arts.

Before she decided to concentrate on the visual arts about twelve years ago, Joan Lowndes had a varied career. It included teaching French and German at the University of British Columbia, working as a translator for the French section of the Office of War Information, New York (later The Voice of America); and four years as producer of Talks and Public Affairs for the C.B.C.'s English network in Montreal. She has been a commentator on the C.B.C.'s English and French networks, an actress for the B.C. School Broadcasts in French; and West Coast correspondent for the French section of the C.B.C.'s International Service. Mrs. Lowndes is married and has a daughter.

THE SENATE

Wednesday, December 5, 1973

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

PROTECTION OF PRIVACY BILL

BILL TO AMEND CERTAIN ACTS—FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-176, to amend the Criminal Code, the Crown Liability Act and the Official Secrets Act.

Bill read first time.

Hon. Mr. Martin moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading on Friday next.

Motion agreed to.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Hon. Paul Martin tabled:

Report on the administration of the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1973, pursuant to section 10 of the said Act, chapter E-5, R.S.C., 1970.

Report of the Superintendent of Insurance for Canada, Volume II, Annual Statements of Fire and Casualty Insurance Companies, for the year ended December 31, 1972, pursuant to section 8 of the Department of Insurance Act, chapter I-17, R.S.C., 1970.

ENERGY RESOURCES

TRANSSHIPMENT OF OIL FOR DOMESTIC HEATING—SUPPLEMENTARY QUESTION

Hon. Mr. Lang: Honourable senators, I should like to draw the attention of the Senate to the answers kindly furnished to the series of questions I asked last week and which appear in the Debates of the Senate for yesterday.

I particularly draw attention to the fact that the answer which appears to my second series of questions—this is no reflection on our leader, because I presume he had some assistance in preparing the answers—completely evades the question.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Then he did not have any assistance.

Hon. Mr. Lang: My question was:

(1) Has the National Energy Board denied permits which would allow the transshipment at Montreal of Venezuelan oil—

And so on. I received the following answer:

The National Energy Board has not denied any applications for export of United States owned material stored in Canada—

That is a complete and obvious evasion of my question, and I ask the Leader of the Government if he will reconsider the answer with which I have been furnished.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: He will reply in the same way.

Hon. Mr. Martin: I assure Senator Lang that I had nothing to do with the formulation of the answers. I have neither the ministerial responsibility nor the technical competence to have done so. I assure the honourable senator that the matter about which he complains will be looked into forthwith.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Forthwith!

AIR CANADA

ABORTED LANDING AT OTTAWA AIRPORT—QUESTION ANSWERED

Hon. Mr. Martin: Honourable senators, on November 22 Senator McElman asked me a question concerning the November 13 Air Canada Flight No. 637 out of Montreal bound for Ottawa. His question was as follows:

• (1410)

1. Has the Ministry of Transport received a report that Air Canada Flight No. 637 out of Montreal had its initial landing attempt at Ottawa Airport, at approximately 2 p.m. on Tuesday, November 13, 1973, aborted?

2. If so:

(a) What was the reason for such action?

(b) Have the person or persons responsible for the cause of such action been identified?

(c) What has been done to insure against any repetition of the cause or causes of such action?

The answer is as follows:

1. Yes.

2. (a) It was the captain's decision to overshoot as he was too high on the approach. There was no truck on the runway.

(b) Not applicable.

(c) Not applicable.

HONOURABLE F. ELSIE INMAN

BIRTHDAY FELICITATIONS

Hon. Mr. Martin: Honourable senators, although it is not our regular custom, I do not think we would want this occasion to pass without extending to one of our most beloved and most respected members, Senator Inman, our warmest congratulations on this her birthday.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: May I say that it is unanimous.

Hon. Mrs. Inman: Thank you, honourable senators. I certainly appreciate your thoughts. I can tell you that when you get to my age you feel every birthday is a gift.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Mr. Molson: Honourable senators, before the Orders of the Day are called, I should like to rise on a point of order. Yesterday I intervened with very considerable reluctance when leave was asked to give second reading to a very important government bill. I say I intervened with reluctance, and I did so on two counts. First of all, I do not like to be always popping up and objecting, and, secondly, because it was during proceedings in which my honourable friend Senator Hayden was going to explain a very important bill, and explain it in the way he does with such clarity and excellence. It was the last thing in the world I wished to do.

In explanation I would say that on the rare occasion when it is felt desirable to speed up our business and give an important bill first and second readings at the same sitting, I believe that as a matter of practicality, courtesy, and convenience to all honourable senators, we should be so informed.

We were adjourned when the bill was passed by the House of Commons on November 26 last and we were to sit eight days later. When it was decided that as a matter of importance to the Senate that there should be extra time spent on this bill and the decision was made that leave would be requested to proceed with second reading at the same sitting, honourable senators should have been so informed.

The point on which I am rising is to ask the Leader of the Government whether, when such situations develop, he would be good enough to have the staff of the Senate inform us that it is proposed, because of the urgency of time, to proceed with first and second readings at the same sitting.

I can well imagine some honourable senators having other obligations and, assuming that the bill would come up on Tuesday evening for first reading only, felt that it was not necessary to be here because our rules require two days' notice for second reading. There could easily have been several senators who had every intention of being here for the explanation on second reading but were not here because they were unaware that leave was going to be requested to proceed with second reading immediately.

With great respect, I would ask the Leader of the Government to instruct our staff that when such a situation develops, information should be briefly indicated to all senators that it is planned to ask leave to proceed with second reading immediately.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Honourable senators, Senator Molson spoke to me about this earlier in the day. In principle I do not see why that could not be done. I explained all the circumstances to him. We did not sit last week. We observed the usual practice of communicating with the responsible officers of the Senate, members of the Senate, the proposer of the bill, the Leader of the Opposition and others. In this instance I think I should have communicated with Senator Molson, who is the leader of his own group.

[Hon. Mr. Flynn.]

Hon. Mr. Molson: I would have been able to inform the members of my group very quickly.

Hon. Mr. Martin: We will see if we can do this.

Hon. Mr. Rowe: Honourable senators, I should like to mention a matter that I think is of some interest to a number of honourable senators, particularly those who live west of Toronto and east of Montreal. I refer to the increasing difficulties at this time of the year in making airplane and other reservations, particularly airplane reservations. Very often we are compelled to go by guesswork. I know that the house leaders and other responsible senators at times find it very difficult to predict what will happen; a lot of imponderables are involved. However, as I have said before, some of us have the feeling that there are occasions when we could be given earlier warning about the disposition of Senate business.

This is, of course, a serious matter to most of us who, in addition to senatorial responsibilities, may have professional, political, or personal responsibilities as well. If there is any way whereby we can be given more advance notice of the dates of sitting and terminating Senate sessions, I hope that will be done, particularly at this time of the year when flights to Newfoundland and to other places are probably already booked up, in some instances until the second day of January. This is a very important matter for those of us who periodically try to get back and forth from our homes to Ottawa.

Hon. Mr. Martin: I think we must assume that we will be here, in all probability, until December 21. Beyond that it is not possible for anyone to indicate.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Do you mean every day?

Hon. Mr. Martin: It all depends. I hope not.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I hope honourable senators will notice that I have not intervened and that it is not my personal problem.

Hon. Mr. Rowe: Could the Leader of the Government indicate whether that includes Fridays as well? Routinely we meet on Tuesday night and terminate on Thursday afternoon. What about Fridays and the weekend?

Hon. Mr. Martin: We may have to meet on Fridays.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Why?

Hon. Mr. Martin: At the moment it looks as though we will have to meet this Friday.

Hon. Mr. Beaubien: Honourable senators, we could deal with the work we have in front of us today, tomorrow and on the three days next week when we usually sit. I do not think it is fair all of a sudden to change our sitting days for no particular reason. Just for the fun of it, I went through the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate, and I see that from January 4 to September 14 there were 77 sittings.

When we look at the attendance by some people it is quite interesting. The Ottawa senators, of course, have a very good attendance record, but as you get a little farther away from Ottawa, in some cases the attendance is pitiful. I think one of the reasons is that we have a slipshod way of running things. When we have to deal with a bill that comes to us at the last minute nobody minds. On one occasion we sat all day on a bill and passed it at ten minutes to six the following morning. Everyone did it cheerfully and it was all right. It is the nature of our lives but that does not mean we should change every time a bill comes, sitting on Friday one week and Monday morning the next. We could run the business better than that.

Hon. Mr. Martin: As the honourable senator has just said, it is in the nature of the business. We have all accepted our obligations as senators. There is no other way, I believe, for this house to operate than the way we are operating now. We are dependent absolutely, in the absence of action by ourselves, on the progress of legislation in the other place. Senator Hayden, for instance, the sponsor of the bill, suggested that because of the importance of the bill, we should meet on Monday of this week. After consulting various people we came to the conclusion that the timetable might permit us to meet in the usual way on Tuesday and proceed accordingly. I know Senator Hayden has worked hard on this and has been working out a schedule in order to expedite our consideration of the bill.

We received a bill from the House of Commons today regarding wiretapping. We have a bill on federal-provincial fiscal arrangements, which passed in the other place unexpectedly on Friday last after about 15 minutes of debate. These are circumstances over which no one has any control. As the Leader of the Opposition would be the first to agree, particularly at this stage of our proceedings, we must be ready for this kind of eventuality. I do not know of any way to avoid it.

While I am discussing this matter, I can say that we are expecting certain other bills. We expect two energy bills. One, which deals with the allocation of energy, is now before the House of Commons. Another bill, which deals with a tax on gas, has not been presented there yet. However, it will come before us because it deals with the crisis facing the country—or the anticipated crisis.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: You are speaking like a minister of energy.

Hon. Mr. Martin: I am using the language of the bill.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh.

Hon. Mr. Martin: I am glad to hear Senator Beaubien laugh. That makes the whole situation much easier than I thought it would be before I rose.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: If you had known, you would have remained seated.

Hon. Mr. Martin: There is nothing like a laugh.

[Later:]

ROYAL ASSENT

NOTICE

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that the following communication had been received:

GOVERNMENT HOUSE,
Ottawa

5 December 1973

Madam,

I have the honour to inform you that the Right Honourable Gérald Fauteux, P.C., Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Canada, in his capacity as Deputy Governor General will proceed to the Senate Chamber today, December 5, at 5.45 p.m. for the purpose of giving Royal Assent to certain bills.

I have the honour to be,
Madam,
Your obedient servant,
André Garneau
Brigadier General

Administrative Secretary to the Governor General.

The Honourable
The Speaker of the Senate
Ottawa

The Senate resumed from yesterday the adjourned debate on Bill C-132, to provide for the review and assessment of acquisitions of control of Canadian business enterprises by certain persons and of the establishment of new businesses in Canada by certain persons.

Hon. Allister Grosart: Honourable senators, in connection with Bill C-132, we had last night the usual comprehensive explanation and review of the background of the bill by Senator Hayden. We have had from him here many great efforts in the introduction of bills, and in my view this was one of his very best. He was pressed for time and there were some aspects of the bill that he was not able to cover and he indicated that had more time been at his disposal he would have covered them.

I got the impression that Senator Hayden, as sponsor, was not too happy with the bill as it is before us. He made an excellent case for the input of constructive amendments by the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce of which he is chairman. I was not quite as optimistic as he seemed to be that the Senate has been listened to as thoroughly as some of us had hoped it might in connection with possible amendments. If I heard him correctly, he indicated that there were three major amendments by the Senate committee that had not been acted on. It is very difficult, in assessing the relationship between the Senate committee recommendations and the bill as approved before us, to determine exactly the value of the input of the Senate committee. One can come up with various groups of numbers; one could say that there were perhaps 17 amendments suggested by the Senate committee, some grouped together so that perhaps there were nine groups of amendments. Some of these were fully accepted, some were partially accepted and some were not accepted at all.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: Were not dealt with.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: Well, "were not dealt with"—I said they were not accepted and I take it to mean the same thing, because the bill is before us and I presume they were dealt with. I am quite sure that the minister and others having before them the report of the Senate committee would say that they "dealt with" them.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: It is a question of the way in which they dealt with them.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: I can only presume that they rejected them, at least for the time being. I do not think we could ever get much satisfaction from merely saying that the minister deals with amendments from the Senate committee or from the Senate. Naturally, he will deal with them. What we are concerned with is whether he will deal with them positively or negatively.

However, in saying that, I do not for one moment want to take away from the importance of the input of the Senate committee. The Senate committee has been listened to. Some of its recommendations have been accepted and these have made a vital improvement in the bill as it stands before us. I regret, however, as I am sure the committee and Senate regret, that some of the amendments were not accepted, because those particular amendments would have made for a much better bill than the one before us. I refer particularly to some of the exemptions—exemptions of certain types of corporate activity or enterprise which the Senate committee recommended should be exempted from the non-eligibility definitions in the bill. I also refer particularly to one major amendment from the Senate which Senator Hayden referred to but did not include in his list of negatives, and I am referring to the phrase "significant benefit" which remains in the bill, and which, in my view and obviously in the view of the Senate committee, is a serious deficiency in the bill as it stands before us.

This may or may not create an interesting problem for the Senate, but I have been one who has supported and warmly praised what I have called the "Hayden formula" of obtaining permission from the Senate to consider the substance of White Papers and bills which may emanate from those White Papers in advance of the time when such bills would actually come to us. This formula has in my view been an important innovation in the Senate's activities. It has, or should have, avoided the terminal problem which we have at times when very important bills come to us when the Commons is ready to go home and we are expected to pass them without the kind of consideration many of us in the Senate believe important bills should receive.

I have said it is an important innovation. I hope in this case that it will not prove embarrassing as it proved to me to be and to some other senators in the case of the so-called "tax reform bill", at which time it seemed to me the Senate was put in the position of, if not repudiating some of the recommendations made by the same Senate committee, at least of begging for the privilege of a change of mind or a second thought or a temporary accommodation to the wishes of the ministry at the time. I hope we will not find ourselves in that position this time, but that the Senate committee will insist vigorously upon the amendments that have not been incorporated in the bill before us, and that the Senate will support the committee in that regard.

This, I say, is my hope, and it would be a great day for the Senate if, having put these amendments forward and having had them dealt with—although, as Senator Hayden says, not accepted—the Senate were to insist that there is value in these amendments and that they must now be incorporated in the bill. I know the problems, of course, such as that of time, and the problems of the Leader of the Government, who obviously assumes the responsibility of getting the Senate to agree as expeditiously as possible to bills that have been approved in the Cabinet, of which he is a member. I recognize all of his problems—

● (1430)

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Is that the exact responsibility of the Leader of the Government here, to have legislation enacted and passed as expeditiously as possible?

Hon. Mr. Grosart: Well, I used the phrase to indicate that it was an accepted responsibility. Perhaps I went too far.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I hope you did; but unless you were making a description of the actual Leader of the Government—

Hon. Mr. Martin: He was using the words used by Mr. Meighen.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Nobody remembers except you.

Hon. Mr. Martin: I am the only one that reads, then.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: Excuse me. I—

Hon. Mr. Martin: On behalf of the Leader of the Opposition and myself, I excuse you.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: I wanted to make sure that that interesting exchange was over before I continued, because I would not have wanted to interrupt it.

I was about to say that, of course, it may not be correct to describe this as the constitutional responsibility of the Leader of the Government. I certainly have had the impression that it has been a responsibility assumed by leaders of the government since I have been here, certainly while on this side of the house. I think there is some justification for that. After all, the Leader of the Government is the Leader of the Government—not in the sense that some of us would wish, and this is no disparagement to him—namely, that he should be the Leader of the Senate rather than the Leader of the Government. This is one of the reforms that have been suggested, if we are to reform this institution in due course.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: You have to reform the institution if the individuals will not reform themselves.

Hon. Mr. Croll: It is your turn, Senator Grosart.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: It is my turn again, perhaps.

I move now to some comments on the principle of the bill. I think all honourable senators are agreed that the principle of the bill, the intention of the bill, as expressed in the preamble, is control. There is no question but that Canadians generally are concerned about foreign control of our economic, social and cultural future, as a result of the predominance of foreign corporations, particularly American corporations, in the private sector of our economy. There are varying figures given as to what the extent of that control might be at the moment. The latest figure I have seen, although it is hardly definitive, is that it might be 60 per cent of manufacturing, perhaps the same in mining and smelting and other resource industries, and in some particular areas, particularly in petroleum products, as high as 90 per cent or more. This, however, has been going on for a long time. There is nothing new about foreign domination of the Canadian corporate economy. One has to ask: why the sudden heated debate? And it has been comparatively sudden.

A few years ago Canadians generally were fully aware of the concessions that we had had, particularly from our American friends in relation to some of their global measures of protection, and some would say isolation; but suddenly we are very concerned about foreign, and particularly American, domination of our economy. Yet we know, or are fully aware, that foreign investment, and particularly American investment, particularly since the war, has contributed a great deal to our own best interests. We would not have our present standard of living if it were not for American and foreign investment, particularly in our resource industries, and to a considerable extent in our manufacturing industries. We would not have as efficient an economy as we now have as a result of American management expertise, and also as a result of the access to foreign markets that we have been given as a result of what I might call the "branch-plant" aspect of our economy.

The reasons, I think, are worth considering, honourable senators, because they are so much a part of the new Canadianism. Some call it economic nationalism; others call it a mere upsurge of world-wide nationalism. Whatever it is, it is with us and it has a great deal to do with the bill now before us, because without that upsurge we might have gone on and continued to live with the situation as it was, saying, "It will work out in the long run; we will continue to have a substantial favourable merchandise balance of trade, and we will also have for some time at least, perhaps forever, a non-merchandise, or, as some people call it, an invisible deficit, and on current account we will have a deficit but not one with which we could not live." That is the attitude that could be taken. We could also say, "Why close the door now? If we have these high levels of foreign control of our economy, and if we are looking very much into the future, will we be dealing with another 10 per cent, 15 per cent or 20 per cent, and does it matter all that much?" Those are some of the philosophical suggestions put forward when considering the desirability and efficacy of the bill now before us.

The reasons, as I see them, are rather well documented in a recent publication called Nationalism and the Multinational Enterprise, published by three professors from McGill University, H. R. Hahlo, J. Graham Smith and Richard Wright. In one particular chapter which deals with the Canadian situation in respect of multinational corporations and other corporations involved in the problem with which we are now dealing, I find this analysis, to which I have added a few of my own, of the reasons why we are now concerned with foreign control of our economy.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: What is the page?

Hon. Mr. Grosart: It will be found in chapter 3 which is headed, Canada and the Multinational Enterprise, written by Ivan R. Feltham, Q.C. and W. R. Rauenbush, beginning at page 40. These informed gentlemen say that the first reason, and this is perhaps the most important, is that it is only in the last decade that we have moved from a position of dominant control of individual corporations to a positon of dominant foreign control of whole industries. I do not need to document that; we know it to be a fact. But it is also a well known fact that it is only in the last decade or decade and a half, certainly within that time span, that we have awakened to the fact that this is so.

The second reason is that the American proportion of that control has increased, and for various reasons connected with the American image abroad, American control—and the reasons may be sentimental or otherwise—has become less acceptable to Canadians than control from elsewhere.

The third reason is related to that. We are perhaps in a backlash of the European concern about American control. A great deal has been written about this. The famous Servan-Schreiber book Le Défi américain is a good example. We, like other nations around the world, are becoming concerned particularly about American domination, not merely foreign domination per se.

The fourth reason given is the rise of the multinationals. The multinationals are obviously creating a problem for all sovereign states, because there are many indications that in many areas of their activities they are able, if permitted, to transcend national boundaries with their policies and, at times, to act in ways that may be regarded as counter to national economic policies. At the present time it is said that some 15 per cent of the total GNP of the free world is now controlled by multinationals and there is an estimate that this will rise in the next 20 years at least to 50 per cent.

The fifth reason given is the concern about extraterritorial application of foreign laws. We have had some very good examples of that in Canada or, at least, some good "scares" about it. There is some evidence that our American friends in the structuring of their own remedies for their economic troubles find it necessary to insist that their laws, particularly in respect to foreign investment in the United States and to American investment abroad, should carry through to the policies of subsidiaries of American companies. The result is this problem of extraterritorial extension of the laws of one country into our own. Then, of course, there are these specific balance of payments measures which came upon us rather suddenly in Canada. It always surprised me that we did not anticipate them, perhaps because our American friends were taken by surprise when they suddenly discovered two or three years ago that for the first time in their history they were faced with a deficit on commodity trade. When they looked at the picture they said, "Who are the two biggest offenders? Japan and Canada." They had not, I think, put us in that class up to that time, but when they were faced with this crisis in their economy they introduced legislation to remedy it. This had very serious effects on our own economy, not as serious, I think, as the general assumption at the time in Canada but, nevertheless, serious. It is rather interesting, because it has been said that our action as governed by this bill is unilateral and unique. Although I am not fully in favour of this bill, I would have to say that that is not so, because it is rather interesting that the name of one of the groups of regulations that our American friends decided to invoke is the Foreign Investment Control Regulations. For reasons that I think Senator Hayden indicated, we did not go quite that far in the nomenclature of our bill. We called it the Foreign Investment Review Act but, of course, we all know it was a foreign investment "control" act. That is a bit of semantic euphemism which I do not think has done any particular good but, perhaps, no great harm.

Then, of course, the seventh reason has been the concern about the degree of the social responsibility of corporate management. This is, I think, a fairly new phenomenon in its present cycle, although, of course, it has been going on for a long, long time, as evidenced by the anti-trust laws in the United States and our own restrictive laws in respect to competition. However, as part of the new concept of the importance of social indicators as a yardstick of the efficiency of legislation and government policy, we have come to place much greater emphasis upon our analysis of the degree of social responsibility that has been accepted by Canadian and particularly foreign corporations.

Finally, there is the worldwide resurgence of nationalism. This is not confined to Canada. We sometimes call it economic nationalism. Some people call it chauvinism. There are many names and many aspects, but there is no question it is with us. Public opinion polls have made it very clear that this is a matter of great concern to Canadians, although the overwhelming figures of the degree of concern are, I think, greatly distorted merely by putting the question, "Are you in favour or not of further foreign control of the Canadian economy?" If the question was put, "Would you be in favour of restricting American control if it meant dropping your standard of living 30 per cent, or if it meant losing your job?" I think there might be a different answer.

Those are the eight reasons that are given and I elaborated on them somewhat, but there is an interesting discussion in the source I have just mentioned. All this means, of course, is that this bill faces up to the problem, which was very clearly enunciated by Senator Hayden, of reconciling these two broad factors in our future. One is, of course, the desire to control our own destiny. The other is the obvious need of continued foreign investment if we are to achieve that destiny. So we have these two factors operating at times against each other, and an attempt has been made in this bill to reconcile them.

The question before us, of course, is, is this the best possible reconciliation? Could it be a better bill? Senator Hayden indicated that he hoped this bill would do the job, and I am sure we all do. He indicated some doubts, and I have further doubts. The bill could be improved, should be improved and will certainly be improved if this Senate insists on the amendments already made by our committee.

[Hon. Mr. Grosart.]

We have, of course, the problem of what will be the effect of this bill on our relations with our American friends. These are our best customers. Two-thirds of our merchandise exports are taken by the United States, which means the United States permits access of those imports to their markets. Something like two-thirds of our imports, necessary imports for the maintenance of our economy, also come from the United States, a total each way of about $10 billion, not an insignificant portion of our economic account. It is also so that our surplus on merchandise trade with the United States has been increasing quite substantially and for the last three years has been at over $1 billion. I add the rider, as I did earlier, that this is not the current account figure. We are still in deficit on the current account.

● (1450)

American investment in Canada is said at the moment to be about $38 billion. Here again there are various figures given. I would say this is an up-to-date figure. On the other hand, Canadian investment in the United States is about at the level of $5 billion, which is something we would not want to jeopardize, because it is a very important earner of necessary balance of payments money.

If I might quote again, on page 48 of Nationalism and the Multinational Enterprise, it says:

> In the search for general guidelines—

The reference is, of course, to guidelines on what we should do about foreign investment.

> —we have concentrated too much on ownership and its traditional corollary, control, and too little on regulation of behaviour of enterprises to achieve defined goals. There is already a high level of behaviour regulation for economic, safety and other social purposes. All business is subject to some regulation and some industry to a very large amount.

This is the kind of alternative suggestion which I do not believe has been given enough consideration in the deliberations leading up to the drafting of this bill. There seems to be some evidence, clear in the Gray Report, that there is an unreasonable bias per se against foreign investment in Canada.

I say "an unreasonable bias" because in the Gray Report I find no attempt to balance or assess the advantages of foreign investment to Canada over the long run, in the present or in the future; and certainly I see no indication in this bill that this aspect has been given the consideration it deserves.

This may be a dangerous bill. If it offends those on whom we rely to invest in the future of our country, we shall have some serious problems. It seems possible to me that one of the effects of the bill as it stands might be to induce a would-be investor in a plant to produce a product for the Canadian market, to locate in the United States. His attitude might be that he does not want to go through this review process. Canadian tariffs are fairly high. If he has a product for which there is substantial demand, he will pay the tariff and invade the Canadian market from his plant in the United States rather than invest in a plant in Canada.

There is real danger that this will be one of the effects of the bill. I should perhaps qualify that by saying, as did

Senator Hayden, that a great deal will depend on the administration of this bill. We have very little evidence or reason to know how it will be administered. There have been some indications, non-official statements by officials and perhaps even by the minister, that the bill will not be as rigidly enforced as the provisions would indicate it could be. We all hope that will be so.

The decision raises, of course, the great problem of ministerial discretion. Dare we trust this tremendously important factor in our destiny to this kind of review process, bureaucratic at one level, semi-bureaucratic at another, departmental ministerial at another, and Cabinet level at another? It seems to me to be a kind of judgment, an almost impossible task of deciding out of hand, irrevocably, without appeal, whether a business investment in Canada will be of significant benefit to Canada. No one knows. Very seldom has anyone introducing a new product a clear idea of what it will do on the market.

As for "significant benefit," which I will come to in a moment, I was thinking about this the other day in connection with Xerox Corporation's being allowed to come into Canada. I remember the early days of the Xerox Corporation. That new product was not entirely accepted by the business community for a very long time. It might not have been allowed into Canada, yet many of us who saw it at the start could today be millionaires if we had known its potential significant benefit to Canada. That would apply to many people. Would it have been regarded as of "significant benefit" to Canada?

Taking the criteria with which the minister is to be guided in making his decision on whether to permit a takeover or new business in Canada, one would, of course, be employment.

It might well have been argued that Xerox was likely to put many stenographers out of business. That would have been one argument. It could also be argued that there would be unfair competition to business already in the duplicating field.

Again I say that if the administration of this bill is as wise as we hope it will be, perhaps these problems will not arise. But I see a tremendous responsibility in asking any review board or review group, including the Cabinet, to decide whether this or that business will succeed, what its effect will be on employment, what its effect will be on competition with other businesses, and whether it will be of significant benefit.

To achieve its purpose, it is obvious that in this bill very wide powers have been given to the review board, to the minister, and to the Cabinet.

This is a fairly old story in the drafting of legislation, where the net is cast wide to catch all the possible fish, even if many fish would be much better left in the sea to swim their own way. Here again, it is a matter of administration. Of course, we do not have before us the usual regulations which will be promulgated under this bill. Again, we are in the dark in many aspects of the bill, although I am glad to say that in the regulation clause of the bill we are not at this time faced with that impossible kind of clause which we have often had in other bills, which says that it will be at the discretion of the minister to make regulations which he considers necessary to effect the purposes of the bill. I have said before that I will oppose such a clause each time it appears in a bill, because obviously it takes the decision about its relevancy to the provisions of the bill away from the courts. It merely means that if the minister thinks he needs such a regulation, that is the end of it. That clause, I am glad to say, is not in the regulation section of this bill.

I would not in all respects go quite as far as the submission of the Board of Trade of Metropolitan Toronto, which I have before me. I am sorry it has no date. In some respects I was impressed with the statement:

> The board represents businessmen who want a government of laws, not of men, who want certainty in law.

That is perhaps the crux of the business community's objection to some clauses of this bill. I know the difficulties involved in the drafting of bills, but I am always concerned when we substitute the judgment or the discretion of men for clear, legal guidelines.

● (1500)

I said I would not go as far as the Board of Trade and others in the matter of the constitutionality of the bill, which Senator Hayden discussed at length last evening. It paraphrases Lord Acton, and is simply the irrepressible deduction from history "that great discretionary power, secretly exercised, is likely in the long run to lead to the corruption of those who exercise or influence the exercising of the power." Some might agree with that, but perhaps not with another statement. I am unable to put my hands on that statement at this time, but it is to the effect that because of the problems of the possible unconstitutionality of the bill, no businessman is likely to contest it on those grounds and, therefore, it amounts to "intimidation of business." That is a statement which, in my view, goes too far. Senator Hayden dealt comprehensively last evening with the problems involved in challenging the constitutionality of the bill, possibly by the provinces and possibly by some corporation or person affected by the bill.

We have before us the bill, the report of the Senate committee, Senator Hayden's excellent explanation given last evening and appendix "A" to Hansard of yesterday, which gives us an assessment of the acceptance or otherwise by the government of the Senate amendments.

Because of the importance to the Senate of this general situation, I would hope that in due course—perhaps in summing up—Senator Hayden will have something more to say. He was pressed for time last evening and generously did not wish to retain our attention longer than he did. However, I hope he will have something to say on the comments I will now be making on the bill as it stands in relation, to some extent, although not exhaustively, to the recommendations of the Senate.

I have mentioned the name of the bill. It is derived, I think, fairly directly from the Gray report which was entitled Foreign Direct Investment in Canada, although this bill deals with more than direct investment.

The preamble, as Senator Hayden called it, headed, "Purpose of the Act," in his view has been inserted to bring to the federal authority the power to enact this bill within the Constitution.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: Would my honourable friend permit me to interject? I did not say its purpose was to bring the authority within the purview of the federal authority. What I said is that the use of a preamble or the use of a statement in a bill itself—this time the statement is in the bill itself, not the preamble—is very often the device used in order to raise the presumption of validity. I did not say that that declaration makes the bill valid.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: Of course not. That would be the last declaration in the world I would expect from Senator Hayden. He did refer to it as a "presumption of constitutionality" on the part of the framers of the bill and therefore of the government. He referred to the fact that the bill presumes to say that this situation with which we are faced is a matter of "national concern," and he went on very learnedly to explain the relationship of the phrase "national concern" to "national emergency" in respect of recent Supreme Court decisions. In listening to him I wondered why the government had not been bold enough to say it was a matter of national emergency, which they have not done.

Moving on to the famous clause 2 where the marginal note in subparagraph (2) is, "Factors to be taken into account in assessment." That refers, of course, to the assessment by the review board, the ministers and the Cabinet as to whether or not a person seeking to start a new business in Canada or to take over an existing business is an eligible or a non-eligible person.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: If my friend would permit an interjection? I think his statement combining the review agency with the minister is not a correct interpretation of the bill. The agency has no authority. The minister makes the decision and the assessment.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: I thank Senator Hayden for that correction. As a matter of fact, he made that very clear in his statement. I was coupling the whole process together from the review agency to the commissioner, to the minister, to the Cabinet, and saying that it is within this bloc that the decision is made. It is quite true, as Senator Hayden says, that the agency itself merely passes on—

Hon. Mr. Hayden: It is a conduit pipe.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: Yes. But it is part of the process. It is part of the decision-making process. It is the very start of the decision-making process, and without the review board there could be no decision-making process upward. It is for that reason that I coupled them all together. I am fully aware that the review board itself merely accepts the application, and perhaps it does some lookout work in order to apprise itself so that it can in turn apprise the minister as to whether somebody somewhere is thinking of making an acquisition, and so forth, under the act. I thank Senator Hayden for the correction, because he is normally much more precise in these matters than I am likely to be.

When we come to this part of clause 2, we have this famous phrase:

> . . . the establishment of any new business in Canada is or is likely to be of significant benefit to Canada,—

The committee in its report says that this may not be the best phrase to use. Senator Hayden suggested the phrase, "contrary to Canada's national interests" as being a better phrase. I think he was perhaps referring there, as he indicated, to the phrase in the Australian bill. I believe the Australian bill uses the phrase, "in the national interest."

Another suggestion which appeals to me is that the disqualification requirement be that it be shown that the proposed acquisition would be a detriment to Canada. This goes much further and produces much better guidelines for business. As somebody has said, if the acquisition or new investment is not a detriment to Canada, then why worry about it? Yet, we go the other way, perhaps casting the net as wide as possible with this phrase, "of significant benefit to Canada," which, as I indicated, is going to be absolutely impossible to interpret with any consistency because of the criteria requirements that have to be applied to the decision. I will not go over them, because Senator Hayden explained them thoroughly last night.

I move on to clause 3(3)(b), which is the presumption of control provision. This takes us into the famous "25-10" situation—that is, the definition of the degree of control, or apparent control, in the shares of a corporation. I am sure honourable senators are aware of the general situation here. Perhaps it is enough for me to say that the Senate committee made two very sensible recommendations, which were not adopted. It is said that 5 per cent of the shares of a corporation owned by one individual should be the threshold of non-eligibility. The committee recommended that that should be raised to 10 per cent, and also that the 20 per cent in other clauses—which I will not deal with, because there are a great many of them—should be increased to 25 per cent.

I myself find it difficult to understand why the Senate committee's suggestion was not accepted, because it is not only sensible but has a broad consensus of support among the experts in business, and even among academics. This is the formula that Premier Davis of Ontario suggested very strongly. Perhaps I might quote a statement he made in the Ontario Legislature on July 13, 1971, which is reported in the Ontario Securities Commission Bulletin of July 1971:

> This policy of using a 25-10 formula for non-Canadian ownership is consistent with that now in effect in the loan and trust field and which we used in connection with distributors of paperback books. It is a sound yardstick for use in most areas involving foreign ownership, enabling the encouragement of foreign investment and funds while protecting our own Canadian interests.

It seems to me that this recommendation of our committee was so sound, and so much in line with current conventional wisdom, that the committee and the Senate will insist on it. In various clauses of the bill, which I will not detail, both the 5 per cent and 20 per cent thresholds are retained, in spite of the Senate committee's recommendation.

I turn to some other of the committee's recommendations that were not accepted. There was a group of recommendations applying to amalgamated corporations, which we suggested should be completely exempted. The committee also suggested that investment fees be exempted, and that certain non-arm's length transactions that did not involve change of control should be exempt. I should also perhaps mention normal real estate activities. All of these were very important exemption recommendations that would have made this bill much more workable in my view and I am sure in the view of Senator Hayden and the committee. These recommendations were not accepted.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: Except the amalgamation.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: I am subject to correction. My recollection now is that a clarification was made, but that the complete recommendation was not accepted. I know there was a clarification, but it was my impression, on reading the suggested amendment and the bill, that the totality of the suggested Senate amendment had not been accepted. Perhaps in due course Senator Hayden will correct me if I am wrong on that.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: Do you want the statement now?

Hon. Mr. Grosart: Of course.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: All the bill appears to deal with is what they call statutory amalgamations—that would be of shares. Provisions exist in both provincial company law and federal company law to permit the amalgamation of two or more companies as a result of which the several companies cease to exist, and the amalgamated company becomes the company. We thought that sort of transaction should be excluded from the bill, and it is. The bill does not deal with an amalgamation, in the general terms of that word, outside of statutory amalgamations; nor does it deal with amalgamations that may be in relation to assets rather than involving shares.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: Thank you very much. Then I think we can mark that one up as a partial acceptance of the Senate recommendation.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: Then we come to the question of rights issues, which are very complicated and run through a number of subsections and paragraphs. Here again, on such things as foreclosure and so on, the Senate recommendations were not, as I recall, accepted.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: The foreclosure recommendation was.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: Foreclosure by security holders, yes. However, I was particularly interested in the phrase used in connection with clause 3(6) (d.2), where the Senate recommended that certain borrowers—I will not go into the full details—be not contaminated (which was the word used) by non-eligible person status. I find that a very interesting indication of an attitude by the committee, which seemed to me to make a great deal of sense, that there is considerable danger of normal, reasonable, honest, decent people being contaminated by this bill. As the bill stands, I am afraid that such persons will continue to be contaminated.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: Would my friend permit me to clarify that?

Hon. Mr. Grosart: Of course.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: "Contamination" simply means that if a Canadian business enterprise borrowed money from a non-eligible person it might well be that under the bill that Canadian enterprise, in borrowing money from a non-eligible person, might itself become tainted with non-eligibility.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: Contaminated.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: We thought by choosing the word "contaminated" it described the situation. That has been corrected.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: I think it was an excellent use of the word. I mentioned it because I like it so much. I did refer to the fact that it might be used in relation to some decent, honest people who might find themselves contaminated by dealing with others who are described by this dreadful phrase "non-eligible person."

Hon. Mr. Hayden: It has a more general application.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: It is a frightful thing to have to live with, to think that some American or other foreigner would have to say to a Canadian he wants to discuss a business deal with, "I am sorry, but I am a non-eligible person in Canada . . ."

Hon. Mr. Hayden: "And I don't want to contaminate you."

Hon. Mr. Grosart: ". . . If you have anything to do with me you will get contaminated. Watch out for yourself." That is what economic nationalism could do when carried to its farthest extreme. I am not for one moment saying that is characteristic of the country.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: Would my honourable friend suggest that we should find a vaccine against that?

• (1520)

Hon. Mr. Grosart: I think the Senate committee has offered some very fine shots.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: That is right.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: Shots of an excellent vaccine.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: That is right.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: And what I have been saying to the Senate is that I hope that the doctors in the committee will put the needle in, put it in deep, and keep it in there—

Hon. Mr. Hayden: There must be something in the needle.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: —until the patient responds positively, not negatively, the way it did the last time we had this situation. There is plenty in the Senate committee's report.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: The Salter vaccine.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Senator Langlois said we might apply the Salter vaccine.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: I always respect Senator Langlois' opinion but I have an innate resistance to puns, particularly puns of that kind which would relate the Salk vaccine to the Salter vaccine, but, of course, it is quite appropriate.

The committee had some success, what we might call partial success, in the reduction of certain delays. Again I will not go into details but I hope that Senator Hayden, if he feels at any time that further details will help, will not hesitate to give them. I would certainly welcome his filling in the precise details of some of these matters. There had been a reduction in certain delays. In the original bill it was 90 days, the Senate recommended 30 days, and now we have this compromise to 60 days. We have gone halfway—again another partial success.

I come now to three specific areas where Senator Hayden seemed to regard the result as a major, if I may say so, failure of acceptance.

The first was in the matter of provincial consultation. It seems to me this is very serious, because under the bill as it stands those who will be engaged in the decision-making process will have certain criteria as to whether an investment or acquisition is by an eligible or a non-eligible person—in other words, whether it is acceptable in Canada and whether it is of significant benefit.

There is some casual mention in the bill of provincial input but as Senator Hayden himself said, in giving his judgment on the bill, there is no requirement of any provincial input. This would seem to be a very serious omission. It perhaps goes to some extent to the question of constitutionality, because if we are speaking of "national concern" it would seem obvious that the relevancy of the bill, or the constitutionality of the bill, would depend on the nationalism—the national extent of the concern.

The provinces are vitally concerned in these provisions. We all know as a matter of fact that many provinces are actively out in the world financial markets soliciting foreign investment today. It is true that in the decision-making process a representatation by a province must be taken into consideration. But it seems to me that there is no constitutional point which would require the decision-makers to find out whether any province wishes to make a representation.

It may be said that these acquisitions do not go on in secret, that provinces are going to find out. This is not necessarily so. As I read the bill, the decision-making process may start when someone is just thinking about an acquisition. I do not see anything in the bill that says there must be an overt act of acquisition before various things can happen, including the invasion of private offices on a court order to find out if somebody is thinking of an acquisition. It seems to me the bill goes that far, but I am subject to correction on that.

This being so, there will be very many cases where there is federal government intervention between the contemplation of acquisition and acquisition, where provinces would have no knowledge whatsoever, and where decisions might be made—if the administration is not what we would hope—without the knowledge of the provinces.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: I know my friend wants to state the position accurately, but the investigation provided for in the bill is where the minister has reasonable and probable grounds to believe that a non-eligible person, or group of persons any member of which is a non-eligible person, is proposing to implement a proposed investment, or has made the actual investment, without complying—

Hon. Mr. Grosart: That I think is exactly what I said—where somebody is proposing to make a proposed investment.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: My friend used the word "contemplate".

Hon. Mr. Grosart: Well, contemplate. "Contemplate" is "propose."

[Hon. Mr. Grosart.]

Hon. Mr. Hayden: Is it?

Hon. Mr. Grosart: It can be.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: You write a different dictionary from me.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: I would not say so. I would say that in certain cases the words can certainly be synonymous. If I contemplate a decision I am putting or proposing an action in my own mind. I do not have to be proposing it to someone else. To some extent a contemplation is a proposition, which a person is entitled to consider subjectively himself. We will not argue on the semantics of it, except that Senator Hayden says we are looking at different dictionaries. I do not think we are. We are looking perhaps at a different interpretation of perhaps the same dictionary, which is quite common, certainly in the interpretation of statutes.

I would hope that Senator Hayden might enlighten me on one matter which comes up under clause 14(2)(b) on page 26. It starts at the bottom of page 25. The whole subclause reads:

> Any information with respect to a person, business or proposed business obtained by the Minister or an officer or employee of Her Majesty in the course of the administration of this Act may,
> (a) on request in writing to the Agency by or on behalf of the person to which the information relates or by or on behalf of the person or group of persons . . . or
> (b) for any purpose relating to the administration of this Act, be communicated to a Minister of the Crown in right of any province or to an officer or employee of Her Majesty in right thereof—

My question is: Would this communication be automatic. The bill says it "may be" communicated. It would seem to me desirable to say that it "shall be" communicated. I wonder if Senator Hayden has any comment. Although it is perhaps not senatorial procedure, I might in a case like this invite his comment.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: I think you would interpret "may" as "shall," because there are qualifications as to the confidentiality of the people. It just goes to certain sources, but if the "may" would be "shall," I would need to see the agency make a refusal to give that information in the circumstances of this exception.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: I suppose so, there. It seems to me important that in the interpretation section of the rules of the Senate, if my recollection is correct, the interpretation of "may" as meaning "shall" is not in keeping with those rules. But that is another matter.

● (1530)

I hope that Senator Hayden is correct in that, because it would remove some of the objections I have made on the ground of the provincial input into this decision-making process.

A second area of disappointment in respect to the committee's recommendations, as indicated by Senator Hayden, is in the matter of appeals. The committee made a very strong statement on this. I shall not read all of it, but the committee's report says:

> The Bill contains no provision for recourse to the courts against an Order adverse to the interests of the applicant.

I should mention in passing that Senator Hayden has explained that there is an area in which there are appeals, but this is not the one which the committee is referring to here.

The committee's report also states:

> The Minister's recommendation and the Order of the Governor in Council may have a profound effect on the civil rights, not only of foreigners but on those of Canadians as well. It is submitted that the inability to have administrative and quasi-judicial decisions of this nature reviewed, affecting as they do the legal relationships between two or more parties, rather than between the State and an individual, is inconsistent with and without precedent in our system of law and justice.

That is a very strong statement.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: It was intended to be.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: Of course, and it would seem that here we are faced with a refusal or a denial of appeal in a very important area of civil rights which, according to our committee, is without precedent, and here again I would hope this is a place where the committee and the Senate would take a strong stand.

The third area, if I recall, was in the real estate matter which we have already discussed. I think we can say there was partial acceptance, because there was a modification to exempt acquisition of raw land. But the point made by the committee, I think, is a very strong one that to include the acquisition of an office building and so on in the normal course of business, with no intention of corporate control, is going to cause great difficulties. Here again I hope the committee will take a strong stand.

I conclude my remarks, honourable senators, on what I hope will not be regarded as a partisan note. I am going to quote from a very well known Canadian economist. I rather regret that in designating some offenders against his better judgment he does use the term "Liberal", rather than "administration." I am not using the quotation for that reason. I am using it because I believe it is apropos of the situation before us, and should be put on the record. I refer to an article by Mr. J. Douglas Gibson, who is well known to many senators. He was Deputy Chairman and Executive Vice-President of the Bank of Nova Scotia, a former member of the Royal Commission on Banking and Finance, and is now a highly regarded economic consultant. So far as I know he is not, in politics, opposed to the present government.

I should also say that this article appeared in the Harvard Business Review for September-October 1973. Its title is: "Canada's declaration of less dependence;" and there is a subheading: "No longer content as a 'branch-plant' country, Canada is moving toward limits on investments from the United States." It should also be noted that this article was obviously written before the current bill was produced. It refers more directly to the so-called "foreign takeovers bill," which was the predecessor of the bill before us.

Mr. Gibson has this to say:

> Berating the Americans is easy for Canadian politicians, and it is usually good for some applause and newspaper and TV coverage. It is much more difficult to do something sensible about Americans' alleged wrongdoings, particularly when their Canadian operations are not only legal but long accepted and, in many quarters, welcomed and encouraged.
> It is even more difficult to discourage or control foreign investment activity if there is no clearly developed national economic policy and no reasonable idea of the costs and benefits of various foreign investment policies. Unfortunately, Canada does not have a developed national economic policy. She has not even adequately weighed the various alternative courses of action.
> The Liberal government, which is in power now, has been sensitive to the need for response to the forces of economic nationalism. Nationalism is in the Liberals' tradition and seems indeed to be an integral part of their approach to the just society. But the Liberals have had great difficulty in putting together an effective national economic policy.
> In my view, their failure partly reflects the effort to apply to the economic sphere rather abstract concepts of what is good, without answering the practical question of whether the new policies will work. Or, to put it another way, Liberal policy reflects a desire to clean the slate and start over, rather than build on what exists and is understood. The trouble also reflects a task-force technique that has allowed the government to take public soundings before committing itself, sometimes without an adequate presentation of the facts and alternatives in task-force statements.
> In any case, the government has spent a great deal of time and effort in trying to reform the economic system, so far with little result except for considerably more public awareness of some of the issues.

I shall skip a few paragraphs, not because they are more complimentary but because it would take too long to read the whole article.

Mr. Gibson says:

> What is most needed now is an analysis of the benefits of foreign investment and enunciation of the policy alternatives.

Further on Mr. Gibson says:

> Doubtless, the government would have liked to produce a clear and forthright statement of policy on foreign control. But how could policy decisions be reached on such a tough and complex subject without adequate background? The government has already got itself into a morass of trouble in the sphere of taxation, competition, and regional economic policy by acting or trying to act before it really knew what it was doing. In considering what shape the report should take, its authors faced some difficult questions.

I should say here that Mr. Gibson is referring really to the Gray report on which this bill is largely based. Here are the questions he asked:

> How could Ottawa pursue policies that would discourage foreign investment to an unknown degree in the face of the strongly expressed desires of most provincial governments for investment, whether domestic or foreign, to increase employment?

What would be the public response to controls extending even to the capital outlays of foreign-controlled Canadian companies, however financed?

How would the business community respond to further government intrusion into the private sector?

How much would a thoroughgoing system of controlling foreign investment increase protection of the Canadian economy and reduce competition?

Mr. Gibson then refers to some of the guidelines:

There are, of course, problems of guidelines and of definition, some of which have been made unnecessarily difficult by the drafters' desire to cover all possible loopholes.

I believe that is a statement with which Senator Hayden agrees, because he expressed the same concern, that the drafting of the bill may have overreached some of its better objectives.

Mr. Gibson concludes, referring again to the government:

So the Liberals' tougher attitude toward foreign investment and control is scarcely surprising, in view of the changed political facts, including the strong nationalist attitude of the NDP . . .

The bill is not yet law—

Again I remind you that he was referring to the earlier bill.

—but, in my judgment, the new proposals, or something rather like them, stand a strong chance of becoming law. If that happens, we shall then be faced with a long process of confusion, interpretation, and regulatory decisions before it is at all clear just what the new law means and how it will work.

With that conclusion I agree, and it is the reason I have risen at this time and taken as long as I have to put these views before the chamber.

● (1540)

Hon. Mr. Lang: I wonder if I might direct a question to my colleague, Senator Grosart, in connection with his speech? Should I infer from his remarks that he supports this bill on second reading, or otherwise?

Hon. Mr. Flynn: What have you gathered from Senator Hayden's speech?

Hon. Mr. Croll: Now, now.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: My answer to Senator Lang is that I never make up my mind how I will vote until I have heard the discussion in full.

Hon. Mr. Martin: That is very good.

Hon. John J. Connolly: Honourable senators, Bill C-132 is certainly no stranger to this house. The Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, as honourable senators are aware, held a considerable number of meetings on it—nine, to be exact—between May 23 and June 28 of this year. They heard ten outside witnesses, and received nine briefs. They also heard explanations given by officials of the department. Perhaps it would be of value, for the record, to say that some of the outside witnesses heard included the Canadian Manufacturers' Association, the Independent Petroleum Association of Canada, the Canadian Institute of Public Real Estate Companies, the Province of Ontario, the Investment Dealers' Association, the Committee for an Independent Canada, the Province of Quebec, and the Toronto Stock Exchange.

Hon. Mr. Asselin: Were they all in favour of this bill?

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Well, they made their representations, senator, and I would think most of them approved the principle of the bill.

I should say, too, that the committee of the other place had this bill before it between June 5 and July 17. They had 21 sittings, heard 22 different sets of witnesses—more, in fact, than we did—and they also had six sessions with the minister. Perhaps it is worthwhile to observe that the House of Commons now, under their new rules in respect of legislation of this character, is using a procedure with respect to the consideration of bills at the committee stage that has been in vogue in the Senate now for many years, with good parliamentary effect.

I must say that I am very much in favour of the new development we have embarked upon here in recent years, of studying bills before they actually come to us in a formal way for legislative action. What we have been doing, in effect, is giving virtual simultaneous consideration to bills in both Houses of Parliament. This is an example, if one desires to describe it that way, of the kind of work that is done under the congressional system. Certainly, it is of advantage and use to the parliamentary system, and I believe it should be encouraged. From the point of view of the Senate, I think it removes—or certainly it should remove—the criticism that the Senate gives hasty consideration to legislation, that it rubber-stamps legislation. I do not think that can be said when we do this pre-study.

I must, of course, commend the chairman of the committee, first of all for arranging the excellent opportunities that we had in committee for our review of the legislation, then for organizing the staff, and for doing so much in the drafting of the report, which I think has been useful to all honourable senators. I commend him also for the outstanding explanation of the bill which he gave here last night.

I do not propose to be comprehensive in my discussion of the bill today, but there are one or two points upon which I think I should concentrate.

As honourable senators know, the bill is a response to the report of a task force which was established by the Government of Canada in 1970. The report of that task force is entitled: "Foreign Direct Investment in Canada," and is commonly known as the Gray report. The Gray report really resulted from public debate on foreign control of Canadian industries and Canadian resources, and I suppose all of us are familiar with some of the significant figures in this field, some of which have already been referred to by Senator Grosart.

For example, on page 20 of the report it is disclosed that in 1967, 45 per cent of our manufacturing facilities were controlled by United States interests, and 12 per cent by other foreign interests. The petroleum/natural gas industry was 60 per cent owned by Americans, and some 14 per cent by other foreign nationals. The mining industry in this country was controlled to the extent of 56 per cent by Americans, and some 9 per cent by other foreign interests.

Page 25 of the report carries two interesting though short tables, numbered 9 and 10. Those tables indicate that in the period from 1946, just after the last war, until 1967, a period of some 20 years, the total financing available in Canada for enterprise was $43.9 billion, and of this some 22 per cent came from abroad.

Foreign-controlled companies continue to expand in Canada and develop enterprise. The sources of their funds are various, and these are given in table 9 on page 25 of the Gray report. One of the sources of their funds is profits generated in Canada. These retained earnings are estimated at $8.2 billion for that 20-year period, or 33.8 per cent of what was invested in enterprise in Canada in that time.

The capital inflow—new capital brought into the country—amounted to $8.9 billion, or 36.5 per cent of the investment that was made in that same 20-year period. The Canadian capital contributed in that period was $4.9 billion, or 20.3 per cent of the actual investment made. This Canadian investment, of course, may include debt capital. It may include moneys borrowed by foreign-owned firms in Canada on the good credit of the company itself, or perhaps even of its foreign parent. But it would also include whatever equity investment was made in these foreign-owned enterprises by Canadians.

Honourable senators, to me at least these simple statistics make it clear that in the period from 1946 to 1967 Canada obviously did not generate enough capital to finance the $43.9 billion investment which was made here. The shortfall was in fact 22 per cent of what was required, and perhaps this is one of the measures of the benefit that foreign investment has brought to Canada. The situation then was that to create the enterprise established here in that period we were dependent upon foreign capital resources to the extent of 22 per cent of our requirements. I understand that the position is virtually the same today.

There are two or three other figures here that may be of interest to honourable senators. Statistics Canada reports that the book value of foreign direct investment in Canada rose from $2.8 billion in 1946 to $26.5 billion in 1970. It may also interest honourable senators to know that the corporate assets of companies in Canada which are 50 per cent or more foreign-owned rose from $27 billion in 1965 to $45 billion in 1969. These figures are from returns made under the Corporation and Labour Union Returns Act, and they are cumulative.

In our consideration of this bill in committee, the first question we had to ask ourselves was how the bill decided the answer to this question: Who is a foreigner? Who is, to use the language of the present clause 3(1), a "non-eligible person"? Perhaps I can state it a little more clearly if, instead of referring to a "non-eligible person" I use the word "foreigner."

Certainly a Canadian citizen, ordinarily resident in Canada, is not a foreigner. A landed immigrant, according to the provisions of the bill, is not a foreigner. A foreign government of course, is a foreigner and presumably an individual citizen of a foreign country is also a foreigner. Certainly a corporate organization controlled either by a foreign government or by a foreign person is a foreigner, or a non-eligible person within the meaning of the bill.

What is control?—because it is control we are talking about primarily in this bill, and not ownership. The conclusive proof of control is established when the ownership of 50 per cent or more of the voting shares can be proved to reside in one place. No control is presumed if a foreigner owns less than 5 per cent of the voting rights of a publicly traded company, or if a foreigner owns less than 20 per cent of the voting rights of a non-publicly traded company. So, under clause 3(3)(c) the foreigner is deemed to acquire control of an enterprise if he acquires 5 per cent or more of the voting shares of a publicly traded company, or 20 per cent or more of the shares of a company that is not publicly traded.

Senator Grosart and Senator Hayden have both pointed out that the committee thought that the limitation might well be raised to 10 per cent and 25 per cent respectively, and that is a matter which I think the committee might well reconsider. In any event, if a foreigner proposes to invest in a corporate enterprise in Canada and acquire control, as I have defined it and as the bill defines it, he or it becomes subject to a screening process by an agency established under the bill called the Foreign Investment Review Agency. If, ultimately, an Order in Council issues approving the foreign investment as proposed, then the foreigner can proceed with this investment. If the investment is not approved, and the appeals which are available sustain the disapproval, then the investment cannot proceed. If it should do so, the minister is authorized under the bill to apply to the courts to render the investment nugatory.

What about this Foreign Investment Review Agency? It would review applications of the type we are talking about in the first instance, and it would be expected to apply certain tests set out in clause 2(2) of the bill. Ultimately it would have to find, on the basis of the advice given, that if control is to be acquired by a foreigner of a new business or of an existing business in Canada—which incidentally must have gross assets of $250,000 and revenue of $3 million, if it is to be affected by the bill—such control of the existing business or the new business is, or is likely to be, of significant benefit to Canada.

The phrase "significant benefit," as Senator Hayden has pointed out, is not precisely defined, but there are five guidelines, as he has indicated, set out in clause 2(2) of the bill. An enterprise can become of significant benefit to Canada if it raises the level of economic activity in Canada; if it increases participation by Canadians in the enterprise; if it improves the productivity and efficiency, the technology and innovation, or the variety of products which might result from the establishment of the enterprise; if it extends competition; and, finally, if it conforms to federal and provincial economic policies. These five tests are cumulative, but in certain respects they can overlap.

If the applicant can establish that his proposal for control of either an existing enterprise or a new enterprise will be of significant benefit to Canada within the meaning of the five guidelines which I have just mentioned, then control of the enterprise by a foreigner may be allowed. But how much foreign control? I would say that under the bill it could be anywhere from 5 per cent to 100 per cent of the voting stock of a company to be publicly traded.

Honourable senators, in my view the question we have to ask ourselves is whether or not these tests set out in clause 2(2) are reasonable. It seems to me that for a new enterprise or a new business which is commercially viable most of the economic criteria set out in clause 2(2) are bound to be present. If a project will provide employment, or perhaps more employment, or improved productivity or efficiency, or will raise the general level of economic activity in this country, then it can succeed. It seems to me, however, that if those factors are not present then the enterprise would not be viable. The market would not absorb an enterprise of that nature. I think that ultimately would be the test, and if an enterprise could meet the market test it would be likely to succeed under the economic tests that are provided in the bill.

The political criteria, however, it seems to me, are another matter. Under the clause in question the economic policies and goals of federal and provincial governments must be envisaged and promoted. These policies and goals, of course, can change. They can change with government, and change between the time a government comes into office and the time it goes out of office. They can change in the sense that the policies could become more strongly nationalistic. If they do become more nationalistic, then they become stricter for the applicants. However, in view of the shortfall of Canadian capital for our overall needs—industrial needs and economic needs—to which I have alluded, this is unlikely to happen until Canada is much wealthier, has more disposable savings, and has a much larger population.

Let me give an example of what I have in mind when I speak as I do. I am informed that within the next two decades Canada must prove and develop great quantities of petroleum from frontier sources in the north and offshore, and in the tar sands of Alberta, if Canadian petroleum requirements are to be met. I understand that for the tar sands alone the investment required to do this, to market the petroleum that we will need in the next two decades, is something of the order of $17 billion to $20 billion. This is an enormous prospect. A valid application to do this in the present economic climate, and with the use of an established technology, it seems to me, would be likely to meet the tests set out in this bill if a good deal of the investment had to come from foreign sources.

We can think of a good many other examples, perhaps, in which it is not quite so obvious that significant advantage to Canada would flow from a foreign investment of capital of this magnitude, but this is the type of example that leads me to conclude that the best which is provided here is reasonable.

I ask myself, however, if the test is reasonable for a foreign takeover of an existing Canadian business, and I must confess that I think this kind of test is more difficult to achieve. The economic tests of employment, of efficiency when raising the economic activity, perhaps can be readily met. They are questions of fact. As to the political tests, governmental policy again is an unknown factor. Even public opinion can cause change in the tests required in the political sector. It seems to me that, barring certain extreme examples, perhaps the tests for both the establishment of a new business and the takeover of an existing business are reasonable. Properly administered and reasonably interpreted in the light of all the requirements of this country for growth and development, they are probably satisfactory.

Our committee report reflected views about certain cases which might cause hardship. Some of these, as Senator Hayden has already indicated, have been adjusted. The minister has not appeared before the committee. He did so, as I said, before the House of Commons committee on six different occasions.

In my opinion, as a result of the study given this bill by the committee, and the excellent report which is before honourable senators, when the bill is referred to committee they will be in a position to review its provisions with a good background.

Hon. Eric Cook: Honourable senators, at the conclusion of my remarks I trust that my colleague, Senator Lang, will be able to gather that I am very much opposed to the bill in its present form, and unless it is amended I intend to vote against it.

The matter of foreign control of sections of our economy has become such an emotional issue that no one seems bold enough to suggest there are two sides to the coin. Indeed, it seems these days no one wants to say anything sensible about any type of capital, foreign or Canadian. Notwithstanding this atmosphere, I do intend to say some things about the other side of the coin, but I want to make it very clear that I am not arguing a case for foreign investors. I am interested only in what is good for Canada.

It would, of course, be highly desirable if we did own all the capital invested in Canada, but as we do not and cannot, at least for a long time to come, we must be very careful, if we take steps to restrict the freedom of action of foreign investors, that we do not throw out the baby with the bath water. In other words, we run the risk of cutting off our nose to spite our face.

Before discussing the bill itself I wish to say something about the Gray report. In my view this report is not a satisfactory study in depth of the problems caused by, or the benefits of, foreign investment. This is also the view of many of the organizations which appeared before the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce. The Canadian Chamber of Commerce prepared an excellent submission. It is difficult to select the extracts which contain the most telling criticism of the report, but a portion of the submission headed "Lack of Evidence" seems to me to go to the root of the matter. The passage reads as follows:

> The lack of evidence in the report is its greatest weakness. It is also supportive of the general anti-foreign ownership bias found in the report. The authors strongly desire increased Canadian ownership of business in Canada, but they make a significant admission that affects the validity of the entire report. The admission is that in order to assess the costs and benefits of foreign subsidiaries in Canada, data are required on the performance of Canadian-owned companies as well as data for comparisons between foreign subsidiary performance in Canada and foreign subsidiary performance abroad. As neither of these comparisons is now possible with existing published data, the authors would seem to have little more than a make-believe case for more Canadian control of business and greater control over foreign direct investment.

The Gray report in chapter 1 states:

> The bulk of this heavy foreign direct investment in Canada has occurred since the end of the last war, and it has unquestionably played an important role in the growth of the Canadian economy over the past quarter century.

● (1610)

Before we vest in a new branch of government the power to restrict further growth of the Canadian economy by restricting new foreign investment in the country, let us look at what has taken place.

The gross national product of Canada in the year 1945, the year after the war ended, was of the order of $12 billion. In 1973 it will be $116 billion—an increase, if my arithmetic is correct, of nearly 1,000 per cent.

In the report of the Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs the following comment is made relative to the European Community:

> Between 1958 and 1970 the gross product of the Community increased by 90 per cent (as compared to 61 per cent for the U.S.).

These are impressive increases, but between 1958 and 1970 the gross national product of Canada increased from $34 billion to $84 billion, an increase of about 250 per cent. These increases in our GNP are more than mere figures to the people of Canada. The Senate Committee on National Finance has told us that all levels of government levy taxes to the total of some 40 per cent of the GNP.

In 1946, after the war, the GNP was $12 billion, so that all levels of government could collect some $4.8 billion to pay for all government services at all levels. In 1972 governments—federal, provincial and municipal—could collect some $46.4 billion. This is over $40 billion more than the 1946 total taxes. It should be readily appreciated that all the many desirable social benefits, the rising cost of health and education, and the numerous other increasing costs of government, cannot be financed by a static GNP.

Nowhere is there a better illustration of the benefits of foreign investment than in the province of Newfoundland. In 1946 the interior of Labrador was an untouched uninhabited wilderness. Today, after the expenditure of some $1,650 million of foreign capital, there are 2,500 men and women working in Labrador and earning $50 million every year. The GNP of Labrador exceeds $100 million each year and, if we apply the national average tax yield, Labrador contributes in excess of $40 million per year to the tax revenues of the Government of Canada.

It must surely be obvious that if we are to follow a policy of continually increasing pensions, family allowances, and to embark on other desirable schemes, the GNP must increase in order that the tax yield may also increase. Generally speaking, tax rates cannot be increased much more because this will only bring into operation the law of diminishing returns.

It should not be necessary to point out that the only way to maintain and improve our Canadian way of life is to continue developing the whole country. If we merely maintain the status quo, we will not be able to sustain our present personal standards, nor our present municipal, provincial and federal services, and certainly not increase them.

As it will not be possible to increase very much the rate of taxation, the only way out is to do everything possible to increase the GNP. The GNP can only be increased by further development, and further development requires more capital. If we do not have the required supply of domestic capital to do all the things we would like to do, and if we impede the free flow of foreign capital needed to continue to develop, we are stupidly and short-sightedly imposing unnecessary hardships on many of our own people.

I believe I am correctly reporting the evidence of one of those who appeared before the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee when I say he advised us that the pool of Canadian capital is in fact growing rapidly and now exceeds $8 billion. But there is so much for Canadian capital to do. It cannot possibly do everything, and, as the committee has pointed out, we still need to import capital.

For example, we were told that both International Nickel and Hudson's Bay Company recently announced that the majority of their shares are now held by Canadians. To achieve this desirable result, however, a good deal of Canadian capital was required, and there is simply not enough Canadian capital at the present time to develop the country and to provide for our many social needs.

Dealing, therefore, with new, fresh development only, and excluding for the moment takeovers, I quote from the brief of the Toronto Stock Exchange:

> Therefore, we submit that every effort should be made to permit foreign investment, which does not threaten effective control of Canadian ventures, to flow freely and with the very minimum of regulation while effective regulation is maintained in respect of the flow of capital which does pose a threat to such effective control.

I am dealing with the new developments, and not takeovers. I would agree that there might be a need to provide some effective control against takeovers, which are contrary to the national interest, but, as I will discuss later, not for the methods and procedures contained in the bill before us.

When one thinks of takeovers which might be contrary to the national interest—and I stress "might be"—one thinks of Home Oil, Denison Mines, and the Mercantile Bank. When one thinks of new ventures which help to develop the country, one thinks, among others, of Brinco, and the two iron ore companies in Labrador. Very different considerations should apply to takeovers from those which apply to new ventures.

In my opinion, we should follow the "open door" principle for new development of any type. I have little patience with those who argue against the development at the present time of our resources because they are fearful that we are not receiving sufficient returns, and because they are convinced they will fetch more money in the future if we continue to sit on them. These good people, as a rule, also express themselves as being opposed to all forms of human exploitation, but see nothing inconsistent in suggesting that Canadians should, if possible, keep the rest of the world in short supply, so that eventually Canada may be able to exploit the rest of mankind when the time is ripe to market what we own of the world's requirements.

In addition, there is a fallacy in their contention, because while the value of natural resources will, of course, increase, so also does everything else. So that in the final result there is relatively little or no gain, and, indeed, as new methods and new inventions come into existence, there is the added danger that some natural resources may lose a good deal of their value. One generation's assets may be a succeeding generation's liabilities. For example, what were once the largest iron ore mines in the then British Empire, the iron ore mines on Bell Island in the Province of Newfoundland, are completely shut down and dismantled. The coal mining industry in Cape Breton is only a shadow of its former self. As the Canada Year Book puts it, "the decline in this industry has been fairly rapid and would have been more rapid without government intervention."

Consider the classical case of gold. We can read in the Canada Year Book the following:

> Of the 32 lode gold mines operating in Canada in 1970 there was only one that did not receive assistance under the terms of the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act.

Just think what our grandfathers would have said if in their day and time someone had forecast that in order to continue to operate gold mines one would have to obtain public assistance.

Lastly, Canada is not the only area in the world which has undeveloped lands and untapped natural resources. There are many other vast, almost unexplored and certainly undeveloped areas of the globe, and capital will always go where it is welcome. I am not, of course, disputing the right of governments at all levels to insist that the public should at all times receive a fair return from the development of natural resources. This can be done by gearing the returns to the governments to match the returns to the developers. The "in" word for this in this day and age is "indexing."

There can indeed be no objection to all levels of government "indexing" royalties, taxes and so forth to the profits of the development, and this should be done to protect the public good. Subject to the protection of the public interest, in the matter of the proper financial returns to the public treasuries, and subject to the right to veto "takeovers" which are contrary to the public interest, it is in the best interests of Canada to maintain "an open door" policy, and we should continue to welcome and encourage foreign capital for all purposes, so that we can develop and further develop all our resources. We need to build up the country in every way, in order to supply our present needs.

[Hon. Mr. Cook.]

It is surely unnecessary to point out that if Canadians are to be happy and content, more and more opportunities must be opened up for men and women to live useful lives, and to be engaged in meaningful and gainful work. For those who are too young or too old or otherwise unable to work, the state must supply more and more services. Neither of these goals can be achieved unless the harvest of the mines, the oil wells, the land and the sea becomes greater and greater. As the harvest of the mines, the oil wells, the land and the sea becomes greater and greater, so the whole world will benefit, and it is a matter of little importance who does, in fact, own the capital needed to achieve this result.

A selfish, nationalist, closed-door policy should be scorned as being unworthy of a people who are among the most fortunate in the world. It is also, to put it quite bluntly, short-sighted, and will impose burdens on Canadians rather than benefits.

I suggest, therefore, that Canada is in a very strong position today, and she is in this excellent position due, to a large extent, to the availability of foreign capital. I think the alleged evils of foreign capital are grossly overexaggerated, and this is apparent in the Gray report. In my view the Gray report, with all due respect to its ministerial namesake, should be thrown in the ash can. If there is cause for dissatisfaction with the existence of so much foreign capital, let the government undertake a real in-depth study to be made by a strong independent body with representations from all concerned, including the provinces and outside capitalists. Let us get a balanced study which would give due weight to all the factors involved.

With regard to the bill itself, I believe it is correct to say that most of the provinces do not welcome the proposed legislation. In addition, as has been pointed out by those more competent to speak than I, some very borderline constitutional questions will arise. Indeed, the committee proceedings convinced me that this legislation will result in a constitutional "witch's brew." Even the Province of Ontario, which seemed to mildly approve of the legislation, reserved the right to challenge it in court if subsequently it is not pleased with any of the minister's decisions.

But even if we assume that the legislation is constitutionally in order, it has other serious defects, and should it be accepted in principle it still requires to be amended in several important respects.

Canada, of course, is not the only country which has to deal with the matter of foreign capital within its borders. Australia also is enacting legislation to control takeovers, and the provisions of the proposed legislation in Australia make much more sense than do those of the bill before us.

I wish to refer to the statement of the Australian Prime Minister made on September 26, 1972, to show the three main differences between the Australian legislation and this bill. The Prime Minister of Australia said, among other things:

> Australian as well as overseas investors have rights at stake and our policy must be such that their inter> est is not prejudiced—except when the interest of the nation requires it—

You will note the regard for the Australian investor. In our proposed law the Canadian investor seems to be regarded as a mere expendable pawn without any rights in the first instance, and certainly without any right of appeal beyond the department in the event he feels aggrieved.

I refer to another important difference. The Australian Prime Minister said:

> We think, however, that the time has now come to introduce a new approach for the control of foreign takeovers. The Government intends to legislate for the prevention of foreign takeovers it considers would be against the national interest on the basis of criteria which I shall indicate.

You will note the Australian test is "contrary to the national interest," and the proposed test in the bill before us is that the proposal "must be of significant benefit to Canada."

Finally, the Australian Prime Minister said:

> Foreign takeover proposals judged by the Government to warrant detailed investigation as to whether they would be against the national interest will be referred to an independent authority—including official Government representation—which will analyse each such proposal and report on it to the Government.

Why not have such an independent authority in Canada? What makes a civil servant, or the minister he advises, more competent to judge the merits of a situation than an independent authority?

Hon. Mr. Rowe: Would the honourable senator permit a request? Would he give me the date on which the Australian Prime Minister made this statement? If he did give it, I missed it.

Hon. Mr. Cook: It was September 26, 1972.

Hon. Mr. Rowe: Thank you.

Hon. Mr. Cook: In my opinion, the legislation should, at the present time, do five things. It should set up an independent authority to advise the minister; it should specify that due regard must be had to the rights of all Canadian owners who wish to sell; it should provide that only takeovers which are contrary to the national interest should be disallowed—the test of "significant benefit" can be used to block almost any transaction—and it should provide for all possible publicity and all possible rights of appeal. The courts should not be prevented from protecting the rights of the citizen.

Generally speaking, it is quite wrong to give such wide powers governing the economy of the country to one division of a government department. This is particularly so when the proceedings are not public, and the decisions are not appealable. To me it serves no purpose to be assured that the law will be carefully and equitably administered. The point is that we should not pass a law which could be harshly administered. Present good intentions could be replaced by bureaucratic indifference, or even incompetence.

Also, it must be borne in mind that an intended foreign investor may not have the same "blind faith" in the federal government as all honourable senators have.

The major interventions of the government to date have all been on the ground of "contrary to the national interest." I am referring to the Mercantile Bank takeover, the Home Oil takeover, and the Denison Mines takeover. One can appreciate the desirability of proper legislation to cover cases such as these three, but why there is need for legislation to allow some government official to say that the two major iron ore developments in Labrador, or Brinco, should or should not be allowed to come into existence is beyond me. Indeed, I doubt very much that any government department could give an intelligent ruling on the matter, or that anyone could visualize the sheer size of these operations at their start. Someone once said that war is too important a matter to leave to the generals alone. In the same way, I think the development of our frontier areas is too important a matter to leave to a federal government department alone. The provinces and those actively engaged in developing our more remote areas should also be given a very vital say in any policies affecting their future.

Let me point out that although the foreign investor may have some degree of control over his operations in Canada, the Parliament of Canada as well as the provincial parliaments control the foreign investors absolutely. The foreign investor has to obey all federal and provincial laws, and pay all taxes and royalties, and his effective control is very limited indeed. The natural resources still belong to Canada or the provinces, and if the foreign investor does not play the part of a good citizen, it is a simple matter for the government concerned to enact the necessary legislation and controls to ensure that he does act as a good citizen.

It seems to me that during the nine years that I have been a member of the Senate there has come before us no other piece of legislation which warrants more the careful second thought of this chamber. This is legislation which goes much farther than it need to correct the alleged evils of foreign takeovers. Indeed, it is legislation based on a report which, in my opinion, does not clearly establish the alleged evils of foreign investment, and which seems to completely overlook the beneficial effects such capital has on development, employment, and the budgets of all levels of government.

It was established some hundreds of years ago that you cannot make bricks without straw. The federal government cannot plan to give away more and more money unless Canada achieves a bigger and bigger GNP for the government to bite on. Because we are still developing our resources, and because we have more needs to provide for than Canadian capital can meet, the choice before us is not one between Canadian capital and foreign capital, but one between foreign capital and no capital at all, and this is particularly the case when the capital is required for very high risk operations.

We should, therefore, continue our open-door policy, at the same time having a sensible taxation policy for all capital, and reasonable corporate and other general laws to ensure that while the rights of capital are protected, all kinds of capital will be prevented from carving out a privileged place, or from abusing its position in any way.

Let us assume that we had not followed an open-door policy in the past. What might have been the effects of a different policy? In last Saturday's Gazette the minister is quoted as follows:

> Here we are as a nation, one hundred some odd years after Confederation, and for the first time the federal government will be able to exercise a decision as to whether these things are in the interest of the Canadian people—

I wonder what the minister's department would have done if it had the proposed powers a hundred years ago? Would the department have forbidden the construction of the CPR? Would it have forbidden the operations of the Hudson's Bay Company? Would it have prevented the Imperial Oil Company from searching for oil in Alberta? Would it have forbidden the Aluminum Company of Canada from starting operations in Quebec? Would it have prevented Brinco and the Iron Ore Company of Canada from doing business in Newfoundland, or the International Nickel Company from mining in Ontario?

Those are just a very few examples of operations which were made possible through foreign capital. I invite the minister to name a half dozen, or even two or three, enterprises of any worthwhile size which were new to Canada during the past 100 years which he would have vetoed, and thus have prevented them from starting their operations here.

Hon. John M. Godfrey: Honourable senators, when I took my seat in the Senate I was prepared to wait for some time before making my maiden speech, because I did not want to make it unless I thought I had some special qualifications to say something on the particular subject being debated. When it was suggested that I might speak on this bill I decided that I would do so, because certainly in my professional life I have had a chance to observe the operations of many foreign-owned companies in Canada.

It is because of this very fact that the bill we are considering undeniably presents a personal problem. The law firm of which I am a partner acts for many foreign-controlled companies, and I am a director of a number of Canadian corporations that are controlled from abroad. While it could, therefore, possibly be argued that I have a financial interest, although very indirect and remote, in permitting foreign companies to expand their operations in Canada, I certainly have no greater financial interest in this particular subject than, say, a farmer speaking on agricultural matters, a doctor speaking on medicare, or a manufacturer speaking on manufacturing. It would, in my opinion, be ridiculous to say that Parliament should be denied the benefit of the opinions, advice and vote of those gentlemen on those subjects because they have a special personal, financial interest in them. Surely one of the strengths of Parliament is that it is composed of members who represent diverse interests, as well as different regions.

However, in my opinion lawyers have special problems. When a farmer or doctor or a manufacturer rises to speak it is common knowledge that he is a farmer, a doctor or a manufacturer, and people will judge what he says in that light. When a lawyer in active practice gets up to speak it is not common knowledge who his clients are, or even what type of clients he or his firm act for, or what influences there are which consciously or subconsciously may have been brought to bear on him. In my opinion, when a lawyer speaks in Parliament his fellow parliamentarians, the press and the public should know at least the type of clients his firm acts for so that they can be in a position to judge for themselves whether or not the lawyer-parliamentarian, when he is speaking or voting, may possibly have a particular bias or conflict of interest.

May I say, to begin with, that I am a partner in the law firm of Campbell, Godfrey and Lewtas. That firm can correctly be described as a corporation law firm, as at least 95 per cent of its fees in any one year come from corporations. Furthermore, a significant proportion of the fees of my firm in any one year comes from foreign or foreign-controlled companies.

In preparation for this speech I had a list prepared setting forth all the foreign or foreign-controlled companies for whom we have acted since January 1, 1972. When I prepared this list it had been my intention to put it on record, and have it appear in Hansard. Upon further reflection, however, I decided that this presented a professional ethical problem, and I may say that this opinion was considerably strengthened by a preliminary report I received several weeks ago prepared by the Special Committee on Legal Ethics of the Canadian Bar Association. That report says:

> —as a general rule the lawyer should not disclose that a particular person has consulted or retained him unless the nature of the matter requires it.

I think that for the purpose of this debate, and any similar debates in the future on legislation generally affecting the business community, it should suffice for me to say that my firm acts primarily for corporate clients, covering a broad spectrum of the business, financial, manufacturing, resource and transportation businesses, many of which will be affected by this legislation.

It goes without saying that I shall certainly make a conscious effort to make sure, as I am sure every honourable senator who is a lawyer does, that anything I say or do in this chamber will not in any way be influenced by the fact that it might affect a client of my firm, and that I will in no way allow my professional interest to conflict with the proper discharge of my duties as a senator. I might also say that at this stage in my life and my professional career I expect that this will not be a difficult course to follow.

I trust that what I have said will be considered sufficient to disclose any possible conflict of interest or bias which I may have with respect to this particular bill. I do not propose to repeat what I have said today if I speak or vote on other bills which may affect corporate clients of my firm generally. I think my firm is of sufficient size, and our clientele encompasses such a broad spectrum of the business world, that I can hardly imagine any bill which comes before this house affecting business generally which will not in some way affect one of our clients. However, if any bill affects a particular client in some special way, then of course I shall have to consider whether or not it is proper for me to vote or speak on such a bill, and if I did whether, in addition to pointing this out, I should actually name the particular client.

Having made this rather lengthy introductory statement, which I wanted to get on the record as much to explain my position for future debates as for the present one, I will now get back to the subject under discussion. Might I say at the outset that I am in favour of the general principle of this bill. I disagree with only two of its particulars strongly enough that I will comment about them later.

In my opinion, while Canada certainly has needed and will continue to need foreign capital, particularly to finance our enormous capital requirements for energy in the next few years, we must be more selective than we have been in the past. Particularly, we should not allow more of our industrial or financial institutions to fall under foreign control unless it can be shown that there is a significant benefit to Canada generally. In my opinion, it would usually be of significant benefit to Canada if the investment is of significant benefit to a have-not or depressed region.

Having said that, I will not comment further generally on the bill, but will confine the rest of my remarks to commenting on specific matters of principle discussed in the Proceedings of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, and some of the recommendations in the report which were not accepted by the government.

I should like first to comment on the statement made by Mr. Hugh Stevens, the President of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association, at page 9, issue No. 8, of the proceedings of the committee, where he says:

> Canada can develop its own technology to a degree, but to a much more limited degree, and, if we have a big reduction in foreign investment in Canada, we will lose the access to a lot of U.S. technology.

In my opinion, if we restrict the entry of United States business into Canada we will lose a lot less access to United States technology than is generally supposed. If a United States company is doing business in Canada through a subsidiary it will ordinarily not share its know-how or technology with anyone in Canada other than its subsidiary. However, if it is not doing business in Canada through a subsidiary, then it should be very happy to enter into a licensing agreement with a Canadian-controlled company to provide it with know-how and technology. Sometimes such licensing agreements are complemented with an acquisition of a minority and non-controlling interest by a foreign company, frequently pursuant to an agreement that they will not try to acquire control. This is a good deal for both sides, and, might I suggest, for Canada.

If we restrict the entry of foreign companies into Canada there should be more of these deals, and we should not lose to any significant degree access to needed United States technology. Furthermore, the Canadian company seeking access to United States know-how and technology will be in a stronger bargaining position in settling the terms of the licensing agreement if the United States company is unable to establish a plant in Canada because of this legislation.

If, however, a Canadian company is unable to enter into a satisfactory licensing agreement, then this will encourage the Canadian company to increase its own research and development activities, whereas there is no such incentive for a Canadian subsidiary of a foreign company that can rely on its parent's know-how and technology. It will also encourage Canadian companies to expand abroad, so that, as Mr. Stevens points out at page 16 of the committee's proceedings, they can create and spread the base from which they can develop technology in Canada, because they will get technology payments from their overseas affiliates which will go into the facilities here in Canada which generate the technology. If the Canadian company is foreign-controlled, such technology payments would go to the foreign parent, not the Canadian subsidiary, and the technology development base would be broadened for the development of technology by the foreign parent, not the Canadian company.

> Take an American company that can now form a DISC. I know several who have investments here and who have formed DISCs and who are not going to invest further in Canada. There is no further incentive. They have the DISC and they have sufficient presence here so they do not want to invest any more. There are other places where they can put their money.

I suggest that this statement by Mr. Stevens, while it may not be as true generally as people originally supposed, is a very potent argument in favour of this bill. The whole purpose of the United States DISC program is to divert the manufacturing of products in the plants of foreign subsidiaries to the plants of the parent companies in the United States. In other words, a United States controlled company in Canada would lose business which would not have been lost if it had been Canadian controlled.

I was interested to hear a paper delivered by Dr. Peggy Musgrave at the recent conference of the Canadian Tax Foundation in Montreal. She pointed out that the DISC provisions generated only a very modest increase in United States exports. They cost the United States treasury some $600 million in taxes and increased United States worldwide exports by only $300 million—surely a very poor return, and reflecting the fact that the tax reduction applied to all existing exports as well as the increased ones. Of the $600 million loss, there was a $90 million loss to the United States treasury on exports to Canada, without any net increase in the export balance in favour of the United States.

It is my understanding that one of the main considerations influencing the government in its reduction this year of corporate taxes in Canada for manufacturers, and the provisions for accelerated depreciation, was that there had to be a reaction to the United States DISC proposals in order to neutralize the effect of that program. This resulted in a loss to the Canadian Treasury of $150 million that benefited the United States shareholders of United States controlled manufacturing companies operating in Canada.

In effect, the net result was little different in trade patterns, but with a substantial consequential loss to the Canadian treasury for the benefit of United States investors in Canadian manufacturing companies. This is a very good example of one of the penalties we pay for having such a large proportion of our secondary manufacturing industry controlled from abroad.

I should like now to refer to the evidence of Mr. R. J. Beach, chairman of the membership committee of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association. I must confess that over the years I have disagreed very strongly with the attitudes of many representatives of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association towards government, and any laws and regulations which may have been enacted by governments in the interest, and for the protection, of the public generally. Mr. Beach is a typical example of these attitudes, and what I object to in many of the spokesmen for that association. While I know Mr. Stevens and have the greatest respect for him, I do question his judgment in bringing the likes of Mr. Beach along to appear before the committee.

The type of thing I take strong exception to is best exemplified by the statement that Mr. Beach makes at page 19, where he says:

> Well, senator, the business acumen and the ability to make a decision in the business area on the part of civil servants and politicians comes pretty low on my list. I just don't think they know what makes them tick, and I don't think they understand the problems. I think that most of the time the decisions they make are wrong.

Now, what is Mr. Beach's real complaint? It is that if this bill goes through he will be unable to sell his business to a United States company for a million dollars more than it is really worth. Mr. Beach admits that he has had some serious discussions with Canadian companies who would be prepared to buy his business, but not for more than it is worth.

Mr. Stevens comes up with another example of this kind of thing that has been going on, and the reason why Canadian companies have not been able to purchase other Canadian companies that are for sale, and why these companies have been sold to foreigners. He refers, at page 19, to a competitor of theirs who wanted to sell. They made him an offer of $2 million for the business because that was all it was really worth to them. The competitor—and he can hardly be blamed for this—eventually sold out to an American interest for something in excess of $5 million. As Mr. Stevens said, the business did not do very well because the Americans admittedly paid too much for it, and it was eventually resold at a much reduced price to another foreign-controlled company.

I think these are typical examples of why the control of Canadian companies has been going abroad and, might I say with the greatest respect, I disagree with the choice of words used by Senator Hayden, reported on page 20 of issue 11 of the committee's proceedings, where he refers to Mr. Beach and says:

> How do you deal with a situation like that, where there is a penalty on a person having to follow the requirements on a takeover where he has a successful business, providing reasonable employment, yet there is a penalty; his market for sale is limited?

It is the use of the word "penalty" that I take issue with. In my opinion, no one is suffering a penalty merely because the result of this bill might be that he can only sell his business for what it is worth, and not for a million dollars more than it is worth.

While I strongly criticize Mr. Beach's attitude to government, which is so well illustrated by his remarks about our civil servants and politicians, I do not criticize him for wanting to be able to sell to the highest bidder if he ever decided to sell, without regard to the nationality of the bidder. But, surely it is the duty of the government to be primarily concerned with the interests of the public as a whole and not just Mr. Beach, particularly if they can do so without penalizing Mr. Beach. Under this legislation, Mr. Beach will still be able to get what his business is worth, and I shed no tears for him or his heirs because they may have to struggle along with a million dollars less than what they would have had from some foreign company if this bill had not been passed.

For that reason I cannot go along with the recommendation in the report of the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee, where it recommends that there should be an exception under certain circumstances where no Canadian purchaser can be found who is willing to pay a reasonable consideration. The statement of the chairman about Mr. Beach suffering a penalty if he cannot get the extra million dollars would lead me to believe that it was the opinion of the committee that a reasonable consideration for Mr. Beach's business would be a million dollars more than it is worth, and that I cannot agree with. For that and other reasons I am not in favour of that recommendation.

I want to comment on three other recommendations in the report. First, the Senate committee proposes that the province where the investment is located be given a right of veto and, in effect, complete control in determining whether or not it is of significant benefit. While I certainly agree that the representations of the provinces should be considered, as is now provided in the bill, and the effect in any particular province of such investment should be given very serious consideration, in my opinion it would be a complete abdication of the responsibility of the federal government in this area, and go far to nullify the purpose and principle of this bill, if this recommendation were accepted.

Secondly, the Senate committee recommended that there be an appeal not only from the rulings of the minister on questions such as whether a company is an non-eligible person and whether a business is related, but also from the decision of the minister to recommend to the Cabinet that the investment be disallowed because it is not of significant benefit to Canada. In that connection I would like to refer to the submission of the Canadian Bar Association, which recommended:

> —a specific right of appeal to the courts from ministerial rulings except on the issue of whether an investment was of significant benefit to Canada.

I certainly agree with the recommendation of the Canadian Bar Association and the committee that there should be an appeal from ministerial rulings, and I might say at this point that I also agree with the recommendation of the Senate committee that there should also be provision—and I quote from the committee's report—for a ruling "as to whether a given and actual set of circumstances would or would not constitute an acquisition of control within the meaning of the act." And frankly I just do not understand why this is not provided for.

In the brief of the Canadian Bar Association they refer to a departmental news release entitled "Background Information," dated January 24, 1973, being the date of the first reading of Bill C-132 in the other place. This reads as follows:

> A major additional safeguard is that any decision by the Government—except on the question of significant benefit—can be brought before the courts. This includes the Minister's judgment on whether the company is foreign controlled and hence subject to the review process; whether an investor has in fact acquired control; whether an acquisition is of a Canadian business; and in the case of the establishment of a new business, whether it is related to an existing operation.

As presently constituted, if the minister makes a ruling that the company is foreign-controlled, and the company concerned is of the opinion that the minister is wrong, then the only way the company can get the ruling reviewed by the courts is for it to proceed with the acquisition and invite either injunction proceedings under clause 19, proceedings to render an investment nugatory under clause 20, or a criminal prosecution under clause 24. Such rulings by the minister are of a judicial or quasi-judicial nature, and it is wrong in principle that the only way to appeal a ruling of this kind by the minister to the courts is to defy it and, therefore, invite criminal prosecution.

Section 28 of the Federal Court Act gives a right of appeal to the appeal division of that court from any decisions or orders of any federal board, commission or other tribunal of a judicial or quasi-judicial nature. If, therefore, instead of merely advising the minister, the Foreign Investment Review Agency provided for in the act were empowered to give actual rulings, no doubt on any ruling of the agency there would be a right of appeal to the court under the Federal Court Act because it would be considered to be of a judicial or quasi-judicial nature.

What would be the practical effect of providing for a right of appeal from such rulings? There is provision in the Ontario Securities Act for appeals to the court of appeal from the decisions of the commission. This right of appeal is seldom used. Its main value, and the main value of the appeal provided in the Federal Court Act, is that it counteracts any tendency an administrative body or person might otherwise have to be capricious or arbitrary. As one judicial writer puts it:

> The right of appeal can be justified on the strictly practical grounds that to leave administrators and members of inferior tribunals with power definitely to set the limits of their own authority would be to offer them temptations which not all would be able to resist.

By the very fact of its existence, a right of appeal from orders and decisions of administrative bodies of a judicial or quasijudicial nature protects the civil rights of persons and companies.

As a result of the delay involved in an appeal, which would in most cases prevent any proposed investment, there would probably in practice be few appeals. It would, however, have a very salutary effect on both the agency and the minister, and would be of real value in ensuring that they acted judicially in making any ruling. It should not be overlooked that the determination of who is a non-eligible person, or whether control would be acquired, is a determination of whether or not the minister and the Cabinet has authority to deal with the matter at all. However, on this question of appeals to the courts I must disagree with the committee on two points.

First, I do not think it is right that appeal from a ruling should be to the trial division of the court without any right of appeal. Both the Federal Court Act and provincial acts, like the Ontario Securities Act, provide for appeals from a board, commission or other tribunal to a court of appeal and I do not see why this should be any different.

Secondly, I do not think a court is the appropriate body to determine whether an investment is of significant benefit to Canada, and I agree with the submission of the Canadian Bar Association and disagree with the recommendation of the committee in that regard.

In my opinion, there should be no appeal to the courts from the decision of the minister to recommend to Cabinet that the investment be disallowed. It has long been a principle of Canadian law that where a government official or body arrives at its decision through the application of policy rather than law, its function should be described as administrative, and traditionally there are no appeals to the courts from a decision of a purely administrative nature as opposed to one of a judicial or quasi-judicial nature. It is only necessary to refer to clause 2(2), which provides that one of the factors to be taken into consideration in determining "significant benefit" is its compatibility with "national industrial and economic policies," to see this is an administrative decision of the type that the courts should not be dealing with.

Finally, I disagree with the recommendation of the Senate committee that investment companies be, in effect, exempted from the provisions of the bill. In my view, it is of particular importance that investment companies be subject to the provisions of this bill, because I believe it is important that before any foreigner be allowed to control an investment company in Canada he be carefully screened. It is preferable that people who control investment companies should be Canadian citizens resident in Canada, and answerable to Canadian courts. I only have to mention the likes of Messrs. Cornfeld and Vesco to emphasize the importance of this.

The last point I would like to comment on is the statement by the Honourable Darcy McKeough in issue 11 of the committee's proceedings, at page 12, that Canadians should be more prominent on the boards of directors of subsidiary firms in Canada. He referred to the introduction of Canadian residence requirements for directors of companies incorporated in Ontario, which had been described by the federal minister before as being tokenism, and to the fact that this more enlightened federal government indicates that it will legislate the same thing. In my opinion, to describe the present provision in the Ontario act, and the proposed provisions in the Canadian act, as being tokenism is really understating the matter. I would describe it as pure window-dressing, if past experience is any criterion. I have yet to run into a lawyer who knows how these things work who does not agree with me. In no way can the provisions requiring that a majority of the board be Canadians lessen the necessity for this bill.

In conclusion, might I say that I think it is of great importance that this bill be passed substantially in its present form. With the recommendations of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce which have already been incorporated by amendments in the other place this is a much improved bill, although in my opinion it would be even further improved if a right of appeal from the rulings of the minister were provided, as I have suggested, and the provision for rulings were extended to provide for rulings as to whether or not under a given set of circumstances an investor will acquire control.

On motion of Senator Lang, debate adjourned.

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL FISCAL ARRANGEMENTS ACT, 1972
FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL FISCAL REVISION ACT, 1964
INCOME TAX ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Eric Cook moved the second reading of Bill C-233, to amend the Federal-Provincial Fiscal Arrangements Act, 1972, the Federal-Provincial Fiscal Revision Act, 1964 and the Income Tax Act.

He said: Honourable senators, Bill C-233 has a long title. It is also possible to give a long explanation of the details of the bill but, on the other hand, it is equally possible to give a fairly brief explanation of the purposes of the bill, leaving the details to the committee stage.

It is my view that honourable senators would prefer the brief explanation, and this I will now endeavour to give.

The amendments to equalization grants made by this bill were announced by the Minister of Finance in his budget last February and were accepted at that time. As a consequence this bill was passed in the other place at one sitting, and then referred to Committee of the Whole, and disposed of within the hour. The principle underlying the bill is that it will achieve four basic purposes.

First, it will increase the equalization grants paid to the seven lower income provinces by broadening the equalization formula to include in the revenue to be equalized local government taxes raised for school purposes.

Second, it will extend to March 31, 1977 the existing arrangements for federal assistance to provincial post-secondary education costs.

Third, it will modify the harshness of the provisions respecting ineligibility for the revenue guarantee. This is required to be done because the province of Nova Scotia had raised its income tax rates above the specified break-even rates, and thus had made itself ineligible for a five-year period of receiving guaranteed payments. It is now proposed to reduce this five-year ineligible period to one year.

● (1700)

Fourth, it will permit the continuation of long standing financial arrangements with Quebec in the light of the new family allowances legislation program.

This increase in grants will bring the total amount paid in equalization to about $1.5 billion. On a per capita basis the amount to be distributed to each of the seven receiving provinces in 1973-1974 will be approximately as follows: Newfoundland, $311; Prince Edward Island, $299; New Brunswick, $230; Nova Scotia, $217; Saskatchewan, $128; Quebec, $117; and Manitoba, $96. The lowest income provinces, Newfoundland and Prince Edward Island, will receive the highest per capita payments. Quebec and Manitoba, which are only slightly below the national average in revenue-raising capacity, will receive the lowest per capita payments. I believe all honourable senators will agree that this is as it should be.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Have you got the present figures—a comparison with what is being paid now?

Hon. Mr. Cook: I have not got them at my fingertips. If the bill receives second reading I intend to move that it be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance, and I am sure that those figures will be available there.

I commend this bill to the favourable consideration of honourable senators.

On motion of Senator Macdonald, for Senator Phillips, debate adjourned.

THE ESTIMATES

CONSIDERATION OF REPORT OF NATIONAL FINANCE COMMITTEE ON SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES (A)—DEBATE ADJOURNED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the report of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance on Supplementary Estimates (A) laid before Parliament for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1974.

Hon. Douglas D. Everett moved the adoption of the report of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance on supplementary estimates (A), tabled in the Senate on Thursday, November 22, 1973, and printed as an appendix to the Debates of the Senate of that date.

He said: Honourable senators, this report shows that supplementary estimates (A) for 1973-74 total almost $1.005 billion, bringing the total expenditures for the year, to date, to $20.291 billion, and this before the final supplementary estimates of the year—supplementary estimates (B)—which will add to that total.

In its examination your committee has been concerned about the increasing amounts in the supplementary estimates. Five to seven years ago, supplementary estimates (A) and (B) for the fiscal year totalled between $200 million and $400 million. In 1972-73 that sum had risen to $1.775 billion, and this year, dealing only with the first half, it is $1.004 billion, so it is quite possible that the supplementary estimates for the 1973-74 fiscal year may exceed $2 billion.

This indicates a tendency towards a lack of control over the formulation of the budget and the estimates themselves. We are talking about supplementaries which, essentially, are the result of statutory and budgetary programs imposed on the government during the term of the fiscal year.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Most of them have been imposed by the NDP.

Hon. Mr. Everett: I will ignore that remark, senator.

Your committee, while dealing with the estimates, has also been making a detailed study of Information Canada.

We have had a considerable number of hearings, which are now virtually concluded, and within the next few weeks we will be writing a report which we hope to be able to table in the Senate in the near future. We think it will be a useful report, one that will indicate a new direction for Information Canada, and dealing with some of the problems of information services in government.

We think that the examination of an individual department, program, or agency is the proper role for the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance to play. There is some discussion in the report before you of the suggestion that when we have concluded our examination of Information Canada, we should perhaps take a look at the LIP program, and the Opportunities for Youth program.

There is, however, one other direction that the work of the committee can take, and that comes under the heading of economic reports. There is before this house the Tenth Annual Review of Economic Council of Canada, that makes certain recommendations which are of interest to your committee. Two of those recommendations directly impinge upon the spending of government. The first of these recommendations of the Economic Council is:

> We recommend that the growth of government transfer payments to individuals not exceed an average yearly rate of approximately 11 per cent during the period 1973-76.

And the second is:

> We recommend that the federal and provincial governments establish, for themselves and for the public sector as a whole, one or more indicators of the desirable level of increase in public expenditures for a three-year period. To this end, we recommend that they entrust the preparation of background documents to the continuing committee of officials on fiscal and economic matters or to the Economic Council of Canada.

● (1710)

The Leader of the Opposition mentioned yesterday that he thought the National Finance Committee should study the latest annual review of the Economic Council of Canada. I think there is something interesting there, because of the tremendous increase in the level of government spending. We are talking here of estimates that this year will exceed $20 billion, and we are also talking in terms of municipal, provincial and federal government expenditures taking over 40 per cent of the gross national product.

I know some of my colleagues will disagree with me when I express concern over this, because they really do not see any difference between an undertaking in the hands of government and an undertaking in the hands of private enterprise. But here I have to part company with them because I do see a difference. In fact, I see a difference in two respects. One is that part of the inflation we are experiencing—perhaps 3 per cent of the inflation we are undergoing in Canada today—can be traced to the fact that 40 per cent or more of what is being done in Canada is under government control. By that very fact the expenditure of money is not as controlled as it is in the competitive enterprise system.

I do not believe, for example, that in the areas of wages, of costs generally and of capital appropriations, governments are as careful or as cautious as businesses are. Businesses are faced with looking at a profit and loss statement, with reporting to their shareholders, and surviving in a competitive atmosphere. I think that an examination would show that this increasing expenditure by governments—what I would call this increasing "take" of government—is contributing, as I say, to the extent of perhaps 3 per cent to our annual inflation.

My other concern, honourable senators, is that our taxation system is based on ability to pay. As the Economic Council of Canada indicates, if our expenditures are going to grow over the next few years that could involve a substantial increase in the tax requirements of government. I think you get to the point in a sliding scale taxation system where you create a positive disincentive to the development of the country.

For those reasons I am hoping that one of the initiatives that can be taken by the National Finance Committee is an examination the Economic Council's review, as suggested by the Leader of the Opposition. I hope we can put together some empirical data on this question of the size and growth of government, and its effects on inflation and the willingness of people to work and invest in an economy that has a greater and greater degree of government control.

On motion of Senator Grosart, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

At 5.45 the sitting was resumed.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

ROYAL ASSENT

The Right Honourable Gérald Fauteux, P.C., Chief Justice of Canada, Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General, having come and being seated at the foot of the Throne, and the House of Commons having been summoned, and being come with their Speaker, the Right Honourable the Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General was pleased to give the Royal Assent to the following bills:

> An Act to amend the Cooperative Credit Associations Act

An Act to amend the Criminal Code

An Act to amend the Customs Act

An Act respecting the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act

The House of Commons withdrew.

The Right Honourable the Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General was pleased to retire.

———

The sitting of the Senate was resumed.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

AIR CANADA

ABORTED LANDING AT OTTAWA AIRPORT—QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE RE ANSWER TO INQUIRY

Hon. Mr. McElman: Honourable senators, before the house proceeds with its business I should like to raise a question of privilege.

My question of privilege is that the house has been provided with misinformation. It concerns a reply to a question that I put to the Leader of the Government in the Senate on Thursday, November 22. My question appears at page 1208 in the Debates of the Senate for that date, together with my background remarks. The answer was placed on the record yesterday by Senator Martin and will be found at page 1245.

Let me say at once that my question of privilege and any remarks that I make are not meant to reflect in any way upon Senator Martin. I understand, as do honourable senators, that he merely conveys to the house the information provided by respective ministries concerning questions asked in this chamber.

My first question to the Leader of the Government was:

> 1. Has the Ministry of Transport received a report that Air Canada Flight No. 637 out of Montreal had its initial landing attempt at Ottawa Airport, at approximately 2 p.m. on Tuesday, November 13, 1973, aborted?

The answer to that question was; "Yes".

My second question was:

> (a) What was the reason for such action?

The answer was:

> It was the captain's decision to overshoot as he was too high on the approach. There was no truck on the runway.

Subparagraphs (b) and (c) to my second question were:

> (b) Have the person or persons responsible for the cause of such action been identified?
> (c) What has been done to insure against any repetition of the cause or causes of such action?

And the answer in both cases was, "Not applicable."

The basis for my statement that misinformation has been given to the Senate is this. I had informed the house that there was a truck on the runway. The reply says that there was no truck on the runway and attributes the flight being aborted to the "captain's decision to overshoot as he was too high on the approach."

On that day the ceiling at Ottawa Airport, I am now informed, was 300 feet. Those honourable senators who have flown will appreciate what a 300-foot ceiling is. To make it more understandable, the height of the Peace Tower of the Parliament Buildings from ground level to the base of the flag staff is exactly 300 feet. It was a difficult approach for landing. We had come under the ceiling of 300 feet; the aircraft was on low power, full flaps, landing gear down, and the runway was immediately ahead of us. I cannot accept for a moment that you can overshoot in such circumstances. The power was thrown back to full power and we did get back out into the cloud layer again.

The first officer came on the intercom and advised the passengers, of whom I was one—Senator Burchill was my seatmate in the aircraft, so there is no imagination involved in what I am telling the house, there is nothing secondhand about it—and said, in a humorous tone—we needed a bit of humour at that time—that he thought probably we would like to know what had happened. He told us that we were going to circle a bit because, as we had made our approach to set down, they had found a truck in the middle of the runway. A truck on the runway! I do not discount what he told us, but the answer now given is that there was no truck on the runway. He went on to say that there was a low ceiling, that we would circle and try to get back in; perhaps we might not be able to do it and would have to go to an alternate airport. Conditions were that bad. I apologize for the detail, but I thought honourable senators would want to know the detail to understand the circumstances. We did circle and we did get back in.

I have since gathered information about the height of the ceiling on that day, and it was 300 feet. I give you the fact that we were below that ceiling; I give you the fact that the first officer told us the cause of our pulling out and making a second run.

There is something wrong when Parliament requests a department to give information and information of this nature is given to it. It is my suggestion to the Leader of the Government and the Senate that, in the interests of public safety, the leader undertake at once with the Ministry of Transport an inquiry to find out the true facts of this case and report them to this house. I further suggest that, if we are not satisfied with those facts as related to us by the Ministry of Transport, we ask the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications to conduct an inquiry into this incident; that we ask for the tapes of that Air Canada flight, which would record the conversation by the first officer that I have related to you; that we hear evidence from the control tower staff on that day and get to the bottom of what I can only suggest is a bureaucratic cover-up of a very serious incident.

I would close by suggesting that perhaps our colleague the Honourable Senator Dan Lang might have some additional information that he would wish to give on this question of privilege.

Hon. Mr. Lang: Honourable senators, I spoke to Senator McElman about this incident the other day and mentioned to him that when he put his question, that I was familiar with the incident to which he was referring. I was not on that aircraft, but I was in the VIP lounge at the airport either that day or the next day and was involved in a conversation there with a group of men waiting the departure of a plane. It is, therefore, all hearsay. The whole discussion was about this truck on the runway and everybody knew about it and everybody was commenting on it and I assumed that this incident must be of widespread public knowledge.

The other thing that they were saying—and again one must call this hearsay—was that when they got the truck off the runway or got out to the truck that they found the driver was drunk. This sort of thing is of a serious nature and should be investigated. I certainly support the position taken by Senator McElman and I add this for what it may be worth.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Honourable senators, I should like to add a few remarks to what has been said about this incident. First, as Senator McElman has pointed out, and rightly so, the Honourable Senator Martin cannot be blamed if any misinformation was conveyed to the house. As honourable senators know, in cases of this nature the leader merely conveys to the house the information that he gets from Air Canada through the offices of the Minister of Transport. However, it would seem that here we have been faced, as Senator Lang has pointed out, with some hearsay evidence. I am not challenging the facts as stated by Senator McElman, but we have the version given to those on the flight on that occasion by the flight officer. Now we have supposedly coming from Air Canada statements of the captain himself, the man who took the action to abort this landing. Having said this, I can assure Senator McElman and Senator Lang that Senator Martin and I will do our best to bring their remarks of this afternoon to the attention of both Air Canada and the Minister of Transport—

Hon. Mr. Asselin: And to the truck driver also?

Hon. Mr. Langlois: —and we will report further to the house.

Hon. Mr. Cameron: Honourable senators, I think it is timely that this matter was brought up, not only for this particular incident but for a number of others. Some senators may have seen in the Toronto Star two or three nights ago a story about a tunnel from terminal 1 to terminal 2 in Toronto Airport, built at a cost of something over $1 million, and that fewer than 200 people a day use it, whereas the number taking the ten-cent bus ride above ground is up in the hundreds of thousands a year. Even at that, since the service started in the past year we have subsidized the bus to the extent of $57,000. That is one point.

The second point is the complete inconvenience of that terminal 2. There are many other things. We should have thorough investigation, calling officials of Air Canada and the Ministry of Transport before our Committee on Transport and Communications. We might as well go into the whole thing completely while we are at it.

[Hon. Mr. McElman.]

Hon. Mr. Blois: Honourable senators, I wish to state that I was on that flight 637 with Senator McElman and I vouch for every word he has said.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

On the Question Period:

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Honourable senators, may I ask the Acting Leader of the Government, since there has been no notice of motion given as to the adjournment of the Senate today, whether we are going to sit tomorrow?

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Honourable senators, I intended to make a statement before the Orders of the Day were called. As I have had the opportunity to inform the Leader of the Opposition this morning, it is our intention to sit tomorrow, in view of the uncertainty of the situation which presently exists in the House of Commons and which may persist for a few days. In view of that situation, the Senate should be available tomorrow to deal with legislation we have before us now and also with any legislation which might come to us in the course of the present day.

It is expected that there will be some kind of "package deal" made in the other place today and that a group of bills might be coming to us at any time now. As was said, no motion is being made for a special adjournment, and when we adjourn today we will take the normal adjournment as provided in the rules, which is to say that this chamber will adjourn until 2 o'clock tomorrow afternoon.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Would the acting leader think it appropriate, as being convenient to senators, to meet at 11 o'clock tomorrow morning so that we might be able to finish by 1 o'clock?

Hon. Mr. Langlois: That is precisely what I had in mind when I was discussing the matter with the leader, but I have since been informed that a committee had already been scheduled to sit tomorrow morning, and that that would not be possible if the house were in session unless the house consented to the committee's sitting during the sitting of the Senate. That is the only reason we have kept it to 2 o'clock.

There again I am in the hands of the Senate. However, I should like to discuss the matter further with the chairman of the committee in question before making any final statement about it. But it is for the reasons I have just given that we intend to adjourn today until 2 o'clock tomorrow afternoon.

Hon. Mr. Beaubien: Can the acting leader give us any information about next week?

Hon. Mr. Langlois: It is our intention to come back at 2 o'clock Monday afternoon.

FOREIGN INVESTMENT REVIEW BILL

SECOND READING

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Hayden, seconded by the Honourable Senator Bourget, P.C., for the second reading of the Bill C-132, intituled: "An Act to provide for the review and assessment of acquisitions of control of Canadian business enterprises by certain persons and of the establishment of new businesses in Canada by certain persons".—(Honourable Senator Lang).

Hon. Mr. Lang: Honourable senators, at the request of Senator Desruisseaux I am going to yield. I assume that I will then follow him.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed that Senator Desruisseaux speak in place of Senator Lang?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Paul Desruisseaux: Honourable senators, my first words are to thank Senator Lang for allowing me to proceed. I had expected to go on yesterday, but, unfortunately, I could not because of the number of senators who took part in the debate. As I will be unable to speak later this day, and because I understand we are getting close to the end of the consideration of this bill before it goes to committee, I wish to thank Senator Lang for yielding with his usual courtesy and graciousness, thus enabling me to speak on the bill now.

When Senator Hayden moved second reading of this complex and difficult bill last Tuesday evening, I gathered from his remarks that he hoped it would go to committee where consideration could be given to making certain amendments to it. That is a position with which I fully agree for reasons which will become apparent during the course of my remarks.

Just in passing may I say that in my opinion the contributions to the debate on this bill by Senators Grosart, Connolly, Cook and Godfrey were all of high calibre and form a valuable contribution to the work of this chamber.

As for myself, today, my position is similar to that of another senator who spoke on the bill: I am involved in a number of corporations, but my involvement has no bearing on the views I have about this bill. I am taking the liberty of saying what I think about it, and I hope it will be taken in the same spirit.

I will make no technical approach to the bill. This was so well done by so many other senators that I think it would be quite useless for me to try it. I would like to undertake a study of the present planning that has been done in connection with the bill, and I would like to make some general observations on the possible consequences of it.

We cannot take questionable situations. We have to know for sure what would be the consequences, as they have a bearing on our future conception of how we trade in Canada. Many want to take a new look at international partners. I would like to take that under consideration in my own way, and I hope I will not be boring. I will try to be short.

The Foreign Investment Review bill, Bill C-132, is a most consequential bill. It was referred to on its presentation as only one of many measures on foreign investment which the government was proposing to produce in Parliament, and it was said that the bill was an extension of the review process to cover not only takeovers but the establishment of new foreign-controlled businesses in Canada.

Still other bills, as the Honourable Alastair Gillespie said, have been or will be introduced, first, to provide for the registration of technology transfer agreements; second, to ensure that the majority on the boards of directors of federally incorporated companies be Canadians; third, to increase Canadian participation in the ownership and control of resource projects; and, fourth, to examine the desirability of restricing sales of Canadian land to foreigners.

This latter heading as yet is only under advisement.

It was against this sweeping background of projected bills that the minister introduced Bill C-132. The proponents of this bill affirm that it will help to generate meaningful and satisfying employment for Canadians, promote economic growth, and provide Canada with what it wants, that is, an economy which gives it the power to innovate in response to a changing world.

I am afraid this way of reasoning out some parts of the bill is pure rationalization, for in spite of the good intention of the bill as a whole, as expressed brilliantly by the well-intentioned, pragmatic, nationalist minister, and the high hopes and the broad expectations as to what this legislation will provide for Canadians, this particular legislation may well boomerang and provide a breeding ground for some dissension and will stir, in my view, eventual resentment from some of our provinces who may be involved when factual cases of applicants interested in their localities will be dealt with negatively under the provisions of the bill.

It is my own assessment that in spite of the good purposes of the bill there will be considerable discontent about, for instance, regional employment, when it is realized that applying foreign firms have been slowed up in their development, or find themselves at a practical standstill because of the restrictions imposed under the bill, and because of the government's refusal to admit an applying foreign investor under the guidelines provided for in the bill.

● (1430)

Honourable senators, if there has been great success in our exports of manufactured goods in the last few years, which provided wide and satisfying Canadian employment, it is not solely because of our Canadian export policies and our government's continued assistance to our exporting corporations. It is principally because of the vast major market factors provided mostly through our Canadian foreign-owned firms and our Canadian multinational corporations financed by foreigners operating in worldwide markets from Canada. This is the main reason for the high export figures we now have, and this is one of the principal reasons for our current prosperity. Let us not fool ourselves by thinking otherwise.

One must therefore realize that it is a restrictive bill in spite of its good points and its apparent mild approach and its concept of a new outlook of what is good for Canada, with which I could not agree less.

The agency to be formed to undertake the screenings is expected to be more demanding and more political than any that has been formed thus far in the Canadian Parliament. It will be responsible for assessing the net benefit to Canada of an estimated 150 to 200 proposed foreign takeovers annually, and, in a year or so, of some 300 to 400 cases of new foreign direct investment and expansion into unrelated fields by existing foreign-controlled Canadian subsidiaries. In practice, the decision of the commissioners, in accordance with the bill before us, will be subject to Cabinet review. This is where political considerations will inevitably enter the picture. It will be dependent on the Cabinet of the day and on the pressures that provincial ministers, of whatever party, bring to bear. Without any definition to act as a guide, what will be called of "significant benefit" by some will not be so considered in the thinking of others who hold different political views. And what will be considered to be a related or unrelated business by those who deal with it at different levels, will appear to contain an element of bias to others of different political philosophies. Stability of assessment and appraisal will over a certain period of time disappear, and to say that the bill will promote economic growth appears to me to be erroneous.

If through this bill foreign investment is refused entry into Canada and if mergers planned for expansion and market growth are not permitted, for one reason or another, then the result will not be to promote economic growth. No Canadian or group of Canadians will find it easy to duplicate the performance and the large profitable achievements beneficial to Canada realized mostly by the multinational corporations because of their "know-how" and their ready worldwide markets. I believe truly that this new bill may prove to be, as some have said, a deterrent to many hopeful outsiders considering Canada for one of their operating bases. Being a federal government, with federated provinces as members, each having their definite powers in the field of commerce and industry, I also sense divergence of constitutional views between the federal government and the individual provinces in respect of their rights and powers, especially concerning provincially incorporated corporations backed up by foreign investment. Quebec, for instance, expresses strong opposition to the present federal policies on foreign investment. Foreign investment is unreservedly welcomed in my province. Quebec believes this is an encroachment on its rights. We have been and are successful in our manufacturing ventures and have successfully developed our exports. We have achieved prestige and gained general recognition the world over, in spite of our smallness and the little capital we could in reality afford to put up. We have not done it alone. Foreign investment played the big part. Protective types of legislation such as we now are proposing have not worked too well in the past wherever they were enforced. They may cost Canada in this instance some of its economic success and in the process make us lose a highly regarded reputation of Canadian economic liberalism that for our great benefit has been retained here up to now. The proponents of the bill have said that we as Canadians want an economy which gives us power to innovate in response to a changing environment. They have theorized that this bill will ensure that power, because otherwise we would be turning the control of our future over to those who retain it. To me, such premises have no justifiable acceptability. To me, they are of the wrong, antiquated philosophy. Foreign investment has brought us new products, new technology, good management skills, access to foreign markets and improved productivity. It was not used here for commanding, for dictating its wants, or for pressing its instructions, as was hinted. In the past, we, as a government, as a people, have found instead full co-operation and a good partnership spirit in our dealings with foreign-controlled investment firms.

Historically, it was foreign investment that helped fill a number of Canadian economic gaps, which involved capital, technology, management, and particularly markets. If foreign investment came to Canada, as it did, it was to share in the benefits derived from its international involvements, and Canada was the happy recipient of by far the greater proportion of benefits realized from their worldwide operations from their Canadian bases.

When foreign investment came to Canada in the past, it became responsible also for the export of manufactured products to world markets to the extent of more than 75 per cent. If, through such controls, restrictions, narrow guidelines, political pressures and decisions, as proposed in the bill, we were to prevent foreign investment from coming to Canada, it would mean that to that extent we would be stopping development such as those which we have witnessed.

I would not want to see our growth slowed beyond reason, or stopped in certain areas, because of some questionable theories originating in most cases in Mr. Walter Gordon's philosophy of what is a successful new economy for our country. I am quite happy with our achievement so far. I would quite honestly prefer to see Canada big and prosperous, and growing bigger and more properous, with some accepted interdependence with others, be they nations or multinational corporations, than to see Canada small, reliant and dependent on others, with a diminishing importance and diminishing control over its own economy because of its weakness, and, at the end, left with just a semblance of control over its real destiny.

There is some comfort in being informed that the future development of Canada should not be jeopardized by committing our scarce funds to an enormous repatriation of the past. It would be a monstrous destruction of the best recognized system of liberal and free movement economy that exists. It would force an inverted approach to everything, and would also cost the prohibitive amount of $30 billion, an impossibility for Canada at this time. I fear it would also have the effect of having Canada branded all over the world as a "one-way dealer," with all of its implications. Although Canada, no more than others, can rely passively on the operation of market forces alone, it is realized that our past policies were to assist effectively the development of market forces for Canada, whence they originated, and this approach was highly successful.

The expansion of such foreign policies has served Canada very well. Such foreign policies have made good new Canadians, given us world prestige, helped raise the spending income of individual Canadians, and, more than anything else, provided us with economic stability and growing economic contentment.

I am sorry that I cannot truthfully follow the pragmatic minister in his thinking, when he says:

> Our objective is to introduce a policy that will have no adverse impact on employment or investment.

I differ with him on that point if we are to consider the proposed law as being operative in the least. I do not believe that I am being grossly stupid in making the assessment that the policy of the bill will have an adverse effect on employment and investment whenever restrictions are applied, whenever takeovers planned for providing market growth and expansion are reviewed, and whenever limitations and limited guidelines are used.

The five factors covering all sectors of the economy, resources and services, which are said to be taken into account to consider a proposal of investment in a Canadian business, as to whether it is of benefit to Canadians, makes the bill restrictive, conditional, protective, and subject to interpretation.

The factors are not positive per se. They can only provide or show ways to subtract from what we have and from what we now allow. Decisions reached under the articles of the proposed law are fully dependent on personal and political evaluations of these factors. The relative importance of the factors mentioned, whether liberal, restrictive, or conservative, will change as parties in power change.

So again I say that it can and will at times have an adverse impact on both employment and investment. In my judgment, more surely than is affirmed to the contrary, it will affect our long-term economic and social goals in Canada. This is a future responsibility that Parliament will have to bear with the passage of this bill.

[Translation]

I am concerned about our federal-provincial relations when everyone can constitutionally legislate differently and according to concepts of different philosophies and principles. In the case of Bill C-132 before us, Mr. Gillespie stated on more than two occasions that with respect to the role of provincial priorities he wanted to reassure us that the bill would not have the effect of an unfavourable impact on any regional development. The minister added that foreign investment necessary to the development and growth of a province was likely to be considered as being of significant benefit and thus allowed. That seems to me to be an extreme simplification of the argument he made in his discussion of this bill. I for one do not believe that we can find that same simplification in the political facts and reality with which we are familiar.

The minister then talked about federal consultation with the provinces he visited.

I doubt very much that certain provinces would agree—this would have to be further examined in committee—to give up just like that upon the visit of federal authorities a right they have had, it seems to me at least, since the beginning of their existence, which would allow the federal government to deal directly on an individual basis with foreign corporations, for example, with a view to foreign investment, in a given province, with a provincially chartered corporation. The province of Quebec, for its part, is strongly opposed to federal policies in the area of foreign investment. That policy would be contrary to its best interests, according to what has been stated.

Is the question of the selection of qualifications required of provincial companies one of provincial jurisdiction or not? Is it or is it not up to the province to accept legally foreigners who want to obtain provincial incorporation, make investments in the province and operate therein?

If so, it is our duty to represent our provinces in this house and vindicate all their rights and make sure they keep the rights they acquired at the time of Confederation. Is individual consultation between the federal and provincial governments valid, binding on both parties? Should we not ensure a non-equivocal agreement, in writing, especially in these matters which may have constitutional implications?

The bill submits that for new foreign investments to be considered, then allowed and permitted, it must be proved that they will be of significant benefit. To my mind, that "significant benefit" remains a totally subjective matter. What it means will depend, over and above everything else, and to a large extent, on the political climate of the times, on the approach of the commissioner, the minister or governor in council who will reflect the opinion of his key members, who in turn are, by vocation, naturally strongly political.

In a country until now very democratic, one can only dread seeing a government, no matter how well intentioned, evolve in that direction and adopt such a system in the evaluation of the economic partners who would join us.

● (1450)

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Before leaving this point, would my honourable friend allow me a question?

Hon. Mr. Desruisseaux: Certainly.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Has care been taken to ensure that the bill is constitutional or not, or are we proceeding from the idea that the provinces will agree to let the federal government decide if the input of foreign capital in a company or the takeover of a provincial charter company can be allowed?

Hon. Mr. Desruisseaux: From what I gathered from the report I read, it is a constitutional matter, and the Minister of Justice, I think, or someone from the Department of Justice, has given the opinion that the present procedure made it constitutional. But I am personally not satisfied with this interpretation and for this reason I think that the bill should be referred to a committee. If it should be unconstitutional, it should never be passed. It is our duty here to protect the provinces.

Honourable senators, I never believed that we had lost control over our economy, or that we were about to lose it, as was suggested in some places. I never believed that foreign investers at any time had been or were interested in gaining control over our Canadian economy. I am convinced that our Canadians, our governments have had no difficulty to date to keep our Canadian economy independent, maybe more independent than any other nation in the world. Surely we have preserved all its flexibility against restriction so that our citizens may draw utmost benefits from it, as opposed to what can be seen in a few other countries—because of situations that are created by restrictive measures.

If I understood well, Senator Connolly (Ottawa West) stated yesterday that foreign investment in Canada amounted to $38 billion. I read in an article by Frank Rutter published in yesterday's Montreal Star that, according to economists of the United States Department of Commerce who for some time have been considering the situation of foreign subsidiaries of American companies over which they have control, this kind of investment has now levelled off while foreign investment in subsidiaries increased by 11 or 12 per cent this year. As a whole, American investments in Canada remained almost constant at the 1972 level and, according to investment projections for next year, they are expected to amount only to 7 per cent. This has started already.

You were told that 69 per cent of Canadians favour this kind of legislation. Nevertheless, I am convinced that when we review it in the light of the consequences, this percentage of approval will go in the opposite direction, for this kind of restrictive legislation will not prove, as expected, to have anything good for our economy.

The bill will probably be carried in this house. It is to be hoped however that it will be considered in committee for possible amendments and corrections. But it will probably be carried in the long run. Unfortunately I feel that the bill complies with a request of the group which indeed holds the balance of power at the present time. We are dancing to a tune, their tune. I will abstain from voting on that bill.

[English]

Hon. Daniel A. Lang: Honourable senators, I never cease to marvel at the lucidity and exactitude of our colleague, Senator Hayden, when he presents, explains and dissects a piece of legislation. In connection with the bill we have before us he has not only lived up to his masterful record, but in some ways has surpassed it. I want to particularly congratulate him, once again, and to thank all those who have contributed to this debate thus far.

Last week in the Globe and Mail, in a front page report on the passage of Bill C-132 through the House of Commons, the columnist concluded by saying that the bill would now go to the Senate where it would receive quick approval after the usual ritual grumblings. Well, honourable senators, I am afraid that is what we are seeing happening. I think some, if not all, of the speeches we have heard so far rather confirm this conclusion.

● (1500)

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Especially the silence of the government leader.

Hon. Mr. Lang: I would say that in many ways some of our speakers, if I may so put it, praised this bill with faint damns. I must say that this is not surprising to me, inasmuch as we have today a piece of legislation sponsored by a Liberal government, based on a fundamental Conservative Party protectionist philosophy, and in complete accord with the anti-capitalist and anti-free enterprise bureaucratic control bias of socialist NDPs. It is a bill with something appealing for everybody. Liberals can support it because of party loyalty. Conservatives can support it and relive for a moment the glories of the 1911 election and the slogan with which they carried it, "No truck or trade with the Yankees." Indeed, if there are any unsuspected socialists among us here they might take comfort in the rapid expansion envisaged in this bill of bureaucratic planning and control. So, honourable senators, in my opinion this bill appeals to all political persuasions.

Some time ago I set forth my own views, not on this bill specifically, but on the subject matter of the Gray report and foreign investment generally. I set forth those views in a debate we had here in June 1971 on Canada-United States economic relations. I am not today going to repeat what I said at that time; it will suffice to mention a few specifics. I said then that I believed there were five great Canadian myths about foreign investment, and I attempted in my speech to demolish those myths, with some objective statistical data. Specifically, I referred to the following myths.

Myth No. 1 is that we have an undue proportion of foreign ownership in Canada, which I said is not true, because our overall foreign investment is only 21 per cent of our total capital stock outstanding in Canada.

Myth No. 2 is that the inflow of foreign investment is less than the outflow abroad from that investment. Not true, when account is taken of the exports thereby created by foreign investment here in Canada, the imports that are displaced by such foreign investment manufacturing in Canada, and the foreign exchange gains that are produced by this foreign investment in Canada.

Myth No. 3 is that the use of accrued earnings from foreign investment for expansion in Canada is use of our savings to finance foreign takeovers. This, of course, is patent nonsense, because such accrued earnings are no more our savings than was the original foreign investment itself.

Here I point out to honourable senators an interesting phenomenon. You will note throughout the debates in the other place, and in all the talk surrounding this issue, the use of that word "takeover." Honourable senators who are lawyers certainly realize that is a completely inflammatory word. It has implicit in it, a sense of compulsory taking, but in fact all we are talking about here is buying and selling between willing sellers and willing purchasers. There is no such thing as a takeover. It is an inflammatory word, and when I hear it I immediately suspect the source whence it comes.

Myth No. 4 is that the economic performance of foreign-owned firms in Canada is inferior to Canadian companies, which is not true. Objective analysis shows the reverse to be true, until in time our inhibiting industrial and legislative environment brings down the foreign enterprise to our level of competency.

Myth No. 5 is that Canadian-owned companies in Canada will serve the public interest better than foreign-owned companies. Not true. Both Canadian and foreign-owned companies serve private interests.

Since I spoke in June 1971, my views have not changed, and I think my views compel me to reject this bill in principle. First I would like to say, as a sort of personal testament, why I must reject this bill. I think I am both a capital "L" Liberal and a small "l" liberal.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: That is the reverse of the Leader of the Government.

Hon. Mr. Lang: I basically believe in free and freer trade. I believe in freer competition. I think that both free trade and free competition best serve the interests of all Canadians, particularly the middle-class Canadians and the labouring-class Canadians. I am not a protectionist, and I am particularly not a protectionist of vested Canadian financial and industrial interests, which will be so well served by this bill in protecting them from foreign competition.

Finally, I have every confidence in the ability of Canadians to compete and win against any foreign competition in innovation, development and exploitation of any industrial and scientific skills. I have no fear for the competency of Canadian talent. I am not afraid of big bad Americans. I am not afraid of big bad Europeans. I particularly realize that the world is getting smaller every minute, and that protectionism and isolationism, which is a characteristic of this piece of legislation, must inevitably fail against the dynamics of common markets now formed and forming throughout the world, and particularly the dawning of a new sense of internationalism.

Honourable senators, let us face it: the purpose of this bill is that there shall be no further foreign investment in Canada without the consent of the minister. The significance of that is appalling. This bill, in my opinion, represents one of the most devastating assaults on the rule of law that has ever taken place in Canada outside a state of emergency. Its ramifications for most business activity in this country are staggering, and the sweep of power to be vested in the minister is absolutely enormous. There is only one thing certain, that this bill will create the greatest lobby that this or any other Parliament in Canada has ever seen. Not only that, but enormous discretion will be vested in bureaucratic niches here on the Hill and elsewhere; powers to be exercised by people with little or no knowledge of business practices, and certainly many of them with very strong ideological biases.

I suggest, honourable senators, that this is no way to direct or control foreign investment. It is an assault on the rule of law in Canada. The way to control or direct foreign investment, if that is desirable, is through taxation laws, corporation laws or security laws. That is where you create specific and delineated offences capable of being interpreted and enforced in our courts, against both the corporations and their directors. This is the way normal, competent government carries out these objectives in other countries, not by saying there will be no more foreign investment in Canada without the consent of the minister. The egregious arrogance involved in that concept staggers me.

Thirdly, I reject this bill because I believe that the problem of foreign investment in Canada is a manufactured issue. Just recently, in fact last week or so, a survey was conducted by Kates Peat Marwick & Co. for the Ontario Legislature's Select Committee on Economic and Cultural Nationalism. It would be interesting to note that they found it was a sort of "motherhood" issue, which indeed it is, and that it ranked, on the average, nineteenth in priority in a list of the problems considered important by the average man in the street. This manufactured issue is largely an Ontario manufactured issue, it is largely a Toronto-based manufactured issue.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: That is true.

Hon. Mr. Lang: It is now pervading the halls of Parliament here in Ottawa and the halls of the Legislature at Queen's Park.

Honourable senators, we have been hearing this drum beat for a long time and it is worthwhile to try to take some long range perspective on it.

This bill does not come to us as an isolated legislative act; it is part and parcel of a pattern of events that have been going on for 10 years. The first faint signs of the drumbeat could be heard in the mid-1950s through the ivy halls of our universities where academics of dubious distinction were trying to inculcate into our young people a new kind of rabid nationalism completely foreign to the traditions of our country as a whole. From the classrooms of our universities the drumbeat was picked up by our self-proclaimed prophets in the field of television, newspapers, journals and books. If I may, I would just like to read to you some brief quotations which tend to sort of simplicize the message of those drumbeats. Professor William Kilbourn, alderman, City of Toronto, said:

> Compared to the U.S., Canadians, per capita, are painfully short of first-rate, intelligent, liberated people in every sphere from industry to education and the arts.

The Honourable Robert Stanbury, Minister of National Revenue said:

> We really don't have much of a Canadian culture.

Richard Rohmer, Q.C., Chairman of the Ontario Royal Commission on Book Publishing, a man with whom I have some acquaintance, said:

> We have no national purpose, none at all that I can see.

Peter Newman, editor of Maclean's Magazine said:

> This dull, middle-class nation—

Dalton Camp, former president of the Progressive Conservative Party, said:

> The real enemy of all political parties today is not the other side, but public apathy and indifference and a national sense of futility.

Honourable senators, look at the titles of the books we are publishing, and we have more coming out at Christmas with a lot more of this ethic: Troubled Canada; The Uneasy Neighbour; Lament for a Nation; The Canadian Dilemma; The Unheroic North; The Precarious Homestead; and Survival.

Mr. John Holmes, President of the Canadian Institute of Public Affairs, said:

> We need a touch of grandiosity in Canada to lift us from the meanness of spirit, the failure of conviction which besets us.

Honourable senators, I am fed up with this drumbeat from our so-called prophets of doom. The proponents of rabid nationalism are completely out of keeping with the country as it exists today, and are trying to push us back into the eighteenth century.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: You mean you want that?

Hon. Mr. Martin: I do.

Hon. Mr. Lang: This phrase recurs. We find it being picked up in academe and media. Thence we find it pervading our political parties, not only my party but the Conservative Party and the NDP, all for different reasons, and all because the conventional wisdom created by the media—newspapers, journals, and so on—the conventional wisdom forced through those means require the politicians to go along to get their sought-after acceptance and publicity.

What has in fact evolved from this propaganda drive? Many things have evolved up to date.

First, Canadian broadcasting was Canadianized. Secondly, newspapers, then periodicals, were Canadianized. Then our trust companies, loan companies and insurance companies were all freed of the taint of foreign ownership—and incidentally, very nicely protected from future competition from abroad. Our cable television was Canadianized. Then the content of broadcasting.

Hon. Mr. Martin: As Senator O'Leary suggested. He is one of those dangerous nationalists.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Time Magazine.

Hon. Mr. Lang: Ontario book publishers are now Canadianized. Is censorship, applied by a board, the next thing we are going to have? Under the Ontario Corporations Act we have now some Canadians on the board and directors of foreign companies. A lot of good that is going to do.

Honourable senators, we have now formed a basic pattern of foreign investment restriction, with most mass media, including book publishing and distributing, movie making, radio, cablevision and radio, magazines and newspapers, and we have preserved from condemnation and competition most financial institutions, banks, trust and loan companies, insurance companies, investment companies.

Honourable senators, some speakers said this bill represents a concern felt by many people including those people appearing before the Senate committee and who basically support the legislation. Look at the list: the Canadian Manufacturers Association, the Independent Petroleum Association of Canada, the Investment Dealers Association of Canada, the Committee for an Independent Canada, the Canadian Chamber of Commerce, and the Canadian Bankers Association.

Honourable senators, why would they not want this bill? It will protect our manufacturers, like putting a tariff wall five miles high around the country. Of course they want it.

I give credit where credit is due. I remember Mr. Hart, President of the Bank of Montreal, and Mr. McLaughlin, President of the Royal Bank, both got up and said that the banks do not want this protection. But they have got it. The government has forced it on them. Also, I guess all the rest of our manufacturing industry can now look forward to benevolent sunshine flowing out of the minister's office and protecting them from the harsh winds of competition from abroad.

What even astounds me more is that after the bill was passed in the other place the minister got up and predicted that the next step is a restriction on technological exchange. What are we trying to do—build a Canadian monastery?

Hon. Mr. Cook: No. The Great Wall of China.

[Hon. Mr. Lang.]

Hon. Mr. Lang: Outside we hear in academe now the demand rising again, the drumbeats are being heard, that the staffs of our Canadian universities must have 85 per cent Canadian content.

● (1520)

I can assure you, honourable senators, that that demand stems from no desire for academic excellence, although it certainly does establish tenure.

Honourable senators, many of those developments which I have referred to that have come about, many of us have accepted and still do accept as being necessary or at least temporarily necessary in the interests of preserving some of our Canadian values. But the principle contained in this bill completely overshadows in importance the total package of everything that has come to date.

I, for one, want to see this dance stopped. I want the drummers to take away their drums and go away for a long rest.

Finally, in conclusion, I should like to mention another aspect of this bill which I think we should consider; namely, that this bill could be a real hurt to Canadians. I am not referring to the loss of jobs or the loss of potential jobs for the average Canadian worker, which is inevitably going to flow by the suppression of foreign investment inflow. I am not talking about that. I am talking about something more subtle. This bill can create in Canadians a real loss of interest, a loss of confidence in themselves. Indeed, it can produce a lack of will not only to participate in entrepreneurial activity in Canada but to compete in that activity abroad.

It is sort of interesting to see the contrast between Toronto's losing one of its greatest newspapers, the Toronto Telegram—because nobody in Canada would buy it and no foreigner could buy it so it just disappeared—and at the same time, Mr. Thomson from Kirkland Lake going over to London, England, to take control of the prestigious London Times.

Another interesting contrast to see is Britain today struggling to get into the Common Market while we here in Canada shirk away in fear of foreign investment. You know, we have heard so often that we are a mouse trying to sleep with an elephant—the mouse being Canada and the elephant being the United States. I think over the years we have started to get a "mouse" complex. I suggest that this is "mouse mentality" legislation.

In my opinion, Canada is not a mouse and Canadians are not mice and I suggest that we all have a good look again at what has happened on the north half or two-thirds of this continent we occupy. Let us look at what has happened over the last 100 years. Look at the Canada of then and the Canada of today and then decide whether we are mice or men!

Hon. Mr. Goldenberg: Would the honourable senator permit a question? I listened carefully and I think I am quoting him correctly. Senator Lang has told us that the measure before us is a bill introduced by a Liberal government, embodying principles of the Conservative Party and approved by the NDP, to say nothing of the mass media, the universities, the banks, the manufacturers and apparently Canadians in almost every other type of activity.

Would he tell us—I would be interested in knowing—what other qualities a bill must possess to show that it represents the views of the vast majority of the electors under our democratic system?

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Is there a reply?

Hon. Sidney L. Buckwold: Honourable senators, I had not planned to take part in the debate at the moment but I feel that it is essential—

Hon. Mr. Choquette: To defend the Liberal government.

Hon. Mr. Buckwold: I feel it is essential—

Hon. Mr. Choquette: You are always doing that. I like to hear you.

Hon. Mr. Buckwold: Honourable senators, may I start again?

Hon. Mr. Flynn: No, no, we heard you.

Hon. Mr. Buckwold: I say that it is essential, after listening to two very impassioned speakers today, for someone to get up and speak in the interests of Canada in this house.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I see. Nobody else has done so?

Hon. Mr. Buckwold: No, no one today has spoken in the long-term interests of Canada. They have spoken in the interests of a variety of specialized groups.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Oh!

Hon. Mr. Buckwold: Those who have special interests.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Oh, yi, yi!

Hon. Mr. Buckwold: Oh, yes, keep on "oh, yi, yi-ing", Mr. Leader, and I can tell you that we will soon turn the Senate of Canada over to the Senate of the United States, if that is what you wish.

I feel that it is essential that we not lose track of what we are trying to achieve in this bill. Somewhere along the line Senator Desruisseaux and Senator Lang seemed to adopt the attitude that no foreign capital is welcome in Canada. That is the furthest from the truth of anything that could be said in this house today.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Hear, hear!

Hon. Mr. Buckwold: This bill is an effort to encourage capital in the best interests of Canadian development.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Hear, hear!

Hon. Mr. Buckwold: Now, I enjoy the myths that were put forward by our learned friend from Toronto. I can tell you that in Saskatchewan we do not necessarily think the people in Toronto have a monopoly on wisdom, but let me tell you that there are a variety of other myths which we could look at, and I am going to recite some of those myths for you.

The first myth that I would like to put forward, which has been expressed by the senators who spoke today, is that "all foreign investment is good." That is the first myth. That is the point that we have heard today.

Hon. Mr. Lang: Who said that?

Hon. Mr. Buckwold: I think it was very ably expressed by both speakers.

The second myth was that "Canada can have full national sovereignty when key resources are fully controlled by foreign owners." That is the second myth which we have had put forward today. I refute that. I do not believe we can have full national sovereignty by having unrestricted foreign-ownership of all our resources, without control, in this country.

Myth No. 3 put forward today is that "foreign companies serve only Canada and are not influenced by their national interests." That was strongly and ably put forward by our learned senator from Toronto. That is a real myth!

We have had the explanation given to us by Senator Godfrey of the effect of DISC, where the Americans have influenced production in this country in the interests of their own foreign-controlled companies by using a tax medium that affected Canadians and Canadian employment. There are many other examples. I suggest to honourable senators who oppose this bill in the interest of unrestricted control and unrestricted foreign investment in Canada, that that kind of myth cannot be perpetuated.

● (1530)

Myth No. 4, as expressed by our learned senators, is that foreign firms in many cases serve Canadians better than companies that are owned in Canada. We heard that expressed today by Senator Lang. That is the implication that you get from—

Hon. Mr. Lang: On a matter of privilege, I must deny categorically that I ever made such a statement. I think the record will show—

Hon. Mr. Buckwold: You are well able to read the record—I am sure that will be possible—but that was the implication.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: You have to accept the statement of Senator Lang.

Hon. Mr. Buckwold: I accept the statement, but I am saying that that is the implication that was presented to us today, that foreign firms can do better—

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Who said it? Who said that?

Hon. Mr. Buckwold: Myth No. 5, just to balance the other myths given to us, is that unrestricted takeover of Canadian resources and key industries in Canada can go on forever without control, and that Canada will benefit. That is the greatest myth of all.

Hon. Mr. Lang: I rise on a question of privilege. My honourable friend seems to be imputing a statement to me, which I categorically deny. On a matter of privilege, I do not think that sort of statement should be allowed. I think the house will have to accept my statement that my learned friend's contentions are untrue.

Hon. Mr. Buckwold: On reading the record I am sure we will be able to make up our minds on that, Senator Lang. I just want to say that although you may deny saying these things, the statements that were made by both you and Senator Desruisseaux lead to these implications.

Hon. Mr. Lang: In your mind.

Hon. Mr. Buckwold: Well, in my mind and in the minds of others who may think the way I do in interpreting—

Hon. Mr. Flynn: There probably are no others here who have the same views as you have.

Hon. Mr. Buckwold: I have a feeling that there are a few.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I dare anybody to rise and support you at this time. Nobody would do it—

Hon. Mr. Buckwold: I do not need support at this time. I am well able to support myself.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: —except possibly the leader, who has told you to speak.

Hon. Mr. Buckwold: The leader is probably wishing I had not spoken.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I am sure, but I think he will learn.

Hon. Mr. Martin: I think you are doing very well. I am proud of you.

Hon. Mr. Buckwold: Madam Speaker, I would just like to carry on, if I can.

The Hon. the Speaker: I draw the attention of honourable senators to the fact that Senator Buckwold has the floor, and I think he should be permitted to make his speech.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Buckwold: All that I am really saying is that certainly there is foreign investment that is good for Canada, as was so ably expounded by Senator Hayden in his introduction of this bill. There are reasons for controlling this investment, however, when it is not in the national interest. I have to say that I admire very much Senator Hayden's ability to put into words meanings that are sometimes elusive. I enjoyed very much his interpretation of "significant benefit". He said that "significant benefit," in his mind—and I presume in the minds of those who will be part of this agency—means a benefit that is in the national interest. I would like to suggest that that does not preclude the kind of new inflow of capital that will help to develop this nation—capital which is sorely needed in many parts of Canada—but it will be there for the benefit of all Canadians.

There are resources that we want to control. I have to say that we would not be experiencing an energy crisis today if we had full control of the oil industry in Canada. Yet, we have an industry, supported, I presume, by those senators who spoke, that is controlled 99 per cent—

Hon. Mr. Everett: This is not an interruption, but a question. You say that we would not be experiencing an energy crisis today if we had control of our petroleum resources. I believe that was the statement. Can you give me some empirical data that would prove that statement?

Hon. Mr. Buckwold: You did not let me finish. I was just moving along to the completion of this comment—

Hon. Mr. Everett: I am sorry. I was so shocked by that remark that I could not help asking that question.

Hon. Mr. Buckwold: I do not say that we would find all our energy problems solved if that were so. I am simply saying that the situation would be much easier for Canada if Canadian industry controlled the production of petroleum and the distribution of petroleum. If the industry were controlled completely by Canadians, and not by multinationals, our problem would be eased. I did not say it would be solved.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: You said we would not have that problem. You did not say—

Hon. Mr. Buckwold: Again, Madam Speaker, obviously I am irritating those who would like to have everything controlled by foreign capital.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Oh, la, la. You are irritating the common sense of the house. That is what you are doing.

Hon. Mr. Everett: You are not irritating me at all, senator. I just want to stay with the facts.

Hon. Mr. Buckwold: I think I have answered your question as best I can.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: As best you could, certainly.

Hon. Mr. Everett: You have not answered my question. You have shifted your ground—and that is fine, if you want to shift your ground. But you said the problem would be eased. Again I ask you for empirical data that would support that statement.

Hon. Mr. Buckwold: I think we can safely say that if all Canadian oil was controlled by Canadian companies, it would be easier in many ways. I say "easier" because certainly it would be easier—

Hon. Mr. Flynn: How?

Hon. Mr. Buckwold: —to encourage more development—

Hon. Mr. Flynn: How?

Hon. Mr. Buckwold: —which is our chief problem—

Hon. Mr. Flynn: How?

Hon. Mr. Buckwold: Because the decisions would be made by Canadian companies.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Oh, come, now.

Hon. Mr. Buckwold: We have been told many times by those who support the oil industry that if there is not enough profit their exploration dollar will go to different parts of the world where their return is better.

Hon. Mr. Everett: But we were told by Noranda, a Canadian company, in respect of the Income Tax Act—I think that Senator Hayden was chairman of the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee during those hearings, and he will attest to this—that if there was not enough return in Canada they would have to invest elsewhere. I say that you cannot bring before us any empirical data to show that we would be in a better position in respect of energy in Canada if all the resources were owned by Canadian companies. That is a red herring. I think your argument is fine, but for goodness' sake let us not spread that one.

Hon. Mr. Buckwold: I can only state again that full Canadian control of the energy resources of this country would have made our very serious problem easier.

Hon. Mr. Everett: I wish you could give us some data on that.

Hon. Mr. Buckwold: That will be my statement, and I think I have to leave it at that.

I want now to move on to this whole question of why we are debating this issue. I have in front of me a clipping from the Ottawa Citizen, giving a few figures:

> The latest government figures, released by Statistics Canada last month, show that total foreign ownership of industry, land and government securities in Canada may total well over $50 billion.
> Direct foreign corporate investment, the federal statistics bureau said, rose by $2 billion in 1970 to a total of $26.5 billion. Other foreign holdings are estimated at double that figure.

The article also points out a very significant fact that I think has not been truly appreciated by those who oppose control over foreign investment in the national interest of Canada, namely the movement of Japanese capital into this country. Japanese capital is looking for a home. I do not believe that we are now at the stage of being a pioneer nation—an undeveloped nation—that has to welcome, indeed, beg for, foreign investment, with no restrictions and in any circumstances. I have to admit that there was an era when we needed it, but the time has come now when Canadians have to look out for the national interests of Canada, and to move in the direction of this particular objective.

I want to conclude by saying that I believe this bill to be a step in the right direction. I sincerely believe that it will work in the best interests of the future development of Canada, from the point of view of new industry, the development of natural resources, and the employment of Canadians. It is not a phoney issue. It is a very real issue.

I could, I suppose, share Senator Lang's assessment of some of the problems that we have at universities, some of the so-called issues of the permissive society, and what not, but I am going to say one thing categorically, and that is that the issue of foreign investment in Canada is not a Toronto-inspired bogeyman, or a drumbeat by Ontario. The fact is that all Canadians are concerned.

Speaking regionally, if I may use that term, all honourable senators are aware I come from the Province of Saskatchewan, and I have no hesitation in saying that my province does need and want new capital investment. Nevertheless, as citizens of that region, most of us are fully prepared to support the kind of controls embodied in this bill—controls that have, I think, very broad guidelines in which regional participation and provincial opinions become important factors in the making of the final decision. I think this is quite proper. And to say that this will mean the elimination of competition in so far as Canada is concerned is just not correct.

Here I have to digress slightly because it has been suggested that the Canadian Manufacturers' Association and all others who appeared before the committee were in favour of the bill. I certainly did not gain that impression, although perhaps Senator Hayden may have. I think many of them expressed themselves as being in favour of the principle of the bill, but most of them had some objections. At least, that is my opinion having sat through the committee hearings. There certainly was not a carte blanche endorsement of the bill because they wanted to build a wall around Canada, and sit comfortably in a non-competitive area and grow fat. I do not think that that was their feeling at all, but that impression has been given here today.

The fact is that one of the essential guidelines set out in the bill concerns the improvement of competition in a particular field. In fact, one of the factors to be taken into account is the effect of the acquisition or establishment of a business on competition within any industry or industries in Canada. That, honourable senators, is a very significant point.

Honourable senators, although I recognize that there are many aspects of the bill that certainly can be questioned inasmuch as at this stage it represents just a step forward—some may see it as a not big enough step forward, while others may see it as too big a step forward—and while there are problems, the fact is that Canada finally has moved in the direction of controlled development in the national interest so far as foreign capital is concerned. But this is not a socialist-inspired scheme, nor is it even a conservative-inspired scheme. It is a scheme which I know will have the full support of the people of Canada and will lead, as it must, to the continued development and growth of this country.

Hon. Mr. Martin: A very good speech.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I am sure that Senator Buckwold has richly deserved the praise poured upon him by his leader.

Honourable senators, if nobody else wishes to speak, I would move the adjournment of the debate until later this day so as to enable Senator Phillips, who cannot be here tomorrow, to speak on the bill sponsored by Senator Cook dealing with federal-provincial fiscal arrangements. In other words, honourable senators, I ask that we revert to this debate later this day.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: As long as it is understood that, for the same reason that you are asking for this concession on behalf of Senator Phillips, I am asking for a similar concession. In other words, I am merely pointing out that I wish, if the Senate will permit me, to close the debate on second reading of this bill today because I, too, cannot be here tomorrow. I understood I had reached that agreement with you.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Certainly. Otherwise I would not have moved that the debate be adjourned until later today.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: How late is later?

Hon. Mr. Martin: I understand Senator Phillips is going to speak for only a short time.

On motion of Senator Flynn, debate adjourned until later this day.

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL FISCAL ARRANGEMENTS ACT, 1972
FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL FISCAL REVISION ACT, 1964
INCOME TAX ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from yesterday the adjourned debate on the motion of Senator Cook for the second reading of Bill C-233, to amend the Federal-Provincial Fiscal Arrangements Act, 1972, the Federal-Provincial Fiscal Revision Act, 1964 and the Income Tax Act.

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, Senator Cook, in moving second reading of Bill C-233, gave a very clear and concise explanation of the bill. Unfortunately I do not possess the quality of being as concise as Senator Cook. However, in view of the courtesy extended to me, I shall attempt to be brief. I shall also attempt to avoid criticizing the government.

I used to get a particular and singular delight out of criticizing the government, because I was a member of what was at one time a very small group. Now that group or club has grown, and there is no particular uniqueness about being a member of it. Nowadays everybody criticizes the government. It used to be that when two people met the first words of conversation always concerned the weather. That situation has now changed, and the subject of discussion is the government. Of course, there is a great deal of similarity in the conversation since the government and the weather are very much alike. They have both been dull, grey, generally unpleasant and totally unacceptable.

The amendment to the Federal-Provincial Fiscal Arrangements Act of 1972 must be a unique piece of legislation in this Parliament. It was introduced in the House of Commons and received very prompt attention, passing through second reading and committee in one day. That must be something of a record for the other place, and leads one to think that perhaps they are adopting our pattern.

The equalization grants, as honourable senators know, were instituted a number of years ago at which time they created a great deal of interest. In 1957 the government of the day added the Atlantic Provinces adjustment grants. Since that time the equalization grants have been gradually increased over the years. Part of this increase has been due to increased demand for government services, and other parts have been due to the increased taxation revenue.

I had great hopes in 1957 that equalization adjustment grants would close the economic gap between the poorer provinces and those with a greater tax revenue. Unfortunately, honourable senators, that economic gap remains today in spite of the equalization grants. The Atlantic Provinces still have the lowest per capita income and the highest rate of unemployment. Our industrial growth has not kept pace with that of the other provinces. I am not placing the blame on the provincial governments or on the federal government, but it is rather strange that that gap still remains in spite of the efforts made—and they have been considerable efforts—through equalization payments. It causes one to ask how effective the equalization grants have been.

Admittedly we have an improvement in roads, educational facilities and social services, but we are still behind. The gap is still there, and by means of this bill we are adding further treatment to a pattern that has already been followed for some years. Perhaps I am expecting too much of a change—too dramatic, perhaps. However, through the improved educational facilities, social services, and so on, the gap may eventually be closed.

The first of the four amendments proposed in this bill includes school taxes as revenue to be equalized and distributed throughout the provinces. This will be of great advantage and assistance to the poorer provinces, and it is indeed a very welcome change. The Minister of Finance in his remarks expressed the hope that the increased grants would be used by the provinces to provide relief for the property taxpayers and tenants.

Mr. Turner also stated that the equalization formula was not suited to solving the increased cost of urbanization, as 60 per cent of our urban population live in provinces which do not receive equalization grants—that is, Ontario, Alberta and British Columbia. The urban taxpayer requires some relief from the present heavy taxation and this taxation, honourable senators, will increase as cities attempt to meet the need for rapid transit systems, and other problems facing municipal governments.

I thought that the Progressive Conservative Party platform in the 1972 general election, which granted exemption to homeowners from municipal taxes, was a step in this direction. Obviously sufficient voters were not convinced of this, because there are still a great many urban areas represented by Liberals. Perhaps, however, this is the time to revive the idea. It is one that I still like, and perhaps the Honourable Senator Martin might consider recommending this to the next "think tank" that is held at O'Brien castle. I feel that we still have a great deal to offer in the way of concrete suggestions on this side, sir, and I hope you will consider that.

While the provinces and the federal government were able to reach a certain stage of harmony in connection with the tax-sharing formula, the position is not quite so harmonious with respect to the second item dealt with in the bill—grants for post-secondary education. In 1972 a bill was introduced in the other place which apparently did not meet with the approval of the provinces, and was then withdrawn. Perhaps the provinces are a little too sensitive concerning federal participation in the field of education. They maintain that it is strictly a provincial responsibility and right, but it is interesting to note, honourable senators, that the federal government contributes almost as much to post-secondary education as it does to equalization payments. They are almost equal and, surely, if the federal government and the provinces can arrive at a formula for equalization, they should be able to arrive at one respecting post-secondary education.

Part of the problem may be that the provinces are waiting for the federal election, when they know they will be dealing with a different prime minister and a different party, and are hoping to get a little more reasonable treatment than they have received to date. However, this delay—

Hon. Mr. Martin: The poor Leader of the Opposition in the Senate will have his troubles, if that happens.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: I am sure you will find him quite capable of handling them, Senator Martin.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Oh, I am quite sure about that, but his ulcers will develop.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: However, he will not create the problem of dictating policy, and will not get into the same trouble as you do occasionally.

Hon. Mr. Martin: I am sure of that.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: The problem facing the universities is one of great uncertainty. They are unable to plan for the future. Sure, they realize that federal grants will continue, but in what form? Two years is not a very long projection for universities. Three years is not out of the question, and at the end of the three years this bill terminates. A board of governors of a university attempting to plan for the future must face a deadline of March 1, 1977. This is totally unfair to the universities, and I urge the government to consult the provinces and solve this problem.

The proposal made by the Secretary of State some time ago suggested that the federal government would transfer so many tax points to the provinces. This would be very hard on three Atlantic provinces—Newfoundland, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island. They have a separate formula now, which they feel is better than the transfer of so many tax points. I would urge the government to bear in mind the remarks made by the Honourable Senator Hicks a short time ago in this chamber when he pointed out that the Atlantic provinces have a particular difficulty in financing universities.

The third amendment deals exclusively with the Province of Nova Scotia. Apparently Nova Scotia in its enthusiasm to raise income tax ended in the federal "dog house," and lost its guarantee of revenue for a period of five years. This amendment is sort of a parole for the Province of Nova Scotia and instead of its being in the "dog house" for five years, it will be there for only one year. I am sure no one in this chamber would want to see Nova Scotia in the "dog house" for five years, and everyone is quite happy to see this amendment.

● (1600)

The fourth amendment deals with the three point tax abatement to Quebec. This has been in existence for some time, and if René Levesque and Premier Barrett of British Columbia can live with it, I am sure we can.

[Translation]

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, after the remarks that Senator Phillips has just made, I would like to recall that the equalization principle is to enable the poorer provinces to provide the same services that more fortunate provinces can afford. We have always supported that principle. I think that, in all parties in the Parliament of Canada, and even in the days of Mr. Duplessis, everyone gladly accepted the payments granted to Quebec under this equalization formula.

Senator Phillips has stressed the problem of post-graduation, or rather post-secondary education costs.

I always agreed that this equalization formula ought to enable the provinces to face up to their responsibilities in all areas under their exclusive jurisdiction. I do not see why this formula should not be changed so as to give more to the Atlantic provinces, just like to other provinces which need it, so that they can discharge this responsibility in the field of education at all levels, namely, at the primary as well as at the secondary and university levels. The same applies also in those fields connected with social welfare.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Removing the constitutional jurisdiction in education?

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Yes, exactly, for this is where you would allow provinces to assume fully their responsibilities by granting them more money, on principle, and not by directly subsidizing universities and educational institutions.

In this way the government, shortchanging the provinces which need money, does not mind its own business and misinterprets the responsibilities provided in the Constitution, which belong either to the provinces or to the federal government.

I find the equalization formula to be excellent because we live in the same country, and because we must give everybody an equal chance I believe that this formula must at the same time ensure that provinces can carry out their responsibilities in all areas under their jurisdiction in order to prevent the government from intervening where it has no business.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Next sitting.

Hon. Mr. Cook: Should this bill be referred to committee?

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Yesterday I asked a question of Senator Cook, who sent me the reply in writing. Therefore, speaking for myself, I do not think that we need refer the bill to committee.

Hon. Mr. Cook moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

Motion agreed to.

FOREIGN INVESTMENT REVIEW BILL

SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from earlier this day the adjourned debate on the motion of Senator Hayden for the second reading of Bill C-132, to provide for the review and assessment of acquisitions of control of Canadian business enterprises by certain persons and of the establishment of new businesses in Canada by certain persons.

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, I am not well prepared to speak on this bill, because I had not anticipated speaking to it before next week. However, I will speak for a few minutes. I am sure the fact that my words will be few will be appreciated by all, myself included.

I would say at the beginning that the debate so far has been a good one. I have some reservations about the speech made by Senator Buckwold. He is the only senator who came all-out in favour of the bill, and in terms that I would not want to qualify. The Leader of the Government told him afterwards that he had made a good speech. But I am not so sure that he would not have preferred to paraphrase Lafontaine's fable, "Le Pavé de L'Ours" and say something like:

Lord deliver me from my friends.

I will look after my enemies.

I say this because I am quite certain that Senator Buckwold's effort was of no value whatever in helping to further the Senate's understanding of this bill. I believe that everyone who spoke in this debate, with the exception of Senator Buckwold, had some reservations about the bill. Even Senator Godfrey, who made a very good maiden speech—and I want to congratulate him en passant—while supporting the bill had some reservations about it.

Hon. Mr. Buckwold: On a question of privilege, I should like to clarify the fact that I have reservations about the bill. I claimed that some aspects of the bill did not go far enough and that some went too far, but that it was a good start.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: The blaring praise drowned out the whispered criticism. The honourable senator's reservations were not very significant, if my recollection is correct.

Before the honourable senator's interjection, I was referring to Senator Godfrey's speech. It was a very good first speech in this house, and we shall look forward to further contributions from him.

There are, of course, obvious good points to this bill. The principle of the bill that seeks to favour the control of Canadian enterprises by Canadians is, in itself, good. It all depends on whether or not we have the choice to do that. If we had the choice—that is, if conditions were made more favourable to investment in Canada—then legislation such as this would not be necessary. Canadians would want to participate more fully, to take control of Canadian enterprises.

In this matter we would be doing the same as people in the United States. Canadians invest in their country when they feel they should, but they also invest tremendously outside of the country because they consider it in their interest to do so.

There is nothing entirely wrong with foreign investment. There is an advantage in being the owner of our own house. There is no doubt about that. I can live in a house which is mortgaged, and not be too unhappy about it if I can meet my monthly payments and gradually reduce my debt. By so doing, I shall probably have a better house than if I wait until I have the full amount of cash required for the property.

In any event, no one is disputing the objective. But have we the choice to enact this legislation, and do we need it? Do we need at this time this kind of federal legislation?

There are three points with which I wish to deal in regard to this bill. The first is the principle of accepting foreign investment only if it means significant benefit to Canada. The second is the question of provincial input, constitutionality and the management related to this problem, which was suggested by the Senate report. The third is the question of appeals, which is also a recommendation in the committee report and which was not acted upon by the minister or the other place.

Clause 2 of the bill deals with the purpose of the act. Clause 2(1) states:

> This Act is enacted by the Parliament of Canada in recognition by Parliament that the extent to which control of Canadian industry, trade and commerce has become acquired by persons other than Canadians and the effect thereof on the ability of Canadians to maintain effective control over their economic environment is a matter of national concern—

Well, that is a rather vague statement. Honourable senators can accept or reject it, according to their own feelings. I think Senator Desruisseaux and Senator Lang are in disagreement with it, and in listening to them I was, at times, inclined to share their view. Some honourable senators may be able to subscribe to it.

Clause 2 (1) continues:

> —and that it is therefore expedient to establish a means by which measures may be taken under the authority of Parliament to ensure that, in so far as is practicable after the enactment of this Act, control of Canadian business enterprises may be acquired by persons other than Canadians, and new businesses may be established in Canada by persons, other than Canadians, who are not already carrying on business in Canada or whose new businesses in Canada would be unrelated to the businesses already being carried on by them in Canada, only if it has been assessed that the acquisition of control of those enterprises or the establishment of those new businesses as the case may be, by those persons is or is likely to be of significant benefit to Canada, having regard to all of the factors to be taken into account under this Act for that purpose.

Before I go any further I want to thank Senator Hayden on behalf of myself and all members of the Senate for the very able job he did in explaining this bill. He mentioned the reservations which both he and the committee had in connection with it. His explanation of the bill, I am sure, will be very helpful to all honourable senators.

When I interrupted Senator Hayden during the course of his explanation, what I wanted to point out was the weak way in which this is stated in the bill. The bill says we are establishing the way in which non-eligible persons, or foreigners, may acquire Canadian businesses instead of saying that we are establishing the procedures which would prevent further acquisitions by foreigners.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: The way it is in the bill is a weak way of saying it. You wait a long time to get the limitation on the word "only", whereas if you do it the other way you would have to use the word "unless."

Hon. Mr. Flynn: It is clearer in the French version. The French version is much more descriptive, in my view, with respect to the purpose of the bill. The French version uses the words, "ne puisse acquérir," whereas in the English version the word used is "only."

Hon. Mr. Hayden: That is right. It is like taking a long time to say yes.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Indeed. I suggest that this is a weak approach to the proposal as it is recited in clause 2, which defines the purpose of the act.

The next thing I want to say in connection with this bill is that even taking into consideration the guidelines provided in clause 2(2), the principles are so wide that interpretations could vary from one government to another.

I discussed this bill with one of my colleagues earlier today and he said, "Well, there is probably no real difference between the approaches which would be taken by a Progressive Conservative government and a Liberal government." But what about a socialist government? It is quite obvious to me that the interpretation of this bill by an NDP government would be entirely different from the interpretations by either the present administration or the administration which will succeed it fairly soon.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I think that argument is a valid one, and one which should retain the attention of the Senate. "Significant benefit to Canada" does not mean the same thing to all persons. I am quite sure that an administration of 25 years ago would not have adopted the same interpretation as would the present administration, and what do we know of future administrations, especially, God forbid, should we have a socialistic government in Canada. For that reason I have great reservation about this bill as a whole.

I come now to the second point I mentioned, the constitutionality of the bill. Senator Hayden discussed this matter at length, and I do not intend to repeat what he said. Everyone who has looked at the bill has some doubts as to its constitutionality. During the committee proceedings we asked the representative of the Department of Justice whether it would be within the competence of a provincial legislature to adopt a bill such as this. He did not dare say no. On the contrary, I think he indicated that it would appear to be within the competence of a provincial legislature to enact this kind of legislation to be applicable within the territory of that province. There is no doubt about that.

As has been suggested by the committee, if we want to avoid conflict and uncertainty, as well as the possibility of this bill's being attacked and submitted to the Supreme Court of Canada on the question of its constitutionality, the proposed amendment dealing with the concurrence of the provinces in a decision to refuse a takeover or enlarge a business is necessary. In view of the fact that the other place did not see fit to adopt that amendment, it should be adopted in the Senate. I think the Senate would be wise in taking that course. In adopting such an amendment it would be following the tradition of looking after provincial rights as well as eliminating the possibility of this bill's being attacked in the Supreme Court of Canada on that ground.

There is another conclusion which could be drawn from this argument, that being that it probably would have been even better had the federal government stayed out of this area entirely and allowed instead the different provincial legislatures to enact, if they so desired, legislation concerning this review and assessment process in connection with the acquisition of control of Canadian business enterprises. In my view that would have been the proper course.

As we heard in the committee proceedings, the views of the provinces are not all the same. Ontario is one province which seems to approve of it and, as Senator Lang mentioned, the main source of support is centred in Toronto. Ontario is one of the wealthier provinces, and it is better able to control and to invest in these enterprises. Because Ontario is wealthier than any other province, and is better able to control and, let us say, invest in its enterprises, Toronto would be inclined to adopt stricter rules for the acquisition of Canadian enterprises within the boundaries of the province. This, of course, is not the case in Newfoundland and Quebec. It may to some extent be the case in British Columbia and Alberta. Saskatchewan, the province of my good friend Senator Buckwold, does not want that, even with a socialist government. It has to say to private enterprise, "Come in. We won't hurt you, because we need you." We know how these socialist governments do it. Just look at Mr. Barrett in British Columbia. It is very interesting to see the way in which they can talk out of both sides of their mouths.

● (1620)

Hon. Mr. Buckwold: He learned it from Saskatchewan.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Probably, and to some extent possibly from the province of my good friend, Senator Everett. Mr. Schreyer in Manitoba is doing it very smoothly.

Hon. Mr. McDonald: He is only beginning.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: If this responsibility were left to the provinces, we would see whether it is in their interest to control more or less the acquisition of businesses within their territories.

In any event, since the provinces generally have not taken any stand in this field, and since we are faced with this legislation, which undoubtedly is going to pass, why not at least do the same thing in practice as would be achieved by provincial legislation in all the ten provinces by adopting the amendment recommended by the Senate committee?

I leave it to honourable senators, but I hope that the Senate will not be dissuaded from adopting what it thought was a good amendment, by the minister's coming and telling us that it will dilute the effectiveness of the bill. I do not mind starting slowly in this field. If we are going to experiment we might as well experiment slowly and see what the results are, rather than trying to do too much at the same time. This is really a new field for government, especially a government of a country like ours, where we need so much money to develop our resources. It is unbelievable that we would be so afraid of foreign control, because we need so much foreign capital.

The last point I want to touch on briefly is the question of appeal. The Senate report recommended that the bill provide for appeal to the Federal Court. Yesterday Senator Godfrey objected to the fact that we would provide for appeal to the trial division rather than to the appeal division. I would say that it is only a question of practice, of procedure. Whether it is an appeal to the appeal division or the trial division I do not mind, as long as there is an appeal; it is the principle with which I am concerned.

I was in the other place at the time, but I remember what took place in this house in 1961 on the "class or kind" bill—and I read it yesterday. On that occasion the Senate stood very firm. It maintained that the minister should not have the discretion to determine whether something was of the same class or kind as another item, one manufactured in Canada. It therefore moved and adopted an amendment to the bill before it at that time to provide for an appeal. I think we are faced with the same principle here, and I think we should take the same attitude if we are to be consistent.

I hope, therefore, that when this bill is in committee at least two amendments will be passed, one concerning the concurrence of the province and the other concerning an appeal from the decision of the minister on whether an investment is of significant benefit to Canada.

Hon. Mr. Goldenberg: Would the honourable senator permit a question on that point?

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Goldenberg: I can see his point on having an appeal from a decision by the minister that a person is non-eligible, or that there has been an acquisition of control, but does the honourable senator, who is an eminent lawyer, think that a court should decide whether something is of "significant benefit" or not of "significant benefit"?

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I admit that it is not easy. I have already said that the phrase is vague. At least, we could provide for an appeal to quash the recommendation of a minister which was obviously wrong. There is at least that. The court of appeal would probably assess this decision in the same way that it assesses the decision of a trial judge on a matter of fact; it would say, "On the facts we are not competent," but if there is an obvious error in law it would be able to quash the decision of the minister.

Hon. Paul Martin: Honourable senators, I am sure you will agree that Senator Flynn made a moderate speech about a bill that I think is itself moderate and does not deserve some of the characterizations that have been given to it.

If all honourable senators have not spoken, it is not because they are not interested; it is not because those who have spoken and expressed reservations are not in favour of the bill. My experience, which I am sure is that of the Leader of the Opposition, is that very few bills presented to Parliament satisfy all members of both houses in every particular. That has certainly been my experience. For instance, the capital punishment bill, which we passed the other day, certainly did not satisfy me in every particular.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: It satisfied nobody.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Because I was in support of what the bill basically did, I certainly gave it the support that I felt it deserved as a move forward. That is true of this bill.

This bill was presented to the Senate by Senator Hayden, and I would not be doing my duty as Leader of the Government if I did not say to him that the country owes him a great deal—not only for the way in which he presented this bill, but for the way in which from time to time he has presented other bills that have been assigned to him—for service in an area in which he has an expertise, and for service in this regard over many years.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Martin: I want him to know that I am expressing not only my own view, but the view of my colleagues in the government. When the time comes, which is a long time hence, when he is no longer in the Senate we will have to look for someone with his knowledge to deal with this area of legislative activity.

The bill before us has been debated extensively for a long time in and out of Parliament. It has been debated extensively in the House of Commons. It has been reviewed by a committee of that body. It has been reviewed, in anticipation, under a unique procedure, by the Senate. The Senate has, in anticipation, expressed its view to the other place and to the government. Some of the suggestions made by the Senate have been accepted by the other place and by the government.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Very few.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Some have not. It is the responsibility of the government, and of the other place, to exercise its judgment regarding proposals which it is felt should be put forward. We here will have an opportunity next week in the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce to give further consideration to these matters.

I think it important for us to put in perspective what we are seeking to do in the bill before us. We should examine the immediate factors which have given rise to the introduction of this bill. In the two key goods-producing sectors of the economy—the manufacturing area and the resource extraction industries—the level of foreign ownership and control in Canada is very high. It is well beyond that experienced by any other industrialized country.

The figures in that regard were given to us yesterday by Senator Connolly (Ottawa West). What judgment is drawn from these figures is open to each senator, but the facts are there.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: This fact.

Hon. Mr. Martin: These two broad sectors of our economy are responsible, admittedly, for much of our prosperity, and this we have to take into account, as much as the employment in our service sectors depends upon high volumes of efficient goods production. The fact that these two sectors are dominated by business controlled outside of Canada has, understandably, as Senator Buckwold in his able and spirited speech today pointed out, caused concern to great numbers of Canadians. Some have taken extreme positions and have proposed extreme solutions respecting the manner in which Canada should deal with this fact, but there is no doubt that what Senator Buckwold said is true—and this has been underlined by practically every speaker.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: What?

Hon. Mr. Martin: That there is a sense of unease in Canada that Canada may be forfeiting to others the key strategic considerations about its economic future. We do not all agree of course—I think that most of us in this house are in agreement as to the steps that should be taken—but let us not fail to recognize that there is this national uneasiness.

I say this is a moderate bill. This is not a bill—as Senator Buckwold has emphasized, as Senator Godfrey has emphasized and as Senator Hayden has also said—that seeks to curb foreign capital. We know that capital is required in many parts of our country. We know what foreign capital in the development of Canada has meant. There is no suggestion that we are trying to curb it.

It is one thing to take that position, and on the other hand to affirm that we want to do everything that we can to encourage Canadians to take a greater interest, a greater investment interest, in their own enterprise in Canada. What we are doing in this bill is a modest measure; it is not an extreme position. It does not represent chauvinism or uncontrolled economic nationalism. It is nothing of the sort.

Every country in the industrial world does this, and we are the last one to begin to attempt to do it. Some do it in different ways. Some do it in this way, some do it in a more modified form than is proposed in this bill, and some do it in a much more extreme way.

In reviewing proposed takeovers or new investments, the government is going to be guided by five criteria. These are:

1. The effect of the acquisition or establishment on the level and nature of economic activity in Canada, including employment, resource processing, utilization of parts, components and services produced in Canada, and exports.

2. The degree and significance of participation by Canadians.

3. The effect on productivity, industrial efficiency, technological development, product innovation and product variety.

4. The effect on competition.

And finally, but not least:

5. The compatibility with national and provincial industrial and economic policies.

These criteria are essentially economic in nature. They take account of provincial as well as federal industrial economic policies.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: How do they do it?

Hon. Mr. Martin: They determine the limits within which government decisions are to be taken.

Apart altogether from what may be thought should be in the bill, surely it is not to be assumed—and indeed Senator Flynn did not; he assumed that if he was over here, he would act basically as this present government would in regard to this measure—

Hon. Mr. Flynn: That is not what I said. I said someone said it.

Hon. Mr. Martin: May I just finish? I always allow Senator Flynn to go on without interruption. If he wishes to ask questions at the right time I shall be happy to answer, but I want to give Senator Hayden an opportunity to intervene and reply.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Do not misinterpret me, or say anything that obviously has to be corrected.

Hon. Mr. Martin: What I was trying to say was that surely no government in this country is going to reach decisions that are not thought to be in the national interest.

I was particularly struck by the way Senator Hayden handled the question of "significance," relating it to "national interest." There was mention of the practice in Australia, and how it was being interpreted there. I am sure that Senator Hayden's interpretation is the correct one. When any minister in the Federal Government of Canada comes to interpret the criteria and thinks what the Canadian interest is, he will not be thinking of Ottawa; he will be thinking of Canadian interest in terms of what is Canada, and that is the ten provinces that make up this country.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Windsor.

Hon. Mr. Martin: If it is going to be of benefit to Newfoundland, certainly that will be of interest and of concern to Canada. We must not assume that the Government of Canada does not bear in mind the interests of the ten components of this country.

Finally, Senator Flynn has talked about the constitutionality of this bill. Very few bills come before Parliament in connection with which there is not some constitutional skepticism of one kind or another. The government naturally had to consider this. The government was satisfied, from the advice it received, that this bill is within its constitutional competence. If that fact is assumed, then it may be assumed that there can be no exercise of veto in respect of matters that are thought to be within the competence of the Government of Canada.

Honourable senators, I made these few remarks because I thought that on a bill of this importance, notwithstanding the thoroughness of the coverage in the various speeches, I should say a few words to indicate that the government does attach a great deal of importance to this matter.

I acknowledge the contribution made by Senator Hayden, and by others such as Senator Godfrey yesterday, who spoke for the first time. I know it is dangerous to mention some honourable senators, for fear of overlooking others. Senator Cook made a brilliant speech yesterday. It does not meet the criteria of full acceptance by me, but it was a good speech and, indeed, it was made by a good man.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: You won't change his vote. Don't try that.

Hon. Mr. Martin: I have no hope of changing Senator Flynn's vote, but I shall not say that I am not capable of changing Senator Cook's.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: You lost your chance.

Hon. A. Hamilton McDonald: Honourable senators, I rise to take part in this debate, although I know I should not for two reasons—first, that I am not really medically fit to do so, and, secondly, that I have not followed the debate in the house in the manner in which I should have. I do so because I come from a province in which the vast majority of the people would dislike this bill in its entirety.

I come from a province desperately in need of investment capital. The vast majority of the people I represent do not give a damn whether that capital comes from the United States, from the Soviet Union, or even from Toronto.

● (1640)

Hon. Mr. McIlraith: In that order?

Hon. Mr. McDonald: In that order. But one of the most difficult places for the Government of Saskatchewan to raise money for any enterprise is Canada. I know of what I speak. I happen to have served in a Government of Saskatchewan for a short period of time. We went from one end of this country to the other endeavouring to attract two resources into Saskatchewan. One was money and the other was know-how, because in most industrial expansion, or most industrial growth, money is no good to you without know-how, and know-how will only get you into trouble if you do not have the money. What success did we have in finding those two requirements in Canada? None! We were laughed at on Bay Street and in Montreal.

To get investment capital, where did we have to go, and where do you have to go today? We had to go to New York. Where do you have to go to get the knowledge to develop many of the resources of Canada? You have to go outside the borders of Canada.

It was rather interesting last night to listen to an American gentleman on television, a man nobody seemed to know existed—least of all the Government of Canada—who had an enterprise in Newfoundland. I wonder why that particular oil refinery was not built by Canadians. Why was the money not raised in Canada?

Hon. Mr. McIlraith: It was. At least, a great part of it was.

Hon. Mr. McDonald: A great part of it? The part that was raised privately in Canada would not amount to a tinker's damn, and you know it. And the knowledge that is available in Canada is even less when it comes to taking that knowledge any place outside the "Golden Triangle". Certainly, this little area of Canada here that we live in—Ottawa and through to Toronto—can grow on itself. But who developed this part of Canada? It was developed by Americans and Britishers.

As the Leader of the Government said a moment ago, a large part of the support for this bill comes from the city of Toronto, and I can understand that because the city of Toronto, in the "Golden Triangle," can raise sufficient money and has the technical know-how to develop virtually any resource you can find in that area. But that is not true of the rest of Canada, and it is not true of the province which I come from.

The Leader of the Government during his remarks said that most Canadians believe there is a high degree of foreign control in Canada. That is true, but I ask you: Is there any other country in the world in a position similar to that of Canada? Certainly, foreign control is higher in Canada than in perhaps any other country in the world, but is there any other country in the world in a geographical position similar to that of Canada, which shares a 4,000-mile border with the most powerful nation on earth?

I am not speaking about military power. I am speaking about economic power, scientific power, and technical know-how. There is more of that in the United States of America than there is in the rest of the world combined, and we live next door to it. So how are we going to shut it out? Do we want to shut it out? Perhaps you want to shut it out of Toronto, but we don't want to shut it out of Saskatchewan. And I don't think we want to shut it out in Manitoba, Alberta, Quebec or the Maritimes.

The statement has been made that people hold extreme positions. They do. I happen to be one of them. I happen to be one of those people who believe Saskatchewan wants foreign capital, and wants foreign know-how in abundance from whatever source it can be obtained.

My people want to be employed. I live in a province which has fewer people in it today than it had in 1935. Why? If things are so rosy, and if the financial institutions and industrialists of this country are prepared to share the wealth, how come there are fewer people in my province than there were in 1935? And this is 1973. A decline in population is just what this bill is going to perpetuate in areas such as Saskatchewan. Well, not with my support it isn't!

Certainly, there is national uneasiness in Canada—there is international uneasiness around the world today—because of the power of multinational corporations. Some multinational corporations operating in many countries of this world have more power than the governments of those countries—and that applies to some pretty big nations.

I am sure some of you will recall the statement made not too many years ago by John L. Lewis, when he said that he was more powerful than the President of the United States. I believed him. Perhaps it is a good job there are some people more powerful than the President of the United States. It might be a good thing if that applied to Canada as well.

Statements have been made that this bill does not seek to control foreign capital. Well, then, what does it do? What is this bill all about? And what have the actions of this government been, even without this bill? Its actions have been controlling foreign capital—controlling investments of Canadians who wished to sell their equities to someone else. This has been going on without the bill. What will happen now with it, I don't know. But I dread to see the growth of this nation placed in the hands of a bunch of bungling bureaucrats, civil servants, who, in my view, are the least able of our total population to make a decision about what ought to be developed and what ought not to be developed in this country. That ought to be left in the hands of business, not in the hands of bureaucrats.

The Leader of the Government says that the bill asks Canadians to take an interest in the development of their country. There is no Canadian inside or outside this house who has more interest in, or more wish to see Canadians take a more active part in, the development of this nation than I have. But I am also a realist, and the reality of life is that Canadians who control the financial institutions of this country are not prepared to see the wealth of this nation spread across it, so that we can develop it equally from one side to the other.

We have had the government endeavouring to develop industry under programs known as DREE. It would be interesting to know how much DREE money has gone to foreign corporations. Has anybody ever figured it out?

Naturally, the vast majority of it has gone to foreign companies because there is nobody else, according to a lot of speeches that are on the record of this house. Why should we have one government program handing out Canadian taxpayers' money to companies like Standard Oil? I think that is American-owned, and I think it is a multinational corporation. Undoubtedly it is also in financial trouble, but we, the Canadian taxpayers, are prepared to give it money to expand its Canadian operation. Then we bring in a bill like this that says that the bureaucrats are going to decide what Standard Oil, Imperial Oil—call them what you like; call them Exxon, because that is the one that owns the majority, or 76 per cent, of Imperial Oil—may do.

You know, sometimes I wonder about what goes on in this chamber, and in the other one. I dread to see the day, I repeat, when bureaucrats are going to tell us, and tell the businessmen of this nation, where and how they can operate, or if they can operate. Surely we should have learned a few lessons from some of the legislation that has been passed since I came to this house, that has restricted business activities from one end of this country to the other.

We passed the tax bill here a while ago. Bouquets have been handed out, so I will hand some out. Senator Hayden, the gentleman who introduced this bill, and others along with him, played a large part in improving the tax bill, but the tax bill has done an awful lot to destroy incentive in this country. All you have to do is look at the mining industry. What has happened to it? It has virtually dried up and blown away. What is happening to the oil industry today?

Hon. Mr. Goldbenberg: Making bigger profits.

Hon. Mr. McDonald: You are quite right—they are, and we are going to help them make some more. But what is happening to those profits? They are moving out of western Canada and going down across the border into the United States. Why? Because the chances of return on the dollar are greater there than they are in Canada, and nobody is in business for his health. People are in business to create wealth, to create employment, to create tax money and to create prosperity for the nation. About the only thing the government can do, as far as I am concerned, is stay out of the road. But no, this legislation is designed to do one thing, and one thing only. To me it is an extension of the old tariff system, to protect a little chunk of central Canada.

While we are at it, we may as well talk about some other legislation. I feel better now than when I started. You know, we farmers in Western Canada have some new legislation that helps us an awful lot, known as the "two-price policy" for feed grain. I have never heard such malarkey in my life. That policy does one thing, and one thing only. It sells feed grain produced by the Western farmer at less than world prices to every other farmer in Canada, and the Canadian taxpayer subsidizes the movement of it to every farmer other than the one who produced it.

An Hon. Senator: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. McDonald: Wonderful. This will be a great thing for the "Golden Triangle." It needs some help.

Hon. Mr. McElman: And for the Maritimes.

Hon. Mr. McDonald: Well, I would go along with the Maritimes. I would help you. You need it, and that is that. But they do not need help there. The amount by which the Maritime Provinces are going to benefit is peanuts compared to the benefit that is going to accrue to the Ontario livestock feed man.

Hon. Mr. McElman: In relative terms, in the East, it is not peanuts. It is survival.

Hon. Mr. McDonald: It is relative to peanuts. Yours are little peanuts, but these are jumbo peanuts in Ontario. That is the difference.

I do not want to take up any more of your time, honourable senators, other than to conclude by saying that it is about time that this house started performing the functions—or one of the functions—that I think it was designed to perform. This house, in my view, never was designed to be the mouthpiece of that other place.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. McDonald: Why did the Fathers of Confederation bring this house into being? It was because the Maritime Provinces said they were not interested in a union where there was one house, and representation by population, because they knew they would be swamped on every issue.

Hon. Mr. Cook: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. McDonald: One of the main reasons for the existence of this house is to give protection to the regions of Canada, and how any senator from Manitoba, Saskatchewan or Alberta, whether he is a Liberal, a Conservative, a Social Crediter, an NDPer or whatever he is, can vote for this bill, I do not know. I will not vote for it, because I think it is time that some consideration was given to those areas of Canada that do not have large votes in the other place. We have got only a handful in the House of Commons, and as time goes on the weight of our proportionate representation will drop.

It is up to this chamber to uphold provincial rights, and to uphold what the people in our provinces believe in. I was not here to vote on capital punishment, although I wish I had been, because I know how the vast majority of people in my province think. Some people refer to that as voting, or being dictated to by the Gallup poll. I do not pay any attention to the Gallup poll. All you have to do is walk down the street to find you almost get your head kicked in if you support a lot of this nonsense.

Honourable senators, I am sorry for having taken so much time, and I apologize to you, Senator Hayden, because I know you want to conclude the debate and have the bill sent to committee, but I did want to place my feelings with regard to this bill on record. I hope that the Senate will vote in the manner in which it was constituted to vote in the first place—that is, to vote from their hearts, and to believe in what they know is right.

Hon. Salter A. Hayden: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: I wish to inform the Senate that if the Honourable Senator Hayden speaks now his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for second reading of this bill.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: Honourable senators, I think I should start off by telling you that I am not a prophet, and I am not the son of a prophet. I have no pretensions in that regard. I shall be brief, and I shall be as objective as is practical in the circumstances.

In fact, there is very little to make any reply to, although I must acknowledge Senator Grosart's contribution to this debate. He and I met yesterday, in the late afternoon, and we held a meeting of two of the members of a very exclusive mutual admiration society—himself and myself. He thanked me very much for the help I had given him in the presentation of this material, and I reciprocated by thanking him for the help he had given me in supporting the principle that I had enunciated about the need and the value of the input of foreign investment money in Canada. I said, "The length of time that you spent on that, as far as I am concerned, was well justified, and it indicated that you were thinking in the right direction and that you understood the purposes of the bill."

With respect to Senator Cook, I heard a portion of his speech and I read it all, and, as I told him afterwards, it was a good, impassioned speech. My first reaction was to wonder what office he contemplated running for, because it really was a speech on the need for risk capital in Newfoundland. I had developed a statement of facts, when I was making my recommendation, indicating that this need had been met by the input of foreign capital when there was no Canadian money available.

I also called his attention to the fact that this bill did not interfere in any way with risk capital, that there is a specific provision in the bill which excludes venture capital. If my friend wishes to read the appropriate reference he will find it in clause 3(3)(b)(iii) which points out that control is not acquired by > the acquisition of shares of the corporation by any person in the ordinary course of a business carried on by that person that consists of providing, in Canada, venture capital upon terms and conditions not inconsistent with such terms and conditions as may be prescribed by the Minister—

So, honourable senators, perhaps here I shall venture into a field that the leader was not ready to venture into. He said that he would not dare to suggest to Senator Cook that he should vote in any way other than the way he said he intended to vote. But now that Senator Cook realizes that there is no prohibition in the bill in relation to the provision of risk capital, he might, perhaps, review his thinking. Everything he said was perfectly sound; everything he said was perfectly true, but there is nothing in the bill that would prevent Newfoundland, if it could find foreign investment moneys, from receiving them and using them.

So far as Senator Godfrey is concerned, I was not here when he spoke, but I read his speech. It was a good speech, and it was perfectly in order for him to be critical in some instances of the recommendations contained in the committee report. That is his privilege. However, I would call his attention to the fact that, in referring to one section of the report towards the end of his speech, he said:

[The Hon. the Speaker.]

> Finally, I disagree with the recommendation of the Senate committee that investment companies be, in effect, exempted from the provisions of the bill.

That is not what the committee report says. The report says that the bill in the way it was drawn provided that when a non-eligible person created an investment company it had to be screened, and then, when it went to work to carry on business, it had to be screened again. What we said was that there should not be a double screening. All we said was, in so far as investment companies controlled by non-eligible persons are concerned, that investments made by such a company should be reviewed in the ordinary manner as provided for under the bill, and that in view of that it would appear unnecessary to review the actual establishment of the investment company because it would appear difficult, if not impossible, in such circumstances to meet the specific criteria in clause 2 (2).

So far as appeals are concerned, there is one point of disagreement between Senator Godfrey and the committee report. Senator Godfrey thinks that the decision of the minister on disallowance would be an administrative decision. I think there are too many quasi points involved in the consideration that the minister has to give to this, to attribute to it any other quality than that of a quasi-judicial decision which would therefore be subject to review in the courts at the instance of the person affected by the decision.

So far as Senator Flynn is concerned, on the question of constitutionality what I said was that clause 2 of the bill was undoubtedly intended to create a presumption of validity, it is on that presumption of validity that the legislation is enacted. It is not the first time that this has been done, nor do I expect it to be the last. It may well be varied the next time and you may find the recital in the preamble, but if there are questions about validity I think you would find an attempt being made by the government to hoist themselves by their own bootstraps, either by a substantive clause in a bill or by a preamble that starts the legislation on its way. That is the way it was done here.

Even if it were felt that the constitutional issue might become important enough to find its way into the Supreme Court of Canada, the question in the meantime still is as to what course of action the government should take.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Parliament!

Hon. Mr. Hayden: The committee recommended that attention be given to submitting the question to the Supreme Court of Canada, but the committee did not make any declaration itself on the question of constitutionality. It simply indicated that fundamentally there appeared to be a question of constitutionality that may at some time have to be resolved.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I did not say that. I read it not in the report, but in the testimony of the officials of the Department of Justice.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: Then, coming the rest of the way to the prophecy part of today's sitting, I suggested to Senator Flynn earlier this afternoon that possibly, since we generated such an amount of acidity and vitriolic comment for a period this afternoon, it might be a good idea to set aside an hour or two once a week when there would be absolute freedom from rules, and anybody could speak whatever was in his mind no matter how irrelevant it was to anything being discussed. I say that because if ever there was anything more irrelevant than what Senator Flynn said, and based his speech on, I have yet to learn something about it. He proceeded on the basis that this bill prohibited foreign investment capital from coming into Canada, that it would provide what was the equivalent of a tariff so that people in Canada could grow rich. He went searching the university halls—

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I didn't say that.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: I am sorry. I would never attribute that to you, Senator Flynn. It was Senator Lang who said it. If anybody has heard me say that Senator Flynn said it, then I would ask him to forget about it. It was not Senator Flynn; it was Senator Lang. He searched in the halls of universities, and he searched in the television studios, radio stations and the news media, to find who was lurking there who had these nefarious schemes, plans and strategies by which they were going to subvert the Government of Canada for their own benefit and their own monetary gain. I cannot find any foundation for this, because the bill does not provide a prohibition. This is simply a case of building up a straw man by assuming that it is prohibition when it is only control, and proceeding to knock the straw man to pieces. In the process you have ample opportunity, without having to deal with any facts in the bill, to indulge in the kind of tirade that Senator Lang indulged in today.

● (1710)

In making this comment, which I think is a fair comment in the circumstances, I should mention that Senator Lang and I are good friends. I am sorry he is not here at the moment, but he can read my remarks and talk to me about them, and argue about them, if he wishes. But I think that is the sum and substance of his view and, undoubtedly, he was sincere in what he said. As is the case with many prophets, however, in making his economic prophecy I believe that the crystal ball he was using was not shined enough so that he could see clearly the vision—or perhaps it was too clear, and he projected the vision he desired into the crystal ball. I know there are prophets all over the world—people who, self-appointed and self-anointed, call themselves prophets. Some predict the end of the world in 10 or 15 days, and when this does not happen people forget all about it. That is what generally happens with prophets, and I think that is what will happen to the fears expressed in looking forward—

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Some prophets are durable, like Senator Martin. You did not sit in the other place with him, that is why.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: Well, I take that as an aside, or an interjection that does not flow from what I said.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Oh, no.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: It is purely gratuitous.

Hon. Mr. Martin: It is a manifestation of his love for me.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: In any event, the prophet can afford to be prophetic because there will be another prophet tomorrow prophesying something else, and the earlier one gets lost in the scramble. There are many prophets around, and in connection with what Senator Lang said today there may be a new prophet who will go in a different direction.

We had an example of that in the speech of Senator McDonald a few minutes ago, in which he was clear enough and frank enough to say that he had not heard the debate—he had not read it, and he had not read the bill. I believe him, because I listened with astonishment to the facility with which he jumped from subject to subject. If it were a chamber of commerce speech for Saskatchewan, I would say it was a quite excellent one. If it were a speech for someone aspiring to office in Saskatchewan, I would say it was a good speech. In so far as its having anything to do with this debate, I must point out that this bill does not deal with the disposition and distribution of moneys to Ontario. It deals with foreign investment capital, and the control of that capital in its dispositions and uses in Canada under certain conditions that will be of the greatest benefit to Canada. That is all it does, and in those circumstances I interpret Senator McDonald's speech as being an earnest, inspired and sincere effort to put forward the case of Saskatchewan in the best manner in which he could. I can assure him, however, that if he had even read the proceedings of our committee when dealing with the provinces he would have found, at least to the extent of his fervour, that we matched it in committee. We heard from the various provinces, and were fully aware of the provincial problems.

That is more than I intended to say, but I leave a parting word, that we must not talk about prohibition. There is no prohibition in this bill. We can find all around the world this tendency to exercise control in connection with investment and in connection with currency. The United States at the present time is attempting by various legislative devices to prevent United States money from being shipped to various parts of the world to be expended in manufacturing developments outside the United States. They wish to keep it at home, and have it spent in the United States. That is a variation on the theme that we have here in Canada and in this bill.

This problem of control in relation to trade, in relation to money, and in relation to investment can manifest itself in many ways. The bill before us is such a manifestation, and is designed to suit the national interest. I prefer those two words, the "national interest" of Canada. At this point I do not know whether it will or not, but the design and purpose of the bill is to reach that objective. If it does not I do not think the bill and the organization and administration established under it will last for very long.

I believe there is sufficient contained in the amendments made in the other place, and in the discussion we have had of this bill, to warrant my proposing that the bill be referred to committee. We have not had the opportunity of hearing the minister and, in my opinion, it is essential that we do. I can inform you that the committee, if the matter is referred to it, will be sitting next Tuesday at 9.30 in the morning, and will sit until the witnesses have been heard. The minister and one or two departmental officials will attend to answer our questions, justify the contents of the bill and, to the extent that they can, justify the omission of certain recommendations of the Senate committee in the bill.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

On motion of Senator Hayden, bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

THE ESTIMATES

REPORT OF NATIONAL FINANCE COMMITTEE ON SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES (A) ADOPTED

The Senate resumed from yesterday the adjourned debate on the consideration of the report of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance on Supplementary Estimates (A) laid before Parliament for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1974.

Hon. Allister Grosart: Honourable senators, my remarks in response to the motion by Senator Everett will be shorter than I had intended them to be. I am sure honourable senators will bear with me if I shorten them. Senator Everett gave us an excellent review of the report of the National Finance Committee which resulted from a session of that committee which, in my view, was one of the more important sessions it has ever held. I am referring particularly to the evidence we heard from the President of the Treasury Board, Mr. Drury, and some of his responses to the questions that were asked.

Senator Everett drew attention to the fact that Supplementary Estimates (A), which are not the only supplementaries we shall have this year, amount to just over $1 billion, bringing the total of federal government expenditures to $20 billion to date this year.

He pointed out that in his view the fact that the government "take"—that is, the take of all governments—from the GNP has now reached 40 per cent, has brought about a transfer of control of the economy from the private to the public sector of enormous dimensions. He estimated that this very fact might account for 3 per cent of the current inflation that is plaguing Canada.

I am quite sure that Senator Everett will, in due course, develop that theme, because he is not a man who makes statements such as this without having a good deal of evidence to back them up.

I suggest, honourable senators, that if 3 per cent of current inflation is caused by this transfer—that is, by the relative inefficiencies of spending in the government sector—we are faced with a very serious problem. Even if the degree of inflation is not of the magnitude suggested—it might prove to be a little less—this is still probably the most serious problem facing Canada today.

In committee, we asked the President of the Treasury Board what action the government would be taking on the very important recommendations made by the Economic Council of Canada in its Tenth Annual Review. In our questioning, particular reference was made to two recommendations of the Council which Senator Everett repeated yesterday in his speech on the motion. One was:

> We recommend that the growth of government transfer payments to individuals not exceed an average yearly rate of approximately 11 per cent during the period 1973-76.

The other recommendation of the Economic Council was:

> We recommend that the federal and provincial governments establish, for themselves and for the public sector as a whole, one or more indicators of the desirable level of increase in public expenditures for a three-year period.

The Economic Council mentioned some indicators—

Hon. Mr. Langlois: But the indicators were not defined, if I recall.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: The indicators are well defined and documented. I have two documents. One is the presentation by Dr. André Raynauld, Chairman of the Economic Council of Canada, to the Conference of Federal and Provincial Ministers of Finance which met in Ottawa in January. The whole document deals with indicators. On page 5, for example, the indicators are listed. In table 1, the heading is "Performance Indicators for the Period 1973-75." In the review, page after page is headed "Current Conditions and the Performance Indicators." So I suggest there are no grounds whatsoever for saying that the indicators have not been defined.

In this I found the responses from the minister somewhat disappointing, because he did not seem to be aware of the precision with which these indicators were established by the Economic Council of Canada.

Let us take the 11 per cent suggestion—that is, that the growth of transfer payments to persons does not exceed 11 per cent. What happened last year? What is going to happen?

In its Ninth Annual Review, the council did not propose an indicator for government transfer payments to persons, but noted that current dollar increases of around 10 per cent per annum would be consistent with the other indicators.

The council is saying in effect, "We have put before you some indicators which will indicate the course of the economy, which will indicate the kind of money that will be available for government expenditures, and which will also indicate the dangers inherent to the whole economy of excessive federal government and other government expenditures." The whole report relates these indicators to present and future levels and intentions of government spending.

The recommendation is 11 per cent. In 1972, the increase—this appears on page 32 of the Tenth Annual Review—was 19.3 per cent, in spite of the fact that the Economic Council has said that 11 per cent is the danger point; a danger to Canada's whole economy. The prediction for 1973, taking these indicators, taking known government spending intentions—and this is all governments, not just the federal government—is 14.5 per cent. For 1974, the indicator is a 21 per cent increase in the level of transfer payments.

That is why I said at the beginning of my remarks that I regard the recent meeting of the National Finance Committee as being one of its most important. I am delighted that Senator Everett, responding to a suggestion by the Leader of the Opposition, indicated that the committee might undertake a thorough study of this document and others related to it.

Honourable senators, it had been my intention, had the hour not been so late, to put before you some of the indicators. Perhaps I can refer to one in an area that is well known to honourable senators, and that is the relation of government expenditures to GNP.

For several years now our committee has recommended that the increase in the rate of government expenditures—I repeat that when I say "government expenditures" I am referring to the total expenditures of all governments of Canada, federal, provincial and local—should not exceed the rate of increase of the GNP. That would seem to be just ordinary common sense, because if the rate of government expenditure goes up faster than the rate of increase in the GNP, obviously we are in trouble.

I turn now to page 29 of the Tenth Annual Review. There is a chart, a table, and some explanation with regard to the percentage rate of increase in government current expenditures—perhaps I should draw attention to the words "current expenditures," because it is not the same as saying "all expenditures"—taken in 1961 dollars. It is the recommendation of the Economic Council that for the period 1972 to 1975 the GNP, the target, the expectation, the indication, be an increase of 5 per cent—that would be 5 per cent per year—and yet, looking at the chart and the figures, I see that, from 1970 on, we have been, in every year, over 10 per cent, and the curve is going up.

Honourable senators, I suggest that the federal government, and all governments in Canada, are contributing to a very dangerous situation in our economy unless they take the advice of the Economic Council of Canada. Surely that is what it is there for.

● (1730)

I should perhaps make one footnote. As far as the federal government is concerned, over a considerable period of years, its percentage of the total tax take, as related to total expenditures, has been decreasing rather steadily. This is largely due to the fact that the provinces and the municipalities have found it necessary to spend more to meet the growing responsibilities which social policies have placed on those levels of government. Against a rate of federal transfers to persons over the last few years of about 16 per cent, some recent decisions by the federal government have raised this to well over 20 per cent. That is the average.

That is why the Economic Council of Canada has given the stern warning that we will be in danger if the federal government, which is but one part of this whole area, does not restrict the increase in its expenditures on transfers to persons to that 11 per cent, contrasted with the 19 per cent last year and the 20 per cent anticipated by the indications of present government policies next year.

Honourable senators, I hope that Senator Everett will have success, as I am sure he will, when he turns the attention of the National Finance Committee and the Senate to this very important problem.

Report adopted.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

LEGAL AND CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRS

NOTICE OF COMMITTEE MEETINGS—QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Honourable senators, I rise on a question of privilege affecting the Senate as a whole. I received this morning, as all of you probably did, a notice of future committee meetings. It provides that on Thursday and Friday next the Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee will consider Bill C-176, to amend the Criminal Code, the Crown Liability Act and the Official Secrets Act.

As honourable senators know, this bill is on the Orders of the Day today for second reading. Therefore, the notice assumes that this place will pass this bill in time for a Senate committee's consideration on Thursday and Friday next. It seems to me that the Senate as a whole has been taken for granted too much by this government.

Hon. Mr. McIlraith: It was a mistake.

Hon. Mr Flynn: It may be a mistake but it is a mistake which, I suggest to Senator McIlraith,—

Hon. Mr. McIlraith: The original notice was withdrawn.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: —results from a practice and perspective that has been prevalent in this house for too many years.

● (1410)

Hon. Mr. Goldenberg: Honourable senators, I think I can explain what Senator Flynn is referring to. I personally have not received that notice. There was no authorization to send the notice. What happened was this. The subcommittee—or rather the drafting subcommittee of the Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee—has been meeting all this week and we wanted another day next week. I asked the Committee clerk to reserve those two days. If the Protection of Privacy Bill should come before us, we would have the two days, but if not, we were going ahead with our study of the Parole Act. There was no instruction to issue any notice to anyone and this is the first I have heard of it. I would feel as Senator Flynn feels had I received it.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: What about the withdrawal?

Hon. Mr. McIlraith: It was withdrawn.

Hon. Mr. Argue: Who sent it out?

Hon. Mr. Goldenberg: I do not know.

Hon. Mr. McIlraith: I think I should say that I was called about it, assuming that such a notice had been delivered to me as one of the members of the committee on corrections. I found it had not been delivered to me. The explanation given was that the notice had inadvertently been sent over here without instructions or authority, and that it had been partially delivered.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Unfortunately, it came to me.

Hon. Mr. McIlraith: The delivery was not completed to all.

Hon. Mr. Argue: They sent it to the important ones first.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: It is the zeal of the Senate employees.

Hon. Mr. Martin: It is a good point.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Hon. Paul Martin tabled:

Report on operations under the Regional Development Incentives Act for the month of October 1973, pursuant to section 16 of the said act, chapter R-3, R.S.C., 1970.

Revised Capital Budget of Air Canada for the year ending December 31, 1973, pursuant to section 70(2) of the Financial Administration Act, chapter F-10, R.S.C., 1970, together with copy of Order in Council P.C. 1973-3704, dated November 29, 1973, approving same.

Report of the president and statement of accounts of the Industrial Development Bank for the fiscal year ended September 30, 1973, pursuant to section 30(4) of the Industrial Development Bank Act, chapter I-9, R.S.C., 1970.

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. Leopold Langlois: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), I move that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until Monday, December 10, at 8 o'clock in the evening.

Honourable senators, perhaps a word of explanation would be in order, since yesterday I suggested that when the Senate adjourned today it would be until Monday afternoon at 2 o'clock. The change of time is to enable discussions to take place on Monday morning and Monday afternoon among those who are concerned with the foreign takeover bill. For that reason we concluded it would be more appropriate to sit on Monday evening, at which time we could consider second reading of the bills we have received today.

I might add for the information of honourable senators who wish to take part in the debates on the four bills which were introduced today that they will, if the Senate is in agreement, be taken in the following order on Monday: first, Bill C-211, to provide for the payment of family allowances in respect of children to supplement the income of Canadian families and for the payment of special allowances to provide for the care and maintenance of other children, and to amend the Income Tax Act in consequence thereof; second, Bill C-224, to amend the Canada Pension Plan (No. 2); third, Bill C-135, to provide additional financing mechanisms and institutions for the residential mortgage market in Canada; and fourth, Bill C-191, to amend the Parole Act.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Since he is giving explanations, perhaps the deputy leader could explain what happened in the other place to cause an indigestion of four bills at a time.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: I believe my honourable friend the Leader of the Opposition knows the answer to that much better than I do.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Perhaps the answer was the announcement made by the Prime Minister yesterday.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: We will have yet another kind of indigestion from that.

Motion agreed to.

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL FISCAL ARRANGEMENTS ACT, 1972
FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL FISCAL REVISION ACT, 1964
INCOME TAX ACT

BILL TO AMEND—THIRD READING

Hon. Eric Cook moved the third reading of Bill C-233, to amend the Federal-Provincial Fiscal Arrangements Act, 1972, the Federal-Provincial Fiscal Revision Act, 1964 and the Income Tax Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

PROTECTION OF PRIVACY BILL

BILL TO AMEND CERTAIN ACTS—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Daniel A. Lang moved the second reading of Bill C-176, to amend the Criminal Code, the Crown Liability Act and the Official Secrets Act.

● (1420)

He said: Honourable senators, this bill is entitled, "An Act to amend the Criminal Code, the Crown Liability Act and the Official Secrets Act"; but for descriptive purposes it might better be entitled, "The Right to Privacy Act," or "The Anti-Bugging Act." The purpose of the legislation is certainly to establish the right to privacy in a new area, that is, an area where these gadgets have come into use; but the mechanics of accomplishing this end are carried out through amending the three acts referred to in the title.

The bill is not new in principle, but extends old principles in our jurisprudence into a new area of technology, which in terms of the bill consists of "electromagnetic, acoustic, mechanical or other device," used to intercept a private communication; or, in common parlance, "bugs," and for purposes of brevity I will use that term during the balance of my remarks.

I said that there is no new principle in this bill, and that it is rather an extension of an old principle in the law, which in fact it is. The right to privacy is deeply embedded in our jurisprudence, as particularly evidenced by the limitations placed by our law on, for example, the search of one's person, or the search of one's premises. This restriction is highly regarded as a fundamental cornerstone of our personal liberties, and the authorities must, in order to engage in such searches, obtain a warrant beforehand, which warrant must be secured through normal judicial procedures.

The restrictions contained in our law, however, did not envisage the wizardry of modern technology, which includes such things as devices for listening to private conversations from great distances without the use of wires, directional receivers for that purpose, and devices which can pick up and transmit voices, spoken words, or words transmitted through wires in electronic form, and devices of such a nature which can be so miniaturized as in fact to resemble bugs, in size and appearance.

Turning to the bill itself, I would point out that it firstly amends the Criminal Code, and that takes up the greater bulk of the bill.

The bill also creates new offences. The first new offence is the interception of private communications by the use of these bugs. When this bill passes, it will be a criminal offence to do so. Secondly, it makes it a criminal offence to disclose the contents of private conversations that were intercepted by the use of these devices; and thirdly, it makes the possession, sale or purchase of these devices illegal, or, in other words, a crime.

In addition to creating these crimes, the bill also sets out rules regarding the admissibility of evidence that is obtained through the use of bugs, and safeguards in connection with the admissibility of that evidence.

The next part of the bill amends the Crown Liability Act, to make the Crown liable when private communications are unlawfully intercepted or disclosed by a servant of the Crown through the use of these bugs.

Finally, the bill amends the Official Secrets Act to provide for the interception by the use of bugs of communications if that interception is done for the prevention or detection of espionage, sabotage or other subversive activity.

The concepts of the bill are very simple up to this point. However, one has to balance on the one hand the individual's right to privacy against, on the other hand, the paramount interest of protecting the state and the securing of law and order in the state. In serving the latter interest, this bill provides that the police, certain members of the armed forces and certain other persons, will be able to use these bugging devices, and the evidence obtained through their use. In consequence, certain licensed people will be able to possess and sell these devices to the authorities who require them. These exceptions to the general rules provided here are essential in this modern age to allow our security forces the weapons needed to combat certain types of crime. The balance between these two interests is accomplished in this bill, very generally, by outlawing bugging on the one hand except as specifically authorized under its provisions.

The authority to use these devices must be obtained basically from a judge, and on the authority of either the attorney general of a province or on the authority of the Solicitor General of Canada. The bill goes on to set out in detail the evidence that must be furnished upon such application to a judge and the matters upon which the judge must satisfy himself before granting such authority. There is also provision here for what I would call a short form of application which can be used in cases of emergency. In such a case, authority may be obtained from certain specially appointed judges, but that authority is limited as to time, namely, for a period of 36 hours. I might mention that it was in this area that there was a certain amount of controversy, resulting in a subsequent amendment to this bill, as it passed through the House of Commons.

Finally, the bill deals at some length with the admissibility of evidence obtained through the use of bugging devices.

● (1430)

In my opinion it would be sufficient for our purposes today on second reading to say that, generally speaking, the evidence obtained by authorized bugging is admissible in court whereas that obtained by unauthorized bugging is inadmissible. However, there is an exception to that latter generalization, and under certain limited conditions spelled out in the bill such evidence obtained by unauthorized bugging may be used in court.

The bill goes on to provide for penalties, some of which are quite severe, for those contravening its provisions. It also provides for damages that might be paid to individuals who are injured through the unlawful use of these devices.

Honourable senators, none of us wish to live in a world of bugging, snooping and wiretapping. I believe that to be mainly because it has all the smell of a police state. However, on the other hand, none of us wish to hamper the work of our police forces and other officials in maintaining law and order, by denying them the proper use of this technological gadgetry. This bill endeavours to strike a balance between these two concerns. Undoubtedly, some persons may think that it goes too far in permitting the use of these devices; on the other hand, others may think that it goes too far in restricting their use by our authorities. Personally, I am inclined to the latter view. However, it seems to me that the bill strikes as fair a balance as is possible. It deals with a new area and one with which we have become more familiar in recent weeks through listening to broadcasts from Washington. I think it is timely that this sort of law should be put on our statute books and I feel that, notwithstanding the legal requirements and impositions placed upon our authorities before they may legally use these devices, it is a fair balance between the two interests affected, namely, that of personal privacy and that of the state and the preservation of law and order.

For that reason I commend the bill to your favourable consideration.

On motion of Senator Choquette, debate adjourned.

ELECTORAL BOUNDARIES READJUSTMENT ACT

BILL C-228 (LASALLE)—SECOND READING.

Hon. Azellus Denis moved the second reading of Bill C-228, respecting the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act.

He said:

[Translation]

Honourable senators, I have the honour to move for second reading a bill which stands among the most important for the people of LaSalle, in the great city of Montreal.

A bill such as this enables groups of people living in the same riding to recall or keep their identity of origin, even by the mere reference to their first designation in the name of the riding where they live now. Such is the case with the beautiful riding of LaSalle which comprises three municipalities: Ville LaSalle, Ville Emard and Côte Saint-Paul. These good citizens would like their identity to show, because, as you know, names are sacred and they are reminders of the past, of history.

I am convinced that the people of these three municipalities would be pleased to learn that their riding of LaSalle will from now on be called LaSalle-Emard-Côte Saint-Paul.

Honourable senators, to give in to the legitimate and reasonable wish of these good people is very little for us, but to them, it means a lot.

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, you are already aware of my position in respect of this bill: I am entirely against it because the Electoral Boundaries Commission has set as a principle that the names of constituencies should be simplified. That is why they looked—maybe not successfully in all cases, but certainly in this one—for a name which, if not descriptive of the electoral boundaries, would recall at least something of our history. LaSalle is a fine name indeed, which calls to mind Robert Cavelier de La Salle, one of the greatest explorers of this continent. It is a well-known name, and even if it is that of a municipality, its meaning goes far beyond the boundaries of a municipality.

In my opinion, the choice made by the Commission which recommended that name was a good one. If we try to use as many names as possible, names related to geography and not to history—like Emard, Côte Saint Paul or what have you—we shall reach a point where every small locality will insist its name being used. That is why I feel that multi-barrelled names are a mistake.

The last time I spoke on a bill like this it was about the famous Berthier-Maskinongé-DeLanaudière riding that Mr. Rémi Paul used to represent. We could go on and add five or six other names and it would take half a page in the official report of the Debates of the House of Commons or the Senate to designate the riding represented by a member. I think that is completely ridiculous and, whatever the little local vanities at the origin of a bill like this might be, I cannot accept it.

I am quite sure that it does not fall to the Senate to object to what the House of Commons does in this area. On the other hand, I know that the House never opposes the wishes, I would say more or less legitimate, or more or less selfish, on the part of a member to try and flatter all corners of his riding. There is nothing to prevent that. But the fact still remains that it is contrary to the accepted principle of giving a constituency a name that would be simple, uncomplicated. From reading the Debates of the other place, I recall a member saying that in Prince Edward Island they had found names, historic names like Cardigan, Malpec, etc., that describe whole areas, forgetting about municipalities. I think that there at least they have found a way of pleasing everybody.

In this case I do not see why any other name should be added to that of LaSalle. I regret this type of legislation. I do not intend to oppose it, except to say that it will be carried on division because I think it is basically bad.

Hon. Mr. Goldenberg: Does Senator Flynn mean to tell us that LaSalle, the explorer, was more important than Saint Paul?

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Greater than the apostle? I would not want to engage in a polemic on this subject with a theologian like Senator Goldenberg. This is only Côte Saint-Paul. It is not even côte d'Adam (Adam's rib) from which Eve was made.

• (1440)

[English]

Hon. Azellus Denis: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: I must remind honourable senators that if the Honourable Senator Denis speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate.

[Translation]

Hon. Mr. Denis: Just a few words in closing to take into account the protest from the Leader of the Opposition who has thus condemned not only those who wish to change the name of their constituency but also the government which, as all other governments, is trying from time to time to please certain sectors of the population.

It should fall mainly on us in the Senate to take the side of the minorities and the constituency of LaSalle is a minority as compared to the rest of the country.

I do not want to take up too much of our time but I have here many names of constituencies which are as long if not longer than the name I respectfully submit and which have been suggested by the good friends of the Leader of the Opposition.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I guess they were wrong too.

Hon. Mr. Denis: No. The Commission did its work but you know that a commission has neither the heart nor the spirit of politicians, of those who have lived with men; it does not care about ancestors, history and the country and when such mistakes are made by such a Commission, we have Parliament to correct them.

I guess that the Leader of the Opposition will not campaign at the next election in the constituency of LaSalle-Emard-Côte Saint-Paul, but I guess he would not do any better than he did the last time.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: This reminds me of Rostand who wrote—

Hon. Mr. Côté: Here is a poem!

Hon. Mr. Flynn: —about the King of Rome saying:

Vous lui remettrez son uniforme blanc.

I hope that in 25, 30 or 40 years when Senator Denis dies he will be buried in his red vest.

Hon. Mr. Denis: I am happy that you noticed it and I am as proud as the electors of LaSalle.

[English]

The Hon. the Speaker: It is moved by the Honourable Senator Denis, seconded by Honourable Senator Fournier (De Lanaudière), that this bill be read the second time.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Mr. Flynn: On division.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time, on division.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Côté: Now.

[Translation]

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I have no objection. In any event, since it cannot be given Royal Assent today, it would be better to postpone third reading until Monday night.

[English]

Hon. Mr. Denis: I am going to take a chance that it might go through today. There might be a more important piece of legislation to deal with at the next sitting.

[Translation]

Hon. Mr. Flynn: That does not matter. Third readings are always called at the beginning of Orders of the Day.

Hon. Mr. Denis: My honourable leader will be pleased to comply with the request from the honourable Leader of the Opposition.

[English]

Next sitting, then.

The Hon. the Speaker: It is moved by the Honourable Senator Denis, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Fournier (De Lanaudière) that this bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

BILL C-232 (OTTAWA EAST)—SECOND READING

Hon. George McIlraith moved the second reading of Bill C-232, respecting the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act.

He said: Honourable senators, Bill C-232 proposes to change the name of the electoral district of Ottawa East to Ottawa-Vanier. The reason for requesting this change is that a substantial part of the community in the eastern section of Ottawa known as Ottawa East is no longer in the constituency of Ottawa East but now is in the constituency of Ottawa Centre. That part of Ottawa still remaining within the constituency we are now discussing, and excluding the local area or community formerly known as Ottawa East, along with the whole of the City of Vanier, makes up the present constituency of Ottawa East.

The City of Vanier, formerly the Town of Eastview, has grown rather rapidly.

When a change of name for that city was decided upon, the name of a very distinguished Canadian, the late Governor General Vanier, was chosen. In addition, the City of Vanier has grown in terms of its population and significance in the constituency. I base that statement on the 1971 census, which shows that the City of Vanier had a population of about 21,000, and I believe it has increased since then. That part of Ottawa remaining in the constituency we are discussing has a population of approximately 49,000. I believe the City of Vanier is growing at a more rapid rate than is that part of the City of Ottawa which will remain in the new electoral district.

Honourable senators, for those reasons I commend this bill to you for your approval.

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, I think the remarks I made with respect to Bill C-228 should apply to this one. I do not want Senator Denis to think that I only find fault when he introduces bills.

In my view, the name "Vanier" would have been entirely sufficient as a name for this constituency. It is an illustrious name as well as being short and simple. It would have been entirely adequate to describe the district which Senator McIlraith has just described to us. I think we must come back to the criterion which the commissioners tried to apply in choosing a name to describe a given electoral district, the criterion being that it should be one word. It will probably come to that since the population of the City of Vanier, as Senator McIlraith mentioned, is growing at a faster rate than that part of Ottawa which will remain in the constituency. I am sure that fairly soon a new electoral district will be required, one to cover the City of Vanier only.

Hon. Paul C. Lafond: Honourable senators, I have spoken on this subject previously. In this particular case I believe the aim of the bill is laudable. I disagree with Senator Flynn's view that the constituency should eventually be called only "Vanier," because we do have Ville Vanier in the Quebec district and that could create some confusion.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: It is a provincial district.

Hon. Mr. Lafond: Yes, but it is still a municipality. The present bill calls for the addition of only two letters, not two words, to the name of the constituency, so a grammatical argument is of little value. Nevertheless, as I said previously, my view is that if we are going to have a redistribution commission, either we obey it or we do not. There are still opportunities for processing a change of name for that constituency since the redistribution process has only been suspended, not concluded.

• (1450)

As I have said before, if we have a redistribution commission there are opportunities for the public, the press and those concerned to make representations to the commission when it sits in the constituency or in that area. There is a further opportunity in the other place, when the Redistribution Commission reports are tabled, to make recommendations to change names. I do not accept at all the process of changing the name of a constituency against the wishes, tacit or otherwise, of the Redistribution Commission through a private bill, so I regret that I shall have to record my division on this bill as well as on the previous bill.

Hon. Mr. Buckwold: Honourable senators I should like to make a comment on Senator Flynn's remarks. I question his consistency in opposing the addition of new constituency names when I look back at the very good name which was the appellation of his own party, which somewhere along the line was extended to include a few progressives.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: It is a good joke, but it is not a serious one.

Hon. Mr. Denis: It was a joke.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time, on division.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. McIlraith: With leave, now.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I don't mind, but since we have said we will have third reading of the other bill next Monday it would be illogical to proceed otherwise with this one.

Hon. Mr. McIlraith: I am sorry, honourable senators, I misunderstood. My interpretation of Senator Flynn's opposition was not accurate. There is no urgency about the matter and I am quite agreeable to it being dealt with on Monday.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: It is because we said that on the other bill.

Hon. Mr. McIlraith: I misunderstood your earlier indication. I therefore move that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

The Senate resumed from Tuesday, November 6, the adjourned debate on consideration of the Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs, entitled: "Canadian Relations with the European Community".

Hon. Chesley W. Carter: Honourable senators, I should like to begin my remarks by congratulating Senator Aird, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs, on his excellent presentation when he opened the debate on the committee's report on Canadian relations with the European Economic Community on July 12 last, as recorded at page 867 of Hansard. I should also like to join with Senator Grosart in the tribute he paid to Senator Aird as committee chairman. As a member of that committee, I can support everything Senator Grosart said. In his quiet and unassuming manner, Senator Aird is an extremely effective chairman, and the committee's success is due largely to his personal qualities and the manner in which he presides over the committee's proceedings. It is not only an honour and a privilege but also a joy to serve on the committee with him.

In his opening address, Senator Aird referred to the committee's report as a Canadian handbook on the European Community. He went on to say that its prime purpose is to help make more Canadians aware of the Community, as it is in Canada's best interests to develop closer relations with the European Community at this time. He pointed out that Canadians generally had been slow to recognize the vast potential market of the European Community, which had imported $10 billion worth of finished goods in 1971, and, secondly, the mutual importance of the European Community and Canada to each other as potential sources of investment capital. These could be developed, he pointed out, by utilizing our present important links with the United Kingdom as a launching pad, but new techniques of joint production and joint development might have to be worked out.

The committee's report has been well received by the business community and by the press, both within Canada and outside our borders. The September issue of the Canadian Business Magazine comments very favourably on the committee's report. On page 6, a full page article emphasizes and supports the committee's recommendation that our Prime Minister should, as soon as possible, visit officially the Brussels headquarters of the European Community and the member states. Incidentally, the same article also states that the report is a useful reminder of the good work that can done by the Senate as a body.

Outside Canada the committee's report also received very favourable recognition. As an example, I should like to quote part of an article that appeared in the Christian Science Monitor of October 12, 1973, written by Eric Dowd of the Financial Times Service. The article begins by referring to the effect on Canada of Britain's entry into the European Community, and continues as follows:

> Although Britain's entry to the EEC had been telegraphed well in advance, and although, even without Britain, the common market has been an important export market for Canada (already taking $1 billion worth of Canadian exports a year), most Canadians, including politicians and businessmen, had until recently only the haziest idea of the problems posed for them by the EEC.
> In an attempt to plug this gap in knowledge, the Canadian Senate's Committee on Foreign Affairs has made a wide ranging study which is perhaps the most valuable guide this country has ever given its businessmen. It concludes that only between one and two per cent of Canada's trade will be lost, and then only in the short run, if the right measures are taken by Canada.
> It holds out a hope that the EEC will ease some of the tougher restrictions in its common agricultural policy and it wants Canada to press insistently for this in coming talks on tariffs and trade.

Under the heading of "Opportunity Stressed," the article goes on to state:

> The Canadian Senate Committee is still concerned with what it sees as long-range opportunities, rather than short-term dangers, in exporting to the common market.

The group is highly critical of past efforts by Canadian businessmen; it says they have been slow to recognize new opportunities in Europe and are not aggressive in selling there, contrary to the belief in Europe that North Americans adopt a pretty hard sell.

The Senate Committee is urging smaller Canadian companies to develop export partnerships in the EEC to lower the cost of transport, warehousing and distribution, and Canadian companies generally to establish subsidiary companies within the EEC and enter into joint ventures and licensing arrangements with the European companies.

● (1500)

The Canadian Committee recognizes there are some procedural difficulties in dealing with the EEC, which is far less integrated politically than it is economically, and suggests Canada cover all the bases by forging strong links both with the EEC member states and EEC headquarters. This call for stronger links with Europe is particularly acceptable to Canadians at this time, because of their high level of concern at United States economic and cultural domination of Canada.

That seems to me to be a very good summary of the report.

The report itself is titled, "Canada's Relations with the European Community." This is a subject which has already been debated in this chamber quite extensively on at least two previous occasions during this session. It was debated in February last on the motion to reconstitute the committee and define its terms of reference, and again when the committee reported to the Senate on its visit to Brussels in March last. There is, therefore, very little left to be said on this subject.

It so happened that I had to forego the visit to Brussels because of the death of my dear friend, the late Senator Isnor, which took place on the eve of the committee's departure.

The visit to Brussels grew out of the committee's conviction that not only was it necessary to make Canadians aware of the European Community but it was equally vital that the European Community should be made aware of Canadians and of the fact that Canada is not an economic satellite of the United States and that Canada is in many ways significantly different from our great neighbour to the south. For example, Canadians have maintained their cultural links with Europe, and the Canadian economy also is significantly different from that of the United States. We have different aspirations and objectives. Our problems are different and, in working out solutions to our problems, we use different approaches.

There was reason to believe that those charged with conducting the affairs of the European Community and of developing future policy did not fully realize either the extent or the importance of these differences between Canada and the United States. The remedy to this situation lies in more and better lines of communication, not only between Canada and the member countries of the European Community but also between Canada and the Community headquarters and nerve centre at Brussels.

[Hon. Mr. Carter.]

The first step in developing better communications is the establishment of personal contacts and a free and frank discussion of mutual problems. That is why the committee went to Brussels last March. This visit proved to be as wise as it was timely, as can be seen from the debate introduced by Senator Grosart on May 22 last and continued by Senator Macnaughton on the following day and recorded on pages 630 to 633 of Senate Hansard.

The committee returned fully convinced that the lines of communication they had succeeded in establishing should be put on a permanent basis. Since the ambassadors of member countries are neither authorized nor qualified to speak on matters involving Community affairs, the report recommends that the authorities at Brussels set up a Community information office here in Ottawa similar to the Information Centres already established at Washington, Geneva and Tokyo.

It is reasonable to expect that the establishment of an information centre by the European Community here in Ottawa would encourage the press and electronic media in Canada to disseminate much more information about the European Community than is now the case. At the same time it should cause Canadians to take more interest in the Community and the opportunities it affords.

The committee suggests that Canadian universities and academic circles should also take more interest in the European Community than they have been taking to date. In the universities across the country there are centres for area studies for Asia, Africa, and Latin America, but Europe, and particularly the European Community countries, have been largely ignored.

In the committee's opinion, post-graduate courses on European Community affairs could be given in Canadian universities, and scholarships and fellowships could be made available to enable Canadians to take similar courses at European seats of learning. Conversely, foreign officials could be brought to Canada on a functional basis in programs similar to that which the Canadian Wheat Board has been conducting very successfully for the past 20 years. Such programs could very well be sponsored by the Department of External Affairs and/or the Canada Council.

The report also recommended that Canada take advantage of the "exchange visit" programs now sponsored by the Community and, in addition, develop Canadian sponsored "exchange visit" programs to the European Community similar to those already sponsored by the United States.

Chapter 5 of the report, entitled "Closing the Information Gap," deals with this matter in some detail and one can only hope that the Government of Canada will treat this as a matter of urgent priority and adopt the suggestions the committee has made. In view of the fact that the European Community represents a market much greater than that of the United States and one that is also growing at a faster rate, the importance of developing as many contacts and lines of communication as possible cannot be overestimated.

Senator Grosart, in his excellent contribution to this debate on November 1 last, as reported in Senate Hansard, page 1077, referred to the meetings the committee had here in Ottawa with top officials of the Common Market and with members of the delegation from the Parliament of the European Community—whose visit was a direct result both of the committee's visit to Brussels in March and of the initiatives the committee had taken since their return.

At meetings with both of these bodies, committee members emphasized the need for the European Community to set up an information centre here in Ottawa, and the response was extremely encouraging. The idea that ways should be found whereby Canadian parliamentarians can get together with members of the Parliament of Europe was also very favourably received. The value of such contacts is evident from the ones that have just taken place. In view of the fact that the European Community is still in a state of evolution, it is to be hoped that some means of regular periodic meetings will materialize, so that Canadian parliamentarians can impress upon their opposite numbers of the European Community, not only the effects upon Canada that will flow from certain Common Market policies but that we can assist each other in the solution of problems and in determining the courses that should be taken, not only for our mutual advantage but for the benefit of all mankind.

The exchange of viewpoints which we had with the two groups of visitors from the European Community—one group being the top civil servants responsible for the operation of Community institutions and the other a group of parliamentarians representing member countries, was most interesting and, for me, most enlightening, but in some respects I found it also somewhat disappointing.

For one thing, our whole discussion was confined to matters of trade and economics. As long as we stayed within that field there was a fruitful discussion, but once we ventured outside that field there seemed to be no tangible or definite concept that one could lay hold of.

We know that the European Community is in a state of evolution with a number of set goals ranging from that of a common currency to full political union with target dates ranging from 1980 to 1985. But in moving towards these goals, the member countries seem to have no common strategy at all. With the possible exception of agriculture, which is forced upon them by France, they have no common policy, not even on energy, and no acknowledged leader.

Neither do they seem to have any fixed ideas or concepts as to what the role of the Common Market should be in the world at large once political unity has been attained, nor in what direction the Community should move and what type of relationship should be established, either with the other world giants or with the developing countries of the third world. It seems to me that under those circumstances the final shape and direction of the European Community is going to be determined by the force of external events rather than by the conscious will and planning of member countries.

The U.S.A. and the U.S.S.R. are giants industrially, economically and militarily. Japan is an industrial and economic giant. China is a giant in terms of population and of economic and industrial potential. And now the European Community is becoming an economic and industrial giant and with military potential as well.

At one of our meetings I pointed out to our visitors from Brussels that as Canadians we were concerned about where Canada as a nation is going to fit into this world of giants, since having a very small domestic market of only 22 million people we were very dependent on exports and had no special relationship with any other country or group of countries that would assure us access to a major market. That is why we are anxious that the European Community understand our position and take it into consideration so that policies, particularly trade policies, that are mutually advantageous can be developed. Otherwise Canada's economy could be seriously damaged.

I then asked if one of the visitors would care to comment on that statement and explain to the committee what role the European Community, as one of the world giants, would play in the world at large and what its relationship would be with the other giants—for example, with the United States and Japan. I expected an answer somewhat along the following lines, that there is a precarious balance of power in the world today because the world powers, the giants, are working out alignments which can be represented by two triangles.

First there is the big triangle, the United States, China and Russia. At the present time the United States has fairly good relations with both China and the Soviet Union while these two nations have very poor relations with each other. To some extent that puts Washington in the driver's seat, so to speak, but this will not necessarily last forever. It will last only as long as Peking and Moscow are hostile to each other. This should not be regarded as a permanent phenomenon but something that is a phase which will pass probably soon after the present leaders of those countries have departed from the scene.

Then there is the smaller triangle consisting of the United States, Japan and the European Community. This smaller triangle is very important because this is a triangle in which, if the three components agree, something can be accomplished since Brussels, Washington and Tokyo are more or less free to make whatever decisions they deem to be of mutual benefit to members as well as to the world as a whole. If the United States, Europe and Japan can create the right kind of relationships between them so that they can operate as a functioning triangle, then it would not be so dangerous for the free world if the two red giants move closer together again within the larger triangle.

That was the kind of answer I expected to my question but the official who replied stated that the European Community did not think of itself as a giant at all, that within their common tariff structure each member nation was responsible for its own economy, its own industrial strategy, its own foreign policy and the development of its own trade and commerce. The rest of the reply, as I interpreted it, was to the effect that not until all these different policies of all member countries had become fully integrated could the European Community think and plan as a single entity or consider itself a giant and, although they had set target dates for monetary and political union, it would be many more years before integration could be completed.

Articles that I have read in various magazines indicate that they are thinking in terms of a time frame of up to a hundred years. Personally, I doubt if they have ten. The most crucial decisions may well have to be taken within five years or even less. It may be that recent events such as President Nixon's armed forces alert, and the energy crisis which threatens the whole European economy, have changed their thinking in this respect and created a sense of urgent necessity which will greatly speed up the integration process.

In my opinion, it is absolutely essential that a functional relationship between Europe, the United States and Japan be created immediately. Since the United States is a key member of both triangles, steps should be taken at once to solve or alleviate the very serious economic issues between the United States and the other two countries and also that measures be adopted to ensure that further misunderstandings will be avoided in the future.

The Arab countries, especially Saudi Arabia, are anxious to develop an industrial base for their economies before their oil resources are depleted. Since they already have the capital, here is a tremendous opportunity for the European Community to offer both the technology which will be required and economic security through some form of special relationship. Japan and the United States can also help. What is needed is a common strategy based on what is right.

In all this, Canada, having links with all three countries, can play a very constructive role and, at the same time, contribute to world peace, stability and prosperity because the greatest security any nation can have is the goodwill, trust and confidence of all the other nations. If we act on that basis, trade and economic problems will take care of themselves.

On motion of Senator Langlois, debate adjourned.

MIDDLE EAST

UNITED NATIONS EMERGENCY FORCE—STATEMENTS BY CANADIAN MEDICAL OFFICER—QUESTIONS ANSWERED

Leave having been given to revert to Question Period:

Hon. Paul Martin: Honourable senators—

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Would you like to ask me some questions?

Hon. Mr. Langlois: No, he wants to answer your questions.

Hon. Mr. Martin: I have a reason for reverting to Questions, but, as a matter of fact, I would not mind asking Senator Choquette a few questions since he looks so different today from the way he looked in a picture he showed me the other day in which he was wearing a very handsome beard.

The fact is that on December 4 Senator Molson asked me some questions, which were more in the manner of an extended comment, and these were followed by a supplementary question put by Senator Phillips. At that time I promised to make a reply as quickly as possible. It had to do with the observations that were supposed to have been made by Major Jean-Paul Vezina, and my reply covering all these questions is as follows:

• (1520)

Major Jean-Paul Vezina is a doctor in the armed forces serving at Val Cartier. He comes under the direction of Mobile Command. As directed by National Defence Headquarters, this command was responsible for organizing, with the assistance of Air Transport Command, the deployment of the Canadian contingent to the Middle East.

The Surgeon-General reports that Major Vezina was selected, as were all 36 other medical personnel now with the Canadian contingent of the United Nations Emergency Force, for their experience, skill, and the fact that they are members of field ambulance units. Major Vezina had previously served with the United Nations force in Cyprus, and Canada's contingent to the International Commission of Control and Supervision in Vietnam.

The allegations made by Dr. Vezina with respect to such health services as washing facilities, toilets, and general hygiene, were not, in part, unfounded at that time.

The Chief of Defence Staff, General Jacques Dextraze, has pointed out that upon arrival in a theatre of operations it is difficult to have the facilities that we have here in Canada. Under the existing circumstances, facilities were considered adequate.

It must be kept in mind that once Canada agreed to participate in the United Nations Emergency Force the Secretary General of the United Nations asked Canada to supply a signal unit to this emergency operation. Since permanent accommodations were not available in the Middle East, as they had been in both Cyprus and Vietnam, Canada's contingent went to Cairo in such a manner as to be self-sufficient for a period of 30 days.

In the first contingent, all necessary Canadian medical facilities for 400 men, including 16 medical officers, assistants, hygiene technicians and dental officers, were included. In addition, the Senior Medical Officer, Lieutenant-Colonel Slavik, made local arrangements with the UNEF, as General Dextraze pointed out, "to have two major civilian hospitals cater to our needs until a small 20-bed Canadian hospital . . . arrived." That hospital arrived on November 30.

Major Vezina, having returned to Canada, is now on leave. He will report for duty to Canadian Forces Hospital, Val Cartier, on December 17.

In answer to Senator Phillips, I would say, because the new UNEF is composed of a number of nations which are each undertaking separate responsibilities, it was decided that the field hospital would be the responsibility of the Polish contingent. It should be noted, however, that each national contingent is responsible for their own primary medical services. Only when a man needs hospitalization for an extended period will he be sent to the UNEF hospital. This has been the practice followed in Cyprus; that is, having our own medical team, preliminary diagnoses were made by our medical staff. Should hospitalization then be recommended, it would be provided by either the British or the Austrians.

The Senate adjourned until Monday, December 10, at 8 p.m.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Hon. Paul Martin tabled:

Copies of Order in Council P.C. 1973-3658, dated November 27, 1973, amending Part I of the Schedule to the Hazardous Products Act, pursuant to section 8(3) of the said act, chapter H-3, R.S.C., 1970.

Copies of a paper, dated December 1, 1973, entitled "The Criminal in Canadian Society—A Perspective on Corrections," issued by the Solicitor General of Canada.

BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MEET DURING SITTING OF THE SENATE

Hon. Leopold Langlois, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(a), moved:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce have power to sit while the Senate is sitting tomorrow, Tuesday, December 11, and that rule 76(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I would like to inquire of the chairman what the program is going to be. I understand that the minister has agreed to appear before the committee tomorrow, but I would be interested in also knowing what the program of the committee is going to be, not only for tomorrow but let us say for Wednesday also.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: The committee is going to sit tomorrow at 9.30 in the morning. We have arranged to have some witnesses appear before the committee at that time. The minister will be there from 10.30 to 11.30 and he will be available all afternoon and all evening. He will also be available on Wednesday morning and Wednesday afternoon and—God forbid!—if necessary, Wednesday evening.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: When the committee has finished listening to witnesses, is it provided that the bill will be studied clause by clause on a given day? For example, do we know if this is going to start tomorrow or Wednesday?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: With respect to the clause-by-clause study, I would expect that after the minister makes an opening statement—and I did make a suggestion that a short one would be much appreciated—we would start in on either a clause-by-clause study of the bill or a clause-by-clause study of the recommendations of the Senate report.

Personally, I would incline to adopt a procedure under which we would select first the topics which were stressed and were the subject matter of the debate here and then go back into the bill. We would thereby focus attention on the points debated in the Senate first.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: That is what I wanted to hear from the chairman. I think it would be preferable if we were to hear the minister on the points raised in the report which we made last spring and on the points which were raised in debate here in the Senate. Then, when we have concluded hearing the testimony of the minister, we might be in a position to consider the bill clause by clause. We should not do a clause-by-clause study in the presence of the minister. I do not think it would be proper.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: The minister, of course, once he is there and embarks on a course outlined by the chairman, with the approval of the committee, is then there to answer questions.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Of course, but when he has finished, we can carry on with our own business.

Motion agreed to.

HONOURABLE PAUL YUZYK
HONOURABLE DONALD CAMERON

FELICITATIONS

Hon. Paul Martin: Honourable senators, I wish to draw the Senate's attention to the fact that Senator Yuzyk has written a book called For A Better Canada. He was kind enough to send me a copy, and I am showing it to other senators. He will not expect that all that is in his book will meet with full acceptance by all of us, but it is an indication of his interest in multiculturalism, and also a reflection on his industry.

At the same time I would like to mention that I received a book about Senator Donald Cameron, edited by Elizabeth Motherwell, entitled No Small Plans, an Affectionate and Incomplete Biography. I am sure we will all look forward to reading this book.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Honourable senators, I would like to join the Leader of the Government in praising Senator Yuzyk for publishing this book entitled For A Better Canada, which I have read in part. What I read has been very good. It is unlike the senator's previous and more scholarly tomes in that it is a book of speeches. It has plenty of heart and gut that you would expect in a book of his speeches. What pervades the book, what can be actually felt in every word he utters, is the man's incomparable Canadianism. It is extremely refreshing in an era when people are trying to break this nation up. It is heart-warming and relieving to know that there are true Canadians of significant talent working just as hard to make Confederation work.

I want to join the Leader of the Government in congratulating my esteemed colleague on his book. I wish him continued good health, because as long as the likes of Paul Yuzyk are healthy, they will be active, and if they are active, Canada cannot help but flourish in unity and harmony.

I have not seen the book on Senator Cameron, but I will certainly look forward to reading it. Knowing the senator as I do, I am quite sure that I will have generally the same impression as I had on reading Senator Yuzyk's book.

Hon. Paul Yuzyk: Honourable senators, I should like to thank most warmly Senator Martin, the Leader of the Government in the Senate, and Senator Flynn, the Leader of the Opposition, for their kind remarks about my book.

As all senators are aware, I have sent a copy to each of my colleagues, hoping that I would get a reaction from them, and I have received so far only favourable comments. I am sure the unfavourable comments will come a little later. I want to thank you very much for these comments.

Another thing which may interest honourable senators is that I approached three large publishing firms in Toronto to have this book published. Each of the three firms stated that it would require at least one year before the book could make its appearance; but I was not satisfied with that estimate. I wanted it done in six months, if possible, because this book should really be published this year on the occasion of my tenth anniversary in the Senate. However, I soon found out that there were other reasons why they did not accept the book for publication. One of them told me very frankly that if we had a book of the selected speeches of Winston Churchill, and published such a book here in Canada, he doubted very much whether it would be possible to sell 1,000 copies to Canadians. Well, I had to accept that verdict from them, so I went to a smaller firm and made arrangements for its publication and the book appeared within four months—on November 1 of this year. I am happy to inform the Senate that in the five weeks since then the book has already sold 1,200 copies.

● (2010)

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Yuzyk: Which proves that some people in high places can be wrong.

Hon. Donald Cameron: Honourable senators, Senator Martin's announcement coupled my name with the book written by Senator Yuzyk, which, unfortunately, I have not acknowledged yet because I have not had a chance to read it, but I will, and I hope that my comments will not be among the unfavourable. I want to deny any authorship of the book to which Senator Martin referred called No Small Plans. It was written by a former student of the Banff School, Elizabeth Motherwell. It was published by my successor at the Banff School. When you read it I am sure you will be convinced that my capacities for brainwashing my colleagues exceed anything you ever thought of.

FAMILY ALLOWANCES ACT, 1973

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Leopold Langlois moved the second reading of Bill C-211, to provide for the payment of family allowances in respect of children to supplement the income of Canadian families and for the payment of special allowances to provide for the care and maintenance of other children, and to amend the Income Tax Act in consequence thereof.

He said: Honourable senators, to summarize Bill C-211 very briefly indeed I must say that it is primarily a measure to supplement the incomes of Canadian families and improve their capacity to meet the cost of raising children. This bill will permit 3½ million Canadian families, the great majority of which have low or middle incomes, to realize a net additional amount of $840 million in 1974 alone. In addition, it will advance the development of a more equitable regional redistribution of income across Canada. For these reasons Bill C-211 represents, to my mind, a major step in the overall reform of the social security system to which the Government of Canada is firmly committed. As a matter of fact, this bill constitutes the largest single federal expenditure ever voted by Parliament for any new program.

This bill is the second major social policy measure that the government has brought before Parliament in the past six months. As honourable senators will recall, the first was the legislation introduced last spring to increase the old age pension to $100 per month, thereby raising the guaranteed income for pensioners to $170.14 monthly for single pensioners, and to $324.60 monthly for married couples when both the husband and wife are pensioners.

Recently Parliament approved a further amendment to the Old Age Security Act to provide that both the old age pension and the guaranteed income supplement will be escalated in accordance with increases in the cost of living on a quarterly basis, instead of once a year as was previously the case. This means that as of October last the guaranteed minimum income is $179.16 for single pensioners, and $341.80 for married pensioner couples. These increased pensions for the aged, together with the changes in the income tax law which substantially reduced or eliminated in some cases the tax burden on pensioners, have, I believe, gone a long way toward improving the lot of our citizens of age 65 and over.

Bill C-211, now before this chamber, is directed at the other end of the age spectrum—that is, at our citizens who are under the age of 18 years. To mitigate the effects of rising prices Parliament recently approved amendments to the Family Allowances Act and the Youth Allowances Act, to increase the allowances paid in respect of dependent children under the age of 18 from an average of $7.21 to a flat $12 per month effective in October. The bill now before us proposes to almost triple the pre-October average allowance payment from $7.21 monthly to an average of $20 monthly, with effect from January 1, 1974. This increase will mean greater benefits for over 7½ million children in over 3½ million Canadian families.

Family allowances, as honourable senators will recall, were first introduced in Canada in 1945. In that year the allowances were set at $5 for children up to six years of age, $6 for children aged six to nine years, $7 for children aged 10 to 12 years and at $10, finally, for children aged 13 to 15 years. The family allowance program in 1945 was additional to the system of income tax credits for dependent children of taxpayers, that had been in operation since 1918.

• (2020)

The two measures were, however, closely co-ordinated. That is, the Income Tax Act required the return of certain amounts up to 100 per cent of the family allowance payments received, according to a graduated formula, taking into account family income and size.

In 1947 this approach was modified to repeal tax on family allowances and to provide different exemptions depending on whether or not children were qualified for family allowances.

The original exemptions were $100 for a child qualified for family allowances and $300 for a child not so qualified.

In the intervening years these exemptions have been increased and revised to $300 for a child under 16 years of age and to $550 for a dependent child of 16 years and over. In 1957 the allowance rates were changed to $6 for children up to 10 years of age and $8 for children aged 10 to 15. In 1956 the family allowances assistance program was revised to provide the same level of benefits for the children of immigrants during their first year in Canada.

Youth allowances of $10 for dependent children aged 16 to 17, who were in attendance at school, were introduced in 1964. Finally, family and youth allowances were raised to a uniform benefit of $12 monthly effective last October 1.

The original family allowance program was introduced for the purpose of giving a minimum measure of income to support all families, to help ease the financial burden of bringing up children, and to provide a measure of equal opportunity for children regardless of a family's income and economic situation.

The objective of the new family allowance program is to provide a supplement to the income of Canadian families in such a way that those with the greatest need obtain the greatest benefit. The increased allowances were proposed in the Working Paper on Social Security in Canada which was tabled on April 18 last. In this working paper the family allowance increase was put forward as part of what has been called an income supplementation strategy. This strategy is one of five strategies advanced by the Government of Canada as the basis upon which a joint federal-provincial review of social security policy might be undertaken.

At the April federal-provincial conference of welfare ministers it was generally agreed that the propositions put forward in the working paper would provide an appropriate basis for the social security review. There was also unanimous agreement among provincial ministers at that conference that first priority in reforming Canada's social security system should be given to increases in family allowances.

Honourable senators, this bill is important for several reasons. Firstly, as I said earlier, it represents a major step in the reform of Canada's system of social security. It is the initial phase of a program of income supplementation for those Canadian families whose earnings from employment are insufficient to support a family unit, for those families whose breadwinner simply cannot find employment, and for those families whose breadwinner is not expected to work, such as disabled persons and single parent families.

It is estimated that there are some 327,000 families with children under 18 years of age who can be classed among the working poor, families whose earnings are not considered sufficient to support the family unit. There can be several reasons for this. Income from employment does not ordinarily take account of family size. That is the first reason. The family's breadwinner may be working at or near the minimum wage, but even if he or she worked full time at that wage the earnings are not sufficient to support more than one or two dependants. Secondly, the breadwinner may be able to obtain work on a seasonal or intermittent basis only and is not able to earn enough to meet the minimum income needs of the family. For these families it is a constant struggle to keep off the welfare rolls.

The reason why the breadwinners of such families continue to work is that they have pride in their ability to make their own way, and they do not want to lose their self-respect. The tripling of family allowances, to my mind, will go some considerable way in providing more income to assist low income families in meeting the cost of caring for and educating their dependent children.

Another significant feature of this measure is that it will permit a province to vary the family allowances paid in relation to the age of children or to the size of the family, or both, providing there is an act of the provincial legislature which establishes what the variation should be. The provinces will not be permitted to vary the family allowances in relation to family income.

This approach involves two parallel sets of legislation, one passed by the Parliament of Canada, which is the bill before us this evening, and one passed by the legislature of a province wishing to vary the payments. Both of these measures would regulate the family allowances to be paid in the province.

Before the differential rates can be paid in a province, however, the Minister of National Health and Welfare would have to satisfy himself on two counts—first, that the family allowances to be paid in the province would average $20 per child over a three-year period and, secondly, that an allowance would not be less than $12 per month in respect of any individual child.

At this point I should emphasize that although the amounts of the cheques may vary from province to province, depending on such provincial legislation as may be enacted, the federal government will continue to send the cheques directly to the families.

I should also like to draw attention to the fact that if a province chooses to have a $12 family allowance paid in respect of children in a certain age group or in respect of a certain size of family, it will be necessary to pay more than $20 in respect of other children in order that the $20 average will be achieved.

The provision to permit the provinces to vary the rates of family allowances flows from the fourth principle enunciated in the Speech from the Throne which opened the present session:

> —it must be recognized that Provinces may wish to have the structures of social security vary in accordance with the social needs, income standards and the cost of living in different communities.

Honourable senators, this is also consistent with recommendation No. 84 of the Special Joint Committee of the Senate and House of Commons on the Constitution of Canada. I should also add that the approach of having two parallel sets of laws governing social security transfer payments represents a significant innovation in constitutional arrangements as well as a new and, hopefully, continuing phase of federal-provincial co-operation. Two provinces to date—that is, Alberta and Quebec—have indicated their intention to take advantage of this "flexibility formula," and all provincial ministers of welfare have welcomed the federal government's initiative in giving this increased flexibility.

The government has proposed in this bill that the minimum allowance that can be paid in respect of any child must be 60 per cent of the national norm. This percentage figure was selected taking account of the recommendation of the Special Joint Committee of the Senate and House of Commons on the Constitution of Canada that, where a province wishes to vary the benefits paid to individuals under federal programs involving demographic grants or guaranteed income payments, such benefits should not be less than a certain percentage—perhaps one-half to two-thirds—of the amounts that would be paid under the scheme proposed by the federal government.

Hon. Mr. Argue: Honourable senators, I wonder if I might ask the honourable senator a question at this point. Does this mean, for example, that in a very wealthy family with a high income the guaranteed minimum is $12? Is that what it is aimed at?

Hon. Mr. Langlois: It has no relation whatsoever to the wealth of the family. It is up to the provincial legislatures to vary the rate paid to each child in relation to the size of the family and the age of children in the family.

Hon. Mr. Argue: If a province wishes to vary it, let us say, based partly, on the income of a family, and make a lower payment in the case of a child of wealthy parents, then it means—it may mean other things, too—in the case of wealthy families with high incomes the family allowance in any given province will be at least 60 per cent of the $20.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: This is a taxation problem; it is not dealt with in this piece of legislation. Later on in my presentation I shall give examples of what happens to the $20 average in relation to the income of the family receiving it. My honourable friend will then see that the higher the earning of the family receiving the allowance the lower the amount of the allowance that stays within that family. The amount of the allowance decreases with the rate of income tax.

I shall give two or three examples later on of various income levels, but this is not dealt with in this piece of legislation. This bill merely establishes a rate, which is a monthly average rate, for Canadian children, which may be varied by provincial legislation alone.

Hon. Mr. Argue: The average rate is $20, but it can be varied?

Hon. Mr. Langlois: The average rate must remain at that level of $20 per child per month. For example, if one provincial government decides that in a given family of five or six children the rate should be $12 or $13 each, then for other children that rate can be above $20, so as to arrive at an average of $20, given this variation with different children in the same family. As I said a moment ago, this average must be maintained. It must be established on the basis of three years. I hope I am making myself clear there.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: You are doing your best.

Hon. Mr. Argue: That makes two of us.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: As I have said, the government has proposed in this bill that the minimum allowance which can be paid in respect of one child must be 60 per cent of the national norm, that is, 60 per cent of $20, or a minimum average of $12.

As I was saying, honourable senators, this percentage figure was selected, taking account of the recommendation of the Special Joint Committee of the Senate and House of Commons on the Constitution of Canada that—and here is the essence of the recommendation—where a province wishes to vary the benefits paid to individuals under federal programs involving demographic grants or guaranteed income payments, such benefits should not be less than a certain percentage—and the committee suggested perhaps one-half to two-thirds—of the amounts that would be paid under this scheme proposed by the federal government. That is the reason why in this piece of legislation we have this suggested average of $12 as compared to $20, $12 being 60 per cent of $20.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Twelve dollars is the minimum, and $20 is the average.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Twenty dollars is the maximum average. I should also mention that the bill contains a provision to pay a special allowance of $20 a month for the care and maintenance of children who are maintained by provincial governments, or agencies of provincial governments, in institutions or foster homes, or who are maintained by private institutions.

Here I should open a parenthesis to bring the attention of honourable senators to the fact that these special allowances are not taxable. Furthermore, these allowances cannot be charged. This is the same for the ordinary family allowances, which cannot be charged or transferred. That is under clause 12, and perhaps honourable senators would permit me to read it:

> A special allowance is not subject to tax under any Act of Parliament and shall not be assigned, charged, attached, anticipated or given as security, and an allowance is payable subject to such conditions.

Honourable senators, the principle underlying the new family allowance program is that the allowance represents a supplement to family income. Logically speaking, therefore, we should not be paying an allowance in respect of children maintained by provincial governments in foster homes or institutions, or maintained in private voluntary institutions. There are other provisions to meet the cost of such care, such as the Canada Assistance Plan.

However, the minister has received strong representations to the effect that we would be discriminating against already disadvantaged children in institutional care if we were to eliminate the allowance now paid. Consequently, the government has decided to ask Parliament to approve payment of a special allowance of $20, to be paid for the care and maintenance of those 58,000 children. Moreover, it is proposed to include children in the care of those private voluntary institutions that have been approved by a provincial government.

This will mean that allowances now will be paid in respect of an estimated 9,000 children maintained in private voluntary institutions and for whom payments are not made under existing legislation.

In order to avoid discriminating against children residing with foster parents, it is proposed that the special allowance cheque be sent directly to the foster parent, in the same way that a family allowance cheque is sent to a regular parent.

Honourable senators, turning now to the matter of costs, the proposed new family allowance program will result in an annual cost of $1,830 million. This may be compared with the $640 million which was being expended annually on family and youth allowances prior to the October increase.

However, it is also proposed that the family allowances should be treated as taxable income in the hands of the parent who claims an exemption for the child for income tax purposes. The estimated tax recovery will be $350 million to the federal treasury.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Out of what? What is the amount expended?

Hon. Mr. Langlois: The total amount is $1,830 million. However, you have to take into account the amount which was being expended before the October increase, which amounted to $640 million less the $350 million recovered by the federal treasury, and a further $115 million recovered by the provincial treasuries as a result of the tax-sharing agreements. Consequently, the net additional cost to the federal treasury of the new allowances will be $840 million.

● (2040)

I should stress that the proposal to tax the family allowances will mean that, if a province does not vary the rates and an allowance of $20 is paid—and I hope I am answering questions put by my honourable friend Senator Argue—only a very limited number of taxpayers with very high taxable incomes—for example, those with taxable incomes of $40,000 whose children are 16 and 17 years of age—will suffer a loss compared with their existing family and youth allowance payments. Obviously, the situation may be somewhat different in those provinces which decide to modify the configuration of family allowances.

The taxation of family allowances will bring them into line with the tax treatment accorded to other income security payments, such as old age security, Canada Pension Plan benefits and unemployment insurance benefits.

It will be recalled that the Economic Council of Canada emphasized the need to concentrate family allowance benefits on the poor. The family income security program, or FISP, which was brought forward last year, was designed to provide greater benefits to the lowest family income group.

As seen in the Speech from the Throne, it was the government's intention to bring forward a new family allowance program which would concentrate the greatest benefits on those families with the lowest incomes. That was clearly stated.

By taxing family allowances, the government will bring about a substantial degree of flexibility in the amount of the benefit because a large part of the allowance will remain in the hands of those who need it the most; that is, the lower income families who do not earn sufficient income to pay taxes or those who earn just enough to be taxed at the lowest marginal tax rate. On the other hand, families in the higher income tax brackets will receive a benefit which will progressively reduce as income rises.

It may be useful, honourable senators, to illustrate the effect of taxing the family allowance. Assuming that the national norm of $20 per child is paid, a non-taxpayer will receive a net benefit of $20 per month per child; the average Canadian taxpayer will receive a net benefit of $15 per child per month; the taxpayer in the highest tax bracket will receive a net benefit of only $8 per child per month.

Even after taxes are paid on family allowances, most Canadian families, and more particularly all the low as well as middle income families, will be well ahead compared to the allowances they receive under the present program. For example, the federal government used to pay a family with four eligible children an average of $346.08 per year. Based on the new average of $20 a month per child, the family earning $4,000 per year will now receive, after allowing for taxes, of course, $934.08, which represents a net increase of $588 per year.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Oh, no! I am quite sure the honourable senator will want to correct that statement, because if the province changes the amount—

Hon. Mr. Langlois: I must remind my honourable friend that I put the premise that this was based on the $20 average.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: But that can be varied by the province.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: That is beside the point. My example is that we are assuming this is based on the $20 per child per month.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: It would be true, if the province were to accept the $20 average as a minimum, but that is not necessarily a fact.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: In the circumstances I have given for my example, I do not think I have to correct my statement.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: The point is that you won't get it.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Some provinces have accepted and are satisfied with the $20 average.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: But that is merely a possibility.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: There are only two provinces which have agreed to change the rates.

Hon. Mr. Argue: Some of the provinces may pocket the money.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Oh, no.

Hon. Mr. Croll: No, that is not possible.

Hon. Mr. Argue: Oh, yes, it is possible. They will pocket it just as they pocketed the old age pension.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: But the minister will have to be satisfied that the money is paid to the children.

Hon. Mr. Croll: It is not possible for them to do that.

Hon. Mr. Argue: It is not paid to the children; it is paid to somebody else.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: It is paid to the children directly by the federal treasury. I made that point, specifically, about ten minutes ago. The family allowance, no matter what the rate is, will be paid by the federal treasury to the child through the parents of the child.

Hon. Mr. Argue: Well, "or to the parents of the child." Or to the agency.

Hon. Mr. Croll: No, no. Not an agency.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: The federal government will pay it directly to foster homes and to provincial agencies in such cases where they, in place of the parents, are taking care of the children.

Hon. Mr. Argue: You may correct me if you believe me to be wrong, but I make the assertion that under the legislation as it now stands it is quite possible for a provincial government, having children under its care in agencies or in foster homes, to allow the $20 a month to go to the foster parents but then subsequently to reduce the amounts of the provincial money which would normally go to the foster homes. And I say to the honourable senator, who is just as interested as I am in this legislation, that I do not think there is any certainty at all that that kind of practice will be prevented.

Senator Croll, I think, would be concerned if he believed me to be correct, but I am sure he imagines I am wrong.

[Hon. Mr. Flynn.]

But I should like to point out to Senator Croll, and to the other senators, that with respect to the recent increase in old age pensions, in the homes for old age pensioners in Saskatchewan the pensioners did not get five cents. The provincial government put all the money in its big, fat pocket.

Hon. Mr. Croll: That is true.

Hon. Mr. Argue: And I am saying that under this present legislation, while it may technically be absolutely correct that the money goes to the foster parents, I would like the assurance that the Government of Saskatchewan, or any other provincial government, will not use this legislation as a means of saving money which they otherwise would be paying to the homes, because what has happened in Saskatchewan since that old age pension legislation is a disgrace to Canada, I say, where people in homes are getting 85 cents a day.

Hon. Mr. Smith: That is a good speech.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: I hope my honourable friend does not want to leave the impression, since he has given only the example of his province, that there is only one dishonest government in the whole of Canada.

Hon. Mr. Argue: I don't think it is dishonest—that is, illegal.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: I hope you don't wish to give that impression.

Hon. Mr. Argue: I do not say it is illegal. I think it probably is legal. I wish it were illegal. But it is highly immoral. It is certainly immoral.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: This allowance is paid to foster homes or institutions as approved by any provincial government and it is payable only if the money goes directly to the upkeeping, caring for and education of the child. That is a provision of this bill. Moreover, the Minister of National Health and Welfare has the right to supervise these payments and, if he finds that this money is being used for other purposes than provided for in this act, he will have the right—in fact, it will be his duty, and I am sure he will carry it out—to intervene and see to it that the money goes to benefit the child or children for whom it is intended.

Hon. Mr. Argue: I should like to see an amendment to clause 9(2) of this bill. The amendment could not be moved at this time, but I would propose that clause 9(2) be amended to read:

> (2) A special allowance shall be applied exclusively toward the care, maintenance, education, training or advancement of the child in respect of whom it is paid, and shall not be used to reduce payments otherwise paid by any agency of the Government of Canada or of any province.

The addition of the words, "and shall not be used . . ." et cetera, would preclude any chiseling, but the way it is now, without that being in the law, they can and will chisel.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: I submit that the bill goes far enough as it is, because it gives the right of control to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. The bill is quite specific. The clause you have referred to, clause 9, is quite specific and is clear enough to establish sufficient protection for the children to ensure that the money will not be used for some other purpose.

Hon. Mr. Argue: In the case of the old age pensioners, the federal government extended exactly the same protection to the old age pensioners in Saskatchewan, but the Government of Saskatchewan gobbled up the money while those people had to live in provincial homes on a mere pittance.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: I am sorry. I cannot comment on this last remark of my learned friend. I have not studied the case of Saskatchewan to which he is referring. Neither have I had the time to compare the provisions of the present legislation with the old age security legislation. He may be right on that score, but I think in this piece of legislation the minister has the right to intervene and to see that the money goes to the children for whom it is intended.

● (2050)

If I may be allowed to carry on with my exposé of this legislation—

Hon. Mr. Croll: "Exposé" is the word.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Even after taxes are paid on family allowance, most Canadian families, and more particularly all the low as well as middle income families, will be well ahead in comparison with allowances under the previous program. For example, the federal government used to pay a family with four eligible children an average of $346.08 per year. Based on the new average of $20 per month per child—and that is where I was interrupted by my learned friend, the Leader of the Opposition—the family earning $4,000 per year will now receive, after allowing for taxes, $934.08, which represents a net increase of $588 per year. The same family earning $6,000 per year will receive a net increase of $364.07. The family with earnings of $8,000 per year will receive a net increase of $345.29, and with earnings of $10,000, a net increase of only $319.71.

It is proposed that the new allowances will become payable in January 1974. There are several reasons for choosing this date. First, it coincides with the start of the new tax year, and will facilitate reporting income when taxpayers are filing tax returns for 1974. Secondly, provincial governments require time to develop and submit their plans for variations in rates of allowances. Finally, it will take time to gear up the administrative machinery to provide for the differential payments.

Parents now in receipt of family allowance—and I wish to underline that—will not have to re-apply for the new allowance payments; however, parents will have to provide some additional information to facilitate taxing the allowances.

There are several other features of the bill that I would like to highlight.

The family allowance will continue to be paid to the mother where there is one. It will, however, be up to each family to decide which parent will claim the child as an exemption for income tax purposes.

Family allowances will be paid to parents who are temporarily residing abroad, providing they are still paying Canadian income taxes. This will mean that family allowances will now be paid in respect of children of armed forces personnel and of diplomatic personnel posted abroad. The allowance to be paid in these situations will be the national norm of $20 per month per child.

The allowance will be paid in respect of a child residing in Canada who has at least one parent who is a Canadian citizen or a landed immigrant or, in certain circumstances, who is a non-immigrant and whose income is subject to Canadian income tax. To be eligible for the allowance a parent must be wholly or substantially maintaining the child.

The allowance will be made available for children of immigrants as soon as they are legally landed. This means that the family assistance program, under which an allowance equal to the family allowances are now paid during the first year in Canada, can be discontinued.

The school attendance requirement will no longer apply. Unemployed children under age 18 who do not attend school are just as dependent on their parents as children who do. This means that allowances will be paid for all dependent children of 16 and 17 years of age throughout the year instead of the present practice under youth allowances where the youths must attend school to qualify for the allowances, or be disabled and incapable of attending school.

The bill also provides that the average family allowance can be increased from time to time to take account of changes in the cost of living. Such increases would be brought about by order in council, subject to approval through a resolution of Parliament.

Honourable senators, the proposal to increase family allowances, which was originally outlined in the Working Paper on Social Security in Canada, was applauded by the vast majority of Canadians. To be sure, there were some fears that the magnitude of the increased expenditures would mean an increase in taxes. This will not be the case. The government has decided that priority in the allocation of government revenues will be given to the financing of increases in family allowances. It is intended to fund these higher allowances without having to increase taxes to do so.

Apart from increasing the income of the Canadian "working poor," the increased allowances should, to some extent, ease the pressure on provincial social assistance expenditures. The increase in the allowance should in many instances be enough to keep families off the welfare rolls. Moreover, a tax recovery, as I have said, of $115 million will be realized by the provinces through tax-sharing arrangements. It is hoped that these tax recoveries will be used by the provinces to ease the burden of their social welfare costs.

Honourable senators, there has been some criticism of the proposal to increase family allowances on the grounds that higher family allowances will encourage people to have more children, thus aggravating the so-called "population problem," which to my mind does not exist now in Canada. All available evidence suggests that this claim is unfounded. There are a number of factors which can affect fertility. They include, for example, the level of family income, the economic outlook, trends towards urbanization, higher living standards, increased employment of women outside the home—

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Lack of the pill.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: —spread of knowledge of family planning, and development of effective contraceptive devices, as well as changing social and cultural attitudes toward family size. There appears also to be a high correlation between higher incomes and lower fertility.

Taking account of long-term trends, young married couples, relatively better off than their counterparts of a generation ago, are limiting the number of children they have in order to maintain the standard of living they have achieved. Moreover, it is estimated that it costs between $500 and $700 annually to maintain a child; consequently a family allowance of $240 can hardly be said to provide an incentive to procreate.

If one examines the statistics on population trends both in Canada and in other countries, there appears to be no evidence that family allowance programs have stimulated the birth rate. This holds true even for those countries that have deliberately set about to use family allowances or other forms of income support to stimulate the birth rate. For example, population growth was the specific objective sought by the family allowance system in France.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: La revanche des berceaux.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: However, from 1960 to 1971 the fertility rate—that is the number of live births per 1,000 women of child-bearing age—has declined from 70.1 to 60.4 per thousand. Czechoslovakia is another country which in the post-war period tried to stimulate population growth through family allowances and other forms of income support, but the fertility rate fell in that country from 62.4 per thousand in 1960 to 51.4 per thousand in 1970.

It is also interesting to note the population trends in Canada and the United States over the past few years. Canada has paid family allowances since 1945. The United States has no program of family allowances. In 1960, the fertility rate in Canada was 94.6 per thousand and in the United States it was 86.1 per thousand. In 1971 the fertility rate in Canada was 56.5, while in the United States it was 59.3. We should note that that was remarkably close.

In a study conducted by the United Nations in 1965, it was found that there was a high correlation between high levels of economic growth and economic development and low birth rate. This study showed that the level of fertility divided the less developed countries from the more developed countries more consistently and more completely than any other single indicator. In the less developed countries the crude birth rate, that is the number of live births per 1,000 of population in this case, is still well above 30 births per 1,000. But in the developed countries it is below 30. In many it is around 15 per 1,000. The 1965 World Population Conference reported that an advanced economy with a high per capita product requires and imposes a demographic pattern on the country under which the birth rates cannot be as high as those found in less developed countries. On the evidence available I am convinced that in an economically advanced country such as Canada, family allowances at the levels proposed will not affect the underlying factors that are encouraging and stimulating the trend towards still lower birth rates.

I think we should look at another interesting fact. May I recall, again, that it was in 1945 that family allowances were introduced in Canada. In 1945 the average number of children under 16 years per family in Canada was 2.37; today it has fallen to 2.17. Looking at the average number of children per family, the following comparisons are enlightening:

In 1945 Ontario had 2.06 children per family; in 1973 the figure was up to 2.15. In British Columbia in 1945 it was 1.93 children; in 1973 it was 2.09. In the Province of Quebec, in 1945, there were 2.86 children per family. By 1965 that figure had increased to 2.61.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: What was that figure again?

Hon. Mr. Langlois: It was 2.61.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: And before that it was?

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Before that it was 2.86.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: That is a decrease. You said it was increased.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: I may have had a lapsus linguae. It is possible. I am sorry.

In 1967 the Government of Quebec introduced its own family allowance scheme in addition to the federal family allowances; yet the number of children per family continued to decrease to 2.11 today in Quebec.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Is that the purpose of this legislation, to decrease the birth date?

Hon. Mr. Langlois: No, I said it would not affect it.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Well, you have been giving figures that show that it has decreased all the time, and you seem to defend the bill on that basis.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: My friend is not following my argument. He has been out of the house for a few minutes and that is why he has missed part of my argument, I am afraid.

Hon. Mr. Croll: The accusation has been made time and again that the purpose of this bill has been to increase the population, and he is defending it.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: I gave the examples of France and Czechoslovakia where family allowances and supplementary payments were used in an attempt to increase the birth rate and it had the contrary effect. That is what I am trying to establish.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I cannot see the relevancy.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Well, I am replying to a criticism which has been made of this legislation.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Where?

Hon. Mr. Langlois: All over Canada. Honourable senators will be interested to know that in 1973 British Columbia had the smallest number of children under 16 years of age per family, an average of 2.09. Contrary to popular mythology, the Province of Quebec has the next lowest rate at 2.11, followed by Ontario at 2.15, Nova Scotia at 2.21, Saskatchewan at 2.22 and Manitoba at 2.24.

While Quebec is the second lowest province in terms of numbers of children per family, it is by far the lowest province with respect to the fertility rate. In 1971 there were 47.6 live births per 1,000 women of child-bearing age. The next lowest province was British Columbia with a rate of 55.4 per thousand.

In global terms—and if my honourable friend will bear with me for a minute he will see what I am driving at—families in Ontario will receive $650 million from the federal government through this program; while in Quebec it will be only $497.5 million; in British Columbia it will be $183.1 million, and in Alberta it will be $149.1 million.

I have pointed out these details because there are Canadians who believe that this program is designed primarily to benefit Quebec families. The foregoing facts simply do not support this argument. I hope I have made that very clear.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: You are referring to criticisms made 30 years ago.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: They are still being made today.

Hon. Mr. Croll: On a question of privilege, I would point out that the minister said some time ago he had been receiving letters suggesting that this bill was for the purpose of assisting the people of Quebec to have more children. He denied it. At the same time I received two letters, and I don't know where they came from, saying the same thing. That was less than a month ago. So the myth is still around.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Well, the myth has been used by the Liberal Party in Quebec, saying that this bill was designed to catch their vote, and I can assure you that you won't change your tune in the country the next time you go to it.

Hon. Mr. van Roggen: If the Leader of the Opposition wants to hear criticism of this bill on those grounds, he should come out and listen to his Tory colleagues in British Columbia.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I am quite sure they don't speak differently from the Liberal members from that place either—when they are at home, anyway.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: I am sorry that I seem to be the cause of a political undertone in this discussion which I wanted to keep above party politics. I was merely dealing with the criticism that has been levelled against this bill without referring to any political party. As I have said, I pointed out these details because there are some people who believe that this bill is designed to benefit Quebec families and I am sure that I have proven the contrary.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: You won't make that speech in Quebec.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Some critics also have suggested that we should eliminate family allowances completely or, alternatively, limit allowances to one or two children per family. I reject this proposition out of hand. In all humanity, one cannot argue that because parents ought, perhaps, not to have had children, we should allow the children to suffer from poverty and malnutrition. Other measures should be and are being adopted to encourage family planning. For example, the Department of National Health and Welfare has set up a program of public information and education on family planning. Moreover, they are promoting the training of professionals and non-professionals who are engaged in providing family planning services and are supporting research on family planning.

It is through these improved programs of public information and education that we are coming to grips with the issue of family planning. It is through the family allowance program that it is hoped to improve the living standards of the present generation of Canada's children who, through no fault of their own, find themselves living in conditions of poverty.

This measure will have the effect of generating additional net income for families amounting to $840 million. The greatest part of this amount will be placed in the hands of Canada's low and middle income families, and it will be made available to these families at a time when living costs are continuing to rise. It is hoped that this measure will ease to some extent the heavy financial burden that parents now face in caring for and educating their dependent children.

For all these reasons, honourable senators, I consider it a great honour to have the opportunity of recommending this most important measure to the favourable consideration of my colleagues in this chamber.

• (2110)

Hon. Mr. Croll: Honourable senators, we passed over rather lightly Senator Argue's suggestion that children may not receive the full amount of the family allowance. When the increase in the family allowance was announced some time ago, a statement was made by the minister responsible for welfare in the Province of Ontario that welfare payments would be reduced. There was such a howl in the province and the legislature that he immediately decided to forget about it, so that danger does exist.

Hon. Mr. Argue: The danger does exist.

Hon. Josie D. Quart: Honourable senators, to begin I should like to thank Senator Langlois very much for his explanation of the bill. My first remark will be that I am going to support it.

I am going to support this bill because I know there are people in Canada who are urgently in need of the limited help it provides. I toured Canada with the Special Committee of the Senate on Poverty, and my eyes were opened. I saw what poverty was, and what it could do to people. I want those who need it now, and need it badly, to have all the financial help they can get. So the government can be assured of my vote on this bill. I certainly do not want to see implementation of this measure delayed in any way for any reason.

But let not the government think that it has pulled the wool over these tired old eyes. I am fully aware of the fact that this is no great praiseworthy act of munificence. This is no sterling example of government largesse. Oh no, this measure just serves to keep up with the skyrocketing cost of living. It means that the poor will be kept in the same relative poverty and it offers no real hope. It offers no real practicable way of escape from the cruel condition of poverty. It is a cynical patch, a palliative, any poor excuse for a policy. It is just more of the same, another desperation move by a government that seems totally incapable of dealing in depth with the serious problems that bind this nation.

The Special Committee of the Senate on Poverty in Canada, under the chairmanship of Senator Croll and of which I was a member, suggested a comprehensive program to the government. We suggested a number of measures that might be used in an all-out frontal attack against poverty. Very few of the recommendations of that committee have been implemented. We have had a few reluctant, half-hearted attempts at a solution, but these have been too few and too limited in scope to amount to anything significant.

We are having a fight with poverty and losing it because the government refuses to really get in there and fight. Oh, they do a lot of sparring, it is true, but as prizefighters they have failed for they have not landed any knockout punches to date. Certainly the bill before us now is no knockout punch. It is a flashy piece of window dressing. It is dull and unimaginative. But then again, the government's record in combating poverty amounts to nothing more than a crazy quilt of ill-conceived half measures.

The government does not know what to do about combating poverty, and it adamantly refuses to take the advice of those who do. So, what happens? We are confronted with a bill that offers yet another handout. The government is simply throwing out another subsidy in the hope this will get the poor off its back.

The poor of this country require far more than just another subsidy. Our poor need a government that really cares and cares enough to put together a comprehensive program, one designed to eradicate poverty once and for all. But all this administration can think of doing is offering yet another subsidy.

What does this bill really do for the poor? Yes, it offers temporary relief, but does it get them out of poverty and allow them the luxury of solving their own poverty problems? Does it make them self-sufficient? Not at all. It simply provides for their continued dependence on the government. It is a sadly deficient piece of legislation.

Honourable senators, we had the right to expect more. We had the right to expect a complete plan—something new, something original, something daring, something that could provide hope for a better and economically sounder future for the poor. But this is not such legislation. Some day I hope a government, a better one, will offer more than a tiny patch to cover the gaping hole of deprivation. Some day, hopefully, a government will be able to offer the poor the opportunity to walk out of poverty under their own steam. Their heads will be held high; they will owe nothing to anybody, and they will be equipped to participate fully in the community and make a worthwhile contribution to our undying quest for a better and fuller life.

Unfortunately, this time has not yet arrived. The present administration lacks the vision to bring it about. I am disappointed at what is being offered in this bill, as I am sure many of you are. It is neither sufficient nor the right kind of help. Being on welfare is not living in luxury or on easy street, and criticism of a great number of welfare recipients is unjustified. The needs of the poor are real, and immediate relief is necessary.

[Hon. Mrs. Quart.]

In my opinion Bill C-211, the family allowances bill, is the most significant and urgent of the package of bills now before the Senate. Although the monthly payments will be increased from $12 to $20 per child, it seems regrettable that these payments will be taxable for the first time. Nevertheless, as I said at the beginning of my remarks, I will support the bill. There are people in dire need who can use this help until such time as we are able to find an administration with the wisdom and resourcefulness to fashion a real solution to poverty.

On motion of Senator Macdonald, for Senator Phillips, debate adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Honourable senators, I rise on a point of order. I notice that the resumption of the debate on Bill C-176, to amend the Criminal Code, the Crown Liability Act and the Official Secrets Act has been set down as the seventh item on the Orders of the Day contrary to the provisions of rule 21, which reads as follows:

> Unless otherwise ordered by the Senate, orders of the day take precedence according to priority as follows, precedence always being given to orders of the day relating to legislation under paragraphs (b), (c) and (d):
> (a) orders of the day for the third reading of bills;
> (b) an order of the day which was under consideration at the time of adjournment;
>
> (c) orders of the day which had not been reached at the time of adjournment;
> (d) remaining orders of the day.

● (2120)

When the bill was under consideration on the last occasion, Senator Choquette adjourned the debate, but yielded to Senator O'Leary. Since we had to listen to the propagandist speech of Senator Langlois on family allowances, Senator O'Leary gave up. I want the Senate to note that normally item No. 7 would have been item No. 3 tonight.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Under the Rules of the Senate, Senator Flynn is correct, but we understood that it was desirable for us to proceed with the two social security measures about which there did not seem to be a great difference of opinion.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Oh.

Hon. Mr. Martin: That is what we had been told.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: This was not discussed with me, anyway.

Hon. Mr. Martin: If there is any misunderstanding, I am sorry. It seemed to be a reasonable assumption that we should proceed with the two measures about which our differences are perhaps not as fundamental as they are on other items of legislation. However, I acknowledge that Senator Flynn is correct.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I want simply to register my objection, because Senator O'Leary is not here to continue the debate. I think that note should be taken of the fact that the Rules of the Senate have not been followed.

Hon. Mr. Croll: Senator O'Leary should be given some priority tomorrow.

CANADA PENSION PLAN (No. 2)

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

Hon. George van Roggen moved the second reading of Bill C-224, to amend the Canada Pension Plan (No. 2).

He said: Honourable senators will recall that in October last, when the then new federal Minister of National Health and Welfare met with his provincial counterparts from all 10 provinces, he was roundly applauded in the press not only for the proposals which he brought to that conference but for the manner in which he developed them with the provincial ministers before announcing them as government policy.

At the time of the conference there was unanimity among the federal and provincial ministers in bringing forward the changes to the Canada Pension Plan which are apparent in this bill. If I may, I shall read the first two paragraphs of the communiqué that was issued at the conclusion of the conference. The communiqué is dated October 11, 1973, and states:

> The Government of Canada and the nine provinces where the Canada Pension Plan operates, and the Government of Quebec where the Quebec Pension Plan operates, announce that they have agreed that the pensions paid under both the Canada and Quebec Pension Plans should be fully escalated in response to increases in the cost of living, starting in 1974. They have also agreed that the levels of earnings upon which benefits and contributions under the two plans are based should be increased, and made identical under both plans. Thus this Conference has succeeded both in improving the benefits of the Canada and Quebec Pension Plans and in restoring parallelism as between two of the most important elements of the two plans.
> For the people of Canada this means, specifically, that their pensions under the Canada and Quebec Pension Plans will no longer be eroded by increases in the cost of living. It means, too, that their pensions and contributions will be based upon a larger proportion of their earnings—$6,600 in 1974 compared with $5,600 under CPP and $5,900 under QPP this year. The $6,600 will be increased by 12½ per cent per annum until it reaches the average of the earnings of Canadian workers as represented by the Industrial Composite of weekly wages and salaries as published by Statistics Canada.

The bill also deals with 1975, to which I will refer in a few moments. The communiqué continues:

> The amount of earnings which would be exempted from contributions in 1974 would be set at $700 and thereafter would be determined as 10 per cent of the ceiling on pensionable earnings. Contributions therefore will be based on the band of earnings between $700 and $6,600 in 1974. It is estimated that by 1980 the yearly maximum pensionable earnings will have risen from $5,600 to over $13,000. During the same period maximum retirement benefits will rise from $1,089 to over $3,000, over and above the Old Age Security pension. Finally, the agreement which has been reached at this Conference means that those workers who move from Quebec to other provinces, and vice versa, will no longer be faced with different contributions on the same levels of earning. Similarly, employers having employees in Quebec and other provinces will be in the same situation.
> It was also agreed where the Canada Pension Plan operates that, effective in 1974, retirement pensions will become payable at age 65 to any person who has ceased to contribute to the Plan, regardless of his or her earnings. Thus the earnings test which has been applied to people between 65 and 69 will be eliminated. The Government of Quebec has already liberalized the Earnings Test under the Quebec Pension Plan.

Honourable senators, the agreement reached by the ministers has been brought forward in two separate bills. The item to which I have just referred, regarding the elimination of the earning limits for pensioners between the ages of 65 and 69, will be dealt with in the second bill.

The bill before us affects just over 500,000 Canadians and, if it receives royal assent before the end of this year, will go into effect on January 1, 1974.

Honourable senators, I do not need to ask for your support of either the Canada Pension Plan or the proposition that its recipients be guaranteed against inflation, which, in recent years, has been a problem not only in Canada but in all countries of the world. Certainly the problem of inflation cannot be avoided by a great trading nation such as Canada.

Apart from lifting the ceiling of 2 per cent relative to inflation, Canadians could not receive an appropriate pension under the plan were the yearly maximum pensionable earnings not increased. To quote Mr. Lalonde, the Minister of National Health and Welfare:

> The process of strengthening the CPP must start with the recognition that by its very nature the Plan is earnings-related. It is impossible to receive benefits on earnings for which no contribution has been made. Thus, we obviously looked first at the level of yearly maximum pensionable earnings on which people can contribute. This offered visible proof of the extent to which national economic performance had outstripped all expectations of past years.
> For when we set up the Plan, we based our calculations around average wages and salaries at the time. We projected a YMPE by 1976 of around $6,000. That figure, in terms of today's economy, now appears ludicrously low.
> At the end of 1970, we advanced a proposal to raise the YMPE to $7,800 a year in 1975. While the figure itself was not out of line, the future rate of escalation with such a base figure was in danger of becoming so. Yet even that figure was based on the data available only four years ago. Surely there is no better evidence of the remarkable performance of the Canadian economy in recent years. But if economic indicators have risen, so have costs. Adequacy is expressed in bigger numbers now than it was in 1966.

• (2130)

Honourable senators, I have a volume of detailed figures which have been provided by the Department of National Health and Welfare. To simply recite these would only be tedious, so I will confine myself to the salient facts. We have, first, complete agreement between the ten provincial governments and the federal government that the amendments contained in the bill before us, as well as the bringing together of the salient features of the Canada Pension Plan and the Quebec Pension Plan, should go forward.

I might just digress here to mention the manner in which the Quebec Pension Plan started to drift apart from the federal plan. As recently, I believe, as 1973, the Quebec government raised the limit of inflation for payments under the Quebec Pension Plan to 3 per cent, whereas under the federal plan it remained at 2 per cent.

Another major area where the two plans started to drift apart was in the maximum earnings permitted under the plans. Under the federal plan the maximum earnings permitted are $5,600, whereas under the Quebec Pension Plan it was raised to $5,900. As a matter of fact, the proposed figure for 1974 in respect of maximum earnings of $6,600 is arrived at by taking the Quebec figure of $5,900 and increasing it by 12 per cent.

The next point I should like to make is that this bill, if passed, will remove the 2 per cent ceiling on pension increases in respect of inflation. That ceiling has been part of the Canada Pension Plan since its inception. The bill does not just raise the ceiling, it removes it in total for all time to come. The impact of this proposal is that inflation will no longer erode people's pensions under the Canada Pension Plan. That, of course, will also apply to the Quebec Pension Plan.

The third point is that the increased benefits resulting from the 2 per cent ceiling being removed will apply to all existing pensions dating back to their coming into force. That is why I say this bill, if passed, will have an immediate effect on the pensions payable to the more than 500,000 Canadians who have come under the various provisions of the Canada Pension Plan Act over the last number of years. This would include people receiving retirement benefits, disability benefits, children, widows, orphans, and so forth.

The effect of the ceiling being lifted retroactively back to the beginning of the plan is that instead of these people being brought forward from whenever they came into the plan at the rate of 2 per cent, they will be brought forward at a rate based on the actual inflation rates we have experienced during that period of time. To give you an example of the extent to which pensions will increase under this provision, it is estimated that they will go from the present $81.20 a month to $250 a month by 1980. That, of course, would be in addition to old age security benefits.

The fourth point I should like to draw to the attention of honourable senators concerns the limitation on earnings. The present yearly maximum pensionable earnings set forth under the act, as was referred to in the communiqué which I read a few moments ago, is $5,600. That limit, if this bill is passed, will be raised to $6,600 in 1974, and to $7,400 in 1975, and it is agreed that the parallel Quebec Pension Plan will increase the limitation on earnings to those amounts for those two years.

[Hon. Mr. van Roggen.]

The intention expressed by the minister is that the yearly maximum pensionable earnings should continue to increase at the rate of 12 per cent per year through to 1980, or until such time as they catch up to the average industrial composite for wages and salaries in Canada, at which point they would be approximately $13,000. That does not relate to an inflation factor, honourable senators, but to a combined factor of inflation and the anticipated continued growth in the economy which we have experienced in recent years.

Why two separate bills to accomplish these objectives? The present bill removes the 2 per cent ceiling in respect of inflation, and the two principal divergences which have started to develop between the Quebec Pension Plan and the Canada Pension Plan. It also provides for more than a 12 per cent increase in yearly maximum pensionable earnings for 1974 and 1975. That much will be accomplished by the passage of Bill C-224.

It was also agreed by the ministers at the meeting, as indicated in the communiqué, that this process should continue in so far as increases in permitted earnings are concerned. However, there were a number of technical problems which could not be resolved in time to allow the increases to be included in this bill, if it was to be passed in time to make the benefits agreed to by the ministers available to the half a million Canadians affected on January 1, 1974. It was the proposal of the minister, therefore, that this bill be passed at this time, giving effect to all of the principles agreed to by the ministers at the meeting, and that at a subsequent time a further bill be introduced.

That further bill, basically, will do two things: first of all, it will provide a formula by which the yearly maximum pensionable earnings may be increased in 1976 and 1977, and years beyond, to bring the amount in line with the industrial composite of salaries and wages in Canada; and, secondly, it will cover a number of minor technical matters which are required to give effect to that. That bill will be forthcoming, hopefully in time to be dealt with before the expiration of 1975, which is covered by the escalation in this bill.

It is also felt, as the full escalation of permitted earnings carried through to, say, 1980, might reach a figure of the magnitude of $13,000, that there are interested groups in Canada, including employer groups, who would want to make representations, and undoubtedly the two Houses of Parliament would want to receive those representations in committee. So that has been left to a future date.

Subject to that, honourable senators, I commend this legislation to you. It represents an unanimous agreement between the ten provincial governments and the federal government in attempting to alleviate the burden of inflation on those people who are presently benefiting from the Canada and the Quebec Pension Plans.

• (2140)

I might simply add in closing that the Canada Pension Plan and the Quebec Pension Plan are fully contributory. This legislation will have no bearing on the tax load being borne by Canadians, and the rates of contribution will remain the same.

Hon. John M. Macdonald: Honourable senators, it is not my intention to speak at any length on this bill. I do not think it is necessary to do so, in that the bill is very straightforward and not difficult to understand.

As has been stated by the sponsor, the bill basically does three things. One is to change the yearly maximum pensionable earnings level for the years 1974 and 1975. Under existing legislation, such earnings would be $5,600 for 1974 and $5,800 for 1975. Under this amendment, these amounts are changed to $6,600 and $7,400.

The second purpose of the bill is to remove the 2 per cent ceiling on the pension index, so that now the actual increase in the cost of living will be taken into account.

The third purpose is what is called the "catch-up" provision—which has been explained by the sponsor—in relation to the actual increase in the cost of living. The percentage increase will go into effect from the time pensions first became payable.

I think there is general agreement with this measure. This is shown by the communiqué which was issued after the federal-provincial meeting on these proposed amendments, and which was read by the sponsor.

Honourable senators, there are some things which are of interest in that communiqué. One is where they stress the fact that they wanted these amendments to come into effect in 1974. I do not intend to quote that again, but I will read one part where it says:

> However, it is recognized that there is urgent need for immediate action on two questions if the changes are to come into effect in January 1974. These are the proposals to escalate benefits according to the full increase in the consumer price index, and to raise the level of the earnings ceiling for 1974 to $6,600. These two changes should be legislated immediately—

Of course, the reason why all agreed to have this legislation passed immediately lies in clause 8 of the bill. That clause provides:

> Subsection 115(2) of the Canada Pension Plan does not apply in respect of the amendments to that Act contained in this Act.

Subsection (2) of section 115 provides in effect that major amendments to the Canada Pension Plan will come into effect on a day to be fixed by proclamation, which day shall not be earlier than the first day of the third year following the year in which any notice of intention to introduce a measure containing a provision to such effect was laid before Parliament. In other words, unless there had been some agreement of that kind, and if that provision in the Canada Pension Plan was put into effect, these amendments could not have been proposed at this session of Parliament.

Of course, in a legal sense that provision would not bind this Parliament, because it could repeal it if it so wished. But if the federal government should act contrary to that provision without the consent and agreement of the provinces concerned, it could certainly be accused of acting in bad faith. Happily in this case the question did not arise, as all the provinces concerned were in agreement to have the proposed amendments passed now. Since they have agreed, the provision of section 115(4), mentioned in clause 9 of this bill, has already been acted upon.

It is of interest to speculate as to why that provision was actually put in the Canada Pension Plan at the time. I presume it was in order to give the provinces some reassurance that changes would not be made unilaterally by the federal Parliament.

Hon. Mr. Martin: That is right.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: And, technically, so that one Parliament could not bind future Parliaments.

Honourable senators, believing as I do that the proposed amendments are worthwhile, I am pleased to support them. Since the amendments have been so clearly and ably explained by the sponsor, I do not see where any benefit would be obtained by referring this bill to a committee. Therefore, unless the sponsor or someone else wishes to do so, I would suggest that the bill be set down for third reading at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read a third time?

On motion of Senator van Roggen, bill placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting.

RESIDENTIAL MORTGAGE FINANCING BILL

SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Richard J. Stanbury moved the second reading of Bill C-135, to provide additional financing mechanisms and institutions for the residential mortgage market in Canada.

He said: Honourable senators, I appreciate your patience and your durability in allowing me to explain this bill this evening. That may facilitate our departure from this place sometime next week.

Hon. Mr. Bourget: You are optimistic.

Hon. Mr. Stanbury: In any event, I should like to give a short explanation, beginning with the need for Bill C-135.

If the government is to fulfill its obligation to see that all Canadians are well housed, in a healthy and satisfying community environment, some 2.5 million new housing units will be required in the next decade to meet the needs of new families being formed, and to replace some of the existing substandard housing.

In terms of capital, that will mean some $30 billion to $40 billion during the next 10 years. The annual flow of capital into the housing market is about $4.5 billion, compared with $2.7 billion some five years ago. With the growing demand for housing, we are rapidly reaching the point where we will need an investment of some $5 billion a year. Dwelling starts during the current year are expected to reach an all-time high of more than 260,000. As a matter of fact, data for the first 10 months show that the seasonally adjusted rate of housing starts averaged 271,620, up 9 per cent from the 1972 level.

As honourable senators are aware, there has been a good deal of justifiable concern in recent months about the level of mortgage interest rates, which are making it difficult for many Canadian families to realize their expectations of owning their own homes. In many respects, the cost of capital is the result of market forces, not only within Canada but on an international scale. One obvious approach to this problem is to take what steps are available to bring the supply of capital for housing more closely into balance with the demand, and that is one of the purposes of this legislation.

An important constraint on the availability of capital for housing has been the recognition on the part of investors that residential mortgages are less fluid that other kinds of investments. It is difficult to get in and out of the mortgage market if your circumstances or your investment strategy should change. Recently, however, it has been found that there was a sharp decline in the United States housing starts. That has happened very largely because of this drying up of the pool of mortgage money. We simply cannot allow that to happen here. It is even more important here than in the U.S.

A key difference between the two countries is the relative size of Canada's post-war baby boom, which resulted in the fastest growth in adult population of any major industrial nation of the world. The rate of growth of this segment of Canada's population is, in fact, more than double that of the United States. Most of the bulge now is in the 18- to 19-year-old age group—that is, those born in the period between 1944 and 1955—the age when people customarily leave their parental homes to set up housekeeping on their own.

A number of social and economic factors have in recent years acted to reinforce the effects of this basic demographic trend. For example, the long-run movement of population from rural to urban areas has meant that younger rural residents immigrating to cities have had to find accommodation of their own at an earlier age than if they had remained in the country. The average age of marrying has declined, again leading to an earlier demand for separate housing, while at the other end of the spectrum, greater financial independence for the elderly has meant that a larger proportion of older people are living on their own. A higher number of divorces has also led to an increased rate of "undoubling" of households. Then, too, family ties have been weakening, the young desiring more independence and a place of their own. This is probably most pronounced in the case of young, single females who have been flooding into the labour market at record rates and acquiring jobs with incomes sufficient to enable them to rent their own apartments.

Between 1961 and 1966, new household formation, both family and non-family, totalled 625,000—about the same as in 1956-61. In the 1966-71 period, however, the increase was 870,000 and the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation estimates that 934,000 new households will be formed between 1971 and 1976.

During this latter period there is no question that the post-war baby boom will provide the main impetus for the fast growth. The number of new households formed in the 15 to 34 age group rose dramatically from 161,000 in 1956-61 to 375,000 in 1966-71. In 1971-76 the increase will be an estimated 559,000.

[Hon. Mr. Stanbury.]

Now, this bill is intended to accommodate the problem of fluidity by creating a federal mortgage exchange corporation, in effect, by providing an active secondary market in which mortgages can readily be bought and sold.

Another important factor in limiting the flow of private capital into residential mortgages has been that it is largely a market for big investors. It is difficult for a small investor—either an individual or an institution such as pension funds or credit unions—to operate in the mortgage market without sizeable packages of money. Mortgages, legally and administratively, are not readily split in such a way that the investor can acquire a separate and divided piece of the action that fits his investment portfolio. Furthermore, getting into the mortgage market requires some knowledgeable advice and expertise that is not always available to small investors.

The bill responds to these last two problems—the problem of making mortgage investments available in manageable units, and the requirement for expert advice—by permitting the creation of a new kind of institution called mortgage investment companies. In effect, the mortgage investment companies will provide small investors with the same kind of access and expertise in the mortgage fields as mutual funds provide for investors in equity shares. By amendments to the Loan Companies Act and the Income Tax Act, these companies, under federal government supervision, will give many small investors the opportunity of participating in mortgage and real estate investments for the first time.

The overall effect of these measures will be to remove some of the constraints which have discouraged institutional investors from getting into mortgages and which have shut many smaller investors out of the market altogether. The bill will make residential mortgages more attractive and put them on a more nearly equal footing with other kinds of investment.

All of the indications so far are that the financial community feel these measures are appropriate and effective and that they will have the effect which the government intends. One of the institutions with the greatest potential for increasing the flow of capital is the trustee pension fund.

These funds are now investing only about 9 per cent of their assets—the savings of Canadian workers—in residential mortgages, compared with more than 50 per cent by the life companies and nearly 60 per cent by trust companies. If, by making mortgages more accessible and attractive, we could increase investment by trustee pension plans from the present 9 per cent to, say, 15 per cent, that would make available more than $500 million a year in new money for housing.

Honourable senators who recall the amendments to the National Housing Act which were before us earlier in this session will be aware of the direction which the government has taken in meeting the housing needs of low income Canadians. Many of the amendments enacted at that time involve substantial subsidies for the benefit of people who are unable to house themselves adequately with their own resources. To the extent that we can increase the flow of private capital into the mortgage market, public funds may be reserved for people who, for one reason or another, are not provided for in the private market. The government should not be required to fill any gaps in the private lending field.

The bill which I am now commending to honourable senators for approval in principle is necessarily complex. But perhaps I might conclude these remarks by describing briefly the main characteristics of the institutions which it proposes to establish.

The Federal Mortgage Exchange Corporation, which many people are referring to as the mortgage bank, will be a crown corporation responsible to the Minister of Finance and will come under the supervision of the Superintendent of Insurance. The corporation will be empowered not only to buy and sell residential mortgages but also to make loans to private mortgage institutions for terms up to one year on the security of residential mortgages.

At incorporation the federal government will be the sole shareholder. It will be administered by a board of ten directors appointed by the Governor in Council. The federal government will provide operating capital by investing $50 million in shares of the corporation and may lend it an additional $150 million plus a further $75 million on a dollar-for-dollar matching basis with loans from the private sector. About $200 million may be mortgages now held by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation.

With regard to the mortgage investment companies which will be permitted by this legislation, their investments will be confined to Canada and at least half of their assets must be in mortgages, residential real estate or cash. Other provisions of the bill ensure that these companies must maintain a highly liquid position to protect investors. Their income must be passive; that is, they must not actively conduct a trade or business.

The bill provides for amendments to the Income Tax Act regarding the status of these companies and this, perhaps, deserves a word of explanation. The significant effect of this part of the bill is to provide that, where the company promptly conveys dividends to the investors, these dividends will be taxed only once—in the hands of the investors—and not twice, in the hands of the corporation and again in the hands of the investors. This so-called conduit or flow-through tax provision is not unique with these companies. The principle applies equally to taxation of dividends of real estate trusts and of mutual funds which, in some respects, are very similar in their operation to the new mortgage investment companies.

I would like to conclude now by commending the principles involved in this legislation to honourable senators. As I have suggested, it is a very necessary instrument in meeting the housing needs of Canadians in the decade ahead. It can help us find the $40 or $50 billions we will need to create enough housing for our growing population. By improving the supply of housing capital, it can help exert a downward push on mortgage interest rates. By increasing the flow of private capital it will help conserve public financial resources to be directed to those in greatest need of help with their housing problems. I know that honourable senators will share my concern to help provide all Canadians with adequate shelter, now and for the years ahead, and will appreciate the urgent need to put the measures provided for us in this bill into effect with the least possible delay.

On motion of Senator Macdonald, for Senator Bélisle, debate adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

On the motion to adjourn:

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Honourable senators, before moving the adjournment of the house, I should like to clear up an apparent misunderstanding which arose this evening in regard to the Orders of the Day. At the same time I should like to indicate the order in which we propose to proceed tomorrow.

On Friday, December 7, four bills were introduced in this house, and in speaking about the agenda for today's sitting I said this:

> I might add for the information of honourable senators who wish to take part in the debates on the four bills which were introduced today that they will, if the Senate is in agreement, be taken in the following order on Monday: first, Bill C-211, to provide for the payment of family allowances in respect of children to supplement the income of Canadian families and for the payment of special allowances to provide for the care and maintenance of other children, and to amend the Income Tax Act in consequence thereof; second, Bill C-224, to amend the Canada Pension Plan (No. 2); third, Bill C-135, to provide additional financing mechanisms and institutions for the residential mortgage market in Canada; and fourth, Bill C-191, to amend the Parole Act.

That is the order in which those bills were taken today, and I would suggest, if the Senate is in agreement, that the same order be followed again tomorrow, that is—

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Excuse me. We want No. 7 to be proceeded with first. By the way, senator, I had made a note of this. Seeing that the leader is away I was going to bring it to his attention, and I have already underlined it. I can understand why there was that misunderstanding. We did follow that order, but we did not say that there would be first, second and third readings. You see, what you have just read there says, "I might add for the information of honourable senators who wish to take part in the debate on the four bills which were introduced today that they will, if the Senate is in agreement, be taken in the following order . . ." We have taken them "in the following order," but you put them ahead of the business that was already under discussion.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: This was the intention, of course, and I have no objection if my honourable friend insists on having order No. 7 taken first tomorrow. I have no objection to that, and I want this to be clearly understood so that we do not have the same misunderstanding tomorrow that we had today. Is that clear?

Hon. Mr. Choquette: That is clear. That is perfectly clear.

Hon. Mr. Martin: And we will go on with the family allowances bill right after.

Hon. Mr. Buckwold: I think we have a third reading that should come first.

Hon. Mr. Martin: That will come first. Third readings should always come first.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: That is according to the rules.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: That is all right.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: Honourable senators, is it agreed that that order should be followed, on the understanding that third readings come first?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Tuesday, December 11, 1973

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

APPROPRIATION BILL No. 5, 1973

FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-239, for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial year ending the 31st March, 1974.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. Leopold Langlois: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate, I move that this bill be read the second time later this day.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: I wonder if the deputy leader could inform us of the reason for the urgency and why leave should be given to proceed with second reading later today?

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Honourable senators, we are nearing the end of the session. It is proposed that tomorrow there will be royal assent. If we can include this bill in the royal assent tomorrow, it would be quite in order to do so. As honourable senators know, last week I gave notice of a motion to suspend certain rules of the Senate. I have not made the motion, and I hope I will not need to, although it is customary to do so at this stage of a session.

In view of the fact that we are nearing the end of the session, I hope that we shall be given leave to proceed with second reading later this day, subject to the debate being adjourned until tomorrow if the Deputy Leader of the Opposition wishes to do so.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is it your pleasure to adopt the motion?

Motion agreed to.

CANADA PENSION PLAN (No. 2)

BILL TO AMEND—THIRD READING

Hon. George van Roggen moved third reading of Bill C-224, to amend the Canada Pension Plan (No. 2).

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

PROTECTION OF PRIVACY BILL

BILL TO AMEND CERTAIN ACTS—SECOND READING—ORDER STANDS UNTIL LATER THIS DAY

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Lang, seconded by the Honourable Senator Inman, for the second reading of the Bill C-176, intituled: "An Act to amend the Criminal Code, the Crown Liability Act and the Official Secrets Act".—(Honourable Senator Choquette).

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Honourable senators, may I suggest that this item be taken later on this day.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Order stands.

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from yesterday the adjourned debate on the motion of Senator Langlois for second reading of Bill C-211, to provide for the payment of family allowances in respect of children to supplement the income of Canadian families and for the payment of special allowances to provide for the care and maintenance of other children, and to amend the Income Tax Act in consequence thereof.

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, during the past four years we have been subjected to and inflicted with various government announcements concerning changes in the family allowances. We have had these both in Throne Speeches and in the form of announcements from Dominion-Provincial Conferences. We have had various programs, such as the FISP program introduced in the other place and then allowed to die. More recently, as an emergency measure, we have had the family allowance increased to $12 a month.

After four years, the government seems to have gotten tired of its revisions. It has taken the baby bonus and thrown it out with the wash and started all over again. This is a new bill, supposedly, and not an amendment to the existing legislation. Yet the new bill contains a great many of the principles of the old bill. This bill maintains that there must be an average of $20 a month per child, yet the provinces can vary that as they please.

In 1947 the average family allowance, or baby bonus, was $7.21. This new legislation proposes an average of $20 a month. It is interesting that the change from $7 to $20 equals the cost of living increase from 1947 to 1972. It does not take in the really accelerating cost of living in 1973. Therefore, it is necessary that the government get down to plan basic principles and attempt to meet inflation. We have had legislation after legislation bringing allowances, pensions and so on in line with the present-day cost of living. But, necessary as these amendments have been, they do not meet the problem of inflation. That is one problem the government is unwilling to face, is unwilling to attempt to control.

In all the legislation we have had since the special session in August, we have increased various pensions and allowances to meet the present-day cost of living, but we have not had one piece of legislation to control inflation. One must ask why. Why haven't we had one, single, solitary piece of legislation to control inflation?

The Minister of National Health and Welfare, when he was going to the Dominion-Provincial Conference at which he made the proposal that family allowances be increased to $20 per month, acted somewhat like a socialist Paul Revere. As he jogged down the hill he kept lighting various lights on the way to the old railway station and kept shouting, "Family allowances! Twenty dollars per month!"

But, honourable senators, on the way back, the old lamplighter sang a different tune. He must have met the Minister of Finance part-way up the hill, because he started to say, "It is taxable! It is taxable! It is quite all right, it is taxable!" He went on to point out that the federal government would recover $350 million and that the provinces would recover $150 million annually by taxing family allowances.

I find it amazing that a government which cannot calculate oil reserves, which cannot keep track of the unemployment insurance fund and really has no idea of what the cost of living is, can be so definite, so "accurate," in saying what we are going to recover from this $20 a month. Perhaps we should take the "experts" out of the Department of National Health and Welfare and put them into the Department of Finance and the Department of Manpower and Immigration. Then we would have no problems in those departments. If they are that accurate, they are in the wrong department.

One question which comes to mind is: What formula is going to be used in distributing this money to the provinces? I note from the information given to the committee in the other place that Ontario, Alberta and British Columbia are listed as receiving grants from this new form of taxation. If the equalization formula were used, then Ontario, Alberta and British Columbia would receive nothing under this proposal.

The bill itself and the government explanations up to date have not dealt with the cost or the difficulty of administering this program. Make no mistake about it, honourable senators, it is going to be costly to administer this bill. It is going to be, as Senator Manning said in committee the other day, a "nightmare to administer this program."

I am afraid that we may find ourselves very much in the same situation as we often find ourselves in when paying those who are unemployed. Honourable senators are familiar with the complaints of the unemployed when their cheques are not on time and when they are not accurate. It is all blamed on a computer. The computer in this case will have to work overtime. The late Senator McCutcheon used to lecture us on the stupidity of collecting money from those in a higher income bracket, giving it back to them in some form of subsidy or allowance, then taxing them on it. We are doing the same thing again, and one must ask what is the cost of this double taxation and who is paying for it? Are the provinces paying for it, or is the federal government being big-hearted again and paying all the administration costs? A chartered accountant friend of mine pointed out to me that a person eligible for family allowance and earning $20,000 a year would receive a net increase of $2 per month from this program. Now, $20,000 in this day of inflation is not a large salary and is earned by a great many people. However, we are collecting $20 a month in taxation from these people, the administration costs are $5 so we are collecting $25 a month in taxation to give them a net gain of $2, which is nothing short of rank stupidity. I know that once a program of this nature starts it is difficult to cut it off at certain limits but, honourable senators, we must consider that we are taking it from the taxpayer in income tax and it is costing us at least 20 per cent to administer.

[Hon. Mr. Phillips.]

It is rather amusing to read the remarks of the Minister of National Health and Welfare in his explanation in the other place. He went to great efforts to point out that the increased family allowances would not result in an increased population explosion. He hopped all over the map, pointing out that Czechoslovakia tried this and it did not work, that British Columbia has the highest supplemental benefits and the lowest birth rate and Quebec has the second highest benefits and the second lowest birth rate in Canada. There is only one conclusion to be drawn from the minister's remarks, that family allowances are a sort of political form of contraception, which I am sure was not the intention of the government. It is not the rate of family allowance that has resulted in a decreased birth rate. There are factors that the government refuses to recognize, such as the cost of living and the cost of housing. It is not easy to provide housing for a family of nine at today's standards. The extreme cost of food and clothing must also be considered. Clothing in particular has become a very serious item in the family budget. These are the factors which must be taken into account.

One matter that irritates me greatly is the fact that this program was announced at a Dominion-Provincial Conference. We are seeing more and more of this. The federal government does not announce its programs to Parliament, but goes down to the Government Conference Centre in the old railway station, calls in its provincial counterparts and makes the announcements there. The provinces accept them. Then, because of that acceptance, Parliament is not supposed to criticize the programs. If we are proceeding on that assumption, honourable senators, why have Parliament meet? I would hope that in future some of these announcements could be made to Parliament, and discussed and debated before they are presented to the provinces.

Mr. Lalonde, in his introductory remarks, pointed out that the increased allowances should keep a number of families off the welfare rolls. This raises a very intriguing question. As you know, the allowance for welfare recipients varies from province to province. What happens if one province decides to pay $40 a month for the first child, $30 a month for the next two or three and then tells the welfare recipient that he now receives $100 income in family allowances? There is nothing in the bill to prevent this. In my opinion, the bill is deficient in this regard.

My next remark, I think, should be of interest to Senator Croll in particular. Apparently the government has announced that it is abandoning the principle of a guaranteed income; at least, that has been the statement of various ministers. Of course, that was before the O'Brien "think tank" and maybe it is now back on the agenda. If we are to introduce all these measures and assistance, however, they should be coordinated in such a manner as that recommended by the Special Senate Committee on Poverty.

Honourable senators, again I ask the government, instead of moving a little at a time, to adjust payments for this group of people to bring them up to the inflationary rate, and let us begin an assault on inflation. Let us have the government face up to its responsibilities instead of attempting by one piece of legislation to bring the poor up to a certain level. Let us deal with the problem in a very concrete manner, rather than a little at a time. The Conservative Party has supported this legislation, but not because it felt it was an answer. It is merely a need, and it is unfortunate to think that those in economic agony really need this increase. Perhaps I could suggest to the government that they begin preparing the next amendment. They are already a year behind in their cost-of-living adjustments. Start the amendment to this legislation before it receives royal assent.

Hon. Hazen Argue: Honourable senators, when Senator Langlois was speaking last evening, I intervened by asking whether or not it would be possible for provincial governments, in view of the fact that there was an increase in family allowances, to reduce the expenditures they were otherwise making on behalf of children in foster homes or of people receiving welfare.

I have read the exchange carefully. Senator Langlois may have missed my point. At all events, I should like to make it again because I consider it to be a valid one, namely, that with the increase in family allowances, provincial governments may reduce welfare payments. Because there is an increase in family allowances paid to foster parents, many provincial governments may take advantage by reducing their own payments on behalf of a child. This is a very grave danger and a real possibility in connection with payments to people on welfare. Despite a substantial and welcome increase in family allowances, provincial governments may consider that this is an opportunity for them to save on their welfare payments. In other words, what the federal government is giving with one hand, provincial governments may be taking away with the other. From statements I have read in the press, and from other information I have gathered, I am led to believe that this is likely to happen.

I would refer honourable senators to what happened a few months ago when there was a substantial increase in old age pensions. I pointed out at that time that in the case of pensioners in approved homes who were in receipt of higher pensions, provincial governments would have the amount of welfare that was paid to the homes reduced by the amount of increase that the pensioners received.

In approved homes in Saskatchewan, the so-called comfort allowance, which is for everything except room and board and clothing, amounts to the magnificent sum of $15 a month. The clothing allowance is $11. Therefore, a person in one of those homes who wishes to clothe himself receives a total cash payment, after an amount for board and room is deducted, of $26 a month.

I am sure honourable senators were shocked at the small amount being paid, and I felt that honourable senators supported my contention that there should be provision to ensure that this money was passed on to the pensioners in those homes. We received some assurance that provincial governments would look at this matter sympathetically.

Friends of mine in Saskatchewan who live in such homes report to me that they have not received a five-cent increase. They have not received a cost of living bonus. They have not received the increase in the old age pensions. All that has happened is that the provincial governments have interceded, and either the homes or the provincial treasury have taken advantage of the increase and taken the money.

I have one friend, in a home in Saskatchewan, who is physically handicapped but still energetic enough to wish to earn a little money over and above the monthly pittance of $26. He is well into his seventies but despite his advanced years has recently done odd jobs for two or three hours a day. Some years ago he sold his farm to a member of his family. He retired and wishes to earn a bit extra. But what do they say to him? They say, "We will let you keep a few dollars of this without any penalty, but we are going to take 50 per cent of those additional dollars over and above the $26 allowance."

Honourable senators, I put this forward to show how hard and cruel some provincial governments can be when it comes to dealing with people who are in a defenceless position. I suggest that if provincial governments can rob old age pensioners, the same provincial governments could take steps to rob children of their total benefits resulting from this increase in family allowances. If we are going to add $10 to family allowances, and then take $10 off somewhere else, how is that likely to be of any benefit at all?

I had the privilege a few weeks ago of visiting a mother in her home in a small town in Saskatchewan. She is on welfare and has sole responsibility for six children. Her total welfare income is $395 a month for seven people. She pays $85 a month rent for her house, and has $310 left for fuel, electricity, clothing, food, medicine, entertainment, and for the 101 items that human beings in Canada spend their money on. That is her total income.

It is my duty to stand in this place and say that it was a dreadful shame for the Saskatchewan government not to have made it crystal clear that people on social welfare would not actually receive the full increase of $60 or $70 a month provided for under the increased family allowances. For provincial governments to even consider chiseling on this proposed increase in family allowances in respect of children is a dreadful shame. This matter was raised in the other place—not in prolonged debate, but certainly it was raised and alluded to.

I am pleased that the idea I am expressing has found support from members in a number of political parties.

Jack Marshall, a Conservative member of Parliament for Newfoundland, has expressed his concern that this practice may be followed, namely, that provincial governments may use this legislation to save money themselves and to reduce welfare payments.

The NDP member of Parliament, Arnold Peters, in addition to condemning the practice and the Ontario government for not having made its own position clear, stated that Ontario is likely to use this program to reduce its expenditures. He had this to say:

> The Minister of National Health and Welfare (Hon. Mr. Lalonde) should be prepared to introduce an amendment to ensure that the Ontario minister cannot take the increased family allowance out of other welfare payments. Of course, we could increase family allowances to the point where Ontario would not have to pay anything. But, Mr. Speaker, Ontario is not a poor province; and does not have to be niggardly.

Well, in that statement he could have substituted the word Ontario for the word Saskatchewan. I would like to see an amendment placed in this legislation so as to carry out what I believe to be the intention of Parliament, namely, that the increase in family allowances should be for people on welfare and for young people in foster homes.

Senator Langlois did an excellent job in introducing this most important and far-reaching piece of legislation. He gave an interesting review. I make no apology for speaking on it, because over the years in the other place I used to introduce private members' resolutions, resolutions in my name, asking for the doubling of family allowances. That was a pretty simple thing to ask; it was not complicated. We have waited a long time but now we are being told that they are being doubled. I must say that the doubling now would no more than restore the purchasing power to the families that they had at the time many of those speeches were made.

These increases will be in themselves a welcome result, and I am sure Senator Croll is happy at this increase. It does not go far to provide the guaranteed minimum payment for which he has been campaigning so effectively. It is some more income—and more income is very important to people who have very little of it.

Last night, as reported in Hansard, page 1307, Senator Langlois said:

> Apart from increasing the income of the Canadian "working poor," the increased allowances should, to some extent, ease the pressure on provincial social assistance expenditures.

Well, if it eases the pressure it must save money, and if it saves the money then the people receiving family allowances are being chiseled and short-changed. Senator Langlois went on to say:

> The increase in the allowance should in many instances be enough to keep families off the welfare rolls.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: That is the explanation.

Hon. Mr. Argue: That statement is correct if you apply it to a person who has great pride and does not wish to go on the welfare roll—there are thousands of people like that—and uses this increase as a means of convincing himself that he does not need to apply. But if it really means that all provincial governments will be doing is keeping people off welfare rolls because now they have a larger income and therefore will not qualify, then I would think this legislation is defeating the purpose for which Parliament at any rate, would like to see it used.

If someone robs poor people, if someone takes away their subsistence, if someone takes the increase in the old age pension that should go to them, it is hard to get any publicity on that point, it is hard to make people listen, If somebody robs a bank he might go to jail for a few years, but if a government robs the poor it is hard to get publicity exposing what the government is in fact doing.

Honourable senators, even though it is late in the session and even though the press never mentioned that the Senate also would have to deal with family allowances when the bill was passed in the House of Commons—nonetheless, I think the Senate should deal with the point I have raised. I would ask that this bill, as is normal practice, be referred to our Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science and that the Honourable Marc Lalonde, Minister of National Health and Welfare, be called so that we can raise this point with him. It would be my hope and intention to have placed before that committee an amendment that would, I trust, achieve this purpose if acted upon. I am not too optimistic about the Senate's accepting amendments even though they may be important ones, but I am still not discouraged from suggesting amendments I feel should be adopted. I am still not discouraged from asking the Senate to consider them.

I hope that a few months from now I will not be able to rise in the Senate and say "I told you so. See what the provincial governments are doing." We should take every precaution to make certain that the increase in family allowances, designed to improve the living standard of the poor, does not find its way into provincial coffers or into other hands.

Hon. Leopold Langlois: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: I must inform the Senate that if the Honourable Senator Langlois speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for second reading of this bill.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Honourable senators, I wish to thank those who have taken part in this debate, and I shall endeavour to be brief in my remarks on what has been said by my colleagues.

I refer first to the remark made this afternoon by Senator Phillips. I must say, if I understood him correctly, that I think he made a very slight mistake when he mentioned—and I do not want to put words into his mouth—that the average of $20 a month could be varied by the province. This is not what the bill says. The average of $20 per child is the maximum average, and cannot be changed. What can be changed is the rate paid to any individual child depending on the size of the family and the age of the recipient, and provided the minimum paid to any individual child is not lower than 60 per cent of $20, or $12. This is the minimum average. Outside of that, no variations whatsoever can be made by any provincial legislature to the legislation which is proposed now.

Senator Phillips also made reference to the cost of living. If I understood him correctly, he suggested we should make haste to bring in legislation, even before this bill receives royal assent, in order to keep up with the ever increasing cost of living. Senator Phillips forgets that this legislation, now being considered, provides for an increase of the payments herein in accordance with the cost of living. As I explained yesterday, this can be done by order in council subject to the approval of Parliament through a resolution.

Hon. Mr. Croll: On a quarterly basis.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: On a quarterly basis, as Senator Croll adds. This is correct.

Senator Phillips also spoke of the cost of administration of this program, and added that it would be a nightmare to administer it. When the President of the Privy Council was before our National Finance Committee I asked him a few questions as to whether this was correct. I can assure the house that the minister then had no worries at all about the cost of instituting this new program. He said that quite a lot of the information necessary to apply these varied rates provided in the law is available now. Senators should not forget that the family allowance scheme has always been based on age groups, and it is necessary for the department to have up-to-date information as to the ages of recipients. I even asked the minister, when he was before the committee, whether the administration of this new program will cause any big increase in the number of personnel now employed under the present system, and his answer was no. I do not think we need to be unduly concerned about this forecast of increased cost, or even about the "nightmare" of administering this new program.

● (1450)

As for the taxation of family allowances, I am inclined to believe that Senator Phillips forgot what I said last night when I mentioned that this special allowance paid in regard to children in foster homes, provincial institutions or private institutions, as approved by provincial governments, will not be taxable for the good reason that the foster parents, or the institutions for that matter, cannot claim the recipient as a dependant. This is the reason why in the case of the special allowance there is no taxation of that allowance.

Apparently Senator Phillips missed that point last night. I cannot blame him for that, however, because my statement was quite long. I would not blame anyone for not listening to it very closely.

The last remark made by Senator Phillips on which I must comment is that this new scheme of family allowances should first have been put before the Houses of Parliament before it was considered by the conference of provincial welfare ministers. As I said last night, this new family allowance scheme—

Hon. Mr. Choquette: I believe Senator Thompson wishes to ask you a question.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Excuse me, senator. I did not hear you.

Hon. Mr. Thompson: Just for clarification, Senator Langlois, did you say that a foster child is not a dependant?

Hon. Mr. Langlois: I said that a foster child cannot be claimed as a dependant under the Income Tax Act.

Hon. Mr. McDonald: An institution cannot claim such a child under the act.

Hon. Mr. Thompson: Do you say that a family that fosters a child cannot claim him or her under the act?

Hon. Mr. Langlois: I am saying that such a child does not fall within the definition of "dependent child" in the Income Tax Act. In other words, foster parents or provincial and private institutions cannot claim the recipient as a dependant. What I have said applies to both foster parents and provincial or private institutions taking care of children in receipt of family allowances.

I should like to return now to Senator Phillips' suggestion that this scheme should have been submitted first to the Houses of Parliament before it was ever discussed at the conference of provincial welfare ministers. With respect to that suggestion I must state, as I stated last night, that this whole new scheme of family allowances was contained in the Working Paper on Social Security which was tabled in Parliament on April 18 and that, therefore, the scheme was submitted to the attention and to the knowledge of those in Parliament who are interested in this kind of legislation.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: There is a difference between a working paper and legislation.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: But how could we have legislation before there was an agreement with the provinces? This is a joint scheme which will be worked through concurrent legislation—legislation passed in the legislatures of the provinces and in this Parliament.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: But you do not have agreement with all the provinces yet.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Two provinces have agreed to vary the rates. The others have not committed themselves yet, so far as I am concerned. Only Alberta and Quebec have agreed to vary the rates.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: You still have not given a reason why it could not have been given to Parliament first.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: I can merely point out the fact that the scheme was made known to Parliament before it was discussed at the conference of provincial welfare ministers. That is the only comment I wish to make in this respect.

Coming now to the remarks of Senator Argue, who repeated in part what he said last night during the course of my statement, I believe I understood correctly last night that his intention was, as it is today, to propose an amendment to the bill presently before us in order to curb, in some way, the legislative authority of the provincial legislatures.

Of course, provincial legislatures can legislate in respect of their security programs and amend them as they wish. I do not see what an amendment to this legislation could do towards preventing provincial legislatures from doing that. Provincial legislatures are autonomous in their right and their power to legislate in spheres within their jurisdictions.

As I said last night in reply to the questions put to me by the honourable senator, clause 9, which he himself partly quoted, is quite sufficient to guarantee that the allowances which are provided for in this act will go to the benefit of the children. I refer this house again to clause 9(2) of the bill which reads as follows:

> A special allowance shall be applied exclusively toward the care, maintenance, education, training or advancement of the child in respect of whom it is paid.

A further guarantee to that effect is contained in clause 10(1), as follows:

> A special allowance is not payable in respect of a child for any month unless
> (a) an application therefor has been made in prescribed manner by the department, agency or institution that maintains the child; and
> (b) payment of the allowance has been approved under this Act.

That is why I said last night that the minister had control. He can turn down an application, or he can accept the application. The minister has the perfect right to supervise the spending of the money, and, if the allowance does not go as prescribed by clause 9 towards the care, maintenance, education, training or advancement of the child, the minister can stop the payments at any time.

I think that is a sufficient safeguard, and that the amendment suggested by my good friend is unnecessary. In any event, I am afraid that his amendment would be ultra vires of the authority of this Parliament which cannot curb or limit in any way, shape or form, the legislative authority of any province. My friend cannot expect me to use the words that he used like "rob the children," but I do not think that any government of any province wishes to do that.

Hon. Mr. Argue: Some of them have already said they are going to.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Oh, no. Which province said that?

Hon. Mr. Croll: No.

Hon. Mr. Argue: Ontario said they were considering it. As I read the newspapers, Mr. Brunelle said that they were not prepared to say they would add this amount to the existing social welfare payments.

Hon. Mr. Croll: Let us be quite fair about this. I raised the matter here last night. The Minister of Health and Welfare for Ontario said that they would reduce the welfare payments to those people who were drawing increased family allowances. He said that on Monday. On Tuesday he ate his words. The government ate those words, and tried to hide from the statement that was made. They completely repudiated that statement. It certainly does not hold in Ontario.

Hon. Mr. Argue: I am pleased to hear that. I was in the library this morning, but I did not see that particular item. If they have done that, great! So far as I know, Saskatchewan has not yet eaten its words. I do not know about the other provinces, but let us hope they are all eating their words, if they are making statements like that, and let us hope that the money does go as an additional income. But, as I suggested to Senator Langlois, it is quite within the Constitution for the Parliament of Canada to attach certain conditions governing money which the federal government pays out to the provinces.

[Hon. Mr. Langlois.]

Hon. Mr. Langlois: First, I must say that I am amazed to hear that my good friend relies on the press to interpret what was said inside or outside another legislature by anyone. He has been long enough in politics—

Hon. Mr. Argue: What do you read?

Hon. Mr. Langlois: —to have learned not to depend too much on the accuracy of press reports.

Hon. Mr. Argue: Senator Croll is relying on the accuracy of some other press reports, so who is right? I take Senator Croll's reports as being accurate.

Hon. Mr. Croll: I am not relying on press reports, although the reports were there. When I saw this I got in touch with the people concerned to ask if it was possibly true. It was true for about an hour.

Hon. Mr. Argue: It is true that they said it once, and corrected it by saying something else later.

Hon. Mr. Croll: By repudiating it.

Hon. Mr. Argue: All right, the press was right on both counts. It was accurate reporting in both instances.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: I have not read in the newspapers that any provincial government said it was its intention to rob any of the children of this country.

Hon. Mr. Argue: They would not say that; they would just take it.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: As I said, the wording of the two sections I have quoted is clear enough to guarantee the result which seems to be sought by my honourable friend, and I repeat that it would be a curb or limitation on the legislative authority of provincial governments to use the wording he has suggested in amendment.

Before I resume my seat I wish also to comment on the reference my learned friend—my honourable friend—made to my remarks last night.

Hon. Mr. Argue: You slipped that "learned" in.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Yes, it is a habit in the courts to style our opponents as our learned friends, rather than our honourable friends as in this place.

Senator Argue read from page 1307 of yesterday's Debates of the Senate part of my statement, and if I am permitted I will put the full statement on the record. I said:

> Apart from increasing the income of the Canadian "working poor", the increased allowances should, to some extent, ease the pressure on provincial social assistance expenditures. The increase in the allowance should in many instances be enough to keep families off the welfare rolls.

That is not robbing the children.

> Moreover, a tax recovery, as I have said, of $115 million will be realized by the provinces through tax-sharing arrangements. It is hoped that these tax recoveries will be used by the provinces to ease the burden of their social welfare costs.

That is all I said, and it is clear enough. The minister made the same statement in the other place, and I do not see how my good friend can quarrel with this.

Again before resuming my seat I would like to make a correction to a statement which I was induced to make a few moments ago to Senator Croll, when he suggested that the indexing of the allowance will be made on a quarterly basis. We were both wrong. I said yes, but was taken by surprise, and I am now reliably informed that this is done on an annual basis and will commence in 1975, based on the change in the Consumer Price Index.

With this I close my remarks on second reading.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Langlois: With leave, now.

Hon. Mr. Argue: No, honourable senators. It was my hope that this bill would be referred to a committee.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: The bill has now been read the second time.

Hon. Mr. Argue: Yes, I realize that. I made a suggestion but the sponsor does not agree with it, otherwise he would have moved that the bill be referred to a committee. That is all right, but I do not think we need to hurry to third reading today. I have further remarks to make on third reading, and would like to give consideration to them. I ask that third reading be given at the next sitting.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Could you not agree to third reading now?

Hon. Mr. Argue: No, I would like it to take place at the next sitting of the house.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: We can still have royal assent tomorrow.

Hon. Mr. Langlois moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

Motion agreed to.

The Senate resumed from yesterday the adjourned debate on the motion of Senator Stanbury for second reading of Bill C-135, to provide additional financing mechanisms and institutions for the residential mortgage market in Canada.

Hon. Rhéal Bélisle: Honourable senators, I should like to begin my remarks by congratulating the Honourable Senator Stanbury on his detailed presentation of Bill C-135. He did a wonderful job in trying to convince us of the necessity of supporting this bill. It is obvious to me that, as a former President of the Liberal Party of Canada, he had a great platform and he enriched himself very much by it. Let me put the government at ease. We plan to support this bill. There is no guarantee that this measure will serve to reduce mortgage rates, but it does offer some reason for hope in this regard. The bill seeks to stimulate the flow of private mortgage funds for housing. This increased mobility, or liquidity of mortgage moneys, will mean greater availability and hence more competition. As those of us know who have not closed our minds to the virtue of the market economy, added availability and competition will likely serve to drive down the rates of mortgage money.

The bill is intended to create institutions which will operate competitively on the private market and prompt a greater degree of private investment in mortgages and real estate. These institutions will simply make it easier for a number of investors, large and small, corporate and otherwise, to invest with greater facility and security in the area of mortgages and real estate.

A provision for a tax benefit is also contained in the bill. The mortgage investment corporations provided for in the bill will be allowed to pass the income received from their portfolio directly to their shareholders, either as an interest taxable dividend or a capital gains dividend. This represents the end of double taxation in this area. The principle of conduit taxation is being paid tribute to, and any day on which taxation can be reduced in any way has to be a happy day. In the past in other areas of corporate endeavour the corporation first paid a corporate tax of 50 per cent. When they made their distribution to investors, the investors paid a further income tax. As a result of the pass-through provision contained in this bill the corporation now will not pay a corporate tax, payment of tax being made only upon distribution. The investor, upon distribution of profits to him, if the distribution is made within 90 days of the company's year end, will pay an income tax on the amount distributed to him. If the company distributes profits later than 90 days after its year's end, there will be a corporate tax. But the dividend that the investor receives will be treated as a capital gains dividend and will be subject to taxation on the basis of the capital gain rather than on the basis of a regular dividend. This means that it will be taxed at a significantly reduced rate.

The government is convinced that such tax benefits will serve to entice Canadians into investing in the purchase of mortgages. It is unfortunate that the government cannot convince itself that the same principle might work equally well in other areas. Some of us have been convinced of that for years. We feel certain that the general application of this principle would constitute the best shot of adrenalin our economy has ever been administered. The government seems to have recognized in this instance that the removal of oppressive taxation will act as a stimulant. Why could not this be the case generally?

It is to be hoped that they will experiment with this principle in other areas. The principle of the bill is good. It deserves our full support. The idea is to make more mortgage money available for residential housing and, from the way it is structured, I think it will achieve that end.

The mechanism is created to provide for the accumulation of money to be loaned out for the purchase of houses. Interest will be charged on those loans, and in part this will represent the profit of those firms. Interest rates will be determined by the market. The most important aspect is that profits will not be taxed twice. If they are, it will be at a reduced rate.

I see nothing wrong with the bill as far as it goes. I support it, and I hope the government will adopt the principle in other areas.

On motion of Senator Phillips, debate adjourned.

PAROLE ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

On the Order:

Second reading of the Bill C-191, intituled: "An Act to amend the Parole Act".—(Honourable Senator Langlois).

Hon. H. Carl Goldenberg: Honourable senators, I move second reading of this bill.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Honourable senators, I have no particular objection. If honourable senators will recall, we had a little scrap yesterday. I was going to be on first, but here I am taking a back seat to everyone. So go ahead, Senator Goldenberg. I wanted to show the house how magnanimous I am.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: I said that there would be no objection to doing that.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, it is moved by the Honourable Senator Goldenberg, seconded by the Honourable Senator Carter, that this bill be read a second time. Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Mr. Goldenberg: Honourable senators, this is a very simple and short measure.

Under the legislation as it stands, there is provision for from three to nine members to be appointed to the National Parole Board for a period of up to 10 years. There are now nine members of the board. The legislation before us proposes the appointment of a maximum of 10 additional members for periods of up to five years. In other words, the present members have been appointed for 10 years. The new members, to be called ad hoc members, will be appointed for periods of up to five years.

They will be full-time members of the board. They are not temporary members. They will serve for shorter periods. That is the difference between the additional members now proposed and those who are presently on the board.

The reasons for the increase in membership are clear. The National Parole Board faces a great backlog of cases, and because of this backlog the board had to change a policy which it had been pursuing for some time, namely, of sitting in panels of two and hearing inmates who were applying for parole. That is the only fair practice. A man whose liberty is affected is entitled to be present when his case is heard. This practice has been discontinued because of the great volume of work undertaken by the board.

Another reason for increasing the membership of the board is to effect a change in practice with respect to temporary absences. Parole is granted by the National Parole Board. Temporary absences are granted under the Penitentiary Act by the director of an institution or the Commissioner of Penitentiaries. The temporary absences in certain cases were granted, as we now call it, back to back; in other words, successive temporary absences.

It is questionable whether this is permissible under the legislation, and therefore the practice of back to back temporary absences was discontinued. It is replaced by the use of day parole or temporary parole. Day parole and temporary parole can only be granted by the National Parole Board. This is another reason for the enormous increase in the volume of work by the board.

The third reason for the appointment of additional members is that it will make possible the regionalization of the board's services. At present the services are highly centralized. They are centralized in Ottawa. The Hugessen report, a report on parole made earlier this year, pointed out that the present National Parole Board suffers from excessive centralization. The same evidence has come from all parties who have presented briefs to our committee which is studying the parole system.

With the addition of 10 members, it is proposed to regionalize the work of the board. Two members will be sitting as a panel in each of the five regions of Canada: British Columbia, the Prairies, Ontario, Quebec, and the Atlantic provinces. In this way the inmates will again be heard when their parole applications are heard. In other words, panel hearings will be reintroduced.

That is all that the legislation involves—namely, the appointment of up to 10 additional members. It is hoped—and this, by the way, is one of the reasons for the shorter term—to be able to interest people such as judges, police officers and provincial government officials to receive temporary leave of absence from their duties in order to work with the Parole Board for a period of two, three, four or five years. This would make possible closer liaison with the bench and police services.

I conclude by pointing out that there is no intent in this measure of reforming the parole system. Consideration of parole reform is under way. The government, as the Solicitor General made clear in presenting this legislation in the other place, is now studying a report presented by a committee under the chairmanship of Acting Chief Justice Hugessen of the Quebec Superior Court, and is awaiting the report of the Senate committee and of a House of Commons committee which has also been studying certain aspects of the problem.

Reform will come in due course but there is no doubt that the present situation calls for an increase in the membership of the board in order that the work of parole be properly done.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Honourable senators, I propose to move the adjournment of this debate. I am ready with my remarks now, but I would not think of inflicting two speeches on this chamber on the same day.

Hon. John M. Macdonald: Honourable senators, I should like to add a few words regarding this bill. I notice the sponsor mentioned what the minister said before the House of Commons committee, that he hoped to appoint judges or police officers or civil servants to the Parole Board. I think that is utterly wrong.

Hon. Mr. Croll: Terrible.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I see no reason for appointing judges, police officers, or civil servants to this board. Their functions are wholly different. In fact, I would say the last person anyone should appoint to the Parole Board would be a judge. I may be quite wrong. Perhaps the last person should be a police officer. His function is to investigate crime, getting a conviction if he can. The judge proceeds to sentence a prisoner and then his function ends and the Parole Board takes over. The functions are different and let us keep them different. Let the judges stick to their judging and the policemen stick to their police work. Let the Parole Board do its job. Personally, I feel that the members of the Parole Board are doing a good job now.

Hon. Mr. Goldenberg: Honourable senators, may I say to Senator Macdonald that I was not expressing my approval of what was said. I merely said that this is what the Solicitor General recommended. Personally, I agree with what Senator Macdonald has said about the appointments to the board.

On motion of Senator Choquette, debate adjourned.

PROTECTION OF PRIVACY BILL

BILL TO AMEND CERTAIN ACTS—SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from Friday, December 7, the adjourned debate on the motion of Senator Lang for the second reading of Bill C-176, to amend the Criminal Code, the Crown Liability Act and the Official Secrets Act.

Hon. Lionel Choquette: Honourable senators, in rising to speak in this debate, I should like to congratulate Senator Lang on his moderation in moving the second reading of this bill. As he said, none of us wants to live in a world of bugging, snooping and wiretapping, which has the smell of a police state. On the other hand, none of us wants to hamper the work of our police forces, and other officials charged with the protection of society, by denying them the use of this technological gadgetry. As Senator Lang has said, the bill tries to maintain a balance between those two concerns.

For my own part, I suppose I am basically a "law and order" man. I believe that the alternative to order in society is anarchy. In the words of Gilbert and Sullivan, we must at all times "make the punishment fit the crime."

Like Senator Molson, I am concerned about a comparatively new phenomenon, "organized crime," a sophisticated type of crime which affects principally our large metropolitan areas, and which requires sophisticated techniques favourable to the prosecution. Ordinary law-abiding citizens going about their business have little to fear from this legislation. We are not talking about crime in Stittsville or Medicine Hat or even in Come-By-Chance; we are speaking of large organized syndicates in cities like Montreal, Toronto, Winnipeg and Vancouver. We must root out this type of crime by the best means at our disposal in order to protect our society.

The bill, as we have it before us now, is much better than the original version. It underwent significant changes as it proceeded through the other place.

The term "offence" has been more specifically and narrowly defined. The government accepted the principle that emergency interceptions would always have to be subject to judicial approval. The number and type of offences for which legal authorization to intercept could be obtained was severely restricted. The provision allowing for unsupervised 36-hour emergency permits for electronic eavesdropping was amended. Judicial approval is now to be required in all instances.

But let no one get the impression that this bill provides any thorough and comprehensive protection of privacy. No protection is offered in this bill against visual invasion of privacy, such as the taking of unauthorized photographs of people. No protection is offered against the unauthorized taping of conversations where only one of the parties is aware of the taping. No protection is offered against the invasion of privacy represented by the computer and the facility it affords for the accumulation of information on people.

Honourable senators, the bill is not perfect but it is a start. Those of us who are concerned about privacy worried about the lack of protection that existed. There was no law to prohibit wiretapping, and no law to prevent the purchase, sale or possession of electronic eavesdropping equipment. There was no law to prevent the disclosure of information obtained from unlawful electronic eavesdropping. Now we have a law. Now the primacy of the judiciary in protecting the rights of people in the area of personal privacy has been recognized by the government. That is extremely important.

The bill is not perfect, but it is a start; it is a step in the right direction. It strikes a proper balance. We are providing for the protection of personal privacy while at the same time not going too far in restricting law enforcement agencies, those responsible for the protection of our system, in the prosecution of their duties.

At least as I read it now, it does not appear to me that this bill severely handicaps our law enforcement agencies. I only hope I am right, and that time does not show that we have gone too far along these lines.

Honourable senators, I think this bill should be sent to committee. Some senators might have suggestions as to how it might be improved even further. If someone can muster the patience, he might try to convince the minister to have the bill translated from legalese into English. The drafting is frightful. I do not know whether all honourable senators have read this, but it is not even grammatical in parts. Sentences are too long, and cannot be read in one breath. There is nothing clear about many of them. Cannot anyone write plain, grammatically correct English any more?

Let me take page 3 of the bill. Here we find a mistake which is made repeatedly in editorials, in Hansard, everywhere—a very simple one. On page 3, there is this:

> (b) a person who intercepts a private communication in accordance with an authorization or any person who in good faith aids in any way a person whom he has reasonable and probable grounds to believe is acting with any such authorization;

What is "whom" doing there? The pronoun "who" is the subject of "is acting."

Some people continue on indefinitely like that, and these mistakes go on unnoticed and uncorrected. I find another at page 10, and there are others that I could indicate. However, I am going to deal with the translation of the last paragraph on page 10, subclause (5), which reads as follows:

● (1530)

> Any information obtained by an interception that, but for the interception would have been privileged, remains privileged and inadmissible as evidence without the consent of the person enjoying the privilege.

That is clear enough. There are 30 words in that short paragraph in the English version. In the French version, which is so obscure that you cannot understand one word of it, there are 40 words.

Privileged conversations exist, and are well known to many people. Even the ordinary layman knows that there is a privileged conversation between the solicitor and his client, in either his office or a prison cell. Another occasion of a privileged conversation is that between a doctor and his patient, or between a confessor and a penitent. Now, that privilege exists in the French language and it exists in the French legal phraseology, but in this whole paragraph of 40 words, as opposed to 30 in the English text, the word "privileged" does not appear once. On the contrary, there is a bunch of words which do not convey the idea of a privileged conversation.

I do not know who drafted these translations, who supervises the drafting of them or who edits them, but they should be gone over carefully, and the grammar and phraseology should be corrected.

Honourable senators, I propose to vote for the second reading of this bill with one reservation. I hope we have not gone too far in restricting the law enforcement agencies, those responsible for the protection of our system, in the prosecution of their duties. I agree that this bill should go to committee, and I think we should be vigilant to see to it that we continue to live under the rule of law and not under the rule of a criminal elite anywhere in this country.

Hon. Chesley W. Carter: Honourable senators, before this bill is given second reading I should like to say one or two words, and I shall be very brief because my remarks are directed to the notification clause, the proposed new section 178.23 of the Criminal Code, which is on page 18, and specifically to the new section 178.13(2)(e) on page 5.

Senator Lang, when he introduced this bill, stated that it was an effort to try to balance the rights of the individual to privacy, on the one hand, against the protection of the state and the security of law and order, on the other. He described the protection of the state and the security of law and order as being of "paramount interest." I direct your attention to these two clauses because I believe they tip the scales against the security of law and order.

Authorization to use bugging devices must be obtained from a judge, and under section 178.13 (2)(e) that authorization is limited to a period not exceeding 30 days. When the 30 days are up, the police may then go back to the judge again, and secure a further authorization for another 30 days. So far as I know there is no limitation in the bill on the number of 30-day periods which can be authorized, but one must assume that a judge will get tired of repeating and renewing that type of authorization. Moreover, bearing in mind that many investigations on the part of the police, particularly the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, extend over a period of years—sometimes two and three years—it is easy to see that that particular section is a considerable handicap.

A much greater handicap, however, to my mind, is included in the notification section, 178.23 on page 18, which states that within 90 days of the ending of the authorization period the Solicitor General of Canada or the provincial Attorney General, whichever is the proper authority, must advise the person in writing that he has been bugged.

Senator Choquette has just referred to the situation in Canada where we have a considerable problem now in dealing with organized crime. This particular clause, in my opinion, tips the scales in favour of organized crime, and it tips the scales particularly when the police are trying to discover the kingpin of the organization. That person often is not very obvious. He is not down on the street corner pushing drugs, or doing things like that. He is probably living in a penthouse in very respectable surroundings. It is not going to be easy to smoke that type of person out.

I submit that this particular clause requiring the 90-day notification is going to make it impossible for the RCMP ever to get at the big fellows in organized crime, particularly those in the drug traffic. I know that some people will point out that a subclause of this clause also allows a judge, after the 90-day period has expired, to defer notification for another period of time, but that does not belie the fact that at some point in time the person who is bugged has to be notified.

I should like to point out that when the police are after the big fish they very often have to depend on their contacts in other countries, such as Interpol and other police organizations. Involved in that procedure is what one could call a type of conspiracy, because the police are dependent upon tips.

Now, it does not matter how long it is after the authorization period before the person has to be notified. The important point is that at some point in time he does have to be notified, and once he is notified he then knows that somebody in his organization has squealed on him, and you do not have to stretch your imagination very much to realize what is going to happen to that person who squealed. He will be hunted down, and his life is in jeopardy. So the effect of this clause will be a drying up of the supply of tips to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. It is going to make the world a much safer place for the kingpins of organized crime.

Perhaps it could be argued that this bill should be passed now, even with this clause in it, and that we should hope that at some future date it will be brought back again for amendment. I submit that the Senate should not proceed on that basis. If we do, I think we will be lowering the dignity of the Senate as a body, and rendering a disservice to the people of Canada, who depend on the Senate to exercise its proper function when legislation of this nature comes before it.

I am aware of the fact that the government tried to remove this clause—the notification clause—in committee and again in the house. The government does not want it in. However, for some reason or another, they were unsuccessful, and I believe they were unsuccessful because the impact of this clause was not properly explained to, and not fully understood by, the members of the other place when they voted on it. I am pleased that this bill is going to a Senate committee, because I cannot bring myself to believe, if the members of the other place really understood what the effect of this clause is going to be, that they would have insisted on keeping it there.

This Senate committee will be our last chance to get all the facts—to get as much evidence as possible with respect to the impact that this bill will have on police action. I understand that representatives of police associations are going to appear before the committee, and I hope that the RCMP also will be called, because the RCMP have detachments across Canada and can give a balanced view of the impact of this bill across the country. At the same time, they can explain to the committee what impact this is going to have on their relationships with international police forces.

In conclusion I should like to read an editorial which appeared in the Ottawa Journal last Thursday, and which, in my opinion, sums up the whole case in a nutshell. The beginning of the editorial emphasizes that this bill is a good measure, and states:

> —it remains, a measure designed to outlaw all private wiretapping and even the possession of wiretapping equipment by everyone except authorized police officers. It makes it possible for victims of wiretapping to seek punitive and civil damages. Violators of privacy will, for the first time, be subject to a penalty—up to five years in jail.

The editorial continues, and in the final paragraph states:

> The amendent—

That is, the particular one I am addressing myself to, the notification clause.

> —that would compel the police to inform anyone put under electronic surveillance of that fact is largely window dressing which the Senate, in its deliberations over the legislation, should try to remove. It is at best silly, at worst damaging to the confidentiality and security of police work.
> Police officers undertake many investigations which do not lead to charges. What is to be gained by someone being notified after the fact that, pursuant to a court order, his telephone had been bugged? Nothing except ulcers or a nervous breakdown. The courts can't be sued. The wiretap has taken place and it can't be undone. The disclosure requirement will be no deterrent.

So, honourable senators, since this particular clause can do nobody any good, and can certainly result in a lot of harm, I hope that it will be removed.

Hon. M. Grattan O'Leary: Honourable senators, I had decided yesterday to permit my distinguished legal colleague to say the things that I intended to say, because surely he could say them better, and I had decided to say nothing at all. There is, however, one clause in this bill which I think, honestly, should be removed if we are going to talk about stopping wiretapping. I refer to the new section 178.16(2) which starts on page 9, and which actually permits a judge to receive illegal wiretapping evidence in court as evidence. I say, if we permit that—if we permit wiretapping evidence to be used by a judge in court to convict a man—then we are permitting a monstrous apostasy of true justice.

My friend, Senator Choquette, spoke of the drafting of this bill. When I tried to go through it yesterday I could not help thinking of the Czar of Russia who while visiting Paris many years ago was asked how many lawyers there were in Russia. He said that there were only four, and that he was going back home to have three of them shot. I am certain that if he had had a lawyer in Russia who drafted and presented him with a bill such as this, he would be perfectly justified.

It is not only that the English is bad, but the sentences are unbelievable, as Senator Choquette has said. If you can only get lawyers—and I presume this bill was written by lawyers—who give too much thought to Blackstone and too little to Fowler's Modern English Usage, there must surely be someone in the vicinity who can put this into plain English. Some of the sentences are unbelievable. They make no sense, and are certainly on very dubious grammatical grounds.

However, what I am concerned with is this particular clause. It says that if a judge has before him wiretapping evidence presented by a police officer, and if he should decide in his own mind that an obviously guilty person might go free if this evidence is not used, then he may make it admissible—that is, evidence illegally obtained by wiretapping. In other words, if this evidence, even though it be obtained by bugging, by illegal wiretapping, should be presented, he still would be able to say, under this bill, that it should be accepted by him as admissible evidence, and used to condemn the man.

I say, honourable senators, that that is a monstrous apostasy of true justice. If we in Canada, who over the past two or three months have been professing horror at some of the things we have heard about Watergate, permit that clause to appear on the statute books, all I can say is that our professions of horror about Watergate are nothing but pure and sanctimonious humbug. I doubt if there is anything of this sort on any statute book of the world today.

Incidentally, we speak of this protection of privacy, but any child reading this bill, and knowing what conditions are in Canada on this continent and all over the world today, would know perfectly well there is little protection of privacy for the average citizen. I can name scores of cases in which this bill provides no protection of privacy whatsoever. It is true that it is a step in the right direction, but it is certainly a short and a feeble step.

I repeat, I will not stand in this house and accept a vote for this clause. I will say, "No, on division," if the bill contains that clause. I know what they tell us. They say such things as, "This bill was worse than it is now when it first appeared." Well, if it was worse than it is now, it must have been an awful mess. That is all I can say about it. However, I know what is said. I have talked to people and they say, "Look, all this is being done for your own protection; it is all being done for the good of society." When I heard this so often during the past week I checked to see what Justice Brandeis said in connection with the very same point. Justice Brandeis, who perhaps next to Justice Marshall and Justice Holmes was the most famous and distinguised of all the jurists in American history, warned against this very situation. He said:

> Experience should teach us to be most on our guard to protect liberty when the Government's purposes are beneficent. Men born to freedom are naturally alert to repel invasions of their liberty by evil-minded rulers. The greatest dangers to liberty lurk in insidious encroachments by men of zeal, well-meaning but without understanding.

That is true. The do-gooders who want to save us from ourselves are those who all through history have imposed tyranny upon others. I have no doubt at all that the gentlemen in the Kremlin who issue their edicts and decrees believe they are doing it for the good of the Russian people. I have no doubt that when Mr. Hitler used the Gestapo, SS brigades and so on he thought he was doing it for the good of the German people. These are developments against which we must be alert to protect ourselves. We must protect ourselves against do-gooders who want to regulate and conduct our lives. There is too much of that sort of thing contained in this bill.

I will not stand in the Senate, nor will I sit in the Senate, and accept, even by inference, by implication, that this bill should be placed on the statute books of Canada as it is. In my opinion it should be referred to the appropriate committee, and have removed from it this stigma upon true justice, human liberty and human life.

Hon. Ernest C. Manning: Honourable senators, my comments on this bill will be very brief. I do wish, however, to add my endorsation to the points raised by Senator Choquette and Senator Carter. This is one occasion on which I regretfully find I cannot agree with the conclusions expressed by our distinguished colleague, Senator O'Leary.

It seems to me more and more in this age, when organized crime is becoming such a grave concern in this country and in others, that our laws so often in our endeavours to protect the rights of individual citizens are making it increasingly difficult for those charged with law enforcement to effectively control the rapid increase in crime. We must remember that criminals do not play by decent rules. When we provide legislation that safeguards the rights of law-abiding citizens, something with which we certainly all agree and endorse, we must realize that in so doing it is almost inevitable that we create situations of which those who do not respect the law, or the rights and privacy of other citizens, can readily take advantage to accomplish their illegal ends. I hope this bill will be referred to committee and strengthened on the side of those charged with the responsibility of law enforcement.

With regard to the point raised by Senator O'Leary, the admissibility of evidence obtained by wiretapping, in my judgment the important aspect of evidence is whether it is factual. If we can bring into court evidence that is factual and bears on the judgment which must be made by the court, surely that is the important thing. Whether that evidence was obtained by one method or another is not the important thing. That is incidental, and every time we put an obstacle in the way of obtaining evidence by law enforcement officers we reduce the possibility of securing all the evidence that could be available to enable a court to make a just decision when dealing with those who violate the law.

I therefore reiterate my hope that when this bill is in committee it will be strengthened by dealing particularly with those objectionable clauses which were mentioned by Senator Carter. It should also be amended to whatever degree is necessary to put in the hands of our law enforcement officers the tools they must have if we are to hold them responsible to deal effectively with the increasing crime and lawlessness which exists today in this country.

Hon. John. M. Macdonald: Honourable senators, I find I must violently disagree with the views just expressed by Senator Manning as to the admissibility of evidence. I wholly agree with the views expressed by Senator O'Leary.

The new section 178.16(2) provides the right of a judge to admit evidence which was illegally obtained. In the first place, there is no need to obtain that evidence illegally. The bill sets out the legal methods by which to obtain it by wiretapping. To my mind there is not one bit of difference between a judge being authorized to admit evidence that was illegally obtained by wiretapping, and being authorized to admit evidence illegally obtained in any other way.

We have done away with the third degree, and no longer allow evidence to be beaten out of suspects. There is no difference in principle. The end does not justify the means, and I say it is wholly wrong that evidence which is illegally obtained be allowed in a court. One illegality does not excuse another. I would hope, therefore, that that section will be done away with.

So far as the remarks of Senator Carter are concerned, I concede they have some merit. Why notify a person three months afterwards that his telephone has been tapped? That does not make sense, in my opinion.

However, I wish to emphasize that I wholly disagree with the remarks made by Senator Manning.

Hon. Mr. Manning: Honourable senators, may I correct an erroneous impression I may have left, judging from the statements just made. I would not advocate for one moment the acceptance of evidence obtained illegally. My point was that we ought to amend our legislation so that this avenue of obtaining evidence will not be illegal. In my opinion, our error is in declaring illegal a source of evidence which could in many cases lead to lawbreakers being brought to justice.

● (1600)

Hon. Donald Cameron: Honourable senators, I want to make just a brief comment with respect to this particular section 178.16(2). I find myself in complete agreement with both Senator O'Leary and Senator Macdonald, and in disagreement with my friend, Senator Manning, although I can appreciate his position as a former attorney general of the Province of Alberta. It seems to me that there are other ways of obtaining this information. If we must resort to this means of obtaining evidence, then, as Senator O'Leary and Senator Macdonald have said, we are opening up one of the most dangerous threats to privacy I have seen in a long time.

For that reason, I hope this bill will be referred to committee, and that this clause will be either struck out entirely or amended to remove this defect.

Hon. Edward M. Lawson: Honourable senators, I have two brief comments to make with respect to this legislation. First of all, I agree with the remarks of Senator Carter and his concern that the individual who has been bugged would be informed by the police agency concerned. I also share his view that this bill should go to committee, and that responsible members of the RCMP be called to explain to the committee the risks which may be involved to law enforcement that may result from this particular clause, because it may even include making known the methods and the individuals who use them.

Also, I want to associate myself totally with the remarks of Senator O'Leary. I have some personal knowledge of a case in the United States which involved evidence obtained as a result of bugging. That case was prosecuted and a conviction obtained as a result of wiretap evidence. An agent was used by the government to obtain this evidence. I am sure everyone believed it was the purest form of evidence, and that all persons connected with that prosecution were pure of heart, including the agent. However, a year or two later the agent who acted for the government in that case was convicted of the most serious crimes, of the most reprehensible acts, those crimes having been committed prior to his functioning as an agent for the government.

I know it is going to be said that this type of thing would not happen in Canada, but we cannot be sure of that. Because of such circumstances, we might have second thoughts about allowing wiretapping evidence to be used against any accused, but if we have it in any form there is no prohibition against an over-eager prosecutor from obtaining not so pure evidence which he can use in his endeavour to obtain a conviction.

The best way to avoid that happening here is simply to delete that clause from the bill. In that respect, I am in complete agreement with the remarks of Senator O'Leary. In order to have the guarantee that it will not happen here, that particular clause of the bill will have to be struck out.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

On motion of Senator Goldenberg, bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs.

APPROPRIATION BILL NO. 5, 1973

SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Leopold Langlois moved the second reading of Bill C-239, for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial year ending the 31st March, 1974.

He said: Honourable senators, you will recall that royal assent has already been given to two supply bills covering Estimates for the current fiscal year. The first provided interim supply for the months of April, May and June. The second, assented to on June 28, 1973, provided full supply for the balance of the main Estimates for 1973-74.

The bill introduced today provides for full supply of Supplementary Estimates (A), 1973-74, which total $1,005 million. These Estimates consist of approximately $528 million in statutory expenditures, and $477 million in voted items which are made up of $468 million in budgetary items and $9 million in non-budgetary items.

The total Estimates tabled to date for 1973-74 consist of budgetary expenditures of $19,389 million and non-budgetary expenditures of $902.2 million, giving a grand total of $20,291.2 million.

Supplementary Estimates (A) were referred to the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance on November 8, 1973. These Estimates were discussed in committee on November 21 with the President of the Treasury Board and one of his senior departmental officials.

The form of the supply bill is the same as that passed in the previous years. No additional borrowing authority is requested, since the first supply bill for the current fiscal year provided sufficient borrowing authority in the amount of $3 billion.

These relatively large Supplementary Estimates are made up mainly of a few items which reflect changes in forecasts of statutory expenditures, or the costs of measures the government has taken to mitigate the effects of rising prices, or to provide employment.

The larger statutory items are as follows:

1. Additional fiscal transfer payments to the provinces of $147 million which, because of higher tax yields in the so-called "have" provinces, necessitate larger transfers to other provinces.

2. An additional $59 million in debt charges for higher interest rates.

3. Higher family allowances and youth allowances payments requiring an additional $222 million. This relates to the increases in family and youth allowances which went into effect in October last.

4. A payment of $79 million towards an actuarial deficiency in the Canadian Forces Superannuation Account based on the regular five-year assessment of the actuarial deficiency of that account.

5. $27 million in payments to the railways for the maintenance of passenger and uneconomic branch line services.

● (1610)

The large items which Parliament will be asked to vote upon include:

1. $152 million for the carryover and extension of the 1972-73 Local Initiatives Projects and for the cost of the 1973-74 Local Initiatives Projects which is to be borne in this fiscal year.

2. $65 million for increased pensions and allowances to veterans.

3. $53 million for payments to subsidize the price of fluid milk and milk powder to the consumer.

Honourable senators will note that these Supplementary Estimates provide only for the amendments to the Family Allowances Act and the Youth Allowances Act that raised the benefit payments to $12 per child—that is the increase passed in October last. They do not provide for the amounts involved in the bill which is now before Parliament, for the obvious reason that the decision of Parliament could not be anticipated in the Supplementary Estimates. In addition, provision has not been included in these estimates for the program which subsidized the price of bread. This will be the subject of separate legislative action.

These Estimates, as has been done in previous fiscal years, seek authority to finance new items through complete or partial offsets in other votes in the same program, or other programs of the ministry where funds can be made available through the exercise of restraint, or where changing circumstances permit lower expenditures. These offsets are treated as $1 votes in order to bring them before Parliament for authorization.

There is a total of 23 $1 items included in these Supplementary Estimates. They consist of:

(a) Items authorizing the deletion of debts due the Crown. There are three such items.

(b) Items for grants. There are seven such items.

(c) Items authorizing transfers from one vote to another. There are four such items, including one item for Indian Affairs and Northern Development which is also listed in category (b).

(d) Items which authorize amendments to previous appropriation acts. There are nine such items, including two items for Industry, Trade and Commerce, which are also listed in category (c).

(e) Items which specifically amend existing legislation other than appropriation acts. There are three such items.

Honourable senators will be happy to learn that the explanations of the $1 items which were originally requested by our National Finance Committee were made available to, and were used by, members of the other place, and also by our own committee, in considering these Estimates.

I have before me the explanations for these $1 items. It is a rather lengthy document and all the explanations are there. I shall be only too happy to supply further information on these $1 items, if honourable senators wish me to do so.

I have covered the important features of the bill. If honourable senators wish further explanation, I shall do my best to provide it.

Honourable senators, while I am on my feet, I should like to refer to the debate which took place in this house on December 6 last when Senator Grosart was speaking on the motion for the adoption of the report of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance which studied these Estimates. I am sorry that Senator Grosart is unavoidably absent today. However, I am not challenging what he has said, but merely wish to explain the interjection which I made at that time.

On page 1290 of Debates of the Senate of this session Senator Grosart spoke about the performance indicators proposed by the Economic Council of Canada. I interjected:

[Hon. Mr. Langlois.]

But the indicators were not defined, if I recall.

Senator Grosart replied:

The indicators are well defined and documented.

He went on to refer to the presentation made by Dr. André Raynauld, chairman of the Economic Council of Canada, to the Conference of Federal and Provincial Ministers of Finance. I shall skip a few sentences expressed in the same vein, and Senator Grosart then said:

> In this I found the responses from the minister somewhat disappointing, because he did not seem to be aware of the precision with which these indicators were established by the Economic Council of Canada.

I should like to refer honourable senators to the Tenth Annual Review of the Economic Council of Canada entitled: "Shaping the Expansion." I propose to quote the following two paragraphs, appearing on page 9 of the review, which deal with these indicators:

> The reason for setting up such an institutional concertation process is to generate a consensus around the basic national objectives we are striving to achieve. Once precisely defined—

I emphasize the words "once precisely defined."

> —these objectives would serve as a focus for public and private decisions, provided sufficiently broad agreement had been reached, both by the public at large and in the government sector.
> Further, it would be highly desirable for the federal government—at some future time—

And I emphasize the words "at some future time."

> —to adopt the system of performance indicators. The private sector could then make decisions with a clear and precise perception of the future orientation of economic policy. Immediate adoption of the indicators would, however, be premature—

I emphasize the words "be premature."

> —as they are still at testing stage. The system has to be tried by decision-makers, first, to determine whether it would be as useful in practice as it seems to be in theory.

I put this on the record merely to emphasize what I meant when I interjected the other day that these indicators were not well defined, and to put another perspective on the remarks of the minister to the committee when speaking about these performance indicators.

I thank honourable senators for their kind attention.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I wonder if I might ask the honourable senator if he would table the explanations of the $1 items?

Hon. Mr. Langlois: I shall be happy to do that. I have them here. If honourable senators are agreeable, I will table them. I have them in both French and English, and I might as well table them in both languages.

Hon. Mr. Molson: Would the honourable senator agree to having them printed as an appendix to today's proceedings?

Hon. Mr. Langlois: If the Senate is agreeable, I shall so move.

Hon. Mr. Molson: I think that would be worth while.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I think they were printed in the minutes of the committee's proceedings. It would be useful to have them here.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: They appear as an appendix to the minutes of the committee.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is it agreed that the explanations be printed as an appendix to today's proceedings?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(For explanation of $1 items, see appendix, pp. 1332-1336.)

On motion of Senator Macdonald, for Senator Phillips, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

Estimates Division
November 1973

SCHEDULE A

ONE DOLLAR ITEMS AUTHORIZING THE DELETION OF DEBTS DUE THE CROWN—3 ITEMS.

Indian Affairs and Northern Development

Vote 25a—Authority is requested to delete an uncollectable debt of $6,295.44.

Explanation—It is proposed to write-off a debt incurred by the Department in its Northern Natural Resources and Environment Activity. The Department has been unable to collect this debt due to the financial condition of the company. This amount has been examined and approved by the Standing Interdepartmental Committee on Uncollectable Debts due the Crown.

Veterans Affairs

Vote 5a—Authority is requested to delete certain debts due amounting to $74,580.53.

Explanation—To write-off the accounts of some ten debtors. Six of these are for debtors who have died with no known estate, three are for debtors who are considered to be indigent and one is for a liability which is not admitted and for which further collection expenses are not justified. The write-off of these accounts have been approved by the Standing Interdepartmental Committee on Uncollectible Debts due the Crown.

Vote 45a—Authority is requested to delete a debt amounting to $31,090.21.

Explanation—To write-off an outstanding debt of a debtor who has died leaving no known estate. This write-off has been approved by the Standing Interdepartmental Committee on Uncollectible Debts due the Crown.

SCHEDULE B

ONE DOLLAR ITEMS FOR GRANTS—7 ITEMS.

Environment

Vote 25a—To authorize grants totalling $46,000.

Explanation—The additional funds will be used to provide for the following grants:

(1) Chemical Institute of Canada—to provide a grant to assist in the cost of a symposium to be held on the Control of Insect Pests	$ 1,000
(2) Creston Valley Wildlife Management—to provide a further $30,000 to this authority in order to effect a more equitable Federal-Provincial distribution of costs. The Department has already provided a grant of $25,000 to assist the authority with its operating expenditures	$ 30,000
(3) Festival of Forestry—to provide an additional $15,000 to assist with the cost of the Festival (formerly the British Columbia Festival of Forestry). The Department has already provided a grant of $5,000	$ 15,000

Source of Funds—Vote 25—Contributions provided for Environment Management Services will be less than originally forecast.

External Affairs

Vote 10a—To authorize grants totalling $69,500.

Explanation—Additional funds are requested to provide for the following grants:

(1) Emergency Fund for the Westman Islands—to provide assistance to the volcanic disaster relief fund for the Westman Islands in Iceland	$ 62,500
(2) Atlantic Council of Canada—to provide an additional $5,000 to assist the Council in meeting its higher costs for public information and conference activities. The Department has already provided a grant of $2,500	$ 5,000
(3) An additional $2,000 is requested to provide for gifts to countries attaining independence and to mark special occasions	$ 2,000

Source of Funds—Vote 10—Contributions under the United Nations Voluntary Fund for the Environment are less than was originally anticipated.

External Affairs—Canadian International Development Agency

Vote 25a—To authorize the payment of grants totalling $752,050.

Explanation—It is proposed to provide additional grants to the following United Nations Organizations:

(1) International Planned Parenthood Federation—to provide an additional grant to assist with the Federation's work. The current Estimates provide for a grant of $1,230,100. $252,050

(2) United Nations Relief and Work Agency —to meet higher costs incurred in caring for Palestine refugees in the near East. The current Estimates provides for the payment of a grant of $650,000. $500,000

Source of funds—Vote 25—Funds are available as a result of less than anticipated payments to International Organizations.

Indian Affairs and Northern Development

Vote 35a—(This item is also included in Schedule C) To authorize the payment of a grant and contributions totalling $754,700.

Explanation—It is proposed to pay the following grant and contributions:

(1) Yukon Prospectors Association—to assist with the preparation of briefs in connection with proposed amendments to the Yukon Quartz Mining Act $ 1,000

(2) Government of the Northwest Territories —to assist in the provision of an arena for the community at Frobisher Bay $300,000

(3) Government of the Northwest Territories —to cover the cost of completing its 1972-73 Federal Labour Intensive Projects Program $238,700

(4) Government of Yukon Territory—to cover the cost of completing its 1972-73 Federal Labour Intensive Projects Program $215,000

Source of Funds—Vote 25—$453,700.—Funds are available due to the deferral of certain Constitutional Studies and Territorial Municipal Services Impact Studies and reductions in the level of operations elsewhere within the program.

—Vote 30—$300,000.—Funds are available due to a delay in the construction of the Resource Management Building at Yellowknife.

—Vote 35—$999.—Forecast expenditures for the amortization portion of the Transfer Grant to the Northwest Territories will be less than expected.

Vote 70a—To authorize grants totalling $40,000.

Explanation—The following grants are proposed:

(1) It is proposed to provide assistance in the form of scholarship to assist university students selected by the Department for post-graduate studies in resource conservation, outdoor recreation and other similar fields $ 30,000

(2) National and Provincial Park Associations in Canada—to provide financial assistance to a non-profit organization which assists the Department in the promulgation and comprehension of Parks Canada Policies and Plans through its participation at public hearings $ 10,000

Source of funds—Vote 70—funds are available due to the operating costs of certain parks being less than anticipated.

Vote 45a—To authorize a grant of $100,000.

Explanation—It is proposed to provide an additional grant for family planning services. The number of applications for financial assistance received has been greater than was expected. The present Estimates provides for grants totalling $1,150,000 to assist in the family planning services and other projects in this area.

Source of funds—Vote 40—Funds are available due to contracts having been cancelled or delayed for the production of information materials. Some of this information is now being provided by the various applicants.

Secretary of State—National Museums of Canada

Vote 90a—To authorize a grant of $55,000.

Explanation—to provide a grant to the University of Toronto Press to meet the deficit which is expected to be incurred in the production of "Mammals of Canada".

Source of Funds—Vote 90—Funds are available due to the delay in negotiations for grants with qualified students engaged in graduate courses in the history of Canada art, and lower than expected expenditures for catalogue assistance.

SCHEDULE C

ONE DOLLAR ITEMS AUTHORIZING TRANSFERS FROM ONE VOTE TO ANOTHER—4 ITEMS (INCLUDES ONE ITEM FOR INDIAN AFFAIRS AND NORTHERN DEVELOPMENT WHICH IS ALSO LISTED IN SCHEDULE B).

Indian Affairs and Northern Development

Vote 35a—(This item is also included in Schedule B) Amount of the transfer to this vote $753,700.00.

Explanation—The additional funds will be used to provide for payment of the following contributions.

(1) Government of Northwest Territories—to assist in the provision of an arena for the community of Frobisher Bay $300,000

(2) Government of the Northwest Territories—to cover the cost of completing its 1972-73 Federal Labour Intensive Projects Program $238,700

(3) Government of Yukon Territory—to cover the cost of completing its 1972-73 Federal Labour Intensive Projects Program $215,000

Source of Funds—Vote 25—$453,700.—Funds are available due to the deferral of certain Constitutional Studies and Territorial Municipal Services Impact Studies and reductions in the level of operations elsewhere within the program.

—Vote 30—$300,000.—Funds are available due to a delay in the construction of the Resource Management Building at Yellowknife.

Industry, Trade and Commerce

Vote 1a—(This item is also included in Schedule D) Amount of transfer to this vote $1,764,931.

Explanation—The additional funds are required for the following reasons:

(1) Metric Commission—the additional funds will be used to hire staff and to provide for associated expenses which are required to meet the increased workload resulting from the promotional work necessitated by the Commission's program $626,800

(2) Additional funds are required to provide for the operating expenses and staff required by the Canadian Trade and Tariffs Committee in order that it may obtain the views of all interested Canadians including Provincial Governments, Businesses, Consumers and Labour as part of the process of developing Canada's objectives for the multilateral trade negotiations which is currently underway $127,500

(3) Defence, Industry and Productivity—Industry Modernizations for Defence Exports Program—funds are requested for the deletion of the unpaid balance of a loan provided to a firm under this program. This contract has now fallen into the default $ 55,831

(4) Regional Offices—Additional funds are required to cover the cost of upgrading and expansion of the existing Regional Offices and the opening of a new office in St. John's, Newfoundland $338,000

(5) Trade Commissioner Service—Additional funds are required as the result of the devaluation of the Canadian dollar and the increased cost of operations abroad $616,800

Source of Funds—Vote 10—Funds are available from the PAIT Program disbursements which are now forecast to be less than was expected.

Vote 32a—(This item is also listed in Schedule D)—Amount of the transfer to this vote is $1,699,999.

Purpose—This additional amount will be used to provide for payments under the two-price wheat program based on the bushels sold for human consumption in Canada in 1972.

Source of Funds—Vote 35—funds are available as the forecast contribution to the Brazilian Government for construction of grain silos at grain importing and distribution points in Brazil will be less than expected due to construction delays.

Regional Economic Expansion

Vote 11a—Amount of transfer to this vote was $14,999,999.

Explanation—These additional funds are requested to provide for forecast contributions required as the result of the extension of economic expansion and social adjustment assistance to all areas of Canada rather than the designated areas.

Source of Funds—Vote 10—contributions within this program are expected to be less than originally forecast.

SCHEDULE D

ONE DOLLAR ITEMS WHICH AUTHORIZE AMENDMENTS TO PREVIOUS APPROPRIATION ACTS—9 ITEMS (INCLUDES TWO ITEMS FOR INDUSTRY, TRADE AND COMMERCE WHICH ARE ALSO LISTED IN SCHEDULE C).

Finance

Vote L13a—To authorize an extension to the vote wording so as to permit Loans made under the Winter Capital Projects Program which are to be consolidated after March 31, 1976 to include interest accrued thereon to the date of consolidation.

Explanation—This extension is requested to enable the Government to capitalize interest which may accrue on loans made to the same debtor and to permit the consolidation of these loans into one loan. If these loans were not consolidated the interest, in some cases could prove to be a financial burden to the debtor.

Indian Affairs and Northern Development

Vote L81a—To authorize an extension to the vote wording so as to extend the purposes of the Working Capital Advance Account to cover the acquisition and management of stores required for the operation and maintenance of the canals.

Explanation—This extension is required since the present National Parks Act does not permit the use of the Working Capital Advance Account to finance the stores operations under the Canals Activity.

Industry, Trade and Commerce

Vote 1a—(This item is also included in Schedule C)—To authorize through an extension to the vote wording the reimbursement of the Department for the unpaid balance of a loan totalling $55,831.40.

Explanation—The proposed revision to the vote wording is requested to authorize the write-off of a loan provided for the purchase of equipment to assist an industry under the Defence Industry Productivity Program. The equipment has been repossessed due to the termination of the contract by default and the Department has not been successful in finding a purchaser for this equipment during the past fiscal year.

Vote 32a—(This item is also listed in Schedule C)—To authorize additional funds required for payments to Canadian Grain Producers in 1973-74 based on the number of bushels of wheat sold for human consumption in Canada in 1972.

Explanation—The original estimate for 1973-74 as to payments under the two-price wheat program was made prior to the receipt of official figures. As a result, the number of bushels sold for domestic human consumption in Canada in 1972 was higher than expected.

Labour

Vote 1a—To authorize through an extension to the vote wording the expansion of the Adjustment Assistance Program to cover displaced workers in the leather footwear and tanning industries.

Explanation—Authority is requested to enable the Department to enter into agreements to provide Adjustment Assistance Benefits to displaced workers which become unemployed as a result of implementation of the Leather Footwear and Tanning Industries Adjustment Program.

Regional Economic Expansion

Vote 1a—To authorize through an extension to the present vote wording the transfer without cost of the Bow River and St. Mary irrigation projects to the Province of Alberta.

Explanation—This authority is requested so that the Minister may transfer without cost to the Province of Alberta all assets of the Bow River and St. Mary irrigation projects. This transfer is in accordance with negotiated Canada-Alberta agreements signed earlier this year, in which it was agreed to transfer to Alberta all rights and interests in the property.

Treasury Board

Vote 7a—To authorize the deletion from the Accounts of Canada of the Reserve for Retroactive Salary Increases.

Explanation—Authority is requested to delete the Reserve for Retroactive Salary Increases for 1969/70 and 1970/71 established by the Treasury Board from the Accounts of Canada. This Reserve is no longer required since collective bargaining procedures are now developed to a point where retroactive salary payments can be provided within annual appropriations.

Vote 15a—To authorize an extension to the vote wording so as to permit payment to the Unemployment Insurance Commission of the cost of developing bilingualism in that Agency.

Explanation—Authority is requested to enable the Commission to be reimbursed for the cost of developing bilingualism in accordance with the Government's announced policy.

Vote 20a—To authorize an extension to the vote wording so as to permit the payment to employees of their share of the premium reduction under the Unemployment Insurance Act.

Explanation—Authority is requested to amend the wording of this vote to permit the payment to employees of their share of the employer unemployment insurance premium reduction to be charged against it. This reduction is granted under the Unemployment Insurance Act in respect of employees who are entitled to accumulate sick leave credits, the payment of which would reduce the liability of the Unemployment Insurance Commission to pay sickness benefits.

SCHEDULE E

ONE DOLLAR ITEMS WHICH SPECIFICALLY AMEND EXISTING LEGISLATION OTHER THAN APPROPRIATION ACTS—3 ITEMS.

Justice

Vote 1a—Authority is requested through this Vote wording so as to enable the Minister under the Judges Act to reimburse District Court Judges for all travelling expenses incurred in performing duties at a place other than that at which they are obliged to reside.

Explanation—The present Judges Act provides for the payment of a maximum travelling allowance of $500 per annum to district Court Judges in Ontario. This was found to be insufficient to cover travelling expenses of District Court Judges who regularly travel to judicial centres which are located some distance from the centre at which he resides. It is therefore proposed to reimburse these judges on the same basis for travelling expenses as county court judges.

National Health and Welfare

Vote 50a—To authorize an increase of $2,000,000 in the Statutory aggregate amount of payments that can be made under the Fitness and Amateur Sport Act.

Explanation—This increase in statutory ceiling is required to permit the provision of additional assistance to foster increased paticipation of Canadians in sport and fitness activities at all levels of endeavour, whether competitive or not.

Veterans Affairs

Vote 30a—To authorize an amendment to the Pension Act so as to enable the Canadian Pension Commission to accept and administer property and money bequeathed or donated in trust to the Commission for the benefit of pensioners and their dependents.

Explanation—The present Pension Act does not enable the Canadian Pension Commission to accept and administer properties and moneys bequeathed or donated in trust. Authority is requested to enable the Commission to accept and administer properties and moneys conveyed to the Commission in trust for the benefit of pensioners, their dependents and any other persons.

THE SENATE

Wednesday, December 12, 1973

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

FOREIGN INVESTMENT REVIEW BILL

REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Hon. Salter A. Hayden, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, reported that the committee had considered Bill C-132, to provide for the review and assessment of acquisitions of control of Canadian business enterprises by certain persons and of the establishment of new businesses in Canada by certain persons, and had directed that the bill be reported without amendment.

He said: Honourable senators, I propose to depart somewhat from the normal procedure in that I intend to read the report myself, and save the Clerk or the Assistant Clerk the trouble of doing so.

The report reads as follows:

> The Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, to which was referred the Bill C-132, intituled: "An Act to provide for the review and assessment of acquisitions of control of Canadian business enterprises by certain persons and of the establishment of new businesses in Canada by certain persons" has, in obedience to the order of reference of December 6, 1973, examined the said bill and, for the reasons hereinafter mentioned, now reports the same without amendment.

Honourable senators will note the language, "for the reasons hereinafter mentioned."

> This was not the first time your committee had occasion to consider the above bill, which received first reading in the House of Commons on January 24, 1973. As a result of authority given to your committee by the Senate on May 16, 1973, to consider the document entitled Foreign Direct Investment in Canada (tabled in the Senate on May 15, 1972) and the bill based thereon, being Bill C-132, your committee held hearings and tabled a report on July 12, 1973, (see appendix to the Debates of the Senate of that date at page 873).
> As a result of the deliberations of your committee and the submissions made to it at that time, a number of areas requiring clarification or, in the opinion of your committee, corrections were identified and set forth in its report as recommendations for amendments to the bill (see specific recommendations, at pages 875 and following of the report). Your committee was in communication with the Honourable the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce prior to the formal tabling of its report as to those parts of the bill which appeared to your committee to require amendment. On July 5 the minister tabled a series of amendments to the bill in the Commons Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs which was also considering the bill at that time. These and other amendments were incorporated into the bill by the Commons Committee which reported the bill, with amendments, on July 20, 1973.
> A number of the areas of concern to your committee were covered by the bill, as amended, which was passed by the Commons on November 26, 1973.
> Of sixteen Senate recommendations, ten were dealt with by the Commons amendments. Of these ten, six, in the opinion of your committee, can be said to meet fully the objections which prompted your committee's recommendations. A further four amendments responded at least in part to your committee's recommendations, and in the remaining six cases, no amendments were made (see appendix "A" to the Debates of the Senate, December 4, 1973).
> Of the areas not touched or only partially touched by the Commons amendments, four, in the opinion of your committee, emerge as having particular importance:
> (1) Provision for adequate recourse to the courts;
>
> (2) The role of the provinces;
>
> (3) The position of real estate transactions under the bill; and
>
> (4) The presumption (although rebuttable) that 5% share ownership constitutes acquisition of control.
>
> The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, the Honourable Alastair Gillespie, together with Mr. F. E. Gibson, Director of Legislation, Department of Justice, and Mr. Harvey Lazar, Special Advisor to the Minister, appeared before your committee on December 11. The minister and his officials responded to questions on a broad range of subjects relating to the bill and the way in which it is expected it will be applied; for example, the minister indicated that binding rulings on the question of non-eligibility would be given to an applicant notwithstanding that no specific acquisition was contemplated at the time. Reference is made to issue No. 23 of the proceedings of the committee for other important statements made by the minister; however, your committee considers it expedient to outline his statements and undertakings in respect of the four matters above referred to.
> On the question of appeals to the courts, Mr. Gibson indicated the manner in which, in his view, recourse could be had to the courts under section 18 of the Federal Court Act, in view of the definition in paragraph 2(g) of that act, for judicial review of purely legal questions (as opposed to the policy question of whether an investment is of "significant benefit" to Canada) disputed by an applicant. The minister undertook that should these remedies not prove efficacious in practice after an opportunity for some experience under the bill, he would recommend that appropriate amendments be brought forward.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: We have heard that before!

Hon. Mr. Hayden: The report continues:

On the question of the role of the provinces in the review process, the minister stated in very specific terms his proposals for communication and consultation with the provinces.

On the difficult question of the treatment of real estate transactions under the bill, the minister undertook to bring forward guidelines illustrating what kind of transactions would be considered to be acquisitions of a business and consequently within the purview of the bill, and what kind of transactions would be regarded as acquisitions of property, and therefore not within the scope of the bill.

Finally, on the question of whether the figure of 5 per cent was too low a figure for the purpose of presuming acquisition of control, the minister emphasized the rebuttable nature of the presumption created and undertook to recommend amendments to the legislation to increase the figure if experience indicated that the 5 per cent figure, arbitrarily selected in the first place, proved lower than was necessary to properly accomplish its purposes.

In your committee's opinion, specific amendments are not the sole means of clarifying questions which arise under legislation. The present bill, if enacted, will be the first such legislation of its kind in Canada. The bill has raised a number of questions which, as a result of hearings before your committee and its deliberations on the bill, as well as discussions in other places, have been fully aired. In this connection your committee should mention a further submission made to it at its hearing on December 11 and to which the minister appeared receptive, pointing out that the amendment to paragraph 3(3)(e) of the bill may not adequately exclude certain kinds of internal reorganization other than the "statutory" or "Letters Patent" type to which the amendment appears to be confined.

It would be perhaps impossible to deal effectively at this stage, by way of amendment to the bill, with all possible objections to and concerns about the bill and its operation. As the minister acknowledged, doubtless the need will arise, as experience of operation of the bill is gained, for amendments to it and your committee recommends to the minister who will be charged with the responsibility for administration of the bill that, following its enactment and in the light of practical experience under it, all the concerns of your committee expressed in its recommendations be noted in applying the bill, in the preparation of guidelines which may be issued under the authority thereof and, where necessary, by specific amendment to the legislation.

[Hon. Mr. Hayden,.]

• (1410)

In 1971 your committee made a number of recommendations for changes in Bill C-259, the Income Tax reform legislation. In order to avoid further delays in passage, the then Minister of Finance undertook to bring forward in due course certain amendments to meet your Committee's recommendations. Your Committee notes with satisfaction that all of those amendments have now been made.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: All of this?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: The report concludes:

It is in a similar spirit and with similar confidence in the undertakings and statements of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce made before your committee on December 11 that your committee is pleased to recommend passage of Bill C-132.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read a third time?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: Honourable senators, before the motion is put, I should like to have leave of the Senate to offer a few words of explanation amplifying the report.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: I realize that this could be done on third reading, but it might be of value, now that the report has been distributed to all senators, if I deal with it very briefly now.

I think I can safely say, as can those who were present yesterday when we had a pretty full attendance at the meetings of the committee, that the questioning of the minister covered a wide range of subjects. Mr. F. E. Gibson, representing the Department of Justice, was also present. We dealt with particular subject matters which were discussed during the debate in this chamber and on which particular emphasis was placed during the course of that debate. One such subject was the question of appeal; that is, a non-eligible person who wishes to acquire shares of a Canadian business enterprise has the right to proceed to judicial review when his application is refused by the minister.

In the recommendations made by the committee when it was considering the bill by reference from this chamber before the bill was formally received here, a course of appeal was outlined, which we suggested be incorporated in the bill itself. However, there exists a statutory right of appeal, which is contained in the Federal Court Act. Mr. Gibson developed this at length, and the committee was satisfied with this opportunity for judicial review at the instance of an applicant, and even at the instance of the minister, by the Federal Court, in connection with issues which might be the subject of dispute. These issues apply to acquisition of control, non-eligible persons and Canadian business enterprises. We exacted an undertaking from the minister that if the Federal Court, where any such proceedings might be taken, decided it did not have jurisdiction to maintain such an application, the minister would propose the necessary amendments to make certain that the jurisdiction would exist, together with the right of an applicant to go to the court for judicial review of his position.

On the question of the role of the provinces, the minister made a complete statement of his position. I had intended to read it, but honourable senators will see it in the proceedings of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking Trade and Commerce, in a few days.

There might be some value in reading a portion of it. If the Senate will bear with me, I will indicate the nature of the minister's remarks. The minister, when asked what the procedures would be under which he would deal with the provinces and consult with them, said:

> Before the second proclamation, that being with respect to the establishment of new businesses, I will be meeting with them.

The word "them" means the ministers in all the provinces and the other officials designated by the provincial leaders in those provinces. The minister continued:

> In fact, I hope to be meeting with them to deal with the channels of communication before the first proclamation.

The first proclamation must be made, under this bill, not less than 180 days after royal assent has been given to this bill. The minister continued:

> So it would seem to me that the voice of the provinces will be heard. The phrase I have used throughout the discussion on this bill is that the provinces will be given a voice but not a veto. I think that is probably, in as few words as I can use, a way of distinguishing it. They will be given a voice. This is a national bill concerned with national policies, and, therefore, there should be no provincial veto.

The minister indicated further on—it is quite a lengthy statement—that he had requested the provincial premiers to appoint a minister. Most provinces already have a minister of industry. The point of contact between the minister in Ottawa and the provinces will be with the provincial minister of industry, together with any other provincial officials designated by the premier of the province.

So much for reference and consultation. On the question of land, or real estate, a statement was made by the minister through Mr. Gibson. Mr. Gibson explained at length the scope of section 18 of the Federal Court Act. If honourable senators read section 18 they will see that it does not appear that the act extends far enough to cover the minister, because section 18 deals with federal boards and tribunals. The interpretation section says:

> "Federal board, commission or other tribunal" means any body or any person or persons having, exercising or purporting to exercise jurisdiction or powers conferred by or under an Act of the Parliament of Canada,"

In the light of Mr. Gibson's statement, which the minister confirmed, it would appear, from consideration of section 18 of the Federal Court Act and the interpretation section, that there is jurisdiction for an applicant who has been injured or who thinks he has been injured by any disallowance of the minister or by the wrong application or interpretation of the factors leading to that decision. He may then go to the federal court. The committee felt that the undertaking of the minister to reinforce that right of judicial review, if any court presumed to challenge it, was adequate for the purposes of this bill. We were prepared to accept that in lieu of a particular amendment to the bill itself.

I started out intending to read to you the minister's statement with respect to land transactions, but that statement seems to have gotten lost in the welter of papers I have. The minister's statement was to the effect that he would propose issuing guidelines provided for under the bill and that these guidelines would indicate, by examples, both those areas subject to review and those not subject to review in transactions relating to real estate.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: That would not be binding on another minister.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: No. The only comment I would make—and it is a gratuitous comment—is that as far as I am concerned, if a minister gave an undertaking to issue guidelines and did not live up to that undertaking, he would have the greatest difficulty in getting any subsequent bills passed by this chamber. It might even be impossible.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: What happens if we have a change at the ministerial level, as was the case with the Honourable Mr. Benson?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: Well, my friend will have an opportunity to speak on third reading.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Why not now?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: I do not control the appointment of ministers or changes at the ministerial level, nor does my friend as yet.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Never. Don't worry about that.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: Not as yet, anyway. The minister explained that he felt there was a difference between the business of dealing in real estate and the business of dealing in property. His feeling was that there are bound to be many transactions which may fall on one side of the line or the other.

In view of the proposed issuance of guidelines, it was the view of the committee, as evidenced from the report, that this adequately deals with the situation at this time, particularly when the minister, realizing that this was the first venture to control foreign investment in the economy of Canada, recognized the need for amendments to meet the situations which would be experienced. He went on to say that he would deal with such situations by way of binding rulings, guidelines or regulations. He also said that if a situation could not be dealt with by any of those means, he would then recommend to his colleagues that it be dealt with by way of amendment to the act itself.

With respect to the five per cent, which is the threshold in applying a test as to whether there is acquisition of control or not, the minister very frankly admitted that this was an arbitrary figure. They had to select some figure, as he said, and five per cent was chosen arbitrarily. However, if it should develop, by reason of the volume of applications generated on this basis, and the experience in connection with them, that this threshold has been set too low, it will be increased to a more appropriate figure. The minister gave this undertaking.

I have attempted to paraphrase some of the things that were said in the course of the committee hearings. The hearings went on until about 4 o'clock in the afternoon and the report was considered by the members of the committee and they approved of it in the form in which I presented it and read it to you today.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: When was the report drafted? Was it drafted in the course of the hearings, or after?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: If my friend wants to ask me that question, I will answer it on third reading. I am first explaining the report now, and in my opinion this is not the time to answer his question.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Why not? It seems to me that it is a good question. I would like some clarification. The honourable senator has read the report and has explained it. Now, are we discussing the report or not? Of course, all is contrary to the rules, but with leave the chairman has been empowered to proceed. I do not see why we should not be entitled to discuss the report, as he has been doing.

The Hon. the Speaker: As honourable senators know, under rule 78(4), when a committee reports a bill without amendment, such report shall stand adopted without any motion, and the senator in charge of the bill shall move that it be read a third time on a future day.

Senator Hayden asked for permission to speak on his report, and the Senate gave permission. If other honourable senators wish to ask such permission, and if leave is given, there is no reason why they should not proceed.

Actually, there was a precedent for this when a bill to amend the Income Tax Act came before this house. Senator Connolly (Ottawa West), who had introduced the bill, spoke on the report, with leave, and there were other speeches made at that time; but I think that if they are going to be made they should be made with leave of the Senate.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: We have given leave.

Hon. Mr. Martin: I think we all agree that the Leader of the Opposition ought to have that leave.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: If third reading is going to be moved now, I don't mind.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: Is there any objection to third reading now? Honourable senators, with leave I move that this bill be now read a third time.

Honourable senators, I told my friend that when we got to the stage of third reading I would answer his question as to when the report was drafted. Perhaps that is why I got his consent to third reading right away.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: That is why I gave you leave.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: That is fine. We have counsel on the staff of this committee. Also, you have to give the chairman some sense of judgment or appreciation of how things are going. Certainly, by the time we had reached the recess, about 12 o'clock in the day, I had concluded, perhaps wrongly, as to the direction of the thinking. I had a session with our staff advisor and I laid out several courses of action for drafting. He produced a draft which, later on in the day, I read to the committee after it had voted that the bill should be reported without amendment. Some changes were made in that draft, to meet the wishes of members of the committee, and the result was the report which I presented today.

MOTION IN AMENDMENT NEGATIVED

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, I am unable to express in English my reaction to the explanation given by the chairman as to the manner in which the report was drafted and was adopted by the committee, and can only do so in French. No doubt Hansard will translate it for tomorrow but the interpreter can do it now for those of you who use the translation equipment: Qu'en termes élégants ces choses sont dites.

It is quite obvious that this "scenario" was organized in advance; we knew exactly what was going to happen. This report could not have been prepared so expeditiously if the chairman had not known the exact direction in which he wanted the committee to go, and seen to it that it took the course he wanted it to follow. The committee followed the course as directed. It could not do otherwise, owing to the great influence—I would not say bad influence, but the great influence of the chairman of the committee.

I am sorry that, owing to another commitment, I was unable to be present for yesterday's meeting of the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee. I had hoped that the committee would not complete its hearing of the witnesses before I had a chance to get back, because I should have liked to have said a few words on the clause-by-clause study of the bill. However, I was not there—something which happens to all of us—and, therefore, I cannot complain about that. I will say, however, that I find it unfortunate that this report reminds me so much of the income tax reform bill, not only because it follows the same pattern but because it actually refers specifically to that unforgettable bill.

The penultimate paragraph of the report reads:

> In 1971 your committee made a number of recommendations for changes in Bill C-259, the income tax reform legislation. In order to avoid further delays in passage, the then Minister of Finance undertook to bring forward in due course certain amendments to meet your committee's recommendations. Your committee notes with satisfaction that all of those amendments have now been made.

I will not challenge that assertion, because the matters referred to happened too long ago. But if I had time to look into it, I feel certain I would be able to prove that that assertion is not entirely correct, although it may, in substance, be right. I think it all depends upon the vantage point from which you consider the report of the committee. Certainly, I was not at all satisfied with the manner in which the legislation was dealt with in 1971, and, therefore, I do not approve of the way in which we are dealing with the present legislation.

When we were discussing Bill C-132 on second reading, I expressed my doubts as to the necessity of passing the legislation at this time. I expressed my doubts as to whether there was any urgency to pass it immediately. I said that it might be good in principle but that in practice, considering all the relevant circumstances, there was no good reason to rush it. In fact, it was also the view of many provinces, including Quebec, that there was no rush about this matter.

Even if we intend to exercise some control over foreign investment in this country, that does not mean that we have to do so immediately. There is no rush with regard to this bill, as was the case or was purported by the government to be the case with regard to the income tax reform legislation of 1971. There was no urgency in that case, nor is there any with respect to this case. There would be no problem arising from delaying the passage of this bill for six months or even a year or more. We could very well have taken the time required properly to consider whether we should delay passage of this bill in order to bring forth a superior piece of legislation.

When I look at the report of the committee which resulted from our study of the bill prior to its coming before us and then look at the report we are considering today, I am annoyed by the about face which this report represents. I am thoroughly displeased with what we are doing here and what, I am afraid, is about to be done by this chamber.

In my opinion, it is not enough for the Senate to make recommendations for amendments and then settle for the mere promises of the minister that some of those amendments will eventually be made. We know what happened to the minister who made certain promises with regard to the income tax reform bill. He was replaced, and the new minister refused to be bound by the promises made by his predecessor.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Mr. Benson's promises were kept.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: They were not kept. I do not agree with that. There are still a number of ills in that act which have not yet been cured.

If my friend wants to discuss that act, I am willing to do so, but I will say one thing at the start: We were assured by the then minister, when dealing with the income tax reform bill, that that legislation would mean less revenue to the government and great relief to a significant number of taxpayers in Canada. That never materialized. On the contrary! The government has collected $3 billion more under the new tax bill than it received before, and everyone knows that is so.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: That was not the subject of a Senate amendment, though.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Yes, but the underlying principle of the income tax reform legislation was that we were going to give relief to many people. The amendments we proposed in the Senate were intended to give that relief, but they were refused, and I suggest that there are figures published by the Department of National Revenue which prove precisely that the government has pocketed $3 billion more since the inception of the new income tax legislation—in other words, in the last fiscal year. In any event, that is not the subject matter of the bill before us today, but since reference was made to what we did in the case of the income tax reform bill I thought my comments might have some bearing on what we should do today.

I disagree entirely with the idea that we should take the opinion of an official of the department as to the question of appeals. If the opinion that Mr. Gibson gave yesterday is correct, then, as far as the income tax legislation is concerned, should we not simply abolish the Income Act Appeal Board? If we do not need any board to appeal to the Federal Court, why not simply abolish the Income Tax Appeal Board? It is quite obvious to me that this reference, which the chairman has made to the Federal Court Act with regard to any person acting as a court or quasi-judicial body, does not apply to a minister of the Crown, or, if it does, has not been decided by any court yet and that we should not be satisfied simply with the assurance or the pious hope of any official of the Department of Justice that this is so. I have seen this argument before. Every time we question the wording of a bill, we always receive the same reply: "We know that it is like that, and, even if it has not been proven, it will be proven so." But very seldom has that been the case.

I do not accept the suggestion that the Senate should be satisfied with the pious assurance of any official of the Department of Justice as far as appeals are concerned.

With regard to the concurrence of the provinces, our committee, when it studied the bill, gave reasons for providing for the concurrence of any province in which the investment was going to be made in order to satisfy two things: first, the policy of that province and, second, getting the assurance that no province under these circumstances would challenge the constitutionality of the bill before the Supreme Court. Those were the two arguments. Those arguments are not countered by the assurance that the minister will meet with the provinces. There are, admittedly, many federal-provincial meetings. But you know very well how most of them end: The federal minister states his position, "take it or leave it," and that is the end of the conference. The provinces who are happy, take it, and those who are not happy, don't take it, or accept it in part. But it is always the same story. Do you suggest, honourable senators, that we should be satisfied with this procedure? I disagree entirely.

● (1440)

In the circumstances, not being satisfied with this report, I intend to move that the bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce on two counts, and on two separate motions. There is one which will deal with the problem of the concurrence of the provinces, and another which will deal with appeals.

I will start with the provinces. As far as their concurrence being required is concerned, the recommendation of the Senate committee has not been implemented. The proposition that we should settle for the mere assurance of the minister that he will consult the provinces is completely unsatisfactory.

I therefore move, seconded by Senator Choquette, that Bill C-132 be not now read a third time but that it be referred back to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce with specific instructions to amend it by adding new clauses to provide:

> (a) that the province in which the investment is located be given a copy of all notices received by the agency under section 8 of the Bill and of any other information submitted by any applicant immediately upon receipt by the agency, and

(b) that where the Minister proposes to recommend to the Governor in Council that an investment not be allowed, the Minister shall not submit such recommendation unless the province in which the investment is located either advises him within a specified period of time that it concurs with such recommendation or fails to communicate with the Minister within such period of time.

I may add that this wording is practically word for word that of the report of the Senate committee made prior to the coming before us of the bill. It seems to me that the reasons given at that time by the committee, and given and explained again by the chairman of the committee when he spoke introducing the bill, are sufficient to convince the Senate that we should approve this amendment.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(b), it is moved by the Honourable Senator Hayden, seconded by the Honourable Senator Bourget, P.C., that this bill be now read a third time.

In amendment, it is moved by the Honourable Senator Flynn, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Choquette, that Bill C-132 be not now read a third time but that it be referred back to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce with specific instructions to amend it by adding new clauses to provide:

(a) that the province in which the investment is located be given a copy of all notices received by the agency under section 8 of the Bill and of any other information submitted by any applicant immediately upon receipt by the agency, and

(b) that where the Minister proposes to recommend to the Governor in Council that an investment not be allowed, the Minister shall not submit such recommendation unless the province in which the investment is located either advises him within a specified period of time that it concurs with such recommendation or fails to communicate with the Minister within such period of time.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion in amendment?

Hon. John J. Connolly: Honourable senators, I have listened very carefully to what the chairman of the committee has said, and I have also listened with great interest to Senator Flynn's discussion in connection particularly with the work done by this committee.

For my part, not only do I make no apology for the work of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce in connection with this bill, because I think the work that has been done on this bill has been exemplary, but I certainly make no apology for the work done by the same committee on Bill C-259 in 1971. At that time, in my opinion, the Senate broke new ground in connection with the great problem that traditionally second chambers have had.

I have used this argument many times before, but I think it bears repetition. We find ourselves, as do other second chambers in the parliamentary system, at the end of a session, or at the end of a Parliament, deluged with legislation—very often complicated and important legislation—with little or no time to deal with it. I think this departure from the rules which have been adopted in this chamber is a pioneering step for the parliamentary system. By pre-study of the legislation we put ourselves in a better position to deal with legislation when it comes to us in a formal way after it has been passed by the House of Commons.

I do not propose to engage in a dispute about whether every one of the amendments that were proposed by the Senate to the tax reform bill in 1971 were in fact included in subsequent amendments to that bill. But I do think—and I remember Senator Molson using the language in this house—that perhaps 95 or 99 per cent of the suggestions of the Senate committee with respect to the amendment of that bill have been adopted. What we have done in both these cases is to apply the kind of sober second thought that responsible people in the second chamber of a parliamentary system are expected to apply to legislation.

I say more than that. I say that our experience so far, particularly on the tax bill, has been fruitful. We have achieved something that perhaps we would not otherwise have achieved.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Bringing more billions of dollars into the treasury.

Hon. Mr. Connolly: Well, I will not engage the honourable senator on that point, because I think it is not germane to the issue we have before us now.

There is the question of delay. Senator Flynn suggests that we should hold this bill up for another six months, perhaps another year, and that there is no hurry about it. The fact of the matter is that the bill is before Parliament. We studied the subject matter of the bill nearly six months ago. We did a month's study of it. Ultimately we are going to be faced with the same problem that we were faced with yesterday, whether it comes three months from now or six months from now. I think that the Senate committee did what it should have done in this respect. It dealt with the matter before it, and, in my view, dealt with it in an effective way.

Senator Flynn has suggested that it is not sufficient for a Senate committee simply to recommend amendments. I think, in the circumstances in which the committee dealt with this bill yesterday, it is highly appropriate for us to consider the problems that are indigenous to the introduction of a piece of legislation like this, which breaks new ground. It was responsible action on the part of the members of that committee—and I feel that my own responsibility was discharged—to discuss this frankly with the minister, get his reactions to the difficulties that we saw and, finally, to accept his proposal that at least the legislation is worthy of a try, and if amendments are ultimately required they will be brought in. The minister gave us that undertaking. I am sure that that undertaking will be honoured, just as the undertaking given by the Minister of Finance in 1971 was honoured, although not by the minister who gave the undertaking but by his successor.

On the question of appeal, Senator Flynn suggests that what we did in the committee yesterday was to simply accept the say-so of the official of the Department of Justice, who explained the effect of section 18 of the Federal Court Act combined with section 2(g), which is the interpretation section.

● (1450)

I am sorry that Senator Flynn was not there himself yesterday because, being the distinguished lawyer that he is—and I do not flatter him when I say that—I think he would agree with the other lawyers on the committee that the interpretation by the chairman, contained in part of the report, is an interpretation generally agreed to. It is not a tortured interpretation.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I am sorry, but I should point out to the honourable senator that when we made the report last May this section in the Federal Court Act then existed, and we were the same lawyers.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): We were the same lawyers, and the law was on the statute books. It was unfortunate that we did not advert to it.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: We did.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): I do not remember adverting to section 18 of the Federal Court Act at that time, and I do not think the matter came before the committee.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: It did.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): If my friend knew about it at that time, then my statement that he is a distinguished lawyer is even more strongly established. But I did not know about it.

In my view, honourable senators, the interpretation given yesterday is a clear and reasonable interpretation. But if we are completely wrong, and if, in fact, appeals cannot be made on the points to which the report refers, and if there is difficulty in that respect, what we have now on the record is an indication from the minister that the legislation before us will be amended to provide the right of appeal.

Coming now to the question of liaison with the provinces, the wording of the statement made by Senator Hayden, chairman of the committee, is a quotation from the minister to the effect that he thought the provinces, under the bill, should be consulted, but that they should not have a right of veto—and here I am paraphrasing. This is primarily a piece of federal legislation intended for the benefit of all of Canada. We did not go into the reasons, and I do not at this time propose to go into the background and the reasons which urged the Government of Canada at this time to bring forward this kind of legislation. The fact remains that the legislation is now before us, and it is federal legislation.

There may be some doubts in the minds of some people as to whether it is constitutional. I do not say that it is or that it is not—I have an open mind about it. But I was impressed, and I think the committee was impressed, with the expressed intention of the minister to consult very closely with the provinces in respect of all matters in connection with both foreign takeovers of existing Canadian companies and the formation of new Canadian business enterprises by non-eligible persons. From a practical point of view, it was pointed out to the committee yesterday—and the minister and the officials agreed—that in almost every case of an important takeover, or the establishment of an important new enterprise, the province is likely to discover the existence of such proposals in advance of discovery by, and notice being given to, federal officials. I do not think there is a great chance that the provinces would be kept in the dark in any particular in respect of important takeovers, or in respect of the establishment of new important enterprises.

Honourable senators, I am very proud of the work that the Senate committee has done on this bill, and in the past I expressed my pride in work of a similar character done on the income tax reform bill of 1971. I think that a great deal more credit than he has been given is due to the chairman of the committee for the way in which he has enabled the committee to deal with these matters in advance of our receiving the bills. The committee was enabled to provide itself with suitable staff so that the members had expert advice as they did their work. Our chairman's conduct of the meetings has been a great contribution to the work of the Senate and, even more, a great contribution to the work of Parliament.

Hon. Ernest C. Manning: Honourable senators, we are specifically debating whether this bill should be sent back to the committee with instructions to make the amendment that has been proposed. I think you will agree that in debating such an amendment it is almost unavoidable that we go beyond the terms of the amendment itself, or beyond the motion itself, and consider the reasons why such a motion would be proposed. I hope that I will be permitted that latitude.

I had intended to make some comments on the principle of this bill when it received second reading, but unfortunately I was not able to be in attendance on that occasion. I shall not personally support the motion to refer this bill back to committee for this one specific amendment, because if such an amendment were desirable and if such an amendment were made, it would still not come to grips with what I consider to be the most serious aspects of this particular piece of legislation.

I endorse fully the commendation expressed by Senator Connolly of the excellent work done on this bill by the committee, and by its chairman. On the occasion when he introduced this bill in the Senate and on the occasion of dealing with his report, he has outlined in his usual clear and explicit manner the provisions and implications of this particular piece of legislation. But quite frankly, the more I hear this bill explained, and the clearer its provisions become by reason of those explanations, the more disturbed I am that we are placing legislation of this kind on the statute books of Canada at all.

We are entering a period in this country when we are going to require investment capital on a scale unequalled in any previous period in our history. In the current energy crisis alone, it has been estimated that Canada will require probably $30 billion in the next ten years if we are to develop adequately our energy resources to avert what otherwise may be serious shortages in the years ahead. I am very disturbed to see us passing legislation which amounts to one more impediment in the way of obtaining adequate foreign investment capital in this country. It can correctly be said that this bill does not prevent foreign investment capital coming into Canada. It indicates, however, an attitude and position on the part of the Government of Canada that creates very grave doubts in the minds of foreign investors. It is the indirect impact of such legislation that, I suggest, may well cost this country millions of dollars of much needed foreign investment capital in the critical years which lie ahead.

● (1500)

I look back over the past and I frankly hate to think where we would be in Western Canada in resource development had there been this type of impediment in the way of American investment 30 years ago. My first great concern, therefore, is as to the necessity of such legislation at all. This bill has been talked about in the media and across Canada as a bill to prevent foreign takeovers. That misconception needs to be repeatedly dispelled. No one can take over a business in this country without the free will consent of the owner or owners of that business. Every transaction we are talking about that this bill will touch is a transaction in which Canadian owners of a company have initiated steps to sell their equity to a foreign investor, or have been approached by a foreign investor with an inquiry as to whether they are prepared to sell all or part of their equity. When governments start interfering with the right of Canadians, individually or collectively, to dispose of assets which they rightly own, government is injecting itself into a field that leads to results the consequences of which can be very detrimental in the long run to the well-being of this country and the development of its economy. I cannot escape the conclusion that there is little, if any, necessity for such legislation in Canada. Primarily it is another government capitulation to the political pressures of the socialistic elements in this country which have always been biased against foreign investment and, particularly, against United States investment. I am disturbed to see a bill going on the statute books that employs the method that this bill employs to accomplish its objective. What we are doing is putting in the hands of a minister of the Crown very broad discretionary powers. We are establishing for him an advisory or screening committee to recommend to him whether he should or should not approve certain sales of Canadian companies, or permit the establishment of certain new companies by other than Canadian citizens. That is a very bad method to employ. If it is necessary to introduce some type of legislation along these lines, surely it would be far better to spell out specifically in the statute what is required of foreign investors wishing to own all or part of a company in Canada. Then the investor would know in advance precisely the rules with which he must comply before he comes to this country. This business of leaving these vital decisions to the discretionary powers of ministers who change from time to time and to advisory committees, whose judgment may be influenced by political considerations which have nothing, or very little to do with the issue at stake, inevitably creates an atmosphere of uncertainty in the minds of investors. This again has a very detrimental impact as far as the flow of essential investment capital to this country is concerned.

Finally, there is this matter of constitutionality. I was sorry that the chairman did not deal with that specifically in this report. Surely the fact that this bill applies to companies incorporated under provincial statutes does raise a serious constitutional question. The government of Canada, if it was going to insist on this type of legislation, would have been well advised to refer the bill to the Supreme Court of Canada for a ruling on that important constitutional point. I can see difficulties arising down the road when the federal government interferes with the sale of a company which is incorporated entirely under the companies act of a province, and perhaps operating only in that province. It is unwise to leave an issue of that importance in doubt until action is initiated with respect to a specific case. In the meantime the element of uncertainty is left in an important constitutional field.

In my view it is not practicable to attempt to make amendments to this statute that would meet the major objectives. I agree with the section of the report that points this out quite clearly. I am not only unimpressed, but I am afraid of the position in which this matter is being left as far as consultation with the provinces is concerned. We have seen from past experience that the meaning attached to consultation with the provinces by the Government of Canada and the meaning attached to the procedure by the provinces are often two very different things. We have some very unhappy situations in Canada today due to this difference of interpretation as to what is meant by consultation between federal ministers and the governments of the provinces. That is not a good basis on which to leave an issue of this importance.

My conclusion, therefore, is that I see no purpose in referring the bill again to committee for one or two specific amendments. Had the motion been that the bill not be read a third time, but given a six-month hoist, that would have been a far more practical motion and I would have supported it. In my view this bill should be withdrawn altogether and redrafted, if the decision is that we must have such legislation at all. It should be redrafted to spell out in the statute itself the specific restraints considered necessary of foreign investment in Canada which, under this legislation, are left to the discretion of a minister of the Crown.

For those reasons I cannot do other than oppose altogether the legislation in its present form.

Hon. L. P. Beaubien: Honourable senators, I agree very much with Senator Manning, Senator Cook and Senator Lang. During the years that I have been in the financial business I have never seen any kind of foreign investment in Canada that has been detrimental. Nearly all senators who live in the different provinces of Canada and have spoken in this connection have stressed the tremendous good that has been generated in various regions by foreign investment. Take Labrador, for instance. There is no question that enormous changes have been brought about there through foreign investment.

● (1510)

The development at Churchill Falls, which produces something like seven million horsepower at a cost of less than $1 billion, is of tremendous benefit to Canada and particularly to the province of Quebec. It will go on being an increasing benefit as the cost of all other kinds of competing energy increase.

The different dams built above Churchill Falls form a retaining lake the size of Ireland. The dams are there forever, and the power thus generated is purchased at the Labrador border by Quebec Hydro. This cheap power is a great benefit to every inhabitant of Quebec and the development would not have been possible without foreign capital.

I would like to give the house two or three figures to illustrate my point. Let us take, as an example, Imperial Oil. We have always been told that the oil industry is nearly 100 per cent foreign-owned. I work with an estate that purchased 100 shares of Imperial Oil in 1919 at a cost of $2,000. Later that year each share was split four for one. In 1925 the stock was split four for one for the second time. In 1969 each Imperial share was split four for one for the third time. At that stage the estate owned 6,400 shares. Multiply that by the price the stock is selling at today, and you get a value of $256,000.

Imperial Oil has 129,500,000 shares outstanding of which the parent company owns 69.8 per cent. The remaining 30.2 per cent are mostly held by Canadians, and a lot of it is in our different pension funds. That means that Canadians own 38 million shares of Imperial Oil, and if you multiply that by today's price of $42 you come up with the astronomical figure of $1.6 billion.

That is a lot of money. To give honourable senators an idea of how much money it really is let me point out that CPR has 71 million shares outstanding. Multiply that by today's price of $14.50 and the answer is $1 billion. Bank of Montreal has 34 million shares issued. At $18.50 a share that works out to $600 million. In other words, the Canadian public's investment in Imperial Oil is equal to the combined value of the CPR and Bank of Montreal. The total value of Bell Canada common shares is about $1.4 billion, and that of Royal Bank shares is $1.1 billion. It is not surprising that Imperial Oil is a popular stock with the pension funds that are being built up, year after year, to protect the Canadian worker.

Getting back to the bill, I should like to compliment Senator Hayden on the way he dealt with it. As Senator Connolly said, our method of going through the bill, and studying the substance of it, was of great help. By so doing we were able to see the weaknesses of the bill.

In my opinion, there should be some amendments. I do not like the feeling that exists in the Senate that come what may no bill should be amended and sent back to the other place; the attitude that they are having trouble in the other place and, therefore, no matter what happens, we will not amend any bill. I think that is a wrong attitude. It is very wrong.

For my part, I do not like the bill. I do not think it is needed. I agree with Senator Manning. Therefore I shall vote against the bill in every way that I can.

If we could vote for the amendment and send it back to the other place, it might die. I think that is the best thing that could happen to it. Therefore I shall vote against the bill, or I shall vote for the amendment, whichever comes first.

Hon. Eugene A. Forsey: Honourable senators, I merely wish to say that if the amendment proposed by Senator Flynn were confined to the first half of it, I should be strongly inclined to vote for it. In fact, I would. I have no objection to the first half of the amendment, the compulsory furnishing of information to the provinces. This provides for what seems to me to be consultation in the proper sense of the term.

But with the second half of the amendment, I am not in sympathy at all. Assuming that the legislation is within the power of Parliament, which I think it is, then there seems to me no reason at all for offering the provinces a veto on a matter of national policy.

If anybody says the legislation is unconstitutional and should be referred to the Supreme Court, my answer would be that, on the whole, experience has demonstrated that it is better that legislation should go before the courts in the form of concrete cases rather than in the form of reference cases.

Hon. Mr. Everett: Honourable senators, my point is not really addressed to the amendment but rather to the principle of the report that is before us. I am prepared to wait until after we have dealt with the amendment before discussing this matter, if that is your wish.

Hon. Mr. Martin: On third reading.

Hon. Mr. Everett: On third reading.

The Hon. the Speaker: With leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(b), it is moved by the Honourable Senator Hayden, seconded by the Honourable Senator Bourget, P.C., that this bill be now read a third time.

In amendment, it is moved by the Honourable Senator Flynn, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Choquette, that this bill be not now read a third time, but that it be referred back to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce with specific instructions to amend it by adding new clauses to provide—

Hon. Senators: Dispense.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is it your pleasure to adopt the motion in amendment?

Some Hon. Senators: Yes.

Some Hon. Senators: No.

The Hon. the Speaker: Will those honourable senators in favour of Senator Flynn's motion in amendment please say "yea".

Some Hon. Senators: Yea.

The Hon. the Speaker: Will those who are against Senator Flynn's motion in amendment please say "nay".

Some Hon. Senators: Nay.

The Hon. the Speaker: In my opinion the "nays" have it.

And more than two honourable senators having risen.

The Hon. the Speaker: I declare the motion in amendment lost.

Hon. Douglas D. Everett: Honourable senators, before we proceed to third reading of this bill I have some comments I wish to make. My comments are not related to the bill itself as much as they are to the principle of the report.

Like Senator Connolly, I congratulate Senator Hayden on the departure he took with respect to Bill C-259, the income tax legislation, and with respect to the bill now before us, undertaking the pre-study in order to permit our committee to examine the bill and to consider it fully without being rushed by legislative requirements. On the other hand, in the case of Bill C-259, the undertaking by the minister was to bring forward certain specific amendments to the bill. The Senate passed Bill C-259 on that basis, that the amendments to be made by the minister were of a specific nature.

● (1530)

It seems to me that there is a new principle arising out of Bill C-132. After its first hearings, the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, reported on July 12, and it recommended 16 alterations to the bill. The committee states, in its present report which was tabled here today, that 10 of those were accepted and the bill was amended accordingly, but that six of them were left open.

On page 2 of the report, the committee outlined the four areas that were left open:

(1) Provision for adequate recourse to the courts;

(2) The role of the provinces;

(3) The position of real estate transactions under the bill; and

(4) The presumption . . . that 5 per cent share ownership constitutes acquisition of control.

The principle that bothers me is that we passed Bill C-259 because we had an undertaking that "specific" amendments would be made. Here we have passed the bill and the undertakings are that the bill will be administered in a certain way or that certain unspecified amendments will be made to the bill. I just caution the Senate that this is perhaps a poor principle on which to pass legislation.

One of the areas was provincial participation in the review process. In the July 12 report to the Senate, recommendations for specific amendments were made. In the report before us it says that "the minister stated in very specific terms his proposals for communication and consultation with the provinces."

On the question of appeals, in the July 12 report we recommended that certain provisions, certain amendments, be made to provide for appeals on specific grounds. In the report before us, the minister undertook that "should these remedies not prove efficacious in practice after an opportunity for some experience under the bill, he would recommend that appropriate amendments be brought forward," not specific amendments but appropriate amendments; in other words, amendments that he would bring forward at the time.

Under the question of presumption of control, in the July 12 report the committee recommended that the 5 per cent figure should be increased to 10 per cent. In the report before us, the minister "undertook to recommend amendments to the legislation to increase the figure if experience indicated that the 5 per cent figure, arbitrarily selected in the first place, proved lower than was necessary to properly accomplish its purposes."

The point I am making is that what we have done here is to pass legislation on the basis of the minister's statement that either he will administer it in a certain way or he will bring forth appropriate amendments which he will draft at the time.

I can appreciate that this course has been necessary in order to handle this legislation, but I caution the Senate that we should be very careful about going too far in this direction. What in effect we may be saying is, "Bring forth any legislation that you like and assure us that you will administer it in a certain way and we will pass it."

That assumes a number of things. It assumes that the same minister is going to be there; it assumes that the same principles are going to apply, and it assumes that the minister who is going to be there understands the same criteria as the committee does in respect to future amendments and the operation of the bill.

This is not an area in which I am sufficiently knowledgeable to say that we should not go forward in respect of this bill. I think it was necessary in respect of this bill, but this is an area where we should be very cautious in the future about going further. When we are dealing with a bill, it seems to me that our responsibility is to pass the bill or to amend it. At the worst, we could do what we did with Bill C-259, pass it on the undertaking that amendments will be made subsequently. But it is very dangerous to pass a bill on the basis of certain undertakings having been given as to how it will be administered or that it might be amended some day if it is not working properly.

● (1540)

Hon. George van Roggen: Honourable senators, I did not take the opportunity of speaking on this bill on second reading, but, if you will permit me, I will now take just two or three minutes to express one or two views I have relative to it.

Particularly as someone coming from one of the distant provinces of this country—

Hon. Mr. Flynn: One of the wealthy provinces.

Hon. Mr. van Roggen: —we have to be always a little bit on our guard, I feel. One or two of my friends might say to me, jokingly I know, "Well, George, we would expect you to vote against this bill." However, I will not be voting against the bill, because to do so would be, in a sense, simply to vote against the past. It is my personal view that much of the problem we have in Canada with respect to foreign control—and I use the word "control" as opposed to "ownership," which I will deal with in a moment—is of our own devising. It has resulted in our almost totally branch-plant-manufacturing economy, which is something we have created—nobody has imposed it upon us. I have spoken on that subject before so I will not bore you with further remarks on it now, but the problem has been forthcoming for many years. We have created it, and we should be clear about it, and clear that it is not some nasty foreigners who have imposed it upon us.

We are faced, however, with the situation as it exists today. Unfortunately, we cannot go back into the past and cure the past. The situation today is that foreign investment in Canada is approximately $50 billion, of which I believe United States investment is approximately $35 billion. Those are just approximate figures, incidentally. Now, those are very large figures, and we have heard repeated, particularly by the NDP, ad nauseam, that it is "a huge percentage of this industry" and "a huge percentage of that industry," but let us keep in mind that in terms of a mortgage on the family farm, to use the vernacular, it is not that much.

Our gross national product this year will be about $120 billion. In other words, about 40 per cent of it is represented by foreign investment. That is like the situation in which a man with $10,000 income has a mortgage on his home of $4,000—not a very serious state of affairs; not one we need to panic over.

I hope the minister will keep these facts in mind when he starts administering the bill. However, we do have a high level of control in a number of sensitive industries in this country—a control wholly outside of Canada—and as a British Columbian I have in recent years been taken with the sophistication and sensitivity of Japanese investors coming into British Columbia. They are sensitive because at home they do not allow uncontrolled foreign investment to take control of their different industries. They display sensitivity in coming into British Columbia and arriving at partnership arrangements with Canadian investors, where the Japanese will bring in much of the capital, take a small percentage of the equity, possibly set up purchasing arrangements for the products from the plants, and allow for large Canadian equity participation.

One of the reasons I am voting for this bill is that it will give the minister a bargaining tool to enable him to persuade foreign investors to come forward with sophisticated approaches when they wish to come into Canada with foreign investment. These could be sophisticated approaches with regard to establishing proper research and development in Canada, finding Canadian partners and going the extra mile in trying to make arrangements which will see equity in the hands of Canadians in addition to foreign equity.

This has not been the case in the past. In the past, business by its insensitivity has brought upon itself much of the present mood of the country in this respect, and it has nothing but itself to blame.

To provide this bargaining tool to the minister and to the government, I am going to support this legislation. But I do wish to make the point that I fully appreciate the fact that this bill puts entirely in the hands of the government a veto over every substantial foreign investment in Canada in the future, whether for new business or for buying out an existing business, and that is a remarkable power for a government to take unto itself.

I simply wish to make the statement that I, for one, will be watching very carefully to see that this bill is not administered for the sole benefit of Ontario, as has been the case relative to tariffs over the past one hundred years—to the disadvantage of the rest of this country.

FURTHER MOTION IN AMENDMENT NEGATIVED

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, after the two speeches we have just listened to, as well as Senator Manning's speech, I think I should give the Senate the opportunity of making a decision on the question of appeals and on the question of the discretion given to the minister.

As I have indicated, when the committee made its recommendation last July as to the necessity of providing appeals from the rulings of the minister or the recommendations of the minister to the Cabinet to disallow given investment, it stated that there should be an appeal to the Federal Court. We knew then that the Federal Court provided for certain appeals. But obviously we must not have been satisfied with the provisions. Now, just because an official of the department comes and tells us that we should not worry about this or that any more, because in his opinion it is already provided for, we simply abandon the recommendation as though it had lost all relevance and value.

The recommendation we made with regard to appeals was in keeping with the attitude taken by this body in 1961 in the famous "class or kind" bill. In that case we did not budge. The minister at that time, as the minister does today, assured us that he would be very careful. The minister of that day had a much easier decision to make. He had only to decide whether a certain piece of equipment was or was not of the class or kind manufactured in Canada. That was merely an administrative decision. Yet, the Senate insisted upon providing an appeal from the decision of the minister. It was insistent. It would not budge.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: And it had the effect of killing the bill.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Yes, the bill was killed.

I suppose we are all in the same mood today, especially the Leader of the Government, who in 1961, as a member of the other place, fought for that amendment to be adopted by the Senate. In fact, I see many senators here who supported that amendment at that time. It will interest me to see how they vote on the amendment I am about to propose. We will see whether there is any consistency in the way they vote or whether their votes are simply mindless partisan acts prompted only by the desire to maintain this weak government in power.

I move, seconded by Senator Choquette:

> That the bill be not now read a third time but that it be referred back to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce with specific instructions to amend it to provide for an appeal to the Federal Court, at the instance of any party to the transaction, from any ruling of the Minister and any decision made by the Minister to recommend to the Governor in Council that the investment be disallowed.

This is, in substance, in accordance with the recommendation of the report of the committee. I have omitted the details of the procedure which should be followed, because I know that, if the matter is referred again to committee, Senator Hayden will be able to draft the precise provisions required to make the bill efficient.

I am quite sure I am going to have the support of all those who in 1961 wanted to have an appeal from the decision of the minister in that famous class or kind bill.

● (1550)

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45 (1) (b), it is moved by the Honourable Senator Hayden, seconded by the Honourable Senator Bourget, P.C., that this bill be now read a third time.

In amendment, it is moved by the Honourable Senator Flynn, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Choquette, that this bill be not now read a third time, but that it be referred back to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce with specific instructions to amend it to provide for an appeal to the Federal Court, at the instance of any party to the transaction, from any ruling of the minister and any decision made by the minister to recommend to the Governor in Council that the investment be disallowed.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion in amendment?

Hon. Lionel Choquette: Honourable senators, I would like to say just a few words on that. When I hear "class or kind", I recall that I was the one who introduced that bill a year or two after my appointment to this house. Then, as today, there was just a small group on the Conservative side, but we were in power. Again, we had, on the other side of the house, in opposition then, an impressive array of Liberals such as we have today. However, I would like to recall for your benefit just a few of the expressions that were used then.

The minister in question was the Honourable George Nowlan—a kindly sort of man. I do not think he would have abused his powers.

Hon. Mr. McElman: A good Maritimer.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Yes, and we referred to him then—and I am sure Senator Hayden will recall this—as "Fidel Castro". We went as far as that. We were giving him the same powers as Fidel Castro possessed. Others made great dissertations and compared him to Louis XIV who said, "L'état, c'est moi." The speeches were most eloquent, and it was suggested that the powers contemplated would constitute an abuse of authority, but it was pointed out that that could not possibly happen in Canada.

I remember one senator who said, "I am leary now. I have to draw up my will, and when I see such powers about to be given to some of our politicians and statesmen, I do not know to what members of my family I will bequeath my estate". I nearly answered, "Why do you not leave it to the one who is the least pompous of your family?" But those were the kinds of speeches that I had to listen to as a new arrival in the Senate.

I have not got the bill before me, with all the debates, but from recollection I am just reminding those honourable senators who were here then of some of the expressions, some of the speeches made, and some of the vehemence used, at that time. I ask you to recall that today, and compare how easy it was for the then minister to say, "This machinery is of the same colour, and the same dimensions. It has a few bolts here, with perhaps a few more on that side than on this side, but that is all we will be called upon to decide, and I will have experts who will advise me." It was said at that time, "Oh, no. You are going to have the same powers as Fidel Castro."

I am just reminding honourable senators of those expressions that were used at that time, and of the attitude that the Liberals took when I introduced the bill on "class or kind".

Hon. H. Carl Goldenberg: Honourable senators, I am one of those who were not here in 1961, and I assume that Senator Flynn will allow me to vote the way I choose to vote that is, according to my conscience.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Whether I allow you to do so or not, you will do it just the same—and it will always be the same way.

Hon. Mr. Goldenberg: I certainly will, but I just want to remind Senator Flynn of a difference in the situation that existed in 1961, as compared with the situation today.

There was no Federal Court in 1961. There was no special court to which appeals could be made from decisions by administrative boards and other quasi-judicial bodies. There was no such court then, but there is today. As a lawyer, I naturally believe in appeals, and there is a provision in the Federal Court Act, as Senator Hayden pointed out this afternoon, for appeals from federal administrative bodies.

Now, I do not believe that there should be an appeal from the minister's decision that an investment is not of "significant benefit" to Canada. That is not a matter for a court to decide. However, it is for a court to decide whether the minister is right when he says that under the act a person is eligible or not eligible, or when he says there has been an acquisition or there has not been an acquisition. A court can decide on that. The matter of "significant benefit" is not something that is proper for decision by a court. I therefore feel that under the legislation as proposed the right of appeal is protected in so far as it should exist.

Again I would remind the Senate that while it is easy to talk of 1961—I remember that occasion very well; I was not too young then either—there was then no Federal Court; there was no provision for appeals such as is now available.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: May I ask the honourable senator a question? When the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee brought down its report in July, and recommended specifically that there should be an appeal, did he protest? Did he bring in his argument that there should not be any appeal? Did he disagree with the committee at that time?

Hon. Mr. Goldenberg: I am not a member of the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee—

Hon. Mr. Flynn: You do not have to be a member to disagree.

Hon. Mr. Goldenberg: —and I too, like Senator Flynn, sometimes do not attend meetings of committees.

Hon. John M. Godfrey: Honourable senators, in my speech on the bill I dealt with the question of the right of appeal, and I was relying to a great extent upon a brief submitted by the Ontario Section of the Canadian Bar Association, and the report of the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee of the Senate, in my reference to the fact that there was no such right of appeal.

When we heard from Mr. Gibson, of the Department of Justice, yesterday that, in effect, there was a right of appeal under section 18, by the use of certiorari and prohibition, I decided that on this occasion I would not rely on Mr. Gibson but would do a little independent legal research of my own, which I did. As a result, I have come to the conclusion, particularly in view of the opinion given by Mr. Gibson and the statement made by the minister to the committee yesterday, that in fact there is a right of appeal under section 18 on the question of whether or not a person or a company is non-eligible.

There may have been some doubt before, but now, in opposing any motion of certiorari or prohibition, I would suggest that no government lawyer could contend that the court did not have jurisdiction, that it could not listen to it, in effect, like an appeal. I say that especially in view of the statement made by Mr. Gibson and by the minister yesterday. So what might have been a doubtful position before I think now is quite clear, and that is that there is, in effect, a right of appeal.

Hon. Charles McElman: Honourable senators, I do not propose to enter this debate between the barristers, but I would like some information. It is my understanding that there is judicial review on all these matters that lie within the decision of the minister, but when it comes to a decision as to "significant benefit" there is no judicial review, and this has to go to the Cabinet, and when a decision is reached there it then becomes a policy decision of the government. Am I correct thus far?

Hon. Mr. Martin: That is right.

Hon. Mr. McElman: Senator Flynn has raised, for purposes of comparison, the 1961 case. I was not here at that time, and I am not familiar with the details, but I do ask: Is there not some difference, in that what we are talking about now—that can be reviewed judicially are administrative decisions up to a point where a recommendation is made for a policy decision? Is it not true that the other matter concerned a ministerial decision made in an administrative capacity? That differs substantially from a policy decision by government.

● (1600)

I disagree with some who have spoken, that there is no necessity for this bill, but I will get into that, perhaps, at another time. There is, in my view, a necessity for such legislation currently. But it seems to me that in matters where the government of the land makes a policy decision, this should not be subjected to the decision of the courts.

I suggest—and if I am wrong I wish someone would explain it to me—that we are dealing with two very different situations in comparing the 1961 situation with the present situation.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: If you take it that the bill gives complete discretionary power to the minister and that the guidelines and the words "significant benefit to Canada" do not mean a thing, or can be interpreted a hundred different ways, you are entirely right. But I will say to you that, unless I am entirely mistaken, when the committee last July recommended an appeal, it was because it considered the situation analogous to that which obtained in 1961.

Hon. Mr. McElman: I have a few further words I should like to say, and I hope that before this debate closes we will hear, as I am sure we shall, from Senator Hayden on this point. Before leaving the subject I should like to say that while I am not a member of the committee I enjoyed the sessions yesterday, and I would not like to see any inference left that Senator Hayden had done something improper, or something untoward in his drafting. I think he did us all a very great service.

Senator Flynn has run for office on occasion, as have others, and I am sure that in such situations some people running for office prepare two speeches in advance of election night.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Only one—the one in case of defeat. The other is very easy. Don't worry about that.

Hon. Mr. McElman: I think we have an exceedingly good chairman of that committee, and he takes prudent action so that the committee can move rapidly.

The only other comment I should like to make, honourable senators, is that it has been suggested that there might be something amiss because all of the recommendations forwarded in earlier meetings of the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee have not thus far been embodied in the bill before us. Well, I think that, in the case of some of those recommendations, not all members of the committee today are convinced that they were right in the recommendations they made at that time. Further discussions have been held, and perhaps some views have changed.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Not views; only perspectives.

Hon. Mr. McElman: That was indicated, perhaps, in the discussion in the committee yesterday. I gathered the view that perhaps some of these opinions had changed quite substantially.

As to the danger expressed by Senator Everett, I do not think I entirely share his view. It has been proven to us that in order for Canada to continue in the way that most of us want it to continue, we have to learn, as some of our leaders have done in the past and others will do in the future, the honourable art of compromise.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Will you compromise when this government has been replaced?

Hon. Mr. McElman: I beg your pardon?

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Will you compromise after this government has been replaced?

Hon. Mr. Martin: That would be a compromise in itself.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: It would be a catastrophe for a partisan like you!

Hon. Mr. McElman: According to the latest Gallup poll, if the government were to be changed, that would be a compromise of the wishes of the Canadian people. The figures are 43 per cent for the Liberals, 33 per cent for the Conservatives, and so on.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Are you talking about the Senate?

An Hon. Senator: I have no faith in polls.

Hon. Mr. McElman: In any event, honourable senators, there is need in this country for compromise, and many of the great problems have been solved by compromise. I ask you: What position would we be in today if we had not proceeded with this new course introduced by the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee, of examining bills in advance of their coming before us? We would be faced with a situation in which we would be forced into either a great compromise or the destruction of this bill. And, honourable senators, I would not want to see the destruction of this bill because I think there is enough good in it, and it sufficiently promotes the interests of Canada, that we should pass it.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: There is no danger?

Hon. Mr. Flynn: You are not really worried?

Hon. Mr. McElman: The process in use now has gained for the Senate quite an amount of prestige, and has not acted to its detriment.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: That is news to me.

Hon. Mr. McElman: The Senate's input has been accepted, and the bill has been improved.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Not substantially.

[Hon. Mr. McElman.]

Hon. Mr. McElman: All things have not been accepted, but I think that in compromise the Senate has done good work, and we should be rather happy with it at this point.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(b), it is moved by the Honourable Senator Hayden, seconded by the Honourable Senator Bourget, P.C., that this bill be now read the third time.

In amendment, it is moved by the Honourable Senator Flynn, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Choquette, that the bill be not now read a third time but that it be referred back to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce with specific instructions to amend it to provide for an appeal to the Federal Court, at the instance of any party to the transaction, from any ruling of the Minister and any decision made by the Minister to recommend to the Governor in Council that the investment be disallowed.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion in amendment?

Some Hon. Senators: Yes.

Some Hon. Senators: No.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: The "yeas" carry.

The Hon. The Speaker: Will those in favour say "yea"?

Some Hon. Senators: Yea.

The Hon. the Speaker: Will those against say "nay"?

Some Hon. Senators: Nay.

The Hon. the Speaker: In my opinion the "nays" have it.

And more than two honourable senators having risen.

The Hon. the Speaker: Please call in the senators.

The Hon. the Speaker: I declare the motion in amendment lost.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Another one lost.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read a third time?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: With leave, now.

Honourable senators, I am now speaking to the motion for third reading. I would like to make one or two comments, particularly in answer to my friend, Senator Flynn.

This report is the report of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce. In its proceedings the first decision made by the committee, on a vote by a show of hands—and the vote was ten to one—was to report the bill without amendment. In those circumstances, I find it difficult to accept Senator Flynn's statement that I influenced the committee.

● (1620)

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I am not being critical, but you always do.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: My friend says I "always do," but he does not get around what he said by offering that kind of explanation, because he used that expression in the context of criticism of the actions of the committee, and suggested that the report came about because the chairman influenced the committee. Those honourable senators who are members of the committee, and who are here today, can speak for themselves. They had the opportunity. There was a free vote, and they voted to report the bill without amendment.

My friend can be as logical or illogical, as rational or irrational, as he likes in relation to any provision in the bill. We are now debating the motion for third reading. If he finds anything in the report which he feels should have been incorporated in the bill, it is perfectly open to him to say so. But if he presumes that the committee proceeded on the basis of accepting undertakings from the minister, and says that I was responsible for that, then I assure him that he is in error, and I hope it was not a well thought out statement on his part.

The illogic of it is that, notwithstanding the fact of the influence which he has attributed to me in committee, he has suggested, in his motions and in speaking in support of them, that the bill go back to committee, and that I be deputed to draft the necessary form of amendments. On the second motion, he suggested that the bill go back to committee. If I behaved in that way, my friend would give his own answer. The answer must be that the report represents the free action of the members of the committee.

Many other honourable senators were there, and they participated in the debate, and expressed their views. Some of their views were incorporated in the report in its final form. Senator Godfrey, who is not a member of the committee, was present. He was very active, and several of his worthwhile suggestions were included in the report.

The chairman tries to expedite the business of the committee—that is a legitimate operation—and tries to simplify and clarify the procedures. I think that is the duty of the chairman.

If honourable senators accept statements that I make, it must be because they think they are reasonable and intelligent, and the assumption must be that all senators are intelligent.

What struck me as important is that the criticism of the conduct of yesterday's meeting came from one who was not there. I do not know in what form the conduct of the meeting was related to him in order that he should make the reference to the chairman that he did. But I am not happy about it. We have been good friends, and we are not going to cease from being good friends. That is why I am speaking frankly to my honourable friend.

Perhaps I am being touchy, and perhaps I have a right to be, because my friend was very vigorous and impassioned in his remarks. He took almost a campaigning attitude—an attitude I would expect on the platform. Of course, if any honourable senator wishes to indulge in that form of speechmaking here, it is perfectly all right. But there should be a stage of personal criticism beyond which we should not go.

I would hate to feel every time a committee presents a report with which Senator Flynn does not agree, that one of the allegations made is that the report is presented in such a form because of the influence of the chairman. I do not influence the committee. I convey all the information that I have. I try to extract from witnesses all the information which I think is pertinent. In addition, members of the committee can ask their own questions.

I turn now to the question of appeals, which seems to have a particular attraction. In my view—I use the word "view" advisedly—many years ago, when I was much younger in the practice of law, I said to an older man, a well known counsel, that I was feeling particularly good that day because the Supreme Court of Canada had said that I was right in a factum I had written, and the appeal was argued on that basis before the court. I shall always remember his reply. He said, "You can never say that you are right in law. All you can say is that the court took your view of the law." When my friend refers to the relationship between the appeals that we provided in the report, and the interpretation of the appeal section in the Federal Court Act, I take it that he is expressing an opinion, that he is not going so far as to say that he is right.

My view of the law is exactly opposite to the one he has stated. Neither of us may turn out to be correct in the final analysis, after a judge has made a decision. But at least, in section 18 of the Federal Court Act the scope for an appeal or judicial review is very broad. The trial judge there has jurisdiction to issue an injunction, a writ of certiorari, a writ of prohibition, a writ of mandamus, a writ of quo warranto, or grant declaratory relief.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: But not against the Crown.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: It is in the clearest language. We provide for an appeal from the ruling of the minister. There is an appeal to the Trial Division of the Federal Court, which is the final and conclusive appeal.

I am not defending which way an appeal should go. I am merely saying that the committee took the view, after hearing all the evidence and the views of the minister—and there are many lawyers on the committee—that the appeal under section 18 is adequate.

I think it was Senator Everett who raised a question about an appropriate amendment. The minister, in reply, said:

> The statements which Mr. Gibson has made in the course of the foregoing discussion—

That was the discussion on the appeal section, section 18.

> —indicate the substance of the advice which I have received in the course of the development of this bill from the Department of Justice. In summary, it is to the effect that appropriate opportunities for judicial review, and thus appropriate judicial safeguards, are implicit in the scheme of the bill.
>
> These questions will, of course, be tested in the early period of administration of the legislation. In the event that experience indicates that the opportunities for judicial review are inadequate or the procedures are overly cumbersome or inappropriate... amendments will be introduced into the legislation.

● (1630)

That is the broadest kind of undertaking by the minister to implement the jurisdiction under section 18 of the Federal Court Act, in the event that some judge at some time takes the view that an applicant was not extended the full benefit of what is intended by this bill. I can only speak for myself, and those members of the committee who voted to support the report, in saying that this must have been an acceptable view.

I close my remarks by saying that this is the report of the committee which the Senate appointed, and to which it referred this bill for consideration and report. We reported on the bill itself, and the bill is different in many respects from the bill which your committee considered in June and July of this year. There were a lot of amendments which came during the course of the study in the other place.

This is the report of your committee. You are not bound by it. On third reading, honourable senators will vote for or against the substance of the bill. In that respect the report may or may not be persuasive, depending on the views of honourable senators.

[Hon. Mr. Hayden.]

Even now as I speak on this bill I am interpreting what I think is the attitude of the committee, and I am expressing my own views. But you do not have to take my position. You do not have to take the interpretation of the committee. You can form your own judgment, as you wish, in voting on third reading.

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, first I should like to apologize to Senator Hayden if I said anything to hurt his feelings. My ability to express myself in English is not as good as it is in French—at least, it has been suggested to me that that is the case. When I said that the report had been influenced by Senator Hayden, I did not mean anything disparaging.

Having sat on that committee for some years, and knowing the work he did on the report produced last July, I know very well the input of Senator Hayden with respect to this report. Since there is some change of view in the report that is now before us over the previous report, it can only be that Senator Hayden has altered his views. There is nothing wrong in altering one's views, or course. All I was trying to express, in making the remarks which I did, was that I am disappointed that Senator Hayden has changed his views.

When I questioned Senator Hayden the other day as to the time the committee would take to deal with this bill, I got the impression from his answer that it would take at least a whole day to hear the witnesses, which would have been yesterday, and that this morning we would study the bill clause by clause, at which time I would have been able to be present. The committee sat from 9.30 yesterday morning until about 12.30—and that is a fact—and then met for less than two hours in the afternoon. I suggest that there must have been some preparation of the report in the meantime in order for the committee to be in a position to adopt it, in general terms, yesterday afternoon.

I do not think Senator Hayden should be offended by my telling him that he has a very important influence upon the committee. He is very influential in both the committee and the Senate itself. Many of the achievements by this body can be attributed to him, and I say that without any reservation. But at the same time, I must express my disappointment. I had hoped to see the Senate stand on its feet with respect to this bill. But, what has happened? Our principal amendments to the bill have been killed; they have vanished. How can I feel anything but sorry? How can I be other than disappointed at the way in which the committee under Senator Hayden's chairmanship has reversed itself completely, has shamefully capitulated?

As far as the question of appeal is concerned, I do not think section 18 of the Federal Court Act applies to the Crown or to a minister of the Crown. It has to be a separate body from the Cabinet or a member of the Cabinet. I may be wrong, as Senator Hayden suggests, but I hasten to remind him that last July he was certainly in agreement with me.

In any event, it is fruitless to continue this discussion since the Senate has already passed its judgment on the amendment which I moved. We will see how it goes.

Again, honourable senators, as far as the committee report is concerned, if my words went further than my thoughts, I apologize. I hope I have now clarified my position, and I hope my position, as clarified, is acceptable to Senator Hayden and, as he has said, we will remain friends.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed, on division.

LEGAL AND CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRS

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MEET DURING SITTING OF THE SENATE

Hon. Leopold Langlois, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(a), moved:

> That the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs have power to sit while the Senate is sitting tomorrow, Thursday, December 13, and that rule 76(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

Motion agreed to.

FAMILY ALLOWANCES ACT, 1973

BILL TO AMEND—MOTION FOR THIRD READING

Hon. Leopold Langlois moved the third reading of Bill C-211, to provide for the payment of family allowances in respect of children to supplement the income of Canadian families and for the payment of special allowances to provide for the care and maintenance of other children, and to amend the Income Tax Act in consequence thereof.

MOTION IN AMENDMENT NEGATIVED

Hon. Hazen Argue: Honourable senators, at this point I move, in amendment, seconded by the honourable Senator Forsey:

> That the bill be not now read a third time but that it be amended as follows:
>
> 21A. The Minister shall each year enter into discussions with the provinces with the objective of assuring that all increases in payments of family allowances result in corresponding increases in payments to those receiving social assistance and to those receiving special allowances, and shall include the results of such discussions in his report on the administration of this Act.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, it is moved by Senator Langlois, seconded by Senator Martin, that this bill be now read the third time.

In amendment it is moved by Senator Argue, seconded by Senator Forsey:

> That the bill be not now read a third time but that it be amended as follows:
>
> 21A. The Minister shall each year enter into discussions with the provinces with the objective of assuring that all increases in payments of family allowances result in corresponding increases in payments to those receiving social assistance and to those receiving special allowances, and shall include the results of such discussions in his report on the administration of this Act.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion in amendment?

Hon. Mr. Argue: Honourable senators, I know that the Leader of the Government and other senators are anxious that this bill should be read the third time this afternoon so that it can receive royal assent.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Today? Is there still a question of today?

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Argue: The Minister of National Health and Welfare, the Honourable Marc Lalonde, has done great service to Canada in his major achievements in the field of social security up to this point. We all appreciate that as soon as this legislation is passed cheques will be mailed—and, of course, those who may receive such cheques will be happy to receive them as soon as possible.

I am putting forward this amendment, not necessarily because I have decided to call a recorded vote—which I have not called, as yet—but because I am most anxious to get support on the record from a number of senators for this general proposition. For my part, I am also prepared to co-operate to have this bill passed today in the hope that it might receive royal assent, and that these cheques may be placed in the mail as soon as possible.

I put this proposition before the Senate the other day, that there should be something in legislative form to make certain that, when the federal Parliament increases the family allowance or the old age pension those increases will arrive as an additional income in fact, or as an addition to the regular amount, particularly in the case of those Canadians who are on social welfare or who will be receiving special assistance under this legislation. It was objected then that the federal Parliament could not exercise power over the actions of provincial governments.

Therefore, this amendment has been drafted carefully, to avoid any suggestion that the Parliament of Canada is endeavouring to control or force provincial legislatures to act in a certain way. We are merely enunciating the proposition that we feel these additional payments should add, in a comparable amount, to the income of those people whom it is designed to benefit.

We make that proposition by suggesting in a legislative form that the minister should have formal annual consultations with his counterparts in the provinces, putting forth this proposition, and then reporting back as to what has happened in those consultations. I would hope that this will be the practice.

For my own part, I express a sincere hope that the minister and the government will endeavour to exercise their influence, so that these additional payments may be added to the incomes of those in receipt of family allowances or who are on welfare, and will not be used by any provincial government as an excuse to reduce the amount of the contributions—because if they did so, surely that would destroy the very reason for advancing this legislation.

Honourable senators, there is a school of thought that if we increase the benefits to large families and those on social welfare this will add to their income by such an amount as to provide a further discouragement to the head of the family to obtain employment, and, therefore, that these benefits should not be added to that income. I say that is a very negative attitude, and a very defeatist attitude.

If these welfare payments—which are subsistence payments—are being given to the point where they discourage individuals from working, then positive steps should be taken to make certain, by increasing the minimum wage or taking other steps, that those individuals will go out and obtain work so as to have a more adequate income. There should be an incentive to a person on welfare to go out and get work, and that incentive should be to allow that person to keep at least a part of the income he earns by going on the labour market, rather than deducting the whole income from his welfare payment, thereby telling him that as far as the country is concerned if he goes to work he will not improve the economic position of his family.

May I refer to a person, whom I shall not name, but with whom I have had some experience? This gentleman was on welfare. He had a large family, he went into the labour market and took a job. He came to me and said, "Hazen, I don't know whether to continue this job or not. My family is worse off now that I am working. I am earning about the same money as I got on welfare, but I must have a car to go to work now and that is expensive, and I don't know what to do." That gentleman quit working for some time because he was discouraged. However, he was quite skilled and, as luck would have it, some other person recognized his skill and hired him at a higher wage. Now he has a more adequate income. He is off welfare, and he is the happiest man you could meet.

Honourable senators, rather than taking a negative attitude and cutting down the welfare payments because an increase in family allowances might discourage persons from going to work, we should attack this problem from the reverse angle.

I hope that my proposition will receive some general support in the Senate, so that the Minister of National Health and Welfare, and others who read today's Senate Hansard, will get the impression that the Senate, whether by formal amendment or merely by statement, does feel that when the federal Parliament increases these allowances, those increases should be added to the income of those for whom they are intended.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Honourable senators, yesterday afternoon my honourable friend was good enough to give notice to this chamber of his intention to introduce an amendment today on third reading of this bill. I am grateful to him for having informed me today, a few minutes before we came into this chamber at 2 o'clock, of the wording of the amendment he is proposing.

● (1650)

I must say right now that I find a great deal of difference between the amendment he is now proposing and what he said yesterday afternoon. I see my honourable friend nodding his head, and I assume I am fair in my interpretation of the remarks he made yesterday afternoon.

[Hon. Mr. Argue.]

The purpose of this new amendment seems to be to obtain some kind of guarantee that the minister will enter into discussions on a yearly basis with his provincial counterparts with a view to obtaining assurances that all increases in payments of family allowances will result in corresponding increases in payments to those receiving social assistance and those receiving special allowances. The minister would also be requested to "include the results of such discussions in his report on the administration of this Act".

Well, I hardly think we need to clutter our statutes with directives of that kind to ministers of the Crown, who are already responsible to Parliament. Any member of Parliament at any sitting may rise in the House of Commons to ask a particular minister about his discussions with his provincial counterparts. He can also ask the minister to report on the results of such discussions. For that matter, the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science may call upon the minister at any time to answer the same questions. That same committee may do exactly the same kind of prompting which this amendment suggests.

For those reasons, I say we need not clutter our statutes with such directives to ministers of the Crown who, after all, are responsible to, and answerable to, Parliament.

When I introduced this bill on Monday evening, I underlined the fact that the bill is one of the objectives in the Working Paper on Social Security in Canada, which was tabled in April, and that the main objective of that working paper was to obtain a review of social security in Canada in developing a comprehensive social security system. I would add now that this system would be such that one element of it would bear a relationship to every other part.

I feel that the amendment now proposed is contrary to this and, in effect, would attempt to build up one element—that is, those on social assistance or in receipt of family allowances—while ignoring the consequences such a build-up would have on the rest of the system.

I also said on introducing this measure that the government was officially committed to this review of social security in Canada, which it is expected will be completed some time in April, 1975.

I wish to add that I am informed that working parties of federal and provincial officials are actively considering this matter and other important matters in this field. The federal authorities are also attempting to let provinces adjust their systems of social assistance—to which, by the way, the federal government contributes 50 per cent under the Canada Assistance Plan, by which means again we have some control—to reflect the priorities they, the provinces, have identified.

An example of this is to be found in Quebec, where priority is being given to single persons, many of whom are elderly or infirm and for whom the wait until they reach 65 years of age would be very difficult. At present they receive $149. Quebec has now revised its assistance rates to make that $175 as of January 1974, which is only a few dollars less than what the same person would receive by way of old age security and guaranteed income supplement.

It is also a well-known fact that all the provinces have just recently increased, or are about to increase, their social assistance rates. That is to be encouraged. I feel we should not try to hamstring their efforts at providing a more integrated social security system, which could well be the end result or effect of the proposed amendment.

The matter of considering family allowance benefits, when set by social assistance rates, can hardly be said to be new. It is impossible to believe that provincial officials do not realize that a given family is presently receiving extra benefits in family allowances. Certainly, that is in their minds when they set the social assistance rates for that family.

If we were to demand that the increases in family allowances result in corresponding increases in social assistance rates, as suggested in the amendment of my honourable friend, how could we be sure that the province would not simply neglect to increase those social assistance benefits for, say, a period of two to three years? Every family on social assistance should receive more than it is presently receiving. because of the fact that social assistance benefits are generally being increased by the provincial governments. However, provincial governments may wish to use the increase in family allowances to permit them to increase their social assistance benefits to certain particularly hard-hit categories more than to others.

I think there should be some flexibility left to the provincial governments because, after all, we must agree that social security is primarily the concern of the provincial governments, and, as I said yesterday, the flexibility provided in the present measure has been applauded by all premiers and all welfare ministers across Canada as being a most important step in the right direction.

Let us not now, by interfering with it, see go to waste all the work which was done at the level of all of the welfare ministers of Canada at the conference to which I referred. Rather, let us welcome the new trend toward discussion and consultation which has developed in Canada among the ministers of welfare at various levels, because with it they can work out a scheme of social security in this country which will reflect the various levels of competence of our governments.

I am ready to admit that there might be certain circumstances in which provincial governments would simply absorb any increase in federal benefits, even dollar for dollar, if you wish—and that is deplorable—but I do not know how we can stop it, or what we could do to stop it. Certainly, few people, if any, are well enough off that they do not need at least a portion of these increases. In any event, those instances cannot be completely done away with by legislation, such as the amendment now proposed by my honourable friend, for the reasons that I have previously outlined.

● (1700)

I am sure that my honourable friend will agree with me when I say that social security is quite a problem in Canada, and that we should all welcome the fact that now the ministers of welfare across the country are sitting together and trying to work out a comprehensive system of social security which will take care of those in need among our population. I do not think that we, as legislators, at this stage, should interfere in this exchange of views, or these consultations, which are taking place between the various levels of government.

Honourable senators, I close my remarks by saying that although the honourable senator's intent might be otherwise laudable, I must regretfully oppose his amendment for the reasons I have just enumerated.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: May I make an inquiry of the Honourable Senator Langlois?

During his remarks he emphasized the consultations between the federal minister and his provincial counterparts. Would he please tell us what would happen if this amendment is not accepted, and there is disagreement between the federal government and the provinces? How are they going to straighten that out in the old railway station?

Hon. Mr. Langlois: I do not know what disagreement you are referring to. The conference has taken place, there has been a common accord, there has been consensus among the ministers participating, and now we have this proposed legislation. Some of the provinces—and my province of Quebec is one of them—have already, if I am well informed, enacted new legislation to implement the results of that conference. There is no difference of opinion that I know of.

Perhaps my honourable friend was misled by what I said yesterday when I mentioned that only two provinces, Quebec and Alberta, had agreed to vary the rates payable to the individual child in respect of this provision in the bill, to the extent that the rates should not be lower than $12 for any individual child. But, because only two provinces have agreed to take advantage of this flexibility in the bill, that does not mean there is any disagreement. The other provinces are satisfied with the $20 average, which is the maximum average. So far so good. I do not think we should take objection to this. This is not a manifestation of disagreement as between the various provinces and the federal government.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: Honourable senators, I am not mistaken, nor am I confusing the variance allowed to the provinces under the bill. I mentioned this point in my remarks yesterday, that the bill provides an opportunity for the provinces to take the increased allowance, and then deduct it from the amount the welfare recipient can receive. At that time I said that the bill was deficient. I think this amendment corrects it.

My question, however, is simply this: What happens in all the discussions between the Minister of National Health and Welfare and his provincial counterparts should a disagreement occur? How is it corrected? To me this amendment prevents that situation, and I would like to know how a disagreement on this point could be corrected should it occur. I am not saying it will occur, but how will it be corrected?

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Well, my only answer is that we must assume that the ministers will work out any such difference among themselves. I do not think we can do that now in the present measure by anticipating possible disagreements.

Hon. Eugene A. Forsey: Honourable senators, I should like just to say something very briefly about this proposed amendment.

We have listened to an extremely forceful and eloquent speech from Senator Langlois in reply to the mover of the amendment. But for the life of me I cannot see what relevance most of what Senator Langlois said had to the amendment. He talked of the amendment hamstringing efforts to provide a more integrated social security system; he talked about preventing the provinces from giving more assistance to some categories of welfare recipients than others; and he talked about—at least, if I understood him correctly—its showing a lack of respect for the various levels of government. For the life of me I could not see how the amendment would do any of these things.

It seems to me that quite clearly it would be fully in line with co-operation between the dominion and the provinces in this matter. It would promote further co-operation. It might help to prevent distortion of the intentions of Parliament.

Either we are trying to give these people more income by this measure, or we are not. I understood from the whole thrust of the original speeches on the subject, and from the assistant leader—or whatever his proper title may be—that we were trying to give them more income. Well, if we are trying to give them more income, then we do not want to see the provinces taking advantage of this to withdraw some of the income that they are already paying to these people, which would frustrate the intention of the measure as I understand it.

However, we are not attempting by this amendment to interfere in any way with the jurisdiction of the provinces, or with their full freedom to do as they see fit within their jurisdiction. All we are saying is that there should be an obligation on the minister to discuss this matter in the light of the intentions of Parliament, and to report on it, so that the thing will be brought out into the open, and so that we shall know exactly what is being done by the provinces.

It is all very well for Senator Langlois to say that any member of the House of Commons can ask questions about this; of course he can. Any member of the Senate can rise and ask questions about it. It is all very well to say that the minister can be asked to report on it by someone here or in the other place. That, however, is not the same thing as making sure, by this amendment, that the minister will in fact emphasize this matter in his discussions with his provincial counterparts, and will report to the two houses on what results he has got, at which point it may be necessary for the two houses to do something further about it. But the main effect will be one of publicity, so that the kind of thing that Senator Argue referred to the other day as having taken place in one province will not take place all across the country, and the country know little or nothing about the situation that exists.

I cannot for the life of me see how this amendment will, in any way, in the slightest degree, interfere with the splendid things which Senator Langlois has been talking about—the admirable spirit of co-operation, the discussions, and all the rest of it. It seems to me that it would merely mean that the minister would have a special obligation to make sure that this matter was considered in his discussions, and properly reported upon in Parliament.

[Hon. Mr. Langlois.]

Hon. Mr. Langlois: I must confess that you have a right to disagree with me, and I accept your position in that respect.

Hon. Charles McElman: Honourable senators, I shall keep you only briefly. Senator Argue has discussed this matter with me, and I know his objectives. I do not think he is under any illusions as to whether he will get his amendment passed or not. But I agree totally with his approach, which is to the effect that this question should be aired here.

I think Senator Langlois should accept that, at this particular point in time, this intervention is timely. In these federal-provincial discussions and negotiations that he speaks of, it might fortify the minister's hand a little, in dealing with the provinces, to have the view expressed in Parliament that it is intended that these additional moneys should reach people, and not governments.

In the other place the government party, which brought this legislation forward, said that it was an excellent thing to get more money into the hands of people who need it. The Official Opposition party, and the NDP, agreed that it was a good thing to do. Their only disagreement was that it was "not enough" to get this much into the hands of the people; they should get more into the hands of the people. But again it was not to get it into the hands of provincial governments.

● (1710)

I was rather shocked to read what Senator Argue had to say yesterday about what has happened in the recent past in the Province of Saskatchewan. There we have a situation where the party in office in Saskatchewan is part of another party which here talks about "rip-offs," and "welfare bums." If what he tells us about the Government of Saskatchewan is accurate, they are conducting the "rip-off" so far as the poor people are concerned, and they are the "welfare bums" in Saskatchewan because they are taking it away from the people who should be getting welfare.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: The NDP can make their own rip-off.

Hon. Mr. McElman: Indeed they can, on occasion. I shall not go further into it, except to say that Senator Argue, although he probably will not get his amendment accepted, has performed a great service in bringing this matter to the attention of the Senate and Parliament and, it is to be hoped, of the Canadian people. It is to be hoped also that he has helped fortify the hand of the Minister of Health at the national level in his dealings with the provinces. If there is any "rip-off" on their part in taking these moneys away from the people who are supposed to get them, and whom Parliament intended to get them, perhaps the minister's hand will be strengthened, and the situation will be improved thereby.

The Hon. the Speaker: It is moved by the Honourable Senator Langlois—

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Isn't Senator Argue going to reply?

Hon. Mr. Argue: I am being pushed to speak by the Leader of the Opposition, but I think that any reply that I might have made to the points raised by Senator Langlois has been much better expressed by Senator Forsey. I certainly agree with everything that he has said, and I agree with Senator McElman. I am also anxious that the payments be made as quickly as possible, so I am now prepared to have the question put.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: Honourable senators, before we vote on this motion, would Senator Martin be kind enough to elaborate and inform us on the instructions he gave to Senator Argue?

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Put the question.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, it is moved by the honourable Senator Langlois, seconded by the Honourable Senator Martin, that this bill be now read the third time.

In amendment, it is moved by the Honourable Senator Argue, seconded by the Honourable Senator Forsey, that this bill be not now read the third time but that it be amended as follows—

Some Hon. Senators: Dispense.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion in amendment?

Some Hon. Senators: No.

Some Hon. Senators: Yes.

The Hon. the Speaker: Will those in favour of the amendment please say "yea"?

Some Hon. Senators: Yea.

The Hon. the Speaker: Will those contrary, please say "nay"?

Some Hon. Senators: Nay.

The Hon. the Speaker: In my opinion, the "nays" have it and the motion in amendment is defeated.

It is moved by the Honourable Senator Langlois, seconded by the Honourable Senator Martin, that this bill be now read the third time. Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Motion agreed to, and bill read third time and passed.

ROYAL ASSENT

NOTICE

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that she had received the following communication:

GOVERNMENT HOUSE
OTTAWA

12 December 1973

Madam,

I have the honour to inform you that the Honourable Wishart F. Spence, O.B.E., Puisne Judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, in his capacity as Deputy Governor General, will proceed to the Senate Chamber today, December 12th at 5.45 p.m. for the purpose of giving Royal Assent to certain Bills.

I have the honour to be,
Madam,
Your obedient servant,
André Garneau
Brigadier General
Administrative Secretary to the Governor General.

The Honourable
The Speaker of the Senate,
Ottawa.

APPROPRIATION BILL No. 5, 1973

SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

The Senate resumed from yesterday, the adjourned debate on the motion of Senator Langlois for the second reading of Bill C-239, for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial year ending the 31st March, 1974.

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, when I was a student writing essays I was always taught to avoid an anti-climax at the end of an essay or story. At this hour, after what we have seen this afternoon, and in the light of a certain event that is coming up, I feel that in speaking at this time I am providing something in the nature of an anti-climax. However, the amount of money involved in this bill deserves a little more consideration than a mere anti-climax.

I realize, honourable senators, that each year the supplementary estimates come in and we study them, more or less, in advance, and then when the supply bill comes we think we have, perhaps, completed our study. I have the greatest respect for the President of the Treasury Board, Mr. Drury. I am always impressed by the way he can answer questions before the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance. But he reached a new zenith before he even appeared before the committee of either the Senate or the other place. The announcement accompanying the supplementary estimates stated that they were anti-inflationary. You know, it takes a real expert to take $1.2 billion and say, "This is an anti-inflationary measure." I say that, because when one is dealing with inflation the normal economic pattern is to restrict the amount of money in circulation. We have now received a new doctrine, and we will call it the Drury Doctrine—I think that is an appropriate name for it—that the expenditure of $1.2 billion is "anti-inflationary." In fact, it is not anti-inflationary; it is the result of inflation.

Therefore I feel that we must take a look at a few of the items in the estimates, and here I shall try to condense my remarks and in consequence I shall be somewhat briefer than I normally am—which, no doubt, will please most of you. Let us take a look at a few of the major items.

● (1720)

One item which is of particular interest, Senator Martin, is $59 million for higher interest on the federal debt. It is not so long since the budget was presented and, with your accuracy in predicting the taxation revenues for the family allowances bill, you must have realized that interest rates were increasing and you could have estimated for that extra $59 million. I do not think you have reached the end of it, because at the beginning of this week many of the chartered banks announced an increase in their prime lending rate to 9½ per cent and, unfortunately, I am beginning to wonder if the Government of Canada is even considered to be a prime lending rate client any more. Surely when we consider the various bond issues and inducements which are held out, we must ask if the Government of Canada is a prime lending rate client.

I have a note to make reference to youth and family allowances, but during the last couple of days we have fairly well covered that subject, so I will skip it.

Another item is $53 million for milk subsidies. Honourable senators, milk is a normal staple food used by all, particularly the young family group with children. No one really objects to the government subsidizing the cost of milk production. Instead of boasting about it, why cannot the government admit that it has failed to control inflation and must add $53 million to the tax bill to subsidize the price of milk? We have just heard Senator Langlois describe the ease with which the federal government can deal with the provinces, and make arrangements in connection with family allowances. The federal government has not completed agreements with all provinces on the milk subsidies. Why is there not the same ease in that connection as with family allowances?

Every now and then Senator Langlois will look at the clock. The Standing Senate Committee on National Finance spent some time considering the report of the Economic Council of Canada. In your introductory remarks, Senator Langlois, you attempted to find yourself in disagreement with Senator Grosart because he emphasized that the government should begin imposing the 11 per cent limit on increased spending. You know, you can make a pretty good presentation on occasion, but yesterday in replying to Senator Grosart you were horribly weak. You found yourself in disagreement with everyone but Senator Langlois, and perhaps we will let the situation rest there.

I do not intend to discuss the benefit of limiting public spending to a certain figure, but I would like for a moment to refer to your remarks, Senator Langlois, in which you say "at some future time". There is an expression that today is merely the future of yesterday. We are in the future, and it is time that Parliament began giving this problem more serious consideration than it is receiving at the present time.

Later on, you go on to say the idea of a limitation on public spending may be premature, and that it must be tried by the decision-makers. When I look at those words in Hansard "by decision-makers," I must ask: Who are the decision-makers? Is it not Parliament, or are you adopting the Liberal philosophy that the decision-makers are the bureaucrats, the deputy ministers, who lay down the policy for the Liberal Government, and then compound that with Mr. Lewis and the deputy ministers? One must ask who are the decision-makers? The decision-makers should be the parliamentarians and I would ask you to underline that, sir, think it over, give it very serious consideration, and try to convince your seat-mate, Senator Martin, to convince his colleagues in the Cabinet to remember that they are the decision-makers responsible to Parliament.

[Hon. Mr. Phillips.]

Hon. Mr. Flynn: That is really wishful thinking.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: Oh, that is wishful thinking, but sometimes I feel that perhaps we do touch a bit of their conscience when we criticize them on this side, Senator Flynn, and I like to do that.

In committee I asked the President of the Treasury Board for the main source of increased taxation which allowed the government to make increased payments to the provinces under the equalization program. I suspect that it was increased income tax, and I asked the minister this point-blank. Naturally he did not have the breakdown as to various sources of revenue, but in his own gentlemanly way he admitted that it was income tax which allowed the federal government to distribute an additional $150 million, approximately, to the provinces. I am sure that every province welcomes this, but is it not time that Parliament—and by Parliament I mean both Houses of Parliament—stopped and considered that the average taxpayer is beginning to find his income tax just a little more than he can bear?

● (1730)

Also, let us observe and check federal government spending a little more carefully than we have done in the past. Let us make sure that the expenditures are made wisely and carefully. I see Senator Langlois looking at his watch, so I shall continue to condense my remarks.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: I am sorry to interrupt my honourable friend. I do not wish to press him, but if he is unlikely to conclude within a few minutes we shall have to adjourn in order to send a messenger to the other place.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: How much time do I have?

Hon. Mr. Langlois: A few minutes, at the most.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: I shall take approximately another five minutes.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: That is too long.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: Then I shall adjourn my remarks until tomorrow.

On motion of Senator Phillips, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

At 5.45 p.m. the sitting was resumed.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Hon. Paul Martin tabled:

Report of the Superintendent of Insurance for Canada on Small Loans Companies and Money-Lenders licensed under the Small Loans Act for the year ended December 31, 1972.

Report of the Superintendent of Insurance for Canada on Trust and Loan Companies for the year ended December 31, 1972, pursuant to section 8 of the Department of Insurance Act, chapter I-17, R.S.C., 1970.

Report of the Department of National Health and Welfare for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1973, pursuant to section 13 of the Department of National Health and Welfare Act, chapter N-9, R.S.C., 1970.

CLERK'S ACCOUNTS

SECOND REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE ON INTERNAL ECONOMY, BUDGETS AND ADMINISTRATION

Hon. Donald Smith: Honourable senators, the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration makes its second report as follows:

Your committee to which were referred on 31st May, 1973, the Clerk's Accounts, being a detailed statement of receipts and disbursements for the fiscal year 1972-73, reports as follows:

Your committee has examined the above statement and supporting statements and finds them to be in accordance with the estimates submitted by the Senate and the authority necessary for the purpose. We have received all the information and explanations which we have required. We would state that the sums expended appear to be in keeping with the duties of and the tasks undertaken by the Senate and its committees, standing and special.

Your committee wishes to draw your attention to the fact that the budget for the year 1972-73 amounting to $6,384,001.41, was underspent by $998,708.06.

Your committee also wishes to draw to the Senate's attention that Senate Committees and senators require research assistance from time to time. It is noted that the Committees Branch of the Senate is not fully occupied at all times during the year. It is suggested that steps might be taken to have the staff of the Committees Branch help in this field by undertaking or otherwise assisting in research projects for Senate Committees and particularly individual senators.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration.

Hon. Mr. Smith moved that the report be taken into consideration at the next sitting of the Senate.

Motion agreed to.

INTERNAL ECONOMY

SUPPLEMENTARY BUDGET OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE ON SCIENCE POLICY TABLED

Hon. Donald Smith: Honourable senators, as Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration, I desire to table the committee's report approving the supplementary budget presented to it by the Chairman of the Special Senate Committee on Science Policy for the proposed additional expenditures of the said Committee on Science Policy respecting the holding of a special meeting to determine the feasibility of establishing a Commission on the Future, as authorized by the Senate on 19th July, 1973.

SUPPLEMENTARY BUDGET OF LEGAL AND CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRS COMMITTEE TABLED

Hon. Donald Smith: Honourable senators, as Chairman of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration, I desire to table the committee's report approving the supplementary budget presented to it by the Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs for the proposed expenditures of the said Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs with respect to its examination of the Parole System in Canada, referred by the Senate to the said Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs for examination and report on 5th February, 1973.

PROTECTION OF PRIVACY BILL

BILL TO AMEND CERTAIN ACTS—REPORT OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED

Hon. H. Carl Goldenberg, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, reported that the committee had considered Bill C-176, to amend the Criminal Code, the Crown Liability Act and the Official Secrets Act, and had directed that the bill be reported with the following amendment:

Page 18: Strike out lines 16 to 44 both inclusive in the English version, and lines 18 to 46 both inclusive in the French version.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Hon. Mr. Goldenberg: With leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(i)(f), now.

Honourable senators, I think I should read to the Senate parts of the clause which has been eliminated as a result of the amendment referred to in my report. The clause is 178.23, and the principal section reads as follows:

> 178.23(1) The Attorney General of the province in which the application was made—

That is the application for authorization to intercept a communication.

> —or the Solicitor General of Canada, as the case may be, shall notify in writing within ninety days next following the period for which the authorization was given the person who was the object of the interception pursuant to the authorization and shall, in a manner prescribed by regulation, certify to the court that issued the authorization that such person has been notified.

The second section allows the judge on application to extend the delay beyond the 90 days. It was the view of your committee that such notification would hamper the administration of justice, inasmuch as it could have the effect of advising criminals of the location and strategy of police operations thereby enabling them to take evasive measures to avoid further detection. This is the sum and substance of the feeling of your committee.

The Hon. the Speaker: It is moved by the Honourable Senator Goldenberg that this report be now adopted. Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: Nay.

Report adopted.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: When shall this bill be read a third time?

Hon. Mr. Goldenberg: With leave, now. If honourable senators will allow me to explain, the Senate has exercised its responsibility in this connection and in view of the fact that we are told that there may be an adjournment or a prorogation within a very short time, I feel that the other place should be given every opportunity to consider our amendment as soon as possible. I trust that honourable senators will agree with me.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Honourable senators, I have no objection to Senator Goldenberg's remarks. I just want to point out that today's situation differs from that which confronted us yesterday. It is very easy to propose an amendment which is desired by a minister but it is more courageous to propose an amendment which is opposed by a minister.

Hon. Mr. Goldenberg: If Senator Flynn will allow me. I think Senator Choquette, who is sitting beside him—

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I am in favour of the amendment. I simply say that the circumstances made it very easy for the committee to say yes; that is all.

Hon. Mr. Goldenberg: I want to assure Senator Flynn that the minister did not favour—

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Oh.

Hon. Mr. Goldenberg: —that amendment being made by our committee.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: That is because he was afraid it would not be accepted by the House of Commons. That is the amendment he moved in the other place. Now, do not be ridiculous and do not take us for children.

Hon. Mr. Goldenberg: He said he did not favour taking it back.

Hon. Mr. Argue: I wonder if I might ask the honourable senator a question? I am certainly not an expert with regard to this legislation. With the removal of the 90 days, is there any period within which the person must be informed?

Hon. Mr. Goldenberg: No.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Not at all.

Hon. Mr. Argue: The judge makes that decision?

Hon. Mr. Flynn: It is never used.

Hon. Mr. Goldenberg: The original authorization to intercept must be granted by a judge, of course.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: May I direct a question to the honourable senator? When we were fortunate enough to have him summoned to this place he, with all due modesty, presented himself as an authority on the Constitution. Is there any conflict between the Constitution and the fact that we are failing to notify an individual that he is under investigation through what I consider to be various dubious means? I am opposing the amendment.

Hon. Mr. Goldenberg: I will just comment on Senator Phillips' first remark. I never introduced myself to the Senate as an authority on the Constitution.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Very humble.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: Very humble.

Hon. Mr. Goldenberg: Secondly, there is no constitutional conflict between this proposal and the situation the senator has in mind.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: It does not apply to civil rights.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Honourable senators, further to the question asked by my honourable friend, Senator Argue, would Senator Goldenberg tell us if I am right in assuming that the authorization given by the judge would contain no time limit for which the authorization is given?

Hon. Mr. Goldenberg: There is a time limit.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: No, but if this amendment is adopted there would be no time limit set?

Hon. Mr. Goldenberg: Oh, yes. This has nothing to do with the time limit which the court can set. The court can, of course, renew the time limit on application, there being no limit to the number of renewals.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: But there is no limit in the act. When the authorization is given is it given for a limited time?

Hon. Mr. Langlois: That is what I had in mind.

Hon. Mr. Goldenberg: It is given for 30 days, subject to renewal for further periods of 30 days.

• (1410)

Hon. Mr. Langlois: In other words, the authorization is good for 30 days only.

Hon. Lionel Choquette: Honourable senators, I was pleased to be a member of this committee this morning and to see the work that was accomplished by the committee and its chairman.

I want to tell the house how particularly pleased I was to hear the oration given by Senator Carter on behalf of the Senate, explaining to the committee and to the chiefs of police, many of whom were present, the duties of the Senate and the obligations of senators.

Senator Carter stated that we were not going to be a rubber stamp and that even if the minister told us that the legislation was urgent and that it was late in the session for us to propose an amendment, such an amendment should be made in the interest of the people of Canada and of those who are trying to protect society. I commend the reading of his remarks to this chamber.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Motion agreed to and bill, as amended, read third time and passed.

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. Leopold Langlois: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), I move that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until Tuesday next, December 18, at 8 o'clock in the evening.

Honourable senators, before the question is put I should like to state that the motion is made with the usual reservation regarding a possible recall. Although I am not attempting to prophesy what might take place in the House of Commons, it is possible that that house may sit on Saturday, in which case legislation may come to us over the weekend. In such circumstances it might be necessary to recall the Senate before Tuesday next. It is possible that we would be informed of this too late to give the necessary notice. Is is only a possibility, but I thought I should bring that to your attention.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I cannot accept that statement without challenging it. It is impossible to imagine a situation where the Senate would be recalled on Monday instead of Tuesday. This warning, which has been repeated time and again by the Leader of the Government, is a downright silly attitude to take.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: It is only a possibility.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Why tell us that? Why put it on the record?

Hon. Mr. Martin: Senator Langlois was perfectly justified in what he said.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: No.

Hon. Mr. Martin: It is not likely that we shall have to return on Monday. As we all know, there are in the other place two vital matters under consideration, one having to do with the allocation of energy and the other pertaining to an export tax on oil and gas. These are matters which, in the opinion of the government, vitally affect the nation. No one knows what disposition is going to be made today or tomorrow, certainly with regard to one of those measures. Next week could be the last week before adjournment or prorogation. Surely the observations made by Senator Langlois are justified.

[Hon. Mr. Goldenberg.]

Hon. Mr. Flynn: That has added a lot to the debate. It makes very nice reading.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: I should like to direct a question to the Leader of the Government. I noticed that he mentioned adjournment and prorogation. Perhaps I am being too optimistic and too hopeful, but would he also include "dissolution" in that description?

Hon. Mr. Martin: I didn't, did I?

Hon. Mr. Phillips: But would you?

Hon. Mr. Flynn: He did not say anything, so don't worry.

Motion agreed to.

NATIONAL FINANCE

MOTION TO PUBLISH AND DISTRIBUTE REPORT OF COMMITTEE ON INFORMATION CANADA

Hon. Douglas D. Everett, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(i), moved:

> That the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance be authorized to publish and distribute its report on Information Canada as a supplement to its report on the Estimates laid before Parliament for the fiscal year ending 31st March, 1974, adopted by the Senate on 26th June, 1973, as soon as it becomes available, even though the Senate may not be sitting.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: You have to remember we are subject to recall.

Hon. Mr. Everett: Honourable senators, I think an explanation as to the necessity for this motion is in order. The committee's report on Information Canada is presently in the writing stages. However, it is unlikely that it will be finished and ready for publication before the Senate recesses. Unfortunately, we do not know how long we will be in recess, and as it may be a fairly lengthy time it is possible that the report could be ready at some point during the recess, resulting in a fairly lengthy period of time elapsing between its completion and its publication. It is for that reason we are asking leave of the Senate to publish the report as soon as it is ready, even though the Senate may not then be sitting.

In that regard, I make two undertakings: first of all, we would only publish the report while the Senate is in recess; that is, not sitting for more than one week. Secondly, we will not publish the report in the event that the date of publication comes close to the date on which the Senate will be back in session—and by that I mean a matter of two or three days—as we could then just as easily table the report in the Senate. It is not our desire to take this course. I only ask for leave to do so in the event that it does become necessary.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: You will have to consult your leader.

Hon. Mr. Everett: I have consulted my leader.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: But you will have to consult your leader before having it published, because he may have in mind the recalling of the Senate.

Hon. Mr. Everett: In any event, as a matter of courtesy I would consult my leader and very likely, as I have in this case, the Leader of the Opposition.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: You will be safer with me.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Has the report of the committee been drafted as yet?

Hon. Mr. Everett: The report has not yet been drafted. We have completed our hearings and are now in the preliminary writing stages of the report.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Can the honourable senator tell us when the committee would be approving the report in order to have it published?

Hon. Mr. Everett: When the report is written and, as I said, it is quite possible that the report will be completed during the coming recess.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Does the committee advocate the abolition of Information Canada?

Hon. Mr. Everett: Well, it is like the last chapter of a mystery story—you will have to read the report.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Does the committee have leave to sit while the Senate is not sitting? The committee will have to meet in order to approve the report, and it has to have leave to sit while the Senate is not sitting.

● (1420)

Hon. Mr. Everett: I was not aware that we required leave to sit while the Senate is not sitting. I thought that leave was needed only to sit while the Senate is sitting. If we require that power the committee will request it. I was under the impression we could sit right through the recess.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: We had better have another motion.

Hon. Mr. Everett: I thank the senator for his advice and will check. If it is necessary to get that permission, we will ask for it.

Motion agreed to.

APPROPRIATION BILL No. 5, 1973

SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from yesterday the adjourned debate on the motion of Senator Langlois for the second reading of Bill C-239, for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial year ending the 31st March, 1974.

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, last evening when it was necessary to interrupt my remarks for a certain event, I was attempting to lead up to the point that the committee report indicated that perhaps some of the projects of the Local Initiatives Program should be reviewed.

The supplementary estimates provide approximately $152 million for LIP projects. Approximately $73 million is forecast for the 1973-74 year. It is most interesting to note that approximately $80 million included in that original figure of $152 million is described as a carryover. The carryover results from the decision of the government. I am not so sure where the government made this decision, in front of the television cameras or down at the old railway station, but the government expended $80 million, while Parliament was in session, to carry on with the LIP projects.

This is entirely wrong. If Parliament is to have some control over government expenditures, we must have an introduction of legislation or an estimate earlier than this. At this time of the year there is no use saying we will meet and approve the expenditure of $80 million. I think this was an entirely illegal act—the money has been spent—but they cannot use the excuse used last year, saying that Parliament was not in session and was not available to be recalled. Parliament was in session when someone, I am not quite sure who, made the decision to go ahead and waste, illegally, $80 million of the taxpayers' money.

It is fine to say that various projects, such as the LIP projects, are necessary for employment. Let us look at the final results. We are raising a new breed of Canadian who is dependent entirely on these programs. These people go from LIP projects to the Opportunity for Youth projects and they consider that to be their right, their inheritance from the Canadian taxpayers. In all fairness, the President of the Treasury Board stated before our committee that the government was now beginning a study on the effectiveness of these programs. I support that study. It is long overdue. I hope it does not drag out for months. I have already anticipated the results. I will not give them in this speech, but I do not expect the study to prove these programs have been very effective.

Last evening, when I got home, my good wife pointed out to me that a friend of mine in the other place is leaving because of government expenditures. The Honourable Senator McElman likes to tell me that I enjoy being a majority of one in this chamber. Perhaps my friend in the other place found himself somewhat in the same position, that he was a majority of one. At any rate, I find myself in a great deal of sympathy with his viewpoints.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Who is he?

Hon. Mr. Phillips: The honourable member for Bruce, Mr. Ross Whicher. I believe he was also at one time a member of the Ontario Legislature.

I should like to leave with the Senate certain remarks of Mr. Whicher, because I believe that anyone who takes a stand such as the stand taken by Mr. Whicher deserves a great deal of respect. I am sure it was not an easy stand for him to take.

The statement I should like to leave with you, honourable senators, and have you consider, is this:

> In the long run, we as citizens should only have what we as taxpayers can afford to pay.

I should like all governments, federal, provincial and municipal, to consider that statement, because I think it deserves special consideration.

Throughout my remarks on the supplementary estimates I have been critical of the amounts included. Now I am going to change and ask why certain items were not included in the supplementary estimates. Earlier today the Honourable Senator Martin referred to the energy crisis. In a supplementary estimate of $1.2 billion there is not one cent to deal with the energy crisis.

Hon. Mr. Martin: We have to pass the bill first.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: You did not pass a bill on anything else in the supplementary estimates; why do you have to have the energy crisis singled out? It is the most urgent problem facing Canada and you say you have to have a bill on it.

Hon. Mr. Martin: It will be provided for in the bill.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: What are the expenditures provided for in that bill?

Hon. Mr. Martin: Those will be the provisions.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: The provisions for what? The point is that up until these supplementary estimates were introduced, the government did not have plans for any pipelines or nuclear energy plants. There was not any urgent plan to deal with the energy crisis. But you are now hoping that you can get out before Christmas without dealing with that crisis. That is exactly what is happening in the other place.

Hon. Mr. Everett: I am sorry, senator, I did not quite understand that. I thought it was the Conservatives who were talking about slowing down in the other place the legislation on the energy crisis. I was not aware that it was the government.

I had the impression from reading the Globe and Mail this morning that the government wanted to proceed with that bill as fast as possible, but that Mr. Baldwin said that they would not be able to proceed with it until, I think, January 22.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: The Globe and Mail, my honourable friend, is not necessarily an official government organ—

Hon. Mr. Smith: You can say that again!

Hon. Mr. Phillips: —any more than it is an authority on the Conservative Party. If you can only interpret the actions in the other place by the Globe and Mail, then I have sympathy for you.

● (1430)

The estimates include approximately $1 million for constituency offices for members of the other place. I do not object to the fact that a member of the other place should have, or indeed, needs an office in his constituency; however, I am greatly concerned that this money is being voted in the supplementary estimates and given to the members of the other place in a manner whereby they can change the regulations any time they see fit. In committee I recommended that this expenditure be in the form of legislation, in which all rules and regulations should be laid out. I still hope that that will become fact. When we consider the facilities that we in this chamber have, as compared to those in the other place, I do not think we have to apologize for our budget; indeed, we could use some of the facilities here that are provided to the other chamber.

During the winter months, various government departments begin programs under which they will absorb various unemployed individuals, and it was interesting to make a comparison of man-years of employment that have been provided. I would refer you to page 24 in the supplementary estimates. I have selected the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources, not because that department is any more an offender than other departments, but there you will find an administrative support complement of 27 people for a total employed force of 64. At the end of March, 1974, when the grants are exhausted, we still find that there will be 18 people retained on the payroll; but out of the 18, 13 will be administrative support. In other words, they have created so much paper work that it requires the administrative staff to stay on and clear that paper work away.

Honourable senators, I could inflict you with my remarks much longer, but when I look at the Order Paper and see that I am supposed to follow on another subject, I think that even the Senate is entitled to a bit of humane treatment and I will sit down.

Hon. Leopold Langlois: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I must inform the Senate that if the Honourable Senator Langlois speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for second reading of this bill.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Honourable senators, I wish to add a word or two to the remarks made by my honourable friend Senator Phillips. I do so in order to correct an impression which his remarks yesterday might have given to the house when he referred to what I had said on the previous day in connection with a remark of Senator Grosart when Senator Grosart was speaking on the motion to adopt the report of the National Finance Committee. Senator Phillips said yesterday—and as is his habit he was addressing himself to me directly, instead of through the Chair or through the Senate:

> In your introductory remarks, Senator Langlois, you attempted to find yourself in disagreement with Senator Grosart because he emphasized that the government should begin imposing the 11 per cent limit on increased spending.

If the honourable senator refers to my remarks on that occasion, he will see that I prefaced those remarks by saying that I was in no way challenging, or putting in question, anything that Senator Grosart had said, but that I merely wanted to explain why I interjected in the course of his remarks something about the unreliability of the performance indicators suggested by the Economic Council of Canada. In doing so I merely quoted two paragraphs of the Tenth Annual Review of the Economic Council of Canada, which creates some doubt as to the reliability of the indicators suggested. I left my remarks at that. I do not think my honourable friend should quarrel with this, and I merely make this intervention at this stage to destroy the wrong impression that his remarks, unwillingly, I am ready to admit, might have given to the house.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read a third time?

Hon. Mr. Langlois: With leave, now.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Well, you do not intend to have royal assent tonight, do you?

Hon. Mr. Langlois: No. Next sitting.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Next sitting, subject to recall.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Subject to recall.

Hon. Mr. Martin: We would not want to come back for that.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Yes. That is another reason.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: I rise on a point of order. Perhaps I misunderstood Senator Langlois. He said that I directed my remarks to him rather than to the Chair.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Through the chair.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: My interpretation of the rules is perhaps a bit different from his, but I understand that you address the Senate as a whole rather than the Chair. Your set of rules is for the House of Commons. You are in the wrong chamber, sir.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: If my friend would permit me to add this, I said, "Through the Chair," or "through honourable senators."

Hon. Mr. Phillips: I did not hear the words "through honourable senators." I am sorry.

Hon. Mr. Langlois moved, that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

RESIDENTIAL MORTGAGE FINANCING BILL

SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from Tuesday, December 11, the adjourned debate on the motion of Senator Stanbury for second reading of Bill C-135, to provide additional financing mechanisms and institutions for the residential mortgage market in Canada.

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, I assure you that regardless of where my remarks are directed or through what channel, this will be my last speech today.

This government has been known for one thing, and that is it is a government that does not understand the problems facing Canada. This bill emphasizes the fact that this government does not understand the housing situation. It seems to be implying that mortgage money is not available. Mortgage money is available. But unfortunately for the average home buyer it is available at 10 per cent or 11 per cent interest. And these high interest rates are a result of government policy, a government policy of neglect.

Recently the President of the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation stated that residential housing was being well looked after, but there was need for what he termed "Volkswagen housing". I am not so sure what he meant by this term. I would assume that he meant cheaper housing. But, this bill does nothing to provide cheaper housing. Furthermore, it points out that the government does not understand its own legislation. When one reads the committee reports of the other place, it is obvious that the government has not the faintest idea of the manner in which this bill will operate. To begin with, they are providing a staff of 25 people to look after the Mortgage Exchange Corporation established under this bill. Last year approximately 10,000 public servants were added to the payroll, and if 25 out of that 10,000 are going to deal with the Mortgage Exchange Corporation, one can only conclude that the government does not expect it to be taken very seriously.

I very much question the clause dealing with the appointment of directors. This clause does not indicate whether the director will be full-time or part-time. Will he attend a meeting once a year? What is his salary? What, indeed, is expected of him? The minister responsible for housing suggested that the Bank of Canada should be represented on the Board of Directors. Honourable senators, the Bank of Canada is represented on the Industrial Development Bank, and I am not too impressed with its performance, particularly when dealing with the Maritimes or Western Canada. The interesting thing in this respect is that Mr. Basford stated he thought that the rest of the directors would come from banks, trust companies and insurance companies. At the same time, in his vision—this new Star of Bethlehem in the mortgage field—he saw the Mortgage Exchange Corporation dealing only with the banks and the trust companies and hoped that they would open up desks to deal with the general public in this regard.

Senator Croll has drawn our attention on a number of occasions to conflict of interest. Here is the ideal opportunity for a conflict of interest problem. If a bank or a trust company has a mortgage portfolio that it would like to sell, and if a director of that bank or trust company is also a director of the Mortgage Exchange Corporation, naturally he is going to attempt to persuade the mortgage exchange to buy the undesirable portfolio or portfolios that his company would like to unload.

Then we must ask ourselves what type of mortgage is going to be sold. Naturally a bank or a trust company is not going to sell a mortgage with an interest rate of 10 per cent. They know that with a change of government they are never going to get that rate again, so they are going to attempt to sell the long-range mortgages at 6½ per cent or 7 per cent. And this, honourable senators, is not going to make a profit for the shareholders in this corporation that is so vaguely envisioned by this government.

The bill before us gives no direction as to commission, legal fees, et cetera, when a mortgage or mortgage portfolio is bought or sold. There are enough lawyers in this chamber to realize that a mortgage portfolio is not going to be sold until it has been checked out and confirmed by a legal expert of some type, and the minimum fee that such expert will ask for doing this will be 5 per cent. The banks and trust companies all have their own real estate branches. So when you go to sell a mortgage portfolio they too are going to ask for a minimum 5 per cent commission. It is therefore quite obvious that a mortgage portfolio is going to increase by 10 per cent through legal fees and real estate commissions. This again is not going to provide a profit to the poor taxpayer who will buy shares in the type of corporation proposed under this legislation.

The chartered banks, insurance companies and trust companies already provide 80 per cent of the mortgage money available in Canada. Honourable senators, are we so naïve that we expect one of the major insurance companies or a chartered bank to enter into a partnership with a bureaucracy as proposed for the Federal Mortgage Exchange Corporation? Canada presently has four large real estate investment trusts operating. Three are operated by chartered banks. Can you really see the chartered banks and the trust companies moving into a situation in which they will not have control over their funds? There are many bank directors and directors of trust companies in this chamber. I do not think there is one honourable senator who occupies such a position who would recommend to the bank of which he is a director, or the trust company of which he is a director, that they enter into an agreement with the Mortgage Exchange Corporation.

The bill also provides for the formulation of what are commonly known as MICs. The mortgage investment companies will be subject to the limitations and regulations of the Loan Companies Act. A mortgage loan company under the regulations of the Loan Companies Act requires a paid-up capitalization of $500,000 before making application. It is fine for the minister responsible for housing to say that he can see small towns getting together and forming their own mortgage investment companies. The $500,000 paid-up capitalization is a very serious impediment. In addition, we have all the requirements of the insurance act, with which those in small towns are just not familiar. They are not used to dealing with this type of bureaucracy and will not do it. The Superintendent of Insurance, when he was asked before a committee of the other place if any inquiries had been received, replied that he thought three or four groups were interested. This act was introduced in June, over six months ago, and since that time three groups have shown interest. Three groups cannot, by any stretch of the imagination, be said to reflect enthusiasm. Therefore, this bill is a complete waste of time. It will not do one single, solitary thing to reduce interest rates and it is interest rates that hurt the home buyer today. No one holding a mortgage of 10 per cent or 11 per cent is going to sell his mortgage and in turn buy another at 7 per cent. You do not have to be a genius to figure that one out, Senator Martin. In my opinion it is obvious that this bill will fail and we have had enough of the window dressing it contains. Let us get down to brass tacks in committee and obtain a few more definite answers than the government provided the members of the other place.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

On motion of Senator Langlois, bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

PAROLE ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Goldenberg, seconded by the Honourable Senator Carter, for the second reading of the Bill C-191, intituled: "An Act to amend the Parole Act".—(Honourable Senator Choquette).

[Hon. Mr. Phillips.]

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Honourable senators, I would like to stand this item because there are so few senators left in the chamber and I think we should keep some work for Tuesday evening.

Order stands.

SCIENCE POLICY

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the consideration of Volume 3 of the Report of the Special Committee of the Senate on Science Policy, tabled in the Senate on Tuesday, 11th September, 1973—(Honourable Senator Carter).

Hon. Mr. Carter: Honourable senators, I should like to yield to Senator Cameron.

The Hon. the Speaker: Has Senator Cameron leave to proceed?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Donald Cameron: Thank you, honourable senators.

In his address to the Senate on November 14, Senator Lamontagne defined the role of an effective central machinery responsible for the formulation and implementation of an overall coherent science policy for Canada. On December 4, Senator Grosart dealt with that part of our report on the interfaces of science policy; that is, federal-provincial relations, international relations and relations between the Canadian Government and Parliament.

It will be my task today to review some of the proposals with respect to the reorganization of government departments and agencies which will be charged with the responsibility for the most effective development of specific and sectoral science policies.

It is not an easy task, first, because it flies in the face of long-established practices in some cases; secondly, because it flies in the face of views and prejudices long held by many people who have held or still hold responsible positions in the scientific community.

● (1500)

An example of the difficulties in flying in the face of long-held beliefs is the controversy over the continuum theory, that there was "an unbroken spectrum from basic research through to innovation." The Association of Consulting Engineers of Canada supported this theory, as did, even more surprisingly, SCITEC in its special two-day meeting in Ottawa in October 1972. Their position paper noted:

> There was a strong agreement that any new institutional structures should be based on a recognition of the continuum which embraces all stages from basic science, through applied science, development and innovation.

The continuum theory has been held by many scientists for a long period of time, but this theory, like many others, must give way to a new assessment based on many in-depth studies of what the realities are between basic science and innovation. I need only mention the work of Stephen Toulmin on "Human Understanding," the "Project Sappho" conducted by the Science Policy Research Unit at the University of Sussex, or the work of Erik Haeffner of the Swedish Innovation Institute in Stockholm, just to mention a few of those who have demonstrated in the real world of applied science and innovation that innovation does not automatically spring from basic research in a continuous chain reaction.

On this continent the work of Myers and Marquis showed that of 567 commercially successful innovations, only 3 per cent could be identified as being initiated in research.

J. Herbert Holoman of the MIT School of Engineering agrees with the view of Derek de Solla Price that technology builds largely on earlier technology. He says:

> The naïve picture of technology as applied science simply will not fit all the facts. Inventions do not hang like fruits on a scientific tree. In those parts of the history of technology where one feels some confidence, it is quite apparent that most technological advances derive immediately from those that precede them.

Holoman, in the same vein, says:

> Scientific discoveries occasionally lead to applications in the form of new technology; this is rare, but the effects may be multiplied indefinitely as technology builds on technology. Science also provides techniques which make it possible or easier to tackle industrial problems successfully. Finally, basic research is an element contributing to the output of highly qualified men and women educated in science and its methods. Of these three factors, the manpower benefit may be the most important when the justification for basic science is considered in the national context, partly because discoveries and techniques cross international boundaries more easily than men.

Dr. Oshima, a member of Japan's advisory committee to the Minister of Trade and Technology, has emphasized that the quality of manpower has been a major factor in Japan's notable success in innovation. He said:

> The percentage of Japanese students of natural science and engineering is low, 20 per cent, much lower than in European countries. The proportion of engineering students among this group is extremely high, more than 70 per cent. This trend indicates that the education policy of the Government is influenced by the demand of industry for high-quality technical manpower.

Many more authorities and practical experiments could be quoted, but enough has been said to indicate that a certain mythology has existed in the scientific community for a long time to the effect: "Science discovers, technology applies and innovation occurs."

However, in rejecting the continuum theory of an unbroken spectrum from basic research through to innovation, the committee most emphatically denies any intention to downgrade the importance of basic research. Our support for this is amply developed in chapter 14 of Volume 2 of our report. The committee believes it is important to understand the specific features and requirements, its purposes and role, if the government is to formulate a coherent science policy and design a proper system of organization for its implementation.

One of the basic recommendations of our report was the need to establish a strong central agency, a Ministry of Science and Technology, which would have the responsibility of co-ordinating the multiplicity of government departments, agencies and organizations involved in Canada's science effort, to have the responsibility of monitoring projects, auditing results and bringing this massive activity, which in 1973 consumed $1.2 billion—more than one-twentieth of our total budget—into a more visible and coherent form. In terms of comparative size, Canada's science budget is approximately on a par with such other basic elements of our economy as food and transportation, which each take up about 20 per cent of the national budget. The latter two phases of our national economy are highly visible, and we think the time has come to make the national science budget, which has always maintained a low profile, more visible to the public who make the expenditures possible.

The proposals which follow are designed for that purpose now that we have a Ministry of State for Science and Technology which, contrary to the terms of reference in setting it up, was to have "an advisory or assistant role to departments and agencies of the government in the formulation and development of advice to the Governor-in-Council; this must be given the authority to review and assess the formulation and development of advice to the Governor-in-Council." I underline the words "review and assess." That is something very different from acting in an advisory or assistant role.

If this change is not made soon, we will have created one more agency in a long chain which is doomed to futility, frustration and ineffectiveness. So in suggesting some principles of a reorganization plan, we start from the basic assumption that the Ministry of State for Science and Technology will have the authority and power to carry it out.

There are some people—critics of our reports—who have said that the committee was out to dismantle the National Research Council, just as these same critics said we were out to denigrade basic research by reducing the percentage of the total budget allocated to it and by "separating" it from applied research. Neither charge is true.

The massive studies of the Senate Science Policy Committee conducted over the four-year period 1969-1973 have indicated, because of the size of our scientific operation, that it might be desirable to restructure some old institutions like the NRC, which have served Canada well in the past, and to re-assign new duties and responsibilities to the universities, mission-oriented departments and private industry. The whole thrust of our technological society has for some years been towards a greater degree of division of labour and greater specialization. So the committee accepts the premise that our proposed reorganization of government departments accepts the three principles of (a) division of labour, (b) specialization, and (c) integration.

In earlier days and with lower budgets we followed the principle of having multipurpose agencies, and these served their purpose. But as the structures grew bigger and more complex, conflicts of interest developed and incompatibility of overlapping of functions became quite apparent. Very often there was duplication of effort between departments and agencies, and overall a sad lack of communication between agencies.

Donald V. Fowke put the case for coupling specialization with integration rather well when he said:

● (1510)

> Organizations are thought to be either centralized or decentralized. In the face of uncertainty, organizations must be both . . . The concepts of differentiation and integration provide a more precise way of looking at the decentralization-centralization question. According to research work done by Lawrence and Loesch, organizational units should be highly differentiated where there is:
> 1. Lack of clarity in the information on which decisions must be made;
>
> 2. Uncertainty regarding cause and effect relationships; and
>
> 3. A long time span in feedback of the results from a decision.
> Differentiation implies a specialization of organization units, adaptation of their styles of management to the requirement of their particular environments. For overall adaptability, however, organization units must not only be highly differentiated but they must also be highly integrated.

The above three conditions are to be found in the field of science and technology more than in any other sector of public policy. Most of the recommendations made in Volume 2 provide for highly differentiated organizational units capable of reacting effectively to a specific function or responsibility, but also sufficiently integrated to profit from the advantages offered by centralization.

One of the recommendations of the Senate committee's report that drew some criticism was the proposal to separate the research-granting function from the NRC where it had reposed for a long time. The committee gave very careful consideration to this proposal and reviewed the history with great care. As far back as 1951 the Massey Commission indicated that there was some feeling that the NRC's research function and its granting function were incompatible. Then in 1969 the OECD examiners recommended that the support of basic research in universities and similar institutions should be separated from the council's laboratories and assigned to a special body. In 1969, too, the Macdonald group recommended that:

> The National Research Council be reconstituted so as to have as its sole responsibility the support of scientific and engineering research in universities and related institutions.

And finally Dr. Omond Solandt, in his last annual report as Chairman of the Science Council, concluded as follows:

[Hon. Mr. Cameron.]

> I believe that it is important for the NRC to relinquish its role as a major granting agency for the support of university research.

The committee agreed with these concerns and shared the view of Dr. C. H. Townes, who won the Nobel Prize in physics for his invention of the laser and the maser, when he wrote:

> A government agency is naturally concerned about the fate of one of its own laboratories and may hence be overindulgent. This instinct is particularly hazardous when the same agency, perhaps even the same individual is responsible for initiating or maintaining a laboratory as well as for making decisions on competing bids by other institutions for research support.

And I have seen this happen in universities time and again.

The committee accepted the view that the granting function should be separated from the NRC, and was influenced as well by a statement from one witness, speaking on behalf of the NRC, to the effect that 90 per cent of the council's time was taken up with the allocation of grants.

In devising a new structure the committee kept in mind the three basic principles of division of labour, specialization and integration, and as a consequence recommended:

> 1. That a Canadian Research Board be set up, together with three foundations, to report to the Secretary of State and to be responsible mainly for the development of a capacity for and the support of curiosity-oriented basic research in universities and similar institutions;
>
> 2. That the three foundations cover the physical sciences, the life sciences, and the social sciences and humanities, and bear the full cost, both direct and indirect, of the projects and programs they select to support in this area; and
> 3. That the responsibility for preparing university teachers and for supporting their research on the existing stock of knowledge designed to improve their teaching be left to provincial governments and universities within the framework of existing federal-provincial arrangements for the financing of post-secondary education.

Some people misconstrued this recommendation to mean that the foundations would be restricted to the support of basic research only. But the recommendation was not meant to make a separation between basic and applied research. It did specify that the "foundations be responsible mainly for the support of curiosity-oriented basic research." We had said earlier:

> The support of scientific surveys and applied research (conducted in universities and similar institutions) should be assigned mainly to mission-oriented agencies. The assistance provided by the federal foundations . . . would be residual and available only in areas where there were no other specific federal agencies.

Here again we applied the principle of the division of labour. Applied and engineering research, as well as scientific surveys, must correspond to a need or a practical objective.

Mission-oriented departments and agencies are in a much better position to perceive needs and existing problems than the existing councils or the proposed foundations. These applied scientific activities must be demand-pull, but good curiosity-oriented basic research must be supply-pull. In other words, you are only justified in spending money if there is a demand for it in the market place, whereas as far as basic research is concerned you must have a supply of qualified people to do the work. It is not a demand-pull supply issue.

These different requirements could be respected if mission-oriented departments and agencies were mainly responsible for supporting extramural demand-pull research and development through contractual arrangements.

In this context Dr. Solandt said:

> In discussing federal support of research, especially in universities, there is a tendency to think of the granting councils as the sole source of federal funds. It is often overlooked that the mission-oriented departments can, and to a limited extent do, support research outside the government both by grants to universities and by contracts to industry. The Science Council has seen the two sources of funds, the granting councils and the mission-oriented departments, as having complementary, but not competitive, roles in supporting research.

The foregoing division of labour would not guarantee that all undesirable gaps and duplication would be avoided, but if the Ministry of State for Science and Technology were made responsible for reviewing and assessing all government programs designed to support research in universities and similar institutions, it would be in a position to detect imbalances and make proposals to correct them, and ensure that the foundations and the mission-oriented departments play complementary rather than competing roles. Under these proposals the ministry should have enough authority to convince departments and agencies to give more adequate support to applied research and engineering in universities and similar institutions.

It has been observed that the most successful government laboratories and agencies have closely integrated their in-house research efforts with their management and external contracts. The Ministry of State for Science and Technology should induce departments and agencies, in co-operation with the Department of Supply and Services, to develop their balance of expertise.

Dr. Solandt has suggested the reorganization of the granting function "into a single body that would be internally organized into suitable components to cover the entire spectrum of research in the natural, social and life sciences." He said:

> Such a body would take over the university-oriented granting functions of NRC, those relating to basic research from the Medical Research Council and support of research in the social sciences and humanities from the Canada Council.

The OECD examiners proposed a similar arrangement to our committee's proposals for a Canadian Research Board and three foundations, so this proposal has pretty authoritative support. The idea of a number of research councils has many counterparts in Europe. Finland, for example, has six research councils which share an administrative and financial bureau under one umbrella organization, the Central Board of Research Councils. The board is serviced by several planning committees, and this whole complex is called the Academy of Finland and reports to the Science Office of the Ministry of Education.

In Great Britain there are five research councils and Sir Frederick Dainton, speaking of them, said that they would be opposed to the setting up of one monolithic national research council because of the dangers it would entail in making the council too remote from the scientists actually carrying out the work. There would be the added danger of creating a "paralyzing bureaucracy" and the further risk that if the granting agency was monolithic its errors would have monolithic consequences.

● (1520)

The Senate committee's conviction of the need for a Canadian research board was further reinforced by the views of Lord Rothschild, adviser to the United Kingdom Government on Science Policy, and also of the Dainton group which recommended for the United Kingdom:

> —that the activities of the Research Councils should be co-ordinated by a board which would include as full members the scientific heads of the Research Councils—we believe that the board should be associated with the Department of Education and Science.

That is, as far as the United Kingdom is concerned.

Our committee recommendation was that the Canadian research board be constituted with either a full or part-time president, the chairmen of the three foundations, with the provision for additional members and a small secretariat. This board should provide the common administrative services for the foundations, and take steps to ensure that their priorities include support for worthwhile multidiscipline projects. The board could play a useful co-ordinating role without intervening in the foundation's allocation of research funds.

Questions have been raised about the board and the foundations reporting through the Secretary of State rather than through the Ministry of State for Science and Technology. We must emphatically state that if the MOSST is to function effectively as an authority for overall assessment and review, it cannot be put in the position where it would have to defend any particular agency's budget.

In Volume 2, the committee recommended:

> —that in future most basic research activities of the Canadian Government be concentrated in a national research academy, with three institutes for the physical sciences, the life sciences and the humanities, with the purpose of filling gaps in basic research [and] that a substantial portion of the work of the institutes be performed at the request of government agencies and private firms on a fee basis.

As might be expected, these proposals met with a wide range of divergent criticisms. Dr. King of OECD suggested that the NRC laboratories be transferred to the universities, specifically the two Ottawa universities. SCITEC, at its meeting in 1972 on the national research academy, recommended keeping the status quo.

In summary, three basic criticisms were made against the proposed national research academy. First, the academy would isolate basic research from mission-oriented applied research and development. Secondly, the creation of three institutes would separate and isolate the main areas of scientific disciplines. Thirdly, the responsibilities assigned to the academy would destroy NRC's historical role.

The committee does not accept the suggestion that the role assigned to the proposed academy would unduly isolate basic research from the other phases of its innovation process. The division of labour we have suggested is capable of much more flexibility than it has been given credit for. When we recommended that most basic research activities of the Canadian government be concentrated in a national academy, this did not mean that mission-oriented departments and agencies would be prevented from carrying out any basic research at all. It meant that their role would be residual, thus avoiding a danger indicated by Wineberg when he said:

> It is natural that as a laboratory loses its sense of mission, the management will ensure the survival of the institution by drifting into basic research.

Here we have seen this happen, time and time again, particularly in mission-oriented agencies under the government.

> This drift toward basic research in a mission-oriented laboratory, if allowed to proceed unchecked, could destroy the laboratory's taste and capacity for getting on with practical missions.

The committee does not deny that mission-oriented departments and agencies may have real needs for basic research. We contend, however, that most of these requirements should be met by the academy on a fee basis, thus guaranteeing that only genuine needs would be expressed by the users, and that a substantial portion of the government intramural basic research activities would be directly related to applied research and development. These arrangements would bring basic research closer to the other phases of the innovation process rather than isolate it.

Howard M. Vollmer has drawn important conclusions from the pattern of historic relations between basic science and technology development in technologically advanced countries. He says, in part:

> Although they have some elements in common, basic research and applied research are fundamentally different in their purposes and objectives, in their culture or predominant value patterns, and in the style of management and organization they require. Therefore, there is a need for organizational insulation between basic research and applied research activities.

And this is heresy to some academics, I assure you. Vollmer continues:

> Since they are different but increasingly interdependent activities, there is a need for the development and strengthening of the mechanisms for cross-fertilization between basic and applied research. The success of these mechanisms for cross-fertilization will not only contribute directly to the continued growth of both basic and applied research but also to the growth of technologically-based societies and to the solution of major problems in these societies.

It is the committee's belief that the role we have proposed for the academy, and the mechanisms provided to relate a substantial portion of its activities to mission-oriented departments and agencies, is very much in line with Vollmer's conclusions.

Supporters of the continuum theory often cite the Bell Telephone laboratories in the United States as an example of a high technology company which combines basic and applied research. This is an interesting comparison because the total Bell expenditures on science and research and development in a year are about the same as the total Canadian science budget, $1.2 billion, but examination of the Bell laboratories shows that they have three distinct groups—a basic research group, an applied research group, and a development and design group. The task of central management is to see that the specialized goals of each section are relevant to the overall goals of the integrated system.

J. A. Morton, a vice-president of the Bell Company, points out that there are two types of barriers between groups—space barriers (are the groups in the same building?), and organizational barriers (do the groups report to the same manager?). Morton maintains that the barriers are necessary. He says:

> I can see that if I allow the feedback loop from design manufacture to basic research to get very strong, the feedback will stop the basic research. And it won't be long until I have lost my research and my research people. So we purposely put a barrier between manufacture and basic research, either a space barrier or an organizational barrier—maybe both.

Morton claims that similar barriers are desirable between basic research on the one hand, and applied research and engineering on the other:

> But at the same time, we see that if applied people or engineering people can dictate what the basic research people do, they will kill the long-range basic research. So we need an organizational barrier. One man—Bill Baker—is head of all basic research; other men head up applied research and engineering. Our people are free to sell, to stimulate and motivate all they like. But my engineers and researchers, for example, cannot tell the basic researchers what to do. And conversely, the basic researcher who believes he has made an important discovery, cannot order the applied research or engineering people to pursue it. So this organizational barrier provides freedom for basic research and freedom for what shall be developed.

The obvious conclusion to be derived from examples like the Bell laboratories and similar empirical investigations, and the management practices of large research-intensive firms, is that basic research laboratories should be loosely coupled with organizations doing applied research and development, and that a considerable amount of freedom should be given to basic science. This conclusion would seem to justify the establishment of a national research academy on the basis we have proposed.

● (1530)

Our committee wants the academy to be loosely connected with the mission-oriented departments and agencies, but we agree with Morton that "if applied people or engineering people can dictate what the basic research people do, they will kill long-range basic research". It should be understood, however, that in taking on contractural work the academy should be free to conduct worthwhile projects on its own.

One of the more obvious lessons from the current scientific scene is that the sciences are becoming more interdependent and that multidiscipline approaches are the only ways to tackle some major problems such as, for an example, pollution of the environment. Solutions to these problems will call for massive inputs from engineers, physicists, chemists, economists and sociologists, to name just a few.

Basic research that allows scientists from many disciplines to interact is not only fruitful but, in the opinion of many, is becoming essential. Gabor Strasser put it very well when he said, "It is necessary to properly orchestrate the many disciplines, and that superposition ... simply does not work." In other words, basic research on complex and socially important situations today requires a multidiscipline approach in a coherent organization.

In the months since Volume 2 came out the charge has been made that the Senate committee was out to destroy the NRC, and we emphasized time and again that, rather than destroy the NRC, our aim was to strengthen it by getting it back to doing the kind of long-range and basic tasks envisaged by its first president, Dr. Tory, in 1932, and re-emphasized again by Dr. Steacie, when he said:

> It is essential, if the organization is to develop any reputation or scientific self-respect, that the ad hoc problems and routine enquiries shall not be allowed to force real research out the door. It is very easy for this to happen and in the case of many laboratories of similar type in other countries, it has happened. In my view, at least as far as NRC is concerned, long-term investigations, fundamental or applied, must constitute the major effort of the laboratories if they are to keep the scientific reputation they have earned.

We say "Amen" to that. And for those who suffered an emotional trauma at the thought of changing the name of the NRC to that of the Canadian Research Academy, we have proposed that the name NRC be retained as the name of the academy.

Naturally, if we transfer the short-term problems that Dr. Steacie described as "ad hoc problems and routine enquiries," there must be some other organization to deal with them, and it was our proposal that this be done by the CILC, the Canadian Industrial Laboratories Corporation. This suggestion was embodied in the following recommendations on page 589 of Volume 2:

> 1. That a detailed and continuing review be undertaken by the Ministry for Science and Technology of current and future industrial R&D programs of government departments and agencies involved with renewable resources and related primary industries such as agriculture and fisheries, and that the objectives of such a review be to make sure that these agencies do not get involved in R&D activities on manufactured goods based on primary products, abandon or reduce certain programs which have a low Canadian priority, and contract out their mission-oriented basic research to universities or to the National Research Academy, and as much as possible of their development work to industry;
> 2. That the Ministry for Science and Technology undertake a review, with the same objectives, of industrial R&D programs in laboratories operated by government departments and agencies for secondary and service industries as well as for mining and power utilities;
>
> 3. That on March 31, 1973, these latter government laboratories be brought together in a new Crown company called the Canadian Industrial Laboratories Corporation (CILC) with a strong industrial representation on its board and committees and a growing industrial contribution to its financing and to be responsible to the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce; and
> 4. That pending the results of the proposed detailed review, a financial and manpower limit be imposed on intramural industrially-oriented R&D activities, commencing in fiscal year 1973-74.

Well, obviously we are a year behind schedule already and it may be more yet, but the principle involved is still sound.

Honourable senators, in this speech I have attempted to condense and put in a shorter framework much of the research elaborated in detail in chapter 14 of Volume 2, and a substantial part of chapter 21 of Volume 3. In order to do justice to the very important subject of the reorganization of the government departments and agencies responsible for specific or sectoral science policies, Senator Carter and I have put into practice what I have been preaching, namely, a division of labour. Consequently, he will complete the reorganization picture by dealing with the following topics: (a) a multipurpose grant program for R&D in industry; (b) industrial task forces and the Office of Industrial Reorganization; (c) the Interdepartmental Committee on Innovation; (d) assistance to small inventors; (e) recognition of innovation and invention; and (f) the reorganization of the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce.

In conclusion, I want to recapitulate and re-emphasize certain points which we believe to be basic to any modern science policy worthy of the name.

First, the Ministry of State for Science and Technology must be given the power to review and assess the formulation and development of science policy rather than to have an advisory and assistant role to the Treasury Board. It must do both. Saying this in no way denigrates the role of the Treasury Board, which must have the final say on the amount of the science budget, but the arrangement does provide that the decisions with respect to science policies and projects will be made by scientists.

Secondly, the proposals will ensure that for the first time the total expenditures by the government on scientific research and R&D will be visible.

Thirdly, the fact that the science budget will be visible and will be brought before the members of Parliament should result in developing more interest, and a better-informed Parliament, as far as science policy is concerned.

Fourthly, the setting up of the Canadian Research Academy or a new National Research Council with three foundations under it will strengthen the NRC rather than weaken it, and enable it to concentrate its efforts, as was originally intended, on long-range basic and applied research.

Fifthly, by separating the granting function from the NRC and placing it with the foundations it will bring to the granting function, particularly in the area of the humanities and social sciences which have been a part of the Canada Council, a quality of expertise which has been lacking under the present system.

Sixthly, the division of labour, while not necessarily taking away the opportunity for mission-oriented departments and agencies to do basic research, will assure a better use of and a better co-ordination of resources. It will put the emphasis on user-demand rather than supply-push.

Seventhly, the proposed Canadian Industrial Laboratories Corporation will be a natural vehicle to take over the work of the NRC laboratories, and to provide a greater opportunity and responsibility for a major input from industry.

Eighthly, in any government reorganization with respect to science policy, the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce must play a major role, but if it is to do this effectively it must strengthen the technological capability of the department. This is the only way that an effective industrial strategy for the seventies can be implemented at the business level.

Finally—and this is a beseeching plea—please, please give every support and encouragement to making the Social Science Research Council an equal partner in funding and support with the other councils.

Our greatest weakness today lies in the lag between the status of the physical and life sciences and the social sciences, and we have a tremendous job of catching up to do in this field because the major problems of the seventies are in this field.

On motion of Senator Carter, debate adjourned.

NATIONAL FINANCE

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO SIT DURING ADJOURNMENTS OF THE SENATE

Leave having been given to revert to Notices of Motions:

Hon. Sidney L. Buckwold, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(a), moved:

> That the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance have power to sit during adjournments of the Senate.

Motion agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, December 18, at 8 p.m.

THE SENATE

Tuesday, December 18, 1973

The Senate met at 8 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

PRIVATE BILL

NATIONAL DENTAL EXAMINING BOARD OF CANADA— COMMONS AMENDMENTS

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons returning Bill S-7, respecting the National Dental Examining Board of Canada, and acquainting the Senate that they have passed this bill with the following amendments, to which they desire the concurrence of the Senate:

Honourable senators, when shall these amendments be taken into consideration?

Hon. Mr. Phillips: Honourable senators, I move, seconded by Senator Smith, that these amendments be taken into consideration at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Hon. Paul Martin tabled:

Copies of Final Report of the Task Force on Organic Mercury in the Environment, together with statement on action taken by the Department of National Health and Welfare on recommendations contained therein.

Report of Statistics Canada for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1972, pursuant to section 4(3) of the Statistics Act chapter 15, Statutes of Canada, 1970-71-72.

Report of operations under the Fisheries Development Act for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1973, pursuant to section 10 of the said act, chapter F-21, R.S.C., 1970.

Copies of final communiqué issued following the Ministerial Session of the North Atlantic Council, held at Brussels, December 10 and 11, 1973.

Report of the Department of External Affairs for the year ended December 31, 1972, pursuant to section 6 of the Department of External Affairs Act, chapter E-20, R.S.C., 1970.

Report on the activities of the Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations for the fiscal year 1972-73, pursuant to section 3 of the Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations Act, chapter F-26, R.S.C., 1970.

Copies of Final Report of the Commission of Inquiry into the non-medical use of drugs, dated December 14, 1973 (Chairman, Mr. Gerald Le Dain).

Copies of a booklet entitled "Status of Women in Canada—1973", issued by the Minister of Labour.

Copies of an intergovernmental agreement on coordination structure for transportation planning in the Regional Municipality of Ottawa-Carleton, Outaouais Regional Community and the National Capital Region as a whole, together with a press communiqué relating thereto.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

On the Question Period:

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Honourable senators, as this is the last full week before Christmas, I wonder if the Leader of the Government is in a position to tell the Senate what lies ahead for us during this week, whether we may expect an adjournment at the end of this week, and, if so, for how long.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Honourable senators, I would prefer to postpone any conjecture until—

Hon. Mr. Flynn: After the New Year.

Hon. Mr. Martin: —later in the week. If my honourable friend can tell me what is going to happen to the two energy bills, I would be in a better position to reply to his question. Perhaps he may be able to give me some good news tomorrow.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: What did you expect when you agreed to present it to Parliament?

Hon. Mr. Martin: I still think, in the spirit of Christmas, Senator Flynn could tell me what they are going to do in the other place.

Hon. Mr. Buckwold: Honourable senators, apropos the question raised by the Leader of the Opposition, I have been in touch with the authorities who arrange transportation. I have been given to understand that a military plane will be available on Saturday morning, leaving the airport at 9 a.m., to transport members travelling west. I am not quite sure about the arrangements for those members who wish to travel east.

Hon. Mr. Martin: And east too.

Hon. Mr. Buckwold: I wanted honourable senators to know that if any changes were required in their transportation arrangements, alternative transportation will be available through the Department of National Defence.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: That would indicate that we shall not be sitting on December 24.

Hon. Mr. Martin: But it does not mean that we would not sit on the 25th!

APPROPRIATION BILL NO. 5, 1973

THIRD READING

Hon. Leopold Langlois moved the third reading of Bill C-239, for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial year ending the 31st March, 1974.

Hon. Hazen Argue: Honourable senators, before the motion is put, I should like—

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Not before the motion is put; before it is adopted.

Hon. Mr. Argue: Before it is adopted. The Leader of the Opposition keeps us all in line and on the right track. Before the motion is adopted, I should like to take advantage of the fact that this is an omnibus bill. It contains certain items in respect of the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources. I have a few comments to make on the question of whether or not, in Canada at this time, we should adopt daylight saving time. The Minister of Energy for Canada has taken a fence-sitting attitude on this question. He is not convinced that it would necessarily save very much in the way of energy.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: What is unusual about that?

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Would you please repeat the name of the minister to whom you referred?

Hon. Mr. Martin: The Leader of the Opposition.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: No, he said the Minister of Energy for Canada.

Hon. Mr. Argue: The Honourable Donald Macdonald.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Thank you.

Hon. Mr. Argue: On the other hand, I understand that the Province of Ontario may be looking at the question of daylight saving time for Ontario in a favourable light.

[Hon. Mr. Martin.]

Hon. Mr. Martin: There will be a lot of light if we have it.

Hon. Mr. Argue: I would think it would be to our advantage to go on daylight saving time. My personal view is that it would help conserve energy. The use of daylight saving time during the war years conserved energy, and I think it would do so again. I support daylight saving time not only as a temporary advantage at this time, but also on a year-round basis. I feel that this part of Canada should be on daylight saving time year round.

I welcome this opportunity to express my views on this subject. I have held these views for a long time. I have always felt that Ontario made a mistake in adopting standard time for the winter months. As far as I am concerned, it brings instant winter. I find it most discouraging, when the clocks go back, to find that, in effect, the days are shortened for most people. I think the kind of time that they have in Ontario for the winter months is "igloo" time.

We in Saskatchewan debated this question of daylight saving time over a long period. The situation that prevailed in Saskatchewan for many years was most confusing. A time zone divided our province. Part of the province was on one time, part on another. For the summer months some clocks were advanced, while others were not. The same situation prevailed during the winter months. After a lengthy debate, Saskatchewan adopted daylight saving time year round. I think everyone is happy with it. It has many advantages. The children have another hour of daylight in the afternoon for recreation purposes. They are able to make use of unlighted, open air rinks for an extra hour. That is an advantage. I had a daughter in Ottawa who had a horse. She liked to go riding, but when winter came it brought almost instant darkness after school, and because of this ridiculous time situation she was unable to engage in this sport during December and January.

I hope that Ontario does adopt daylight saving time, and I hope that the federal government gives daylight saving time its support and a boost. I think it is good for Canada as an energy-saving move, and it has many advantages. We would not have to tamper with the clock any longer, and I feel it would have many advantages for the citizens of this and other provinces who would adopt daylight saving time.

● (2010)

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Honourable senators, there is not much I can say on this subject except to note that Senator Argue opened his remarks by saying that this measure would be welcomed in the present situation, when there is a shortage of energy in Canada. However, he concluded by expressing the wish that daylight saving time should be adopted for ever and ever. I have not made the research he seems to have made into the possibility of saving energy by changing now to daylight saving time, but I can see his suggestion has some merit. Unfortunately, I am advised that this is not a matter of federal jurisdiction, and that the provinces should take the initiative. If I recall correctly something I read in the newspapers last week, there was a statement in the other place by someone on the government side to the effect that this move would be welcomed, but that the initiative should come from the provinces.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I am quite sure that the Leader of the Government would express the opinion that this would be a good move, because he has always been on daylight saving time.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Anything that will add some light to the Leader of the Opposition I will gladly support.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Whether it is little or nothing.

Hon. Mr. Buckwold: Honourable senators, I wish to endorse the remarks of my colleague from Saskatchewan. We have been on year-round daylight saving time in half of our province for a long while. I have to tell you that it has not been universally accepted. There are some rural areas where one hears complaints that the chickens and cows do not recognize that the time has changed, so it is not quite as widely accepted as my colleague indicated. One of the problems is getting up in the dark, although in Ottawa that should not make much difference, and I do not suppose it would bother people in this city too much.

I would like to pass on a bit of wisdom I once read, when it was reported that daylight saving time started when an old Indian cut off one end of his blanket and sewed it on to the other end in order to make it longer.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

PAROLE ACT

The Senate resumed from Tuesday, December 11, the adjourned debate on the motion of Senator Goldenberg for the second reading of Bill C-191, to amend the Parole Act.

Hon. Lionel Choquette: Honourable senators, this bill is an ad hoc measure by an ad hoc administration to appoint ten new ad hoc members to the National Parole Board. However, I am not surprised, "ad hocery" is characteristic of this moribund administration. It waits for crises to occur and then reacts to them, and it reacts with unimaginative, ill thought-out half measures, which reveal a complete failure to grasp the problems. There was no good reason for the government to bring in a bill as limited in scope as this one is.

The government has had the Hugessen Report on the release of inmates from Canadian penal institutions for over a year. Much of that report dealt with the parole system, and many of its recommendations made very good sense. Why then has it taken so long to implement any of it? Neither our penal nor our parole system is the envy of the world. Some of those familiar with our institutions and what goes on there would tell you we have a way to go before catching up with the nineteenth century. So why, when a group of experts makes recommendations, does this government take all of one year to make a half-hearted attempt at implementing a single one of those recommendations?

The Hugessen Report set down four main objectives for the reorganization of the parole system, which I enumerate as follows: (1) The decentralization of the board; (2) the integration of the parole system with the criminal justice continuum; (3) an interlinked information system; and (4) due process of law. It also made specific recommendations as to how those objectives might be implemented.

For a whole year the Solicitor General's Department, with all its well paid experts, has pored over the Hugessen Report. They have studied it in depth—or, at least, they have had plenty of time to do so—and this is all they can bring forth. This government has no shame.

Special reports that are commissioned cost a lot of money, and what happens to recommendations contained in those reports? They are not acted upon expeditiously; rather, they are, for the most part, studiously ignored.

This bill goes a small hesitant step in the direction of the first objective, but falls far short of what was actually recommended in the Hugessen Report. That report called for the formation of local parole boards to serve each institution, or group of institutions. Each local board was to have three members—one representing the penal institution, one representing the community, and one representing the parole service.

The report also called for the appointment of five regional boards, each with eight members, including an informed and interested citizen, a judge, a senior police officer, a psychiatrist or psychologist, a criminologist or sociologist, a person responsible for programs in correctional institutions, a person responsible for the supervision of criminal offenders, and a regional chairman.

My good friend, Senator John M. Macdonald, has already expressed his opinion on a few of these suggestions, and I very much agree with his opinion. So why is it that all we have to prove that the Hugessen Report was given even a cursory glance by this government is the weak and very limited piece of patchwork contained in this bill? Why does this bill not set down a comprehensive, imaginative, forward-looking policy on parole? The government has had the time to draw one up, starting from the Hugessen Report, so where is it? Why are we suffered to deal with this piece of midget policy?

We had the right to expect that the government would present us with a complete plan on how it would improve the parole system. And there is more to that task than just providing a few new bodies on the Parole Board.

What about provincial boards; are they to continue or not? What about having a national commission for parole to co-ordinate local and provincial boards? What about a national parole institute, to gather information for the various parole agencies? What about the inefficient duplication of operations of the penitentiary service and the national parole service? What is going to be done to improve the liaison between the Parole Board and the various police forces? We had every reason to expect that this bill would provide a statement of policy covering these matters.

According to the Hugessen Report the prison system fails to provide adequate protection for the public. Nobody wants to see people, who are ready to be successfully re-integrated into the community, languishing in jail. No one wants to see people suffer, but surely we have a right to expect that those persons who represent significant risks to the community will not be released from our penal institutions. It has happened all too often that parolees have committed crimes. I do not need to remind honourable senators that some people, who should never have been released in the first place, have killed as many as four children or four young people after they were released.

● (2020)

We want to see a policy aimed at eliminating, to the greatest degree imaginable, the possibility of having society suffer as a result of crimes being committed by people who should have been in institutions at the time. The existing policy has been judged by experts to be deficient. Recommendations have been made to improve the system. Again, I ask, when will the government take action? This bill simply does not qualify as a satisfactory reply to the needs of our community as itemized in the Hugessen Report.

We do not want to see the total number of paroles reduced. If anything, we want it increased. There are too many people in our penal institutions. I am told that, per capita, we incarcerate more people than any other country in the world. That is a statistic we should certainly not be proud of.

We want to see our rehabilitation programs improved, and more of the right people released from prison. We have had enough of seeing the wrong ones released. We want to see the Parole Board provided with the facilities to undertake much more thorough searches of applications for parole. We want mistakes to be avoided as much as is humanly possible.

We want a policy—a clear, comprehensive policy—on parole. We want to see what measures the government plans to use to release those who could again be of value rather than a burden to society.

That is what we should have had in this bill—a clear enunciation of policy; a comprehensive program for the proper administration of parole and temporary releases. But that is not what we have here—not at all. Instead, we have a half measure. The student has turned in his assignment with only the first paragraph of the required essay. We will have to mark him accordingly, and give him an "F".

However, since the measure contained in this bill is undoubtedly necessary, and since this measure would definitely have figured in a comprehensive program, if the government had been responsible enough to provide one, we find we must vote for it. But it will not solve the parole problem. The problems with regard to parole go far beyond our not having the bodies to interview personally applicants for parole. Our problems are more fundamental than that. The Hugessen Report pointed out quite clearly what those problems were, but the government is dragging its feet.

In closing, I would express one hope. I sincerely hope the government is not going to treat the report of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs on the subject of parole in the way it has treated—or should I say "mistreated"—the Hugessen Report. I am assuming, of course, that Senator Goldenberg's committee is planning some day to submit a report of some sort.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Somehow!

Hon. Mr. Choquette: I do not have to point out to Senator Goldenberg that his committee was charged with a study of the parole system as far back as October, 1971. I should add that the honourable senator is not wholly to blame, because he was not present at that time and not functioning as the chairman of the committee, but nevertheless that is over two years ago. The committee has, since that time, held 27 public hearings, heard 75 witnesses, and received 116 briefs from interested parties. The expert staff of the committee has logged several thousand miles criss-crossing Canada, interviewing authorities in the fields of criminology and penology.

The whole exercise has cost $150,000 to date, and as yet has borne no fruit. Absolutely nothing has been produced that even vaguely resembles a preliminary report. That is not the way it should be. No committee should be allowed to get away with sitting two years on a problem without giving us some sort of report.

In my more cynical moments I can easily convince myself that this committee's study of parole is being deliberately kept going merely to provide the government with an excuse for its inaction.

Hon. Mr. Goldenberg: I think the honourable senator should withdraw that remark. He knows that it is not true.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: I do not know that it is not true.

Hon. Mr. Goldenberg: If the honourable senator had attended meetings of the committee as much or as often as other members did—and he is a member of that committee—he would know.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: But I have attended many; I have taken an active part in them, and I have made a contribution. I still have to see when we are going to get a final report, and I am asking the question.

As long as the committee keeps up its pretence of work, the government can claim it is waiting for that committee's report before fashioning a new policy. I do not think we should allow the Senate to be used in that way by a morally bankrupt government, totally devoid of anything even vaguely resembling an original and effective idea as to how to improve the parole system.

I will support this bill, but I am not happy with it. It is a stopgap measure by a government that is incapable of providing thorough solutions to our problems.

There is still plenty of work to be done in this area, but I know that this administration does not have the talent to do the required work. So I guess the people of Canada will just have to keep yearning for that glorious day when this government is replaced by one that possesses the vision necessary to solve our problems.

Hon. Mr. Martin: May I ask the senator a question? Since he is a member of the committee, does he not think that he should confirm to the Senate that the committee has been energetically engaged in preparing its report regarding a problem which Senator Choquette himself has said is a vital one? Senator Choquette is a member of that committee—

Hon. Mr. Flynn: How do you know? You stay away.

Hon. Mr. Martin: —and he knows what is going on. Should he not tell the Senate the fact, namely, that this committee is now engaged in the preparation of its report under an able chairman, Senator Goldenberg?

Hon. Mr. Flynn: That is a good speech, but it is not a question.

Hon. Earl A. Hastings: Honourable senators, in speaking to this bill I shall try to reply to Senator Choquette with respect to the criticism he has made against the committee. In doing so I think my first obligation is to pay tribute to the chairman of that committee, under whom many of us have served in this past year, for the work he has done. Senator Goldenberg came to our committee about a year ago. Since then he has given excellent leadership, and I can tell Senator Choquette, as he has not been present, that we are in the final stage of that report and hopefully it will be published in March. Let me also tell him that it was out of respect for the Senate, and the Senate committee and its report, that no further legislation has been introduced. As the minister has said from time to time, this bill was not intended as a complete reform of parole legislation in Canada, but he was awaiting the report of the Senate committee. He was awaiting the report of the Federal-Provincial Conference on Corrections, which has just concluded in Ottawa, and he is also awaiting the report of a committee in the other house, which has toured the institutions of Canada this past year under the honourable member for Kingston and the Islands. It is out of respect for these reports that the minister introduced the present bill which we have under consideration, as a stopgap measure which is urgently needed, and further reforms will await the completion of these other reports.

● (2030)

Judge Hugessen and his committee are not the only "experts" who have been giving consideration to the problem of parole, corrections and custody in Canada. Twenty members of this house have worked in committee, of which Senator Choquette is a member, and they have worked fairly diligently in conducting a thorough study. We wanted to make certain that any recommendations which we make at this time are not going to continue to be ad hoc, and we are not going to continue to gather meaningless reports that have been made over the past years when it comes to the treatment of offenders in our institutions and their release back into society.

I have to disagree again with Senator Choquette, and unfortunately I also have to disagree with the distinguished senator from Cape Breton, Senator Macdonald, when he says that no policeman or judge should ever be appointed to a parole board. In my view you cannot preclude any man from sitting on a parole board by virtue of his occupation or training. It seems to me that as we have given consideration to the question of parole, one glaring deficiency that keeps coming forward is the fact that it is something misunderstood by all segments of the criminal justice system from the policeman who arrests the man, gives evidence that leads to his conviction and then disposes of him, the judge who judges and sentences the man and disposes of him, sending him on his way to custody, to the custodial men who take him into custody and hold him for the necessary period of time and then send him off on parole under the care of the Parole Board or some other after-care agency. The greatest problem in corrections today is the fragmentation of effort, and what is needed more than anything else is an understanding by all segments of the criminal justice system of what is involved as the offender is sent on his journey. Furthermore, this should be understood by the offender himself, because one thing we have learned is that the process is misunderstood even by the offender himself. It reminds me of the occasion when I asked a young man if he could define parole for me. His answer was, "It is that thing they are going to use to let me out to see how long it will be before I steal again." One of the things we have to seek is a greater understanding throughout the whole criminal justice system, and a great contribution to that understanding could be made by having a judge or policeman sit on a parole board. I can pay great tribute to Jean-Paul Gilbert, former police chief of Montreal and a present member of the Parole Board. In my own city of Calgary, part of the training of a police officer is to spend two weeks in the parole office. Mr. Gilbert also organized a committee of the Canadian police chiefs and Parole Board so that these two organizations would understand and appreciate each other's objectives. In my view this is the only way we can hope to attain some success, and for that reason I would not preclude a judge or a policeman, or anyone else for that matter, from serving on a parole board. As I have said, what is needed is an appreciation and understanding of the correction procedure.

I have had a great deal of experience with the Parole Board, and I cannot criticize its members. I know it is easy to join the mob and to criticize when there is a failure in parole. When that happens, it seems that everyone screams to get the man back in his cage. But, few people stop to try and understand why this individual acted in this way in these particular circumstances, just as few people try to understand why this man was allowed to go free, or the effort and consideration that goes into the question of putting him back on the street again. It is easy to scream with the mob to get him back in his cage, but it is frequently very hard to work with these men to try to get them back into society even though doing so is our greatest protection.

What are the parolees who are presently in society doing? We hear that they are doing all kinds of dreadful things—stealing, thieving, raping and so forth. I have a survey of the National Parole Service as of June 1973, and it indicates that of the 2003 parolees under the supervision of the National Parole Service, 81 per cent were employed, 15 per cent were unemployed and 4 per cent of the total were engaged in pursuing further education and undergoing various forms of training to improve their occupational skill. Then of the 1,632 who were employed, 77.5 per cent are employed continuously, 11.5 per cent on a seasonal basis and 10.5 per cent on a casual basis.

During the month of June these men earned a total of $905,745, which meant an average per parolee of $545, and they supported 1,805 dependants. So that is what these men are doing on parole under the supervision of the National Parole Service.

Honourable senators, with these observations, I should like to adjourn the debate until the next sitting of the Senate.

On motion of Senator Hastings, debate adjourned.

SCIENCE POLICY

The Senate resumed from Thursday, December 13, consideration of Volume 3 of the Report of the Special Committee of the Senate on Science Policy, tabled in the Senate on Tuesday, September 11, 1973.

Hon. Chesley W. Carter: Honourable senators, we are now considering the third and final volume of the Report of the Senate Special Committee on Science Policy. It will be recalled that Volume 1 traced the development of science policy in Canada from the beginning of Confederation to the present time. It also outlined the industrial strategy that developed concurrently along with and from that science policy, because the two are intertwined and in many respects inseparable. In fact, a science policy developed in isolation and without a close relationship to industrial and economic growth has little relevance.

In the early days both science policy and industrial strategy rested on the same foundation which was supported by three pillars: (1) the exploitation of natural resources including energy; (2) the export of raw materials; and (3) the encouragement of small branch plant secondary industries protected by high tariff walls.

This science policy and the industrial strategy that sprang from it served Canada well enough in the days when Canada had a rural economy based on agriculture and other primary industries. At that time most nations of the world were in the same boat, struggling to develop along similar lines. That was 60 or 70 years ago. But two world wars changed all that. World War I not only made Canada a nation, but it also marked the beginning of a change in the basis of Canada's economy from rural and agricultural to urban and industrial.

The second technological revolution, which took place in the United States about this time and which resulted in the mass production of motor cars, electrical appliances, et cetera, gave further impetus to this process because these products required vast quantities of raw materials and cheap hydro power, which were available in Canada in abundance and at less cost than in the United States. Since these resources were under provincial jurisdiction, and each province was vying with the other for secondary industry, there was naturally a rapid expansion of the branch plant economy, not only in manufacturing but in resource industries as well. The result was heavy foreign investment in Canada with concomitant foreign control over Canada's industries and resources.

World War II carried the process even further. During the intervening period, and particularly during the past 25 years, Canada's science policy has been doctored here and there in a futile effort to adjust to events as they occurred in the economic and industrial world, but no transformation has taken place. Basically we are still following the same science policy and the same industrial strategy that was designed 100 years ago for a different age and different conditions. If anything, our science policy has been determined largely by our industrial strategy, whereas actually it should be the other way around.

[Hon. Mr. Hastings.]

Our present ad hoc, haphazard, science policy by accident, is totally inadequate and totally unsuited for an industrial country like Canada with an exploding work force, a small domestic market and an economy heavily dependent on exports. Moreover, it is totally unsuited for the kind of world we are living in, a world where Canada has to meet fierce competition from other countries that are advanced industrially and technologically, and which also have the benefit of large domestic markets. On the contrary, it handicaps Canada greatly because it makes no provision for the attainment of long range goals, and it prohibits those quick adjustments that must be made almost overnight in our rapidly changing world.

Let us take a moment to pause and consider exactly where we are with respect to science policy in Canada today. To begin with, we do not have an accurate picture of the overall expenditures on scientific research and development because we have no overall inventory of what R & D programs are being carried out all across Canada. Neither do we have an overall inventory of the R & D programs that are being funded with public money. Such inventories simply do not exist.

We do know, however, that the Government of Canada is spending somewhere around $1.25 billion on research and development. Some of this money is being spent by government departments in their own laboratories, and some in industry and the universities by way of federal grants. But, generally speaking, the universities do not know what industry is doing, and industry does not know what the universities are doing. Neither of them knows what the government laboratories are doing, and the government laboratories do not know what industry and the universities are doing. They represent the three solitudes, each oblivious of the other and each going its own sweet way in splendid isolation.

Consequently we have no way of knowing what overlapping or duplication is taking place with respect to programs at home or abroad, or what programs are being perpetuated unnecessarily. Neither do we have any criteria for determining when a program has outlived its usefulness and should be terminated. This situation must be viewed in the light of the fact that Canada lags far behind other industrial nations in the race for science and technology, particularly in the innovative process—the translation of scientific discoveries into new products or improved versions of existing products.

The committee was told that the National Research Council, which was set up to conduct long-term basic research and to advise government and industry on matters of science and technology, was spending about 90 per cent of its time awarding grants.

On the industrial side, we have a fragmented manufacturing industry geared to our small domestic market, unable, because of problems of scale, to compete with imported products without heavy tariff protection. Also, our secondary industry is mainly dependent on the foreign parent for scientific research and improved technology. With two or three notable exceptions, our secondary industry has no ongoing long-range R & D programs, and what little research is being done depends largely on the yearly balance sheet. If profits are low, they do little or none. If profits are up, they do a little more. No worthwhile industrial research and development program can be developed in this haphazard manner.

On the economic development side, our industries have been encouraged to concentrate in the two central provinces, with the rest of the country constituting a huge periphery of undeveloped regions, the political and economic status of which is little different from that of a colony.

On the social side, we have no worthwhile scientific research whatsoever, although all our most difficult and most pressing problems are social problems, such as pollution and other environmental problems; scarcity of housing and land for housing development; exorbitant increases in land and housing costs; urban transportation problems; and problems of poverty and over-crowding, and crime problems resulting from them.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I am sorry to interrupt Senator Carter's speech, but I hear conversation from both sides of the house, which makes it very difficult to follow what the honourable senator is saying.

Senator Carter has prepared a speech which is well worth while hearing, and I am sure that many honourable senators, like myself, would like to hear it without interruption. I would remind honourable senators of the rule of the Senate regarding conversation when a senator is speaking.

Hon. Mr. Carter: Thank you, Madam Speaker.

Honourable senators, Canadian inventors are discouraged rather than encouraged. There is no source of venture capital or assistance, either public or private, to which they can turn for assistance in building a prototype, and completing the innovative process. The Industrial Development Bank has proved to be practically useless as far as this need is concerned.

The so-called incentive grants are rendered useless by bureaucracy. They are distributed among a number of government departments in different localities, and the applicant is kept running from door to door as each department passes the buck on to the other. If by chance the Canadian inventor should meet the criteria established for any particular form of assistance, he is kept waiting for months, and even years, before the bureaucrats condescend to tell him whether or not he will be assisted. In most cases, when the decision is handed down, it is too late. The applicant has either given up the idea altogether, or financial circumstances have compelled him to stop working on it, or he has been compelled to sell it to some foreign company for a mere fraction of its worth. In this way, because of cumbersome machinery and a slow acting and indifferent bureaucracy, untold millions of dollars' worth of new industry is lost to Canada every year.

● (2050)

That, honourable senators, to use a Newfoundland expression, "is where we are at," at the present time. All this is spelled out in detail in Volume 2 of the committee's report. But Volume 2 goes further than that. The committee felt it was not good enough merely to try to cope with the present situation. That would be like the generals who are always prepared to fight the last war. The committee, therefore, looked a little into the future, and it forecast the kind of world that we now see unfolding before us.

The Committee warned that not only Canada, but the whole industrial world, was using up its resources at an exponential rate. We were doubling our consumption of energy every 15 years, and doubling our consumption of other resources—in longer or shorter periods, but doubling them, nevertheless—at an exponential rate, and that was the road to disaster, because once you have reached the halfway mark it is then too late to take any counter measures that can be effective in diverting disaster.

In short, the committee predicted that not only Canada, but the whole industrial world, was headed into an era of scarcity, and our plans for the future should take that into account. We already have a scarcity of available petroleum. Cheap energy is now a thing of the past. Higher cost energy means higher cost agricultural products, higher food prices and higher priced manufactured products. This is a fact of life. The only hope of offsetting these higher prices is through improved technology and productivity.

Table 17 on page 483, Volume 2, lists a number of strategic minerals and their world rate of depletion. We are already aware of the shortage of available oil. This table, which was compiled in 1969, showed that world resources of petroleum would be exhausted in 31 years if there was no increase in the rate of consumption. But consumption was increasing at the rate of 3.8 per cent per year, and if that rate of increased consumption continued, world petroleum resources would be exhausted in 20 years. That means we have about 15 years' supply left, which is what the experts have been telling us. But the experts are warning us also that before long we will be faced with a similar shortage of copper, zinc, mercury, gold and even water. These resources cannot be replaced overnight. It takes years to find acceptable substitutes, and more years after that to construct the plants to turn out those substitutes.

Then there is the question of investment—the amount, the source and its effect on Canada's dollar. Having a small domestic market and being highly dependent on exports, Canada cannot afford to permit the exchange rate of the Canadian dollar to be pushed to a level that will make our goods uncompetitive on the world market. This, then, is a limiting factor on the amount of foreign capital that Canada's economy can safely absorb. It is, therefore, necessary to plan ahead so that we will be prepared for events as they happen, instead of trying to catch up with them as we have been doing until now.

In line with this thinking, the committee, in Volume 2, set forth a number of recommended targets for the seventies, and the strategies it felt were necessary to achieve them.

In Volume 3 the committee outlined the reorganization and restructuring of government departments and agencies that must be carried out in order to implement those strategies, achieve those goals described in Volume 2, and also to correct the situation I described earlier. In short, Volume 3 deals with the kind of organization at the national level which is required to develop and implement a new industrial strategy—a new national policy that takes into account present day conditions and which, at the same time, is flexible enough to permit rapid adjustments to changes, either at home or abroad, as they occur.

In his excellent address when opening the debate on November 14 last—Senate Hansard, page 1136—Senator Lamontagne pointed out that the plan of reorganization recommended by the committee had three facets—the central machinery, departments and agencies, and the interfaces of science policy, which means relationships between federal agencies and other agencies at the international, provincial and national levels, including Parliament and the scientific and engineering community.

Senator Lamontagne went on to make it quite clear that the committee had recommended a much stronger central organization than the present Ministry of State for Science and Technology. The present ministry can only advise and assist. What the committee recommended was a central authority that could review and assess, because only in this way can we ever have a visible budget and an accurate overview of federal expenditures on scientific research and development. Only in this way can we minimize bureaucracy, eliminate overlapping and duplication of programs, prevent the perpetuation of useless programs, and develop criteria by which programs which have outlived their usefulness can be identified and terminated. In short, it is the only way we can get the best value for our scientific research and development dollar.

Senator Lamontagne devoted practically his whole speech to exposing the organizational weakness of our present Ministry of State for Science and Technology, explaining how the central authority recommended by the committee was intended to function, and also the adverse consequences that can be expected if it is not adopted or if the present organization is continued.

On December 4 last—Senate Hansard, page 1235—Senator Grosart, in his usual thorough manner, dealt extensively with the interfaces of science policy, and last Thursday Senator Cameron, in another excellent speech, dealt with the reorganization of government departments and agencies, as recommended by the committee. He emphasized that this reorganization was based on the three principles of (a) division of labour, (b) specialization, and (c) integration.

I referred earlier to the fact that Canada lags far behind other industrial nations in the scientific and technological race, and particularly in the innovative process which translates scientific discoveries into new industries and new commercial products, or improved versions of old products. To correct this situation, and to facilitate the development of a new industrial strategy, the committee believes that the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce should be charged with the clear responsibility for implementing a realistic technological and industrial strategy, including the encouragement and development of the various stages of the innovative process.

The committee believes that it is important for domestic technological and industrial strategy to be related directly to trade policy and, indeed, to help define it. Evidence before the committee led to the conclusion that since the two departments were combined in 1969, the trade and commerce mission of the department had been emphasized at the expense of the industrial mission. The committee felt that this was a deplorable outcome which ought to be corrected. To that end the committee recommended—and I am quoting from page 723, volume 3, of the report—as follows:

> —that a deputy minister of industry be appointed in the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce as the senior official responsible for implementing a technological and industrial strategy and for administering its support services, and that a senior assistant deputy minister for technology and innovation be designated as soon as possible to serve eventually under the new deputy minister when appropriate legislation has been approved.

Both senior officials should, of course, have a practical knowledge of Canadian industry and of the requirements for the successful introduction of a new technology and industrial innovation.

● (2100)

The committee also recommended that the specialized tools and agencies required to encourage and assist the innovative process should also be brought under the umbrella of the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce. I mentioned earlier the discouragement that resulted from the runaround and long delays experienced by individual inventors and innovators, and by innovating enterprises, who applied for various federal grants available for R & D in industry. To overcome this, the committee recommended in Volume 2 that all existing specific grants designed to encourage R & D activities in industry be integrated into one multi-purpose program, and placed under the management of the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce, and that the department carefully evaluate the program so as to establish the public benefit gained from this expenditure of public funds. On the whole, this recommendation received wide support from the business and scientific community, and, since it can be easily implemented, the government is urged to do so without delay.

The experience of many countries is that industries with limited R & D capacity can and should develop skills to use existing information rather than conduct small, poor quality R & D programs. One of the most valuable services the government can render industry is to help gather and distribute technological information and forecasts. To develop a sound innovative strategy private firms and industries must detect technological trends at home and abroad as early as possible. A good technological monitoring service is therefore of crucial importance for an individual firm or industry. Monitoring on a large scale, and in the most important countries of the world, has contributed largely to Japan's technological success.

It is usually too expensive for smaller firms to develop their own monitoring system, but an efficient and satisfactory system can be worked out on an industry-wide basis by a number of firms willing to work together and pool their resources. Nevertheless, all private systems must be complemented by a public monitoring service with representation abroad.

In this connection, the committee recommended at page 593, Volume 2:

> 1. The Ministry of State for Science and Technology be given responsibility for initiating the creation of new scientific and technical information and transfer systems and technological forecasting services in co-operation with the proposed National Research Academy and the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce and in consultation with the communication industry;

2. The main operating responsibility for the collection, storage, and dissemination of scientific and technical documentation should be assigned to the proposed National Research Academy, and the operating responsibility for the collection, storage, and effective transfer of information and technological forecasts concerning the industrial innovative process should be assigned to the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce, while enabling other government agencies to maintain their own systems according to their specific needs;

3. The Ministry of State for Science and Technology be responsible for the continuing review and evaluation and coordination of the various government agencies' scientific and technical information and technological forecasting activities; and

4. All these activities be arranged so as to encourage the development of a Canadian information and forecasting industry to which the two ministries named above should give high priority.

The committee came to the conclusion that if the secondary manufacturing industry in Canada is to expand, or even to survive, it is absolutely essential that a two-stage strategy be implemented at once.

In the first stage, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce would ask secondary manufacturing industries to organize task forces with appropriate labour representation to consider the problems of scale and specialization, and then prepare a plan to improve the efficiency, the innovative capacity and international competitiveness of individual firms through mergers or otherwise.

In the second stage, the government would set up a Cabinet committee to review these plans suggested by the task force in the light of the requirements of the public interest, particularly economic efficiency, innovative potentiality and international competitiveness.

The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce would appoint an impartial chairman and provide a small secretariat for each task force. To accelerate the review process and to advise the Cabinet committee, it was recommended that an office of industrial organization be set up in the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce, with the chairman and secretariat of the various task forces as its members. This office would have close liaison with the Canadian Development Corporation.

Evidence before the committee indicated that most government policies, while serving their intended purpose, nevertheless produced side effects which were harmful to the industrial innovative process. This comes about when policies are formulated in government departments and agencies that have no science policy advisers to help them consider the impact of their decisions on the economy or on the industrial innovative process. There is, therefore, a need for a central machinery to check a policy's probable effect on innovation, to discuss alternatives, and, in cases of disagreement, to report its findings to the Cabinet committee on science and technology.

The committee found that the existing interdepartmental committee on innovation had not performed this function, and did not appear to be able to do so. Since the committee was convinced that it is imperative for the government to strengthen its positive impact on the industrial innovative process in order for industrial reorganization to succeed, the committee therefore recommended that the scope, composition and authority of the interdepartmental committee on innovation be enlarged so that, working with the departments and agencies concerned, it could appraise the implications of their decisions and policies for the innovative process.

Many briefs commenting on Volume 2 strongly supported this recommendation. They pointed to several government policies that had a negative impact on innovation in the private sector. The Electronic Industries Association of Canada stated that this recommendation was "almost totally supported by the EIAC."

As stated earlier, the committee found that the Industrial Development Bank, though intended to assist new or small companies, was not of any significant use to innovating firms or individual inventors and innovators who needed funds to complete the innovative process.

The committee therefore recommended:

2. That a lending and investing institution called the Canadian Innovation Bank (CIB) be created to support in co-operation with private venture capital companies the activities involved with the launching of technological innovations, especially in new or existing small and medium-sized firms, to provide managerial services to these enterprises and to be responsible to the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce.

One large high-technology company commented that this was perhaps the best recommendation in the report. The senior vice-president of another large Canadian-owned company declared, "We urge rapid adoption of this recommendation."

Recently, however, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce has announced that the Industrial Development Bank is to be reorganized along lines similar to those in the committee's recommendation, and perhaps we shall have to wait and see to what extent the new Industrial Development Bank can or will meet this need.

● (2110)

The committee was impressed by the assistance which certain countries provide for their small inventors. Sweden has a scheme to assist small inventors which enables them to work full-time for a whole year on an invention. The United States of America is actively seeking means of promoting inventions and of serving its individual inventors more effectively. A National Inventors Council has been set up to advise them, and arrangements have been made whereby federal government laboratories, under certain restrictions, can proof-test inventors' ideas.

The committee felt that Canada should show similar appreciation and therefore recommended:

> That the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce set up a task force to investigate all factors having an important effect on the individual private inventor in Canada, to consider the kind of public assistance provided by other countries in this area, and the desirability of establishing a Canadian inventors council to assist private inventors and to act as their formal spokesman.

The committee felt that the task force should include successful Canadian inventors and innovators and that SCITEC should be asked to undertake the study.

Since Canada gives a wide range of awards to individuals who distinguish themselves in the arts, letters and sciences as well as in the public service, the committee felt that similar recognition should be given in Canada to groups and individuals who have been successful technological innovators, especially those contributing to substantial exports. Such a system would encourage invention and innovation, show our appreciation of inventors and innovators and might also serve to reduce our export of ideas.

Honourable senators, my purpose tonight has been to deal briefly with those sections of chapter 21, entitled "Reorganization of Departments and Agencies," which Senator Cameron was unable to include in his speech of Thursday, December 13, at page 1366 of Senate Hansard, and also to provide a framework and perspective in which the committee's whole report and particularly Volume 3 can be viewed.

A very good commentary was contained in an editorial in the Ottawa Citizen dated September 13, 1973. It is headed, "A blueprint for progress" and reads as follows:

> There it all is, after six years' hard labour by Senator Maurice Lamontagne's committee, a coherent blueprint for organizing Canada's science policy and the billion-dollar federal science spending program.
>
> After the several faulty and timid starts of this past decade, a compelling, forward-looking and rational plan it is, one that should set Canada firmly astride the onrushing beast of scientific progress, with as good an overview as could be asked of what lies ahead and on its flanks.
>
> The great fear is that the government will content itself with half-measures when full measures require not so much courage as foresight and leadership.
>
> The goal of the report is to ensure that Canada uses its modest science budget to best advantage—to meet practical social and economic needs, and ensure that industry obtains and retains a strong foothold in the markets of the world.
> Part of this, long central to Senator Lamontagne's approach, is the need to feed to the public and up through the political structure a coherent body of information related to the thrust of our scientific effort. Without this there can only be apathy, a lapse of will, and a terrifying stagnation. Much is at stake.

You will see from what I have said that the Special Senate Committee on Science Policy has recommended an extensive restructuring, not only of the Ministry of State for Science and Technology but also of the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce, as well as the reorganization of a number of existing agencies and the creation of some new ones. Recent events have confirmed the accuracy of the committee's predictions and the soundness of the committee's recommendations. In view of the serious challenges with which we are now faced, time is of the essence and it is to be hoped the Government of Canada will act speedily on the committee's report.

On motion of Senator Buckwold, debate adjourned.

CLERK'S ACCOUNTS

SECOND REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE ON INTERNAL ECONOMY, BUDGETS AND ADMINISTRATION ADOPTED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the Second Report of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration, which was presented on Thursday, December 13.

Hon. Mr. Smith moved the adoption of the report.

Report adopted.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Wednesday, December 19, 1973

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

RESIDENTIAL MORTGAGE FINANCING BILL

REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Hon. John J. Connolly, Acting Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, reported that the committee had considered Bill C-135, to provide additional financing mechanisms and institutions for the residential mortgage market in Canada, and had directed that the bill be reported without amendment.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Connolly moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

On the Question Period:

Hon. Mr. Flynn: May I ask the Leader of the Government if he knows more today than he did yesterday about the adjournment of the Senate?

Hon. Mr. Martin: It has been suggested that perhaps I should ask the Leader of the Opposition whether he knows more. I will not ask him that question today, but I might tomorrow. I am quite certain that we will have to be here until Friday of this week. I believe it will be proposed in the other place, depending on what progress is made, that that house come back on the night of December 26.

An Hon. Senator: What year?

Hon. Mr. Martin: Don't look at me with pain. That is what will be proposed for the other place. I am only saying what I believe to be the case. Perhaps tomorrow I can be a little more informative.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Mind you, I would make some suggestions to the Leader of the Government were it not for the fact that every time I do so the result turns out worse than if I had said nothing.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Perhaps you could make your suggestions to me privately. In that way you would not be committed.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: In that case, I might.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Also to the other place.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Perhaps we could both make representations to the other place.

CIVIL AVIATION

PROTECTION AGAINST HIJACKING AND TERRORISM—QUESTION

[Translation]

Hon. Martial Asselin: Honourable senators, I should like to ask a question of the Leader of the Government.

After the horrible tragedy in Rome, where Palestinian commandoes hijacked another airplane and killed about thirty people, does Canada intend recommending, after the next meeting of the International Air Transport Association, more drastic measures to punish the authors of these hijackings to ensure the security of passengers and crew members on these aircraft?

I must add that this tragedy has brought consternation not only to Canada but to the entire world and, in my opinion, Canada should approach the other countries so that these hijackers may be punished.

Has the Cabinet discussed this? Can the leader tell us whether Canada will take such action?

Hon. Mr. Martin: Yes, honourable senators, we have discussed this matter recently and, as you know, Canada had made some proposals about eight months ago. These proposals were not all acceptable, but I am convinced that the situation is serious, as you pointed out.

I could perhaps consider your question as notice and try to give you a more complete answer when I have more details.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: I think that the honourable senator will allow me to add that we should make a distinction.

My honourable friend has referred to an international air control organization, the IATA, I suppose. However, the recent events did not occur in the air but on the ground, and they are therefore a security matter under the jurisdiction of the Italian police. The crime was committed at an airport in Rome, not in an aircraft. I do not believe that Canada can do anything about improving security at the Rome airport.

Hon. Mr. Asselin: Yes, but an aircraft was hijacked at the Rome airport and the passengers were flown to Athens.

Steps taken in the past were not severe enough, to my mind, to prevent such crimes. Naturally, security measures were taken at some airports but obviously they are not sufficient to prevent similar situations.

In the face of world opinion, Canada and the other countries should take special steps to ensure passengers all possible security. Some day the pilots around the world may strike, precisely to attract world attention, because those countries which should take severe measures against hijackings have not done so to date.

Some security measures have been taken, but others have not even been changed; we see what the consequences are.

I do not claim that all security measures were not applied in Rome; that is how Senator Langlois interpreted my question. It deals with the international problem and I would like Canada to intervene.

PAROLE ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from yesterday the adjourned debate on the motion of Senator Goldenberg for the second reading of Bill C-191, to amend the Parole Act.

Hon. Earl A. Hastings: Honourable senators, in speaking last night to Bill C-191 I drew the attention of senators to the fragmentation of effort that exists in the criminal justice system between the police, the judicial, custodial, parole and after-care agencies, and the contribution it was making to the failure of the system as it exists. Through this procedure it is the offender who is bounced from one jurisdiction to the other until he is finally taken back into society, and everyone is amazed to find that the whole exercise was to no avail, that whatever else he learned while he went on his journey, he really did not become very rehabilitated.

If you visit our institutions of custody you will probably find the reason why. While he may be committed for a minor offence of breaking or entering, when he is in custody he learns some very worthwhile skills that do not contribute very much to living within the norms of society. He can learn how to blow a safe a little better; he can learn how to make a pass key that will start a Chev or a Ford at any time; or he can learn how to enter a building a little more efficiently. It is because of this fragmentation of effort, one of the causes, that we are failing so miserably in our programs of rehabilitation.

My few remarks today are a plea to all those engaged in the correction process, in the judicial process, for co-operation and understanding that each one is working towards the same objective. If we are to have any success whatever each jurisdiction must have a better knowledge and appreciation of what the other is doing. What is even more important, we must have public participation and support, particularly by the legislature, if we are to instigate meaningful reform in this procedure.

That understanding and appreciation on the part of the public and the legislature can come only through meaningful participation and knowledge of what the game is all about.

I suggest that that participation or insight comes from first-hand knowledge of your subject and not from a cursory reading of the Hugessen Report. That is the precise reason the Canadian Penitentiary Service has encouraged participation of the public in the various programs in the institutions. It is incumbent upon legislators, judges and police to visit these institutions and see what transpires. I rather suspect that when they find out what is going on, there will be a real demand for reform and change.

[Hon. Mr. Asselin.]

Last summer, Mr. Justice Jacques Ducros of the Quebec Superior Court, together with Mr. Justice Kaufman of the Quebec Appeals Court and Mrs. Kaufman, spent a day at the penitentiary at Drumheller with Mrs. Hastings and me. I think Mrs. Hastings and Mrs. Kaufman were the first women ever to enter the cell block and spend an afternoon visiting and talking to the inmates. They were trying to understand the men and convey to them a sense of hope with respect to the problems they had. Those problems were magnified out of all proportion to what you and I would consider a problem, but they were grave problems to those concerned.

We also had a seminar at Drumheller, to which we invited the business community of Calgary. In one particular instance, 67 "blue chip" businessmen came in and spent a Saturday with the Hopewell group. That group is composed of men convicted of capital or non-capital murder. Before the visitors arrived I asked the warden if the men could not be dressed in business suits for the occasion. I did not feel it fair to have them otherwise identified in such a gathering. He agreed.

The first visitor to arrive was a district court judge and I introduced him to the inmates. Shortly after he asked me, "When will the inmates be coming?" and I replied, "They are here." He asked where they were and I said "You have just met them." "You mean," he said, "these are men convicted of murder?" and I said yes. He then inquired where the closest guard was and I said he was about half a mile away at the front gate. He became very perturbed, and asked, "Do you mean to tell me we are going to spend a whole day in this room with these men without any protection?" I said yes, and we did. We spent the whole day there. We had lunch with the men, and we had a worthwhile meeting with them. I believe that the person who benefited most from that day's experience was the judge himself.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Obviously.

Hon. Mr. Hastings: He realized that we are dealing with human problems in these institutions. It is by visiting these institutions that these judges come to realize the utterly inane sentences they are handing out in the name of justice. I never cease to be amazed when I see such sentences as, "I sentence you to three years in Drumheller Penitentiary, and I recommend that you receive psychiatric treatment."

● (1420)

Little does the judge know that psychiatric treatment at Drumheller Penitentiary consists of a psychiatrist being available two half days a month for 500 men. The only time the man will see a psychiatrist after he arrives at the penitentiary is about two months before he is ready to be released.

But if the judge is involved with these men in some way after sentencing he can gain an insight. It is not just by reading the Hugessen Report that one gains an insight into parolees and inmates. It is when you have to spend a night with a young parolee who has just lost his job, has a pregnant wife, and who is filled with fear, despair and frustration with the future—a very minor problem to you and to me were we in the same circumstances, but to him his whole life—it is when you spend such a night counselling him and getting him through the night that you gain that insight as to what it is all about. Or you gain that insight after you have spent an afternoon with a parolee coming off a heroin trip and advise him on the best procedure to follow to get to a hospital—advice he will not accept because he sees in going to the hospital the end of his parole. You explain to him that, "We are not playing with the parole but we are playing with your life," and you explain that, if he gets into a hospital and gets himself cleaned up, there is no assurance that his parole will be cancelled. It is when you see that procedure accepted and see the man following that advice and, a year later, having abandoned drugs and succeeded in the game of life, that you are able to gain that insight.

It is by involving ourselves with these men that we become aware of that very difficult, complex problem of human behaviour and corrections. It is complex and difficult to the extent that there are no "experts" when it comes to dealing with people. There is no real knowledge on which to base a decision as to future behaviour. You can do the very best you can from the psychiatrist to the correction officer, but there is no guarantee how a particular individual will react any more than I can give any assurance how I will react under a certain set of circumstances.

But by visiting these institutions—and I have visited most of them in Canada—and by working with parolees, I have come to accept a responsibility for what we do to most of the men we send to these institutions and what we do to the men we hire in our name to keep them there. I have reached the conclusion that I have no more right or authority to ostracize them, banish them, stigmatize them, than I have to offer similar treatment to one of my own family who may be impaired or otherwise handicapped in the game of life.

It is understanding of parole and corrections by the public and by the legislators that is needed today. In saying that, I should like to pay tribute to the Parole Board and to the members of the parole service and to the members of the Canadian Penitentiary Service. I sometimes wish that all those who are so quick to run to the airwaves and to the newspapers to give voice to criticism when there is an unfortunate incident could have the opportunity to spend 24 hours on the firing line with these men as they try to put lives back together and get men back into society. It is so easy to criticize the failures—I do not like calling them "failures"—and create prejudice against these few unfortunate circumstances which are glaring failures. Nothing is ever said of the many successful stories that are the result of parole and temporary absence from the Canadian Penitentiary Service. It is simply a case that most people just do not understand parole. They do not understand that it is a given procedure, utilized at a given time in a man's custodial career, when it is decided by a group of people, working on the best knowledge available to them, that this is the most opportune time to release a man into society and to operate and function therein under supervision. Of course, there is no guarantee that it will work; there is no guarantee that he is going to put on a white shirt, blue tie and blue suit and start going to church; there is no guarantee that he will not get into trouble again. But to the best of the knowledge available to these men whom we have entrusted with the job of making the decision, this is the right time to put him back into society and not leave him in the custodial environment having regard to the debilitating effect that this would have on him.

Sometimes it does not work, and then, of course, all hell breaks loose and the Parole Board is criticized. I simply cannot understand why. They have done their best to get this man back into society and to function within the norms of that society. When you have a cold and you take an aspirin and it doesn't work, you don't damn the medical profession. When you have surgery which does not cure your illness, you don't damn the medical profession. You say they did their best under very difficult circumstances. The same applies to the parole procedure. The charge that these men are released into society, men who are known to be dangerous and who are likely to create havoc in society, is just unfounded. Granted, there are examples of such cases, but to say that those who make the decision on parole do so without consideration for public safety is just not true.

It seems to me that whenever there is a discussion on the question of parole, such as we had last night, one always hears of the Dion case in Quebec, but we never hear of the many successful cases. When the question of temporary absence is being discussed, we always hear how it went wrong in the case of Yves Geoffroy two years ago at Christmastime but nobody talks about last Christmas when 1,445 were released on temporary absence and only two got into trouble, minor trouble at that.

There are too many people who do not understand the purpose of parole. In this connection I should like to place on record the story of a parolee. He was a young man who came from a broken home and who spent one year in reformatory at the age of 17. He served another year at the age of 21 for car theft, and then at the age of 28 in the commission of armed robbery he shot a storekeeper and marked him for life. In sentencing this man the judge said, "I am sentencing you to 12 years, and I am recommending that you never be considered for parole, because, in my opinion, you are unfit to be in society." Here is the story of this man as taken from the final report of a parole officer.

● (1430)

> John was released on parole November 8, 1965, under the supervision of the writer when employed as a probation officer. He was very nervous, confused and disoriented after serving six years in jail for armed robbery for which he was sentenced to 12 years. The writer remembers vividly taking him out by car to his first job as a welder... He wore a long heavy overcoat practically to his ankles and a huge prison fedora which covered his head nearly to his nose. Seven years, two months later, his parole finally expired on January 4, 1972.
> ... He is also one of the finest human beings in terms of personal decency and high moral standards known to the writer. John is a most sincere friend who would never let anyone down and go more than the second mile for the countless people he has helped and worked for in the past years... He is an intensely spiritual man who follows to the very letter the moral precepts of his creed. In other words, throughout the years since his release, there has been a total transformation or conversion of personality.

On many occasions, John has personally assisted quite a number of different parole and probation officers in working with other offenders. Christmas eve 1970, he visited one of my parolees who was going through an alcoholic binge... there hasn't been anyone in this field, I am sure, who has personally inconvenienced himself and dedicated himself more to the service of his fellow man than John. Recently, he spent every evening, and a weekend, at his home with another of my older parolees with a drinking problem...

With respect to his occupational achievements, these have been considerable. In July 1966 to about July 1970, John, together with a partner... a very astute and aggressive businessman developed a service business from nothing to one of the top three in this city...

He now has six children, two of whom arrived since his being on parole. So far as we know, he has been an excellent provider for his family, and a good family man with his children. He has also been involved in coaching kids hockey teams.

In the writer's opinion, John symbolizes the very best example of what parole can be. He has already pioneered in the volunteer service area of our related fields which has recently been coming into such prominence. His contributions surely should be recognized and acknowledged perhaps by way of a special letter of commendation from our parole service headquarters. This man indeed should not be forgotten. He will continue to serve his fellow man.

That is what parole can do and that is what parole does for the majority of cases, but still the Parole Board is vilified and criticized for the few failures, and nothing is said of the three out of four who succeed in finding their way quietly and successfully through life.

I was happy to hear Senator Choquette say that he was in favour of more parole. He used the first person plural in saying "we". I hope he was speaking for the Conservative Party. Having said that, I hope that he is willing to accept the risk that goes with additional parole, because, as I have said, with every man who comes out, whether it is on completion of sentence, temporary absence, or parole, there will be risks involved. However, I, as a member of society, with others, will be prepared to accept those risks for the good that can be done. We shall need continued public support as we proceed to community corrections and parole, in order that they can be the foundation of our future corrective policies and procedures.

Honourable senators, I happily support the bill, inadequate though it may be for the time being, in the full knowledge that it is another short step forward in corrections reform, and in the knowledge that a corrections charter is in the offing in the near future.

Hon. H. Carl Goldenberg: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: I must inform honourable senators that if Senator Goldenberg speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for second reading of this bill.

[Hon. Mr. Hastings.]

Hon. Mr. Goldenberg: Honourable senators, since all who have spoken on this measure have expressed their support for it, I do not need to say much more than has already been said. However, I find, as Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, that I owe it to the committee to say a few things in reply to what Senator Choquette, a member of the committee, said last night.

Senator Choquette opened his remarks by criticizing the bill because it does not involve complete reform of the parole system. He is correct. The bill does not purport to do that. The Solicitor General, in introducing the bill in the House, made it very clear that:

> The report of the task force on the releases of inmates, under the chairmanship of Mr. Justice Hugessen of Montreal, which I made public a few months ago, is receiving detailed consideration.

Senator Choquette properly referred to that report. The minister went on to say:

> Also for the long term, we will have to consider the report of the Senate Committee on Parole and Temporary Absence which should be ready soon. It is also my hope that the report of the Justice and Legal Affairs Committee of this House, which is carrying out an enquiry into our penitentiary system including parole and temporary absence, will be of assistance to us in our search for improvements in the corrections field in the longer run.

More recently—as a matter of fact, last week—there was held a Federal-Provincial Conference on Corrections, presided over by the Solicitor General and attended by the attorneys general of the provinces, to consider not only parole but the whole system of corrections. So that this bill is not intended, as I have said, to be a reform of parole, but merely to facilitate the work of the National Parole Board, which has increased greatly in the past year.

Having spoken about the bill, Senator Choquette saw fit to criticize and to cast reflections on the committee over which I have the honour to preside. He said:

> In my more cynical moments I can easily convince myself that this committee's study of parole is being deliberately kept going merely to provide the government with an excuse for its inaction.

That statement is beneath contempt, and I shall not comment on it. Senator Choquette went on to say:

> As long as the committee keeps up its pretence of work, the government can claim it is waiting for that committee's report before fashioning a new policy.

"Pretence of work". Honourable senators, I will leave it to you to judge the qualifications of Senator Choquette to comment on the works of the committee. I became chairman of the committee early this year. The committee held public hearings on 10 days: March 6, 7, 8, 13, 15; April 10 and 11; May 29 and 30 and, finally, on June 14. Those were 10 days of hearings, including days on which the committee sat both morning and afternoon. Senator Choquette attended on four of those days, and he rarely stayed through a full meeting.

● (1440)

At the last public meeting, which was held on June 14 last, I was authorized by the committee to appoint a subcommittee to assist in drafting our report. Senator Choquette did not attend that meeting. That subcommittee met informally with me in my office on several occasions during the summer. It then met in camera on November 13, morning and afternoon; November 14; December 4, morning and afternoon; December 6; December 7; and December 18, yesterday, again morning and afternoon.

Our report, we expect, will contain 11 chapters. We completed our review of the draft of the ninth chapter yesterday. As I said, I leave it to the Senate to decide whether we are pretending to be working.

Senator Choquette said the committee held 27 public hearings, heard 75 witnesses and received 116 briefs from interested parties. We held our last hearing on June 14, six months ago. Considering the volume of work with which we were faced, I think it very unfair to suggest that we are just pretending, and I rise to the defence of the drafting subcommittee which I named and which has worked with me very loyally. The other members of that subcommittee are Senator Lapointe, Senator Quart, Senator Neiman, Senator McIlraith, Senator Buckwold, Senator Hastings and Senator Laird.

That is all I want to say. I did not want to go into these details but I did so because I owed it to a number of very hard-working senators who deserve more recognition than was given to them last night.

I shall say nothing further with respect to the bill. The bill itself is simple. It merely provides for the appointment of 10 additional members to the National Parole Board. In due course—after these reports have been studied, we are told—the government expects to draft a more thorough reform of parole. I assure honourable senators that this is not an easy task.

Motion agreed to and bill read a second time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Hon. Mr. Goldenberg, bill placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting.

PRIVATE BILL

NATIONAL DENTAL EXAMINING BOARD OF CANADA—COMMONS AMENDMENTS CONCURRED IN

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the amendments made by the House of Commons to Bill S-7, respecting the National Dental Examining Board of Canada, which were presented yesterday.

Hon. Orville H. Phillips moved that the amendments be concurred in.

He said: Honourable senators, before the summer recess I introduced and explained Bill S-7. I am sure all honourable senators remember the explanation made at that time, so I need not repeat it.

The principle used in drafting Bill S-7 was the Wells Report, which was a study commissioned by the federal government and concurred in by the provinces dealing with the use and privileges of dental auxiliaries. During the Senate committee meeting on Bill S-7, the question of provincial jurisdiction was raised. Following that meeting the National Dental Examining Board approached the provinces and on that occasion received a reaction from some of the provinces that they felt the bill, based on the Wells Report, was somewhat premature. As a result, the National Dental Examining Board requested that any reference to "dental auxiliaries" in the bill be deleted.

I should point out that it was the National Dental Examining Board which initiated this request. That is evident from reading the report of the Committee on Miscellaneous Private Bills and Standing Orders of the other place. The attorney representing the National Dental Examining Board made that very clear. I should also point out that I, as the sponsor of the bill, was also consulted before the amendments were proposed. Since the organization requesting the bill had no objections to these amendments, I have no objections. I do not think we need be concerned with the fact that this bill has come back to us with a long list of amendments. Most of them are simply to remove the words "dental auxiliaries" from the bill.

The other principles of the bill are not affected in any way by the amendments. I repeat, the amendments were made at the request of the organization which asked me to sponsor this bill in the first place. Therefore, I urge you to concur in the amendments.

Amendments concurred in.

TRANSPORTATION

NORTH SYDNEY-PORT AUX BASQUES FREIGHT AND PASSENGER SERVICE: PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND-MAINLAND FERRY SERVICE—DEBATE CONTINUED

The Senate resumed from Thursday, November 22, the adjourned debate on the motion of Senator Rowe that in the opinion of the Senate, the Government of Canada should, in future, guarantee and ensure the continuous maintenance, at all times and in all contingencies, of a freight and passenger service between North Sydney and Port aux Basques, and an efficient ferry service between Prince Edward Island and the mainland of Canada, in accordance with the Terms of Union of Newfoundland with Canada and the Order of Her Majesty in Council admitting Prince Edward Island into the Union.

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, you will note that as I sat in my seat today I had on my head the hat of the Fathers of Confederation of Prince Edward Island, representing the centennial. It is one hundred years this year since we joined with Canada, or Canada joined with us. It also represents two hundred years of responsible government on this continent. It is too bad that at this same time, when we are all rejoicing in our joining the rest of Canada, I should have to stand in my place in the Upper House of the Parliament of Canada to discuss some of the terms of that union which, in my opinion, have not been upheld to the fullest letter of the law. Today, therefore, I would like to support the motion that my colleague, the Honourable Senator Rowe, has presented.

Honourable senators, this motion is very apropos in the year 1973, because it was in the year 1873, on the 26th day of June, at the Court at Windsor, that the Order of Her Majesty in Council admitting Prince Edward Island into the Union was signed. Present at that signing were the Queen's Most Excellent Majesty, the Lord President, Earl Granville, the Earl of Kimberley, the Lord Chamberlain, and Mr. Gladstone. One of the terms of that Order in Council is:

> That the Dominion Government shall assume and defray all the charges for the following services, viz.:—
> The salary of the Lieutenant-Governor;
> The salaries of the Judges of the Superior Court and of the District or County Courts when established;
>
> The charges in respect of the Department of Customs;
>
> The Postal Department;
>
> The protection of the Fisheries;
>
> The provision for the Militia;
>
> The Lighthouses, Shipwrecked Crews, Quarantine and Marine Hospitals;
>
> The Geological Survey;
> The Penitentiary—

Probably one of the main reasons Prince Edward Island joined Confederation was because the Dominion Government was to assume and defray all the charges for:

> Efficient Steam Service for the conveyance of mails and passengers, to be established and maintained between the Island and the mainland of the Dominion, Winter and Summer, thus placing the Island in continuous communication with the Intercolonial Railway and the railway system of the Dominion.

These are just some of the undertakings by the Dominion of Canada before the Legislative Council of Prince Edward Island in Parliament assembled, and the House of Assembly of the Province of Prince Edward Island in Parliament assembled agreed to this Union.

Furthermore, section 92 of the British North America Act begins:

> In each Province the Legislature may exclusively make Laws in relation to Matters coming within the Classes of Subject next hereinafter enumerated; that is to say—

It goes on to list nine subjects, including direct taxation and the borrowing of money, and the tenth subject is:

> Local Works and Undertakings other than . . .
> (a) Lines of Steam or other Ships, Railways, Canals, Telegraphs, and other Works and Undertakings connecting the Province with any other or others of the Provinces, or extending beyond the Limits of the Province.

In other words, the provinces have had taken from them the jurisdiction over ferries connecting one province with another. Head 10 of section 92 of the British North America Act takes away from the provinces, in respect of local works and undertakings, anything pertaining to lines of steam and other ships connecting one province with another, thereby making it a federal responsibility.

[Hon. Mr. Bonnell.]

Section 91 of the British North America Act provides:

> It shall be lawful for the Queen, by and with the Advice and Consent of the Senate and House of Commons, to make Laws for the Peace, Order, and good Government of Canada, in relation to all Matters not coming within the Classes of Subjects by this Act assigned exclusively to the Legislatures of the Provinces, and for greater Certainty, but not so as to restrict the Generality of the foregoing Terms in this Section, it is hereby declared that (notwithstanding anything in this Act) the exclusive Legislative Authority of the Parliament of Canada extends to all Matters coming within the Classes of Subjects next hereinafter enumerated.

It then lists certain matters such as the amendment from time to time of the Constitution, the regulation of trade and commerce, et cetera, and then Head 13 is:

> Ferries between a Province and any British or Foreign Country or between Two Provinces.

In other words, by section 91 ferries become a matter of federal jurisdiction, and by section 92 a province is denied jurisdiction over the ferries between two provinces.

Honourable senators, I contend that section 91 definitely lays the responsibility for the maintenance of ferry services between two provinces on the federal government, and head 10 of section 92, takes this responsibility away from the provinces and the legislatures of the provinces, consequently making it a federal responsibility.

I agree with Senator Rowe when he said that the discontinuance of the ferry service between Newfoundland and the rest of Canada, and between Prince Edward Island and the rest of Canada, would be like closing all the roads and all the streams, and blocking off all the paths through the woods and fields, so that the people of Ontario, or the people of any other province of Canada, could not get beyond its borders. I wonder how long the good people of Ontario, the good people of Quebec, or the good people of any of the Western provinces, would stand for a wall or barrier being put around them and isolating them from the rest of the world even for 24 hours, let alone two weeks.

● (1500)

Honourable senators, if this were the first time this had happened to the Province of Prince Edward Island, or if it could be guaranteed that it would be the last time, then we as Islanders would accept all the damage that has been done to us in the past. We will go forward with a permanent assurance for the future, if we can persuade the federal government to accept this motion, and to guarantee this service to the island provinces at all times and in all contingencies.

Prince Edward Island is probably one of the few provinces of Canada that depends on agriculture for its greatest source of income, followed closely by the tourist industry. Both of these industries are growing by leaps and bounds, and as a result Prince Edward Island is getting closer to the day when it will not be a "have-not" province any more.

With the signing of the development plan in Prince Edward Island, and the sharing by the federal government with the province in the development of the agricultural, fisheries and tourist industries for the promotion of our social and economic development, Prince Edward Island is gradually producing the greatest growth in its gross provincial product in its history. The provincial treasurer was able to balance the budget in the last two years, and he is predicting a balanced budget for next year.

At the same time the government has been able to reduce taxation and do away with gift taxes, succession duties, and estate taxes. We have been able to reduce the education tax, because of this growth we have seen in the last four years, and because of the help of the federal government and the development plan.

On the other hand, we meet obstacles that slow our growth, destroy our economy, hurt our future development, almost wipe out the tourist industry, and cause us to lose the better markets for our agricultural products, in the tie-up of our ferry communications with mainland Canada. So, while the federal government was helping us on the one hand, it was allowing the Canadian National Railway to cease operations, to curtail or discontinue a ferry service connecting us with mainland Canada.

Honourable senators, in the year 1966 the tourist season was the most successful in our Island history. However, this trend was suddenly stalled in mid-August of 1966 by the threatened tying up, which subsequently occurred, of the Borden-Tormentine ferries because of a national strike. From August 26, 1966 to September 3, 1966, Prince Edward Island was isolated from the mainland. Even the threat of a strike was enough to have most of our visitors leave the province early, and cause many who anticipated a visit to refrain from doing so in case they became isolated in our province. Consequently there were only 6,000 visitors to our province during the months of August and September in 1966. In 1967, when there was no strike, there was a 64 per cent increase in the tourist trade for the month of August, and a 115 per cent increase for the month of September, compared to the previous year.

Furthermore, in 1965 there were 117 conventions, but in 1966, because of the strike, we had only 10 conventions in the whole province. The total vehicular traffic increase for the year 1965 was 15.7 per cent over 1964. The total increase for the whole year 1966, because of the strike in August and September, was only 1.2 per cent. This meant a great loss of forecasted revenue for the province in that year.

Honourable senators, in the year 1973 we were again isolated by another national strike, causing a complete tie-up of the rail services for 10 days in August. In the month of July there was a 2.9 per cent decrease in the number of travellers coming to Prince Edward Island because of the threatened rail strike. In August the traffic losses plunged 22.2 per cent compared with the same month last year. This means 10,669 fewer visitors in July and 71,568 fewer visitors in August, compared to last year.

In the Province of Newfoundland the traffic losses plunged 25.2 per cent. The CNR vessels to Newfoundland carried 84,746 passengers in the month of July. This number was cut to 55,488 passengers in the month of August.

For the month of August in the Prince Edward Island services there was a decrease of 21.9 per cent in the number of trailers and campers, 31.7 per cent fewer trucks, 31.5 per cent fewer tractor-trailers, and 38.8 per cent fewer bus tours, meaning an overall decrease in vehicles of 21.3 per cent compared with the same month in the previous year.

In July there was a decrease of 3.9 per cent in trailers and campers, with an overall decrease of 2.7 per cent in vehicles. This was in anticipation of a threatened strike. When you estimate that the tourist spends approximately $40 per day in Prince Edward Island and stays an average of 3.5 days, and then you multiply this by the 82,000 fewer visitors in July and August of this year, you can well see that this loss to the tourist industry was well over $1 million—and that does not take into account the fringe benefits that flow to other types of industry from this $1 million in tourist revenue.

Also, because of this 10-day strike, there has been a threat to the way of life of Islanders, who have been emphasizing our quality of life, and trying to preserve our environment, our rolling rural countryside, our beauty and cleanliness, and our easy and free way of life.

We now find that strong support for the construction of a causeway between New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island has been shown by such groups as the Prince Edward Island Tourist Association, the Chamber of Commerce of Summerside, and others. Other groups, like the Brothers and Sisters of Cornelius Howatt, in fear of a causeway, are hauling wheelbarrow-loads of clay from Borden to Charlottetown drawing attention to their disapproval.

● (1510)

The agricultural industry of the Island has been seriously affected also by the rail strike. On August 29, 1973, I received a letter from Mr. Wallace Wood, President of the Prince Edward Island Federation of Agriculture, advising that they expect some action to guarantee continuous communication with the mainland. I should like to quote from Mr. Wood's letter the following paragraph:

> The strike of the railway non-operating Unions which has lasted on a selective basis for four weeks and culminated in a national strike last week, cannot be condoned. Some other means of arbitration must be found so that an already harangued economy will not be further weakened.
> Public services, particularly those involving transportation cannot afford the crippling effect that this strike has caused our national economy. It tends to increase the hardships now endured by those least able to improve their position, and we can only condemn such procedures as being contemptuous, irrational and ridiculous in the highest degree.
> The Prince Edward Island Federation of Agriculture at this time calls upon all politicians of whatever persuasion to—not only enact legislation that will send the employees back to work—but go one step further to see that it does not happen again.

You can see from that, honourable senators, the feeling of the Prince Edward Island Federation of Agriculture about this lack of communication with the rest of Canada.

I would further like to state that, at the time of the rail strike, Prince Edward Island's main agricultural products, namely, potatoes, were selling at a premium of approximately $6 per bag. Because potato growers in other parts of Canada were digging their new potatoes at that time, and new potatoes were coming on the market fast and furious, by the time the rail strike was over Prince Edward Island farmers were able to get approximately $2 per bag for the same product. Consequently, they lost many thousands of dollars owing to the absence of transportation during this critical time in the agricultural industry of the province.

The industrial sector of the province was badly hampered because of the strike. They were unable to get cement, lumber, steel, asphalt, and building materials into the province, and home construction, capital construction, road paving, et cetera, came almost to a complete halt in the province of Prince Edward Island. Even to this day we are still lagging behind, and we have not caught up on many of these essential items needed for the growth and development of our province. We are still short of cement, gyprock, insulating material, steel, and so on. This has slowed down the growth of the economy and the development of Prince Edward Island during the summer and late fall. Because of the severity of our winters, construction is difficult until spring and, consequently, most of the good weather has been lost to many of our industries.

There has been a reorganization of the federal ferry and coastal services in the Atlantic Provinces. The Minister of Transport, the Honourable Jean Marchand, and the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion, the Honourable Donald Jamieson, have been working for this reorganization, to improve the ferry services in the Atlantic area. A new East Coast Marine and Ferry Operating Administration will be responsible for all ferries and coastal services, but it will continue to be managed by the Canadian National Railways for the Ministry of Transport. I believe the main objectives of the new administration will be the co-ordination, operation, improvement and expansion of the present ferry and coastal services to meet the expected increased traffic demands in the years ahead, as well as the immediate unprecedented influx of traffic which the present system is attempting to handle.

I am not one hundred per cent convinced that the creation of the new marine and ferry administration is sufficient to guarantee continuous communications with the mainland, especially when it is being administered by the Canadian National Railways. Each time the railway workers in other parts of Canada decide to strike, the ferry workers in Prince Edward Island feel obliged to strike with them. I do not know the total answer to the problem. There have been many suggestions, one of which is the creation of a separate entity for ferry services, to report to the Canadian National's vice-president for the Atlantic region; a second is the creation of a separate Canadian National subsidiary with its own board of directors; a third is the creation of a federal crown corporation; a fourth is the creation of a provincial crown corporation; a fifth is the creation of a combined provincial and federal crown corporation; and a sixth is to bring the ferry services into the public service under the Ministry of Transport.

I noticed in the public press of Prince Edward Island, in the Journal-Pioneer of October 2, 1973, a news item to the effect that Premier Alexander B. Campbell favours a Prince Edward Island crown corporation to operate the ferries:

> The premier said he preferred a provincial crown corporation to a separate federal crown corporation because the province can move faster in the event of an emergency and it would have the full backing of the people to take any action necessary to keep the ferries in operation in the event of an illegal walkout.

I also noted a letter in the Public Forum of the Charlottetown Guardian of November 19, 1973, from our colleague, the Honourable Senator T. J. Kickham, who writes as follows:

> There is however one positive course in solving the problem, and that course is for the Government of Canada, to amend the Act of Incorporation which grants to the C.N.R. the operation of railway services in Canada. The amendment would prohibit the labour union, representing the C.B.R.T.G.W. from discontinuing Canadian National ferry services between the two Island provinces of Canada and the mainland, those two ferry service operations would be placed in a priority category of essential ferry services.
> There would be no interruption of the pay schedules affecting the C.N.R. personnel operating the ferries, and they would receive any increased pay schedules negotiated by their union, with management.
>
> The Federal Government has the direct responsibility and obligation to those two integral provinces of Canada, to insure that no person or group of persons, possess the authority and power in Canada, to incapacitate or erode the economic standards and fundamental rights and freedoms of those two integral provinces.

● (1520)

As you can see, honourable senators, the answer to the problem is not easy. It is not simple. Not only must we preserve the rights of Prince Edward Island and its people, but we must also try to preserve the rights of the working man who is seeking fair wages for a fair day's work. We must try to preserve the rights of collective bargaining, but at the same time we must not isolate the whole province from the rest of the world, not even for one day, especially when that right to be connected by ferry is written so plainly in the British North America Act.

Personally, I tend to favour a Prince Edward Island crown corporation, and if that should not be acceptable to the Government of Canada, then I would favour a joint corporation served by directors from the Government of Prince Edward Island and the Government of Canada. I further maintain that the federal government must be financially responsible for all costs of the operation of a ferry, regardless of whether it is operated by a Prince Edward Island crown corporation instead of the Canadian National Railways, or a joint crown corporation. In any event, it is my feeling that if a Prince Edward Island crown corporation moved quickly to maintain the service when there is a threat of a strike, it would have the unanimous support of the people of Prince Edward Island. The strength and popular appeal of its action would be shown. It is not my intention to deny the ferry workers the right to strike, or to belong to a national trade union, but I believe that in such an emergency they should be denied the right to cease work but be guaranteed all the benefits provided for in any national settlement.

If a Prince Edward Island crown corporation is not acceptable to the Government of Canada, then I believe the next most workable solution would be a joint corporation of the two governments. I realize that there is no easy solution to the problem, and for that reason I believe that the Government of Canada and the Ministry of Transport would appreciate the comments of many honourable senators on this motion, to give them some idea of what the feeling of Canadians is with regard to the isolation of one province because of failure to operate the ferry services as pledged by the British North America Act.

While I am supporting this motion, honourable senators, there are a few other items which I should like to mention, which are very important to the question of transportation and the growth of transportation in the Province of Prince Edward Island. At the present time there are four vessels operating between Borden and Cape Tormentine, namely, the Abegweit, Holiday Island, Vacationland and Confederation. During the winter months the Lucy Maud Montgomery is taken off the North Sydney-Port aux Basques run and brought back to Prince Edward Island, which it was originally constructed to serve. The Holiday Island, Vacationland and Confederation are not ice-breaking ferries, and can operate only in the summer months, so we are left with the Abegweit and the part-time service of the Lucy Maud Montgomery to carry the traffic between Prince Edward Island and the mainland of Canada during the fall and winter months. This has been fine in the past, as long as we have had no breakdown in the Abegweit, the only railcar-carrying ferry we have. Although the Canadian National Railways has pretty well curtailed its passenger service in Prince Edward Island, there are still large quantities of freight that come in by rail, and large quantities of produce that are shipped by rail from Prince Edward Island.

I believe that the time has come for the Government of Canada to commence the construction of a new ferry with railcar-carrying capacity to operate during the winter months between Borden, Prince Edward Island, and Cape Tormentine, New Brunswick, to assist the Abegweit and perhaps to replace it, because it is now 25 years old and cannot be guaranteed to operate satisfactorily for much longer.

The Hon. the Speaker: I am sorry to interrupt the honourable senator, but I should like to draw his attention to the fact that according to Beauchesne it has been sanctioned by usage in both England and Canada that a member or a senator while addressing the house must not speak of any matter on which a judicial decision is pending. It is also mentioned in May, 18th edition.

I would also draw to the attention of the honourable senator that there is pending in the Federal Court of Canada a suit between Her Majesty the Queen in the right of the Province of Prince Edward Island and Her Majesty the Queen in the right of Canada, for damages claimed as a result of the stoppage of the ferry service between Prince Edward Island and the mainland. It would appear to me that in the honourable senator's references to ferry services and other matters he is touching on questions very close to this matter which is now sub judice, and to which we, under our rules, should not be making reference in this house.

Hon. Mr. Bonnell: Thank you, Madam Speaker, for advising me that I am getting in close. I shall try to stay a little further away. You know, there is an old saying in Prince Edward Island that "close" only counts with horseshoes, and since I have only been close, I have not touched directly on this matter.

I repeat, honourable senators, that there is a need for a new ferry service to the eastern part of Prince Edward Island. The two vessels which operate between Wood Islands, Prince Edward Island and Caribou, Nova Scotia, should be encouraged to operate between Georgetown, Prince Edward Island and Port Hood, Nova Scotia, during the winter months, and an icebreaking service should be added at the eastern end of Prince Edward Island because of the increase and growth in agriculture and tourism, the result of assistance from the federal government under its development plan.

I also believe that because of the development of the western part of Prince Edward Island there is a need for a hovercraft service between Miminegash, Prince Edward Island, and some appropriate point in New Brunswick. This would reduce the journey by five road-hours for the trucks and tourist traffic coming from Quebec and Ontario, and would consequently expand that western part of our province which has been growing, particularly since the development of the Lady Slipper Drive and the Mill River Golf Course and tourist complex.

Miminegash has been suggested as the Island terminal, as it is equidistant from Tignish, Alberton and O'Leary, three of the major centres in western Prince County. It is approximately 12 miles from each centre. The port of Miminegash has ideal beach facilities, and road conditions are good for reaching the three centres. Pointe Sapin, New Brunswick could be the mainland terminal for it is only 30 minutes from Newcastle and Chatham. This type of service now operates between Ramsgate, England and Calais, France. This would bring the Quebec and Ontario markets five road-hours nearer to Prince Edward Island suppliers, as well as putting western Prince Edward Island in much closer contact with visitors from Quebec and Ontario, who are gradually finding Prince Edward Island to be Canada's holiday island.

Honourable senators, transportation is the lifeline of Prince Edward Island and when the transportation system fails, either by strike or negligence, or by lack of growth to meet increased demand, the whole economy of our province is destroyed. It is for that reason that I ask all honourable senators to support the motion—to give unanimous and strong support to the motion—to show the island provinces that the Parliament of Canada understands their problems and cares for their predicament.

When an island province has all means of transportation removed, so that its imports and exports and its food supplies are stopped, it feels very much like an unborn baby strangled by its umbilical cord and thus deprived of the opportunity to grow and develop like its fellow men.

Hon. William J. Petten: Honourable senators, I would like to congratulate the mover of the motion, Senator Rowe, for raising this most important subject which is so vital to my province of Newfoundland, and the province of Prince Edward Island. I would like also to congratulate Senator Carter on his important contribution to this debate, and Senator Bonnell who spoke so ably for his province of Prince Edward Island.

The Government of Canada has in the main provided, and is continuing to provide through its agent the Canadian National Railways, a substantial ferry service to Newfoundland and Prince Edward Island. This service is often referred to as an extension of the Trans-Canada Highway from the Canadian mainland. As previous speakers have pointed out, the closing-down of the ferry service is the equivalent of closing all road and rail connections here in Ontario with Quebec, Manitoba and the United States border.

The Prince Edward Island service has been adequately dealt with by our colleague, Senator Bonnell, so I shall confine my remarks to the Newfoundland service, and more specifically to the Gulf service between North Sydney, Nova Scotia and Port aux Basques, Newfoundland.

The Canadian National Railways operates the following ships on this service: the William Carson, Lief Eriksson, Frederick Carter, and Lucy Maud Montgomery, plus five chartered CN-crewed vessels which are the Princess of Tasmania, Seatrader, Stena Carrier, Stena Trailer (since mid-July, 1973) and Jarl Transporter (since November, 1973).

Contractual negotiations for a new railcar carrier are about to be concluded between the Department of Supply and Services and a shipbuilding company in Eastern Canada. A ten-year program to cost approximately $250 million, for the construction in Canada of other new ships to replace or supplement those now in service, has been prepared by the marine branch of the Ministry of Transport for consideration by the transportation council and the Cabinet. I should explain that the figure of $250 million covers both the Newfoundland and Prince Edward Island services.

In the fall of 1972 a team of CN and Ministry of Transport officials began examining the original structure of the East coast ferry service to Newfoundland and Prince Edward Island. They also considered ways and means of improving the East Coast ferry service by creating a separate entity for the ferry service that would report to the CN vice-president responsible for the Atlantic region; creating a separate CN subsidiary with its own board of directors; creating a crown corporation; or putting the ferry service into the Public Service.

In October 1973, the Newfoundland minister, the Honourable Don Jamieson, the Honourable Jean Marchand and Mr. McMillan of the CN agreed upon a new East Coast ferry operation to be based at Moncton, New Brunswick, with operating units in Newfoundland, Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island, responsible for all ferry and coastal services operated by the CNR for the Ministry of Transport.

A feature of the reorganization was the creation of a directing committee for the new administration composed of senior Ministry of Transport officials and CN officials. Major objectives for the new administration are the coordination, improvement, and expansion of the present ferry and coastal services to meet expected increased traffic demands. So we can see that the Canadian government, through its agent, the Canadian National Railways, has been actively engaged in maintaining and improving the service.

It should be noted in regard to all of the alternatives, that the employees would either have, by law, the right to strike or be able to choose the right to strike as a means of settling a dispute. This is the crux of the whole matter. We can never be sure, in the event of a rail strike, that the service will not be curtailed or stopped completely, with all the hardship this would entail.

The suggestion that I should like to put forward—and in this I have the agreement of the mover and seconder, Senator Rowe and Senator Carter—is that this subject be studied by the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications, or a special committee. Either committee would be acceptable.

I know that in this chamber we have the expertise and time to deal fully with this matter, and I feel that this would put us well on the road to finding a solution to something that so vitally affects my province of Newfoundland, and the province of Prince Edward Island.

I ask all senators, on both sides of this chamber, for their support in finding a solution to this problem.

On motion of Senator Duggan, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

SENATOR RENAUDE LAPOINTE—GUEST ON TELEVISION PROGRAM "APPELEZ-MOI LISE"—QUESTION

Hon. Martial Asselin: Honourable senators, I should like to put a question to the Deputy Leader of the Government.

Last night, our colleague, Senator Lapointe, gave an interview on the program "Appelez-moi Lise". Among other remarks, she said a third of the senators were active workers, another third, moderate workers, and finally, the last third was made up of senators who slept or were sleepy.

I must say that the last part of her remarks are not such as to enhance the prestige of the Senate with the people. Could the Deputy Leader of the Senate comment on those remarks?

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Honourable senators, it is quite impossible for me to make the comments expected of me. I listened to part of, but not all, the interview given last night by Senator Lapointe. I gathered that she included herself, at least by inference, in the third group of senators inclined to fall asleep at times, but I do not believe, if I understood her well, that this group includes one third of the Senate. It is possible that someone in this third group would fall asleep. Moreover, I think that she said: I happen myself to feel sleepy at times.

Anyhow, I believe that Senator Lapointe is in a better position than I am to comment on the remarks made just now by my honourable friend.

Hon. Miss Lapointe: Honourable senators, my excellent colleague, Senator Asselin, did not quite understand what I said.

I said that one third of the senators were very active. I added that another third were moderately active, underlining "moderately". I also said that another third were either ill, absent or indifferent. Then, when I was asked to say frankly if some fell asleep, I answered yes. It is then that I also included myself among those who felt sleepy at times. However, I think that in all circumstances, frankness is the best weapon to have the laugh on one's side, because this was a humorous program. Moreover, I feel that on the whole, I gave a very sympathetic and favourable picture of the Senate and all this was said in a humorous vein, mind you.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: I would not wish to attribute intentions which he does not have to my friend Senator Asselin, but I think that he would be glad to learn from you, Senator Lapointe, in which category you would place him.

Hon. Mr. Asselin: I would like her to answer.

Hon. Miss Lapointe: I would place him among the moderately active, I think.

Hon. Mr. Asselin: I rise on a question of privilege.

Hon. Mr. Côté: She is very generous.

Hon. Mr. Asselin: Of course, I would not wish to include Senator Langlois in the third category, but sometimes he does not, like some others, sleep but nod his head.

However, I should like to take up this statement because Senator Lapointe must know that in the year since I have been appointed to the Senate, I have twice had health problems. If I have been moderately active, I can promise her, as a member of the Opposition, that when my health improves, I shall be very active in order to control what the government party does in the Senate. I make you that promise, Senator Lapointe.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I would like to add just one comment. If Senator Lapointe had had the opportunity, like myself and several other colleagues, to sit in the other place, she could have said that some people also drop off to sleep over there.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: That is true.

TRANSPORTATION

NORTH SYDNEY-PORT AUX BASQUES FREIGHT AND PASSENGER SERVICE: PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND-MAINLAND FERRY SERVICE—DEBATE CONTINUED

The Senate resumed from yesterday the adjourned debate on the motion of Senator Rowe that, in the opinion of the Senate, the Government of Canada should, in future, guarantee and ensure the continuous maintenance, at all times and in all contingencies, of a freight and passenger service between North Sydney and Port aux Basques, and an efficient ferry service between Prince Edward Island and the mainland of Canada, in accordance with the Terms of Union of Newfoundland with Canada and the Order of Her Majesty in Council admitting Prince Edward Island into the Union.

Hon. James Duggan: Honourable senators, I wish to associate myself with some of the comments and explanations of my colleague, Senator Rowe, in introducing the motion presently under debate in this chamber, and, whether wittingly or unwittingly, in endeavouring to take the Government of Canada to task for failure to ensure the continuous maintenance at all times and in all contingencies of a freight and passenger service between Port aux Basques and North Sydney, and an efficient ferry service between Prince Edward Island and the mainland of Canada, in accordance with the terms of Union of Newfoundland with Canada and the Order of Her Majesty in Council admitting Prince Edward Island into the Union.

Term 32, paragraph (1), provides that Canada will maintain in accordance with the traffic a freight and passenger steamship service between North Sydney and Port aux Basques which will include suitable provision for the carriage of motor vehicles.

The Terms of Union became effective on April 1, 1949, 24 years ago, and this service has been maintained continuously since then with the exception of two interruptions caused by labour problems when free men in a free country exercised their right to withdraw their services from coast to coast.

The management of Canadian National Railways, which was entrusted with the operation of the so-called "Newfoundland Services" as acting agents of the Government of Canada—and I use the word "acting" advisedly—sought and received assurances from the non-operating railway unions negotiating committee that services on the Cabot Strait, that stretch of water between Port aux Basques and North Sydney, would be maintained. It was not long, however, until provocation by local railway officials—in instituting further lay-offs and continuing to serve further lay-off notices, which influenced many of the employees at Port aux Basques and North Sydney and on the Cabot Strait service—resulted in the tie-up of the vital link between Newfoundland and the continent.

[Hon. Mr. Langlois.]

Political mileage then became the order of the day. Politicians clamoured for the government to take immediate action to restore the service, and would-be newspaper editors, not in the least conservative in the use of their ink, were most liberal in their condemnation of the government's lack of action. However, none of these people suggested any of the ways and means to solve the problem.

It may be said at this point that both local railway officials and local union men were at this point stewing in the same unfavourable container; that is to say, on both sides it was a case of the "tail wagging the dog".

During the past few years much time and space have been devoted to the subject of industrial strife caused by organized labour. Until all Canadians recognize that a strike is fundamentally a confrontation of forces on an economic level and is a manifestation of conflicts and a means of regulating these conflicts can there be some semblance of trust and respect to foster meaningful negotiations.

In our Canadian industrial society, different viewpoints cannot be avoided. Therefore, they must be accepted and dealt with in a meaningful manner. At this point and speaking as a retired railway union officer, I submit that to restore meaningful negotiations to the railway management-railway unions bargaining table, railwaymen versed in railroad language should be brought back to the operation and administration of our railways and let the campus experts seek some other type of employment.

The motion under debate calls on the Government of Canada, in future, to guarantee and ensure the continuous maintenance at all times, et cetera, et cetera. I cannot allow myself to entertain the thought that either the mover or the seconder of this motion is suggesting that the employees in that part of the services be stripped of union representation and denied the right to strike. This desire, an ancient one which needs no assistance to gather momentum, was animated by the unfortunate incidents of provocation on the part of local management resulting in local union officers and their members discarding directives from the non-operating railway union employees negotiating committee, an agreement or understanding by which it was promised to maintain Cabot Strait services between Port aux Basques and North Sydney. It was both regrettable and unfortunate that such an agreement was not honoured.

● (1420)

I submit that when one ship's crew or even ten ships' crews can place the health and welfare of a province—an island province—in a state of peril, it is time that a study of the problem and its ramifications be made by a qualified and independent commission. To this end, I recommend that this motion be referred to our Senate Committee on Transport and Communications or to a special committee from this chamber.

At this point I wish to sound a word of caution to anyone who may be entertaining the thought of banning the right to strike by the employees on the Cabot Strait services, by suggesting that they first concentrate their efforts on devising a formula which will protect the rights of those employees insofar as future improved wages and working conditions are concerned in the event that the right to strike is curtailed.

I offer for the consideration of the committee that the employees concerned be left under the jurisdiction of their present union, and that if their right to strike is curtailed they shall be given a guarantee to ensure their protection in receiving the benefits of the same wage settlement, improved working conditions, et cetera, as other employees in their bargaining unit, and with full protection under the grievance and seniority clauses.

I offer just one more suggestion, which may be helpful in arriving at a settlement acceptable to the Newfoundland people and to the Cabot Strait services employees. That is, that the stretch of water extending from North Sydney to Port aux Basques and known as Cabot Strait be designated as the "Trans-Canada Seaway" and form part of Trans-Canada Highway, and that tractor trailers be carried over this route at all times thereby giving to the people of Newfoundland the same benefits enjoyed by people in the other provinces during a national railway tie-up.

Senator Carter, in seconding this motion, dealt in part with passenger travel difficulties over the bus routes in Newfoundland, and it would be more amusing than annoying if it were a description of passenger travel in South Africa or South America rather than here in Canada in this age.

As pointed out so ably by the mover and seconder of the motion, the Canadian National Railways were entrusted with the operation of the Newfoundland services, and I am of the considered opinion that such acceptance was undertaken with some degree of reluctance on the part of Canadian National Railways. Therefore little, if anything, was done to win the trust and confidence of the Newfoundland people and the Newfoundland railway employees.

For two to three years, the people were denied the benefits of the Maritime Freight Rates Act and were overcharged on freight rates to the tune of some 3 million dollars, together with a freight and passenger train service which left much to be desired.

As general chairman of the Order of Railroad Telegraphers—now the Transportation-Communication Employees Union—a division of the Brotherhood of Railway and Airline Clerks, I had the honour to head our committee representing train dispatchers, railroad station agents, telegraph operators and station assistants in the transportation field, and plant inspectors, linemen, cable splicers, climbers and groundmen in the communications field during the years subsequent to Union.

Our committee negotiated a wage and working agreement covering the above-mentioned classifications and we were at the time pleased with our accomplishments, but as time went on and some research was done it was discovered that our members' salaries in station service fell far short of those paid to employees in comparable positions on the continent.

Therefore, we set out to reach parity, or as reasonably close as possible, with those positions, but not until some ten or twelve trips to Montreal and Moncton had been made, and some six years later, did the employees represented by the Order of Railroad Telegraphers receive near parity in wages with their mainland counterparts.

With respect to pension benefits under the Canadian National Railways plan, we—and by "we", I mean all Newfoundland railway employees—were denied any credit, regarding pension benefits, for our service with the Newfoundland railway. It was not until the provincial government gave our pension committee, representing all unions on the property, legal assistance in the person of Mr. Eric Cook, Q.C., now Senator Cook, who gave us valuable guidance and assistance in dealing with the dispute, that an acceptable arrangement was decided upon between the railway and the Government of Canada. The aftermath, of course, was that a large number of employees were in arrears, plus interest, to the tune of a couple of thousand dollars.

I have not intended, nor do I wish, to deal with any grievances of a personal nature, but will content myself by recording some of the grievances of a general nature, in the hope that honourable senators may be able to grasp the point of the failure of our government appointed custodians to win friends and influence people associated with railway affairs in Newfoundland.

There is just one more item, again of general interest to the station service employees. At the date of Union, our railway express business was handled on a commission basis, just as it was all over North America. The railway station agent received 5 per cent on forwarded express business in Newfoundland only, but on all other railways in North America it applied to received traffic as well as to forwarded traffic, on a 10 per cent basis.

Immediately following the effective date of Union, our station agents were granted a 9 per cent allowance, but again applicable only to forwarded business. But, at the same time, our counterparts were being allowed 10 per cent on all business forwarded and received traffic.

It was not until three or four years had passed that our negotiating committee was successful in prodding Canadian National Railways into a settlement and winning an amount of over $40,000 for distribution to the employees associated with this part of the business, this amount having been withheld from them over the years.

In conclusion, I recommend that our government give consideration to replacing the present custodians with a commission comprised of Newfoundland businessmen and railwaymen, to carry on the efficient operation and administration of what is now referred to as "The Newfoundland Services."

I thank you, honourable senators, for your attention.

Hon. Eugene A. Forsey: Honourable senators, as another of the new Canadians from Newfoundland—and, I might add, like Senator Duggan, a former union official—I should like briefly to support the motion which Senator Rowe has presented, and to support also the suggestion that the whole question might well be referred to either the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications or to a special committee of this house.

I have no hesitation in supporting that suggestion because the terms of the motion do not in the slightest degree involve any encroachment on the question which is now before the courts. The motion specifically states that it is desirable that the government should "in future" guarantee the continuous and efficient service between the two island provinces and the mainland of this dominion.

I simply wish to draw attention, in passing, to the fact that some very pernickety lawyer might say that the case of the two provinces is not precisely the same. I do not think it is of great importance myself, because while the Terms of Union of Prince Edward Island speak of "an efficient steam service for the conveyance of mails and passengers to be established and maintained between the Island and the mainland of the Dominion, winter and summer, thus placing the Island in continuous communication with the Intercolonial Railway and the railway system of the Dominion," the Terms of Union of Newfoundland, as has already been placed on the record by Senator Duggan and others, provide simply that Canada "will maintain, in accordance with the traffic offering, a freight and passenger steamship service between North Sydney and Port aux Basques," and so forth. Well, it is true that in the case of Newfoundland there is not the explicit reference to "continuous and efficient service," but I think that with the amount of traffic which offers between the Island and Newfoundland and the rest of the country, it is safe to assume that this amounts in practice, or should amount in practice, to the same kind of guarantee which is more explicitly given to the Province of Prince Edward Island by the Terms of Union of 1873.

● (1430)

The question of maintaining this service in the fashion required by the Terms of Union in both cases is one that, as honourable senators who have already spoken in this debate have indicated, is not free from difficulty. There are a number of proposals which have been made.

I should not venture to offer an opinion on which of them is the most desirable or, indeed, whether any of them would be satisfactory. It is precisely for that reason that I very much hope that this subject will be referred to some committee of this house for proper consideration and report.

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, when Senator Bonnell began his remarks on this subject yesterday he produced a high paper hat, which was used as a symbol throughout the centennial celebrations in Prince Edward Island. I am not going to wear that hat. I am going to attempt to keep my thinking cap on. I wish that Senator Bonnell had kept his thinking cap on.

Throughout this debate there has been an inference—not explicit, but an inference—that all of the difficulties with respect to the CNR ferry service were the result of the employees going out on strike. That, I cannot buy; that, I cannot accept. In no way can I minimize the effect of the employees of both the New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island CNR ferries, as well as those operating between Cape Breton Island and Newfoundland, going out on strike. Without a doubt there was a certain economic effect on those provinces as a result of that action of the employees. In the case of my province this matter is sub judice, or before the courts, so I do not think it is proper to go into it. Indeed, were I to attempt to argue the economic effects, Her Honour would inform me that I was out of order and, indeed, I would be out of order. However, let me emphasize that all of the difficulties did not result from the fact that a limited number of employees—that is, those employed by CNR ferries—went out on strike.

Yesterday the Honourable Senator Bonnell quoted certain statistics, statistics intended to prove that Senator Bonnell and some of his select political cohorts were right. Those statistics were used inaccurately. Honourable senators are familiar with the expression, "Statistics—damn lies," and so forth, as the quotation goes. I do not intend to go into that, except to say that I wish Senator Bonnell had written his own speech and had kept his own thinking cap on. Had that been the case, he might have had a different viewpoint with respect to the strike.

In discussing this subject, honourable senators, we must remember that the strike by these employees was a legal one. No one has ever denied that. In fact, the Cabinet of the present government, if you can call it a government, repeatedly emphasized that the strike was legal.

● (1440)

I very much appreciate Senator Carter's attention. I am not attempting to pick an argument with him, but I would point out to him that both the car ferry strikes, the strikes on the car ferries to Prince Edward Island and to Newfoundland, were legal. The federal government, through the Department of Labour, recognized that and refused to intervene in the strike. Therefore, we must accept the fact that the strike was legal; it was authorized and recognized by the Department of Labour.

I am not going to single out certain honourable senators who have taken part in the debate, that would be most unfair, but the inference has been left that the employees were looking for some special benefit. I cannot accept that inference. When an employee begins work for the CNR ferry service—and here I limit myself to the Prince Edward Island-New Brunswick ferry service—he must start as a deckhand or a waiter, and he is employed only during the busy season. It takes a new employee at least five years to achieve seniority within the union to which he must belong, and Parliament has made it mandatory for the employee to belong to that union. I therefore find it very difficult to imagine a citizen of either Newfoundland, Prince Edward Island, New Brunswick or Nova Scotia saying it is the fault of the union. Parliament has made it mandatory for employees on the car ferries to join the union. If there is to be any criticism on that account, it must be directed to Parliament, not to the unions. If the law is wrong, then Parliament must correct it; we must not leave this authority in the hands of the unions.

Let us for a moment consider the terms and conditions of employment of employees of the car ferry services mentioned in the motion. Earlier I referred to the fact that an employee must begin as a deckhand parking automobiles in certain spaces, or, if he is lucky, he can become a waiter and hope to obtain a few tips from the tourists. However, this employment lasts for about two-and-a-half months in the year; then the tourist traffic, to both Prince Edward Island and Newfoundland, declines and the employee is laid off. This, I think, is a very important point to consider, because no one has recognized or admitted that we, as a Parliament, are forcing the employee into a situation whereby he has two-and-a-half months in which to earn a full year's living. Admittedly, it can be said that he can go on unemployment insurance. However, many of the people are not employed long enough to earn extended benefit under the Unemployment Insurance Act.

I emphasize these things because I feel strongly that we are here considering a group of employees serving the public who are really suffering because of the fact that the public can say, "You must operate at a certain time. You must have a car ferry running at a certain time. When we don't need that car ferry running in the middle of October, we are sorry, but we don't need you, old boy. You are out on your own. Come back next June!" Is that fair to these employees? I do not think it is.

After an employee has had five to ten years of this employment, in and out, he can, through seniority, obtain full time employment. Full time employment is no bed of roses.

Let us consider for a moment the CNR ferry crossing between Borden and Cape Tormentine in heavy, icy winter conditions. Honourable senators, I may not be as explicit as I should be, because I am speaking without a verbatim text and I will make mistakes and forget certain things.

● (1450)

One of the first problems facing an employee is the fact that he is unsure of the time at which he will report for employment. He may report at 3 o'clock in the afternoon and be told to go back home and await the arrival of the next car ferry. Due to ice conditions, that car ferry may be four or five hours late. Yet he is expected to go back home and await its arrival and, through some mystic communication system, know exactly when it is to arrive.

Once having gone on board that car ferry, he is expected to complete the journey to Cape Tormentine and back. That can take anywhere from eight to 20 hours. Because the ship left with a specific crew that crew must complete the journey to Cape Tormentine and back—in other words, the return trip. No means has been devised whereby a transfer is possible in midstream, in heavy ice. Therefore, their membership in the Canadian Brotherhood of Railway, Transport and General Workers is most important.

Honourable senators, on one occasion I flew from Ottawa to Moncton, intending to fly on to Summerside. The flight from Moncton to Summerside was cancelled, but I was offered a taxi to pick up the CNR car ferry at Cape Tormentine. We drove there in miserable weather, very similar to that we are experiencing today. The car ferry was a mile and a half from Cape Tormentine. I phoned the CNR captain in charge and asked him when he expected the ferry to be in. He said, "We are a mile and a half offshore. The ice conditions are such that it could take us anywhere from five to eight hours to arrive at the dock."

Honourable senators, in August it is fine to forget these conditions, but I am sure the members of that union do not forget those conditions.

Yesterday, the honourable Senator Bonnell, in speaking with his high hat and without his thinking cap, suggested various solutions. I will not go into all of them, as I find, in watching the clock, that I have already transgressed in what I consider a brief speech. Forgive me on this point, because I feel so strongly on it.

I realize that Senator Bonnell may be much more popular in Prince Edward Island than I will be there—because he criticized the ferry employees; I am defending them. Consequently, I am bringing myself into what I know to be a most unpopular situation in the Island.

Honourable senators, what will we accomplish by a crown corporation, whether it is a joint federal-provincial crown corporation or a provincial crown corporation? It is fine for someone to urge all politicians to join in the support of this proposal. That is a useless suggestion to politicians, to "join in support" of something. If we all agreed, if we all followed that pattern, we would have no Parliament because we would be in agreement and there would be no need for discussion.

Senator Bonnell suggested that Prince Edward Island operate the ferry system under a crown corporation. Let us look at that suggestion. First, it would not change the right to strike. The public servants of the Island have the right to strike and I assume the same right would be given to servants of a crown corporation.

Secondly—and let us consider this in the light of today's cost of living—the Prince Edward Island public servants receive approximately one-third less in salary than the federal public servants. Are we going to turn to the CNR ferry employees and say, "because you went on strike you are now going to have one-third less pay"?

● (1500)

I cannot see Senator Bonnell's idea receiving the concurrence and support of this Senate.

I should point out that we have also had threats within the public service of Prince Edward Island. They would like to go on strike. Let us not assume for a moment that all is happiness and light in the public service of either Newfoundland or Prince Edward Island.

It has been proposed on numerous occasions, as it was yesterday by Senator Bonnell, that we can solve this problem by taking the responsibility for the car ferries away from the CNR and giving it to the Ministry of Transport. Honourable senators will recall that a few years ago, and it is really not that many years ago, the Seaway Authority had a strike. The then Prime Minister, the late Right Honourable Lester B. Pearson, appointed Norman MacKenzie, a former member of this chamber, to find a solution to that problem. We all know of the recommendation for an increase of 33⅓ per cent. In fact, there are many people today who still feel that that 33⅓ per cent increase was the beginning of all our difficulties. For that reason I have grave reservations concerning the propriety of transferring to the Ministry of Transport the operations of the CNR car ferries.

Honourable Senator Bonnell later on in his remarks seemed to me very much like a penitent reciting the Prayer of Penitence. The prayer we used in the service went something like this:

> We have done those things that we ought not to have done, and we have left undone those things which we ought to have done.

In his remarks Senator Bonnell seemed to come back to the theory, or idea, that he had left undone many things that he should have done.

Honourable senators might not be aware that Senator Bonnell's uncle is the Reverend Dr. Bonnell, one of the outstanding Protestant theologians in North America. I am sure the Reverend Dr. Bonnell would be most surprised to find Senator Bonnell using a Prayer of Penitence here. I suppose, in all fairness, since I am also very well acquainted with him, I should say that Reverend Dr. Bonnell would be just as surprised to find either of us joining him in the Prayer of Penitence.

Be that as it may, I want again to emphasize that the strike was legal; the union employees on the car ferries and on the docks at Cape Breton and in Newfoundland did nothing illegal. The government recognized the strike. Indeed, the government took far too long to correct the situation. The employees on strike did not go out for the sheer joy of making the situation awkward for anybody else. The employees needed the money just as much as anyone else.

At any rate, after his Prayer of Penitence yesterday, Senator Bonnell said it was not an easy solution. Well, honourable senators, at six o'clock in the morning, dealing with strike legislation, I made a recommendation to the effect that the ferry service should become an auxiliary of the main union. Since that time I have discussed the matter with my secretary, a former personnel officer, who pointed out to me that every department in the federal public service has what are called "designated employees." A designated employee, very briefly, honourable senators, comes under the terms of negotiations between his union and the Treasury Board with respect to the terms and conditions of employment. Designated employees do not have the right to go on strike, but they do have the right to belong to a union, and that is what I had in mind at six o'clock in the morning.

● (1510)

In dealing with this matter, I am referring not only to the federal government, but I am also keeping in mind the fact that the governments of Prince Edward Island and Newfoundland have both intervened in a field in which, I think, they have no right to intervene. Nobody can criticize me on the basis of being partisan in making this statement, because one is a Conservative government and one is a Liberal; in fact, when I come to think of it, the Government of my own province is nothing. But I need not go into that at the moment. The fact remains that neither government has any business intervening in this field whatsoever. This is a federal responsibility and the federal government can find a solution to the problem through the means of "designated employees." Let there be no mistake about it, there is a ready solution to the problem.

Again, honourable senators, I want to emphasize that all the difficulties facing Prince Edward Island last year were not due to the fact that the CNR ferries went on strike. Anyone who would present an argument that we are short of cement for foundations or that we are short of asbestos shingles for our roofs only because of the strike would be making a statement that is absurd. I say this, honourable senators, because those products are manufactured in other parts of Canada. When an individual in Prince Edward Island builds a home he brings in a furnace manufactured in some other province, and he brings in insulation manufactured in some other province. Even the roof is manufactured in another province. Has anyone stopped for a moment to consider that when there is a rail strike these products are not going to move from a Johns-Manville manufacturing plant in Quebec? They are certainly not going to move to Cape Tormentine or to Sydney, Nova Scotia, when there is no rail transportation. It is all very well to say that we could move them by truck, but in this connection we must keep in mind the fact that the second car-ferry service, privately operated, between Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick retains so many spaces for the transportation of trucks. This is quite right and proper, and no one can argue with that. But, during the strike at least half of that retained truck space was given away because the trucks failed to show up. We do not have the trucking facilities to compete with the CNR, and naturally no one is going to institute a trucking service to compete in a ten-day or two-week strike period.

I appreciate the situation in which the farmers and fishermen of Prince Edward Island found themselves during the strike, but I would just ask them, as I am asking you, what the situation would have been even if they had succeeded in moving their produce across the strait by the car-ferry service? Where were they going to send it from there? How were they going to send it?

The tourist industry on Prince Edward Island was certainly affected, and since this matter is now sub judice I am not going to put Her Honour, Madam Speaker, in an awkward situation by imposing on her the duty of informing me that I am out of order by discussing it further. But I should point out the fact that Prince Edward Island did not achieve this anticipated tourist influx last year was not solely due to the rail strike. There was another factor involved, and that was the over-advertising by the provincial government. Every little village on Prince Edward Island had a homecoming day which meant a great deal to Islanders, but it meant absolutely nothing to people in Fairbanks, Alaska, San Francisco or Morocco. They looked at the timetable and decided it was just too busy for them to visit Prince Edward Island.

Honourable senators, throughout my remarks I have endeavoured to be fair to the residents of Prince Edward Island, and in particular to a group that I think have been kicked in the shins. Here I am referring to the employees of Canadian National Railways car-ferry service. I hope that as a result of what I have said, the residents of Prince Edward Island will have an understanding of the problems facing those employees.

On motion of Senator Buckwold, debate adjourned.

PUBLIC BILLS

SUSPENSION OF RULES 44, 45 AND 78

Hon. Leopold Langlois moved pursuant to notice:

That for the balance of the session, rules 44, 45 and 78 be suspended insofar as they relate to public bills.

Honourable senators, I think that a word of explanation is in order.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Is necessary.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: When I gave notice of this motion some two weeks ago I discussed the matter with the Leader of the Opposition and told him that it was not my intention to put this motion unless it were necessary. I was of that mind until yesterday afternoon, when I was informed that notice had been given in the other place providing for an adjournment of the House of Commons, when it adjourns this week, until the evening of December 26. This implied that the house would be considering legislation during the Christmas holidays, and implied also the possibility that if honourable senators were away at the time legislation was passed by the other house, they might have to be recalled.

I do not want to anticipate a decision which will be taken by this chamber tomorrow when the motion for adjournment is put.

In these circumstances, it means only one thing, that if important legislation is passed, and if the House of Commons decides to sit during the holidays, it will be because that chamber is of the opinion that the legislation is sufficiently important. I would not like to see the quality of the Senate's work in some way affected by reason of the fact that it might be squeezed, so to speak, between Christmas and the New Year.

It might become necessary to sit on a non-sitting day, on a day not provided for as a sitting day in our rules. That is the main purpose of this motion. There is no intention whatsoever to use it to curtail debate; debate will be allowed to take place as usual; but we want to be in a position to deal with legislation without, so to speak, railroading it through the Senate.

When I discussed this matter with the Leader of the Opposition some two weeks ago, he asked me whether the motion would be limited to government sponsored public bills.

I then considered the possibility of so wording my motion as to limit its effect to government sponsored public bills, but was informed that I could not do so, since our rules do not make a distinction between government sponsored and privately sponsored public bills.

I therefore agreed at that time to give an undertaking to the house. That undertaking I now give, that this motion will not be used for privately sponsored public bills, but that its use will be limited to government sponsored bills exclusively.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Honourable senators, I am very sorry that Senator Langlois has decided to move this motion. I do not think it is justified under any of the circumstances with which we have been faced in recent weeks.

Before I deal with the substance of the motion, I wish to point out to Senator Langlois that his undertaking that the motion will apply only to government legislation and not to public bills sponsored by private members is not worth anything legally, because, if we pass this motion, any honourable senator may move the adoption of a bill and can use this motion to force the adoption of a public bill without observing the delays provided for under our rules.

In any event, this is not a big thing. I merely wish to point out to Senator Langlois that his undertaking is not binding on the members of the Senate.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: It is binding on the majority of the Senate.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Once this motion is passed, a senator who introduces a privately sponsored public bill could not be prevented from invoking the fact that the rules have been suspended. It applies to him as well as to anyone else. This could be prevented only if the Acting Leader of the Government had amended his motion to say government sponsored legislation.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: I was told I could not do that.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: It could have been done. However, that is not the main point. I do not expect that anyone will sponsor a public bill at this stage of the session. It has, however, occurred in previous sessions, though not very often.

Although the Acting Leader of the Government has given us an undertaking that he would not push the Senate around, this motion gives him the right to do precisely that. His will be the final judgment. He alone will decide whether there is some abuse on this side of the house or on the part of anyone else in the Senate in delaying passage of any legislation.

There is no justification for all this. On many occasions we have returned after a recess to deal with bills that had been passed by the other place, and we have always agreed to let the sponsor of the bill speak right away. On occasion we have continued the debate and been very co-operative.

I can see no justification either for waiving the rules and for placing the government in the position of being able to tell the Senate, "You are going to pass the bill today. Though you may wish to adjourn, you may not do so. If you do not have sufficient speakers to continue the debate, then the question will be put right away."

We know how the government leader handles his followers. When instructions are sent out that no one speak, no one speaks. Therefore, I foresee that it would become the responsibility of the small group on this side to try to ensure a real debate. If the Acting Leader of the Government does not want to have any debate, if he wants the Senate to be no more than a spineless rubber stamp, then, I must say, he is going about it in the right way.

I object to this manhandling of the Senate, and I would ask honourable senators on the other side of the house to realize that the Acting Leader of the Government is doing something that is totally unjustified and which may lead to abuse.

We on this side of the house gave an undertaking that we would co-operate, that we would be reasonable. We have always been so. I would ask honourable senators to join me in protesting this motion and in voting it down.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: Honourable senators, with reference to Senator Flynn's remarks, I can only say that I have been worried and concerned by the fact that I could see the energy bill being directed towards us at the last moment, at a moment when it was hoped that those honourable senators from both east and west who were most concerned with this matter would have left.

I had made up my mind, prior to the introduction of this motion, that if Mr. Lewis instructs the government and

Leader of the Senate to bring in legislation and to pass it by a certain time, he would not succeed.

• (1530)

Hon. Mr. Perrault: Oh, here!

Hon. Mr. Phillips: What do you mean, "Oh, here!" That practice has been going on for some time. By the time you can wipe your ears around here, you will realize that.

Hon. Mr. Perrault: Keep your comments to yourself.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: That has been going on for too long. It will not happen with the energy bill, because it is too vital to the Atlantic provinces. I intend to make sure that every rule and regulation of this place is employed to make sure that that bill is studied in every aspect, particularly as it relates to the Atlantic provinces. So don't attempt to bring in "Christmas closure," or any other form of closure, because it is not going to be accepted.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Mr. Langlois: I thank my honourable friend, Senator Phillips, for having given me an additional argument. He has just said he was going to stand in the way of any government legislation. That is what we do not want to happen. We do not want legislation to be blocked here when we have such a short time in which to deal with it. That is the only reason behind this motion.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: You sound like David Lewis.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: I do not quarrel with the limitations which the Leader of the Opposition has placed on the validity of my undertaking. The same limitations apply to the undertaking that he said he was ready to give. We have accepted such undertakings on many occasions.

I do not think anyone should be scandalized by the moving of such a motion at this stage of the session. It has been done many, many times in the past, regardless of the colour of the party sitting on this side of the house. It is an accepted practice of this house, towards the end of any session, to have such a motion moved by the government side, which is responsible for the passage of legislation in this house. I repeat, it is not our wish to curtail, in any way, shape or form, the debates of this chamber on any piece of legislation. We will use this motion sparingly.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: May I direct a question to the Honourable Senator Langlois? How many hours of debate and committee study is planned for the energy bill?

Hon. Mr. Langlois: All the time needed to give it full consideration.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: I thank you for that, and I will hold you to it.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: You will have a lot of support.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, it is moved by the Honourable Senator Langlois, seconded by the Honourable Senator Martin, that for the balance of the session, rules 44, 45 and 78 be suspended insofar as they relate to public bills.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Senators: No.

[Hon. Mr. Phillips.]

The Hon. the Speaker: All those in favour please say "yea."

Some Hon. Senators: Yea.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Louder, louder.

The Hon. the Speaker: All those against the motion, please say "nay."

Some Hon. Senators: Nay.

The Hon. the Speaker: In my opinion, the "yeas" have it. I declare the motion carried.

Hon. Mr. Asselin: On division.

Motion agreed to, on division.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Mr. Buckwold: Honourable senators, before we adjourn I wish to advise honourable senators again of the transportation which will be available for those who may require it. There is a Ministry of Transport airplane going east on Saturday morning, and honourable senators interested in that flight can get in touch with Mrs. Taylor by calling local 5-3009. The Department of National Defence has arranged a flight to Winnipeg, Regina, Edmonton and Vancouver on Saturday, and honourable senators who are interested in that flight can get in touch with Mr. Neron, local 2-3131.

It is possible that we may be recalled sometime in late December, and with that in mind we will try to have transportation available for honourable senators who may be required back here. Those arrangements have not been finalized as yet.

Hon. Mr. Rowe: I take it those telephone numbers would be useable during business hours only.

Hon. Mr. Buckwold: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Rowe: Is there any emergency number which we could call to get information after business hours?

Hon. Mr. Martin: In that event you can call Senator Phillips.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: What the honourable Senator Rowe wants to know, really, is whether they will follow the usual Liberal technique and take the telephone off the hook so that they do not have to answer the phone.

Hon. Mr. Buckwold: I would suggest that you call Senator Asselin, who advised the Senate earlier that he never sleeps.

Hon. Mr. Rowe: I should like to pursue this further, because it is more serious than some senators are inclined to regard it. Suppose, for example, at 8 o'clock or 10 o'clock or 12 o'clock Saturday morning we want flight information. Where can we call? I have had this experience before right here in Ottawa. Where do we go for that information? What do we do about it?

Hon. Mr. Buckwold: I should think you could call the Ministry of Transport. I presume there will be somebody there. I gather that the Ministry of Transport plane is to leave at 9 o'clock, or thereabouts, on Saturday morning, so if you call at 12 o'clock it will be a "Merry Christmas" call.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I would suggest to the assistant Whip that he might inquire as to the telephone numbers, including any emergency numbers, and then send a note containing that information to all senators.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: Might I inquire of Senator Buckwold as to his authority for presenting us with this information? Usually it is someone in authority or someone who has some specific duty, such as a chairman. May I ask Senator Buckwold in what function he is presenting this information? Much as I appreciate it, I am curious as to the source which grants him the authority to give us this information.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Senator Flynn has made the suggestion—and I think it is a good one—that a memo be sent to all honourable senators. That is the general practice. I think we all appreciate the effort Senator Buckwold has put into this matter.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: As he is speaking on your behalf, I accept that.

Hon. Mr. Buckwold: I would advise the honourable senator that I am merely doing this in my capacity as acting Whip on this side. It is being done in the interest of our friends, and in the spirit of the yuletide season—benevolence and brotherly love.

Before I sit down, may I take this opportunity to wish all honourable senators a very happy Christmas and a good New Year.

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. Mr. Martin: I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: May I suggest that we adjourn until 11 o'clock tomorrow morning, since the House of Commons meets at 11 o'clock.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: I meant to speak to that previously. It slipped my mind. It is proposed that we adjourn until 2 o'clock tomorrow afternoon. I do not want to anticipate the letter which we are likely to receive tomorrow from Rideau Hall, but it is expected that we will have royal assent at 4.45 p.m., since the other place adjourns at 5 o'clock tomorrow.

● (1540)

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Since we are going to adjourn during pleasure in any event to await the arrival of the deputy of His Excellency the Governor General, if we met at 11 o'clock some of us could assess the situation and make plans accordingly. We gain absolutely nothing by meeting at 2 o'clock.

Hon. Mr. Martin: I appreciate the point Senator Flynn has made. Perhaps I might add that the House of Commons sits tomorrow at 11 o'clock. The motion in the name of the Minister of Transport, for the Leader of the House, will be put under their rules and orders shortly after 11 o'clock. It may be that when we assemble at 2 o'clock we will have a better appreciation of the situation. I hope this is a wise arrangement.

Motion agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Friday, December 21, 1973

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

ROYAL ASSENT

NOTICE

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that she had received the following communication:

AGRICULTURE

INTERIM REPORT OF COMMITTEE PRESENTED

Hon. Hazen Argue, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture, which was empowered by the Senate on February 22, 1973, without special reference by the Senate, to examine, from time to time, any aspect of the agricultural industry in Canada, presented the committee's interim report.

He said: Honourable senators, I would ask that this interim report be printed as an appendix to the Debates of the Senate and to the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate, and form part of the permanent record of this house.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is it agreed that the interim report be printed as an appendix to the Debates of the Senate and to the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(For text of interim report, see appendix, pp.1407-1411.)

Hon. Mr. Argue: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate, I would like to read a short summary of the report for the information of honourable senators.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Mr. Argue: The Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture is studying the matter of marginal, submarginal and abandoned farmlands in Eastern Canada, noting in particular the situation in Kent County, New Brunswick. The purpose of the report is to review the progress of the committee and to make recommendations on two aspects of the problem.

To date, the committee has held sessions in Ottawa and in Moncton, hearing briefs from federal and provincial departments of agriculture, government agencies, research and educational institutions, community and producer groups, and individuals. The committee has toured parts of New Brunswick discussing the farmers' problems with them.

The committee is continuing its work. It plans further hearings in the new year on a number of specific aspects.

The committee will, after the conclusion of the hearings, submit its report.

At this time the committee wishes to bring to the attention of the Senate two areas of concern: (1) the problem of entry into agriculture as a vocation; and (2) some apparent deficiencies in the Small Farms Development Program.

As individuals and as members of the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture we have observed that young people from both urban and rural areas are developing an interest in farming as a vocation, and in the rural life as a very desirable alternative to that in the cities and suburbs. The committee welcomes this, and wishes to see as much encouragement as possible given to these people. We have also observed that this interest is being frustrated by the institutions of our society. The schools are urban-oriented, factory-oriented and office-oriented. The media, the educators and even the parents take a negative attitude to farming as a career. The young person who emerges from this with a positive attitude is further frustrated by the excessively high demands of the government credit agencies for equity capital. As a committee we are looking further into this problem, but we consider it to be a national problem and one deserving to be a national problem and one deserving attention.

To encourage a national discussion we are making certain recommendations:

Recommendation I:

That the federal and provincial governments give serious consideration to the revision of their policies, particularly to drastically reducing for the prospective farmer the initial cash payment or other security required.

The second important area of concern that we should like to bring to your attention is the ineffectiveness of the Small Farms Development Program in achieving its goal of aiding the operators of small uneconomic farms to create, through land consolidation, economic family farms.

● (1410)

Evidence supplied to the committee shows that from April to December of this year the Small Farms Development Program land transfer program has moved five times as many farmers off the land as it has aided in expansion. Only one out of every five or six sales is to an eligible purchaser, the rest are to already established operators. This evidence also shows that the program has had almost no impact on marginal areas where very few transactions have taken place at all.

The committee has concluded that the roots of these problems are: (a) the criteria of eligibility for purchasers and vendors; and (b) the unequal access of purchasers and vendors to the land market.

The major criterion for buyers and sellers is that they be principally occupied in farming. In marginal areas farm income is insufficient for family needs and off-farm work is a necessity, thus few farmers can qualify. A second important criterion is that only land in production at the time of application can qualify. Marginal areas have a high rate of land abandonment, and much of this land is still reclaimable. It does not qualify.

Another deficiency in the program is that there is unequal access to the land market for buyers and sellers. The eligible vendor may sell to the operator of any economic unit and receive his grant. The eligible purchaser must buy from an eligible vendor. He is thus restricted, in general, to a very small market and possibly to a nonexistent one in marginal areas.

The committee considers that the primary objective of the program is to create small economic family farms, and that the program must be improved until it can effectively achieve that goal. To overcome the obstacles that the committee has found within the program it recommends:

Recommendation II:

That the eligibility criteria—

Hon. Mr. Choquette: That should be criterion. "Criteria" is the plural.

Hon. Mr. Argue: I believe you are right. We have had so many people on the editing of this that I would have hoped that it would be correct by now—at least as far as English is concerned, anyway.

To repeat, honourable senators, Recommendation II is:

That the eligibility criterion for purchasers under the Small Farms Development Program be widened to include operators not principally occupied in farming at the time of application, if the Farm Credit Corporation at the time of approval considers that the loan will materially assist the applicant to become principally occupied in farming.

Recommendation III:

That the special credit conditions provided for under the Small Farms Development Program be available to eligible purchasers for land transactions with any vendor and for the purchase of any suitable agricultural land.

Honourable senators, it has been a pleasure to act as chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture. Our committee is fortunate to have a dedicated, energetic and capable deputy chairman in the person of Senator Hervé Michaud. Interest by members of our committee has been high and attendance of senators has been excellent.

I am confident that your committee will be able to bring in a useful final report in the new year.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Honourable senators, in moving the adjournment of the Senate during pleasure until the call of the bell, to await the arrival of the Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General, I wish to inform the house that information has been received to the effect that the election expenses bill might come to us this afternoon.

Although this measure is not of great concern to this house, we shall have to deal with it. It is possible that the sitting will be resumed to deal with this measure before the arrival of the Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General. I felt that I should so inform the house before we adjourn.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: Honourable senators, Senator Langlois mentioned that we might be dealing with this bill this afternoon. I trust that he did not imply that we would be expected to pass it this afternoon.

Some Hon. Senators: Why not?

Hon. Mr. Langlois: That is up to the Senate, not to me.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is it your wish that the Senate do now adjourn during pleasure until the call of the bell, to await the arrival of the Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General at approximately 4.40 o'clock this afternoon?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

At 5.05 p.m. the sitting was resumed.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

ROYAL ASSENT

The Honourable Roland A. Ritchie, Puisne Judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General, having come and being seated at the foot of the Throne, and the House of Commons having been summoned, and being come with their Speaker, the Honourable the Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General was pleased to give the Royal Assent to the following bills:

An Act respecting The National Dental Examining Board of Canada.

An Act to amend the Parole Act.

An Act to provide additional financing mechanisms and institutions for the residential mortgage market in Canada.

The Honourable Lucien Lamoureux, Speaker of the House of Commons, then addressed the Honourable the Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General as follows:

May it please Your Honour:

The Commons of Canada have voted certain supplies required to enable the Governor to defray the expenses of the public service.

In the name of the Commons, I present to Your Honour the following bill:

An Act for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial year ending the 31st March, 1974.

To which bill I humbly request Your Honour's assent.

The Honourable the Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General was pleased to give the Royal Assent to the said bill.

The House of Commons withdrew.

The Honourable the Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General was pleased to retire.

[Hon. Mr. Phillips.]

The sitting of the Senate was resumed.

CIVIL AVIATION

PROTECTION AGAINST HIJACKING AND TERRORISM—QUESTION ANSWERED

Leave having been given to revert to the Question Period:

[Translation]

Hon. Leopold Langlois: Honourable senators, I am happy to reply on behalf of the Leader of the Government to a question asked in this chamber on Wednesday, December 19, by Senator Asselin about the horrible crime committed by hijackers at the Fiumicino airport in Rome last Monday.

As honourable senators know, Canada has been grappling on all fronts with the problem of illegal acts against the safety of civil aviation. The most effective way of preventing such acts is obviously to improve national and international security measures. The government has taken a number of concrete steps in this field with a view to creating at the international level a climate that will make potential criminals and terrorists realize that they can do themselves harm by resorting to the hijacking and sabotage of aircraft to obtain money or to promote their political objectives.

The Canadian Air Transportation Administration of the Transport Department has developed a security program for the protection of civil aviation in Canada. This program, which is implemented in co-operation with regular air carrier, includes the screening of passengers prior to embarking, the reinforcment of police surveillance in major Canadian airports, the fencing in of air terminals, identification procedures, the detection of weapons and explosives as well as a certain number of research and development projects.

Throughout the world, no country has accomplished as much as Canada in seeking answers to the elusive problem of hijacking and sabotage of aircraft. Canada has ratified three major international conventions which deal specifically with this problem, and Canadian officials have actively participated in the negotiations and drafting of these international legal instruments.

Under the 1963 Tokyo Convention, it is incumbent upon the participating countries to facilitate the return of the hijacked aircraft along with the crew members and passengers. Under The Hague Convention of 1970, it is incumbent upon the participating states either to extradite the hijackers to the prosecuting country or to prosecute themselves those criminals. The 1971 Montreal Convention provides for the same obligation in connection with the sabotage of civil aircraft. The Government of Canada strongly urged all countries to adhere to those important agreements to eliminate entirely the possibility for terrorists and criminals having committed so despicable an act to find "safe refuge".

Since the Government of Cuba was unwilling to adhere to multilateral agreements in that respect the Government of Canada passed a bilateral treaty with the government last February providing that air pirates hijacking Canadian aircraft could not find refuge in that country. This year, Cuba also passed similar bilateral agreements with the United States and Mexico, agreements that seem to have had a major preventive effect with respect to aircraft hijacking in North America.

In order to guarantee that all states would fulfill their obligations contracted under the three multilateral agreements Canada, in co-operation with the United States, worked out a draft agreement setting up mechanisms allowing for "joint action" to be taken such as the suspension of air service to all countries not complying with the obligations set out in the Tokyo, The Hague and Montreal agreements. Unfortunately, many states were not prepared to consider taking sanctions against countries which had not adhered to existing agreements. It is in part for that reason that at the 1973 Diplomatic Conference and the extraordinary meeting of the International Civil Aviation Organization held at the same time in Rome in the month of September of this year agreement could not be reached on adopting stricter international measures aimed at checking air pirates and saboteurs.

However, through sustained efforts by Canada and members of the international community working in that same direction a very large number of states have already ratified existing conventions to the extent that a number of nations where air pirates can take refuge in all quietude has been substantially reduced. The facts that characterized the last tragic attempt of this kind which started in Rome last Monday prove it.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Honourable senators, I should like to pass on some information that has come to us only recently. Negotiations are still being carried on in the other place among the various political parties about what is in store for that house next week and the week after. It is expected that a final decision will be reached between now and 6 o'clock this evening. That is why I now propose that the Senate adjourn during pleasure to reassemble at approximately 6 o'clock in order to move the adjournment of this house, having in mind all the information that is needed to take such a decision.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: Honourable senators, does this mean that the government is capitulating entirely and taking directions from David Lewis? I have been suggesting for the last several months that that is what has been happening. This merely confirms that the government leader is unwilling and, unfortunately, unable to make a decision until he gets his directive from David Lewis.

Hon. Mr. Argue: The newspapers say that Woolliams is in control now.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, before we adjourn I should like to ask you to join me in the Speaker's Chambers where we may, in the interim before we return, exchange season's greetings with each other and with His Honour, the Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

At 7 p.m. the sitting was resumed.

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. Paul Martin: Honourable senators, first of all let me say that I would be happier if the Acting Leader of the Opposition would sit where he is entitled to sit, so that I could say to him, on behalf of all of us, that we are glad to see that his health is so good that he can discharge his very heavy obligations.

The next thing I would like to do, honourable senators, is simply to wish you all a very merry Christmas—and I sincerely hope that I shall have a happy Christmas too.

I now move, seconded by Senator Langlois, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), that when the Senate adjourns today, it do stand adjourned until Monday, January 14, 1974, at 8 o'clock in the evening.

I should like to explain, in the first place, that they have agreed in the House of Commons to reconvene on January 3. They have further agreed on an allocation of time on the energy bill and the bill respecting an export tax on oil and gas, which are related to what the government believes is an anticipated emergency. It is sincerely believed it will be no more than that. Her Honour the Speaker, of course, has authority to recall the Senate if an emergency should arise before January 3.

It is my hope that we in the Senate shall not have to be recalled before January 14. I do not anticipate that we shall, in view of the agreement and the allocation of time in the other place for consideration of and debate on the two energy bills.

Honourable senators, that is the situation, and I hope that this motion will be carried.

Hon. Mr. O'Leary: Honourable senators, I should like to ask the honourable Leader of the Government a question. Can he tell us what has happened to the clause the Senate deleted from the wiretapping bill?

Hon. Mr. Martin: There is no decision on that matter yet, but I suspect that when we come back we will have a better idea of what disposition the other place will make regarding the amendment made by the Senate.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: They are still reflecting on it.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Pierre Côté: Honourable senators, I would simply like to add a word to what the leader of our party has just said. I wish you a Merry Christmas, Madam Speaker, as well as to all senior officials of this house, to the translators, to the staff working with us, to the page boys and girls and to all those who, directly or indirectly, assist us in carrying out this most important job of ours.

[English]

Hon. Mr. Martin: Honourable senators, before we adjourn, I should like to extend to Madam Speaker, on behalf of all of us, our warmest greetings for Christmas and the New Year. I should like also to thank the officers of the house for their assistance in our deliberations. In that message of appreciation I include the young ladies and the young men who serve as pages, all ranks of the Senate staff, the charwomen, the Senate committees, the officials, and the Hansard personnel. I should like to extend special greetings to the Leader of the Opposition who has had to leave the chamber on public business, to the members of his party, and to all honourable senators.

[Translation]

Merry Christmas and Happy New Year to you all!

[English]

Hon. Mr. Phillips: Honourable senators, I think that most honourable senators would find it odd if I agreed with Senator Martin on any point. But on this occasion I am sure that all Opposition members—although I have no authority to speak for the Opposition party—would like me to wish all honourable senators and members of the staff the very best over the holiday period.

I would like at this time to wish you all a Merry Christmas. I would express it in Welsh, except that honourable senators might not understand me, and I am not sure that I would understand it myself.

I extend best wishes to all honourable senators and to the staff. Joyeux Noël.

The Senate adjourned until Monday, January 14, 1974, at 8 o'clock in the evening.

AGRICULTURE

INTERIM REPORT OF COMMITTEE

FRIDAY, December 21, 1973

The Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture, which was empowered by the Senate on 22nd February, 1973, without special reference by the Senate, to examine, from time to time, any aspect of the agricultural industry in Canada, now makes an Interim Report, as follows:

SUMMARY

The Senate Agricultural Committee is studying the matter of marginal, submarginal, and abandoned farmlands in Eastern Canada, noting in particular the situation in Kent County, New Brunswick. The purpose of this report is to review the progress of the Committee and to make recommendations on two aspects of the problem.

To date the Committee has held sessions in Ottawa and in Moncton, hearing briefs from federal and provincial departments of agriculture, government agencies, research and educational institutions, community and producer groups and individuals. The Committee has toured parts of New Brunswick discussing the farmers' problems with them.

The Committee is continuing its work. It plans further hearings in the New Year on a number of specific aspects, after which the Committee will submit its report.

At this time the Committee wishes to bring to the attention of the Senate two areas of concern: (1) the problem of entry into agriculture as a vocation, and (2) some apparent deficiencies in the Small Farms Development Program.

The Committee in its sessions has observed an increased interest on the part of young people in agriculture as a vocation and in the rural life. This interest is frustrated by many things. Along with other obstacles the entry of young people into agriculture is often made impossible by the large amount of capital required. Parallel to this new interest in agriculture is the rapid depopulation of rural areas. The Committee believes it is desirable that larger numbers of young people enter agriculture. The Committee is pursuing this problem, but it is a national problem which merits the concern of the people and governments. In order to encourage discussion of these problems the Committee recommends:

Recommendation I

That the federal and provincial governments give serious consideration to the revision of their policies, particularly to drastically reducing for the prospective farmer the initial cash payment or other security presently required.

The Small Farms Development Program is considered by the Committee to be the most important policy instrument now in place for aiding the economic development of marginal farming areas. However, evidence presented to the Committee suggests that the program is achieving its goal of easing the exit of farmers from uneconomic farms much more effectively than it is achieving its goal of creating small economic family farms.

The evidence further suggests that the program's impact in marginal areas is less than was expected.

The Committee has concluded that the roots of these problems are: (a) the criteria of eligibility for purchasers and vendors, and (b) the unequal access of purchasers and vendors to the land market.

The major criterion for buyers and sellers is that they be principally occupied in farming. In marginal areas farm income is insufficient for family needs and off-farm work is a necessity, thus few farmers qualify. A second important criterion is that only land in production at the time of the federal-provincial agreement and at the time of application can qualify. Marginal areas have a high rate of land abandonment. Much of this land is reclaimable for agricultural use, but it does not qualify.

Under the program there is unequal access to the land market for buyers and sellers. The eligible vendor may sell to the operator of any economic farm unit and receive his grant. The eligible purchaser must buy from an eligible vendor. He is thus restricted, in general, to a very small market and possibly to a nonexistent market in marginal areas.

To overcome these obstacles and to increase the effectiveness of the Small Farms Development Program the Committee recommends the following changes:

Recommendation II

That the eligibility criteria for purchasers under SFDP be widened to include operators not principally occupied in farming at the time of application, if the Farm Credit Corporation at the time of approval considers that the loan will materially assist the applicant to become principally occupied in farming.

Recommendation III

That the special credit conditions provided for under the SFDP be available to eligible purchasers for land transactions with any vendor and for the purchase of any suitable agricultural land.

REPORT

Introduction

At the suggestion of the Honourable Senator Hervé Michaud, the Agriculture Committee, with approval of the Senate, undertook as its first major inquiry

> "the matter of marginal, submarginal, and abandoned farm lands in Eastern Canada, noting in particular the situation in Kent County, N.B., and the consideration of such recommendations as might be useful in the interests of securing and maintaining:
>
> 1) Viable rural communities;
> 2) A prosperous agricultural population;
> 3) A progressive and expanding industry;
> 4) Such supplies of agricultural products as will contribute to reasonable and stable prices—an advantage to both producers and consumers;
> 5) Farm units of a kind and site, consistent with the above objectives, so as to maintain a large rural population."

Proceedings of the Inquiry

The Committee has held and continues to hold hearings on this question, and at this time seeks to inform the Senate of its progress and to make recommendations concerning two aspects of the matter.

The Committee sought as its first witness the Honourable Eugene Whelan, Minister of Agriculture, who appeared on May 22nd, with his Deputy Minister, Mr. S. B. Williams, and other officials of his Department. This meeting served to allow the federal government to discuss its policies concerning the small and marginal farm sector. This meeting was productive and encouraging.

The Committee then undertook to examine the agricultural problems of Kent County. To acquaint the Committee with local conditions, with the attitudes of rural residents and farmers, and with the attitudes, goals, and programs of the provincial government and other agencies and institutions, two days of hearings were held in Moncton, on June 13 and 14, 1973. On the preceding day, June 12th, the Committee toured parts of Kent and Westmorland Counties, visiting with farmers, at local communities, and at the headquarters of New Brunswick New Start Inc. On June 15th, the Committee travelled to the Agriculture Canada Research Station at Fredericton, where it toured the station and had discussions with the director and his staff.

While in Moncton the Committee held six meetings in the morning, afternoon and evening of June 13th and 14th. The Committee heard from witnesses representing the provincial and federal governments, educational and research institutions, local groups and also from individuals. The following appeared:

—on behalf of Agriculture Canada, Mr. G. M. Weaver, Director, Research Station, Fredericton; supporting witnesses from the various research divisions; and Mr. Frank Calder, Acting Superintendent, Experimental Farm, Nappan, N.S.

—on behalf of New Brunswick Department of Agricultural and Rural Development, Mr. R. Gilbert, Deputy Minister; Mr. P. Schousboe, Director of Extension; and Mr. V. Bastin, Secretary, New Brunswick Forest Products Commission.

—Mr. L.-Ph. Albert and Mr. E. Keizer, presenting the conclusions of the Report on Agricultural Manpower Training Needs, 1971, in New Brunswick.

—Mr. C. Gallagher (MLA, Carleton) and Mr. A. Graham (MLA, Kent) presenting the conclusions of the report of the New Brunswick Select Committee on Agriculture and Rural Life.

—on behalf of La Fédération des Agriculteurs Francophones de l'Archidiocèse de Moncton, Mr. Joel Arsenault, Secretary.

—on behalf of the Woodlot Association, Mr. Jean Finnigan, President.

—Mr. Philippe Bourgeois, agronome.

—on behalf of the Rexton sub-federation of Agriculture, Mrs. Flora Sullivan, Secretary.

—on behalf of the Association of Producers of Christmas trees for Kent County North, Mr. Yvon Babineau, President.

—on behalf of the Memramcook Institute, Mr. E. A. Arsenault, Director, and Mr. R. Robichaud, Co-ordinator, Auxiliary Services.

—on behalf of the Farm Credit Corporation, Mr. W. West, Director; and Mr. E. Bourgeois, Supervisor of Small Farms Development Program.

—on behalf of New Brunswick New Start, Inc., Mr. H. Shorten, Director.

—on behalf of the Students' Council, Clement Cormier High School, Buctouche, Ms. Adrienne Léger, Mr. André Leger, and a delegation of students.

—on behalf of Maritimes Cooperative Services, Ltd., Mr. W. D. Dernier, General Manager, members of the staff, and members of the Board of Directors.

—on behalf of New Food Products Co. Ltd., Mr. J. P. Leblanc, General Manager, who also read the brief of Rabbit Ranchers Enterprises (Rexton, N.B.)

—on behalf of J. D. Irving Ltd., Mr. D. Oxley, Woodland Director.

—on behalf of Fédération des Caisses Populaires Acadiennes, Mr. M. Légère, Director.

The exchanges, both formal and informal, with the witnesses, were stimulating. The representatives from the provincial and federal governments, and the research institutions, produced information that was optimistic, though cautiously so, concerning the prospects of increased agricultural employment and production in Kent County. The local people expressed hope, though it was mixed with bitterness towards and alienation from the policies and services of the departments of agriculture and development of the two senior levels of government.

The Committee would like to make especial note of a surprising and an encouraging centre of hope for the possibilities of a re-invigorated rural life, the delegation of students from Clement Cormier High School in Buctouche. These students expressed the frustrations of their generation with the all too traditional migration from the rural to the urban setting, and their hope that the rural alternative would become a viable alternative, possibly for themselves.

The sessions in Moncton, the briefs presented and discussions that took place, have served to bring the conditions of Kent County, and similar areas, into a clearer perspective, and to focus the attention of the Committee with greater precision. A number of specific areas of investigation have been decided on by the Committee, the problems of production and marketing, of capital and credit, of agricultural education and extension services (with special attention to the language problem), and of land abandonment and use, etc., and these are being pursued.

Two weeks ago the Committee continued its study with two meetings on specific aspects. On December 4th the problems of agricultural education were discussed with Mr. Victorin Lavoie, Dean and Mr. Yves Chartier, Secretary, Faculty of Agricultural Science and Nutrition, University of Laval, Dr. H. F. MacRae, Principal, Mr. J. E. Shuh, Vice-Principal, and Mr. P. Y. Hamilton, Registrar, Nova Scotia Agricultural College, Mr. Roland Cloutier, Dean, Faculty of Science, Moncton University, and Mr. L.-Ph. Albert, Cabinet Secretariat of the Office of the Premier of New Brunswick.

This discussion covered two interrelated areas, professional training for agrologists or agronomes and continuing education for practising farmers. The Committee found the interchange of ideas between participants in the less formal atmosphere of discussion to be most productive both in generating ideas and exploring problems.

On December 6th, the Committee invited Dr. G. M. MacEachern, President, Agricultural Economics Research Council of Canada, to appear. The discussions centered on the interventions of government in the agricultural sector, and specifically with those policies directed at small farms and marginal areas.

The hearings held to date, the witnesses who have appeared, and the discussions that ensued, are considered by the Committee to have been a good beginning on both the general and the specific problem under consideration. In the New Year the Committee plans further hearings on a number of important aspects.

Discussion of certain aspects and Recommendations

The Committee wishes at this time to bring to the attention of the Senate two areas of concern: (a) the problem of entry into agriculture, and (b) some apparent deficiencies of the Small Farms Development Program.

It appears to the Committee that there may be a developing interest in farming as a vocation and this should be encouraged by governments. This interest has taken many forms, including the "back to the land" movement, increased enrollment in agriculture colleges, and increased interest in the secondary schools. This interest is being frustrated by many things. The education system is completely urban oriented. The Committee has found that only a few secondary students have the option of an agriculture course available to them. The schools prepare students for and they offer them the choice of only the offices and the factories, not the fields, the forests or the sea. The policies of the federal and provincial governments also serve as a disincentive. They seem to be oriented towards the creation of an elite, based on large, capital intensive farms. The credit policies especially presuppose that significant amounts of capital are available to the entrant into agriculture.

The Committee has observed the depopulation of rural Canada, the gradually advancing average age of farmers, with dismay. It has a responsibility to seek solutions to this problem for marginal areas, but the problem is a national one, as relevant in the Regina Central Plains of Saskatchewan as in Kent County, New Brunswick. The Committee, therefore, wishes to see a national discussion of this problem and so it recommends:

Recommendation I

That the federal and provincial governments give serious consideration to the revision of their policies, particularly to drastically reducing for the prospective farmer the initial cash payment or other security presently required.

The Small Farms Development Program, from its announcement in December 1971 to the recent past, raised the expectations of all persons concerned with the problems of small and marginal farms in Canada. The Honourable H. A. Olson, Minister of Agriculture on December 6, 1971, stated:

> "Unless we develop new and workable programs, there are many farmers in Canada and, indeed, entire rural communities, that will be threatened..."
> "Economic studies and practical experience suggest that the family farm is the best type of farm, and it is in this context that we have developed a comprehensive program to help the small farmers of Canada to develop profitable family farms."

The Prime Minister, the Right Honourable Pierre Elliott Trudeau, emphasized the importance that the federal government placed on this initiative in a speech to La Coopérative Fédérée de Québec, on February 2, 1972:

> "I will say that the program (SFDP) we are presently discussing is our last straw. We either have to make it work or the whole thing (rural society) will collapse. Our entire hopes are centered and focused on this program and we will never give it too much importance."

The Honourable Eugene Whelan, when he appeared before the Committee, echoed these statements:

"I still think that the Small Farms Development Program has quite a lot to offer, particularly in areas such as Kent County, and other similar areas in Canada."

The Committee at the beginning of its inquiry also had much hope for the program. Senator Michaud at the hearings in Moncton spoke for many of the members present when he said:

"With regard to the small farms program, I think perhaps as far as we are concerned in Kent County at the present time, it is the most vital piece of legislation coming before us."

We did not see the program as a magic wand that the federal and provincial governments could wave to produce prosperity, but rather as a program with a specific role to play. The Committee has come to the conclusion that the program is unable to fulfill that role in areas like Kent County.

Perhaps it would be useful to outline the program before discussing the deficiencies that the Committee has found.

The major thrust of the Small Farms Development Program is the transformation of small, economically marginal family farms into economically viable family farms. It concentrates its efforts on making small farms larger, but not in making large farms. It has a second objective, "to assist owner-operators of small farms to realize on their equity in their farm holdings," or to allow those who wish to depart from a subsistence agricultural life to a better non-farm life, to do so.

To achieve these two goals the program provides an information service and a land transfer program. In New Brunswick the province administers the former and the Farm Credit Corporation administers the latter. The information service consists of (a) a rural development service to help the farmer and his family get the information required to make the basic decision to develop within agriculture or to take advantage of other opportunities, (b) a farm management service to help the individual farmer develop a commercially viable farm business and (c) an information system to back up these two services. The land transfer program consists of (a) the provision of special credit for prospective purchasers, (b) the provision of assistance grants for prospective vendors, (c) a listing service to bring buyers and sellers together, and (d) the option for the outright purchase and resale of farm property.

Under the special credit provisions the purchaser will be able to make a low down payment ($200.00 on a $20,000.00 loan), will have up to 26 years to repay at the standard Farm Credit Corporation mortgage rate, and will not be required to mortgage other property as security. The purchaser is put in a low risk position, he does not endanger his present holdings and he retains his capital as operating capital. The vendor receives a special assistance grant of a basic $1,500 plus 10% of the sale price of the farm to a maximum combined total of $3,500.00. The vendor also has the option of retaining the farm home and property for residential use.

How is the small farms program working? Preliminary data has been made available by the Farm Credit Corporation and is set out in the attached Tables I and II. The range of "ideal transactions" (eligible vendors selling to eligible purchasers) varies considerably; for the period April 1 to November 30, 1973, the national ratio is 18.5%, the New Brunswick ratio is 14.3%. From this we can conclude that the program is more effective in achieving its second objective, the assisting of "owner-operators of small farms to realize on their equity," than in achieving its first objective, the creation of small economic family farms through consolidation. The average value of the transactions, both sales and purchases, are well within the maximum established for each province. It appears that there is sufficient credit available to eligible purchasers to compete for the size of farms being offered by eligible vendors. We must conclude that there are other reasons for the low level of "ideal transactions."

The Committee's attention was directed to the eligibility criteria by a number of witnesses and it has concluded that the limitations imposed by these criteria are at the root of the problems of purchasers.

A purchase under the land transfer program, an "ideal transaction," is possible only if both the buyer and the seller are eligible. The principal condition of eligibility and the most limiting one in the Committee's opinion is that the purchaser must be "principally occupied in the operation of a farm" and that a vendor must be "principally occupied in the operation of that farm at the date of commencement of the program and at the time of application."

This dual eligibility does not apply to sales under the program, thus the number of sales is more than five times the number of purchases. The vendor has an unlimited range of persons to whom he can sell. The purchaser has a severely limited range of persons from whom he can buy and still qualify for the special credit arrangements.

This problem, which is nationwide, is further accentuated in marginal areas, where few farmers are principally employed in farming. The revenue generated by most of these farms is not sufficient for the operators needs and off-farm work must be taken to supplement the farm income. This is illustrated by Kent County, where in 1971, 66.6% of farms had gross sales of less than $2,500 and 81.8% had sales of less than $5,000. The farmers in Kent County who reported off-farm work for 1970 averaged 143 days in the under $2,500 class, 151 days in the $2,500-$4,999 class and 107 days in the $10,000 and over class. Clearly most of the farmers in Kent County would not qualify as being principally employed in farming.

The criteria limit the options of the eligible purchaser in another way; the potential acreage available for purchase is that which was in production when the federal-provincial agreement was signed and that has remained in production to the time of application. Many acres have gone out of production in marginal areas in the last two decades and much of this land can still be retrieved for agricultural use. In Kent County in the period 1966-71, 18,092 acres of improved land alone were removed from agriculture, a decline of 35.7%. If the same absolute decline in acres continues, another 18,000 acres could be removed from production within the period of the New Brunswick Small Farms Development Program Agreement (till 1977). The land taken out of production one year becomes ineligible for purchase the next year.

The quality of this abandoned land is, in general, equivalent to those acres presently available. It is dispersed throughout the farming area, not concentrated on the fringes or in certain areas, thus its suitability for use in consolidation may be more satisfactory than acreage from some eligible farm.

The Committee finds the pattern of the movement of land within the land transfer program to be most discouraging. Farmers are being moved off the land at a much faster rate than small farms are being expanded. The expectations of the rural population in marginal areas are not being satisfied within the scope of the program. The Committee has concluded that the most important obstacles to the success of the program are the criteria that require applicants to be principally occupied in farming and that limits the access of eligible purchasers to transactions with eligible vendors.

To overcome these obstacles and to increase the effectiveness of the Small Farms Development Program the Committee recommends the following changes:

Recommendation II

That the eligibility criteria for purchasers under the Small Farms Development Program be widened to include operators not principally occupied in farming at the time of application, if the Farm Credit Corporation at the time of approval considers that the loan will materially assist the applicant to become principally occupied in farming.

Recommendation III

That the special credit conditions provided for under the Small Farms Development Program be available to eligible purchasers for land transactions with any vendor and for the purchase of any suitable agricultural land.

Respectfully submitted.

THE SENATE

Wednesday, January 9, 1974

The Senate met at 8 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

NEW SENATORS

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I have the honour to inform the Senate that the Clerk has received certificates from the Registrar General of Canada showing that the following persons, respectively, have been summoned to the Senate:

Hon. Louis-J. Robichaud, P.C.

Daniel Riley, Esquire

NEW SENATORS INTRODUCED

The Hon. the Speaker having informed the Senate that there were senators without, waiting to be introduced:

The following honourable senators were introduced; presented Her Majesty's writs of summons, which were read by the Clerk Assistant; took the legally prescribed oath, which was administered by the Clerk, and were seated:

Hon. Louis-J. Robichaud, P.C., of the Province of New Brunswick, introduced between Hon. Mr. Martin, P.C. and Hon. Mr. McElman.

Hon. Daniel Riley, of Saint John West, New Brunswick, introduced between Hon. Mr. Martin, P.C. and Hon. Mr. McElman.

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that the honourable senators named above had made and subscribed the declaration of qualification required by the British North America Act, 1867, in the presence of the Clerk of the Senate, the Commissioner appointed to receive and witness the said declaration.

[Later:]

Hon. Paul Martin: Honourable senators, although this has not been my custom, I would like to say to Senator Robichaud, a former Premier of New Brunswick, and also to a colleague of mine in the days when we were in the House of Commons, Senator Riley, a former member of the Government of New Brunswick, how pleased we are to have them as members of this house.

I think it is well for us to note that Senator Robichaud is the fourth former provincial premier in our membership. We have Senator Hicks, Senator Manning, Senator Robichaud, and Senator Harold Connolly, whose illness has made it impossible for him to be with us during the past two years. It is significant that these four gentlemen have taken their places as members of the Senate. The Senate has among its many responsibilities the consideration of the problems of government in Canada as they affect the provinces and the rights of provinces. I think it is salutary that four former provincial premiers are members of this body.

ELECTION EXPENSES BILL

BILL TO AMEND CERTAIN ACTS—FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-203, to amend the Canada Elections Act, the Broadcasting Act and the Income Tax Act in respect of election expenses.

Bill read first time.

SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. Azellus Denis: Honourable senators, I move second reading now.

[Translation]

Honourable senators, I wonder whether it will be helpful to me from the Opposition's point of view, but before I begin to make my comments I would like to wish a Happy New Year to all, especially to the members opposite who have learned to criticize me.

Honourable senators, I consider myself a fortunate man once again to have the opportunity of introducing another bill which will surely meet the unanimous approval of the Senate. I refer to Bill C-203 to amend the Canada Elections Act, the Broadcasting Act and the Income Tax Act in respect of election expenses.

We can say that this measure is most democratic as far as the Canadian election system is concerned and I could thus summarize the purposes of the bill: more active participation of the Canadian citizen in the political affairs of his country; greater opportunity for the serious-minded citizen to serve as member, whatever his means or social condition; reduced election expenses; efficient control over the sources of contributions and restrictions on the expenses of political parties and candidates.

More active participation of the Canadian citizen; this participation is twofold: first, through the income tax deduction of the taxpayer's contribution either to registered parties or candidates; he also participates through his taxes that will be used to reimburse in part the election expenditures incurred by registered parties and candidates.

According to the act, any contributor to registered parties and candidates may deduct from his income tax: 75 per cent of the amount contributed, not exceeding $100; $75 plus 50 per cent of the amount contributed between $100 and $550; $300 plus 33⅓ per cent of the amount contributed above $550, with a maximum deduction of $550.

As you can see, small contributions will involve a tax reduction higher than the others, while remaining anonymous if the contribution does not exceed $100, which should prompt more people to take part actively in electoral campaigns, in Canadian political party organization, thus taking a greater interest in public affairs.

As for the other contributors, they will also be entitled to a major tax reduction, but they will not be able to remain anonymous. Their contributions and their names will be disclosed and every citizen will have access to this information. For these reasons, it may be that in spite of the allowed tax reduction, some persons or companies may, for personal or other reasons, refuse to give contributions to a party or candidate because their names will be disclosed, but these parties and candidates will not suffer too much from that on account of the limits imposed on expenditures and partial reimbursements by the state, as provided for by this bill. There will be greater opportunity for the serious-minded citizen to serve as a member, whatever his means or social condition.

Any candidate obtaining at least 15 per cent of the vote will be entitled to a reimbursement of the lesser of the following amounts: the amount of the candidate's expenses or the total of the following: the postage costs for one mailing to the electors of his riding; eight cents for each of the first 25,000 electors, and six cents for each name in excess of 25,000 electors.

Furthermore, the candidate will be entitled to a refund of his deposit. Finally, the auditor that each candidate will be required to appoint shall be paid by the state up to $250.

Concerning candidates in ridings referred to in Appendix III of the Canada Elections Act, the refunding procedure is somewhat different since the least of the following amounts is added: the amount of the candidate's travelling expenses, or the number of square miles in the electoral district multiplied by one cent, or $3,000; that is, the least of these three amounts.

Of course, the candidates shall be entitled to a refund of their deposit and to payment of the auditor by the state.

Finally, the candidate who does not get 15 per cent of the ballots cost will of course forfeit his deposit and the state will only pay the auditor as stated above.

The electoral expenditures of a candidate shall be limited as follows: one dollar for each of the first 15,000 names appearing on the preliminary lists of electors for the electoral district; fifty cents for each name in excess of 15,000 but not in excess of 25,000; and finally, twenty-five cents for each name in excess of 25,000 electors.

For instance, in a riding where there are 40,000 electors, any candidate shall be entitled, according to this calculation, to a maximum expenditure of $23,750.

However, if I take the same example of a constituency with 40,000 voters, the candidate would be entitled to a $6,100 reimbursement, about one quarter of his expenses. However if the candidate spends only $10,000 instead of $23,750 which is the maximum allowed, he will still be entitled to that $6,100 reimbursement, 61 per cent of his expenses; therefore it will be to his great advantage to limit his expenses.

I should like to point out that for the computation of allowed expenses, the candidate's travel expenses are excluded—by a committee amendment—as well as the candidate's personal expenses already provided for in the law up to $2,000 as stipulated in the Elections Act. The candidate's travel expenses are not included in the allowed personal expenses except for the proportion exceeding the amount he is entitled to spend.

As you are aware, there is a margin between limiting allowed expenses and amounts of $50,000 and over which some candidates spent during past elections, which was quite unfair for those candidates who did not have such amounts.

Honourable senators, the limitation of expenses and partial reimbursements will result in more serious and competent candidates being attracted. Another interesting result is that fewer defeated candidates and elected members will have to sustain election debts which sometimes entail many disagreeable consequences.

As regards the allowed expenses of registered parties, they are limited to 30 cents for each name on the election lists of the constituencies where those parties have candidates, and as partial reimbursement they will be entitled to half the cost of the radio and television broadcasting time allocated to them on the basis of a fair distribution agreed to by the registered parties and by the Canadian Radio-Television Commission. In this connection, only six hours and a half of radio and television broadcasting time will be allocated among the registered parties and for each radio and television station. Moreover, these programs will be allowed only from the 29th to the second day before the elections, and not from the issue of the writs of election. This last restriction applies also to periodical publications and newspapers; the rates charged for this type of publicity will not be higher than the lowest rates charged to any person or ordinary customer.

● (2010)

[English]

Honourable senators, the reform proposals would also remove the "veil of secrecy" from the financial affairs of political parties and candidates.

The bill will require that every registered political party name a chief agent who would be responsible for submitting audited financial statements to the Chief Electoral Officer after an election campaign and at the end of each fiscal year. These financial statements would be made available to the public, and laid before the House of Commons in a form prescribed by the Chief Electoral Officer, and would go to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, as far as expenses are involved.

Each candidate, who is already required to appoint an official agent, would also appoint an auditor, and an audited financial statement would be submitted to the returning officer. The statement would be a full and complete accounting of all campaign contributions and expenditures.

[Translation]

Now, honourable senators, to give you an idea just how severely this act will be administered, let me quote to you a list of offences punishable by a fine not exceeding $25,000: a registered party whose expenses exceed the authorized limits; a party which fails to submit its financial report or which submits one that is either false or inadequate; a party or candidate who advertises in periodicals or makes use of radio or television facilities outside the authorized period, specifically from the 29th to the 2nd day before an election; a broadcaster who charges a rate that exceeds the lowest rate charged to an ordinary customer; a broadcaster who fails to comply with the allocation of time to each party or candidate.

Honourable senators, a committee of the other place has made a thorough examination of this bill which required over fifty sittings. Over forty of the one hundred or so amendments which had been proposed to the original bill were retained. All sorts of experts having appeared before the committee. I respectfully submit that a second study by a Senate committee would be nothing more than a repetition of what occurred in the committee of the other place.

Furthermore, the House committee report has also been thoroughly discussed and some forty amendments were dealt with.

I have taken into account many amendments in my comments to you. Several are really nothing more than an explanation of the initial draft. I will merely point out to you six changes which, in my opinion, have some importance.

First, candidates who were no longer entitled to print or distribute notices of poll will now be able to do so.

Second, the auditor who was to be paid by the candidate will be remunerated by the Chief Electoral Officer up to $250.

Third, the value of services supplied by a government or public organization during the election campaign shall constitute an election expense. One example only: transportation of party leaders by government aircraft.

Fourth, under the supervision of the Chief Electoral Officer a commissioner shall be appointed in order to ensure that the act in regard to election expenses is complied with.

Fifth, a riding association of members of a registered party may elect a person as constituency agent on the same basis as a registered agent and provide for a replacement if necessary.

Finally, the publication of government documents that would favour or harm a party or a candidate will be prohibited from the moment the election writ is issued.

Honourable senators, I have given you what I believe is a substantial summary of this bill. As the bill is of direct interest only to the members of the other place and to possible candidates, I do not think it is necessary, with your leave, to refer this bill to a Senate committee.

This bill has been preceded by a similar bill, Bill C-121, in 1972, which was not adopted because of lack of time.

I add that this electoral reform has been studied by an ad hoc committee of the House of Commons in 1971 and that it goes back to the Barbeau Commission of 1964.

Honourable senators, I have the honour to move the adoption of this bill on second reading.

[English]

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Honourable senators, on this side there are two or three honourable senators who are interested in speaking on this bill, but I would like to ask a question or two of the sponsor. Suppose I am a wealthy candidate in a federal election and I call on five of the most popular people in my riding and say to them, "Will you organize for me? I will give you $5,000 each under the table. Now get busy." What check is there under this bill? Must the candidate divulge such a matter as that? Is he under oath? These are a few of the questions I had intended to ask.

● (2020)

Hon. Mr. Denis: It is pretty easy to answer those questions. It is forbidden to rob a bank, but some banks are robbed. If you want to be dishonest in an electoral campaign, you can be dishonest just the same despite the fact that you might have everything covered in the book. We have even appointed a new commissioner to look after that, and don't forget that we have the opponents, the official agents, the returning officers and the Chief Electoral Officer to look after that. We even have Diefenbaker!

Hon. Mr. Phillips: Honourable senators, I rise on a point of order. Perhaps there was a mistake on the part of the translator, but when I listened to the English translation of the honourable senator's remarks the motion I heard was, "I move the adoption of this bill on second reading." I do not think our rules provide for that. I hope it was a mistake on the part of the translator rather than a mistake in the motion itself.

[Translation]

Hon. Edgar E. Fournier (Madawaska-Restigouche): Honourable senators, as a senator from New Brunswick, I feel it my duty to wish the most cordial welcome to two old colleagues and friends of mine, Senators Robichaud and Riley.

[English]

I am sure that you will find your work very interesting. The friendship here in the Senate is beyond reproach.

[Translation]

To both of you, Senator Robichaud and Senator Riley, I extend the most sincere welcome and long life in the Senate.

Honourable senators, if I allow myself, even with much hesitancy and difficulty, to be heard, it is not to support this bill with all its pretentions but rather to protest as, for the moment being, I cannot foresee any substantial accomplishment in improving our election legislation as it is today and as we have known it for so many years.

Those election laws go back to the beginning of Confederation and include several amendments to correct the drawbacks that existed.

[English]

Honourable senators, I just said that I do not rise either to praise or condemn the bill because I cannot praise or condemn something I do not believe in. In my view not only is it the Elections Act which needs amendment; the whole structure of the government procedure should have first priority. Let us remodel the whole structure, which is over 100 years old and which was designed, if I may use the expression, to operate on two wheels, as a two-party structure, rather than as a four-wheel structure as we have today, according to which one party can remove one wheel and paralyze the whole vehicle, or the government as a whole, at the expense of the taxpayers.

Honourable senators, from my own experience I firmly believe that our election expenses have reached alarming proportions. They have reached the point where even the selection of our representatives is at stake. But who is to blame for this? It is we, the public, because of our attitude and because of our lack of knowledge and understanding of the democratic system. The public, or some of the public, have lost the merits and values of freedom.

The British North America Act of 1867 saw the birth of our first Elections Act. Since that time, and up until 1967, our democracy has survived 165 amendments. Fifty-eight of those amendments took place between 1867 and 1900, and 107 of them occurred between 1900 and 1967. Obviously, Bill C-203, which is still another amendment, is not included in those 165 amendments.

Those amendments come under various headings, such as Interim Parliamentary Elections Act, 1871; Revisal of Voters Lists for elections to the House of Commons; an Act respecting the Elections of Members of the House of Commons; The Dominion Elections Act; The Dominion Controverted Elections Act, and so on.

As early as 1876 there was an act to provide for more effectual inquiry into the existence of corrupt practices at elections of members of the House of Commons. In the same year there was an act to provide for more effectual provisions for the administration of the law relating to corrupt practices at elections of members of the House of Commons. The list goes on and on. In 1894 there was an act to disfranchise voters who may have taken bribes. From all these examples you can see that the game was already well underway.

The list I have been referring to, which concerns electoral matters in the Statutes of Canada, is too long to read and I would ask permission to have it printed as an appendix to the Debates of the Senate.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable sénators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(For list see appendix, pp. 1421-1426.)

Hon. Mr. Fournier (Madawaska-Restigouche): You will note that as early as 1876—ten years after the birth of Confederation—our system was already in trouble. And history repeats itself. We are still in trouble.

In the United States, Watergate is not a result of modern technology. Technology may have contributed somewhat to the dust storm, but the fact is that when it comes to elections this old game has been going on for ages in all political parties, and in this country for over 100 years.

Elections have been, and will be, regardless of the controlling of expenses, a sort of game which can be divided into two parts. The first part is before the election and consists in the art of fooling the people; the second part occurs after the election and consists in the art of blaming your opponent for your failure to accomplish your promises. It is just as simple as that. I do not hesitate, however, to add that some are better at the game than others, and some have become experts.

[Hon. Mr. Fournier (De Lanaudière).]

● (2030)

In my personal opinion democratic elections and voting rights are sacred rights. If we want our system to survive, this is no time to play games and fool the public. Some day—and I am afraid, too late—we will realize what we have done and what we are doing. The door of destruction is just around the corner. To eliminate part of the difficulties we are facing today with over-expenditures, the first move—and again this is a personal opinion—should be compulsory voting. This would eliminate many problems, such as radio and television political propaganda, public meetings, transportation of voters, not overlooking boozing or alcohol drinking, and so on. I have seen them all, and I have lived most of them.

Now is the time, after a hundred years or more, to become more realistic and sober up at voting time; to change the rules of the proceedings to provide our legislators with the necessary tools for effective government. This bill will not do any of that.

I close my remarks by quoting an extract from the little prayer book called Prions en Église. I do sometimes go to church on Sundays.

[Translation]

In Prions en Église, I read what follows:

> God gives Himself to us like the light but we sometimes close our eyes. Let us, immediately, beg His pardon. Because we close our eyes too often on the real problems of life, Lord have mercy.

Without hesitation, I must confess that I am among the culprits.

On motion of Senator Godfrey, debate adjourned.

OIL EXPORT TAX BILL

FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-245, to impose an oil export tax under the Excise Tax Act and to allocate certain of the revenues derived from the oil export tax.

Bill read first time.

SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. Alan A. Macnaughton: Honourable senators I move second reading now.

Honourable senators, this bill now before the Senate represents one important element of the government's proposals for dealing with the current instability of the system for pricing international oil, and the recent dramatic price increases in our major export market, the American mid-west. I should like at this time to describe briefly the events which led to the introduction of this bill, and the principles upon which it is based.

The Minister of Finance in the other place has outlined how the domestic pricing of Canadian crude oil has traditionally responded to prices prevailing in the United States market. Recent price increases in this market have been transmitted to western Canada where, in the nine months up to August of this year, the wellhead price of domestic oil rose by about one-third. To prevent further substantial increases in the domestic market, on September 4, 1973 the Prime Minister announced a voluntary price restraint on Canadian oil and oil products until the end of January, 1974. Since this announcement, continuing increases in the price of international oil have underlined the wisdom of this measure. On December 6 the Prime Minister proposed new discussions with the provinces and the oil companies regarding an extension of the price restraint at least until the end of this winter.

The Oil Export Tax Bill now before us is a relatively short bill of five clauses. There are two parts to the bill, plus the definition appearing in clause 2.

Part I is an amendment to the Excise Tax Act and covers the excise tax imposed for the period October 1, 1973 to April 1, 1974.

Part II contains the provision with respect to the payment to the oil producing provinces of the proceeds of the oil export tax imposed under the Excise Tax Act for the period from October 1, 1973 to April 1, 1974. What happens after April 1 will depend on the conclusions reached at the federal-provincial meeting to be held in January 1974 with reference to payments to the oil producing provinces.

Honourable senators, with your permission I shall deal first with Part I, being clause 3 of the bill. This part provides for the imposition and collection of the oil export tax under the Excise Tax Act between October 1, 1973 and April 1, 1974. It imposes an excise tax on crude oil exported from Canada. The amount of the tax is as follows: (a) $0.40 a barrel for the months of October and November, 1973; (b) $1.90 a barrel for the month of December, 1973; (c) $2.20 a barrel for the month of January, 1974; and (d) $6.40 a barrel for the months of February and March, 1974.

All of these provisions confirm announcements made by the federal government during the autumn and winter with respect to the level of export tax on crude oil.

One might ask: Why was the Excise Tax Act used for this purpose? The answer is: Because the administrative machinery to supervise the collection of the taxes is available in the Department of National Revenue.

One might ask in the second place: What in fact is taxed? The answer to this question is that the tax is imposed upon each barrel of Canadian crude exported from Canada.

A barrel under the provisions of the Weights and Measures Act contains 34.9 standard Canadian gallons, or 42 United States gallons. [S. 13(1), Ch. W-7, RSC 1970.]

● (2040)

The definition of "crude oil" contained in clause 2 of the bill is taken from the National Energy Board Act, to which is added language to include production from oil sands. This definition of crude oil is, of course, well known to the oil industry. The term "export" covers shipments by pipeline, as well as by other means of transportation, such as ships, trucks and the like.

The last question to be asked is: Who is responsible for payment of the tax? The proposed new section 22.3 of the Excise Tax Act—I refer honourable senators to page 4 of the bill before us—makes the exporter liable. The term "exporter" includes 20 persons, firms, or corporations licensed to export crude by the National Energy Board, as well as any other person, firm, or corporation who exports, or attempts to export, crude from Canada.

There are other consequential sections empowering the Department of National Revenue to collect and enforce the tax imposed. These are contained in the new sections 22.4, 22.5 and 22.6 of the Excise Tax Act which are to be found on page 4 of the bill.

Part II of the bill deals with payments to the provinces from the money collected from the export tax imposed under the Excise Tax Act for the period ending April 1, 1974.

Honourable senators are aware, of course, that oil royalties are a source of revenue for the provincial government which owns oil resources. The rate of royalty imposed by the provinces is 22 per cent of the price of crude at the wellhead. For this reason, royalty rates rise and fall with the rise and fall of wellhead prices.

Beginning September 4, 1973, and on later dates, two things happened to affect the level of royalties. First, the federal government asked the oil industry to hold the price of crude oil to the wellhead price prevailing on September 4. Prices of crude oil and oil products on the world market were then beginning to rise. The action of the government and the compliance of the oil companies had the effect not only of freezing prices but also of freezing the provincial royalties payable at the level then prevailing for crude at the wellhead.

Secondly, the federal government imposed an oil export tax at the rate of 40 cents a barrel for October and November 1973; at the rate of $1.90 a barrel for December 1973; at the rate of $2.20 a barrel for January 1974; and at the rate of $6.40 a barrel for February and March 1974.

Presumably the addition of the oil export tax to the frozen price at September 4 would have been the price of Canadian crude in the foreign market in this period. If this had been the price received by the Canadian oil industry for all crude production in the six-month period from October to March, the industry would have received, in addition to the frozen price, an additional amount of approximately $1 billion. This would have been the higher wellhead price upon which royalties would have been levied at 22 per cent.

In other words, as a result of the freezing of the wellhead price at the September level, plus the imposition of the export tax, the provinces lost royalties of approximately $220 million, which is approximately 22 per cent of $1 billion. In addition to this royalty loss, the provinces claim further losses resulting from a reduction in the amount of collected income tax to which the producing oil companies would have been subject had they received the higher price for the crude.

For this reason, the federal government proposes to pay to the oil producing provinces 50 per cent of the oil export tax collected of $530 million, which amounts to approximately $265 million.

The distribution to each of those four provinces, based on their average oil production for the period, would be approximately as follows: To Alberta, $223.8 million; to Saskatchewan, $31.3 million; to British Columbia, $8.3 million; and to Manitoba, $1.6 million.

But there is another complication. As a result of making these payments to the four oil producing provinces, the federal government incurs an obligation by way of equalization payments to other provinces who receive equalization payments under the Federal-Provincial Fiscal Arrangements Act, 1972. The amount of this payment will be approximately $88 million.

There is no provision in the bill for compensation to any of the oil producing companies in Canada for revenue they would have had if Canadian crude had been allowed to be sold on the open market. However, the federal government has given a firm understanding that the federal portion of the revenues from the oil export tax over the period October 1973 through January 1974 will be invested by the federal government in Western resources.

Application of the federal share of the revenues derived in the months of February and March 1974 will be considered at the conference of first ministers on energy to be held between the 22nd and 24th of this month in Ottawa.

In summary, it should be emphasized that this is an interim tax measure, operating under the Excise Tax Act, which in turn self-destructs or terminates on April 1, 1974. The bill provides that the revenues derived from the tax will be shared equally between the federal government and the oil producing provinces. In addition, the federal portion of the revenues derived in the period from October 1973 to January 1974—a period of four months—will be expended for further research, development and exploration in the Western provinces.

Honourable senators, the bill before us is the result of a compromise reached by all parties in the other place. In Committee of the Whole several amendments were made with unanimous consent, after the house had agreed to an amendment to the ways and means motion upon which the bill was based. The bill was finally adopted in the other place without a recorded division.

In consequence, I commend the bill to the sympathetic consideration of honourable senators. Although I am not an expert, I will do my best to answer any questions that may arise in the course of discussion.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Before I move the adjournment of the debate, I wonder if the sponsor of the bill would explain the new section 22.3 of the Excise Tax Act, which appears on page 4 of the bill. It reads:

> A person who exports crude oil on which a tax is imposed under this Part in circumstances in which there is no exporter who is liable under this Part to pay that tax, is liable to pay that tax.

Hon. Mr. Macnaughton: As I pointed out to honourable senators, I do not pretend to be an expert on this bill. My understanding of this is that in this country there are at present 20 companies which are licensed by the National Energy Board to export crude oil. Should either the honourable senator or I get hold of a barrel of oil and wish to send it down to the United States, or to any other place, we, as a person, firm, company or corporation, would become liable to pay the amount of tax on that barrel of oil. In other words, no one can get away scot-free from paying the tax.

[Hon. Mr. Macnaughton.]

● (2050

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Honourable senators, before the debate is adjourned, I should like to draw to the attention of the house a number of errors that I have noted in the translation of clause 2 of the bill. Some confusion has arisen in the translation between the words "exportateur" and "exporter." In addition to that, the English text is in the reverse order of the French text.

I have already drawn the attention of the Clerk Assistant to these errors. I hope that they will be corrected before the bill is further considered.

On motion of Senator Macdonald, debate adjourned.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Hon. Paul Martin tabled:

Copies of contracts between the Government of Canada and the Towns of Fort St. John, Merritt and Quesnel, in the Province of British Columbia, for the use or employment of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, pursuant to section 20(3) of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Act, chapter R-9, R.S.C., 1970 (English text).

Report by the Textile and Clothing Board, dated December 12, 1973, to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, pursuant to section 19 of the Textile and Clothing Board Act, chapter 39, Statutes of Canada, 1970-71-72, respecting cotton yarns.

Report by the Textile and Clothing Board, dated October 31, 1973, to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, pursuant to section 19 of the Textile and Clothing Board Act, chapter 39, Statutes of Canada, 1970-71-72, respecting men's and boys' shirts.

Report of the Canada Council, including its accounts and financial statements certified by the Auditor General, for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1973, pursuant to section 23 of the Canada Council Act, chapter C-2, R.S.C., 1970.

Copies of a letter, dated December 10, 1973, addressed by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources to the President and Chief Executive of Imperial Oil Limited, Toronto, relating to the Government's general policy with respect to Alberta Oil (Tar) Sands Production.

Copies of Order in Council P.C. 1973-4020, dated December 18, 1973, amending Part I of the Schedule to the Hazardous Products Act, pursuant to section 8(3) of the said Act, chapter H-3, R.S.C., 1970.

Revised Capital Budget of Atomic Energy of Canada Limited for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1974, pursuant to section 70(2) of the Financial Administration Act, chapter F-10, R.S.C., 1970, together with a copy of Order in Council P.C. 1973-4083, dated December 20, 1973, approving same.

REGULATIONS AND OTHER STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS

STANDING JOINT COMMITTEE

Hon. Eugene A. Forsey: Honourable senators, although I have no report to present of the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and Other Statutory Instruments, with leave, I should like very briefly to give the house a little information about this committee, which honourable senators may have thought was lost, strayed or stolen.

We had some difficulty getting staff. We have now obtained staff. The committee met yesterday, and it is now, I think I may say, operational and has plans for holding hearings on certain matters immediately after the recess which we all expect in a short time.

I thought the house was entitled, after this long delay in hearing anything of this committee, to have this information.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Honourable senators, I am sure that we all welcome what Senator Forsey has just reported. It would be well to recall that over a period of two sessions the Senate had extended debate on the desirability of implementing the report standing in the name of Mr. Mark MacGuigan, M.P. We in the Senate were anxious to see that regulations of government, save those involving the security of the state and certain matters relating thereto, were examined by Parliament in some form. The decision to do this in the form of a joint committee was made by the other place and by the Senate. I am very glad that at long last some progress in setting up the operation of this committee has begun.

My own view is that time will show that the Senate has a useful role to play in the examination of regulations formulated under authority of the statutes of Parliament. I have a suspicion—and I am happy about this—that in one way or another Senator Forsey will give that committee the same continuity that the late Senator Roebuck gave to the Divorce Committee over which he presided on behalf of the Senate. That committee made a contribution that is often forgotten by those who delight in criticizing the Senate.

In any event, I am glad we have had this interim report. I regard this as an important matter, as does the government. I am happy that the wishes of the Senate in this regard, supported by others in the House of Commons, are being acknowledged.

CIVIL AVIATION

PROTECTION AGAINST HIJACKING AND TERRORISM—QUESTION

Hon. Martial Asselin: Honourable senators, I will ask the government leader whether or not he has had time to get a reply to the question I put to him on December 19, 1973 concerning hijackings. I believe the government leader—

Hon. Mr. Martin: We have had a reply.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: I answered the question, on behalf of the government leader, on December 21.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Reading Hansard is a worthwhile endeavour.

PROTECTION OF PRIVACY BILL

HOUSE OF COMMONS DECISION CONCERNING AMENDMENT MOVED BY SENATE—QUESTION

Hon. Martial Asselin: I shall ask a question. Can the government leader tell us whether there is a chance that the wiretapping bill, which was amended by the Senate, will come back to the Senate? What is the attitude of the government?

Hon. Mr. Martin: As you know, a proposal made by the Minister of Justice is now before the House of Commons. I understand that this proposal will be considered tomorrow in the other place. Therefore, tomorrow we may have a better idea not only of the decision or intention of the government, as the intention of the government is clear as concerns the amendment on the Order Paper of the House of Commons, but also of the position of the House of Commons. As far as I am concerned, I cannot say what this will be. Maybe the honourable senator can tell us what will be the position of his party.

I think that the position taken by the government is wise. I hope that it will also be the position of the House of Commons tomorrow, but we do not know.

Hon. Mr. Asselin: The newspapers were saying today that the government may withdraw the bill; has the government leader received any information about this?

Hon. Mr. Martin: Not as far as I know.

Hon. Mr. Bourget: They are not very good newspapers.

AIR TERMINALS

BAGGAGE HANDLING FACILITIES—QUESTION

Hon. Mr. Molson: Honourable senators, I should like to address a question to the Leader of the Government. I wonder whether it would be possible for him to bear to the government the message that the public of Canada today, which is travelling so very much by air, is being terribly incommoded at the airports, which are run by the Department of Transport, by great difficulties encountered in handling their baggage.

For those of us who are young, as in this chamber, it is not a problem. However, on many occasions in going through airports we see elderly people, and people who are not as strong as we are, having great difficulty in handling their baggage. We find, first of all, that there are no porters to assist the elderly or the handicapped, and, in addition to there being a lack of porters, that there are none of those little buggies into which people can hoist their baggage and get it out of the terminal.

If we are unable to organize a porter service for those in need of help, it would not really be beyond the bounds of capability to see that there are enough of those buggies such as we see in supermarkets so that at least there is some means of getting baggage off the roundabouts, or whatever those round things are called, and out the door. As it is at present, from my own personal observation, there is extreme difficulty encountered by the elderly, women and children. I have seen several examples of this during the last few weeks. It is not good, but it is quite susceptible to improvement, in my humble opinion.

Hon. Mr. Martin: I can certainly confirm what Senator Molson has said. I have had the same experience at, of all places, the Montreal airport. Although that may be the case in some airports, one would not have expected it at Montreal. As I say, I can confirm what Senator Molson has said and I will certainly see that the Minister of Transport and his department is given an opportunity to examine the matter raised.

Of course, this problem, as Senator Molson has said, does not really affect him or me. We have not reached the stage where we have to worry about our bags being vicariously transported.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: I presume that when Senator Molson referred to those "round things," he was referring to the baggage carrousel.

HON. THOMAS A. CRERAR, P.C.

COMPANION OF THE ORDER OF CANADA

Hon. Eugene A. Forsey: Honourable senators, I am sorry to rise again so soon after my previous remarks, but I should like to ask leave of the house to refer to the fact that a former very distinguished member of this house, and a very dear old friend of many of us here, myself included, the Honourable T. A. Crerar, the senior Privy Councillor in Canada, now in his 98th year, has been honoured by Her Majesty with the decoration of Companion of the Order of Canada.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Forsey: These remarks might perhaps more appropriately have come from some of the several senators here who were his colleagues when he was in this house, and who will remember the very distinguished speech which he made when he resigned just on the eve of his 90th birthday, still in the full vigour of mind and body, his eye undimmed and his natural force not abated.

I felt that the occasion should not be allowed to pass without some mention, and because of my long friendship with Senator Crerar I felt I might perhaps legitimately call the attention of this house to it. I think I may take the liberty of sending him a copy of the Senate Hansard for today, in which I think I shall be entitled to say that I express the feelings of the members of this house in extending to him our very hearty congratulations and good wishes on the distinction that has just been conferred upon him, and which is so well merited.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Paul Martin: I am sure that we would wish to join Senator Forsey in noting, with much satisfaction, the recognition paid to so distinguished a Canadian statesman and Privy Councillor as Senator Thomas Crerar, who now is enjoying the opportunity of reflecting upon an active life in his days of retirement in Victoria.

Indeed, Senator Crerar, a former member of this house, has had a career in the public life of our country that can be emulated by certainly no one now living, and as far as I know by very few, if any, in Canadian history. A member of the Union Government of Sir Robert Borden, and a member of the Government of Mackenzie King, Senator Crerar represented Canada at important international gatherings. He was a member of the House of Commons from 1917 until he became a member of this house in 1945, and for some years during that time he was one of the leaders of the farm movement in Western Canada. During all of this active public life he served Canada in a distinguished way. Recognition of him as Companion of the Order of Canada is simply an inadequate recognition of his great services to his country.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Perhaps I might, as a senator from Manitoba, whence Senator Crerar came, add my brief words to the congratulations of my two colleagues. Senator Crerar was certainly an outstanding Canadian. As Manitobans, we are very proud of his record in the field of agriculture before he entered politics and for many many years after in the field of politics. Some two years ago it was my pleasure to call on him personally at his home in Victoria, and I was pleased and impressed to see how he had maintained a close interest in what was going on here in this chamber, and also what was going on in politics in Manitoba. He was completely up to date in every detail. I had the pleasure of seeing his daughter in Winnipeg about three months ago. I had a good chat with her and she reported that Senator Crerar was in good health, very much interested in what went on in Canada, and still well informed on current events.

HON. ARTHUR LAING, P.C.
HON. L. M. GOUIN
HON. HENRY D. HICKS

FELICITATIONS ON RETURN TO CHAMBER

Hon. Mr. Martin: I would like to say to my colleague Senator Laing that we are very glad to see him back in his seat.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

[Translation]

We are also very happy to welcome here tonight Senator Gouin who is in such good health.

[English]

I welcome back to the Senate Senator Hicks, who has been away on public business. Senator Hicks has been a member of the Canadian delegation at the Assembly of the United Nations, whose deliberations have just come to an end. We look forward to having a report from him about those important three months which he spent as a member of the Canadian delegation.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Hon. Paul Martin tabled:

Report of the Superintendent of Insurance for Canada on Co-operative Credit Societies for the year ended December 31, 1972, pursuant to section 57 of the Co-operative Credit Associations Act, chapter C-29, R.S.C., 1970

Report of the Postmaster General for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1973, pursuant to section 80(2) of the Post Office Act, chapter P-14, R.S.C., 1970.

PROTECTION OF PRIVACY BILL

NEWSPAPER ARTICLE—STATEMENT BY SENATOR GOLDENBERG ON ROLE OF THE SENATE—QUESTION

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Honourable senators, I have an important question to ask the Leader of the Government.

I want to draw his attention to a statement alleged to have been made by Senator Goldenberg which I find disturbing, because he happens to be chairman of our Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee.

In this morning's issue of the Toronto Globe and Mail, in a column written by Geoffrey Stevens, we find the following statement:

> Liberal Senator Carl Goldenberg, the chairman of the Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee which struck out the clause, holds this view.

They are talking about the wiretapping bill, of course.

> Although he notes that the two Houses of Parliament are co-equal, he says: "The Senate . . . must bear in mind that its members are appointed and not elected . . . In the final analysis, the decision must be that of the elected House."

This is disturbing. I do not think that the Fathers of Confederation had that in mind when they formulated the policies and duties of honourable senators.

I would like to know whether his statement is accurately reported; and, if so, whether it is one man's opinion or represents the policy of the present government.

Hon. Mr. Goldenberg: Honourable senators, since Senator Choquette saw fit to quote me, may I answer the question? This was obviously my opinion. It is the opinion that I expressed and the opinion that I hold.

The same applies, I assume, to the paragraph following the one that Senator Choquette read. Senator Choquette is there quoted, and I assume that he is quoted correctly. I was not quoting the Fathers of Confederation. I was giving my own view.

[Later:]

[Translation]

Hon. Mr. Asselin: I would like to come back to the question asked by Senator Choquette. We have had an answer from Senator Goldenberg. However, I am under the impression that this issue is so important that we should first hear the opinion of the Government Leader on this matter which often comes up in the Senate.

I have read Senator Goldenberg's statement, to which Senator Choquette has referred, and once again last night Senator Denis said that this is a bill on election expenses, that it concerns the House of Commons and, consequently, that it is unnecessary to refer it to the committee.

I would like to know if the government majority in the Senate is under the impression that this chamber's only purpose is to approve blindly the bills submitted by the government or that it should review the bills, study them in detail and examine them to see if corrections or amendments should be made, since, as we are not an elected body, but an appointed one—as the honourable senators opposite have often said—should members of the Senate on the government side say "Well, here is a bill submitted by the government, we should not disturb their plans, we must therefore approve this bill as soon as possible so as not to harm the government". Or rather, are we not appointed so that we may indeed represent the democratic opinion of the people?

Normally, a senator should have no political affiliation. He is out of politics when sitting in the Senate. Should his role not be an objective one? Is he not there to protect democracy and the minority, and even though he may belong to a party sitting in the other place, should his role not be to put aside certain government pretentions concerning certain bills submitted to the Senate?

I would be very pleased if some day the government leader could tell us in a formal statement what is the role of senators and of the Senate.

I have always thought that it was not a good thing that the leader of the majority in the Senate be a member of the government, because he is then bound by ministerial solidarity and he must, under that principle, support cabinet decisions, especially when frequently in recent years we have heard comments in the Senate that we are not an elected body but an appointed one. Furthermore, it is not because the party in power, be it Liberal or Conservative, introduces pieces of legislation in the Senate that we ought to approve them in a few minutes, in a few hours. Is not the duty of the Senate rather to consider these bills thoroughly to find their shortcomings so as to improve them and preserve some democratic rights?

The appointment of senators is made in order to free these people from a political party so that they may vote in a more objective manner.

I wish the Leader of the Government would tell us, in due time, whether he will make a formal statement in this chamber as to what is, in his view, the role of the Senate and what the senators must do when they are called to vote on legislation, because in a case like that of the electoral legislation now before us we should not be required to pass it very quickly.

Senator Denis was saying in his speech yesterday that this bill belongs to the House of Commons and that it was not necessary to refer it to a committee. I believe it is nonsensical, illogical, to think in this way while we are sitting in this house. Therefore, I would ask the Leader of the Government when will he make an official statement on this subject?

Hon. Mr. Martin: Speeches are not allowed during the question period, for the rules provide such a period for the senators to ask questions. But if speeches are made during the question period, then it becomes impossible to maintain the order required for the good conduct of debates.

However, in answer—

Hon. Mr. Asselin: I rise on a point of order. If the Leader of the Government claims that my question is a speech, I could make it a question of privilege, and as a question of privilege, I believe the Leader of the Government will answer it.

Hon. Mr. Martin: I must say, in addition, that the fact that Senator Asselin, a distinguished senator, was appointed by a Liberal government, I feel it would perhaps be in the interest of the government to have a Senate where deliberations are led objectively. The bills do not come from the government. The bills we study here come, not from the government, but from the House of Commons.

Every senator has the right to express his views, as Senator Asselin has just done, and as Senator Choquette, my good friend, seems to have done in his interview with the representative of the Globe and Mail; and Senator Goldenberg has the same right.

ENERGY RESOURCES

SHORTAGE OF PETROLEUM PRODUCTS IN CANADA—QUESTION

Hon. Mr. Phillips: Honourable senators, may I direct a question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate?

What was the actual shortage of shortfall of petroleum products in the months of October, November and December 1973 in the Atlantic provinces and the province of Quebec? Was there an actual petroleum shortfall in any area of Canada? If so, what was the amount of that shortfall?

Hon. Mr. Martin: Honourable senators, by letter last Monday Senator Phillips gave me notice of his intention to ask this question. My reply is based on information supplied to me by the National Energy Board.

With respect to the three sections of the question, the Board informs me that in the months in question there were no shortages of any significance of petroleum in any part of Canada.

While the area east of the Ottawa Valley line, hitherto served by imported oil, was affected by international production cutbacks, this was offset by the efforts of the federal government and industry to move Western Canadian oil into this region.

This was achieved by movement of oil through the St. Lawrence Seaway until it closed for the winter. Shipments averaged about 90,000 barrels a day at closure. Shipments averaging about 70,000 barrels a day have also started to arrive from the West via the Panama Canal, and are expected to rise to about 100,000 barrels a day in the coming weeks. This, of course, is with regard to the past.

ELECTION EXPENSES BILL

BILL TO AMEND CERTAIN ACTS—SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from yesterday the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mr. Denis for the second reading of Bill C-203, to amend the Canada Elections Act, the Broadcasting Act and the Income Tax Act in respect to election expenses.

Hon. John M. Godfrey: Honourable senators, as is well known, I have a particular interest in this bill, which I will formally declare immediately. I am, and have been since the fall of 1968, the chairman of the finance and treasury committees of the Liberal Party of Canada, and in that capacity I have the overall responsibility for raising the funds for the federal Liberal Party, not only at election time but also to maintain its activities between elections.

My connection with fund raising on behalf of the Liberal Party goes back to 1959, when I agreed to take over the fund raising for the provincial Liberal Party in Ontario, and I did so for two provincial elections, until 1964, at which time I handed over to Senator Stanbury and swore solemnly to myself that never again would I take on that kind of a job.

The public—and to a large extent this is encouraged by the press—has many misconceptions as to how the federal Liberal Party raises money and what influence the chief fund raiser and large corporate donors have on the party and the government, and I would now like to take the opportunity, when discussing this bill, to set the record straight.

I have long held the view that there should be an election reform bill, and I have had some very decided views on what this bill should contain. In fact, when the Prime Minister asked me to take over the responsibility for raising funds in Ontario in the 1968 general election, I made it a condition of my accepting that he should bring in an election reform bill after the election. Of course, he readily agreed to that, because this was to form part of his platform in the 1968 election.

While I strongly believe in the necessity for an election reform bill on the fund raising side, it has not been for the same reasons as those put forward by most of the press and instinctively believed by the general public. The press and the public do believe two things. First, they believe that a large part of the money raised comes from companies doing business with the government and who contribute because of favours received or favours expected. Second, if giving is not actually tied in with doing business with the government, it at least gives the donor, because of his contribution, or the chief fund raiser, because of his position, some kind of evil influence with the government which may result in legislation favourable to the donor in particular or to the business community in general; or, in the alternative—and this is considered more likely—it may on occasion prevent legislation from being enacted which, while it would be in the public interest, is opposed by that portion of the business community represented by large corporate donors. By requiring full disclosure of donations to parties and candidates, it is believed that these rascals who influence legislation will now be unmasked, and I believe that the reason the NDP want this bill so badly is that they really believe it will greatly reduce the source of campaign and other funds for the two major political parties, because they think the type of contributions those parties normally receive would not stand the light of day.

Now, what are the facts? First, I would like to deal with how funds have been raised in the past. I think we should be careful to distinguish clearly between the methods used in the past by certain parties in power in the provinces and the federal field and the methods used by the federal Liberal Party in the more recent past, particularly since the Liberals took over the government in 1963. There is no question that in the past some provincial parties in power have resorted to methods which can only be described as corrupt—and I am not just referring to Quebec under Duplessis. For example, because of Fidinam we have seen evidence of how the provincial Conservative Party in Ontario raises its money. The federal Liberal Party under Mr. King went through its own well-publicized valley of humiliation because of certain practices indulged in during the twenties. I only mention this to show that it is understandable why the public and the press believe that the same kind of thing may presently go on in the raising of money for the federal Liberal Party.

I can well recall, as if it were yesterday, being called on in early 1959 by two eminent gentlemen who asked me to take over the job of raising money for the provincial Liberal Party for the 1959 provincial election. One of them had been responsible for raising the money in the previous provincial election and had, at that time or shortly afterwards, taken over the job of raising money for the federal Liberal Party. The other had worked closely with him. I remember so clearly their admonition to me that, if I took on the job, under no circumstances should I ever raise money on the basis of making any deal, promise or threat of any kind, either specific or implied. May I say that this was not only proper but sensible advice. Senator Aird received the same advice when he first became involved; he also took it very much to heart and repeated the same thing to me when I became associated with him before the 1968 federal election.

● (1420)

I might say that I was amused, upon my appointment to the Senate, to find that the translation of one of the mural inscriptions in the Senate Speaker's chambers makes somewhat the same point for political fund raisers. It comes from Livy and reads: "What is most honourable is most prudent."

When I was in charge of raising money in Ontario for the 1968 federal election, all canvassers were instructed to approach prospective donors on the basis that giving a donation was merely being a good corporate citizen, that there was nothing in it for anyone, and that they were merely supporting the democratic process and that they should give equally to the party in power and the official Opposition.

I was well aware that it had been traditional for corporate contributors to give 60 per cent to the party in power and 40 per cent to the official Opposition, and I might say that the provincial Conservatives in Ontario, during the many years they have been in power, have become somewhat greedier, in that they have suggested that the split should be 70/30.

It always seemed to me completely illogical, if a contribution was to be made by a public company on a non-partisan basis, that the party in power should receive more than the official Opposition. To me, such a practice might logically suggest, particularly to the cynical, that the donor was looking for something for his money, and that was why he was giving more to the party in power.

I am sure that when I adopted the practice of telling everyone that they should give equally to both the party in power and the official Opposition, some of our veteran politicians thought I was out of my mind. All I can say is that the results speak for themselves. I quickly found that corporate donors were very receptive to that type of approach, and by putting the request for funds on a high moral plane I am sure we were far more successful in getting corporations to raise their donations than if we had even vaguely hinted that there might be some undefined advantage in their giving and, for that reason, they should give more to the party in power.

Since I became involved in 1968, I can only recall four instances in which a prospective donor stated that what he might give would be influenced by some action, legislative or otherwise, which he wanted the government to take. I can recall how startled these gentlemen were when I told them forcefully and in no uncertain terms that the Liberal Party was not for sale, the government was not for sale, and that was not the basis upon which the Liberal Party raised or accepted money. In several cases, in order to avoid any misunderstanding, I repeated in writing that part which was printable of what I had told them verbally.

Of course, I received complaints from time to time, particularly as to pending legislation, and occasionally I have passed on the views of the business community to the appropriate minister. There is the president of one large corporation who, when I call him every year for their donation, gives the Liberal Party and the government a five-minute tongue lashing, which has now become traditional. When I tell him that for the kind of money his company donates he can, as far as I am concerned, call the Liberal Party and the government anything he wants, he simply laughs and cheerfully sends in their usual contribution.

When the 1972 election was over, I decided that I should have my books audited. These would show all moneys going through my hands, particularly moneys contributed by corporations with their head offices in Ontario, to the federal Liberal Party for and since the 1968 election. They would not, of course, show moneys raised by or on behalf of individual candidates. I asked Mr. A. J. Little to make this audit on a professional basis, and I insisted upon his billing me on their usual time basis. I chose him to make this audit for three reasons: First, he was a senior partner of Clarkson, Gordon & Co., a highly respected chartered accountancy firm in Canada. Secondly, at that time he was president of the Canadian Institute of Chartered Accountants. And, thirdly, as far as I knew, he had no political affiliations, and certainly had no connection with the Liberal Party.

I wrote Mr. Little a letter dated January 4, 1973, which I will now read:

> This is merely to confirm the following understanding which I reached with you yesterday, namely that you are to examine all of my records since I became involved in the fund raising for the federal Liberal Party before the 1968 election. I want you to examine these records with the following objectives in mind:
> 1. To satisfy yourself that proper records have been kept of the donations received and disbursed by me and that all such donations have been properly accounted for and were disbursed by me to or on behalf of the Party.
> 2. That as far as can be ascertained from the examination of my records and enquiries made from me that you are satisfied any contributions appearing in my books have not been solicited in breach of the Code of Ethics re Solicitation of Funds adopted by the Liberal Federation of Canada and approved by the Prime Minister, a copy of which I am enclosing herewith.
> 3. I would like you to become sufficiently familiar with the donations made for yearly maintenance and at election times and their relation to the size and profitability of the corporate donors making them that you could advise any prospective donor to whom I may refer you as to what would be an appropriate donation to each of the Federal Liberal and Conservative Parties at election times and for party maintenance purposes between elections, having regard to donations made by other companies, particularly those controlled in Canada and bearing in mind that it has been my policy, which has been approved by the Prime Minister, that public corporations should be told by whoever is canvassing them on behalf of the Liberal Party that they should donate equally to both the Liberal and Conservative Parties.

I would also like to read the Code of Ethics re Solicitation of Funds which was approved by the Prime Minister and formally adopted by the Liberal Federation of Canada in the fall of 1968, which was referred to in my letter to Mr. Little.

[Hon. Mr. Godfrey.]

> All contributions shall be simple unconditional donations and no solicitor shall either directly or by inference suggest to any donor that he may be entitled by reason of such donation to any favour, special consideration or representation of any kind with respect to proposed legislation, regulations or orders of the Government of Canada or any province thereof or to any contract, transaction or other affairs of any nature or kind whatsoever in which the Government of Canada or Parliament or any province thereof, their agencies and dependencies have a direct or indirect interest.

In my conversations with Mr. Little, I told him that in dealing with the second point, namely whether there was a possible breach of the code of ethics, I specifically wanted him to look at the contributions received, with the Fidinam case in mind. In other words, if we had ever received a donation of $50,000 from a company like Fidinam, it would stick out like a sore thumb and it would be obvious that a donation of that size would never be made by a company like Fidinam unless it was a payoff for favours received or expected.

After his audit, Mr. Little replied and gave me a clean bill of health, although he was reluctant to get involved in the fund-raising process as requested in the paragraph numbered 3 in my letter. I will only read that part of his letter dealing with the second point, which he heads "Method of Solicitation"—and I now quote:

> Attached to your letter of January 4th was a copy of the code of ethics regarding solicitation of funds adopted by the Liberal Federation, and, as requested, I reviewed your correspondence files to see what evidence there might be as to the method of solicitation used and possible expectation of any donor. There was no indication of any impropriety or any breach of the code of ethics in the documents I examined.
> On the contrary, there was evidence in at least three cases where the Code had been applied in a very strict fashion, and where it had been made perfectly clear to a potential donor that no special treatment would result from a contribution or from a threat to withhold a contribution.
> In addition to examination of the correspondence, I scrutinized the receipt book and the detailed ledger records to make sure that there were no unusually large donations or donations which might appear unusually large, having regard to the source. Again there was no indication of anything unusual or improper.

● (1430)

On the question as to whether corporate donations, particularly large ones, give the donor some kind of influence with the government, I must say that it is not only the public and the press who believe this, but many active Liberals, particularly young ones, who look with grave suspicion upon the source of campaign funds, but who cheerfully keep on accepting anything I give them and invariably ask for more.

What influence do these corporations have in return for their money? The answer is none. To begin with, I took the view—and I felt very strongly on this point—that no one in the government should know who gives or how much they give. Certainly some members of the government can make a pretty shrewd guess as to some of the companies that contribute, but I do not think any of them really have any idea how much individual companies give, and in my experience they could not care less. This does not come from their having any particularly high moral or ethical standards in this area. In my experience it comes from sheer indifference. So long as the money is somehow provided to maintain the party between elections and to fight elections, they do not want to know how it is raised or from where it comes. They want it raised properly, mind you, but that is from purely pragmatic motives, because they do not want a scandal which might hurt the government politically.

I have never seen the slighest evidence that any member of the government is the least bit interested in, or concerned about, whether or not anything the government does will influence the amount of money the party can raise. I have encouraged this attitude and have told members of the government that the members of the business community were, on the whole, highly responsible in this area, and that while they may make loud noises and breathe fire and thunder from time to time, when the chips are down, no matter what the government or the Opposition did, they would continue to provide reasonable financial support to the two major free enterprise parties.

Might I say that I have been proved right. In spite of dire predictions in the press to the contrary, including some completely fanciful accounts of my being thrown out of corporate president offices, the federal Liberal Party received greater financial support from the business community in the 1972 election than they had ever received before, and I am happy to be able to say that they are continuing their reasonable support for the maintenance of the party between elections, as they are no doubt doing for the Conservatives.

What about my own supposed influence on the government? Might I say that I have never seen any evidence to the effect that anything I say carries any special weight. In fact, I have always maintained, and have said so on numerous occasions, that I rated only Z in the political pecking order of the party. I never considered that I was being unduly modest, and I might mention that I was amused recently when I noticed in the Parliamentary Guide that since my becoming Chairman of the Finance and Treasury Committees of the Liberal Party of Canada, I was the Prime Minister's twenty-sixth appointee to the Senate.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Hear, hear. Is that not a nice reward in itself for a bagman?

Hon. Mr. Godfrey: Having said all this, and having explained how pure the federal Liberal Party has been in its fund-raising activities under Senator Aird's and my benevolent leadership, honourable senators may wonder why I have been such a strong advocate of electoral reform. There are several areas with which I have been concerned.

Firstly, in spite of everything that I have said, it did not seem to me to be right and proper that the two major political parties should be so dependent upon one segment of the country, namely, the business community, for financial support. Furthermore—I remember saying this when I was interviewed by the Toronto Star a couple of years ago—it concerned me that so much depended upon the integrity of the chief fund raiser. We have seen instances, not only in Canada, but south of the border, of what happens when that integrity is lacking. I was concerned at the enormous amounts of money being spent these days on federal elections at the national, provincial and constituency levels, and while I am firmly of the belief that money does not win elections, it is difficult to persuade party and candidates' campaign managers that this is so. I am convinced that had the Liberal Party as a whole, including candidates, spent $1.5 million less, or $3 million more, in the last election, it would not have affected the outcome in any single riding.

I was concerned that some individual candidates might not be as punctilious as they should be with respect to the sources from which their fund raisers raised money.

I was also concerned that very few individuals, particularly the party faithful, were not contributing to the financing of the two major parties. The very people in the party who were most voluble in expressing their disapproval of the dependence of the party on corporate donations were often the ones who made no financial contribution themselves, yet they had no hesitation in demanding greater expenditures by, or financial help from, the party. I was concerned at the growing cynicism of the press and the public as to how parties were financed, and that as a result our political system was being unjustly downgraded.

While, as I have said, and as Steve Roman can certainly testify, money does not win elections, I completely agree with the statement at page 28 of the Barbeau Committee Report:

> that candidates have legitimate electoral expenses, and must have means sufficient to enable them to explain to the electorate what Canada's domestic and international problems are, and their proposed solutions. The Canadian elector cannot otherwise cast his vote intelligently. Political parties and candidates must have at their disposal the financial means that will enable them to play their role of political educators, ideally without being bound to private interests to the detriment of the public good.
> . . . the Committee's enquiries have convinced it that the use of money is essential in the democratic process.
>
> The elector cannot make a sensible choice unless he is well informed. Keeping the electorate well informed means using the great communications media: radio, television, newspapers, printed flysheets, billboards, etc. If these media are to be used well, parties and candidates must spend very considerable sums of money. The sums are essential expenditures incurred in informing the public. It may be alleged that political expenditures do not always meet the aim of informing the elector and one may criticize the wrong or foolish use of money by parties or candidates; but one cannot dispense with the use itself.

Finally, I was concerned that since 1920, while our Federal Elections Act has provided for full disclosure by candidates of all contributions, and the amount of each contribution, few candidates have paid any attention to this law, and apparently, from my reading of the newspapers and conversations with reporters, the press and the public are completely unaware that this law even exists. So that there will not be any misunderstanding, let me repeat that since 1920 it has been the law that all federal candidates must disclose not just contributions over $100, but the names of all contributors and the amounts, no matter how small.

I would now like to discuss the reform measures I originally advocated, and how the bill compares with them.

Firstly, I believe that all candidates should make full disclosure of names of contributors, and amounts of over $1,000, and that it should be strictly enforced, even to the extent of asking for jail sentences where there were flagrant breaches. I believe that if one accepts the premise that the purpose of full disclosure is to help stop contributions which, because of their size and source, may possibly improperly affect our parliamentary or governmental process, or indicate that a favour has been received or expected, then surely we should set a reasonable limit for the size of contributions below which no one could possibly suggest that anyone would be improperly influenced.

It appears that I have ten times more confidence in the integrity of our members of Parliament than has the government, because I thought that no member could possibly be bought for less than $1,000. The government and the members of the Commons Privileges and Elections Committee seem to think that some members can be purchased or influenced for a lousy $101! Why else would they provide for full disclosure over $100? Like the secrecy of the ballot box, there should be, on the same principle, secrecy for political giving up to certain reasonable limits. Surely, a prosperous merchant in a small town should be encouraged and entitled to give more than $100 to the candidate of his choice without worrying about whether or not he is offending some of his best customers of other political persuasions?

Furthermore, I believe that logically there should be some tie-in between the amount upon which a tax credit can be claimed under this bill and the amount upon which there must be full disclosure.

● (1440)

The government, in this bill, wants to make political giving respectable and to encourage individuals and corporations to give up to $1,150 in any one year by giving them tax credits for contributions up to that amount. The government obviously feels that contributions up to this size are good and proper, and hopefully more people will make them. Surely, therefore, the amount of a contribution above which there should be full disclosure should, in all logic, be $1,150. Up to that amount you should be able to give without other people knowing who you are supporting financially, just as you can vote without other people knowing how you vote.

In the spirit of compromise I suggested, after this bill was introduced in the other place—and I might say that the executive of the Liberal Party of Canada unanimously agreed with me—that the figure of $100, above which candidates or parties must make full disclosure, be raised to $500. I also suggested that in order to prevent donors from evading the act by scattering their gifts—for example, giving 100 candidates gifts of $500 apiece—any donor must disclose donations made for political purposes of gifts of $500 or less which exceed $1,150 in total. Thus, to the extent of the amount that a donor is permitted to claim a tax credit, he could make anonymous contributions totalling $1,150 in any one year, so long as none of them to any one party or candidate exceeded $500. Thus, the local merchant could give $500 apiece to two candidates in his riding, if he wanted to support them both, without it being disclosed, but he could not give $600 to each without disclosure by the candidates. Nor could he give more than $150 to a party in addition to the $500 donations without his disclosing the excess.

How can one possibly say, on the one hand, that political giving up to $1,150 in any one year is proper and should be encouraged by tax credits and, on the other hand, say that there may be something fishy or suspicious about any donation over $100, so that it has to be disclosed? I have been saying this for years to anyone who would listen, but no one has paid the slightest attention to me. That is an example of the great influence I have with the government and members of Parliament!

I also mentioned that as well as having a higher and more realistic limit than $100, I was of the opinion that there should be very strict enforcement procedures. What I was really concerned about was that if the limiting figure was set too low and there were as many loopholes in the legislation as in the present Elections Act, it would continue not to be taken seriously. No more attention would be paid to this requirement by those candidates who wanted to cheat and avoid the spirit of the law—and they have hitherto been in the vast majority—than was previously paid to the requirement of full disclosure in the present act.

The Commons Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections has laboured long and hard on this bill. They have come up with several worthwhile amendments, although many of their amendments were really rather unimportant quibbling. In this area of full disclosure by candidates, however, in my opinion they have completely struck out. This bill is just as easy to get around legally as the present act, which has been in force since 1920. In fact the provisions are essentially the same, except that there have been provisions added in this bill which are designed to prevent getting around the disclosure proceedings by making donations to local riding associations. In the 53 years since the present act was passed there has not been one single attempt to enforce the full disclosure provisions with respect to contributions to candidates. It was only necessary, in order to comply with the act but avoid disclosure, for the donor to make a contribution to an unofficial collector, who in turn would contribute to the candidate's official agent. The candidate's official agent would not be informed as to the true source of the funds. Exactly the same procedure may be adopted under this bill.

It is almost incredible to me that the Commons committee, while they came up with a rather feeble amendment to try and plug this gaping and obvious loophole with respect to contributions to parties, completely ignored it with respect to contributions to candidates.

While it is really stretching the bounds of credulity, I am prepared to be charitable where others might not, and give the Commons committee the benefit of the doubt and say that they were not insincere when they neglected to plug this loophole; rather, they were just plain incompetent.

As to full disclosure of contributions to parties as opposed to candidates, I was originally opposed to this. I thought our system was superior provided that the government did not know who specifically were contributors and how much they gave. After all, full disclosure is a two-edged sword. Cabinet ministers are only human, and while they have been completely indifferent as to where the party funds come from, and could not care less how much is raised, provided they get enough at election time, they may, even if it is only subconsciously, be affected by actually knowing who are their friends and who are their enemies. Futhermore, when the public sees what large amounts our more public-spirited large corporations give to support the political process, they may cynically, and quite unjustifiably, think that there is something in it for them. I have even had personal friends say to me that there must be a specific quid pro quo, or corporations would not contribute. Possibly I was being over-sensitive, but even my own children, after Watergate, seemed to me to be eyeing me quizzically at the dinner table as if they were wondering what dear old Dad had been up to when he was raising money for the Liberals. In view of the Watergate disclosures and Fidinam, I have changed my mind and believe that full disclosure, so long as there is a reasonable limit below which anonymity may be retained, is, on balance, preferable. Furthermore, while it is too early to know exactly what position the large corporate donors will take, indications to date are very encouraging. When the bill was first introduced the tendency was for them to howl their heads off. Some even threatened they would not give if there was full disclosure. Since they have become convinced that the bill will become law, with the exception of two corporations—one of them this week—who say they are presently reconsidering their policy, I have heard no more of that kind of talk. In fact, just the opposite. Many chief executive officers have told me that they are pleased that at last these sorts of things are being brought out into the open, and they have no fears that they will be unable to live with the bill. I have had several corporations substantially increase their contributions, and they have frankly said they did so because they realized their previous donations were inadequate. They say that now that there is going to be full disclosure they do not want to appear to the public as cheapskates. The chief executive officer of one of our largest contributors says he is pleased because the public will now realize they do not give the enormous sums the public thought they gave.

Turning to the question of expenditures, I have always been a firm believer in and advocate of limitations on election spending. As far as candidates' spending is concerned, I think the limits proposed in the bill are reasonable and adequate. My opinion as to the limits on party spending, apart from candidates, provided in the bill—30 cents per elector—is that they are overly generous. However, these types of amounts are inclined to be firmly enmeshed in the law for many years, and with the present rate of inflation it will not be too many elections before these limits will have some real significance.

As to the question of subsidies, I have long been an advocate of government subsidies to parties and candidates, not only for election expenses, but also to help maintain parties between elections, although I do believe that any provision for government subsidization of political parties between elections should be provided for in some other act and should not be part of an election expenses act.

Here again, the government and the committee, in my opinion, collectively struck out with respect to one matter, and the committee alone with respect to another.

As to the first matter, the Barbeau Committee, the first bill introduced by the government, and a committee appointed by the Liberal Party of Canada some years ago all recommended that the 6½ hours of radio and television time should be provided free to the political parties, with the government paying half and the radio and television stations providing the other half free. This seemed eminently reasonable, because after all the licence given them by a federal government agency is, to quote Lord Thomson's famous and familiar cliché, a licence to print money in varying amounts. The very least the stations could do in return would be to only charge half price for 6½ hours of political broadcasting, as a public service, whenever there is a federal election.

● (1450)

In explaining why the government, in this bill, relieved the radio and television stations from this burden, Mr. MacEachen stated that Mr. Juneau of the CRTC was of the opinion that the money would be better spent by the stations on further Canadianization of their programs, rather than on picking up the tab on half the cost of 6½ hours of election broadcasting. Why the government and the Commons committee should meekly let Mr. Juneau make this decision for them has never been satisfactorily explained to me. The result is that the parties are not being subsidized to the extent they should be, and they are saddled with a financial burden which should have been assumed by the radio and television stations.

Incidentally, for several months now I have been trying to get the figures as to how much the total profits of all radio and television stations in Canada are for a year, but have been unable to do so. While I certainly thought it relevant information in determining whether the radio and television stations could afford to contribute half this time, apparently the government and the Commons committee did not think so, because this information does not seem to be in their hands.

In making these criticisms, I am not overlooking the provisions of section 99.1(18) inserted by the committee, which provide that, in addition to the 6½ hours broadcasting, networks must provide free "a number of program periods" to the parties in the same proportion as they are entitled to the 6½ hours. This is largely meaningless, as they do not stipulate how long or how many program periods. I understand that a program period, under CRTC regulations, can be anything over two minutes, so that the broadcasters can satisfy this requirement by making a token offering.

As to the second matter, I thought the subsidies to the candidates less than generous and only barely adequate. I thought having to get 20 per cent of the vote to earn them was too high, and that it should have been 15 per cent. I am delighted that the bill has been amended to provide the 15 per cent figure. One of the reasons I was persuaded that the subsidies to candidates were barely adequate was that the bill provided that the returning officer would send out the "You vote at . . ." cards, which would not only tell each voter where to vote but also reproduce the ballot to be used in the riding, thus identifying each candidate and his party. The candidates were prohibited from sending out a similar card, and a penalty provided if they did, thus providing an indirect subsidy by saving each candidate in the average constituency $3,000 in postage alone, which would then be available for other purposes.

This again was recommended by the Barbeau Commission and the Liberal Party Committee, because the two main purposes of the "You vote at . . ." cards usually sent out by each candidate just before the election was to tell the voter where to vote and to identify the candidate with his political party, so that those who were voting for the party rather than the candidate would know who to vote for. Now that the political affiliation of the candidate is to appear on the ballot, this second purpose is no longer important, but in any event would be covered on the card to be sent out by the returning officer.

For some incomprehensible reason the Conservatives in the Commons committee, supported by the NDP and one Liberal, deleted the provision in the bill providing for a penalty if candidates send out the cards, thus making the whole provision pointless, and the committee later, therefore, deleted the whole provision, including having the returning officer send out a card. Thus most candidates will feel they have to send out a "You vote at . . ." card, and they will all be burdened with this unnecessary duplication and extra expense.

What prompted the lone Liberal, the Conservatives and the NDP, of all people, to support this amendment and thus add an additional expense of more than $3,000 for each candidate in the average constituency is beyond my comprehension. While I want to be polite, the only word I can find to properly and adequately describe this amendment is "stupid", thus borrowing a word aptly used by the Minister of Justice in describing an amendment made in another bill by another Commons committee, with which we are all familiar.

As to tax relief for political contributors, I have always been a strong believer that this was essential if the base of political giving was to be substantially broadened. I will only say that in my view the tax credit provisions of this bill are reasonable and equitable.

I have already taken up too much time, and, while I could make other comments, I will now conclude by saying, firstly, that I support the general principle of this bill and will vote for it.

The problem is, what should the Senate do about the glaring and really quite outrageous loophole the Commons committee has permitted with respect to disclosure of donations to candidates? While the Elections Act is a particularly sensitive area for the Senate to deal with, and many think it is none of our business at all, I would say that this is a classical example of the kind of error in a Commons bill which the Senate should amend, so that the public will get what the public and the "watchdogs of the press" have been fooled into thinking they have got, namely, a bill effectively providing for full disclosure of donations to candidates over $100, and I was seriously considering proposing such an amendment. However, as I have explained, I believe the $100 limit is ridiculously low, and there is no rational explanation as to why it should not be at least $500. Why, therefore, should I propose an amendment to make workable a provision that I do not believe in?

The only way, therefore, that I would propose an amendment would be if the bill were amended to increase the $100 limit to $500, and I certainly do not believe that this is an area of the bill where the Senate should intervene. If the members of the other place insist on believing that they or some of their other members can be influenced by a donation of $101, why should we do more than tell them that we in the Senate have more faith in them than that?

The bill is essentially a non-partisan one, and the government, in the interest of getting the bill through, accepted all of the Commons committee amendments and did not try to interfere at the committee stage other than explaining the reasons behind certain provisions. The job of a Commons committee—and this applies to all its members of all parties—is to detect and correct errors and omissions in a bill, particularly when they come within an area where they should have particular familiarity and competence. They fell down on their job.

I think that the Senate will have, with this particular bill, performed its function by having one of its members inform the public that in this area of full disclosure by candidates they are not getting what the Commons committee and the press have led them to believe they are getting, namely, a bill effectively requiring full disclosure of donations to candidates over $100.

Might I say, in closing, that I do not think any useful purpose will be served at this time by referring this bill to a committee of the Senate. This would only be going through the motions, and it would, in my opinion, be a waste of time. Not that there is any urgency mind you, because the one thing I think all honourable senators will have no difficulty agreeing to is that there will not be an election this year.

[Translation]

Hon. Martial Asselin: Honourable senators, first of all I want to congratulate Senator Godfrey for his participation in the debate. Obviously, I shall not speak as a senator with as much experience as my colleague since I have never collected funds for a political party. Still, his reflections will help us better understand the merits of the bill before us and induce us to study it more seriously. I want to congratulate him.

My contribution to this debate will be very short. The mover of the bill said, last night, that basically this bill is intended to make more concrete participatory democracy in that more people will contribute financially to electoral funds. First of all, I want to say that I doubt it. I will say even more. Before going into the reasons for which I doubt the assertion made on presentation of the bill, I must say immediately that I am, in principle, in favour of the bill. Electoral expenses must be limited, it goes without saying.

[English]

Hon. Mr. Rowe: I hope the honourable senator will forgive my interrupting him, but we are not getting any interpretation.

● (1500)

Hon. Mr. Martin: We can't hear you!

Hon. Mr. Rowe: Madam Speaker, we are getting no interpretation at all.

The Hon. the Speaker: I have just sent word down that there is no interpretation coming through. I believe the system is now working.

Hon. Mr. Asselin: I will continue in French in the hope that you can now hear the interpretation.

As I was saying, election expenses should be restricted and candidates should obtain a partial refund of their election expenses. This legislation obviously is an improvement which will correct a deplorable situation in which the members of the House of Commons and the defeated candidates found themselves. It will be remembered that in the past, rich people alone could consider taking up a political career, because they had the means to pay for the expenses incurred during an election campaign. Many politicians after several years of active political life found themselves—to use a colloquial expression—out on the street utterly ruined because they wanted to pursue an ideal while lacking the financial means. There are many examples. I think that former members of the House of Commons sitting in this house could quote as examples some of their colleagues who jeopardized the security of their family. They became discredited in the eyes of their creditors and in many cases, ended up stony-broke. This bill will correct at least that unfortunate situation.

For 12 years I was the elected representative of my constituency. We had of course to raise funds to meet our election expenses. Some other members of Parliament in this house can back me up on this. I have never been able to go through an election campaign without being in debt for several thousand dollars and during four years I have had to meet my bank manager to reimburse from my member's salary the money borrowed for an election campaign.

This bill will have at least the advantage of affording those who do not have the money but who are talented a political career without putting their family in debt and without creating personal and extremely painful financial problems.

However, I am wondering about an aspect of this bill which provides that all contributions amounting to $100 and over should be declared under penalty of sanctions.

I do not think that this bill will change human nature. We know that the contributors to election funds and election campaigns have always been reluctant to see their names published. The reason for that is simple: more often than not they want to be on the side of the party in power. Donors do not want to have their names related to an opposition member's name from fear of losing their influence with the party in power. This is, I think, the general spirit of middle-class donors. In my opinion this bill will not change the way those people think. Therefore, this means that the party in power, as in the past, will receive a higher number of contributions than the Opposition party. We have had another example of that during the last election campaign when, according to an expert's study, the Liberal party spent $6 million, the Conservatives $3 million and it was said that the NPD had spent $350,000. I think this has always jeopardized the principle of equality of chances of competing political parties. If the names of the donors must be published fewer people will be participating in the financing of political parties.

What must be changed first, in my opinion, is the philosophy of donors. We might manage to undertake a popular educational campaign to convince donors that their donations will not necessarily be used to give them some political influence with the party in office, but that their contributions will be part of a social step to elect a really democratic Parliament. I suggest that the government and members of Parliament should begin to proceed to educate people as Senator Godfrey said a moment ago. I think too that not even 10 per cent of the population are aware that this bill is now before us. People will know about it probably when there is an electoral campaign, but at present people do not know one single item of the bill we are considering. I suggest that we should begin this popular education as regards donations that taxpayers are to make to election campaigns. The ideal would be that someone who contributes to a political party should be proud to admit it, to consider his donation as the frank expression of his preference for one form of government as opposed to another. But, as we cannot change human nature overnight, as I said, as a result of compelling a donor to disclose his identity, there will be fewer people who make contributions to electoral funds of candidates. Contrary to what the sponsor of the bill said, I fear that instead of increasing financial contributions of those who are less well-off, if there is no popular education in this direction, that this will decrease the number of less well-off people who want to contribute to electoral funds. Needless to say the same will occur for large corporate contributions.

To conclude, I think that compelling people to disclose their contributions is, in my opinion, a negative action. It would be more positive to assure people that they have nothing to fear as regards influence or reprisals if they contribute to a political party that does not win the election.

I would wish to make a further comment regarding the reimbursement of candidates' expenses in electoral districts, as mentioned in chapter 3 of the bill. I think there is some discrimination against candidates in rural districts, that candidates in urban districts and those in rural districts are not treated on the same basis. Everyone here knows that election campaigns are more expensive in rural than in urban districts. If I take a riding in the city of Montreal that has maybe 50,000 people, 50,000 voters, and if I compare it with a rural district with 35,000 or 45,000 voters, it will be found to be more expensive for a candidate to run in the rural district than in the urban riding because of additional expenses. However, the bill imposes a ceiling on candidates' expenses, on travelling expenses.

● (1510)

If you take a riding like that of Charlevoix where I was a member of Parliament for a number of years, where I had to travel distances of 200 to 250 miles, where I had 110 municipalities to visit, where there were three television stations on which I had to appear, where there were three or four radio stations where I also had to make speeches, where there were three or four weeklies—papers that exist in most of the larger cities in my riding—where I also had to make statements, then it becomes obvious that such a candidate's expenses are higher than those of a candidate in the city of Montreal where he can carry his political platform on only one radio or television station.

Hon. Mr. Deschatelets: Does the honourable senator mean that candidates in urban and rural ridings should not have been treated the same way?

Hon. Mr. Asselin: That is what I said at the outset, that they should not be treated the same way in this bill.

For example, I would say that in Montreal a candidate can visit his whole riding in a single day, and sometimes his riding will cover 10 miles whereas several rural ridings will stretch over 100 to 125 miles, and even more. Take, for example, the riding of Manicouagan which is 800 miles long, and the riding of Gaspé, including the Magdalen Islands, where Senator Langlois was a member which was a very large riding as well.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Three hundred and fifty miles.

Hon. Mr. Asselin: Three hundred and fifty miles long.

So I say that candidates in rural ridings and candidates in urban ridings should have been treated differently in this bill because of the reasons I just mentioned. I think it would be good if we had recommendations to make to the other place to have that taken into consideration.

Another comment that I would also like to make is this: the legislation refers to the appointment of an auditor of electoral expenses. He is appointed by the candidate and then the legislation also refers to a commissioner appointed by the returning officer to ensure compliance with the law concerning election expenses.

Of course, I have nothing against the auditors that may be appointed by a candidate, or an elected member, but I have the feeling that all auditors do not enjoy the same reputation and are not equally capable. What I wonder about is this: when the commissioner appointed by the returning officer has checked the work of the auditor appointed by a candidate, if there are any serious complaints to be lodged who shall be the judge of these complaints referred to the returning officer? Is it the returning officer? Does the bill provide that the returning officer shall report to the House the election expenses incurred by every candidate and table his report in the House? Who shall judge a serious complaint by a taxpayer to the returning officer? Obviously, the commissioner appointed by the returning officer will report to the latter.

[Hon. Mr. Asselin.]

Then will it be the returning officer who will decide whether the complaint is well founded?

Will he be the one to impose penalties? Will that be the duty of the House of Commons committees, will it be that of the Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs? What will be the authority?

Hon. Mr. Denis: It will be the chief electoral officer.

Hon. Mr. Asselin: It will be the chief electoral officer. If, as the sponsor of the bill has indicated, the chief electoral officer will decide whether a complaint he has received is well founded, I think that he is given too great a responsibility. I think that the serious complaints made to the chief electoral officer should be referred to a parliamentary committee sitting within Justice Committee of the House of Commons. In my opinion, these complaints should be checked and studied in depth by parliamentarians since they are themselves involved in the matter.

Moreover, I think as I said before that the chief electoral officer would be given too much responsibility if he were required to judge himself whether the complaints that he receives are well founded. As for me, I repeat that I would have preferred that a committee of the House of Commons be informed of complaints, and report if these are well founded, after which a report would be submitted to the Solicitor General who would take action as provided by the legislation.

Seven years ago, the Barbeau report suggested another formula. It recommended creating the position of "Registrar of Election on Political Science".

From what I have read in the Barbeau report, it seems that this registrar would have been independent from the chief electoral officer as regards the assessment of serious complaints concerning election expenses of the candidates or political parties. Since the chief electoral officer is the one who appoints returning officers, he has the responsibility of running the elections and also auditing electoral expenses.

I think I would have preferred the Barbeau formula, providing for the establishment of an independent body that could rule independently on the complaints drawn to the chief electoral officer's attention. Again, I would have preferred this Barbeau formula because, in my opinion, it would have given the legislation a higher degree of credibility. People would realize that it is an independent body which is not part of the legal process, which is not involved in the enforcement of the legislation and yet, which has to pass judgment on these situations. Therefore, I think that the voters, the public in general, would have more faith in the legislation now before us.

Finally, honourable senators, notwithstanding some weaknesses, this bill meets with our approval. May it prove to be the first step in the rehabilitation of our political customs, the guarantee of the participatory democracy which is oriented, I think, toward a more realistic concept.

Hon. Mr. Molgat: Honourable senators, I should like to direct a question to Senator Asselin. Early in his remarks, speaking of expenses, he quoted some figures. Were these expenses in any way connected with the last federal elections?

Hon. Mr. Asselin: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Molgat: In my opinion, if he quoted expenses of $6 million and $3 million for the Liberal Party and the Progressive Conservative Party, respectively, his figures are not right.

Hon. Mr. Asselin: I quoted these figures from a paper prepared by a University of Ottawa professor who made a special study of this, as well as from the Globe and Mail or some other newspaper which I have in my office—I even have clippings which I could show you. Besides, I said that those figures had been provided by an expert—I am neither a member of the Liberal party nor an official of the Conservative Party Finance Committee—and I have no idea how much the Progressive Conservative Party or the NDP did spend. However, I know this paper has been prepared by an expert who is not involved in politics. He stated that the Liberal Party must have spent $6 million, the Progressive Conservative Party $3 million, and the NDP $350,000; however, he was unable to come up with any figure for the Social Crediters.

Hon. Mr. Molgat: I do not think that these figures are accurate. Senator Godfrey quoted figures too.

● (1520)

[English]

Hon. Mr. Godfrey: Senator Molgat, the interpreter could not hear you.

Hon. Mr. Molgat: The statement was made earlier by Senator Asselin. He said he obtained the figures from newspaper reports, and cannot vouch personally for their accuracy. The expenditures in the course of the last election were given as some $6 million for the Liberal Party, $3 million for the Conservative Party, and $350,000 for the NDP. I do not believe these are accurate. I wondered if you, Senator Godfrey, could give us accurate figures.

Hon. Mr. Godfrey: I wonder if I could reply to that, because I, on behalf of the Liberal Party, gave the figures to Professor Paltiel that were referred to by Senator Asselin. He also received figures from the Conservative Party. Those figures given to Professor Paltiel were published in a paper given by him in August.

The Liberal Party had raised $6.5 million and they paid off $600,000 in between-election debts, bank overdrafts, and so on, that they had incurred long before the election was called. The Liberals came out of the election with a surplus of $600,000, so that the amount actually spent by the Liberal Party on the election was $5,300,000, according to those figures.

The Conservative Party replied to Professor Paltiel, and they reported that they had raised $3,980,000, I believe it was, and that they had spent somewhat more than that. So they spent a bit over $4 million as compared to the Liberals' $5,300,000.

[Translation]

Hon. Leopold Langlois: Honourable senators, I have no intention of making an extensive speech. I will be content simply to point out some aspects of the bill that seem to me to be somewhat lacking. Moreover, my main purpose is to ask the sponsor of this bill a question which I find of great importance.

However, before going any further, let me first congratulate the sponsor of this bill for the magnificent way in which he carried out his task, as he always does, and on behalf of our colleagues, I thank him and I congratulate him again.

I agree completely—as an introductory comment—with the observations made by Senator Asselin regarding the cost of electoral expenses in rural districts, for I have myself represented a rural district during twelve years in the House of Commons.

I was elected in a riding which had a total shoreline 315 miles long, not counting one lost island, or rather some islands, for there were five, in the Gulf of St. Lawrence, that is the Magdalen Islands.

That riding included three and one half provincial ridings. In that riding there were no means of communication by rail, all travelling had to be paid by the candidate himself and done by animal-drawn vehicle or car. On top of that, to go to Magdalen Islands in those days you had to cross two other provinces—New Brunswick via Moncton and then to Charlottetown in Prince Edward Island—to reach Magdalen Islands by plane, a flight of 65 miles from Charlottetown.

Election expenses in a riding of this kind were very high. Indeed, they were very high because that riding was a bilingual riding and all the advertising, speeches, meetings had to be multiplied by two and in several towns in my riding I even had to hold one meeting for the French-speaking electorate and an other for the English-speaking electorate.

Radio advertising—there was no television in those days—was the same thing because there was no radio station in that electoral district and I had to leave the riding and go and talk to my people from Rimouski or New Carlisle stations. Those who know the area realize the expenses incurred through travelling of this kind.

Also, Senator Asselin mentioned that after some of his election campaigns he had to go and meet with his bank manager to make arrangements to repay his election debts out of his salary. I would add that the salary paid to a member of Parliament when I was first elected to the House in 1945 was only $4,000 per session. There were not in those days any tax free expense allowances as we have them today. On top of that, we even had to pay for our own phones on our own desks in our offices in the House of Commons. All this to say that the situation has changed tremendously.

However, it must be considered that the dollar was worth more in those days than today but I do not think that inflation was entirely offset by the increase in salaries although expenses went up a lot because sessions are somewhat longer today in spite of the fact that during the postwar period sessions were quite frequent; but we had that loophole anyway that we were paid on a sessional basis and we could in one year receive two allowances. It was inadequate compensation for the expenses incurred but it allowed us to float, so to speak, at best and often in the red.

I would now like to come back to the bill before us. I want to point out that I find the provisions of the following clauses to be somewhat too weak to meet the situations which may arise.

First I would like to refer this house to clause 13.2, subclause 1 on page 9 setting a limitation on expenses of registered parties. I think that this limitation is not clear enough and should go farther defining more exactly what is considered an expense of a registered party. I will show later the consequences of such a failure or such vagueness.

You find in subclause 1 of the same clause the definition of the amounts not included in election expenses. Once again, I find this definition inadequate and it should be further determined what is an election expense of a party, what is included in an expense of a national political party in relation with the expense of a local candidate, because it can happen as it did during the last Quebec elections that a political party takes the opportunity to obtain more money—such occurrence is less possible at the federal level because the Quebec legislation goes further since it provides a refund to the party as well as to the candidate—while the bill now under consideration only provides a refund at the level of the constituency or to the candidate. Still it could be possible with some skill or some scheme to circumvent a legislation and misappropriate an expense provided under that legislation for the direct election of a candidate and use it for advertising at the national level.

For instance, take the case of a political party that runs candidates throughout this country but stands no chance of winning even a few of these seats; however, it claims the amounts provided for these candidates who get 15 per cent of the votes but whose expenses are not included at the national scale. That happened at the last general election in Quebec where a party took an enormous advantage of such a shortcoming in the law by merely waging a campaign on such a basis simply to show the people that it was indeed a provincial party. Also, announcements were sponsored and paid for, and that was indicated in the announcement made by the television station that this was made by candidates of that party who ran in Beauce or in the most remote parts of the province where that party knew it had no chance of winning.

I suggest that this amounts to embezzlement. However, although my consideration of the bill now before us has been superficial and I did not go into any depth, I tried to find out whether it was provided in this legislation, either by going further into the definitions of what must be considered as expenses at the national level, an expense made by a registered party, or by defining more clearly what is included in a candidate's expenses, so as to prevent any possibility of having this transfer of expenses from one level to another and thus take advantage of this to ignore the terms of the clause which limits expenses. For instance, clause 13.2 allows a registered party to get 30 cents per voter registered on preliminary lists. If one can draw from a candidate's budget an amount of money to pay for the party's expenses on a national scale, I believe the law is being distorted. I would even say that it is a misappropriation.

Hon. Mr. Asselin: According to you, could the Social Credit Party, that has candidates almost only in Quebec, have under this new legislation candidates in all constituencies throughout Canada and use money from candidates from other provinces to pay debts in Quebec?

[Hon. Mr. Langlois.]

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Yes, it would be possible, but there would still be the 15 per cent of registered voters.

Hon. Mr. Asselin: Of expressed votes.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Of expressed votes, I beg your pardon. Not of registered voters but rather of expressed votes. That can be done and that is why I should like to ask the sponsor of this bill if I am right in believing that the bill before us allows such a thing and, if the wording of the law does allow it, was there something provided in the implementation mechanism of this legislation to prevent such an abuse, to prevent people from evading in such a way the object of the law by misappropriating funds from the public treasury, that will be paid for the election of a straw candidate in a constituency, in order to pay expenses on a national scale? I believe that is a very important matter. I think that if the bill as presented today becomes law, they will have to move quickly after its passage to prevent abuses of that kind.

● (1530)

[English]

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, I would like to make a few brief remarks before the debate on the bill is concluded.

I appreciate the explanation given by Senator Denis. I was rather intrigued by the fact that he felt that those of us on this side of the house might wish to criticize him. He is such an accurate, congenial gentleman that it would be difficult for me to find a reason to criticize the honourable senator, and certainly I have no criticism of his explanation of the bill.

I do not have the experience in fund-raising that Senator Godfrey has. In fact, I have great difficulty in obtaining a loan, let alone a donation. However, I felt that he was very much like the Shakespearian lady in that he protested a little too much. I was intrigued by the amount of time he spent collecting funds for the Progressive Conservative Party. I thought he was following the old Presbyterian system by which a congregation looking for a new clergyman would invite a number of clergymen to come in and deliver a sermon. This is what was known as preaching for a call. He has already received his call from the Liberal Party, and I thought he was speaking to Premier Davis of Ontario and telling him he expected a call from him, too.

Along the same line, I might remind him that a former Dean of Canterbury, when asked his opinion of confession, said that it is good for the soul but damned hard on the reputation. I hope he has not done his reputation too much harm today.

My main purpose in rising today was to say that I doubt this bill will accomplish everything that the members of the other place expect. I agree with those honourable senators who have suggested that there be certain changes made in the bill. The House of Commons started fooling around with this bill last May, and if by now they have not arrived at a solution that is satisfactory to them, I do not see why we should concern ourselves greatly in this regard. They have made their own bed; they will have to lie in it.

I feel we are boxing both the parties and the individual candidates into a specific limit that may not be very realistic in ten years time. It will be just as difficult to change that limit in ten years time as it is to get a change in members' salaries.

I agree with the audit and the publication of the list of donors. That is a very good idea. The Progressive Conservative Party has always been accused of receiving its support from large corporations. According to the figures given by Senator Asselin, the number of large corporations must be declining. According to those figures the Progressive Conservative Party got half the contributions the Liberal Party received. The Liberal Party, in turn, has always been accused of getting a great deal of its funds from the Unites States. Publication of donors' lists will destroy these myths.

The New Democratic Party has always been accused of receiving large donations from the labour unions. The Canadian Labour Congress has approximately 1.8 million members, of which approximately 278,000 are in unions directly affiliated with the New Democratic Party. Formerly these people made a small monthly contribution of 5 cents per month, 60 cents per year, which amounted to approximately $170,000 annually. As of the first of January this year that amount was raised to 10 cents per month, so the total will be approximately a quarter of a million dollars yearly. In addition, various locals contribute somewhere in the vicinity of $500,000 over a four-year period.

I saw Mr. Lewis on television when the last election was called, at which time he announced that they were running their election on $350,000. I should like to see that statement audited. I do not think it was a very accurate statement—certainly no more accurate than his usual statements. If the NDP only had $300,000 left out of those contributions, there was not a corporate rip-off but a Lewis rip-off.

I would point out to honourable senators, that neither the Conservative Party nor the Liberal Party allow those who make contributions to their election funds to send delegates to their conventions, whereas the New Democratic Party does allow its affiliated unions to send voting delegates.

Hon. Mr. Forsey: Well, naturally. What else do you expect?

Hon. Mr. Phillips: Then it would be quite in order, Senator Forsey, for someone who made a donation of, say, $1,000 to either the Progressive Conservative Party or the Liberal Party to turn up at the convention saying that he had a right to be a delegate because he had contributed that amount.

Hon. Mr. Forsey: If he is elected by the constituency association.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: But these are not elected by the constituency associations. They are elected by the unions.

Hon. Mr. Forsey: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Are you still a CCFer, Senator Forsey?

Hon. Mr. Phillips: I do not believe he is, Senator Choquette. I thing he is firmly under the wing of Senator Martin.

Hon. Mr. Forsey: Don't be too sure.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: The CCFers were really Liberals in a hurry.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: One point that does concern me is with respect to broadcasts 48 hours prior to an election. This is one point that I feel will have to be very carefully watched. I can see the PR men for all parties announcing public opinion polls, having made them into the form of a news item when they are actually a form of political advertisement. Great care must be taken in the last 48 hours to ensure that a broadcast is specified as political commentary, and not a general news item.

I should like to direct a question to the sponsor of the bill. I am wondering whether donations made to candidates in the case of a national party leadership convention will be declared. I am uncertain, after reading the bill, whether this will be part of the annual party audit, or whether it will be outside the audit. I fully realize that Mr. Turner will not need any contributions after the next election to depose Mr. Trudeau. However, the Conservative Party has a history of having a few more leadership conventions than does the Liberal Party. That is probably why I have such a great curiosity in this regard.

Hon. Mr. Forsey: They devour their leaders.

[Translation]

Mr. Asselin: Since Senator Langlois and others have asked some questions, some explanations, should this bill be referred to a committee?

Hon. Mr. Denis: I understand that another senator intends to say a few words. Nevertheless, I shall attempt to answer the honourable senator's question.

[English]

Hon. Raymond Joseph Perrault: Honourable senators, as one who was associated some years ago with the broadcasting industry, I have a few remarks to make.

● (1540)

I think it is interesting to note that the measure before us will permit the broadcast media of Canada to present editorial commentary literally to the very moment of balloting. This has not been permissible to this time. As honourable senators are aware, there has been a blackout, and the blackout was instituted some time ago in order to prevent a roorback situation from developing, a last minute political charge made on radio or television—a charge very difficult to counteract, and perhaps slanderous in content. In fact, as one who has been victimized in this manner, I can say that it is impossible to answer last minute commentary of that kind—completely impossible.

I want to suggest to honourable senators that, while all of us support free speech—and I am not going to oppose this particular change—the fact that we are now about to permit any editorial commentator on any radio station in Canada to broadcast political opinions up to the very moment of balloting will require a very special form of vigilance, not only on the part of the broadcasting industry but on the part of the Canadian Radio and Television Commission—a body which, at times, has been very reluctant to exercise any kind of leadership in this direction.

The bill states, as honourable senators are aware:

> Every registered party that, through any person acting on its behalf,

> (a) between the date of the issue of the writ for an election and Sunday, the twenty-ninth day before polling day, or on polling day or the one day immediately preceding polling day advertises on the facilities of any broadcasting undertaking as defined in section 2 of the Broadcasting Act . . .
> for the purpose of promoting or opposing a particular registered party or the election of a particular candidate is guilty of an offence against this Act and is liable on summary conviction to a fine not exceeding twenty-five thousand dollars.

However, it does not deal at all with the situation where a political commentator who may happen to dislike, with a personal venom, the Conservative Party, the Liberal Party, the New Democratic Party or any other political entity in this country, can broadcast his opinions, without contravening this act, to the very moment the voter goes to the polls.

There are real dangers here—extreme dangers. The airwaves of Canada are public. They are not the personal possession of any group of investors who may for some reason wish to have a certain election result obtain. They are not the possession of a small group of people, whatever they describe themselves as—editorialists or open-line commentators—some of whom may believe that they have the absolute freedom to inflict their unchallenged, last minute views on the voter. If free speech is to be protected in this country it means that divergent views have a right to be heard on radio or television, whether on the CBC program Viewpoint, or on open-line shows in Vancouver, Winnipeg, Montreal, Toronto and Halifax. It means, for example, that the fairly recent phenomenon of open-line broadcasting has to be watched extremely closely by the Canadian Radio and Television Commission and by the industry, so that fair play and balance be maintained.

None of the open-line broadcasters should have the unfettered right to inflict their own partisan opinions on their listeners without permitting equal time for those who have been attacked and criticized, and this is not always the case in Canada today. It is vital that the traditional Canadian concept be observed—that on the public facility of the airwaves balance must be maintained.

Most of the editorial commentators on the radio and television stations in Canada do a commendable job in their efforts to assure that all opinions are given a fair hearing. However, I assure you that after discussing this particular section with representatives of the broadcast industry, public and private, there is real concern on the part of some about what Parliament is creating in the way of opportunities for biased editorial broadcasting and commentaries to election time, and on election day.

A minority of editorialists across this country, in the radio and television industry, look on the hours of broadcast time made available to them as daily opportunities to inflict partisan bias on their audiences, without any fair opportunity given for the other views to be heard. I submit that the legislation, as amended, will present for the irresponsible few an unparalleled opportunity to launch final hour campaigns on behalf of their political favourites. In my view, assurance should be sought from and be given by, the broadcasting industry, that through self-policing they will not permit this abuse of the airwaves prior to Canadian elections. As well, this body and the other place should seek assurances from the CRTC that there will be careful monitoring of the way this new right is exercised by the broadcast industry.

I am not talking this afternoon in favour of restricting free speech, but rather of extending free speech and fair play. I fear that, misused, this new right of radio and television stations to engage in roorback, if they so desire, will provide the irresponsible few with a final hour opportunity. The right of free speech must not be distorted by some open-line commentator or editorialist who permits his political bias to overcome his sense of fair play, particularly during the critical closing hours of a campaign, when broadcast remarks are simply impossible to counteract or contradict.

While I certainly intend to support these election reform measures, I feel that this chamber should be made aware of the deep concern being felt today by responsible people in the broadcast industry, and I feel we must seek the assurances that I have suggested.

Hon. Mr. Molson: I wonder if the honourable senator would permit a question. In speaking just now he seemed to be referring largely to the independent stations. He spoke about groups of investors, open-line radio stations, and so on. Does he include in his views the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and Radio Canada? We have had a great many examples on those particular networks of opinions which are decidedly biased in directions that some of us think are inimical to Canada.

Hon. Mr. Perrault: I endorse the remarks of my honourable colleague. One of the considerations which has inspired my remarks this afternoon is experience with that to which he has referred, relating to certain broadcasting by the public corporation. I most certainly believe that these assurances have to be sought from not only public broadcasters in this country but the private sector as well. I appreciate the opportunity to clarify my position.

Hon. Azellus Denis: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: I should inform the Senate that if the Honourable Senator Denis speaks now his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on second reading of this bill.

● (1550)

[Translation]

Hon. Azellus Denis: Honourable senators, it is getting late so I will not keep you too long. First of all, I want to thank all those who had kind words for me. I also thank them for their remarks concerning the bill. There have been more compliments than critical remarks.

Of course, this bill is an in-depth reform. It is a new experience. It goes without saying that, in spite of all the discussions and studies of the past, whether it be those of the Barbeau commission or Commons committees, or those related to the Elections Act introduced in 1970, or the statements of experts in committees, or the amendments moved in committee at the other place, a bill such as this one or any other to my mind is not a total loss. As Senator Godfrey said, there are some loopholes in it, but there are loopholes in every law.

Let us see what the next elections reveal, through its practical application, what those loopholes are, what its weak spots are, that they can be remedied. I still think this is a giant step towards improving and democratizing Canadian elections.

A while ago, my friend Senator Asselin said that no one knows that we are amending this reform. There are people who are aware of it—that is, public opinion—and those who today are the most critical of the bill are precisely those who clamored for similar amendments. The independent parties or the new parties are those that have always claimed that the major parties were thieves, manipulators, people who were millionaires, and that nobody knew how much money they were making. Today, now that it has been decided that the amount of the contributions and the names of all contributors will be disclosed to the public, these independent or new parties, the pure who claim to be the purest among the pure, complain that it is not enough still and that some people will circumvent the law. Laws exist as this one does, as all other laws. In reply to my honourable friend Senator Choquette—perhaps I did not elaborate enough in answer to his question—we all know that whatever the law, be it civil or criminal, there are always people who will violate it. But this law has something special because all precautions have been taken in order to try to prevent it from being violated.

The only proof I want in this bill is the appointment of a sworn auditor, a certified accountant, who will make a complete study of all election expenses. He will have access to all records of the registered agent. He will be able to force the registered agent to produce vouchers. Consequently, the commissioner who is under the surveillance of the Chief Electoral Officer is directly involved with the enforcement of the law.

Moreover, as I said earlier, whether a candidate or an ordinary citizen finds a serious mistake he only has to report it immediately. The commissioner appointed under this bill will then make an inquiry to discover any breach of the law.

Someone has mentioned the rich candidates who give $25,000 to five guys. Under the law the candidate is entitled to spend for his personal expenses up to $2,000—and this was provided for in the former law—and any amount in excess of those $2,000 must be paid by the official agent.

Second, all donations and contributions must be paid to the official agent. Consequently the candidate has no right to give spending money to every Tom, Dick and Harry. Moreover the five guys mentioned by my honourable friend are not entitled, under the law, to spend that money because if they do they are liable to a fine from $1,000 to $5,000 since only the official agent is allowed to spend money.

And of course any candidate breaking the law will have his election questioned. He is also liable to a $5,000 fine; I think this was in the old act and it is also included in the Dominion Controverted Elections Act, section 78.

I hope that answers the question of my honourable friend, Senator Asselin, who asked who would deal with this. With all his experience, he is well aware that if a candidate who is elected has done anything fraudulent, there will always be someone to sign an affidavit that he has behaved badly, that he has had too many votes or that he has spent too much money, and depending upon the seriousness of the offence on the part of the official agent or of the candidate, he can either have his election annulled, be deprived of his right to vote or be deprived of his right to be a candidate for seven years, I think.

This is included in the infractions punishable under the present legislation.

Some have also complained that rural ridings were larger and require greater expenses than urban ridings.

Yet, in reading on page 17 the expenses allowed candidates, at the bottom of the page, in clause 7 which contains clause 61.1, you will note the following:

> (3) In determining, for the purposes of this section, the amount of election expenses incurred by a candidate directly or through his official agent or any other person acting on his behalf,
> (a) there shall not be included any amount in respect of the candidate's travelling expenses;

This means that you may spend one dollar, 50 cents, 25 cents per candidate and $2,000 or $3,000 for travelling expenses.

Coming back to—I beg your pardon?

Hon. Mr. Asselin: For someone who has 40,000 constituents.

Hon. Mr. Denis: The $3,000, the least of the amounts of $3,000 or one cent per square mile of the riding, is in excess. But I do not think that the riding the honourable senator has represented is part of the ridings referred to in Schedule III. I believe that there are only two ridings in the province of Quebec that are included in Schedule III that is Abitibi and Manicouagan.

Moreover, this legislation provides for the reimbursement of travelling expenses for candidates whose ridings in Schedule III are a bit larger than others.

As regards the question asked by my friend Senator Langlois about some provincial parties that used lots of advertising and signed the name of a riding's official candidate, which was not included, therefore, in the expenses of a registered party, I suggest that nothing in the provincial legislation prevents a registered party from spending 25 cents per voter.

● (1600)

Now, in candidate's expenses, this publication that costs $1,000, for instance, or $2,000, is included in the candidate's expenses. Therefore this amount is deducted from other election expenses to which the candidate is entitled. This is different from provincial legislation since, under the present bill, the less money you spend the less you attain the maximum allowed, the higher the proportion of your reimbursement is, given the partial reimbursement made to candidates under the present bill. But at the provincial level, as the refund is proportional to the expenses, the more the candidate spends, the higher the refund he gets, which is approximately 50 per cent. I think that my good friend Senator Martial Asselin, my friend Senator Langlois and others speak here about the separatist party which advertised this way.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: I did not name any party.

Hon. Mr. Denis: No, but it is the one as I have myself seen full pages of advertising for the separatist party paid by the official agent of a riding.

Well, I can tell you that, as normally the partial refund amounts to 50 per cent, you and I have paid half of the separatist party's promotion.

But as regards protection in the present law for such kind of advertising, here is what I read on page 6:

> Subject to this section,
>
> (a) all money provided by an individual other than the candidate or by a corporation, trade union, unincorporated organization or association—shall be made by a registered agent.

So, we have in the law the registered agent and consequently all advertising shall be made and paid by the registered agent and this would mean, for instance, having it paid by the party and not by the candidate.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Does the sponsor of the bill feel that the expression "registered agent" contained in the clause he has just quoted in part includes the official agent of a candidate?

Hon. Mr. Denis: No, it only means the registered party. Instead of having an official agent for the registered party, it is the chief agent who must, at the same time, appoint an auditor, just as the candidate who has an official agent and an auditor.

A few minutes ago, I heard Senator Asselin speak about election debts. What he said is exactly what I said yesterday. That is why I liked that part of his speech, because it is exactly what I said.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Are you by any chance accusing him of having lifted part of your speech?

Hon. Mr. Denis: No, I must congratulate him on his good taste. I also compliment Senator Godfrey for telling us how well he performed when he was holding such an important position, how much the important image they want to give us is false and how much he worked in order to have this bill amended. There might or might not be differences concerning the amounts that are given or to be disclosed. It is a question of dollars, it is all relative, arbitrary, and we will see what happens. I am sure that the individual who wants to give $100 and who knows that he will get $75 back from the Taxation Department will only be too happy to contribute to Canadian election campaigns. These reimbursements will also result in lower election expenses and better off candidates after the election.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Denis moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

Motion agreed to.

OIL EXPORT TAX BILL

The Senate resumed from yesterday the adjourned debate on the motion of Senator Macnaughton for the second reading of Bill C-245, to impose an oil export tax under the Excise Tax Act and to allocate certain of the revenue derived from the oil export tax.

Hon. John M. Macdonald: Honourable senators, it is not my intention to speak at any length on this bill, because I do not think it is necessary to do so, its provisions being very clear and uncomplicated.

As you know, Bill C-245 gives legislative approval to a tax which was first imposed on October 1 last. This tax was imposed on crude oil being exported from Canada. The amount of the tax, and the rate at which it has increased, shows in a startling way the difference between the price of crude, which is presently frozen in Canada, and the price which could be obtained by selling it in the United States. The tax was only 40 cents a barrel from October 1 to December 1, 1973. Then it went to $1.90 in January 1974. Now it is $2.20 until February 1 next, when it will go to $6.40 a barrel. That rate will be in effect until April 1—and after that, who knows?

I understand that this is one of the matters which is to be discussed at the conference of first ministers to be held here in the near future. In any event, it is obvious that this matter must again come before Parliament before April 1.

Honourable senators, the principles behind this tax and the need for it have been well explained by the sponsor, so there is no need to go over them again. If some action had not been taken, huge sums of unearned profits would have accrued to oil companies; and if the price had not been frozen in Canada, then I can only think that increases in the price of crude oil would have been disastrous.

● (1610)

As honourable senators know, the bill in its original form contained provisions which were strongly opposed in the other place. However, following consultation and discussion among the various parties, an acceptable compromise was agreed upon, with the result that we have this bill in its present form. Consequently, I do not think any useful purpose would be served by having a lengthy debate at this time.

It should be remembered, however, that the bill is somewhat unique in two aspects. First, the tax is not imposed, as most taxes are, primarily for the purpose of raising revenue. Secondly, it is a federal tax on a non-renewable resource wholly owned by the provinces concerned. This being so, a major question is how this tax which is being collected is to be distributed.

As the sponsor pointed out, there can be no doubt that the provinces which own these resources are entitled to compensation for the revenues they will lose—for the loss of royalties, income tax, and the like.

Part II of the bill, which appears on page 4, provides that the minister may pay to such provinces out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund an amount equal to 50 per cent of the tax collected in such province, and I understand there is a commitment that the other 50 per cent will be used in the producing provinces at least for the period covered by this bill. I believe that this too is a matter which will be discussed at the forthcoming conference. Obviously, it is a matter of great concern to all Canadians and not only to the producing provinces, and some arrangement will have to be made between, and a policy worked out by, the provincial and federal governments.

Honourable senators, while listening last evening to the very able explanation given by the sponsor, two thoughts occurred to me. I was startled by the tremendous dependency of highly industrialized nations on the continuing supply of oil. Small producing nations can indeed exert a powerful adverse effect by simply curtailing the supply of oil which these industrialized nations need, and upon which they depend.

The second thought that occurred to me was the complexity of the situation, and the interrelationship with our own economic system. If the price of oil for domestic and industrial purposes is allowed to increase substantially, undoubtedly the have-not provinces will have still less. The adverse effect on Eastern Canada will, in my opinion, wipe out all the gains which have been made over the past number of years, and federal government policies will have to be such as to permit no substantial increase in the price of crude oil in Eastern Canada.

Honourable senators, while at the present time the distribution of the moneys received by the federal government from this tax is of major concern to the oil-producing provinces in Western Canada, it must not be forgotten that in future it may well be the concern also of the Eastern provinces, especially Nova Scotia and Newfoundland.

As honourable senators know, great efforts have been made, and are being made, to discover oil off the coast of Nova Scotia and Newfoundland. Vast sums of money have been spent for this purpose, yet the results so far have been disappointing. There are indications, however, that oil does exist in those areas, and actual exploration is proceeding. If oil is discovered in commercial quantities, the whole energy picture will change. At that time, not only will there have to be an agreement on the distribution of any tax on the export of oil, but there will have to be agreement also on the ownership of the oil itself. Nova Scotia, for example, claims—with some justification, I think—the ownership of any oil which might be found off its coast, although in all fairness it must be said that this claim has not been admitted up to the present time by the federal government.

Honourable senators, since the bill has general agreement, and since the sponsor has given such a clear and detailed explanation of its provisions, I personally do not consider it necessary to send it to committee. If we send it to committee for study, we shall be doing so in a speculative way. After all, the provisions of the bill are clear. The amendments made in the other place were agreed upon by all parties, and I do not think there is opposition to them in this chamber.

As the provisions of the bill will be in effect only until March 31, it would be more useful if we delayed giving a detailed study of the whole situation until after the conference of first ministers which begins in Ottawa on January 22. We shall then know what proposals come out of that conference and, before March 31, we might see what is contained in the new legislation. However, if honourable senators feel that it would be helpful to have the bill studied in committee, I certainly would have no objection.

On motion of Senator Laing, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

PROTECTION OF PRIVACY BILL

BILL TO AMEND CERTAIN ACTS—COMMONS DISAGREEMENT WITH SENATE AMENDMENT

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, a message has been received from the House of Commons to acquaint the Senate that that house does not concur in the amendment made by the Senate to Bill C-176, to amend the Criminal Code, the Crown Liability Act and the Official Secrets Act.

CONSIDERATION LATER THIS DAY

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this message be taken into consideration?

Hon. Mr. Martin: Later this day.

Some Hon. Senators: Now.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Honourable senators, I must object to the message being considered later this day. This is a vital question. The Senate is highly concerned about it; the public is highly concerned about it. We know that there will be many senators absent later this day. There are many already absent—very conveniently, I would say.

Hon. Mr. Buckwold: On whose side?

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Well, we know what side we are on, and we know where we stand. In any event, I am objecting to the consideration of this message being put over until later this day. If there is any consent to be given, I for one do not intend to give it. I think this matter should be discussed immediately. It should be discussed before the 4 o'clock plane leaves, taking more of those honourable senators who are very much in favour of insisting upon our amendment. I should like to hear from those—the few that we are—who are adamantly in favour of insisting upon our amendment. I want them to be heard, because this amendment was their doing.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: We do not want any violence.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, there should be a motion before the house before any speeches are made on this question.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Honourable senators, I move that this message be taken into consideration later this day.

The Hon. the Speaker: It is moved by the Honourable Senator Martin, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Langlois, that this message be taken into consideration later this day.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Mr. Asselin: No.

Hon. Mr. Molson: Honourable senators, I think that at the very least the Leader of the Government should explain why a matter of this import, a matter that everybody has been waiting for—we have been reading in all the media what we are going to do and what we ought to do—should be deferred until later this day. Unless there is very good reason—

Hon. Mr. Martin: Well, one of the obvious reasons which I could give to Senator Molson, as well as to Senator Choquette, is that the Senate has before it another important bill which it is now debating and which, under our rules and our practice, has precedence, unless otherwise decided.

We are now discussing the Oil Export Tax bill, on which a number of senators are anxious to speak. Having canvassed, to the extent possible, the wishes of honourable senators, I am sure that this is the best arrangement. I can assure Senator Choquette that there will not be any senators leaving the chamber to catch a plane. We are prepared to sit here tomorrow, Sunday, Monday and Tuesday, and to take our full time in considering matters that are of public interest.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Senator Choquette said that the matter referred to in the message before us is an important one. Of course it is important. I do not know whether Senator Choquette has any idea what each senator's view will be on this matter. I don't know.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh!

Hon. Mr. Martin: This is going to be a matter for each senator.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: You knew this morning.

Hon. Mr. Martin: I wish I could understand Senator Choquette as well as I can understand senators generally. I can assure him that this matter is important, but let me tell him that a matter also of great importance is the one the Senate is now debating, the oil export tax, and this is the legislation that I propose we should continue to discuss now, following the discussion we began yesterday. In its proper place we will deal with the other bill courageously and completely, and we will give Senator Choquette and any other senator all the opportunity that is needed, no matter how long it takes.

Senator Choquette need not be disturbed that he will be denied the opportunity of fighting for the rights of the Senate, as I noted he did in June of 1961 when he urged the Opposition on that day not to insist on an amendment that the Senate had sent to the House of Commons.

The Hon. the Speaker: It is moved by the Honourable Senator Martin. P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator

Langlois, that this message be taken into consideration later this day. Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Senators: Yes.

Some Hon. Senators: No.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, as there is in my mind uncertainty as to agreement, I am going to ask those who are in favour of the motion to please say "yea."

Some Hon. Senators: Yea.

The Hon. the Speaker: Those who are against the motion will please say "nay."

Some Hon. Senators: Nay.

The Hon. the Speaker: In my opinion, the "yeas" have it.

And more than two honourable senators having risen.

The Hon. the Speaker: Please call in the senators.

OFFICIAL REPORT (HANSARD)

SENATORS' STYLE OF ADDRESS—QUESTION

Hon. Mr. Godfrey: Honourable senators, I have a question to address to the Leader of the Government.

For years I have been puzzled as to why in Senate Hansard members of this house who speak are designated as "Honourable Mr." I presume, because of this, that they had appropriated to themselves the title of "Senator" to which they were not technically entitled. However, in the proceedings of standing committees I note that the members of this house who speak are designated as "Senator". Furthermore, in the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate, a member of the Senate is designated as "the Honourable Senator." My question is: Why has this house not effected uniformity in the printed reports of the Senate and discontinued a form in Senate Hansard which appears to be archaic?

Hon. Mr. Martin: I am sure, honourable senators, that that would be perhaps the only question relating to this house that would make us archaic.

I understand that this matter has been raised a number of times, particularly by the Editor of Hansard. It was brought to the attention of at least two of the Speakers, and I hope that Senator Deschatelets will not object if I remind him that this matter was brought to his attention when he suggested to his inquirers at that time that he would take the matter up with the Leader of the Opposition and myself. If the Leader of the Opposition and I can afford to be in the country at the same time, I would hope, Madam Speaker, that you would be good enough to carry on where Senator Deschatelets left off and deal with this question.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: Supplementary to that, I am sure that the Honourable Senator Godfrey inadvertently left out my favourite description of those honourable senators who support the Liberal Party, and that is "Martinized." I feel there should be a description calling them "Honourable Martinized Senators."

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Not even funny.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: It will be more appropriate later today when the wiretapping bill comes up.

Hon. Mr. Buckwold: We could have expected that. We will send that to the dry cleaners.

Hon. Mr. Martin: You must never make any threats.

ELECTION EXPENSES BILL

BILL TO AMEND CERTAIN ACTS—THIRD READING

Hon. Azellus Denis moved the third reading of Bill C-203, to amend the Canada Elections Act, the Broadcasting Act and the Income Tax Act in respect to election expenses.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time, and passed.

OIL EXPORT TAX BILL

SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from yesterday the adjourned debate on the motion of Senator Macnaughton for the second reading of Bill C-245, to impose an oil export tax under the Excise Tax Act and to allocate certain of the revenue derived from the oil export tax.

Hon. Arthur Laing: Honourable senators, I despair at once of attracting the interest of the house or of the galleries which would have been generated had the debate proposed by the Opposition taken place instead of this one. But I am not going to accept any diminishment in the importance of the debate with which I am concerned because I am of the opinion that involved in this legislation, and because of the implications of the actions adopted by certain nations, we in Canada are confronted today, in common with a large number of nations, with one of the most serious set of circumstances in recent history.

The Minister of Finance uttered the following words:

> Normal competitive forces of supply and demand have not been responsible. Rather, these disruptions have been brought about by a deliberate monopoly pricing decision on the part of the main oil exporting nations. As is the case with all other countries affected by this deliberately concerted jacking up of price, we are compelled as a national government to adopt a national policy to protect the broad public interest.

Very importantly he noted also:

> Further, a trading nation like Canada can never insulate itself in domestic pricing from the influence of world prices for internationally traded goods, commodities or services.

Finally, he frankly admitted that the situation within our country raised a constitutional issue between the central government and the provinces.

The political purposes of the OPEC nations remain, I think, undefined. If continued by methods of embargo and preposterous pricing, this is a ruthless attempt at crowbar dismantling of Western economies. If successful, this is a most massive assault on a civilization ever attempted, a civilization which has produced more improved standards of living, more security, a greater degree of freedom and egalitarian progress in the third world of emerging nations than any other chapter in human history.

There is the suggestion that the disease could be catching. It is said that the nations who produce bauxite and alumina are meeting to post prices. If these great concentrations of international extortion are so organized, then quickly all world producers of wheat could, for a short period at least, extract from the needy as much for a bushel of wheat as the OPEC nations now want for a barrel of oil.

It is unthinkable that all the efforts and sacrifices of mankind through the ages can produce nothing better than this self destruction.

I want to make reference to the warning issued by our Prime Minister on Christmas Eve, when he pointed out to the Arab nations that there was great danger in what they were doing, because they were inviting retaliation.

That warning was timely. I think the Prime Minister was the first head of any nation to issue that warning, and within 48 hours it received a reaction from those nations, who said they were going to postpone a further reduction of shipments of 5 per cent.

Not only does embargo hurt, but we cannot pay these prices for oil. Alternative sources of energy are almost within our grasp.

While the general plateau of world energy costs is expected to rise, there is general agreement that no oil can for long command a price in excess of $7 per barrel; and probably, with new world discoveries—Indonesia, the great gamble of the North Sea, our own Arctic, Canada's 165,000 miles of shoreline, and, finally, Africa in the general Nigerian area—we shall again be in a surplus position.

It could be further argued that alternative sources of energy, including gasification of coal, atomic energy, and finally fusion power, will discipline all energy costs.

This bill, most competently described for us by Senator Macnaughton and effectively dealt with by Senator Macdonald yesterday, has a broad application to Canada's future situation.

The bill is made necessary not by any limitation of even our current resources of oil or gas, but only because of our extraordinary geography.

Canada today is 98 per cent self-sufficient in oil and gas, but, as with many things in Canada, we say it is in the wrong place, and at this moment we do not have the equipment to put it in the right place.

It is now some five years since I quoted that 84 per cent of the population of Canada was living within 200 miles of the United States border. The latest information I have is that we are now hugging the border, and 84 per cent of Canadians are now living within 150 miles of the United States border.

Our industry and population are spread, substantially, 4,000 miles wide and 150 miles deep. Equitable legislation and regulation on behalf of all Canadians has always been a challenge to the central government in Canada.

Our predominant employment is in the industrial heartland of central Canada. Our resources, including all our petrochemical resources, are predominantly located at present west of Winnipeg and in the Canadian North. The economic challenge of Canada has always been to get people and things from one part of the nation to another.

I have no desire to trespass on our house rules by discussing aspects of the legislation which will be contained in a second bill, but I do wish to discuss the suggested disposition of the great sums of money flowing to the national treasury from this legislation.

There is a commitment that 50 per cent of the funds will be returned to the producing provinces. A substantial allocation to search and exploration has been indicated, which I most heartily endorse. Very wisely, it has been decided to review some of these matters when the premiers of the provinces meet the Prime Minister and his ministers on January 22.

Our Prime Minister and the Honourable John Turner have both frankly acknowleged the critical constitutional issue involved in these discussions. We cannot amend our Constitution by a tax bill, nor is there any intention to do so. The jealousy of the provinces over control of their resources is fully understandable, and their position is obviously equally fully recognized by our Prime Minister.

The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, the Honourable Donald Macdonald, very wisely has brought together a committee of executives of our oil-producing companies. It is equally important that he bring together the industrial users of oil and gas and ask them for their cumulative advice, because uses and costs, particularly in the chemical industry, are fantastically involved.

Energy, as an input in production, ranges from only 2 to 12 per cent. I think it is 12 per cent in the case of aluminum. That is the percentage input of energy in the final price. But the chemical qualities of both oil and gas are such as to be of critical importance in all petrochemical operations.

I am told that in the United States the effect of increased oil costs has already added $17 billion to the cost of petrochemical products in the United States this year.

Dislocations of the most serious kind are confronting many industries and could lead to very serious unemployment in central Canada. The efforts of the national government exemplified in this competent emergency bill should minimize that disruption.

The emergency nature of this bill temporarily amends our historic reliance on the market system. It is an emergency bill for an emergency situation. Any nation which relies upon world trade to the extent that we do in Canada cannot but regret this action and hope that a return to common sense will ensure a return to common practice.

I have noted in the last 48 hours that there have been some complaints in the United States of America against the action of the Canadian government, because in order to protect ourselves and to provide protection for Canadians in all parts of the country we have imposed upon the United States a cost for Canadian oil equal to the cost of the oil they would have to bring in from other outside sources.

● (1430)

I cannot see that our American friends have any complaint at all. It is less than four years ago that they made the strongest possible representations to the Government of Canada that we should self-impose upon ourselves a reduction in exports of Canadian oil to the United States, then running at the rate of about 800,000 barrels a day, down to 588,000 barrels a day. In other words, they told us at that time that we were exporting to them at a very low cost some 200,000 or 250,000 barrels of oil per day which they did not want at any price at all. Well, we did not self-impose and they did not impose a quota upon us, and I rather think that at the present time they are extremely glad that they did not. Now, of course, they want from us as much oil as they can possibly get. So I do not think they have a legitimate complaint against Canada in respect of the action that has been taken in light of the attitude which prevailed in March 1970.

If we believe in a ceiling of $6 or $7 per barrel of oil, what should we now do to ensure our industrial security in the future? We have already staked out enormous reserves in coal and tar sand oil. We know we have coal for 600 years. We know the Athabaska bitumins contain 600 billion barrels of oil, of which at least half are recoverable even with present practice, and present practice is due for early and enormous improvement. We are at the point of certifying Arctic gas sufficient to justify a pipeline. Since plenty and not shortage is our blessing, we must develop these resources as soon as possible.

It is apparent that both frontier gas and tar sands oil require both external funds and external markets for their development. The government of the United States has launched a program of self-sufficiency in energy by 1980. There is no question of their ability to be self-sufficient. However, I would despair of their timing.

Their program comprises coal gasification, atomic power, geothermal sources, fusion, and a serious look at their oil shales, reputed to cover 16,000 square miles and to contain oil equivalent to our Athabaska tar sands. This was a particular favourite of Secretary Udall when he was Secretary of the Interior, but he failed in selling the idea of proceeding with the development of the oil shales to the government of which he was a member.

There is no question that their shale would cost at least $2 per barrel more than oil from the Athabaska tar sands. The capital required for realistic shale development is fantastic—probably of the order of $100 billion. If embarked upon, this investment would have to be protected in the same way as the U.S. oil industry has long been protected from cheap offshore oil.

We could see in Canada both our frontier gas and tar sands oil put away in cold storage for a generation because we do not have the market to justify the massive production volume necessary to achieve favourable unit cost. I am suggesting immediate discussion with the U.S. authorities toward co-operation in developing resources in Canada that could be of enormous benefit to both our nations. I am not talking about "continental resources". In the past I have been as vocal as anyone in taking a stand that the resources of Canada, because of their attractiveness for the future for both capital and population, should never become continental resources.

I believe that security of delivery, in the interests of the United States, could be ensured by treaties between our two countries. I further believe that most of the financing could be secured by debenture and that the developers could be Canadian companies.

Are we attempting to negotiate Prudhoe Bay gas by the Mackenzie Valley Line in order to facilitate delivery of our frontier gas? An interested American segment now proposes to liquefy that gas from a line parallel to the Aleskaya Oil Line. It costs 50 cents per 1,000 feet to compress 630 cubic feet of gas to 1 cubic foot of liquefied. El Paso's interest, of course, is to ensure retention of this gas for the hungry markets of California rather than make delivery to the Chicago area. These are matters upon which we should now earnestly engage in discussion with U.S. authorities.

In all this, it is obvious that I consider the present and future beneficial market and industrial relationship of Canada to lie within the geographic area of this continent. This is exactly what I believe. Europe will remain important to us. The Pacific is opening up great new avenues of trade. However, our proximity, our common derivation and our complementary resources will continue to give first importance to all our relations with the United States of America.

I have little patience for a myopic nationalism aimed principally at denigrating our neighbour. It was as late as 1940 that the greatest Briton of his age called upon the new world "in all its strength and might to come to the rescue and the liberation of the old." When I see what is happening to the American dollar I believe the Macedonian cry may be repeated again.

The Statue of Liberty bears these words:

Give me your tired, your poor,
Your huddled masses yearning to breathe free,
The wretched refuse of your teeming shore,
Send these, the homeless, tempest-tossed, to me.

It should be obvious that those huddled masses contained a vast competitiveness and a great character.

Our small nationalists not long ago were the "leave it in the ground people," some going so far as to suggest we had so abused our resources that we should reserve their use for later generations with more intelligence. At the moment we have a surplus of self-flagellators; we have history's most comfortable group of pessimists in the Club of Rome, and we have some environmental bureaucrats, who could not light a fire if given matches, disrupting enterprise.

We have had some terrible people in this world, honourable senators, of late. I am referring to hijackers. This is the worst kind of criminality in the memory of anyone living, and probably the most despicable in the history of the world. Their common cunning, however, gives them a common phrase, that being, "Don't shoot the pilot." My advice to governments interesting themselves more and more in industry, provincial governments talking about taking over oil administration, other governments talking about exercising more power in respect of industry, is, "Don't shoot the pilot."

We are dealing with industry here, particularly in the energy field and the oil industry, which has probably the most competent group of technologists the world has ever seen. I am not talking only of the fantastic competence of geologists but right down to that of the men who work with their hands, some of whom have been all over the world. They have worked in the hottest places in the world, and they are now working in our Arctic. These people have incomes as high as $1,200, $1,400 and $1,600 per month. It is costing those companies which are operating in the Arctic today $28.50 a day to feed a man, and $14.50 to put him to bed.

● (1440)

We are dealing with extremely technological subjects, and I cannot comprehend these businesses directed by politicians and operated by civil servants. If we get into that, I think we will wind up like the unfortunate merchant who found he had a price list but no bananas.

I believe that the world has competence and plenty in every sphere. I have, out of some interest in and knowledge of agriculture, predicted that the world will be in a surplus position in food, if not by the end of 1974, at least in 1975. Last year the United States of America exported $17 billion worth of food, up from $7 billion three years earlier. The competence of production and manufacture today is unbelievable. We have enormous competence for illimitable production. We have the ability to have plenty in every field.

Having been the minister responsible for national resources, I have some slight experience in this field. At one time I was able to convince the Government of Canada that in order to open up our Canadian north we should offer the explorers and discoverers 40 per cent of the cost of exploration, on condition that if they found a mine that was operable they would return the money to us; if they found nothing we would write it off. We had people from all over the world coming to the Northwest Territories and the Yukon, with the result that this year the Yukon alone, with a population of only 18,000 people, produced $147 million from mines alone.

I believe in the leg-up theory. I believe in using the most competent, independent private-enterprise people, assisted by government. On that policy I also convinced my colleagues in the Cabinet at that time to go into Panarctic Oils. I was not a socialist, but there were 20 little oil companies around Calgary who were going to fail because they had no money to dig a hole. They said they needed $20 million to dig 16 holes; they could get $11 million, could we put up $9 million? My first proposal was that we give them the $9 million, but the government of the day felt that was too generous, so we took equity in Panarctic Oils to the extent of 45 per cent. There is nothing wrong with that at all, because we are exploring and finding new great resources in the Canadian north.

I think it is important to Canada that we build this nation in depth; that we bring down those resources. It is important to our income in the future that, as quickly as possible, we meld the higher cost resources from those areas with the cheaper and declining amounts of our resources in Southern Canada. I am talking at the present time of self-sufficiency, ability to export, great resources capable of looking after our interests in Canada, and at the same time being competitive with other parts of the world.

This is an important measure. I approve of this bill. I think it is extremely competent, that it meets the conditions of Canada at this time. However, I do not want this to continue indefinitely, and I am quite certain that the governments, federal and provincial, would like to have thought that it was unnecessary. I am quite certain that when the responsible leaders of our nation here and the responsible leaders of our provinces come together in Ottawa on January 22 they will sit down, take counsel with one another and, while this kind of thing is best at this time, will try to find a way to get back as rapidly as we possibly can to the basis of enterprise where we can deal with other nations to our best advantage and to theirs.

Hon. George van Roggen: Honourable senators, I think it suitable that as a Westerner I also should make a few remarks on this bill. Senator Laing has already dealt with several points that I would otherwise have touched on, and has done so more ably than I could. I will therefore keep my remarks comparatively brief.

In the past four months, a very short period of time, the Arab nations, or basically the oil-producing countries, including Venezuela, have driven up the world price of oil by 400 per cent. To put it mildly, this has had a traumatic effect on the economies of the Western industrialized nations, because oil is the very lifeblood of the economies of those nations. There is no question but that in this traumatic and unusual situation unusual remedies are necessary. Canadians must stand together for the common good at this time. I certainly support the export tax mechanism that is being employed in an emergency situation by the government, and I support this bill. However, I do wish to point out some of its ramifications.

First, let me agree with Senator Laing that it is a short-term measure. It must be because we cannot isolate ourselves, the Minister of Finance has stated, from world prices and world energy supplies.

What is the cost to the producing areas, not to the oil companies but to the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan, which produce nearly all of our oil on the basis of the $6 limit that will be coming into effect with the export tax on the first of next month? We export approximately one million barrels a day, and we consume domestically approximately two million barrels a day. We produce two million; we export one million, and we import one million. Geography makes it impossible for us to supply the imported oil in the East at the moment.

One million barrels a day, or 365 million barrels a year, at $6 a barrel gives us just over $2 billion a year coming into the coffers of the federal government from a resource owned by the people of two Western provinces. Reference has been made to the fact that possibly 50 per cent of this money will be returned to those provinces. Hopefully a further portion of this money will be used for exploration.

This export tax has another effect, on both the people of the producing areas and the people of Eastern Canada. The export tax of $6 a barrel has the effect of keeping the sale price of oil in Canada at $6 below world prices, as set in the Chicago market. Therefore, another $2 billion a year is being provided, not in cash but in subsidy, to the Canadian consumer by the producing areas. You are now talking of a mammoth total figure of possibly $4 billion a year—an enormous sum of money—brought about by emergency measures that had to be improvised in a very few months because of a strange and unusual world situation.

The very magnitude of these figures tends to chase questions of principle out the window. If we were dealing with only $50 million or $100 million it would be very simple to say in terms of principle that these moneys belonged to the people of the producing provinces and that, if a burden was being imposed on them to subsidize the price of oil in other parts of Canada, they should be reimbursed by all the taxpayers of Canada for having that burden cast on them. But when you get into figures as large as we are faced with today and a situation as traumatic as today's, these principles tend to go out the window.

However, I do not intend to let this opportunity go by without reminding honourable senators of the simple facts of life. You may ask why I, as a British Columbian, am so concerned. I am concerned for several reasons. We do not have oil in British Columbia, but we do have natural gas which has been selling for 20 cents at the wellhead in the past, but which is now being sold on contract to Quebec for 40 cents at the wellhead plus the cost of transportation.

Senator Laing referred to the possibility of liquefying the gas in Alaska rather than bringing it down the Mackenzie by pipeline. As a matter of fact, El Paso would rather have it liquefied because, even though it is more expensive to liquefy it, the cost is meaningless. In California they are so short of natural gas, or are on the threshhold of being so short, that they would rather pay $1.25 for liquefied gas than to let 60-cent or 70-cent gas go to Chicago.

That is the world we are coming into. We are never going to see four-dollar oil again. We are never again going to see gas selling at 20 cents, 30 cents, or 40 cents. We are not going to be able to maintain beyond this winter the low prices that are being maintained at the moment in Canada for petroleum and heating oil.

Also as a British Columbian and as a Westerner I am concerned about other products which might come into short supply. There has been talk about two-priced lumber in Canada. It would become a different story if these same principles were applied to lumber and if, instead of taking money away from some international oil companies or from the provincial governments of Alberta and Saskatchewan, you started to ask the men working in the woods in British Columbia to take home 50 cents an hour less in their pay cheques. That would be a different kettle of fish.

There has also been talk about two-priced fish. Many of our other resource commodities in Canada might well increase in value substantially in the next few years and lead to similar problems, although on a lesser scale, admittedly, than is the case with oil.

So we must keep the principle in mind, and the principle is quite simple. An export tax is the same thing as an export tariff. The people in the extremities of Canada who have gone through the first 100 years of Confederation with an import tariff on manufactured goods, which has worked to the benefit of central Canada and generally at the expense of the extremities, should not now be asked to go through the second 100 years of Confederation with export tariffs on their resources in the extremities of the country.

Hon. Mr. Laing: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. van Roggen: I would appeal to my friends from the Maritimes that they not concentrate wholly on the short-term advantage of keeping the price of their gas down to 50 cents at the pump as the only problem we are faced with at the moment, because they might well find they have success in finding offshore oil in the Maritimes in the course of their explorations there in the next number of years. Will they, when things have settled down and this immediate crisis is over, then be wanting to sell that oil at $4 a barrel instead of at the world price of $10 a barrel? I do not think that would be in their best interests.

Hon. Mr. McElman: It is 75 cents at the pump now.

Hon. Mr. van Roggen: What I am saying is that as Canadians it is important that we address our minds to what we do with the substantial cash revenue that is coming from this export tax. We often like to think that in Canada we are swimming in raw materials and swimming in cheap oil. Some people, including the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, have even suggested that we will keep oil at an artificial, low price in Canada, and that this will give our industry a competitive advantage over other industries in the world.

Let us look at the facts of Canadian oil for a minute. We have a very low reserve at the moment. There is only about ten years' supply, or about ten billion barrels, proven in Alberta and Saskatchewan. There were 4,000 wells drilled in Canada last year. Three thousand five hundred of them were drilled in Alberta. I would suggest that that is sufficient saturation in that province to indicate that there is not a large undiscovered mass of oil deposits waiting to be discovered in Alberta. So where is our new oil in Canada, if we are going to find it in such quantities that we can be more competitive by having cheaper oil than any other place in the world?

We know that there is oil in the tar sands—and I will come back to that in a moment—but the oil in the tar sands is a very expensive commodity. It might be produced at about $6 or $7, as Senator Laing suggested, but in my opinion with the normal rate of inflation over the four or five years it will take to put even modest amounts into production that figure is going to be about $10.

If the Arctic is suggested as a source of oil, it is true that great discoveries have been made in finding gas, but there has been practically no oil. I am not suggesting we will not find oil there; hopefully, we will, but we have not yet found a Canadian Prudhoe Bay. The average oil well drilled in the Arctic costs about $3 million. In Arabia the wells are drilled at about $50,000 per hole. They just have to drill a couple of thousand feet down into the sand. Does anyone think seriously that we are going to have cheaper oil in Canada than Arabian oil.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: Pardon me for interrupting you, senator, but as I have not been able to receive accurate information from any government organization, perhaps you could answer my question. What does it cost to drill a hole on the Atlantic Coast—by that I mean the Maritimes, the Atlantic provinces and Quebec?

Hon. Mr. van Roggen: I am not in the oil business. I cannot give you precise figures. I do know, however, that deep sea drilling—and I was just coming to that—is at a cost comparable to that of our Arctic drilling. Some wells in the North Sea are running at a cost as high as $1 million to $2 million per well. Some of them may be even higher than that.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: Did you say $1 million to $2 million?

Hon. Mr. van Roggen: Yes, but some figures I have heard go as high as $5 million per well.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: Five million dollars is the figure I wanted. Thank you, senator.

Hon. Mr. van Roggen: At any rate, it is extraordinarily expensive, and that oil, if it is found, is going to be very expensive when they bring it to the market.

We are looking, therefore, at the bonanza of revenue from this export tax on a short-term basis until the world situation straightens itself round, and until the Americans are able to tap the Prudhoe Bay oil in Alaska. I might say to you that while there are only 30 billion barrels of oil specifically proved on the north slope, the oil that they have there by inference, and which some knowledgeable people to whom I have spoken are satisfied exists there, runs to ten times that quantity. They are satisfied that they have a pool of oil there unmatched outside of Arabia, and much cheaper than our oil in the tar sands. That is conventional oil. It is on the north slope, not on an Arctic island, and it can be brought to market at a figure of about $4 or $5 as opposed to the tar sands oil which would be much more costly. So we may be looking at a situation in which our oil not only is not cheaper than American oil but, on the contrary, is more expensive.

[Hon. Mr. van Roggen.]

● (1500)

The point I am trying to come to is that we must, as Canadians, level with the Canadian consumer, and explain these facts to him, pointing out, "Fine, everything that can be done will be done to alleviate the unfortunate economic consequences falling unevenly across the country, but in the long haul we in Canada are going to be consuming one-dollar gas, not 50-cent or 75-cent gas, that we have been used to in the past." We have to get people's minds conditioned to this. We have to get ready for this.

We have also to get ready to use the moneys that are coming from this tax, not just to keep the price of oil, gasoline and heating oil down and having that money dissipated in that way, and then not having the massive funds needed to develop the tar sands and Arctic oil. We have got to save these billions and add them to further exploration capital, and I have heard figures as high as $40 billion and $80 billion quoted. These sums will be necessary in the oil industry alone, in Canada, to produce the needs of this country, to say nothing of maintaining a reasonable level of exports to assist our balance of payments. Funds of this magnitude must be found for exploration purposes alone within the next 15 years, so that this country will never be held hostage to a world energy crisis again.

To avoid that we should build the pipeline to the East, whether it is economic or not. We must never be held hostage again. We must take the funds now becoming available from the export tax and elsewhere, and start plowing them into massive development of the tar sands, offshore oil, and Arctic oil, if we are to be self-sufficient in this resource and immune from this type of crisis and blackmail in the future.

Canadian consumers are going to have to come face to face with the unfortunate fact of life that we have simply been enjoying energy at too low a cost for too many years. I think Canadians are intelligent enough that these facts can be placed properly before them. They will appreciate what must be done and, therefore, will support a great national endeavour to see that we have ample Canadian oil and gas reserves developed and made available to all Canadians by a proper pipeline network.

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, my remarks on this occasion may be very vivid, for the simple reason that I am a representative of the Atlantic provinces. I make a distinction between the Atlantic provinces and the East. Most of the people in Western Canada think that the East ends at Ontario and Quebec. It does not, honourable senators. We in the Maritimes still feel that we are Eastern Canada.

The bill before us, admittedly, is a compromise, and everybody accepts the compromise with the idea that having achieved a compromise we will automatically achieve a solution. I would point out that the present policy as outlined by the government—and you will pardon me if I say that the government changes its viewpoint on the hour, by the hour—it would be delightful, honourable senators, if, when listening to the time signal from the Observatory and hearing, "In 10 seconds it will be one o'clock," we could also have a declaration of government policy. Would it not be wonderful to find out exactly what the government is thinking at that time on, say, the export tax; what the government is thinking about development—what the government is really thinking, in fact? But then, I suppose that would be impossible. When you ask what the government is really thinking—

Hon. Mr. Hastings: Where are the Tories?

Hon. Mr. McElman: They do not think.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: You had the Tory platform made out, and you had it mailed to you. If you had not been so busy being "Martinized" you would have had the time to read the Conservative platform—the doctrine as outlined by Mr. Stanfield. It is a rather good one. It is one that I would recommend to you, Senator Hastings. You, as a member of the Liberal Party, have forgotten the energy crisis in this province. You have taken the attitude that you must destroy Lougheed. What are you doing for Canada when you attempt to destroy Lougheed?

Hon. Mr. van Roggen: Mr. Blakeney was in the same boat as Mr. Lougheed, and I supported him.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: I am sorry, I did not hear your interruption.

Hon. Mr. van Roggen: I just wanted to make the point that in my remarks I was careful to refer to both Alberta and Saskatchewan, because here we have a Conservative government and an NDP government, at opposite poles of the political spectrum, and both basically being required to take the same position.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: But then, Senator van Roggen, you must recognize the fact—and you, as a senator from British Columbia, must be particularly aware of this—that basically the NDP policy comes from Mr. Lewis, and Mr. Lewis is your leader, and you have to accept his viewpoint.

Hon. Mr. van Roggen: I thought you were talking about Mr. Lougheed. I am sorry.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: If you will read his statement—

Hon. Mr. Buckwold: May I ask a question?

● (1510)

Hon. Mr. Phillips: The honourable senator may ask his question after I have replied. Senator van Roggen will realize, having read the press lately, that Mr. Blakeney is sure that he will get what he wants. That can lead to only one conclusion, that there has been consultation between Mr. Blakeney, Mr. Lewis and Mr. Trudeau, and they have made an arrangement.

The NDP premier of British Columbia—I am sorry, but for the moment I cannot recall his name.

Some Hon. Senators: Barrett.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: I thought Barrett was a Liberal member in the other place. However, that is all right. You cannot disassociate yourself or your partner, Senator van Roggen, from the alliance between the NDP and the Liberal Party. You are both responsible and you are both to blame.

Hon. Mr. Buckwold: The honourable senator made the statement that Mr. Lewis was the leader of the Liberal Party. May I ask what party Mr. Lewis led yesterday in the House of Commons?

Hon. Mr. Phillips: I had anticipated that question. I am glad the honourable senator raised it. I make no apology for asking the following question of my Conservative colleagues in the other place: Did Stanley Knowles lead them? I make no apology for asking that question. That is my viewpoint, and I shall not retract that now or later in the debate.

I had anticipated the interruption of the honourable senator, and I was quite prepared to answer it later on. It was no surprise to me that it came a little earlier. Perhaps I should not say that it came as no surprise, but I wondered how much "Martinization" the honourable senator had gone through to interrupt at this stage of the debate.

Hon. Mr. Martin: It sort of hit home, though.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: It did not hit home, Senator Martin. We have the right to send legislation back to the House of Commons, and the House of Commons has the right to return it to us. I see no reason why we should develop this as being the ultimate question facing us at this time. Actually, there is a far more important question facing us, the Energy Supplies Emergency Bill.

Hon. Mr. Molson: On a point of order.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: Let us deal with one bill at a time, and let us not confuse them. Does that answer your question, Senator Molson?

In dealing with the export tax, it is difficult to assess the government's position as applied to the Maritime provinces. Traditionally, unfortunately—perhaps "traditionally" is the wrong word; perhaps "historically" is more correct—gasoline products in the Maritime provinces have always cost more than they have in the rest of Canada, despite the fact of the so-called Ottawa Valley line. Admittedly a great deal of this extra cost is due to the fact that the provinces have imposed a gasoline tax that is extremely high. The provinces, I am sure, did not enjoy imposing that tax. They thought it was necessary because the Atlantic provinces have a very small tax base, and therefore they had to turn to the most popular tax item, which is gasoline.

Some honourable senators might think that it would have been more logical for the Atlantic provinces to have turned to the liquor control commission for their tax revenues rather than to tax gasoline. But I assure honourable senators that residents in the Atlantic provinces use far more gasoline than any of the products of the liquor control commission.

The present bill will self-destruct on, I believe, April 1. In my opinion, the bill is deficient in this regard. What a wonderful situation it would be if the present government agreed to the principles they have laid down in the bill, and if both the bill and the government self-destructed on April 1.

Here, honourable senators, we are giving authority to the government to continue until April 1 a certain tax measure, knowing that it will expire. This in itself is really not that bad. Once we have approved this measure it is obvious to the provincial governments, as well as to the federal government, dumb though it may be, that we are also giving them complete authority to go to the dominion-provincial conference later this month with the attitude that whatever the federal government wants, whatever the federal government decrees, will become law.

If honourable senators have any doubts in that regard, they should read the Energy Supplies Emergency Bill, which is very closely allied to this bill. There they will see that the federal government has emphasized, beyond anything conveyed in the British North America Act, that they have power to say to the provinces, "You will take it and like it, and if you do not like it, you can lump it."

● (1520)

Honourable senators, I am not going to spend any more time discussing the export tax, industrial development, and so forth. I do want to emphasize the point that various estimates from oil companies, economists and political scientists—if you want to include them in the same classification—have predicted that by late April or May 1 gasoline will cost $1 a gallon in the Maritime provinces. Late April or May 1 is the time when the ice breakup occurs in the Maritimes, and the time when fishermen go after herring, lobsters, mackerel, and various other products of the sea. Those fishermen will want to know in advance whether to use diesel engines or gasoline engines. Can the government not make up its mind now, and assist these fishermen in that regard?

Up to this point in time it has been much more economical to use diesel fuel, even though diesel engines are more expensive. Will they have fuel for their diesel engines? If they use gasoline engines, will they be able to get the particular type of gasoline necessary to run those engines? Will they be able to get the premium gasolines? Will they be able to get the particular fuel additives necessary for a gasoline engine?

Honourable senators, between the federal-provincial meeting on energy and the commencement of the next session of Parliament, may I ask—and all I can do as a member of the Senate is ask—that this point receive the highest priority.

The bill before us provides that the federal government will keep a certain portion of the export tax on crude oil, and return a certain portion to those provinces which are fortunate enough to be exporting crude oil. This brings up a very interesting question, and I raise it now. In this regard, we are particularly fortunate in having Senator Lamontagne with us this afternoon. The Minister of Finance stated that the federal government's portion would be retained for development and research, and after a bit of pushing from the Opposition he also included exploration.

Honourable senators will recall that the Special Committee of the Senate on Science Policy spent a good deal of time on this point. Unless I have misinterpreted the recommendations of that committee—and I do not think I have—it recommended that a great deal more of the research and development be carried out by private industry, as it was far more practical than having the government do it. I could look up the recommendation on this point, but I am not going to. I am sure my recollection of it is correct. If it is not, Senator Lamontagne can correct me. The committee recommended that the share of research and development carried out by private industry—and I assume oil companies are private industries—should be increased from 18 per cent in 1969 to 60 per cent by 1980. Yet here we find a piece of legislation giving the government almost unlimited funds to compete with the oil companies. Let us make no mistake about it, the government will be competing with the oil companies in that it will be assigning this amount of money, an unknown amount of money, for research and development

The Special Senate Committee on Science Policy, under the expert direction of Senator Lamontagne, which spent millions—

Hon. Mr. Lamontagne: Not millions.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: Well, more than a million, and the government is now saying, "No, we cannot accept that advice." I find it difficult to believe that a Liberal organization would reject the advice of Senator Lamontagne. After all, he was a former member of the Cabinet. The government also rejected the advice of Senator Cameron, which was better than your advice, Senator Lamontagne.

● (1530)

The idea is to take a certain amount of money, and have the government do research. Who is going to do it? From our studies in the Science Policy Committee we know that we do not have the people to do it. During the committee hearings I asked a former professor of mine how much money he needed for cancer research. He replied, "We don't need the money. We need people with new ideas; we need people with a different attitude. That is our difficulty." I would say to the government, "That is your difficulty. You can lay aside so many millions, but do you have the people qualified to do the research, the exploration and so on? You haven't. Who are you going to send out? Are you going to send Plumptres and Naders to certain areas of Saskatchewan or the Grand Banks of Newfoundland to ask, 'Have you got an oil well here?' You can't do that. You are going about it the wrong way."

The Science Policy Committee recommended that 60 per cent of the research and development, so-called in-house research and development, should be done by the companies. Here we find the federal government laying aside millions, indeed billions, of dollars without any indication of who is to do the research and development.

Last evening it was stated on the CBC news that the National Research Council was under somewhat of a cloud because they were involved with the CIA. I do not believe it. However, that is really immaterial. Who are you going to pass it over to? Are you going to pass it to the National Research Council? When the National Research Council makes a recommendation they do so to the Cabinet. Is that what you intend, honourable senators, that any research and development that could be involved has to go back to the Cabinet, to the House of Commons, and perhaps to the Senate? I do not believe you really want that.

In closing, may I point out the importance of this measure to the Atlantic provinces. Let us assume a 5-cent, 10-cent or 15-cent price difference per gallon on gasoline, crude oil, petroleum products in the Maritime provinces. If you were developing an industry, and looking for a new site, would you do so in one of the Maritime provinces where you will have to pay 10 cents or 15 cents a gallon more? I do not know a board of directors that would recommend that. I think it is time we considered this aspect. The whole idea of DREE is completely destroyed by this price difference of 10 or 15 cents per gallon for petroleum products. No one will develop a plant in the Atlantic provinces knowing of that differential. In addition, no one will open a plant until they are sure of a new supply of petroleum products. We can talk about Shaheen. Shaheen is there not by the grace of God but by the grace of the sheik, and his supply can be cut off at any moment.

By this bill I feel that everything east of Ottawa has been eliminated—blacked-out, as they say on TV. I find it rather strange that a government representing all of Canada would wish to black-out the area east of Ottawa. To quote the Honourable Mr. Turner, the Minister of Finance, on a CBC radio broadcast, "If we, the Liberal Party, handle this situation correctly we could win the next election."

The Liberals feel they have to destroy Mr. Lougheed. We in the East are not interested in destroying Mr. Lougheed. He, like most Canadians in Western Canada, has made an outstanding contribution to Canada. Regardless of the province in which we originated, we have no desire to destroy that individual. We do not understand the argument between the Prime Minister of Canada and the Premier of Alberta. It is totally irrelevant and stupid. Let us get back to the problem that is facing us; let us face it as Canadians, and never mind the attempt to destroy any individual, whether it be the Prime Minister of Canada or the Premier of Alberta.

Hon. Alan A. Macnaughton: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: I should inform the Senate that if the honourable Senator Macnaughton speaks now his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for second reading of this bill.

Hon. Mr. Macnaughton: Honourable senators, in the volatile and emergency situation in which this bill has been introduced I want to take this opportunity to thank all honourable senators for their valuable contributions to the discussion of this matter. In particular, I wish to thank Senator Macdonald, Senator Laing, Senator van Roggen and Senator Phillips.

I have only a few words in summary.

This bill tries to strike a balance between the interests of the Canadian consumers and those of the oil-producing provinces. It tries to ensure a reasonable return for all Canadians from the export of our oil resources. I have already pointed out that this bill self-destructs on March 31 this year. I hope that by that time a more comprehensive, overall energy policy will be the product of the conference of first ministers which will be held later this month.

Keeping in mind the importance of the principles at stake and the major dimensions of pricing and taxation, as well as the considerable amount of revenues involved, may I plead with honourable senators to pass this legislation—I would call it emergency legislation—as soon as possible?

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Martin: Now.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: At the next sitting.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Yes, at the next sitting.

Hon. Mr. Macnaughton moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

Motion agreed to.

PROTECTION OF PRIVACY BILL

BILL TO AMEND CERTAIN ACTS—MOTION FOR NON-INSISTENCE UPON SENATE AMENDMENT

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the message from the House of Commons disagreeing with the amendment made by the Senate to Bill C-176, to amend the Criminal Code, the Crown Liability Act and the Official Secrets Act.

Hon. H. Carl Goldenberg: Honourable senators, in rising to give my views on this message from the other place, I realize that I am treading on sensitive ground. We are all human beings and I sometimes wish that the critics of the Senate would realize that senators are human too.

We have before us, once again, the Protection of Privacy Bill which we considered some weeks ago and which we sent back to the other place with an amendment.

Let me remind honourable senators that this bill is one on the principle of which all parties were in agreement in this house and in the other place. We all agreed as to its desirability and as to its necessity. It is, I believe, the first legislative attempt to restrict wiretapping to cases where judicial authorization is given.

The bill carefully prescribes the conditions for authorization. It provides that violations of privacy are an indictable offence and that aggrieved persons are entitled to claim damages.

The bill, I think it has been generally agreed, is a genuine attempt to reconcile the rights of individuals to privacy with the right of society to be protected against organized criminal groups.

After consideration of the bill by the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, the Senate rejected one clause in the bill. It rejected section 178.23, requiring written notification to the person who was the object of the interception, the notification to be given within 90 days after the period for which the authorization was given.

It has been suggested that the Senate committee did not give adequate consideration to the measure. We heard the representatives of one association as witnesses. They were the only witnesses. They were the only group to apply, because they had not been heard by the committee in the other place.

I know that honourable senators will understand that certainly some members of the committee read the evidence which was submitted to the committee in the other place, and that to have heard the same group of witnesses on the same matters would have been unnecessary duplication.

● (1550)

We gave the measure careful consideration and, as we all know, we rejected this one clause because the committee and the Senate concluded that the clause might have the effect of hampering the administration of justice, inasmuch as it could advise criminals of the location and strategy of police operations.

The Senate has been very severely criticized for its action. You know, I have only been in this house for just a little more than two years, and I am always amazed at the type of criticism we have to face. If we enact legislation speedily, we are called rubber stamps. If we exercise the constitutional authority which the Senate possesses under the British North America Act, we are told that we are doing something that we have no right to do. I do not know how to satisfy our critics.

Hon. Mr. Martin: You cannot.

Hon. Mr. Goldenberg: After all, we have to face the fact that the Senate is here and that it has constitutional powers to legislate.

The British North America Act has been amended a number of times with respect to the Senate, but only by way of increasing the membership when additional provinces were created, or by way of providing for the retirement at the age of 75 of senators appointed after a certain date. There has been no attempt to modify the Constitution in any way so as to affect the powers of the Senate. The Senate, therefore, exercised a constitutional power, which it possesses, in sending the measure back, not because we disapproved of the bill but because we disapproved of one clause.

In the other place the Minister of Justice introduced an amendment which, in my opinion, would have met the criticism and the concern of the Senate. The proposed amendment was introduced and debated yesterday. I was in the gallery during most of the debate. I must say that I regretted the absence of discussion on the merits of our amendment or on the clause in question. There was a great deal of political discussion, but there was, as far as I could note, no discussion on the particular measure.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Hear, hear. We all agree.

Hon. Mr. Goldenberg: What was the end result? When this clause was first adopted in the other place it was adopted by a majority of five, and our committee gave consideration to that fact—that is, that it had been adopted by a narrow majority. Yesterday, honourable senators, it was adopted by a majority of 20.

Now we have this bill again before us in its original form. What is the duty of the Senate at this stage? I suggest that our first concern should be, not the Senate, but the public interest.

[Hon. Mr. Goldenberg.]

What is the public interest? I submit to you that the public interest is the enactment of legislation which will control wiretapping and electronic eavesdropping. That is our first concern.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Goldenberg: If that is our primary concern—and I hope that the public interest is our primary concern—do we feel that by sending this bill back to the other place with the same amendment we will be promoting the public interest? I am sure that if we did that, that is what we would be aiming at, but I submit that we would not be promoting the public interest, because the suggested change, in the light of the attitude in the other place yesterday, would not be adopted and the bill would be dropped from the Order Paper. In those circumstances it would be the Senate that would be blamed for preventing the enactment of legislation safeguarding the right of privacy. I hope you will consider this very carefully.

I should point out at this stage that, while we rejected the measure for the reasons I have set out, we had as a witness before our committee the Minister of Justice. The minister said that while he did not like the clause himself, "we ought to try the bill in its present form".

Hon. Mr. Asselin: What is the reference, please?

Hon. Mr. Goldenberg: This is the report of the meeting of our committee, at page 9. On page 10 the minister said:

> ... but, again, I really suggest that we can live with this situation.
>
> I put it that way, because the House of Commons has very thoroughly argued this issue and, knowing where we are in the session, I am concerned that if we do not go along with the bill as it stands, we will not have a bill at all. And, of course, the bill is extremely important because it creates offences of wiretapping by private persons having in their possession electronic intrusion devices, and I very much want to see it become law.

He added, and this is important:

> I take the position that I will want to watch very closely, with the provincial Attorneys General, the manner in which the bill operates in practice, and I will be prepared at an early date to bring back an amendment to the bill, if there is an indication from them that in their experience that is required.

● (1600)

I repeat that I believe this to be an important statement by the Minister of Justice, in the light of what I propose to recommend to honourable senators.

I have another question. We may be told that this is an opportunity for a confrontation with the other place. In principle, I do not like confrontations. Perhaps that is because by profession I am a mediator. Perhaps I am prejudiced.

However, I say to honourable senators that if we want a confrontation—and I hope that we do not—let us pick an issue that warrants a confrontation but not one clause in an important bill, a clause which the Minister of Justice, responsible for its administration, tells us that he can live with. Therefore I suggest that we forget about a confrontation.

If honourable senators accept the recommendation that I propose to make, I have no doubt that some will say that we are surrendering—"The Senate is caving in"! I do not admit that.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Goldenberg: I cannot admit that. We have rendered a public service. We studied the bill. We examined this clause which was brought to our attention. We exercised our right, and we sent it back to give the other place an opportunity to restudy the measure.

The subject has now become a matter of public concern. In my opinion, by our action on the bill we rendered a public service. We exercised, in effect, a suspensive veto.

I know that I shall be told that there is no such thing as a suspensive veto in the British North America Act. But I say to honourable senators who raise the constitutional argument that those of us who have studied constitutional law are impressed by the fact that the law of the Constitution is not necessarily the main part of the Constitution. Usages, customs, conventions of the Constitution are often more important than the law.

If we establish the suspensive veto by convention, by usage, we will have changed the Constitution, without amending it formally. If the Senate were to do this, I suggest we could become more effective because we would be less hesitant, in those circumstances, to amend legislation.

In any event, I am not suggesting that at this stage. I am saying that in effect we have exercised a suspensive veto. We have given the other place an opportunity to reconsider a measure on which we differ.

The other house having chosen to reaffirm its stand, should we disregard that? Can we disregard that? Can we face the Canadian public and say that we disregard the decision taken twice by the elected house on the same bill, particularly in light of the fact that the majority on this clause rose from five to 20?

I am not saying that we should never amend a measure. I am not saying that at all. Nor am I saying that whenever we amend a measure we should agree with the other place if they send the measure back to us. I am saying that it depends on the measure. I can see that in the case of a measure which affects the fundamental liberties of the citizen, a measure which we might consider damaging to those liberties, we would assert ourselves and insist on our amendment. I can envisage a constitutional change affecting something which has concerned us over the years, namely, the unity of this nation, where the Senate could and would rightly assert itself. But let us choose our ground. Let us not disregard the wishes of the elected representatives of the people on an issue such as this.

I think I have expressed my feelings as far as I can go. I say again that we have not exercised a right that we do not possess. We exercised a right which we do possess. But the Senate should, as it has done over the years, exercise its right judiciously and with discretion. In my opinion, we can be a far more effective body if we do that.

Accordingly, honourable senators, I move, seconded by Senator Forsey:

> That the Senate do not insist upon its amendment to Bill C-176, intituled: "An Act to amend the Criminal Code, the Crown Liability Act and the Official Secrets Act", and that a Message be sent to the House of Commons to acquaint that House accordingly.

The Hon. the Speaker: It is moved by the Honourable Senator Goldenberg, seconded by the Honourable Senator Forsey:

> That the Senate do not insist upon its amendment to Bill C-176, intituled: "An Act to amend the Criminal Code, the Crown Liability Act and the Official Secrets Act", and that a Message be sent to the House of Commons to acquaint that House accordingly.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Senators: No.

Hon. Mr. Lang: Honourable senators, I would like to speak on the motion.

Hon. Lionel Choquette: I want to reply, and we usually alternate.

Hon. Mr. Lang: I noticed that the honourable senator hesitated.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: No. It is because I knew that you were going to damn the government. I was hesitant in letting you go ahead and do it before me.

Before I commence my remarks, honourable senators, I would like to hasten to congratulate Senator Goldenberg for his presentation on a most difficult problem. As usual, he was fair and honest in his presentation on this question.

Also, I wish to point out the fallacy that was repeated in editorials throughout the country during the course of the past 15 or 20 days. One which particularly deserves our notice is that which appeared in this morning's issue of the Globe and Mail. I shall not read the whole article; I shall just read an excerpt. At the end of the article it says:

> The Senate has no choice in the matter. If it rejects the bill a second time, it will call into question the whole constitutional position of the Senate. This is a question which certainly should be debated, but not in the present time of passion and emergency. The elected representatives of Canada have spoken; the Senate must bow to their judgment.

This, to my mind, honourable senators, is an absolute fallacy, and I propose to deal with it in the course of my remarks.

When we have a situation such as now exists in the other place, where the tail is wagging the dog, this institution must be alert, must study legislation enacted and make the changes we deem necessary.

● (1610)

Another editorial which was most insulting to one of our most able senators, Senator George McIlraith, appeared in the Montreal Gazette of today's date. Senator McIlraith had a notable political career in the other place before coming to the Senate, and I know he is quite capable of defending himself. The editorial, in part, states:

> Further grounds for PC and NDP opposition to the amendment is the truculent attitude of the likes of Liberal Senator George McIlraith, who has indicated that the Liberal Senate would again reject the bill should the House of Commons again pass it in the form it originally went to the Senate.
> The appointed senators must either flout the will of the elected members or accept the original bill. Senator McIlraith's statement reflects on the supremacy of the Commons and was reason enough for the Tories to join the NDP in holding out the original bill.

I leave it to my former classmate at Osgoode Hall and long-time friend, Senator McIlraith, to answer this editorial, together with other accusations of like manner.

Hon. Mr. McIlraith: May I have a copy of the editorial?

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Yes. I am sure you have not seen it; you cannot read all the editorials.

Hon. Mr. Molson: Fortunately.

An Hon. Senator: Especially in the Gazette.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Honourable senators, the first thing I want to say with regard to what happened in the other place yesterday is that it is a good argument in favour of having a second chamber, an appointed legislative body. The behaviour of the other place yesterday was that of juvenile irresponsibility. We have already heard that they did not go into the merits of the bill at all.

The NDP, who are obsessed with the idea of abolishing the Senate, saw an opportunity to humiliate us. They obviously tried to take a good, hefty swing at us to, as they would have it, put us back in our place. What disappoints me—and this was thrown at us a minute ago—is that so many Conservatives supported the NDP in this respect.

Hon. Mr. Buckwold: All of them.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: I am going to be fair in my presentation—just as fair as Senator Goldenberg was. I think the Conservatives supported the NDP not so much out of any desire to humiliate the Senate, but rather to embarrass the government, to see the government defeated in the Commons. That is my opinion. Those who believed that defeat of the government on a matter such as this would lead it to resign were not thinking too clearly.

What seems to have figured least in all that went on in the other place yesterday was our amendment. Very little serious consideration was given either to our amendment or to the compromise offered by the minister. The minister suggested that a judge be entitled to decide whether a person who has been bugged should be made aware of it within 90 days of the bug being removed. That is a sensible compromise. However, a sensible compromise was not what the elected chamber was after. The three opposition parties were out to make political gains. That is unfortunate, but it serves admirably to point out the value of an appointed body such as the Senate that can consider legislation coolly and calmly, without being forever subject to intense political pressures.

Our amendment was not given serious consideration, and I cannot repeat that often enough. I resent that. I resent the fact that no effort was made, of which I am aware, to consult with the Senate before sending this bill back to us in its original form. We were ignored completely. There was not a phone call, that I know of. There was no communication by the representative of this chamber in the Cabinet, who happens to be the Leader of the Government in this chamber. I do not know of any communication. I was the Acting Leader of the Opposition. I never even received a phone call saying that these people might get together with us. Nothing at all. We were not even given the courtesy of consultation. I do not think we should take that lying down. The attitude that we should back down as soon as an amendment is sent back because we are not an elected body is utter nonsense.

The Senate of Canada is part of Parliament. It is a legislative body equal in power and authority to the other place. Our prime responsibility is to review legislation. This body was constituted to watch out for what might be done by that other body.

We were in good company, honourable senators, when we sent this bill back with amendment. We were in the company of the minister, whose motion along this line had been defeated by only four or five votes. We were in good company when we were in the company of all the Attorneys General of all the provinces of this country. We were in good company with the RCMP at large. We asked Mr. Adamson, who represented all of the Chiefs of Police in Canada, whether we had the RCMP in our favour in considering this amendment, and his answer was that we did.

Those senators on the committee who decided this question were qualified to do so. If we look at the Minutes of Proceedings we see that the Honourable Senators Buckwold, Croll, Eudes, Hastings, Laird, Lapointe, McIlraith, Neiman, Quart and myself were present. Also present, but not members of the committee, were the Honourable Senators Argue, Cameron, Carter, Godfrey, O'Leary and Sparrow. All of these honourable senators, even though they did not have the right to vote, were in favour of the amendment which has now been rejected by the other place.

Honourable senators, I do not intend to belabour the matter further, except to point out to you certain questions asked and answers given on the morning before this bill was sent back to the other place with amendment. On page 14:9 of the committee proceedings on this bill Senator Croll said this:

> Let us get the two objections; let us put them this way. We realize you are dead against the notification.

That is the clause in question. And a little further on, again, Senator Croll said:

> May I put a question to the Minister of Justice, Mr. Chairman? He is a witness today.
>
> What is your reaction, sir, to the 90-day provision and the immediate tap? How do you meet the arguments put forward by the chief?

And the minister replied:

> Well, Mr. Chairman and senators, my position here is an intriguing one today, because on the question of the notice I myself moved an amendment in the House of Commons to delete that particular section and it lost on a fairly close vote.

So we were in good company when we were in the company of the Minister of Justice.

Further on in the committee proceedings at page 14:10, Mr. Adamson had this to say:

> As a Canadian, Senator Croll, I am more concerned with the far-reaching effects of this bill than I am with whether this bill passes the house or not. That is the way I feel. I don't think it is right and I don't think it is fair to the citizens of Canada to pass the bill as it stands.

● (1620)

Further on Senator McIlraith had this to say:

> As I understand the operations of criminals—and I have observed them a bit—I do not understand the purpose of notifying them, because, using a much narrower version of organized crime than Mr. Adamson does, it is perfectly obvious that if this kind of surveillance was being used on them, whether or not it resulted in an arrest and a conviction, and the notification were given, two things would happen. One is that they would eliminate that person, or change the personnel; and when I say "eliminate," I mean, literally, in some areas of the country, eliminate that person totally, or they would remove him from the activity he is engaged in in the crime web. So why are we assisting criminals by this provision?

This chief of police gave us about ten cases where criminals were apprehended, in which thousands of dollars worth of heroin and all sorts of money regarding crime were involved. He said he did not have the opportunity to give this type of evidence in the other place in committee. I asked whether in the ten or twelve cases that he had mentioned would he have failed if this clause that we were trying to delete had then been in existence. He said they would not have succeeded in one of them because these people would have been alerted. It took the police more than 90 days to find out who the criminals were, where their phones were installed, and he said that none of these cases, involving millions of dollars, would have been solved by the police.

I then made a few remarks. I do not like quoting myself, but this occurred just a few minutes before Senator Croll decided that we should vote and that we should delete this clause. These are my remarks at page 14:13:

> Senator Choquette: Chief Adamson, do I understand that all the examples contained in your brief were presented to the committee of the House of Commons?
> Mr. Adamson: No, sir, they were not. These are recent examples. The last time we appeared the 90-day disclosure rule was not evident and the emergency permit problem did not exist, so we did not present these types of examples.

Surely, honourable senators, this alone was enough for the committee not to reject what the chief of police, representing all the chiefs in Canada, was asking us to do?

Then I continued:

> Senator Choquette: Mr. Minister, how close was the result of the vote on the 90-day notification in the house? I believe you indicated that it nearly disappeared during the debate.
>
> Hon. Mr. Lang: I believe it was 118 to 113, but that is from my memory.

We have since checked and those figures were about correct.

> Senator Choquette: Would you be averse to the Senate removing this clause altogether? I do not see any necessity for it. We are losing a great deal of time on it, and I think the consensus of the senators present would be to get rid of that clause altogether. That would please our police. I have been engaged in a great deal of criminal law work for 40 years and, in my opinion, we are pampering criminals. It is difficult to obtain a conviction today, and I would say that more than 50 per cent of accused are found not guilty, either on appeal or otherwise, and I do not like to facilitate their operations. The function of the police being to protect society, we should assist them, and I am all in favour of deleting this 90-day notification clause altogether.

I thus played some part in suggesting that this clause be deleted. I am today repeating what was then said.

With respect to Senator Carter, I want to point out to the house that I have already commended him for his conduct in the committee, and I should like to put on record today what Senator Carter said at that time:

> Senator Carter: I am not a member of the committee, but I would like to ask the minister one question with respect to the statement he just made.
>
> The Senate is often criticized by the public and your house. Do you think that the statement you just made, that the Senate should abandon its responsibility with respect to this legislation just because it will facilitate something that the House of Commons wishes to do, is justified? It is something which cannot be defended. You have not defended it and no one has defended it. The police have told us they are better off without it. How can you expect the Senate, as a body, to take an action such as this and make themselves ridiculous in the eyes of the public, when there is no defence for it?

Senator Carter concluded in this manner:

> Our responsibility, based on the evidence we have heard and our own intelligence, is to throw this clause out. If we do that, then it is your responsibility and that of the house to do something about it.
>
> You are asking us to abandon our responsibility here in the Senate so that you in the Commons do not have to face up to yours. It is your responsibility when we send it back to you; the ball is in your court. It is your responsibility to deal with it. If you do not want to pass it, throw it out. That is the responsibility of the House of Commons. You should not come here, to the Senate, and ask us to compromise our responsibility so that you people over there do not have to face up to yours.

Again I want to commend Senator Carter for the words he expressed on that day.

Honourable senators, the Fathers of Confederation were worried, and rightly so, that political pressures might at times force them to take positions dangerous for the welfare of some citizens, so they created the Senate, an appointed body that does not have to worry about pandering to the electorate. We are here to counteract the excesses politicians can indulge in to acquire power or maintain themselves in power. That is exactly what has happened with regard to this bill in the other place—exactly; politics and nothing else. We are the very people who would stop any abuses if a certain party came into power. That is why every year they present a motion to abolish the Senate. Why? Because if ever they attained power we would be here, this chamber would be here to say, "No, you are not going to go any further than you have gone now!"

We have every right to review legislation. We have every right to amend legislation. Any attempt on the part of any group to diminish those rights is an affront to the Senate and to Parliament. To adopt the attitude enunciated by Senator Goldenberg, that we should automatically capitulate because we were not elected, is fundamentally to alter the role of the Senate. This reduces the Senate to being a mere consultative body, and I will have no part of that. I have seen that coming for a while.

Senator Hayden's Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce has on a few occasions studied bills simultaneously with the other place; we made recommendations before the bills got through the other place in the hope that the minister would accept them and amend his own bill before sending it over here. Well, that was a notably unsuccessful venture; most of our suggestions were ignored. But even if they had been accepted, I still think it is a cowardly way for us to carry out our tasks. We were not facing up to our responsibility. Our responsibility is to look into legislation when it gets here and to amend it if it is deficient. We have no reason to fear arousing the ire of the other place. We have a constitutional right and a moral obligation to improve legislation when necessary.

● (1630)

Our amendment was a necessary one. It improved the legislation. That is what I thought then, and that is what I think now. That is what the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs thought, and that is what this chamber approved.

Nothing has transpired that could lead us to change our minds on the value of the amendment. So the question revolves around whether or not the Senate has the right to insist. I am convinced it not only has the right but the obligation. If we fail to stand by our amendment, we lose all credibility.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: We, in effect, end up admitting our own impotence and uselessness. This I am certainly not prepared to do. I will not stand by and see the Senate trampled under foot. I will not see Parliament raped. I insist that we should advise the other place that we are still convinced of the value of this amendment.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Will Senator Choquette permit me to ask him two questions?

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Not embarrassing, I hope.

[Hon. Mr. Choquette.]

Hon. Mr. Martin: First of all, does he agree that it is desirable that this wiretapping bill should be operative?

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Well, I am going to tell you something: no bill is better than a bad bill, and the police—

Hon. Mr. Martin: Can the honourable senator—

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Just a moment. The police have used their discretion up until now, and I do not know of any abuses that have occurred. If this is rejected, I am still hopeful and confident that the police chiefs and the police throughout this country, including the RCMP, will do their duty and will not create any abuses.

Hon. Mr. Martin: I am grateful to Senator Choquette for that answer. Can he say to the Senate now that, if it insists on its amendment, the attitude of the party to which he belongs in the other place—

Hon. Mr. Choquette: That is politics.

Hon. Mr. O'Leary: Come on!

Hon. Mr. Martin: No, this is not politics.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: I have already condemned that.

Hon. Mr. Martin: It is not politics.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Go ahead!

Hon. Mr. Martin: If, as Senator Choquette has admitted, the bill is desirable as an operative measure and we now send it back to the other place, is there not a danger that the bill will be killed in the other place, as it was yesterday?

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Why not?

Hon. Mr. Martin: I am asking the question.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: I gave you my answer at first: no bill is better than a bad bill! I have all confidence in the police throughout this country that they will carry out their duties as honourable men.

Hon. Mr. Martin: I am not asking for confidence in the police. I am asking if the honourable gentleman can assure us that he has confidence in the party to which he belongs in the other place—

Hon. Mr. O'Leary: Oh, come on now!

Hon. Mr. Choquette: That is ridiculous!

Hon. Mr. Martin: —and that it will not stand in the way of this amendment's being accepted and not being rejected as it was yesterday.

An Hon. Senator: Sit down!

Hon. Mr. Choquette: That is too ridiculous to answer.

Hon. Mr. Martin: No, that is not ridiculous.

Hon. Mr. O'Leary: That is not worthy of the Senate.

The Hon. the Speaker: I regret to interrupt this important debate, honourable senators, but I must inform honourable senators that a message has been received from the House of Commons.

ENERGY SUPPLIES EMERGENCY BILL

FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-236, to provide a means to conserve the supplies of petroleum products within Canada during periods of national emergency caused by shortages or market disturbances affecting the national security and welfare and the economic stability of Canada, and to amend the National Energy Board Act.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. Mr. Martin: Later this day.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: At the next sitting.

Hon. Mr. Martin: No, later this day. It all depends on the progress we make.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: At the next sitting!

Hon. Mr. Martin: That will likely be on Monday.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Don't push us!

The Hon. the Speaker: Senator Martin, are you moving that the bill be given second reading later this day?

Hon. Mr. Martin: I am making the usual observation that, if we finish the matter before us now—and I do not think we will—then we will proceed to the next item of business, which will be the measure to which Your Honour has directed our attention. But it may be that we will not be dealing with that measure until some time next week, perhaps as late as the end of next week.

The Hon. the Speaker: But you are moving that it be read the second time later this day.

It is moved by the Honourable Senator Martin, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Langlois, that this bill be read the second time later this day. Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: No.

Motion agreed to, on division.

PROTECTION OF PRIVACY BILL

BILL TO AMEND CERTAIN ACTS—MOTION FOR NON-INSISTENCE UPON SENATE AMENDMENT—DEBATE ADJOURNED

The Senate resumed consideration of the message from the House of Commons disagreeing with the amendment made by the Senate to Bill C-176, to amend the Criminal Code, the Crown Liability Act and the Official Secrets Act.

Hon. Hartland de M. Molson: Honourable senators, today, as usual, when we came into the chamber we started with our prayers. Amongst those prayers there is one for the Senate in its legislative capacity. I think that today may be one of those days on which we need a little guidance from above, because certainly the problem we have at the moment is a difficult one and does require wisdom and patience to solve it in the best interests of Parliament and of the country.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Molson: In the first place, in looking at the reason why we have this bill back today, it becomes obvious that the concern of those who sent it back to us was not the protection of privacy for the ordinary, hard-working Canadian. The bill is here for political reasons only.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Molson: Very simply, it is here for political reasons.

The socialist party, in their continuing endeavour to eliminate the Senate and to make a one-house Parliament where there would be no brakes or checks on any socialistic measures, put it forward. Unfortunately, the Tories' desire for power, the desire to govern at almost any cost, put them into bed with the NDP. Those parties have completely different motives, completely different ideals, completely different principles. They have only one common factor, and that is frustration. I hate to think what such a misalliance caused by frustration might produce in the way of progeny.

As is generally known, I am not a member of Senator Goldenberg's committee, but I have followed the proceedings in detail. I believe that the amendment which was proposed by our committee is in the best interests of the public.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Molson: Why do I say this? In the first place, it is not the ordinary man or woman in Canada who is frightened of being bugged. They will not be bugged. They are not concerned about this. It is limited to only a small layer of people who have the concern that electronic eavesdropping may be used to get information about them.

Second, under the bill as proposed, the protection of privacy is already being achieved, except that the authorities can wiretap, and that is under judicial supervision, as my friend said.

● (1640)

Third, there is no wiretapping without judicial authority.

Fourth, wiretapping is only possible, or certainly only worthwhile, against major criminals. It is not being used, nor is it proposed to be used, for petty thieves or people who steal a loaf of bread, and so on. It is designed for use against a very limited group, namely, major criminals and organized criminals.

Fifth, most of the people in this country, like those everywhere else in the world, have nothing to hide.

Sixth, this bill actually helps most organized criminals and the few—it is unfortunate that there are any—criminal lawyers who live and move in criminal circles. There is no use denying the fact that those types exist. Every now and again they come up out of the froth, and we see them. We know they are there.

Last, and most important, the clause that was amended operates to hinder only one group, and that is the police—nobody else. This requirement of the 90-day notice to the person being tapped makes, as the evidence heard in committee shows, the work of the police more difficult. They are the only people being hindered.

We all agree that the public should be protected in every possible way, but at this moment I am convinced that it needs to be protected more from criminals who destroy our liberty by violence, dope, gambling and prostitution, than from our police forces. I agree with Senator Choquette when he says that we have very fine police forces in Canada. Every police force has the odd poor type, but certainly in Canada we have every reason to have great confidence and pride in our police forces. I think they should be the last people from whom we should take steps to protect the public

I do not want to go on at length on this, honourable senators, but, to me, the issue comes back to the committee's initial consideration. Was the committee right, or was it wrong? Was it acting on principle, or was it acting on expediency?

The Globe and Mail, which is called Canada's national newspaper—although I think some of my friends of Quebec might disagree with that—for Thursday, January 10, 1974 contains something that I would like to read:

> The compromise was wrong on two grounds. The new clause is wrong in itself. The New Democratic Party has been right in rejecting it from the first. It would permit intolerable invasion of privacy; it would negate most of the protections against excessive police use of electronic eavesdropping.

Now, that, honourable senators, on the record, is false.

Further on in the same editorial we read the following:

> The clause was rejected by a Senate in a fit of petulance. Some senators have themselves admitted that their quarrel was not with this bill but with another bill, which they felt they had been given insufficient time to assess.

What utter nonsense! What sheer poppycock!

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Molson: The Senate has often received inconsiderate treatment from the House of Commons. In fact, it does every year; it does on every adjournment. That, however, does not mean that the members of this chamber can have it said that they acted in a fit of petulance, or did something that is embarrassing and awkward to Parliament, just because they feel themselves offended.

The editorial goes on to state:

> It was a childish and irresponsible action, and seen to be so.

I assume that means that it was seen to be so by the writer.

Honourable senators, it has been suggested in some of the media, and in the other place, that we have chosen a confrontation with the House of Commons. I think this is completely wrong.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Of course.

Hon. Mr. Molson: I have been here 18 years, and I do not remember the Senate ever adopting an attitude where they were seeking a reason to have a confrontation with the House of Commons. I think the attitude has always been that we are one of the three parts of Parliament. We have our duties, and we try to carry them out. We certainly do not intend to be told by the other house what to do, but I do not remember a single time when we have deliberately gone out of our way to seek a confrontation.

I think, therefore, that this suggestion, this attitude, is completely wrong. It carries me on to Senator Goldenberg's remarks about not making this amendment a confrontation; that if we wish a confrontation, we should seize on a good issue. Well, again, I simply cannot agree with that. The bill came to the Senate and the Senate has, as has been mentioned several times, a right and a duty to review legislation. It reviews it; it does what it thinks is necessary with the legislation. In this case it suggested an amendment. I believe that it was the right thing to do, and I believe that if we are convinced that the committee acted in the right way, we should stand behind it.

I would go a little further, and say that if in the Senate we are not permitted to amend a bill for reasons which we consider to be valid or good, we simply should not be here. As far as I am concerned, the political pressures that exist generally, or frequently, among members of the two houses, do not exist. I am not a member of any of the parties concerned. As far as I am personally concerned, that is the issue. We are here, and if we cannot amend legislation that is put before us for consideration then we should not be here. That is the way the issue appears to me. As far as I am concerned, I shall govern myself in the light of developments.

Hon. Mr. Martin: I think we are all in agreement with that.

Hon. George McIlraith: Honourable senators, the message coming from the other place seems to be quite a simple one. It rejects our amendment deleting a clause in a bill, the clause itself containing no question of principle whatsoever, but being very significant in its implications as to the administration of law and justice in this country. There are other implications in the message from the House of Commons that I think we are compelled to deal with.

The House of Commons has rejected our amendment to a very important bill. Our amendment deleting that clause, as I said, does not involve a question of principle relating to the bill, but it is a clause, nonetheless, that is very harmful, and we will have to consider all the facts relating to it.

Those facts are these: All parties in the other house, as I understand the matter, desire legislation protecting the privacy of individuals against electronic surveillance and intrusion. That is very commendable. All honourable senators, so far as I know, desire exactly the same thing.

● (1650)

Here we are in an extraordinary situation. It is the only case that I can recall where all members of the House of Commons—certainly all parties in the House of Commons—and all members of the Senate desire legislation making what we popularly call wiretapping—although that is a somewhat inaccurate term—illegal. Everyone desires that. Everyone agrees with that principle. There is no question about that. I think everyone also agrees with the principle that the realities of life make it necessary that we should provide that those charged with the administration of justice—the police, and the attorneys general of the provinces, who have constitutional jurisdiction over the administration of justice—should have a limited right to wiretap.

A secondary principle is that the exception to the general principle, about which I have spoken, should be carefully safeguarded by the judicial process. The exception granted to police authorities should be granted only when they are able to convince an appropriate judge that it is necessary. The limitations on a judge's ability to grant such an exception to the general rule are prescribed in the bill. The bill provides adequate penalties for an illegal wiretap. That is all to the good. There is no difficulty about that.

Then, for some reason that remains obscure, there were two other characteristics involved. One is that no one can figure out how section 178.23, which we deleted by our amendment and which the House of Commons put back in, relates to the protection of privacy of the individual—which is something that everyone, in both houses, has agreed should be protected. The provisions of the section apply after the wiretap has taken place. The section does not protect the privacy of individuals. Their privacy has already been invaded. The protection of an individual's privacy lies in making it a criminal offence to wiretap, to possess wiretapping equipment, and in the judicial process limiting and preceding any wiretap by the police. That is where the protection of an individual's privacy lies, and that is the only place in the bill where it can lie.

The section with which we are concerned today merely provides notice to certain persons after the event, and that has nothing to do with the protection of privacy.

I should perhaps add here a qualification. At one time I was a law officer for the Crown, one of several, and I had the responsibility with others of preparing the first drafts of legislation which has now become Bill C-176. We took the usual steps to process the kind of legislation that we thought suitable. We worked very hard on this. Our bill was not completed. The bill with which I was concerned was not brought forward, but it was essentially the same type as this. Having had that responsibility, I followed the debates with great interest. In addition, I discussed the subject with people whose opinion on matters of law I respect.

The bill with which we are now dealing was presented in the other place many months ago. The committee of the other place dealt with it over a long period, and I obtained a copy of the report of each sitting of that committee as it was printed.

I gained the impression that the motives of the member of the House of Commons who presented what became the particular section with which we are today concerned were good. It was his desire that it would make more complete, perfect and desirable the legislation, which is what we all want.

If honourable senators refer to the House of Commons committee proceedings on this subject, they will find it is quite clear that the members did not address themselves to the draftsmanship of the clause—to exactly what it did and meant. Mr. Atkey put what he wished to achieve by the clause very well. He was speaking on a supplementary—

Hon. Mr. Martin: Which page?

Hon. Mr. McIlraith: On page 28:10 of the report of the committee proceedings, issue No. 28. He said:

> I think this amendment is here to serve as an assistance to a person who discovers that he has been the victim or an object of a tap or electronic surveillance.

He made it quite clear. That is very laudable. I agree with his motives. He goes on in that theme. But the members of the other place did not address themselves to the draftsmanship of the clause they put in to accomplish this, and with great deference I hope to show honourable senators that the clause itself does not do what the honourable member intended it to do.

I am one of those who yield to no one in expressing respect and admiration for the institution of the House of Commons. I make no apology for saying that, and I will repeat it as often as I need to. However, if honourable senators read the debates on this subject in the other place, they will see, under the curious procedure followed because of the most recent amendments to the rules, that amendments are voted on by number. If they look at Hansard, when this section was originally voted on in the House of Commons, they will find there was a problem in deciphering the number of the amendment being voted on. They will see from the discussion and debate that the precise wording of what was being voted on was not put before the house.

If one looks at yesterday's House of Commons Debates one finds that again the precise words in the section and its meaning were not discussed.

I am saying that there was no discussion of the precise wording of the section that they put back into the bill, and which they have sent back to us. It is regrettable, but it is so. I genuinely believe—I shall have more to say about this later on—that if the members of the other place had read the clause itself, in a particular and specific way, they would not for one moment have sent back the message in the way they did, and without giving the clause the consideration it should have received.

● (1700)

Having said that, I think it is only fair to say that in dealing with this bill in committee perhaps we made a mistake in not putting on the record a whole lot of repetition. Instead, we dealt with the one point rather quickly, and let it go. Also, when the report came back to the house we did not spell out in lengthy fashion exactly why we deleted the clause. Had we done that I am sure this subsequent difficulty might not have arisen.

But there is one other interesting thing, that being the way in which the media has handled this piece of legislation. I have not seen any matter so misrepresented to the public by the press as has this amendment by the Senate, and everything subsequent to it. We have the Toronto Globe and Mail, a great newspaper with quality news coverage, running a continuous barrage of editorials against the Senate throughout discussion on this point. I do not intend to bore honourable senators by going through them. Senator Molson has already drawn the attention of the Senate to one. It is sad. It is perfectly obvious that the editorial writer had not read the bill. Indeed, it would have been quite impossible for him to have done so at the time he wrote the first item regarding the Senate amendment. It is quite clear to anyone who is interested in the responsibility of Parliament, and, in particular, interested in the amendment to this bill, that all his writings have been quite uncontaminated by the facts.

I do not make any such allusion regarding the news columns of that newspaper, but only to the factual references in its editorials which contain news instead of viewpoints and comments on the news. That is an interesting distinction and one which should be borne in mind.

I would point out that there are responsible reporters, such as Arthur Blakely of the Montreal Gazette, and one of the reporters of the Ottawa Journal. The Journal has been the most responsible newspaper in dealing with this amendment of any of the papers I have read, and I commend it. But even that newspaper, in dealing with this subject in its news columns, said that the clause we are concerned with provided for notifying the subject of the wiretap. It does nothing of the sort. Mr. Blakely, who wrote a very good and responsible article on this subject, made the same mistake. The Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, in its news broadcast of this morning, made the same error. Again it said that the clause provided that the subject of the wiretap be notified. That is a gross error all the way through.

I shall not labour this point any further, except to say that Senator Choquette, just before he began his remarks on this subject, drew my attention to the editorial in the Montreal Gazette of this morning headed, "Determination of House." Regrettably, I had not seen it up to that point, but I have now read it. All I can say about that editorial is that the writer is totally uncontaminated by the facts relating to this bill. I do not think that editorial deserves any further comment from me. It should be treated as it deserves. As far as I am concerned, I do not care what opinion that editorial writer holds of me so long as he is so completely uncontaminated by the facts, as is shown in that editorial. Any opinion he may hold of me is a matter of complete indifference to me. That editorial is, of course, as all honourable senators are aware, and as all members of the other place are aware, quite contrary to the facts.

Hon. Mr. Forsey: I wonder if the honourable senator would permit just one question. Would he perhaps enlarge a little on the point he just made about the subject of the interception which, from conversations I have had with him, I understand he contrasts with the object of the interception, which I think is the language used in the bill?

Hon. Mr. McIlraith: I shall be coming to that in a few moments.

Hon. Mr. Forsey: That is a very important point.

Hon. Mr. McIlraith: I shall deal with it specifically.

Here, then, we have a message from the other place, and a situation where we believe the members there did not address themselves specifically to the point of concern to the Senate. I shall have something more to say about that later. We have also the curious coincidence that the media, for one reason or another, equally have not addressed themselves to the subject matter.

I must say that I was very much impressed with the quality of the speeches made here this afternoon. It indicates to me that honourable senators have addressed themselves with great thoroughness and particularity to the point at issue.

I think it is important, so that we will not have this misrepresentation to the public assiduously going on as it has been, that we put on record exactly what it is we are dealing with here. The subject is the proposed new section 178.23 of the Criminal Code. With the permission of honourable senators, I should like to have that section printed at this point in Hansard exactly as it appears in the bill.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The proposed new section follows:

178.23 (1) The Attorney General of the province in which the application was made or the Solicitor General of Canada, as the case may be, shall notify in writing within ninety days next following the period for which the authorization was given the person who was the object of the interception pursuant to the authorization and shall, in a manner prescribed by regulation, certify to the court that issued the authorization that such person has been notified.

(2) Subsection (1) does not apply

(a) in the case of a warrant issued under subsection 16(2) of the Official Secrets Act, or

(b) where the Attorney General of the province in which the application is made or the Solicitor General of Canada, as the case may be, certifies within the said ninety days in a manner prescribed by regulations to the judge who granted the authorization that the investigation is continuing and the judge is of the opinion that the interests of justice require that a delay of a determinate reasonable length be granted, in which case the judge may grant a determinate reasonable delay."

Hon. Mr. McIlraith: It will be noted that the essence of the section is very simple. It is that the attorney general of the province concerned or the Solicitor General of Canada, as the case may be, shall notify in writing the person who was the object of the interception. That is the only requirement of that provision. There are other subsidiary points, but that is the absolute requirement. There are no exceptions. It must be done. The person who is the object of the interception must be notified.

Yesterday the Minister of Justice for Canada, having been questioned by senators when he appeared before our committee, and having almost embarrassingly begged and cajoled us publicly, as appears from the record, and privately to the point of almost humiliating himself in an effort to have us pass this clause notwithstanding its defects, prepared and moved a comprehensive amendment. I think it also should be part of the record of this place so that persons who want to examine this subject—particularly students who I hope will study it in due course—may do so. It simply substitutes a new section 178.23.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: Who was humiliated?

Hon. Mr. McIlraith: It is quite lengthy, and I do not think I need read it. I would ask that the motion the Minister of Justice put in the House of Commons be printed in the record at this point in my remarks. It was a rather different approach to this problem, and was meant to meet the wishes of the members of the House of Commons who originated the section. It required notification only if required by a decision of the judge; that the judge determined whether persons should be notified at all. There is a rather interesting improvement here, one part of which I will read:

● (1710)

> —the judge . . . shall consider if it is in the interests of justice and the protection of privacy that any person—

Notice this.

> —whose private communications have been intercepted be notified of such interception.

The requirement was that the person whose telephone was tapped be notified, and not the person who was the object of the interception. If I have permission, I would like the whole motion to be printed at this point.

Hon. Mr. Molson: Honourable senators, I think it would be desirable if the honourable senator were to read it in, because there is a custom here not to take extracts from the proceedings in the other place, although it has gone on for a great many years.

Hon. Mr. McIlraith: I shall gladly read it, although I apologize for its length. The motion the Minister of Justice made yesterday in the House of Commons, appearing at page 9232 of yesterday's Hansard, was:

> That this House does not concur in the amendment made by the Senate to Bill C-176, An act to amend the Criminal Code, the Crown Liability Act and the Official Secrets Act, but that instead of the said amendment the said Bill be amended by striking out lines 16 to 44 on page 18 and substituting the following:
>
> 178.23(1) Subject to subsection (4), within ninety days next following the period for which an authorization or any renewal thereof was given, a person specially designated in writing for the purposes of this section by the Attorney General of the province in which the application for the authorization was made or the Solicitor General of Canada, as the case may be, shall make a report, in writing, to the judge who gave the authorization or any renewal thereof or, if such judge is unable to act, a judge of the same jurisdiction, specifying the progress of the investigation in relation to which the authorization or any renewal thereof was given.
>
> (2) Upon receipt of the report referred to in subsection (1), the judge to whom the report was made shall consider if it is in the interests of justice and the protection of privacy that any person whose private communications have been intercepted be notified of such interception.

Honourable senators, I hope I have read that clearly and with accuracy.

It will be noted that that proposal deals with one of the main points of the reason for our rejection. It does provide for notification being made to the person whose telephones have been wiretapped, rather than the person who was the object of the wiretapping. The other clause, which we are now asked to accept and leave in, is of a quite different nature. It does not provide for notification of that person. It provides for notification of what in a great many cases will not be the person whose telephone has been wiretapped; it may or may not be the person whose telephone has been wiretapped. It may, on the other hand, be the alleged criminal, or the one in respect of whom the judge has already found enough evidence to warrant this method of obtaining further evidence to prove the charges, or ascertaining if there has been a crime. Indeed, it may be a convicted criminal in respect of whom the wiretap has been successful, a criminal who has been arrested and convicted. Even if he has pleaded guilty he may be the one required to be notified. It is a most extraordinary provision.

I think I must say out of fairness that it is also perfectly clear that Mr. Knowles, who was for many years my colleague in the House of Commons—I was going to say for decades, but I do not want to put it in that way.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Why not?

Hon. Mr. McIlraith: Let me say for many years.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: That is all right. You are getting old, and so am I.

Hon. Mr. McIlraith: He is a man with excellent standards, and no one would suggest for one minute that it is his objective to aid and assist criminals. However, it is regrettable that he, in his desire to carry on the continuing objective he has—which he is perfectly entitled to hold if he so wishes—of changing the jurisdiction of the Senate, or indeed to eliminate or restrict its powers, should willingly aid and assist criminals in their work as criminals merely to further indirectly his attacks on the Senate. I can only speculate on what caused him to fail to look at the section itself to see what it in fact did. It is regrettable that, for that or some other reason, he decided that they must, without examination, send the section back and so confront the Senate. That is his way of business. I do not know what his motive was, but I do know his publicly repeated attitude towards the Senate.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: Honourable senators—

Hon. Mr. McIlraith: Just a moment, please. I do know that he is a very conscientious member of the House of Commons, and I am wondering if this results from the fatigue caused by the incredibly heavy demands made on members of the House of Commons in this present session of Parliament, which has continued since last January 4. During that time he and most other members have attended for incredibly long hours every day. Perhaps for that reason there was a slip somewhere. I do not know, but there it is.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: Pardon me, honourable senators. I rise—

The Hon. the Speaker: Order. Senator McIlraith has the floor. Unless he gives permission for a question then, under the rules, I do not think he should be interrupted.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: Madam Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege, because Senator McIlraith was referring to a particular member of the other place.

● (1720)

I do not think our rules provide that a senator can refer to a member in the other place, because that gives him a certain privilege. However, more particularly, on a question of privilege I ask the honourable senator to let us have the name of that individual he was quoting. Let us have the point which he was supposed to be making.

Hon. Mr. Molson: That is not a question of privilege.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: Let us have the point he was supposed to be making, Senator McIlraith, and which you were attempting to interpolate in your remarks here. Of course, you will never do that, but let us have the name of the imaginary member of the other place—

Hon. Mr. Molson: Order.

Hon. Mr. Buckwold: Order.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: And let us have—

Hon. Mr. Buckwold: Madam Speaker, I would submit that this is not a question of privilege in the way it is being put.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: It is a question of privilege, Senator Buckwold.

Hon. Mr. Buckwold: Order. Madam Speaker has risen.

The Hon. the Speaker: I do not think the speech being made by the honourable senator involves a question of privilege at this time.

[Hon. Mr. McIlraith.]

Hon. Mr. McIlraith: Honourable senators, if I may continue, since I did not grant permission for a question, I noted that the honourable member who was the author of this particular clause in the bill, and who was trying to do something desirable with the bill when he put it forward, tried to co-operate—and this I cannot substantiate, although I believe it—in getting an amendment which would achieve the objectives he was seeking and meet the objections we had taken to the clause. I commend him for that. There is a part of this that I find difficult to understand, however, and I can only take the official record of the House of Commons of yesterday on the matter. I find in House of Commons Debates the Leader of the Official Opposition for some reason not clearly set out in his remarks seems to have departed from what publicly—at least so we were led to believe—was the reasonable and proper position of two or three of the members in his party who were dealing with this subject matter. I think their attitude was very reasonable in what they were trying to achieve. The amendments they were proposing were good. I do not know that I would have offered them in quite the same way, but they were really an honest attempt to deal with the subject.

For some reason which remains obscure the Leader of the Opposition let himself get sidetracked, and he repudiated his own members and supported the NDP. He did give as his reason the fact that the minister would not give an undertaking that he obviously should not have been asked to give, and could not give. Any parliamentarian should know at once that the minister could not give the undertaking asked. He has no authority to do so. Anyone who has had responsibility in a minority Parliament, of all Parliaments, should know such an undertaking would be meaningless if given, because in a minority House of Commons one thing is clear, namely, that neither the government, nor an individual minister in the government can give a commitment of the kind asked by the Leader of the Official Opposition. That is something determined by the members themselves—not just the members of any one party, whether it be the government party or any other.

In any event, all I can say on that is to suggest that honourable senators read those debates carefully. Although I do not have the reference at the moment, he makes it clear that he supports the principle of the bill and is quite keen to get it through. That is clear.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: But who is "he"?

Hon. Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Stanfield is his name. The other leader of that party is sitting in the gallery now.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: You have always had difficulty in differentiating between your "hes" and "shes".

Some Hon. Senators: Order.

Hon. Mr. McIlraith: I am always respectful of the Leader of the Official Opposition, in both this place and the other place. Let there be no confusion about that.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: Confusion in what regard?

Hon. Mr. McIlraith: If I may continue with my remarks—

Hon. Mr. Phillips: I think you should sit down. Her Honour has risen.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, this is an important debate. We want to have all the information we possibly can, but I must remind honourable senators that one of our rules says that allusions to debates in the other house in the current session are out of order. It is usually understood that we really do not know what has taken place in the other house. Therefore, I ask the speakers in this debate to follow that rule more closely.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: Honourable senators—

Hon. Mr. McIlraith: Madam Speaker, I readily accept your ruling and I apologize for having forgotten that rule. I shall make no further reference to the subject. I apologize if I violated the rule. I certainly had no intention of doing so.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: Honourable senators, I have been attempting to rise on a point of order. Surely I have that right, and the right to be recognized by Madam Speaker.

The point of order on which I rise is really not that important, but I should like to point out that I, as one of those poor, unfortunate individuals who are on the wrong side of the dialogue—

Hon. Mr. Buckwold: I rise on the same point of order that I rose on before. We are not listening to a question of privilege now; we are hearing another speech. I suggest that Senator McIlraith be allowed to proceed.

Hon. Mr. McIlraith: Honourable senators, I have dealt with that point sufficiently. Since the rules prevent me from dealing with it further in any event—and I am most anxious to follow the rules meticulously—I shall proceed to another point that confronts us, a point we have to consider quite apart from the substance of the matter.

I have dealt with the substance, and I believe I have pointed out part of the defect in the section about which we are speaking. Part of the defect is that it requires the person who is the object of the wiretap to be notified. It does not require the notification to go to the person whose telephone is being tapped. Since most of the criminals do not have telephones of their own, and since the wiretaps are usually made on a friend or some other person, notification should be to the person whose telephone is tapped. For example, in stock fraud cases the notification should be to persons whose telephones have been tapped—persons who are on the sucker list of the alleged criminals—instead of to the criminals. In the drug cases, likewise, it is not the drug importer but some other person—it might be the airline agency—whose telephone is tapped.

It is the criminal in all those cases who is required to be notified, and I am quite sure that anyone would desire that notification should be to the person whose telephone is tapped, whether he be the criminal or not. I am also certain that no one, had he really thought about the section and examined it, would have put the authorities in the position of having no escape whatever from the requirement to notify, although a time delay provision in respect of notifying the criminal in some cases is provided. It is a legal point, and it is upsetting that it was not spotted and dealt with. Anyway, so much for the merits of the section.

● (1730)

We are now confronted by a practical situation. It has been admirably set out by Senator Goldenberg, and, I must say, by most of the others. We have a bad section being put back in a piece of legislation by the enactment of another place, and sent to us in this message, and we have to decide what to do in the circumstance?

I must say that I am unaware of any discussions having taken place regarding, or of anybody having considered or thought about, a conference. There are provisions in the rules of the other house, as there are provisions in our rules, for a conference, and nobody has explored that. I am sorry the government leader in the Senate is not in the house at the moment. I would like to ask him—

Hon. Mr. Bourget: Call 6 o'clock.

Hon. Mr. McIlraith: There is a demand that we call 6 o'clock, Madam Speaker.

The Hon. the Speaker: Pursuant to Rule 12, it being 6 o'clock, I now leave the Chair until 8 o'clock this evening, unless the Senate, by a manifest consent, decides to complete the day's business at once.

The Senate adjourned until 8 p.m.

At 8 p.m. the sitting was resumed.

Hon. Mr. McIlraith: Honourable senators, prior to the recess at 6 o'clock I was starting to develop a line of argument as to what we should do in the present situation, knowing that the clause that was restored is defective and will not achieve what its proponents sought to achieve, knowing that the members of the other place did not address themselves to the draftsmanship of the clause they intended to put in, either in committee or when the bill came before the house and an amendment was considered, or again yesterday when they were dealing with our amendment removing the clause from the bill.

The clause as drafted—not as intended but as drafted—will aid and assist criminals or suspected criminals and will not provide for the notification in all cases of persons whose telephones or properties are wiretapped. Curiously enough, it is linked to legal wiretaps made by the police authorities only, but is not applicable to illegal wiretaps that they discover and where the criminal who did the wiretapping is prosecuted. In those cases, the clause does not require that the person be notified.

There is a good deal more that I could say about the clause and its draftsmanship. However, there is no question of principle in it. It is merely the expression of a genuine desire to improve the bill but regrettably has very serious consequences in the results it achieves. It comes after the wiretap and not before, and therefore does not protect the individual from any invasion of privacy.

Knowing that, what are the alternatives for us to consider? As I see it, a simple rejection of the message from the House of Commons is not good or realistic, because it must be apparent to everyone that the leader in sending the matter back to us was Mr. Knowles.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. McIlraith: His purpose was to create a confrontation with the Senate in order, as he has often repeated, to reform the Senate by restricting or taking away its power to legislate as one of the Houses of Parliament. That is an objective which he has asserted openly many times in debate; indeed he has many times asserted his desire to abolish the Senate. That obviously is his purpose. If you read yesterday's Hansard of the House of Commons, you will see that he was successful, by some device in the heat and fatigue of this final stage of the session, in making the Leader of the Official Opposition his accomplice—perhaps "accomplice" is not fair, but the Leader of the Official Opposition was made an assistant, probably unwittingly. I am not accusing him of bad motives, but he was put in the position, probably unwittingly, of contributing to the defeat of the government amendment. He was successful in bringing the Leader of the Opposition in the other place into a position where he supported the reinstating of the defective clause. I am absolutely sure that had Mr. Stanfield read this section carefully he would have agreed, as would his supporters who take the main interest in this subject in the other place, with the amendment put forward by the Honourable Mr. Lang. Had they appreciated the situation they would have accepted that amendment, or at least proposed some amendment to improve the clause.

I am absolutely certain that the last thing they would want to do would be to assist criminals or would-be or suspected criminals in the achievement of their criminal activity. I am absolutely certain of that. In any event, they were enticed into the false position they took yesterday.

If we simply reject it and send it back they will be in an embarrassing position. They proposed the clause in good faith in the first instance.

Hon. Mr. Asselin: Why don't we propose a conference between the two chambers?

Hon. Mr. McIlraith: I will be coming to that. I mentioned that just before 6 o'clock. To me, simply returning the matter to the House of Commons is out of the question. It would not be a responsible step. It would mean that Mr. Knowles would simply filibuster and prevent the House of Commons from dealing with it. That is the predicament we would be in. It would make for an impossible situation for an already tired House of Commons which, because of the exigencies of a minority government, has carried on under almost impossible conditions. Bringing them back to meet a filibuster would not be reasonable and sensible in the circumstances.

There is another thing bothering me. I know I am taking long, Senator O'Leary, but I believe the subject matter with which we are confronted is of such vital importance that we have to explain and put on the record—because of the unfortunate failure of the media to report fairly and accurately what happened—everything in connection with this matter. I must take the time, at the risk of boring you, to get accurately and fully on the record every facet of this subject.

Hon. Mr. O'Leary: They don't believe the record.

Hon. Mr. McIlraith: If we simply adopt it we are in danger—and I hope other senators will address themselves to this point—of having helped Mr. Knowles achieve what he wants, the restriction of the right of the Senate to legislate. This clause involves no principle. It is just a nuisance clause with bad consequences. As I say, if we simply adopt it we are in danger of having helped Mr. Knowles achieve reform of the Senate by cutting down its right to legislate in the ordinary way, as it traditionally has.

We should consider whether there is any real danger in that. I cannot believe that it is really the desire of the members of the other place, other than the NDP, to do that. I believe that the Official Opposition would not, for a moment, have acquiesced in what was done in the other place yesterday had they thought that that was the situation. I think everyone here would agree that we must not amend the Constitution to take away, impair or cut down sharply the power of the Senate as a legislative body by this indirect means. The Senate, among other functions, certainly has some obligation or responsibility in important constitutional matters. We must protect, among other things, the rights of the provinces. To impair or cut down the right of the Senate in the legislative field without consulting with the provinces is, to me, offensive.

That is the view I hold on the matter, so if we simply accept the message from the house expressing our acceptance of the clause being put back in the bill we must be very careful that we are not achieving the objective that some may have had, which I have stated. It should be looked at, and I would like to hear the views of other senators on that point. I am quite certain that that was not the position of the Official Opposition in their vote last night.

That leaves us to consider what we do. I frankly and bluntly admit that for me it is a great conundrum, a great problem. I was very much taken with the reasoned and calm speech made by Senator Goldenberg in opening the debate this afternoon. I must say, I envied him his ability to speak clearly and with great accuracy, but I do not think the matter is quite as simple as he put it. I should like to hear my colleagues here discuss some of the other aspects that have been raised, which were raised so eloquently by Senator Choquette and others, before we adopt the course suggested by Senator Goldenberg.

What course should we adopt? I would ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate if he has considered, with his colleagues, the possibility of working out a conference. There are procedures in the rules of both houses for holding a conference, and they are relatively simple. In essence, it means that one house sets up a committee of three to hold a conference with the other house, and if the other house agrees, it sets up a committee of three. They then consider whether they can work out some compromise, and if they cannot the houses take action. I would like to know from the Leader of the Government whether he has considered that, whether he has taken any exploratory steps, and whether he considers it would have any possibility of success if we were to do that.

I am not prepared to make a motion for a conference at the moment, for the simple reason that I believe the nature of the debate and what has been indicated through the press by Mr. Knowles in the last few days would render such a conference with the House of Commons useless, no matter how willing the vast majority of the members of the House of Commons were to seek to work out some amendment that would improve the clause they have put in the bill, or would vary the clause suggested by the Minister of Justice to make it palatable to them.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Is it not a little late to talk about a conference? I understand that the House of Commons has adjourned until February 26.

Hon. Mr. McIlraith: Yes, that poses a real problem, I quite agree. I must say, I share the abhorrence of honourable senators about this business of always being thrust against a deadline here and expected to deal in one day with what the House of Commons took eight or ten months to deal with, and expected to deal with it competently. I find it offensive. It does pose a problem and we will have to consider that carefully. Quite frankly, it is very much on my mind. I doubt if a conference is the right method. I wish it had been considered earlier, because it is conceivable we might have to adopt Senator Goldenberg's motion. Distasteful as I find that to be in the circumstances, it may well be the best solution.

● (2010)

Certainly, there is no will here on this matter to have a confrontation with the House of Commons. If we are going to have a confrontation with the House of Commons, which I certainly do not ever want or ever hope to have, it has to be on some question of principle, and this involves no principle whatever.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: But this conference could not have taken place before today. We had to wait until the other house had returned the bill because it had to deal with our amendment.

Hon. Mr. McIlraith: I realize that, but there could have been some gesture somewhere in the remarks made in the other place yesterday which would have shown some willingness to reach a reasoned solution to an embarrassing problem which had arisen through the circumstances I have described at some length today.

Honourable senators, I have spoken at greater length than I intended, but I did feel it was necessary to put on record what I thought needed to be put on record.

[Translation]

Hon. Martial Asselin: Honourable senators, I believe that the Senate is now attending an extremely important debate. We have heard this afternoon and tonight also the opinions of many of our colleagues on the question being dealt with and on the motion introduced at the start of the sitting by Senator Goldenberg.

I shall be brief for I support entirely the ideas expressed this afternoon by Senator Choquette. I am a member of the Senate since only recently, but I believe, Senator Choquette, that you have made your best contribution in a long time. You have stated frankly your ideas which I think reflect the opinion of the opposition group you are now leading.

We are now faced with a test of credibility, credibility of the Senate towards the population. Yet, I would not go so far as to endorse completely the arguments put forward by Senator Goldenberg when he proposed his motion this afternoon. I respect Senator Goldenberg's constitutional knowledge. But I do believe he had an extremely difficult case to plead this afternoon. That is why—and I shall say so later—I do not agree totally with the reasons he gave the Senate to convince it of accepting his motion.

Senator Goldenberg was right in saying that the rights of the Senate are recognized by the Canadian Constitution. There is no doubt about that assertion. But when Senator Goldenberg tells us we should beware of provoking a confrontation with the House of Commons, because the stakes are not high enough, I balk at that argument.

As Senator McIlraith said, we are not discussing a fundamental principle. Still, the fact remains that the attitude of Senate towards the matter will determine whether or not the Senate must still exercise the legislative powers vested in it by the Constitution.

I am not prepared to fall for the New Democratic Party's blackmail. Neither do I agree, as Senator Choquette put it, with the action of our party when they voted with the socialists. Quite possibly, this was due to an oversight on the part of our party or, if this is some kind of strategy, it is not the most successful that they have used so far in the House of Commons.

When NDP representatives say in the House of Commons that the Senate must pass this or else, I have the feeling that no senator who is aware of his responsibilities as a legislator ought to put up with such a statement and such provocation from the New Democratic Party. If it was the intention of the New Democratic Party to turn this into a political football in an attempt to convince the people, as they have been doing for several years, that the Senate is useless, that we do not do anything here, that we spend the taxpayers' money without giving due consideration to legislation, I do not think that we ought to follow the NDP in this campaign that they have been waging for several years against the Senate.

If the Senate agreed to the motion introduced today, it would mean that we would give in to the New Democratic Party's blackmail.

By the way, I must say at once that I am one of those who, precisely for that reason, will oppose the motion.

If we want to see the Senate abolished, we just have to continue to accept motions such as the one before us tonight. We are going to create a precedent because whenever the House of Commons returns a bill which we have amended, for fear of preventing a confrontation or an argument with the House of Commons we shall say: Well, it is just too bad, we may have made a mistake, but here is your bill, do what you want with it and we are not going to insist on our amendment. But, honourable senators, what would be the use of the Senate? Are we not going to ask this very question: should the Senate continue to exist? In my opinion, the question cannot be clearer.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: We shall come back to it some other time.

Hon. Mr. Asselin: I beg your pardon!

Hon. Mr. Langlois: When the question is asked, we shall answer it.

Hon. Mr. Asselin: In my opinion, the essential question is the one I have just asked.

The committee made a good study of this subject, and I would like to congratulate Senator Goldenberg on the way in which he conducted this study. He has my wholehearted support. Moreover, all the members of the committee did their duty according to their oath and their responsibilities as senators. The senators who sat on this committee simply voted for an amendment that would serve society in general, since it does not affect all society, as was mentioned during the debate, but simply a group of people who organize crime. The amendment concerned only those people and provided that a report be made to the victim of wiretapping 90 days after his telephone was tapped or that this person be advised that his phone was tapped.

As a senator told us—I do not remember his name, one of those who spoke today, Senator Molson—it is not all society that will be under police surveillance. What the chiefs of police who appeared before the Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs wanted was that they be left the tools, the necessary means to fight organized crime. By accepting the stand taken by the Senate, the decision made in the Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, we have protected the society's interest against people who are not afraid to resort to all kinds of means in order to commit crimes. Let us give the tools to the police, to the organized police corps, to enable them to fight against those who give way to crime.

Senator McIlraith was perfectly right when he said this afternoon that possibly, like those who were against the amendment, my leader had not read the wording of the law, he had not read the wording of the amendment or had not read the proceedings in the Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs.

Therefore, honourable senators, we do not have here a major confrontation. I do not want any confrontation with the House of Commons. I have too much respect for the House of Commons, since I spent 12 years there, and I know the value of the person elected by the people, who represents the interests of the people within the Parliament of Canada. This is not a confrontation. It is a matter of reaffirming the principle whereby the Senate is here to consider once more the pieces of legislation coming from the House of Commons, to amend them, modify them, in the best interests of the people. Having been appointed should not be reason to give up our responsibilities.

Sending back the bill to the House of Commons now would not prove anything.

The Government Leader said today to the Acting Leader of the Opposition: Do you want to have any legislation? Do you want legislation or no legislation at all? I think the answer has now been given: the House of Commons stands adjourned until February 26. If the legislation is sent back, the bill is not killed in any way, but I think, as Senator McIlraith said, it might be possible in the meantime to set up a conference between the House of Commons and the Senate to find a solution to the problem.

I hope that if a vote is taken on the issue it will be a free vote. And I call here upon my colleagues who belong to the majority.

It is not a question of voting against government legislation. It is only and simply a matter of reasserting a basic principle, namely, that the Senate is an institution which is part of the Parliament of Canada, and that institution when it considers legislation can amend it, send it back to the House of Commons. It is as simple as that and I hope knowing the broadness of mind of the government leader, that he will let his colleagues sitting with him vote freely.

Hon. Mr. Côté: We are all free.

Hon. Mr. Asselin: Those were the comments I had to make, honourable senators. I know there are others who wish to speak, so in conclusion I will repeat: It is not a question of basic principle but if, every time we take a certain position, bills are returned to the Senate because they are not acceptable to the House of Commons, that is not to say that the existence of the Senate is not justified. If abolition of the Senate is sought, let them say so frankly and we will have our word to say when this bill will come to the Senate. But I think that the decision we shall take tonight will be exceedingly important. I ask all my colleagues to think it over before voting for this motion.

Hon. Mr. Côté: Would the honourable senator permit a question?

Does this last request mean that each time the Senate will return an amended bill to the Commons they should always accept this amendment or whether this is the only one they should accept?

Hon. Mr. Asselin: If I said so I did not express myself as I intended.

Of course the Commons are entitled to reject any amendment we send them. It is seldom that we have amended bills which we sent back to the Commons.

Today is a test. It is a credibility test, as I just said. Ask the Canadian people, confrontation is useless. We have often been told that we are here to assert ourselves. This is an opportunity to do so. If it has been understood that I said that each time we return amended bills to the Commons they should be accepted by them, it is not what I meant.

● (2020)

Hon. Mr. Martin: Honourable senators, I want first to say to the Acting Leader of the Opposition that I generally agree with his assessment of the situation in the contribution that he made to this debate. We differ on method, as to what we should do.

There is no doubt that all of us in this chamber, firm protagonists of this institution, have been troubled by this matter. Regardless of where we sit, anxious to further the integrity of our parliamentary system and to maintain the integrity of the Senate, each of us in our own way is endeavoring to find a solution to a problem that has been laid in our lap by the other house.

Much has been said about the Senate during the past few days, in newspaper articles and in other sections of the media. Our opportunity for response is not always as easy in this chamber as it is in the other place, and our position has not been as fully exposed to the public as I think vigilant media should endeavour to assist us in doing.

But this is not new. It is a weakness that not only attends us, but it is something that in recent days has been attending the institution of Parliament itself.

No one could speak more eloquently and precisely on this point than Senator O'Leary, himself one of the great journalists of our country. However, we have to take the facts in our society as they are.

One thing is clear. Whatever may be said about the merits of the view taken by the Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee of this house with regard to our proposed amendment, it was a sincere amendment. It reflected the view of the Senate.

● (2030)

Some have argued that we had no right to put forward such an amendment. I need not spend much time arguing that point. Under the British North America Act, an act of Parliament can become such only after it has passed both Houses of Parliament, and then it must be sanctioned by the Crown. The Fathers of Confederation would not have put that provision into the written portion of our Constitution in 1867, vicariously through Westminster, had it not been that it was intended clearly that enactments, as distinguished from some other instruments, have to involve the consideration of both the House of Commons and the Senate.

So we in this chamber respond now in this debate and say that we have the right to make amendments which we believe in. That is the course that was followed in this chamber when it proposed the amendment, which was partially recognized in the modified proposal put forward by the Minister of Justice in the other place yesterday, notice of which had been given before Christmas.

It has been suggested that the Senate had no right to dispute, in this particular, the views of the other place. That is answered by what I have already said and by the provision in the BNA Act itself as to the two necessary parliamentary vehicles that must be employed if an act is to become the law of the land—participation of the Senate and of the House of Commons. And so we say that for what we have done we do not apologize. It was our right, and if it was our conviction, it was our duty.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Every participant in this debate, on both sides, has sought at the outset to put forward the point of view that all of us in this chamber have regarding this matter. That, in itself, is of significance. We speak tonight, despite different emphasis, as a united body. We are asserting the duty of the Senate, as upholders of the Constitution. If others want to change this function, there is a process open, a process that has often been challenged in the past, often been threatened, almost from the very first year after Canada became a Confederation.

Senator Goldenberg, the Chairman of the Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee, as Senator McIlraith has said and as Senator Asselin has observed, made a lucid, moderate and responsible statement. He was one of those who, in the initial period, supported the amendment which was sent by this house to the other place. He is no less convinced now about the merits of that amendment, as is the case with all of us, than he was when it was first projected just before Christmas. But that is not the situation he tells us today, as he sees it. It is in the light of the limitations of time before us, having in mind our desire to see a regulated form of wiretapping, a fully legalized system of wiretapping with restraints and checks, that we say that we wish this bill to become law, and we do not want any action of ours to make that impossible.

In the light of what happened yesterday, that is exactly what we must know to be the case. With his experience as a former Solicitor General and long experience as a cabinet minister and as a Privy Councillor, Senator McIlraith, in his speech has made some important points which only he could make because of his knowledge of the administrative process involved in the office of the Solicitor General. I can tell him, as he well knows because of our discussions during the past few days, that I share fully his concern about this matter, not only because of the merit of the amendment itself but because of the challenges that are being flung at the Senate. We are agreed on this. These challenges we answer by this open and full expression of our prerogatives and constitutional responsibilities.

Senator Asselin spoke of his experience in the House of Commons. Senator McIlraith, rightly, can speak of his, as could many others. I can speak of mine over a period of 33 years. I think I have some understanding of the House of Commons, of which I was proud to be a member, as I am proud to be a member of the Senate.

The debate yesterday clearly indicated that there was no close examination of the merits of the Senate's amendment. It was clear, long before this amendment was conceived, what the intentions of some in the other place were. The intention of some in the other place was not to make this bill a better one; it was not to recognize the obligations and the rights of this house to offer suggestions regarding this legislation; it was, as Senator Asselin has said, and others have likewise observed, to try to put a spike into the continued existence of the Senate.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Well, that is not going to succeed.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Anyone who knows of the nature of the modern state, and particularly a confederation, knows that the unicameral parliamentary system does not meet the requirements of that kind of state. No federal country in the world like ours has a unicameral legislative body. While there are those who complain about our productivity, oftentimes we find among such persons people like Professor MacKay, who wrote The Unreformed Senate of Canada, or Professor Kunz, the author of The Modern Senate of Canada 1925-63. These gentlemen have recognized the indispensable character of a Senate, particularly in the kind of state that we have, with two legislative operations. They note that there are occasions when the public conscience and the interests of the state, particularly, where the people have not had an opportunity of expressing themselves, require the existence of a body like this, not only to provide a pause or a reconsideration of legislative proposals, but to act as arbiter in the rare but fundamental situations which emerge in many societies.

● (2040)

There are situations in the kind of world in which we live that could conceivably make it universally desirable that there be, in addition to the elected house, a place where a body like this would be enabled to assert a prudence of action and restraint. We know of country after country, in the last decade, in which the existence of an upper house has proved essential.

We do not say here that our procedures are perfect. We have been debating ways and means of making them better. In that process we are not saying that we are the only imperfect legislative body. Any of us who have been in the House of Commons know that changes have had to be made there to meet modern conditions. When we talk of the need for reform, let it not be addressed only to the Senate of Canada. I believe that the chaos—if that is not too strong a word—the confusion, which I think is perhaps more apt, which flowed from the quick debate and decision of yesterday reveals the hopelessness at this particular stage, with the limitations of time, of getting necessary rectification.

I am sure that to send this bill back in the form in which it went to the House of Commons with our amendment would not only meet with a quick rebuff, if that opportunity were open to it—and I do not think it is—

Hon. Mr. Phillips: That opportunity is there.

Hon. Mr. Martin: I believe Senator Goldenberg was right when he said that we want to see this legislation on the statute books, for the reasons I mentioned earlier. We do not want to do anything here that will negate that. We do not want to be responsible for the death of this bill. We want this bill to become law, even without the amendment which we think would strengthen it.

I would remind the house that yesterday the Minister of Justice gave an undertaking that he would bring in amendments if the Attorneys General of the provinces felt them necessary. He said that if in the course of practice there was evidence that the bill needed amendment or change, he would press for amendments at the next session of Parliament. I regard that as a hopeful opportunity that lies ahead for the ultimate realization of the kind of amendment put forward by the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: May I be permitted a question on that? Have you ever seen a cabinet minister not make such rash promises in our committees since you have been in the Senate?

Hon. Mr. Martin: The only assurances I know of were with regard to the Tax Act, and I am pleased that the government lived up to the commitments. I am sure that commitments made by the present Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce on the scrutiny bill will be faithfully observed by Mr. Gillespie. Of course, governments cannot be expected to accept all submissions made by the public or by members of both houses. However, I am sure that no government would make a commitment to a legislative body such as ours, or to the House of Commons, and not endeavour to live up to it. That has been my experience over the years as a minister.

I have given careful thought to the suggestion of Senator McIlraith at the conclusion of his speech. I have thought of one aspect of it myself. I am satisfied, having canvassed this matter to the extent that has been open to me, that I see no way of giving effect to his proposal, as a result of the soundings I have made. However, I will say this. If Senator Goldenberg's proposal is accepted—as I strongly urge it should be, not because we relent on our position, not because we do not think this amendment should not be in the bill, because I think it should be—I do not believe we abdicate our position. There is nothing to prevent any senator at the next session from introducing a bill in this chamber, embodying the proposals covered in our amendment.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: That is a weak argument.

Hon. Mr. Martin: That is a safeguard for the preservation of this very bill. The argument of Senator Goldenberg today was that, reluctant as he was to see this amendment not accepted by the other place, he did not want this chamber to be responsible for the bill not becoming law. He wanted to legalize the process embodied in the bill. He wanted some regulation to cover wiretapping authorized under this bill. He wanted this measure to become law, and he did not want any act of ours to prevent that, which would clearly result from a decision by this body to send the bill back in the form in which we originally sent it to the House of Commons.

In the light of yesterday's vote, when admittedly the government received a firm defeat in the House of Commons, no senator can seriously argue that, in the context of that situation, there is any hope of the parties in opposition in the other place accepting our amendment at this stage. But we do not need to wait for the Minister of Justice and the Attorneys General when we come back here at the end of February or in March. There is nothing to prevent any senator, or any member of Parliament for that matter, from introducing an amendment consistent with the amendment initially offered by the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs.

● (2050)

I thank Senator McIlraith for this suggestion. I share his concern, as we all do. If I knew of any way by which at this stage it would be possible for us to get concurrence, to get an undoing of yesterday's procedure, no one would be happier than I. I am sure all of us would want that.

And so, if we do not want this bill to die—and we don't—we cannot take any action that would mean its not becoming operative.

I believe that the formula put forward yesterday by the Minister of Justice was a satisfactory accomodation. It was not our full amendment. It was designed, undoubtedly, to capture a maximum of support and consensus in the other place. It did not succeed.

That amendment meets the concerns of those anxious to protect the rights of the subject and those who desire to enable the police—municipal, provincial and federal—to meet the challenge of organized crime.

This much I think must be said—and I do not want to be partisan in anything I say, but these are the facts—that yesterday the position taken by the government was the same as that represented by our common concern and conviction here, to the extent that the amendment offered represented substantially the position we took. We must remember this. Regarding the position taken by the Senate, we had the government on our side.

The Minister of Justice, anxious that the bill should not die on the Order Paper, has urged the Senate to accept the decision of the Commons, not because, as he said over the television last night, he feels that we have capitulated or that we are less convinced of the position we took, but because he too, like Senator Goldenberg, like all of us, wants to see this bill become law. He does not want to see it die; he does not want to have to go through all the machinery and processes that would have to be undertaken if the bill were reintroduced. It would not in that event be a matter of days.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: How about the private member's bill that you suggested?

Hon. Mr. Martin: It would take weeks, it would take months—

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Sure!

Hon. Mr. Martin: —as we know from the situation and the timetable in the other place.

Senator Choquette has asked a perfectly proper question: What about the private bill? It too, of course, has to go through the process; and the private members' hours, limited as they are in the other place, undoubtedly make the problem a difficult one. There is no denying this. But if a senator were to take that course in the next session it would be an answer to those who say that we are reluctant to re-assert our views; it would be an answer to those who say we have no right to make an amendment at all; it would be an answer to those who say that it is not the function of the Senate to make amendments of this kind.

Of all the lack of understanding of the Constitution of this country, for anyone to say that the Senate has not the prerogative, the legal right, the constitutional obligation, where its convictions are sound, to support its acts is difficult for me to understand.

What we did was not to veto any legislation, although we are free to do so. This is not the first time that the Senate has amended a bill. I ask those who have been criticizing the Senate to look at the record, to look at the bills that have been amended by the Senate. Certainly, even in the time I have been here the number of amendments clearly indicates that the Senate has not rested on its oars. It has accepted its constitutional responsibility. It has made many amendments to many bills. Some it has rejected.

Some allege surprise that we would dare make an amendment because of the confrontation initiated by those who would like to impair the Senate. As I say, there have been all kinds of amendments, and since 1961 no amendments have been returned from the other place. I believe this is the first one since 1961, and, as Senator Asselin said for the reason that he mentioned, it is because a minority in the other place has taken the position, through one or two of its members, that the other place alone should have the legislative responsibility in respect of affairs concerning Canada.

The Minister of Justice said, "Now let us see how this act will work out."

As I said, at the earliest possible moment if we feel that the operations of this act show the need, none of us is precluded from presenting a bill that would embody our amendment or any other that is thought desirable.

As I said earlier, it has been suggested that the Senate cannot make amendments. We are answering that now. We are answering those in the media who have criticized us, who have been surprised at our "assumption" that we have the right to make an amendment to a bill. We are answering those criticisms now. I am answering them now. As Leader of the Government and as a senator in this house I say we are here for that purpose, we are here to improve on legislation and we are not in any way abdicating our responsibility.

At page 347 of his book, The Modern Senate of Canada, Professor Kunz said:

> The power of veto over legislation sponsored by the Government and passed by the House of Commons is only the most extreme form of the exercise of the legally unrestrained powers enjoyed by the Senate.

That is a correct statement of the constitutional position so far as this body is concerned.

> In view of this unique constitutional position the Senate would seem to be eminently able to perform what the report of the Bryce Conference, qualified by the Churchillian concept of the "deepening of the shadow," considered the most important function of a modern second chamber, . . .

That is the true position.

● (2100)

The situation before us, honourable senators, is a practical one. I can very well understand the feelings that honourable senators had—I shared them myself—when this present situation was first projected. I can well understand how senators feel about the criticisms that have been levelled at us during these past few days; although we are used to them, because they are continuous, we must note that we are not the only objects of criticism. The parliamentary institution itself is alleged by many to be meaningless. Many argue that it is irrelevant. This criticism is levelled not only at the parliamentary institution in Canada, but at the Congress of the United States. Reflect on what is said about the Parliament of Britain and its two houses. We need not feel that we are unique regarding these criticisms.

I am satisfied that this Senate, and the senators in it, are dedicated to Canada, dedicated to the promulgation of good and satisfactory laws. Our adversary system does not mean that anyone has a monopoly on legislative sincerity. I recognize at once that those who sit immediately opposite are no less interested in making this institution work, and are no less interested in seeing that this country's best interests are furthered by what we do, than those of us on this side. That is not the point. The point is that we are given now the opportunity of asserting, to those who seek to discredit us, that we are doing our utmost, as they are in the other place.

I can well understand Senator Choquette today urging us to insist on the amendment; but as I pointed out to him today, in the friendliest way, he took a different position, when the situation, admittedly, was not easy, in 1961, when he urged those in the Opposition then not to insist on their amendment. If the argument that he made today is relevant, if it is persuasive, it would apply then.

Honourable senators, I do not see any way out of this matter other than to do what Senator Goldenberg has proposed. The result will be that this bill will become law. There will be regulation of wiretapping. There will be proper checks and balances, and we will be given the opportunity, every one of us, here and elsewhere, to give teeth to a law which we regard as essential if we are to meet the challenge of crime.

Senator Molson spoke earlier. I did not disagree with one word that he uttered. I do not think any of us would disagree with anything he said. What he said represents the convictions of all of us. Each of us has to ask himself honestly, what other course can we take? Those who say, "Well, the Senate has been affronted and we must respond to the news media and we must respond to the charges made in the other place, and the way to do that is to take courage and send the bill back with amendments."

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Martin: The result of that, however, will be that we will certainly have responded and shown some determination, but it will be an empty gesture because the bill will die.

Hon. Mr. Molson: Why?

Hon. Mr. Martin: It will die because the Opposition yesterday decided that they would not accept even the modified proposal of the Minister of Justice.

Hon. Mr. Everett: Is not that their responsibility?

Hon. Mr. Martin: That is why it would die, and there is no one who, having examined the situation, can come to any other conclusion.

So, honourable senators, I believe that we are not abdicating our views, that we are not abdicating our position. We believed that the amendment we offered was desirable. We accept—I accept—the modified proposal made by the Minister of Justice, which I thought met the concerns of those who were anxious about civil liberties, or for strict law enforcement; but again I say that if we are not satisfied with that modified form, we are not precluded from again asserting, within a short time, if we feel that we should, and if we feel that the operation of the act warrants it, the very provision that we put in in the first instance at the suggestion of the Constitutional and Legal Affairs Committee.

If one examines the debates of the Senate in Hansard, one will find that there have not been many occasions like this. There have been some occasions. I know of at least six that I have read very carefully in Hansard, and I do not think that the solutions offered by Senator Goldenberg are basically different, when one takes into account this stage of the session and the minority government position in the other place. There is not any other course open to us that is going to be effective, and we are not, I repeat again, we are not in any way giving in on a principle.

Honourable senators, those are my views on this matter. I speak with conviction and with force because I share the common concern. I have been aroused by the unjust criticisms of the Senate.

The action of the House of Commons does not in any way affect our authority or powers. It does not mean that we cannot bring in amendments to bills; it does not mean that we cannot veto bills; it does not mean that we cannot continue to initiate legislation. Our powers have not been circumscribed in any way whatsoever. We are, however, the victims, for the moment—and only for the moment—of a situation which I believe is not in the interests of our parliamentary form of government. This is a situation in which the government in the other place finds itself in a minority position. I have served in many governments over a long period, and for a good part of that time there was a minority government. I have been able to contrast that with the advantages of majority government, as I am sure other Privy Councillors in this chamber have, and there is not any doubt about the shortcomings of a minority government situation. I am not making any plea now as to which should be the government. Naturally I have my convictions, as Senator Choquette has. Each of us will fight for particular programs and principles to the extent of our energy and conviction. These are the facts. They cannot be altered. The facts are before us. If we want to see the wiretapping measure stay on the statute books following royal assent, and if we want to be true to our convictions, we will have the opportunity—and it will not be long—when any one of us may initiate a bill incorporating the amendment, or one like it, that was rejected yesterday.

● (2110)

For those reasons I support the proposal made by Senator Goldenberg, and in doing so I am not retreating. I am not bowing to the challenges of those who do not have the same faith in this institution that I have.

This is the only course that we can take. I strongly commend it to the Senate.

Hon. Mr. Asselin: I should like the Leader of the Government to explain to the house how he can say that the bill would be killed if it is returned to the other house. If I recall the rules of the house correctly, if the bill is sent back to the other place and is accepted by the other place, it becomes law. The bill would not be killed if it is returned to the House of Commons. I would like the Leader of the Government to explain.

Hon. Mr. Martin: I thought I had explained that. The other house has adjourned, and will be coming back only for royal assent. Is there any reasonable ground for thinking, in the light of yesterday's events, that the party to which my honourable friend belongs, that the NDP or the Social Credit Party, will reverse their positions, when they overwhelmingly turned down the more modified form of amendment put forward by the Minister of Justice?

In my judgment, there is no reasonable ground for arguing that there is any hope of the House of Commons at this time accepting our amendment. That is the fact. Surely no one can seriously take issue with this. Since we want to make this bill law, there is no course open to us other than to accept the suggestion of Senator Goldenberg. In doing so, I repeat, we are not denying ourselves the opportunity later, if that course is not taken in the other place, of initiating changes in the law that will respect our convictions, and which we believe should be in the bill.

Hon. M. Grattan O'Leary: Honourable senators, with the indulgence and grace of our Speaker, and the indulgence also of Senator Molson, who is an authority on the rules, I feel bound to say that the situation in which this house finds itself was spawned in the petulance and fanaticism of the house leader of one party in the Commons. That is why this bill is before us in its present state. Mr. Stanley Knowles is here tonight. He has put us in the position we are in, and I must add in all frankness that he was aided and abetted by what I consider to be the mistaken tactics of the Official Opposition in the Commons, plus the political illiteracy of the backbenchers of both major parties.

The honourable Leader of the Government in the Senate, in the course of his speech a few moments ago, said that those who were intent on destroying this chamber would not succeed; and that brought cheers from the house.

Honourable senators, I am not so sure that it will not succeed. I am not so sure, because the truth of the matter is that throughout this country there is pitiful ignorance of the true function of this house. You read it in the press, and the press especially has a particular illiteracy about the Senate. In reading the press in the last few days—and I speak as an old member of the press; as an honorary life member of the press and of the press gallery—I must confess that I am sometimes appalled at the ignorance of the media, of the press and of television, about the true functions and position of the Senate.

Only the other evening, in a television program by Mr. Patrick Watson called "Some Honourable Members," there were interviews with three members of the House of Commons, one of whom actually said, in the course of the discussion, that he did not consider that senators were members of Parliament. As a matter of fact, he is not alone in taking that position. I have heard the Prime Minister himself speak of members of Parliament and senators. Tonight, in going back to my office, I found a notice from the president of my party in which he speaks of federal PC members of Parliament and then PC senators.

Honourable senators, my friend, the Leader of the Government, tonight quoted from the professor of McGill University who wrote the book The Modern Senate of Canada. As the Leader of the Government spoke, I wondered how many members of this house had studied that book; how many members of the other place had read that book; how many editors in Canada had read that book; and how many members of the Parliamentary Press Gallery had read that book. If they have read it, they surely would not write the nonsense that they usually write again and again and again.

They speak, for example, of the dissolution of Parliament. I submit, honourable senators, that this is what Mr. Churchill once called a terminological inexactitude. Parliament is not dissolved when you dissolve the House of Commons. That is all you do. Do you dissolve the Queen? Do you dissolve the Senate? We continue to exist. The Queen continues to exist. So what is the sense of talking about dissolution of Parliament when the British North America Act—that British statute which is our only Constitution—says that Parliament shall consist, does consist, of the Queen, the Senate and the House of Commons.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. O'Leary: That is the position, and every schoolboy and schoolgirl in this country should be made aware of it.

I say to you, honourable senators, that unless something is done, whether by this house or by somebody else, to make the people of Canada acquainted with the true functions of the Senate, with the simple fact that it is an integral part of Parliament, then I am not so sure that a man like the leader of the NDP in the other house will not eventually succeed in abolishing this chamber.

What nonsense it is to say, "Take this bill back, or else." Honourable senators, I was a member of the parliamentary press gallery in 1913 when the Senate not only amended a bill, but threw out a money bill, a $35 million money bill, Sir Robert Borden's naval aid bill, and I remember seeing Sir George Ross, the former Premier of Ontario, wheeled into this chamber in a wheel chair and making a powerful speech against that bill which was rejected. I know we had some broncos in our party, who exist in all parties, who said, "Let us abolish the damn place." Great pressure was placed on Sir Robert Borden to take that action, and he certainly had more provocation than has Mr. Stanley Knowles. But Sir Robert Borden, a man of uncommon commonsense, a man of great wisdom, said "Nonsense." He accepted the verdict of the Senate and I, as a Conservative, say tonight that I am not so sure that in the light of history the Senate was not right at that time.

● (2120)

Ever since then—and this is shown in the book which the Leader of the Government quoted here tonight—again and again the Senate has amended and improved bills that came before it. It has sent them back to the other place, had conferences with them, and in more cases than naught the Senate's recommendations were accepted.

This is our business. It is not the business of the Senate to put bills on the statute books. It is the business of the Senate to keep bad bills from going on the statute books. That is our function.

I have always disagreed with the Leader of the Government when I thought he seemed to be trying to make this chamber an investigative body. That is not our business either. We may have standing committees, but this business of setting up special committees to investigate this, that and the other thing is not the business of the Senate at all. Our business here is to review legislation. That is our business, and that is enough business. We have no other business under the Constitution.

I could go on and make other criticisms about what has happened to the Senate, this tinkering with the Senate. People say we should reform it, and I think they are right, but we do not reform it by making it a one-party chamber. The Leader of the Government, over the last two or three years, has been trying to make this chamber a one-party chamber. We know what happens when the serried ranks of the Liberal Party on the other side come to vote. Their rhetoric never matches their actions—never! I have been in this house, a very humble member of it, for 12 years. Again and again over that time I have voted against my party. I recall proposing an amendment during the flag debate, and the first man to get up and vote against me was Senator Flynn, the leader of my party. That was his right.

When one accepts a senatorship he is like the judge who accepts a judgeship. He may have been a Liberal or a Conservative, or a member of some other party, but once he sits on the court he forgets his party and gives his judgments in the light of reason. That is the business of members of the Senate.

This house was constituted, was structured, as a two-party house. That does not mean that we must always vote with our party, but I do not think we can safely get away from being a two-party structured chamber. We cannot make it into a one-party house, and that is what has been attempted over the last five years.

To get back to the bill before us, I read very carefully yesterday's Hansard of the other place. There was no discussion on the amendment made in our committee. I sat in that committee. I heard the argument made by Senator McIlraith. Incidentally, I listened tonight with great admiration to the fairness and sincerity of Senator McIlraith's speech. It is true, I do not know quite clearly where he is going, but at least he put his case, I thought, beautifully. I hope the press comes here more often, because this debate here today far surpasses anything that took place in the House of Commons. There is no question about that. The debate here today is a credit to this house. Senator Molson started it off admirably. Even the Leader of the Government tonight, I thought, was fairer and better than usual. The acting leader of my party, Senator Choquette, distinguished himself today with his speech. This is a great thing for the Senate. The only way we will get this house reported—and I hear complaints all the time that we are not getting reported by the press—is by having good debates. The press goes where the action is, and if we have good debates, if we have real fighting debates, the press will come here, even though they may often murder us in the reports that they make.

I cannot accept at all the suggestion made by Senator McIlraith that we should have a conference with the other place. With whom would we confer? They have all gone home. There is no one with whom we could confer. If they were here, any conference we would have with the other place would have to include Mr. Stanley Knowles, and Mr. Stanley Knowles is not accepting anything that will give any prestige, or any position, to the Senate.

This does not mean that I reject the motion put by my friend, Senator Goldenberg. I agree with what he said, and said truly, that the Fathers of Confederation, the Founding Fathers, said, "You are a chamber of second sober thought." Very well, we accept that. Now what has happened is that we have given the best of what we thought was second sober thought, and we sent the bill back to the other place. They did not accept our sober second thought, however. So what do we do? Surely what we do is say, "All right, we have tried our best. We have tried to make this bill a better bill; we have tried to make it a better law. You will not accept that, so you take the responsibility; you take the consequences."

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. O'Leary: There is a speech in Hansard by Arthur Meighen on this question. Arthur Meighen was a partisan, and a very good one, but read that speech of Meighen's. In that speech Meighen said—and he laid it down—that, of course, our job here is to review legislation, to try to improve legislation, but if when we try to improve it and the other house will not accept what we try to improve, there is nothing we can do. They are, rightly or wrongly, the representative chamber and their will, if they insist on it, must prevail. They may be wrong, but if they insist on being wrong, our business, our only recourse, is to accept it. They are the elected, responsible chamber.

By the way, I want to say a word about that. What in the name of heaven is all this antagonism against people who are appointed? They say we must have no say in the Government of Canada because we are appointed. Well, what is the Supreme Court of Canada? Is it elected? What is the Federal Court of Canada, which deals with the lives and property of people? Is it elected? Is our Governor General elected? Are our deputy ministers, who have more control over us than does Parliament itself, elected? They are appointed by the Prime Minister.

Hon. Mr. Molson: What about editors?

Hon. Mr. O'Leary: That is right. There are all sorts of situations where people are appointed—school boards, and so forth. So this talk indulged in by people like Mr. Stanley Knowles, that as people who are appointed we must have no say in the governing of the country, is utter nonsense.

Honourable senators, taking that view—that rightly or wrongly we must have regard for the other place, the elected house—I will support the motion moved by Senator Goldenberg.

Hon. Daniel Lang: Honourable senators, I had certainly hoped to be on my feet before this today. I certainly never expected to have to follow two such difficult acts as those of my leader and Senator O'Leary. So I start from a position of great disadvantage.

I know honourable senators will recollect that this bill was explained by me in this chamber on second reading. For personal reasons I had to leave immediately after that. I was not present at the proceedings of the committee, nor thereafter. I did, of course, at first opportunity, read the minutes of those proceedings, and having done so I completely concur, for the reasons given there, in the action that the committee took. I certainly would have voted with the committee on that issue.

● (2130)

To some extent I feel that I owe an explanation, almost an apology, to this chamber, because when I introduced this bill on second reading I did not comprehend the ramifications of the clause that was deleted by the committee. I had no idea how serious an imposition this was placing on our police. I had no idea how it could manacle our crime detection organization to the great and serious detriment of the public.

Honourable senators, I would like to draw your attention again to what I consider to be the kernel of the problem. It may be all very well for somebody living in Meadow Lake, Saskatchewan, or in Chedabucto, to consider that the clause we deleted was a trivial one. Tonight several senators have said that this is a trivial clause, an inconsequential clause, one that does not concern the principle of the bill. It might not affect the principle of the bill, but I can assure you that it is not a trivial clause. It is particularly not a trivial clause for a person like myself who lives in the City of Toronto, or somebody who lives in Montreal or in Vancouver, where crime is serious. This is not a trivial clause those people.

Senator Goldenberg said that our first responsibility was the public concern. I would say that when this chamber first considered this bill it dedicated itself accurately and correctly to the public concern. Yesterday public concern was flouted in the other place. The clause we are considering is not a clause to protect the police. It is a clause to protect the public. I think that the failure of the press to recognize the seriousness of the action we took, to recognize that it was no ill-conceived or ill-thought out action, but one that evolved from a real personal concern for the public, is absolutely reprehensible.

Let me read two passages from Mr. Adamson's testimony before our committee. Let me say first that in Toronto we have one of the finest police forces in the world bar none, and Chief Adamson is one of the finest police chiefs ever known, not only in this country but in North America. Speaking of the clause that was deleted by us he said this:

> An effect of that section of the bill, as presently drafted, would be that in the next twelve months Canada's top criminals would receive such notification—

That is of being wiretapped.

> —enabling them to take necessary evasive measures to avoid further detection and so escape law and order.

A little later he said:

> So the whole thing, in effect, is going to put us out of business in fighting crime in that way.

But it certainly will not put out of business the criminals, who themselves are going to use these bugging devices. I quote that merely to underscore how seriously I regard the effect of yesterday's action in the House of Commons on what I consider public security and order in Canada.

The Minister of Justice said he could live with this bill. What I want to know is: Can the Canadian public live with this bill?

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Lang: I think the actions taken yesterday by the Conservative Party and the New Democratic Party were public irresponsibility of the first magnitude, and I hope they have to answer to the Canadian public for it.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: May I, as a Conservative, say that I support you in that view.

Hon. Mr. Lang: Honourable senators, I know I am in the same quandary as you all are about where we go from here. I am not satisfied that Senator Goldenberg's answer is the right one. I am not satisfied of that at all. I think there may be another one. This Parliament is not prorogued; it is adjourned. I do not know what this chamber will do with this motion. When this debate opened today I did not know what I was going to do on the motion, but I think I am beginning to understand what I will do. I was flattered that my leader picked up an idea of mine, that we could bring in a private member's public bill to amend this measure. At noon today I spoke to the Law Clerk, and such a bill is already in the printing stage. At the first opportunity I will bring in that bill as a private member's public bill if this legislation goes into law in its present form. I have no idea of what hope I have of getting a private member's public bill through the House of Commons, but I am going to have a damn good go at it.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Lang: There has been a lot of talk about our having no alternative but to either accept the bill in its present form, dangerous as it is, or lose the bill. I do not want to lose the bill. I like the blanket prohibition against wiretapping as far as non-police activities are concerned; I think it is necessary and desirable. But how important is it to retain the bill weighed against placing the public in jeopardy. I am not satisfied that keeping the bill is that important.

I do not want any more crime in Toronto than we now have. I do not want any more heroin hauls, muggings on the street, or to start importing all the problems of Detroit. How important is it to keep the bill weighed against the public interest in retaining effective protection by the police? I am not satisfied it is that important a bill. But I am concerned for the public. I think what we are considering tonight is whether the bill is so important that we are prepared to manacle our police to the extent that is provided in this clause now, our rejection of it having been amended.

I do not think it matters to the constitutionalists of the Senate. I do not think it really matters what happens in the other place, although I am disturbed about it. What matters is whether we are placing the public in jeopardy by proceeding in this way. I am going to have to be far more persuaded about the importance of the balance of this bill to the public of Canada than I am at the moment before I support this motion.

Honourable senators, I did not accept my appointment to this chamber merely to abrogate my judgment in these matters on the ground of expediency. I could not live with myself if I had to be in this chamber under those conditions.

I think the Senate has a great role to play and I think the public appreciates that far more than we know. At least, they know we are always there as a backstop. They certainly have not been well informed in this case, but perhaps if we can find some other avenue than that of accepting this motion we will be able to get across to them that we are performing a valuable function, particularly in terms of the preservation of law and order in our large cities.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault: Honourable senators, I rise tonight with some trepidation because the speeches this afternoon have been of a very high order.

I have served in three assemblies in this country and I have quickly discovered this about the Senate, that it stands second to none in its concern for the problems of Canadians wherever they live, and it certainly stands second to none with respect to the abilities which exist here.

In both this chamber and in the other place Bill C-176 has been described as a most important measure. No one will dispute that. As honourable senators are aware, the bill makes it an offence to intrude upon individuals in this country, or to possess electronic devices. I shall endeavour not to be repetitious, but I do intend to introduce one or two new considerations.

The majority of the Senate and of the other place are in basic agreement with the measure before us. However, in light of today's debate it is really an understatement to say that differences have arisen. The Senate suggests that defects exist in one important section of this bill. It is felt by certain members of this chamber and, I suspect, by a majority of the other chamber, that these defects exist; that under certain circumstances the retention of certain features of the bill—features which have been discussed so eloquently today by so many speakers that they need hardly be repeated—would give undue advantage to certain individuals engaging in possible criminal activity in Canada. This has been spoken of at great length, of course, but the relevant section would provide:

> 178.23 (1) The Attorney General of the province in which the application was made or the Solicitor General of Canada, as the case may be, shall notify in writing within ninety days next following the period for which the authorization was given the person who was the object of the interception—

Subsection (2)(b) of Section 178.23 provides as well:

> (b) where the Attorney General of the province in which the application is made or the Solicitor General of Canada, as the case may be, certifies within the said ninety days in a manner prescribed by regulations to the judge who granted the authorization that the investigation is continuing and the judge is of the opinion that the interests of justice require that a delay of a determinate reasonable length be granted, in which case the judge may grant a determinate reasonable delay.

Ideally, of course, the balance could be restored in this whole situation by requiring that all criminals who are engaging in illicit wiretapping activities, criminals intent on committing violence, fraud, mayhem and murder, give similar notice of their illicit wiretapping activities and their intentions. Of course, the idea is facetious. Such a requirement would be impossible to enforce, and would be ludicrous. But the suggestion does point up one of the concerns confronting conscientious members of both this chamber and the other place—and no chamber has a monopoly on virtue or good ideas or on concern about the safety of the Canadian people—and that is that the section as it stands is inadequate. And in their hearts the majority of the members of the other place know it to be inadequate.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Perrault: It is ineffectual because while it provides power for any judge to grant a delay of notification for "a determinate reasonable length of time," it does not empower any judge to grant extensions on any continuing basis should that be necessary, and it has been necessary in several instances which have been cited in parliamentary debate and committee consideration over the past few weeks.

Nowhere in the section do the words "from time to time" appear—words which I point out to the honourable members of this assembly are invariably in common statutory usage where such an intent exists.

I would ask members of this chamber, and our associates in the other place, to refer to section 465 of the Criminal Code of Canada where, when it is proposed that a continuing basis does exist, the words appear:

> A justice acting under this Part may . . . adjourn the inquiry from time to time—

Section 501:

> A judge or magistrate acting under this Part may from time to time adjourn a trial.

Section 756 says:

> The appeal court may adjourn the hearing of the appeal from time to time as may be necessary.

Competent legal authorities in this country suggest that this is a serious defect in this proposed legislation. Words of this type "from time to time" found in the Criminal Code invariably are interpreted by the courts to empower a continuation. But the words do not appear in the measure before us. Despite the off-the-cuff legal opinions which have surfaced in some publications across the country, this, I suggest, is one more demonstrable flaw in the wording as it exists.

The Globe and Mail has been mentioned today. May I say rather bitterly that its editorial opinions on this matter, and indeed on the Senate itself, appear to be guided by a failed and shattered lawyer who took his law course by mail order. The suggestion that the present measure, if maintained, will permit law enforcement authorities to go back to a judge again and again is completely ludicrous. The Globe and Mail is wrong, and the critics who have suggested this are wrong. The Senate is right. These critics are wrong just as the critics in the NDP who have advanced their specious arguments in the other place are wrong.

Well, what problem arises? It means that police investigations, including the use of certain electronic intrusion devices over long periods of time, would, according to competent legal and judicial authorities, require at some point that notice be given—if not after 90 days, then at some specific, determinate time—and the right to continuation does not, in fact, exist. Is this really what the Leader of the Conservative Party voted for when he leapt up to support the NDP yesterday afternoon? Is this what the Official Opposition really wants Parliament to do?

Hon. Mr. Phillips: No.

Hon. Mr. Perrault: Or was it sheer political expediency which led him to betray all of his previously professed beliefs in effective law enforcement, and his desire, professed so often, to protect society? There was this action, despite the fact that members of his own party in a commendable display of all party solidarity aided the government in correcting the flaw; aided it in the drafting of an amendment which would correct the flaw?

● (2150)

The Conservative Party wants to form the government. This is a legitimate and worthwhile ambition, but does it really require a total abandonment of principle in order to achieve that goal? The position of Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition is rendered even more regrettable and deplorable because, as I said, members of that party in the other place in fact co-operated to help repair the defect in the original section. They worked in harmony to develop a new section which would protect the public interest while providing adequate safeguards for human rights. It was a first-rate example of party co-operation. However, when the time of testing came, yesterday afternoon, the Official Opposition was tried, and, regrettably, found wanting.

Even those Opposition members who assisted in the drafting of the new section were driven like abject sheep to support their leader in his act of political irresponsibility and folly. They can be none other than unhappy and disillusioned men today as they review the implications of their position, and the notable disservice which they have done the Canadian people. They acted as they did certainly not with any intention of protecting society, for they will make the task of our beleaguered law enforcement officers even more difficult, as will be the case in British Columbia. I hope the Tories are able to explain to the people of my home province why they acted as they did. Together with other provinces, British Columbia has been plagued by the importation of dope and narcotics, and violence and crime.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: You helped them, did you not? I asked: Did you not agree with them?

Hon. Mr. Perrault: Honourable senators, I regret to say that I think the Official Opposition took the action they did because of their extreme frustration and their unseemly anxiety for power, which has apparently rendered at least their leadership insensitive to the need to assist in the development of sound legislation in the area of law reform before all other political considerations.

And what can be said for the NDP? In their long vendetta against the Senate they long ago abandoned their sense of fair play or objectivity with respect to this body. Again, yesterday, that party demonstrated its irresponsibility and indifference to the efforts of this body, and many members in the other place, to repair the defects in the bill. In an act of moral bankruptcy, not once did any one of their spokesmen even make the slightest pretence to analyze the merits of yesterday's government amendment. Rather, in their frantic efforts to discredit this body they resorted to innuendo and distortion of the worst kind, and it is there in Hansard to see. The NDP regard this so-called confrontation as another opportunity to attack the Senate—and the public interest be damned.

You know, we are in a sorry state indeed when political manoeuvring and expediency are given precedence over the development of sound legislation and the public interest. The suggestion is advanced from some sources, which should know better, that in effect the Senate has no right to advance proposals, suggestions, or amendments with respect to legislation originating in the other place, and that somehow members of this assembly have a moral obligation and a staunch duty to accede to every proposal from the other place, whether those proposals constitute folly, or whether they carry adverse implications for the public weal.

The theory has it that the Senate must maintain an acquiescent and decent silence on all occasions. The Fathers of Confederation would turn over in their graves if they knew what was going on.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Perrault: They never, at any time, had that concept in mind. They saw in this body—and the eloquence of Senator Eugene Forsey in this chamber tonight was very moving—they saw in this body, among other things—

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Are you referring to Senator O'Leary?

Hon. Mr. Perrault: Yes, Senator O'Leary. What did I say?

Hon. Mr. Forsey: The honourable senator must have extrasensory perception.

Hon. Mr. Perrault: Well, both senators are always eloquent. The Fathers of Confederation saw in this body, among other things, one which would represent regional interests, made up of those who would be able to contribute in a very real way to the construction of good and sound legislation.

During a period of time when he served as leader of the post-war British Opposition, Churchill was upbraided for opposing certain activities of the socialist party of that day. The quotation I am about to make is not exact, but as I recall it he said, "I have not assumed my responsibilities to remain supine and silent while all of the principles that our people have fought for and worked for and died for, down through the years, are frittered away." I think we can take something from that post-war Churchill speech.

Similarly, in Canada in 1974, the Senate of Canada cannot, and must not, remain supine and silent because a small minority, exercising a power totally disproportionate to their numbers in that other place, are making a concerted attempt to silence this body, to truncate it, and to eventually make it disappear. We are here, together with those who serve in the other place, as Laurier said, to form part of the people's jury, and it is our duty to render a conscientious verdict, regardless of person or party.

I have served, as I say, in other chambers, and no one chamber has a monopoly on virtue, good ideas, capacity, or a concern for the public interest. The members of this chamber are no less concerned about the betterment of Canada and its laws than are members of the other place. To suggest otherwise is to advance a totally false and mischievous concept.

In conclusion, the fact is that if legislation can be improved, bettered, made more effective, for the Canadian people, it does not matter where the proposals originate. Whether they originate in the other place, in this chamber, in a citizens' group in some other part of Canada, or even in the Globe and Mail, does not matter. If it is a good idea it should be incorporated in the laws of Canada. No one should be so small-minded that he will deliberately, for his own narrow purposes, block good legislation which will help the Canadian people. To send back to this house, without a debate on certain proposed amendments, a piece of legislation, is flawed, wrong, irresponsible and totally lacking in principle. Additionally, it is an act that dramatizes, I think, for the Canadian people, the fact that those who aspire to replace this government are neither qualified by their sense of responsibility, nor are they to be trusted with power.

Hon. Chesley W. Carter: Honourable senators, as Senator Choquette has pointed out, in his excellent and very eloquent speech on this motion, the long expected moment of truth for the Senate has finally arrived. We are faced with a situation which involves two separate issues. One issue is the nature and subject matter of an amendment to Bill C-176. The second, and larger issue, is the functions, responsibilities, rights and duties of the Senate itself.

● (2200)

It is very important that we keep these two issues separate in our minds. It is very easy to focus on one issue to the exclusion of the other. If we do that, we will only muddy the waters and confuse both ourselves and the public.

To put the first issue in its proper perspective, we must first look at Parliament as a whole. What is the Canadian Parliament? Is it the House of Commons alone? No. Is it the Senate alone? Certainly not.

As Senator O'Leary so eloquently pointed out a short while ago, the Canadian Constitution says that the Parliament of Canada is composed of three elements: the Crown, the Senate and the House of Commons—all three together, not any one of them singly.

Unfortunately, however, the House of Commons, with the connivance of the press and other media, has propagated the idea that the House of Commons alone constitutes Parliament, that the Senate does not count. With the connivance of the same allies, the NDP has propagated the theory that the House of Commons is a somewhat superior body because it is an elected body.

That, however, is contrary to the Constitution. The Canadian Constitution gives equal powers and responsibilities to both houses, with the possible exception of money bills, about which there is some controversy.

It is common knowledge that the NDP, and some members of other parties, do not like this, and for that reason they want to abolish the Senate. But for the reasons so eloquently pointed out by Senator Choquette and Senator Molson, it is essential that it be this way in order to safeguard the public interest.

Some parties, notably the NDP, are prejudiced against the police, the judiciary, and against law enforcement authorities generally. They incorporate their bias and prejudices in legislation, and the only safeguard against this is a body like the Senate. So they hate the Senate and are out to destroy it.

To rationalize their actions, they propagate the theory of the superiority of the elected body. They carefully ignore the fact that the Constitution makes both houses equal.

But the theory itself will not stand up to examination. Our concept of democracy is based on representation of the will of the majority. To represent the will of the majority, an elected member must have over 50 per cent of the votes, and preferably over 50 per cent of the population of his constituency.

How many members in the other place are elected with over 50 per cent of the votes cast, or with votes equal to 50 per cent of their constituency?

In the few minutes available to me this evening, I have done a little research. I have confined my research to NDP candidates, because they have been the most assiduous and the most vociferous in propagating this myth. I have had time only to look at about a dozen candidates, but I wish to give the house one or two examples.

The member for Meadow Lake was elected with 7,194 votes out of 20,298 votes cast, as against 27,433 people qualified to vote. That is 7,000 out of 20,000, or a little over 30 per cent of voters, but only 22 per cent of eligible constituents.

For the member for Burnaby-Seymour, there was a total of 18,274 votes out of 48,567 votes cast, as against 64,363 people qualified to vote. That represents less than 30 per cent.

Most of the dozen candidates that I looked at this afternoon fall within that category. We use the term that they are elected, but do they represent the will of the majority? I submit that a better term than "elected" would be to say that they are appointed. They are appointed by our electoral system, and they have no more claim to represent the will of the majority of the Canadian people than have we who sit in this chamber as appointed members.

I would think that probably 75 per cent of the members of the House of Commons would fall in that category. Therefore I do not see where they have any grounds for appropriating for themselves any sense of superiority, on the grounds of being elected by a very small minority of the votes and of being rejected, in most cases, by two-thirds of their constituents.

What is the function of Parliament? And by "Parliament" I mean both houses. One of our main functions is to pass legislation. The passage of legislation should be a co-operative effort, with both houses working together to try to provide the best legislation possible for Canadians.

It is in this spirit that the Senate approached Bill C-176. When the bill was being considered by the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, evidence was adduced which showed that Bill C-176 was defective in certain respects, and the Senate, in good faith, had, in the course of discharging its responsibilities to the Canadian people, deleted those parts that were defective, and by so doing provided a much better piece of legislation.

● (2210)

Why did the Senate delete certain parts of the bill? The title of the bill, certain portions of the bill, and the principle of the bill were all aimed at safeguarding privacy in relation to wiretapping. Our committee found that the 90-day clause, which was deleted by the Senate, had nothing whatsoever to do with safeguarding the privacy of the public. That privacy was safeguarded by another clause in the bill which required the police to get permission from a judge, or other person appointed by the Attorney General of the province concerned, before installing any wiretapping device. That was the safeguard of public privacy. The 90-day clause that the Senate deleted was one that compelled the police to notify the object of the wiretapping, and, as Senator McIlraith has pointed out, the object of the wiretap is not always the person whose phone is tapped. That clause added nothing to the bill. It provided no safeguard. That is another reason why the Senate took it out.

Also, it applied to legal wiretapping only. There are hundreds of illegal wiretappings going on, but there is no way of compelling those people to report. Nor do we, as a matter of judicial process, notify or inform anybody else who is under investigation that they have been investigated.

These three things add up to a very serious handicap to the police and the law enforcement authorities. In fact, they tip the scale in favour of organized crime and against law enforcement. By removing that clause, the Senate was acting in the public interest.

Honourable senators, what is going to happen if we pass Senator Goldenberg's motion? I think we should give very careful consideration to what is going to happen if that motion is carried. The first thing that is going to happen is that any wiretapping that is presently being carried out immediately becomes illegal and the taps must be removed. That is the first effect of the bill as it is now.

The second thing that has to happen is that the police will have to set about preparing a case to present to a judge in order to obtain permission to install another wiretapping device, and honourable senators do not have to stretch their imagination very far to realize that this could take a considerable period of time.

Also, a number of wiretaps would never be installed again. Because many of our wiretaps are carried out in conjunction with the police of other countries by international arrangement, we must ask ourselves what country is going to risk having its efforts to catch criminals jeopardized and betrayed by Canada through this process of having to report wiretapping back to the object of the wiretap, the criminal who has been the object of the wiretapping? A lot of wiretaps would never again be installed because the co-operation necessary to get them installed would no longer be forthcoming.

Many of these wiretaps can only be installed through the co-operation of janitors, secretaries, and other people who give the police access to buildings and offices. These individuals have an understanding with the police that they will remain anonymous. However, this bill in its present form is going to compel criminals to be notified and, as a consequence, the criminal will immediately know that he could not have been wiretapped unless somebody in his office, in his organization, co-operated with the police, and that person's life would be in jeopardy, as Chief Adamson pointed out to the committee.

Some people have put forth the idea that the amendment in question is a rather trivial matter and not something over which we should fight to the last ditch and dig in our heels over. They have suggested that it really does not matter. Senator Goldenberg said that we should consider what is in the public interest. I submit to you, honourable senators, that it is in the public interest to co-operate with law enforcement authorities rather than to handicap them. I submit to you that some of these wiretaps will never be installed again. Others will be installed only after a long period of time, probably several months, because the proper information would have to be compiled and submitted to a judge in order to secure permission for the wiretap. And what is going to happen during that period of time? Canada is going to be flooded with narcotics of all kinds, as well as other illicit goods. Organized crime is going to have a field day. There would be no way of stopping them. It would be a bonanza for them. And we say that this is a trivial matter? We say that it is not in the public interest to do something about it?

Hon. Mr. McElman: Would the honourable senator permit a question?

Hon. Mr. Carter: Yes, certainly.

Hon. Mr. McElman: Surely you are not suggesting that the only means of catching people who are peddling drugs is by means of a wiretap? Surely you are not suggesting, are you, that our police forces are so insecure and so unable to handle law enforcement that this is the only course they have?

Hon. Mr. Carter: I am suggesting, Senator McElman, that the only way you can get the kingpin is through a wiretap. Sure, you can go down to the corner and pick up the pedlar, the pusher, the little fellow, but you will not get the big guy who lives in a penthouse in a wealthy locale unless you have the wiretapping devices that are essential for it, as Chief Adamson pointed out to our committee. He listed a number of people like that, whom I think Senator Choquette enumerated this evening, who were caught but who would never have been caught without the use of the wiretapping device. Is that not right?

● (2220)

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Yes. Even if the 90-day period had been in force, Chief Adamson said that in the ten cases he gave us the culprits would not have been apprehended. I have been asked a question, so perhaps I might clear up the point. When a thug has his own telephone and the police say, "We did not get him in 90 days, but we are very close to getting him if we have another three weeks to a month," the minute he is told his wire is tapped he is either liquidated or abandoned by the mafia or the crowd of gangsters, who then change to another city with another phone and contact man. That is the importance of this. We were begged by the police to delete this clause, which we did, so as not to hamper those who are protecting society. I hope I have made myself clear.

Hon. Mr. McElman: I think my question has been misunderstood. The honourable senator has said that unless this particular provision is there this country will immediately be flooded with drugs. I suggest that is sheer nonsense.

Hon. Mr. Carter: You are entitled to your opinion and I am entitled to mine. Not only that, but my opinion is backed up by the police forces and I would like you to state your authority to back up your opinion.

Hon. Mr. McElman: You made the statement.

Hon. Mr. Carter: I make my statement and I quote my authority. You made your statement. Now you quote your authority.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: You have only Louis to quote, Charlie. Can't you get a better authority than that?

Hon. Mr. McElman: John Barleycorn.

Hon. Mr. Carter: Honourable senators, if we pass this bill, let us be clear in our minds exactly what it is we are doing. In the first place, we are tipping the scales in favour of crime and against law and order; there is no doubt about that. Secondly, we are seriously handicapping law enforcement authorities, making them operate with one hand tied behind their backs, and making it impossible to catch the kingpins of organized crime. That is what we are doing.

With respect to the other issue, the functions and powers of the Senate, we are setting a precedent and participating in what amounts to an amendment of the Canadian Constitution, as Senator McIlraith so ably pointed out this evening. We are ourselves admitting that the Senate is an inferior body; that the Senate can amend legislation only when the House of Commons condescends to give us permission to exercise our rights and responsibilities. That is the principle involved in this motion now before us. If the House of Commons were interested in good legislation, if they were putting the public interest first, they would have accepted the amendment of the Minister of Justice, which was a fair amendment and which went to extreme lengths to meet any objection that anybody could make with regard to the violation of privacy. He went as far as he possibly could have gone while still being consonant with the public interest and the maintenance of law and order.

These people are not interested in privacy from wiretapping. They are interested in the abolition of the Senate, and that is the only reason we have this motion before us. Let us be clear on that; let us not fool ourselves. If we pass this motion we will be effectively destroying the Senate as a legislative body; we will be destroying our credibility for ever. At the same time we will be downgrading the Senate to the status of a purely advisory body. Honourable senators, I cannot be a party to any of these things.

I belong to the Liberal Party, and I am prepared to support the Liberal Party and the Liberal Government, but there comes a time when my loyalty to the people of Canada, to the Constitution of Canada and to this body, the Senate, transcends any loyalty I may have to a government, a minister or a party, and I am not prepared to compromise my integrity.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

MOTION IN AMENDMENT—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Mr. Carter: I supported the committee's action in deleting the clause. I believed it was the right thing to do. I still believe it is the right thing to do, and I am not going to compromise myself and say I now think it is better to do something else. I submit that no bill at all is better than the present bill and is more in the public interest than passing the bill that will become law if we accept this motion. However, if it can be avoided, I am not prepared to throw out the baby with the bathwater. I agree with the principle of the bill. I agree with every part of the bill except that one clause we deleted. I am therefore going to move an amendment to the motion before us.

I move:

That the Senate do not insist upon its amendment to Bill C-176, intituled: "An Act to amend the Criminal Code, the Crown Liability Act and the Official Secrets Act", but that instead of the said amendment the said bill be amended by striking out lines 16 to 44 on page 18 and substituting the following:

[Hon. Mr. Carter.]

178.23(1) Subject to subsection (4), within ninety days next following the period for which an authorisation or any renewal thereof was given, a person specially designated in writing for the purposes of this section by the Attorney General of the province in which the application for the authorization was made or the Solicitor General of Canada, as the case may be, shall make a report, in writing, to the judge who gave the authorization or any renewal thereof or, if such judge is unable to act, a judge of the same jurisdiction, specifying the progress of the investigation in relation to which the authorization or any renewal thereof was given.

(2) Upon receipt of the report referred to in subsection (1), the judge to whom the report was made shall consider if it is in the interests of justice and the protection of privacy that any person whose private communications have been intercepted—

I stress "whose private communications have been intercepted".

—be notified of such interception.

That does not include notifying the criminal.

(3) Where the judge to whom a report referred in subsection (1) was made is of the opinion that it is in the interests of justice and the protection of privacy that any person referred to in subsection (2) be notified that his private communications have been intercepted, he shall inform the Attorney General of the province or the Solicitor General of Canada, as the case may be, who shall thereupon notify such person, in writing, of the interception, and deliver to him a copy of the authorization.

(4) Subsection (1) does not apply where the authorization was obtained for the purpose of an interception in relation to the prevention or detection of subversive activity as defined by subsection 16(3) of the Official Secrets Act.

(5) Nothing in this section shall be construed as giving a person who has received a notice referred to in subsection (3) a right of access to the application for the authorization or any renewal thereof or to the report described in subsection (1) or to any material in support of or in relation to such applications or report.

(6) The report referred to in subsection (1) and any documents related thereto are confidential and shall be dealt with in the manner provided in section 178.14 in respect of documents relating to an application made pursuant to section 178.12 or subsection 178.13(3) with such modifications as the circumstances require.

● (2230)

Hon. Mr. Choquette: That is clear enough, but it sounds more complicated than the one we just turned down.

Hon. Mr. Carter: You probably recognize that as exactly the same amendment moved in the other place by the Minister of Justice.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Carter: My seconder is Honourable Senator Lang. I move this amendment, because I think it is the best course at the moment. I am not saying that it is absolutely the best course, because I really think the best course would be to defeat the bill altogether—kill it. Some people have been saying that, if we do this, the bill is going to die because there is no one over there. Well, that is none of my business. It is none of our business. It is their business to be over there to look after legislation when it comes from us, and we should not provide excuses for them.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: That is right.

Hon. Mr. Carter: It may well die. If it dies, in my mind no catastrophe will have occurred, because we are as well off or better off without it. But there is some merit in the bill and I agree with the arguments put forward by the leader and others that, if we can institute some control over wiretapping, all to the good.

All this amendment does is test the sincerity of the other place. If they are truly interested in the good of the people of Canada, they will accept this and act accordingly. If they do not want to accept it, well, then, that is not our business. The responsibility for killing the bill belongs to them.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: Senator Forsey, are you going to speak or are you going to just stand there?

Hon. Mr. Forsey: I am waiting for Her Honour to say what she has to say.

The Hon. the Speaker: I am going to put the amendment.

It is moved by the Honourable Senator Goldenberg, seconded by the Honourable Senator Forsey, that the Senate do not insist upon its amendment to Bill C-176 intituled an act—

Some Hon. Senators: Dispense.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: No. I would like to know what it is.

The Hon. the Speaker: I am sorry. May I continue with the amendment?

Hon. Mr. Phillips: Yes, please continue, Madam Speaker.

The Hon. the Speaker: In amendment it is moved by the Honourable Senator Carter, seconded by the Honourable Senator Lang, that the Senate do not insist upon—

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Dispense.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion in amendment?

Hon. Mr. Phillips: What motion? I have heard so many "dispenses" and so on that I am not sure.

Hon. Mr. Laird: Order!

Hon. Eugene A. Forsey: Honourable senators, I am in somewhat of a quandary because it is very late and I do not wish to make myself obnoxious to the house by prolonging the proceedings beyond what honourable senators wish. I should be grateful for any guidance I may have on this. I am afraid I shall not be able to be quite as brief as I should like, although I do not intend to be very long. I should think it is perfectly possible that I might speak for 20 minutes, and I do not know if the house is prepared to tolerate a speech of that length now.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Forsey: I do not absolutely guarantee not to run over the 20 minutes, but I hope I shan't.

First of all—

Hon. Mr. Phillips: Move the adjournment!

Hon. Mr. Forsey: I think, if I may say so, that that last suggestion is not in accordance with what seemed to be the wish of the house as indicated by certain demonstrations which I saw just now. However, as I say, I am in the hands of the house.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: Move the adjournment!

Hon. Mr. Forsey: I am perfectly prepared to put it off until tomorrow morning.

Hon. Senators: Carry on.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: Move the adjournment.

Hon. Senators: Carry on now.

Hon. Mr. Forsey: I want to address myself first of all to the amendment which has been moved by Senator Carter. That amendment is, of course, identical with the amendment moved in the other place yesterday by the Minister of Justice and might, therefore, be assumed in the abstract to have my support. I am not prepared to support it now. If I had been in the other house yesterday, yes, of course, I should have supported it. I am not prepared to support it in this house now because I think it is an exercise in complete futility. I cannot imagine for one moment that there is the slightest prospect of such a motion being accepted in the other house. Therefore. I think it is really a complete waste of time to go in for any detailed examination of this particular amendment here tonight.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Forsey: I was a little puzzled by a great deal of Senator Carter's speech, because it seemed to me that the main thrust of what he had to say was that no bill at all on wiretapping would be the best possible solution to this problem. I may have misunderstood him. I admit that he finally said that he was in favour of some kind of control over wiretapping, but a great deal of his speech seemed to me to be a lamentation of Jeremiah on the subject of having a wiretapping bill at all.

Of course, I cannot share that point of view and I do not think that most of the members of this house do.

To address myself now, if I may without violating the rules, to the main motion to which Senator Carter proposed his amendment—and I think this is in order, because it is necessary to explain why I believe the main motion is desirable rather than the amendment—first of all I think there can be no question at all that this house has a right to amend any legislation from the other house that it sees fit to amend. It has even a duty to amend, if it sees what it considers good reason to do so. And it has a right and even a duty to insist on the amendments, if there is in the judgment of the members of this house, due reason to do so.

This, I think, should go without saying. Any contention to the contrary seems to me to be devoid of sense.

Now, I think the amendment which we made to this bill was a good amendment. I thought so at the time. I have seen no reason to change my position. Someone said this afternoon that if it was a good amendment then we should stick to it. I think that is rather too simple. I should have thought that anybody with even my limited political experience—and I cannot remember whether the honourable senator who made this remark had more or less political experience than I, although he could scarcely perhaps have less—I should have thought that anybody even with a minimum of political experience would have realized that there are many occasions when you cannot get what you regard as the ideal solution, the ideal bill, the ideal clause; and when you are faced with the question, "Is it so important to have that particular clause, that particular section of the bill, that it is worthwhile sticking to my original position, come what may?" Surely there are many occasions when we are obliged to say, if we are practical politicians at all—and I use the word "politician" in its better sense—if we are reasonable and pragmatic practitioners of the art of politics, surely there are many occasions when we are obliged to say to ourselves, "Well, I do not altogether like this, I should have preferred to see that last amendment carried; I do not altogether like that; but on the whole, I think that even with this imperfection the bill is worth supporting."

● (2240)

My view on this is that what I might call the "Atkey clause," clause 178.23, is a blemish on this legislation—and I do not think it is a trivial blemish. I should not subscribe to that word "trivial." However, I think it is only a blemish on this legislation, and my reason for saying that is that the Minister of Justice said, more than once, that while he would have preferred not to have this clause, nevertheless he could live with it.

Some people prefer the view of the police chiefs to the view of the Minister of Justice. I do not know that I am prepared to accept that view wholeheartedly. I remember on occasion in my perhaps somewhat chequered past, having to encounter certain actions of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. They never picked me up—I do not mean anything like that. They may even never have had a dossier on me, although perhaps they have. I do not know. But in some cases I thought they showed remarkably poor judgment, and not very much knowledge, in their activities in regard to certain civil liberties of the subject. I am not prepared to accept the infallibility of police chiefs. I am not prepared, of course, to accept the infallibility of a Minister of Justice, either; but I am rather inclined to think that the Minister of Justice may be in a position to take a broader view, and a somewhat less biased view—a view less affected by "déformation professionnelle," as we say in French—than the police chiefs; and therefore I attach great weight to what the Minister of Justice said on this subject.

[Translation]

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Honourable senator, please allow me one question. What about the provincial Attorneys General who have their say in this?

Hon. Mr. Forsey: Please excuse me.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: The same goes for them: they have their responsibilities.

[Hon. Mr. Forsey.]

[English]

Hon. Mr. Choquette: What do you say? He asked you about the Attorneys General, and he said "Attorney Generals," but it's "Attorneys General." What do you say as to their opinions?

Hon. Mr. Forsey: I have no access to the opinions of the Attorneys General. Perhaps my honourable friends who have just spoken—both of them—have. I cannot say. I should think, however, that that point is covered by what has already been said about the undertaking of the Minister of Justice to keep in touch with the Attorneys General of the provinces and to introduce legislation to meet their difficulties if it turns out that these difficulties really exist. However, that is a side issue, for the moment, for me. I am not in possession of the opinions of the Attorneys General.

Senator Choquette said this afternoon, "Better no bill than a bad bill." My answer to that is, "Better a blemished bill than no bill." It is really a question, here, of judgment. In the judgment of Senator Choquette, and of Senator Carter, and of various others, this bill, with this clause in it, is a bad bill. In my judgment it is a good bill with a blemish, which I am prepared to accept, "faute de mieux", because I think we cannot get anything better at the present time. I do not want to see the bill die. I am absolutely convinced that if we send this measure back to the House of Commons with the amendment proposed by Senator Carter, or if we just send it back with the original amendment which this house passed, the bill will die. I do not think there is the faintest prospect of the obdurate majority which we saw yesterday—the increased majority which we saw yesterday—eating humble pie, eating crow, or backing down. I cannot conceive of this.

Hon. Mr. Molson: What are we doing?

Hon. Mr. Forsey: Wait a minute. I have great respect for my friend, Senator Molson, and I listened with great respect this afternoon to the speech which he made, as I always do, and to the speeches of other people who oppose this motion. I was greatly impressed by Senator Lang's speech, and by Senator Perrault's. I am not entirely convinced by them, for reasons which I shall try to make clear, however.

A good deal has been said about the constitutional position of the Senate in this matter, and mention has been made of the clauses of the British North America Act, under which the Senate, except for its inability to introduce money bills, or to increase the amount involved in money bills, is completely the equal of the House of Commons. That goes very far. This house, if it wants to, can pass any amendment other than those I have just mentioned. It can reject any bill whatsoever, and it can go on doing it from now until Doomsday. There is no restriction whatever, and in some instances it has thrown out a bill five times in succession.

If you look simply at the law of our Constitution, you can be very gravely misled about its essence. If you go through the British North America Act from end to end you will not find the faintest, most oblique reference to responsible government except in the preamble—the words "similar in principle," "a constitution similar in principle to that of the United Kingdom."

The politically illiterate person—the politically illiterate foreigner—looking at the British North America Act, would get the impression that we were governed by an almost complete monarchical despotism. We all know that this is simply not true. The practice, the usage, the conventions, the understandings and the accepted views of what should be done politically and constitutionally are an enormously important and vital part of our Constitution, and we all know that the practice changes from time to time, that it develops, that it adjusts itself to new circumstances. I suggest that in fact, over recent decades, the Senate has been less ready, either to reject bills outright or to pass amendments upon which it insisted in the teeth of the Opposition of the other place, than it formerly was, and I think the practice has now grown up that in general the Senate will reject a bill from the other house, or insist on an amendment of a bill from the other house, only in rather unusual circumstances—circumstances of great seriousness. Of course, what constitutes a circumstance of great seriousness is a matter of opinion.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: If you follow Senator Martin—

Hon. Mr. Forsey: I am sorry. My infirmity prevents me from hearing all the interventions of other honcurable senators, but I think I shall probably come to the point Senator Phillips was mentioning in a moment or two.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: Senator Martin has—

Hon. Mr. Forsey: I am tired of Senator Phillips talking about Senator Martin. If he wants to talk about Senator Martin, let him get up and make a speech about him. I am not talking about Senator Martin, or any other personality in this house, and I am expressing my opinions, which I arrived at without having the faintest idea what Senator Martin's opinion was, or Senator Goldenberg's, or anyone else's. I have the floor, Senator Phillips, and I am going to keep it for the moment.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: Honourable senators—

Hon. Senators: Order, order.

Hon. Mr. Forsey: I will yield the floor to you, Senator Phillips, when you ask a proper question in the proper way. I have the floor, Senator Phillips, and I am going to keep it for the moment. I will yield the floor to you when you ask a proper question in the proper way, but I am not yielding the floor at this point.

● (2250)

I want to make it perfectly clear that I arrived at my opinion that I am expressing on this matter before discussing it with anyone. Senator Goldenberg came to me and said, "What do you think about this?" I said, "I should be interested in knowing what you think, but I will tell you what I think." I told him, and it turned out that our opinions coincided. I said, "If I found that your opinion was opposed to mine, such is my respect for you that I should have gone and thought again, although I don't know that I should have changed it." But my opinion, good, bad or indifferent, has nothing to do with Senator Martin, Senator Langlois, Senator Buckwold, Senator Goldenberg, or anybody else in this house. I am expressing my own personal opinion based on my conviction about this legislation. I may be 100 per cent wrong, but if so, I am 100 per cent wrong on my own responsibility.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: I am sure the honourable senator is not suggesting that we were all agreed?

Hon. Mr. Forsey: No, certainly not.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: Were you at the Liberal caucus this morning?

Hon. Mr. Forsey: I do not know if that question is in order, and I do not think it makes one particle of difference one way or the other. I am not going to answer a perfectly irrelevant question. I do not know whether you were at the Conservative caucus or not, but I do not care two hoots in Hades.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: That is our fault. We never had a caucus.

Hon. Mr. Forsey: Really, honourable senators, I think the interruptions to which I am being subjected are not altogether in the nature of legitimate interruptions.

The Hon. the Speaker: Senator Forsey has the floor. Unless he wishes to have questions asked of him, he should not have to interrupt his speech.

Hon. Mr. Forsey: I want to refer specifically, honourable senators, to the practice which I think has been followed here for nearly 40 years now. I think, if you go back to 1935, you will find that the occasions upon which the Senate has either rejected any measure or has insisted on amendments are very few indeed and very unusual, if not extraordinary.

In 1936 a proposal to amend the Constitution came up to this house from the House of Commons. When it got here, the then Conservative leader, the Right Honourable Arthur Meighen, pointed out that it would have given the provinces power to erect tariffs against each other. This statement, which was not I think seriously challenged, was received with horror from all sides. Practically everybody said, "Oh, we never meant that". The Senate threw out the proposed amendment, and that was the last we ever heard of it. It died unwept, unhonoured and unsung, and deserved so to die.

There was a very extraordinary proposal brought before this house, one that would have menaced, threatened the national existence of this country; and there was a case where the Senate, I think, was fully justified in saying, "We will not pass it".

The next occasion when the Senate asserted itself in a somewhat similar way, as I recall it, was when a proposal came before this house, passed by the other house, to confer on the Minister of National Revenue certain arbitrary powers which, in the opinion of this house, were altogether unwarranted and dangerous; and the Senate chucked out, rejected, threw out, that particular part of the bill. The House of Commons refused to accept the Senate amendment. The Senate insisted on its amendment, and the bill died—and in my judgment, although I was at that time a supporter of the government then in power, it deserved to die. The third occasion—I may have got these last two out of their chronological order—was when a bill passed the House of Commons for the removal of Mr. Coyne as Governor of the Bank of Canada. Mr. Coyne felt he was entitled to a hearing before a parliamentary committee. He could not get it before the relevant committee of the House of Commons. He asked to have a hearing before the relevant committee of this house. This house agreed, and he got his hearing; and when he had his hearing, he resigned. So the bill fell to the ground because, of course, the purpose had been achieved by the resignation of Mr. Coyne.

The suggestion that if we give in on this thing, if we do not insist on our amendment, we are committing suicide, that we are creating a fatal precedent, that never again shall we dare to amend anything, or at any rate dare to amend anything without the gracious permission of the House of Commons, dare to amend and insist on any amendment we may make—a suggestion that a single instance of this sort creates a fatal precedent is to my mind perfect nonsense.

I cannot see how that could be maintained for a moment. One swallow does not make a summer. One decision on one particular bill does not create a complete precedent binding on posterity to the end of time.

In my judgment, our right to amend anything we see fit to amend within our powers, barring what I have mentioned, raising of the amounts of the money bills, remains absolutely intact and unquestionable.

In my judgment, our right to insist on our amendments, our right to reject a bill outright, remains perfectly intact. But it is a question of when these rights should be exerted. What do we reject, and when and why? What do we insist on, and when and why? This is a matter where we have to use our heads and use our judgment. This is matter where we have to use that sober second thought celebrated in song and story and in countless eloquent speeches in this chamber. I emphasize sober and thought—not impulse, not something that hits us on the top of the head, but the intelligent use of our brains.

I would say that the Senate has a right to insist on an amendment or a right to throw out an amendment if the bill, or a clause in the bill, is really vicious; if it is, for example, a gross and flagrant invasion of the liberties of the subject, or a measure fatal or highly dangerous to the national existence.

I would say that there is a similar warrant for us to exercise our rights to throw out a bill or amend a bill and insist on our amendment if there is a tremendous, widespread, furious outcry from a large section of the country against the measure.

Those are, roughly speaking, the circumstances in which I think we are entitled to exercise these rights, and justified, warranted, amply so, in exercising these rights. I think that the example of 1936, our throwing out of that constitutional amendment, is one illustration of this—and the case that Senator O'Leary referred to, of the destructive amendment, as I think it was to the naval aid bill of 1913—is another.

There, there was very widespread, very strong, very deep opposition to the measure, notably I think in the province of Quebec.

I think the Senate said, "We will pass it only if you put it to the country in a general election," and Sir Robert Borden did not take the bet. I think he did not take the bet because he knew that there was such widespread opposition in the country, and such deep opposition.

I should like to point out that we got our way in the Senate on these various occasions. The House of Commons caved in.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: Were you there at that time?

Hon. Mr. Forsey: No, I was not. I am speaking now of the Senate as an institution. I am sorry if I transgressed in that way. Of course I was not there. I do not think the honourable senator was there either, for that matter. But that, again, is quite irrelevant. The Commons never tried again with those particular measures. We put the lid on, and I think rightly so.

The House of Commons gave in. Nobody suggested for one moment that it was committing suicide, or divesting itself of its rights and powers, or that it had lost the power to object to anything the Senate said.

I venture to say that our right to reject measures, or to insist on our amendments, is somewhat analogous on the one hand to the right of the House of Commons to engage in prolonged obstruction which it has done only relatively rarely in the history of this country. I think 1881, 1896, 1911, 1955 and 1956 are the only occasions that I can recall when there was really deep and prolonged and sustained obstruction. In all of those cases there was very sound warrant.

It is somewhat analogous to that, and also to certain reserve powers of the Crown which are rarely exercised, but which nevertheless remain there in the background for the protection of the functioning of parliamentary government.

Obstruction in the House of Commons, the use of the reserve powers of the Crown, the use of our undoubted right to reject bills or to amend them in any way we see fit, and insist on our amendment, I suggest, is a similar power; to use the language of the Anglican Prayer Book on the subject of marriage:

> Not by any to be enterprised or taken in hand lightly, unadvisedly, or wantonly, but reverently, soberly, discreetly, and in the fear of God.

● (2300)

I think we should undertake to insist on our amendments only if there is very, very grave and substantial reason for doing so. In the judgment of certain honourable senators, which I respect, there is such grave reason in this case. In my judgment, there is not. In my judgment it is not a bad bill. It is a good bill, somewhat blemished.

I should like to add one or two other things, notably that I fully share what Senator O'Leary said about appointed persons. This nonsense that merely because you are elected you are endowed with all the wisdom and virtue of the angels, and that merely because you are appointed you are devoid of intelligence, devoid of principle, devoid of any good quality, is perfect trash, and tripe, and rubbish, and I reject it completely.

If we were now faced with the kind of thing that I have been mentioning, the kind of extraordinary circumstances, the grave violation of our liberties, the threat to the national existence, in this measure, then I would say let us have a confrontation with the House of Commons, with all my heart, and I would support it. But this clause in question, good, bad or indifferent, is not, to my mind, of that character. It is not a grave invasion of the liberties of the subject; it is not a threat to our national existence, and there is no serious, widespread outcry against it. So, to my mind, to insist on our original amendment, or to pass the amendment moved by Senator Carter, would be foolish and irresponsible.

Never mind what the media may say, or what the NDP or anybody else may say. Let our sober judgment be our guide, not the gibes of the press or the jeers of the NDP, and I am tempted to add, the taunts of the Tories. This is not an occasion for simply reacting emotionally to misrepresentation or abuse, or releasing pent-up feelings of anger or frustration, however justified, or giving ourselves the emotional satisfaction of sticking our tongues out at the majority in the other house. It is an occasion for exercising what Sir Robert Borden, too optimistically, I fear, called the "commonplace quality of common sense."

Hon. George van Roggen: Honourable senators, when Senator Lang rose a little earlier this evening he said he rose with some hesitation in following the excellent speeches of Senator Martin and Senator O'Leary, to say nothing of Senator Choquette's earlier speech. I rise with even more trepidation, because Senator Lang proceeded immediately to give an excellent speech, which was followed by equally good speeches from Senator Perrault and Senator Carter. Unfortunately, I missed part of Senator Carter's speech because I had to leave the chamber for a few minutes. Now we have heard Senator Forsey with his usual eloquence, fluency and decisiveness. So I shall not try to speak to you in the manner of these other honourable senators, whose eloquence I cannot match.

I have only one or two points to make, and I shall not take more than two or three minutes to make them. The first thing I should like to mention—and it has been mentioned already—is the extraordinarily stupid and inaccurate editorial in the Globe and Mail. It could only have been the product of an ignorant oaf. I do not know who the author of that editorial was, but somebody told me earlier today that he used to work for a newspaper in Vancouver. If that is true, I can only say that I am glad he is now in Toronto. We should not, however, dignify such nonsense by creating a confrontation with the Commons for the amusement of these rather irresponsible thrill-seekers in the media.

To answer the point the NDP and the media have been trying to make, that we must obey the will of the elected majority, and the response to that by some members of this chamber, and others, that if we accept this bill now and pass it we will somehow be subservient to the Commons, I should like to say that surely this coin must have two sides. We know that there have been a large number of amendments over the years passed by this house, which have been accepted by the House of Commons. In those instances the House of Commons has not said, because they accepted an amendment proposed here, that this made them inferior to us. I say that the other side of that coin is that we must not take the position that we cannot ever propose a single amendment that they must not accept; that the time can never come when we propose an amendment which they reject, because then we are saying that we are superior to them, rather than vice versa. We are two chambers trying to work in harness together, with equal authority under the Constitution, as has been pointed out. I reject the proposition that, having had many amendments to legislation accepted over the years by the House of Commons, we are now being insulted in some fashion by having one not accepted.

Having made that point, there is an unfortunate additional factor in this particular instance, and that is the irresponsibility of the House of Commons in not giving our amendment proper consideration. What does that leave us with? It leaves us with this state of affairs that we have done our duty; we have improved this bill; we have given it sober second thought, as is our duty. It is the other place that has not done its duty. It is the other place that is acting on pique and emotion; not us.

I can understand the actions of the NDP for two reasons. First, they wish to abolish this chamber. They have said this quite publicly in their platform, and they are entitled to that viewpoint. This is not the time to go into the problems that would arise in a parliamentary democracy, without a written Constitution and a Bill of Rights which can be enforced by the courts, if you do not have the protection of the Upper House in Canada. The Senate could not be abolished, I would suggest, without there being other safeguards for the Canadian public in its place. I will not go into that tonight, but that is one thing the NDP are known to support and, of course, they seize on any opportunity such as this to further that end.

There is a second reason why they supported the action of the Commons yesterday, that being that philosophically they probably agree with the bill as it now reads. That was disclosed in their vote in the other place earlier. So I do not have that much criticism of them, although I think they demonstrated typical irresponsibility in not considering seriously, and debating, our amendment.

The Tories, on the other hand, are a different story. There was shocking irresponsibility displayed yesterday in a thirst for power, regardless of the quality of the legislation coming out of the other place. But they, together with the NDP and the Creditistes, constitute the majority in the other place, and they had their way. They will have to answer for it to the electorate in the years to come. It is not our job in this chamber to go through hell and fire to pull the Tory chestnuts out of the fire for them. They perpetrated this, and they will have to live with it.

Personally, in spite of the rather unnecessary remarks by one of my fellow senators across the way about those on this side being "Martinized," I would say that I was in some doubt as to what the best course to follow tonight would be right up until the time I listened to the excellent speech of Senator O'Leary, since fortified by the speeches of other honourable senators and, lastly, by that of Senator Forsey. I will be opposing the amendment proposed by Senator Carter, and supporting the motion of Senator Goldenberg. This should not be construed as an embarrassment for the Senate, but only as an embarrassment for the Progressive Conservative Party of Canada.

[Translation]

Hon. Léopold Langlois: Honourable senators, I regret to rise at such a late hour, but I am ready to promise my colleagues that I will try to make the shortest speech possible.

First of all, I must make an important preliminary comment. As a result of the duties I have been fulfilling in this house for some time already, I must say that my comments tonight are made in my own name only.

Another preliminary remark I must also make is to emphasize the fact that today, January 11, 1974, will surely remain for the parliamentary history of this country a glorious day for the Senate. As a matter of fact, today, our chamber appeared in the country as a first quality deliberative assembly and the opponents to this chamber will surely recall for a long time, I am sure, the Senate reaction to this inconsiderate attack. As regards this attack, the Senate proved to be a strong opponent thanks to its vigorous response, the independence and the quality of its debates.

First, as a remark on what was said by previous speakers about the urgency to dispose of this bill—and this was mentioned in the House of Commons yesterday by the honourable Leader of the Opposition—I will point out at the outset that it is the fourth bill of the kind to be brought before the Canadian Parliament.

The first was introduced in 1969 by Mr. Orlikow.

The second was given first reading in 1971, on June 28 to be exact, and on February 21, 1972, a third such bill came into being in the House of Commons and because of lack of action in due time, these three bills died on the order paper of the House of Commons. That very house says to us today: hurry up, forget about your right to deal with this measure as you see fit.

I cannot accept such irresponsibility, from the House of Commons or from anywhere else.

Having made these few comments on the history of the bill before us, I should like to emphasize a few aspects of the excellent speeches we have heard today.

First of all, I will refer to Senator Goldenberg's remarks, although I do not agree with his allegations.

What I do not like about the statement of Senator Goldenberg, who is a well-known expert in constitutional law, is the point that he tried to make that customs and practices are more important than a written constitution.

I should like to remind him of the old Latin proverb:

verba volant, scripta manent

I think he must have forgotten this principle which is applicable not only to the constitutional point of view, but universally by all those who feel that a practice may change, customs may vary, and usages may be retained so long as the people who once adopted them remain constant in their attitude under certain circumstances.

What can prevent other legislators from counter-attacking later on and changing the established customs? They are not bound by doctrine, as are some of our Canadian courts.

In any case, this objection of Senator Goldenberg was contradicted by two eminent speakers, my own leader, and the senator who seconded the motion of Senator Goldenberg, Senator Forsey, when both senators stated that the fact of not using tonight our right to refer this bill to the House of Commons did not affect the Canadian Constitution.

This would have been a precedent, a first step towards the establishment of a tradition which, according to Senator Goldenberg, would have become more important than the written Constitution of this country. I cannot accept this position.

Senator Goldenberg's speech was followed by that of Senator Choquette, with whom I am in complete agreement. I congratulate him on the independence that he showed in his statement, even when he criticized his party. I believe that he will appreciate my attitude tonight since I shall withdraw the support that I have always given to my party in order to express a personal opinion.

Moreover, I think that the positions taken in this house tonight show the independence of the Senate. Mostly, they show its objectivity when it comes to the consideration of important bills. Senators are showing to the country that they can put aside their political affiliations in order to consider first of all the welfare of Canada. This is a rare example among Canadian legislatures. I am proud that the Senate of Canada gave this example tonight.

Hon. Mr. Bourget: Very well.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: This afternoon and tonight it was often repeated that a difference should exist in the mind of some people between the powers of the elected chamber and those of the appointed Senate.

When, in last June, I was participating in the debate of this house on Senate reform I thought I should point out first the tremendous difference which exists between the membership of this chamber and the House of Lords. I used this basis to say that too often the Senate situation is appreciated on the basis of the composition and the role of the British House of Lords which is totally different from ours. Suffice it to look briefly at the function of the British House of Lords to see the enormous difference which exists between the two chambers.

First, the British House of Lords is in principle composed of 1,034 lords, of which 265 spiritual lords representing the upper hierarchy of the British Anglican Church and 1,008 temporal lords, representing 272 hereditary lordships and 126 life lordships. We are far from our Canadian upper chamber. I am now in the same position as the Father of Confederation, the Right Honourable Sir John A. Macdonald who at page 37 of the Confederation Debates stated and I quote:

● (2320)

[English]

> In this country, we must remember, that the gentlemen who will be selected for the Legislative Council—

That is, the Senate.

> —stand on a very different footing from the peers of England. They have not like them any ancestral associations or position derived from history. They have not that direct influence on the people themselves, or on the popular branch of the legislature, which the peers of England exercise, from their great wealth, their vast territorial possessions, their numerous tenantry, and that prestige with which the exalted position of their class for centuries has invested them . . . The members of our Upper House will be like those of the Lower, men of the people, and from the people. The man put into the Upper House is as much a man of the people the day after, as the day before his elevation. Springing from the people, and one of them, he takes his seat in the Council with all the sympathies and feelings of a man of the people, and when he returns home, at the end of the session, he mingles with them on equal terms, and is influenced by the same feelings and associations, and events, as those which affect the mass around him.

[Translation]

Further on Sir John A. Macdonald proceeded to say and I quote again:

[English]

And is it, then, to be supposed that the members of the upper branch of the legislature will set themselves deliberately at work to oppose what they know to be the settled opinions and wishes of the people of the country? They will not do it. There is no fear of a deadlock between the two houses. There is an infinitely greater chance of a dead lock between the two branches of the legislature, should the elective principle be adopted, than with a nominated chamber—chosen by the Crown, and having no mission from the people. The members of the Upper Chamber would then come from the people as well as those of the Lower House, and should any difference ever arise between both branches, the former could say to the members of the popular branch—"We as much represent the feelings of the people as you do, and even more so; we are not elected from small localities and for a short period; you as a body were elected at a particular time, when the public mind was running in a particular channel; you were returned to Parliament, not so much representing the general views of the country, on general questions, as upon the particular subjects which happened to engage the minds of the people when they went to the polls. We have as much right, or a better right, than you to be considered as representing the deliberate will of the people on general questions, and therefore we will not give way."

[Translation]

A comparable opinion about the Senate was expressed by none other than the Right Honourable Arthur Meighen in the Queen's Quarterly, volume 44, page 152 and I quote:

[English]

Some time ago a prominent and popular Canadian, a man of opposite political association to myself, said, "I am thankful in these days for the Senate! No matter what wild and extreme radicalism may sweep the country the Senate will stand firm; it will save the ship". This surely is worth saying and remembering. The forces of wild and extreme radicalism must be met right out among the ranks of our people, in their homes and meeting places; there the power of reason and common sense must be applied, the lesson of long experience must be taught, or nothing will save the ship. Surely we have learned from tragedies in other lands that the tide of a mad, militant and persistent majority never can be stemmed. It must not become a majority.

[Translation]

Following those two quotations, I think it is absolutely impossible to suggest that the House of Commons is on a higher step than the Senate simply because of the fact that one is elected and the other is appointed.

Coming back to the speeches made by my colleagues tonight, I say to Senator Asselin that I agree with him when he says that the test in the Senate tonight is one of credibility. I would add that it is also a test of respect for the Canadian public and even respect on the part of our own members. Indeed, if we downgraded this House to the level where some of its opponents, its adversaries would like to see it, soon our colleagues will lose respect for this House and interest in attending and participating in its debates.

I think the future of Canada, the future of the Senate, depends upon what we do here tonight. That is why I am opposed to the motion of my honourable friend, Senator Goldenberg. I have also appreciated enormously—as well as my colleagues I am sure—the comments of Senator O'Leary who tonight let us have one of his speeches that not only proved beneficial because of his parliamentary experience but also his journalistic experience. I find myself in complete agreement with his comments although his conclusion was contrary to the one I reached tonight.

I should also like to point out the speeches made tonight by my other colleagues such as my leader, Senator Martin,who as usual was excellent in his presentation although I regret to tell him he did not convince me. But I appreciate that he leaves me free, as it should be, to voice an opinion contrary to his own.

● (2330)

Senator Molson also showed an excellence to which we have long become accustomed, as well as Senator Laing, Senator Perrault, Senator Carter and Senator Forsey.

However, I would have preferred Senator Carter to take a stand other than the one he took tonight, although I would be ready to vote for his amendment. However I would have preferred Senator Carter—instead of proposing to send the bill back with the amendment which was defeated in the House yesterday and has very little chance of being accepted—to propose a conference as provided for in our rules, especially rule 59 of the Senate, on page 26, in paragraph 2, as follows:

(2) When the House of Commons disagrees with amendments made by the Senate to a bill originating in the House of Commons and has returned to the Senate such bill indicating the amendments disagreed with, if the Senate decides to insist on its amendments or any of them and to return the bill to the House of Commons, the message accompanying such bill shall state the reasons for the insistence by the Senate on its own amendments, and such reasons shall be drawn up by a committee of three senators appointed for such purpose by the Senate.

While commenting on the speeches delivered tonight, I may say to Senator Carter that any amendment for the sending back of a bill to the House of Commons must be accompanied by a message stating the reasons for the insistence by the Senate on its own amendments, and that such reasons shall be drawn up by a committee of three senators appointed for such purpose by the Senate.

A motion on the amendment providing for such a conference would not have been a confrontation on the stand taken by the House of Commons, but would have provided an opportunity for compromise. We would not be exposing ourselves to receiving from the House of Commons a negative answer to our request that they swallow up, reject what they had decided yesterday. But by opening the door to compromise, I believe that we would have had the chance of at least holding a conference through Senate and House of Commons committees which would have tried to solve this problem.

I believe that was the most practical solution and the least offensive situation for the House of Commons which, as I have said, would have had more chances of being successful. In any event, in moving his amendment, Senator Carter is returning the bill to the House. I do not support those who say that in so doing we are killing the bill because the House has given us the opportunity today to maintain it and keep it alive by adjourning instead of proroguing.

The House of Commons adjourned until February 26 subject to be recalled on the Speaker's order at any moment. However, there will certainly be a recall for Royal Assent by the end of the week or early in the next one. Whenever the House is called back by the Speaker for Royal Assent, our message sent tonight or tomorrow will be received by the House which will have the opportunity to consider it immediately or at a later date.

When, a moment ago, I gave the sequence of introduction of the four bills similar to the one we are considering tonight, I wanted to indicate that there was no urgency. Even if we delay the consideration of this bill until February 26, the House could deal with it earlier, if it so wishes, but even if they do wait until February 26, the delay would be a month at the most, whereas the House took years to introduce the bill which was sent us some time ago and which we rejected with the introduction of an amendment to a clause.

I think there is no urgency. Now that the Honourable Minister of Justice has said before the Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs that he could live with the bill in its present form, I will tell him that he still can go on living as we did for a century without any bill, because all that we would be doing in passing this bill tonight would be to give protection to criminals and organized crime. We would not provide any protection to the people; we would even expose them to the wrongdoings of those people because in so doing, we would be clipping the wings of our law-enforcement bodies which would not have the same powers to investigate the activities of organized crime.

I was surprised a moment ago to hear my honourable friend senator Forsey state that he could not rely too much on police officers who were subject to professional bias; but he forgot that the administration of justice falls not within the jurisdiction of the federal government but within that of the provinces. Has he forgotten that the main function of the Senate is to protect regional interests, provincial interests, to fight for the autonomy of the provinces? That is one of the principal functions of the Senate. That is exactly what we are doing when we object to a bill reducing the freedom of the provincial Attorneys General who have the last say in police matters in their respective provinces; and we reduce their freedom in the administration of justice, which is theirs alone and into which neither the Senate nor the House of Commons has the right to interfere. I feel that the Senate, in adopting the attitude I have suggested this evening, will assume an important function: that of protecting the autonomy of provincial administrations within the Canadian confederation.

[Hon. Mr. Langlois.]

[English]

Hon. Mr. Carter: Honourable senators, I rise on a question of privilege. I would like to explain to the house the remark which Senator Langlois just made with respect to the amendment that I proposed. I considered the amendment referred to by Senator Langlois, which involved asking for a conference under Rule 59(2), and I found that that is not possible. It is not possible because Rule 59(2) applies only when the Senate insists on its amendment; the motion before us says that we do not insist, and therefore it is impossible, under our procedure, our rules, to make that amendment. I would have preferred to make the amendment involving Rule 59(2), but my advice was that it is not possible, and that the only possible amendment is the one I proposed.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: My colleague apparently missed my point. I do not see how he could fail to be bound by the motion made by Senator Goldenberg, since he was moving a motion in amendment. True, Senator Goldenberg was suggesting that we were not insisting on the amendment, but he could, in the amendment, have said that we were insisting, and called for a conference, and thereby opened the door to a compromise, or discussions with the other place which might have resulted in a compromise.

Hon. Mr. Rowe: May I ask a question? Must we have a vote tonight? I want to speak on this matter. I understand there are several other honourable senators who want to speak on this matter also. My question to the Leader of the Government, or to whoever it concerns, is this: Must we have a vote tonight?

Hon. Mr. Buckwold: Honourable senators, I move the adjournment of the debate.

On motion of Senator Buckwold, debate adjourned.

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Honourable senators, I move that the Senate do now adjourn until tomorrow, Saturday, January 12, 1974, at 11 o'clock in the forenoon.

Hon. Mr. Molson: Honourable senators, I do not know whether that can be done under Rule 13.

Hon. Mrs. Norrie: Honourable senators, is there any way by which we can let the maintenance men put in the chairs and benches for the swearing-in ceremony on Monday? I do not think it would hurt us if we had to sit on the benches.

The Hon. the Speaker: Senator Norrie wants to know if the benches can be put in to the chamber for the ceremony on Monday. There is very little time over the weekend for that to be done. She would like to know if we could sit on the benches tomorrow.

Some Hon. Senators: No.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: I have discussed this matter with the Black Rod. I was informed this work would start at four or five o'clock tomorrow afternoon, and be finished in time for the investiture of the Governor General on Monday.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 11 a.m.

THE SENATE

Saturday, January 12, 1974

The Senate met at 11 a.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

AIR CANADA

ABORTED LANDING AT OTTAWA AIRPORT—FURTHER QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE RE ANSWER TO INQUIRY

Hon. Mr. McElman: Honourable senators, before the business of the house proceeds I should like to rise on a question of privilege. I suppose I should call it a "continuing question of privilege". Some honourable senators will recall that on December 6 last I rose on a question of privilege stating that misinformation had been provided the house in reply to a question which I had placed with the Leader of the Government in the Senate with respect to the aborted landing at Ottawa Airport of Air Canada, Flight No. 637 on November 13, 1973. At that time, of course, I absolved the Leader of the Government of any blame in that he was simply passing on information received by him.

At this point I thank the Leader of the Government in the Senate for assisting and supporting me in obtaining full and complete information in connection with this point. Let me say, very briefly, perhaps in repetition, that aboard that flight there were four senators, namely, Senators Inman, Blois, Burchill and myself. The flight landing was aborted after descending below a level of 300 feet at Ottawa Airport, and it was a rather hair-raising experience.

I have now received from the Ministry of Transport a detailed explanation of the incident, and because of what I have said on the record in the Senate I hope, in fairness to the ministry, to be permitted to read into the record their explanation and detailed reply. Have I your permission?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Mr. McElman: The letter is addressed to me, and is from Mr. Jean-Marc Favreau, executive assistant to the minister, and reads as follows:

> On December 6 you raised a question of privilege in the Senate stating that the answer to your question regarding Air Canada Flight 637 (Montreal-Ottawa, November 13), as provided to the Senate by Senator Martin on December 5, constituted "misinformation."
>
> While the answer may well have appeared to you, for good reasons, to have been misleading, it was in fact accurate. It seems that you should have been supplied with some further explanatory information along with the original answer, and I regret this oversight.
>
> The apparent contradiction here is that the captain of the aircraft did announce that there was a truck on the runway, yet the answer supplied to Senator Martin indicated that this was not the reason for the captain aborting his landing attempt, which is a fact. The captain did not, as has been suggested, break through the 300-ft. ceiling, see the truck on the runway and therefore abort his landing. The truck had been ordered off the runway before Flight 637 was cleared to land, and in fact left the runway promptly and well before the aircraft broke through the ceiling.
> What happened, in detail, was the following, partly described in the captain's own words. "For some minutes, (about five) prior to my final approach, a vehicle was operating on the runway looking for birds because of reports of bird strikes." The captain had been listening to the truck talking to ground control on its radio for the five-minute interval. He knew it was there and knew what it was doing.
>
> "I believe that this was causing oscillations on my ILS Localizer. As I broke through cloud for the final approach, the control tower told me the vehicle was no longer on the runway and that I was cleared to land." (The truck had pulled off the runway onto the grass.)
>
> "Because of the instrument oscillations and other factors, I was not satisfied with the general conditions and elected to make another approach. On breaking through cloud level I did not see the vehicle because I was not looking for it. My concern was to circle and approach the runway again." One of the "general conditions" the captain refers to was the ceiling, which left him insufficient time to safely correct for altitude and alignment of the aircraft with the runway.
>
> Here is how the captain recalls his public address statement after aborting the first landing attempt. "As you have probably noticed, I have decided not to land the aircraft at this time and we will make another approach. I did this for several reasons, one of which was that there was a truck on the runway which was a potential hazard to our approach."

As an aside, I might say that my recollection is something different. However, to go on:

> In fact, the truck was neither on the runway nor a hazard when the aircraft broke through the ceiling. It may have created an apparent interference with the instrument approach. The interference caused the captain to decide on a fresh approach for absolute safety. But it should be borne in mind that the truck was where it was, precisely to ensure that the aircraft would be safe in landing.
> The captain advises that announcements of this type are routine. In his words, "When anything unusual happens, such as this, I usually try to simplify my explanation to the passengers, and in this case a brief explanation about the truck being on the runway was the best and simplest way, particularly in French and English, when you have only a few seconds to do it." Unfortunately, it appears that the captain may have oversimplified somewhat in this instance.

The tape transcription of the captain's announcement to the cabin is not available. These on-board tapes are kept only for one half hour after the plane lands unless there is some specific known reason for keeping them. They are erased simply by the re-recording process, in other words, the next flight recording is simply made on the same tape, automatically erasing the previous tape.

The control tower's tape of their conversation with the plane and the truck are also not available. Control tower tapes of this kind are erased for re-use after thirty days.

Finally, we cannot substantiate the allegation to the effect that the truck driver was disciplined. Both the Ottawa Airport Manager of Maintenance and Engineering Services and the Head of the Airport RCMP detachment, independently reported that there was no substance to any such report.

I hope this clarifies the matter, and I repeat my regret that any misunderstanding should have occurred.

That is the end of the letter.

My only comment, honourable senators, in explanation of the reference to tower tapes and deck tapes is that I asked specifically of the department that the tapes be kept and that transcriptions be obtained. Of course, as indicated, the deck tape is erased 30 minutes after the flight has landed, but I twice requested that the tower tapes be retained and transcribed, and I so requested within the 30-day period, but that was not done.

In any event, in fairness to the department after what I said here, I wished the Senate to have this full explanation. I, of course, accept the information given.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Hon. Paul Martin tabled:

Copies of a contract between the Government of Canada and the Town of Wynyard, Saskatchewan, for the use or employment of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, pursuant to section 20(3) of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Act, chapter R-9, R.S.C., 1970 (English Text).

PROTECTION OF PRIVACY BILL

POSSIBLE COMMUNICATIONS RE MOTION FOR NON-INSISTENCE UPON SENATE AMENDMENT—QUESTION

Hon. Mr. Carter: Honourable senators, I should like to ask the Leader of the Government whether he has received any communication from the attorneys general of the various provinces or the Minister of Justice, or whether the government has received any communications from the attorneys general, relative to the motion that is before this house and, if so, what is the attitude expressed in their communications?

Hon. Mr. Martin: I have not received any such communication from the attorneys general.

Hon. Mr. Carter: You do not know of any, from the government?

Hon. Mr. Martin: With regard to this motion? This motion was only made yesterday. I have none.

Hon. Mr. Carter: Well, maybe if I worded it differently: With respect to the action that the Senate should take on Bill C-176.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Well, I would be surprised if any attorneys general would really seek to direct the Senate as to what it should do. The member for Winnipeg North Centre, I thought unceremoniously and improperly, tried to do that in the other place, but I cannot conceive that any attorney general would direct a message to the Senate telling us what to do. If he did, I know what my reply would be.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

ROYAL ASSENT—QUESTION

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Could we have a vague idea as to when royal assent is to take place?

Hon. Mr. Martin: I would sooner not give a vague idea; I would like to be able to give a precise one. I think it depends on the progress that we make on the matter before us. As soon as I have some indication I will certainly make it known. However, I hope we will have royal assent quickly, once we have taken what we believe to be the time necessary for the consideration of these matters.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: Supplementary to Senator Choquette's question. Has the honourable Senator Martin ever given anything but a vague indication?

Hon. Mr. Martin: I was going to say something to the senator, but I do not want to provoke him, so I won't.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: I was trying to provoke you.

[Translation]

Hon. Mr. Asselin: Honourable senators, I should like to put a question to the Leader of the Government about some statements that were made last night.

In the leader's opinion, if the Senate were to send the bill before us back to the House of Commons, would this kill the bill, since the House of Commons has adjourned to February 26 and the session has not been prorogued?

I think that several senators are under the impression that if we vote to send the bill back to the House of Commons, we would in fact be killing it, according to the popular expression. I think that such is not the case. The Leader of the Government should clarify this point for some senators who will want to make a decision on the vote sometime.

Hon. Mr. Martin: I sincerely thank Senator Asselin for having asked this question.

Yesterday, in my speech, I tried to consider this question, and I repeat that I am convinced, after last Thursday's experience, that it is impossible to obtain any agreement or cooperation from the House of Commons. This is why I came to such a conclusion in my speech yesterday.

Hon. Mr. Asselin: I have a supplementary for the Leader of the Government.

Unless I do not have a very thorough understanding of the Standing Orders of the House of Commons and the Senate, I am under the impression that, if a bill is returned by the Senate to the House of Commons and the latter refuses to accept it, and then returns it to the Senate, the Standing Orders of the House of Commons stipulates that the bill having been sent a second time to the other place, the Commons then accept it and it becomes law.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Not here in Canada. That is the case in the United Kingdom but not in Canada.

If it were possible to have some assurance—and I referred to the matter yesterday when Senator McIlraith proposed the same thing in principle—I would be the first to act. But I am convinced that we cannot get the required co-operation from the three opposition parties in the other place.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: The House of Commons is being stubborn.

Hon. Mr. Asselin: Could the government withdraw the bill if it were returned to the Commons? The leader should know.

OIL EXPORT TAX BILL

THIRD READING

Hon. Alan A. Macnaughton moved the third reading of Bill C-245, to impose an oil export tax under the Excise Tax Act and to allocate certain of the revenue derived from the oil export tax.

He said: Honourable senators, I think we have discussed this bill thoroughly and fully. May I suggest, and ask for the co-operation of honourable senators, that we now move for third reading.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

PROTECTION OF PRIVACY BILL

BILL TO AMEND CERTAIN ACTS—MOTION FOR NON-INSISTENCE UPON SENATE AMENDMENT—MOTION IN AMENDMENT NEGATIVED

The Senate resumed from yesterday the adjourned debate on the motion in amendment of Senator Carter to the motion of Senator Goldenberg that the Senate do not insist on the amendment made by the Senate to Bill C-176, to amend the Criminal Code, the Crown Liability Act and the Official Secrets Act.

Hon. Henry D. Hicks: Honourable senators, I was a member of the Canadian delegation to the Twenty-Eighth General Assembly of the United Nations when the Senate considered this bill in December, and hence I have given my attention to it only during the past few days.

First, it seems to me that Bill C-176 is a relatively important bill, but in my view certainly not of the first order of importance.

It seems clear to me that the bill was improved by the Senate amendment which had the effect of deleting clause 178.23, and had I been here at that time I am sure that I would have agreed with the amendment and with the return of the amended bill to the House of Commons, as was done by this house.

Interestingly enough, such correspondence and communications as I have had from members of the general public, notwithstanding the gleeful attitude of the media, the press, radio and TV, who hoped to find a confrontation between the Senate and the House of Commons, or who hoped to find fuel for the fires that some people are always stoking to consume the Senate, have indicated without exception agreement with the attitude that the Senate took.

● (1120)

I even had one Nova Scotian telephone me long distance yesterday supporting the position which the Senate took and supporting the bill in the form in which we in this place would like to see it passed. Even so, the other place sent the bill back to us with the clause in question restored. They rejected the amendment proposed by the Minister of Justice which would have had an effect similar to the Senate's amendment, and which would have been acceptable to me and, I should think, to most other honourable senators.

Because others who have preceded me in this debate have done so, I need not dwell on the fact that it seems evident—very evident—that members of the other place did not deal with this piece of legislation on its merits as a piece of legislation in amendment of the Criminal Code and the other statutes to which it refers. Rather, they dealt with it on the basis of the well-known anti-Senate prejudice which Mr. Stanley Knowles has always felt, and upon Mr. Stanfield's equally anti-Liberal attitude and his desire to overthrow the Liberal government in the other place. The result is that we now find ourselves in a dispute about one clause in a bill which I do not regard as being in itself essential or of the first order of importance.

What, then, should the Senate do under the circumstances—or perhaps I should more modestly say, how should I, as one member of this house, vote in relation to the motion before us and in relation to the amendment proposed by Senator Carter? First of all, I am surprised at the number of senators who have said that they feel that our reaction at this stage in dealing with this piece of legislation will have the most far-reaching implications for the future of the Senate. Some have even suggested that the continuing existence of the Senate itself is at stake, or at least that our continuing right to amend bills, with or without the consent of the other place, is under severe criticism and review at this time.

Honourable senators, I reject these views as being entirely too extreme. I may say that I cannot see that this is at all a question involving the continuing existence of the Senate.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Hicks: I cannot see, no matter what we do at this stage in respect of this bill, that there will be any precedent to the effect that we can never insist on an amendment of a bill except with the permission of the other place. This seems to me to be not the issue at all. We would be over-reacting if we took this to be the issue, or to be a consequence of our actions at this time. I cannot see that this is at all a question involving our duties, powers and responsibilities as appointed rather than elected members of Parliament. I should like to dwell at greater length on that subject, but again it has already been referred to by other senators. I think it is quite clear that as long as we exist as one of the three components of the Parliament of Canada, our right to act in that legislative capacity is not in any wise determined by whether we are appointed or elected. It is only determined by the Constitution of the country and the limitations, of course, which are placed upon our activities by the Constitution, in respect of money bills.

All of these issues have been dealt with already. Much as I should like to expound upon them, I shall not take the time of the house to do so now. Again, I think that it is not at all a question of the Senate's conceding that this place must never have a confrontation with the other place. I do not think that this is a question that is important enough to warrant such a confrontation. If and when the time comes when we must have a major confrontation with the other place, I am sure that anyone who listened to the debate which took place here yesterday will judge that this house will not be found wanting. In my view, however, the point before us at this time does not warrant us building it into the kind of confrontation to which I and others have referred.

The Senate has stated its position. I believe in so doing we have offered a change in the bill which nearly everyone who looks at the bill on its merits agrees would constitute an improvement.

References have been made to the motives influencing the action of members of the other place. I do not intend to repeat them, but I should like to say that if the other place is wrong—and we believe it is—in the way it has handled this particular piece of legislation, or any other piece of legislation, we in this house do not, and particularly in respect of issues of secondary importance, have to insist on taking a stand or fall position with respect to each piece of legislation.

We have stated our views in respect of this bill. We think we are right. The other place, however, has not agreed with us. I do not think we should take the childish attitude that, "Well, if you don't agree with our amendment, then we won't go along with any other part of the bill." We should not take that attitude, no more than we should expect the House of Commons to take that attitude when they accept amendments, as so often they have, to legislation proposed in this place.

I think I am in substantial agreement with what Senator O'Leary had to say yesterday when he referred to his long recollection of the history of this place and the issue which have, from time to time, been recorded as of primary importance in making constitutional precedents, and the behaviour of this chamber and the other chamber on other occasions when accommodation, in order to enact legislation, had to be reached between these two components of the Parliament of Canada.

I must say, I listened with considerable interest yesterday to the position taken by Senator Choquette. I thought he expounded his position extremely well indeed. I agree with his general proposition that "No bill is better than a bad bill." However, here I find it is a matter of judgment, and in my view this bill, even without the Senate amendment or the amendment proposed in the other place by the Minister of Justice, is not sufficiently bad to warrant the action which Senator Choquette recommends.

By the same token, I regret that I cannot regard Senator Carter's amendment as being the type of action that has any likelihood of resulting in a practical solution or practical action in the other place. Therefore, with some reluctance, because I like to support my colleague from Newfoundland—and usually I am able to do so—I cannot find it useful, in my view, to support the amendment which he has put forward.

With some reluctance, but certainly with no feeling that it is a world-shattering or Senate-shattering decision, I propose to support Senator Goldenberg's motion. In doing so, I must say very frankly that I am not worried about the media and the press, who want to build every difference of opinion into a major confrontation or crisis. They will take their attitude towards the Senate regardless of what we do today. Over a reasonable period of time, if we act reasonably and sensibly, the people of Canada, and even the press and the other media, will, I think, recognize the worthwhileness of our contribution to the legislative process of this country.

Furthermore, I am not disturbed by the prospect of giving comfort to Mr. Stanley Knowles, whose views with respect to the Senate are fixed—indeed have been so firmly fixed for so many years that I doubt there is anything that this chamber could do during the lifetime of Mr. Stanley Knowles to change his opinion.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators may feel that I was too lenient yesterday in permitting references to debates in the other place and to names of individuals in that place. I am sure all honourable senators are aware that such references should not be made. The Speaker is supposed to be very strict on this point. However, perhaps I, too, was more interested in what went on than I should have been. I was lenient concerning some such references, but I would ask that in the rest of the debate no reference be made to members of the other house or to the debates that have taken place there during this session.

● (1130)

Hon. Mr. Hicks: Madam Speaker, I thank you for your graciousness, and I apologize for transgressing upon your good nature and tolerance. I shall do so no more.

Honourable senators, I was going to say finally that I do not think we should be worried about the political implications of our action in respect of this bill, because it is inevitable that one party will always contend with another. We should stick firmly to our view here that our attitude in relation to the current issues of politics can afford to be different, and can be governed by what we believe to be actions taken in the best legislative interests of the people of Canada.

Hon. Sydney L. Buckwold: Honourable senators, I should like to continue in the same vein as that pursued so ably by our colleague Senator Hicks in the first speech of the morning. I agree with everything that he said, except that I would put more emphasis on the importance of the bill we have before us.

This bill, Bill C-176, will, for the first time in the history of this country put limitations, and very strict limitations, on the use of electronic bugging devices—wiretapping. It will for the first time ensure privacy to the greatest degree compatible with the security of the state and law and order. To me that bill is a very urgent bill. I do not think anybody should minimize the fact that the people of Canada find this bill is a very important one with respect to the direction of basic freedom and law and order in this country.

The government has for a long time been trying to bring such a bill forward. There is one now in front of us. It is not a perfect bill, as has been so well pointed out. The Senate amendment was a good amendment, but when anybody says that no bill is better than a bad bill I think they are going too far in reference to this bill. I suggest to you that this bill does in almost every way meet the needs of this country in finally assuring privacy.

We now have the spectacle of what has been going on in the United States. I do not like to quote a newspaper that has not been very friendly to the Senate, the Montreal Gazette, but I was impressed with the headline on the front page of that paper yesterday, which said:

> Bar demands wiretap probe—Quebec lawyers say practice "abhorrent"

In other words, wiretapping, the invasion of privacy, is a very important issue, indeed I would say a vital issue, in the country today. We just cannot afford the luxury of allowing uncontrolled invasion of privacy by whoever it is, police or private agencies. I think we should always remember that this also involves private agencies. We cannot do that any longer.

We have here a bill that the Senate found good except for one aspect of it, which was—this is, I must admit, a bit oblique, in accordance with what Senator McIlraith has pointed out—

Hon. Mr. Phillips: You have to put on your glasses to read what Paul Martin has told you.

Hon. Mr. Buckwold: I am sorry, but the learned senator has made me lose track of my sentence, so I will just start again, if he will give me the opportunity.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: I will.

Hon. Mr. Buckwold: This bill says that within 90 days the person who is the object of the interception should be notified. The Senate threw out that clause, and I would say that was a good action on the part of the Senate; it made the bill a better one. However, I would like to emphasize again—and it has been obliquely referred to—that there is another way in which the police can carry on their functions. I refer again to subsection (2) of clause 178.23, on page 18 of the bill, which provides a process whereby the object, so-called, of the interception, does not have to be told. Let me read it:

> ... where the Attorney General of the province in which the application is made or the Solicitor General of Canada, as the case may be, certifies within the said ninety days in a manner prescribed by regulations to the judge who granted the authorization that the investigation is continuing and the judge is of the opinion that the interests of justice require that a delay of a determinate reasonable length be granted, in which case the judge may grant a determinate reasonable delay.

There is a weakness in that, and this is why the Senate rejected this clause. The weakness is the word "determinate" reasonable delay. In other words, the judge in this case has the right to say to the Solicitor General of Canada or the attorney general who applies for it because of the specific needs in a given case, of which there will be some, "You want another year. Fine, I will give you another year," or 60 days or whatever it is. The word "determinate" is a limiting factor, and I am the first to admit it. However, if anyone says there is just no opportunity for the police to carry on their work, that the hands of the police are completely tied, that the police might as well throw up any hope they have of apprehending those of the criminal world, I say that they are not looking reasonably at this bill.

I would like to follow that up by reading from the evidence given to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs by the Minister of Justice, the Honourable Mr. Lang. At page 14:14 he said:

> I did myself, however, make reference in the House of Commons to the type of problem that arises in cases such as the Zizzo case—

Which had been discussed earlier.

> —so that was also brought to their attention. I am really suggesting to you that even in a case such as the Zizzo case we would not have had the difficulty, that a judge would have set such a far forward period for notification that the problem could have been avoided. That is why I am saying that, in my opinion, we can live with this. I really do stress, and I am sure that many of you will share the view, that the main provisions of the bill, which are to outlaw private electronic intrusion, are so important that we ought not now to risk losing that part if we can live with it at all.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Who is that again?

Hon. Mr. Buckwold: That is the Minister of Justice saying that there is this provision in the bill. Because of the fact that this clause was inserted in the bill—granted, it is not a perfect answer to the problem posed by the Senate—it does answer statements made by people like Senator Carter whom we respect, that the police are completely helpless. For that reason the minister did say he could live with it.

It has been put to us that if any changes are to be made they will be made, or can be made, in the future if the present provisions are unworkable. We have already had a notice of intent given by Senator Lang. The minister himself has said that he will watch the operations of this very carefully.

Fellow senators, I appeal to you to start looking at this debate, at the issue, with a sense of proportion. The bill itself is an important one. I am satisfied, although there may be others who are not—because I know enough about the political facts of life—that if this bill goes back to the House of Commons in an amended form, certainly with the amendment proposed by Senator Carter, to which I will speak in a minute, it has absolutely no chance of being proclaimed into law.

• (1140)

If we value the image of the Senate, I think we have to take a reasonable approach. It seems to me that we are so emotional on this matter that some senators want to take a stand on an issue which, as Senator Hicks has so ably described it, is not of all that major importance. I think Senator Forsey put this very forcibly, as did Senator Goldenberg, that if we are going to take that as the issue and let our emotions rule our reason, saying that the honour and the future of the Senate are now at stake—and we have Senator Asselin saying the Senate would be useless, Senator Carter saying he is not prepared to compromise his integrity, and Senator Lang asking whether this bill is so important that we must manacle the police and place the public in jeopardy—then, honourable senators, I think we are getting carried away because the fact is that we have basically a good law here which, although it can be improved, is needed, and I suggest that that has to be the first consideration.

I should like to warn honourable senators that, if it is the so-called image of the Senate or the future of the Senate that is going to help make your decision in this regard, then, if by any chance this bill dies and the people of Canada have no protection against invasion of privacy, the repercussions in so far as the Senate will be concerned will be many, many times stronger, more biting and more trenchant, than anything that would happen as a result of our saying that we have fulfilled our responsibility that we have pointed out to the other place that the legislation could be improved and that that place has rejected it and now will have to live with it.

Honourable senators, this is the kind of thing we have to consider. To those who are concerned about the Senate, I again emphasize that the repercussions will be much more serious insofar as the Senate is concerned if the people of Canada find themselves without a bill at all, which would in my opinion be the alternative.

We have heard another suggestion, namely, that we should have some kind of meeting of both houses. Those of you who know the Constitution and how these things operate know quite well that that is very difficult. I hope that we do not ask the Senate, through the Leader of the Government and the Leader of the Opposition here, to try to arrange a meeting with those of the other place.

Hon. Mr. Asselin: Why?

Hon. Mr. Buckwold: Because it would be impossible on the basis of what took place on Thursday. We know the political facts of life. Let us not humiliate the Senate.

You know, it is fine to turn one cheek, but it is not necessary to turn the other. Let us not put ourselves in such a position that we will find our application for such a meeting rejected—and, in my opinion, there is no other alternative on the basis of what has transpired.

Hon. Mr. Everett: Could I ask a question of the honourable senator? He says, "We know what will happen in the other place." I wonder if he could tell us how he knows. And would it not be more correct to say that he thinks this is what will happen?

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Oh, no, no. He knows everything!

Hon. Mr. Phillips: More specifically, have you not been told by Paul Martin?

Hon. Mr. Molson: Order, please!

Some Hon. Senators: Order.

Hon. Mr. Buckwold: Honourable senators, I have been asked a question. I can only say that having had some experience, having, hopefully, medium intelligence, having been present during the debate in the other place and having discussed this matter with the Minister of Justice, who is a colleague of mine as a resident of my city, I say that we know. I am speaking personally, I suppose, when I say "we know." I am not saying the whole Senate knows, although they should; but, certainly, so far as I am concerned, I know what the answer will be. If you want the Senate to be humiliated and insulted further, then take that course.

Honourable senators, I say that we should deal with Senator Carter's amendment very soon. Here we have an amendment put forward with the best of intentions as an emotional appeal to the pride of the Senate, asking us to send back an amendment in exactly the same wording as an amendment proposed by the government on Thursday of this week, which was soundly rejected and with respect to which the government, insofar as its presentation of that amendment is concerned, was soundly defeated.

It is all right to be proud, but I do not think we should be completely foolish in asking for a further rejection.

To answer Senator Everett further, I do not know. Maybe the Tories will change their views as a result of Senator Choquette's remarks in which he said he dissociates himself from his party. That is all we have heard from our friends in the Opposition, and rightly so. They have said, "We just cannot understand what got into the Leader of the Opposition, Mr. Stanfield."

Hon. Mr. Asselin: We have shown our independence.

Hon. Mr. Buckwold: Yes, they have shown their independence.

Hon. Mr. Asselin: "We" have!

Hon. Mr. Buckwold: But I have a feeling that to bring back an amendment worded exactly the same as one which has been rejected would downgrade the Senate even further than it has been downgraded in the opinion of some—and I emphasize "in the opinion of some."

So I say to you, honourable senators: Let not your emotions rule your sensibilities. I am sure you will all agree that any time you have made an emotional response to an issue and have disregarded good, common sense, you have usually regretted doing so. That, generally, has been my experience in such circumstances.

Surely, this is not the time, nor the place, to take that kind of stand on an issue—a clause, if you will—which is relatively unimportant in a bill which is very important. Are we going to drag down everyone? Because we will bring down the prestige not only of the Senate but of the House of Commons as well. The House of Commons will find itself without much needed legislation at a time when the image of Parliament should be as high as possible.

Honourable senators, there is an old parable one hears repeated every so often which has to do with the Arab-

Israeli situation. The story is about a camel and a scorpion who, in crossing the sands, come to the Suez Canal. The question arises how they should get across. The scorpion says to the camel, "Let me climb on your back; then you can swim across and in that way we will both land safely." The camel replies, "How can I trust you? How do I know that you will not sting me and kill me with your venom as we are moving across?" "If I did that," replies the scorpion, "we would both drown, so obviously we are going to get across."

This assurance satisfies the camel and they proceed across the canal. However, half way over the scorpion stings the camel, and as they are sinking the camel asks the scorpion, "Why did you do that?" And the scorpion replies, "That's the Middle East!"

Now, applying that to this situation, I would say, "That's Parliament!" Are we going to bring down the image of both Houses of Parliament by the action which would follow the acceptance here of the amendment proposed by Senator Carter? That is the kind of position we would be finding ourselves in.

● (1150)

Honourable senators, in my opinion the necessity of having this law proclaimed overrides any consideration of self-interest of the Senate. Certainly the benefits to the country have to be considered, and I would hope, honourable senators, that we would reject the amendment proposed by Senator Carter and support the motion moved by Senator Goldenberg. I appeal to members that we vote on Senator Carter's amendment as soon as possible, so that we can proceed with the main motion which is before us.

Hon. Mr. Everett: Honourable senators, I am prepared, if it is the desire of the house, to postpone my speech until after a vote on the amendment, so long as I do not give up my right to speak on the main motion.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: But when, Senator Everett, do you anticipate that you will be speaking—Tuesday of next week, Thursday of next week? Before you exercise your right—and I am not opposing that, honourable senators—you should give us an indication of when you will be speaking on the motion.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Order! Question!

Hon. Mr. Everett: I propose to speak now, senator, if that is agreeable to the house.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: I wish you would; I always enjoy your speeches.

Hon. Mr. Buckwold: Question!

Hon. Mr. Macnaughton: Honourable senators, if I understand the procedure, we have a motion to vote on the subamendment. If we are ever going to vote on it, why do we not vote on it now, and clear the issues so that we can get back to the main motion?

Hon. Mr. Buckwold: Honourable senators, I do not know whether we have a formal motion—I made a suggestion; but I would like to move that we vote on Senator Carter's amendment at this time.

Hon. Mr. Martin: You do not need a motion.

[Hon. Mr. Buckwold.]

Hon. Mr. Phillips: You cannot make that motion, according to the rules of the Senate, Senator Buckwold.

Hon. Mr. Buckwold: It has been withdrawn.

The Hon. the Speaker: It has been moved by the honourable Senator—

Hon. Mr. Carter: Honourable senators, before the motion is put, I would like to say a few words in reply to some of the statements that have been made concerning the motion in amendment I moved yesterday.

Hon. Mr. Rowe: May I ask a question at this point?

The Hon. the Speaker: I would like to draw the attention of honourable senators to the fact that Senator Carter does not have the right to reply on this, unless he has leave of the house. If he has leave of the house, then, of course, he may speak.

Hon. Mr. Bourget: I think that in a case like this, if the Honourable Senator Carter wants to give an explanation, he is entitled to do so as all senators are, on any motion.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: I agree.

Hon. Mr. Carter: Honourable senators, on a point of order, I did not speak on my amendment yesterday. I spoke on the main motion and moved an amendment at the end of my speech. I am waiting now to speak on the amendment. Surely, I am entitled to speak on the amendment I moved?

The Hon. the Speaker: Are you speaking in explanation of your motion? Do you want to explain it?

Hon. Mr. Carter: I am speaking on my amendment. I did not speak on my amendment yesterday; I spoke on the main motion.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: Now he wishes to speak on his amendment.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Honourable senators, bearing in mind, of course, that Senator Everett had wanted to speak, I do not think we want to be unfair to him, but apart altogether from what he wishes to do and when he wishes to speak, I would say that there is no doubt that technically Senator Carter has spoken on the amendment. However, I believe that we have had a responsible debate and that we would not want to be unfair.

I, for one, would not be opposed to Senator Carter's speaking again. It is not that we want to create a precedent, but in view of the character of the debate and the fact that we are all anxious to terminate this discussion, I think we will do that by adopting a spirit of compromise and understanding. It is in that spirit that I urge that we agree that Senator Carter should speak. In doing so, however, I do not want Senator Everett to think that I am prejudicing his rights.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: I would not like the Honourable Senator Carter to feel, after the words of the leader here, that we are condescending and granting him quite a favour. I do not think that Senator Carter has spoken on his motion at all. He has spoken on the main issue. Then, at the end of that, he said, "I propose this," and he did not expand on it; he did not say a thing. We are therefore not doing him a favour, and I am gladly granting him any privilege that he requires.

Hon. Mr. Molson: Honourable senators, I suggest that in order to get this straightened up, under Rule 28 Senator Carter—whether he is speaking for the first time on his amendment, which I believe, or whether he is not speaking for the first time—can certainly make an explanation of a material part of his amendment, and I believe he should be allowed to continue.

The Hon. the Speaker: It was under Rule 28 that I asked Senator Carter if he was making an explanation. I had that in mind.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: Honourable senators, on third reading there is no limitation. Any honourable senator who wishes to make his—

Hon. Senators: Order, order!

Hon. Mr. Phillips: —viewpoint known—

Hon. Mr. Martin: Order, order!

Hon. Mr. Molson: The honourable senator is out of order.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: —has that right to express himself.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, it is my opinion, although I may be incorrect, that it would make very little difference if Senator Carter had made his motion at the beginning of his speech or at the end; but, in any case, if he is speaking in explanation, I think he should be permitted to continue.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Chesley W. Carter: Thank you, honourable senators. I just want to say that if it would be more convenient for Senator Everett to speak now, I would gladly defer to him.

Hon. Senators: No, no. Speak. Speak. Go ahead!

Hon. Mr. Carter: Honourable senators, yesterday I moved an amendment to the motion before us, and due to the lateness of the hour and the fact that so many other members wanted to speak on the main motion, I refrained from giving any explanation of my amendment. I am sorry now that I did that, because I can see that a lot of misunderstanding has resulted. A number of speakers have addressed the Senate and they have used the word "confrontation", the word "emotion", and all sorts of words like that, with respect to my amendment.

I should like to begin my explanation by saying that the amendment I actually moved really was not the amendment I wanted to move.

Yesterday, in the course of the debate, Senator Asselin, in particular, raised the question, "Why wouldn't we ask for a conference?" My purpose was to have an amendment which incorporates rule 59(2) of the Senate.

● (1200)

When a disagreement occurs between the two houses, the Senate and the House of Commons, both houses have rules to deal with the situation. The House of Commons has Standing Order 22(1), which reads:

> (1) In cases in which the Senate disagree to any amendments made by the House of Commons, or to which the House of Commons has disagreed, the House of Commons is willing to receive the reasons of the Senate for their disagreeing or insisting (as the case may be) by message, without a conference, unless at any time the Senate should desire to communicate the same at a conference.
>
> (2) Any conference between the two Houses may be a free conference.
> (3) When the House requests a conference with the Senate, the reasons to be given by this House at the same shall be prepared and agreed to by the House before a message be sent therewith.

The House of Commons could have used that rule and sought a conference with the Senate to resolve the difficulties between the two houses with respect to this amendment.

I submit that the fact that they did not do so is further evidence that the House of Commons was not interested in providing the Canadian public with the best legislation possible. Neither was the other house interested in the public interest.

The Senate also has rules covering the same situation, and here I refer to rule 59(2) which, under the heading "Commons Disagreement", says:

> (2) When the House of Commons disagrees with amendments made by the Senate to a bill originating in the House of Commons and has returned to the Senate such bill indicating the amendments disagreed with, if the Senate decides to insist on its amendments—

I underline the words "if the Senate decides to insist on its amendments."

> —or any of them and to return the bill to the House of Commons, the message accompanying such bill shall state the reasons for the insistence by the Senate on its own amendments, and such reasons shall be drawn up by a committee of three senators appointed for such purpose by the Senate.

My first thought was that we should try to work out some sort of action under this rule. I sought to develop an amendment which would do this. However, I found that it was procedurally impossible because the motion before us starts out by saying, "That the Senate do not insist . . ." whereas the rule applies only to cases where the Senate does insist. Therefore, the rule could not be applied unless the motion before us were defeated, and that, in my opinion, was too late. Had I moved that motion, as I would have liked to have done, and wanted to do, it would have been out of order. I was conscious of the fact that this chamber is the house of sober second thought.

We have before us a bill which contains a clause that was inserted rather late in the proceedings, which was not adequately covered in the committee of the other place, which was not defended or justified in any way, shape or form before the Senate committee, not justified in any way, shape or form in the debates of the other place. It was just put in there.

Certainly we should try, in such cases, to present reasons. Senator Goldenberg, in the course of his speech yesterday, said:

> I suggest that our first concern should be, not the Senate, but the public interest.

Surely it is the public interest to provide the Canadian people with the best legislation possible, and it was my intention to move an amendment which would say that the Senate does not insist on its own amendment but returns the bill to the House of Commons with the request that that house reconsider the amendment that had been proposed by the Minister of Justice.

I draw attention to the fact that this amendment which I have proposed and which is now before us, was not introduced in the other place until at least the Conservative Party had agreed to it. It was a compromise resolution. It was not an amendment cooked up by the Minister of Justice. It was an amendment which had been agreed to by the members of the other place. It was defeated, and Senator Goldenberg used that fact as a reason why we should not take any further action. But why was it defeated? Was it defeated on its merits? No. Its merits were not even considered either yesterday in the debate, or at any other time.

Apparently the majority of members of the House of Commons believed that this amendment was a good thing, and if this amendment is a good thing, and if we are interested, as we should be, and as our responsibilities and duties demand that we should be, in the public interest, surely the proper thing to do is to ask the House of Commons to reconsider its amendment.

Then came the problem of working that idea into an amendment which would be in order. As I have mentioned, I had a wording worked out, but I then discovered that the only amendment possible was the one that I moved yesterday. Therefore, I was limited in my action.

I want to make it quite clear that the purpose of sending this bill back is not confrontation. It is to reconsider, to seek a conference, to get a meeting of minds on it. I would like to have a meeting of minds of the two houses, and also a conference with the provincial attorneys general.

Senator Forsey said yesterday, "Oh, well, this is a wonderful bill," and so forth. But how many of the Canadian attorneys general think so? The Minister of Justice, the Honourable Otto Lang, says that he can live with the bill. Perhaps he can, but can the attorneys general live with it? Those attorneys general that I know have indicated that they cannot live with it. I have been informed that a number of attorneys general have communicated with the government, with the Leader of the Government in the Senate, or with the Minister of Justice, and indicated that they cannot live with a bill which contains this clause.

● (1210)

It was for that very purpose that I asked the Leader of the Government that question this morning. The Leader of the Government says that he has not received any communication, nor does he know whether the government has received any. I assume he includes in that statement that the Minister of Justice has not received any communication. I do not know; I have to take his word for it. However, that is not the information I have. The information I have is that the attorneys general of the provinces are deeply disturbed about this legislation becoming law.

It is the attorneys general, not the federal Minister of Justice, who are most concerned with the administration of justice in this country. We cannot dismiss their views lightly.

Hon. Mr. Forsey: I wonder if the honourable senator would permit a question? I understood him to say that he has personal knowledge that certain attorneys general, who had communicated with him, were taking objection to this. Could he tell us who they are or give us the source of his information?

Hon. Mr. Carter: No, I cannot. I have been told that certain attorneys general have communicated their views in this respect. I have been given the names of those who have so communicated, but I have not been given authority to reveal them.

Hon. Mr. Buckwold: May I ask a question of the honourable senator? Have these so-called communications from the attorneys general occurred since the rejection of this bill by the other place, or were they representations made while the bill was still in the committee stage in that place?

Hon. Mr. Carter: Both. My honourable friend knows, as does the Leader of the Government and, I think, almost everyone else, that before this bill came to this place representations were made by the attorneys general to the Minister of Justice in connection with this legislation. In their representations they said it was unworkable; that if passed it would make the administration of justice in the provinces unbearable.

Hon. Mr. Buckwold: That is not the question I asked.

Hon. Mr. Carter: I answered your question, senator. I said, "Both." In the last day or two, since this bill has been sent back to us, I have been informed that they have made such communications again.

Perhaps my information is incorrect, but I have been informed that this is so.

Be that as it may, what is the Senate for? Surely, the Senate has a responsibility to ensure that the Canadian people get the best legislation possible and, as well, to ensure that the interests of the provinces are safeguarded, particularly with respect to matters concerning justice which affect the provinces so vitally?

I want to assure Senator Forsey, and all honourable senators, that the fact that this amendment is in the form it is, although it may look like and could be interpreted as such, it does not mean that it is intended to seek a confrontation with the other place. It is in that particular form because there was no other form that I could find that was procedurally correct.

I still say it is a good idea to ask the other place to take a second look at it. The bill was defeated by a majority of 20. It was not defeated on its merits. Everyone I have talked to, including many members of the Conservative Party, have told me that this was a good amendment. But they rejected it. Why? For other reasons—political reasons. Under those circumstances, would we be doing our duty as senators if we did not ask the members of the other place to reconsider their action? I, for one, do not think I would be discharging my duty to the people of Canada and to the provinces if I did not take what action I could to that end.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Would the honourable senator permit me to ask a question? Is he not aware that when this matter was being discussed in the House of Commons the other day the Minister of Justice asked that this be done? He asked that this be done, not in a private conference but in the House of Commons, before the public. The unequivocal response of the leaders of all the opposition parties was, "No, we are not going to accept this amendment." And they defeated the government in the process. Surely, that is the answer to the point Senator Carter has raised?

Hon. Mr. Carter: To my mind, that is not the answer. The House of Commons is responsible for their actions. We are not responsible for the actions of the members of that place. Our efforts here, in this house, should not be dictated by their action, which is what has happened.

Hon. Mr. Martin: I agree.

Hon. Mr. Carter: They do something and we bow down and allow them to force us to do something else, even though it is second best.

Yesterday Senator Forsey said something which I want to refute. He said, as reported at page 1481 of yesterday's Hansard:

> I was a little puzzled by a great deal of Senator Carter's speech, because it seemed to me that the main thrust of what he had to say was that no bill at all on wiretapping would be the best possible solution to this problem.

I said nothing of the kind. The very fact that I moved this amendment makes it apparent that I feel there is a solution which we should seek and which we are seeking in the course of this amendment. What I did say, Senator Forsey, was that I felt that no bill at all would be better than the bill which would result if we passed this motion. It would completely tie the hands of the law enforcement authorities. It would give a free ride to the criminals, the racketeers, the smugglers, the narcotics pushers. It would tie the hands of the police in their international dealings. If this bill became law, every wiretap that is on at the present time would become illegal and would have to be removed. The law enforcement authorities would have to start the whole process over again to secure permission to install another wiretap.

Hon. Mr. Forsey: On a point of privilege, it seems to me that what Senator Carter is saying now does confirm the impression that I formed, because he is now saying that even if the bill goes into effect in any form it will have the disastrous results which he is speaking of.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: That is not a point of privilege.

Hon. Mr. Carter: I did not say, "if the bill goes into effect in any form." I said, if the bill goes into effect in the form in which it came to us originally, or in the form in which it will be if we pass this motion. That is what I said, I did not say "in any form."

So, honourable senators, since the other place has seen fit, for reasons other than reasons of merit, to reject the Senate's amendment, and because of the fact that it has not given us one iota of justification either for their putting the clause in the bill in the first place or for reinserting it after the Senate had deleted it, I ask you whether this is not a very good way of doing it. At the same time, we would serve the interests of the Canadian public, as well as meeting the objectives and the principle of the original bill, with which we are all in agreement that being to safeguard against wiretapping. So I ask you to consider very carefully before you vote on my proposed amendment.

● (1220)

The Hon. the Speaker: It is moved by the Honourable Senator Goldenberg, seconded by the Honourable Senator Forsey, that the Senate do not insist on the amendment made by the Senate to the Bill C-176—

Hon. Senators: Dispense.

The Hon. the Speaker: In amendment it is moved by the Honourable Senator Carter, seconded by the Honourable Senator Lang, that the Senate do not insist on its amendment to the Bill C-176—

Hon. Senators: Dispense.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion in amendment?

Some Hon. Senators: Yes.

Some Hon. Senators: No.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, as there is in my mind uncertainty as to agreement, I am going to ask those who are in favour of the motion in amendment to please say "yea."

Some Hon. Senators: Yea.

The Hon. the Speaker: Those who are against the motion in amendment will please say "nay."

Some Hon. Senators: Nay.

The Hon. the Speaker: In my opinion the "nays" have it.

And more than two honourable senators having risen.

The Hon. the Speaker: Please call in the senators.

The Hon. the Speaker: I declare the motion in amendment lost.

It is moved by the Honourable Senator Goldenberg, seconded by the Honourable Senator Forsey,—

Some Hon. Senators: Dispense.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Mr. Everett: Honourable senators,—

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Honourable senators, before Senator Everett makes his remarks might I suggest that we take this opportunity to adjourn for lunch.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Anything which Senator Macdonald proposes I can never refuse, and I think we are all agreed that that is a good suggestion. Perhaps we could return at two o'clock.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I would suggest 2.30, because only the restaurant on the fifth floor is available today and it might take longer than an hour for them to look after this crowd.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: I think we should come back at 2 o'clock. We can have sandwiches.

The Senate adjourned until 2 p.m.

———

At 2 p.m. the sitting was resumed.

Hon. Douglas D. Everett: Honourable senators, before I proceed with my brief remarks on this bill I would like to read into the record a portion of an article written by Mr. Geoffrey Stevens, which appeared in this morning's Globe and Mail, that portion reads as follows:

> The Commons revolt on the privacy bill left the Government in the embarrassing position of having to whip its own supporters in the Senate into line in support of a notification provision in which the Government itself did not believe.

Well, I can say to Mr. Stevens, categorically, and without any fear that he could in any way refute what I say, that that is an absolute untruth.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

[The Hon. the Speaker.]

Hon. Mr. Everett: Surely the number of senators on this side of the house who are opposed to the amendment suggested by Senator Goldenberg, including, I think, the Deputy Leader of the Government, is more evidence than any reasonable person would need that we on this side of the house, and I assume those on the other side, have not been whipped into line. Because of this article I would like to mention the great respect that I have for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. He has never, in the seven years I have been here, put any undue influence on me in any way—

Hon. Mr. Bourget: Or any other.

Hon. Mr. Everett: —to cause me to vote in the way he wanted the vote to go. He is the example of a top flight parliamentarian. I know of no one who fights harder for his position, and I know of no one who respects the opinions of others more than he does.

Honourable senators, moving on to the question of this bill, it seems to me that there are three basic arguments that are postulated by those who support Senator Goldenberg's amendment. The first is that "the Commons has now spoken," and, therefore, since they are the elected representatives, we must go along with them. I think Senator O'Leary last night characterized that line of argument when he said:

> Honourable senators, taking that view—that rightly or wrongly we must have regard for the other place, the elected house—I will support the motion moved by Senator Goldenberg.

In the committee, and in the Senate, we made what I think everybody has agreed is a worthwhile amendment to the bill. Less than a month has elapsed, and the senators who support Senator Goldenberg's amendment are now saying, "We do not feel that strongly about the amendment that we made less than a month ago." What happened to cause those senators to change their opinion of the amendment that they supported quite vigorously before?

One of the arguments seems to be that it is the will of the elected house. The Senate took a look at the legislation. It made its amendment. It sent the bill back to the other place. The other place rejected the amendment, and sent it back here. The elected representatives have made their will clear, and now the Senate must go along.

I think that that is probably not an unreasonable argument. I do not think it was ever intended that the Senate should flout the will of the elected representatives. As a matter of fact—I stand to be corrected by a constitutional expert like Senator Forsey—I think Sir John A. Macdonald said that while in the course of negotiating Confederation it was necessary to give the Senate plenary powers, nevertheless he could not conceive the need of the Senate to ever use them other than in a suspensive way. In other words, the Senate could veto legislation, and it would go back to the elected representatives who would give it mature consideration. If the bill was removed from the Order Paper—which it would be if it were vetoed—that would give the members of the House of Commons an opportunity to go back and talk to their constituents. I think Macdonald then said that if the elected representatives returned and put the same bill back on the Order Paper, he thought the Senate should then pass it.

So we have no difference of opinion there. It seems to me that our difference of opinion lies in whether or not the Commons fulfilled that function. If they fulfilled that function, then I have no real argument with them, but if they did not fulfill it then I think that I do have an argument.

What happened? Was there an in-depth examination of the Senate's amendment? Clearly not. In the Commons the NDP made up its mind that it was going to humiliate the Senate, and it was backed by the Conservative Party who were manoeuvring for power. That is what happened in the Commons, and therefore that amendment was never given proper consideration.

I suggest, honourable senators, that if the amendment was not given proper consideration, then we are not put in the position of having to consider it on the basis that it was returned to us for the second time by the elected representatives, but rather we are in the position where we can send it back again, and they can go through the process that they are supposed to go through according to the conventions of Confederation.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Everett: The second argument is that if we insist on our amendment, we will be responsible for having eliminated the wiretapping bill. The Senate will be responsible.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Quite right.

Hon. Mr. Everett: But you will agree, senator, that this has been the argument put forward by many of the senators who support Senator Goldenberg's motion.

Hon. Mr. Asselin: It is a wrong argument.

Hon. Mr. Everett: I think so too, because, first, in my view it is not good legislation unless it incorporates the Senate amendment. In my opinion, that is what makes it good legislation. I do not think it is our role to pass bad legislation or legislation that is not up to a standard.

Surely if the Senate has any role at all, it is to make sure that the standards of legislation are high, and that legislation does what it is intended to do. Without that amendment, this legislation will not do what it is intended to do.

Further, are not people assuming a great deal when they say that if we send it back we must accept the responsibility? Are they not assuming that the Commons will do nothing? Why should we make those assumptions? I asked Senator Buckwold, when he was speaking, if he knew, was he sure, that this is what the Commons would do. He said no; he thought that anybody looking at the evidence would come to that conclusion. He does not know, so why should we assume. In any event, if we send the legislation back, and the other place does nothing about it, then it is their responsibility, not ours.

I think it is the worst possible kind of logic, even public relations, to say that if we refuse the legislation we are responsible for Canada having no wiretapping legislation. I think that is absolute poppycock. Even if this amendment passes, I do not think we should allow that to stay on the record. If this bill does not pass because the Senate sends it back, then that is the responsibility of the other place. Let us be clear on that.

The third argument is that this is not an issue on which we should fight. The proponents of that argument say, "I love a fight. Give me a fight because I am a fighting man, but not right now; not on this issue. I would rather fight on another issue." Well, that is fair. I agree that this amendment is not a major issue. It is not a "conscription" issue. It is not an issue that goes to the heart of the very country. I agree with those who say that if we knuckle under to the House of Commons we have not, in law, lost a power. In law we will have lost no powers. Our powers would still be as plenary as they were before we knuckled under.

I agree with those—and I think Senator Goldenberg raised the issue—who say that perhaps this is a new role for the Senate; that perhaps we should be going into the area of a suspensive veto. I am not against the idea, incidentally, of a suspensive veto. In fact, the Special Joint Committee on the Constitution suggested such a thing. I think it would be a useful power, a better power for the Senate to have, and a power that would be more used than the plenary power. We could argue that point, and we could agree or disagree on it, but I do not think this is the way to establish the convention of a suspensive veto. It is the wrong way. It would be a foolish way. We could not control what would happen.

So I agree with some of the arguments, and I have great respect for many of them, on this matter. I agree that it is not an issue that goes to the heart of the Confederation, but it is an issue that has become a matter of serious principle. No matter how we gloss over it, no matter how we slither around the legal niceties, we have to face the fact that it is a matter of very serious principle.

I could wish that we had not got ourselves into this position, but I do not really wish that. The fighting ground is not that good. I would have rather had a real issue that we could really have some fun with. An amendment to a wiretapping bill is not that great. But surely that is not the point. The other place has made this into an issue. They have made it into an issue because the NDP is bent on humiliating the Senate. That is the principle that the public of Canada see; that is what they are looking at.

● (1410)

I agree that we do not have to react to every manifestation of the public will. One of the beauties of the Senate is that we its members are appointed. It is very difficult to interfere with us, and we can view the public will over a long period of time. However, while we do not have to react immediately to the public will, we are as subject to public attitude as anybody else.

The public do not go through the motions of listening to neat argument. What is the issue to them? Very simply it is this: "The NDP went out in the Commons to humiliate the Senate. The Senate had a good amendment. What did the Senate do?" Well, we will find out. If the Senate knuckles under, then we lose one devil of a lot of public support. The public attitude to us will go downhill. If we are prepared to stand up and fight this humiliation, then the Senate will enjoy probably the most glorious day in its history.

Hon. Mr. Denis: May I ask a question of Senator Everett? If I understood him correctly, he said that if the bill is sent back with our amendment and rejected again, that will be the Commons' responsibility. I think he said that. If it is their responsibility after the second rejection, why is it not their responsibility after the first rejection?

Hon. Mr. Everett: For a very simple reason. What some of the speakers supporting Senator Goldenberg's motion are saying is that the members of the other place have made up their minds that they are not going to deal with this, and that if we send it back it will not be dealt with at all; it will just go off the Order Paper. That is basically what they are saying. They are saying that the Commons has adjourned, and will come back only for royal assent; that if we send this bill back to them we can forget it. I say that is arrogant. If it is arrogant, then I think the responsibility lies with them. What kind of people are they who say in respect of legislation, "We are not going to play in the game any more. We do not care what you do. We are going home; we are adjourning. We will come back for royal assent, but we won't come back for anything else." I say that is arrogant of the other place. Indeed, I say that that automatically puts the responsibility on their shoulders.

Hon. Frederick William Rowe: Honourable senators, let me start by saying that the two years or so that I have been in the Senate have comprised, in one sense, one of my proudest experiences. Certainly we have had an example of unparalleled eloquence during the past day or so and of democracy in action. I was intrigued with, and also very proud of, the two lines of thought that have been expressed. Senator Carter expressed one line of thought, supporting one side of this issue, and one of the most eloquent supporters of the other line of thought was Senator Forsey.

I am sure honourable senators will be as intrigued as I am by the fact that these two distinguished Canadians are not only Newfoundlanders but were actually born only a few miles apart on the south coast of Newfoundland. It is, as I say, an example of democracy in action when two men, two distinguished senators with such a background, are able to espouse different points of view here in spite of the fact that they are, I am sure, close personal friends.

Perhaps it is invidious of me to make distinctions, but I should like to say a word of congratulation to my friend Senator O'Leary. Sometimes we hear disparaging remarks about the age of some of our senators, but with respect to Senator O'Leary—and I am sure he will not mind this personal allusion—I am always reminded of the fact that, of the entire Senate, probably the one with whom I would want least to engage in debate would be Senator O'Leary, who is, I believe everybody knows, past the four score years.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Rowe: I should like to express my appreciation in particular to the Leader of the Government here, Senator Martin, and I am sure honourable senators will concur in that. This has been a difficult time for him, just as it has been difficult for some other honourable senators, but, in view of his position, it has been a most difficult time for him.

I trust that no one will infer from what I am about to say that I in any way imply a lack of confidence in his leadership, any more than, for that matter, I would wish to imply a lack of confidence in the administration which I support. I believe the administration in this particular instance has acted honourably. I for one appreciate the stand it took a couple of days ago in supporting the Senate. The administration did the right thing at a time when we saw occurring in the other place one of the most blatant pieces of political cynicism in the history of Canada.

I should like to say a few words about the Senate itself. I suppose the most common word one hears about this institution is the word "anachronistic". The Senate has been called an anachronism. I have heard people refer to it as antediluvian, medieval, among other derogatory terms.

As Senator Everett and the others have pointed out, we have had examples in recent days of unfair and totally unwarranted attacks being made upon this body.

We did not invent the Senate. The members here did not invent this institution. We are here by right. The members in the other place are not there because of votes they got in a democratic election. They are there essentially and basically under the authority of the Constitution of Canada. That is why we are here. We have as much right to be here, under that Constitution, as they have to be over there, and we have as much right to take the actions we have taken.

Now, it is true, as someone mentioned the other day, that theoretically the Senate does possess enormous power. There is absolutely no doubt about that. However, in my studies of the record of the Senate since its creation I have never found one example of the Senate's ever abusing that power. I have not seen, nor have I heard of, a single case in which the Senate has done anything but try to co-operate with the other body which goes to make up the Parliament of Canada.

We did not invent this chamber. We are here by virtue of the authority conferred on us by the Constitution of Canada, and if that Constitution is anachronistic, if it is medieval in its concept, then it is up to the people of Canada to change it. It will not be changed by statements such as we have heard heretofore.

● (1420)

Let me give an example. All honourable senators must have heard this last year. The leader of a political party in Canada—note, the leader of a political party, a man who presents himself to us as an advocate of political honesty and an exposer of deception wherever he finds it, and who epitomizes political piety—when the suggestion was made that a joint committee of the two houses be set up, made the statement that he objected to senatorial representation on it, coupled with the wisecrack—the smart-aleck witticism—that he did not want to see senators on that committee because they would be interested only in the price of Geritol. It was the leader of a political party who said that. He may have been speaking in ignorance. I do not know. If that is the case, then he certainly could be criticized. He may not know the ages of the senators here. He really may not know. If he does, then he was guilty of a little piece of political deception, because if he knows the composition of the Senate, as he should know it before he goes making statements like that to the people of Canada, he knows that over half the members of the Senate are younger than he is.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: And an awful lot younger.

Hon. Mr. Rowe: Honourable senators, the action taken this past week in the other place was, as I said—and it has been said by others—a piece of irresponsible political cynicism at its worst. In addition, an attempt was then made to rationalize it by invoking a principle which is not valid at all: the principle that the Senate has no right to interfere with the decisions of the elected representatives of the people. What political bible is that in? I happen to have majored in political science in my undergraduate work. I never read that in any document pertaining to the parliamentary system in Canada.

We do have certain rights here, and, as I said earlier, we have never abused those rights. We have every right to take issue with matters that are adopted in that other place if we do not agree with them. We have every right to do so, and this, of course, is what we did the other day.

I realize that my remarks are going to be a little disjointed because I am leaving out quite a bit of what I intended to say, but it would not be fair to be more lengthy because time is running out on us here. I do, however, want to say that it could well be that this Senate should be reformed, or modified, or, it may be, abolished—I do not know. I think there would have to be a great deal of argument before you would get the people of Canada, and particularly the people who are minority groups, either geographically or racially, or in other ways, to agree; because, and let us not ignore this fact, this chamber, appointed as it is, and non-elective as it is, is still a great bastion of freedom. This is where geographical minorities, or economic minorities or racial minorities, or any other minorities, would have appeal, if, at any time, action were taken in that other place which they felt was discriminating against them in any serious way.

Reference has already been made to this newspaper, the Globe and Mail—a newspaper, incidentally, for which I have always had the highest regard, although I have not always agreed with its political principles. However, here we have a very good example of why so many people in Canada do not understand the role, the important role, that the Senate has under the Constitution in Canada. Here is the editor of a great newspaper, in its leading editorial, saying this—and this has already been read, but I am going to read it again:

> The Senate has no choice in the matter. If it rejects the bill a second time it will call into question the whole constitutional position of the Senate.

What kind of tommyrot is that? The man who wrote that, surely, unless he is lying—and I assume he is honest—must be a political ignoramus. The man who wrote that surely has never read the Constitution. He says, "The elected representatives of Canada have spoken. The Senate must now bow to their judgment."

I took an oath here. I did not take an oath to do as this editorial suggests. I have no intention of doing so as long as I am a member of this body.

Before I conclude I should like to say that I do not believe that in opposing Senator Goldenberg's motion here we would be further humiliating the Senate. I think that perhaps the opposite would be true. I do not think the Senate, as a result, would be insulted further, as we were told here today, and I do not think the arguments expressed by my fellow Newfoundlander, Senator Carter, are based on emotion at all.

Incidentally, may I say for the record that I see nothing wrong with a little bit of emotion. You find plenty of emotion in the Gettysburg address, for instance, and in President John Kennedy's inaugural speech. There is nothing wrong with emotion, especially on matters that affect us as deeply as this, or when it is a question of the principles that are involved here.

Let me again say, as I said a long time ago here, that I yield to no one in my concern for our basic freedoms. Almost two years ago, when I sat where Senator Côté sits now, I stood up here and expressed my fears that our great neighbour to the south was on the road to fascism. One of my friends said to me at that time. "Do you not think you are overstating the case?" I think perhaps I was a little emotional in my statement, but no one had heard the word "Watergate" at that time. I refer to that to indicate that I am as concerned as anybody else is about the intrusion upon our privacy, and about our basic freedoms, but I also recognize, as must anybody who has been concerned about and connected with young people, the need to adopt more effective measures in coping with criminal elements in Canada.

Over a year ago I pointed out here that there is no reason in the world why we, in the course of time, could not have in Toronto the murder rate that exists in the almost neighbouring city of Detroit. We have to cope with crime, and we have to do everything possible to enable the police to perform their duties, particularly in protecting our young people against the gangster elements who are interested in seducing young people into the use of detrimental drugs.

● (1430)

We have to ensure that any powers we give are properly exercised, because we have to remind ourselves constantly that power does corrupt. It is not fear of the legitimate use of the powers that could be in this bill; it is fear that there could be illegitimate use made of those powers.

Having said that, I want to add that I do not think the world will end if any action taken by this body resulted in there being no such legislation on the statute books for the next two or three months. I do not think the world would end.

I know that electronic surveillance is a very serious matter, but we have been without this measure for many years, while we have had the problem of electronic bugging. As important and necessary as the bill is, if by chance—I do not imagine this is likely to happen—action in the Senate resulted in its not being enacted, I do not think the world would end for Canada in the next two or three months. It is something that could be rectified very easily.

I appreciate the tremendous work done by Senator Goldenberg in this matter. I appreciate the sincerity of the arguments that have been advanced by those who support Senator Goldenberg's motion. I regret I cannot support the motion.

Hon. Alan A. Macnaughton: Honourable senators, my remarks will be brief.

The discussion in the Senate has already demonstrated clearly our views that society needs this bill and must be protected. The right of the individual to privacy must be upheld.

The Senate is exercising its constitutional right and duty to review legislation and improve it, where possible. On the constitutional issue, I accept Senator Forsey's views. I would add that the Canadian Senate is in no way limited, for example, to the degree that the House of Lords in Britain is limited. Our power is co-equal with that of the House of Commons, with the exception of money bills.

The compromise solution offered by Senator Goldenberg, in my opinion, makes sense, and I intend to go along with it.

The bill is necessary. The Minister of Justice says that he can live with it, and he is prepared to amend the act after consultation—and this is important—with the attorneys general of all the provinces.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Macnaughton: The bill can always be amended at the next session or later sessions.

The three and a half years' study in the other place and the work of the Senate in the last few days, in calling attention to the matter and suggesting that certain improvements should be made, should not be lost in a fit of political pique, as demonstrated in the other place.

I was not going to say this, but I have been a little agitated today. I wish we would stop apologizing for our position in the Senate and for the Senate itself.

We have a constitutional right here. It is our parliamentary system. One of our duties is the protection of provincial rights. Honourable senators know the other duties that we should maintain.

As a mattter of fact, during the luncheon adjournment I went quickly through the index of honourable senators. I would say that of the 75 senators listed, 40 have had great experience in elected bodies, either in the other house or in provincial assemblies. Many of those senators, who are here today and who have gone through the electoral process, were elected not once, not twice, not three times, but four, five, six, seven, eight, nine and ten times.

To say that we do not know how to represent the people of Canada, that we are a second-class body, second-class citizens, out of touch with the public, is utter nonsense.

The remainder of the senators who have been appointed, and who have not had that great benefit of public experience, were appointed either for their experience or their intellectual capacity, or for their overriding interest in the general welfare of this country.

We should stop apologizing for that. There is no reason for us to apologize.

I like to think of myself, as the Right Honourable John Diefenbaker would say, as a "House of Commons man". But I am prepared, at my age and stage in life, to try to make a contribution, as an older person, in the Senate.

I will terminate my remarks by saying: For heaven's sake, let us do our job in the Senate and let those in the other place do theirs. I intend, in spite of Mr. Stevens, to support the motion.

[Hon. Mr. Rowe.]

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, my remarks will be pointedly brief, because I was asked by a colleague to be brief.

What has disappointed me in the debate in the other place and in this chamber is the fact that everyone has been trying to justify his existence. Both in the House of Commons and in the Senate we have listened to learned dissertations on the Constitution. Everyone has told us that both the House of Commons and the Senate have certain rights. But, honourable senators, no one throughout the debate in either place emphasized responsibility, not to either of the chambers but to the public and, essentially, to the taxpayer.

Throughout the debate no one has considered the John Doe in either house. That is rather unfortunate. It is fine to say, "Let us get into an argument. Let us make a confrontation". Sure, the press would love the members of the Senate to get into a confrontation with the House of Commons. But, honourable senators, we should not do that. We should consider the merit of the bill.

I opposed the amendment made by the Senate. Since that time I have become converted, and I was converted by the oddest individual you can imagine—Senator Forsey.

● (1440)

For the record, I should like to say that one of my colleagues on the Liberal side of the Senate put this to me: "All right, you feel that the individual should be notified about the fact that he has been listened to. Well, look at it this way. If there is any evidence, he will hear about it in court. If there is no evidence, why give him a nervous breakdown by telling him that he has been listened to?"

There are various arguments, both pro and con, that can be presented to the effect that if he were a member of the mafia, the whole mafia would know that someone was listening to him. Is there anyone in this chamber or the other chamber stupid enough to think that the mafia are not aware that they can be listened to and that they do not listen to one another. Sure they do!

Hon. Mr. Molson: We are being listened to.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: They are aware that they can be listened to. They listen to one another within their own organization, Senator Molson. The point I wanted to make—and I will be brief—is simply that we are not in a confrontation with the House of Commons. Stop and think for a moment as to what the House of Commons has achieved, what it has accomplished in its picky little way. I am sure they are sitting over there smirking because they sent a bill back to us. But did they send the bill back to us or did they kick somebody else in the groin, that somebody being not a member of this chamber or of the other place, but the judiciary.

My party is the Conservative Party, and I am sure it is the culprit in this regard. I never go to caucus or have any consultation with them, but I still like to say I am a Conservative. Sometimes it is rather awkward to say so, as it is on this occasion. When one looks at the vote in the other place, it is awkward to be a Conservative. A former Prime Minister of this country, a man who has gone around this country beating pulpit after pulpit telling us that we have to depend on our courts, voted against the compromise amendment, an amendment that improved the bill, an amendment that placed the responsibility where, I am sure, every Canadian citizen would want it to be, that being in the hands of the judiciary. In the Conservative Party we have a former Prime Minister who voted against the judiciary.

I suppose that I should perhaps flatter the individual by mentioning that a former attorney general of New Brunswick also voted against the compromise amendment. Actually, he would not deserve any consideration or mention were it not for the fact that the attorneys general, police associations and so forth, supported the Senate's amendment. That overgrown, egotistical former attorney general did exactly what the former Prime Minister of this country did—he voted against the judiciary. Honourable senators, if we cannot trust our judges to be fair and impartial, whom can we trust?

In closing, honourable senators, let me just say that I am disappointed in both the House of Commons and the Senate. It is fine to stand up and read someone's dissertation on the Canadian Constitution, but God help us if we try to make our courts like they attempted to make theirs in the United States.

The only way we can prevent that is by having respect for our courts, It will certainly not be accomplished by kicking the judiciary in the shins. Bear in mind, honourable senators, that we are supposed to give sober second thought to legislation. The judge makes the final thought, and throughout this debate no one has asked who makes the final thought. Honourable senators, make the final thought.

● (1450)

Hon. Joan Neiman: Honourable senators, I will try to be brief in the remarks that I should like to add to this debate. If I can decipher my handwritten notes, I will try to abbreviate them even more, because I think we have already heard some eloquent and able expositions of the different views during this debate.

There are really two principal issues. Overshadowing to some extent our concern about how we should handle Bill C-176—and I think it is unfortunate in a sense—has been our concern about how we should deal with this so-called confrontation that has been generated by some members in the other place, and has been aided and abetted by some rather intemperate and hysterical commentary in the media. I find it difficult to believe that, having amended a single clause in a single bill, we should be accused of "attempting to take over the ruling of the country." It would be laughable if it were not for the fact that some of the naïve readers of the Globe and Mail, who are no more knowledgeable than the man who wrote that editorial, might actually believe that idiotic statement.

In spite of the fact that so much of the comment on our action in amending one clause in Bill C-176 has been misinformed, mischievous, and even malicious, I must admit that there is a kernel of truth in part of the criticism that has been made against us—that we dealt hastily with a bill on which members in the other place had laboured for many hours over many months. If our haste appeared to be unseemly, then I submit that it was so in appearance more than in actual fact.

We have heard Senator McIlraith tell us how he has followed the progress of this legislation from its genesis many years ago, with many abortive attempts, through to Bill C-176. I know I have not been as thorough and as painstaking as Senator McIlraith in following all the words and arguments that have been used while this bill was being constructed, but I know that I, other members of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, and many other senators here who have been interested in this matter, which is of public concern, have been following the proceedings in the other place and in its Justice and Legal Affairs Committee.

I know that before I attended our own committee meeting a few weeks ago I had already decided that there were a couple of areas in the bill that I did not like, and to me this was the most vital area. I had talked to several senators before attending the committee meeting and I was aware that many of them felt the same way. They too had studied the bill and considered its implications.

I felt that Chief Adamson gave a reasoned and reasonable argument, not only on the point that we eventually amended but on some others, but we declined to go along with his argument on why other parts of the bill should be amended. I think there was almost unanimous consent that this particular clause was inimical, and that it should be changed.

I think the conduct of the Minister of Justice at our committee hearing was impeccable. The record speaks for itself and we do not need to defend him, in spite of the comments made by parts of the media. As an aside, might I say that I believe it was Senator Choquette who read part of his statements into the record to substantiate what I am saying. My very vivid recollection of his opening comment at our meeting on that day is that he said, "My role here is an entreating one." The printed record of our committee hearing shows him as saying "an intriguing one." I think that mistake could be made quite easily. Perhaps I was wrong, but certainly I understood him to use the word "entreating" to the committee when he asked us to go along with the legislation because he was concerned that it should be passed.

At that time my objections to this clause were very simple. I felt that we were not doing what the legislation intended to do, which was to protect the public. I think Senator Lang expressed this very forcefully yesterday. It was not simply a question of aiding and assisting the police and making their job of work easier. That, of course, is important, and it is incidental. Our real job was to try to make the legislation work in the best interests of the Canadian people, and the clause as it stood did not, I think, do that; it took away a very vital protection from the Canadian people.

In his speech yesterday Senator McIlraith introduced a more subtle and technical point, which I must confess had not occurred to me. However, I am inclined to agree with him. I think it will be open to interpretation as to who might be considered the object of the bugging, and I have no doubt that some of our young counsel will have a marvellous time with that clause; they are going to tear it apart in the courts, and one of these days it will have to be changed and clarified to ensure that the problem brought to our attention by Senator McIlraith does not arise through possible misinterpretation. I think that is an extremely important point.

As far as I am concerned, where we in this house really fell down was that we did not take the time to explain our objections. If we had expended one quarter of the time that we have done in the last day or two on expositions of what we felt were right or wrong about this legislation, I do not think we would have had the problem we have encountered in the other place. I think it would have made our position very clear to the members there. More importantly, I think even the NDP and the Conservative Party would not have had the excuse for this political manoeuvring that went on.

There is no doubt that there are Opposition members, particularly in the Conservative Party, who are very anxious to assist and try to promote this legislation, to get it through, and I believe that if we had made our position clear we would have assisted the other place. To that extent I feel that we did not do our job as well as we might have.

I should now like to refer briefly to the comments made a few minutes ago by Senator Everett, because, with the greatest respect, I cannot agree with some of the arguments he advanced. He said that one of the arguments used here has been that the Commons has spoken and we must go along with them. He also felt that the Commons had not considered our amendment in depth, and we therefore should feel no necessity to go along with what they had done. I cannot agree with that, because I feel, in all conscience, that perhaps we did not consider it, or show that we considered it. We did not give them the full explanation to which the Commons and the people who worked over there for so long were justly entitled in this matter. Therefore, I feel that they had a right to expect a little more from us than they got.

● (1500)

Now, with regard to the other argument we were concerned with, that if we sent back Bill C-176 we should be responsible for eliminating it, my opinion is that this is good legislation. We are here to help to enact good legislation, and it is not a question of whether we eliminate it or somebody else eliminates it. I have to agree most heartily with Senator O'Leary and Senator Forsey. We accept this legislation for what it is. It is excellent. It is necessary. It is wanted by the people of Canada. Many people have worked on this legislation for months and months and they have put their best efforts into it, and I do not think that we, in a fit of pique or feeling that we are being challenged, should turn around and just say, "Send it back!" We have to let them have that legislation, and we will take it with its blemishes.

There is probably hardly a statute on the books that does not have some blemish in it in one form or another, at least the first time it is drafted and put into practice, so I do not think that is a sufficient reason for sending it back.

The final point you made was whether this was an issue on which we should or should not fight. Perhaps I am a pacifist, but I cannot really say that I have ever seen any issue as black or white. I am a middle-of-the-roader, and maybe that is why I am a Liberal. I do feel that this is an issue on which we have to be mostly concerned with the good of the people. That is what we are here for. We are here to assist on legislation, and that is what we want to do.

[Hon. Mr. Neiman.]

So I most strongly urge honourable senators to support Senator Goldenberg's motion. I do not want to be concerned with these comments about the fact that we have been challenged. I do not see why we should be worried unduly about the comments that have been made about us, or worried about the so-called challenges from the other place. I think we should take them for what they are. So far as I am concerned, the member for Winnipeg North, if I am allowed to refer to him in that way, is our Don Quixote.

Hon. Mr. Everett: North Centre.

Hon. Mrs. Neiman: Thank you, Senator Everett.

Hon. Mr. Riley: You mean left centre.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mrs. Neiman: Very good! Thank you, Senator Riley.

I see him riding his steed backwards. He is looking into the blinding rays of the setting sun and saying, "I see the dawn of a new day." Well, what a hope he has! I think the Senate is going to be here for many, many years and it is going to grow in vigour and importance long after he has ridden off on his hobbyhorse into the thorns and thickets.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Paul Deschatelets: Honourable senators, I will simply make a brief comment. I can say that I approve almost in their entirety the comments just made by Senator Neiman. I think that they summarize somewhat the position I intend to take on the motion of Senator Goldenberg.

If I rise at such a late moment in the debate, it is simply to say that I am one who believes in the extreme importance of this legislation. I think that if there is one area in Canada that urgently requires legislation of this type, it is the province of Quebec, because the newspaper Le Devoir as well as other newspapers were mentioning yesterday that the Quebec bar was calling for a royal commission on the use of wiretapping devices in Quebec. I must say that for the past four or five months, there have been in the province of Quebec some rather disturbing cases of wiretapping devices utilization. One example that comes to my mind is the installation of wiretapping equipment in the lawyers' offices at the Société Saint-Jean-Baptiste headquarters.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: May I direct a question to the honourable senators?

Hon. Mr. Deschatelets: Yes, Senator Langlois.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Was the bar's request not restricted to wiretapping in some lawyers' offices in Montreal?

Hon. Mr. Deschatelets: That is correct. But this shows that up to now the way wiretapping has been used has given rise to some disturbing cases. Therefore, I say that in the public interest, the legislation now before us should come into effect as soon as possible.

I do not want to repeat the arguments put forward by a number of my colleagues, but one point must be made clear: that is, through this legislation, we are dealing with a completely new area, and not only do I anticipate that within one year the section that our amendment deals with, section 178.23, will be reviewed, but it is quite possible that many other sections of this bill will have to be reviewed in the light of the practical experience carried out in every province. I think that the provincial attorneys general will receive complaints and will see how the legislation is working and, after a trial period of few months, they will be in a position to say: Here are the amendments we are suggesting.

Therefore, I will conclude with this remark which is essential in my opinion: One thing comes out of this whole debate, and it is the fact that, in all the speeches that have been made up to now by those who are in favour of Senator Goldenberg's proposal as well as those who are against it, honourable senators have shown a determined will to use in future, as they did in the past, whenever they find it relevant, the rights and prerogatives that are provided by the Constitution, irrespective of their effect.

I think all honourable senators were quite clear on this subject, and this satisfies me.

Before concluding there is another thing I would like to point out. All these difficulties we face today were created by the socialist party in the House of Commons, and we can expect that on the first opportunity we might be faced once again with difficulties of this kind. This should not come as a surprise because there is an obvious intention on the part of that party to quarrel with everything the Senate does, probably with a view to calling for its abolition. But I am satisfied that the attitude we take if the majority of the Senate votes in favour of Senator Goldenberg's proposal will be judged by the Canadian public as a reasonable and wise attitude in the circumstances. But in view of the speeches made by all honourable senators who participated in this debate if in the coming months when we will be sitting we are again faced with a situation of this kind and if at that time we have not only a minor amendment to suggest but a question of principle, a basic question, I am sure that the Canadian Senate will manage to resist those who proved recently that they were going after the Senate on the basis of a policy set out several years ago and that they want to take advantage of the circumstances of a minority government. I think that if on occasion we have a question of principle and if we do not fear confrontation at that time we will then be supported by all the people of Canada.

● (1510)

[English]

Hon. Charles McElman: Honourable senators, I shall not take up too much of your time. I had not intended to speak in this debate, but in view of what we have seen in the printed media, and have heard through the broadcast media, and in view of some of the very strong statements that were made here today and last evening, I feel I must take a little of your time.

I suspect that the happiest person in Parliament today has to be that cadaverous old gentleman with the insidiously clever mind who has played quite a part in devising the whole set of circumstances that we are now embroiled in. I submit to you that to achieve his purposes he would not want this chamber standing its ground on a great issue, because he knows that in a great issue the substance and value of the Senate within a nation as diverse as Canada would come through very clearly to the people.

I think all of us in this chamber appreciate that the Senate will, one day—perhaps sooner than some of us think—have to take a stand on a great issue, or even a series of great issues, to keep this amazing and wonderful country that we have as one country, and as a growing, evolving country in, hopefully, a peaceful and advancing world.

Now, the last thing that the gentleman of whom I have spoken wants to do is put the Senate in a place where it could take its stand at a point in our history such as that. How delighted he must be at the aggravation of senators over a period of years by the actions of the other place in their lack of consideration of this house, demonstrated by the ill-timing they devise in sending important bills to this house, when we, humanly, feel there are deadlines to be met. Many of us, with that aggravation in our minds—and he knows we have it—react at a time such as this, and call this a great constitutional issue. I regret, although I respect the opinions of those who so describe this matter, that I cannot agree. I simply repeat that that gentleman must be very happy that he has aggravated us, and entrapped one particular party in the other place to join him in that aggravation. Well, it is not a matter of just choosing a time when you stand and fight, or fall and die; or it is a matter of using your judgment as to whether you will even recognize affronts of this nature.

For my part, I think this is a neccessary piece of legislation. Electronic eavesdropping is a serious thing. It is used for gaining commercial intelligence, and it is used illegally or improperly. It is used by pimps, prostitutes and purveyors of evil to gather ammunition to blackmail otherwise good citizens. It is used to destroy people. It is used to destroy families.

Hon. Mr. Carter: Will the honourable member permit a question?

Hon. Mr. McElman: Of course.

Hon. Mr. Carter: Is the honourable senator telling the Senate that the passage of this bill will prevent all the illegal wiretapping that is being engaged in by pimps, prostitutes, and the like? Is he saying the bill is going to prevent that?

Hon. Mr. McElman: Of course not. While a law can help to restrict, no law can totally prevent. Otherwise there would be nobody in our prisons. There would be nobody fined. There would be nobody prosecuted. No, this law will not prevent this sort of thing, but it will diminish it. This law will help to protect the innocent.

This law, additionally, will help to restrict the enforcement authorities. It has been said repeatedly in this debate that no one knows of instances where the police have abused the use of this procedure. Well, there are warts on just about every element of society, and there are warts on the police. There are people in many groups within society who become overzealous, and the public needs protection from those people as well.

I am not entirely satisfied within my own mind that the amendment as initially proposed by the Senate was entirely called for. I appreciate the lucid remarks of Senator McIlraith, where he pointed out that in some cases the innocent will not have to be notified, because the subject of the surveillance would be the criminal. You notify the criminal, but not the innocent. I suggest there can be many other cases in which the innocent may, even with the protective measures in this act, come under surveillance, and they should be notified. They must be notified. There has to be protection of the civil rights of the individual, and as a small "l", as well as a large "L", Liberal, I believe this is awfully important.

This is not the only weapon, or the only useful tool, that we give the police to use in the enforcement of the law and the catching of criminals. If it were the only instrument, then we would have quite a different debate. The whole focus of attention would be different. This is only one of a great many instruments that the enforcement authorities have at their disposal. Therefore, if we have to strike a balance between limiting, to a degree, the effect of this instrument for the police, and guarding the rights of individual Canadian citizens, then I am all for balancing it on the side of civil liberties and the Canadian innocent who may be put under surveillance. In my opinion, the innocent person should be notified if he has been subjected to such surveillance.

● (1520)

I come back—

Hon. Mr. Choquette: What has he to fear, compared to the criminals?

Hon. Mr. McElman: What did the people of Germany have to fear prior to the last war?

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. McElman: I know that is an extreme reply to give, but when civil liberties are being interfered with, there is always the question, "What has he to fear?" He has fear itself to fear.

Hon. Mr. Molson: They had no bill of rights.

Hon. Mr. McElman: Much has been said about the police not abusing their authority. Let me say at once that I admire tremendously the RCMP. I believe it to be the greatest national police force in the world.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. McElman: Most of our municipal enforcement authorities are excellent people, but they have warts as well.

For a number of years it was my responsibility to assist in the administration of the Liquor Control Act in New Brunswick. There were three provisions under that act that I propose to mention. They were there for the enforcement of the law and to catch criminals.

One was called a blanket warrant. The Liquor Control Board was a quasi-judicial authority. The blanket warrant enabled a police officer to enter any residence in New Brunswick, ostensibly to look for liquor or for the illicit handling of liquor. When a new police officer was transferred into "J" Division of the RCMP in Fredericton and assigned to CIB work, the first thing that was done was to issue him with a blanket warrant. That blanket warrant would take him into any home in the province which he wished to enter. Those warrants were used to enter homes. No search for liquor was required to take place. The people concerned were suspected of other crimes.

That was the first provision. Let me say again that I admire the RCMP. It is their job to enforce the law, and it is their job to use whatever means they can to enforce the law and catch criminals. But they are ordinary individuals too, and the law can be bent to serve purposes.

Another section of the law to which I am referring provided for what were called interdiction orders. If an individual drank to extreme so that he damaged himself and could not provide for his family, the RCMP—and also the parish priest or religious authority—could recommend that an interdiction order be issued to save the man from himself. The penalty, if caught with liquor in quantity, was two months in jail plus a fine of $200, or, in lieu of payment of the fine, two more months, making four months altogether. There were cases when those interdiction orders were used against criminals, not because they were drinking too much, but to catch them and to put them in jail. Once they were on the interdiction list, then all the police needed to do to put them away for four months was to catch them with three ounces of liquor.

Hon. Mr. Molson: That is in the public interest.

Hon. Mr. McElman: I do not agree that it is.

Hon. Mr. Molson: But you said "criminals".

Hon. Mr. McElman: I meant to say "suspected criminals;" I am sorry. I appreciate that intervention, because it was a misstatement on my part.

The third section of the law had to do with suspected bootleggers. There were what were called blacklists. In the case of suspected bootleggers, the police applied for a restriction order. This was another section of the law. All that the RCMP or municipal police authorities had to do was say, "We have reason to suspect that this person is illicitly dealing in the traffic of liquor," and the restriction order was issued. Again, the mere possession of liquor—not even physical possession, but merely having liquor in the home automatically meant a fine of $200 plus two months in jail, or, in lieu of payment of the fine, two more months, making four months in jail.

I repeat, this was used in the case of suspected persons. They could be put away for four months because they had liquor in the home. It was used against criminals and criminals were caught, as they should be. But it was used also against persons who were suspected of other crimes, and they were put in jail because they had booze in the house.

Having said that, I repeat that I have great respect for the police authorities. They are handicapped in many ways in their efforts to catch criminals. We in the Senate feel frustrated on occasion, but let us imagine the frustration of those who daily face the criminal element in this country. We should provide them with every reasonable means of catching criminals and putting them behind bars, and of stopping the illicit traffic in drugs and drink.

I do not think this bill is entirely unreasonable when we balance the rights of the individual with the necessity of providing police with the means of catching criminals. It is a very necessary bill. I am not at all unhappy at the possibility of its being passed in its present form, but I hope that we shall not continue to fall into the trap and suffer from the wiles of that unnamed gentleman in the other place by getting too excited and too emotional on occasions such as this.

Hon. Mr. Goldenberg: Would honourable senators give me leave to answer two questions which have been raised in the course of the debate? I shall be very brief.

Hon. Mr. Molson: Honourable senators, I do not think the honourable senator requires leave. He has a motion, and I think it would be quite in order for him to speak.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: He is answering questions.

Hon. Mr. Goldenberg: I wish to clarify two points which have been raised by a number of senators. The first is: Why should we make the assumption that if we send this bill back to the other place it will be rejected?

Not only do I make that assumption; with me, it is a conviction. The other place passed this bill some months ago. They sent it to us. We amended it, and sent it back. The government took cognizance of the amendment that we made, presented a satisfactory amendment to the house, and it was rejected last Thursday.

Following the rejection of the amendment, the house unanimously adopted the main motion which reads as follows:

> That this House does not concur in the amendment made by the Senate to Bill C-176, An act to amend the Criminal Code, the Crown Liability Act and the Official Secrets Act, . . . and that a message to that effect be sent to Their Honours.

There was no recorded vote on this. It was unanimously adopted last Thursday. Surely to goodness, we could make no other assumption than that if we send it back now it will again be rejected.

● (1530)

The second question is: If the bill is rejected, whose responsibility will it be? Well, it is clear to me that if we send the bill back for the second time, the other place having passed it twice, the responsibility will be ours, and the people of Canada will place it on the Senate. That is all I have to say.

Hon. Mr. Molson: Honourable senators, before the debate is concluded, I should like to ask a question of the mover of the motion, who is also the chairman of the committee. Can he tell me what effect this bill will have in connection with suspected espionage? I am not referring to a warrant under the Official Secrets Act, but rather to an embassy official who lives in an apartment, such as Igor Gouzenko. If the authorities decide to put electronic surveillance on such an individual, is he going to be informed? In other words, is this going to apply to matters of state intelligence?

Hon. Mr. Goldenberg: There are certain cases to which the legislation requiring notification does not apply.

Hon. Mr. Molson: I did not see any.

Hon. Mr. Goldenberg: They are set out on page 23 of the bill. For example, subversive activity, which includes espionage and sabotage; foreign intelligence activities directed toward gathering intelligence information relating to Canada, and so forth. There is a whole series of them. I think that answers your question, Senator Molson.

The Hon. the Speaker: It is moved by the Honourable Senator Goldenberg, seconded by the Honourable Senator Forsey, that the Senate do not insist—

Hon. Senators: Dispense.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Senators: Yes.

Some Hon. Senators: No.

The Hon. the Speaker: Will all those in favour please say "yea."

Some Hon. Senators: Yea.

The Hon. the Speaker: Will those who are against the motion please say "nay."

Some Hon. Senators: Nay.

The Hon. the Speaker: In my opinion, the "yeas" have it.

And more than two honourable senators having risen.

The Hon. the Speaker: Please call in the senators.

ENERGY SUPPLIES EMERGENCY BILL

SECOND READING

[Translation]

Hon. Earl Hastings: Honourable senators, I move second reading of Bill C-236, to provide a means to conserve the supplies of petroleum products within Canada during periods of national emergency caused by shortages or market disturbances affecting the national security and welfare and the economic stability of Canada, and to amend the National Energy Board Act.

[English]

Hon. Mr. Phillips: On a point of order. What language is the honourable senator speaking?

Hon. Mr. Goldenberg: Albertan.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: The right language.

Hon. Mr. Martin: One of the two official languages.

[Translation]

Hon. Mr. Hastings: Before discussing Bill C-236, allow me to wish the most cordial welcome to two new colleagues from New Brunswick, Senator Louis Robichaud, P.C., and Senator Daniel Riley.

[English]

Hon. Mr. Phillips: You are not bilingual yet.

[Translation]

Hon. Mr. Hastings: Honourable senators, I am trying to learn French and I am trying to become bilingual. It is very difficult for me to speak French, "mais du moins, je fais mon possible".

Hon. Mr. Asselin: Very well.

Hon. M. Hastings: These men distinguised themselves by their devotion to Canadian public and political affairs. Their very presence here in the Senate will be a great contribution to our debates. The fact that I am now speaking in the mother tongue of Senator Robichaud might be an indication that I am very happy to see him here with us in the Senate.

[English]

I also welcome Senator Riley as he continues a distinguished career in both the elective and appointive fields. I do not know whether he feels better being appointed, or being elected. In any event, I am certain these two distinguished sons of New Brunswick will maintain the high standard of representation that has been maintained by that province's former representatives.

● (1550)

Honourable senators, in directing my remarks to Bill C-236, I must say that it is another step by which the government seeks legislative authority to deal with the present instability in the distribution of energy in Canada.

The previous bill, C-245, which was introduced by my colleague, Senator Macnaughton, dealt mainly with some degree of equitability in price. The present bill seeks to maintain or preserve some degree of equality in the distribution of energy to all Canadians in the event of an emergency throughout this period of future uncertainty.

May I say just briefly that the present problem we face, or the present world energy crisis, did not have its genesis in the Arab-Israeli conflict. The energy crisis was predicted as long as three of four years ago. Indeed, as Senator Macdonald pointed out, the crisis would seem to be largely the result of the growth and development throughout the world of great industrial complexes, and their insatiable demands for energy, of their striving to keep up with the requirements of the consuming public.

In any event, in December 1972 the National Energy Board, taking cognizance of and watching the change in the world situation with respect to oil, advised the government of the need for caution and prudence with respect to exports. On March 1, 1973, it was found necessary to adopt a program of export controls on crude oil in the light of the very sharp increase in importation by the United States of oil, gasoline and middle distillates.

As Senator Laing pointed out in his remarks on Bill C-245, our exports to that market have increased from 450,000 to 800,000 barrels to a million barrels a day over the period of the last three years. So even before the outbreak of hostilities between the Arabs and the Israelis the Canadian government and the National Energy Board, which is entrusted with that responsibility, were taking the necessary actions in the light of world developments.

Finally, in October 1973, the Israeli-Arab conflict broke upon the scene, with the attendant international interruption, cut-backs, price freezes, export controls and so on, and it was at that time that the government established the technical advisory committee on petroleum to advise the government as to future policies with respect to supply and demand. This technical advisory committee was composed of senior industrial people and both federal and provincial government officials.

Finally, on November 26 the government was advised by this technical advisory committee to take certain steps, which were announced by the minister responsible, to alleviate any cutback or shortfall which might occur in the immediate future. Those steps, as indicated, were, first, to increase the movement of western crude oil through the St. Lawrence Seaway, which resulted in an average of 44,000 barrels a day of western crude coming on to the eastern market; second, to make foreign purchases through Roumania; third, to transmit oil through the Trans-Mountain Pipe Line to Vancouver, and to use dock facilities in Vancouver to ship crude oil through the Panama Canal to the Maritime provinces, I might say that up to now ten ships have been used in this movement, but I understand from National Energy Board officials that this will be increased to 14 ships in the next few days. This procedure has resulted in three million barrels of oil per month going through the Panama Canal to the Maritime provinces. The fourth step was to utilize the new Come-By-Chance refinery that was coming on stream, and the Toronto-Brockville-Ottawa pipeline which has been unused for many years; and, finally, to appeal to the public to use restraints with respect to its consumption of energy.

All of these policies have been brought into play and have, to a great degree, contributed to the fact that there has not been up until the present time any real shortage or emergency in the Maritime provinces.

Subsequently, a statement of energy policy was made by the Prime Minister on the basis of a one-Canada concept for the future predicated on the development and use of Canadian petroleum resources for the benefit of all Canadian in the form of a single national market, self-sufficiency and national pricing, subject to transportation and distribution adjustments.

Security of supply and self-sufficiency demands accelerated exploration and development programs in the Mackenzie basin, the Arctic and the offshore areas of Canada. Obviously, it also means that in establishing reasonable Canadian prices we cannot completely isolate ourselves from exterior trends and pressures. Moreover, in developing these dual goals, that is, increased exploration and development and equitable domestic pricing, we must face the fact that we will inevitably have to pay higher prices in the future for energy requirements if these two objectives are to be realized.

I do not think we can remain immune to these exterior pressures. There exist at the present time five interconnecting U.S. pipelines, and I think we have to be mindful of our responsibilities to our traditional trading partners in times of crises and developments in the U.S.A. I have often wondered, if the Montreal-Sarnia pipeline were to go into operation tomorrow, what would happen to the United States midwest and District 5, which is the Pacific Northwest of the United States, which are now taking our exports? Do we simply wave goodbye to this very valuable market that we have built up over the last few years with no consideration as to the results? I say that we cannot ignore the needs of our neighbours, and that we must develop these resources in the light of their needs as well as of our own with our own domestic needs taking precedence, of course.

There is one fact that we must remember as a nation. We must remember that at the present time these resources fall mainly within provincial jurisdiction. While we seek to establish fair and equitable prices to royalty owner, producer, marketer and consumer, the legitimate interests and aspirations of the provinces, both producing and consuming, must be respected.

● (1600)

It is in this spirit—that is, one of understanding and appreciation—that I believe the Prime Minister will meet with the first ministers of the provinces on January 22, to resolve and formulate a national energy policy for the future.

The picture today, as has been recommended to the government by this technical advisory committee, is one which indicates a distinct possibility of shortage in middle distillates and heavy oils in the Atlantic provinces, Quebec, and also the possibility of local shortages in British Columbia.

This committee, which is continually keeping the problem under surveillance, is unable, of course, to make any really accurate prediction as to the future. It would have to have some knowledge of what kind of a winter we are going to have, for example, and of many other factors. But the one conclusion it has reached is that we should be prepared for a shortfall of up to 20 per cent, and that voluntary restraints and the procedures I have just outlined simply will not meet the demand. So the industry, through the technical advisory committee, have urged that this allocation program be put into effect as quickly as possible in order to avoid any chaotic conditions which might develop in such an eventuality in the future.

In that regard I can only refer to the excellent contribution which Senator Phillips made yesterday with respect to Bill C-245. He made an informative, articulate contribution to that debate, placing the present bill in exact perspective when he was discussing the fishermen of his own province and the problems that they face. He asked: Will they have fuel for their diesel engines; will they be able to get the particular type of gasoline necessary to run those engines; will they be able to get the particular fuel additives that are necessary for a gasoline engine? That is a point that should receive the highest priority, and which places exactly in perspective the reason for the bill presently before us—that is, the creation of an emergency supplies allocation board, which will take cognizance of any such conditions, referred to by Senator Phillips, throughout the nation, to take appropriate measures to alleviate the situation, and to make certain there is fair distribution of fuel products, as to both price and quantity. It is in keeping with the statement made by the Prime Minister, that distribution will be made not only on ability to pay, but on the premise of need.

Honourable senators, I can do no better, I think, than read part of clause 11 of the bill. It provides, of course, for the creation of an emergency supplies allocation board. On this board the minister has indicated there will be representatives of industry, the provinces—one from a producing province; one from a consuming province—the federal government, and the consumer. This board is going to be vested with sweeping powers to meet the challenge of crises should they occur. The purpose is stated quite clearly in clause 11:

> When the Governor in Council is of the opinion that a national emergency exists by reason of actual or anticipated shortages of petroleum or disturbances in the petroleum markets that affect or will affect the national security and welfare and the economic stability of Canada, and that it is necessary in the national interest to conserve the supplies of petroleum products within Canada, the Governor in Council may, by order, so declare and by that order authorize the establishment of a program for the mandatory allocation of petroleum products within Canada in accordance with this Act.

These are pretty sweeping powers, but I think there are adequate safeguards in the bill. There are adequate checks and balances to make certain there will be no unauthorized use of the powers vested, in that any order in council made pursuant to this act must be placed before both Houses of Parliament and become the first order of the day.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: Are you sure of that, senator? Both houses?

Hon. Mr. Hastings: Both houses, yes. I can read it to you if you wish.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: I am perfectly willing to accept your word, senator.

Hon. Mr. Hastings: It is to go before both Houses of Parliament, and shall be set down as the first order of the day. In addition, any order that this board may make from time to time will come under the scrutiny of the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and Other Statutory Instruments.

Finally, an additional safeguard is the fact that the board, during any period for which any program is in operation, shall report in writing its activities to the minister every month, and all reports shall be laid before Parliament forthwith, if Parliament is sitting, and if not, then within 15 days from which Parliamant is next sitting. So we have three protective checks and balances, and, in essence, the final decision is vested in the Parliament of Canada within 30 days of any order being issued.

The bill is divided into five parts. I do not think I need to cover them all, although I should mention that in Part II—and this is an important factor—the authority is vested in the government to proceed directly to rationing at the consumer level should any allocation program which may be authorized fail in its objectives.

Parts III and IV of the bill cover the general provisions for the operation, and deal with the termination, of the program. Finally, Part V provides for two additional members of the National Energy Board. This has been found necessary due to the additional workload that has been placed upon the National Energy Board during this time of intense activity throughout the world.

Honourable senators, I think that covers that bill. As I said, it has been designed, and its objective is, in so far as is possible, to guarantee that in the event of any shortage or emergency in any part of Canada the government will have power to authorize the board to take such measures as are necessary to alleviate such conditions.

I commend this bill to honourable senators for their favourable consideration.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: Honourable senators, I move the adjournment of the debate.

The Hon. the Speaker: Who is your seconder, Senator Phillips?

Hon. John M. Macdonald: Honourable senators, I wonder if I might say a few words before Senator Phillips makes his motion? It is not my intention to speak at any length at this time of day.

I thank the sponsor for the very able manner in which he explained this bill, because it is somewhat complicated. I think it can safely be said that the bill is the legislative result of an energy shortage in Canada, particularly in Eastern Canada.

[Hon. Mr. Hastings.]

We may not be too directly affected by the fuel shortage as our own production of crude oil is at present sufficient for our needs, if it can be diverted from the present markets to serve the Canadian market only. Of course, as a great trading nation, dependent to a large extent for our economic well-being on our trade with other nations, we cannot hope to make such market changes without some adverse results.

We know that the major industrial nations are faced with the prospect of an energy shortage, and I think it should be recognized that the action of the oil producing countries has brought this matter of the supply of energy to a point where it has now to be recognized as an immediate problem, and should be dealt with accordingly. But, as the sponsor pointed out, the problem is not new. It has existed for some time. I believe it was last year, at a conference in London attended by recognized specialists, that it was said that within eight years there would be a decline in the production of the oil industry, as the industry had not been able to find new sources of oil in sufficient quantities to keep up with increasing demand.

So, even without the action of the oil producing states, there was an energy crisis in the making. The use of the supply of oil as a political tool has made a more aggressive search for new sources of energy imperative. So far as Canada is concerned, I understand we have reserves of oil for approximately 10 years' supply at projected production rates. So it is imperative that an aggressive search for new sources be undertaken, and that searches now being made are intensified.

If oil in commercial quantities can be found off our Eastern seaboard, it will change the whole energy picture in Canada for the better. We would have a national self-sufficiency without causing any distress to our present customers outside Canada—those to whom we now sell. It would also mean cheaper oil, as there can be no doubt that bringing oil from Western Canada to the East coast is an expensive proposition, no matter what type of transportation is used. Atlantic Canada needs an oil policy that will guarantee it sufficient fuel at practically the same cost as Canadians pay elsewhere. I know that there will be some variation in the cost—perhaps a few cents per gallon. However, we are used to that, because even before the recent price increase there was a difference of about two cents a gallon in the price of fuel between Halifax and Sydney. There is also a differential in the price of oil charged for large consumers. Why this should be so, I could never understand. I assumed it resulted from the policy of oil companies to charge all the traffic would bear.

However, honourable senators, the bill before us is for the purpose of giving the government, through the agency of an energy supplies allocation board, very great powers. As has been mentioned, they can establish mandatory allocation of petroleum products throughout Canada, or in any region of Canada. The Governor in Council can give the board orders to do this, that or the other thing. They can exercise some of the most extraordinarily wide powers—powers of expropriation; powers of mandatory allocation of petroleum products to anywhere in Canada, or to any part of it. They can set up priorities and change priorities. They will also have control of any product that is manufactured, even in part, from petroleum. Indeed, other fuels can be brought under control.

Consequently, since these are wide powers, some safeguards have been inserted in the bill. This was done because there might be a panic situation in which the government would over-react, as many people feel the government over-reacted in the Quebec crisis around 1970. If my memory serves me correctly, about 600 people were arrested during that period. They were held for various periods without any charges being laid. Again, if my memory serves me correctly, only about 40 people were charged, and of those only a handful were convicted of anything.

The safeguards have been mentioned by the sponsor. There are two important and powerful ones. The sponsor mentioned that the order must be placed before Parliament; that it had to have the concurrence of both Houses of Parliament. An amendment was made by the NDP. I should add that I hope that the virtuous indignation which we have heard from certain speakers at the action of the Conservative Party in the other place has not been completely used up; that some of it will be directed at the action of their own party in accepting the NDP amendment.

Be that as it may, the amendment has been made. The order must be placed before Parliament, if Parliament is sitting, and must be dealt with immediately. If Parliament is not sitting, it will be recalled. A motion for concurrence must be made. So far as the Senate is concerned, all it can do is concur. So far as the House of Commons is concerned, if they do not concur in it, the order is automatically revoked.

When that amendment was accepted, some consequential amendments should also have been made. However, I presume that in the rush to get the bill through, they were not made. It makes absolutely no sense to place an order for concurrence before the Senate. It means mothing. It would merely be an exercise in futility. If we concur, it means nothing; and it means nothing if we do not concur. In this connection, I refer honourable senators to the various subclauses of clause 11 on page 6.

We cannot do it now, but when we come back after the recess we should make an amendment. It should be made by means of a private member's bill, in order to avoid a confrontation with the House of Commons. The bill should be amended to provide that there is no necessity for the Senate to be recalled if Parliament is not sitting, so there will be no necessity for the Senate to debate the question.

As the bill gives extraordinarily wide powers, it would be well to examine it closely in committee. I recognize that that cannot be done at the present time, but it could be done if a bill to amend is introduced here, and referred to committee. Personally, I would have no objection to sponsoring such a bill at some future date.

Honourable senators, that concludes what I have to say. I congratulate the sponsor on his fine explanation. I leave this bill to the discretion of honourable senators, to vote for it or against it. Personally, I shall vote for it.

● (1620)

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, I had a long list of items which I felt should be covered in my remarks on this occasion. However, Senator Hastings was so complimentary to me that he has automatically eliminated certain of those items. I really did not expect that someone opposite would really understand my viewpoint, but I am glad to be able to eliminate a portion of the remarks I intended to make.

I do want to say, let the government beware. Caveat emptor let the buyer beware. Let the taxpayer beware.

I thank Senator Hastings for his kind remarks. I would point out that there is a corollary in the motion introduced in this chamber by Senator Rowe in which, in essence, he said to the federal government, "Get on with the ferry service between Cape Breton and Newfoundland, and between Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island". The government and the CNR really took that motion to heart. Within 10 days of Senator Rowe's motion the CNR announced that in an effort to save fuel they were cutting down on the ferry services.

Honourable senators, I ask you to look back at the results of that motion, and ask the government what it is doing. Of course, the government does not know what it is doing. It is waffling around in a very peculiar way. The only policy the government has is not to accept the advice of those who know. That is not unusual in this government. Senator Martin, in his long and distinguished career, has always taken the attitude of not accepting the advice of those who know. Perhaps that is why he ended up in the Senate.

Hon. Mr. Laing: I had better go back to my own seat.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Poor Senator Martin. He gets it all the time from Senator Phillips.

Hon. Mr. Laing: I am going to move away.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: He is a good target.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: Let me just say, Senator Martin, that I respect you because you can take it as well as dish it out. Were it not for those two conditions, I would not bother with you.

Recently I asked the Leader of the Government whether there was any basis for concern over shortfalls in oil in the Atlantic provinces and in the province of Quebec. Senator Martin was quite frank in his reply. He said that beyond the Ottawa Valley line we have done such and such. Of course, I anticipated that in his reply he would say that we are taking Western oil through the Panama Canal. Somehow or other the government has decided to take oil from Vancouver, via the Panama Canal, to the Sheehan Refinery in Newfoundland. They take great credit in this regard.

But, honourable senators, let us not get carried away. What has happened is that in the months of October, November and December of 1973 the National Energy Board and, in effect, the government, issued permits for the export of 10½ million barrels of petroleum products. At a time when we in the Maritimes are greatly concerned that there might be an oil shortage, the government exports 10½ million barrels of petroleum products! When I asked whether this would continue they said, "Naturally, because a certain firm is Canadian and operating in the United States. Naturally we will supply a Canadian firm with petroleum." Is the United States Government going to supply their Canadian subsidiaries operating in Canada on the same basis? They are not.

● (1630)

I was intrigued to read in a newspaper—admittedly not the best newspaper in Canada, the Ottawa Journal—that Senator Muskie from Maine made an announcement saying that certain firms will get oil because he, Senator Muskie, an American senator, has arranged that these firms will continue to get their oil supply. Why do they get that continuation of supply? Is it surplus to the Maritimes? I ask that of Senator Riley, who has a close connection with the Irving oil company, and it was Irving who got the export permit. If we have a shortfall, why, oh, why are we giving permits for the export of 10½ million barrels to the U.S.A.

Not only that, but why did we export it at a price that is far below the international market price today? Can any honourable senator explain to me why we as Canadians should be giving the oil companies permits to export their products at a time when we are short, and at a time when our cost in rising? What do we do? We give it to Senator Muskie. This is perhaps more pertinent to yesterday's debate than today's. I am curious, honourable senators. I am asking you point-blank: What contribution has Senator Muskie made to the Liberal party for 10½ million barrels of fuel?

Hon. Mr. Riley: Watergate again.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: Senator Riley, as the attorney for Irving, would be the most qualified person to say, "Watergate again." If you say it is Watergate again, senator, I am almost, but not quite, willing to take your word.

Both Senator Riley and I represent maritime areas. When I say "maritime," I am referring to the Atlantic coast. We in the Maritimes like to refer to the Maritimes regardless of the coast. On the other hand, we have had imposed upon us a Minister of Fisheries from British Columbia. Honestly, honourable senators, he would not know a lobster from a cod fish. Nevertheless, he has laid down regulations saying such-and-such. I will tell you the regulations he has laid down.

Hon. Mr. Hicks: No. It is not relevant to this debate at all.

Hon. Mr. McIlraith: Not at all.

Hon. Mr. Hicks: We are not interested in it in this debate.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: You are not? I will tell you the relevance, if you just listen for a moment. By the way, if you want to leave, go ahead; I don't care. On the other hand, I couldn't care less if you came in.

The Minister of the Environment stated that certain regulations will be laid down for Canadian ports. If a trawler leaves Spain and does not have sufficient fuel to get back—which is a normal situation—it can come to a Canadian port and prove the need for it. I have no objection to that. They can also go to St. Pierre and Miquelon and receive not only the oil for the one-way journey back, but also return trip. They can go to St. Pierre and Miquelon from Spain, pick up their oil, go back to Spain, come back and drop into St. Pierre and Miquelon again, and once more go back to Spain, or Portugal, or Italy—you name it. But what country is buying that fuel? Canada is! About 100 foreign trawler apply at St. Pierre and Miquelon, are refuelled and are on their way, with oil from the Atlantic provinces.

● (1640)

Now, honourable senators, the oil from the Altantic provinces raises a rather important question in my mind with respect to industrial development. Senator Hastings referred to the remarks I made yesterday. The same thing applies, for example, to farming, but I will not go into that aspect today, except to say that when an industry is considering locating somewhere in Canada it is important to realize that it will look at the cost of oil and the cost of energy, and it will also ask if it can depend on the continuity of supply of energy—and there is nothing wrong in doing so.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Would Senator Phillips permit me to intervene? I do not wish to interfere with his speech, but Senator Langlois has reminded me that he had made arrangements to have the staff prepare this chamber for the ceremony on Monday. The staff is now waiting outside. Although I do not wish to interrupt Senator Phillips' speech, I just mention the problem, confident that Senator Phillips will co-operate with respect to the arrangements for Monday. I shall be very grateful.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: I would love to co-operate with you, Senator Martin, but as usual you have not stated your point. Would you clarify it for me, please?

Hon. Mr. Martin: I did not want to interrupt Senator Phillips' speech, but I was hoping we might be able to accommodate the staff who are waiting to convert the Senate for the ceremony of the installation of the new Governor General. If Senator Phillips could co-operate with us in this regard I for one would be very grateful. I am sure all of us would be.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: This, honourable senators, is a new form of closure. If the staff wants to take the desks out, that is fine. If that is all Senator Martin thinks of the Senate, I will co-operate, but I am sure you will regret it if you have the idea that the staff waiting outside is superior to a debate in the Senate. But, of course, you would not understand the debate in the Senate because you have already told your colleagues what they are to do. You have already written their speeches so, presumably, you will follow along on that line.

Honourable senators, I will co-operate with Senator Martin. I was going to refer to certain remarks in the December issue of the publication of Richardson Securities of Canada. Honourable senators know there is a really close connection between Richardson Securities and the government, when it talks on the oil policy. A member of the cabinet and a distinguished former member of the Senate are members of that firm.

We cannot blame the Arabs for increasing their oil prices. When you consider that the price of copper has gone up 300 per cent, what could you expect the Arabs to do? Naturally, you would expect them to increase the price of oil. Moreover, we have introduced them to the Harvard School of Business. I have nephews who attended that school, and they know the technique and the reasons why an increase must be made. With that background in mind,

I think we are entirely wrong in saying that the increase in the price of oil is due to the Arab-Israeli war. It is not. The Arabs look at us and say, "All right. You put the price of your copper up 300 per cent. What do you expect us to do?"

Honourable senators, I was going to go on to elaborate more fully on this matter, but Senator Martin has put in his own form of closure, and I accept that. But let us as Canadians, and as members of this chamber, be fully aware that there will be changes in oil prices, but those changes will not necessarily apply only to the Arab area; they will apply also to Venezuela.

● (1650)

Honourable senators can probably recall that last September the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources went to Venezuela to get a new agreement. Perhaps he got a new agreement for Canada, but the point is that Venezuela is now charging a higher price for crude oil—that is, $14 per barrel—than any other country. I find it very interesting that the government sent the minister to Venezuela to negotiate a permanent agreement between Canada and Venezuela. In fact, he was just as much of a failure as the rest of the government.

Honourable senators, I am looking at the clock and I know that you would like me to quit. I am also very much aware of the fact that this government does not accept advice. This is an unfortunate thing. This government is just plain too dumb to accept advice. Therefore, if I spent the next 24 hours giving this government advice—and, Senator Martin, they need it—I would be wasting my time. What is even worse, you look at me and say, "What a nut Phillips is. He is giving advice and we don't need it." This government needs advice. This government has to have advice. This government must accept advice.

Honourable senators, I would point out in closing that bill gives the government and its commissars great authority. This is the most atrocious bill ever to come before Parliament. You can delude yourselves that you were being Canadians, that you were being senators with regard to the last bill we dealt with, but you were not. The point that is pertinent is that this is the bill that Senator Martin says is not necessary, because there is no energy shortage in Eastern Canada, or in any area of Canada. Yet we appoint commissars. Honourable senators, let us make no mistake; they are commissars. They have no responsibility under this bill to report to anyone. The only thing is that they must take direction from the government.

Honourable senators, what an unfortunate situation we are in! The commissars have complete authority, and the commissars take direction from the Cabinet. If you feel you can honestly accept that, then do so. I can do nothing more than feel sorry for you.

I have gone beyond Senator Martin's closing time, and I see him signalling to his colleagues to get up. I would like to ask him, "Shall I continue, or would you like to have it completed now?" You would like to have it completed now? All right, then.

Honourable senators, while walking up to the Hill this morning I thought about this bill. I have been following the discussions about it throughout in the other place, and I was looking for a phrase that I could use to describe this bill. Down at the corner of Wellington Street, along which the wind was blowing colder than the devil, I decided that I knew the government's attitude on this bill. Honourable senators, it is power without policy. When you vote for this bill, you will be voting for power without policy.

● (1700)

Honourable senators, I will repeat this remark all night, if necessary. The bill should be rephrased. It permits power without policy—and, perhaps in a quiet way I could say, without responsibility. But, then, that has never been an attribute of this government.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Hastings: Honourable senators, I move that the bill be read the third time now.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. Mr. Martin: Honourable senators, I move, seconded by Senator Inman, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), that when the Senate adjourns today, it do stand adjourned until Monday next, January 14, 1974, at 4 o'clock in the afternoon.

Hon. Mr. Laing: Perhaps the Leader of the Government would permit me to raise a matter before we adjourn. There is one question I should like to ask, as a matter of personal privilege. My question is addressed to the Whips of both parties and relates to the time period for the ringing of the bell.

I did not vote this afternoon because I was denied access at the door. I had left the house for a very few moments and came back to find that I was denied access. I was locked out.

I have no record of escaping votes, and I do not wish to acquire the reputation in this house of being an evader. Had I been here, I would have been very proud to have voted against Senator Goldenberg's motion.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: That is probably why you were locked out.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: You should have been locked out.

Hon. Mr. Laing: I understand that it is the decision of the Whips as to how long the bell shall ring. I had been accustomed in the other place to a minimum of 10 or 15 minutes. I make a plea to the Whips that they make known to us the time limit, be it 5 or 10 minutes; that they let us know that we have a minimum amount of time in which to return to the chamber to record our vote.

Hon. Mr. Riley: Honourable senators, I suffered the same ignominious fate as Senator Laing. I too was locked out. It was impossible for me to reach the chamber by means of the elevator before the bells ceased ringing.

Had I voted, I would have voted for the motion and nullified Senator Laing's vote.

Hon. Mr. Hicks: You were paired.

Hon. Mr. Buckwold: Honourable senators, I take full responsibility for this matter. I had agreed with my colleague, Senator Macdonald, the Opposition Whip, that we were ready to come in. I have already apologized personally to Senator Laing, and I extend a similar apology to Senator Riley. Quite frankly, we felt that everyone was here.

There has been a good deal of pressure on both of us to get on with the show, as it were, and the hour was getting late. For this reason it was possibly a shorter bell than usual.

I agree with Senator Laing that there should be a minimum time, that senators should know what the time limit is. I do not know for how long the bell was rung, but it must have been close to 10 minutes. I extend my apologies.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: Honourable senators, I would point out that Senator Laing directed a question to Senator Martin. In this chamber, we are accustomed to everyone being equal. Perhaps Senator Laing has decided he has preference over the rest of us.

Hon. Mr. Riley: Honourable senators, I do not know very much about parliamentary procedure, but surely there is a motion before the house—a motion to adjourn.

The Hon. the Speaker: It is a notice of motion.

Hon. Mr. Riley: I understood that it was a motion by the Leader of the Government.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: We also gave you the courtesy of reverting, but you did not do so.

The Hon. the Speaker: Did the Leader of the Government make a motion?

Hon. Mr. Martin: Yes, absolutely.

Motion agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until Monday, January 14, 1974, at 4 p.m.

THE SENATE

Monday, January 14, 1974

The Senate met at 4 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

ROYAL ASSENT

NOTICE

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that the following communication had been received:

GOVERNMENT HOUSE
OTTAWA

14 January 1974

Madam,

I have the honour to inform you that the Right Honourable Bora Laskin, P.C., Chief Justice of Canada, in his capacity as Deputy Governor General, will proceed to the Senate Chamber today, January 14th, at 4.15 p.m. for the purpose of giving Royal Assent to certain Bills.

I have the honour to be,
Madam,
Your obedient servant,
André Garneau,
Brigadier General
Administrative Secretary to the Governor General.

The Honourable
The Speaker of the Senate,
Ottawa.

HON. J. CAMPBELL HAIG

FELICITATIONS ON RETURN TO CHAMBER

Hon. Paul Martin: Honourable senators, before leaving the chamber to welcome the new Deputy Governor General, I should like to say to Senator Haig, who has not been with us for some months, how very happy we are to see him back in his seat. We wish him good health.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

THE GOVERNOR GENERAL

ADDRESSES AT INSTALLATION

Hon. Leopold Langlois: Honourable senators, I move:

That the address of the Prime Minister, the Right Honourable Pierre Elliott Trudeau, P.C., at the Installation of the Right Honourable Jules Léger, P.C., as Governor General of Canada, on January 14, 1974, together with the reply of His Excellency the Governor General thereto, be printed as an appendix to the Debates of the Senate of this day.

Motion agreed to.

[See pp. 1519-1520.]

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

ROYAL ASSENT

The Right Honourable Bora Laskin, P.C., Chief Justice of Canada, having come and being seated at the foot of the Throne, and the House of Commons having been summoned, and being come with their Speaker, the Honourable the Speaker of the Senate said:

Honourable Members of the Senate:

Members of the House of Commons:

I have the honour to inform you that His Excellency the Governor General has been pleased to cause Letters Patent to be issued under his Sign Manual and Signet constituting the Right Honourable Bora Laskin, P.C., Chief Justice of Canada, his Deputy, to do in His Excellency's name all acts on his part necessary to be done during His Excellency's pleasure.

The Commission was read by the Clerk Assistant.

The Right Honourable the Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General was pleased to give the Royal Assent to the following bills:

An Act to amend the Canada Elections Act, the Broadcasting Act and the Income Tax Act in respect of election expenses.

An Act to provide a means to conserve the supplies of petroleum products within Canada during periods of national emergency caused by shortages or market disturbances affecting the national security and welfare and the economic stability of Canada, and to amend the National Energy Board Act.

An act to impose an oil export tax under the Excise Tax Act and to allocate certain of the revenues derived from the oil export tax.

An Act to amend the Criminal Code, the Crown Liability Act and the Official Secrets Act.

The House of Commons withdrew.

The Right Honourable the Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General was pleased to retire.

The sitting of the Senate was resumed.

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. Leopold Langlois: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), I move that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until Tuesday, February 26, 1974, at 2 o'clock in the afternoon.

Motion agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, February 26, 1974, at 2 p.m.

APPENDIX

(See p. 1517.)

THE GOVERNOR GENERAL

ADDRESS BY THE PRIME MINISTER, THE RIGHT HONOURABLE PIERRE ELLIOTT TRUDEAU, P.C.
AT THE INSTALLATION OF THE RIGHT HONOURABLE JULES LÉGER
THE SENATE CHAMBER, MONDAY, JANUARY 14, 1974

Your Excellency:

As you assume the great responsibilities of the office of Governor General, I am pleased as well as honoured to extend to you the warmest good wishes of the Government, Parliament and people of Canada. May I respectfully ask that your first official act be to convey to Her Majesty, The Queen of Canada, a message expressing the loyalty and affection of the Canadian people.

In his classical work on the English constitution, Walter Bagehot defined the position of the Crown in the following words: "The Sovereign has—three rights—the right to be consulted, the right to encourage, the right to warn. And a King of great sense and sagacity would want no others." I know that Your Excellency will want to exercise these rights fully—and I am happy in that expectation, for there is no one from whom a government would more surely receive wisdom in counsel than from yourself.

The Governor General, like the Sovereign, is the symbol of our unity as well as an agent of its preservation. He is also the symbol and agent of the continuity of our governmental process. Excellency, your experience and accomplishments at home and abroad eminently suit you for this role.

As a diplomat, you have had difficult and demanding assignments; they have been accompanied at times by frustration and disappointment. But you have always carried your diplomatic tasks to success because of your patience and your wisdom. At home, as Undersecretary of State, you helped to evolve national policies designed to ensure that our two official languages could truly thrive; that our many cultures could truly flourish; that our identity as individuals—and as a nation—could find strength and fulfillment in our arts and culture. These efforts have helped to give Canadians a greater knowledge of each other, and to give the world a greater knowledge of Canada.

You assumed your high office at a time when world headlines are dominated by an energy crisis, and there is widespread concern about food supply shortages, and about serious threats to our natural environment. I believe these very alarums and shortages have helped convince millions of us that squandering our material resources is not a luxury of our way of life—but a threat to it. For that very reason, I believe that these are hopeful times, since, in shattering a consumer society's illusion of unlimited quantiy, events such as the energy crisis encourage each of us to turn away from the sometimes mindless scramble for "more," toward the more humane impulse for "better"; from our traditional North American concern with the technologies of "conquering" nature, to the joys of living in respectful harmony with nature.

Your Excellency, at a time of increased doubt about material things, you have by your vast culture, your intellect and devoutness, shown the undiminished value of the things of the mind and spirit. I hope you will share these qualities with all Canadians, and will want Government House to be what your home has always been—a place of intellectual and cultural excellence, a home for the arts and for the spirit.

I know you to be a man of life-long integrity—a person of great sensitivity and thoughtfulness. Even at times of stress and bustling activity, you have always preserved your ability to meditate in lucidity and serenity, and to communicate your wisdom to others; your sense du merveilleux toward the world around you; your keen but gentle sense of humour. While your appointment as the personal representative of Her Majesty has been widely welcomed by Canadians, I am confident that their esteem and affection will continue to grow as they come to know you better. In discharging your new responsibilities, you will have the support of your wife, a warm, witty and generous lady. To Her Excellency, we offer the expression of our friendship and our best wishes.

Your Excellency, your public service to Canada has spanned more than three decades. We are most grateful indeed that you have accepted the high responsibilities of the office you assume today. We know that you will serve with devotion and distinction, and we pray that your term of office will be happy and fulfilling for you.

REPLY OF HIS EXCELLENCY THE GOVERNOR GENERAL TO THE ADDRESS OF THE PRIME MINISTER

PRIME MINISTER:

I shall be honoured to convey to our gracious Sovereign the message of loyalty and affection you have entrusted to me. In recent years, the visits of the Royal Family to Canada have assumed a more informal character that has brought them closer to our everyday lives. We shall accordingly be glad, so soon after their marriage, to welcome Her Royal Highness Princess Anne and her husband, Captain Phillips, who will shortly be spending a few days in Ottawa.

The informality to which I have referred provides an accurate reflection of the changes occurring in our relationship with the Crown. For every region of every member country of the Commonwealth, the Crown has a distinct symbolic significance. Each is bound to it in a particular way, and yet each finds in it a common ground of fellowship. Beneath what some may consider an outmoded terminology lies the reality of a political system that we have shaped according to our own lights, one that is subject to our will and suited to our needs.

My wife and I have been deeply touched, Prime Minister, by your most cordial welcome, offered as it was on behalf of all Canadians; for we can succeed in the mission to which we are dedicating ourselves today only in so far as we are able to rely on the support of all, and on the aid of Providence. We shall seek out that support among all those who have a hand in the vast, richly colourful, yet unfinished tapestry that is Canada.

We shall begin by making brief visits to all the provincial capitals, and later we shall retrace our steps in a more deliberate manner, visiting each of the provinces and territories as occasions arise to which we can lend completeness and a sense of historical continuity; for the office of the Governor General symbolizes the stability of our national life and the permanence of our institutions.

In an unbroken line, Samuel de Champlain was in reality the first Governor of this land, and particularly of the valley of the Ottawa, through which he passed in 1613. He has been succeeded by 63 Governors and Governors General. The nature of their authority has varied, of course, as indeed has the geographical extent of their jurisdiction. Whether from France, from Great Britain, or more recently from Canada, they have all contributed in one way or another to the building of this country, each playing his own part though unable truly to realize the greatness of the whole.

The same might be said of generations of honest and unassuming people of Quebec, the province from which my wife and I both come, who have always been faithful to their homeland, having no other and seeking no other. Men of the land and of the sea, men of the Church and men of business, I pay them warm tribute, for without their courage and their tenacity the Canada we know today would not exist. They lived their lives in peace along the shores of the mighty river that bore their ancestors and shaped their destiny.

Nor do I forget the masters with whom I have been privileged to work—some of them equal to the very greatest—and the colleagues whose co-operation has always been unstinting and their friendship wholehearted during the more than 30 years that I have shared their hopes and anxieties in public service, through war and peace, through negotiation and reconstruction. Canada played her part during a generation in which the world found a new equilibrium and this country a new place. These were proud days for Canada's representatives abroad. Has it really been only by chance that the four Canadian Governors General have been chosen from among their ranks, or is it rather because they have shared the common denominator of national pride?

But already times have changed; we find ourselves in another age, whose contours we cannot fully perceive. Our Western civilization is floundering, exhausted, because of a number of paralysing contradictions: generations that confront one another in mutual non-recognition; insecurity amid plenty; poverty amid wealth; a traditional morality that is being shaken and replaced by a yearning for primitive purity; acts of violence by some who shun violence; space-age communications at a time when major political groupings are tending more and more towards regionalism.

In some parts of the world, the consumer society is losing momentum; in some, it is not a factor; and in some, it has become a tyrannical force. A process of change is under way; new values are emerging, particularly among the young, that have already made themselves felt here. For it is at once our strength and our weakness that Canada is a crossroads, her people open to influences from many directions.

We have been the first—and in many ways the only—people to be affected in a deep and lasting fashion by the three major currents of contemporary thought and genius: the English, the French and the American. Each in turn has formed and in some respects deformed us. In the past we have had to yield to them because the strength to resist was not forthcoming in a young and scattered people, disunited and hungry for new technology. But now we have the strength, the numbers and the self-confidence to choose what suits us, to assimilate it and give it originality, thus creating a civilization of many cultures—the only kind that can survive—as we learn that we need very little gasoline to explore the highways of the soul.

With these thoughts in mind, what can we wish the 985 children that will be born in this country today, January 14, 1974, and will belong to a nation of 25 million Canadians in 1980? Clean landscapes, clear waters, industrious yet unforbidding cities, a community of brotherhood in which Man has resumed his appointed pride of place at the centre of creation—all these things in a united and prosperous country in a world of justice and peace. If in the next few years my wife and I can be associated, however modestly, with such an achievement, then we shall know that our mission has not been in vain. We shall have shared with you the perpetually difficult task of being Canadians. Throughout our mission we shall have in our minds the question asked by Paul the Apostle: "Who makes you, my friend, so important? What do you possess that was not given you? If then you really received it all as a gift, why take the credit to yourself?"

PROROGATION SPEECH

The Right Honourable Bora Laskin, P.C., Chief Justice of Canada, Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General, having come and being seated at the foot of the Throne, and the House of Commons having been summoned, and being come with their Speaker, the Right Honourable the Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General was pleased to close the First Session of the Twenty-ninth Parliament with the following speech:

Honourable Members of the Senate:

Members of the House of Commons:

The First Session of the Twenty-ninth Parliament was opened on January 4, 1973. Since that time many events of great significance to Canada and to the world have taken place and you have responded by legislating and otherwise approving many actions of the highest importance.

Canadians were pleased during this Session that Her Majesty the Queen and His Royal Highness, the Duke of Edinburgh, twice came to Canada.

They assisted in the celebrations of the Centenary of the entry of Prince Edward Island into Confederation, the Centenary of the founding of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police and the Tercentenary of Kingston. They were also present in Ottawa for the Commonwealth Heads of Government Meeting.

Canadians were honoured to have been host to the Commonwealth Heads of Government meeting this summer when the contribution to world understanding of this association was once more underlined.

International affairs generally played an important rôle in this Session. When a major international effort had brought some hope of peace to Viet-Nam, Canada agreed to take part, with reservations, in a new truce supervisory exercise. Although we withdrew when it became clear that our membership in the I.C.C.S. could no longer serve a constructive purpose, our brief participation helped to stabilize a fragile cease-fire which in turn allowed for an exchange of prisoners of war and the withdrawal of American combat forces.

Following the renewal of hostilities in the Middle East, Canada again accepted an invitation to participate in a peacekeeping mission. Canada's commitment to détente has been evident also in our active participation in the conferences on European security and cooperation and on Mutual Balanced Force Reductions.

In October the Prime Minister paid an official visit to the People's Republic of China. His visit was the first of a Canadian Prime Minister to that country and came on the second anniversary of the exchange of diplomatic recognition between Canada and China. Negotiations and discussions with Premier Chou En-lai and Chairman Mao Tse-tung led to the conclusion of several agreements and understandings, some of them of considerable importance to Canada. A trade agreement was signed, as was an agreement in the field of health services which led quickly to the selection for travel to China of a team of Canadian anaesthetists to study acupuncture analgesia. Arrangements were also concluded to facilitate the reunion in Canada of families of Chinese origin, and for exchanges and cooperation in several other areas of mutual interest.

The Government has pursued its efforts to extend and deepen international exchange in commerce, science, culture and in many other fields and, to this end, several other Ministers have made important visits to nations on all continents.

The energy situation has revealed dramatically the inter-dependence of our global society, and while assuring Canadian needs first, the Government has made clear Canada's desire to cooperate with the United States and others to work together towards a solution.

The Canadian economy has functioned at a high level of activity. Very high rates of growth in the first part of the year carried the economy close to the physical limits of its productive capacity. Work stoppages in the late summer and early fall resulted in a slowing of output growth in that period but as we have neared the end of the Session, the production has increased rapidly. One of the fastest growing components of demand is business investment in new structures and equipment. Demand for Canadian exports has been high but is now subject to the uncertain impact upon our suppliers, our markets and our own producers of the world shortage and high prices for petroleum.

Our labour force has continued to grow more rapidly than in the previous year, and more rapidly than the labour force of other industrial countries. This growth has been led by the movement of women and younger Canadians into the labour market. But employment has grown more rapidly than the labour force, so that there has been over the year a significant and welcome reduction in the numbers of persons without jobs and seeking work.

Incomes of Canadians have grown with the expansion of the economy. Workers' incomes have grown, the receipts of governments have grown and so too have the returns to business.

The returns to business, combined with special measures which you have approved, are encouraging the expansion of investment needed to increase the productive capacity of our economy. Investment in housing has also been at a high level.

In our foreign trade, both our exports and imports have grown at a much more rapid rate than the total value of our output and we continue to have a surplus balance on merchandise trade and the combined balance of our international transactions in goods and services has improved from the average for 1972.

The external value of our currency in terms of United States dollars has floated within a narrow range.

The rise of prices in the course of this year has been a matter for constant concern. The increase in prices of industrial materials, foodstuffs and petroleum has been general throughout the world. The impact of these price rises on Canadians has prompted a number of the measures you have taken to relieve hardship among Canadians and to promote an increase in supplies for the future.

During this Session you have acted to deal with the energy situation. The Government has placed before Parliament the basis for a new national energy policy. The objective of that policy, to be reached before the end of the decade, is Canadian self-reliance in oil and oil products. Included in the essential requirements for a new policy are the creation of a national market for Canadian oil; a pricing mechanism that will provide sufficient incentives for the development of our oil resources; measures to ensure that any escalation in returns and revenues as a result of any higher prices will be used in a manner conducive to security and self-sufficiency; the establishment of a publicly-owned Canadian petroleum company principally to expedite exploration and development; the early completion of a pipeline of adequate capacity to serve Montreal and, as required, more eastward points; and the intensification of research on oil sands technology to permit their full and rapid development.

During this Session you have enacted measures designed to begin the implementation of this new policy. The Government has held discussions with the provinces and further negotiations on this subject will take place. In the meantime Canadians are being asked to economize on the use of energy and the Government is confident that the Canadian economy is sufficiently flexible and resilient that it can adjust quickly to changing conditions and can maintain high levels of production and employment.

In the Speech from the Throne beginning this Session, the Government announced a new priority for social policy issues, and the re-organization of social security programs. An important development in fulfilment of this promise was the decision of federal and provincial Governments to commence a comprehensive two-year review of the entire Canadian social security system on the basis of a framework set forth in the Working Paper on Social Security presented to Parliament last April by the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

One of the two main objectives set out in the Working Paper, and agreed on by federal and provincial Ministers, is to strengthen the incentive toward, and the reward for, productive self-reliance on the part of all who can participate in our work force. In pursuit of that objective, the government proposed, and Parliament accepted a legislative initiative to increase substantially Family Allowance benefits. Since wages are not geared to family size, as are social assistance benefits, this measure reached out in particular to the many in our society who, for various reasons, are employed at earnings below the level of family need. The new Family Allowance program seeks to reduce such inequities and increase the incentive to remain in the work force. To effect a sizeable measure of income redistribution at the same time, these new and higher allowances have been made taxable.

To reinforce further the strong desire for independence and self-reliance among our population, our Government, with the concurrence of the provinces, took steps to strengthen the major social insurance program in the country, the Canada Pension Plan.

Through legislation which you have approved the levels of earnings on which contributions can be made will be raised, thereby allowing Canadian workers more adequately to protect themselves against financial hardship arising from conditions over which they have little or no control—aging, disability, or the death of a family breadwinner.

Furthermore, the Government took steps to maintain the purchasing power of social security benefits. For example, under the Canada Pension Plan, War Veterans' Allowances, Superannuation and Family Allowance programs, benefits were made subject to full escalation to meet cost-of-living increases. Old Age Security and the Guaranteed Income Supplement for the aged, which were already fully indexed, had this escalation put on a quarterly basis. Through these measures, all major government income security programs now assure a continuing full dollar value.

The other major objective of the social security review is to ensure a decent basic income standard for all those who cannot, and should not be expected to work. Accordingly, at the beginning of this session, the government proposed, and Parliament assented to, a significant increase in the level of security guaranteed our senior citizens. Thanks to this measure, single persons 65 years of age and more are today assured a guaranteed income of over $2,000 a year, and couples are assured in excess of $4,000 a year—levels which compare very favourably with those of any nation in the world.

But these actions do not exhaust the tasks inherent in the social security review. We can now look forward with justifiable hope to further achievements in the review, aimed at maximizing the benefits and reducing the inequities of Canadian society.

You have acted in this Session to improve the standards and the availability of Canadian housing. You approved a measure that provided assistance for research and planning for community development; for public acquisition of residential land; for the improvement of existing residential neighbourhoods; for the improvement of housing for native people; for the increase in housing available for low income families; for the development of cooperative housing; and for beginning protection of buyers similar to that provided for the purchasers of other consumer products. You also enacted the Residential Mortgages Act, which is intended to increase the funds available in Canada for home mortgages.

You were compelled during this Session to deal with a strike in the railways, but you were able to act justly and expeditiously so that no extensive harm was done to the nation.

Measures to improve immigration procedures were enacted during this Session and the Government acted to legitimize the status of thousands of immigrants.

Steps were taken during this year to improve the operations of the Unemployment Insurance Commission.

Of prime importance to the Canadian direction of the economy was the enactment of the Foreign Investment Review Act. This is a positive measure, designed to promote the development of both the Canadian economy and the Canadian identity. The review process that it established is a flexible instrument which recognizes that foreign direct investment is a complex of costs and benefits. It is intended to help us obtain better performance from foreign investment in Canada while arresting and reversing a trend toward foreign control of enterprise in Canada. This measure is not intended to terminate foreign investment in this country; it is intended to provide a welcome to foreign investment that is of significant benefit to Canada.

Substantial increases in the sales and prices of wheat are manifestations of the prosperity enjoyed by Canadian farmers during this Session. In order to protect these farmers you have enacted measures to eliminate capital gains taxes on family farms passing from generation to generation and to reduce the cost to the farmer of crop insurance. Both farmer and consumer have been protected by the increase in the support levels on dairy products and by the increase in feed freight rate assistance in eastern Canada and British Columbia. Steps were taken to improve generally the marketing of agricultural products and the development of a new feed grains policy was initiated.

In this Session you renewed for a five year period the restriction on capital punishment, and you enacted an important measure to protect the privacy of individuals from abridgement through modern technology. You also enacted a measure to provide protection against air piracy and you increased the membership of the National Parole Board.

You addressed yourselves to the strengthening of the institutions of Canadian democracy. The Government announced its policies toward conflicts of interest of Ministers and public servants. It laid before you a Green Paper on Members of Parliament and conflicts of interest. You initiated the process of review and possible modernization of the system of determining representation of the people in the Canadian Parliament.

Of prime importance to Canadian democracy, you passed the Election Expenses Act. This measure will serve to open the doors of direct political participation in government to many more people. It will provide a more open and just ground for political campaigns in our history and it will assure that the private interests and significant political obligations of candidates and parties will be public.

Much has been accomplished during this Session, but the pace of legislative reform and innovation must continue rapidly so that the challenges of the future may be met.

Members of the House of Commons:

I thank you for the provision you have made for the public services during the previous and the current fiscal year.

Honourable Members of the Senate:

Members of the House of Commons:

May Divine Providence continue to bless our country.

The Honourable the Speaker of the Senate then said:

Honourable Members of the Senate:

Members of the House of Commons:

It is the will and pleasure of the Right Honourable the Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General that this Parliament be prorogued until tomorrow, Wednesday, the 27th day of February, 1974, at ten thirty o'clock in the forenoon, to be here holden; and this Parliament is accordingly prorogued until tomorrow, Wednesday, the 27th day of February, 1974, at ten thirty o'clock in the forenoon.
