

CANADA

DEBATES OF THE SENATE

OFFICIAL REPORT

(HANSARD)

THE HONOURABLE MURIEL McQUEEN FERGUSSON

SPEAKER

1973-74
FIRST SESSION, TWENTY-NINTH PARLIAMENT
21-22-23 ELIZABETH II

Volume II

(July 3, 1973, to February 26, 1974)

The Session was opened on January 4, 1973 and war prorogued on February 26, 1974

Queen's Printer for Canada, Ottawa

The Speaker

THE HONOURABLE MURIEL MCQUEEN FERGUSSON

The Leader of the Government

THE HONOURABLE PAUL MARTIN, P.C.

The Leader of the Opposition

THE HONOURABLE JACQUES FLYNN, P.C.

THE MINISTRY

According to Precedence

February 26, 1974

The Right Honourable Pierre Elliott Trudeau	Prime Minister
The Honourable Senator Paul Joseph James Martin	Leader of the Government in The Senate
The Honourable Mitchell Sharp	Secretary of State for External Affairs
The Honourable Allan Joseph MacEachen	President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada
The Honourable Charles Mills Drury	President of the Treasury Board
The Honourable Jean Marchand	Minister of Transport
The Honourable John Napier Turner	Minister of Finance
The Honourable Jean Chrétien	Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development
The Honourable Donald Stovel Macdonald	Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources
The Honourable John Carr Munro	Minister of Labour
The Honourable Gérard Pelletier	Minister of Communications
The Honourable Jack Davis	Minister of the Environment
The Honourable Jean-Eudes Dubé	Minister of Public Works
The Honourable Stanley Ronald Basford	Minister of State for Urban Affairs
The Honourable Donald Campbell Jamieson	Minister of Regional Economic Expansion
The Honourable Robert Knight Andras	Minister of Manpower and Immigration
The Honourable James Armstrong Richardson	Minister of National Defence
The Honourable Otto Emil Lang	Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada
The Honourable Herb Gray	Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs
The Honourable Robert Stanbury	Minister of National Revenue
The Honourable Jean-Pierre Goyer	Minister of Supply and Services
The Honourable Alastair William Gillespie	Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce
The Honourable Stanley Haidasz	Minister of State
The Honourable Eugene Francis Whelan	Minister of Agriculture
The Honourable W. Warren Allmand	Solicitor General of Canada
The Honourable James Hugh Faulkner	Secretary of State of Canada
The Honourable André Ouellet	Postmaster General
The Honourable Daniel Joseph MacDonald	Minister of Veterans Affairs
The Honourable Marc Lalonde	Minister of National Health and Welfare
The Honourable Jeanne Sauvé	Minister of State for Science and Technology

PARLIAMENTARY SECRETARIES

Léopold Corriveau	To Minister of Agriculture
Pierre De Bané	To Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs
Herb Breau	To Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources
William Rompkey	To Minister of the Environment
J.-Roland Comtois	To Minister of Finance
Len Marchand	To Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development
Raynald Guay	To Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce
Gilles Marceau	To Minister of Justice
Charles Turner	To Minister of Labour
Mark MacGuigan	To Minister of Manpower and Immigration
Leonard Hopkins	To Minister of National Defence
Norman A. Cafik	To Minister of National Health and Welfare
John M. Reid	To President of the Privy Council
Maurice Foster	To President of the Privy Council
Marcel Prud'homme	To Minister of Regional Economic Expansion
Joseph-Philippe Guay	To Minister of Transport
Ian Watson	To Minister of State for Urban Affairs

SENATORS OF CANADA

ACCORDING TO SENIORITY

February 26, 1974

Senators	Designation	Post Office Address
THE HONOURABLE
Salter Adrian Hayden	Toronto	Toronto, Ont.
Norman McLeod Paterson	Thunder Bay	Thunder Bay, Ont.
Léon Mercier Gouin	De Salaberry	Montreal, Que.
George Percival Burchill	Northumberland-Miramichi	Nelson-Miramichi, N.B.
Michael G. Basha	West Coast	Curling, Nfld.
Muriel McQueen Fergusson (Speaker)	Fredericton	Fredericton, N.B.
Sarto Fournier	De Lanaudière	Montreal, Que.
John J. Connolly, P.C.	Ottawa West	Ottawa, Ont.
Donald Cameron	Banff	Banff, Alta.
David A. Croll	Toronto-Spadina	Toronto, Ont.
Fred A. McGrand	Sunbury	Fredericton Junction, N.B.
Donald Smith	Queens-Shelburne	Liverpool, N.S.
Harold Connolly	Halifax North	Halifax, N.S.
Florence Elsie Inman	Murray Harbour	Montague, P.E.I.
Hartland de Montarville Molson	Alma	Montreal, Que.
William Albert Boucher	Prince Albert	Prince Albert, Sask.
J. Eugène Lefrançois	Repentigny	Montreal, Que.
Joseph A. Sullivan	North York	Toronto, Ont.
Lionel Choquette	Ottawa East	Ottawa, Ont.
Frederick Murray Blois	Colchester-Hants	Truro, N.S.
John Michael Macdonald	Cape Breton	North Sydney, N.S.
Josie Alice Dinan Quart	Victoria	Quebec, Que.
Louis Philippe Beaubien	Bedford	Montreal, Que.
J. Campbell Haig	River Heights	Winnipeg, Man.
M. Grattan O'Leary	Carleton	Ottawa, Ont.
Allister Grosart	Pickering	Toronto, Ont.
Edgar Fournier	Madawaska-Restigouche	Iroquois, N.B.
Frank C. Welch	Kings	Wolfville, N.S.
Jacques Flynn, P.C.	Rougemont	Quebec, Que.
David James Walker, P.C.	Toronto	Toronto, Ont.
Rhéal Bélisle	Sudbury	Sudbury, Ont.
Paul Yuzyk	Fort Garry	Winnipeg, Man.
Orville Howard Phillips	Prince	Alberton, P.E.I.
Maurice Bourget, P.C.	The Laurentides	Lévis, Que.
Louis P. Gélinas	Montarville	Montreal, Que.
Romuald Bourque	De la Vallière	Outremont, Que.
Azellus Denis, P.C.	La Salle	Montreal, Que.
Eric Cook	Harbour Grace	St. John's, Nfld.
Daniel Aiken Lang	South York	Toronto, Ont.
John B. Aird	Toronto	Toronto, Ont.
William Moore Benidickson, P.C.	Kenora-Rainy River	Kenora, Ont.
Alexander Hamilton McDonald	Moosomin	Moosomin, Sask.
Earl Adam Hastings	Palliser-Foothills	Calgary, Alta.
Harry William Hays, P.C.	Calgary	Calgary, Alta.
James Harper Prowse	Edmonton	Edmonton, Alta.
Charles Robert McElman	Nashwaak Valley	Fredericton, N.B.
Douglas Keith Davey	York	Don Mills, Ont.
Jean-Paul Deschatelets, P.C.	Lauzon	Montreal, Que.

Senators	Designation	Post Office Address
THE HONOURABLE
Hazen Robert Argue	Regina	Kayville, Sask.
Alan Aylesworth Macnaughton, P.C.	Sorel	Montreal, Que.
J. G. Léopold Langlois	Grandville	Quebec, Que.
Paul Desruisseaux	Wellington	Sherbrooke, Que.
Chesley William Carter	The Grand Banks	St. John's, Nfld.
James Duggan	Avalon	St. John's, Nfld.
Thomas Joseph Kickham	Cardigan	Souris, P.E.I.
Douglas Donald Everett	Fort Rouge	Winnipeg, Man.
Maurice Lamontagne, P.C.	Inkerman	Aylmer, Que.
Andrew Ernest Thompson	Dovercourt	Kendal, Ont.
Keith Laird	Windsor	Windsor, Ont.
Herbert Orville Sparrow	The Battlefords	North Battleford, Sask.
Richard James Stanbury	York Centre	Toronto, Ont.
Hervé J. Michaud	Kent	Buctouche, N.B.
William John Petten	Bonavista	St. John's, Nfld.
Raymond Eudes	De Lorimier	Montreal, Que.
Paul Martin, P.C.	Windsor-Walkerville	Windsor, Ont.
Louis de Gonzague Giguère	De la Durantaye	Montreal, Que.
Ernest C. Manning, P.C.	Edmonton West	Edmonton, Alta.
Gildas L. Molgat	Ste. Rose	Winnipeg, Man.
Eugene A. Forsey	Nepean	Ottawa, Ont.
William C. McNamara	Winnipeg	Winnipeg, Man.
Paul C. Lafond	Gulf	Hull, Que.
Ann Elizabeth Haddon Heath	Nanaimo-Malaspina	Nanaimo, B.C.
Edward M. Lawson	Vancouver	Vancouver, B.C.
H. Carl Goldenberg	Rigaud	Westmount, Que.
George Clifford van Roggen	Vancouver-Point Grey	Vancouver, B.C.
Sidney L. Buckwold	Saskatoon	Saskatoon, Sask.
Renaude Lapointe	Mille Isles	Montreal, Que.
Mark Lorne Bonnell	Murray River	Murray River, P.E.I.
Guy Williams	Richmond	Richmond, B.C.
Michel Fournier	Restigouche-Gloucester	Pointe Verte, N.B.
Frederick William Rowe	Lewisporte	St. John's, Nfld.
George James McIlraith, P.C.	Ottawa Valley	Ottawa, Ont.
Margaret Norrie	Colchester-Cumberland	Truro, N.S.
Henry D. Hicks	The Annapolis Valley	Halifax, N.S.
Bernard Alasdair Graham	The Highlands	Sydney, N.S.
Martial Asselin, P.C.	Stadacona	La Malbaie, Que.
Arthur Laing, P.C.	Vancouver South	Vancouver, B.C.
John James Greene, P.C.	Niagara	Niagara Falls, Ont.
Joseph Julien Jean-Pierre Côté, P.C.	Kennebec	Longueuil, Que.
Joan Neiman	Peel	Caledon East, Ont.
Raymond Joseph Perrault	North Shore-Burnaby	Vancouver, B.C.
John Morrow Godfrey	Rosedale	Toronto, Ont.
Maurice Riel	Shawinigan	Mount Royal, Que.
Louis-J. Robichaud, P.C.	L'Acadie-Acadia	Ottawa, Ont.
Daniel Riley	Saint John	Saint John West, N.B.

SENATORS OF CANADA

ALPHABETICAL LIST

February 26, 1974

Senators	Designation	Post Office Address
THE HONOURABLE
Aird, John B.	Toronto	Toronto, Ont.
Argue, Hazen	Regina	Kayville, Sask.
Asselin, Martial, P.C.	Stadacona	La Malbaie, Que.
Basha, Michael G.	West Coast	Curling, Nfld.
Beaubien, L. P.	Bedford	Montreal, Que.
Bélisle, Rhéal	Sudbury	Sudbury, Ont.
Benidickson, W. M., P.C.	Kenora-Rainy River	Kenora, Ont.
Blois, Fred M.	Colchester-Hants	Truro, N.S.
Bonnell, M. Lorne	Murray River	Murray River, P.E.I.
Boucher, William A.	Prince Albert	Prince Albert, Sask.
Bourget, Maurice, P.C.	The Laurentides	Lévis, Que.
Bourque, Romuald	De la Vallière	Outremont, Que.
Buckwold, Sidney L.	Saskatoon	Saskatoon, Sask.
Burchill, G. Percival	Northumberland-Miramichi	Nelson-Miramichi, N.B.
Cameron, Donald	Banff	Banff, Alta.
Carter, Chesley W.	The Grand Banks	St. John's, Nfld.
Choquette, Lionel	Ottawa East	Ottawa, Ont.
Connolly, Harold	Halifax North	Halifax, N.S.
Connolly, John J., P.C.	Ottawa West	Ottawa, Ont.
Cook, Eric	Harbour Grace	St. John's, Nfld.
Côté, Joseph Julien Jean-Pierre, P.C.	Kennebec	Longueuil, Que.
Croll, David A.	Toronto-Spadina	Toronto, Ont.
Davey, Keith	York	Don Mills, Ont.
Denis, Azellus, P.C.	La Salle	Montreal, Que.
Deschatelets, Jean-Paul, P.C.	Lauzon	Montreal, Que.
Desruisseaux, Paul	Wellington	Sherbrooke, Que.
Duggan, James	Avalon	St. John's, Nfld.
Eudes, Raymond	De Lorimier	Montreal, Que.
Everett, Douglas D.	Fort Rouge	Winnipeg, Man.
Fergusson, Muriel McQueen (Speaker)	Fredericton	Fredericton, N.B.
Flynn, Jacques, P.C.	Rougemont	Quebec, Que.
Forsey, Eugene A.	Nepean	Ottawa, Ont.
Fournier, Edgar	Madawaska-Restigouche	Iroquois, N.B.
Fournier, Michel	Restigouche-Gloucester	Pointe Verte, N.B.
Fournier, Sarto	De Lanaudière	Montreal, Que.
Gélinas, Louis P.	Montarville	Montreal, Que.
Giguère, Louis de G.	De la Durantaye	Montreal, Que.
Godfrey, John Morrow	Rosedale	Toronto, Ont.
Goldenberg, H. Carl	Rigaud	Westmount, Que.
Gouin, L. M.	De Salaberry	Montreal, Que.
Graham, Bernard Alasdair	The Highlands	Sydney, N.S.
Greene, John James, P.C.	Niagara	Niagara Falls, Ont.
Grosart, Allister	Pickering	Toronto, Ont.
Haig, J. Campbell	River Heights	Winnipeg, Man.
Hastings, Earl A.	Palliser-Foothills	Calgary, Alta.
Hayden, Salter A.	Toronto	Toronto, Ont.
Hays, Harry, P.C.	Calgary	Calgary, Alta.
Heath, A. E. Haddon	Nanaimo-Malaspina	Nanaimo, B.C.

Senators	Designation	Post Office Address
THE HONOURABLE
Hicks, Henry D.	The Annapolis Valley	Halifax, N.S.
Inman, F. Elsie	Murray Harbour	Montague, P.E.I.
Kickham, Thomas J.	Cardigan	Souris, P.E.I.
Lafond, Paul C.	Gulf	Hull, Que.
Laing, Arthur, P.C.	Vancouver South	Vancouver, B.C.
Laird, Keith	Windsor	Windsor, Ont.
Lamontagne, Maurice, P.C.	Inkerman	Aylmer, Que.
Lang, Daniel A.	South York	Toronto, Ont.
Langlois, Léopold	Grandville	Quebec, Que.
Lapointe, Renaude	Mille Isles	Montreal, Que.
Lawson, Edward M.	Vancouver	Vancouver, B.C.
Lefrançois, J. Eugène	Repentigny	Montreal, Que.
Macdonald, John M.	Cape Breton	North Sydney, N.S.
Macnaughton, Alan A., P.C.	Sorel	Montreal, Que.
Manning, Ernest C., P.C.	Edmonton West	Edmonton, Alta.
Martin, Paul, P.C.	Windsor-Walkerville	Windsor, Ont.
McDonald, A Hamilton	Moosomin	Moosomin, Sask.
McElman, Charles	Nashwaak Valley	Fredericton, N.B.
McGrand, Fred A.	Sunbury	Fredericton Junction, N.B.
McIlraith, George, P.C.	Ottawa Valley	Ottawa, Ont.
McNamara, William C.	Winnipeg	Winnipeg, Man.
Michaud, Hervé J.	Kent	Buctouche, N.B.
Molgat, Gildas L.	Ste. Rose	Winnipeg, Man.
Molson, Hartland de M.	Alma	Montreal, Que.
Neiman, Joan	Peel	Caledon East, Ont.
Norrie, Margaret	Colchester-Cumberland	Truro, N.S.
O'Leary, M. Grattan	Carleton	Ottawa, Ont.
Paterson, Norman McL	Thunder Bay	Thunder Bay, Ont.
Perrault, Raymond J.	North Shore-Burnaby	Vancouver, B.C.
Petten, William J.	Bonavista	St. John's, Nfld.
Phillips, Orville H.	Prince	Alberton, P.E.I.
Prowse, J. Harper	Edmonton	Edmonton, Alta.
Quart, Josie D.	Victoria	Quebec, Que.
Riel, Maurice	Shawinigan	Mount Royal, Que.
Riley, Daniel	Saint John	Saint John West, N.B.
Robichaud, Louis-J., P.C.	L'Acadie-Acadia	Ottawa, Ont.
Rowe, Frederick William	Lewisporte	St. John's, Nfld.
Smith, Donald	Queens-Shelburne	Liverpool, N.S.
Sparrow, Herbert O.	The Battlefords	North Battleford, Sask.
Stanbury, Richard J.	York Centre	Toronto, Ont.
Sullivan, Joseph A.	North York	Toronto, Ont.
Thompson, Andrew	Dovercourt	Kendal, Ont.
van Roggen, George	Vancouver-Point Grey	Vancouver, B.C.
Walker, David, P.C.	Toronto	Toronto, Ont.
Welch, Frank C.	Kings	Wolfville, N.S.
Williams, Guy	Richmond	Richmond, B.C.
Yuzyk, Paul	Fort Garry	Winnipeg, Man.

SENATORS OF CANADA

BY PROVINCES

February 26, 1974

ONTARIO—24

	Senators	Designation	Post Office Address
	THE HONOURABLE
1	Salter Adrian Hayden	Toronto	Toronto.
2	Norman McLeod Paterson	Thunder Bay	Thunder Bay.
3	John J. Connolly, P.C.	Ottawa West	Ottawa.
4	David A. Croll	Toronto-Spadina	Toronto.
5	Joseph A. Sullivan	North York	Toronto.
6	Lionel Choquette	Ottawa East	Ottawa.
7	M. Grattan O'Leary	Carleton	Ottawa.
8	Allister Grosart	Pickering	Toronto.
9	David James Walker, P.C.	Toronto	Toronto.
10	Rhéal Bélisle	Sudbury	Sudbury.
11	Daniel Aiken Lang	South York	Toronto.
12	John B. Aird	Toronto	Toronto.
13	William Moore Benidickson, P.C.	Kenora-Rainy River	Kenora.
14	Douglas Keith Davey	York	Don Mills.
15	Andrew Ernest Thompson	Dovercourt	Kendal.
16	Keith Laird	Windsor	Windsor.
17	Richard James Stanbury	York Centre	Toronto.
18	Paul Martin, P.C.	Windsor-Walkerville	Windsor.
19	Eugene A. Forsey	Nepean	Ottawa.
20	George James McIlraith, P.C.	Ottawa Valley	Ottawa.
21	John James Greene, P.C.	Niagara	Niagara Falls.
22	Joan Neiman	Peel	Caledon East.
23	John Morrow Godfrey	Rosedale	Toronto.
24

QUEBEC—24

	Senators	Designation	Post Office Address
	THE HONOURABLE
1	Léon Mercier Gouin	De Salaberry	Montreal.
2	Sarto Fournier	De Lanaudière	Montreal.
3	Hartland de Montarville Molson	Alma	Montreal.
4	J. Eugène Lefrançois	Repentigny	Montreal.
5	Josie Alice Dinan Quart	Victoria	Quebec.
6	Louis Philippe Beaubien	Bedford	Montreal.
7	Jacques Flynn, P.C.	Rougemont	Quebec.
8	Maurice Bourget, P.C.	The Laurentides	Lévis.
9	Louis P. Gélinas	Montarville	Montreal.
10	Romuald Bourque	De la Vallière	Outremont.
11	Azellus Denis, P.C.	La Salle	Montreal.
12	Jean-Paul Deschatelets, P.C.	Lauzon	Montreal.
13	Alan Aylesworth Macnaughton, P.C.	Sorel	Montreal.
14	J. G. Léopold Langlois	Grandville	Quebec.
15	Paul Desruisseaux	Wellington	Sherbrooke.
16	Maurice Lamontagne, P.C.	Inkerman	Aylmer.
17	Raymond Eudes	De Lorimier	Montreal.
18	Louis de Gonzague Giguère	De la Durantaye	Montreal.
19	Paul C. Lafond	Gulf	Hull.
20	H. Carl Goldenberg	Rigaud	Westmount.
21	Renaude Lapointe	Mille Isles	Montreal.
22	Martial Asselin, P.C.	Stadacona	La Malbaie.
23	Joseph Julien Jean-Pierre Côté, P.C.	Kennebec	Longueuil.
24	Maurice Riel	Shawinigan	Mount Royal.

NOVA SCOTIA—10

	Senators	Designation	Post Office Address
	THE HONOURABLE
1	Donald Smith	Queens-Shelburne	Liverpool.
2	Harold Connolly	Halifax North	Halifax.
3	Frederick Murray Blois	Colchester-Hants	Truro.
4	John Michael Macdonald	Cape Breton	North Sydney.
5	Frank C. Welch	Kings	Wolfville.
6	Margaret Norrie	Colchester-Cumberland	Truro.
7	Henry D. Hicks	The Annapolis Valley	Halifax.
8	Bernard Alasdair Graham	The Highlands	Sydney.
9
10

NEW BRUNSWICK—10

	Senators	Designation	Post Office Address
	THE HONOURABLE
1	George Percival Burchill	Northumberland-Miramichi	Nelson-Miramichi.
2	Muriel McQueen Fergusson (Speaker)	Fredericton	Fredericton.
3	Fred A. McGrand	Sunbury	Fredericton Junction.
4	Edgar Fournier	Madawaska-Restigouche	Iroquois.
5	Charles Robert McElman	Nashwaak Valley	Fredericton.
6	Hervé J. Michaud	Kent	Buctouche.
7	Michel Fournier	Restigouche-Gloucester	Pointe Verte.
8	Louis-J. Robichaud, P.C.	L'Acadie-Acadia	Ottawa, Ont.
9	Daniel Riley	Saint John	Saint John West.
10

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND—4

	Senators	Designation	Post Office Address
	THE HONOURABLE
1	Florence Elsie Inman	Murray Harbour	Montague.
2	Orville Howard Phillips	Prince	Alberton.
3	Thomas Joseph Kickham	Cardigan	Souris.
4	M. Lorne Bonnell	Murray River	Murray River.

MANITOBA—6

	Senators	Designation	Post Office Address
	THE HONOURABLE
1	J. Campbell Haig	River Heights	Winnipeg.
2	Paul Yuzyk	Fort Garry	Winnipeg.
3	Douglas Donald Everett	Fort Rouge	Winnipeg.
4	Gildas L. Molgat	Ste. Rose	Winnipeg.
5	William C. McNamara	Winnipeg	Winnipeg.
6	.....	.....	.....

BRITISH COLUMBIA—6

	THE HONOURABLE
1	Ann Elizabeth Haddon Heath	Nanaimo-Malaspina	Nanaimo.
2	Edward M. Lawson	Vancouver	Vancouver.
3	George Clifford van Roggen	Vancouver-Point Grey	Vancouver.
4	Guy Williams	Richmond	Richmond.
5	Arthur Laing, P.C.	Vancouver South	Vancouver.
6	Raymond Joseph Perrault	North Shore-Burnaby	Vancouver.

SASKATCHEWAN—6

	THE HONOURABLE
1	William Albert Boucher	Prince Albert	Prince Albert.
2	Alexander Hamilton McDonald	Moosomin	Moosomin.
3	Hazen Robert Argue	Regina	Kayville.
4	Herbert Orville Sparrow	The Battlefords	North Battleford.
5	Sidney L. Buckwold	Saskatoon	Saskatoon.
6	.....	.....	.....

ALBERTA—6

	THE HONOURABLE
1	Donald Cameron	Banff	Banff.
2	Earl Adam Hastings	Palliser-Foothills	Calgary.
3	Harry William Hays, P.C.	Calgary	Calgary.
4	James Harper Prowse	Edmonton	Edmonton.
5	Ernest C. Manning, P.C.	Edmonton West	Edmonton.
6	.....	.....	.....

NEWFOUNDLAND—6

	Senators	Designation	Post Office Address
	THE HONOURABLE
1	Michael G. Basha	West Coast	Curling.
2	Eric Cook	Harbour Grace	St. John's.
3	Chesley William Carter	The Grand Banks	St. John's.
4	James Duggan	Avalon	St. John's.
5	William John Petten	Bonavista	St. John's.
6	Frederick William Rowe	Lewisporte	St. John's.

THE SENATE

Officers and Chiefs of Principal Branches

Clerk of the Senate and Clerk of the Parliaments	Robert Fortier, Q.C., B.A., LL.B.
Law Clerk and Parliamentary Counsel	E. Russell Hopkins, B.A., LL.B.
First Clerk Assistant	Alcide Paquette, B.A.
Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod	A. G. Vandelac, M.C., C.D.
Director of Committees	Pierre Godbout, Q.C., B.A., LL.L.
Director of Administration and Personnel	J. Walter Dean
Editor of Debates and Chief of Reporting Branch	T. S. Hubbard
Chief of Minutes and Journals (English)	Mrs. Jean F. Sutherland
Chief of Minutes and Journals (French)	Miss Madeleine Ouimet
Assistant Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod	Alfred Fortier, E.D., C.D.
Postmaster	Harold King
Supervisor of Stenographic Service (English)
Supervisor of Stenographic Service (Bilingual)	Mrs. Jocelyne Latrémouille
Chief of Stationery Branch and Furniture Control Officer
Chief of Joint Distribution Office	J. E. Levesque
Chief of Protective Service	W. Maheux
Manager of Parliamentary Restaurant	W. Pentecost

Parliamentary Reporters

G. R. Baker (Assistant Chief of Reporting Branch),
H. D. Griffith (Associate Editor and Senior Reporter, English),
J. R. Langlois (Associate Editor and Senior Reporter, French),
Aurèle Chenier, Lorcan OhUiginn,
W. J. Culleton, G. K. Hubbard, D. L. Sellers,
A. A. Gallagher, L. R. Powis, H. C. Warburton

Assistant Parliamentary Reporters

Maurice Bolduc, N. C. Keeley

TRANSLATORS

Bureau for Translations

Department of Secretary of State

Director, Special Operations	Raymond Aupy
Chief, Parliamentary Translations	Paul Boudreault
Chief of Debates	André Audette

LIBRARY OF PARLIAMENT

Parliamentary Librarian	Erik J. Spicer, C.D., B.A., B.L.S., M.A.L.S.
Associate Parliamentary Librarian	Gilles J. C. Frappier, B.A., B.Ph., B.L.S.

THE SENATE

Tuesday, July 3, 1973

The Senate met at 8 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Hon. Paul Martin tabled:

Report of the Unemployment Insurance Commission for the year ended December 31, 1972, pursuant to section 130(2) of the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971, chapter 48, Statutes of Canada, 1970-71-72.

Report of Canadian Arsenals Limited, including its accounts and financial statements certified by the Auditor General, for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1973, pursuant to sections 75(3) and 77(3) of the Financial Administration Act, chapter F-10, R.S.C., 1970.

Report of the National Librarian for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1973, pursuant to section 13 of the National Library Act, chapter N-11, R.S.C., 1970.

Report of the Atomic Energy Control Board of Canada for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1973, pursuant to section 20(1) of the Atomic Energy Control Act, chapter A-19, R.S.C., 1970.

Copies of Statistics outlining, by area and by species, Canadian allocations for 1973 and 1974, together with the total allowable fish catch for all countries in the Northwest Atlantic, issued by the Department of the Environment.

Report of the Standards Council of Canada for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1973, including its financial statement certified by the Auditor General, pursuant to section 20 of the Standards Council of Canada Act, chapter 41 (1st Supplement), R.S.C., 1970.

Report of the Canadian Radio-Television Commission for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1973, pursuant to section 31 of the Broadcasting Act, chapter B-11, R.S.C., 1970.

Report of Canadian Overseas Telecommunication Corporation, together with its accounts and financial statements certified by the Auditor General, for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1973, pursuant to section 16 of the Canadian Overseas Telecommunication Corporation Act, chapter C-11, and sections 75(3) and 77(3) of the Financial Administration Act, chapter F-10, R.S.C., 1970.

Copies of Government of Canada review of the Canadian Transport Commission decision of March 30, 1973 on Bell Canada's application "A", issued by the Department of Communications.

Copies of a document entitled "An Energy Policy for Canada, Phase 1, Volume I—Analysis, Phase 1, Volume II—Appendices" issued by the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources.

Copies of a series of staff papers, prepared by the Department of Regional Economic Expansion as a contribution to federal-provincial consultations on regional development policy in Canada, relating to the following areas—Alberta, British Columbia, Manitoba, New Brunswick, Newfoundland, Nova Scotia, Ontario, Quebec, Saskatchewan, Atlantic Region, Western Northlands and Western Region.

Report of the President of the National Research Council for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1973, pursuant to section 16 of the National Research Council Act, chapter N-14, R.S.C., 1970.

Report of Canadian Patents and Development Limited for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1973, including its accounts and financial statements certified by the Auditor General, pursuant to sections 75(3) and 77(3) of the Financial Administration Act, chapter F-10, R.S.C., 1970.

AIRCRAFT REGISTRY BILL

THIRD READING

Hon. Renaude Lapointe moved the third reading of Bill S-9, to enable Canada to comply with a Convention on the International Recognition of Rights in Aircraft.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

CRIMINAL CODE AND NATIONAL DEFENCE ACT (TOTAL ABOLITION OF CAPITAL PUNISHMENT)

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Macdonald, seconded by the Honourable Senator Flynn, P.C., for the second reading of the Bill S-8, intituled: "An Act to amend the Criminal Code and the National Defence Act (total abolition of capital punishment)".—(Honourable Senator McIlraith, P.C.).

Hon. Mr. McIlraith: Stand.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: May I ask whether this order is going to stand for very long? I am surprised that Senator McIlraith, with his experience and knowledge of the matter, should delay further the debate on this very important piece of legislation.

Hon. Mr. McIlraith: Honourable senators, I think the answer to the question posed by the Leader of the Opposition has to be a simple and direct, "Yes, it will stand for a considerable time."

I see no other way of having a proper debate on this important subject than by delaying it until we know better the progress of the bill on this subject now before the other place. It seems to me that to have a debate on this matter running concurrently in both houses would be most chaotic, and conducive only to a poor result on the rather clear proposition embodied in this order. If we do not wait until the other place has dealt more fully with this subject, we will get into a situation where honourable senators will be forced to take a position for or against abolition, for partial aboliton or for partial retention, which would be most confusing for them and would only be an obstacle to our obtaining in the law the result we desire, whatever that may be.

It seems to me that to have two debates on this subject running concurrently would be a quite wrong usage of our rights in Parliament. For that reason, I ask that the order stand, and I expect to ask the forbearance of honourable senators when it is called again to have it stand until we know better what is happening with the bill before the other place.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Do you not think we can make up our minds on a subject such as this before it is dealt with in the other place?

Hon. Mr. McIlraith: Yes, I am sure we can. However, I do not think any useful purpose would be served in so doing. I do not see any sense in the Senate making a decision on this bill, and the other place making a decision on the bill before it. I think that would result in a situation that would be most harmful to the best determination of this whole matter.

Order stands.

NATIONAL PARKS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—REPORT OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the report of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce on Bill S-4, to amend the National Parks Act, which was presented on Thursday, June 28, 1973.

Hon. John J. Connolly, Acting Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, moved that the report be adopted.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Honourable senators, before the report is adopted I wonder if I might ask the sponsor whether any consideration has been given to having the notice of intention to issue a proclamation published in a local newspaper as well as in the Canada Gazette? The Canada Gazette is not a publication which is widely read by the general public.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Honourable senators, I am not the sponsor of this bill, but perhaps, as acting chairman of the committee I can say to Senator Macdonald that that is certainly not included in the amendment. Senator Macdonald is aware that the amendment originated in the fertile mind of the Leader of the Opposition and was, for that reason, considered to be a fairly thoroughgoing amendment. Publication of the notice is restricted to the Canada Gazette.

Report adopted.

[Hon. Mr. McIlraith.]

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West) moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

● (2010)

THE CONSTITUTION

FEDERAL DISALLOWANCE OF PROVINCIAL STATUTES—DEBATE CONCLUDED

The Senate resumed from Wednesday, June 27, the adjourned debate on the inquiry of Senator van Roggen, calling the attention of the Senate to an urgent constitutional matter.

Hon. H. Carl Goldenberg: Honourable senators, the constitutional matter raised by Senator van Roggen last week is one of major significance. I listened to his presentation with great interest. As a good lawyer—and I am sorry he is not here to hear me say what I want to say—he quoted from precedents and cited authorities, many of whom I know or have known personally. I make exception, of course, of the barons who signed Magna Carta.

Senator van Roggen was followed by Senator Manning, to whom we must pay heed in these matters, because his long experience with the issues involved is almost unequalled. Then we heard Senator Forsey who, notwithstanding his humility and the deference he shows to others, remains one of our great and, fortunately, articulate constitutional authorities. His contributions in this area make him a national asset.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Goldenberg: Senator van Roggen drew the attention of the Senate to Bill 103 of the last session of the British Columbia Legislature, and, more particularly, to clause 14 of that bill, which declares void and unenforceable leases or other agreements entered into by the board of the Pacific National Exhibition unless these leases or agreements expire before December 31, 1975, subject, however, to approval and ratification or amendment by a new board. There is apparently no provision in the bill for compensation. The bill received third reading on April 18 of this year, but, according to Senator van Roggen, has not yet been presented to the Lieutenant-Governor for royal assent.

Honourable senators, that is all we have been told about the measure and nothing more. I for one am therefore not in any position to judge it. I know nothing about the leases or agreements affected by the bill or the considerations that led the Government of British Columbia to act as it did. As Senator Manning reminded us:

> . . . in issues of this kind the argument is never wholly one-sided. No government, provincial or federal, introduces legislation without some reason which, rightly or wrongly, it considers a valid reason for so doing.

I agree with Senator Manning. Accordingly, while in principle I object to what may be expropriation without just compensation, I take no stand on the measure in the present case because I have no facts. Whatever I say tonight is therefore based on neither approval nor disapproval of the bill in question.

In his opening remarks Senator van Roggen quoted extensively from newspaper reports of a criticism of the bill by Senator Lawson. Unfortunately, the senator was not here at that time. I am glad to see that he is here tonight, because I am sure he did not mean what he is reported to have said. It was that if the clause voiding the contracts is proclaimed, he would recommend to the Teamsters Union that they void their contracts. Surely the fact that a person or a group objects to a law that has been duly passed does not justify violation of another law by which they are governed. That way lies anarchy, and I know that Senator Lawson is not an anarchist. In fact, I do not think that an anarchist has ever been called to the Senate!

Hon. Mr. Smith: Not knowingly.

Hon. Mr. Croll: There are some who do pretty well.

Hon. Mr. Goldenberg: Honourable senators, what is Senator van Roggen proposing? This is what he says:

> I am advocating today that the federal government, through the medium of the Governor in Council, which is the federal cabinet, disallow this provincial legislation.

I find this rather confusing because the Governor in Council can only disallow an act of the legislature, and Senator van Roggen has told us that the bill has not yet been presented to the Lieutenant-Governor for his assent. It is therefore not legislation and there is nothing as yet to disallow. Nonetheless we must assume that the Lieutenant-Governor will in due course assent to the bill. It is only then that the matter of disallowance becomes relevant.

The powers of disallowance and reservation of provincial legislation are found in sections 55, 56, 57 and 90 of the British North America Act. They are unusual powers. The Governor General in Council—the act actually says "the Governor General" but the interpretation is that it must be "the Governor General in Council"—may disallow any provincial act within one year after it has been received from the Lieutenant-Governor of the province concerned. An authentic copy of all bills which have been assented to by the Lieutenant-Governor must be forwarded to the Secretary of State of Canada.

Disallowance is an executive act. It is not exercised by the Parliament of Canada but by the Governor in Council. It is not a function of Parliament. There is even controversy as to whether Parliament is competent to call upon the government to exercise or not to exercise the power of disallowance with respect to a particular provincial act.

Hon. Mr. Forsey: But it has done so.

Hon. Mr. Goldenberg: I know that Senator Forsey has expressed the view that Parliament has the power to advise on executive acts—I accept that—but, as Edward Blake said in 1890, in a debate on this very subject in the other place, it is "a power to be exercised with reserve."

The power of disallowance was one of the compromises worked out by the Fathers of Confederation at the Quebec Conference of 1864. It was a compromise between the advocates of legislative union and those who favoured a federal constitution. It has remained a part of our Constitution to this day. Since Confederation, 112 provincial acts have been disallowed. It is significant—and I want honourable senators to note this—it is significant that of these 112 acts, 96 were disallowed in the first 50 years of Confederation and only 16 in the following 50 years. The last time an act was disallowed was in 1943, that is, thirty years ago.

What provincial legislation did the Fathers of Confederation consider subject to disallowance? I am sure that both Senator van Roggen and Senator Forsey would agree to accept Sir John A. Macdonald as an authority on this point. He was not only the first Prime Minister of Canada but also the first Minister of Justice. On June 8, 1868, he reported to the Governor General in Council on the manner in which the duty of the federal government of examining provincial statutes should be fulfilled. This is a rather lengthy quotation, but I think it important for us to bear in mind what Macdonald set out right at the beginning. This is what he said:

● (2020)

> In deciding whether an Act of a provincial legislature should be allowed or sanctioned, the government must not only consider whether it affects the interests of the whole Dominion or not; but also, whether it be unconstitutional, whether it exceeds the jurisdiction conferred on local legislatures, and in cases where the jurisdiction is concurrent, whether it clashes with the legislation of the general Parliament.
>
> As it is of importance that the course of local legislation should be interfered with as little as possible, and the power of disallowance exercised with great caution, and only in cases where the law and the general interests of the Dominion imperatively demand it, the undersigned recommends that the following course be pursued:
>
> 'That on receipt, by your Excellency, of the Acts passed in any province, they be referred to the Minister of Justice for report, and that he, with all convenient speed, do report as to those Acts which he considers free from objection of any kind, and if such report be approved by your Excellency in Council that such approval be forthwith communicated to the provincial government.
>
> 'That he makes a separate report or separate reports, on those Acts which he may consider:—
>
> 1. As being altogether illegal or unconstitutional;
>
> 2. As illegal or unconstitutional in part;
>
> 3. In cases of concurrent jurisdiction, as clashing with the legislation of the general parliament;
>
> 4. As affecting the interests of the Dominion generally.
>
> 'And that in such report or reports he gives his reasons for his opinions.'

These were the classes of acts set out by Sir John A. Macdonald for consideration in relation to the exercise of the power of disallowance. Edward Blake, who was Minister of Justice in the eighteen-seventies, stated his position on the matter in these words:

> I inquire only as to this: is the law passed by the local legislature within the exclusive competence of > that legislature and not materially affecting Dominion interests? If so, the Ottawa Cabinet have no right to touch it. I admit—and I rejoice—that there is an appeal from the power that made that law, but that appeal is from the legislature which passed the law to the people who elected the legislature and who can elect another to their minds.

That was Blake's position.

On the history of the exercise of the power of disallowance, Dr. Gerald V. La Forest, now Assistant Deputy Attorney General of Canada, is our leading authority. In his comprehensive study on disallowance and reservation he divides that history into five periods. Applying the tests for disallowance set out by Macdonald, he shows that in the earlier periods the principal ground was that the legislation was ultra vires the provincial legislature and, in some cases, also affected dominion interests or policies. In due course and particularly after the amendment of the Supreme Court Act in 1891 to provide for references to that court, the practice developed of leaving the matter of ultra vires to the determination of the courts. The principal ground for disallowance thereafter was conflict with the interests of the dominion generally or with the operation of federal legislation.

Senator van Roggen now calls for disallowance of a measure on the ground of injustice in that it allegedly violates private property rights. Dr. LaForest shows that the power of disallowance on this sole ground was exercised in a number of cases but only in the period from 1881 to 1896.

Hon. Mr. Forsey: What about the MacNeil case?

Hon. Mr. Goldenberg: That was a special case. The law was disallowed because it overruled the decision of the Supreme Court. I think I am correct in that.

However, as I was saying, it was in the period from 1881 to 1896—and I shall bow to Senator Forsey and say there may have been one or two cases later, but no more—it was in that period that disallowance on this sole ground, that is injustice because of violation of private property rights, that the power was exercised.

Macdonald, having been returned to office with a resounding majority in 1878, became less concerned than he had previously appeared to be with the rights of the provinces. The government, in a change of policy, then gave heed to a number of petitions for disallowance on the ground of interference with private rights. The result was resentment by, and bitter controversy with, the provinces. Even Sir John Thompson—another eminent lawyer, who was later Prime Minister of Canada—as Macdonald's Minister of Justice appeared to disagree with this new policy. Thus, reporting in 1886 on an Ontario act which had been petitioned against as being a direct interference with private rights, he said:

> Without expressing any opinion as to whether the Act is a just measure or not, the undersigned is of opinion that it is within the undoubted legislative authority of the legislature of that province, and, therefore, respectfully recommends that it be left to its operation.

The practice of disallowing statutes for injustice, in this sense, did not continue for long. It definitely ended, with perhaps one or two exceptions, with the coming into power of Sir Wilfrid Laurier's government in 1896. Let me cite the opinions of two great lawyers who occupied the Justice portfolio in that government.

David Mills, who later became a Justice of the Supreme Court of Canada, dealing with a petition to disallow an Ontario statute in 1901, declared:

> The undersigned conceives that Your Excellency's government is not concerned with the policy of this measure. It is no doubt intra vires of the Legislature, and if it be unfair or unjust or contrary to the principles which ought to govern in dealing with private rights, the constitutional recourse is to the Legislature, and the acts of the Legislature may be ultimately judged by the people. The undersigned does not consider, therefore, that Your Excellency ought to exercise the power of disallowance in such cases.

Sir Allen Aylesworth, later a distinguished member of the Senate, speaking on disallowance as Minister of Justice in March 1909, said:

> The large measure of principle which was presented for consideration was simply whether or not the provincial legislature has the power, without control, to take one man's property and give it to another and to take away from the person injured any right of redress in the courts.

● (2030)

Remember, Sir Allen Aylesworth was not a subversive. He went on to say:

> I entertain in all honesty and sincerity the view that it is of vital consequence to the well-being of this Dominion that the rights of the provinces to legislate within the scope of their authority should not be interfered with, and that every provincial legislature, within the limits prescribed for it by the terms of the British North America Act, is and ought to be supreme. I believe that this is a principle of greater importance to the welfare of this Dominion as a whole than even the sacredness of private rights or of property ownership.

May I also quote the Right Honourable C. J. Doherty, who was Minister of Justice in the government of Sir Robert Borden. Before that he was a distinguished member of the bench of the Superior Court of Quebec. Refusing to recommend disallowance of two Ontario statutes which, it was charged, intended to take away or prejudice rights acquired by a company under its contract to which the province was in effect a party, he reported that:

> —the undersigned, while he does not hesitate to express strong disapproval of legislation which is intended to break down or take away legitimate contract rights without compensation, is not prepared to recommend this consideration as a ground for the exercise of the power of disallowance in the circumstances of this particular case. The legislature is directly responsible for the policy, merits and justice of the legislation. Its powers are plenary and exclusive within the limits by which they are confined, and although doubtless they must be exercised subject to the control of the Governor General in Council, that > control cannot in the opinion of the undersigned be constitutionally exercised upon the principle of substituting the judgment of the Dominion Executive for that of the local legislature, in relation to matters which are strictly confined to the field of local self-government.

The Honourable Ernest Lapointe, the last Minister of Justice to recommend a series of disallowances, shared the opinions I have cited. In 1938 he said:

> As I said last year, touching the question of unfairness or injustice, I share on this point the views expressed by Sir Allen Aylesworth when he was Minister of Justice. It is for the electors of the province to decide whether the legislation is unfair or unjust and to vote against the government that enacts such legislation.

To prove to you that I do not really belong to ancient times because of the dates of my citations, I will come closer to our own times. The Right Honourable John Diefenbaker, speaking as Prime Minister on the refusal of the government to disallow a Newfoundland statute said, in 1960:

> Whatever one's feelings with respect to legislation passed by provincial legislatures may be, however much one may dislike it, the gradual development has been that the federal government, through the Governor General in Council, does not exercise that power where there is on the face of it an apparent conformity with the legislative authority of the legislature which passes it.

Honourable senators, considering the evolution in the exercise of the power of disallowance and the opinions of the men responsible for that exercise over the years, I submit that Senator van Roggen cannot say to the federal government that there is a "clear duty imposed upon it by the B.N.A. Act"—those were his words—to disallow the measure to which he objects. If it affects purely local property rights and does not affect the rights and interests of people outside the province, I submit that disallowance would be contrary to the evolving conventions of our Constitution. Moreover, as Senator Manning pointed out, the cost in terms of disruption of federal-provincial relations would be excessive.

Now, I have said that the power of disallowance has not been exercised for 30 years. The last time it was exercised was on the recommendation of the Right Honourable Louis St. Laurent in the matter of Alberta legislation affecting the sale of land to "Enemy Aliens and Hutterites". That is how the legislation read. But, the fact that it has not been exercised does not mean that it is no longer a part of the Constitution. Of course it is still a part of the Constitution.

In the absence of enforceable constitutional guarantees, disallowance may at some time be necessary to protect fundamental civil liberties or minority rights. It may be necessary to protect the rights of residents of other provinces who have no political remedy against the government responsible for the legislation. It might also have to be used in a case where provincial legislation interferes seriously with the operation of federal legislation and policy and the problem cannot be solved by intergovernmental compromise. I submit, however, that, if used at all, it must be only in the most unusual circumstances. Otherwise, in the words of Professor D. V. Smiley, a student of Canadian federalism, it "would almost inevitably inhibit the kinds of federal-provincial collaboration that are necessary if the federal system is to operate in a tolerably effective manner." This, honourable senators, is a risk we cannot afford to take.

Hon. Mr. Forsey: I wonder if the Honourable Senator Goldenberg, to whom I apologize for my interruptions, would mind answering one question. What would he say about the possibility of the exercise of, or the desirability of exercising, the power of disallowance in case of a provincial legislature extending its own life for a prolonged period which, of course, it can perfectly well do within its powers? In fact, provincial legislatures have repeatedly done this, though not, I admit, for any prolonged period. Would he consider it desirable that the power should be exercised if the legislature in effect took away from the electors of the province their power of dealing with the legislature?

Hon. Mr. Goldenberg: It might be desirable, but I think it might also be dangerous. Of course, this was one of the possibilities for which we wished to provide in the political rights section of the Victoria Charter, which was rejected. There was a specific provision. As I say, it might be desirable but I think it would be highly dangerous unless, of course, a province decided to abolish elections.

Hon. Mr. Forsey: Surely if the legislature were to extend its own life for a prolonged period it might be necessary to protect the rights of the electors to elect a new legislature within a reasonable time.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: What about the federal Parliament? It did it once. What is the remedy?

• (2040)

Hon. Mr. Forsey: Oh yes, but we have a constitutional provision for that, in section 91, head 1.

Hon. Mr. Laird: I am still confused. I received the impression from Senator van Roggen that there was machinery available, presumably in the B.N.A. Act, to, in effect, disallow a bill even though it had not received royal assent. That is the impression that I received. Is there any such machinery?

Hon. Mr. Goldenberg: I think that Senator van Roggen had in mind the power of reservation. The Lieutenant-Governor does not give his assent but reserves it for the Governor General in Council to decide whether or not it should be assented to. The Governor in Council can assent in lieu of the Lieutenant-Governor, or do nothing, and the legislation, in the latter case, would be inoperative.

Hon. Edward M. Lawson: Honourable senators, I think I should speak to this very briefly, since it appears that I was somewhat responsible for causing this mini-political storm which took place in British Columbia.

I want at the outset to thank Senator Goldenberg for his crash course on the Constitution and on the subject of disallowance, because it is something about which I am totally unfamiliar. I did not have the benefit of any legal authorities, or the excellent material that we have had before us this evening. I was simply relying on my knowing the difference between right or wrong, and my reaction on the panel was a matter of instinct. We were discussing what was going to happen in the year 1980 on the collective labour-management scene. What about contracts? What pressures would take place, and so on? I was trying to illustrate or dramatize, and perhaps overdramatize, the seriousness that would take place in the collective market place if the government philosophy of contempt of contract were to prevail throughout the whole of the community. In effect, the legislation, as I knew and understood it, simply cancelled out, or terminated, or declared null and void, long-term contracts.

I had the advantage, or disadvantage, of having some time prior been involved in negotiations of one of those contracts for a football club. These were not unconscionable contracts that were made privately or secretly under the table where the legislature was compelled to correct an injustice. The terms and conditions of the football club contract were as tough, from the point of view of the penalties imposed on the football club, as any in Canada.

Regarding the contract that the Vancouver Canucks Hockey Club had with the Pacific National Exhibition, the terms imposed on the hockey club were probably as tough or tougher than the top five in Canada. The arrangement with the jockey club, with the racing commission, was a long-term contract, a lease granted in lieu of the principals of the B.C. Jockey Club, or whatever its official title is, putting up $3 million or $4 million of its own money in exchange for the long-term lease. And very quickly, on third reading one day, the day before the Legislature was to prorogue, there came an amendment that upon proclamation declared null and void all of these contracts.

My concern was the fact that this could be done and, more importantly, the philosophy, if it were allowed to permeate in the community, of contempt of contracts and no respect for contracts.

My point is: If this were to take place, what would stop our trade unions from adopting the same philosophy? What kind of chaos would develop as a result of that? What would happen with the banks? Should banks provide money under long-term mortgages at 5, 5¼, or 5½ per cent, and have to pay more to obtain money than they are receiving? Why could they not cancel out their long-term contracts and raise the rates to recover?

That is a terrible philosophy to permeate throughout the whole of society. It is a philosophy of no respect for contracts. I was pointing this out somewhat with tongue in cheek, but I was not unmindful of the seriousness of the principle involved.

I went on to say, in predicting what would happen in 1980 and the chaos that would result if they proclaimed cancellation of these contracts, that they would be replaced in 1980 by a right wing reactionary government which would take away the right to strike, would impose binding arbitration, would take over trucking companies and make them a public utility, and make the drivers civil servants, and we would live happily ever after. But they did not point out that part. The press only pointed out on the front pages the threat to void all contracts.

I knew immediately I was in trouble for two reasons: first, because of the fact that the newspapers would editorially be in support of any senator and, secondly, because one of them was even so bold as to call for the need of a Senate in British Columbia, saying this could not have happened had there been an active Senate in British Columbia, that Parliament here would not have allowed that kind of legislation to go through unchallenged. So I knew that I was in trouble there.

I do think it is a very important principle. The fact that it has been so dramatized in the press, that so much concern has been expressed, that Senator van Roggen chose to raise it in this chamber, and was sufficiently concerned to do so—and we did have a brief discussion prior to his doing that—that the comments of Senator Forsey have received wide public dissemination, and that Senator Goldenberg and others have expressed their views—all this has served its purpose and had its effect.

I had occasion in the last 10 days to have a meeting with the Attorney General for the Province of British Columbia, and the Premier, to discuss very briefly the concerns that were expressed. The Attorney General is a man of principle, and I hold him in high regard for that. The Premier of British Columbia, in addition to being a man of principle, is also a fair man. Now that they are more aware, as a result of the attention focused on the matter, of the seriousness of their attack on the principle, I am satisfied that the right and fair thing will be done, and it will be unnecessary to go so far as to ask the government to impose disallowance.

One amusing sidelight is that the legislation, if proclaimed, would force a renegotiation, presumably by the PNE, of the contracts with all these other parties.

One other thing they overlooked is that the PNE lives and exists as a result of the long-term lease it has with the City of Vancouver. Upon proclamation it may not even have the status to do anything. I think that a serious principle was involved. Sufficient public concern has been expressed, and the Senate has discharged its responsibility by expressing its concern for principle. In view of the assurance I have personally received from the Premier and the Attorney General of British Columbia, the matter should be left to rest there.

The Hon. the Speaker: As no other honourable senator wishes to participate in the debate, the inquiry is considered as having been debated.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Wednesday, July 4, 1973

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

HARBOUR COMMISSIONS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-21, to amend the Harbour Commissions Act (Nanaimo Harbour Commission).

Bill read first time.

Hon. Donald Cameron moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading on Tuesday next.

Motion agreed to.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Hon. Paul Martin tabled:

Copies of Order in Council P.C. 1972-1611, dated July 27, 1972, amending class 8 in schedule B to the income tax regulations.

Copies of the Report of the Anti-Dumping Tribunal respecting the effects of footwear imports on Canadian production of like goods, dated April 1973.

Copies of a directive from Treasury Board to deputy heads of departments and heads of agencies on the language requirements of positions in the Public Service, together with copies of Public Service Bulletin No. 73-12 respecting the staffing of bilingual positions, both dated June 29, 1973.

NATIONAL PARKS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—THIRD READING

Hon. John J. Connolly moved the third reading of Bill S-4, to amend the National Parks Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

CRIMINAL CODE AND NATIONAL DEFENCE ACT (TOTAL ABOLITION OF CAPITAL PUNISHMENT)

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Macdonald, seconded by the Honourable Senator Flynn, P.C., for the second reading of the Bill S-8, intituled: "An Act to amend the Criminal Code and the National Defence Act (total abolition of capital punishment)".—(Honourable Senator McIlraith, P.C.).

Hon. Mr. McIlraith: Stand.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Honourable senators, I rise on a point of order. Senator McIlraith has asked that this item stand. I have read what he said last evening in this connection and I am somewhat puzzled by the words he uttered. I should like to have clarification, either from Senator McIlraith or from the Chair, as to the exact purport of his remarks.

I asked Senator McIlraith last evening whether this order was going to stand for very long, and his reply was:

> Honourable senators, I think the answer to the question posed by the Leader of the Opposition has to be a simple and direct, "Yes, it will stand for a considerable time."

His reply suggests that it is within his own discretion to decide whether or not this order should stand indefinitely. I am not too sure whether that is what he meant. Of course, I have to agree that at the end of his remarks he said:

> For that reason, I ask that the order stand, and I expect to ask the forbearance of honourable senators when it is called again to have it stand until we know better what is happening with the bill before the other place.

That seems to be a tempering of his previous remarks. I would not want to let the comment of the Honourable Senator McIlraith stand on the record as meaning that it is within the discretion of any honourable senator to adjourn a debate indefinitely. I know that some years ago authorities expressed the opinion that it was within the discretion of any honourable senator who had moved the adjournment of a debate to keep the item on the Order Paper indefinitely, whether or not the Senate as a whole or any honourable senator wanted to continue the debate. I have never felt that that was a satisfactory interpretation of our rules.

I do not know if that is what the honourable senator meant. If he did not—and I am suggesting that he probably did not—I would like the Chair to give a ruling on this eventually. He may have good reason for moving the adjournment of the debate to three weeks from now, and if the house is in agreement, very well. However, to say that it is within his own discretion to delay debate indefinitely, whatever may be his reason, and whatever validity there may be in his reasoning, is a principle I doubt we should agree with.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: One could block any bill if this were the case.

Hon. Mr. McIlraith: Honourable senators, I am very glad to have the opportunity to clear up any misunderstanding any remarks of mine may have caused in the mind of the honourable Leader of the Opposition. With great respect and deference to him, may I read the record of yesterday's Hansard. I think it is important that we should read it.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I did read it.

Hon. Mr. McIlraith: The item was called and I said, "Stand." It goes on:

> HON. MR. FLYNN: May I ask whether this order is going to stand for very long?

That was the form of his question. It was not whether the proponent or the one in whose name the debate stood adjourned was going to ask it to stand, but ". . . whether this order is going to stand for very long?" I replied—

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Continue with what I said.

Hon. Mr. McIlraith: I listened attentively to the honourable senator, but may I—

Hon. Mr. Flynn: What I am suggesting is that you read everything I said before you continue.

Hon. Mr. McIlraith: May I continue my remarks in an uninterrupted way?

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Go ahead.

Hon. Mr. McIlraith: I listened with great care and considerable interest to the honourable senator, and I claim the same right, at least, to be allowed to continue without interruption in my reply to his remarks, which indicated a misunderstanding of what I said last night. My reply to his inquiry, "May I ask whether this order is going to stand for very long?" was:

> Honourable senators, I think the answer to the question posed by the Leader of the Opposition has to be a simple and direct, "Yes, it will stand for a considerable time."

I then went on at considerable length—some might say too long—to explain why I thought it appropriate that this order stand for a considerable time. I concluded my remarks as quoted by the honourable senator today:

> For that reason, I ask that the order stand, and I expect to ask the forbearance of honourable senators when it is called again to have it stand until we know better what is happening with the bill before the other place.

I hope the remarks read in that way are perfectly clear. I do not for one moment suggest, nor claim any right, to have it stand as of right at the say-so of myself. Such arrogance is quite contrary to my nature. I do, however, respectfully suggest to this honourable body that it may be necessary to stand it from time to time for a considerable length of time, until we know what happens with the government bill before the other place on a similar subject to the bill now before this house. I hope I made it clear that I make no claim whatever to have it stand as of right, and I think my reference to asking the forbearance of honourable senators made that very clear.

● (1410)

Hon. Mr. Grosart: Honourable senators, on the point of order, I am delighted that Senator McIlraith has cleared up what would appear to be a misunderstanding. I agree that the Leader of the Opposition was perfectly within his rights in taking the meaning he took from the very clear answer that Senator McIlraith gave to the question. Senator Flynn had asked whether this order was going to stand for very long, and the answer from the senator who moved the adjournment was, "Yes, it will stand for a considerable time." The assumption there was the right of an honourable senator, in adjourning a debate on a motion, to hold it up indefinitely.

I suggest that this goes much beyond the present case. We all know that the mere device of an adjournment has been used in this place to stand debate for a long long time.

On the point of order, I would ask that there be a ruling from Her Honour as to the meaning of an adjournment of the debate and the rights that may or may not flow to the senator who adjourns the debate. I would point out that our rules are not awfully clear on this. As a matter of fact, under our rules there is no such thing, ipso facto, as "adjournment" of the debate; it is officially a "postponement" of the debate. Honourable senators will find this in rule 46(c), which provides for the postponement of a debate to a certain day. Under rule 36(2) a motion to adjourn a debate shall be deemed to be a motion to postpone that debate to the day specified in the motion or, if no day is so specified, to the next sitting day.

It is clear, therefore, that our rules merely say that they will regard a motion to adjourn a debate as a motion coming under rule 46 to postpone the debate to the next sitting, if no date is named.

It so happens that on the Order Paper now there is a motion of mine relating to a bill. It has been postponed for months, because the adjournment is in the name of Senator Molgat. I understand his reasons, but the situation has been that here by practice if a senator adjourns a motion we are powerless to do anything about it. It comes up, and what will happen? If I wish to speak on the motion which Senator McIlraith adjourned, I ask honourable senators what would be my position if I rose. Senator McIlraith would move, as he moved yesterday, that the adjournment be continued. That is what "stand" means; it means "I move the motion that the debate be adjourned." If he has a motion before the house, I presume I would be entitled to rise and say I wish to speak on the motion. What position would the Senate take on that?

Therefore, I suggest this should be clarified and we should have a ruling from Her Honour, if this is Her Honour's interpretation of the practice and procedure of this place, that the motion to adjourn does not give the right to any senator indefinitely to hold up a bill.

Senator McIlraith has expressly said this was not his intention, but the words as they stand here might indicate that that was the interpretation held by certain senators. Certainly, the practice of the management of the house has been to hold up indefinitely debate on certain motions—and I am not saying improperly, but it has been the practice to do so—by using this device of an adjournment in the name of a certain senator.

For that reason, honourable senators, I would ask that there be a formal ruling on this so that we will be quite clear in the future what the situation is when a debate on a motion is adjourned, and a senator wishes to speak, even though the senator who moved the adjournment does not wish to speak.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Honourable senators, I had not intended to take part in this discussion, but it seems to me that Senator Grosart's observations do call for some recognition.

I have no difficulty in understanding what Senator McIlraith intended yesterday, when he asked in these words:

> For that reason, I ask that the order stand, and I expect to ask the forbearance of honourable senators when it is called again to have it stand until we know better what is happening with the bill before the other place.

These words clearly indicate what Senator McIlraith had in mind and what his attitude with regard to the primacy of his position in this matter was.

I am sure that if anyone had said to him yesterday, "Well, notwithstanding the fact that the motion is in your name and notwithstanding the fact that you are asking that it stand further, in view of the fact that I wish to speak, will you give way?", he would have given way.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: No, no.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: What happens if he does not?

Hon. Mr. Martin: May I just finish? I think the practice in all our debates since I have been here is that when a motion is standing or when a matter is standing in the name of a particular senator and is called, if he is not ready to go on and another senator wishes to speak, the senator in whose name the matter stands always gives way to the person who would like to take part in the debate. I do not think that any of us are under any misapprehension on this point. Surely that has been our practice. Surely it does not require a formal ruling.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Why not?

Hon. Mr. Martin: Surely we all recognize that that is the rule. And Senator McIlraith, who himself is no mean authority on procedure, even though it may be in another place, would, I am sure, be the first to understand this. He was trying clearly to indicate why he thought that he should not go on in view of the fact that another bill on this matter was before the other house in one of its committees and that he would prefer to deal with the matter before this house—

Hon. Mr. Flynn: And nobody else should go on?

Hon. Mr. Martin: —only after—

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Nobody should?

Hon. Mr. Martin: —only after that matter in the other place had been disposed of. But not that nobody else should.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Oh, sure! Read the rest of what he said.

Hon. Mr. Martin: I have read it.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: No, you did not read it.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Well, my honourable friend says that, no, I did not. He knows what I have done better than I know myself what I have done, obviously.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Oh, come on!

Hon. Mr. Flynn: That is easy for you to say.

Hon. Mr. Martin: But it is clear that if someone said today to Senator McIlraith, in whose name this motion still stands, "I would like to speak on the bill standing in the name of Senator John Macdonald," there is no doubt that Senator McIlraith would give way, as we all would.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: What if he says no?

Hon. Mr. Martin: Under our practice he must—

Hon. Mr. Choquette: What if he says no?

Hon. Mr. Martin: If I may finish—

Hon. Mr. Choquette: What if he says no? You are getting away from the question. We are asking for a ruling in the event that in a similar case the senator would not yield. Here you are going around in circles, telling us how nice the senators should be and how nice you think they will be in such an event. I would like you to bring your argument to bear on item 9.

Hon. Mr. Martin: I would like to finish, if I may.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Yes, but before you finish, look at item No. 9 on the Orders of the Day. That has been going on for some time now.

Hon. Mr. Martin: I have allowed Senator Choquette to intervene by way of a question but not to comment. However, I do not object. I am sure I have stated the situation correctly.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: No, you have not.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: No!

Hon. Mr. Martin: If there is any honourable senator who wishes to speak on the bill standing in the name of Senator John Macdonald, that is his privilege and he has the right to ask that he be allowed to do so now. I would think, personally, for the reason Senator McIlraith gave, that that would not be a wise course—

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Oh, oh!

Hon. Mr. Martin: —in view of the importance of the measure covered by this bill and in view of the importance of the measure covered by the bill which is now in the other place and which ultimately will come to us. So there is no real confusion here.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: It was done before you started to speak.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Will my honourable friend allow me to continue? He continually, he persistently interrupts. He never gives anyone a chance.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I am trying to keep you on the track.

Hon. Mr. Martin: There he is again! This motion is in the name of Senator McIlraith. If anyone wishes to speak on it now, then, in my judgment, it is quite clear that he would have the right to do so, and the senator should yield. As to whether this would be a wise course, or not, that is another matter. I do not think there is any difficulty; I think we all understand the practice very well. Certainly there was no intention on Senator McIlraith's part to hold up—

• (1420)

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Why do you speak for Senator McIlraith? He can speak for himself.

Hon. Mr. Martin: —any legitimate discussion of this matter. I speak for Senator McIlraith because it has been suggested that he had an ulterior motive, and I know that Senator McIlraith has no such ulterior motive in this matter; he conforms to the rule, and I do not think there is any difficulty in our understanding what the practice and the tradition is.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Are you giving the ruling that the Honourable Senator Grosart asked should be given by the Speaker?

Hon. Mr. Martin: If I did not like Senator Choquette, I would think that he was serious in his question.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: It follows your comment.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: Honourable senators, because my remarks have been misunderstood, I think I have the right to speak a second time to clarify my remarks. I did not suggest any ulterior motive on the part of Senator McIlraith. I am not greatly concerned with the particular case presently before us, but I am concerned with the principle. The remarks we have just heard from the Leader of the Government make it perfectly clear that he does not have the whole situation in his mind, because he used the phrase "that leave would be given," if a senator rose and said, "I wish to speak." Now, "leave" means unanimous consent, and that is the whole point I am making. His phrase was, "that leave would be given." If we have to depend upon leave being given, then clearly the right exists for a senator to hold up the debate indefinitely, because he himself, as one senator, could refuse leave. Perhaps the Honourable Leader of the Government has not read the rules lately—

Hon. Mr. Flynn: He has never read them.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: —and maybe that is not what he meant to say, but that is what he did say, that it would require leave for a senator to assert the right to speak on such an occasion.

I therefore repeat my request for a ruling on this matter so that there will be no problem about it in the future. I think it is essential.

The Leader of the Opposition referred to an opinion that had been given earlier, and I am sure he is referring to the fact that a former Clerk of the Parliaments did, at least verbally if not in writing, express the opinion that the senator who had moved the adjournment had the right indefinitely to control the debate. I say that because the Honourable Senator Martin was not here. I did not hear the former Clerk say it, but it was repeated to me by one of our officials as a statement he had made. I am not personally sure that he did make it.

But because of that conclusion I repeat my request for a ruling from Her Honour.

Hon. Mr. Prowse: Honourable senators, on the point of order, I doubt very much if the ruling is necessary. Nevertheless, if it is requested, I am sure Her Honour the Speaker will be glad to give it.

But it seems to me, honourable senators, that people as well versed in the rules as the members on the other side, who are raising the objection, should realise that a very simple motion that is seldom used—that is, "the previous question"—can certainly put an end to any obstruction of this kind and force a vote on a matter. If I were to stand now and say, "I move the previous question," that could be debated. Nothing else could be debated. There would then, I presume, be a division on it, and then there would be a vote on the main motion without further debate.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: That is exactly what we are trying to avoid.

Hon. Mr. Prowse: Yes, but the point is you had this. As far as the further debate is concerned and on the point of order, let me say in this regard as far as the principle is concerned that no member under our rules at the present time, as has been alleged, can keep the house from voting, which is the important aspect. I am not too sure that the debates change the minds of many, but simply give us the chance to express our own personal opinions. I wish, however, to speak on this question when it is before us and it is the proper time to do so. I wish to support the motion, as I am also aware that in the other place there will be a motion similar to this in the amendments to the bill which is being debated in committee. If it has not been returned from the committee it will be returned. There are other items attached to that which do not appear here, which are probably important and on which I would wish to speak. I do not wish to weary the house by speaking on this motion at this time and then being faced with the necessity, in order to deal with the other matters, to again impose myself upon the house within a very brief period of time. Naturally, it seems to me that the proper procedure should be that when we find out what the other house has said we deal with it in whatever manner we wish. We would then refer this bill to committee after such debate as we deem to be expedient. Out of committee we would bring such legislation as contains the best of their bill and that of the Honourable Senator Macdonald. In the meantime, if we feel we are being frustrated and prevented from voting, which is the important point, the Leaders of the Opposition and the Government, together with the Honourable Senator Grosart, who are more familiar with these rules than I—at least they regularly hold themselves out as being experts on the rules—must be aware of the fact that the provision regarding "the previous question" is there and always protects our right to a vote.

Hon. Mr. Benidickson: Honourable senators, I wish simply to speak with regard to two points. One is that I have no objection to having a ruling on this question. I wish to point out, however, that Senator Grosart himself rose without asking leave to speak a second time. During the short time that I have been here I have found that by courtesy there are very few objections when there may perhaps be contraventions of the formal rules, including this one of providing the courtesy—

Hon. Mr. Grosart: Could I ask the honourable senator a question? Is he aware that under our rules a senator may rise without asking leave when he considers that he has been misinterpreted? Read the rules.

Hon. Mr. Benidickson: May I say that the senator did not say that he was misinterpreted.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: I did.

Hon. Mr. Benidickson: He simply said he assumed courtesy of the house—

Hon. Mr. Grosart: I didn't say anything of the kind.

Hon. Mr. Benidickson: —to speak a second time. He did not rise, as I think he should have if he wanted to be formal, and say, "I speak on a point of privilege," or "in contravention to something that was improper to have been said against me." I have never in my experience seen a situation in which a senator desiring to take precedence over the adjourner of a debate has not been given that privilege. That is the courtsey of this chamber, which is not extraordinarily controversial. I was impressed by Senator Prowse pointing out our opportunities in the event we feel controversial or aggrieved or that we should depart from the normal courtesy of this house. My other point is that the Leader of the Opposition did not rise, but he did say in interrupting the comments of the admirable Leader of the Government that everyone on this side supports him at all times. That again has not been my experience in this chamber. On this point I perfectly agree with Senator Grosart. If he wants clarification of the ruling, that is a proper request to be made to Madam Speaker, and I support him in that request. The practical point is: who wants to speak at this time? I am sure that my colleague, Senator McIlraith, would make it possible for him to speak.

● (1430)

Hon. Mr. Croll: Honourable senators, it is obvious from what has already been said that the Chair has not much choice. An opinion should be forthcoming. Is it a matter of right, or is it a matter of courtesy? It is as simple as that. The Chair should consider the request and let us have an opinion in due course.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, this is a point on which I am certainly not prepared to make any ruling at the present moment. I would have to do a good deal of research, as I am not as familiar as other honourable senators with the opinion which apparently has been expressed and which was referred to by Senator Flynn and Senator Grosart.

I should like to look into these matters. I propose to consider the request for a ruling, and, after making a thorough investigation and reading any debates on the subject which may be in existence, decide whether or not a ruling is necessary. I shall advise honourable senators accordingly.

This is a matter on which I should perhaps be more familiar than I am. I would therefore welcome from honourable senators any further opinion which might help me to reach a decision.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Exclude the courtesy question, otherwise you may have 15 speeches like those we have heard.

Hon. Mr. Benidickson: Is that a speech?

Hon. Mr. Choquette: No, it is a suggestion.

Order stands.

BRITISH NORTH AMERICA ACTS, 1867 TO 1965

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Grosart, seconded by the Honourable Senator O'Leary, for the second reading of the Bill S-3, intituled: "An Act to amend the British North America Acts, 1867 to 1965 (Yukon and Northwest Territories Senate representation)".—(Honourable Senator Molgat).

Hon. Mr. Molgat: Honourable senators, I should like this matter to stand. I have had further discussions with Senator Grosart. I have no objection if other senators wish to speak.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: It is not the same situation as that applying to Senator McIlraith.

Order stands.

THE SENATE

NEED FOR REFORM—DEBATE CONTINUED

The Senate resumed from Tuesday, June 19, the adjourned debate on the inquiry of Senator Croll calling the attention of the Senate to the urgent public need in Canada for Senate reform now.

[Translation]

Hon. Renaude Lapointe: Honourable senators, after only nineteen months of participating in the work of the Senate, it seems daring of me to enter this debate, particularly after listening recently to such a thorough account by Senator Langlois. Having first taken care to highlight the numerous accomplishments and various merits of this house, Senator Langlois then outlined the proposed reforms before mentioning those he considers desirable, and my views on these reforms are almost identical with his.

Since the voice of parliamentary and constitutional experience has also been heard in the sound speeches made by several of our eminent colleagues, I shall restrict myself to a few modest, down-to-earth remarks which may appear naïve and impertinent to you, as they are aimed at reforming senators rather than the Senate. They have to do mainly with regular attendance at sessions and with the work spirit which we should all strive to display if we are to restore the good name of the Senate in the eyes of our colleagues in the other place as well as of the general public.

Everyone is aware of the scornful character of the attacks the honourable member for Winnipeg North Centre, Mr. Stanley Knowles, launches regularly when he proposes the abolition of the Senate. The journalists are then far more eager to call attention to his words than they are to the worthiest speeches made in the Upper House. By the way, it must be pointed out that this year, a woman, the honourable member for Louis-Hébert, Mrs. Morin, was the first to come to the defence of the Senate, followed by another French-Canadian member, the honourable member for Nipissing, Mr. Blais. But, as witnessed at the time of the negative vote held in January last on the participation of the Senate in the special committee of inquiry on food costs, we have a good many detractors in the other place, among others Mr. Diefenbaker, who gave vent yesterday to disgraceful critcism of the Upper House, and that in the very area where the Leader of the Government in the Senate lives.

As for those who shape public opinion, they seldom give us their support. Going over the most recent newspaper clippings concerning the Senate, I was struck, once again unpleasantly, by the superciliously ironical tone of most of the thirty or some editorials which followed the resounding speech of Senator Croll. That acrimony was obviously not directed against him—for he must be, and was largely, congratulated for having belled the cat and having brought up the matter anew—but against the Senate generally.

Once more, my former journalist colleagues—mainly English-speaking—have used their acute sense of periphrasis to stigmatize in vitriolic terms the Upper Chamber and its occupants:

> Politic infirmary, garbage dump, useless appendage, rubber stamp, undemocratic anachronism, old gentlemen's club, house of patronage and sinecure, constitutional aberration, lush pasture for old political warhorses, graceful way of cleaning deadwood from a P.M.'s cabinet, and, finally, the least cruel and most sincere:

> a featherbed secretly desired by many who criticize it.

As another reporter recently wrote:

> The very intensity of these attacks seems to be an important element in the fashioning of a senatorial togetherness.

It is therefore as a reaction to those attacks and to try and correct—maybe more in surface than in depth—such a regrettable situation that I make these few remarks which I hope will be well taken by everyone.

As regards sitting attendance, it is to be regretted that some colleagues are behaving like school truants. Some come here just to have their name down on the book and disappear after 10 or 15 minutes, while others, for the same reason, arrive only at the end of the sittings. Also, some colleagues disappear for several weeks and are to be seen only on great occasions and justify their absence by explanations whose value or credibility stretches the imagination.

You can imagine what impression is felt by the public when only 20 to 25 senators are seen in attendance and sometimes as few as 12 or 13 during certain speeches, particularly when they threaten to be rather lengthy. The public can also see that quite often the rules of courtesy are violated when six or seven private conversations are taking place during a colleague's speech, and sometimes loudly enough to inconvenience the speaker. I admit with you that we do not all command the same degree of skill to hold the attention and that the matters discussed are not equally interesting. However, we should make an effort to be present, to remain silent and patient, to avoid falling asleep if only to show to visitors a better image than is traditionally linked with a dignified dozing old man.

It is indeed quite seldom that our sittings are unduly long. It even happens that they are rather too short and that they hardly justify the staging and trips which they require. This unfortunately can provide valid reasons for those who would rather not bother for so little.

Attendance at the meetings of the various standing committees sometimes leaves room for improvement. While the membership of each committee has been reduced to 20, several chairmen cannot rely on more than six or seven faithful participants, since the others are satisfied with seeing their name appear on the list as they never take part in the proceedings and are very seldom present.

Devotion to work is obviously related to the interest shown in the sittings of the Senate as well as those of the standing committees. Here is one example drawn from my own brief experience. In the Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, the inquiry on the parole system led to the presentation of more than 120 briefs, many of which were very informative although rather dry. They required hours of reading on the part of those who wished to ask relevant questions of the authors of those briefs subsequently called upon to give evidence before the committee. Too few members set their heart on doing that. It would be surprising if such failings never had to be deplored in other committees.

On another level, Senate members are invited to various provincial or national caucuses and to all special caucuses during which a minister states his policy on whatever bill he intends to introduce, or on such or such difficulties calling for advice or solutions. As a member of the Liberal party, I must say that, except for the Wednesday national Liberal caucus, where the Senate representation is usually satisfactory, senators seldom attend their provincial caucus—I refer to the Quebec caucus of course—or the special caucuses which, nevertheless, give plenty of first-hand information and allow us to understand the core of problems.

Contrarily to what the honourable member for Crowfoot, Jack Horner, said on January 26, when he recommended that no senator should have the right to take part in a caucus of any party, I believe the attendance at those caucuses, most of which since the advent of the minority government, have to take place from seven to eight and may last until nine o'clock, sets much sounder and much friendlier bonds with our colleagues of the other place who generally appreciate deeply our presence. I am in a position to realize that since I consider it a duty to attend those meetings as regularly as possible. Those meetings are a great help to newcomers, specially those who, like me, have no parliamentary experience, as they help them understand the bills to be introduced and make them aware of the numerous objections such bills may give rise to outside, as well as among the members. I believe indeed that it is wrong to act as if we were divorced when, on the contrary, anything that is done over there should concern us. Is the situation the same on the opposition side? If it is better in terms of attendance at meetings, we would be pleased to find out.

Another one of my remarks has to do with the meager attendance at the royal assent of bills, which is not too edifying and makes us the object of well deserved gibes. There again, in the name of a certain respect for decorum, several senators, particularly from Quebec and Ontario, could delay their departure by a few hours without in any way spoiling their long weekend. It is, however, obvious that if these ceremonies took place on either Tuesday or Wednesday instead of late Thursday afternoon, more seats would be occupied.

● (1440)

[English]

This, perhaps, would not please the Montreal Gazette for, according to that paper, which is decidedly allergic to the Senate, an empty Senate would be easier to reform or abolish than would a full one.

But first we should define "senatorship," having first asked our honourable colleague Senator O'Leary whether he was serious or whether he was joking 30 years ago when he uttered this now famous sentence, "A senatorship is not a job; it is a title." What he did afterwards certainly does not fit with his definition, for he performed well and is still doing a fine job.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Miss Lapointe: For my part, I have been asked to come and work here, and the one who asked me to do so was not joking.

The trouble is that for many of us a senatorship is a part-time job, with the main occupation sometimes preventing a fuller dedication to the secondary one. This leads me to think that a mandate of about seven years, as was suggested by the Honourable Senator Manning, should be introduced, that mandate being renewable or not renewable by an impartial jury of honourable senators, according to the production and merits of the candidate. This would appear to me to be a logical and efficient way of maintaining a spirit of alertness among the recruits who, naturally, should be young enough to contemplate a second, third, and even a fourth active term of office.

Another of our shortcomings resides in the fact that the public—and here I am not only referring to the illiterate public; far from it—is kept amazingly unaware of the kind of work the Senate has to perform. We soon realize that that is the case when we are invited to address even a select audience.

[Translation]

Have we ever considered carrying out a discreet but effective campaign during which all of us would accept as many invitations as possible to speak about the Senate before social clubs and other important organizations, either early or late in the week?

And we all know that a single television exposure to tell the people about the Senate is worth more than 10,000 words! I have had this experience on a number of occasions and I must say that the people's reaction has always been more than sympathetic.

Would it not be possible either through interviews, panel discussions on radio or TV to inform Canadians of the usefulness of the Senate, what it is doing and what it could do, and to ask the public what they would like it to be? Moreover, why not suggest to our respective political organizations that one of us be invited once in a while to speak to the public within the scope of "The Nation's Business" or other such politically-oriented programs.

● (1450)

[English]

Apart from our own publicity, another role in which we are said to be notoriously bad, according to Senator Stanbury, is that of communicators with our constituencies. How right he is. Not five per cent of the Canadian people know the name of their senator. There are some notable exceptions, of course, adds Senator Stanbury, but he admits that most of us, including himself, have left the job of communication of government programs and relevant political activities to the members of Parliament and other elements of the party organization. For example, the policy of bilingualism could be explained perhaps more freely, in a more relaxed manner, by senators than by M.P.s, and some of our colleagues rightly suggested that.

It is true that every one of us—Liberals, Conservatives or Independents—could do much better about establishing some liaison with the people, in demystifying the image and function of a senator which is too closely linked with that of a millionaire playing golf or dozing in his red leather armchair. Another useful thing for the Senate to do would be to keep a monthly list of the commitments of every senator on outside duty. We generally ignore the whereabouts of our colleagues in that respect, and I feel that we should be kept informed of these activities. It would help us to counteract vicious propaganda.

[Translation]

With regard to the rules and procedure, I leave it to the parliamentary veterans to suggest changes which they deem appropriate. There was something, however, which was puzzling me—the debate just ended has partially replied to my question—the fact that topics for discussions are on the order paper for months and months without any further attention being paid to them. I was wondering if this was due to procrastination as Senator Croll once suggested or if such inertia was caused by the lack of preparation on the part of those who moved the adjournment of this or that debate. Either way, these items on the order paper or these notices of inquiry remaining many months in the Minutes of the Proceedings smell terribly of dust.

No doubt I will shock many by suggesting that time has come to drop the title of honourable which to the ears of an important segment of the population sounds a little too pompous and dignified, thus antagonizing many. What we would lose in prestige we would gain no doubt in popularity.

Another comment about an altogether different issue. So as to restore better balance between two languages, which is now tipped at least 90 per cent in favour of English, it would be advisable if French-speaking senators were to express themselves more often in French. I take this opportunity to congratulate and thank the bilingual English-speaking senators for their occasional contribution and I add that such contribution is greatly appreciated.

I would also consider the possibility of holding more sittings during the same week, even if that meant a possibility of no sittings during the following week—which would save time and money.

At the outset of my remarks, I said that I support most changes which Senator Langlois approved among those proposed by Senator Croll. Let me list a few, including, for instance, representation in this house from the Northwest Territories and Yukon as well as a larger representation from western provinces, as advocated also in the report of the Joint Committee on the Constitution. I would also approve increased representation from various political parties and minority cultural groups, as well as the setting up of a Senate standing committee on Canadian affairs.

I agree with the joint committee's other suggestion that the Senate might deal with more bills and inquiries and that it might, in a way, serve as an agent between the people and the government on contentious issues. I would also endorse the abolition of restrictions imposed on Quebec senators, the abolition of the 30-year age limit and the abolition of requirements relating to property qualifications.

Finally, I also agree with the principle that the Prime Minister might consult the leader of the federal opposition or premiers of provinces or specific ethnic groups before making his final selection of Senate candidates.

I am somewhat cautious about the concept of changing the Senate into a house of provinces, in a similar way as the West German Bundesrat, a concept that was put forward by political expert E. D. Briggs—whom you undoubtedly know—as a means of rehabilitating the Canadian Senate. I leave to my elders in this house the duty of discussing that matter.

However, I think in summary that considerations that are essential to any attempt at reform, listed in 1963 by famous professor Robert Mackay in his book entitled The Unreformed Senate—which was revised in co-operation with Senator Croll—are still quite the same.

Those considerations are the following: First, that the assembly of senators better reflect the trends of public views in this country; second, that the Senate carry some degree of representation if it is to have the moral authority necessary to draw respect and attention across the country; third, that its autonomy be preserved and if possible strengthened; fourth, that the reform not be drastic enough to prejudice the efficient operation of parliamentary government as it has developed in Canada.

According to those esteemed colleagues who spoke before me in this debate, it seems that some of Senator Croll's 12 recommendations would considerably upset the mechanisms of our parliamentary system.

Professor Mackay was no doubt thinking about those possible upsets when he wrote ten years ago:

> Canadian authorities can continue to consider it surer and easier to leave again that problem unsolved, as is the case with several other political problems.

Still according to him, I conclude by suggesting that the Senate, if it were given the opportunity, could certainly play a more dynamic and useful part in Canada's political life. But I join with the authors of the report of the Joint Committee on the Constitution in saying:

> If Canadian governments in the past have paid only lip service to Senate reform, the Senate itself in recent times has made great efforts to improve itself.

[Hon. Miss Lapointe.]

Personally I have but one more wish to make: that it continue in that direction, spurred first by the awakeners who sit in this house.

[English]

Hon. Edward M. Lawson: Honourable senators, in adding the views of an Independent in this chamber on Senate reform, my remarks will be somewhat shortened because of the excellent presentation we have just heard. However, I do want to comment, because this is one of the few occasions on which the call for Senate reform has a valid base. It is a call by one of our fellow senators.

I have been concerned about a tendency in this chamber always to be on the defensive, to allow ourselves to be intimidated, almost, by members of the other place, and by people throughout the country from time to time, who consider that if there is nothing else newsworthy then ideally they can take a shot at abolishing the Senate, or kicking the Senate.

With that in mind, I am pleased to pay my respects to Senator Croll for raising this issue so that we can make an objective analysis here. Having said that kind thing about Senator Croll, I hasten to take issue with some of the points he made.

First, I do not agree with the suspensive veto. It seems to me that before we hurry to change the power of veto that we have, we must agree it should be only as a result of abuse by this chamber in exercising it. Surely, if there is any criticism it is that it has been exercised too few times, not too often. It has never been abused, and, in my view, a suspensive veto would simply weaken the effectiveness of this chamber. Surely it is far better to have something with meaning and substance that we can use when the situation is so desperate as to demand its use, then it would be to have a suspensive veto that, in my view, would be a meaningless thing and would have a tendency to weaken our relationship as a part of the parliamentary system.

Senator Croll's second point about additional distribution of senators and greater representation from the West has already been commented on adequately. I support that as being of considerable merit.

The third point that Senator Croll made, that the supporters of any one political party should not comprise more than two-thirds of the membership of the Senate at any one time, has merit. One of the things desperately needed here is to have at least this side of the chamber loaded with more Conservatives, or more Opposition members. I think there should be more balance. That greater balance in the house would make for a better discharge of our duties in the committees, for the quality of debate, and for the working and effectiveness of the Senate. So certainly I endorse the proposal to have more Opposition members—either Conservatives or members of any other party. I should be more careful, and not say the Senate should be "loaded with more Conservatives."

I am not sure that I totally agree with Senator Croll on the question of a compulsory retirement age. We could have retirement at 70 years of age, but that should be optional, with mandatory retirement at 75.

I do not agree with the suggestion that to be named to any position, such as that of leader or chairman of a committee, a senator should be under 65. It would be sheer folly, from the point of view of perhaps a younger member of this chamber, to deny ourselves and the country the competence, skill, wisdom and experience that senators who have passed the age of 65 can bring to bear on particular problems—and here I am thinking of Senator Croll himself, Senator Hayden, Senator O'Leary, and others.

I had the privilege a few years ago to serve on a royal commission, two members of which were over the age of 70. They were two of the youngest minds it has been my privilege to serve with. I do not think youth has any monopoly on wisdom. I have found old men of 40 and young men of 75, and I take issue with that proposal, as I do not think it is in the best interests of the Senate or the country to support it.

Honourable senators, I do not agree with Senator Croll's view that the Speaker, the Government leader and the Opposition leader should be elected by the members of this house. This is an appointed chamber, and I find it inconsistent to talk about electing these officers. The Leader of the Government in the Senate should be the choice of the government. He should be someone in whom the government has confidence. We should have a relationship or liaison with the Cabinet by which we can express our concerns and views, and the senator who performs that function and that of transmitting information back to us must have the confidence of the cabinet. I have mixed views on whether the government leader should have the support of another member of this chamber as a member of the cabinet, but we should do everything we can to make the Senate a more effective body.

I do not agree with the view that the Government leader and the Opposition leader should serve for only one Parliament, and not be eligible for re-election. They should serve for the Parliament, but then should be eligible for re-election. A determination should then be made on their competence, their work, and their performance. If they are worthy of re-election, they should be entitled to re-election.

I am afraid I do not agree with Senator Croll's eighth suggestion, that the Government leader in the Senate should not be a member of the Cabinet. It is very important that he should be a member of the Cabinet, and we should not fall into the trap of promoting further isolation, further removal, of the Senate as a part of the parliamentary system. There are two houses, but a single Parliament. We should maintain very strong ties and should not allow any separation in that regard.

Senator Lapointe made a point about minority groups being under-represented in the Senate. That is true, and there is need for a broader input of Canada as we know it from the various sections. When I look around I do not see very many—I was going to say "working men," but there are many working men here—trade union representatives in the chamber. There are other groups also that are under-represented and it would make for a chamber more reflective of the Canadian people if that very valid point were implemented.

Senator Croll suggested that the chairmen of standing committees should not be eligible for re-election. I agree that they should serve for one Parliament, but on merit they should certainly be eligible for re-election. We should not deny ourselves the competence and calibre of such people with proven records of ability and understanding of the committee function.

The final recommendation in Senator Croll's list of twelve is that there should be constituted a standing Senate committee on miscellaneous Canadian affairs to deal with various matters such as he enumerates. It is my opinion that that has considerable merit and is something that should be considered.

What troubles me is our tendency to allow ourselves to be intimidated. We have almost fallen into the trap of "going along," and one subject no one likes to talk about is that of salaries. I think it was a mistake on the part of this chamber to agree that there should be a different scale of either salary or expenses from that of the other house. I do not accept the view that constituents in the various parts of the country we represent are concerned only with going to MPs, and that the costs or expenses of MPs are greater than those of members of the Senate.

I do not know how this affects other senators, but I presume their experience is the same as mine. I receive many complaints, grievances and problems of a federal nature that people in my community want me to raise in Ottawa. It would be easy for me to tell them to go and see their MP, but have I the right to do that? Is it not my responsibility to deal with those problems on their behalf when I have the opportunity to do so? It is not a question of dollars as such but it is a question of eroding the prestige of this body and lessening its function. A case can be made for equal pay for equal work. Perhaps it is of a different style or different form, but we should not allow ourselves to fall into the trap of agreeing to any lesser salary or expense schedule than that which applies to the other house.

I have read in recent weeks, as I am sure everyone has, about the possibility of establishing constituency offices at an additional cost of $6,000 or $8,000 a year. If that should be proposed, then as good a case can be made for members of this house to have offices of a similar type established. Perhaps this is the weak link. We are talking about communication with constituents, and we should be more readily available to hear and deal with their problems. A constituent's problem may very well be a matter for referral to his or her elected member of Parliament, but there are matters that we can properly deal with and for which we have a responsibility.

On the question of salaries, the honourable senator who spoke just ahead of me talked about its being somewhat of a part-time job to be here. Yes, it is, but many people would find that they simply could not afford to live totally on the salary of a senator. If this is to be a full-time job then we must think in terms of substantially raising the salaries in both houses and making it possible for a parliamentarian to devote the whole of his time to his duties, although I do not particularly share the view that this should be a full-time job.

It is important that members of this chamber should represent involvement throughout the community and in all the various facets of the economy—the professions, labour and management. It is important that members of this chamber should have been involved on a day-to-day basis in what is happening in the community as a whole. A membership such as that, plus some who after long experience have retired, would make this a very up-to-date chamber. So it is important that we should not allow the status of the Senate to be eroded in any way.

There is one thing that we have allowed to happen, and I am troubled by it although I have seen a marked improvement in the last couple of years. Not only have we been subjected to some criticism from members of the other house from time to time, but the attitude of the press towards us has been extremely bad. I really think that, to a large degree, is our own fault. I know that when we conducted the last major study of tax reform we received extremely bad press coverage. Those of us who took issue with the press and criticized them for not being here to know and understand what we had done, for not attending the committee meetings to know what had taken place there, found that when we made the position clear and said, "You are simply not telling the truth in the way you are reporting this," there followed a marked improvement in the calibre of reporting.

This is certainly the case in British Columbia. The Vancouver Sun and the Vancouver Province are to be highly commended for the kind of reporting that is now appearing in their pages. I think that is the direct result of our saying to them, "No, we are not going to be intimidated by your criticism. We accept that you have the right to make valid criticism, but you also have the responsibility to report the efficiency of, and the excellent work done by, the Senate and its committees. All we are asking for is fair treatment." When we take that position we seem to improve our press relationships and our communications with the people.

● (1510)

The most recent thing that is heard from time to time is almost a plea or a hope that we could have Senate committees of the nature of the showcase in the United States. Well, the Senate committee there is a showcase. The people can see senators in action, asking tough questions and going through the whole process, and so on. I do not know how to go about initiating a scandal so that we can have a showcase to bring the television in here. I do not think there would be many members of this house, if any, who would want to be a party to a kind of Watergate scandal. Perhaps we would get more volunteers if we suggested the British-type scandal. It seems that there is a need—and perhaps we should be talking to the CBC—to have some of the committee meetings properly televised.

A press reporter for whom I have great regard was telling me a few weeks ago why he attended a Senate committee meeting. When I saw him I asked, "Why are you here?" He replied, "It is simple. When I really want to get to the guts of an issue or the thrust of a piece of legislation, to know what is really intended, I go to a Senate committee. That is where I hear questions put that go to the root of the legislation and I get a better understanding of what is behind it." I think that was a very fine compliment to pay to committees of the Senate. I also think that it is the kind of thing that should be more widely known.

I received a letter from a school in Kitimat, British Columbia, saying that they thought the Senate should have committees and that they should work on all kinds of problems; that they should help the members of Parliament. They had no knowledge or understanding whatever of the role or function of the Senate and its committees. I took the precaution of getting some of the fine pieces of work which Senator Croll prepared on poverty, which Senator Lamontagne prepared on science policy, as well as Senator Davey's report on the mass media, and I bundled these up and sent them to the school. I said, "Let me know when you have read all this, and I will send you some more."

But, really, in retrospect, whose fault is it? Is it the school's fault for not being aware of what is taking place? Is it the teacher's fault? Or is it perhaps our fault for not making what takes place in our committees well enough known?

I think any committee report which is printed and published in book form should be made available to, and even sent to, all of the schools across the country so that they can know and understand what we are doing. I would not be a bit interested in hearing somebody say that that would be terribly expensive. I would not be concerned about that. Perhaps we should get an Opportunities for Youth grant, or a special grant of some kind, and spend it on making Canadians, especially young Canadians, aware of what their Houses of Parliament are doing, what this chamber is doing, what its committees are doing, the role it is playing, and our hopes for the future.

In spite of all the criticism, I would mention that in a serious and heated debate in the provincial legislature—and, Senator Croll, I think this will please you somewhat—in which members of four different parties were involved, they all used as authority for their very valid points Senator Croll's report on poverty. Is it not interesting that a defunct, non-functioning body of people sleeping in red chairs, somehow produced a report which those members of the provincial legislature quoted as their supreme authority for the points they were making? I think that is a fine commentary on the calibre of performance of the committees of this house.

I am somewhat troubled by the question of reform. I think one honourable senator made the point a couple of weeks ago by saying that if you move one part, perhaps all the other parts do not necessarily fall into place. We need to be very careful in the way we go about Senate reform. Perhaps there is a greater need for reform of senators and our attitudes than there is for reform of the chamber or its role. We need to be far more aggressive. If we were being rated as a football club is, we would have a weak offence and no defence. Really, with what is performed by this chamber and its committees, with the kind of raw material available to us, we should go on the offensive; we should be far more aggressive in dealing with criticisms made of this chamber. We should adopt suggestions such as that made by Senator Lapointe, that we should be more involved throughout the community as a whole, and should point out our accomplishments, our role and our function.

We should be very cautious, in my view, in changing the rules. I think we should go slowly, because many of the rules we are talking about changing have never been operated at full speed. And so a word of caution. I think that apart from the few points I have made, the basic structure is sound. As to matters that we are concerned about as individual senators, well, I know that in my own case there are many things that I have not initiated or done but which it is possible for me to have done under the rules. Until we have exhausted all our rights and privileges—and perhaps even obligations—here under the present machinery, we should proceed cautiously and slowly about changing old or adopting new machinery.

Hon. Mr. Molgat: Honourable senators, if no other senator wishes to speak, I will move the adjournment of the debate.

Hon. Mr. Croll: Honourable senators, I have no objection, but I assume that until such time as a ruling is brought down we will proceed in accordance with the suggestion made today that any honourable senator who would like to speak will have the right to do so, not by leave.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Molgat: I wish to make it very clear, honourable senators, that the reason I moved the adjournment of the debate is that I understand there are other honourable senators who wish to speak but who are not here. Rather than have them lose their opportunity, I moved the adjournment.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: You said they would yield to the Leader of the Government, if he wished to speak. I have been waiting for him.

Hon. Mr. Molgat: And they would yield to the Leader of the Opposition as well.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Molgat, debate adjourned.

EXPORT DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION

CONSIDERATION OF REPORT OF BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE COMMITTEE

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce on the structure, policy and operations of the Export Development Corporation, which was tabled on Thursday, June 14.

Hon. Salter A. Hayden: Honourable senators, the report itself has been tabled and, in my view, is clear and complete. I do not propose, therefore, to discuss the details of it.

However, I do intend to tell you that the president of the corporation, Mr. Aitken, appeared before us in the course of our examination of this reference from the Senate. He has also appeared before us on previous occasions when amendments were being dealt with. It is the wish of the committee that I should report to the Senate our view that the corporation is under excellent management and direction, and that the person we have as administrator of the corporation's affairs is very capable. He is fully aware of the problems, purposes and responsibilities of this corporation, and I think the country is fortunate to have such an able administrator in charge of such a responsible job.

The Hon. the Speaker: As no other honourable senator wishes to participate in this debate, this order is considered as having been debated.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I thought the idea was to adopt the report.

The Hon. the Speaker: There was no motion.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Thursday, July 5, 1973

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

INCOME TAX ACT (No. 2)

BILL TO AMEND—FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-192, to amend the Income Tax Act (No. 2).

Bill read first time.

Hon. Mr. Martin moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading on Tuesday next.

Motion agreed to.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Hon. Paul Martin tabled:

First Annual Report of the National Farm Products Marketing Council, including a statement of expenses, for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1973, pursuant to section 16 of the Farm Products Marketing Agencies Act, chapter 65, Statutes of Canada, 1970-71-72.

INCOME TAX

REPORT OF BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE COMMITTEE ON ADVANCE EXAMINATION OF BILL C-192, TO AMEND THE INCOME TAX ACT (No. 2) TABLED AND PRINTED AS AN APPENDIX

Hon. John J. Connolly: Honourable senators, on behalf of the Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, I desire to table a report of the committee on Bill C-192, to amend the Income Tax Act (No. 2), pursuant to order of the Senate of June 14, 1973, authorizing the committee to examine any bill based on budget resolutions in advance of its coming before the Senate.

Honourable senators, I would ask that the report be printed as an appendix to the Debates of the Senate and to the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate of this day and form part of the permanent record of this house.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(For text of report see appendix, pp. 835-837.)

[Later:]

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Honourable senators, I am not clear as to what is intended with regard to the report tabled by Senator Connolly (Ottawa West) on Bill C-192. I thought it would be moved that the consideration of that report take place at the same time as we examine the bill on third reading. Is that the intention?

Hon. Mr. Langlois: That should be the intention.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: No motion was made.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: No motion was made.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

On the motion to adjourn:

Hon. Leopold Langlois: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), I move that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until Tuesday, July 10, 1973, at 8 o'clock in the evening.

Honourable senators, before this motion is put, I should like to give a preview of what is in store for us next week.

We now have before us Bill C-192, to amend the Income Tax Act (No. 2), dealing with corporate income tax. Senator Hayden will move second reading of this bill on Tuesday evening. As honourable senators know, the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce has examined this bill in advance of its coming before us, and Senator Connolly (Ottawa West) has just tabled the committee's report on its findings. The same procedure has been followed with Bill C-193, to amend the statute law relating to income tax (No. 3) dealing with personal income tax, and Senator Hayden will table the report on that bill on Tuesday evening also. It is expected that Bill C-193 will pass the other place today or tomorrow, so we shall have both income tax bills before us next week.

The Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce will sit on Wednesday and Thursday of next week, and my information is that Senator Hayden will be in a position to table the report on direct foreign investment in Canada on Wednesday next.

On Thursday Senator Aird will table the report of the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs respecting that committee's study of the expanded European Communities.

The Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications will meet on Tuesday, Wednesday and Thursday to examine the question of the advisability of steps being taken to ensure that all radio and television commercial advertising broadcast in Canada be completely produced in Canada. As senators will recall, this examination was authorized by the Senate on May 24 and the committee hopes to have the report thereon ready for presentation to the Senate before Parliament adjourns for the summer.

In addition to the foregoing, there is Bill C-21, to amend the Harbour Commissions Act (Nanaimo Harbour Commission), on the Order Paper for second reading on Tuesday. This is a public bill by a private member. Also, debate will continue on Senator Croll's inquiry respecting Senate reform.

I am not in a position to say definitely what other legislation will reach us next week, but we should have Bill C-197, to amend the Immigration Appeal Board Act, and perhaps one or two others.

Motion agreed to.

THE SENATE

TELEPHONE SERVICE DELAYS—QUESTION

Hon. Donald Cameron: Honourable senators, I should like to ask the Leader of the Government if he could initiate some steps to have something done about the most unsatisfactory situation with respect to the long distance telephone service, certainly as far as Western Canada is concerned. I apologize for not giving him notice of this, but there is no rush about it.

For example, on Tuesday, July 3, at 11.13 in the morning, I tried to get through to Calgary. I rang 151 and that phone rang from 11.13 to 11.30, with no answer from the local operator in Ottawa. I complained to the supervisor and she said the operators were busy. At 5.41 p.m. on that same day I tried to get the same call through. The phone rang consistently from 5.41 until 6 o'clock, at which time I hung up.

That is the sort of thing that has been going on. Whenever one picks up the telephone and dials 151 to get to Western Canada, it takes from 3 to 7 minutes—and the other day it was 17 and 19 minutes—before anyone answers. They say they are busy, so there must be something seriously wrong with Bell Canada's operation. I think it is high time something was done about it.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Honourable senators, Bell Canada is in the private sector, of course, but I will certainly do what I can to accommodate Senator Cameron who, I know, is a sincere and devoted user of the telephone system.

Hon. Mr. Benidickson: Honourable senators, I am not a great user of the telephone service. I am an Ottawa resident most of the time, and a part-time resident of Kenora-Rainy River, and I think you will be interested in my experience. This very morning I spoke to Mrs. Carrière, the representative of Bell Canada, and I told her that we as a Senate do not want second-class service. I will leave it at that.

● (1410)

[Translation]

VIETNAM

DISAPPEARANCE OF TWO CANADIAN OFFICERS ATTACHED TO INTERNATIONAL COMMISSION OF CONTROL AND SUPERVISION—QUESTION

Hon. Mr. Asselin: Honourable senators, to get back to the question period, I have a question for the government leader.

I would like to know what the government is doing about the search for the Canadian members of the control commission being held prisoners by the Viet Cong? Have there been any further developments? Has the government succeeded in locating their whereabouts?

Hon. Mr. Martin: There has been no news since yesterday's statement to this House, but I think that I will have something to say on the matter later in the day, and if I have the opportunity I will then answer the question more fully.

[Later:]

Hon. Mr. Martin: Honourable senators, with the permission of the house may I return to the question period?

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Mr. Martin: In reply to the question put to me by Senator Asselin at the beginning of the sitting, I have received the following information: We are encouraged by recent events. Though in the last five days we have had no new information on the actual whereabouts of Captain Patten and Captain Thomson, the discussions being held between the ICCS and the representatives of the PRG in Saigon, are now showing promise that their return can be arranged. The Canadian delegation is vigorously continuing its efforts, both within the ICCS and in direct contacts with the PRG representatives. An ICCS team is now being organized with a view to recovering the two officers, and we are awaiting news about this. For the moment we have no further information. We shall inform this house as soon as the government has received any more news.

[English]

COMMUNICATIONS

LAUNCHING OF ANIK II OF TELESAT CANADA—DEBATE CONCLUDED

The Senate resumed from Wednesday, May 23, the adjourned debate on the inquiry of Senator Grosart calling the attention of the Senate to the launching of Anik II of Telesat Canada at Cape Kennedy, Florida, on Friday, 20th April, 1973.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, it had been my intention to speak in glowing terms about communications within Canada, but when I heard Senator Cameron's initial comments a moment ago, I thought I might have to revise my speech for the afternoon. However, I find that Senator Cameron's complaint is really one about government service or Bell Canada service of an internal nature, and not one concerning Anik II or the very fine accomplishments of Telesat and of Canada in the communications field.

[Translation]

I would like to add a few words to those of Senator Grosart, my leader Senator Martin, and Senator Buckwold. Their contributions to this debate are very important, for communications are a matter of major importance for the well-being of our country. Geographically, ours is the second largest country in the world, and with a small population scattered across the country, it is essential that we have an excellent system of communications. I would like to congratulate Senator Grosart for proposing this debate, which has allowed us to study the matter and to see how Canada has, in fact, taken the lead in this field.

[English]

Senator Grosart has covered in detail just what Anik II has accomplished in order to provide a better communications system throughout our country. I believe Canadians have reason to be proud of what has been done in this field.

Important as it is to Canada, I think that we have really done more in this area than could have been expected in a short period of time. It was only in 1966 that Canada established the first earth station to pick up the Intelsat communications—the International Communications Network, the first station of which was established at Mill Village, Nova Scotia. It picked up from the international satellite the communications of importance to Canada.

Following on that, we proceeded to a purely Canadian development in the satellite field—not in the communications field, it is true, but nevertheless in the satellite field—and in a very successful way with the first Canadian satellite, Alouette I, which in turn was followed by Alouette II and Isis. Here again Canada achieved a remarkable record. Alouette I is still in orbit, and while it is true that it was taken out of service last fall, on the anniversary of its tenth year in orbit, we should keep in mind that this is a satellite which was designed for one year of service. Nevertheless, after 10 years it was still in service, and could have continued in service if its information had been of further value. I understand it can be put back into service at any time, if desired. This outstanding success led then to further developments in Canada.

Following this, there was a report in 1967 by Mr. John H. Chapman, dealing with upper atmosphere and space programs in Canada. Shortly after that, the Prime Minister's task force on satellites was established. That task force published a report in March 1968, of which I believe all honourable senators have copies. Following this, and at a very rapid pace, the government proceeded to establish a joint enterprise composed of government and the various bodies in Canada concerned with communications. This followed directly on the recommendation of the task force which had stated:

> —a domestic satellite communications system is of vital importance for the growth, prosperity and unity of Canada, and should be established as a matter of priority.

Many of us may sometimes feel that where governments are concerned matters of priority do not seem to be dealt with very quickly. However, I am pleased to say that this one was, and as early as June 1969 the bill incorporating Telesat was introduced in the House of Commons. On September 1, 1969, Telesat started its operations. Within a very few months a contract was signed with Hughes Aircraft to proceed with the development of the Anik satellite.

The Anik satellite is interesting, honourable senators, in that while it is not a Canadian design—it is a Hughes Aircraft design, since they are leaders in the communications field—it has a substantial Canadian content. The agreement made with Hughes provided that there would be substantial Canadian content in the three satellites in the Anik series ordered by Canada, and in addition that if Hughes succeeded in selling any further Anik satellites to other countries, up to a maximum of 15, the Canadian participation would continue to the same extent up to that number. It is interesting to note that to date Hughes Aircraft have been able to sell six of the series to other nations, and there is a likelihood that more will be sold, largely as a result of the highly successful operation of both Anik I and Anik II. So Canadian scientists who, by the way, participated in the re-design of Anik I, have carved out an important segment of economic and scientific activity for Canadians.

● (1420)

The success of Anik I, which was launched on November 9, 1972, was immediate. It is interesting to note also, by the way, that the whole of the Telesat program was completely on time, in spite of the very narrow timings from September 1, 1969. The projection at that time was to put the first satellite in space in November of 1972, which goal was achieved. The satellite launching was delayed, in fact, because of a small malfunction for two hours, but that was the only delay and Anik I went into space. Anik II, to which Senator Grosart referred, was a back-up for Anik I. It also was launched successfully and both satellites are now in operation. I understand from the experts in the field that once the satellite is launched and it functions on the first day the likelihood is that it will continue to function throughout its life.

The designed life for the Anik series is seven years. The reason for this set timing is that in order to perform its function the Anik series must be in a permanent position. That is, its orbit must be at the same speed as the rotation of the earth so that it maintains a position above the equator. It is interesting, by the way, to note that in the original plans of Telesat it was expected that the location from a longitudinal standpoint would be roughly directly south of Winnipeg. As it turns out, Anik I is directly south of Calgary and Anik II is directly south of Saskatoon, above the equator. In order to maintain their positions, the Aniks must consume fuel which is expected to last for seven years. The purpose of Anik II is really a back-up to Anik I in order to ensure and guarantee to the users that they will have constant use, even if a mulfunction occurs in one of the units.

It is also interesting to note that this is a Canadian first and, in fact, a world first. It is true that there are international communications satellites, but Canada is the first nation to have put into space a domestic satellite. No other nation is anywhere near us in this regard. It is obviously to the credit of the Telesat group that these satellites should function in such a remarkably precise manner, and to the credit of the Canadian scientists involved.

It is with some regret that I agree with Senator Grosart that Canadians have not been made sufficiently aware of this magnificent achievement, something of which we have every reason to be proud and which is so important to many regions of our country.

One needs only to travel through northern Canada to appreciate the importance of good communications. A visit to an isolated community in the Northwest Territories makes one realize how important good, dependable and steady communications are. I recall that during my trips to the North my first expectation was to find that the inhabitants desired access by road, better air service, and so on. The greatest concern I found was for good television, which was much more important to them in many cases because of the long winter nights. Such daily communication with the outside world for those isolated communities is something which can be provided by Anik.

On a temporary basis Anik has a second advantage for us, in that we have been able, because of surplus channels, to rent a part of that space to the Americans. So there is added revenue for the time being, but this, of course, will be temporary. International satellite communications are in the hands of Intelsat, and the Anik series is concerned purely with domestic communications. As soon as the American domestic satellites are in place, they will be using their own, and we shall revert to using Anik exclusively for ourselves. But temporarily the present arrangement is both interesting and useful. It is economically beneficial to us, and also interesting that a Canadian satellite should be providing communications for our American neighbours, whom we normally consider to be far ahead of us in the scientific field. In this case, Canada is ahead.

● (1430)

Where do we go from here? What are the next likely steps? My understanding is that the production of a satellite, from the stage of design to that of putting it into space, involves roughly a three-year period. Canada at the moment has a contract for a third Anik satellite. The likelihood is that it will be launched, at the earliest, in 1975. Contract negotiations are presently in process with NASA and, depending on failures in the present Aniks, changes in communication demands, or commercial changes, there is the likelihood of a launch in mid-1975.

There has been co-operation with the Americans in connection with the launching. A wise decision was made by Canada at the outset not to attempt to develop its own launch vehicle, which is a very expensive process, but to agree to depend on the Americans who had rockets and bases in place, which were effective and which could be used without our being involved in any capital expenditure. At the moment, there are only three pads in North America from which launchings can take place. There are two at Cape Kennedy and one in California. I understand that for the next year those launch pads will be in complete use. One launch per month is scheduled as the American program comes to fruition. There is the likelihood at the moment that Canada may not need to launch Anik III as early as anticipated, because of the outstanding success of Anik I and Anik II.

Canadians can look at this achievement with a great deal of pride. It is something uniquely Canadian. It is something in which we have been a world leader. It is a field in which we can look forward to economic benefits. Because of the technology developed in Canada, and the fact that the whole process has been so successful, it will likely mean that other nations—some are dealing with us now—will be looking to Canada for further scientific help in this field.

I am pleased that Senator Grosart was able to represent us at the launching of Anik II, and that he initiated this inquiry. I hope that more Canadians will look into this program and understand its importance to our nation, and will appreciate how much we owe to those individuals who have been involved in it.

The Hon. the Speaker left the Chair.

Hon. John M. Macdonald in the Chair.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker (Hon. Mr. Macdonald): Honourable senators, as no other senator wishes to participate in the debate, this inquiry is considered as having been debated.

CANADA-UNITED STATES INTERPARLIAMENTARY GROUP

FIFTEENTH MEETING—DEBATE CONCLUDED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Aird calling the attention of the Senate to the Fifteenth Meeting of the Canada-United States Interparliamentary Group, held at Washington, D.C., and White Sulphur Springs, West Virginia, from 4th to 8th April, 1973.— (Honourable Senator Molgat).

Hon. Paul Martin: Honourable senators, when the debate on this order was adjourned, it was done so in the expectation that some honourable senators would be interested in pursuing the discussion. It now seems that this debate has been exhausted, and I consequently ask that it be removed from the Order Paper.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker (Hon. Mr. Macdonald): As no other honourable senator wishes to speak on this item, it will be considered as having been debated.

VIETNAM

VISIT OF CANADIAN PARLIAMENTARY MISSION—DEBATE CONCLUDED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Cameron calling the attention of the Senate to the recent Canadian Parliamentary Mission to Vietnam.—(Honourable Senator Molgat).

Hon. Paul Martin: Honourable senators, the remarks I just made with respect to the previous order also apply to this one. I would ask that it, too, be removed from the Order Paper.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker (Hon. Mr. Macdonald): Honourable senators, as no other senator wishes to speak on this order, it will be considered as having been debated.

CEASE-FIRE AGREEMENTS—CANADA'S ROLE IN INTERNATIONAL COMMISSION OF CONTROL AND SUPERVISION—MOTION WITHDRAWN

On the Motion of the Honourable Senator Martin:

That this House welcomes the conclusion of the Agreements on ending the War and restoring peace in Vietnam and notes the provision for an International Commission of Control and Supervision as part of the cease-fire arrangements, in which Canada has agreed to participate for the initial period of 60 days as provided for in the Note, dated January 27, 1973, from the Secretary of State for External Affairs to the four Parties to the Vietnam cease-fire.—(Honourable Senator Molgat).

Hon. Paul Martin: Honourable senators, as there has been no indication by any honourable senator of his intention to speak to this motion, I would ask that it be withdrawn.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker (Hon. Mr. Macdonald): Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion withdrawn.

HUNGARY

VISIT OF CANADIAN PARLIAMENTARIANS—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Muriel McQueen Fergusson rose pursuant to notice:

> That she will call the attention of the Senate to the visit of Canadian Parliamentarians to Hungary, 25th to 30th April, 1973.

She said: Honourable senators, as you know, since I have been honoured by my appointment as Speaker of the Senate, I have not addressed honourable senators from the floor of this chamber. However, I should like to make an exception today because I wish to report to this house on a trip to Hungary made during the Easter recess by a Canadian parliamentary group at the request of the Hungarian Parliament which, as your Speaker, I was privileged to lead.

Before doing so, I should like to take this opportunity to congratulate the Honourable Senator Eugene Forsey on the honour he received at the recent convocation of Mount Allison University in Sackville, New Brunswick, at which he was granted an honorary Doctor of Civil Law degree. It seems a very appropriate degree to confer on him because, although he may never have been admitted to the Bar, we certainly have reason to know that he is "learned in the law," particularly regarding constitutional law.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mrs. Fergusson: My reason for making this report to you is because I believe most deeply in the importance of parliamentary visits between countries. There is no doubt that personal contact between representatives of different nations makes for smoother relations.

In common language, the name of the game may be trade and commerce, but the players on both sides are people. When people of different countries do not know each other, and do not understand or really cannot understand each other, we do not have trade, commerce or cultural exchange. Indeed, we do not have any human progress at all.

I should like to take a moment to refresh your memories about Hungary. Hungary is a small country, approximately two-thirds the size of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia put together. But it has, in that area, 10 million citizens. The first language is Magyar and the second is German. Many Hungarians also speak English, and our hosts provided us with excellent interpreters, particularly Dr. Ferenc Lippenyi from the Institute for Cultural Relations, who was with us continuously. With these interpreters we did not feel any language barrier and were not conscious of any communication problems whatsoever.

[Hon. Mr. Molgat.]

As honourable senators know, the capital of Hungary is Budapest. Budapest, in some ways, reminds one of Ottawa-Hull. Originally it was two cities, Buda and Pest, separated by a river, the Danube. Contrary to the belief we held because of our familiarity with Strauss's "Beautiful Blue Danube Waltz," we were surprised to find that the Danube is not blue at all. However, it is a very busy and a very important means of communication and transportation. One hundred years ago these two cities of Buda and Pest joined to form the city of Budapest, a city which now has a population of 2 million people.

Another resemblance between the two capitals is that Hungary's magnificent, really awesome Parliament Buildings are on the banks of a river, as are our Parliament Buildings. Budapest has many very old buildings which have been almost totally destroyed by wars. They are trying very hard to restore them to their original beauty, and deserve much commendation for the research, work and, particularly, the money which they are putting into this restoration program. We also found that their climate is similar to ours.

Hungary, of course, is a communist country. It is a member of the United Nations, the Warsaw Pact and the Interparliamentary Union, of which we also are a member. Their National Assembly has 11 commissions actively participating in the Interparliamentary Union. They also told us that they have many bi-national groups in their Parliament and, as an illustration of this, they mentioned the Japanese-Hungarian organization which has 42 members in the Hungarian branch and also a branch in Japan, although they did not mention the number of members.

Hungary has an armed force of 95,000, and four Russian divisions are stationed within the country. It lies on the main east-west invasion routes of Central Europe. They say her people occasionally feel isolated in a sea of Slavs.

We had been told that her people are reputed to be the most hot-blooded in Central Europe. I should point out to honourable senators that I was unable to do any personal verification, as I might have had the trip been made 50 years ago.

Parliament in Hungary is a single-chamber legislative body called the National Assembly. There are 349 deputies, of which 84 are women.

The deputies elect the 21-member Presidential Council from their ranks. This council is headed by Mr. Pal Losonczi, who has two deputies. President Losonczi received our group and spent an hour in conversation with us, which, as was pointed out, was recognition of the importance attached to our visit.

We also visited Mr. Peter Valyi, vice-president of the council. Some honourable senators, like myself, may have met Mr. Valyi when he visited Canada in March of this year. Mr. Valyi pointed out that in a number of international forums, such as the United Nations, our two countries agree on many things. He thought parliamentary visits promoted mutual "getting acquainted with each other," and mentioned that he felt there are "no black clouds on the sky of our co-operation."

The National Assembly elects the Council of Ministers, the Supreme Court and the Attorney General. It also approves plans for the economy and the budget.

Elections are held every four years, and the voting age is 18. There is a single political party, which is the Hungarian socialist workers' party, and it controls the National Assembly. The head of the party, the first secretary, is Janos Kadar.

● (1440)

The Speaker of the Hungarian Parliament is Mr. Antal Apro, my opposite number, and our official host. He is an intelligent, charming man, 60 years of age, a most gracious host with a delightful wife, who made the women of our group feel very welcome indeed. Mr. Apro's personal political history goes back to the age of 16. He was an anti-Fascist guerrilla fighter in World War II. Amongst other things, he is a devoted philatelist, and I am pleased to say he seemed to appreciate very much the Canadian first day of issue stamps we carried with us and presented to him.

Mr. Apro has the assistance of two deputies—a woman, Mrs. Gabor Varga, and a man, Miklos Beresztoczy—both elected members of the National Assembly. During our visit they were both very helpful to Mr. Apro and very kind to us. The thought certainly occurred to me that it might be an improvement in our chamber if there were deputy speakers, or even one deputy speaker, to assist the Speaker. Also, I think a church dignitary, whether assistant to the Speaker or not, would certainly add prestige to our chamber, as it does to the Hungarian Parliament.

During our visit we learned that in centuries past Hungary has been a remarkable country indeed. Her people were forced out of Asia in the 10th century and finally settled in the Danube Basin. For centuries after that the Kingdom of Hungary was one of the largest in Europe, second only to France.

In 1919, after World War I, Hungary's size was cut in half. It lost half its people and half its land, and, in addition, its access to the sea. It was, in short, beset upon by traditional enemies. Romania invaded. Budapest was looted. There was the bloody dictatorship of Bela Kun. In the twenties and the thirties Hungary was drawn into the Axis sphere of influence, because the alternative seemed to be annihilation. Finally, Hungary became an extension of the Third Reich. As the Germans collapsed in World War II, the Russians conquered. At the end of the war, in 1945, the communists won 15 per cent of the free vote, and it was not long before they gained control.

In 1949 a constitution modelled in theory and convention after that of the Soviet Union was introduced. We were told that there has been a slow but steady liberalization of the Hungarian society since its internal convulsion was settled by the Soviet Union in 1956.

We were each presented with a copy of the consolidated text of the Constitution of the Hungarian People's Republic, which was passed by Parliament in April 1972. The foreword states that this constitution embodies the fundamental changes that have taken place in the life of the country and the historical results of the struggle for social progress and the building of the country.

We found the Hungarian officials and citizens whom we met to be universally friendly. They were anxious for better trade relations with us, and they seemed eager to accomplish this. They are full of good humour, and they delight in making their points with small appropriate jokes. I am reminded that they were also amused by us, as you will see by an incident which I will refer to later.

You will be interested in the composition of our group. From the Senate there was Senator and Mrs. Welch and myself. From the House of Commons there was Mr. and Mrs. Thomas H. Lefebvre of the Liberal Party, Mr. and Mrs. Gerald W. Baldwin of the Progressive Conservative Party, and Mr. and Mrs. William G. Knight of the New Democratic Party. We were accompanied by Mr. J. W. Dean, Director and Administrator of Personnel of the Senate, and Mr. A. Gilbert, Executive Assistant to the Speaker of the House of Commons, who looked after all arrangements for our Canadian group extremely well.

Hon. Mr. Martin: As a matter of record, I think honourable senators would want to have it noted that Your Honour was chairman of the delegation.

Hon. Mrs. Fergusson: Thank you. Although we had an agenda, our delegation was not strictly bound to any particular subjects of discussion with our hosts. However, it was a serious hard-working group, interested and anxious to learn about the history, culture and economics of our host country, and we found our hosts more than willing to give us information about anything that interested us.

I have travelled considerably with various groups, and it seemed to me the members of our party were very compatible and got along unusually well with each other, perhaps because the group was small. I want to state—because there has been some question about this with other groups—that in my opinion the presence of the wives of the delegates did much to help to bring about the rapport that was established with our hosts.

By way of background to the story I propose to tell, I should explain—I have perhaps been helped in saying this by Senator Martin's interjection—although at our first meeting I spoke at some length, at subsequent meetings, after an address by the person on whom the group was calling, I usually made a few general remarks and then called on some member of the group, who had previously agreed to do so, to reply on behalf of the group, following which there was a general discussion by both sides.

Once, when I called upon Mr. Knight to do this, he began his remarks by saying frankly that it was the policy of his party, the New Democratic Party, to abolish the Senate. I was rather startled, but have thought since that perhaps nothing could have demonstrated more clearly to our hosts that the members of our group were free to speak for themselves. Subsequently, during the discussion, Senator Welch made an excellent contribution supporting the Senate, and I used that occasion to point out to our hosts that our group of parliamentarians did not represent the government, or speak for government policy on the subject of Senate reform, or indeed any other matter. I stated also that we were present as representatives of various parties and that we held individual opinions, as they could very well see, and a variety of views. I think there is no doubt that all this worked to the benefit of more understanding between our two countries.

If Hungarians do not share our ways completely, not just in the matter of not having a Senate of their own, they are much like us in many things. They serve excellent foods and wine. We were privileged to eat many real Hungarian dishes, and to sample a formidable list of their moderate and delightful wines. We were presented with flowers, both men and women, on very many occasions, and we all thought it was an enchanting custom. In short, we were treated with the utmost friendliness and cordiality.

Our visit was highlighted by some lengthy discussions with senior officials. At the time, they were concerned very much about the International Commission of Control and Supervision in Vietnam. We had not expected to discuss this. But, since events have superseded any discussion we had, and since Canada is shortly scheduled to end its International Commission of Control and Supervision participation, I will not dwell on that subject at present.

Reference was made also to the forthcoming conference on European Cooperation and Security, now taking place in Helsinki, and the hope was expressed by both sides that it would be successful. The Canadians expressed satisfaction that the Hungarian Ministry of Foreign Affairs has been co-operating in implementing the terms of the 1964 Exchange of Notes, which dealt with reunification of families and applications by dual nationals living in Hungary to return to Canada, and we expressed satisfaction that we can count on a re-examination by the Hungarian authorities of difficult cases on the basis of humanitarian considerations, as was agreed in 1964.

It was clear to me at the time of our visit that the Hungarians attached considerable political importance to our visit, both in terms of détente and in the context of Canadian-Hungarian bilateral relations. In the case of the latter, I would like to note simply that there are no negotiations being considered in the areas of aviation and tourism, and also in the area of cultural, scientific and technical exchanges.

Perhaps our warm welcome and the evident interest of the Hungarian parliamentarians and Hungarian people stemmed partly from the fact that we were the first Canadian parliamentary delegation ever to visit Hungary, and only the third parliamentary delegation to Hungary from a non-socialist country. Accordingly, we benefited from a surprisingly frequent and broad coverage from press and television. The cameras and reporters followed us everywhere and while there we appeared practically every day in the press and every evening on the television news.

● (1450)

One outstanding experience was a visit to one of the giant industrial bases of Hungary. This is the Csepel Iron and Metal Works Trust. It is on an island in the Danube. It is a vertical manufacturing giant. It takes the raw materials through complete processing to turn out a variety of products from transformers to bicycles. We saw many bicycles that were to be sent to Canada. We were particularly interested in this, and learned that 260,000 bicycles were being manufactured, as well as component parts, that 40 per cent of these were for export, and that 25 per cent of the total exports were going to Canada. However, only 5 or 6 per cent of the total production of Csepel is bicycles and sewing machines. These are two items that Canada purchases from Hungary. We were pleased when they told us that they consider Canada to be a very fair and correct trading partner.

Honourable senators, I might digress for a moment to say that at one time I found myself seated on one of the bicycles—pedalling. I did not realize, when I got on, that it was an exercise bicycle sample. I have wondered since then if they were politely trying to tell me something.

Csepel's divisions include steel pipes and tubes, metal-based chemical materials for non-ferrous foundries—such as converter copper, lead and tin alloys—and aluminum products. It also has a machine tool plant, a motorcycle assembly plant, and an industrial design institute.

What was particularly interesting to me was Csepel's activities on behalf of its workers. There is, by the way, a shortage of labour and 60 per cent of women work in industry of some kind. I did not find that the workers seemed to be down trodden, with noses to the grindstone, as we in the West often think they are. Rather, I found that workers seem to do well and consideration of worker welfare holds a surprisingly high priority, as I have also found it often does in Japan.

Csepel workers have new housing on the factory island. They have nurseries, kindergartens, technical schools and skilled worker training schools. In addition there is factory sponsorship of amateur artistic groups, special clubs, a theatre, a library, and even a modern audio-visual language laboratory. There are also sports fields and recreation grounds. The Csepel Works sports club competes in national and international events and we were told it has won Olympic gold medals.

Show place it may be—and I am old enough to know what I am looking at, and to be able to assess what is being told to me—but it may be that our own industrialists should take a look at Csepel to discover whether all that might be done in our own plants and factories is in fact being done to increase both productivity and worker benefits.

We were also greatly impressed by the visit to the City of Cegled and the agricultural co-operative farm there, and by our visit to the vice-president of the Central Planning Board. Time does not allow me to enlarge on the many things we learned from them. However, as in the case of Csepel, if we studied what they are doing we might find that there are many ideas we would like to adopt.

I should like to refer briefly to the trade between our two countries. Honourable senators will perhaps recall that Canadians participated in the Budapest Trade Fair again last May. The Hungarians spoke to us quite often about this and they were very pleased that we were participating, and that we have been making some contribution to the trade fair for the last seven years.

It is usually foolish to be very sanguine about the development of exports to eastern European countries. I know this, and Hungary is not any exception. Its trade is dominated by the COMECON bloc. Some 70 per cent of Hungary's trade is with the Soviet Union. We in Canada can understand what that means when we consider the huge and similar volume of trade we are tied into with the United States.

To face facts, Hungary is very poor in natural resources, except for bauxite. Most raw materials have to be imported from the U.S.S.R. Hungary suffers a perennial shortage of convertible currency. And, of course, European suppliers—East and West alike—are much closer than we are. Further, negotiations with the officials of the Ministry of Foreign Trade have been, in the past, often lengthy, to say the least, before any transactions have been actually completed.

It is to be hoped that both we and the Hungarians look upon the Canadian visit as tangible evidence that something must be done about speeding up development of trade between the two countries and increasing the volume. So, present trade prospects should be assessed with an appropriate amount of enthusiasm and also in the light of Hungary's own economic plans.

Briefly, here is the background to recent Canada-Hungary trade. In 1968 Hungary began a policy of economic decentralization—very like that of Czechoslovakia, but not quite as far-reaching and, therefore, not quite as provocative to Russia. Under this plan the state continues to allocate resources and to set priorities through five-year plans. Now individual enterprises decide what and how to produce on the basis of profitability. Since 1968 growth of industrial production has been slow, however, for two reasons. First, there was a sudden and unexpected increase in industrial development. Second, there was an excessive demand for imports because of floods and drought.

At present, trade both ways between Canada and Hungary, exports and imports, is running at about $10 million annually each way. Honourable senators will realize quickly that this is not a very impressive amount, but a bilateral trade agreement was signed between Canada and Hungary on January 18 of last year—that is, in 1972. So it remains to be seen how much effect it will have on commerce between our two countries. Members of this house will, I am sure, like the members of our delegation, wish those engaged in this trade the greatest possible success.

Honourable senators, while the trade relations between our two countries are important to both sides, I think it fair to say that the flow of people is equally important, if not more important, and in this regard Canada has enjoyed much the better of the exchange. There have been six major periods of immigration into Canada from Hungary. The first was in 1848 after Hungary's own war of independence. The two most recent were those following World War II and in 1956. In 1901 there were only 1,500 Hungarians living in Canada and now there are nearly 150,000.

The Hungarian, in my opinion, is one of our most valued immigrants. Hungarians do not band together as ethnic groups capable of acting, and being treated, as pressure groups. Their background and their reasons, public and personal, for coming to this country have been far too varied and mixed to encourage cohesiveness.

● (1500)

The average Hungarian establishes himself as an individual and becomes Canadianized, while at the same time he brings along his own traditions and culture to enrich the lives of those of us already resident here. Indeed, Canadian life has benefited enormously from the immigration of Hungarians. For example, almost all of the nearly 40,000 Hungarians who entered Canada about 1956 were possessed of professional qualifications acceptable here. As a consequence, they were rapidly absorbed into the Canadian community.

Canadian cultural life is studded with the names of former Hungarians: in music, Bartok, and Lazlo Gati, who founded the Montreal Chamber Orchestra; in art, Nicholas Hornyansky, the painter and printer; in sculpture, Dora De Pedery-Hunt; in architecture, George Eber of Expo fame, who designed the "Sermon of Science" pavilion and the aquarium; and in drama, John Hirsh, a co-founder of the Manitoba Theatre Centre.

While I am mentioning names I should mention one Canadian name. I should like to acknowledge the most capable assistance of our Chargé d'Affaires in Budapest, Mr. R. B. Edmonds, who seems to have developed excellent relations with many high Hungarian government officials. I should like also to extend our sincere thanks to his charming wife.

I feel, too, that we should recognize the contribution which was made to our visit by His Excellency Janos Bartha, the Hungarian Ambassador to Canada, and his staff. They helped significantly in the preparations for our visit.

As I have mentioned, upon the arrival of our group, the Speaker of the Hungarian Parliament, Mr. Antal Apro, pointed out to us that our two countries are in a period of lessening diplomatic tension. This is true, of course. It is, therefore, a time for energetic exploration of ways to promote understanding and trade between Canada and Hungary. Not only do we in Canada sympathize with the citizens of Hungary and their problems, but perhaps they will sympathize with us and ours. But more, we two nations can together consider increased co-operation in a variety of ways which may be left to others to pursue and develop.

I look forward, therefore, to one of the results of our visit being the future development of both nations, and the right of each of us to find a place in the world scene. I hope we will do this successfully, in friendship and in peace.

Honourable senators, I thank you for your attentiveness and patience.

On motion of Senator Molgat, for Senator Welch, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, July 10, at 8 p.m.

25862—53

APPENDIX

(See p. 826.)

STANDING SENATE COMMITTEE ON BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE

REPORT ON BILL C-192, INTITULED

"AN ACT TO AMEND THE INCOME TAX ACT (NO. 2)",

IN ADVANCE OF THE SAID BILL COMING BEFORE THE SENATE

The Honourable Salter A. Hayden, Q.C., Chairman

25862—53½

THE STANDING SENATE COMMITTEE ON BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE

The Honourable Salter A. Hayden, Chairman

The Honourable Senators,

Aird	Hayden
Beaubien	Hays
Blois	Laing
Buckwold	Lang
Burchill	Macnaughton
Connolly (Ottawa West)	*Martin
Cook	McIlraith
Desruisseaux	Molson
*Flynn	Smith
Gélinas	Sullivan
Haig	Walker (20)

*Ex officio members

(Quorum 5)

ORDER OF REFERENCE

Extract from the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate, June 14th, 1973:

The Honourable Senator Connolly, P.C., for the Honourable Senator Hayden moved, seconded by the Honourable Senator Laing, P.C.:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce be authorized to examine and consider any bill based on the Budget Resolutions relating to income tax in advance of the said bill coming before the Senate, or any matter relating thereto; and

That the Committee have power to engage the services of such counsel, staff and technical advisers as may be necessary for the purpose of the said examination.

After debate, and—

The question being put on the motion, it was—

Resolved in the affirmative.

ROBERT FORTIER,
Clerk of the Senate.

WEDNESDAY, 4th July 1973.

On June 6, 1973, Bill C-192, intituled "An Act to amend the Income Tax Act (No. 2)" received first reading in the House of Commons. This Bill is intended to implement in part the Ways and Means motion which was originally tabled by the Minister of Finance with his Budget Resolutions of May 8, 1972 and which was reintroduced in part on May 29 of this year.

By resolution of the Senate on June 14, 1973, the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce was authorized to examine and consider any bill based on the Budget Resolutions relating to income tax in advance of the said bill coming before the Senate.

In accordance with the Order of Reference, your Committee has given careful consideration to the said Bill C-192 and in connection therewith has heard Mr. M. A. Cohen, Assistant Deputy Minister, Department of Finance, and Mr. H. E. Garland, Director-General, Tax Policy, Department of National Revenue.

The purpose of this bill is to provide for a reduction in the rate of tax payable on a corporation's Canadian manufacturing and processing profits. The reduction applies to profits earned in 1973 and subsequent taxation years. However, where a corporation's 1973 taxation year commences prior to January 1, 1973, only the portion of the corporation's Canadian manufacturing and processing profits which are allocated, on a pro rata basis, to the portion of the taxation year falling after December 31, 1972, is eligible for the reduced rate.

The effect of the amendments contained in the bill would be to tax manufacturing and processing profits at the rate of 40%. This compares with the 49% corporate tax that otherwise would have applied to manufacturing or processing profits attributable to the 1973 taxation year's profits; the 48% that otherwise would have applied to the 1974 taxation year's profits, and so forth.

Further, to the extent that a corporation's manufacturing and processing profits are eligible for the small business deduction, the effective rate of tax payable would be 20% as compared with the 25% rate payable under the Income Tax Act as it now stands.

The main purpose of the tax reduction is to assist secondary industry which is exposed to foreign competition (and any tax advantage which such competitors may enjoy abroad), to changes in currency valuations and to other international factors. Therefore, certain activities which might be considered in certain circumstances to fall within the terms "manufacturing" or "processing" have been specifically excluded from the benefit of the tax reduction. Among those excluded are primary industries, construction, transportation and, to some extent, communications and other service areas.

Apart from these specific exclusions, the bill does not define which activities will fall within the scope of "manufacturing" or "processing" and which will not. As a result, some difficulty will be encountered in determining which activities will qualify for the reduction. In these cases, rulings may be obtained from the Department of National Revenue and, in the event of dispute, recourse may have to be made to the courts.

As an example, a corporation in the fishing industry would qualify for the reduced rate but only to the extent of its profits, if any, from processing fish and not in respect of its profits from its fishing activities as the latter fall within the specified exclusions. According to the Department of National Revenue, its manufacturing or processing activities would include the smoking, salting, pickling, boiling and filleting or freezing of fish.

In cases where a corporation carries on manufacturing or processing operations and other operations, the Bill provides that the amount of manufacturing or processing profits shall be determined on a formula basis to be established by regulation.

The bill also makes provision for Members of the House to introduce motions to amend the bill. This may be done at any time after March 31, 1974, but can only be accompanied by filing with the Speaker a motion signed by not less than 60 members of the House. Further, the only type of amendments that may be proposed are that the tax deduction be discontinued or reduced in amount or that its application should otherwise be restricted.

Upon the filing of such a motion, the House must consider the motion within fifteen days of the date on which it was filed. If it is approved by the House, with or without amendment, the Minister of Finance must "forthwith" take such steps as are necessary to place a measure before the House giving effect to the motion.

The use of the word "forthwith" in these provisions has been the subject of some criticism on the ground that it lacks the degree of precision necessary to ensure that a motion which has been approved by the House is given effect as quickly and expeditiously as possible. However, it is possible that this defect may be remedied before the bill comes before the Senate.

Your Committee wishes to express its appreciation for the services rendered by Mr. Albert Poissant and Mr. Charles B. Mitchell of Thorne Gunn and Co., chartered accountants, and its legal counsel, Mr. Thomas S. Gillespie of Ogilvy, Cope, Porteous, Hansard, Marler, Montgomery and Renault.

Your Committee has examined and considered Bill C-192 in accordance with its terms of reference and assuming that the amendment described above is made in a satisfactory manner, has no objection to make to the bill either in form or substance.

Respectfully submitted,

SALTER A. HAYDEN,
Chairman.

THE SENATE

Tuesday, July 10, 1973

The Senate met at 8 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

ORDERS OF THE DAY

SPEAKER'S STATEMENT ON POINT OF ORDER

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I should like to deal with the point of order which was raised by the Leader of the Opposition on Wednesday, July 4, 1973, which is to be found on page 815 of the Debates of the Senate.

Senator Flynn asked if it is within the discretion of an honourable senator to decide whether or not an order of the day should stand indefinitely. My understanding of the practice of this chamber is that the Senate itself makes all decisions. When this point of order was raised I would have been prepared to state that it is my opinion that when an order is called and the person in whose name it has been adjourned says "Stand," his action is understood to be equivalent to a motion to further adjourn the debate. Usually no objections are raised. If it happens that another senator is prepared and wishes to speak at that time, it is customary, as the Honourable Senator Martin pointed out, for the person who has asked to have the order stand to give way. If objections are raised by any senator to the order standing longer, the person who has said "Stand" should either speak or move to further adjourn the debate, and a vote should be taken on the motion.

Honourable senators, it is my opinion that, like everything else, these matters are completely in the hands of the Senate itself; and it is unthinkable that an order of the Senate could be in the hands of any one senator.

This, honourable senators, would have been my interpretation of the rules that day, and I would have been prepared to give it had it not been that twice during the discussion on the point of order raised by Senator Flynn reference was made to an opinion attributed to a former Clerk of the Senate, that the senator who had said "Stand" in such a case had the right indefinitely to control the debate.

As I have very great respect for the previous Clerk of the Senate, I felt I should look into the matter before I made any statement. I got in touch with the former Clerk of the Senate—directly by telephone, I might say, as he is out of town—and I read him the references made to his supposed opinion in this matter. He assured me that he had no recollection of ever making such a statement, and that he did not hold such an opinion. I would add that the opinion of the former Clerk confirmed my own opinion, and it is also that of the Officers at the Table.

Honourable senators, I should like to say that I have given considerable time and study to this point of order raised by Senator Flynn. I would refer honourable senators to a ruling made by the then Speaker, the Honourable Senator King, on April 11, 1946, which is reported at page 135 of Debates of the Senate of that year. The order was for the resumption of the debate on the motion for the second reading of a bill. The senator who had adjourned the debate said "Stand" when the order was called. One senator expressed his opposition to the adjournment, and the Speaker ruled as follows:

> Honourable members, the order in question is: "Resuming the adjourned debate on the motion for the second reading of Bill G, an Act to amend the Dairy Industry Act." It will be recalled that yesterday the honourable leader to my left (Hon. Mr. Haig) adjourned the debate. Today he has asked that the order stand. That is tantamount to a motion for the further adjournment of the debate. The matter is now in the hands of the house.

Following that, His Honour, the Speaker called for the Contents and Non-contents, and the vote was taken.

Honourable senators, I fully concur in that decision, and I would be ready to follow that practice and precedent should I be called to make a ruling in similar circumstances.

INCOME TAX ACT (No. 3)

BILL TO AMEND—FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-193, to amend the statute law relating to income tax (No. 3).

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. Paul Martin: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding Rule 44(1)(f), I move that this bill be read the second time later this day.

Motion agreed to.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Hon. Paul Martin: Honourable senators, I beg to table certain documents required to be tabled.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: By law?

Hon. Mr. Martin: Some, but not these. These by tradition.

Hon. Mr. Molgat: By courtesy.

Hon. Mr. Martin tabled:

> Text of the Final Recommendations of the Helsinki Consultations relating to the Conference on Security and Co-operation in Europe.

Statement by the Secretary of State for External Affairs to the Conference on Security and Co-operation in Europe, Helsinki, July 4, 1973.

Submission of Canada in accordance with Chapter 1, paragraph 6(b) of the Final Recommendations of the Helsinki Consultations, made in Helsinki, July 5, 1973.

Communiqué of the first stage of the Conference on Security and Co-operation in Europe, which took place in Helsinki, July 3-7, 1973.

INCOME TAX

REPORT OF BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE COMMITTEE ON ADVANCE EXAMINATION OF BILL C-193, TO AMEND THE STATUTE LAW RELATING TO INCOME TAX (No. 3) TABLED AND PRINTED AS AN APPENDIX

Hon. Salter A. Hayden: Honourable senators, I have the honour to table the report of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce on Bill C-193, to amend the statute law relating to income tax (No. 3), which was authorized by the Senate on June 14 last to examine any bill based on the budget resolutions relating to income tax in advance of the bill's coming before the Senate, or any matter relating thereto.

I would ask that this report be printed as an appendix to the Debates of the Senate and to the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate of this day and form part of the permanent record of this house.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(For text of report see appendix, pp. 847-850.)

TRANSPORT AND COMMUNICATIONS

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MEET DURING SITTINGS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Leopold Langlois, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(a), moved:

> That the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications have power to sit while the Senate is sitting tomorrow, Wednesday, July 11, 1973, and Thursday, July 12, 1973, and that Rule 76(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Explain!

● (2010)

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Honourable senators, the Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications is probably in a better position to explain this than I am. Nevertheless, as I announced last Thursday when moving the adjournment of the Senate until today, the Transport and Communications Committee will be sitting tomorrow and on Thursday, studying the question of television advertising made in the United States, and the possibility of having such advertising made completely in Canada. Witnesses from outside Ottawa, from Montreal and Toronto, have been invited to appear before the committee to give evidence.

This motion concerns the sittings of the Senate tomorrow afternoon and Thursday afternoon since the committee has scheduled sittings to commence at 2 o'clock tomorrow and at 3 o'clock on Thursday. In the circumstances it is possible that only a short part of our proceedings in the chamber would be affected by the sittings of the committee.

I understand that the matter has been discussed between Senator Bourget, the chairman of the committee, and the Leader of the Opposition. I commend this motion to the house.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I agree that Senator Bourget has talked to me about this, but that does not mean I have indicated my agreement.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: I did not say that.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I know you didn't, but there was an implication. As honourable senators know, we on this side of the house are opposed to this kind of motion. Here again, however, we are faced with a fait accompli because witnesses have been summoned, and it would create quite a disturbance if we were to oppose the motion. I must further say that I think the committee is doing a rush job and I disagree with the methods it is following. Trying to solve or even to report on a problem of this magnitude, after three or four sittings, especially at this time of year, in my opinion, is not wise. However, I shall leave the responsibility to the majority in this place—which certainly is not around me.

Hon. Mr. Bourget: Honourable senators, it is not my intention to add much to what has been said by Senator Langlois. He has given the reasons why the committee has asked leave to sit while the Senate is sitting. It will be recalled that this motion was approved at the end of June and the subject matter was referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications. As you are aware, Senator Haig unfortunately was ill and I was asked to act as chairman of the committee. We had our first meeting at the beginning of July and it was decided, because of the importance of the subject matter, that the committee should make some kind of recommendation to the Senate.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: That is right, some kind of recommendation.

Hon. Mr. Bourget: And that is the reason a decision was taken by the committee to hear witnesses starting today. We did start this afternoon and heard two groups. Tomorrow morning and afternoon we shall hear from four more and from a further four on Thursday.

I understand that the Leader of the Opposition is quite right; we did ask for permission because we had to face special circumstances. We have now started our work, and invitations have been sent to witnesses from Montreal and Toronto. Some of them are already here, and I hope the Senate will agree with the motion moved by Senator Langlois.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: Honourable senators, I object to this motion on principle. And, as I have said before, I intend to object any time that any committee asks permission to sit while the Senate is sitting. There are very good reasons for this, particularly from the point of view of this group here where we have a real problem in discharging our responsibilities in the Senate and in committees.

I have the very greatest respect for Senator Bourget who, as a former Speaker, I know is most anxious to keep the rules of the house and would not have suggested this extraordinary proceeding, which it is, without good reason. Nevertheless, I have to say that the worst reason I can think of is that we are faced with a situation of un fait accompli. The fact that notices have been sent out to witnesses and the witnesses have been told that they will be heard when the Senate is sitting is not in my view a good argument. I would hope that before granting leave, as I understand leave is required—that is unanimous consent to the suspension of our rules—the chairman of the committee will consider the possibility of hearing the witnesses when the Senate rises tomorrow and on Thursday. I do not think in either case it would be a great inconvenience. If he finds it to be so, I will be glad to reconsider my present position, which might be not to give leave. I leave myself in the hands of the chairman of the committee. I must reiterate that I object and will always object to the Senate being faced with this argument of un fait accompli, that witnesses have been called and we cannot do anything about it. Surely the Senate should be consulted before arrangements are made with outside witnesses?

Hon. Mr. Bourget: Honourable senators, I do not know what arrangements could be changed, because we have witnesses arriving tomorrow afternoon at 2 o'clock. One arrangement which could probably be made with the witnesses would be to hear them at 3 o'clock rather than 2 o'clock. I would remind honourable senators that this permission has been granted many times. In my opinion our committees endeavour to do good work for the people of Canada and it is worth while that this permission be granted. It is not according to the rules, but in a case such as this we have very good reasons to hear the witnesses because the subject matter we are considering at the moment will have beneficial effect on employment in Canada. I therefore leave it to you. I am only one senator and if you decide that we cannot hear them tomorrow, it is up to you and I will telephone them and inform them that we will not be able to do so. Whatever you decide is your own decision.

Hon. Mr. Asselin: Are your witnesses in Ottawa now?

Hon. Mr. Bourget: They certainly are.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: Senator Bourget has made a compromise suggestion, which is very typical of him. Perhaps I could go along a little way and suggest to him that tomorrow he might hold his hearings at 2.30, so that the Senate could assemble and show its best face. On Thursday his hearings could be held when the Senate rises which, if custom prevails, will not be late.

Hon. Mr. Bourget: I will be more generous than my honourable friend and say that we will endeavour to sit at 3 o'clock instead of 2.30. We will do so even on Thursday. Tonight, however, we found it necessary to sit until 20 minutes to 7. I did not have time for a cup of coffee.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: Make it 2.30.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, has the Honourable Senator Langlois leave to move his motion?

[Hon. Mr. Grosart.]

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: On division.

Motion agreed to, on division.

VIETNAM

DISCLOSURE IN PENTAGON PAPERS OF ROLE OF THE HONOURABLE PAUL MARTIN IN PEACE NEGOTIATIONS DURING 1964-66—QUESTION

Hon. David Walker: Honourable senators, I should like to ask the honourable Leader of the Government if a certain article appearing in the Toronto Star today is correct?

The Pentagon Papers, which reflect the official thinking of the United States, have sprung another leak today. The Star reveals that during the crucial years 1964-66 the leader of this house, at that time Canada's Minister of External Affairs, stood up to the Americans, to the great annoyance of members of the State Department, and insisted that the Canadian channel to Hanoi be kept open and that every possible Canadian effort should be continued to bring about in any way possible a just peace between the United States and Vietnam.

● (2020)

This is a most interesting disclosure, and I should like to ask the leader whether it is true. If so, he is to be congratulated on his courage; and to date he certainly has kept his light in this matter under a bushel. If it is true, I should like to ask whether he is including it in the memoirs he is currently writing.

Hon. Mr. Martin: The answer to both questions is yes.

Hon. Mr. Walker: Touché!

INCOME TAX ACT (No. 2)

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Salter A. Hayden moved the second reading of Bill C-192, to amend the Income Tax Act (No. 2).

He said: Honourable senators, Bill C-192 has been a long time coming. Since it first saw the light of day in the May budget of 1972 every manufacturer and processor, and perhaps members of the public generally, have been thinking about it, and a lot of them have been talking about it.

Here it is now before the Senate for second reading, so it would appear that it is well on its way to the stage where it may become the law of the land.

The Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, on an order of reference from this chamber, conducted hearings in connection with this bill, and a report was tabled last Thursday reviewing its provisions. The report concluded by saying that the committee has no objection to make to the bill in either form or substance.

Starting from that premise, may I tell honourable senators a little about the bill? I would assume that a lot of it, by the process of osmosis or otherwise, has become a matter of fairly common knowledge to everyone who reads the newspapers these days. The purpose of the bill is to provide for a reduction in the rates of tax on manufacturing and processing profits of corporations. This applies to the year starting January 1, 1973 and in subsequent years, reducing the effective rate, of course, from 49 per cent, which is the tax for this year. The tax rate that will be applicable, when the bill becomes law, in respect to the year 1973 will be 40 per cent. There will be a gradual reduction of that 9 per cent between now and 1976. The 40 per cent remains constant.

In the meantime, the general provision in our law under which corporate taxation was to go down by 1 per cent a year reaches its period in 1976, so that from 1976 on the 9 per cent, which is the effective rate of reduction this year to bring the corporate rate down to 40 per cent, will then become 6 per cent, and it will remain constant until Parliament changes it thereafter at 6 per cent, and therefore a 40 per cent corporate rate.

There is provision in the bill, of course, where there are strict fiscal periods and where some corporations have part of their fiscal period in 1972 and part in 1973, to prorate the profits so that the proper proportion of manufacturing and processing profits earned in 1973 will receive the lower rate of tax.

I should tell you, too, that there is no particular definition of "manufacturing" and "processing." Rather, the bill proceeds by way of exclusions. Clause 1(3)(b) on page 4 of the bill sets out the exclusions. The first item listed is "farming or fishing," and there then follows an enumeration of many other headings.

The purpose in the selection, we were told, was to have this reduced rate of tax benefit secondary industry; that primary industry is in a better position to take care of itself, but secondary industry is in direct competition with industry which enjoys tax advantages by reason of the new tax provisions in the law of the United States, and it is, therefore, necessary to improve the tax position of Canadian secondary industry so that it will be able to compete to offset the effects of currency revaluations, and to engage in the kind of international trade that we have at the present time.

We did ask, in the course of our committee study, because the exclusions are very general—"farming and fishing," for instance, "logging," "construction," and so on—how one would obtain reliable information as to whether or not he, as a manufacturer or processor, was entitled to the benefit of this reduced rate of tax. We had before us a representative of the Department of National Revenue, and to test him we asked this question: Under the heading of "fishing," for instance, what would be included and thus qualify for the processing tax reduction, and what would be excluded and thus not so qualify? His answer was, "As an example, a corporation in the fishing industry would qualify for the reduced rate, but only to the extent of its profit, it any, from processing fish and not in respect of its profit from its fishing activity, as the latter falls within the specific exclusions." According to the Department of National Revenue, the manufacturing and processing activities of a fishing company would include the smoking, salting, pickling, boiling, filleting and freezing of fish. So we have an illustration of the expansion that may take place by way of the rulings that might be granted, one way or the other, on interpretation. I am not giving any guarantee of anything I am saying here tonight—

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I hope not.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: —as to whether the exclusions are going to be narrowed or broadened, but rulings, as I understand them, are intended to provide interpretation; to tell you whether you are within or without the particular coverage. At least, the facility will be there to do that.

Apart from that, the one problem that seemed to bother the members in the other place was the character of this legislation, and the duration for which it might remain in force before there could be any effective challenge. In the language of the bill as it stood when it got to the second reading stage there was some provision to cover that point; that is, that if 60 members of the house signed a motion and filed it with the Speaker, and followed the other proceedings, the Minister of Finance forthwith would do certain things.

It was felt that that was not an adequate or a sufficiently specific provision in that regard. Accordingly, what has been done is this—and I do not think I can do better than just read the provision, because if I attempt to paraphrase it some of my friends may say, "Your paraphrasing has departed a little bit in the interpretation that we think should be put on these provisions." The provisions are:

> (3) Where, at any time after March 31, 1974, a motion for the consideration of the House of Commons, signed by not less than sixty members of the House, is filed with the Speaker to the effect that section 125.1 of the Income Tax Act, as enacted by subsection (1), be amended, or to the effect that subsection (2) be amended, so as to
>
> (a) discontinue the deduction that would otherwise be permitted by the said section 125.1,
>
> (b) reduce the amount of the deduction that would otherwise be permitted by that section, or
>
> (c) in any other manner, restrict the application of the provisions of that section, for any period commencing after the motion is filed, the House of Commons shall, within the first fifteen days next after the motion is filed that the House is sitting, in accordance with the Rules of the House, take up and consider the motion, and if the motion, with or without amendments, is approved by the House, the Minister of Finance shall take such steps as are necessary in order that a measure in his name giving effect to the motion may be placed before the House without delay.

The time for deciding the questions involved is in the next subsection, appearing on page 6 of the bill, which is this:

> (4) All questions in connection with any motion taken up and considered by the House of Commons pursuant to subsection (3) shall be debated without interruption and decided not later than the end of the third sitting day next after the day the motion is first so taken up and considered and any measure required to be placed before the House pursuant to that subsection giving effect to any such motion shall be placed before the House not later than the end of the fifteenth sitting day next after the day the motion, with or without amendments, is approved by the House, and all questions in connection with any such measure shall be debated without interruption and decided not later than the end of the seventh sitting day next after the day the measure is first so placed before the House.

Generally, in the particularity of the terms of this kind, this measure was raised in the House of Commons by the Opposition members, and in the course of the debate on second reading and debate the Minister of Finance indicated that at the committee stage he would propose a motion, which he has done, which I describe very briefly as being a motion to define what is the meaning of "forthwith." In the original bill as it was introduced in the other place the word "forthwith" occurred as to the taking of the action by the minister. Now the detail has been spelled out with time limits so that the motion, the will of the members of the Commons and the measure itself, must proceed within certain time limits if it is the desire of the house to make any of the changes that are indicated here—that is, to discontinue the deduction, to reduce the amount of the deduction, or in any other manner restrict the application of the provisions of that section.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: There is no provision for extending the benefit of the reduction to other classes of business, or generally to corporations.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: The effect of the failure of such a motion to be made, or to be signed as required, or the measure following the motion to be carried, would be to continue in operation the provisions of the bill until such time as Parliament takes steps to repeal it.

Honourable senator, there is one other thing I should tell you. Small businesses engaged in manufacturing and processing operations, and earning profits, enjoy a general corporate tax rate of 25 per cent, so the special rate in their case would be 20 per cent.

This is the substance of the bill. It is now detailed before the Senate in the report we tabled, and in the explanation I have made. I expect that in due course, notwithstanding these steps, the Senate might wish the bill to go to committee.

Hon. Ernest C. Manning: Honourable senators, I rise to make one brief comment on this bill, and also to raise one question, which I hope the sponsor of the bill (Hon. Mr. Hayden) will comment on in closing the debate, or perhaps the government leader if he is in possession of the information necessary.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: He should be.

Hon. Mr. Manning: The stated objective of the provision, to reduce corporation tax as it applies to processing industries, is to provide an incentive for further expansion and growth of such industries, in the hope that it will facilitate in creating job opportunities and help combat the problem of unemployment. I think we can all agree that that is a desirable objective.

What I believe has caused concern and disappointment in the way this legislation has been handled is the long delay that has occurred before this statute becomes law. We are now past the middle of 1973. The processing industries of this country have, up until very recently, been left in a state of uncertainty as to whether or not this tax adjustment was going to be effective this year. How can we expect legislation of this kind to have any significant impact on such industries in planning for expansion and growth when they have been left in a state of uncertainty by reason of the long delay in getting this legislation before the other place, and finally before this chamber?

We also have in the bill, as was pointed out, a provision that makes the future of this tax adjustment very uncertain. What is being provided is a statute that will, after the bill passes this house, assure processing industries a tax adjustment for a period no longer than the present fiscal year. I do not suggest there were not valid reasons for asking for some type of review provision to be included, but under the provision included in the bill no processing industries can plan on any expansion of their operation if that expansion is dependant upon assurance of a lower corporate tax rate for 1974, because the whole thing can very easily be changed or thrown out completely under the review provision embodied in the bill as it now stands.

I make those comments because if we are genuine in saying we require a reduction in corporation tax on processing industries for the purpose of encouraging growth and expansion to help combat unemployment, it is ironic that there is included in this bill a provision that to a large extent nullifies what it purports to do. It is equally regrettable that its enactment has been delayed so long that very few processing industries have made plans this year to expand on the strength of this legislation because they could not be certain the bill would become law at all.

● (2040)

The other point I would like to raise in the form of a question is something which obviously is not covered in the bill and yet is very pertinent to the attainment of the objective the bill is intended to achieve. I am wondering if the sponsor could advise us whether, in the long process of bringing this bill to its present state, the Government of Canada has obtained from the provincial governments any undertaking that they will not offset the corporate tax reduction by a comparable increase in provincial corporate taxation.

I ask this question particularly because in three provinces today we have governments of the same political persuasion as the group in the other place which has vehemently and consistently opposed corporate tax reduction since it was first suggested. It would be ironic to make provision to reduce corporate taxes at the national level and then have some provincial governments counteract the benefit by an increase in provincial corporate taxation putting the corporate tax back to what it was before.

I appreciate that the Government of Canada cannot dictate what the provinces will do, but in view of the purpose for which this bill was introduced, I wonder if any effort was made by the Government of Canada to obtain an undertaking from the provinces that no such action would be taken. I believe all honourable senators would be interested in any information that could be provided to us in that regard.

On motion of Senator Flynn, debate adjourned.

INCOME TAX ACT (No. 3)

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Salter A. Hayden moved the second reading of Bill C-193, to amend the statute law relating to income tax (No. 3).

He said: Honourable senators, if it can be said that there are goodies in tax bills, why, there are a few goodies in this one—to the extent that exemptions are increased, and to the extent that there is the additional 2 per cent deduction from basic tax, to 5 per cent, with a limit of $500. Of course, I suppose one's definition of "goodies" depends upon the position in which one finds himself, and the measure of the goodies would depend on that level, so as for those who are not encouraged to say that these goodies represent some value, there is no way in which I can attempt or would attempt to persuade them.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Applying to it the language of C. D. Howe.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: I will let my friend in his own good time when he is making his own speech say what he has to say. I would prefer to pick my own words and express them in my own way, and take responsibility for them.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I do not doubt that.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: May I say that there are three main features in this bill, and I think it is fair to say that in the Commons when they were reviewing this bill they really looked at these three items. The first was the 2 per cent deduction up to $500; the second, the tax exemption for single and married people, plus the benefits that go down in different combinations from spouse to spouse and from spouse to dependent relationships. These were the two main items. The third item was a very important one but which seemed to be a bit confusing—that is, the proposals in the bill for reflecting the effect of inflation in an endeavour to correct the effect of inflation as it might relate to the taxable earnings of people, and it might represent how much of their increased earnings is due to inflation which would mean, therefore, that they would be paying taxes on the inflationary aspect while their real earnings are substantially less.

During the hearing which we conducted Mr. M. A. Cohen of the Department of Finance appeared before us, and he worked out a couple of examples to indicate the effect of making certain assumptions on the consumer price index. First of all, the way this plan respecting the consumer price index will work is that you take a period from September 30, 1972 to September 30, 1973, and determine the increase in the consumer price index for that period, which is the quantum of price index that you use to affect the earnings and the taxes that will be paid by the individual in 1974. Here are the examples. I hope it will not worry you if I read them to you at once.

The first example shows that for a person with rising income, the proportion of his income paid in taxes would not increase as a result of inflation.

This is made on the basis of an assumption that the average consumer price index is 4 per cent in the period.

For a person on a fixed income, the result of indexing would be to reduce his taxes each year as prices rise.

Example No. 1: A married taxpayer with two children under 16 and a salary income of $8,000 has total exemptions and deductions for 1973 to $3,850—made up of the $3,000 married exemption, two children's deductions of $300, the standard $100 medical and charitable deduction and the standard $150 employment expense allowance.

On his first $500 of taxable income this year he pays a federal rate of 15 per cent, on the next $500 a rate of 18 per cent, and progressively higher rates up the income scale. His marginal rate—the rate he pays on taxable income in the last bracket he reaches—would be 21 per cent. When his basic federal tax is determined in this way, a provincial tax is applied as a percentage of the federal tax, with the percentage varying according to province. Finally; his federal tax is reduced by $100, the minimum amount of the new tax cut. Total federal and provincial tax for this taxpayer, assuming the lowest provincial rate, would be $939.

Assuming the same taxpayer's income increased 4 per cent to $8,320, instead of $8,000, and the inflation factor was 4 per cent, this would be the result of the indexing system for him: His married exemption would increase to $3,120 from $3,000. His deductions for two children would go to $624 from $600. With standard deductions, his total exemptions and deductions would come to $3,994 instead of $3,850. His first bracket of taxable income would be $520 instead of $500. Each of the next brackets would also increase by 4 per cent. The cumulative effect would be a total federal and provincial tax of $984, or almost precisely the same proportion of his income as before. His tax without indexing—that is, taking the general rates without any indexing—would have been $1,027.

● (2050)

It would appear from this example, therefore, reflecting in this fashion the consumer price index in the income and the exemptions and the rates in this particular instance, and in all instances that are parallel to this, that there would be no appreciable difference in the taxpayer's tax liability, or the liability to tax that he would have to pay.

Example No. 2: A person 65 or over with a fixed income of $4,000 has exemptions and deductions totalling $2,700. These include a basic exemption of $1,600, the special exemption of $1,000 for persons 65 or over, plus the $100 standard deduction.

His tax in 1973, after the budget measures and assuming the lowest provincial rate, is $190. Under the new system, again assuming a 4 per cent inflation factor, his total exemptions and deductions are raised to $2,804 from $2,700. The tax brackets are increased in the same way. His tax under the indexed system is $163. He pays less tax as a result of indexing being applied to the tax system.

These are illustrations. I suppose one might pick a variety of incomes and possibly achieve some different results, but, as you go up the income scale as it exists at the present time, the areas between certain groupings of income are constant so that for some it may be as much as $10,000 or $15,000. So there is elbow room between that spread between the higher tax rate and the next higher tax rate to take up some of the increase.

I am not saying it will take up all of it, but I would assume that the design, in attempting to relate inflation to income and to exemptions and to tax rates, is a design that is worth trying out, because there may be some real benefit to taxpayers. Certainly, they need all the relief they can get, particularly if the spiral of inflation is going to continue.

Those illustrations I have used appear in the report which I tabled earlier tonight.

I should tell you that once again we find a reflection of the work done by the Senate, and a recommendation that we made in 1971, which finally finds its way into law now. It is one reflection and there may be more on the way. Here's hoping.

The bill provides in clause 6 that processors of natural resources will be allowed to claim depletion allowances, which hitherto were only claimable by owners or operators of natural resources. The recommendation we made at that time was that the processors should be entitled to a depletion allowance, the same as an owner. There is another feature dealing with processors of mining or resource properties, namely, that taxpayers disposing of resource properties will be entitled to purchase income averaging annuities from the proceeds of disposition of such properties. Heretofore they had to include the entire proceeds of disposition in income. So by being able to invest the proceeds of disposition in an income averaging annuity they reduce the burden of tax. Instead of paying tax as income on the entire proceeds of disposition they will pay tax on the income derivable from the annuity in each year, which certainly lowers and spreads out the tax liability. This is a definite benefit in that area.

There is another benefit which, although we cannot claim it as having been instigated by the Senate, we skated so far around the subject and through it that perhaps we left a powerful suggestion. That benefit is that this bill contemplates an amendment to the application rules—that is, the ITAR—to increase the amount of lump sum payments paid out of pension funds and deferred profit-sharing plans which would continue to be subject to the special averaging rules which existed prior to the amendment of the act in 1971.

If you will recall, people in these profit-sharing plans enjoyed the benefit of a special section, section 36, in the then Income Tax Act, and the taxpayer's money went in without deduction of any allowance. Then, when it was coming out as a lump sum payment, the taxpayer was entitled to the benefits of section 36, which was more generous in its deductions and averaging than the general law. Certainly, it was far more so than under the law since January 1972.

This bill provides that the amounts subject to the averaging rules would be increased from the amounts vested—and I emphasize the word "vested"—on January 1, 1972, to the amounts credited on January 1, 1972.

There is a great difference between vesting and crediting, because under the terms and conditions of that deferred profit-sharing plan there may be a vesting provided for in each year of some amount that vests in that particular member, but there would be a larger amount that would stand to his credit. Under the bill as it was originally framed, the vesting was the critical thing which exposed the member of the plan to more in the way of tax.

Now, by giving him the benefit of what has been credited and being able to take that benefit under the old section 36, which was the real beneficial section to the members of this plan, it is of considerable benefit to the member in this category of deferred profit-sharing plans to have a lump sum payment coming out as and when the plan matures.

When I was talking to you last on Bill C-170, I spoke about thin capitalization. You may have forgotten, but I described it rather colloquially as being companies usually created by non-residents where they are long on debt and short on equity. The benefit of that, of course, is substantial in the way of lessening withholding tax. Then the interest, of course, is a deductible item of expense for the company.

One exception is made in this bill to that thin capitalization rule, and that exemption under clause 2, subclause (2), is the aircraft industry, which as one can readily see is an industry which of necessity would be long on debt and therefore much shorter on equity. It would avoid the provisions in the bill which are now law under which if your ratio of debt to equity exceeds 3 to 1, then the excess is the dividend and not a deductible item of expense. So an exception is being made for the aircraft industry.

• (2100)

There are many other changes. Some of them deal with situations that, when the bill was drafted and came into law, were not thought of as particular cases that might happen. I am thinking of one situation in particular in connection with amalgamations. There is a section here dealing with amalgamations and the question of rollover.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: The amalgamation of corporations?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: The amalgamation of two companies, yes.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I was asking the question because I was wondering why these provisions were to be found in this bill rather than in the Corporate Tax Act which we dealt with before.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: I cannot speculate as to why.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I can.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: Of course you may have a larger crystal ball and a more penetrating eye.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: For obvious reasons.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: Let me give you an illustration of what might be involved. When you have an amalgamation of two companies, as any honourable senators who are lawyers know, there emerges an amalgamated company. The question then was: what happens when the shares of the two companies go into an amalgamated company and come out of the shares of the amalgamated company? There was provision for that type of situation in Bill C-259, to amend the Income Tax Act, and the general provision was that you would have a rollover, if on the way through, the common shares of both companies and the common shares to which they were entitled in the amalgamated company were in excess—that is to say if the holdings were in excess—of 25 per cent of the original holdings in the original companies.

Apparently difficulties arose when the two companies that went into the amalgamation had different types of common shares under the definition in the Income Tax Act, and they did not have all those classes of common shares in the amalgamated company. So they have made provision that if you have 25 per cent in common shares or 25 per cent in dollar value, the rollover privilege applies and you carry through the necessary transfer of shares without being subject to a situation where there would be proceeds of disposition at that time.

That, honourable senators, was just an illustration. I intended to say that this bill in general is to cover a number of situations that have arisen and that could reasonably be said to be within the policy or the intention of those who drafted the particular clauses, but for one reason or another—and I am waiting to hear Senator Flynn's explanation as to the reasons which he feels are behind this—they didn't do it all at once. It really would be a modern miracle if they did, because ever since the income tax law came in in 1917, I do not think we have missed a year in which we did not have income tax amendments.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: We have had three this year.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: At any rate, as long as there is income tax and as long as complex business situations develop from day to day, then you will have amendments to that income tax law. And that is quite properly so, because it should reflect the business operations of the particular time. When our income tax law ceases to do that, then it is not carrying out its designed purpose and is working against the economic interest instead of working with it.

Having said that, I might weary you by going through, clause by clause, the many changes incorporated in this bill. Most of them are clear, however, and speak for themselves. I have dealt with the major ones. In the report which I tabled this evening you have a reasonably full explanation, and any further mention of the particular clauses might just prove to be a wearying process. However, I should mention that there is a provision which shows that perhaps even those who draft our income tax laws have a heart. I say this, honourable senators, because there is a provision in the bill under which a regulation is codified into law enabling the minister to instruct an employer to deduct less by way of withholding tax than the amount that would appear to be deductible at any given time under the strict interpretation of the statute. Let me give you an example. It may well be that a pensioner who is subject to withholding tax starts early in the year developing such a rash of medical expenses, for instance, that it will be quite easy to look forward and project the situation and see that he will be paying money by way of withholding tax, and that the employer would be deducting such money at a time when it would appear that in no earthly way would he be subject to that amount of tax at the end of the year. So, there is provision in the law, the codified regulations, to enable such an instruction to be sent to the employer. That is a beneficial aspect. Now, some people may say that it is a minor one, but if half a dozen pensioners benefit by it, then it is worthwhile.

I think I have covered the other provisions pretty well except to give one further illustration dealing with mutual funds, pool trust funds, et cetera, which serve a purpose in acquiring securities for pension funds, retirement savings funds, and which are required to meet certain tests. One test is that the mutual fund must have a shareholder list of 150, and the interest of any one particular shareholder in that fund must be at least $500. Any investment that was made in the mutual fund trust at a time when it did not meet these requirements would become a non-eligible investment, and this would be working a hardship on pension plans, retirement savings plans, et cetera.

• (2110)

So there is not only provision to remove that classification of non-eligible investment in this regard but also to increase very substantially the penalty if this is used for any purpose not intended by the granting of the privilege. In other words, if there appears to be any abuse of this privilege in recognizing the eligibility of investment transactions between a pension fund and a mutual trust fund in which the mutual trust fund did not at that moment meet the full legal requirements, the feeling expressed to us in committee was that the more severe penalty provided would act as a check. The penalty is one per cent of the cost of any such non-eligible investment.

I could continue in this way for some time, but, to be frank, I do not believe it would contribute much to the general fund of knowledge. They are particular cases and, unless you are interested in a particular case and have a question in relation to it, you can read them. We have endeavoured to elaborate on them in our report.

Mr. M. A. Cohen, Assistant Deputy Minister of Finance, appeared before the committee and we considered this bill clause by clause with the benefit of his information as to the present law in each case, the purpose of the amendment, and why it was proposed. We now have all those answers so we are in possession of all the information. The disposition of this bill after it is debated is a matter for the Senate to decide. We have conducted our examination of the bill. We have heard the witnesses whom we would hear once more if it were referred to committee. That may be in line with the procedures which we have invariably adopted. I am not making any recommendation at this time, but simply awaiting the ruling of the Senate.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Honourable senators, I intend to move the adjournment of the debate after one or two words. There is an obvious reason why the debate should be adjourned, in that the honourable Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce has tonight tabled the committee's report with respect to this bill. The report will appear as an appendix to the Debates of the Senate and the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate tomorrow, when honourable senators will have an opportunity to read it.

I would say that I did not find it possible to attend the committee meeting this afternoon when the report was approved, drafted or corrected. All I was able to read tonight was that the committee has examined and considered Bill C-193 in accordance with its terms of reference, and has no objection to make to the bill, either in form or in substance. I believe if I had been able to attend the committee meeting this afternoon I would have wished to qualify that part of the report in some manner. It may be that we have no amendment to propose, but having no objection is not entirely in the same vein as having no amendment.

In any event, I hope that honourable senators will have an opportunity to read the report before we meet tomorrow, and be able to assess the work of the committee, which in my opinion was excellent. I would say once more, however, that I would have qualified the concluding paragraph of the report.

At this time, therefore, I move the adjournment of the debate, reserving the right to yield to any honourable senator.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: I wonder if my friend would permit me to mention one matter before the debate stands adjourned? I neglected to inform honourable senators that two amendments were made to this bill in committee of the House of Commons. They might be missed if reference were made to the bill as at first reading, rather than as passed. Of course, in the bill as passed, specific attention is not called to the amendments and I might take a moment to explain them.

One is in connection with the cash purchase ticket which is issued to a taxpayer in respect of grain delivered in a taxation year of a taxpayer to a primary elevator. Such ticket entitles the holder thereof to payment by the operator of the elevator of the purchase price, without interest, stated in the ticket for the grain at a date that is after the end of that taxation year. The effect of the amendment is that if the payment on that cash ticket does not fall due until the following year, the taxpayer does not have to include the amount of the ticket in his income for that year, but for the immediately following year.

The other amendment is in connection with the treatment of government rights. I shall explain it, although I believe a mere reading of it will make it clear. For instance, the previous amendment made in the committee of the House of Commons required a taxpayer to include in his income a portion of the proceeds received by him in the sale of goodwill and other nothings. Section 21(1) of the ITAR presently provides that, with respect to government rights owned by a taxpayer on January 1, 1972, the amount to be included in his income will be based on the excess of his proceeds received upon the sale over his cost. That is the present law. The amendment to the bill provides that in certain circumstances the amount to be included in income is to be based on the lesser of (i) the excess of proceeds received over cost; or (ii) the excess of proceeds received over the fair market value of the government right at December 31, 1971.

Those are the two amendments which are to be found in the Votes and Proceedings of the House of Commons of July 4, 1973.

I am sorry that my honourable friend was not at our meeting this afternoon. We might have had the benefit of his excellent judgment and his precise choice of words, and might not have fallen into the error of using the word "objection."

Hon. Mr. Walker: Honourable senators, do I understand my honourable friend to say that having regard to the fact that this matter has been considered so thoroughly already in committee there will be no necessity to refer it to committee again, unless something new is introduced in the debate which is to ensue tomorrow?

Hon. Mr. Grosart: We will decide that later.

Hon. Mr. Walker: That is a suggestion.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: We can assess the situation after the conclusion of the debate.

On motion of Senator Flynn, debate adjourned.

• (2120)

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

MEETINGS OF THE STANDING COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN AFFAIRS AT THE EUROPEAN COMMUNITY, BRUSSELS, BELGIUM—DEBATE CONCLUDED

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Grosart calling the attention of the Senate to the meetings of the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs held at the European Community in Brussels, Belgium, 19th to 23rd March, 1973.—(Honourable Senator Martin, P.C.).

Hon. Mr. Martin: Honourable senators, I think we should consider this order as having been debated. Senator Aird has indicated that he will be bringing in the report of the committee on Thursday, and it is not my intention to proceed.

The Hon. the Speaker: As no other honourable senator wishes to participate in this debate, this inquiry is considered as having been debated.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

APPENDIX

(See p. 839.)

STANDING SENATE COMMITTEE ON BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE

REPORT ON BILL C–193, INTITULED

"AN ACT TO AMEND THE STATUTE LAW RELATING TO INCOME TAX (NO. 3)",

IN ADVANCE OF THE SAID BILL COMING BEFORE THE SENATE

The Honourable Salter A. Hayden, Q.C., Chairman

THE STANDING SENATE COMMITTEE ON BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE

The Honourable Salter A. Hayden, Chairman

The Honourable Senators,

Aird	Hayden
Beaubien	Hays
Blois	Laing
Buckwold	Lang
Burchill	Macnaughton
Connolly (Ottawa West)	*Martin
Cook	McIlraith
Desruisseaux	Molson
*Flynn	Smith
Gélinas	Sullivan
Haig	Walker (20)

*Ex officio members

(Quorum 5)

ORDER OF REFERENCE

Extract from the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate, June 14th, 1973:

The Honourable Senator Connolly, P.C., for the Honourable Senator Hayden moved, seconded by the Honourable Senator Laing, P.C.:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce be authorized to examine and consider any bill based on the Budget Resolutions relating to income tax in advance of the said bill coming before the Senate, or any matter relating thereto; and

That the Committee have power to engage the services of such counsel, staff and technical advisers as may be necessary for the purpose of the said examination.

After debate, and—
The question being put on the motion, it was—
Resolved in the affirmative.

ROBERT FORTIER,
Clerk of the Senate.

TUESDAY, 10th July, 1973

Introduction

The purpose of Bill C-193, intituled: "An Act to Amend the Statute Law Relating to Income Tax (No. 3)", is to implement in part the Ways and Means motion to amend the Income Tax Act and the Income Tax Application Rules, 1971, notice of which was given by the Minister of Finance on May 29, 1973.

By resolution of the Senate on June 14, 1973, the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce was authorized to examine and consider any bill based on the Budget Resolutions relating to income tax in advance of the said bill coming before the Senate.

In accordance with the Order of Reference, your Committee has given careful consideration to the said Bill C-193, and in connection therewith has heard Mr. M. A. Cohen, Assistant Deputy Minister, Department of Finance.

Bill C-193 contains a series of amendments to the Income Tax Act and the Income Tax Application Rules. Those provisions which do not, generally speaking, provide relief to taxpayers are consequential or designed to correct anomalies in the Act and tax taxpayers in the manner previously intended. The bill contains some measures previously suggested by your Committee.

Deductions and Exemptions

It is proposed that an individual taxpayer will be entitled to deduct from tax payable in each year the greater of $100 or 5% of the basic federal tax payable. If 5% of the basic tax calculation produces an amount that is more than $500, the amount deductible will be limited to $500.

The bill proposes to increase individual exemptions from taxable income from $1,500 to $1,600 and married exemptions from taxable income from a total of $2,850 to $3,000.

A tax credit for income or profits taxes payable to the government of a state, province or other political subdivisions of another country is proposed. These taxes are presently only deductible from income.

Personal Income Tax Indexing

The principal exemptions available and the tax rates applicable to individuals will be adjusted annually, commencing in 1974, to reflect changes in the Consumer Price Index. This will mean that automatic adjustments will be made each year to most exemptions and the personal rate schedules corresponding to increases (or decreases) in the Consumer Price Index for the twelve-month period ending September 30 of the year before.

The effect will be, assuming continuing inflation, that the principal exemptions will increase and each bracket of taxable income will be adjusted upwards. Therefore, if the Consumer Price Index rises 4 percent, the first bracket of taxable income, which is taxed this year at the rate of 15 percent, will rise from $500 to $520. The next bracket, which is subject to an 18 percent rate of tax, will commence at $520 (versus $500) and will extend to $1,040) (versus $1,000), and so on through the tax schedule. The converse would apply should the Consumer Price Index decrease.

As a result, persons who have been granted increases in wages in the same proportion as increases in inflation will pay the same or approximately the same amount of federal income tax. Persons receiving a constant income, such as pensioners, will pay less.

The following examples submitted by Mr. Cohen illustrate the effect of indexing personal income taxes.

The first example shows that for a person with rising income, the proportion of his income paid in taxes would not increase as a result of inflation.

For a person on a fixed income, the result of indexing would be to reduce his taxes each year as prices rise as shown in the second example.

Example No. 1

A married taxpayer with two children under 16 and a salary income of $8,000 has total exemptions and deductions for 1973 of $3,850—made up of the $3,000 married exemption, two children's deductions of $300, the standard $100 medical and charitable deductions, and the standard $150 employment expense allowance.

On his first $500 of taxable income this year he pays a federal rate of 15 per cent, on the next $500 a rate of 18 per cent, and progressively higher rates up the income scale. His marginal rate—the rate he pays on taxable income in the last bracket he reaches—would be 21 per cent. When his basic federal tax is determined in this way, a provincial tax is applied as a percentage of the federal tax, with the percentage varying according to province. Finally, his federal tax is reduced by $100, the minimum amount of the new tax cut. Total federal and provincial tax for this taxpayer, assuming the lowest provincial rate, would be $939.

Assuming the same taxpayer's income increased 4 per cent to $8,320, and the inflation factor was 4 per cent, this would be the result of the indexing system for him:

His married exemption would increase to $3,120 from $3,000.

His deductions for two children would go to $624 from $600.

With standard deductions, his total exemptions and deductions would come to $3,994 instead of $3,850.

His first bracket of taxable income would be $520 instead of $500.

Each of the next brackets would also increase by 4 per cent.

The cumulative effect would be a total federal and provincial tax of $984, or almost precisely the same proportion of his income as before. His tax without indexing would have been $1,027.

Example No. 2

A person 65 or over with a fixed income of $4,000 has exemptions and deductions totalling $2,700. These include a basic exemption of $1,600, the special exemption of $1,000 for persons 65 or over, plus the $100 standard deduction.

His tax in 1973 after the budget measures and assuming the lowest provincial rate, is $190. Under the new system, again assuming a 4-per cent inflation factor, his total exemptions and deductions are raised to $2,804, and the tax brackets are increased in the same way. His tax under the indexed system is $163. He pays less tax as a result of indexing being applied to the tax system.

Other Amendments

New tax tables will be prepared each year giving effect to adjustments to the Consumer Price Index for the year before. To assist more taxpayers, the bill makes provision for tables showing federal income tax payable on taxable incomes up to and including $24,000. The Act, as presently drafted, only provides for tables for taxable incomes of up to and including $12,000.

A new tax is proposed by the bill in order to enable relief to be given to taxpayers by amendment to the regulations. This tax will be imposed in respect of non-qualified investments held by trusts for registered retirement saving plans and deferred profit sharing plans. The tax is imposed as a consequence of the proposal to allow by regulation certain trusts and corporations desiring to qualify as "mutual fund trusts", "mutual fund corporations" or "pooled fund trusts" to sell their units or shares to deferred income plans notwithstanding that the trusts or corporations do not so qualify because they do not have the stipulated number of participants. The Act, as presently drafted, imposes a penalty when a plan acquires a non-qualified investment. This penalty would not be adequate if proposed regulations are made to permit trusts or corporations to qualify on the basis of the property they hold. Otherwise, trusts or corporations could meet prescribed requirements at the time their units or shares were acquired by a plan and shortly thereafter switch to holding non-qualified investments.

Processors of natural resources will be allowed to claim depletion allowances which were hitherto only claimable by owners or operators of natural resources. Taxpayers disposing of resource properties will be entitled to purchase income averaging annuities from the proceeds of disposition of such properties.

The bill contemplates an amendment to the Application Rules to increase the amount of lump sum payments made out of pension funds and deferred profit sharing plans which would continue to be subject to the special averaging rules which existed prior to amendment of the Act in 1971. The amount subject to the averaging rules would be increased from the amount vested on January 1, 1972 to the amount credited on January 1, 1972.

The aircraft industry will be exempted by the bill from the thin capitalization rules of the Act and will be entitled to deduct from income the full amount of interest payable to specified non-residents.

A purchaser of taxable Canadian property from a non-resident is obliged to make sure that the non-resident has paid tax on any capital gain incurred by the non-resident upon a disposition or else deduct from the purchase price the amount of tax payable by the non-resident in respect of such capital gain. Failure to conform renders the purchaser liable for tax. The bill reduces the amount necessary to be withheld from the non-resident and the purchaser's liability from 25 percent of the capital gain to the lesser of 15 percent of the cost to the non-resident of the property sold and 25 percent of the capital gain.

Proceeds of life insurance policies received upon death are not subject to tax. The bill proposes that proceeds received upon total and permanent disability be also free from tax.

The bill also proposes to include in the Act the authority presently given to the Minister of National Revenue by regulation to determine that, in cases of undue hardship, lesser amounts may be deducted at source from a taxpayer's income. Taxpayers will also have the right to elect that deductions be made at source in circumstances where such deductions would not otherwise be made.

Your Committee wishes to express its appreciation for the services rendered in the review of the Bill by Mr. Albert Poissant and Mr. Charles B. Mitchell of Thorne Gunn & Co., chartered accountants, and its legal counsel, Mr. Thomas S. Gillespie of Ogilvy, Cope, Porteous, Hansard, Marler, Mongomery & Renault.

Your Committee has examined and considered Bill C-193 in accordance with its terms of reference and has no objection to make to the bill either in form or in substance.

Respectfully submitted,

SALTER A. HAYDEN,
Chairman.

THE SENATE

Wednesday, July 11, 1973

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

HONOURABLE JOSIE D. QUART

FELICITATIONS ON RETURN TO SENATE CHAMBER

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Honourable senators, I would like, on behalf of all honourable senators, to express our pleasure at seeing our dear colleague Senator Quart back in her seat after her illness.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Mr. Langlois: We are very pleased to see that she looks so fit and able to resume her worthwhile contribution to our deliberations in this place.

[Translation]

Welcome back and may you enjoy fine health!

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Honourable senators, needless to say, I entirely agree with Senator Langlois in welcoming back Senator Quart and wishing her the best of health.

I will add that we missed her still more than did honourable senators opposite.

[English]

Hon. Mrs. Quart: Honourable senators, may I just say thank you very much for this very warm reception that I have received in this chamber, as well as the one extended me just before coming in here. I now know that absence makes the heart grow fonder, because I missed every one of you so much, and I also missed my Senate duties.

Thank you.

Hon. Mr. Martin: May I say that I do not think I have ever seen Senator Quart looking as young, as pretty and as charming. We are very glad to have her back.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Hon. Paul Martin tabled:

Copy of Proceedings of the Royal Society of Canada, 1972, together with financial statements certified by the Auditors for the year ended February 28, 1973, pursuant to section 9 of An Act to incorporate the Royal Society of Canada, chapter 46, Statutes of Canada, 1883.

Report on operations under the Regional Development Incentives Act for the month of May 1973, pursuant to section 16 of the said act, chapter R-3, R.S.C., 1970.

LIBRARY OF PARLIAMENT

JOINT COMMITTEE—CHANGE IN SENATE MEMBERSHIP

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat moved, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(h):

That the name of the Honourable Senator Forsey be added to the list of senators serving on the Joint Committee on the Library of Parliament; and

That a message be sent to the House of Commons to acquaint that House accordingly.

Motion agreed to.

FARM IMPROVEMENT LOANS ACT

SENATE BILL REMOVED FROM HOUSE OF COMMONS ORDER PAPER—QUESTIONS

Hon. Mr. O'Leary: Honourable senators, before the Orders of the Day are proceeded with I should like to ask the Leader of the Government what ever happened to a bill passed by this house and which the Speaker of the House of Commons declared to be a money bill and beyond our jurisdiction. My understanding was that this question was referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, or to the chairman thereof. In whichever case it was, has any decision been reached regarding it?

Hon. Mr. Martin: Honourable senators, there was no formal reference to any committee in this matter. Perhaps Senator O'Leary will recall that I had suggested that the chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs might like to look at this matter. He told me, as he told the house, that this he would do.

● (1410)

Hon. Mr. Goldenberg: I should like the Senate to understand, as I think it does, that the issue which arose when the Speaker of the House declared that particular measure a money bill is an issue which has been before the people of Canada or before Parliament for 100 years. It started shortly after Confederation.

At the suggestion of the government leader, I undertook to look into it. I am doing so, and I am gathering relevant information. Some is being prepared for me. The Law Clerk of the Senate, for example, is one person who is preparing something, but he has been occupied with meetings of Senate committees. I hope to be able to express some views in due course, but I am sure that Senator O'Leary will understand that it is not a matter on which one can arrive at a decision without careful study.

Hon. Mr. O'Leary: I hope my distinguished friend isn't suggesting that we are going to have to wait another 100 years. Time is running out on me.

Hon. Mr. Goldenberg: I have promised to advise the Senate of what I think is the answer, and seeing that I undertook to do it personally, Senator O'Leary will know that it cannot possibly take another 100 years.

Hon. Mr. Sparrow: When would the honourable senator feel that a report in that regard might be available to this chamber? Are we talking in terms of this session or would it be the next session?

Hon. Mr. Goldenberg: I cannot fix a date. It depends upon the studies which I have asked to be made for me. Whether I will be able to advise the Senate before the adjournment I do not know. It may not be possible.

Hon. Mr. Martin: I would not think so.

Hon. Mr. Goldenberg: But I will in due course.

[Translation]

Hon. Mr. Asselin: I have a supplementary question for Senator Goldenberg. Why did he not call a meeting of the Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee, at which he could have obtained the opinions of the committee members instead of making the decision himself?

Hon. Mr. Goldenberg: Honourable senators, as Senator Asselin knows, it is not up to me to refer the matter to the committee. I was asked by the Senate to study the matter and to give my opinion, but it was not referred to the committee and it is not up to the chairman to refer a matter to the committee.

Hon. Mr. Asselin: A supplementary for the government leader: does he intend, when Senator Goldenberg has made his report to the government leader, to refer this issue, which is an important one, to the Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee?

Hon. Mr. Martin: I would very much like to receive the report before taking a decision or making any recommendations. But I believe that the order of procedure proposed by Senator Asselin is acceptable in principle. We will see when the report is received.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: That is extremely prudent, as is typical of the government leader.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: The product of experience!

[English]

INCOME TAX ACT (No. 2)

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from yesterday the adjourned debate on the motion of Senator Hayden for second reading of Bill C-192, to amend the Income Tax Act (No. 2).

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, last night Senator Hayden explained Bill C-192 in his usual lucid and objective way.

Hon. Mr. Walker: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: When Senator Hayden does not agree with all that is in a bill he tends to be rather objective. I would say that last night he was more objective than usual. There were some obvious reservations in his speech with regard to the effects of this bill.

The purpose, of course, has been explained several times, and we have known about this budget proposal since early 1972. I don't remember the exact date, but I think it was in the spring of 1972 that we were given the first Turner budget. The Minister of Finance explained at that time that the income tax on corporations involved in manufacturing and processing activities would be decreased by 9 per cent immediately in order to protect the jobs, dependent upon the health of those industries, and also to promote the development of many new jobs.

Honourable senators will recall that at that time the party to which I belong took the stand that perhaps this measure would not really achieve the objective indicated by the minister, and that it needed scrutiny. But in any event we felt we were under a moral obligation to this sector of industry to support this measure, at least for an experimental period of about one year.

It remained on the Order Paper when we adjourned last summer, and then, of course, the election ensued with the result that the legislation could not be adopted and the reduction could not be enacted and brought into force before the new Parliament was convened.

During that last general election compaign the NDP indicated that it considered this legislation as giving an unfair advantage to what Mr. Lewis used to call, and still does call, "corporate bums." Also, the Conservative Party expressed reservations with regard to this legislation. As a result, the government was in a quandary, given its minority position after the election. It did not know what to do for many many months. Finally, it made up its mind to bring this bill before us with the provision providing for the review of the tax concessions in the manner which was explained very clearly by the sponsor of the bill last evening, and to which I shall return later.

Honourable senators, I do not intend to deal with the bill in detail, because other senators around me intend to speak on it. But it is quite clear that we are giving a sector of industry, or a sector of the corporate field, some incentives by a reduction of 9 per cent in taxation. We are, however, in a way discriminating against about 75 per cent of Canadian corporations. I say this because the manufacturing and processing industries represent only 25 per cent of the corporate activities in Canada. The service industries, I should point out, represent about 60 per cent of all jobs available in industry in Canada. This field of activity will not enjoy any benefit from this bill.

● (1420)

The main criticism levelled against this bill is the fact that its sole obvious aim is to counter the effect of the DISC program of the United States. The government is here dealing in a very negative way with a difficult situation. It would have been much wiser to extend the rebate, or some kind of rebate, to the whole corporate field in Canada.

I wish now to deal with the effect of the position in which the government found itself as a result of the total opposition of the NDP and the requirement of the Progressive Conservative Party that this legislation should not be enacted for more than one year. Last night Senator Manning expressed the view that the provisions included by the Minister of Finance to meet the situation, and to keep the government alive against any threat of a negative vote by those two parties I have just mentioned, would create uncertainty, because the legislation can be challenged by 60 members of the other place. In one way Senator Manning is right, but in another way it must be remembered that at any time the Minister of Finance can, by introducing a budget, change the situation. There is no guarantee given when legislation is adopted that it will remain as such indefinitely. When a new budget is brought down the rate of tax can be increased. That has happened very often.

In this respect, I suggest that there is nothing special about this situation. Of course, long-term plans cannot be made when it is known that the legislation can be challenged. But then again, how can any long-term plans be made in an economic situation such as the one which presently exists in North America? Anything can happen. Events can suggest to the present Minister of Finance, or to a new Minister of Finance who may follow next year, that the whole setup should be changed.

Hon. Mr. Greene: It will not be a Tory.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: It would certainly be a good thing if he were. You may be right that it will not be a Tory, but I would not bet on it if I were you. Things may turn out right for Canada, and Canadians may find themselves with a Tory government after the next election. Anyway I do not see why that remark by Senator Greene should deter me from the argument I am trying to make, which will show that we ought to have a change of government as soon as possible.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Let me now deal more specifically with this review provision. The way I read it, 60 members of the other place can force the Minister of Finance or the government to bring in a measure to meet the conclusion of any resolution voted by that house. What was the position of the Conservative Party? They suggested adopting the idea of a corporate tax reduction for one year. The goverment, because it did not want to accept this suggestion, proffers a quasi-solution that has a much wider and more serious effect than that which had been proposed by the Conservative Party. It amounts to a most shameful abdication of this government's responsibility and authority under the B.N.A. Act, under our Constitution. I will demonstrate to you how true that statement is, and how well founded.

If the government had accepted the position of the Leader of the Conservative Party, this resolution would have been in force for the present year, 1973. If the results had been available, the government could have, in the next budget, decided to continue with this rebate in taxation. But what is the government faced with now, given the position it has taken? This was not discussed in the other place for the simple reason that if someone asks for something and receives twice what he is asking, he doesn't usually complain. That is why this point was not raised in the other place. Look at what it amounts to. Sixty members can force a debate in the other place on a resolution which would tell the government that it should stop the concessions granted by this bill, or diminish them. After such a resolution has been adopted, as it could be because the government is in a minority position, the government is bound to present a measure before the House reflecting the desire expressed in the resolution accepted by the other place.

Hon. Mr. Benidickson: Sixty members.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Section 54 of the B.N.A. Act reads:

> It shall not be lawful for the House of Commons to adopt or pass any Vote, Resolution, Address, or Bill for the Appropriation of any Part of the Public Revenue, or of any Tax or Impost, to any Purpose that has not been first recommended to that House by Message of the Governor General in the Session in which such Vote, Resolution, Address, or Bill is proposed.

This section of the B.N.A. Act is repeated almost word for word in Standing Order No. 62(1) and (2), of the House of Commons, which I do not think I need read. It repeats the same thing, that there is to be a message from the Governor General in the session in which such a vote, resolution, address or bill is proposed.

What the government has accepted by this review method is that the house will direct the Governor General, and the Governor General in Council will have no choice but to send a message to the House of Commons recommending an amendment to this bill. The house so decides and the Governor General in Council, the Cabinet itself, the present government, must, because it agrees to do so in this bill, accept the directive of the House of Commons. This directly contradicts section 54 of the B.N.A. Act, and is absolutely contrary to the Standing Order I just referred to. This is what this bill says.

When I read that provision the first time, I just could not believe it. In fact, the government has put its fate in the hands of the Opposition. It has given up its right or its exclusive jurisdiction in the matter of the appropriation of money or in the matter of taxation and the imposition of taxes or impost. It is unbelievable when you come to think of it. The government has said, "Well, if you decide that we should do this in the matter of taxation, we will do it." It has accepted in advance a decision of the House in a field where it has, under the Constitution and under the Standing Orders governing the other place, exclusive discretion to bring in any measure. It is a capitulation, of course, which is explained by the present political circumstances. It wants to ensure its survival and to avoid giving way to the request of the Official Opposition in the other place. The government has capitulated; it has put its head on the block. It has said it will accept whatever terms are dictated to it and will bring in whatever measure the house has indicated it wants to see recommended. If this is not directly opposed to what is laid down in the Constitution, then, certainly, it is indirectly contrary to the provision I have cited.

● (1430)

This point was not raised in the other place but I think it should be raised here because the Senate has some responsibility as far as respect for the Constitution is concerned.

I am really horrified at the precedent created by this legislation. I hope that my point will not be considered as a mere matter of routine nor a debating or academic point. I want to see this point given full consideration. I hope to convince honourable senators that the provision for review provided in this legislation is a shameful abdication of responsibility on the part of the government.

Hon. Allister Grosart: Honourable senators, I rise to support the position taken by my leader, Senator Flynn. He has said that there will be some further comments on the bill in more general terms from this side and it is my opportunity at the moment to fall in line with that suggestion.

Honourable senators will be aware from reading the bill and from listening to the excellent exposition given by Senator Hayden, that this is a bill to amend the Income Tax Act. It is important to emphasize that, because it is merely one of a number of approaches to the solution of some of the very pressing problems facing the Canadian economy today—problems connected with the provision of jobs, with the maintenance of jobs, with the slow growth in the secondary industries, and the increasing threat by international competition in foreign markets and in our own domestic market.

To place it in context, it is fair to say that the Minister of Finance spoke of the "companion proposal" to which this is closely linked—the fast two-day write-off on machinery and equipment for industries in a certainly narrowly defined area known as manufacturing and processing. Having said that, it is important to think of this bill more than in terms of a mere amendment to the Income Tax Act. It is important to show it in its larger context—an aspect of the bill which was not thoroughly commented on by the report of the committee, for the good reason, of course, that it did not have the minister before it and it did not go into the larger questions of policy, of where this fits into the general economic policy in the immediate future in relation to the problems that face us.

I propose, therefore, to make some remarks, divided into two main sections. First of all, it is important to deal with what the bill does and with what it does not do; next, to discuss the hopes there are for its success; then to discuss it in relation to its response to DISC and other economic incentive measures in the United States; to call attention to some policy inconsistencies that seem inherent in the philosophy of the bill and, finally, to suggest an alternative or complementary approach to these same problems.

The bill deals exclusively with a fairly narrow area of the economy, that is to say, corporate profits accruing from manufacturing and processing industries in Canada as defined or not defined in the bill. Senator Hayden dealt with that yesterday evening, indicating there is no general definition of manufacturing and processing but there are some negative exemptions which considerably narrow it. In this particular area the corporate income tax is reduced: for larger corporations from 49 to 40 per cent, for small corporations from 25 to 20 per cent. Of course, that is in current year terms. Actually, the reduction in succeeding years will be from lower levels, 48, 47, 46 per cent, in line with previous legislation. The important thing is that the 49 per cent corporate tax level remains for the majority of Canadian corporations.

The exclusions are primary industries—and again it was explained by Senator Hayden yesterday evening that the main reason is that existing legislation already is fairly generous in terms of tax allowances and tax exemptions for certain of the primary industries.

[Hon. Mr. Flynn.]

The service industries are completely exempt from the operation of this bill. The service industries account for about 60 per cent of the total employment in Canada.

A surprising exemption, to me, is the construction industry, which could hardly, in many of its operations, be described as a primary industry, but for various reasons it has been excluded. This may prove to be a mistake. There are other exclusions—transportation and utilities, in certain circumstances.

Honourable senators, what does it amount to, in total? The best figures that I have seen indicate that probably about 40 per cent of the total of corporate income taxation will come under the new tax rates—which is a sizeable segment of our economy. The figures given by the minister suggest that about 5 per cent of the exemption would be in the small business area—the 20 per cent reduction area—and about 35 per cent in the larger corporation area.

One of the things the bill does not do is channel the flow of its benefits exclusively to Canadian industry. This may or may not be a serious criticism. It may or may not be something that could be avoided. The fact remains that 60 per cent of the total tax reduction benefit which flows under this bill will flow to American controlled corporations. I do not question that figure. It is the minister's own figure.

I am not one who takes the attitude that in Canada we should exclude corporations from the benefits of tax or other legislation merely because they are American controlled. But it is important to keep that in mind when we come to consider the possibility of success or failure of this legislation.

The limitations are mainly due to certain philosophical considerations. One is international competition. The bill sets out what the minister also emphasized quite clearly, that one of the raisons d'être of the bill is the fact of serious international competition of various kinds.

The cost to the Treasury of this particular bill appears to be about $250 million which in a $20 billion budget is perhaps not great. It has been estimated that the total cost of extending these benefits to all corporations in Canada this year and in succeeding years would be about $1.2 billion to $1.25 billion annually. I have been considering whether that might not have been a more daring approach than the one we had, as $1.2 billion is a lot of money; but in an area where we seem to have been concentrating more on legislation to distribute wealth rather than to produce it, I can see a good case being made out for this very large measure of incentive to the whole of the Canadian corporate industry, even at a cost to the Treasury of $1.2 billion a year. It is perhaps one of the chances, or the hopes I should say, of success.

● (1440)

It seems to me that historically this bill may go down as an economic milestone. It is possible—I do not say probable, but it is possible that it will prove to be a milestone on the wrong road. I will indicate in a moment why I think it could be so. But the great hope of the minister is, of course, that this will maintain and promote jobs in Canada. It is hoped that it will maintain the two million jobs directly related to our manufacturing and processing industries, and perhaps another two million jobs which flow indirectly from its activities. One of our major Canadian problems at the moment is the unprecedented rate at which we have been creating new jobs in the last few years. In the last five years there have been created in Canada 1.3 million new jobs, which is 50 per cent more than the absolute increase in employment in the 15 European Community and EFTA countries. That is an amazing achievement and yet last year we had an average of 6.3 per cent unemployment—an intolerably high level—compared to 6.4 per cent the year before.

We had at the same time an average level over the year of 5.1 per cent inflation, and whether significant or not it has to be noted that in the first quarter of this year the rate of inflation was over 7 per cent. I am not saying that that will persist for the whole year, but that is the situation we face. So with respect to the concern of the minister and the government for the maintenance and creation of jobs, we can only say we hope this bill will be successful in that purpose.

Another problem related to that is the extraordinarily slow growth of the secondary industry in Canada. Its growth has averaged over the last year only 2 per cent annually as against a real increase of the GNP running from 5 per cent to 6 per cent. The minister has high hopes that the proposed reduction in the tax burden, and I am quoting him, "borne by Canadian manufacturers and processors is designed to assist them to meet increasingly intense foreign competition in a variety of ways." These are the ways in which the minister hopes that this measure will improve the growth of our secondary industry. He hopes they will, as a result of these tax decreases, increase the efficiency of their operations and lower costs, undertake more research, finance increased capital investment, increase their price competitiveness with foreign producers both at home and abroad.

Again we can only hope that that will be a result of these decreases and particularly in the case of American-controlled corporations, foreign-controlled corporations, that the windfall from this measure will be used in these ways and not merely, as some have already suggested, to take up the lag of past low-profit levels, and so on.

Again an increase in corporate profits is one of the hopes of the minister. In that respect anyone who has looked at the record of corporate profits over the last ten years will take a very different attitude to the third party in the other place which, I am sorry to say, is in connection with this bill's using statistics completely out of context and, in my view, falsely and crudely.

The situation is roughly this, that over the last ten years corporate profits in Canada have averaged about 10 per cent increase per year. When we consider that those are corporate profits before taxes and that we have to take into consideration the effect of inflation, it is obvious that Canadian corporations have not been in a position over the last ten years, despite the odd very good year here and there and the last two years, to develop the kind of growth that corporations in Canada must develop if they are going to maintain their level of jobs to be adequate to the increase in the labour force.

It is a fact that corporate profits have not been exorbitant over this period of time. I agree with the minister. I share his hopes that one of the results of this bill will be an absolute increase in corporate profits, which brings me to what I call the DISC problem. In the earlier part of the discussion on this bill the minister placed a great deal of emphasis on what I call the DISC problem. He said:

> The DISC scheme presents a three-pronged threat to the Canadian economy.

Elsewhere he speaks of the "magnitude of the threat posed by DISC," and there is no question that one of the motivations of this bill is a direct response to DISC.

DISC, of course, is the generic name for a very large program, progressive program, of incentives to American industry of various kinds. The evidence is that we have attempted to match to some extent the American incentives by Canadian incentives under this bill or incentives to corporations doing business in Canada. The minister said on one occasion that this was "the least we could do" to respond to DISC.

The Tax Executive Institute which has probably made the best analysis of the contents of this bill has reached the conclusion that some response was absolutely necessary in the interests of the growth of Canadian secondary industry. We understand the American point of view, of course. They are faced again this year with a $6.4 billion deficit on commodity trade and with an even greater deficit on current account.

So, honourable senators, I think it is essential that in discussing this bill we assess it in relationship to and as a response to DISC. In the first place it is not a complete response because the analogy between the two sets of initiatives is not exact. If we take our reduction to be 40 per cent, it is considerably less in one area than the tax reductions—the tax rate decreases to be more exact—under the American plan. The American plan brings down taxation from a general level of 48 per cent to 35 per cent, and even in certain circumstances under certain formulae to about 25 per cent tax. This, of course, applies only to profits arising from export industries, so the analogy is not exact at all because the Canadian measure does not cover all export industries but only manufacturing and processing industries.

Unfortunately, this measure does not include profits which may accrue from very essential aspects of the marketing of products of our manufacturing and processing industries. It stops short in allowing tax reductions on the promotion and marketing activities. That is a mistake which our American friends did not make in constructing DISC.

On balance, it is rather interesting that the Tax Executive Institute, which made what seems to be the best examination of the bill, reaches the conclusion that the two bills put together will result in a United States production advantage in the Canadian market because they have these lower tax rates to apply against their export business. But the effect of the Canadian measure now before us will give many of these Canadian companies a production advantage in the United States market, because these companies will be operating under a 40 per cent corporate tax rate, whereas in the American market they will be competing with companies still operating under the standard 48 per cent rate.

• (1450)

These are perhaps just details about the difference between the two. But to me the real problem posed by this attempt to confront or to respond to DISC is the possibility of starting a run of countervailing duties, one against the other, a battle or race in which there is not the slightest chance in the world that we are going to be able to compete with the Americans. I have spoken on this before, but in case there is any suggestion that this may be just a particular hobby horse of mine, I would call the attention of honourable senators to some comments made as recently as May 18 by a person generally respected here, Mr. John Meyer, former financial editor of the Montreal Gazette. He is dealing with the American administration's proposals—not just DISC but also the additional outlines issued on April 10. Speaking of the American administration he says:

> What the Administration made clear was that it would no longer tolerate tax incentives offered by foreign countries as inducements to investment—

He explains that the DISC program was intended to offset certain tax concessions, and give investment tax credits, revised depreciation, and so on, and then continues:

> But now that the Administration has introduced its complementary tax stick, the initial skirmishes over competitive tax advantages are taking on the dimensions of global warfare. The question implicit in this turn of events is whether Canada should cast its lot with the Europeans and others who will be vigorously protesting the Administration's position or actively pursue a bilateral exemption on its own account.

Here is the spectre, and I think it is a real spectre, of a knock-down, drag-out war between Canada and the United States over our own domestic market and our position in the American market, and I need hardly say that this is as important to us as our own domestic market in many respects.

This, of course, raises the question as to whether this measure is enough or whether it is just a piecemeal approach to this problem—whether it is so politically controlled and politically inspired that it will fall short of its important objectives. These are questions which I think have to be raised, and I am sure are in the minds of those who sponsor this bill. I say this, honourable senators, because this accusation of Canadian piecemeal approaches to problems is an old one. Dian Cohen, well known as an authority on many aspects of our economy, writing in the Toronto Daily Star, says:

> We have an almost perfect record in this country of making economic policy decisions that are piecemeal, expedient and foolish.

The date of this, by the way, is June 4, 1973.

She points out that "Canada is one of the highest-cost producers in the world," and that we cannot afford to get into this knock-down, drag-out confrontation with our American friends. She goes on to say:

> One could dismiss this latest venture into policy-making as a bizarre aberration of a weak and demoralized government if it weren't so typical of the myopic economic planning we have endured in this country for the past 25 years.

[Hon. Mr. Grosart.]

Honourable senators opposite will be glad to know that the phrase "bizarre aberration of a weak and demoralized government," is not confined by Miss Cohen to the present government. Then she says:

> While the need intensifies daily for coherent long range economic planning, our governments continue to respond only to short-term political expediency.

Finally, I come to some inconsistencies and, in this connection, point to the stress laid by the minister and others on the urgency of this legislation. Fourteen months ago we had the May budget in which this legislation was first brought forward, and over and over again we were told by representatives of the government that it was urgent. We were told that the economy needed heating up. Yet, it took 14 months to produce. I need not go into the reasons for that except to say that this surely is an intolerable delay. In the meantime the economy has heated up, and there is now some doubt as to whether this measure is not badly timed. Certainly it would have been well timed 14 months ago, but there is a very real doubt as to whether this is the right time to introduce it.

We are aware of the political background that caused this situation, but it is certainly not, in my view, to the credit of the government that it did not find ways to bring this measure before us earlier.

Secondly, honourable senators, it seems to me that we in Canada need to look at our own house more often than we do and see to putting it in order. We are forever talking about how we are committed to multilateral trade and the liberalization of trade all around the world. But that is not where we stand. The Economist, which is not always right, but is one of the greatest financial papers in the world, has this to say on June 30:

> Earlier this month Canada banned the export of all refined petrol and heating oil to the United States except under special licence. The ban will not be lifted until Canada can expand its own refineries.
>
> Canada is not only tight-fisted with its energy but has conspicuously failed to keep pace with other industrial nations in lowering its tariffs in line with the Kennedy round. It now hides behind one of the highest tariff barriers in the developed world.

That is the Canada, honourable senators, that is always talking about how committed we are to multilateral trade.

He goes on to say:

> The chief difficulty is to persuade Canada to jettison some of its non-tariff barriers.

Here again, on both the tariff side and the non-tariff side, we are among the real offenders in the world. I am not saying that there may not be good reasons for keeping some of those, but I think we should recognize that we have to put our own house in better order—and perhaps there is to be some legislation forthcoming along that line.

The capital investment concern of the government impressed me because the minister said that one of the most important things about this bill—and here I shall quote him directly—was:

> —most important of all, it could over time result in a significant proportion of new capital investment and the accompanying new employment opportunities being located in the United States rather than in our own country.

Here he is speaking of DISC and saying one of the real problems is that this will dry up the flow of American capital into Canada, and he makes it quite clear that he regards this as being of the utmost importance to our unemployment problems. I merely point out at this time that there is some inconsistency here as between this legislation, and the legislation now in the other place generally known as the "takeover bill." It seems that we want to have it both ways. But it is a clear fact of political life and of economic life that in such cases you cannot have it both ways.

Referring to the review process so eloquently discussed by the leader on this side, I find myself having the same doubts on the constitutional aspects which he outlined. I find myself having doubts not only on the constitutional aspects but also in the straight matter of policy. I am fully aware that the Conservative Party was responsible for asking for these review clauses to be put in the bill, and this was part of the general deal. I am not myself sure why the Conservative Party insisted on that.

● (1500)

Hon. Mr. Flynn: We did not ask for it. We wanted only one year.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: A review after a one-year trial. I am not being overcritical. I merely say that I fail to understand any theory that suggests that tax legislation should not be as permanent as it is possible to make it, because of the problems impermanence and uncertainty about tax legislation produce in the business world. I am well aware of the Conservative Party position in this, but I am not saying I would fully endorse it from the point of view of overall economic policy.

I have been critical of some aspects of the bill. Obviously one could ask me to suggest what should be done. I can only answer that by asking a question, which is this: To what extent has the government really tried to develop bilateral exemptions for Canada from these American measures? We have no evidence that there has been an effort. That does not mean there has not been an effort, or that there is not an ongoing one. It is probably one of the problems of politics that politicans do not like to announce that they are trying very hard to achieve concessions from another country and so risk failure, and the public and opposition scorn that might come from that.

It seems to me to be of the utmost importance that we make every effort to get on the American side of this; that we bargain for bilateral exemptions from the effects of these American measures, which are to some extent targeted to us, although not wholly. I think there are bargains that could be made. One suggestion has been made by Carl Beigie, who happens to be Executive Director of the Canadian Economic Policy Committee, of which I have the honour to be a member. I pose this as just one suggestion. Carl Beigie, speaking to the Toronto Investment Analysts, perhaps a month or so ago, suggested that we should:

> —seek exemption from all American payments correctives in return for the following undertakings: to peg the Canadian dollar within a narrow trading range with the U.S., to refrain from any conversion of any U.S. dollar holdings into American reserve assets, to block all American dollar pass-throughs, and to lift all restraints on Canadian investment abroad.

The honourable Leader of the Government might object to that on the ground that it sounds like a package deal. I would go a little further and say that we should extend the package, talk about access to our energy resources, talk about anything we have to bargain with in the Canadian interest, to see if we cannot get into a better position than this rather dangerous confrontation with DISC and those who have decided that DISC and its implications is going to be continuing American policy.

[Translation]

Hon. Martial Asselin: Honourable senators, I would first like to congratulate Senator Hayden who introduced the legislation now before us. As usual he has done so with clarity and understanding. Of course, I do not intend to enter this debate to contradict the technicalities which he pointed out when introducing the bill last night.

All the same, I would like to say to the members of the government that I fully support the remarks made by the leader of our party in the Senate concerning the constitutionality of an important provision of this bill. I have the impression that we would not be satisfied if the government leader or the sponsor of this bill did not give us a satisfactory reply to the constitutional question raised by Senator Flynn in his remarks this afternoon.

As Senator Flynn said, the Senate is a body created to study constitutional matters, and above all to see that the Canadian Constitution is respected. The point raised by Senator Flynn is based on the constitutional level, and before we adopt this legislation, we must obtain a satisfactory answer, or a satisfactory explanation, from the government leader, or the sponsor of this bill.

Senator Grosart, who is a tax expert, dealt with the details of the bill, with its consequences on Canada's relations with the United States as well as the international community. I am no expert on tax matters. I shall therefore limit myself today to a few remarks on the bill before us. I may broaden the debate somewhat by pointing out to this assembly that the present government seems to have overlooked certain constitutional aspects of which the fundamental principle whereby the House of Commons, the representatives of the people, must supervise financial matters, and the fact that the government must not by-pass the representatives of the people in having fiscal measures passed by other methods than those provided for by the Constitution.

To my mind, this bill is based on the reaction of the government to recent tax measures passed by the American government. If that is its only reason, then I would say this bill is negative because the government has proved that it applies a policy which, to my way of thinking, lacks planning in that our government should have foreseen the American competition through fiscal legislation. It shows a total lack of imagination by asking us to pass this bill to counteract the American DISC program, as Senator Grosart pointed out.

Yet, there would be other avenues open to the administration, other ways which could have been used and would have not risked in any way a tax concession war with the United States, for Canada has no intention whatever of competing with tax reductions against the punitive tax measures which the United States adopted recently in respect of Canadian corporations.

Perhaps this act will also result in a further deterioration of our relations with the United States in the fiscal area and, in return, we may be faced again, on the part of the Americans, with new fiscal punitive measures. This we cannot accept in view of the present state of the Canadian economy.

● (1510)

[English]

Relaxed depreciation and the investment tax credit have been powerful inducements to the location of new manufacturing facilities in the United States. Even the relocation of existing facilities in the United States by both American parents of Canadian subsidiaries and Canadian investors has been a source of worry in the past and present times. This bill is an attempt to offset that southward pull, an attempt to buy time for the government to develop a long-term policy capable of dealing with an evolving problem.

That is the story of this government's life, honourable senators—forever "reacting to situations," never one jump ahead, chronically incapable of predicting what might happen, and prepare in consequence. This government cannot possibly lead. It is incapable of even keeping up. So again we are faced with this government's incompetent reaction to an economically impalatable situation.

From this side of the house I should say this bill is a good bill, but I must also say is that it is too little, too late, and terribly deficient.

For a number of reasons, one of which is too heavy a tax burden, manufacturers have been having a difficult time of it. To think that a 9 per cent tax cut is going to give rise to great expansion is to demonstrate complete ignorance of the problems involved. For many manufacturers, this tax relief means only that they will avoid bankruptcy for a while longer. It does not mean they will have the wherewithal to expand.

[Translation]

Here I make a small digression. This morning on the radio we were told that this year, in Canada, 1,500 companies went bankrupt. In Quebec alone we had 400, and over 450 corporations had to dispose of their assets.

When I said earlier that this legislation may have come too late we are of course told that it is aimed at creating jobs—God knows employment is needed in Canada—but I think that this 9 per cent reduction will only result in allowing those industries to survive a little longer and that it will not solve the basic problem facing those industries if they are to survive.

Certainly, this 9 per cent corporate reduction can only give those enterprises a new lease on life from the economic standpoint because the reduction is too limited within the context of their financial operations. Corporations will have to spend an enormous amount of money to hire surplus personnel so as to benefit from those tax cuts. How many people will they have to hire only to prepare their income tax returns which will be very hard to compute when the time comes?

[English]

Honourable senators, without realizing it, I am sure, this government is on the right track, and regardless of how inefficiently it proceeds, regardless of the motives behind this bill, and regardless of the immediate goals—which are likely never to be realized, anyway—one can feel nothing but joy at the idea of a tax reduction of any kind.

This government has a dismal record; its inefficiency is notorious. The Auditor General has been telling us for years all we should need to know about government—the less you have of it the better off you will be.

The record of the past ten years of government in Canada reads like a nightmare of mindless waste of the taxpayers' money. We have an Arts Centre that cost four times what it was supposed to cost; a Bonaventure that was refitted for twice what it was to cost, only to be scrapped a little while later. We have spent millions on hydrofoils, only to consign them to mothballs. This government spent $9 million preparing to build a harbour at Gros Cacouna, Quebec, before realizing that there would be no customers for that harbour. This government spent $20 million preparing a crossing between Northumberland Strait and Prince Edward Island. That crossing was never built—$20 million more shot to hell.

Such inefficiency and stupidity is horrendous. But what worries me even more is that the taxpayer is not revolted at such goings on. He is either unaware or he has decided that such is par for the course where governments are concerned. He seems not to have considered yet that he might be better off if the government were given much less opportunity to waste money. All that is required is that the voting public decide that its government will have less money to spend and less power to wield. That is all. But oh, what a difference that would make—the people again in control of their government and not vice versa. What a refreshing thought.

As it stands now, the situation is quite different. Since 1968, the government has successfully striven to decrease Parliament's control over public money, and to increase its own control. This unconstitutional usurpation of financial power by the executive has been deliberately planned. The strategy has been to decrease the quantity and quality of the opportunities available to members of Parliament to question, criticize and publicize the government's demands and needs for public money. Complementary to this strategy has been a cover-up propaganda program to conceal and even glorify the government's intentions.

The government has used trickery of the basest variety to obtain public money without parliamentary consent. They have perverted the lawful powers of the Treasury Board Committee of Cabinet to their own purposes, instead of to those of Parliament and the public.

[Translation]

This is another constitutional issue that the government should settle as quickly as possible and those of us who have been members of the House of Commons dream of the days where that constitutional argument was applied in the House of Commons, where the representatives of the people controlled the taxpayers' money because they had been elected to do so, whereas today we see the government resort to every trick in its attempts to control the taxpayers' money without the consent of the people through their representatives in the House of Commons.

That is another constitutional issue. For that reason, the members of the House of Commons and those of the Senate are increasingly wondering about the role of the House of Commons as regards administration and executive power. If the executive power simply decides to control public funds, it should keep in mind that the people sent members to the House of Commons precisely to control money and taxes. Of course, if the government chooses to ignore the power of Parliament, we are on the road to a presidential system. That is what is now happening in the House of Commons. I do not suggest that it is a bad system, but until the Constitution is changed, I believe that we must come back to a responsible government answerable to the elected people for the expenses of the government in power.

● (1520)

[English]

But Trudeau's administration has gone out of its way to emasculate Parliament, honourable senators. They have used every means and sought every opportunity to hobble and shackle the Opposition. They do not want their actions submitted to close scrutiny, because they do not want the voting public to know how incompetent the government is.

This government has abolished overall debate of the estimates in the other place. Estimates are taken up in bits and pieces in the various committees of that house. Also, a time limit has been imposed. Estimates must be considered within a certain time. If this is not done, they are reported out of committee and voted on without debate in the House. This is what the Trudeau administration means by participatory democracy: "Don't give the Opposition a chance to point out how frightfully inept we really are or we're finished for sure."

Another thing this government has done since coming to power in 1968 is to increase its revenues vastly on the plea that the tax system must be reformed. It introduced an incomprehensible tax bill and used closure to force it through Parliament. Taxes were forced upon the people by curtailing the right of their representatives to complain. Is this the kind of democracy which Prime Minister Trudeau advocated in his 1968 campaign when he spoke of participatory democracy?

This government, honourable senators, is not striving to do what is best for the country. It is too preoccupied with doing what is necessary to ensure re-election. That is something I can hardly blame them for. They are good politicians. They have been in office for a long time. Sometimes I think the Conservative Party is not politically-minded enough. It is not often in office, and when it is it sometimes does everything to lose office.

The people of Canada should know that annual reports on the administration of government departments are very often not produced within the time limit required by law. They should know that information requested by parliamentary committees is regularly denied by this government, that the government delays sending reports to committees for consideration in order to make sure that what they have done will not be found out.

All kinds of specious reasons are advanced for denying information. All sorts of secret studies exist to which parliamentarians have no access even though the taxpayers whom they represent have paid for them. For example, the Treasury Board with full backing from the government has betrayed its trust as manager of the public funds. It is no longer working for Parliament, but for the government. It no longer tries to keep order in spending; rather, it concentrates upon covering up waste and abuse.

There are those infamous "dollar votes" in the estimates. These permit government programs to continue year after year without detailed statutory terms of reference and without report to Parliament.

There are those equally notorious revolving funds which permit large sums of public money to be removed from the scrutiny of Pariament and placed under the control of the government which can spend the money without fear of parliamentary or public criticism. It used to be that money the government did not spend in a given year reverted to the Consolidated Revenue Fund which was controlled by Parliament—but not any more. This government has seen to that. It wants that money, and it does not want anybody to know how it is being used either.

The latest attack in this organized gang rape of the traditional and constitutional rights of Parliament to control government expenditures came only recently. It had to do with the matter of opposed votes. The use of opposed votes is one of the methods available to Parliament for reducing an agency's or department's budget. Under the rules, a member can post a notice of opposition to objectionable budgetary expenditures.

This year opposed votes covering $30 million worth of proposed government expenditures were posted. The idea was to precipitate a recorded vote in the other place on whether or not these items had the approval of the representatives of the people. After all, that is what parliamentarians are here for. Well, that was not to be—not in this Liberal participatory democracy. Specious legalistic arguments were used by the government to prevent a recorded vote on specific budgetary items. This government has effectively curtailed to traditional privilege of an Opposition party to attempt to reduce any given budgetary item.

The long-term effect of this will be to emasculate Parliament completely. No longer will the Opposition be able to challenge the government's extravagant spending. No longer will the taxpayer be able to voice his opposition in Parliament. His representative has been gagged. And all this is being done, mind you, in the name of participatory democracy.

● (1530)

My reason for participating in this debate is quite simple. I am happy to see corporate taxes lowered, just as I am happy to see personal taxes lowered. To me the lowering of taxes is a breath of fresh air. It is a source of hope, hope that someday we may all realized that we are overburdened not only with taxes but with government.

Governments are oppressive. They use force to impose upon everyone almost every wish of the majority. Minorities are in ever-increasing danger of being denied ever more fundamental rights. This must stop, but it will not until we learn to curb the power of government. Governments pander to those who elect them because they want to ensure their re-election. This is the reason why minorities are at times hard pressed to defend their freedom. And the greater the influence of government, the worse will be this problem.

[Translation]

Honourable senators, I must say in closing—and this has been said countless times in both the House of Commons and the Senate—that as long as the rights of the minority, in a democratic system, are not respected, the fundamental principle of freedom and of expression of the people's elected representatives are endangered. Of course, I am in favour of the rule that the majority must decide. It is clear that when the people have voted for the majority, it must take the decisions. But, when decisions are being taken, the minorities, that is the people who are in the minority in assemblies such as the House of Commons or the Senate, must be heard so that they can express the opinions of the minority, of those who have voted for the people sitting in Parliament to defend the interests of the population and also to study and supervise the taxpayers' money.

I may have digressed somewhat, but I wished to make these few remarks on the introduction of a tax bill. I will say again that I am in favour of the bill now before us. I hope that it will settle the situation foreseen by the government when it introduced this bill, but, in my view, it has come too late. It is not generous enough. I have the impression that it is not the answer to the unemployment problem but if the corporations gain by it and if it will help them survive economically, then I will be happy to have been among those who voted for this legislation.

[English]

Hon. Mr. Martin: Honourable senators, I do not propose to speak at any great length. I am sure that Senator Asselin will understand if I do not fully follow the arguments he made in relation to government responsibilities in such a wide field.

Hon. Mr. Walker: You speak French, don't you?

Hon. Mr. Martin: So I thought I would address myself essentially to the point made by Senator Flynn. I agree that the explanation given of this bill by Senator Hayden has been characteristically comprehensive. We continually recognize the contribution the senator makes in the explanation of these tax measures.

Senator Flynn began by saying that this bill comes to us very late. This was an argument put forward by Senator Grosart as well. It is said that we knew about this tax proposal some time ago—in fact, in the spring of 1972. This is true. But we also know the circumstances in which the government, in a minority situation since the general election, has had to face the responsibility which all of us recognized after the election. In the absence of a willingness to have another election, there had to be a consensus that would provide Parliament with the opportunity to carry on the business of the country. My honourable friend seems to disagree.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I am very much amused.

Hon. Mr. Martin: I must also admit that at one stage his view and the view of his party was—and this was an understandable position for him to take—that there should be an election forthwith. But this was not the view of the government, it was not the view of the majority in Parliament, and I suspect it was not the view of the majority of the people of Canada. As time has gone by I think this has become increasingly clear. Therefore, if there was not going to be another election, the necessity was to find in Parliament a satisfactory way of meeting the wishes of Parliament.

The Minister of Finance was quite clear that if the present parliamentary situation had not prevailed it would not have been necessary for him to seek an accommodation with respect to this tax reduction measure—and that is what this bill is. This bill, in the government's opinion, is important for the economy of this country and to the maintenance of a high level of productivity in certain sections of the private sector—a point of view, incidentally, that until after the election had always been propounded not only by the government but by members of the party to which the Leader of the Opposition belongs.

We had a demonstration of this, an objective recognition of this fact, when Senator Grosart himself said that he regarded the more permanent aspects of this tax measure as desirable in the interest of the nation's economy, and in the interest of the nation's objective to maintain exports at a traditionally high level. That is the purpose of this legislation, honourable senators. This is a tax reduction measure; it is not an appropriation bill, as the Leader of the Opposition suggested when he quoted section 54 of the British North America Act. This is not an appropriation bill. This bill provides for a tax reduction.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I rise on a point of order.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Please let me continue.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I have the right, when I am misquoted, to rise and correct the Honourable Leader of the Government. I quoted section 54 because while it speaks of appropriation bills it also refers to any bill relating to any tax or impost. That is the only part of section 54 I referred to, and the Leader of the Government is entirely wrong when he says I spoke of this as being an appropriation bill.

Hon. Mr. Martin: My honourable friend is entitled to make his argument.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: This is not an argument. It is a correction.

Hon. Mr. Martin: And I am entitled to make mine.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: No.

Hon. Mr. Martin: My friend has the habit of interrupting. When he spoke, nobody interrupted him from this side of the house. I would ask him for similar treatment in this and other situations.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I did not misquote you.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Senator Flynn based his argument on section 54 of the British North America Act. His argument is that the scrutiny device conceived and presented by the Minister of Finance might render unconstitutional the measure before the Senate.

● (1540)

It is important to remember, as Senator Grosart emphasized, why we have this measure. Why is the senator in favour of the principle of this measure? I am sure he would have gone on to argue, as is the fact, that the tax reductions provided here are designed to assist Canadian industry to meet the competitive position which faces it in the export markets of the world—and it is a very serious competitive position. Other countries, Sweden, Britain, France and Germany among others, give their exporting industries, their exporting corporations, special assistance by way of tax reductions to enable them to gain advantages in the export market. That is the purpose of this tax reduction measure. It is to enable us to maintain a competitive position in the export markets of the world.

No country has a greater stake in the export market than Canada. No country has as great a portion of its national income involved in what it is able to sell to other countries of the world. It is not unnatural, therefore, that we should seek devices, not for the purpose of assisting any particular corporation per se, but rather of assisting industry to improve its export position, to increase its productivity and, as a result, to increase employment at home. Those are the objectives of this legislation.

I had always assumed, as I am sure most of us had, that this was a position which not only the members of this party who are charged with responsibilities of government had espoused, but that it was the point of view of those who belong to the party that Senator Flynn so ably supports. He did say—and I thought this was an indication of his indirect support for the measure, even though he did think there was a constitutional impediment—that this kind of tax relief was not extended to all industries. I took from that his approval of the principle of this measure; that, not only should it apply to all export industries concerned, that it should apply not only to the resource industries, but to the service industries and other industries in Canada. I took that as an indirect recognition of the value of this legislation.

I think Senator Flynn made a very proper reply to Senator Manning, who yesterday expressed fear of the possibility that there would be a lack of confidence created, a lack of certainty that would affect industry generally. This is a situation that always attends any tax legislation introduced by one Parliament. Industry must always assume the supremacy of Parliament. What may be decided by Parliament in one session, or in one Parliament, however, need not necessarily be the policy that the same government, or another government, will present in another session or in a subsequent Parliament.

Nevertheless, the point Senator Manning made is important. It would be helpful if the uncertainty in this matter could have been removed many months ago. It would have been helpful if we did not have a minority government situation, so that government's policy could be clearly implemented, or more effectively implemented. However, that is not the situation in the country at the present time, so the government had to consider how it could implement a policy that it believed to be essential for the development of its export trade objectives, and at the same time be able to command in Parliament itself confidence for that purpose.

Senator Grosart did not say he thought legislation of this kind should be permanent, but he did say he thought it should not be subject to the precariousness that follows a life term of one year. That is true, and the only way that can be corrected is by a statement of the government's overall objectives in trade policy in this area. The government has stated those objectives.

The government cannot make this law effective for more than one year. That is clear. No matter what permanency the government may have had in mind for this policy, the fact is that no enactment by Parliament in respect of tax reductions, for instance, can be made effective for more than the term of the calendar or fiscal year.

Senator Flynn called our attention to section 54 of the British North America Act.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: You are coming back to it.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Yes, I am coming back to it. I must admit that it is a rather ingenious, if obviously faulty, argument, as I will try to show. It is an ingenious argument, and I am rather surprised that it was not introduced in the other place.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: So am I.

Hon. Mr. Martin: I am sure that there are continuous consultations, but in this case something happened—the channel must not have opened. In any event, I do not know why, at least for debating purposes, this argument was not made elsewhere.

This is what section 54 says:

> It shall not be lawful for the House of Commons to adopt or pass any Vote, Resolution, Address, or Bill for the Appropriation of any Part of the Public Revenue, or of any Tax or Impost, to any Purpose that has not been first recommended to that House by Message of the Governor General in the Session in which such Vote, Resolution, Address, or Bill is proposed.

That is the totality of the language of the section. It is a section that deals with a tax or impost, or an appropriation. This is none of these things. This is a reduction in taxation.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Oh!

Hon. Mr. Martin: When my honourable friend argues I sit here and listen to him patiently, but it seems that he finds himself constitutionally incapable of maintaining his serenity, which I recognize he really does possess.

When my honourable friend was Deputy Speaker in the other place he was very familiar with Beauchesne, and this is what Beauchesne says, at page 215, with regard to advice in respect of tax reductions by members of Parliament:

> If His Excellency is debarred from taking the advice of individuals on public matters, he is not precluded from acting upon any request made to him by the House of Commons. The House is always free to approach the Crown with its constitutional advice in any matter of prerogative, but in requesting the Crown to incur certain expenditure—

It does not say "or reduce such expenditure."

> —it must give assurance of its readiness to make good the same.

● (1550)

So it has always been recognized that Parliament has the right to take action to embody its proposals to government in the form that is open to any deliberative body. This particular device—not the most normal or the most stylistic, if you will—is not a unique device; it has been employed in other statutes. I regret that I cannot put my finger on them.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I am not surprised.

Hon. Mr. Martin: I have tried since my friend raised this argument, for they can be located.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I am sure you will not locate them.

Hon. Mr. Martin: My friend says he is sure, but I am equally confident that they can be. In any event, we have it that the House of Commons has a right to make recommendations to the Crown.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Yes, but—

Hon. Mr. Martin: There is nothing to suggest that the Crown has not the right to express, by way of a vote, its desire as to what the government should do. This bill does not provide what members of Parliament shall do. This bill provides for a scrutiny device, introduced in it by the Minister of Finance himself. He is the one who takes the initiative.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: On the order of the house.

Hon. Mr. Martin: No, no. He is the one who takes the initiative. It is provided in subclause (3) on page 5, which is in the bill as a result of a proposal made to Parliament by the Minister of Finance. That subclause says:

> Where, at any time after March 31, 1974, a motion for the consideration of the House of Commons, signed by not less than sixty members of the House is filed with the Speaker to the effect that Section 125.1 of the Income Tax Act, as enacted by subsection (1), be amended, or to the effect that subsection (2) be amended, so as to
>
> (a) discontinue the deduction that would otherwise be permitted by the said section 125.1—

It is not for the appropriate minister to discontinue the deduction.

> (b) reduce the amount of the deduction that would otherwise be permitted by that section, or
>
> (c) in any other manner, restrict the application of the provisions of that section—

And then—this is important.

> for any period commencing after the motion is filed, the House of Commons shall, within the first fifteen days next after the motion is filed that the House is sitting, in accordance with the Rules of the House, take up and consider the motion, and if the motion, with or without amendments, is approved by the House—

Hon. Mr. Flynn: And?

Hon. Mr. Martin: And in those circumstances only the Minister of Finance, not the house.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: That is different.

Hon. Mr. Martin: It continues:

> —the Minister of Finance shall take such steps—

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Shall.

[Hon. Mr. Martin.]

Hon. Mr. Martin:

> —shall take such steps as are necessary in order that a measure in his name giving effect to the motion may be placed before the House without delay.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: That is right.

Hon. Mr. Martin: But there is nothing in this bill that authorizes any private member of Parliament, anyone who is not within the component of the Governor in Council, to introduce a measure. If the House of Commons says, "We feel that the time has come when the government should look at this particular situation," all they can do is express that view and nothing else, and the Minister of Finance—

Hon. Mr. Flynn: —shall—

Hon. Mr. Martin: Shall, or he would lose in a vote of confidence.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: No, no; he shall.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Only he can do it.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Yes, he has to.

Hon. Mr. Martin: The 60 members of the House is much smaller than one party in the House. One should recognize that. No matter what argument my friend puts forward, it cannot be argued if he is bringing the approach to this within section 54 of the British North America Act.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Ha!

Hon. Mr. Martin: My honourable friend smiles. That is my argument.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: May I ask a question at this stage?

Hon. Mr. Martin: Certainly.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Would the honourable Leader of the Government agree that this bill was preceded by the recommendation of the Governor General?

Hon. Mr. Martin: This bill?

Hon. Mr. Flynn: This bill, yes.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Of course.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Does he agree that the measure which the minister "shall" bring at this time will have to be preceded by a recommendation of the Governor General?

Hon. Mr. Martin: Of course, but that does not—

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Oh.

Hon. Mr. Martin: That simply compounds the issue rather than clarifies it.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: That is section 54 of the B.N.A. Act.

Hon. Mr. Martin: My honourable friend, there is no doubt about it—only the Governor in Council can introduce a measure. That is the whole point.

What my honourable friend is arguing is that this bill gives to the private member of Parliament, or to 60 of them, a function or responsibility that is given under the Constitution only to the Governor in Council.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: The House has control.

Hon. Mr. Martin: My friend's very question clearly indicates the weakness of the argument.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Ha!

Hon. Mr. Martin: I acknowledge its ingenuity, and for that my friend is to be commended, if not fully approved. But I think we are agreed on one thing, and that is that my honourable friend has not taken any issue with the principle of the bill.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: That is something else.

Hon. Mr. Martin: He recognizes this is a good bill, a good thing to do for Canada. This bill is a good thing.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: That is going too far.

Hon. Mr. Martin: This has been the traditional position of my honourable friend's party.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: No, no.

Hon. Mr. Martin: This year a limitation was put on that position, that it should be carried on for only one year. Senator Grosart does not find that an acceptable arrangement. I am sure that he would not be alone in his courage to make that affirmation of opinion.

For these reasons, I strongly support this bill, and thank the Leader of the Opposition for having raised an interesting academic but impracticable point.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Honourable senators, I think the sponsor of the bill yesterday mentioned that he intended to move that it be referred to a committee. Am I to presume that the comments made by the Leader of the Government about my argument preclude such a referral of the bill to a committee to discuss my objection?

Hon. Mr. Martin: No, no.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: You could refer it to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs—but you do not think it is worth it?

Hon. Mr. Goldenberg: Honourable senators, like Senator Flynn, I was listening carefully to Senator Hayden yesterday. He did not say that he was going to ask that this bill be referred to a committee. He said he would leave it to the Senate to decide.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: That is what he said about the second bill, if my memory is correct.

Hon. Mr. Martin: That was the second bill.

Hon. Mr. Goldenberg: I see.

Hon. Mr. Martin moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

INCOME TAX ACT (No. 3)

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from yesterday the adjourned debate on the motion of Senator Hayden for the second reading of Bill C-193, to amend the statute law relating to income tax (No. 3).

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, I shall not be long. I have taken much less time in discussing two important bills than some honourable senators at times have taken to discuss no bill at all.

Hon. Mr. Martin: I am certainly not objecting to your speech.

● (1600)

Hon. Mr. Flynn: This Income Tax Bill (No. 3) is a housekeeping bill in some ways. It provides for some relief so far as the income tax tables for certain individuals are concerned. It was the result of a study by the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

Senator Hayden in concluding the first part of his remarks last evening mentioned that it might not be necessary to refer this bill to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce because of the study which had been made, and the report which was printed in yesterday's Hansard. I wish to make clear that he distinguished between this bill and the previous bill.

I should like to refer honourable senators to page 842 of yesterday's Debates of the Senate. In concluding his remarks on the previous bill Senator Hayden stated the following:

> This is the substance of the bill. It is now detailed before the Senate in the report we tabled, and in the explanation I have made. I expect that in due course, notwithstanding these steps, the Senate might wish the bill to go to committee.

I was hoping that the Leader of the Government would have more respect for my argument today, and would suggest that the bill be referred back to committee to air at least that point. But, in any event, I can do it just as well on third reading, and I intend to do so.

Coming back to Bill C-193, as I say, many of the provisions are intended to correct or clarify income tax provisions in many respects, and I do not intend to deal with them. What is important in this bill, generally speaking, is the fact that it affords some relief to individuals by increasing the exemptions, by providing an additional 2 per cent decrease in the tax, and also by indexing the tax brackets to the cost of living.

So far as the exemptions are concerned, they are not very generous but, of course, they are welcome. It is proposed that taxpayers will be entitled to increase their deductions from $1,500 to $1,600 in the case of individuals, and from $2,850 to $3,000 in the case of married couples. That is an increase of only $100 in the exemption for an individual, and $150 for a married couple. It does not afford any great relief.

The bill has always been presented by the government as constituting a reduction in the rate of income tax of 5 per cent. Of course, that is merely a device to hide the fact that for the year 1972 there was a reduction of 3 per cent which was to lapse at the end of December. The bill continues the 3 per cent reduction and adds another 2 per cent, so that in practice the effect of this legislation is to provide merely an additional 2 per cent reduction in the rate of tax.

That is really very little, as is demonstrated by the examples used in the report of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce which forms an appendix to yesterday's Hansard. These examples, which are shown on page 849, are related to the indexing of the tax brackets and rate of exemptions to the cost of living.

As everybody knows, that principle was proposed by the Progressive Conservative Party during the last election campaign, at which time it was turned down flatly by the present Minister of Finance, who made some rather unflattering comments about the idea. But, of course, he has seen the light not only in respect of this bill but, as I have indicated, with respect to the other bill which we discussed previously. He had said that he would never accept any proposal to review the legislation or to limit its application, but he found that he had to change his mind. Remaining in office is more important than defending one's own principles, even if one is very loud about one's convictions.

In any event, this idea of indexing, which is a good one in principle, was borrowed—was stolen, rather—from the platform of the party to which I belong. I would say, however, that in practice it is not so favourable to the people who have a fixed income.

Example No. 1 applies to a person whose income increases with inflation. We see that the application of the rule will leave that individual approximately the same amount of purchasing power as he had before, or the same proportion of his income as he had the year before. This is not the case with respect to a person with a fixed income, as is shown in the second example, which is described on page 850 of the Debates of the Senate of yesterday. When you deal with the case of a person on a fixed income of $4,000, that person will get the benefit of $2,700 in his tax, but he will not be left with the same purchasing power as he had before, as is the case of the married taxpayer with an income of $8,000, whose income is increased in the same proportion as the increase in the cost of living or inflation.

I would suggest that there may be in due course some adjustment to be made for the benefit of the small taxpayer, especially the one whose income does not rise with inflation, or with the increase in the cost of living. In any event, a little bit is better than nothing at all.

Yesterday I was suggesting that on the whole it is "peanuts," because there is a minimum of $100 and a maximum of $500, and that cannot really be presented as a substantial relief to the Canadian taxpayer. It really does not amount to much. I just want to say that on the whole I am sure the government will eventually come out on top.

Honourable senators may well remember that on June 12 the Leader of the Government, answering a question that I had asked him on May 23, put on Hansard the number of tax returns filed for the years 1969, 1970, 1971 and 1972. I should like to repeat the answers that I received at that time. The numbers of returns filed for the various years I have referred to were: 8,882,000 for 1969; 9,183,000 for 1970; 9,533,000 for 1971; and 10,300,000 for 1972. The numbers of taxable returns were: 7,364,000 for 1969; 7,642,000 for 1970; 7,373,000 for 1971—that is the only decrease in those figures—and 7,800,000 for 1972.

● (1610)

The total federal tax payable for the same years is as follows: 1969, $5.278 billion; 1970, $6.037 billion; and 1971, $6.689 billion. For 1972, the first year of the application of the so-called tax reform, which was to bring relief to a lot of people, the figure was $7.5 billion. That is close to $1 billion more than the previous year.

The average federal tax paid by individual taxpayers was as follows: 1969, $717; 1970, $790; 1971, $907; and 1972, $962.

This represents an almost constant increase in the number of people paying income tax, and a constant increase in the average amount of tax paid by each individual who was subject to tax.

The measure we are presently dealing with affords very little relief for the taxpayers, and I am quite sure that when we have the figures for 1973 and can see the effect of these reductions, we will find that the government is still the winner, that it is collecting more and will continue to collect more every year from the taxpayers of Canada.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Martin moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

HARBOUR COMMISSIONS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

Hon. Donald Cameron moved the second reading of Bill C-21, to amend the Harbour Commissions Act (Nanaimo Harbour Commission).

He said: Honourable senators, this is a very short and simple bill, the purpose of which is to amend the Harbour Commissions Act. It was passed in the House of Commons on July 3, having had a very thorough discussion in the Transport and Communications Committee of the other place. It is not often that a private member's bill receives unanimous support in that place, but this one did.

The purpose of the bill is quite simple. It is to provide for proper representation on the Nanaimo Harbour commission.

Section 4 (1)(c) of the act reads as follows:

> (c) fix the number of members of the Commission, which shall be not less than three nor more than five.

Section 5 (1) at present reads as follows:

> Subject to this section, a majority of the members of a Commission shall be appointed by the Governor in Council and the remainder shall be appointed as follows:
>
> (a) where one municipality only adjoins the harbour for which the Commission is established, by the council of that municipality;
>
> (b) where two municipalities only adjoin the harbour for which the Commission is established and the remainder consists of two members, one member by the council of each municipality; or
>
> (c) where the number of municipalities adjoining the harbour for which the Commission is established exceeds the number of members in the remainder, by agreement among the councils of all of the adjoining municipalities.

Honourable senators, this is a situation where there are several regional municipalities surrounding the Nanaimo area, and it is important for us to remember that in dealing with this bill we are dealing only with the situation in Nanaimo. The legislation simply calls for the raising of the number of members from three to five. The reason for this is to make provision for representation from those adjacent municipalities which will be affected. At the present time, two of the commission members, the chairman and the secretary, are appointed by the Governor in Council, and one is appointed by the City of Nanaimo. By increasing the number of members from three to five, it will be possible to have three appointed by the Governor in Council, one by the City of Nanaimo, and one by the regional district council.

The reason this matter has come up at this time is that the Nanaimo Harbour Commission has proposed an extension of harbour facilities involving an expenditure of between $10 million and $11 million, a very substantial amount. Apparently there was either no communication at all or very little communication with the people affected, and I understand that when the people affected discovered the proposals of the harbour commission there was a considerable uproar. The City of Nanaimo Advisory Planning Commission registered its objections, and the regional district council objected to the location. In other words, there was a classic example of a small autocratic group going ahead and making a decision without adequate consultation with the people to be affected by that decision.

As a result of this, the Department of Transport sent officers out to look into the matter, and they received over 50 briefs from the people concerned. This, in itself, is an indication that there is a great deal of local interest.

There has been considerable change in the circumstances affecting many harbours throughout Canada over the past number of years, and the Department of Transport has set up the National Ports Council to look into this matter and to review the whole National Harbours Act. It has become obvious that there is need to amend that act, and I am sure that this will be done eventually.

However, we should regard with some reservation that the National Ports Council is to bring in recommendations, because that council is made up of the chairmen of the local harbour boards across the country. In other words, it is a small group of people. It is not my intention to reflect on anybody when I say that they do not necessarily represent the viewpoints of all the people affected. There is a great need today to take a new look at the National Harbours Act, but this will undoubtedly take some time. The report on the study being made by the National Ports Council will take a year. Assuming that their recommendations require legislation, then it will be at least another six months before such recommendations can be translated into action. In the meantime, there is some urgency in moving to correct the Nanaimo harbour situation. For that reason, this bill deals only with the Nanaimo Harbour Commission.

There was some suggestion in the discussion in the Transport and Communications Committee of the other place that the whole matter should be gone into, but that that would have taken some time, and as a consequence it was decided unanimously to pass this bill in its present form.

Honourable senators, I think the principle of the bill is one that is of increasing importance. In addition to making provision for representation from the adjoining municipalities, it makes provision for the people concerned to be always represented in the planning stages of any program affecting the harbour and its environs.

• (1620)

This planning involves the layout of streets, roads and access, and provision for recreational facilities. As most of us know, there is a tremendous increase in the number of small boats, private craft and so on, being used in every maritime centre today, and these people's needs and requirements must be taken care of. There is also an increasing awareness of the need to protect the environment. As a matter of fact, it was an approach from the Department of the Environment that brought this whole issue into focus.

The evidence given in this matter, and in many others, makes it clear that there is insufficient communication between government departments. On looking around the various harbours it will be found that there are some facilities, costing millions of dollars in some cases, owned by the Department of Public works, yet harbour boards are making expenditures without any concern as to the utilization of existing facilities. For this reason, it is important that the Harbour Commissions Act be revised, so that all agencies, municipalities, planning departments of governments, environmentalists, and the people can be consulted, to avoid the kind of thing that would have happened in Nanaimo had this protest not been made.

I commend this bill to you. It is a simple one, to increase the number of members of the Nanaimo Harbour Commission from the present three to five, so that representatives of the regional municipalities and the City of Nanaimo can be added. This will give the government the right to have a majority on the board, with three members appointed by order in council, and there will be two from the local bodies. There is nothing difficult about this bill. If it can be passed now, it will enable those concerned to proceed with a program that has some urgency attached to it.

The bill was discussed in committee in the other place, but if any honourable senator wants it referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications I have no objection. However, because of its simplicity I do not think it is necessary to refer it to committee.

Hon. A. E. Haddon Heath: Honourable senators, I have great pleasure in seconding the motion moved by Senator Cameron. I can add very little to his clear explanation of the difficulty we have in respect of this west coast harbour. It is an all-weather, deep water harbour, and because of the accumulation of large freighters and tankers on both our east and west coasts, you can imagine the urgency with which we view the need to expand the harbour facilities.

At present the various levels of government—local, municipal, regional, provincial and federal, because parks, recreation and so on come into the matter—are uncoordinated. They cannot communicate with each other, although millions of dollars are being spent. It can be seen that this is a very worth while and simple bill, which will help to solve the harbour problem on the coast of Vancouver Island. I hope honourable senators will support it.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Cameron moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Thursday, July 12, 1973

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Hon. Paul Martin tabled:

Report of the Agricultural Stabilization Board for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1973, pursuant to section 14 of the Agricultural Stabilization Act, chapter A-9, R.S.C., 1970.

Report of the Agricultural Products Board for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1973, pursuant to section 7 of the Agricultural Products Board Act, chapter A-5, R.S.C., 1970.

Copies of background information to Statement on Small Business by the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce relating to the proposed establishment of the Industrial Bank and Development Agency, dated July 11, 1973.

FOREIGN INVESTMENT IN CANADA

REPORT OF BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE COMMITTEE
TABLED AND PRINTED AS AN APPENDIX

Hon. Salter A. Hayden: Honourable senators, I have the honour to table the report of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, which was authorized on Wednesday, May 16, 1973, to examine and consider the document entitled "Foreign Direct Investment in Canada," tabled in the Senate on Monday, May 15, 1972, and the subject matter of any bill arising therefrom, in advance of such bill coming before the Senate, or any other matter relating thereto.

I would ask that this report be printed as an appendix to the Debates of the Senate and to the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate of this day and form part of the permanent record of this house.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(For text of report see appendix, pp. 873-879.)

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

EXPANDED EUROPEAN COMMUNITIES—REPORT OF COMMITTEE TABLED

Hon. John B. Aird: Honourable senators, it is with some pride and pleasure that I table today the report of the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs respecting Canada's relations with the European Community.

With leave of the Senate I should like to say a few words about it at this time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Mr. Aird: Honourable senators, your committee has worked hard and spent many long hours in the preparation of this report. In particular I want to express my appreciation to the deputy chairman, Senator Allister Grosart. His wise counsel and support have been of invaluable help. Literally he has been a tower of strength.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Aird: Also, at the risk of singling out certain members of the committee, I must record the unique contribution made by Senator Renaude Lapointe and Senator Paul Lafond. They have not only been of great assistance in committee, but have given up a good deal of their personal time in order to ensure that the French edition clearly reflects our views.

In addition, the committee was honoured by the presence in Brussels of the Leader of the Opposition, Senator Jacques Flynn. The fact of his attendance there did a great deal to enhance the prestige and stature of your committee.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Aird: Having paid those compliments, which I mean most sincerely, I wish to emphasize that this report is the product of each and every member of the committee. I have been singularly impressed by the interest and effort of every one of them.

● (1410)

I should now like to make a few remarks about the report itself. The first question I ask myself, in all frankness, is: Does it matter? As I have previously indicated in this chamber, I am most concerned about this point. Is the report of relevance and of use? The best efforts of your committee, most ably assisted by its secretary, Mr. Eric Innes, and by the first-rate staff of the Parliamentary Centre for Foreign Affairs and Foreign Trade, have produced what I believe to be a highly professional document. To the best of my knowledge, there is no other report, document or paper in Canada which presents the story of the European Community with such a range of authoritative material. Therefore, I suggest to you that this report may have a unique quality. It is the product of some of the best Canadian expertise available, and your committee has done its best to collate and distil their accumulated wisdom.

Therefore, honourable senators, once again: Does it matter? I believe it can, does and must matter. But it will only be of relevance and use if the public interest is served by it.

During our inquiry we realized how little material about the Community is actually available to Canadians. It seems to me that this report may well be the only one of its kind in existence. If you like, it could be the Canadian handbook on the European Community. Surely, we are not too modest if we hope that it will, in fact, become a very useful and timely guide, not only for the Canadian public and universities but, perhaps even more so, for Canadian businessmen who are thinking of approaching Community markets with export or investment projects and who may feel, as we did initially, bewildered by the complexities.

If I might turn to some substantive issues, the report recognizes that profound political and economic changes have been taking place in Western Europe, and the European Community has played a major role in these developments. With expansion at the beginning of this year from the original six to nine countries, the impact of the European Community, not only on Europe itself but also its impact on all nations of the world, has become increasingly evident.

A prime purpose of the committee in presenting this report is to help make Canadians more aware of the Community. It is true that a majority of Canadians have traditionally felt linked to Western Europe through cultural and linguistic ties. Many have also had wartime experiences, as I did myself, in Western Europe. However, the achievements of the Community in present-day Europe, its actual progress toward integration in trade and economic matters, and the significance of its future movement toward political integration, are matters which have not sufficiently registered in Canada.

At this time I should like to emphasize developments within the Community which I consider to be of particular importance to Canada, both immediately and in the longer term.

Firstly, the impact of the Community's voice at the forthcoming multilateral trade talks under GATT could well affect world trading patterns for years to come. It is in Canada's interests to point out clearly to the Community the folly of inward-looking protectionist policies which can only lead to the polarization of the world into major competitive trading blocs. It is surely in Canada's interests at these talks to try to persuade the Community to pursue liberal trade policies and that trade barriers of all kinds should be reduced or dismantled.

Secondly, I have already spoken in this chamber of the increasing direct economic importance of the Community for Canada. With the inclusion of the United Kingdom, the European Community has become by far Canada's second largest trading partner. In 1972 the nine member countries bought $2.5 billion worth of Canadian exports—that is 45 per cent of all our exported goods not going to the United States—and sold us $2.2 billion worth of goods. With a population greater than that of the United States—250 million compared to 207 million—and with relevant levels of imports significantly in excess of those of the United States, the Community market obviously presents a most important target for Canada's trading interests.

Thirdly, traditionally Western Europe has served as a market for Canadian primary and resource products. But the European member states actually form large and sophisticated consumer-oriented markets for finished goods, which Canadians have on the whole been slow to recognize. In 1971 the European Community imported over $10 billion worth of finished goods from outside countries, but Canada's share was only one per cent of this market. In view of Canada's fast-growing labour force and the employment which could be created in the processing of goods in Canada, the markets of the Community member countries offer an important challenge to the Canadian entrepreneur.

Fourthly, the Community can be of importance in future business and investment developments. Canada already has important investment links with the United Kingdom, which should be used as launching pads for further expansion into the Community. However, new techniques of joint production and joint development ventures with European entrepreneurs could also be increasingly attractive to Canadian investors for projects both within Canada and in Europe.

Clearly the growing importance of the Community to Canada means that Canadians should try to better understand this economic giant. As one of our witnesses put it, the Community:

> ... is a new political animal, neither a conventional grouping of States ... nor a single state but a mixture of the two ... a very difficult political system for us to try to comprehend from the outside; it is even difficult enough to comprehend for those on the inside.

The committee's report has sought to point out some of the present characteristics of the Community, its achievements, its goals, its strengths and its limitations, the complexities of its decision-making processes, and above all the relevance of its developments to Canada and to Canadians. Basic to the report is the committee's conviction that it is in Canada's best interests to develop closer relations with the European Community at this time. The growth of the Community offers Canada an important opportunity to diversify its international links, and in particular its economic interests. To this end, increased connections with member countries of the Community are urged at all levels, not only on governmental levels but in business and investment undertakings, through academic pursuits, and in all other aspects of Canadian national life.

At the intergovernmental level the committee endorses the present initiatives of the Canadian government in seeking the establishment of an appropriate structure for bilateral relations with the Community, including some form of satisfactory consultative arrangements. Increasingly, there will be areas of mutual interest relating not only to trade matters but to broader questions of economic co-operation. The government's approach to date has been imaginative and innovative, and it is to be hoped the Community will continue to respond positively to these Canadian efforts.

Particularly important for closer European Community-Canada relations will be increased efforts of Canadian businessmen and Canadian investors. This is an opportune moment for them to take a close, positive look at the Community, to assess methods such as export partnerships or consortia for facilitating export procedures and performance, to consider joint production and development projects with Community entrepreneurs, to make use of government trade promotion programs as ways of stepping up the penetration of the European market.

In order to increase Canadian awareness of the Community, the committee recommends that the Prime Minister should find an early occasion to make an official visit to the Community headquarters in Brussels. This should be linked, if possible, with visits to European capitals of member states. Such a visit would be the single most effective way of focussing the attention of Canadians on the Community, and at the same time of illustrating to the Community a vigorous Canadian interest in closer bilateral relations.

● (1420)

In order to bridge what can only be called a serious information gap in Canada, the committee has urged the establishment at the earliest possible date of a European Community information office in Ottawa. This would work both ways: It could enlarge Canadian awareness of Community activities and developments; it could, at the same time, serve as a means by which the Community could become more aware of Canada and the Canadian viewpoint. In the past, there has been a tendency by Europeans to assume that Canadian views were probably similar to American on most issues, and that a common policy might do for both countries. A separate information office would help to overcome this situation. The Community has already established such an office in Japan, a country with whom it has only slightly more trade than with Canada.

One of the most stimulating meetings the committee had in Brussels was with a delegation from the European Parliament led by Mr. Peter Kirk, a British M.P., who is the Leader of the Conservative group. There can be little doubt that the European Parliament will acquire more influence, more responsibility and more democratic control over the affairs of the Community. The committee's report urges that some regular parliamentary link be formed between the Parliament of Canada and the European Parliament to promote increased contacts between Canada and the Community at the level of parliamentary representatives.

Honourable senators, I have touched briefly on some of the considerations and conclusions which have emerged from our study. It has been an interesting and rewarding examination. I know that those members of the committee who were able to visit the Community headquarters in Brussels felt that it was the highlight of the inquiry. We came away with a much deeper appreciation of the potentialities as well as the complexities of the Community. While in Brussels, we were treated with great consideration and courtesy during our tightly scheduled program. Committee members had the impression that they had encountered many dedicated Europeans who, while fully aware of the difficulties and obstacles ahead, were devoted to their task of moving the Community slowly ahead toward its goal of European union by 1980.

Honourable senators, I commend this report to you for your consideration. I trust that it is a report of which we may be justifiably proud and I would move, seconded by Senator Grosart, that it be taken into consideration at the next sitting of the Senate.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, it is moved by the Honourable Senator Aird, seconded by the Honourable Senator Grosart, that this report be placed on the Orders of the Day for consideration at the next sitting. Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Allister Grosart: Honourable senators, it is not my intention at this time to enter into a full discussion of the report. I will hope to do so on another occasion. In the meantime, I think members of the committee would want me to comment on the modesty with which the chairman has presented this report. He has been extremely generous in giving credit to others, but the fact of the matter is that all of us on this committee know full well that the success of the proceedings of the committee and its report, assuming it proves to be a success, are due almost entirely to the leadership and extremely hard work of the chairman of the committee.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: I would like to emphasize that this is not merely a perfunctory response to his very generous tribute to others. One of the things that amazes us on the committee is how a man with his interests, varied as they are, can find the time to give the attention that he has given to this and others of his responsibilities and duties in the Senate.

To those who sometimes wonder whether it is wise for senators to have interests other than those they have assumed in the Senate, I can think of no better answer than the tremendous usefulness to this chamber and to Canada of the fact that the chairman of this committee is also the joint chairman of the Canada-U.S. Defence Committee and the Canadian who was chosen to replace the late Right Honourable Lester Pearson on the Committee of Nine.

In addition, Senator Aird has interests which involve him in the world of international finance and international business. I am sure all members of the committee will recall with great pride one afternoon in Brussels, when Senator Aird questioned at length on behalf of the committee the leading bankers and financial men of Belgium. Not one of us could even have thought of the questions which Senator Aird put to those learned and experienced gentlemen, and we watched with pride as their eyebrows rose as they struggled for answers to questions which seemed at times to be beyond even their competence but which were fully within the experience of the chairman of the committee.

Senator Aird, as chairman, was responsible for choosing the particular focus of this part of the committee's work. He planned the proceedings himself; he was responsible for the decision to go to Europe, and, as some of us perhaps regret, he was also responsible for the work schedule which was set up there for us. We had no time for anything but hard work. Mornings, afternoons and evenings Senator Aird had arranged meetings with prominent members of the community. I say some of us had some slight complaint, but we got nowhere with Senator Aird. He said, "We are here to work and that is all." And he made sure that he held us to that.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: Typically, Senator Aird raised the essential question about the report when he asked, "Does it matter?" This committee has issued other reports—for example, the Caribbean Report and the Pacific Rim Report—and we are glad to see that there has been a degree of implementation by the government of the recommendations in those reports. But I say that it is typical of Senator Aird that when he brings a report to the Senate, and therefore through the Senate to the government and to the people of Canada, what is in his mind is, "Am I wasting my time? Are we wasting our time? Is this a waste of the Senate's time?" I am sure that he will make it his business, as he has for the other reports, to make sure that they are considered in the places where they should be considered first of all, and I am quite sure that once again Senator Aird's valuable time will not have been wasted in this his latest effort in the Senate.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

On the Motion to Adjourn:

Hon. Leopold Langlois: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), I move that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until Tuesday, July 17, 1973, at 8 o'clock in the evening. Honourable senators, as usual I should like to give a brief preview of what is in store for us next week, but I find that as the session progresses and as the date of the summer recess draws nearer, my task as prophet becomes quite difficult, not to say impossible. However, so far as next week is concerned, we will have for consideration on Tuesday evening the report of the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs which has been tabled this afternoon by Senator Aird. It is also expected that at some time tomorrow Bill C-197, to amend the Immigration Appeal Board Act, should pass the other place and is likely to be available for consideration here on Tuesday evening.

● (1430)

I am informed that there is the strong possibility that other bills will be coming to us in the course of the next week. There is also the possibility of adjourning for the summer recess some time on Thursday or Friday next. I am afraid I cannot be more precise than that. For that reason I feel it is our duty to be on standby, at least, for any legislation that might come to us from the other place between now and the beginning of the summer recess.

Motion agreed to.

INCOME TAX ACT (No. 2)

BILL TO AMEND—THIRD READING—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Third reading of the Bill C-192, intituled: "An Act to amend the Income Tax Act (No. 2)".—(Honourable Senator Martin, P.C.).

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Honourable senators, I would like to move the adjournment of this debate until Tuesday next. I had intended to speak on it today, but I find I would like more time to consider the problems I want to deal with. However, I shall be ready to speak on it on Tuesday next. I understand that it is not intended to have royal assent this afternnon. If it had been intended to have royal assent this afternoon, then I would have let the bill go through.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Do I take the consequence of this to mean that having spoken to the bill Tuesday night we will then be able to pass it?

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Oh, certainly. I do not want to delay the bill; I just want to delay my observations on it.

Order stands.

INCOME TAX ACT (No. 3)

BILL TO AMEND—THIRD READING

Hon. Paul Martin moved the third reading of Bill C-193, to amend the statute law relating to income tax (No. 3).

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

HARBOUR COMMISSIONS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—THIRD READING

Hon. Donald Cameron moved the third reading of Bill C-21, to amend the Harbour Commissions Act (Nanaimo Harbour Commission).

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

CRIMINAL CODE AND NATIONAL DEFENCE ACT (TOTAL ABOLITION OF CAPITAL PUNISHMENT)

BILL TO AMEND—ORDER FOR SECOND READING DISCHARGED AND BILL WITHDRAWN

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Macdonald, seconded by the Honourable Senator Flynn, P.C., for the second reading of Bill S-8, intituled: "An Act to amend the Criminal Code and the National Defence Act (total abolition of capital punishment)".—(Honourable Senator McIlraith, P.C.).

Hon. John M. Macdonald: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate, I move that the order for second reading of Bill S-8, intituled: "An Act to amend the Criminal Code and the National Defence Act (total abolition of capital punishment)" be discharged and the bill withdrawn.

I may say that I do this because I feel there is just not sufficient time between now and the summer adjournment for this chamber and the House of Commons to adequately deal with this important measure.

Motion agreed to.

THE SENATE

NEED FOR REFORM—DEBATE CONTINUED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Croll calling the attention of the Senate to the urgent public need in Canada for Senate reform now.—(Honourable Senator Molgat).

Hon. Paul C. Lafond: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators, that the Honourable Senator Lafond should speak now instead of Honourable Senator Molgat?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

[Translation]

Hon. Mr. Lafond: Honourable senators, we are indebted to Senator Croll for raising in this house at this time the eternal issue of Senate reform, which will enable senators to express their views individually and, hopefully, to indicate collectively the orientation which the Senate should take and which the other sources of power should also adopt to influence the future achievements of this house, for I have no doubt about the Senate's future.

When concluding his speech, Senator Croll gave us only two choices: reform or abolition. This is typical of his categoric way of expressing himself. However, I think that as long as the Senate will include one or two obdurate reformers of the kind of Senator Croll, its existence will keep on being researched and guaranteed.

I am quite in agreement with this other aspect of Senator Croll's conclusion that:

> History has shown that Senate reform is much more likely to be achieved through the initiative of the Senate itself than through an outside agency.

It should be noted that he did not say "by the Senate" but "through the initiative of the Senate." I will come back to that later.

I shared the indignation of Senator Connolly, in February 1969, at the time of the almost indecent publication of the document entitled The Constitution and the People of Canada.

It would have been impertinent for me to speak then since I was still far away in the anteroom of the Senate. I am not sure at all that it is still not impertinent for me to do it today.

However, very soon after my coming into this chamber, I was assigned to the Special Joint Committee of the Senate and of the House of Commons on the Constitution, and I came, in a way, to grips with this issue. I then made up my mind to do my best to prevent in the future any further attempts to settle the fate of the Senate in the face of public opinion and without consulting us. Moreover, I came to the conclusion that the only way to avoid that kind of situation was for the Senate to step forward on the first occasion. This occasion is now on the Order Paper.

Honourable senators, I will not undertake to review or comment upon the numerous worthwhile or simply interesting suggestions that were made by the previous speakers who took part in this debate. I believe I have made a full contribution in this regard with respect to the report of the Special Joint Committee on the Constitution and, except for a few details, I still agree with the comments and recommendations it contained.

Hon. Mr. Asselin: Do you mean the minority report?

Hon. Mr. Lafond: No, I was referring to the committee's majority report.

There is a widespread feeling, however, that the Senate is somewhat outmoded with respect to its representation, its composition and the legislative role that it actually plays.

Let me make a digression at this point concerning the recommendation that the Senate's right of absolute veto be reduced to a suspensive veto of six months.

I entirely agree with Honourable John Connolly's suggestion that, if we were to have a right of suspensive veto, our right to absolute veto must be preserved for all constitutional matters. The main raison d'être of the Senate is to be the ultimate protector of provincial and minority rights. Though it is not always highly appreciated by those it protects, nevertheless it must have all the necessary means to defend their rights, and that means full veto.

But for many administrative or legislative measures of exclusive federal jurisdiction I would not fear the substitution of a suspensive veto for six months, as seem to do some of our colleagues. The report of the Special Joint Committee on the Constitution said:

> In the case of the Senate a curbing of its veto power would paradoxically, strenghten it... It would increase the possibilities of confrontation—

Of course, that suggestion calls for further consideration but I am not all that sure that the Senate would not gain by it in terms of increased consideration from the government, the other place, and the whole population.

The committee was first inclined to suggest a suspensive veto for 90 days which I successfully opposed by showing that even if the veto power of the Senate were to be limited it ought to retain the possibility of bringing its case before public opinion and that requires at least six months.

I do not doubt for a moment the ability of the Senate to bring its case before public opinion if it tried a bit to shake off the inertia and hesitations which at times seem to be part of this institution.

Generally speaking, it seems to me that it would be a first step toward a constructive reform if we resolved forthwith to stop ignoring or failing to recognize that inertia and hesitation.

Last week Senator Lapointe expressed the wish that French-speaking senators speak French more often. I accept my share of that remark. I make amends today but without forever giving up the extensive use of the other language because, after all, I do wish to be heard and understood.

On January 9 last, in this house, when the character of the debate called for me to speak in French, the interpretation system failed and a number of my colleagues told me how they regretted being unable to follow me. The visitors in the gallery are not provided with simultaneous interpretation. Honourable senators, to my knowledge, for at least 18 months and maybe much longer we have been suggesting the restoration of our sound equipment and making it available in the galleries, but nothing has been done.

I will not deal today with the rooms where the committees meet. We have only one decent room and we need three. I will stick to the interpretation services.

On May 15 last, the Committee on Agriculture was assigned room 260N where we met 16 members of the executive committee of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture. One of them was French-speaking and it was to him that I directed my questions. I had to do it in English if his colleagues were to be informed about the matter with which I was dealing because even though senators were provided with interpretation services our guests were not.

On June 13 and 14, that same Agriculture Committee was holding public hearings in Moncton. We had with us interpreters, technicians, stenographers and sound equipment. Once again, the senators were served, but newsmen and public were not.

Yet, on May 20, 1971, two years earlier, when the Special Joint Committee on the Constitution met at the same place, in Moncton, several hundred seats in the auditorium had been equipped with interpretation facilities. Honourable senators, I ask you: is it absolutely impossible for us to borrow or even rent, if necessary, the equipment from the other place in order to provide proper service?

Last Friday, July 6, I received the minutes of the proceedings of two committees: one from the House of Commons, which had met 36 hours earlier and one from the Senate which had met eight days before. We have not yet received the minutes of the proceedings of the Agriculture Committee, even though it met one month ago.

Inertia has crept into many activities of our day to day operation. Too often, the moment a senator asks for something or some service, the immediate answer is negative or he is ignored until he raises hell. I would much prefer if individual senators did not have to protest but rather that the Senate do so collectively when necessary, and create a climate of alertness and efficiency which would allow it to take the steps needed to correct and improve its operations.

I digress once more to support a suggestion made by Senator McIlraith. I note, as he did, that in organizing our work we show little regard for those of our colleagues who are not permanent residents of the capital. It often seems to me that it would be much more convenient and effective if we were to sit for extended periods, four or five days every three weeks, rather than trying to stretch out ten or so hours of sittings over three consecutive days every week.

Honourable senators, to return to the main proposition, there are three means of reforming the Senate.

First, the Constitution governs the composition of the Senate, that is, the numbers of senators and the regions they represent, and also lays down the qualifications a senator must have and prescribes the powers of the Senate. We can make no changes in this sector, neither on our own nor in conjunction with the federal government. In my view, this would also require the unanimous consent of the provinces, or the consent of the majority, using a formula to which they had agreed unanimously.

Second, the Governor General in Council alone appoints persons to the Senate and can discern their political sympathies. He also has a lot to say about the legislative work the Senate must tackle and the conditions, among them the time limits, for carrying out this work. In this sector we can surely apply strong pressure and I for one would not be averse to the use, on occasion, of a certain amount of blackmail.

Finally, we have the areas over which the Senate has complete control: the use of its powers, the organization of its work and procedures. Of course, there is only one course open to us here: to take the bull by the horns and shake off the inertia that I have mentioned earlier.

[English]

• (1440)

Sometime last week, Senator Grosart employed the expression "the management of the house." I would like to borrow this expression from him, although in this context I conceive the management as being constituted of the leadership of both sides of the house, the Speaker, and the chairmen of one or two standing committees affected.

I would hope that the management of the house would endeavour to devise means, resolution, report, or what have you, whereby the Senate may collectively express its views and formulate guidelines for the Constitution-makers, the Governor in Council, and the management itself, as to the steps that should be taken to make the Senate at this time what we think it should be.

Surely we are not going to let this debate die away like embers choking on their own ashes.

On motion of Senator Molgat, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, July 17, 1973, at 8 p.m.

APPENDIX

(See p. 867.)

FOREIGN INVESTMENT IN CANADA

REPORT OF STANDING SENATE COMMITTEE ON BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE

Thursday, July 12, 1973

A. INTRODUCTION

On May 16, 1973, the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce was authorized by the Senate to examine and consider the following:

(a) the document entitled "Foreign Direct Investment in Canada" which was tabled in the Senate on May 15, 1972, and

(b) the subject matter of any Bill arising from that document, in advance of such Bill coming before the Senate.

This report constitutes the result of your Committee's examination and consideration of the said document and of the Bill C-132, intituled: "An Act to provide for the review and assessment of acquisitions of control of Canadian business enterprises by certain persons and of the establishment of new businesses in Canada by certain persons" (herein referred to as "the Bill" or "the proposed legislation") which the Honourable Alastair Gillespie, Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, introduced in the House of Commons on January 24, 1973 in furtherance of the objectives set out in the aforesaid document.

Pursuant to the authority granted by the Senate, your Committee retained the services of the following advisers: Mr. R. J. Cowling, who served as legal counsel to the Committee, together with Mr. C. A. Poissant, C.A., and Mr. C. B. Mitchell, C.A., who acted as consultants on general business and economic aspects of the proposed legislation.

During the course of its study which involved twelve meetings beginning on May 23 and ending on July 12 of this year, the Committee received and heard representations from a number of individuals and organizations as well as from two of the provinces, all as listed in Schedule A to this report. Written submissions were also received from a number of other bodies who did not appear before the Committee.

Three meetings were devoted to the hearing of testimony of Mr. R. D. Gualtieri, Special Adviser to the Deputy Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and of Mr. F. E. Gibson of the Department of Justice. The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce was unable to appear before your Committee owing to the hearings which the Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs, of the House of Commons, was conducting at the same time on this matter.

The conclusions and recommendations contained in this report are based on your Committee's own study of the proposed legislation as it stands after second reading in the House of Commons and without regard to any amendments, proposed or otherwise, that may be made during its progress through the House of Commons. Due consideration has been given in formulating these conclusions and recommendations to the testimony and submissions presented to the Committee.

B. SUMMARY OF THE PROPOSED LEGISLATION

1. Purpose

The purpose of the proposed legislation is set out in subclause 2(1) of the Bill. This states that it is a matter of national concern that Canadians retain effective control over their economic environment and that it is therefore expedient to establish a means whereby control of Canadian business enterprises may only be acquired by persons other than Canadians if such control is likely to be of "significant benefit to Canada". The significance of the benefit to Canada is to be assessed by reference to the factors set out in subclause 2(2) of the Bill.

2. Scope and application

The proposed legislation differs in scope from Bill C-201, entitled the "Foreign Takeovers Review Act", which died on the order paper on the dissolution of the Twenty-eighth Parliament of Canada on September 1 of last year. Bill C-201 provided only for the regulation of foreign takeovers (i.e., the acquisition of control of an existing Canadian business enterprise by a non-eligible person), and did not extend to the establishment of new businesses.

By contrast, the proposed legislation is not restricted to foreign takeovers. A non-eligible person who proposes to establish a new business in Canada will also fall within the ambit of the Bill, and will therefore be subject to the review process, unless the proposed new business is related to another business which the particular non-eligible person is then carrying on in Canada.

Provision is made, however, for the Bill to be proclaimed in two parts. The Minister has stated that it is his intention not to proclaim the second part, dealing with the regulation of the establishment of new business, in force until approximately one year after the foreign takeover part is proclaimed.

Insofar as takeovers are concerned, the Bill covers "acquisitions of control" of "Canadian business enterprises" by "non-eligible persons". Insofar as the establishment of new businesses is concerned, the Bill covers the establishment of a new business by a non-eligible person, not already doing business in Canada, and the establishment of a new business unrelated to any business being carried on in Canada by a non-eligible person already carrying on business in Canada. The fact that the Bill contains no definition or other criteria helpful in identifying the nature of "unrelated business" was the subject of considerable concern to many of the parties appearing before your Committee and it would appear, from statements made both before your Committee and that of the House of Commons, that there is some confusion with respect to the understanding of the scope of these terms which may only be clarified through experience.

25862—56

The definitions of non-eligible person and acquisition of control found in the Bill are complex and detailed. Generally speaking, a non-eligible person is a person who is neither a Canadian citizen ordinarily resident in Canada nor a landed immigrant; a government of another country; or a corporation, wherever incorporated, controlled directly or indirectly by non-eligible individuals.

Acquisition of control takes place under the proposed legislation by the acquisition of either shares or property. Briefly, acquisition of shares of a corporation to which are attached more than 50% of the voting rights is conclusively deemed to constitute acquisition of control (paragraph 3(3)(d)). Acquisition of less than 5% of the voting shares of a publicly-traded company or less than 20% of a corporation whose shares are not publicly-traded is deemed not to constitute acquisition of control (paragraph 3(3)(b)(i)). Between these two limits, control is deemed to be acquired "unless the contrary is established" (paragraph 3(3)(c)).

Transactions deemed not to constitute acquisition of control are the acquisition of shares by a trader or dealer in securities in the ordinary course of his business and, under prescribed conditions, by a person carrying on the business of providing, in Canada, venture capital (subparagraphs 3(3)(b)(ii) and (iii)).

3. Review Process

Every non-eligible person proposing to acquire control of a Canadian business enterprise with gross assets of more than $250,000 or revenues in excess of $3 million must give notice of his intention to the Foreign Investment Review Agency which is to be created under the proposed legislation. Effective upon the date on which the second part of the Bill is proclaimed in force, notice must also be given when a non-eligible person proposes to establish a new business in Canada, or to acquire control of an existing Canadian business enterprise with assets and revenues of an amount smaller than the previously described thresholds, unless the new business or the existing business is "related" to a business then carried on in Canada by the non-eligible person.

The Agency is not empowered to make any decisions but must refer the notice to such Minister as may be designated by the Governor in Council to act as Minister for purposes of the Act (Clause 9).

If, following his review of the notice, the Minister is satisfied that the proposed investment (i.e., the proposed acquisition of control or the proposed establishment of a new business) is, or is likely to be, of significant benefit to Canada, he may recommend to the Governor in Council that the investment be allowed and submit a report in support of that recommendation (Clause 10).

If, on the other hand, the Minister is unable to recommend that the investment be allowed, the applicant must be notified of the Minister's decision and be given an opportunity to be heard and make further representations. Following receipt of these representations and any undertakings which the non-eligible person may make pursuant to discussions with the Minister, the latter is to make his recommendation to the Governor in Council (subclause 11(4)).

The Governor in Council is in no event bound by the Minister's recommendation. However, where the Minister has recommended that an investment be allowed and the Governor in Council is of the opinion that it should not be allowed, the Governor in Council may refer the matter back to the Minister so that the latter can afford the parties the same kind of opportunity to be heard and to make further representations as they would have had if the Minister had been about to recommend that the investment not be allowed, provided that the parties have not already had such an opportunity before the Minister (subclause 12(2)).

If ninety days elapse from receipt of the applicant's notice by the Agency without any order being made by the Governor in Council, then the investment is deemed to be allowed (subclause 13(1)). However, where the Minister has been unable to recommend that the investment be allowed and has accordingly given the parties an opportunity to be heard, there is no longer any time limit within which the Governor in Council must make an Order.

4. Compliance provisions

The only offence created under the Bill (apart from violations of certain enforcement provisions) is the knowing failure of a person to give notice to the Agency of an investment. A heavier maximum penalty is provided in a case where the Minister demanded that a person give notice and he subsequently failed to do so than in a case where the Minister made no demand.

In a case where the applicant has failed to give notice to the Agency in compliance with a demand served by the Minister or where he has gone through the review process but has not complied with the Order of the Governor in Council, either by proceeding with an investment which the Governor in Council has refused or by failing to observe any term or condition upon the basis of which the investment is allowed, the Minister may seek in a Superior Court an Order to render the investment "nugatory". In addition, the Court may, amongst other things, order the party to divest himself of the shares of property he acquired on such terms and conditions as the Court deems just and reasonable.

The Minister may demand that a party give notice to the Agency even after an investment has been made and there does not appear to be any time limit within which prosecutions or other proceedings by the Minister must be taken.

C. GENERAL CONSIDERATIONS

Your Committee supports the objective of securing for Canada and Canadians the maximum possible economic benefit of foreign investment in Canada. It also concurs with the concept that Canadians must maintain effective control over their economic environment.

However, the Committee wishes to express its concern that the implementation of the measures provided for in the Bill will tend to reduce the inflow of capital necessary to maintain Canada's economic growth. Certainly, the review process may discourage the entry of such capital into Canada and the locking-in effect will add to the difficulties.

Canada's need for such capital was referred to by your Committee on page one of the Prologue to its "Report on the White Paper Proposals for Tax Reform", where it was stated:

> "Canada is, of necessity, a capital importing country. The development of our natural resources such as mining and gas and oil requires substantial risk capital which in the past has come largely from the United States mainly because of our political and economic stability. . . . The competition for capital, including risk capital, in world markets makes it necessary that Canada meet such competition or suffer diminution in capital inflow with disastrous effect on our economic growth, prosperity and standard of living."

These comments are equally as valid today as they were at the date on which the said report was prepared. In fact, having regard to the measures which the United States has since taken to discourage the outflow of capital from that country and to encourage its nationals to invest in manufacturing and processing facilities in the United States, the risk of suffering a reduction in capital inflow through the introduction of unduly restrictive measures is perhaps more real today than it was then.

Your Committee recognizes that the conflict between the competing objectives of retention of control over our own destiny and the assurance of an adequate flow of capital to meet our capital needs is difficult to reconcile. A great deal has been said on this subject already without any wholly satisfactory resolution of the problem. As a consequence, your committee in consideration of the matters before it and in the preparation of this report, has addressed itself principally to the practical question of making the provisions of the Bill more realistic, workable and fair.

D. CONSTITUTIONALITY

Officials of the Department of Justice have indicated to your Committee that, while they concede that no single enumerated head of section 91 of The British North America Act provides the authority to make laws in relation to subjects such as those covered by the Bill, it is their opinion that the proposed legislation could be supported under a combination of a number of such heads. Aliens, Trade and Commerce and Criminal Law are the ones mentioned. The "residual" or "peace, order and good government" clause would also be invoked. However, Mr. Gibson conceded that

> ". . . short of restricting the application of this Bill very significantly, there is no way that all lawyers will agree with certainty that the Bill is, without question, within the authority of Parliament." (Proceedings of the Committee, Issue No. 4, May 30, 1973, p. 21).

An analysis of judicial decisions interpreting questions of the distribution of power between Parliament and the provincial legislatures indicates that there may be difficulties in supporting the legislation under the above-mentioned heads. Only recently have the courts begun to modify the position that the "peace, order and good government" clause may be invoked only in cases of national emergency, as opposed to mere national concern. Cases interpreting the Criminal Law power have laid down that the federal legislation under this head may not be colourable. While the federal government has undisputed authority to regulate the entry of aliens into Canada, regulation of the civil rights of aliens is not, according to the authorities, so clearly a federal matter. In view of its treatment by our highest courts, the Trade and Commerce clause has never been a reliable basis for legislation which could not also be supported at least incidentally under some other head.

Moreover, the provincial power in relation to property and civil rights would appear to encompass the subject matter of the legislation and the powers of the provinces in relation to other matters, such as the incorporation of companies with provincial objects and natural resources, would appear relevant.

It is possible that the application of the Bill may or may not be constitutional depending upon the particular circumstances. For example, a case where the immediate parties were federally incorporated companies and the non-Canadian element was other than British would present a stronger set of circumstances, at one end of the spectrum, in support of federal legislative activity than would, e.g., at the other end of the spectrum, circumstances involving British controlled provincial companies carrying on a mining operation.

It is not the intention of your Committee to offer an opinion on the constitutionality of the proposed legislation. Rather, the Committee would sound a note of warning in view of the apparently precarious foundations of the Bill and suggest the possibility of referring the Bill to the Supreme Court of Canada prior to its enactment. Otherwise, a climate of uncertainty as unsatisfactory for the federal and provincial governments as for potential investors and owners of Canadian businesses will prevail, since the constitutional question is bound to arise at some stage.

E. SPECIFIC RECOMMENDATIONS

1. Provincial participation in the review process

The most important area which, in your Committee's opinion, requires further clarification relates to the extent to which each province that is likely to be significantly affected by an investment will be permitted to participate in the review process.

In a presentation to the Committee of the House of Commons, the Provinces of New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island expressed their opposition to the Bill in toto on the ground that, in their view, it should be a matter for the provinces to decide whether foreign investment in the respective province should or should not be allowed.

The representatives of the Province of Quebec who appeared before your Committee left no doubt, under reserve of their right to challenge the constitutionality of the Bill, that they considered the proposed legislation inopportune and that, in any event, the province should have equal say with the Federal Government, especially in any case where the federal Minister proposed to refuse to allow an investment in Quebec. The Government of the Province of Newfoundland expressed a similar view to your Committee.

The representations received from the Government of Ontario, while not specifically requesting a veto over the Federal Government's decision with respect to investments in Ontario, made it clear that it felt that the provisions for provincial consultation in the Bill are entirely inadequate.

The only reference to provincial consultation in the Bill is to be found in paragraph 2(2)(e) which reads as follows:

> "... the compatibility of the acquisition or establishment with national industrial and economic policies, taking into consideration industrial and economic policy objectives enunciated by the government or legislature of any province likely to be significantly affected by the acquisition or establishment."

YOUR COMMITTEE THEREFORE RECOMMENDS:

(a) that paragraph 2(2)(e) of the Bill be amended to delete the words following "national industrial and economic policies",

(b) that a new paragraph be added to subclause 2(2) to provide that the "industrial and economic policy objectives enunciated by the government or legislature of the province in which the investment is located must be taken into account" as a factor in determining "significant benefit to Canada", and

(c) that new clauses be added to the Bill to provide

(i) that such province be given a copy of all notices received by the Agency under Section 8 of the Bill and of any other information submitted by any applicant immediately upon receipt by the Agency, and

(ii) that, where the Minister proposes to recommend to the Governor in Council that an investment not be allowed, the Minister shall not submit such recommendation unless the province in which the investment is located either advises him within a specified period of time that it concurs with such recommendation or fails to communicate with the Minister within such period of time.

2. Binding rulings

The Bill provides for the furnishing of opinions to the applicant by the Minister on questions as to whether a person is or is not a "non-eligible person" or whether a business would or would not be an "unrelated business". Such opinions, however, are merely for the guidance of the applicant and, accordingly, are not binding upon the Minister.

Your Committee considers that a great many hardships which the Act, perhaps unwittingly, may impose on everyday transactions because of the breadth and fine mesh of the net which the review process casts, could be avoided or mitigated by permitting the applicant to apply for a binding ruling, not only on questions of eligibility and related business but also on the question as to whether a given and actual set of circumstances would or would not constitute an acquisition of control within the meaning of the Act.

YOUR COMMITTEE THEREFORE RECOMMENDS:

(a) that the existing provision for furnishing of opinions (Clause 4) be extended to all questions arising under the Act except the application of the assessment criteria referred to in subclause 2(2) (amended as recommended herein),

(b) that a new provision be inserted providing for the issuance by the Minister of binding rulings on all questions upon which he may give guidance opinion under Clause 4, and

(c) that such ruling be given within fourteen days of the date of application therefor, in default of which a binding ruling in terms of the applicant's request shall be deemed to have been given.

3. Appeals

The Bill contains no provision for recourse to the courts against an Order adverse to the interests of the applicant. The earliest possible juncture at which a party adversely affected by an Order could have his position reviewed judicially would be on a penal prosecution under Clause 24 or on proceedings under Clauses 19 or 20 by the Minister for an injunction or to have an investment rendered nugatory. Even at this stage, however, it is not at all clear what matters a party could raise by way of defence.

The Minister's recommendation and the Order of the Governor in Council may have a profound affect on the civil rights, not only of foreigners but on those of Canadians as well. It is submitted that the inability to have administrative and quasi-judicial decisions of this nature reviewed, affecting as they do the legal relationships between two or more parties, rather than between the State and an individual, is inconsistent with and without precedent in our system of law and justice. The review process provided by the Bill, shielded as it is from any intervention by the ordinary courts, has been called a "Commercial Star Chamber".

The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce has indicated that there is precedent for decisions of this kind in the Income Tax Act and has referred to the exercise of ministerial discretion provided in Section 247 of the Income Tax Act. It is important to note, however, that subsection 247(3) of that Act provides for an appeal to the ordinary courts from such decisions by the Minister of National Revenue.

Reference was also made to the decision-making process under the National Transportation Act. Under that Act, however, there is an appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada on questions of law or jurisdiction and while the Governor in Council may vary or rescind any Order, etc., of the Canadian Transport Commission, it must be remembered that for the most part inter partes decisions of the Commission are rendered only after full hearings comparable to those available in the ordinary courts and the Governor in Council acts really, in matters under that Act, as a kind of appellate tribunal. This is in sharp contrast to the Bill under consideration where the only and final decision is made by the Governor in Council, and that solely on the basis of a summary of facts submitted by the Minister. Even the kind of hearing which the Minister is obliged to give the parties in the case where he is about to render an adverse decision is not clothed by the Bill with any formality which it would be normal to expect in judicial or quasi-judicial hearings.

YOUR COMMITTEE THEREFORE RECOMMENDS:

(a) That provision should be made for an appeal to the Federal Court, at the instance of any party to the transaction, from any

(i) ruling of the Minister (as herein proposed) (hereinafter referred to as a "ruling")

(ii) decision made by the Minister to recommend to the Governor in Council that the investment be disallowed (hereafter referred to as a "decision");

(b) That the appeal would be to the Trial Division of the Federal Court to which the record before the Minister, together with his reasons for such ruling or decision, as the case may be, would be transmitted; but the appellant would be entitled to adduce additional evidence before the Court;

(c) That in the case of an appeal from a ruling, the judgment of the Trial Division of the Court would be final and unappealable;

(d) That in the case of an appeal from a decision, a further appeal would lie by either the appellant or the Minister from the judgment of the Trial Division to the Federal Court of Appeal on any question of law or mixed fact and law, the judgment of the Court of Appeal to be final and unappealable;

(e) That in the case of an appeal from a decision, both the Trial Division and the Court of Appeal should be permitted to consider any matter not previously disposed of by judgment of the Court on an appeal from a ruling. In considering an appeal, or that part of an appeal dealing with the Minister's assessment of the factors in subclause 2(2) (amended as herein proposed), the Court would give its opinion as to whether or not the Minister

(i) failed to observe a principle of natural justice or otherwise acted beyond or refused to exercise his jurisdiction,

(ii) erred in law in making his decision, whether or not the error appears on the face of the record, or

(iii) based his decision on an erroneous finding of fact that he made in a perverse or capricious manner or without regard for the material before him;

(f) That the final judgment of the Federal Court should be conclusive for all purposes of the Act except as regards the matter of the application of the factors in subclause 2(2) (amended as herein proposed), but the Governor in Council would be directed by the Act to have due regard for the opinion of the Court on such matters;

(g) That the Bill should be further amended to provide for

(i) notification to the parties of the Minister's recommendation,

(ii) delays for launching appeals, and

(iii) deferring the Governor in Council's consideration of a recommendation pending the outcome of an appeal; and

(h) That the fact a party had not exercised his right of appeal should not prevent him from raising any matter which he could have raised on the appeal in defence of any proceedings instituted by the Minister in a Superior Court under Clauses 19 and 20, with the exception of the Minister's assessment of the subclause 2(2) factors.

4. Delays

In the light of representations made to it, your Committee considers that the ninety-day limit (Sections 10 and 13 of the Bill) within which an Order must be made following commencement of the review process by a notice given by the applicant to the Agency under Section 8 is too long having regard to the speed with which business decisions are and must be made and also bearing in mind the great number of transactions which will undoubtedly find their way into the review process. Moreover, your Committee considers that the indefinite delays which could result, in the event of a hearing under Section 11 taking place, are an intolerable hindrance to transactions in the business and financial community upon which the livelihoods of many Canadians, in a sense, ultimately depend.

YOUR COMMITTEE THEREFORE RECOMMENDS:

(a) That the maximum period for the making of an Order be changed from ninety days to thirty days (Clauses 10, 11 and 13);

(b) That the Minister be required to afford the parties the opportunity to make further representations, etc., in accordance with subclause 11(3) within thirty days of the date of receipt by the Agency of a reply to a notice under subclause 11(1), or within such longer delay as the Minister and the parties may agree to in writing;

(c) That the Minister's recommendation under subsection 11(4) be made at the latest within thirty days of the date upon which the parties certified to the Agency that all representations, etc., which they wished to make had been made, in default of which the investment would be deemed to be allowed; and

(d) That consequential amendments be made to Clause 13.

5. "Significant Benefit" Test

A frequently expressed criticism of the Bill is that the "significant benefit" test in paragraph 2(2)(e) of the Bill is too rigorous and that a proposed investment should be allowed unless it is contrary to Canada's national interest.

This would be similar to the test that is to be found in the equivalent Australian legislation which was adopted in November 1972. Your Committee considers that at the very least certain transactions, either for reasons of equity or because they are simply of their nature incapable of ever meeting the "significant benefit" test, should be withdrawn from the latter test and submitted to a less stringent test.

YOUR COMMITTEE THEREFORE RECOMMENDS:

that in applying the assessment criteria set out in subclause 2(2) (amended as proposed herein), the Minister be permitted to recommend that the investment be allowed unless the effect would be contrary to the national interest in any of the following circumstances—

(i) acquisitions through inheritance,

(ii) acquisitions by a non-eligible person from another non-eligible person where at the time the vendor (or any of his predecessors) made his investment that transaction had been found to be of significant benefit under the Act,

(iii) acquisition of control of a Canadian business where it is established that, after diligent effort, no eligible purchaser offering to make the acquisition for a reasonable consideration has been found and there are impelling reasons which indicate that failure to dispose of the control of such business would result in a serious prejudice to the owner or to the business,

(iv) a mandatory acquisition under a contract which provides that acquisition is to take place upon the death of an individual designated therein,

(v) acquisitions by a non-eligible person carrying on business in Canada at the date of coming into force of the Act from another such non-eligible person.

6. Exemptions

(a) Real Estate

The position of the real estate industry in Canada under the proposed legislation has been the subject of considerable discussion. There have been suggestions by the Minister and his officials that the Bill would not apply to certain real estate transactions, particularly the acquisition of raw land, because such transaction would not fall within the definition of "business" contained in subclause 3(1). However, it is by no means clear that such an interpretation is correct. If it is not, it would seem virtually impossible for a party to establish that a change of control constituted a significant benefit to Canada in the light of the factors enumerated in subclause 2(2). It can readily be seen that these criteria have been developed with the manufacturing industry in mind, viz., the references to employment, productivity, industrial efficiency, technological development, product innovation and variety, and industrial competition. In addition, the Federal Government's constitutional position may be more vulnerable in regard to transactions involving land.

YOUR COMMITTEE THEREFORE RECOMMENDS:

That an investment in a Canadian business enterprise whose sole activity is the ownership, development, management and/or operation of real estate be exempted from the application of the provisions of the Bill.

(b) Investment companies

Insofar as investment companies controlled by non-eligible persons are concerned, your Committee considers that investments made by such a company should be reviewed in the ordinary manner as provided for under the Bill. In view of this, it would appear unnecessary to review the actual establishment of the investment company because it would appear difficult, if not impossible, in such circumstances, to meet the specific criteria in subclause 2(2).

YOUR COMMITTEE THEREFORE RECOMMENDS:

That the mere establishment in Canada of an investment company controlled by a non-eligible person should be exempted from application of the Bill.

(c) Amalgamations

Where two or more corporations amalgamate, the amalgamated corporation is deemed under the provisions of paragraph 3(3)(e) to have acquired control of the businesses carried on by the amalgamating corporations immediately before the date of the amalgamation. Because of this, the amalgamation of, for example, two wholly-owned subsidiaries of a non-eligible person would automatically be subject to the review process even though there was, in fact, no change in control of the businesses. Such a result seems unreasonable.

YOUR COMMITTEE THEREFORE RECOMMENDS:

That intra-corporate amalgamations (i.e., the amalgamation of corporations having the same ultimate control) should be exempted from the provisions of subclause 3(3)(e).

(d) Other non-arm's length transactions

Your Committee noted that the Bill does not exempt any other non-arm's length transactions from the screening process. Thus, a non-eligible person carrying on business in Canada through a branch operation who wished to incorporate that business would be unable to do so without submitting the acquisition to the review process.

YOUR COMMITTEE THEREFORE RECOMMENDS:

That appropriate amendments be made to the Bill to exempt from the review process all non-arm's length transactions which do not involve a change in control.

7. Presumption of Control

An almost universal complaint made against the Bill was that the 5 per cent share ownership figure in the eligibility and control provisions of the Bill was unnecessarily low and would sweep into the review process a multiplicity of transactions unconnected with its purpose. In each case, the figure of 10 per cent was suggested as being more reasonable and as being in line with figures contained in other legislation and regulations, such as the insider rules under securities legislation.

YOUR COMMITTEE THEREFORE RECOMMENDS:

That the 5 per cent figure should be increased to 10 per cent, both in the definitions of a non-eligible person and acquisition of control (paragraph 3(2)(b) and paragraphs 3(3)(b)(i)(A) and 3(3)(c)(i)) and the 20 per cent figure in the definition of acquisition of control increased to 25 per cent (paragraphs 3(3)(b)(i)(B) and 3(3)(c)(ii)).

8. Similar Provisions in other Acts

Subclause 5(3) appears to provide that the provisions of the Bill should co-exist with provisions directed to similar objects in other Acts. This would appear to result in undesirable and unnecessary complications since Parliament has already provided rather elaborate rules respecting foreign control of such entities.

YOUR COMMITTEE THEREFORE RECOMMENDS:

That subclause 5(3) be amended to provide that when another Act (e.g., Bank Act, Canadian and British Insurance Companies Act, Trust Companies Act) deals with the question of foreign participation in the entities subject to it, the provisions of such Act shall apply to the exclusion of those in the present Act.

9. Other Amendments

In the course of its study your Committee identified a number of areas in which it was considered that the Bill would have unintended effects.

(a) Further share acquisitions by a person who already has control

Since the Bill is concerned with questions of control rather than ownership,

YOUR COMMITTEE THEREFORE RECOMMENDS:

That where a party already has control, subsequent acquisitions by which the party adds to his existing holdings should be exempted from application of the Bill.

(b) Rights issues

It was considered that the position of a "rights" issue should be clarified under the Bill since it is possible to interpret paragraph 3(6)(c) as deeming receipt of rights by a shareholder to be equivalent to an acquisition of the shares which the rights entitle him to subscribe for. On the other hand, where some shareholders allow their rights to expire or sell their rights to another shareholder, the holdings of another shareholder might thereby surpass the control limits provided in the Bill; therefore the actual subscription for new shares to which the rights entitle a shareholder to subscribe should be left within the review process.

YOUR COMMITTEE THEREFORE RECOMMENDS:

That the mere receipt by a shareholder of a company of rights to acquire additional shares in the company, when all shareholders of the same class have received the same rights pro rata to their respective holdings, should be excepted from the application of paragraph 3(6)(c).

(c) Foreclosure

In view of the mandatory nature of the circumstances described in the following recommendation and the virtual impossibility of establishing "significant benefit",

YOUR COMMITTEE THEREFORE RECOMMENDS:

that control should not be considered to have been acquired by reason only of the acquisition of property by a non-eligible lender who has taken over such property by default.

(d) Status of borrowers

Since it seems to be universally agreed that debt financing through non-eligible sources continues to be desirable in Canada,

YOUR COMMITTEE THEREFORE RECOMMENDS:

that the exception contained in paragraph 3(6)(d) should be extended to paragraph 3(6)(c) so that a company which has borrowed on the security of its assets from a "non-eligible" lender will not itself become tainted with non-eligible status for that reason alone.

(e) Powers of Court

The word "nugatory" in Clause 20 suggests that the Court has the right to annul the original transaction. Since this seems unnecessary and would result in severe practical difficulties, especially where the transaction had taken place on a stock exchange,

YOUR COMMITTEE THEREFORE RECOMMENDS:

that the powers of the Court under section 20 be limited to those set out in Clause 20(2), the effect of which is to permit the Court, among other things, to order an acquirer to divest himself of the shares or property representing his investment.

SCHEDULE "A"

BRIEFS RECEIVED FROM INDIVIDUALS AND ORGANIZATIONS WHO WERE HEARD BY THE COMMITTEE

1. Canadian Manufacturers Association
2. Independent Petroleum Association of Canada
3. Canadian Institute of Public Real Estate Companies
4. Topping Electronics Limited
5. The Province of Ontario
6. Sinclair Radio Laboratories Limited
7. Investment Dealers Association of Canada
8. Committee for an Independent Canada
9. The Province of Quebec
10. The Toronto Stock Exchange

SCHEDULE "B"

WRITTEN SUBMISSIONS RECEIVED FROM INDIVIDUALS AND ORGANIZATIONS WHO WERE NOT HEARD BY THE COMMITTEE

1. The Canadian Chamber of Commerce
2. The Communist Party of Canada
3. The Canadian Bankers Association
4. The Government of Newfoundland and Labrador
5. Citicorp Venture Capital Canada Ltd.
6. MacMillan Bloedel Limited
7. La Chambre de Commerce de la Province de Quebec
8. M.E.P.C. Canadian Properties Limited
9. The Mining Association of Canada

THE SENATE

Tuesday, July 17, 1973

The Senate met at 8 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

REGULATIONS AND OTHER STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS

JOINT COMMITTEE—CHANGE IN COMMONS MEMBERSHIP

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons to acquaint the Senate that the name of Mr. O'Connor has been substituted for that of Mr. Ritchie on the list of members appointed to serve on the Joint Committee on Regulations and Other Statutory Instruments.

IMMIGRATION APPEAL BOARD ACT

BILL TO AMEND—FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-197, to amend the Immigration Appeal Board Act.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. Paul Martin: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding Rule 44(1)(f), I move that this bill be read the second time later this day.

Motion agreed to.

EXCISE TAX ACT AND EXCISE ACT (NO. 2)

BILL TO AMEND—FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-194, to amend the Excise Tax Act and the Excise Act (No. 2).

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. Paul Martin: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 44(1)(f), I move that this bill be read the second time later this day.

Motion agreed to.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Hon. Paul Martin tabled:

Report of Canadian Commercial Corporation, including its accounts and financial statements certified by the Auditor General, for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1973, pursuant to section 13(1) of the Canadian Commercial Corporation Act, chapter C-6, and sections 75(3) and 77(3) of the Financial Administration Act, chapter F-10, R.S.C., 1970.

Report of the National Capital Commission, including its accounts and financial statements certified by the Auditor General, for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1973, pursuant to sections 75(3) and 77(3) of the Financial Administration Act, chapter F-10, R.S.C., 1970.

Statement showing Classification of Deposit Liabilities Payable in Canadian Currency of the Chartered Banks of Canada as at April 30, 1973, pursuant to section 119(1) of the Bank Act, chapter B-1, R.S.C., 1970.

Report of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, including its accounts and financial statements certified by the Auditor General, for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1973, pursuant to section 47 of the Broadcasting Act, chapter B-11, and sections 75(3) and 77(3) of the Financial Administration Act, chapter F-10, R.S.C., 1970.

Report of the Superintendent of Insurance on the administration of the Pension Benefits Standards Act for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1973, pursuant to section 22 of the said act, chapter P-8, R.S.C., 1970.

Copies of a Statement by the Secretary of State for External Affairs, dated July 16, 1973, respecting the death of Canadian tourists at the Zambian/Rhodesian border on May 15, 1973.

Copies of background papers prepared for the conference on Western Economic Opportunities to be held in Calgary, July 24-26, 1973, entitled "Agriculture", "Capital Financing and Financial Institutions", "Industrial and Trade Development", "Mineral Resource Development" and "Regional Development Opportunities".

Green Paper, entitled "Members of Parliament and Conflict of Interest", together with copy of a statement by the President of the Privy Council thereon dated July 17, 1973, and copy of a press release relating thereto, dated July 17, 1973.

SCIENCE POLICY

REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Hon. Maurice Lamontagne, Chairman of the Special Committee of the Senate on Science Policy, presented the following report of the committee:

That the Special Senate Committee on Science Policy which was appointed to consider and report on the Science Policy of the Federal Government, reports that Volume III of the report is now being edited and will be in the hands of the printer shortly and your committee asks leave of the Senate to publish and distribute the said Volume III as soon as it becomes available, even though the Senate may not then be sitting.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Hon. Mr. Lamontagne moved that the report be placed on the Orders of the Day for consideration at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

WESTERN ECONOMIC OPPORTUNITIES

CONFERENCE—ATTENDANCE OF PARLIAMENTARIANS—QUESTION

Hon. Mr. Manning: Honourable senators, may I ask a question of the Leader of the Government. Newspaper reports last week attributed a statement to the Minister of Justice to the effect that members of the House of Commons and members of the Senate for the Western Provinces were being invited as observers to the Western Regional Conference on Economic Opportunities. To the best of my knowledge there has been no notification of this, and I have seen nothing about it other than what appeared in the press. I wonder, therefore, if the Leader of the Government could enlighten us as to the government's position in this regard.

Hon. Mr. Martin: I shall make some inquiries and I shall reply tomorrow.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

ADJOURNMENT FOR SUMMER RECESS—QUESTION

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Honourable senators, in view of the contradictory reports appearing in the press, may I ask the Leader of the Government whether he foresees the adjournment of Parliament for the summer recess this week, and, if so, what legislation we may expect to receive and deal with this week.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Honourable senators, I do not know what final arrangements have been reached. Personally, I remain optimistic that we may finish this week, perhaps on Friday. At any rate I hope that this proves to be the case. I think that much depends on the disposition of the bill concerning capital punishment, and I believe there are some discussions going on in connection with that. We will have the Immigration Appeal Board bill tonight, and I understand that we will have the bill with respect to the Olympic Games, which is considered as a priority. Then we will have the bill to amend the Electoral Boundaries Act, and the bill to amend the Customs Tariff which we had hoped to get today and which is being discussed this evening in the other place.

I do not think that there is any real change from the list given on Thursday last by Senator Langlois, other than with respect to the disposition of the bill on capital punishment, about which we still have to learn.

● (2010)

Hon. Mr. Asselin: Has the government decided to postpone the debate on capital punishment until September?

Hon. Mr. Martin: That is the matter regarding which we have had no final word yet. The disposition was made by other parties.

Hon. Mr. Asselin: Yes, we made an offer to the government—

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Not the right kind of offer.

Hon. Mr. Asselin:—to postpone it for two weeks.

INCOME TAX ACT (No. 2)

BILL TO AMEND—THIRD READING

Hon. Salter A. Hayden moved the third reading of Bill C-192, to amend the Income Tax Act (No. 2).

He said: Honourable senators, I would like to take advantage of the motion for third reading of this bill to answer a question which was asked by Senator Manning during debate on second reading, although I suspect that he may well have the answer in his own mind. He asked if the Government of Canada has obtained from the provincial governments any undertaking that they will not offset the corporate tax deduction by a comparable increase in the provincial corporate taxation. My information is that with respect to the Provinces of Ontario and Quebec, which have their own corporate tax legislation, there has been no discussion, no agreement and no undertaking.

With respect to other provinces, which operate under collection agency agreements, my information is that it is expected that no advantage will be taken, because that would appear to be part of the basis upon which the collection agency agreements operate and serious difficulties might develop if there were any attempt to take advantage of this reduction.

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, I moved that this item be postponed until today for the purpose of considering the comments made by the Leader of the Government in respect of the criticism I levelled against the bill when I spoke on second reading. It was also to give myself an opportunity to consider whether I was correct in my remarks at that time. I wish now to set the record right. After studying the matter I find that I was not entirely right and that the Leader of the Government was not entirely wrong. I suggested when I spoke on second reading that the process of review contained in the bill flies in the face of section 54 of the B.N.A. Act in that it provides for the House of Commons to direct the government, or the Crown, whether it likes it or not, to bring in a measure to amend a taxation bill. I commented that any such bill requires a message of the Governor General before it can be introduced. Therefore the machinery provided in the bill is an abdication by the government of its privilege to introduce a tax bill.

I was, I think, wrong in basing my argument for that on Section 54 of the B.N.A. Act. But the government leader, when he replied, mentioned that there was no obligation on the part of the government to follow the recommendation, that it was merely a wish that the members of the House of Commons would express by adopting a resolution indicating that they wanted the tax reductions to be entirely or in part discontinued. That was his mistake.

I disagree with his interpretation, although I agree that Parliament, or either of the Houses of Parliament, may recommend to the government that it adopt certain tax law. But a recommendation is not an order, and I suggest that this bill, as presently worded, does not provide for a mere recommendation but for an order.

In order to make myself clear, I wish to quote from the bill itself, commencing at page 5:

> (3) Where, at any time after March 31, 1974, a motion for the consideration of the House of Commons, signed by not less than sixty members of the House, is filed with the Speaker to the effect that section 125.1 of the Income Tax Act, as enacted by subsection (1), be amended or to the effect that subsection (2) be amended, so as to
>
> (a) discontinue the deduction that would otherwise be permitted by the said section 125.1,
>
> (b) reduce the amount of the deduction that would otherwise be permitted by that section, or
>
> (c) in any other manner, restrict the application of the provisions of that section, for any period commencing after the motion is filed, the House of Commons shall, within the first fifteen days next after the motion is filed that the House is sitting, in accordance with the Rules of the House, take up and consider the motion, and if the motion, with or without amendments, is approved by the House, the Minister of Finance shall take such steps as are necessary in order that a measure in his name giving effect to the motion may be placed before the House without delay.

The important words are:

> ... the Minister of Finance shall take such steps as are necessary in order that a measure in his name giving effect to the motion may be placed before the House without delay.

I said that the government, by this wording, was obligating itself to act in accordance with the motion adopted by the House of Commons, whether or not the government was in agreement with the said motion; and I said—I am paraphrasing what I said before—the government, in order to avoid a vote of non-confidence, said that it would avoid another vote of non-confidence by accepting any decision which the House of Commons would make after March 31, 1974. I say that whether or not we accept the argument that I made about section 54 being valid, the government was capitulating in this way by avoiding two votes of non-confidence and saying, "We are going to agree with anything you tell us to do concerning this tax measure."

It is a shameful and cowardly attitude, and I don't intend to change one word of my accusation.

● (2020)

I now come to my argument based on section 54. I agree that if one reads the text without giving it a wide interpretation, one may find that I was wrong. Section 54 says:

> It shall not be lawful for the House of Commons to adopt or pass any Vote, Resolution, Address, or Bill for the Appropriation of any Part of the Public Revenue, or of any Tax or Impost, to any Purpose that has not been first recommended to that House by Message of the Governor General in the Session in which such Vote, Resolution, Address, or Bill is proposed.

I agree that if you give strict interpretation to the wording of this section, you will apply it only to appropriation bills, be they concerning appropriation in general of the consolidated revenue for any purpose whatsoever or an appropriation of the proceeds of any tax or impost.

In this respect I was wrong, because I included in this wording a "taxation bill," a bill imposing a tax, whereas the wording would suggest that it is a bill appropriating the revenue of tax or impost. But looking at the question more closely, I came to the conclusion that over the years either section 54 has been interpreted as including a taxation bill, which was imposing a tax or an impost, and not appropriating the proceeds thereof, or that it followed the usages of the British House of Commons and concluded that no tax bill could be introduced by a private member and had to be preceded by a resolution or introduced by a minister of the Crown and, therefore, that the message, which is mentioned in section 54, was not necessarily a message directly from the Governor General but an indirect message from the government or from a minister of the Crown.

To find support for this view I had a look at Beauchesne—I had forgotten about Beauchesne, there was a time when I had to read it very often—and I refer honourable senators to item 263 (2)—

Hon. Mr. Martin: The fourth edition at page 220.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Ah, I see my honourable friend, the Leader of the Government, has done his homework over the weekend, as I did. This is a quotation from May, 511:

> The principle that the sanction of the Crown must be given to every grant of money drawn from the public revenue, applies equally to the taxation levied to provide that revenue. No motion can therefore be made to impose a tax, save by a Minister of the Crown, unless such tax be in substitution, by way of equivalent, for taxation at that moment submitted to the consideration of Parliament; nor can the amount of a tax proposed on behalf of the Crown be augmented, nor any alteration made in the area of imposition. In like manner, no increase can be considered either of an existing or of a new or temporary tax for the service of the year, except on the initiative of a minister, acting on behalf of the Crown; nor can a member other than a minister move for the introduction of a Bill framed to effect a reduction of duties —

Which would be the case in the present bill.

> —which would incidentally effect the increase of an existing duty, or the imposition of a new tax, although the aggregate amount of imposition would be diminished by the provisions of the Bill.

Then we go to item 265(1) at page 221, which reads:

> No member other than a minister of the Crown may introduce a Bill for the reduction of duties. The Government must take full responsibility for the taxation levied to provide the revenue. But the House enjoys complete freedom to make every representation possible—

I agree with that. The Leader of the Government tried to interpret the bill as being that it was merely a recommendation. I have already dealt with that aspect of the bill.

> —representation possible to the Government with regard to the manner in which the ministers discharge this responsibility. This duty the members may perform by moving amendments to reduce the taxes proposed by the Administration.

Item 266(1), on the same page, says:

> A ways and means resolution is a necessary preliminary to the imposition of a new tax, the continuation of an expiring tax, an increase in the rate of an existing tax, or an extension of the incidence of a tax so as to include persons not already payers. According to present practice it is immaterial whether the tax is solely intended to provide revenue for the service of the year, or whether its primary purpose is to regulate imports.

Finally I quote from item 269, on page 223:

> No augmentation of a tax or duty asked by the Crown can be proposed to the committee, nor tax imposed, save upon the motion of a Minister of the Crown; nor would an amendment to extend the imposition of a tax to persons enjoying an exemption therefrom be now permitted.

That is quoted from May, 544.

What I say is that, whether the message from the Governor General is in the form of a resolution or in the form of the sponsorship of a bill by a minister of the Crown, the responsibility of the government, the responsibility of the Crown, as far as a tax measure of any kind is concerned, is to take the initiative and not surrender it to the members of Parliament, or to the members of the House of Commons in particular, in view of section 53 of the B.N.A. Act.

I therefore say that this bill provides for a capitulation by the Crown, by the government, to the House of Commons, especially when we know that there is a majority in the other place that does not belong to the government party. The 60 members could, of course, move the motion, but in the present circumstances with a minority government a motion like that could be adopted by the House of Commons against the wishes of the government, and then the minister, or the government, which is the equivalent, would have no choice but to accept the view of the House and discontinue the tax deductions provided in this bill.

I say that it would have been more courageous simply to provide that those deductions be operative until the end of December, 1973, giving the Minister of Finance discretion to include the continuation of these deductions in his next budget. But now he says, "I accept to bring in a measure in keeping with your wishes whether I like what you require me to do or not. I am telling you now that I would rather this measure not be temporary, but permanent. If you tell me, however, that it is going to be only temporary, I will do as you direct, whether I approve or not."

As I said, this government, in order to avoid a vote of non-confidence this year has agreed to jettison its responsibilities next year to avoid the same vote of non-confidence. That is cowardice such as I have never seen in my life. Whether or not it has been raised in the other place, as was mentioned by the Leader of the Government, is of no importance at all. As I said before, if someone asked for a concession and was given twice what he asked, he would be foolish to criticize. I rest my case on this. It is a very bad precedent, and it will haunt the government for a long time.

● (2030)

Hon. Paul Martin: Honourable senators, I take it that it is not necessary now to argue at any length on the relevance of section 54 of the British North America Act to this situation. This section reads:

> It shall not be lawful for the House of Commons to adopt or pass any Vote, Resolution, Address, or Bill for the Appropriation of any Part of the Public Revenue, or of any Tax or Impost, to any Purpose that has not been first recommended to that House by Message of the Governor General in the Session in which such Vote, Resolution, Address, or Bill is proposed.

The other day we did have some understandable difference of opinion as to whether there were three different measures contemplated in section 54—an appropriation, a tax, or an impost—but it is clear from the authorities, as Senator Flynn has just acknowledged, that what section 54 provides is:

> —or Bill for the Appropriation ... of any Tax or Impost—

This is borne out clearly, as he said, by Dr. Beauchesne, who says page 221 of Parliamentary Rules and Forms, regarding the 54th section of the B.N.A. Act—and this is in addition to what Senator Flynn has quoted:

> The 54th Clause of the British North America Act, 1867, merely relates to appropriations, and does not bear on the question of the imposition of taxes.

Dr. Driedger, a former Deputy Minister of Justice, in his pamphlet entitled "Money Bills and the Senate," says at page 42—

Hon. Mr. Flynn: This is something else.

Hon. Mr. Martin: He speaks of section 53 as well as section 54.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Martin: He said:

> Section 53 relates to both appropriation and taxation bills and requires that all such bills must originate in the House of Commons; it does not mention royal messages, recommendations or consent.

Then he says:

> Section 54, on the other hand, deals only with appropriation bills (the appropriation of any part of the public revenue, or of any tax or impost) and not with bills imposing or levying a tax or impost.

So Senator Flynn and I are not now in disagreement.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: On this point.

Hon. Mr. Martin: On this point.

Hon. Mr. Walker: This is the first time in history.

Hon. Mr. Martin: The other area of Senator Flynn's argument is essentially a political one.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Oh, no.

Hon. Mr. Martin: I do not quarrel with his right to make that argument, even in the Senate. The fact is that, whatever the government would do in respect of a motion filed by 60 members of the House of Commons after March 31, 1974, whether the government's act of bringing in the necessary resolution and the necessary measure represents the government's convictions, or merely a compliance by the government with the provision in this bill—

Hon. Mr. Flynn: With the wish of the House.

Hon. Mr. Martin: —which provides that the 60-member motion must be filed with the Speaker and that, 15 days after Parliament is called, that motion must be dealt with; or whether the government acts in accordance with what is or becomes its conviction—

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Ha!

Hon. Mr. Martin: —the fact is that only the government, only the Crown, can bring in, in the necessary form, a measure that will meet the requirements demanded as a result of the action of the 60 members.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I never questioned that.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Only the 60 members can give effect to their wish.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: A majority can.

Hon. Mr. Martin: What is Senator Flynn arguing now? He is arguing for a limitation on the powers of Parliament.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Oh, no.

Hon. Mr. Martin: He is saying that there is a limit to what Parliament can do in respect of matters over which it has no constitutional authority.

This is an old question. Mr. Fulton argued it in 1960. Senator Flynn may recall that Mr. Fulton, when he was Minister of Justice, advanced the proposition in an even more extreme form than the proposition that was advanced by Sir John Thompson, to which Mr. Blake replied in that famous speech of his in 1890, when he talked of the rights of the House of Commons in respect of measures that were designed to force the government to adopt policies which Parliament wanted—

Hon. Mr. Flynn: That is something else.

Hon. Mr. Martin: —even in a form which Parliament itself could not do.

There is no doubt that 60 members and more have a right at any time to say to the government, "We want this and this done;" and they can so express themselves, for they have this power to advise. They can so express themselves in a form, as they are permitted to do in the bill before us, that requires of the executive to do something in a form which alone it could employ.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: It should resign.

Hon. Mr. Martin: As I said, that is Senator Flynn's political argument. I can understand Senator Flynn, in his frustration—

Hon. Mr. Flynn: No, no.

Hon. Mr. Martin: —saying that, but he will understand that I am not addressing myself to his political argument. I am addressing myself to the facts of the case.

[Hon. Mr. Flynn.]

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Frustration?

Hon. Mr. Martin: Parliament has the right to advise, Parliament has the right to take a position that will make its advice effective, as Mr. Blake said in 1890 and as Mr. Fulton said in March 1960. But only the government, as provided for in this bill, can give legal effect by the necessary resolution, and in accordance with section 53, to which Senator Flynn made reference a short time ago.

Honourable senators, while I think Senator Flynn has made a good argument, it is clear now that he must rise on some future occasion and say, "I was wrong on Thursday night with regard to section 54, and I am now wrong with regard to my implied assertions that there is a limitation on the power of the majority in Parliament to demand that the government take particular action, and particularly in this instance, that they will be required to do so by this very bill."

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Honourable senators, I quote something in French:

Courbe la tête, fier Sicambres.

[Translation]

Hon. Mr. Martin: You know your literature but you do lack the passion.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: It is not really necessary with you.

[English]

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

IMMIGRATION APPEAL BOARD ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Jean-Paul Deschatelets moved the second reading of Bill C-197, to amend the Immigration Appeal Board Act.

• (2040)

He said: Honourable senators, this bill is of an emergency nature, and its main purpose is to overcome an intolerable situation resulting from the incapacity at this time of the Immigration Appeal Board to deal with the increasing number of appeals.

I must say that this bill received unanimous support in the House of Commons and, after two sittings, was reported without amendment by the standing committee in the other place. I do not say that in order to prevent an examination of this bill by the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs. On the contrary, if this bill receives second reading it is my intention to propose that it be referred to that committee because, in my opinion, it is precisely the kind of bill which has to be examined thoroughly. In saying that I am not suggesting, however, that we are dealing here with what might be called a contentious bill. It is simply that in view of its implications and the great number of people it will help it is one of the most progressive steps ever taken by the Department of Manpower and Immigration in a long time and as such deserves our close attention.

The provisions of this bill are divided into eight clauses, and, after I have reviewed briefly with you the background leading to it, we can then examine the objectives of the bill in the light of the acute problems it is designed to solve.

As honourable senators know, the present Immigration Act dates back to 1952, and in his opening remarks on moving the second reading of this bill in the other place, the Minister of Manpower and Immigration intimated that the government is now working towards a complete revision of Canada's immigration law. Since 1952, as everyone will agree, we have passed from an era of ocean transportation to one of air transportation which brings more and more visitors to our country each year. In fact, more than 3.5 million visitors cross our borders or enter our country by our airports and seaports annually.

This improvement in transportation facilities has created many phenomena. I read in the newspapers a week or so ago that even Quebecers, who as recently as 20 years ago were not known to travel to any great extent, have now begun emigrating to other countries. The fact that many thousands of them have done so is, of course, partly because of increased pensions and early retirement. At any rate, it is obvious that not only Canada but other countries as well are facing certain new phenomena resulting from the new developments in the field of transportation.

For these reasons the government has announced its intention to produce a policy paper on immigration later this year. Before a draft can be submitted to Parliament, however, there will have to be discussions with the provinces, since they also have a share of authority in matters of immigration. The matter will also have to be discussed with ethnic organizations and community groups and any others interested in the subject of immigration.

Honourable senators, why do we need this bill now and why do we need it so urgently? In simple terms, the facts can be summed up as follows: The Immigration Appeal Board now receives more than 30,000 appeals each year from deportation orders. You will note the number of 30,000 per year. As the board is constituted at the moment it can handle only 1,000 appeals a year. As a result there is a backlog of about 18,000 cases awaiting decision by the Appeal Board. This means that some appellants whose appeals have been filed and are now before the Appeal Board might, if nothing were done to correct the situation, have to wait about 15 years before receiving a decision.

Part of the problem is that unless this bill is passed the membership of the board cannot be increased, nor can the rights of appeal be modified. Neither of these things can take place without an amendment to the Immigration Appeal Board Act, which is the proposal we have before us tonight.

Some honourable senators might ask what the causes of this situation are. Well, in 1967 there was an amendment to the immigration regulations by which visitors to Canada were given the right to apply for landed immigrant status. Moreover, at that time any person subjected to an order of deportation, or any Canadian citizen sponsoring an immigrant, had the right to file an appeal. Yet, strangely enough, when these very generous provisions of the act were discussed in Parliament in 1967 there was actually very little discussion on what impact they might have on cases concerning visitors who wished to become Canadian citizens, or on cases of persons who entered Canada illegally. There is no doubt at all that the provisions were exceedingly generous.

● (2050)

I do not think that any country in the world had more generous attitudes towards visitors who were within that country and were asking for immigrant status. But experience has shown that this act contained many loopholes with the result that visitors and persons who had entered Canada illegally since 1967 were, in fact, the main beneficiaries of the act, since they represent about 90 per cent of the appeals received by the Appeal Board.

This situation again is largely due to the fact that rights of appeal against deportation orders were primarily intended for immigrants, but had, in fact, been exercised to an overwhelming degree by visitors. I am told that out of the backlog of 18,000 cases before the Immigration Appeal Board, 90 per cent represent cases of visitors who filed application while on Canadian soil.

Honourable senators, the government, being aware that this situation has developed, has already taken some emergency measures, at least, to correct the situation in part, by taking away as of November 6, 1972, the right of visitors to apply for landed immigrant status while still in this country. The new regulations came into force on November 6, 1972, and it is not now possible for a visitor within Canada to apply for landed immigrant status.

On January 1, 1973, the department also acted to require all visitors who wish to work in Canada to obtain an employment visa, a work permit, or to register, if they plan to stay more than three months. But these measures had relatively minor impact. Therefore, what is required to cope with this intolerable situation—and here I am thinking of the backlog of about 18,000 cases—is an amendment to the Immigration Appeal Board Act, and that is what we are considering this evening.

Honourable senators, there are two major features of this bill. First, there are some temporary measures. This bill provides for the appointment of an unlimited number of temporary board members to deal with the backlog to which I referred earlier. I would remind you that under the present act there are seven permanent members of the Immigration Appeal Board, and this number can be increased to nine. In this bill there is a permanent provision for the appointment of seven temporary members, together with a temporary provision for the appointment of an unlimited number of temporary board members in order to dispose once and for all of the backlog facing the Appeal Board. A second temporary measure is that appeals may now be heard by a single member of the board rather than by three members as is presently the case.

Let us now look at some of the permanent measures provided by the bill. It establishes a new basis of appeal from a deportation order issued by a special inquiry officer of the immigration division. Under the present regulations everyone who is ordered deported has a right of appeal to the Appeal Board but, in future, if this bill passes, the right will be restricted to persons to whom Canada has an obligation.

Let me give you a few examples of this situation. One is the case of a landed immigrant, or a person of immigrant or non-immigrant status deported at the port of entry.

Another concerns persons who can substantiate a claim to Canadian citizenship or refugee status, and so forth. The department recognizes that there are thousands of people in Canada, legally or illegally, who will lose their right of appeal when this bill is proclaimed unless they take advantage of a certain provision that I shall explain later. Many of these people have been in Canada for years. They are living useful lives here, and some of them are well known in their communities. Others are more recent arrivals who were in Canada or en route to Canada when the right of visitors to apply was removed on November 6, 1972.

This bill will give these people 60 days in which to come forward and apply for landed immigrant status. In other words, this privilege to apply is available to all, whether they were in Canada legally or illegally, as long as they were in Canada on November 30, 1972, and have been here continuously since that date. They will have the right to appeal during the 60 days, and this I shall explain further later.

● (2100)

If this bill is passed the department will establish by regulation—after the bill is proclaimed, of course—a number of criteria for use by the Appeal Board in ruling on applications which will be filed within 60 days of proclamation. The applications will be assessed on such factors or criteria as the length of residence in Canada, family relationships, employment record and the existence of compelling compassionate circumstances. Thousands have entered Canada illegally, without reporting to immigration offices. They might have been here for the last five or six years, and if they can meet the criteria contained in the regulations and in light of experience in similar cases they will be permitted to remain in Canada.

If this bill is examined in committee honourable senators, of course, will have the opportunity to obtain more information from the minister regarding these criteria. According to my information, however, any person of goodwill and good faith will be allowed to remain. As a personal guess, there are surely more than 100,000 instances of cases in breach of the regulations, and the number could possibly reach 200,000. However, in view of past experience it is estimated that approximately 90 per cent of these cases could meet the criteria and be permitted to stay.

I informed honourable senators that on November 30, 1972, new regulations revoked the visitor's right to apply. If there was any mistake made in 1967 it was in the fact that visitors entering Canada were entitled to file an application, and to appeal following a deportation order. The loopholes which existed and the legal advice that these persons no doubt received made it easier to do this than to visit Canadian immigration offices abroad for screening. They much preferred to come here as visitors and file applications, knowing that deportation orders against them might not be enforced for five or six years. In the meantime these visitors became entrenched in the country, married and had children. Their appeals, of course, then had to be decided on humanitarian and compassionate grounds.

In order to achieve the purpose of this bill the appeal system must be changed entirely. In the future those seeking admission at ports of entry will have the right to appeal deportation orders. This will apply to those to whom immigrant or non-immigrant status was issued overseas, landed immigrants, and persons having a claim to refugee status or Canadian citizenship. These provisions will avoid such an impossible situation arising in the future as is faced by the department today. It is not possible to assess the numbers to whom an appeal will be made to come forward in good faith and take advantage of a unique policy. It is the wish of the department to give most generous study to such cases, but it is useless to state that there will be no prosecution for the manner in which they entered or remained in Canada.

The bill also provides a legal basis for fulfilling the obligations accepted by Canada in acceding in 1969 to the United Nations convention relating to the status of refugees, which provides protection against deportation to countries in which they would be subjected to persecution.

● (2110)

Having said that, there will be a period of 60 days following proclamation of the act which will provide a final opportunity for perhaps a few hundred thousand people to regularize and correct their case with immigration officials. In my view, it is most important, if we wish to achieve this goal, for the department to organize the widest possible publicity program to ensure that during the 60-day period following proclamation of the act every person who wishes to regularize his case be informed of his rights and privileges under the amended act, including the criteria which he will be asked to meet in order that his application can be accepted.

The department intends to insert advertisements in newspapers across the country, particularly in foreign language newspapers and the ethnic press. There will also be radio and television announcements. The department also envisages participation in public affairs broadcasts, and departmental personnel may be at the disposal of community groups whenever meetings can be arranged.

It is also intended that Canadian immigration centres will remain open on evenings and weekends during the 60-day period in order to receive registrations, and consideration is being given to the possibility of departmental officers being sent to more remote communities to explain the program and accept registrations. It is also possible that the services of Canada manpower centres will be enlisted for registration purposes as necessary.

I am informed that the department has already received many applications, and although there is no legal authority for so doing, the names of applicants are being recorded in order that they may be notified when the advertisement program comes into force.

Honourable senators, I have tried to outline only the highlights of the bill. I hope that the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs will thoroughly examine the bill, and I intend to move accordingly if the house agrees to give the bill second reading.

Having said that, I have a personal appeal to make to the government leader and to the members of the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs. If the bill goes to committee, I would ask my colleagues—and I am myself a member of the committee—to ask the Minister of Manpower and Immigration to consider a suggestion I shall make.

I have already mentioned that the Appeal Board will have to deal with 18,000 outstanding cases. Those cases are now before the Appeal Board. However, there will be more cases than that. Following the wide publicity given to the matter, there could be as many as 100,000 or 200,000 applications filed. If an application is turned down and a deportation order issued, the applicant is entitled, under the bill, to an appeal. So the figure of 18,000 outstanding cases could increase by 5,000 or 10,000.

When the bill was in committee in the other place, the minister informed the committee that he was planning to appoint as many temporary members as necessary to hear the cases. In speaking of the kind of persons he had in mind, the minister said:

> We also are interested of course in the people with competence and experience who have retired and who again would not be looking for a long-term attachment to the Public Service.

In my opinion it will not be possible to dispose of the backlog of cases in less than two or three years. Before anyone will hear a case he will be required to attend a refresher course for approximately two weeks. It occurs to me that there may be many honourable senators who would readily volunteer their help in this matter. It will be recalled that for many years members of the Senate presided over divorce cases, and during that time they showed a dedication to serve the public interest.

I hope that the government leader and other honourable senators, when in committee, will discuss this matter with the Minister of Immigration and remind him that he might find in the Senate many who would readily volunteer for this type of work.

[Translation]

Honourable senators, in just a few words I would like to sum up this bill. It is about the Immigration Appeal Board which is now faced with an entirely unacceptable situation with a backlog of 18,000 cases and those cases will not be disposed of before 15 years unless the bill before us is passed, because this bill sets forth changes to the Immigration Appeal Board.

Also, this bill will end the major problem which caused that backlog of cases, that is visitors coming to Canada to circumvent the law, apply for immigrant status and then appeal to enjoy four or five years before their appeal is heard, settle down here, get married here and, finally, nearly force the authorities to accept them.

So I made a suggestion to my colleagues and to the government leader because I sincerely think that the Senate can play a part as it did in divorce cases. We have here men of experience. We have men of talent. I remember the minister stating that of the number of temporary staff that will be hired 28 per cent at most will be lawyers.

Hon. Mr. Asselin: Are there any senators?

Hon. Mr. Deschatelets: There are no senators, and that is why I make that suggestion.

So, having said that, if honourable senators have any questions, I think that I have papers here which will enable me to answer some technical questions.

I hope I have stated the main purpose of the bill. This bill is to be referred to the committee because not only is it up to us to show that we have an interest in this tremendously important act but because of the interest of many senators in immigration I think it will be quite possible for them to give the minister very good advice in a very difficult situation.

• (2120)

[English]

Hon. Henry D. Hicks: Honourable senators, I rise to support this bill. I merely wish to make two observations on it. First of all, I am sure that everyone must approve of the appointment of additional temporary members to expedite the work of the Immigration Appeal Board. It seems to me that nothing discredits the law and destroys the respect which citizens hold for it more than long delays, delays which in the case of immigration appeals have been interminable under the present state of affairs. I do not think that this amendment will be questioned by any thoughtful person.

I wish to make special reference, however, to the provisions under clause 8 of the bill, to which my honourable colleague, Senator Deschatelets, referred. These provisions have to do with persons who were in Canada in November of 1972 without landed immigrant status and who found themselves unable, after the changes which were made on November 6, 1972, to apply for landed immigrant status while remaining in Canada. It is not fair to suggest that these people, or a great many of them, anyway, were in Canada illegally. Indeed, the common practice, which was condoned by immigration officials, was for persons to come to Canada as visitors and then to apply for landed immigrant status, it being well known that their cases could be dealt with expeditiously after they arrived in Canada and, in some cases, even more expeditously than previously.

Hon. Mr. Deschatelets: I am glad that the Honourable Senator Hicks has raised this point. Those individuals are going to be entitled to apply—

Hon. Mr. Hicks: Yes, I understand that perfectly. I merely wish to make a comment on it. I wanted to make the point that it is hardly fair to suggest that those people were in Canada illegally.

I am, of course, most familiar with this through my dealings with persons coming to Canadian universities. Over the past years many universities in Canada have recruited teachers from abroad, and it has been common practice for a university, rightly or wrongly, to suggest to new appointees that they could come to Canada without worrying about their status and then apply from within for landed immigrant status. Many of these people, some of whom came from Australia, India, the United States, and other parts of the world, found themselves in this position last November, only to be told that they must return to the country of their origin to spend a certain period of time, which I believe was three months, before they could apply for such status. Therefore, I welcome wholeheartedly the provisions contained in clause 8. I think they are altogether correct and will completely redress what to me seemed to have been an injustice in dealing with a great many people.

Hon. Mr. McIlraith: Perhaps it was bad advice which they were given.

Hon. Mr. Hicks: It may have been bad advice. I will not argue the point with my honourable colleague, Senator McIlraith. What I am saying is that the universality of the badness of it was certainly condoned and overlooked. In any event, the argument is academic at the present time.

I have one reservation concerning this bill, and that is with respect to the 60 days given for the applicant to apply. I am wondering whether 60 days is a sufficient period of time to enable applications to be made. I listened with interest to the account which Senator Deschatelets gave of the measures which the department intended to resort to by way of advertising these provisions. I am sure that will be helpful. Again, if I may refer to some of my academic colleagues, many of them do not stay at their home base during the summer months, and if this bill should be proclaimed next week, for example, they would only have until the third week of September to make application. I would hope that they would have at least until the end of October. This could be done, of course, by extending the 60 days to 90 days. I am not suggesting that we should do this now. It could be much more easily done by the Governor in Council proclaiming the bill late in August. It may well be that time before the bill can be proclaimed anyway, if they are going to organize this advertising campaign to which Senator Deschatelets referred.

This is an important point. I do not think that persons who came to Canada in good faith, even though, perhaps, on inadequate advice necessarily ought to be required to return to Australia, or wherever, with their families and live there for three months before being able to return to Canada in order to continue in jobs which they are performing satisfactorily to the benefit of themselves and the many Canadians they are serving.

Honourable senators, I welcome all aspects of this bill, and support the measure wholeheartedly.

Hon. Hartland de M. Molson: Honourable senators, I am not going to oppose this bill. However, I must say that I found its introduction to be a very disheartening affair, and a real reflection of incompetent administration over a period of time when what has happened could and should have been foreseen. Unless the bill is passed the wrong people are going to be hurt. The effect of the bill, of course, is to condone in many cases illegal acts, and to remove the necessity to comply with the requirements our immigration laws should have demanded throughout, and in fact did demand, I believe, until 1967.

● (2130)

My honourable friend said that this is an emergency. Why is it an emergency? I suggest it is because the government has been taken by surprise. It should not be an emergency. Immigration is nothing new in Canada. We have been getting immigrants since the country was first discovered. All of a sudden we find that our immigration system has been completely faulty, so we say we must have emergency legislation; that the Appeal Board we set up is inadequate; that there are 30,000 appeals a year. We must have known there would be these appeals when we set up the machinery for them. There are 18,000 people hanging around waiting for their chance to come before the Appeal Board. That is not good for them, or for the country, or for the Appeal Board.

Apparently the amendments made by the government in 1967—and I am sure passed by this house—have caused this situation. I feel this is a condemnation of the legislation that applies to immigration into this country. In my view, the government of the day when these amendments were passed should accept full responsibility. At the same time, as we all so well know, parliamentary procedure requires that all such measures be debated and passed in both houses, and receive royal assent, so I assume we all have to accept some blame for the present situation.

To me it is appalling to hear a bill introduced with words like, "Unfortunately, the main beneficiaries will be those who did something illegal—those who entered the country illegally." From what we have heard and read we know that in this way Canada has admitted perhaps hundreds of completely undesirable people. We have become a haven for crooks, gangsters, escapers, and other unattractive people. Why we admitted them as visitors, with the later privilege of applying for landed immigrant status, I really do not know. It seems to me that this whole thing could and should have been foreseen.

I must admit that the introduction of the bill has a degree of frankness that I can only say is most commendable, because it admits that awful mistakes have been made in the past. It would seem as though we are now in desperation throwing the baby out with the bath water. We do not know what to do, so we say that everybody who is now here will by this new process be permitted to stay, that we will start afresh and will not make the same mistake again.

I know that many of the people in question have had bad advice, and came here as a result of that. I know that if this bill is not passed there will be great suffering for those people, and we certainly do not want to hurt them.

Under normal circumstances, responsibility would be found for the basic cause of this situation and proper blame attached. It reflects not only on the government, but on our whole parliamentary system. I might even go so far as to say it is one of the factors that led to change in the political scene last autumn; it was one of the matters greatly criticized as not being administered efficiently.

It seems that we are moving, as Senator Manning said a few months ago, towards a permissive society in which we no longer hold people responsible for their actions. We are always finding some reasons why they do wrong, making excuses for them, and not insisting that they be held responsible. If we held the people who came here through misunderstanding responsible, there would be real hardship, and we could not even suggest such a step.

In passing this bill, as I am sure we will—and I shall certainly vote for it—we ought to realize how in this instance some colossal mistakes have been made in the process of government. We should take it as a lesson. What has happened has been a great disservice to this country. When the bill goes to committee, I hope we shall be able to find out how the mistake originally happened, why it happened, and ensure that this lesson will prevent a similar mistake in the future. As I see it, we have no choice but to give this bill speedy passage in order to relieve those who are waiting to be admitted to the country. If in the course of dealing with it we can find out how it all happened, we will be further ahead in the future.

On motion of Senator Yuzyk, debate adjourned.

EXCISE TAX ACT AND EXCISE ACT (NO. 2)

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Second reading of Bill C-194, intituled: "An Act to amend the Excise Tax Act and the Excise Act (No. 2)".—(Honourable Senator Martin, P.C.).

Hon. Paul Martin: Honourable senators, I think Senator Lang, who will move second reading, would prefer that we do not go on with this bill until tomorrow. I would accede to that. I know that Senator Macdonald intends to speak on this bill, but if we accede to Senator Lang's wish I do not think it will stand in the way of giving full and efficient consideration to the bill, and will not destroy our timetable.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: That is agreeable. My remarks will be very brief, and I do not see any need to send this bill to a committee.

Hon. Mr. Martin: It could certainly be given second reading tomorrow, if that is what honourable senators wish.

Order stands.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Wednesday, July 18, 1973

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

CUSTOMS TARIFF (No. 2)

BILL TO AMEND—FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-195, to amend the Customs Tariff (No. 2).

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. Paul Martin: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 44(1)(f), I move that this bill be read the second time later this day.

Motion agreed to.

THE ESTIMATES

INFORMATION CANADA—INTERIM STATEMENT

Hon. Douglas D. Everett: Honourable senators, in the report on the estimates presented on June 21, 1973, I made the following statement on behalf of the committee:

> The report on the examination of Information Canada is being prepared and when it is ready it will be tabled in the Senate as a supplement to this report.

By way of an interim statement, I advise the Senate that we are still putting together information on these hearings and hope to have more to report when Parliament resumes in the fall or soon thereafter.

REGULATIONS AND OTHER STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS

STANDING JOINT COMMITTEE—QUORUM—AUTHORITY TO SIT DURING ADJOURNMENTS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Eugene A. Forsey: Honourable senators, I move, seconded by Honourable Senator McNamara, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(h):

> That the quorum of the Joint Committee of the Senate and House of Commons on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments be fixed at seven (7) members, provided that both Houses are represented, whenever a vote, resolution or other decision is taken, and that the Joint Chairmen be authorized to hold meetings and receive evidence so long as five (5) members are present, provided that both Houses are represented;
>
> That the Committee have power to sit during adjournments of the Senate; and
>
> That a Message be sent to the House of Commons to acquaint that House thereof and to request their concurrence in the fixing of the quorum as indicated.

Motion agreed to.

WESTERN ECONOMIC OPPORTUNITIES

CONFERENCE—ATTENDANCE OF PARLIAMENTARIANS—QUESTION ANSWERED

Hon. Mr. Martin: Honourable senators, last evening Senator Manning asked whether members of the Senate from the Western Provinces or elsewhere would be invited as observers at the Western Regional Conference on Economic Opportunities. At that time I told him I would make inquiries and have an answer for him today. The answer is definitely yes. As honourable senators are aware, the conference is to be held at Mount Royal College in Calgary on July 24, 25 and 26.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Neutral territory!

Hon. Mr. Martin: Well, at the moment it is hostile territory. The government wishes to ensure that those members of the Senate who wish to attend during conference sessions will be welcome to do so. Those who wish to attend should contact Mr. Bélec of the Privy Council office before they leave. He will issue the necessary passes. If any senator wishes to get in touch with my office, we will be glad to assist in a similar fashion.

IMMIGRATION APPEAL BOARD ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from yesterday the adjourned debate on the motion of Senator Deschatelets for second reading of Bill C-197, to amend the Immigration Appeal Board Act.

Hon. Paul Yuzyk: Honourable senators, we can be grateful to Senator Deschatelets for explaining the main features of Bill C-197. His suggestion that many senators qualify to sit on the Immigration Appeal Board and should be invited to serve on a temporary basis to assist in the disposition of the heavy backlog of appeals is interesting. I wonder how many senators would offer their services and whether the Minister of Manpower and Immigration would consider such a proposal? Perhaps Senator Deschatelets should present this suggestion to the minister when he appears before the committee considering this bill.

Bill C-197 must be regarded as an emergency measure. It took almost nine months for the government to give it birth, a period which is normal with human beings but, in such cases as this, far too long for reasonable government action.

The changes in the immigration law and regulations introduced in 1967 making it possible for visitors, if they complied with the selection criteria and other regulations, to apply for landed immigrant status, caused an unprecedented surge in the flow of self-styled visitors into Canada. An intolerable crisis was reached last October, prior to the federal election, when some 4,500 people in this category arrived at Toronto International Airport in a single weekend. The number of applications in Canada for immigrant status began to escalate so rapidly that it shocked government officials and the government. The Minister of Manpower and Immigration, the Honourable Robert Andras, informed Canadians that 39 million visitors cross our border annually. What an appalling and unmanageable situation.

Thereupon the government announced last November 3 the revocation of section 34 of the Immigration Regulations, and on January 1 of this year introduced regulations requiring registration of visitors staying in Canada more than three months and employment visas for visitors who wish to take jobs in our country. This stemmed the flow of immigrants.

Honourable senators, in the past few years we have witnessed the bungling of the government in matters related to immigration policies in addition to the Immigration Appeal Board Act. We have witnessed errors of judgment, indecision, procrastination and inaction. The government has not shown a vital interest in immigration and the development of a sound policy in this area. How else can the fact that 10 different ministers have been involved with immigration in 10 years be explained? Five of those ministers have been in office since the legislation of 1967, which brought about the crisis we face today. The present Minister of Manpower and Immigration, Mr. Andras, has been in office only a short time and has to take the rap for the past blunders of the government in this field. How long will he last?

Already in 1968 the chairman of the Immigration Appeal Board warned the gonernment that the panel would have to be enlarged because a situation was being created which had not been experienced in any advanced industrial country.

The appeal backlog at first caused concern, which was quickly followed by alarm. Here are the figures:

January 1, 1969	200
January 1, 1970	1,750
January 1, 1971	4,750
January 1, 1972	8,081
January 1, 1973	11,875
June 1, 1973	17,472

With appeals being filed at the rate of 1,000 a month, there might have been another 12,000 cases awaiting the board had not the special administrative measures been taken last November 3.

Taking into account the existing capacity of the board and the rate of new appeals, unless the law is amended the backlog could reach 30,000, as was mentioned by Senator Deschatelets. This would mean that many persons would have to wait up to 20 years before receiving a verdict, which would be most unfair to the immigrant who had complied with all the regulations in his country of origin.

This is a shameful breakdown for a court of record. We are witnessing a chaotic situation which must be promptly remedied. The blame for this immigration mess must be placed squarely on the shoulders of the government and not on the visitors who want to become landed immigrants.

Just listen to the press release dated September 12, 1967, which was issued by the office of Manpower and Immigration under the charge of the Honourable Jean Marchand, now the Minister of Transport—and remember that it was read throughout Canada and in many parts of the world. Here is an extract:

> A complete innovation in the new regulations is the provision for the admission to Canada for permanent residence of persons already present in Canada such as visitors. From now on, any visitor to Canada can apply for permanent residence. Previously, with the exception of the remedial action instituted in July, 1966, visitors while in Canada were not allowed in the normal way to apply for immigration. This innovation recognizes the growing ease of transportation. In fact, a person visiting in Canada to "look things over" before making his final decision was penalized for this initiative.

It is obvious from this press release that anyone from any part of the world was invited to come to Canada as a visitor to "look things over" and consider permanent residence, which would hopefully lead to citizenship. Can any such visitor be blamed, after having read this press statement, for taking his case to the Appeal Board? What sense of justice does he feel when departmental officials tell him that he is not a bona fide visitor and must be regarded as an illegitimate visitor? The fault is definitely with the government, which should have foreseen these circumstances and consequences.

Now let us take the press release of the Minister of Manpower and Immigration which was issued on November 3, 1972:

> We advise that visitors will not have the right to apply unless their application was submitted before 12 noon on November 3.

Remember, this was issued on November 3. Continuing with the quotation:

> This decision has been changed in the light of evidence that this provision of our immigration policy has been flagrantly abused, particularly by racketeers who take advantage of the innocence and gullibility of citizens from many countries.

To the visitors then in Canada, this announcement must have come like a bolt from the clear, blue sky. It took effect immediately at the time of issue, without any warning. What sense of justice was experienced by those would-be immigrants? Is this sudden reversal of policy, and the manner in which it was proclaimed, good for the reputation of Canada? Realizing that such a situation is untenable, the present Minister of Manpower and Immigration is attempting to remedy it by bringing in legislation to amend the Immigration Appeal Board Act. Bill C-197, as has been explained by the sponser of this bill in the Senate, has two key objectives—first, to provide an opportunity for the adjustment of the status of most persons who have lived in this country since November 30 without a legal claim to residence and, secondly, to restore order to the appeal process and eliminate the heavy backlog awaiting hearing by the Appeal Board.

Regarding the adjustment of status, any person who has entered Canada, legally or otherwise, or who has remained longer than he or she had a right to, can come forward within a period of 60 days after this bill comes into force and apply for permanent residence, with the right of appeal to the Immigration Appeal Board. The minister promises not to prosecute those people. Those who do not come forward within the time of 60 days will lose any right of application for permanent residence from within Canada. The opportunity for adjustment of status is not open to persons falling into the following categories: those in the country on a minister's permit, students here under contractual obligations with their home country, seasonal workers here from abroad under agreement to return, and persons who fall into the prohibited classes, such as criminals, and so forth, under the Immigration Act.

This is most generous treatment. I hope that those who are eligible to apply will take full advantage of this opportunity. Otherwise, they will remain underground for the rest of their lives in Canada, running the constant risk of detection and deportation.

The problem of eliminating the enormous backlog of appeals on deportation orders and of staying current once caught up, is being solved by the appointment of seven additional, temporary members to the Appeal Board. Those additional members will serve for terms up to two years. Also, the right of appeal will be given to persons who have a substantial claim to refugee status or to Canadian citizenship. Compassionate consideration or unusual hardship will be applied by the Board to set aside a deportation order.

These measures appear to be an excellent solution in dealing with the backlog of appeals. I trust that persons of high calibre will be appointed to the Appeal Board.

As an emergency measure to deal with a critical situation, Bill C-197 received the support of all parties in the other place. The Opposition in the Senate will also give its support for speedy passage of this bill after examination in committee. Once it becomes law, we hope that all those who are affected will promptly apply for landed immigrant status and Canadian citizenship. We urge the responsible minister to give wide publicity in the press, radio and television, focusing the attention of various ethnic groups on this at least two weeks before the 60-day period is proclaimed.

The passage of this piece of legislation, however, is far short of an immigration policy to suit the needs of our country. The world and Canada are much different today from 1952, when the last basic Immigration Act was passed. The Liberal administration of the past 11 years undertook a serious study of immigration in the white paper of 1966, but has done very little about the recommendations. The large array of former ministers of immigration could be engaged in working out a policy for the present times. Yet it appears that the Secretary of State, the Honourable Hugh Faulkner, has a better understanding of this problem. He has engaged Dr. Freda Hawkins to produce a study entitled "Canada and Immigration: Public Policy and Public Concern," which many members of Parliament received in March of this year. It is a thorough, indispensable work that should be read by all who are interested in this important matter. I should like to quote a brief passage which explains the urgency of establishing a new and more stable immigration policy for Canada:

● (1420)

> The fact of Canada's geography, her immense undeveloped natural resources, and increasing industrial strength suggest that immigration will continue to play a vital role in national development. And in a world of exploding populations Canada's vast empty spaces, inhospitable though many of them are, must surely be used at least partly as living space. It seems clear, however, that from now on immigration and particularly the pattern of immigrant settlement across Canada will need to be much more closely related to environmental and social, as well as to economic, considerations and to the needs of all provinces and regions. To relate immigration to environment in a positive way will require a far more wide-ranging and socially oriented kind of immigration planning than we have today. An essential feature of it will be the kind of provincial and community participation in immigration policy-making and management which has been envisaged in this study.

I understand that the Minister of Manpower and Immigration has set up a task force to produce another white paper on immigration. I am glad to hear that Dr. Hawkins is now holding consultative meetings arranged between municipalities, the provinces and the federal government, and that social agencies, ethnic groups and public spirited bodies will be involved. It is high time that such a paper be made available to the government and to the public, and that appropriate legislation be passed to make immigration policy serve the best needs of Canada, and to strengthen the cause of freedom and democracy, and to improve the well-being of our citizens.

For example, I believe that newcomers who are entering our country could be used to build up rural, depressed and depopulated areas of Canada, such as Saskatchewan, Manitoba and the Northern Territories. Incentives could be offered to immigrants who would go to such areas and such industries, which are necessary to the development of Canadian economic, social and cultural patterns. Immigration could make a much more effective contribution to the national objectives of our country if a long-range, sustained immigration program is implemented.

Canada has greatly benefited from immigration throughout the past 100 years. Immigrants of various backgrounds, colours and creeds have helped to open up vast empty spaces and to develop our rich economic resources, thus bettering their own lives and the prosperity of our country. Their contributions have greatly aided Canada to achieve one of the highest standards of living in the world and a prominent place among the advanced nations of the world. We are justly proud of our multicultural society and our Canadian mosaic and the peaceful and harmonious development of our country which is dedicated to freedom and democracy.

Let us also keep in mind that the recent immigration has already made substantial contributions to our country.

This is evident from the following statement that was made by the minister in the other house recently:

> —the immigration division of my department has case histories of more than 27,000 new businesses established by newcomers during the past 20 years. These enterprises directly created more than 83,000 jobs. Last year alone immigrants brought $334 million in capital into this country.

Therefore, Canada should welcome people from different countries and cultures, even if they do not measure up to the strict requirements of the moment. We need those who have the skills to fit into our present economic needs but we also need a great variety of other people who bring with them the capacity to work and enrich our way of life. After a comprehensive study of the problems in this field, which should include hearings of interested bodies, groups of people and individuals, I am looking forward to legislation in the near future which will establish a new immigration policy to reflect Canada's national objectives and the basic needs of our population and our country.

Hon. John M. Macdonald: Honourable senators, I wish to make a few remarks before this bill receives second reading, though I well understand that since it has been pretty well debated already much of what I will say will be repetitious.

However, as has been pointed out by the sponsor, Bill C-197 has three purposes. The first is to provide an opportunity, during a 60-day period, for persons to legalize their residence in Canada if they need to do so. Any person who has been living in Canada continuously since November 30 last, without being entitled to do so, can during the 60-day period apply for permanent residence without suffering any penalty for non-compliance with the immigration law in the first instance.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Has that anything to do with the "60 days of decision"?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: The second purpose is to prevent a recurrence of the situation now faced by the Immigration Appeal Board where a huge backlog of cases has been built up. Finally, a method is provided whereby the backlog of appeal cases will be dealt with.

Honourable senators, I do not think any objection in principle can be taken to the provisions of the bill, though there may be some objection to certain details. However, I am one of those who believe that great caution should be exercised when amendments are proposed to the Immigration Appeal Board Act to ensure that they would not weaken the act or involve any change which could result in discrimination against or injustice to any person or group of persons.

I believe it is very easy for a country such as ours to become too particular as to whom it wants as immigrants. It is very easy to become too selective, to become so determined to protect our standard of living that we forget our own beginnings.

Those who want to come here to better themselves, to give to their children all the advantages of life in Canada, should be encouraged to settle here and the rules and regulations regarding their entry should be as few and as light as possible.

Personally, I am always rather amused when I read or hear that people should not be allowed entry into Canada who are under-skilled, under-educated or under-financed, because if such rules had been followed in days gone by, I believe that not many of our ancestors would have qualified for landed immigrant status. Personally, I know my own ancestors, who came here about 150 years ago, would never have been allowed to come, because they had little skill, were under-educated, could speak neither official language, and certainly were under-financed because they had no money; but I will say, with all due modesty, they were very good people.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

• (1430)

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I realize that my remarks have been directed more to the Immigration Act than to the bill before us, and I will not continue in that vein, but I repeat that the idea of giving people who are in the country illegally a chance to come forward and legalize their position is good. I suspect that many of those who have broken immigration laws have done so through lack of knowledge or because other people who have been interested in using them have given them false information or have played upon their fear of not being allowed to live here.

I believe the minister is to be commended for his enlightened approach to this whole problem. Personally, I am somewhat concerned that the 60 days allotted in the bill will prove too short a period. I should like to see it set at six months. I do not know if there is any particular reason why 60 days was selected, but I do know that a strong effort is to be made during that time to bring this to the attention of all those who are interested. But I believe it should be recognized that there is probably a natural distrust and a natural suspicion which must be overcome. It is quite likely that many of those who would be affected would be afraid, or at least would be timid, about approaching an immigration officer, and it might take far more than 60 days for them to overcome that distrust or suspicion.

We must assure these people that the idea is to help them, not to harm them.

I also believe that many of them will be waiting to see what happens to others before they apply for landed immigrant status themselves. I certainly hope all applicants will be treated with great courtesy and will be given every possible consideration, for if they are not so treated and if there should be a great many deportations then the whole program will be endangered.

With respect to the second and third purposes of the bill, it is obvious that something had to be done. At the time that the right of appeal was given to those visiting Canada, it was not realized that it could be used for the purpose of simply delaying the enforcing of deportation orders. It was just another case of a good idea not working out as intended. The result is that bona fide visitors will not have the right to apply for landed immigrant status simply because persons who never had any intention of becoming immigrants were using this device to circumvent the Immigration Act– and apparently they were doing so on a large scale.

I was both surprised and shocked to read the remarks of the Honourable Bryce Mackasey, former Minister of Manpower and Immigration, who spoke on this bill on June 22 last. I should like to quote a paragraph of his speech just to show the extent of the problem. I believe his words are well worth listening to:

> One of the things that appalled me when I was Minister of Manpower and Immigration—I do not think too many people who are now in the House are aware of this—was that most of the backlog, or a sizeable number of cases to be heard by the Appeal Board did not comprise visitors who had applied for immigrant status in Canada and were refused because of the points system; most of them were persons hiding from something. In many cases they were criminals who crossed the border illegally, but once in Canada could not be legally deported because they were entitled to every step of the appeal process, including appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada. If you have the funds to do so—and the underworld certainly has that kind of money—you can gain many years of postponement by simply taking advantage of the legal procedures in this country, not to obtain immigrant status but simply to prevent your deportation back to the country of origin.
>
> I am not unaware of criminals coming out of jail after a two or three years' sentence and immediately launching an appeal against their deportation to the United States or some other country.

It would be interesting to see a breakdown of the backlog of appeals, showing the country of origin of those appealing and their reasons for appealing. In any event, it is obvious from Mr. Mackasey's remarks, if from nothing else, that the proposed amendments are necessary, but I hope that in preventing abuses great care will be taken not to reject legitimate appeals on purely technical grounds.

I hope these amendments will have the effect intended. Especially, I hope the appeal to those who are residing here illegally, the appeal to come forward and have their status legalized, will be successful, because it must be a dreadful feeling not having security of residence and being afraid of what might happen any day in the future.

I notice that up to June 28—and the bill has not even become law yet—1,114 people had already come forward. I also noticed that in the Canada Gazette of June 27 last there was a statement to the effect that, notwithstanding certain sections of the immigration regulations, certain persons might be granted landings in Canada, and 699 names were listed. I suspect, although I do not know for sure, that those were also as a result of the proposed amendments.

Honourable senators, while supporting these amendments I repeat that, when dealing with immigration matters, we should always be careful that we do not cause injustice by discriminating against any person or persons who wish to settle here. This country has been built on immigration. I am sure we all know people who, having come to Canada from other lands, have made valuable contributions to the building of our nation. While we must act to prevent abuses of our immigration laws, nevertheless we must welcome those, from whatever land they may come, who want to be Canadians because they believe our way of life is a good way and wish to share it with us.

[Hon. Mr. Macdonald.]

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Jean-Paul Deschatelets: Honourable senators, I move that this bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs.

The Hon. the Speaker: It is moved by Honourable Senator Deschatelets, P.C., seconded by Honourable Senator Hicks, that this bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs. Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Mr. Martin: Senator Deschatelets has proposed that the bill go to committee, and normally we do send bills to committee after second reading, but many senators have spoken to me about this, wondering whether in all of the circumstances it is necessary to do so.

I certainly have no objection to sending the bill to committee, but if there is no disposition to do so, perhaps Senator Deschatelets would wish to examine the implications of his motion. If there is a desire to send it, then, of course, that is what we must do, but there must be an opportunity to determine whether that is the desire.

Hon. Mr. Deschatelets: Honourable senators, the general practice is that, after second reading, bills are sent to committee. That is the usual practice unless there is some indication by honourable senators taking part in the debate that it is not necessary to send the bill to committee.

When I introduced the bill I indicated that in my opinion it was the kind of bill which could be examined in committee, but in that respect I am in the hands of the Senate. On the other hand, when I listened to Senator Yuzyk a few moments ago I had the impression that he expected the bill to go to committee.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Because you said it. You are the one who said it.

Hon. Mr. Deschatelets: Well, if that is the situation—

Hon. Mr. Yuzyk: Honourable senators, originally I had not intended to have this bill sent to committee for the simple reason that the principle of the bill is such that I can approve of it, and we can approve of it on this side of the house. We could ask the minister many questions. I am quite well aware of that. But that would really be more for future legislation than for the present legislation. Therefore, I personally would not insist that this bill go to committee.

● (1440)

Hon. Mr. Deschatelets: I was of the opinion that this was the kind of bill that honourable senators might like to study in greater depth with the minister. However, if it is the consensus that there is no advantage to be gained by sending this bill to committee, then, with the agreement of honourable senators, I would be quite ready to withdraw my motion.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators, that Senator Deschatelets shall have leave to withdraw his motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion withdrawn.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Deschatelets moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

EXCISE TAX ACT AND EXCISE ACT (No. 2)

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

Hon. Daniel A. Lang moved the second reading of Bill C-194, to amend the Excise Tax Act and the Excise Act (No. 2).

He said: Honourable Members of Parliament, I do not use that appellation this afternoon in any way in error or by mistake; I do so simply to remind all members here that we are in fact members of Parliament. I am using this phrase as a means of making a personal protest against the use of the expression that one hears so often nowadays, "Members of Parliament and Senators". Not only do we hear this redundant expression used on radio and television and read it in the other media—and I am sure that that does not bother any one of us too much because some of the writers and commentators there show rather dubious knowledge of our parliamentary institutions—

Hon. Mr. Flynn: They have no knowledge of them.

Hon. Mr. Lang: —but what really did disturb me during the last few weeks was to see the same expression being used in letters being sent out from the offices of ministers, particularly the Minister of Transport and the office of the Secretary of State. When I see that degree of ignorance of our parliamentary institution expressed in this fashion and from those quarters, then I become very gravely concerned indeed.

I hope honourable senators will excuse me for that interjection, but I wanted to take this opportunity to express my concern, even though it is not particularly apropos of the bill we have before us this afternoon.

Honourable senators, if brevity is the soul of wit, then this is going to be a very witty speech. I say this because I am dealing with a bill which is brief and which is, I think, not at all controversial.

Honourable senators may recall that several weeks ago I had the very great pleasure of moving second reading of a very similar bill dealing with sales taxes and the reduction thereof. I might add that these bills always give me great pleasure. This one in particular gives me even greater pleasure than the one to which I have just referred because, as honourable senators will recall, while the reduction in taxes embodied in that bill amounted to some $25 million, in this bill the sum involved is somewhat in excess of $100 million. Further, the bill to which I have just referred arose out of the budget resolutions of May, 1972. I think it is a sign that we are making some progress now since this bill arises out of the budget resolutions of February of this year. So, honourable senators, you will see that reduction in sales taxes is continuing and we can be very greatly encouraged with the trend that this legislation confirms.

In this bill there are some 15 or 16 items which, when it is passed—and it will be effective back to the date of the resolution in February—will be totally exempt from sales tax or excise tax. These items range all the way from certain kinds of insurance premiums to containers for carrying poultry around. Honourable senators will recall that I dealt with this question of poultry containers a few months ago, and their importance to our economy. I gather since that time that the definition of containers for poultry has been broadened and, in this legislation, includes not only crates but also cages and boxes. From this you can see how our system works, and it is a wonderful, wonderful thing to see.

Within the broad range of items affected by the reduction or the elimination of the 12 per cent sales tax we have some that are of particular public interest. I should like very briefly to deal with these.

First of all, all children's clothing and footwear will henceforth be free of sales tax. Now, children and motherhood are things that you can never go very far wrong on politically, and the removal of the sales tax on these items will be of great benefit to those parents who are raising children who, within a few years, go from tiny toddlers around ankle-height to 6 feet 4 inches. The cost of clothing them and keeping them in footwear during these rapid changes places a strain on any family budget, and I am sure—at least I hope—that this 12 per cent reduction in the federal sales tax will be reflected in the retail cost of these items. That is certainly the expectation of the government in removing this tax. Incidentally, the reduction of tax on these items alone should amount to about $30 million in lost revenue to the exchequer, which means that the equivalent amount will be saved by the taxpayer.

Secondly, all sales tax now comes off confectionary, chocolate bars, soft drinks, juice drinks, cream and sugar substitutes. This will be welcome. It may not be all that good for the children's teeth, but I am sure that the $75 million that will be retained in the pockets of the parents will go a long way to pay for the additional dentist bills that may be expected. What is interesting and significant is that with the removal of the tax on these items, henceforth there will be no federal sales tax on any food or drink for human or animal consumption, across the board, but with one exception. The exception, and I am very sad to have to tell you this, is that the tax on wine, spirits, beer, malt liquor or other alcoholic beverages is, unfortunately, to be maintained, notwithstanding the fact that in many ways its retention is discriminatory legislation against a very important segment of our population.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: We definitely have a conflict of interest here. We had none in the previous items.

Hon. Mr. Lang: Thirdly, there is a further tax relief for municipalities who intend to construct incinerators. When those municipalities have completed the construction of an incinerator to be owned and operated by the municipality, they can claim back the sales tax levied on the components that went into the manufacture of that incinerator. Relief from federal sales tax is also provided on materials and instruments municipalities use or acquire in connection with their fight against pollution.

● (1450)

Fourthly, I might mention that the excise tax, which is a 10 per cent levy, on toilet articles and cosmetics is removed. It is interesting to note that this tax was imposed in 1939, at the beginning of World War II and has persisted at different levels since. Once such taxes are introduced they do tend to be rather persistent. The removal of that alone amounts to approximately $25 million in federal revenue which will no longer be incoming.

Fifthly, a special excise tax, again one which was imposed during World War II, on watches as being luxury items of jewellery is removed by this bill, that is, on watches of $50 or less in value. That item amounts to $2 million or $3 million per year in loss of revenue.

I have only mentioned those items which are of some importance and interest to the public. The bill contains others which are not of such general significance to the public but are of particular interest in certain areas. These are such provisions as the removal of sales tax on equipment for installation on board ships as they are built. In addition there are technical and drafting amendments affecting the Excise Tax Act and the Excise Act and their interrelation with each other.

Honourable senators, that is all I wish to say with respect to the bill. I believe I have broadly covered the main items with which it deals.

I should mention that some members in the other place referred to "the benefit" which this legislation will confer upon the Canadian public. Really, I find it hard to conceive that to be the appropriate word. If that could be extrapolated, the removal of all taxes should be the greatest benefit to the Canadian people. Further, I am not aware that when someone ceases taking money out of your pocket or hitting you on the head with a hammer he confers a "benefit" upon you. It is not a "benefit conferred," but rather a benign forbearance.

In my opinion it is of particular significance, however, that the removal of these taxes comes at a time when the Canadian public is very conscious of inflation. I am hopeful that in removing these taxes the government is in effect recognizing how inflationary the taxes themselves can be, and how they have contributed toward inflation. I would hope that in their removal we may experience a counter-inflationary trend, albeit small and in a relatively limited number of consumer commodities.

Honourable senators, I commend this bill to you. It is one I am sure we all welcome, as the Canadian public must welcome the removal of any sales tax.

I do not consider it to be the type of bill which it is necessary to refer to committee and I will not so ask, if such seems to be the opinion of speakers who may follow me.

Hon. John M. Macdonald: Honourable senators, I do not think that there is any part of this bill which calls for prolonged debate, and the sponsor in his rather extended remarks has discussed the details sufficiently. I expect the bill has general approval since it does, as was mentioned, remove various taxes. I was somewhat surprised to learn of the amounts involved. For example, the lost revenue caused by removal of the tax on children's clothing and footwear will be approximately $30 million. Although this may not amount to too much in individual cases, I have seen some criticism of the fact that the standard sizes used for children's clothing do not adequately provide for the situation. Apparently this clothing is sold by sizes and if a child is somewhat larger than usual, an adult size on which tax must be paid is necessary. Apparently the children must fit the clothes, and not the clothes fit the children. However, I understand also that the elimination of this tax has resulted in a lessening of the cost of such clothing since last February, but the increase in that time due to general increases in costs has not equalled the lowering in price through the removal of the tax.

Of course, in these cases it is questionable whether the consumer benefits and the tax relief finds its way right down to those who pay the bills, but apparently, in the case of children's clothing, this is so. I understand it is not so, however, in so far as the removal of the tax on soft drinks, chocolate bars, and other such items is concerned. For some reason or other the removal of the tax has not resulted in appreciable decreases in prices. As Senator Lang mentioned, it is amazing to think that the tax on these items realized approximately $75 million in revenue.

In some respects I would have preferred to have seen the bill go a little further. In fact, I will mention two items. One is the rebate of the tax to a municipality building an incinerator for its own use. I cannot understand why such a rebate cannot be extended to any incinerator built by private enterprise for the use of a municipality. Especially in the cases of smaller municipalities, they may not wish to become involved in the ownership of such construction. In my opinion, it would have been better if the rebate had been extended to at least all incinerators used by municipalities. I know there have been suggestions that it should have been extended to industrial incinerators, but that is another question.

I would also like to mention that in my opinion the clause dealing with the labour of handicapped persons could have been widened. A reference to page 6 of the bill indicates that the tax is eliminated on:

> All goods manufactured or produced in Canada by the labour of individuals who are
>
> (a) blind,
>
> (b) deaf and dumb,
>
> (c) mentally retarded, or
>
> (d) in any other manner mentally or physically handicapped,
>
> where a substantial portion of the sale price of the goods is in any way attributable to the labour of such individuals which labour has been performed in, or exclusively under the control and direction of, a certified institution.

I take two objections to that. If the labour is to be performed under the control and direction of a certified institution I do not understand why the word "substantial" should be included. If the labour of these handicapped persons adds to the value of the goods, in my opinion the tax should be eliminated. In the second place, I do not agree that such labour has actually been performed under the control and direction of an institution. If my memory serves me correctly, after the last war, when there were a great many handicapped people, some veterans' hospitals sent people to teach handicapped persons in their own homes. Some of those handicapped persons are still working and doing fairly well, but they are certainly handicapped, and they certainly do not want to come under the direction and control of any institution. I should have liked to have seen the act broadened in that respect, and perhaps at some future date an amendment might be brought in to that effect.

● (1500)

Honourable senators, in looking at the reduction in taxes, there is one thing that puzzles me. I cannot understand the antagonism of the government towards removal of the sales tax on building materials. To my mind that would have been most beneficial. For some reason or other—I do not think for any good reason—the government will not do it.

I agree with the sponsor of the bill. I support the bill and do not see any point in sending it to committee.

Hon. Mr. Walker: May I ask my honourable friend, Senator Lang, a question? It is nice for the little boys and girls to have a reduction in the price of soft drinks and chocolate bars, but what good is it doing the little boys and girls? The reduction in tax has not been passed on to them. The only people who are benefiting so far are the manufacturers. The reduction has been in effect long enough for us to have seen whether it is being passed on to the consumer. As for cosmetics, it is nice for ladies to become more beautiful, and the reduction in the tax will enable them—

Hon. Mr. Flynn: If it is possible.

Hon. Mr. Walker: It is always possible—the reduction in tax will enable them to obtain more cosmetics.

My honourable friend, Senator Macdonald, as well as the sponsor of the bill, has considered this point. The reduction has not been passed on to the consumer. So, in the name of heaven, what good does it do to have these reductions in sales tax? If the 12 per cent tax had been taken off building materials, it would have been a great enough yardstick to determine whether or not the reduction was being passed on. However, that tax remains. A reduction there would have achieved some real good, and would have enabled people to buy their own homes.

Soft drinks, chocolate bars, and cosmetics are nebulous things, merely on the fringe. The reduction is not passed on. Only the manufacturers are being enriched.

I should like to ask the sponor of the bill whether there is any provision in the bill, or in the regulations, to determine whether or not these tax reductions are being passed on to the consumer, or whether any regulation exists to ensure that at any time they should be passed on?

Hon. Mr. Lang: I am rather surprised at the philosophical approach of my honourable friend, who seems to consider that the removal of tax enriches the taxpayer. I would have thought rather the imposition of tax enriches the exchequer. The candy makers and cosmetic manufacturers may be only keeping what is rightfully theirs.

Specifically, in reply to my honourable friend's question, there is no way of seeing how the benefit from this tax reduction is dealt with. However, I think that in due course the government will have the benefit of hindsight.

Undoubtedly in children's clothing and footwear, and in the confectionery and soft drink businesses, the reduction in the tax has already been reflected to a greater or less extent. This, I gather, is public knowledge, particularly with regard to children's clothing and footwear. It is also public knowledge in the area of chocolate bars and soft drinks.

The honourable senator knows well enough, from his own broad experience, that if the tax were not removed from some of these items, those items would have become more expensive for the consumer through the pressure of ordinary market forces. Hindsight experience with regard to these tax reductions will be useful to the government undoubtedly, and will be reflected in their future policy. This exercise will be a very useful experience.

Hon. Mr. Cameron: With regard to Senator Walker's comment on cosmetics, one or more newspapers published a story to the effect that the tax on cosmetics had been removed. But that is not the way the section reads. It says:

> Spirits used directly in the manufacture of cosmetics as defined in the Excise Tax Act are subject to no duty or excise.

That refers to one of the ingredients in the manufacture of cosmetics. I wonder if the sponsor of the bill would tell us what percentage of a cosmetic is made up of spirits? That is my first question.

May I also comment that I am sorry the excise tax on building materials has not been removed, as it would have helped to reduce the fantastic escalation in the cost of home building today. I am sorry it is not there.

The item on cosmetics intrigued me. I wonder if the sponsor of the bill can enlighten us on this question.

Hon. Mr. Lang: The honourable senator could easily be confused by the sectioning of the act. The section to which he referred, which ensures that no tax is levied on the alcoholic content of cosmetics, may have somewhat put him off. Incidentally, this is not a benefit for rub-a-dubs who drink cosmetics or other potable lotions. It arises because of the interrelation between the Excise Tax Act and the Excise Act and is included to ensure that alcohol used in cosmetics and toilet lotions is not subject to tax as is alcohol used for other more pleasurable purposes. I refer my honourable colleague to clause 5(1) which removes totally the tax on toilet articles and cosmetics. A special 10 per cent excise tax which hitherto had applied to toilet articles and cosmetics is now totally removed by clause 5(1) of the bill.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: This is typical of the generosity of the budget for this year.

Hon. Mr. Walker: They thought it was an election year when they made it up.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I hope not.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read a third time?

Hon. Mr. Lang moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

CUSTOMS TARIFF (No. 2)

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Sidney L. Buckwold moved the second reading of Bill C-195, to amend the Customs Tariff (No. 2).

He said: Honourable senators, my colleague, Senator Lang, I am sure, pleased both the members of the Opposition and those on the government side with the previous bill that provides for excise tax reductions. It is a pleasure for me to add more good news, and introduce to my colleagues Bill C-195, an act to amend the Customs Tariff (No. 2). This bill reduces the rate of duty by an average of about 5 percentage points on imports which last year amounted to $1.4 billion. I might say that of this amount, one-third is represented in food items.

● (1510)

These reductions are intended to counteract, in particular, the strong upward pressures on prices which were expected to result from the accelerated pace of the Canadian economy. Earlier reductions in corporate taxes, together with the latest reduction in personal income taxes and removal of the sales and excise taxes on a wide range of products which we heard of this afternoon, have resulted in a powerful stimulus to the Canadian economy. In this context, the tariff reductions are intended to reduce the cost of imported products, the demand for which was expected to increase with the larger disposable incomes available to Canadian consumers. The demand for Canadian-made goods was also expected to increase even more rapidly, and these reductions are intended to apply some pressure on Canadian producers to exercise moderation in their pricing in response to the increase in demand.

I might point out to honourable senators that there is a unique aspect to this legislation. To my knowledge, and from inquiries I have made of departmental personnel, this is the first time in the history of Canada that the Customs Tariff has been used as an implement in an attempt to minimize increases in the cost of living. These reductions became effective on February 20 last, and the great bulk of the bill—and I will explain this in a little more detail later—represents items on which tariffs will be reduced for a temporary period. They are in effect for one year from February 20 last. On February 19, 1974, the original tariffs will go back on the books, unless the government reconsiders them in the meantime.

There is another unique aspect in that this bill also allows the re-imposition of these duties at any time by the Governor in Council if, in the opinion of the government, any harm is being done to those producers or manufacturers who could be affected. So I suggest to you that it is a very new kind of approach and one that is worthy of careful consideration.

I am sure that Senator Walker and others will ask the same question: Have these been effective? There has been a reduction in many tariffs involving goods coming into Canada, especially in food items. I would agree that it is sometimes difficult to pinpoint whether these reductions have resulted in lower prices to the Canadian consumer, who they are intended to benefit.

I think it is fair to say, certainly with respect to food items and in many other instances, that increased prices, which otherwise would have come into effect, have been minimized as a result of the tariff reductions which are included in this bill. I would agree with Senator Walker, along with Senator Lang, that there is a very significant role for the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs to play in following through the effects of these reductions as we move into this new approach to controlling this difficult problem of inflation. I would hope that department, or perhaps some other government department, will take an increasingly active role in making sure that we follow through the effects of these tariff reductions.

[Hon. Mr. Lang.]

Honourable senators, care was taken in selecting the products for tariff reduction to avoid disruptions in Canadian production and employment. Consumer goods which were in short supply, or for which prices were increasing rapidly, are included. Other consumer goods subject to duty above the average, particularly those dutiable at more than 15 per cent, are also selected. It was realized, however, that with the selection being made on the basis of a general criteria of this kind, Canadian production of certain goods might be adversely affected.

To deal with that, the government has asked Parliament for authority to restore the pre-budget rates by order in council. The minister has made it clear that he is fully prepared to take such action where a genuine case of hardship resulting from increased import competition can be made. I would point out that already in the area of greenhouse tomatoes such action has been taken, and also, I believe, in the case of sweet cherries. So the government has tried to be responsive to the pressures, especially those that have been put on our agricultural community.

I might mention at this stage, too, that the Customs Act provides authority for the government to reduce the duties by order in council on parts and materials imported for the production of goods in Canada. Where relief for Canadian producers can be provided through this means, it is the government's intention to use this authority and thus avoid, wherever possible, resorting to the authority requested in the present bill to restore pre-budget rates of duty.

An example of that would be in the case where a product was being made in Canada involving the importation of component parts, and this was affected by the tariff reductions on the entire product brought in from a foreign country. It would then be the intention of this bill to reduce the duty on the component parts to make the Canadian producers more competitive.

The terms of the bill clearly provide that the reductions are to remain in effect for a period of one year after February 20, 1973, following which the pre-budget rates will be automatically restored. It is the government's intention, during this one-year period, to review carefully the reductions made in this bill and to examine their impact on Canadian production, employment and prices before considering any proposal for the extension of any of them. I think this answers the point previously raised so effectively by Senator Walker.

There are, in fact, two main clauses to the bill. The first is relatively simple. It involves a few items for which the tariffs are completely removed and free entry into Canada provided. This particular clause is not of a temporary nature; it is an amendment to the act. It involves such items as heavy fuel oils, low temperature metal containers for use in the storage or shipping of vaccines for poultry, recordings of an instructional character, and so forth. The tariffs have been eliminated on those items and free entry into Canada provided.

On the other hand, clause 2 of the bill deals with the changes of a temporary nature. I am sure honourable senators do not want me to go through in detail the literally hundreds of items that are affected. Perhaps I could generalize them by categories. This bill will result in lower customs tariffs on animals and meat products; coffee and coffee substitutes; confectionery and cereals; fresh fruits and vegetables; canned fish; sugar and related products; fruit juices; and soaps and toilet preparations, which seems to be of great concern to members of the Opposition. I might add, for their enlightenment, that there has been a reduction not only in sales tax but also in the customs tariffs on perfumed spirits, bay rum, cologne and lavender waters. I thought the last one might be of great interest. The duty on the most-favoured-nation tariff has been reduced from 20 per cent to 15 per cent, which should result in substantial savings for the learned gentlemen on the other side of the house. The bill also provides for lower customs tariffs on drugs and pharmaceuticals; china, earthenware and glassware; spectacles and parts; sporting equipment and toys; and a variety of miscellaneous items.

● (1520)

Honourable senators, at this point I want to suggest that the government has responded, wherever possible, to representations that have been made by a number of Canadian producers since the reductions were put into effect on a provisional basis on February 20. We have had several months of actual experience with this experiment in the control of prices, or the attempt to control at least some of this price rise through the Customs Tariff.

Most of those representations have been concerned with the fact that there had been no prior consultations with the industry involved, or that the reductions had been made on a unilateral basis and no attempt had been made to secure reciprocal concessions from other countries. Others expressed concern that the reductions might be extended beyond the one-year period provided for in this bill. Temporary reductions covering a very broad range of goods were considered necessary in the context of the other economic and fiscal measures which were being proposed. It would not have been possible to hold meaningful consultations in advance without possibly revealing the content of the budget. The industries affected are, of course, currently expressing their views on the reductions, and these will obviously be taken into account.

Since the reductions are clearly temporary, with no international commitment to maintain the rates at these lower levels, there has been no loss in their value as possible concessions in a future tariff negotiation. A more detailed examination of the position of Canadian suppliers and of the general Canadian trading interest will, of course, be required before the Canadian negotiating position for the forthcoming round of multilateral tariff negotiations can be decided.

Other representations which should perhaps be mentioned are those from the fruit and vegetable growers and processors. These have emphasized certain problems in the present tariff structure. The Minister of Finance has directed the Tariff Board to review the tariff items covering these products, and to make recommendations with respect to rates and rate structure.

Finally, I would like to say a word on assessing the effects on Canadian prices which these reductions may have had since their introduction. I mentioned this earlier, but it is an important point. It should be borne in mind that a number of other factors affecting prices must be taken into account. There have been, for instance, significant changes in exchange rates since February 20. Worldwide shortages in certain products have developed and, indeed, export controls have been introduced in certain countries to assure adequate domestic supplies. This does not mean that the reductions have had no impact on prices. The real question, I believe, is: How much higher would prices, and the cost of living, be currently if these reductions had not been in effect since February 20?

Honourable senators, that concludes my presentation in support of this bill, and I shall be pleased to hear the discussion which follows.

Hon. Mr. Burchill: Honourable senators, I have been waiting since February to ask this question.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: You are very patient.

Hon. Mr. Burchill: I must confess that I do not expect Senator Buckwold to be able to answer it, but I would very much appreciate it if he could get the information for me so that I may pass it on to my friends who have been pressing me for an answer. I refer to tariff item 50715-1, plywood, on page 17. I think the duty has been reduced by 10 per cent with, as I understand it, no corresponding reduction from nations to whom Canada ships plywood. I am referring particularly to the United States. I think about 100 million feet of soft wood plywood and 500 million feet of hard wood plywood were imported into Canada last year, so it is a quite considerable item.

Due to recent political events in the United States, and fluctuations in the exchange rate of the American dollar, plywood prices have softened. My information is that some American plywood is drifting into Canada. I would be very happy indeed if the honourable senator could obtain information on this for me, if he has not got it now.

Hon. Mr. Buckwold: I can say that to my knowledge there were no attempts to use these reductions as a trade-off with other countries, in view of the fact that they are of a temporary nature. In other words, if they were in effect for a short period they could be re-imposed if the industry was suffering. Certainly this question could be asked in committee. There was no sort of meeting with other nations with the intention of saying, "We reduced our tariffs; you reduce yours on our exports." That was not really the purpose of the game. I think this question could be answered in committee.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: Honourable senators, it is my intention to move the adjournment of the debate, but in view of the time schedule and the possibility that the bill might not go to committee, I should like to give notice to the sponsor of the bill, Senator Buckwold, of two questions that I shall be asking, in the hope that he will be able to get the answers if he does not already have them.

First, I would ask him if he would provide us with some comparative price figures on a selective basis. Would he obtain some figures giving us the prices at which some of these items were sold before the revised tariff came into effect, and the present prices? I am fully aware of his comment that we should look at what might have happened, but it would also be interesting to look at what has happened in a few selective cases.

Hon. Mr. Buckwold: Might I ask a clarifying question? Is the honourable senator referring to retail prices, wholesale prices, or import prices?

Hon. Mr. Flynn: All of them.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: Whichever is the easiest to arrive at. It is possible that the wholesale price index might be a better indicator. As long as the comparisons are valid I will be very glad to have them at either the wholesale or retail level.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Both.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: Perhaps at both levels, if they are available.

I would also be very interested in knowing how the department arrives at the specific items on which it has decided to make reductions. It has been stressed that there has been no previous consultation with the industries affected. We understand that there might be some restriction on that, because this is a budget item. On the other hand, obviously there must have been some requests from industries, merchants or business people affected. It is hard to believe that the department itself would be able to go over the whole list of tariff items and say, "We will pick this one and that one." It would be interesting to know where the incentive, impetus or motivation came from for these reductions. Perhaps there are some examples in the files of the department that could help to answer that question.

I give the honourable sponsor notice that I will be asking for answers to these questions, since he may wish to seek information elsewhere.

On motion of Senator Grosart, debate adjourned.

TRANSPORTATION

FREIGHT RATES AND NEW TECHNOLOGY—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Cameron calling the attention of the Senate to the need to re-examine the structure of freight rates in Canada and the importance of new technology to the economics of transportation.—(Honourable Senator McIlraith, P.C.).

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, in the absence of Senator McIlraith, I should like to ask on his behalf that this order stand until September 20.

Hon. Mr. Walker: October 10, the government have notified us.

[Hon. Mr. Grosart.]

Order stands.

● (1530)

SCIENCE POLICY

REPORT OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the Report of the Special Committee of the Senate on Science Policy which was presented yesterday.

Hon. Maurice Lamontagne: Honourable senators, I move, seconded by Senator Lang, that this report be now adopted.

As the report implies, the drafting of the third volume of our report was completed last weekend. We are now at the stage of editing and printing. Our best forecast is that, provided the translation services are slightly more efficient than they have been in the past, the report will be ready for publication early in September.

I understand, from the slight reference made a moment ago, that we are not likely to reconvene until some time in October.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Is that so?

An Hon. Senator: What about September 20?

Hon. Mr. Martin: The Opposition—

Hon. Mr. Lamontagne: I hope that the Leader of the Government will not insist on any answer to this question, because I would probably refer to him as a source. In any case, there will be this lapse of time between when the report is ready for publication and the reconvening of the Senate.

We have been very fortunate up to now in not having been victims of leaks, and we would like this to continue. I remember that Senator "Chubby" Power, one of our former colleagues, said one day that if you want something to become known say it in the Cabinet, and if you want something to remain secret say it in the Senate. This axiom might have been true when Senator Power was sitting in this house, but it has proved to be wrong recently. I am sure that Senator Croll would agree with me in that respect.

Hon. Mr. Walker: No one leaks in the Cabinet.

Hon. Mr. Lamontagne: Another reason why we are asking for the adoption of this report is that experience has shown that debates on reports of committees such as ours prove to be of higher quality if senators have had an opportunity beforehand to look at the reaction from the scientific and engineering community and other interested organizations.

Finally, we have good reason to believe that the government is waiting for the publication of this third volume of our report in order to arrive at substantial decisions on its overall re-organization plan, related to its involvement with science, technology and innovation.

For all these reasons, I urge honourable senators to adopt the report of the committee.

Report adopted.

PROPOSED CONFERENCE TO ESTABLISH COMMISSION ON THE FUTURE—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Maurice Lamontagne moved pursuant to notice:

That the Special Committee of the Senate on Science Policy be authorized to organize and hold a conference to be held in 1974 for the purpose of establishing a Commission on the Future, whose responsibility would be to help as many private and public organizations as possible to forecast and build their future not only in isolation but together, as was recommended by Chapter 13 of Volume II of the Report of the Special Committee of the Senate on Science Policy; and

That the committee have power to engage the services of such counsel, staff and technical advisers and to incur such other special expenses as may be necessary for the purpose of organizing and holding the said conference.

He said: Some honourable senators may have forgotten that a substantially similar motion was adopted by this chamber on March 28, 1972. The only significant change appearing in the new motion is in the timing of the proposed conference on the future. According to the motion agreed to in March 1972, the meeting was supposed to take place in the autumn of that year. We are now suggesting that the conference be held in 1974.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: We will be into a general election again then.

Hon. Mr. Lamontagne: I do not want to use any blackmail tactics in this matter but if honourable senators are not ready at this stage to accept the motion, similar to the one they accepted about a year ago, I will have to impose on them at least a 20-minute speech.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: We will accept it.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Let us have the speech.

Hon. Mr. Lamontagne: Is there unanimous approval for me to remain silent?

Hon. Mr. Martin: No, let us hear your speech.

Hon. Mr. Lamontagne: In a more serious vein, I think we were rather imprudent last year in being too precise on the timing of the conference. I recall, however, that during the debate then, and in answer to a question put to me by Senator Buckwold, I warned that we might not be able to meet the deadline. I said then, as reported in Hansard:

● (1540)

If we feel as we proceed that we will not be ready to make it [the conference] a success next fall, then the honourable senator may rest assured that we will delay the calling of the conference.

Honourable senators are well aware of what happened in Canada last fall, and will readily agree that it would have been very undesirable to hold the conference in the kind of political climate which prevailed at that time. The steering committee of the Special Committee of the Senate on Science Policy had two preliminary meetings in the early summer with an informal advisory group, including Dr. André Raynauld, chairman of the Economic Council; Ronald S. Ritchie, president of the Institute for Research on Public Policy; and Mr. Cruickshank, then vice-president of Bell Telephone of Canada. Other preparatory work was done on the content of the conference and on the concept of the commission on the future to be set up, hopefully, at the conclusion of the proposed meeting. That work was interrupted when serious rumours about a fall election began to circulate.

Early in 1973 the steering committee reconsidered the situation and decided that it would be inappropriate to hold the conference this year. One of the considerations which justified this decision was that the Special Committee of the Senate on Science Policy should first complete its assignment and issue the final volume of its report before concentrating on the preparation of the conference.

The committee has now completed its work for all practical purposes. As the foreword of its final volume will indicate, the committee will probably ask the Senate for a new assignment enabling it to start a new inquiry into the contribution that research and development can make to social innovations, more particularly to the improvement of our social systems, in terms of both efficiency and costs. Even if the Senate decides to give this new assignment to the committee, as I hope it will, it will be impossible to launch this investigation properly before March or April next year. Thus, the new assignment would hardly conflict with the substantive preparatory work of the conference.

Moreover, I would expect that a new nucleus will have to assume the main working load involved by the committee's new assignment. So far as I am concerned, I should like to make it clear that if the Senate does decide to launch the new investigation, I will not accept a nomination for chairmanship when the committee is reconstituted. I feel that I have done my share of the work in the past few years, and that the time has come for somebody else to assume this responsibility. In reaching that decision, I am conscious of the fact that I am implementing one of the proposals put forward by Senator Croll for the reform of the Senate.

However, I consider the preparation of the proposed conference a temporary assignment following up the work of the committee which I had the honour to chair. After taking a short holiday, I will therefore be prepared to devote most of my time for the next few months to the conference on the future, if this motion is approved.

Hon. Mr. Walker: May I ask the honourable senator a question? You will be chairman of that one, will you not?

Hon. Mr. Lamontagne: That will depend upon the decision of the committee and, of course, upon the decision of this chamber so far as this motion is concerned.

Hon. Mr. Walker: It is just so we all understand.

Hon. Mr. Lamontagne: I am even more convinced than I was a year ago that a permanent and private commission on the future, as envisaged in Volume II of our report, is essential if we are to reach a broad consensus on planning Canada's future, and I am convinced that the Senate is the only appropriate Canadian institution to sponsor the conference which would lead to the creation of that unique agency in the world.

Two observations are becoming increasingly obvious. First, individual organizations in the public sector such as federal and provincial departments and agencies, municipalities and school boards, and organizations in the private sector such as firms, industries, labour unions, universities, co-operatives and other voluntary agencies, are forced daily to take decisions too often in isolation and without proper consideration of the medium- and long-term future.

I was, told, for instance, that suppliers of energy equipment in Canada had to determine their production plans in isolation without knowing the long-term specific needs of power utilities and the new technological opportunities these public utilities were prepared to consider. This highly undesirable situation is unfortunately not limited to this illustration.

Secondly, it is equally obvious that in the 1960s, but especially in recent years, scientific studies on the future have increased at a tremendous rate in both quantity and quality. I have become interested in this subject during the last few years and as a member of the Club of Rome I could speak for several hours—but I will not—on this explosion of knowledge on the future, and on the major methodological breakthroughs that we are witnessing at the moment. Even before this recent spectacular progress, most of the crucial problems that we experience today had long been foreseen by experts. I will only refer to the food and energy crisis.

In a book written in 1954—almost 20 years ago—entitled "The Challenge of Man's Future," the great futurologist Harrison Brown foresaw an emergency food crisis. He predicted that demand for food would rise rapidly with the increase of population and the standard of living. But, referring to the supply side, he added:

> The greater part of the world's agricultural production comes from regions which were originally prairies, steppes and broad-leaf forests ... Most of these areas are now under cultivation ... and we cannot look forward to any major expansion of agriculture in such regions.

In the sector of energy, Harrison Brown was fairly optimistic in his outlook for the end of this century, but he said:

> —before we become too optimistic about the future of mankind, it should be emphasized that difficulties appear on the horizon to mar the otherwise hopeful prospects.

He predicted an energy crisis for the not too distant future and stated, at a time when coal mines were beginning to close, that "the price of coal, relative to the general price level, is bound to rise considerably during the course of the next few decades."

Thus, individual organizations, both public and private, have a growing need in our rapidly changing world for a better knowledge of the future in order to improve their decision-making process and to deal effectively with problems before they reach the crisis stage. On the other hand, experts are rapidly improving the techniques they use to detect medium- and long-term trends as well as their knowledge of the future. But we have found that this vastly improved knowledge of experts is not easily accessible to those who need it. Very often potential users of such information are not even aware that it is available. In other words, the supply of and the demand for information on the future rarely meet; they live in isolation.

The tragic result of this situation is that leaders in the public and private sectors are becoming a fire brigade in a society facing a series of simultaneous crises such as galloping inflation, pollution, food and energy shortages, a growing international monetary disequilibrium, and the rapid destruction of traditional values with the great danger that represents for the survival of Western civilization.

The major and most regrettable gap between the supply of valuable information on the future by experts, and the timely use of that information by decision-makers, represents a basic element of our present predicament.

● (1550)

It would be one of the major tasks of the proposed commission to close that dangerous gap. As I said last year, it would not carry out research of its own on the future. It would be rather an intermediary between experts and potential users, between supply of and demand for information on the future. It would seek primarily to develop and maintain a network of information. It would supply individual organizations with the available data they require, and keep experts and agencies conducting research on the future better informed of users' needs for information which is not available.

The first task of the commission would be to convince as many individual organizations or groups of organizations as possible that they need better information on the future to improve their decision-making process and that, to meet this need, they should set up their own units on the future. Such individual units could be very small in terms of staff because their role would be simply that of determining the information needed by the organization, to ask the commission to supply it, and to transmit it to the top management of the organization concerned.

The second major task of the commission would be to supply to these units in the various organizations affiliated to it the information they need on a fee basis. This mission, in our view, would not be unduly complicated and would not require a large staff. For instance, our committee has had access, in the preparation of its report, to the most significant information on science policy available in the world through the services of a single expert in this area.

Finally, the commission would hold regional and national annual meetings of its affiliated organizations. These meetings would afford an excellent opportunity for them to exchange views on their respective futures and to review the work of the commission. In addition, a general topic concerning the future would be selected each year as the main theme to be discussed, with the expectation that a consensus would be reached. It would be important indeed for these organizations to go beyond their respective spheres of activities and interests, and consider together the alternative technological, economic and social environments in which they would be likely to operate in the future.

A common, conscious and systematic consideration of the future must become an essential ingredient of today's decision-making processes in the public and the private sectors. If we can develop a consensus on the challenges of the future, we will be in a much better position to meet them before they degenerate into crises. Otherwise, our society, as it is subjected more and more to perpetual motion, will get out of control, and this, in turn, will bring consternation and disillusionment not only about technology but also about our institutions and the values they represent.

If we want, as a nation, to avoid chaos and anarchy, we must dedicate ourselves to the future. Our commitment does not just require the preparation of papers and forecasts by experts although this is essential to develop an enlightened approach. It also requires a collective involvement. In other words, our dedication cannot be only an elitist and ivory-tower exercise; to be practical and meaningful, it must develop a grass-roots and action-oriented approach. According to Alvin Toffler, we must complement participatory democracy by anticipatory democracy, and organize some kind of parliament or continuing plebiscite on the future. But we cannot expect this anticipatory democracy to develop by itself as a natural process. On the contrary, it is the gap between experts in their ivory towers and decision-makers in the real world which is natural and which must be removed by artificial means. This would be the main mission of the commission envisaged by our committee. As such, it would be the first institution of its kind in the world.

The concept and purpose of the proposed commission do not represent a theoretical and impractical dream. Dr. Alexander King of OECD, who is one of the world's wise men in the area of science, technology and innovation, reviewed Volume II of our report in a long article published in Science Forum. He wrote:

> I particularly welcome the proposals concerning the establishment of a Commission for the Future to help organizations, public or private, to build their futures not in isolation but together. This may well beome an essential feature of all national science policies.

SCITEC, the Association of the Scientific, Engineering and Technological Community of Canada, which represents about 60 affiliated professional and scientific associations in our country, circulated a detailed questionnaire on the recommendations contained in Volume II of our report. Nearly 80 per cent of those who responded said they were in favour of the creation of the proposed commission. To be precise, 79 per cent of those who responded said they were in favour of this commission.

I would also like to put on the record the reaction of some professional and industrial associations to our recommendation regarding the proposed commission. The Association of Professional Engineers of the Province of Ontario stated, "We endorse this recommendation without further qualification." The Bell-Northern Research Company said, "We agree that such a conference would be useful to launch a Commission on the Future." The Canadian Chemical Producers' Association had this to say: "A Commission to encourage and assist public and private organizations to engage in forecasting would form a useful liaison between the experts ... and various private and public organizations." The Chemical Institute of Canada claimed that "the proposed Commission on the Future to be sponsored by the Senate for the purpose of assisting private and public organizations in forecasting could be valuable particularly if it served to point out to industry the areas where an infrastructure is being created." The Geological Association of Canada indicated that "some aspects of the report win support from many of our members, e.g., the forward-looking attitude with its suggestion of a Commission of the Future." The Pharmaceutical Manufacturers Association of Canada stated: "PMAC would like to comment favourably, and briefly, on the recommendations made in the report of the Special Committee. The first five recommendations, dealing largely with planning for the future, are endorsed by PMAC."

In addition, I would like to point out that members of the Steering Committee, including Senator Cameron, Senator Grosart and myself, have had several occasions to discuss the concept and role of the commission with important Canadian groups and audiences such as the Montreal Chamber of Commerce. On all such occasions, the reaction we received was favourable. The only conclusion I can reach from this evidence is that there is strong and broadly based support for the commission.

● (1600)

The only other point I wish to make relates to the proposed conference to be sponsored by the Senate for the purpose of creating the commission. It is quite clear that while the commission is strongly supported, it will not be born spontaneously. If it is to be launched successfully, as it should, some one must take the initiative. Moveover, a fairly large number of organizations, widely representative of the various segments of Canadian life, should be willing from the start to support the activities of the commission and to use its services.

This is why we believe that a well-planned conference, attended by a sizeable group of Canadian leaders representing organizations capable of supporting the commission, is necessary as a successful launching pad. In turn, if the conference is to achieve its practical purpose—that is, the setting up of the commission—it must be sponsored by an appropriate body.

As I said last year, we could not find any private organization sufficiently representative of all the different and varied segments of Canadian society to take this particular initiative. On the other hand, we also came to the conclusion that the government should not sponsor the conference. The commission can only be a success if it is and remains a private institution. This does not mean, however, that top government representatives should not be closely associated with the conference. Mr. Gillespie, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, as I indicated last year, has already expressed his wish for such a close association with the conference. The present Minister of State for Science and Technology, Mrs. Sauvé, made known the same desire to me yesterday.

Under such conditions we feel that the Senate would be the most appropriate sponsoring agency. As a chamber of sober second thought, we are above the immediate concerns of political parties and can serve as a valuable intermediary between the different spheres of the public and private sectors. The committee is conscious of the fact that such an initiative is without precedent in the activities of this chamber. We have an excellent opportunity here, however, to show that the Senate is not merely an institution of the past, that we can also take a long-term view of the future, and that we can provide our country with the grass-roots organization that it needs to remain on the difficult but inevitable path of rapid and pervasive change.

If the conference is to be a success, it will require a good deal of preparatory work and preliminary contacts with interested organizations. To help in this work and to facilitate these contacts, it would be highly desirable to establish a high-level advisory committee composed of Canadian leaders representing various segments of Canadian society. We have already been assured of such collaboration. But there is no doubt that a small staff will be required and that other disbursements will be necessary. Therefore, a special budget will have to be provided. It will be prepared as soon as this motion has been approved and submitted, according to our rules, to the Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration.

There may be some worry related to expenditures devoted to support the activities of special committees. In my view, these increased activities are a crucial and essential element of the reform of the Senate. Those of us who are prepared to devote a great deal of time and energy to the work of these committees should receive full support from honourable senators who have other priorities.

I can only speak from personal experience in connection with the Senate Special Committee on Science Policy, and say that we have been so careful in controlling expenditures as to impose an undue burden on members and on our small staff. This committee began its activities in 1968 and has spent since that time approximately half of the funds which are allocated to the Science Council in a single year. Yet it is now widely recognized that the committee has had a much greater impact on Canadian science policy and on the Canadian scientific and engineering community than the Science Council has had since it was established in 1966. Again, in the last two weeks the government has announced the implementation, in a slightly modified form, of two other important recommendations contained in Volume II of our report. Thus, I suggest that as part of Senate reform we should not take a veiled puritanical attitude which could inhibit honourable senators who claim the right to work in committees under relatively decent conditions.

In the context of these remarks, I want to give assurance that the budget which will be submitted for the preparation and the holding of the conference will be most reasonable compared to expenditures devoted to other similar undertakings. It will represent a small investment with potential substantial long-term benefits for the country as a whole, and for the Senate in particular. Indeed, it will be significantly lower than the approximate amount of $150,000 spend by the Department of Justice for the Conference on Law held in Ottawa a few years ago.

For all these reasons, I hope that honourable senators will approve this motion before the adjournment, so that the preparatory work can start as soon as possible.

Hon. Mr. Martin: May I ask Senator Lamontagne a question, offered in full appreciation of his remarks? Unless I misunderstood him, I do not believe he has explained that once the commission is established it will be a private body rather than a government organization. I wish the senator would respond to that.

[Hon. Mr. Lamontagne.]

Hon. Mr. Lamontagne: I am glad that the government leader has asked that question, but I do not believe he could have really listened when I read my statement. I referred on at least two occasions to the point that the commission would be a permanent, private organization which would be financed on a fee basis by other organizations in the private or the public sector.

Hon. Mr. Asselin: Have you received assurances that private companies will finance such a commission?

Hon. Mr. Lamontagne: Yes, we have had quite a number of contacts with private industry. We would hope, however, that not only private industry but other organizations in the public sector, such as school boards, the Canadian Federation of Mayors and Municipalities, labour unions, and all kinds of organizations including voluntary organizations, would also actively participate in the work of the commission and pay their part of its financing.

Hon. Arthur Laing: Honourable senators, I am indeed a very brave person to stand up and make any remarks following the presentation by the honourable senator. He spoke from a great depth of experience, being more or less the father of the committee which studied the subject of science policy in Canada. However, I was not here a year ago when there was unanimity on this point in the Senate, and I would like to ask some questions regarding this type of organization and study.

I could make the general criticism that in Canada today we are studying everything and not doing enough. Studies are in process all over the country. If anyone attempts to put anything into effect, or to do anything, in Canada today apparently a reaction at once manifests itself, that we should wait until a full study is carried out.

Hon. Mr. Lamontagne: If I may interrupt my honourable friend, I should point out before he continues developing this argument that I was very careful to emphasize that the proposed commission is not to be a study group, but a commission to organize a network of information. Its function is to take the studies, where they are available, and transmit them to the potential users of those studies, so that they will not pile up unused in warehouses, as they are at the moment; so that they will be used by those who are responsible for the various aspects of the decision-making process in our country.

● (1610)

Hon. Mr. Laing: I am familiar with the writings of Dr. Harrison Brown, whom I know. There was another man, a representative of the Olivetti Company, who wrote a book called "The Abyss Ahead." These people are overpessimistic, in my view. I do not think there is any chance in the future of a shortage of any kind, except in the short term. I have read many of those books. By their remarks fears are engendered in people's minds. One could compare them to the author of the original Book of Lamentations. I do not think their fears are justified in the world today. A great deal of the breakthrough, and much that will be done, will still be engineered and done by individuals—

Hon. Mr. Martin: Did you say the book of Lamontagne or the Book of Lamentations?

Hon. Mr. Laing: Senator Lamontagne was repeating some of the fears which have been expressed, fears which I think are groundless. There is talk about a food shortage. In most nations in recent years, legislation has been designed to prevent food prices from collapsing. This is the case in Canada. There are regulations made by marketing boards to prevent overproduction.

In 1965, while visiting the Soviet Union, I met one of their scientists who was engaged on getting a man to the moon, and he introduced me to three or four of his colleagues. I asked him, "What are you people up to?" He replied, "We should be doing this together instead of separately, because it costs each of us too much." I reported that statement to another Soviet scientist and asked him the same question, and he said, "Would it not be better if you weighed 90 pounds instead of 180 pounds and lived to be 125, and if a locomotive weighed 50 tons instead of 100 tons and lasted twice as long?" I said, "You don't mean that!"

Next year I will go back to the Soviet Union to find out how that scientist is making out. In the meantime, I am trying to keep my weight down to 180 pounds. This is the sort of thing that is envisaged in the world. Only the great nations can spend that kind of money.

At lunch today I was talking to one of our colleagues. We recalled that not very long age there was found in the American budget an allocation, under Defence, of $11 billion which did not go to defence but which went to American universities for educational purposes. Those were votes taken under Defence, and therefore obtainable, and they would probably not have passed Congress had they been votes for educational purposes.

This is the kind of competition that we are facing. We should be realistic about it. We have the National Research Council. I have been critical of the National Research Council, which receives $140 million or $160 million a year. I am dissatisfied with its productivity, and have been so for years.

People have to do things, and when we get down to meeting and discussing with the corporations in Canada and with those people who are doing things, there will be an osmosis. Governments are miles behind technology in this country. I am trying to put in a word of caution so that we will not become involved in one of those continuing committees of academics or specialists, not recognizing what is going on in the country. We should go out and see people at work. We should go and see agriculture as it is being practised today. There are farms on the Prairies of six to ten sections, where a man will say, "All I need is two men and a hundred thousand dollars worth of Massey-Harris machinery." This is the age of technology. There is a mine in British Columbia that with modern technology is excavating 44,800 tons of ore per day. How we provide an advantage to these people by calling a conference like this, I do not know.

I would like to see less preparation of reports. I have in my office reports collected over the past 18 or 20 years which have cost in excess of $100 million. Most of them have never been read by anyone capable of taking any action. Action is being taken by people in the private sector—people who have to make their corporations successful, who have to produce results or lose their jobs.

In the academic field the position is entirely different. Our colleague has put up a very good case for bringing these people together. I doubt very much whether the government should be influenced to continue giving annual grants. These things are entitled to stand on their own feet.

Are we going to bring these persons together for an exchange of secrets? Most industries in Canada are not inclined to exchange secrets. That is the name of the game. If you have something, you do not tell your competitor about it. We should pay a little more attention to practical solutions, both here and in the other place, because we are not conversant with what is going on in the field of technology.

In mining and agriculture we are just as efficient as any other nation on the face of the earth, and quite likely we are the most efficient. We should take advantage of those areas in which we can demonstrate excellence, and expand on them, instead of engaging ourselves in going to the moon, or remaining in that far-off haze where people sit around and predict the demise of the world.

There will not be any demise of this world. In 40 years' time we shall not be using uranium. We are now developing fusion power. The Soviets told me that they will definitely have it in this century. They referred me to their colleagues in London. I went to see them, and they confirmed what the Soviets had told me. I then met an American scientist, who was going around betting people $100 they would have it in 15 years. The only raw material involved is salt water, and the best scientists in Germany are now studying the development of plasma to reduce the immense heat associated with fusion power.

All these things are going on in the world, and we should not be pessimistic. If we have people uniting to share knowledge, that is fine. But I would counsel care about the expenditure of public funds merely to bring people together. We have done too much of that.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Honourable senators, I had intended to speak on this subject this afternoon, but I am now expected at a committee meeting called for the purpose of drafting a report. If no other honourable senator wishes to speak now, I will move the adjournment of the debate.

Hon. Mr. Lamontagne: I would plead with Senator Langlois, that unless he has a very important message to bring before the house, we should try to adopt the motion this afternoon. I understand that Senator Smith is prepared to call a meeting of the Standing Senate Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration to consider the proposed budget. I would hope to have this budget proposal considered and reviewed before the recess.

• (1620)

An Hon. Senator: There is lots of time.

Hon. Mr. Smith: Honourable senators, I might add a few words to emphasize what Senator Lamontagne has said. The system under which we now operate requires two meetings. We are first required to call a meeting of the subcommittee, at which the chairman of the committee has to make his case for the approval of the budget. Following that step, it is necessary to have a meeting of the full membership of the committee. This would be fine if we were to be here all next week. However, the business of this house could reach an end very suddenly on Friday, and we would not have the budget prepared.

I join with Senator Lamontagne in asking members of the Senate to give their approval before the end of this week.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: The end of the week is not today.

Hon. Mr. Cameron: Honourable senators, my intervention will be short. As one who has been associated with Senator Lamontagne and Senator Grosart in giving some study to this matter, I am naturally very much in favour of the motion. I listened to the remarks of my colleague, Senator Laing, and I was struck by his statement that he had reports that cost $100 million on his desk. I do not doubt that. I am concerned every day about the amount of material, slick cover material, which comes to my desk and which I do not have time to read.

The purpose in setting up this committee, as Senator Lamontagne has emphasized, is to turn the work over to a private institution. It will be financed by a private institution and, hopefully, will lead to the kind of results which Senator Laing and all of us want to see.

Senator Lamontagne mentioned the possible budget as being less than $150,000, which was the cost of the Conference on Law. That may seem like a lot of money to some, but in terms of what is happening today, it is a very small amount.

Hon. Mr. Martin: That is not the amount that he mentioned.

Hon. Mr. Lamontagne: I mentioned the amount of $150,000 in relation to the conference organized by the Department of Justice.

An Hon. Senator: It was much less.

Hon. Mr. Cameron: Yes, he said it would be less than that. The avalanche of new information, coming out with increasing rapidity and not being co-ordinated or passed on to the action front, is really frightening.

Just a very short time ago we were talking about an energy crisis. We are asking ourselves whether we are going to run out of oil, or run out of this and that. As an aside, one of the most significant problems facing municipalities today is the disposal of waste. The disposal of farmyard waste, which is causing pollution, is a major problem. Work has been done in the last ten years on the utilization of farm waste and it has been demonstrated experimentally that we can economically produce 200 million barrels of oil a year from farm waste, and from municipal waste we can produce gas at 50 cents a thousand cubic feet.

This is the kind of technology that is coming. Yet how many people know about it? How many people have this presented to them at the decision-making level? I think this proposed Commission on the Future will be a very important follow-up to the work on the Science Policy Committee. In the last few weeks I have gone over the final chapters of Volume 3, and what has impressed me most is the need for some agency to take the information that is coming out and put it in a place where action will be taken. Hopefully, this kind of commission will be one of the agencies that can make that possible. I certainly hope that this commission will commend itself to the members of the Senate.

On motion of Senator Langlois, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Thursday, July 19, 1973

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

DOCUMENT TABLED

Hon. Paul Martin tabled:

Quinquennial report on actuarial examination of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police (Dependants) Pension Fund as at March 31, 1972, together with Treasury Board Order, dated July 12, 1973, pursuant to sections 56(3) and 57(3) of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Pension Continuation Act, chapter R-10, R.S.C., 1970.

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. Leopold Langlois: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), I move that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until tomorrow at 11 a.m.

Motion agreed to.

IMMIGRATION APPEAL BOARD ACT

BILL TO AMEND—THIRD READING

Hon. Jean-Paul Deschatelets moved the third reading of Bill C-197, to amend the Immigration Appeal Board Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

EXCISE TAX ACT AND EXCISE ACT (No. 2)

BILL TO AMEND—THIRD READING

Hon. Daniel A. Lang moved the third reading of Bill C-194, to amend the Excise Tax Act and the Excise Act (No. 2).

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

CUSTOMS TARIFF (No. 2)

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from yesterday the adjourned debate on the motion of Senator Buckwold for second reading of Bill C-195, to amend the Customs Tariff (No. 2).

Hon. Allister Grosart: Honourable senators, Senator Buckwold has given us an interesting explanation of this bill, and, in fairness to him, I would say as complete and comprehensive an explanation as has been given from the government side. However, I have to say that the explanation we have had on this bill so far has been so incomplete in some essentials as to confirm in my mind the suspicion that has been raised that this is mere window dressing.

I say that because very serious doubts have been raised as to whether it will achieve its two main purposes, one being to decrease the price of certain products to the Canadian consumer, and the other being, naturally, to deal to some extent with our continuing problems of inflation and unemployment.

The casualness with which it has been presented to Parliament, the lack of background information which we have been given, and the lack of proof as to what its effects may be, indicate to me that it may not only be window dressing, but very bad window dressing—window dressing which will fail in its purposes, which will increase the prices to Canadian consumers instead of decreasing them, and which could perhaps increase rather than decrease unemployment. I do not say that those will be the facts, but I do say that knowledgeable people have suggested that there will be deleterious effects as a result of this bill, and certainly the government has made no effort that I have been able to discover to counter those suggestions.

On the surface it appears to be a very simple bill. It has three clauses only, all of which affect the Customs Tariff. The first clause—I am going over some of the ground that was covered by Senator Buckwold, but it is perhaps advisable to get a clear picture of the bill as it stands—amends the Customs Tariff in respect of certain items which appear in schedule A of the bill. Those are items which will now enter Canada generally free of duty, with minor exceptions. Petroleum fuel oil is one. I would hope that Senator Buckwold, in replying to the comments which have been made on the bill, will give us a little more information, because it seems extraordinary to me, in view of the general energy situation, that we should be reducing the tariff on petroleum fuel oil coming into Canada at this time. There are two rates in the bill. I would be interested in knowing the reasons for the two rates.

The bill deals also with vaccine containers used in the poultry trade, with some medical and surgical supplies where they are used in public hospitals or for the benefit of disabled persons. Finally, it deals with certain educational sound recordings.

Clause 2 also amends the Customs Tariff with respect to items which appear in schedule B of the bill. I counted them quickly, and it seems to me that there are about 250 Customs Tariff items which are amended. Many are amendments to lower the tariff in respect of goods produced in Canada, and there is evidence, certainly in the Hansard of the other place, that the effects may be very serious with respect to certain Canadian producers, particularly agricultural producers in the horticultural field. In the past, these types of tariff reductions have actually put some Canadian horticultural producers out of business. Also, we have the famous case of the Ontario sugar beet industry, which was put out of business and which is now in the process of rehabilitation, because it has been proven that the action of the government which resulted in its going out of business was very unsound.

25862—58½

● (1410)

I mention that because a very large number of the items contained in clause 2 of this bill relate to sugar. Sugar, to Canadians, is a sensitive area of imports. Some of us are very much ashamed of the Canadian position on the import of sugar, particularly from the Caribbean. It so happens that both the United States and Great Britain pay for their Caribbean sugar at a rate higher than the world market. Canada, however, still insists on buying it below the world market price, and for that reason Caribbean sugar only comes to Canada when the people there cannot help themselves. As I say, this is an area in which some of us who are interested in the Caribbean continue to be embarrassed and ashamed.

I mentioned the 250 items. Yesterday I asked Senator Buckwold if he would be good enough to obtain some information as to how these 250 items were chosen. The minister has stated that there was no consultation with the industries concerned prior to the decision to reduce the tariffs on these items. In one way, that is understandable, if prior consultation meant revealing the government's intention in this area. But the minister's argument in that respect, to me, is a very weak one, because consultation about tariff changes may take place without any revelation of the government's intention.

We are faced in this bill with decisions made in the department, decisions, I presume, made by bureaucrats, as to these particular 250 items on which the government, in its wisdom or otherwise, has decided to make tariff reductions. On what bases have these decisions been made? Has industry itself asked for these tariff reductions? Have consumer associations asked for them? Have users, other than consumers at the retail level, asked for these reductions? It would be interesting to know how the bureaucracy works, when we are suddenly confronted with a situation where we are asked to pass a bill making these reductions in a very sensitive area of the Canadian economy, without this kind of explanation.

I am quite sure that Senator Buckwold, with his usual attention to such details, will give us the answers before we are called upon to vote on this bill.

Clause 3 is the operative clause. It merely says that these tariff reductions will come into effect on February 20 this year, in the usual way following the ways and means motion flowing from the budget; and that they will end on February 19, 1974, giving a period of one year in which they will be in effect. They are temporary tariff reductions, and I will have some comments to make on that aspect in a moment. Clause 3(3) gives the Governor in Council the authority to restore any of the tariff rates if, on the basis of information or observation, these reductions are clearly harmful to some existing Canadian producers.

I am concerned about the temporary nature of these reductions and the power given to the Governor in Council to restore the rates at will. These are, in essence, tariff safeguards, and the use of safeguards is one of the problems complicating world trade today.

The background of the bill is that it implements the ways and means motion. It reduces by 5 per cent the effective tariff on $1.4 billion worth of imports into Canada at last year's rates. The total of imports into Canada last year was about $18.6 billion, so the reduction does not affect a very significant area of our total tariffs. Perhaps when he has the opportunity, Senator Buckwold would let us have the figures of the total effect of these tariff reductions. This is 5 per cent of $1.4 billion. Some arithmetic is needed there, and some input other than arithmetical into the equation is needed to give us the information of the total effect of these tariff reductions on the whole range of the Customs Tariff.

I say that because this is something the world is looking at with considerable interest. Not long ago I quoted The Economist, a financial paper, as saying that Canada is lagging behind in implementing the agreements made in the Kennedy Round, that we are hiding behind one of the highest protective tariffs in the developed nations. There are many interested nations looking at this and asking, "What is the total effect? What have you done?" When they do that, they will naturally look to our position in the forthcoming round of GATT tariff reductions. In that sense, this action is very ill-advised; it completely compromises our position in the GATT rounds.

We have reduced tariffs on a continuing basis unilaterally, without consultation, and the minister blandly says, "Oh, this is just a domestic thing." That is the statement he made. It is not a domestic thing; no tariff reduction in a country as dependent as Canada is on international trade is purely domestic. This will affect our position in the world market. In the debate to date, not a jot or tittle of evidence has been presented by the government to show that this has caused them any concern. I suggest that Parliament is entitled to an explanation of the government's approach in respect of that very great danger to our position in international trade.

Yesterday I asked Senator Buckwold if he would produce some figures on the effect of these tariff reductions on the cost of living. There are those who say that they will have no effect whatsoever. To do any good, the reductions will need to have a very great effect, and there is not the slightest possibility that they will have a great effect. The cost of living, in terms of food on the household table, has risen by 30 per cent in the last three years. We are asked to believe—and this is why I used the phrase "window dressing"—that a 5 per cent reduction in certain tariffs, not all food tariffs by any means, affecting $1.4 billion of our imports, will really have a great effect on the cost of living.

Having asked Senator Buckwold that question, I checked a few sensitive prices myself, and I found that in every case the prices of these household articles and foods today are considerably higher than they were on the day these tariff reductions went into effect. I will be told that there are many reasons for this, that the cost of living is always going up, that there have been changes in the value of the dollar; I will be told many other things. They will all be excuses, because we were told that the purpose of this was to reduce the cost of these consumer articles. The evidence is that in that respect the bill has been completely ineffective. Somebody will have to do a lot of hard work to prove to me that these reductions have had other than a minimal effect. If that is so, what was the purpose of playing around with the Customs Tariff at this particular time in this way, without consultation domestically, without consultation internationally, doing it on a completely unilateral basis? It seems to be part of the general policy of this government at the moment to find domestic reasons to take unilateral action which is greatly harming the credibility of Canada around the world.

● (1420)

After all that has been said, written and preached by ministers of this government about the importance of our consulting our partners in the world before we take these steps, why do we continue doing so without that consultation? I may say that I am not guessing that there was not consultation; the minister himself said that this is purely domestic, that we have not talked to anybody.

Honourable senators, I suggest that if we have a government that says it can make tariff changes and regard them purely as domestic, we are headed for very serious danger in our position in the international markets.

Surely the time has come, when we are presented in the Senate with a bill such as this, for us to be given a much better explanation of its purpose, its background and its possible effects, than we have been given today. It is quite possible that Senator Buckwold will remedy this situation—I hope he will, and I wish him luck.

Hon. Sidney L. Buckwold: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, if the Honourable Senator Buckwold speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on second reading.

Hon. Mr. Buckwold: As usual, Senator Grosart was able to put his finger on those problems which concern all of us when we view the impact of a measure such as Bill C-195. On the other hand, I was a little disappointed that he did not express some feeling of appreciation, not to the government—that would be too much to expect—

Hon. Mr. Grosart: I have done it.

Hon. Mr. Buckwold: —but to the philosophy that tariffs have been reduced. It seems to me that most of us look at this from the point of view of the nation's well-being and we keep in mind our desire to have our own industries relatively prosperous, competitive and not undermined by foreign goods. Nevertheless, in spite of it all—and perhaps I speak especially as a Western Canadian—any reduction in tariff should be greeted with more enthusiasm than is shown in the rather desultory remarks we heard from Senator Grosart.

The fact is that there has been a substantial reduction in a number of items. Hopefully, the result will be a minimization—and I have to repeat that—a minimization of price increases. The government should be given some good marks for using this means of attempting at least to hold down the spiralling inflation which is facing not only Canada, but indeed the world.

I compliment the government for the unique approach it has made. I agree that it is difficult to pinpoint the effects, and I agree that by itself this will not wipe out the speculative inflation which is haunting every Canadian household, but I do feel that it is at least one small step in the right direction, a step worthy of favourable consideration because of the effort that is being made.

Honourable senators, I now have the answers to some questions that were raised in the Senate yesterday. First of all, Senator Burchill asked why the United States did not make a reduction in the duty on soft wood plywood corresponding to the Canadian reduction. In reply to that question, I believe that Senator Burchill referred to a reduction of 10 percentage points in the duty on plywood, but the Canadian duty was reduced by only 5 percentage points—that is, from 15 per cent to 10 per cent. The U.S. rate is 20 per cent. The tariff reductions in the bill were made for domestic reasons, and not in the context of international negotiations. Therefore, it was not a question of obtaining reciprocal tariff reductions from other countries. Before the start of the next round of multilateral tariff negotiations the government will, of course, be consulting in detail with all interested parties. In the meantime—and I am sure this will reassure Senator Burchill and those who have spoken with him—representations made by the Canadian soft wood plywood industry about the temporary tariff reduction on plywood are receiving very careful consideration.

Senator Grosart asked two questions. He asked whether a comparison could be made of the retail and wholesale levels of prices before and after the tariff reductions. I think that in asking the question he knew very well the difficulty of coming up with the answer. I had indicated earlier in my address yesterday that it is very difficult to follow through not only these reductions but the excise tax reductions that are provided for in the bill sponsored by Senator Lang.

Senator Walker also asked a very good question, but was really asking the same thing. He asked: How do you relate the reductions to the actual cost effect to the consumer in due course?

I can only say to Senator Grosart that the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs has been directed to monitor the impact on prices of the temporary tariff reductions. The department has not yet completed its study. It should be borne in mind that there are difficulties in singling out one factor, such as a lower tariff, from other factors which may affect prices, and I referred to some of those other factors in my address yesterday. Appreciation of the currencies of a number of other countries has more than offset the reductions in tariffs on some products. Shortages of certain products obviously have a direct impact on their prices.

Finally, the Minister of Finance said in the House of Commons on July 17:

> —if one were to judge from the objections which have been received since the budget from a number of Canadian firms who consider that their competitive positions have been adversely affected by the temporary tax cuts, then, although I would not accept all their complaints as valid, I think one has to assume from these complaints that there are pressures on prices in a number of sectors affected by the tariff cuts.

In other words, what he has said is that there have been a lot of complaints from Canadian industry that may have been affected or think they have been affected, and, if that is valid, then the very points that have been raised by the Opposition are negated by the fact that there is a pressure for downward prices which could adversely affect the Canadian industry concerned.

So that Senator Grosart does not feel he is being neglected, I have here—and am quite prepared to pass them on to him—the consumer price indices for 1972 and 1973, indicating groups of items which have been affected by the changes in the act as brought forward today. These are given not individually, but by groups. Some of them have gone up but—and Senator Grosart might be surprised at this—some of them have also gone down slightly. For example, frozen orange juice had a price index of 105.6 in June 1972, whereas in June 1973 it was 103.7. Vacuum cleaners had an index of 93.3 in June 1972, whereas in June 1973 that index was 91.8. As was pointed out the other day, these are some of the things that are a direct result of some of these tariff reductions. For example, for light bulbs—and I guess this is an important item for those on the other side who might need them—the index was 115.0 in June 1972, while June 1973 it was down to 109.9.

I am not in any way trying to suggest that this has made a material difference in the cost of living. The fact is that the bakery and cereal products index has gone up from 129.1 in June 1972 to 137.3 in June of this year, and the pork index has gone up from 127.4 to 155.1. I am sure there are many more increases than those I have referred to. All I am suggesting is that in some cases there have been reductions, and I feel that we could attribute them to the impact of the legislation we are now considering.

● (1430)

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Those are very amusing examples you have picked.

Hon. Mr. Buckwold: Thank you. I am glad that I have been able to amuse the honourable Leader of the Opposition. He is sometimes difficult to amuse.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I agree.

Hon. Mr. Buckwold: I should be glad to have this list of items which I have here considered as read into the record. It is a list of prices, some of which will make good material for the Opposition and some of which support the points I have made today.

Honourable senators, I refuse to accept Senator Grosart's statement that in his opinion this act will increase prices to the Canadian consumer rather than decrease them. I think that is a pretty broad generalization, and one that is hardly worthy of the usually intelligent presentations made by that distinguished senator.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: On that point, may I say that if that is what I said, it was not what I meant to say. I thought I was very careful to say that that was the opinion of others, and I think I used the phrase "knowledgeable people." I think I added, "It may be so or it may not be so." I was not reading from a text and so I cannot be sure, but I can assure Senator Buckwold that it was not my intention to say that I knew personally it was going to have this effect.

[Hon. Mr. Buckwold.]

Hon. Mr. Buckwold: Honourable senators, I equate knowledgeable people with Senator Grosart, and that is what led me to say what I have just said.

Senator Grosart also asked about petroleum fuel oil entering Canada generally free of duty, and asked the reason for this. Petroleum fuel oil, which is tariff item No. 26906-1, enters Canada free of duty, and this has been continued for a further period of one year. This is an extension of the existing tariff structure.

If Senator Grosart wishes any more information on that particular item, I have it here. It was felt, as a general conclusion, that the existing prices for heavy fuel oils are at such high levels that they should be allowed continued free entry for users such as the pulp and paper industry and power companies.

Another question asked by Senator Grosart concerned the problem of consultations. I think the question read something like this: Since there were no consultations with the industries affected before the tariff reductions were introduced, how did the department arrive at specific items on which it decided to make reductions? In reply I should like to say it is evident that if the reductions were to be meaningful they would have to cover a wide range of consumer goods in the food and non-food sectors. The Department of Finance has a considerable amount of information on various areas of the economy. The agricultural sector was reviewed with the Minister of Agriculture and his senior advisers. The non-agricultural sector was reviewed with the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and his senior advisers.

I also referred in my statement to certain criteria which were followed—for example, products in short supply or for which prices were rising rapidly. It was also considered reasonable to reduce rates above 15 per cent to the 15 per cent level—the basic protective rate—for a temporary period. The 15 per cent rate has applied for some time to such consumer products as air conditioners, dishwashers, radios and television sets.

I would again like to remind honourable senators that the bill does provide authority for the Governor in Council to restore rates of duty on products to the levels in effect prior to February 20. The Minister of Finance has indicated that he is prepared to use this authority in any case where the facts warrant such action.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: At this point may I ask Senator Buckwold a question? Does he know why the Minister of Finance in this bill has reserved the right to restore the rates that prevailed before the budget speech when he has not reserved to himself this right in the matter of Bill C-192? It would have been a simple device.

Hon. Mr. Buckwold: Again I think it would be presumptuous of me to attempt to answer that, except to indicate that one is of a temporary nature, whereas the previous bill provided for permanent reduction in a series of sales taxes.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: It does not.

Hon. Mr. Buckwold: Well, I think—and perhaps Senator Lang can answer that—it is a permanent reduction.

Let me conclude by saying that I believe this is legislation in the right direction. I believe it is legislation which presents an interesting new experiment in the control of the cost of living. I am sure all of us will be watching with interest the impact of these changes as they affect the Canadian consumer, and I for one—and I think I speak for this side of the house—am delighted to see tariff reductions as long as Canadian industry is not adversely affected by them.

The Hon. the Speaker: Does the Honourable Senator Buckwold wish to have the list from which he read printed as part of his speech?

Hon. Mr. Buckwold: Yes.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Mr. Buckwold: The list is as follows:

The Consumer Price Index
1961 = 100

	Index 1973		1972
	June	Feb.	June
Bakery and cereal products	137.3	136.2	129.1
Jam	133.3	130.7	123.2
Pork	155.1	155.4	127.4
Canned peaches	155.4	152.4	138.2
Canned tomato juice	147.3	145.8	130.9
Frozen orange juice	103.7	106.5	105.6
Soup	99.7	100.6	99.0
Chocolate bars	126.2	129.4	127.9
Furniture	138.5	132.5	130.7
Vacuum cleaners	91.8	91.2	93.3
Refrigerators	92.1	91.2	91.6
Ranges	95.3	92.4	94.1
Washing machines	102.2	98.2	101.4
Dryers	112.8	113.1	113.4
Light bulbs	109.9	111.8	115.0
Razor blades	108.5	109.4	109.4
Tires	112.2	115.8	118.2
Pharmaceuticals	100.1	99.4	97.5

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Buckwold moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

CANADA-UNITED STATES INTERPARLIAMENTARY GROUP

MEETING TO CONSIDER IMPACT OF OIL TRANSPORTATION ON WEST COAST OF CANADA

Hon. Alan Macnaughton: Honourable senators, I wonder if I might have permission to make a short statement of general interest to the Senate at this time?

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Mr. Macnaughton: Honourable senators, I happened to be in the gallery of the House of Commons about 15 minutes ago, and I should like to bring to the attention of the Senate the fact that the other place passed unanimously a motion proposed by Mr. Knowles to the effect that the Canada-United States Interparliamentary Group be convened immediately and placed in contact with their counterparts in the United States for the purpose of bringing to the attention of the American members of that group the matter of the transportation of oil on the west coast of Canada. Before long the same message will probably be given to the leader here, but I thought I should bring this to the attention of the Senate so that it might be considered and not take us by surprise.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Do I understand that there would be a meeting arranged in the next few weeks?

Hon. Mr. Macnaughton: Yes.

● (1440)

SCIENCE POLICY

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO HOLD SPECIAL MEETING TO DETERMINE FEASIBILITY OF ESTABLISHING A COMMISSION ON THE FUTURE

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Lamontagne, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Cameron:

That the Special Committee of the Senate on Science Policy be authorized to organize and hold a conference to be held in 1974 for the purpose of establishing a Commission on the Future, whose responsibility would be to help as many private and public organizations as possible to forecast and build their future not only in isolation but together, as was recommended by Chapter 13 of Volume II of the Report of the Special Committee of the Senate on Science Policy; and

That the committee have power to engage the services of such counsel, staff and technical advisers and to incur such other special expenses as may be necessary for the purpose of organizing and holding the said conference.—(Honourable Senator Langlois.)

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Honourable senators, I understand that Senator Rowe wishes to speak at this stage, and I am pleased to yield to him.

Hon. Frederick William Rowe: Honourable senators, first I wish to thank Senator Langlois for being so gracious as to yield at this time. He appreciates that there are other factors over which I have no control, and if I wish to say a few words in support of Senator Lamontagne's motion I must do so now or not at all.

I would like also to express my congratulations to the distinguished Senator Lamontagne, not only for introducing this motion in this chamber, but also for the great contribution that he and his committee have made in recent months to this whole matter of science and the implications of scientific development in Canada.

I shall compress my thoughts as much as possible and am afraid that consequently my remarks may be a little disjointed and haphazard. I will, however, confine myself to the enunciation of only a few principles as I see them with reference to this resolution.

Senator Lamontagne has proposed that the Senate should take the initiative in this matter. I heartily support that. I intend on some other occasion, if the opportunity offers, to speak to Senator Croll's inquiry on reform of the Senate. I realize that perhaps it would be presumptuous for one who has been in the Senate only a relatively short time to speak categorically on such an important and, shall I say, completely misunderstood matter as Senate reform. I feel, however, that I am entitled to express a few thoughts in that respect. Allow me to say now with reference to Senator Lamontagne's motion that I have had a somewhat depressing personal feeling since being summoned to the Senate that to some extent there is an inferiority complex at work here. This inferiority complex, it seems to me, arises from the fact that we are an appointed rather than an elected body. However acceptable appointed bodies may have been one hundred years ago, there is a feeling among senators and many others, I suppose, that appointed bodies are something of an anachronism. I do not agree with that entirely, but I believe that is a feeling.

I seems to me that this may explain—again I do not wish to be presumptuous—why the Senate has been so reluctant at times to take the initiative in matters such as that brought to our attention by Senator Lamontagne. I feel that we must assert and reassert a basic fact that this body, the Senate, is part of the Constitution of Canada and has rights and responsibilities. These rights are just as important in the whole scheme of things as the rights and responsibilities of the House of Commons. The Parliament of Canada is not a single body.

Another fact which in my opinion enforces the validity of Senator Lamontagne's motion is that in the Senate—we can say this factually, without being accused of boasting—we do have a reservoir of talent, experience and, although I do not like the word, expertise. We do have that reservoir which, in my view, is not being utilized sufficiently in the interests of the nation. In this respect Senator Lamontagne does us and Canada a service by his proposal that the Senate take the initiative. There is, of course, the obvious fact, which he brought out, that we being an appointed body are not so much concerned with the day-to-day, short-term political factors which concern our friends and colleagues in the other place. Therefore we can devote ourselves more to the long-term view and long-term deliberations. Several of the principles which I shall now enunciate were put forward yesterday by Senator Lamontagne in his eloquent address to this chamber. They are so important that in my opinion they should be reiterated, repeated and re-emphasized. Of these I shall name two or three.

First of all, we must face up to the fact that national and international crises will increase, both numerically and in complexity. We are not living in the 1800s or 1700s, but in the 1900s—and the late 1900s at that. We will face increasingly crises in such basic fields as food supply, energy, housing and, perhaps most of all, human relations. I would again support the thought expressed by my colleague yesterday when he pointed out that we cannot deal with these crises on a fire-brigade basis. I would go further and say that we cannot deal with them on a Manhattan Project basis. They must be dealt with more scientifically and logically than that.

Past attempts to predict the future have for the most part been miserable failures. This has been partly due, in my opinion, to the fact that these attempts to make predictions have been based on unscientific and emotional approaches rather than carefully studied, deliberated and rationalized long-term approaches. A basic ingredient which I believe has been absent from most predictions is the use of the imagination. I look back over my span of life and remember the predictions made during the 1930s and 1940s.

I remember particularly those made by President Conant of Harvard and other internationally known educators in the late 1940s and early 1950s. These predictions proved to be inadequate, erroneous and incomplete. In my opinion the main reason for their invalidity was their lack of imagination. For some reason we seem to be afraid to use our imagination when predicting the future and, as a result, make miserable mistakes. I am sorry that I do not have time to develop that thought now, but perhaps I can do so at some other time.

I can understand the feelings of almost irritation expressed yesterday by Senator Laing because so many scientists and pseudo-scientists have cried wolf when there have been no wolves around. This is a serious tactical and strategic error, of a type which we cannot afford today. It is just as dangerous as was the practice a few years ago with respect to new philosophical or political ideas to accuse those putting them forward of being communists or "pinkos." That accusation was not a service to our society, whether made by a would-be President of the United States or by an obscure businessman in France or Italy. We cannot afford that type of talk today, and neither can we afford alarmist predictions which are not based on careful study and scientific principles, but on emotional standards.

Having said all that, I wish now to say that we must recognize the simple fact that most of the physical resources of this planet are finite, exhaustible and irreplaceable. There are a few exceptions, I suppose. I cannot think of solar energy as exhaustible, as not very much of it is used. I suppose atmospheric movement does not become irreplaceable, because it is a continuous process. Atmospheric movement does not destroy itself even if it is utilized, but the atmosphere itself, of course, can be destroyed and is being destroyed.

● (1450)

Another principle that I would enunciate is that Canadians cannot live in a vacuum. Far too many of us think that we can, that we can live unto ourselves. I have to remind myself of the fact that we in Canada, with our small population, are controlling a disproportionate amount of the physical resources of this planet. That has a serious implication. Whether we like it or not—and many people will be horror-stricken at the implication of what I am about to point out—if pressures become sufficiently heavy on more heavily populated parts of the world, they will demand that action be taken—either we must take it or they will take it—in respect of our physical resources.

Let me give a simple example. If in 20 years the population of the United States reaches 300 million—and this could well happen—and our population at that time is 30 million, and if at that time the life of the United States is threatened by a serious shortage of fresh water, as may well be the case, does anyone in his right senses think that the United States will sit back and do nothing? Either we must take action or the United States should take action. That, I think, is the simple fact. We have to face up to the implications of that situation. We in Canada control an undeniably large amount of the finite resources of this planet.

At times I like to make use of the Greek myth of Cassandra. Cassandra's predictions and warnings were ridiculed and ignored, and she became a bore to her family and the rest of society. That is what we remember most about Cassandra. We forget the all-important fact that Cassandra was invariably right in her predictions.

I am reminded of another "Cassandra" of more recent times in the person of Malthus and the Malthusian theory. Malthus was incorrect in certain details. He was incorrect chronologically. The catastrophes, such as war, famine, and so on, which he predicted did not occur when he predicted they would. But he was right in his basic principle, namely, that the law of arithmetic and geometry are inexorable and that if you have food resources increasing arithmetically and the population increasing geometrically, we are headed for trouble, for disaster, somewhere along the line. It may not occur for 100 years because of scientific advances or increased development in agriculture, but what is 100, 200 or 300 years in the lifetime of a planet?

Some honourable senators may have read that little work put out a few years ago by Lady Jackson under her professional name of Barbara Ward, in which she introduced the concept of the spaceship Earth. Her concept was that earth was going through space as a very small and insignificant ball of matter, and that we are travellers on it.

If anyone thinks that we can separate Canada from the rest of the world, he is in for a rude awakening. I say that deliberately because the proposal that Senator Lamontagne has introduced represents something that the Senate and Canada should be doing not only for this country but for the rest of the world. Canada has a duty to the spaceship Earth.

Hon. Chesley W. Carter: I should like to speak briefly to this motion. My remarks may be a little disjointed because I decided to speak only about 10 minutes ago. I want to say at the outset that I support Senator Lamontagne's motion, which I consider to be a natural and logical extension of the committee's report. We are concerned not so much with crises but with the changes that are taking place all around us, changes to which Canada must adjust or suffer very serious consequences.

Canada's economy today is based on an industrial strategy which rests on heavy exploitation of her natural resources, and small branch manufacturing plants supported by a high tariff protection. It is evident from the committee's report that if we continue along this road we shall be heading for disaster. If we are to map out another road and another course for Canada, some planning is necessary. This planning of our free enterprise economy should be carried out by the enterprisers themselves. It should not be forced upon them as a result of state planning or the ideas of bureaucrats.

As I understand the motion, the purpose of the conference is to bring together heads of companies and industries in order that they may discuss these problems in a co-operative manner, work out a new strategy, and make the necessary adjustments within their own industries and within the larger relationship of their industry to the economy as a whole. Very serious and drastic adjustments will have to be made in some instances in order that Canada may survive as a trading nation, that our resources can be used to the maximum benefit of all Canadians, and to enable us to cope, in a logical and orderly manner with pollution and other problems which are a concomitant part of industry today.

There is also the problem of unemployment in Canada. We can see no way of expanding our economy sufficiently to take care of our growing labour force if we continue along those lines which we have followed in the past. We have to greatly expand our trade. As Senator Aird and Senator van Roggen recently pointed out, the entry of the United Kingdom into the European Common Market, the emergence of the European Community, and the trading blocs, mean that Canada must take action to readjust in a logical and orderly manner to those problems which are staring us in the face. We must not wait until tragedy is upon us.

Unless I misunderstood the whole exercise, the purpose of the proposed conference is to bring together the proper people who can sit down and discuss these problems among themselves and work out the kind of strategy which must be followed if we are to get out of this mess and adjust to the new set of circumstances that face us in the world today. It is not, as my honourable colleague Senator Lamontagne pointed out yesterday, another study. I agree with him that we are studied to death. This is a plan for action. I hope honourable senators will support this motion.

● (1500)

Hon. Allister Grosart: I, too, thank Senator Langlois for yielding at this time. I have not yet spoken on this motion. I rise now to agree, first of all, with the very generous tribute which Senator Rowe has paid to Senator Lamontagne and his exciting project for which the Senate gave a mandate a year ago, and which will be renewed if this motion is passed.

I find myself also in general agreement with Senator Laing, particularly with his suggestion that the modern prophets of doom may have overstated their case. However, I also believe that the prophets of doom, the Cassandras of Senator Rowe's classical allusion, the modern pessimists, have done the world a great service in focusing attention on the problems of the future, and particularly in their insistence that there must be serious planning now to avert the disasters of which they have warned.

However, the prophets of doom are always suspect in their own time. I feel that, like the prophets of old, the Old Testament prophets, although they may not always be right, they have certainly done a great deal of good.

In using the word "prophet," I could not help thinking of a quotation from the New Testament. We are all aware that Senator Lamontagne has had some difficulties and some frustrations in convincing the Senate that it was in the interest of the Senate and the public and, indeed, the world, for the Senate to spend the money to sponsor this project. That recalled the statement which we find in all of the four gospels, so it was regarded as highly important by all of the writers of the gospels; "A prophet is not without honour, save in his own country . . ." And honourable senators may be surprised if I complete that quotation as it is written in the authorized King James' version, ". . . save in his own country, and in his own house." That is the exact quotation, from St. Matthew 13:57.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: The French phrase is: "Nul n'est prophète dans son pays."

[Translation]

Hon. Leopold Langlois: Honourable senators, I would like to join my colleagues who preceded me in this debate and commend Senator Lamontagne for the excellent initiative he had when proposing the resolution before us. I was asked to study this resolution and in spite of the limited time at my disposal I quickly came to the conclusion that it was a very good motion which the Senate should study with all its energy and resources.

For those who have read—as did thousands of Canadians—the two volumes published so far by the Special Committee on Science Policy, it was no surprise to find this development following the tremendous amount of work accomplished by the committee. However, during discussions with my colleagues I have noted certain hesitations and reservations concerning the timeliness of adopting the resolution proposed by our colleague Senator Lamontagne. They boil down to this: First, launching such a conference or meeting seems without precedent in the history of the Senate.

Second, we are entering a new field and some people fear that should the Senate stray from beaten paths we might commit some errors.

The third reservation I have found with my colleagues is that they seem to believe that the objective of this resolution does not necessarily stem from the terms of reference given by this house to the special committee of Senator Lamontagne. I wish to give the following replies to those reservations.

First, as regards the argument of established Senate practices, I have much respect for practices and usages derived from years in this house but I wonder what they would be today if, in the past, the Senate had not created any precedent? Usage and practice are the repetition of precedents created by institutions such as ours. To those who speak today about reforming the Senate, as Senator Lamontagne pointed out yesterday, if we really are to reform the Senate, not only in theory but also in practice, we must necessarily develop new approaches. We must necessarily open new horizons, create precedents in initiatives like the one proposed today by Senator Lamontagne.

[Hon. Mr. Grosart.]

As for the allegation that the motion may not fall within the terms of reference that were assigned to this committee, that is to say before it began its study on science policy, I will answer that Senator Lamontagne is now asking this chamber to widen these terms of reference to allow the meeting or the conference—call it as you wish—which, I hope, will result in the setting up of the proposed Commission on the Future. Besides, as Senator Lamontagne stated yesterday, when doing so the Senate Special Committee on Science Policy is only asking this chamber to implement one of its recommendations; I would say the one which may have received most support from all those who are interested in science development, both in the public and the private sectors.

Yesterday, Senator Lamontagne gave us detailed explanations on evidence he received and which support, without any hesitation or reservation, the Senate special committee's recommendation to convene a conference, or rather, to arrange a meeting, in order to set up this Commission on the Future.

Hon. Mr. Martin: An extension of the committee.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: This is, as our leader has just noted, a continuation of the committee's work through the implementation of one of its main recommendations.

I believe that the few remarks I have made answer objections and reservations that were put forward during my research on this proposed resolution. However, other objections were raised which, in my opinion, came to some people's mind because, perhaps, the wording of the resolution now before us is not clear enough. The word "conference" has frightened some people.

The Senate wants to arrange a conference. That is breaking new ground. It is a gigantic undertaking and we may be wrong to engage in such a project. The word "conference" is perhaps too pompous and I think that the mover of the motion would not object if it were replaced by the word "meeting" or "special meeting" as the purpose of the motion.

Not only did my colleagues hesitate to accept that word "conference" but they also seemed to have a certain fear about the cost of that special meeting of the committee to create this Commission on the Future.

First of all, I must remind the honourable senators that even though this house is authorizing, by means of this motion, the Committee on Science Policy to spend money on this meeting, it is still true that pursuant to our rules, and particularly rule 83A, the expenses of the committee must be strictly controlled by the Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration. I quote for that purpose the first paragraph of rule 83A:

> A committee that has been empowered by the Senate to incur special expenses in respect of any matter referred to it by the Senate, shall not incur any such special expenses until the chairman of that committee, or a Senator acting for him, has presented to the Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration a budget setting forth in reasonable detail estimates of its proposed expenditures for a specific period of time, and until the said budget has been approved in whole or in part by the latter committee.

And paragraph 2 says:

> When the expenditures of any such committee have reached the limits set forth in any such budget, the committee shall not incur any further special expenses until a supplementary budget or supplementary budgets has or have been presented by or on behalf of its chairman to the Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration and approved in whole or in part by the latter committee.

I think that those two paragraphs of rule 83A of this house are enough to dissipate the fears that some senators could have in that regard. Moreover, according to the information received up to now from the chairman of the Special Senate Committee on Science Policy, that budget should not exceed $110,000. Once again, that budget—even the expenditure of that proposed amount, as I said—is subject to final approval by the Senate Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration.

About two years ago I suggested before the Committee on the Rules of this house that in my opinion rule 83A that I just quoted went perhaps a bit too far because it amends in a certain way and can even nullify a decision made by this house authorizing those expenditures so that a committee of this house is granted veto power over the expenditures authorized by the house itself when the final decision should rather remain here in this house and not rest with one of its committees.

However, in the discussion I had before the Rules Committee on the subject the committee was unanimous in rejecting my suggestion. However, my views are still the same in that respect but I must abide by the rules which exist and accept it as all other senators must do because those rules were sanctioned by this house.

● (1510)

[English]

MOTION IN AMENDMENT

I suggested a while ago that the word "conference" mentioned in the original resolution by my colleague is perhaps somewhat pompous. This is not intended as an unpleasant remark. I am merely suggesting that it is perhaps a wrong choice of words. I intend to propose that the words "special meeting" be substituted therefor and in order to further clarify that resolution I move the following amendment:

> That the motion be not now adopted but that it be amended by striking out the first paragraph thereof and substituting therefor the following:
>
> That the Special Committee of the Senate on Science Policy be authorized to organize and hold a special meeting to be held in 1974 for the purpose of determining the feasibility of establishing a Commission on the Future, whose responsibility would be to help as many private and public organizations as possible to forecast and build their future not only in isolation but together, as was recommended by Chapter 13 of Volume II of the Report of the Special Committee of the Senate on Science Policy; and

The remaining paragraph remains unchanged.

[Translation]

I commend this amendment to the consideration of the nouse, assuring it once again that it is only suggested for elucidation purposes. I feel that it does not alter in any way the object of the original motion. I think that this amendment will be sufficient to lessen the fears and reservations expressed by some colleagues about the motion now under consideration.

Before resuming my seat, I wish to advise the honourable senators that if the motion is carried by this house, the committee—

Hon. Mr. Flynn: As amended.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: As amended, of course. If the motion is passed by this house, the budget of the Special Science Committee for this special meeting will be studied by the Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration at the end of our sitting this afternoon. The committee has been called not only to study that budget but also to examine the supplementary budget of the Committee on National Finance. This is why I gave notice, even before the passage of this motion in the house, that another item will be considered by that committee.

[English]

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, it is moved by the Honourable Senator Lamontagne, seconded by the Honourable Senator Cameron:

> That the Special Committee of the Senate on Science Policy be authorized to organize and hold a conference to be held in 1974 for the purpose of establishing a Commission on the Future, whose responsibility would be to help as many private and public organizations as possible to forecast and build their future not only in isolation but together, as was recommended by Chapter 13 of Volume II of the Report of the Special Committee of the Senate on Science Policy; and
>
> That the committee have power to engage the services of such counsel, staff and technical advisers and to incur such other special expenses as may be necessary for the purpose of organizing and holding the said conference.

In amendment it is moved by the Honourable Senator Langlois, seconded by the Honourable Senator Martin, P.C.:

> That the motion be not now adopted but that it be amended by striking out the first paragraph thereof and substituting therefor the following:
>
> That the Special Committee of the Senate on Science Policy be authorized to organize and hold a special meeting to be held in 1974 for the purpose of determining the feasibility of establishing a Commission on the Future, whose responsibility would be to help as many private and public organizations as possible to forecast and build their future not only in isolation but together, as was recommended by Chapter 13 of Volume II of the Report of the Special Committee of the Senate on Science Policy; and

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion in amendment?

[Translation]

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, I listened with great interest, with great pleasure, and possibly with some amusement, to my honourable friend Senator Langlois speaking of timeliness. He said the Senate should break new ground. He certainly did so himself today by replying to objections that were not raised in this chamber. A senator's objections are seldom disputed when they have not been expressed here. To want to reply to people who have not expressed their views is certainly something new, and shows a will to innovate.

I know not whether Senator Langlois wanted to meet the objections which were, according to him, put forward outside, or to please Senator Lamontagne, but I think he managed to reconcile extremes, if they did exist in fact. To my mind, they do not, and in this case, it was mere caution.

I agree that the proposal of Senator Lamontagne is very attractive. It is so attractive that some, outside this chamber, have said: Let's go, but let's be careful. In fact, the amendment proposed by Senator Langlois reflects that caution and does not take anything away—

Hon. Mr. Langlois: May I point out to my honourable friend that he is making the same mistake for which he took me to task a moment ago by commenting on the remarks—

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I had to explain why Senator Langlois spoke as he did. Otherwise, no one would understand. One wonders who he is fighting, with whom he is arguing. It is therefore necessary for the record that I may say that discussions actually took place.

It is merely a precaution, for there are indeed people, like Senator Lamontagne, whom I could describe as "thinkers" and who may be inclined to daydreaming.

Hon. Mr. Lamontagne: One should not—

Hon. Mr. Flynn: You may rest assured that I shall not follow you on those grounds and, having just mentioned the need for discretion, I shall take care. I shall be very careful.

As I said, the Senate only wants to suggest to Senator Lamontagne and his committee a policy of discretion. He wants to be able to follow the preparatory work of this meeting, not to foster hopes that may be frustrated. It would be much better to be careful now, in order to realize more than we promised, than to come a short distance from the objective indicated previously.

Senator Langlois mentioned restrictions imposed on a Senate committee authorized to make special expenditures for a definite purpose. He referred to rule 83A which, in his opinion, could deny or even nullify a decision of the Senate.

I simply state this: When you examine the text of the rule, if you want to play on words, or interpret it strictly, you find that the Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration can only empower, totally or partially, such a committee to incur expenses. In other words, you can use all the budget, or reduce it, but you cannot cancel it completely. I submit that, in a case where the Committee on Internal Economy would hinder a committee authorized to act by the Senate, then there is always an appeal to the Senate. I think that, in this case, there is nothing to fear, or no cause to doubt the usual wisdom of the Committee on Internal Economy.

Under these conditions I believe that we can, without hesitation, approve the principle of the motion before the Senate, and then wait and see. At any rate, we hope that the project submitted by Senator Lamontagne will bring the best possible results. In this regard, we have complete confidence in the wisdom of this committee.

[The Hon. the Speaker.]

● (1520)

[English]

Hon. G. Percival Burchill: Honourable senators, before Senator Lamontagne winds up the debate, may I say I welcome and approve very much the principle of the resolution. I commend those who have spoken in tribute to Senator Lamontagne. He has done a tremendous job. The work of the Science Policy Committee has enhanced the Senate in the eyes of the Canadian public and for this we are indebted in great measure to Senator Lamontagne.

Honourable senators, I am not a scientist, I am a manufacturer, so I am rather stupid as far as science is concerned. I should like Senator Lamontagne to make clear to me, if he can, the tie-in between what he has in mind and the manufacturing industry. Applied science is a secret. It is not enough to know how to do these things; one must know how to apply them to industry. We must not forget that. I know wonderful things have been done by scientists and wonderful studies have been made, but the difficulty is to apply those achievements to industry and to manufacturing.

I might mention a crude example, which relates to our natural products. Some years ago one of my friends wanted to make a starch from potatoes, and he could not find out from scientists in Canada the most modern method of doing so. Starch factories have now been established in my province, of course; but I remember that incident very well indeed and I think my friend had to get his information at that time from the United States.

I can give another example. In trying to make plywood out of eastern woods, we could not discover the particular type of glue that was necessary for the species of wood we wanted to use in Eastern Canada. Westerners had solved their own problem, but we ourselves had to find the most suitable method for Eastern Canada.

Again may I say I am wondering about the tie-in between the manufacturing industry and the result of this conference which Senator Lamontagne has in mind. It is wonderful to know all these things, but we have to apply them to Canadian industry in order to compete in the markets of the world.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is it your pleasure to adopt the motion in amendment?

Hon. Maurice Lamontagne: Honourable senators, I would like to speak just for a few minutes on the amendment.

[Translation]

First, I would like to thank very sincerely Senator Langlois and the Leader of the Opposition, who were kind enough to support the motion I introduced yesterday, and also for having understood its true scope.

[English]

I would like to thank those who have participated in this debate and who have supported this motion. I am quite sure that my colleagues and I will do our best to make this new undertaking a success.

May I emphasize that this new undertaking is really within the scope of the activities of the committee. We will approach it with the same prudence and the same dedication with which we have approached our work since 1968.

• (1530)

I suppose I could at this stage express my view about the amendment, since I am the sponsor of the main motion. Before this amendment is carried by the chamber I should like to indicate that I was made aware yesterday that this amendment would be proposed today. I want to indicate to the house that I do not intend at this stage to object to it.

Finally, I wish to thank Senator Burchill for the support he has given to this motion and I wish to tell him that the real purpose of the conference and of the establishment of the commission would be exactly as he said, to bring the knowledge of the experts and the results of their research closer to the users of that information, namely, private and public organizations, including the manufacturing industry, so that our industrial leaders will have the kind of information that they do not have at the moment. It will be in a usable form so that—as you expect, Senator Burchill, and as you expect, Senator Paterson—they will be in a better position not only to develop but also to export.

Hon. Mr. Carter: Honourable senators, if I understood the wording of the motion in amendment, it is:

> That the Special Committee of the Senate on Science Policy be authorized to organize and hold a special meeting—

To my mind that indicates a special meeting of the committee.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Why not?

Hon. Mr. Carter: The intent of the original motion, as I understood it, was to hold a special meeting of more than just the committee.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Of course. The committee can hear anybody it wants to hear.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: You could have the whole world at a special meeting.

Hon. Mr. Carter: I was not quite clear that that interpretation could be placed on the wording.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: There is no problem at all. It could be either "conference" or "meeting".

Hon. Mr. Lamontagne: The wording, Senator Carter, is quite acceptable at this stage, I believe, and it covers the activities we have in mind.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: I wonder if I might make the suggestion, following Senator Carter's observation, that the letters "s" and "m" in "special meeting" be capitalized in the resolution.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Agreed.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: If the mover of the amendment would accept that, I think it would help Senator Carter, and make the intent clearer.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: I have no objection to that at all.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is it your pleasure to adopt the motion in amendment?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion as amended agreed to.

Hon. Mr. Forsey: Honourable senators, do I understand the main motion, as amended, has carried?

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Yes, but technically, if you want to speak on the motion as amended, Senator Forsey, you may do so.

Hon. Mr. Forsey: Heaven forfend!

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 11 a.m.

THE SENATE

Friday, July 20, 1973

The Senate met at 11 a.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

REGULATIONS AND OTHER STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS

STANDING JOINT COMMITTEE—MESSAGE FROM COMMONS CONCURRING IN QUORUM

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, a message has been received from the House of Commons as follows:

> That the quorum of the Joint Committee of the Senate and House of Commons on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments be fixed at seven (7) members, provided that both Houses are represented, whenever a vote, resolution or other decision is taken, and that the Joint Chairmen be authorized to hold meetings and receive evidence so long as five (5) members are present, provided that both Houses are represented; and
>
> That a Message be sent to the Senate to acquaint Their Honours thereof.

ELECTORAL BOUNDARIES READJUSTMENT ACT

BILL TO SUSPEND—FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-208, to suspend the operation of the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. Paul Martin: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 44(1)(f), I move that this bill be read the second time later this day.

Motion agreed to.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Hon. Paul Martin tabled:

> Report of the Northern Canada Power Commission, including its accounts and financial statements and the Auditor General's report thereon, for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1973, pursuant to section 24 of the Northern Canada Power Commission Act, chapter N-21, and section 75(3) of the Financial Administration Act, chapter F-10, R.S.C., 1970.

INTERNAL ECONOMY

SUPPLEMENTARY BUDGET OF NATIONAL FINANCE COMMITTEE TABLED

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration has examined and approved the supplementary budget presented to it by the Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance for the proposed additional expenditures of the said Committee on National Finance with regard to its examination and consideration of such legislation and other matters as may be referred to it, authorized by the Senate on March 15, 1973.

SUPPLEMENTARY BUDGET OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE ON SCIENCE POLICY TABLED

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration has examined and approved the supplementary budget presented to it by the Chairman of the Special Senate Committee on Science Policy for the proposed additional expenditures of the said Committee on Science Policy respecting the holding of a special meeting to determine the feasibility of establishing a Commission on the Future, as authorized by the Senate on July 19, 1973.

TRANSPORT AND COMMUNICATIONS

REPORT OF COMMITTEE ON RADIO AND TELEVISION COMMERCIAL ADVERTISING BROADCAST IN CANADA PRESENTED—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Maurice Bourget: Honourable senators, I have the honour to present the report of the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications on Radio and Television Commercial Advertising Broadcast in Canada.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Hon. Maurice Bourget moved, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(f), that the report be adopted now.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Explain.

Hon. Mr. Bourget: Honourable senators, on May 24, 1973, Senator Sidney L. Buckwold moved the following motion in the Senate:

> That the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications be authorized to examine and report upon the question of the advisability of steps being taken to ensure that all radio and television commercial advertising broadcast in Canada be completely produced in Canada, utilizing Canadian manpower to the maximum possible extent.

This motion was adopted on the same day, and the question was referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications.

The committee held its first meeting on May 30, at which time it was agreed that it would be desirable to have the study completed before the summer recess.

The committee invited representative organizations to present briefs and, if possible, to appear before the committee to answer questions. With very few exceptions, those invited responded favourably and appeared before the committee.

It should be made clear that at this point the committee felt it advisable to hear invited groups only, in order to develop a general reaction by interested parties on the impact of the motion.

The hearings commenced on Tuesday, July 10 and continued through July 11 and 12, with morning and afternoon sittings each day.

I should like now to give a short resumé of the briefs presented to the committee.

The first witness to appear before the committee was Agency Forum. It represents 52 small and medium-sized advertising agencies, all of which are Canadian owned and operated. This presentation was in favour of the motion and suggested that the government publish and enforce "Guidelines for Good Corporate Citizenship," and that the television and radio advertising industry should be asked to abide by these guidelines which would involve an increased percentage of Canadian content.

The submission emphasized the importance of the cultural impact of advertising, and concluded with the following words:

> We sincerely believe that the overall result of implementing this proposal would be freer trade in a fairer market that more closely reflects a cultural milieu created by ourselves.
>
> We also believe that if Canada is not soon to become simply a marketing-module in a multinational society with head offices in New York, then now is the time for our Government to act.

The second organization to appear before the committee was the J. Walter Thompson Company Limited. This company is an American-owned, multinational agency which has operated in Canada for 43 years. It is one of the largest advertising agencies in Canada. Although foreign controlled, this agency is operated almost exclusively by Canadians. This brief pointed out that about 68 per cent of the English-language and 76 per cent of the French-language television commercials are produced in Canada. It was pointed out to the committee that there has been a small but significant increase in Canadian advertising production during the last five years. This agency agreed in principle with the objectives of the motion, but warned that there could be adverse repercussions to the industry generally if 100 per cent Canadian content was insisted upon.

● (1110)

This brief concluded by indicating that the continued growth of Canadian commercial production is a positive and attainable goal. It was pointed out that there is a need for further information and they suggested it is essential before action is taken that the subject be thoroughly researched.

The third witness was the Association of Canadian Television and Radio Artists, known as ACTRA.

No written brief was received from this organization, but a very extensive and informative oral presentation was made. The Association of Canadian Television and Radio Artists represents the English segment of professional performing and writing talent in the recorded media. The spokesman for this organization said:

> We believe that the survival of Canada as a distinct nation is linked directly with communications.

He pointed out the difficulties experienced by Canadian talent in obtaining employment, and that increased production of Canadian-made television and radio commercials would open up many job opportunities for Canadians involved in this field. It was emphasized that it would be difficult to achieve 100 per cent Canadian content because of geographic and climatic limitations.

ACTRA considers that the number of commercials made outside of Canada is "inordinately excessive." It was also stated that foreign produced commercials have a very clear and, perhaps, undue influence and impact on our culture. ACTRA emphasized that a substantial field of talent was available, and the committee was assured that Canadians were well able to provide professional know-how in making Canadian production possible. ACTRA did not consider the increase in the number of Canadian produced advertisements over the past five years as being adequate. It was very strongly in favour of the objectives of the motion.

[Translation]

The fourth witness was L'Union des Artistes from Montreal.

L'Union des Artistes is a professional union of more than 1,550 paid-up members and more than 800 trainees, including announcers, singers, comedians, dancers and others, all performing in the theatre, films, radio, television, dubbing and commercials.

In their brief, they state that the situation of French-speaking performers is just about the same as that of their English-speaking colleagues because, as they say, if the latter have to fight against the invasion of American culture, they have much to do to avoid being submerged by the increasingly marked invasion of productions from France and French-speaking countries.

This organization says it is affected by the importation of commercials. In the cultural field, the meaning of these commercials, in their opinion, reflect in no way our Canadian way of life.

The brief also mentions that the French synchronization of American commercials involves hiring only one or two announcers who, ordinarily, are already full-time employees of radio or television stations.

The group estimates that the production of these same commercials in Canada would bring jobs to hundreds of Canadian technicians, producers, writers and performers, which would help greatly in a more rapid establishment of a profitable film industry.

[English]

Our fifth witness was the McConnell Advertising Company Limited. This is a large Canadian owned and operated advertising agency. The brief emphasized the importance of the cultural impact of advertising and indicated that advertising contributed "to the moulding of a distinctive Canadian identity and a significant fact in the development of a culture for our nation." It was suggested that a realistic goal would be to see 80 per cent Canadian-produced television and radio commercials as an optimum level to be achieved by 1977. This brief recommended that incentives should be created to encourage domestic production of radio and television commercials rather than penalties imposed for the importation of materials produced in foreign countries.

This agency proposed that:

> a company producing commercials for radio or television in Canada be allowed to claim 150 per cent of the cost of production of the commercial as a deductible expense when calculating its corporate taxes.

Our sixth witness was the Association of Canadian Advertisers Incorporated. It is a non-profit service organization with a membership of over 200 Canadian advertisers whose combined budgets form approximately 75 per cent of the total amount spent on national advertising. This brief emphasized the difficulties that would be encountered in advertisers achieving 100 per cent Canadian content. The ACA expressed sympathy with the objectives. It was considered that the present rate of expansion of Canadian-made television and radio commercials was satisfactory, and that advertisers were responding to the request of the CRTC for increased Canadian production. It was indicated that there could be adverse effects on the advertising revenue of television and radio stations, in that increased production costs for some advertisers might result in a shift in the use of advertising media.

This brief concluded as follows:

> The Association of Canadian Advertisers is in favour of progressively increasing the use of Canadian produced commercials. The Association does not, however, believe that it is advisable at this time to take steps to ensure that all radio and television advertising be completely produced in Canada.

Our seventh witness was The Canadian Broadcasting League. It is an affiliation of associations and individual members, including 32 principal national and regional organizations. The Canadian Broadcasting League requested regulations requiring 100 per cent Canadian content. Under questioning from the committee, they agreed that some exceptions would be necessary. The brief concluded as follows:

> The Canadian Broadcasting League, therefore, urges that this Committee act to ensure that all commercial content of radio and television programming be produced in Canada, and utilizes Canadian resources to the maximum possible extent, to reflect the tastes and character of Canadians.

Our eighth witness was Mr. Sidney Handleman, member of the Ontario Legislature. He is also a member of the Ontario Select Committee on Economic and Cultural Nationalism, but he made it very clear that the views he expressed were his own and not those of the committee. He made available to our committee copies of a study of the advertising industry made for the Ontario committee by Kates, Peat, Marwick and Company. This publication provided our committee with valuable background statistical information. He pointed out that their studies indicated that, while 70 per cent of the commercials are now being produced in Canada, the 30 per cent which are imported represent a great deal more in dollar value. Mr. Handleman, while agreeing with the importance of Canadian content, stated:

● (1120)

> I am philosophically opposed to 100 per cent content because there are many examples where it would be completely unworkable.

The next witness was the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. The CBC stressed that its main interest lies in the field of broadcasting. The corporation agreed that greater Canadian content in advertising is desirable, but stated that private broadcasters affiliated with the CBC expressed concern if restrictions were imposed on foreign-made advertising. These affiliated stations feared a substantial loss of revenue.

It was also stated that if such restrictions were made it is possible that advertisers might switch to other media and perhaps would make greater use of U.S. broadcast stations serving border areas.

The CBC stated that progress is being made toward the greater Canadianization of commercials on Canada's broadcast media. It would be happy to co-operate in assisting Canadian advertisers to achieve this objective.

Our last witness was the Canadian Radio-Television Commission. The CRTC considers this subject very important, not only to Canadian performers but also to Canadian production companies and all those who are employed in the industry. It was most emphatically stated to the committee that the CRTC has been seriously considering this subject for a number of years. In the late winter of 1970 Mr. Pierre Juneau, who, as you know, is Chairman of the CRTC, expressed the opinion of the commission that advertisers should regulate themselves in this regard and make their commercials in Canada. This request was reiterated in a speech to the Association of Canadian Advertisers in May, 1972.

In its brief to our committee it stated:

> The CRTC has watched with considerable interest to see the effects the appeals to advertisers to produce their commercials in Canada have had.

And after thoroughly reviewing the results the commission has concluded that "in today's context the situation now calls for formal regulatory action."

The commission considered also that in the case of radio "there is no doubt that a 100 per cent Canadian commercial production requirement should be established."

The brief of the CRTC concluded as follows, and this is my last quotation:

> The CRTC is convinced the necessary competence exists in Canada and that substantially improved performance can now be required of advertisers in this country. The Commission is of the opinion generally that television commercials are extremely important showcases, both for the best Canadian creative talent and for Canadian companies and products, and consequently should be conceived and produced within our borders. It must not be forgotten that extremely important values are communicated through commercials with even more precision, often, than through programming. It is important that these values grow out of our society, not out of another, perhaps inappropriate milieu, with different institutions and public goals. Canadian commercials should be connected with the Canadian imagination, with Canadian needs, and be able to reflect better the use and role of products and services in Canadian life.

In addition to the foregoing witnesses who appeared, written communications were received from the following: the CTV Television Network Ltd.; Century II Studios Ltd., Edmonton, Alberta; and CKLW-TV, Windsor, Ontario.

Hon. Mr. Martin: That last one is very important!

Hon. Mr. Bourget: It was brought to the attention of the committee that a ban on the use of American-produced commercials could create problems for border television and radio stations.

Evidence given to the committee revealed the growing importance of the production of television commercials being made in Canada for use by American advertisers in the United States. Several witnesses indicated apprehension as to the possibility of loss of business in this field. This matter requires further investigation.

As a result of these hearings the committee agreed in principle to the objective of the resolution.

The committee recommends that television and radio commercials should be made in Canada to the maximum possible extent. It is recognized that common sense and practical realities may require some limitation to this objective. It is also appreciated that a reasonable period of time would be required for implementation.

In the opinion of the committee, the evidence received indicates that there is reason for concern by Canadians generally in this important field of activity. Consequently, and in order to avoid duplication of effort and expenditure, we urge that the CRTC undertake in-depth studies, consultations and public hearings that will lead to appropriate regulations designed to achieve the objectives of this committee.

The committee is grateful to the groups and individuals who made such a meaningful contribution to the hearings. I would also like to commend the clerks, stenographers and translators who gave so unselfishly of their time.

[Translation]

Personally, as vice-chairman of that committee, I would very much like to thank honourable senators who were members of the committee, as well as other senators—and there were many—who, although not members of the committee, showed considerable interest, first by attending the sittings and also by taking an active part in the deliberations.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Especially Senator Lapointe.

Hon. Mr. Bourget: Well, I do not want to indulge in personalities, as chairman I must be impartial, but I support what Senator Langlois has just said.

So, I want to thank my colleagues, first for their regular attendance and also for their wholehearted co-operation in performing the task we had been assigned; as reported—I must be allowed to say so—by the newspapers, several witnesses who appeared before the committee said that the senators "had done their homework."

[English]

Hon. Edgar E. Fournier: Honourable senators, as a member of the committee recommending the adoption of this report, may I say a few words.

[Translation]

First I wish to thank Senator Bourget for having volunteered to replace Senator Haig, Chairman of the Committee on Transport and Communications, now confined to his home because of illness.

I take this opportunity to wish him a prompt recovery; I can assure him his committee is in very good hands and is getting all the attention it deserves from Senator Bourget and all the members of the committee.

● (1130)

[English]

It has been my privilege to attend most of the meetings of this committee, which undertook the task of studying some of the problems in Canada with respect to advertising on television and radio. True, I was not an active member of the committee, for reasons of which you are all aware. However, I at least found an empty chair, which provided me with the facilities to listen to many of the witnesses who appeared before the committee. Senator Bourget covered the details of the subject very well in his report, and urged the committee's recommendations. I can add nothing that would be of merit.

During the last few days in this chamber we have heard many senators expressing their worries with respect to the future, and I share many of their views. We are fast declining and our destiny is clouded. In the Senate we are aware of these problems. We have great responsibilities, so let us do now what we can without expecting to accomplish everything at once. By adopting this report we will be filling an urgent need and curing some of the trouble in our society. I therefore recommend without hesitation the approval of this report.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Paul Deschatelets: I would like to say a few words on the occasion of the tabling of Senator Bourget's report, first, to commend the initiative taken by Senator Buckwold and also to commend Senator Bourget for his competence as chairman of the committee meetings.

I want to take the opportunity of the tabling of this report to voice the hope that in future—and particularly when we come back this fall—we will be able, in certain areas of our society, to initiate inquiries of this kind, both rapid and efficient which will permit us to provide a forum for the groups which have problems as in this case and which has enabled artists as well as all those who make a living from radio and television advertising to air their views before the CRTC.

I think that in future we can shed some light on several other areas so as to obtain an inquiry as rapid and efficient as that conducted by this committee.

This week, by chance, I spoke with a Montreal movie producer who frankly confessed that he had just discovered the Senate's possibilities. They are very proud of what has been done. I think that in future we could take advantage of our possibilities so as to provide a forum for several sectors of our population in the way this inquiry was conducted.

I congratulate Senator Bourget and all committee members.

Hon. Azellus Denis: I will say just a few words, honourable senators. Since I was a member of that committee and having been praised by the chairman, I wish to extend the same courtesy to him and pay a special tribute to the chairman of this committee as well as to Senator Buckwold who undertook this inquiry.

Like all of you, I wish that these claims become reality. I do not want advantage be taken of it to make advertising less Canadian, less French, especially over French radio and television broadcasting networks.

Then, if we are to reflect the French-Canadian culture, the French-Canadian way of life, I hope our artists and advertising agents will not use these additional advertisements—which they will be producing—as a channel to display our shortcomings. I hope as well that these will not feature more "joual," swearing or racism because I believe we have enough of that as it is.

As far as I am concerned, I will say, like the title of one of these plays that they composed, "Moi, j'ai mon voyage."

[English]

Hon. Mr. Bourget: Honourable senators, may I ask that this report be printed in the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate of this day?

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Mr. Martin: Honourable senators, before we agree, I would like to say that we are all very grateful to Senator Bourget and his colleagues on the committee for their work. Senator Bourget is substituting for Senator Haig, who is regrettably still ill.

[Translation]

We may assure Senator Bourget that we are deeply grateful to him.

[English]

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

On motion of Senator Macdonald, debate adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

On the Notice of Motion to adjourn:

Hon. Leopold Langlois: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), I move that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until Tuesday, July 24, 1973, at 8 o'clock in the evening.

[Hon. Mr. Deschatelets.]

Hon. Mr. Martin: Honourable senators, before the motion is agreed to, if that is to be its disposition, I would simply like to say, as I indicated to the Leader of the Opposition this morning, that my appreciation of the situation now is that on Tuesday next we will continue the debate on the second reading of Bill C-208, an act to suspend the operation of the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act, which I hope will be commenced today. We may then have the Immigration bill. As a matter of fact, I have just been handed a note to the effect that they expect that bill to be passed by 1 o'clock this afternoon.

● (1140)

With regard to the bill dealing with capital punishment, I believe it is the intention of the other place to proceed with the amendments to the Criminal Code on Monday. They have not succeeded in reaching an agreement which would have met the conditions laid down by the leader of the house in the other place. However, on Tuesday, they will interrupt those proceedings to deal with third reading of the Olympic bill, which has to be passed.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: What a mess!

Hon. Mr. Martin: After that bill has been passed, they will proceed with the amendments to the Criminal Code. I cannot give honourable senators any better information. I hope that my forecast of the work planned for the days ahead is accurate.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I suppose that when the other place starts dealing with the amendments to the Criminal Code, the Senate will then adjourn for about three weeks.

Hon. Mr. Martin: I would hope that the other place could deal with the measure expeditiously. Perhaps they might follow our example by disposing of secondary matters expeditiously.

Motion agreed to.

CANADA-UNITED STATES INTERPARLIAMENTARY GROUP

SPEAKER REQUESTED TO SEEK MEETING RE MOVEMENT OF ALASKAN OIL DOWN WEST COAST OF BRITISH COLUMBIA

Hon. Alan Macnaughton: Honourable senators, I rise to ask honourable senators for leave to present a motion. The motion will speak for itself. I do not think any preamble is necessary in this case, and I hope that honourable senators will agree to the motion which I now present. I therefore move, seconded by Senator Grosart, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(h):

> That the Honourable the Speaker be requested to seek an immediate meeting of the Canada-United States Interparliamentary Group, so that Canadian parliamentarians can make known to their United States counterparts their views on the movement of Alaskan oil down the west coast of British Columbia and through the Strait of Juan de Fuca.

During the month of April, from April 4 to 8, 1973, the Canada-United States Interparliamentary Group met in Washington to discuss the question of the movement of Alaskan oil. My purpose is not to suggest that we pound the table, but to suggest that this is the right time for Canadian parliamentarians to communicate to their opposite numbers in the United States their views on the movement of Alaskan oil on the west coast of British Columbia.

Hon. Allister Grosart: Honourable senators, when I first heard that an identical resolution had been passed unanimously in the other place, I had some reservations about it. I am now happy to second the resolution in view of information that has come to my attention since my first reaction. My reservation related to the fact that the resolution uses the word "the" with respect to identifying the Canadian-U.S. group fairly clearly with a specific group which is an interparliamentary organization already in existence.

Having regard for the history of that group, I was a little concerned that it might put the Canadian members of the group in the position of being a pressure group. In the past the tendency at meetings of the group has been to discuss Canadian-U.S. relations as a package in an overview sense rather than to concentrate on one specific "irritant," to use a word that has become common.

Indeed, in the report of the last meeting of the group presented to this chamber, great emphasis was placed on the fact that the consensus of that meeting was that in future we should try to concentrate on co-ordinating our positions and viewpoints in those matters where we have common interests, particularly in the international field, rather than deal with specific "irritants."

However, on reflection, it seems to me that it could be asked, "What is the use of a group such as this if, when a real problem arises between Canada and the United States, the good services of this group might not be involved?" I have said on many occasions that I believe there is a great role in international relations to be played on what I call the third level, the parliamentary level, by parliamentarians as parliamentarians, rather than as cabinet ministers or members holding specific responsibility in foreign affairs.

For that reason, I commend this resolution, in identical terms to that passed in the other place, to the consideration of the Senate.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Mr. Martin: I should like to make an observation which is perhaps in the form of an interrogation, on the terms of the resolution. It says "That the Honourable the Speaker be requested." I presume there will be a meeting between the two Speakers to arrange for the necessary personnel in the usual way?

The Hon. the Speaker: Very shortly.

Motion agreed to.

PARLIAMENT HILL

STATEMENT BY MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS RE EXPROPRIATION OF CERTAIN LAND AND BUILDINGS IN SURROUNDING AREA

Hon. Paul Martin: Honourable senators, I am grateful to Senator McIlraith for reminding me that the Minister of Public Works made an announcement this morning of some importance to both Houses of Parliament. He has, on behalf of the government, filed a Notice of Intent to expropriate all the land and buildings in the area bounded by Wellington Street, Elgin Street, Sparks Street and Bank Street.

The purpose of this expropriation is to protect the environment of Parliament Hill from any development which would adversely affect it and, simultaneously, to provide an appropriate expansion of parliamentary facilities and government requirements. The property of the United States Embassy is excluded. Discussion for its acquisition is now under way.

The Minister of Public Works also announced the intention of the government to appoint a commission on Parliamentary Accommodation, comprised of present and former members of Parliament, which includes, of course, members of this house, representing all parties in the Senate and in the House of Commons, to assist in the planning of the development of this area.

CUSTOMS TARIFF (No. 2)

BILL TO AMEND—THIRD READING

Hon. Leopold Langlois moved the third reading of Bill C-195, to amend the Customs Tariff (No. 2).

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

ELECTORAL BOUNDARIES READJUSTMENT ACT

BILL TO SUSPEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Chesley W. Carter moved the second reading of Bill C-208, to suspend the operation of the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act.

He said: Honourable senators, the main purpose of this bill is to do exactly what the title says, to suspend the operation of the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act. However, it does have a second and unrelated purpose, which is to correct a defect in the existing apparatus designed to adjust our electoral boundaries following a decennial census.

Perhaps the best way to explain Bill C-208 is to begin with a thumbnail sketch of the machinery by which representation in Canada's House of Commons is determined. This representation is governed by three separate acts—the British North America Act, the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act and the Representation Commissioner Act.

The British North America Act sets forth the total number of members of Parliament, which is fixed at 263. It also, however, includes rules by which members of Parliament may be distributed amongst the provinces, and some of these rules affect the fixed total. Among these rules is one that is known as the Senatorial Floor. That rule states that no province can have fewer members of Parliament than the number of senators representing that province. There is also the 15 per cent rule, which means that no province, following a decennial census, can have its number of elected representatives reduced by more than 15 per cent at one time, and there is another rule which states that no province can have fewer members of Parliament than that of another province with a smaller population.

The Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act sets forth the formula for the mathematical application of the number of representatives by population. It provides the tolerance margins within which the population of ridings may be varied. This tolerance is set at a level of 25 per cent, plus or minus, which means that the population can vary from 25 per cent below the average to 25 per cent above the average.

The Representation Commissioner Act sets out the machinery to be used in adjusting electoral boundaries and the steps to be followed throughout the process. This machinery consists of, first, a Representation Commissioner whose headquarters are located in Ottawa and, secondly, a four-man provincial commission for each province. The present Representation Commissioner is Mr. Nelson Castonguay who, himself, is an ex officio member of each provincial commission. His duties include the appointment of the chairmen of the provincial commissions who, wherever possible, are selected from the judges of the provincial supreme courts or, otherwise, from the judges of the lower courts.

In addition to the chairmen and the Representation Commissioner there are two other members of each provincial commission and they are appointed by the Speaker of the House of Commons.

Following a decennial census, the law requires the 10 provincial commissions to be appointed and instructs them to carry out the following steps in the sequence provided in the act. First, they hold public hearings at which both members of Parliament and constituents can appear and make representations. These hearings generally require a period of six months. After the hearings are completed each commission compiles a report, including maps, which is sent to the Representation Commissioner here in Ottawa, who in turn forwards it to the Speaker of the House of Commons, who tables it in Parliament. Then follows a 30-day period, during which any ten members of Parliament may register objections to these reports. Fifteen sitting days after the expiry of the 30-day period a debate on the report must take place in Parliament, and there is no time limit on this debate.

● (1200)

At the end of the debate, the reports go back to the provincial commissions, who then have 30 days more to consider the objections raised by the members of Parliament concerned and in the debate in the other place. The commissions may or may not act on these objections, but after 30 days they must send these reports, either revised or unchanged, to the Representation Commissioner. When all 10 reports have been received, the Representation Commissioner prepares a draft representation order, which he then forwards to the Secretary of State, who is obligated by law to proclaim it within five days. On proclamation the representation order comes into force, new boundaries come into existence and become part of the law.

At the present time this procedure has reached the stage where objections have been raised to nine of the ten reports made by the provincial commissions. The one exception is that of Prince Edward Island, where no objections were raised at all. Some of these reports have been debated in Parliament and others have not.

This is where Bill C-208 comes into the picture. This bill suspends the procedure at the stage at which it is now, or will be at the point in time when Bill C-208, if passed, receives royal assent. It discharges the provincial commissions and freezes the boundaries as they are now based on the 1961 census. The whole apparatus remains suspended until December 31, 1974, a period of 18 months. The reason for this suspension is to enable the government to consider possible alternative systems, which it will place before Parliament for consideration. It is obvious that the present system is not working very well, and certainly not to the satisfaction of the provinces or the MPs and their constituents.

A great deal of discussion took place in the Committee of Privileges and Elections of the other place on whether the 18-month period was too long and should be shortened. However, the evidence given by Mr. Castonguay, the Representation Commissioner, and by Mr. Hamel, the Chief Electoral Officer, confirmed that both felt that 18 months was a reasonable period.

The expiry date acts as an impetus to government to find possible alternate proposals, and to Parliament to act on them. It also protects the public from undue prolongation of the suspension and all the consequences that could evolve from that. If within 18 months the government has not come up with any new proposals, then Bill C-208 expires, the suspension is lifted, and the commissions are re-established. The procedure theoretically proceeds from the point where it was stopped. In practice, however, because of changes in personnel that are sure to take place, the provincial commissions will likely be required to hold some public hearings.

The second purpose of Bill C-208 is to correct a defect or oversight in the present machinery. If the present proceedings, which I have just described, were not interrupted by Bill C-208 and were instead allowed to continue as they have been, the debate that has been going on in the other place would continue, and would probably end some time after Parliament reconvenes in the fall. When the debate has ended the reports have to be returned to the provincial commissions, who have then 30 days to consider the objections that have been raised, and after 30 days they must send them back to the Representation Commissioner. The Representation Commissioner then drafts the representation order and forwards it to the Secretary of State for proclamation.

Within that time frame, it would be late December, 1973, before the representation order could be proclaimed and the new boundaries become law. Then the Chief Electoral Officer must begin adjusting his machinery to the new boundaries; polls have to be transferred from the old boundaries to the new, returning officers appointed, approved and trained. It takes approximately one year before the necessary adjustments can be completed, and during this time it would not be possible to hold any election at all. This means that under present circumstances an election could not be held during 1974, or until very late in 1974. This would hold true in the future following every decennial census during the 12-month period following the proclamation of the new boundaries. This is obviously an intolerable situation.

● (1210)

If it were not desirable to interfere with the present representation machinery, it would still be necessary to pass amending legislation to enable an election to be held at any time whatsoever. Of course, if any election is held between now and January 1, 1975, it will have to be held with the existing electoral boundaries.

Honourable senators, as you can see, this is a fairly short bill and from a legislative point of view it is fairly simple. However, it could have some very complex and far-reaching effects. Personally, I feel no good purpose can be served, because of the nature of this bill, by sending it to a Senate committee. However, if honourable senators have some insistence on sending the bill to committee, I should be only too happy to make the necessary motion.

Honourable senators, taking the bill clause by clause, you will see that clause 2 merely suspends the operation of sections 20 to 27 of the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act until December 31, 1974.

Clause 3 terminates the present provincial commissions.

Clause 4 provides for the removal of the suspension.

Clause 5 provides for the re-establishment of the provincial commissions if the federal government fails to make new proposals before the end of 1974.

Then, clause 6 provides for the procedure to be followed after the suspension is removed.

Clause 7 is a very simple one and provides merely that clauses 4 to 6 of this bill shall be read as one with the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act.

Clause 8 is the important one, because it corrects the defect I referred to and enables elections to be held at any time. It amends the present act—which requires the new boundaries to come into existence immediately on proclamation—and states that the boundaries will come into force one year after the representation order has been proclaimed.

Honourable senators, that covers the essential points of the bill. If there are further questions, I shall be only too happy to do what I can to answer them.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: Honourable senators, if no other senator wishes to speak at this time, I would move the adjournment of the debate in the name of Senator John M. Macdonald, who is at the moment Acting Speaker, and thus prevented by the rules from moving it himself.

On motion of Senator Grosart, for Senator Macdonald, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, July 24, 1973, at 8 p.m.

THE SENATE

Tuesday, July 24, 1973

The Senate met at 8 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

FISHERIES DEVELOPMENT ACT

BILL TO AMEND—FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-4, to amend the Fisheries Development Act.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. Paul Martin: With leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 44(1)(f), I move that this bill be read the second time later this day.

Motion agreed to.

CANADA WILDLIFE BILL

FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-131, respecting wildlife in Canada.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. Paul Martin: With leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 44(1)(f), I move that this bill be read the second time later this day.

Motion agreed to.

IMMIGRATION BILL

FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-212, respecting certain immigration laws and procedures.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. Paul Martin: With leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 44(1)(f), I move that this bill be read the second time later this day.

Motion agreed to.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Hon. Paul Martin tabled:

Report of the Canadian Saltfish Corporation, including its accounts and financial statements certified by the Auditor General, for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1973, pursuant to section 32 of the Saltfish Act, chapter 37 (1st Supplement), and section 77(3) of the Financial Administration Act, chapter F-10, R.S.C., 1970.

Report on the administration of Part I of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Superannuation Act for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1973, pursuant to section 26 of the said act, chapter R-11, R.S.C., 1970.

Report of activities under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act for the Crop Year 1971-72, pursuant to section 12 of the said act, chapter P-16, R.S.C., 1970.

[Translation]

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

On the Question Period:

Hon. Martial Asselin: I would like to ask the Government Leader when this session will end, and what bills we can expect to receive for consideration within the next few days?

I intend to deal with a very special bill, that on the Olympic Games. I would therefore like to know when I will have time to prepare for that, because I have already made plans for next week. Can the Government Leader give me some indication of what we can expect?

Hon. Mr. Martin: I believe we will get the bill on the Olympic Games this week, Thursday, I hope. But I am not a clairvoyant.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: A supplementary. It seems that it was not discussed in the other place today. It is therefore difficult to foresee when we can receive it here, especially if it is not being dealt with in the other place. The Government Leader should at least be able to communicate with the House Leader to set up some priority system, so that we might know where we are going.

Hon. Mr. Martin: I discussed this matter only this afternoon with the government leader in the House of Commons, as it was also discussed at the Cabinet meeting.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Did you understand anything?

Hon. Mr. Martin: A little, yes.

Hon. Mr. Asselin: What did the Government Leader understand, if anything?

Hon. Mr. Martin: I believe I understood that I should be optimistic.

[English]

ELECTORAL BOUNDARIES READJUSTMENT ACT

BILL TO SUSPEND—SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from Friday, July 20, the adjourned debate on the motion of Senator Carter for the second reading of Bill C-208, to suspend the operation of the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act.

Hon. John M. Macdonald: Honourable senators, as Senator Carter pointed out in his very able and comprehensive explanation, this bill proposes to do three things. The first part provides for the suspension of the existing redistribution process. The second part provides for the reinstatement of that process unless it is changed by Parliament by January 1, 1975. The third purpose of the bill is to make sure that there is no period of time when it would be difficult, if not impossible, to hold an election following the introduction of a new system, or new boundaries under the old system.

Since this bill suspends the operation of the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act until January 1, 1975, it is only right that we should examine the reasons advanced for this action. It is only proper that we judge for ourselves if this action is justified in the public interest. I think the Senate is in a position to make the examination of the reasons advanced for the passage of this bill without laying itself open to the accusation of acting from selfish, ulterior or unworthy motives. I say this because I have seen some malicious criticism of the members of the other place. It has been implied—indeed, it has been stated—that they are influenced in this matter by selfish and unworthy motives. It has been stated that they are thinking only of their own election and not of the public good in this matter. Honourable senators, I think such criticism is wholly unjustified; I think it is wholly unfair and unreasonable. Indeed, it is an insult to a fine body of men and women, who are rendering great service to Canada, whose criticism of the present system is based on knowledge and experience, and who should be listened to with great respect.

In my opinion, the reasons advanced for the passage of Bill C-208 are good and valid. As has been pointed out by Senator Carter, the present law could result in a situation in which it would be physically impossible to have an election before late in 1974. This is a situation that is unacceptable in a democratic system of government. The sponsor of the bill, Senator Carter, showed how this can happen, and I shall not repeat what he said.

Certainly, when the proposed new electoral boundaries are objected to in nine provinces, it is time to take a hard look at the redistribution procedure. Personally, I think there is a major weakness in the system, and its correction will go a long way towards satisfying the public interest. The weakness is that there is not a real appeal against the findings or judgments of the provincial representation commissions. As Senator Carter mentioned, the only appeal is by way of objections raised in the House of Commons. The official record of the House of Commons containing such objections is sent to the representation commissions, which can accept or reject them. In other words, there is no real appeal. The objections are referred to the same body which made the findings in the first place, and the same objections were probably raised at the public hearings, so it is unrealistic to expect the commissions to make any changes. I suggest that an appeal be allowed from the findings of a provincial commission, even if it be to the Representation Commissioner or someone nominated by him so that the principle of the boundaries being set by an independent body would be maintained. I do not believe it is wise or practical for the electoral boundaries to be set by a committee of the House of Commons. That system was tried for years, and never was satisfactory.

The main objection to this bill is that by postponing the redistribution we violate the principle of representation by population. And, of course, this is so. This bill especially favours the rural voter over the urban voter. Since the last redistribution there has been a considerable movement of population to the cities. However, I think it should be remembered that in Canada the principle of representation by population has never been in effect in either provincial or federal politics. While we can admire the idea of representation by population where every person's vote is of equal value, it has just never been recognized as practical in Canada. This can be seen from the British North America Act itself. The Fathers of Confederation, in their wisdom, decided, for example, that the number of members elected to the House of Commons from a province would not go below the number of senators from that province. So right from the beginning the principle of representation by population has not been a part of our electoral system. The same is true today.

Under the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act there is allowed a 25 per cent variation over or under the standard used to determine the population of any constituency. So while it is true that there will be a variation in the number of voters in different constituencies, we must recognize that this variation is inevitable under our system. I do not think there is any substantial injustice in this situation. So far as I can learn, members of the House of Commons representing large city constituencies are not called upon to render the same service to their constituents as are members representing smaller constituencies. They are their representatives in Parliament, but I expect they are not called upon in the same manner as are members from rural or semi-rural areas. I know, for example, that a member from Nova Scotia is in many cases the contact between the individual citizen and the federal government. Let's face it, the federal government is a large organization situated many miles from the extreme ends of Canada, and in this day and age government affects the citizen in a great many ways. In the less populated areas the citizen must turn to his member of the House of Commons for a great variety of services. I know this is the custom and the system, and the members give a very valuable service, apart from any contribution they may make in the House of Commons itself.

I do not think it is a valid criticism to say that by postponing redistribution we are violating the principle of representation by population. If the passage of this bill has any adverse effect, because electoral boundaries will not have changed, it will be compensated, and more than compensated, by the good which will result.

Honourable senators, as the bill has been so well explained, I do not think there would be any point in sending it to a committee for further consideration.

[Translation]

Hon. Martial Asselin: Honourable senators, I should like to add a few words to what Senator Macdonald has just said with regard to the bill before us, in view of the fact that, in 1968, as a member of Parliament, I suffered from the decisions of the commission with regard to the redistribution. I feel that I have a right to say that, in general, when the redistribution of electoral boundaries is entrusted to them according to the law, the commissioners do not give enough consideration to the representations of public bodies who go before the commission.

I remember that when the commission sat, public bodies were advised only 15 days in advance; they were invited to appear if they had representations to make concerning the decision the commissioners were to take in the case of such or such a riding.

The same thing happened in 1968. At that time, 500 miles were added to the riding of Charlevoix ... I beg your pardon?

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Of coastline.

Hon. Mr. Asselin: Yes, 500 more miles of coastline were added to a riding that was quite large already. Public bodies appeared before the commission, but not one iota of the decisions to be made by the commission was changed. Moreover, I am told that consideration is being given—excuse me, could we have some quiet, as I am a little hoarse, and it is difficult for me to speak any louder, so I would ask the honourable senators to be patient, for I will not be long, as I would simply like to make a few comments.

I said that in 1968, in my riding, people had made representations to the commission, the Chamber of Commerce, and particularly the municipal councils, about the fact that even—I think that this is a mistake—if one simply wishes to consider the people that must be included in a riding, without considering the economic situation and geography of the riding, I think that the commission is making a basic mistake. One has to go beyond demographic factors. An electoral map cannot be divided up like a pie—like a blueberry pie or a sugar pie. You cannot simply say, here we are, we have to have one constituency for 50,000 voters, so let's divide the pie up, and get 50,000 or 45,000 voters. That was the mistake the commission made in 1968. They are still making that same mistake, and that is the reason, I believe, that the government has wisely suspended the application of this act, which created considerable injustices for those in the other place who are obliged to keep in constant contact with the people, to learn about their problems, to meet with public bodies, to discuss with them the difficulties they are having on the economic, political and social levels, so as to learn about their problems and to find solutions for them.

Just imagine, honourable senators, that one member has to cover 500 miles of coastline—I am speaking of the riding of Charlevoix—and now with the redistribution another 150 miles have been added. Moreover, if you consider the riding of Manicouagan, where the member has to travel thousands of miles to meet his constituents and discuss with them all their problems, it becomes an impossible task.

I therefore say that if the population element is maintained in the distribution of the electoral map in Canada it is at the expense of rural areas. In Montreal—and I refer now to the province of Quebec—some ridings may comprise up to 60,000 voters but the member can cover his riding in five hours whereas other ridings include between 30,000 to 35,000 voters over a distance of 500 miles and it is then impossible for the member to be in contact with the people as often as he would like to try to know their problems, as I said earlier.

I would like to make a digression and say that, before the government decides to implement the bill before us, which is of course suspended, the members should be given the required tools—and I speak from personal experience as I represented a rural riding for about twelve years and some of my colleagues here also represented rural areas—since it is humanly impossible for a member under the present circumstances to keep truly in touch with the people as well as with his constituents and discuss their problems with them. But if a member's task in his riding is not efficiently organized, it will become impossible.

I would only say that in my province the provincial member is entitled to secretaries in his riding. He also has in the riding an office paid for by the government. Those secretaries travel through the riding, meet the constituents, report to their member who sits in the House. It often happens that people have funny reactions. When their member is in Ottawa, they say they never see him. But to discharge his duties he must be in Ottawa, see to the adoption of legislation, discuss legislation in the interest of the population. If the member is in his constituency visiting or receiving his electors, people are happy because he is with them. But the important thing for a member is to be in the House in order to deal with and pass legislation which may be helpful to his constituents.

So I say that our federal members are poorly organized to look after the population and to fulfill their mandate. The government has recently taken decisions as to the assistance that a member may get in his constituency. I think that the House of Commons and the Senate, before coming back to pass this legislation later, will have first to be assured that members, in rural districts especially which involve great distances, as I said earlier, will be provided with the services and the tools they need to adequately discharge the responsibilities entrusted to them by the voters.

Like Senator Macdonald and Senator Carter who spoke before me on this bill, I support the suspension of its application. I would like the Government Leader to submit to the appropriate authorities the comments I made with a view to making the members' job easier, more efficient, so that they may be first of all legislators and then be given the tools, the necessary instruments to enable them to communicate in due time and as often as possible with the population in order to best serve it.

● (2020)

[English]

Hon. Chesley W. Carter: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I must inform the Senate that if Senator Carter speaks now his speech will have the effect of closing the debate.

Hon. Mr. Carter: Honourable senators, in closing the debate on second reading of this bill, there is little for me to say except to thank Senator Macdonald and Senator Asselin for their contributions to this debate, and for their very strong support of this bill.

I think Senator Macdonald put his finger on the weakness of our present system when he said that there was really no appeal from the decision of provincial commissions. In a democratic society there should be some sort of appeal. As a former member of the House of Commons, I can understand the experience described by Senator Asselin since I, too, found myself representing a long, coastal constituency. It had about 50,000 people distributed among 200 different communities, scattered, as I have said, along a coastline 1,000 miles long and for the most part accessible only by sea.

A minimum of eight weeks on a boat was required to travel from one end of my riding to the other. Even then I had to rush. I could not spend the necessary time to represent the constituency or properly meet the needs of the constituents. As Senator Macdonald pointed out, the principle of representation by population is idealistic and has never really been part of our system. It is an ideal almost impossible to attain in a country such as Canada. In addition to the representation of people, we must also consider other factors, such as the various communities of interest, the interests of the primary producers as against those who live in cities and whose contribution is mainly by way of services. Another factor to be considered is the vast geographical areas to be covered and, as Senator Asselin pointed out, the physical limitations of each elected representative and the quality of representation that he is able to give to his constituents. I thank Senator Macdonald and Senator Asselin very much for their contributions to this debate.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Langlois moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

IMMIGRATION BILL

SECOND READING

Hon. John J. Connolly moved the second reading of Bill C-212, respecting certain immigration laws and procedures.

He said: Honourable senators, a situation arose in the autumn of 1972 wherein the government felt that some action should be taken to deal with cases involving thousands of people entering this country each year as visitors and tourists and upon arrival seeking permanent residence. For a number of years, section 34 of the Immigration Regulations allowed those who had entered Canada as non-immigrants, visitors and tourists, to apply for permanent residence for a landing. In other words, they were allowed to immigrate to this country if they met certain tests. It might be appropriate to mention some of the tests which were required by the regulations. I quote from section 34(c):

> Notwithstanding section 28 an applicant in Canada who
>
> (a) if outside Canada would be an independent applicant; and
>
> (b) is not in possession of an immigrant visa or letter of pre-examination but, in the opinion of an immigration officer, would on application be issued a visa or letter of pre-examination if outside Canada; > may be admitted to Canada for permanent residence if . . .
>

● (2030)

It was quite clearly set out in this regulation that these non-immigrant people in Canada could, while they were still here, make application for permanent residence or landed immigrant status.

On November 6, 1972, an order in council identified as P.C. 1972-2502 was passed. It provided two things. First, it revoked section 34 of the Immigration Regulations, to which I have just referred. From then on persons who were not of immigrant status in Canada were prohibited from applying for immigrant status while they were in Canada.

Secondly, it amended regulation 28(1). The new amendment, which I propose to place on the record, reads as follows:

> 28(1) Every immigrant who seeks to land in Canada, including an immigrant who reports pursuant to subsection (3) of section 7 of the Act, shall be in possession of a valid and subsisting immigrant visa issued to him by a visa officer and bearing a serial number which has been recorded by the officer in a register prescribed by the Minister for that purpose, and unless he is in possession of such visa, he shall not be granted landing in Canada.

I should tell honourable senators that visas are issued only outside of Canada by or on behalf of Canadian immigration officials. In this connection, I place on the record sections 2(g) and (h) of the Immigration Regulations:

> "visa" means an impression stamped, in accordance with these Regulations, on a passport, a certificate of identity or any other form prescribed by the Minister.
>
> (h) "visa officer" means
>
> (i) an immigration officer stationed on duty outside of Canada and authorized by the Minister to issue visas or letters of pre-examination for the purpose of section 28—

It is unnecessary for me to quote the balance of the regulation at this time.

Since the present act has been in force, it has been assumed, with regard to applications made in Canada by visitors, tourists, persons not holding immigrant status, that their status has been governed by section 7(3) of the act, which is found in the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1970, chapter I-2, and which reads as follows:

> (3) Where any person who entered Canada as a non-immigrant ceases to be a non-immigrant or to be in the particular class in which he was admitted as a non-immigrant and, in either case, remains in Canada, he shall forthwith report such facts to the nearest immigration officer and present himself for examination at such place and time as he may be directed and shall, for the purposes of the examination and all other purposes under this Act, be deemed to be a person seeking admission to Canada.

Section 22, which deals with reports to Special Inquiry Officers, provides:

Where an immigration officer, after examination of a person seeking to come into Canada, is of opinion that it would or may be contrary to a provision of this Act or the regulations to grant admission to or otherwise let such person come into Canada, he may cause such person to be detained and shall report him to a Special Inquiry Officer.

Section 27(3) reads:

In the case of a person other than a person referred to in subsection (2)—

Those are persons who may be admitted to Canada.

—the Special Inquiry Officer shall, upon rendering his decision, make an order for the deportation of such person.

I am informed that approximately 1,750 appeals have been lodged by persons affected by deportation orders made under section 27(3). Some of those deportation orders were made prior to November 6, 1972, and some have been made since. Almost all of the appeals have been taken by, or on behalf of, visitors who entered Canada with non-immigrant status, and who had no visa issued to them by a Canadian immigration official abroad.

I am informed that on June 29, 1973, the Immigration Appeal Board handed down a ruling in the case of In re Nazarali. The board held at that time that section 28, as amended in the manner I indicated at the beginning of my remarks—which required an applicant to produce a visa—is beyond the authority conferred by the Immigration Act upon the Governor in Council.

If a non-immigrant, as such—that is, a visitor—enters Canada, the board has held that such persons need no visa and, in effect, that the provisions of the previously existing regulation 34, which was revoked by the order in council of November 6, 1972, may still be available to such persons.

Honourable senators, by clause 1 of this bill the government seeks a clear declaration that the Governor in Council had authority to pass Order in Council P.C. 1972-2502. By passing this clause, Parliament is asserting its authority to require that any person seeking immigrant status be in possession of a Canadian immigrant visa, with all that that implies.

I come now to the second part of the bill.

Hon. Mr. Benidickson: Before the honourable senator proceeds, would he permit a question?

Hon. Mr. Connolly: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Benidickson: I have heard a great deal about this problem. Am I to understand that there was a backlog of only 1,750 appeals in 1972?

[Hon. Mr. Connolly.]

Hon. Mr. Connolly: I understand that was the approximate number of appeals still outstanding on this point in the fall of 1972.

Hon. Mr. Benidickson: How many members of the board consider these appeals?

Hon. Mr. Connolly: I am afraid I do not have that information, but I will obtain it for the honourable senator and will let him have it tomorrow.

● (2040)

Honourable senators, on May 23, 1973, the Federal Court of Appeal issued judgment in the case of Koo Shew Wan. It was an unanimous judgment, the appeal being heard by Chief Justice Jackett, Mr. Justice Pratte, and Mr. Justice Perrier. That case dealt with applications for landed immigrant status made in Canada by non-immigrants—that is, visitors—before November 6, 1972, or prior to the coming into effect of the order in council to which I referred earlier.

The Federal Court of Appeal on that occasion held that the department had no authority to make deportation orders against such people because, it said, the department had no authority to require such people to produce a visa issued by a Canadian immigration officer abroad. The department, on its side, contended that applications by persons in Canada as visitors, as tourists, fall under section 7(3) of the act. I have already read that section.

The application of section 3, in turn, involves the use of a Special Inquiry Officer, and I have already referred to his status and function by quoting section 22 of the act. It also involves the requirement of a visa under regulation 28, as passed by order in council on November 6, 1972, and it involves the power to deport under section 27(3), which I have also read.

The department's legal advisers also maintain that the jurisprudence which has been built up in connection with these issues supports their position. They refer to the case of In re Podlaszecka in the Supreme Court of Canada, which is reported in (1972) Supreme Court Reports, at page 733, to the decision of the Ontario Court of Appeal in Regina v. Pringle, ex parte Milks, and also to the case of In re Otto Gloede.

By clause (2) of the bill now before us Parliament is asked to confirm that a non-immigrant who applied for permanent residence while in Canada is applying under section 7(3) of the act and so, as an immigrant, will require a visa. I am told that this clause will affect some 10,000 persons who have made applications. The question in my mind, as I read the material, is whether or not this is retroactive legislation. If the Court of Appeal of Ontario and the Supreme Court of Canada in the two cases I have cited are right, then this has always been the law. Parliament is asked to confirm that this is the law, despite the finding of the Federal Court of Appeal.

I understand that an application for leave to appeal has been filed by the department against the decision of the Federal Court of Appeal. However, as honourable senators—particularly those who are lawyers—are aware, the matter of bringing such appeals to an early conclusion is very difficult. There are certainly long delays. Therefore, it is felt by the government that these two declaratory sections should be enacted.

I commend this bill to the Senate.

Hon. Mr. Benidickson: Honourable senators, I do not propose to speak in this debate. I take pride in being a senator from an ethnic background, like Senator Yuzyk, and in that respect being rather different from some other members of this chamber.

I am concerned about the difference between 1,750 and 10,000. Who is going to be hurt and discriminated against as a result of Parliament's passing this legislation?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Honourable senators, I am sure we are all grateful to Senator Connolly—

Hon. Mr. Benidickson: Would the Honourable Senator Connolly answer my question?

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Later.

Hon. Mr. Connolly: If Senator Macdonald will permit me, I would say it is not reasonable to expect me to say how many of these cases that are under appeal are valid, and how many are not. It would also be impossible for me to give an answer in connection with the 10,000 applications which have been filed by visitors who want to establish permanent residence in Canada. I understand, and I think honourable senators have been so informed through the press and the media generally, that a great many people—perhaps many thousands of people—have been encouraged to come to this country by travel agents and others abroad on the misunderstanding that it is a simple matter, once they come as a visitor, to acquire landed immigrant status from within Canada.

The law, as I have explained it to the Senate, has always been that people who do not have landed immigrant status and who come to this country for a limited period of time do so on the understanding that they will leave Canada at the end of that period.

Hon. Mr. Benidickson: Tourists?

Hon. Mr. Connolly: Tourists, visitors—anyone in that temporary category. Those individuals have always been required to return to their country of origin, and to obtain there the visa that is required. That has been the law in Canada. At least, the department has always understood that to be the law. That is the way the law has been administered.

The two cases to which I have referred seem to give the lie to that proposition. It seems to me that the other decisions to which I have referred, namely, the decisions of the Court of Appeal of Ontario and the Supreme Court of Canada, do, in fact, maintain the department's position with reference to section 7(3).

It may be that people are going to be disaffected, but I think that what is paramount in this situation is the right of the federal authority to say who can come to this country and who cannot. I think that is the proposition with which we are confronted. We want immigrants here; we want to encourage immigration, but there has to be some screening process, and some control over the entry of undesirables.

Hon. Mr. Benidickson: My concern is with respect to the retroactivity.

Hon. Mr. Connolly: I am wondering whether there is a retroactive feature in this legislation. Frankly, I am not sure. I think there is a good argument to the effect that there is no retroactive feature. There is also an argument that there may very well be retroactivity. I raised that point because, like all honourable senators, I dislike retroactive legislation. I think that where there is a danger of having it, we should try to avoid it.

● (2050)

Hon. Mr. Yuzyk: Honourable senators, before Senator Macdonald speaks on this bill, may I ask in regard to what Senator Benidickson raised concerning the discrepancy in the figures given by Senator Connolly—

Hon. Mr. Connolly: There was no discrepancy.

Hon. Mr. Yuzyk: I believe you stated that there were 1,750 cases.

Hon. Mr. Connolly: No, I said that 1,750 appeals have been launched against decisions made by Special Inquiry Officers, but that 10,000 persons may be affected by Order in Council P.C. 1972-2502. There is no discrepancy in the figures.

Hon. Mr. Yuzyk: I should like to bring to the attention of the house that on this matter of the backlog of appeals the minister stated in the other place that as of June 1, 1973, there were 17,472 appeals, and that appeals were still being filed at the rate of 1,000 per month.

Hon. Mr. Connolly: Will the honourable senator give the reference for that in Hansard of the other place?

Hon. Mr. Yuzyk: I took it from Hansard.

Hon. Mr. Prowse: Of what date?

Hon. Mr. Yuzyk: From figures given by the Minister of Manpower and Immigration.

Hon. Mr. Prowse: What is the date?

Hon. Mr. Yuzyk: He was dealing with Bill C-197. I obtained those figures from the statement he made when he introduced the bill.

Hon. Mr. Connolly: I will have to look into that, because I have no knowledge of those figures. The figures given to me are the ones I have used.

Hon. Mr. Prowse: Would Senator Yuzyk be good enough to give the page of Hansard and the date, so that we can look it up ourselves and see the other figures?

Hon. Mr. Yuzyk: I do not have the reference in Hansard of the other place, but the figures I have here are taken from page 891 of Senate Hansard.

Hon. Mr. Molson: Honourable senators, I rise on a point of order. I think it has been well established over the years that in this chamber we do not refer to the proceedings of the other place. To base statements in this house on the reports of the proceedings of the other place would open up a whole new vista of argument. I believe I am safe in saying that it has been well established by custom and usage that we do not do that.

Hon. Mr. Connolly: In any event, I will check the point raised by Senator Yuzyk as expeditiously as I can, and I will report to him.

Hon. John M. Macdonald: Honourable senators, I am sure we are all grateful to Senator Connolly (Ottawa West) for his clear exposition of exactly what this bill proposes to do. We should also be grateful to him for the background he gave us showing why this bill is considered necessary.

As has been pointed out, it is a bill introduced to legalize two regulations which departmental officials believed at the time could be made under the authority of the Immigration Act, one of which the Immigration Appeal Board said could not be made and the other of which was declared invalid by the Federal Court. This bill contains only two clauses, which will have the effect of making those two regulations valid and legal, if they are not already valid and legal.

It has been said, I think correctly, that without these amending regulations the whole program as set out in Bill C-197, which we passed here the other day, would be nullified, because without the right to insist that a prospective immigrant first obtain a visa before coming to Canada there could be no effective control over immigration. If the Federal Court decision should stand, the effect on deportation orders would be simply disastrous. I believe we have no choice but to pass this bill in order to give effect to Bill C-197, which we have already approved.

Objections have been made to the passage of this bill, but those objections are directed more towards the way in which the regulations have been made than to what they contain. Many objections have been on the ground that this should be done not by legalizing regulations, but by amending the Immigration Act itself. I agree there is considerable merit in that point of view.

There is no doubt but that the bill is retroactive legislation, and this is always bad in principle. In practice it always seems to hurt innocent people. It usually hurts people who have acted in good faith under an existing law, and they should not be penalized by having the law changed after they have so acted. I suppose in this case it can be argued, with some justification, that the invalid regulations only tried to do what Parliament wanted done in the first place, so that no one was adversely affected. The answer to that, of course, is that Parliament should have made its intention known by amending the Immigration Act, and not by making regulations to effect the desired amendment.

The fate of the two regulations before the court raises a further and larger question. In this day and age a great many regulations are made. Almost every statute gives the right to make regulations, so the larger question raised, which I think causes justifiable concern, is: are all these other regulations that have been acted on valid? Are they all legal? I do not know how this question can be resolved. It is not practical to have every regulation in existence examined. I do know that under the Statutory Instruments Act proposed regulations must be examined by the Clerk of the Privy Council and the Deputy Minister of Justice to see if they are authorized by statute. I understand the two regulations in question here were so examined. However, no matter how learned in the law these men may be—and I am sure they are both eminent in that profession—they can only give an opinion in these cases. The courts held a different opinion.

It is too bad that this situation arose. However, since it has to be corrected I think the bill will have to pass. I hope that as a result of this situation greater attention will be paid to legislating by statute rather than by regulation, and that the power given in any statute to make regulations will receive very close examination. I do not see that any practical benefit would result from referring this bill to committee.

[Hon. Mr. Macdonald.]

Hon. John J. Connolly: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I should inform you that if the Honourable Senator Connolly speaks now his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on second reading of this bill.

Hon. Mr. Connolly: Honourable senators, I really have nothing to add, except to commend Senator Macdonald for his attitude with respect to the regulations. I think that Parliament is always confronted with the difficulty of endowing a minister—which in effect means a group of officials—with regulating authority, which we do so generally, and for which we really have no alternative if we are to make legislation work. There must be the power to make regulations. The only safeguard one can foresee is the use of the Statutory Instruments Act, which is a fairly recent act, which enables Parliament to examine the exercise of the regulatory authority.

Hon. Mr. Martin: It requires that they be examined.

Hon. Mr. Connolly: It requires that they be examined, yes, but in cases where it is suspected that the authority of the regulating agency is exceeded, it enables Parliament to put it right. Certainly the opinion of a law officer of the crown is fallible; it does not stand up against the adverse decision of a court. Even with the use of the Statutory Instruments Act, the court can still hold regulations to be ultra vires of the regulating authority. However, I think it is a matter over which parliamentarians and Parliament generally should be on the alert to watch the exercise of this regulating authority.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

● (2100)

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Connolly moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

FISHERIES DEVELOPMENT ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

Hon. Chesley W. Carter moved the second reading of Bill C-4, to amend the Fisheries Development Act.

He said: Honourable senators, Bill C-4 is very short, containing but one clause of less than one page. It amends section 5 of the Fisheries Development Act by adding to it paragraph (d), which will enable the minister, under certain conditions, to make payments for the construction and equipment of commercial ice-making units, ice-storing facilities, and fish-chilling units.

The real purpose of this amendment is to increase the earnings of small scale fishermen, that is, inshore fishermen, the small boat fishermen, by enabling them to prevent loss from fish spoilage and at the same time increase their earnings by producing a superior product.

To get a better idea of the importance of this amendment, it would be useful to recapitulate briefly the historical background of the Fisheries Development Act itself. Honourable senators will recall that in 1964 a federal-provincial conference was held on fisheries. At that conference agreement was reached on the need for a national fishery development program. This program was embodied in the Fisheries Development Act which was passed in the session of 1966-67.

Prior to 1966, such programs were initiated through specific budgetary appropriations instead of legislation. In other words, the needs were met one at a time as they arose, on a regional rather than on a national basis.

The purpose of the Fisheries Development Act was to bring about a coherent national fisheries development program by enabling the federal fisheries service to take the initiative in all aspects of fishery development. These included (1) the exploration and development of known fishery resources and the seeking of new resources; (2) the introduction and administration of new and improved fishing vessels, new equipment, new fishing techniques, new methods; (3) new technology resulting in new equipment and new fishery products; and (4) the improvement in fish handling methods, improvement in processing and distribution of fish products. In addition to these, it authorizes various kinds of development programs and assistance programs for the construction and equipment of fishing vessels.

Honourable senators, Bill C-4 initiates still another program in this series. It is aimed at minimizing the economic loss from fish spoilage and at the same time increasing the returns to fishermen by making possible a much better product. It has been estimated that 100 million pounds of fish are rejected annually by the inspection services as unfit for human consumption. In addition, 50 per cent of the inshore landings has been classed by fishery inspection as a second grade quality. This involves great loss to the fishermen, because low quality fish brings a very low price to the fishermen. The total economic loss resulting from rejected fish and low quality fish has been estimated at $25 million a year. This economic loss is borne almost entirely by the inshore fishermen, the small boat fishermen, commonly referred to as day fishermen because they leave their harbour in the morning and go out and fish during the day and return in the evening.

The main reason for this economic loss by the inshore fishermen is that these fishermen do not have access to ice or ice-making facilities or fish-chilling facilities. A survey which was carried out by the fisheries service estimated that the ice requirements of the industry as a whole was 2,600 tons per day more than is available. This survey also found that the requirements of the inshore fishermen, the small boat fishermen, could be taken care of by providing facilities in some 370 different locations. This is the program which Bill C-4 is designed to bring into existence.

Federal government assistance for ice making and refrigeration facilities is governed by section 5 of the Fisheries Development Act, which reads:

> The Minister may make payments to such persons or classes of persons, in such amounts and on such terms and conditions as may be prescribed by the Governor in Council,
>
> (a) for the construction and equipment of
>
> (i) commercial cold storages, or
>
> (ii) commercial bait freezing facilities equipped with mechanical refrigeration,
>
> that will be suitable for the preservation of fishery products;
>
> (b) for the modification of
>
> (i) commercial cold storages, or
>
> (ii) commercial bait freezing facilities equipped with mechanical refrigeration,
>
> to make such cold storages or bait freezing facilities suitable for the preservation of fishery products; and
>
> (c) for the construction and equipment of fishing vessels.

● (2110)

As stated earlier, Bill C-4 merely adds another paragraph to section 5, reading as follows:

> (d) for the construction and equipment of
>
> (i) commercial ice-making and ice-storing facilities, or
>
> (ii) commercial fish-chilling facilities
>
> that will contribute to improvements in productivity in commercial fishing operations.

Honourable senators will note that payments under section 5 are to be made "in such amounts and on such terms and conditions as may be prescribed by the Governor in Council . . ."

The terms and conditions contemplated for cost-sharing of initial programs under the amendment in Bill C-4 are 50 per cent of the cost of the facilities with a maximum ceiling of $25,000 for any one facility. These conditions are set by order in council and, of course, can be changed by order in council as circumstances require. Applications will be considered for assistance under this amendment from individual fishermen, groups of fishermen, co-operatives, companies and provincial governments. The total cost of the program has been estimated at $9 million spread over a period of two years.

Perhaps I should also explain that Bill C-4 provides not only for land-based facilities but also for facilities installed on fishing vessels, including refrigerated sea water facilities, in which case, however, the grant will cover 50 per cent of the cost of the equipment only and will not cover the cost of installation.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Or the cost of the ship.

Hon. Mr. Carter: Such shipboard facilities will benefit fishermen by enabling them to remain at sea longer, secure larger catches and at the same time minimize their loss through fish spoilage.

Bill C-4 will also enable more rigid enforcement of present fish handling regulations, which in some cases cannot be enforced at all at the present time because they are based on the assumption that fishermen have access to ice facilities, whereas, in fact, such facilities do not exist in many areas.

A new set of regulations is being drafted, and with respect to fish handling on vessels these new regulations will be much stricter than the present regulations. The target date for the new regulations is April 1, 1975, by which time it is hoped that the required facilities resulting from the program envisaged in Bill C-4 will be available.

Honourable senators, as I said earlier, Bill C-4 is aimed at helping the little man, the inshore fisherman, the small boat fisherman, the small operator. The survey I referred to earlier shows that the facilities envisaged by this bill are needed on both the Pacific Coast and the Atlantic Coast and in all coastal provinces, Newfoundland and Nova Scotia topping the list so far as need is concerned. I therefore commend Bill C-4 to you for your ready support and for its speedy passage. Because of its simplicity there may be no need of sending this bill to a committee, but if any honourable senator prefers that it go to committee I will be happy to make the necessary motion. If not, I shall do my best to answer any questions honourable senators may have.

Hon. John M. Macdonald: Honourable senators, I do not think it is necessary to say much about this bill, except to indicate general approval of it.

Senator Carter has dealt with it in his usual thorough fashion so that the effects of its provisions are known to you. I am further convinced that the bill has general approval by the manner in which it passed in the House of Commons, where it had both second and third readings without any debate whatsoever. However, one can learn some of the background of the bill and its need by reading the minister's speech of January 11 last when he was participating in the debate on the Speech from the Throne, and further information can be obtained from the record of the House of Commons Committee on Fisheries and Forestry. That committee considered the bill for two days, and its discussion is most informative, although much of it, while pertaining to the fishing industry, generally does not apply to the bill itself.

Honourable senators, from the minister's remarks before that committee, it is obvious the bill is necessary. It will enable the government to make plans for the construction and equipment of commercial ice-making and ice-storing facilities or commercial fish-chilling facilities that will contribute to improvements in productivity in commercial fishing operations. As Senator Carter mentioned, these grants will be equal to 50 per cent of the cost of such facilities and will go up to $25,000 for any one applicant. The real purpose of the bill is to endeavour to increase the earnings of fishermen, especially the small inshore fishermen.

It was startling to learn, as Senator Carter mentioned, that at present it is estimated that 100 million pounds of fish are rejected annually by the fisheries inspectors as unfit for human consumption. In addition, of the inshore fish landings, more than 50 per cent is of secondary quality. It is claimed that this is largely because of inadequate chilling between the time the fish are caught and the time they are delivered to the processing plant. On account of this, inshore fishermen are losing an estimated $25 million a year, which if my arithmetic is correct would amount to an average of $550 per fisherman.

Hon. Mr. Martin: A Scotsman's arithmetic is always good.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Not bad! At any rate, if this loss can be eliminated or substantially reduced, it will be of benefit both to the fisherman and to the general consumer. It is estimated that the cost to the federal treasury will only be about $4½ million over a two-year period. Surely that would be a worthwhile expenditure. Indeed, it might well be argued that a larger expenditure would be justified in order to allow the grants to go to 75 per cent of the cost.

In his appearance before the committee of the House of Commons, the minister stated that he was going to propose a further amendment on third reading of Bill C-4. The amendment he proposed would permit the government to provide financial support for the conversion and modification of fishing vessels; the existing legislation only provides assistance for new construction. His proposed amendment was discussed at some length in committee and was approved in advance of third reading. However, although the bill was given third reading on Friday last, there was no mention of that proposed amendment. What happened to it I do not know, unless there was a lack of communication between the Minister of Fisheries and the government house leader who moved third reading.

Honourable senators, I was surprised—or perhaps I should say impressed—at one statement the minister made on June 19. At page 17:7 of the Minutes of Proceedings and Evidence of the House of Commons Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry, he said:

> We are anxious to get this program under way as soon as possible. Draft regulations for its implementation have already been prepared and agreed to in principle by officials of the Department of Finance and of Treasury Board.

● (2120)

I think if the minister is so anxious to get his program under way, then he makes haste very slowly. The bill received first reading on January 12 last, and it received second reading without debate on June 12 and was referred to committee. It was considered in committee on June 19 and 21 and on the latter date was reported back. It was brought forward and given third reading on July 20.

Honourable senators, I hope the program outlined in the bill will not take as long to get off the ground as the bill itself took to get passed without debate. I agree with Senator Carter that no useful purpose would be served by sending this bill to committee.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Donald Smith: Honourable senators, I must say that I am not at all in agreement with the last statement made by my honourable colleague, Senator Macdonald. There is a lot more to this bill than meets the eye. I have not had the opportunity of following its progress closely in the other place, which is my normal practice with respect to bills of this nature. Furthermore, I am not so concerned with the terms of the bill itself as I am with the background information which is supposed to describe the need which exists for such legislation. I am always glad to see the Fisheries Department getting funds to help small boat fishermen—in fact, any low-income group—to equip themselves so that they can make a much better living for themselves and their families.

I am not at all opposed to the bill itself, but I am rather alarmed about the figures quoted by Senator Carter and Senator Macdonald. In my cursory reading of the proceedings concerning this bill on the other side of this building I did not see those figures, and now that they have been brought to my attention they alarm me extremely.

I have another question with regard to this matter. Where in the world would it be found necessary to reject 100 million pounds of fish? I don't even know which coast is referred to, and I think we should find that out. It would mean an economic loss of $25 million if this fish were destined for the fresh fish trade. There seems to be a general assumption made here that this amount of 100 million pounds of fish was rejected because as a result of coming from small boats it was not of good quality, that there was no market for it because it was in very bad condition.

I have lived close to the sea and close to fishermen all my life, and it is still my opinion—as I know it is the opinion of any housewife who happens to live near the fisheries on the Atlantic coast—that when you want the highest quality fish, you seek it from the fish dealer who gets his supply from the small boats. It is by far a superior product, but unfortunately there is not enough of it available to supply the markets of the major cities of this continent.

Honourable senators, all that is needed here is a comparison. You should have an opportunity to get down to Nova Scotia once in a while and get a supply of fish that comes from a small boat, and then to come back to Montreal, Toronto, or even Chicago, and run your hand along the fresh fish that you find at fish counters in the supermarkets, and bring that fish close to your face. You will then realize exactly what I am talking about. You will realize that that is not a fish that comes from a small boat; that it is a fish that comes from the bottom of one of those big steel draggers—the ones that are making all the money today—the care of which between the sea and the market in the big city is atrocious. The price is high, and the product should be a great deal better. My own experience is—and sometimes I know what I am talking about, even though at other times I don't—that you do not get that type of fish from any small boat fishery.

I do not know what region this legislation concerns. It may concern some remote area of the West Coast or of Newfoundland, which Senator Carter knows so well. I would like somebody to show me where all this rotten fish is in my part of Nova Scotia. I am saying these things because I am defending these people. Ice is not all that hard to get if you are in the fresh fish business. In the small boat fishery that I know of, where the fish is not destined for the fresh fish market, the fish is gutted and cleaned the same day that it is caught; it is salted the same night, and it just cannot go wrong. But according to some fishery inspection processes now being applied to the small boat fishing industry, at the time that that salted fish is ready to go to a packer theoretically something may be wrong with it. However, I have no difficulty in getting good quality salted fish of the kind I am talking about.

So, honourable senators, I think there is much to be explained here. How can we get that explanation unless we have officials from the Fisheries Department come before the appropriate committee and supply it? I consider it is almost an insult to make the assumption that the small boat fishing industry is so bad that those engaged in it are responsible for this great loss. I just cannot accept that that is the situation in my part of Nova Scotia, and I wanted to be assured that it is not happening there.

I am also alarmed about something else that Senator Carter mentioned. It has nothing to do with the bill; it is not even mentioned in the bill. Senator Carter said that there was going to be more rigid enforcement of regulations in connection with fish handling. There has been plenty of rigid enforcement of regulations in fish handling on our coasts in the last number of years, and to the extent that some of those making and enforcing these regulations are the laughing stock of the fishing industry. They cannot back up their thinking with bacterial counts or anything else, but they foist these expensive measures on our fishermen—measures that have no really practical application. The fish is sanitary, clean, and smells like fresh fish. Therefore, I am even more alarmed by the inference I draw from Senator Carter's remarks that even more stringent regulations are going to be proposed. They are going to give the small boat fishermen a chance to get a little ice-grinding machine on a public wharf here and there along the coast, but I should like to know what the regulations are going to be, and how much money the owners of these small boats are going to be called upon to spend in order to conform to these proposed regulations.

Again, I am a little alarmed by what Senator Macdonald pointed out about boats having to be altered to provide for a new way of icing fish or keeping the fish chilled in accordance with the regulations. There should be something in the bill to give assurance that the cost of doing this is not going to be imposed on these fishermen. I gather, from what Senator Macdonald said, that this was supposed to have been provided for on third reading, and I am surprised that it was not followed through. I remember reading some reference to that in the committee proceedings of the other place.

Honourable senators, I am not making a plea that this bill go to committee, but I want to put on record my alarm over the situation. I think we would be well served if we had an opportunity before this week is out to examine this situation with the officials from the Fisheries Department.

Hon. Chesley W. Carter: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I must inform the Senate that if the Honourable Senator Carter speaks now his speech will have the effect of closing the debate.

Hon. Mr. Carter: Honourable senators, I should like to thank Senator Macdonald and Senator Smith for their intervention in this debate, and for raising the points they have.

Like Senator Macdonald, I was somewhat surprised when I looked at the bill and found that it did not contain the amendment dealing with the conversion and modification of fishing vessels. At first I thought it had been mistakenly omitted when the bill was printed. However, on inquiring I was informed that drafting difficulties were encountered in relating the new paragraph to the existing section 5(c) of the act, which pertains to the construction and equipment of fishing vessels. Rather than delay passage of the bill it was decided to proceed with the bill in its present form and introduce another as soon as possible—hopefully even before the summer adjournment—to provide for the further amendment.

● (2130)

Senator Smith commented on the amount of fish rejected as unfit for consumption. I must say that I also felt the figure of 100 million pounds to be really staggering. We must keep in mind, however, that fish deteriorates more rapidly than other perishable foodstuffs. The deterioration begins immediately the fish is removed from the water, the rate of deterioration depending upon the temperature in which the fish is kept. A fish caught early and kept in the boat on a warm day, with no ice to chill it, will deteriorate very rapidly and, of course, the longer it is kept the more it deteriorates.

Fish handling is a further factor. In many cases fish caught from small boats undergo a tremendous amount of handling. This commences when it is brought aboard, and continues through the stages of being thrown into the boat, sometimes transferred to another boat, and from that boat to a wharf. From the wharf the fish must be again handled in the transfer to a truck, from which it is unloaded into bins at the fish plant. During that process it is exposed to a great deal of heat and a considerable period of time passes, which accelerates deterioration to the maximum extent. Therefore, perhaps the figure is not unrealistic. I take it for granted that the figures are official, having been put forward by the minister's staff. I believed they were from statistics compiled by the Fisheries Inspection Branch of the department, so it did not occur to me to question them.

I should have mentioned earlier when discussing deterioration that fish caught in shallow water deteriorates much faster than that caught in deep water. Usually small boats fish in fairly shallow water. Fish often deteriorates in relation to the method by which it is caught. If caught and strangled in a gill net over a weekend it sometimes becomes of second grade quality before it is taken from the net. Another aspect is the use of cod traps in Newfoundland. When the fish are plentiful more may be caught in one day than can be handled in three or four days or even a week.

Honourable senators should not assume that because fish is not fit for human consumption it is wasted. That is not always the case. It is converted into fish meal or fertilizer and the processor receives some return for it, although the return to the fisherman is minimal. Senator Smith also referred to salted fish, but I point out that this bill relates only to fish before it is landed and processed, or delivered to a processor for filleting or salting.

Senator Smith also referred to the rigid enforcement of regulations and complained that many of the regulations are not too reasonable, and probably sometimes not enforced in a reasonable manner. I am inclined to agree with him in that connection. After all, human nature being what it is, we cannot expect a uniform quality of inspection enforcement throughout the country. Some inspectors will be more zealous, and will enforce more rigidly than others. We must bear in mind that not too long ago in the United States, which is our main market for fresh fish, a law was passed under which purchasers of fish from Canada will place their own inspectors in the fish plants here. That is one of the marketing conditions we will have to meet and the type of inspection for which we must prepare.

Therefore this bill represents only part of a series of programs designed to enable our fishermen to meet the anticipated more severe competition, and at the same time increase their earnings which, in my opinion, should be the overriding consideration.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

[Hon. Mr. Carter.]

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

On motion of Senator Carter, bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

CANADA WILDLIFE BILL

SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Alan A. Macnaughton moved the second reading of Bill C-131, respecting wildlife in Canada.

He said: Honourable senators, this is the first comprehensive legislative proposal dealing with wildlife to be considered by Parliament. I should like to point out in particular that the bill is a joint effort on the part of the federal Parliament and the various provincial legislatures. In other words, being a joint effort, the provinces are in full accord with its provisions. I might exaggerate and say that they are anxious that it be passed, just as we are anxious that it be put into full force and effect. In passing, may I do a little boasting and say that as chairman in Canada of the World Wildlife Fund and of the 1001 Nature Trust, it gives me particular personal pleasure to sponsor this bill.

● (2140)

I have before me a prepared statement which summarizes the bill and which I think is important enough to be placed on the record. With the consent and co-operation of honourable senators, I should like to make that statement.

Wildlife, one of Canada's great heritages, was the primary reason for early exploration and settlement. It has continued to play an important role in the economic and social development of Canada, but not enough is being done to ensure that this renewable resource remains useful to Canadians. As the economy expands, as Canadians have more leisure time, as urban and industrial development impinges on wildlife habitat, and as other land resource users, such as agriculturalists and foresters, adopt new techniques to protect and improve their crops, the pressures on wildlife increase.

With environmental degradation progressing as it is, the federal government must take steps to protect wildlife over and above those steps taken by provincial authorities. In addition, protection of endangered species is of national and international scope. An enlightened country should not permit such disasters as the loss of the great auk and passenger pigeon and the near loss of whooping cranes and sea otters to be repeated. However, federal wildlife legislation does not authorize the federal government to assume those responsibilities, particularly where acquisition, control and management of lands for wildlife is required.

Wildlife and its management in Canada fall within several jurisdictions. Under the British North America Act, 1867, and the Natural Resources Transfer Agreements, provincial governments have jurisdiction over wildlife. The Migratory Birds Convention Act takes precedence with respect to those migratory birds identified in the Migratory Bird Treaty, but it does not provide specific legislative authority to purchase, control and manage lands for migratory birds, or to enter into agreements with other agencies or individuals—that is very important—for wildlife management purposes.

Bill C-131, which we are now discussing, has been developed to facilitate federal responsibilities for migratory birds and to enter into co-operative agreements with provincial governments and others, including, persons, corporations and companies, to enhance wildlife protection and management throughout Canada.

In developing principles for the Canada Wildlife Act, a co-operative approach to resolving wildlife problems was taken, and the rights and responsibilities of the provinces and the specific responsibilities and interests of the Government of Canada were fully recognized. The act will provide four major approaches for implementing a dynamic program of wildlife conservation in Canada. It will provide authority:

(a) to acquire, control and manage lands for migratory bird conservation, interpretation and research;

(b) to acquire, control and manage lands for conservation and interpretation of, and research on wildlife species other than migratory birds, in co-operation with provincial and territorial governments;

(c) to enter into co-operative arrangements with any province, territory, organization or person for matters of wildlife conservation, interpretation and research and for the operation of lands and facilities related to wildlife resources;

(d) to take any necessary action, in co-operation with provincial and territorial governments, required to protect endangered species of wildlife.

The bill has been endorsed by the provinces and is based on the National Wildlife Policy and Program which was tabled in the House of Commons on April 6, 1966. It will provide the legislative framework for implementing that policy and program. It will permit the federal government to take initiatives and provide leadership in conserving the wildlife resources of Canada for the benefit of all Canadians.

As I said earlier, this is the first comprehensive legislative proposal dealing with wildlife to be considered by Parliament. It is important that it be enacted quickly so that programs it will permit can be implemented, and so that the great beauty and diversity of our wild creatures will continue to be a source of great satisfaction to us all.

May I respectfully ask for your approval?

On motion of Senator Yuzyk, debate adjourned.

TRANSPORT AND COMMUNICATIONS

REPORT OF COMMITTEE ON RADIO AND TELEVISION COMMERCIAL ADVERTISING BROADCAST IN CANADA ADOPTED

The Senate resumed from Friday, July 20, consideration of the report of the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications on Radio and Television Commercial Advertising Broadcast in Canada which was presented on Friday, July 20, 1973.

Hon. John M. Macdonald: Honourable senators, when I adjourned this debate last Thursday it was not with any intention of unduly delaying the adoption of the report. I felt that I, and perhaps other senators, would like a little more time to study it. Having read and considered the report, I agree generally with its recommendations, although with some reservations.

I agree particularly with the recommendation that the CRTC, or some other body, undertake in-depth studies, consultations and public hearings that will lead to appropriate regulations designed to achieve the objectives of the committee. As honourable senators know, the objectives of the committee were to examine the advisability of steps being taken to ensure that all radio and television commercial advertising broadcast in Canada be completely produced in Canada, utilizing Canadian manpower to the maximum possible extent. It is evident that the committee felt it could not make such an in-depth study in the time available. The report states that the committee felt it advisable to hear invited groups only, in order to develop a general reaction by interested parties on the impact of the motion it was considering. In other words, the committee was actually making a preliminary survey and felt that a more detailed study was advisable.

I personally feel that the committee might undertake such an in-depth study at some future time. It could study the content and quality of commercial radio and TV advertising, and learn why such advertising is not now being completely produced in Canada by Canadians. It could also hear from the ultimate consumer, the general public, to whom all commercial advertising is directed.

It is easy to appreciate the desire of the Canadian advertising industry to have a protected market, as it were, for their product, and since it would apparently give employment to a great many more Canadians, particularly those in special fields, such as producers, technicians, script writers, and artists, the proposal is certainly worthy of consideration.

I find it somewhat strange that we now hear advocated a protected home market for services, because for many years a protected home market for goods was the subject of much political debate. That type of protection is rarely heard of now, but there appears to be a new and interesting development in the services rendered by professional groups.

While I appreciate the arguments advanced that if all radio and television commercial advertising were produced in Canada it would result in a larger industry employing a great many more people, I was not too impressed by some of the other arguments contained in the briefs. Four of the briefs expressed concern about the impact of foreign-produced commercials on our culture. One went so far as to proclaim that commercial advertising contributed to the molding of a distinctive Canadian identity and was a significant factor in the development of a culture for our nation. All I can say is that if we are dependent on present commercial advertising on radio and TV for the development of a distinctive Canadian identity and culture, then we are in a bad way. Personally, I find it hard to credit that the advertising firms involved are motivated by such noble ideals as the briefs proclaim.

● (2150)

Honourable senators, I do think the committee deserves our thanks for the work it has done. We are fortunate in having senators who are willing to give of their time and talent to this type of committee work. I hope that they are prepared to make a further study of this important matter in the not too distant future.

Hon. Maurice Bourget: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, as the motion before the Senate is not a substantive one, is it agreed that the Honourable Senator Bourget be allowed to speak a second time on the understanding that if he does so it does not have the effect of closing the debate?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

[Translation]

Hon. Mr. Bourget: Honourable senators, I do not think it is necessary that I should speak at great length to end the debate on the matter under consideration.

However, I would like to thank the honourable senators who have participated in this debate and tell them how much I have appreciated their interesting remarks as well as the congratulations they offered to the members of the committee.

I am pleased that honourable members of this house have unanimously adopted, with possibly some restrictions, this report and its recommendations. The members of the committee had also approved unanimously these recommendations.

I believe—and this was also the opinion of the members of the committee—that the recommendations of the report are reasonable and follow logically from the testimonies which we heard during the three day sittings of the committee.

[English]

As far as the remarks of the Honourable Senator Macdonald are concerned, I should like to say that the committee would have liked to have continued the inquiry in more depth. However, at the commencement of our hearings we were informed by the chairman of the CRTC that the CRTC had already commenced that kind of investigation. Therefore, so as not to duplicate efforts and expenditures, our committee felt that the study should be conducted by the CRTC as they have the knowledge and expertise in this area.

It is for that reason that we urge in our report that this inquiry be continued by the CRTC. I do not think there is anything further I can add.

[Translation]

Before resuming my seat, I must say that the members of the committee deplore the absence of its chairman, Senator Haig, who is ill at home. I know that all the members of the committee would like, through me, to send Senator Haig our best wishes for a speedy and full recovery.

Report of committee adopted.

[English]

BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE

NOTICE OF COMMITTEE MEETING

Hon. Mr. Langlois: I should like to inform honourable senators that the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce will meet tomorrow morning at 10 o'clock to give consideration to Bill C-4, to amend the Fisheries Development Act. I should add that I am informed that the minister is away—

Hon. Mr. Martin: He is saving Western Canada at the Western Economic Conference.

Hon. Mr. Langlois:—but arrangements have been made to have officials of the department in attendance.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Honourable senators, before the motion to adjourn is put, I should like to say to Senator Macdonald that I hope he is not exhausted by his heroic intervention on so many occasions this evening, and in such a productive and co-operative way.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Wednesday, July 25, 1973

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

PARLIAMENT

CUSTOM AND USAGE IN DEBATE—SPEAKER'S STATEMENT ON POINT OF ORDER

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, last evening Senator Molson intervened in the debate on Bill C-212, respecting certain immigration laws and procedures, and stated as follows:

> Honourable senators, I rise on a point of order. I think it has been well established over the years that in this chamber we do not refer to the proceedings of the other place. To base statements in this house on the reports of the proceedings of the other place would open up a whole new vista of argument. I believe I am safe in saying that it has been well established by custom and usage that we do not do that.

It appears that some honourable senators are unfamiliar with the practice to which Senator Molson referred. It might be helpful to all honourable senators if I quote some precedents which are quite explicit in this regard. I would refer honourable senators to Bourinot's Parliamentary Procedure, Fourth Edition, at page 357:

> It is also a part of the unwritten law of parliament that no allusion should be made in one house to the debates in the other chamber, a rule always enforced by the speaker with the utmost strictness (a). Members sometimes attempt to evade this rule by resorting to ambiguous terms of expression—by referring for instance, to what happened "in another place"; but all such evasions of a wholesome practice should be stopped by the speaker, when it is evident to whom the allusions are made (b). It is perfectly regular, however, to refer to the official printed records of the other branch of the legislature, even though the document may not have been formally asked for and communicated to the house.

The Honourable Senator Wishart Robertson, while he was Speaker of the Senate, on March 11, 1954, quoted this reference. Honourable senators will find it at page 343 in the Debates of the Senate of 1953-54. Senator Robertson went on to say:

> It is very clear then that no attempt on the part of honourable senators to allude to the debates and proceedings of the other branch of parliament, during the current session, can properly succeed, whether the expression "House of Commons" or such apparent evasions as "another place" are used in the process. On the other hand, when it is in order to refer to the other branch of parliament, far from the term "House of Commons" being out of order, it is indeed the proper description to use.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Hon. Paul Martin tabled:

> Copies of final background paper prepared for the conference on Western Economic Opportunities to be held in Calgary, July 24-26, 1973, entitled "Transportation".
>
> Copies of Order in Council P.C. 1973-2161, dated July 17, 1973, amending Part II of the Schedule to the Hazardous Products Act, pursuant to section 8(3) of the said act, chapter H-3, R.S.C., 1970.
>
> Copies of Order in Council P.C. 1973-2162, dated July 17, 1973, amending Part I of the Schedule to the Hazardous Products Act, pursuant to section 8(3) of the said act, chapter H-3, R.S.C., 1970.

Honourable senators, that is something which Senator Hayden will recall, and which Senator Forsey will want to know.

FISHERIES DEVELOPMENT ACT

BILL TO AMEND—REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Hon. Salter A. Hayden, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, reported that the committee had considered Bill C-4, to amend the Fisheries Development Act, and had directed that the bill be reported without amendment.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Carter moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I have no objection to third reading now if there would be royal assent this evening. Is there any possibility?

Hon. Mr. Martin: No; but I appreciate the generous offer.

Motion agreed to.

CANADA-UNITED STATES INTERPARLIAMENTARY GROUP

SPECIAL MEETING HELD IN WASHINGTON, D.C.—INQUIRY TO BE PROCEEDED WITH LATER THIS DAY

Hon. Alan A. Macnaughton: Honourable senators, with leave of this august assembly, and notwithstanding rule 44(2), may I call the attention of the Senate to the Special Meeting of the Canada-United States Interparliamentary Group held at Washington, D.C., on Tuesday, July 24, 1973?

The Hon. the Speaker: Has the honourable senator leave to proceed now?

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Later this day, after third reading of bills and after debate has been resumed on second reading of Bill C-131, respecting wildlife in Canada. I think the legislative items should have priority.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed that leave be given to the Honourable Senator Macnaughton to raise this matter later this day?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

ELECTORAL BOUNDARIES READJUSTMENT ACT

BILL TO SUSPEND—THIRD READING

Hon. Chesley W. Carter moved third reading of Bill C-208, to suspend the operation of the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

IMMIGRATION BILL

THIRD READING

Hon. John J. Connolly moved third reading of Bill C-212, respecting certain immigration laws and procedures.

He said: Honourable senators, before the motion is put, may I answer a couple of questions that were put to me last evening. Senator Benidickson inquired about the number of members of the Immigration Appeal Board who were engaged in the case of In re Nazarali. The answer is that there were three members of the board on that panel: Miss J. V. Scott, Mr. J. C. A. Campbell and Mr. F. Glogowski.

He also asked for the number of members on the Immigration Appeal Board. I am informed that there are nine such members now. Under Bill C-197, which was passed here last week, provision has been made for the appointment of additional temporary members to clean up the very large number of appeals.

● (1410)

Senator Yuzyk also asked me a question based upon a statement that he made and which appears in the Senate Hansard of July 18, 1973, at page 891. I understand that the figures quoted by Senator Yuzyk on that occasion were available from a press release issued by the minister's office on June 18, 1973. He asked about the backlog of cases before the Immigration Appeal Board and he understood that on June 1, 1973, the number was 17,472, and was being added to at the rate of 1,000 appeals per month. I am informed that this informatin is correct. I should like to say that this backlog of 17,472, to which Senator Yuzyk referred last night, includes 1,750 appeals which were affected by the ruling of the Immigration Appeal Board in the case of In re Nazarali.

Honourable senators may recall that in discussing that ruling last night I said that it purported to deny a visa from an applicant for a landed status when that application was made by a person who was then in Canada as a visitor or tourist, and as required by Order in Council P.C. 1972-2502, which was passed last November 6. So, those 1,750 appeals are included in the larger figure quoted by Senator Yuzyk.

[The Hon. the Speaker.]

In addition, there are approximately 10,000 appeals affected by the ruling of the Federal Court of Appeal in the case of In re Koo Shew Wan, to which again I referred last evening. Honourable senators will remember, perhaps, I said that the Federal Court of Appeal held on that occasion that applicants from within Canada who made application for landed immigrant status did not thereby lose their non-immigrant status and were really not affected by section 7(3) of the act. This is pretty legalistic, I am afraid, but it is about the only way I can say it.

The 11,750 appeals, approximately, are affected by the bill we now have before us. In addition, I should tell the Senate there are more or less 6,000 appeals pending before the board on deportation orders made for reasons other than those outlined in the two cases I have cited. They affect persons who are ships' deserters, persons who have criminal records developed either in Canada or abroad, people who are illegal entrants into Canada or who have overstayed a temporary permit to be in Canada, and also people who are found to have false passports, false visas, or false medical certificates. Those 6,000 deportation orders are in addition to the 10,000 to which I referred last night, plus the 1,750 to which I also referred last night. I think that the arithmetic total comes to the figure Senator Yuzyk used when he asked the question.

Last night I also referred to two decisions given by the Ontario Court Appeal, but I did not give the citations. I should like to put those citations on record now. The first was the case of Regina v. Pringle, ex parte Milks, a judgment of Mr. Justice Laskin when he was on the Ontario Court of Appeal. The citation is (1968) 68 D.L.R., Vol. II, p. 290. The second decision I referred to was also a decision of the Ontario Court of Appeal, In re Otto Gloede, (1971) 5 C.C.C., Vol. II, p. 545.

Hon. Mr. Yuzyk: I should like to thank Senator Connolly for clarifying this matter.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

CANADA WILDLIFE BILL

SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from yesterday the adjourned debate on the motion of Senator Macnaughton for the second reading of Bill C-131, respecting wildlife in Canada.

Hon. Paul Yuzyk: Honourable senators, the sponsor of Bill C-131, Senator Macnaughton, can relate directly to the topic of wildlife in that he is a member of an association in this field, namely, the World Wildlife Fund. My own association with wildlife has never been that close, although some could suspect that I may have been close to another meaning of the word—the excesses of activities of youth.

Like most Canadians, I have an abiding interest in the living resources of the land, air and water, in the usefulness and beauty of the environment and in the quality of life. As has already been so ably explained, this bill concerns the conservation of wildlife, research and interpretation in Canada. It is a duplication of Bill C-191, which was introduced last session, on April 19, 1972, to be precise, and which died on the Order Paper after first reading.

The main points of Bill C-131 are:

1. Provision for the Minister of the Environment to initiate programs and conferences for this purpose, including the administration of public lands where required.

2. Agreements with the provinces concerning wildlife programs, including specification of the cost to be borne by each government, and of the responsible authority. Wildlife falls under provincial jurisdiction, except when migratory.

3. Protection of endangered wildlife, including acquisition of lands, if necessary.

The emphasis is on wildlife conservation and research. The legislation is mainly to help the provinces in this matter, since it is largely their responsibility. The passage of this bill will give the Ministry of the Environment a clear mandate from Parliament to do a number of things which have been done under other legislation, and certain things that were not able to be done under legislation passed previously.

● (1420)

It is most unlikely that anyone will oppose this bill; the principles of wise management and need of renewable resources were adopted many years ago by the federal government, the provincial governments, municipal administrations and indeed the people of Canada.

Great strides in this field were made at the Resources for Tomorrow Conference in 1961 under the Diefenbaker government. As a result of one of the resolutions, the Canadian Wildlife Service came into being and has been doing an excellent job. This branch of government has urged the passing of legislation upon the federal and provincial governments, including the present piece of legislation. This conference also recommended the establishment of a Resource Ministers' Council. Such a council has been meeting annually and at times even more frequently. The provincial ministers together with the federal minister have already achieved considerable co-ordination and co-operation in many areas, despite the constitutional jurisdictional problem.

The Resources for Tomorrow Conference was also instrumental in the establishment of the Canadian Wildlife Federation. This body has convened conferences and meetings of the fish and game associations throughout the country. The federation has urged governments at all levels to produce such legislation as we have before us today. Provincial governments have acted more swiftly than the federal government, which has responded positively only recently; this, of course, should be welcomed.

Canadians are fully conscious of the harmful effects of pollution which has been caused by technological development. The effluents from factories and nuclear stations, chemical herbicides and insecticides as well as the destruction of forests and ruthless exploitation of mineral and wildlife resources, have brought great harm to all these resources, endangering the lives of men, birds and beasts. Man's transgressions of the environment are now threatening this environment and man himself. Consequently, the government must take such action as proposed in this bill.

In my opinion this legislation is very general, a sort of "motherhood" legislation. It is a nice bill on wildlife. The provisions dealing with agreements which can be made with provinces, and with private organizations with the approval of the provinces, are far too general. Nothing is stated with respect to the nature of agreements and their exact purposes. The minister is given wide powers, but there are no specifics as to what he is to do.

This brings us to the matter of the regulations. Because Bill C-131 is so general, it is apparent that the regulations will determine its effectiveness. Unfortunately, Parliament has little control over regulations and is not consulted until the government gets into trouble. Of course, if the regulations cannot be made effective, the bill itself will become hollow.

The whole question of the migration of wildlife across provincial boundaries, and of wildlife in national parks, should, I believe, be a federal responsibility. It is a federal responsibility to co-ordinate research carried out by provincial and other authorities in regard to wildlife, and this should have been made more specific in this bill. We know that the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development is responsible for federal parks and for the wildlife in them. I believe that much better service could be performed for the Canadian people if there were one minister responsible for wildlife problems in Canada, particularly in national parks and on all federal public lands.

We all know that nothing much will happen or be done unless funds are available. Lack of funds will make Bill C-131 hollow and only window dressing. Not so long ago we passed the Canada Water Act, which provided for the establishment of river basin boards. This has not been carried out, so far as I can ascertain, because funds have not been allotted for this purpose. There is no use in our thinking that proper research into the preservation of wildlife and ecological matters will be carried out if sufficient funds will not be available for such programs. Also, progress cannot be made if approved programs are cancelled, such as, for example, the cancelling of the program of preserving potholes on the Prairies, where most of the duck population is generated after the farmers had agreed to co-operate in leasing their land.

The legislation before us, even with its weaknesses, has received the support of all parties and is long overdue. I believe that the Minister of the Environment will take into consideration the constructive criticism that has been offered. Greater control and enforcement is required from everyone, from governments, giant corporations, and individual citizens, if we want to build a better Canada and improve the quality of life.

No useful purpose will be served by sending the bill to committee for study at this time. We on this side of the house endorse the bill and hope it will receive speedy passage.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, all Canadians who are interested in conservation and wildlife will, I believe, welcome the bill. The effect of the bill will be welcomed also in other regions, notably across the line in the United States.

In 1937, as a result of very dry years, particularly in the Prairie provinces, a group of Americans banded together to establish Ducks Unlimited. This corporation, whose sole interest was the conservation of migratory birds, was designed in a most unusual way. The funds for the corporation are collected totally in the United States and are spent totally in Canada, with no strings attached.

Ducks Unlimited (Canada) was established in 1938. It started its first work in Western Canada. Since then it has expanded to the point where it is operating not in all provinces in the country but virtually in all. Operations started in the Maritimes three or four years ago, and operations are now proceeding in British Columbia. The two central provinces, Ontario and Quebec, have at this point in time not been opened up to Ducks Unlimited operations.

It is notable that the budget for Ducks Unlimited has been rising steadily. Last year $2.75 million was sent from the United States to Ducks Unlimited in Canada for expenditure on conservation in this country. By the end of this year, $25 million will have come to Canada for conservation purposes during the years that Ducks Unlimited has existed.

Much as we appreciate this money coming from the United States, this is not to say that Canada does not have an input. Canadian input obviously is in land and resources. If the water resources were not available, the money could not be spent.

The original concept of Ducks Unlimited was that it would purchase no land. None of the projects involves the ownership of land. Ducks Unlimited establishes the projects, does the engineering work, arranges for leases with private landowners or provincial governments, puts in the structures, operates them, and looks after their upkeep. Its sole purpose is to arrange for a suitable water supply.

The program does not receive federal government support, nor has such support been applied for. The bill means that in conjunction with the federal government further projects can now be undertaken. The federal government under this act will be empowered to purchase lands. Ducks Unlimited would then be prepared to co-operate with the federal government in establishing structures and having its expertise available. So we welcome this bill and we are anxious to have it passed.

● (1430)

I merely wanted to acquaint honourable senators regarding this venture between the Americans and ourselves, which I think is an outstanding one and, I repeat, one where the money comes with no strings attached. The Canadian directors determine where and how the money will be spent, to the benefit of both countries.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read a third time?

Hon. Mr. Macnaughton moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

[Hon. Mr. Molgat.]

CANADA-UNITED STATES INTERPARLIAMENTARY GROUP

SPECIAL MEETING HELD IN WASHINGTON, D.C.

Hon. Alan A. Macnaughton rose, with leave, to call the attention of the Senate to the Special Meeting of the Canada-United States Interparliamentary Group held at Washington, D.C., on July 24, 1973.

He said: Honourable senators, I am appreciative of the fact that you have granted me permission to proceed at this time. Many of the members who went to Washington yesterday are in the house today and these things, it seems to me, should be placed on the record while they are still before the public.

Honourable senators will recall that on July 19 the House of Commons passed a resolution concerning the transport of Alaskan oil down the West Coast of British Columbia and through the Strait of Juan de Fuca. That resolution was unanimously carried. On the following day, July 20, the Senate, in effect, passed the same resolution, which called for an immediate meeting with our counterparts in the United States so that the Canadian Parliament could make known its views on the movement of the Alaskan oil down the West Coast of British Columbia and through the Strait of Juan de Fuca. That resolution, too, was agreed to unanimously. Three days later—that is to say, on July 24—we were on our way, by special invitation of the senators and members of the House of Representatives, through the Canada-United States Interparliamentary Group, to meet and talk with them in Washington regarding mutual problems.

The Canadian delegation was made up of members of the Senate and members of the House of Commons. The members of the delegation from the Senate were appointed by Her Honour the Speaker, and were as follows: Senator Allister Grosart, Senator Grattan O'Leary, Senator Daniel Lang, Senator George van Roggen, and myself. There were 12 members from the other place, appointed by their Speaker.

With leave of the Senate, I should like to place on Hansard as an appendix the list of Canadian senators and members of the House of Commons who formed the delegation to Washington, together with the list of the American senators and members of the House of Representatives who met us in Washington.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(See appendix, p. 949.)

Hon. Mr. Macnaughton: The actual facts of our meeting are fairly simple. We met in a relatively small dining room at 12.30 p.m. It was not the size of the dining room that was so important, but the quality of the senators and representatives from the United States Congress who were in attendance. For example, in attendance as part of the United States delegation was Senator Fulbright, Chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations and a long-time member of that powerful committee. Others in attendance were Senator George D. Aiken from Vermont, who is a long-time friend of Canada and known to most honourable senators; Senator Frank Church from Idaho, who previsouly acted as chairman of the Canada-United States Interparliamentary Group and who is anxious to assume that position again when other heavy duties release him; Senator Hubert Humphrey who, as honourable senators know, was a candidate for the presidency of the United States; and many others, all of whom are prominent members of the United States Congress. In fact, the luncheon meeting was sold out and many of those who wanted to attend were unable to do so.

I am glad to say that shortly after the luncheon meeting we retired to a committee room where a new set of senators and representatives were in attendance. Honourable senators will understand that in the last week of congressional affairs votes were being taken, and so forth, and, consequently, the membership of the United States delegation changed as time went on. The net result was that we reached a much greater number of senators and representatives than we normally would have and, therefore, had an opportunity to prove our case to a wider audience. In any event, the Canadian case was outlined by one of us at the beginning.

Honourable senators may ask the reason for this meeting. Members of the United States delegation certainly asked us to explain why we had requested this urgent meeting. For three years the Canadian government has been making representations regarding the deep concern prevalent in Canada on the possibility of an oil spill anywhere in the oceans, but particularly on the West Coast. Your delegation was not quite certain that all of these representations had been brought to the attention of members of the United States Senate and the House of Representatives, and we wanted to make sure that they had, indeed, been brought to their attention. Also, last week in the public press there were various allegations—and they are only allegations, as we found out later—that there were delays in communicating the concern of the Canadian government and ministers vis-à-vis energy and the problems of the environment, and all the rest. We wanted to make sure that if there had, in fact, been such delays, at least they would now be informed.

We wanted to tell them, basically, of the wide concern in Canada generally, and particularly on the West Coast, about the great danger from an oil spill which could easily take place, particularly in the Strait of Juan de Fuca, because it is proposed to bring the Alaskan oil down the West Coast through the Strait of Juan de Fuca, which is 30 miles long. It is true that at certain points the Strait of Juan de Fuca is 10, 15, or 25 miles wide, but there are certain peculiarities, such as weather conditions, tidal conditions, current conditions and the flow of water, which is from south to north, that make this strait particularly vulnerable to sea accidents or disasters. Those conditions make it such that if there was an oil spill opposite the American coast, or even in the American sector of the strait, the oil would not necessarily spread to the American beaches. It would be pushed by currents and winds into the Canadian sector of the strait and on the Canadian shores, thereby affecting Victoria, Vancouver, and the many islands and beaches in that area. The pressure of the tides and winds, and other factors, would probably cause that oil to stay there, unless technology finds means of cleaning it up. At the present time such means have not been discovered.

● (1440)

We referred to their own Rand report, which said that if proper safety measures are taken the possibility of disaster can be reduced considerably. But even the Rand report admitted that one major oil disaster in ten years would be sufficient to spoil that sea coast for many years. So you can understand the concern of the Western people, particularly of Vancouver, Victoria and related parts, at the possibility of disasters in this so-called inland sea.

We referred in passing to the possibility of a Canadian Mackenzie Valley pipeline. We admitted that their government has shown no interest. I think that is the correct way to put it. However, we pointed out that while we were not particularly anxious to build pipelines across the Canadian tundra and all the rest, it was certainly a better way of alleviating the danger and reducing the hazard to the environment than taking larger and larger tankers filled with oil down the West Coast and through the straits, and that therefore, in principle, while we were not in love with that system, we would not object to it.

We pointed out to them that the big American oil companies had shown no particular interest in this proposal. We also mentioned that to undertake the construction of an oil pipeline from the north to the south, down the Mackenzie Valley to the United States border, would mean enormous cost, probably beyond the means of our country at the present time.

We referred to the fact, which is no secret, that we were aware of the difficulties of having legislatures change their legislation once it was passed, or very close to being passed; that that was almost too much to expect.

However, we said our objective was, in effect, limited; it was more limited than a wide open concern. We wanted to concentrate on the threat to the inland sea by the transportation of oil to Puget Sound refineries. We wanted to point out our real concern about the passage through this 130-mile strait, and our concern about the winds, the currents, the tides, and even the fog. It was only a short time ago, as you know, that a Russian trawler ran into a smaller Canadian ship in bright sunlight, when everyone could see what was going on and there was no question of fog. It was due, I am told, to the currents, which pushed the two boats together and resulted, on a very clear day like today, in a collision.

We said that we had not come down there to raise a lot of problems, but to make a few practical suggestions; that we were not there to stop the delivery of Alaskan oil, because we know that is not feasible. We pointed out that there are ways of delivering Alaskan oil down the West Coast, not through the straits but to an open sea harbour farther down the coast, thus avoiding the risk of polluting the straits.

We suggested that being good friends, allies, and trading partners, and considering the record of the Canadian-United States Interparliamentary Group for resolving mutual difficulties together, Canadians would react with great respect and real appreciation if the American Congress showed some understanding of the Canadian attitude.

That is a general outline of what we tried to put across. What are the results? As I say, the luncheon meeting was sold out. The afternoon meeting started promptly at 2 o'clock, and we had to close it at 4.15 p.m. There was tremendous interest. Senators and representatives kept coming in and going out, staying and arguing, presenting their viewpoints, as only Americans can, in their clear and forthright manner. We tried to do the same. We emphasized Canadian concern, and this was pointedly made clear to them by the fact that of the 17 members of our delegation, seven came from the West—six from British Columbia and one from Alberta—and they had a great personal interest in and knowledge of the matter under discussion.

It was pointed out to us that rather than using foreign ships under other flags, which in case of disaster suddenly disappear, large oil tankers constructed with double bottoms and using American crews could, by regulation, be subject to American control. It was emphasized that the United States would exercise complete control over the United States waters in the straits. However, this is no basic answer to the possibility of oil disaster.

We went further—and this is reported in the public press, so it is not confidential—and suggested, although we did not have the authority, that instead of bringing oil by tankers down the West Coast it should be supplied by pipeline through one of the Canadian pipelines that was already delivering oil. We reminded them that the amount of oil needed for this refinery is not large, being only 10 per cent, or even less, of the total quantity they propose bringing down from Alaska to the Cherry Point refinery.

Our suggestion was that they should consider the building of an oil port further down the California coast, so that there would be no question of polluting these straits and creating international problems between our two countries. We suggested that there might even be joint control of certain waters to make sure that Canadian, American and foreign ships were under proper surveillance all the time.

We pointed out to them that the United States had accepted the Stockholm declaration of general principles, one of which was to the effect that one neighbour should not pollute, destroy or trespass in any way on the property of another; that those principles had been accepted by the United Nations and by the United States, and here was a case of action being taken by the United States that could in the future affect Canada and its interests. We discussed energy problems, currency problems, balance of payments, the future of pipelines, and other relevant matters.

It is true that the media—the press, TV and radio—were not present at our discussions, and quite properly so. However, as honourable senators well know, as soon as we got outside the committee room the press, the TV cameras and the radio reporters confronted us, and so we got dissemination of the Canadian point of view across the United States, to say nothing of our own country.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Was Senator Jackson there?

Hon. Mr. Macnaughton: Frankly, I do not know. I was so busy doing certain things.

Hon. Mr. Martin: He is the head of this arrangement.

[Hon. Mr. Macnaughton.]

Hon. Mr. Macnaughton: I cannot answer that. Perhaps Senator Grosart can.

Next, I would like to say a word about the Canadian delegates. All 17 delegates took part, not only once but twice, in a very active and constructive way, if I may so put it, without any rancour but with plenty of emotion. I think it is perfectly clear to a great many American senators and representatives that the Canadians are very disturbed by the possibility of an oil tanker disaster on the West Coast and/or in the straits. There is not any doubt about that.

We had the advantage of listening to two senators, Senators Gravel and Stevens, from Alaska, who did their very best to brainwash not only us but some of their confrères, which is perhaps a little hard on them. Nevertheless, they made a beautiful presentation of their side of the case. I am very glad to say that many of the Canadian senators and representatives attacked that, and at least pointed out the alternative to their arguments which perhaps had not been considered by our American confrères to that date.

● (1450)

In conclusion I should say a few words about the Canada-United States Interparliamentary Group. All parliamentary groups from time to time come under criticism—that they are not active enough, that they are getting old-fashioned, that they undertake only voyages of pleasure or voyages of discovery. This could not be further from the truth if it is said about our visit to Washington. We had a direct confrontation with our counterparts. We discussed everything freely and clearly. It gave us a tremendous opportunity to inform, persuade and, perhaps, even to influence.

As I see it, there are three levels of government. There is the Cabinet, which is responsible for policy and direction; there is the Public Service, with ideas, doing considerable research and carrying out a great deal of the administration; but there is by far the most important, Parliament, which discusses, which reaches decisions and which, in effect, can be the salesman for the policies of the cabinet and the government of the day. We have a special ability to approach our counterparts in the United States as practical senators or members of Parliament, who are subject to public scrutiny. We know what it is to go through the mill, to go through elections. We can speak to our opposite numbers with understanding, and they react to that.

Honourable senators, I do not want to enlarge on the question of environmental leadership, but it is true that Canada and the United States together are in the forefront of leading the world in environmental matters, of suggesting what should be done, and that is based on the tradition of 50 years of co-operation with the great country to the south. It started with the decision respecting the smelter at Trail. Smoke from the Trail smelter was polluting the country across the border, and eventually we were sued and paid damages. That created a precedent. It was followed by the Columbia River diversion, and again damages were collected. Then came the adoption at Stockholm in June 1972 of the general principle that neighbours should be good neighbours and that steps taken by one should not cause hazards to the other.

So we have a long line of co-operation between our two countries. It seems to me that the value of our meeting yesterday does not lie in the immediate results—because things have gone too far, perhaps, to stop the legislative process at this stage—but it does lie in the opportunity we have to go directly to our parliamentary counterparts on matters of great national concern and urgency.

Honourable senators, relationships between United States senators and representatives and Canadian senators and members of Parliament are apt to be on a much more permanent basis than dealings between cabinet ministers, who change from year to year and from government to government. The American senators we know and have known for 15 or 20 years are still there. They are outstanding men, and this personal relationship between us cannot be overvalued. It is my view, in regard to the co-operation between parliamentary members, the cabinet and the bureaucracy in Canada, the Canadian political system can be a most effective weapon in persuading members of other nations to listen to our case.

Hon. Allister Grosart: Honourable senators, Senator Macnaughton has given us a full and comprehensive account of the visit of the Canadian group to our colleagues of the American group in Washington yesterday. He has been extremely modest about his own part in the meeting. It should be said here that Senator Macnaughton took the lead in introducing the subject to our American colleagues. At the luncheon meeting he gave them a clear exposition of the Canadian viewpoint, and a clear understanding of why on this emergency basis we were in Washington as their guests.

On another occasion during the meeting, he intervened to counter some of the arguments that had been put before the meeting by Senators Stevens and Gravel, the senators from Alaska.

Honourable senators will naturally ask whether this trip to Washington did any good. I believe it did. I believe there will be positive results and some fairly immediate results from the few hours of work we did there after a long briefing the night before.

Senator Macnaughton has indicated the Canadian position, the concern Canadians have that if there is a great increase in the number and size of tankers going into Puget Sound, there is the inevitability of some ecological damage at some time or other due to navigational or other mishaps in the sound or in the straits. I think our American friends were more impressed than they had been about the level of concern in Canada. As Senator Macnaughton has said, a large proportion of our delegation was from British Columbia and they put their position in both logical and, at times, emotional terms.

The point was made to our American friends—and I got the impression they appreciated it—that this was more than just an issue of what might happen in respect to the refinery at Cherry Point, that it involved the larger issue of Canadian-American relations. It was pointed out to our American friends that we have a long and good record in relationships between the two countries, and that there was insistence on both sides that we should avoid any possible specific action that would endanger that long-term record. I do not think our American friends were fully aware of the degree of endangerment that this issue has appeared to develop.

I was particularly impressed by the assurances they gave of the safeguards, some of which were mentioned by Senator Macnaughton. They have certainly been aware for a long time that those dangers exist in respect to the ecology of that area.

Their safeguards are very well advanced. They invited us to go 30 miles away to see some of the ships they are building—double-bottom ships, compartmentalized, and with safeguards which at the present time are not in use anywhere in the oil tankerage business. They pointed out—Senator Macnaughton has mentioned this but I think it is worth emphasizing—that under the coast guard regulations these tankers will be under the American flag, manned by American crews and skippers and, therefore, under their complete control. This is a degree of control which it is not possible to exercise at the present time over tankers coming to our coast, the American coast, or any other coast where tankers are under the flags of many nations, some of which are less responsible than others in respect to the possible damage that their operations may cause. They hope that we will accept their assurances that the coast guard navigational and operational safeguards are adequate.

We expressed the view that we would like to see, perhaps, some kind of international control of shipping in that particular area. Honourable senators will be aware, of course, that the waters involved in this discussion, as far as Puget Sound and the straits are concerned, are all national waters.

● (1500)

It was suggested that this was a matter that might be brought under the jurisdiction of the International Joint Commission. This commission, which has been operating for well over 50 years now, is regarded internationally as an outstanding model of joint regulatory control of international waters. At the present time its mandate is limited to inland waters, although I have been told that some other waters have, by special resolution, come under the purview of the International Joint Commission.

I for one feel that this is a matter that the Canadian government should pursue actively, to see whether our American friends would agree to an overall extension of the terms of reference of the International Joint Commission to take in these and perhaps other waters.

There will be some difficulties there, of course, because our American friends will want to include some other waters which at the moment we seem to have appropriated, outside the general purview of international law, as territorial waters. Personally, I believe it would be a very good thing if one of the results of this Puget Sound situation was that we would open up this whole question, and, in Canada, be put in the position of talking a little more realistically to our American friends than we have been about their rights in some waters that have historically been regarded as international, but which we, on a completely unilateral basis, have now decided are national.

This is an annoyance to our American friends and I for one, in supporting the plea which was made on behalf of Canada at this time, was continuously conscious of the fact that, if this is an American irritant to Canada, we have done more than our share of developing Canadian irritants to our friends in the United States.

I believe that in the last few years there has been a tendency on the part of the Canadian government to forget that there is a necessary quid pro quo basis. You give and you receive; if you don't give, you don't receive.

There is general agreement, I believe, that on this matter there has been a substantial breakdown of communications at the government and diplomatic levels between Canada and the United States. Perhaps there is no better proof of that than the fact that at the last minute a group of parliamentarians were dispatched by the Parliament of Canada to see what they could do to solve this problem after the essential bill had been passed by the United States Senate, and was about to be passed by the House of Representatives. There could be no clearer indication that something went wrong somewhere in the communications between the two countries.

I am not at this time going to attempt to lay the blame on one side or the other. There were failures on both sides at the official level—that is, at the cabinet level in Canada and at the executive level in the United States. I believe there were failures on both sides at the official diplomatic level. The evidence is there for anyone to read—charges of last-minute statements by a Canadian minister to clarify something that they kept saying was already clear.

I am not saying that there was failure on the Canadian side to make our position clear, but certainly there was a failure somewhere to communicate our position to our American friends. That to me points up the importance of this kind of "third level" of international communications, as Senator Macnaughton has put it.

Our parliamentary group—I refer to this specific group, but we do have others—has performed a valuable service over the years and can perform a much more valuable service in the future.

I had some hesitation myself, and I expressed it in the chamber when this resolution was before us, that this might not be a proper function of the Canada-United States Interparliamentary Group, because of its tradition of overview once a year or so, here or in Washington. However, I am completely disabused of any reservations I had because, as I said at the outset, there will be beneficial results to Canada and to the United States from this visit.

I am convinced that our American friends will now take another look at the safeguards. I am convinced that they will go even further than they have to minimize the danger of an accident in these waters. I believe that they are going to look again at the possibility of maintaining the status quo of tanker traffic in Puget Sound. It has not been made entirely clear in the press that American tankers are now going into the sound and delivering oil—not from Alaska but from other parts of the world—to the Cherry Point refinery. The Cherry Point refinery was, however, built specifically to handle Alaskan crude, and there will be some difficulty in its handling what is called the "sweet" crude from Alberta. However, we were assured this could be done at some expense, and I believe our American friends will now at least consider the possibility of using that refinery at its present capacity and possibly not route the Alaska oil into Puget Sound. I am not over-optimistic about that, but I am quite sure from some private conversations—corridor conversations—that they are going to look at that.

Our minister, the Honourable Donald Macdonald, made a very clear offer to the Americans. That offer does not seem to have been communicated. It was very much sub rosa. No one on either side of the groups in Washington seemed to be fully aware of what the minister had said until it was read out. He said, in effect, that we will consider a guarantee—and that is the word he used—of total supply for a certain period of time through the Trans-Mountain Pipe Line—that is, from a Canadian source—to the Cherry Point refinery. Here is a real alternative.

It is clear from any reading of the documents that there was a misunderstanding on both sides with respect to the Mackenzie pipeline, because over and over again in references to the Mackenzie pipeline the Americans read that as referring to an oil pipeline, while on our side it was intended to mean a gas pipeline. There is clear evidence of lack of precision in the communications on both sides.

One of the American senators—I think it was Senator Stevens—made what I thought was a very good point. He said, "This is not an 'either/or' business. It is not either the Alaskan oil tanker route down the coast or the all-Canadian Mackenzie pipeline." He said that we can have both. We have enough oil up there in reserves, and we are going to bring it into production in due course. There will be enough oil and enough demand for oil for a pipeline down the Mackenzie to carry at capacity, and for the tankers going down the Pacific coast to operate at capacity.

Our American friends, giving us extremely well-documented figures, certainly gave me the impression that the potential for oil production in our Northwest, as well as in the American-Alaskan north, is much greater than we have been led to believe. One hopes that this is so, because some of the discussions did tend to suggest that this was an alternative question: Will you please use the Mackenzie pipeline rather than the Alaska pipeline?

● (1510)

As Senator Macnaughton has said, our group, even the most concerned of our West Coast members, were careful to make very clear that we were not, at this late date, opposing the 800-mile Alaska pipeline. What we were concerned about was where the first land terminal would be after the oil left Alaska.

I should pay a tribute not only to Senator Macnaughton, who led our group and who was a real leader and organizer, but to all the other senators who played such an important part. I was quieter than usual on this occasion, because I did not have the expertise that some of the other members had, and it has been suggested that that may have helped the discussions to be as successful as I think they were.

Hon. Daniel A. Lang: Honourable senators, I had not intended making any remarks this afternoon, but having listened to Senator Macnaughton and Senator Grosart, I felt that I might be able to say something additional of interest to the Senate. In particular, I want to add my comments on Senator Macnaughton's chairmanship to those tendered by Senator Grosart. I have never known anyone who could chair a delegation as Senator Macnaughton can, under circumstances of rush and considerable strain, and in an area and milieu which was, to say the least, really quite uncertain as to potential effects, results or reactions. I cannot speak too highly of Senator Macnaughton's performance in that role, and I know that such success as we did have is due in very great measure to the way he handled our meetings. This was also evidenced by the way our opposite numbers reacted to him. The manner in which they did clearly indicated the high regard in which he is held.

I should point out that in Washington yesterday we did not have the kind of case to put forward of which, in a comparable situation in the law courts, I would welcome being the advocate. It was not exactly a cut and dried piece of business, and it is very important that we should realize that. We were, in essence, down there to protest against the United States carrying oil in tankers from the United States over the high seas through United States coastal waters to a United States port. In other words, honourable senators, we were protesting a perfectly valid objective, a wholly legal undertaking of the United States. Our case was based totally on the danger from pollution which we might be exposed to because of Canadian territorial proximity to United States coastal waters. We were putting that forward in face of the fact that we not only permit but encourage such large-scale tankers to unload at our own ports on the East Coast, including Quebec City.

The Americans, of course, and as usual knew our case and were quick to latch on to the weaknesses inherent in our argument. Notwithstanding that, we received a sympathetic reaction—I might even say an appreciative reaction. I came away convinced that what we had accomplished was this, that they would explore every avenue to avoid, or at least to minimize, the dangers that this traffic might pose for Canada.

One point I should like to repeat, because I think it is important to understand it, is that of the total Alaska oil moving by tanker from Valdez, only 10 or 20 per cent will go into the Cherry Point refinery adjacent to Vancouver and through the Strait of Juan de Fuca, the balance going to California and southward. We are not talking about a tremendously large movement of oil. Our only concern is with the movement of that oil off the high seas and after it enters United States territorial waters to the Cherry Point refinery.

I think that, by narrowing our opposition to that specific area, we gained the sympathetic response of our opposite numbers, which might not have been the case had we simply attacked them on the general basis of West Coast oil transportation by tanker.

Honourable senators, for me—and here I am sure I am speaking for other members of the delegation as well—the exercise was an education. Today, particularly in the area of energy supply and consumption, Canadian latent anti-American feelings tend to rise to the fore, and we are inclined to try to make the Americans scapegoats for all our problems, including pollution and monetary problems.

We must now be particularly careful, especially in this area of energy demand and supply. Undoubtedly, as between our two countries, the control, transportation and utilization of North American energy resources is going to be the most delicate interface that we will be experiencing. But it is with understanding and knowledge that we must approach these problems.

I am not particularly overjoyed when our Secretary of State for External Affairs says, as he said last night on television about these matters, "We are just beginning to fight." I know that fighting will get us nowhere, but can cost us very dearly not only economically, but in terms of our own credibility and esteem.

We should remind ourselves that the eastern part of this country is supplied by oil delivered to the State of Maine by tankers from Venezuela, then transshipped by pipeline through the United States to Montreal. We should also remind ourselves that our western oil coming into central Canada comes via Interprovincial Pipeline for hundreds of miles right through the northern United States to Sarnia and Windsor. Therefore, honourable senators, this is not a game for amateurs or for those with emotional or political axes to grind. It is a game to be played by those with cool heads and, as I said, knowledge and understanding.

To illustrate this point, I should like to recite—and here I shall try to avoid being too specific—an incident which occurred yesterday and which I thought was very telling. One of our opposite numbers, a member of the House of Representatives, rose and spoke to us in a very personal and emotional way about a problem in his recent experience. He told us that in his immediate neighbourhood, with a population of perhaps 75,000 persons, few if any will be able to heat their homes with fuel oil this winter. This potential tragedy in the United States is neither imaginary nor ephemeral; it is real. This man and his neighbours are not located in Florida or California, but near here on the south shore of the St. Lawrence River.

● (1520)

I should also inform hounourable senators that the oil heretofore consumed by this neighbourhood is Venezuelan oil, which arrives in Montreal from a State of Maine port by pipeline. It arrives in bond for Canadian transit to the area in question. The shortage now facing these people has been imposed, albeit involuntarily, I assume, by the restrictions on oil "exports"—I put that word in quotes—recently imposed by the National Energy Board. If it had been oil supplied for just one or two years, it might be one thing. If it had been oil that was produced in Canada and exported, that might be another. Both of those conditions are bad enough, but this is foreign oil in transit through Canada in bond for delivery in the United States, and has been so supplied to that area for some 10 years or more. That is another matter.

Now, that might be considered a minor matter—minor except for those affected—but it is an instance of bureaucratic nonsense that can destroy all the good relations and good will built up by Senator Macnaughton and his group, and others, over the years, and could cost us billions of dollars somewhere else—on the Pacific coast, in the Northwest, or elsewhere.

I mention this incident mainly in the hope that it will point up the extreme sensitivity that we must exhibit now and during the coming years of scarcity in this whole area of energy supply. We must deal with the United States with sympathetic understanding of their needs and in full knowledge of the nature and extent of the increasingly critical situation they are facing.

Honourable senators, yesterday's exercise was indeed useful. I am hopeful that an increase in tanker movement into the Cherry Point refinery may never materialize. If that tanker movement does not increase, it will be due to a great extent to the work of the group chaired by Senator Macnaughton and the good will that such activities generated amongst our colleagues in Washington. I am very happy to have been there.

Hon. Mr. Forsey: Honourable senators, I wonder if I might ask Senator Macnaughton a question. Was the matter raised of having the tankers go around by the high seas, rather than the Strait of Juan de Fuca? I understood there was some question of that being raised at some time, and I wondered if it was taken up yesterday?

Hon. Mr. Macnaughton: Can you specify which high seas? Do you mean down the West Coast in the Pacific Ocean?

Hon. Mr. Forsey: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Macnaughton: Yes, it was mentioned that from Valdez, which is the port of departure, the tankers should go out into the sea, avoiding the inland passage, to a port beyond the strait.

Hon. Mr. Grattan O'Leary: Honourable senators, I had intended to offer a few footnotes to what has been said here this afternoon but, as every reader of history knows, footnotes often do more to cloud than to clarify. In any event, the report presented by Senator Macnaughton was so clear, so good, so accurate and the philosophical conclusions which he derived from what he said so good, that it is hardly necessary for me to say anything at all.

I would, however, like to mention that we were told before we left here yesterday that our mission was impossible. We were told by the Globe and Mail this morning that our mission was a failure. Honourable senators, a situation which enables the legislators of Canada to go to Washington and be welcomed there by the leaders of the United States Senate and the House of Representatives can hardly be termed a failure. When we can go to Washington and be met there by men such as Hubert Humphrey, Jacob Javits, Frank Church, and J. W. Fulbright, the Chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, when such men greet you and are eager to hear your story and spend hours of a busy day, with the bell constantly ringing for votes and more votes, listening to your presentation, surely, in a world such as we live in today, we cannot dismiss that as failure.

I think our mission was, indeed, a success. We did convey to the members of the American Congress information which, I am sorry to say, they did not have before, or did not have completely. At least, that is what they told us. We met some very able debaters. I was tremendously impressed by the debating skill of the senators from Alaska. However, that did not detract from their fairness. The presentation commenced by Senator Macnaughton and continued by Senators Lang and Grosart was objective, fair and competent. Churchill once said that it is better to jaw, jaw, than to shoot, shoot; and I deplore with Senator Lang the statement appearing in the newspaper this morning, "We have just begun to fight." This problem will not be solved by the language of warfare, but by men of good sense and goodwill sitting down together and endeavouring to reach a solution which will be of gain for our two countries.

This is a North American problem and I for one believe that the final solution will be a continental energy policy. I know there are those who run away from this idea. Well, honourable senators, we have a continental defence policy, and energy is closely identified with defence. If we can have a continental energy policy—which is really what we were discussing yesterday and what it all got back to—we can establish such a policy in connection with energy and the transport of oil in the face of navigational and other dangers.

● (1530)

These are things to be settled, surely, by reason. It might be that the International Joint Commission act could be amended to bring these problems, such as the navigational problem, within the jurisdiction of the commission. Elihu Root, the then United States Secretary of State, sat down years ago with a member of the Canadian government, the Honourable William Pugsley, and drew up the terms of reference of the International Joint Commission. Some said it was impossible, but it has worked. It might well be that with a continental energy policy we could work changes in the International Joint Commission act, and do other things whereby we can solve the question to the advantage of both countries. That is what we should aim for.

To have diplomats, whether young or old, saying, "We have just begun to fight," is nonsense, and dangerous nonsense, solving nothing. We should have more meetings, such as the one held yesterday, with people who, after all, write the laws of the Congress and, therefore, of the United States. These things, in the end, are bound to bring benefit.

I must again congratulate Senator Macnaughton. As a Canadian I was proud yesterday to sit among the leading men of the United States, and hear Senator Macnaughton make the presentation on behalf of Canada. It was eloquent, forceful, lucid, good in every respect. I was proud of him, and I think our American neighbours were proud to have a neighbour such as Senator Macnaughton.

The Hon. the Speaker: As no other honourable senator wishes to participate, this inquiry is considered as having been debated.

THE LATE RIGHT HONOURABLE LOUIS STEPHEN ST. LAURENT

ANNOUNCEMENT OF DEATH OF FORMER PRIME MINISTER

Hon. Paul Martin: Honourable senators, I have just been informed by Senator Lamontagne that the Right Honourable Louis St. Laurent, the former Prime Minister, has died.

[Translation]

The Right Honourable Louis St. Laurent, former Prime Minister of Canada, has died. I think the house should adjourn until tomorrow afternoon at two o'clock. I, therefore, move the adjournment of the house.

[English]

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

APPENDIX

(See p. 942.)

SPECIAL MEETING OF CANADA-UNITED STATES INTERPARLIAMENTARY GROUP

UNITED STATES SENATE DELEGATION

Gale W. McGee (Dem., Wyo.), Chairman of Senate Delegation
J. W. Fulbright (Dem., Ark.), Chairman of Committee on Foreign Relations
Frank Church (Dem., Idaho)
Edmund S. Muskie (Dem., Maine)
Hubert H. Humphrey (Dem., Minn.)
Mike Gravel (Dem., Alaska)
Dick Clark (Dem., Iowa)
Joseph R. Siden, Jr. (Dem., Dela.)
J. Bennett Johnston, Jr. (Dem., La.)
George D. Aiken (Rep., Vt.)
Jacob K. Javits (Rep., N.Y.)
Carl T. Curtis (Rep., Nebr.)
Ted Stevens (Rep., Alaska)
William B. Saxbe (Rep., Ohio)

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES DELEGATION

Hon. Thomas E. Morgan, Co-Chairman (D.-Pennsylvania)
Hon. John C. Culver (D-Iowa)
Hon. Pierre S. du Pont (R-Delaware)
Hon. Frank Horton (R-New York)
Hon. Harold T. Johnson (D-California)
Hon. Abraham Kazen, Jr. (D-Texas)
Hon. Peter N. Kyros (D-Maine)
Hon. Richard W. Mallary (R-Vermont)
Hon. Robert C. McEwen (R-New York)
Hon. Lloyd Meeds (D-Washington)
Hon. William J. Randall (D-Missouri)
Hon. Henry P. Smith III (R-New York)
Hon. Samuel S. Stratton (D-New York)
Hon. John B. Anderson (R-Illinois)
Hon. Jonathan B. Bingham (D-New York)
Hon. Donald M. Fraser (D-Minnesota)
Hon. Philip E. Ruppe (R-Michigan)
Hon. John P. Saylor (R-Pennsylvania)
Hon. Morris K. Udall (D-Arizona)

CANADIAN DELEGATION

Senate:

Hon. Alan Macnaughton, P.C. (Lib.—Quebec), Co-Chairman
Hon. Allister Grosart (P.C.—Ontario)
Hon. Daniel A. Lang (Lib.—Ontario)
Hon. M. Grattan O'Leary (P.C.—Ontario)
Hon. George van Roggen (Lib.—British Columbia)

House of Commons:

Mr. Robert McCleave, Deputy Speaker (P.C.—Nova Scotia), Co-Chairman
Mr. J.-J. Blais (Lib.—Ontario)
Mr. Jack Cullen (Lib.—Ontario)
Mr. Len Marchand (Lib.—British Columbia)
Mr. Paul E. McRae (Lib.—Ontario)

Mr. T. C. Douglas (N.D.P.—British Columbia)
Mr. Randolph Harding (N.D.P.—British Columbia)

Mr. Eudore Allard (S.C.—Quebec)

Mr. Peter C. Bawden (P.C.—Alberta)
Mr. Walter Baker (P.C.—Alberta)
Mr. John A. Fraser (P.C.—British Columbia)
Mr. Donald W. Munro (P.C.—British Columbia)

Staff:

Mr. Peter Dobell
Ms. Jean Macpherson

Political Parties:

Lib., Liberal
N.D.P., New Democratic Party
S.C., Social Credit
P.C., Progressive Conservative

THE SENATE

Thursday, July 26, 1973

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

THE LATE RIGHT HONOURABLE LOUIS STEPHEN ST. LAURENT

TRIBUTES TO FORMER PRIME MINISTER

Hon. Paul Martin: Honourable senators, for the second time in seven months we mourn another distinguished Canadian who served Canada as Prime Minister. The Right Honourable Louis Stephen St. Laurent was born February 1, 1882, and died July 25, 1973. Even these cold statistics reveal something of the greatness of Canada's twelfth Prime Minister.

Respected and admired throughout Canada as a brilliant lawyer before he entered politics, he became equally respected and admired as the leader of his country, and as a worker in the cause of both Canadian unity and North Atlantic collective security. He was a firm believer in the United Nations.

Louis St. Laurent's is a unique career, for until the age of 59 he had never played an active part in politics. In the thirties he had been one of Quebec's leading lawyers, and President of the Canadian Bar Association, as the Leader of the Opposition knows, because I believe the Leader of the Opposition was one of Mr. St. Laurent's law students when the latter taught at the University of Laval Law School in Quebec City.

When war was declared in 1939, Mr. St. Laurent became counsel to the Rowell-Sirois Commission on federal-provincial relations. Nevertheless, in 1941 he was asked by the Prime Minister of the day, Mr. King, to enter the field of government, and for the duration of the war years, as the Minister of Justice, he was also the successor of Mr. King's trusted Quebec lieutenant, Ernest Lapointe.

Louis St. Laurent, however, was no one's successor for long. Instead, like other great men, he cut his own path. He took a leading part in the constitutional, judicial and political development of Canada. He sought agreement with the provinces whereby constitutional amendments could be made in Canada rather than through the action of the British Parliament.

He was instrumental in the evolution of the Supreme Court of Canada to its present status as the final court of appeal. If, in the former, his hopes were never realized, he was nevertheless able to take pride, as we all are, in the accomplishment of the latter, as well as in the part he played in the negotiations that led, during the time that he himself was Prime Minister to the entry of Newfoundland into Confederation.

His proposal for federal-provincial fiscal relations was undoubtedly among his greatest achievements and one of his great contributions to Canadian unity. The old age pension became universal under his government and much of the social legislation we now have was introduced by the St. Laurent administrations.

In what one might call "the St. Laurent period," Canada, more than any time before or since, became an important force in international affairs. As Secretary of State for External Affairs after the war—the first man to hold that portfolio, apart from the occupant of the office of Prime Minister—he led Canada away from its pre-1939 quasi-isolation. He told me himself that it was in San Francisco when the charter of the United Nations was adopted in 1945, that he became convinced that he could contribute something vital to world peace, and it was there that he committed himself to that goal.

Clearly supported by Mike Pearson and others, including myself, who had long been urging a more active international role for Canada, he took an active part as deputy chairman of the Canadian delegation to the founding United Nations Conference at San Francisco, and subsequently led the Canadian delegation, of which I was privileged to be a member, at sessions held in London in January of 1946 and in New York in the autumn of that year.

Mr. St. Laurent was among the first to enunciate the concept of collective security that grew into the North Atlantic Treaty Organization.

As Prime Minister he continued to support the international role of Canada by placing this country's armed forces at the service of the United Nations during the Korean conflict, and it was he, together with Mike Pearson, who supported my efforts at the United Nations in 1955 to have the membership of that body enlarged to include nations which had previously been excluded from participation in that world body.

Mr. St. Laurent worked for unity in Canada and for peace in the world. He identified the two and said they were related; only to the extent that we were a united nation would we be able to make a contribution to unity outside our own borders.

His efforts, crowned by recognition during his lifetime both from his own and from other countries, will continue to bear fruit for Canada and for the world and for a long time to come. His memory will remain with us, not only with those in government who served with him but with those who have lived the years following the Second World War.

He was always humanely thoughtful of people. It was this which he was able to transfer into a feeling of responsibility for the whole Canadian family.

Louis St. Laurent was truly a great Canadian; to many, one of our greatest statesmen. Mackenzie King called him the ablest man who ever sat in a Canadian Cabinet. I was privileged to serve with him in Cabinet when he was Minister of Justice and later Secretary of State for External Affairs. I was honoured to be invited to serve in his two governments. Like many others who knew him well and who are in this chamber, my respect and I am sure their respect and admiration for him was such that we found it difficult to address him other than as Mr. St. Laurent or as Mr. Prime Minister. But he was a family man and a grandfather and to millions of Canadians he was affectionately and simply known as "Uncle Louis."

[Translation]

The Right Honourable Louis St. Laurent was, according to all Canadians who have known him, one of the great Prime Ministers of Canada. After a particularly brilliant law career, in 1941, at the pressing invitation of the Right Honourable Mackenzie King, and at the cost of great personal, family and professional sacrifices, he agreed to enter public life. That was in 1941, after the death of his great friend, the Right Honourable Ernest Lapointe, another distinguished Canadian.

It was also during the Second World War, at a crucial moment in the history of our country, when national unity was threatened by the need to intensify our war effort.

Having performed his noble mission, once peace was restored, he wished to return to private life. But, once again, he was submitted to the pressures of a large number of Canadians, particularly those of his Prime Minister, the Right Honourable Mackenzie King, who begged of him to stay in the service of his country and take over.

And so, Mr. St. Laurent became Prime Minister of Canada in 1948. There is no need to enumerate here, in detail, the great tasks with which he was directly associated. Still, mention should be made that, on the international level, he took an active part in setting up the United Nations and NATO, as well as in restoring peace in the Middle East at the time of the Suez crisis.

On the national scene, Mr. St. Laurent made a very great contribution towards launching Canada in the contemporary era. He completed the work of Confederation in successfully leading the negotiations that brought in the tenth province of our country, Newfoundland. Several major social measures, such as the universal old age pensions plan and Medicare, were introduced in Parliament by his administration.

He was responsible, in particular, for ending fiscal arrangements, effected first of all in 1941; it was he who suggested in 1955 new arrangements whereby all provinces were put on an equal footing, and who affirmed, for the first time in our history, the equalization concept, in order to help the underdeveloped provinces.

Senator Lamontagne, who at that time was one of Mr. St. Laurent's advisers in these matters, is unavoidably away today.

It is also Mr. St. Laurent who drew up the basic principles of a federal cultural policy, who implemented them in establishing the federal grants system to universities and in creating the National Arts Council. He set forth these principles in 1956 when he stated:

> First of all, our action at the cultural level must be aimed at strengthening regional cultures, particularly the two main cultures of Canada, so that they may radiate all over the land, and not at weakening them in order to produce a unique and uniform culture.
>
> Secondly, our cultural development, in all its aspects, must be left as much as possible to private initiative.
>
> Thirdly, the state must help and encourage individuals and private groups . . . but it must never, for any reason whatever, control them and take away their freedom of action.

These great principles, originally enunciated 17 years ago, continue to inspire the federal policy on culture.

As we can see, Mr. St. Laurent was, both at the international and national levels, a precursor, an innovator who still inspires those who have succeeded him.

As all great men, he always remained always a humble and simple man. He was a true statesman fully dedicated in the service of his country, but at the same time he never ceased to deeply love his family. That family has lost its beloved leader. In the name of all honourable senators and in my own name, I extend my deepest sympathy to them in this cruel loss. Their loss is also Canada's loss since, with the death of Mr. St. Laurent, whatever may be our political affiliation, whether we are French-speaking or not, our nation loses one of its most distinguished citizens who dedicated the best years of his life to the service of his country, to the service of the common good.

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, the passing at the venerable age of 91 of the Right Honourable Louis St. Laurent causes more melancholy than sadness.

This death brings back into actuality a most attaching personality, an exceptional career in law and public life and a time which already seems remote.

Louis St. Laurent was first, and during 35 years, a great lawyer whose advice was sought by governments and corporations. His colleagues recognized his competence by electing him President of the Bar of the province of Quebec and subsequently President of the Canadian Bar Association and finally, in 1949, by appointing him honorary president for life of this association.

I made his acquaintance at a time when the practice of his profession was his sole preoccupation but this did not prevent him from teaching commercial law at Laval University which I had the benefit of following. This is how I had the opportunity of appreciating both the great dignity and simplicity of this man of noble race.

His entry in politics, in the fall of 1941, was due to the death of the Right Honourable Ernest Lapointe. Louis St. Laurent was then 59—an age when one more often than not retires from rather than enters politics. He accepted as a duty the invitation of Mackenzie King to join his cabinet as Minister of Justice and as representative of the province of Quebec. At that time, conscription was the main concern and most members from Quebec were irrevocably opposed to it. In spite of their insistence, Louis St. Laurent refused to adopt the same attitude and went to the people of Quebec-East in February 1942 while reserving the right to take on this subject the positions which he would think best in Canada's interest. In spite of that very courageous, although clearly unpopular, position he took he was elected.

After the war he thought of going back to his law firm but Mr. King, as the Leader of the Government said earlier, insisted that he accept the office of Secretary of State for External Affairs, the first man to hold that office which Mr. King had always chosen to assume himself. That was in 1946. Two years later, after being elected head of the Liberal party, he succeeded Mr. King as Prime Minister.

The Leader of the Government mentioned the main events and main accomplishments of his career as head of the government. There is no doubt that thanks to him Canada's reputation at the international level developed significantly. In domestic affairs Louis St. Laurent proved to be chiefly a conscientious and methodical administrator. In the House he always had the respect of his opponents and the admiration of everyone.

It is very characteristic of Louis St. Laurent that after the election of June 1957 when his party won seven fewer seats than the Conservatives he did not elect to cling to power and decided to retire with dignity and no bitterness.

In the years that followed he went back to the practice of his profession, deliberately choosing to stay away from the political field. The only statements he allowed himself to make were to reaffirm his faith in the Confederation of Canada and good understanding between the two founding nations of this country.

Nevertheless, he kept an interest in politics. I vividly remember the kind letter he sent me when I was appointed Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys.

● (1420)

[English]

Honourable senators, unity, harmony, and hope: that is what Louis St. Laurent represented. He was a man whose entire adult life was dedicated to one of the worthiest of causes—Canada. He laboured to make this land great. He laboured with incredible energy and zeal, and his every noble effort was characterized by the same honesty and objectivity.

Louis St. Laurent was the perfect gentleman—kind, thoughtful, and fair. His profound wisdom, his depth of understanding, his sincere respect for the institution of Parliament, won him the undying respect and admiration of his political opponents.

[Translation]

The Canadian people will remember forever Louis St. Laurent because they owe him a lot.

To his three daughters, to his two sons and to all his relatives, I extend on behalf of the Opposition, my most sincere and heartfelt sympathy.

[English]

Hon. John J. Connolly: Honourable senators, in the wisdom and foresight of Divine Providence there are times in the life of a nation when great men emerge to confront circumstances of national crisis. The years of the late war represent one of those times, and Mr. St. Laurent was one of those men. Sure, firm judgment, complete integrity and courage were the qualities that were postulated by those times. All the resources of the nation, human and physical, were committed to that desperate struggle. Mr. St. Laurent's participation was not only to provide leadership in his native province of Quebec; he also had a major role to play in the consolidation and direction of the whole national war effort. He played both roles to the full.

Among giants—and in perspective it is right to say that many of his colleagues were giants—he too was a giant. The record testifies to the immensity of his personal contribution.

After victory was achieved, he was to preside over the reconstruction of Canada in peace. If war had transformed Canadian society and the Canadian economy, as it did, when he became Prime Minister at the relatively advanced age of 66, with the immense burden of responsibility, his policies provided the leadership, the integrity and the confidence which were needed in the new national order.

His policies enlarged Canada; they enriched the quality of Canadian life.

As Prime Minister he also found himself directing national affairs, as Canada began to build a new and emerging role internationally. To the test that this presented, he responded with great success.

I recall being in London in 1959, at a conference convened under the auspices of NATO, and meeting Robert Schuman, the great French statesman of that time. With complete spontaneity, as we met, he put his hands on my shoulders and said, "How is Mr. St. Laurent? You know, of course, that without him and Mr. Pearson the NATO organization, the great shield of the West, would not have been. It is thanks to them in great measure that we are here for this conference."

Mr. St. Laurent came onto the national, and indeed the international, stage relatively late in life. He came at a time when most men are thinking of retirement, as the Leader of the Opposition has said, and he gave his immense energies and abilities to the problems of public life wholeheartedly and generously. He had already established for himself a reputation at the bar. Among the great lawyers of his day, men like Tilley, Geoffrion and Lafleur, he, too, was great. His vision for his profession was not restricted to the great constitutional or commercial briefs which were entrusted to him. He saw the law and his profession as a force in Canadian society which could help weld the nation together. Sir James Aikin had established the Canadian Bar Association in 1914. There was some reluctance at the bar of Quebec that full participation in the work of CBA, particularly with the vexing problem of the desire for greater uniformity of law, might lead to a submerging, a smothering, of the institutions and traditions of the Civil Law of Quebec.

Mr. St. Laurent in 1920 joined the Canadian Bar Association and immediately began to preach the importance of its work. His judgment was that there would be no downgrading of the Civil Law, but rather an harmonious development between the two legal systems, the civil and the common, for the advantage of both and for the benefit of the nation. No one now doubts that his judgment has been completely vindicated.

As Senator Flynn has already pointed out, in the early days of CBA he was president and he, along with the Right Honourable R. B. Bennett, are the only two persons to whom the honour of honorary life president has been awarded.

Everyone who knew Mr. St. Laurent personally or, indeed, by reputation thought of him as a kind person and a great gentleman. He was more than that. He had a courtly bearing and demeanor which elicited the respect and admiration of all. He was the epitome in his day of a great Canadian. It is hard to compare him to others. Perhaps in public life his personal qualities, his capacities and his demeanor were reminiscent of Laurier who, too, was magnetic and a great man which Canadian society threw up for his time.

In the St. Laurent blood there was both the gallic and the gaelic strain. Like Laurier, in his early days he was formed by the environment of the mixed community of the Eastern Townships of Quebec, a community which was mixed not only on a racial but on a religious basis. Both men emerged from this community the incarnation of the finest Canadianism.

Mr. St. Laurent's problems were greater and more complex than those faced by Laurier. Mr. St. Laurent served the people of his country and, indeed, of other countries magnificently in his day and time. He carried into retirement and now he carries into history the respect, perhaps the reverence, and certainly the affection of his fellow countrymen. He might not have sought this status. But in this mantle and with a full heart, the people of Canada have enveloped him.

[Translation]

TRAVEL ARRANGEMENTS FOR SENATORS TO PAY RESPECTS

Hon. Leopold Langlois: Honourable senators, I wish to inform you that the official funeral ceremony for the late Right Honourable Louis St. Laurent will take place in the Basilica in Quebec City at 10 a.m. Saturday, and that the funeral procession will leave the National Assembly at 9.30 a.m. Arrangements have been made for the transportation of honourable senators from Ottawa to Quebec City. A special Air Canada flight on board a DC-9 aircraft will be chartered for this purpose. The departure will be from Uplands Airport at 7.45 a.m. Honourable senators will have to arrange for their transportation between their places of residence in Ottawa to Uplands Airport, but return transportation between the airport and the Basilica in Quebec City has already been arranged and honourable senators will not have to worry about it. The plane will leave Quebec at approximately 12 noon on Saturday, and will arrive at Uplands Airport at about 1 p.m. Honourable senators will have, upon arriving in Ottawa, to make their own transportation arrangements between the airport and their homes. There will also be another flight for senators who want to travel from Montreal to Quebec City, rather than Ottawa. Senators who expect to be leaving either from Ottawa or Montreal are requested to report to Mrs. Leblanc, one of the secretaries of the Government Leader, Honourable Senator Martin, this afternoon, if possible, or tomorrow morning at the latest. The sooner, the better. I believe that these arrangements will meet honourable senators' requirements. I am sure that they will avail themselves of them.

[English]

• (1430)

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Hon. Paul Martin tabled:

Report by the Textile and Clothing Board, dated June 15, 1973, to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, pursuant to section 19 of the Textile and Clothing Board Act, chapter 39, Statutes of Canada, 1970-71-72, respecting cotton yarns.

Copies of Agreement in principle on joint Federal-Provincial Transportation Development Program in Northern British Columbia.

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. Leopold Langlois: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), I move that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until tomorrow at 11 a.m.

Motion agreed to.

FISHERIES DEVELOPMENT ACT

BILL TO AMEND—THIRD READING

Hon. Chesley W. Carter moved the third reading of Bill C-4, to amend the Fisheries Development Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

CANADA WILDLIFE BILL

THIRD READING

Hon. Alan A. Macnaughton moved the third reading of Bill C-131, respecting wildlife in Canada.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

EDUCATION

FEDERAL SUPPORT FOR POST-SECONDARY EDUCATION—DEBATE CONTINUED

The Senate resumed from Tuesday, June 5, the adjourned debate on the inquiry of Senator Hicks, calling the attention of the Senate to the importance of federal government support for post-secondary education in Canada and the relations between the Government of Canada and the governments of the provinces concerning the universities of Canada.

Hon. Margaret Norrie: Honourable senators, the problems encountered by our Canadian universities in the financing of post-secondary education are complex indeed. On the subject there have been a great many opinions and debates since about 1910. Recent speakers on this subject, Senators Henry Hicks, Eugene Forsey and Fred Rowe, are all renowned educationalists, and I have listened to their comprehensive and learned opinions with profound interest and respect. However, I would like to add a few of my own observations, gleaned from articles I have read and stimulated by the interest that I have in the subject.

Social consciousness has been aroused to the point where financial barriers are being viewed as unacceptable hurdles to entrance into post-secondary education, and in fact the validity of any restriction is being questioned. In the 1960-70 decade we were faced with a rapidly rising demand for high level manpower, and we were faced with the need to accommodate a rapidly rising demand for places in post-secondary institutions. Canada was experiencing higher levels of unemployment, and everyone was saying that one must get a university education to find a job and be secure. Family incomes were greater, enabling more youth to take advantage of higher education. At this time Britain boasted publicly financed post-secondary institutions, as did other European nations to a somewhat lesser degree. These filled Canada's manpower needs. As a result, Canadian engineering and graduate studies in sciences were encouraged by heavy expenditures in these fields by governments.

Predicting future demand for specialized occupations is very risky speculation. Many factors can interfere in the natural and regular routine of national affairs. The first can be, of course, strikes; secondly, economic failures; thirdly, conflicts such as wars; and fourthly, a shuffling of priorities.

Economic upsets, such as the closing of highly technical plants, have stunned the nation's specialists by leaving hundreds of Ph.Ds jobless and floundering. In considerations of the public support of post-secondary education, it is estimated that in 1980-81 close to $5 billion—in terms of 1969 prices—is required for operating expenses. This will represent an increase of 184 per cent over the $2 billion in the operating costs incurred during the 1970-71 academic year, as stated by Stephen G. Peitchinis, Ph.D, Professor of Economics at the University of Calgary.

The question arises, of course: can the Canadian taxpayer meet the rapidly rising costs of education, which are predictably higher than the expected rate of national income? There are some other legitimate sources that need a big slice of the taxpayer's dollar—for instance, health care, social assistance, urban transportation, roads, pollution, public housing, law and order, and so on. Inevitably, choices will have to be made from time to time.

● (1440)

The "quality of life" we desire, or a "just society" or "social equity," whatever we may call it, is bought at the expense of some other resource, which momentarily has to be juggled around to the spot with highest priority.

During the 1960-70 decade, the rate of increase in public revenue allocated to post-secondary education exceeded substantially the rate of increase in total public revenue. The decision of the public authorities to pursue a spending policy, which caused increasing shares of the available resources to go to post-secondary education, shows the high priority given by them to this social activity. But it cannot go on forever and will inevitably drop—maybe below that rate.

Lord Robbins in Britain responded to a similar question in this way:

[Hon. Mrs. Norrie.]

> Whether we have them [the expenditures] or not is a matter of choice. It is not a question of any technical or economic inability to achieve them.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Pardon me, who said that?

Hon. Mrs. Norrie: Lord Robbins. We must search for alternative ways which will enable post-secondary institutions to continue to satisfy the social need for post-secondary education. In order to maintain high quality programs, the educationalists must increase the efficiency of their operations and find alternative sources of funds, which is no small task.

Periodic imposition of financial constraints weeds out the inefficient, and compels the potentially efficient to demonstrate their administrative capacities. I think the Maritime universities have developed well over the years doing this very thing.

The alternative source of funds is, of course, the student—harsh as this may sound. However, the student cannot be burdened with extra costs. It follows, therefore, that the application of such a policy will have to be preceded by arrangements designed to give potential students access to the necessary funds. An appropriate system of grants or loans can be recommended.

In going back over a few highlights in our Canadian history involving the federal government in post-secondary education, we see the federal government was involved in educational activities prior to 1910, and federal assistance to post-secondary education can be traced in a continuous sequence of programs from that time. Ontario and Quebec have significantly objected to the federal government's participation in financing post-secondary education. Some provinces have benefited much less than other provinces under grants and shared-cost programs.

As you all know, B.N.A. Act section 93 of the B.N.A. Act states:

> In and for each Province the Legislature may exclusively make Laws in relation to Education—

That was in 1867. But does "education"—in the context of the period when the Constitution was formulated—include universities? The debate has revolved around this issue.

Royal Military College was not challenged on constitutional grounds because it was founded for means of defence in 1876.

In 1937, Mr. Paul Martin introduced in the other place a resolution calling for the establishment of a program of national scholarships.

Hon. Mr. Martin: 1937?

Hon. Mrs. Norrie: He acknowledged that the provinces had responsibility for the universities, but argued that the term "exclusively" was not so restrictive that the federal government could not extend assistance to the provinces for a particular purpose.

The Massey Commission was more specific. It declared that, although universities were to be included under section 93, there were several closely related areas for which federal assistance was not only constitutionally permissible but socially necessary.

Since 1957—meaning the Massey Report—the issue has continued to focus on the appropriate scope and nature of federal involvement in post-secondary education.

The success of the veterans' rehabilitation program has been cited frequently in support of continuing demands for a "system of national scholarships" to help students meet increased costs and overcome the financial barrier to further education. At that time the federal government paid tuition fees, maintenance of student veterans, and also made direct grants to universities for operating costs. Thus it represents the initiation of federal financial assistance to operating costs of universities. The implications of the veterans' program focused popular attention directly on the universities and on their financial problems.

The strong arguments in favour of federal government assistance to post-secondary education are listed:

(a) Responsibility for defence.

(b) Provision for agricultural legislation. Agriculture was greatly in need of a helping hand at that time, and it still is.

(c) Federal responsibility for trade and commerce.

(d) In the "national interest". As a note of explanation here, Mr. Louis St. Laurent emphasized, when introducing the per capita grants program in 1951, that "it is in the national interest . . .to assist the universities to perform functions which are quite essential to the country."

(e) Financial limitations of the provinces.

(f) Equality of opportunity. Considerable apprehension was voiced that only students from higher income families would be able to pursue studies in universities.

(g) Interprovincial student mobility. The universities of some provinces had not yet developed professional schools of sufficient size and quality to accommodate all students in their provinces who wished to enter professional programs, necessitating that they seek admission in other provinces.

The last decade has witnessed an unprecedented explosion in post-secondary education for the following reasons:

1. Higher standards of living welcome higher education. That is to say, more highly trained manpower was necessary.

2. Increase in birth rate.

3. Increased immigration caused an upsurge of the 18-24 age cohort.

Between 1960-61 and 1969-70, university enrolments increased in the various provinces as follows: Newfoundland, 317 per cent; Alberta, 293 per cent; Prince Edward Island, 178 per cent; Manitoba, 162 per cent; Saskatchewan, 162 per cent; Ontario, 137 per cent; New Brunswick, 137 per cent; Nova Scotia, 144 per cent; British Columbia, 156 per cent; Quebec, 76 per cent.

Two-thirds of non-government funds were student fees, a substantial proportion of which are met from government student grants. In 1969-70, provincial grants to students amounted to $88 million. Grants from federal councils, departments and agencies to graduate students reached $29 million.

The evidence appears to indicate that a substantial proportion of that burden is in fact borne by governments, so it seems that the 13-24 per cent which students appear to contribute is actually in large part from government grants. In 1967-70, post-secondary institutions have become public institutions; 85 per cent of their operating costs and about 95 per cent of their capital expenditures are being met from public revenues.

● (1450)

Between two-thirds and three-quarters of the projected increase in operating costs of universities is accounted for by the projected increase in enrolment. Thus, the projected increase in all universities of 212 per cent between 1970-71 and 1980-81 is reduced to a small percentage when account is taken of the projected increase in enrolment.

Therefore, a very substantial deceleration in the rate of increase in costs is anticipated during the current decade. Universities must economize in many ways. Some do much better than others according to ability of management and presidency. Some recommend very strongly that provinces give serious consideration to the establishment of procedures which will ensure the minimum of duplication in specializations and programs for which demand is relatively low. Also, a greater effort should be made for interprovincial co-operation on the issue.

Specialization within regions, particularly in some professional programs, will be a very effective way of reducing costs and probably increasing the quality of programs.

There is an article in the Regina Leader-Post on the necessity of reviewing the role of universities and colleges in Canada. The article refers to Dr. J. A. Corry in these words:

> Dr. J. A. Corry, former principal of Queen's University at Kingston and a distinguished authority on Canadian university administration, has suggested that universities are due for a change in objectives which would place more emphasis on their undergraduate teaching role, and reduce their involvement in graduate studies and research. Dr. Corry told the Association of Universities and Colleges of Canada in a recent address that at least some part of the financial difficulties experienced by many universities can be attributed to going overboard to beef up graduate studies and research activities, often at the expense of staff and facilities made available for undergraduate work. In fact, this trend may have contributed to 'turning off' thousands of young people for whom the pursuit of a degree has lost its charm.

The article goes on:

> Part of the blame for the swing of the pendulum in Canada away from undergraduate degree preparation and short-term vocational preparation certificate programs can be laid on the doorstep of government, and to a certain extent of academics on campus. When governments make large sums of money available for applied research in the physical and social sciences and indicate that projects are to be staffed by graduate students and professors, who can blame the universities for assent?

In 1969-70, cost per university student ranged between a low of $2,597 in New Brunswick and a high of $4,171 in Ontario.

It may be good advice for universities to work harder to increase their enrolment, thus reducing costs by having their facilities filled to capacity. The development of excellence should be encouraged whether it is demonstrated by individual students, by individual programs or by individual institutions.

Another area where economy can be exercised by our post-secondary administrators is in the field of research. It is impossible to determine the rationale on which assistance for various programs is based and there is no evidence of an effort to co-ordinate the activities of the multitude of federal, provincial and institutional agencies engaged in the provision of assistance for research activity.

I do realize a certain amount of research is beneficial to graduate students. Research funding has increased greatly and it may be that the whole problem should be handled by a commission which would involve as members the National Research Council, the Medical Research Council and the Canada Council.

Through all these problems the federal-provincial conflict is very much an issue, and constant debate takes place.

In his report, "Financing Post-Secondary Education in Canada," commissioned by the Council of Ministers of Education of Canada, Professor Stephen G. Peitchinis quoted the following comments by three outstanding Canadian political leaders, which manifest the nature of the federal-provincial conflict on the issue. According to Professor Peitchinis, Prime Minister L. B. Pearson put the federal case in the following way:

> Education is, under our Constitution, a matter of provincial jurisdiction. The federal government does not dispute this ... At the same time, education is obviously a matter of profound importance to the economic and social growth of the country as a whole. This is particularly true of higher education. Apart altogether from the general interest in fostering equality of opportunity for Canadians ... the federal government has specific and particular responsibilities to which higher education is relevant ... the federal government accepts primary responsibility for employment and economic activity generally in the country. We recognize that provincial governments share our concern in these matters and pursue these common aims in the conduct of their own affairs. It is, however, the responsibility of the federal government to devise and apply national policies and measures that are necessary to ensure that the economy of Canada will continue to expand and will become increasingly productive, in order that there may be full employment and an increasing level of prosperity for all our citizens. The preparation of our young people for productive participation in the labour force of the country is a matter of vital concern to all Canadians. We have also to keep in mind that young people of a particular province do not necessarily receive their education and training in their home province, and that people, after graduation, do not necessarily live out their lives and take up employment in the province where they received their education. These facts affect the burden of costs that falls upon the different provinces.

[Hon. Mrs. Norrie.]

Professor Peitchinis said that a characteristic provincial view was expressed by the Premier of Quebec, the late Mr. Daniel Johnson, when he said:

> ... that system which takes the form of a transfer of certain tax points is surely a more acceptable way of eliminating the confusion created by past formulas and indicates in that respect that the federal government is coming back to the spirit of the Constitution ... But the Federal Government knows, as we do, that Quebec cannot accept (the more profitable 50%— of operating costs option), as it implies a right of interfering with the spending process and therefore the administration of post-secondary educational institutions.

As quoted by Professor Peitchinis, John Robarts, when he was Premier of Ontario, declared that:

> Ontario does not agree that federal participation in the field of higher education requires its direct involvement with the universities in a system of grants. Direct federal grants not only complicate but often contradict the long-term arrangements and priorities of our Department of University Affairs in dealing with our universities. In Ontario, we would prefer to distribute public funds among our universities on the basis of our own assessments and criteria, rather than have part of such assistance paid directly to our universities on the basis of a national formula.

Honourable senators, these are vital viewpoints.

Dr. Peitchinis ends his penetrating analysis by indicating that the last figures available, 1968-69, show that post-secondary institutions spent $1,113 million on operating costs, that $620 million or 55.5 per cent of that came from Ottawa, that the provinces provided $240 million and therefore provincial educationalists should not complain that post-secondary education is costing them excessively, and that the federal government is now paying the lion's share of the public subsidies to post-secondary education but is exercising no control on how the money is spent because education is a legislative responsibility.

Dr. Peitchinis's recommendations are extreme and I will not go into that part of his report, but his research is interesting and is valuable for those who will be making the decisions in financing post-secondary education in the future.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Molgat, debate adjourned.

● (1500)

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

On the Motion to Adjourn:

Hon. Mr. Martin: Honourable senators, before moving the adjournment, I think I should advise you, as I have already advised the Leader of the Opposition and Senator Macdonald, of the situation that might develop between now and tomorrow morning when we will convene at 11 o'clock. The House of Commons is now about to debate the bill concerning the Olympic Games, which has to be dealt with one way or the other before Parliament rises—if and when it is going to rise—in order that the Olympic Games administration in Montreal may proceed with their work. When that bill will come to us I cannot say with any certainty, but I have had some indications that we may expect it either this evening or early tomorrow. At any rate, whenever we get it, it is important that we should deal with the bill one way or the other, particularly if there is a likelihood that we will not be coming back for some time. I should add that the question as to whether or not we will be coming back for some time is something that at the moment only God knows, and I am sure that He has not been taken fully into the confidence of all honourable gentlemen in the other place.

What will happen after that bill has been disposed of in the House of Commons is a matter for conjecture, but I still remain optimistic. Beyond that I do not want to go, for the simple reason that I do not know what will happen. However, I shall keep Senator Macdonald fully informed.

I think the wisest course for us to follow is to adjourn until tomorrow morning when we will be able to deal with the bill to which I have referred, if we have it, and when we may have some indication as to what is to happen to Parliament in the days following.

I thought I had better give you that information so that Senator Deschatelets can get together with the rolling phrases which he normally uses when introducing a bill, and so that Senator Asselin can prepare himself for a great literary effort, under the guidance and supervision of Senator Macdonald, the Acting Leader of the Opposition, in whom, as in his leader, we have nothing but confidence and for whom we have the utmost admiration.

I move the adjournment of the Senate.

Hon. Mr. Deschatelets: Honourable senators, may I ask the Leader of the Government if we may take it for granted that the bill concerning the Olympic Games is the only bill we can expect to receive from the House of Commons?

Hon. Mr. Martin: I think that is the only bill, unless the amendments to the Criminal Code should come to us before 6 o'clock tomorrow evening. However, I do not think that will happen. I like to leave that little proviso in there so as not to give rise to too serious an objection later.

Hon. Mrs. Norrie: What has happened to the Crop Insurance Act?

Hon. Mr. Martin: I believe it is still in the stage of legislative incubation.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 11 a.m.

THE SENATE

Friday, July 27, 1973

The Senate met at 11 a.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Hon. Paul Martin tabled:

Capital Budget of the Freshwater Fish Marketing Corporation for the fiscal year ending April 30, 1974, pursuant to section 70(2) of the Financial Administration Act, chapter F-10, R.S.C., 1970, together with copy of Order in Council P.C. 1973-1822, dated June 29, 1973, approving same.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Paul Martin: Honourable senators, I will be asking shortly for an adjournment of the house at the call of the Chair. I am led to believe that some understanding has been reached in the other place with regard to the disposition of the bill dealing with amendments to the Criminal Code. It is not likely that we shall be faced with that bill before we return from the period of adjournment, which will be some time from now.

There are only two measures that we could have before us some time during the course of this day. One of those is the bill dealing with the provision for the Olympic Games, and I believe we shall have at least that bill before two o'clock.

Last night the Committee of the Whole in the House of Commons made unexpected progress with the hijacking bill, and because of the urgency of that bill it is conceivable that it will be through the other place and before us today. However, on that I cannot speak with any assurance at all.

At any rate, I suggested this morning that in order to meet the problem facing both houses a request might be made that the normal period of questions in the other place be postponed until later this day, and I am happy to say that I have just received word that the Question Period has been at least transferred from the usual hour of eleven o'clock to twelve o'clock, it being a one-hour period, if not waived for the day. I am informed that they will be proceeding with the Olympic Games bill forthwith. So it is possible that we shall have that bill by noon or, hopefully, before one o'clock.

That is all I can report at the moment. I now propose that we adjourn to the call of the Chair at some time between now and two o'clock.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

At 12.05 the sitting was resumed.

OLYMPIC (1976) BILL

FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-196, respecting the 1976 Summer Olympic Games.

Bill read first time.

SECOND READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. Jean-Paul Deschatelets moved, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 44(1)(f), that the bill be read a second time now.

He said: Honourable senators, I understand that time is of the essence, so I shall try to be as brief as possible. Let me say at the outset that I have given to this bill a thorough analysis and if there are any questions in its regard it will give me great pleasure to try to answer them.

In starting my remarks I should like to remind honourable senators that as soon as the Olympic Games were allotted to Montreal, Mayor Drapeau stated and restated on many occasions, first, that these Games would be staged without extravagance, secondly, that these Games would be self-financing—meaning that he was not expecting any direct contribution from the federal government, if proper legislation were passed by that government—and this is the purpose of the bill before us.

In the past, honourable senators, coins and stamps have been sold on the occasion of the Olympic Games, but this will be the first time that the sale of coins and stamps will finance entirely this world event.

Last November, COJO—which is the organization that has been formed under the Quebec Corporation Act—submitted a budget to the federal government. This budget was carefully examined, and all in all the expenditures involved in the holding of these Games were found to be reasonable for the kind of structures planned for these Games. Under the COJO budget the total cost of these Games will amount to $310 million, of which $250 million will be for capital costs and $60 million for operating costs. It was felt, after an analysis by officials of the federal government, that the $60 million for operating costs seemed low, and that a figure of $82 million would appear to be more accurate. So, as a result of this budget analysis, $332 million was considered by federal government officials to be a fair estimate of the total cost of the Games, excluding the cost of the Olympic Village which might qualify under the regular program of the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation.

Turning now to the revenue side, it was on this item that there was a discrepancy between the figures submitted in the COJO budget and the opinion expressed by officials of the federal government. COJO expects revenues of approximately $18 million from ticket sales, TV rights, and so forth. This was found to be a reasonable expectation. The balance of the revenue must be obtained from the sale of commemorative coins and stamps. COJO expects to obtain $250 million from the coin sales which, of course, is the main and key item in its budget. I should inform honourable senators that $230 million was raised by sales of commemorative coins for the last Olympic Games, held in Munich. It should be noted that of this amount 90 per cent was subscribed in Germany and only 10 per cent in other countries. The house will recall that it is with respect to this item that federal government officials expressed the opinion that these sales might not exceed $100 million, rather than the anticipated $250 million, because in their opinion the size of the German and Canadian markets cannot be compared.

● (1210)

As far as the sale of stamps is concerned, COJO expects a net revenue of $10 million, which is considered to be a fair estimate. The lottery is expected to raise $32 million, which again is considered to be a reasonable target.

The fact that COJO cannot rely under the provisions of this bill on any direct contribution from the federal government, before, during or after the Games will no doubt induce COJO to organize this event within the limit of the budget they have presented. The federal government, as honourable senators know, has made it very clear from the outset that it will not accept responsibility for any deficit. The City of Montreal, the Government of Quebec and COJO have accepted the clear attitude of the federal government in this regard. They have given their assurances in writing on the understanding that the required legislation now before us is passed. It would be desirable that these three long letters be taken as read and printed as an appendix to the Debates of the Senate of this day. I hope honourable senators will agree to this, because it would make the presentation more comprehensible.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is it agreed?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(For text of correspondence see appendix pp. 971-972.)

[Translation]

Hon. Mr. Deschatelets: Honourable senators, this bill makes five distinct provisions, with regard, first of all, to coins; second, to stamps; third, to a lottery; fourth, to the establishment of an Olympic Account in the accounts of Canada; and fifth, to tax exemptions for individuals and companies wishing to contribute to COJO.

We are going to examine briefly how things will work if the bill is passed. The Royal Canadian Mint will strike $5 and $10 coins. These coins will be put on sale in Canada and abroad. They will bear the respective dates 1973, 1974, 1975 and 1976. In fact, they should go on sale in the fall, if, of course, this bill is passed.

It goes without saying that the federal government will maintain complete and sole responsibility for the production and merchandising of the Olympic coins and stamps. The costs of production and promotion will be deducted from the proceeds of the sale of these items, and the profits will go to COJO, because, as I said earlier, an account will be opened for COJO in the accounts of Canada, and all production costs that may be incurred by the federal government will be debited to COJO, in the Olympic account, while the net revenues for COJO will be also credited to this account. It goes without saying that the federal government will take the full and entire responsibility for the production and merchandising of the coins and stamps.

I would now like to give you a very concrete but brief idea of how this will work. I must, however, warn the honourable senators that the figures I am going to use are rough approximations. They are used only to give you an example of how this mechanism will operate.

If the production of a $5 Olympic coin costs, for instance, $2.50 and if sales and promotion expenses as well as the cost for distributing these coins amount to 10¢ each, the total cost of production and sales expenses will then be $2.60, which means that the difference, that is $2.40 for this $5 coin, will then be paid to COJO on the account opened for this purpose. This is how the mechanism will operate. But again I want to remind honourable senators that the figures I mentioned, about the cost of production, are approximate. This must still be established.

I inform honourable senators right away that clause 5(3) provides—and this is important—that $450 million will be the maximum total amount of all Olympic coins issued or sold under the present legislation; that is to say, should there be such a strong demand in Canada and abroad as to reach $450 million one day, this will then be the maximum amount under the provisions of this bill, above which the federal government will not issue any coins.

There is also clause 11 (5) according to which the total amount of payments which could be made to COJO under the present legislation will not exceed $260 million, which means that in the federal account, over the years before the Olympic Games take place, whenever an amount of $260 million will have been paid to COJO under the direction of the Minister of Finance, then it will be finished, according to the present legislation, and this amount will not be exceeded.

I also draw honourable senators' attention on what I consider as the key clause of the whole mechanism of the Olympic coins. This is clause 4 (1), which I believe I should quote, because it is very short and reads as follows:

> Subject to this section, a tender of payment of money in Olympic coins is a legal tender if it is made for payment of an amount not exceeding twenty dollars, but for no greater amount.

The English version translates the words "pouvoir libératoire" to "legal tender." As far as I am concerned, I cannot do otherwise but make the act say exactly that. The fact of the matter is that we are not dealing here with medals but coins, in five- and ten-dollar denominations, that will be put in circulation. Those coins will be legal tender. This means that they will have the same power as the twenty-five cent piece in my pocket. That being so, it also means that if someday, having a five-dollar coin in my pocket, I take a cab and the fare runs up to around $2.50, I can, under the law, offer that Olympic coin of $5, which is "legal tender," and so pay off my debt to the driver.

The same goes if I run up a bill of $19.70 for groceries. I could offer two Olympic coins of $10 each and hope to get in return the difference between $19.70 and $20. I want this to be well understood because until now there has been talk of medals in some areas. These will be coins and because of this, I say this is the key clause in the whole Olympic Games financing bill.

This, of course, could offer interesting possibilities to those who will be in charge of the sales promotion.

● (1220)

[English]

Honourable senators, as far as the stamps are concerned the same accounting system will be in effect. It is expected that $32 million will be derived from the sale of stamps, and after the analysis was made this was found to be a reasonable estimation. Whether for the coinage or for the stamps, the payments out of the account of COJO will be made on the authorization of the Minister of Finance.

Pursuant to clauses 13(1) and 13(2) of the bill, detailed reports respecting the COJO account will be made to Parliament not later than May 1974. In other words, it is compulsory that detailed reports be made to both Houses of Parliament by the Minister of Finance and the Postmaster General covering the operations of the COJO account. There is also provision in the bill for detailed reports every six months after May 1974 until the completion of the Games.

The bill provides that a lottery may also be authorized by COJO, or one of its agents, in the province of Quebec or in any other province which gives its approval for such a lottery. Again, I should like to make it perfectly clear that the federal government will have no responsibility whatsoever with respect to the organization of these provincial or interprovincial lotteries.

Following the practice at previous games in other countries, the local CBC organization will have to provide all the facilities for radio and TV commentators, and so on. It is believed that a sum of about $25 million will be required for these activities.

Another area is that of security, of course. As Canada will be the host of about 9,000 foreign atheletes and officials, 4,000 representatives of the international news media, heads of state, and hundreds of thousands of visitors, and in order to prevent harassment or threats of violence from subversive groups, it is clear, as I am sure everyone will agree, that the federal government has a direct responsibility in this field. It is felt that an amount of approximately $27.5 million will be necessary to co-ordinate the protection provided by the local Quebec police, the RCMP, and even the Canadian Armed Forces.

[Translation]

Honourable senators, the government, as well as all the departments concerned, intends to implement special programs in all the provinces of Canada, to promote amateur sport for the 1976 Olympic Games. It is expected also that several million dollars will be spent on this program which will last from the present time until the Olympic Games are held. I would like to say, however, that the aim of the various departments is not so much to prepare athletes for international competitions; rather, the program will be far-reaching involving institutions, colleges, CEGEPs and universities, so that our young people will have access to sports facilities under the guidance of specialized coaches. I think you will admit that this money will be well spent.

Now, honourable senators, I told you earlier that I had considerably shortened my explanations, but I hope that I have given the essentials of this bill. I repeat that we must not forget that in Munich the sum of $230 million was raised through the sale of commemorative coins and stamps, and only 10 per cent of that amount came from outside Germany.

In concluding I think that I can honestly and sincerely tell you what my attitude is towards this proposed method of self-funding, which, in my opinion, is most original and opens new prospects. I must say that, all things considered, I am not fully in agreement with the results of the analysis made by the federal government's officials, who set a limit of about $100 million on the proceeds to be obtained from the sale of Olympic coins and stamps, and I will tell you why.

Until now, there has never been an Olympiad financed solely by the sale of coins and stamps. It must also be said that up until now only rich nations had access to the Olympic Games. That is a situation that seems abnormal to me. I think that the Olympic ideal is to allow those Games to be organized so that middle-size nations will have access to them. I think that is where the challenge of the self-financing of the Games takes on a very interesting dimension. In the past, and I think I am well informed, governments hosting the Games assumed astronomical deficits. So if the 1976 Olympic Games are organized as they should, I think that the self-financing will be a success. But I put down two conditions. This proposed self-financing must be carried out in an aggressive and bold manner not only in Canada but in all countries participating in those Olympic Games. I think it is possible. Furthermore, I think that if there is to be a deficit it will be very small, particularly if these two conditions I mentioned earlier are met.

The first one is this: It behooves COJO and the City of Montreal to keep the total cost of those Games within $332 million. I must say that for the Olympic Games I looked into in the past 10 to 12 years this amount of $332 million is the smallest ever forecast for the cost of facilities and the total cost of the Games.

I set out another condition under which it is possible to self-finance the 1976 Olympic Games. It has to do with the organization of sales in all participating countries. I say readily that the 1976 Olympic Games do not concern only Montreal, do not concern only Canada but it is also the moral responsibility of all countries because over 125 countries will be sending their athletes here in the hope of being proudly represented.

I think there are two points of views to be considered here: the athletic success and the financial success.

Success in sports is a sure thing, for in the past all participating countries contributed to it with their athletes. But I say that it is not enough. I suggest that all the foreign countries that will send their athletes here have the moral obligation to help in promoting the sale of Olympic coins and stamps, especially if they want the financial results to be in accordance with the sports' results. It is not in the interest of any country to organize Olympic Games and to find itself afterwards face to face with tremendous deficits. I think that there lies the challenge for the next Olympic Games. I hope that the COJO will find sale possibilities in all foreign countries. I hope that it will put them in the hands of local sports organizations in France, in the United Kingdom, in Germany and everywhere so as to make them understand that they also have a moral responsibility in the financing of those Games, either by selling coins and stamps or by helping to promote their sale.

Honourable senators, needless to say, during the next three years, tremendous efforts will be made to draw the attention of young Canadian people, not only to the idea of representing Canada in international competitions, because I do not think that that is the only object of Olympic Games, but to arouse in young people throughout the world the love of sportsmanship. I believe that in a country like Canada where it is always being said that young people are trying to find their feet, that they are looking for an ideal—well, perhaps this bill will help to solve in this country many problems of incomprehension among our young people.

Honourable senators, in concluding, I do not hesitate to say—and I carefully considered this bill and its implications—that I am convinced that self-financing will succeed in supporting those Games, but do not forget that the only request that the federal government received from the Mayor of Montreal and from COJO was to give them an instrument to start and promote the sale of coins and stamps—and that is exactly what we are doing today.

As I was saying, COJO will only have to set up a good sales promotion program aimed at the whole world so that not only Montreal, Quebec, the Canadian provinces and the whole of Canada shall help to finance these Olympics. I suggest, since this is a new thing, that all the participating countries have a moral obligation to insure not only the athletic success but also the financial success of these Olympic Games.

I have nothing else to add for now. If you have any questions, I will try to answer them the best I can. However, I know, honourable senators, that you shall join me in wishing to COJO the best of success.

● (1230)

Hon. Martial Asselin: Honourable senators, I want first of all to congratulate Senator Deschatelets who reviewed in a clear fashion the various provisions of the bill now before us. It may come as a surprise to him, following the remarks I am about to make, to discover that I do not agree with all the points he brought up. In any case, I want to provide my contribution because I want to try to give the opinion of the Opposition on this bill which is very difficult to study; to me any way, it is not clear and leaves room for confusion.

As Senator Deschatelets said, the primary purpose of this bill is to help finance the Olympic Games which will be held in Montreal in 1976.

I do not like the term "self-financing" used by Senator Deschatelets, as this self-financing of the Olympic Games will be done in three major ways: the issue and sale of commemorative coins, the printing and sale of commemorative stamps and the creation of a national lottery.

Honourable senators, I must tell you right now that the Conservative Party indicated from the beginning that it favoured the idea of the bill as, in our opinion, the 1976 Olympic Games in Montreal will not be an event which will be of benefit to Québec only; it is a national event which will directly or indirectly benefit Canada as a whole.

It is obvious that if we read the committee's report we might find that our members made things difficult by demanding explanations about the way the federal government intends to help finance the Olympic Games, but even though they introduced amendments in committee it does not necessarily mean that we are opposed to the bill. Moreover, most of our amendments have been accepted by the ministers who sponsored the bill. We only wanted to improve the bill, to make it more efficient and clarify some inconsistencies with regard to making good the deficit that is bound to be incurred.

When speaking about making good the deficit, the Mayor of Montreal said on several occasions that there would be no deficit. In its financial analysis, the government of Quebec foresees a deficit. The advisors of the federal government, of the Treasury Board, estimated at certain times that the deficit which will be incurred for the organization and the maintaining of the Olympic Games will amount to $172 million. Moreover, if all those people think there will be a deficit, we must ask the following question: who will make up this deficit, if there is one?

The Olympic authorities claim that they will be able to receive an amount of about $250 million from the sale of coins. Then, when evaluating this amount, the following facts were not taken into account.

● (1240)

[English]

Honourable senators, clause 3 of the bill calls for silver coins of $5 and $10 denominations to be minted for the years 1973 to 1976 inclusive, and these coins are to be legal tender at face value. The profit on the coins will amount to roughly 60 per cent, which will mean a profit of $3 on a $5 coin and $6 on a $10 coin, the proceeds of which will be given to the Olympic organizing committee.

Clause 6(1) deals with the issue and distribution of special commemorative postage stamps and postal related products by the Postmaster General. The price of the postage stamps will be at the legal rate for postage plus an additional surcharge fixed by the Postmaster General with the approval of the Governor in Council. It is not yet known how much the stamps will sell for or what the profit margin will be, but the revenue which will be given to the Olympic organizing committee is the net revenue derived from the surcharge and that from the stamp used for collecting purposes, as well as the net proceeds from the sale of postal related products as determined by the Postmaster General.

Honourable senators, it costs approximately 50 cents per 1,000 stamps for printing, yet the mailing of a regularly stamped letter, including handling, sorting, transportation and delivery, costs the Post Office eight cents. Thus the Post Office could not afford to offer any more financial assistance to COJO without incurring another deficit.

Reference is made in the bill to lotteries. For this purpose the pertinent provisions of Part V of the Criminal Code will be suspended in order to allow the Olympic organizing committee or its agents to conduct a lottery. Under regulations made by the Governor in Council all provinces will be given the right to approve or disapprove the lottery. Apparently, however, the provinces will have no part in setting the terms and conditions governing the operation of the lottery. This, honourable senators, abrogates the powers allocated to the provinces in Part V, section 190 (6) of the Criminal Code, whereby provincial lotteries are allowed to be conducted in provinces. The wording of Bill C-196 provides only that the provinces can set the conditions with respect to the length of time the lottery can operate within its boundaries. Provision is included in the bill to allow the participating provinces a commission. If the proceeds of the lottery are used for the purpose of providing financial assistance to the Olympic Games the province will receive an as yet undisclosed amount to promote the development of some other sport in the province.

It is well known that many objections have been raised by various groups against lotteries. It is thought by many that this method of raising revenue will result in the money of the poor financing the Olympic Games. In my opinion the government, by proceeding in this manner, will be imposing an indirect tax. It is not certain that the provinces will agree to a system of lotteries within their boundaries. The Province of Manitoba has already stated that it will not participate. Furthermore, we cannot at the moment evaluate the amount of revenue such a national lottery would provide for the Olympic organization. We can only establish the financial contribution of the federal government.

A study of the bill emphasizes the confusion which has so far surrounded the Olympic Games. For example, on January 9 the honourable member for Fraser Valley West inquired of the Minister of National Health and Welfare whether the government had yet reached a decision in connection with future financial participation in the Montreal Olympics in 1976. In reply the minister informed the honourable member that the Montreal Olympics were not under his jurisdiction. The question was then asked of the Minister of State for Urban Affairs, who replied that the position had not changed from that stated previously by the Prime Minister in the House. On January 18 the honourable member for Joliette inquired whether the federal government was prepared to grant financial assistance to ensure the success of the Olympic Games. The Minister of State for Urban Affairs replied that the government's position had not changed, and added: We have had some requests of a non-financial nature from the organizing committee which I have indicated are being considered by the government. Also, on January 25, the Right Honourable member for Prince Albert asked whether the Prime Minister could give assurance that Canada was not going to make a contribution to the Olympic Games. Prime Minister Trudeau replied that there would be no special assistance, no special financial aid, from the federal government to Montreal or to COJO for the holding of the Olympics.

● (1250)

On February 3 the Prime Minister stated that the federal government through CMHC could spend between $26 million and $54 million on the Olympic Games. In addition, he estimated there would be an expenditure of approximately $20 million for increased costs for security, customs and immigration. Further, the CBC would provide basic television service at a cost of $25 million.

Let us look at some more inconsistencies which were demonstrated in the House of Commons concerning this topic. On August 15, 1972, Prime Minister Trudeau wrote a letter to Mayor Jean Drapeau expressing his concern over the financing of the Games. In this letter he referred to the statement of February 24, 1972, that the Games would cost only $124 million. Mr. Trudeau then claimed that, in the absence of any detailed estimates from the committee, it was necessary for the federal government to undertake its own review of capital operating costs. He suggested that the capital operating costs could be more than those estimated, and could reasonably be set at half a billion dollars.

Serious consideration must be given to providing security for the 1976 Games. After the violence which erupted in Munich in 1972, the important role of the security forces cannot be underplayed. In Mr. Trudeau's statement to the House on February 2, 1973, he estimated the cost of maintaining the security staff, which will consist of RCMP, Armed Forces and Customs and Immigration personnel, at approximately $20 million. However, in Bill C-196 there is no mention of security financing or who will bear the cost.

I wish now to refer to capital operating costs, which were mentioned by Senator Deschatelets. Senator Deschatelets gave us the correct figures that represent the capital operating costs, but I am sure he will also admit that there is a difference between the estimate of costs made by COJO and Mayor Drapeau in Montreal and that of the President of the Treasury Board when they analyzed the financial costs of the 1976 Olympic Games.

Having said that, Montreal will be the host city for the 1976 Olympic Games. It was a Canadian decision to nominate Montreal as the representative Canadian city to be the host for the 1976 Olympics. The honour went to Montreal on behalf of Canada, and therefore the honour of holding the 1976 Olympic Games is national. The Games will not belong to any particular city or region.

[Translation]

Even after the bill was adopted by the Commons committee there were still some doubts in the mind of the President of the Treasury Board with regard to the possible deficit—because there will be a deficit. What then will be the federal government's commitment? The President of the Treasury Board, according to an article in the Montréal-Matin of Thursday, July 26, 1973, said he wanted assurances. I quote from that article as follows:

Mr. Charles Drury, President of the Treasury Board, promised he will obtain from Prime Minister Robert Bourassa, from Mayor Jean Drapeau and from the General Director of COJO, Mr. Roger Rousseau, the written assurance that they are satisfied with the Olympic financing bill and that neither of the three parties intends to request a financial contribution from the federal government if COJO should meet a deficit as feared by the federal authorities.

Of course, I will not take up the arguments put forward in the House of Commons by the member for Matane and the NDP members to the effect that the money which would be used for the Olympics could be used to organize amateur sport in Canada and also for housing development. But as stated by Senator Deschatelets, I think this is a national event and in view of the fact that we have been chosen to receive the 1976 Olympic Games the federal government should have the assurance, since it said that no deficit would take place, that the parties involved will be able to secure the money required for those Games to be a great success.

As I said earlier, if I am taking up those contradictions which surrounded the bill in the other place it is because I want to demonstrate that the Canadian public is entitled to know in advance what will be the precise contribution of the federal government in the organization of the Olympic Games.

Hon. Mr. Martin: It is clear.

Hon. Mr. Asselin: It is not clear at all in the bill.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Not in the bill but the government's position is clear.

Hon. Mr. Asselin: The government's position is clear; it says that it will not make up any deficit. But we have, of course, had experience in the past of an event held in Montreal, which incurred a large deficit, and in that case the federal government was forced to intervene. Senator Martin would perhaps be surprised if I told him that if there were a deficit I would not be against its being met by the federal government, since this is a national event. Personally, I would not be against it. But what I wanted to say was that this bill, of course, is aimed at providing several sources of funds for the Olympic Games, so that the deficit may be smaller; now, the federal government has said that it would not meet the deficit, but why, still, this hesitation on the part of the President of the Treasury Board who states: Even if we did say that, we still want written assurances from the Mayor of Montreal, the Premier of Quebec and the COJO authorities that if there should be a deficit, it will not have to be met by the federal government.

So I say that as a result of this confusion that has prevailed in the relations between the federal government, Mayor Drapeau and the province of Quebec over how the deficit could be met, as members of the Opposition, we rejoice at having this occasion to make our country better known, through the Olympics, to many athletes who will come and visit us. Senator Martin should not take my remarks as reflecting criticism or opposition to the Olympics. But, since it is the role of the Opposition to search for deficiencies in the bills and indicate them to the Senate, I think it was our duty to make the remarks we made this morning.

After all, we are in favour of the Olympics. We say that it is a bill which gives rise to confusion, but nevertheless we wish every possible success to COJO. We hope, honourable senators, that all Canadians will be able to benefit from such an important event.

[English]

Hon. Mr. Martin: Honourable senators, I propose that we adjourn now until two o'clock. We will, I hope, have royal assent some time today, assuming that the Senate examines, with the care it will want to, whatever measure might still come before us. I have spoken with the Leader of the Opposition regarding this, and he concurs in the suggestion that we adjourn now until two o'clock.

I understand there will be at least one more speaker on Bill C-196. If we take this adjournment it would perhaps give us an opportunity to see what the situation ahead is.

Hon. Mr. Deschatelets: May I ask the government leader if there is another honourable senator who wishes to speak?

Hon. Mr. Martin: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Deschatelets: There is one?

Hon. Mr. Martin: There is at least one.

Hon. Mr. Deschatelets: Otherwise it would take me just two or three minutes to deal with some of the points raised.

Hon. Mr. Martin: I know, but I made a commitment to the Leader of the Opposition that we would adjourn at 1 o'clock and return at 2 o'clock. I wish to respect that commitment because of the very co-operative way in which he has responded to this situation.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): I think this will be agreeable to everyone in the house, but I would suggest that the Leader of the Government now arrange to have the person who is to adjourn the debate stand and do so.

Hon. Mr. Martin: That is right, he will have to adjourn the debate.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Until later this day.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Macnaughton: Is it the desire of honourable senators that the debate be adjourned at this moment?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

On motion of Senator Macnaughton, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

• (1400)

At 2 p.m. the sitting was resumed.

Hon. Alan A. Macnaughton: Honourable senators, regardless of what is generally thought of Mayor Drapeau of Montreal, I personally think a great deal of him. He has done so much for the city. I will not attempt to compare his efforts with those of our colleague to my left, Senator Fournier (de Lanaudière) who, in his own time, was a great Mayor of the City of Montreal. I do congratulate His Honour Mayor Drapeau on his dynamic foresight in fighting to obtain the Olympic Games for Montreal and Canada, because, after all, for this short period of time Montreal becomes the showcase for the rest of Canada to the world. In bringing the Olympic Games to Montreal, the mayor has brought a new dimension in living to the attention of Canadians generally, and the Games will be of great benefit to this country.

My complaint is that some Canadians are far too modest in international efforts and affairs. All one need do is spend a little time in Europe—and I know all of us have spent considerable time there—and look at this great country, Canada; look at its resources, its people, its climate, its history, the enterprise of Canadians over the years—in fact, everything connected with it. This is a great country, and it is time we took its light from under the bushel and showed it to the rest of the world.

For example, take Expo '67. There was a great deal of criticism; it was said it would be a flop, it would be a failure. What happened? It turned out to be one of the greatest sales efforts which this country has ever made. It was good for Canada. It brought us international recognition. It brought great credit to the country and it indicated that Canadians could rise to the challenge artistically, physically, structurally and in every other way. I think that is self-evident.

Then take the Pan-American Games in Winnipeg in 1967. I am indebted for this information to Senate Molgat. As a result of the Games in Winnipeg that city has the finest swimming pool in Canada. While that is important in itself, Canadians since that time have been breaking world records. In other words, those Games have promoted and changed the attitude towards amateur sport amongst Canadians, particularly in that fine city. This is something for the young; it takes them off the streets.

Then take the third great international sports event, the British Empire Games in Vancouver, which had good effects within the Commonwealth. Vancouver ended up with one of the great sports stadiums of the world, and the effect on the citizens of Vancouver and British Columbia generally was good.

Honourable senators, great international events like these result in cleaner cities and benefits to the individual host cities, such as swimming pools, stadiums, better roads, and better communications, and better interchange of ideas on the international level. This is nothing particularly new, because if you consider Europe you will see that for centuries the British, for instance, have indulged in sport. They like it, it makes for a healthy nation. The same can be said for the French and the Germans. Even the Swiss, with military training, make sure that every citizen at least gets a degree of discipline and physical conditioning. Coming closer to home, in Ottawa, we had 32,000 people skating on the Rideau Canal last winter, and they are now cycling on the paths that have been created through the parks system.

These are things which can and should be done. We have been negligent in not having done them long before, because the social benefits to the nation are great. Canadian participation in sport promotes national health, and we all know that a healthy nation is a wealthy nation.

[Hon. Mr. Macnaughton.]

The Olympic Games in Canada will, it seems to me, promote this idea. It will open the door to young Canadians by allowing them to take their proper place in the world of sport. The money we put into this project is small indeed compared to the return Canada will receive in national co-operation and national participation by all Canadians in another joint effort.

Honourable senators, I support the bill enthusiastically.

Hon. Mr. Forsey: Honourable senators, I rise merely to say that I have very grave misgivings about this bill, and that I shall be very agreeably surprised if this is the last we hear of this subject. When the vote is called, I propose to utter the words, "On division."

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Paul Deschatelets: I would like to thank, first of all, Senators Asselin and Macnaughton who have participated in this debate, and I must say that both of them have taken a very responsible attitude, though this has not prevented Senator Asselin from expressing certain criticisms of some aspects of the bill, which is perfectly in order.

If I understood him correctly, Senator Asselin has indicated, on behalf of the Opposition, that this bill would receive the support of his party on second reading. He raised a few interesting and very relevant questions which I would like to comment on briefly.

As I can understand, Senator Asselin took as a basis the analysis of the government officials which foresaw a deficit of about $172 million.

Hon. Mr. Asselin: Mayor Drapeau.

Hon. Mr. Deschatelets: When COJO and Mayor Drapeau submitted a budget of $310 million, government experts said we should now add to this about $22 million. When we consider the revenues and that Mayor Drapeau indicated he was convinced that $250 million would come from the sale of Olympic coins—and government officials said that, according to them, on the basis of the example of Munich, these sales would produce not more than $100 million and thus, they foresaw a deficit of about $150 million.

I think I am entitled to my personal opinion and I think that the analysis made by government officials was made in a somewhat conservative fashion, with a small "c" because in my opinion they did not take into account the fact that in the case of the 1976 Olympics in Montreal a considerable effort will be made abroad to have foreign countries participate not only from the athletic standpoint but also from the financial standpoint in order to allow those Games to be a success.

Therefore, it was perfectly reasonable for Senator Asselin to say this: but if there is a deficit of $172 million who will pay that deficit?

One thing is sure, under Bill C-196 now before us the federal government cannot—does not have legally the right to make any direct contribution neither now nor during nor after the Olympic Games to make up any deficit unless later, in a few years, a different legislation is introduced.

I think that that answers Senator Asselin's question.

Once again, the three letters, from Mayor Drapeau, from COJO and from the Government of Quebec, which will appear as appendices to the official report of the Senate, state this very clearly:

● (1410)

[English]

Give us the tools and we will do the job, and if you pass this legislation, Bill C-196, it is understood that no contribution will be expected from the federal government.

[Translation]

Hon. Mr. Asselin: May I put a question to the honourable senator?

Hon. Mr. Deschatelets: But of course.

Hon. Mr. Asselin: If, as Senator Deschatelets indicated, a deficit is not to be made good by the federal government, why is it that on third reading the President of the Treasury Board demanded a promise from the Mayor of Montreal, the chairman of COJO, as well as from the Quebec government—a written promise—that the deficit would not be made up by the federal government? If that is so clear in the bill, why should the President of the Treasury Board have asked for that written promise?

Hon. Mr. Deschatelets: I believe I can answer that question, I trust, to the satisfaction of Senator Asselin.

When the federal government decided to introduce Bill C-196 in Parliament, it obtained prior guarantee from the three parties concerned that they did not expect that there should be a direct federal contribution; and that solved the problem. I believe that answers Senator Asselin's very pertinent question.

As a result of the consideration of the bill in committee, certain major amendments have been made, and note carefully—

Hon. Mr. Asselin: The amendments introduced by the Conservative Party have been accepted by the Postmaster General.

Hon. Mr. Deschatelets: I am glad to hear that. Please note that these amendments may not please Mayor Drapeau, as they limit the amount of coins to be minted; they limit everything, which is a way of saying to COJO, to the Mayor and to the City of Montreal: "You claimed that you could organize the Olympic Games if you obtained proceeds from the sale of coins and stamps, to the tune of $260 million; you will get them, but these amendments are a warning to you that when $260 million worth of coins and stamps have been issued and sold, that will be the end of it, and you will not get any more".

I believe that questions were asked in the other place, since that would restrict the activities of COJO and of the City of Montreal, and Mr. Drury was asked what the Mayor of Montreal thought of the amendments introduced following second reading, which will restrict the opportunities and the hopes he had. I think he replied that he did not know what Mayor Drapeau said to that, but if the bill is passed, rest assured that, under this legislation, there will be no direct contribution, and that there will be a definite limit set to the amounts that COJO may receive under this Act.

Hon. Mr. Asselin: Could I make a remark?

Hon. Mr. Deschatelets: Certainly.

Hon. Mr. Asselin: Senator Deschatelets says that there will be no direct contribution. Are the contributions of the federal government to the construction of the Olympic Village, for security, the armed forces, broadcasting expenditures for the Games—are those not all direct expenditures that will be made by the federal?

I do not object but when Senator Deschatelets says there will be no direct expenditures by the federal government, I think he should clarify his position. There will be direct expenditures as indicated earlier. But will the indicated expenditures not be direct expenditures by the federal government?

Hon. Mr. Deschatelets: I think we are playing on words perhaps because I was not very clear on what I call direct contributions. It would be a direct contribution by the federal government if it paid out, for example, $100 million to COJO, but that will not be the case.

Now, as far as the Olympic Village is concerned, of course, if the program for the proposed Olympic Village complied with the present Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation Act, it is estimated that presently in the province of Quebec Central Mortgage and Housing is spending capital expenditures of at least $100 million. I imagine that if the Olympic Village meets the criteria put out by Central Mortgage and Housing, a request will be made between Montreal and Quebec to grant out of the $100 million from Central Mortgage an amount of $25 million, $30 million or $40 million for the Olympic Village.

As far as the lottery is concerned, the federal government as I said this morning does not want to have anything to do with it in any way, shape or form; they let Quebec organize their lottery with any of the provinces willing to cooperate.

However, Senator Asselin has mentioned that because this money will be provided by the poor and so forth, it must not be forgotten that all contributions from the purchasing of Olympic coins and stamps will be made on a voluntary and universal basis. Anyone who does not wish to contribute is free to abstain from doing so. Those who believe that their limited contributions might help will be free to do so.

Now, there is another minor point—the one dealing with security. Security obviously falls under the complete jurisdiction of the federal government because at this international event we will be receiving heads of state and so forth. An approximate amount of $25 million is to be provided for armed forces and RCMP expenses.

In conclusion, I should say it is good that such a consideration is included because there is a basic difference between financial arrangements for the organization of Expo 67 and the 1976 Olympic Games.

It will be remembered, and I think that we may say that we are all in the same situation, that in 1963 I was given the responsibility for Expo, but then that legislation had been passed under the former government of which Senator Asselin was a member in the House of Commons—and no change was made. But for Expo, the government assumed 50 per cent of all expenditures in order to share, at the end of the project, on a 50-50 basis—or a deficit on a 50-50 basis—which is what happened.

Here all the programs that I referred to this morning will not cost one cent to the federal government; I am thinking of stamps, coins and other activities, because all production, marketing and sale promotion costs will be figured out and deducted from the Olympic Games accounts, and only the present legislation will be put on the Olympic Games account.

● (1420)

[English]

The Hon. the Speaker: It is moved by the Honourable Senator Deschatelets, seconded by the Honourable Senator Quart, that this bill be now read the second time.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Mr. Forsey: On division.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time, on division.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Deschatelets moved, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(b), that the bill be read the third time now.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Mr. Martin: Honourable senators, I have no alternative but to move the adjournment of the Senate until the call of the bell.

Hon. Mr. Asselin: Before doing so, does the Leader of the Government know whether we are likely to receive the hijacking bill today?

Hon. Mr. Martin: I do not have any definite information. I believe there is a possibility that we shall.

Hon. Mr. Asselin: Are there likely to be any other bills?

Hon. Mr. Martin: It is possible that we shall receive the bill dealing with crop insurance, as that is a non-contentious item. During the period of this present adjournment I hope to put my antenna to better use than I was able to between 1 and 2 p.m. I am told that the other house is still debating the question of adjournment. There have been prominent participants in that debate. I was hoping that Senator Grosart could give us some information in this connection, as I believe he was there. At the moment, I have no alternative but to move the adjournment until the call of the bell.

If other bills are forthcoming, and we give them the consideration to which they are entitled, and decide that there shall be royal assent, I would like to say to those honourable senators who have been in their rooms assiduously engaged on matters having to do with public business that I hope we shall have a large attendance for royal assent.

[Hon. Mr. Deschatelets.]

We take second place to no House of Parliament for the attentiveness which honourable senators have given to the business of the house in the past six months. I fully expect that honourable senators will apply that same attentiveness to today's proceedings. I know that no honourable senator now in Ottawa will leave the city until we have discharged our business, which includes attendance at royal assent.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

At 3.45 p.m. the sitting was resumed.

LIBRARY OF PARLIAMENT

REPORT OF JOINT COMMITTEE TABLED

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I have the honour to table the report of the Joint Committee on the Library of Parliament respecting salary revisions for the members of the staff of the Library of Parliament.

Report tabled.

ROYAL ASSENT

NOTICE

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that the following communication had been received:

GOVERNMENT HOUSE
OTTAWA

27 July 1973

Madam,

I have the honour to inform you that the Honourable Bora Laskin, Puisne Judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, in his capacity as Deputy Governor General, will proceed to the Senate Chamber today, the 27th day of July at four o'clock, for the purpose of giving Royal Assent to certain Bills.

I have the honour to be,
Madam,
Your obedient servant,
André Garneau
Brigadier General
Administrative Secretary to the
Governor General

The Honourable
The Speaker of the Senate,
Ottawa.

AERONAUTICS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-128, to amend the Aeronautics Act.

Bill read first time.

SECOND READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. H. Carl Goldenberg, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 44(1)(f), moved the second reading of the bill.

He said: Honourable senators, the purpose of this bill is to provide for security measures to be taken at airports, including the search of persons and property, for the protection of passengers, crews and aircraft. I am sure that it is not a controversial measure. I do not think honourable senators favour hijacking, and that is what this bill is aimed to protect the public against.

Hon. Mr. Asselin: They do not favour hijacking for themselves.

Hon. Mr. Goldenberg: This bill will provide the government with the authority to require passenger screening services by major Canadian and foreign air carriers using Canadian airports.

Pending the passage of this bill, the major Canadian airlines, at the request of the Minister of Transport, voluntarily developed and implemented their own passenger screening programs. Without this legislation there is no legal authority which would ensure that these security measures are continued by the respective airlines or that consistent standards would be maintained throughout the country. In other words, the Government of Canada does not have the authority to screen passengers, and the airlines are able to do so only because of the contract on the reverse of the ticket which reserves to the airlines the right to refuse a passenger. Otherwise there is no authority.

● (1550)

The Government of the United States has had this authority since January 9, 1973. At the international level, beginning on August 28, there is to be held an extraordinary assembly of the International Civil Aviation Organization in Rome, and a diplomatic conference at which representatives from throughout the world will attempt to find additional ways to combat the threat of aircraft hijacking and terrorist acts against civil aviation. Without any legislation to protect the safety of the Canadian traveller, Canada's position at these conferences will be extremely weak indeed.

The bill has, of course, received the approval of the other place, where it went to the Committee on Transport and Communications, which studied it at five sessions. I can summarize it very briefly. The first clause empowers the Governor in Council to make regulations requiring the owners or operators of aircraft to establish, maintain and carry out security measures affecting the person and the person's belongings.

The next clause allows the minister to establish such regulations in lieu of or in addition to the measures that the airlines would introduce.

The rest follows. No person would be allowed to board an aircraft unless he has submitted to an authorized search of himself and his belongings. The law makes it very clear that there is no obligation imposed. No passenger is obliged to submit to a search of his person, personal belongings or baggage if he chooses not to board an aircraft, so his liberty is preserved.

Penalties are provided for persons boarding an aircraft having refused inspection as provided. Specially trained personnel are now being prepared to perform this work. They are being trained by the RCMP.

Honourable senators, I think this sums up the legislation and its purpose as much as need be done at this time.

Hon. Allister Grosart: Honourable senators, we are clearly under a time limit in discussing this bill, an understandable one in the circumstances, and I will therefore make my remarks on the bill rather shorter than they would otherwise be.

Senator Goldenberg has given us a quick but, I think, full explanation of the bill, and has said that in his view it is not controversial because senators are opposed to hijacking. That is a rather general statement. We can be opposed to hijacking and also to some of the hijinks involved in the method by which this bill is brought before us. I personally am opposed to some of these hijinks, by which, of course, I refer to the financial aspects of the bill and to the matter of the regulations. I agree it is highly necessary that the method should be regularized by which we now screen passengers at our airports. It is absurd, of course, that up to this moment the only authority to search passengers boarding an aircraft has been based on the fine print on the back of an airline ticket.

We have had a minority government, which has been the excuse for many of the failures to introduce legislation in the last year. It will, of course, be the excuse used in this case. Look at the absurdity of the situation when hijacking is going on all over the world. There have been at least six hijacking attempts in Canada. This bill was introduced in the other place in January, and apparently no attempt has been made to push aside non-controversial legislation, other time-killing legislation, in order that we might consider this bill. I think it is fair to say that it is the usual approach of this government to an international problem. We wait until somebody else does something and then we respond.

We have the absurdity of this bill being only in response to an American initiative. I think Senator Goldenberg said it was January 27, or thereabouts, that our American friends took action similar to, but, I think, perhaps more effective than that proposed in this bill.

Honourable senators, it is really amazing that we are asked to pass this bill when there is not a senator or member of the House of Commons who has the faintest idea of the cost of implementing its provisions. This is the kind of thing that has come before us in legislation on more than one occasion recently.

It is quite clear that the minister and the deputy minister have said that neither the House of Commons nor the Senate can be told what this will cost. It has not been decided whether the government will subsidize the cost, the great cost of this measure, or whether it will be added to the cost of airline tickets, or whether the carriers themselves will be asked to bear some portion of the cost.

We are told that this will appear in regulations. The old story! In the committee of the other place there were many requests that the regulations be brought before the committee. This was opposed. The minister himself was completely contradictory. In one breath he said, "We do not have the regulations," and in another he said, "We have a draft of the regulations which is being discussed with the carriers." These are facts, honourable senators. The regulations which will give full effect to this act, which will decide the cost, which will decide what airports come under it, are not available to Parliament, but they have been for a long time in draft form available to the airlines association. Yet this is the kind of legislation that is supposed to deal effectively with great problems such as this.

The argument the minister made about not producing regulations was the old one. He said it would be impossible to deal with legislation if we had to bring the regulations before Parliament. I suggest to honourable senators that that is nonsense. If there was ever a principle which would make it possible for Parliament to deal effectively with this legislation, it would be to have the regulations before Parliament at the same time. We are all aware that more often than not the burden or the effectiveness of legislation is determined by the regulations and not by the bare bones of the act itself.

Honourable senators, I am not going to suggest that the bill should go to committee—for obvious reasons. It was a long time in committee in the other place and that committee was not able to get the kind of answers that I am suggesting now should be before Parliament.

I regret that on this last bill before the summer recess—if it is the summer recess—I have to raise these controversial aspects. Perhaps it is not entirely out of character for me to do so. Nevertheless, I hope honourable senators will find themselves seized of these grave considerations when they have some responsibility in the matter of other bills which will come before us in the future.

Do let us have a principle in this place that we are going to oppose legislation when we are not told what the cost to the public purse will be.

May I say that the estimate of the cost per Air Canada passenger is 33 cents, which is probably the lowest. On other airlines it will run as high as 75 cents. If honourable senators care to multiply 33 cents by the total number of passengers boarding at Canadian airports this year, they will have some concept of the magnitude of the demand on the public purse that the government has not seen fit to disclose to this Parliament.

Hon. H. Carl Goldenberg: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, if Senator Goldenberg speaks now his speech will have the effect of closing the debate.

Hon. Mr. Forsey: Honourable senators, may I ask Senator Goldenberg one question? I notice the legislation comes into force on proclamation. Has he any idea when it is intended to proclaim the legislation?

Hon. Mr. Goldenberg: No.

● (1600)

Honourable senators, I listened with interest to what Senator Grosart said. He was complaining that the bill was being presented to us without the regulations. I am sure that Senator Grosart is not going to suggest that the normal procedure is to table a bill with the regulations, which in due course would have to be passed.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: That is exactly what I did suggest.

Hon. Mr. Goldenberg: Well, that is not the custom.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: Agreed.

Hon. Mr. Goldenberg: That is not the practice.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: Agreed.

Hon. Mr. Goldenberg: I cannot personally see how it can be done. Of course, so far as regulations are concerned, we have now created the Joint Committee on Statutory Instruments to which all regulations will be referred in future.

So far as the costs are concerned, the situation is that the carriers, Air Canada and the others, say that it is not their obligation to provide security; they say they have been paying for it and now want the Government of Canada to pay for it because security is a governmental function.

I do not think that the government has taken a final stand on this matter. It has been suggested that the costs may be shared. Apparently, in some countries the costs are paid by the national government; in others the costs are paid by the air lines, who then pass them on in the charge for the service.

I am sure that Senator Grosart, having already complained about the delays in presenting this measure, will not suggest that it be delayed further until the costs have been carefully worked out and some agreement has been reached for payment, because this is an urgent measure which should and will, I am sure, receive the approval of all honourable senators.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Goldenberg: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(b), I move that the bill be read the third time now.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

ROYAL ASSENT

REQUEST BY C.B.C. TO PHOTOGRAPH CEREMONY DENIED

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I have received a request from the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation for permission to photograph the arrival of the members of the House of Commons in the Senate chamber for royal assent. There will be no sound in connection with the picture, and there will be no pictures taken after the ceremony commences.

Do I have your consent to give permission for such a picture to be taken?

Hon. Mr. Benidickson: Honourable senators, I object.

Hon. Mr. Fournier (De Lanaudière): Honourable senators, is unanimous consent required in this case?

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable Senator Fournier, the Clerk informs me that a majority is all that is required. Will those in favour say yea?

Some Hon. Senators: Yea.

The Hon. the Speaker: Will those contrary-minded, if any, say nay?

Some Hon. Senators: Nay.

The Hon. the Speaker: In my opinion, the nays have it.

● (1610)

ADJOURNMENT

Leave having been given to revert to Notices of Motions:

Hon. Mr. Molgat: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), I move, seconded by Senator Macdonald, that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until Tuesday, October 30, 1973, at 8 o'clock in the evening.

Before this motion is voted on I should like to make clear that, while this might seem to be a lengthy adjournment, there is a every likelihood that we will be recalled before the date mentioned. Honourable senators should be prepared to be recalled in the event of further bills being passed by the other place, or other circumstances arising that require our presence here. As honourable senators are aware, once a date is established for recall, we must appear at that time. It was, however, felt that the setting of our return for October 30, subject to recall at any time, would give us more flexibility. I point out that such a recall may, in fact, issue at any time.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Honourable senators, may I say a word about this motion, simply to underline what Senator Molgat has said? We are always subject to the call of the Chair, and in the light of some reports that have reached this house with respect to bills that may well be dealt with in the other place in the early part of the resumed session, it is certainly not inconceivable that we will be called back before October 30.

As you are aware, honourable senators, we have to plan our work here based largely on progress in the other place, and it is with that in mind that we have accepted a suggestion that we should set October 30 as the date of our return, at the same time clearly emphasizing the possibility that we will be back well before that date.

Having said that, honourable senators, let me say that my main point in rising at this time is to say to Her Honour, the Speaker, as we reach this point in the session's proceedings, how grateful we are for the way in which she has presided over our deliberations.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Martin: I should like to say further to all honourable senators how grateful I am personally—and I know that Senator Molgat and Senator Langlois join me in this—for the co-operation we have had from senators on both sides of this house. I want particularly to thank the Leader of the Opposition, who is unavoidably absent, and his deputy, Senator Macdonald, who is here in his place, for the way in which they have joined with us in trying to conduct the affairs of this house during a very difficult time when the uncertainties of minority government have made themselves manifest.

I should like also to thank the members of the staff, the Clerk, the Assistant Clerk, and all the officers of the Senate. I particularly want to thank Mrs. Sutherland and her staff for their daily co-operation, the pages, and all who have in any way contributed to the carrying out of the work of the Senate.

The record of our sittings will show that we sat proportionately for a longer period than during many sessions in the past, and this at a time when the legislative flow from the other place was not as it normally is. I make this observation simply because it reflects the fact that the Senate is a working legislative body, composed of men and women who have accepted heavy responsibility and who, in my judgment, have discharged it in a manner which warrants my appreciation and recognition, and this I heartily give.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Honourable senators, before the motion is put, may I associate myself and those on this side of the house with the remarks of the Leader of the Government and express our appreciation for the fine manner in which he has carried out his function in this chamber. May we also associate ourselves with his remarks of appreciation to the staff. On behalf of all members on this side, I wish all honourable senators and members of the staff a very happy holiday.

Motion agreed to.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

● (1620)

At 4.20 p.m. the sitting was resumed.

ROYAL ASSENT

The Honourable Bora Laskin, Puisne Judge of the Supreme Court of Canada acting as Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General, having come and being seated at the foot of the Throne, and the House of Commons having been summoned, and being come with their Speaker, the Honourable the Speaker of the Senate said:

Honourable members of the Senate:

Members of the House of Commons:

I have the honour to inform you that His Excellency the Governor General has been pleased to cause Letters Patent to be issued under his Sign Manual and Signet constituting the Honourable Bora Laskin, Puisne Judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, his Deputy, to do in His Excellency's name all acts on his part necessary to be done during His Excellency's pleasure.

The Commission was read by the Clerk Assistant.

The Honourable the Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General was pleased to give the Royal Assent to the following bills:

An Act to amend the Aeronautics Act.

An Act respecting Centre Amusement Co. Limited.

An Act to amend the Customs Tariff (No. 2).

An Act to suspend the operation of the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act.

An Act to amend the Excise Tax Act and the Excise Act (No. 2).

An Act to amend the Fisheries Development Act.

An Act to amend the Harbour Commissions Act (Nanaimo Harbour Commission).

An Act to amend the Immigration Appeal Board Act.

An Act respecting certain immigration laws and procedures.

An Act to amend the Income Tax Act (No. 2).

An Act to amend the statute law relating to income tax (No. 3).

An Act respecting the 1976 Summer Olympic Games.

An Act respecting wildlife in Canada.

The House of Commons withdrew.

The Honourable the Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General was pleased to retire.

The sitting of the Senate was resumed.

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. Mr. Molgat: Honourable senators, before I move the adjournment may I wish you all a very pleasant holiday. Thank you for your co-operation over the past few months. I look forward to seeing you all on or before October 30 full of vim, vigour and new ideas.

[Translation]

To all our faithful employees, I wish a pleasant recess and even if it has been delayed I hope they will still enjoy it.

[English]

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I, too, wish you all a very pleasant summer.

Hon. Mr. Molgat: Honourable senators, I move the adjournment.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, October 30, at 8 p.m.

APPENDIX

(See p. 959.)

LETTERS TO THE PRIME MINISTER OF CANADA RE 1976 OLYMPIC GAMES

January 31, 1973.

The Right Honourable
Pierre Elliott Trudeau
Prime Minister of Canada
Parliament Buildings
Ottawa, Ontario.

Re: 1976 Olympic Games

Dear Mr. Prime Minister:

Following upon our previous discussions, I wish to inform you that the City of Montreal and the Organizing Committee for the Olympic Games have assured the Government of Quebec that the revenues received by COJO will cover its expenses and that no direct contribution will be required from the federal government provided that the federal government acts upon the request of the City of Montreal and COJO concerning the special issues of stamps and coins during the period indicated by them.

I understand, moreover, that the federal government is studying in concert with my government, the City of Montreal and COJO the best way of acting upon the request of the City of Montreal and COJO concerning an annual lottery.

Taking into account the benefits and advantages that the holding of the Olympic Games will produce not only for the City of Montreal itself but also for all of Quebec as well as all of Canada, the government of Quebec gives its support to the holding of these games provided the federal government accedes to the requests of the City and COJO that I have just mentioned.

The government of Quebec agrees that the federal government will not have to assume the interim financing of costs relative to the 1976 Olympic Games throughout the period leading up to and including the holding of the Games.

Provided that the federal government agrees to remit to COJO the net proceeds of the sale of special Olympic coins and stamps, the government of Quebec also agrees that the federal government will not be called upon to make any special contribution towards the payment of any or all expenses incurred in connection with the Olympic Games of 1976 and which would be in excess of the net proceeds mentioned above and of revenues from other sources.

Yours truly,
Robert Bourassa
Prime Minister of Quebec

February 1, 1973

The Right Honourable
Pierre Elliott Trudeau
Prime Minister of Canada
Parliament Buildings
Ottawa, Ontario

Mr. Prime Minister:

Confirming repeated discussions, I am pleased to inform you again that the City of Montreal intends to stand upon the position it adopted from the outset of efforts which resulted in obtaining for Canada the honour of hosting the world's best young athletes in Montreal to participate in the 21st Olympic Games. Indeed, the methods and programs of self-financing already submitted to federal government analysts and improved upon since our meetings in November enable us to affirm that the City of Montreal will not have to call on the federal government for a contribution from federal funds for the purpose of the Olympic Games.

An understanding has been reached to the effect that the methods and programs for self-financing approved by the federal government as requested in letters addressed to you by His Excellency Mr. C. O. Roger Rousseau, General Commissioner for the Olympic Games, will benefit by effective co-operation from the federal government for their best possible implementation.

The programs already submitted are in no way final as, once the self-financing principle has been accepted by your government through appropriate legislation, all abilities will be welcome to co-operate actively to further improvement of methods and programs conceived, to date, for the purpose of illustration. Implementation of the various programs will be spread over a period adequate to permit covering authorized expenditures.

Insofar as the national lottery is concerned, I understand that your officials and those of the Quebec government are trying to work out the best solution and I have no doubt of their success and of remittance of proceeds to COJO.

Provided, of course, the federal government agrees to remit to COJO the net proceeds from sales of special Olympic coins and stamps, and with the support of the Quebec government, which is well aware of the benefits and advantages involved in holding the Olympic Games and of the healthy stimulant these games will represent for young people throughout the country, both before they actually take place and for a long time after, the City of Montreal assures the federal government that it will not be called upon to grant special direct support for the holding of the 1976 Olympic Games or to assume interim financing.

Any surplus of income over expenditures will, under control of the City of Montreal, go into a separate special fund, the income derived therefrom to be used exclusively for the promotion of amateur sports and the training of young athletes.

25862—62½

I am firmly convinced that these considerations will allow you to make a proper assessment of the City of Montreal's stand relative to the financing of the 1976 Olympic Games.

I have the honour to remain,
Yours respectfully,
Jean Drapeau
Mayor of Montreal

February 1, 1973

The Right Honourable
Pierre Elliott Trudeau,
Prime Minister of Canada,
Parliament Buildings,
Ottawa, Canada

Re: 1976 Olympic Games

Sir:

Further to our previous conversations, I wish to inform you that COJO has given the Government of Canada the assurance that revenue collected by COJO will cover expenses and that no direct contribution will be required of the federal government provided the federal government approves the requests submitted by the City of Montreal and COJO for the issue of special series of stamps and coins during a specific period.

I realize also that the federal government is engaged in consultations with the Government of the Province of Quebec, the City of Montreal and COJO in seeking the best course of action in connection with the request made by the City and COJO for a national lottery.

COJO agrees that the federal government will not have to provide for the interim financing of costs incurred in relation to the 1976 Olympic Games pending the beginning of the games and until their completion.

Provided the Government of Canada agrees to pay COJO the net revenue from the sale of special Olympic coins and stamps, COJO also agrees that the federal government will not be called upon to pay special contributions to meet any expenses incurred in connection with the 1976 Olympic Games and in excess of the net revenue mentioned above and income from other sources.

Yours sincerely,
(Signed)
C. O. R. Rousseau,
Chairman and Commissioner General

THE SENATE

Thursday, August 30, 1973

The Senate met at 8 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

DISTINGUISHED VISITORS IN GALLERY

SIR THEODORE BRANCKER, PRESIDENT OF THE SENATE OF BARBADOS, AND LADY BRANCKER

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I should like to draw to your attention the presence in the gallery of Sir Theodore Brancker, the President of the Senate of Barbados, and his wife, Lady Brancker, whom we are very glad to welcome to Canada.

Hon. Paul Martin: Honourable senators, I also wish to say how pleased we are to see the President of the Senate of Barbados in our midst. He and his gracious wife are most welcome.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Hon. Paul Martin tabled:

Report of the Unemployment Insurance Advisory Committee for the year ended December 31, 1972, pursuant to sections 89(1) and 90(2) of the Unemployment Insurance Act, chapter U-2, R.S.C., 1970.

Report of the Department of Public Works for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1972, pursuant to section 34 of the Public Works Act, chapter P-38, R.S.C., 1970.

Report on operations under the Regional Development Incentives Act for the month of June 1973, pursuant to section 16 of the said act, chapter R-3, R.S.C., 1970.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Mr. Martin: I should like to say to the Leader of the Opposition that I thought I knew every honourable senator in this house. I do not want to raise a procedural point at this time, but I hope before the evening is out Senator Flynn will be good enough to introduce to us the bearded gentleman who sits on his left.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Honourable senators, the Leader of the Government has never introduced to us the honourable member sitting over there, who also wears a beard. I do not see why I should have to make an introduction now.

Hon. Mr. Argue: One is on the left, and the other is on the right.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Honourable senators, I should like to ask the Leader of the Government if he could let us know why we are here tonight.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Certainly. One of the by-products of being here is that we are going to have an opportunity of meeting a new senator.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: At any rate, not an old one!

Hon. Mr. Martin: And, of course, we are here primarily to deal with the railway strike in respect of which the other house is now considering a bill of urgent national importance.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I presume that we will know a little more about it later. Apparently we are not supposed to know what is going on in the other place. I say that because I thought the government leader might be more explicit.

TRANSPORTATION

FREIGHT RATES AND NEW TECHNOLOGY—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Cameron calling the attention of the Senate to the need to re-examine the structure of freight rates in Canada and the importance of new technology to the economics of transportation.—(Honourable Senator McIlraith, P.C.).

Hon. Mr. McIlraith: Honourable senators, I would ask that this order stand until October 30.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Honourable senators, I have, of course, no objection to Senator McIlraith's request, but I would have thought that it was a subject matter of great relevance to the situation presently existing, and that he would therefore deal with it at this time. It would, perhaps, prepare us for the legislation that the Leader of the Government suggested we are going to be faced with in a few hours or a few days.

Hon. Mr. McIlraith: Honourable senators, I have no desire to use this item on the Order Paper today to further confuse the Leader of the Opposition.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Rather, you would perhaps confuse the government if you did.

Order stands.

● (2010)

TRADE

CANADA'S DEVELOPMENT AS A MANUFACTURING NATION—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator van Roggen calling the attention of the Senate to the question of Canada's development as a manufacturing nation in the light of world trading patterns today.—(Honourable Senator Lang).

Hon. Mr. Lang: Stand.

Hon. Mr. Molson: Honourable senators, would it be in order to ask what are all these items? We have no Order Paper, and do not know what we are discussing.

Hon. Mr. Beaubien: Why no Order Paper?

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I think you should rise on a point of order with respect to this.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Honourable senators, I cannot answer Senator Molson. I also would like to know why there is no Order Paper. Perhaps the Table could tell us?

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I believe you will find the Orders of the Day in the files in your desks.

Order stands.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Mr. Asselin: Honourable senators, I rise on a point of order.

[Translation]

Honourable senators, as the Leader of the Government said a while ago, the Senate was recalled to pass a special act. I wonder how we can resume a session that has not started, the last one having been adjourned to October 30, when we were to have Orders of the Day and also discuss some legislation that is to come before the Senate.

Can the Leader of the Government tell us how we can possibly discuss today acts other than the one for which we were convened, that is, the legislation that will end the railworkers' strike?

I am under the impression that the study of any other item in the Senate would be out of order, and I ask the Leader of the Government to enlighten us on that point.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Honourable senators, I cannot accept what Senator Asselin has just said. The Senate may discuss any matter. Of course, we are here expressly to consider a bill on rail service stoppage in Canada and the strike. But we are entitled to discuss any matter here if we so wish and decide. The Senate was not prorogued, but merely adjourned to October 30. However, the Speaker asked us to return, as she had the right to do, and as she did, for the reasons I have given.

[English]

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Honourable senators, the government leader suggests that we should speak of anything tonight except the matter concerning which we were recalled. I suppose we could discuss problems which have arisen since we adjourned on July 27. Perhaps we should discuss, for instance, the appointment of Senator Davey as the chief campaign organizer of the Liberal Party. Of course, we congratulate him on his courage in accepting such an assignment. I was organizer for my party in 1962-63 and I cannot imagine my accepting the appointment again, as Senator Davey is now doing. He has been very careful to say that he will adopt a low profile. I am very curious as to how he intends to achieve that. In any event, since we have, apparently, nothing else to do tonight, we might as well discuss this matter. As far as I am concerned, I wish him well.

[Hon. Mr. Lang.]

Hon. Mr. Davey: I very much regret having to inform the Leader of the Opposition that my low profile makes it impossible for me to speak.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: That is the best news since the railway strike.

Hon. Mr. Molson: Is a motion for adjournment in order?

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, in answer to the inquiry of the Leader of the Opposition as to why the Senate was recalled this evening, I would say that I do not think anyone in Canada was unaware that the House of Commons was to be recalled today at 2 p.m. No one knew whether the bill that was to be placed before the house would be passed immediately. It might have been passed by six o'clock this evening and, in that eventuality, it certainly would not have looked very well if the Senate were not here to deal with it. That did not happen, but we had no way of knowing that it would not have been the case.

I think it was quite reasonable to recall the Senate for this evening, in view of the fact that when the Senate adjourned it was subject to recall by the Speaker. I exercised that privilege and recalled the Senate to deal with business which might come before it tonight.

That is the explanation as to why we are here.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: With great respect, Madam Speaker, I do not doubt that you exercised your discretion with wisdom. However, I think it has always been clear in the minds of all honourable senators, as well as in the minds of all members of the other place, that the recall of the Senate and of the House of Commons is done on the initiative of the Prime Minister, or of the Leader of the Government in the Senate.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Honourable senators, I do not know whether the Leader of the Opposition is provoking debate for the sake of debate.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I am provoking anything you want.

Hon. Mr. Martin: I think Her Honour the Speaker has given us a very good explanation. The motion for adjournment provided that the house would adjourn to such and such a date subject to earlier recall by the Speaker. Her Honour, naturally, had consultations in this matter with members of the government—the Leader of the Government and the Prime Minister. It seemed to us—as I am sure it did to the Leader of the Opposition, because I talked to him on the telephone regarding this matter and he fully agreed—that in view of the emergency with regard to the railway strike and the proposed legislation, we should be here to deal with this matter as quickly as possible.

I do not want to leave the impression that the Leader of the Opposition does not see, as do the rest of us, the urgent reasons why we are here tonight, which have been so succinctly stated by the Speaker.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Honourable senators, let me just add that I wanted the government leader to put on the record the reasons for our being here tonight. The one responsible for our being here tonight is the Leader of the Government, and I should like him to put on the record the reasons why we are here. It does not lie with Her Honour the Speaker to come to the rescue of the Leader of the Government.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I feel I must enter this discussion again. Honourable senators who listened to the announcement by the Prime Minister that Parliament was to be recalled—

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Yes, the Prime Minister.

The Hon. the Speaker: —will remember that he stated he had consulted with the Speakers of both Houses of Parliament and asked them to recall Parliament. I can tell you—and I trust you will take my word for it—that he did consult me before he made that announcement. I concurred in it, and I also concurred in the view that this evening was the proper time for us to be here.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: You are just repeating what I have been saying, Madam Speaker. I agree with you.

Hon. Mr. Martin: I am sure the Leader of the Opposition did not mean to convey this, but in his remarks a few moments ago he said that the Speaker had come to the assistance of the government—

Hon. Mr. Flynn: No, the government leader.

Hon. Mr. Asselin: He did not say that.

Hon. Mr. Martin: I think we are all agreed that Her Honour exercises the greatest impartiality, and I am sure no one recognizes that more than the Leader of the Opposition himself.

• (2020)

PUBLIC BILLS

MOTION TO SUSPEND RULES DROPPED

On the Motion:

That until the Senate adjourns for the summer recess, Rules 44, 45 and 78 be suspended insofar as they relate to public bills.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Honourable senators, I believe we can drop this motion, since it has no useful purpose now.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is that agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion dropped.

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), I move that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until tomorrow, Friday, August 31, 1973, at 11 o'clock in the forenoon.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Honourable senators, I have no objection to the motion. It would have appeared to be a reasonable decision if the Leader of the Government had answered my question in a proper way.

Hon. Mr. Prowse: He did answer it properly.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Here is Senator Prowse coming to the rescue of the Leader of the Government.

Motion agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 11 a.m.

THE SENATE

Friday, August 31, 1973

The Senate met at 11 a.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Honourable senators, since it is not likely that the legislation for which we are waiting will come to us until much later this day, I venture to suggest that we should dispense with going through the usual proceedings and deal with a motion to adjourn until later this day—that is, to the call of the bell at approximately 5 o'clock this afternoon. As I have said, honourable senators, we do not expect the bill to reach us until some time after dinner today.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I understand that in the other place the bill is being dealt with in Committee of the Whole, following second reading.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Yes, and I understand there will be amendments.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: I move, therefore, that we now adjourn to reassemble at the call of the bell at approximately 5 p.m., or earlier if necessary.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: That is if the bill reaches us before then.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Yes.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

At 5.30 p.m. the sitting was resumed.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Honourable senators, we have no further news from the other place, except that progress is being made and it is expected that the legislation will be coming to us some time this evening, the exact time being unknown. In these circumstances I move that the Senate now adjourn, to reassemble at the call of the bell some time this evening, but I do not know when.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: To be more precise and to avoid any objection, I would suggest to the Acting Leader of the Government that "some time this evening" is not sufficient, as the bill could be sent here during the night. I was in the other place when it was decided to sit until 6 o'clock, adjourn until 8 o'clock, and complete all stages of the bill in such time as is necessary. Therefore, we may be here until midnight or even until 3 o'clock in the morning, which has occurred before. I do not mind that. We may as well stay here as return tomorrow.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: In that case I will say, "some time this evening or during the night."

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

At 4.10 a.m. the sitting was resumed.

MAINTENANCE OF RAILWAY OPERATIONS BILL, 1973

FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-217, to provide for the resumption and continuance of operations of railways and for the settlement of the disputes with respect to terms and conditions of employment between railway companies and their employees.

Bill read first time.

SECOND READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. Paul Martin: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 44(1)(f), I move that this bill be read the second time now.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is it agreed?

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I have no objection, but I should like the government leader to tell us whether the House of Commons is waiting for us. If it is not, I do not think we should deal with this bill at this time.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Yes, the House of Commons is waiting for us. It is hoped that when we dispose of this bill we will have royal assent. The hour, of course, will depend upon the consideration which the Senate wishes to give to this matter.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Let us hope that is when the sun rises.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Honourable senators, in rising to move second reading of this bill I should like to say good morning to you. This is the first time I have had the opportunity of addressing this House of Parliament at this hour of the day, although I have done so in the other place.

As honourable senators are well aware, the bill before us, Bill C-217, the Maintenance of Railway Operations Bill, 1973, provides for the resumption and continuance of railway and associated services in Canada, as well as for the settlement of the disagreement which has arisen over the question of the terms of a contract under which the employees of the railways are to work.

The bill to get the railways operating is not, nor do we think it should be, a bill that destroys or even injures the fundamental and justly-won bargaining rights that labour has gained over the years. I am sure that this is the view of all of us.

This bill does not interfere with the right of unions to negotiate settlements on behalf of their membership.

The history of the problem necessitating this legislation will be helpful in our consideration of the bill. Negotiations began in November of last year, two months before the expiration of the contract on December 31, 1972. Negotiations have been carried on for approximately 91,000 employees of the railway, by the Associated Non-Operating Unions, the United Transportation Union, and Division No. 4 Railway Employees Department of the AFL/CIO, representing various shopcraft unions. The unions involved are listed in Schedules B and C of the bill and the various companies involved—some 13 of them—are listed in Schedule A.

Across the table were representatives of the Canadian National Railway Company, the Canadian Pacific Railway and 11 other smaller railway companies, which are mentioned in Schedule A of the bill.

The strike action which has been taken directly involves the non-operating unions only. The dispute between the railways and the United Transportation Union, together with the shopcraft unions, has not yet culminated in strike action.

In all cases, early mediation assistance was sought by both parties. In the case of the non-operating unions the government first appointed Mr. A. R. Gibbons and then, in addition to Mr. Gibbons, Mr. W. P. Kelly and, finally, Judge Alan B. Gold of Montreal. Meetings with the parties were held almost constantly between December 28, when Mr. Gibbons was assigned, and August 25.

A conciliation board was convened towards the end of June, because little progress between the associated non-operating unions and management was demonstrated to have taken place. This board consisted of S. E. Dinsdale, Q.C., the railroad nominee; Professor J. C. Weldon, the union nominee; and the Honourable Mr. Justice F. Craig Munroe, Chairman.

On July 13 the chairman's report was released to the two parties. Mr. Justice Munroe suggested a 30 cent per hour increase, effective January 1, 1973; a subsequent 5 per cent increase on the wage rates in effect as of December 1973, to begin January 1, 1974; and another 3 per cent increase to take effect July 1, 1974, and based upon the rates in effect in June 1974.

None of the reports of the conciliation board was acceptable to both parties, and on July 21 the union was in a legal strike position. Rotating strikes began on July 26. It was shortly after this that the Minister of Labour entered the negotiations to do what he could, not only to further negotiations but to impress upon the parties a sense of national urgency.

When the total inability of the parties to come to agreement became evident and the call for a nationwide strike on August 23 was made by the non-operating unions, the government felt itself compelled in the national interest to suggest to the Speakers of both Houses that Parliament should be recalled. This it did on the evening of August 27.

A resumé of the disputes involving the railway and the shopcraft unions, as well as the railway and the United Transportation Union, will provide a complete survey of the present picture.

With respect to contract negotiations involving the United Transportation Union, a conciliation board was established on May 29 under the chairmanship of Mr. R. A. Gallagher, Q.C. The report of this board, while it contained no recommendations on wages, is presently under consideration by the UTU. This union is in a legal strike position today, September 1.

Regarding the dispute involving the railway and the shopcraft unions, yet another conciliation board was convened on June 26, after a negotiated settlement had been rejected by the union members. The majority report emanating from the board proposed wage increases of 8.25 per cent effective January 1, 1973; 6.5 per cent on the wage rate in effect as of December 1973, and this to take effect January 1, 1974; and a further increase of 1.5 per cent as of July 1, 1974, based upon wage rates in operation in June 1974.

● (0420)

This latter report has been rejected by the negotiating committee of the shopcraft unions and a strike vote is now being conducted.

Since August 23, when the rotating strikes of the non-operating unions became a total, nationwide strike, the lack of necessary rail services in Canada has seriously hampered the country economically.

There are before us now three amendments to the original bill. The first of these amendments is to clause 5, which will be found on page 3; the second is to clause 14.1, on page 10; and the third is to clause 16(3) on page 12.

The bill before us provides for the resumption of railway and related services throughout Canada forthwith. It is divided into four parts. Part I pertains to the railway non-operating employees, Part II to the railway shopcraft employees, Part III to the railway operating employees, and Part IV deals with mediation and arbitration. There are, however, clauses in the bill which are common to Parts I, II and III and it is to these that I would draw the attention of honourable senators.

The bill provides that "every railway company shall resume operation" and that "employees shall resume or continue, as the case may be, the duties of their employment." It provides that the order shall invalidate all prior declarations to strike action.

It provides further that no person acting on behalf of the railway company shall prohibit an employee from resuming his employment, and as well that no person of the railway company shall discharge or discipline any employee.

In addition, the bill provides that an extension of each collective agreement pertaining to each of the three union groups will continue in effect from January 1, 1973, until such time as new collective agreements come into effect or until December 31, 1974, whichever is earlier.

Provision is made in the bill that negotiations must resume between the railway companies and the unions immediately in order to settle matters presently in dispute. The Minister of Labour is empowered to appoint mediators if he so desires, in the forthcoming re-opened negotiations.

With respect to those provisions of the bill which deal specifically with the unions involved, the following deserve to be noted: the changes to the contract of the non-operating employees in this bill, as amended by the House of Commons, provide for an increase of 34 cents per hour, retroactively effective to January 1, 1973; an increase of 6.5 per cent effective January 1, 1974; and a further increase of 1.5 per cent as of July 1, 1974. These changes, together with the clauses in the bill governing rate increases to members of the shopcraft unions and the railway operating employees, represent "floors" from which renewed bargaining, mediation or arbitration may begin.

Identical with those recommendations proposed by the conciliation board involving the railways and the shopcraft unions are the proposals which are made in the shopcraft employees' contract—an hourly increase of 8.25 per cent effective January 1, 1973; a further increase of 6.5 per cent effective January 1, 1974; and another increase of 1.5 per cent effective July 1, 1974. This same scale will apply to the railway operating employees.

In Part IV provision has been made for the appointment of a mediator who, if appointed, will have all the powers of a conciliation board, pursuant to Part V of the Canada Labour Code, to sort out the existing differences between the railway companies and the unions representing non-operating employees, railway shopcraft employees, and railway operating employees.

Provision is also made in the bill for the appointment of an arbitrator, in the event that no mediator is appointed or following the report of the mediator. The arbitrator is empowered to decide upon matters still in dispute between the parties concerned and to incorporate the necessary amendments in a collective agreement. A new collective agreement would be in effect until December 31, 1974, unless it is mutually agreed by both parties to extend the agreement.

As I indicated at the outset, amendments to this bill were made in the other place to clause 16(3), giving instructions to the arbitrator. As these amendments were not contained in the original bill but come to us fresh from discussion and decision in the other place, I think I should place them on the record. They read as follows:

> An arbitrator appointed under subsection (1),
>
> (a) shall closely examine the job security demands of the unions and fully explore the feasibility of a job security plan based on the principle of attrition;
>
> (b) shall not alter or amend any existing work rules or practices in a manner that could have an adverse effect on rates of pay, earnings or employment opportunities, or safety;
>
> (c) shall, for the purpose of the arbitration, have all the powers conferred on a conciliation board under section 175 of the Canada Labour Code; and
>
> (d) shall in respect of wages, specifically provide for the adjustment of wages to any increase or increases in the cost of living where the arbitrator is satisfied that such adjustment has not been previously or adequately provided.

I point out that paragraph (c) was in the original bill.

[Hon. Mr. Martin.]

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Has this been accepted by the government?

Hon. Mr. Martin: Yes, and it will now become the law of the land.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I am simply asking you whether the government was satisfied with it.

Hon. Mr. Martin: This was an amendment introduced by the Minister of Labour pursuant to suggestions that had been made by, I believe, two of the Opposition parties.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Why don't you say, "Yes", when you have only to say, "Yes"?

Hon. Mr. Phillips: Did the honourable Leader of the Government say that the provision respecting allowance for the increased cost of living is already the law of the land?

Hon. Mr. Martin: No, I said that it was provided for in the bill passed by the other place. It will become the law of the land only after the two Houses of Parliament have dealt with the matter.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: If the honourable leader said it was the law of the land, it must have been a lapsus linguae.

Hon. Mr. Martin: The original bill was amended by adding a new clause concerning layoffs and numbered 14.1 in Part IV under the heading "General", which reads:

> Forthwith upon the coming into force of this Act,
>
> (a) every railway company to which any Part of this Act applies shall call back to work every employee of the railway company who has been on strike or has been laid off as a consequence of any strike that has ceased to be valid by reason of the coming into force of this Act; and
>
> (b) no such employee shall be laid off or again be laid off by any such railway company as a consequence of any such strike.

This relates, I may say, to every employee of all railway companies affected by this bill.

● (0430)

Hon. Mr. Connolly: Honourable senators. I wonder if the leader would allow me to make an observation for a moment. In the copies of the bill we have before us, the clause to which he is referring in Part IV is numbered 14.1, and I think it probably should be 14.2 since clause 14 is in Part III. This may simply be a typographical error, and it may well be rectified at a later date when the bill is reprinted. I simply draw this to the attention of the leader since when the bill is reprinted it may appear that his remarks refer to a section that is numbered differently.

Hon. Mr. Martin: That is right.

The question of pensions for the railwaymen has become an issue of contention between the railway companies and their employees for subsequent to March 16, 1973, the date on which agreement was reached between the two sides over this question, controversy has arisen over the railway companies' cost estimates of such benefits. The government wishes to examine this question, and to this end has appointed an industrial inquiry commissioner. The principal of Queen's University, Dr. John Deutsch, has been charged with estimating the cost of the negotiated settlement relating to pensions.

I am sure that most, if not all, honourable senators will agree that we have an obligation, that the government has an obligation which it has exercised, to ensure communication services essential to the nation, and to prevent undue hardship to those island provinces dependent upon ferry services for their sustenance.

Furthermore, the interruption in export trade and the operation of large and small industries alike, caused by the withdrawal of rail service, threatens not only our economic lifeline but the livelihood of all whose jobs are disrupted, not the least of whom are the railway workers themselves.

We all remember the late Senator Roebuck, an acknowledged champion of the rights of labour, who represented the railway operating unions for over thirty years. I was reading yesterday what he had to say about the measures introduced in Parliament in 1950 and incorporating some of the provisions—not all, but some of the provisions—in the measure before us. He said, quite frankly, as many of us could and would say, that he did not approve in principle the 1950 and or the 1966 bills requiring a return to work of the railway employees. But he understood, he said, not only that the bills presented in those years were drawn "with every possible care, devotion and bona fide" but drawn in "an attempt to bring the strike to an end, and . . . in a manner that would not cripple too greatly the economy of our country." He voted for the bills. He did not vote, any more than we will vote tonight, against the unions which he represented so ably, or against his conscience, but, as he himself said, "in an emergency, when the economic life of Canada demands that the railways resume operation" and that the men return to work. I am sure that that is our conviction as well.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: May I ask the Leader of the Government if he dealt with the amendment to clause 5?

Hon. Mr. Martin: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I do not remember if he mentioned whether this was acceptable to the government, or that the government considered it to be a good amendment?

Hon. Mr. Martin: No, I did not say it was attributed to the government. As my honourable friend knows, in the bill before us the government used as the base the recommendations of the chairman of the board, and I mentioned what the chairman had recommended. The bill, however, in clause 5, now incorporates the provisions of an amendment which was introduced in the other place by the party to which my honourable friend belongs; it was not the position of the government. The government decided, because the chairman of the board took one position, the representative of the employees another, and the representative of the employers another, that it was right that the base provided should be that suggested by one who was, by virtue of his chairmanship, clearly a neutral party on the board. That was not the decision taken in the other place and the provision in clause 5, with the modifications that were made, is now incorporated in the bill before us.

[Translation]

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, I do not know whether it was of Bossuet that it was said when he delivered late in the evening his first sermon at age 16 with the oratory recorded in history, that no speech had even taken place both so early and so late. I wonder if we are not in the same situation. I do not know whether it is early or late because indeed this sitting of the Senate began at 11 o'clock on August 31 and, if I am not mistaken, it is now 4 o'clock in the morning of September 1.

Hon. Mr. Martin: You are correct.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: So, it is understandable that there should be some confusion with regard to time.

On the other hand, what is rather strange is that exactly seven years have elapsed since the Senate—or the Parliament of Canada if you wish—has been called upon to pass a legislation substantially similar to this one.

I was reading a short while ago in the official report of the House of Commons and of the Senate that on September 1, 1966, the Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General gave royal assent to a bill entitled:

> An Act to provide for the resumption of operations of railways and for the settlement of the existing dispute with respect to terms and conditions of employment between Railway Companies and their employees.

It is an interesting coincidence which enables us to discuss not the particulars of this bill, but the problems facing us at this time.

[English]

Honourable senators, I think we owe some thanks to the Leader of the Government for the explanation he has given with regard to this bill. I would not say he deserves too much praise, however, because the task was an easy one. He had only to repeat what was said on previous occasions with respect to bills such as this.

It is always the same problem: "We do not like to do it, but we have to do it. We are in favour of the right to strike, but when it is exercised, sometimes we must remove that right." That is all very well; we continue to find ourselves in the same sort of situation. We are pressed by an urgent situation to adopt a bill in a matter of hours. We in this chamber this morning—again I hesitate to say "this morning"—have been waiting about 17 hours. Do you not think we look a little bit silly? Do you not think that Parliament as a whole looks a little bit silly trying to rush through a piece of legislation of this importance, legislation which concerns very difficult questions and very important principles? Dealing with this bill at three o'clock in the morning—

• (0440)

An Hon. Senator: Four o'clock.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I am referring to the other place. We really cannot do justice to this piece of legislation at this time of the day and under the circumstances in which we meet. It is foolish to think that we can.

We are here, of course, because it is urgent for us to legislate an end to this strike, which is seriously damaging the economy and causing significant personal hardship to a great number of Canadians.

This problem should have been dealt with by the government many, many weeks ago. The situation we are now faced with is not new. We knew it was coming. I remember that before we adjourned at the end of July we were discussing the inevitability of the strike. We knew that there was not one chance in a thousand that this dispute between the railway employees and the companies would be settled in the ordinary process of conciliation and mediation. But the government waited and was telling everybody, "We will not interfere; we respect the right to strike. We do not want to do anything about it." The government was not being sincere. I am convinced the government knew then that it would have to intervene at some time or another. Had the government at that time indicated that it was prepared to intervene, perhaps a solution would have been found.

But that is not the main problem. The main problem is that in this sector of industry the right to strike is given to employees and that right, if exercised, results in hardship to the public at large. It cannot be exercised without causing serious damage. To protect against situations like this, the government should have taken, some years ago, the decision to embody in legislation some machinery to deal with the type of situation which faces us this morning. For instance, the government has had since 1968 the report of the Task Force on Labour Relations, which task force it set up. However, it has done nothing about that report. The task force recommended that a three-man public interest disputes commission be set up—

Hon. Mr. Martin: That is the Woods Report.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Yes, that is the report to which I am referring. The commission, it was recommended, should be independent of any government department and composed of members of the public only, and should report directly to the Prime Minister. Nothing was ever done about that.

Since that time Parliament has had to intervene in strikes affecting the general public on three different occasions. In the previous session it had to intervene twice. On one occasion we had a ridiculous bill relating to the strike of the stevedores of the St. Lawrence ports. In it we took the foolish step of ordering people to obey the law. We passed a law telling people, "You must obey that other law." If we had the machinery about which I was speaking, the government would have the responsibility of deciding when the right to strike should be taken away from a certain group of employees. The machinery would provide for compulsory arbitration, with some rules governing the procedure and indicating to the arbitrator the way in which the wage rates should be set or applied. Even with that kind of machinery we might still have to interfere in the same way we did last year if the employees concerned did not obey the law and did not agree with the decision of the government. But the instances would surely be fewer.

In any event, I do not think Parliament should be recalled every time we have a situation like the one we are now faced with. It seems to me silly to ask Parliament to deal with a problem like the one we are dealing with this morning in a matter of a few hours, and under the pressure of ending a strike urgently.

How can we really appreciate the problems involved? I am not speaking of the necessity to force the railways to operate again, of forcing the employees to go back to work. That is obvious. But we have to tell them to go back to work under certain conditions. Now, how can we, after only a few hours of study, say to the employees that the conditions set down in this bill, even after the improvements made by the Opposition in the other place against the will of the government, are fair and that they should go back to work because we have decided that these are the conditions under which they should go back? We can't, if we're responsible, do that. We are not able to assess all the complexities involved in a dispute like this one. Parliament is not competent, nobody here is competent, to tell the railway employees, "The minimum conditions we are providing in this bill are fair enough for you to go back to work and forget about the right to strike that we have given you."

In fact, when we speak of the right to strike for railway employees we are not being frank at all. Nobody believes in it. Even the leader of the NDP, as far back as 1966, if honourable members want to look at the record, was saying the very same thing. It is not true. We cannot speak of the right to strike for railway employees, because the country can never afford a railway strike. It's just intolerable. You cannot say to a group of people, "You have the right to strike, but if you do use this right we will have to intervene and take it away from you." In the debate on the bill passed in 1966 Mr. Lewis acknowledged that. He said that there should be some rules for compulsory arbitration. Perhaps he did not say so in so many words, but if honourable members take time to read his speech they will find that this was his conclusion. And today he heads the party that is recognized as the political arm of labour in Canada.

I really do not understand why the government, after the experiences we have had over recent years, has not been able to bring in some legislation that would enable it to accept its responsibility, and not invite Parliament to share the burden of making such decisions. In fact, what is the government doing here? It is asking Parliament, "Will you help us out? Will you bail us out?" That is what is happening in the present instance. When the strike is on, with the necessity to end it as soon as possible, Parliament has to pass judgment on problems which it is not competent to judge.

● (0450)

We are going to vote for this bill, of course, because we want to end the strike. But how do we know, how can we know, that the conditions under which we are asking the employees to go back are fair? We are just shooting in the dark.

I hope that the improvement made in the other place to clause 5—increasing the award, or the decision of the conciliation board, by four cents and by 1.5 per cent, I understand, as of January 1, 1974—will help to convince the railway employees that Parliament is doing what it can to give them a fair minimum settlement, and will induce them to go back to work.

I certainly hope that the union leaders will show some responsibility. But I say this to the Leader of the Government and to the majority in this house: Sooner or later you will have to face the situation directly, and not try to avoid the issue; you will have to set up some machinery to settle these problems. If you continue asking Parliament to approve legislation in a rush, without really understanding what it means, one of these days you will be faced with a serious situation.

I am quite convinced that the union leaders and all the employees concerned will go back to work, but one of these days they might refuse, because they will not understand this process that we have been using over the years. They should know where they stand, they should know that there is a certain standard that will be observed in so far as they are concerned, and it should be embodied in legislation. I urge the Leader of the Government, I urge the government, and I urge the majority here, to think about it.

This is an impossible situation. I do not know whether I am acting in the right way in supporting this legislation. I know that I am doing the right thing in asking the employees to go back to work, because the country cannot afford to have this strike continue. But whether the conditions offered to the employees are right or wrong I do not know. I leave the responsibility for that to the government. I hope that one of these days the government will come up with really adequate machinery to settle these very difficult problems.

The fact that we are here at this hour of the day, the fact that the House of Commons started debating this bill the day before yesterday, and continued through the whole of yesterday until 3 o'clock this morning, and asks us to concur in this bill at this hour, it being now 5 o'clock on Saturday morning, is an indication of the stupidity of the situation in which Parliament finds itself.

We have no choice, if we want this strike to end. Since the House of Commons is waiting for us, there is no use in our considering this bill in committee; there is no use in discussing the details of the conditions under which the employees are being forced to go back to work. That would be useless, and we can only rubber-stamp this legislation. The House of Commons may have appeared to do a little more than that, but it did not do much more. In fact, Parliament cannot boast about having done very much by going through this legislation and passing it in the time it did.

Hon. J. Harper Prowse: Honourable senators, it is not my intention to weary you by embarking on a philosophical debate about matters which might properly be submitted later to committees of both houses, but I am concerned about the document which is placed before us. It may be that there is an answer in the Interpretation Act.

This bill says on its face that it was passed by the House of Commons on 31st August 1973. According to my watch it was not passed until about 2.30 or three o'clock on the morning of September 1. If that is correct and if there is an error on the face of the document, I do not know what effect that error would have on its legality.

The second point that arises is that clause 17 provides that the act shall come into force upon the day immediately following the day it is assented to. In other words, if we assume it was expected that it would be assented to before midnight last night, then it would have come into effect one minute after midnight and would now have been in effect for almost five hours. On the other hand, if, as I believe, there has been an oversight here, then it means that nobody will be starting anything until midnight tonight, which is 19 hours from now.

In view of the urgency, it is not a matter of stupidity that we are here dealing with this measure at this hour in the morning. The reason we are here is to get those trains running, and those people out of the spot they are in, as soon as possible. Therefore, if there has been any error in the drafting of this bill then, for heaven's sake, let us get it fixed up right now. Let us make the necessary amendments, and send the bill back to the House of Commons so that they can concur in them. By so doing we will not find ourselves with a piece of legislation that does not do what everyone expects it to do.

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, I had intended in my remarks to refer to the question raised by Senator Prowse. It is very important that we have a definition in that regard, because it can mean almost a further 48 hours' delay in the resumption of railway operation. I would point out that this is very significant to the Atlantic provinces, where we have had, as a result of the rotating rail strikes, a further two or two and a half days of strike. The rotating strike hit the Maritime provinces, after which the employees returned to work at six o'clock in the morning, and then they went out at six o'clock the same evening on a national strike.

The question raised by the Honourable Senator Prowse is valid and important. At this hour of the morning, we are not even sure whether it is Friday or Saturday. Of course, I could digress and outline a little bit of history, and refer to the fact that the Liberal Party has always solved this problem nicely by declaring Thursday to be Friday, and I am sure they will be able to handle this situation as well.

The various notes that I have made raise a number of questions in my mind. However, I am going to concentrate on one point, namely, the ferry service to the two island provinces, Prince Edward Island and Newfoundland. It is interesting to note that the Minister of Labour in his remarks in introducing the bill in the other place--and here I assume that he was presenting the viewpoint of the government, and expressing government concern—failed completely to recognize that the ferry services to the two island provinces had terminated as a result of the strike.

Hon. Mr. Côté: The Prime Minister recognized that situation.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: I am sorry. I could not hear the honourable gentleman.

Hon. Mr. Côté: I said the Prime Minister did.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: I have not had a chance to read the Prime Minister's remarks.

Hon. Mr. Molson: It would be out of order if you did, senator.

● (0500)

Hon. Mr. Phillips: Yes, it would be very much out of order. Naturally they have not been printed in Hansard yet, but the remarks of the Minister of Labour are there. They do not contain a reference to the ferry strike, which had such an adverse effect on the two island provinces on the Atlantic coast. The tourist industry in particular was very seriously affected by the strike, and great numbers of tourists have been stranded in both provinces.

I was intrigued by the fact that the province of Prince Edward Island, having the benefit of a privately operated car ferry service, was able to make arrangements to assist in the orderly movement of traffic across the strait, while Newfoundland, solely dependent on the benefits of a nationalized system, was completely captive and had no recourse to any other form of transportation.

It is also interesting to note that when an emergency occurs in other parts of the world, Canada offers transportation as its chief means of assisting in such an emergency. Yet two of our own provinces have been virtually isolated because of this strike, and no one in the federal government offered them our great asset, transportation, which is offered so readily when disasters occur in various parts of the world. Various areas, not only in Newfoundland but also in northern Canada, were becoming short of essential food items, yet no one proposed any form of government transportation, whether by Armed Forces or Department of Transport aircraft. I suggest that this is a matter to be very seriously considered. With the approach of fall, many areas may be in a serious situation regarding essential food items.

Two of our Atlantic provinces, Prince Edward Island and Newfoundland, are considering legal action against the federal government, in an effort to obtain compensation for the losses suffered as a result of the rail strike. This may or may not be a desirable tactic, and it is not my intention to go into the question of the desirability or undesirability of legal action. However, I would urge the government to give consideration to settling this claim out of court. It is rather unfortunate that we should end up, as a result of a rail strike, with at least one province suing the federal government. Surely we are democratic enough to settle this matter out of court.

There is in the Atlantic provinces a great deal of bitterness against the members of the railway union who operate the car ferries. Perhaps this will be of very short duration. I hope so, because the members of the union feel they must participate in the strike if they are to enjoy the benefits. A far more important point is that they must participate in the negotiations, because they work in a very unusual situation. During the winter, and more particularly during the spring, when the ice is heavy, the railway employees can leave on a crossing which should take one or one and a half hours but can last for five or six hours. They must then repeat the procedure in returning. Consequently their contract must contain certain special points respecting their terms of employment, and it is essential that the general public recognizes this.

I am concerned, honourable senators, with clause 4(1), which provides:

> —every railway company shall resume operation of the railway and subsidiary services—

The car ferries to Prince Edward Island and Newfoundland are owned by the Department of Transport, yet they are operated by the Canadian National Railways. In my mind, therefore, there is some considerable doubt that this would constitute a subsidiary of the railway company. Perhaps the expired agreement between the railway and the union would cover the situation. However, I would like assurance from the government that the railway will resume immediately the operation of the two car ferry services to Prince Edward Island and Newfoundland. It is essential that there be no further delay in this regard.

I am quite willing to accept the word of the honourable Leader of the Government in the Senate. I realize it is not the best authority in the world, but it is the best that we have here; and at this hour of the morning one reaches for a straw and hangs on to it. The two provinces have asked that the right to strike be removed from the operation of the ferries. Perhaps this could be done by legislation. I would hope, instead, that in the future the government will consider allowing the railways and the brotherhood of railway employees to consider these persons as members of an auxiliary unit of the brotherhood. They could participate in negotiations and live up to the terms of their employment, yet not feel obligated to answer the strike call. In my opinion, this would be quite satisfactory. It would allow employees of the railway service to transfer to other branches, and would allow laid-off employees of the railway to transfer to the ferry service.

● (0510)

Honourable senators, I wish to emphasize again the need to restore the ferry service, and I would ask Senator Martin to give his assurance that it will be restored immediately.

Hon. Chesley W. Carter: Honourable senators, I have some brief remarks in support of what Senator Phillips has just said. The ferry service between Nova Scotia and Newfoundland is a vital link in the economy of the province of Newfoundland. In fact, it is our life line. The province of Prince Edward Island does have a private ferry on which it can rely and from which it gets some relief in a situation such as the one we are going through. However, there is no private ferry service in Newfoundland.

About 10 days ago there was a backlog of 600 freight cars piled up in North Sydney. I do not know what the situation is at the present time, but that backlog certainly must have doubled, which means that the economy of Newfoundland is already crippled. It will be months before this backlog can be cleared up, with the result that our northern settlements may be completely cut off from the supplies which they need, because those supplies must be shipped before the freeze-up in late fall or early winter.

When the railways ceased operating, other parts of Canada fell back on the trucking service. However, in Newfoundland the ferry is both our railroad and our highroad, so once the ferry stops running we have no trucking service. Consequently, we suffer more severely than any other part of Canada.

I should like to point out to the Leader of the Government that the Terms of Union between the Province of Newfoundland and the Dominion of Canada require that the ferry service be continued. As a result, when a strike interrupts that service it not only violates a contract between the railway and the union, but it also violates the provisions of the British North America Act. I understand that there are penalties for breaking the law in Canada, and certainly this is a law that is being broken. It is my hope that the government will take some steps to enact legislation to prevent interruption of the ferry service in the event that strikes of this nature occur in the future. I would ask the Leader of the Government to bring this to the attention of the government, to see whether legislation cannot be put on the statute books to prevent a recurrence.

As Senator Prowse has pointed out, Bill C-217, as it is before us now, will come into force some 19 hours later than we had hoped. Once it does come into force there will be another period of 24 hours or probably 36 hours before things can get rolling again, which means that it will be Wednesday or Thursday of next week, at the earliest, before the ferries are back in operation. Another factor is that we do not know what the union reaction to this legislation will be. We hear over the news media that they are not too happy with it and that some employees have vowed not to obey the law.

I point out that the province of Newfoundland is in a crisis position at the present time, and if the ferries do not run for another week the situation will become intolerable.

For those reasons I should like to impress upon the Leader of the Government the need to provide some emergency service to fill the gap in the event that this interruption of the ferry service is prolonged.

Hon. Mr. Forsey: Honourable senators, I had hoped to speak on this bill, but in the circumstances I have no choice but to defer my remarks to a more convenient season.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I would have liked to have done that, too.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I would inform you that if the Honourable Senator Martin speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for second reading of this bill.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Honourable senators, I should like to reply briefly to some of the questions that have been put and some of the assurances that have been asked for, and to refer to one matter raised by the Leader of the Opposition in a speech that I thought was, in these circumstances, a responsible one, and one that we would have expected him to make, having in mind his interest in the welfare of the country.

Senator Prowse called our attention to the provisions of the final clause of this bill, dealing with the time when the bill becomes effective. This bill, with clause 17, has just come to us from the other place, and I can tell Senator Prowse—as I think he knows himself, because he followed a good bit of the debate in the other place—that clause 17 was before the other place. It represents the wish of that House, and consequently it seems to me quite clear what our responsibility is, namely, to deal with the bill in the form in which it comes to us. Clause 17 provides:

> This Act shall come into force on the day immediately following the day this Act is assented to.

The fact that on the cover of the bill there are in type the words "As passed by the House of Commons 31st August, 1973" does not alter the validity and effectiveness of what I have said as representing the decision of the other place, one of the Houses of Parliament. The words "As passed by the House of Commons 31st August, 1973" are obviously a mistake. The time of day at which we are sitting in the Senate is a response to that. They are not, however, part of the bill. This is a designation by the officers of Parliament. It is not Parliament itself that puts in "As passed by the House of Commons 31st August, 1973," because the House of Commons would respond "We passed it today." This editorial slip in no way affects the substance of the bill. It is an editorial mistake that will be corrected.

The reason the bill comes into force on the day following royal assent is that if it came into force on the day of assent the bill would be retroactive to 12.01 a.m. on that day, according to the provisions of the Interpretation Act. The result would be that all parties would be acting illegally. The Interpretation Act defines "day" as a calendar day; that is, 12.01 a.m. to 12.00 midnight. Therefore, if the bill came into force on the day of proclamation at 5 a.m. or at 5.30 a.m., "day" having been defined, it would have been effective five hours before anyone could have had any notice.

I will certainly act on the suggestion of Senator Carter with respect to what he has said should be brought to the attention of my colleagues in the government, particularly the Minister of Transport, with regard to emergency services.

● (0520)

Senator Phillips mentioned the provisions of clause 4. It is a fact, as he himself has said, that the ferries in question are owned by the Department of Transport. They are operated, pursuant to contract, by the railways. Clause 4 provides that the subsidiaries such as the ferries are clearly covered in this bill, not only in clause 4 but also in clause 8(1), and clause 16 dealing with arbitration.

Honourable senators, as to the legal action that has been threatened, this is a matter which each government must decide in the light of its responsibilities. I make no comment on the legal situation, for two reasons. In the first place, it would not be wise for me to make a comment. Secondly, I would not know what kind of comment should be made. In any event, whatever may be the legal situation, the matter raised by Senator Phillips is not one that will go without the fullest study and consideration.

Senator Flynn, in his helpful and sometimes hard hitting—understandably hard hitting—speech, said that the government should have acted a long time ago. This is the precise remark, the kind of argument, I myself made when a government of which he was a distinguished member had to deal with a situation like this, when the men were ordered back to work, without any compensation having been determined, or any minimum terms provided. It was said then, as I recall, by myself and by others, that the government should have acted earlier. That is the kind of statement one would expect a vigilant oppositionist like Senator Flynn to make. I was not less alert on another occasion than he was tonight. But the government did not act prematurely.

Senator Flynn says that there should have been some law in existence enabling the government to deal with emergency situations in the public sector and affecting the interest of the nation. I know there is a strong section in Parliament, and outside, which takes that position. But in this case, there being no such provision, had the government acted earlier it would properly have been accused of having interfered in the collective bargaining process, which is a vital part of our heritage of freedom in this free society.

There is always the hope, even with respect to operations that are of national import, operations that involve the employment, as in this case, of over 90,000 men, that at some point agreement between the parties will be reached. The national interest clearly must be protected, but until the danger point is reached, and in the absence of any such legislation as Senator Flynn mentioned, a government would be open to the greatest criticism—

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Not by me.

Hon. Mr. Martin: —if it interfered with the collective bargaining process. Senator Flynn says "not by me," and he clearly made his position understood in that regard, but I am sure there would be many in this country who would regard a premature interference as unwarranted.

Senator Flynn seriously invited all of us, the government in particular, to take into account the recommendation of the Woods Report. The leader of his party has, in the other place and outside, proposed the establishment of a public disputes commission, one which would categorize those operations that should be dealt with as coming within the class of those that create, in the event of a strike, a national emergency. I can only say that the Minister of Labour, when faced with this request for a public disputes commission, said that he did not accept it. I was not in the other place at the time and I forget the reasons which he gave, but I am advised that he rejected this type of commission. Nevertheless, the question is one of great importance.

We have in the Senate men and women of varied experience in business, in the professions, in labour, in agriculture and in other avocations. I am sure they could give this matter a great deal of thought, and it might be desirable at some point that we give some further consideration to this. Not only have we a wide representation of expert opinion and great experience in our membership, but we have some outstanding people who have had long experience in labour matters—Senator Goldenberg, Senator Forsey and Senator Lawson, to mention but three, and we have Senator Croll and others.

This House of Parliament need not feel it is less competent to deal with a matter of this kind than the other House of Parliament. In any event, it is open to any one of us to take the initiative with respect to the question understandably raised by Senator Flynn.

There were many other points which Senator Flynn made. I do not think he expects me at this time to comment on them, but I assure him that what he did say, certainly by way of constructive criticism, will not go unnoticed. I would not pay the same attention to those remarks which I regard as not within the category of constructive criticism. Nevertheless, I admire the way in which those unconstructive observations and criticisms were levelled at me and at the government.

But now the task for all of us is to get on with the job, for the railways to resume their operations, and for the men to go back to work. I am sure that the end result, as in other instances similar to this, will be that justice will be accorded to both sides in the dispute, and that the interests of the nation will not be further imperiled.

[Hon. Mr. Martin.]

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Paul Martin: With leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(h), I move that the bill be read the third time now.

Hon. Mr. Prowse: Honourable senators, may I ask the Leader of the Government a question? I did not understand the last part of his answer to the question I raised, namely, whether clause 17 as we now have it was put in that form deliberately or inadvertently. If that clause were changed to provide that the act "shall come into force at noon on the day on which it is assented to", we would get around the objection about the retroctivity, and it would still give us 12 hours more.

● (0530)

I ask that question because 12 hours could be very important, and I would not feel I was doing my duty if I were not clear on that before being asked to vote.

Hon. Mr. Martin: I do not think I can add anything to what I have already said. I appreciate very much Senator Prowse's interest in the matter, but clause 17 is quite clear. It is the provision as passed by the other house and it is the provision that I am proposing to this house. When the bill is finalized, it will bear the designation Chapter 32, assented to on September 1, 1973.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

ROYAL ASSENT

NOTICE

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that the following communication had been received:

GOVERNMENT HOUSE
OTTAWA

1 September 1973

Madam,

I have the honour to inform you that the Honourable Ronald Martland, Puisne Judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, in his capacity as Deputy Governor General, will proceed to the Senate Chamber today, the 1st day of September, at 4.30 a.m. for the purpose of giving Royal Assent to certain Bills.

I have the honour to be,
Madam,
Your obedient servant,
André Garneau
Brigadier General
Administrative Secretary to the
Governor General

The Honourable
The Speaker of the Senate,
Ottawa.

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. Leopold Langlois: Honourable senators, I move, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding Rule 45(1)(g), that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until Tuesday, September 18, 1973, at 8 o'clock in the evening.

Honourable senators, I feel I should add at this stage that although this motion calls for adjournment to September 18, we shall very likely be recalled before that date, when legislation is passed in the other place. It is expected that we will return within a week.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Does that mean that the session is resumed at this time rather than on October 30, the date set when we adjourned at the end of July?

Hon. Mr. Langlois: I do not think it means that, but it is likely that we shall receive urgent legislation before too long.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Does that mean legislation that was not on the Order Paper of the other place when we adjourned?

Hon. Mr. Martin: Perhaps I should briefly supplement the remarks of Senator Langlois. It is true that at the end of July we adjourned until October 30, and the House of Commons adjourned until October 15. In the meantime, of course, we encountered this situation. Other situations of an important character seem to be of concern to members of Parliament, and to the public.

The government has addressed itself to some aspects of the problem of inflation. The House of Commons is to meet on Tuesday, and there will undoubtedly be a discussion of inflation, its causes and proposed remedies. The government will be dealing with some aspects of that problem, as the Prime Minister has indicated, and in all probability some new measures will be introduced. Those measures can only be enacted with the consent of both Houses of Parliament. It is not possible now to envision when—it may be next week or the week after—those bills will be dealt with in the other place. We therefore consider it wise to adjourn until the date mentioned by Senator Langlois, with the expectancy that we may have to return earlier.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: In the event the measures referred to by the government leader are passed, is it the intention of the government to adjourn the House of Commons until October 15?

Hon. Mr. Martin: I do not believe any decision has been made with regard to that matter.

Motion agreed to.

• (0540)

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

ROYAL ASSENT

The Honourable Ronald Martland, Puisne Judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General, having come and being seated at the foot of the Throne, and the House of Commons having been summoned, and being come with their Speaker, the Honourable the Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General was pleased to give the Royal Assent to the following bill:

> An Act to provide for the resumption and continuance of operations of railways and for the settlement of the disputes with respect to terms and conditions of employment between railway companies and their employees.

The House of Commons withdrew.

The Honourable the Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General was pleased to retire.

The sitting of the Senate was resumed.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, September 18, at 8 p.m.

THE SENATE

Thursday, September 6, 1973

The Senate met at 8 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Hon. Paul Martin tabled:

Report of the Canadian National Railways Securities Trust for the year ended December 31, 1972, pursuant to section 17 of the Canadian National Railways Capital Revision Act, chapter 311, R.S.C., 1952.

Copies of amendments to the Income Tax Regulations with respect to Canadian manufacturing and processing profits, together with press release, dated August 30, 1973, relating thereto.

Copies of Order in Council P.C. 1973-2482, dated August 21, 1973, amending Part I of the Schedule to the Hazardous Products Act, pursuant to section 8(3) of the said act, chapter H-3, R.S.C., 1970.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

On the Question Period.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Honourable senators, as no one has asked, I would like to know why we are here again? I thought the Leader of the Government would have had the courage to step up and tell us something regarding the recall of Parliament before the date that we had set last Saturday morning at six o'clock.

Hon. Mr. Martin: I thought that the Leader of the Opposition was aware, because I did telephone him the other day—

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I knew that would be the first thing you would say. Don't you know any other formula with which to start a reply to me?

Hon. Mr. Martin: —to advise him that we would reconvene in order to deal with three measures, we hoped, which were being proposed by the government. At that time it was anticipated that we would certainly have one or two, and possibly all three of them, so that the Senate could dispose of them, if it wished, after giving them the consideration it wanted.

We felt that, as the other place was going to adjourn following those matters, in all probability—

Hon. Mr. Flynn: You said no to that last week.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Would my honourable friend allow me to finish? It was felt that because of this the Senate would want to be here to deal with these measures, as is its constitutional obligation.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: No.

Hon. Mr. Martin: And that, in any event, the Senate would not want to be placed in the invidious position, of which it is sometimes unjustly and unfairly accused, of shirking its responsibility, which I deny is the case. We wanted to deal with these measures. I can very well understand what would have certainly been said outside if we were not here to deal with measures designed to meet the problem of inflation and which had been passed by the other place.

By being here tonight the Senate is doing its duty, and it is my concept, after the fullest consultation with other honourable senators, that this is our duty.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. O'Leary: Honourable senators, I rise, if I may, to support the position taken by my leader. I think that this house, being recalled on two occasions in recent weeks when there was nothing for it to do, compels and creates the disrespect which is growing in this country for this house.

When I accepted an appointment to the Senate I did not do so expecting to be at the beck and call, to be a waiter for the whims and follies and the mistakes and incompetence, of the other chamber. This is what is wrong here. We have been recalled for what? We have been recalled to do nothing.

I, myself, am convinced that this country is forgetting what this house is about. This house is an integral part of Parliament. Yet we have the press, or we have the media, as it is called now, referring constantly to members of Parliament and senators. We are members of Parliament, and surely we are entitled to more respect than merely to be here at the beck and call of the other place.

● (2010)

Nobody knows this better, and nobody should know it better, than the consummate, sophisticated politician who is the leader of this house. In fact, every time I hear him speak, every time I see him in action and hear him in action, I feel I should bow where I cannot pray. I appeal to him as an ornament of this branch of Parliament to be a little more in character with the guardian of the dignity of this house and its rights.

Hon. Mr. Forsey: Honourable senators, I would venture to add something to this. It seems to me that one thing we could very well do on occasions when we are here with no business from the other place is to get on with some of the items on the Orders of the Day. There is a string of things down here, at least six items on the Orders of the Day, some of which have been there for a very long time. Repeatedly when they are called we hear, "Stand. Stand. Stand." I cannot see why some of them, which seem to me to be suitable and of continuing importance, might not be taken up by some of those who have adjourned the debate on these matters, either by rising and saying their piece or giving way to somebody who is prepared to speak. There must be people in this house who are prepared, with very little preparation, to speak on order number one, for example, the bill introduced by Senator Grosart concerning representation of the Yukon and Northwest Territories. There must be people here prepared to speak, with very little preparation, on a number of these matters.

Under the head of Inquiries there is one that was put down by Senator Argue way back in January, and as far as I can recall it has never been taken up at all. I do not say it is incumbent on every senator who puts something down on the Order Paper to be here on every occasion, or for every senator who adjourns a debate to be here prepared to speak on the matter at a moment's notice. But I do think we would enhance our stature in the eyes of the country if some of us were to exert ourselves and be ready to take up various matters that are on the Order Paper. I am perfectly prepared at a moment's notice to make my small contribution on the first order, for example, dealing with the representation of the Yukon and Northwest Territories.

If we are brought here for some quite legitimate reason, as explained by the Leader of the Government, I do not see why we should not do some of the business that we have put on our own Order Paper on our own initiative. It is our own responsibility. This, it seems to me, would be a way of discharging our duties, or performing our function in Parliament, which would avoid some of the unfortunate results that have been alluded to by other senators.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Honourable senators, far be it from me to try to stand in judgment of the conduct of others. As far as I am concerned, I would rather be called here on occasions when there is nothing to do than not be here when there is something to do. I think that is the way we should look at our job as senators here. We should be at the disposal of the country when there is urgent legislation to be passed. Following the suggestion made by Senator Forsey, if we are looking for some work to do tonight, we can do what they did in the other place instead of discussing urgent legislation which is before Parliament. They discussed inflation. We can do that tonight. We are called here to pass measures to remedy inflation—

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Honourable senators, I rise on a point of order.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: You cannot take it, as usual, of course.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: If the honourable senator wishes to discuss the debate that is going on in the other place, which is entirely out of order, I have no objection.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: I am not discussing that.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: If you have no other argument you might as well stay where you are on your seat.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: You can continue going on giving your lesson to everybody. You are not teaching very much, and you are not being listened to.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I know. That's why we look ridiculous at times. It is because suggestions from this side aren't followed.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: As to what took place in the other house, I am just giving that as an example to follow in this place. If honourable members of the Opposition do not know what they should talk about tonight, let them talk about inflation—that is what they have been doing in the other place, instead of discussing measures to deal with inflation—or let them talk about any other matters on the Order Paper. It is up to you. It is a free house and we are ready to give leave to discuss any matter you want to discuss, if you have anything to say on the situation prevailing in the country.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: You people have nothing of value to say. You're the people who created this economic mess we have on our hands.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: You can talk as long as you wish, beating on that point. You probably can talk louder than I can, and I will not try to contend with you on that.

Hon. Mr. Cameron: Honourable senators, I do not wish to enter into the argument between Senator Flynn and Senator Langlois, but I would like to associate myself with Senator Forsey's idea that one of the things we could do in this time, pending the arrival of legislation, is to proceed with what is on the Order Paper. I think that is a perfectly proper suggestion to follow. I am sure that when the house does reconvene, if we have another recess, there will be plenty to do, so let us get what we can out of the way.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: Honourable senators, it has been the custom on Thursdays for the Leader of the Government to give an indication of the business for the next week. I wonder if he could indicate to the chamber what emergency the government has prepared for next week, and what days we will be sitting next week.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Honourable senators, as Senator Phillips knows, there is now being discussed in the other place an amendment that will provide for the indexing of old age security pensions on a quarterly basis instead of on an annual basis. We had every reason to believe, on the basis of a reasonable assessment, that that bill might reach us sometime today. Because of the rules of the other place, that progress was thwarted at 5 o'clock when one single member—within his right—objected to the use of the private members' hour between 5 and 6 o'clock for that purpose. That measure will be with us, if not later tonight, perhaps tomorrow.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: What is the urgency?

Hon. Mr. Martin: There is also a bill providing for the indexing on a quarterly basis of superannuation payments to persons in the Public Service. In addition to that, there is another measure providing for the increase in family allowances up to $12, pending the introduction later of a measure providing family allowances in the amount of $20 to begin on January 1, 1974.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Very urgent!

Hon. Mr. Martin: These three measures are part of the government's current program to meet the rise in the cost of living.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Recent? Not very recent.

Hon. Mr. Martin: With the cooperation of all honourable members of all parties on both sides of the house, those three measures will be before us sometime between now and some day next week. Those are measures which everyone in the country regards as capable of contributing to an improvement and an easing for thousands of citizens in respect of price rises. This, together with the government's effort at subsidizing bread and milk, the persuasion that it seeks to exercise on the oil and gas industries, and the various selective measures it has devised, is all part of a program designed to meet the problem of inflation. Now, this program is important.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: It is inflationary.

Hon. Mr. Martin: These are matters which lie ahead and which can only be dealt with by both Houses of Parliament. I say, in answer to Senator O'Leary, it is true that we are all members of Parliament. It is because we in this house are members of Parliament, like those who constitute the membership in the other place, that when there is legislation pending it is our duty as senators to be here to deal with it as quickly and as expeditiously—

Hon. Mr. Flynn: That is not true.

Hon. Mr. Martin:—as our obligations following careful study will permit. That is our duty. That is our constitutional obligation.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: No.

Hon. Mr. Martin: I am sure that there would be nothing that would bring this chamber into criticism by a sometimes unknowing news media than for us not to be here to discharge our obligation. Our obligation is to be here to deal with this legislation, and it is not our fault if that legislation is not before us now.

• (2020)

Hon. Mr. Flynn: That is a lot of hot air!

Hon. Mr. Martin: There was every reasonable expectation that at least one or two of these measures would be here before the end of the present week. It is not our fault if they are not here—

Hon. Mr. Flynn: But it is your fault that we are here.

Hon. Mr. Martin: It is not our fault if they are not here, and, I repeat again, if those measures had come to us and the Senate was not here to deal with them, a howl would have gone up in the country, and rightfully so, by the electorate and a citizenry that would have every justification to complain.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Hot air!

Hon. Mr. Martin: Not only would they have every justification, but there would be some honourable members of this house who would also criticize us for not having been called here to deal with measures which everyone recognizes as desirable, if not fully satisfactory.

Hon. Mr. O'Leary: May I ask the honourable leader a question? If certain people in the other house go on endlessly electioneering as they have done in the last few days, as reported to me by a member of their own party, if they go on day after day, hour after hour, electioneering, are we to sit here and wait until they finish electioneering?

[Hon. Mr. Flynn.]

Hon. Mr. Martin: My honourable friend Senator O'Leary, who has far more political experience than I have, can answer that question by noting that if there is a disposition to electioneer—and I am not saying there is a disposition to electioneer—that disposition is not confined to one political party.

Hon. Mr. O'Leary: It was confined to one party the other afternoon, and if you read Hansard of the House of Commons you will see that it was confined to one party, and that that bill would now be before us if it had not been for Liberal members in the other house having been engaged in electioneering. And what good that electioneering will do them, God knows!

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Senator O'Leary was answering the charge made by Senator Langlois, but—

Hon. Mr. Langlois: I made no charge.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: That is what you said—that the Conservative Party in the other place was electioneering. But my question to the Leader of the Government at this time—and I hope he can answer it without making a speech full of hot air like the one he just made—is whether there was any absolute necessity to pass the bill respecting the increase, the indexing of the old age pensions, by tomorrow. Wouldn't next Monday or Tuesday have been soon enough? What's the rush? The increases are only for October.

Hon. Mr. Martin: I think there was. Basically, as I told Senator Flynn on the telephone at the time, there were good reasons for concluding that the three bills would be in our hands before the end of this week. There was also some good reason for thinking that there might be an adjournment on the part of the other place.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Oh, oh.

Hon. Mr. Martin: In that case, it was surely our obligation to be here to deal with those measures before the other place adjourned. Now, those were not final judgments; those were judgments that could be made only on an assessment of the situation. It was an honest assessment. It was an assessment that Senator Flynn himself would have made, if he were sitting on this side.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Oh, no.

Hon. Mr. Martin: He says no. He has not yet had that responsibility. I know that if it ever comes to him he will discharge it sincerely and in no way different from the way it has been discharged today.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Honourable senators, I wish to make my position clear. I am not here trying to defend the case of the party sitting on the left of Madam Speaker. I am trying to defend the case of the Senate. I know that I am defending a case that many senators sitting behind the Leader of the Government believe to be a just case—one of great merit. The Leader of the Government always speaks of his telephone conversations with me. I could speak of many telephone conversations with many of his supporters, or so-called supporters. If he wants to raise such matters, it could become very embarrasssing for him. I always considered the telephone conversations that I had with the Leader of the Government as private. I resent his making them public knowledge for the purpose of bolstering his very weak argument. I never said to the Leader of the Government that I agreed with his decision to recall Parliament tonight. He says that we should be here in case the other place passes legislation.

Hon. Mr. Denis: What is wrong with that?

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I say no.

Hon. Mr. Denis: But what is wrong with that?

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I say no. We are not here to wait for the other place to pass a bill and then rubber-stamp it. That is a basic and erroneous assumption under which the present Leader of the Government in the Senate has operated since his coming to this place. In recalling Parliament tonight, just in case the legislation presently before the other place might be passed, the government was taking for granted that the Senate would be willing to completely ignore its rules, that the Senate would have foregone its usual two days' notice, and that we would have dealt with this legislation tonight.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Parliament was not recalled tonight. It was recalled two weeks ago.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I meant the Senate.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: But you said Parliament.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: All right. I stand corrected. But I do wish to point out that it was clear to all other honourable members of the Senate, if it wasn't clear to Senator Langlois. If only one fails to understand, is it not possible that it is he who has a problem?

Now, to get back to my point. When the Leader of the Government tells us to be here tonight, in case the other place passes a particular bill dealing with old age pensions, linking them to the rise in the cost of living on a quarterly basis rather than on an annual basis, he assumes that we are going to deal with that bill tonight.

Hon. Mr. Martin: No, no.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Oh, yes. Otherwise, why call members of the Senate from British Columbia and Nova Scotia if not to be here to deal with the bill? But if there is no leave to deal with the bill tonight or tomorrow, then we will according to our rules have to adjourn until next week. So, in fact, what you have done is quite simply this: you have called these people to take a bow before Madam Speaker, but more particularly before the Leader of the Government. The Leader of the Government was lonely in his office—

Hon. Mr. Langlois: You are not fair. Say something sensible.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: The Leader of the Government misses us when we are absent too long. But let me hasten to point out that we don't miss him. Not at all.

We were summoned to the Senate to deal with the business of Parliament when there is business before Parliament. We were not summoned here to wait and be prepared to fall all over ourselves to pass legislation the moment it is sent us. That may be the government leader's position but it is not mine and it is not that of anyone who understands the role of the Senate.

Hon. Mr. Martin: That is not the case at all.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: We are supposed to give sober second thought to legislation, and I cannot see how we can give that sober second thought if we are prepared to rubber-stamp a bill two minutes after it has passed the other place.

There is no justification for our being here tonight. If the legislation were to pass the other place, then it could come to us next Tuesday, and members of the Senate from British Columbia or Nova Scotia would not have to come all that way to sit here and wait until next week to do any work. For myself I do not mind particularly, although it has disrupted my own program somewhat. Still, I am not complaining. But some members of this house will be here five days for nothing simply because the Leader of the Government in the Senate thinks that he has a duty to safeguard and protect the government by having the Senate approve immediately, with utmost speed, all measures that may pass the other place.

Apparently the Leader of the Government is not capable of making a distinction between the situation with which we were faced last week and the present one. In that situation there was an element of urgency, and I agreed with him at that time when during the course of a telephone conversation I told him that he was right in what he wanted to do. I said, "You are right to call the Senate on Thursday even if the bill has not passed the other place." There is a difference between the two situations. I thought that the Leader of the Government was more incisive. But I suppose it is as hard to teach partisans new ways as it is to teach old dogs new tricks. The Leader of the Government does not understand the Senate and never has understood it. I say to the government leader, and to all his supporters who get worked up occasionally when he makes hot air speeches such as the one he made a short while ago, that no one has ever hurt the Senate and its image more than he. Every time he summons this house to give quick approval to legislation coming to us from the other place he puts another nail in the coffin of the bicameral system. There is never any justification for servile behavior.

• (2030)

Senator Forsey and Senator Cameron ask why we do not deal with the items on the Order Paper. I have no objection, but when you recall Parliament because of urgency why should you deal with such matters as these? You were in agreement when we adjourned on July 27 that we not deal with these matters before October 30. Now you suggest we use them as fill. Your motive is noble. You want to keep your leader from looking completely inane. But that doesn't make your suggestion worthy of much consideration. If you insist that it is a serious proposal and should be implemented, I won't stand in your way. But I leave to you the responsibility of defending this position before public opinion.

The Senate has one principal duty, and that is to review legislation. And that should be done after it has passed the other place, not before. The government leader has already made a speech defending the legislation in advance. He does not know what it will be when it arrives here, and he has no right to assume that it will be the same as it now is. He does this, nevertheless, and assumes that we will waive our rules in order to approve and rubber-stamp the legislation. For five years I have urged the government leader to understand that there is no need for the Senate to be here before the legislation has passed the other place. The position in which we find ourselves now is completely ludicrous. But this is not the first time we have demonstrated our propensity for the absurd. We have found ourselves in similar circumstances on many occasions.

I have discussed this matter with many members of the Senate and none of them are pleased with the way we have been forced to act. I reiterate that I am not defending the case of the Opposition at all, but that of the Senate.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: My honourable friend Senator Langlois says no.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: I said nothing at all; you are imagining things.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: If you tell me you didn't mean what you seemed to say, I will accept that.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: I did not utter anything; you are just imagining things.

Hon. Mr. Walker: He spoke but he said nothing. Let us make the distinction.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: What annoys me is that I know that when, after the next election, the Grits wake up on this side of the chamber, they will seek out every opportunity, both real and imagined, to criticize us for the very things they are doing now.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: That is your old habit of sleeping over there.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Did you say something this time?

Hon. Mr. Langlois: You did, as usual.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: But did you say something about my sleeping on this side?

Hon. Mr. Langlois: That is what I said.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: That is what you said, unless Hansard does not report you correctly. You are seated across from me and you said it would be my old habit of sleeping on this side.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: You are being silly.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Did you say that, or not?

Hon. Mr. Langlois: You are being silly.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I am not being silly, but I will tell you that I do not snore as you do. Of course, when the Leader of the Government speaks that would be just cause for all of us to retreat to the arms of Morpheus.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: You should not say that. You are not fair when you say that.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Well, who was not fair in the first place?

Hon. Mr. Langlois: You.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: That's a good one. I never heard anything so asinine. I suppose, honourable senators, that I am helping the Liberal side of the Senate by speaking so long that the bill may reach us before we are through this exchange. I can just imagine how pleased the Leader of the Government would be if we received a message from the other place saying that the bill had finally passed. I do not mind; it would do no violence to my basic contention. I am not speaking on behalf of the Opposition; I am trying to defend the Senate. I would hope that some members on the other side who have strong convictions similar to mine would tonight have the courage to rise and speak their minds.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, there is nothing before the house at the present time. We are on the Question Period, and under the rules questions may be asked of the government leader or a senator who is a minister of the Crown. There is, however, no provision for a debate. Because this is obviously a matter of great interest to honourable senators, and sometimes we do not follow the rules too closely, the Chair has allowed ample opportunity for both the Leader of the Government and the Leader of the Opposition to make their points. I would like to be able to call the Orders of the Day, but before doing so, if you will allow me, I will make another statement.

Increasingly comments are made which cast reflection on the other house, and speeches made there. I refer honourable senators to the 18th edition of May at page 416, where it is stated:

> It is obviously unbecoming to permit offensive expressions against the character and conduct of Parliament to be used without rebuke; for they are not only a contempt of that high court, but are calculated to degrade the legislature in the estimation of the people.

I ask honourable senators to bear that passage in mind when making comments.

I should like to proceed with the Orders of the Day, but if other senators wish to speak I shall allow them.

Hon. Mr. Croll: Honourable senators, I have a question for the leader. As payments under the three acts which are now before the House of Commons will not be made until October 1, what is the urgency?

Hon. Mr. Martin: There is the obligation of processing three different acts. These are amendments to the Old Age Security Act, which governs well over a million people; similar payments respecting pensions of retired public servants; and a measure providing for an increase in the family allowance. I do not suggest that there is any limitation on our right of debate or the length of time that we take. It does, however, take time to process and prepare. In addition, notices must be inserted, not by a central office but by a regional office. The department officials concerned have advised both the ministry and the government of the need for this time.

Hon. Mr. Walker: Honourable senators, I have heard in high circles that our leader is to leave us shortly to become the Governor General in November.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Bravo; it is the best thing that could happen to us.

Hon. Mr. Walker: Obviously the display put on tonight by his would-be successors is something regarding which I should like to ask a question of the leader. Never in all my years in the Senate have I heard the Honourable Senator Langlois in such an ebullient and oratorical mood. Would it be that he is the first choice? He is in the front row tonight.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: I have no ambition whatsoever.

Hon. Mr. Walker: Or could it be Senator Molgat, who had trouble in Manitoba? Of course, that is an odd sort of province, which did not appreciate his talents and he has come along very quickly here. Could it be that he is to be the choice? Or could it be that our great friend, Senator McDonald, is to be the leader? It has been a wonderful thing to sit here opposite and watch these three very distinguished senators compete for the succession. We on this side are becoming highly nervous about it and having watched Senator Langlois tonight I am reminded that he looks his best in his sailor's uniform sitting in his yacht with the waves racing about him. But tonight he was so eloquent that I am almost inclined to think that he must have the nod. Otherwise, he would not have presumed to have been as forceful as he was. It is marvellous.

• (2040)

On the other hand, there is Senator Molgat. We have not had a leader from the Western provinces for some time. We have had Senator Macdonald from Ontario; we have had Senator Connolly from Ontario, and we have Senator Martin from Ontario. It is time we had someone from one of the Western provinces.

Hon. Mr. Benidickson: We had Senator Haig.

Hon. Mr. Walker: Yes, Senator Haig from Manitoba, and a wonderful leader he was. Perhaps it is for that reason, if none other, that Senator Molgat might be considered as a possible candidate. In any event, these are brilliant men and I congratulate the leader. I did not realize what he was doing all these months in giving encouragement to one and then pulling the carrot away and favouring another. Of course, the one being rejected looks annoyed for a while and the new man looks pleased, as pleased as Punch, particularly Senator Molgat.

Senator Molgat has not been in this house long. He does not know what happens to those who are too ambitious. But it is wonderful that he has kept his ambition to its present height. And do not forget Senator "Ham" McDonald, a very good friend of all on this side. He is still in the running.

Senator Croll could perhaps give a better answer than I, but if our leader becomes the Governor General—

Hon. Mr. Flynn: You mean the Leader of the Senate.

Hon. Mr. Walker: Yes, the leader of our house—and I hope he does. He is an old friend of mine and a very distinguished one. There is no one in Canada who could fill that honoured post with more distinction than he. I have known him since I debated with him at the University of Toronto away back in 1926. He will be a good Governor General, but who is going to fill the exalted place he is leaving? That is important. That is the real question tonight, not the obvious fact that my leader is right about the recall of the Senate. It is a completely ridiculous thing. However, I do not blame the Leader of the Senate for recalling us. He does not want to lose the preference that he has at the present time by doing anything untoward. Had the measures passed the House of Commons and we were not here to deal with them, it might have wrecked his future career. Who knows?

But here we have four people, all of them playing what we used to call musical chairs. We would ride around on our horses and then have to get off the horse and sit on the chair. Well, they don't have to get off their horses, but I might say to Senator Langlois that he had better get off his high horse if he hopes to fill this honourable position.

Having said what I said in support of my leader, who always talks common sense, I will come to my question and ask the honourable Leader of the Government to relieve us of our worry. This has been worrying me for months. Until tonight I thought Senator Langlois was just a second runner. However, he was so eloquent tonight I thought perhaps he had moved to the forefront. Would the Leader of the Senate please tell us who is going to succeed him?

Hon. Mr. Martin: I am sure that this question is very relevant to the important issue that Senator Flynn has provoked. I can assure Senator Walker that he need not have any concern. He and I will be in this house for a long time together. In any event, I can only say to him that I do not know why he puts himself out of the running. There is always a possibility that with a change of ideological conviction he might succeed me.

Hon. Mr. Croll: Honourable senators, I would not have asked the question I asked of the Leader of the Government a few minutes ago had I not known what the answer was. It was not the answer that he gave, in which he said that so much time was needed to do this, that and the other thing. As a matter of fact, the machinery is ready and prepared to go on almost instant notice—five or three days' notice. So that is not the reason. I think perhaps he did state earlier in his remarks that there was some thought that Parliament would adjourn tomorrow, and that it did not work out that way. Perhaps it was for that reason. But the reason he gave is not acceptable, as far as I am concerned.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: He had better give an acceptable answer. He very seldom gives an acceptable answer anyway.

Hon. Mr. Molgat: Honourable senators, I rise with some hesitation after listening to Senator Walker. I do not know whether I should ask him to be my campaign chairman, or what position I should propose for him.

Her Honour the Speaker suggested that there should be no further discussion on the comments that were made. However, I wonder if I might—

Hon. Mr. Walker: Is this a new question?

Hon. Mr. Molgat: —Possibly on a question of privilege, if I may word it that way; it is reverse privilege in a sense—

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I agree that you are entitled to speak. I respectfully disagree with the point made by Her Honour the Speaker. As long as there is no objection by any senator to a debate, there should be no intervention by the Chair. I understand the comments of Her Honour the Speaker regarding the debate in the other place, because some comments were made regarding it. It was very proper for Her Honour to speak of that. But as to the rest, I think Senator Molgat is entitled to make his comments.

Hon. Mr. Molgat: Quite frankly, I am inclined to agree with the views of Her Honour the Speaker, in that there is really no debate before us. However, in view of the fact that the question was raised—

Hon. Mr. Flynn: We agree to debate that.

Hon. Mr. Molgat: —I rise to make it clear that there is no need for me to defend my leader in this place. He is quite capable of defending himself. On the other hand, I want to make my responsibility in this matter clear to the Senate, because I was one of those involved in the decision to recall the Senate.

Quite frankly, it was a difficult decision to make. We were faced with the possibility of three bills coming from the other place, all of which concern a matter of extreme urgency, and a matter of extreme—

Hon. Mr. Flynn: No.

Hon. Mr. Molgat: —importance to the people of Canada at this time on the subject of inflation.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: What urgency?

Hon. Mr. Molgat: Well, you may not think it is urgent, but the people who are faced with the increased cost of living right now certainly feel it is urgent.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: What is the difference between having them dealt with today or next Monday?

Hon. Mr. Molgat: That may be your point of view, but that is not the point of view of the poor working man in this country who is faced with increasing costs.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: No.

Hon. Mr. Molgat: Well, you may not think that. You may not think that, but perhaps it is about time that you found out.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Tell me how—

Hon. Mr. Walker: You are preaching for a call.

Hon. Mr. Molgat: Well, you may think that as well.

Hon. Mr. Walker: I do.

Hon. Mr. Molgat: That is your privilege. I am preaching for no call.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: May I ask you a question? What difference would it make to the poor people or the poor worker, for whom you seem suddenly to feel such great concern, were the Senate to pass this bill next Tuesday or Wednesday rather than tomorrow?

Hon. Mr. Molgat: That is not the point.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Ignorance.

Hon. Mr. Molgat: My honourable friend says that the Senate looks silly.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Yes, indeed.

Hon. Mr. Molgat: How would the Senate have looked in the eyes of Canada had the House of Commons passed those three bills and we were not here to deal with them? I would not want to be a member of that kind of Senate.

[Hon. Mr. Flynn.]

My honourable friend talks about the importance of Parliament. I respect the importance of Parliament. I come from a background of political life. I have spent 20 years in political life and I respect the importance of the legislative process.

My honourable friend has a responsibility to Canada. We complain at times that we have to wait for legislation; that we are not happy about the process. But we are part of the parliamentary process. I remind honourable senators that we have a clear responsibility to the people at the other end of this building who are paid no more than we are, but who spend a great deal more time here than we do. I do not have much patience for people who say that we ought to be on an entirely different scale than those at the other end. We have a responsibility to Canada. My honourable friend may say that we look silly tonight. I say we would have appeared to be derelict in our duty had the House of Commons passed those three bills and we were not here prepared to deal with them.

That is the decision which we took. It was not an easy one. No one likes to recall honourable senators from all over Canada, and in this respect I am particularly conscious of those who had to come from the Maritimes and those who had to come from the West coast, because I know what it means. It means a whole day travelling for them to be here. They are in an entirely different position from those senators of central Canada. Whenever we discuss a recall I am very conscious of that fact.

● (2050)

On the other hand, it is one of those decisions that has to be made. We thought the bills would be passed by the other house, and that they would be before us. Had they been sent to us, I think it would have been damaging for the Senate not to be here ready to deal with them. It turns out that they have not been passed, and it is unfortunate.

When I made my recommendation concerning, and gave my approval to, the recall of the Senate I did so thinking it was the best thing to do in the circumstances. If the chance was that the bills would be passed by the House of Commons, I thought the better decision for the Senate, and for the good of the country, was that we should be here in a position to deal with them.

In one respect I agree with Senator Flynn. As he knows, I very much dislike this business of bills' coming to us and our being under the gun to pass them. He will recall that some two years ago I refused passage of a bill at Christmas time, even though it meant a recall, because I could not agree with the procedure. I do not agree with it. However, I do agree that we should be back here tonight to deal with the business, not to be under the gun of having to pass the legislation tomorrow, so that the Senate will be in a position to deal with matters that come before it, and be able to take the time required to deal with them.

I rise to make it clear that I accept my responsibility in this. The responsibility is not wholly that of the leader. He did consult with me, and that was my recommendation based on the facts.

Hon. Mr. Forsey: The sooner we are here the more time we can give to considering the matter.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Honourable senators, Senator Molgat put a question to me, so may I reply briefly? I do not want to engage in a discussion. I thought I made my position very clear, possibly too forcibly at times. In any event, the record will speak for itself. I am not arguing that the decision was not made in good faith. I think it was a wrong decision. I am not questioning the good faith of the Leader of the Government. I have told him he does not understand the Senate, and maybe that is also true of Senator Molgat. When he says the members of the other place are paid the same indemnity as we are, he is right. If I have something to do, I do not mind being here; but I object to being here when there is nothing to be done. That is the first point.

The second point is that if we are to give sober, second thought, we should not be here waiting to give immediate approval, because otherwise it is useless for us to have any rules. Honourable senators might like to think about that. If I told the Senate tonight that I would not give leave to proceed with the bill if it came to us tonight or tomorrow, we would have to adjourn until next week. That would be the proper thing to do, because long ago the Senate decided, in its wisdom, to write rules that would prevent us from proceeding with second reading of a bill before we had had two days to think about it.

Senator Molgat will not tell me that it makes any difference whether we pass this bill respecting old age pensions tomorrow or next week. What I am questioning, and I question it again, is the judgment that was made to recall senators before we knew the bill had passed the other place. If we had we would have had a better perspective. I disagree with the idea of coming back in advance, and I know that many of my colleagues on the other side of the house think the same. I have continuously objected to this practice which the Leader of the Government has insisted on following since he came to this place. He seems to have convinced Senator Molgat, and apparently Senator Langlois of its value—although I doubt the latter a little—but he has not convinced me. I think it is entirely wrong.

Hon. Mr. Molgat: If it is Senator Flynn's decision not to allow second reading to proceed, I would agree. Furthermore, if it is his decision to refer the bill to committee, I would agree with that as well. I think that is the proper course.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Then why are we here?

Hon. Mr. Molgat: However, I think it would be wrong for the Senate not to be ready to proceed with at least the first stages to get the machinery moving when we are dealing with a matter that is of extreme importance to Canadians today. That does not mean it should not receive proper consideration here, and you will get my support if you wish to defer second reading to another day and then refer the legislation to committee.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: First reading would be implied if we had not been recalled tonight. I would say it is the same thing. We know the bill has passed the other place, we know in what form it is. In such circumstances first reading is deemed to have taken place the next day, even if we are not here. I would have agreed then to forego the two days' notice.

Hon. Mr. Molgat: Hindsight is always much easier than foresight.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Then next time try to think so far ahead that what is about to happen will seem like hindsight.

RAILWAY OPERATIONS

FAILURE OF EMPLOYEES TO RETURN TO WORK—QUESTION

Hon. Mr. Cameron: Honourable senators, I should like to ask the Leader of the Government a few brief questions that are exercising the minds of people in Western Canada in particular. On September 1, at 4.30 in the morning this Parliament passed an important piece of legislation ordering the railwaymen back to work. I was out of the country at the time, and I was sorry to miss the sitting. However, it is my understanding that when that act was passed it became the law of the land.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: It was at 6.30 in the morning.

Hon. Mr. Cameron: Today, several days later, the railways are still not operating across Canada. The question is: is a small minority of the railway workers of Canada breaking the law? Secondly, if they are, how long is the government going to be tolerant and not do anything about this breach of the law?

Hon. Mr. Martin: Honourable senators, the law on the matter is clear. What action is to be taken with regard to what Senator Cameron calls a small minority is something for the government to consider in due course, and I do not want to complicate matters. I think it important to remember that the railways are running now, that the men are back at work with the exception of those he has mentioned. I think at this time that is sufficient by way of reply.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: The Minister of Labour has made a statement on that. I do not know whether the Leader of the Government wants me to help him.

Hon. Mr. Walker: Honourable senators, in that connection, may I quote from the Toronto Star of tonight, September 6, which refers to the appointment of the former Supreme Court judge, the Honourable Emmett Hall, to arbitrate the railway dispute, and then giving him very narrow terms of reference in which to work. The article says:

> The terms—which refer only to a cost of living adjustment, job security and work rules—are so limiting as to suggest that all the government wants is a temporary repair job, one that will stand up until the next round of negotiations between the railways and their employees. It is such short-range pragmatism that has bred chronic strike threats, and three costly strikes, on the railway in the last 23 years.

It goes on to say:

> With a man of Hall's calibre available as arbitrator, this should be the time to seek the basis of a durable peace on the rails, through a formula that would keep railway wages matched to those in a comparable industry.

I would ask the honourable leader whether he would not suggest that the government widen the terms of reference of the Honourable Mr. Justice Hall so as to include, not only the suggestion of the Toronto Star that the formula should be worked out for the settlement of railway wages, but also the suggestion that he should work out—and he is a man with a great record of achievement—a formula for avoiding future strikes.

Hon. Mr. Croll: May I ask the honourable senator a question? How can Mr. Justice Hall possibly come to any conclusion without having a formula? I read that editorial. I know Mr. Justice Hall very well, and I do not think the government could make a better appointment. It occurred to me that it is fallacious to say that he must lay down some formula at that time which will show exactly what he will do.

● (2100)

Hon. Mr. Walker: That is right, and he has not any jurisdiction, under his narrow terms of reference.

Hon. Mr. Croll: But, Senator Walker, he must have jurisdiction to make a decision. He must lay down the formula. He does not have to say, "Please bring in that formula." When he brings down a decision, he says, "This is my decision," and he compares it with whatever he wants to compare it with.

Hon. Mr. Walker: No one knows better than my friend that the Honourable Mr. Justice Hall is asked to arbitrate this strike and to arbitrate the final results that will accrue. What I am suggesting—and my honourable friend, having been a labour lawyer and a labour man all his life perhaps does not appreciate this—is that the days of strikes should be at an end. Mr. Justice Hall, within the limit of railways, should be able to suggest a formula, and within the reference that he has been given he can make a suggestion, not only to settle this strike and to arbitrate as to what the merits are of this strike, but to have a formula to deal with any future strikes. That may not appeal to my friend. He enjoys strikes.

Hon. Mr. Croll: It may not appeal to Mr. Justice Hall either, I can assure you.

Hon. Mr. Walker: Just a moment. I have never heard of my honourable friend, brilliant as he is, and consummate politician that he is, being in the Supreme Court in his life. I doubt whether he knows Mr. Justice Hall or Mr. Justice Hall's thinking. Mr. Justice Hall's experience—which my friend may not be in a position to appreciate—with his incomparable background, enables him to make a suggestion as to a final formula for getting rid of strikes, not only the railway strike. But he can confine it, if he wishes, if the terms of reference are broad, to suggesting how railway strikes can be avoided in the future and what formula should be adopted.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Honourable senators, Senator Walker put a question to me and I want to reply to it. Mr. Justice Hall was appointed arbitrator within the terms of the act that was passed by Parliament last week. His judgment in the matter will be final. There are certain parameters set out in the bill which the arbitrator must take into consideration. It would not have been possible, under any legislative authority, it seems to me, to give to Mr. Justice Hall the powers suggested by Senator Walker. Senator Walker knows that in the Woods Report, which was referred to by the Leader of the Opposition in his speech the other night, there was a recommendation dealing with the wider aspect of the subject of strikes in certain industries that are of national concern and national interest. The Leader of the Opposition in the other place has suggested a particular formula based on that report. But it does seem to me that it would not be open to Mr. Justice Hall to deal, as Senator Croll said, with this broader question, important as that question may be.

Hon. Mr. Walker: May I just answer your suggestion? Considering Mr. Justice Hall's terms of reference, you are quite right; he is not empowered to do so. He has to go through with this arbitration in connection with this particular strike. But there is no reason why the Cabinet, of which you are a worthy member, cannot widen his terms of reference, and use the experience that he has in this strike, and in the settlement and the arbitration of this strike, to make suggestions as to the avoidance of future strikes. There is no reason whatever why they cannot be broadened.

Hon. Mr. Forsey: Honourable senators, I would put a supplementary question to the Leader of the Government, arising particularly out of what Senator Walker has just said. I have not seen the terms of reference of the appointment for Mr. Justice Hall but surely they must accord with the provisions in the legislation. Are they different from the provisions in the legislation? It seems to me, with great respect—and I should like to have the statement of the Leader of the Government on this—first of all that the specific provisions in the legislation dealing with the matters which Senator Walker has referred to—work rules, job security and the cost of living—are not restrictive; that the arbitrator, as I read the terms of the legislation, is told that he must take into consideration these things. It does not follow that these are the only things that he can take into consideration. Surely I am not incorrect in that. The Leader of the Government can correct me if I am wrong. I think this ought to be made clear one way or the other.

As for the suggestion that Mr. Justice Hall could proceed to lay down some formula for the settlement of future disputes, with great respect, it seems to me this is not possible for him in his capacity as arbitrator, As a citizen of this country, like anybody else in this country, he can suggest any formula he likes to settle railway disputes; but on his powers as arbitrator, I would have thought—I would defer to the great legal knowledge of Senator Walker, but I would have thought, in my simple layman's fashion, that as arbitrator he is limited by the terms of the legislation establishing the position to which he has been appointed.

Hon. Mr. Martin: That is right. In answer to Senator Forsey, that is what I have said, that Mr. Justice Hall is limited by the parameters in the legislation, which includes job security, the minimum wage levels provided for in section 5 of that act. He certainly has no power under that legislation to deal with any other dispute, nor does the legislation give him or the government power to do so.

As a matter of fact, when the bill was being discussed in this house, this question was raised, as it was raised elsewhere.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: We had no time to deal with it.

Hon. Mr. Martin: It was suggested that it would not be helpful to introduce into this particular matter the very much wider question. But there is no doubt that Mr. Justice Hall is limited by the terms provided in the legislation.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Which we had to rush through.

Hon. Mr. Forsey: But not limited to the particular, specific points which Senator Walker mentioned. He has to take those into consideration, but he could go beyond those, provided he stays within the provisions of the act.

Hon. Mr. Martin: That is right, within the act.

Hon. Mr. Croll: I can assure you that he is appointed under the Inquiries Act.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: No, no.

Hon. Mr. Croll: And it is directed that he shall—

Hon. Mr. Flynn: No, no; it is under this act.

Hon. Mr. Croll: He must be appointed under the Inquiries Act.

Hon. Mr. Martin: He is appointed under this particular legislation.

Hon. Mr. Walker: By this legislation.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: I am wondering, if Mr. Justice Hall were given a double mandate as arbitrator and as adviser to the government, whether that would not prejudice his position as an independent arbitrator. He cannot fill both roles, to my mind, being an independent arbitrator and at the same time an adviser to the government, even on these particular matters.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: There is a distinction, but it is rather subtle.

Hon. Mr. Martin: I just want to add a supplementary, if I may, to the question asked by Senator Cameron. The Minister of Labour also said he wanted to make sure that the implications of the act were understood by those who, it is alleged, have not fully observed its terms.

Hon. Mr. Croll: I want to thank Her Honour the Speaker for her tolerance here today.

Hon. Mr. Walker: I want to thank Her Honour the Speaker also. I suggest there is no reason whatever why the terms of reference cannot be widened within the terms of the act, because the act itself is what speaks. The arbitrator can make a suggestion, and should make a suggestion, as to how in future such railway strikes can be avoided. There is no question about that.

BRITISH NORTH AMERICA ACTS, 1867 TO 1965

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE CONTINUED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Grosart, seconded by the Honourable Senator O'Leary, for the second reading of the Bill S-3, intituled: "An Act to amend the British North America Acts, 1867 to 1965 (Yukon and Northwest Territories Senate representation)".—(Honourable Senator Molgat).

Hon. Mr. Molgat: Stand.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Why? I thought you were ready?

Hon. Mr. Molgat: Honourable senators, I would like to make it very clear that I have no objection whatever to giving way to any other honourable senator who wishes to speak on the subject.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: But we want to hear you.

Hon. Mr. Molgat: While I am on my feet, I should say that as one of my duties I frequently adjourn debates so that they will not die, leaving them open for other senators. It is for that reason that there are some items presently standing in my name, not because I personally intend to speak on them. Again, I invite any senator who wishes to participate to do so.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: We would like to hear you.

• (2110)

Hon. Eugene A. Forsey: Honourable senators, if Senator Molgat will make way for me on this occasion, I would like to discuss very briefly and pointedly the matter of the bill which was submitted to us some considerable time ago.

One of our complaints in this house—

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I don't know if it is.

Hon. Mr. Forsey: I may as well wait until the Leader of the Opposition leaves the chamber.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I will come back.

Hon. Mr. Forsey: Thank you very much. I hope when you come back you may be able to allow me to continue without too many interruptions.

I said some time ago when this was placed before us that one of our perpetual complaints in this house, or at least a very frequent complaint, is that not enough legislation is initiated in this house. Now, it is quite true that to some extent this is the responsibility of the government, and on that subject I have said my say before now and shall probably say it again. But there are certain things which we can initiate in this house ourselves without waiting for the government or without waiting for the other place. Here is one bill which has been initiated by a very distinguished member of this house, Senator Grosart. It is a bill which it seems to me there is no obstacle to our passing promptly. It is a bill which the House of Commons might then be invited to consider promptly when we send it down to them. If they are not sitting at the time perhaps they should be recalled in order to give consideration to this matter, which I think to the people of the Territories might be considered as of some urgency.

The proposal in the bill is part of the proposals which were made by the Special Joint Committee on the Constitution some time ago. For the life of me I cannot understand why the thing has not been proceeded with long before this. I am not attaching any blame to Senator Molgat, who has explained quite well why he has adjourned the debate, but I do wonder that before this somebody has not stood up and asked, as I have asked tonight, that the matter should be proceeded with. What is to stop us? What is to prevent us? This is useful legislation. Surely it is non-controversial legislation. I cannot imagine that anybody would get up in this house and say that the Territories, the Yukon and Northwest Territories, are not entitled to this modest representation. They have representation in the other house. Why should they not have it here? Years and years ago, in 1886, Parliament was given power, by an amendment to the British North America Act, to provide for the representation of the then Territories in both houses. It seems to me that it is high time that we caught up, as it were, in this particular respect with the position that was established as far back as 1886.

I do not wish to delay the Senate. I am not even making these remarks simply to provide the other place with a little more time to send us legislation, but I do venture to urge that this matter might be proceeded with, and that somebody else might follow my example and either speak in favour of this bill or speak against it and let us settle the thing; get on with the thing and clear this out of the way. This is not simply an academic discussion. This is a piece of legislation.

One of our functions here, and this has been repeated over and over again—notably tonight, I think, by the Leader of the Opposition—one of our functions here is the legislative function. One of our functions here should be to initiate legislation, within the powers that we have. Here has been initiated by Senator Grosart an admirable tentative—I do not want to repeat the English word "initiative" all over again—an admirable step. This is an admirable step to take, and here it remains with nothing further done for months and months. Surely we can now cut these things short and decide the matter one way or the other, but after due discussion. I don't want to get any rubber-stamping of Senator Grosart's proposal, but I do think we should have a proper discussion and get on with it and finish it up. It is a simple matter, and something we could very usefully do in the interests of the people of this country, and especially in the interests of the people in the Northwest Territories and the Yukon.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Question.

Hon. Mr. Buckwold: Will the honourable senator allow a question for information? If this bill is passed by the Senate, and I certainly hope that it will be, what would be the process? Would this involve a constitutional change? Would it require the approval of the provinces or is it in the constitutional power presently held by Canada to increase the number of senators without these other processes?

Hon. Mr. Forsey: Well, honourable senators, I presume that question was directed to me. I was not quite sure because I did not have the listening gadget in my ear at the moment Senator Buckwold began, but speaking subject to correction by the numerous gentlemen and ladies learned in the law in this house, I should say that under the terms of the British North America Act, 1949, No. 2, embodied now in the act as head 1 of section 91, the Parliament of Canada certainly has the power to make this provision and, indeed, in a sense has had the power to do what it likes in the matter, if not this specific thing, since 1886. As far as I know the act of 1886 is still valid and already we could, if we wanted to, pass any measure on this subject dealing with representation of the Yukon and Northwest Territories in the Senate.

I speak again as subject to correction by senators learned in the law, but I think there is no doubt about our constitutional power to do this thing with no necessity in law, at all events, to consult the provinces or anybody else.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Question!

Hon. Mr. Molgat: If no other honourable senators wish to speak at this time, I move the adjournment of the debate.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Do you promise to speak the next time?

On motion of Senator Molgat, debate adjourned.

HUNGARY

VISIT OF CANADIAN PARLIAMENTARIANS—DEBATE CONCLUDED

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Fergusson calling the attention of the Senate to the visit of Canadian Parliamentarians to Hungary, 25th to 30th April, 1973.—(Honourable Senator Welch).

Hon. John M. Macdonald: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators, that Senator Macdonald do now speak in place of Senator Welch?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Honourable senators, Senator Welch has been in touch with me about this matter. Because he is very uncertain as to when he will be able to proceed with it, he suggests that, unless some other senator wishes to speak on it, the matter be dropped from the Order Paper.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Honourable senators, I move the adjournment of the Senate.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Just as a matter of interest to the Senate, may I ask whether it would not be proper to adjourn the Senate to next week? You want the Senate to be adjourned until tomorrow at two o'clock?

Hon. Mr. Langlois: It is a normal adjournment.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: The other house is sitting at eleven o'clock. Will we not know before two o'clock whether we are going to waste another day?

Hon. Mr. Langlois: It is not wasted.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Well, probably I am the one who should not consider this night as wasted; but I am prepared to agree to that because I would not want another day to be wasted. May I suggest that the leader and his assistant adjourn the Senate to next week, at which time we can deal with all the bills that come in by Monday night. It would be much better.

The Hon. the Speaker: It has been moved by the Honourable Senator Langlois, seconded by the Honourable Senator Martin, P.C., that the Senate do now adjourn. Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: On division.

Motion agreed to on division.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Friday, September 7, 1973

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

OLD AGE SECURITY ACT

BILL TO AMEND—FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-219, to amend the Old Age Security Act.

Bill read first time.

SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read a second time?

Hon. Mr. Martin: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 44(1)(f), I move that this bill be read the second time now. Can we proceed now?

Hon. Mr. Choquette: May I inquire of the Honourable Leader of the Senate whether it is his intention to give this bill royal assent today?

Hon. Mr. Benidickson: Why?

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Is the answer "no"?

Hon. Mr. Martin: The answer is no.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: In that case, we will certainly agree to having second reading proceeded with today and have the sponsor of the bill explain it, following which we will adjourn the debate.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Agreed. Nobody wants to be a rubber stamp.

Hon. Mr. Walker: A little louder.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: It is not for the record.

Hon. Mr. Martin: I do not want the Leader of the Opposition to be a rubber stamp.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is it agreed?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

[Translation]

Hon. Renaude Lapointe: Honourable senators, the fact that we are here today to discuss Bill C-219, less than eighteen hours after the good dressing-down which some distinguished members of the Opposition gave the government leader, fully establishes that Senator Martin was justified in recalling the Senate this week. It establishes also that the disparaging remarks they uttered last night against him were mischievously inspired.

[English]

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Honourable senators, I rise on a point of order. The honourable senator is sponsoring second reading of the bill, but she is now referring to a debate that took place last night, which is entirely out of order. If she wants to continue in this vein I personally have no objection, but it will be entirely irrelevant. I have risen on a point of order and I want Your Honour to deal with it. Since you dealt with one that was not raised last night, surely you will deal with this one.

[Translation]

Hon. Miss Lapointe: The most painful part of my speech is already over. I shall merely add that the sense of duty which our leader has shown should be exemplified instead, and that the vote which was taken yesterday in the other place confirms the wisdom of his decision. It was reported this morning on the radio that the Senate would examine this bill this very day, which confirms our immediate availability and gives us a better image than if it had been announced that we would wait until next Tuesday before getting on with it.

Let us turn now to this bill which deserves our attention.

It is not necessary to be a learned financial critic to know that the staggering rise in food prices is due to three basic causes and that it is raging throughout the world: first, the scarcity of crops in the Soviet Union, China and the Indian subcontinent in the past two or three years; then, the fluctuations of currencies in the Western World which has given rise to inflated prices of commodities on the world market and finally, the general improvement in the standard of living throughout the world which led to stronger demand, higher prices and lower reserves

According to an expert of the Reuters agency, prices will be lowered only when production, stimulated by rising prices, will reach the market and when the American dollar will be set at a more realistic rate of exchange. The issue is therefore international rather than national.

Even if Canada suffers considerably less than many western countries and some steps have already been taken to correct the problem at least partially, the government feels that it must do more, especially for the needy who are often compelled to cut down on their food to pay for drugs or other essential items.

That is why, today, it requests that you study a new measure providing for the quarterly adjustment of the old age pension, a measure from which over 1.8 million Canadians will benefit.

Bill C-219 proposes that from October 1973 pensions be increased by 5.3 per cent of current rates. Since the basic pension, since April last, is $100, this will mean a minimum increase of $5.30 to $105.30 a month for single people who do not receive the guaranteed income supplement.

Those who receive the maximum supplement will get $179.16 instead of $170.14, and married people will receive $341.80 instead of $324.60. What is the basis for this increase in benefits? It is the cost of living from October 1972 to July 1973, as compared with that for the previous ten months.

In addition, next January and every quarter thereafter, pensions will be pegged to the cost of living index, allowing a two-month delay to enable the administration to get from Statistics Canada the required data on the cost of living fluctuations and to adjust payments accordingly. This means, in plain words, that a pensioner as at April 1, for instance, will see his pension adjusted to the cost of living over the previous period from November 1 to February 1; this leaves a two-month interval for administrative purposes. Moreover, the same will apply to the other quarters, that is, those of July 1, October 1 and January 1.

● (1410)

I would like to point out immediately that even if there should be a reduction in consumer prices during one quarter, the benefits will not go down. Also, they will never be lower than those for the same period in the previous year.

This quarterly revalorization will undoubtedly be costly. This is one of the reasons why the government waited till this time to implement it. Indeed, the change will cost an additional $1.5 to $2 million in administrative expenditures. As the Minister of National Health and Welfare pointed out, the government would have preferred to direct that money immediately into the pockets of older citizens. But since the provision regarding quarterly adjustments seems to please everybody we must accept the unavoidable expenses that will result from it, keeping in mind the relief older people will enjoy through the distribution of supplementary benefits which this year will reach more than $90 million and perhaps even $95 million depending on the increases in prices in coming months. The total commitment of the government with regard to that sector of the population will thus be increased to over $3 billion, which is a far cry from the original pension of $20 a month at age 70 brought in nearly 50 years ago by a Liberal government, a pension which for that matter was subject to a stringent means test.

It was after January 1968 that the Pearson government decided to escalate pensions on the basis of the cost of living. However, at that time a ceiling of 2 per cent was decided which made quite easy the calculation and adjustment of pensions even though the number of pensioners varied each year. When the ceiling was abolished early in 1972—

Hon. Mr. Flynn: By which government? You mentioned that the Pearson government had adjusted them but who abolished the ceiling?

Hon. Miss Lapointe: Probably the Liberal government again.

Hon. Mr. Côté: They are the only ones doing anything.

Hon. Miss Lapointe: When the ceiling was abolished early in 1972, paying out pensions to roughly 1,800,000 Canadians became much more complicated. But the difficulty was not insuperable. The adoption of a new formula will no doubt give rise to new difficulties but with time it is likely to undergo adjustments and improvements.

[English]

Canada offers probably the highest guaranteed income in the world to its senior citizens. For each one there is a solid floor minimum income which is set at over $2,000 for a single pensioner and at almost $4,000 for a couple. We all remember that ten years ago the highest payment to an older citizen was $65 a month, and the benefit was not payable before he was 70.

Under the Liberal government, total expenditures on old age pensions has risen from about $1 billion in 1967 to approximately $3 billion a year, and the number of persons benefiting from the plan has risen also from 1.2 to 1.8 million, because of the lowering of the qualifying age.

Before these improvements took place we could easily admit that old people, without other means, were in fact condemned to live. Today they feel much more secure; not only can they afford the necessities of life, but they can enjoy, thanks to governmental measures, many of its pleasures and commodities.

The increased pension is not the only advantage offered them. Let us not forget that the budget brought down last February increased the basic single exemption from $1,500 to $1,600, and the married rate from $2,850 to $3,000, in addition to an exemption of $1,000 for senior citizens.

The Minister of Finance also reduced the basic federal tax by 5 per cent, which means a decrease of between $100 and $500 in the basic federal tax payable.

Everyone agrees that all these additional measures have helped to alleviate the burden of Canadians with fixed incomes, and we cannot deny that the program New Horizons has given them some opportunities for creative action and travel, which they greatly appreciate. On the other hand, the excessive increase in the cost of living has nevertheless become a cause of daily concern, especially for the 58 per cent of our older citizens whose income is so low that they have to claim the partial or full supplement. It is evident that the low-income family suffers twice as much as the high-income unit from that 20 per cent increase in food costs over a period of 18 months, since it already spends nearly 28 per cent of its income on food compared with 16 per cent for higher income families of the same size.

● (1420)

The method of adjustment will work like this: the benefits which will be paid in January 1974 are calculated by multiplying the rates in effect during October 1973 by the proportional ratio between the average of the official consumer price index for the period from August to October 1973 and the average of the official consumer price index registered for the May-July quarter of 1973. As I said already in French, a two-month delay is provided so that the government may obtain from Statistics Canada all the necessary data on the fluctuations of the price index and also so that the government may take administrative action intended to ensure the payments in accordance with the increase in the rates of both the old age security and the guaranteed income supplement plans.

This will be the second time this year that the government will have increased the old age security pension.

Last April, as you remember, it was raised to $100 a month from the previous level of $82.88. Also, in May of 1972 the two per cent ceiling on escalation was removed and full automatic escalation was extended to both the guaranteed income supplement and the old age security pension. Since 1967, when the supplement was first paid, the combined pension has risen from $105 to $179.16 for a single person, and from $210 to $341.80 for a married pensioner couple. This program has cost the Canadian taxpayers about $3 billion each year. But I feel the Minister of National Health and Welfare was right when he said a few days ago that the Canadian people are expecting us to do no less in order to maintain in dignity those who have contributed so much and are still contributing to what Canada is today.

The increases, brought about mainly by Liberal governments, have, in reality, been larger than the increases in the cost of living during the same period. We can be proud of that fact, for it certainly shows the government's respect for Canada's senior citizens and its concern about their welfare.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: What a joke.

[Translation]

Hon. Miss Lapointe: Let us now glance quickly at Bill C-219 and its amendments to the Old Age Security Act.

In clause 1, where the consumer price index is defined, the words "adjustment quarter" are simply substituted for "fiscal year or any twelve-month period".

In clause 2, the word "quarterly" is subsituted for "annually"; the other amendments in this clause provide for a quarterly adjustment of the pension, while prohibiting any adjustment that would lower the pension to an amount inferior to the preceding one.

Clause 3, which deals not with the basic pension but with the supplement, provides for the same amendments with regard to the quarterly adjustment and the prohibition of any lowering of the supplement.

Finally, clause 4 of the bill which deals with the price index and its adjustment, substitutes the words "adjustment quarter" for "fiscal year or twelve-month period".

Clause 5 permits the Governor in Council to make regulations in respect of the determination of the average of the consumer price index.

As a whole, therefore, in spite of its dull phraseology, the bill is rather simple. Contrary to what one of my honourable colleagues was saying earlier, that the Liberals are putting too much icing on the cake and that the latter is threatening to collapse, I will say that I have explained this bill without too many embellishments and congratulations to the government. I explained it as briefly as possible. I think that all of us agree with its principle, just as we do, for instance, with the principle of motherhood. However, if any honourable senator wishes to get into technicalities, members of the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Science, to which this bill may be referred, are free to get to the core of the matter by inviting the experts from that department to answer all his questions.

[Hon. Miss Lapointe.]

[English]

Hon. Douglas D. Everett: Honourable senators, it is customary at this time for a member of the Opposition to reply to such a proposal as that made by Senator Lapointe with respect to this bill. However, I have spoken with the Leader of the Opposition and understand it is agreeable that I may proceed in place of Senator Phillips.

Honourable senators, I am, of course, in complete agreement with the Old Age Security Act amendments and, indeed, this was a subject raised and recommended by the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance some two years ago, that pensions be increased. Rather than continue with discussion of the bill itself, however, I deemed it useful to discuss the question of the economy and, more particularly, the inflation that is endemic in the present economy. Indeed, the amendments contained in this bill refer directly to an attempt by the government to control the process of inflation which is taking place in Canada and throughout the world. More important, it is an endeavour to lessen the effects of that inflation on those who are more unfortunate members of our society in the economic sense.

Dealing with this broad overall question, I will start by saying that the Economic Council of Canada defined five performance goals for the Canadian economy, which have become widely accepted. They were: Rapid and sustained economic growth, high employment, reasonable price stability, a viable balance of international payments, and an equitable distribution of rising incomes. These performance goals are not ends in themselves, but rather a means of realizing achievement goals which relate to the manner in which our growing resources are used.

Comparatively, the Canadian economy has performed well over the long term. However, the simultaneous and consistent realization of the performance goals continues to elude us. So it is at the present time.

Over the last six months the Canadian economy has been in a phase of exceptionally strong growth. In the last quarter of 1972 and the first quarter of 1973 the real GNP increased at an annual rate of nearly 12 per cent, the strongest advance for two quarters since 1955. Reference to the components of final demand will indicate that they reflect this growth.

● (1430)

In the area of personal consumption, consumers have reduced their savings rate from 8 per cent to 5 per cent and, combined with the ready availability of credit, have increased their expenditures at a seasonally adjusted annual rate of 12½ per cent, the largest gain in almost 20 years. Retail sales increased at a seasonally adjusted annual rate of close to 35 per cent in the first four months of this year.

Corporate profits to date in this recovery have advanced at a seasonally adjusted annual rate of close to 30 per cent. As a percentage of the GNP they have recovered from a depressed level of 8.6 per cent in the fourth quarter of 1970 to 11.8 per cent in the first quarter of this year, which is closer to their historical share of the national income.

Machinery and equipment expenditures in constant dollars increased at a seasonally adjusted annual rate of more than 25 per cent in the first quarter. Combining that with advances in expenditures in non-residential construction, the first quarter gain of plant and equipment spending was the largest since the last quarter in 1965.

Business inventories increased at a seasonally adjusted annual rate of close to $1.5 billion. This increase, interestingly enough, was largely in raw materials and goods in process, not in stocks of finished goods.

Capacity utilization by industry has risen to 97 per cent, and an increasing number of industries are operating at full capacity. Continuing strong demand pressures and capacity constraints have led to an unprecedented backlog of unfilled orders which, in manufacturing, have risen at a seasonally adjusted annual rate of more than 23 per cent in the last six months. Industrial production has increased at an annual rate of 16 per cent since September last, one of the most rapid increases in the post-war period.

Honourable senators, it is clear from this data, and from the fact that seasonally adjusted employment increased by over 400,000 in the first six months of the year, that the Canadian economy has been operating well beyond its potential. As a result, economic policy has shifted towards restraint in an effort to guide the economy back to a sustainable growth path and thus avoid a sharp application of the economic brakes.

The rate of increase in the money supply since June of 1972 has decelerated to approximately 11 per cent from the 16 per cent prevailing since the current period of monetary ease began in 1970.

The liquidity of chartered banks has continued to decline and interest rates have risen. The total cash requirement of the federal government, including foreign exchange, declined to $1.4 billion for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1973. The net position of the total government sector moved from a deficit of $752 million in the fourth quarter of 1972 to a surplus of $824 million in the first quarter of 1973. The full employment budget position moved towards restraint at an annual rate of approximately $1 billion. The results have been seen in the slowing of the rate of real growth in the second quarter.

So, given the present position of an economy operating at or beyond its capacity, I should like to suggest the uses of the policy options available to the government and the central bank to sustain the economy on a stable growth path and move it closer to the Economic Council's performance goals.

Before proceeding further it is worthwhile to examine the following specific aspects of the economy as they bear directly on the use of the policy options. First of all, I should like to look at prices versus wages. It is sometimes felt that prices are increasing nearly as fast or, indeed, faster than wages, and, in fact, from time to time in Canada that is the case. However, over the long term the increases in average weekly wages and salaries far outstrip the increases in the consumer price index. Between 1949 and 1973 the consumer price index increased by 86.7 per cent. In the same period, average weekly wages and salaries increased by 263.5 per cent, at least three times as much. The greatest increase in the elements of the index is to be found in vegetables, which have increased 127.2 per cent in that period as against an increase in average weekly wages and salaries, as I said, of 263.5 per cent.

Despite the magnitude of the differences in these percentages, people still feel that they have trouble keeping up with the cost of living. This is largely due to the much broader range of goods and services available today that people now classify as necessities.

While incomes have accelerated much faster than the cost of living over the long term, there is a disquieting note showing up right now in the statistics. Average weekly wages in manufacturing and disposable personal income continue to show increases over the previous year in current dollar terms. However, in constant dollar terms the increase has been declining since the middle of 1972. If this trend continues, the perception that prices are going up faster than wages will be realized. Even though this may be a relatively short-term phenomenon it means that labour contract negotiations will be conducted in a very difficult climate.

Let us now look at the question of employment in Canada. For better or for worse Canada is enjoying one of the strongest population growths in the world, outstripping the United States, the United Kingdom, France, Germany and even Japan. Add to this an exceptional increase in the participation rate and the result is that Canada has the most rapid rate of labour force growth amongst industrialized nations. It is calculated that the Canadian labour force will increase 30 per cent between 1970 and 1980, or a rate of 2.4 per cent per year. That is a pretty impressive figure when compared with the OECD projections for other industrialized countries, such as the United States at 1.4 per cent per year, Sweden at .5 per cent per year, or Japan at .4 per cent per year. The central problem for Canadian economic policy in the 1970s will be to accommodate this rapidly growing labour force while maintaining a stable economy. This problem is made even more difficult by major changes in the composition of the labour force over the decade. As an example, in 1960 the 25- to 34-year olds constituted only 23 per cent of the labour force. By 1970 this age group had declined to 22 per cent, but by 1980 they are projected to expand to 28 per cent of the total. In 1970 the 14- to 24-year old segment of the labour force stood at 27 per cent of the total, while they are expected to constitute only 24 per cent by 1980. Between 1970 and 1980 women in the labour force will increase from 32 per cent to 35 per cent of the total. The proportion of the labour force constituted by the 35- to 54-year old males, considered to be the most eminently employable members of the labour force, declined from 31 per cent to 27 per cent between 1950 and 1970, and by 1980 that proportion will have shrunk to 23 per cent.

As these changes in the composition of the labour force take place, there will be a marked increase in the proportion of more highly educated workers who will undoubtedly demand more challenging forms of employment.

Next, we look at the question of unemployment. In June the seasonally adjusted unemployment rate was 5.3 per cent. The disaggregated figures are rather interesting in relation to that 5.3 per cent. Members of the labour force of 25 years and over were 3.8 per cent unemployed; of those between 14 and 24 years 9.1 per cent were unemployed; and of married men between 28 and 54 years of age only 3.0 per cent were unemployed. Young people account for only 26.7 per cent of the labour force, but they represent 47.5 per cent of the pool of unemployed labour. And while unemployment between 14 and 24 years for both sexes is 9.1 per cent, for males of this age group it is 10.1 per cent.

● (1440)

The regional breakdowns are also interesting. When lined up against an adjusted employment rate of overall 5.3 per cent, the regional breakdowns are: in the Atlantic region 9.3 per cent, Quebec 7.4 per cent, Ontario 3.6 per cent, the Prairie region 3.5 per cent, and British Columbia 6.1 per cent.

While the policy makers judge the economy on many different sets of statistics, the media, the public and the Opposition often zero in on the overall seasonally adjusted unemployment rate. If it is perceived to be high, or if it is moving in an upward direction, intense pressure is brought to bear on the government of the day to do something about it. If the government bends to such pressures, it can very easily find itself stimulating an economy that is already dangerously close to the boiling point. This is especially risky when one considers the length of the lags that are associated with the use of most of the demand levers.

As I have demonstrated, the disaggregations of the overall figure are a more meaningful guide to policy. Beyond that, we do not have in Canada a generally agreed upon definition of full employment. In June 1973, the unemployment rate of what has been termed "the hard core employed"—that is, married males 25 to 54 years old—was 3 per cent, although the overall rate for Canada was 5.3 per cent. Together with other indices it would appear that we are very close to capacity in Canada, and yet historically the unemployment rate would indicate that we have not achieved full employment. One reason for this is that there is some evidence that changes in income support programs have had a marked effect on labour force participation rates, and may have helped to considerably alter the definition of full employment.

It is clear that an intensive examination of the meaning of unemployment and full employment is required in Canada. Proper definition would improve policy making and would remove some of the pressure for instant solutions that can lead to a boom and bust cycle.

Then what about the problem that confronts us today, the problem of inflation? The consumer price index has increased by 8.1 per cent in the past year. The increase in food prices is 16.7 per cent, while all other items have increased by 5.0 per cent. Some of the increase is undoubtedly due to cost-push elements, and some to the strength of the economy. However, there are certain special problems which are affecting the price index. First, all major Western countries are undergoing a boom simultaneously. To my knowledge it has never happened before. Secondly, the rapid expansion of the U.S. economy has caused a large increase in Canadian exports. Thirdly, demand and shortages have combined to cause world-wide price increases in industrial commodities and agricultural products. It is interesting to note in this regard that in the last ten years in Canada per capita beef consumption in pounds has increased 33.7 per cent and poultry consumption has increased 50.6 per cent. This means that each Canadian is consuming, on the average, one-third more in beef products and 50 per cent more in poultry products. This is going on around the industrialized world. Fourthly, in addition to that, commodity markets have been chosen as a vehicle for speculation at a time of widespread disenchantment with currencies and of expectations of inflation. Fifthly, in most countries in the world, wage gains have been running persistently in excess of productivity gains.

These factors indicate that much of the present inflation in Canada is a world-wide phenomenon, and for the time being domestic policies will not be as effective as they normally would be.

The main policy options available to the government and the central bank are the demand levers of fiscal, monetary and exchange rate policies. In an economy that is suffering from a high degree of expectations of continuing inflation, the demand levers must be applied in a steady and consistent manner. Because of the extremely long lags that are associated with the exercise of the demand levers, under no circumstances should they be used to fine-tune the economy.

In theory, therefore, the government and the central bank should decide on the targets for the economy over the medium term and set the demand policies to achieve those targets. However, there is too much of an interrelation between fiscal, monetary and exchange rate policies to allow this to happen without serious short-term dislocations. Therefore, in suggesting appropriate settings for the demand levers, qualifications necessarily appear.

Under the heading of monetary policy, emphasis should be given to the increase in the money supply, and as much as possible it should be set to accommodate our potential growth. As this would amount to a restriction of the money supply from the present rate of expansion, we will likely suffer an increase in interest rates. This increase will have to be tempered by domestic requirements and the requirements of exchange rate policy.

In the realm of fiscal policy, the concept of full-employment budgeting should be used as a test against which fiscal policy is examined. Our fiscal policy should ensure that our cash requirements do not frustrate our monetary policy. As we enjoy the fiscal dividends of a booming economy we must be cautious about using these surpluses to embark on new programs that have long-term cost effects.

There are a number of people around today who are saying that really that does not matter, that the total answer to operating the economy is to bring in controls. Indeed, controls are politically popular. They look to the average Canadian like the complete answer, as though tomorrow you could stop it all and everything would be fine. Of course, the longer the government delays in bringing in controls the more the Opposition is in a position to say that had controls been brought in six months ago we would not have had this price rise.

I will admit that there are limited possibilities for controls, but those possibilities have long passed us by in this economic cycle. The possibilities for controls are at the bottom of a cycle after a down turn, when the public has expectations of continuing inflation. Controls can help at that time. Cut off those expectations and they work, because there is a lot of slack in the economy and because productivity is rising extremely quickly as you come back up the other side of the cycle. The reason they work is that they are not imposing themselves on any sort of price or wage because the level of prices and wages is generally below the control level. Even then, their application, as we found in the United States, is only for a limited time. But beyond that one area the trouble with controls is that they just don't work. No control policy or experiment in the world has yet worked. One of the great exponents of controls is John Kenneth Galbraith and even he states that in the present context of the economy controls do not work. Let me quote from him:

● (1450)

> Controls should not be used where price increases are caused by an excess in aggregate demand or a shortage in the specific supply. If so used, some momentary effects apart, the result will be either random shortages in the retail stores, violations, or, more likely, both.

Controls just don't work. And even worse, they heighten the expectation of continuing inflation.

One of the reasons for the increase in many prices in the Canadian economy over the last six months has been the promise of the Conservative party that they would bring in a price freeze. What do you think the average businessman does? He says, "If they get in, which is a possibility, I suppose, I had better put my prices up now."

Hon. Mr. Phillips: Make it a distinct possibility.

Hon. Mr. Everett: If you wish.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: Thank you.

Hon. Mr. Everett: And coming out of controls there has in every case been an explosion which again raised the expectation in the mind of the average member of the public that inflation would continue. The problem with controls is that once they are put in, the controllers have either to keep giving away, giving away and giving away, until the whole thing is a shambles—as it was under phase III in the United States, or they have to hang onto the control system, in which case they have distortions, with farmers killing chickens because it is cheaper to kill them than to bring them to market. That is the problem with controls.

Over and above all that, Canada of all countries is in the worst possible condition to bring in controls. Some 20 per cent of our gross national product is dependent upon exports and imports. We are subject to those world prices; we cannot isolate ourselves from what is going on in the world. The fact of the matter is that there is a heavy commodity inflation in the world. So to put in controls, to think that we, with 20 per cent of our GNP in the form of exports, imports and foreign trade, could do anything with these controls, is really getting very ludicrous. Beyond that, controls can actually contribute to inflation. Let me read to you from the Harris Bank letter:

> Basic economic analysis suggests that wage and price controls will actually have a perverse effect upon inflation, particularly in view of the capacity limitations which currently exist. First, by holding down prices, they encourage more consumption than would have occurred at higher prices; second, lower prices in certain areas will reduce the incentives to increase or even maintain current production levels; and third, given increased uncertainty over future prices, controls tend to reduce investment, thereby resulting in a lower level of productive capacity. Since they tend to encourage consumer spending while discouraging increased supplies, controls tend to aggravate underlying inflationary pressures.

The basic problem that we face in our economy, and indeed that many countries in the world face, is that we have enormously rising incomes and we have not been quick enough to match supplies to those incomes.

On January 18 I made a speech here on this same subject. I would like to quote one paragraph from that speech. You will recall that at that time our policy was directed towards the decrease of unemployment. That was the basic thrust of government policy. I said at that time:

> I should like to suggest that the problem in Canada today is not unemployment; the problem is inflation. We are enjoying a solid growth rate in Canada. Our excess capacity is being utilized. Demand is high. In some areas shortages are developing and investment is increasing at a very rapid pace. It seems to me that, really, what we should be doing is beginning to dampen our economy; because the demand is there, the growth is taking place, and there is a sufficient demand to ensure that the supply problems will be taken care of. If we go on pressing this economy forward, the net result will be excess demand that no amount of supply will be able to satisfy.

I contend that if that policy had been followed in January, the problems we have today would be far less serious. They would still be serious, because they are to a large extent world engendered, but they would be far less serious.

Funnily enough, I think I probably depart from policy again. There is a very heavy restraint being brought to bear on the economy to control inflation at the present time. I think that is the correct policy stance. I most certainly endorse the government concept in not getting into a control scenario. I endorse the government stance in trying to bring up the income of those who are being most seriously affected by this inflation. But I am concerned that there is a possibility now of over restraint, of reacting too far and too fast. If we were projecting over this next year a rate of inflation of 7 per cent, then I would say that 3 per cent of that inflation would be connected with supply problems, mostly in the commodity market, the inability to supply the goods to the people; 3 per cent would be what I would call "institutional," institutional being the fact that government is a non-competitive industry and it is damn hard to control its costs. Our competition policy in industry is not as effective as it should be, and we provide a number of what we call landing nets to people who are in economic trouble, that are often available to people who do not need them. So I say 3 per cent in the supply of goods; 3 per cent in the institutional problem of inflation that we may have to live with for some number of years; and only one per cent attributable to demand-pull, and less than that at the present time to cost-push.

So what does that tell you? It tells you that quick solutions to this problem are just not possible. The room to manoeuvre is in that one per cent out of 7 per cent, and that is not a devil of a lot of room. If you try to control it by pushing that one per cent, believe me, you risk the real possibility of a serious down turn. So what should the government do? It should hang tough. It should hang tough with the Opposition, it should hang tough with the media, and it should hang tough with the public.

There should be no controls, no tinkering with the economy. There should be a steady application of sound restraint policies, and let time take its effect. You cannot fine-tune the economy at this particular point. You have got to tough it out. And really the only thing that is available beyond that is to start some serious long-range policies.

What are we going to do in the future about this question of supply? What is our policy about supply, should incomes keep rising? From 1949 to 1973 they have gone up by 263 per cent. What are we going to do about supply, to meet the rising wealth in incomes of people? What are we going to do about this institutional problem of inflation? What are we going to do about labour-management relations? What are we going to do about competition policy? What are we going to do to keep this increasing level of government expenditures down and to bring efficiency into government? What are we going to do to make sure that, if we provide assistance to unfortunate people who are affected by inflation, unemployment or other economic effects, that assistance will go to those who need it and not to those who do not need it?

● (1500)

I do not paint a very attractive picture and I do not because I really do not believe there are any quick solutions. If the politicians of this country are not prepared to manage the economy on that basis, on the basis that there are no quick solutions, that you have to hang tough for a long time and that you have to plan a long, long way ahead, and, if they fall for this junk that controls are the answer, then all we are doing is delaying what is really going to be a mess. Honourable senators, I think that would be a real tragedy for this country.

Hon. Mr. Walker: Would my honourable friend, who has given a very amazingly lucid address, enlighten the house as to his prognosis, how this matter can be resolved and what period of time will be involved? He must have some idea as to when it is going to abate.

Hon. Mr. Everett: I doubt very much that I or anyone else could measure the time frame. The lags in the application of the major demand levers, senator, are now upwards of two years. That does not mean that if you put in a policy today you will not have its effect for two years, because there is a series of waves: some of the effects are immediate and some are six months off, but there are still lag effects two years later.

One of the problems, and I am talking generally in respect of governments around the world, is that when we bring in restraint policies or expansion policies we are pressured; and, after all, that is the problem of the democratic society: governments are pressured for instant solutions, but nobody who has examined a free economy has yet been able to find an immediate answer. Of course, if you want to talk about a controlled economy that is another matter. One of the things that amazes me is that those people who are really liberals, in the small "1" sense, talk about the freedom of the economy and the dignity of the individual on the one hand and then talk about controls on the other hand. If they want a short route to an illiberal society they are going to find it by controls; but nobody has yet been able to find an immediate answer, and for me to say that it is going to happen in six months or that it is going to happen in a year would be wrong. I just could not say that. It is going to happen with a hell of a lot of patience on the part of a lot of people.

[Hon. Mr. Everett.]

Hon. Mr. Walker: My friend probably is fair in his attitude toward the government, usually. Has he any views as to the aid of the stop-gap indulgences of the government in handouts or in subsidies to keep down the price of bread by paying so much? What is his idea in connection with that, or with government policy?

Hon. Mr. Everett: Are you referring to the recent government initiatives, the ones just announced?

Hon. Mr. Walker: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Everett: As I said earlier, I am certainly very much in favour, as we were in the report of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance, of the indexing of pensions. I think that is something which should be done, and the concept of indexing quarterly I very much endorse. With respect to the subsidy problem, I guess I would have to say I am of two minds about it.

Hon. Mr. Walker: Are you not really definitely against it? A man of your stature?

Hon. Mr. Everett: I am not definitely against it. I am a Westerner, and, yes, I would like to see—

Hon. Mr. Walker: You are not running for anything; you can be frank with us.

Hon. Mr. Everett: I am being frank with you, senator. If I were running for something I would be frank as well. I am saying that I am a Westerner and that I am in favour of our producers' getting a fair return on their production. They deserve it. The return has not been that high, and when world prices accelerate the way they do you take a choice: either you say to the consumer, "You are going to pay that higher price and the producer is going to get that higher price and the consumer can go to hell," or you can say, "No, we are not going to allow that to happen. There will be a special price for domestic consumption; we are not going to subsidize; the consumer will be all right but the producer can go to hell." The government is trying to say that somehow in this particular situation we have to balance it. I think that is a fair compromise. I do not see that doing a great deal of damage. I think it keeps up production, which we want, because we want an increase in supply, and at the same time it means that milk and bread will not be taken out of the mouths of those who otherwise could not afford them.

As to the oil business, I decline to comment on that because I am in the oil business. Apparently it is very dangerous for a person in a business to comment on it, because everyone then thinks he has an axe to grind, and I guess he does. So if you do not mind, senator, I will not comment on that.

Hon. Mr. Walker: Very good.

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, once again we meet in an emergency situation—or at least it was an emergency last night. Today we seem to be somewhat in the eye of the storm. Probably today's sunshine has evaporated a certain amount of the fog of last evening so that we find ourselves in a much calmer situation today.

Perhaps in a calm atmosphere we should look back to the fact that after Parliament opened early in the new year we had, as the months progressed, very little or no legislation completed until July. Then arose an emergency—the emergency being a summer recess—and several pieces of legislation did succeed in passing through the gamut of the legislative process and received royal assent. Last week, honourable senators, we had another emergency—the railway strike. That emergency was met by legislation. This week we are dealing with what Senator Martin has described as "the government's inflationary program." We seem to be going from emergency to emergency. In fact, the function of the Senate seems to have become that of meeting in emergency session so that the other place can adjourn after emergency legislation.

I would say to the supporters of the government that we could have an emergency on the hour, every hour, 24 hours a day, seven days a week, for seven months, but we would not even scratch the surface of the problems this government has created in the last few years.

One must ask why there was such a delay in passing legislation to meet these problems. After all, these problems did not arise during the summer recess. We should have met them long before the summer recess. Why was there such a delay? The answer is obvious to everyone. The assistant prime minister—Mr. Trudeau—had to introduce his legislation in the other place and then consult his bosses in the NDP, after which he had to shelve his legislation while he held behind-the-scenes discussions with Mr. Lewis and his colleagues. Then, once this legislation was shelved, it never seemed to come out of the discussions.

● (1510)

We have had threats that if such and such a piece of legislation were not improved, then the government would fall. Then, all of a sudden, after the legislation had been in hibernation for a few months, it would come out again in the form of a teddy bear or a butterfly, and it would be just as beautiful to the Liberals and to the NDP as it was before it went into hibernation.

King David of the Old Testament is very familiar to all of us as a shepherd. The present-day David of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation is also a form of shepherd in that he is still leading the Liberal Party around. King David was a much more considerate shepherd in that he led his charges by quiet waters; David of the CBC wants to lead his charges from emergency to emergency—in short, leading the country down the drain.

During all this time, honourable senators, the cost of living has become excessive. It is not only the people who are affected by Bill C-219, but every Canadian has felt the neglect that has occurred in the last few months. Bill C-219 will give some small form of relief to about one million Canadians, but there are approximately 22 million Canadians, Senator Martin, still waiting for emergency legislation to meet their desperate situation.

Last evening in reply—and it was a very brief reply, I should say—to my question concerning next week's emergency legislation, Senator Martin emphasized that the government was embarking on a legislative program. What he really meant, honourable senators, was that the government has been on an inflationary program, and a rather deliberate program at that, for the past several years. In fact the only real success this government can claim is that it has achieved an extremely high rate of inflation. It is rather a dubious honour and one which the government has been, up to now, most reluctant to accept, and one that they did not quite understand until recently.

During the past summer the Minister of Finance attended an International Monetary Fund meeting in Japan. He returned from that meeting full of understanding. He appeared before the TV cameras and said he had found the reason for the problem of inflation in Canada. Somehow at that meeting he had learned that the Japanese also used money, and that they had $22 billion in reserve, and were beginning to live it up. I would point out, honourable senators, that $22 billion is about the equivalent of one year's federal budget in Canada—that is, the budget plus the supplementary estimates. The Minister of Finance, as I have said, stated that the Japanese were now beginning to live it up; they were beginning to buy imported wine and imported perfume. Honourable senators, I wonder how those two items affected the situation that our old age pensioners are in today. How many grandmothers and great-grandmothers suffer the loss of imported perfumes?

But the other members of the Cabinet were not going to be outclassed, honourable senators. They too made their appearances before the idiot box, and in turn gave their very wise opinions on the subject. There really was not a Solomon in the whole group. The Minister of Agriculture stated that even at today's food prices, the consumers were getting a bargain. The Minister of Consumer Affairs accused the retailers of gouging. The Minister of Labour stated that wages had no effect on today's prices. About the only conclusion one can arrive at is that they all seem to agree with the Minister of Finance, and that is that the Japanese are responsible for the inflation in Canada today.

Every shopper who entered a supermarket in the last few months was shocked by the sudden increase in food prices. Yet we find that the producer, in many instances, is still on a quota basis. In fact, he is just beginning to recover from many of the effects of the socialist planning that we have had in the past few years. Senator Everett has just dealt to some extent with the problem of controls, and he referred to the fact that chickens were being slaughtered rather than taken to market. I was rather intrigued with this, honourable senators, and I am sure Senator Everett wishes he had read the Annual Report for 1972-73 of the Agricultural Stabilization Board. There on page 4 it states that by order in council the board paid producers 75 cents for each fowl slaughtered during the period from June 5 to June 20, 1972. Then they go on to say that this program had the immediate effect of markedly improving producers' egg prices. So we paid close to two and a half million dollars, Senator Everett, for slaughtering chickens a year ago and now all we can boast about is an increase in price. I would rather have a look at the situation and ask what effect those three million chickens would have had on today's prices if they had been allowed to remain in the market.

Hon. Mr. Buckwold: They would certainly be tough chickens.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: You have to be tough to survive under a Liberal government, and there are still a few chickens around, Senator Buckwold.

Hon. Mr. Walker: Don't go any further.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: One must also ask what has happened in the last few months to the chicken and egg war. If you remember that one, Senator Martin, we had emergency legislation then too with a deadline. We had to meet that deadline and have the legislation in effect by a certain date, or else we were going to be faced with a chicken and egg war. Today the consumers are looking for chickens and eggs at reasonable prices, and they are not concerned about the chicken and egg war.

The legislation before us, honourable senators, proposes to increase the old age security and the guaranteed income supplement on a quarterly basis. For several months the government had been ridiculing Mr. Stanfield's proposal for very similar legislation, and in the very scholarly address which we have just heard this point that there is a great deal of similarity between what was advocated by Mr. Stanfield and this legislation has been overlooked.

● (1520)

Up until last week, however, it was too expensive; it was impossible to calculate the effect on the cost of living and on rising prices. Never mind what it was doing to the old age pensioner, the low-income groups and the workers with whom Senators Molgat and Langlois were concerned last evening. It was impossible to calculate the rate of increase in the cost of living and adjust it to pensions. However, something happened last week that made the government change its mind. Did the bureaucrats—the sluggish, self-satisfied bureaucrats in the Department of National Health and Welfare—suddenly see Damascus? Did they become that enlightened that now they can do it on a quarterly basis? Give them another week and they will be able to do it on a monthly basis.

I would suggest that this is an ideal opportunity for the Liberal Party to adopt Mr. Stanfield's proposals, because those who follow the political scene in Canada and make forecasts are predicting a general election very soon. I would say to the Leader of the Government that if his party expects to escape the NDP deluge they must adopt a great many of the Progressive Conservative Party's proposals. Otherwise they will go under the Lewis flood. The government now has an ideal situation in which to practice. I would suggest that the government adopt the full conservative viewpoint on this bill, and use it as practice for the election to come this fall. After all, Senator Martin, Mr. Stanfield will be busy on the campaign trail and will not be around to continually explain the situation to you. I think you should have at least one practice run before the election, and would urge you to use this case as an example to do so.

Honourable senators will recall that on April 5 this chamber completed its debate of a measure amending the Old Age Security Act, following which royal assent was granted. At that time honourable senators opposite were very jubilant and excited because of the fact that Canada had the best social security system in the world and our old age pensioners received the best care in the world. It would take years in the case of some countries, and generations for others, to catch up with Canada. What happened during April, May, June and July that we now find ourselves with a measure giving an increase of 1 per cent per month? The situation must have been one in which you had two choices, of which you could take your pick. I would suggest that you obtain one of the NCC doggie bags before you touch the mess.

The situation boils down to two points. First, the situation was not as good as you described it in April when everyone on the other side joined in the trumpet blast. The contrast came when the predominant wind instruments on the other side came into contrast with the string instruments. We found Senator Martin, on the one hand, claiming the legislation was the result of his long interest in old age pensioners, and Senator Croll, on the other hand, saying it was the result of the recommendations of the Special Senate Committee on Poverty. Both came back into harmony, however, for the final part of the symphony, and the old age pensioners turned out to be the best off in the world.

Hon. Mr. Everett: Would you care to identify the winds and the strings?

Hon. Mr. Phillips: Actually there is a little bit of each in all of them but I believe Senator Croll is rather more of the bull fiddle type than the winds.

The situation is such, honourable senators, that you must give very serious consideration to the fact that we have experienced a 1 per cent monthly increase in the cost of living, as calculated in this bill. Yet the sponsor of the bill in her remarks I believe stated that we had a 20 per cent increase during the last 18 months. I have not had an opportunity to check this, honourable senators, but I rather suspect that the 18-month period was adopted to give a lower average monthly increase, and that you will find it much higher in the last few months.

Last evening Senator Martin, through his two lesser microphones, Senator Langlois and Senator Molgat, was calling for us to discuss inflation—by "us" I mean the supporters of the Progressive Conservative Party. It seems to be verboten for a Liberal to discuss this subject, but I would like to suggest that the government at this stage introduce a complete and adequate method of controlling inflation. If not, it is my opinion that it is high time for both the prime minister, Mr. Lewis, and the assistant prime minister, Mr. Trudeau, to step down and allow Mr. Stanfield, who seems to be the only party leader with a program to control inflation, to take over and return the economy to even control. We have had enough of this incestuous situation between the NDP and the Liberal sheep. Since it was indicated on the introduction of this bill that the emergency has passed, and we now have time to think over the situation, I propose that the government consider this suggestion.

I move the adjournment of the debate until Monday.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Tuesday.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: Why not Monday, if it is an emergency?

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Until the next sitting.

Hon. Mr. Martin: We must not be rubber stamps.

On motion of Senator Phillips, debate adjourned.

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Honourable senators, I move, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until Tuesday next, September 11, 1973, at 8 o'clock in the evening.

Motion agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, September 11, at 8 p.m.

THE SENATE

Tuesday, September 11, 1973

The Senate met at 8 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Hon. Paul Martin tabled:

Report of the International Development Research Centre, including its accounts and financial statements certified by the Auditor General, for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1973, pursuant to section 22 of the International Development Research Centre Act, chapter 21 (1st Supplement), R.S.C., 1970.

Auditor General's report to the Solicitor General on the examination of the accounts and financial statement of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police (Dependants) Pension Fund for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1973, pursuant to section 55(4) of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Pension Continuation Act, chapter R-10, R.S.C., 1970.

Report of the Auditor General on the examination of the accounts and financial statements of the National Battlefields Commission for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1973, pursuant to section 12 of An Act respecting the National Battlefields at Quebec, chapter 57, Statutes of Canada, 1907-08, and sections 75(3) and 77(3) of the Financial Administration Act, chapter F-10, R.S.C., 1970.

Report of the Fisheries Prices Support Board for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1973, pursuant to section 7 of the Fisheries Prices Support Act, chapter F-23, R.S.C., 1970.

SCIENCE POLICY

REPORT OF COMMITTEE TABLED

Hon. Maurice Lamontagne: Honourable senators, I have the honour to table the report of the Special Committee of the Senate on Science Policy, A Science Policy for Canada, Volume 3, A Government Organization for the Seventies.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Hon. Mr. Lamontagne: I move that the report be taken into consideration at the next sitting of the Senate.

Hon. Mr. Asselin: Explain.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Honourable senators, before the question is put, I rise on a point of order. I do not want to be critical of the chairman of the Special Committee on Science Policy. I know that he got leave from the Senate to publish and distribute this third volume as soon as it became available even though the Senate might not then be sitting. But the Senate was sitting or was to sit this evening, the day the report was published, and I think it is highly irregular that it should have been given to the press before being tabled in the Senate, given the present circumstances. I can understand a mistake may have been made, but it is indeed very unfortunate that the Senate was treated in this way, be it by accident or otherwise.

Hon. Mr. Lamontagne: Honourable senators, it was merely by accident. This press conference was organized at least three weeks ago, because they needed some warning.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: You could have postponed it to tomorrow.

Hon. Mr. Lamontagne: All right, but I think the press had been warned three weeks ago that this would take place today. I personally would have preferred that the conference would have taken place tomorrow. I am sorry that it happened but I think that honourable senators were warned in advance—

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Not during any sitting last week.

Hon. Mr. Lamontagne: —when I was asking for this special authority. I am sorry that it happened that way, but I think that it was the only way it could happen.

Hon. Mr. Walker: I have the greatest respect for the honourable senator who has just spoken, but there is no question about the practice on a matter of this kind. It is incongruous that my honourable friend, knowing that the Senate was to sit this evening, should have given a press conference this morning and announced the report to the press before reporting to the Senate. The fact that the plan for the press conference was made three weeks ago is no excuse; the honourable senator could have said to the press, "tomorrow morning." They would all be there just the same. It is again a denigration of or a reflection on the prestige of the Senate, and we have enough reflections on us from the other place without having it happen from one of our own senior members. I am not saying this personally to you, senator, but in the other place a matter of this sort would cause a tremendous storm of disapproval. Thank you very much.

● (2010)

Hon. Mr. Lamontagne: I am very sorry to rise again, but I must take the blame for this. I asked for the authority of this chamber to do it.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Not under the circumstances.

Hon. Mr. Lamontagne: I assume the responsibility. I think the issuing of this report will reflect on the Senate in a nice way. If it does not, again I say I will take the blame.

[Translation]

Hon. Mr. Côté: Honourable senators, I merely wish to add one thing.

Although some may feel that the fact that the report was made public outside the Senate may be prejudicial to the prestige of our assembly, I feel personally that the report in itself and the magnificent work performed by the committee reflect great credit on the Senate.

Hon. Mr. Asselin: Honourable senators, our leader, and Senator Walker have raised the following point: the committee was appointed by the Senate to undertake a study on scientific research. The work Senator Lamontagne did is not being questioned; everyone congratulates him on the way he performed his job. He is, however, being taken to task because, although the Senate was sitting this evening, a news conference was held and announced by both radio and television, and the findings and the report were tabled without the Senate having been notified in this chamber.

It may be that the report was sent individually to some senators, to their private offices, but the report should first have been tabled here in the Senate in order that the senator might then make a statement. That is the reproach we address to Senator Lamontagne.

Hon. Mr. Côté: Do not forget to congratulate him!

Hon. Mr. Flynn: That smacks of the government leader's attitude.

[English]

The Hon. the Speaker: It is moved by the Honourable Senator Lamontagne, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Cameron, that this report be placed on the Orders of the Day for consideration at the next sitting of the Senate. Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: With leave.

Motion agreed to.

MEXICO

STATE OF THE UNION ADDRESS BY PRESIDENT—INVITATION TO SENATE SPEAKER—NOTICE OF INQUIRY

Hon. Donald Cameron: Honourable senators, I give notice that later this day, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 44(2), I will call the attention of the Senate to the invitation of the President of Mexico to the Speaker of the Senate to be present when he delivers his third State of the Union Address.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators, that the Honourable Senator Cameron have leave to proceed with his inquiry later this day?

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: No. No leave is granted for that. We will see later this day.

OLD AGE SECURITY ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from Friday, September 7, the adjourned debate on the motion of Senator Lapointe for the second reading of Bill C-219, to amend the Old Age Security Act.

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, during last week's emergency debate on this subject I was opening the door to speak on inflation. Since that time I have had the opportunity of reading the speech delivered by Senator Everett on inflation and I have come to the conclusion that perhaps I am no more qualified to speak on the various causes of inflation than Senator Everett or those opposite. However, there is one thing that I will point out to the Senate, and that is the emergence of a rather intriguing philosophy.

One can see the Liberal philosophy develop rather cleverly throughout all the statistics. Apparently, the blame for inflation belongs to everyone else except the government, and no one can deny that inflation is the responsibility of the federal government. I was intrigued by the viewpoint presented by Senator Everett that the Opposition Party—for some reason the Conservative Party was named as the opposition party and the NDP was not listed as an opposition party—should not present proposals to deal with inflation, should not present alternative programs to government legislation and should not criticize the government in any way because that only made the situation worse. This is a new and unique theory in a Canadian Parliament. Every economic theory seems to have a name attached to it, and I think we would have to call this one the commissar's theory—"don't criticize, it is not expected of you, and you only make the situation worse if you tell the people the truth." Then he finished by urging the government to "hang tough." In the beef industry they normally hang beef a certain time to age it, with the idea that it becomes tender by doing so. But in this case the government was urged to "hang tough" with the Opposition, to "hang tough" with the people. I don't know what they mean by "hanging tough" with the people. At any rate, the urging was to hang on.

Unfortunately, the speech did not tell us what we would hang on to, and I would ask honourable senators opposite to clarify that point and tell us what we will hang on to because most Canadians are beginning to wonder what they can hang on to. They cannot hang on to their savings; they cannot hang on to their weekly wages. So what are they going to hang on to?

Bill C-219 attempts to provide relief for those on old age security and guaranteed income supplements having regard to the drastic increase in inflation and the cost of living. In this connection it is interesting to note that in 1971 there were 1,700,000 Canadians receiving old age security benefits. Of these, 387,000 received partial support under the GIS payments and 473,000 received the full payment under OAS/GIS. Then in 1972 there were 1,762,-000 Canadians receiving OAS/GIS, but the number receiving the full payment increased from approximately 22 per cent to around 27.27 per cent. This is a drastic increase of 5 per cent in one year of those who need the full supplementary benefit. Why? I know the cost of living has increased drastically, but there must be other reasons. One of them is that those on retirement have had to use up their hard-earned savings to meet the increase in the cost of living.

• (2020)

That is obvious to all. The second point to come out is that the Canada Pension Plan is not the answer it was supposed to be. While more and more Canadians are drawing their Canada Pension Plan benefits, more and more are applying for the full guaranteed income supplement benefits. Why? There seems to be a reason, and again it is a point that should be considered when this bill is referred to committee. This would be an appropriate time to inquire of the government if it proposes to allow those in receipt of Canada Pension Plan payments to earn more in casual earnings than the present ceiling of $960? As honourable senators know, when a recipient of Canada Pension Plan payments earns more than $960, half of it is deducted. When the amount of casual earnings reaches $1,600, the full amount is deducted. There are a great many Canadians who at 65 years of age still feel that they can contribute something to the Canadian economy and thereby benefit not only financially but physically and mentally. I am sure that no honourable members of either House of Parliament who are over the age of 65 years feel that they are in a crypt of some kind and are therefore cast aside. We have only to look at some of the outstanding parliamentarians to find that many are beyond the age of 65.

In its mid-summer haste the government has overlooked the war veterans, another group with which I am much concerned. In the government's "inflationary program" I see no mention of war veterans who draw disability pensions. Surely that is one group that would be the first in the mind of the government. Yet we find no mention of it in the inflationary program.

One most interesting aspect of Bill C-219 is a rather tacit admission that the government has no answer to inflation nor any program to control it. Instead, every quarter the rate of inflation is reviewed and an addition made to the old age security guaranteed income security payments. Admittedly, this is necessary but are we by enacting this legislation to approve of inflation in perpetuity? Surely there must be some plan by which the Government can put the brakes on inflation. Perhaps it is impossible to control it completely, but must we give blanket approval for galloping inflation and then say that it is all right because we have increased social security benefits? This is a very dangerous pattern to follow. We must look at the alternatives to the inflationary trend. In fact, it is not an inflationary trend; it is a government program.

The sponsor of the bill, in her explanation of it which as she stated was rather brief, spent more time reviewing the history of the Liberal leaders from Laurier to Lewis than she did on the bill. However, there is a brief section in her speech which deals with the bill. I refer to clause 5 which states that the Governor in Council may make regulations. In the past I have objected strenuously to this type of legislation, and again I question the need for this clause in the bill. Perhaps the sponsor, when she sums up, can forget Laurier and Lewis and give us an indication of the type of regulation with which clause 5 concerns itself.

In dealing with the $5 a month increase in old age security one should make a comparison with a control group of some sort. I have looked around, honourable senators, to find a control group. It seemed to me that the fair thing to do would be to have a group that is presently employed. I found a very interesting control group mentioned in House of Commons Hansard at page 6231, and it is in the reply to a question from a member of the other place as to why the number of public servants earning above $20,000 a year had increased. The reply was provided by the government, so no one can accuse me of being biased or picking an unfair control group. The government very candidly stated that a salary of $20,000 a year in 1973 is equal to a salary of $11,500 in 1963.

[Hon. Mr. Phillips.]

Ten years ago, honourable senators, the old age security was $65 a month, and was raised to $75 a month in October of that year. On the basis of the government's reply, the explanation in the other place, it is logical to assume that the basic old age security payments should now be in the vicinity of $135 a month—that is, if we assume the government treated our people who receive old age security with the same amount of concern and consideration as it does the moguls of the public service, those people who seem to be the favourites of the government and get promoted at that rate.

I know that the unfinished symphony in regard to the government's old age security program will be rehearsed again, and they will refer to the fact that there is now a GIS supplement and various other things. But I would point out, honourable senators, that those same moguls who had their salaries doubled in the same period also received extra retirement benefits. They were allowed to retire at an earlier age, and the benefits they have received are comparable to, or, in fact, even better than, those provided our old age pensioners.

I feel that we are not being overly generous in this bill. I hope that we will not hear a chorus of applause for this bill from the other side, but rather that you will accept it as a measure of your failure.

• (2030)

Honourable senators, I will close my remarks on this note. Approximately one and a half million Canadians will receive some small benefit from this piece of legislation, but outside in the wide, wonderful world of inflation and unemployment there are approximately 21 million Canadians waiting and looking for relief from inflation. When are we going to deal with the other 21 million?

Hon. Jacques Flynn: If no one else on the government side will support this legislation, perhaps I might say a few words.

[Translation]

Honourable senators, the sponsor of this bill, my very good friend the Honourable Senator Renaude Lapointe, in the introduction to her speech the other night, had this to say:

> The fact that we are here today to discuss Bill C-219, less than eighteen hours after the good dressing-down which some distinguished members of the Opposition gave the government leader, fully establishes that Senator Martin was justified in recalling the Senate this week.

Hon. Mr. Côté: Well done.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Of course, I do not know if these words came out spontaneously from her mouth. I do not know whether she had consulted with the government leader on what she intended to say, but the fact that the government leader, last Friday, had moved to adjourn Senate until Tuesday rather than Monday, and that he refused the most generous offer made to him by the Assistant Leader of the Opposition to deal with that legislation on Friday afternoon so that it could receive royal assent on that day, I think it is obvious that this destroys the argument of the honourable senator. Once again, I do not know where she found inspiration for those words but I think that the facts are more eloquent than her words.

Secondly, the Honourable Senator Lapointe stated:

> It establishes also that the disparaging remarks they uttered last night against him were mischievously inspired.

I do not know what she has found to be ungracious in what was said to Senator Martin. But if she reads carefully what has been reported in Hansard of that day she will find that if there were any ungracious words, they were addressed to the opposition leader when it was mentioned that he used to sleep on this side. I think it is altogether unfair and absolutely wrong.

Now, this being said, let us come back to the bill itself.

You will notice that I have no resentment, that I am used to giving and to receiving and that generally speaking maybe I could give more than I receive.

Besides, I see that my good friend Senator Côté—I see him squirming in his seat—would like to participate in this debate at some point so that he could finish me off. It may come, Senator Côté; be patient. Be more interested in the substance of our debates rather than in their form and then—

Hon. Mr. Côté: He wants to give me a lesson.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Then, you will probably have a better chance to reach your goal.

Hon. Mr. Côté: Which one?

Hon. Mr. Flynn: That of putting me out of action.

Hon. Mr. Côté: If that were my goal, I would know how to go about it.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I see now that my friend Senator Langlois is butting in. I am happy to see he is in a good mood, as I am, and that we have forgotten what we may have said to each other in the past.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Of course.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Good. Having said this, I would like to come back to a few remarks concerning the bill under consideration.

I simply want to point out that this legislation is not very significant. I admit from the start that it was suggested to the government by the party to which I belong. But, it was suggested during the debate on Bill C-147, which is an act amending the Old Age Security Act introduced for first reading on February 22 last and passed, I think, in the month of May; I don't exactly recall the date, but I am ready to stand corrected if I am wrong.

At that time, the government was reversing its attitude and saying that the old age security pension would be increased to $100, that it would be indexed on the increase in the cost of living, thus putting aside the principle it had adopted last year to take into account the rise in the cost of living, with a maximum of 2 per cent. Very well.

At that time, in the other place, my party suggested that, with inflation running wild, increases should be indexed quarterly rather than annually. The government protested vehemently! Impossible! Stupid! Too complicated! Nothing of the kind! Now, four months later, they again reverse their policy and say: Well, this is an excellent idea.

Of course we know the conditions which were prevailing when this legislation and others to come were submitted by the government. The New Democratic party which holds the balance of power and, in fact, rules the land in a more or less regular way, but rather irregularly since the opening of the session last January, flared up recently and told the government: "If you are not taking any action, we will withdraw our support and you will have to stand an election." Imagine this courageous government we have had since last October accepting to stand an election. It is inconceivable.

They immediately concocted—and I can see the Leader of the Government discussing with the Cabinet—a contingency plan, of course to cope with a purely electoral emergency, that is to say, a series of two or three measures merely intended to blind people to the facts. Indeed, this is all that Mr. Lewis wanted, a few measures to blind people to the facts. They said then that they were going to adjust the old age security quarterly rather than annually. Very good. But, is that important? Is that really important from the point of view of the struggle against inflation? Actually, it is not a measure designed to fight inflation. It is a measure that will make good the effects of inflation, and this is quite different. When we try to compensate for the effects of inflation by distributing more money, all we do generally is to help increase inflation. This is the situation in which we are now.

We cannot refuse to approve this bill. It is a palliative to the uncertain policy of this government. The NDP leader states on television that it is very important to avoid elections, that he must not say, in the circumstances, that government policy is inadequate. Meanwhile, the leader of the Canadian Labour Congress, on behalf of which the NDP acts as a political instrument, has said: "We cannot in any way approve the economic policy of the Trudeau government." You see how ambiguous and how odd our situation is.

Senator Everett condemned the other night the controls system. I will not be involved in this debate now, but you may be sure of one thing: the government has at present no policy of its own. Whatever action they take is inspired not by their own convictions but rather by the convictions of the Opposition. They say, what is the Opposition expecting from us in return for keeping us in power? And they hand out the minimum that is asked either by the New Democratic Party or, occasionally, by the combined opposition of Conservatives and New Democrats as was seen in the case of the now famous bill on corporate income tax cuts which, as I already explained in this house, was a shameless surrender of government responsibility.

As far as I am concerned, this bill may well pass. It is a bill designed to help a few people. It will mean to a considerable number of citizens who do not need it an increase in purchasing power that will do nothing short of increasing inflation and the possibilities of a further rise in the cost of living. This legislation is a good thing for those who need the assistance, but where the others are concerned, I fail to agree.

This government lacks courage. Its policy is being dictated by the Opposition and often by a minority party in the Opposition, the New Democratic Party. That is extremely unfortunate. One has only to read the comments being written in every newspaper to realize that the policy of this government is one of opportunism, pragmatism, improvisation, and of course with the sole purpose of staying in power.

The thirst for power is ever-increasing—I know all about that because as a Conservative I have been in the Opposition much longer than I have been in power. I have seen in front of me the government leader who has been in power much longer than he has been in the opposition. I have seen him in the opposition and witnessed the extent of his unhappiness. It was more than he could bear. Personally, I am not too unhappy to be in the opposition but I hate to see from my opposition seat a government so weak, so unable to accept its responsibilities and grapple courageously with the situation, even at the risk of losing power.

I am sorry to see this distressing spectacle of a weak government, unable to assume its responsibilities and take initiatives of its own.

Be that as it may, this bill has to pass, I agree. But nothing is solved, and we are back at square one. We are waiting for the NDP's accord so that, at last, people can take sides. I know very well that it may be slow to come, because the New Democrats realize that at this point, to sell their conscience, to crawl on their knees, to give up their principles cannot serve them in the long run. But the day will come when they will have no choice. It is the people who will have to choose, and we will see the results.

Hon. Mr. Côté: Your electoral campaign is launched.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: This is my answer to Senator Lapointe's speech.

● (2040)

[English]

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Martin: At the next sitting.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: No, no. Is the bill not being referred to a committee?

[Translation]

The other evening, Senator Molgat said that this bill could be referred to a committee. I understood that Senator Phillips had some questions to ask in committee.

Hon. Mr. Martin: I have no objection.

[Hon. Mr. Flynn.]

Hon. Miss Lapointe: I move that this bill be referred to the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Science.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Agreed.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Agreed.

[English]

On motion of Senator Lapointe, bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

EXPANDED EUROPEAN COMMUNITIES—CONSIDERATION OF REPORT OF COMMITTEE—DEBATE ADJOURNED

On the Order:

> Consideration of the Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs, entitled: "Canadian Relations with the European Community," tabled in the Senate on Thursday, 12th July 1973.—(Honourable Senator Aird.)

Hon. Frederick William Rowe: Honourable senators, in the absence of Senator Aird I should like to make a few remarks about the report which he presented here some weeks ago.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, has the Honourable Senator Rowe leave to proceed in place of the Honourable Senator Aird?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Mr. Rowe: I am not a senior member of the Senate, but of the reports I have seen in the last two years this is one of the most interesting and most carefully prepared. It is succinct, but it is also comprehensive. It raises, in some cases directly and in other cases by implication, some serious and formidable questions for Canadians.

I am not a businessman and have no business experience in the narrow sense of that word. However, I do not regard the emergence of the European Economic Community, commonly called the Common Market, as a business development. I do not even regard it as an economic development in the narrow sense of those words. It is a fact of history we must face and deal with. The Common Market is not an economic development but a great social experiment. In order that it be understood and assessed properly we must think of it in terms of historical perspective.

Honourable senators, no one today would argue that the great industrial revolution, which changed the face of England, the face of Europe and ultimately the face of the world, was simply an economic or business development. Going back still further, no one would argue that the Reformation was a religious development. The emergence of the European Economic Community is one of the most important developments of this century. It ranks with some of those tremendous social upheavals and undertakings which have had the ultimate effect of changing the face of the earth—and that sometimes in a literal way.

For example, in the nineteenth century in Europe there were what were termed "geographical expressions." That is the term one historian used in respect of Germany and Italy. Germany was not an economic or a political entity 150 years ago, nor was Italy. Some 250 years ago or less, Russia was not an economic or a political entity. If we go further back we reach a time when France—what we know now as France—was not an economic or political entity. We could go back to a time when what is now Britain was a collection of independent or semi-independent states, principalities and fiefdoms, and what have you. Over the centuries these geographical expressions were consolidated; they were brought together to be entities—and not merely economic entities, but political entities as well.

● (2050)

I said earlier that I am not a businessman, but I do not regard this development of the common market as a business development in the narrow sense of the word. I do presume to speak on it because I have been in my lifetime a student of history. I have done much research into historical matters, and I am reminded that traditionally we were led to regard, for example, the consolidation of the German states in the 19th century under Bismarck as being the result of Bismarck's policy of "blood and iron," as I think it was called, with the help, of course, of Prussian militarism. There is some truth in that, but it is only a half truth.

I was interested, incidentally, in reading this week an article in a book edited by Dr. Henderson of the University of London, a book which he calls: "Since 1945: Aspects of Contemporary World History." That is the rather clumsy title of the book. One of the contributors is Russell Lewis whose article is entitled: "The Growth of European Unity." I was rather interested to notice there that he brings out the very point which has been apparent to me and to others for a long time, namely, that the consolidation of Germany in the 1800s—in the second half of the 19th century—brought about during the time that Bismarck was a predominant statesman in Prussia, was actually the result of the Zollverein, that great customs union which started in a very small way, as a customs union among some of the independent German states, and over the years became stronger and stronger; it was that which laid the ground later for the political union of the German states.

To some extent the same thing is true in Italy. Again, traditionally, we regard the unification of Italy as being the result of the vigour and the idealism of men like Garibaldi, Count Cavour and Victor Emmanuel, and so on. Of course, there is some truth in that, but if you go a little deeper into it you will find that that political union which resulted in the nation of Italy, as we know it today, would not have been possible if it had not been preceded by economic consolidation in one way or another.

I mention these things tonight deliberately, honourable senators, because I think we make a grave error if we think of the emergence of what we call the Common Market in Europe as being an economic development, as being something that has economic implications and nothing else. I remind you that the very men who provided the idealism and the inspiration for this did not speak in terms of economic unity. I am talking now about Adenaeur of Germany, Churchill of England, Spaak and others shortly after World War II. They talked about the possibility of the political unification of Western Europe. Now, in recent years, that idea has been soft-pedalled—deliberately, I think, and probably wisely because one has to approach a political unification very gingerly for reasons which I think must be obvious: people think emotionally about these things and they react very quickly to them.

If I might digress for a moment I would say that I was reading today in the Illustrated London News an article by Arthur Bryant, one of the famous historians who opposed the entry of Britain into the Common Market. Of course, as we know, others of all political persuasions agreed with him in that opposition. Basically, the reason for their opposition is nationalistic; it is emotional. "We have managed to survive," said Bryant, "for a thousand years or more. We did survive Louis XIV and we did survive Napoleon Bonaparte and we did survive Kaiser Wilhelm and we did survive Hitler; and now you are going to merge all of that, all of that great British tradition, into Europe, with the possibility that it is going to be submerged." I am paraphrasing, of course. He did not use those words, but that is what he meant.

I think we have to remember that this economic union has and could have very serious far-reaching implications far beyond the economic factors. This is a matter which is far too complex to go into at this time. I was interested in noticing that the committee referred to it peripherally here and there, but it did not get involved in this matter of a possibility of a political union, or the political implications. But do not let us fool ourselves for one moment; this economic union in Western Europe, from what I have seen, has all the earmarks of being successful.

The first time I went to Europe was in 1956 and I have been back there I suppose seven or eight times since. I have travelled in Italy, France, Spain and Germany, and so on. Last year in the fall I had the opportunity to travel through Germany and through Italy, and anyone who has done that, and being aware of conditions that existed in, for example, Italy in the 1950s, must have been absolutely amazed at the transformation which is taking place there. No one can go to Germany and not look in wonderment at the obvious vigour, energy and progress that are now characteristic of that country. I am speaking, of course, of West Germany right now. To some extent it is true of East Germany too, but for different reasons, but certainly it is true of West Germany and it is true of France. There is no doubt at all that the transformation which is taking place in Western Europe, and which has taken place, and which among other things has virtually eliminated unemployment, has largely been the result of the impetus given by the economic unification, or the partial economic unification, of these nations in what we call the Common Market.

● (2100)

The report of the committee raises some questions, again not always directly but perhaps by implication. For example, is the European Community, the whole idea generally, and, specifically, the decision of Britain to join that Common Market, a good thing or a bad thing for Canada? This is a question that is asked in the report, but it is not answered fully for obvious reasons. The committee could not answer it fully. If I were to give a hasty personal judgment, I would say that any such union has to benefit the component parts of that union. I do not think anyone would argue, for example, that the states and the political entities that made up the geographical area of what is now Germany did not benefit as a result of the union into the German nation. The same remark applies to Italy. For that matter, coming to this side of the ocean, I am sure nobody would argue that the union which formed the United States nearly 200 years ago has not benefited every component part of that union.

Even here at home, honourable senators, while I know that we all argue at times that we have suffered in one way or another, particularly in provinces like my own, by virtue of entry into union, nevertheless I would say that nobody in his right senses could argue that Newfoundland, or Saskatchewan, or for that matter Ontario or British Columbia, has not benefited as a result of the economic and political union effected more than 100 years ago for part of Canada, and 25 years ago for my own province. Nobody could argue that each part has not benefited because every component part of that union has, in fact, benefited. I will go further and say that the unification of the British colonies in North America which eventually became the United States, and the unification of the colonies—or whatever you want to call them—here in what is now Canada has not only benefited those component parts, but has benefited the world at large. I do not think there is the slightest doubt whatever that the world is benefiting from the unification of those colonies and from the emergence of what we now know as the United States of America.

But there is another side to that coin, honourable senators. There are the political and military factors. We know that in at least one instance such a union—and here I refer to the unification of a number of these states into one superstate in the case of Germany—had dire effects for Europe and for the world. But these were not a necessary consequence of that union. I do not intend going into that in detail at this time, but I do want to say that it was unfortunate that so much of the energy and so much of the progressive development of the German nation was eventually applied in ways that were deleterious and destructive to the rest of the world.

One question that comes to my mind at least, honourable senators, from the reading of this report is this: Has Canada given enough attention to the implications of the European Community? That is indeed a question. I personally would answer it negatively. I would say no. I shall develop that further in a moment. I arrived at that conclusion independently, and for that reason I was very interested to see, as I re-read the report this week, that it implies exactly that—that Canada has not given enough attention to the implications of this economic development in Western Europe. In fact some of the conclusions in the report are disconcerting. I would go even further and say that they are alarming. For that reason I suggest to honourable senators that they might go back and read this report again because, believe me, it deals with matters which are going to affect us increasingly in the years to come; they are going to affect the destinies of our children and grandchildren here in Canada.

Here is something I have taken verbatim from the report:

> In general terms Canada's exports to the expanding Community markets have not kept pace with competitor nations' exports. Canada's share of this rapidly growing market has declined.

That is very disconcerting.

Honourable senators, let us take a less important matter raised here. The European Community has adopted or implemented a program for employing young people from non-member countries, and under that program—and here let me say that I do not recall all the details—each non-member country is entitled to have one paid intern per year, and two or three non-paid candidates, go over to work there, study, do research and participate in the work of the Common Market. Canada, during that ten-year period, has placed only one intern over there. I cannot help wishing that the committee had found it possible to develop that aspect a little more, or to look into it a little more, to try to ascertain the reasons for this failure in such a simple thing as that. The opportunity was there for young, intelligent, alert, ambitious young Canadians to go over there, and yet we sent only one in 10 years. I do not know the reason for that. The first thing I knew about it was when I read this report. It is a small matter, but it is something that might cause us some concern.

Let us consider a more serious matter than that. During the past several years Canadian exports to the United Kingdom, with which we had, of course, preferential arrangements, increased at an even slower rate than the exports to the Six—that is, the six members of the original Economic Community—despite the advantage of the preferential tariff.

Consider too this sentence taken directly from the report:

> Other world trading nations such as the United States and Japan have increased their share (of exports to the Community) often dramatically.

I have heard some fears expressed about the development of the Common Market. From time to time you hear people say, "This can be pretty bad for Canada." I say to you, honourable senators, and I say it as a Canadian, that it is not the European Economic Community we have to be afraid of; it is our own failure, our own delinquency.

● (2110)

Hon. Mr. Walker: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Rowe: I am a Canadian and it does not give me any particular pleasure to wash Canadian linen in public but sometimes it must be done. I know that a number of my colleagues here have been identified with Canadian business over the years, in some cases in a very large way. I hope that no one will take my next remarks as irresponsible statements or criticisms. I repeat, I am not a businessman.

Hon. Mr. Walker: May I interrupt for a moment? You are a very able administrator and I remember well doing business with you for many years when you held office in the Government of Newfoundland. For the third time you have apologized for yourself, which you do not need to do at all.

Hon. Mr. Rowe: I thank Senator Walker for that. May I reciprocate by saying that I have the same feeling with respect to dealings I had with him some years ago.

I was identified with an attempt to improve an underdeveloped part of Canada from 1949 until I was summoned to the Senate. We literally travelled all over the world in an attempt to encourage capital and expertise to come to our province, which in 1949 was one of the underdeveloped parts of the world. It included that great area of 112,000 square miles known as Labrador and the island of Newfoundland, one of the seven or eight largest on the face of the earth. We were undeveloped and so did everything we could, often too much, to induce capital and capabilities into our province. One of the great disappointments experienced by my colleagues and by me personally, as we had been responsible for effecting the union of Newfoundland with Canada, was the failure of Canadian capital and business to take any real interest in the development of this, the newest and most underdeveloped part of Canada. This was one of our greatest and also continuing disappointments. As a result, we had to go to all parts of the world to induce investment and interest. We were successful in this. I might say that in some cases we did not even have to go. Representatives came to Newfoundland, not from Ontario, Quebec or Canada generally, but from Japan, Germany, Italy and, of course, the United States, to search out opportunities.

I wish to pay tribute to individual Canadians who did realize the opportunities which were available in the province and devoted their lives to bringing about development there. Again, as I shall point out in a moment, this was done without the encouragement or assistance that should have been provided by other Canadians. I think, for example, of two men in particular. One was M. J. Boylan, who is now deceased. Mr. Boylan, a mining developer and promoter, came to Newfoundland at our invitation. He brought in geologists and mining engineers who saw great potentials in the province. He was successful, as a result of concessions and other help given him by the provincial government, in opening up seven separate mines in Newfoundland. One was the great asbestos mine at Baie Verte, in which he was able to persuade Johns-Manville of the United States to take an interest. It is now one of the great asbestos developments and has a future of at least 100 years. No one even knew that there was one ounce of asbestos in the Baie Verte Peninsula when I became the member for that area in the 1950s. Mr. Boylan, however, did not receive financial assistance from Canadians. He was stymied over and over again and had to go to the United States, as I know very well. He induced most improbable characters in the United States to invest in the project. Of course, they were not gangsters. I do not wish to leave that impression. It was respectable business but included were, for example, such as Gene Tunney, the famous boxer who knocked out Jack Dempsey.

I recall the contribution made to Labrador by Jules Timmins. He is also deceased, but I wish to pay tribute to the imagination, drive and energy of this man, who realized that there were great possibilities in Labrador. He, too, had to go to the United States and enlist the support of men such as George Humphrey, who later became Secretary of the Treasury, and others. The M.A. Hanna Company, of which Mr. Humphrey was then the head, and others contributed. As a result of that the greatest single mining development in the history of Canada took place. There is, however, no credit due, apart from Jules Timmins and a few others, to Canadian business generally in connection with that development, nor, for that matter, to any government of Canada.

Although it was realized that one of the greatest hydro potentials on the face of the earth was rolling out into the Atlantic Ocean, as it had been since the ice age, no one in Canada was willing to listen. I say this deliberately: there was no one in Canada at any level, either political, business or economic who was really interested in it. We had to go to England and put the proposition forward as a gamble to the then Prime Minister of England, Winston Churchill. It was through his interest that Rothschild and other great entrepreneurs entered the picture, and as a result the greatest single hydro development on the face of the earth was developed in our province. Most Canadians do not even realize that in that one spot more than $1 billion was spent to develop the greatest single hydro capacity in the world. There is one in Russia, as Kosygin reminded us, but that is a triple development. If the lower Churchill is developed as a dual development it will be bigger than the triple development in Russia.

It is ironic, honourable senators, and I do not take any great pleasure in saying this, but we should keep in mind that the two greatest industrial projects in the history of Canada, not the CPR, not the Niagara development and not the St. Lawrence Seaway, took place in Labrador, almost entirely as a result of the efforts of the province itself with the help of non-Canadian capital and largely non-Canadian business expertise.

• (2120)

I would be the last one in the world to ignore the roles played by Donald Gordon, Robert Winters and Donald McParland in the later development, but what I say still stands. Those two greatest economic developments in the history of Canada owe practically nothing to Canada. The nearly $3 billion that has gone into Western Labrador to develop the iron owes practically nothing to Canadian capital, and certainly nothing to Canada generally. I suggest that there is something basically wrong when that is the case.

If we in Newfoundland had waited for Canadian business, Canadian enterprise, to bring about those developments we would still be waiting. These developments, may I remind you, have already poured countless millions of dollars into the federal treasury, and countless millions of dollars are being poured into the economy of Canada as a result.

I did not mean to speak at such length and in such strong terms on this matter, honourable senators, but this is something that needs to be said and I am glad to say it. Once more I should like to express my congratulations to the committee for the work it has done. It has done a good job. I trust that this is not the end of it. If it is, it will be fatal for us, because I think it is absolutely imperative that the people of Canada appreciate and understand that the development of the economic community in Western Europe is fraught with all kinds of possibilities, both good and bad, for Canada as well as for the rest of the world.

Finally, on a more positive note, I want to say that I believe the formation of this Common Market, or whatever you wish to call it, will present, and does present, an increasing challenge as well as an increasing opportunity to Canada. If we fail to measure up, we have no one to blame. We cannot blame England for deserting us. Incidentally, I was very happy—and I say this again—that Canada did not show any vindictiveness in this matter when one of our mother countries, Britain, decided to enter the Common Market, with all the implications that that step had with respect to the preferential arrangements that had been part of the scheme of things for so many years. As I have said, if we do not measure up to this challenge, we have no one to blame but ourselves.

In conclusion, I quote Cassius in Shakespeare's Julius Caesar, who, while speaking to Brutus when Brutus was complaining about their failure to do anything about keeping Caesar in check, said:

> The fault, dear Brutus, is not in our stars,
> But in ourselves, that we are underlings.

I do not believe that we in Canada are underlings.

On motion of Senator Martin, debate adjourned.

HEALTH, WELFARE AND SCIENCE

NOTICE OF COMMITTEE MEETING

Hon. Mr. Carter: Honourable senators, before the Senate adjourns I should like to announce, on behalf of the chairman, that the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science will meet in room 356-S tomorrow morning at 11 o'clock.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Wednesday, September 12, 1973

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Hon. Paul Martin tabled:

Report of expenditures and administration in connection with the Family Allowances Act for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1973, pursuant to section 14 of the said act, chapter F-1, R.S.C., 1970.

Report of expenditures and administration in connection with the Old Age Security Act for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1973, pursuant to section 26 of the said act, chapter 0-6, R.S.C., 1970.

Report of expenditures and administration in connection with the Youth Allowances Act for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1973, pursuant to section 13 of the said act, chapter Y-1, R.S.C., 1970.

OLD AGE SECURITY ACT

BILL TO AMEND—REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Hon. Chesley W. Carter, Deputy Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science, reported that the committee had considered Bill C-219, to amend the Old Age Security Act, and had directed that the bill be reported without amendment.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read a third time?

Hon. Mr. Martin: Next sitting.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Or now?

Hon. Mr. Martin: No; no rubber-stamping around this place.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: If the Leader of the Government wants royal assent to this bill this afternoon, we will consent to third reading now.

Hon. Mr. Martin: I think a responsible Senate would want third reading of this bill to take place tomorrow.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh!

Motion agreed to.

ENERGY RESOURCES

CRUDE OIL AND NATURAL GAS—PROPOSED NATIONAL POLICY—QUESTIONS

Hon. Ernest C. Manning: Honourable senators, I should like to address several questions to the Leader of the Government in the Senate with respect to the government's proposed national oil policy. The questions are as follows:

(1) Is it the Government's intention to fix the well head price of crude oil?

(2) Is it the Government's intention to establish an Oil Marketing Board and if so, will all oil producers in Canada be required to market their production through the Government Board?

(3) If it is the intention to require oil produced in Canada to be marketed through a Government Marketing Board, will importers of crude oil be required to market such oil through the Board and will the Board determine the price at which such oil will be sold to refineries in Canada?

(4) If the Government intends to become the sole marketer of crude oil under a two price system, will the profit from export sales at higher than well head price accrue to the federal treasury, be paid to the province owning the oil, or to be used as a subsidy to reduce fuel prices in the domestic market?

(5) Is it the Government's intention to treat natural gas in the same manner as crude oil in the application of its proposed oil policy?

(6) Is it the Government's intention to insist that the Montreal market area be supplied with Western Canadian crude oil by the construction of a pipeline to Montreal?

(7) If Alberta crude oil producers are required to supply the Montreal market, is the Government prepared to give a commitment that the well head price of Western crude oil will not be purposely depressed in order to enable the Montreal market area to enjoy lower gasoline prices?

I appreciate, honourable senators, that the government leader will require some time to secure the answers to these questions, and I would simply ask him to provide the answers at his convenience.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I am quite sure he has ready answers.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Senator Manning expressed his intention last night to ask questions along these lines, but, as I told him just before we entered the chamber this afternoon, I only received his letter about half an hour ago. I assure him that just as quickly as I can get responses to all of these questions I will give them here.

● (1410)

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

EXPANDED EUROPEAN COMMUNITIES—CONSIDERATION OF REPORT OF COMMITTEE—DEBATE CONTINUED

The Senate resumed from yesterday the adjourned debate on the consideration of the Report of the Standing

Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs, entitled: "Canadian Relations with the European Community."

Hon. Mr. Martin: Honourable senators, I give way to the Honourable Senator Buckwold.

Hon. Sidney L. Buckwold: Honourable senators, I ask leave to resume this debate at this stage.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators, that Senator Buckwold shall have leave to proceed now?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Mr. Buckwold: Honourable senators, as has been indicated by previous speakers during this debate, the subject of the Common Market, or the European Community as we should perhaps now refer to it, is one of very real importance to the entire nation, but perhaps especially to Western Canada. Some time ago we had the pleasure of listening to my colleague, Senator Sparrow, talking of the impact of the Common Market on agriculture. I should like to resume where he left off and refer to some of the changes that have taken place even since this report has been written. I say this because there has been a very significant difference in the whole outlook on food production and food supply since the early days of discussion on the Common Market and the European Community.

At the outset, I want to congratulate the committee for undertaking this study. It was well done and has been, I think, very provocative in the suggestions made as to what Canada should do to meet the challenge of doing business, maintaining trade relations and carrying on the export volume which we have had with the European area. It is an immense market, a very important market, a market of growing affluence, and one which should be cultivated to the best ability that Canadian know-how can develop.

In the last year or two, about 12½ per cent of our total exports have been to the countries of the European Community. So far as our agricultural exports are concerned, 23 per cent have gone to countries that are now members of the European Community. This worried western farmers and Prairie people generally, especially with the loss of the British preference in selling our products to that traditional market for western agriculture. I can remember some years ago the very, very serious concern expressed by farm organizations and responsible farm leaders generally as to the impact on Western agriculture of the loss of the British preference and the imposition of higher tariff duties under the European Community arrangements. There were many criers of doom; there were many who said this would add to the woes, already numerous at that time, of western agriculture. I think, however, that time has shown that although there certainly will be problems in the future, the situation is not quite as bad as we had feared it would be.

A good part of this, of course, is because of the change in the food supply situation. Suddenly, almost overnight it seems, we ran into short supply. We were unable to meet the food requirements of a hungry world, and suddenly that much maligned entrepreneur, the Canadian farmer—who has been the subject of undue economic oppression as a result of a variety of policies—came into his own and is able now to achieve reasonable prices for his products. Because of this growing demand for food, which I believe will exist for a very long time, although there will be undoubtedly shifts in demands, it seems to me that Europe and other parts of the world will more and more need our agricultural products. Now, this does not indicate that we should sit back quietly and just allow them to come and buy from us. There is an increasing production of barley and wheat in the European Community. The Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs reports, as a matter of fact, that the European Community is a net exporter of barley, which is a very important feed grain. Wheat has been grown in larger and larger quantities in these European countries, and the committee points out that by 1980 it is possible that even Europe will be a net exporter of that staple commodity.

In my opinion these figures, in the light of new circumstances, probably could be revised. I believe that in spite of higher tariffs there will be a strong market for Canadian wheat, that very superior-quality grain, in these European countries. Feed grain will be a problem also, but with the growing affluence of Europe, with the growing demand for red meat and other meat products and proteins, I suggest that there will be a growing demand for Canadian agricultural products. I remarked a little earlier that we could not sit back and wait for these countries to come to us. I suggest to members of the Senate that it will require a great deal of Canadian salesmanship, good marketing policies and studies in depth to cultivate the European market for our agricultural and, indeed, other products.

I agree with this conclusion of the committee, which reads:

> The committee is convinced that Western European markets offer Canada the most important prospect for diversification of its exports, particularly of semi-processed and manufactured goods.

I concur with that, but I again hasten to add that I believe agricultural products could be added to that recommendation in the light of the changes to which I have referred. There is an old Chinese saying, the correctness of which I am not quite sure, that the Chinese characters for crisis and opportunity are exactly the same. I have not checked with any of my Chinese friends as to whether this is true, but it is certainly a good allegory in that crisis does lead to opportunity. In my opinion there is a tremendous opportunity for Canadian know-how to assist exporters get into the European markets.

I had a refreshing talk at noon today with a friend. That may startle the learned members of the Opposition, but this friend, a great idea man, is a former Minister of Agriculture, the Honourable Alvin Hamilton. I hasten to add that I may not always agree with his ideas, but certainly he is very knowledgeable in this field and a source of inspiration for many things that Canadians can and should be doing. I asked for his opinion with respect to the European Community and he agreed with me that the crisis is now our opportunity.

● (1420)

There are many things that we could do. Already we are shipping fresh meat by air. Europeans are willing to pay the price for it. Some are now affluent enough to afford this luxury which some Canadians cannot afford. There is a growing demand for the movement of fresh meat by air, and certainly for the transport of large quantities of livestock, feed grains, and protein-rich products. All this will take market development; it does not happen overnight.

I think Canadian cheddar cheese could find its way into the European market. Ontario producers have been successful in promoting cheddar cheese as something of a luxury item in Great Britain, where people have developed a liking for it. With marketing studies and salesmanship we might be able to sell this product in other parts of Europe. This is the type of challenge that the European Economic Community provides.

Our Maritime provinces are having problems marketing their apples. I think that their market could be expanded to meet a possible European demand. It seems to me that the great potential market of hundreds of millions of Western Europeans provides a great opportunity for us. That market is here for us to develop if we prepare the groundwork intelligently and aggressively and play our cards right. I look forward to the business that we will do with the European Economic Community. It will make previous figures fade into insignificance.

We can talk to the European Community about the products we have to offer and their need for them. I am not just referring to agricultural products. I suggest to you that a wise European Community would look at its supply requirements covering a variety of important resource materials. We cannot manufacture and process all our resource materials, but some we can. The European Community is going to need supplies of lumber, iron ore, and a variety of other resources which we have to offer. It seems to me that aggressive action on the part of our government could persuade our European counterparts to provide markets for our products. We must assure them that to the best of our ability we can supply the materials which are so essential to the growing development of Western Europe.

This is the type of thing that I see happening in Canadian agriculture and industry generally as a result of the Common Market. Granted, there will be disruptions. Agreed, there will be changes in pattern. But looking forward to the growing affluence of Europe, in my opinion the opportunities for Canadian business in Europe, for Canadian exports, for the kind of thing that Canada does best, are greater than ever before. I hope that Canadian trade offices, and Canadian businessmen, will rise to the challenge and meet the new opportunities.

Hon. Ernest C. Manning: Honourable senators, I should like to make a few comments on this resolution which is before us. First of all, I join sincerely in commending the committee for its excellent work and on the report it has produced. I hope all members of this house agree with the major conclusions that have been stated, and have perhaps a deeper appreciation of the importance and the opportunity that attaches to Canada's closer ties with the European Common Market.

I was much impressed with the remarks last evening of Senator Rowe, who presented to this house some significant observations on the whole area of international relations, and on our domestic attitudes which affect our dependence on other countries. I am sure we all appreciated the constructive remarks just made by Senator Buckwold.

I share the conclusion that Canada is well advised to establish the closest possible ties with the European Common Market. While the formation of that bloc and Britain's entry into that bloc certainly does create problems for Canada in the trade areas, it does at the same time afford some significant opportunities.

We are all aware that this is a period of significant realignment in trade patterns and international relationships on a world-wide scale. As you study what is going on in this regard you notice that such relationships are influenced by both abstract and concrete factors. By abstract factors I mean matters such as the traditional ties that have existed for a long time between various nations and groups of people. Probably the greatest example is the Commonwealth. For many years the nations of the Commonwealth have enjoyed particular ties with other member nations, and those traditional ties are strong influences in the decisions and the judgments that are made.

International relationships are influenced by racial and cultural ties through which one nation finds a natural affinity with the aspirations and ideals of another. But perhaps more than in previous times these realignments of international trade arrangements and international relationships are being influenced today by factors that are very concrete. These primarily are the demands of economic necessity.

It is undoubtedly true to say that Britain's entry into the Common Market was dictated by economic necessity. In fact, from the reports we hear, the general attitude of the people of Great Britain, the man in the street, is unfavourable to Britain's entry into the Common Market. This may well be, because the man in the street is influenced more by abstract considerations, by sentimental and emotional factors than by the cold, hard economic facts that moved the Government of Great Britain to take the step that brought Britain into the Common Market bloc.

We have seen this same factor at work in the last year or so in the United States in the realignment of its trade position. These changes certainly have been dictated to a large degree by the serious economic factor of the adverse U.S. balance of payments. They arrived at a position where it was an economic necessity to get more exports and to curtail their imports of goods from other countries. This led them to devalue their currency in order to stimulate export trade and curb the volume of goods imported. The results certainly demonstrated once more how closely our economy is tied to the economy of the United States.

● (1430)

Our dollar moved almost parallel with theirs in the steps to devaluation which they have taken in the past eighteen months. When their dollar drops, our dollar drops. The actual devaluation, in relation to the stronger currencies of Europe, particularly the German mark, is now in the neighbourhood of 18 per cent. Very few Canadians realize that our dollar has been devalued to that extent, because the bulk of our trade is with the United States. As long as our dollar and theirs remain in relative parity, our people do not see the significance that they would recognize if we were heavily dependent on imports from countries other than the United States.

Honourable senators, these developments emphasize the importance of our giving attention to the pertinent factors which influence our international relationships, be they trade relationships or otherwise.

Senator Rowe commented last evening on an experience in his area of Canada, which demonstrated its dependence on foreign capital to bring about some of the major industrial and resource developments in Newfoundland. I have a great appreciation of what he said because over thirty years ago we went through almost the same experience in Western Canada. In the late 1930s, when interest developed in the possibility of significant oil development in Alberta, both the government and industry made representations, particularly to the investment houses of Montreal and Toronto, to try to get Canadian investment capital for the potential oil development in the West. I am sorry to say that, as Senator Rowe said about Newfoundland, we met with practically no success. At that particular period, mining development in Northern Ontario, and pulpwood development in Quebec, were the areas to which Canadian investment capital was being directed. The attitude was cold towards risking capital in what was regarded as a highly speculative possibility of significant oil development in Western Canada.

Following our disappointment at not being able to interest Canadian capital, in 1938 we sent a delegation to London, England, made up of representatives of the province and the petroleum industry, to see if we could interest British capital. There was a considerable interest and the response was favourable. But in 1938, war clouds were gathering over the continent of Europe and the resulting uncertainty prevented any significant action being taken.

It was at that stage that, having been frustrated in trying to get Canadian capital and unsuccessful in getting British capital, we turned our attention to trying to interest American capital in oil development in Alberta. In this effort we met with outstanding success.

All this emphasizes that there are regions in this country that are forced to depend on outside capital to obtain the development of their resources.

It is important to recognize that for the foreseeable future it will continue to be important for Canada to have access to large amounts of foreign capital. Attitudes or actions which prejudice that access are detrimental to Canada's best interests.

There is in this country today, and I suppose in other countries, a strange inconsistency in the attitude of the public, and of governments, to this whole question of international relationships. In the matter of social concern there is very strong advocacy that we forget about national boundaries and that the people of each part of the world should be deeply concerned about the social and economic needs of people in all countries. I agree completely with that conclusion. However, it is paradoxical that along with this urging of people to ignore nationalism and national boundaries and let their social concerns be worldwide in scope, at the very same time in the political and economic areas of concern there are developing strong pressures for greater nationalism.

In the United States a strong sentiment is running towards a more isolationist position. Part of this is due to the economic necessity to which I have referred. Part of it is due to public backlash against the constant complaints and criticisms levelled against the United States by other nations.

To be fair, we must recognize that no other country in this world has been more generous in spending its money on assistance to other nations than the United States, and regrettably probably no nation has made more enemies in the process.

We can understand the people of the United States coming to the place where, having taxed themselves hundreds of billions of dollars for foreign aid—and getting in return complaints and criticisms and condemnation on how they handle their domestic affairs and their role in international affairs, particularly during the Vietnam War—it is understandable that Americans should say, "Perhaps the best thing for us to do is to look after ourselves and let the rest of the world do the same."

In our own country we are hearing from a number of vocal groups who are advocating what I have frequently referred to as a dangerous negative nationalism. In my judgment the Kierans and the Gordons and the Hurtigs, and the groups they represent, are doing irreparable damage to the best interests of this country, even though their intentions may be the best. They are giving the impression abroad that Canada is anti-foreign capital, is anti-American and that Canada desires to be more nationalistic. Those impressions in the long run can be extremely damaging to the best interests of this country, and I suggest it is of the utmost importance that the federal government make Canada's official position crystal clear in the capitals of the world with which we deal, and particularly in Washington. In my view, the Canadian government has not done so.

Like a lot of other people, I spend a considerable amount of time in the United States. I talk to many businessmen and men in public life in the United States. I am increasingly disturbed by the growing belief among Americans that the Canadian government is anti-American; and, of course, this is regarded as a reflection of what they feel must be the attitude of the Canadian people. This is something the government of this country should take effective steps to correct.

• (1440)

If I may digress for a moment, a classic illustration of what I mean is what we are hearing today in connection with the growing oil shortage on this continent. There are strong voices in Canada today saying that we should look after our own requirements and let the United States look after themselves. Why should we be concerned with the fact that they are facing a very serious domestic oil shortage? I have a long enough memory to remember what happened at the time of the last World War. I wish more Canadians would remember. At the time that war broke out, the importation of petroleum products from the United States was the largest single trade item for which Canada had to find scarce American dollars. At that time Canadian production did not begin to meet Canadian requirements and we were dependent on imported oil to a very large degree. The bulk of it came from the United States.

When Pearl Harbour occurred and the United States was propelled into the Second World War, I remember the governments' very deep concern, both provincial and federal, about what position we would be in in Canada if the United States said, "We are sorry, Canada, but we are having to ration gasoline for our own people so we cannot go on exporting oil to meet your requirements." If the United States had taken that position, frankly, I do not know what would have happened to Canada. You could not get offshore oil in those days. The Atlantic was swarming with submarines. Tankers were their favourite prey, and in any event the tankers were needed to carry oil to the war theatre in Europe. We were wholly dependent on the willingness of the American government to permit oil exports to Canada to continue.

I say it is to the credit of the American government and their people that, when they were forced to ration gasoline in the United States, without any argument they readily agreed to treat Canadians exactly the same as Americans, and as long as our gasoline rationing system paralleled theirs, they continued to export to Canada on the same basis as they provided for their own people.

Honourable senators, I become disturbed today when I hear Canadians suggest cutting off oil to the United States. Here we are at a point in time when the situation, in a sense, is reversed. We now have more oil than we need in Canada; in our tar sands in Alberta alone we have a potential recovery of at least 300 billion barrels of crude, the largest known oil supply in any one place in the world; yet you have people running around this country today saying, "Let us cut off selling oil to the United States. What if they can't get all the oil they need? That is no concern of ours, we are going to look after ourselves!" I say to you that such attitudes do not redound to Canada's credit and they will not in the long run redound to Canada's interests.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Manning: Canada's best interests are not incompatible with a constructive relationship with other nations, and particularly with our neighbour nation on whom we are dependent for so many things, whether we like it or not.

As I have already said, our economy is tied to theirs. Whatever happens to their economy, we will experience the same trends very quickly. In the matter of hemispheric security we are almost 100 per cent dependent on the United States. We draw a great deal of our technical research and knowhow from the United States. These are matters which require the intelligent consideration of the Canadian people and some very firm leadership on the part of the Canadian government when dealing with this whole question of international relationships and the realignments taking place at the present time.

I would offer one other observation in closing. It relates to a concept we do not often hear discussed but which I suggest has considerable merit. When we are dealing with international relationships and the flow of capital between nations, the extent of foreign ownership in Canada and of Canadian ownership in other countries, we should give more attention to what might be called "net national sovereignty." We hear today that "we shouldn't let foreign capital come into Canada" and "we can't let a foreign firm own something in Canada" or "we are going to lose our national sovereignty". I suggest that we should be more concerned with net national sovereignty than with individual transactions.

If the citizens of one country acquire a position, economic or financial, in any other country, to that extent they acquire a degree of control in the country where they operate. We really have no knowledge in Canada today of the extent to which this offsets the effect of the ownership and control of foreign companies in our own nation. You often hear it referred to, though little attention seems to be paid to it, that on a per capita basis the people of Canada have a bigger stake in the United States than the people of the United States have in Canada. Admittedly, that does not tell the whole story, because even a large per capita stake on the part of a small population country is not a very significant influence on the economy of a nation the size of the United States; whereas, a rather small investment from the standpoint of their population in a country like Canada can have a significant influence. But, to date, little or no attention has been paid to this concept of net national sovereignty, which has great potential for a small population country like Canada.

We hear a lot of criticism about multinational companies, and some of the criticisms are certainly valid. But, honourable senators, I think you will agree that multinational companies can be one instrument through which a nation with a relatively small population can acquire a significant economic stake in the economy of another country in which those companies operate.

So far as Canada is concerned, rather than discouraging multinational companies, I should like to see some leadership given in using multinational companies as an instrument to improve Canada's net national sovereignty in a way that could be very much in the interests of this country.

I will not detain you longer, but the committee's report raises fundamental issues on almost a worldwide scale and it should certainly be given very serious attention by the Canadian people and by the Government of Canada. The great need, as I have said, is for strong leadership. When you have matters in which people's judgments are influenced by sentimental factors rather than by the realities of economics and the long-range effects of what we do, that is not a time when you can let a broad general consensus be the deciding factor.

As I said earlier, if Great Britain had followed that course, it would not be in the Common Market today. The government gave leadership in a direction contrary to public opinion, recognizing that that public opinion was based on sentimental considerations rather than on considerations which in the long run will advance the interests of all British people. I wish we could get away from government by popularity polls in Canada. This business of having to see what the latest Gallup poll says before the government can make up its mind on what policy it is going to adopt, in my judgment, is one of the most disastrous things that can happen to a country. A leader ought to be out in front leading, and not waiting to find out first what the public opinion polls are saying and then deciding, "We can capitalize on a certain public whim to our political advantage and so that will be our policy until the next poll comes out." These are areas where Canada needs to make major changes, if we are going to play the role we should play domestically and in the broad field of international relationships.

● (1450)

Hon. Mr. Buckwold: Would the honourable senator allow a question? It is in no way critical of anything that you said, Senator Manning, but I would be interested in an answer to this question which is bothering many Canadians.

You came to the defence of some of the multinational concerns, and you made specific reference to the oil companies. In your opinion has the pricing of energy products by our multinational oil companies during these last several months been in the best interests of the country, keeping in mind your observation that we did not have a shortage of energy supplies in Canada?

Hon. Mr. Manning: There have been charges made, particularly in the United States, that multinational oil companies created an artificial shortage of petroleum products in order to jack up prices and enhance their profits. All I can say on that point is that to the best of my knowledge no concrete evidence has been produced to establish that charge. On the question of price increases in Canada as a result of shortages in the United States, this, I suppose, is one of the inevitable consequences of multinational company operations. On the other hand, it is not all bad. If you are going to interfere artificially with the price of a commodity in a certain area because it happens not to be in a short supply in that area, then you are going to play complete havoc with the economy of the country.

I think, Senator Buckwold, you will agree with me that in Saskatchewan, Manitoba, and Alberta, if the surplus of wheat in the Prairie provinces was accepted as an argument for saying, "Look, we have wheat coming out of our ears so the price should be 30 cents a bushel because we have so much of it," it would be absolutely disastrous to our agricultural industry. We expect our wheat prices to be governed by world prices, and I do not think you can expect to treat oil too much differently. Somebody always gets hurt, but in balance more people get hurt when you impose artificial price controls in certain areas and dislocate the whole natural play of economic factors.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Honourable senators, if no other honourable senator wishes to speak at this time I will move the adjournment of the debate.

On motion of Senator Langlois, debate adjourned.

MEXICO

STATE OF THE UNION ADDRESS BY PRESIDENT— INVITATION TO SENATE SPEAKER

Hon. Donald Cameron rose pursuant to notice:

> That he will call the attention of the Senate to the invitation of the President of Mexico to the Speaker of the Senate to be present when he delivers his third State of the Union Address.

He said: Honourable senators, some weeks ago our distinguished Speaker of the Senate received a personal invitation from the President of Mexico to be his guest at his third State of the Union Address in the Congress Hall in Mexico City on Saturday, September 1.

Due to the calling of the emergency session of Parliament, Madam Speaker was unable to go, and she inquired of the Mexican authorities if a substitute would be acceptable. The Mexican authorities with their usual gracious courtesy replied in the affirmative, and accordingly Her Honour telephoned me to see if I would be free to go. I was highly honoured and privileged by the invitation, and while I am sure that Madam Speaker would have made a much more gracious presence than mine, I was nevertheless delighted to go in Her Honour's place. It brought to my mind the old adage that it is an ill wind that blows nobody good. In this case I was the beneficiary of that wind.

While Madam Speaker had to remain here and participate in an all-night session resulting from the peccadilloes of a recalcitrant group of railroad workers, I had the extremely interesting pleasure and privilege of participating in an international exchange.

The Canadian guests invited by the President of Mexico were Mr. Hugh Aitken, President of the Canadian Export Development Corporation, and his wife; the Honourable Claude Bennett, Minister of Industry and Tourism of the province of Ontario; and the Honourable Guy Saint-Pierre, Minister of Industry and Commerce of the province of Quebec, and his wife.

As a representative of the federal Parliament, it was my privilege to act as leader of the Canadian delegation which was the largest and most senior of those present. The Honourable Jeanne Sauvé, Minister of Science and Technology, had been invited along with Madam Speaker but, for the same reasons as Madam Speaker, had to forego the pleasure. She had to report for a higher duty in Ottawa.

Altogether there were 21 foreign guests, and they included such people as Francois Ortoli, Director of the European Economic Community, a man with whom Senator Lamontagne and I had the pleasure of spending some time during the visit of the Senate Special Committee on Science Policy to Belgium in 1969. Mr. Ortoli gave his usual good account of himself and spoke for the European Economic Community.

The foreign guests also included Mr. Lecat, the French Minister of State for Finance; William Jorden of the National Security Council in Washington; Rodman Rockefeller, President of the International Basic Economy Corporation of New York; and Huang Hua, the permanent representative of China at the United Nations and, as you will remember, the first Chinese Ambassador to Ottawa. I had the pleasure of two or three chats with Mr. Huang Hua, and I was impressed with his frankness in discussing what they consider to be the very serious situation which exists on the border between Russia and China at the present time. Russia was represented by Mr. Georgy S. Dzotsenidze, Vice-President of the Presidium of the USSR.

In addition there were a number of distinguished journalists representing the leading newspapers and press agencies of the world.

It was my duty and privilege to present to President Echeverria a letter of sympathy and condolence to the people of Mexico from Prime Minister Trudeau and the people of Canada, on the great hardship and suffering caused by recent floods and earthquakes.

May I interject here that it is hard for us to understand the effect of the flooding on that particular part of the country. The floods took place in a very flat area, where the highway grades are elevated about six feet above the surrounding countryside. When these rains and floods came down the valleys, the highways had the effect of acting as dams, building up a head of sometimes eight or 10 feet of water. When these dams inevitably broke, as they did in many cases, the waters flooded through the villages and towns. As many of the homes of the ordinary peasants and workers in Mexico are built of adobe—and we know what happens when they become soaked with water—the result was that in some of the towns and cities 40 per cent of the homes were destroyed. So they have a tremendous job of rebuilding.

● (1500)

Although I had no authority to speak for the Government of Canada, I made inquiries as to the attitude of the Mexican government toward assistance from other countries, but again President Echeverria took the line that they have always taken—"Thank you very much, but we are quite competent, and confident that we can go it alone." They are independent and self-reliant people, and this quality was impressed on me very much in more than one meeting in that country.

In addition to the presentation of the letter to the President on behalf of the Prime Minister, I had the privilege of presenting on behalf of Her Honour the Speaker of the Senate a similar letter. I also had the pleasure of presenting the official gift on behalf of the Speaker to President and Senora Echeverria.

The hospitality of our Mexican hosts was most gracious and generous, leaving nothing to be desired. Tremendous opportunities were provided to meet cabinet ministers and senior government officials for the purpose of discussing mutually important Mexican-Canadian problems. No matter with whom we talked there was a warm relationship and a desire to cultivate closer relationships with Canada at every level—social, economic and cultural.

In my own case I had a meeting with Senator Aguilar, the head of the Mexican Committee on Health and Welfare, and with the Senate Foreign Affairs Chairman, Senator Carrillo, a very charming man. I also had the pleasure of spending an evening discussing science policy with the minister, Senor Bueno, and his director general, Senor Carrillo who, incidentally, is a son of Senator Carrillo. This was an invaluable opportunity to exchange ideas and to see how the Mexican authorites were organizing their National Council of Science and Technology, CONACYT. We discussed the possible loan of a senior officer of the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce to the Mexican authorities at a mutually convenient time for the purpose of giving them any assistance that could be given by Canada in their attempt to build a national science policy for that country.

I had the opportunity of meeting Senor Figuero, the organizer of the World Silvercrafts Exhibition which is being held in Taxco next November. Senor Figuero expressed a desire to make arrangements to invite either the Royal Winnipeg Ballet or the National Ballet Company to perform at this festival and, being a Westerner, of course, I had to give the nod to Winnipeg. I assured him, however, that in either case they would be very desirable representatives of Canada in that field, and that if it would fit into their timetable I was sure they would be happy to go. I undertook to see what I could do to ensure that this comes about.

I found considerable interest in management education, and discussed having Mexican executives from both the private and the public sector attend Canadian business management schools, and especially the Banff School of Advanced Management.

Finally, I had discussions with Senor Campillo-Saenz, Deputy Minister of Industry and Commerce, with a view to furthering trade relations between Canada and Mexico, and also with a view to having Mexican executives come to Canada for management education. I explored with him and Foreign Minister Rabasa the idea of a parliamentary exchange. They are most favourable to this and they hope, and I am sure that Madam Speaker will be hearing of this very shortly, to arrange the same kind of exchange we have had with the Americans for some time. In my opinion, this is a very desirable type of exchange.

I must say that I was tremendously impressed with the courtesy and the willingness to assist in every way possible of Senor Zapata, the Under-Secretary to the President and of the President's Special Assistant, Mr. Alonso. These two men went to great lengths to make sure that every guest had the opportunity to meet everyone they wished to see, and to gather any information that they desired.

I would like to take a minute or two to give some account of what the ministers representing the provinces were doing. Mr. Bennett and Mr. Saint-Pierre met separately with the Minister of Industry and Commerce, Torres Manzo. Mr. Saint-Pierre also met with Mr. Farrell, the head of the Federal Electricity Commission. Mr. Bennett met with Mr. Olachea, the head of the tourist department, because tourism comes under Mr. Bennett's direction. Mr. Aitken had a wide variety of business meetings, including those with the head of the National Finance Commission. In addition, all the members of our group had frequent opportunities for informal talks with Foreign Minister Rabasa, Under-Secretary Zapata, and a large cross-section of Mexican ministers, senior officials and business representatives.

Among the main points emerging from these meetings were the following: Minister Torres Manzo told Mr. Saint-Pierre of a series of problems he saw in connection with trade between Canada and Mexico. This included the questions of tariffs, quotas, fruit and vegetable standards and so on. They also expressed some concern with respect to the percentage of U.S. ownership of Canadian companies and the lack of Canadian industrial interest in developments in Mexico. Our ambassador, who is a very energetic and effective man, Mr. Schwarzmann, undertook to correct some of the false impressions that they had at that time.

Mr. Saint-Pierre expressed interest in expanding trade with Mexico and suggested a possible area of co-operation in the exchange of expertise and technology between PEMEX, which is the Mexican oil complex, and the hydroelectric sectors in Quebec. Mr. Torres Manzo seemed interested in this, and undertook to follow it up by means of talks with the Canadian ambassador. He also referred to areas of possible co-operation with Canada in GATT, UNCTAD, and various other international organizations. Mr. Saint-Pierre indicated to the embassy the possible interest on the part of the Quebec government in establishing a trade office in Mexico City. Mr. Bennett made strong representations to Mr. Torres Manzo regarding the bid of Litton Industries for an airport traffic control system to be established in Mexico. Mr. Bennett also explored the possibility of the export of auto parts from Ontario, in view of the Mexican automotive policy. With respect to this point the possibility of joint ventures between Mexico and Canada was emphasized, and it was suggested that Mexico might make an arrangement with Canada similar to that which has been made between Volkswagen Brazil and Volkswagen Mexico. He suggested that this arrangement might be extended by this company as far as Canada and Mexico are concerned.

Mr. Bennett referred to the invitation to the national financial experts to visit Canada for a meeting with some 10 Ontario firms regarding possible joint ventures in Mexico. This referred specifically to machinery and equipment studies made by advisers to the UN in Mexico, which were discussed by our commercial counsellor, Mr. Sirrs, with the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce last spring. Mr. Torres Manzo suggested that the Deputy Minister of Industry and Commerce and his representatives would also wish to accompany the national finance representatives to Canada when these talks were held.

Mr. Saint-Pierre suggested to Mr. Farrell of the Federal Electricity Commission the possibility of co-operation with Mexico in the petroleum and hydraulic sectors. Mr. Farrell invited Hydro-Quebec to send technicians to Mexico to examine their projects. Mr. Saint-Pierre also undertook on his return to invite the Mexican Federal Electricity Commission technicians to the Hydro-Quebec Research Institute for training.

Honourable senators, this will give you some idea of the kinds of things that went on between the Canadian representatives and the Mexican authorities.

I come now to the raison d'être of our visit to Mexico, the Third Annual State of the Union Address by President Echeverria. Before going to the meeting at 11 o'clock on Saturday morning, September 1, we were advised that the speech would be three hours in length. When you know something like that in advance it is quite a deterrent. I have that speech and it is a masterly presentation of the entire kaleidoscope—

● (1510)

Hon. Mr. Asselin: Do you intend to read it?

Hon. Mr. Cameron: No.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Dispense.

Hon. Mr. Cameron: It is a masterly presentation of the entire kaleidoscope of the Mexican social, economic and cultural scene today. The President dealt with this under six headings, as follows: Domestic Policy, Foreign Policy, Development Policy, Educational Policy, Social Policy and Economic Policy.

I must say at this time that I was very impressed with this man, and those who saw him when he was here in the latter part of March and early April of this year must have been impressed with him too. He is a tremendously vital and dynamic character. He is, I like to think, a man who is innovative in his thinking as far as the economic situation today is concerned, and God knows we need some innovation in our whole economic outlook. One of the things that appall and frighten me today, particularly in light of the report issued by the members of the International Monetary Fund in the last couple of days wherein they are projecting that the inflationary spiral is going to get worse in the next few months, with no end in sight, is that our economic experts—not only Canadian experts but experts from throughout the world—after the Smithsonian meeting, and other meetings in London and various other places, have absolutely no solutions to offer. The inflationary spiral worsens. Those of us who remember the dirty thirties cannot help but be frightened that we are on the slippery slope that could lead to a depression worse than we have ever seen. We hope this does not happen, but it seems to me that there is a tremendous need for some new thinking, some new innovation, and some new attempt to arrive at a different form of exchange between nations which will avoid the kind of situation in which we find ourselves at the present time.

I should like to take a few moments to describe Mexican domestic policy. Mexico has a growth index of 3.5 per cent per year. It also has a population growth of 3.5 per cent year, one of the highest in the world. It is a frightening population growth. At the present time the population of Mexico is 56 million. They expect it to double in the next 20 years, and that they will begin the 21st century with 135 million people. The challenge to feed, house, educate and employ these millions is a task of Herculean proportions. I will not go into that any further at the present time.

In respect of foreign policy, Mexico follows the principle of universality. They are committed to good relations with all countries, including those as diverse in their political systems as Cuba, Brazil and Chile.

At this point I should like to refer to the tragedy which occurred in Chile yesterday, and in that connection I will quote what President Echeverria had to say with respect to the state visit of President Allende:

> In reciprocity to the State visit I paid to the Republic of Chile, its President, Dr. Salvador Allende, came to Mexico as our guest. During his stay, the agreements approved in Santiago to intensify trade between the two countries were drawn up. A line of credit to facilitate these operations was opened and we signed an Agreement for Scientific and Technical Cooperation.

There is more, but I will not go into it now. I do want to observe that what happened in Chile yesterday is a great tragedy. One does not need to be an admirer of marxism or socialism, or even a sympathizer, to realize that President Allende was a man who was dedicated to improving the lot of millions of poor peons in Chile. As recently as last March he increased substantially the vote he received in the previous election. I am afraid the shots that were fired in Chile yesterday mark the beginning of a confrontation that will sweep most of South America in the years to come.

It is rather interesting that I should have been in Mexico just prior to this. Those of you who will remember the Mexico of 1910-1920 will recall that that country went through a series of revolutions. Today it is evident that Mexico has a stable government, a government that has the support of the people and a government that is independent and self-reliant to an amazing extent.

It is inevitable that there will be conflict in the South American countries until they go through the same trauma that Mexico went through during the period between 1910 and 1920. Franklin D. Roosevelt, when he was President of the United States in 1932, said that the economic royalists and the Bourbons never learn from history. I think that is true and understandable, because the wealthy, the church, the privileged in these poor countries are determined to hold on to everything they have. That is a perfectly understandable human reaction. However, the number of poor is getting so large, and the conditions under which so many of the people live so deplorable, that a tremendous upheaval in those countries, is inevitable.

The Mexicans are proud of the fact that Latin America is the first denuclearized region in the world, and they intend to keep it that way. They are particularly proud of their arrangements for economic co-operation with Canada, and they look forward to extending those arrangements in the future.

In respect of development policy, the basic economic health of the country depends on the vitality of the farmers. The government has introduced programs to upgrade the productivity, the health and the social amenities of the farming population, particularly the small holders. They are greatly extending irrigation to make the land more productive. It is interesting to note that there are 10 million of these small holders who make their living from growing corn and beans. The government has recently introduced a program of guaranteed floor prices for these crops, which will return to the farmers an increase of from 25 to 35 per cent. There is much more.

I was very interested in what the President had to say about educational policy, and I thought that he was saying many of the same things that Canadian educators are saying in this country. In this connection I will quote just one or two excerpts. I might say that he received standing ovations time and time again in relation to this, as was the case in relation to many other portions of his speech. He said:

> One of the main aims of this educational reform is to create and encourage studies that will make it possible for the youth to participate in the productive life of the nation without the need for many years of training. It is also designed to eliminate the harmful and elitist mirage of considering that a higher education is the only one capable of giving prestige to the individual and of providing him with an adequate standard of living.

There are many distinguished Canadian educators who are saying the same thing today in relation to Canada. He went on to say:

> The Constitution did not eliminate titles of nobility from our country only to replace them with professional titles.
>
> Professional degrees must not serve to indicate a supposed superiority, but only to identify the citizens who owe more to society because they have received more from it.

And that is a message that applies equally well in this country. He continued:

> Serious frustration is felt by our students when their university degree fails to provide them with the advantages which collective pretence had promised them and when they find that they are unable to serve the community as much as they would have liked.
>
> This disenchantment is, among others, one of the underlying reasons for the problems which affect our main institutions of learning.

And again, honourable senators, we can apply that to Canada. Finally, in this connection, he said:

> Our policy in the field of public education must not be examined by itself but within the frame of reference of government action. The fruit it bears will depend on the progress achieved by the country as a whole.
>
> Society is the main teaching agent and the school only shares in a part of the process. We are carrying out an educational reform which is not limited exclusively to didactic modifications. Its principal objective, as we have already said, is to change our mental structures.

● (1520)

> The aims which guide us are oriented toward shaping a culture which, without divorcing itself from universal humanism and science, will emphasize the traits of our own identity, will be consistent with our needs and will assure our cultural and economic independence.

Under "Social Policy" the president announced an increase of 15 per cent in all wages and salaries for those in the lower echelons of the public service, the lower echelons of the workers and the armed forces. He announced an improvement of labour laws, including the right to strike and improved wage and education facilities.

Under "Economic Policy" he indicated that the GNP rose by 7.5 per cent in 1972. I should like to quote from his last comment in this area. In discussing the question of foreign debt, he said:

> Having decreased the prospects of foreign debt to which we resorted excessively in the past, our economic equilibrium depends, essentially, on the fair contribution of private enterprise to public expenditure. Wealth which is spent on superfluous consumption must be transferred to a much greater degree to the achievement of the basic aims of the community. This is the main mechanism necessary for the redistribution of income . . .
>
> But if out of fear of inflation we were to permit income to continue to concentrate in a few hands, we would endanger the stability of the country and its possibilities for authentic development.

> We need, therefore, to simultaneously restrain inflation, promote growth and redistribute income. To this end, we have set in motion an economic program which will equally meet excessive demand, insufficient supply and abuses in speculation.

The Mexican government is committed to maintaining a fixed foreign exchange rate of 12 pesos to the dollar. They are determined to reach this, and this is providing for a stable economy in that country.

In closing I want to say that I have been impressed over the years by the people who do things and achieve things. Usually they are people who have greater strength and more energy than the average. After President Echeverria had delivered this address, which took exactly three hours and four minutes, the President of the Congress found himself in the most difficult spot I have ever seen a man in, for he had to express his thanks off the cuff, not having seen the address and thus not knowing what was in it. However, for 20 minutes he spoke very well and intelligently. The president went from that room to a reception line, where he stood for two hours receiving the parliamentarians and other dignitaries who were there. From there he immediately went to his own plane and flew to Taxco, in the area devastated by earthquakes and floods, and he was meeting people until 12 midnight.

This was just one day's exercise. They tell me that this man is often in his office at 5 o'clock in the morning and does not leave until midnight. That is the kind of dedication, drive and determination that this great Mexican is displaying today as an example to all his people. I have the feeling that this man, who is relatively young, is one of the men to watch on the world scene. He is a man of tremendous energy, drive and imagination; a man who, I repeat, possesses some of those innovative qualities that are necessary if we are to find solutions to some of the increasingly complex and disturbing problems that face us all today.

I want to say again, Madam Speaker, that, thanks to your inability to go, it was a great privilege and pleasure for me to be your representative, to represent the Senate at this important and impressive gathering.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I trust you will permit me to express my gratitude to Senator Cameron for replacing me at this gathering, when President Echeverria delivered the Third State of the Union Address in Mexico City. From his report it seems to me that this was a valuable visit, and that Canadians may learn very much from it. Probably in the future it will lead to closer understanding and more co-operation between our two countries, which apparently is something that the Mexican people would like.

Hon. Eugene A. Forsey: Honourable senators, I should like, if I might, to rise for just a moment to express my strong concurrence with something Senator Cameron said about the tragedy yesterday in Chile. I suppose it is not strictly in order, but as he has now referred to it I might perhaps be allowed a moment to underline what he said.

In my judgment, this was a tragedy not only for Chile and for South America, but for the world. Here was a case where there seemed to be some hope that revolutionary developments, which I think were highly necessary in that country, whether or not they may be elsewhere, would be carried through by democratic and constitutional means. It now appears that that hope has been destroyed, and I cannot help feeling that this will provide sad ammunition for subversive elements throughout the world, who will be in a position to say as far as this South American country is concerned, and to say to the other countries there, "Learn the lesson. The thing is hopeless. It cannot be done except by violence."

To my mind this is a great tragedy far beyond the bounds of South America, and I was glad to be able to hear from the gallery in the other place certain sentiments that I think were highly appropriate on this subject, from both sides of the house.

Hon. Mr. Burchill: May I ask Senator Cameron if there were any language problems?

Hon. Mr. Cameron: No, thanks, as usual, to the capacity of other people to learn our language better than we learn theirs. All of the officials with whom we conferred spoke English very well indeed. However, as one who has a little of Alberta's fractured French, I think it is easier to follow the Spanish than the French.

Hon. Mr. Walker: Might I ask Senator Cameron a question? Is the fantastic increase in births contemplated in Mexico just a natural development, or is it the president's policy to foster such an increase? Having regard to the necessity to limit the world population, are they proud of what seems to be an amazing projected increase? I thought the church wielded some influence there. Does it still? What is the reason for this?

Hon. Mr. Cameron: I am asked if it is a natural phenomenon. I would say that the answer must be yes. On the other hand, in his speech the president announced, without spelling it out, that he would be introducing measures to deal with this population explosion, which he considered a very serious problem. However, he said that because of the complexity of the problem and its wide ramifications in so many areas of the community, he wanted a little more time to work out the details in consultation with the people who would be affected, with the people who would really be the gatekeepers of public opinion, and who would carry out the educational campaign necessary to control this population explosion, which is worrying them very much.

The Hon. the Speaker: If no other honourable senator wishes to participate in this debate, the inquiry is considered to have been debated.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Thursday, September 13, 1973

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

DISTINGUISHED VISITORS IN GALLERY

ANN-MARIE HORNE AND DAVID McTAGGART

Hon. Daniel A. Lang: Honourable senators, before we commence the business of the day, I wonder if I might have leave to introduce two very distinguished young visitors in our gallery this afternoon. I personally have great admiration for these young people, an admiration which I believe is shared by hundreds of thousands of people around the world.

I think it was the Hudson Institute or the Club of Rome that recently declared nuclear explosions and nuclear fall-out, first, and, second, the population explosion to be the two primary threats to the world in this age. The danger from nuclear fall-out resulting from atmospheric tests was very recently recognized in the House of Commons when that house unanimously passed a resolution condemning the tests being conducted in the South Pacific by the French government. Those tests brought protests from around the world. But in my view no persons have so effectively protested and in such a completely selfless manner, and with such complete disregard for their personal safety, as the two young people in the gallery today. In so doing they have focused the attention of the world on the problem and its escalation, particularly by France.

Honourable senators will recall that in 1972 a small vessel, sailing in international waters off Mururoa atoll in the South Pacific, was rammed by a French warship and its crew taken into custody. Later the ship was towed out of the test limits arbitrarily established by the military authority of France. It will also be recalled that this year under a nuclear cloud the same vessel sailed into the area. This time, while in international waters, it was boarded by armed French seamen who brutally assaulted the members of the crew, seriously injuring the captain and the navigator.

That small vessel that has created such concern and has aroused public opinion throughout the world simply and solely by its actions and the bravery of its crew, as all honourable senators know, was Greenpeace III. In the gallery this afternoon we have David McTaggart from Vancouver, a Canadian-born citizen, and with him Miss Ann-Marie Horne from New Zealand. Mr. McTaggart is captain of the Greenpeace and Miss Horne accompanied him on that dangerous mission representing the conscience of her fellow citizens in New Zealand.

● (1410)

Honourable senators, I am sure we are proud to have these young people here today. Miss Horne is just 20 years of age. They represent a generation in which we must repose the highest trust and confidence and if they are representative of that generation I have no fears.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

STATUTE LAW (SUPPLEMENTARY RETIREMENT BENEFITS) AMENDMENT ACT, 1973

BILL TO AMEND—FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-220, to amend the statute law providing for the payment of supplementary retirement benefits to certain persons in receipt of pensions payable out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. Eugene A. Forsey: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 44(1)(f), I move that this bill be read the second time later this day.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Honourable senators, what I am going to ask the Leader of the Government will apply, I believe, to the other two bills which are to be sent to us this afternoon. With regard to the leave requested to proceed today, I would like to have the impressions of the Leader of the Government as to what will take place next week. Is Parliament to reassemble next week? Is it the intention of the leader to recall us if the other place sits? If we were to proceed today, would the leader say that we should complete the three readings of this bill today and have royal assent tonight? What are the plans? It all depends upon whether there is any urgency. Under the circumstances I think honourable members of the Senate would like to kno v where they stand. I know that I do.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Honourable senators, I have been discussing the matter with Senator Langlois and others and I do not think that at this moment it is possible to know what will happen. Perhaps the Leader of the Opposition could help me in that regard. He may know more about what events will take place next week. At the present time, however, in my opinion the best course for us to take would be to proceed in an orderly manner. Perhaps we could agree to hear Senator Forsey today, which would give the Opposition an opportunity to prepare its comments, and have second and third readings tomorrow. By that time I believe we would have a better idea of the situation for next week. I would hope that then, if we had passed the measures and had the necessary discussion, we could arrange for royal assent tomorrow. In my opinion that would be the best procedure.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Would we sit tomorrow morning, or in the afternoon?

Hon. Mr. Martin: It would be better to meet at 2 o'clock, as the other place sits at 11 o'clock; but I am open to suggestions in that regard.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: The problem with the suggestion of the Leader of the Government is that if we are to return next week it would not be necessary to sit tomorrow.

Hon. Mr. Martin: I do not know if we will be sitting next week or not.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: My understanding is that the House of Commons will sit next week. In that event would it be the intention of the Leader of the Government to call the Senate next week? As the leader understands, we were supposed to receive two bills, being the last two of the three so-called emergency bills. I am repeating the statement of the government rather than saying what I personally believe. We now have another bill, an Act to amend the Crop Insurance Act. I understand that in the other place today the bill concerning amendments to the Canada Pension Plan and that concerning amendments to the Parole Act will be studied. These may very well come to us tomorrow. Therefore, if we foresee having business next week we may as well revert to our usual practice and adjourn today until Tuesday evening. My inquiry is only to enable honourable senators to make arrangements. There is no use in rushing the bills through tomorrow when we could adjourn until next week and deal with them properly.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Well, I do not think, in any event, we want to rush these bills. We want to give these bills the care and attention which they should receive. I would hope that it would not be necessary to be here next week, but I cannot give any assurance of that. I do not think anybody can be sure of that until later. We hope to have a better assessment of that situation tomorrow.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: But the point I am trying to make—

Hon. Mr. Martin: I got the point.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: —is whether or not the Leader of the Government intends to recall the Senate in the event that the other place continues to sit.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Not necessarily. Only if there is some business with which to deal. I cannot make a decision on that until I see what happens today and tomorrow.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: If the other place is sitting, then we will have some business.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Not necessarily. It may be; I do not know.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: We do not know where we stand.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Nobody knows.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: At this time we will agree to have the sponsor introduce and explain the bill, following which we will adjourn the debate on this bill and on any others that are introduced today. What we do after will depend on what we hear later in the day.

Hon. Mr. Manning: Honourable senators, I should like to urge on the Leader of the Government the importance of trying to adhere to the regularly scheduled sittings, if at all possible. At the present time, with one of our national airlines tied up with a strike, it is impossible for those of us at a distance to arrange reservations when we only know 48 hours ahead of time when the sittings are going to be.

For example, last week I personally missed the sitting on Thursday night because I did not have sufficient notice in order to make reservations. We were advised at the first of the week that the house would not sit until September 18. Then on Tuesday we were advised that it would sit on Thursday night. By that time it was impossible to get a seat on a flight to Ottawa. My absence from the chamber on Thursday evening last was due entirely to the fact that it was impossible for me to get air transportation on such short notice. I have to leave this evening because I had assumed that we were following our regular schedule this week. I cannot at this time get air transportation tomorrow.

In my own case, and worse yet for honourable senators from British Columbia, every trip down here involves a 4,000-mile round trip. We have to make our airline reservations, under present conditions, at least a week in advance. I would point out that the intention of the Parliament of Canada, when it adjourned for the summer recess, was that none of the matters which are now being debated and on which legislation is being considered would be dealt with until the latter part of October. The only reason they are being dealt with at this time is that the house had to reconvene to legislate an end to the railway strike. I do suggest, in light of what the initial intention was, that there is no urgency in respect of any of this legislation. All of this legislation could have been dealt with by the House of Commons following which we could have reconvened for a week and cleaned it all up. As it is, we are running back and forth thousands of miles across the country, not knowing from one day to the next whether we will be here or not.

I do not want to belabour the point, but I point out to the Leader of the Government that for those of us at a distance this creates a completely impossible situation. I do hope in the future we can stay with our regular schedule, thereby allowing us to make our reservations a month ahead, if need be. The present situation now is utterly impossible.

Hon. Mr. Croll: Honourable senators, the Leader of the Opposition has made a very reasonable proposition to this house. The other place, for its own reasons, has decided to sit on another day or so. What the Leader of the Opposition is saying, in effect, is that we have four bills with which we can deal now. He said that if we are not going to sit next week, he will see to it that these bills go through today and tomorrow with royal assent being given Friday night. That seems to be a very reasonable position. In the circumstances I cannot see why the Leader of the Government cannot give him that assurance. As the Leader of the Opposition points out, the two bills now before the other place, one dealing with pensions and the other with amendments to the Parole Act, can both wait a little while. There is no great urgency in respect to either one of them. They are not likely to pass very soon. I am sure that in the other place today and tomorrow will be taken up with matters concerning the cost of living, which is of importance. They will not actually be dealing with bills. For the orderliness of carrying out the business of this house, I think the proposition made by the Leader of the Opposition is a very reasonable one, and ought to be accepted.

● (1420)

Hon. Mr. Prowse: Honourable senators, to impress on everyone the importance of this matter I might say that for the first time in nearly 30 years I find myself in complete agreement with Senator Manning from Alberta. That should give you all cause for thought. Like him, I got the phone call because, as you know, the railways do not bother to have telegraph offices outside the main centres any more and they just drop telegrams in a post box. If the mail happens to be running you get it, and if not you don't. Fortunately, I got the phone call and immediately had my secretary here do everything she could, while I tried in Edmonton. I tried every airline, the armed forces and the Ministry of Transport, but, like Senator Manning, I found there was no possible way for me to get here last week.

Perhaps those honourable senators who live a little closer to Ottawa ought to visit us in the outlying places once in a while, to find out how difficult it is. What I am saying applies also to those from the Maritimes. We do not mind the distance; we do not mind coming; we do not mind being here. This house has always had the greatest respect and consideration for the members of the other place, to the point where we have been content to take a back seat time and time again because the members there needed votes and we did not. For that we have received no thanks but a great deal of criticism.

I think the members of the other place have a responsibility not only to themselves but to the people of Canada and the members of this chamber, who are equally responsible to the people of Canada for the legislation which is passed. If they have legislation, let them sit today and pass it, and we will sit here and pass it, as we have done before, if it is decent legislation. If they do not have legislation that has to be passed, then for heaven's sake let them go home and listen to their constituents, which is what they ought to be doing at least part of the time; and let us do the same, which is what we should be doing when we go home. Don't let us just be sitting here because someone hopes that by some kind of freak they may get a break that will enable them to get a headline in the papers in the late afternoon. That, I submit, is the only reason this house is being kept here at this time.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Honourable senators, I readily understand the plight of honourable senators from Western Canada, as explained to us by Senator Manning, owing to the fact that one of the main air carriers of Canada is presently out of action. However, as the Leader of the Government explained, we are faced with a situation that is pretty hard to forecast. We do not know what the other place is going to do next week. We do not even know if they will sit, or whether, if they sit, they will pass any legislation. We are faced with this situation, and we have to wait until we know more about what is going to happen in the other place before we make up our minds whether we should come back next week. I can give assurance on behalf of this side of the house that if we pass the bills that we have before us by the end of this week we will not come back bext week, unless the Senate is sent some legislation to be considered. That is as far as we can go.

Hon. Mr. Martin: That is what I said.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: That is as far as we can go. We might know better tomorrow and if we do we will act accordingly.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Can Mr. Lewis not help us?

Hon. Mr. Flynn: In this case, in order to know where we stand, why do we not adjourn until next week, this evening? Then we will know. If the House of Commons decides to adjourn tomorrow, we will force them to come back and be here for royal assent next week. It is very easy. We have only to refuse leave to proceed and we have no choice but to come back next Tuesday.

Some Hon. Senators: No, no.

Hon. Mr. Beaubien: Honourable senators, I think the point which Senator Manning has made is a very good one. He cannot be here tomorrow, because he cannot change his flight. If we have some bills that come to us and we cannot finish them today, why cannot we finish them on Tuesday evening, which is the evening we usually sit, and on Wednesday if need be?

Many honourable senators have other things to do. It is all very well for senators who live in Ottawa, or who do not do anything else. Many others have other things to do. If they have, they need to do a little planning. If it is necessary for us to be here all night on Friday, we can do so. No one is going to object to that. These bills do not take effect until October 1. If we cannot deal with them today, why can't we finish dealing with them on Tuesday evening instead of tomorrow? People who live here find it easy to be here. I am not arguing for myself. I live in Montreal and when the bridges are not down I can get here in two hours. Now, of course, they pull the bridges down and it takes two and a half hours. However, it is comparatively easy. But for people like Senator Manning, who has to remain a day more because he cannot get another flight, I do not think it makes sense. Why do we not sit on Tuesday evening as we always do, unless there is something that makes that difficult? We are always ready; everyone is ready to come if called at the last minute and we have to be here. But we do not have to be here tomorrow, we do not have to be here on Monday, we can deal with whatever comes on Tuesday, and on Wednesday if need be. I suggest that is what we should do.

Hon. Mr. Martin: I am always interested when Senator Beaubien speaks because I know he always tries to get to the heart of a matter; but in this case perhaps he has misunderstood the situation. As Senator Langlois said, we all appreciate the difficulties that face some senators, particularly those who do not live close to Ottawa and who have to come, as Senator Manning has, from afar. But what we are trying to do is to discharge our business with regard to those measures that we definitely have now and I would hope that, having discharged our duty with regard to those measures, then we would not have to be here at all next week.

I think it would be wiser to assess the situation tomorrow, to see whether or not we have to be. If it were clear that we had to be here next week, there would certainly be no objection to accepting the suggestion of Senator Beaubien; but supposing there was no other business next week except these three bills—

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Senator Manning can be here. He cannot be here tomorrow.

Hon. Mr. Martin: —I know what the criticism would be. Each and every one does his best to make an assessment of the agenda to meet the conveniences of all of us. I can tell you it is not an easy thing to do. We assess the situation and we discuss it among ourselves, as with Senator Langlois, Senator Molgat and others, to try and ascertain the position. Our best judgment is that we hope to have royal assent, if these bills are passed, tomorrow; we will deal with them today and I would hope that tomorrow we can adjourn and not come back next week. However, we cannot be firm on that point until we know exactly what happens today and tomorrow. That is the way we see it. My own judgment is that we can avoid coming back next week. I think we can adjourn for the period we originally had in mind, tomorrow, subject to recall. But that depends on circumstances that no man in this house, no man in Parliament at this time, can finalize, because we do not know what are the intentions of those who have to do with the affairs in another place.

● (1430)

I assure Senator Manning that we are aware that he cannot be here tomorrow. That happens to many of us. I am sorry he is not going to be here, because when he is here he always makes a valuable contribution.

My judgment is, however, that we should go on with these bills today, see how far we can get with them, pass them tomorrow and have royal assent tomorrow, in the hope that we can adjourn tomorrow and not return here next week at all.

Hon. Mr. Manning: If I may make one further brief observation, I quite appreciate that this house cannot govern its timetable to meet the convenience of a few of us who may have travelling difficulties. Really, I am more concerned about our procedures in similar cases in the future than with anything that can be done this near the end of the present session.

The Senate had to be here to deal with the bill to get the railways back into operation. There was absolutely no question about that, and no one would quarrel with that. But I do respectfully suggest that the sensible thing would have been for the Senate then to adjourn until such time as the reconvened Commons had passed all of the legislation that it intended to pass before adjourning for the balance of the summer months. Nothing was urgent. It would not have made a bit of difference whether legislation was delayed for one or two weeks. Had we remained in adjournment until the House of Commons had completed the legislation it is dealing with, we could have come back and, in one week's normal sitting, consisting of three days, we could have dealt with the whole thing and avoided all of this running back and forth across Canada resulting from spreading our sittings over two or three weeks, which in my judgment is not only unnecessary but unfair to the Canadian people who have to foot the bill.

Hon. Mr. Martin: I forgot to add a comment on a point Senator Manning has repeated. It is an important point which I think requires a response. I fully agree with him that it would be much better for Parliament to have a normal schedule. Up until this year, under the present Prime Minister, Parliament met with regularity. There was an Easter recess, a Christmas recess and a summer recess—and at definite times.

I was in the House of Commons for a long time. I know the importance of having a definite parliamentary schedule—a program which did not attend until 1968. We used to sit for months, and anyone who has had the drudgery of the parliamentary life under those circumstances knows how desirable it is to have a definite program.

I wish we could have avoided coming back here for the railway strike. I wish we could have avoided having to deal with the problems of rising prices which are now before the country and before Parliament. I wish we could have ended in June and come back in October, as we did for the last four years, and have adjourned for Christmas and for the summer. But that is not the situation we presently find ourselves in.

Senator Manning says that we should not deal with all of these measures now.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: No, that is not what he said.

Hon. Mr. Martin: I know that on reflection he does not really mean that.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: That is not what he said.

Hon. Mr. Martin: We were called for the railway strike, it is true, and for that purpose only, but at the same time in the other place there was, understandably, a demand that the attention of Parliament and the government should be addressed to the problem of rising prices. The government introduced a program to meet the inflationary situation. Included in the program are two of the bills now before us. They have to be passed before October 1. We had adjourned until October 30, and if we had waited until that time we could not possibly have dealt with those two matters.

The more I reflect on this matter, the more convinced I am that the course we are now taking is the wise one. I really believe that tomorrow we will be able to anticipate not having to come back next week.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: There is the carrot again.

Hon. Mr. Martin: I beg your pardon?

Hon. Mr. Flynn: You are dangling the carrot again.

Hon. Mr. Martin: What else can we do?

Hon. Mr. Manning: I apologize for speaking again, but apparently I did not make my position clear to the Leader of the Government. I fully agree that all of the legislation passed in the House of Commons at this reconvened session should be dealt with by this house well before October 1.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: That is right.

Hon. Mr. Manning: I agree with that fully. But my point was that once we had passed the railway bill, which was the urgent bill, this house could have adjourned until next week, for example, by which time the House of Commons would have completed its three or four pieces of legislation. We could then have come back for our regular three days—Tuesday, Wednesday and Thursday—and passed those bills, or we could have gone into the following week, if necessary. They would all have been through this house well before October 1, but we would have dealt with them all in the space of one week, or perhaps another day of the second week, without spreading our sittings over three weeks to do the same amount of work. That is all I am arguing for—not that the bills should be delayed.

Hon. Mr. Beaubien: I should like to make one small point, honourable senators. We cannot do everything today. Therefore, we must sit either tomorrow or Tuesday night. Now, everybody is prepared to sit on Tuesday nights—

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh.

Hon. Mr. Beaubien: —but nobody is prepared to sit on Fridays.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh.

Hon. Mr. Beaubien: What do you do outside, Senator Smith, apart from living here? People have to make some kind of plans. Unless you are going to retire from everything, you make certain plans. If we have to forego those plans, that is one thing; but if you were to give me the choice of sitting tomorrow or sitting Tuesday night, that would be an easy choice because I expect to sit on Tuesday nights. I have no appointments on Tuesday afternoon. I am perfectly willing to be here on Wednesday. That is our job. Why should we change at the last minute, all of a sudden, and say that we will sit on Friday instead of Tuesday night? How can anybody run any kind of interest outside unless he can make a few plans? I think that is the unreasonable part.

If we cannot complete the business today, let us do what we usually do and adjourn until Tuesday night, unless there is some terribly urgent reason for passing this measure sooner. If there are other bills they might well be before us on Tuesday when we come back, and we could deal with them at that time. If not, we could adjourn until Wednesday afternoon. That seems to me to make sense.

Hon. Mr. Laird: Honourable senators, this debate is becoming prolonged. May I make a suggestion, addressed particularly to the leaders? I understand that all the bills dealing with the inflation problem are coming to us today. My suggestion is that we deal with all of those bills today—and tomorrow, if necessary—and, if we do sit tomorrow, that we all agree definitely to adjourn until October 30, subject to recall. Then, if there are other bills which come to us, such as that respecting crop insurance and so on, which we were never told were urgent, let them wait.

Hon. Mr Flynn: Since the Leader of the Government obviously is not prepared to accept the suggestion of Senator Laird, with which I am in full accord, and since the government leader's assessment of the situation of last week was wrong, while my attitude has been proven to have been right in view of the stand taken by Senators Manning and Prowse, under those circumstances I will take the responsibility of refusing leave to proceed today with second reading of all of the bills coming to us, and I will, therefore, force the government leader to adjourn until Tuesday. That appears to be the only solution.

Hon. Mr. Laird: What do you say to my suggestion?

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I say it is my suggestion, and I made it to the Leader of the Government a few minutes ago.

Hon. Mr. Laird: If the honourable leader would accept my suggestion—apparently it is acceptable to the Leader of the Opposition—that we adjourn regardless; if he would agree to deal with these bills today and tomorrow and—

Hon. Mr. Martin: That is what we are doing.

Hon. Mr. Laird: No, you are not. You are saying that we might have to come back. I say let us make it definite and positive. Senator Prowse has pointed out that we are sort of "chore boys" for the other place. I must admit that I get that impression myself.

If the Leader of the Opposition will agree to the proposition of getting these bills disposed of today and tomorrow on the understanding that there will be a definite adjournment regardless of what happens over there, then I think that is the solution to the problem.

● (1440)

Hon. Mr. Flynn: It is up to the Leader of the Government to assure us that we are going to adjourn tomorrow night until the end of October.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Subject to recall.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Subject to recall.

Hon. Mr. Martin: The Leader of the Opposition has his responsibilities and I have mine. I have to anticipate these things as responsibly as I can. I have already indicated that we have the two bills mentioned—the one amending the Family Allowances Act and the Youth Allowances Act, and the one dealing with the indexing for civil servants' pensions on an annual basis. We now know that the bill respecting crop insurance has been passed, and that we will have a message in connection with that very shortly. It has left the other place.

I have indicated that it is my assessment, as it is of those who examined the situation with me this morning, that if these measures are disposed of tomorrow, and if arrangements can be made for royal assent, we can dispose of this legislative timetable. And I would hope—and no man can say more than that—I would hope that we could adjourn until October, subject, naturally, to recall.

With regard to the suggestion that we meet on Tuesday, I can understand the desirability of a regular program, but what does that mean? It means that we would come back next Tuesday just to deal with these three measures.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: That is sufficient. I cannot remember the last time we had three bills to deal with in the same week.

Hon. Mr. Martin: As I said, only to deal with the three measures which we can now dispose of, and thereby avoid coming back next week or for some weeks thereafter. That is the extent to which one can envisage what lies ahead. I do not think that anybody could put the situation more fairly or more squarely than that. As far as the question of rubber stamping is concerned, if we feel that we want to take more time on those bills—if we want to take tomorrow night, Saturday and Sunday—then there is nothing to prevent us from doing so.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Don't go overboard.

Hon. Mr. Martin: I do not think we help the Senate one bit by giving the impression that there is no time allowed for the consideration of these measures.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I didn't mention that at all.

Hon. Mr. Martin: I am not referring to Senator Flynn on this occasion. There are times when he is not in my mind.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: When the leader loses his cool and speaks of sitting Saturday and Sunday when he knows full well the house will not be sitting on Saturday or Sunday, and would not be here for the royal assent, then it is obvious he has completely lost track of the procedure of Parliament. Therefore, honourable senators, not being able to obtain his assurance that we are going to adjourn tomorrow night, come hell or high water, I refuse leave to proceed.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: Honourable senators, throughout the remarks made here today I think there is probably one point that has been overlooked. That is the fact that both Houses of Parliament have to come together for royal assent. I think it is time that perhaps this pattern was changed. If it were changed, then the Senate would be freer to deal with the legislation as it comes to us, and we could quit being "chore boys" to the other place, as I believe Senator Laird and Senator Prowse so aptly expressed it. In those circumstances we could meet, and deal with the legislation in our own time, and it would not be necessary for the members of the other house to come here for royal assent.

I recall, when I was a member of the other place, that we were not too excited about coming here, and frankly I do not think that they would miss that part of the procedure.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Honourable senators, it seems to me that there is a misunderstanding here. When I spoke earlier on this matter I mentioned that we were ready, provided these three pieces of legislation before us today were passed and they received royal assent before tomorrow night, to adjourn for a long period of time, subject to being recalled. The only difference between the suggestion made by Senator Laird and that made by Senator Martin is that Senator Martin is not prepared to give an assurance that we will not be recalled before that time.

Hon. Mr. Martin: That is right.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: And I do not think that anybody could give that assurance.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: You are playing on words.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: I am not playing on words. This is plain English, and very easy to understand.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Well, I won't take it as a promise.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: I shall repeat it, and my leader is here to correct me if I am wrong. If these three pieces of legislation are passed and assented to by tomorrow night, then the Senate will adjourn for more than one week, possibly three or four weeks, probably to a date towards the end of October, subject to being recalled if any legislation comes to us in the meantime.

Hon. Mr. Martin: That is right.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: And we are ready to proceed on that basis.

The Honourable Leader of the Opposition is free to refuse leave if he wants to, and I will not fight him on that ground, because it is his privilege and his right. But I think that since we have legislation before us that calls for immediate attention, we should deal with it today and tomorrow, and then adjourn to the end of October, subject to being recalled.

This is the suggestion made by Senator Laird. I see him nodding, so I interpret that as signifying that I have interpreted his statement correctly.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: If the Leader of the Government is prepared to say that everything Senator Langlois has said is correct, then I am prepared to accept it. I shall accept Senator Langlois' words, but not the leader's. I will not accept what he said earlier today to the effect that we could be recalled, let us say, in ten days. I will not agree to that. I want this to be very clear. What the Leader of the Government has said—and it is quite clear because I know him; I have been sitting opposite him for many years and I know exactly what he thinks even if he does not say everything he thinks—is that if some legislation goes through the other place, he will want us to deal with it before the other place adjourns, and to this proposition I say no.

Hon. Mr. Martin: It is amazing how the best of friends, even though they sit opposite one another, can get involved as we do. I do not blame the Leader of the Opposition for this entirely—I accept some responsibility—but I think what Senator Langlois has said is what I endeavoured to say. I think the Leader of the Opposition—

Hon. Mr. Flynn: You are not the only one smiling. Look behind you.

Hon. Mr. Martin: If I were to make that kind of remark to my honourable friend, he would not like it. I do not believe it is desirable for the Leader of the Opposition and the Leader of the Government in the Senate to engage in the kind of controversy in which we might engage in the other place. In my view it does not help us or the Senate to do so. That is why, notwithstanding the provocation, as I have told my friend Senator Flynn on many occasions, I do not react to the extent that one could normally react in the circumstances. What Senator Langlois has said in answer to Senator Laird represents the situation. We could adjourn tomorrow night if we pass these bills, and then come back, subject to recall.

Some Hon. Senators: We will.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. Mr. Forsey: With leave now.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Not now. I will not give leave. Later this day. I will certainly not give leave for the Crop Insurance bill.

The Hon. the Speaker: It is moved by Honourable Senator Forsey, seconded by Honourable Senator Martin, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding Rule 44(1)(f) that this bill be read a second time later this day. Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Motion agreed to.

● (1450)

FAMILY ALLOWANCES ACT
YOUTH ALLOWANCES ACT

BILL TO AMEND—FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-223, to amend the Family Allowances Act and the Youth Allowances Act.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. Mr. Langlois: With leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 44(1)(f), I move that this bill be read the second time later this day.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: The same comments apply. We will adjourn the debate, and then decide what to do.

Motion agreed to.

CROP INSURANCE ACT

BILL TO AMEND—FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-129, to amend the Crop Insurance Act.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Tuesday next.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: With leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 44(1)(f), I move that this bill be read the second time later this day.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: No; leave is refused.

Hon. Mr. Martin: May I ask Senator Flynn, in the event we adjourn tomorrow and do not return until October 30, are we to deny the farmers of this country the advantages of this legislation, which passed in the House of Commons with practically no discussion?

Hon. Mr. Flynn: If you took the trouble to read it, you would see it has nothing to do with the farmers themselves. We will deal with it on Tuesday next. That is all.

Hon. Mr. Martin: No, I do not believe we are returning on Tuesday next. I think we will be adjourning tomorrow night.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Again those words, "I think."

Hon. Mr. Martin: How could anyone say any more than that? We should let the matter stand with this bill.

Hon. Mr. Laird: Honourable senators, may I advise Senator Flynn that, frankly, I did not know that the Crop Insurance bill had arrived here. I was thinking in terms of a condition in which he would agree to these three bills passing in two days, after which the government leader would say we will adjourn no matter what the House of Commons does. I thought this would pour oil on troubled waters. Now, however, as I know the Crop Insurance bill has reached us and we can deal with it, I would appeal to Senator Flynn to take the same stand as with the other two bills.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: May I point out to the honourable senator that the understanding was that we were to deal with three measures, introduced supposedly to fight inflation. The government was very clear. That was all it wished to have Parliament approve, following which it was to adjourn. The intentions of the government were very clear. It was never suggested that this bill had a priority of any kind. I will maintain the refusal as a safeguard, because your leader will never use the word "definitely" with regard to adjournment. He has never been definite in his life, and is not going to start at his age.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Honourable senators, I am sorry to have to speak once more, and that my friend the Leader of the Opposition is so personal in his argument. He can make the strongest argument, but I ask him to consider the consequences were I to indulge in that type of argument, which I do not intend to do.

When we returned here I had no idea that the Crop Insurance bill would be passed. I had no more idea when we were sitting here yesterday that it would be passed. I was surprised this morning to hear that it had been passed in the other place, practically without discussion. If it is desired to proceed with a full discussion of this bill and extend it, that would be the choice of the Senate. In order that Senator Laird may understand fully, I wish to make it clear that if we deal with these bills tomorrow or at any time before we adjourn prior to Sunday—

Hon. Mr. Flynn: No, not Sunday. Say tomorrow night, at least.

Hon. Mr. Martin: If we were to pass them tomorrow night, that would be fine, but if I said that, someone would say I was insisting upon limiting the debate, and I will not again put myself in that position. That is why I put it in the way I do. However, once these bills are passed, as I indicated, my proposal would be that we adjourn subject to recall, which could be at any time.

Neither I nor any other senator can say at this minute when we might be recalled. My hope, however, is that we would adjourn tomorrow night until October 30, subject to recall, which, as I have said, could be at any time. I do not know what will be done in the other place or what amount of legislation will be passed there. No one can take any other attitude in this type of situation. However, we will adjourn tomorrow night, subject to recall. Now, surely that is clear.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: No.

Hon. Mr. Martin: That means—

Hon. Mr. Flynn: You can leave it on the Order Paper.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Of course you could.

Hon. Mr. Prowse: On a point of order, Madam Speaker; is it ordered now that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading next Tuesday, or the next sitting?

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Next Tuesday. It requires two days' notice.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Or if we come back on Monday.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Well, you can do that.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, as leave has not been granted, it is ordered that the bill be placed upon the Orders of the Day for second reading on Monday next.

DISTINGUISHED VISITOR IN GALLERY

THE RIGHT HONOURABLE LORD SHACKLETON

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I should like to draw to your attention that we have in the gallery a distinguished visitor, Lord Shackleton, the Leader of the Opposition in the British House of Lords, who is paying a short visit to Canada. We are very glad to welcome him to the Senate.

Hon. Paul Martin: Honourable senators, I should like to take advantage of this opportunity to join with Madam Speaker in extending a welcome to the Leader of the Opposition in the House of Lords, the Right Honourable Edward Shackleton. We look forward to the opportunity of discussing with him matters of common concern.

He has had a very distinguished public career, having been a member of the Cabinet in Britain and a former Leader of the Government in the House of Lords, and now Leader of the Opposition. I do not know whether he listened to the amiable exchange between the Leader of the Opposition and myself today. If he did, perhaps he could tell both Senator Flynn and me privately, having been both a Leader of the Government and a Leader of the Opposition, what his impressions are as to a satisfactory method of bringing Senator Flynn's point of view and mine to meet.

In any event, we wish Lord Shackleton to know that we are honoured by his presence, and on behalf of all who sit on this side I extend to him a very warm welcome.

• (1500)

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, I join with the Leader of the Government—I am for one moment today in complete agreement with him—in welcoming Lord Shackleton with whom we had the pleasure of having an excellent lunch in Madam Speaker's chambers.

Lord Shackleton and I had the occasion to exchange views as to the way in which the Leaders of the Government and of the Opposition in the House of Lords and in this chamber discharge their duties. It seems to me that in the case of the House of Lords the Leader of the Government pays more attention to the views expressed by the Leader of the Opposition than is the case in this chamber. I know that many honourable senators pay attention to what I suggest, but that does not always seem to be the case with the Leader of the Government himself. In any event, we had a very interesting conversation.

Lord Shackleton informed us that some years ago there was a paper or report prepared on the reform of the House of Lords, and he has promised to send us a copy for our instruction and edification. It will likely be of great interest to Senator Croll. We know that the House of Lords performs a very worthwhile function. However, it is not always appreciated by the public, and in that respect we are all in the same boat.

Lord Shackleton is the present Leader of the Opposition in the House of Lords, the former Leader of the Government, a former minister in the Wilson government, and, I believe, at one time was a junior member, with the Right Honourable Herbert Morrison, of the Attlee government. I join with all honourable senators in wishing him a very pleasant stay in Ottawa. I hope that the time he spends in our gallery here will not be the worst part of his trip to Canada.

THE SENATE

NEWSPAPER ARTICLE—ALLEGED STATEMENT BY SENATOR LAMONTAGNE—QUESTION

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Honourable senators, before the Orders of the Day are called I wish to ask my good friend, Senator Lamontagne, whether he has been misquoted by Le Journal de Montreal which carried a Canadian Press item in this morning's edition with the headline: "'Moi Aussi, Je Ris du Sénat'—Le Sénateur Lamontagne," the translation of which is, "I, too, laugh at the Senate."

Now, either Senator Lamontagne said those words or he did not. If he said them jokingly, we should know. If I may translate, part of the article reads: "Questioned to find out if the government would take seriously the third report on sciences considering the little attention given to the Senate by parliamentarians, Mr. Lamontagne declared: "I, too, laugh at the Senate."

I do not know how seriously he laughs, or how long he is going to laugh. Somebody said "a horse laugh." We are entitled to know if this statement was made jokingly or seriously.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Or made at all.

[Translation]

Hon. Mr. Lamontagne: Honourable senators, I can say immediately to Senator Choquette that it was a joke intended to demonstrate, afterwards, that a very serious job was done in this house—not only in this house but also in its committees. I was answering a newsman who attempted to make the Senate appear ridiculous.

I would have many more comments about the remarks I allegedly made, although in a completely different context, during a two-hour conference. Unfortunately, after what just happened in this house, I am in no mood for laughing.

[English]

SIMULTANEOUS INTERPRETATION—QUESTION

Hon. Mr. Blois: I should like to ask the Leader of the Government whether there is any reason why we cannot get the interpretation. Unfortunately, many of us do not understand French, and every time French is spoken of late, today being another example, we do not get an interpretation. It seems to me there should be some way of providing a better service than that which is presently provided.

Hon. Mr. Smith: The interpretation is excellent at my desk.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: It is on now.

Hon. Mr. Blois: Mine is not working.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Senator Blois has raised an important point. Some honourable senators say that the simultaneous interpretation system is working, but obviously in Senator Blois' case it is not working. Yesterday I had two honourable senators speak to me regarding this. In addition, there was no simultaneous interpretation at the committee hearing yesterday at which the Honourable Mr. Lalonde, Minister of National Health and Welfare, was in attendance. He began to speak in French, as he has a right to do, and there was no simultaneous interpretation of his speech.

I am sure that those who look after these things—the Committees Branch in that case—and those who are responsible for the simultaneous interpretation in the chamber, will see that it is operating properly, and if there is any ineffectiveness in the operation that it will be corrected.

OLD AGE SECURITY ACT

BILL TO AMEND—THIRD READING

Hon. Renaude Lapointe moved the third reading of Bill C-219, to amend the Old Age Security Act.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Honourable senators, for the record I should like to say that when the minister appeared before the committee yesterday he said that he did not need royal assent to this legislation before October 7 next. I simply mention that in the light of the comment made by the Leader of the Government last week. What the minister said was that two or three weeks' advance notice would provide sufficient time to prepare the cheques and to forward them in due course.

Hon. W. M. Benidickson: Honourable senators, although I am not a member of the Health, Welfare and Science Committee, I did attend the committee meeting yesterday because of my great interest in the subject matter that was before it. Unfortunately, we do not have a Hansard of yesterday's committee meeting. It is for that reason that I propose to say a few words on third reading about what transpired in committee.

First of all, I should like to say that my understanding of what the minister, the Honourable Mr. Lalonde, had to say to us yesterday was quite different from that reported by the Leader of the Opposition.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: In that event, the record will prove me wrong.

Hon. Mr. Benidickson: In the past we have had presented to us, as matters of great urgency, certain bills which we have been obliged to pass without the necessary time either for speaking or for study and which some of us would have liked to have had on those occasions. I have objected on such occasions, as have other honourable senators from all quarters of the house.

I recall that on a couple of those occasions we were very concerned about the time required by the Department of Supply and Services to get the cheques out after royal assent and the legislation becoming law because there were specific close operative dates in the bills sent over to us. We were told on every occasion that there was a minimum of two weeks required for cheque change preparation and delivery. In connection with the bill before us today, however, there is an unusual difficulty for those whose task it is to put out the cheques, despite computer aid, because this particular bill does not simply call for a mere increase in amount—for example, from $10 to $25, or whatever it might be—but rather it requires practically individual attention and calculation for every file as the amount received under the guaranteed income supplement varies from person to person, depending on the incomes of those persons receiving the supplemental payments. A very high percentage—I think more than 60 per cent—actually do receive more than the basic pension, which would be easy to calculate, and they have to have individual attention by the computer, and in consequence special cheques, because they have varying incomes. I think we were told it would take a minimum of two weeks for that.

● (1510)

In addition, you have to allow for the delivery by post of those cheques before October 1, and we all know the uncertainties of deliveries these days in certain sections of the country. The minister indicated that, while the cheques for the last revision may have been late in April—

Hon. Mr. Flynn: No, they were not.

Hon. Mr. Benidickson: There was a discussion about that.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Yes, but the honourable senator will remember that at the end he got an answer from the department admitting that the cheques had been sent. They are sent in the third week of the month for that month.

Hon. Mr. Benidickson: That is right.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: That means the end of the month of October. We still have six weeks before they need to be delivered. I am quite sure the honourable senator does not correctly remember what was said.

Hon. Mr. Martin: I was there, and I did not understand that.

Hon. Mr. Benidickson: I did not get that understanding, and the Leader of the Government says he was there and did not have that understanding. It was my understanding that we had to have this legislation completed in adequate time before October 1—at least 10 days, almost two weeks—if we were also to calculate and put cheques in the mail for October delivery.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: We have six weeks now.

Hon. Mr. Benidickson: No. But that was not the main purpose of my speaking on third reading. I wish to report some comments that I thought would be of interest to members of the Senate, that resulted from the committee meeting held yesterday for which we have not yet received the Hansard report.

I asked the minister whether it was not a fact that the thrust of any criticism in the other place respecting this bill dealt primarily with three matters. First, there were those who said that the amount of increase was not enough, that the basic pension should be increased. Some said it should be increased to $150 a month, and I believe that was the maximum suggested by any party even in the election campaign last October. Since then, in an auction last week, some suggested the basic pension should be $200. Secondly, there were those who said their criticism rested upon the fact that there should be a pension payable to a spouse of a pensioner who might be under 65 years of age. Thirdly, there was the proposal that the increase should be retroactive to July 1 rather than be effective on October 1.

In the discussion in committee yesterday the minister indicated that, meritorious as some of the suggestions might be in themselves, it was his obligation to look at the whole spectrum of social welfare policy and expenditure from taxes, and to decide in his own mind that what was given in one place did not disaffect the opportunity to provide funds in another sector, such as family allowances and welfare under the Canada Assistance Act, or in other social benefit and health fields. He pointed out that substantial progress had been made for the sector of the population represented by senior citizens, and that to reduce the age of entitlement at the moment from 65 to 60 would involve an expenditure right there of $1 billion. He further pointed out that for the senior citizens group, whether or not they are receiving what many would wish, having regard for all the other considerations that must be taken into account, the portion of tax revenues devoted to them had increased threefold in the six years between 1967 and 1973. That is not true of larger contributions or added assistance to some other sectors of the population in need.

These are points that were brought out at our committee meeting yesterday, which I think were sympathetically heard by the minister. He said that on a personal basis, if he continued to be minister, it would perhaps not be the area of the three suggestions I have indicated, and which were discussed in the other place last week, but the field relating to single senior citizens that as a first step should be looked at next. At the moment what needed most consideration was some increase for the single old age pensioner.

I just thought, honourable senators, as we nave no Hansard report of our committee meeting, that some of this information that was given the committee should be on record.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: You are entirely right, except on the point I raised.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

STATUTE LAW (SUPPLEMENTARY RETIREMENT BENEFITS) AMENDMENT ACT, 1973

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Eugene A. Forsey moved the second reading of Bill C-220, to amend the statute law providing for the payment of supplementary retirement benefits to certain persons in receipt of pensions payable out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund.

The Hon. the Speaker: It is moved by the Honourable Senator Forsey, seconded by the Honourable Senator Lapointe, that this bill be now read a second time. Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion? Adoptée, carried.

[Hon. Mr. Benidickson.]

Hon. Mr. Forsey: Honourable senators, I was going to say that I thought Her Honour had perhaps anticipated events slightly. I was under the impression that I was to have the pleasure—and it is a pleasure—of making some statements about what this bill contains.

The Hon. the Speaker: I apologize, Senator Forsey. My mind was not on what I was doing.

Hon. Mr. Forsey: I assure Your Honour that I was merely being facetious, without any intention of reflecting on Your Honour's conduct. I was merely being facetious, as someone was the other day when it was said that a bill was law when it had come from the House of Commons and not yet been dealt with here.

● (1520)

Though it looks like a fairly complex bill, thanks to the necessity of having things in due and proper legal language, although the layman sometimes wonders whether it need be quite as elaborate as it is, this bill is really a very simple bill and I think in general it is non-controversial. I have always suspected that when critics of the bill rise to debate it their criticisms will in effect amount to this, that "it is good legislation as far as it goes but it does not go far enough." I doubt very much whether anybody will oppose the legislation in itself.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: You are already admitting the shortcomings of the bill.

Hon. Mr. Forsey: No, no, I am not admitting anything. I am merely saying that the criticism by honourable members of the Opposition or by honourable members of our own party, for that matter, will not be that this is a bad bill but the criticism will be that it does not go far enough. I am not saying that; I may have something to say on that later but I am not saying it now, for the moment.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: It is to prevent you from doing that, that they asked you to sponsor the bill, I hope.

Hon. Mr. Forsey: I do not know about that. The honourable Leader of the Opposition said a while ago that he enjoyed a little extrasensory perception in regard to what is in the mind of the Leader of the Government and perhaps he is once again indulging in this flight of imagination. Perhaps that is a little unkind to the Leader of the Opposition, because I understand that extrasensory perception and all that sort of thing has now become, scientifically, perfectly respectable and well established. Perhaps the honourable Leader of the Opposition is one of those who possess very special psychic powers denied to most of the rest of us. I should be more confident of that if he were of Scottish rather than of Irish extraction, because I think it is the Scots Highlanders who have the second sight, not the Irish, as far as I know. Perhaps if Senator O'Leary were present he could set me right on that, or confirm my impression.

I am extraordinarily pleased to have the task of moving the second reading of this bill, for a rather personal reason. Ever since 1855 until last year, there has been some member of what I think I might call my immediate family in the public service of the Province of Canada before Confederation, of the Dominion of Canada since Confederation or for that matter in what is now the Province of Newfoundland, for some considerable period of time, though I cannot give the exact dates. I have long felt that retired public servants are among the most defenceless groups in our society against rises in the cost of living, especially of course rises in the cost of living on the scale that we have known recently. So I undertook the moving of the second reading of this bill con amore, with gusto, with immense pleasure, with enthusiasm. I think it redresses a grievance which is of long standing.

This is true also of certain other groups. Indeed it may be said that it is true especially of certain former members of Parliament who have been retired for some considerable time. I cannot say offhand how many of those there may be, but I suspect that some of them may be in a position where the alleviation of their fate which is provided by this legislation may be very welcome indeed. It may help to redress the injustice.

I shall go so far in the way of criticism at this point as to say that I am sorry that, to the best of my belief, this bill does not cover the matter of the pensions of widows of retired judges. There are some very hard cases there of people whose husbands died when they were on the judicial bench, some considerable time ago, when the salaries of judges were much lower than they are now, and where the pensions enjoyed by some of those widows are extremely inadequate. I understand, however, that this bill does not cover such cases, and if so, that is in my judgment unfortunate and regrettable.

I have jotted down here half a dozen or so headings under which the provisions of this bill may be described. First and foremost, there are the provisions which remove the ceiling on the escalation of pensions of retired public servants and others covered by the bill, a ceiling which formerly, like the ceiling on Canada Pension Plan pensions, was set at 2 per cent per year.

Under the existing legislation the escalation is tied to the escalation in the Canada Pension Plan. The minister has explained that normally the government would have waited for the revision of the Canada Pension Plan—which it is hoped will take place very shortly—and would have removed the ceiling from both at once. But, as honourable senators know, changes in the Canada Pension Plan require consultation with the provinces. It was felt undesirable to have this particular change wait for the length of time necessary for that consultation. It was felt that this measure should be put through now. That is the first provision and the most important provision, one may say it is the most comprehensive provision in this measure.

The precise terms of this part of the bill will be found in clause 2(1) and (4). Subclause (1) simply removes the ceiling and subclause (4) provides that this legislation shall come into effect on January 1, 1974.

The second point I should make is that in clause 3 there is provision that there shall be no reduction in the amount of the pension if the cost of living goes down. I suppose some people will say that in view of the now fairly prolonged rise in prices over a long period—I am not thinking simply of the recent large rises—it is what the Anglican Prayer Book calls "a work of supererogation." It may seem scarcely necessary to talk about what may happen if the cost of living should go down. But to make assurance doubly sure, it is provided by the bill that there shall be no reduction in the pension, even if the cost of living does go down.

I should mention at this point what the amount of the increase is likely to be and then I shall go on to discuss the total cost. The amount of the increase for various retired public servants will vary according to the time when they retired. Those who retired in 1970 and earlier will get an increase of approximately 11.45 per cent. (These figures have been provided by the officials and are subject to minor adjustments.) Those who retired in 1971 will get an increase of 9.34 per cent. Those who retired in 1972 will get an increase of 8.99 per cent. Those who retire this year will get an increase of 6.35 per cent.

The third feature of the bill to which I should call attention is the matter of the financing of the provisions for removing the ceiling. Clause 4 provides that the extra amount involved shall be payable by the Government of Canada out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund. It is not going to be imposed on the contributors to the various funds involved.

The total cost of the proposals in the bill will be something like $25 million. Of this, my recollection is that about $22 million will come out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund. The further $3 million will come from other sources which I may be referring to shortly because they deal, in effect, with other parts of the bill.

● (1530)

I have left aside for the moment section 2, subsections (3) and (5).

Sections 5 and 6 are, really, simply amendments to the legislation consequential upon the removing of the 2 per cent ceiling on the escalation.

A fourth and very important part of the bill is the removal of certain anomalies with respect to certain categories of people covered by the legislation. It is a matter of the age at which the escalation of pensions of former members of the Public Service, the Canadian Armed Forces, the Royal Canadian Mounted Police and former Members of Parliament can begin unless they are disabled. At the present time the act provides that this age should be 60. In 1970 the amendments to the Public Service Superannuation Act lowered the age at which Public Service employees could retire from 60 to 55, if they had 30 years of service; but the people in the other categories were left as they were. It is now proposed by subsections (3) and (5) of section 2 to remove this anomaly and put the members of the other categories on the same basis as the former members of the Public Service of Canada.

That is simply a matter of redressing this particular injustice which has existed since 1970. That provision of the bill "shall be deemed to have come into force on January 1, 1973." So that that particular part of the bill is retroactive until the beginning of this year.

The fifth feature of this bill has to do with the financing, a little distance in the future, of the changes which have been made, which I have just been referring to, in the removal of the anomalies between the former members of the Public Service under the Public Service Superannuation Act, 1970, and the other categories. The government consulted the advisory committee on this subject and arrived at the conclusion that the best way to handle this thing was to provide for the extra cost by a phased program, and part of that is that from the beginning—and honourable senators will find these provisions in sections 8 to 12—from the beginning of January 1977, the contribution should be raised from the present one-half of 1 per cent to 1 per cent. The part of this dealing with the diplomatic service is found in section 8; the part dealing with the Public Service is found in section 9; the part dealing with the Canadian Forces Superannuation Act is found in section 10; the part dealing with the Royal Canadian Mounted Police is found in section 11, and the part dealing with the former Members of Parliament is to be found in section 12.

By the way, I have noticed that one comment which has been made elsewhere, which I think is important, is that this whole piece of legislation is not going to add to what one might call the "real" pensions of retired members or former Members of Parliament; so that if anybody is proposing to make political capital out of the idea that Parliament is now giving something special to retired Members of Parliament, the answer is that that is a complete misunderstanding.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: They are not getting any more benefit than retired members of the armed forces.

Hon. Mr. Forsey: No. They are on all fours, if I may use that expression, with the others.

The last feature of the bill to which I want to draw attention is of extremely small importance; it is the mere correction of a typographical error which appears in the present legislation, where it says "Appropriate Act" rather than "Appropriation Act". That is to be found in section 7, where it says that the English version of the act is to be "amended by striking out the words 'Appropriate Act' where they appear therein and substituting therefor the words 'Appropriation Act'.

That pretty well covers the provisions of the bill, I think.

Although I speak with caution and with diffidence on this subject, I should be inclined to think that there is likely to be so much agreement with the actual provisions of this bill, subject to the criticisms that I suggested before might be made, that it would be unnecessary to refer the matter to the appropriate committee. But, of course, I am entirely in the hands of the Senate in that regard. It seems to me that the purposes of the bill are simple; there is no particular question so far as I know about the drafting of the clauses. I should therefore hope that we might, in due course and at the proper time, proceed from second reading to third reading without the necessity of referring the bill to committee.

I shall, of course, be glad to answer any questions which honourable senators may have, provided they are within my knowledge and competence. In some instances I may be obliged to say that perhaps I shall take note of the question, and inquire of the officials, and come back with the answer on third reading.

I may be permitted, perhaps, to end with what Senator O'Leary tells me was the invariable ending of Sir Robert Borden's speeches on any bill in the House of Commons when he was Prime Minister:

> And I am persuaded that this legislation will commend itself not only to the judgment of the House but to the judgment of the country.

[Hon. Mr. Forsey.]

Hon. Mr. Phillips: Honourable senators, I should like to thank Senator Forsey for his introduction of the bill, even if he did have certain difficulty getting permission to introduce it before the scroll called for second reading. He seemed to have a certain amount of hesitation during his introduction, in that he anticipated criticisms and was well aware of the fact that the bill is deficient in a good many ways. I should like to have the benefit of reading his remarks in order to ensure that I will not disappoint him by missing those deficient points. Therefore, honourable senators, I move the adjournment of the debate.

On motion of Senator Phillips, debate adjourned.

FAMILY ALLOWANCES ACT
YOUTH ALLOWANCES ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Leopold Langlois moved the second reading of Bill C-223, to amend the Family Allowances Act and the Youth Allowances Act.

He said: Honourable senators, the present bill is an interim measure, and, to put it in its proper perspective, I should add that this measure is within the scope of the program which the government has already announced to protect the purchasing power of Canadian consumers. By this bill it is hoped to contain, or at least control to some degree, the effects of the inflation which Canada, like most other countries of the world, is presently experiencing, particularly in the area of food costs.

● (1540)

As we all know, honourable senators, the government has drawn up a program to protect Canadian consumers against the eroding effects of inflation on the purchasing power of the recipients of pensions and allowances paid under federal plans. As part of this program Parliament has already considered the advisability of indexing old age security pensions and the guaranteed income supplement with a view to gearing such payments to the increase in the consumer price index on a quarterly basis. In these circumstances I venture to suggest that it is now appropriate to turn our attention to the plight of another group of our society, to wit, the breadwinners of the three and a half million families responsible for seven and a half million children and adolescents.

Surely I need not remind honourable senators that last July 1 a bill to reform the present legislation on family allowances and youth allowances was introduced in the other place. It will be recalled that the main feature of that proposed legislation is to increase family allowances and youth allowances to an average monthly rate of $20 per child. It is anticipated that that proposed legislation will receive the approval of Parliament in time to come into effect next January.

Although that prior legislation is not as yet before this chamber, I deem it necessary at this time to further elaborate on the same in order to place the present measure in its proper perspective. As a result of the printing and distribution of Bill C-211, and of the statement of policy made in July last by the government, we know that that legislative measure would represent an important innovation in the field of universal benefits in granting to the provinces the power to amend allowances on the basis of the age and family size, or both at the same time, each province determining the variation best applicable. That variation, however, would be subject to the conditions that the rate variation be set so that the average payment in any province would be equivalent to the national standard; that is to say, $20 per child per month, and, secondly, that the minimum for any child be $12 a month.

Furthermore, under Bill C-211, the allowances would escalate on the basis of the cost of living, and the provinces would be allowed to determine their own variations. If it is the intention of the provinces to avail themselves of this latitude, the middle of October was set as the deadline for them to make known to Ottawa the nature of their respective decisions. This would permit the Canadian government to adjust the rates of each variant to its administrative system, and to be in a position to begin making payments early in 1974, if Parliament has then given its approval to the proposed new system.

It is considered, honourable senators, that the time necessary to develop the administrative mechanisms and to consult with the provinces cannot be further reduced. Consequently, it would not be realistic in order to cope with the present situation to endeavour to enforce immediately the reform of family allowances as proposed under the legislative measure introduced in July in the other chamber. We have need now for rather special measures capable of immediate application, and I submit that it is precisely a special measure of this kind that we are presently called upon to consider. The exceptional increase in food prices confirms, to my mind, the urgency of passing such provisions.

When one stops to consider that a family of four with an income of over $10,000 per annum spends approximately 16 per cent of its budget on food, while the same size family with an income of less than $4,000 per annum spends approximately 28 per cent of its budget on food, it becomes obvious that the increase of 20 per cent in the price of food over the past 18 months would have a much greater impact on the low income family as compared with the higher income family.

These figures are very important indeed, and should also be put into perspective. For example, in 1971, the latest year for which international figures are available, one finds that Canadians spent, on an average, 19.3 per cent of their budget on food. The only country with a lower percentage at that time was the United States at 18.3 per cent, and in other industrial countries one finds that the following figures applied:

United Kingdom	23.0 per cent
West Germany	24.2 per cent
Sweden	25.0 per cent
Japan	26.6 per cent
France	27.5 per cent

When one compares the Canadian figure of 19.3 per cent in 1971 with the figure of 38 per cent some fifteen years ago, one can see that the Canadian consumer has seen his lot substantially improve over the years, and that even in spite of the recent increases in the cost of food the Canadian consumer is still in a more favourable position than the consumer of probably any other country in the world in so far as the allocation of budget for food is concerned.

I should like to draw the attention of honourable senators to the fact that the average real income of Canadians has continued to increase substantially in 1973 as compared with 1972, and I would refer to the statement made in the House of Commons on September 4 by the Prime Minister, as reported at page 6182 of Hansard:

> Workers income and corporation benefits have by far exceeded the global rate of inflation in Canada. During the first quarter this year, the real income of individuals, after income tax, went up by an average 6.2 per cent compared with the same period in 1972. If Canadians have a net increase in income, it is due to a large extent to the fact that the financial budgetary reductions of last February have borne fruit.

In spite of the substantial increases that we have witnessed in the cost of food in the last few months, we also have to look at the situation in its broader aspects to appraise the total situation of the economic conditions prevailing in Canada at the present time. The fact is that the present worldwide situation has caught all of us in its grip and, given the present rate of inflation, it therefore appears that even a few months' delay would prove a hardship to many Canadians. The bill before this chamber constitutes one aspect of the strategy adopted by the government to fight inflation.

● (1550)

This bill, honourable senators, is one of the projects proposed within the program designed essentially to protect the purchasing power of the Canadian consumer. Through this legislation, 3.5 million Canadian families will benefit next month from a monthly allowance of $12 per child.

Although the government itself in normal circumstances cannot relate salaries to the variations in the cost of living, that being exclusively done by both employers and employees under collective agreements, the government with the approval of Parliament can increase family allowances in order to supplement the salaries of Canadians with dependent children, and for whom the cost of living means still greater financial commitments. As I have already mentioned, a legislative measure has been introduced in the other chamber to increase the current family allowances to $20 per month per child starting January next. The present bill proposes to immediately increase family allowances to $12 per child, and for adolescents under the age of 18. Consequently, this legislation will prevent families living on a small employment income from finding it more advantageous to quit working and live entirely on public assistance by becoming recipients of social assistance. Indeed, unlike social welfare benefits, wages do not take into account the size of the family and the resulting financial charges. In most provinces, couples with two or more children receive higher social allowances than the provincial minimum wages.

The working paper on social security which was submitted last summer by the Department of National Health and Welfare suggested that an income supplement system be implemented for these people. However, the development of such a system requires a detailed study of the political and administrative issues involved, and close co-operation with the provinces. It is hoped that the work undertaken will be successful. On the other hand, the family allowances program is useful in preventing the small wage earner being swept over by family charges that he no longer can bear because of the rising cost of living and forced to live on the fringe of society. This bill brings a temporary solution to the problems of such people.

The measure now before us proposes that family allowances be brought up to the minimum level set by the federal government for the general review of the Family Allowances Act and the Youth Allowances Act, namely, $12 per child per month. This provision will result in a direct increase in the benefits paid to the three and a half million families in Canada. That increase alone means an average increase of 60 per cent in the family allowances that are now paid to Canadians.

Another remarkable feature of the present bill lies in the fact that the increased payments will not be taxed. It follows that there is a clear-cut increase for every recipient of the family allowances payments at this time and fully accruing to them immediately, with a further net increase in January under the proposed reformed family allowances program. These measures will ensure that the amount of purchasing power is maintained for low wage earners.

I shall now explain some of the details of the bill, which while an important one is also very simple because it contains only five clauses. Clause 1 merely repeals section 3 of the Family Allowances Act and replaces the existing rates of $6 and $8 respectively by a single monthly average rate of $12.

Clause 2 repeals subsection (4) of section 4 of the Family Allowances Act, and is merely consequential upon the amendment contained in clause 1. Subsection 4(4) of the present act provides that the payment of $10 should become payable for the month immediately following the tenth birthday of any child.

Clause 3 provides for the application of the new monthly average rate for any month commencing after September 30 next.

Clause 4 repeals section 3 of the Youth Allowances Act, and increases the monthly allowance from $10 to $12.

Clause 5 provides that the increase in the Youth Allowances Act shall be applicable for any month commencing after September 30 next, as in the case of the increase in the family allowances rate.

In conclusion, honourable senators, this legislation, coupled with the measures for the immediate increase in the OAS and GIS payments, with allowances for quarterly escalation, demonstrates the manner in which the government is using its power and its responsibilities under the two universal direct payment programs as one facet of its whole thrust to combat the effect of inflation which we are now feeling. There is a hope that this package will contribute to ensure the maximum value in purchasing power for the Canadian consumer, child or pensioner, and the low income, middle income or higher income Canadian. However, these measures will only constitute an interim step. It is hoped that the government will continue working to provide the best form of income security possible—that is, the reduction of the rate of inflation itself.

In these circumstances, I would urge you, honourable senators, to give this bill your immediate consideration, without sacrificing your undeniable right to give the measure the fullest consideration possible under the rules of this honourable chamber.

On motion of Senator Macdonald, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Friday, September 14, 1973

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Hon. Paul Martin tabled:

Report of the Superintendent of Insurance on the administration of the Investment Companies Act, for the period January 1, 1972 to March 31, 1973, pursuant to section 27(1) of the said act, chapter 33, Statutes of Canada, 1970-71-72.

Revised Capital Budget of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation for the year ending December 31, 1973, pursuant to section 70(2) of the Financial Administration Act, chapter F-10, R.S.C., 1970, as approved by Order in Council P.C. 1973-2568, dated August 31, 1973.

INTEREST RATES

INCREASE TO BENEFIT PUBLIC TREASURY—QUESTION

Hon. J. Harper Prowse: Honourable senators, I should like to direct a question to the Leader of the Government. I am sorry that I did not have a chance to give him notice, but perhaps he will be able to deal with it despite the lack of notice.

In view of the fact that the government is taking action to ensure that the oil companies do not just accumulate windfall profits as a result of the international oil situation, and in view of the fact that the various financial institutions in this country, for purposes of national policy and in the hope of slowing down the economy, are finding it necessary once again to increase their interest rates, will the government give consideration to the possibility of considering every increase in the interest rate as a tax to be collected for the people of the country and to be payable to the public treasury rather than allowing this increase to provide windfall benefits to those financial institutions?

Hon. Mr. Martin: I will certainly be glad to take that question into consideration with the government.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: Would the Leader of the Government also give consideration to redefining the question to make reference to Liberal policy rather than national policy?

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Would you mind repeating that?

Hon. Mr. Phillips: The Honourable Senator Prowse in directing his question referred to national policy. I asked that that be changed from national to Liberal policy.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: It is synonymous. It is the same thing.

STATUTE LAW (SUPPLEMENTARY RETIREMENT BENEFITS) AMENDMENT ACT, 1973

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from yesterday the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mr. Forsey for the second reading of Bill C-220, to amend the statute law providing for the payment of supplementary retirement benefits to certain persons in receipt of pensions payable out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund.

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, in adjourning the debate yesterday I thanked the Honourable Senator Forsey for his introduction of the bill. I stated at that time that he anticipated certain criticisms. I shall attempt to live up to his anticipation in that regard. Before doing so, however, I should like to thank Senator Forsey for omitting one aspect of the introductions and explanations we have had recently. I have in mind the references to inflation as a sort of "Manna from Heaven." Senator Forsey neglected to include that in his speech and to those of us in the Conservative Party who are opposed to inflation the fact that we were not expected to accept inflationary fallout as a benefit was greatly appreciated.

This is another of those pieces of emergency legislation which were very much in the mind of the Leader of the Government on September 6. One must ask if anyone on the government side had read the legislation when they considered it to be an emergency, because the legislation does not come into effect until January 1, 1974, roughly four months from the time it was introduced. Since it was not the effective date of the legislation that was the emergency, one must ask what the emergency was. Perhaps it is unfair to make this suggestion at this time, but I feel the real emergency was that both of the Prime Ministers, the Honourable Mr. Lewis and the Right Honourable Mr. Trudeau, wanted to be out of Ottawa and have Parliament in recess before Statistics Canada released the latest figures on the cost of living. I think that had a great deal to do with the emergency on September 6.

● (1410)

While I am on the subject of inflation, honourable senators, may I, in a lighter manner, point out that today we have a rather important sign in this chamber of the effect of inflation. We are quite accustomed to honourable senators wearing roses, or boutonnières of some description. However, today I notice an awful lot of honourable senators opposite are wearing some form of plastic button. As a result of inflation, they can no longer afford the boutonnières. If they are still unable to afford a rose when we return at a later date perhaps a daisy or something of that nature would fill in just as well.

Hon. Mr. Prowse: A rose would be cheaper than this.

Hon. Mr. Laird: This cost $50.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: I have not been sending roses lately, Senator Prowse, so I am not up to date on the cost.

The legislation before us emphasizes just how stubborn this government can be. For years the government insisted that all was well because there was a 2 per cent escalation clause in our social security program. Taking the advice of some of its supporters, it was hanging tight. Unfortunately, "hanging tight" overlooked a great many of the more important facts of life. One only has to look back over the past few months to find that in January of this year the cost of food increased by 10 per cent; in February by 10.2 per cent; in March by 11 per cent; in April by 12.9 per cent; in May by 14.6 per cent, and in June by 16.7 per cent. Meanwhile, the government was hanging tight to a 2 per cent escalation clause.

The government speakers, particularly those of the other place, have pointed to the generosity of the government, saying that those who retired prior to 1970 will receive supplementary benefits at a rate of approximately 11.5 per cent. That, of course, was before the figures were released yesterday; it will probably be much higher as a result of those figures. But let us look at the other side of the coin. If we are that far behind in our escalation of social security benefits, surely someone in the Liberal Party must have recognized it and, equally certain, the prime ministers and the members of the cabinets refused to consider the matter until they were forced, during an emergency session of Parliament, to deal with it. That credit goes to only one party, and that is the Opposition party, the Conservative Party.

Part I of the bill deals with those public servants who retire before reaching the age of 60. I would like to remind honourable senators that two or three years ago the government was urging public servants to retire early, to take these wonderful retirement benefits and make way for employment for younger persons. We heard a great deal about it. In fact, most government speakers developed a sore tonsil from it. We now have two problems before us: those who retired and those who are still unemployed, and government speakers now have two sore tonsils as a result of enshrining inflation and unemployment as part of Liberal policy.

The President of the Treasury Board, in his explanation of the supplementary benefits, pointed out, quite rightly I think, that there is a time limit in which the consolidated revenue fund will bear the cost of the supplementary benefits. After that those public servants still working will be required to increase their contributions. Are you laughing, Senator Lamontagne? Are you laughing at the Senate?

Hon. Mr. Lamontagne: No. I was just asking Senator Benedickson if he would make a speech on this.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: That is fine. After yesterday's question I thought maybe you were laughing.

The public servant now beginning his public service will in the future be required to increase his contribution to the pension fund. This is to be phased in, as the minister explained, and the increased contributions will come into full effect on January 1, 1977. The public servants have been warned. I can only tell them to look out, because the President of the Treasury Board has already stated that the contributions planned for January 1, 1977, will not look after the superannuation fund, and increases will be required after that date.

About this time last year we were attempting to obtain information on the unemployment insurance fund. We received information from three different sources, none of it accurate. Perhaps it is not too much to ask the government to make an effort to ensure that the information issued on the state of the superannuation fund will be more accurate than that issued on the unemployment insurance fund a year ago.

The government has a rather strange arrangement in dealing with the Public Service superannuation fund. As honourable senators know, there are various organizations representing public servants. These organizations are authorized to deal with the Treasury Board in respect of pay rates and working conditions. Yet when it comes to pension rates the Treasury Board selects an advisory board, not the public servants; they do not elect them, they are not allowed to make any recommendations. The Treasury Board selects an advisory board, which recommends to the Treasury Board certain actions; and of course the Treasury Board is not obligated to follow those recommendations.

● (1420)

For some reason or other, I seem to think that Senator Forsey for a number of years was connected with a labour organization of some type. I wonder if this was the recommendation that he made to his labour organization, that the employer select an advisory board that would deal with the union superannuation fund. I do not think he did that.

Hon. Mr. Forsey: No.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: The superannuation fund is invested at 6 per cent. The reason the government gives for investing at 6 per cent is the fact that they must associate it with and keep it at a level with the interest paid on the Canada Pension Plan. Today, interest rates and mortgages are 10 per cent, and after yesterday's increase in the bank rate they will likely be 11 per cent.

Honourable senators, are we being fair to tie our public servants to a 6 per cent interest rate on a superannuation fund. I do not think so. Perhaps we will hear more of this from Senator Forsey, as I notice that he is making a note. I am sure he is much more qualified to make suggestions to the government than I am; and he might even get more attention than I do—as I have not been too successful in my recommendations to the government.

Hon. Mr. Buckwold: Keep trying.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: Keep trying? It was King David and the spider, I believe, that finally succeeded—

Hon. Mr. Forsey: Bruce.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: Who knows but that we may get up the cobweb, too.

It is interesting to note that through our social security legislation pensions have been tied to the 2 per cent escalation clause. The reason given by the government has been the Canada Pension Plan. Honourable senators will recall that when the Honourable Miss LaMarsh introduced this pension plan, it was going to put everyone in a political Garden of Eden. Somewhere in this political Garden of Eden there must be a boa constrictor, because something certainly squeezed the 2 per cent out of existence.

In his introductory remarks, Senator Forsey referred to the fact that certain changes are being made in the Armed Forces Superannuation Act and in the retirement legislation of the RCMP. Previously, the retired members of the armed forces and of the RCMP could not benefit from the 2 per cent escalation until they reached age 60. This bill purports to put these people on the same level as the retired public servants, by reducing to 55 the age in which they can benefit from the escalation clause. However, there is still an extreme gap between the public servant and the retired member of the armed forces and the RCMP. In order to understand this difference we must look at the terms of employment of a member of the armed forces or the RCMP. A member of the armed forces is required to retire at a certain age, depending on his rank. This makes it virtually impossible for the average member of the armed forces or the RCMP to acquire the necessary 30 years' service as outlined in this bill.

Following World War II, a great many servicemen stayed in the armed forces. These people, because of the age limitation for retirement, were forced to retire at age 45 or 50, and they retired on very small pensions. Yet they have no opportunity of making up the 30 years' required service. A number of these veterans went to private industry to look for employment, but they were not welcomed by private industry, particularly by the union shops, because at age 45 or 50 they would have very little time to contribute to union pension funds. Consequently, a great many of these veterans have entered the Public Service. Unfortunately, it is precisely in the Public Service that a very severe form of discrimination has been exercised against these veterans. If a veteran enters the Public Service his pension from the armed forces is reduced while at the same time he must contribute to the Public Service superannuation fund. Despite the fact that he may have more than 30 years' combined service in the government, he cannot retire before he reaches age 60.

If the government is going to combine the contributory periods in the armed forces retirement fund and the superannuation fund of the Public Service, then the government should give consideration to putting the veterans on the same footing as public servants who were in the armed forces and grant them the same benefits such as early retirement at age 55, and not penalize these public servants for having served in the armed forces. But with respect to the veteran who was in World War II, his situation is that he is even further penalized by the fact that in 1966 both the pay and the pension plan of the armed forces were changed. Prior to 1966 the lodging and food provided to a member of the armed forces were not considered part of his pay; today he receives a specified salary, depending on his rank, and, if he lives on a military base, he is charged for his food and quarters. Consequently, those who retire after 1966 are, with respect to their pensions, in a far more advantageous position than those who retired before 1966.

This should not be a very expensive situation to correct, because it is a rather unfortunate statistic that retiring members of the armed forces who are veterans of World War II have a life expectancy of only five years in retirement.

When speaking to the previous bill, once again I raised the matter of veterans' disability pensions, asking when the same escalation clause would apply to them. I note that the minister stated in the other place that consideration was being given to putting that escalation into effect, and I would simply ask Senator Martin to use his good influence and offices in this regard.

• (1430)

Hon. Eugene A. Forsey: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I wish to inform the Senate that if the Honourable Senator Forsey speaks now his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on second reading of this bill.

Hon. Mr. Forsey: Honourable senators, I wish to speak only very briefly in reply to the speech of the Honourable Senator Phillips. As I listened I was reminded of that eighteenth century couple—

Let observation, with extensive view,

Survey mankind from China to Peru.

I say that, honourable senators, because while the Honourable Senator Phillips did not cast his net quite as wide as that, he gave us a very comprehensive critique of a large number of pieces of legislation now on the statute books. I was grateful to him that we did not have to listen to what I might call the customary commination service read over the government from the opposition benches here. Those of you who are familiar with the Anglican Prayer Book, as I know Her Honour is, will recognize at once the reference—that long list of maledictions, "Cursed be he that removeth his neighbour's land-mark. . . . Cursed be he . . ." that does this, that and the other thing.

We were spared that today, and I think we should be very grateful to the Honourable Senator Phillips for the moderation with which he spoke.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Mr. Forsey: I am a little surprised that he suggested, if I understood him correctly, that members of the government and their supporters have been suggesting that inflation was manna from heaven. I had thought that every speech I heard from the Liberal side either in the other place or here had been very far from suggesting anything of the kind. There may have been some suggestions from the opposition benches, in one place or the other, that some people in the government and among government supporters thought that the redress of certain injustices by this and accompanying legislation might be looked upon as manna from heaven. But I certainly do not think that any phrase like "manna from heaven" has ever been applied by anybody in any party to the existence of inflation or to any fallout which may result from it.

I am not going to attempt to answer the points that Senator Phillips has made about various pieces of legislation. There may well be a great deal in what he says that a number of these acts on the statute books could well do with amendment and could be improved. I am not sufficiently familiar with the various pieces of legislation to be able to say anything useful on that point at present. I merely point out that at present, we are, as Senator Phillips acknowledges, in a series of emergency sittings. He was inclined to cavil with the word "emergency", but at least originally we were supposed to be coming back for a relatively short time, first to deal with the resumption of railway service and then, as events developed, to deal with certain aspects of the problem of inflation or the results of inflation. I think if we were to undertake the comprehensive revision of a series of statutes which Senator Phillips' criticism of this bill seems to suggest, we should be here for a very long time indeed. I am not in a position to say whether the government is or is not going to introduce legislation to deal with any of the matters that Senator Phillips mentioned.

I think that from nowhere more than from this chamber would there be a howl of protest if legislation of this magnitude were introduced now for the consideration of the two houses, and I am perfectly certain that if we were doing our duty in this house, and if any such legislation came before us, it would be under consideration for a very long time indeed, and it might be difficult even to get this particular legislation that we are considering now into effect by the beginning of January, 1974, which Senator Phillips was inclined to think was a little bit late in the day.

May I be permitted just one other comment in view of the reference to my long association with the trade union movement. I have no hesitation whatever in saying that I think collective bargaining in the Public Service ought to include the matter of pensions. Since that is customary in industrial relations generally, I think this is a serious defect in the existing legislation on the subject. But that that is, after all, not what we are discussing here this afternoon, and if we started to go into that question alone, let alone the numerous others Senator Phillips has raised, again I am afraid that we should be here for a very long time.

As it is, I think it is quite clear Senator Phillips is not suggesting that we should, in fact, attempt to embark in committee on a series of detailed amendments to this bill which would cover some of the points, if not all of the points, he has suggested.

I venture to hope, therefore, that we may be able to proceed, with leave, to the final stages of this bill today, and that it will not be necessary to refer it to the appropriate committee of the Senate. But, as I said when I moved second reading, I am entirely in the hands of the Senate, and if it is the desire of honourable senators to go into this matter in detail in committee, then no one could have less objection than I.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read a third time?

Hon. Mr. Forsey: With leave, now.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: I am prepared to give leave for third reading today on the understanding that the sponsor of the bill will consult Mr. Lewis and recommend to him the numerous changes I recommended in this bill.

Hon. Mr. Forsey: Honourable senators, I think we had a ruling the other day—oh, no, I am sorry, it was elsewhere—but I understand it is contrary to the rules to give leave on condition, that leave must be either given or withheld. I don't know if I am correct in that.

I am afraid I am not on such terms with the leader of the NDP in the other house that my representations to him on any subject would be received with very much more favour than those of Senator Phillips are received by the government, according to his own account.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Even as an old member of his party?

Hon. Mr. Prowse: Not so old.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Ancient.

The Hon. the Speaker: With leave of the Senate and notwithstanding Rule 45 (1) (b), it is moved by Honourable Senator Forsey, seconded by Honourable Senator Lapointe, that this bill be now read the third time. Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

● (1440)

FAMILY ALLOWANCES ACT YOUTH ALLOWANCES ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from yesterday the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mr. Langlois for the second reading of Bill C-223, to amend the Family Allowances Act and the Youth Allowances Act.

Hon. John M. Macdonald: Honourable senators, I do not propose to speak at any length upon this bill. It is actually very short and has been adequately explained. As you know, its purpose is to increase the payments under these acts to a flat $12 a month per child from the present payments of $6, $8 and $10. As 3-1/2 million families will receive at least some benefit from the legislation, it is certainly entitled to our support. As mentioned by the sponsor, this is actually an interim measure designed to offset, to some extent, the evil effects which inflation is having upon these families.

I do not suppose anyone would claim that the legislation would do very much to offset the ever-increasing cost of living, and certainly not as much as the proposed new legislation contained in Bill C-211. As I understand it, it is proposed by the provisions of that bill that there be an average payment of $20 per month per child, with a minimum of $12, which is from where the payment of $12 contained in the bill under consideration was derived. I appreciate, of course, why that bill has not been proceeded with, because the provinces have time remaining in which to inform the federal government of the method they wish to employ for averaging the new allowance. However, it is also obvious that the $12 payment now proposed cannot be considered satisfactory. It must be borne in mind that it was proposed in July to increase the average payment to $20 per month, with a minimum of $12, and in my opinion it certainly cannot be denied that since July there has been a substantial increase in the cost of living. In consequence of this the $20 increase has been eroded before ever being paid. As I also understand it, under the proposed legislation the minimum $12 payment was to go to those needing it least, while under this legislation the $12 will also go to those who need it most.

Honourable senators, firstly, I do not understand why the government does not now make $20 the minimum payment. To do so would not necessitate interference with the consultations and negotiations proceeding with the provinces. I would urge that the same guidelines could be retained, yet the minimum of $20 per child established. A minimum of $20 would require an average of $28 or $30 per child in order to keep the same proportion. This, I believe, would be a much more realistic approach to the problem of offsetting the ever-increasing cost of living. I know it is too late now to have this bill amended, but I would urge the Leader of the Government in the Senate—who, I may say, has an unequalled record of accomplishment in the social service field—to impress upon his colleagues the need to increase the proposed minimum allowance from $12 to at least $20 per child.

Honourable senators, at this time I do not propose to discuss government policy in relation to inflation. I do wish, however, to make one short comment in connection with the policy urged upon the government by Senator Everett in his speech one week ago. I understood from his speech that while he agreed that measures should be taken to increase the income of those most seriously affected by inflation, he did not believe that any drastic action, as it were, should be taken to control it. He was all for a free economy and mentioned that there should be no controls and no tinkering with the economy. Honourable senators, in my opinion he was advocating an economic philosophy and policy which were discarded in Canada a great many years ago. We have been tinkering with the economy in one way or another ever since 1867, and have had direct or indirect controls almost that long. Every time an item is added to or deleted from the Customs Tariff, every time a subsidy is given or taken away, every time a foreign country is asked to limit its exports of certain items to this country, we are tinkering with the economy and exercising indirect control.

Personally, I do not believe that there is such a thing as a free economy and, in my opinion, it is a very good thing that there is not. We would really be in a bad way if we left the economy to the tender mercy of the ruthless play of economic forces. I do not wish to be too critical of Senator Everett's speech, but I simply add that I do not know what he meant when he said the government "should hang tough with the Opposition, it should hang tough with the media, and it should hang tough with the public." It sounded to me as though, rather than speaking to the bill before the house at that time, he was speaking of the retention of capital punishment in Canada.

Honourable senators, while I support the bill before us, may I say that although I consider it to be good legislation as far as it goes, I do not believe it goes far enough. Honourable senators, I do not consider it necessary to refer this bill to committee.

Hon. W. M. Benidickson: Honourable senators, I remarked yesterday that when we deal with one piece of legislation which contains substantial and relatively costly social benefits we must consider other measures which are being or should be implemented with respect to that portion of our constituency which requires some aid in these times of rising prices. It is true that by means of this bill we are at the moment increasing, for the benefit of more than three million families with children in this country, the family allowances from an average of approximately $7 to one of $12 per child.

Senator Macdonald said that we should immediately legislate in accordance with the notice of legislation to come, given last July under which the family allowance payment would be $20 per month. However, Senator Macdonald also said that such legislation has not been brought forward so far because of a commitment made by the Government, after a considerable amount of complaint from the provinces, that the provinces would be consulted with respect to major changes in social assistance legislation.

● (1450)

There is some suggestion that when that bill comes before us, increasing the family allowance to $20 a month, the provinces will have increased authority and increased jurisdiction as to just what the rates of payment will be within the provincial boundaries. That would be considerably different from our practice heretofore, whereby the entire bill for these increased payments has been borne by the federal taxpayer and administered federally. I am somewhat perplexed about the result of the proposal to come, which would give the provinces a veto power or the power to change a universal payment, the revenue for which is raised solely by federal taxation. I am all the more concerned with respect to such legislation as a result of reading this morning's edition of the Montreal Gazette.

We are here for the purpose of giving immediate help, because of the dire inflationary situation in which we find ourselves, and especially those on fixed incomes. However, under this proposed bill the treatment is universal. Both the affluent and the poor will receive this payment, only what is paid in the way of family allowances under it will be taxable. We will not have the redistribution of wealth contemplated by the former Minister of National Health and Welfare, because of the howls from the wealthier people in this country and those in the higher income brackets when it was suggested that they, through an income tax means test, might not be the recipients of this increased family allowance. I remember it was that same group, when I was a member of the House in 1945, when family allowances were being introduced, which protested loudly and from whom there was much criticism. Last year it was suggested, for better redistribution of the wealth in this country and in order to reduce the immense amount that a payment of $20 per month per child would involve, that those above a certain income level would not receive family allowance benefits. Again there was a terrific howl, the result being that the government, according to its present proposal, surrendered and proposed to continue with universal payments under the family allowances scheme.

We run a great risk when we propose a certain type of legislation that we hope will be of assistance to those in greatest need if we invite the provinces' intervention. Last week the government provided a milk subsidy of 5¢ a quart, thinking that such a subsidy would be beneficial to those consumers in our society who are most in need. This is particularly relevant to the bill before us, as it deals with children, for whom we all agree an adequate supply of milk at a reasonable price, or at the lowest possible price, is most desirable. However, according to this morning's Montreal Gazette, in the case of the province of Quebec the full benefit of this subsidy will not be passed on to the consumer. I think Quebec is the first province which has given any indication of its intention with respect to the milk subsidy. It was stipulated in a statement issued by the federal Minister of Agriculture that this milk subsidy would cost about $108 million. He not only went so far as to say that it would maintain existing prices for 12 months, but he was even optimistic enough to think that there was perhaps room for a rollback in prices, to the benefit of the consumer. In any event, we would have price stability for 12 months, provided that the provincial government milk boards co-operated and did not take advantage of the subsidy to reduce their own current or intended contribution by way of subsidy to the milk producers.

This morning's Gazette reports as follows:

> Quebec consumers will only get a penny out of Ottawa's five-cent a quart subsidy on milk prices, it was announced in Quebec City yesterday.
>
> Beginning next Monday, the minimum price of milk will drop from 35 cents a quart to 34 cents, agriculture minister Normand Toupin announced in a press release.
>
> Most of the federal subsidy will go to cover an increase promised to Quebec's dairy farmers last summer.

So, we learn that most of the federal subsidy will not go to the consumer, but will offset the subsidy being paid, or promised to be paid, out of the treasury of the Province of Quebec. In other words, the consumer and, more particularly, the parents of children whom this legislation was intended to help, will not get that intended reduction of five cents a quart on milk. This is the type of thing we have to watch very carefully, when we are dependent on the provinces for co-operation in a good intention.

In our present discussion on ways to beat inflation, it has been proposed that the price of oil be stabilized. It is all very well to hope that the consumer be protected regarding the cost of gasoline and fuel oil, but insofar as the retail price at the pump is concerned, that is not within the jurisdiction of federal Parliament. We must have co-operation from the province if we are to have stability in the price of gasoline at the pump. There is no indication that the provinces are prepared to walk side by side with the federal government in protecting the consumer in a field as important as that.

Let us look at general welfare. We cannot decide whether we have an appropriate figure in this bill for assistance in raising children unless we recognize the substantial number of families in this country dependent on welfare. The rates of welfare payments are set by the provincial governments, although not so very long ago the federal government, under the Canada Assistance Act, agreed to pay, without a ceiling, 50 per cent of what each province decides to pay to families on welfare.

The bill before us provides for an increase from $7 per child to $12 per child, and it is proposed that on January 1, 1974 this be raised to $20 per month, on average, per child. We do not know what the provinces will do under the legislation. Some of them may decide to redistribute that amount. In fact, it is not $20 on average. We know that in all provinces, conspicuously in some of the wealthier provinces such as the province of Ontario, what is paid as welfare to the disabled—the handicapped, those unable to work, those entitled under provincial statutes to help, which we describe as welfare—is only a fraction of what is provided under the senior citizens pension act that we recently revised. The provinces pay less in welfare than we pay a couple on old age pension. In many provinces they must have more than two children to receive under welfare payments as much as we pay to an elderly couple under our old age legislation, which is dispensed solely by the treasury of the federal government. These all have to be considered in the light of a bill such as we have here, which will involve a great deal of expenditure, and legislators must assure themselves that they are not ignoring certain other very needy elements of our population, such as those who are on welfare.

● (1500)

I am not amused by but I do have regard for what I heard said yesterday in the other place on a special debate with respect to inflation. About all I heard from one of the three Official Opposition financial critics in the other place was that he deplored that the government was not doing enough to fight inflation. One of the very few specifics causing inflation was that the government was spending too much money. In the last two weeks, with practically unanimous consent, Parliament has been ready and willing to increase greatly the amount of federal expenditures. I have no quarrel with all these proposals. I simply quarrel with those who vote for these things and then decry the massive expenditures that, in the almost unanimous opinion of Parliament, as in this case, are necessary.

The Conservative Party has been suggesting since February that the core for change and the best concrete way of dealing with the current inflation would be a 90-day freeze on prices and incomes. The 90 days has long since expired, because this proposal was first presented to Parliament in a want of confidence motion in February. They have had a think-tank for more than 90 days, and I deplore the lack of concrete suggestions, beyond what the government proposes, and beyond what we have been dealing with in the last few weeks. After these 90 days of thought became available to them, what do they say should be done beyond what is being done? As I say, about the only thing that I heard yesterday was a suggestion that we put in a freeze and the government expenditures were too high. In this bill we are raising them right now.

Where would the farmer, who has been getting little more than a decent return for his products in the last few months, be if the freeze had been put on in February as proposed? Where would the railway worker be? The Official Opposition proposed a week ago in settlement of the railway strike that we permit a change in the bill giving four cents an hour more in the first year to the non-ops and other railway workers. They would not have got any raise if this Tory freeze had been effective, as the Official Opposition proposed last February. These are things that I think we disregard.

There are many places where I think all of us see what we cannot avoid seeing as suspiciously like profiteering. Today Senator Prowse mentioned the banks. We have read that in the first six months of this year one of the largest banks reported an increase in profit of 50 per cent over last year. I am not going back to the low period of earnings, perhaps in 1970, but compared with 1972, which was a very good year for banks, some profits went up 50 per cent in only the first half of this year. The same is true of recent filings of financial statements by food companies in recent weeks.

The automobile people, who have been enjoying unprecedented profits, have recently gained in the United States promises of substantial increases in prices for their 1974 products. They present increased costs for certain safety items. But where is regard taken, over the period since the last increases, for some better productivity? Surely something has been done to improve efficiency in these plants that would provide earnings for some of the new apparatus that has to be supplied in the safety field. Increased prices all have to come from the consumer, yet there are increased profits seen of substance.

This year there were four increases in oil prices before the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources urged the industry to put on restraints and voluntarily keep prices at the wellhead at the current rate. It is rather late to make that proposal after four increases have been made this year. The Quebec Minister of Financial Institutions has said that the prices were completely unjustified, yet I do not see that the legislature of the Province of Quebec, which has jurisdiction in setting gasoline prices to the consumer at retail, is meeting for the purpose of dealing with this problem. We have dealt with it to the extent that we are now urging the price to be stabilized at the wellhead.

This morning there was a very radical proposal that there be an export tax, which will help pay for some of these other counter-inflationary measures financed by the federal government. It was proposed that there be a tax of 40 cents per barrel on oil exported. I read in the papers this morning that that might increase federal revenues, while it is in force, to the extent of about $15 million a month. That will go quite a way towards paying the cost of this and other emergency bills, as well as food subsidies that we are giving and have given approval to.

Reference has been made to food prices so often in recent weeks. We all have applauded the subsidies that have been provided to stabilize the cost of milk and bread. Very little has been said about the fact that a greater amount of the family income is disbursed for housing than is disbursed for food. I am rather disappointed that in these emergency sittings that have interrupted our proposed recess very little has been said about solutions to the high cost of housing today, aggravated, of course, by the rising interest rates.

Yesterday's newspapers comment upon a very noteworthy report made to our largest province, the province of Ontario, pointing out that 300,000 to 400,000, one out of six of the population in Ontario, are in very dire housing straits, and all of them need some assistance from governments.

● (1510)

I say that regrettably we are not dealing with housing at the present time, although it is a family problem. This bill will assist in raising the income of families which have children. It will be particularly helpful to those in the lowest brackets, and will assist with respect to housing costs. This measure will help everyone universally, because even those in the highest brackets will not be paying taxes on this $12 per child, although it is proposed that they will pay income tax on the $20 payment when it is put into law. But even the wealthiest in the land will then retain the difference between 100 per cent and the percentage rate of their personal income tax, and that probably averages out to 40 per cent or less. The person paying the highest income tax—and I believe the highest personal rate would be about 63 per cent—would retain 37 per cent of the family allowance payments.

I saw a heading in one of the Ottawa newspapers the other day to the effect that redistribution of wealth is seen as a result of proposals for increases in family allowances. I do not think we need to shudder or be disturbed about these increases of family allowances. Last week in the other place there was an indication of the percentage of our governmental income that has been allocated to family allowances. Soon after they were first introduced in 1947 it was 8.99 per cent, and the percentage allocated at the end of the 1972-73 year fell to 2.48 per cent. I must say that even under the new proposals the redistribution of wealth for this purpose will not be too noteworthy. In so far as present rates are concerned, the portion of our national expenditures that goes to family allowances is about one quarter of the percentage that was allocated for the same purpose back when they were first introduced.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: They were first introduced on July 1, 1945.

Hon. Mr. Benidickson: That is right, and the studies and recommendations were made in 1944.

Now, somebody remarked that the prime minister of that day was not regarded as incautious when it came to expenditures of public funds, but what was considered desirable in the redistribution of wealth at that time—in giving those persons who were regarded as being most in need, those with families—what was subtantial from the point of view of gross national product or gross federal expenditure, would be only a fraction, about one quarter, of what it was last year in relation to both of those indices, gross national product and federal government expenditure.

I hope that when the $20 figure is reached there will be a little more noticeable progress in the redistribution of wealth, because certainly we have not over 25 years seen very much change. The amount of income, the high percentage, that is retained by those in the upper income brackets has remained pretty static, while at the same time the amount in the lowest income brackets has similarly remained at about the same percentage as it was 20 years ago. Hopefully, when new figures are presented to us they will show that the increase in family allowances in January 1974 is a little more helpful with respect to redistribution, and that there is more equity in distributing the wealth of this country.

Certainly, this bill does not go very far in that regard, although it is a good bill. The Opposition everywhere has indicated its approval, notwithstanding the fact that the next day it might berate the government for increased expenditures, the curtailing of which it says would be one of the best means of reducing inflation. I quite admit that there are many places where expenditures are made that, in my opinion, are undesirable and unnecessary, and I say it is the role of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance to pursue those. I think the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance, not engaged in vote-seeking, has a great role to play—and it does play the role well—in suggesting whether expenditures are necessary or desirable. But these possible savings, which are known to all of us, are infinitesimal compared to some of the expenditures we feel obliged to make or feel it is desirable to make, and which we approve almost unanimously, as we are likely to do again here today. Nevertheless, we will hear this constant berating of an administration for increased total overall cost every year.

Hon. Leopold Langlois: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I wish to inform the Senate that if the Honourable Senator Langlois speaks now his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on second reading.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Honourable senators, we are all grateful to our esteemed colleague, Senator Macdonald, for his timely remarks on this bill. I am sure his remarks will receive every consideration possible. We are also grateful for his willingness to co-operate in the consideration of this important measure today.

Senator Macdonald referred to a point which I thought I had covered fully yesterday apropos the inclusion in the present legislation of an increase to $20 monthly as provided in Bill C-211, instead of the present proposed total monthly average of $12.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: May I interject for a moment? If I said that, it was certainly not what I meant to say, because I realize that we cannot amend this bill to raise the amount to $20.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: I grant you that, Senator Macdonald, but as I explained yesterday the reason why we are not proceeding now with the amount suggested in the legislation originally placed before Parliament, and introduced on July 1 last, to wit, a monthly average of $20, is that in this proposed reform of the family allowance system the government is giving the provinces latitude to apply their own variations to best suit the needs of those for whom they are responsible. This, as I explained yesterday, necessitates some discussions and negotiations as between the provincial and federal governments. A time schedule has been set for those negotiations to take place, and the limit is some time in the middle of next month. It was considered that this time could not be further curtailed, if we wanted to give time to the federal Department of National Health and Welfare to adjust its own administrative mechanism to whatever variations the provinces decided to apply. That is the reason why we could not proceed with this reform at this time.

[Hon. Mr. Benidickson.]

As I also explained yesterday, what we need now are measures capable of immediate application, because we are faced with a situation which must be remedied immediately; that is, the necessity of remedying the ill effects of the inflation which is continuously eroding the purchasing power of the Canadian consumer, and more particularly of low-income Canadians.

● (1520)

This is the reason why we are not now proceeding with this originally anticipated reform of the family allowance program, and the government has decided to introduce a measure which will come into effect at the end of the present month to remedy the situation created by this galloping inflation.

At this point I think I should point out what the total expenditure will be simply as a result of implementation of the legislation now before us. The total expenditure under the family allowance program for the present calendar year is $640 million. With this new program, based on a period of three months—that is October, November and December—the total will increase from $640 million to $745 million, an increase of $105 million. This does not mean that the increase will be limited to this amount, because there is no time limit in the present bill. It is anticipated that the new reform bill, Bill C-211, will be in effect in January 1974, but this, of course, depends on the will of Parliament. If the reform bill should not be passed by January 1974, the present increase will carry on for whatever additional period is necessary to bring that legislation into law, and each month after January 1974 will mean an addition of approximately $35 million per month. This is quite a substantial injection into the economy of the country, and it goes, as I have already explained, directly and immediately to these lower income groups who are the most affected by inflation.

I think this consideration alone makes it urgent to pass this legislation in order to bring an immediate remedy, even if it is only an interim step—and I agree with my honourable friend when he says that this is only an interim measure. It will be remembered that when introducing the bill I added that it was hoped the government would direct its endeavours to establish income security by combatting directly the rate of inflation, in trying to keep it at the lowest possible level.

For these reasons, I am very grateful, as I know all honourable senators are, to my honourable friend for his co-operation, and again I thank him for his timely remarks.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Langlois: With leave, now.

The Hon. the Speaker: With leave of the Senate and notwithstanding Rule 45(1)(b), it is moved by Honourable Senator Langlois, seconded by Honourable Senator Martin, that this bill be now read the third time. Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. W. M. Benidickson: Honourable senators, I apologize for rising to speak twice on this subject, but having regard to the mood of the chamber, as I interpreted it, and since there seemed to be unanimity of approval regarding the bill, I discarded my notes. My memory not being as good as it should be, I left out what I consider to be my most important point, and that is a proposal that might in some way alleviate the increased cost involved in the enacting of this legislation, other proposals for food subsidies and other measures to help those in greatest need in present circumstances. I was going to refer to the desirability of study and early action, if recommendations can be obtained for it. I think that perhaps there should be a Senate investigation of the matter.

In my view, the time has come to consider the situation of selected industries which we think have been getting windfall profits of great substance, where it might seem there has been actual gouging of the consumer, and where advantage has been taken of exceptional circumstances. I would propose that the Finance Department should study rapidly the implications and desirability of having in selected cases an excess profits tax. We had such a tax before to prevent profiteering, and to tax windfall profits. I think it is not out of the way at this time that such a suggestion should be made.

I read in the Canadian section of last week's issue of Time magazine about a report from Professor John Crispo, Dean of the Faculty of Management Studies at the University of Toronto, in which he urged, as I have done, the need for escalation of welfare programs. The article, quoting Professor Crispo, says:

> —the Government should mount a "vigilant pressure point program" against those who are "rocking the boat." His list of boat-rockers covers a broad social range: unions imposing inflationary work conditions, professional groups charging exorbitant fees, Government departments that are overstaffed and spend too much.

In his report, Professor Crispo said:

> After a cross section of offending groups have the skeletons in their closets exposed and dealt with, others would think twice about continuing measures that would invite similar treatments.

The article concluded:

> If nothing else, that would publicly separate those taking advantage of inflation from some of those victimized by it.

I think if such a tribunal were set up it could determine who is taking advantage of the situation and what industries are getting exorbitant windfall profits. I say this, honourable senators, because if unpalatable action is not taken—and this action would be unpalatable to many, including myself—then the whole country will suffer. The disappointment of the present legislation is that we are not ready to be tough enough.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

• (1530)

ROYAL ASSENT

NOTICE

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that the following communication had been received:

GOVERNMENT HOUSE
OTTAWA

14 September 1973

Madam,

I have the honour to inform you that the Honourable Wishart F. Spence, O.B.E., Puisne Judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, in his capacity as Deputy Governor General, will proceed to the Senate Chamber today, September 14, at 4.45 p.m. for the purpose of giving Royal Assent to certain Bills.

I have the honour to be,
Madam,
Your obedient servant,
André Garneau
Brigadier General
Administrative Secretary to the Governor General.

The Honourable
The Speaker of the Senate,
Ottawa.

CROP INSURANCE ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

On the Order for Monday, September 17, 1973:

Second reading of Bill C-129, intituled: "An Act to amend the Crop Insurance Act".—(Honourable Senator Martin, P.C.).

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate I move that Bill C-129, an Act to amend the Crop Insurance Act, set down on the Orders of the Day for second reading on Monday next, September 17, 1973, be brought forward and placed on the Orders of the Day for this date.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators, that this order be brought forward?

Hon. Mr. Benidickson: Honourable senators, the proposal that this bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for Monday next was made by the Leader of the Opposition, who is not present. Can another honourable senator speak for him?

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Yes, I was about to do so. It was my understanding that at this stage of the proceedings the Leader of the Government would explain the situation as to why this request is made, when the Senate will adjourn and when it will be recalled, if necessary. I would like to hear that explanation.

Hon. Mr. Martin: I had assumed we would deal with that on the motion for adjournment, but I have no objection to doing it now. I discussed the matter with the Leader of the Opposition and other persons concerned with such questions this morning. It was agreed that this bill be considered today. I indicated that as there is no other legislation now before us, it would later be moved that we adjourn until October 30 subject, of course, to recall. It was understood that we would return in an emergency, or to deal with legislation passed by the other place.

In the event of recall, as I have always endeavoured to do, I would consult with the Leader of the Opposition with a view to reaching agreement as to the course to follow. That has always been the situation as far as I understood it. However, so that there may be no ambiguity, I restate it now.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: I am sure we do not wish to engage in a debate similar to that which took place yesterday. However, in order that there be no misunderstanding, and because I was not the person who agreed on the telephone or elsewhere with the Leader of the Government as to the steps to be taken, I took no chances and obtained from my leader a statement to the effect that an agreement had been reached between him and the Leader of the Government. I wish to read that statement and have it included in the record. The statement of the Leader of the Opposition reads as follows:

> Honourable senators, the Government Leader has proposed we adjourn to October 30.

So far, that is correct. The statement continues:

> That is acceptable to us. He has also given us a commitment, which is that he will not recall the Senate before having consulted the Leader of the Opposition.

That, again, is correct.

> Now, let me be specific about what that means. The Government Leader has given us his assurance that he will not recall the Senate until the bill for which he might be recalling us has been passed in the House of Commons and has actually reached the Senate.

In other words, we do not wish to be recalled if the leader merely anticipates that the bill will have reached this chamber. This is his understanding. If it is incorrect, we will get into another hassle. The statement continues:

> Further, he has agreed that he will not recall us for anything but legislation of an urgent character—legislation that cannot wait until October 30.
>
> He has also agreed to discuss the question of urgency with the Leader of the Opposition and not to proceed unless there is a meeting of the minds as to whether or not the legislation really is of an urgent character.
>
> We are pleased with the very reasonable attitude the Government Leader is displaying—today.

Hon. Mr. Martin: I do not wish to become involved in an argument. However, legislation passed in the other place cannot be considered as having reached us until the Senate is in session. It cannot be said that we have a bill until we have first reading. First reading cannot take place unless the Senate is in session. The arrangement was as I believe I have stated it, that we would return in an emergency or when legislation in the House of Commons is passed.

If the Government considered that the Senate should meet, then I would consult with the Leader of the Opposition and we would endeavour to reach an agreement as to the course to be followed. I explained to him that I have certain responsibilities as a member of the Government which I must discharge but I also desire to discharge them, to the fullest extent possible, in the spirit of arrangements made with him. I do not believe there is any misunderstanding, and my statement of the problem is the situation which constitutionally governs and represents our discussion.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: I think that is as good as I am going to get.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed that this order be brought forward?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Hon. the Speaker: It is so ordered.

Hon. Margaret Norrie moved the second reading of Bill C-129, to amend the Crop Insurance Act.

She said: Honourable senators, in the Speech from the Throne reference was made to the government's intention to amend the Crop Insurance Act so that the farmers' cost of this protection could be reduced. Bill C-129 provides that where a province agrees to increase its financial contribution to the program by paying all of the administrative costs, instead of being reimbursed 50 per cent of these costs by the federal government, the federal government will increase its contribution to premiums from 25 per cent to 50 per cent. In this way both levels of government will share the increased assistance to farmers designed to reduce farmers' contributions from 75 per cent to 50 per cent of the premiums necessary to cover indemnities.

● (1540)

This amendment has the endorsement of the respective governments and of the ministers of agriculture of all provinces that now have agreements with the federal government under the Crop Insurance Act. In fact, five provincial governments, those being British Columbia, Alberta, Saskatchewan, Manitoba and Prince Edward Island, had their crop insurance agencies sell crop insurance to farmers in 1973 using a rate structure based on the increased government contribution set out in this bill. It is understood that until this bill is passed these provincial governments will advance 50 per cent of the premium to the respective crop insurance funds and pay all administration costs.

The Crop Insurance Act was passed in 1959, and has been amended three times to make improvements designed to improve the program and to increase its usefulness to the farmers of Canada. Crop insurance was first sold to farmers in Manitoba in 1960, and the program was expanded to include Saskatchewan in 1961, Prince Edward Island in 1962, Alberta in 1965, Ontario in 1966, British Columbia in 1967, Quebec in 1968, and Nova Scotia in 1969.

Farmer participation has increased slowly. In 1972, 49,742 farmers purchased insurance worth $161 million for a total premium of $11,726,000. Total indemnities which will be paid on last year's insured crops will exceed $13 million, the largest crop losses occurring in Alberta, Ontario and Quebec.

The number of farmers protected by crop insurance in 1972 was 49,742, but this represents less than 20 per cent of the number of farmers eligible to purchase this protection. There are several reasons why many farmers have not used this program. Bill C-129 is one major step toward meeting farmers' objections, particularly the objection that the level of the guarantee is too low and the premium too high.

There is a large increase in the number of farmers who have bought insurance for the 1973 crop year. At the moment, even though all the figures are not in, it appears that there will be a 50 per cent increase in the number of farmers—from 49,742 farmers in 1972 to approximately 74,600 this year. A large part of the increase has taken place in Western Canada, particularly in the province of Saskatchewan. Due to changes in the program, particularly the effort put forth by the staff of the Saskatchewan Crop Insurance Board, over 24,000 farmers will be insured in 1973 as compared with 12,000 in 1972.

Variation in crop yields is one of the major risks of farming. This variation can be caused by any one of a number of unavoidable actions of nature, and often a combination of some.

The cost of any insurance program that might be designed to compensate a farmer for any crop damage would be prohibitive. Therefore, crop insurance is designed to guarantee a level of production on a farmer's total crop up to 80 per cent of his previous average yield, so that when a crop is seriously reduced the farmer is assured of a return which will generally cover his investment in the crop.

While many farmers would prefer a higher guarantee, the premium cost is often prohibitive when added to all the costs that a farmer faces each spring of the year. The most common level of coverage is 60 to 70 per cent of average yield, and the average premium for this coverage has exceeded 7 per cent.

In the 12 years that crop insurance has been sold in Canada $73,480,000 has been collected in premiums, of which the farmers have paid $52,179,000, and $69,328,000 has been paid to farmers whose crops were less than the guarantee. Thus, for each premium dollar paid by farmers in total, they have received $1.33.

Each year improvements are made in the terms and conditions of the crop insurance program to meet farmers' needs, but this bill will be a big step in permitting improvements in the size of the guarantee in relation to the cost to the farmer.

It is expected that the number of farmers who buy crop insurance in the next few years will nearly double. The basic idea of crop insurance—that a farmer decides to purchase protection before he sows a crop—is new to many farmers. Many farmers continue to self-insure or take a chance, or diversify to reduce risk of crop loss, or rely on government emergency grants.

Honourable senators, as all provinces step up their efforts to explain the advantages and the operation of crop insurance, particularly with the ever-increasing need for higher cash investment in every crop, one can see the majority of farmers using this program in the near future and benefiting from the stability of income that it provides.

Hon. Paul Yuzyk: Honourable senators, as has been so ably explained by Senator Norrie, this bill is designed to aid those farmers who, because of bad weather conditions, worm and insect infestation, or other causes over which they have no control, suffer heavy losses.

Bill C-129 really provides for a cost-sharing arrangement between the federal and provincial governments on the one hand, and the farmers on the other. In general, by this legislation the federal government, under the federal-provincial agreement, will provide up to 50 per cent of the total premiums on the conditions that the provinces pay all of the administrative costs of the program. The farmer's share will be up to 50 per cent of the premium. This greater federal contribution reduces the cost of protection to the farmers and, therefore, should encourage them to take out crop insurance for their own protection.

Up to this time, I understand that only 46,000 farmers, who constitute about 20 per cent of the farming population, have taken advantage of crop insurance. That is a very poor response. We know that many suffered severe losses last year, and even this year, and have received little or no aid because they were not covered by crop insurance. This legislation will bring the cost of protection down considerably, thus aiding those farmers who, through no fault of their own, find themselves in distress.

The increased federal contribution in this cost-sharing arrangement will now make it possible for the administrators of the crop insurance program to improve their facilities in order to educate a larger proportion of farmers in understanding the program to the extent that it gains their confidence. Farmers should be made aware that it is to their advantage to make use of this program regularly.

There are many problems that could be discussed with regard to the weaknesses in this insurance program. For example, I understand that some farmers had great difficulty in collecting insurance benefits, and many received no benefits whatever because damage to their crops could not be evaluated by inspectors until two or three months following the damage, and sometimes not until winter had already set in. This probably helps to explain why many farmers lost confidence in crop insurance. I hope that the federal Department of Agriculture will intercede with the provincial authorities to improve the services of the crop insurance program in this and many other respects.

● (1550)

We are aware that the provinces are waiting for the passage of this bill, as they cannot prepare their programs for 1974 until the bill becomes law. Again the government has been slow in getting the bill through the other place, where it was introduced on March 29 last. We can now only consider this as legislation for an emergency situation. This week the present weak government suddenly realized it had a commitment to the provinces.

As far as it goes, we welcome this legislation and approve its speedy passage. It is a worthwhile measure in helping to stabilize the production and income of farmers. But there must be a broad agricultural policy, which will create the stability needed in agriculture. This government does not appear to have an overall agricultural policy that will satisfactorily meet the basic needs of farming and of agriculture at the present time.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mrs. Norrie: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(b), I move that the bill be read the third time now.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

ADJOURNMENT

Leave having been given to revert to Notices of Motions:

Hon. Leopold Langlois: Honourable senators, I move, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until Tuesday, October 30, 1973, at 8 o'clock in the evening.

This motion, of course, is made with the reserve of the earlier remarks by the Leader of the Government about the possibility of recalling the Senate between now and then.

Motion agreed to.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

ROYAL ASSENT

The Honourable Wishart F. Spence, O.B.E., Puisne Judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General, having come and being seated at the foot of the Throne, and the House of Commons having been summoned, and being come with their Speaker, the Honourable the Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General was pleased to give the Royal Assent to the following bills:

An Act to amend the Crop Insurance Act.

An Act to amend the Family Allowances Act and the Youth Allowances Act.

An Act to amend the Old Age Security Act.

An Act to amend the statute law providing for the payment of supplementary retirement benefits to certain persons in receipt of pensions payable out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund.

The House of Commons withdrew.

The Honourable the Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General was pleased to retire.

The sitting of the Senate was resumed.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, October 30, 1973, at 8 p.m.

THE SENATE

Tuesday, October 30, 1973

The Senate met at 8 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

NEW SENATORS

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I have the honour to inform the Senate that the Clerk has received certificates from the Registrar General of Canada showing that the following persons, respectively, have been summoned to the Senate:

Raymond Joseph Perrault, Esquire

John Morrow Godfrey, Esquire

Maurice Riel, Esquire

NEW SENATORS INTRODUCED

The Hon. the Speaker having informed the Senate that there were senators without, waiting to be introduced:

The following honourable senators were introduced; presented Her Majesty's writs of summons, which were read by the Clerk Assistant; took the legally prescribed oath, which was administered by the Clerk and were seated:

Hon. Raymond Joseph Perrault, of Vancouver, British Columbia, introduced between Hon. Mr. Langlois and Hon. Mr. Laing, P.C.

Hon. John Morrow Godfrey, of Toronto, Ontario, introduced between Hon. Mr. Langlois and Hon. Mr. Stanbury.

Hon. Maurice Riel, of Ville Mont-Royal, Quebec, introduced between Hon. Mr. Langlois and Hon. Mr. Giguère.

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that each of the honourable senators named above had made and subscribed the declaration of qualification required by the British North America Act, 1867, in the presence of the Clerk of the Senate, the Commissioner appointed to receive and witness the said declaration.

[Later:]

Hon. Daniel A. Lang: Honourable senators, I know I am out of order but I would like, if I may, with your unanimous leave, to congratulate the Prime Minister of Canada. I am not doing this in a partisan way, but I wish to compliment the Prime Minister on the appointments he has made to this body, our new colleagues whom we have received tonight.

I know we pay tributes to those who leave us from time to time, and I think we might revive the welcoming of new appointees to this body, particularly when they are men like Senator Perrault, Senator Riel and Senator Godfrey, coming to strengthen our forces.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Your weak forces.

Hon. Mr. Lang: There is a certain partisan tone that comes from the other side of this place on occasion.

I would like particularly to welcome these three men tonight, and I hope that they will very soon feel at home. Senators Perrault and Riel I know very well by reputation, and their reputation comes very high. Particularly, of course, I have for many years known our new Senator Godfrey. Although I recognize the significance of the flower he wears in his lapel, I must say that here we have a man whose political, professional and social wisdom far transcends political considerations.

I know that Senator Godfrey will bring to our deliberations a professional approach that will be a tremendous contribution to our function as legislative analysts.

Professionally Senator Godfrey brings a reputation for brilliance of mind, a learned and perceptive legal mind, from which we will benefit greatly. Above all, he has very deeply embedded in him a dedication to serve, whether it be in the social, political or professional field, far above and beyond his own self-interest. That is a quality that I know we all welcome, entice and are grateful for in this chamber.

Honourable senators, I know I have your leave to make these few remarks. Tonight we are being strengthened by our new appointees. We will look to them for hard work and dedication, and I hope they will feel very much at home with us.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Honourable senators, I am pleased to join with my colleague Senator Lang in expressing a most hearty welcome to our new colleagues this evening. I was waiting until we disposed of the Orders of the Day before doing so, but I am pleased to join with him at this stage in saying to our new colleagues that we expect from them a worthy contribution to our debates. They are indeed welcome among us.

CRIMINAL CODE (CAPITAL PUNISHMENT)

BILL TO AMEND—FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-2, to amend the Criminal Code.

Bill read first time.

Hon. Mr. McIlraith moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading on Thursday next.

Motion agreed to.

ELECTORAL BOUNDARIES READJUSTMENT ACT

BILL C-222 (PEEL SOUTH)—FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-222, respecting the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act.

Bill read first time.

Hon. Mr. Grosart moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading on Thursday next.

Motion agreed to.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Hon. Leopold Langlois tabled:

Report on operations under the Regional Development Incentives Act for the month of July 1973, pursuant to section 16 of the said act, chapter R-3, R.S.C., 1970.

Copies of Declaration issued following the Ministerial Meeting on the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade (GATT), held at Tokyo, September 12-14, 1973.

Calendar of The Royal Society of Canada for the year 1973-74.

Report of operations under the Canada Water Act for the period ended March 31, 1973, pursuant to section 36 of the said act, chapter 5 (1st Supplement), R.S.C., 1970.

Copies of a statement by the Minister of Manpower and Immigration, dated September 17, 1973, respecting problems on immigration policy now under study.

Copies of a communiqué issued by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources following a meeting between representatives of the governments of Canada and the Province of Quebec respecting oil, held in Ottawa, September 14, 1973.

Revised Capital Budgets of the National Battlefields Commission for the fiscal years ending March 31, 1972 and 1973, pursuant to section 70(2) of the Financial Administration Act, chapter F-10, R.S.C., 1970, together with copies of Orders in Council P.C. 1973-2179 and P.C. 1973-2180, dated July 19, 1973, approving same.

Capital Budget of the National Battlefields Commission for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1974, pursuant to section 70(2) of the Financial Administration Act, chapter F-10, R.S.C., 1970, together with copy of Order in Council P.C. 1973-2181, dated July 19, 1973, approving same.

Capital Budgets of Eldorado Nuclear Limited and Eldorado Aviation Limited for the year ending December 31, 1973 (English text), pursuant to section 70(2) of the Financial Administration Act, chapter F-10, R.S.C., 1970, together with copies of Order in Council P.C. 1973-554, dated March 8, 1973, approving same.

Public Accounts of Canada, Volumes I, II and III, for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1973, pursuant to section 55(1) of the Financial Administration Act, chapter F-10, R.S.C., 1970.

Report of the Superintendent of Insurance for Canada, Volume I, Abstract of Statements of Insurance Companies in Canada, for the year ended December 31, 1972, pursuant to section 8 of the Department of Insurance Act, chapter I-17, R.S.C., 1970.

[The Hon. the Speaker.]

Statement by the Secretary of State for External Affairs, dated October 15, 1973, on the government's policy on international bridges, with particular reference to the Ambassador Bridge between Windsor and Detroit.

Report on operations under the Regional Development Incentives Act for the month of August 1973, pursuant to section 16 of the said act, chapter R-3, R.S.C., 1970.

Report respecting operations under the Health Resources Fund Act for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1973, pursuant to section 13 of the said act, chapter H-4, R.S.C., 1970.

Report of the Law Reform Commission of Canada for the year ended May 31, 1973, pursuant to section 18 of the Law Reform Commission Act, chapter 23 (1st Supplement), R.S.C., 1970.

Copies of final Communiqué on the Commonwealth Finance Ministers' Meeting held at Dar es Salaam, Tanzania, September 19-20, 1973. (English text).

Copies of a Statement by the Minister of Finance respecting the Meeting of the Commonwealth Finance Ministers in Dar es Salaam, Tanzania, September 19-20, 1973, and the Annual Meetings of the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development and the International Monetary Fund in Nairobi, Kenya, September 24-28, 1973.

Copies of various Statements made at the Annual Meetings of the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development and the International Monetary Fund, held at Nairobi, Kenya, September 24-28, 1973, as follows:

(1) By the Minister of Finance, dated September 25, 1973.

(2) By the Chairman of the Executive Board and Managing Director of the International Monetary Fund, in presenting the Twenty-eighth Annual Report of the Executive Directors to the Board of Governors of the Fund, dated September 24, 1973.

(3) Report to the Board of Governors of the International Monetary Fund by the Chairman of the Committee on Reform of the International Monetary System and related Issues, dated September 24, 1973 (together with a First Outline of Reform).

(4) Concluding Remarks by the Managing Director of the International Monetary Fund at the Closing Session, dated September 28, 1973.

(5) Address to the Board of Governors by the President of the World Bank Group, dated September 24, 1973.

Statement concerning the immigration adjustment of status program made to the House of Commons on October 15, 1973, by the Minister of Manpower and Immigration.

Report on the effects of the Tariff, Sales and Excise Tax changes of February 19, 1973, on consumer prices, issued by the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and dated September 26, 1973.

Auditor General's Report to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration on the examination of the accounts and financial statements of the Unemployment Insurance Commission for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1973, pursuant to section 138 of the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971, chapter 48, Statutes of Canada, 1970-71-72.

Report of operations under the Farm Improvement Loans Act for the year ended December 31, 1972, pursuant to section 13 of the said act, chapter F-3, R.S.C., 1970.

Report on the administration of the Small Businesses Loans Act for the year ended December 31, 1972, pursuant to section 11 of the said act, chapter S-10, R.S.C., 1970.

Report of the National Museums of Canada, including accounts and financial statements certified by the Auditor General, for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1973, pursuant to section 22 of the National Museums Act, chapter N-12, R.S.C., 1970.

Copies of Trade Agreement between the Government of Canada and the Government of the People's Republic of China. Done at Peking, October 13, 1973. In force October 13, 1973.

Copies of background papers and statements relating to the Second National Tri-Level Conference on Urban Affairs, held in Edmonton, Alberta, October 22 and 23, 1973, as follows:

(1) Federal Position Papers prepared by the Department of Urban Affairs.

(2) Federal Data Book prepared by the Department of Urban Affairs.

(3) Statement on Public Finance prepared by the Department of Finance, together with Statement by the Minister of State for Urban Affairs.

(4) Opening remarks by the Minister of State for Urban Affairs respecting Housing and Land Use Strategy.

(5) Statements on the Management of Urban Growth.

(6) Statement on Transportation.

Copies of Order in Council P.C. 1973-3141, dated October 16, 1973, amending Part II of the Schedule to the Hazardous Products Act, pursuant to section 8(3) of the said act, chapter H-3, R.S.C., 1970.

Revised Capital Budget of the Farm Credit Corporation for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1974, pursuant to section 70(2) of the Financial Administration Act, chapter F-10, R.S.C., 1970, together with copy of Order in Council P.C. 1973-3193, dated October 18, 1973, approving same.

Report on the administration of the Industrial Research and Development Incentives Act for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1973, pursuant to section 17 of the said act, chapter I-10, R.S.C., 1970.

Copies of Order in Council P.C. 1973-3143, dated October 16, 1973, amending Part I of the Schedule to the Hazardous Products Act, pursuant to section 8(3) of the said act, chapter H-3, R.S.C., 1970.

Copies of Protocol of the Third Session of the Canada/USSR Mixed Commission on Cooperation in the Industrial Application of Science and Technology, together with appendices. Done at Moscow, October 19, 1973.

● (2010)

NEWFOUNDLAND

DEDICATION OF BOOK OF REMEMBRANCE

Hon. Eric Cook: Honourable senators, with your permission I should like to make a request of the Senate.

On Sunday, October 21 last there was a ceremony of deep significance to all Newfoundlanders held in the Confederation Room. On that day the Newfoundland Book of Remembrance was dedicated and, in the words of the Honourable Daniel J. MacDonald, the Minister of Veterans Affairs, it will henceforth "rest proud and silent in the Memorial Chamber of the Peace Tower."

On the following day in the other place, on the motion of the Right Honourable Mr. Diefenbaker, who spoke in eloquent terms of the event, it was ordered that the speeches of the Minister of Veterans Affairs and the honourable member for Mercier be printed as an appendix to Hansard of the other place. In making the motion the Right Honourable gentleman expressed the view that the speeches of the Speaker of the Senate and of our colleague, Major, the Honourable Senator Carter, who played an outstanding part in bringing about the creation of the Newfoundland Book of Remembrance, would be made available to the proceedings of the Senate.

It seems to me, with your consent, that this should be done. However, in order that a reader of our Hansard should be aware of the full proceedings I would ask that the Senate order that all the addresses made on Sunday, October 21, including that of the Lieutenant-Governor of Newfoundland, be made available and be printed as an appendix to today's Hansard.

Hon. William J. Petten: Honourable senators, I should like to associate myself with the remarks made by my honourable colleague, Senator Cook. I was most impressed with the ceremony of dedication of the Newfoundland Book of Remembrance. It has, in my opinion, forged yet another link between Newfoundland and the rest of our great country of Canada. For the honourable Senator Carter and all those involved in compiling the book, it was an arduous task, but I know from speaking to him and others that for them it was a work of love. I extend my most sincere thanks to all concerned.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is it agreed that Senator Cook's request be complied with?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Hon. the Speaker: It is so ordered.

(For text of speeches see appendix A, pp. 1062-1066.)

● (2020)

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

EXPANDED EUROPEAN COMMUNITIES—CONSIDERATION OF REPORT OF COMMITTEE—DEBATE CONTINUED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the consideration of the Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs, entitled: "Canadian Relations with the European Community".—(Honourable Senator Langlois).

Hon. Paul Desruisseaux: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: Has the Honourable Senator Desruisseaux leave to proceed in the place of the Honourable Senator Langlois?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Mr. Desruisseaux: Honourable senators, first, I should like to associate myself with the other senators who have congratulated the new senators who have come into our midst this evening.

[Translation]

Honourable senators, we have the opportunity once in a while to welcome prominent people in our midst. Such is the case for our three new senators. They come here not as to a place where they would have some interest but to see what is going on. However, the Senate, for me at least—and for many of us I believe—has become a real challenge. I congratulate them as well as the Prime Minister for his choice. Nevertheless, I sincerely regret to see the progressive weakening of the Opposition. I hope there will be opportunities some day for the Prime Minister to help the Opposition. Besides it is a popular tendency, and as I am from the province of Quebec, I am most proud tonight to take part in the Liberal party's victory in that province.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Desruisseaux: I will not deal with the situation, nor with the interpretations people want to put on it. All we can see at this moment is that we will have problems even if we do not want them. Having a big majority is already a very heavy responsibility as the government will also have to protect the weak. I am happy that the people's feelings on federalism and related matters were made clear once and for all in my province. I am also happy to see that 70 per cent of the Quebec population rallied to express themselves as to the future for the next few years. I also hope that the members of the new government will have the opportunity to deal, if need be, with the problems that may exist. However, I hope they will not have the same difficulties as in the past when dealing with them, considering how the people have shown their approval of federalism.

[English]

I have read with the utmost interest the report of the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs entitled "Canadian Relations with the European Community." Since its tabling here on July 12 by Senator Aird we have heard interesting ad hoc comments by Senator Grosart, Senator Rowe, Senator Buckwold and Senator Manning, who have given us the benefit of their experienced observations and constructive criticisms. They made a valuable contribution to the debate on this subject, and we are grateful to them.

As is pointed out in the report, Canada's exports to the European Common Market have not kept pace lately with the exports of competing nations. Despite the fact that the value of Canada's exports to this market has risen in the past 15 years from $422 million in 1958 to $1.1 billion in 1972, we are nevertheless registering a decline in our share of this lucrative export market, which is our second biggest. Moreover, we have also lost our surplus balance-of-trade position with the Community. In 1972, it amounted to $22 million.

However, no one can really claim that Canada has been idle in her attempts to improve her foreign trade relationships with the nations of the world in the last few decades. In fact, Canada has enjoyed a most important export growth, and now, after years of trade balance deficits, Canada is managing to reverse the trend and record comfortable export trade balances.

The external trade department, as of January 1, 1973, had 31 trade and tariff arrangements, or agreements, with the Commonwealth countries, and 90 with the non-Commonwealth countries. It also had important trade agreements and trade arrangements with the United States, our best trading partner, and with progressive Japan, the fastest growing export trading country in the world. Important new export trade agreements are presently in the making with the U.S.S.R. and with China, both excellent trade prospects which will be of significant consequence to all of us in the future.

When it comes to world trade, the European Community is by far the biggest force. It has a $150 billion market, including intra-community trade, and an approximately $80 billion market if intra-community trade is excluded. By way of comparison, the United States foreign trade market is a little less than $50 billion, and Canada's foreign trade market is about $15 billion.

We have to consider the deadline set for 1980 by the European Community for a great, dramatic, political and economic change for Europe and the rest of the world. As we know, what is involved here is nothing short of the creation of the structure and machinery for a new superstate, capable of taking its place as a fully confederated entity of states alongside the United States and the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, where it will have a political will as the United States of Europe. European technocrats are working at it, so far with recognized success.

They are preparing new frameworks, new infrastructures, for (a) a common monetary policy, a single currency, and a new European Central Bank, with respect to which the central banks of the individual countries will take subsidiary positions and toss aside their own monetary policies; (b) an economic union, providing for the melding of all economic policies into one European whole—a far-reaching objective which, in the past, war could not achieve; (c) an elected European Community parliament to replace the present assembly of 198 appointed members—an idealistic dream which it is hard to realize because it will establish a new and growing European bureaucratic machine that will have power over the people of the nine member states, who would then lose their matching democratic power; (d) a European foreign policy to impress on others what Europeans are thinking and saying; and (e) a free, internal market to guarantee unobstructed and simple trade amongst its members.

His Excellency James C. Langley is the Canadian ambassador to the European Community. For the first two and a half years, our ambassador to Belgium performed this role. We have now five Canadian specialists working there, and our ambassador states that our relations with the Community are excellent. As he pointed out, one of the functions of the mission is to represent our distinctive interests to the new European body, and the Community is aware of the many reasons for special intimacy between Canada and the United States. The Community is knowledgeable and understanding of our situation and our problems, and is realistic in its appreciation of our resulting relationships.

Our government's trade policies have long recognized that Canada's economy is vitally dependent on external trade. Our trade representatives and export trade experts have persistently underlined their importance in securing our prosperity, and along with it the development and extension of our social programs—so necessary for the well-being of Canadians, so necessary for the upgrading of our educational, medical and cultural standards, and so necessary if we are to lessen our regional disparities. The help, assistance and co-operation of those serving in the external trade field have not always met with easy success because there is intense competition from other industrialized nations. Nevertheless, some high objectives have been achieved for us.

● (2030)

[Translation]

When he appeared before the Senate committee, Mr. A. F. W. Plumptre, our Canadian high representative at the discussions on foreign trade with the Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development, said that a preferential agreement with the European Community would be discriminatory to the United States, Japan and other important foreign trade partners with whom Canada has done $15.2 billion worth of business in 1971, while Canadian exports with the Common Market only amounted to about $2.5 billion for the same year. Mr. Forest Rogers, financial advisor of the Bank of Nova Scotia, and Mr. Plumptre, both expert witnesses before the committee, remarked that the expected growth rate for the next decade was lower with the Common Market than with the United States and Japan. Moreover, they said that the United States bought 85 per cent of all Canadian exports of manufactured goods.

These experts took this opportunity to warn us of the danger of jeopardizing a high proportion of our exports if we granted to other nations preferential agreements that would be discriminatory.

Even though we will have to be very careful to avoid all kinds of discrimination against our current partners, whoever they be, I agree that we must make all useful and possible efforts to have closer trade relations with the European Community and other countries outside the GATT jurisdiction. Surely such closer ties would have the effect of developing our mutual business interests and complementing GATT without becoming some sort of substitute for it.

For his part Mr. Sharp informed us in committee that generally speaking the European Community had shown signs of willingness and readiness to listen to a typically Canadian proposal which would strengthen our bilateral relationships with western European Community countries and create an appropriate structure liable to bind together Canada and the European Community.

I note with satisfaction and reassurance that the arguments and recommendations contained in the report strongly support the concept of a non-discriminatory, economic, co-operative arrangement between Canada and European Community countries providing a broader base and favouring easier mutual co-operation on economic matters outside normal business arrangements.

● (2040)

[English]

The recent entry of the United Kingdom as a full-fledged member of the European Community will shortly affect their long-standing trade exchanges with us, and our existing mutual external trade agreements with them. This triggers new international trade problems for us which will now, more than ever before, attract us towards a possible broader trade rapprochement and a closer relationship with the Community to fill a coming economic gap in our export trade.

I should like to give my views on the Commonwealth, because I have always believed that the Commonwealth composed of 28 countries, representing 25 per cent of the world and a population of some 900 million, and offering a most lucrative trade potential, should be reactivated along more practical lines with goals that are as helpful to its members as the goals of the European Community are to its members. The relationships between the 28 members of the Commonwealth, even though very friendly and most acceptable politically, have been awkward and sluggish; somewhat more idealistic and symbolic, in my view, than practical. Its preferential tariff did not work as well as was expected. Somehow the Commonwealth relationship was not aimed, as it should have been in my view, at developing and expanding efficient economic trading projects for its members in order to make each highly progressive and fully secure. The evidence of this is there to see.

From 1963 to 1970 Canadian exports to Commonwealth and other countries to which we gave preferential tariffs increased from $1.4 billion to $2.2 billion, while our imports from the Commonwealth and those other countries went from $927 million in 1963 to $1.4 billion in 1973. In spite of the increased figures, it is perhaps Canada's worst accomplishment in the field of export trade with any group of countries during those years.

With the great and wonderful potential of the Commonwealth, the common purpose of action in many fields and the identical motivation for mutual advancement, benefits, and economic and social strength, how do we explain this? The Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs could, I believe, render the members of the Commonwealth a real service by analyzing what has happened and suggesting what can now be done. I have come to believe that the Commonwealth should have a new, modern charter to make it more efficient economically for its members. In my opinion, there is no doubt that the Commonwealth could be built into a much greater economic force. I believe we should not just stand by and allow this great and important association of nations to gradually diminish its services to the members and operate at a fraction of its capacity and capability. Its members are all in need of better and broader mutual economic assistance to expand their export trade and to provide, whenever necessary, a vigorous show of strength and unity of action in modern fields of endeavour for the achievement of far-reaching and progressive goals.

I believe that only a new revised charter for the Commonwealth would allow such initiatives, and the Community charter should in good part be the inspiration for a new Commonwealth economic relationship. Canada should take the lead in rebuilding, because it is one of the Commonwealth's most important members.

In the economic history of our industrialized world since Canadian Confederation there has existed a multilateral system of exchanges and payments. A stable monetary system with provision for continuous clearings of international transactions was the prime reason for the remarkable economic expansion that we have witnessed, and for the rapid increase in international exchanges. The Commonwealth did not give full consideration to such modern and essential economic tools, yet it was because of such instruments that economic interdependence rapidly increased everywhere in the world.

The remarkable results and benefits to Canada that will flow from the recent visit of the Prime Minister and his charming wife to our Oriental friends in China could be duplicated by similar visits to the countries of the European Community with great economic possibilities. This could bring about a positive follow-up to the Canadian policy paper of 1970 favouring closer ties between Canada and Europe.

It has been noted that financial and business groups have not moved in this area as much as they have in most other areas. Canadian business has no reason to be hesitant about undertaking new trade discussions and relationships with Europeans. As was pointed out, we have close cultural and linguistic ties with many European countries. Many of us have ancestral ties with member countries of the Community. We have competence and specialized know-how in a great many fields of manufacturing. Canadian products have become more competitive on European markets because of the revaluation of the European currencies, and because of our current productivity.

● (2050)

The devaluation of the American dollar, because the value of the Canadian dollar normally follows it closely, will be helping Canada just as much as the United States by making our products much more competitive internationally. Our business people are receiving the best assistance and the fullest co-operation from officers of the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce. I believe that no other nation has done better, and no nation could plan better for the future of its export markets.

The Senate committee made a recommendation that may have startled quite a few. It suggested that to provide increased penetration of Western European markets consideration should be given to (a) the establishment of subsidiary firms within the Community borders; (b) the acquisition of participation in established European firms; (c) the concluding of joint-venture arrangements; and (d) the securing of licensing arrangements under which Canadian products would be manufactured in Europe in return for a licence fee and royalty.

[Hon. Mr. Desruisseaux.]

There is quite a challenge in this kind of bold approach, but it is based on a philosophy that presently remains questionable. If there is to be this approach I can foresee the necessity for reviewing some of our taxation laws to make it fully possible and sufficiently attractive to manufacturing and exporting firms. Foreign manufacturing under licence is done now, but its success has not been too marked. Its widespread use could make Canadians suspicious; they might, rightly or wrongly, fear the loss of Canadian jobs and taxes. The committee made the important observation that the conclusion of a preferential agreement or associate arrangement with the Community is obviously not in the best interests of Canada.

As the report says, in view of the fact that 20 per cent of Canada's gross national product stems from export trade with our present trading partners, compared with 9 per cent from export trade with the Community countries, and only 4 per cent from export trade with the United States, Canada's interest lies in world trade liberalization. It is assumed, therefore, that our present external trade policy is serving Canada well by advocating and pressing for further reductions in tariff barriers, in agricultural restrictions, and in non-tariff barriers.

I am sure that no honourable senator is under the impression that the negotiations within the Community among its members, fully pledged or otherwise, or in its dealings with non-members, have been easy. They are not, they never were, and I believe, quite honestly, they will never be. As in any association or community of people, squabbles and differences are common occurrences. These will prevail so long as the Community exists, regardless of its membership. Discussion in common forums is still the best way of settling problems and differences of opinion, and achieving solid and broad economic goals for mutual advancement.

The European Community is only partly a trading entity, and its goal in this area is to build economic, monetary and political unions on enlarged commercial exchanges, mostly by elimination of their mutual tariffs.

It is not a uniform association. There are basic differences between full members, newly admitted members, and associate members, which are the neutral countries of Europe—Sweden, Finland, Austria and Switzerland. The United Kingdom since January 1, 1973 has been a full member. As in the case of the other members, it did so to protect its markets within the enlarged European membership through elimination of tariffs and other trade barriers. It must be realized at the same time that this means the constructing of common barriers between the Community and the non-members—the other countries of the world.

It was noted in the statistics in the appendices to the report that within the European Community trade rose by 530 per cent between 1958 and 1970 as a result of the progressive diminution of external barriers. In the same period, trade with the outside world grew by 183 per cent.

It was to avoid a trade war that might develop from a chain reaction of protective measures on both sides of the Atlantic that the new round of trade liberalization resulted from the enlarged membership. It created the framework for more harmonious relations in Western Europe for the next few years. The negotiations that took place recently between the United States and the European Community will provide a bilateral trade agreement without membership in the European Community, which should prove profitable to both the United States and the European Community. However, it will be largely at the expense of certain countries like Canada, and will result in loss of our export trade.

I was surprised to hear of this projected new trade pact so soon after the United States external trade policies were revised to establish tariff and other barriers against competing industrial nations. In the light of what is happening, it is in our urgent interest to follow suit, if possible; to negotiate with the European Community a similar trade agreement providing, first, a broader area of economic co-operation, and, secondly, offering, as the committee hopes, long-term prospects for trade in energy and resource materials that would include the processing of nuclear fuels and, in such potential non-tariff barriers as were mentioned, government procurement policies, countervailing duties, coastal shipping regulations, export subsidies and concessional financing.

● (2100)

In a foreign affairs report in Business Week of October 6, 1973, there was reference to the Community and the great number of multinational corporations that have made elaborate lobbying arrangements in Brussels, as well as making wide use of consultants and advisers in Brussels to keep tabs on the activities of the Common Market Commission and to make sure that the "Eurocrats" would hear well industry's side of pending issues. Many states have reinforced their foreign trade representation in the capital of the Community in order to make more accurate evaluations and assessments of Common Market activities, to keep in touch with developments of relevance to them, and to provide more efficient channels of communication.

I believe that such a policy would also be realistic for Canada. There is no better way to keep Canada as informed as it should be on the intelligent competitive approaches that can be made with the Community, and on how to sell efficiently Canadian trade goods to this important group of European countries. Consequently, I believe we should now provide greater expert assistance to our few valiant Canadian representatives in Brussels to ensure rapid and productive results.

[Translation]

The committee report did note the major role played by the emerging economic Community and Japan as major industrial powers.

Thus, the continuing difficulties met by developing countries and the increasing interdependence of economies to which Canada is not unrelated have placed the international trade problems under a totally new perspective. We should not forget that no industrialized nation will henceforth be able to avoid the growing need for periodic adjustments, whether it be at the monetary, industrial or foreign trade level.

Canada's current needs will certainly compel us to adjust our foreign trade policy and the committee report is rightly based on the conviction that Canada should immediately become more interested in the changes which have been taking place for the last few years in western Europe. We shall have to grow ever more aware of their eventual impact which will be quickly increasing.

This liberation effort between countries bound by trade agreements or treaties must be pursued in all tariff, quota and non-tariff fields. It must cover both the agricultural product trade and the industrial products or services area. Our isolation and nationalism in the field of international economy have become impossible for us. As an industrialized nation, we no longer have any choice. We belong to the industrialized community whose interdependence makes such rapprochements essential and vital—within our Confederation, between our provinces and, through our federation, with foreign nations.

I wish that in the case of the European Community countries we can achieve this objective without damaging our current partners, which we do not want to harm.

The work of the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs renders outstanding services to the Canadian people. The intelligent and complete study on the possible extension of our foreign trade with the European Community is an example, and we fully realize that closer ties with the European Community are even more possible following the study made of the objections, the problems as well as of benefits of closer relations. I think it was a fine piece of work, an intelligent study that will be useful and wide-ranging.

In conclusion, I commend our colleagues, the members of the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs. As a Canadian, I express to them all my gratitude and, I am sure, that also of my colleagues who are here tonight.

[English]

Hon. Allister Grosart: Honourable senators, it is my intention in a moment to adjourn the debate on this subject, on which Senator Desruisseaux has spoken so eloquently. I would like to say at once, however, that as one who was involved, as other senators were, in the preparation of this report, one of the things that makes that kind of an effort worth while is when it provides an opportunity for the kind of thoughtful and useful response to our efforts that we have just had from Senator Desruisseaux.

Tonight, however, it may be particularly appropriate, in the unavoidable absence of the chairman of the committee, Senator Aird, for me to put on record the fact that tomorrow and the next day we, Ottawa and the Parliament of Canada, will be honoured by the visit of a large and very distinguished delegation from the Parliament of the European Community. I think this is of particular significance to the Senate because, in the words of Senator Aird in his official announcement, this visit by these very distinguished members of the European Parliament is "a direct outcome of the contact established with the European Parliament during the Senate committee's visit to Brussels to study the European Community in March of this year."

On our return from Brussels, after our deliberations Senator Aird got in touch with Mr. Georges Lachance, the chairman of the House of Commons Committee on External Affairs and National Defence, and, in consultation with Her Honour the Speaker of this house and the Speaker of the House of Commons, extended an invitation to the European Parliament, the result of which will be the very important meetings in Ottawa tomorrow and the next day between these members of the European Parliament and parliamentarians, ministers and officials of the Canadian government.

It is also, I think, of particular interest to the Senate that one of the major recommendations in our report was that we hoped the European Community would in due course establish an information and liaison office in Ottawa as one step towards closing the very vast gap that we found between Canada and the European Community at many levels of communication.

I am therefore glad to say that tomorrow morning at 10 o'clock three very important officials of the Community will be meeting with the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs in Room 356-S to discuss informally and unofficially the recommendations of the Senate committee. I think honourable senators will agree that this is a notable and visible contribution of the Senate to a major Canadian problem of the present and the future. Honourable senators are, of course, invited to attend the meeting tomorrow morning and the meetings that will take place between the two committees and the European delegation on Wednesday morning and Wednesday afternoon.

On motion of Senator Grosart, debate adjourned.

QUEBEC

RESULTS OF PROVINCIAL ELECTION

Hon. L. P. Beaubien: Honourable senators, I am probably out of order, and perhaps this is unfortunate in view of the fact that three new senators have just been sworn in. I may be leading them down the garden path.

First of all, I welcome the new senators to this chamber and I am pleased to see them here.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Beaubien: I want to bring to the attention of honourable senators something that happened yesterday which I think is of extreme importance to all of Canada. But first I want to go back to two important earlier events. In 1939 Mr. Maurice Duplessis enjoyed a very large majority in the Quebec Legislature and he called a snap election. His platform was one of non-participation in the war and he was roundly defeated by Adélard Godbout, who was not the most flamboyant politician we have ever seen. Mr. Godbout had become the leader of what was then the discredited remnants of the Taschereau regime. When I say that I need only remind you that Alexandre Taschereau's brother had been sent to jail for embezzling provincial government funds.

The next event was the re-election in 1970 of Jean Drapeau as Mayor of Montreal. I don't think the electorate had been too pleased with Mr. Drapeau, but because he stood up for one Canada he received 92 per cent of the vote, which I think is an all-time record anywhere that free elections are held.

The third event I want to refer to is Mr. Bourassa's victory of yesterday. Mr. Bourassa completely wiped out, once and for all, all those little people who were going around saying that they were going to split Canada in two. The leader of that party was defeated, and every one of his lieutenants who was known was defeated personally. Mr. Bourassa got 102 seats out of 110, and I think it was a wonderful victory for us all. It was a wonderful victory for Canada, for us, and probably for our children, that the idea that somebody might come along and tear us apart has gone forever.

● (2110)

Honourable senators, I should like to add something that we should all remember. From now on we are perfectly safe as one country. As we have got every advantage under the sun, I think that was the only cloud on the horizon.

From a purely old Conservative point of view, of course, we get a little advantage too in the next federal election. Mr. Bourassa seems to have Quebec securely and solidly in the confederate fold, and therefore no leader of the Liberal Party can stand up and say that to keep Canada together he is indispensable.

Hon. Sidney L. Buckwold: Honourable senators, I wonder if some further comments following Senator Beaubien's remarks would be in order at this time, or perhaps later.

The Hon. the Speaker: It is in order if honourable senators do not object. Is it agreed?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Mr. Buckwold: I should like to take this opportunity, on behalf of the English-speaking senators from the part of Canada that has been watching this election in Quebec with a great deal of interest, to express my personal appreciation of the fact that Senator Beaubien has raised this issue in the Senate. I think, as he does, that it was a very important election, and one that meant a great deal to the future of Canada as a nation, as one nation. I am sure I speak for the English-speaking Canadians to our French-speaking colleagues in this great country in saying that we are proud of what happened in your province.

We agree to a very large extent with what Senator Beaubien has said. I would not agree that we can take Canada for granted. I am not quite sure whether that is what Senator Beaubien meant. I suggest that we still have to work very hard at keeping this one nation under one flag. Certainly it is a good indication that the rank and file, the ordinary common people—I refer to them as common in the very nicest way—of Quebec opted for Canada. They have shown this time and time again. I do not think any of us who speak English can rest easy that the concern that we have had, and that indeed the nation has had, is over forever. The problems we have should be faced, and there is a great challenge to English-speaking Canadians to participate in the whole development of a bilingual program. This is the kind of challenge that all of us as Canadians have to face, and we have to appreciate the problems of our French-speaking fellow Canadians.

I should like to make one further comment, again as a non-Quebecer, about the election. Once again it is an indication of the irresponsibility of many journalists. I am not speaking for the French press, but those of us who read the English press, or watched or listened to the communications media, the radio and TV, were led to believe by a group of journalists, who in many cases I would suggest have their own personal feelings about the matter and are inclined towards separatism, that this movement was much more powerful and more dangerous, from the point of view of literally taking over control of the government, than was really the case. This is an indication that these journalists did not represent to the reading, listening or viewing public the true feeling of the average Quebec citizen. This is the impression I get as an English-speaking Canadian, and I would hope that Quebecers are also aware of this situation, because it indicates the power of an irresponsible press. Even more, it shows that in the end the people know best, and they will vote in the best interests of the country as a whole.

I congratulate Senator Beaubien for raising this matter. I congratulate the people of Quebec for choosing Canada, and I look forward to the continued growth and development of our nation, French- and English-speaking.

• (2120)

TRADE

CANADA'S DEVELOPMENT AS A MANUFACTURING NATION—DEBATE CONCLUDED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator van Roggen calling the attention of the Senate to the question of Canada's development as a manufacturing nation in the light of world trading patterns today.—(Honourable Senator Lang).

Hon. Daniel A. Lang: Honourable senators, in regard to this Order which has stood in my name, Senator van Roggen gave a very lucid and penetrating speech on some of the problems connected with the development of our manufacturing sector. His remarks were closely related to the report of the Special Senate Committee on Science Policy.

When I asked that the Order stand, I did not do so with the intention of speaking later, as I felt there was very little I could add to what Senator van Roggen had said. I felt, however, that some other senators might wish to speak to it.

The position has changed very radically within the relatively short period which has elapsed, and therefore I would ask that the order be removed from the Order Paper.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is it agreed that Order No. 7 be removed from the Order Paper?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

EDUCATION

NUMBER OF CANADIAN GRADUATES FROM UNIVERSITIES—INQUIRY ANSWERED

Hon. Orville H. Phillips inquired of the government pursuant to notice:

1. How many Canadian students have graduated from university to date this year in each of the following faculties:

Arts,

Science,

Business and Commerce, and Engineering?

2. How many of these students have found employment to date in their chosen fields?

Hon. Leopold Langlois: Answered.

1. The estimated number of degrees[1] awarded as of July 1973 by Canadian degree-granting institutions in the fields designated in the question are as follows:

	Undergraduate level	Graduate level[2]
Arts	25,000	3,100
Science	7,000	1,100
Commerce & Business Admin.	3,100	800
Engineering	4,000	700

(1) The estimates are a combination of figures obtained via telephone by Statistics Canada and the Department of Manpower and Immigration, and figures estimated by Statistics Canada for several institutions which could not yet provide the required data.

(2) At the graduate level, data collected by Statistics Canada shows degrees by field and discipline rather than by faculty as asked in the question. Therefore the data was re-categorized by Statistics Canada to provide estimated figures according to the requested breakdown.

NOTE: The figures shown above are estimates of the total number of faculty and level. The institutions could not provide a breakdown by "Canadian" and "non-Canadian." As a possible indication of the split, information provided by the institutions regarding their 1971-72 enrolment shows approximately 7% undergraduate, and 30% graduate "non-Canadian" students enrolled full time in Canada. However, it should be remembered that the percentage of "non-Canadians" may vary considerably from faculty to faculty.

2. There is no data available concerning the number of students who have found employment in their chosen field.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

APPENDIX "A"

(See p. 1055.)

SPEECHES DELIVERED ON THE OCCASION OF THE DEDICATION OF THE NEWFOUNDLAND BOOK OF REMEMBRANCE IN THE CONFEDERATION ROOM, WEST BLOCK, PARLIAMENT BUILDINGS, OTTAWA, OCTOBER 21, 1973

THE HONOURABLE CHESLEY W. CARTER: Mr. Chairman, the Honourable E. J. Harnum, Lieutenant-Governor of Newfoundland, Madam Speaker of the Senate, Mr. Boulanger, representing the Speaker of the House of Commons, reverend sirs, Premier Moores, Mr. Minister, fellow parliamentarians, ladies and gentlemen. On behalf of the Newfoundland Book of Remembrance Committee, it gives me much pleasure to welcome you on this very solemn and historic occasion. Solemn because we are about to participate in the dedication of a Book of Remembrance in which is recorded the names of the men and women of Newfoundland who gave their lives in defence of freedom before Newfoundland became a province of Canada. Historic because for Canada as a nation it makes complete the Roll of Honour enshrined in the four Books of Remembrance resting in the Memorial Chapel in the Centre Block Tower of the Parliament Buildings. Historic also because for Newfoundland it marks the forging of another tie that will bind our province to the nation as a whole.

For our committee this ceremony marks the completion of a project which in the truest sense of the word has been a labour of love for all of us and to which we have given seven long years of persistent and painstaking endeavour. For many of us this is a dream come true. I first visited the Memorial Chapel in 1949, shortly after the opening of Parliament to which I had been elected as one of the seven Newfoundland representatives in the House of Commons, and when I saw the Book of Remembrance I thought: "What a pity it is that the names of Newfoundlanders who had given their lives in two world wars had no place in the national shrine."

The Second World War had then been over for nearly five years, and thirty years had passed since the end of the First World War so that the problems of collecting the names and essential information at that late date seemed insuperable. However, I did have some exploratory talks with the minister of that day and with some of his officials, and although they offered to give it consideration, because of the problems involved due to the passage of time, prospects did not appear very bright.

Then the Korean War started in 1950 and lasted until 1952. By this time I had learned enough to know that this was not a propitious period to pursue requests of this nature. By this time also, like all Members of Parliament, my constituency matters kept me constantly fighting deadlines and there was just no time for the pursuit of personal or individual interests. The same was true of the Minister of Veterans Affairs.

The dedication of the Korean Book of Remembrance on November 11, 1962, and the presentation of replicas to Premier Smallwood in 1963 brought the matter to the fore again. I also discovered that Major Syd Frost had been working independently on the same idea. Not only had he been pursuing the matter privately by correspondence, but he had done considerable research and had collected many names and much pertinent information. Provincial Command of the Royal Canadian Legion was also pressing the matter more vigorously, and as a result of this concerted effort, by 1966 sufficient spadework had been done to justify approaching the Minister (the Honourable Roger Teillet) formally by letter.

As a result, Premier Smallwood made a formal request to Prime Minister Pearson suggesting that a supplementary Book of Remembrance should be prepared. Mr. Pearson formally requested Mr. Teillet to look into this suggestion and he, in turn, made Major Gordon Way, Chief of D.V.A. Public Relations, responsible for exploring what had to be done and what arrangements would have to be made for the preparation of the Book.

On the provincial side, early in 1967 Mr. Smallwood requested Colonel Sir Leonard Outerbridge, the Honourable Myles Murray, Q.C., Colonel Jos O'Driscoll and Major James Fagan to constitute a steering committee with the Provincial Archivist, Allan Fraser, as Chairman and J. G. Channing, Deputy Minister of Provincial Affairs, as member ex officio. The committee had powers to add to their numbers and in June, 1967, Major Frost, Major Way and I were invited to serve on the committee. A few months later, Victor Snow, District Director of D.V.A. for Newfoundland, also became a member.

The committee proceeded almost immediately to engage Mrs. Rosalie McDonald as research worker and to place advertisements in all veterans' publications in Canada, Great Britain and the U.S.A., as well as in the local press and radio. Next, the committee contacted the heads of all religious denominations in Newfoundland, requesting them to ask their clergy to supply the committee with a list of all the names appearing on plaques and other memorials in their churches. Schools were also contacted and students in senior grades were asked to undertake as a school project the compilation of lists of fatal casualties from their respective communities.

The response was so tremendous and generated so much correspondence that a full-time corresponding secretary became necessary and Mr. Michael Murphy, a full-time member of the Newfoundland Archives staff, was seconded to the committee, free of cost, for this post.

The names accumulated through advertisements and research were advertised in the Newfoundland press and over Newfoundland radio and TV stations for verification. The cost of all advertising was borne by the Newfoundland Government.

By the end of 1967 sufficient progress had been made to engage the services of an artist-designer. Mr. Alan Beddoe who had been associated with the other Books of Remembrance was not available on a full-time basis, but the committee was fortunate to secure the services of Mrs. Yvonne Diceman and her assistant, Mrs. Sandra Armstrong, both professional artist-designers who were also specialists in calligraphy and illumination. Mr. Beddoe agreed to act as consultant.

Having acquired the artist-designers, the committee then got down to the details of size and format—the overall size of the book, the size and style of lettering, the number of lines per page, colouring and matters of this nature. The artist-designers on their part had to do a great deal of research. Much time and effort were involved in gathering up a lot of the old-time regimental badges (especially World War I) Needed for decoration purposes and also in getting the house flags of merchant ships that had been refitted as naval vessels. Since they were working on vellum (skin), their work was extremely exacting because of the Ottawa climate which can be either very humid or very dry. However, they have done a magnificent job as you will shortly be able to see for yourselves.

Next to be considered were the dedicatory pages and the binding. From the very beginning Mr. Way had acted as liaison between the committee and Mr. Sydney Cockerell of the firm of Douglas Cockerell and Son, Cambridge, England. Mr. Cockerell had already given us much valuable advice as to choice of vellum and type of binding, and since this firm had bound the Books of Remembrance for the South African and Korean Wars, the quality of their work was known and it was decided to have them bind the Newfoundland book also.

The late Dr. A. C. Hunter and Dr. George Story of Memorial University were approached and submitted verses and literary extracts which were approved by the committee—Dr. Hunter's for the dedicatory and introductory pages and Dr. Story's as inscriptions for the special openings of which there were eight: three for World War I (Beaumont-Hamel; Gallipoli; and The Battle of the Seas); three for World War II (The Battle of the Air; the campaigns in North Africa and Italy; and the campaign in Northwest Europe). Of the remainder, one page is dedicated to those who died unknown and unrecorded and the other is for addenda.

Contracts having been arranged with the technical experts and an estimate secured on the vellum and binding, the committee then provided D.V.A. with the information necessary for the submission of a specific proposal to Treasury Board. Treasury approval was given on December 21, 1967. The committee then turned its attention to the design of the altar on which the book will rest in the Memorial Chapel and also to the preparation of the replica which will be in colour and which on completion will be presented to the province.

Our committee was greatly saddened by the loss of our chairman, Allan Fraser, who passed away on November 16, 1969. It was a deep personal loss to all of us and a very severe blow to the committee, as no committee could have enjoyed a chairman of greater ability and understanding of all facets of the task that had to be done. We are happy that Mrs. Fraser is with us today to see the culmination of the work to which her husband gave himself with such outstanding devotion and dedication. Allan Fraser was replaced by Mr. H. W. Coombs, who had replaced Mr. Channing as Deputy Minister of Provincial Affairs.

The "dummy" had already been completed by June of 1969 and the committee for the first time had a visual presentation of what the finished book would be like. Unanimous approval was given to the introductory pages, the special openings and to the decorative material, all of which were explained by Mrs. Diceman and Major Way. Words could not express our admiration for the artistic excellence of its design. Work could now begin on the book itself and we all knew that the finished work would meet our highest expectations. From then on the committee concerned itself with the numerous details associated with a project of this nature.

It is impossible to compress the work of seven years into a time capsule of ten minutes, but I hope this rather sketchy outline will give you some idea of the history of the book and the work involved in its preparation.

Before closing, I should like to say a word about my colleagues on the committee. We were extremely fortunate to have Herb Coombs take over as our chairman. He has carried on in the tradition established by his predecessor, and in his official capacity as deputy minister he has been of tremendous help in connection with problems requiring government action.

Sir Leonard, with his great wisdom and experience, his broad knowledge of things military, his vast knowledge of so many other things including art, design, heraldry and the history of the Newfoundland Regiment, was a tower of strength at all times. When a little something extra was needed, he always knew how to put the right word in the right place.

Jos O'Driscoll, a veteran of both wars, Jim Fagan and Judge Murray, veterans of World War II, each brought to the committee his great personal knowledge of many of the men whose names are enshrined in the book, as well as of the campaigns and activities in which they were engaged. Victor Snow acted as Secretary to the committee, and we are indebted to him not only for the detailed accounts of our meetings, but also for the access he provided to the records of his department which greatly facilitated the committee's work. I know of no words that will adequately describe the amount of work done by Sydney Frost. He started the research on his own before any committee existed and he continued it right to the end, seeking information from numerous sources in all parts of the Commonwealth and the U.S.A.

In spite of all this, I don't know how the committee could have managed without the contribution of Major Way. He was our liaison with the authorities both in Ottawa and in Britain. His experience with previous Books of Remembrance and his knowledge and understanding of the technical problems involved were invaluable.

The Newfoundland Book of Remembrance has been produced jointly by the Government of Canada and the Government of Newfoundland. I should like to take this opportunity to express to both governments our very deep gratitude for the funds they made available for this purpose. Our very sincere thanks are due also both to the present Minister of Veterans Affairs and his officials and also to their predecessors for their encouragement and never-failing assistance in connection with this project.

We extend our thanks also to the Newfoundland press and media, especially to the Evening Telegram, the Daily News, the Newfoundland Herald, and to radio stations VOCM, CJON and CBN for the free advertising they gave us and to the smaller weekly publications for their greatly reduced rates.

The book about to be dedicated, like the others already in the Memorial Chapel, records for posterity the names of those who gave their lives that we may be free. It is up to us to see that they have not died in vain and that their memory continues to be hallowed in the land they loved.

THE HONOURABLE MURIEL MCQUEEN FERGUSSON (SPEAKER OF THE SENATE): Mr. Chairman, distinguished guests, ladies and gentlemen: I want to take advantage of this opportunity to welcome you to the Parliament Buildings of Canada, and to extend a special welcome to those who are here from far, far away. This is the seat of the Government of Canada, and these buildings are known throughout this broad land as the symbol of our democratic institutions; institutions which so many of you fought to defend, and for which many gave their lives.

My part in this ceremony is the introduction of the Honourable Frank Moores, Premier of the Province of Newfoundland and Labrador, for approximately two years. He is a native of Newfoundland and, because of his extensive business and other activities there, he knows it and its people very well. But he is no stranger to Ottawa, for he was a member of Parliament here for two years prior to returning to politics in his home province in 1970.

The Newfoundland Book of Remembrance, as we have just heard, was begun under another Newfoundland administration, but I have been told that Premier Moores has given it his support while he has been in office. Indeed, his presence here today, with six of his Cabinet ministers and a substantial representation of Newfoundland veterans and their wives is ample evidence of his support of this project, and of his interest in Newfoundland veterans. He may well be proud of them, and of their sacrifices and achievements.

Ladies and gentlemen, the Honourable Frank Moores, Premier of Newfoundland.

THE HONOURABLE FRANK D. MOORES (PREMIER OF NEWFOUNDLAND): Madam Speaker, Mr. Chairman, Your Honour, distinguished guests, ladies and gentlemen. First of all, it is a great honour as Premier of the Province of Newfoundland and Labrador to be here for this occasion today.

In 1968 the Government of Canada in conjunction with the Province of Newfoundland undertook to create a Book of Remembrance. Inscribed in this book are the names of all the veterans who lost their lives in World War I and World War II.

The major cost involved for the production of the book has been borne by the Government of Canada. Newfoundland had the responsibility for all the research, and the members of the committee contacted Governments as far away as Australia. Confirmation of the names that were received by the committee was carried out by the Department of Veterans Affairs with the assistance of the Commonwealth War Graves Commission.

This book includes the names of approximately 2,200 members of the Armed Forces who lost their lives during those two great conflicts.

I would like to give special mention to Mr. Sydney Frost who was the sparkplug behind this whole project. It was mainly through his efforts that the original committee was set up and funds were made available by the Government of Canada to the committee.

This book was created to place Newfoundland on an equal par with the rest of Canada where the names of Canadian servicemen have been inscribed in memorial books already installed in the Peace Tower.

I should like to extend the thanks of the Newfoundland people to the Government of Canada for underwriting the cost of this magnificent Book and also thank the government for the reproduction that will be eventually dedicated in Newfoundland sometime during 1974.

It is my understanding that the committee engaged the services of two artists to inscribe the names together with the badges of regiments, the crests of various ships on which Newfoundlanders served and appropriate insignia for the Air Force.

Ladies and gentlemen, Mr. Chairman, today is a very proud day for Newfoundland; proud in the remembrance of those who paid the supreme sacrifice. There are times today in our modern society when this almost becomes a cliché because the events happened so long ago. But the freedom we enjoy, the agony the families experienced at the time, the experiences of the veterans who are here today and the other hundreds of thousands of Canadians who served for a cause that we call freedom; is all worth while. On behalf of the people of Newfoundland I would like to thank those who served and pay a tribute to those who made the supreme sacrifice. I would also like to say to the veterans that today's generation is very appreciative of your contribution, and more importantly to say thank you for the generations yet unborn for the freedom which we as Canadians have an absolute obligation to uphold. Thank you.

[Translation]

MR. PROSPER BOULANGER, M.P.: Mr. Chairman, distinguished guests, ladies and gentlemen. It is with deep emotion and great joy that I have the honour this afternoon to represent the Honourable Lucien Lamoureux, Speaker of the House of Commons, and also the privilege of introducing the Honourable Daniel MacDonald, Minister of Veterans Affairs.

I think that there is no need to introduce Mr. MacDonald. Even if during the last years he has been before all a politician—first at the provincial level and now at the federal level—he has remained nevertheless strongly devoted to his first love, farming. And whenever his ministerial responsibilities allow him to do so, he likes to go back to the red soil of his farm in his province.

[English]

That he is a war veteran is obvious; and the scars he bears show that he knows, personally, what it means to be at the "sharp end" in battle. He is well aware too, also from personal experience, of the provisions of Canada's veterans charter and of the way in which its benefits have been, and are, administered.

[Translation]

The contribution of Canada and Newfoundland to two world wars was such that at memorial ceremonies it is difficult to find someone who has not lost a relative or a friend. This is all the truer in the case of men such as Mr. MacDonald who fought the enemy at close range. During the few months since his appointment as Minister of Veterans Affairs, Mr. MacDonald has proved that he has set his heart on the needs and aspirations of veterans and their families.

[English]

I am sure that, in unveiling this memorial to the war dead of Newfoundland, Mr. MacDonald will want to leave us a message that certainly takes a special significance, coming from a man with his past and experience.

Ladies and gentlemen, the Honourable Daniel MacDonald, Minister of Veterans Affairs.

THE HONOURABLE DANIEL J. MACDONALD (MINISTER OF VETERANS AFFAIRS): Mr. Chairman, reverend sirs, honoured guests, ladies and gentlemen. I am indeed privileged to be playing a small part on such a solemn and historic occasion. We are here to witness, and take part in, the unveiling and dedication of a book which commemorates the names of more than two thousand men and women who gave their lives bravely and willingly for the ideals of freedom which we all hold so dear.

These were a very special group of people and they came from a very special place. It is fitting that the Book bearing their names will rest, proud and silent, in the Memorial Chamber of the Peace Tower. Many of those whose names are listed here have no known graves but now their names are recorded forever in this book in the capital of our country.

It is also fitting that so many of their friends are here today. I would like to thank the Province of Newfoundland for arranging to bring so many of your brave sons and fair daughters to be witness to this memorable event.

The story behind the production of this book started over six years ago. A certain pressure group from one of the larger island provinces felt, and I must say with justification, that the names of their fallen heroes should be enshrined in the Memorial Chamber along with those other Canadians who had made the supreme sacrifice for their country.

One of the main driving forces in this group was a veteran of both world wars and a man who is held in great respect in his native Newfoundland. I refer to Major, the Honourable Senator C. W. Carter. I know—but I want to be sure that everyone knows—just how much Senator Carter contributed to the successful completion of the project. It is said that no man is indispensable, but Senator Carter came awfully close to proving that saying wrong.

A great many people contributed their talents and energies to producing this book and, unfortunately, it is impossible to name them all. There are, however, two whose dedication and industry must be identified. One of them, Major Sidney Frost, is with us today and I want to thank him officially for his part in initiating and bringing this project to a successful conclusion. The other one was Mr. Alan Fraser who regretfully did not live to see the fruition of his labours. I am happy to see Mrs. Fraser here today to witness the dedication of this superb piece of work to which her husband contributed so much.

Many others worked long and faithfully gathering the information which was required. I know that, when you see this book, you will appreciate that their reward is the knowledge of a job well done.

Canada has always deservedly had an international reputation for excellence in the ways in which she commemorates her war dead. Whether the memorials are in stone or vellum, they reflect the feelings we have for those who fell that we might live. They have a dignity and a glory worthy of those in whose memory they were created.

Just this summer, while on an inspection tour of our memorials and cemeteries in Europe, I had the privilege of visiting Newfoundland Park at Beaumont-Hamel. I know quite a few of you have made a pilgrimage to this hallowed piece of Newfoundland but I wanted to relay the feelings I experienced to all who are here today.

The impact of this impressive memorial was staggering. I came as a complete stranger but I was immediately filled with a compassion and awe for the courage of those who had passed this way on the first day of July in 1916. This monument is a worthy tribute to the fearless and intrepid men of Newfoundland who fell in World War I and who have no known graves.

In just the same way, I am confident that the Book of Remembrance which will be unveiled today will be a magnificent memorial to all whose names are inscribed in it. A special copy of this book is being prepared which will be presented to the Province of Newfoundland and which I understand will be located in a place of honour in St. John's where it will be readily available to the public. Copies of this book will also be sent to all the other provincial capitals so that ex-patriate Newfoundlanders living in those cities will be able to see them.

I would like to tell you about our procedure in Ottawa concerning the showing of the Books of Remembrance. The pages are turned daily, always at 11 a.m. which was the time of the cease-fire of World War I. The control system is such that anyone can request and be told the date on which the page containing the name of their loved ones will be open. In this way families of those recorded in these books can time their visit to Ottawa to coincide with the date on which the page in which they are interested will be on view.

I mentioned earlier that this book contains the names of more than 2,000 Newfoundlanders. The exact figure is 2,327. We realize, even though the search for names was painstaking, that there may have been some omissions. Provision has been made in this book to add the names of any who may have been overlooked.

So, what has been a labour of love, has now been finished. It started when the Honourable Roger Teillet was Minister of Veterans Affairs and it was conscientiously continued under his successors, the Honourable Jean-Eudes Dubé and Senator Arthur Laing. Now I have the privilege and honour of unveiling the Newfoundland Book of Remembrance. I do so with a deep feeling of both pride and sorrow.

(Minister reverently lifts flag from the Book, hands it to the Protective Service Deputy Chief who, with assistant, folds it and hands it back to the minister)

I will now ask the Honourable Joseph Harnum, Lieutenant-Governor of Newfoundland, to come forward, so that I may present this flag to him for safe-keeping in Newfoundland.

THE HONOURABLE E. J. HARNUM (LIEUTENANT-GOVERNOR OF NEWFOUNDLAND): Mr. Chairman, Mr. Premier, Honourable Speaker of the Senate, honourable ministers, reverend sirs, veterans, and guests. First of all, not only as Lieutenant-Governor of Newfoundland but more especially as Patron of the Royal Canadian Legion, I wish to thank you for inviting me on this most memorable occasion to an event which means so much to the people of Newfoundland. On their behalf I accept this flag with great humility and pride, and it shall be my pleasure to have this symbol of sacrifice and glory displayed in a prominent place in our native province within Government House where there are displayed the retired colours of the Royal Newfoundland Regiment, the present colours of the Royal Newfoundland Regiment, of the Canadian Legion, and of the Ladies' Auxiliary. Now this flag, which I have accepted, will make an historical addition to those already on display.

It is my pleasure once again to be with my friends of the Royal Canadian Legion and to take part in their ceremonies. I am fully aware that today brings to a happy conclusion months and years of planning and hard work, which is contained within the covers of this beautiful book that will stand forever as a memorial to those who gave their all so that we may have a better world in which to live, and I would like to suggest to the committee that they give thought to having a copy of this book displayed in Government House in Newfoundland, a place that has played a prominent and important part in the military and naval history of Newfoundland.

I also wish to take this opportunity to extend to Major Syd Frost my sincere, personal thanks, and those of our people, for without his efforts it is quite possible that this Remembrance Book would not be unveiled today. I extend my grateful thanks to the committees for their work and devotion, and I look forward shortly to the pleasure of thanking each one individually. God guard thee, Newfoundland.

THE SENATE

Wednesday, October 31, 1973

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Hon. Leopold Langlois tabled:

Report of the Department of Public Works for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1973, pursuant to section 34 of the Public Works Act, chapter P-38, R.S.C., 1970.

PUBLIC WORKS

HIGH COST OF DECORATING FEDERAL GOVERNMENT BUILDINGS—QUESTION

Hon. Mr. Molson: Honourable senators, I should like to address a question to the Leader of the Government, and in his absence I shall address myself with equal pleasure to his deputy, the acting leader.

I should like to ask if, in harmony with the views expressed to the Prime Minister in a letter from the Canadian Manufacturers' Association on October 26, the government is contemplating participating in the struggle against inflation by reducing some of the astronomical expenses involved in decorating government buildings in recent times? I have in mind the expenditure of $81,500 for 2,250 potted palms for the National Defence Building, the $1 million spent in refurbishing the Confederation Building for the use of 88 members and five ministers, and the costs involved in connection with the absolutely oriental splendour of the External Affairs Department.

Hon. Mr. Forsey: Don't forget the scrap iron in front of the buildings.

Hon. Mr. Molson: I will add that to my question.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Honourable senators, since this question deals with a matter of government policy, I assume that my honourable friend will allow me to take it as notice.

PARLIAMENTARY RESTAURANT

COST OF MEALS—AVAILABILITY TO SENATORS OF DINING FACILITIES IN CONFEDERATION BUILDING—QUESTIONS

Hon. Mr. Molson: Honourable senators, may I ask another question of the Honourable Acting Leader of the Government? When I came back last night I found in my office, as I am sure all my colleagues found in their offices, a very courteous letter from the Speaker of the House of Commons informing us of the price increases in the cost of meals in the Parliamentary Restaurant which, of course, come as a result of inflation. But in that letter there was a second paragraph stating that we might be interested to know at the same time that the members' dining room on the eighth floor of the Confederation Building was now open and that the lounge is now available for receptions. This letter is addressed to: "All Members of the House."

My question is whether this in fact includes members of this chamber, or is it addressed to members of the House of Commons only? Is the restaurant in the Confederation Building open to senators or is it for members of the House of Commons only?

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Honourable senators, the increase in the cost of meals in the Parliamentary Restaurant is not only due to inflation but to the constant request which has been made to the Joint Committee on the Restaurant of Parliament for an improvement in the quality of meals served. I understand that the increase results from a combination of those two factors.

As far as the letter that was sent by the Speaker of the other place is concerned, it is addressed to Members of Parliament, which includes members of this chamber.

Hon. Mr. Molson: It is addressed to "All Members of the House."

Hon. Mr. Langlois: We are Members of Parliament.

Hon. Mr. Argue: Correct the Speaker of the other place.

Hon. Mr. Molson: With respect, I am saying that a letter from the Speaker of the other place going to "All Members of the House" would not include members of this chamber.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: I am wondering whether it would be within the jurisdiction of the Speaker of the other place to address a letter of instruction or otherwise to members of this place. This is addressed to the members of his house, and through a courtesy on his part copies were sent to us. That is my understanding.

Hon. Mr. Molson: Thank you.

Hon. Mr. Carter: May I ask a supplementary question of the acting leader? Does this new dining room come under the surveillance of the Joint Committee on the Restaurant of Parliament?

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Yes, indeed.

Hon. Mr. McIlraith: It is a joint committee.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: It is a joint committee of both houses, yes.

● (1410)

DISTINGUISHED VISITORS IN GALLERY

PRESIDIUM AND EXECUTIVE OF WORLD CONGRESS OF FREE UKRAINIANS SECRETARIAT

Hon. Paul Yuzyk: Honourable senators, I would like to draw your attention to a distinguished group of visitors in the Senate Gallery. Today we are honoured with the presence of the Presidium and Executive members of the Secretariat of the World Congress of Free Ukrainians, who are holding meetings of the Secretariat in Ottawa on the occasion of the Second World Congress which will be held in Toronto, November 1 to 4.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Yuzyk: The following are members of this delegation, which I would like to introduce:

> Mr. Antin Melnyk, President, Ukrainian World Congress, Germany; Metropolitan Maxime Hermaniuk, Head of Executive Committee, U.W.C., and Head of Ukrainian Catholic Church of Canada; Msgr. Vasyl Kushnir, Canadian Vice President, U.W.C.; Mr. Joseph Lesawyer, United States Vice President, U.W.C.; Professor Peter Kondra, President, Ukrainian Canadian Committee; Mr. Vasyl Kosiuk, Argentinian Vice President, U.W.C.; Dr. S. Fostun, General Secretary, U.W.C., England; Professor W. Janiw, Rector, Ukrainian Free University; Professor B. Hnatiuk, Presidium Member, U.S.A., U.W.C.; Mr. Mykola Ciurak, Presidium Member, U.W.C., Australia.

We warmly welcome them here in Parliament and wish them success in their deliberations in the interests of freedom and democracy, the realization of just human rights to their people, and the preservation and development of cultural values as their special contribution to the countries of which they are citizens.

Honourable senators are aware that the Ukrainian Canadian Group of Parliamentarians are hosting a reception and banquet in their honour in the Confederation Room this evening.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, I wonder if I might have leave to add my words of welcome to the distinguished delegation that is before us. I may be somewhat more parochial than my fellow senator from Manitoba in pointing out that at least three of the gentlemen are distinguished citizens of Manitoba. I would further point out that the Ukrainian community has been a very important group in the province of Manitoba and in fact throughout Western Canada. Over the years I think we can say that Manitoba and Winnipeg, in particular, have been the centre of Ukrainian life in Canada. I am delighted to see that the Congress is having its meetings this week, and we are honoured by the presence of this distinguished group in the gallery. I am sure that all honourable senators wish them well in their deliberations.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Mr. Molgat: Honourable senators, it had been our intention to proceed this afternoon with item No. 2 on the Orders of the Day, resuming the debate on Canadian relations with the European Community. Unfortunately, Senator Grosart, who was to address us on the subject, is tied up at this time with a delegation from the European Community. There was a meeting this morning of the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs and there are further deliberations this afternoon. Regrettably, Senator Grosart could not be here, which is the reason we could not proceed with that item.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Thursday, November 1, 1973

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

THE HONOURABLE H. CARL GOLDENBERG

CHAIRMAN OF CONFERENCES—TRIBUTES

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Honourable senators, with your leave I should like to make a brief statement at this stage to underline two important functions which were performed during the last parliamentary recess by our distinguished colleague Senator Carl Goldenberg. On October 15 and 16 last, Senator Goldenberg acted as Chairman of the First Canadian Conference on Multiculturalism held in Ottawa, and on October 22 and 23 he acted as Chairman of a Tri-level Conference of Federal-Provincial-Municipal Governments of Canada. He carried out these functions at the request of the Prime Minister of Canada, and on both occasions our colleague not only distinguished himself but did great honour to this chamber. I am sure I am expressing the feelings of each and every one of us when I say to Senator Goldenberg that we are proud of him and grateful to him for these splendid performances.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Hon. Leopold Langlois tabled:

> Report of the Department of National Revenue containing Tables and Statements relative to Customs, Excise and Taxation for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1973, pursuant to section 5 of the Department of National Revenue Act, chapter N-15, R.S.C., 1970.

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. Leopold Langlois: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), I move that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until Tuesday, November 6, 1973, at 8 o'clock in the evening.

Honourable senators, I should like to give a brief outline of what is in store for us next week. On Tuesday evening, as I have had the occasion to inform the honourable Leader of the Opposition, we will be discussing the joint resolution of both Houses of Parliament for the ratification of the government's action in sending Canadian troops to support the United Nations Emergency Force in the Middle East.

• (1410)

After that, we will carry on with the debate on the second reading of Bill C-2, to amend the Criminal Code, which is to start today.

Motion agreed to.

SENATE

NEWSPAPER EDITORIAL—QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE

Hon. Hartland de M. Molson: Honourable senators, before we go to the question period, I rise on a point of privilege. I would like to direct the attention of the Senate to an editorial item that appeared in the Montreal Gazette on October 10 of this year. I do this with some reluctance because the Montreal Gazette is the oldest newspaper in Canada. It has a long, very creditable history.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Until a few years ago.

Hon. Mr. Molson: Over the history of Canada it has been a very responsible publication. As most honourable senators will be aware, it is now a member of that great organization, Southam Newspapers, a corporation which spreads from shore to shore of this country.

In that editorial on October 10 the newspaper is in effect criticizing the Senate. I would be the first to say that it has every right in the world to criticize the Senate and to express its views about the past, the present and the future of the Senate, if it so wishes. What I am complaining about is the language used in this article, which I consider to be intemperate when used by anyone; but coming from a source such as the Gazette I really believe it is quite unacceptable and definitely a breach of privilege.

I do not intend to read the editorial. I have given the reference. I would like to mention the terms to which I object and I am sure my colleagues will find those terms objectionable also. They are:

> The Senate of Canada stinks of patronage. It reeks of special interest. It is crammed with political fat cats.

I object particularly there to the words "stinks" and "reeks".

An Hon. Senator: How about the other one?

Hon. Mr. Molson: The rest I leave to my colleagues to consider. The editorial ends up with the words:

> It merely serves to consolidate an institution that is a farce and a scandal in the Canadian constitutional set-up.

We may be redundant, we may be old, we may be tired, we may be useless, but I very much object to this chamber, this part of Parliament, being alluded to as a farce and a scandal.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Freedom of insults.

Hon. Mr. Molson: Freedom of insults, that is right.

CRIMINAL CODE (CAPITAL PUNISHMENT)

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. George McIlraith moved the second reading of Bill C-2, to amend the Criminal Code.

He said: Honourable senators, in moving second reading of this bill, I hope that I will be able to do so in a way which will bring the question to be decided before honourable senators in a direct and accurate way. The whole subject of capital punishment, which involves life and death itself, not only is the most basic subject with which we in Parliament have to deal but it is an issue which is not easily resolved within our own individual consciences. It often calls up our emotions in discussion. However, I hope that I can present this subject with the judgment and calm which will bring forward our best consideration without emotion but with the wisdom which the subject deserves and, indeed, requires. I will try to present the bill, and my own views on it, in a way that will not appeal to the emotions of honourable senators but rather bring forward their best possible consideration.

The bill itself, while it may be confusing in format, as so many amending bills are, is very similar to the bill on this subject that was brought forward in 1967 and enacted on a trial basis for the period 1967 to 1972. It provides that the only persons subject to the death penalty, upon conviction for murder, are those who cause or assist in causing the death of police officers or prison guards. However, in the present bill the terms "capital murder" and "non-capital murder" have been replaced by the terms "murder punishable by death" and "murder punishable by life imprisonment". These changes are only for the sake of clarity and precision of expression.

There is another interesting difference in the bill, namely, a provision relating to the circumstances in which a person sentenced to life imprisonment for murder may be granted parole. Later I will have something to say about that in a more particular way.

The bill was presented for first reading in the House of Commons on January 11 of this year, and the debate on second reading commenced on January 26. The bill, as amended by the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs of the other place, was finally passed by the House of Commons on October 24, 1973. It is that bill that is now before us.

Before I launch into a discussion on this legislation, I would point out that we are confronted with a difficulty that we find in so many amending bills that come to us from the other house. There have been three printings of this bill. There is the bill as presented to the House of Commons for first reading, which is important because it contains explanatory notes dealing with the exact terminology of certain sections of the Criminal Code, which we are seeking to amend; then there is the bill as reprinted after amendment by the House of Commons Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs. Although that printing does not contain the explanatory notes which are so helpful, it does contain, in clear marking, the parts that were added and certain changes that were made in the language by the standing committee.

Regrettably, we are confronted with what is officially before us, and that is the bill as passed by the House of Commons, which contains neither the markings indicating the amendments made by the standing committee of the House of Commons nor the explanatory notes. I regret that this should be the case, but under our rules that is the way it is supposed to be, and that is the way the bill is before us now.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: It is a question of practice rather than a question of rules.

Hon. Mr. McIlraith: That is, perhaps, another subject which we might discuss in some other circumstances than those in which we find ourselves at the moment. I merely mention the matter for the purpose of seeking to have clearly before anyone who may be interested in reading the debate subsequently an accurate record of the proceedings. This bill, if passed, will be in effect for a five-year term only, which means that we shall have another bill on this subject before us within five years. At that time this debate, no doubt, will have a certain importance, particularly so far as the manner of the recording and presentation of the contents of the bill are concerned. That, quite simply, is the point I was trying to make.

The principle of the bill is, of course, fairly simple and is essentially to be found in two clauses. The first of these is clause 2 which deals with section 214 of the Criminal Code. The part of that section which is amended deals with the very important and vital subject—indeed it is the principle of the whole thing—of reducing the category of persons convicted of murder who would be subject to the death penalty from the fairly wide range now contained in the law to that of murderers of police officers and prison officers. This is in line with what was done by the act passed in 1967, and which remained in force until December 29, 1972. Since that is the case, it may well be asked why there was not a bill introduced to simply extend the date of the expiry of the changes made in 1967. The simple answer to that, honourable senators, lies in the fact—at least I presume this to be the case—that in the autumn of 1972 Parliament had been dissolved and so the expiry date went by, and this in turn brought about the automatic reintroduction of the sections of the Criminal Code which had been amended.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: It brought back the old law in principle only.

Hon. Mr. McIlraith: For that reason there was no way in which the legislation could be brought forward in that simple form. Then, of course, there is the other question of principle involved in the bill, and this is dealt with in clause 7 concerning certain circumstances in which parole can be granted to persons convicted of murder, whether sentenced to life imprisonment, or to the death penalty which was subsequently commuted to life imprisonment. I shall deal with that in more detail later.

• (1420)

In the light of these remarks I should like to take a moment to deal with clause 2, which brings squarely before us the principle with which we are here concerned today. The clauses other than those I have mentioned deal mainly with consequential changes in language and other such matters, and for our purposes on second reading I do not believe I need to refer to them as such.

The condition of the law on this point raised by clause 2 of the bill, and which has been in operation since December 29, 1972, is to be found in section 214 of the Criminal Code. I ask the indulgence of honourable senators to place on the record the whole of the section so that it will be understood precisely. I was rather shocked to note that the precise point at issue in the debate in the other place is not clearly apparent from the record. I believe, therefore, it would be useful and helpful to all concerned if I were to place section 214 of the Criminal Code on the record now.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Mr. McIlraith: The section that has been in force since December 29, 1972, and that was in force prior to 1967, provides as follows:

> 214.(1) Murder is capital murder or non-capital murder.
>
> (2) Murder is capital murder, in respect of any person, where
>
> (a) it is planned and deliberate on the part of such person,
>
> (b) it is within section 213 and such person
>
> (i) by his own act caused or assisted in causing the bodily harm from which the death ensued,
>
> (ii) by his own act administered or assisted in administering the stupefying or over-powering thing from which the death ensued,
>
> (iii) by his own act stopped or assisted in the stopping of the breath from which the death ensued,
>
> (iv) himself used or had upon his person the weapon as a consequence of which the death ensued, or
>
> (v) counselled or procured another person to do any act mentioned in subparagraph (i), (ii) or (iii) or to use any weapon mentioned in subparagraph (iv), or
>
> (c) such person by his own act caused or assisted in causing the death of
>
> (i) a police officer, police constable, constable, sheriff, deputy sheriff, sheriff's officer or other person employed for the preservation and maintenance of the public peace, acting in the course of his duties, or
>
> (ii) a warden, deputy warden, instructor, keeper, gaoler, guard or other officer or permanent employee of a prison, acting in the course of his duties, > or counselled or procured another person to do any act causing or assisting in causing the death.
>
>
> (3) All murder other than capital murder is non-capital murder.

Section 214(1) provides that murder is capital murder or non-capital murder. That was the law from 1962 until 1967, and has been the law since December 29, 1972. That section during the period 1967-1972 read as follows:

> 214. (1) Murder is capital murder or non-capital murder.
>
> (2) Murder is capital murder, in respect of any person, where such person by his own act caused or assisted in causing the death of
>
> (a) a police officer, police constable, constable, sheriff, deputy sheriff, sheriff's officer or other person employed for the preservation and maintenance of the public peace, acting in the course of his duties, or
>
> (b) a warden, deputy warden, instructor, keeper, gaoler, guard or other officer or permanent employee of a prison, acting in the course of his duties, > or counselled or procured another person to do any act causing or assisting in causing the death.
>
>
> (3) All murder other than capital murder is non-capital murder.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: You almost had a lapse when you said that was the law that was in operation, because it was not operative at all. I think I can say that because you said it yourself.

Hon. Mr. McIlraith: Section 214(2), which is the really operative part of the legislation with which we are concerned, and which involves the whole question in principle, defines under several subheadings the circumstances in which murder shall be capital murder. Included, of course, are murder of a police officer and murder of a prison official, in addition to several other categories of direct murder. We must be careful when referring to the law to distinguish between the provisions of the law that exist today and the law which existed in the five-year period between 1967 and 1972. The law on this point as in effect today and as it was between 1962 and 1967 is not the same. In 1967 the point which was rather simply involved was the reduction of those categories of murder for which capital punishment sentence could be inflicted as the punishment.

Section 214(3) of the Criminal Code merely states that all murder other than capital murder is non-capital murder. That is a curious way of putting it. That was the law from 1962. It continued without change until 1967, and it applies today.

The bill before us, as well as reducing the number of cases in which the death sentence may be imposed, provides for the substitution of the words "punishable by death" and "punishable by life imprisonment" for capital murder and non-capital murder.

Clauses 3 and 7, with which we are also directly concerned, relate to the circumstances under which parole may be granted. There is a difference between the law as it exists today and as it existed from 1962 to 1967, as I shall endeavour to explain. The amendment which arose from passage of the 1967 amending bill, which appears in section 684(3) of the Criminal Code, and which was in operation until 1972, reads as follows:

> Notwithstanding any other law or authority, a person in respect of whom a sentence of death has been commuted to imprisonment for life or a term of imprisonment or a person upon whom a sentence of imprisonment for life has been imposed as a minimum punishment, shall not be released during his life or such term, as the case may be, without the prior approval of the Governor in Council.

For the five years preceding 1967 and since 1972 the law stated that the prior approval of the Governor in Council, before a person convicted and serving a capital sentence could be granted parole, was required only in those cases in which the instrument of commutation so directed. Since December 29, 1972 we have made it much easier for a person convicted of capital murder to be granted parole than was the case during the five-year period to which I referred.

The bill as submitted for first reading sought to introduce an amendment on that point. It provided that:

> —a person in respect of whom a sentence of death has been commuted to imprisonment for life or a term of imprisonment for life or a term of imprisonment or a person upon whom a sentence of imprisonment for life has been imposed as a minimum punishment, shall not be released during his life or such term, as the case may be, without the prior approval of the Governor in Council.

● (1430)

The committee of the other place made a considerable amendment in this regard, and that amendment is in the bill now before us. Clauses 3 and 7 of the bill, which deal with this point, have been amended with the result that there is no power in the parole authorities to grant parole for those convicted of murder within a 10-year period. It clears up another point as to temporary absences under section 26 of the Penitentiary Act, and it also provides that there must be the concurrence of the Governor in Council when such paroles are being considered.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Does that change anything?

Hon. Mr. McIlraith: Yes, substantially. Those clauses can perhaps be dealt with in a more detailed way when we get to the committee stage. However, I did feel that should be indicated here so that we may proceed to the discussion of the bill with an accurate indication of the matters with which we are dealing.

Dealing with the subject matter of the bill itself, it will be understood from what I have said that basically this is an attempt to return to the state of the law as it was between 1967 and 1972, and by instituting a further 5-year trial period.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: That is the principle of the bill, according to you?

Hon. Mr. McIlraith: Yes, that is right. That is what I was seeking to establish.

When we get into the whole subject which that indirectly raises as to the application of capital punishment we are, of course, into one of the most basically difficult issues with which parliamentarians can be confronted. I shall try to keep what I have to say on this point within bounds that will fairly meet the requirement of that kind of consideration by this body.

The question most often asked of those who are dealing with this subject is: Why, if you are going so far in abolishing capital punishment for murder, do you retain capital punishment for those persons convicted of murdering prison guards or officials and police officers? That, to me, is a valid and very important question, and I feel it is at the very root and key of the issue. This subject was topical for a considerable period of time in the middle sixties, and it has been topical for a considerable period of time in 1972 and 1973. It has been widely debated in the other place, and commented upon and dealt with by the media. It has been the subject of much consideration by many people quite outside of Parliament and ordinarily not directly involved in the parliamentary processes or the reporting of the same.

Having read all of the discussions of this subject, I feel the short and simple answer, as far as I am personally concerned, is that the statistics respecting the number of murders in different countries since Confederation are remarkably unhelpful in any conclusion one way or the other on this subject. I want to amplify that because it is quite a sweeping statement. I make it only after considerable work and study into this subject, first of all, in the 1966-67 period, and again in the period during which I was Solicitor General when I had occasion to be dealing with cases of commutation.

Having used statistics a great many times with great care and attention in studying trade matters, and things of that nature, I reluctantly found a complete absence of value in many of the statistics on the subject of murder in helping one to arrive at a fair conclusion as to the necessity or otherwise of retention or partial retention. I could give several illustrations. With respect to statistics relating to the murder of prison guards in this country from 1867 to date, it is specious to apply those statistics to the present day for the simple reason that anyone who has examined our penal institutions throughout the country, and noted the progress that has been made in the containment of convicted criminals during that period, has to realize that in the early years in nearly all cases the opportunities for convicted criminals to murder a prison guard were virtually non-existent because the convicted criminals were contained in what we would now, in terms of today's society, quite properly call absolutely shocking conditions. At that time inmates were fed through bars in the doors of their cells, and so forth, and there was no way by which the murder of a prison guard could have been achieved. Today the prisons are constructed in a different way altogether. The inmates can move freely about recreation areas and other free movement areas within the prison, and they are fed in a much more civilized way.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Even those who are sentenced to death?

Hon. Mr. McIlraith: Yes. I am talking about all prisoners, including those convicted of murder.

Inherent in that progress, that civilized progress, which I think all of us welcome, there is opportunity for a prisoner who is under life sentence, whether by way of commutation or original sentence, to murder a prison guard. The physical opportunity for contact is there to an incredibly larger degree than was the case in the earlier years. You cannot group statistics over a 100-year period without analyzing them to see how meaningless they become. I make that point only by way of trying to indicate that we should not use blanket statistics in trying to substantiate an argument one way or another.

● (1440)

I come next to some other reasons why I put a severe limitation on the use of statistics in determining the point at issue. I would refer honourable senators to a publication entitled: "Capital Punishment. New Material, 1965-72," which was commissioned by the former Solicitor General. At the back it has a number of tables to which I wish to make reference, not because of the figures contained in them, the statistical results, but because they illustrate another point rather clearly.

On page 149 one finds table 25, "Leading circumstances of capital murders in Canada from 1867 to 1971." They are set out in several categories with, of course, the numbers. My point today has no reference to the numbers involved.

Those categories include such offences as those involving inmates and staff of welfare institutions, attacks on police officers, attacks resulting from family altercations, attacks resulting from domestic (residence) altercations, attacks resulting from altercations between people who are working together, attacks in or around places of public entertainment, and so on. Then follows the category of robbery, and I presume from the nature of those offences set out that robbery includes armed robbery. There are many categories and I do not need to read them all. One sees that there appear to be categories of murder that arise out of the performance of criminal acts, and indeed attacks on institution officials by someone after conviction as a criminal. The table includes the category of family altercations, domestic quarrels in the family, and in that category the number is very large. I for one cannot believe that the retention of the death penalty has any preventive value in respect to the family quarrel situation, or some other murders of that type of category.

I now come to those cases in which I think it can be argued that there is every reason to retain the death penalty as a preventive measure. On the same page, table 26 deals with "Relationship of victim to offender at the time of the offence of capital murder in Canada, from 1867 to 1971." It lists the relationship of the victim—wife, husband, mother, father, son, daughter, brother, sister, other relative, sweetheart and so on; it also includes the policeman and the prison officer.

On the next page, table 27 gives an analysis of the "Motives or causes of capital murders in Canada from 1867 to 1971." Those statistics are based on research in an attempt to extract the motives from the evidence and reports of the cases. It will be seen that they are very wide-ranging, covering the motive of robbery—which is very large—obstacles to marriage, escaping arrest, brawls, quarrels, jealousy, and all that sort of thing. There is also the motive of gain in removing an obstacle to marriage, which is a statistical way of putting the simple prospect of wiping out one's spouse in order to achieve another. It includes also murders committed with the motive of escaping arrest, escaping custody, or escaping discovery, and so on. It is a wide-ranging field.

Those three tables are a good illustration of the wide range of circumstances involved in the crime of murder. With most other offences the range of circumstances is very narrow. For instance, in armed robbery somebody is trying to get some benefit, some economic or financial gain of money or an article, as the case may be, and it is very simple and precise. With murder, however, one becomes involved with such things as family quarrels, the fights of spouses, and fights because of jealousy. The murders are committed by persons who were never guilty of another criminal activity in their lives, and, except for the actual act of murder, those persons were not committing any other offence in the course of committing the larger crime of murder. The murders are committed by persons who have never committed an offence before, and are not likely ever to commit one again.

When we come to some of the other categories we find ourselves dealing with the class of person who, in so many cases, has developed a career of criminal activity. An examination of the case histories of persons in our penitentiaries under conviction of murder shows in a dramatic way that they are the hard core of those who are really full-time, or part-time, criminals, with long records of criminal activity, and who by reason of that activity are in close contact, or have the opportunity for contact on many occasions, with police officers, since they are criminals, and with prison guards in the institutions. They have also an altogether different type of approach to life.

In the first group of categories of murderers of whom I spoke, there are very often persons who, notwithstanding the act they have committed—they may have had an aberration with terrible consequences—accept in their concept of their own lives and of society around them a respect for human life. It is true that that is not the full problem, but basically they accept it. Nevertheless we have in society a very small number, which no one could define with precision, of persons who have rejected that concept of respect for human life and who have chosen a way of life which, at best, carelessly disregards the rights of others to their lives, their property and their general freedom. Policemen and prison guards, by the very nature of their work, are constantly in contact with this latter group.

● (1450)

Hon. Mr. Flynn: That is a very interesting argument. I wonder if the honourable senator would tell us how many murderers of police officers and prison guards were executed in the last ten years?

Hon. Mr. McIlraith: I will come to that point.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: You can come to it now. There were none.

Hon. Mr. McIlraith: Let me come to it in my own way. I have had some contact with this subject in a practical working way. I have come to the conviction that, in the present state of society, in fulfilling our duty to protect the lives of innocent people, it is not possible to abolish the death sentence for the murder of prison officials or police officers.

That is not a very precise definition and other categories of persons could be included, but in drawing a distinction one has to draw the line somewhere. However, it is clearly established by experience that with respect to these two groups of persons we have every reason to believe that the retention of capital punishment is a deterrent to their murder. One may ask me to produce some statistics to prove that; one may ask me why those who want to retain capital punishment do not prove their case, or why those who want it abolished altogether do not prove the opposite. As I said earlier, the statistical approach does not seem to me to give us the help we need.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: The point I raised was not whether it is a deterrent, but that if it is not used how can it be a deterrent. This is the point.

Hon. Mr. McIlraith: I want to deal with that point. I have expressed my opinion and I may be asked how I arrived at it, if I do not have statistics to prove it. I will explain the process, which may or may not be considered valid in the opinion of honourable senators. At least it is my opinion and is based on my having worked on this subject.

Honourable senators, I should like to take one example to illustrate my point, one for which statistics are not available, for the simple reason that the evidence on this point is not usually germane in the trial. Evidence as to whether the existence of capital punishment acted as a deterrent and prevented that criminal from committing another murder, the murder of a police officer, is simply not available. I can explain why. Although I will take one case, I do not wish it to be taken as the basis for my conclusion but rather as one which will enable me to illustrate my point.

In a recent case, a criminal who had committed murder, and who was subsequently convicted for it, was found armed with a rifle two or three nights after the offence. He was hiding in a large building piled high with packages. He was arrested. I had occasion to know the circumstances and details of the arrest, but it is proper that I should not make reference to the case on the record. On his arrest the first thing he said to the constable, in not very parliamentary language, was, "Do you so-and-so realize that I had you in the sights of this rifle?" And obviously he easily could have, and there is every reason to believe he did have. He continued, "I would have shot you, you so-and-so, had it not been for the fact that I would hang for it."

Hon. Mr. Flynn: He was not aware of the practice of the present government.

Hon. Mr. McIlraith: Here is a man who had already committed one murder. I wanted to use that example.

In my own experience, the sum of it is the conclusion that the retention of capital punishment is a deterrent among the criminal class who are the ones with whom police and prison guards are in contact.

Honourable senators, when I was dealing a few minutes ago with the question of statistics and their use, the honourable Leader of the Opposition asked how many murders have been committed and how many murderers were under sentence of death. Undoubtedly he was referring to the fact that the sentence of death has not been carried out on anyone in Canada since 1962, and in all cases the sentence has been commuted to life imprisonment.

I am informed that there are three cases now before the federal authorities, awaiting the perfection of the case—that is, awaiting the time for final appeal to elapse or the obtaining of material necessary for consideration, or the like. There are others at varying stages in the lower courts, either at the trial stage or the appeal stage.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: How many capital murders were committed since the first of January this year?

[Hon. Mr. McIlraith.]

Hon. Mr. McIlraith: Information about them is not accurately available in the federal department at the moment.

Honourable senators, on the question of commutation, I want to raise two or three matters. When one really gets into a study of the statistics one finds that they are substantially impaired in all cases where there has been capital punishment, and then abolition. For about a decade before abolition came about the percentage of persons sentenced to death and on whom the sentence was carried out seems to become very small indeed. The statistics do not give a true reflection of the value or otherwise of capital punishment in that period. So the extent to which it is a deterrant is not clear, if you are going to use the statistical argument.

● (1500)

I think I should say something with regard to commutation itself. I know it is not proper to quote here the debates of the House of Commons, but I would hope that honourable senators will look with care at what was said on the point in the other place.

Commutation itself, in the last decade—I cannot speak as to any period before that but I have every reason to believe the same situation existed then, and I have no personal knowledge as to the last couple of years—was treated as being a matter of great seriousness. It demanded the utmost attention from the minister, and involved the gathering together of all material necessary for consideration by the minister. Originally this was done by the Minister of Justice, but more recently by the Solicitor General. Not only the evidence and judgments given at the trials—that is to say, the court records—but all other relevant material that might be considered to have any bearing or significance in the consideration of the case, together with reports of psychiatrists and others, is very carefully and fully considered. Whether psychiatrists' reports were included in earlier days or not, I do not know. There are those more cynical people who argue about what value they have, I am not one of those people, although I admit that psychiatry is a science that by its very nature cannot be absolute.

The point I wish to make is that it would be quite wrong for anyone in this house, as I feel it was wrong for some in the other house, to use the fact that the death sentence had not been carried out since 1962 as an argument against the process of commutation in appropriate cases.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: I am going to, in five minutes. I shall be one of those condemned by you. I am going to do exactly what you say should not be done.

Hon. Mr. McIlraith: It would be a mistake to try to destroy that process. I cannot for one moment contemplate a society in which the right of commutation of the death sentence is taken away. I think some careless remarks on that subject have been made, which, if they were widespread enough, might result in an attempt to have that done, and that, to my mind, would be a regressive step.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Total abolition would be a solution to that problem.

Hon. Mr. McIlraith: There is another related question, of course, and I believe the two honourable gentlemen, the Leader of the Opposition, and the honourable senator from—where is it?

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Ottawa East.

Hon. Mr. McIlraith: I believe they will agree with me, at least, on this point, that the royal prerogative of mercy was not interfered with in any way by the legislation of 1967, and it is not interfered with by this legislation. Indeed, it is expressly protected in the Criminal Code. I would hope that on that narrow point they would agree that it in no circumstance should be interfered with by us. It is another point of—

Hon. Mr. Flynn: You would if you promote total abolition. You would not have the problem of the royal prerogative.

Hon. Mr. McIlraith: In any event, I wanted to make that exception.

I recognize fully that there will be sharply differing points of view, and I am the first, I hope, to support the right of all persons to assert those points of view, and to develop them as they think appropriate. I recognize as well that there are those who want total abolition now, and I can only say that this bill now before us does not grant them that.

There are also those who recommend a return to what I may call wide retention, or total retention, and who are in an easier position, because if they defeat the bill we will continue the present law, which extends the categories of murder in respect to which the death sentence is applicable from those in respect to which it was applicable from 1967 to 1972. The bill itself, therefore, deals only with a part of the subject. It is, however, one that I hope, after full and adequate discussion here and in committee, we can resolve in a way that will bring credit to the Parliament of Canada and the people of Canada.

I thank you, honourable senators, for listening to me at such length but, frankly, I found the subject to be of such importance, and technically difficult with regard to presentation, that I thought it better to take a little more of your time than I otherwise would have wished. I hope I have presented the bill to you in such a way that it will commend itself to you.

Hon. Lionel Choquette: Honourable senators, may I first congratulate Senator McIlraith on his excellent explanation of this bill. He has, I am sure, done his absolute best to make a silk purse out of a sow's ear, and I admire him for it. It is a comparatively easy and uncomplicated bill. After all, we are being asked to renew a bill which was passed in 1967; we are asked to renew it for a further period of five years.

On another occasion a few months ago, when I spoke on a private bill introduced by my colleague to my left, Senator John M. Macdonald, I pointed out that the bill that would come before us—this bill before us today—was perpetuating a farce which had existed for five years. My remarks respecting it will be quite brief and to the point.

I intend to vote against the motion for the second reading of this bill, which is supposed to be a motion for its approval in principle. In my view, this bill is devoid of principle. It is, in reality, a non-bill. It is neither retentionist nor abolitionist. It is neither fish, flesh, nor good red-herring, as Cervantes would have said. At best it is a face-saving device, and at worst an affront to Parliament and a fraud on the Canadian people.

First, let us ask ourselves this question: Does it abolish capital punishment? The answer is no, it does not, not even for murder. Capital punishment is retained for treason, piracy and a parade of military offences set out in the National Defence Act.

• (1510)

I am a retentionist at heart, as I said on an earlier occasion, and would prefer to leave the law in regard to murder as it is now rather than restore, as this bill would, the law as it was immediately prior to December 30, 1972. In my opinion, most Canadians are retentionist, as I am sure a referendum would so reveal.

Let us suppose that little Justin, the Prime Minister's son, was being escorted by an RCMP constable across Wellington Street. A murderer shooting this child would get life imprisonment while a murderer shooting the constable would, in theory, be executed. Of course, there would be no difference in the practical result; the sentence of death would be commuted.

And therein lies the farce, honourable senators. Capital punishment in this country has been abolished, at least de facto, since 1962. Let us not delude ourselves. We know that capital punishment has de facto been abolished. We all know, and I can safely predict, that there will never again be another execution of a murderer of any kind in this country. I should like to see something quite unequivocal in the Criminal Code saying: If you kill wilfully and with premeditation, you shall die. If people think it is inhumane to execute convicted murderers by hanging, then some other means of execution will have to be found, such as giving them a hypo when they are asleep. But people should know that if they kill premeditatedly and wilfully, then they will die. I should like to see that in the Criminal Code.

Honourable senators, there cannot be this kind of compromise or sham in respect of cold-blooded murder. A law that is not enforced is not a law at all. It brings our entire judicial system into contempt and ridicule. I would have much greater respect for a bill which eliminated capital punishment entirely. Indeed, I indicated my support of a bill to that effect introduced by my colleague, Senator Macdonald, and later withdrawn by him, before the recent adjournment.

Laws should be clear. They should command respect and they should be enforced. Law depends ultimately on sanction, and if sanction is to be removed—and that is what we have been doing for the last five years—by whatever device, then the law should be changed. This bill, coupled with the practice of commutation, makes a mockery of the law. I feel sure that it will pass the Senate, and I am not impugning the motives of any senator who may be voting in accordance with his conscience. Indeed, I am not urging any senator to vote against the bill. I just cannot bring myself to support it. But, honourable senators, if it is to pass, then, for heaven's sake, let its passing be mercifully quick. We deserve a merciful release from this long and fruitless debate which has consumed much valuable time in the other place—I hope that will not be the case here—and led nowhere. It has accomplished nothing—and this is my last comment—except perhaps to buy time in which the government could work out satisfactory arrangements with the New Democratic Party.

Hon. Hazen Argue: Honourable senators, I wish to make the main part of my speech next Tuesday evening, but before moving the adjournment of the debate I should like to make one or two observations at this time. Certainly this bill is, in fact, neither fish nor fowl. However, those of us who are abolitionists are pleased that we have before us a bill that goes as far as this one does. Those of us who are realists have looked over the history of this measure when it was on the statute books, and we share the opinion expressed by Senator Choquette that we have seen the last of hanging in this country; even if this measure should pass, as I presume it will, and leave the possibility, at least, of death by hanging following certain types of conviction, that in fact there will be commutation and that no hanging will take place.

I do not know the mood of the Senate. While I do not think it will happen I should like to think there might be the possibility of the Senate's amending this bill, even if such an amendment should constitute a difference in position from that of the House of Commons and, indeed, from that of the government. In this regard, honourable senators, I was disturbed by a statement I read in the press attributed to the Solicitor General, to the effect that the Senate should not introduce any amendments to this legislation—that it would, in fact, be a mistake. That, in my view, is a matter for this house to decide, and I would like to see the Senate amend this measure so that we, as a nation and as a Parliament, can take a completely honest position, namely, that if hanging is not going to take place, then it should be crystal clear in the legislation that hanging has, in fact, been abolished.

Of course, honourable senators, if the Senate were to amend this bill to provide for total abolition, I do not know whether the Speaker of the other place would consider it in order for the other place even to discuss such an amended bill. I say that because it seems to me that the Speaker of the other place takes the attitude that anything coming from the Senate is not likely to be good or acceptable, and his first reaction is to rule it out of order. At least that is what he has been doing in the past.

Hon. Mr. Goldenberg: Will the honourable senator permit a question? Is he trying to suggest that a bill to abolish capital punishment might be considered a money bill?

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Perhaps in one way it could be. It certainly costs a lot of money to maintain these people.

Hon. Mr. Argue: I hope not. I understand he ruled out an amendment in the other place to provide total abolition on the basis that the amendment in fact was contrary to the principle of the bill. If that is the case, then I am wondering whether an amendment in somewhat similar terms coming from the Senate would commend itself to the Speaker any more favourably than the amendment proposed in the other place.

An Hon. Senator: Let us try it.

Hon. Mr. Argue: I agree. Let us try it. Let us challenge them.

[Hon. Mr. Choquette.]

Of one thing I am sure, honourable senators, and that is that the Senate will deal with this bill in a thorough manner. There will be vigorous debate; there will be differences of opinion. I am pleased at this time to move the adjournment of the debate.

On motion of Senator Argue, debate adjourned.

• (1520)

ELECTORAL BOUNDARIES READJUSTMENT ACT

BILL C-222 (PEEL SOUTH)—SECOND READING

Hon. Allister Grosart moved the second reading of Bill C-222, respecting the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act.

He said: Honourable senators, it is an honour to move the second reading of this bill, which comes to us from the other place having been passed there without controversy and, I believe, unanimously. It is a bill to amend paragraph 54 of that part of the Schedule to the Proclamation declaring the draft representation order under the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act. It is the usual change of name of constituency bill, several of which have come before us in the past. It refers to the constituency now known as Peel South in the historic County of Peel in Ontario, west of Toronto. The effect of the bill would be to change the name of the electoral district from Peel South to Mississauga.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: To what?

Hon. Mr. Grosart: Mississauga.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: How do you spell it?

Hon. Mr. Grosart: M-i-s-s-i-s-s-a-u-g-a. It is the name of the well-known and famous Indian tribe who inhabited that part of Ontario many years ago.

The bill was introduced by the present member for Peel South in the other place, who tells me that this is in response to the request of many of the citizens of that important area. Mississauga has grown up on the outskirts of Toronto and will be incorporated as a new Canadian city, I believe, on January 1. It has a population of some 200,000 persons. I know of no objection that has been raised to this change of name, and I commend it to honourable senators for their consideration.

Hon. Paul C. Lafond: Honourable senators, I am of an open mind with respect to this particular bill. You will recall my objections to this process during the last few years, but since Her Honour the Speaker in her wisdom decided that I am the seconder of this bill I can hardly oppose it now. However, I find that there may be in this case some attenuating, demographic, civic and geographic circumstances that would warrant the change of name in normal circumstances, and I have no intention of calling for a division on it. Nonetheless, I am quite convinced that the exercise will prove useless, since redistribution will be back on the boards, notwithstanding legislation we have already passed, long before the time comes for an election and the actual practical use of the new name of Mississauga.

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, since on previous occasions in connection with bills of this nature I have agreed with Senator Lafond, I wish to make it clear that in regard to this particular bill the principle which I have defended on previous occasions does not apply. I was against the idea of composed names of which I think we had three examples, but I seem to have forgotten them momentarily. They were Argenteuil-Deux-Montagnes, and others. Now we are changing the name of Peel South to Mississauga. Is that it?

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Then it is only one name. Even if it is very difficult to pronounce, and probably more difficult to spell correctly, at least it is only one. Therefore I cannot sustain the attitude I have taken on previous occasions and must support the bill.

Of course, the electors of this riding will have a very distinctive name for it, and God bless them.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: I have to inform the Senate that if the honourable Senator Grosart speaks now his speech will have the effect of closing the debate.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: Honourable senators, I have only this to say, that I respect the position taken on this whole question of the principle of these changes of name by Senator Lafond, and the practices to which Senator Flynn has taken objection. However, in view of the very great change in the position of the commissioners that has been made by the other place, I think many of those objections are perhaps not valid today.

The difficulty in pronouncing what will be the new name of the constituency perhaps may be simplified if I call the attention of Senator Flynn to the fact that it starts with "Missis" and it is completely in line now with some trends of women's lib. It is "Missis sauga" and I do not think it is likely to be contracted to "Ms. sauga."

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read a third time?

Hon. Mr. Grosart moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

EXPANDED EUROPEAN COMMUNITIES—CONSIDERATION OF REPORT OF COMMITTEE—DEBATE CONTINUED

The Senate resumed from Tuesday, October 30, the adjourned debate on the consideration of the Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs, entitled: "Canadian Relations with the European Community".

Hon. Allister Grosart: Honourable senators, I would not be inflicting myself on you for a second time today had I been able to be here yesterday afternoon to complete the speech I began on Tuesday night on this important subject. I was engaged at that time with our distinguished visitors from the European Community. I arrived at the Senate door breathless, hoping to conclude my speech, just as the bell rang, so I was not allowed to come in and resume the debate.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Saved by the bell.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: The Senate was saved by the bell, as Senator Langlois said.

Before I adjourned the debate on Tuesday night, honourable senators, I said that the subject was particularly timely at that time because the distinguished visitors from Europe were just about to arrive and the following morning, yesterday, important officials of the Community had a special meeting, in camera at their request, with the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs. I believe the matter is even more timely this afternoon. The discussions that started this morning with the members of the delegation from the Parliament of the European Community are continuing. It is my own feeling and belief that this morning in the discussions there was a milestone breakthrough in European Community-Canada relations.

● (1530)

In the discussion this morning, the important role of the Senate in bringing about what I have called "a milestone" was emphasized over and over again by our friends from Europe. Speaker after speaker from that delegation made it clear that their visit, and the discussions under way, were a direct response to the initiative taken by our Foreign Affairs Committee and the report which that committee presented to the Senate.

Why do I refer to it as "a milestone breakthrough"? As honourable senators are aware, Canada has been concerned officially and at other levels for a considerable time about the vast gap in communication between the European Community and Canada. The Community has had no official presence in Canada even though we have had, since January 1, an ambassador accredited to the Community in Brussels. That ambassador is in addition to our ambassador to Belgium. This lack of a Community presence in Canada has reinforced the very great concern of many Canadians, especially those directly concerned with this matter, about apparent tendencies in Community policies to lump us together with the United States, and there is ample evidence that this fact is operating very much to the detriment of the best Canadian interests.

This, of course, has to be important when we remember that the European Community, the largest trading community in the world and one and a half times the size of the United States market, has an import market that is growing at a much greater rate than the American market. The reason is that although the GNP of the Community is not as large as that of the United States, on the other hand the international trade, particularly import trade, as a percentage of the GNP or the GCP, the gross Community product, is 10 per cent, and that of the United States merely 4 per cent. So we can assume that this market will grow and in a very short time be very much larger—not just one and a half times, but much larger—than the United States market.

Our performance in the Community, as it has grown, has not been good. In the 15 years of the Six, prior to enlargement, our share of the market has reached about one per cent. It is quite true that in dollar terms it has grown from year to year, but as a percentage in that market it has declined, which is to say that we have not done as well as our major competitors.

For some years now, particularly since the enlargement, which now includes the United Kingdom, Denmark and Ireland, there have been many efforts at many levels, by Canada and Canadians, to develop much better channels of communication between the Community and Canada, and hopefully to have the Community set up a real presence in Canada.

These have not been successful, and when the committee went to Brussels in March, we went there pessimistically. The information we had, the briefings from our officials, were on the whole pessimistic. They told us about this problem of being lumped, in Community external policies, with the United States, and they warned us that there was no chance of Canada achieving any "special relationship"—I underline the word "special"—with the Community. Indeed, when we were there, in our first conversation with high officials of the Community, this was repeated. We were told, "There is no way Canada is going to have any special relationship with the Community."

It was, of course, the major thrust of our presentation and representation to various officials of the Community and to a delegation from the European Parliament that this situation should be remedied, and we emphasized this strongly in the report we presented to the Senate.

But we still seemed to be making no headway at all until the European Parliament accepted the invitation of Senator Aird, the Chairman of our Foreign Affairs Committee, and Mr. Georges Lachance, the Chairman of the Commons Committee on External Affairs and National Defence, in consultation with Her Honour, and the Speaker of the Commons, to come to Canada and discuss this matter with us. That was clearly the result of the initiative of Senator Aird and the Senate committee.

This morning, with Senator Aird as co-chairman in the chair, with Mr. Lachance and Mr. Cousté, the leader of the European delegation, I was asked, as deputy chairman of our committee and in recognition of the work done by the Senate committee, to open the discussion. I said that two of the many impressions some of us on the Senate committee brought back from our visit to the Community last March were:

(1) A rather negative attitude towards the extension of the existing relationship between the Community and Canada; and, perhaps conversely,

(2) An impression of increasing flexibility in Community attitudes vis-à-vis non-member countries such as Canada as Community external policies develop and expand.

The question I put to our distinguished visitors was: Would any of our visitors care to comment on the present and future relationship of the Community to Canada in contrast to the various special relationships accorded to some 60 or more other non-member countries of the world? The first reply was given by Mr. Peter Kirk, who is known, I am sure to many honourable senators as the leader of the United Kingdom group in the European Parliament. Mr. Kirk, in replying, said he felt that the Community might now be ready to recommend that the Community establish a delegation—I should perhaps put the word "delegation" in quotes because it is a very important word in that context—in Ottawa. The chairman of the group, Mr. Cousté, and others made it clear that such a delegation should have the same official status as the Community's delegation already established in Washington, and the one soon to be established in Tokyo.

Honourable senators, I do not want to overexaggerate the immediate importance of this. It is not going to happen tomorrow, but I am convinced it is going to happen in the very near future, and that Canada will be moved away up on the priority list of that pipeline which the Community has already set up for the extension of its external policies towards non-member and non-associated countries.

The European Parliament does not, of course, have the final say on this matter, but it has a great deal of influence, and the members of the European parliamentary delegation this morning made it very clear to us that it was their intention to strongly recommend this breakthrough for Canada in Community-Canada relations.

Why is this so important to Canada? I have indicated the importance of the market as such, and its growing importance in our economic future. It is important because we have not done well in the market in the past and can, I am convinced, do much better in the future. It is important, of course, because of the enlargement that I spoke of. Our position in the U.K. market has declined drastically, but it is still vitally important to many elements in our economy.

It is important also because of the Canadian interest—perhaps greater than that of almost any other country in the world—in the liberalization of multinational world trade. One of the fears expressed over the years about the Community, its common external tariff and its common agricultural policy, has been that the Community of nine nations and the many associated nations were turning inwards in their philosophy in respect to world free trade. Our visitors this morning assured us that this was not so. But certainly Canada has a tremendous interest in obtaining a closer communication, a voice, through the establishment of a delegation here, in the Community's policies, particularly in the now inaugurated new round of GATT negotiations.

• (1540)

Honourable senators, I believe that the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs has made a great contribution in this very important area in the best interests of Canada. I believe we can take some credit for this development this morning. It is possible—I will not say "probable"—it is possible there may be an announcement, because Sir Christopher Soames, the Commissioner for External Relations of the Community, has just arrived in Ottawa, and will be carrying on discussions at the ministerial and public service levels. I do not want to anticipate what may come out of those discussions, but if there is an announcement to the effect that it is the European Community's policy in the not too distant future to establish a delegation in Canada, I am sure that the Senate can take a good deal of credit for such a development.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

On motion of Senator Lapointe, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, November 6, at 8 p.m.

THE SENATE

Tuesday, November 6, 1973

The Senate met at 8 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

THE LATE SENATOR DONALD A. McLEAN

TRIBUTES

Hon. Paul Martin: Honourable senators, all of us I am sure share my deep regret at the loss of our colleague and friend Senator Donald McLean, who passed away yesterday. He was a good senator; he was a genial, friendly and co-operative gentleman. Throughout his life Donald McLean worked untiringly in the interests of his native province of New Brunswick and of Canada. "We in New Brunswick," he was fond of saying, "believe in the rule of law and in democratic principles to be found in the legislatures of the British Commonwealth." These were the words that he used on the occasion of his first speech in this house.

It was through that parliamentary system we have in Canada that, with resourcefulness and fortitude, Donald McLean worked unceasingly for the proper conservation of natural resources, particularly in the Atlantic area. From the very beginning of his career in the Senate in 1968 we know that he was true to those principles. In his maiden speech in the Senate he appealed to the Department of Fisheries to establish facilities for research so that adequate supplies would be assured for future generations. He knew that business perhaps as well as anyone in the country.

Away from the Senate and as a director of the Fisheries Council of Canada he maintained the same steadfastness of purpose that he demonstrated in this house. The programs which have since been instituted for the protection of Canadian fishery rights and for a viable conservation program to prevent the unnecessary depletion of fish stocks are largely due, we have been told, to his persistent efforts.

We admired Senator McLean; we admired and we noted his fortitude throughout his long and difficult illness. Senator McLean's life was a full contribution to public service. He will be missed by all who had the privilege of knowing and working with so unselfish and energetic a man. He will be sincerely missed in the Senate of Canada.

To Mrs. McLean and to her children we extend our sincere sympathy.

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, Donald McLean was a quiet, dignified and eminently sensible man. He was wise, experienced and humble. His career took him into several very different areas of endeavour and in each he was a resounding success.

This man of action could always be counted upon for a few incisive comments on the practicality of certain pieces of legislation. The points he made, the issues he raised, were always appropriate.

Over the past several months, our colleague had won even greater respect and admiration from everyone. His valiant fight against the dread disease of cancer was edifying and inspirational. The ferocity with which he fought to preserve it, the tenacity with which he clung to it when the effort of combat became too much for him, should give us all cause to reflect upon the value of the gift which is life.

Donald McLean was, above all else, a gentleman. He served both his province of New Brunswick and his country with the enthusiasm of a honest man sincerely desirous of helping other human beings. He was in the Senate, as he had been elsewhere, effective and successful.

To his widow and family, we offer our most heartfelt condolences.

Hon. Hervé J. Michaud: Senator Donald McLean and I were both summoned to the Senate on March 18, 1968, and we took the oath of allegiance on March 21, 1968. From that day until the last day he sat in this house he occupied the desk to my immediate right.

In his passing, I have lost a sincere friend, the province of New Brunswick has lost a sincere friend, and the country has lost a sincere friend.

To Mrs. McLean and the members of his family, I extend my sincere condolences.

COOPERATIVE CREDIT ASSOCIATIONS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-183, to amend the Cooperative Credit Associations Act.

Bill read first time.

Hon. Mr. Martin moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading on Thursday next.

Motion agreed to.

CUSTOMS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-189, to amend the Customs Act.

Bill read first time.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West) moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading on Thursday next.

Motion agreed to.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Hon. Paul Martin tabled:

Report of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce under the Corporations and Labour Unions Returns Act (Part II, Labour Unions) for the fiscal periods ended in 1971, pursuant to section 18(1) of the said act, chapter C-31, R.S.C., 1970.

Copies of document stating the government's position for the Third United Nations Conference of the Law of the Sea.

Copies of 'Tax Review Board Rules of Practice and Procedure published in the Canada Gazette, Part II, of September 26, 1973, pursuant to section 11(2) of the Tax Review Board Act, chapter 11, Statutes of Canada, 1970-71-72.

Copies of Order in Council P.C. 1973-3327, dated October 23, 1973, amending Part II of the Schedule to the Hazardous Products Act, pursuant to section 8(3) of the said act, chapter H-3, R.S.C., 1970.

Report on the administration of the Canada Student Loans Act for the loan year ended June 30, 1972, pursuant to section 18 of the said act, chapter S-17, R.S.C., 1970.

Copies of report submitted by the Secretary General of the United Nations to the Security Council, (English and French text), together with texts of two Notes addressed by him to the Permanent Representative of Canada to the United Nations, respecting Canadian participation in the Peace-Keeping Force in the Middle East (English texts).

Actuarial report on the operation of the Canada Pension Plan and on the state of the Canada Pension Plan Account as at December 31, 1972, pursuant to section 116(3) of the said plan, chapter C-5, R.S.C., 1970.

Copies of documents relating to the United Nations Emergency Force in the Middle East as follows:

(1) Agreement on the second phase of the implementation of the Security Council Resolution 340(1973) (English and French text).

(2) Notes dated October 30 and November 4, 1973, from the Permanent Representative of Canada to the Secretary General of the United Nations (English text).

(3) Note of November 3, 1973, from the Secretary General to Canada's Permanent Representative (English text).

● (2010)

SENATOR JOSEPH A. SULLIVAN

FELICITATIONS ON HONOUR FOR ATHLETIC ACHIEVEMENTS

Hon. Allister Grosart: Honourable senators, before the Orders of the Day are called, perhaps you will permit me to comment on an article which appeared in the Globe and Mail this morning and in which reference was made to one of our colleagues, Senator Sullivan. As I am sure you are all aware, Senator Sullivan has not been able to be with us for some time because of a long illness, a serious operation and a long convalescence.

The article to which I refer states that this evening he will be attending a convention in Toronto known as the Cavalcade of Champions. Unfortunately, this is not the case. In response to questions asked by some of my colleagues I want to make it clear that Senator Sullivan will not be present at that convention because he is still convalescing, and unable to leave his home.

However, he is to be honoured on this occasion, together with other outstanding Canadian athletes, past and present, as a member of the Varsity Grads Hockey Team, the 1928 Olympic Champions, and officially designated as the hockey team of the half-century, and also for his equally great, but not as well known, accomplishments in football and golf.

I can assure honourable senators that Senator Sullivan would very much like to be with us. He regrets his prolonged absence, particularly at this time when we are debating one of the subjects in which he is intensely interested, namely, capital punishment. If he were here he would express strong views, as we all know, with his usual forthrightness, conviction and professional erudition. I am sure that all honourable senators join with me in wishing him a speedy recovery and in assuring him of a warm welcome when he resumes his responsibilities here.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Honourable senators, I am sure we all note the information given to us by Senator Grosart, and hope that Senator Sullivan will soon be with us again. We congratulate him on the honour to be paid to him this evening, as, indeed, we congratulate all those who are to be honoured with him. I was happy to note that Senator Grosart referred to Senator Sullivan's distinction as goaltender on the University of Toronto Olympic championship team. I would point out, however, that in those days Senator Grosart would probably not have been as generous in applauding somebody from the University of Toronto as he is tonight, because at that time he was in another place. I am glad to note his change of heart.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: I am rather mystified by the remarks of Senator Martin. At that time I was an undergraduate at the University of Toronto, and a great admirer of the hockey team and also of the head of the Varsity debating team whose name in those days was just Paul Martin.

Hon. Mr. Martin: I stand corrected. I know now why Senator Grosart is as good a man as he is.

THE SENATE

APPOINTMENT OF GOVERNMENT WHIP

Hon. Mr. Martin: Honourable senators, it will be recalled that not very long ago Senator Molgat, who functioned in the capacity of Acting Whip, was elevated to an important national office in one of the major political parties of this country. I think we will all wish to extend our congratulations even though we may not be united in the same ideological purposes. As a result of his being so selected he finds it will be impossible for him to discharge the duties of Acting Whip. We have asked Senator Buckwold to assume this responsibility.

In doing so we note with satisfaction that Senator McDonald, who has been quite ill, is showing evidence of renewed vigour. We are very happy that this is the case.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I would like some clarification. Is the Leader of the Government able to clarify the situation as to who is Whip, who is Deputy Leader, and who is Acting Whip? What are the responsibilities of those around him? We know that he is the Leader of the Government—there is no doubt about that—but otherwise we are in the dark. If he could help us we would appreciate it very much.

Hon. Mr. Martin: I am sure that the only one who is really in the dark in this matter is Senator Flynn.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: That is too glib an answer.

MIDDLE EAST

PARTICIPATION OF CANADIAN FORCES IN UNITED NATIONS PEACEKEEPING FORCE—QUESTION

Hon. Mr. O'Leary: Before the Orders of the Day are called I should like to ask the Leader of the Government if he can inform the house in some way just what our role is in this alleged peacekeeping activity in the Middle East? Just how and where are we going there? Are we going to repeat the fiasco that happened in Vietnam, or is there something more to this role we are adopting? I am sure the government leader in the Senate knows what the situation is, and I think this house should be informed.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Before replying to that question I should like to congratulate Senator O'Leary on being made a Doctor of Letters of Wilfrid Laurier University. I had the great honour of conferring the degree, on behalf of the university, last Thursday night.

As Senator O'Leary and honourable senators know, the Secretary of State for External Affairs intimated in the other place last week Canada's willingness, if invited, to participate in the newly established United Nations force in the Middle East. We had received a request to join that force from the Secretary General, orally in the first instance and subsequently confirmed by letter. Some complications arose, as we know, on the part of the Soviet Union, which took the position that Poland should be a member of that force, and on that account there seemed to be some objection to Canadian participation. That objection has been removed, but a few details have yet to be worked out. When these are finalized it is proposed that there will be discussion in the other place, through a resolution concerning Parliament's reaction to the government's decision to participate in the force. However, as certain problems must be fully resolved, that debate has not yet been scheduled. When it does take place it will be followed, of course, by a similar procedure in the Senate.

Hon. Mr. O'Leary: The answer of the Leader of the Government contains two points. There were objections in some quarters. We know about those; the details, he said, have not yet been worked out, so we have no answer at all as to whom the objections were from, and what details are yet to be worked out.

● (2020)

Hon. Mr. Martin: As I indicated, there was an objection, in the first instance, to the participation of a NATO country.

Hon. Mr. O'Leary: By the Soviet Union.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Later the delegate of the Soviet Union publicly indicated the desire of his country and his government that Poland, a Warsaw Pact country, should participate. That question, together with the question of Canadian participation, has been solved, in principle. However, details of the participation in the peacekeeping force are now being considered. When they have been finally determined, the Secretary of State for External Affairs will so indicate. The debate in both houses will follow so that the government's policy can be confirmed or rejected.

Hon. Mr. O'Leary: In the meantine we have to work with Poland, the very country we could not work with, or who would not work with us. Is that not right?

Hon. Mr. Martin: There were difficulties not only between Canada and Poland but also with the other member of the commission. But these difficulties are hardly related to this situation.

Hon. Mr. O'Leary: Can we expect a later statement to this house from the Leader of the Government?

Hon. Mr. Martin: Certainly, when the resolution is placed before us the government will give a complete history of the matter, the circumstances of the invitation, the confirmation thereof, the discussions that the Secretary of State for External Affairs has had with Secretary General Waldheim, and the terms on which Canada has joined the peacekeeping force.

Hon. Mr. O'Leary: That will be something new.

Hon. Mr. Benidickson: Honourable senators, I rise with some hesitation. We appear to have a variety of topics on the discussion menu tonight. If I am not mistaken, Senator O'Leary is wearing the suit in which he appeared on television the other night. He, perhaps more than anyone, can relate the story of Sir Wilfrid Laurier and the history of events which occurred in his public life, and he did so in the highest tradition of this and the other chamber, and with great distinction to himself.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

ELECTORAL BOUNDARIES READJUSTMENT ACT

BILL C-222 (PEEL-SOUTH)—THIRD READING

Hon. Allister Grosart moved the third reading of Bill C-222, respecting the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

CRIMINAL CODE (CAPITAL PUNISHMENT)

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE CONTINUED

The Senate resumed from Thursday, November 1, the adjourned debate on the motion of Senator McIlraith for second reading of Bill C-2, to amend the Criminal Code.

Hon. Hazen Argue: Honourable senators, I wish to continue my speech, adjourned at the last sitting of the Senate, in support of the total abolition of capital punishment. Senator McIlraith is to be congratulated on his comprehensive review in presenting the bill to the house. Senator McIlraith, with his wide experience, is eminently fitted to pilot this measure which is now before us.

I am one of those who believe in the total abolition of capital punishment. I think the world, and the civilized world in particular, is moving in that direction. Great Britain abolished capital punishment permanently in 1969, after having abolished capital punishment for a five-year trial period. A private member's bill was brought before the Parliament of the United Kingdom earlier this year with the purpose of restoring capital punishment. That bill was defeated by a resounding vote. Organizations of many kinds across the country, more and more, are coming to support the abolition of capital punishment. The churches are taking a stand. The protestant churches, in general, are opposed to capital punishment.

Senator Macdonald earlier this year placed on the record a statement from the Canadian Catholic Conference as issued by the Reverend W. E. Power, the then President, which stated in part as follows:

> The question of the death penalty, in our opinion, ought not focus on whether a convicted murderer, no matter how wanton, "deserves" to die. The focus should be on us: should Canadians as a community try to break the escalating spiral of violence by refraining from violence even as a deterrent?

He goes on to say:

> There is also a pragmatic, statistical question whether the death penalty is an effective deterrent. We will not enter this debate. Our question is not whether the death penalty is an effective deterrent; our question is whether it is an absolutely necessary deterrent, required by good order in Canada today. Unless you are convinced that it is, then we feel that the presumption should be for suspension. Furthermore, in our opinion the case for retention of the death penalty has not been proven.

It was difficult for members of the other place to register their vote on second reading of this bill. While many of them believed in abolition, and for that reason wished to support the measure, many of them found their constituents, to a substantial degree, appeared to favour retention of the death penalty. Many of the members who decided to support the bill did so believing that it was the duty of a member of Parliament to exercise his own conviction even though, in exercising that conviction, he might go against what appeared to be the popular will of the electorate.

Even more so, I think members of this place should, and I expect will, exercise their own personal convictions in dealing with this legislation. We are in a position—as a matter of fact, that, I believe, is one of the reasons we are here—to exercise independent judgment, and we can exercise our independent judgment not only on the bill itself but also on any amendment that may be presented to the bill when it is before us in committee for detailed consideration.

Capital punishment has been abolished in Canada in a modified way for a period of five years. It may be said by some that the murder rate in that period increased as compared to the previous period. I have statistics before me which show that is true. The murder rate increased by some 53 per cent. Other crimes of violence increased by an even larger amount. There is no evidence that the de facto abolition of capital punishment resulted in any way by itself in an increase in murders. The increase that has taken place was less, as I have said, than the increase in certain other violent crimes.

● (2030)

Capital punishment has been abolished in New Zealand for many years, but it has a long history of having had periods in which capital punishment was in effect and other periods when it was abolished. I quote now from a study prepared on the New Zealand results:

> During seven years of capital punishment (1951-1957) 22 murderers were convicted. Each of the murderers was hanged. In the nine years following the suspension of capital punishment the figure was 24.

It goes on:

> . . . in the 15-year period during which the death penalty was not imposed in New Zealand (1936-50) there were 148 murders; in the 15-year period before 1936 there were 154.

In other words, there was a reduction of six in the number of murders after execution had stopped.

There is certainly no evidence to suggest that the retention of capital punishment is a deterrent to murder. The bill before us provides that capital punishment may take place in the case of conviction for the killing of a policeman or a prison guard. Naturally people are inclined to wish to give every protection they can to policemen and to prison guards, but does the retention of capital punishment in this respect have any particular effect? I would suggest not. Statistics have been placed on the record to show that the likelihood of a policeman or prison guard losing his life while doing his job is about three in 10,000. The likelihood of a miner losing his life on the job is about eleven in 10,000. The likelihood of a farmer losing his life working in the fields with farm equipment is about six in 10,000. From this evidence, from the fact that it cannot be proven that capital punishment is in fact a deterrent, it does not seem that even this particular provision should be retained in the legislation that is before us. As nations become more and more civilized, there is a tendency and a trend towards the abolition of hanging.

Another reason capital punishment should be abolished is that innocent people may be executed, and in fact are executed. A study shows that in the 40-year period of the operation of Sing Sing Prison, 12.3 per cent of the 406 persons sent there for execution were found, upon reconsideration, to have been sentenced in error.

I suggest that the state should not take the life of a citizen, even though that citizen may have been convicted of murder. There is the danger of error. I would suggest to honourable senators that we shall have achieved an improved civilization when the citizens of this nation can be certain that no miscarriage of justice by the state will result in a citizen losing his life. To me one of the great advantages of living in a democracy compared with living in a dictatorship is the safety and the sanctity of life. I suggest that we should go the full way and remove the possibility of the state taking the life of a citizen.

I believe in total abolition. I believe there is reason for the Senate at this time, when this measure is being considered by the Senate, to make a decision on the question of total abolition. That decision was not made by the other place. When this measure was passed by the other place, I am pleased to say that most of the press of this country supported this advance towards the removal of capital punishment. An editorial in the Montreal Gazette of October 26, which appealed to me, had this to say:

> Sooner or later, Canadians will have to sort out how they feel on capital punishment. As this week's extension of the ban on state executions for another five years shows, they have not done so yet.
>
> Over the past 11 years there has been no convincing evidence offered to show that a hanging ban has caused an increase in the murder rate. Countries like Great Britain that are noted for their civilized humanity have added to their good names by abolishing capital punishment. Canada has not yet done so and is dishonored by this barbaric relic on its statute books.

Hon. Mr. Molson: Will the honourable senator permit a question?

Hon. Mr. Argue: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Molson: Do you not think the source of that particular quotation is somewhat in question after the "respect" it has expressed for this chamber?

Hon. Mr. Argue: That may be. It may have been the same editorial writer, it may not. In any event, I would think that in the editorial to which I have referred they were using much better judgment than in the editorial to which the honourable senator has referred. However, there were many other newspapers that, following this, had editorials in favour of the abolition of capital punishment.

I think the Senate itself should make a decision on the question of total abolition. I have had prepared a number of amendments, which I hope at the appropriate time to place before honourable senators so that a decision can be taken by the Senate. I would like to see the Senate amend this legislation to provide for total abolition. I would like to see us send the amended bill back to the other place, which could then deal with this question. They will either accept the Senate amendment, which I hope they would do, resulting in total abolition, or they will reject it. If they reject it, I for one would be satisfied to accept that rejection, and we would then have on the statute book of this country the bill that is now before us. But I would think that the Senate should exercise independent judgment, that each senator should examine his position and that we should not be in any way afraid or deterred from passing an amendment providing for total abolition, if that is our conviction.

● (2040)

Some may say that the other place is not in a position to deal with the amendment, and would point to all the trouble they had over there in getting the bill to this stage. I know they have had lots of trouble. I know they are apparently incapable of achieving very much. But that is their responsibility. I would think that our responsibility is to make our own decision independently of how they may handle that decision after we make it. I don't know what position the Conservative Party will take on this question.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: It is a free vote.

Hon. Mr. Argue: The leader now says it is a free vote, which is the answer I expected. I hope that it will not only be stated that there will be a free vote as far as the Liberal senators are concerned. I express the hope that there will be no effort to crack the whip.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: That is wishful thinking.

Hon. Mr. Argue: I don't believe the whip was cracked, or that the whips were put on—

Hon. Mr. Flynn: You will see.

Hon. Mr. Argue: —in the House of Commons. I do not see any reason why the whips should be put on in the Senate and I do not really expect they will. We have a very small Opposition Party in the Senate. The Government Party outnumbers the Opposition by almost five to one. That being the case, it is all the more necessary that each individual senator, no matter his party label, exercise his own individual judgment.

I do not expect senators to support any of my amendments just because I place them before the Senate, but I hope that each amendment will be judged on its merits and that in the end the Senate will vote for the abolition of capital punishment and make this chamber a leader in this important social reform.

Hon. Raymond Joseph Perrault: Honourable senators, as I rise for the first time in this house may I say it is a privilege to be here. I look forward to working with all of you.

As you know, I have served in the legislature of the Province of British Columbia, and I have served in the other place. I have discovered, as have you, that no one party has a monopoly on virtue, talent, ability or a monopoly on concern about problems afflicting Canadians.

I have discovered also that we achieve far more by co-operation than by antagonism. I say with genuine fervour that I look forward to serving here to the best of my ability and to working co-operatively and constructively with all of you wherever you sit in this distinguished assembly.

Canada's first recorded execution occurred in the late eighteenth century when a sixteen-year-old girl was hanged for petty theft. The hanging of that young woman gave rise to an agonizing public dialogue which continues to this day. It is a dialogue which stirs men's hearts, souls and consciences.

Honourable senators, the question uppermost in our minds must surely be: Does capital punishment represent the best way to protect society against those who would take another's life? That is the uppermost consideration, in a violent society, where there is a rising public clamour for something to be done by governments against those who would wreck our society from within.

Have we learned anything about crime and punishment since that little girl spent her final 15 minutes at the end of a rope? Since that unhappy incident in the early days of Canada, before we were really all one Canada, many others have died in agony at the hands of murderers, and many murderers in turn have gone to the gallows and been hanged. In no way can anyone question the need to protect the public against the murderous predators in our midst. A violent society demands effective and enlightened law enforcement.

In the past ten years in the Province of British Columbia some horrible crimes involving youngsters and the elderly have been committed, which has given rise to a real public passion on this subject of crime and punishment and law enforcement. Would a return to the law of 1961, which would follow the rejection by Parliament of the measure before us, serve the interest of society, the interest of justice, the interest of public security, or rather revenge and passion?

The purpose of criminal law surely stems from a desire to provide a means of protection for the public against a few who do not respect the rights of others. That still remains the fundamental purpose of the law to which this government is committed.

Honourable senators, the question as to the deterrent value of capital punishment has been asked for centuries, as we all know. The death penalty for such minor offences as picking pockets and petty theft was abandoned in England in the nineteenth century. Public executions were abandoned in Canada in 1868. The bill before us is really a continuation of a measure introduced in 1967 by Parliament when it determined to launch a five-year test period during which capital punishment would be limited to cases involving the death of police or prison officials. This bill is similar to the 1967 act, as honourable senators know. It is contended that more time is required to determine whether society is protected adequately by this partial abolition of the death penalty.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: It is practically abolition.

Hon. Mr. Perrault: The measure before us establishes a special status for police and prison officials which, in the state of today's Canada, I believe to be warranted. We should make no mistake. The premise from which we must ponder the question and take appropriate action is the basic one of safety of Canadians. This bears repeating over and over again.

The Right Honourable the Prime Minister said a few months ago in the other place:

> Our criminal laws, our penal system, our reform programs will be of little value if they do not respect the right of Canadians to live their lives without fear of criminal activity.

And he added:

> The attributes of mercy and forgiveness cannot thrive in circumstances of fright and uncertainty.

● (2050)

The evidence available thus far with respect to the five-year partial ban on capital punishment is, I think it must be admitted, fragmentary, incomplete, and inconclusive, and so I intend to support the measure before us. Just as strongly, however, do I support measures which will assist law enforcement officials in this country to deal with the problems of a violent society, for I think that too often we ignore the problems facing law enforcement officials. It is almost a popular "kick" by a minority in North America to attack law enforcement agencies of all kinds as being "square", old fashioned, out of date, unnecessary, or somehow reactionary, but at all levels of government we must be prepared to provide our law enforcement agencies with the personnel and resources which they require in order to reduce the incidence of crime, including murder, to deal with criminals, and thereby help us all.

It may be said that the best deterrent to murder, or to any other crime, is the certainty of detection and conviction. It is not easy to be a policeman these days, as those of us who know people in police work realize. Police work and penology are fields where a great deal of dedication and understanding are required, especially in circumstances where a loud and vocal minority choose to denigrate and to attack the efforts of law enforcement agencies to serve the interests of society.

I intend to support the measure before us because the results of the previous experiment are, as yet, not known. But, honourable senators, I am in accord with those who suggest that while we need, perhaps, to review our position with respect to capital punishment, we are in urgent need of a review of the parole legislation and its administration in this country today. I say this in the knowledge that a number of senators have been engaged in a review of the subject, and are in the process of preparing a report on parole and sentencing. Certainly consideration has to be given to the mandatory sentencing without access to parole, without access to temporary release, of certain people who being psychotics cannot be unleashed on society. The problem is, of course, to identify the psychotic offender who is incapable of rehabilitation. And there should be a review of sentencing in this country.

The men and women serving in the capacity of law enforcement officials are, in fact, the front line shock troops in the battle against our anti-social internal enemies. At this stage in Canada's evolution, I agree very much that their position as society's front line against crime must be recognized, and it is not good enough merely to say, "Well, there is a higher accident rate on construction projects than there is in police work." That is irrelevant. People in police work are defending society. They are defending the lives of Canadians; they enjoy a special status and should be accorded a special status.

I suggest, as well, that regardless of allegations to the contrary, commutation by Cabinet has not been, and should not be, automatic for a police or prison guard murderer. All the evidence indicates that Canadian Cabinets have been extremely conscientious in their advice to Her Majesty to exercise the royal prerogative to commute the death sentence. That applies not only in the case of this Cabinet, but previous Cabinets regardless of political affiliation.

What progress has been made in efforts to further protect society, if protection is our goal? For protection of society is and must be the end object of the measure before us. Over the past ten years there have been a number of experiments with respect to the administration of justice, including parole and capital punishment. Some of these experiments have been successful; others, tragically, have been unsuccessful. One fact, however, emerges.

These efforts to evolve a more effective method of reform and rehabilitation must continue.

It is said these days, that we send people to prison and "they eat steaks three times a week," and "they live it up." Some people say, "Well, instead, they should be on the end of a rope," or "They should be breaking stones."

I visited a prison last week, preparatory to this debate. This was a minimum security institution, and as I was in the waiting room one of the prisoners shattered a plate of glass, in frustration, with his hand, and as the blood trickled down his arm he began to cry like a six-year-old child at the thought of leaving his wife and youngsters, who had been admitted on a family visit. It is no fun for people to be in prison, and to some extent, at least, we can say, "There, but for the grace of God, go a great many Canadian citizens, perhaps even including members of Parliament."

An Hon. Senator: How about including senators?

Hon. Mr. Perrault: Including senators.

The extremists in society insist that prisoners are "living the life of Riley" in prison, but I cannot forget the sight of that man standing there in frustration. He had committed an anti-social crime, undoubtedly, but it is not easy to be in prison, just as it is not a happy event to be a victim of crime.

None of us can be complacent about the fact that the rate of recidivism continues to be very high in this country. The resultant cost to society, in terms of economics, human suffering and agony, is entirely unacceptable.

With respect to the high rate of recidivism it is interesting and significant to note that since 1867 only one person convicted of murder, and sentenced to life imprisonment, has killed a second time on parole. By contrast, as honourable senators are aware, the failure rate among many other offenders is much higher. It is a statistical fact that murder is often the unique incident of criminality in the life of a man or woman, the only time, perhaps, that he or she has done anything illegal or wrong, according to law. Perhaps there was a burst of passion which drove the person to commit the terrible crime of murder. Most murders are crimes of passion, and they are not premeditated. Approximately two out of every three murders involve family or acquaintances. The recidivism rates for murderers bears repeating; they are among the lowest of any form of criminal activity.

The right honourable member for Prince Albert in the other place is an abolitionist, of course, as honourable senators know, but for another reason—the possibility that an innocent man may be hanged. One notable study, by the University of Minnesota, concluded that out of a number of murders in the first 50 years of this century, as many as 12 per cent of all those executed were eventually absolved of the crime for which they had died. Abolition in the United Kingdom, of course, arose, in great measure, from that horrible miscarriage of justice in which a multiple murderer went free, at least for a time, and an innocent man died in his place. There is no clear evidence that capital punishment deters. In actual fact, the results of our Canadian test ban are not known as yet.

Capital punishment does not help the victim. As one commentator said, "We risk killing innocent men, we escalate brutality, and we betray our highest ideals." But what of the victims and their survivors? So many people debate this issue, and they forget all about the tragedy of the person who is killed and the family he or she leaves. Society, however, is coming around to a recognition of their need. It is one of the curious facts of contemporary history that about a year ago a police officer was killed in the United States, and petitions were taken up by thousands of people for mercy to be extended to the murderer, but nobody came forward to volunteer to help raise money for the family of six that the police officer left behind.

What of the victims and their survivors? Until fairly recently the emotional concern directed to the murderer was, curiously, withheld from the victim and his dependents. I agree that society's first concern must be with the innocent victims of crime, and with society; and happily, new programs are now in effect which provide compensation for victims of violent crime, largely due to the initiative shown by the present government.

● (2100)

In conclusion, honourable senators, I support the continuation of the partial ban on capital punishment. It is to be hoped that the final result of the test period and the statistics, when analyzed, will indicate that there is no danger and no difficulty in effecting a total and permanent ban on capital punishment. I urge, however, at the same time, that major efforts be made to assist our hard-working law enforcement agencies to advance enlightened and effective policies in defence of the public; that we direct greater efforts to achieve enlightened penal reform, and that we attempt to improve the quality of society generally so that the rate of crime will thereby be reduced. As well, I believe we should review the present sentencing and parole procedures in this country.

Hon. Chesley W. Carter: Honourable senators, before saying a few words on this bill I should like to join in the tribute that has been paid to Senator McIlraith for his clear exposition of the measure on Thursday last. I should also like to congratulate those who have preceded me in this debate. They have expressed their views with a clarity and conviction which demands the utmost respect. Even if we cannot agree completely with the views expressed, we certainly must give them the respect they deserve.

In moving second reading of the bill, Senator McIlraith made it very clear that its principle did not concern the question whether the death penalty should be retained or abolished, but rather whether the legislation in effect from 1967 to 1972 should be extended for a further period of five years. The 1967 legislation was passed only after a very great deal of soul-searching on a subject that touches the consciences and emotions of us all.

If we look back over the history of capital punishment we will see that there has been a great deal of progression in the direction of abolition. There was a time when the death penalty was imposed for a large variety of offences, even for the stealing of a sheep. However, over the years there has been a gradual reduction in the number of crimes for which the death penalty was imposed until finally in recent years it was imposed for the crime of murder only.

The 1967 legislation carried that reduction process one stage further by defining two classes of murder, and retaining the death penalty only for the murder of police officials and prison guards. At that time, honourable senators, a time limit of five years was placed on the legislation, and those of us who favoured abolition hoped that during those five years public opinion would progress still further in the direction of abolition, or that at least statistics would emerge that would tip the scales decisively either in favour of abolition or retention. Neither of these things has happened. The country as a whole is still as divided as it was in 1967. So the motion for third reading of this bill, which involves merely the extension of an experiment, was carried by a very narrow margin in the other place. It is my impression that a bill for outright abolition would have been rejected by the other place, and by the country at large. Every police officer with whom I have been able to talk has been in favour of retention of the death penalty and the mail that I have received has also been heavily weighted in favour of its retention.

No conclusive statistical data has emerged over the past five years for the very reason that Senator McIlraith pointed out on Thursday last, that the crime of murder arises from such a vast number of widely varying circumstances, involving a large number of different kinds of people in so many different situations, that the inference is that for some persons, in some circumstances and in some situations, the death penalty is a deterrent, while for others, in different circumstances and in other situations, it is not. If that is a logical conclusion then, of course, we cannot expect that any conclusive statistical evidence will emerge during the next five years, and, unless there is a marked change in public opinion, when 1978 comes around we shall be faced with the same problem again and we shall find ourselves in exactly the same position as we are now.

Honourable senators, I referred earlier to the legislation in operation from 1967 to 1972 as a five-year experiment. But there is one factor which may have disqualified it or invalidated it as an experiment, and that is the exercise of the royal prerogative as a result of which the death sentence, although pronounced in certain cases, was commuted and the penalty prescribed by law not carried out.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: May I ask a question? Do you still consider it an experiment?

Hon. Mr. Carter: I think the answer to my honourable friend's question will emerge if he will listen for a few more minutes.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: It is always a pleasure to listen to you.

Hon. Mr. Carter: What statistical effect this had on the results of the experiment we have no way of knowing. Had the death sentences not been commuted, then the very act of their being carried out might very well have shocked the public conscience to the point that there might now be a clear majority in favour of total abolition. On the other hand, statistical evidence might have emerged that would have shown conclusively that the death penalty ought to be retained as a deterrent. However, that is something we shall never know and shall never have any way of knowing. Who is to say that these sentences should not have been commuted, or that the royal prerogative should never be exercised at all? This is something that we can do nothing about and, as Senator McIlraith pointed out last Thursday, the royal prerogative is not a part of the principle of this bill and therefore should not be a factor in our decision as to its approval on second reading. It is clear, however, that the principle of Bill C-2 to which we must address ourselves is whether the 1967-72 law should be extended for a further five years, yet it is practically impossible to separate that from the wider question as to whether the death penalty should be abolished or retained.

● (2110)

In coming to grips with this question in the absence of conclusive statistical data we are forced to fall back on our personal opinions, feelings and emotions which, in turn, are products of our individual backgrounds, experiences and convictions. Sincere as they undoubtedly are, how can we add them up, assign values to them and strike a concrete balance for or against the question? My conscience is no better guide than that of any other person, and my opinions no more valid; that is true of us all. That being the case, what would our vote if taken really mean?

Personally, I have always been in favour of abolition, both on philosophical and moral grounds in addition to the interests of equitable administration of justice. As Senator Argue pointed out earlier this evening, the moral and philosophical grounds rest on the sanctity of human life, and that raises the broad question as to whether the life of one individual, because he is a policeman or a guard, is more sacred than the life of any other individual. It raises the question as to whether the state should be bound by the same moral law as binds the individual. Should the state take away something which it cannot restore?

As both Senator Argue and Senator Perrault pointed out, we know that innocent people have been hanged, which is a fearful risk for society to take. We know also that the law is very unevenly administered. Statistics show that only 7 per cent of those convicted or accused of murder are actually hanged. Analysis of that 7 per cent shows that they come from the poorer ranks of society, people who are unable to afford the legal counsel necessary for their acquittal.

Then I am against the death penalty because I think that there is another alternative, which is life imprisonment under conditions which will ensure that the convicted person will stay confined for a long period of time because, after all, the purpose of the law is to protect society. This alternative provides both an opportunity to protect society and at the same time to attempt to rehabilitate the criminal.

There is also the effect of the application of capital punishment on society as a whole. There are those who maintain that it degrades society and they would abolish the death penalty on that ground alone. There is also the question as to what extent society itself is to blame for the crime that has been committed. We cannot escape being our brother's keeper. If society permits conditions under which people grow up underprivileged; if society permits dens of vice and the trafficking of drugs to exist, as a result of which a person becomes a criminal and commits murder, surely society itself has to share the blame for that crime.

Senator Argue said that he intends to put forward some amendments, which I understood to be in the direction of total abolition. I am not an expert on rules of procedure, but it would seem to me that if we accept the fact that the principle of this bill is whether the 1967-72 legislation should be extended, then any amendment contrary to that principle would be out of order. However, perhaps it is well for Senator Argue to test this out in committee. If the committee accepts his amendments and recommends them to this house, then I for one would be inclined to support them. I would point out that this bill was considered at length in the other place, not only in the chamber itself but also in committee. There were many, many opportunities for an amendment such as Senator Argue indicated to be presented in the other place. The fact is that such an amendment was not presented, and I think we can deduce that the reason was that there was no chance of it being carried. Now, if that is a correct deduction, it may not be a wise strategy for the Senate to amend this bill and send it back to the Commons for another period of extended debate. Perhaps the wiser course would be for us to pass this bill as it is and wait for another five years to see what changes may take place in the meantime.

Hon. Mr. Argue: You said you would support the amendment.

Hon. Mr. Carter: I would if the committee adopted it and recommended it to this house. Although I am in favour of total abolition, should that be possible, I should like at present to indicate my support for the bill.

• (2120)

Hon. Mr. Phillips: Honourable senators, may I ask a question of the honourable senator who has just resumed his seat? I asked him earlier in his remarks whether or not the five-year period, or moratorium, on the death penalty was a success. I do not feel that the honourable senator answered my question, although he assured me that if I continued to listen to him he would. I listened, and in the course of his remarks, he raised a number of other questions, made a number of suggestions, and referred to other possibilities. As a consequence, I should like to ask him whether, because the House of Commons has rejected an amendment for the complete abolition of capital punishment, he considers that we should accept that decision.

In all fairness, I should tell the honourable senator that I am a retentionist. I do not think the honourable senator's remarks really express his own views or those of this chamber, in that we should not amend something which the House of Commons has accepted. I would point out, with all due respect, that we have the right to amend any measure, and I hope we will retain that right.

Hon. Mr. Carter: If I understood my honourable friend correctly, he started out by saying he had asked me a question which had not been answered. I listened to him attentively, but I still do not know which part of the question remains unanswered.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: All of it.

Hon. Mr. Carter: I should point out to the honourable senator that I did not say that this house does not have the right to amend the bill now before us. I concede that it has. I merely pointed out that the same opportunity to amend the bill existed in the other place. The bill was considered and deliberated upon for an extended period, and such an amendment was not introduced. I assume that was not done because it was generally understood that it would not be carried. I have no reason to believe that the opinion of the other house has changed, and for that reason I question the strategy of amending the bill in the Senate and sending it back to the other place with the almost certain assurance that it would not be accepted.

Hon. Mr. Argue: I am sure it would pass.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: If I understood Senator Carter correctly, he is saying that the only time an amendment should be introduced is when it can be carried. How does he think we on this side of the chamber feel when we introduce an amendment knowing that we are outvoted three to one?

Hon. Mr. Argue: Four and a half to one.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: Yes. Would the honourable senator explain his attitude with regard to our feelings on this side of the house?

Hon. Mr. Carter: That is not a correct parallel, because the vote in the other house was non-partisan.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: And the vote in this house is not?

Hon. Mr. Buckwold: Honourable senators, before the debate is adjourned may I, as Acting Whip appointed by the Leader of the Government, make a request of the house? A great deal of interest has been shown by honourable senators in this debate. I would appeal to those on the government side, and, if possible, to those on the opposite side of the house, to indicate to me their desire to speak in order that the debate can be arranged in an orderly fashion. I would like to ensure a good supply of speakers on both sides of the house, and to this end I would appreciate the co-operation of all honourable senators.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: Our group on this side of the house is very small. I do not think we have ever failed to put up speakers when required. Our difficulty has been in finding out when and if the government has a speaker available. If we are assured that there is someone available on the government side, the honourable senator will find someone equally available on the Opposition side.

On motion of Senator Molson, debate adjourned.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

EXPANDED EUROPEAN COMMUNITIES—CONSIDERATION OF REPORT OF COMMITTEE—DEBATE CONTINUED

The Senate resumed from Thursday, November 1, the adjourned debate on the consideration of the Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs, entitled: "Canadian Relations with the European Community".

[Translation]

Hon. Renaude Lapointe: Honourable senators, I had not so far taken part in the debate on the report of the Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs entitled "Canadian Relations with the European Community" because I felt everything had been said on the subject by my distinguished colleagues on the committee.

But I think I am justified in doing so today due to the almost miraculous expansion those relations have taken in the last few days, first, with the visit in Ottawa of an important delegation from the European Parliament, which we could almost call historic, and second, with the opening speech, Sir Christopher Soames, Vice-President of the European Community Commission, made at the conference of the Canadian Institute of International Affairs on the same subject, that is, Canada and the European Community.

We can say that the conference organized by the Institute, in co-operation with the Department of External Affairs and the European Community Commission, was a complete success. It enabled the many participants to deal with new ideas and to give a logical follow up to the joint statement issued on November 1 by the European Parliament delegation and the Canadian Parliament delegation, at the outcome of their discussions.

In this statement, the European delegates admit that the Community policies must take into account the interests of Canada as separate from those of the United States, and that policy statement, separate from the one prepared between the United States and the Community, must be worked out for Canada. They say they are satisfied by the constructive part played by Canada at the Conference on European Security and Co-operation, and they are very much interested in the results obtained in Canada in the area of nuclear reactors.

For their part, the Canadian delegates recognize the political and social importance of the agricultural policy of the European Community, even though Canadian sales are affected by the price structure of this policy.

Finally, both parties agree that periodic meetings should be arranged between the European Parliament and the Parliament of Canada, as requested by the Senate committee, and both groups recognize as well the need to develop a structured two-way communication mechanism with the Community. But the most important point is that they agreed, as announced here last Thursday by the honourable Senator Grosart, that the Community should consider in priority the establishment of a delegation including an information office in Ottawa.

In our committee report, we stopped short of asking for the setting up of this delegation. We merely expressed the wish that an information office might be set up in Ottawa. And now, not only do our visitors admit the need for such an office, but they consider the establishment of a delegation that would include about five or six experts in different fields, and this is considered as a priority matter after the establishment of a similar delegation in Tokyo, in 1974.

● (2130)

[English]

The two delegations recognized that methods for co-operation in the exploration and development of oil sources in the North Atlantic, the Eastern Arctic and the Alberta tar sands could be profitably examined; they recognized the great importance of co-operation also in the field of scientific research and technology; they agreed that co-operation between member states and Canada in the upgrading of industrial raw materials could be mutually advantageous. The two sides equally agreed that there were increasingly interesting investment possibilities in both directions, but they recognized that the question of multinational corporations would inevitably have to be examined. Finally, they agreed on the need to take more energetic action in implementing their responsibilities to developing countries.

The friendly message delivered Thursday night by Sir Christopher Soames, on what he considered his first official visit to Canada as a European, has also been received with satisfaction by the Standing Senate Committee which had met him in Brussels. In particularly good spirits, the Vice-President of the Commission has maintained that the Community is not, and never could become, an inward-looking regional bloc, for, even if it had that desire, it does not have the means or the resources to be a self-sufficient economic unit. He added that in the new round of world trade negotiations inaugurated in Tokyo, and which are to run their course in Geneva, the Community has taken the lead and is determined to show concrete proof of its willingness to travel further along the path of liberalization.

As a second illustration, he referred to the Community's policies towards developing countries. "Our concern," he said, "is not mere altruism; it is also an expression of enlightened self-interest."

Regarding Canada, Sir Christopher said he could give a clear answer. Recalling that our country was explicitly singled out in the Communiqué of the Summit as a country with which the Community was determined to maintain a constructive dialogue, he added that it has been the task of the European Commission to give this dialogue a serious content and that the imaginative response from the Canadian side has been encouraging for them.

Not only do they see Canada as a country of fast increasing industrialization, as the possessor of large supplies, as an important trading partner, but as a country whose approach to world problems is similar to the approach which the Community itself is seeking to adopt, such as a further liberalization of world trade and the promotion of a new and more satisfactory balance between developed and developing countries. However, Sir Christopher does not want us to see the Community uniquely as some form of alternative to Canada's links with the United States or the Far East; he does consider that Canada and the European Community have their own particular and individual relationship to work out.

He added that the European Community is trying, in the negotiations at Geneva, under article 24, paragraph 6 of GATT, to offset some of the immediate adverse consequences to Canada which have resulted from the enlargement of the Community, and he is confident that wider opportunities for both industry and agriculture will arise in the multilateral trade negotiations which opened in Tokyo last September. At this stage, however, we should not be too optimistic regarding possible changes in the agricultural policy because of the world situation. The opinion of experts is that the European Community will brush aside ambitious reforms, and will limit its propositions to relatively minor changes.

For Sir Christopher, the essential point is that Canada and the Community share the basic aim of increasing the flow of trade and investment between them. Like the European parliamentarians, he believes that there is real scope for something bold and imaginative in the field of joint industrial ventures. He is also in favour of swapping technology and expertise, and opening up investment and markets in both directions. He considers that both the public and the private sectors will have their part to play in this new game—the public sector in tracing the economic framework and laying down the rules where appropriate; the private sector in getting together the bankers and engineers, the managers and market experts, to see whether there can be a larger European contribution to Canada's own economic self-realization.

The distinguished visitor concluded by saying that if the Community intends to do its best to develop its Canadian dimension, it expects in return an equal effort and encouragement on the Canadian side.

● (2140)

[Translation]

The courtesy and enthusiasm that were called for that evening at the opening of the Institute conference gave way to more technical and intensive discussions between Europeans and Canadians in the four round tables or work shops on the following topics: trade and agriculture; industry and technology; resources and energy and, finally, Canada, the Community and the world.

The chairman of this last workshop, Gordon Hawkins, of Dalhousie University, cautioned us against a presumption that we know all about the Common Market. "We still consider it, he said, as an economic organization, while it is developing into a more complex and more sophisticated society. This is the reason why we must establish other relations than on the business level. At the present time, our interest is mainly dictated by our fear of isolation, but we must take more serious and systematic measures at two levels, either through knowledge and bilateral relations, that is between Canada and each country in particular, or through knowledge and multilateral relations between Canada and the Community as a whole."

Several newsmen who were there did agree that until now the press has utterly failed in its task to involve the people in this new economic and political entity. We find a lack of interest at all levels: in the business world, the universities, the trade unions and elsewhere. However, we must admit that it is still an abstract subject, except for well-informed people who take the time to find out about what goes on. But, if the media were more actively involved, public opinion would follow, if it were given clear and positive facts.

It is in this connection that a reference was made to a possible visit of the Prime Minister to Brussels and the member countries of the Common Market, a visit suggested by our committee. A representative from External Affairs indicated Friday that the matter is being considered very seriously. However, the following day, a panelist who is both an economist and a newsman, said he felt that the tour was a little premature, explaining that our exploratory approaches are not sufficiently advanced.

For his part, Mr. Pierre Malvé, an assistant to the Chairman of the European Commission in Brussels, made a remarkable speech: "What is wanted here", he said, "is perhaps a still picture of the Economic Community, and that does not exist, because the Community is always changing." However, there have been contacts with Canada and we are even concerned about the close watch the Canadian government is keeping on us. During the GATT meetings, he went on, you waged, with a certain degree of success, some battles against the EEC. That's good, for if you do not have the political will to achieve something, you shall get nothing. The decision of Great Britain to join the EEC provides your country with a new opportunity and you must make the other member States aware of the Canadian position and Europe's responsibility towards you.

He went on to say that industrialized nations need one another and that it is between them that trade expands more rapidly. Because to expand, know-how and expertise must be pooled.

Finally, what we must retain of these exchanges of views between academics, diplomats, economists, officials of various departments, outstanding businessmen and learned experts on the European question is, first of all, that the move of the EEC towards monetary and political unity in 1980 will not go smoothly and without disappointments, that its steps will be hesitant and careful, and that it will remain a slow and clumsy partner for many years to come. But it has been added that this partner is not as aggressive as it was thought and even though it is not easy on everyone it is not unreasonable.

Secondly, Canada should be patient and obstinate and more audacious and imaginative in its initiatives, as strongly suggested by Roy Pryce, Information Director for the Community. From this standpoint we think that the publication of our report was a most constructive and original initiative. And, if it is true, as emphasized by a spokesman from External Affairs, that the dialogue has been going on for two and a half years between Canada and the Community and that our ambassador in Brussels is quite competent, it nevertheless remains that the representations made in Brussels by the Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs, under the able leadership of Senators Aird and Grosart, awoke the interest of the Community's representatives at various levels and that they succeeded in establishing ties whose significance should not be minimized, ties which have been strengthened by the very visit here of the European parliamentarians.

We have therefore lived through a memorable week in the sense that it has certainly given a new impetus to Canada's relations with the overseas giant which seems less fearsome than we had thought previously.

[English]

On motion of Senator Carter, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

25862—69

THE SENATE

Wednesday, November 7, 1973

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Hon. Paul Martin tabled:

Report on operations under the Regional Development Incentives Act for the month of September 1973, pursuant to section 16 of the said act, chapter R-3, R.S.C., 1970.

CRIMINAL CODE (CAPITAL PUNISHMENT)

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE CONTINUED

The Senate resumed from yesterday the adjourned debate on the motion of Senator McIlraith for second reading of Bill C-2, to amend the Criminal Code.

Hon. Hartland de M. Molson: Honourable senators, when we speak of capital punishment we automatically think of hanging. I must say at the outset that I hate the idea of anyone being hanged. The use of the rope for purposes of execution is unquestionably out of place in our society. It is a survival from the days of barbarism and it is the last brutal remnant of hanging, drawing and quartering evolved in the dark ages to provide both a warning and a public spectacle for the people. I should like to see hanging abolished, once and for all.

I am not taking part in this debate, however, for that reason. I am speaking because I will, like all my colleagues in this chamber, vote according to my convictions and my conscience; and I believe I owe it to you, and in fulfilment of my public responsibilities, to explain the reason for the way in which I will vote.

Capital punishment has been the subject of debate for years, and since 1966 has been constantly before legislators in this country. It has brought forward some of the greatest arguments; it has been the basis of some of the finest speeches, and it has been the generator of some of the widest, if not the most diametrically opposed, interpretations of facts and statistics that we have ever seen.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Right.

Hon. Mr. Molson: In this debate, reality has largely disappeared and emotion has taken its place. Some of the agonizing questions frequently introduced into the debate are such as: Is the death sentence a deterrent or is it not? Is crime on the increase or is murder on the increase? Are these figures absolute or are they in ratio? Is murder as prevalent in jurisdictions where the death penalty exists? Is there any relationship between other violent crime and murder? Is execution murder by the state? Does the death penalty degrade all those in any way involved? Should there be any distinction in the crime because the victim is in a special category, such as police or prison personnel? Should a convicted murderer ever be paroled and, if so, when?

These and dozens of other queries and theories have been raised, and I must say raised with great sincerity, by people trying to reinforce their own convictions. In the course of argument we have, I believe, seen very little hypocrisy but we have seen some extraordinarily fallacious conclusions drawn. Again questionable statements are pronounced as established fact such as:

> The artificial distinction between the guilty and the innocent must be abolished from the law books: it has long outlived its usefulness.

This simply sets my head spinning. In the context from which this came we also find the following:

> In discarding the old view of guilt and punishment, it would also be as well to discard once and for all the idea that the law should enforce public morality.

My own idea of public morality would be that it indicates standards of behaviour acceptable to the majority of the public, and that for the purpose of peace, order and good government enforcement is in some cases desirable. This is going rather far afield, but I mention it because these thoughts were used in support of the case for abolition. Another example of woolly thinking explains that there really were not nearly as many murders as we thought, because there are so few convictions. Here again let me quote:

> Of the 1,157 cases reported to the police during this period (1966-69) only 176 resulted in a conviction for murder (9 capital and 167 non-capital), but this is only 15 per cent. It would appear that the great majority of cases of so-called murder reported to the police were not murder at all, and to include them in murder statistics only causes confusion.

In other words, if a person is found dead from a bullet or stab wound and no conviction can be obtained, it is not murder. It should not be included in murder statistics; it should be included under some other heading. I wonder what the other heading should be, voodoo? Unable to continue? Functional failure? I suggest to you that the small number of convictions proves far more the difficulty of proof of murder beyond the shadow of a doubt, and the very great skill of the legal profession.

It is emotional exaggeration such as some of these expressions which I believe clouds clear thinking. A widely circulated statement is to the effect that most murders in Canada result from sudden aberrations as a consequence of marital or extramarital jealousies, quarrels and misunderstandings and are frequently committed under the influence of drugs or alcohol. Canadian statistics are quite clear on this, and last evening Senator Perrault mentioned this. But it depends on where you live. In my own city in the first ten months of 1973 we have had 35 voluntary homicides or murders.

An Hon. Senator: Thirty-eight.

Hon. Mr. Molson: Thirty-eight, thank you. Thirty-three of these are assessed as plain gang killings for revenge or intimidation. That is 94 per cent. This is a completely different type of crime from the "crime de passion."

Attention has been drawn to the statement by that great parliamentarian, Edmund Burke, that he did not feel bound to respond to the majority wishes of his constituents. Things have changed in 200 years. Today the public is informed in detail and instantaneously about all serious issues, and at times adopts positions ahead of its representatives.

● (1410)

As we are not elected, we are not in quite the same position as Burke, but we must be expected to give full weight to our understanding of what the majority of the people of Canada want and expect. I have been led to believe that between 60 per cent and 85 per cent, or let us say a clear majority, firmly believe that capital punishment should be retained for not only murder of police and prison personnel but for premeditated, organized, gangland and other brutal, cold-blooded killings.

It would be purposeless and, I believe, quite unnecessary for me to cover the ground which has been so fully the object of pleading and discussion over all the years in many debates, articles and speeches. The speeches so far in this chamber have been most impressive and do credit to the deep concern of all, even though I do not agree with some of the views expressed.

I would like to point out one extremely important fact. It is that not nearly enough attention, if any, has been devoted to the imperative need to find a means of painless execution, perhaps by injection of a drug, if there is to be a death penalty. It is possible that on this question the most active abolitionists have been avoiding any mention of a more merciful approach to execution, because it might strengthen the case of those who favour any form of retention.

I would like to ask a question. A prison is a pretty mean place, where normal habits, thoughts, urges, appetites and, in fact, life are all under constant restraint. After many years the individual is destroyed. Many people now favouring abolition suggest that to protect society sentences must last 20, 25 or 30 years, or the natural life. If you were faced with that prospect, the prospect of no way out ever, ever, are you so sure that you would find death, particularly if it could be quick and painless, so poor an alternative? Is the destruction of character more merciful than the destruction of the body? I am not sure which I would choose, but there have been many suicides for less reason.

This brings me back to the beginning of my remarks and my purpose is to make my position clear. I shall put it as briefly as I possibly can. I believe that the death penalty is a deterrent. It is said that it cannot be proved. Can it be argued that imprisonment has been proved to be a deterrent to the commission of armed hold-up, rape, robbery and other crimes? Statistics have been published showing an increase in the number of murders in Canada of 50 per cent in five years and of 61 per cent in the United States. It has been shown that other crimes have increased at a much greater rate. Should we then abolish the prisons also? However, in my opinion, a merciful alternative for hanging should now be developed immediately until abolition of the death penalty becomes law. I think it is right to provide any protection possible for officers enforcing the law and controlling those convicted of crimes, but the death penalty should also be provided for the planned, deliberate professional killing commonly used in gangland operations.

Until human nature changes so that only good is done by one individual to another, or until an erring human being can be kept without restraint on the straight and narrow path, it will be necessary to have some form of punishment for acts against the public interest.

It is my belief that one of the reasons there is today so much crime and so much unwillingness to conform to reasonable standards of existence is that society has accepted the cult of permissiveness, perhaps more marked in some countries than in others. Canada has gone extremely far in this direction, with the result that we have suffered from a rapid increase in all forms of disagreement with society, as, for example, crime. If you remove capital punishment, the most onerous punishment of all, you downgrade all punishment. If that is followed, as in this country, by life imprisonment being cut to eight years, and if the effect is further reduced by granting early parole for all offences, and if you then give bail to people suspected of the worst crimes, such as dope-pushing, you have a degree of permissiveness which is nothing short of an invitation to live beyond the law.

I do not believe that I am at all alone in this point of view. I believe that Canadians feel this strongly today and that it is one area in which the government has not been acting in accordance with the will of the majority of the people. Unquestionably rehabilitation is far more desirable and more important than punishment, but, in changing to a course such as the one we have embarked on, great care must be taken to see that it works. There must be a pragmatic approach. In this case the government has gone far in advance of any actual experience and knowledge, just as it did with those astounding changes to our immigration laws which have caused so much grief. Another illustration is the confusion which has occurred in the expensive snafu in unemployment insurance.

Coming back to the bill, I have to say that I cannot support it. I believe the bill is hypocritical. If we believe in abolition of the death penalty, there is no reason why we should vote for the death penalty for killing certain categories of people.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Molson: If we believe in retention of the death penalty, then we are getting it only in so far as it covers the relatively rare murder of police and prison officers. In both cases there is not just compromise; there is pretense that the bill meets either standard. What is worse is that we are being asked to pass this bill, providing for the death penalty in the murder of police and prison officers, when we know now, today, that not one single such sentence will be carried out.

Members of the Cabinet—that is, members of the Government of Canada—have brought in a bill which contains this provision as part of the law, knowing full well that in every case, regardless of whether there is any reason or any appeal for clemency, they will commute the sentence.

It was quite unthinkable to thousands of Canadians that any excuse for clemency could have been found for commuting the sentence in certain really vicious killings, such as the one of the wounded policeman lying on the ground who was shot twice more by Marcotte, alias Santa Claus.

I would like to think that in considering this bill in committee, or on third reading, some effort will be made to reduce the infallibility of such Cabinet action. It may well require an amendment in order to accomplish this purpose, and I reserve my right in this regard.

So I say, honourable senators, that in its present form I cannot vote for the bill for the reasons I have indicated. Should there be any effort to change it so that there will be no commutation by the Cabinet unless there has been a recommendation for mercy, I would then reconsider my position. In the meantime, I must vote against it.

Hon. Mr. Lamontagne: I wonder if the honourable senator would go so far as to include in the present bill the abolition of the royal prerogative in this matter?

• (1420)

Hon. Mr. Molson: The royal prerogative, I have been led to believe, is a different subject. It deals more peculiarly with pardon, either complete or partial. Provision for commutation by the Cabinet is contained within this bill, and in that respect is more susceptible to any action which we choose to take than is the much larger question of the royal prerogative.

Hon. Ernest C. Manning: Honourable senators, as has been stated by previous speakers in this debate, the major point at issue in the legislation before us is whether the partial ban on capital punishment should be extended for another five years. Unfortunately, the policy position of the present government on this question of capital punishment makes any discussion of this issue largely an academic exercise.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: That is right.

Hon. Mr. Manning: During the past five years Parliament's expressed intention regarding capital punishment for murderers of police officers and prison guards has been consistently ignored. The five-year partial ban was supposed to be an experimental period. If this was the intention of Parliament, it has been frustrated to a very large degree by the government's failure to carry out that intention.

I am afraid there is no reason to believe, as Senator Molson indicated a few moments ago, that the situation will be any different whether this present bill is passed or not. For this reason I suggest that all the protracted debate as to whether we should or should not execute murderers has been little more than an academic discussion.

The government deserves to be severely censored for the manner in which it has flouted the expressed will of Parliament and even the stronger expressions by the Canadian people on this important issue. I concur with the position of the substantial majority of the Canadian people, and I want to go on record as being emphatically opposed to even the partial abolition of the death penalty in cases of wilful murder.

[Hon. Mr. Molson.]

I appreciate that few minds are going to be changed by the repetition of arguments which have often been advanced, but I agree that those who conscientiously believe capital punishment should be retained have a responsibility to the public and to Parliament to state their reasons. My first and foremost reason is a firm conviction that respect for the sanctity of life is absolutely essential to the preservation of an acceptable form of society. That sanctity cannot be preserved by a society which permits its members to wilfully take the lives of others with impunity.

To attach to conviction for wilful murder a penalty of imprisonment which, under modern parole practices, which have made a farce of life sentences, turns out to be no more severe than that imposed for kidnapping or hijacking, or major theft or embezzlement, certainly places no premium on the sanctity of life.

The edicts: "Thou shalt not kill" and "Whoso sheddeth man's blood, by man shall his blood be shed" were not of human origin. Rather they were affirmations by the Creator of life of the sanctity that attaches to such life. I repeat, essential respect for the sanctity of life cannot be preserved by a society that permits life to be taken with impunity.

I reject as wholly fallacious the popular assertion by abolitionists that the execution of a guilty murderer is an act of vengeance or revenge on the part of society. It is not an act of revenge. It is an act of justice. There is no place in the administration of justice for revenge; but an integral part of justice, if it is to mean anything, is that every act of wrongdoing carries a penalty.

The fallacious modern concept that wrongdoing should result in neither a sense of guilt nor a penalty is one of the major factors contributing to the ever-increasing lawlessness of our times. The popular tendency today is to portray the guilty criminal as an unfortunate victim of circumstances and always to seek to place the blame for his action on something or someone else. There seems to be little concern for the murderer's innocent victim, or for the loved ones left to mourn his loss, but there is a great deal of misplaced sympathy for the murderer, and a strange unwillingness to attach blame for his action and impose a just penalty.

It is not uncommon to hear people say that the concept embodied in the ancient Mosaic Law of an eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth is a relic of primitive times, and smacks of vengeance rather than of justice. It is nothing of the kind. What the Mosaic Law, on which so much of our system of jurisprudence is based, provided was a restraint on the administration of justice, to prevent the penalty imposed from exceeding that which was just and becoming vengeance. For an eye no greater penalty could be exacted than an eye; for a tooth, no greater penalty than a tooth. By the same principle, a life for a life.

May I make a few brief comments on the matter of deterrence. We seem to live in an age of many strange inconsistencies. Why do we have traffic policemen give tickets to motorists for speeding or reckless driving and impose fines for those offences? Is that vengeance? Or is it merely a way of collecting revenue? Or is not the whole concept behind it to act as a deterrent to others? Why do we impose a fine or a jail term for income tax fraud or evasion? Is that vengeance on the part of the state? Is that simply a way to collect a little more revenue? Or is not the whole concept—and I submit a sound concept—that it is done because it is recognized that it serves as a deterrent to others? Is it not strange that it is only in this one field of capital punishment that the imposition of the penalty becomes no longer a deterrent? I admit there is no way of measuring accurately the deterrent effect of capital punishment but all logic is on the side of assuming that it does have a deterrent effect and that that effect is potent.

● (1430)

I would like to conclude these remarks with a few general observations. It seems to me that there is no valid reason for restricting capital punishment to murders of police officers and prison guards. Certainly these men are engaged in a dangerous occupation on behalf of society, and I am in favour of giving them the maximum measure of protection. But certainly there are many other instances in which there is equally as much justification to impose capital punishment as in the case of police officers and prison guards. What about hijackers who brutally murder innocent passengers or the crew of an airplane? What about kidnappers who brutally murder innocent hostages? Are the lives of these people less valuable than the lives of men who voluntarily choose a hazardous occupation? The restricting of capital punishment to the murderers of police officers and prison guards has no validity in logic.

I would like to comment briefly on the method of execution. This was dealt with effectively by Senator Molson and I agree with what he said. It is unfortunate that in many discussions on capital punishment, attention has been diverted to the method of execution rather than held to the specific proposition that capital punishment in some form is just and necessary. If hanging is repugnant, there are other methods of execution that could be adopted, but these two issues should not be confused.

I would like also to make an observation on the lack of consideration given by many elected representatives of the Canadian people to the wishes of those they represent. It is a well known fact—and every recent scientific opinion survey has borne this out—that a substantial majority of Canadian citizens believe that capital punishment should be retained and applied in all cases of wilful murder, unless extenuating circumstances justify the exercise of the prerogative of mercy. Elected parliamentarians frequently boast that they represent their people and are guided in their decisions by the expressed will of the people, but on the issue of capital punishment many have completely ignored and voted contrary to that which they know is the wish of the people they represent. I concede that if a man has a conscientious objection which prevents him from supporting their wishes on an issue of this kind, his electors must accept that as one of the conditions on which a man accepts public office. I do point out, however, that it is inconsistent with the attitude of elected representatives on the vast majority of issues which come before them.

Finally, on the matter of the prerogative of mercy, my submission is that the prerogative of mercy is proper, that it should be retained and that it should be employed in any case where there is any shadow of doubt as to the guilt of the accused party. We hear fears expressed that some innocent person might be executed. Such a possibility is so unlikely as to be almost non-existent. There are few, if any, cases of murder in which it is not possible to determine whether there is some element of doubt; and if any doubt exists the prerogative of mercy should be exercised. It should be used when there are extenuating circumstances—and there are such cases. We all recognize the very obvious case of a man who commits a murder in the heat of passion or anger, perhaps because he has seen a loved one assaulted or because something has happened which causes him temporarily to lose control over his own actions. You cannot compare such cases with the type of gangland murders, for example, that Senator Molson referred to as deliberately planned executions.

While the prerogative of mercy should be exercised in all cases where there are extenuating circumstances, it is absurd for the Government of Canada to suggest that since the partial ban on capital punishment came into effect there has not been a single case of murder in which there were not extenuating circumstances. For these reasons, as far as this particular bill is concerned, I have exactly the same feeling as was expressed by Senator Molson. The bill is hypocritical, it is a farce, because it does not come to grips with the issue in any realistic way, and because we are well aware that whether the bill passes or not it will not make one iota of difference, because the present government is not going to execute any murderers.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: That is the point. It makes no difference.

Hon. Mr. Martin: That is not correct.

Hon. Mr. Manning: If an effort is made to amend this legislation, to abolish capital punishment altogether, I will certainly oppose such amendments, for the reasons I have endeavoured to explain.

Hon. Mr. Hastings: Honourable senators, I would like to direct a brief question to Senator Manning. He outlined those cases where he would extend the prerogative of mercy. Would he extend that prerogative where the jury and the judge on the case recommended mercy?

Hon. Mr. Manning: I think the fact that the judge and jury recommended mercy would be one of the very strong considerations that the government would take into account. I do not say it would be binding but it would certainly be a measure to be taken into consideration.

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham: I know now, Senator Molson, how the "Pocket Rocket," Henri Richard, must have felt when he played his first game in a Canadiens uniform some nineteen years ago beside his illustrious big brother Maurice. While we are in a different forum this afternoon, there must be some similarity in the way the Pocket Rocket felt and the way I feel now, having to follow two very eloquent and wise men of this chamber, Senator Molson and Senator Manning, on the very important subject which is before the Canadian public today. I think this is particularly true since I do not necessarily share all of the views of these two very knowledgeable Canadians.

I want to congratulate all those who participated in this debate for the clear and straightforward manner in which they presented their views. I would particularly congratulate the sponsor of the bill, Senator McIlraith, who took considerable time—as he explained to us—in order to give a full and valid explanation of the bill.

This subject is continuously occupying the attention of many Canadians of different points of view and it is becoming increasingly obvious as we continue the debate in this chamber. The debate occupied a considerable amount of time in the other place and prompted some very eloquent testimony by participants on both sides of the house and on all sides of the question.

• (1440)

As a result of that, I want to begin today by quoting a member from the other place, the honourable member from Sarnia-Lambton, who spoke in the debate there on January 30. Mr. Cullen at that time gave voice to what I consider to be one of the most damning definitions of the death penalty in Canada. He said:

> I believe that the death penalty is an immature response to an irrational act. I believe that advocates of capital punishment for murder are looking for an easy solution. There is not one.

Like all Canadians, I wish to see this matter settled, once and for all. It has consumed a tremendous amount of time, it has generated a great deal of heat, and unfortunately the light that has come forth from the heat of this debate is not sufficient, in my opinion, to bring the matter to finality at this time. In fact, recent events have tended to halt, and, indeed, somewhat reverse, a trend which I found to be very gratifying—that is to say, the trend away from capital punishment.

There has been an upsurge in crime in general, and there have been a number of incidents of late which have caused great concern among government authorities and the Canadian public at large. In my judgment, these events have had no direct connection with the death penalty itself, but I do suggest that they have coloured the thinking of many people. They have confused the issue. They have placed the whole question again in an atmosphere of emotion, of fear, of misinterpretation and misunderstanding. Therefore, I suggest that the present climate is just not suited to a proper solution at this time.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: But do you suggest it is not a good time for any proper solution? Do you suggest that it is a good time for an improper solution?

Hon. Mr. Graham: No, sir. You will find out what I mean if you listen as I continue.

I have a great deal of admiration for the energy and the frankness of the Solicitor General. He has inherited an enormous task—the task of reforming the penal system of Canada—at a time of great social upheaval, and after much study and consideration he and his experts have concluded that the hard statistics needed to make a rational decision at this time are just not complete. He seeks, as you know, the continuation of the ban that has existed since 1967.

[Hon. Mr. Graham.]

Honourable senators, I am prepared to support that request this afternoon, because I believe it to be the best solution for this moment. At the same time, I look forward to the day when total abolition will become a fact of law in this country.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: That is a fact already.

Hon. Mr. Graham: The history of capital punishment, viewed from the annals of any country, is very depressing. It is a sickening record of man acting from prejudice and power, from fear and emotion. It is chapter after chapter of what some people have called "burnings and boilings, hangings and beheadings," and so on. These were not necessarily, as somebody pointed out last night, punishment for the great crimes of treason and murder, because a life could be taken in gruesome fashion for the theft of a loaf of bread.

While speaking in this chamber on June 21 last my friend and colleague, the senior senator from Cape Breton, Senator John M. Macdonald, had this to say about capital punishment:

> —it must be admitted that capital punishment is a degrading thing. It leaves its mark on all who are connected with it. What must be the mental strain, yes, the mental anguish, of the judge who must impose the sentence? What must be the mental strain on the jury, and on the sheriff who must see it is carried out, and on those who do the actual killing?

Senator Perrault pointed out last night that the first execution performed in Canada was that of a 16-year old girl. The first man hanged, I believe, was a negro, back in the late 1700s. Somehow I cannot help but feel that the whole pattern of the death penalty in Canada was set on that bleak day when that unfortunate man was sent to the gallows, and I cannot help believing that from that day forward the principal victims of the rope in Canada have been the poor, the deprived and what some people call "the ignorant," in the classical sense of the word.

It was John Diefenbaker, a man not inexperienced in the law, who said:

> Some quote scripture and say it is difficult for a rich man to enter the Kingdom of Heaven. A cynic would ask whether a rich man, leaving aside the Kingdom of Heaven, is not virtually secured against a meeting with the hangman on the gallows.

For a long time the victims of capital punishment in Canada have been, for the most part, those unfortunate people who could not afford the cost and the complexities of the advocacy system. I do not think that that is justice, honourable senators. Since Confederation, 697 Canadian men and 13 Canadian women have been executed. I fail completely to see how this slaughter has contributed one inch, or one iota, to our growth as a nation. One day, and I hope it will be soon, we will have to rise above revenge, and choose the path of human progress. We will have to reject what Mr. Cullen so aptly called "the easy solution."

Despite growing evidence that capital punishment is no deterrent, we continue to equivocate when it comes to the final decision, and we ask ourselves why. I have come to the conclusion that it is virtually impossible ever to consider this very sensitive topic in an atmosphere or climate that is free of social ferment, and it may well be that that ideal climate will never come to pass.

There now exists a Canadian study conducted by Dr. Ezzar A. Fattah, a criminologist from the University of Montreal. It was commissioned by the Solicitor General in 1971. Because it contains only three years of data from Statistics Canada, and one year of material compiled by Dr. Fattah himself, it is not considered sufficiently complete for a major decision at this time. Indeed, honourable senators, Dr. Fattah's results to date make the burden of proof on the retentionist heavier than it has ever been. Let me read his conclusions:

> Homicide rates are conditioned by factors other than the death penalty. They suggest that the cause of homicide cannot be found in a single factor but is a total social situation in which a special law or particular punishment can have little or no effect.

He further states:

> Nothing emerges from the study of trends in violent crimes in Canada that would support or even suggest a proposition that the suspension of capital punishment has caused an increase in the homicide rate.

To me, the evidence that capital punishment is not a deterrent is sufficient to enforce my stand as a confirmed abolitionist. This is in direct contradiction, I realize, to what Senator Molson has said, namely, that he believes it is a deterrent. Other Canadians disagree with my point of view, and I sympathize with the decisions that have to be taken by all honourable senators and all honourable members of the House of Commons who must come to grips with their own consciences, and what Senator Manning referred to as "the attitudes of their constituents," the people they represent. I shall deal with that in just a moment.

The duties of members of the House of Commons were clearly enunciated by the Solicitor General when he introduced Bill C-2 in the other place. At that time he said:

> We have been sent to this House to deliberate, to weigh the force of argument . . . If we were to accept a plebiscite on the issue of capital punishment we would open the way for plebiscites on all controversial legislation of a similar nature presented to the House.
>
> This does not mean that we do not have a duty to consult with and listen to our constituents. We do have that duty and we should take it seriously. But this means that we listen openly and honestly to their arguments, the reasons for their opinions, and if they are convincing we adopt them. It does not mean that we should be swayed by protests, volume of voice, shrillness, or mere numbers.

● (1450)

Honourable senators, I submit that the present action is, at very best, only a delaying action. But I also submit that it is justified at this particular time. At the end of this period members and senators must come to grips with the fact that—

Hon. Mr. Flynn: That is what they said five years ago.

Hon. Mr. Graham: But I am not satisfied that the statistics available in Canada are adequate at this particular time. If we are going to kill, then we have to establish beyond all shadow of a doubt that killing is justified. I hope that when the time comes to make a further decision on this matter the climate will have improved to the extent that all honourable senators and members of the other place will reject what I consider to be an outmoded concept—that is, an eye for an eye.

When Mr. Pearson, the late Prime Minister, introduced the subject in the House of Commons in 1967, he said:

> History provides the ineffectiveness of punishment alone as a cure for crime or as protection for society . . . I believe that crime should be treated, not on the gallows, or in the gas chamber, but in the slums, in the ghettos, in the clinics at the source.

That, I think, is coming to grips with the real problem—the cancerous conditions that breed crime and breed murder today. Statistics show, as I believe Senator Perrault mentioned last night, that two out of three killings evolve from what can be termed family or community situations, and I believe Senator Molson also made reference to this this afternoon. They emerge from family conflicts, from drug and liquor-induced melees, from frustration, poverty and despair. In short, murder springs from sources that can profit from the clinic of which Mr. Pearson spoke, but where the gallows can have no lasting effect.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: All crimes do.

Hon. Mr. Graham: The death penalty is no deterrent for the psychopath, the potential suicide, the crazed idealist or the man lost to degradation and despair. These account for most of our murders. So who then is deterred by the death penalty? In my judgment only those who are not likely to commit murder at any time, or under any circumstances. So it seems to me to be a rather bloody way to convert the converted.

The Solicitor General was very consistent with what the late Prime Minister Pearson had said, when he spoke on presenting Bill C-2 in the other place. I quote again, in part, from what he said:

> Each time the state-society executes a man, it admits failure—a failure of its family life, a failure of its education system, a failure of its social and economic environment, a failure of its moral and religious institutions, and, above all, a failure to cope humanely and optimistically with anti-social behaviours. An execution is an act of despair toward the value of the human person.

Mr. Allmand's words strike at the heart of the matter. And I ask in all sincerity, is it fear for ourselves, fear for those we love, that prompts us to want to eliminate the murderer completely? Or is it, perhaps, also because the presence of the murderer is a constant reminder of our failure, because we are somehow tainted with his guilt? And I ask you: Is our rage totally directed at the offender or is it partly directed at ourselves because we, with all the essential tools we have at our disposal, have failed to shape a truly civilized society?

Back in March, 1966, when the Joint Committee of the Senate and House of Commons presented their proposal for abolition, Mr. Ian Wahn was in the forefront of those supporting the bill and he presented his ideas. In doing so he said:

> Canada has developed a wealthy, complex and relatively mature society. I believe we can afford a multitude of institutions to deal in an appropriate manner with the great variety of offenders inevitable in a complex society.

I, too, believe that we have the capacity to provide a law enforcement system, a rehabilitation structure and a social climate which will allay the fears of our citizens and remove this nation, once and for all, from the business of killing.

Honourable senators, this debate has gone on for some time. It has been going on in extreme fashion in this country for the past 15 years. Perhaps it has gone on far too long today as far as I am concerned, because I have added to the mountain of words and phrases. But I make no apology, because I have the highest regard for the sanctity of life, and it is my sincere hope that the present extension will be the last patchwork solution to this particular problem.

I understand and appreciate the concern of many Canadians and many senators. Agreement can only be expected if during this five-year period of extension we turn our efforts to those measures which will dissipate the aura of fear and confusion which now exists among Canadians. We must be assured that there are workable alternatives. We must be convinced that penalties will be adequate, and that parole is not something which is taken for granted. We must know that there is a sufficient number of trained, qualified individuals to work at all levels, and here I am talking about crime prevention, detection, security and rehabilitation. We must be satisfied that our institutions for criminals are secure, that they are adequate and that they are also humane.

The Solicitor General has continued and expanded our existing program of penal reform, and it is important that all Canadians realize that the program must reach into all facets and all areas of society. It must be appreciated that this program has to be conducted at a time when society is being shattered and bruised by changes that are altering the whole of society. What is essential is not just a thorough overhaul of the penal system, but an all-out attack on the social conditions which give rise to violence and murder. And this attack must be made in what Mr. Pearson called "the clinics at the source". Mr. Cullen pointed out that it is futile to seek fast, easy solutions because there are none. We must set about the task of accepting and implementing the difficult solutions—solutions that will make the death penalty anachronistic and which will bring this great country to greater maturity.

I want to close, honourable senators, by talking about what is required in this Parliament of Canada, and I suggest that the first requirement is leadership. Here perhaps I should make reference to what Senator Manning talked about in terms of his concept of the role of the parliamentarian. The concept of parliamentary government, in my judgment, is based on the selection of wise men, with the understanding that they will legislate for the general welfare. In legislating for the general welfare, as Edmund Burke would say, the representative "must serve the constituency's interests, but not its will." In other words, we must act as representatives and not merely as delegates.

[Hon. Mr. Graham.]

• (1500)

I do not dispute that today a significant proportion of the Canadian people are demanding the retention of capital punishment. It is our job as leaders to address ourselves to the problem in such a way that in fact the best interests of the people will be served. Due to the very fact that the death penalty has ill served us, in my judgment, in the past and that its victims must certainly be the poor and the deprived, and because I am convinced that no definite case has been presented to demonstrate the deterrent effect of capital punishment, I urge you, honourable senators, to support the legislation before this house. In asking you to show leadership in supporting this bill I am also asking that we find a way to ease the public mind and to bring out the real facts surrounding this problem. To do otherwise would be to fail in our responsibilities to the people of this country.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: May I ask a question of Senator Graham? I understood from his speech that he is for the total abolition of capital punishment. If, therefore, a suitable amendment were proposed in the Senate to provide for total abolition, would he vote for it?

Hon. Mr. Graham: It would depend upon the amendment, senator.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: If it were to abolish the death penalty, would you vote for it? I do not want you to circumvent the question.

Hon. Mr. Graham: From my study of all the facts and statistics that are available to us in Canada today, I have regretfully come to the conclusion that we do not have the cold, hard facts necessary at this time to bring the matter to finality.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: That is not what you said before.

Hon. Mr. Graham: That is exactly what I said before.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: You are contradicting yourself, and speaking out of both sides of your mouth.

Hon. Mr. Graham: I beg the indulgence of honourable senators. If the honourable senator will read my remarks, I am sure he will find that what I have just said is consistent with my remarks.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: It is inconsistent in every way.

Hon. David A. Croll: Honourable senators, let me just say that I am consistent, but I am disappointed in this bill. I had hoped that the death penalty would have withered away before now, and in that respect I am as disappointed as the Leader of the Government—

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Well, he has not spoken yet.

Hon. Mr. Croll: —the leader of the Conservative Party, the leader of the New Democratic Party, and the only living former Prime Minister of Canada, all of whom voted for this bill in its present form in the other place.

I have had a long association with this particular problem. I remember when I was a young man that it was common to have debates at the university on the death penalty. When I was a member of the other place I took the opportunity on many occasions to discuss the death penalty when the matter came up for discussion. After being appointed to the Senate, I introduced Bill S-6, to abolish capital punishment, in January, 1960, and was asked to allow it to stand while the matter was dealt with in the other place.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: They were doing that in the other place also.

Hon. Mr. Croll: Yes. I told you I was consistent, did I not?

Hon. Mr. Flynn: But they are consistent there also.

Hon. Mr. Croll: In December of 1967 I introduced in this house the legislation which lapsed in December, 1972. We had a great debate in this house, with 20 speakers taking part. When my friend, Senator Manning, says it is an academic exercise, I would add that it has value. It is of value for members of the upper house of Parliament to open their minds and their hearts, and to speak to the people of Canada. It does not make really a great deal of difference whether you are on one side or the other, as long as you express your views. That is the purpose of having this very wide discussion.

So I rise today, as you know, to support this bill, as I did its predecessor, because it goes a long way toward abolishing capital punishment. I am prepared to accept half of loaf when I realize that the whole loaf is not within reach at the present time. Somehow or other the speakers have spoken of the government as having presented this bill. This is not a government bill.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: It is.

Hon. Mr. Croll: Of course, it is not a government bill.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: It is.

Hon. Mr. Croll: This bill was presented by the government under a free vote.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Croll: It was a free vote, and if you refer to the record you will find your friends on all sides.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: But it is a government bill despite the fact that there was a free vote. The initiative was taken by the government.

Hon. Mr. Croll: That is because it was the method that was decided on.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: You go around the point. It is a government bill.

Hon. Mr. Croll: There were no whips on.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Whips? You will see them at work in no time.

Hon. Mr. Croll: I can tell you yours will not be very effective.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: No, but it is a free vote on our side. That is the difference.

Hon. Mr. Croll: The last time the legislation was before this house it was a free vote, as you will remember.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Croll: I have been an unrelenting abolitionist for a long time. I am a total abolitionist. I do not believe that anyone, not even the state, has a right to take a life, and this bill will simply restore the law to what it was before the date I mentioned. Capital punishment will thus be retained, at least in theory, for the murder of policemen and prison guards. I have always objected to that, and considered such an exemption to be meaningless. It lacks logic and it lacks reason.

I repeat statements I have made on other occasions. There is a strong opinion in this country in favour of restoring capital punishment, which is chiefly influenced by the cry of crime in the streets, which is an American tragedy, and the suspicion that the suspension of the death penalty has led to a greater increase in murder. The public is wrong on both counts. There is statistical and other evidence of that beyond question. This is the best bill that we can expect from the House of Commons at this time, and the law will be with us for at least the next five years. I very much doubt if anyone will swing in this country during that period.

• (1510)

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Nobody has in the past ten years.

Hon. Mr. Croll: Then that is a fair guess. Honourable senators will recall that the Solicitor General did his best to go well beyond the present bill. He stuck his neck out a very long way, and got himself into some difficulty.

Hon. Mr. Molson: He got himself stretched.

Hon. Mr. Croll: Honourable senators who followed the debate in the other house realize that the speeches rose to great heights. There were some great speeches, because they were dealing with human life. Members realized that they could not restore that which was destroyed. The question was whether they should destroy the one who did the destroying. They came to the conclusion that this was the best possible compromise in the circumstances.

We must keep in mind that they felt they had a mandate from the people. The matter had been discussed even during the election. In the light of that fact, that is the way they voted, and we must respect that situation at this time.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: May I be clear on that point? Does the honourable senator suggest that because the vote in the House of Commons represented the will of the people, the Senate cannot vote against the bill?

Hon. Mr. Croll: No. I merely indicated that it had some bearing on the vote. The subject was discussed during the election. The members of Parliament listened to their constituents, and on their return to Parliament they voted in favour of the measure. They knew what the measure meant before they voted on it.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: There was a very slight difference in the vote.

Hon. Mr. Croll: The majority voted in favour of it.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Do you mean the people, or members of the house?

Hon. Mr. Croll: Under our representative system, I am satisfied that we should accept the decision of the other house, which came after prolonged and careful concern. It was an intelligent and sometimes agonizing debate. To my mind, we should let the matter rest quickly, but not permanently, for the next few years. If we return the bill to the Commons—

Hon. Mr. Flynn: We do not have to. We can just vote against it.

Hon. Mr. Croll: —the whole tedious process might well start over again, and with what results I do not know. I do not think we should prolong the agony, or, if you like, the ecstasy, by referring this bill to committee. We should deal with it in Committee of the Whole once we obtain, if we do obtain, second reading.

I am certain that no honourable senator is unaware of all the pros and cons. We should pass the bill as quickly as possible. The government, by practice, indicates that capital punishment is an unnecessary evil, something which degrades and dehumanizes all who participate in the process. It is my hope that when we are again required to deal with the measure the government of the day will lay on the whips, take the responsibility, and once and for all abolish capital punishment.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: May I ask the honourable senator a question? If we were to vote against the measure, what practical difference would it make? If we rejected the legislation, what practical difference would it make to the situation in Canada?

Hon. Mr. Croll: Are you asking what would be the situation if we defeat this bill?

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Croll: I would presume we would remain where we are now.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: What practical difference would it make?

Hon. Mr. Croll: It would perhaps make it very untidy.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: No worse than it is now.

[Translation]

Hon. Maurice Lamontagne: Honourable senators, I did not intend to take part in this debate but, after listening to the speeches this afternoon, I came to the conclusion that perhaps at this time, in a friendly atmosphere such as that developed by the Leader of the Opposition, I might make a contribution to the problem we are dealing with and which is, I think, so important that we must consider this matter not only in terms of and in the context of the bill now before us but above all in the context of the question I put to Senator Molson this afternoon. As a matter of fact, there is another aspect of the present discussion, the royal prerogative, that many people, in the House of Commons and in this chamber, have ignored, knowingly or not. I think that this is really an essential aspect of this debate.

I heard a moment ago Senator Manning say that the government or the ministry did not accept the people's will, and would not accept either to reflect Parliament's view in this area. I think that this shows—I would not say an unawareness but at least a failure to recognize the real nature of the royal prerogative as I interpret it. In my opinion, the real nature of this prerogative is to put the Cabinet above the law by giving their views to Her Majesty through the Governor General. This is what royal prerogative means. Then, as long as we do not decide either to abolish this power or to restrict its application, we are putting a group of men, the ministers, in a position of judges, in a position where they must assess every case to the best of their knowledge and belief, despite all opinions expressed throughout the country or in Parliament.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Complete abolition would simplify the problem.

Hon. Mr. Lamontagne: I will get back to that. But, in the present system we have to admit that those are the constitutional arrangements which exist. It is very easy for those in favour of capital punishment to tell the ministers: You will exercise your responsibility in a certain way, or you will refuse to exercise it. This is very easy to say when you are not sitting at the Cabinet table. I know some of my colleagues who have been sitting around this table as well as the Honourable Leader of the Opposition; I do not know whether he was there long enough to see how things happen in the Cabinet—but, I am convinced that if such was the case he will admit that the exercise of this prerogative is one of the most serious problems with which a group of ministers is faced. I do not think I am disclosing Cabinet secrets when I say that when the agenda of a Cabinet meeting is brought to the attention of the ministers with capital punishment as the first item, many of them do not sleep much that night in search of a decision for the next day. They must reach this decision without any background or evidence about the condemned man. I think that this afternoon Senator Manning suggested that the Cabinet should have this royal prerogative and should be able to oppose legal decisions in the event of reasonable doubt. But, then what does that mean? It means that the Cabinet should meet as a true court of justice and hear the case all over again. Presently, the Cabinet has no evidence that there was any reasonable doubt in the mind of the jury, the judges, and so on. This type of information was not available to the Cabinet, at least when I was a minister of the Crown. I also know—once again, this is no Cabinet secret—that the consideration of these cases was the only opportunity, as far as my experience is concerned, for actual votes to be taken by the Cabinet. Given these circumstances, everyone must live with his own conscience; you cannot blame Cabinet ministers who have assumed this responsibility for not respecting the wishes of Parliament. Such a charge would be extremely unfair since it would amount to a misunderstanding as to the nature of the royal prerogative.

● (1520)

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I would like to interrupt the senator, not to be mean to him, but to make everything clear for the official report. As far as I know, nobody has said that the Cabinet had wrongly used its discretionary powers. However, considering that the Cabinet has used its discretionary powers for twelve years in commuting all sentences, then it is no longer a matter of using discretionary powers; it is applying a policy, which is very different.

Hon. Mr. Lamontagne: I understand this perfectly. What I want to say is that ever since 1962 there has always been a majority of ministers in the Cabinet who have been against capital punishment.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: That is correct. It is a policy, yes.

Hon. Mr. Lamontagne: That is right. Therefore, those ministers incessantly, despite the changes in government—

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Yes, I agree.

Hon. Mr. Lamontagne: —decided to the best of their knowledge and their belief that there should not be any capital punishment.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Therefore, it is a policy.

Hon. Mr. Lamontagne: Yes, I believe it is a tendency that evolves into a policy. As far as I am concerned, and I am against capital punishment, I am in favour of the retention of the royal prerogative, since it is exercised in that direction. But then I think that the retentionists have an obligation, a responsibility they have not exercised yet, the obligation to propose straightforwardly during this debate the abolition or limitation of this prerogative. We are all practical people, we know all the facts, we are all aware of the existence of that royal prerogative. The retentionists should realize, as was often said this afternoon, that the bill before us will have virtually no effect.

The 1967 legislation limited the number of cases to which capital punishment was to apply and thus it was more restrictive than the previous legislation. According to the legislation prior to 1967, all those who were found guilty of murder were condemned. There was a difference between . . .

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Capital murder.

Hon. Mr. Lamontagne: That is right. Anyway, the legislation in those days was more inclined towards capital punishment than the one that followed in 1967. In spite of that, the Cabinet of the day, and the ones that followed, refused to be restricted by such a legislation.

In that context, I believe we all agree that the bill before us now is in fact a rather futile piece of legislation.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Agreed.

Hon. Mr. Lamontagne: However, to make it truly effective, those who are in favour of the death penalty should take into more serious consideration the royal prerogative and move amendments to this legislation either to abolish it or to limit its application. It is quite easy when one is not a member of the Cabinet to say "You will have to restrict yourselves; you will have to set aside your conscience and your responsibility and you will rigidly carry on the will of Parliament as expressed in the legislation." Such a position is unacceptable.

Now, I think that those who are in favour of the death penalty must go still further if they wish to be realistic and practical and they must introduce amendments, as I have just said, either to abolish or to limit the use of royal prerogative. Otherwise we are heating the air and it would be advisable to vote on the issue today. I do not think that we can alter our respective positions on that issue. They will always be determined by individual experiences, by problems of personal awareness. I know for instance that many lawyers do advocate capital punishment. On the other hand, many sociologists, anthropologists and so on, are opposed to it. I do not think that we will manage to convince any one here into changing their minds. Except if we do something about the royal prerogative, we will have passed a bill leading in whatever direction regardless of amendments, but absolutely nothing will have been changed in the situation. We will not have set any limitations to the exercise by a group of individuals of a function now vested upon them by our constitutional arrangements.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Unless it is abolished, perhaps.

Hon. Mr. Lamontagne: Right. Otherwise—and I see the Leader of the Opposition is also in agreement with me—the tendancy observed since 1958 towards the commutation of sentences by the Cabinet will continue. As I said, it is up to those in favor of capital punishment to come up with a solution to that confusing problem. I do not think that we should set aside this responsibility and tell the Cabinet members to muffle the voices of their conscience. It is up to those advocating capital punishment to say openly: there is a genuine problem in our constitutional arrangement and we are going to try and solve it in a manner worthy of responsible, realistic and practical men. I do not think there is at present any amendment likely to solve this basic problem.

I wanted to say all this because I have been in such a predicament as a minister of the Crown and I am not the only one in this House who has had to live with it. Until we deal with that constitutional arrangement, nothing will be solved.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: May I suggest a practical solution while at the same time asking Senator Lamontagne a question?

I am most interested by the emphasis he is putting on the issue of the royal prerogative, but that is not the main problem. If, on the one side, an amendment to consider complete abolition of capital punishment were considered out of order, does he not think that an amendment dealing with the royal prerogative, which is not mentioned in this bill, would not also be considered out of order? Moreover, given these two possibilities, what would be the solution for both abolitionists and retentionists if not to vote against the bill, in order to force the government to bring forward a clear and specific measure—

● (1530)

[English]

I do not refer to an improper method, as was suggested by Senator Graham, but a proper measure that would solve the problem once and for all.

[Translation]

Hon. Mr. Lamontagne: Unlike my honourable friend, I am not an expert in procedure and I do not know whether an amendment to that effect—

Hon. Mr. Flynn: That is a presumption.

Hon. Mr. Lamontagne: —would be in order, but even if it were not, the reason I blame those who today are advocating capital punishment is that they have not sufficiently stressed, during the debate, this other problem which, in my view, is truly basic because it is a prerequisite. It is a prerequisite to the passing of legislation—

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Senator Perrault referred to that yesterday.

Hon. Mr. Lamontagne: —which the majority would agree to. We know now that we have a system requiring that in fact we ignore the expression of the will of a majority because, even if there is a consensus on that problem, in my view that in no way reduces either the scope of the royal prerogative or the obligation to exercise a very clear ministerial responsibility in that area.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: The problem is the same on both sides.

Hon. Mr. Lamontagne: Yes, but with a difference, in that those who are against capital punishment, like myself, will be satisfied with the policy developed since 1962, whereas those who are for capital punishment will not be.

I think that we should settle this question at least during this debate instead of asking ourselves whether capital punishment is required by the Gospel, or is against the Commandments, or is a factor deterring criminals from killing people.

I believe these discussions are nothing but mere verbosity, purely academic. We know too well that whatever the conclusions of this debate may be, the end result will depend on the Cabinet's composition; if there is a majority of ministers against capital punishment, then I think it is their duty to vote against.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Not at all.

Hon. Mr. Lamontagne: This is precisely where we should have a real debate on the nature, the scope and the extent of the royal prerogative. I believe it is a point which has been completely ignored during this debate—that is not completely, but partially.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: The Cabinet has no right to ignore the law because of personal convictions.

[English]

Hon. Mr. Molson: I wonder if the honourable senator would let me ask him a question. He explained the problem of the royal prerogative very clearly, but when I was looking into the question today, although I am not a lawyer like my honourable friend—

Hon. Mr. Lamontagne: I am not.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Don't insult the Bar.

Hon. Mr. Molson: I am not a lawyer, as my honourable friend is not a lawyer. I was shown the two sections of the Criminal Code, which are not far removed. One deals with the commutation of the death penalty by the Cabinet, and later on there is mention of the royal prerogative. I ask my honourable friend, after his very clear exposition of the problem, why is it assumed that the action of the Cabinet is being taken as the royal prerogative of mercy when in fact it is, under this section of the Criminal Code, one of its provisions? It seems to me, knowing nothing about the law, that the royal prerogative deals with pardons, not the commutation of one sentence to another. Why is it that the Cabinet are not acting under the section which provides for, and gives them the power of, commuting a sentence, but are instead saying that the royal prerogative forces this issue upon them? Are they not playing God a little bit?

Hon. Mr. Lamontagne: My honourable friend may be completely right on this, and I may be completely wrong. However, this was how the matter was explained to me when I had to exercise my responsibility as a minister. I may have been completely wrong, but it seems to me that this has been the tradition that has developed since 1962. If I have been wrong in my interpretation of the statute, I am not alone, and at this time I am in the company of quite a number of notable lawyers in this field.

Hon. Mr. Molson: I am not criticizing; I am asking for information.

Hon. Mr. Lamontagne: The question my honourable friend asks now further proves my point, that this matter has not been properly discussed. We are about to vote on new legislation to be in force for a period of five years. We have a debate that is very similar to the one we had five years ago. Five years ago this issue, which I have raised in a very informal and unprepared way, was ignored, and it has been partially ignored again. It seems to me that there is no urgency to pass this legislation.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: We could very well vote against it.

Hon. Mr. Lamontagne: I believe it would be worth while to look into this seriously to see what can be done. We would then be able to vote on something that would be meaningful. At the moment, we will vote, and if the abolitionists win I am sure that in the long run they will win all the way.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: This is not the question.

Hon. Mr. Lamontagne: If those who are for capital punishment win, then I am sure that as long as we have the kind of ministers we have had since 1962—you see how non-partisan I am today—

Hon. Mr. Flynn: You mean since 1962 inclusive.

Hon. Mr. Lamontagne: Inclusive.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Why not?

Hon. Mr. Lamontagne: I would even go back to 1957. I think there were very few cases in which justice followed its natural course, starting from 1957.

If we want to continue having nice academic discourses and arguments on this very fundamental problem we can go on as we have done all afternoon, and possibly yesterday.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: And next week.

Hon. Mr. Lamontagne: And in the other place. I am all in favour of this kind of philosophical argument.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: You are at your best in this field.

Hon. Mr. Lamontagne: Or biblical arguments. In any case, unless we face this basic issue I feel that we will not solve very much.

[Translation]

● (1540)

Hon. Mr. Deschatelets: Would Senator Lamontagne permit a question?

Hon. Mr. Lamontagne: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Deschatelets: I must congratulate him for his most interesting point of view but I do not think there would be much to gain by discussing here the exercise of the royal prerogative.

During a speech made earlier—I do not know who raised this point—it was suggested that there would be no need to submit this bill to a committee after second reading but I think we should refer the bill to a committee which will study it with the Solicitor General, the Minister of Justice and officials of the Department of Justice so as to shed some light on the aspect raised by Senator Lamontagne.

Do you not agree that this bill should be deferred to a committee so that we may be fully informed on the points raised?

Hon. Mr. Lamontagne: Of course, as far as I am concerned I have no objection to this legislation's being referred to a committee. In fact, I would rather not because I think that the bill before us will be passed and that the royal prerogative that I mentioned will still apply. This practice satisfied my conscience and my personal convictions. So I do not ask for any amendments to the bill. If those who do not accept the legislation as it is presented today insist that the bill be submitted to a committee, I will not object.

Hon. Mr. Deschatelets: I did not have enough time to consider seriously the point raised but I have some reservations because if this bill is passed, it becomes the law of the land and I hesitate to accept the view of Senator Lamontagne. I wonder if the Cabinet has the right to ignore systematically and consistently the law, even though members of the Cabinet could be tempted to vote according to their beliefs. Yet, I don't think the Cabinet can be above the law of the land. I did not have time yet to think about this. I should like to study it.

Hon. Mr. Desruisseaux: May I ask a supplementary question only to get some information? But first, I would like to mention that I very much enjoyed the discussion; it is new. But I wonder why the same bill did not come before us in the Senate when it was introduced five years ago.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: This possibility was considered.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: The possibility was considered.

Hon. Mr. Desruisseaux: And the decision?

Hon. Mr. Flynn: This was a new problem, for the Criminal Code had been amended less than five years before. Today, quite some time has elapsed since then.

Hon. Mr. Lamontagne: It was rather new then. The problem really cropped up in 1957, because the then prime minister was an abolitionist.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: There have been one or two.

Hon. Mr. Lamontagne: Yes, there have been one or two I think; they were really exceptions that confirmed the rule, that led in fact to the introduction of the 1967 bill.

As my honourable friend said, that issue was raised in 1967, but in a very marginal way. I think we are going today through the same experience.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Which changes the subject.

Hon. Mr. Desruisseaux: As I understand it, we do not know what reasons were given five years ago when this issue was put aside.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: It was not put aside.

Hon. Mr. Desruisseaux: Why did they vote without taking it into account?

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Because it was not recent enough, the trend was not as clear-cut a few years ago.

[English]

On motion of Senator Lang, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Thursday, November 8, 1973

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Hon. Paul Martin tabled:

Report on a national survey of nutrition in Canada entitled "Nutrition Canada National Survey", issued by the Department of National Health and Welfare, together with a summary thereof and a press release relating thereto.

Copies of auditors' statement on the net stocks for the crop year ended July 31, 1973, on which The Canadian Wheat Board is entitled to recover carrying charges.

Copies of statement on the final payments on Wheat, Oats and Barley to Western Grain Producers for the 1972-73 crop year, issued by The Canadian Wheat Board.

Supplementary Estimates (A) for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1974.

Report of the Department of Transport for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1973, pursuant to section 34 of the Department of Transport Act, chapter T-15, R.S.C., 1970.

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. Leopold Langlois: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), I move that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until Tuesday, November 13, 1973, at 8 o'clock in the evening.

Motion agreed to.

THE ESTIMATES

SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES (A) REFERRED TO NATIONAL FINANCE COMMITTEE

Hon. Leopold Langlois, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(e) moved:

That the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance be authorized to examine and report upon the expenditures set out in the supplementary estimates (A) laid before Parliament for the fiscal year ending the 31st March, 1974.

Motion agreed to.

CRIMINAL CODE (CAPITAL PUNISHMENT)

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE CONTINUED

The Senate resumed from yesterday the adjourned debate on the motion of Senator McIlraith for second reading of Bill C-2, to amend the Criminal Code.

Hon. Daniel A. Lang: Honourable senators, at the outset I should like to express my appreciation for the contributions that have been made to this debate so far by members of the Senate, and I should like particularly to thank Senator McIlraith for his explanation in introducing the bill.

As we all know, we are dealing with a subject upon which we all feel very strongly. Our feelings are held with great sincerity and we certainly do not share the same points of view. I feel that it is because of the strength of conviction with which people have views on this matter, and the sincerity of those views, that we all approach the subject with temerity and respect.

It is not my intention today to state my own convictions, nor is it my intention to reiterate the arguments for and against the principle of this bill, which we have heard from previous speakers and with which some of us are familiar from the debate which took place in 1967 when the original bill, now lapsed, was first brought before Parliament. Rather would I like today to try to clarify and define what I consider to be the basic decision we have to make when the vote is called on this bill, and perhaps at the same time to relegate to what I consider to be minor subsidiary positions some of the other peripheral issues that have been thrown into the controversy.

To start with, I am of the opinion that there is no real extrinsic evidence available to us upon which an objective judgment can be made. Statistics available to us in Canada and those which have been available to us for some time from the states of the United States and from Europe give us no handle that we can grasp. They can be used, as all statistics can, to support any previously determined position held by the advocate. That being so, then it follows that ultimately our decision is going to be based more on an act of the heart than of the head and, in fact, it cannot be other than what may rather crudely be expressed as a gut reaction to a very, very solemn problem.

Despite our differences of approach there is one thing that we all hold in common about this issue, namely, a great respect for the sanctity of human life. Whether we are concerned about the life of a potential murder victim or that of a convicted killer, we are all concerned with sanctity of human life. How can we best protect the life of a potential victim or, having failed to do so, how do we deal with the life of a murderer? Does retention protect the potential victim and, on the other hand, does abolition rather expose the potential victim to greater danger?

Again, does retention merely create, in effect, a double killing?

Honourable senators, in my humble opinion, at this stage in our history there are really no absolutes on this matter. I can conceive of murders so heinous, so reprehensible as to constitute a very challenge to our social and our moral order. Indeed, some of the mass murders recently reported in the news and committed in the United States come very close to that category. That type of crime might very well warrant capital punishment. On the other hand, I reject entirely the simplistic, archaic, concept of an eye for an eye, a tooth for a tooth and a life for a life. In my opinion that is just as repugnant as the type of crime to which I have referred. It is mediaeval in its concept and basically barbaric.

While we are thinking of these things it is wise for us to examine our attitudes on related subjects such as, particularly, abortion. Here again we are concerned with the question of the sanctity of human life. As abhorrent and simplistic as the concept of abortion on demand might be, that fact does not rule out the possibility of circumstances so compelling as to justify this unnatural procedure. Similarly, we might also examine our reaction to euthanasia, which raises again the question of the sanctity of human life and the justification for its use to end the torture of unendurable physical terminal suffering.

● (1410)

All these factors, like the issue now before us, are basically concerned with this moral problem of sanctity of life. In my opinion our social attitudes are still as unrefined and relatively primitive as they were 50 years ago, and, in the long haul, are in a most elemental stage of evolution. So much so that reasonable articulation into law, in my view, remains well in the future.

May I pass now to what I have stated to be my real intention in speaking to this debate, namely, the definition of the basic decision we take when voting. As honourable senators are aware, the bill before us extends for another five years a principle established in 1967 that capital punishment be confined to murders of police and prison guards. In other words, the bill is a retentionist bill, not an abolitionist bill. Even if there were only one policeman in the whole of the Dominion of Canada, the principle of the bill would remain the same in that the retention of capital punishment for the murderer of that one man is provided for. If I am correct in that thesis, any amendment to the bill which would remove the capital penalty against murderers of policemen or prison guards would violate the principle of the bill and, in my opinion, would be completely out of order.

Basically we have only one alternative: we can defeat the bill or pass it. In my opinion, the other issues that have been raised in this debate and elsewhere on the questions of parole, commutation of sentence, the nature of execution, are ancillary, peripheral and subsidiary and tend to do nothing more than cloud the basic issue which can be decided only by the defeat or passage of the bill.

Let us look for a moment at the consequences flowing from the defeat of this bill. Its defeat would reinstate the law in Canada as it was prior to 1967. We should be well aware of the state of the law at that time. It provided for two types of murder: capital murder carrying a death sentence, and non-capital murder carrying a term of life imprisonment. Capital murder, as defined in that law, was murder planned and deliberately carried out by the murderer of his own act and, in addition, the murder of police officers and prison guards, whether planned and deliberately carried out or not. All other murders were classified as non-capital murders and involved a sentence of life imprisonment. Those, of course, would include murders of passion and otherwise.

Really, if you look at the law as it stood prior to 1967 you will see that it reflects the thinking and attitudes of many senators who have already spoken in this debate. It seems to me that if their objectives are to be met, they can be met very well by the defeat of this bill. The law as it was at that time, in my opinion, was not unreasonable, considering the state and development of our society today.

On the other hand, we may support this bill. If we do so, we preserve the principle of capital punishment but restrict its use to an infinitesimal segment of our society.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Unjustifiably.

Hon. Mr. Lang: At this stage of our development, this bill represents the wisest course of action. It is not the last word; it does not freeze forever the state of our law.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: No bill does.

Hon. Mr. Lang: In fact, it keeps our options open for five years.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Not necessarily for five years. It could be a shorter period.

Hon. Mr. Lang: Well, for at least five years our options are open.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: No.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Sure.

Hon. Mr. Lang: I think this is a wise and prudent course. Hopefully, during this period we will be able to amass, for what it is worth, additional statistical data, and hopefully public opinion on this issue can become more firmly crystallized. Above all, I would hope that a far more sophisticated insight into the nature of murder could be developed, particularly to ascertain if there may not be murder so heinous and reprehensible as to strike at the root of our political, social and moral order and to justify capital punishment.

In my opinion, our thinking in this area is primitive, elemental, unsophisticated and incomplete. I would hope, if this bill passes, that both the government and the Law Reform Commission will diligently apply themselves to this task. There can be no higher priority for the Solicitor General's office or for the Law Reform Commission than to attempt the formulization of a basic philosophy that would be acceptable to the Canadian people and capable of articulation in law.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: That is wishful thinking.

Hon. Mr. Lang: I believe this is possible.

● (1420)

Hon. Mr. Flynn: That was said in 1967.

Hon. Mr. Lang: I would like another five years, or a shorter period. I know that our law can, with sufficient application, reconcile, on the one hand, its responsibility to protect society and the individuals comprising society with, on the other hand, its responsibility to uphold our faith in the sanctity of human life.

Hon. Mr. Argue: Before the honourable senator resumes his seat, I wonder if I might ask a question. To me the honourable senator seemed to be almost raising in advance a possible point of order on a possible amendment when he said he felt the principle of this legislation was the extension of a provision that had been tried for a period of five years, and that that provision retained capital punishment in certain areas. I am sure the honourable senator is aware that that five-year provision lapsed, and therefore this bill could not extend that provision even if it wished to. A new law has to be re-enacted. Does he not think that a basic principle of this bill is to restrict the death penalty, and that to provide by way of an amendment for removing further restriction is merely to extend that?

For his information, and for the information of other honourable senators, I may say that I have had eminent authorities check a possible amendment along this line, on the question of whether or not it is in order, and I am assured that it would be in order for the Senate to consider such an amendment on its merits. Surely the Senate does not have to tie its hands in advance.

Hon. Mr. Laird: Might I ask the honourable senator a supplementary question?

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I hope you are luckier than Senator Argue.

Hon. Mr. Laird: Why?

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Because he did not get a reply.

Hon. Mr. Laird: You have given consideration to the technical position which Senator Argue has raised. Have you given any consideration to the possibility of removing the right of the Cabinet to commute the death sentence?

Hon. Mr. Lang: As I said in my speech, I consider that a peripheral, subsidiary matter which tends merely to confuse the main issue. I can say that I have considered it. An amendment affecting that power of commutation would, in my humble, non-legal opinion, be in order, because the section in the Criminal Code dealing with commutation is amended by this bill. If it had not been dealt with in the bill I would not think it to be in order. That is my opinion.

Hon. Mr. Molson: I wonder if I might ask one question? Senator Lang said that in the definition of murder in the pre-1967 act, amongst other requirements the murder had to be by the individual's own hand. Does that mean that in this world of gangland activity, if somebody lets a contract to have another person killed, pays him money to do it, the person letting the contract could not be charged with capital murder?

Hon. Mr. Lang: The words are, as I understand it, "committed by the murderer" or "by the murderer's own hand." I cannot put my finger on the section immediately, but I would assume the case you refer to would not fall within that category. However, I am really not prepared to give an opinion.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Surely, the aspect of conspiracy comes into this question. There is a section in the Criminal Code which provides that when one conspires with another to commit an act and the other does it, they are equally guilty.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Paul Deschatelets: Honourable senators, I first wish to congratulate honourable Senator McIlraith for the accurate and detailed manner in which he introduced this bill. I also want to congratulate all those who have participated in this debate until now. They did not hesitate to speak their mind quite frankly and clearly on this most complex matter of capital punishment. Some of them had very hard words to say about the bill.

Personally, I find this excellent because it is understood that we are discussing this complex problem in complete freedom, and the purpose of this debate is to allow each one of us to state our views and to justify the stand we intend to take on this bill.

However, if one summarizes the various views expressed until now, one must admit that this bill as submitted to us is far from having the unanimous support of the honourable senators, especially those with set and even uncompromising opinions: those who say they are, by conviction, either abolitionists or retentionists and disapprove of this bill for completely different reasons.

As far as I am concerned, I must readily admit—and this may seem strange—that even today, as I am speaking, I have no definite opinion either as an abolitionist or as a retentionist. For the past few years, I have at times been inclined to be a retentionist and at other times an abolitionist, but I must confess I have never been able to stick to a definite option. So in the circumstances in spite of its imperfect format I consider this bill as a compromise for a period of five years. I intend to vote for it.

● (1430)

Now, some senators suggested in their remarks that on several occasions in public opinion polls most Canadians expressed a marked preference for the retention of capital punishment. I am not all that convinced—and here is why; I do not think that on any occasion in those surveys was the man in the street offered an alternative. If I remember correctly, the question was this: are you in favor of the abolition or retention of capital punishment? But there are other alternatives which could have altered the result of those surveys.

After discussing this bill with several friends of mine I am under the impression that what the public fears most at this time is that if capital punishment is abolished convicted murderers will be back in circulation after a few years, and this the public is not willing to accept at the present time. But if, on the other hand, in those surveys the following alternative had been offered, that if capital punishment is abolished criminals convicted of murder would not be back in circulation, if not for life at least after a period of detention long enough so that when they are released they will not represent a danger to peace and order, I feel that then many of our fellow citizens could have favoured the retention of capital punishment in those surveys.

I feel and I am convinced that if life sentences handed down by our courts meant exactly what they should, that is a long term outside the jurisdiction of the Parole Board, this could satisfy a large part of the public opinion.

Considering the swift developments of these last years and the deep changes in our society, I share the views expressed by several of my colleagues who spoke before me and said that, except in extraordinary cases covered by section 214 (1) of this bill, it may be expected that, in practice, no sentence of death will be passed in Canada from now on. I agree with this viewpoint except as regards section 214 (2) and the few cases covered by this bill, in a few categories, as I am not sure at all whether in the future, and on account of the public opinion growing more and more aggressive in this regard, in the case of policemen or prison wardens murdered while on duty, there will not be executions in such cases. Even if I had doubts in the matter, I would still be in favour of this bill because today, at this very moment, I would not be ready under any condition to propose the abolition of capital punishment in the case of policemen or penitentiary wardens killed while on duty. I am very grateful to the former Solicitor General of Canada, the Honourable Mr. McIlraith, for having dwelled on that specific case in his presentation.

With the new concepts in judicial administration, criminals will have more and more freedom in prison; they will have more recreational activities, which means a complete change of the situation, whereas about 15 years ago they were very seldom in touch with the warden. I think that should we abolish definitely capital punishment in the case of murder of prison wardens and policemen on duty, it could have now a rather important impact, at least in those two sectors of the administration of justice.

As far as I am concerned, I am a convinced retentionist towards these exceptional cases.

● (1440)

Now, honourable senators, one should not gather from what I have said that I am entirely satisfied with the general administration of justice, as a whole, because I am not. I think it is very difficult during this debate to stick to the sole issue of capital punishment, and not deal with a few other aspects of the judiciary relating to murder charges brought before our courts because capital punishment, in my opinion, is not the most important aspect in such instances; I will give a few examples later.

During the last 15 years—as I said earlier—there has been in all areas of social, governmental and other activities, a considerable progress which has reflected, of course, on the judiciary. I think that if any reproach can be made in this field, it is that we proceeded too fast with our judicial system, introducing new concepts in the areas of parole and bails in murder trials; I think all these changes, these administrative decisions, have not been explained well enough to the public at large who did not understand anything, who still does not understand what is happening in this field, for we must admit that if there is one segment of public administration that is extremely important for our citizens, it is that concerned with administering justice. People are asking themselves many questions which, in my opinion, have not yet been answered. Let me suggest a few of them. I would like to confine my remarks to the judiciary, mostly as far as I am concerned, in the province of Quebec. I am not in a position to say whether the same applies in other provinces, for instance, to the advisability of trials by jury.

I think that some day that question should be asked. I know that for a number of senators, when we deal with the setting up of a jury to hear important cases before the courts, we are dwelling on a sacrosanct issue. We imagine that it is a basic issue in our democratic concepts which perhaps go back to the Magna Carta. I merely say that owing to the rapid development in all sectors, I do not see why several questions should not be raised, while in my opinion, it is in the public interest to dust up the administrative forms which may have been used up to now, but in certain cases, such forms should be put aside to improve the administration of justice. I say so, because there have been several happenings with social implications during the past few years.

I suppose that you are aware of various quite important trials held in Quebec those past years—trials with a political connotation—and it was noted, and I am not alone to say so, that the members of a jury today, perhaps on account of that politization of their convictions, have refused and still refuse to base their judgment on the evidence in some trials.

I recall, for instance, that as a beginner about 30 years ago, two or three hours were spent in selecting the jury; we would start at 9:30 in the morning and work up to 12, when we had completed the jury.

Today, for some unknown reason, some juries are selected after two or three weeks. Each selection would constitute a trial within a trial, which bears heavily on the judicial system.

I raise this question because under the terms of the existing law—I refer here to murders not punishable by death—the defence in those instances will also have access to the formation of the jury and, as far as I can remember—I am not an historian in such matters—but I think that the concept of the accused being judged by its peers was applicable mostly in cases where the life of the accused was involved. In such a case, one can understand why the fate of a man was not left in care of a single judge, whether the man involved was sentenced to death or not. However, today, this is not a problem anymore, except in cases under section 214(1). It is understood that for other crimes not punishable by death, the sentence will be life imprisonment. In order to facilitate the administration of justice, I wonder to what extent it would be necessary today to have a jury when a man's life is no longer at stake.

As regards parole—I refer to that now because we are discussing murder cases—I have yet to hear a federal official try to justify and make the public understand that a few years ago an accused found guilty of first degree murder and condemned to death could have his sentence commuted and be allowed to get out after six or seven years. That is something that, even I who have practised law, do not understand. They have never given or even tried to give me any justification. Those are things that the public does not understand. Those are things that, for the past few years, have contributed to an almost total weakening of the administration of justice and that, in the eyes of the public, have seemed to establish tnat all is on the side of criminals.

Should you discuss this with people around you, that is the kind of arguments they raise and you will not always be in a position to justify what was done.

I want to talk of another point which applies in the case of murder and which is beyond my imagination. I refer to the new regulations regarding bail in murder cases.

Here is one which happened a year ago. The man had been arrested for a sordid type of murder. After the inquiry he had to appear before a coroner. A full confession was obtained from the man. Of course, afterwards a formal charge was laid against him. He appears in court. Following his counsel's representations, he is set free on a $25,000 bail.

● (1450)

As far as I am concerned—I may very well be of the older school in respect of court proceedings—this is something I cannot accept, unless I am given serious motives to warrant this.

There is another consideration which may have escaped everybody. It is the fact that when the accused appears in court, the judge who has in his hands a file containing a confession from the accused and a full description of his crime, accepts a $25,000 bail.

Then, the general public may very well ask what would happen in a murder case if the accused were an underprivileged or unemployed person and were asked for a $25,000 bail? This person would certainly be returned to his cell pending trial. The question the public is asking is this: Are there in Canada two kinds of justice, one for the haves and one for the have-nots?

That is why I say that, as regards the administration of justice which applies to this bill and many other administrative decisions, there has been, in my opinion, much too thick a screen between those who make the decisions and the public. I think that the public has not obtained the explanations it should have had, at least to justify the new concepts which we are now trying to apply.

I should now like to speak of mass commutations. Honourable Senator Lamontagne talked about this yesterday. I was also a member of a cabinet where this happened, in 1962-1963. I take my share of responsibility. But let us not forget that before sentences were commuted by the federal Cabinet, there was a very spectacular procedure followed by the judge, which now seems to belong to folklore. The judge was allowed to put on black gloves and a black three-cornered hat to sentence a man to be hanged, knowing very well that in the end the sentence would not be carried out and would be commuted. In retrospect, this seems like a mockery of justice. In the eyes of the public, such things weaken the administration of justice in Canada. People know that something is happening that they do not understand. In this vital area, I think it is a disservice not to better inform the public.

I am satisfied that with the introduction of this bill, this will no longer take place, except in some fifteen cases a year because I do not think that there will be more than fifteen death sentences pronounced under section 214(2). I do not think that in recent years there have been more than fifteen convictions a year for the murder of prison guards or police officers. That will be limited exclusively to those cases in the future. This is, I think, something that the passage of this bill will prove beneficial.

There is another problem I want to mention and which is directly related to this issue of capital punishment. I know this is a sensitive area. I mean the Evidence Act. That is another area where there has been a systematic refusal to amend the existing legislation for the last 100 years on the pretence that it has stood the test of time for 100 years. Of course, that Evidence Act was inherited from the United Kingdom. It has stood the test of time but I wonder whether there could not be enormous benefits to be reaped in reviewing certain provisions of the Evidence Act in relation to criminal matters as it applies today in all courts of justice in Canada.

Furthermore, I will give you an illustration which I think is a patent example, and then you will try and explain to the man in the street how this can be accepted from the standpoints of both logic and justice. Two years ago in Montreal a loathsome crime was committed in a night club. Two persons were arrested because there were points of evidence against them, not direct evidence, mere circumstancial evidence, but serious enough to bring them before the courts. During the trial the defence called for a witness who requested court protection from the judge. This was granted to him and he testified and confessed that he had committed the murder. Needless to say that the accused were acquitted and released. A few days later, a murder charge was brought against the witness who had confessed to this murder. As you know, he was not required to testify. For lack of evidence, he was released even though the file contained his statement made under court protection to the effect that he was the actual murderer. To sum up, everyone was released. Therefore, I ask how can you explain to the ordinary citizen the way justice is administered? Are you going to try and tell him that sometimes it is not in favour of criminals? This is why I say that some day we shall have to consider all the aspects of the judiciary, including the Evidence Act as applied to penal matters, and see to it that society has as much protection as the criminals.

Cases of this kind are raising disturbing questions in the people's mind. In my opinion those questions have not been answered adequately.

That being said, honourable senators, I will not go any further. So many things could be said on the whole problem, but since I am not an uncompromising abolitionist nor an intelligent retentionist—intelligent, well, you draw your own conclusions. I see today certain advantages in the lack of unanimity and in the diversity of opinions to put off for another five years a decision that will perhaps be final then. I think that those of you who are in favour of abolition for a thousand and one reasons will admit that public opinion in this respect is constantly moving forward and that perhaps in five years' time there will be a consensus of opinion in our society that will bring about a final settlement to this debate.

As I have said, it seems to me therefore that this bill is incomplete. It does not satisfy me altogether, but there are some points in it with which I agree. I will vote for this bill.

• (1500)

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Would the senator allow me a question? My honourable friend has just pointed out a trial held in Montreal during which a witness testifying under the protection of the court admitted that he was guilty, but was discharged afterwards for lack of evidence. Should I understand from the example given by my friend that in addition to suggesting that the Canada Evidence Act should be amended he would go so far as to recommend that the potential criminal could incriminate himself and that he could be compelled to testify in his own trial to incriminate himself?

Hon. Mr. Deschatelets: Today, honourable senators, you will appreciate that criminals are well informed and obviously take advantage of legal advice. In other words, as soon as a lawyer arrives in court where his client has been summoned to appear—I do not know if I should have that recorded in Hansard—he generally says: "Shut your mouth, from now on, not a word." He warns him that he does not have to give any answer to anybody.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: The policeman who arrested him has probably given him the same caution.

Hon. Mr. Deschatelets: He does, yes, probably. If you want me to, I shall answer your question with a concrete and excellent example.

A year ago—that is not so long ago—a car that had left Paris, or some other place close to Paris, with heroin, drugs, etc., concealed under the mudguards, and elsewhere, was checked in Montreal harbour, and of course a considerable amount of drugs was found in it with the help of a detector. This constituted an extremely serious case of smuggling. These people involved were arrested. Obviously, they were not required to testify. They sat in the box. The Crown had to prove that these people knew that the car had these goods concealed in it, but this could not be proved beyond any shadow of a doubt. Even the police could not prove it beyond any reasonable doubt. So, the people were released. The car was sent back to Paris. But there, things did change, because in Paris the car was seized again. INTERPOL narcotics officers made another search of the car but did not find a single ounce of the stuff, but they found enough dust to prove that drugs had been there. Having been released under our laws here, these people were sentenced to ten years in jail over there. At that point, the police had proof that there had been some heroin, etc., in that car, and they had to answer under the French evidence legislation that they could not evade. This is where I notice that our Evidence Act in penal matters benefits the criminal.

So, is it because our penal law has well served us for a hundred years that it is so sacred that we should not one of these days look into it in an effort to bring in amendments and thus force the accused in some cases to reply to certain questions? I swear to you that if this were the case most of the criminals who are dodging our laws would change their minds. This is what I think.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: In his comments, my honourable colleague has come upon a different judicial system. Maybe the solution he just gave is due to the fact that under the French judicial system the accused, immediately upon being indicted, is considered guilty and must clear himself, while here it is quite the opposite. The accused is not guilty as long as he is not found guilty. It is not a matter of evidence.

Hon. Mr. Deschatelets: Here, one must admit that unfortunately is there never a witness to the crime, except the criminal and the victim. So this places the police in a situation often quite difficult.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Must I understand that you would like to see the accused indicting himself?

Hon. Mr. Deschatelets: Not incriminate himself, but answer questions.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Even if he incrimates himself?

Hon. Mr. Deschatelets: It happens in a great many countries, but now there is an alternative, an option to be made.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Tell us about your option.

Hon. Mr. Deschatelets: Under our penal system, that is the criminal system, we must admit this: I have seen it recently and I do not want to take too much time. Let us pretend there are people who want to hold up a bank. Those people are not crazy, they are intelligent. They know how to figure it out. Police statistics show that criminals who hold up a bank have a 35 per cent chance of not being caught. It is 40 per cent rather.

If they are arrested, they have again a 35 per cent chance that the Crown will not be able to establish a clear proof against them. Therefore, they can still go free.

So, with all the changes that are taking place, a parolee caught in the act of armed robbery, if he does not succeed in being acquitted by the court, has still a 35 to 40 per cent chance of going free under the Parole Act.

That is why they say today that criminals are not afraid of the courts because they are powerless. Moreover, with all that has happened to weaken the law, they are not afraid.

The violence which exists today is not likely to help the police and the administration of justice. All I want is that we consider the possibility of reinforcing the administration of justice to prevent too many criminals from escaping.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Is it the contrary with this bill?

[English]

• (1510)

Hon. Margaret F. Norrie: Honourable senators, it has been fascinating to listen to Senator Deschatelets and Senator Lang and, indeed, to all those who have preceded me on this subject of capital punishment. I hope the little I have to say today will be appropriate. There are a great many arguments that are unanswerable at the moment, but perhaps in time, if there is a further extension of the ban on capital punishment for five years, these things will become at least partially answerable.

On December 29, 1972, the abolishment of the death penalty for all cases of murder, except the murder of persons employed for the preservation and maintenance of the public peace and persons employed in a prison, ceased to be in force. I am in favour of the adoption of this bill, which would mean the return into force for a further five-year period ending on December 31, 1977, of the amendments which were in force during the last ban which ended on December 29, 1972.

During this second period of suspension of the death penalty it is hoped that a more exhaustive study of this complex problem of crime and all its ramifications will be completed and published. The public may then be more receptive to total abolition of the death penalty. I am convinced more should be known about the background of murderers in order to ascertain what it is in our society that drove these persons to violent crime, and whether or not we can detect and correct dangerous trends such as these in our youth. Is it poverty, ill health, inadequate housing, loneliness, cruelty in our society, temporary or permanent insanity, passion, jealousy or other causes?

Have we analyzed what effect the hanging of a murderer has on the average citizen, on the relatives of the victim, on the relatives of the murderer, on the prison attendants administering the last acts of attention and solicitude, on the fellow prisoners, on the hangman, on the religious attendant?

Phyllis Haslam, Executive Director of the Elizabeth Fry Society, Toronto, says in this regard:

> It is small wonder that reports indicate that many of these people show serious signs of disturbance, if not, indeed, mental breakdown, following a hanging.

What services did we as a community fail to provide to identify the child with the distorted personality, and to give child and adult the help that was needed? Or did we say, "We can't afford it," or "We are too busy to bother"? Can we assess the damage our TV programs might do to the minds of our young people? We are hard pressed to find a local or national program which does not demonstrate murder and crime as the main theme of the story. It is a good thought and a wide open field for research.

Unfortunately, instead of accepting our share of the guilt we put all the blame on the man or woman we kill. To some people the dismal rite of hanging can foster the illusion that a problem has been solved. As a matter of fact, the opposite is true. Scores of problems have been created by this horrible, vengeful act. The death penalty lowers the whole moral tone of our society. Violence breeds violence; disregard for human life makes all life cheaper. I strongly uphold this bill as an enlightened step toward social justice. Furthermore, evidence from many countries and recent studies in Canada indicate that the death penalty is not a deterrent to murder. Those who advocate retention of the death penalty for murderers use this act as their greatest argument; that is, as a deterrent to murder.

A thorough examination of several scholarly studies published in criminology and sociology journals permits the following statement to be made: Exceptions are so rare, that one may say no sociologist or criminologist believes capital punishment to be a deterrent to murder. To state it differently, one may say that statistical evidence does not support the claim that there exists a causal relationship between the death penalty and murder rates.

There are dramatic incidents in the book Meet the Murderer, by a long-time warden of Sing Sing prison, to prove the point that a would-be murderer seldom thinks of the electric chair, or whatever, when he passionately wants to "plug a guy". It is shocking to read that the majority of police officers are murdered while investigating family disputes. Many people use the argument that a murderer who is sentenced to life imprisonment gets out on parole in a very few years, and is a danger again to society.

● (1520)

The National Parole Board exercises extreme caution in considering the parole of anyone who has been convicted of murder. One per cent of paroled murderers have been convicted of another criminal offence, not necessarily murder, after their release on parole. The instances where a paroled murderer commits the act of murder again are exceedingly rare.

Twenty years ago Karl Schuessler, in summarizing his classic study entitled The Deterrent Influence of the Death Penalty, stated that:

> —statistical findings and case studies converge to disprove the claim that the death penalty has any special deterrent value . . . The fact that men continue to argue in favour of the death penalty on deterrence grounds may only demonstrate man's ability to confuse tradition with proof, and his related ability to justify his established way of behaving.

In the 20 years that have elapsed since the writing of those words, some things apparently have not changed.

Those who quote ancient Israelite law from the Bible, justifying the death penalty for murderers, do not quite see the whole picture of the law of those times, 2,000 years ago. In condemning or supporting the actions of Jesus in his approach to social injustices, it must be remembered that He showed true Christian compassion for suffering in the world, although He could not bring in drastic reforms in those early times. That same compassion is carried forward to be used as guidelines for justice in present-day deliberations.

There is one other point which I feel is a strong argument in favour of the abolition of capital punishment in Canada. That is the argument that the element of error can creep into our judicial system, and an innocent person can be condemned to hang. Juries and judges do make mistakes, and the finality of the death penalty leaves no room for correction of them. As late as 1953, in the United Kingdom Timothy Evans was hanged for a murder he did not commit.

Last June, in a trial in Victoriaville, Quebec, Julian Roux was found innocent of the murder of Henri Denault in 1963. Roux spent nine years and three months in prison after being given a life sentence. Mr. Roux insisted he was innocent, and eventually the federal Minister of Justice ordered an appeal court to review the case. That court ordered a retrial. On retrial, Roux was found not guilty of the murder and was released from prison. A serious mistake had been corrected. But what if Roux had been hanged?

How many people scoffed at me when I suggested mistakes can be made even today? All people can commit errors, both wittingly and unwittingly, and remedy can be had if the finality of capital punishment has not yet been performed.

Dr. Anthony Storr, an English psychiatrist, has written a book, Human Aggression, in which, out of his study and clinical experience, he makes this significant statement:

> So far as we understand human nature, the ordinary person will be deterred from crime by comparatively minor penalties, whilst the psycopath will not be deterred by any threat of punishment, however savage.

I would like to conclude by quoting Winston Churchill:

> The mood and temper of the public with regard to the treatment of crime and criminals is one of the most unfailing tests of the civilization of any country. A calm dispassionate recognition of the rights of the accused, and even of the convicted criminal against the state; a constant heart-searching by all charged with the duty of punishment; a desire and an eagerness to rehabilitate . . . ; tireless efforts toward the discovery of creative and regenerative processes; unfailing faith that there is a treasure, if you can only find it, in the heart of every man. These are the symbols which . . . mark and measure the stored-up strength of a nation . . . proof of the living virtue in it.

Hon. Sidney L. Buckwold: Honourable senators, it is not my intention to speak at any length on this bill. I would just like to read into the record a part of the bill that I think has not been discussed and that, to my knowledge, has not been mentioned. I wish to draw it to your attention as a result of hearing Senator Deschatelets speak today. I refer to the question of the parole of murderers.

This new bill would effect in the law a significant change which has received relatively little publicity, either here or in the other place. I have not read about it in the newspapers, although someone may tell me it has appeared. There is a proposed change in the parole set-up from what we have had in the past, when, as you are aware, after 10 years a convicted murderer could apply for parole and have it granted. Clause 3(2) adds a new subsection (8) to section 218:

> Where a jury finds an accused guilty of murder punishable by imprisonment for life, the judge who presides at the trial shall, before discharging the jury, put to them the following question:
>
> "You have found the accused guilty of murder punishable by imprisonment for life and the law requires that I now pronounce a sentence of imprisonment for life against him. Do you wish to make any recommendation with respect to the number of years he must serve before he is eligible for release on parole? You are not required to make any recommendation but if you do, your recommendation will be considered by me when I am considering whether I should substitute for the ten year period, which the law would otherwise require the accused to serve before he is eligible for release on parole, a number of years that is not more than twenty but more than ten."

This is a fairly significant change.

Hon. Mr. Deschatelets: It is a new provision.

Hon. Mr. Buckwold: It is a new provision which I draw to the attention of honourable senators and the nation, because, as I say, it has received very little publicity. We continually have thrown back at us the argument, "They are going to release these people who have committed murder. In 10 years they will be walking the streets."

I am not suggesting this is necessarily good. Some of us who are very much involved with parole may not agree with it. From the point of view of the protection of the public, this new provision makes it more difficult to achieve parole status, which Senator Deschatelets has indicated the public are concerned about. It is now provided that it can be up to 20 years before there is parole, if on the recommendation of a judge or jury such action is taken. I draw this to the attention of honourable senators while they are considering this bill.

On motion of Senator Buckwold, for Senator Beaubien, debate adjourned.

COOPERATIVE CREDIT ASSOCIATIONS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Azellus Denis moved the second reading of Bill C-183, to amend the Cooperative Credit Associations Act.

[Translation]

He said: Honourable senators, Bill C-183, to amend the Cooperative Credit Associations Act, for which I have the honour of moving second reading, seems very complex in view of its many technicalities and administrative features. It refers to more than half a dozen other acts. It contains clauses whose length I would call excessive; one of them fills a dozen pages and when you have finished reading it, you may have forgotten its beginning and gotten lost in its many subclauses, paragraphs, subparagraphs, etc., and, moreover, this clause is an amendment added to a section which already fills nearly two pages in the present act.

However, something which I find very clear is the purpose of this bill; it concerns not only the cooperative credit associations and their members, but the entire Canadian community.

[English]

● (1530)

Honourable senators, before mentioning some amendments proposed by this bill, a few words concerning the organization of the credit union movement in Canada may be appropriate. Credit unions in Canada are organized on three levels. At the first level are the local credit unions organized on a parish, community or employment basis. These credit unions accept deposits from and make loans to their members who, for the most part, are individuals falling within the group that the local credit union is organized to serve. These local credit unions are incorporated under provincial law, and are supervised by provincial authorities.

At the second level are provincial central credit unions. These organizations act as central credit unions for the local credit unions which form their membership. The centrals accept deposits from their members and make loans to them, and also invest their excess funds in appropriate securities, such as government bonds.

Finally, at the third level we have the Canadian Cooperative Credit Society which is a federally incorporated organization having for its members a number of provincial central credit unions and some interprovincial cooperatives. The main purpose of a federal society or "association", as named in this bill, is to link together the provincial central credit unions and to provide a means whereby some federal status can be given to the cooperative credit movement at the second and third levels. This society is authorized to receive deposits from its members, to lend money to its members, and to borrow or raise money. It also has certain investment powers which this bill proposes to enlarge. This federal society is subject to the Canadian Cooperative Credit Associations Act, and so are those of its members that make themselves subject to it.

The amendments presently before us have four principal purposes. First, to broaden the eligible membership of the Canadian Cooperative Credit Society and other societies that may become incorporated at the federal level. Second, to enlarge the investment powers of cooperative credit societies to bring these powers more closely into line with the powers of other financial institutions. Third, to extend other corporate powers to enable central cooperative credit societies to better serve the needs of the cooperative credit movement. And fourth, to provide a facility for emergency loans to meet liquidity needs of central credit societies and provincial organizations formed to provide financial aid to credit unions.

[Translation]

Honourable senators, this bill provides first that a credit union may be incorporated not just by a special act of Parliament but also by letters patent, a provision which will apply to all amendments related to existing corporations.

The instrument of incorporation shall include all details concerning provisional directors, as well as the place where the "association" will conduct its business. Its name shall include the words "cooperative" and "credit", and it must not allow it to be confused with any other cooperative society.

At present, the act opens membership to other credit cooperative societies. However, concerning the membership of cooperative societies other than credit, this bill authorizes, among other things, the "association" to accept as members as many non-credit cooperative societies as it wishes, without being confined to ten, as is the case at present. The Superintendent of Insurance may also authorize acceptance of any other cooperative corporation.

This bill will also extend considerably the objects and powers of the "association." The latter may act as an agent, provide programs and services of an educational, technical, administrative, training, research and consultative nature to its members, to credit unions or other cooperative credit societies in Canada. It may provide advisory and management services to a corporation in which it has invested funds.

The "association" may establish, support or aid institutions or funds designed to benefit employees or ex-employees of the "association," grant pensions and allowances, subscribe money for charitable, or benevolent or for any public, general or useful purposes.

[Hon. Mr. Denis.]

The famous, twelve-page Clause No. 7, which I have mentioned, brings the investment powers of the "association" in line with those of finance, trust and insurance companies.

Section 16 limits at 25 per cent the transfer of any share of the capital stock to non-residents, and directors who ignore this limit are liable to a fine of up to $5,000 or to imprisonment for a term not exceeding one year or both.

Further in the legislation, in addition to a quarterly financial statement, the association shall produce, twice a year, a statement indicating changes in its investments and loans.

Another section defines more clearly the auditor's qualifications and provides for his removal before the expiration of his term of office.

If any assets of an association are not satisfactorily accounted for, the Superintendent of Insurance may take control of the assets for a given time, but if, on the contrary, the reverse takes place, meaning that the assets are inadequate, the Minister and the Superintendent may take corrective action in order to protect depositors and members of the association. The Minister may, then, either make the association's certificate subject to such limitations or conditions that he considers appropriate, or prescribe a time limit within which the association shall have to correct the situation, or direct the Superintendent to take control of the assets of the association, and as a last resort the Minister may request the winding up of the association.

Honourable senators, as you will no doubt realize, this bill not only enables the association and credit unions to expand in Canada, not only gives them increased powers, but also provides for more protection for their members.

Part V of this bill provides for still more protection since it authorizes the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation to make loans in cases of emergency, and for short periods, and the Corporation, if required, and for the same purposes, may get amounts out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund, of up to $200 million.

[English]

Honourable senators, the changes proposed in this bill were requested by representatives of the federal association and of the affiliated provincial associations. They were also discussed as a whole, in an official way, with the provincial authorities, and requested by the cooperatives and credit managers concerned.

The government is aware of the expansion and of the growing financial strength of the credit movement and of its past and future contributions to the economic development of our country. An obvious indication of its strength and of its importance is the fact that the total assets of local credit unions amounted to more than $7 billion at the end of 1972.

[Translation]

A question often raised when referring to cooperative credit associations has to do with income tax. I can therefore give some explanations. The cooperative credit associations, including credit unions as well as credit and savings unions, went tax-free up until 1972. Now, they must pay a 25 per cent income tax, and that is the normal rate for small businesses. However, if the income reaches over $50,000, the surplus is subject to the usual tax rate, that is, 49 per cent this year.

Honourable senators, I will thus summarize the purpose of the bill: easier accessibility to incorporation; development of the cooperative movement; increased powers; greater control; more adequate protection against fraud and financial setbacks.

During consideration of the bill in committee, some experts will be entirely at your disposal, to complete, elucidate and even correct the few comments which I have ventured to make.

I therefore move that this bill be read for the second time.

● (1540)

[English]

Hon. Mr. Grosart: Honourable senators, may I ask the honourable senator a question? I took it from the latter part of his remarks that it is the intention to send this very complicated bill to a committee. Is that so?

Hon. Mr. Denis: Yes.

Hon. Hazen Argue: Honourable senators, I am sure the bill before the Senate today is an exceedingly important one. It provides, as Senator Denis has explained so well, for something of a central clearing agency, a central credit agency, for the various provincial sections of the credit union movement across this country.

The credit union movement in Canada today is big business, and it is important business, and in my judgment has for many years performed a magnificent service on behalf of its members and on behalf of Canadians generally.

Credit unions are big competition to the banks, and they are good competition for the banks. One often hears it said that private business is the best agency for getting almost anything you might wish to mention accomplished. Credit unions do not fit into the category of private business, as it is usually considered, but credit unions have led the banks in many, many ways.

I happen to come from the Province of Saskatchewan, which helped pioneer the credit union movement. The credit unions in Saskatchewan, at least in some ways, are the most advanced and the most progressive credit unions in the country. The caisses populaires in the Province of Quebec have been mass credit unions, in the sense that they have had tremendous memberships. They have done a marvellous job on behalf of their local people.

I might point out to honourable senators that in the small town of Assiniboia, Saskatchewan, with a population of 3,000, there is a very large credit union. The local people often call it their bank. The credit union is by far the biggest "bank" in the town of Assiniboia, and its manager, Mr. Vic Keep, told me the other day that the assets of that credit union are approaching the $30 million mark. His loan manager, Mr. Wayne Sather, said that when the next Wheat Board payments are received they expect their farmer customers—their farmer members—to bring in as much as an extra $2 million in deposits. Local lawyers in that town say that they would not have had a thriving business if the Assiniboia credit union, over the years, had not been progressive; had not made many loans that the banks turned down.

I use the Assiniboia credit union because I know it, and what can be said about that credit union can be said about hundreds of credit unions across this country.

Twenty years ago, when the Leader of the Government in this house and I were members of the other place, we tried to encourage the banks to go into the personal loans field, because we did not think it should be a near monopoly of the finance companies, and because the finance companies were charging high rates of interest. The banks were slow. The Bank of Commerce pioneered in this field, but the banks as a group were slow, and their interest rates were high. The credit unions pioneered in the personal loan field, and many people of very modest incomes were able to go to their local credit union, or their local caisse populaire, and get a personal loan.

For many years it was impossible for a farmer of modest means to get a loan from a bank, for the purpose of a land purchase or land refinancing. It was impossible. The credit unions pioneered in this field and led the way, and provided many loans to farmers who were under threat of foreclosure, and thus saved their farms.

The banks—large and hairy-chested—say they are aggressive; they say they show the way. In fact, the credit unions showed them the way by insuring their loans. Many credit unions insure their loans up to $10,000. If a loan of up to $10,000 is obtained from a credit union, and the person borrowing the money dies, the loan is wiped out and the estate is that much richer.

Hon. Mr. Denis: It's a family bank.

Hon. Mr. Argue: It's a family bank. It's a people's bank. It's the best free enterprise bank in the country, because it is run by the membership for the community as a whole. If you have up to $2,000 on deposit or in shares in a credit union—their regulations vary, of course, but what I say is true of many—and you die, your estate is not only entitled to the deposit, or the shares, of $2,000, but is paid an additional matching amount of $2,000. These are some of the ways in which the credit unions have pioneered in this field.

I read the debate—in the other place. It did not take them long to deal with this measure. It is certainly not controversial. It was passed quickly. But might not some honourable members in the other place have spent their time profitably in pointing out the very great advances that credit unions have made? Just because something is good, and is supported in a unanimous way, is no reason for a parliamentary body to spend so little time on it as to give very little publicity to its merits. I am afraid that that is what has happened in the other place.

This measure required, in my judgment, not only support but promotion, and an explanation of the wonderful job that credit unions have done, and the tremendous service that they will render to Canada in the years ahead.

I was astounded to read that the membership of credit unions is approaching seven million. I presume there is some overlapping, and—

Hon. Mr. Denis: Seven billion.

Hon. Mr. Argue: No, I am referring to the number of members. Their total assets amount to over $7 billion. It has been a wonder to me, over the years, how the Parliament of Canada could be so unaware of the credit union movement and the cooperative movement.

● (1550)

I have seen governments, from time to time, bring in legislation that allegedly had for its purpose the fair taxation of cooperatives but which, if it had gone through, in my judgment, would have placed an unfair and onerous taxation burden on the cooperatives. The members of Parliament did not understand the cooperative movement. But once representatives of the cooperatives had meetings with members of Parliament and senators, and explained their position, then, to its credit the government brought forward the amending legislation that enabled Senator Denis to say this afternoon that the credit unions are paying their taxes, and so on, as other businesses are doing.

I am pleased to see that there seems to have been a change, and that the government is today becoming aware of the cooperative movement. I give great credit to the present Minister of Agriculture, the Honourable Eugene Whelan, who has been instrumental in having set up amongst the cooperatives, both English and French, a central committee which will advise the government from time to time about the needs and requirements of the cooperative movement. I have also read that the minister has the intention of setting up a branch in his department that will have as its particular job the understanding of the cooperative movement, and the provision of services as requested and as agreed to by cooperatives. I feel this is an example that should also be followed by the Department of Finance.

I read in the business section of this morning's Globe and Mail that the Premier of Manitoba, the Honourable Edward Schreyer, is promoting a western bank for the Prairies. I am glad he is doing that. I know him; I consider him to be a personal friend, and I feel that he will do a good job in promoting a bank in Western Canada. But he is not sure what kind of bank it will be in the final analysis. It could be a bank that will have as its main source the credit unions of the Provinces of Manitoba and Saskatchewan. I wish him success in this project.

I think the measure before us today is an important milestone, and I feel it is something that we should all welcome, because it will place the credit unions more and more on equal terms with the banks. It will assist in making them a front-street competitor of the banking system in this country, and God knows that that banking system needs a lot of competition. Since the banks have been able to charge any interest rate that comes to their minds without government control, their profits have gone up by a very large amount.

[Hon. Mr. Denis.]

The Assiniboia Credit Union, of which I spoke earlier, was making loans on long-term mortgages at 9 per cent. There was an escalation clause which allowed it to go to a maximum of 10 per cent. But the Assiniboia Credit Union has been paying to borrowers for a number of years a dividend based on the interest that was paid by the borrowers, and that dividend recently has been 15 per cent. You can work out the mathematics of this yourselves, but a person borrowing money at 9 per cent and getting a 15 per cent dividend would, in fact, be paying less than 8 per cent interest on long-term mortgages on real estate. I suggest that this is the kind of operation that this Parliament, by acting today and by its future actions, should help make available to other sections of Canada.

Honourable senators, I am proud to come from a part of this nation that has shown the way as far as credit unions are concerned. The credit unions of Saskatchewan during this year have been prepared to put some of their resources behind the credit union movement of the Province of Ontario, so that the latter could expand, meet its obligations, and generally do a better job. I think that the competition that comes from credit unions and the kind of service they give will be welcomed and supported by all senators. I am certainly pleased that this bill is before the Senate today, and to give it my enthusiastic support.

On motion of Senator Grosart, debate adjourned.

CUSTOMS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. John J. Connolly moved the second reading of Bill C-189, to amend the Customs Act.

He said: Honourable senators, Bill C-189 provides for a very short amendment to the Customs Act. Some years ago the customs department discovered it had a problem. The problem arose from the fact that goods of foreign origin were found in commerce in Canada, but they had not been processed through customs. Presumably they had been delivered at docks and ports in Canada by sea-going ships. In some areas the loss of duty is estimated to have amounted to $200,000 and in others to $120,000. I am informed by the officials that the average loss of duty per annum over a given number of years amounted to approximately $100,000.

The discovery of the problem resulted from the perusal by the department of bills of lading and reports from masters of ships, which detailed first, the goods laden in those ships at the foreign ports, and secondly, the goods presumed to have been landed at Canadian ports. Those reports showed more merchandise than was reported to have been actually landed and reported to Canadian customs, and upon which duty was paid. This short-fall of goods or these shortages, in the language of the trade and the department, are called "short-landed goods." I am sure all honourable senators understand what I am talking about. The goods appeared on the ship's inward report or bill of lading, but some of them did not appear at the Custom House at the docks or in the warehouses for assessment of duty.

Before 1960, I am informed, the customs department conducted a detailed check of every inbound ship in every port in Canada. However, I am also informed that this is now impractical for a number of reasons. One of these is the extensive use of mechanized loading and unloading facilities; a second is the growing use of containers; and a third is consequent upon the dictates of the industry that requires a very fast turn-around for ships, particularly cargo ships.

● (1600)

I asked how these shortages could occur, and was informed that they are thought to have occurred as a result of theft or pilfering, which could have taken place before the ship left its port of origin, during the passage of the ship, or after the ship docked in the Canadian port. Theft could occur from the ship itself at the dockside, or from the warehouse. The result is, in the view of the department, that there has been a good deal of smuggling of such goods into Canada.

In 1971 the department engaged in litigation in the then Exchequer Court of Canada in the case of Regina vs. the Canadian General Insurance Company and Logistec Corporation et al. The trial was before Mr. Justice Dumoulin, and his decision is to be found in (1971) Insurance Law Reports, at page 1262. The effect of this decision is that a shipping company or its agent, the master, cannot be held prima facie responsible for shortages or short-landed cargo under section 11 of the Customs Act. In the result the department decided to approach the minister with a view to overcoming the difficulty created for the department by the deficiency of the section. The amendment which we have before us now purports to correct that deficiency.

Under the amendment the shipping company and its agent, the master, become responsible for duty on goods reported for entry into Canada, with certain exceptions which are outlined in the proposed new subsection (4) of section 11 of the Customs Act, which exonerates the shipping company and the master in respect of goods that are:

(a) destroyed or lost at sea due to stress of weather or casualty on board the vessel,

(b) not laden on board the vessel at the foreign port of exportation,

(c) destroyed after landing but before being formally entered into a customs warehouse or delivered to a bonded carrier,

(d) formally entered into a customs warehouse,

(e) delivered to a bonded carrier for furtherance to destination,

(f) carried over to another port and there accounted for to customs, or

(g) exported from Canada

In any case in which any of these points can be established by the carrier, or its agent, the master, they escape responsibility for duty.

The effect of the section really shifts the onus of proof to the shipping company, or to its agent, the master. The sanction is that the shipping company or the master must prevent thefts of goods while those goods are in their possession, control, and custody.

The situation sought to be reached by this bill is that which obtains under the American law. It is, I am informed, different from the British law, under which the importer is responsible for the duty on all goods shipped in and shown on the manifest.

I may tell honourable senators that the amendment will bring the liability of the master and the shipping company into line with that of carriers by air, rail and road. The reference to the responsibility of those other three types of carriers is sections 16 and 18 of the Customs Act, which is chapter C-40 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1970.

If there is a desire on the part of any honourable senator to have this bill referred to a committee, I shall be happy indeed to move such disposition.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: Honourable senators, I wonder if I may ask Senator Connolly a question? Do I understand that the effect of the amendments in the bill before us is to make the shipping company or, specifically, the master of the ship, liable for any theft of goods from the time they are reported and come under the exemptions contained in the proposed section 11(4)? I ask that because in reading the exemptions—which are: destroyed or lost at sea, not laden, destroyed after landing but before being formally entered into a customs warehouse, formally entered into a customs warehouse, delivered to a bonded carrier, carried over to another port, or exported—it seems that there is to be a liability now on the shipping company if these goods are stolen by anyone. Is that correct?

Hon. Mr. Connolly: I believe not. The enactment of the section would shift the onus, and if the master or any other agent of the shipping company is able to establish that in fact there had been theft or pilferage of goods not in its control, the duty would not be assessed. However, as in the case of a sufferance warehouse, a bonded warehouse, or any other form of custody of that type where dutiable goods are kept, there is a very heavy onus upon the warehouseman to insure the goods against theft and pilferage. Normally, warehousemen—and, indeed, this will apply, I am told, in connection with the shipping companies and the masters—will bond themselves against these crimes, and resort would be had to the bond.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: I am aware of that. Of course, once the goods are formally entered into a customs warehouse or delivered to a bonded carrier they come under the exemptions contained in the bill, so there is no problem in that connection. It would seem to me, however, to be subverting a very essential principle of equity if the person from whom goods are stolen is now made liable for the theft, which does seem to me to be the effect of the bill from a superficial reading. I would hope, therefore, that it would be referred to committee, unless the sponsor can assure me that shipping companies have not objected.

Hon. Mr. Connolly: I cannot answer for the shipping companies. It might be desirable to have that question answered in committee. I imagine the answer will be somewhat along the lines of the reply I have given, because I believe in all cases such as this there would be a bond, such as warehousemen obtain.

On motion of Senator Grosart, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, November 13, 1973 at 8 p.m.

THE SENATE

Tuesday, November 13, 1973

The Senate met at 8 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

THE HONOURABLE PAUL MARTIN, P.C.

FELICITATIONS ON HONORARY DEGREE

Hon. Keith Laird: Honourable senators, before we commence the business of the evening, might I have permission to draw to your attention an event which happened yesterday and which I think is of importance not only to the individual concerned but to the Senate as a whole. I refer to a ceremony in Windsor at which I had the honour to be in attendance when an honorary Doctorate of Laws degree was conferred upon the Leader of the Government.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Another one?

Hon. Mr. Laird: This makes about the twenty-second honorary degree he has received, but I suggest that it is somewhat extraordinary in the sense that this one was conferred by Hanyang University, Seoul, South Korea. I venture to say that no other senator has had an honour of this kind conferred upon him. I would also mention that this honour was offered to him when he visited Seoul in 1971 but he was unable to attend the formal ceremony at that time.

Yesterday's ceremony was a modest one and was held at Senator Martin's residence, and it so happens that I was the only other senator in attendance. I am sure if you had known about it, honourable senators, you would all have been there, particularly since there was a free lunch.

Might I suggest that in view of the number of degrees of this kind already conferred upon our leader, all of them richly deserved, that we should from this time on call him Doctor.

Hon. Mr. Buckwold: How do you say "Doctor" in Korean?

Hon. Mr. Laird: He has a certificate in Korean which, of course, he reads quite well.

Hon. Mr. Walker: Could it be that the leader of the house is becoming popular by degrees?

Hon. Mr. Flynn: It would be exaggerating.

Hon. Mr. Martin: It is the only way he would be.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Hon. Paul Martin tabled:

Report of Information Canada for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1973.

Report of the Canadian Film Development Corporation, including its accounts and financial statements certified by the Auditor General, for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1973, pursuant to section 20 of the Canadian Film Development Corporation Act, chapter C-8, R.S.C., 1970.

INFORMATION CANADA

DELAY IN MAIL DELIVERY OF HANSARD—QUESTION

Hon. Mr. Molson: Honourable senators, I would like to ask the Leader of the Government, who just alluded to Information Canada, whether he thinks there is any possible way of getting them to send the mailed copies of Hansard to honourable senators so that they arrive during the same week in which they are recorded here?

Hon. Mr. Martin: I do not think there is any possibility.

Hon. Mr. Molson: That is what I was afraid of.

Hon. Mr. Martin: But I think that the delay should be corrected through other means, and I am looking into that.

DISTINGUISHED VISITORS IN SENATE GALLERY

PROVINCIAL AND TERRITORIAL REPRESENTATIVES ATTENDING SEMINAR OF COMMONWEALTH PARLIAMENTARY ASSOCIATION

Hon. Allister Grosart: Honourable senators, I have Her Honour's permission at this time to call your attention to the fact that in Her Honour's gallery at the moment are some very distinguished parliamentarians. They are representatives of the legislatures of all the Canadian provinces, and the Councils of the Yukon and the Northwest Territories. They are attending a seminar on parliamentary procedure and practice sponsored by the main federal branch of the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association. The seminar is being conducted through the week, and I am sure honourable senators would wish me on their behalf to welcome them to this look at the proceedings in the Red Chamber.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Paul Martin: Honourable senators, I am grateful to Senator Grosart for directing our attention to the presence in the gallery of so many provincial representatives. I should like to say, on behalf of the government and those on this side of the house, how honoured we are that they should be present in the Senate gallery tonight.

It is of significance that they should be welcomed to the Senate, because the Senate of Canada has a particular responsibility toward the provinces. Our visitors represent provincial legislatures operating under section 92 of the British North America Act. Each province has its own responsibility, as we have. Together we are working toward national unity in this envied country of ours.

I am informed by Senator Croll—and for this I am grateful—that it was Senator Grosart who conceived the idea of this meeting. Senator Grosart therefore deserves our special approbation. I again extend a welcome to our visitors.

[Translation]

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, first of all, I join with Senator Grosart and the Leader of the Government in warmly welcoming the representatives, not only of the provincial legislatures but also of the Quebec National Assembly, who are here to attend a seminar on parliamentary procedure.

I know that in that respect the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association plays a very useful part.

I am sure that the parliamentarians of all the legislatures, not to mention those from Quebec, understand what I am saying or can at least guess that I am extending to them a hearty welcome.

I am most happy that the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association has taken this initiative, on the recommendation of Senator Grosart, and I wish all participants a most enlightening week as well as a happy stay in Ottawa, where we will all get along very well, at least as regards the ways of fulfilling our parliamentary duties.

[English]

CRIMINAL CODE (CAPITAL PUNISHMENT)

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE CONTINUED

The Senate resumed from Thursday, November 8, the adjourned debate on the motion of Senator McIlraith for the second reading of Bill C-2, to amend the Criminal Code.

Hon. L. P. Beaubien: Honourable senators, I should like to congratulate the senators who have spoken in the debate so far. Bill C-2 is one of the more important bills with which we have had to deal in the last few years.

The bill, as it stands, is very unsatisfactory. In my opinion, it was not seriously dealt with in the other place. I should like to suggest that following second reading the bill be referred to Committee of the Whole in order that consideration can be given to examining two main points. The first is that since 1962 all those who have been convicted and sentenced to death have had their sentence commuted by Cabinet.

I do not mean to criticize the various administrations, each one of which has followed the same course of action over the years. Those who bear the awesome burden of running this country should not be forced to act as executioners. I do not think it makes sense for someone to slip a piece of paper before the Cabinet saying at the same time, "Sign this document to commute this man's sentence or he hangs tomorrow."

● (2010)

I am not versed in the law, so I do not intend to discuss in depth the sections of the Criminal Code which deal with murder. There are three sections in the Criminal Code concerning this matter. Two deal with pardon, and should not be touched. In other words, if a man is convicted of murder and just before he is to be executed some evidence comes to light which shows that he is obviously innocent, the Governor in Council must be in a position to pardon him. We cannot let an innocent man hang. Section 684 deals with commuting sentences.

Honourable senators, I think we should amend the act, and amend it in such a way that the Cabinet can commute only in a case where the judge and jury recommend or request clemency.

The next point I want to deal with—and the important one, I think—is the big question, which is simply this: Is capital punishment a deterrent? That, really, is the whole question at issue. If after examination we come to the conclusion that capital punishment is not a deterrent, no honest man or woman could possibly vote for its retention. On the other hand, if it can be proven to us that capital punishment is a deterrent, then I find it hard to imagine anyone here voting against it.

Honourable senators, there is no body in Canada that is better able to deal with this question. We have the facilities; we have the talent; and we have the time.

I gather that all criminologists, all social workers, and nearly all editors, commentators, broadcasters, scholars and educationalists say that capital punishment is not a deterrent. Nevertheless, as both Senator Molson and Senator Manning pointed out, every poll that has been taken in the last three or four years has shown that the population at large is overwhelmingly in favour of retaining capital punishment. In other words, they have stated plainly, "Keep the death penalty; it is a deterrent."

I do not pretend that I can contribute very much to that debate, but if we as a body are willing to hold public hearings and to invite people to come before us, if we are willing to receive briefs, and if we work really hard, we can at least say, "It was a very difficult task, but we did our best."

When intelligent people who are interested in criminology, and that sort of thing, talk about crime, they deal in a great many cases with tragedies such as the fire at the Bluebird Café in Montreal, when three stupid drunken young men, who had had an argument with the doorman, went and got a drum of gasoline and poured it on the stairs and set it on fire. The stairs were all-enclosed, leading from the street to the second floor, where 200 people were dancing. The fire roared up the stairs. The exits were jammed and could not be opened, so 37 people were asphyxiated, or trampled and burned to death. I am quite sure that in that case the existence or otherwise of capital punishment would not have influenced their actions.

At about that same time in Montreal a deranged handyman-cum-furnaceman in an old people's home deliberately set the furnace room on fire and burned the place down. Some poor people on the second and third storeys were burned to death. At about the same time a middle-aged man took an axe and killed his father. In another case, a son took a carving knife to his mother. I also remember a case of a person being killed when a husband found another man with his wife. A family quarrel resulted in another death, and there was a case where someone who had taken drugs started shooting people he had never seen before. In all these tragedies I am sure the death penalty would not have been a deterrent.

When a poll is conducted on this question, I believe the man in the street thinks of the hooded gangsters who go into a bank saying, "Give us your money or we will shoot." Such men are professional killers; they live by murder or the threat of murder. When we were brought up we were all taught that dishonesty does not pay. I doubt if that is as true today as it was. Many of these people live high on the hog; they are in well organized gangs; their operations are like commando raids, and they collect large amounts of money. If they have to, they shoot it out with the police.

If you talk to ordinary people on this subject you discover that they think of the nice old man running the corner store in their neighbourhood whose head was bashed in the other day by a hold-up man. This is the sort of thing they think of, not of crazy people who set fires.

● (2020)

If we have public hearings and go into this question very seriously we can come to some kind of opinion, and then we will be in a position to deal with the question and amend this bill. If we conclude that capital punishment is not a deterrent, we must amend the law in such a way as to abolish capital punishment. On the other hand, if we are convinced that it is a deterrent, I am sure that we will all want to amend the bill so that all convicted murderers should be executed.

Honourable senators, this is a problem on which a body like the Senate can perform a great service to the country. There is a tremendous division of opinion amongst all classes on this matter, and if we make an honest effort we can do something worthwhile in helping to solve the problem.

[Translation]

Hon. Léopold Langlois: Honourable senators, in taking part in this debate, my very first words will be words of congratulations to all senators who have participated in this debate so far, more particularly to Senator McIlraith as well as Senator Perrault, our new colleague from British Columbia.

Senator McIlraith has introduced the bill in a masterful way. He made us benefit to a great extent from his long parliamentary experience, considerable legal knowledge, particularly from his experience as a member of the federal Cabinet as Solicitor General of Canada.

Senator Perrault also has had remarkable parliamentary experience as a former member of the legislature of his province where he acted as leader of his party; he was also a member of the House of Commons of Canada.

At the outset of his remarks, he reminded us of the past abuse related to the implementation of capital punishment in Canada and referred to the painful case, I must say, of a girl of 17 who was hanged for petty larceny at the outset of Confederation.

I readily recognize that some abuse took place in the past not only in the implementation of capital punishment, but in the administration of justice as a whole in this country and elsewhere and, when I took part in the 1967 debate on this matter, I personally mentioned the extreme severity not so long ago, of the wording and implementation of the provisions of the Criminal Code in our country and elsewhere.

In this regard, honourable senators might recall that in 1967 I gave the example of a museum exhibit I happened to notice during a visit to the Royal Exchange in London, which showed in a remarkable way the severity of our former criminal law, while emphasizing the substantial relief brought in since then. This museum exhibit, as I said, was a "Notice of Reward" as they called it, dated June 24th 1802, that offered a reward of 100 pounds sterling—it was a lot of money at the time, needless to say—to anyone who would give the group of insurers of the Royal Exchange some information leading to the conviction of anyone guilty of arson. It dealt with the destruction of crops, for there was an epidemic of such acts at that time in England, I was told, and this notice of reward reproduced in part the words of Act 9—George I—Chapter 22, which passage reads as follows:

[English]

> —or if any Person or Persons . . . shall unlawfully and maliciously . . . set fire to any House, Barn or Outhouse, or to any Hovel, Cock, Mow, or stack of Corn, Straw, Hay or Wood . . . shall be adjudged guilty of Felony, and shall suffer Death . . . without Benefit of Clergy.

[Translation]

I was struck at first by the extreme severity of the penalty compared to the crime, but I was particularly upset by the addition to this penalty of the denial to the culprit of the last rites of the Church before being put to death.

In this regard, I wish to remind this house of the recent and very substantial changes in our criminal law, in our parole and rehabilitation methods. I shall, however, merely underline that our Criminal Code has become less stringent in the twelve years, first of all due to the 1961 amendment which established the categories of capital and non-capital murders. I refer, of course, to the amendment to section 202A of our Criminal Code. I hasten to point out, however, that care was taken in 1961 to maintain in its entirety the wording of section 656 of the same code stipulating that if the Governor in Council so ordered in the commutation decree, a person in respect of whom a sentence of death has been commuted to life imprisonment or a term of imprisonment, shall not, notwithstanding any other act or authority, be released during his life or such term, as the case may be, without the prior approval of the Governor in Council.

This first amendment to our Criminal Code in 1961 was followed by that of 1967 when Bill C-168 deleted the 1961 amendment to section 202A, substituting therefor the amendment reserving the application of the death penalty for the capital murder of a police officer and other peace officers acting in the discharge of their duties.

While Bill C-168 of 1967 amended section 656, it maintained, however, the protection included in the original clause to the effect that a person in respect of whom a sentence of death had been commuted to imprisonment for life or a term of imprisonment, or a person upon whom a sentence of imprisonment for life had been imposed as a minimum punishment, should not be released during his life, or such term, as the case may be, without the prior approval of the Governor in Council.

In 1967, I objected in this house to the passage of Bill C-168 and I have maintained that position since then.

My position is not based on unduly emotional or humane arguments but on the sole fact that, in my opinion, society must protect itself. I would even add that if I had the assurance of that protection for society against the baneful consequences of the increasing crime rate these days, not only in this country but throughout the world, I would readily and even eagerly agree to the abolition of the death penalty.

● (2030)

Indeed, I have never been impressed by the arguments of sentimentality and alleged barbarism that have, alas, been too often put forward to demand the abolition of capital punishment. Moreover, I have no firm opinion on the alleged deterrent value of the retention of capital punishment. I also wonder how a person, unless one has been able to personally appreciate this deterrent value, could determine its effectiveness, since crime statistics, according to all experts in this field, offer no worthwhile basis.

Reverting to my main argument which is to ensure the protection of our society against crime, I submit that the time is inappropriate for us to destroy or reduce, in any way, such a protection in this age of extreme violence throughout the world. Indeed, hardly a day goes by without one reading or hearing about extreme acts of violence both in our country and abroad. Cold-blooded murders, kidnappings, hijackings and, generally speaking, air piracy, settling of accounts with firearms, acts of all kinds committed daily, do these not require us to make efforts, not in order to further mitigate law enforcement, but rather to take proper steps to ensure a stricter as well as more equitable justice? Is it not true that the experience that we had in the course of the period now known as the October crisis in my province has brought no change to the general behaviour of those who no longer accept the democratic rule of government by the majority and who keep demanding the right to come down into the street every time that an expression of the will of the people is not to their liking? The same phenomenon also occurs much too often, alas, every time a governmental or quasi-governmental body takes a stand that does not happen to please some groups, often minority groups, but always prepared to resort to violence in order to assert the views that they want to foist on others. This phenomenon is the result of the climate of violence which prevails in our country and elsewhere and, once again, I submit that this is no time to be soft, but rather to enforce a fair but firm justice.

For that matter, I had, like several other members of the Senate and of the other place, foreseen in 1967 that the legislation introduced that year, like the one before us today, was only a temporary measure and that it would be followed by increasingly more generous measures for the benefit of those who have no concern for human lives and the welfare of society as a whole.

This bill is in fact more generous than the previous one introduced in 1967 in respect of persons found guilty of murder punishable by life imprisonment; indeed, under subclause 3(2) which amends section 218 of the Criminal Code, any person upon whom a sentence of life imprisonment in respect of murder has been imposed or in respect of whom a sentence of death in respect of murder has been commuted will be eligible for parole after he has completed at least 10 years of his sentence, provided the National Parole Board, by a vote of at least two thirds of its members, decides to grant such parole.

As stated earlier, Bill C-168 in 1967 did not provide for parole under these circumstances, without a previous order from the Governor in Council.

I will surely be told that the same subclause 3(2) of this bill provides that the judge presiding over the court which sentences someone to life imprisonment will be able, in some cases, to change by order the minimum number of years for parole purposes, to a number exceeding ten years but not exceeding twenty. This same judge will also be duly authorized to ask the jury convicting a person of murder punishable by life imprisonment, whether they wish to make a recommendation as to the number of years which the accused will have to serve before becoming eligible for release on parole, adding that he will take into account any such recommendation made by the jury. It is therefore obvious from reading this clause 3 of the bill especially, that when the bill provides for life imprisonment, in the mind of the legislator there is no such sentence but rather a minimum imprisonment of ten years. I think that such an attitude on the legislator's part goes to show the irresponsibility and the absurdity of the legislation now before this house. It is also quite clear that this bill does away with capital punishment in most cases without providing society with any adequate guarantee of protection against murderers' relapses. I would even say that in doing so the legislator is destroying the authority of our courts by giving them the power to sentence a murderer to life imprisonment, even to the gallows, knowing that in most cases such a sentence will be either commuted or reduced to an often ridiculously short imprisonment term. Such inconsistency on the part of the legislator is sufficient, in my opinion, to bring ridicule to the legislation before us.

Moreover, you find such inconsistencies in the distinction made in subclauses 2(2) and 2(3) of the bill between the murder of a police officer, etc., and the murder of any other person. This distinction was obviously made to avoid any reproof from police officers and even awkward protests from them, but I do not think, in spite of the fact that we are living in an era in which protesting is fashionable, that the mere fear of such a reaction from police officers can justify such a false principle, mainly when the protection of society against criminals is at stake. It is so obvious that the only purpose was to avoid criticism from police officers, with or without protests, that the legislator failed in making this distinction to include in the category of police officers and other peace officers the ordinary citizen obliged by a police officer to help prevent the commission of a crime or who, as allowed by law, fulfills his duty as a citizen and arrests an individual to prevent the commission of a crime. In my opinion, it is obvious that if it had been sought to protect anyone, be he a police officer or not, who prevents the commission of a crime, the ordinary citizen acting as an ad hoc police officer or an ad hoc peace officer would have been included.

Still about clause 2, the last subclause of subclause 2 is far from clear. This ambiguity seems to stem from the fact that they have simply used word for word subsection (c) of former section 202A of the Criminal Code, as amended in 1961, while ignoring the changed context. I submit that this subclause 2 of clause 2 of the bill is badly drafted and may lead to confusion when it comes to knowing whether it is dealing with a criminal act involving capital punishment or life imprisonment.

• (2040)

In short, this is poor wording and I think that it should be changed.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: The wording of the whole bill is poor.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: It is to be noted that this bill does not amend in any way section 683 of the Criminal Code, which deals with pardon or royal mercy, or section 684 which deals with commutation of sentence by the Governor in Council

I am taking the position that if we had wanted to abolish capital punishment in all its barbarian aspects, we could have done so while providing society with an adequate guarantee against the murder of any citizen by retaining in an absolute manner imprisonment for life, subject to pardon or royal mercy. I am ready to accept this reservation though I think that pardon or royal mercy represent an anachronism in the present context of our criminal law and our judicial system. As a matter of fact, pardon or royal mercy is only a reminder of a time that has gone by, the passing along of several centuries, of the feudal system, when because of the total lack of a criminal code and a judicial system, monarchs, and even lords, could exercise over their subjects or serfs the power of life and death.

There is not now one single circumstance which could justify at this time the retention of such a measure enabling a remote monarch or his ministers, who often have no legal ability or knowledge of criminal law at all, to act as a Suprme Court laying aside sentences following often complex evidence and long proceedings in our trial and appeal courts, both at the provincial and federal levels.

When I listened last week to the speech of my colleague and friend Senator Lamontagne—

Hon. Mr. Flynn: That is what I thought, you were thinking of him.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: When he took part in this debate, he referred to the tremendous hesitation, not to say the aversion, expressed by Cabinet members every time a case of commutation of sentence or exercise of mercy by the Governor in Council takes place. I could remember an incident which made a definite impression on me just a few years ago. I was indeed taken into the confidence of a former solicitor general, now deceased, whose name I would not like to reveal, who told me one day about the crises of conscience he went through every time he had to consider a recommendation to his colleagues in Cabinet on the commutation of sentence of a death penalty. Although that former solicitor general was a member of the Bar, but never had a great deal of experience in the practice of criminal law, he told me that he felt a very deep reluctance to voice an opinion on death sentences handed down by our courts to the point of often losing sleep over it. That former solicitor general then told me this story that left me very skeptical as to the exercise of sentence commutation.

He told me that one day he had to make a recommendation on a death sentence in a case where the victim died after being struck on the head with an axe by his aggressor. In that case the only defence offered by the accused was that it was not a premeditated murder and there was no criminal intent or—to use the legal term—"mens rea" but simply an accident when the axe left the handle as he was only jokingly threatening the eventual victim. Of course, the jurors did not accept the explanation given by the accused and found him guilty of murder.

That solicitor general added that in his study of the case, before submitting the petition for commutation to the consideration of the Cabinet, he had the instrument of the crime brought to him and simulated in his office the motion of threat that the accused claimed had caused the death of the victim. Much to his surprise, not to say consternation, when he repeated the threatening gesture alleged by the defendant, the axe slipped off the handle and hit with violence a piece of furniture in his office. The former solicitor general was extremely upset by this incident and, after several days of hesitation and several sleepless nights, he could not help recommending the commutation of the sentence to his colleagues in the Cabinet for this reason. When I asked him if he had inquired about the place and particularly about the atmosphere of the place where the instrument of the crime had been stored before being brought to his office, he said no. I pointed out to him that it was quite possible that, when he made this experiment in his office, the axe could have slipped off the handle as a result of the fact that the instrument of the crime had been stored in a very dry place for a long period before he made this experiment in his office. Moreover, I asked him if he had investigated the atmospheric conditions in the place where that same axe had been stored before the perpetration of the alleged crime. Again he said no, adding that he did not even pay attention to these details before presenting a recommendation to his colleagues in the Cabinet, in view of his great nervousness on the eve of presenting his recommendation.

Obviously in that case, the recommendation was superficial and based on an incident that anyone fully aware of the circumstances of the crime of which the person was accused could have easily explained.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: A good lumberjack!

Hon. Mr. Langlois: I do not think it is necessary to list examples comparable with the one I gave to convince everyone that it is dangerous to leave such decision to a layman, even to a member of the profession who would not be sufficiently familiar with all the elements of a criminal act to revise the judgment of our courts of law, a judgment which was rendered after full consideration of all the facts and circumstances of the act being judged.

It must also be considered that the power to commute a sentence gives members of the Cabinet the authority, which not even the judges have, to overrule the verdict of the jury. Indeed we know that the judge of a county court cannot annul the verdict of the jury since he does not control the facts. The power to commute sentence enables some people, who have not even heard the evidence and who could not see and hear the witnesses and therefore could not verify their credibility, to make a decision contrary to the finding of the accused's peers.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: It is the same for the judges of the Court of Appeal and the Supreme Court.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: The judges of the Court of Appeal do not rely on points of fact, but on points of law, and if there is any doubt about a point of fact, they order a new trial. This is why they do it, as a matter of fact.

Some may argue against the position which I have just taken by pretending that the commutation of a sentence is a safeguard against a possible judicial error. In view of the Canadian legal system as regards criminal law, under which an accused is presumed innocent until found guilty by his peers, I believe that the possibility of a judicial error is reduced to a minimum in Canada. Even to those who argue that the possibility of such an error occurring justifies maintaining the measures concerning the pardon, or royal clemency, or the commutation of sentences, I may reply that the revision of sentences for which there may exist a doubt of judicial error is much preferable to these other measures and ensures a greater protection for our society. Of course, I mean the review of sentences by the courts themselves.

My suggestion in this regard would be to extend the present authority of the Solicitor General as concerns the reference of a sentence to the courts, namely, the Supreme Court of Canada, for review, in order to allow him, on the recommendation of the Cabinet, to refer any sentence for which there exists a doubt of judicial error to the Supreme Court for review, and to point out to this court the aspects of the trial which could give rise to such a doubt, if there is one, while giving the court the authority to order a new trial if it decides that justice may be better served by so doing. I think that this method of reviewing sentences would be greatly superior to the commutation system and would provide as good a guarantee against the eventuality of miscarriages of justice as the present system. For the sake of those who are more apprehensive than I am, I would agree that the royal prerogative of mercy, which is exercised in Canada directly by the Governor General according to the Letters Patent appointing him to this high office, could be maintained even though I consider, as I said earlier, it is presently outdated in practice.

Honourable senators, in conclusion I will say that for all those reasons I have just mentioned, I will vote against the bill; I think I must maintain the position I adopted in 1967—and which remains unchanged—until a bill is tabled which will provide sufficient protection to society against murder and relapse.

● (2050)

[English]

Hon. Paul Desruisseaux: Honourable senators, I have read or heard a great many of the arguments presented on Bill C-2 now before us, and I have been impressed by what was said in this debate by the preceding speakers, particularly Senator Molson and Senator Lamontagne. I shall explain why in a moment. However, nothing has changed my personal view. I shall not attempt to sway anyone from his own belief, but I should like to record briefly my own feelings on this subject.

Bill C-2 is a compromise bill if ever one was introduced in the Senate. It does not represent, either now or at any time in the past, the views, desires or judgment of the great majority of Canadians whom we represent. This fact was well established in surveys that were made, and it has been clearly recognized by some speakers who have supported this bill. I am sure there is no doubt in the minds of honourable senators that Canadians strongly support capital punishment. I have the highest respect for their judgment, and I find myself sharing their view.

For a period of five years we tried the amendments that had been passed abolishing capital punishment except in the case of the murder of police officers or prison personnel. That experiment in permissiveness was a total failure, according to available statistical information on its effects and consequences. There were sad cases of police officers being murdered, and the accused were sentenced to hang. I was not particularly disturbed by those death sentences, because I knew that the accused had been tried by 12 of their peers. They were sentenced by learned judges who, more than anyone else, felt the full weight of their responsibilities. The sentences were appealed, and after being reviewed in Ottawa were commuted. Those who imposed the sentences were not sadists. They had a conscience. But they also had a duty to society from which they did not back away.

Senator Lamontagne raised an important point concerning the royal prerogative, which was studied briefly five years ago in connection with a bill to amend section 214 of the Criminal Code, but which was not proceeded with. That subject has not been mentioned so far in connection with the bill now before us. Senator Molson was right in his observation that a distinction has to be made between a possible commutation of sentence after consideration by the Cabinet as required by the penal code, in the case of condemned murderers, and the royal prerogative that can be invoked under another section of the Criminal Code.

The Senate committee that will undoubtedly be required to study the bill should be made aware of all its implications. The committee should carefully examine the provisions of the bill, clarify them and bring forward recommendations.

We are now being asked, in effect, to extend this experiment for another five years. The first five years produced disastrous results. During that period we experienced a record crime rate, including murders. I cannot lightly discard that fact and place the blame on something else. I do not wish to see gangsters settle their accounts by killing, or to see paid killers, murderers, hijackers and kidnappers escape their obligations to society that cheaply. I do not wish to see bandit killers of whole families get away with it. If they value life so cheaply, then their own lives should be considered by society to be equally cheap.

During the last few months almost everything that can be said has been said, in the media and in Parliament, in support or condemnation of the abolition of capital punishment. It is my intention to avoid repeating the arguments that have already been presented on this subject, and which are so well known to honourable senators. Nevertheless, I will note again, as have previous speakers in this debate, that no one is held to party lines or party discipline with respect to this bill. The decision to allow this freedom was a wise one in the present circumstances.

● (2100)

I shall be voting against Bill C-2 and any amendments thereto that may sway us away from capital punishment, because I cannot accept the permissiveness and the philosophy on which Bill C-2 is based.

[Translation]

I cannot accept the idea that with this bill we could, as far as we can do so, provide the society we represent here with the fair and just payment that is due that society for the crime of murder committed against one of its members.

It is too bad but I rather see Bill C-2 as a way of facilitating the disintegration of the real basis of our society. Why should a murderer worry, with the real protection he is provided with in this bill? Should someone want to kill or murder somebody else in cold blood, knowingly and of his own free will, with a very definite intention in perpetrating that murder, why should he worry unduly, sure as he is of the protection provided by the amendment to section 214? Why should he dread such light punitive consequences? That murderer, that aggressor without morals knows very well that the risks of being discovered and punished are not too great, according to the statistics of these last years. He knows very well that if he were to be arrested and eventually convicted by a jury and sentenced to life imprisonment, the maximum punishment would not correspond in any way to his heinous crime of murder. Moreover, should he be found guilty, the release from his life sentence that he would get under this bill is an almost sure and normal thing after a ten-year compulsory jail term, except if he is unlucky, then the compulsory jail term could go to a maximum of twenty years. What we are talking about here really is a ten-year sentence in most cases. I find this most inadequate, considering the seriousness and the gravity of the crime. The usual ten-year jail term cannot be compared, in view of the seriousness of the crime, to the other sentences provided by our Criminal Code for less serious crimes. I cannot support such permissive, slow, weak and toothless legislation which, I think, does not protect honest and law-abiding people and degrades the whole punishment system provided by our Criminal Code.

Five-year trial periods have been more than sufficient to show, in the light of reality, the philosophical error of its design which seems obvious to me in spite of the humanitarian theories put forward by supporters of the bill and the fear of errors which have been mentioned. We can see the unfortunate results of the relaxation in criminal sentences and punishments, regardless of the reasons we find to justify and rationalize our bad record. In my opinion, we have before us a bill which has been a failure for many years, which has a bad record, and which does not protect the honest citizen in the best of ways. This can be demonstrated by recent criminal statistics and many case histories.

Moreover, my conscience refuses to distinguish between the possible conviction for the murder of an armed policeman and the conviction for the murderer of an unarmed solid citizen, since in both cases he is a cold-blooded murderer, armed to kill, who has the obvious intent to kill and who carries out his heinous act.

[English]

The price to be paid for everything in life must, in all justice and in order to avoid chaos in our society, be paid. In the case of the criminal aggressor it must be paid by something owned by him, and it must be of reasonable value. That, in my book at least, is an essential rule for a good and just government in a society that respects its law-abiding members.

Today I find no reason why we should support a bill that will make it easier to kill those in authority, those in public service, or any law-abiding citizen. In my estimation, the proposed amendment to section 214 of the Criminal Code, setting aside and suspending capital punishment, is an injustice and an iniquity to Canadian society. Without disregarding the arguments advanced to the contrary, I shall be voting against Bill C-2, and against any amendment that would not reinstate capital punishment as it was five years ago.

Hon. Richard J. Stanbury: Honourable senators, I should like to begin by welcoming the three new senators. I know they have been welcomed many times, but I should like to add my own personal greetings, on behalf of all honourable senators.

Senator Perrault is an orator of great strength, and one who articulates beautifully. We have already had an example of his speaking in this house. He is not one who simply talks; he is one of the most hard-working and conscientious people I know. All honourable senators will soon know that Senator Ray Perrault is a member of this house, as will all the people of Canada.

[Translation]

I am very pleased to welcome here Senator Maurice Riel. I have known Senator Riel since 1968 and my admiration for him is continuously increasing.

[English]

I am delighted, also, to welcome my good friend John Godfrey into this house. I had the honour of escorting him, with the assistance of the Deputy Leader of the Government, to Her Honour the Speaker, but this is my first opportunity to formally welcome him. Senator Godfrey is not only a man of ability, whose very presence here will be of great benefit to this house, but he is also a great democrat, a real liberal in the non-partisan sense, and a really warm human being. It is a pleasure to me to see that these people have joined us here in this house.

● (2110)

I now enter, with some trepidation, the debate on capital punishment. I have listened to and read the speeches that have gone before. They have been excellent speeches, and have demonstrated just how strongly feelings are held by honourable senators on this subject, and how completely opposed those feelings are in many respects.

I am cognizant of the fact that there is really no clear moral guide in our religious background. Some people interpret their religious teachings to say that we must retain capital punishment; others interpret their religious teachings to say that we must not retain capital punishment, and so it becomes a matter of one's own personal approach to humanity, which makes it a very difficult thing for us to deal with in this house.

The one thing that does bother me is to hear some honourable senators describe this bill as being hypocritical. It is, as Senator Desruisseaux said, a compromise. Compromise and hypocrisy are not one and the same thing. It they were we would be in great difficulty as a country, because our country is based upon compromise, compromise of every kind to satisfy the people across this great 6,000-mile wide country, people with different interests of all kinds, religious, ethnic, regional, and so on.

I say that there is nothing hypocritical about this bill. If you show me a nation that is able to deal with all its problems in a consistent and uncompromising way, then I will show you a dictatorship. We live together here in a democracy. We live here because we have been willing to compromise. Those compromises often do not satisfy anyone, but they nevertheless serve the common interest. For that reason I see no hypocrisy in this bill.

I see acceptance of the fact that probably at this time in this country no other solution is possible. Certainly our colleagues in the other place struggled long and hard to find one, and they failed to come together with any measure but the one that is before us. They are the elected representatives of the people, and they fully understand the weight of the responsibility they have taken. They have voted freely and openly in favour of the best compromise they could find.

Surely it is not for us, just because we have the duty to review their decision, to upset the result they have so laboriously fashioned, unless we have some reason to believe that we have some superior wisdom that impels us to override their best judgment. I believe it is not enough for us simply to disagree with our colleagues in the other place. If we are going to meddle with their handiwork, it must only be in the belief that their action will do substantial harm to the body politic of Canada, or that our solution is much better than the one they have adopted. Such a case cannot be made in this situation.

We have lived under a similar law for the last five years, and there is no evidence that serious consequences have resulted. If we refuse to enact this legislation we throw our law back to what it was five years ago. I submit that there is no clear indication that such law would serve the Canadian people better.

The suggestion that we amend the bill to abolish capital punishment once and for all is, I realize, a very attractive one. It polarizes thinking; it makes everything nice and neat and tidy. But the closeness of the vote in the other place says clearly to me that we are not yet ready for that black and white decision in Canada. Where is the virtue of forcing it if our elected representatives, answerable to the people, have agreed in a free and open vote to keep our options open for a little longer?

I confess to you frankly that I personally would love to see that matter resolved in favour of my own opinion, but I love even more the democratic process which allows the Canadian people to reach difficult and emotional decisions after due consideration, in due time, by as many steps as they wish to take. I will support this bill.

On motion of Senator Hastings, debate adjourned.

[Hon. Mr. Stanbury.]

COOPERATIVE CREDIT ASSOCIATIONS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE CONTINUED

The Senate resumed from Thursday, November 8, the adjourned debate on the motion of Senator Denis for the second reading of Bill C-183, to amend the Cooperative Credit Associations Act.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: Honourable senators, this debate is adjourned in my name, but I would like to yield to Senator John M. Macdonald, who wishes to speak on it tomorrow.

Hon. David A. Croll: Honourable senators, I have a few words I should like to say on this bill. May I take the honourable senator's place?

Hon. Mr. Grosart: Of course.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed that the honourable Senator Croll speak in place of the honourable Senator Grosart?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Mr. Croll: Honourable senators, I rise to say a very few words in connection with the motion for the second reading of this bill, an act to amend the Cooperative Credit Associations Act. This bill would permit cooperative credit societies to exercise the functions of a trust company, which would presumably be competitive in some degree with existing trust companies.

I believe I should bring to the attention of the Senate a fact that is and has been public knowledge. I am the chairman of the board of an existing trust company. It might be thought by some that because of that association I would have an interest in opposing this bill.

Under the present law and practice relating to conflict of interest, which I have often stated in this chamber is in many respects completely outmoded, I am not precluded from participating in the debate on this bill, nor from voting thereon. However, I do wish at this time to make it quite clear that, despite my association with a trust company, I support this bill in principle, and I intend to vote for its second reading.

On motion of Senator Grosart, for Senator Macdonald, debate adjourned.

• (2120)

CUSTOMS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE CONTINUED

The Senate resumed from Thursday, November 8, the adjourned debate on the motion of Senator Connolly (Ottawa West) for the second reading of Bill C-189, to amend the Customs Act.

Hon. Allister Grosart: Honourable senators, we have had an excellent explanation of this bill from Senator Connolly (Ottawa West), but I regret to say that his explanation did not clear up in my mind the matter of the validity or otherwise of a principle which appears to be embodied in this bill. That principle is the placing of legal responsibility on a person from whom goods are stolen, instead of on those who have the responsibility for preventing this kind of theft.

Senator Connolly gave us the background of the bill. There was a decision of Mr. Justice Dumoulin of the Exchequer Court of Canada which in effect declared, as a matter of judicial decision, that the master of a ship is not responsible for the declaration of goods entering the country and particularly, of course, goods that have been stolen from his custody.

Honourable senators, I think we are all naturally suspicious of any bill that attempts to overturn, overrule or change a decision of the Exchequer Court or any court in Canada, but such is clearly the intent of this bill. The reason given by the minister, in introducing the bill, was the need to protect the revenue. He gave figures as to the kind of revenue that might be lost as a result of this decision by Mr. Justice Dumoulin. Of course, we all agree that it is a highly laudable exercise in responsibility by a minister or a department to collect all the revenue that is legally due to the public treasury.

This raises the question whether this money is legally due. It raises the question whether the responsibility for theft of goods originally declared by the master of a ship, goods in his custody, or goods released from his custody but not yet in a customs warehouse or in the possession of a bonded carrier, should not be on those—on the Government of Canada—who have the responsibility of making our docks safe from pilfering.

What we are saying here is that the authorities are unable to prevent theft on the dock in this interim period. The master from whom the goods are stolen, from whose custody the goods are stolen, is to be responsible and will be required under this bill to pay duty on those stolen goods.

Honourable senators, I suggest that this is reversing a very fundamental principle of responsibility. I am quite sure that no honourable senator here would like to be put in the position of having to pay duty, tax or a penalty because goods were stolen from him. Yet this seems to be the effect that this bill will have.

To make it quite clear, the minister in introducing this bill said:

> Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to amend the Customs Act to permit more effective control over goods landed in Canada by ships, thus protecting the revenue.

Of course, that is a very laudable purpose. Then he explained that this will make the master of a vessel responsible "for the accuracy of his report inwards, or accountable for duty and taxes owing on goods which are reported as having been landed in Canada and are later incapable of being produced for customs clearance, due to pilferage, irregular delivery, or for any other reason." I suggest again that the necessary requirement of collecting revenue is not, in my mind, unless there are circumstances of which I am unaware, adequate reason for changing the basic principle of responsibility.

Senator Connolly has stated that this is similar to the responsibility that is laid on an airline captain, or in relation to goods with any other carrier. But just because this kind of responsibility may already be imposed on others does not convince me that the principle is right.

Surely the responsibility is on the Canadian authority to protect the goods when they are in this apparently vulnerable position.

We are also told that this has something to do with the fact of containerization, which apparently lends itself to pilfering and to problems of detection greater than those that were in effect before containerization.

We are told, of course, that the captain of a ship can get a bond, and that the cost of the bond is not very much; that it is negligible. That may be so, but again this to me does not affect the principle of which I am speaking, that someone from whom goods are stolen should not be held responsible for taxes on those goods.

I asked Senator Connolly if the shipping companies were aware of this bill or if they had made any complaint. I do not know. He has not had an opportunity to give me an answer, but I believe he will do so.

Honourable senators, the reason I raised that question is that this bill went through the other place in less than an hour. It was introduced by the minister, and there were two comments on it. It went immediately to Committee of the Whole, and in less than an hour this bill was passed. I believe we have a responsibility here to protect corporations as well as individuals who may be affected by a bill such as this. I suggest that perhaps the bill should go to committee so that we can inquire into these aspects.

However, I have said to Senator Connolly, and I repeat, that if he can assure me that the shipping companies are aware of this bill and that they make no objection to it, or there are other reasons behind this decision—this strange decision suggested by the bill—that I do not know of, or if there is some reason why matters might be expedited if the bill does not go to committee, I would be prepared to accept Senator Connolly's word. I am unaware of these things because there is no mention of them anywhere in the discussions that have taken place, so as a senator I have no information about them. All I have is the superficial information that I put before the Senate, from which it appears that the principle here is a bad principle, and one which, in my opinion, should not have the consent of this chamber.

On motion of Senator Buckwold, for Senator Connolly (Ottawa West), debate adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Mr. Martin: Honourable senators, before we adjourn, I should like to indicate that, as I had told the Leader of the Opposition earlier in this evening's session, the Secretary of State for External Affairs proposes tomorrow to present the resolution regarding the decision to participate in the United Nations Peacekeeping Force in the Middle East Operation. On the assumption that we will be in a position to deal with it, I would propose that we deal with it first thing on Thursday.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: Would the Leader of the Government be good enough to inform the chamber as to the present status of that resolution?

Hon. Mr. Martin: There has been no resolution placed before the other house yet, but I anticipate that it will be so placed tomorrow.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Wednesday, November 14, 1973

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

CRIMINAL CODE (CAPITAL PUNISHMENT)

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE CONTINUED

The Senate resumed from yesterday the adjourned debate on the motion of Senator McIlraith for the second reading of Bill C-2, to amend the Criminal Code.

Hon. Earl A. Hastings: Honourable senators, in addressing myself to Bill C-2, my first duty is to extend congratulations to Senator McIlraith, the mover, for the succinct and clear manner in which he presented an otherwise complex and difficult bill for our consideration. I should like also to commend those who have preceded me in the debate for their fine efforts, observations and remarks. I shall attempt to maintain the high standard of discussion in my speech this afternoon.

The problem of capital punishment and the treatment dictated by society towards offenders is not new. One need only read the speeches made by Clarence Darrow 50 years ago, or those made at various other times, in an effort to abolish capital punishment, to realize that although many years have passed, the issue remains the same.

In essence the speeches made in the current debate are almost the same as those made in years gone by when the subject was under discussion. Statistics and polls have changed, of course, but in the final analysis it becomes a matter of a man's personal conscience and, I believe, his attitude toward his fellow men.

In reaching my own conclusion, I have the advantage—some may regard it as a disadvantage—of knowing, as friends, approximately 30 men who are the subject matter of the bill; that is to say, 30 men who have been convicted of capital and non-capital murder and who are in custody or out of custody at the present time.

I think perhaps it is in this area, leaving all other considerations aside, that my best contribution can be made to our deliberations. In addition, over the past three years I have had the opportunity to visit penitentiaries from Nova Scotia to British Columbia and discuss with the inmates in those institutions this difficult matter of human behaviour. I think I have gained some limited knowledge from sharing many hours of discussion with the men in these institutions. Misplaced sympathy? Perhaps. Bleeding heart and sentimentality? Perhaps. On the other hand, perhaps a sincere desire to contribute what I can as one human being to another human in less fortunate circumstances than myself. In any event, I leave the final judgment as to what label is placed on me with those men in our institutions, and in particular the wardens and correctional staffs of those institutions. I assure you I do not join in any crying session over the past. My one main objective is to assist in any way I can in urging men to face the circumstances in which they find themselves, thereby facing reality. I contribute what I can in that respect.

In addition, I have the honour—some may regard it as a dishonour—to be Honorary President of the Hopewell Club of Drumheller Institution. The Hopewell Club is composed of 22 members serving life sentences for non-capital and capital murder. We meet regularly at least once a week in sessions of constructive self help. Each man assists the other to face up to his problem. It is not a crying session nor a paranoid meeting but men facing up to the difficult problems they have and trying to find solutions.

I recently took three members of this group to Calgary to attend a group encounter session with the Calgary Jaycees. It was held in the party room of a high-rise apartment building where the Calgary Jaycees usually hold their meetings. What did we do? We did just exactly as we are doing here today. The Jaycees had invited the "lifers" to participate in this group encounter, and to discuss the problem which we are discussing today. It was a great benefit to the three inmates, and it was of great benefit to the 60 members of the Calgary Jaycees and their wives.

● (1410)

The following Monday I received a telephone call from a large Eastern Canadian newspaper asking me if I had taken three convicted murderers to Calgary for a Saturday night party. I replied that I had taken three men to a group encounter session in Calgary on the Saturday night. I was asked if they were convicted murderers and I said they were. When asked where the meeting was held I replied that it was held in the party room of a high-rise apartment, which happened to be the regular meeting place of the Calgary Jaycees. I was then asked if liquor was served, and I said that it had been. The next question was, "Did the inmates drink?" To which I replied, "No. They happen to have more respect for the terms of their temporary absence than to drink." Finally I was asked if I had been escorted, and when I said no the reporter mumbled something to the effect that he thought I was utterly out of my mind.

Honourable senators, in working with these men I can only say that at any time I will take to such functions a man who has been convicted of murder, who knows he is a murderer and is doing something about it, rather than the many hundreds who are wandering around unaware of the fact that in certain circumstances they are capable of murder.

I now wish to deal briefly, if I may, with some of what I feel are inconsistencies that have cropped up during the debate. The first concerns the act of commutation. There seems to be great concern about this act of commutation. There has been a great deal of misrepresentative information, to the point where it would seem that the Governor in Council is actually violating the law when the act of commutation is fulfilled and obeying the law if we have a few hangings. The fact is that the law specifically states—and it is the will of the people—that when a man is sentenced to be hanged the judge shall inquire of the jury if they have any recommendation to make with respect to mercy; he shall convey that recommendation, if any, together with any recommendation he may care to make, to the Minister of Justice, for final determination by the Governor in Council. That is the will of Parliament.

The Cabinet, in considering whether or not a sentence of death should be carried out or commuted, do not, I believe, adopt the procedure outlined by Senator Beaubien last night of passing a piece of paper around and having people sign it, because I have some knowledge of the input into making this decision. In addition to all the information and the transcripts of court proceedings, the Council are at liberty to seek any other information they wish to secure on which to base their final decision. I am sure that every member of Council, in fulfilling his duty, gives a great deal of consideration as to whether to send a man swinging off to eternity or commute the death sentence.

I asked a prisoner in Saskatchewan Penitentiary at Prince Albert last Friday if I could bring his case to your attention. He is one of those whose sentence was commuted but who received no recommendation for mercy from the presiding judge. Some members of Council who considered his case—and probably sit in this chamber—have been unable, because of their oath of secrecy, to give you the information I now intend to place on Hansard.

When I asked Cliff Lurvey for permission to use his name and to explain the circumstances of his commutation, he replied that to have this matter continually brought up created difficulties, particularly for his wife and family, but that if it would assist me to open the eyes of one senator, it would be worth it.

What are the facts here? Cliff Lurvey was found guilty of capital murder in the death of a policeman in Winnipeg and he was sentenced to hang. There was no recommendation for mercy from the judge, and as required by law the sentence was placed before the Cabinet for consideration. By way of additional information, the Cabinet requested three independent psychiatric reports and an independent medical examination of Cliff Lurvey. The medical examination disclosed that he is suffering from terminal emphysema and will probably spend his last days in custody. I ask honourable senators, had they been members of the Cabinet at that time, fulfilling that responsibility, could they have done otherwise than commute this man's sentence and give him at least the dignity of dying in custody rather than dropping him through the trap door to his death?

Hon. Mr. Molson: Could the honourable senator give the date of the murder for which he was convicted?

Hon. Mr. Hastings: It was after 1969. I can give the exact date and name. He is one of four in the last four years.

[Hon. Mr. Hastings.]

Hon. Mr. Laird: The honourable senator mentioned a recommendation for mercy. He says there are four cases. Was mercy recommended in the case of the other three?

Hon. Mr. Hastings: Mercy was recommended in the case of three, but there was no recommendation from the judge in the case of Cliff Lurvey.

Hon. Mr. Everett: Could the honourable senator give the facts of the murder?

Hon. Mr. Hastings: I believe the facts are that, along with three other men, Lurvey participated in the holdup of a supermarket in Winnipeg. The police closed in and a gun battle ensued with Lurvey, which resulted in the death of a policeman.

Honourable senators, it seems to me that all of the considerations, which the public are unaware of, and which the Cabinet is unable to explain, are brought into play in the act of commutation. It is simply not a matter that the law is disregarded when the act of commutation is invoked.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Even if during the period of twelve years all sentences have been commuted? Even if not one person has been executed?

● (1420)

Hon. Mr. Hastings: In each one of those cases certain factors were obviously brought into play, and obviously given great consideration and importance, prior to commutation being granted.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: May I say to the honourable senator that it is much easier for a Cabinet minister to say, "I am going to commute the sentence." There is always one factor or another that will influence you to commute a sentence. I mean, you are on the safe side.

Hon. Mr. Smith: If there has been a mistake, you are on the safe side.

Hon. Mr. Hastings: Senator Molson posed a very interesting and relevant question the other night, which I hope I can answer to his satisfaction. He was discussing the matter of deterrents and he asked whether prisons are a deterrent and should they be abolished?

From what experience I have had, I would say that prisons are not a deterrent to the vast majority of men who have the misfortune to go through prison doors, and I can only say that the present form of custodial treatment should be abolished. It has been found, not only by myself but by many studies that have been made—for example, the Fauteux Commission and the Ouimet Commission—that prisons are a total failure. As far as the deterrent effect, or the protection of society is concerned—the very purpose for which they have been created—it must give us little comfort to know the number of our fellow men who are going through these institutions and coming out worse than they went in.

Prison gives society some short-term protection, while the prisoner is locked up in his cage, but of what value is it to society when we release him, perhaps a more violent, vicious individual, ready to take out his viciousness on society and cause even greater problems? It does not deter.

In regard to that, I can only quote a recent report by Judge Hugessen:

> Prison is an undesirable method of ensuring that society is protected against its own failures. On empirical, as well as on humane and economic grounds, it is far from the ideal solution and the search for more acceptable and more efficient means must go on.

That is not a bleeding heart speaking; it is a hard-nosed judge of the Superior Court of Quebec.

As recently as November 7, 1973, Dr. Kenneth A. Carlson, an assessor of prisoners at the Guelph Correctional Centre's neuropsychiatric clinic, wrote a report, basing his conclusions on a study of 1,070 adult first offenders admitted to the medium-security institution in 1965. The study shows that of the 1,070 prisoners he followed after their release, 686 had been reconvicted by 1971; almost a third of that number were back in jail within six months; more than half were serving new sentences within a year of their release; two-thirds had been reconvicted within 18 months, and within two years, three-quarters had been found guilty of a new offence.

This may not impress you, and you may not agree with me, but I can only say that punishment, whether it is imprisonment or at the end of a rope, is no deterrent to the act of lawlessness.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: What should we do, then?

Hon. Mr. Hastings: We sent 790 men dangling to their death in the vain hope that the next half-crazed killer would stop and take notice, that he would check out his sentence and decide whether he would serve ten years or twenty years, and decide whether or when he would be eligible for parole.

Murder is an insane act, performed by insane, irrational people.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Oh, no.

Hon. Mr. Hastings: And no consideration whatever is given by them to the deterrent that may follow.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Not in all cases.

Hon. Mr. Hastings: Now, if I may deal with the Parole Board, I don't think there has been a board, commission or agency of government that has been more maligned and vilified these last two years than the National Parole Board, through inaccurate and misleading information. In this connection let me deal first with the remarks and observations made by Senator Deschatelets, which I know were made in good faith.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: So are yours.

Hon. Mr. Hastings: Well, I hope they are.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: But they are so naïve.

Hon. Mr. Hastings: But I should be able to express them. From page 1105 of Senate Hansard of Thursday last, November 8, I quote Senator Deschatelets as follows:

> As regards parole—I refer to that now because we are discussing murder cases—I have yet to hear a federal official try to justify and make the public understand that a few years ago, an accused found guilty of first degree murder and condemned to death could have his sentence commuted and be allowed to get out after six or seven years.

I too would like to have an explanation, because the fact is that since 1968 the act demands that no man whose sentence has been commuted may be released in under ten years.

Hon. Mr. Deschatelets: There might be a mistake there of a few years. I think the first murder I had in mind took place about 1957 or 1958, and the sentence was commuted and the convicted person came back into circulation and was subsequently arrested for another murder. If my honourable friend would like me to check the year, I shall be pleased to do so.

Hon. Mr. Hastings: The fact is that under the Criminal Code and the Parole Act no man committed on a death-commuted sentence of life imprisonment may be released before the expiry of a period of ten years. The average sentence served between 1961 and 1968 was 12 years, and between 1968 and 1973 the average sentence served was 13.5 years. Let us be perfectly clear that that is not the average life sentence being served in prison; it is the average sentence being served by those paroled. There are still many, many in institutions serving life sentences, and their number would increase that average to a great degree. I point out that it is only an average. But the accusation is made that they are "letting them out to kill again." What are the facts?

The National Parole Board has released 152 men with death-commuted sentences, and 56 men for non-capital murder, making a total of 208. Of that number 21 have had to be returned to custody, not for murder or for any act occasioning loss of life but for violation of their parole, which carries with it many restrictions. It is well to remember that these men released on parole are, in fact, on parole for life and can be returned to the institution at any time. As I have said, 21 were returned to custody, and that amounts to about 10 per cent of the total, which is a far better average than that of any other area of inmate parole. Seventeen died on parole. That makes a total of 38, which means that in Canada 170 men remain on parole who have served their sentences for murder or non-capital murder, and not one, let me repeat, not one, has inflicted any injury or caused loss of life since. Where is the basis for the statement, "Let them out to kill again"? I know some of those men. I know what they are doing and what they have gone through. If I may, I should like to describe a few of their cases. I shall not use names and I shall disguise their places of residence, because I have great respect for the men and the anonymity which they wish to maintain.

● (1430)

The first man I shall call Boyd. He was sentenced to capital punishment for murder, and spent 13 months on death row. There was no recommendation from the jury for mercy. His sentence was commuted, and he served 13 years in Prince Albert Penitentiary. He was paroled and is presently living with his mother. He is attending a western Canadian university and will graduate next June with a master's degree in engineering. He plans to be married on graduation.

The next case is that of Troy, who was convicted of murder and spent nine months on death row. He spent 11 years in Stony Mountain Penitentiary and Saskatchewan Penitentiary. His sentence was commuted, and there was no recommendation for mercy from the judge. This man lives quietly in a western Canadian city and is working as a caretaker of an apartment block. Is he prowling at night looking for a victim? No. All his extra time has been, and is, spent at self-help meetings in the local penal institution and psychiatric hospital.

Another case is that of Barry, who was convicted of non-capital murder and spent eight years in Prince Albert Penitentiary. He was paroled in 1971 and is now superintendent of a large construction company. He did so well with his company that his salary was increased from $600 a month, at the time he was first paroled, to $1,200 a month. He rose so high with his company that it was necessary for him to be bonded, and when he applied for a bond it was denied because of his criminal record. I had to explain to the president of the bonding company that this man had never stolen a nickel in his life. Following my representation to the company, the man was bonded. He is now earning approximately $1,200 a month as superintendent of a large construction company.

Another case is that of Hank, who was sentenced for capital murder. Under the provisions of the present act, this man would be put to death. There would be no consideration for commutation because his victim was a prison guard. There could be no recommendation for mercy. He spent 12 years in Prince Albert Penitentiary. Hank went as far as he could with correspondence courses and, on his release on parole, completed his education and obtained a degree. He was for a short time a professor. Honourable senators will understand that I am trying to disguise the details as much as possible. This man now has his own business, is married and has two sons.

Those are the types of men released by the Parole Board. They are men who, in a moment of time, under circumstances which none of us has experienced, took another's life.

From my limited worthwhile experience—and I confess that it is limited—I believe that no matter how low a man may fall, no matter how depraved or degenerate his conduct may be in a given time and under certain circumstances, there is within him that elusive something which urges him to reach out beyond the sordidness and deceit of his circumstances and to grasp that which spells kinship and harmony with his fellow men and his Creator. From the depth of my conscience I can place no man beyond the reach of that redemption. I support the bill.

Hon. John J. Connolly (Ottawa West): Honourable senators, the quality of the debate on this issue has been as high as any I have heard in this chamber over a good many years. The speeches have been both objective and reasoned.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: But not all the conclusions.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Certainly the speeches have been informed and sincere. One could expect no less in a chamber such as this on an issue as basic as the one under discussion, because it involves questions of life and death, of foul murder, and the social consequences of imposing the traditional penalty. There is also the broader question of crime and punishment and the still broader question of sin, penance, and, indeed, repentance. For many of us in Parliament, the decision is an agonizing one.

I do not propose to generalize or to discuss the various theories involved in deciding the issue of capital punishment. Rather I propose to deal with a single point. It may be simplistic or narrow, but I hope it will be looked upon as being practical.

As honourable senators know, I was a member of the government in 1967 when the original provisional legislation was passed, and I assumed my share of the responsibility for that legislation. At that time I was deeply concerned about the extended use of section 684 of the Criminal Code, particularly subsection (1) of that section, whereby the government was empowered to reprieve a convicted person or to commute a sentence.

As there has been some discussion on this section of the code, I should perhaps read the subsection into the record. It says:

> The Governor in Council may commute a sentence of death to imprisonment in the penitentiary for life, or for any term of years not less than two years, or to imprisonment in a prison other than a penitentiary for a period of less than two years.

Section 686 says:

> Nothing in this Act in any manner limits or affects Her Majesty's royal prerogative of mercy.

The effect of section 684 can be achieved, of course, by using the royal prerogative of mercy. Again, I should like to place on record the authority for the use of the royal prerogative. It is found in the Revised Statutes of Canada 1970, in the volume entitled Appendices, at page 445.

I do not propose to read it, but I would ask permission of the Senate to have incorporated in my speech at this point article XII of the Letters Patent constituting the Office of Governor General of Canada.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(Article XII follows)

> And We do further authorize and empower Our Governor General, as he shall see occasion, Our name and on Our behalf, when any crime or offence against the laws of Canada has been committed for which the offender may be tried thereunder, to grant a pardon to any accomplice, in such crime or offence, who shall give such information as shall lead to the conviction of the principal offender, or of any one of such offenders if more than one; and further to grant to any offender convicted of any such crime or offence in any court, or before any Judge, Justice, or Magistrate, administering the laws of Canada, a pardon, either free or subject to lawful conditions, or any respite of the execution of the sentence of any such offender, for such period as to Our Governor General may seem fit, and to remit any fines, penalties or forfeitures which may become due and payable to Us. And We do hereby direct and enjoin that Our Governor General shall not pardon or reprieve any such offender without first receiving in capital cases the advice of Our Privy Council for Canada and, in other cases, the advice of one at least, of his Ministers.

• (1440)

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Honourable senators, in my own humble opinion, on the general issue of capital punishment the statistics are singularly inconclusive.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Right.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): However, on the question of commutation there are some figures which might prove useful to this chamber. The year of significance in my view was 1956, during which year there were five executions and five reprieves. Prior to that time, from 1950 to 1955, there were 58 executions and 33 reprieves. After 1956, from 1957 to 1966, there were 14 executions and 76 reprieves. There have been no executions since 1962, as has already been mentioned a number of times.

I have said that bare statistics on the general issue of capital punishment are not too helpful, but those that I have given I think confirm an understanding, a consensus that was abroad in the country and which most people, both in Parliament and out of Parliament, recognized. That understanding was the reluctance in Canada on the part of governments to allow the death sentence to be carried out, even though the law provided for the carrying out of the death sentences and the courts were complying with that law.

May I file and have incorporated in my remarks at this point a table, which I have compiled from information obtained for the 1967 debate and which I have now brought up to date, setting out the number of executions and reprieves from 1950 to date?

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators, that this table be incorporated in the proceedings?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Year	Executions	Reprieves
1950	10	3
1951	11	3
1952	10	8
1953	10	6
1954	11	4
1955	6	9
1956	5	5
1957	3	5
1958	3	16
1959	3	11
1960	2	6
1961	1	10
1962	2	8
1963	—	8
1964	—	3
1965	—	9
1966	—	3
In 1967	—	18*
Since 1967	4 capital murders	4

* After passage of Bill C-168 in December 1967, there were 18 persons in penitentiaries who had been convicted of murder under the old law and were awaiting execution. Had they been tried under the 1967 law, the charge would have been one of non-capital murder. All were reprieved after the 1967 law was passed.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: You have just filed a table of statistics after having said they do not prove anything.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): No; I said statistics with respect to commutations and reprieves were rather more helpful than those in connection with capital punishment generally. I must say these have been helpful to me.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: You said the contrary.

Hon. Mr. McIlraith: May I ask a question in relation to these statistics? Do they show separately in the list of commutations the group of commutations that were granted by reason of the change in the law in 1967 and applicable to those persons who were under sentence of death before the 1967 change but on whom the sentence had not been carried out by reason of the change of law and the limiting of capital punishment?

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Yes, they do. The table which I filed contains the following note:

> After passage of Bill C-168 in December 1967, there were 18 persons in penitentiaries who had been convicted of murder under the old law and were awaiting execution. Had they been tried under the 1967 law, the charge would have been one of non-capital murder. All were reprieved after the 1967 law was passed.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: That is obvious.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Yes.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: They had been reprieved until then.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Honourable senators, in 1967 the situation in respect of commutation was most unsatisfactory for the public, for the courts, for parliamentarians and, believe me, for members of the government. Convinced proponents of capital punishment were openly and vehemently critical of the increasing use of the power of commutation by governments. Each time a new murder was committed a louder outburst of outrage was heard. Again, many felt—and I am quite sure that this included sincere and distinguished jurists—that a mockery was being made of the prescribed judicial process. The courts, although doing their duty meticulously, were being brought into what was virtually contempt. This was especially true in cases where there was no recommendation from a jury for mercy, and where there had been no successful appeal against the sentence.

In addition, there were some members of Parliament, some members of the government and certainly members of the public, who said that either the law should be applied or it should be changed.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: They still say that.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Therefore, it was no surprise, especially in view of the numbers of reprieves which had been granted since 1956, that the decision was made to change the law; that that was the course chosen and that the use of the death penalty would be severely restricted. Some who were in the Cabinet in 1967 would have had the Code omit the death penalty for murder completely. They urged outright abolition. I do not believe

I am opening the doors of the Privy Council when I speak in this manner. This was the view expressed in discussions which took place outside the Cabinet room.

Others insisted upon retention of the death penalty, at least in a limited class of cases, namely murders or killings of policemen and of prison guards, for the reasons we all know. There were still others who emphasized the importance of a trial period, regardless of the provisions of the bill to be submitted to Parliament. This latter group were concerned with the social implications which might flow from virtually dispensing with capital punishment as the penalty for murder.

In my view, this concern stemmed from the unprovable proposition that a prospective killer might be deterred by the prospect of facing death after trial. Personally, I believe that if the value of deterrence can be proved, then the death penalty may very well be warranted. However, if the value of the death penalty as a deterrent cannot be proved, then capital punishment may not be justified.

The bill which came finally to Parliament for a free vote provided for the abolition of capital punishment except in the two specific cases prescribed in this bill, namely, the killings of policemen and of prison guards. It provided also that a five-year trial period be established.

If this reasoning was wrong, honourable senators, the least that can be said for it is that it sinned on the side of mercy. I say that the governments which applied the policy of reprieve from 1956 on were composed of men of mercy. They were neither men of vengeance, nor men of blood. They were, however, dissatisfied with the existing state of the law. The 1967 legislation may not have been the best solution to the problem, but it was certainly an improvement over the old order which had prevailed since 1956.

● (1450)

Governments of any stripe do not relish the accusation that they change the law by executive decree, even when their motives are humanitarian. I note that all of the four convictions for capital murder that have been handed down in the past five years have been commuted, although in only two cases was there a recommendation for mercy. So, in my view, the trend for the continuation of the policy is still there.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: The situation has not changed.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Honourable senators, in 1967 I had in my own mind no definitive solution to the problem posed by the use of the death penalty for murder. In 1973, I confess, I am in the same position. Six years ago I could not assess its value as a deterrent; today I am really no better off. If I did know I would not vote to approve another trial period of virtual abolition. It may be that five years hence I shall have developed more wisdom on this most agonizing issue.

Perhaps all of us will be wiser in five years. If we are not, and there is no better solution recommended after an additional five-year trial period, the law now proposed without the five-year provisional period and as a permanent element or feature of the Criminal Code might well be a desirable step to take at that time. Parliament could take that step knowing that Parliaments thereafter could change the law at any time.

[Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West).]

Hon. Mr. Molson: Honourable senators, I wonder if Senator Connolly would also care to read section 683, which seems to have some bearing on this discussion as it deals with commutation, pardons and the royal prerogative.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): I regret to say that I do not have section 683 with me. I brought only section 684. I did say originally that I would be simplistic. I was trying simply to beam in on section 684(1), section 686 and article XII, of the Letters Patent constituting the Office of Governor General. I will look up section 683, and perhaps I can speak to it at a later stage.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: May I ask the honourable senator why he thinks he will be in a better position to assess the situation five years from now in light of a policy of virtual abolition continuing for the next five years? After all, we have already had this partial ban on capital punishment for a period of five years for experimentation purposes, but we did not enforce it.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Honourable senators, I did say one thing and that was that governments since 1956, both Progressive Conservative and Liberal, have perhaps not done everything that could or should have been done. However, if they sinned, they sinned on the side of mercy. This, I think, is something for which they should be commended. But during the next five years there may be developments—perhaps not in the Canadian jurisdiction, but in other jurisdictions—which will help us at that time.

I did refresh my memory on this matter and I recall a somewhat similar point being raised by Senator Flynn during the debate on this question in 1967. I said to him at that time—and I think I can say it again—that when the question of the trial period was discussed a two-year period, a five-year period, a seven-year period, and a ten-year period were considered. Senator Flynn will perhaps remember that. I said at that time that I thought we could decide on the five-year period, but we could just as well decide on the ten-year period.

Hon. Mr. Croll: We will next time.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Who knows? I am afraid no one can be too specific or definite about this.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Clause 10 of the bill would help, too. No one has referred to it yet.

Hon. Joan Neiman: Honourable senators, in rising to address this house for the first time I want to state that I did not delay my debut for lack of kindness or encouragement on the part of our gracious Speaker and other honourable senators, or, I must add, some gentle prodding from our leader. Rather, I listened to the many eloquent and informed speeches which have been made on a wide range of topics and became convinced that I should not speak until I had something worthwhile to say. That criterion might have sentenced me to a life of silence. However, I have managed to overcome my initial modesty because of the importance to me, and I believe to all of us, of the principal subject we are discussing in Bill C-2, that being capital punishment.

In the meantime, however, I have tried to learn something of the processes of Parliament, and particularly of this house. I hope I shall be able to make some effective contribution to my province and to my country through this chamber, of which I am proud to be a member.

I had only to read the debates which have taken place in this house and in the other place since the introduction of Bill C-2 to realize that every cogent argument in support of either the retention or the abolition of the death penalty, or the compromise position which this bill proposes, has been advanced. Nothing I can say will illuminate the subject any more, nor, I believe, will I move any fixed opinion. But our right to adjudicate upon the life or death of another human being, however indirect that right may be, obliges us to bend our minds to the consequences of what our decision might be, and be prepared, in so far as we are able, to justify our convictions.

I believe that is what all honourable senators who have taken part in this debate have tried to do, even though I cannot agree with many of the arguments which have been advanced. I am deeply grateful for the contributions which have been made today by both Senator Hastings and Senator Connolly.

I am a total abolitionist. I say that without sentimentality and without apology. I say it with the same honest conviction with which Senator Desruisseaux gave us his views to the contrary last night. My belief is equally founded on a deep respect for the sanctity of human life, and a desire for the optimum protection of our society.

I agree with the view expressed by Ramsey Clark, a former Attorney General of the United States of America, who, in voicing his opposition to the death penalty in the District of Columbia, said:

> Society pays a heavy price for the penalty of death it imposes. Our emotions may cry vengeance in the wake of a horrible crime. But reason and experience tell us that killing the criminal will not undo the crime, prevent other crimes or bring justice to the victim, the criminal or society. Executions cheapen life. We must cherish life.

My interest in penal reform—of which the question of capital punishment is only one problem, and in perhaps every sense except its finality a minor one—began when I was a law student many years ago. At the outset I did not think too deeply about that particular aspect of criminal justice. Later, in about 1966, as counsel for the Elizabeth Fry Society in Toronto I was asked to prepare for its members an exposition of the arguments for and against capital punishment, including data and statistics that might support the views of both the abolitionists and the retentionists. As you know, this was when the government was again studying the question very earnestly, and hearing briefs from various interested citizens and groups of citizens, with a view to proposing amendments to the Criminal Code. My own opinions crystallized as I studied and prepared material for the report.

● (1500)

The Elizabeth Fry Society eventually submitted a brief to the government recommending total abolition of the death penalty.

I do not need to remind honourable senators that the bill which passed and took effect in 1967 did not go that far. As has been so ably explained by Senator McIlraith in his introduction, that bill, Bill C-168, was the precursor of the one presently before us. Both restrict the imposition of the death penalty to a limited and comparatively infrequent type of homicide, and in each case the restriction applied or applies for only a period of five years. Although Bill C-168 was surely an improvement over the status of our criminal law prior to the time it was passed, it was nevertheless a disappointment to me. So is the present one, for reasons I shall explain later.

In preparing the paper on capital punishment for the Elizabeth Fry Society, I had to begin with a study of murder, of the varieties of homicide, the social factors which appear to beget that extreme form of violence, and the types of people usually convicted of murder. One of the first non-technical but very compelling books that influenced my thinking was the late Lewis Lawes' personal history of his more than twenty years as warden of Sing Sing Prison.

Warden Lawes more than compensated for his lack of judicial and legal expertise by a compassionate sensitivity which excluded sentimentality towards that miserable stream of humanity which came under his supervision, and particularly towards those hundreds he got to know personally on death row. He had to walk those last agonizing steps with more than a hundred murderers and, like Ramsey Clark, he was never persuaded that their execution meant justice for either the victims, their next of kin, or society as a whole. With his years of experience he remained convinced that it was almost always the poor and the outcast who ended on death row. He wrote:

> Not only does capital punishment fail in its justification, but no punishment could be invented with so many inherent defects. It is an unequal punishment in the way it is applied to the rich and the poor.

That observation is equally valid here in Canada. It is true that some people are more capable and able to defend themselves, or can afford to hire experienced counsel to plead their cases. Those unfortunate others who come in contact with the law often do not have the means or the ability to enforce or even insist upon their rights as citizens, and so they suffer inequities in the handling and disposition of charges laid against them. The petty thief who is poor usually goes to jail; the petty thief with money usually pays a fine. What happens at that most elementary level of justice can and does occur right up through a series of increasingly serious offenses, with equally serious consequences to the convicted offender, to the type of charge with which we are concerned in Bill C-2, that of culpable homicide.

Can we be certain that every man charged with murder, the conviction for which might carry the forfeiture of his life, has been accorded complete and impartial justice, without prejudice, and with every competent legal argument and proper defence provided for him as for every other person charged with a similar offence? I think not. It is humanly impossible to ensure such equitable treatment for all persons charged in our courts across Canada.

If there ever is a possibility that one man might be condemned to die in circumstances where another would be permitted to live, we cannot allow justice to be blind. I have never liked that concept, because the theory of the impartiality of justice often tends to do just the opposite in practice.

I might add another example of the uneven application of justice. A recent study in the United States has found that of several hundred persons who were executed in that country since 1930, 53 per cent were black. I believe the blacks comprise about 10 per cent of the entire United States' population.

It follows that I am not in accord with those who argue that capital punishment is necessary to provide justice for those who suffer loss of their own lives or those of their next of kin through wanton murder. It is obvious that even today many good and well-meaning people cannot agree on what, if anything, would justify legal homicide on the part of the state. While we are agonizingly searching for answers on how to curb violence in our society, we must not tamper with the lives of a selected few, only to realize later on that the final solution we chose was not necessarily the last or the best one.

To those who argue that we must uphold the sanctity of life I say that we must be concerned with the sanctity of all life, not just of those we decide are worthy to live.

I need hardly add that I totally reject the archaic exhortation of "an eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth" as being completely inconsistent with modern concepts of law and justice, however imperfect they may be.

The most commonly held argument advanced by persons who advocate the retention of the death penalty is that it has a possible, and even a probable, deterrent value. This argument must be substantiated to a reasonable degree in order to be considered valid. I do not believe this can be done at the moment, any more than I could successfully argue the opposing point of view.

Warden Lawes did, however, have strong convictions on this matter. He said unequivocally in his book that his personal conversations with inmate murderers led him inescapably to the conclusion that the vast majority of them, if not all, simply did not think of the possibility of being sentenced to death, or in fact of being executed, before committing the crime for which they were convicted. The question of whether the death penalty might or might not be imposed simply did not influence their thinking or their actions. This could be because of man's apparent inability to conceive of his own death. Nevertheless, deterrence was apparently not a relevant factor.

We can, however, consider the question of deterrence on a more scientific basis. Professor Thorsten Sellin of the University of Pennsylvania has for many years been considered the world's foremost authority on all aspects of capital punishment. His exhaustive studies have covered not only all states in the United States but many of the European and Asian countries, under varying conditions: in jurisdictions where there has always been some type of capital punishment, in some where there has been none, and in many where it has been in force and has been abolished and, in some of those, again reinstated.

● (1510)

The statistics and data Professor Sellin has compiled are staggering. He has presented his findings to almost every important commission and committee set up in the last twenty years to study the problem—the British royal commission, the United Nations committee, and our own royal commission among them. His views on the deterrent effect of the death penalty were generally accepted by all those bodies and, indeed, were incorporated into the findings made by the British royal commission. His conclusion was that the presence or absence of the death penalty is not a determining factor in the fluctuation of the homicide rate in the jurisdictions he studied.

In another context, Professor Sellin said:

> Few people who discuss the deterrent effect of the death penalty realize that a criminal exposes himself to a much greater risk of being killed while committing a crime or while being arrested than of being executed.

Dr. Ezzat Fattah, with the Department of Criminology at the University of Montreal, recently completed "A Study of the Deterrent Effect of Capital Punishment with Special Reference to the Canadian Situation," already mentioned by Senator Graham in his recent address. This was commissioned by the then Solicitor General in order to complement previous studies and bring our thinking up to date. It takes us statistically to the end of 1970 and, although all forms of violence appear to have increased slightly in recent years, Dr. Fattah's conclusions in no way invalidate those previously drawn by Professor Sellin. A far more significant view held by those as well as other experts in the field is that the realization by the would-be criminal, that punishment for his intended crime will be swift and certain, acts as a much more effective deterrent than the threat of capital punishment.

Another important finding made by Dr. Fattah—and here I refer to page 47 and following of his study—is that capital punishment does not act as a deterrent for the protection of policemen and prison guards. He refers to analyses made by Professor Sellin who had arrived at the same conclusion. This does not mean that we should not be as properly concerned with the protection of these public officers as they are with our protection, but apparently the death penalty is not the answer. Indeed, I have read several times that it was the police force of Austria which petitioned its government to abolish the death penalty in order to lessen the risk of danger to themselves while trying to apprehend desperate criminals who might otherwise feel they had nothing to lose in killing their way to freedom.

This brings me to a consideration of the bill before us and my reasons for being dissatisfied with it. Bill C-2 is undoubtedly a compromise, but that in itself is not bad. It is the best consensus which could be achieved in the other place, but I still consider it an unsatisfactory one. If we are to have the death penalty at all, there are far more heinous crimes which deserve the ultimate punishment than the occasional killing of a policeman or prison guard—and I say that with the greatest respect and admiration for those officers. We are illogical in choosing this particular form of homicide to punish most severely because we are in fact not certain that what we are doing is right.

A necessary component of the Criminal Code as it now stands is the legal right of the Governor General in Council to commute any sentence of death, as it deems proper. That right I shall defend as long as capital punishment is part of our judicial system. Senator Connolly spoke comprehensively to this point today. But there again the possibility of the exercise of this right creates uncertainty in the minds of the public, the police and, of course, the criminal. It has been stated in many ways by many people who have studied the problem of crime and punishment that the certainty of a small punishment will make a stronger impression than the fear of one which is more severe, if there is a reasonable chance of escaping the latter. In countenancing and continuing this period of uncertainty, we are not working effectively towards the goal which I am sure we all want—the diminution of violence in our society.

I hope, therefore, honourable senators, that we shall at least consider the feasibility and the legality of amending this bill in committee. I listened with great attention and respect to what Senator Stanbury had to say on this matter last night. I cannot agree that, simply because the honourable members in the other place arrived at this compromise after so much painful soul-searching, we should refrain from attempting to amend it, if our conscience and our reason so dictate.

Almost every bill which comes to us from the other place is in effect a compromise, fashioned by pragmatic, political reality, tested and turned on the wheel of public opinion—or what the honourable members in the other place conceive to be public opinion. Nevertheless, I understand it to be not only the function but the duty of honourable senators to exercise their independent judgment, to examine each bill presented to them on its merits, and at least to attempt to amend it if they deem it necessary and proper to do so.

As I further understand our parliamentary rules of procedure—and I am surely no expert in that field—if this chamber amends any bill presented to it the heavens will not fall nor, on a lesser scale of celestial intervention, will we have thwarted the expressed will of the people. We too are the people. All that will happen is that only the amendments we make, however insignificant or important they may be, are referred back to the other place for consideration. If they are approved and passed, so be it; if they are struck down, we must then deal with the bill as it was originally presented to us. Nothing is lost except time, but much may be gained. If amendments in committee are deemed improper or impractical, I shall support this bill as it stands.

I also listened last evening to the views which Senator Langlois so eloquently expressed. His fundamental concern was to ensure the protection of the individual and society against criminality, and particularly all types of violence. As I understood him, Senator Langlois did say that he might be prepared to support total abolition if the violence in our society could first be eradicated. I am afraid he is seeking a Utopia we all want, but shall never find.

Man is unfortunately the most violent of all animals. When we find the reason why this is so, we might also begin to learn how to modify his behaviour. At present we are curbed by sanctions imposed by law, by public opinion, by our neighbours and friends, and sometimes by our religious beliefs. Most of these are necessary and beneficial, but to state that the ultimate sanction of death is necessary to deter violence is to repeat an oft-told but, I believe, a factually discredited tale.

When Sir Samuel Romilly introduced a bill in the British House of Commons in 1810 to abolish capital punishment for theft of five shillings or over from a shop, this is part of what Lord Chief Justice Ellenborough had to say:

> I trust Your Lordships will pause before you assent to an experiment pregnant with danger to the security of property, and before you repeal a Statute which has so long been held necessary for public security... Such will be the consequences of the repeal of this Statute that I am certain depredations to an unlimited extent would be immediately committed.

● (1520)

Lord Ellenborough's fearsome forebodings helped prevent immediate passage of the bill, but when it was passed in due course none of his dire predictions became a reality.

Violence begets violence. The Roman Catholic Church in Canada long held the view that, in certain circumstances, capital punishment was morally and ethically justified. That view has changed. In considering this problem again, the following statement was made by the Canadian Catholic Conference, which is the administrative body of the Roman Catholic Church in Canada:

> The question of the death penalty, in our opinion, ought not to focus on whether a convicted murderer, no matter how wanton, deserves to die. The focus should be on us: should Canadians, as a community, try to break the escalating spiral of violence by refraining from violence even as a deterrent?

It concluded that we should.

Finally, I should like to mention that a few months ago I wrote the chiefs of police of four of our Canadian metropolitan centres—Halifax, Montreal, Toronto and Vancouver—to obtain some figures on culpable homicides committed in their area during 1972 and to the end of June, 1973. This is the period for which the government has not been able to furnish us with any statistics to assist our consideration of this bill.

The information I received makes interesting reading, although I shall not burden you with all the details. It is clear that only a small percentage of all the homicides committed were planned or premeditated. These usually involved some type of gang warfare, and drug trafficking was often a factor. Both alcohol and drugs figured very prominently in a large percentage of the cases and these usually related to sudden, violent quarrels, very often between relatives and friends. The percentage of policemen and prison guards killed was extremely low—in fact, no prison guards were listed. Toronto had the highest percentage by a small margin, but there one of the policemen died at the hands of two youths who were heavily under the influence of drugs at the time, and both of whom committed suicide shortly afterwards.

In all the crimes of murder which were committed in those four cities during that 18-month period, I would hesitate to look at one case and say with certainty that if that criminal knew beyond a doubt that he would die on the gallows for his crime, he would not have committed it. I wonder if anyone else could do otherwise.

Hon. Mr. Molson: Will the honourable senator permit a question?

Hon. Mrs. Neiman: Yes, certainly.

Hon. Mr. Molson: Are you aware of the figures from the City of Montreal for this year, that 33 out of 35 voluntary homicides were assessed as planned, premeditated gangland types? That is 94 per cent.

Hon. Mrs. Neiman: Senator Molson, the only thing I can say is that I have a letter in my possession with information that does not coincide with yours. We perhaps should compare the figures.

Hon. Mr. Molson: I think perhaps your figures are a little earlier than mine. Mine are up to the end of October, 1973.

Hon. Mrs. Neiman: Mine are up to the end of June. I do not think the figures should be all that greatly different, but we could compare them.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Summer is a better season.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Summer is an open season.

An Hon. Senator: A long, hot summer is the answer.

Hon. Mrs. Neiman: If Bill C-2 passes in its present form, then there is a heavy responsibility upon us to use every resource at our command, and the command of this government, to study the causes of violence to try to find solutions that are practical, meaningful and just, keeping in mind at all times the protection and security of society. I am prepared to accept that there are certain types of violent aggressors for whom no present-day medical knowledge is available, and that these types should be segregated for their natural lives, or until they can be helped.

We must begin to know why some men live violently and die violently. What are the reasons for these murders, and have we ever achieved anything by the executions which often follow them?

Honourable senators, I should like to conclude these overly long comments by reading you a passage from a booklet entitled "The Unexamined Death," which was written by Hans W. Mattick when the state of Illinois was considering the abolition of the death penalty. Mr. Mattick had many years' experience in the fields of penology and criminology having, among other duties, served as Assistant Warden of the Cook County jail and later on the Illinois Parole and Pardon Board, as well as a lecturer in criminology at the University of Chicago. He concludes his observations in this way:

> The venerable Socrates, who was executed in 399 B.C., maintained to the bitter end that "the unexamined life is not worth living." Our examination of capital punishment has led to the conclusion that the unexamined death is not worth dying.

If I may interject, I believe that within each one of us there is a reluctance to face death; but since we must, we all want it at least to be meaningful.

> Jesus Christ, who was executed at the beginning of our era, said, at the end, "Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do." We are still executing people in 1962, and there is still no evidence that we know what we are doing when we inflict the death penalty. Every rational inquiry into the relation between the death penalty and murder has demonstrated that capital punishment is irrelevant to the homicide rate. It is, however, a cruel, expensive, and demoralizing irrelevancy to maintain. Since capital punishment is indefensible on any rational grounds, and since the only purpose it can serve is that of an irrational vengeance that is no better than the original homicide to which it answers in kind, it is high time that the death penalty be abolished.

On motion of Senator O'Leary, debate adjourned.

COOPERATIVE CREDIT ASSOCIATIONS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from yesterday the adjourned debate on the motion of Senator Denis for the second reading of Bill C-183, to amend the Cooperative Credit Associations Act.

Hon. John M. Macdonald: It is not my intention to speak at this time on this bill. I understand there is some urgency in bringing it before the committee for a closer and more detailed examination. I did not have the opportunity of listening to the sponsor, but I have read his speech, and after doing so I think that we on this side can say that we are in general agreement with everything he said. As usual, he made an excellent presentation.

Consequently, any one from this side who wishes to comment on this bill will wait until it is before the committee or until third reading, so there is no objection to second reading at this time.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

On motion of Senator Denis, bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

● (1530)

CUSTOMS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from yesterday the adjourned debate on the motion of Senator Connolly (Ottawa West) for the second reading of Bill C-189, to amend the Customs Act.

Hon. John J. Connolly (Ottawa West): Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I wish to inform the Senate that if the Honourable Senator Connolly speaks now on this subject his speech will have the effect of closing the debate.

Hon. Mr. Walker: Honourable senators, before my honourable friend closes the debate, may I be permitted to ask him a question in connection with this legislation. He is a former leader of this house for whom I have the greatest respect, not only for his probity but for his efforts, and he was criticized in the Globe and Mail last week. It was suggested that he, as sponsor of this bill, had a conflict of interest which should have been declared. My question is a very simple one, and I ask it because I think this matter should be cleared up for the record. Does the sponsor consider that he has a conflict of interest in respect of this bill?

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Honourable senators, let me deal first with the question asked by Senator Walker. The possible conflict of interest to which he refers would arise from the fact that, as the article in question stated, I happen to be a director of Scott Misener Steamships Limited. I should have thought that not only would this not involve a conflict of interest, but would in fact be just the reverse.

When I explained the bill last week on second reading, I said it was designed primarily to deal with theft and smuggling so far as goods coming into Canada on ocean carriers are concerned. The Scott Misener Steamships Company does not operate on the high seas. It operates in the Seaway system, in the lakes and on the rivers. There are, however, times when Scott Misener Steamships touch upon American ports, and then proceed to Canadian ports. Let me point out that they do not carry packaged goods, although they could do so. They carry bulk cargoes because they are in the grain and iron ore trades.

Quite apart from that, honourable senators, I have no hesitation in saying that if this is good law for the protection of the revenue of Canada, and if it is in the public interest for ocean carriers to have the responsibility of accounting to customs for the goods that they carry, then I think it is equally proper that lake carriers should be bound in the same manner. I had no hesitation whatever in sponsoring this bill, even if it should place an additional onus on lake carriers, including Scott Misener Steamships. I hope that that answers Senator Walker's question.

Hon. Mr. Walker: Yes, it does.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Honourable senators, I should like at this time to thank Senator Grosart for his attention to this bill last evening. He described it as "a highly laudable exercise in responsibility by a minister or a department to collect all the revenue that is legally due to the public treasury." I think it is more than a laudable exercise. One of the basic responsibilities of the Minister of National Revenue is to see that every penny that is due to the Treasury and that can be collected should be collected. He should exert every ounce of energy he has to see that this is done.

Senator Grosart also said that, in the case of theft, the placing of legal responsibility on the person from whom the goods are stolen instead of on those who have the responsibility of preventing this kind of theft, is one of the problems arising out of this bill. In this connection I should like to say that goods which are laden upon a carrier abroad for delivery in Canada must, when they come to Canadian ports, be reported to Canadian customs and must pass through customs. The carrier therefore has the responsibility, once the goods are laden and brought to their destination in Canada, to deliver them either directly into customs custody, into a sufferance warehouse, into a bonded warehouse or to a bonded inland carrier to take them from whatever port they may arrive at to their ultimate destination. The ocean carrier and all these other people, including the warehousemen and inland carriers, have the responsibility of safeguarding the goods in their custody and control until they are dealt with by customs. This includes the duty to prevent theft. I am informed that theft in many cases has led to the avoidance of duty because the stolen goods have eventually found their way into commerce in Canada, without passing through customs.

Honourable senators, I feel the principle of this bill is a good one. A loophole existed in the law as it was, and in this connection I referred to a specific case when I explained the bill on moving its second reading. It has been suggested that the average loss of duty on goods that have been stolen and subsequently smuggled into Canada has been in the region of $100,000 per year. The law is that all goods entering Canada are subject to customs appraisal, and there should be no exception for goods smuggled into Canada. The people who have custody of those goods destined for Canada, or in Canada, some of which eventually go through customs, should have the responsibility of safeguarding those goods against theft. If this were not the case, the situation could exist where certain segments of the Canadian population could buy the smuggled goods at a cheaper rate while the rest of the population of the country would be paying higher prices for the duty-paid goods.

Senator Grosart also asked if the shipping companies were aware of this legislation. I was rather glad that I was not required to deal with this question last evening, but in the interval I have had the opportunity of discussing it with the deputy minister who has informed me that the shipping companies are aware of this legislation and none of them has raised any objection. He has further informed me that the normal way of dealing with the industry is to deal with the industry association.

● (1540)

The secretary of the industry association has been aware of this legislation since it was introduced, and was probably aware of it before that time. The views of the department have been fully put forward, and in fact the industry's understanding is that the law now proposed was always believed to be the law until the Exchequer Court case in question. That case raised the problem only in connection with the carriage of goods by water. The law applying to goods carried by rail, truck or aircraft is hereafter to be the same as that applicable to the carriage of goods by water.

In the event honourable senators desire this bill to be referred to committee, I will have no hesitation in so moving.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: I wonder if I may ask the honourable senator a question? I preface my question by saying that I accept immediately, of course, his statement that the shipping companies are aware of the bill, and have made no protest. However, may I ask him to use his influence with the chairman of the committee to which this bill will be referred to make sure that representatives of the companies are invited to appear before the committee? Again I say it is not that I doubt the fact, but I would like to find out why they have not complained.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): I shall suggest to the chairman of the committee that officers of the committees branch advise the industry, and give them an opportunity to make representations. That is, I take it, the sum and substance of the honourable senator's wishes.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

On motion of Senator Connolly (Ottawa West), bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

[Translation]

SCIENCE POLICY

CONSIDERATION OF VOLUME 3 OF REPORT OF SENATE SPECIAL COMMITTEE—DEBATE ADJOURNED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of Volume 3 of the Report of the Special Committee on Science Policy, tabled in the Senate on Tuesday, September 11, 1973.

Hon. Maurice Lamontagne: Honourable senators, the final edition of the third and last volume of the report of the Senate Special Committee on Science Policy was published barely a month ago. Therefore it is too early, I think, to know the response it will bring about in scientific circles and to assess its impact on government policies.

However, I am happy to note that it has attracted unexpected attention from the press across this country and that editorials on it were on the whole favourable. Among those written in French, I shall quote only the article by Mr. Claude Ryan published in Le Devoir, on September 13.

Mr. Ryan, as one would expect, does not approve of the role assigned to the provinces by the committee, in the field of science policy. He says that the committee—> —is led to a perception which, while originating from an obvious feeling of goodwill towards the provinces, prompts it to consider them as minor partners in the science policy effort.

I do not accept that interpretation of the report but I do not wish at the present time to disprove it.

Hon. Mr. Martin: What was Mr. Ryan's position as to the other two reports?

Hon. Mr. Lamontagne: I do not believe he commented on the other two volumes. The editor of Le Devoir also states, and I quote:

> When the Lamontagne committee affirms the indisputable responsibility of the central government in the field of scientific research... it stands on solid ground.

Concerning the committee, Mr. Ryan admits that it has shown—> —until the end a remarkable perseverance and a care for detail quite uncommon in bodies of that nature.

As for the third volume, Mr. Ryan suggests:

> —one can hardly foresee the catastrophic results, predicted by people who have found nothing but faults in the Lamontagne report. That document shows indeed a care for rationality which is related to concerns felt just as keenly in other industrialized countries. Inasmuch as—

—Mr. Ryan adds—

> —this report expresses poorly the fact of the two societies which constitute Canada, it provides, however, except for this factor, an interesting model of development for government action.

This testimony, in spite of its reservations, is comforting.

[English]

As I have just said, the third volume of the report of the Special Committee of the Senate on Science Policy has received wide coverage by the press throughout the country. More than a hundred pages have been written about it. I hope that my colleagues who will participate in this debate will refer to the most significant comments which have been made.

Volume 3 deals with government organization for science policy. It presents an overall plan for action, divided into three main parts. The first one defines the nature and role of an effective central machinery responsible for the formulation and implementation of an overall coherent science policy. The second part is devoted to the reorganization of departments and agencies responsible for specific or sectorial science policies. The third part deals with the interfaces of science policy, and covers federal-provincial relations, international relations, relations between the Canadian government and Parliament and, finally, relations between the government and the Canadian scientific and engineering community. I intend to concentrate my remarks today on the first part of the proposed overall plan.

The opening chapter reviews the four basic organizational models or systems which can be envisaged for science policy. In a decentralized or pluralistic model, government decisions related to science and technology are taken in isolation by individual departments and agencies under the broad supervision and control of the treasury. All countries which have been interested in developing a policy for science and in using science for policy in order to promote industrial and social innovations and growth have universally rejected this model or system. Two main factors account for the basic weakness of a pluralistic model. First, individual departments and agencies working in isolation cannot produce a balanced and coherent scientific effort capable of responding quickly and effectively to national problems and opportunities. Secondly, the treasury, or the Treasury Board in our country, is not equipped to correct the inherent deficiencies of a diffuse and disjointed decision-making process, or to provide overall planning and co-ordination which are essential to an efficient research and development effort.

● (1550)

These two observations are basic to the whole issue of government organization for science policy, and, for this reason, they deserve further elaboration. The extensive inquiry, conducted by the committee on the scientific activities of individual departments and agencies, has led us to the following six conclusions which we have listed in our report:

1. Government agencies with important policy and regulatory missions generally tend to neglect their research missions. On the other hand, agencies with small policy missions tend to overemphasize their research functions.

2. In a system relying exclusively on specific and isolated policies, the inevitable divisions of the federal administration produce gaps. New problems or opportunities do not always fit neatly into existing departments or agencies, which are often monuments to the past.

3. Research organizations, like others, seek to accomplish their missions completely by themselves. The striving for self-perpetuation leads to growth and an attempt at autonomy, not a move toward co-operation and co-ordination.

4. This natural inclination to self-sufficiency also leads to undesirable duplication, both internationally and domestically.

5. Like all organizations, government research agencies tend to be defensive rather than self-critical. This, combined with the tendency toward autonomy, produces paralysis rather than a capacity for creative adaptation to outside change.

6. Another weakness of isolated science policies is that they can unconsciously conflict, particularly in the sector of public support for industrial research and innovation.

These are some of the reasons why individual departments and agencies cannot produce in isolation a balanced and coherent scientific effort. The treasury is not in a position to correct these deficiencies. Mr. Simon Reisman, when Secretary of the Treasury Board, told the committee that government departments and agencies should be left free to determine their own specific science policies within the financial constraints of overall budgetary considerations. Mr. William Carey, who was for many years Assistant Director of the American Bureau of the Budget, with special responsibility for science and technology, has described the review process in this area as follows:

> To a large extent, the Bureau has to have confidence in the quality and responsibility of planning and project selection at the level of the supporting agencies.

His successor, Mr. Young, accepts this description of the review process of the bureau and admits that it is too superficial and negative. When I asked him why the United States bureau did not acquire the expertise to improve its review process of government scientific activities, he told me that it would not be possible to attract people of the highest calibre since they would be at the lower levels of the administrative structure, and that such a staff would constitute a rather unmanageable appendix to the main mission of the bureau, which is to exercise overall rather than detailed control over government expenditures.

The inevitable result of this pluralistic or decentralized model, as I have described it, is to produce a science policy by accident. This is certainly not good enough in an area which is so vital to the quantitative and qualitative well-being of our society, and which involved government expenditures exceeding $1.1 billion in 1972-73.

At the other extreme, we can envisage a centralized model which provides for a big department of science, designed to integrate and concentrate the bulk of government scientific activities under a single and powerful management. The United Kingdom is probably the best example of a country that initially adopted a centralized model. The Department of Scientific and Industrial Research, set up in 1916, was composed of research councils responsible for the support of academic research and of research labs, that were expected to serve the needs of ministries and industry.

The OECD examiners, in their report on Canada, firmly rejected this second organizational concept. They stated:

> We feel that it is important that large governmental research programs should be as close as possible to departments responsible for operational economic and regulatory policies for subjects such as agriculture, fisheries, forestry, mineral resources and defence. As already stressed, general allocation decisions with regard to research in such areas are essentially political rather than scientific, and the closest relationship must be sought between the creators and users of new knowledge. A central science ministry would inevitably tend to be operational rather than policy-oriented, and its necessary size could well hold bureaucratic dangers which can make creative research extremely difficult. Sound research divisions under strong scientific leadership within the mission-departments seem to us to be inherently more sound.

The experience of the United Kingdom confirms those views, and there has been in Great Britain, especially since 1964, a steady drift away from the first attempt to concentrate the bulk of government R & D activities in a single department. With the implementation of the Rothschild report, the British government is reverting to the old pluralism. Our committee is convinced, however, that this swing of the pendulum in the United Kingdom from extreme centralization to excessive pluralism is only temporary because, as I mentioned before, a decentralized system cannot properly deal with modern issues raised by science, technology and innovation.

A number of countries like Canada and the United States have selected a third approach, which we have described as the co-ordination model, to formulate and implement their science policies. This system, like the pluralistic model, relies mainly on the individual initiatives of departments and agencies, and on the overall control and supervision of the treasury; but it also involves a special central machinery composed of various advisory bodies intended to serve as a link between operating agencies, and between them and the treasury.

The central advisory machineries which gradually developed in the United States and Canada were remarkably similar. The President's Science Advisory Committee, set up to look after general science policy matters, had a role somewhat like that of the Science Council of Canada. The federal Council for Science and Technology was a group of government officials responsible for co-ordinating the R & D activities of government agencies, as the Advisory Panel on Scientific Policy was supposed to do in Canada. Finally, the Special Assistant to the President for Science and Technology, and the Office of Science and Technology, had a role similar to our Ministry of State for Science and Technology.

The Office of Science and Technology established in 1962 in the United States has had a longer life than our own Ministry of State, which was set up in the fall of 1971.

For this reason, the committee decided to report the views of impartial observers of the American scene. In spite of the complex advisory central machinery set up in the United States, Dr. Harvey Brooks of Harvard University wrote in 1968:

> There has never been any general theory of the relations of government and science which could be called a national science policy. Rather there was a series of science policies framed in the context of particular agencies in a manner largely incidental to their principal missions.

The clear implication here is that the central machinery set up in the United States was rather useless.

William Carey, with his long administrative experience in dealing with science and technology, observed that the United States organizational system for science policy "is managed as a network which is held together loosely, by the White House science office." He continued:

> It does not have a prime mover. Its decision-making patterns are pluralistic. As an institutional process, it is not responsive to standards of balance, purpose or priorities.

In 1970, the Subcommittee on Science, Research and Development of the United States Congress reported that "neither the National Science Foundation nor the Office of Science and Technology has occupied a position, within the Federal structure, of sufficient authority to make its actions and/or directives effective on a governmentwide basis." The report noted, "that the Office of Science and Technology is frequently used for tackling immediate crisis—or in a brush fire operation."

The frustration induced by the co-ordination approach in the United States has fallen heavily on science advisers to the President. Most of them, once they had left their posts, were so disenchanted with a purely advisory central organization that they went to the other extreme and publicly advocated a big department of science along the lines of the centralized model which I discussed earlier. One of them, Dr. Jerome B. Wiesner, stated:

> There is no single entity of government, that even has the responsibility for planning and monitoring the broad range of R & D activities, that are required to support the national goals. No wonder there is so little understanding of the purpose of the country's research efforts.

In January 1973, the President of the United States decided to dismantle the central advisory machinery which had been developed since 1950 and to replace it by a still weaker one which, according to Herbert Holloman, could bring the United States "back to the pre-World II period—when few agencies knew how to use science successfully."

On the basis of the American experience and of other evidence, our committee has concluded that the co-ordination model was largely ineffective and unstable, and that its poor results gradually led governments to take the easy solution and revert to the pluralistic system. While we recognize that wealthy superpowers may be able to sustain the great waste resulting from such an organization, we are convinced that countries such as Canada can ill afford an obviously inefficient system with their modest scientific and technological resources.

The Ministry of State for Science and Technology was set up primarily, according to its terms of reference, to "assist departments and agencies of the Government of Canada in the formulation and development of advice to the Governor in Council." When Mr. Drury announced its creation, he said that its "policy-formulating roles will be characterized by activities such as advising, monitoring, forecasting and co-ordinating." It is clear, therefore, that the ministry is expected to work as an advisory agency within the framework of the co-ordination model.

The committee has expressed its deep conviction that the ministry is being placed on a side road, and that it cannot participate in any significant and meaningful manner in the decision-making process.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Who said that?

Hon. Mr. Lamontagne: The committee has expressed that view.

As I said before, operating departments and agencies have an understandable inclination to accomplish their scientific missions unaided by others, to seek self-sufficiency and to be defensive rather than self-critical. They already resent the supervision and control Treasury Board is able to exert. When they see another outside agency trying to assist them and realize they have the right to refuse its assistance, they are likely to exercise that right.

Faced with this inimical environment, the ministry is bound to become more timid in its initiatives, to think twice before offering assistance that is not wanted, and to become frustrated and demoralized. As this process goes on, the organization is likely to lose its best people and fail to attract able replacements so that the quality of its services will decay. Departments and agencies will then be in a position to show that the ministry is useless. It will retire within itself and eventually disappear. The process will then be completed and the government will be back where it started 50 years ago. That is exactly what happened in the United States.

We are being told that an alternative procedure is being developed in Canada and that the staff of the Treasury Board is seeking, more and more, the advice of the ministry on scientific programs proposed by departments and agencies. This ad hoc arrangement may appear to be an improvement and succeed in extending the useful life of the ministry for a while. It should be noted, however, that the Bureau of the Budget in the United States was also seeking the advice of the Office of Science and Technology, but this informal process did not prevent the destruction of the office after 10 years of existence.

In this context, the improvement provided by this new ad hoc relationship between Treasury Board and the ministry may be quite misleading. It is a relationship between master and servant, based on an informal arrangement and on the goodwill of the board's staff. The board keeps complete control over the size of the ministry's budget and establishment, and consults the ministry only when it so wishes. This means that the process of consultation is bound to be arbitrary, piecemeal and very likely to be limited to the scientific merit of new major budgetary proposals. Under such conditions, how can the ministry operate efficiently as a useful and reliable adviser when it has to appraise specific new proposals without having a detailed knowledge of the total picture, including the merits of existing programs, without a set of scientific and financial priorities and without having the opportunity to put forward alternative proposals in other areas which are competing for funds? Finally, the board quite naturally keeps its freedom to accept or reject the ministry's advice, and to consult again with departments which have put forward proposals that have not received the support of the ministry.

As it can be readily seen, this informal relationship between the Treasury Board and the ministry cannot work properly or for long. It makes the ministry a mere adjunct and a fire brigade of the board. It even prevents the ministry from performing its advisory function efficiently and independently. If that relationship is maintained, the ministry will soon look like a futile nuisance to everyone involved, and the Canadian government will be looking again for a new organizational system for science policy, or it may revert in desperation and by default to the pluralistic model, which would be a tragedy for Canada.

There is a better alternative to this informal arrangement within the framework of the co-ordination models. It would be possible to formalize this ad hoc arrangement and to require the board to consult the ministry, not only on a piecemeal basis when departments and agencies submit specific scientific programs and projects but also on the total government involvement with science and technology, at the beginning of the budgetary review procedure when departmental estimates and forecasts are first submitted. The board would then separate scientific activities from other programs and send them to the ministry for review and advice. Under this alternative, the government would arrive at a science budget, total scientific activities could be systematically reviewed and assessed in detail and as a package, and the ministry could make its input at an early and decisive stage of the preparation of the budget.

● (1610)

I readily agree that this alternative proposal would be an improvement over the past and present situation. I do not believe, however, that this formula can provide a stable, satisfactory and final solution to the problem of government organization for science policy. It would still leave the ministry as a mere adjunct to the Treasury Board, which would keep the authority to approve the science budget not only as a package but also in its detailed components.

Let us look at this proposal more closely. Ministers who are members of Treasury Board usually represent regional interests and may give a low priority to science policy and activities. Moreover, they are already too busy in the exercise of their responsibility for controlling and supervising overall government expenditures and staff management to have the time to examine carefully and in detail the content of the science budget. This means that even under this more formal arrangement the Ministry of State for Science and Technology would be, for all practical purposes, under the complete control of the board's staff. This staff is also very busy, and it would tend almost inevitably to appraise the detailed assessment submitted by the ministry in purely financial terms, which would bring us back to the present situation.

The ministry could play a meaningful decision-making role if Treasury Board were to accept its advice automatically. But then the board would have given up its specific responsibility and become the rubber stamp of the ministry—an unlikely role for any agency. It is more likely that Treasury Board would decide to discharge its obligation in a fully responsible manner, which would mean it would have to review and re-assess the assessment submitted by the ministry. To do that, it would have to employ its own science policy advisers and seek the reaction of departments and agencies to the ministry's assessment. The whole review process would then start all over again, merely adding another link to an already long and frustrating decision-making process. In effect, there would be two treasury boards for science and technology, one advisory, the other with authority.

Some people might be satisfied with this alternative proposal, not so much because they feel it would work, but because they are afraid to rock the boat if they insist on obtaining a more meaningful role for the ministry. They feel that this compromise would be more easily acceptable, and they hope that if it proves unworkable after a trial period it would still be possible to change the system again and to directly involve the ministry in the decision-making process.

Our committee takes the opposite view. We feel that, even under this improved version of the advisory system, the ministry will not be able for long to survive as a useful, credible and viable entity, and that after the trial period its reputation and credibility will be so low that nobody will want to give it a more meaningful role and more authority. To be useful in this vital policy area, it is urgent to give to the ministry a really challenging role to enable it to attract and retain competent people.

The time has come to face the situation frankly and realistically. Since 1916, the Canadian government has been experimenting with various modifications of the co-ordination model. They have not worked, and our country's innovative performance has remained poor. Are we going to try another variation of the same model to find, five years from now, that we have failed again? I hope not. I feel that the best way to rock the boat is to try to improve the status quo, while preserving its basic features. When Mr. Drury announced the creation of the Ministry of State for Science and Technology in 1971, he presented it as "the necessary first step." The committee is convinced that the next step, which should be taken now, is to abandon the co-ordination model with its basic and unworkable advisory feature, and to give real authority to the central machinery for science policy.

Having rejected the decentralized, the centralized and the co-ordination systems, the committee has put forward a fourth approach, described as the concerted action model which, in our view, retains the main advantages of the three other systems without their shortcomings. On the basis of our inquiry, and of numerous consultations with experts in this area, we came to the conclusion that the ideal organizational system for science policy had to meet two basic requirements.

First, it should maintain a diffuse government organization for science, technology and innovation. If science and technology are to respond to national needs and opportunities, the functional responsibility of individual departments and agencies must be preserved. This requirement is met by pluralism and the co-ordination model, but this is precisely where a centralized system fails.

Secondly, the ideal organization also requires a strong and effective central machinery with specific authority to review, assess and approve the scientific activities of departments and agencies within the broad guidelines determined by Treasury Board. Without such a strong central machinery, the diffuse effort of departments and agencies is likely to be unco-ordinated, to lead to duplication and gaps, and to neglect important areas involving multi-disciplinary and inter-agency programs. This second requirement is met by a centralized system, but this is precisely where pluralism and the co-ordination model fail.

In our view, only the concerted action model fully meets these two requirements. It would involve a new budgetary procedure for government expenditures devoted to scientific activities. Since this new procedure constitutes the most important recommendation of our whole report, honourable senators will allow me, I am sure, although it is late, to describe it in detail, as we outlined it in Volume 3. It will take about two minutes. The new approach would involve the following six steps:

1. Departments and agencies would continue to prepare their budgetary proposals as they do now, except that they would separate their scientific activities from their operational programs. This would not mean a significant departure from present practice, because departments and agencies already have to isolate their scientific activities at a later stage to report them to Statistics Canada. Putting them in a separate package while they are still in the form of proposals or estimates would bring the obvious advantage of enabling heads of departments and agencies to look at their respective scientific programs more closely, and to exercise more effective scrutiny and control before they decided to continue current activities or initiate new programs.

2. The science budget or the estimates related to scientific activities prepared by departments and agencies would be submitted to the Ministry of State for Science and Technology for review and assessment, instead of being presented to the staff of Treasury Board. For the government as a whole and for Treasury Board in particular, this procedure would represent a significant improvement over the present situation. Supervision by an impartial group of science policy advisers and managers would offer a better guarantee that waste and undesirable duplication were minimized, and that new opportunities were not missed. For heads of departments and agencies, who are often too busy with their operational programs and not adequately trained in evaluating scientific activities, the proposed procedure would provide a safeguard and a protection. They would know that their own appraisal of a specialized area to which they could not devote much of their time would be checked by skilled people whose only interest would be in maximizing the value of the R & D input to the policy objectives of their department or agency. For competent and motivated scientists and engineers in government establishments, the new system would guarantee a fair hearing, which would naturally give preference to promising programs and projects over those with a lower priority.

[Hon. Mr. Lamontagne.]

• (1620)

3. Once the science budget of individual departments and agencies had been reviewed and assessed by the Ministry of State for Science and Technology, it would be submitted for approval to a special interministerial committee presided over by the Minister of State for Science and Technology. The President of Treasury Board would be an ex officio member of this new cabinet committee, and its other members should be ministers responsible for important science budgets. This would give the ministers the opportunity to become better acquainted with the scientific activities for which they are directly responsible, and see them in the perspective of the overall government involvement with science and technology. This would undoubtedly lead to a significant improvement in the contribution of science to policy. In the course of its examination, the Cabinet committee would determine the overall government science budget, including the R & D activities.

4. The science budget approved by the interministerial committee on science, technology and innovation would be presented as a package, or as if it were the estimates of an ordinary department, for Treasury Board's consideration. If the board were to find the science budget was too high in the light of the overall government priorities and budgetary constraints, it would be expected to use its "pair of scissors" as it does for the estimates of an ordinary department. If the Minister of State for Science and Technology, who should be an ex officio member of the board, were to disagree with the board's decision, he should have the right, in his capacity as chairman of the interministerial committee, to appeal before the full Cabinet.

5. If the final decision was to cut the science budget, it would be the responsibility of the Cabinet committee on science and technology to determine how and where the cuts should be made. The advice of the ministry and its overall knowledge of government priorities and programs in science and technology would put the Cabinet committee in a better position than individual departments and agencies or Treasury Board to cut the least desirable programs.

6. The approved estimates of departments and agencies consolidated in the overall science budget would be published separately, as is now done in some countries. This would give Parliament and the public a better idea than they now have of the size and distribution of the government's scientific activities.

This procedure is not as revolutionary as it may appear. On the one hand, it would not reduce Treasury Board's normal control over the whole expenditure budget under the planning, programming and budgeting system, which would leave departments and agencies the freedom to determine their priorities within the constraints of general budgetary considerations. On the other hand, it would give the Ministry of State for Science and Technology an effective leverage to supervise and assess the formulation and execution of sectoral science policies and give it general oversight of scientific activities, thus ensuring the macroscopic view needed to complement the microscopic approach that departments and agencies have to take.

In addition, the new procedure would be relatively easy to introduce. It would not even require new legislation. The proposed interministerial committee on science and technology can be created by a Cabinet decision. Its establishment would certainly represent a substantial improvement over the present situation. It is rather surprising indeed that policy issues raised by science, technology and innovation are now being considered by a Cabinet committee which has to deal also with culture, information and communications.

The change in the role of the Ministry of State for Science and Technology could be made by a simple modification of the order in council defining its terms of reference. At present, the minister is expected to "assist departments and agencies of the Government of Canada in the formulation and development of advice to the Governor in Council." This wording should be changed to require the minister to "review and assess the formulation and development of advice by departments and agencies of the Government of Canada to the Governor in Council."

The system which I have just described fully meets the two basic requirements of the ideal organization that I mentioned before. It leaves the main initiative to individual departments and agencies. It provides a meaningful role to the central machinery and enables it to contribute a direct and necessary input of impartial and general oversight to the decision-making process. Moreover, it does not weaken the overall control of Treasury Board over government expenditures. It does not make the budgetary review procedure more lengthy.

The special examination of the science budget could be done in parallel with the review of other government expenditures, because the two assessments would not involve the same people. On the whole, the proposed special procedure would be the best way to ensure that Canadians will derive the maximum benefits from an optimum investment in science, technology and innovation. Our committee has strongly recommended this new approach for the formulation and implementation of science policy.

The government now has a unique opportunity to be bold, imaginative and realistic. This occasion may not present itself again before another ten years, when it may be too late. Professor Miles of Princeton University stated a few years ago:

> Reorganizations are not usually imaginative and drastic to cope with tomorrow's problems—only with the worst of today's problems. Rarely is a major reorganization pattern developed and installed in a federal department or agency which is based on meeting future needs instead of merely alleviating yesterday's and today's pains. In consequence, by the time the typical reorganization is put into effect, it is already out of date.

The committee has presented an overall organization plan for science policy "to cope with tomorrow's problems." We hope that the government will not resort to the typical reorganization designed to alleviate yesterday's pains and which will be out of date as soon as it is put into effect.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Honourable senators, on behalf of Senator Grosart, I move the adjournment of this debate. At the same time, Senator Grosart asked me to express to Senator Lamontagne his deep regret that he was unable to remain in the chamber to hear him, due to the fact that he has another meeting which he must attend.

On motion of Senator Macdonald, for Senator Grosart, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Thursday, November 15, 1973

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Hon. Paul Martin tabled:

Report of the National Film Board of Canada, including its accounts and financial statements certified by the Auditor General, for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1973, pursuant to section 20(2) of the National Film Act, chapter N-7, R.S.C., 1970.

COOPERATIVE CREDIT ASSOCIATIONS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Hon. Salter A. Hayden, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, reported that the committee had considered Bill C-183, to amend the Cooperative Credit Associations Act, and had directed that the bill be reported without amendment.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Langlois moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. Leopold Langlois: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), I move that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until Monday, November 19, 1973, at 8 o'clock in the evening.

Honourable senators, before the question is put I should like to add a word of explanation. To my mind this adjournment is justified by the fact that on Monday evening we will have to suspend debate on Bill C-2 in order to consider the joint resolution on the participation of a Canadian peacekeeping force in the Middle East.

It is important and expedient that our debate on Bill C-2 be disposed of next week, if at all possible, and in order to achieve that end I think we will need this additional day of sitting.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: Might I ask Senator Langlois a question? What is the basis of your assurance that we will have the resolution on Monday night?

Hon. Mr. Langlois: We are fairly safe in assuming that we will get this joint resolution by Monday evening. It is an assessment, of course. I have already warned the house on previous occasions about my bad record in prophesying what will happen in the other place. With that reservation, it is fairly safe to say that this joint resolution will be before us on Monday evening.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: I thought perhaps the honourable senator had some inside information or some influence on the other side. That is why I asked the question.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: As my honourable friend knows, influence on the other side is shared by quite a few groups. It is pretty hard to be in the confidence of any majority group on the other side.

Hon. Mr. Beaubien: I should like to ask Senator Langlois about the following week. Are we changing our pattern all of a sudden so that we will be sitting on Monday evenings?

Hon. Mr. Langlois: No, we are not changing our pattern. It all depends on what comes to us from the other place. We will make our decision in the light of events as they take place next week.

Hon. Mr. Beaubien: Well, the peacekeeping force is going to go forward whether we sit Monday night or not. So what else is new!

Hon. Mr. Molson: If we sit Monday evening is it proposed that we sit Tuesday evening as well?

Hon. Mr. Langlois: There again it will depend on the progress made. I hope we will not have to sit next Thursday night, but we will be sitting on Tuesday, Wednesday and Thursday, until the usual adjournment time on Thursday. We hope we will have concluded this debate by that time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Mr. Flynn: On division.

Motion agreed to, on division.

ENERGY RESOURCES

EXPORT OF CANADIAN CRUDE OIL TO THE UNITED STATES—QUESTION AND ANSWER

Hon. Mr. Molson: Honourable senators, I should like to direct a question to the Leader of the Government. I wonder if he could inform the Senate of the volumes of crude oil presently being shipped to the United States, and possibly what changes have occurred since the shortages or the crisis created by the Middle East situation?

This house does not permit preambles to questions, but I think honourable senators will forgive me if I say that the reason I ask this question is that there have been such conflicting statements, both here and in the United States, within the last few days. There have been some very strong expressions of dissatisfaction in the House of Representatives and/or the Senate of the United States, and we have had different statements in this country. If the leader could clarify the situation, I think he would be performing a great service.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I doubt that he can.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Honourable senators, Senator Molson spoke to me earlier this morning about this and I called the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, Mr. Macdonald. As a result I am in a position to provide a table that will show the exports for the various months of 1972 up to the end of December.

To explain this latter statement, I should point out that each month the National Energy Board makes a determination of Canadian crude oil production, of the requirements by Canadian refineries from this production, and, as a residual, the amount which is surplus to Canadian requirements. This surplus is then available for the United States export market, and the board normally grants licences for this amount.

The table, which I ask leave to have printed in today's Hansard in answer to the question, shows the amount of crude oil that has been licensed for export to the United States. The figures shown are the figures month by month for 1973 and 1972, together with the percentage increase, or decrease when shown on the table, over 1972. For comparison, the average monthly figures for 1971 and 1970 are also shown.

Hon. Mr. Molson: I wonder if the honourable senator would indicate to us, so that we know today, whether there has been any substantial decrease indicated in more recent months?

Hon. Mr. Martin: The estimate for instance, for December 1973, a licence for which has already been provided, shows a decrease over December of 1972. Likewise, for November there is shown a slight decrease over November of last year. In some cases it is up. However, rather than take up the time of the Senate now, I would ask leave to have the table printed in today's Hansard.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(For table see appendix A, p. 1154.)

Hon. Mr. Martin: Although Senator Molson has not asked for this information, I think it would help to get a clearer picture if there were also printed to today's Hansard the "Current Canadian Oil Supply and Demand Fact Sheet," which I think was printed in Hansard in the other place, and likewise a document on oil stocks on hand. I think this might be a helpful supplementary.

Hon. Mr. Molson: Thank you.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(For text of fact sheet see appendix B, p. 1154.)

OIL SHIPMENTS—NAVIGATION AND POLLUTION HAZARDS—QUESTIONS

Hon. Mr. Lang: Honourable senators, I have several questions I should like to direct to the Leader of the Government on this subject of oil. I did not reach him this morning in time to speak to him; he had gone to a Cabinet meeting. He will probably want to take these questions as notice. I hope honourable senators will be indulgent if I elaborate the background to these questions.

● (1410)

In July of this year the Canada-United States Interparliamentary Group met in Washington, D.C. in emergency meeting, called at the behest of Canadian parliamentarians concerned with potential pollution in the event that ships were damaged or wrecked in the Strait of Juan de Fuca while carrying oil from Valdez in Alaska, when the Alaskan pipeline is completed, to Cherry Point in the State of Washington. Deep concern was shown at that meeting particularly by members of the House of Commons from the West Coast. Following upon that meeting, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources even suggested that if the Americans would haul that oil farther south and not bring it into the Strait of Juan de Fuca, we might be able to bring oil to the Cherry Point refineries.

In the last few days the government has announced that it will attempt to move Canadian oil from the West Coast through the Strait of Juan de Fuca, through the Panama Canal, to points in Eastern Canada. In the light of that, I should like to ask the Leader of the Government the following questions:

1. What quantity of oil does the government expect will be shipped during the next six months through the Strait of Juan de Fuca and destined for Eastern Canadian ports?

2. Under what flag or flags are those ships likely to be sailing?

3. Will those ships be by design or installation less vulnerable to oil spill hazards than the average single-hulled tanker?

4. What steps, if any, is the government taking or contemplating to minimize the navigational dangers involved in the passage of those ships through the Strait of Juan de Fuca?

That is my first question.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Your first group of questions.

Hon. Mr. Lang: My second question arises from the same meeting held in Washington. After we returned, I was one of several senators who spoke here on what had transpired. Among other things, I referred to a speech made by Congressman McEwen on the crisis situation created in Northern New York State by the refusal of our National Energy Board to grant a licence to re-export or transship Venezuelan oil into the Ogdensburg, New York, area.

After speaking about that, I learned that such a licence or permit had been granted and I assumed that the matter had been satisfactorily resolved. I was satisfied at the time that the refusal of such a permit was bureaucratic nonsense because it was not Canadian oil that was involved but Venezuelan oil. It was not oil we would otherwise have to use ourselves, it was really transshipped, purely for geographical logistics, through Canada. Much to my dismay I read in the Toronto Globe and Mail this morning, "Congressman 'troubled' by refusal of Canadian permit for tanker." I would ask honourable senators to have a look at that article, reporting on Mr. McEwen's appearance before the American Congressional Subcommittee on Inter-American Affairs. Evidently the ship is now being diverted at sea, although it originally was going to Montreal. Permits were refused by our National Energy Board to transship the oil at Montreal. The problem seems to be as bad as when first raised last August. In view of that situation, I ask the Leader of the Government the following questions:

(1) Has the National Energy Board denied permits which would allow the transshipment at Montreal of Venezuelan oil to be used for domestic heating in Northern New York State, such transshipments to be effected either by

(a) transfer from oceanic tanker to seaway draft vessels,

(b) landing in Canada for temporary storage pending forwarding,

(c) landing in Canada for temporary storage in bond pending forwarding?

(2) If so, for each instance under (a), (b) and (c) above, under what authority, how often, under what circumstances and for what reasons?

(3) If so, to what extent, if any, has each or all such denials ameliorated the heating oil shortage in Canada?

Hon. Mr. Martin: Honourable senators, I am going to take Senator Lang's question, or his series of questions, or his chapters, as notice.

CRIMINAL CODE (CONTROL OF WEAPONS AND FIREARMS)

BILL TO AMEND—POINT OF ORDER

Hon. Mr. Lang: Honourable senators, I rise now on a point of order. Some months ago a bill dealing with the control of weapons and firearms was introduced in the Senate by Senator Cameron. My recollection is that this bill received second reading and was referred to committee, but it seems to have disappeared from view. Could the leader give us any intimation as to what stage the bill is at now and when it might receive further consideration?

Hon. Mr. Walker: You are safe. The bill did not go through.

Hon. Mr. Laird: Honourable senators, in the absence of the Chairman of the Legal and Constitutional Committee, Senator Goldenberg, I can tell you that the committee has been very, very occupied, to put it mildly, with the preparation of its report on the parole system. For that reason we have not been able to deal further, up to now, with the weapons and firearms bill.

THE SENATE

PATROL OF PARKING AREA—QUESTION

Hon. Mr. Argue: Honourable senators, I have a question I should like to put to the Honourable Senator Smith as Chairman of the Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration Committee. It has to do with the constable who looks after our Senate parking space. It has been brought to my attention by a number of people in this building that that particular constable stays outside continuously for the whole of his shift, which I understand lasts for eight hours or more, depending on the sitting of the Senate. I should think that it is a hardship for any person to carry on that work without relief during inclement weather. I am wondering if consideration might be given to having some relief provided, or having these parking duties shared.

So that there is no misunderstanding, I want to make it perfectly clear that the constable in question, Cst. Martel, has not protested, but others have felt that this is not a humane way to treat one of our staff.

Hon. Mr. Smith: Honourable senators, the question having been raised, it is hardly necessary for me to say that this will be attended to by our staff; I can assure the honourable senator that the matter will be investigated, and when we come back next week he will be informed about what is being done about the situation. I thank him for bringing this matter up.

CRIMINAL CODE (CAPITAL PUNISHMENT)

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE CONTINUED

The Senate resumed from yesterday the adjourned debate on the motion of Senator McIlraith for second reading of Bill C-2, to amend the Criminal Code.

Hon. Mr. Deschatelets: Honourable senators, before Senator O'Leary, who adjourned this debate, proceeds, may I be permitted to speak for just one minute on a question of privilege, to answer a point raised by Senator Hastings yesterday? Senator Hastings referred to a part of my speech of last Thursday, having to do with the case of a convicted murderer who had been released and who had committed a second murder. I should like to refer to Senator Hastings' remarks as reported at page 1127 of Senate Hansard. He said it is unfortunate that inaccurate and misleading information has reflected on the Parole Board.

• (1420)

I knew that there was at least one case when I made that statement last Thursday, but I was speaking without notes at the time. I now refer Senator Hastings to a speech in the House of Commons by the Solicitor General, the Honourable Warren Allmand reported at page 7013 of the Commons Hansard, part of which reads as follows:

> The recidivism rate of murderers is among the lowest of all types of crime. Indeed, in the entire history of Canada there have been only three individuals who have ever been convicted a second time of murder.

I checked this morning with an officer of the Parole Board, and this statement is accurate. If Senator Hastings is interested, the names of the accused involved, and also the dates on which the first murder and the second murder were committed, could be obtained.

Hon. Mr. Hastings: Honourable senators, I should like to make a brief reply to Senator Deschatelets. If Senator Deschatelets reads my remarks he will see that I said—I know I am accurate in this—that no man who has committed murder, and has subsequently been released by the National Parole Board, has committed murder again.

There have been incidents such as the Solicitor General mentioned involving people not released by the National Parole Board but by other agencies—there are other government agencies that have power to do this. My point was that no man having been convicted on a charge of murder, and subsequently released by the National Parole Board, has been found guilty of a subsequent offence of murder.

Hon. M. Grattan O'Leary: Honourable senators, in rising to speak to Bill C-2, I am well aware that nothing that I can say here or will say here can or will affect the consciences, the convictions or the votes of the members of this house. But I did feel it incumbent upon me to rise and say that I shall vote against the bill, and to try to tell you, with a permissible economy of words, why I shall do so.

I am an abolitionist; I am a total abolitionist without qualification whatsoever, and, honourable senators, this bill does not abolish capital punishment. This bill, in fact, entrenches capital punishment, to a limited extent at all events. I cannot make house with that.

As one grows older, as one wistfully watches a setting sun, with the serenity of the evening star an only consolation, one is bound to reflect more and more upon the sanctity of human life. I do not believe that the state should drag itself down to the level of the murderer regardless of that sanctity. I know that I shall be told—and I am sure my distinguished deskmate will be one of the first to tell me—that in voting against this bill I shall be voting against the wishes of public opinion of Canada. My answer to that is that I refuse to surrender my conscience to the Gallup Poll. If we are going to take the views of pollsters, or the alleged findings of pollsters, to determine what we shall do and say here, then I see no reason at all for the existence of this Senate.

I shall be asked, I am sure, if this house should vote against this bill, should reject it in toto, what would happen then? I have no clear answer to that, but I suspect that that would result in Parliament's having to enact a new bill doing away with capital punishment altogether. Speaking of what is known as public opinion, I remember Lord Grey, the former Sir Edward Grey, who, when he retired from Parliament after nearly half a century there, wrote in his memoirs that looking back on his parliamentary career he had to come to the conclusion that all the mistakes he had made were due to his belief that public opinion was a great statesman, subsequently finding out that this was not so at all. In any event, whether there is public opinion against this or not—I am not sure I can take the words of pollsters—I would still vote as I intend.

I repeat, the sanctity of life to me means that it must be observed by the state as well as by the murderer. It is one thing for a man to commit a murder in passion, or with a deranged mind, or under some other terrible circumstances, but surely it is a different thing when the state coldly and deliberately decides to put the hangman's noose on a man. Surely this is a relic of barbarism.

I recall that in her memoirs Lady Haldane, the wife of the great and distinguished Lord Chancellor of Great Britain, wrote that she remembered that when she was a girl an eight-year old boy in her district was hanged for stealing a turnip. I have no doubt at all that those who advocated hanging or tried to justify it said that it was a deterrent for those who might go on stealing turnips. Surely that was a relic of barbarism, and there is not one iota of evidence to show or prove that hanging, or capital punishment by some other means, is a deterrent. I know it can be attempted to prove almost anything by quoting statistics or the Scriptures, but those events took place in a different day and era and mean nothing at all.

I am sorry to have to take the position I am taking, because I feel that many in this house do not believe what I am saying and have other convictions, which I respect. However, honourable senators, in my opinion it is an awesome responsibility for Parliament at this time to say that in this age and generation, in this society of ours, a man or a woman may be hanged if he or she commits a certain crime.

● (1430)

In my view there can be no degrees of murder; there can be no categories of punishment for murder. You ask me what is my alternative, and there again I have no easy answer. I am not dealing with certainties. I do not know. But I do believe that it is not beyond the wit and competence of the Parliament of Canada to devise some more humane punishment or deterrent, call it what you will, than the use of the noose.

There is the fallibility of human beings, the fallibility of judges, and the fallibility of juries. Even now, 100 years after the assassination of D'Arcy McGee, the experts say they are not sure, they cannot determine with any accuracy whether the bullet that killed McGee was actually fired by Whelan. If all the forensic experts, if all the legal experts, say they are not sure what happened in that particular case, how can we be sure at any time that a man convicted of murder and hanged for it really has not been hanged unjustly. A terrible responsibility hinges upon what we call capital punishment.

I am sorry, honourable senators, to have to speak in this way. However, I must say—I am not speaking as an authority—that the debate in this house on this bill reflects tremendous credit on the Senate. I have read the debates on capital punishment in the British House of Commons and House of Lords. I am sure that in skill, sincerity and ability, and clear and forceful expression, none of those debates exceeded the speeches we have heard in this house during the past week.

I know that comparisons are odious—perhaps I should use the word "odorous"—but I should like especially to mention the first speech delivered in this house on this question by Senator Molson. It was an excellent example of what is meant by debate. I refer to his economy of words, logic, lucidity and moderation.

I should like also to mention the speech delivered yesterday by Senator Hastings, which was deeply moving, and the speech of Senator Neiman, which was one of the finest speeches I have heard in the house for years.

I cannot myself add to the quality of speeches of that kind, but I cannot refrain from saying, as an abolitionist, who believes sincerely in the abolition of capital punishment without any qualification whatsoever, that I must oppose the bill. I do so because it does not abolish capital punishment. It entrenches capital punishment. I oppose it also because I believe the bill is inconsistent, illogical and a relic of the past. For those reasons I shall vote against Bill C-2.

Hon. Paul Martin: Honourable senators, I agree with Senator O'Leary on some points. As he said, this has been a very responsible debate, reflecting the convictions and consciences of honourable senators. I am sure we all agree that the speakers to whom he referred have maintained a high standard of debate on this important issue.

I have followed the debate in both houses. I carefully studied the speech of Senator McIlraith, the sponsor of this bill. I consider it to be well worth reading. For content it will take its place among the most comprehensive and succinct speeches made on this subject, certainly from the point of view of the law and of one who had the responsibility, as Solicitor General, of administering the law.

I should like also to compliment those who have taken part in the debate, regardless of their point of view. Of course, I include in that tribute the speech made on Tuesday by Senator Langlois, the deputy leader. The fact that we, sitting together, can take different positions on this matter clearly indicates the independence of each honourable senator on this issue.

Admittedly capital punishment is a difficult question for each of us to resolve in our conscience. It is an issue which has occupied the attention of Canadians particularly since 1962. From then until 1967, when the forerunner of the present bill was passed, it was evident that opinions were divided, that there was support for both abolition and retention of the death penalty. There is still a division on this issue, a division which is found in other countries where, with zeal and passion, the subject has been considered.

The question to be resolved in our minds is that of a balance between public safety and execution of a criminal. Does capital punishment serve society by affording greater protection? That is the question asked by proponents of the bill and by those who are against it. I support the bill—

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Surprise.

Hon. Mr. Martin: —not merely because I am a member of the government, but because I do not believe in capital punishment. In that respect I agree with Senator O'Leary. I do not support the principle of a life for a life. Here I take issue with Senator Manning. We agree that measures must be taken to protect society against acts of murder or violence. Those who support capital punishment, who are opposed to this bill, will recognize that all who support it appreciate the fact that measures are required to punish murderers and those who cause violence and create disorder. That is not the issue before us.

Honourable senators have affirmed that society must be protected. Of course society must be protected. An abolitionist like Senator O'Leary, even though not a proponent of the bill, wishes to protect society. I, as a supporter of the bill, am no less interested in protecting society. Some improvements in that regard have already been taken and are embodied in the bill. I refer to section 3, and to some of its subsections, to which Senator Hastings has taken exception.

Those who advocate the abolition of capital punishment in the form provided by the bill are as concerned—let this be clear—that measures be taken to provide protection against persons who cause violence, or who take a life through a criminal act, as are those who favour retention of capital punishment.

[Hon. Mr. O'Leary.]

● (1440)

My colleague, Senator Langlois, an able lawyer, strongly advocated the need for opposing this bill, and among his grounds was the need for protecting society. I am sure if I recognize the sincerity and the depth of his conviction in that regard he will not deny the same to me. He and I and all civilized men want steps to be taken to protect society and to punish those who commit the act of murder.

The question is as to the kind of punishment. I believe that the death penalty, as a measure for the prevention of crime, failed in its objective even in the days when it received its strongest support. I was impressed with what Senator McIlraith said, especially since he is a former Solicitor General, regarding the deterrent value of capital punishment. I do not overlook what he said as to the deterrent value in so far as prison guards and policemen are concerned, even though I might find difficulty in agreeing with him on the retention of capital punishment regarding these two exceptions which are in the bill. Senator McIlraith has administered this act. He has said that statistics do not help us. This is my view, and always has been.

Most speakers in this debate, I feel, are of the view that the statistics do not prove the deterrent value of capital punishment. Even the royal commission in England which examined the question was not inclined to believe that statistics would be helpful.

David Hume, the nineteenth century historian, records that in sixteenth century England over 100,000 persons were sent to the gallows. The criminal, when he planned and executed a crime, knew full well in those days that the sure result of detection, arrest and conviction was dangling at the end of a rope. He had no illusions and still, as I emphasized, there is no record that criminal activity diminished. In Britain in the early nineteenth century the law was no less severe. Almost all crimes were punishable by death. If a man stole five shillings or more from a shop he was hanged. If he damaged Westminster Bridge, or took a fish from a pond, he was hanged. And what was accomplished by this excessive severity? Other than the determination of juries not to convict those brought to trial, nothing.

I agree with Senator McIlraith. I do not believe statistics really help us in coming to a conclusion on this question. I do not believe that you can prove the deterrent effect statistically. It is not obvious that in the past capital punishment reduced crime. I do not think it is any more so today.

One senator referred to the increase in murder in one of our provinces. I believe it was Senator Molson. I live next to the American border, next to one of the largest cities in the United States where last year just fewer than 700 murders took place. Let no one tell me that I am not concerned as to the consequences of murder. Anyone who has had that experience and who comes from my home city, seeing this across the border, could not help but feel very concerned about this problem.

But I am not convinced that the form of punishment proposed by those who are opposed to this bill, or who are opposed to abolition, is a remedy for the situation that exists across the border not far from my home city. I believe, however, that there should be punishment, and adequate punishment. But what I am arguing, and what this bill provides, is that capital punishment is not the kind of punishment that will fit this situation. I do not believe that the death penalty is more effective in deterring would-be murderers than the prospect of life imprisonment. While we seemingly cannot measure the deterrent value of either penalty, I believe that changes in our parole regulations, providing for a longer prison term, would have as much deterrent effect as the death penalty.

For capital punishment to be warranted, the cost of imposing it would have to be offset by an additional increment in deterrence. Those costs, in my estimation, are the risk of executing an innocent person, the opportunity for judicial discrimination as between charged persons in imposing the penalty, and the possibility of rehabilitating the murderer.

I do not overlook, let me say again, the danger to society, to the community. These dangers can be guarded against just as effectively, however, as is argued by those supporting the death penalty. No convincing proof has been offered that the death penalty markedly reduces the number of murders. How, then, can we justify retaining this form of punishment?

What this bill does, honourable senators, in its admittedly imperfect way, is to continue the work done in the nineteenth century by Sir Samuel Romilly in England and Anatole Leroy-Beaulieu in France to humanize the criminal law. Of course, society must be protected against murderers and other criminals. Of course, the state has an obligation to assume that responsibility. My position is that there are other ways of protecting society than that advocated by Senator Manning, who the other day espoused the philosophy of an eye for an eye. There are other ways, ways which are neither as irreversible nor as final as carrying out a sentence of death. Let me repeat again, we should make sure that the public is protected by keeping criminals in jail as long as necessary.

On February 3, 1973, in Kitchener, the Prime Minister of Canada had this to say:

> We should make sure that the public is protected, if necessary by keeping people in jail until we are reasonably sure that they will no longer be a menace to society, but I don't believe in destroying a life except ... in self-defence.

In debates of this nature we are inclined to neglect the fact that while the state has an obligation to society, it also has an obligation to those members of society who commit criminal acts. We have, however, marched a long way since the days of the Inquisition, and the cold and black treatment of the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries. We have made progress in rehabilitation, no matter what the current criticisms may be. Yet we know that rehabilitation sometimes takes a long time and, in some cases, may even prove to be impossible.

I think I am right in saying that since 1962 a total of 51 commutations of the death sentence have been granted on Her Majesty's behalf by the Governor in Council. Sixteen of these cases respecting capital murder were tried under the law in existence in 1962, and were not concluded until after the partial ban on capital punishment was passed and put into law in 1967. Since 1963 a total of 35 commutations have been granted, and only four of these have been granted since the new law came into force in 1967.

● (1450)

There are those who have railed against and criticized this application of clemency, stating that the government maintains a double standard and a policy of ignoring the law by commuting sentences imposed under the law. I do not agree with that criticism, and I am in a position at least to argue it, because I have participated, along with others in the Cabinet, in whatever disposition was made by the Cabinet. As the Prime Minister said:

> I cannot emphasize too strongly that these commutations are carried out in accordance with the law, not in defiance of it ... The Criminal Code of Canada expressly states that nothing therein in any manner limits or affects Her Majesty's royal prerogative of mercy.

I agree with that statement. It reflects the position of all in the present administration, and I am sure in other administrations, including that in which the Leader of the Opposition was a distinguished member. I do not think any member of the Cabinet, any Cabinet, regardless of its political complexion, approaches any problem with greater concern or more meaningfully than they do this question. I can say that these commutations were carried out in complete accordance with the law and not in defiance of it.

Senator Lamontagne dealt with the matter of executive clemency, with the royal prerogative of mercy in, I thought, a helpful statement. The prerogative of executive clemency exists under different names, let it be noted, in almost every country of the world. I agree with Senator Lamontagne that there must reside in the state authority to exercise the right to grant commutation. To think that there would not exist in the state power to accord mercy certainly does not fit in with my conception of the kind of state that I believe we want, and the kind of governments that I think should have the management of the affairs of such a state.

Should it not be, as it is, the ultimate responsibility of the executive in the nation to decide in each particular case whether it will exercise the right to grant a commutation or not? I say that, fully remembering the implications of the Report of the Royal Commission on Capital Punishment in 1949-53 in Britain, where the proper parameters and limitations of the exercise of this right of clemency are carefully outlined.

In Canada we exercise the right to grant a commutation by exercising the prerogative of mercy. As I said, I have participated in this Cabinet process, and I have done so for a long time, as have a good number of honourable senators sitting on both sides of Madam Speaker. I am sure that Senator Flynn himself, as I said a moment ago, a member of a former administration, would agree that the exercise of the prerogative of mercy is reached only after long and thorough consideration. The concern in such circumstances is to carry out the law justly, wisely and, when required, compassionately.

I do not wish to imply now that commutation should be granted in all cases; nor do I wish to hypothesize cases. But the prerogative of mercy has not been abolished in Canada. I hope that it never will be. It is the responsibility of the Cabinet, as it is of each member of Parliament and every citizen of Canada, to uphold the law. We do not seek to shirk this responsibility, or the additional responsibility incumbent on us as members of Parliament of making difficult legislative decisions.

It was suggested, admittedly not in the Senate, that the whole question of capital punishment should be referred to the Supreme Court of Canada. In my judgment, to do so would have been to abrogate our responsibilities as legislators. Parliament has difficult decisions to make. I do not believe we would be doing our duty if we shirked our responsibility. Of course, as I say, no honourable senator has suggested that.

The intention of Bill C-2 is to extend the five-year moratorium on capital punishment except for the killing of police officers and prison guards. That is the principle of this bill. This prolongs the principle of the act passed in 1967, as Senator McIlraith reminded us. This bill may not be completely in the form that I would like, holding the views on capital punishment that I do, but that is not the point. I say to Senator O'Leary, who affirms himself to be an abolitionist, that I am not satisfied with every aspect of this bill, but it does push us on from the days of no recognition of the desirability to abolish capital punishment. This bill is, in my judgment, better than that which allowed for complete retention of the death penalty. This bill is in the form that it is because of the desire to see some progress made in this matter.

What we must consider now is not so much whether capital punishment prevents crime, but whether it is a justifiable penalty. The answer depends, in my view, on the value we attach to human life. I personally do not think it is a justifiable penalty. Our support for the bill before us will extend the trial period for the suspension of capital punishment in Canada, and it affords us the opportunity to better assess the merits or the demerits of the steps that were taken in 1967, which I continue to support.

When we reach the committee stage we will have an opportunity to deal with some of the arguments made here, but I felt, as Leader of the Government in the Senate, that I owed it to the house to state my position on the bill.

Hon. Mr. O'Leary: Will the honourable Leader of the Government permit a question?

Hon. Mr. Martin: Yes.

Hon. Mr. O'Leary: If, as you say—and I do not doubt it at all—you do not believe in capital punishment or that it is a deterrent, how do you justify extending capital punishment to someone who shoots a policeman?

Hon. Mr. Martin: I thought I dealt with that argument, as other honourable senators have. I say that I would like a bill that provides for the abolition of capital punishment.

Hon. Mr. O'Leary: Completely?

[Hon. Mr. Martin.]

Hon. Mr. Martin: Yes. But we would not get such a bill if that position were taken. If the exceptions were not in this bill we would not now be dealing with a bill to provide for the partial abolition of capital punishment. It was for that reason that I made an appeal to Senator O'Leary, because of his views on capital punishment, to ask whether he would not join with those who wanted to see progress made in bringing about abolition.

● (1500)

Hon. Mr. Argue: May I ask the honourable leader a question? Would he tell the Senate whether or not it was in fact government policy to provide total abolition and an amendment was prepared and brought forward by the Solicitor General?

Hon. Mr. Martin: I do not think I can usefully say anything in answer to that, right off the cuff. I will take that question and deal with it later.

Hon. Mr. Argue: I would think it was government policy to provide total abolition.

Hon. Mr. McIlraith: No.

Hon. Mr. Hastings: If it is believed that hanging is not a deterrent, how does he explain the provisions in the bill that increase the time served before qualifying for parole?

Hon. Mr. Martin: As I have said, I firmly believe that those who are in favour of capital punishment and those who are against it equally have the responsibility of affirming, as they do, that steps must be taken to punish a criminal who commits murder.

What we are objecting to in this bill is the form of punishment. Senator Hastings does not agree with the additional provision in the proposed subsection (8), nevertheless this is in fulfilment of the objective to provide adequate protection for society against those who commit murder. Senator Hastings does not agree, I know, with the proposed subsection. He made that clear to me privately. I do believe that it is an advance. I believe that the criminal must be punished but I do not believe he should be punished by taking his life.

Hon. Mr. O'Leary: May I ask one more question? Perhaps it is unfair. If the honourable leader in the Senate had been preparing this bill and had the power to determine the full character of this bill, would he have included hanging for those who shoot policemen?

Hon. Mr. Langlois: That is hypothetical.

Hon. Mr. Martin: That is a hypothetical question.

Hon. Mr. Argue: I understand he would have prepared that type of bill.

Hon. Mr. O'Leary: I do not think he would. Surely he would not.

Hon. Keith Laird: Honourable senators, it might be refreshing to hear a backbencher explaining the stand he takes on this bill. This will be a brief speech. As the sponsor succinctly and ably presented the bill and the quality of the speeches has been so high, there is nothing much I can add.

I would emphasize my reasons for voting for the bill. This has been expressed in other language by various speakers, including Senator McIlraith, the sponsor. Fundamentally and philosophically I am really an abolitionist, but we live in a democracy and, living in a democracy, we have to compromise on many occasions. I am voting for this bill because it is a compromise between two extreme points of view. There are abolitionists, like Senator O'Leary, and those who take another point of view, that everybody should be hanged.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Oh, now, everybody?

Hon. Mr. Laird: Those people say that every murderer should be hanged. I did not mean "everyone"—but, after all, this might not be a bad idea: it might save a nuclear bomb effort.

In any event, it is essential to compromise in a democratic society and therefore the bill deserves support. No pressure was put on me by anyone to vote in a particular way. I have had many discussions. My good friend Senator Hastings and I have discussed this question many times. We have different points of view on certain things. There is one point I should like to make about that. Senator Hastings admits to me that he did not make it clear in his speech that he was not for letting criminals simply wander away after a crime. Of course, he wants them held in custody.

An Hon. Senator: He wants to give them a reward.

Hon. Mr. Laird: That was the impression he was afraid he had left, so he wants to make it very clear. Having discussed this with him, I know I speak for him when I say that he certainly wants them taken into custody. How else could one deal with the matter of rehabilitation?

There is another point which should be made plain. I make bold to mention that I discussed this privately with Senator Hastings. He failed to get this point across, that there are certain incorrigibles who can never be let out of custody and who must be incarcerated for an indefinite period. I do not need to go into details as to the type of person who falls into that category, but I point out that in many instances murders are committed by psychopaths. When we were examining the parole system we received some interesting information by way of evidence. It became very clear in that committee that some prisons are in such a state that they create a worse criminal than the one who goes in. This is the fault of the penitentiary system—but that is another problem.

As a corollary to that proposition, it emerged very clearly from the evidence that many murderers should not be kept in penitentiaries but in mental hospitals, indefinitely. I recall defending a murderer who was found to be mentally incompetent and who, unless he has since died, is currently in the Penetanguishene hospital for the criminally insane. He is the type that should be kept in forever. This is being done in some cases, but not in enough.

Honourable senators, another interesting aspect of this bill is that while it does not satisfy the two groups I mentioned, it does constitute something moving towards satisfying both sides. It retains capital punishment for the two categories we have heard so much about. While philosophically I am an abolitionist, I realize as a realist that the millennium has not yet arrived and that we should retain capital punishment at least for those crimes. That provides protection to those who, as policemen, are trying to maintain law and order. It also provides protection for those individuals, the prison guards, who take responsibility when a person is incarcerated.

In that connection, it has been rightly stated that this is not a case of anybody being hanged, that there is almost automatic commutation. I suggest to the member of the government who is with us today that more careful consideration should be given to the exercise of the royal prerogative of commutation, bearing in mind the obviously expressed opinion of the majority of the people.

Whenever a sentence is commuted, it is important, in my opinion, though it may not always be possible, that the government give formal written reasons, no matter how brief, as to why there has been commutation. This would go a long way towards meeting public demand. For example, take the case of that fellow Lurvey mentioned by Senator Hastings yesterday. You will recall Senator Hastings saying that in that case the man had terminal emphysema. Under those circumstances, if the public had been informed at that time, I think there would have been better understanding as to why there was a commutation of the death sentence. So I respectfully submit—not that I expect it to have too much force—that it might be a reasonable suggestion that the Privy Council should give reasons in such special circumstances.

• (1510)

Really, everything has been said on this subject. Originally, I had intended to say more, but the quality of the debate, the facts brought out, and the able way in which so many senators have dealt with this matter, leave one with nothing much to add. As a result, I can only reiterate—and I suppose that it will not hurt to reiterate it—how at least one senator feels, namely, that it is a reasonable compromise between two extreme points of view. As such, I am going to support the bill.

Hon. Guy Williams: Honourable senators, in rising to say a few words on this bill, I fully realize that a great deal of research has gone into the debate, not only in this chamber but also in the other house; but I rise to express to you, honourable senators, my personal feelings and experience with regard to capital punishment, and on the matter of victims who have died at the hands of murderers.

In my 40 years of participation in Indian work and Indian leadership I have had two friends who became victims at the hands of murderers. The first was a young man who, possibly, was destined for a life of hardship. He was born into this world by accident, of course, and out of wedlock. From that day on into his childhood, he had some very difficult moments with regard to being accepted by his people and by society. This young man overcame these obstacles, however, and eventually became quite successful. He was on the road to becoming an example to his people, and had already amassed a fair amount of money. One morning, however, he was found in his house, his head bludgeoned.

This young man was a close friend. In fact, he was a crew member of mine in a fishing vessel. I was the last man to spend any time with him, from 11 p.m. to 12 p.m., at which time he left my hotel room. I left that city early that morning and travelled about 250 miles. The police were looking for me as being the last person to see him alive, but this I did not know until I heard it on the radio the next day. The accused was finally picked up in the United States and was found not guilty.

This young man, this victim, would have contributed a great deal to his people—my people—in our particular part of British Columbia.

The second murder also involved a friend who was emerging and becoming a very useful and, in fact, clever man, and who was working towards being an Indian leader. He and his wife were murdered one night in their sleep. They had nine children—nine children! Of course, the nine children were split up by the welfare department, in its wisdom, and under its care. There you had a home broken up, and an emerging leader lost to my people.

The murderer, of course, was sentenced to life. One day last June I received a seven-page letter in my office here from an inmate. It took me a little while to realize who that inmate was. Later I learned that a member of Parliament had received a 50-page letter from the same inmate. A few days ago I had an opportunity to go to see this inmate, and I spent nearly an hour with him. He had been sentenced to life imprisonment for the murder of my friend, the emerging leader, and father of nine children.

I cannot make up my mind as to my conclusions or viewpoints, or what my thoughts were, after I left him. It is a very difficult matter to make your mind up about, when a personal friend is involved. It leads me to think that I may be a bit prejudiced in this case.

But what are the answers? What is this bill trying to do, in this day and age, when science has advanced so far that this civilization can do almost anything? Can this civilization—can this country—find a deterrent that will be more effective than the judge's words when he sentences the murderer and says, "You will hang by your neck until you are dead. May God have mercy on your soul"?

That part of capital punishment, in my opinion, is the only deterrent. Even if it only deters one potential murderer, it has served its purpose.

I know this is a difficult age and a difficult civilization in which we live. There are many roads and by-roads for criminals to follow. This involves even young people. Our organization has an office at the corner of Main and Hastings in the city of Vancouver, and our members have jokingly said, "We are the cornerpost of skid row!"

In the last three years we have observed eight-year-old children in an alley right across from our window. They have been sitting in that alley—Indian children, and children of other nationalities—sniffing. This is the beginning of the road that leads to the criminal way of life.

● (1520)

How do we overcome that? This is the problem of this civilization; this is the problem of this government. Ways and means must be found by which to replace that kind of life and that kind of element.

In the old days the sentence for murder was definite, but nowadays the sentence could be carried out much more swiftly and humanely by the methods at our disposal.

Riel was hanged for treason; but then, honourable senators, not too long ago they erected a monument to him. What does this indicate? It indicates a grave mistake. I realize that there can be victims of mistakes where capital punishment is involved but, again, the rope is the only deterrent available to us. Until this civilization, until this country, until this government finds something that will adequately protect the public, I must take the position I have taken. When a bill to that effect is introduced, then I shall vote for that bill on that day. I am voting against this bill.

I have spoken!

On motion of Senator Macdonald, for Senator Grosart, debate adjourned.

TRANSPORTATION

FREIGHT RATES AND NEW TECHNOLOGY—DEBATE CONCLUDED

The Senate resumed from Wednesday, April 11, the adjourned debate on the inquiry of Senator Cameron, calling the attention of the Senate to the need to re-examine the structure of freight rates in Canada and the importance of new technology to the economics of transportation.

Hon. George McIlraith: Honourable senators, since I adjourned the debate on this inquiry the position of the subject matter has not materially changed, and the arbitration of the railway labour dispute is still proceeding. In these circumstances I do not wish to speak on this subject at this time, and unless some other senator has something to say I presume the usual consequences will follow and the inquiry will disappear from the Order Paper. I should add that Senator Cameron, who was responsible for this inquiry, is not here but he is fully aware of what I am saying today and that it has his concurrence.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, if no other honourable senator wishes to participate in this debate, the inquiry will be considered as having been debated.

COMMONWEALTH PARLIAMENTARY ASSOCIATION

CONFERENCE HELD AT LONDON, ENGLAND—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. John J. Connolly (Ottawa West) rose pursuant to notice:

> That he will call the attention of the Senate to the Nineteenth General Conference of the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association, held at London, England, in September, 1973, and in particular to the discussions and the proceedings of the Conference and the participation therein of the delegation from Canada.

He said: Honourable senators, the Nineteenth Commonwealth Parliamentary Conference was opened in London by Her Majesty the Queen in Westminster Hall on September 7 last. I need not emphasize that this was a splendid, colourful ceremony in superbly historic surroundings which provide abiding inspiration on the value of the parliamentary system. The Chairman of the General Council, Sir Alec Douglas-Home, who is also British Foreign Secretary, reminded the audience that the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association began in 1911 at the coronation of George V. At that time there were five dominions in the organization. At this meeting, 62 years later, 94 legislatures from 33 countries were represented.

Her Majesty interrupted her holiday to preside at the opening function. She spoke about the association of free peoples in the Commonwealth spanning five oceans and six continents—peoples and groupings of people that transcend all barriers of race, religion and culture. She spoke further of the importance of the Commonwealth as a vehicle to promote lines of communication between many peoples in all parts of the world.

Her Majesty also referred to the meeting of the first ministers of Commonwealth countries held in Ottawa the previous August. She said it was an outstanding example of the value of the Commonwealth Conference as a forum for discussion of many things which affect the daily lives of people who live in the 33 Commonwealth countries.

The British Prime Minister, Mr. Edward Heath, in his speech referred to the fact that generations of British statesmen believed that the parliamentary institutions, along the lines of the model provided by Westminster, was their most precious possession and the strongest safeguard for liberty, independence and prosperity that they had to offer to the newly independent Commonwealth countries over the years as they negotiated the transfer of power from Britain to those countries.

I propose to deal very briefly, since the hour is late, with the debate that took place at this meeting. I do not propose to talk about the major portion of that debate, which had to do with economic matters. As you are aware, Senator Grosart was also a delegate from this house, and he took a very active part in the work of the plenary session which dealt with the effects of the British entry into the European Common Market. He also participated in one of the panel discussions in the committee which dealt with the same problems. In the circumstances I think it would be more appropriate, and I have spoken to him about this, if he should deal with that part of the discussion. I do want to say, however, that the debates conducted during the plenary session at Church House were most unusual. They were reasoned, responsible and of a very high order. I propose to deal with one or two of the issues which were on the agenda.

● (1530)

The first has to do with Commonwealth immigration policies. Let me say at the beginning that none of the major problems of the developing countries of the Commonwealth, whether they are overcrowded or underpopulated, will be solved by immigration, and the representatives of these peoples know that. The debate itself was concerned with current policies for immigration in the more developed parts of the Commonwealth—the United Kingdom, Canada, Australia, and New Zealand—and mainly the effects of these policies on developing Commonwealth countries.

The burden of criticism offered was that the immigration laws in the four main developed Commonwealth countries discriminated in law and in administration against citizens of the developing countries on grounds of race or colour. In addition, the United Kingdom was criticized because the rules for entry into the United Kingdom under the Immigration Act are more liberal for citizens of the European Economic Community than for citizens of Commonwealth countries. The criticism in connection with these issues came from speakers on behalf of Sri Lanka, Malaysia, the Bahamas and India. The United Kingdom reply was given by Lord Balniel, M.P., who spoke for the government, by Lord Wade, Baroness White and Mr. Sydney Bidwell, M.P. Lord Balniel restricted himself to an explanation of the United Kingdom policy, especially of the acts of 1962 and 1971. He said that the laws limiting entry to the United Kingdom of Commonwealth citizens were in fact laws required in that country. He also said that at this time it was impracticable to think that large-scale, permanent immigration to the United Kingdom could be a policy of any United Kingdom government, because it placed unacceptable strains on social services, housing and educational facilities in that country.

Lord Wade, who is one of the few Liberals in the House of Lords, is an effective, informed and humanitarian man. He criticized many features of United Kingdom policy and advocated more liberal approaches with respect, particularly, to family units and stateless persons. He criticized also the preferences enjoyed by citizens of the European Community. Baroness White and Mr. Bidwell ably supported the views expressed by Lord Wade. However, I believe all of them recognize the practical impossibility of an open-door policy for Commonwealth citizens entering the United Kingdom.

For Australia, Dr. A. J. Forbes and Mr. J. A. Clough spoke regarding the Australian position. Both spoke with great authority. They described new Liberal policies that have been in place in Australia for a number of years. They informed us, for example, that there have been three million new immigrants to Australia since 1940, 50 per cent having come from South East Asia, Asia, the Pacific and Southern Europe. Dr. Forbes particularly stressed one fact, his view that it is fundamental to a nation's sovereignty that it should control the level of its own immigration and the composition of its peoples. The assimilation of immigrants was to him a very important aspect of immigration policy.

For Canada, the Honourable Allan MacEachen, who was the leader of the delegation, laid out the Canadian policy, with which I am sure honourable senators are extremely familiar. Mr. MacEachen's presentation was of a high order, and he was one of the most distinguished and best speakers who addressed that assembly. This he did on a number of occasions.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Did you say that he was chairman of the delegation?

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): He was the leader of the delegation, yes.

Hon. Mr. Deschatelets: Before Senator Connolly leaves this problem of immigration, would he tell us whether there were any criticisms expressed by any of the delegates, particularly those from the southeastern countries, in connection with Canada's immigration policy?

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): I believe there was some general criticism of Canadian immigration policy along the lines I mentioned earlier. There was a feeling on the part of some of these Commonwealth people that on the basis of race or colour, Canadians may, either in policy or in administration, discourage immigration from Commonwealth countries. By the time Mr. MacEachen was finished, I believe it had become clear that the policy of Canadian immigration, although selective, was based rather upon the test of skills than the test of colour or race. I do not know whether that is completely acceptable to these people, but I think that is the announced policy and it is the manner in which the officials endeavour to administer the Immigration Act. I cannot say much more on that point.

One of the topics discussed in the plenary session was the question "Parliamentary government, where is it heading?" Some believed that the answer is, "Straight in front of the television cameras." Others, to use a colloquial expression, were saying "Over my dead body." There was a concern, expressed by almost all the speakers, related to the effect of the media upon the image of Parliament. There was concern about the emphasis by the media on sensationalism with regard to the personal foibles of members. They felt that in some cases the media influence was usurping the position of the Houses of Parliament. They felt that in other cases the media was critical of the institutions of Parliament and of the methods of Parliament without an adequate understanding of parliamentary institutions, without adequate respect for parliamentary traditions and without regard in some cases for the social consequences of downgrading Parliament and its members. I would say that their conclusion in connection with this branch of the argument was that an informed, constructive criticism of Parliament is needed, but not such uninformed criticism.

Curiously, honourable senators, in the background of the political problems in the United States arising out of Watergate, there was no attempt made by any speaker to institute a comparison between the parliamentary system on the one hand and the congressional system on the other. On the positive side, there were speeches recommending that parliaments modernize their parliamentary institutions, make them more efficient to respond to new social, economic, military and political requirements.

● (1540)

The chief area of reform to which parliamentarians pointed most often was that of the committee system. They advocated wider use of standing and select committees for legislative work and for the investigation of matters of national importance.

The Honourable Mr. MacEachen, in opening the debate, gave a comprehensive review of the changes made in the Canadian House of Commons during the last half decade. He was joined by Sir Robin Turton, an outstanding authority on parliamentary institutions in the United Kingdom. Sir Robin emphasized the fact that members of Parliament should not be overburdened with work, that they should not be required to run between house and committee, thereby finding themselves unable to do justice to their work in either place. He suggested a device which has been used in this chamber, namely, that of adjourning the house from time to time to allow committees to function.

Sir Stephen McAdden spoke from the depth of his wide experience of the committee system in the United Kingdom Parliament and made some practical proposals, which appear in the official record of the conference.

Mr. André Harvey, of the Quebec National Assembly, spoke of innovations in the committee system as it operates in that chamber.

As no one else referred to the use of second chambers, or to the work of our own committees, I undertook to tell the conference about the considerable achievement of this chamber in its use of both standing and select committees.

Other points raised by speakers at the conference included traditional, time-honoured claims and complaints. There were pleas for better facilities, better allowances, and better pay for members of Parliament. They urged that the role of backbenchers and their importance be emphasized in order to relieve backbenchers of their frustrations. Some, however, disagreed on that point. They maintained that backbenchers, especially those in elective chambers, should concentrate on looking after the welfare of their people, attending to local issues and cultivating the press, and that they should leave the great policy issues to ministers.

The debate on the use of committees was, in my opinion, very useful, but as a debate on parliamentary government it left much to be desired.

Contrary to my original intention, I do not propose to talk at length on the subject of world security. The debate on this subject was opened by the Honourable G. S. Dhillon, M.P., Speaker of the Lok Sabha of India and one of the most distinguished and respected members of the Commonwealth and of the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association.

A number of distinguished persons spoke in this debate. Senator Fulbright, from Washington, encouraged smaller countries to take a more active part in the work of the United Nations and to influence to a larger degree the great powers in the direction of peace. He impressed upon them the fact that from the point of view of sheer numbers in the membership of the United Nations, the smaller countries could be most effective.

Senator Dr. Mahathir bin Mohamad of Malaysia explained the concept of regional neutrality for Southeast Asia now being developed in that area. He advocated small country power blocs, not for defence but for peace.

There was no call for a Commonwealth arrangement for defence. Nor could there be, because most Commonwealth countries lack effective establishments for defence purposes, and many have very little interest in military matters.

Great credit is due to the United Kingdom branch, to its members and officials, particularly Mr. Peter Molloy, and Mr. James Batten, his erudite assistant. They arranged most interesting and informative visits for all of the delegates. They staged a dinner at Grosvener House, which was addressed by the British Prime Minister. It was splendid and most informative. They arranged the impressive opening of the conference held in Westminster Hall, and many opportunities for informal talks among the delegates. The Queen Mother attended one of the social functions. All delegates appreciated the friendliness and hospitality of the United Kingdom parliamentarians.

Much of the success of the conference is due to the General Secretariat under the leadership of Sir Robin Vanderfelt, and his senior assistants, Mr. Grey, Mr. Fowler, and Miss May.

I should point out that of those elected to the Executive Committee of the CPA, Premier Regan of Nova Scotia was elected Chairman, and our colleague Senator Grosart was elected member for the Canadian region. He is to be congratulated on his election. Mr. James Walker, M.P., was elected a member of the Executive Committee under clause 19.

Honourable senators, it would appear that Canada enjoys the respect and confidence of all Commonwealth countries. This is particularly true of the developing countries. They seemed to understand Canada, and to feel that we were sympathetically aware of their particular problems.

Our relations with the larger countries of the Commonwealth—the United Kingdom, India, Australia, and New Zealand—should be a source of pride to all of us. However, there is no reason for Canadians to feel smug about the fact that we are respected in the Commonwealth. If we are to maintain that respect, we must work positively and continuously in the development of an organization which has great potential for the development of Commonwealth prosperity and world peace.

The Hon. the Speaker: As no other honourable senator wishes to participate in the debate,—

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I have not had the opportunity of ascertaining whether other Senate members of the delegation wish to participate in this debate. In order that I might have that opportunity, I move the adjournment of the debate.

On motion of Senator Macdonald, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until Monday, November 19, 1973, at 8 p.m.

25862—73

APPENDIX "A"

(See p. 1143.)

EXPORTS OF CRUDE OIL AND EQUIVALENT TO UNITED STATES (1,000's BARRELS PER DAY)

January to December	1973	Percent Increase	1972
January	1,173	27	927
February	1,215	27	960
March	1,243	31	948
April	1,282	48	867
May	1,143	23	927
June	1,121	24	907
July	1,063	21	881
August	1,104	16	953
September	1,138	14	999
October	1,119	10	1,012
November	1,005	(2)	1,027
December	978	(8)	1,072
Average	1,132	18	956
Average for 1971 749
Average for 1970 665

APPENDIX "B"

(See p. 1143.)

CURRENT CANADIAN OIL SUPPLY AND DEMAND FACT SHEET

CANADIAN CRUDE OIL

Production of crude oil and equivalent: 2,000,000 barrels daily b/d (85% from Alberta, 11% from Saskatchewan, 3% from B.C. and 1% from Manitoba.)

Consumption in Canada of domestic crude: 960,000 b/d (45% in western provinces, 50% in Ontario and 5% in Quebec).

Exports (all to U.S.A. under N.E.B. licensing) 1,000,000 b/d (23% to U.S. Pacific Northwest and 77% to U.S. east of Rockies) (Difference between sum of Canadian consumption and exports reflects inventory build and pipeline fill).

IMPORTED OIL

Programmed Imports of crude oil and products to all parts of Canada: 1,000,000 b/d.

Sourcing of programmed crude oil imports (all to Québec and Atlantic Provinces): Western Hemisphere 45%, Eastern Hemisphere 55%, "OPEC" Countries 94%, other South American and African Countries 6%.

PETROLEUM PRODUCTS

Consumption in Canada: 1,750,000 b/d (22% western provinces: 28% central & western Ont, 50% eastern Ontario, Québec and Atlantic Provinces.)

Exports: The export of most grades of petroleum products requires a licence from the National Energy Board. It is not possible in the current uncertain international situation to indicate what quantities are likely to be licensed for export. In the year 1972, exports, mostly to the U.S.A. and mostly from eastern Canada, were in excess of 100,000 b/d.

COMPONENTS OF CANADIAN PETROLEUM PRODUCTS CONSUMPTION (Approximate): Aviation Fuels 3%, Motor Gasoline 31%, Light Heating Oils 22%, Diesel Fuel 9%, Heavy Fuel Oils 20%, Other Products 8% and Oil Industry's Own Consumption 7%. Total: 100%.

OIL STOCKS

Stocks of crude and oil products held at refineries and bulk terminals in the import-dependent areas of Canada—eastern Ontario, Québec and the Atlantic Provinces—are equivalent to about 70 days' of average local consumption. This does not mean that consumption could be sustained for 70 days in circumstances of a total loss of supply. Constraints such as product quality maintenance, distribution patterns and the unavailability of some oil in tank bottoms mean that the effective stock coverage is about 45 days.

The planned 4th quarter 1973 imports of oil to Canada show the following breakdown: 44% Venezuela, 30% Arab countries, 16% Iran, 5% Angola, 4% Nigeria and 1% Colombia. Total: 100%.

Of the Arab countries' 30% input, the 4th quarter breakdown shows: 40% Saudi Arabia, 36% Trucial states (mainly Abu Dhabi and Oman), 16% Lybia and 8% Iraq. Total: 100%.

(It should be noted that the above figures represented the planned 4th quarter 1973 imports and could be affected by the current international situation.)

THE SENATE

Monday, November 19, 1973

The Senate met at 8 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

MIDDLE EAST

RESOLUTION APPROVING PARTICIPATION OF CANADIAN FORCES IN UNITED NATIONS EMERGENCY FORCE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, a message has been received from the House of Commons as follows:

> That it is expedient that the Houses of Parliament do approve the Government's decision that Canadian Forces participate in the United Nations Emergency Force in the Middle East, and that this House do approve the same;
>
> Ordered: That a message be sent to the Senate informing Their Honours that this House has adopted a resolution approving of the participation of Canadian Forces in the United Nations Emergency Force in the Middle East, and requesting Their Honours to unite with this House in the approval of the same by filling up the blanks in the resolution with the words "Senate and".
>
> Alistair Fraser
> Clerk of the House of Commons

Honourable senators, when shall this message be taken into consideration?

Hon. Paul Martin: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(h), I move, seconded by the Honourable Senator Buckwold:

> That it is expedient that the Houses of Parliament do approve the Government's decision that Canadian Forces participate in the United Nations Emergency Force in the Middle East, and that this House do approve the same; and
>
> That a message be sent to the House of Commons to inform that House that the Senate has adopted a resolution approving the Government's decision that Canadian Forces participate in the United Nations Emergency Force in the Middle East and has filled up the blanks therein with the words "Senate and".

Hon. Mr. Choquette: It is a fait accompli.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Honourable senators, it may be helpful if I review briefly the events which have led the government to submit this resolution seeking approval for Canadian participation in this United Nations peacekeeping role.

There is now, as we all know, an uneasy cease-fire, made even more tenuous by the fierce fighting which preceded it. Along two fronts which from October 6 until October 26 saw some of the most bloody fighting in the Middle East, some semblance of order now prevails. There were land battles, sea and air battles; the loss of life which resulted on both sides is perhaps not even now fully known.

The international situation caused by the war could have involved even the great powers. As we are only too well aware, there was concern when the Soviet Union and the United States took measures that might well have led to a serious expansion of the conflict although that may not have been their intention—the former by a reported desire to intervene unilaterally, while the latter, the United States, placed its own forces on a state of alert.

It was at this point that the Security Council met to consider a proposal of the non-aligned powers, supported by the United States and the Soviet Union. It was at this stage that the Security Council reaffirmed the call for a cease-fire and established the United Nations Emergency Force, No. 2.

Honourable senators, there is much yet to be resolved before a certain peace emerges. The new United Nations Emergency Force establishes an international presence which, like the predecessor force, could contribute to peace between the Arab countries and Israel. The prospects for successful negotiation are not negative, but will not easily be achieved. Eventual negotiations could lead to peace and towards this the force could make a special contribution.

Canadian governments in the past, regardless of political complexion, have recognized their obligations to their United Nations commitments. I call to witness Korea, the Congo, Kashmir, Cyprus, Yemen. They all testify to this. I remember when, in October 1946, the leader of the Canadian delegation at the second part of the first assembly in New York, Mr. St. Laurent, then Minister of Justice, pleaded for the creation of an enforcement organization under Article 43 of the Charter of the United Nations, an article which provides for such procedures through the Security Council. Such an organization, as we know, did not result because of the refusal of certain member states to recognize the plea. As a consequence, these ad hoc arrangements have been substituted for what was intended by the provision in the Charter.

I am sure none of us regard this question in any way as a political one. This matter, I think, is above politics.

I remember, as Mr. Pearson pointed out in 1956, that the former Prime Minister, Mr. Diefenbaker, in January of 1956 had suggested a limited international force in the Israeli-Egyptian situation.

Peacekeeping or peace observation, for the crystalization of which we are indebted to Prime Minister Pearson, has been supported, as I say, by all governments. Of course, it continues to be supported by the present government, but this does not mean that the present government accepted the invitation to join the present UNEF without careful consideration.

On October 27, well before the Secretary of State for External Affairs went to New York to clarify issues relating to the precise role Canada would play in the United Nations Emergency Force, and to confirm that Canadian participation was indeed acceptable to all parties, the request for Canadian troops by the Secretary General of the United Nations had been received in Ottawa. Actually, he made an oral representation followed by two communications.

It has been said by some that Mr. Sharp went begging for Canadian participation in this second United Nations Emergency Force. This is not the fact. I for one, however, would take the position, and I am speaking now only for myself, that Canada, among the smaller powers traditionally interested in peacekeeping, has an experience in these matters among members of the force second to none. Among the smaller powers we have logistic capacities which apparently other smaller powers do not possess to the same extent, and we have had an experience in their use in other peacekeeping enterprises. I see nothing wrong in a country dedicated to the United Nations and its principles, as we are, wanting to do its utmost to make effective a United Nations peace force.

I commend fully what Mr. Sharp has done. In my judgment he could not have done anything less, and I believe we could do nothing less than give support to our participation in a force which may be able to help maintain the peace in this troubled area.

The first request from Secretary General Waldheim for Canadian participation in the United Nations Emergency Force was for the supply of logistic components for the force. This was, indeed, in keeping with our first peacekeeping mission in the Middle East in 1956 when Canadian forces were in charge of essential support services. Our men performed this arduous and often dangerous task with great success. And so it is not surprising, I believe, that the Secretary General had asked Canada to contribute the expertise which it had acquired in 11 years of service in the first United Nations Emergency Force between 1956 and 1967. No other force in the present UNEF is as well prepared to carry out these workmanlike duties more quickly or more efficiently than we are.

● (2010)

It was subsequent to the original request for our participation that the Security Council decided that the logistic role should be shared between Canada and Poland. We have no objection to this arrangement, nor to working with Poland, for we do not consider our participation in the force as being in any way a political or ideological representation. What we are concerned with, essentially, is a clear definition of our role, and performing a function which will aid the successful operation of this mission, and performing it well. While a clear and practical division of technical responsibility remains still to be finalized, so that efficiency will be assured, considerable progress has already been made in organizing this joint arrangement.

In discussions between our ambassador, Mr. Rae, at the United Nations, officials from the United Nations Secretariat and Polish officials, it was agreed that initially Canada would provide a signals unit. The first unit arrived in Cairo on November 10. Poland, on the other hand, will provide an engineering unit. In the meantime, the government is considering a proposal from the Secretary General that we provide an air unit, while Poland has been asked to furnish and staff a field hospital.

There is no doubt that the prospect of Canada being approached had been foreseen by the government from the outset.

"I think we in Canada can take some pride," Mr. Pearson once observed, "in the fact that whenever the United Nations is required to intervene in a situation where peace and security are threatened, the United Nations has nearly always called on Canada for assistance."

We wanted to ensure that if we took part in the operation, however, certain criteria—conditions, if you will—would have to be met, that we would at least have the assurance of being able to discharge our undertaking. The criteria Canada sought in New York, and which we have succeeded in establishing, lie in two distinctly different areas—the political and the technical. The government, and, I know, Canadians generally, want a lasting peace and a just settlement in the Middle East. It might be borne in mind that it is not the responsibility of the United Nations Emergency Force, however, to promote a settlement. This is a political responsibility shared by all members of the United Nations.

The specific functions of the force are, first, to supervise the implementation of the cease-fire; second, to bring about the return of the parties to their positions on October 22; and third, to use its best efforts to prevent a recurrence of fighting.

Canada has consistently stressed a number of conditions before its acceptance of this role in the peacekeeping operation. A basic condition is met by the fact that the United Nations will be the continuing political authority to which the force reports.

The Secretary General himself has listed the following essential conditions for the force:

(a) It must have the full confidence and backing of the Security Council. It has.

(b) It must operate with the full co-operation of the parties concerned. This has been assured.

(c) It must function as an integrated and efficient military unit.

(d) It must enjoy freedom of movement, communications, and any other facilities that are necessary for the efficient performance of its function.

(e) It should be granted all relevent privileges and immunities provided by the United Nations Convention on Privileges and Immunities.

The cost of the force is estimated at $30 million per year, and this will be borne by compulsory obligations on all state members of the organization.

It is of further satisfaction to us in Canada that one of the conditions for which Canada strove so energetically prior to, and even during, our participation in the International Commission of Control and Supervision in Vietnam—specifically that a peacekeeping force must be responsible to a political authority, preferably the United Nations—is an integral part of the existing structure under which Canada will operate. The new UNEF, with superpower co-operation, is under the command of the United Nations, vested in the Secretary General, and under the authority of the Security Council.

Moreover, the cease-fire is linked to negotiations on the basic problems of the Middle East. We have learned from 25 years' experience in peacekeeping that ultimate success depends upon the willingness of the disputants, the belligerents, to agree on a political settlement. This is the most important and essential aspect of peacekeeping.

We learned from the 1956 situation in Suez that United Nations action there was not sufficiently swift, and subsequently it was hard to bring about a political settlement. It is our hope that the belligerents can take advantage of the shock of the present emergency and come to an agreement. Indeed, the Security Council Resolution passed on October 22 of this year calls for a start on the implementation of Resolution No. 242 of November 1967, and as my colleague, the Secretary of State for External Affairs has observed:

> The framework for peace exists in the resolutions adopted by the Security Council. The problem [in the view of the Canadian Government] has never been so much one of interpretation as of implementation of these resolutions.

The whole basis of Resolution 242 is a balance of obligations and commitments.

> [Such provisions as], those calling for the withdrawal of Israeli forces from occupied territories and the establishment of secure and recognized boundaries for all states in the region, had to be taken together.

Honourable senators, the government—and I am sure this applies to all of us—will have no illusions about the difficulties and dangers of the task which lies ahead for the second United Nations Emergency Force. While this body, as I have said, is not charged with the extremely difficult problem of effecting a political settlement, peacekeeping operations are not easy. My honourable friend, the Leader of the Opposition, will remember, I am sure, the experience of the government of which he was a member in 1960 in the Congo. When that situation developed Canada responded quickly, and Parliament readily gave the government the necessary approval for its policy which had already been proclaimed.

There are important and difficult problems in the Middle East which yet remain to be settled, such as the question of the Palestinian refugees, to whom we in Canada have contributed over $29 million through the United Nations Works and Relief Agency. Canada is, in fact, the third largest contributor. There are, however, encouraging signs that political progress is being made. The exchange of wounded prisoners has begun and, most encouraging of all, in advance of this action Egypt and Israel met for the first time in 25 years to sign an agreement.

This agreement provides for the implementation of the cease-fire. Its terms were devised and proposed by the United States Secretary of State, Dr. Kissinger, to whose ingenuity and brilliant diplomacy I pay tribute. His knowledge of foreign affairs over a long period of study and interest, and his credibility in vital world capitals, has enabled him to play a productive role in the Middle East problem.

● (2020)

I commend this resolution to the house as a further indication of Canada's desire to contribute to peace.

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, Her Honour informed us that the House of Commons had approved the decision of the government that Canadian forces participate in the United Nations Emergency Force in the Middle East and that that house requested the Senate to unite in this approval. Her Honour asked when this message would be taken into consideration. The Leader of the Government said, "With leave, now." That caused me to hesitate for a moment. I wondered whether we should refuse leave because this is not urgent at all, or whether we should grant it because it is already too late to make any difference. The Leader of the Government recited for the record the history of the Middle East war and the problems faced there by the United Nations. It is all very well, but as far as the resolution proper before the Senate is concerned I consider that the debate with which we are faced can hardly be taken seriously. To ask Parliament for approbation ex post facto is to ridicule the institution and is equivalent to denying its existence. Our troops have already been there for some time. We have made a commitment to the rest of the world and now the government says it wants to know how the representatives of the people feel about it.

Why could we not have had this debate before offering our help or, at least, committing ourselves definitely? Why could not the representatives of the people have been consulted before we caused ourselves to become involved in this peacekeeping effort?

Sure, we are all in favour of peace and wish to see the end of hostilities in the Middle East. We would like to see a firm, just and permanent peace established in that area of the world. All that goes without saying. Certainly, I am aware of our experience and expertise in the area of peacekeeping, the history of which has been put on the record by the Leader of the Government.

I know how well we have done in Cyprus. I am aware that our role there has served to keep peace in that part of the world. All that is very laudable and as a Canadian I am proud of what we are doing. I do not consider that the peacekeeping role should be looked at in a partisan way, but a problem of making a decision such as that which the government has made should not, for the simple reason that our foreign policy is non-partisan, go without criticism if criticism is needed. I do not think, however, that the success we have enjoyed in this domain means that we should feel compelled to jump in every time there is an opportunity to serve as peacemaker. Surely, we are not the only small nation that has respect for and values peace?

I insist that this debate should have taken place before any offer of assistance was made. That would have been the logical and sensible thing to do. After all, such operations cost money, as we have experienced in Cyprus. The people are entitled to a say in such extraordinary expenditures. Further, and this is important to remember, this is not our first tour of duty as peacemakers in the Middle East. We were there in 1967 and were tossed out by General Nasser. Also, we might have wanted to remind ourselves of our role in Vietnam over the past several years before offering our help anew in the Middle East conflict. Vietnam, as we all know, was a disaster. We couldn't work with the Poles at all. Yet, here we are again with the Poles as peacekeeping partners.

There is something vividly unreal about all of this. It seems like such obvious folly, one wonders what we are doing. Certainly one wonders what we are doing discussing it now since we have no rational alternative but to support the resolution. It's an old political ploy used by governments in trouble domestically. You try and do something dramatic on the international scene and hope it will be successful and distract from the bankruptcy at home.

So, while this government tries to refurbish its image, we Canadians are made to look ridiculous. Our government goes chasing after thankless jobs and accepts to work with a country which has frustrated our previous efforts at peacekeeping elsewhere.

Further, and even more important, our government was so eager to grandstand that it allowed itself to be placed in a position that destroyed our future credibility as objective peacekeepers. We allowed ourselves to be cast in the role of an advocate of NATO and the United States, to be traded off against the participation of Poland representing the Warsaw Pact.

Ex post facto resolutions such as this should not be. The Government of Canada should be forced to obtain the approval of Parliament before it sends a significant number of Canadian troops into any other country, no matter what the purpose. Sure, our troops have been sent to preserve peace, not to make war. Nobody denies that, but we all know the risks involved in keeping peace. Very often the well-intentioned third party who went in as friend to the belligerents, attempting to keep them from fighting, can come out of it having acquired two enemies.

The government had no practical choice. But I can't help repeating that this whole episode has been grossly mismanaged and that the government has seemingly been more interested in gaining political mileage than in making a worthwhile contribution.

Honourable senators, if we support this resolution, we certainly disapprove of the government's conduct in eliciting our support.

Hon. Allister Grosart: Honourable senators, in support of the position taken by the Leader of the Opposition, I should like to reiterate my own concern that this matter was not placed before Parliament before the decision was taken.

It has been said, of course, that the leaders of the parties in the other place were consulted on the broad principle some time in advance of the decision. But that, surely, is not the parliamentary way. At that time, the leaders of the parties did not have the details, and the details were not placed before Parliament before the decision was made. It is true that this resolution comes to us without objection in a vote from the House of Commons. However, it should be placed on record that there were strongly worded qualifications of several kinds to the method in which our troops have been committed once again to a scene of international belligerence.

The main qualification, of course, was the one to which I have referred and which was so well put by the Leader of the Opposition. It is my view that there is a basic principle that should arise out of a discussion of the resolution before us. I had considered moving an amendment to the resolution, but I found it difficult to word an amendment that would fall within the rules of the house. Any such amendment to this resolution would refer, perhaps, to the substance of the bill and certainly to a future time. Under the rules of amendments, it is difficult to word an amendment which falls within the terms of those rules. My amendment would have added to the resolution the words: "and that in any comparable future circumstances the Houses of Parliament approve such duty before rather than after participation by Canadian forces". I am sure that the reason I say that this is a major principle will be obvious to all members of Parliament.

[Hon. Mr. Flynn.]

● (2030)

The commitment of the armed forces of Canada abroad, whether on a peacekeeping mission, a peace observing mission, or a war mission, is one that concerns all the public of Canada. It may be said, of course, that there is no great danger to the lives of our troops on this particular occasion. However, the principle remains that if there is to be any major decision on the commitment of the armed forces of Canada, that decision should be made by Parliament.

Why is Parliament not consulted? The Leader of the Government will no doubt tell me once again that there is the prerogative of the Crown in international matters. As I said before, this is obviously an anachronism, and it is becoming a more dangerous anachronism daily as such decisions as these are made. Surely it should not be left to the judgment of a minister or a group of ministers, on the advice of officials, to commit the armed forces of Canada to a major mission abroad.

No one has yet explained to me why this principle is apparently unsound. It may be said, of course, that previous governments, Conservative as well as Liberal, have not followed this principle. That, to me, is no reason why we should not at this time, or in the near future, insist that this principle be followed. It is my intention, perhaps on some other occasion, to move a resolution, which I hope would be in order, to elicit the views of honourable senators on all sides of the house as to whether they believe it makes sense to commit Canadian armed forces abroad without the consent of Parliament in advance of so doing.

As a corollary, of course, it can be said that this involves an expenditure of money. The Leader of the Government may say, of course, that on this occasion we have an arrangement by which the expenses of our troops will be paid. I am less optimistic than he on that. He said that payment of a proper share by other countries in the United Nations of the cost of the Canadian part of the force would be "compulsorily" imposed—that was the word he used—on all member countries. I hope he will tell us whether he believes that the People's Republic of China, which is mainland China, has agreed to contribute its share. I hope he will also be good enough to inform us, before we vote on this matter, as to the attitude of that one member of the Security Council which did not support this, and how we can say that we have the complete commitment of the United Nations to the support and payment of this force if all members of the Security Council have not expressed themselves in support of it.

I was interested in the honourable leader's comments to the effect that this time we have some hard and fast criteria; that before we entered into this agreement with the United Nations we really laid down the conditions under which we would participate. I think on the face of it that is not so.

We can, of course, hark back to some other bad decisions on the part of the government in respect to peacekeeping or peace-observing missions when the criteria were not clear, when perhaps there were no criteria. Certainly in the situation of Vietnam we became the laughing-stock of the world because of the method by which we went into that operation. We had no logistic preparation; our troops—and they said so as they came back—were thoroughly embarrassed and ashamed to be there in the wrong uniforms, with lack of support and not knowing what their mission was.

The first criterion suggested, of course, is that there be a threat to international peace. We would agree with that.

We are then told it is to be linked to an agreement on a political settlement amongst the parties. That, of course, is an absurdity. There cannot be any such agreement. There has not been such an agreement in this case, any more than there was in Vietnam or in Cyprus. Why do we pretend that this is a criterion? Yet, the minister has said that it is the number two criterion. I am not critical of the fact that it is not a criterion. I am critical of the fact that we pretend it is. Obviously, the job of a peacekeeping force is to keep the peace, not to work out a political settlement. The Leader of the Government made that clear. But why do we have the pretense that we are there having the previous understanding that there is going to be a political settlement? That had nothing to do with the decision to send our troops there.

Another criterion is that there has to be a political authority. This is a lesson we learned in Vietnam, or which the government apparently learned. Some of us will recall that this very point was made when the government decided to send a peace-observance force, I think they called it, into Vietnam. There was no such authority; there was no political authority to which they would report. The very fact that the government completely ignored the warnings that were given in that case, I feel, reinforces the position that such decisions should at least have the consent of Parliament before being made.

Another criterion is that the parties to the conflict must accept the peacekeeping force, and the Canadian participation therein must be acceptable to "all concerned." There is evidence that this is now so, "all concerned" of course, being more than the two belligerents in this case; "all concerned" involves other nations, perhaps understandably, in this case. One of those nations, as the Leader of the Opposition has pointed out, is Poland. Why we should have to have the consent of Poland to take part in a United Nations Emergency Force, for the reasons the Leader of the Opposition has put forward, is beyond me.

One wonders what "acceptable" means. One thinks immediately, of course, of the situation in the Gaza Strip. Does this mean that this Canadian force is to be in some part of Egypt or Egyptian territory—if that is where it is to be—until one or other of the belligerents says, "Get them out of there; we want to attack the others." This has happened.

Yet we have this pretense that we are there and will be there as long as there is that agreement. I object, honourable senators, to being told that these are the criteria when it is so clear that they are not. It is mere window dressing—for what reason I do not know. Perhaps it is to persuade the Canadian public that this is an exercise in peacekeeping which presents no danger to Canada, no danger to our reputation, no embarrassment to our forces. There is nothing in these so-called criteria that will guarantee that in the future, and for that reason I insist that in the future Parliament be consulted. It would have been very interesting had Parliament had the opportunity of debating these criteria which have now been laid down by the minister.

Another criterion is that there has to be freedom of movement. Well, obviously, there will not be freedom of movement. Also, there has to be an agreed and equitable method of financing the operation. I hope the Leader of the Government will tell us what that "agreed and equitable method of financing" is. The minister told us that this is a principal condition. Now, do we have it? We should have it. We should have the exact "agreed and equitable method." These are very precise words. It does not mean, surely, that we are going to work it out later and hope that every one will pay his share.

We have no information as to how that compulsory levy is to be made; how the money is to be collected. We have no reason to believe that we will not be left in exactly the same position we were left in Cyprus. I visited Cyprus and, unless my information is wrong, we are the only peacekeeping unit in the United Nations peacekeeping force in Cyprus that is paying its own way. We are told that the cost is $22 million to date. I am not against our forces being there. As a matter of fact, perhaps I should take this opportunity to say that I had a chance to go down the "Green Line," spend a couple of days with our troops, to interview men at all levels—from private soldiers to the commanding officer—and I came away from my look at that operation proud to be a Canadian.

● (2040)

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: The troops there at the time were the famous Van Doos, and I can say to honourable senators the job they are doing is one that has won the admiration of the two sides, the Greeks and the Turks. I am sure that one of the reasons, perhaps the main reason, why we have been asked once again to participate in an international peacekeeping force is the reputation of our troops wherever they have been, in spite of some of the embarrassments I have mentioned, in spite sometimes of the intolerable conditions. And when I speak of this, I am not blaming the government or our defence authorities. Our troops have operated in intolerable conditions and conducted themselves on a level of soldierliness and discipline which has won the admiration of anyone I could talk to, and in that particular case those between whom they were keeping the peace.

The Leader of the Government has told us today that this apparently is to be a quite restricted operation. We are to be on the logistics side, and possibly we will contribute an air transport unit. I hope he will tell us if there is a clear understanding, at the present time, of the responsibilities that our troops will be expected to undertake, because here again we have the unhappy story of some of our other peacekeeping operations. In this respect I am thinking of Cyprus where I have it on the authority of our own people there that their obligations, their responsibilities, and their relations with other forces are anything but clear.

Incidentally, we have at the present time in Cyprus no civilian authority—for I believe, economic reasons. With a battalion of troops in Cyprus, somebody in the External Affairs Department, in his wisdom or stupidity—and I think the latter—decided to close our embassy there. At the moment, with a battalion of troops in Cyprus, we do not have one single person representing the civil power. I am sure those senators with extensive military experience will realize what an impossible and unfair situation that is for troops to be placed in.

As has been said over and over again, at this particular time we are faced with a fait accompli. As the Leader of the Opposition has said, there is really no choice. We cannot but vote for the resolution, for the simple reason that we must put ourselves in the position, I think, of approving this effort on the part of Canada to participate in peacekeeping around the world.

I concur in the tribute that the Leader of the Government has paid to the late Right Honourable Lester B. Pearson, who won a deserved Nobel prize for his initiative in this matter. It is an initiative that has brought a great deal of credit to Canada—and would have brought much more if in recent years it had been managed rather better than it has been.

I have one final question that I hope the Leader of the Government will find it possible to answer before we vote on this resolution. I ask: What is the intention in regard to our force in Cyprus? We are given to understand, although we have no precise figures and I hope we will have them, that there has been some diminution in that force as a result of this decision to participate in a new United Nations Emergency Force. My own understanding is that it could well be that our forces there, as part of the contingent in Cyprus, were already under strength. Certainly it seemed to be the wish that that battalion be brought up to full strength, with the sending of the company that has been left at home to help them out. There seems to be evidence now from various dispatches that our force is spun out far too thin along that very dangerous Green Line. I hope that we will be informed as to exactly what the situation is there. How many fewer troops have we there than we had a month or so ago?

I have not given the Leader of the Government notice of these questions and perhaps it is unfair to ask him to respond at once, but I am sure with his vast knowledge of what is going on in such matters, even if I do not always agree with his decisions, he will be able in due course to answer these questions, which I might say have not been answered to my knowledge anywhere.

[Hon. Mr. Grosart.]

Hon. Mr. Forsey: May I ask Senator Grosart a question? I understood him to lay down the principle that Parliament ought always to be consulted before any action of this sort was taken. What would he do if Parliament had been dissolved and a crisis arose, in which it seemed desirable to take immediate action and Parliament might not be available for some weeks at least, possibly months?

Hon. Mr. Grosart: Honourable senators, I may say to Senator Forsey that that question has been asked a hundred times whenever this matter arises. Of course, the answer is that Parliament can be called. We have had examples recently—such things as railway strikes. There is no possible problem whatsoever, in my view, in calling Parliament to meet. Parliament can be called together in 24 hours.

Hon. Mr. Forsey: Honourable senators, I am sorry to interrupt but the Honourable Senator Grosart has not caught the point of my question. I said "when Parliament had been dissolved." Last summer, at the time of the railway strike, Parliament had not been dissolved. But after Parliament has been dissolved a certain length of time is required to hold an election and a certain length of time is required for the return of the writs, and the new Parliament cannot legally come into existence until the writs have been returned.

I speak subject to correction by honourable senators learned in the law, but I think this is the case, and I think documents will show that a very considerable period can elapse between one Parliament being dissolved and another new Parliament being legally competent to meet; and during that period it may be necessary in some international situation for the government to act immediately and not wait some weeks or even months for the Parliament to be called.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: That is not the only case.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: Honourable senators, on recollection, Senator Forsey, I did not take your question quite too clearly. I missed the word "dissolution" but you did use it. That question also is an old one and the answer is equally obvious. If the principle is that Parliament shall be called, then Parliament will be called, if Parliament can be called. I need hardly argue the point that if there is no Parliament the principle is still there but is not operative. That does not in any way affect the principle that Parliament shall be called. Of course, in the case of a resolution to that effect—and the resolution I discussed concerned only the peacekeeping operations—if Parliament were in dissolution, then the policy would provide for that special case. This has been discussed. Mr. Mackenzie King many years ago discussed this kind of policy in which he took that very matter into consideration. This can be arranged as part of the policy. It could be that the old Parliament could be called back. I do not know what the decision might be. Of course it could be.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I think the government has no mandate in any way under those circumstances.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: I do not know. Some may say that the government has no mandate, can do nothing. I would not agree with that. I would agree that the right policy can be laid down which would provide for this very difficult situation that Senator Forsey suggests.

• (2050)

Hon. Mr. O'Leary: Honourable senators, before the government leader replies to Senator Grosart, may I ask him this question? He says that the Secretary General of the United Nations has given a guarantee that the UN will pay the cost of this operation.

Hon. Mr. Martin: No, not a guarantee.

Hon. Mr. O'Leary: Well, at least he has said so.

Hon. Mr. Martin: No.

Hon. Mr. O'Leary: Well, that is what my friend said.

Hon. Mr. Martin: No. What I said was that there would be an obligation on the part of the membership of the United Nations.

Hon. Mr. O'Leary: Well, there would be an obligation; but we have no guarantee at all, because if he cannot collect the dues of the members of the UN, and they are now in arrears, how in the name of God is he going to collect $30 million for peacekeeping?

Hon. Mr. Martin: If I may, Senator O'Leary, I will answer that in my later remarks.

Hon. Ernest C. Manning: Honourable senators, I concur in the conclusion expressed by the Leader of the Opposition and by Senator Grosart, that under the circumstances we in this chamber really have no alternative but to endorse this resolution approving the use of Canadian personnel as part of the peacekeeping force in the Middle East. It is hard, however, to escape the conclusion which also has been expressed that it is an affront to Parliament for the government to seek such approval after it has already committed Canadians to this role and when in fact the Canadian personnel are already in Egypt.

There have been many debates on this question of whether a government should act without the consent of Parliament in matters of this kind. A good case can be made for drawing a distinction between committing the armed forces of a country to a theatre of conflict; that is, to participate in an actual war, and committing men to play some role in a peacekeeping force. I think the Canadian people would have respect for the government in the latter case if the government made the decision, carried it out and then assumed full responsibility for its decision. What many Canadians find offensive is for the government to make a decision which cannot be reversed, and then, after it has been implemented, seek to shift responsibility by calling upon Parliament to endorse what has already been done. That is the most regrettable part in this whole exercise.

I would not criticize the Government of Canada if it had made the decision and sent these men and then stood by that decision and taken the full responsibility for its actions. But having made its decision and having already sent the men, it is not appropriate for the government to come to Parliament now and say, "We want your endorsation so that if things do not work out as we hope they will, you will take the responsibility, not us."

