House of Commons Debates

THIRD SESSION—ELEVENTH PARLIAMENT.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

THURSDAY, April 27, 1911.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE—MR. HUGHES.

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege. In the Ottawa 'Free Press' and I understand in some other papers of recent date there appears an item, trival it is true, but still more or less important, to the effect that I had apologized to the legal gentleman in the city of Montreal who had defended the prisoner in the recent Masonic trial in that city. I thought I was very fair to that gentleman in explaining to the House, and the country that he had not appealed on his own account to religious fanaticism in order to defend the prisoner. I think I went much further than I might have been expected to do. He explained, as I stated to the House, that his object in referring to religious fanaticism in the trial to show that the prisoner had no intent to commit robbery for the sake of robbery itself, but was carried away by the spirit of fanaticism characteristic of all religious fanatics. I made no apology to any one. I merely recited the statement in fairplay to the gentleman who conducted the defence on that occasion. The object of the barrister was to show that the prisoner was carried away with fanaticism, and had no intention to rob. That was the reason why he brought it in. The fanaticism was admitted as regards the prisoner, but not on the part of the lawyer further than to explain that the prisoner had no intent to commit robbery for his own advantage.

CHARGES AGAINST MR. A. LANCTOT, M.P.

Mr. W. M. GERMAN, (Welland). Mr. Speaker, I beg leave to move that the third report of the Select Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections be now concurred in. Before submitting the motion, it is perhaps advisable that I should as shortly as possible explain to the House my views in regard to the evidence that was taken before that committee. The committee had several meetings, and examined a number of witnesses, and were aided in their investigations by counsel employed for the gentleman who made the charge, and for the gentleman against whom the charge was made. Speaking for myself, I wish to say that the committee were very considerably aided by the intelligent manner in which those gentlemen conducted their respective sides of the case. They both showed themselves to be keen examiners, good lawyers, and very correct in their mode of conducting proceedings of this kind. The charge is a very serious one, in so far as a member of this House is concerned. That charge is as follows:

That in the course of the years 1908, 1909 and 1910, irregularities, abuses, frauds, malversations and robberies have been committed in the shops and stores of the government of Canada at St. Joseph de Sorel and in the city of Sorel, in the electoral district of Richelieu.

That barrels and tins of paint and other goods of this nature have been illegally and fraudulently taken and carried away from the said stores and shops and transported to the house of Mr. Adelard Lanctot, then and now a member of the House of Commons of Canada, for the electoral district of Richelieu, which house was then being built on George street, at Sorel above mentioned, and ready to be painted.

That with these goods and paint, paint works, decoration and varnish works, have been done by the employees of the government of Canada under the supervision of the painters' foreman employed by said government at the said place, at the government's expense and during the hours supposed to be devoted to the government and for which said employees were paid by the government, these men registering each day as if they had really worked for the government, and this during weeks and months; the materials and time, thus furnished, are valued at about one thousand or twelve hundred dollars.

That said goods were so fraudulently appropriated to, and said work so fraudulently done at the expense of the government of Canada for the benefit of the said Adelard Lanctot, then and now a member of the House as aforesaid, with his knowledge, assent and approval, the said Adelard Lanctot abusively and fraudulently profiting at the public expense and to the public detriment by his position as member of the House.

Now, that appears to me to be a very serious charge made against an hon. member of this House, and before the House comes to the conclusion that the hon. member for Richelieu is to be condemned on a charge so serious, it seems to me that the evidence, and all the evidence taken, should be very carefully weighed and very fairly considered. On the day the charge was given utterance to in the House, Mr. Lanctot, the member for Richelieu, made a statement in which he said that in 1910, in consequence of the serious illness of Mrs. Lanctot, his wife, who was away at a health resort, it was necessary for him to be considerably away from home, and it was—I think he used the word 'impossible' —at any rate, he was unable to get painters in Sorel to paint his house, and he, therefore, spoke to Mr. Jean Baptiste Pagé, who was foreman of the painters in the government yards at Sorel, to know if he could let him have the men to paint the house, and would look after the painting of the House. Mr. Pagé lived across the street from the building which Mr. Lanctot was having painted. Mr. Pagé told him that he would be glad to do it, the expression he used being 'with pleasure, if you can get the permission of Mr. Papineau' who was the director or superintendent of the government shipyard at Sorel. The men were permitted to go and work on Mr. Lanctot's house. Mr. Lanctot said that he had on different occasions asked to have an account of the men's time and the paint that was supplied sent to him so that he could from time to time pay the men's wages, but Mr. Champagne who was the timekeeper at the government yards, and who kept the time of the men, told him to wait until the work was all completed, and then he would send in a full account of the whole work, and it could be paid in one lump sum. I apprehend, if that is the true condition of affairs, that no person inside or outside this House will condemn Mr. Lanctot for having fraudulently, or with intention of fraud, used the employees of the government, or government material for the painting of his house. It is simply a question as to whether that statement is true or untrue, as to whether or not the evidence which was adduced before the committee bears out the statement of Mr. Lanctot.

In the first place, it is alleged that he could have procured men in Sorel to do the work and that it was not necessary for him to go to the government yard to secure employees to do it. The evidence on that particular point is not voluminous. There were only three witnesses called, and the first witness called was Mr. Henry Proulx, a contractor in Sorel. He makes the statement that there were four painting contractors in Sorel who could have done this work for Mr. Lanctot. His evidence will be found on page 48 of the printed evidence. But, he says this:

I do not know that they would have had the time to do the work.

So that his evidence as to that is more guesswork than anything else. He says that there are four painting contractors there who might have been got to do the work, but he does not know if they would have had the time. Of these four only two are called. A Mr. Georges Cartier, a painter is called, and Auguste Payette, a painter, is also called, two out of the four contractors whom Mr. Proulx said were able to do the work. Why the other two were not called I cannot understand because I may say that the committee gave every possible opportunity to the learned counsel, Mr. McDougall, who is a very able lawyer, evidently well accustomed to conduct a case of this nature, and well accustomed to conducting cases of any nature as he showed himself to be an expert cross-examiner, and an expert conductor of the case. But yet, he only calls two of these witnesses. What does Cartier say:

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). What page?

Mr. GERMAN. Mr. Cartier's evidence will be found on pages 29-36. He says that in the month of November, 1909, almost a year before Mr. Lanctot's house was ready for the painter, he met Mr. Lanctot and asked him about doing the painting. He says that he asked for the job of painting the house and that Mr. Lanctot said he would not give the job without seeing him, but that he did not see him again. This was in November, prior to the July or August when the painting work began. Mr. Cartier, in his cross-examination, admits that during the year 1910 he was busy with other jobs of painting, that he had work to do. He went to the city of Montreal to do certain work, his time was occupied, and on cross-examination he had to admit that the painting work which he had done in Sorel had not been satisfactory to, at any rate, some of his customers. It was very evident from his own statement that he was not a man whom any person would be willing to trust with the responsibility of looking after work of that kind, particularly when the owner of the work and the man who wanted the work done would not be present himself. I think, therefore, that Mr. Cartier's evidence is not such as should impress the members of this House with the idea that he could have done the work, and done it with satisfaction. Mr. Augustin Payette gives his evidence at page 120, and he says that one evening in March, 1910, he met Mr. Lanctot on the street about nine o'clock and said to him:

You won't forget me for the painting.

And that Mr. Lanctot said:

I will think it over.

Nothing was further said. These were the only two men who were called to even say that they could have done the work. Mr. Payette, on cross-examination, also showed very clearly that he was not a man of that standing as a painter, or as a contracting painter, whom a person would be willing to trust to do a good piece of work such as this was supposed to be. These are the only two witnesses, and this the only evidence to controvert the proposition of Mr. Lanctot, that he could not get men in Sorel during the months of July, August and September, when he wanted the painting done. I cannot imagine that any person with the feelings of fairness will say that Mr. Lanctot was overstepping the mark when he made the statement that he could not get men in Sorel during those months to do his painting.

That being the case he goes to the government yards. In May, 1910, between the 15th and 30th, he had a conversation with Mr. Pagé—acquaintances, it is sure, and no doubt, friends. He met Mr. Pagé and asked him if he could overlook the painting and lend men to him from the government yards. Mr. Pagé says:

Yes, if you will get the consent of Mr. Papineau, the director.

About the 29th of May—the evidence is the 29th, but it was evidently the 28th as the 29th was on a Sunday—he went to the government shipyards to see Mr. Papineau. Upon going there he saw Mr. Champagne, and he saw Mr. Pagé. He asked one of them to see Mr. Papineau and see if Mr. Papineau would consent to allow the men to work on the house. They found, and it is proved clearly now, that Mr. Papineau was away from Sorel. Mr. Papineau says that he left Sorel early in the morning of the 28th, went to Montreal where he stayed until Monday afternoon, attending some fête or church entertainment that was being held in Montreal on Sunday. It is very clear that Mr. Papineau was not in Sorel on Saturday the 28th of May or on Sunday the 29th of May. But, he did see Mr. Champagne. Mr. Champagne is the timekeeper, and would be the man that one would naturally be inclined to speak to with regard to a matter of this kind particularly when Mr. Papineau was away. Mr. Champagne said:

Yes, we can let you have the men.

And Mr. Lanctot said:

Keep an account of their time and I will pay you for the men's time.

On that day, or a day or two previous, he is not sure which, he had a conversation with Mr. Pagé, the foreman painter, about the supply of paint, and he told Mr. Pagé to get the paint required from time to time from the firm known as Cyrille Labelle & Co., of Sorel, with which firm, Mr. Lanctot said, he had an account. Mr. Pagé said to Mr. Lanctot: They may not have the paint you will require. It was then arranged that if they had not the paint in stock which was required, Mr. Pagé was to lend the paint from the government store, was to keep an accurate account of the paint used; and Mr. Lanctot would pay for the paint after the completion of the job. That is all there was about the transaction so far as Mr. Lanctot was concerned. He was very seldom in Sorel during that summer; he was back and forth from time to time, but not very frequently. He saw that the work was going on, and that Mr. Pagé was looking after it. That being the case, and if that is all there was to the matter, surely there was no fraud and there was no indiscretion on the part of Mr. Lanctot. He went to these men to borrow the men required; the foreman consented to allow the use of the men; they were to keep an accurate account of the time of the men and of the supplies, and all were to be paid for. That, to my mind, is exactly what happened.

It is contended that the accounts were falsified, that certain men worked on Mr. Lanctot's house for a longer period of time than was charged for in the accounts. One Alfred Douaire, a painter, states in his evidence that he worked on Mr. Lanctot's house for eight weeks, during July, August, September and October. He kept no account or record of the time, and it will be noticed that in his declaration read to the House when the charge was made, he does not state that he worked eight weeks or any specified time. But he says in his evidence that on his conscience he worked eight weeks during the period referred to. He is down in the account which was filed as exhibit No. 2, for only 15 days' work at $2 a day—and there is no dispute about the daily wages which are admitted to have been the correct wages the government paid the men. Now, it is contended that Alfred Douaire's evidence on that point is to be accepted, that he worked eight weeks instead of 15 days. Mr. Pagé says that he kept the time of every man from day to day. It was not shown that he has any personal interest in the matter. When he was first spoken to about it, he told Mr. Lanctot he would be willing that the men should go there if Mr. Lanctot got the approval of Mr. Papineau. He was to keep the time of the men, and he swears he kept the time of the men and kept it accurately. He had his time book, which was produced before the committee shown as exhibit 23. That book was criticised most carefully. He was cross-examined at great length by Mr. McDougall on his time book. Every opportunity was given to show inaccuracies or falsification; and, after a thorough examination by Mr. McDougall of Mr. Pagé and his time book, the book was shown to be in every particular absolutely accurate—no suspicion of falsification in the book. He kept the time from day to day, and each week he supplied Mr. Champagne, the time-keeper, with a sheet showing the time of the men as he had kept it. These sheets were kept by Mr. Champagne until the work was completed and the account sent to Mr. Lanctot was made up from these sheets and from Mr. Pagé's time-book. Now, it is asked that the statement of Mr. Douaire should be accepted in preference to the statement of Mr. Pagé, that we are to believe that Mr. Douaire worked eight weeks and that, instead of keeping an account of eight weeks' time in his book, Mr. Pagé deliberately and fraudulently failed to keep account of Douaire's time, and in that way defrauded the government. I do not quite see how any person of fair mind can possible reach such a conclusion. It can be easily imagined that Mr. Douaire is mistaken. He is not working continuously for the government. His evidence in that particular shows that for many days, and for weeks at a time, he was not working for the government but was laid off. It can easily be imagined that Mr. Douaire, in that matter, was mistaken. But we cannot reject the statement of Mr. Pagé without at the same time holding him responsible for perjury, for he deliberately says: There is my book; I kept the time from day to day; I marked it down each day in that book. He cannot be mistaken; either his statement is correct or he is deliberately perjuring himself. I will ask any hon. member which of these men he is prepared to believe. Are you going to say that the evidence of Mr. Douaire, who worked from time to time and who kept no record of his time—does not pretend that he did; admits that he did not—is to be taken against the evidence of Mr. Pagé, who did keep the time and kept it correctly. I should hardly think so; I should hardly think that any jury or any court would say that Mr. Douaire's evidence was to be accepted and that of Mr. Pagé rejected. The only man besides Mr. Douaire who says that he worked for a greater number of days than is shown by the time-book kept by Mr. Pagé is Mr. Louis Paul. There is a peculiarity in regard to Mr. Louis Paul's statement. At page 61 of the evidence is given exhibit No. 14, in which Mr. Paul states that he worked 30 days or one month. It is shown in the evidence by Henri Proulx, who is called as a witness, that Louis Paul gave him this statement in which he says:

I declare that I have worked at Mr. Lanctot's house for one month, paid for at the government.

On the time-book, Mr. Louis Paul is down as having worked 20 days at $2 a day. When that statement was placed before the committee I unhesitatingly, and with the approval of all the members of the committee, ruled that the statement was not evidence, it was only marked for identification, with the expectation that Mr. Louis Paul would be called as a witness to verify the statement himself. I submit that that statement should not have been offered as an exhibit in this evidence, and it should not be considered, because it is certainly not evidence of any kind. There was no opportunity to cross-examine Louis Paul, this is his bald statement, not even made to the committee, but given to an outsider who is called as a witness. He says he worked thirty days, and even applying the same rule that you apply to Mr. Douaire and Mr. Pagé, where does it land us? Supposing Louis Paul had been there and made that statement; 'I worked for thirty days,' he kept no accurate account of it, he kept no account of any kind. Mr. Pagé did keep an account, and says he kept it correctly. I submit that the evidence of Mr. Pagé, on these matters should be accepted, rather than the evidence of Douaire, or the evidence of Louis Paul, even though that evidence were admissible, which it is not. Those are the only two witnesses called who say they worked a longer time than is shown in the time-book kept by Pagé. Well it appears to me that the committee would be doing a wrong thing to doubt the evidence of Pagé, who appears to be an eminently respectable man, and a highly intelligent man, who was not shown to be in any way personally connected with the matter, who states frankly, and above board, what his connection with the matter was, with an apparent desire to tell the truth, apparently having been desirous of keeping a correct account of the time of all these men. I say we should not place the statements of these men who kept no time as against the statement by Mr. Pagé, and as I say, those are the only two who were called, the only evidence there is of any time having been worked which was not charged for.

But it is said that the work did not cost nearly as much to Mr. Lanctot as it was worth, and that that is evidence that the men's time has not been fully accounted for, and that all the material which went into the painting of the house had not been charged for by the government and paid for by Mr. Lanctot. Now, what is the position with regard to that? We find that Mr. Lanctot paid the government for 217 days painting on his house. There were about four days of ordinary labourers, who were not working on the painting work, which made it a little more than that; but the labour on the painting came to $367.59. Now, Mr. Douaire, the star witness of the gentleman who made this charge, himself admits, at page 36, that 216 days' work was all that was necessary to do the painting of that house, and 217 days work was paid for by Mr. Lanctot at the prices paid by the government, and Mr. Douaire says that 216 days' work is what he calculated. Now, we find there is $367.52 for labourers on the painting. An account was kept of all the paint that was supplied, and Mr. Pagé tells us what was done. He says that he mixed the paints himself. When he found that paint could not be obtained from Labelle & Company, at Sorel, he mixed the quantity of paint to be used on Mr. Lanctot's house, and set it apart for that use and for none other. The whole of that paint was not used, but the whole of it amounted, in value, to $81.60. As soon as that account came in to Mr. Lanctot after the work was completed, he paid the money. Mr. Papineau replaced the paint, having purchased it from the same people, I presume, the government buy their supplies from; Mr. Papineau purchased the paint at $81.60, and Mr. Lanctot paid him the money. Then there was $18.95, an account with Labelle & Company, for paints, and there was an account of $25 with Mr. Joseph Rivet for painting blinds, windows, &c., making a total of $493.07 for the painting. Now, we are reminded that Mr. Douaire says that the painting should have been worth $950, but he calculates in the $950, about 20 per cent of a profit. Another witness says about $1,200, but they all admit that 217 days is the requisite number of days to do the painting, and then it is a question of what the paint itself was worth.

Now, to establish that with accuracy, three witnesses are called who give their evidence in regard to that matter at pages 201, 204, and 215 of the evidence. The first witness is Mr. Trudeau, manager of the painting department of Henry Morgan & Company, of Montreal. He has occupied that position for 11 years, is an experienced man in painting work. He went to Mr. Lanctot's and measured the house, took the number of cubic yards in the house which had been painted, and can speak with accuracy. These men who gave their evidence as to the cost of painting did not measure the house, they all admit that they did not measure the house, and they are speaking from guess. Mr. Trudeau went there and measured the house, and he put the number of yards at 685, and he puts the value of the painting done $491.38, as against $493 which it actually cost. Then we have at page 204, Mr. Joseph Dagenais, sworn. He lives at Montreal, he is a painter and contractor, and has been a painter for 16 years. He went to Mr. Lanctot's and made a measurement of the number of yards of painting that was done, and he put the value of the work at $502.71. Here I wish to distinguish between the cost and the value, because all these men say that in estimating the value they add a profit of 10 to 15 per cent; he puts the value of the work done at $502.71, and he measured accurately the number of yards of painting, and indeed went there for the purpose of making a statement of the value of the work. Then at page 215, we have the statement of Mr. Joseph Edmond Gauthier, of 354 Champlain street, Montreal, manager for the painting department of Castle & Sons, Montreal.

He has had many years experience at painting work. He went to Sorel, measured the house, took the number of yards of paint work and he puts the value at $461. There are three men of experience, none of them having the slightest interest in this matter, one way or the other, all leading business men of Montreal, and is there any person who will be bold enough to say that these men will come here and deliberately perjure themselves for the sake of satisfying the desires of Mr. Lanctot or any one else. They are experienced men, they went there to make the measurements, they did make them, they speak with authority, and that is the statement they give. Two of them are below the amount it cost Mr. Lanctot and one of them is only $4 or $5 above that amount. Remember they are including in that the contractor's profit as well as the cost of the work. So I say that when Mr. Lanctot made his statement in the House or in the committee, that he thought the work was costing him more than it should have done, he was speaking by the book. I cannot apprehend that any one will feel that the work cost Mr. Lanctot actually less than it should have cost. When you have got that far you have got just as far as the evidence will carry you in regard to those particulars. In the first place was the time of the men, employees of the government, who worked on Mr. Lanctot's house, fully and completely paid for? The evidence is overwhelming that it was. There cannot be any evidence shown to the contrary excepting by the merest possible partisan suspicion. The fact remains that men who knew, unprejudiced and unbiassed, swore to the records as being a truthful record of the situation. The men's time was paid for fully. The paint supplied by the government was returned in full and that being so, every element of fraud in regard to the matter is removed and disposed of. Whether or not it was advisable for the foreman of the yards to allow the government employees to work on Mr. Lanctot's house or on any person else's house, is another question altogether with which the committee have nothing to do, and that was settled very emphatically at the first meeting of the committee. A question was then suggested by the hon. member for Carleton, N.B., (Mr. Carvell) as to whether or not we were going further than to investigate the simple charge against Mr. Lanctot; and the hon. member for East Hamilton (Mr. Barker) who attended all the meetings of the committee, stated then, with the approval of all the committee, that it was the charge against Mr. Lanctot that was to be investigated, only and solely, and that is the one which was investigated. Of course if Mr. Lanctot had been shown to have been guilty of any wrong-doing less than the serious charge made, I suppose it would have been the duty of the committee to so find. For instance, if a man is indicted for murder, and the jury can only find him guilty of manslaughter, it is their duty to find him guilty of manslaughter, but we certainly cannot find any evidence to establish any suspicion of fraud or wrong-doing on the part of Mr. Lanctot in connection with this matter.

But they try to go further. They say that fraud was shown. One of the contentions of Mr. McDougall was that there was a conspiracy between Mr. Lanctot, Champagne and Pagé to defraud the government. You could hardly have a conspiracy to defraud when no fraud was attempted, intended or perpetrated. Mr. Lanctot secured the men and it is said that certain of the men's time which was kept by Pagé was marked against them in the government time-books, they not being present. That happens to be the case. Mr. Lanctot's house is in Sorel. The shipyard is in what is known as St. Joseph de Sorel, across the river. Most of these men live in Sorel. In order to have their time properly marked in the government books they would have to cross the river three times a day, record their time of leaving and then go back to Sorel. In order to avoid the necessity of doing that, and to save them the expense of crossing the ferry, Mr. Pagé instructed one of the men to keep the time of these men as though they were present themselves. Whatever may be said in regard to the management of that particular branch of the department, I submit we have here nothing to say or do unless it is shown that Mr. Lanctot was a party to that, and that it was being perpetrated for the purpose of permitting a crime against the government. It is absolutely certain that no matter what Pagé did in regard to that, or what Champagne thought, Mr. Lanctot knew nothing about it. He states and the evidence shows that he supposed the time was being properly kept and charged against him, and him only, that it was not being paid for by the government and that he frequently, during the whole course of this work, was asking Champagne for the account and was anxious and willing to pay for the work. But Champagne explains it, and says that he did not want to mix matters up, and thought it better for himself and the men that the time should be kept as other government time, and then when the whole work was completed the time would be sent in to Mr. Lanctot, and he would pay the bill. Then they say the time of the men was sent in to the department as though the men were doing work on government work whereas they were working on Mr. Lanctot's house. That is a matter which must be conceded. The evidence shows that the men working from day to day on Mr. Lanctot's house were being put down as working those days on government work or at least not as on Mr. Lanctot's house, and they must have been put down as doing government work, because they were paid from time to time by the government. But that was a thing with which Champagne had exclusively to do, with which Mr. Lanctot had nothing to do. Mr. Lanctot tells us that his desire was continuously to pay the men as the work was going on. Champagne, for purposes of his own which he explained in his evidence, did this without the knowledge of Mr. Lanctot, without any information to Mr. Lanctot that he was doing it, without knowledge on the part of Mr. Lanctot that it was being done. So far as Mr. Lanctot was concerned, he was under the impression that the work was being charged to him, and to him directly, and that when the work was completed the bill would be sent in.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Did Mr. Lanctot understand that he was making this compact or arrangement with the men or with the department?

Mr. GERMAN. With the men through Mr. Champagne and Mr. Pagé. The evidence shows clearly what happened, and we cannot go outside the record. The evidence shows that Mr. Lanctot went to the yards, having first spoken to Pagé about being able to secure the men. He went to the yeards to see Papineau, to get the consent of Papineau, he got the consent of Champagne, and Mr. Lanctot that day left Sorel, and was not back for several weeks, and was there for only a little time in the summer; Champagne and Pagé were the men exclusively and solely responsible for the sending of the employees and the providing of the paint.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I am merely asking for information. Might I be permitted one more question? Did the officials understand it in the same way as Mr. Lanctot?

Mr. GERMAN. Does my hon. friend mean Champagne and Pagé?

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I mean the men who made this arrangement—did they understand it in the same way that Mr. Lanctot understood it, according to my hon. friend's apprehension?

Mr. GERMAN. As to how the men understood it there is no evidence at all.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Not the men, but the managers, the foremen.

Mr. GERMAN. Champagne and Pagé understood it just as Mr. Lanctot understood it. They understood that the time of the men was to be kept and that Mr. Lanctot was to pay the men when the work was completed. Mr. Champagne, of course, understood that these men were being paid at that time by the government, but outside of Mr. Champagne there was no other official of the government who knew how the men were being paid. Mr. Pagé did not know; he kept the time and returned it to Mr. Champagne as being time for work done on Mr. Lanctot's house. Mr. Champagne, instead of sending in these accounts day by day or week by week to Mr. Lanctot, and having Mr. Lanctot pay the accounts, sent in the time to the government, and had it paid by the government, as if those men were doing ordinary government work, and kept it against Mr. Lanctot, and Mr. Lanctot paid it at the end.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). The reason I asked was this: If the officials understood it in the same way Mr. Lanctot understood it, according to my hon. friend's view, I do not see why the government had anything to do with paying the men at all.

Mr. GERMAN. Mr. Champagne explains that in his evidence where he says that he did not want to pay the men himself, as they might think that he was getting more money than they were getting, and so he sent in the bill to the department, and the men were paid by the department. As to the propriety of Mr. Champagne doing that, I have nothing to say, and I do not know that this House, on this particular question at this time, has anything to say; that will be for the minister to ascertain later on. But at any rate, Mr. Lanctot knew nothing about that. Mr. Champagne knew the men were being paid by the government; he explains why he was doing it that way and claims that he believes he was acting properly. Whether he was or not is another matter, but Mr. Lanctot knew nothing about it, and Mr. Pagé knew nothing about it.

Mr. TALYOR (Leeds). Lanctot knew he was not paying the men.

Mr. GERMAN. Lanctot knew the account was being kept and that the account would be rendered to him as soon as the work was completed, and that was done, and the money was paid by Lanctot, as soon as the work was completed. There was some evidence as to the men being instructed to carry paint in a roundabout way from the shipyards to Mr. Lanctot's house so as to avoid being seen by the merchants in Sorel, and by Mr. Papineau, the director, but that is a class of evidence that did not impress me, and I do not think it impressed the committee, as being of any great weight, if any weight at all, because it is absurd to suppose that these men would receive instructions to avoid Mr. Papineau when it is known that Mr. Papineau lived within a few feet of Mr. Lanctot's house, and directly on the same street. The whole evidence, Mr. Speaker, is divulged in what I have stated. There are two or three men down on exhibit No. 2 as having done some day work—it seemed that Mr. Lanctot wanted a large telephone pole which was in front of his house and which was an incumbrance, removed, and the superintendent of the Bell Telephone Company said he could not get any men, but that if Mr. Lanctot would supply the men he would have the pole removed; which clearly demonstrates that even day labourers were not very easy to get in Sorel at that time. Mr. Lanctot had two or three men from the government yards help remove the pole, and their pay for a day and a half was paid by him. There is no doubt, and there is no dispute of the fact, that outside of Alfred Douaire and Louis Paul every man who worked on Lanctot's house was paid in full. As to that there can be no dispute. The only two men as to whom there is a suggestion that there was not complete payment is Alfred Douaire and Louis Paul, and I have stated what the evidence is in regard to these two. The rest of the account is correct and will be admitted by every member of the committee. Now, was all the paint that was taken from the government yards and used on Mr. Lanctot's house carefully and accurately returned?

Mr. PORTER. What about the paint that was spoiled and not used?

Mr. GERMAN. I will come to that in a moment. The only evidence as to the quantity of paint that was prepared and taken to Mr. Lanctot's house is the evidence of Mr. Pagé, and he is the only man who knows. There are men who did carry paint there, but they do not know, and do not say in what quantities they took it, but Mr. Pagé says he prepared all the paint that was taken from the government yards to Mr. Lanctot's house; he kept a correct account of all the paint, and he says that more paint was prepared and charged against Mr. Lanctot than was actually used as all the paint he had prepared for Lanctot's house had not been used in painting it, and some of it was still on hand when the work was completed, and as it was not the kind of paint that could be used in the government works it was not used, but Mr. Lanctot paid for it, and it was returned to the government stores. Now there is the question as to the independence of parliament.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Before the hon. gentleman leaves the evidence—what business had this man, an employee of the government, to take away property belonging to the government and deposit it on Mr. Lanctot's premises? Was there any explanation of that? How did he come to do it? What justification is there for it, or what orders had he to do it? It strikes me as most peculiar.

Mr. GERMAN. He had no orders excepting the orders he took from himself and to himself. He was asked by Mr. Lanctot if, being unable to get all the paint that was required from the Labelle Company, he might supply some paint and keep a record of it, and later he would return it. It will be remembered that Mr. Pagé suggested to Mr. Lanctot when he spoke to him about the paint and told him to get it from Labelle and Company, Mr. Pagé said: They may not have all the kinds of paint you want, and I will let you have some from the government, and Mr. Lanctot said: Keep a record of that paint, and I will return it, and Mr. Lanctot did return it. Whether or not Mr. Pagé should have done that is another matter, but Mr. Lanctot was acting in perfect good faith and every thing he did was perfectly justified by the circumstances as they arose.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I suppose Pagé has been dismissed?

Mr. GERMAN. I do not think so. He did not say he had when he was before the committee, and I do not suppose he would be for he impressed me as being a good employee of the government. And whether or not that has been the custom in the yards of lending men to do work on private houses or lending paint for work on private houses I do not know. There is no evidence as to that, but at any rate Mr. Pagé appeared to feel that he was quite justified in what he did in lending the paint so long as he kept a correct account of it, and saw it was returned to the government stores. There is some question of Mr. Lanctot having violated the independence of parliament——

Mr. HAGGART (Winnipeg). Before you leave the report, will you kindly give us some reasons for handing out this severe censure to Mr. Blondin?

Mr. GERMAN. Before I finish I will give my hon. friend from Winnipeg my view with regard to that matter. There has been a suggestion that Mr. Lanctot has violated the independence of parliament.

There is an Act of parliament which declares that certain things done by a member of parliament shall be a violation of that Act, and by reason of which he shall not be entitled to occupy his seat in this House; but that is a statutory enactment, and a man cannot be guilty of a breach of the independence of parliament unless he is guilty of a breach of the Independence of Parliament Act. The gentlemen who prepared what is known as the minority report probably feel that they cannot possibly succeed in establishing the charges made against Mr. Lanctot, and, trying to read between the lines, and perhaps to create some feeling of suspicion, they would like to accuse him of something. But I cannot see how Mr. Lanctot or any one else can be accused of a violation of the independence of parliament unless he has violated some Act of parliament. Now, the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Haggart) has asked what justification there is for the last paragraph of this report. That paragraph reads as follows:

> Your committee feel that in view of the very serious nature of the charges made they should express an opinion on the propriety of Mr. Blondin making the charges in the manner he did. Your committee do not wish to state that Mr. Blondin did not believe there was truth in the allegations, or that he did not act from a bona fide belief in their truthfulness, but the committee think that before making so serious a charge against an honourable member of the House of Commons, he should have made some independent inquiry to verify the truthfulness of the charges made, and which he apparently did not do. The Minister of Marine was called as a witness. His evidence as to this on page 189, where he says he had information that no fraud had been committed and that all labour supplied by the shipyards had been paid for and all material supplied had been returned, and which information he would have been pleased to give Mr. Blondin had he applied for same.
> Your committee think that if Mr. Blondin had made these inquiries he would not and should not have made these charges.

I think the assertion contained in that last clause of the report is absolutely justified. The evidence not only fails entirely to establish any wrong-doing on the part of Mr. Lanctot, but disproves any wrong-doing on his part. Mr. Blondin could have inquired, had he seen fit, from the Minister of Marine, and could have got every particle of evidence that was given before the committee, before he made his charge. Before a member of this House makes a charge of so serious a nature against another member of this House, it seems to me that he should exhaust every means of ascertaining the truthfulness of that charge, and that he should not on mere suspicion, or on the statements of men who had been employed by the government, and who were evidently disgruntled, make such charges as those made by Mr. Blondin. To my mind the evidence disproves every charge of wrongdoing on the part of Mr. Lanctot, and I have no hesitation in moving the resolution which I now have the honour to place in your hands.

Mr. F. D. MONK (Jacques Cartier). Mr. Speaker, it is a matter of regret that in a controversy of this kind the Committee on Privileges and Elections was not able to come to a unanimous decision, because, as members of the House are well aware, when we are examining a matter before that committee, we are in a sense sitting in judgment upon our own selves, and dealing with circumstances which might become our own at any moment. We should, I think, before that committee, free ourselves as much as possible from partisan prejudices, and I must say that the annals of that committee to a very large extent bear out my contention, because on many different matters in the past it has come to unanimous conclusions. We must not forget either that that committee, perhaps the most important in parliament, has under its charge the care of the privileges of parliament, both collective and personal, and we know what the obtaining of those privileges, and their maintenance has cost of struggles in the past. If my hon. friend had narrowed down his argument merely to the question of the quantum, of the amount, which the sitting member in this case has actually refunded to the government, I do not think the discussion would last a very long time. If we adopt this report, and if we sanction the principle that members of parliament can secure the officers of the government for the performance of works such as were performed in this instance, and all other analogous works—if we can have our houses built and repaired by government employees, and in other respects use them for our own ends, and purposes, I know sufficiently well the temper of the members of this House, on both sides of it, to say that there never will be any very serious controversy about $66 or $99, or any other such sum in the settlement of the amount of the refund. But there is a far more significant and important question, the question of the principle upon which we are obliged to insist, upon the preservation of that principle depends to my mind the utility of every institution of parliament. History shows that without it parliament, from a body destined to represent and protect the people, has degenerated into an institution destined to betray the various interests which it was created to guard. The matter, therefore, to my mind goes far deeper and beyond what most of the argument of my hon. friend was addressed to. It is a most important matter, particularly at this moment, when we must admit that representative institutions have lost a great deal of favour, and with good reason, and that it is sought in every possible way to check the influence which those institutions are exercising.

Now, I do not wish to take up unduly the time of the House in discussing this question. I will come at once to the uncontroverted facts about which there is no doubt whatever. My hon. friend who has just spoken admits that. There are incidents as to which there is controversy, and as the debate progresses they will probably be insisted upon at greater length. I will speak of the facts regarding which there is no doubt whatever. What are they, Sir? Some years ago, in connection with the St. Lawrence ship channel the government established at Sorel extensive shipyards. Those shipyards are in the electoral division of Richelieu. The member for that division in 1909 started to build a house. I will not insist on the surrounding facts. They were excluded at the inquiry, and I think unwisely. I think it was unwise on the part of the committee to exclude the proof of what is the custom in those shipyards at Sorel, and what happened when Mr. Lanctot began the construction of that house.

The building of the fence and some of the woodwork was done by employees of the government. That was not laid down specifically in the charges and I will pass that over, but when you come to appreciate all the circumstances surrounding this incident, these are material facts. In 1910 the house was so far advanced that it was ready for painting and glazing. What did the sitting member do? He proceeded to have this part of the work—an important part of the construction and completion of the house—executed by government workmen, men attached to the shipyards and to have the material furnished from the government stores. The sitting member pointed out that it was his purpose and intention that the cost of the work should be refunded. I state that immediately in justice to the hon. member. I assume that for the purpose of the argument, but to any man who reads the evidence, as I think the house will perceive as I proceed, the undertaking to refund was not made sufficiently clear. It is not sufficiently apparent, and it is impossible for any man of the world to read that evidence throughout, and not come to the conclusion that this gentleman, like all others in that locality, intended to avail himself of the custom prevailing to get work done by government employees without any refund. There is the evidence of Mr. Pagé that the sitting member declared that he would refund; ten times, says Mr. Pagé, during the summer, he offered to give me money and I refused, because I told him that the workmen might suppose that I intended to keep the money myself, and that it was better to wait till the end. When you have read the evidence through you cannot come to any other conclusion than that the sitting member, not realizing the exceptional position in which he was, intended to avail himself of a general popular privilege in the town of Sorel, a notorious privilege which is known to exist because it is a matter of public notoriety that a man who can exert sufficient influence may obtain materials and get work done without reimbursing anybody for them. But, I assume for the purpose of my argument that this refund was to be made. It is vouched for by the sitting member himself and by Mr. Pagé. I may say at once with regard to this man Pagé, and this observation is provoked by the question put a moment ago by my hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. Borden, Halifax) who did not follow this inquiry, that his testimony is not worthy of confidence because at the beginning he started in to perpetrate an odious fraud upon the government.

I shall not follow my hon. friend (Mr. German) in his argument regarding the impossibility of having this work executed otherwise than by government employees. As a matter of fact there was only one witness produced, as my hon. friend says, a painter, a man of repute in the town of Sorel, who stated that he asked for the work, and that he was capable of executing it. It was not necessary to go further. Every man who has some experience knows that in the province of Quebec there is not a village where you cannot get painting done, and if the painting is of such a quality that it requires men of greater skill you can get them in any large centre, in Sorel, or in Montreal which is only a few miles from Sorel. But, why insist upon this point? If the work was done illegally and irregularly, if the sitting member entered into a contract that he had no right to enter into, it is no argument to say that he could not get workmen elsewhere. If he could not get the work done legally and legitimately he had to give it up; there was no other recourse for him. The circumstances do not authorize any illegality.

I repeat that I regret that we could not agree upon a report, but we have to deal with the facts as we find them without fear or favour since the question is before parliament to-day. The member seemed to think that he was in the same position as other people in the town of Sorel. I repeat that it is a matter of public notoriety in Quebec that these things are done daily in Sorel. You get material if you have sufficient pull, and you do not require much; you get cement, you get boards, paint, nails. Men have started stores from what they have obtained from the government workshops. The sitting member is supposed to know the law; he knows the disabilities that attach to a member of parliament. However, I will come to that in a moment. He occupies an exceptional position in the electoral division. He disposes of the patronage of the division. Unfortunately, under the baneful system which prevails in this country as to the exterior service, he disposes of the patronage, and we know that this regrettable system costs the country millions and millions of dollars a year in waste. That is the result in our province at any rate. He knows that that is his position in the county and he should have thought of that when he undertook to deal with men who owed their nomination and maintenance to him in order to get this work executed. Could he possibly ignore the system which prevails in connection with public works at the government workshops in Sorel? My hon. friend (Mr. German) says that the sitting member did not know what Mr. Pagé and Mr. Champagne were doing in order to have this work executed. He could not ignore it, Sir, because it is not possible to believe that the sitting member did not know the system prevailing with regard to the distribution of work and material at the shipyards at Sorel. At the very outset the sitting member was informed by Pagé, the foreman to whom he went to get this work executed, that he would be glad to get the work done if the director of the works authorized him to do so. There, knowledge was given to him, if that knowledge was necessary, that nothing of that kind could possibly be done without the approval of Mr. Papineau. Starting with these data what were the methods resorted to in order to have this work executed? Let me point out in two words what the system prevailing at Sorel is. There is an army of employees of the government under the control of foremen or clerks of works. By these foremen or clerks of works the men are placed upon different jobs. There is an official time-keeper who punches the work cards four times a day, at the time of starting and at the time of quitting. Reports are made by the foremen and the wages are charged up to the cost of the different government jobs in books kept for that purpose. The materials which are kept at the stores can only be obtained from the stores by requisitions from the foremen and by requisitions showing what these materials are wanted for.

There also records are kept; materials are measured, weighed, taken out of store and charged up, with the time of the men, to the different public works. Afterwards, pay-lists are made up from time to time. They are certified by the foreman and submitted to the director of works and the accountant. There are 600 or 700 employees at least. The director and the accountant certify the accounts, which are then sent up to Ottawa. A cheque is sent from Ottawa to the director, who deposits it. When the money is drawn the director hands it over to the paymaster on the pay-list and he distributes the money to the men. Now, you will not find in the books of the department at Sorel or in the records of the workmen's time or of the materials, one single jot or tittle having reference to this work on the Lanctot house—nothing whatever. Here were men working for the entire season, from June until November, and you will not find any trace whatever in the government records which will enable you to identify them with this Lanctot job. I speak from the evidence. How, then, is the trick done, how was the matter managed? If there was, as my hon. friend (Mr. German) stated a moment ago, an agreement fair and above board that this work was to be done, a strict account kept and afterwards the government to be reimbursed, it is all legal and legitimate if it was done in the way my hon. friend says. But what were the means resorted to, and why is it we can find no trace of this transaction in the books? It was done in this way: First, as to wages, a fraud was resorted to. The workmen were directed to have this work done by Mr. Pagé. Remember, I am giving facts as to which there is no controversy. Pagé and Champagne, both foremen, were the men who directed the workmen to this particular job, without any authority whatever. There was no order from the director of the works who alone had the right to give it. The men's time was punched on their cards by the time-keeper by agreement between the time-keeper, Pagé and Champagne. Their time was punched as workmen engaged on government work. That is the important point. It was in that way that men who were supposed to be working on government jobs were working all the time for the private advantage of the sitting member; otherwise they could not have been paid upon the certified pay-lists as having been engaged on government work. The money was taken out of the public treasury, entered up in the books of the government against the various jobs. The whole thing was put through as being for material furnished and work done for government account. Therefore, I say, the government money was, in consequence of this, expended from June to November in payment of wages and material, and there was nothing in the record that could possibly raise a suspicion as to the real nature of the work done and destination of these materials.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Is there any evidence to show to what particular work this was charged up in the books?

Mr. MONK. No; that is the peculiar point. Some of these pay-sheets are charged to job No. 169—I believe that is the number. But turn up 169 and it is not that at all. There is no difficulty on that point. These two foremen recognized that this work was done upon the supposition that it was being done for the government.

Now, as to material. These materials were sent by foreman Pagé to the Lanctot house. How could he get them with the system of record to which I have referred? The foremen send in requisitions for material for government work, and they always have a certain quantity of these materials. Pagé took these materials out of materials that he had obtained upon regular requisition approved of for government work, and sent them over. Consequently, these materials, at the time the requisitions were sent, were charged up to the different government jobs and not to any private undertaking. That is the way materials were obtained without creating any suspicion—it was by agreement arrived at between Pagé and Champagne, the time-keeper and the foreman. My hon. friend says there is no evidence that the sitting member was privy to this conspiracy—for that is what it was—to obtain these materials and get the work done. There is no evidence that I am aware of that the sitting member ever actually planned this system. But what I say is this, and we cannot ignore it, nor can the public ignore it—that the sitting member addressed himself to the foreman, assuming that he thought the foreman had authority for this work, though he could not do it without the permission of the director of work. Mr. Papineau was there continuously—perhaps he did not happen to be there on a Sunday or on the 28th of May, but he was there during the summer continuously. Mr. Lanctot was there, yet he never went to see Mr. Papineau. Is it conceivable that a member of parliament, under these circumstances and at such a juncture, should not have walked across the street to see the director of work and find out what was being done, if everything was regular and proper? And I would even say further that it is somewhat surprising that a man of affairs should go through an entire summer with this kind of mandate and never seek to find out at the head office, the place whence the direction emanated, what was being done, what expenditure was being incurred, how far his account had mounted up. An entire summer was spent, the whole building was finished, and not an inquiry. I say it is impossible, under these circumstances, to entirely exonerate the sitting member from responsibility in regard to these men. My hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. Borden, Halifax) asked if these men had been dismissed. I will say a word from my personal acquaintance with Mr. Papineau, the director of works. Mr. Papineau is an absolutely honest man. It is utterly impossible for him to cause a cessation of the abuses that exist there if he is not vested with authority, and he is not vested with authority. A proof of the reputation he enjoys is the fact that this work was put through, and the whole summer was spent, and he never heard of it. He asks Mr. Papineau: Would you authorize such a thing as this? Well, he said, it would have to be a pressing case, I suppose a case of a fire, or something of that kind, because otherwise I could not authorize it at all. But he was kept in ignorance the entire summer.

Now, as to the refund—I do not wish to diminish the importance of the refund. What are the facts? We are men, we know how these things happen. The summer had not yet passed, before this matter of the construction of Mr. Lanctot's house was public property in Sorel and Montreal, a matter of public notoriety. Affidavits were prepared. There were outside people—I had the visit myself of one of these men, who told me long before parliament assembled, at any rate long before the matter came up, that he hoped the matter would be brought up, and he was a good Conservative. But there is no doubt that a question of this kind, even if we exonerate Mr. Lanctot from any evil intention, is one that arises above party, and we must be careful about consecrating the principle that parliament sanctions doings of that kind. Well, when it became a matter of public discussion in the town of Sorel, Mr. Pagé prepared an account. Mr. Pagé, while he was defrauding the government, using materials which he held in trust, for certain private parties, and while he was countenancing the payment of men for government work who were employed on this private work, informs us that he kept a private memorandum of the time of the men. This was kept on loose leaves. I do not know that my understanding of the evidence exactly coincides with that of my hon. friend. My recollection is that this memorandum was kept on loose leaves, and slipped into a corner of the drawer in the evening; and at the end, a general memorandum was made up from them in a little book which was produced before the committee. I may be wrong as to that, but the memorandum kept was private, and from these leaves was prepared the statement of $375.60, which, on the 22nd of November, was sent up here. Parliament was sitting, and the sitting member sent a cheque down for the labour only, on the 22nd of November, for $375.60. That cheque was finally paid on the 12th of January following, and upon inquiry from the department, as before stated, the deputy minister wrote that he required a statement to place it in the hands of the Auditor General, so that the Auditor General might know what the object of this refund was. The sitting member went down to Sorel—and this is important, these circumstances are not trifling—he met Mr. Papineau on the street and told him, 'there are the materials, I will replace the materials out of my own pocket.' And in fact Mr. Papineau, having found out that those materials had been substracted from the government stores in the manner I have indicated, immediately got a statement as to the materials from Mr. Pagé, or Mr. Champagne, from this private memorandum, and gave an order, had the materials replaced, and paid them himself out of his own pocket, and then on the street reminded Mr. Lanctot that this bill was still unsettled, and Mr. Lanctot refunded the director of the works.

Those are the facts with regard to which I think there is no possibility of doubt, and no controversy. $375.60 for labour, $81.60 for the material. I think I can say, without really wishing to make any pleasantry in a matter so serious, that I never, in my own experience, heard of a house of that kind being painted inside and outside at so very low a rate. I do not wish to make that an issue, because I think the matter is far more important. But I think the affidavits mention $700 or $1,000, or $1,200 and that is what it would have cost most of us ordinary mortals to get that work done. In the meantime, affidavits had been made. I wish to say this as regards the hon. member for Champlain that the matter was public property.

Under the terms of those affidavits which charged theft and robbery—the latter word was somewhat peculiar—but charged theft, what was the duty of my hon. friend? Those who sit on this side of the House in opposition know what these affidavits stated. The duty of the opposition under those circumstances was to lay those facts before parliament, and when those facts were laid before parliament, parliament ordered an inquiry. It seems to me that the evidence adduced certainly brings to the knowledge of the House a most deplorable state of affairs. It is not a question of whether the sitting member wanted to defraud the government. There was fraud, there was conspiracy on the part of those foremen; undoubtedly they obtained these materials and this labour in an illegal manner. But if he was not a party, by his conduct and his silence, to that fraud, then we come to the interpretation of my hon. friend from Welland (Mr. German) that he made an agreement which he carried out. Could he make that agreement? Had he the right, under the Independence of Parliament Act, to make such an agreement? Let me quote to the House the sections bearing on that point from chapter 10 of the Senate and House of Commons Act:

14. No person, directly or indirectly, alone or with any other, by himself or by the interposition of any trustee or third party, holding or enjoying, undertaking or executing any contract or agreement, expressed or implied, with or for the government of Canada on behalf of the Crown, or with or for any of the officers of the government of Canada, for which any public money of Canada is to be paid, shall be eligible as a member of the House of Commons, or shall sit or vote in the said House.

15. If any member of the House of Commons accepts any office or commission, or is concerned or interested in any contract, agreement, service or work which, by this Act, renders a person incapable of being elected to, or of sitting or voting in the House of Commons, or knowingly sells any goods, wares or merchandise to, or performs any service for the government of Canada, or for any of the officers of the government of Canada, for which any public money of Canada is paid or to be paid, whether such contract, agreement or sale is expressed or implied, and whether the transaction is single or continuous, the seat of such member shall thereby be vacated, and his election shall thenceforth be null and void.

To my mind it seems beyond doubt that, even accepting the interpretation of the hon. member for Welland (Mr. German), the sitting member for Richelieu made an agreement with the government as to the completion of his house for which public money of Canada was to be expended and was expended. These are the words of the statute. To leave that out, what are we asked to do by the motion of my hon. friend? To declare that the whole transaction was regular as far as the sitting member was concerned, is to be countenanced and is to be commended. Is there not, beyond the words of this statute, a tendency by cases of this kind, to weaken and impair the independence of parliament? When I heard doubt expressed as to the applicability of these sections of the Act I stated that I had an open mind, but no doubt whatever on the second point, that if parliament sanctions such proceedings as these, we are undoing the work of centuries in establishing the independence of parliament, we place a member in absolute dependence. He, by getting work done by a department of the government, places himself in a position of absolute control and subserviency to this department. He loses, in other words, his independence, there is no doubt whatever about that. It seems to me that very far from commending and approving this conduct, we should, at any rate, in adopting this report, point out that this conduct is fraught with extreme danger and is a menace to the independence of parliament.

I have referred to Mr. Papineau. I say, on my responsibility as a member of this House, it is not necessary to produce affidavits of that, that the condition of affairs in Sorel is an eyesore in our province, it is a public scandal, it is notorious. How is that with such a director? Can the question be asked? In the first place he has been there for only a limited time, but what do we now see? We see these four men come up boldly and tell us the system under which they had been able to execute these works. A man employing men who had his confidence under these circumstances would not hesitate for a moment, he would dismiss them. They have forfeited the trust, they have betrayed the confidence placed in them and so they were justifying themselves before the director of the works and in the presence of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries. It is his own incompetency that is at fault. They should not have been allowed to leave the committee room if my hon. friend had time to satisfy himself on that point without his satisfying himself then and there, and dismissing them. Are we going to be told that with that state of affairs enduring for years, it would be impossible for a competent minister, acting for the people, supported by this House, to put a stop to that state of affairs within ten days? I say on the same responsibility that there should be a general inquiry. What is there to fear? If I am right in saying that this is a matter of public notoriety, the minister should have an inquiry, the government should grant one, and if there is an inquiry hon.

members of this House will see that this is not an isolated case, it is a small case, in reality, as far as the amount is concerned, but that system is general in the shipyards at Sorel. It is a general system, but it is time that it should stop and we certainly will not be stopping it by commending the sitting member for the district for his actions in this case. I, therefore, beg to move:

That the said report be not adopted but that this House adopt, in lieu thereof, the draft report suggested by the minority of said Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections, as the same appears of record on the minutes of said committee marked 'B.'

Sir ALLEN AYLESWORTH (Minister of Justice). There is one point with regard to this case, in respect to which probably there will be no difference of opinion in this House, but I am afraid that there is likely not more than that one feature of which that could be said. I think we are all agreed that the matter now under consideration is one of very great importance, and I only wish that it were possible that we could all look at it as one which ought to be decided and which might be decided without any reference to political feeling. The charges which have been made here and which this House now has to decide are charges which affect not only the seat in this House of one of our members, but also affect that man's personal reputation and personal honour ; he is literally on trial here before his peers. The independence of parliament has always been and has properly been a subject in regard to which the House of Commons in England as well as in this country has been peculiarly jealous, and the privileges of a member of parliament are privileges which ought to have and I am sure will receive at our hands, as members of the House of Commons, the most careful and anxious consideration. Any man who has the honour of being chosen by his fellow electors as their representative in this House is entitled surely, at the hands of his fellow members in this House, before any doubt even is cast upon his right to be a member of this House, to a careful trial and an honest consideration of the circumstances and the facts upon which it is proposed that he should be condemned. In what I have to say in reference to this matter I certainly set before myself in all honesty the effort to avoid being prejudiced in favour of the hon. gentleman against whom these charges are made, because of the circumstance that he is a political supporter as well as a personal friend. I want to try and I intend to try to discharge absolutely from my own consideration of the evidence which is here presented the fact that during the few years I have known the member for Richelieu (Mr. Lanctot) I have formed a personal affection for him, that I have in him an intimate friend for whom I have the highest regard and esteem. I submit to you that considerations of that character ought to be discarded in the decision of a matter of this sort, and I hope to be able to do so while confessing, as I have confessed before in this House, that I consider myself as strong and as partisan in my political feeling as any other member of this assembly. But while I say that I think I have plenty of companions in that regard. And, if hon. gentlemen would but confess—they only deceive themselves if they think they are not every bit as partisan in the strength of their political feeling as I unhesitatingly acknowledge myself to be.

There is another view of this matter ; while one should try, and while I shall certainly endeavour my utmost to keep out of view any question of my own personal feelings toward the member for Richelieu, there is something in regard to his course in this matter which is entitled to have taken into consideration by us in coming to any conclusion. A man's character is his most valuable possession ; it is that which he earns by the course of conduct which he pursues during his lifetime, and if any of us are acquainted as a matter of personal knowledge with the character of the hon. gentleman whose seat is in question upon this occasion, I think we are entitled to weigh his action in the light of that character which we know him to possess, whether it be for good or for evil, if any one knows of him matters in regard to which his course of action in this affair would very probably be influenced, that is a consideration which he is entitled to apply to the determination of the facts which are in issue now. And another thing that we are entitled to look upon is the behaviour of the hon. gentleman since these charges were made against him in this House. Every one knows that it is the privilege of the person accused either to remain silent or to say: Not guilty, prove your case. Nothing is to be inferred against a man because he may choose to take that course, but it is open to us to consider what one of us would do, what any honourable or right minded man would do, if charges were made against him which were of disgraceful character, made to an assembly of which he was a member, and which, if proved, would show him to be such a man as ought no longer to retain his seat in a body of gentlemen. This House, as the House of Commons in England, has been spoken of before now as a gentleman's club; certainly it ought not to be put upon any lower footing. And I ask you, Sir, whether this charge ought to be considered in any less careful or any more heated and partisan manner if presented to this assembly of two hundred and twenty gentlemen for our consideration, than would be the case if we were all of us members of a social club, and one of our number preferred charges against another, which, if proved, might render him unworthy any longer to retain his membership among us. If that were the position of matters, then upon this evidence I think there would be very short work indeed made of the charges which have been perferred. And in a case such as the present, the behaviour of the man charged from the time the charges are made against him is a circumstance very properly to be taken account of. If a man is conscious of his guilt, his actions very probably will betray that consciousness to any observer. I have to call attention to the course which in this matter has been pursued by the hon. member for Richelieu. When the charges were made, now nearly two months ago, he stood in his place; he made his statement in a few brief sentences of what exactly were the facts. I am content to leave it in the judgment of any and every hon. gentleman in this House whether or not he kept back the truth, whether or not that statement which he then made in the hearing of this House was a frank, manly, open, and honourable statement of exactly what had taken place in this matter. The charges having been referred to the appropriate committee, the very first witness to go into the box was the hon. gentleman himself. He answered such questions as were put to him; he submitted himself to cross-examination. He has placed his case by that course in the hands of his fellow members of this House and he has walked out of the House and not entered it again or participated in its deliberations, and has purposed to continue to do so until his fellow members pronounce upon the question of whether or not he has done anything which would render him worthy of expulsion from their midst. I think in that respect his course has been that which any honourable man would be inclined to take if charges of this kind were made against him.

Before referring to the nature of the evidence, in regard to which I shall be very brief, I want to premise one other thing—these charges are literally of the personal character which I have described. So far as their result is concerned, so far as the question for consideration on the motions which are in the hands of Mr. Speaker is concerned, the one thing is, whether or not the member for Richelieu has deserved to lose his seat in this House by reason either of the fact that he has been guilty of any infraction of the Independence of Parliament Act, or been guilty of conduct of such disgraceful nature that he ought no longer to be received as a member in a body of gentlemen. The Department of Marine and Fisheries, the government of this country, is not upon trial in this matter to-day. The conclusion of this matter whatever it be does not in any degree interfere with any member of this House taking such course as upon the facts disclosed he may be advised to take in regard to the Department of Marine and Fisheries, the government of this country, or any officer of the department who may have been, in his opinion, guilty of any wrong-doing in connection with these matters. I venture to think, Sir, this is not an occasion for political declamation, not an occasion for the making of a campaign speech which might be received with applause from the hustings, but that it is literally that which at any rate I seek to look upon it as being, the trial of a man to determine whether or not in our honest judgment he ought any longer to retain his seat among us. Accordingly I certainly do not propose to discuss the question of what the employees of the department at Sorel may or may not have been doing. I want to limit myself in a few words to that which it seems to me is the one question for our consideration, whether or not the conduct of the member for Richelieu merits our condemnation.

Now, Sir, it may be that those who think differently from the way in which I think upon this matter may consider that there is to be found somewhere in the evidence taken before the committee upon these charges, proof of fraudulent behaviour, of dishonourable behaviour, or collusion with employees of the department, on the part of the member for Richelieu. I can only say that I am not able to find any such evidence. I did not attend any of the meetings of the Committee on Privileges and Elections. It would have been difficult if not impossible for me to have followed the evidence of the witnesses as that evidence was being given, and I kept myself purposely away from the meetings of that committee, knowing that the question would necessarily have to be ultimately decided by this House itself. The case now comes here upon the report adopted by that committee, and upon the motion just placed in your hands for the adoption of a different conclusion. I have read, as I certainly ought to do, as a member of this House, and one who has felt a keen interest in this matter, every word of the evidence as given in the printed proceedings of that committee—not once only, but all important passages more than once; and I have studied that evidence as closely as it was possible for me to study it. I speak now in the sense of responsibility which I think rests upon each one of us as a member of the High Court of Parliament. Our students are taught that the highest court in the British realm is the court of parliament itself. It is the body which constitutes the courts, and we here, as members of this House of Commons, at any rate in dealing with this matter, are members of a court with the like responsibility resting upon each one of us as rests upon a judge himself in adjudicating upon the rights of a fellow man. If we look at this case from that standpoint, if we remember that it is something which ought to be decided, not upon appeals to political partisanship, but upon the evidence which has been given by the witnesses, and upon exactly the same principles as would govern us without doubt if we were sitting as jurymen upon the trial of a charge such as this, I venture to think, Sir, that there will be little hesitation in coming to a conclusion with regard to it.

I do not intend to discuss the details of the evidence. That has been done very fully, and I would think very satisfactorily, by the chairman of the committee, than whom no other member was in a better position to have discharged that duty. But I want to point out just one thing in that connection. The great majority of us who have now to pass upon this question have not heard the evidence, have not seen the witnesses who gave that evidence, are not in as good a position as our fellow members who constitute that committee were in, to come to a correct conclusion upon the question of what witness or what statement ought to be believed. If there is a contradiction between one witness and another, it is the function of the judge who hears and sees those witnesses, or of jurymen, if there be a jury, to come to a conclusion which man is, in their opinion, the more likely to be telling the truth, to weigh the evidence, and to draw, in the first instance at any rate, the deductions of fact. No judge, no human being, could be, from the nature of the circumstances, in as good a position to do that work as the men who hear the witnesses and who see the way in which they answer, and who judge as the words fall from the lips of the witnesses which of them is telling the truth. I seek to apply that in this case, only to this extent, that if there is a contradiction between one man and another man, if it is a question of which man is the better entitled of two witnesses to be credited, then we ought to rely upon the conclusions of the committee of our own members who heard and saw those men, and who have reported to us in that respect. But fortunately in this case I think there is less than the amount of contradiction between one witness and another that generally, I am sorry to say, is seen in contested cases in our courts. The facts in this matter are really not open to dispute with regard to the main, and I think all the necessary points in reference to this charge. There is no difference of statement among the witnesses who have been called. There is no question but that this work was done on the house of Mr. Lanctot by men who were in the general employment of the government; there is no question but that government supplies were used to a greater or less extent in the doing of that work; there is equally no doubt that that work was paid for by Mr. Lanctot, that those supplies which were used in the doing of the work were replaced at his cost, and that there is no loss in respect to them to the people of this country.

The transaction with regard to the supplies is plainly no transaction of purchase on Mr. Lanctot's part. No one can pretend to say that it is; no one does pretend to say that it is. The agreement between him and the government employees with whom he discussed the matter is perfectly distinct—that government supplies should be used for the doing of Mr. Lanctot's work, that an account should be kept of how much of such supplies were so used, and that goods of equal quantity and of equal quality should be supplied at Mr. Lanctot's expense to replace the goods so used. The chairman of the committee, in speaking of the transaction used the word 'lend.' I think it was not an inappropriate word. These goods were lent to Mr. Lanctot to be returned, not in specie, but in kind, exactly the same kind of transaction that often takes place between individuals, in which goods are handed over by the owner to another with the intention that they shall be consumed and that they shall be replaced by goods of equal value and equal quality as the goods which are given by the owner to the man whom he has accommodated and which are consumed. That was literally the transaction here. The evidence is not in dispute, the evidence is distinct that the man who was custodian of these goods in the government service set apart a certain quantity, which he measured and weighed as being sufficient to do the work which was in hand, that some—the greater part, but not all of these goods—were sent to Mr. Lanctot's house and were used in the doing of the work, and that after the work was done that quantity of goods, equal in amount and equal in quality, was supplied at the expense of Mr. Lanctot to replace the goods which had been taken. Now, in that respect, it is impossible for any one to argue that there has been any loss to the public. On the contrary, this evidence is quite distinct that in point of fact a slightly greater quantity of goods was obtained at Mr. Lanctot's expense than had been sent to his house. But whether there was a greater quantity or not, there was no sale, there is no pretense that there was any arrangement for a sale of these goods to Mr. Lanctot by any one on behalf of the government, and it would not have made the slightest difference if there had been. It would not have been the slightest infraction of either the spirit or the letter of our Independence of Parliament Act.

Now, with regard to the work, very much the same condition of things exists. The arrangement which was made was distinct that the men who did the work were to be paid, at Mr. Lanctot's cost the exact rate of wages they were receiving when in the government service; in other words, if a man worked one particular day at Mr. Lanctot's house, the wages of that day were to be paid by Mr. Lanctot. Mr. Lanctot evidently thought that he was expected to pay as the work proceeded. He said that he was perfectly willing to do so. He asked for an account over and over again, not only he, but also the government official states. It was more convenient to the official that he should not be rendering an account periodically. As the chairman of the committee explained, he said that he was afraid that if he took money from Mr. Lanctot he would be told by some of the workmen that he had, in fact, received more money than he was giving to them, and not wanting to put himself in that position, he kept his account in the matter until the whole thing was over, and then that account was rendered. I ask your attention, as bearing on the question of whether there was evil mind in this matter, to the circumstances of the way in which that account is made out. That account was sent to Mr. Lanctot by post on the 21st November last, and it is an account charging Mr. Lanctot with a certain amount of money in respect to these services as being due to the Marine and Fisheries of Canada: 'A. Lanctot, Esq., Dr. to Marine and Fisheries, Canada, Post office address, Sorel. On the face of the document it is presented as a government account. How does Mr. Lanctot deal with it? He pays it within twenty-four hours, and in what shape? He pays it by his cheque and he makes the cheque payable to 'Department of Marine, or Order.' Well, if this were a charge in an election trial I think every counsel in the court would be somewhat astonished to find a charge of corrupt practices or of the improper use of money for election purposes supported by evidence of the payment of that money by cheque, and the payee named in the cheque one of the public departments of the government of Canada. I think I may appeal to the experience of hon. gentlemen in that regard, whether or not they are members of the legal profession; I ask any man of ordinary acquaintance with business affairs whether or not it is the mark of fraud that a man pays his debt by cheque upon his bank account, thus preserving the evidence for any one who chooses to search the manner in which that payment has been made. That circumstance is one which is entitled to have, at the hands of any one considering what conclusion ought to be reached in this case, its due and proper weight. I present it to the House simply as one of the circumstances in this matter, and I say, without delaying to labour the details of the evidence, what the chairman of the committee has said, that I have read this evidence with all the care in my power and I cannot see any question of any importance in it which has not been truthfully and correctly summed up in the report of the committee, the adoption of which has been moved by the chairman. Those are the undisputed facts of this case. You may insinuate what you please, you may make political charges as much as you care to, but you cannot change the sworn facts in this case, and these facts are truthfully and correctly summed up in the report which has been presented to this House.

I say no more about the facts in this case, except to repeat what I said a little while ago, that I am not discussing the case at the present time from the standpoint of the Department of Marine and Fisheries, or from that of the conduct of the men in charge of that branch of the department which is established at Sorel. I submit respectfully to you, Sir, that to do that on this occasion is simply beclouding the issue, and is seeking to whip, over the shoulders of a member of this House, the government which he supports, and to treat this question as one of party politics rather than that which it truly is—a question of the right of this man to retain his position, and his seat among us. Upon that question I have no more to say in so far as the facts of the case are concerned. Mr. Lanctot paid the bill which was rendered to him, he paid it promptly, and he paid it openly. If that bill was less than it ought to have been, unless you show some collusion on Mr. Lanctot's part with the man who made out that bill, Mr. Lanctot is not to be condemned in the premises. Condemn the men who did wrong, if they have done wrong, but on this occasion I am not discussing their conduct. I say the question here is simply, whether or not we shall adopt the report of the committee. That committee has dealt only with the charges so far as Mr. Lanctot is concerned. If it had been an investigation of the department, or of the conduct of the officials of the department, it is very likely, to say the least of it, that a good deal more evidence would have been given than has been given, and very different considerations would have arisen. Upon the question which was referred to them, it was enough for them to say that, at any rate, whatever opinion may be entertained by hon. gentlemen—depending upon their political sympathies—of the behaviour of the employees of the government, Mr. Lanctot has been clearly shown to have been guilty of no wrong.

Now, Sir, just one word—and I shall be very brief about it—in regard to the conclusions of law which are sought to be applied to this matter. In the report which was proposed before the committee by the minority members of the special committee appointed to draft a report, there are conclusions at the end which speak of the law, and which seem to be based upon a view of the law entertained by the hon. gentlemen who have joined in making that report. Under the heading 'Conclusions, these words appear:

It is our conclusion from the evidence that Mr. Adelard Lanctot, a member of the House of Commons, knowingly and unlawfully did procure the employees of the government of Canada to do certain work for him and on his behalf in the year 1910, he then being a member of the said House, and by collusion with the servants of the government did procure the payment of such labour by and out of the public moneys of the Dominion of Canada for his own purposes and benefit, without lawful right and contrary to the public interest.

That he did furthermore, knowingly and unlawfully, cause and procure certain materials, the property of the government of Canada to be delivered to himself for his own benefit and use, he then being a member of the House of Commons, and with such intent and purpose did collude and contrive with the servants of the Dominion of Canada to whom the said materials had been entrusted for use in the works of said government to so deliver the same to him by unlawful misappropriation, contrary to their duty and obligation to the government and contrary to law and the public interest.

And further it is our conclusion that the said Adelard Lanctot, by the acts and proceedings aforesaid, did infringe the independence of parliament.

S. BARKER,
F. D. MONK.

I suppose that the meaning of the conclusion that, by his acts the said Adelard Lanctot 'did infringe the independence of parliament' is that he did thereby infringe the Independence of Parliament Act. My hon. friend from Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk) shakes his head. I certainly would have been, but for that circumstance, at a loss to understand that a distinction was supposed to exist, between the infraction of the Independence of Parliament Act and the infraction of the independence of parliament. I suppose there is, in the mind of my hon. friend (Mr. Monk), if it is his hand which penned these words, some beautiful general idea of the spirit of the statute, some misty idea that something which is not struck at the statute and not made an unlawful thing, is to be considered as an infraction of the intention of parliament; that parliament had some other meaning in adopting this statute than that which is conveyed by the words which parliament used, and that that meaning is to be interpreted in the light of the political interests of the gentlemen who read it. Our independence of parliament is secured by the Independence of Parliament Act. The sections which constitute the Independence of Parliament Act are to be found in our statute relating to the Senate and the House of Commons, and they appear under these very words: 'Independence of Parliament.' And how, in view of that circumstance, any lawyer can seek to draw a distinction between the meaning of the expression 'Infraction of the Independence of Parliament,' and the meaning of the expression 'Infraction of the Independence of Parliament Act' I leave to hon. gentlemen who entertain such ideas to attempt to explain. The independence of parliament is secured by these few sections, ten in number, of that particular statute, and the provisions of these sections are simply that any man who enters into or has a certain kind of contract with the Crown or public of Canada is ineligible to a seat in this House. It is not every kind of contract which is prohibited; it is not an interest in every kind of contract which would prevent a man holding a seat in this House. There is, in the most distinct way, an express limitation and description of the only kind of contract which is struck at by this legislation or which parliament has seen fit to forbid to its members. That one particular kind of contract which alone is mentioned in this legislation is such a contract as involves the payment to the contractor of any public money of Canada. There is no prohibition whatever upon a man entering into a contract by which he is obliged to pay to the public moneys of Canada. The prohibition is only upon the reverse kind of contract, a contract under which he receives, not a contract under which he pays. The language of the principal section is perfectly clear on the subject, and the language of every other section of the ten I have referred to implies the same thing. The section which is the key to the whole group, and, which is absolutely distinct on the subject, is worded in this way:

No person directly or indirectly, alone or with any other, by himself or by the interposition of any trustee or third party, holding or enjoying, undertaking or executing any contract or agreement, expressed or implied, with or for the government of Canada on behalf of the Crown, or with or for any of the officers of the government of Canada, for which any public money of Canada it to be paid, shall be eligible as a member of the House of Commons, or shall sit or vote in the said House.

Now I ask how that would have been interpreted if these highly important words 'for which any public money of Canada is to be paid' had not been present? Would there have been any question then but that any man interested, directly or indirectly, in any kind of contract at all with the government of Canada, was rendered thereby ineligible to hold a seat in this House? There could be none. But parliament deliberately refrained from enacting such a law, parliament deliberately said: It is not our intention to prohibit every kind of contract between the public and members of this House, it is only that kind of a contract for which the public money of Canada is to be paid that is a contract which will prevent a man holding a seat in this House. It would have been very simple to omit those words. Indeed, if it had been the intention to prevent an interest in every kind of contract whatsoever, it would have been very easy so to enact. An example of it was before the men who drafted this statute. In the Ontario Municipal Act there is exactly the wholesale kind of prohibition I refer to. Under the Ontario Municipal Act no man is eligible to a seat in a municipal council if he owes money which stands unpaid to the municipality; even though there be no express contract between him and the municipality, the mere fact that he owes the debt implies in the law an obligation of a contractual nature resting upon him to pay that debt. The mere fact that a man might be owing to the municipality an unpaid debt, under the Ontario Municipal Act would disqualify him from membership in the municipal council. This parliament never meant to go that length, this parliament refrained from going that length; this parliament at any rate did not prohibit a member of this House from purchasing public stores or goods of Canada if it was decided to sell them. If there were an unused dredge belonging to the Department of Public Works which was being put up for sale by auction, there is nothing whatever to prohibit a member of parliament from purchasing that article, and if he purchased it, from paying for it, as would be his obligation, to the Receiver General of Canada. And just as Mr. Lanctot paid his debt in this case by his cheque to the department, and as his moneys have gone to the credit of the receiver general, so a member of parliament purchasing any goods which might be placed upon sale if there was no longer use for them by the government of this country, would pay his purchase money into the treasury of Canada, and in paying his debt he would in no respect infringe the statute governing the independence of parliament.

Now that it was the deliberate intention of parliament to prohibit only the transactions under which the contractor receives money or is to receive money from the public treasury, is not only the distinct language of the law which I have read, but it is the distinct inference from every other one of those sections of the statute. I suppose every hon. gentleman is alive to the fact that if he accepts any office of emolument under the Crown, he thereby vacates, his seat. That is provided for by the first one of this group of sections. But notice, it is the receipt of the money or the entering into the relationship which involves the payment of money by the government to the individual, which disqualifies him. If the office, in other words, is one which has no salary attached to it, there is no vacating of the seat, by express language of the enactment. The following section of this statute provides that unless that office is one which involves the payment of money to the holder of the office, there is nothing inconsistent in his being an office holder and a member of this House at the same time; and his acceptance of the office, provided there is no money to come from the public treasury to the individual, has no effect whatever upon his right to sit in this House. That is the express language of the enactment, and the wording of every clause in this group of ten sections which constitutes our Independence of Parliament Act. The views which I present certainly seem to me the clear meaning of the law in this regard, which is that any man who owes a debt to the government of Canada is entitled to pay that debt, and must pay that debt, notwithstanding the fact that he is a member of this House. If, on the other hand, any debt is owing from the government of Canada out of the public moneys of this country to an individual, he cannot take payment of that debt, (although it is his own money) as long as he remains a member of this House. If he is interested in any contract which involves payment to him out of the public moneys of this country, or any money the property of the Crown in Canada, that circumstance avoids his seat in this House. But otherwise a contract such as this is one which any member of parliament in so far as its legal effect is concerned, can enter into with perfect impunity.

For that reason I must admit that I read the conclusions of this minority report with considerable astonishment. I am quite prepared to concede to every gentleman, whether he is a legal practitioner or not, his right to his view of the law just as I have a right to my view. I do not criticise in the least degree the use of the word 'unlawfully' in the different branches of these conclusions to the minority report, if the hon. gentlemen who have signed that report thought themselves justified in using that word. I have tried to point out why, to my mind as a lawyer, it is perfectly clear, if any question of law can be clear, that there was nothing whatever unlawful about it. I should be certainly, as an advising solicitor, unable to give a client any other advice, if he were to be sued, under the provisions of the sections of the statute to which I have been referring, for the penalties that he would incur by sitting in this House if disqualified —I could not give him any other advice, I say, than that I have indicated, that he was perfectly free of any danger of the success of such an action in circumstances such as existed here. I am discussing it, in that view of the matter, purely and entirely from the dry legal standpoint; I am sure I am not misunderstood in that regard. I said at the outset that these facts might be viewed either from that standpoint, or as evidence of facts from which some one or other might, according to his political temperament, infer that there had been dishonest conduct, fraudulent conduct, if you like, on the part of the hon. member for Richelieu (Mr. Lanctot), but dealing with it from the standpoint solely of the legal responsibility, it seems to me the law is too clear to admit of two opinions.

One other thing I wish to say with reference to this conclusion of the minority report which we are now asked to adopt. I was astonished when I read these conclusions and saw affixed to them the name of the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk). He bears a name in this country of distinguished and honoured parentage. I had thought him a man of judicial temperament and a man who, however, strong his political feeling might be, would not put his name to a paper which suppressed the all important feature in this case, the feature which existed, to his knowledge as a member of the committee who heard the evidence, and which makes all the difference between the truth and that half truth which is wholly a lie. In this report I find these two hon. gentlemen stating as their conclusion, to this House, that Mr. Adelard Lanctot did unlawfully, &c., procure the payment of such labour by and out of the public moneys of the Dominion of Canada for his own purpose and benefit; and leaving the matter at that and making no mention of the fact that every cent of the public money of Canada which had been used in the payment for this labour had been repaid and replaced by Mr. Lanctot, so that the treasury of this country did not lose one cent by the transaction.

At six o'clock, House took recess.

After Recess.

House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. C. J. DOHERTY (St. Anne, Montreal). Mr. Speaker, I am quite sure that we were all most edified by the homily with which the Minister of Justice premised his most eloquent address of this afternoon. I am not quite certain that that homily was exceedingly necessary. It would perhaps not be unfair to suggest that the address that followed on it was rather of a nature to make one feel that the orator, as he rose, felt that he himself needed to be reminded of those very sound principles which he laid down as those which should be our guides in dealing with this question. In my very humble way, Mr. Speaker, I purpose trying to put into practice the doctrine which he so lucidly and so clearly and so forcibly set forth with regard to the frame of mind in which this House should approach the consideration of the question that is before us. I purpose doing that even though in the doing of it I shall find myself compelled to absolutely refrain from following the example which the Minister of Justice set us with regard to the manner in which this question should be approached and judged, I rise with as high a realizing sense as any man could have, of the gravity of the duty that lies this evening upon the conscience of each and every one of us. I have no protestations to make with regard to my partisanship or absence of partisanship—protestations are something that I am not very fond of, and they do not carry much weight. I am willing to let my conduct speak, and to stand or fall by the testimony that that conduct may afford as to whether I be or be not a partisan. I must however, do the justice to the Minister of Justice of saying, that to a very great extent indeed he did follow his own advice that we should not make campaign speeches. He was not able to preserve quite to the end, however—and I believe it is to those who persevere unto the end that the crown is to be given—but he made a very successful effort for a considerable part of the time to avoid making a campaign speech. He made a speech, however, the tone of which is much more familiar to my ears than that of a campaign speech; he treated us with that eloquence which characterizes him to the typical speech (of course done in its most perfect method), but after all to the typical speech of the counsel before a criminal court who stands making the defence of a man about whose case the least that is said the better. The Minister of Justice was eloquent on the character of his client. Now, I have no desire to say one word that would reflect on the character of the hon. member for Richelieu, save in so far as what I feel it my duty to say with regard to this particular charge may necessarily reflect upon his character. I am willing to assume, and I do so with pleasure, that we are approaching the consideration of the question, of whether, this gentleman hitherto enjoying an irreproachable character, is or is not guilty of the offence that is laid to his charge. The hon. the Minister of Justice was also eloquent on the penalty that might ensue if this House should decide that the hon. member for Richelieu was guilty of the charges brought against him. Hon. members who have had occasion to be present at criminal trials will have observed the pathetic tones with which counsel representing men whose offence carries capital punishment are apt to get far away from the question of the offence and to keep vividly before the eyes and the ears of the jurors the penalty that will follow if they find the accused guilty. That we had done this afternoon and done to perfection by the Minister of Justice. We were told that the question was whether the hon. member for Richelieu should be expelled from this House, and yet, Mr. Speaker, you hold in your hand the motion and the amendment to that motion, and is there one word of suggestion in either motion or amendment as to the infliction of a penalty upon the hon. member for Richelieu. Before you proceed to inflict a penalty you have to deal with the question of fact, and the question of fact is the whole question that we have before us for decision; the question whether as a matter of fact the hon. member for Richelieu is guilty of the offence charged against him, or, possibly as suggested by the hon. member for Welland in moving the motion, of some lesser offence that might be included in that charge that was made. That is the question we have before us. We have besides that, the question whether the hon. member for Champlain (Mr. Blondin) has merited the censure that was passed upon him in the report of the majority of the committee. Those are the questions that we are called upon to determine; those are the questions that it is our duty to approach in that judicial frame of mind which the Minister of Justice so highly commended to us. And, we would be making just as grave a mistake if we allowed our judgment on those two questions to be swayed by the fact that the consequence of the finding in one way might be very grave for the hon. member for Richelieu, as we would be if we allowed ourselves in reaching a conclusion to forget that it is not only the hon. member for Richelieu who is gravely interested in the decision of this parliament, but that this parliament itself is gravely interested in the decision that it is going to render. We are called upon in this decision to set before the people of Canada what the standard is that parliament thinks should be fixed for worthiness or unworthiness to form part of itself. That is a matter of no little importance. It is important to this whole country that the people of this country should be taught that the standard of morality, the standard of honour, of their representatives, if not of the very highest which I would like to see it set at, is at all events one which does not fall below the average standard of the people of this country.

And now, Mr. Speaker, I address myself directly to the consideration of the questions that we are called upon to consider and decide. We have before us two reports from the Committee on Privileges and Elections, one of which tells us in substance that the conduct of the hon. member for Richelieu, as revealed in the evidence laid before that committee, is above reproach—not only that, but that he was so stainless, that his conduct was so far above suspicion, that the belief, the acknowledged honest, sincere belief, of the hon. member for Champlain (Mr. Blondin), that the hon. member for Richelieu is guilty or rather his action based on that belief is deserving of the condemnation of this House. We have, on the other hand, a minority report that finds in substance that the hon. member for Richelieu has been guilty of unlawfully procuring for himself the services of workmen paid with the moneys of the people of Canada and goods belonging to the people of Canada, that that work and those goods have been appropriated to his own uses, and that he obtained them by unlawfully combining or co-operating with employees of the government of Canada to place at his disposal that work and hand over to him those goods; and we have the further finding that, in the judgment of the minority of the committee, this conduct on the part of the hon. member for Richelieu infringed the independence of parliament. So far, on the part of the two hon. members who have spoken in support of the report of the majority, it has appeared that they considered that the question that we have to decide, the great important question, was not how the member for Richelieu got that work done for him or how he got hold of those goods, but whether he paid for them or not. I think that very fairly results from what I consider, if I may be permitted to say so, the very moderate, and from his point of view very fair, laying before this House of the questions involved, by the hon. member for Welland (Mr. German). It certainly appears absolutely clear from the speech of the right hon. Minister of Justice, who, in addition to the high character of the hon. member for Richelieu, dwelt upon the fact that his conduct, since this charge was made, has been such as to bring home to the mind of every fair man conviction of his innocence. And what was the particular act that he held up to us as showing that conclusively? Why, Mr. Speaker, he said that the hon. member for Richelieu, when he paid for these goods, paid for them with his own cheque to the Department of Marine and Fisheries. He made this payment in the manner that would make it the most public thing possible, that would make it absolutely susceptible of such conclusive proof that he that ran might read and be convinced. If the hon. member for Richelieu had felt that there was anything guilty in this payment, would he, the Minister of Justice asked, have made it in that way? The hon. minister was very eloquent on that point. But he completely forgot that the payment was not the thing with which the member for Richelieu was charged. The payment is the entire defence of the hon. member for Richelieu, and, the payment being his entire defence, wonderful to relate, and as conclusive proof of his spotless innocence, he took the trouble to provide himself with conclusive proof of his entire defence. Who can be so partisan as to think him guilty after that? I say that hon. gentlemen on the other side have treated this matter as though the question were whether the hon. member for Richelieu paid or did not pay. The hon. member for Welland seemed to consider that he having paid, that ended the matter, and there was no further ground of complaint. I am not clear what the view of the hon. Minister of Justice was of the nature of the act of payment, because he seemed to consider it something wonderful that that act should have been publicly performed ; but I take it that it was in that fact that he found the proof of innocence. Now, Mr. Speaker, whether the hon. member for Richelieu paid in the end or did not pay, I submit, is not material to the substantial question which we have to decide. If we were dealing with the question of what penalty ought to be meted out to the hon. member for Richelieu, I am not prepared to say that this payment, made just as it was, might not avail as a mitigating circumstance; but I ask you, Mr. Speaker, does any one doubt that there are numbers of thieves in the penitentiary to-day who would gladly have paid what they had stolen if thereby they could have avoided the penalty? Both of these hon. gentlemen who spoke are lawyers, and distinguished lawyers, lawyers of the very highest eminence; and yet they stand before this House, apparently expecting us to accept their proposition, that it is of no consequence how the hon. member for Richelieu got the goods or got the work, provided only he paid for them. I wonder if these distinguished lawyers have heard of such a thing as compounding a felony. I wonder if they know that the victim of a theft who accepts restitution of the goods and undertakes not to prosecute the offender is guilty of an offence himself. And yet, if the charges brought against the hon. member for Richelieu, in regard to the manner in which he got the goods of this country, are true, then this House is being asked on his behalf to compound a felony because he paid. That is the position purely and simply. I am not saying at this stage whether the hon. member for Richelieu is guilty of these charges, but all I want to point out is that what is offered as a defence is absolutely no defence and has absolutely no bearing upon the question of his guilt so far as it is made to rest upon the proposition that he paid for these goods. The question is: Did he lawfully get these goods? If he got them unlawfully it did not become lawful because he paid for them afterwards. If he got them unlawfully it did not become lawful because he meant to pay for them later.

An hon. MEMBER. When he was found out.

Mr. DOHERTY. An hon. gentleman says ' when he was found out.'

Mr. TALBOT. That is a good Tory remark.

Mr. DOHERTY. It is a pleasure to hear the hon. gentleman, once in a while, approve of a Tory remark. But I was saying that even if it were true that when the hon. member for Richelieu got these goods he meant to pay for them, if he got them unlawfully, he is just as guilty as if he had not meant to. How many bank clerks, how many men in positions of trust, are in the penitentiary to-day expiating the offence of having embezzled the funds of their employers, who, nevertheless, when they took that money, honestly, sincerely and earnestly intended to pay and believed that they would pay?

Mr. Speaker, the question is not what was in the mind of the hon. member for Richelieu as to what he was going to do in the future when he got these goods; the question is not as to what he and these employees of the government from whom he got them, had in their minds as to what was going to be done in the future when they handed him over these goods; the question is whether, when these employees delivered over to him these goods and undertook to pay out the moneys of this country to the workmen of the hon. member for Richelieu, they had the right to do it, and whether the hon. member for Richelieu, when he took those goods from those men and when he took the benefit of that work and allowed the government of Canada to be called upon to pay for it, had a right to do it. It is on that point that I want for one moment to refer to one statement in the evidence because I think that the hon. member for Welland (Mr. German) when he stated the evidence upon this subject—and I do not question but that he did it in perfect good faith—misapprehended the effect absolutely of the statement of these accused men themselves as to what was in their minds and what they said to each other at the time of the commission of the alleged offence. I was surprised to hear the hon. member for Welland and, if I am not mistaken, the hon. Minister of Justice, speak of Pagé as an absolutely disinterested man, as some one entirely unaffected by the result of these charges. I was surprised at this, or rather I was not surprised because there are some things that the necessities of the case exact from a counsel. I recognize the familiar devices of a counsel to get around a difficulty and the Minister of Justice finds that he must absolutely separate the hon. member for Richelieu from the employees of this department. If I understand him aright his reasoning is: Well, perhaps the employees of the department stole those goods that they gave to Mr. Lanctot, but that has nothing to do with Mr. Lanctot, nothing in the world to do with him. Innocent Mr. Lanctot; guilty Mr. Pagé; guilty Mr. Champagne! Guilty of what?—giving the country's goods to Mr. Lanctot and paying the country's money to Mr. Lanctot's workmen. They may be guilty, the Minister of Justice says, and the Department of Marine may have many things to answer for, many wrong things may have been done, but, oh, turn your eyes away from the immaculate hon. member for Richelieu because he is not affected in the slightest!

Now, my proposition—and I think it is clearly demonstrated by the undisputed facts of this matter—is that if Mr. Pagé and Mr. Champagne misappropriated the goods and property of this country and handed them over to the hon. member for Richelieu he is an absolute and equal sharer in their guilt, and if they paid out the moneys of Canada to his workmen to paint his house he is as guilty as they of the commission of the offence. Inasmuch as we seem to live in an atmosphere where it seems to be considered that when you are dealing with the property and moneys of the people of this country, the ordinary words of the English language have no application, I would like to get down to the very simplest form of expression as to what, it seems to me, the uncontradicted evidence here, show to have been the nature of the act of Mr. Champagne and Mr. Pagé. As applied to government property and government money, at all events in the Department of Marine, the operation is described as 'borrowing.' In the ordinary parlance of this country and in the language of the criminal code it is called 'theft.' For the information of the eminent lawyers who consider that the whole question is whether this cheque was paid, I would like to read the definition of 'theft':

> Theft or stealing is the act of fraudulently and without colour of right taking or fraudulently and without colour of right converting to the use of any person——

You will notice there is no exception for members of parliament.

> —anything capable of being stolen——

Notice again absolutely no exception for things that belong to the people of Canada.

> —with intent to deprive the owner or any person having any special property or interest therein temporarily or absolutely of such thing or of such property or interest.

On the undisputed facts, what did Pagé do when he gave that paint? What did Champagne do when he undertook, and when he did, by false pretenses, by falsehood, get the money of the people of Canada from the department here and pay it over to Lanctot's workmen? If Mr. Pagé did not convert that paint, which, so far as I know, is an object capable of being stolen, to the use of a person, which I understand the hon. member for Richelieu to be, I am at a loss to know what he did. And if he did not do that fraudulently and without colour of right, then, I would ask some of the defenders of this act who may follow me, to tell me just how he did do it. Pagé and Champagne were two servants of the people of Canada. Pagé had in his possession these things, the property of the people of Canada. He had them entrusted to him—he says so himself, and it would be impossible to deny it—for use in the works of the people of Canada. And what did he do with them, he gave them to Mr. Lanctot for use in Mr. Lanctot's house. And when he gave them to Mr. Lanctot he effectively and for all time, deprived the people of Canada of the ownership of those goods. But hon. gentlemen opposite will say: Ah, but he did not do it fraudulently. I have not heard them suggest that he did it with any colour of right, but if I understand rightly, they do attach a great deal of importance to the point that he did not do it fraudulently. I wonder what the definition of these eminent lawyers is as to what constitutes doing a thing fraudulently. Pagé has no right to use these articles other than for the work of the people of Canada. He handed them over absolutely without right to Mr. Lanctot and so deprived the people of Canada of these goods. I wonder how one of these hon. gentlemen opposite would feel if he went home some evening and found that some servant of his had given away—what shall I say?—these gentlemen are so devoted to harmony, let us say, the grand piano. The servant had got a solemn promise from the gentleman to whom he gave it, that he would bring it back again, or would give the hon. gentleman another piano. I wonder how long it would be before there would be a policeman in the house to deal with the servant who had—in such complete absence of fraud—given away the piano of the hon. gentleman. Why, the thing does not stand a moment's consideration. I give away another man's property, I turn it over from the purpose for which he entrusted it to me and give it to another person, and I have not acted fraudulently?

And now, with regard to the payment of the men—and that is a thing upon which I venture to correct a statement, in regard to the evidence of the hon. member for Welland (Mr. German). That hon. gentleman seems to have gathered from the evidence with regard to these men, that Mr. Lanctot went on throughout this transaction under the supposition that he was dealing with Mr. Champagne, and would have to pay Mr. Champagne, and that he did not know that the money of the government of Canada was being procured and paid over to these men. Now, the very evidence that the hon. member (Mr. German), cites as establishing the point, really shows that the hon. member for Richelieu could not have the very slightest notion of it. I am willing to take the statement of the hon. member (Mr. Lanctot), that, at the outset, that is what he meant—that he meant to pay the money to Champagne, and Champagne to pay it to the men. But that was never carried out and the evidence shows that he knew who was paying them. He tells us he offered to pay to Champagne. And what did Champagne tell him. He said: 'don't give the money to me for the men will think I am not giving all that I get; I don't want the money to go through my hands at all.' And the hon. member for Richelieu, notwithstanding his desire to pay, acquiesced in that. And this thing went on for four or five months. Does anybody suppose that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Lanctot), thought the men were not being paid at all? He knew he was not furnishing the money. He knew the money was not going through the hands of Champagne, because Champagne absolutely refused to pay the men himself, and take the money from Lanctot, because, as he said—I am taking these versions to be true—the men will think I get more than I am paying. The hon. gentleman knew that the men were being paid and that Champagne was not paying them, and that he himself was not paying them. And the hon. member for Welland (Mr. German), would ask us to believe that he (Mr. Lanctot), did not know that the government of Canada was paying. But we need not indeed we must not use any inferences—though inferences sometimes are as conclusive as any proof imaginable—for we have been warned by the hon. Minister of Justice (Sir Allen Aylesworth), that any inferences that we draw will necessarily be inspired by our partisan feeling, so, we will be careful not to draw inferences but will take the testimony of the hon. member for Richelieu himself, as to whom he was dealing with. Here is the wind up of his testimony :

Q. How did you come to send this cheque to Mr. Papineau when you had arranged about this matter with Mr. Champagne and Mr. Pagé?—A. Because the account that was sent to me was made in the name of the Marine and Fisheries Department, Ottawa, and was made: 'A Lanctot Dr. to the Marine and Fisheries Department of Canada, Sorel.'

Q. Was it the first time at that date, November 21, 1910, you learned that you were doing business with the Marine and Fisheries Department for the painting of your house?—A. No, sir.

Q. Did you know from the beginning that you were doing business for the Department of Marine?——

No doubt that means 'with' the Department of Marine.

—A. Certainly. I knew that the men of the Department of Marine were working at my place, but not Mr. Champagne's men.

I think the hon. member for Welland himself, will correct his impression on that subject. The hon. member for Richelieu knew as well then as he knows now that these men were being paid with the moneys of the people of Canada, and, unless we assume that the hon. member for Richelieu is absolutely bereft of ordinary intelligence—and I am sure my hon. friends opposite would not ask us to make such an assumption as that—he knew that these moneys were not paid to these men unless they figured on the pay-lists of the government of Canada. And to tell us now that he is absolutely innocent in regard to the means resorted to to get that money, to tell us that Champagne was the bad man in that connection, that all the benefit was going to the hon. member for Richelieu and all the guilt was on the head of Champagne, why, it is childish, perfectly childish.

I say then, that the hon. member for Richelieu knew that these painters who were working for him were being paid with the money of the people of Canada, and he knew that that result could only be produced by a falsification of the pay-list. But whether he knew there was a falsification or not, is immaterial; he did know that they were being paid with the money of the people. I want to say here and now that it does not make any difference, so far as the member for Richelieu is concerned, whether that money was being paid without the knowledge of Mr. Papineau or with the knowledge of Mr. Papineau; that it does not make any difference whether that money was being paid with or without the knowledge of the minister, because that money was not Mr. Papineau's money and was not the money of the minister, and was not the money of the government; and neither Mr. Papineau nor the minister had any more right, if they had known this, to pay that money out to paint Mr. Lanctot's house, than Mr. Champagne had. The only difference it makes is, who is the guilty man in the Department of Marine and Fisheries, that is all. But Mr. Lanctot's position is absolutely the same, whoever it was that paid that money. Surely I am not to be told that Mr. Lanctot may have innocently supposed that Mr. Champagne had a right to do that; that he may have innocently supposed that Pagé had any such right; that Mr. Lanctot may have innocently supposed that the minister had that right. If the minister had been the man that Mr. Lanctot dealt with, the only difference would have been that it was the minister and Mr. Lanctot who had combined to steal from the people of Canada; that it all.

Mr. GERMAN. Will the hon. gentleman allow me to ask him a question? Supposing Mr. Lanctot had entered into a distinct arrangement with Mr. Champagne that the government officials were to be supplied to paint his house, that they were to be paid for by government money during the course of their work, and that he was to refund the money to the government; under those circumstances does my hon. friend think that Mr. Lanctot would be guilty of an offence?

Mr. DOHERTY I certainly think he would be guilty of a legal offence.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. GERMAN. The Independence of Parliament Act.

Mr. DOHERTY. I am not discussing the Independence of Parliament Act, I am discussing the offences of which this hon. gentleman is accused, and I am somewhat pained to see the amusement created in the minds of some hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House because I have suggested that if Mr. Lanctot went to Mr. Champagne and asked him to pay the money of the people of Canada to his workmen, because he, Mr. Lanctot, was going to pay him back again, Mr. Lanctot would have been guilty of an offence. If the laughter of the hon. members indicate their standard of what is right and wrong in the matter of dealing with other people's money, it is to be hoped that their views will not prevail in this House. Why, Sir, if I walked into a bank to-morrow and asked the teller behind the counter to go on and pay the bank's money out to my workmen and I would pay him by and by, and if the bank manager came down at the end of the week and found that young man short in his cash, I wonder whether that bank manager's standard would be that of the hon. gentlemen who laugh. I see my distinguished, and eloquent and eminent friend, the Crown prosecutor for the distrirct of Montreal, sitting opposite and listening to me with an attention that is flattering. I wonder if he would hesitate to indict the young man whose cash was so found short for having embezzled the funds of his employer. Why, the thing seems to me, as it must seem to every normal mind with ordinary ideas of the difference between meum and tuum, as absolutely self evident. I do not know whether it is that hon. members who are so much amused, having been so long now in the enjoyment of all the benefits and advantages that come from being faithful supporters of the present administration, have come to have a somewhat confused notion about whose the tuum is when it is a question of the money of the people of Canada. Do they apply a different rule in that case? I say that Mr. Champagne, when he paid the money of the people to the men who worked on Mr. Lanctot's house, stole the money of the people of Canada, and I say that Mr. Lanctot knowingly took that money which belonged to the people. It may have been salve to his own conscience—I am not here to judge this matter in foro conscientiae; we are living in the outside world where we have to judge of mens' intentions by their actions—it may have been salve to his conscience that he had paid the money back again. But whether he got these goods rightfully or wrongfully, they were not his and he owed for them, or was bound to restore them, and if he got them wrongfully, that made a double debt. So I say that on the undisputed facts, these men, to the knowledge of Mr. Lanctot, stole the money of the people of Canada to pay Mr. Lanctot's workmen. Possibly he may not have realized that to do so they had to falsify the pay-list, that is a matter of minor interest. But the great fact stands there that they stole the money, they stole the goods, or the Criminal Code does not mean what it says, and does not mean anything. It used to be said the receiver was worse than the thief. As I understand the position to-day, a man who is an accomplice is guilty of the offence; and Mr. Lanctot was as clearly as a man could be an accomplice in the acts of these men.

Now I am told that he had agreed to pay it back again, and he did pay it back again. The offence was complete when he got the goods, and the fact that he paid for the goods afterwards does not alter the fact that he had committed the offence; and what may have been the idea in his mind as to what he was going to do, I submit we cannot safely take as having any bearing on the question. We are told that he was in dire necessity, there was not a painter in Sorel. Mr. Lanctot's house had to be painted. The hon. member for Welland (Mr. German) spent some time this afternoon in showing how completely the attempt had failed to prove that there were any painters in Sorel. A convenient doctrine. I need something for my house, I cannot get it in Montreal.

My hon. friend the member for Welland has it. My hon. friend the member for Welland has a most agreeable and obliging servant who is a friend of mine. What more natural, what more absolutely innocent, what more positively commendable? It puts me on a pedestal as a hero. Why of course I go to my hon. friend's servant and I say: You just give me this thing which your master owns and I do not, and I will give you another one by and by. That is precisely the position. Why should we waste time discussing whether there were painters in Sorel or not? It does not make a particle of difference to the fact that this man gave away government property. Are we to have every time-keeper and foreman painter—because Champagne a time-keeper and Pagé a foreman painter—throughout Canada in any department of this government empowered to sit in judgment on the relative necessities of the citizens of this country and give them what they want, whenever such employees are satisfied that they cannot get what they want anywhere else. It is difficult really, to have patience with pretensions of this kind, really difficult. Manifestly the pretended absence of painters in Sorel has no bearing on the question arising on the different reports of the committee, the question before us, namely, the question of how Mr. Lanctot got these goods. I fail to see how it is possible to describe the operation by which he was put in possession of these goods, and secured the payment of this money to these workmen by any other word than theft. If the English language has another word, I would be glad to employ it. The word 'borrow' is suggested, and might be used if you could borrow from a man what is not his own, and what he has no right to lend, own, and what he has no right to lend, and if he may lend that without stealing goods; if that is so then Mr. Lanctot borrowed it. If you cannot do that, Mr. Lanctot got the proceeds of the thefts of these men and there is no other way to describe it. I was surprised to hear the Minister of Justice declare that there was nothing unlawful in all this matter, because, forsooth, there was no violation in his opinion of section 14 of the Independence of Parliament Act. Besides the Independence of Parliament Act, there is the Criminal Code, and it makes a variety of things unlawful, amongst others, the appropriation of your neighbour's goods when you have no right to them. There is besides that a moral code which may be supposed to have some restraining influence over gentlemen worthy to be members of parliament, and so far as I understand the rules of that code, it likewise rather frowns upon the appropriating to yourself of the goods of other people when you have no right to them.

I need not waste time pointing out that Champagne's consent and Pagé's consent and Papineau's consent if it had been obtained did not bear upon the question in the slightest degree and that Mr. Lanctot knew that; but so far as it goes, even if we assume that Mr. Lanctot was in a state of ignorance I would be sorry to attribute to him, and did suppose that Papineau the superintendent sat there with jurisdiction to determine when he was entitled to give the goods of the government away, we have it clearly shown that Mr. Lanctot being told that that was the essential condition, never got the permission of Papineau. As throwing light upon this state of perfect good faith that is attributed to Mr. Lanctot, I think it is our duty not to pass over the circumstances with regard to the obtaining of that permission. He proved to us by his own testimony as conclusively justifying his taking the stuff without permission, that he went to see Papineau, and Papineau was not in, and he seems to have assumed that because Papineau was not in, that changed the whole nature of the situation with regard to the person who was entitled to control, even if we suppose that the superintendent had power to give these things away. He went immediately to Champagne and made his bargain with him, and it all had to be done in a hurry because he was going to Saranac that afternoon, and he had to catch a train. This was on the 29th of May, and the painting went on until the 21st of November, and we have it on the testimony of Mr. Lanctot himself that the only thing about which there was any hurry on the 28th or 29th of May, was that the carpenters were engaged in putting the clapboards on the exterior, and there was some hurry to have a man put the priming on the boards before they got dry. —Let us say that that justified Mr. Lanctot in getting a man to go and hurry up the job. But how does that explain his refraining from any communication with Papineau throughout the whole summer and fall? It is quite true there were some weeks when Mr. Lanctot was absent from Sorel, but we have his testimony that he got back on the 20th of June and was there until the 20th of July. He came again in August, and he was there for quite a period of time and all this work was going on; in fact the contention is, when it is a question of showing that Mr. Douaire did not paint as many days as he said, that there was little work done in July and August, and that the bulk was done in the fall after Mr. Lanctot came home and Mr. Lanctot with his knowledge that he should have the permission of Mr. Papineau at all events, never went near Mr. Papineau in any way. The testimony of Mr. Papineau, whom we are all agreed, is an honest and reliable man, in reply to my own question is that if he had been asked to do this thing he would not have done it. He adds that no subordinate of his, of course, had power or right to do a thing that he had not the right to do. He does say—because I do not want to mis-state it, although I do not think it has any bearing—that there might conceivably be cases of such urgency and necessity as to induce him to send a man out for a day. But he says that under normal circumstances he would not have done it, and that he considered no subordinate of his had a right to do that which he himself had no right to do.

Mr. TALBOT. Is it not a fact that Mr. Papineau lives right across the street from where that house was being built, that every day he saw these men working there and knew they were in the employ of the government?

Mr. DOHERTY. It is absolutely a fact that Mr. Papineau lives just about opposite Mr. Lanctot's house, but it is also a fact that Papineau swears—I do not know if the hon. gentleman throws discredit on his testimony—that he did not know that this work was being done. I am perfectly free to say that it is a great pleasure once in a while to be able to agree with people with whom you generally disagree. I am quite willing to say it is a matter of surprise to myself that Mr. Papineau did not know. I cannot claim any very intimate personal acquaintance with Mr. Papineau, but I have heard from all sides, and I think the minister will bear it out, that Mr. Papineau is a truthful man and he swears that he did not know.

There is just one word I would like to offer which perhaps the member for Bellechasse may be willing tol isten to, although he seems very incredulous, and it is that what Papineau did not know was that these men who were working there were working for the government and being paid by the government. The fact that they were usually government employees and were working on that house might be explained. I have no brief for Papineau and it is immaterial to me whether he knew or not, but I think it is right to be fair to every man, particularly to a man in whose honesty you have absolute confidence, when it is put in question by my hon. friend. There was a custom in Sorel of which Mr. Papineau did know; a custom under which it did happen that people came to the department and said: Would you lend me a man, and men were lent in a way with regard to which I see no reproach to make—a man was actually lent, that is to say, the department said to him: Go and work for Mr. So and So, and Mr. So and So will pay you and you will get your job when you come back, but in the meantime you won't be stamping on the clock and drawing your money from the government of the country.

Mr. TALBOT. If Mr. Papineau is the man whom my hon. friend believes he is, does he not think he would inquire how these men got there and why they were there?

Mr. DOHERTY. I do think that Mr. Papineau would have been entitled to more commendation if he had done so, although I do not recognize I have jurisdiction to pronounce upon Mr. Papineau's actions. It did strike me as extraordinary that Mr. Papineau did not concern himself more about the matter than he did, but it is fair to say that Mr. Papineau was not charged before us and was not offered an opportunity of giving an explanation, and I do not stand here to condemn him. I am trying to deal with the matter that is before us, and I am trying to be just to every one concerned. If the hon. member for Bellechasse thinks he has any interest in convicting Mr. Papineau of some offence, I can refer him to Mr. Papineau's superior, the Minister of Marine, who, no doubt, will accommodate the hon. member. But I do say that Mr. Papineau swears, and he is not contradicted, that he did not know this kind of thing was going on, that if he had been asked he would not have permitted it. And Messrs. Pagé and Champagne, who were carrying out this job for the member for Richelieu, were very careful to see that nothing happened that came to the knowledge of Mr. Papineau. Mr. Champagne even went the length of falsifying his pay-list with no other object that I can see than to conceal the fact that these men were working for Mr. Lanctot. There is every evidence that so far as these men could they kept it from Mr. Papineau's knowledge. There is Mr. Papineau's own testimony that he never knew, and there is the testimony of the men who swore—testimony at which the hon. member for Welland sneers, but which stands there, and finds remarkable corroboration in the fact that Mr. Papineau did not know—that they were warned when they carried the paint from the Sorel yards to take a route that would enable them to avoid Mr. Papineau. Much has been made of the fact that Mr. Papineau lived opposite and that they had to pass in front of his house, but the hour at which they were carrying the paint would be the hour at which Mr. Papineau would be on his way from his house to the works, and they were told to take certain streets so that they would not meet him. It was not a question of their being seen from Mr. Papineau's house; it was a question of their not being seen by Mr. Papineau on the way, because they were loaded with paint and Mr. Papineau might have asked inconvenient questions. I can quite conceive that Mr. Papineau may have known that these particular men were working on Mr. Lanctot's house, and may have supposed it was under this custom we were told existed there, of men being really and genuinely lent to outside people. There may be something to be said about the desirability of that custom, but at all events it does not mean employing the money of Canada for other people's advantage, or giving the goods of Canada to other people. For my part, I believe that Mr. Lanctot knew—because he could not help knowing—that these goods were in the Sorel yards for the people of Canada and not for him, that these men were working in the Sorel yards and that the money paid them was to be paid for the work they did for the people of Canada and not for him. That he could not help knowing that. If he had gone in there and stolen a barrel of paint would he be able to defend himself by saying: I did not know it belonged to the people of Canada, I did not know whom it belonged to. And if he could not defend himself in such a case, he can no more defend himself now by saying he did not know that that paint was not the property of these men who gave it to him. The two things are absolutely on a parity. So that I say, that not only did he know but he was warned with regard to Mr. Papineau that without his permission, at all events, he could not have these things. And if we assume him to be ignorant enough to think that Mr. Papineau's permission would have helped him, he never moved a finger to get it; never did anything after that one afternoon when he went down and found that Mr. Papineau was not in. I do not want to draw any inference or make any insinuations, but I might be pardoned for saying that sometimes people do go calling and are not heartbroken when they are told that the person they go to call on is not in. At all events, this fact does stand out: that Mr. Lanctot succeeded very very much better in his mission, because Mr. Papineau was not there, for if Mr. Papineau had been there we have his own testimony that Mr. Lanctot would not have got this permission. On that branch of the case, to my mind, it is perfectly impossible to reach the conclusion of the majority of the committee that the hon. member for Richelieu was blameless in this matter; it is absolutely impossible unless you are prepared to say that a man may take what does not belong to him, and if he only pays for it afterwards it is all right. Unless you are prepared to say that every man who is prepared to pay for what he steals is entitled to steal. Mr. Lanctot cannot be acquitted in the way in which he has been acquitted by the majority of this committee. For my part I would be glad to take any charitable view that could possibly be taken of what has happened. I would be willing to make allowance for what may have been the habit in Sorel. but that is not proved and I do not want to affirm it. I must say that somewhat to my surprise Mr. Lanctot's counsel strenuously objected to proof that this kind of thing went on generally in Sorel. If I had been defending Mr. Lanctot—I am not now talking about what might have been the interest of the department or others—but if I had been defending Mr. Lanctot, I certainly would not have objected to that proof because it might at least have explained how he came to let himself slide into the idea that he could take these goods under the circumstances and not be guilty of any offence. That might have been in mitigation; that might have had to be considered when we came to deal with Mr. Lanctot's position from the point of view of any penalty that might be imposed. We are not at all concerned to-night in determining, I repeat, whether Mr. Lanctot ought to be expelled from this House or not; we are not determining whether there should be any penalty meted out to him, or what penalty should be so meted out to him, we are concerned simply with the question of fact: did he lawfully or unlawfully get these goods and that money, the property of the people of Canada. And, the verdict that is going to be sent out to this country if the majority of the House stands behind the Minister of Justice and finds there was nothing unlawful, is going to be an invitation to the public in general: Come on one and all; here we are, the government of Canada, maintaining workshops to do the work of the country, and you are quite welcome to come in and get your work done for you at cost price; we will pay the whole fixed charges and the operating charges and all the expense involved in the maintenance of these great establishments, and you will be the pink of honesty if you come in and get your goods from our employees even without our knowledge. Provided, you give us back exactly what the goods cost us and exactly what we pay the men, we will stand up and say that the people of Canada have lost nothing. Who pays to maintain that establishment? Who pays to put those facilities there, at the disposal of Mr. Lanctot, if they are at his disposal, and at the disposal of everybody else? Who pays for that entire organization of superintendents? Who supplies all the brushes and tools of every description that were used in this work? Everybody knows that paint brushes were used to paint the house, and yet there is not a solitary paint brush paid for. Who pays for all these things? Surely, Mr. Speaker, if the people of Canada have gone into the business of contracting painters, or any other business, they are entitled to have the reasonable profit that anybody else has; and Mr. Lanctot, if his payment has been made, is keeping in his pocket to-day the profit which the people of Canada were legitimately entitled to on that work.

I come to a point where, in his conclusion at all events, I am happy to be able to agree with the Minister of Justice; but it is not nearly as troublesome to me to get to my conclusion, and fortunately it does not need anything like the same eloquence as he devoted to his conclusion this afternoon; nor does it need any argument to support it. The Minister of Justice says that we have not proof of a violation of section 14 of the Independence of Parliament Act. Mr. Speaker, I do not think there has been proved a violation of the text of section 14 or section 15 of the Independence of Parliament Act, for one very simple reason: the Independence of Parliament Act deals with contractual relations between a member of parliament and the government of this country. In this case, to my mind, it is absolutely clear that there were no contractual relations between Mr. Lanctot and the government of this country. The relation that existed between Mr. Lanctot and the government of this country was the relation between a man who had unlawfully obtained another man's property and the man whose property had been so obtained, and which generates an obligation to repay it, and that is not a contractual obligation.

Now, I would stop here if it were not for what strikes me as the most extraordinary feature of the report of the majority of this committee. I am free to confess that in the face of the evidence, I find the report as a whole extraordinary; but what is extraordinary beyond my limited powers of expression, is the censure which the committee has pronounced upon the hon. member for Champlain. And if anything could be more extraordinary than that censure, it is the reason on which it rests. It is worth reading:

> Your committee feel that in view of the very serious nature of the charges made they should express an opinion on the propriety of Mr. Blondin making the charges in the manner he did. Your committee do not wish to state that Mr. Blondin did not believe there was truth in the allegations, or that he did not act from a bona fide belief in their truthfulness, but the committee think that before making so serious a charge against an honourable member of the House of Commons, he should have made some independent inquiry to verify the truthfulness of the charges made and, which he apparently did not do. The Minister of Marine was called as a witness. His evidence as to this on page 189 where he says he had information that no fraud had been committed and that all labour supplied by the shipyards had been paid for and all material supplied had been returned and which information he would have been pleased to give Mr. Blondin had he applied for same.

Now what is the information that Mr. Blondin could have had? Had it any bearing on how the member for Richelieu got these goods or this work? Not a particle. It was that the hon. member for Richelieu had paid for them. What I said at the outset, I think, quite disposes of that. If it were true that the hon. Minister of Marine had said, as he is made to say in this report, that he had information that there was no fraud at all in the matter, and had been in a position to satisfy Mr. Blondin the hon. member for Champlain of that, there might be something to be said, though for my part I question the soundness of the proposition that a man who has credible information that very grave offences have been committed, is bound to go to any minister in this government or any other and absolutely abandon them on the ipse dixit of the minister. I am not in that desirous of being understood as wishing to question in any way the truthfulness of the particular minister. I am speaking as a general proposition. To say that with the strong testimony Mr. Blondin had it was his duty to go further before he laid those charges, and that the going further meant that he should have gone to the minister and been satisfied with what he said, is, I submit, absolutely untenable. But more than that. Stop for a moment to reflect on what the committee knew. The hon. member for Champlain rose in his place and made these charges and read these affidavits; and the hon. member for Richelieu rose in his place and thanked the hon. member for Champlain for giving him an opportunity of disproving them, admitting in the most categorical way that there was ground for suspicion and that he was labouring under grave and serious suspicion which he had an interest to remove. I am not inventing that. You will find that in the very first statement of the hon. member for Richelieu:

I must say that I have no objection whatever to the motion of the hon. member for Champlain, asking that the charges preferred against me as a member of this House be referred for investigation to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. I am glad that he has brought this matter to the attention of the House, and I court the fullest and the most complete investigation of it.

Now, if the hon. member for Richelieu did not know that there was a prima facie case, and a strong prima facie case against him, would he have said that he was glad to have the charges brought forward and to have an investigation? But, more than that: the Minister of Marine and Fisheries sat in the House and heard these charges and this answer, and if he had then in his possession this information which was absolutely conclusive and which would have led the hon. member for Champlain to abandon his charges, did the hon. minister quite do his duty when he did not put that information before the House? I am not imputing to him that he did not do his duty, because I have no hesitation in saying that there is nothing in the evidence which the hon. minister laid before the committee which justifies the conclusion that if the hon. member for Champlain had gone to him and had heard what he had to say, he would have adopted a different course. The minister in giving his testimony was very careful, I think quite properly so, to express no opinion whatever on the lawfulness of what had been done. I would like to read that testimony because it is important in its bearing on this branch of the case. Now, this is what the hon. member for Champlain would have learned if he had gone to the hon. minister—I am not going to read it all. He would have learned, in the first place, that the hon. minister had a letter from the hon. member for Richelieu denying these charges. And just while we are passing, to show how conclusive a basis that would have been for the hon. member for Champlain to have accepted as a reason for abandoning these charges, let me point out that there is on the very face of that letter an absolute falsehood. We have had the conduct of the hon. member for Richelieu, since the charges were made, held up to us as a reason for concluding in his perfect innocence and yet, on the 6th December—and this is a part of the evidence that the majority of the committee think should cause my hon. friend from Champlain to withdraw his charges—the hon. member for Richelieu, in answer to a letter from the minister, calling his attention to the charges, writes:

Mr. Douaire states in his declaration that certain painters of the Department of Marine and Fisheries have worked at my house, and have been paid by said department. This is true; but as soon as their work was finished I reimbursed the department as per understanding with the officers.

So far so good.

I did the same with regard to borrowed material. The whole was paid several days before the filing of those documents.

These documents were dated on the 30th November. There was no settlement for the materials until the 12th December, six days after that letter was written in which the hon. member for Richelieu affirmed that the whole was paid several days before the making of the declaration.

Mr. GERMAN. Is it not fair to state that Mr. Lanctot had made an arrangement with Mr. Papineau that the materials were to be returned prior to the date you have mentioned?

Mr. DOHERTY. It would be fair to state it, but I think it would be a mistake.

Mr. GERMAN. No, that is right.

Mr. DOHERTY. I will just show the testimony of Mr. Lanctot himself as to when he made that arrangement.

Mr. GERMAN. There was not more than a day or two difference anyway.

Mr. DOHERTY. Before I go on to show that there was no settlement before this letter was written with regard to the materials, I want to point out that in any case it was absolutely untrue to say that the whole was paid for before the 30th November and before the declarations were made. That was absolutely untrue.

Mr. GERMAN. Well, it had been arranged for.

Mr. DOHERTY. To get right down to the question of whether, when that letter was written, there had been any settlement for the paint, let us take Mr. Lanctot's own testimony. If it shows me to be mistaken I shall acknowledge it most fairly and most unhesitatingly, because I have no desire to be unfair. The account dated December 12, 1910, will be found on page 24, of the evidence. I want to take the evidence verbatim so that there may be no question as to what Mr. Lanctot himself says about it.

Q. To who did you ask the accounts for paints?—A. To Mr. Pagé?

Q. Did he make a bill for it?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Have you got it?—A. Yes, sir. It was sent to Mr. Papineau.

Then he gives us the bill which is the bill that Mr. Papineau paid to the people who furnished the goods. I think that, as Mr. Papineau's honesty has been questioned, we here have the evidence of it. Mr. Papineau did not wait for Mr. Lanctot to come and make a settlement. When he found that the goods for which he was responsible had disappeared he ordered and paid for similar goods with his own cheque and restored the things that had been within his custody and that he was responsible for although he had no guilty knowledge of how they had disappeared.

Mr. GERMAN. What was the date of the bill that he paid?

Mr. DOHERTY. The 12th December, 1910. Mr. Lanctot is asked:

Q. I do not understand this account, Mr. Lanctot; this account is from the Mount Royal Color and Varnish Company, Limited, of Montreal, to the Department of Marine?—A. This is the account that was sent to the Department of Marine and Fisheries to replace the materials I had got from the Department of Marine and Fisheries. I will explain how it was done: After having sent my cheque to Mr. Papineau on the 22nd of November, 1910—which was Tuesday or Wednesday, I believe—the following Saturday, I think, I came from Ottawa to Sorel. I saw Mr. Papineau at the Department of Marine who told me:——

That is a little remarkable. He does not go to Mr. Papineau to get his bill but he saw Mr. Papineau, and the latter said to him.

—'You have an account for paints; you had some paint; you had some material from Mr. Jean-Baptiste Pagé. Here is his account.'

Q. He had the account?—A. Yes, he had the account. He told me: 'You want to return these goods, do you not?'——

That is not an offer to return them.

—'I said: 'Yes, as it was understood with Mr. Pagé.'

Q. At what date did this take place?—A. I could not say exactly at what date. I know it was a Saturday, at all events.

Q. How many days had elapsed from the time you had sent your cheque to the time you had this interview with Mr. Pagé?—A. I do not know. It was the following Saturday or the Saturday after or the fortnight after——

That was either the first Saturday or a fortnight after he had the interview with Mr. Papineau.

—I coud not say exactly. It was not very long after anyway.

Q. Then it was the following Saturday, or the Saturday a week following?—A. I suppose so. Perhaps I saw him on the street; I do not remember. Mr. Papineau told me: 'I will send Mr. Pagé's account. I will give a requisition to get the same quantity and the same quality of material from the factory to correspond with the material you got from the shop.'

Q. I repeat my question. Did you receive an account from Jean-Baptiste Pagé for the paint that was furnished to you?—A. I tell you it was sent to Mr. Papineau. I do not remember having seen it.

Q. Will you, if you please, answer directly to my question and say if Mr. Pagé furnished you with an account?—A. I do not remember. At all events if I got an account from Mr. Pagé, I took it to Mr. Papineau. Mr. Papineau sent a requisition for the same quantity and the same quality to the same factory and the goods were shipped to Sorel and I paid the freight for the carriage of the goods from Montreal to Sorel.

Q. Will you explain, Mr. Lanctot, how it is that on the 22nd of November, 1910, you had settled, according to your statement, with the Department of Marine and Fisheries for the sum of $375, amount of your cheque for the work done by the men at your house and you did not settle on the same day for the material and paint furnished?—A. It is because I was not to pay for the material. I had borrowed it and I was to return it. . .

Then below:

Mr. Papineau paid the factory and I reimbursed Mr. Papineau.

So that, unmistakably, he had not paid Mr. Papineau on the 6th December. Thus, I say whether this understanding with Mr. Papineau was or was not before the 6th December, it is clear that he had not paid for the material before the declarations were made, and clear that he was not to pay for the material at all but was to return it. I think the letter does say that he was to return it. The testimony of Mr. Papineau shows that there was quite a long delay, shows that it was in December. This is what Mr. Papineau says at page 109: He is asked about the painting of the house:

When did you see Mr. Lanctot in connection with this account, Exhibit No. 20?

That is for painting.

A. Well, I saw him—at the time of receiving the letter. I expected to see him within a few days and then I acknowledged the receipt.

So that on December 2, when Mr. Papineau acknowledged the receipt, he had not yet seen Mr. Lanctot.

When I saw he was not turning up in Sorel I acknowledged the receipt of the letter,——

I hope the hon. member is satisfied that he had no arrangement previous to the 2nd of December.

—and a few days afterwards I had occasion to see him in Sorel and I mentioned the account.

That is the second, the day on which Mr. Papineau wrote, and he had not yet any pretense of a settlement. Four days after that, on the 6th, Mr. Lanctot was in Ottawa. He can hardly on the interval have made a settlement, And even if he had, was it right that he should say he had made a settlement long before the 30th of November? It is inconceivable he should have done that if he were trying to tell the truth.

—which account, the account Mr. Champagne had given you?—A. The account for material. I told him I thought the best plan would be to have the same quantities of material returned to the department. He was quite willing that I have that done for him.

Q. That was the last communication you had with him on that subject?—A. I do not recall any other.

Q. Well, in writing you, for instance, inclosing the cheque to pay for the mens' time did not he also tell you there would be an account for material, for paints? Did he say anything about that?—A. I do not think he said anything, but I knew it about the same time.

Q. Then you knew it from Mr. Champagne? Well then he agreed to return the materials to the department?—A. Yes.

Q. Well, how were the materials got?—A. About the same time——

That is, about the time the settlement was made—about the 12th December, I put it at:

—about that time there was the manager of the Mount Royal Paint and Varnish Company——

Q. Mr. Lamontagne?—A. Mr. Lamontagne—happened to be in Sorel and as he was one of the men supplying material for the department at one time and another, I gave him a list of what we required; you see the list was according to that memoranda.

Q. The memoranda of Mr. Champagne? Exhibit No. 20?—A. Yes. Mr. Pagé, so that Mr. Lamontagne agreed to send the goods to the department, and I gave him my personal cheque.

Q. Have you any cheque with you, Mr. Papineau?—A. Yes. Then at the next——

Q. Will you exhibit your cheque?—A. Yes.

And the cheque is dated 12th of December, and the goods were charged on the 12th, and delivered, I think, on the 13th. So, I think I was making no mistake in saying that not only was there no payment but there was no settlement with Mr. Papineau when Mr. Lanctot wrote that letter. In the second place, the minister himself says that he would not have undertaken to say a word to Mr. Blondin, if that hon. gentleman had gone to him, about the lawfulness or unlawfulness of what had happened, what he would have told him was that the goods had been paid for. Well, of course, if that settled matters we would not be here this evening. But the whole point is that we do not settle an unlawful appropriation of goods by paying for them. This is what the minister says on the subject, I quote from the portion of his evidence which bears on Mr. Blondin's conduct. The minister (Mr. Brodeur), is being examined by Mr. Laflamme:

Q. Well now, just one question: from the 22nd of November up to the 6th of March, did Mr. Blondin ever inquire from you directly or indirectly, verbally or in writing, personally or through outside parties, whether or not the labour had been paid as well as the material?

Question objected to, but the Chairman allows the question.

Hon. Mr. Brodeur.—No, he did not.

By the Chairman—

Q. Could he have ascertained by inquiry from you that Mr. Lanctot had paid for the labour that was done on his house and also had returned to the department the material which had been supplied to him for that purpose?—A. Yes, Mr. Blondin, being a member of parliament, and making an inquiry of that kind, I would be very glad, of course, to have given him the information which I had in my department concerning the matter.

By Mr. Laflamme—

Q. That is to say, you had on the 6th of March all the information required to inform the House generally——

We know the minister did not inform the House generally:

—as well as Mr. Blondin, that the material had not been fraudulently appropriated, robbed or stolen?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. But had been borrowed?—A. Immediately after I got that information, as I told you, I inquired from Mr. Lanctot, and later on from Mr. Papineau, and I was informed that the labour had been reimbursed, had been paid by Mr. Lanctot and that the material had been given back.

Now, if there is anything in that to satisfy one that the labour and material had been lawfully got, then Mr. Blondin should have withdrawn his charges. But to say material illegally got had been paid for or returned, leaves the charge exactly where it was.

By Mr. McDougall—

Q. As I understand, that would be a matter of opinion. You considered at that time the matter to be lawful and others may have considered it unlawful?—A. I do not speak of the lawfulness of the matter. I speak of the information which I had been given.

Q. The information which you had?—A. Yes.

Q. And the information which you had consisted of letters of Mr. Lanctot saying that the matter was all right, that he had borrowed the goods and had paid for them?—A. Yes. He told me that it was true that some men had worked on his house——

This also is important as showing that Mr. Lanctot—different from the impression of the hon. member for Welland—knew that these men were on the pay-lists.

—and were retained on the pay-list, but that he had had reimbursed the money.

Q. And from that you drew an inference?—A. I must say, however, if I remember aright, in all justice to Mr. Lanctot, that he did not think those men were to be put on the list.

Q. And from that you drew the inference that everything was all right. As minister, you were prepared to impart the information to Mr. Blondin or to anybody else that everything was all right?——

And here again the minister was guarded.

—A. Without passing judgment on the irregularity of the proceeding, I would have been ready to give any member of parliament all the information I had because I thought it was for the benefit of all concerned.

I think that is all that bears on the statement that Mr. Blondin could have got the information if he had asked for it.

So, the hon. member for Champlain (Mr. Blondin), has been censured by this majority report in this respect, because he did not go to the minister by whom he would have been told that Mr. Lanctot had paid for the work on the 22nd of November, and had returned the goods some time after. Now, if it were not that sufficient weight, is attached to the fact to build on it this condemnation of the hon. member for Champlain, I would not refer to it, but it is a significant fact—which might have influenced the judgment of the hon. member for Champlain as much as the statement of the minister, which no doubt was perfectly true according to the information he had received—that what the hon. member for Champlain would have learned is that the sending of this cheque with great promptitude on the 22nd of November, the bill being made on the 21st, was singularly coincident with the fact that the minister, on the 22nd of November had sent instructions to Sorel to institute further investigation into the Marine and Fisheries Department. Now, was that a circumstance that would have added, in the mind of the hon. member for Champlain, any very great weight as bearing upon the manner in which these goods were obtained, to the fact that payment had been paid on that very specific date? All these circumstances would still have remained, that all this thing had been carried on in secret without the knowledge of Mr. Papineau, that there did not exist in any book of the government at any period one single charge to show that Mr. Lanctot had ever got anything from the department, that from the beginning to end this thing had been kept concealed until this date, the 22nd of November, coincident with the day on which the Minister of Marine sent instructions to Sorel for further investigation.

I am speaking now only from the point of view of the question whether the hon. member for Champlain had reasonable cause for going ahead. He might well have thought that there was not much weight to be attached to the fact that payment was made just when the investigation was being started, for work and goods the disposal whereof had been withheld from everybody representing the department up to the 22nd of November. Might he not well have thought, that does not mean much, this payment made just when is coming the time when the people will find out what has been done. You have to look at the position of the member for Champlain, and the reasons he had for forming his opinion on that matter. What would he have had reason to believe had he gone to the minister and got that information? He would simply have got the information that after the thing was all done, when the cat was just coming out of the bag, a payment had been made.

It does seem to me an extraordinary thing that a committee whose standard was so low that it could see no harm in what the member for Richelieu had admittedly done, should suddenly take so lofty a position when it came to be a question of the degree of prudence which the member for Champlain should have exercised in making these charges If it were not for the eloquent protests of the Minister of Justice, one would have been tempted to think—of course my thinking so might have been attributed to partisanship—but one would have been tempted to think that there had been perhaps a slight grain of partisanship in the balance that he was holding as between these two gentlemen. I must apologize to the House for detaining it so long on this case. I have spoken to this length because I thought it was my duty to do what I could to clearly convey my view of what is the proper conclusion to be reached on this matter, and thus to show at least that I realize how deeply the public interest is involved in parliament coming to a right decision on this important question.

Mr. V. GEOFFRION (Verchères). The hon. gentleman (Mr. Doherty) who has just taken his seat was very impressive in his opening remarks. I would be glad if I were able to congratulate him on a change in the length of his addresses; because when he was judge in Montreal his judgments were as long, and interminable, and as wearisome to the advocates practising before him, as his speeches are in this House. Sir, the reasons given by the hon. member for Welland (Mr. German) why the majority report should be adopted, have been commented upon at great length. The Minister of Justice has treated exhaustively the legal question, and I will make a very few remarks on a point that does not appear to have been touched by hon. members. The only question for me is whether the charges made by the hon. member for Champlain have been proved. We are not concerned with the question whether any employees of the Department of Marine and Fisheries in Sorel have exceeded their duty. That might form, if necessary, the basis of another inquiry by another committee; but surely the Committee on Privileges and Elections has been instituted only for the purpose of ascertaining whether members sitting in this House are duly qualified to do so. Now I regret that some newspapers in this country have seen fit to try to prejudice opinion, both in the public and in this House, without having had the privilege, as members of the committee have had, of hearing and seeing the witnesses who were being examined. They have discussed the question mostly on hearsay. But lawyers and judges know that it makes a great difference in forming a judgment whether you have the privilege of seeing the witnesses when they are examined. They seem to make a kind of hero of the hon. member for Champlain (Mr. Blondin) who has made the charges. What were the charges made by the hon. member for Champlain against the hon. member for Richelieu? I shall read a part of them for the sake of my argument. He charged:

That I am credibly informed, and I believe that I can establish by satisfactory evidence:—

That in the course of the years 1908, 1909 and 1910, irregularities, abuses, frauds, malversations and robberies have been committed in the shops and stores of the government of Canada at St. Joseph de Sorel and in the city of Sorel, in the electoral district of Richelieu. . .

That said goods——

That is the goods sent to Mr. Lanctot's house.

Were so fraudulently appropriated to, and said work so fraudulently done at the expense of the government of Canada for the benefit of the said Adelard Lanctot, then and now a member of the House as aforesaid, with his knowledge, assent and approval, the said Adelard Lanctot abusively and fraudulently profiting at the public expense and to the public detriment by his position as member of the House.

I submit that these charges have not been proved. I shall briefly review the evidence in the case. Mr. Lanctot, in 1910, at the date mentioned in the report, was building a house in Sorel. A good many people in this House know and many at Sorel knew that Mr. Lanctot's wife was very ill at Saranac lake. This was known by everybody on this side of the House especially, because we had more friendly relations with Mr. Lanctot than hon. members opposite. Being obliged to absent himself often, and having need of painters to finish his house which was ready to be painted, Mr. Lanctot went to the government workshops to get painters. Hon. members may laugh as they please at the idea that Mr. Lanctot could not get painters at Sorel. Every member of the committee who wants to be fair knows that it has been proved that there were only three painters in the city of Sorel who were not in the employ of the government at the time, and that two of them were unfit to fill the job and the other could not do it. Mr. Lanctot went to the workshops and tried to see Mr. Papineau and Mr. Papineau being absent, he went to Champagne whom he knew well, and asked him if he could let him have some painters to finish his work. I need not go minutely into the evidence in the case. He was answered that he could have them, and he said that if Champagne would keep the time of the men he would reimburse the government or that he would pay the men and was ready to pay them himself every week if necessary. Is it extraordinary that a man should go to an extensive workshop like that in Sorel to get workmen when he could not get them anywhere else? It is done in the great cities, in every place where there are large workshops. It is known also that these large shops employ a great number of workmen in certain seasons of the year, that they do not have so much need for these men at other seasons; they sometimes would prefer to see workmen going out and working somewhere else, but they do not want to send them away, and thus be deprived of their services when they need men. This is done every day. Hon. gentlemen opposite may say that the government ought not to do it. It may be so, but anyhow it is not extraordinary that Mr. Lanctot should have gone to those shops, the only place where he could get those workmen, and he got them. He paid them, the evidence is clear on that point; he got some material for which he also paid. Where is the proof of robbery charged by the hon. member for Champlain (Mr. Blondin)? I am sorry to say that the hon. member for Champlain in making such grave charges against a colleague in this House had not the courage to offer to resign his seat if he could not prove the charges which he had made. There is probably no example in this House or in the parliament of any other country of a member making so grave a charge as that an hon. member or colleague had rendered himself guilty of robbery, of fraudulently obtaining money or merchandise under false pretenses and not having the courage to say: If I am not able to prove those charges then I will resign my seat. If the hon. member for Champlain had simply said: I hear that there are irregularities committed in the workshops of the government at Sorel and I ask that they be investigated, well and good; but he charges a colleague with fraud and robbery, and he has not the courage to put his seat in jeopardy. Mr. Lanctot in this House has answered the charges. He made an honest, fair, straightforward declaration. Witness after witness has been examined by the member for Champlain and his counsel, and all the evidence which we got from them went exactly to prove that the declarations of the hon. member for Champlain were correct. Mr. Blondin declared that he had been credibly informed, but the evidence has raised some doubt in my mind as to whether he was very credibly informed. He got his information from discontented men who had been dismissed from the department, from blackmailers, from suborners of perjury. This has been proved before the committee. We had a witness there who declared that an affidavit had been obtained from him under false pretenses.

Another of the witnesses had sent a letter to the member for Richelieu trying to blackmail him if he would not get him contracts; others of the witnesses admitted that they had been dismissed from the department, and this is the company in which we find the hon. member for Champlain and by which he was credibly informed that fraudulent acts had been committed. The hon. gentleman from Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk) dealt with the question of the independence of parliament, and as usual he pretended he was sorry to have to attack an hon. member on this side of the House, although he is generally very unfair when he is dealing with party questions of the kind; the hon. member (Mr. Monk) pretends that the independence of parliament has been infringed by the acts committed by Mr. Lanctot. Well, I believe that the opinion of the Minister of Justice is the true interpretation of the Independence of Parliament Act, and the hon. member for St. Anne himself admitted that there was no infringement of that Act. I believe that to infringe the Independence of Parliament Act one must make a contract by which he derives some pecuniary benefit from the government. Suppose a member of parliament—and I understand that members on both sides of the House do it—should go to the King's Printer and have copies of his speeches printed and pay for them, is he not making a contract and violating the Act if we wanted to put a severe interpretation upon it? I do not wish to be personal, but I would like to ask my hon. friend from St. Anne (Mr. Doherty), who has left the Chamber, whether a judge who has descended from the bench and who is paid every year a sum of money by the country is not infringing the Independence of Parliament Act when he sits here and votes the money which is paid to himself? The hon. member comes here and makes tragedian speeches in which he lifts up his hands and calls to his aid a high moral tone, and he sits in this House and votes the money which is paid to him, but he covers his head with ashes at the actions that have been committed by the hon. member for Richelieu. The delicate conscience of my hon. friends opposite was not touched so much some years ago when one of their friends on their side had some work done in the Department of Marine and Fisheries at Prescott, when he had a boat painted. He made a declaration which, for my part, I accepted in good faith, and from this side of the House no one lifted his voice to blame him because we accepted that he was in good faith, and that he had paid as he declared he had paid. But his actions were exactly the same, if not worse, as those of the hon. member for Richelieu. We did not raise a row about it. But the delicate conscience of hon. members opposite is touched because a member on this side of the House, by an error of judgment perhaps, has committed similar acts to those committed by their own friends, and in whose case they sat there dumb and condoned the action they are actually blaming now. I wish in conclusion to say that I agree with the interpretation of the evidence given by the hon. member for Welland (Mr. German) and with the interpretation of the Independence of Parliament Act given by the Minister of Justice. I believe that the majority of the committee having heard the evidence and weighed it, could not come to any other conclusion than that the hon. member for Richelieu had acted in good faith. The work which he had done by employees of the department was paid for, the material which he got was paid for, everything was paid for, and if any blame—I am not going to say that there should be any blame attached—but if there is any blame to attach to any one it must be to the employees of the department who perhaps exceeded their powers. I will vote for the adoption of the majority report.

Mr. REID (Grenville). I wish to ask the hon. member (Mr. Geoffrion) a question. I was not in the Chamber a moment ago, but I understand that the hon. member made the statement that I had a boat painted in Prescott a few years ago. Did the hon. gentleman make that statement?

Mr. GEOFFRION. I simply said that I was so informed. At the time I knew who the hon. member was, but I do not at the moment know whether it was the hon. member (Mr. Reid), or not.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh.

Mr. GEOFFRION. I did not name anybody.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Name.

Mr. GEOFFRION. If my hon. friend wants to know, I can get the name very soon and give it to him.

Mr. REID (Grenville). I heard that my name had been mentioned, and if so I want to say that the statement is absolutely untrue and false.

Mr. T. W. CROTHERS (West Elgin). Apart altogether from the intent of the hon. member for Richelieu, of which I shall speak later, the facts in connection with this matter are few, simple, clear, admitted, and it is not easy to understand intelligent and honest men differing as to the conclusion in law that should be drawn from these facts. The Richelieu river runs in a northerly direction and empties into the St. Lawrence about 45 miles below Montreal. On the easterly side of its mouth is the city of Sorel, containing a population of about 10,000 people, and just opposite, on the westerly side of the river, are the government shipyards and storehouses. The river runs through the constituency represented by the hon. member for Richelieu, who lives in the city of Sorel. The principal officers of the shipyard are Mr. Papineau, who is director, Mr. Terreault, Oscar Champagne, time-keeper, and John Baptiste Pagé, foreman of painters. The hon. member for Richelieu was building a palatial residence on George street, in the city of Sorel, in the years 1909 and 1910. On or about the 29th of May, 1910—and at present I am only stating facts that are admitted all—Mr. Lanctot went over to St. Joseph de Sorel, and there saw Mr. Champagne and Mr. Pagé. He asked Mr. Pagé to send some painters over to this new house that he was building on George street in Sorel. Mr. Pagé told him he would have much pleasure in doing so if he would get the authority of Mr. Papineau, the director of the shipyard. Mr. Pagé says that Mr. Lanctot promised to see Mr. Papineau and get his authority. Mr. Lanctot admits that he never did see Mr. Papineau. That you will find in his evidence on page 19:

Q. Did that conversation take place on the 29th of May or sooner in the month of May?—A. I canot say so at present.
Q. Did you ever go to Mr. Papineau's after that to obtain his authorization?—A. No, sir.
Q. You never spoke to him of the matter?—A. No, sir. Mr. Papineau lives opposite my house, at about seventy-five feet from me.

So that on the 29th of May, Mr. Lanctot saw Mr. Pagé and Mr. Pagé told him he would send the painters if he got the authority of Mr. Papineau, he agreed to get the authorization of Mr. Papineau, and he never spoke to Mr. Papineau about it until the work was all completed in the latter part of November, although Mr. Papineau lived only 75 feet from him. He went and induced an inferior officer of the government, Mr. Pagé, to send workmen to paint his house; he knew that while these men were working at his house, extending from the 3rd of June till the latter part of November, between five and six months, the time that they were giving to his house was being charged up against the government, and he knew that the government was paying these men for the work they were doing upon his house. Now, what follows from that? It follows that he, in connection with Pagé and Champagne, defrauded the government out of money that was paid to these men while they were doing the work on his house. It is no answer at all to say that he agreed to pay the money back afterwards. It follows from these facts that he was guilty of conspiracy with these men to get from the government or the people of Canada the money that was paid to the men while they were working at his house. It follows further that that money was obtained from the people of Canada through this government by false pretenses of Mr. Lanctot and Mr. Pagé. Now, is that so? The Minister of Marine and Fisheries would tell you that he consented to the payment of this $375, believing the pay-sheets that were sent to him from Sorel, representing that these men during these five months were working on government work. So that the minister was deceived and the money was obtained from the government by false pretenses. Therefore, I say that the hon. member for Richelieu was a party to defrauding the government; he was one of the conspirators for getting the money from the government; he was a party to getting that money from the government by false pretenses. And that is not all; he induced them to take from the government storehouse in St. Joseph de Sorel to his house on George street, in the city of Sorel, some $80 worth of goods belonging to the government of this country. Now, those goods were not loaned. You cannot borrow a thing unless you return that identical thing. There was no intention of returning the thing. The property in it passed forever from the owners, the people of Canada or the government, to Mr. Lanctot's house. In this connection, I want to read a sentence or two from the third edition of James Crankshaw on the Criminal Code of Canada. At page 413, in considering the section of the code which was read by my hon. friend from St. Anne (Mr. Doherty), section 347, he says:

Theft defined.—Theft or stealing is the act of fraudulently and without colour of right taking, or fraudulently and without colour of right converting to the use of any person, anything capable of being stolen, with intent,—

(a) to deprive the owner, or any person having any special property or interest therein, temporarily, or absolutely, of such thing, or of such property or interest; or,

(b) to pledge the same or deposit it as security; or,

(c) to part with it under a condition as to its return which the person parting with it may be unable to perform; or,

(d) to deal with it in such a manner that it cannot be restored in the condition at which it was at the time of its taking and conversion.

And so by putting the paint and putty on Mr. Lanctot's house, they dealt with them so that they could not return them, and there is no evidence that there was any intention of returning the identical goods that they got from the government storehouse.

2. Theft is committed when the offender moves the thing or causes it to move or to be moved, or begins to cause it to become movable, with intent to steal it.

So that as soon as these goods were taken from the government storehouse the offence was complete.

3. The taking or conversion may be fraudulent, although effected without secrecy or attempt at concealment.

4. It is immaterial whether the thing converted was taken for the purpose of conversion, or whether it was, at the time of the conversion, in the lawful possession of the person converting.

In commenting upon this section, at page 413, the learned author speaks as follows:

It is generally laid down that any act which is an interference with the dominion and right of property of another is a conversion. A conversion does not mean a destruction of the goods nor does it necessarily import an acquisition of property by the defendant or a total or absolute loss of the goods to the owner, but it consists in any wrongful act by which the defendant deprives the owner of his goods either wholly or for a time. To constitute a fraudulent conversion, the owner must be deprived of his property or money by an adverse using or holding.

Under the terms of section 347, theft by conversion is committed whenever a person, already in possession of a specific article of personal property with the owner's consent, fraudulently and without colour of right converts it to his own use or to the use of any other person than the owner of it, with intent to deprive the owner of it, either temporarily or absolutely, or with intent to deprive any person having any special property or interest therein, temporarily or absolutely, of such special property or interest, or with intent to pledge the same or to part with it under a condition, as to its return, which he may not be able to perform, or to so deal with it that it cannot be restored.

This was what the Act dealt with because in this case it was impossible to return the goods.

The effect of section 347 is to put all persons whomsoever, whether they are or are not clerks, servants, employees, bankers, merchants, brokers, solicitors, factors, agents or bailees, upon the same footing, and to make every person whomsoever, without any distinction, guilty of theft by conversion (or what may, perhaps, be more properly termed embezzlement), when, having become rightfully possessed of something belonging to another, he, instead of handing it over, in specie or instead of doing with it what he was entrusted to do, fraudulently and without colour of right, converts it to his own use or to the use of any other person than the owner. In other words, embezzlement by clerks, servants or other employees, fraudulent conversion by bankers, merchants, brokers, solicitors, factors or other agents, of property entrusted to them for safe custody, &c., and larceny by bailees, are three only of the various ways of committing the offence of theft by conversion treated of by section 347. So that it may not be out of place to briefly review some of the authorities on these three subjects.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that in taking these goods belonging to the people of Canada from an inferior officer who had no authority to give them the hon. member for Richelieu was strictly within the terms of section 347, of the Criminal Code and was therefore guilty of theft. What is the difference between the position occupied by Mr. Lanctot with reference to these goods and that of a man who goes to an inferior officer in a bank—the teller or the ledger keeper and get $1,000 from him saying to him: I will return this money in a week? The teller or ledger keeper had no authority to give him $1,000, he gives him $1,000, he invests that in margins, at the end of the week the $1,000 is not paid and the clerk is arrested and convicted of embezzlement or theft. The intention of both parties was to return the money at the end of a week or at the end of a month. Why, our prisons are full of men who have embezzled thousands and scores of thousands and hundreds of thousands of dollars intending all the time to return the money. I remember that a short time ago a man from our city stole $287,000 before being arrested, embezzled it, intending every moment to return it as soon as he made it, but he kept on losing and losing, hoping against hope until finally the whole matter was disclosed and he was sent to penitentiary for twelve years. He did not intend to cheat anybody, he intended to return the money just as this man, admit that if you like, intended to return these materials. He did not borrow these goods, but he got these goods promising to return a similar quantity and a like quality of goods just as the young man who gets $1,000 from a bank intends to return, not that identical $1,000, but a like sum of money in ten or thirty days as the case may be. He fails to do it and he is guilty of theft just as sure as we are sitting in this Chamber to-night. There can be no longer any doubt about the fact that the hon. member for Richelieu, in reference to the mens' time, is in law, guilty of fraud, of conspiracy, of getting money from the people of this country by false pretenses and, in reference to these goods, guilty of theft. I am speaking about the legal aspect of it now, Mr. Speaker. There is no manner of doubt whatever that he is guilty of theft.

One of the discouraging features of this whole question is that we have a majority of the Privileges and Elections Committee coming into this house with a report—doing what?—saying that the hon. member for Richelieu inadvertently broke the law, did not intend to break the law, was not really guilty of an intent to do anything wrong, disapproving of the conduct of Pagé, Champagne and Lanctot and saying in effect that it was not the intention to defraud anybody? Is that the report we have? If we had a report of that kind, while I could not approve of it, there would be some mitigating, extenuating circumstances in connection with it. I am not going to take up your time by reading this report. You have all read it and you are all familiar with it. The report of the majority which we are asked to approve has not a word of condemnation in connection with this whole transaction except in so far as the majority condemn the hon. member who exposed the whole transaction. They ask us to approve of this whole transaction, and they ask us to condemn the member of this House who took the means of exposing it. They express approval of the man who in law was and is guilty of theft and they express condemnation of the member of this house who took the means of exposing that theft. What were the facts that were in the hands of the hon. member for Champlain when he read these charges on the 6th day of March last? First, what were the charges? I am quoting from 'Hansard,' unrevised edition, of March 6:

I, Pierre Edouard Blondin, a member of parliament for the electoral district of Champlain, in the province of Quebec, Dominion of Canada, declare that I am credibly informed, and I believe that I can establish by satisfactory evidence:

10. That in the course of the years 1908, 1909 and 1910, irregularities, abuses, frauds, malversations and robberies have been committed in the shops and stores of the government of Canada at St. Joseph of Sorel and in the city of Sorel, in the electoral district of Richelieu.

I am quite ready to admit that in so far as the word 'robberies' is concerned, I do not think there is any evidence before this committee that there was any robbery, but I am told that this word 'robberies,' which is too strong a word, crept in in the process of translation from French to English. We all know there can be no robbery unless there be a stealing by violence, and there is no pretension here that there was any violence—it was all done willingly by the officers of the government. But, with the exception of 'robberies,' I contend that all these charges made by the hon. member for Champlain have been fully established.

2. That barrels and tins of paint and other goods of this nature have been illegally and frudulently taken and carried away from the said stores and shops and transported to the house of Mr. Adelard Lanctot then and now a member of the House of Commons of Canada, for the electoral district of Richelieu, which house was then being built on George street, at Sorel above mentioned, and ready to be painted;

3. That with these goods and paint, paintworks, decoration and varnish works, have been done by the employees of the government of Canada under the supervision of the painters' foreman employed by said government at the said place, at the government's expense and during the hours supposed to be devoted to the government and for which said employees were paid by the government, these men registering each day as if they had really worked for the government, and this during weeks and months; the materials and time, thus furnished, are valued at about one thousand or twelve hundred dollars;

4. That said goods were so fraudulently appropriated to, and said works so fraudulently done at the expense of the government of Canada for the benefit of the said Adélard Lanctot then and now a member of the House as aforesaid with his knowledge, assent and approval, the said Adélard Lanctot abusively and fraudulently profiting at the public expense and to the public detriment by his position of member of the House;

I found the belief I have just expressed upon affidavits which I desire to read and produce in support of the motion I am about to make:

Then there are a number of affidavits which were in the possession of the hon. member for Champlain. I shall read only one or two of them and call your attention to the others:

I, the undersigned, Alfred Douaire, painter, of the city of Sorel, 51 years of age, solemnly declare:

That I have been in the employment of the federal government at its shipyards situated at Saint-Joseph de Sorel, from January, 1906, inclusively to the 5th of November, 1910, as painter under orders of J. Bte. Pagé, foreman of the painters' department at the said shipyards, during the last two years;—that during these two years, and principally during the last year, and especially in July, August and September, 1910, I have been requested by the said J. Bte. Pagé to go to Sorel, at the house of Mr. Adélard Lanctot, M.P., then being built on George street, in order to paint, cement, polish and varnish, &c., &c., the said house and that, as it was well understood, after having registered at the shipyard as present and working on behalf of the government, and my departure each morning was to be from the said shipyard.

That, as a matter of fact, I regularly registered and punched as previously mentioned, and that in conformity with my orders I left the shipyard each working day and went, as above stated, during the months of July, August and September, 1910, to the said Lanctot house, where I have worked at the painting, varnishing and staining of the said Lanctot house.

That this work was also done in part by Messrs. Théodore Emond, Edmond Brault, Adélard Letendre, Albérique Letendre, Omer Pagé, Arthur Trempe, Louis Paul, Adélard Alie, all painters, employed at the time by the said government, and on the working hours due to the government and each of them having punched at the same time as myself as aforesaid.

That during the time that work was going on, the said J. Bte. Pagé and Adélard Lanctot, M.P., were visiting the job from time to time, looking at the progress of the work, Pagé giving orders for having some paint brought from the shipyard and also for the execution of the work, and that, many times to the knowledge and cognizance, and in the presence of the said Adélard Lanctot,—this gentleman knowing also where the paint came from and that the work was being done by employees of the government whom he was seeing often and often at work.

That the said Adélard Lanctot never spoke of paying these painters, and in fact was not paying them, but they were regularly paid their salaries by the government at each pay day, as if they had worked for the department.

That the above mentioned persons who have worked with me at this painting have given to that work, some four weeks, and others from four to ten weeks.

I positively declare:—that Mr. Adelard Lanctot knew at the time that the paint and other goods which were used in the painting of his house were coming from the said shipyard of the government; 2. that this work was done by the then regular employees of the government who were paid, for the time they were doing that work, by the government itself, and that for that purpose the time of each employee was punched as employee of the government.

On the seventh day of December, 1910, at 10 p.m., Mr. Alfred Lavallee, lumber merchant, of Sorel, came to my house at Sorel, asking me to go immediately to the house of Mr. Adelard Lanctot, at Sorel, who desired to see me without fault; I went immediately and found Mr. Lanctot who was waiting for me and who, after the ordinary salutations, showed me and read me the solemn declaration which I had given during the said month of December to the same purpose as the present one, and spoke to me the following words:—'Is it you, Mr. Douaire, who gave this affidavit? I answered: 'Yes.' He added: 'You have signed it?' I answered 'Yes.' He asked me if I would see Albert Thibaudeau and try to lay my hands upon certain papers relating to this affair, which he did not like to see circulating. I answered that it was not easy to get hold of these documents, principally the affidavit dated at Sorel, the 30th of Nvember, 1910. Mr. Lanctot added: 'I will look to that myself, and I will try to get hold of them. Mr. Lanctot wanted me to change my course of action, he offered me a position under the government, which I refused. He told me that if some one was troubled about that affair, principally Mr. J. Bte. Pagé, I would be treated the same way he would be. I answered that I was not afraid. Before leaving, I told him that the affidavit which he had in his hands, and which he got, I did not know from whom, was true and signed by me in perfect knowledge and without any outside influence, as I gave the present one.

And I make this solemn statement, believing it conscientiously to be true, and knowing that it has the same force and effect as if it was made under oath, under the witness law of the Dominion of Canada, and I have signed.

ALFRED DOUAIRE.

Declared before me, the undersigned, at Sorel, the first of March, 1911.

VICTOR A. BOURGEOIS, Notary.

The original one, I believe, was dated the 30th of November. There are others; one by Mr. Proulx, which I will not take up the time by reading, though it is in English. He said he was sent for to go to Mr. Lanctot's house; that he went; that his two uncles were present there with him; that Mr. Lanctot then and there asked him to sign another affidavit saying that the previous one he had signed was untrue, and telling him that if he did so he would use his influence to get him reinstated in a government job. That is set forth in the statement of Mr. Proulx and also in his evidence given before the Committee of Privileges and Elections, and it is corroborated by his uncle. Another statement was by Mr. Peloquin, which I shall not read. There is also one by Mr. A. Senecal, and one by Napoleon Laroche, and one by H. Lambert. There were others in the hands of the hon. member for Champlain, set forth in unrevised 'Hansard,' of March 6th, but as they are in French, owing to my defective early education I shall not attempt to read them. But the hon. member for Champlain had these six or eight affidavits setting forth the facts as I have stated them. With these affidavits in his possession, what was his duty. This committee, or rather a majority of the committee, state that he should have gone to the Minister of Marine and Fisheries and asked him about the whole matter. But what does the Minister of Marine and Fisheries say to us now? He appears before the Committee on Privileges and Elections and has not a word to say in condemnation of this whole transaction.

He was present in that committee, and he quoted from this report of the majority which we have before us, exonerating completely Mr. Lanctot, justifying this whole transaction, and condemning the hon. member for Champlain for having called public attention to it. And he is the man to whom it is said the hon. member for Champlain should have gone and accept his ipse dixit as to this whole transaction. Well, I was surprised at the Minister of Marine and Fisheries voting for that majority report, for the department he administers has been in the public eye for several years, and the people to a large extent have lost confidence in the way in which that department is managed. It was found by a commissioner appointed by this government, Judge Cassels, that scores and scores of men in the employment of that department had been guilty of defrauding the government. Some of those who were proved guilty were superannuated on large superannuation allowances, one or two, or perhaps a few more, were dismissed. But there were no prosecutions issued against either the bribers or the bribees, although there were scores and scores of cases reported by Judge Cassels of crimes committed against the government and people of Canada, and the Minister of Marine and Fisheries did not see fit to prosecute any one of them. If the law had been enforced in that case we would not have had such an exhibition as we have seen here, in what will come to be known in this country as the Lanctot job. Yet the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, it is said, is going to England to represent Canada. It is said that later he may have a seat on the Supreme Court of this country. And that is the man who has been at the head of this Marine Department, and whose record is well known in this House and in this country for the last three or four years in reference to these transactions; and that is the man to whom the majority of this committee suggests that the hon. member for Champlain should have gone when he received these sworn statements showing that this government had been defrauded, and showing conspiracy, showing that money had been obtained by false pretenses, showing theft. And forsooth the majority of the members of this committee, intelligent members of this House, come forward with a report and say to the people of Canada: All this is perfectly regular and honest, we subscribe to the whole thing; and we denounce the man who exposed it.

Well, I was to a certain extent surprised that the Minister of Marine and Fisheries should vote approval of this whole matter, saying in substance: It is all right, saying to the people of Canada that the department over which he presides permits this sort of thing to be done. Not a word of condemnation of it, but instead of condemnation for these offences and these crimes, there are words of condemnation of the hon. member for Champlain who, in the discharge of his duty, brought these frauds and these thefts to the attention of this House and the people of Canada. Why, Sir, a majority of this committee suggested that the member for Champlain should have gone to the Minister of Marine and Fisheries and got from him—what? A statement of the accused. Affidavits similar in substance were sent to the Minister of Marine and Fisheries in November, and what did he do with them? Why, he actually sent the original affidavits to Mr. Lanctot and asked him what he had to say about them. Did you ever hear of such a thing as that in your life? A man is charged with conspiracy, with defrauding the government, with getting money under false pretenses, with theft, and the papers charging him with all these crimes and offences are sent to him and he is asked what he has to say about them. He makes his reply, and that is what the minister says he was perfectly willing to give to the member for Champlain. The minister was examined before this committee, and he, in answer to leading questions put by council for Mr. Lanctot—because that is the position that was taken there—said over and over again: I was perfectly willing to give Mr. Blondin all the information that I had if he had come and asked me. Now to have taken the course that is suggested, that my hon. friend from Champlain should have gone to the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, would have been to take a course like that which the Minister of Finance took when he sent for the manager of the Farmers' Bank and accepted his statement as to the frauds that were charged against him, with all the disastrous results that have followed. What do we do where a man is charged with fraud, with conspiracy? Do we send for him and ask what he has to say about it? And if he declares through his counsel that he is innocent, do we say to him: Depart in peace, may the Lord be with you?

If I was surprised a little to find that the Minister of Marine and Fisheries was endorsing this majority report, I was surprised to a greater extent in listening to the Minister of Justice this afternoon. The Minister of Justice told us he was a strong partisan. It was not the first time he has told us that in this House. Whenever he is called upon to defend an indefensible transaction, he prefaces his remarks by telling us that he is a strong party man. Well, Mr. Speaker, I am not aware that any other Minister of Justice having a seat in the government of Canada ever found it his duty to rise in this House from time to time and tell the people's representatives, and through them the people of Canada, that he was a strong party man. Why, Sir, it was not necessary for him to say that. I want to say to him now—I am sorry he is not present, but he will read what I have to say—I for one will excuse him from ever repeating that again in this House. It never was necessary. We in the province of Ontario, who have known him for the last thirty years, know well that he has always been a strong party man, one of the most bitter partisans we have in the whole province of Ontario. He is the man who represents the goddess of Canadian justice, who gets up in this House and endorses every word that the majority report contains. He has stated that he has read the evidence over two or three times, and there is absolutely no proof of wrong-doing.

Well, Mr. Speaker, what are we to think of that? That the Minister of Justice in this government, the representative of justice in Canada, declares to the people of this whole country that to get workmen from the government, as these men were got, to use them while the government is paying for them, to make false paylists, by misrepresentation to get money from this country, taking the goods and the property of this country, and therefore being guilty of theft under the law—that he, the Minister of Justice, sees absolutely no wrong in all that. And that does not come from a back bencher, that comes from the representative of justice in Canada and it may be read from the Atlantic to the Pacific as the opinion of the Minister of Justice in this country that any man may treat the government of Canada as Mr. Lanctot has done, and if he be a good Liberal he will have not only the Minister of Marine and Fisheries backing him up in all these transactions, but he will have the representative of the sacred Goddess of Justice rising in this House and justifying him.

If I had time I would go over the evidence upon which I found these statements in order that the people might be able to read that evidence, but I shall not do so. I wish to call attention to the intent of Mr. Lanctot. Mr. Lanctot promised Mr. Pagé and Mr. Badeau that he would see Mr. Papineau and get his authority for the use of these men and for the taking of these goods, but he never did so; he never saw Mr. Papineau although he lived only 75 feet away, just across the road from him. For six months this was going on. He promised to see Mr. Papineau. He was in Sorel over and over again but he did not. Why did he not? Was it because he knew that Papineau would not approve of this if he did see it? Evidence of that will be found on pages 19, 130, 172 and 173. He never spoke to Papineau about paying for this paint, Papineau spoke to him first about paying for it, and you will find if I remember right, evidence of this on pages 23 and 24. Another piece of evidence as to intent is his trying to get these two or three men who made these affidavits, Douaire and Proulx, to sign other affidavits denying what they had asserted in their first affidavits, and promising that if they would make other affidavits denying what they had said, he would use his influence to get them jobs under the government. What does that indicate? How does that affect the question of intent? How does that affect the question of guilty knowledge? In this letter inclosing a cheque for $375 for the men's time, pages 23 and 24, he said nothing about the paint, and that letter was sent on November 22. The account for the paint is dated November 16, as you will find on page 109. This account for the paint taken out of the government stores and going to Lanctot's house, amounting to $81.60, is dated November 16. Champagne sent to Mr. Lanctot his account for the wages of the men, $375 on November 22. Nothing was said in that letter of the 22nd November about the paint although the account for it is dated November 16, 12 days before the letter was sent with reference to the pay for the men. In his letter to the minister, of December 6, he stated that he had settled for the paint, and that statement was not true. Look at page 177 and you will find Mr. Lanctot's letter to the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, dated December 6, 1910. The minister had sent him these affidavits that were made in November, and what does he say?:

> This is true; but as soon as their work was finished I reimbursed the department as per understanding with the officers. I did the same with regard to borrowed material. The whole was paid several days before the filing of those documents.

Follow the dates: This is dated December 6. If you turn to page 111 you will find, beyond any peradventure, that that money was not paid even by Papineau until December 13, so Mr. Lanctot in his letter to the minister of December 6, declared he had paid not only for the men's wages but for the goods that had been delivered to him, and on page 111 you will find the account for $81.60 paid on December 13 by Mr. Papineau, a week after Mr. Lanctot had said he had paid it, and Papineau's evidence shows that Mr. Lanctot did not pay him until some time after he had paid the company in Montreal. So there you have a statement of facts that is utterly untrue. Remember that he did not mention anything to Papineau, it was Papineau who went to him. This account was sent to Papineau who says he had occasion to see Mr. Lanctot and he told Mr. Lanctot after Mr. Lanctot had sent the account for the men's wages, $375, that the accounts were paid. Mr. Lanctot did not say anything to him about the paint. Did Mr. Lanctot intend to pay for the paints at all, Mr. Speaker? His statement is untrue. Then he stated further that there were no other painters at Sorel. Well, there are three or four witnesses to show that is not true. A good deal has been said about the cheque sent for $375. He did not pay Papineau with a cheque. I wonder why? I would like to see that cheque if it every was given; it was not produced.

Mr. LENNOX. He says it was paid in cash.

Mr. CROTHERS. And when he wrote to the minister on December 6, that he had paid the wages of the men and had paid for the goods, that was absolutely untrue, and he knew it was untrue when he wrote the letter. Papineau himself had not paid it at that time, or until December 13, and a copy of the receipt is given on page 111, dated Quebec, December 12.

I am very sorry I have not time to refer to some other matters, but the evidence I have adduced as to the intent of Mr. Lanctot will suffice. Why did he make statements that were not true if that intent was honest all the way through? Why resort to these petty and paltry excuses of there not being painters in Sorel? We have evidence that there are two or three competent painters in that city of 10,000 inhabitants. But suppose there was not a painter in the whole city of Sorel does that justify his being a party to conspiracy and theft. If his wife was ill we all deeply sympathize with him, but what under heaven has that to do with it. That is no excuse whatever for being a party to these offences I have mentioned. Why are these little insignificant side issues brought in; why these false statements made by this man who is now accused? He said nothing to the minister when he sent the letter with the cheque for $375; he knew that the paint had been taken to his house before that; he told the minister that he had paid it on the 6th December, whereas it was not paid until the 13th of December; he promised to see Papineau, and why did not he see him? These are all ear marks of the fraud and guilt that I have brought to the attention of the House; these are indications that would justify any jury in any part of Canada in finding that on the part of the member for Richelieu this was not an innocent transaction. I must now conclude my remarks.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Go on.

Mr. CROTHERS. No, I have a train to catch, and I cannot stay longer. Let me read what the Ottawa 'Free Press' said about this matter on April 20, and mind you, this is the Liberal organ of the capital city of the Dominion. Referring to Mr. Lanctot, it says:

But what he should have done the moment the charge was preferred against him was to have resigned his seat and appealed to his constituents for re-election. He could then have been re-elected by acclamation; whether he could do so now is another question.

Where a member of a party in the control of the public business places himself, wittingly or unwittingly, under the penalties of the parliament Act there is only one course open for him to take, and that is what Mr. Lanctot should have done.

For him to now ask a majority of the House of Commons to excuse his fault is to ask many of them to cancel their own records, and we do not believe that they will do so.

Even the 'Free Press' would not believe it, but I fear we will be forced to believe it by this vote to-night. We will be forced to believe that not only a majority of the Privileges and Elections Committee, but that a majority of the men supporting the government, including the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, including the man who occupies the high and sacred position of Minister of Justice of Canada. I fear we will see every one of them expressing their approval of this very thing that their own organ disapproves of. The Montreal 'Herald,' another Liberal organ says:

What is irritating about the case is that Liberals in and out of parliament are assumed to be ready to defend Mr. Lanctot, to maintain his right to get his house painted by the government's workmen and with the government's paint, because it is supposed that in defending Mr. Lanctot they are defending the Laurier Cabinet. The 'Herald,' for one, does not propose to rest its confidence in the Laurier administration on any such basis. The fact is, indeed, that the house painting was done by connivance between the member for Richelieu and subordinate officials at Sorel.

That comes from the Montreal 'Herald,' the great Liberal organ of the city of Montreal:

And that the Minister of Marine was actually demanding the facts about it when the investigation was brought on by Mr. Blondin. And Liberals are expected to testify their confidence in Mr. Brodeur's administration by affirming their satisfaction with what was done, to the injury of the reputation of Mr. Brodeur's department, without his acknowledge and without his approval. It will not down.

That is what the great English speaking Liberal organ in the great metropolis of Canada says; that this will not down, but so far as that is concerned and so far as they can, it will be downed to-night by the pliable mechanical majority if big enough on the other side of the House.

Evidently Mr. Lanctot, for all the ability he undoubtedly possesses, has failed to realize that a public man is under a responsibility towards those who give him their confidence and towards the leaders and the rank and file of his party.

Not only Mr. Lanctot has failed to realize it, but the majority of the members of the Privileges and Elections Committee have failed to realize it, the Minister of Marine has failed to realize it, the Minister of Justice has failed to realize it, and the Liberal members of parliament and the Prime Minister not only fail to realize it, but actually appear to applaud and support it.

He seems to be content to prove that he paid for the painters' time and replaced the materials used on his place. He does not seem to recognize that it was unworthy of him as a member of parliament to arrange with subordinate officials, without the knowledge of their superiors on the spot, even, to have men working for him whose services were all the time being charged to the Crown and presumably apportioned against some work that had been ordered by parliament. If Mr. Lanctot cannot see the unworthiness of that, he ought to be in some other role than that of a Liberal party leader. Certainly no government, Liberal or other, can be maintained in this country on the principle that its supporters in parliament are justified in such enterprises.

There is the opinion of the Liberal organ of the city of Montreal. Now, Mr. Speaker, I have not heard anything so far from my right hon. friend the Prime Minister. Is it to be said of him—and it will be said of him and justly said of him what the 'Herald' has said of Mr. Lanctot, and if he votes for the adoption of the majority report he will make himself just as guilty as Mr. Lanctot. I had hoped; yea I have told several of my friends, that while I was not a supporter of the right hon. gentleman, and while I have not as much confidence in him as a great many other members of this House have, yet in the last two or three days I have told in private several of my friends that Sir Wilfrid Laurier would never stand for the frauds and the crimes that were set forth in this evidence, and I really believe he would not stand for it, and I had hoped until the last moment that there would be at least one man big enough on the other side of the House to get up and condemn this transaction. I hope I will hear after I get home to-morrow, that the right hon. gentleman rose equal to the occasion and showed to the people of Canada that he was big enough to protect the best interests of the people of this country which are their moral interests, and to protect justice in this country. And although his Minister of Justice by the address he delivered here to-night degraded the Canadian goddess of justice as she has never before been degraded in this parliament of Canada, I hope I will hear to-morrow that the Prime Minister of this country has risen equal to the occasion and denounced the conduct which I submit, every intelligent and honest and patriotic Canadian must in his heart condemn.

Mr. G. W. KYTE (Richmond, N.S.). Mr. Speaker, I was a member of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, and I attended regularly every sitting of that committee while the subject now under discussion was before us for investigation. I am one of the members of the committee who signed the majority report, and I desire to state a few reasons which led me to the conclusion I came to with respect to that report. The position taken by hon. gentlemen who are opposing the adoption of this report is somewhat different from that which was taken by them in the committee. So far as I have been able to appreciate the objections made by hon. gentlemen who support the minority report, I am led to the conclusion that they no longer contend seriously that the Independence of Parliament Act has been violated.

There can be no longer any question of doubt as to that, having regard to the argument addressed to this House by the hon. Minister of Justice this afternoon. Having conceded that, what is the conclusion that we must come to with respect to hon. gentlemen opposite? If the hon. member for Richelieu has not committed an infraction of the Independence of Parliament Act, then it must be that hon. gentlemen opposite are seeking to invoke some higher law, with respect to the conduct of the members of this House which perhaps they are not ready to apply to themselves or to their associates. Another question which was brought into the discussion, and now practically dropped from further consideration is whether the hon. member for Richelieu has fully paid for the services rendered to him by the department at Sorel, and adequately compensated the department for the goods which he borrowed. That point has not been emphasized this evening, but hon. gentlemen who have spoken have said that whether or not the hon. member for Richelieu paid for the labour he received or the material supplied to him, he is guilty of having committed an offence in respect of the manner in which they were procured. With that much conceded, the task which falls to hon. gentlemen supporting this report is very much lightened. We come then to the discussion of the general principles which the hon. member for St. Anne (Mr. Doherty) sought to apply to this case. I must confess that I had not very much experience as a member of the Committee on Privileges and Elections when the sittings commenced to hear the case against the hon. member for Richelieu. I endeavoured to inform myself as well as I could as to what was the action of this House and the action of hon. gentlemen opposite and the action of hon. gentlemen supporting the government, in similar cases. In the course of the address delivered by the hon. member for Verchères (Mr. Geoffrion) to-night, he made reference to charges that had been established in the Public Accounts Committee in a preceding session which the hon. member for Grenville (Mr. Reid) understood as applying to himself. I want to read the following from page 9774, volume 5, of 'Hansard' of the session of 1907-8:

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE—MR. J. D. REID.

Mr. J. D. Reid (Grenville). I rise to a question of privilege. On my arrival here this morning I noticed in last night's issue of the Ottawa 'Free Press' the following headings on an article.

'A Conservative member of parliament got yacht repaired at country's expense.

Dr. Reid of Grenville has received favours from the Marine Department at Prescott—Merwin paid on the repairs to his tug "Victor" but Conservative member has not made good.'

I want to say that this is absolutely untrue. So far as I am concerned, the government works at Prescott never did any work on my yacht, so far as I know, that I have not paid for. . . . This matter will come up in the committee on Wednesday next, when I shall be present, and I hope the Minister of Marine will be there too, so that the question can be gone into thoroughly. In the meantime I state that I deny the whole matter absolutely.

Having been made aware that a matter similar in character had come up in parliament in the session of 1907-8, I thought it well to inquire what were the circumstances surrounding the particular incident to which the hon. member for Grenville had reference, and I have procured a copy of the evidence. I desire hon. gentlemen, particularly the hon. member for Grenville, not to understand me as going into this question for the purpose of arguing that he had committed any offence against the independence of parliament. I simply do so for the purpose of pointing out that in the conclusion which I have come to with reference to the charges made against the hon. member for Richelieu, I have been guided by the evidence elicited in the case in which the hon. member for Grenville was concerned. This is the evidence taken before the Public Accounts Committee on June 10, 1908. The witness on the stand is Mr. J. Offspring, an official of the Department of Marine and Fisheries, in the town of Prescott:

Q. Tell me the names of some of the boats or vessels you worked on in 1905?—A. There was the 'Reserve,' the 'Maisonneuve,' 'Lotbinière'.

Q. And the 'Dack'?—A. Yes.

Q. What did you do to her?—A. Hauled her out in the fall, kept her over all the winter on the ways, and in the spring did some work on her.

Q. By whose instructions did you haul her out?—A. A. J. F. Fraser's.

Q. What work did you do to her?—A. Put a caulker, a carpenter and a labourer on her.

Mr. KYTE.

Q. How many days did the caulker work?—A. Two days, I think.

Q. Who paid this man?—A. Well, I tried to find Dr. Reid and could not, and I went to the office and told Mr. Noble that the man wanted to go home in the morning, and Noble paid him.

Q. Was it paid from the government or private funds?—A. I understand that Mr. Noble paid it out of his own pocket.

Q. What Dr. Reid are you referring to?—A. John D. Reid.

Q. What is his business?—A. He has a starch factory at this time.

Q. Was he the owner of the boat?—A. I understand that he was.

Q. Who also worked on this boat—other employees?—A. Well, Malone put in the planking.

Q. What is the business?—A. Ship carpenter.

Q. How many days did he work?—A. Two and a half days I think, he put in six planks.

Q. And who else?—A. Mr. McGarr did the scraping and some painting.

Q. Have you any knowledge of how many days he worked?—A. I could not say exactly.

Q. Well, we will get that another way. However, he worked some days on this boat?—A. Yes.

Q. Was he in the employ of the department?—A. Yes, he was a government man.

Q. Anybody else?—A. John Eamer—he was one of the labourers.

By Mr. Northrup:

Q. How many labourers?—A. McGarr and Eamer.

By Mr. Carvell:

Q. Do you remember Lalonde?—A. That is a carpenter.

Q. Yes, did he work?—A. Yes, two and a half days.

Q. What were his wages?—A. $2.25 per day.

By Mr. Northrup:

Q. Was there a man named Malone and one named Lalonde?—A. It is one man I think. He goes by both names; I cannot tell you which he had then.

By Mr. Carvell:

Q. Lalonde is a carpenter?—A. Yes.

Q. Salary $2.25 a day and he worked how long?—A. Two and a half days.

Q. Did you have to do any work in order to get things ready to get this boat out of the water?—A. Yes, we had to get ways in.

Q. For the purpose of getting this boat out?—A. Well, for all of them.

Q. How many did you haul out?—A. Four altogether.

Q. How much time was occupied in getting the ways in?—A. I . . . well it cost about $200. We had everything ready to haul out for $200.

By Mr. Northrup.

Q. That is for the ways?—A. Yes.

By Mr. Carvell.

Q. And after the ways once got ready you pulled out for boats?—A. Yes.

Q. The yacht 'Dack' was one of them?—A. Yes, of course.

Q. Did the other boats that you have named belong to the department or to private parties?—A. They belonged to the department.

Q. All the boats you worked on, with the exception of the 'Dack,' belonging to the department?—A. Yes.

Q. Well, now, who kept the men's time for this work along with other work?—A. Well, we had a time keeper.

Q. Did you keep books yourself?—A. I made out the time and put it in the office.

Q. Have you these original books that were kept?—A. No, I haven't got them. When we have done with the books we return them to the office.

Q. Who was the official who kept the books in the office?—A. Mr. Mundle.

Q. Do you know that they make up a regular time sheet every month?—A. As far as I know, they do.

Q. I have here the time sheets for the month of May produced by Mr. Boyle, who is the officer in charge. We could have Mr. Mundle here to swear to them if necessary. I notice in this time sheet, over the marks representing the work on days by Mr. McGarr, that the letter 'R' is marked?—A. Every man who worked on the boat for Reid you will find his name marked with an "R".

Q. That means that on that day he worked on Reid's boat?—A. Every man who worked on Reid's boat I marked their name, so that there would be no mistake about it.

By Mr. Northrup:

Q. Is that your sheet?

Mr. Carvell.—No, it is a copy.

By Mr. Northrup.

Q. Are you prepared to swear that that is your sheet?—A. No.

Mr. Carvell.—We can call Boyle as to that.

By Mr. Northrup:

Q. When you handed in your time sheets were you particular to mark the number of days that each man worked on Reid's boat?—A. Very particular, and took all pains to do so.

Q. Now, on this document produced as the official time sheet we find the letter 'R' over marks representing day's work by McGarr, and these 'R's' are over the days of the 9th, 10th, 11th, 12th, 13th, 15th, 16th, 17th, 18th, 19th, 23rd, 24th, 25th, 26th, and 27th of May, 1905. Do you know, as a matter of fact, that in the month of May, 1905, McGarr worked on Reid's boat?—A. Yes, I know he worked on the boat.

Q. But you do not know, as a matter of fact, the exact days I have mentioned?—A. I could not say that.

Q. But in the month of May he worked on Reid's boat?—A. Yes.

Q. I find 'R' over these days in the month of May, and you say that for some days he worked on Reid's boat, and you so reported it?—A. Yes, I reported every day he worked on that boat.

Q. Now, Lalonde—did you also report to the head office the days Lalonde worked on Mr. Reid's boat?—A. Well, I cannot mind exactly whether I did or not.

Q. Well, now, I find in this sheet on the 9th of May, 1909, the letter 'R' marked over one-half day and 'R' marked over the 10th and 11th against Lalonde; that is 'R' over two and a-half days' work of Lalonde in 1905. Did he work on Reid's boat two and a-half days?—A. Yes, he put in six planks on that boat in the two and a-half days he worked.

Q. This man Lalonde, the man you said was paid by Noble?—A. No; his name, I think, was David Mountry. I do not know whether that is the right name or not, it is always the name he went by.

By Mr. Carvell:

Q. Do you know who prepared this account I am showing to you, that is do you know of your own knowledge?—A. I think that is Mundle's writing.

Q. Give me this man's name as nearly as you can?—A. David Mountry, I think. I cannot find it on the government pay-list for the month of May. It may be spelled differently, but I cannot find it on the official time sheet.

Q. There is a D. Montrel, a calker?—A. That is the man.

Q. You look at that list for the month of May, and see if the letter 'R' is over any of his day's work?—A. I do not find it.

Q. Did you find it over any of his day's work?—A. I do not.

Q. Did he work after the 7th day of May, in the year 1905?—A. I cannot tell you exactly what day it was.

Q. According to this time sheet did he?—A. No, sir.

Q. Did Dr. Reid have any other boat repaired at the government expense?—A. Yes, he had one hauled out since.

Q. Yes, the name, please?—A. The 'Helen.'

Q. What was done to her?—A. Just hauled out.

Q. Reid furnished his own men for the work on her?—A. Yes, and the timber.

Q. All the department did was to loan the ways for him to do his own work on?—A. Yes.

Q. And, so far as you know, there was no charge to Reid for that?—A. Not so far as I know.

By Mr. Northrup.

Q. Were you there?—A. Yes.

Q. Tell me how you came to haul Reid's boat up?—A. Dr. Reid spoke about hauling the boat up.

Q. Spoke to who?—A. To the office.

Q. You ought to speak of your own knowledge. What was it first that you knew?—A. He came to me and said he had leave to haul out his boat.

Q. And what was said by you?—A. I said, you get around and as soon as I am ready I will haul her up.

Q. And what then?—A. He sent around the boat to our slip.

Q. His factory is near you?—A. Yes.

Q. So that it was only a few feet to haul around?—A. Yes.

Q. He had his men bring it around?—A. I believe they did and tied it to the slip.

Q. Do you know why his men did not haul her up?—A. I think they did not have enough men.

Q. Why did they not pull her up?—A. Well, I think they did not know enough to pull her up.

Q. Then she was left there at the ways?—. The ways were not ready at the time. She was left there until the ways were ready.

Q. How long did it take to pull her up?—A. I don't think it was more than an hour. We hauled her from the water 110 feet.

Q. Do you think you did that in an hour? You haul these boats along two rails, do you?—A. No, I used holders outside the rails.

Q. Then your power comes from what?—A. A capstan.

Q. How many men?—A. I did not have any men to work the capstan, I had a horse.

Q. Do you remember what repairs were made on the 'Dack'?—A. Scraping and painting and puttying, and putting in six new planks and caulking.

Q. How long would the six planks be?—A. They were 16 feet planks, one and a quarter inch stuff.

Q. Six pieces of one and a quarter-inch stuff were put in?—A. Yes.

Q. As a practical man, how long would you say it would take to put in those six planks?—A. It took a carpenter two days and a half.

Q. Did he do all that himself?—A. All himself, except that when he wanted a plank to be lifted he called the labourers.

Q. The labourers being for work on the ground?—A. Yes.

Q. When he wanted a plank lifted he would call one of the labourers to help?—A. Yes.

Q. Besides putting in the plates, you painted and puttied and caulked?—A. That is right.

Q. And the caulking was done by this man Montrel?—A. Yes.

Q. And there was no charge made to the department for that?—A. Not that I know of.

Q. How long did it take a man to scrape that boat?—A. It would take one man three or four days to scrape her.

Q. Do you remember, as a matter of fact, that any one man did work three or four days?—A. McGarr worked on it.

Q. Did he do all the scraping?—A. Yes, as far as I remember.

Q. Now, about the painting?—A. McGarr did the painting, too.

Q. What else was there? We had the calking accounted for, the putting in of the plates, the scraping and the puttying. What else was done on the boat?—A. That is about all I know of.

Q. Then we are quite clear that one man did the painting and another man the carpentry and put in the plates, and he had another man to help him when he wanted to lift a plank, and the man McGarr did the scraping?—A. Yes.

Q. And the puttying?—A. Yes.

Q. That accounts for all the work done?—A. All that I know of.

Q. So far then we have only McGarr and the carpenter (Lalonde). These are the only two. We won't bother about the caulker, for he was paid outside?—A. There was somebody else. I did not remember. There was a man called Aimer, he worked on it.

Q. What do you say he did?—A. If I remember right, Aimer helped to put her back into the water.

Q. You say that one man, a carpenter, put in the planks, another man, McGarr, also did the puttying and also the scraping?—A. Yes.

Q. Now, can you tell me anything that was done besides carpentry work, painting and puttying?—A. Putting her in the water.

Q. That is not repairs. So that all the work on that boat outside caulking was done by carpenter Lalonde and McGarr?—A. That is so far as I know.

Q. And you were there all the time?—A. I was there all the time.

Q. That being the case, what would you think of this extraordinary document (time sheet produced). I see we have McGarr apparently working sixteen days?—A. I cannot tell you how many he worked.

By Mr. Northrup—

Q. Would you pledge your oath that this man McGarr worked for fifteen days?—A. I cannot tell you how many he worked.

Q. There is an entry here for a caulker, paid at $3 a day or $2.25 a day, paid to May 5. Do you remember this man?—A. No man worked for $2.25.

Q. It is here $3 a day?—A. That is right.

Q. Leland, as a caulker, was paid to May 5 at $3 a day, and then there are the figures $2.25 paid and then three hours?—A. I do not know anything about that.

Q. You would not say that is made up from your sheet?—A. I do not know anything about that. I know he caulked more than two days.

Q. Do you remember the fact of this caulker working for the government at the same time and then being paid off?—A. Yes.

Q. Do you remember that he was working for the government and that he was paid off, and that he then worked for Dr. Reid?—A. Dr Reid asked me three days before, and I told him I could not put on a caulker just then, but that I would in a short time, and that as soon as the work was done I would put him on.

Q. He was discharged from the government and afterwards worked for Dr. Reid?—A. Yes.

Q. The government have nothing to do with the caulker at the time he was working for Dr. Reid?—A. Not at all.

Q. If the government pay-sheet shows six days charged against him, that would be wrong?—A. I cannot say.

Mr. Northrup.—According to this account put in, there are a caulker, painter, carpenter and two labourers apparently, and then two men had half a day each, so there would be four or five labourers apparently.

Q. Can you give me any idea of your own knowledge of what took place, what labourers would be doing on that boat?—A. Labourers were painting.

Q. You told me that McGarr did all the painting?—A. McGarr did the painting, he was a labourer working on the boat.

Q. The painting was all done by McGarr?—A. As far as I can tell you.

Q. If any labourers time is charged for, would you say that that was for hauling her out or putting her back?—A. I suppose that is what it would be for.

Q. I find this item:—'To getting ways ready and hauling out, $28.56.' Did you send in any items from which that would be made up?—A. I think Mr. Mundle took over the matter.

Q. When?—A. The same fall.

Q. How would you average up?—A. We averaged up and then we charged Dr. Reid.

Q. You told us a little while ago that you thought the ways cost about $200?—A. Yes in the neighbourhood of $200.

Q. How did you arrive at this $28.66 for getting ways ready and hauling out?—A. We took the $200 and put so much on the heavy boats and put a little on Dr. Reid's boat. We divided it up as far as we could.

Q. The department has spent $200 on their ways. They had had four boats on ways and they figured out that Dr. Reid's proportionate share would be about $28.66?—A. Yes.

Q. When you charged $28.66 it is clearly understood that that was not based on the particular time that any man took. It was just based on the average cost?—A. The average cost.

Q. This took place in 1905 and you handed in your slips day by day, reporting what was done in May, 1905. Did you ever ask Dr. Reid to pay any bill?—A. I had nothing to do with that.

Q. You did not know of any bills being rendered?—A. No.

Q. When you handed in your slips, did you do anything more?—A. No.

Q. What brought the account to your mind. You started in May, 1905, when did you next hear about these charges against Dr. Reid?—A. I did not hear anything about it until some time this summer or the spring.

Q. The spring of 1908?—A. Yes.

By Mr. Reid (Grenville):

Q. Was there any work done on Sunday on that boat?—A. Not that I know of.

Q. Are you positive?—A. I never have any of them working on Sunday.

Q. You are sure?—A. Yes, none of my men worked on Sunday.

Q. If that time-sheet shows that some of them worked on Sunday, you would say it was untrue?—A. There might have been a watchman put on on Sunday.

Q. Supposing it mentioned that any of these men worked on Sunday at that, you would say it was untrue?—A. I do not remember any of them working on Sunday.

Q. Take McGarr, you are sure that McGarr did not work on Sunday at that boat?—A. Not that I know of; I do not think so.

Now, one other matter referred to that, I think, has special application to the charges made against the hon. member for Richelieu:

Q. Did you know anything about a gas tank?—A. I placed it myself.

Q. Where was it?—A. Down at the east fence on the government property.

Q. Take this plan. Will you point out where it was? Was it placed as close to the starch factory as you could get it?—A. Yes, on the government property.

Q. But as close to their property as you could get it, and yet have it on your own property?—A. Yes, right inside the fence.

Q. I think there was correspondence about that, we may as well have that, too. I find this letter:

October 19, 1904.

Dear Dr. Reid,—On further consideration it seems to me to be practical to roll the steel store roller on the east side of the depot. There will be less pipe required this way than any other. I have given instructions to have this carried out at once.

Yours obediently,
F. F. FRASER,
Commissioner of Lights.

Q. What was meant by steel store roller?—A. That must be the same gas holder.

Q. That must be the gas tank placed on the east side of your lot?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. And it says there will be less pipe required this way than any other. What was the pipe for, do you know?—A. I guess we ran the pipe down from the valve, down to the ground and under the fence.

Q. Where to?—A. We ran it under the fence so that Dr. Reid could attach his pipe.

Q. Did Dr. Reid attach his pipe to your pipe?—A. Yes.

Q. And carried it to his factory?—A. Yes.

Q. That was in your own knowledge?—A. Yes.

Q. Did Dr. Reid use acetylene gas from the government works?—A. He used some.

Q. For how long?—A. I cannot tell. There was a man there trying some new process. I heard of it. They could not get along without gas and they used the gas for that.

Q. For how long?—A. I think they filled three times to my knowledge.

Q. Kindly explain what you mean by filling?—A. Putting gas in.

Q. How much gas would it take to fill it?—A. I think it would hold about 70 atmospheres.

Q. And you pumped that in three times?—A. Three times to my knowledge.

Q. What would be the value of that gas to fill the tank once?—A. I cannot give the figures.

Q. Anyway you know there would be 210 atmospheres pumped in?—A. Somewhere about that.

Q. Do you know whether a government dredge did any work in front of Dr. Reid's property, the starch company's property?—A. I had a dredge digging there and she ran two cuts, one down and one back. I do not know who it was done for.

Q. Was it done in front of his property?—A. Yes, in front of his property. She took one cut down and one back, two cuts.

It is only fair to the hon. member for Grenville that I should read the evidence given by him in answer to the evidence I have just read:

Dr. John D. Reid, M.P., called, sworn and examined.

By Mr. Northrup:

Q. Dr. Reid, the Department of Marine charges this account against you for hauling out your boat, the 'Dack', on the ways at Prescott in the fall of 1904, putting some repairs on her in the month of May, 1905, what have you to say about that?—A. The only thing that I wish to state about that—in fact I want to state first that so far as this matter is concerned I consider it was rather unfair of the minister to bring it up in my absence.

Mr. Carvell.—Tell us the facts, you are in the witness box now, doctor, and you are dealing with facts.

Mr. Northrup.—That is one of the facts connected with this matter.

Hon. Mr. Brodeur.—Matters have been brought up in my absence very often.

A. In the fall of 1904, I wanted to haul out this small yacht, as is customary, with all small yachts which are hauled out in the winter on account of the ice. I did not haul her out for the purpose of making any repairs, I did not expect there were any repairs to be done on her. Of course, at the end of the spring it is always necessary to have a little caulking done, and at the end of the winter I remember speaking to Mr. Offspring and asking him when he got through with the caulker that he had there, doing work for the government, and when he ceased to be a government employee I told Mr. Offspring I would like to get the services of the man for a couple of days to do some caulking that might be necessary on my boat. I did not know of any repairs being done, nor did I expect that any repairs would be done, and from that time until now I never knew of anything about any repairs being done; nor have I ever had any accounts presented to me for repairs done on that boat by the department. I may say that in so far as the hauling out of the boat is concerned, I asked permission of Mr. Préfontaine to haul the boat out on these government ways, government ways that were built and were there in place for their own work. At the time I asked permission from Mr. Préfontaine I mentioned to him that I wanted to do it with my own men, as on no account would I allow or would I wish that any of the government men should be employed doing that work. I never knew from that time until this investigation came on, or until about a week ago, that the government men had even hauled out the boat. I inquired from a man, who was my foreman at that time, if the government men did actually haul out the boat, and the answer he made to me was: that I had told him to take the boat round and haul her out with our own men, and he took the boat around prepared to do that, but Mr. Offspring said to him: 'Never mind, I will haul her out in fifteen minutes, when we are hauling out our own boat.'

By Mr. Northrup:

Q. When were you told that?—A. About a week ago, when I asked him if our men had not hauled her out. I had, at that time very many men in my employ, and could have done it, and would have done it, but I have'nt any doubt that Mr. Offspring told him that thinking it was only a matter of a few minutes to haul her out, and that he did not think anything of the matter further than that.

Q. Now, about the caulking?—A. The caulking was done, I saw Mr. Noble afterwards, and asked him what charges there were against me, and he replied $6. I paid it, and I have never heard one single thing from that day until this about the charges; that is all I know as far as the yacht is concerned.

There are one or two other matters which have been referred to, which I would like to speak of, there is the question of acetylene gas for the Starch Company. Let me say about that that we had secured a chemist from Chicago, a new man, that wanted to use gas for testing purposes, for lighting purposes. We had no gas in the town of Prescott and he wanted me to put in an acetylene gas plant which would cost a good many hundred dollars; he was not quite sure whether acetylene gas would work, and in order to have a simple test of this acetylene gas, I asked Mr. Fraser if he would allow me to use a little acetylene gas just for a day or two in order to test it. Mr. Fraser did put this gas over there and we tested it, and it would not work. It was only just for the test, and the result was we did not put in an acetylene gas plant that I would have put in if it had worked. So far as I was concerned, I did not consider that we had used any quantity or that the value of it would be hardly anything. Now, that is all about the acetylene gas, but I personally derived no benefit whatever from the use of that gas.

Q. Excuse me, it was a company?—A. Yes, it was the company that derived any benefit there may have been from the use of the gas.

Another matter that was mentioned here was with reference to an engine. Now, I wanted—we started up our works and I had ordered machinery which had not arrived, and we wanted to start, and the government had an engine in store which I understood was one which had been laid aside for many years, but that it would answer the company for a short time until we could get our own. I asked Mr. Fraser if he would allow the company the use of this engine until we could get our own. The engine was in a bad state of repair at that time on account of not having been in use for many years. I took it over to the machine shop and got it repaired up and used it for a short time, and then returned it in better condition, I believe, than when we got it.

Mr. REID (Grenville). Would the hon. gentleman also read the evidence of Mr. Noble, the man who was in charge of the matter?

Mr. KYTE. I should be glad to read it if I could put my hand on it.

Mr. REID (Grenville). Mr. Noble was in charge of the plant and right there all the time.

Mr. KYTE. I will pass the book over to the hon. member (Mr. Reid, Grenville), and perhaps he will find it for me.

Now, I desire to say that I was led to an expectation as to the manner in which the charges against the hon. member for Richelieu would be dealt with having read the evidence elicited in the Public Accounts Committee in the charge made against the hon. member for Grenville. We have there a case of the hon. member (Mr. Reid, Grenville) who was then, as now, a member of the House seeking to get a favour from the government. I am going to admit at once that the hon. member for Grenville paid the bill when he knew what was due. I will admit that the hon. member might perhaps have been deceived when the caulkers were put to work upon his vessel as to being still upon the pay-roll of the government.

Mr. REID (Grenville). I object there. The caulkers the hon. gentleman speaks of were two men who had never before been in the employ of the government. They were brought from Kingston, where they were the employees of Davis & Sons. They were brought down just to caulk three boats, and the minute they were through they were discharged, and ceased to be government employees.

Mr. KYTE. I am merely stating what I read from the evidence. It may have been a mistake to continue their names on the government pay-roll.

Mr. REID (Grenville). They were never on the government pay-roll for caulking government boats prior to being on my boat.

Mr. KYTE. I do not desire to enter into a wordy controversy with the hon. member with respect to it. I read the evidence taken from the Public Accounts Committee and which will appear upon the 'Hansard' to-morrow. The evidence is available, and any one who desires can read it. With regard to the repairs made upon the boat, and the painting upon the boat of the hon. member for Grenville, the same thing applies. The hon. member, I presume, paid for it when it came to his notice that their time had been charged against the government.

Mr. REID (Grenville). There was never any account presented to me.

Mr. KYTE. Then it is not paid yet, so it is all the worse for the hon. gentleman. The hon. member for Richelieu desired the use of some men to do work upon his house. He went to the person having charge of these men, who consented that they should go and work upon his house. The time was kept in the same manner in which it was kept in the case of the hon. member for Grenville, and when the work was all done the bill was presented to the hon. member for Richelieu, and he paid the bill, in the same way the member for Grenville would have paid the bill had it been presented to him. Now, with regard to the paint that the member for Richelieu borrowed from the employees of the government at Sorel, the situation is exactly the same as in the case of the hon. member for Grenville in borrowing the acetylene gas and borrowing the engine, with this difference, that there is no testimony that the member for Grenville ever paid the value of the acetylene gas or the rent of the engine. The member for Grenville said that he needed an engine for some special work in his factory, he could not get another one anywhere else, and he went to the Superintendent of the Marine and Fisheries Department in the town of Prescott, he borrowed an engine, and used it as long as he had any use for it, and then returned the engine to the government. I submit that is the exact set of circumstances in respect to the hon. member for Richelieu. It is true, as the Minister of Justice pointed out, that the member for Richelieu did not return the paint in specie, but he returned it in kind. The person who had control of paints in Sorel swears that he kept an absolutely correct account of the material, and after the work was done he made out a bill for the material, he gave it to the time-keeper, who handed it over to Mr. Papineau, and the moment the member for Richelieu ascertained the value of the material that had been used in his house, he gave instructions to have it purchased from the same manufacturer, and he paid the bill, thereby returning to the department at Sorel every penny's worth of material that had been loaned to him. Now, I submit that the circumstances surrounding the transaction in which the hon. member for Grenville was connected are on all fours with the charges made against the member for Richelieu. The member for Richelieu got men from the Department of Marine and Fisheries to do work for him, for which he paid. The hon. member for Grenville, in equal good faith, I presume, got men from the Department of Marine and Fisheries at Prescott, to do work for him, and I am free to admit that if he did not pay for it, it was not his fault, but he would have paid for it if the bill had been rendered to him. Now, there was no hon. member in this House who stood up in his place in 1908, and charged that the hon. member for Grenville had been guilty of fraud, perjury and malversation, in his dealings with the government in the circumstances I have detailed. If the member for Grenville feels that he has not violated the spirit or the letter of the Independence of Parliament Act, and if hon. gentlemen surrounding him on the opposition side of the House feel convinced that the member for Grenville did not violate the Independence of Parliament Act, then I ask them, in all fairness and in all honour, how they can ask this House to censure the member for Richelieu in like circumstances. Taking the argument used by hon. gentlemen on the opposition side that were addressed to you, Mr. Speaker, this afternoon, and taking particularly the arguments used by the member for St. Anne (Mr. Doherty), and the member for West Elgin (Mr. Crothers), every censure and every condemnation addressed by them to the member for Richelieu, might apply with equal force and weight, against the member for Grenville, and I think it would put their casuistry and their talent for making fine distinctions to a severe test to convince you that while the member for Grenville has not violated the Independence of Parliament Act and has done nothing for which he should be censured, the member for Richelieu has done something for which he should be censured and condemned under the same circumstances.

Mr. J. D. REID (Grenville). I would not probably have said anything in this discussion, were it not for the remarks which the hon. member for Richmond (Mr. Kyte) has made concerning myself. I cannot conceive that any hon. member of this House, if he had read the evidence as he should have, would have got up and made the statements the hon. gentleman has made about me here to-night. He has produced the evidence, as he states, in this case, and the hon. member admits that he did not read the evidence, he only read part of the evidence.

Mr. KYTE. I read the statements that were germane to the case.

Mr. REID (Grenville). When I asked the hon. member to read the balance of the evidence he said that he couldn't do it, that he hadn't it. It is not here now, he has only got the one sheet of the evidence. He had not read the evidence of Mr. Noble. Mr. Noble is one of the leading officials of the Marine and Fisheries Department, he was stationed at Prescott at the time, and was living there every day, and the hon. member, if he read Mr. Noble's statement, would see that he denied absolutely the statements made by the hon. member for Richmond. Mr. Noble stated that he had never heard anything about these repairs until it was brought up at that committee. Now, let me state how this thing happened. The hon. member read my evidence, and I denied the whole of the affair, and there was nothing to prove that my evidence was different. Let me tell the House now how this little matter of mine happened to come up. The Minister of Marine and Fisheries is here now, we are face to face and we had better have it out. The Minister of Marine and Fisheries knows that at that time there were investigations going on in the Public Accounts Committee concerning his department. We all know that there were very serious charges against the Marine and Fisheries Department. The minister was up there defending the department, as he should. We had charges there so serious that if the people of this country knew of them, I do not believe they would tolerate this government for one minute. What did the Minister of Marine and Fisheries do in that case? He sent his private secretary out to Prescott and kept him there a week or two as a private detective, to see if he could not find some evidence. After a week or two he got two of these witnesses, the evidence of one of whom the hon. member was reading. He is a man whose oath would not be taken in any part of Prescott or in any other part of Canada, a man who, was himself kept out of jail by his friends. That is one of the men, and the minister has him there yet. Both are men whom you can buy for $10 at any time. But when you get to Mr. Noble, a man of honour, he denied the whole thing. Mr. Noble said he never heard of it. The caulkers spoken of were not regular government officials, they were only there for two or three weeks, they were brought there from Davis & Sons, of Kingston, and after they were dismissed and were returning to Davis Bros. I had two men for one day each, or $6, and I paid that to Mr. Noble because he paid the men, as they were going away. I never heard of anything being done on my yacht, and I believe that not one dollar's worth of work was put on it; had there been anything put on it, I am sure the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, with the venom he had against me, would have produced the evidence. I defy the Minister of Marine and Fisheries to say that he ever produced an account or rendered an account to me; he never rendered an account, and the account that man swore to was something like one gallon of paint, a few pounds of nails, something like $3.80. Then they charged me, in order to bring up a fraudulent account, with part of the ways that were built some years before and which are there yet, for which any man knows I would not be expected to pay anything. That was charged up to make a fraudulent account. The Minister of Marine and Fisheries knows that I was in the Public Accounts Committee every day until this one day, when I had to go and attend a meeting in my county, and then he sprung on this false evidence when I was not there to ask questions. The evidence he read was given when I was not present. I never like to strike below the belt. At that time the Minister of Marine and Fisheries did strike below the belt, he took advantage of me when I was not present, and I do not believe there is another man in the House or another minister who would have stooped to such a mean, low trick as he did.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. REID (Grenville). Then after that, Mr. Speaker, what did I do? I went to the Minister of Marine.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. SPEAKER. I think those words 'mean low trick' are not parliamentary.

Mr. REID (Grenville). I do not wish to use any unparliamentary language, and, of course, if that is out of order, I will withdraw it. But when the Minister of Marine did such an act as that on me, I told him there and then that I would certainly do what I hated to do, I would expose him. Well, Sir, this man Lanctot——

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. REID (Grenville)——who has been accused of theft.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. REID (Grenville). This man Lanctot, the member for Richelieu——

Mr. TALBOT. Mr. Speaker, I appeal to you on a point of order. Has the hon. member the right to call an hon. member 'this man Lanctot'?

Mr. REID (Grenville). I withdraw that; I said that hon member for Richelieu. I apologize for using his name in that way. I said, this hon. member for Richelieu has been accused by members who have spoken, of theft, common theft. Every person knows that means a common thief.

Some hon. members. Order.

Mr. REID (Grenville). Hon. members have accused him of common theft, and that has not been disputed from the opposition side. He is accused of taking men and materials and never intending paying for them.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. REID (Grenville). That has been mentioned by members who have spoken, that he never intended paying. Compare the member for Richelieu with the Minister of Marine and see how these things happen. I want the Prime Minister to understand how these things happen in the Marine and Fisheries Department. I was one of the first to bring out the fact that the Department of Marine and Fisheries was being robbed by a lot of thieves, and, after the investigation, the Prime Minister had to admit that, according to the evidence taken before the Royal Commission, that was practically the case. The Prime Minister assured this House that he was going to have a change in the department, that he had appointed the Hon. Mr. Brodeur as minister, and we were going to see a change; that department was going to be run honestly from the date of his appointment. The Prime Minister knows that that gentleman became Minister of Marine and Fisheries after we had shown up robbers and thieves in that department. He continued those men on his patronage list and they received favours and were paid amounts by that department. After the minister's unfairly taking advantage of my absence we moved for papers in connection with the expenses of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries because it was shown up to us that this gentleman had left Ottawa with the Minister of Finance; they took the same train, they took the same boat to and from England, yet the expenses of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries were three or four times that of the Minister of Finance. No man disputed the expenses of the Minister of Finance. We all knew that the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, who has, beyond doubt, put up this job on me to-night, and got another man to make these statements, put his hand in the public chest and took out a certain amount of money for his expenses. The Prime Minister will not deny that. I think he received some $8,000 altogether for his expenses to England; he took that money out and returned to Canada in October or November. On January 8, three or four months after, when Mr. Taylor, the member for Leeds, asked the question how much his expenses were, the answer was given and seven or eight days afterwards the Minister of Marine and Fisheries refunded $600 or $700 of the money he had in his pocket that belonged to the people of Canada. Would that ever have been paid if we hadn't brought it up in the Public Accounts Committee? The money would not have been refunded, the Minister of Marine and Fisheries would have kept the money and he would have been carrying it around until this day. That is what happened in his case. There was a precedent why the member for Richelieu should do these things. We showed up how the Department of Marine and Fisheries was running and the minister knows that right there at Sorel where he had put a man on as time-keeper of his own when it was brought to his attention that this man was padding the lists and robbing the country, a common thief stealing the money and putting it in his pocket, and after the Minister of Marine and Fisheries had sent one of his own appointees, a good Liberal who reported to him that this man had been thieving, and that he was a common thief, the Minister of Marine and Fisheries promoted him and gave him a better salary and sent him down to Quebec to another job.

Mr. BRODEUR. Who?

Mr. REID (Grenville). It was Roy. You know him well because you put him there, and you knew he was robbing the country.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. REID (Grenville). The Minister of Marine knows that down there at Sorel they have been breaking up the buoys right on the dock and selling them for scrap iron; robbery and common thievery going on there all the time and there is nothing to stop it; going on there with the consent of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries.

Mr. SPEAKER. That is exceeding the limit of debate.

Mr. REID (Grenville). I make the statement that he knows it, and I cannot take back what I know is true.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. member cannot say that thieving is going on with the consent of the minister.

Mr. REID (Grenville). Well, Mr. Speaker, I say with the knowledge of the minister. He knew well enough what is going on, it is in the public press that it is going on, and he knows it. That is what is going on in the Marine and Fisheries Department. Look at the statement that was brought up here that the Prime Minister was ashamed of the other night. There were $23,000 expenses for the Minister of Marine and Fisheries.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. No.

Mr. REID (Grenville). That was shown.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. No.

Mr. REID (Grenville). Was it not read out $23,000 for the Marine and Fisheries department?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. That might be the total expenses for the department.

Mr. REID (Grenville). And some $8,000 of that was for the Minister of Marine and Fisheries himself.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Oh, no.

Mr. REID (Grenville). I read it in the official statement.

Mr. TAYLOR (Leeds). $4,800.

Mr. TALBOT. What about the acetylene case?

Mr. REID (Grenville). The Minister of Marine and Fisheries is trying to attempt to trump up a charge against me of that kind, and take advantage of me in that way, but so far as I am concerned I want to state here, so far as this little matter of mine is concerned, I never in my life went to any official or any member of the government and asked them to allow one man to be employed by me. In fact, the evidence shows that I said I would not allow any government official to have anything to do with my property. There is not an official there that will swear that I ever asked him to put on any government officials for me. I never did, and I never had any account rendered to me because the statement was not true. I think this Sorel affair is one of the most outrageous things ever done in this country, and I think it is unfair for the Minister of Marine to put up this gentleman here a few minutes ago to try to get out of this thing in this way. So far as I am concerned, I believe that this affair in connection with the member for Richelieu is one of the most disgraceful things that ever took place in the history of this country. I cannot believe for one minute that the right hon. the Prime Minister is satisfied with the way the Department of Marine is going on. The Minister of Marne has all his government officials at Prescott, and I have told him there is not any doubt at all but that there has been the same kind of thievery going on there in the same way right along.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. REID (Grenville). But, if I wish to say what I think, I do not believe the minister cares whether it is going on or not as long as it benefits his party. That is the way I put it, because it is all his own political friends who seem to get these favours. And so it is all along the line. We have cases up there in the Public Accounts Committee that witnesses are keeping away because, as I believe, they don't want to expose the minister, so much graft is going on in that department. The Prime Minister surely must take cognizance of all those things going on there. If these statements are true in the press that he is going to appoint this man on the Supreme Court——

Som hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. REID (Grenville)—where it requires a gentleman who will judge a case honestly.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, shame.

Mr. REID (Grenville)—I think the Prime Minister is going pretty far if he does it. So far as the Minister of Marine is concerned there were other cases that really on account of the feeling we have towards him and others we did not investigate. Why, when he was appointed Minister of Marine the Prime Minister knows well the statements that were going around this House about the position he occupied before that. Will the Prime Minister look up and see that while he was Speaker of the House the amount he charged up to this government were such that no other Speaker of the House or any half dozen of them ever spent so much.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. REID (Grenville). We have a head of the Marine and Fisheries Department, and we have a right to discuss these matters in connection with the man in charge of that department. I do not blame those fellows that are stealing from and robbing the Marine and Fisheries Department so long as the Minister of Marine and Fisheries either from ignorance or knowledge is willing to let it go on. It is going on there, and it is either through his ignorance or within his knowledge, and any member of this House judging by his past experience from what we have seen can judge which it is. So far as I am concerned, I have my own opinion and every other member can have his opinion. The hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk) and the hon. member for St. Anne (Mr. Doherty), men from Quebec, men who know the situation, don't hesitate to say that the public thieving and robbery that is going on at the Sorel works is publicly known all over the district of Montreal, and that being so surely the Prime Minister must know it. Is he going to allow this to go on? When I brought this matter up about the Marine Department a few years ago he stood up here and said he was going to clean out this department, going to purify it, and what is the record now? I tell him that if the previous minister, the late Hon. Raymond Prefontaine, could stand up here to-night and see the way this department is going on since he left it, he would be ashamed of the government for running it the way they have been doing since. The record of it is something awful. We can bring it before the Public Accounts Committee, but there is no notice taken of it. I tell the Prime Minister that if he is going to allow things to go on as they have been going on in that department his time will be limited.

Some hon. MEMBERS. We have heard that before.

Mr. REID (Grenville). I believe the Prime Minister thinks that the people will not stand for robbery. Will the Prime Minister say that the people will stand for robbery?

Mr. DEVLIN. I rise to a point of order. I do not wish to interrupt the hon. member, but for the decorum of this House it is time we should have your ruling Mr. Speaker, whether an hon. member of this House may be permitted to say that with the knowledge of a minister, whether the Prime Minister of the country or the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, thieving is going on, and thereby saying that the minister may be mentioned as a party to the crime, because—

Mr. SPEAKER. I cannot allow the hon. member to make a speech.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Sit down.

Mr. DEVLIN. I ask your ruling, Mr. Speaker, on my point of order. I say that any member of this House who charges a minister of the Crown with knowingly allowing thieving to go on in his department is making a statement that the minister himself is guilty of theft, and such a statement should not be allowed in the House.

Mr. SPEAKER. I did not hear any such statement.

Mr. REID (Grenville). With regard to what the hon. member has stated about thieving and robbery going on at Sorel, the hon. member for Jacques Cartier made a statement in this House this afternoon, on his responsibility as a member, that it was going on.

Mr. TALBOT. That does not prove that it is true.

Mr. REID (Grenville). It has been stated in this House that it is going on, and we have proved beyond a doubt that it has been going on. I made a statement in this House that it was going on, and the Prime Minister took me to task, and I proved it. He appointed Judge Cassels to inquire into it, and it was proved that it was going on. Why did the gentleman who made that statement not make some charge against me? No man ever made a charge against me, because they knew that it was not true; and another thing—they never sent me any account.

Mr. TALBOT. We are not built that way.

Mr. REID (Grenville). I do not wish to refer any more to this matter. I did not intend to make any statement on the affair, but it does seem to me pretty small that the Prime Minister, through his Minister of Marine and Fisheries, would put up a member to try to bolster up such an outrageous case of robbery and theft as this is, by citing my case. I do not think the Prime Minister would believe for one minute that I would be guilty of trying to do what these men say.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, no.

Mr. REID (Grenville). I do not care what the gentlemen behind him say. I have that confidence in the Prime Minister, at any rate, that he would not think I would do anything of that kind. The hon. member has asked me something about the little question of gas. Well, to the best of my knowledge and belief, after questioning Mr. Fraser and the other gentlemen there, the value of the gas used—because I think it was used only one day—was about 50 cents. I explained at the time that the company I was connected with had given the government a right-of-way over our property for their railway, which they have got to-day, and I believe that right-of-way was worth anything from $1,000 to $3,000, and they never charged them a cent. The company also gave the government the use of their wharf. The dredging they talk about, was, it is true, in front of a wharf owned by this company, but it was done for the advantage of a wharf alongside owned by the government. I did not want it; I was not using that wharf; but the government boats were using it, and the dredging was in front of the company's wharf for the purpose of enabling the government boats to go to the wharf that was beside the wharf owned by the company with which I was connected. It was done for their sole benefit. After that, down comes this private secretary, Mr. Wiallard, sent by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, to see if he could not get up some cock-and-bull story for the purpose of injuring me. Well, I came before the electors, and the people there, including Liberals, were disgusted that any government would do so mean an act against any member. They could not believe it was true, and at the next election, although the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, as I understood—because I heard on what I considered pretty good authority—sent some thousands of dollars in to try to defeat me——

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman should not make that statement.

Mr. REID (Grenville). Well, I withdraw it, if the Minister of Marine and Fisheries says it was not so. But notwithstanding that fact I had the largest majority I ever had, although more money was used against me than I believe was used at any other election, and I can judge from the rumours, of the source from which it came. I did believe that the evidence we had in the Public Accounts Committee would have some effect on the Minister of Marine and Fisheries; I expected that we would have a better management of that department, but I must confess that knowing all the departments, even the Public Works Department, which the public think is so bad, in my judgment the Marine and Fisheries Department is the most disgracefully run department in the whole government. If there is robbery and thieving going on in the departments, that department is the worst of them all. Now, I do not intend saying any more. I simply rose because of the remarks made against me. I am not a bit afraid of what the minister or any member of the government or any member of this House can do against me in my constituency. I was born in that county, I have lived there all my life, I have run five elections there, and I am satisfied that I can run another, even with the whole government against me, and I can have as big a majority as I had at the last election.

Hon. L. P. BRODEUR (Minister of Marine and Fisheries). I thought, Mr. Speaker, that we had met here to-night for the purpose of discussing the question which is now before the House—the report which has been made and which has been proposed by the hon. member for Welland (Mr. German), and the report which has been proposed by the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk). I find, however, by the speech which we have just heard, that we have gone absolutely out of the way and out of the rules which are generally followed in such cases. I want to say immediately to the hon. member for Grenville (Mr. Reid), that when he says that I had something to do with the statement which has been made to-night in connection with the investigation which took place some years ago, or, to use the expression which he employed several times, that I had put up the hon. member for Richmond (Mr. Kyte), he is making an assertion which is absolutely unfounded.

Mr. REID (Grenville). I had it several days ago that you were going to do it.

Mr. BRODEUR. I never spoke to the hon. member for Richmond in regard to it. I never mentioned the matter in any way, shape or form, to that hon. gentleman or to anybody else, and I am surprised at the statement of the hon. member for Grenville because he cannot show that anything of that kind came from me in any way whatever. When he makes that erroneous assertion I say that he does something which is absolutely unfair and uncalled for. However, I do not care very much, and I am glad that the hon. member has seen fit to speak of the administration of the Department of Marine and Fisheries, because since I have had charge of the administration of that department I have tried to conduct its affairs in such a way as to enlist the confidence of the people.

Mr. REID (Grenville). You have not done it.

Mr. BRODEUR. I have done it not only to my own satisfaction but to the satisfaction of all fair-minded men in this country. I admit that at one time the department was under a cloud. What did I do? I took the necessary steps to investigate everything connected with the administration of the department. When the Civil Service Commission came into the department, I said to them that they could examine everything, and I put at their disposal all the papers which were in the department. Later on, when they stated that there were some frauds, or some general charges against the administration, or against some officials of the department, I asked my colleagues to appoint one of the most eminent judges in this country to investigate thoroughly the affairs of the department. If we had been afraid of any wrong-doing I never would have recommended such an investigation. But, I had the best lawyers in the country, I had one of the most eminent judges to be found in Canada, to investigate the affairs of the department, and when that investigation was over and when it was found that some people were guilty of wrong-doing, I did not hesitate for one moment to recommend to my colleagues the dismissal of those officers who had violated the rules of honesty and rectitude. With regard to the statement that stealing and thievery are still going on, I may say to the hon. member for Grenville and the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk) that I will always be disposed to do everything in my power to put an end to anything of that kind. The hon. member for Grenville says that there are steals going on still in Prescott. What would be the duty of the hon. member for Grenville in such a case as that? The hon. member for Jacques Cartier also stated this afternoon that in September or October last, he knew there was something irregular and illegal going on at Sorel. What would be the duty of these hon. gentlemen? Are they not obliged, like ministers of the Crown, to see that the administration is honestly carried on? If they know of something wrong in any branch of the public service is it not their duty as members of the House to advise the minister of the wrong-doing, or to get up in parliament and say what has been done? The hon. member for Jacques Cartier stated this afternoon that he was advised in September or October last that there was something wrong in Sorel. Why did he not come and tell me? Why did he not advise the minister what was going on? The hon. member for Grenville states also that there is some thieving going on in Prescott. If the hon. member knows that, it is his duty to get up and state what is going on and to give me the particulars in order that the guilty parties may be punished.

Mr. REID (Grenville). I will tell the minister why—because the minister, up in the Public Accounts Committee, defends these rascals instead of prosecuting them.

Mr. BRODEUR. The hon. member has the audacity to state that I am protecting rascality——

Mr. REID (Grenville). Sure, you are.

Mr. BRODEUR——when I dismissed and suspended no less than 29 officers of the service who had been found guilty by a Royal Commission I did this under my sense of duty and the next day the Montreal 'Gazette,' which is a respectable paper, praised the action which I then took. I say now that if there is thieving, if there is stealing in some parts of the department, it is the duty of any member to see that these steals are put a stop to and to denounce these things. My hon. friend can bring his facts before the Public Accounts Committee, he can state the facts to the minister and he will always find that I will take the necessary steps to prevent any stealing or wrong-doing. I may say in connection with this matter that some time ago a member of the opposition, anxious, I am sure, that the administration should be honestly carried out, brought to my notice something which was wrong and I immediately advised the necessary inquiry with the view of punishing the guilty parties. I may inform my hon. friend that in spite of everything that he has said to-night against me, I will always receive any information which he will give in that respect and he may be sure that the necessary steps will be taken to put an end to any wrong-doing which may be disclosed. The hon. member for Grenville has thought fit to refer to all sorts of things with which I have been connected. I say that I am not afraid to put my record before parliament and before the country. My record is just as good as that of any member of this House. I have been trying to do my duty and I think I have done it. I have punished and dismissed culprits, I have sent to jail persons against whom I have been able to secure convictions and I will punish wrong-doing so long as I have anything to do with the administration of the public affairs of this country.

I do not want to discuss at any great length the question which is now engaging the attention of the House. But, perhaps I may be permitted to say a word or two as to the circumstances which surrounded that question. In the month of May last, the hon. memeber for Richelieu seeing that he could not get workmen in Sorel to paint his house went to the time-keeper of the shipyard to ask if he could procure the services of some men for this purpose. There is no great harm in that.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, no.

Mr. BRODEUR. Certainly not. What harm could there be so long as there is no fraud, and the public service does not suffer? Some hon. members opposite say this cannot be. I say, on the contrary, that sometimes it is even a good thing to do in order to retain the services of men who are employed in the government works there. The men employed in the government works in Sorel are generally very good men, and fulfil their duties in a very satisfactory manner. But there may be times in the year when there is not so much to do, and, if we have a chance to secure work for our men elsewhere, it means that we shall be able to retain their services. I do not see how it can be stated that the mere fact that the member for Richelieu asking for men to work on his house is a very bad thing. Some time ago we had a case where we did not absolutely need the services of a certain man, but had we dismissed him he would have gone elsewhere and we would have lost the services of a man we could not easily replace. We found some work for him outside the yard, and I say in such a case there is no harm in it, on the contrary, it is to the advantage of the yard.

Mr. BARKER. Did the minister continue to pay that man?

Mr. BRODEUR. No. But when I made my first proposition I had in mind the suggestion of some hon. members opposite that this should not be done in any case. I say that sometimes it should be done. The circumstances under which the hon. member for Richelieu made his request for men were these: His wife was, unfortunately, very ill. He was unable to stay in Sorel, but had to remain with her at Saranac Lake, where she was being treated. He asked the foreman whether he could not get some men, and the foreman, Mr. Champagne, answered that he could get these men. In June a few days' work was done. Mr. Lanctot was absent most of the time. A few days' more work was done in July, but properly speaking, the painting was done in September and October, and finished in November. So far, there is certainly no harm. Mr. Lanctot asked the foreman painter Mr. Pagé where he could get the paints for his house. It was suggested that he could get them from Cyrille Labelle & Co., but on that remark the foreman said that he did not know whether it would be possible to get all the paint from that firm, that there might be some qualities that they would not have. Mr. Lanctot said that in such a case Mr. Pagé could supply the paints and he would see that they were replaced. Mr. Pagé agreed. That is all that was done. As to the men there was no agreement except that they were to be paid by Mr. Lanctot. Nobody suggested the contrary; nobody suggests that Mr. Lanctot was not to pay these men. The best evidence is that during the progress of the work Mr. Lanctot asked several times for his bill. What was done in this case by Mr. Champagne? Mr. Champagne did what I consider a very irregular thing, but under circumstances which I think it only fair the House should understand. Mr. Champagne had known other instances of men being set at work outside, and he had paid these men, having the money from the person for whom they were working. But Mr. Champagne was severely criticised, so he tells us, and some of the men insinuated that he had put some of the money in his pocket which otherwise would have gone to them. To protect himself, without the knowledge of Mr. Lanctot and without the knowledge of the officers of the department, he kept these men on the pay-lists, but without any intention of defrauding anybody. He had no intention of stealing the money or doing anything wrong; he acted as he did simply for the purpose of protecting himself against such insinuations as has been made against him. And when the work was finished his statement of account was sent to Mr. Lanctot, and immediately a cheque was returned for an amount, and the transaction was consequently closed.

Now, with regard to the paint, it was understood that the paint should be taken from Mr. Cyrill Labelle, but at the same time it was agreed between Mr. Pagé and Mr. Lanctot that if the latter could not get all the paint he required for his house, he might get it from the department. Mr. Pagé was the foreman of the painters. We put at his disposal from the stores a certain quantity of paint which is not charged to any particular work, because this paint has to be mixed, and when it is mixed it is used on different works. Mr. Pagé renders every week an account to the shipyard cost clerk stating the amount he has spent upon such and such a work. In that way he has at his disposal a certain quantity of paint, and out of that he took a small quantity to be used on Mr. Lanctot's house. It was understood that the paint was to be returned, it has been returned, or has been paid for. So far as the money is concerned, it cannot be said that there was any theft, or any conspiracy amounting to a crime. The hon. member for Ste. Anne (Mr. Doherty) has tried to show that there was theft under the circumstances, and that word is also to be found in the charges made by the member for Champlain. But I am convinced, and I am sure the majority of the members of this House are convinced, that there was no theft in the circumstances which have been proven. What constitutes theft? There must be an intention to steal, to defraud. Was there any intention shown to defraud in these circumstances? Certainly not. Was there any intention of stealing? Certainly not; it cannot possibly be said that any crime has been proven. What is the situation today? A minority report has been brought down signed by the member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk) and the member for Hamilton (Mr. Barker). Do these two hon. gentlemen in their report intimate that there was a crime, that there was robbery? Not at all, they simply state that it was a violation of the Independence of Parliament.

Mr. BARKER. We said it was unlawful.

Mr. BRODEUR. But they do not say it was a criminal offence, they do not say that there was theft, they do not say that the charges made by the member for Champlain have been proved. The member for Champlain charges that there was a theft committed. The hon. member for Hamilton does not say that, and I would be greatly surprised if he should now say that there was theft under the circumstances. How does it come then that these charges of theft are now being made? The Minister of Justice showed conclusively that there was no violation of the Independence of Parliament Act, and after his speech the member for Ste. Anne's discovered that the motion made by the member for Jacques Cartier could not stand criticism. Then hon. gentlemen opposite started these charges of theft and robbery. Well, I say there is absolutely nothing in the evidence which would justify the charge on the part either of the foreman or of Mr. Lanctot. Why is Mr. Lanctot being prosecuted to-day? Why have these charges been made against him? Of course, we should not refuse to receive information, no matter from what source it comes. Who brought these charges against Mr. Lanctot? Who are the men who have been surrounding the member for Champlain and urging him on to make these charges against the member for Richelieu? It is well known that if Mr. Lanctot had been willing to get the Department of Marine and Fisheries to make a certain contract with a certain gentleman whose letters are filed in this case, if Mr. Lanctot had been willing to support the contentions of the man who wanted to blackmail the department, who wanted to get a contract with the department that we were not willing to make, there would have been no charges against Mr. Lanctot. Hon. members of this House who have followed the investigation know that a certain gentleman was applying for a contract with the department, he wanted to sell us some machinery that we did not need, and I informed the hon. member for Richelieu that we were not going to purchase that machinery. This man's name was Lamoureux, and Mr. Lanctot informed him that the department was not going to purchase his goods, that they were of no use to us.

Mr. PAQUET. At what date?

Mr. BRODEUR. Some time in the month of September and October, also in November. Then, what does Mr. Lamoureux do? He writes a letter to Mr. Lanctot on the 23rd of November, 1910, page 185, of the evidence. This is what he says:

My Dear Adelard,—What news will you bring me Saturday? You will have seen the minister, I suppose. I count on your bringing me a favourable reply.

If the minister refuses to grant me what I ask of him, after having made promises to me, and having heard what he has said to me, if he refuses, I say, I declare to you, my dear Lanctot, that I will be obliged to attack strongly and to bring to light things about which I feel reluctant. My determination has reached its height, whatever may be the consequence.

Do your best, my dear Lanctot, because a refusal will certainly have grave consequences. You have enough in hand to make the minister give in, if he keeps his word, and what he has written, as I have no doubt he will.

Yours truly,

(Sgd.) J. O. LAMOUREUX.

Here is a letter which speaks for itself. He states in his letter that I made him some promise to purchase his machinery. I saw the man some time afterwards and said: On what do you rely in stating I have given you a promise? You know I have been refusing all the time to purchase these goods, because we do not need them. He said: It is true, but I have done it in order to induce Lanctot to do still more towards you and to induce him to work more strongly in my favour and to represent me. He felt it was only just to write me the following letter:

If from the letter which I addressed to Mr. Lanctot, our member, on the 23rd November, 1910, the inference was drawn that I was making malevolent insinuations against you, I state that my thoughts were not translated properly.

I had not the slighest intention in the world of attacking or tarnishing your reputation. On the contrary, I have never ceased to regard your reputation and your character as absolutely unattackable, and. in addition to that, Mr. Minister, I have no reason to doubt your perfect honesty.

Perhaps my letter was not sufficiently precise for those whose interest it is to alienate from me your esteem. However, it appears to me evident, in its entirety, that the hard words it contains are for him to whom it was addressed, and not for you, Mr. Minister, because I have always thought that if I did not obtain that which I asked, it was because Mr. Lanctot did not take the interest in me that I had hoped from him. Several times he showed himself very reticent.

If in my letter I speak of promises and of encouragements that you could have given me, it was the object of stimulating the zeal of Mr. Lanctot and of proving to him you were not as strongly opposed to my requests as he wished to make me believe.

Once more, Mr. Minister, I have never for an instant doubted your perfect honesty, and I have never wished to tarnish your reputation.

These explanations would have been unnecessary, I am convinced, Mr. Minister, had not the persons interested in depriving me of your esteem sought to draw from any letter a meaning which I had no intention of conveying.

I am confident, Mr. Minister, that my explanations will satisfy you and that you will continue to believe in my best consideration and most respectful sentiments.

Your humble servant,

(Sgd.) J. O. LAMOUREUX.

Mr. LENNOX. A regular patent medicine letter.

Mr. BRODEUR. That is a very significant letter. Here is a man who some time ago stated that if a certain contract which he was expected to make was not consummated, he would make some revelations and he said the minister had given him a promise. Then he writes a letter stating that he did that just to induce Mr. Lanctot to work more strongly for him. That explains to a very large extent the charges which were later made in this House. I do not know if the member for Champlain (Mr. Blondin) is here or not, but if he is here I suppose he will admit that this man Lamoureux has been one of those who have approached him and induced him to make these charges against Mr. Lanctot. Who are the other men who had instigated chiefly these charges against Mr. Lanctot. Two men were in the service in Sorel whose services we had been obliged to dispense with. These men come later on and say: We worked at Mr. Lanctot's house for a couple of months. One of them said he had been working there for four months and that he was being paid by the government during all that time. Honest man! Did he come and tell his superior officers that he was at the same time working for the government and also for Mr. Lanctot. That he was stealing from the government? Why did he not go and say to the director of the shipyard: We are in receipt of money from the government which we do not earn. No, but afterwards, when they were dismissed and sent away from the work of the department those men went to see my hon. friend from Champlain (Mr. Blondin) in connection with the men who wanted to blackmail Mr. Lanctot and they started these charges which are now made against Mr. Lanctot.

Mr. BARKER. Does the hon. minister not know that every material fact spoken of by these witnesses has been admitted by Pagé and Champagne?

Mr. BRODEUR. It has been stated several times here by members who have spoken on the other side that the member for Champlain (Mr. Blondin) should not be blamed for anything in connection with the charges which have been made before this House. I say the hon. member should have stated when he made his charges that the amount had been paid by Mr. Lanctot. It was a very important fact, why did he not state it? He simply took the statements of these men Lamoureux, who wanted to blackmail Mr. Lanctot, Douaire and Proulx, who had been dismissed from the service of the department. Of course every member is free to take evidence from any person, I admit that, but at the same time I think the word of those men who had been dismissed from the public service for cause should not be received and accepted so readily and more especially that charges of this serious nature should not be brought against fellow-members of this House upon such testimony. I am sure the members of this House should be convinced now that the charges made against Mr. Lanctot were not well founded, that he did not violate the Independence of Parliament Act, and that he did not commit any theft or crime as suggested by the hon. member for St. Anne (Mr. Doherty) and the hon. member for Elgin (Mr. Crothers). Under these circumstances I say that we should clear the hon. member for Richelieu (Mr. Lanctot) of the charges which have been made against him.

As the House is aware, the hon member for Richelieu (Mr. Lanctot) was placed in a very trying position. He was obliged to be absent from his city a great deal in order to be with and to nurse his wife, who was very ill. In that situation, he had the sympathy of every man in Sorel, every man was willing to help him; and because some men may have been a little indiscreet in the way they extended sympathy to him, I say that we should not, under the circumstances, do anything which would add to his anxiety.

Mr. W. B. NANTEL (Terrebonne). (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, I will refer in the first place to the words that the hon. the Minister of Marine has just uttered. He tells us that he asks nothing better than to be duly informed of what is taking place. For my part I shall not fail to tell him of the abuses and thefts committed, especially at the Sorel works. I hold here a certain number of affidavits concerning those frauds, and there are many others. The abuses referred to have taken place within a year at the Sorel yards, and the minister should know of them.

Mr. BRODEUR. (Translation.) The hon. member is doubtless aware that six accused persons have been arrested.

Mr. NANTEL. (Translation.) But have you held an investigation such as will satisfy public opinion? I may tell you that had such an investigation been held the hon. member for Champlain (Mr. Blondin) would never have pressed his charges.

Mr. BRODEUR. (Translation.) An investigation was held two years ago.

Mr. NANTEL. (Translation.) It was not a complete investigation. In any case I could, if necessary, produce some fifty affidavits concerning the abuses taking place at Sorel; if I may be allowed to do so.

Mr. BRODEUR. (Translation.) If the hon. member will hand me the affidavits in his possesssion, I will hold an investigation immediately.

Mr. NANTEL. (Translation.) We on this side of the House do not want Mr. Lanctot's head; we require an investigation satisfactory to the public and which will throw light upon the doings of certain government employees at Sorel. I might mention certain names, in fact I will do in the course of my remarks. A certain Mr. Oscar Champagne—for there are several of the name—who checks and prepares pay lists, is said to have answered: 'I do not want to have anything to do with the payment of the men, as I would be accused of not giving them their full pay.' That the government would pay them and Mr. Lanctot refund the money. Men's services have been loaned and honestly so to certain persons in Sorel. There is nothing to be said against that. There is, for instance, the case of Amable Lussier, who secured the services of government painters; he paid them himself and they did not report on such days as having worked for the government. Might not Mr. Champagne have said to Mr. Lanctot: If you want painters you will get them, but you must pay them yourself. An appeal to sentiment is made on the ground that Mr. Lanctot's wife was very ill when the work began. I fail to see why this is constantly brought before the public. A man of courage would not resort to such means for the purpose of attracting sympathy and condoning actions of which the public cannot approve. Concerning the illness of Mrs. Lanctot, I sympathize with the member for Richelieu, but I do not approve of the tactics which consist in calling attention to the illness of the lady in order to attract sympathy to himself. Mr. Lanctot's wife should not be called in to protect him.

At all events, was the hon. gentleman constantly at Saranac lake? Was he not at Sorel on June 3 when the work began? He spent most of his time at Sorel. There was no such pressing haste as has been contended and he might easily have seen Mr. Papineau and made arrangements with him to obtain more men. It is established that Mr. Papineau was only two days absent, May 28 and 29. It will not be believed that the member for Richelieu might not have met him had he so wished.

The organization of the Sorel shipyards should be known. We should be in a position to decide whether it is imperfect or incomplete. There are legions of employees there.

The investigation which has just taken place has given us and the public much information. If, as I have just remarked, the organization is not perfect, it is at least complete in this sense that there are numerous employees of all classes and kinds. It is not perfect because it has been found wanting in a very simple matter.

Mr. Louis G. Papineau is the manager of the Sorel shipyards. His assistant is Mr. H. A. Terreault.

Mr. PAQUET (L'Islet). (Translation.) Will the hon. member allow me to ask whether the member for Richelieu made any effort to see the deputy manager of the Sorel works on finding that the manager was absent?

Mr. NANTEL. (Translation.) Not the slightest. On May 28 or 29 he called at the office of Mr. Papineau who happened to be absent at Montreal. He made no effort to see Mr. Terreault, nor did he seek to meet Mr. Papineau on his return.

Mr. Alfred Baril is the accountant. Mr. Norman Massé is keeper of the stores in which the materials employed in construction work at Sorel are kept.

Hon. Mr. BRODEUR. (Translation.) Does the hon. member know anything against Mr. Baril?

Mr. NANTEL. I will hand in affidavits against Mr. Baril and if I am not mistaken I can get several.

Mr. Jean Baptiste Pagé is foreman of painters. Mr. Arthur Lavallée, his assistant, distributes the paint for different works. Mr. Cecil Doutre is the purchasing agent.

Hon. Mr. BRODEUR. Mr. Doutre does not reside at Sorel.

Mr. NANTEL. Whether he resides at Montreal or at Sorel he is supposed to form part of the staff. Mr. Oscar Champagne is time-keeper; he also prepares the pay lists. The branch dealing with the cost of construction is under the direction of Mr. Ulric Latraverse, with Mr. Albert Prudhomme as assistant. Both have books to keep; by means of statements furnished by other branches, they are in a position to compute the cost of all construction or other works in the Sorel shipyards. Mr. Désiré Champagne is paymaster. Mr. Cuthbert Champagne is keeper of the 'punch' by means of which the men register their time. Mr. Napoléon Badeau is foreman of the wood construction. Mr. Gendron is foreman of day labourers.

There are a number of other employees whose names I will not mention. Each man working at the Sorel shipyard is given a number and every different work is also numbered. The organization cost $42,000 and it is now found defective. It was devised by one Falconer and supposed to be excellent.

Hon. Mr. BRODEUR. Does the hon. member contend that such a sum was spent for that organization or that Mr. Falconer appointed those employees?

Mr. NANTEL. It cost $42,315.02 to establish a good system of book-keeping and instruct the assistants.

We find therefore at Sorel an army of employees, managers, assistants, guardians, time-keepers, foremen who rub up and seemingly interfere with one another. All are bound to protect the property of the government and of the people at Sorel. However, in spite of this complicated machinery there was found to be, in the year of grace 1910, a man, a lawyer by profession, who succeeded in having his house painted and by government materials, tools and men and at the cost of the government. The work was begun as soon as the house was ready to be painted, i.e. the 3rd June, 1910, and was finished only on the 21st November following.

During that period of about 23 weeks, government men and government paint were used for that private work. Until the 21st November seven or eight men at a time worked there and were paid regularly by the government every two weeks. An extraordinary feature is that the government was officially informed of this only on the 22nd November, 1910, by a statement of the wages of painters and labourers accompanied by a cheque for $375.62, addressed to Mr. L. G. Papineau, the manager. The statement was handed in by Jean Baptiste Pagé, who was not the official book-keeper but assumed those duties for the occasion.

Mr. Papineau must have been very much surprised on receiving such a statement and cheque! Until then the government was kept in the most absolute ignorance concerning the painting of this now notorious house. The cheque covered the payment of wages only and not the cost of material. The matter now being known, steps were taken to recover the cost of paint and other material, and Mr. Papineau determined the mode in which this recovery should be made. He decided to obtain the paints from a Montreal firm—the Mount Royal Colour & Varnish Company—to the amount of $81.60 and to return it in kind to the government. Mr. Papineau gave his personal cheque in payment. The goods reached Sorel on December the 12th, 1910 and were stored by the department on the 13th.

The hon. member for Richelieu repaid Mr. Papineau the amount of his personal cheque and also the cost of transportation. But how was the whole of this 'tour de force' managed? for in reality it is a 'tour de force.' Very simple and the matter as a whole shows the true value of the army of government employees at Sorel.

The hon. member for Richelieu spoke first of all to Mr. Oscar Champagne, the timekeeper, whose office is next to that of the manager, Mr. Papineau and of Mr. Terreault, the assistant manager. He said to him:—Mr. Papineau is not in his office, can you send me painters as my house is ready to be painted? With pleasure, replied Mr. Champagne. The member for Richelieu met Mr. Jean Baptiste Pagé, foreman painter, as he left Mr. Champagne's office, and repeated the same request; can you send me any painters? With pleasure replied Mr. Pagé, if Mr. Papineau consents.

Some time later, between the 15th and the 20th May, according to some witnesses, between the 15th and the 30th, according to others, but in any case before the month of June, as the painting began on June 3, the member for Richelieu had asked Pagé for paint and material, requesting him to keep a seperate account, as all would be returned. It was not more difficult than that. That is all. Nothing was done towards seeing Mr. Papineau, although he was absent from Sorel only on the 28th and 29th May, two days in all. It was not worth while to see him or his assistant. Neither Jean Baptiste Pagé nor Oscar Champagne cared to see Mr. Papineau and submit the case to him.

Thus, from the 3rd June to the 21st November, government paint, material, brushes, were abundant, painters, and even labourers flocked the house in question.

It has been attempted, in the course of the investigation, to prove that it was not possible to find painters at Sorel; but laborers at least could be obtained.

At all events, from June 3rd, all the government employees were placed at the disposal of Mr. Lanctot without anything being changed or disturbed in the routine of the yards. Painters and labourers registered each day as if working for the government, when they could; when they could not do so themselves, Cuthbert Champagne, the complainant guardian of the 'punch' registered for them, having been so instructed by his namesake Oscar Champagne. Then Oscar Champagne, who alone with his pal Jean Baptiste Pagé knew what was going on, prepared his pay list regularly and, each fortnight, and painters doing the private work of the member for Richelieu, were paid by the government,

As I have said, each work bears a special number and all the employees engaged upon it are also numbered, so that it is quite possible, if the rule be observed, to compute the cost of each undertaking. The director of construction work can give, at any time, a statement of the cost of any one undertaking. In the present case that was not done. For the work in question was carried on outside of the knowledge of the manager, Mr. Papineau; it was kept secret from him and done behind his back, although his office was next to that of Oscar Champagne and the house in question a few yards away from his own residence; the whole according to a secret and collusive understanding between the hon. member for Richelieu, Oscar Champagne and Jean Baptiste Pagé, under the higher direction of Mr. Baril.

Nothing of this private work, conducted by two subordinate employees of the government, appeared in the regular books of the department at Sorel. J. B. Pagé, foreman, appears to have noted the men's work in his personal note book or on loose sheets which he handed to Oscar Champagne. The latter kept them in a private drawer and manufactured or falsified the pay lists every two months, making it appear that the men had really worked for the government. In this manner was prepared the account of $375.60 handed to L. G. Papineau on November 22nd, 1910, with a cheque for $375.60 bearing the same date, which was charged and deposited in the Federal Treasury on January 11th, 1911

Mr. TALBOT. Is my hon. friend now reading from the evidence?

Mr. NANTEL. Is that what you are anxious about?

Mr. TALBOT. Yes, because you have no right to read your speech.

Mr. NANTEL. It is an extract from the evidence. In any case, I am in the hands of the Speaker.

At the Sorel shipyards, in order to obtain material from the stores, paint, for instance, a written requisition is required. It appears that in spite of this rule, the foreman may obtain large quantities of paint and in fact it is from what friend Jean Baptiste Pagé had in hand and which he had obtained for other purposes and other works, that he furnished the member for Richelieu with the material for painting his house.

J. B. Pagé appears to have noted on a blotter the amount of paint and material so furnished, the value of which amounted to $81.60. But, most unfortunately, the blotter was lost as soon as the account had been prepared and it has been impossible to find it. Had it been lost beforehand, what would have been the position of the member for Richelieu? It is evident that this matter of paint was not an ordinary one and that it required all the influence that a government member of parliament may exercise over government officials at the Sorel shipyards to persuade them to take the chances they did.

It will also be admitted that in computing the cost of this undertaking, the bookkeeping we have had before us is very crude and rudimentary when we reflect upon the fine organization obtaining at Sorel. Quite plainly Messrs. J. B. Pagé and Oscar Champagne are by no means official but rather under the circumstances officious accountants.

If they were acting in good faith and anxious to do everything openly and above board as is their boast, why did they not proceed in the usual manner prescribed for every undertaking in the Sorel shipyards? If it was desired to paint the house of the member for Richelieu, why was not a special number given to the undertaking? So much paint might then have been requisitioned for and charged against the number assigned to the work. All the statements would then have been transmitted to Mr. Ulric Latraverse, who, immediately after the completion of the work, would have stated: the cost is so much, neither more nor less. The matter would have been clear, clean and no more said.

But it is contended that this was a loan of men and of material. During the investigation, Mr. Amable Lussier told us that on a certain occasion, the department had loaned painters to repair his premises. But he paid those men himself; there was no connivance between the men and their foreman to register as if working for the government. He also paid for the material.

Mr. Napoléon Badeau, superintedent of wood construction and foreman of carpenters, also loaned men to Mr. Lanctot, but he made sure that they did not register as if working for the government.

Speaking of Mr. Badeau, do you know, Mr. Speaker, that if Mr. Badeau had not been superintending the wood construction at the Sorel shipyards, if in his place there had been a man less anxious to do his duty, less scrupulous, a man in fact of the stamp of Pagé and Champagne, instead of having to pay the cost of the paint only at the house in question, the carpentering and woodwork would have come in as well. If you doubt it, listen to Mr. Badeau's deposition at the investigation; it is the evidence of an honest man. And really, had a minister of the Crown not testified therein, I would say that Mr. Napoléon Badeau is the most honest man heard before the committee.

Here is an extract which I find at page 179 of the printed evidence:

Q. You knew that Mr. Lanctot was building a house on George Street, at Sorel, in 1910.—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Had Mr. Lanctot previously spoken to you with a view of obtaining men from you?

Mr. Laflamme, K.C., attorney for Mr. Lanctot, objects to that question as non pertinent to the charges referred to the committee.

The objection is maintained by the president.

Q. Did Mr. Lanctot go to your place and ask you to send some of your men that were working for the government, to work at his house, and did you tell him that you would send those men only on the order of Mr. Papineau; did Mr. Papineau give the order and did you send the men?

Objected to by Mr. Laflamme as illegal.

Allowed by the president.

A. What do you ask?

Q. Did Mr. Lanctot go to your place and ask you to send some men to work for him, and did you answer him, that you would do so only on the order of Mr. Papineau; did Mr. Papineau give the order and did you send the men?—A. Mr. Lanctot asked me if I had what he wanted. I told him I had it not at the time, but that it could easily be prepared. I told him then, that to have what he wanted, he would have to ask Mr. Papineau first.

By Hon. Mr. Bureau:

Q. On that occasion, did you send some men at Mr. ——?—A. I beg your pardon, the men have been paid at Mr. Lanctot's house, because I told these men not to have their tickets punched before leaving; I also told the puncher not to punch their tickets.

By Mr. Macdougal:

Q. What did he ask for?—A. He asked me to send some timber first——.

Q. Go on with your answer. What did he ask you to send, first?—A. He asked me to send some timber. I told him that I could do so only with the permission of Mr. Papineau.

Q. Did Mr. Papineau give the order, and did you send the timber?—A. I never heard about it, after that.

Q. How long after that did you send some men?—A. The men were sent about that time.

Mr. Laflamme declined to cross examine the witness.

I am surprised that we have been allowed to make that proof before the committee, because we were not given much latitude by the president and the majority of the committee. They constantly objected to all circumstantial evidence, and to every thing that could throw some light on the intentions of the people concerned. The moment we tried to bring in such a proof, we were called to order. We were not allowed to speak about anything else but paint. Every time we tried to bring in some other subject, we were promptly brought back to the paint, under the pretense that the investigation was to be restricted to the painting of Mr. Lanctot's house.

When we offered to prove that men in the employ of the department had removed Mr. Lanctot's furniture into his new house, after it had been painted, the committee promptly closed the mouth of the witness Arthur Cayer, who had been summoned expressly to prove that charge. The question not being allowed, the witness had to withdraw.

It is true that the painting has been done in broad day light, as it is so inconvenient to paint during the night; but it is equally true, that outside of a few intimate friends, as J. B. Page and Oscar Champagne, nobody knew that the wages and the paint were paid for by the government. All were under the impression that the wages were paid regularly by the proprietor of the house, as well as the materials furnished by the department. If Mr. Papineau had not been under that impression, if he had had the least doubt on that point, and had not put a stop to such practices, he would have proven himself to be as dishonest as J. B. Pagé and Oscar Champagne. Mr. Papineau became aware of the state of things, only when he received the bill.

Mr. NANTEL

Mr. TALBOT. He was living right opposite.

Mr. NANTEL. I admit that, and if the hon. member for Bellechasse's intention is to convince the House, that Mr. Papineau was looking at the skies, not to see what was going around, it is his own business.

On the timekeeper's list, exhibit No. 2, Alfred Douaire is credited with only 15 days work at Mr. Lanctot's house, during September and October, but he actually worked during July and August—48 days in all. He said so himself under oath, and the fact is corroborated by A. E. Payette, Henri Proulx and Alfred Thibodeau.

Louis Paul is credited with 20 days' work, and it has been proven that he worked one month, or 26 days. But hon. gentlemen opposite do not mind a few days more or less; they give no importance to such small matters. It is also stated at page 49, that Arthur Plante has worked for two weeks, but his name is not even mentioned in the bill.

It would appear that the paint furnished by the department only amounted to $81.60, and no charges are made for the plant. The wages paid to the painters are said to be $375.60. Mr. Lanctot admits that all the paint required for his house was taken from the workshops of the department, with the exception of the doors and windows, which had been painted the winter before with materials bought by Mr. Lanctot from Mr. Rivet. That paint cost $13, and the workmanship, $12. If you compare the two cases, you find a wide difference. But, a few pounds, more or less of paint, the brushes and all other necessary tools, what is that for our hon. friends opposite?

If the hon. member for Richelieu cannot find in the city of Sorel a single labourer to remove a telephone post, in front of his door, without making application to the government, it might seem strange to us, but for hon. gentlemen opposite, it is another small matter unworthy of notice.

In fact, the whole transaction itself is only a small affair, a common incident, such as happen every year at the department's workshops at Sorel. But the important thing is the principle implied. The gist of the inquiry is that in 1910, at Sorel, the hon. member for Richelieu succeeded in having his house painted with materials belonging to the government, by men in the employ of the government, at the expense of the government, without the knowledge of the superintendent of the workshops, by means of a secret understanding, of a conspiracy between himself and two inferior officials of the department; that the government became cognizant of the thing, only when the work was completed, by the reimbursement of part of the wages and the return of the materials by Mr. Lanctot, when complaints began to be heard on every side and public opinion forced him to make restitution.

Long before that, on the 24th of September, and on the 17th of October the government had been notlfied that irregularities and wrong doings were going on at Sorel, and disclosure was threatened. If we had been given the least latitude before the committee all that would have been proven.

What is the name to be attached to such a transaction? Shall we call it an irregularity, a fraud, a conspiracy with intent to defraud, an abuse of influence on the part of a member of parliament, a violation of the Act on Independence of Parliament? I do not care what you call it; the transaction is there and it required to be investigated.

Was there intent to defraud, from the beginning? Naturally we were not allowed to prove any kind of intention. We have been strictly limited to the brutal fact. All the people concerned might have a conscience of a special kind, a crooked conscience, and it is possible that they said to themselves: All these things belong to the government; we are the government; the government is ours, let us help ourselves. The officials helped themselves, everybody helped themselves, and the member for Richelieu was given help.

But if you look closely into the matter, you can easily find ample proof that every thing was premeditated and so arranged before hand that if the member for Richelieu had been insolvent, if, for one reason or another, he had not been in a position to pay the bill, the government would have lost every cent. If such a thing had happened, what name would you put on the transaction? You would call it embezzlement; there is no other qualification for it. The cashier who takes the money of the bank for his own use and promise to return it, do not act differently.

If, at the beginning of November, before the 20th, the government had ordered an inspection of the books at Sorel, if they had sent some one to take stock at the workshops, they would have come across that painting contract at Mr. Lanctot's house. If J. B. Pagé and Oscar Champagne had lost their note-book before preparing their statement, what would have happened?

Such transactions would necessarily disturb the bookkeeping of any large establishment. What confidence can we have in the bookkeeping of the department? What guarantee have we that the cost of a boat built at those workshops is as stated when sufficient materials to paint a whole house can be taken away for several weeks without the knowledge of the government?

Things were so arranged before hand that all those concerned had an interest in keeping the matter concealed. Return of materials and payment of wages was sure to arose suspicion and make trouble. They were all interested in keeping the matter secret and in making no payment.

On the 6th December, when the hon. member for Richelieu wrote his letter, the paint had not been returned. It was pretty well known all around Sorel that those faithful public servants, J. B. Pagé, Oscar Champagne and others, committed to the safe keeping of public property, were allowed such privileges as having a canal built on their premises, a kennel for their favourite dog, a carriage or a yacht painted and taken out of the river at the end of the season; all that with the materials belonging to the government and with men in the pay of the government. But the painting of a whole house was out of the ordinary, and it is to the hon. member for Richelieu that honour is due for the change.

Now, has the hon. member for Richelieu violated the Act of Independence of Parliament, chapter 10, R. S. of Canada, sections 14 and 15? I say yes.

A bargain, a convention, a contract has been entered into between himself and certain officials of the department, in their individual capacity, if you like, whereby the house of the hon. member was to be painted with materials belonging to the government and by men in the pay of the government. Later on, the government, in accepting the reimbursement of the wages and the return of the materials, has ratified the bargain.

Has the hon. member for Richelieu been benefited by that bargain? Has he derived from it any advantage or favour? Again, I say yes, and it has been proven.

Could any advantage result from that transaction? Yes. Was that advantage of such a nature that the hon. member could be influenced by it? Yes. If instead of having to pay $500 or $600 to another party, he could have that work done for $300, is that an advantage and a favour? And was not that favour of such a nature as to influence his vote in this House? If a member of parliament buys a property from the government under the real value; if he pays, say $8,000 for a property valued at $10,000, does he not derive a benefit and if such benefit does not constitute an infringement of the Act of Independence of Parliament, I am at a loss to know what it is.

Moreover our critics are not directed so much against the hon. member for Richelieu, as against the general system in vogue at the workshops of the marine department at Sorel. The investigation that we asked for, was not in the doings of the member for Richelieu, but in the general administration of the department. The first resolution that we intended to submit was asking for a general investigation ; if there is any doubt about it I can produce the original document, but that demand would have been rejected and the hon. member himself would have been the first to stand in his place and tell the House that things in the workshops of Sorel were as clear and limpid as the waters of the Richelieu river. As a last resort, we decided to carry the war into Africa.

Mr. TALBOT. In what part of Africa ?

Mr. NANTEL. The hon. gentleman is eminently witty, but his sallies may become tiresome, in the long run, and he is apt to say things that he would not dare to repeat outside of this House. He may rest assured that I am not in the least intimidated by his more or less absurd interruptions.

We have been hampered on every side in this investigation. All circumstantial evidence has been eliminated ; we have been denied the right to prove any fact likely to throw some light on the intentions of the parties interested. The committee would not hear the witness Arthur Cayer, who was ready to say under oath that he had removed the furniture of the hon. member for Richelieu into his new house during the time he was in the employ of the government and that he was paid by the government and also that his wages had never been repaid to the government. In the course of the investigation it was incidentally disclosed that during the summer of 1910, some painters in the employ of the department, had done some work at the church of Sorel, and immediately, a motion was made and carried by the majority to have that part of the evidence rejected.

If it had been clearly proven that high officials in Sorel, are trafficking behind the back of the government that they are selling at low prices or giving away articles taken from the stores of the department, that they are doing odd jobs for their friends and receive money or favours in exchange ; if I say, these charges had been proven, it would have required but one step further to prove the main object of the investigation.

If it had been demonstrated that in the workshops of Sorel high officials entrusted with the safekeeping of public property, are nothing else than thieves pilfering upon the government for themselves and their friends, and if it had been demonstrated afterwards, that the hon. member for Richelieu had dealings with those thieves, it would have been in the nature of throwing light on the whole transaction and of making known the intentions of the bargainers. But we were not allowed to do it. At every step, the heavy fist of the majority would come down upon us, and restrict us to the painting of the house.

It is by mere accident that the evidence about the church, as I stated a moment ago, came out of the bag, in spite of the exertions of those who were keeping watch around the witness box, to see that the truth could not escape. That witness, Napoléon Badeau, has lent some men to the hon. member for Richelieu, but he saw to it, that their tickets would not be punched, as if they had been working for the government, and he saw to it that they should be paid by the right party. That man Badeau received other requisitions from Mr. Lanctôt. He was asked for some timber, but he insisted upon having the authorization of Mr. Papineau, and heard no more about it after that. The member for Richelieu did not bother him any more; he knew then what kind of a man he was.

Complaints about all those wrong-doing at Sorel were made long before the 24th of September. When the money was refunded the clouds were gathering and the storm was on the verge of bursting. I am informed that in other transactions, quite independent of the one we are dealing with, moneys were refunded in anticipation of an investigation. It was no use to try to prove those things to show the intention of the parties. The big fist of the majority was always there, ready to crush all effort in that diretcion.

We are not after the head of the hon. member for Richelieu. We want a thorough cleaning of those modern Augean stables known as the Sorel workshops. We want a complete investigation by a commissioner who, instead of trying to conceal the truth, would direct all his energies and his ability to find out the truth, the whole truth.

I intend to read a few of the affidavits that I hold in my hand so that the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries, who is asleep at the present moment, can read them to-morrow in the Hansard. I will begin by the affidavit of Mr. Henri Proulx, taken before Mr. Bourgeois, on the 23rd of December last. The fifth section says:

5. That since the 20th of November last, about twenty men employed by the government, at the same dockyards, have, to my knowledge, made written declarations, charging high and low officials of the Department of Marine, at St. Joseph de Sorel, with theft of cement, in some cases, in other cases, of timber, of paint, varnish, &c., hardwares, &c., and above all with directing the men in the employ and in the pay of the government to do different works for the benefit of private citizens, and on all these charges, the public is asking an investigation.

Mr. TURCOTTE (Quebec). Is that affidavit before the House?

Mr. NANTEL. No, but I will lay it on the table.

Mr. TURCOTTE. I rise to a point of order. I object to the hon. gentleman reading papers that are not regularly before the House.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman has the right to read these papers.

Mr. NANTEL (reading).

6. That since it is rumoured that there will be an investigation. I have been solicited and supplicated, night and day, by the said Mr. Adélard Lanctot, and by others; they wanted me to destroy or to handle to some party interested in their suppression, the written declarations made by myself and by others, and of which I was at the time the guardian.

Mr. TURCOTTE. I ask that the motion and the amendment now before the House be read, to see if these documents have any relation to the said motion or amendment.

Mr. SPEAKER. According to the Rules of the House, the motion can be read only at the close of the debate.

Mr. NANTEL (reading):

7. That during those trying times, one of the head clerks, in the store of the government was suspended, but he threatened to disclose all what he knew against the other officials and he has been reinstated since three days.

8. That the watch word amongst those who feel that they might be affected by the investigation, is to reimburse as quickly as possible the price of the materials and the wages of the men, and as a man cannot be a good judge in his own case, I know one of them who thinks he is as white as snow, because, a few days ago, he sent a few dollars to the government in settlement of an enormous debt.

9. That in the interest of Justice and of the country an investigation is necessary; if it is not granted the losses will be immense.

Mr. GEOFFRION. Is the hon. gentleman not aware that that affidavit is a forgery?

Mr. NANTEL. I am not aware of it, and I deny it.

Mr. GEOFFRION. The hon. gentleman makes a mistake. He is alluding to the witness Lambert.

Mr. NANTEL. The part I am reading is the one I was not allowed to read before the committee, because it did not concern the hon. member for Richelieu.

Mr. TURCOTTE. I rise to a point of order. I ask for the application of rule 20, of the Rules of this House, which says:

Any member may require the question under the discussion to be read at any time of the debate, but not so as to interrupt a member while speaking.

Mr. Speaker. The hon. gentleman is out of order, and I invite him to take his seat.

Mr. NANTEL. I will now read sections 5 and 6, of the affidavit of Alfred Douaire:

5. That during the time that I was in the employ of the government and receiving good wages for the time I was spending at Mr. Lanctot's place, by order of my chief, Mr. J. B. Pagé asked me one evening, about 8 o'clock, to help him to carry away a box several feet long, made in the workshop of the government, and beautifully finished; in fact, I did help him to carry the said box at his own residence, and I have never seen it since.

6. That about the 5th October, 1910, I was ordered by J. B. Pagé to glaze three double doors at Mr. Adélard Lavallée's place, at Sorel; he told me then: Go and register as if you were present; get your card punched before leaving, and I done so. I was paid by the government for that work that took considerable time.

An hon. MEMBER. Who gave that affidavit?

Mr. NANTEL. Mr. Alfred Douaire; a man that you have dismissed.

An hon. MEMBER. He had a grudge.

Mr. NANTEL. If nobody had grudges, there would never be any investigation, and it is the grudgers that defeat the governments.

I come now to the affidavit of Herménégilde Lambert:

1. That I have been in the employ of the Dominion government at their shipyards, situated at St. Joseph de Sorel, from 1900 to 1910, inclusive, that is to say ten consecutive years, the first four years as caulker, and the six last as overseer of labourers. I have given up that work on December 28 last, and have not taken it up since, although, I have been offered an increase of salary of fifteen cents per day.

2. That while I was thus in the service of the said governement, especially within the last three years, Mr. Alex. Gendron, then and still of the labourers' department, head man, and consequently my superior, has often instructed me to send sometimes one, sometimes two and sometimes three of the men under my orders and in my gang to work at Sorel for private parties, especially for Alfred Baril and Oscar Champagne, two high officials at the time, and still in the same department, and for Adélard Lanctot, M.P., to carry on works and repairs at various buildings.

3. That on receiving these applications, I sent the number of men required to work for the benefit of these persons, and when each foreman was called to give to the head foreman the time of these men, I said to Mr. Alex. Gendron: 'I have one, or two or three men who have been working at Sorel for the above mentioned.' Then Alex. Gendron, when he was present, and Adolphe Joubert, his clerk representing him, when the latter was away, would say: 'Do not mention the absences which go unnoticed; these men have punched and will be paid by the department.'

4. That Mr. Oscar Champagne, employed in the government stores, has had turf taken at St Joseph's Pointe to Sorel to grade his property and embellish the grounds around his house at Sorel, which work was done by André Cotnoir, a man in the employ of the government, who worked between three and four days, while at the same time having their cards punched every morning and getting their pay from the government, at the knowledge of the said Oscar Champagne.

5. That in the course of the summer of 1910, that same Mr. Oscar Champagne caused to be drawn, by the government teams and by men in the government pay, iron pipes taken from the government and had these carried to Sorel and utilized for a tunnel in a stream going through his property, and that this whole expenditure has been supported by the government, which is the looser in this last instance of about $200. That to my knowledge instructions have been given to the men entrusted with the drawing of the pipes to do so in such a way that the great Chief Papineau should have no knowledge of it. As a matter of fact, the drawing was effected about seven o'clock in the morning previous to Mr. Papineau's arrival.

6. That in every instance where time or material was thus embezzled, urgent departmental work was interfered with.

7. I am free to acknowledge that Mr. L. G. Papineau (great chief) of the department, is an honest man.

Hon. Mr. BRODEUR. Who gave that affidavit?

Mr. NANTEL. Horménégilde Lambert.

Hon. Mr. BRODEUR. I might inform my hon. friend that that question came before the department some months ago. An investigation was held, and it was proven that the pipes in question had been sold to that man by Mr. Papineau himself. That is all the scandal that there is in it.

Mr. NANTEL. If the investigation had not been held ex parte, we could probably get more out of it.

Hon. Mr. BRODEUR. That man Lambert has been dismissed.

Mr. NANTEL. Yes, he is another grudger. Here is now the affidavit of Henri Proulx:

I, the undersigned, Henri Proulx, painter of the city of Sorel, solemnly declare that J.-B. Pagé, foreman in the section of the painters at the government workshops, at St. Joseph de Sorel has been guilty of numerous grave irregularities, and among others, the following:

I charge J.-B. Pagé with having worked three days at the church of St. Joseph and St. Michel, on the time of the government, and during the time he was paid by the government; also

I charge J.-B. Pagé with having worked at least two days, at the premises of La Banque Nationale, on the time of the government, and during the time he was paid by the government; also

I charge J.-B. Pagé with having made two large signs for the Banque d'Hochelaga, and two signs for Mr. Adélard Lavallée, lumber merchant, with paint taken at the stores of the government, on the time of the government, and during the time he was paid by the government.

Hon. Mr. BRODEUR. I suppose that the hon. gentleman who has just read that affidavit takes the responsibility of the charge therein, that a man in the employ of the government has worked for the church of St. Joseph?

Mr. NANTEL. I take the responsibility of what I say, but just now I am reading from affidavits that ought to open the eyes of the minister and of the department and urge them to take immediate action.

I charge J.-B. Pagé with having sent me, Henri Proulx, to Mr. Pierre Paulhus to paint a carriage with paint taken from the store of the government, during the time I was paid by the government; that I was there in the company of J.B. Pagé, and when the question of the price came up, J.-B. Pagé said it would cost Mr. Paulhus nothing, as he, Pagé, liked to help friends; also

I charge J.-B. Pagé with having lent brushes belonging to the government for painting a hotel and a house, the property of Mr. J. D. Guevremont; also

I charge J.-B. Pagé with having sent me, Henri Proulx to Mr. Edouard Gauthier's place, to 'imitate' and varnish three doors with materials belonging to the government and that I have been paid by the government; also

I charge J.-B. Pagé with granting at least ten days leave to Omer Fortin, so he could organize a demonstration; and with granting a three days leave to F. X. Pagé, Théodore Hémond, Arthur Péloquin, Alphèche Champagne, Henri Proulx and myself, to organize the same demonstration, on the time of the government and during the time we were all paid by the government. The said demonstration was on the occasion of the 50th anniversary of the said J.-B. Pagé.

I charge J.-B. Pagé with having given paint and gold in sheets taken from the government store for the decoration of the hall in which was held, on the 10th August last, the aforesaid celebration; also

I charge J.-B. Pagé with giving money to Adélard Letendre and sending him to the town to buy liquors, on the time of the government; also

I charge J.-B. Pagé with giving orders to two men to break through a window at the building No. 10, on the government dockyards, expecting to find liquors in the building and and have the keeper dismissed.

Delphis Mongeau declares:

That during the summer of 1910, I saw men in the employ of the federal government carting away, in a wagon belonging to the government, with a horse belonging to the government a certain quantity of iron pipes and cement; that the said articles were deposited at the further end of the property of Mr. Oscar Champagne, also in the employ of the government; that afterwards, the same men laid the said pipes on the button of a brook on the property of the said Champagne, so as to make a drain, a work of considerable importance for the said Mr. Champagne.

Now, here is what Andronique Sénécal has to say:

I, Andronique Sénécal, carpenter of the city of Sorel, solemnly declare that I have worked at the residence of Mr. Oscar Champagne, time keeper, in the Department of Public Works at Sorel, and that I have been paid by the government as it can be shown by a pass for the ferry, signed and delivered by Champagne, on the 3rd May, 1909. One day, I made repairs to doors and cupboards, at his residence; at another time I made repairs to a fence and installed a wire 70 or 75 feet long, on the said fence. I worked there, at least three days.

I further declare that I worked three days at Mr. Adélard Lanctot's residence, to repair the fence and that I have been paid by the government.

I further declare that I worked once at the residence of Alfred Baril, accountant of the Departement of Marine and Fisheries, when he was living above the store of L. T. Trempe. Later I worked at the house were he presently resides, on George Street; Joseph Bérard was working with me. We laid carpets and oil cloths, put on mouldings to hang frames, and built a kennel for his dog. I also set the furnitures in place, in the house. We must have worked at least two weeks. I declare that during all the time I worked for Champagne, Lanctot and Baril, I was paid by the government. I remember that when I was working for Mr. Baril, it was pay day, and Baril told us that he would get the money for us, himself. He did so, and Baril and myself signed a receipt on a printed form, furnished by the government, the same as the one we have to sign when we are on sick leave.

One more affidavit; it is from Elie Sénécal:

2. That during the month of September, 1910, one of my customers told me that he would not buy any more cement from me at 65 cents per bag, as he could buy much cheaper at the government store at St. Joseph de Sorel. I immediately called on M. Norman Massé, an official at the government store and asked him if it was true that they were selling cement, and that they had sold high grade cement for 30, 35 and 40 cents per bag. Though I had put that question politely, M. Massé got very mad and told me that it was none of my business, that as long as a liberal government would be in power, himself and the other liberal officials would do as they please, without having to account, &c., &c.

Up to that time I had always considered M. Massé as a friend of mine, and when I saw him in such a bad humour, I suspected that he had already been annoyed, or expected to be in trouble about that matter, and that there was some truth in it. I called on several contractors and they admitted that they had bought cement from M. Massé at the government store, much cheaper than I was selling it. I notified the federal government of what was going on, and we exchanged several letters that I did not keep on file, except those herein inclosed.

Mr. Cecil Doutre was sent here and made an informal investigation, but took good care not to examine me nor the contractors that are using cement, although they live quite near the government store. A few days after that, Mr. Massé was suspended, but he was soon reinstated, because he was threatening to make damaging disclosures against the other officials. From the above facts, and from other information I have had since, I am in a position to state and I do state that I would not have lost the trade of several customers of mine, during the summer and fall of 1910, if they had not been in a position to buy cement at the government store at a much cheaper price than I could afford to sell mine.

3. I also declare that I was told by Mr. Alfred Désorcy, known also as 'frère Désorcy' labourer of St. Joseph de Sorel, that in 1910 he was in the employ of the government, under Mr. Lindsay, foreman of the labourers, and that himself and seven other labourers had loaded two cars of good timber belonging to the government and taken from the dock yards of the government, that the two cars were afterwards coupled to an engine and sent to Mr. Lindsay's place, at Sorel. That statement of Mr. Désorcy, is corroborated by a great number of citizens who declare that the government have lost the price of these two carloads of timber.

4. I declare further that since Mr. Desbarats left, there is an inconceivable lack of discipline and that the time of the men is very loosely kept. It is to my knowledge that Mr. Massé has supervised and directed the repairs to his house, Augusta Street, at Sorel, and has absented himself from the government store during a considerable space of time, on that account. It is to my knowledge that he has done the same thing, in 1910, when he made repairs to his other house on Ramsay Street, at Sorel. It is also to my knowledge that he is interested in the manufacture of cement blocks, at the corner of Augusta and Acadie Streets, at Sorel; that he represents for several insurance companies, and that by reason of these numerous occupations, he deprives the government of a good portion of the time that he should give to his regular duties. It may be said, also, that several other officials, give a good portion of their time to personal business.

Hon. Mr. BRODEUR. As to that man Sénécal, I might say to my hon. friend that he was challenged to make good his charges against Massé. Some correspondence took place, and I can show it in this House. Upon being challenged to prove those accusations, he has never been able to do it. We had an inquiry and that inquiry has shown the contrary.

Mr. NANTEL. You have had an inquiry behind closed doors. That is not sufficient nor reassuring for public opinion.

Evidently, in Sorel, the government is considered something as personal. Those people are saying: We are ourselves the government. Everybody helps himself, and we must not be surprised if the hon. member for Richelieu has been helped.

Once more, the hon. member is not attacked. The public wanted an inquiry into all those things where it would be represented and where it could have the right to be heard. I am not asking for an inquiry before a committee of the House, because I am sure that would not be the way to get at the truth. There is too much partisanship. I admit myself readily that I am not without fault in that respect.

The only way to get justice would be an inquiry before a royal commissary who would examine all those facts. Such an inquiry would give satisfactory results.

Hon. Mr. BRODEUR. Am I to understand that my hon. friend has read all the affidavits that he had?

Mr. NANTEL. I have read several of them; I will submit them to the House. I can have fifty more if it is necessary, and it will be a pleasure for me to submit them to the House.

Mr. D. A. LAFORTUNE (Montclam). (Translation). Since this discussion has been opened, we are witnessing, Mr. Speaker, a somewhat strange spectacle. I understand how the hon. member for Terrebonne has been able to draw certain conclusions from the evidence submitted, but what I cannot make out is about the hon. members on the left who have preceded him, because they do not agree with him. Before proceeding any further, I will beg leave to read the conclusions of the minority, so as to see if the hon. gentlemen will concur in what the hon. member for Terrebonne has just said.

The hon. member for Jacques Cartier, who has signed the report jointly with the member for Hamilton East, has said: 'We conclude, moreover, that the said Adelard Lanctot, by the acts and proceedings as aforesaid, has violated the independence of parliament.'

What can the hon. members who have signed that report say as against the declarations of the hon. member for Terrebonne? He has just said that the independence of parliament has not been violated. Still, those hon. members have read the same evidence and they are in presence of the same proceedings.

Allow me, Mr. Speaker, to draw your attention on the accusations brought against the member for Richelieu. The thing is very serious, and when the hon. member for Terrebonne says that he has nothing against him, I must confess I do not know what he means. But it is he who is accused; it is he whom they are seeking to ruin; it is he who is accused of being a thief, a highway thief, who is accused of robbery.

Does my hon. friend for Champlain know what is meant by such a word? If he knows the meaning of it, he has been somewhat rash in his accusations. Because his hon. friends who have discoursed this afternoon and to-night have objected to reach those conclusions, they say that it is due to a mistake if the English text contains that word.

Has my hon. friend ever read the Criminal Code before using such a word? Let me draw his attention on section 445 which defines the word 'Robbery':

> Robbery is theft accompanied with violence or threats of violence to any person or property used to extort the property stolen, or to prevent or overcome resistence to its being stolen.

If the hon. member for Champlain had read those articles of the Criminal Code he would not have dared to make such a charge. As he did not know the meaning of it, I will readily forgive him. He has never studied the laws of his country. He is more versed in the 'pills' of his profession.

An hon. MEMBER. He is a notary.

Mr. BLONDIN. I have never practiced medicine. I ask my hon. friend to withdraw that word. I am a notary, not a doctor.

Mr. LAFORTUNE. Well, I will change the formula. If you are a notary, you are the more guilty, because notaries are acquainted with the law, perhaps not the criminal law; but in any case, your colleagues are ashamed and reject that accusation. Your colleagues have just told you that you were not right in accusing the member for Richelieu of robbery.

Mr. BLONDIN. Whom do you mean?

Mr. LAFORTUNE. The learned member for Terrebonne has just said who it was. Before signing a mandate of that kind one must be careful. When a plaintiff goes before a court of justice in a case of robbery, the judge does not proceed before having had a preliminary inquest. In the present case such a charge cannot be substantiated, and not a single member of the left has even attempted to do it.

We have heard of theft, of breach of trust, of malversation. I have listened attentively to all that has been said. I have studied the evidence, I have read and reread it and I say that not a single reasonable man acquainted with the criminal law would pretend that the evidence is sufficient to lay ground for an accusation of robbery. I challenge anybody to prove that the evidence on file would be accepted by a magistrate. The hon. member for Richelieu may have been perhaps imprudent, but I repeat that nothing has been proven to substantiate an accusation of robbery. All that is only a false pretense and we all know what is meant by that.

Let them read the law, to know what is meant by false pretenses. Evidently, those hon. gentlemen who had a grudge against the department now attack the member for Richelieu and make him pay for the bad temper that they feel. We have the admission of one of your own men. My hon.

friend of Terrebonne has just declared that there is no grudge against my hon. friend of Richelieu, but rather against the Marine Department. Then, why don't you behave like brave and courageous men, and don't you lay a direct accusation against the hon. Minister of Marine, with your own seats at stake.

If it is true that this department is as corrupted as you say, and that infamous things are there going on, you ought to have enough courage to make a formal accusation against the hon. minister whom you are seeking to ruin in public opinion by insinuations rather than direct accusations, because you know very well that you would not be able to prove them. In your ill-temper, you throw yourselves on the back of the hon. member for Jacques Cartier . . . I beg pardon to my learned friend, it is he himself who goes for the hon. member for Richelieu.

The hon. member for Champlain ought to have known that my hon. friend of Richelieu had pledged himself to reimburse the government, and that therefore there could not have been neither a theft nor an intention of theft. I understand that his declaration has been made too late, but it was nevertheless too daring. If you examine the evidence, you can see that the declaration of reimbursement has been made at the very origin of this transaction, before anything had yet been delivered. I say that in such a case, it is impossible to prove an accusation of theft. Nobody who has studied criminal law would dare sustain such a pretension. There must be, for a crime, an intention of criminality. Now, in this circumstance, there has never been any intention of theft. I prefer the declaration of the member for Terrebonne who tells us that the intention was primarily to have a general inquiry into what is going on in the Marine Department at Sorel. But then, why now call the member for Richelieu a thief, a highway robber? After the spectacle that they have given us, I am sur I should have good reason to doubt their sincerity.

They say that because Mr. Pagé and Champagne have proceeded irregularly, it follows that the member for Richelieu is a thief. Even if Pagé and Champagne had acted as the member for Jacques Cartier has said they have ; even if they had had no right to act as they have done; even if they had acted with imprudence and without authorization, should the conclusion be that there has been a theft? But every day our courts are asked to waive illegal contracts, things that there was no right to do. Should we perforce come to the conclusion that those persons are thiefs? It is an easy thing to say, but the proof of it is another affair.

The hon. member for Jacques Cartier says that the evidence of Pagé is not to be believed. That is what he says, but where is the proof of it? Who was it that doubted the sincerity of that witness? Where can you see in the inquiry that the declaration under oath of that witness has been contested? One should never forget the principle that the evidence of a witness holds good, so long as the regularity or the sincerity of a witness has not been contested. Where can you see in the evidence that his sincerity has ever been questioned ? You are proceeding against this witness 'ex parte.' But why not give him the chance that is not refused to the greatest criminal to pay his debt. That is agreed, on the floor of the House everything is allowed when it comes to proffer an accusation; but outside of this House, you would not dare to make a charge of perjury against this very same man.

They say that the work was done at Mr. Lanctot's house, next door to where lives the inspector-in-chief Mr. Papineau, and that no permission had been obtained from this gentleman. Would that constitute a theft? Even if Mr. Papineau had not been consulted; even if it had been shown that Champagne and Pagé had gone beyond their powers, and that they had no mandate to act as they have done, would that constitute a theft? If all those who overstep their powers had to go to jail, I know some people who would not be here. If, for instance, the member for Champlain admits that he has exceeded his mandate; if he was asked to justify this accusation; if he was told: you have been imprudent, reckless, you have acted wickedly in proffering such an accusation against the member for Richelieu, what would he answer to that?

I hear some of those hon. gentlemen laughing. You can laugh, but the wife and the children of the member for Richelieu are not in the same agreeable mood.

Mr. PAQUET. I make a call to order. If we want to uphold the dignity of the deliberations of this House, I must ask the hon. member for Montcalm to please address himself to the Speaker and not to members.

Mr. LAFORTUNE. I have just said to the hon. member the accuser that he could have a laugh over what he had done, but that the one he has accused is not in the same mood, since this wicked accusation has been made against him. He will never be able to repair the wrong he has done to that family. I have no doubt whatever that the member for Richelieu will be exonerated; but the result of that wicked accusation which has been hawked about every where, and which stand in bold letters, in the press of the country, as a splendid advertisement for the member for Champlain, the result, I say, will be an incalculable wrong for the member for Richelieu, a wrong which the member for Champlain will never be able to repair for himself and his family.

They say that the work had been going on next door to Mr. Papineau. Well, the member for Richelieu who had asked Champagne and Pagé to do that work had a right to believe, from the answer received from those two men, that they had permission to do the work. Nothing could be more natural and more logical. When those men came to do that work, it was because they had had the permission of Mr. Papineau.

When an officer or a civil servant is asked to do a thing, if he answers : Very well, but I will ask permission of my chief. And if on the morrow I see that man at work, my conclusion is that the necessary permission has been granted.

They say that Mr. Papineau is an honest man. Others are in doubt or unwilling to say so. Who is to be believed ? The necessary conclusion is that Mr. Papineau knew what was going on, and that the member for Richelieu was in no necessity, as was said, to make further inquiries about it, since the men he had asked for were at work.

Mr. PAQUET. Will the hon. member allow me to ask him a question ? Has he read that part of the evidence of Mr. Papineau, in which he declares that he has no knowledge of what was going on ?

Mr. LAFORTUNE. We hear, as an accepted fact, of the frightful things that are going on at Sorel. The hon. member for Jacques Cartier has not been very affirmative on that point, but the member for Terrebonne went farther than that. He told us that abuses and frauds were going on there. But we are not obliged to believe all that. It is easy to throw accusations to the wind. When I am studying a case, I read the evidence and the affirmations made ' ex parte ' have to be controlled.

I may be allowed, I think, not to entertain the same opinion. The people in Sorel are just as respectable as anywhere else. They are honest and industrious. You say that there are scandals going on, but you show no proof of that.

At the time that those hon. gentlemen were in power, the finances of the country were in a sore plight. But now that we have a liberal government, millions of dollars keep flowing to us and this year we have a surplus of thirty millions. You have never been able to show as much. Those hon. gentlemen are still going through the same dreams and they think they are still in power. They should not forget, however, that we are in power since 1896, and that is why the millions keep coming to us.

The member for Jacques Cartier has said: There has been nothing entered in the books. That is a gratuitous affirmation and one which must be taken subject to verification. The evidence shows the contrary. Books have been kept, and statements regularly made every night. Why not state the true facts ? It is true there was no ledger ; there was perhaps no ledger. But for that kind of work, there is no necessity of books in double entry for the time of the men and the few materials which were brought there.

That is then a gratuitous affirmation, and we are not obliged to accept his 'ipse dixit'. I would rather rely on the evidence.

My learned friend has said it is a trick. We are playing no tricks, in our party, that is something to new for us. The hon. member for Jacques Cartier may know a good deal about tricks. Well, let him keep the patent of it, if he has it.

The hon. member for Jacques Cartier, who is a professor at Laval, must be acquainted with that part of the law where it is admitted that the sending of materials, to the knowledge of those who possess them, does not constitute a theft and does not justify a writ of imprisonment. You can come to the law firm to which I have the honour to belong since five years, and you will be told that such an accusation cannot be deemed sufficient to get your man arrested. There may have been an imprudence, but when it comes to a question of having a man arrested, to ruin that man and to deprive him of what is most dear to him in the world, one must look at it twice before leaping.

The hon. member for Jacques Cartier has just declared, in contradiction to what the member for Elgin has said a moment ago, that there was no conspiration. The member for Elgin says : They are conspirators. Who is to be believed ? When in doubt, there should be no condemnation.

When I see that the accusers themselves do not agree, I cannot help having serious doubts. One says white the other says black. If there has been conspiration, then I ask where is the fraud? I have no need to remind you that fraud must not be presumed. Who has proven it? Where is the witness? Is it not the accused who has to prove his innocence; but it belongs to the accuser to show where lies the culpability of the one he accuses. The proof then lies with you. If you cannot show that proof, then the accused is acquitted. What you say is not sufficient to prove that it is the truth. Where is the witness who has shown that there had been a theft or an intention of fraud, or even the existence of a false pretense? On the contrary, the intention to reimburse has been expressed at the very origin.

That the accused may have been imprudent, I concur with you in that. I belong to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. I have been present at all the meetings of this committee. I have listened to what has been said in this House. I have read all the evidence, and I say that is simply a case of imprudence that that does not transgress the independence which a member must possess. But to allege that my hon. friend for Richelieu must perforce be a thief, that he has committed highway robbery, that he has taken possession of things under false pretenses, you will read that in the 'Devoir', but it is not true. It is a doctrine which has no currency. It may be heard in partisan papers, in speeches of small importance, but it is evident that my hon. friend for Richelieu has incurred neither censure nor blame, as those hon. members of the left would fain have us believe.

Can it be said that the hon. member for Jacques Cartier, who has signed the minority report, is this time in the right? I do not mean that he is not habitually in the right. A man cannot be acquitted nor forgiven because of his intention to reimburse. There are a great many criminals in our penitentiaries who would gladly reimburse, if they could be liberated on that chance. But in these cases, it is paying after the accusation has been proved, and after sentence has been pronounced. Even if a convict would be ready to pay, that would be too late. He could thus satisfy his conscience, but for human law it would be too late.

I have some experience of it, Mr. Speaker. Every day, there are men arrested and condemned, who regret what they have done. They are always ready to reimburse what they have stolen, but it is then too late. That is the principal laid down by the member for Jacques Cartier. But we cannot proceed by analogy. In the present case, there has been neither arrest nor conviction, and everything had been paid before a complaint had been laid against him. Not a day passes, in our police courts, but that a denunciator complains of a transaction, and pretends that there has been fraud and false pretenses. What does then the magistrate? He does not deliver a writ of imprisonment. He has the accused brought before him. He asks him explanations, and if a discussion follows on the transaction the magistrate puts definitely the question and says to the individual: There has been a misunderstanding between you, you have obtained certain things under false pretenses, are you ready to return them? But certainly, will answer that individual. After that, could my learned friend get a writ against the one of whom he complains and who had no intention to steal. Never, and that is what occurs every day. Montreal is a large judiciary centre, the largest there is in our country. A great many denunciations and complaints are made there all the time. Not a week comes but justice has to intervene, and magistrates deem it their duty to settle those disputes without arrest.

The member for Jacques Cartier has declared that Mr. Lanctot's house had been painted at too cheap a price. Where is the proof of that? On the contrary, have we not, in the evidence, the proof that the full and whole value of the work has been paid? That the amount paid by the member for Richelieu has been declared by disinterested men, and men knowing something about painting, to be fully sufficient to repay the government for what had been advanced, and more. But let us say that it was not more.

I have to call into question the affirmations of those gentlemen of the left. In order to be convinced, one must need have the truth of the facts. What we have to do here is to exercise our judgment and to appeal to our experience. Now, can we conclude, as has been said, that there was a theft. Not at all. We are ready for the fray, and we can keep it up with our friends of the left benches, because we are just as experienced as they are. The legal evidence which is submitted to us does not prove the accusations which have been brought. Indeed, after having heard the eloquent speech delivered this afternoon by the hon. Minister of Justice, no more doubts can subsist. Here is indeed a talented and superior man. He has shown that the independence of parliament had not been transgressed. He has shown that as clearly and peremptorily that two and two make four.

The hon. member for Terrebonne is not sufficiently versed in law to destroy that demonstration. The hon. member for Jacques Cartier would be the only one to try it, but without any hope of success.

I say that when those hon. gentlemen came to talk of malversation, of theft and of fraud, they are not serious. They have admitted that the one they wanted to reach was the hon. Minister of Marine. Here we can have an idea of the sincerity and frankness that the member for Terrebonne has put in that declaration.

The hon. member for Jacques Cartier has pretended that my friend of Richelieu has conspired. Let us suppose it is true. Well, Mr. Lanctot is guilty. But why has he conspired? It has not been proved that there was a reward for him. Now, crime is always proceeded by a motive of gain, interest or profit which the criminal will derive or hopes to derive from his act. What was the interest of the member for Richelieu in conspiring? Conspirators do not go into that game for pleasure, they never do Mr. Speaker.

The hon. member for Grenville (Mr. Reid) has shown surprise at the accusation laid against him. He was real mad. Yet, that was only a small matter. But, when it comes to others it is a considerable affair. He has been asked several times to tell what he knew about gasoline. That was not agreeable to him. He said he paid for what he had got, because he does not admit that he got anything from the government. He has even said : You accuse me wrongfully, and you are wrong in trying to pick that quarrel with me, because I have given to the government a value of nearly three thousand dollars. How generous of him to thus give three thousand dollars to a liberal government. How is any one to believe that he has ever given three thousand dollars for a railway in which he had no interest.

Here is indeed a man whose declaration may well be called into question. A man who is at war with the Minister of Marine, whom he accuses of graft and theft. He went even so far as saying to the Prime Minister : Be careful, do not call Mr. Brodeur to the Supreme Court, that would be a disgrace.

As the hon. Minister of Justice has so well said, we are here the members sitting as judges in this cause. The preliminary inquiry, which goes on before the magistrate, has taken place before the committee. Five men have been charged to make the preliminary inquiry and to examine the facts. And when we see men having the merit of the members for Welland, Verchères and Richmond, I say to the two others : You have talent and merit, but partisanship makes you see with eyes that are not the eyes of truth, and all that because you cannot get the inquiry that you ask for. It is not fair to thus throw revenge on a member of this House, and all that because the government has not deemed expedient to grant them what they ask for.

The member for St. Anne has not dared to speak of the independence of parliament, and he had good reason for it. The member for St. Anne must have looked askance at all those who have spoken about independence, as for instance the member for Jacques Cartier.

As has been said by the member for Verchères, when that gentleman did judge convenient to leave the bench of magistrature in order to sit here as a member of this House, he had the good sense to cast his vote in favour of drawing a pension of $4,300 a year as an ex-judge, and he has done well not to broach that subject. He was unwilling to speak about independence, because he was not without reproach in that respect.

Two weights and two measures, one for friends and the other for adversaries.

I have listened with attention to what the hon. member for Elgin West (Mr. Crothers) has said. He has expressed himself without the least gentleness and without caring in the least whom he might hurt. He had said to the House that this was a fraud and that there had been false pretenses. If he had opened any book upon criminal law or our own code, he would have seen what is meant by the word theft, and then he would not have spoken as he did. How can any man pretend that there have been false pretense when there is nothing to sustain an accusation of that kind.

He has quoted extracts of two papers which have taken our defence, and particularly the Montreal 'Herald'. He has said that this was an important paper. I assert that the 'Hearld' has not then interpreted our sentiments. Besides, I must say that I have no fondness for a paper published by Mr. Walsh, who is always to be found in company with Mr. Henri Bourassa.

Mr. PAQUET. What about the 'Pays'?

Mr. LAFORTUNE. That is another case of disappointment.

Mr. Walsh bestows praise on Mr. Henri Bourassa. He is there in bad company. The 'Herald' has not then acted as a liberal newspaper should have done.

He has also quoted the Ottawa 'Free Press' What does that paper know about the evidence? What legal knowledge does he possess, that we might be prone to lay the opinion so luminously expressed by the hon. Minister of Justice. Here is a jurist whose life has been spent in the study of law. Could the publishers of those papers say the same thing? They may have acted in good faith, but I deny the legal authority of those papers. I say that they have not the necessary aptitudes nor the legal experience which would entitle them to throw blame on what has been done in the present case.

Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend was saying that Sir Wilfrid Laurier was not approving that, the intention being here to have one believe that the Prime Minister was not in full agreement with his colleagues. It is a case of one can't have too much of a good thing. They ought to know that there are no traitors among us in the cabinet; that among us all are jointly and severally liable.

The hon. member for Elgin says all the contrary to the hon. member for Jacques Cartier. He says that there has been a conspiration. This is a new attack. He also sees false pretenses. There is not a word of that in the evidence. But those gentlemen, one after the other, have a new accusation to bring forward. If they were before a jury, I am sure they would not meet with much success. They would not get many convictions. We have heard about some malcontents. I remember so well what has occurred when the hon.

Minister of Marine was dismissing men in the employ of the government in Sorel. The next day, Conservative papers were denouncing him with violence. I will repeat here to-night to the hon. minister what I have told him elswhere. His mistake has been to tolerate too long old Conservatives who are there, playing knaves to the devil. If, on March 8, 1892, Honoré Mercier has fallen from power, it was due to the traitors who were conspiring against him. I say then to the hon minister: Be firm, be just, but do not give to your adversaries an opportunity to overthrow you, that is their function, and that is what they will do on the first occasion.

The two gentlemen who have signed the minority report have no more merit, experience or honour than the three members of the sub-committee who have signed the other report. Why would we accept the minority report? Could those gentlemen have, by adventure, a monopoly of probity, merit and legal experience? They say that the evidence shows such and such a thing, and that the House is bound to accept that opinion. Their conduct does not authorize us to believe that they are worth more than the others.

According to the hon. member for Terrebonne, there should be a general inquiry into the Sorel shipyards. If the government was appointing an impartial royal commissary, he would approve him. But, in order to have a commissary who would enjoy the confidence of those gentlemen of the left, it would be necessary, I suppose, to chose him in their ranks. If he was a liberal, they would criticise and paralyze him. The choice of a commissary would have to remain with them. Otherwise, he would be no good.

According to the hon. member for Terrebonne, Pagé and Champagne are frauds, and it follows naturally that my hon. friend of Richelieu must be guilty. What a nice way of reasoning! What a fine logic! If something could have been proven, it would be very different. But there is nothing in the evidence against Mr. Lanctot. according to the member for Terrebonne, Champagne and Pagé are thieves who have delivered goods from the Marine stores at Sorel to the member for Richelieu. It appears that they have had a dog-kennel built up, a cart painted, and a sewer-drain dug up.

How terrible, a dog-kennel! It appears that a cart has been painted. Just imagine such a scandal, coming after those of the Curran bridge, the Louise Basin and McGreevy. Those gentlemen of the left benches have so long lived among scandals that they see scandals everywhere. But those scandals were precisely the reason that made them lose the power. It was because they had put under the ban of public opinion that they were forced to give up the power. They cry out to-day against scandals. They should keep quiet, because they could never find anything to equal what they have already done.

The hon. member for Terrebonne has admitted that, in themselves, those alleged scandals were insignificant, but that the question of principle was very important. Indeed they have principles. Their principle is to come back to power as soon as possible, but they will not see that day yet for a long time. And then we will see what their principles are. But we will denounce your principles.

It is very tedious to be in the opposition, when one is used to power, but those gentlemen of the left had better be comforted, because it will be at the very least 15 years before they get out of it. The public will be gracious to them only when the men he has been used to shall have disappeared and when others will have taken their place.

The member for Terrebonne has read a good many affidavits. It is an easy thing to get an affidavit 'ex-parte,' which is taken in the back-ground. But, Mr. Speaker, you cannot recall the past of any one without hearing what he has to say. The greatest criminals have the right to say to their accusers: Bring down your charges, meet me in a court of justice. But, 'ex-parte,' you could heap up lots of things against me which could not be accounted for. And why should we mention those things in this House, when they have been denied.

It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that I have answered categorically to those hon. gentlemen of the left.

I have not left anything without an answer. I noted carefully all that was said. I noticed in the first place their discrepancies, the lack of unanimity. People who are in the right necessarily agree ; truth by nature is simple and indivisible. So I note in the first place their lack of agreement and of consistency ; their lack of sincerity. I have the proof of this in the last words of the member for Terrebonne ; it is not Mr. Lanctot who is guilty ; but if we are making such a fuss about the matter, it is because we were refused the investigation we asked for. The member for Richelieu will be exonerated of all wrongdoing; he will return home carrying his head high. But I say to these hon. gentlemen, have you the right to make of the good name and honour of your fellow-members a subject of laughter ? To-morrow, on meeting him, you will be the first to extend the hand of welcome.

I shall conclude, Mr. Speaker, by saying to the member for Champlain, who is the immediate and direct cause of the wrong done to this man : You will never live old enough to make up for this, and the responsibility of it all will rest on you. He will find out that the harm done to others is very often avenged on one's own family, and if he himself is not made to pay the debt, his own people will bear the burden of it ; for the responsibility he has assumed in respect to that family is enormous, he may never be in a position to liberate himself in this connection.

I shall leave the learned member with that to ponder over, and as for us we shall fulfil our duty.

Mr. E. PAQUET. (L'Islet) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Montcalm (Mr. Lafortune) has claimed for himself the monopoly as it were of sincerity and patriotism. As to that he is greviously in error, and I for one shall undertake to look into this matter guided solely by the dictates of my conscience as a member of parliament and a citizen of Canada.

However, at this stage of the discussion, I cannot think of going over the whole ground once more and of making a thorough review of the facts connected with this unfortunate affair. I shall merely with the leave of the House, offer a few remarks and protest with all my might against the report of the majority of the committee on privileges and elections.

On March 6th, 1911, Mr. P. E. Blondin, member for Champlain, stated in the House of Commons that he had reason to believe that some varnishing and painting had been done by men in the employ, and with material the property of the Department of Marine at Sorel, for the benefit of Mr. A. Lanctot, member for Richelieu. The charge was to the effect that, in the carrying out of such work, there had been wrong-doing, abuses, frauds, and embezzlement resorted to. It was charged that the hon. member for Richelieu had unlawfully, in 1910, had men in the employ of the government to do work for his own benefit. Painting and painters' supplies, the property of the government, had been paid for out of the public funds of Canada, and the hon. member for Richelieu, it was stated, had profited thereby. The hon. member for Richelieu asked for an investigation into such charges.

On that same day, the hon. member for Richelieu acknowledged that, in the year 1910, he had had some painting done at his house by the men in the employ, and which supplies the property of the Department of Marine at Sorel; but that he had paid the salaries of the men and the cost of the supplies. There is one important point in respect to which the whole committee agreed; and it is this, that such work done for the benefit of a private citizen, was done outside the knowledge of the Department of Marine, of the superintendent or deputy superintendent of the yards at Sorel.

In thus endeavouring to protect the property of the government against one of his fellow-members and the men in the government's employ at Sorel, my hon. friend from Champlain has fulfilled a patriotic duty. He is entitled to the gratitude of the people for having thus endeavoured to do away with abuses which are a humiliation for parliament, degrade the dignity of parliament and tend to make fraud and embezzlement rampant among public servants.

The committee was entrusted with the task of determining in what measure the hon. member for Richelieu, in his capacity of representative of the people, was affected by the charges and revelations of his colleague from Champlain.

The supporters of the government have not given expression to the slightest regret in connection with the wrong-doing, the abuses and the frauds, the existence of which nobody dares deny. They have got out a report which grievously pains those who are intent on doing away with the worst frauds committed in the handling of the people's money. Let us look into some of the facts.

It appears from the evidence that work was done at the house of the member for Richelieu at the expense of the government and by men in the government's employ.

True, Mr. Lanctot refunded in November and December last the salaries paid to the painters and the cost of the supplies; but it is a crying abuse that a great public administration should be transformed into a private undertaking for the benefit of a private citizen or a member of parliament. However, the majority of the committee have not a word of blame for the hon. gentleman from Richelieu.

In the yards at Sorel, Mr. L. G. Papineau, superintendent, and Mr. H. A. Terreault, deputy superintendent, are exclusively empowered to order any work. The hon. member for Richelieu acknowledges Mr. Papineau's powers; nevertheless, in Mr. Papineau's absence, he applies for men and supplies to officials in the employ of the government who are without authority and have not been empowered by their superior officers to comply with the wishes of the member for Richelieu. The latter gentleman gets painters and supplies. Mr. Papineau spends the summer at Sorel, but Messrs. Lanctot, Pagé and Champagne, abstain, as guilty people, to apprise him of the work being carried on at Mr. Lanctot's house. In so doing was not Mr. Lanctot attempting to procure men and supplies outside the knowledge of the authorities.

If Mr. Lanctot was anxious to obtain men and supplies from Mr. Papineau, why did he apply to Mr. Pagé previous to March 29? Why did he call on Mr. Pagé previous to calling on Mr. Papineau? Why did he not apply to Mr. Terreault, deputy superintendent? The hon. member for Richelieu is a barrister. He is acquainted with the law, and is aware that servants such as Messrs. Pagé and Champagne have no right to lend men or supplies the property of their employers without the knowledge and consent of the latter. Such action has brought about the falsifying of the pay lists for the Sorel yards, the falsifying of the accounts of the Department of Marine, and the infringement of all rules relative to the relations of chief and subaltern in the yards there. All of these transactions are clandestine. Why did Messrs. Lanctot, Pagé and Champagne go secretly about it? From June until November the people's money was used to pay for work done on behalf of the hon. member for Richelieu. What a sorry lesson of righteousness given to the people of Canada. Official publications do not supply us with any information enabling us to know with certainty that the amount reimbursed by Mr. Lanctot corresponds to that paid out on his account by the government. We have to rely on the word of men who falsified the pay lists. Is that satisfactory? However, the majority of the commission did not have a word of censure as regards the member for Richelieu. According to the report of the majority, Mr. Lanctot paid full value. On the other hand men have sworn that accounts had not been faithfully rendered to the Department of Marine. Thus, Alfred Douaire, painter is recorded as having worked only 18 days at the Lanctot house, while he swears he worked there for eight weeks. His evidence is supported by that of Henri Proulx and by that of Alfred Thibaudeau. However, the majority of the committee entirely lose sight in their report of the evidence of that honest man. Questioned as to his reasons for having this work done by men in the employ of the government, Mr. Lanctot stated, among other things, the lack of available help. Now, the evidence shows that there was at the time, at Sorel, other painters which were not in the employ of the government and who would have been in a position to do the work at the house of the hon. member for Richelieu. Some of these painters even applied for the job, but were refused.

In answer to Mr. McDougall, Mr. Cartier, painter, stated: 'Mr. Lanctot came to me at the place where I was working—I was painting a house for Mr. Baril—and I applied for the job right there.'

Mr. Payette stated under oath that he was in a position to paint the house of the member for Richelieu. Such facts have no meaning in the minds of the hon. gentlemen making up the majority of the committee.

In 1910, Mr. Lussier, merchant at Sorel, got painters in the employ of the government and paid for them. Why did not the hon. gentleman follow the example of that citizen? In spite of evidence as to facts of the most grievous character, the majority state that the charges made by the hon. member for Champlain have not been supported. According to their report, Mr. Lanctot, in dealing with employees of the government which he supports, to his own advantage and to the detriment of the public, has not done anything contrary to the dignity of his office. What an example of dishonesty set out before the eyes of young Canadians!

That is a new easy-going principle enabling the servant to dispose of his master's property. Fortunately that obnoxious principle is condemned and repudiated by the newspaper men of the old liberal school.

I shall read the following extract from the majority report of the commission.

(Text.) Your committee feel in view if the very serious nature of the charges made that they should express an opinion on the propriety of Mr. Blondin making the charges in the manner he did. Your committee do not wish to state that Mr. Blondin did not believe there was truth in the allegations, or that he did not act from a bona fide belief in their truthfulness, but the committee think that before making so serious a charge against an honourable member of the House of Commons, he should have made some independent inquiry to verify the truthfulness of the charges made and, which he apparently did not do. The Minister of Marine was called as a witness. His evidence as to this is on page 189 where he says he had information that no fraud had been committed and that all labour supplied by the shipyards had been paid for and all material supplied had been returned and which information he would have been pleased to give Mr. Blondin had he applied for same.

Your committee think that if Mr. Blondin had made these inquiries he would not and should not have made these charges.

(Translation.) My friend from Champlain has fulfilled his duty with prudence and enlightened patriotism. The member for Richelieu, the Minister of Marine and the Prime Minister of Canada had long been aware of the facts which were brought to the attention of the House on March 6. As far back as December 5, 1910, the hon. Minister of Marine had in his possession statements of a very important nature. At the time, men in the employ of the government were charging one another with thefts and graft. Cases of fraud and embezzlement were being ventilated. Why did not the hon. member for Richelieu and the hon. Minister of Marine make a clean breast of the whole matter previous to March 6?

How can the government newspapers and their supporters in this House decently cast aspersions on the hon. member for Champlain, when it is known that Sir Wilfrid Laurier, on January 18 wrote in the following terms to a staunch liberal at Sorel, Mr. Albert Thibodeau?

Dear Sir,—In answer to your letter of the 16th instant, I have the honour to inform you that if any wrong doing has been carried on at Sorel, it is not the intention of the government to prevent such facts from being made public, on the contrary. Should there be any information in your possession, or in the possession of anybody else, as to what has been going on, the greatest latitude will be given you to make such facts known in the manner you think fit to do so.

Such words justify my hon. friend from Champlain.

Why did not the hon. Minister of Marine on March 6, show the lawfulness of the conduct of the member for Richelieu? Had he not at the time an exceptional opportunity for defending the hon. member? Let us be candid about it. The hon. minister entrusted with the honour and dignity of this department, was unwilling to take upon himself the responsibility of refusing an inquiry. He agreed to it, no doubt, as the best safeguard under the law against abuses and frauds. In granting this inquiry, he joined hands with us towards effecting a work of justice.

The supreme tribunal condemns with the utmost severity the men who favour by their silence administrative acts which smack of fraud and theft. We are called upon to pay taxes. However, the majority of the commission were not big enough to condemn abuses and show their gratitude towards the member for Champlain who has thrown light on a system of frauds bearing heavily on the country's finances. Their verdict does not contain even a gleam of hope for those who are anxious that grafting officials in the service of the State be done away with. They have only insults for a member who is unwilling to grant his protection to offenders against the common law. A little more, and the majority would have dubbed with some high sounding title the hon. member for Richelieu, together with Messrs. Pagé and Champagne. A little more and that majority would have branded as an unworthy citizen the member for Champlain who concerned himself with the interests of the Canadian people.

Important documents, solemn declarations were handed to my hon. friend from Champlain by respectable citizens. He would have betrayed his mandate by remaining silent, and the hon. member for Champlain is no traitor. The majority of the committee have whitewashed the hon. member for Richelieu. I refrain from congratulating them in this connection. At this very moment, independent newspaper men, whether Liberal or Conservative, unhesitatingly condemn the verdict of the majority of the commission. They refuse to cast aside the principle that public funds should be applied exclusively to public ends.

Here is what I find in a good liberal paper, the 'Witness,' in its issue of April 7, 1911:

All the same, the evidence, though severely restricted, has been largely read, and people have formed their own opinion of government as carried on in Canada, and find it very hard to understand the exculpation given to the administration of the shipyard at Sorel. It is time the Marine Department was turned inside out. It is, we are repeatedly told, about to pass into the hands of a new chief, a man of action and in more robust health than Mr. Brodeur. If this be true, Mr. Lemieux has a task before him that will make or mar him.

(Translation.) Then we have 'La Patrie' of April 6, 1911:

Now, government supporters, who necessarily have the upper end whenever the committee come to a decision, after conscientiously looking into the facts, which in any case are undeniable, pronounced this judgment, which will remain as a monument in the history of this country:

(1) Mr. Lanctot is exonerated from all blame.

(2) There is no exception to be taken to the system in vogue in the shipyards at Sorel, to lend to all comers men and material which are government property and paid for out of public funds.

(3) One thing only should be condemned; that is the charge brought forward against Mr. Lanctot; one man only should be frowned upon, that is Mr. Blondin whom the majority of the committee condemn most severely.

We believe that the parliament buildings never before witnessed such a farce.

On April 20, the 'Herald,' unable to control any longer its indignation expressed itself as follows in an editorial entitled 'The shoe on the wrong foot.'

(Text.) He seems to be content to prove that he paid for the painters' time and replaced the materials used on his place. He does seem to recognize that it was unworthy of him as a member of parliament to arrange with subordinate officials, without the knowledge of their superiors on the spot, even, to have men working for him whose services were all the time being charged to the Crown and presumably apportioned against some work that had been ordered by parliament. If Mr. Lanctot cannot see the unworthiness of that, he ought to be in some other role than that of a Liberal party leader. Certainly no government, Liberal or other, can be maintained in this country on the principle that its supporters in parliament are justified in such enterprises.

(Translation.) It is generally known that the 'Herald,' the largest English liberal organ in the metropolis of Canada, is the organ of the hon. Minister of Agriculture. The latter gentleman is aware that I have towards him feelings of great respect, on account of his honesty and his untiring industry. He cannot doubt of my sincerity.

According to 'La Patrie' that editorial of the 'Herald' has caused a profound sensation. It is the legitimate and undisguised condemnation of the conduct of the hon. member for Richelieu.

It is interesting to read the following extracts from 'La Patrie,' of April 21:

It is an objectionable means of forwarding the interests of a party to approve doings of its members which the law and mere common sense show to be worthy of condemnation.

If the Committe on Privileges and Elections had, while granting to Mr. Lanctot the benefit of attenuating circumstances, condemned the abuses which the investigation clearly showed to have been committed, public opinion might have approved their stand.

But by obstinately closing their eyes to abuses, by even giving evidence of boldness and stupidity to the point of censuring Mr. Blondin for having drawn the attention of the House and the country to such facts, the majority of the committee have discredited themselves in the eyes of the country at large, and merited the condemnation even of liberal members.

I shall quote further an extract from the organ of the liberal party in this city. The 'Free Press' published the following on April 25:

(Text.) But what he should have done the moment the charge was preferred against him was to have resigned his seat and appealed to his constituents for re-election. He could then have been re-elected by acclamation; whether he could do so now is another question.

Where a member of a party in the control of the public business places himself, wittingly or unwittingly, under the penalties of the parliament Act there is only one course open for him to take, and that is what Mr. Lanctot should have done.

For him to now ask a majority of the House of Commons to excuse his fault is to ask many of them to cancel their own records, and we do not believe that they will do so.

If Mr. Lanctot has committed a breach of the parliament Act, his is the offence.

Why should the Liberal party as a whole accept any share of his blame?

(Translation.) I am glad to say so, Liberal papers give evidence of a spirit of fairness which overrides the judgment of the majority of the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Conservative members of the committee aforesaid did not wait for the expression of such feelings of indignation to condemn the hon. member for Richelieu. They have assumed a patriotic duty and risen above mere considerations of friendship to condemn the deeds of Mr. Lanctot. I heartily approve of the report of the minority, and, if the House will allow me, I shall read the conclusions of that judgment which will surely be sanctioned by public opinion:

(Text.) It is our conclusion from the evidence that Mr. Adelard Lanctot, a member of the House of Commons, knowingly and unlawfully did procure the employees of the government of Canada to do certain work for him and on his behalf in the year 1910, he then being a member of the said House, and by collusion with the servants of the government did procure the payment of such labour by and out of the public moneys of the Dominion of Canada for his own purposes and benefit, without lawful right and contrary to the public interest.

That he did furthermore, knowingly and unlawfully, cause and procure certain materials, the property of the government of Canada to be delivered to himself for his own benefit and use, he then being a member of the House of Commons, and with such intent and purpose did collude and contrive with the servants of the Dominion of Canada to whom the said materials had been entrusted for use in the works of said government to so deliver the same to him by unlawful misappropriation, contrary to their duty and obligation to the government and contrary to law and the public interest.

And further it is our conclusion that the said Adelard Lanctot, by the acts and proceedings aforesaid, did infringe the independence of parliament.

(Translation.) That investigation of a decidely narrow scope has brought to light what is possibly a mere sample incident in the management of the government yards at Sorel.

Is not the government property in that city in the hands of officials unworthy of the confidence of the Canadian people? There public servants have transgressed the most commonplace notions of equity. Their moral responsibility is not so great if they are the unfortunate victims of that political pressure which bears as heavily as lead on the shoulders of all throughout our province.

The hon. Minister of Marine confines building materials, goods and the management of men in his department to the care of officials who have falsified entries in the public records. And if the House, approving of the principles of the majority of the committee, refrains from condemning the abuses found rampant at Sorel, and censures the patriot anxious to cut out the diseased parts, then, will not these officials commit to-morrow deeds still more obnoxious.

According to the solemn declaration of Mr. D. Peloquin, several men in the employ of the government at Sorel, charge one another with stealing cement, timber, iron, paint and particularly the time of government men who are sent out to do work for private parties while drawing pay from the government. Within the last two years, the government must have lost at Sorel more than $50,000 on account of frauds and thefts.

It would be an easy matter to obtain numerous statements giving evidence of graft and thefts at Sorel. As stated in 'La Patrie'.

Public rumour points to a large number of schemes still unrevealed, whereby building materials and other goods belonging to the shipyards have become the property of private parties without the government being paid for them. Following on the evidence taken under oath, it is imperative that a thorough investigation should be made into the inside management of the yards at Sorel. It is a matter of doing away with thefts, and the voice of consicence should just now be heard in preference to that of the petty interests of political factions.

I attach the greatest importance to these remarks of 'La Patrie'.

The Minister of Marine cannot hope to appease the fears and suspicions of the people by entrusting officials of his department with the task of carrying on an investigation in this connection. Our national life suffers from abuses, thefts and dishonesty in the handling of public funds.

The government should appoint a Royal Commission to thoroughly overhaul the management of the Sorel yards. Confidence in the Department of Marine should be restored by finding out who are the wrongdoers and punishing them for their crimes. But let us not strike the men who are courageous enough to point out abuses and thefts. It is not a secret inquiry I am asking for, but rather a public investigation, for publicity is the terror of criminals.

Mr. P. E. BLONDIN (Champlain) (Translation) : Mr. Speaker, I shall be brief, not wishing at this late hour of the night to give my opponents an opportunity of charging me with a further offence, that of prolonging the debate. I regret that the right hon. Prime Minister should not be in his place, as I would have liked to put to him a question which can properly be answered only by himself ; and I cannot refrain from expressing my surprise at the indifference shown by the right hon. gentleman in respect to this debate ; I wonder whether pangs of conscience have not tardily induced him to abstain from playing a part in the criminal farce which is going on here just now.

The hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries is bold enough to insinuate that I should have made inquiries from him before making these charges. To this my answer will be very brief. He was in the House when I made my charges. Since he had in hand, according to his contention, the proofs of the innocence of the member for Richelieu, why did he not then rise in his seat and make known these proofs? I would have withdrawn my charges and an investigation would not have been required.

But Mr. Speaker, that contention of the minister's is merely blundering and trickery on his part. The evidence has shown that, even had the minister been willing in good faith to carry on with me a private inquiry, he would not have discovered anything ; for they had been very careful to cover up all their tracks, and the books which we might have looked into would not have supplied any information, for they were falsified. I challenge the minister to contradict me when I say that even at the present time he is not in a position to carry on a thorough investigation, the documents having been destroyed and the books falsified.

I realize that I am not to discuss the evidence, the facts, or the report of the committee in this case wherein I stand as one of the parties, but I wish to protest with all my might against that part af the majority report which reflects on me personally, and attempts to make me play the part of the guilty party in connection with this inquiry.

The political bias of the hon. gentlemen supporting the government, their blind and vicious partisanship has prevented them from seeing for themselves the stupidity of the course they took in an effort to show me in a bad light ; but public opinion voiced in the newspapers throughout the country, to whatever party they belong, and even in some of the most influential of the liberal organs, has finally recalled these hon. gentlemen to a sense of decency and caused them to pass silently over that shameful part of their report.

This eveniug not a single one of them dared to make reference to that part of the report; they remained silent as they are all ashamed of it, and have heard the whole country condemning them; and these same gentlemen who yesterday were threatening to eject and lynch me, have no longer a single word of condemnation, and stupidly keep their mouths closed while I throw out to them from my seat the expression of my contempt.

The supporters of the government have exerted all their efforts, their eloquence and their intellectual resources, to throw a red herring across the trail, with a view to inspiring sympathy on behalf for the member for Richelieu, and restricting this whole debate to a petty question of dollars and cents. But they will not succeed in misleading the honest common sense of the Canadian people; they will not mislead this clear-minded, far-seeing and honest judge, who, long before the ridiculous attempt of to-night, severely condemned the member, the department and the methods which I denounced. Let these hon. gentlemen opposite make up their minds that this question by far surpasses all of them, from the smallest to the greatest; it implies the most important of our principles of government, that of the integrity of parliament and the honour of the nation. That is the true scope of this debate; and it cannot be reduced a single inch.

Let those who listen to me and stare at me from the government side, listen to this: I have for Mr. Lanctot all the sympathy and all the regard which a member of this House owes to a fellow-member; I have for hon. gentlemen on the other side, as well as on this side, all the respect which they are entitled to, but let me say one thing: whenever that sympathy conflicts with my bounden duty, I shall not hesitate for one moment to sacrifice it and trample it under foot; and whenever they stand between me and the fulfilment of my public duties, as well as the dictates of honesty and of my conscience, they may rest assured that I shall run them down without any compunction.

And if they will allow me to repeat it, it is not here a matter of discussing Mr. Lanctot, or the Liberal party or anybody else in this House, but solely the good management of public affairs and the honour of the nation.

An hon. member who has to do with criminal matters in the district of Montreal, the member for Montcalm (Mr. Lafortune), has attempted to play on the emotions of hon. members, in the midst of the stupid things making up his farcical speech; he hurled at me maledictions, omens of ill, as an old-time sorcerer might have done, and called on me to make amends for the tears for the shedding of which I am to be held responsible. He forgot for a moment—an unusual occurrence—the position he is entrusted with. Appearing from day to day, as he does, before the criminal courts, on behalf of the Crown, to have all offenders punished, what would he answer were I to ask him to make amends for all the sorrows he thus causes from day to day, he who is constantly arguing for the imposition of penalties, corporal punishments and even the capital punishment.

Now, I am aware that the right hon. Prime Minister will be here shortly and that he will vote in favour of the motion to whitewash the member for Richelieu. May I request of him to state to the country if, in so voting, he means to condone in every respect the conduct of the member for Richelieu, and whether he intends to inform by to-morrow the thousands of public servants, the representatives of the people, the public men who will read the report of this debate, and whether he wishes to have it repeated in all the homes and families throughout the country, that it is a lawful thing to embezzle the public funds and property for the benefit of individuals, and whether he is ready to throw the august mantle of the Prime Minister of Canada to cover up such wrong-doing, provided the moneys which have been taken are subsequently returned?

House divided on amendment (Mr. Monk).

Amendment negatived.

Main motion agreed to on same division reversed as recorded.

Mr. PARDEE. The hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries, the hon. member for Stormont (Mr. Smith) and the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Talbot) have not voted.

Mr. BRODEUR. I am paired with the hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Haggart).

Mr. TALBOT. I am paired with the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Owen). I would have voted against the amendment.

Mr. SMITH (Stormont). I am paired with the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Lancaster). I vould have voted against the amendment.

Mr. BLONDIN.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER moved the adjournment of the House.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). What business will be taken up to-day?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Bills, and, if we have time the reciprocity discussion.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Not the Bank Act?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. No.

Mr. PERLEY. It would be convenient to the members on this side if they knew which particular Bills would be proceeded with.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. All Bills with the exception of the Bank Bill.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 4.42 a.m., Friday.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

FRIDAY, April 28, 1911.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I deem it my duty to call attention to an article which appeared yesterday in the Toronto 'Telegram,' in which direct reference was made to me. The article is a long one, and I need not read it all. It will be sufficient to read the matter which has reference to my name. The article proceeds to say that on the 2nd of March this letter was addressed to me:

My Dear Sir Wilfrid,—I see that you are having troubles of your own by the defection of the 'young Napoleon' on the trade question and in other ways. The other ways are the more serious. Only in one instance in the history of Canada has the trade question played a part in making or unmaking a government, and that was in 1878. Even then, as you will know, there was contributory negligence on the part of the government.

Clifford Sifton's defection on the present occasion will not count against your government. He is a squeezed lemon politically, and without patronage, controls no following.

Neither your government nor any other government will fall, except from weakness on the inside. That was what happened to the Tories in 1896. Ministers of the cabinet had become corrupt and the McGreevy-Langevin scandal, aided by the Manitoba School Bill and cabinet crookedness, did the rest. Recently evidence had come to me that one of your colleagues is a grafter and a boodler. I shall be in Ottawa for a few days, and am willing to submit the evidence to you as Tarte was willing to submit his evidence of the Langevin-McGreevy boodling to Sir John Macdonald. Should you see fit to take immediate action it would go no further. The alternative would be to place the document, letters and photographs of cheques, &c., in the hands of the opposition.

On the receipt of that letter, I instructed my secretary to send the following communication to the gentleman who wrote it:

Ottawa, March 3, 1911.

Dear Sir,—I am instructed by the Prime Minister to inform you that he will be in his office at 10 o'clock to-morrow, Saturday morning, and ready to see you.

Yours very sincerely,
E. J. LEMAIRE,
Private Secretary.

The gentleman in question waited on me, as stated in the rest of the letter, several times. Without committing my memory as to the number of times, I know it was more than once, but the tenor of each conversation between us on these occasions was of the same nature. The gentleman in question, with whom I had in former years friendly relations, but with whom I have not been in communication for many years, called on me and gave me the name of one of my colleagues and said that he had lost the confidence of the party, particularly in his own province, that he was a boodler and a grafter, and for these reasons should go out of the government. I said that I had no reason to doubt the honesty of my colleague, who was not only a colleague but a personal friend, and that I would not accept the alternative he mentioned, namely, 'should you see fit to take immediate action it would go no further; but the alternative would be, to place the documents, letters and photographs of cheques in the hands of the opposition.' I stated to my informant that I would not take any such action as he suggested under such terms, that I had the fullest confidence in my colleague, that I believed in his honesty, and that if it were shown that my confidence were misplaced, he would have to take the consequences. My informant was free to take such steps as he pleased, to place the papers and documents in the hands of the opposition and do anything he pleased with them. If my colleague were then proved to be dishonest, he would have to take the consequences, but if not it was my duty to stand loyally by him. This is the gist of any conversation that took place between us. This is the position I take and I leave that position in the hands of parliament and the country.

THE IMPERIAL CONFERENCE.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I would like to inquire of the right hon. the Prime Minister what his intentions are with respect to attendance at the approaching Imperial Conference and Coronation?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I may say that I deem it my duty to attend the Conference, not only because I have been invited, but because in the last Conference in 1907, the permanency of the Imperial Conference was assured. It was decided that it should meet every four years and be attended by the Prime Minister of Great Britain, the Colonial Secretary, the Prime Ministers of the self-governing dominions, and such members of the cabinets as should be selected. It is now over six weeks since I have taken my passage on the Virginian to sail on the 12th of May, and it is my intention to sail on that day unless prevented by public business. I have come to the conclusion that should my presence here be required, as indeed there is every indication it may be, it will be my duty to forego the privilege of attending the conference. My first duty is to Canada, but I still hope that nothing will prevent my sailing on the 12th of May.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). In order that our own position on this side may be made quite clear, I now move the adjournment of the House for the purpose of discussing the subject which my right hon. friend has just alluded. I am very happy indeed to concur in the hope which he has expressed that he may be enabled to attend the approaching Imperial Conference. As we all know, it was originally designated as a Colonial Conference, and in its original idea consisted of the Prime Ministers of the self-governing dominions and the Colonial Secretary or some other member of the British government. The Prime Minister has referred to the circumstance that the conference was made permanent in 1907; that is entirely correct. But there was a further change made. It became an Imperial Conference instead of a Colonial Conference in its designation; and while the Prime Minister of each of the self-governing dominions is necessarily a member of the conference, other members of the governments of the various dominions who previously were admitted purely on suffrance, have now become members of that conference when so designated by their respective governments. It is quite true that the vote is by government, that is, each government has one vote, as I understand it; but nevertheless, other designated members of the governments of the various dominions are admitted, in addition to the Prime Ministers, to full rights as members of that conference. The present constitution of the conference is set forth in a resolution which was unanimously agreed to by the Imperial Conference of 1907. I will read a portion of the paragraph which relates to the constitution of this conference.

That it will be to the advantage of the empire if a conference, to be called the Imperial Conference, is held every four years, at which questions of common interest may be discussed and considered as between His Majesty's government and his governments of the self-governing dominions beyond the seas. The Prime Minister of the United Kingdom will be ex-officio president, and the Prime Ministers of the self-governing dominions will be ex-officio members of the conference. The Secretary of State for the Colonies will be an ex-officio member of the conference and will take the chair in the absence of the president. He will arrange for such imperial conferences after communication with the Prime Ministers of the respective dominions.

Such other ministers as the respective governments may appoint will also be members of the conference—it being understood that, except by special permission of the conference each discussion will be conducted by not more than two representatives from each government, and that each government will have only one vote.

Now the House will observe that the Prime Minister of Canada is ex-officio member of that conference, he is the only member of this government who occupies that position in the conference. I need not dwell upon the importance of the position of the Prime Minister in the latter day development of parliamentary institutions, both in the mother country and in the various self-governing dominions. The development of those institutions has been along very much the same lines, whether in the mother country, in Canada, Australia, or New Zealand. One feature of the development of parliamentary institutions in modern times has been the increasing power of the cabinet as distinguished from that of parliament, and within the cabinet, the increasing power, importance and influence of the Prime Minister. It is perfectly obvious, therefore, that the presence of the Prime Minister of Canada is entirely necessary at the approaching conference, if this country is to be represented as it should be represented in that conference. In his absence, no definite or important action can very well be taken; it will be a question of reference to the Prime Minister after the conference is over, and in my humble opinion the absence of the Prime Minister from the approaching conference would be a blow at the continued existence of this great factor in the solution of Imperial problems. Now the Prime Minister has alluded to possible reasons of public urgency on account of which it is within the bounds of possibility that he will not be able to attend that conference. It is quite true that we have matters of very great importance pending before parliament at the present time; it is equally true that we on this side of the House do not see eye to eye with hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House with regard to one matter of very great moment which is now occupying the attention of parliament and of the country. It is only right to say in passing that the particular subject to which I allude is the proposal of the government for closer trade relations with the United States of America. These proposals were not introduced into this House until the 26th day of January last, nearly two and a half months after the session had opened and parliament had commenced business.

Now, there are three courses which would permit the Prime Minister to attend the approaching Imperial Conference. If the present session of parliament should not have come to a conclusion at the time when it will be necessary for him to leave, he could proceed to the conference, leaving his colleagues in charge of the business of the House; that is one alternative as to the desirability or expediency of which I am not so good a judge as the Prime Minister himself. I frankly concede that that is a matter upon which it is his right, his duty, to exercise his own judgment. In the second place, he can bring the session to an end, leaving some of these very important matters unfinished and letting them stand over to another session. It has already been intimated to us that the Bank Act will not be pressed at the present session. If that is to stand over to another session, there can be no particular reason why the proposals for closer trade relations with the United States should not also stand over until another session. I do not wish to enter into any controversial observations with regard to that, I only mention it as another alternative which is open to the Prime Minister in that regard. Then in the third place, he can adjourn this session of parliament for two or three months, or whatever length of time may be sufficient to enable him to attend the Imperial Conference and the coronation. After the coronation and after the conference, the session can be resumed; and I desire to say now that for the purpose of facilitating public business we would be prepared to give interim supply to such an extent as the public interest would demand, in case the Prime Minister should see fit to follow that course.

So far as reciprocity is concerned, I have already stated that we do not see eye to eye across the floor of this House. Our own attitude with regard to that is one of uncompromising opposition, for the reason that we have no doubt that the results of these proposals, if they should be carried into effect, would be disastrous, not only to Canada, but to the empire. I am not uttering that as a controversial observation, but merely for the reason that I desire to make our attitude perfectly plain.

Then in addition to the Imperial Conference, there is another great occasion which will occur in the month of June, on the 22nd I think, that is the coronation of his most gracious Majesty King George V., an occasion of great importance, not only to the mother country, but to every dominion of the empire; and I would say in conclusion that in my opinion it would be doubly regrettable if Canada were not represented at the coronation by the Prime Minister of this country.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I entirely agree, and everybody will agree, that under existing circumstances, under the present conditions to which the British Empire has attained, the Imperial Conference having been adopted as a permanent feature of our relations, it would be unfortunate that any of the Prime Ministers of the self-governing dominions should not be present at that important event. If it is not possible for me to attain to that, the fault will not be mine. My hon. friend (Mr. Borden, Halifax) has been kind enough to make several suggestions which would allow me to go to the conference, but each involving this principle—that it must agree with the view of the opposition. He offered three alternatives. The one thing that separates us, apparently, is the trade agreement with the United States. The hon. gentleman has stated that he and his friends offer an uncompromising opposition to that agreement. I may tell him that on this side we offer an uncompromising support of this agreement. He thinks it would be a bane to Canada and a possible danger to the empire. We think it would be a boon to Canada, and the danger to the empire we do not regard as serious. What I have in mind which may force me not to go on with my present plan of attending the conference is this: As I stated more than six weeks ago I obtained my passage. It never occurred to me at the time that there would be any possibility of my not going. But, Sir, since that time rumours have come to us which have been afloat about the corridors of this House that the opposition will not allow this measure to go through. It is well known that the rules of this House are the old rules of the British House of Commons in 1867. Those rules then were not abused. But in Great Britain abuses arose; the rules were taken advantage of by a minority to block legislation which, in the view of the majority, was necessary for the good government of the country. So, I would like to say, it is in the power of the opposition here to block legislation almost indefinitely. I have said that it has come to us that the opposition have such an intention. The corridors have been full of these rumours. I have not paid any attention to these rumours, nor have I attached any importance to them. But I have in my hand the report of a speech delivered yesterday in the city of New York by one of the most important members of the opposition in which we are told practically that the opposition will not allow this agreement to be carried into effect. That is what the hon. member for East Hastings (Mr. Northrup) said yesterday:

> The government of to-day in Canada has introduced the measure into parliament. It therefore stands pledged to carry it and if it fails, it loses the reins of power, which will be taken up by its opponents. You can therefore easily understand how strong is the feeling of the supporters of the government even though they disapprove of the measure, to consider it the lesser of two evils and to vote for it rather than vote the government out.
> It is therefore altogether probable that, if the government can force the measure to a vote, it will be carried. On the other hand the opposition can, if it sees fit, probably prevent a vote. There are 300 items which will give opportunity for illimitable discussion. We have already granted supplies up to the first of June, but money cannot be spent for public purposes unless first voted by the parliament. If we would decline to pass further estimates, the public treasury would be emptied on the first of June. Public officials would have to borrow instead of receiving their salaries and public works would be at a standstill. This, of course, in any event, would be only a last resort not to be adopted unless considered absolutely necessary; but at the same time every one will admit that if the opposition felt that any measure was of such tremendous importance as to seriously affect, perhaps directly, the future history of our country, it would then be justified in refusing to grant any supplies or pass the measure until there had been an appeal to the people.

I do not know how far the hon. member for East Hastings has the right to speak for the opposition, but if I am correctly informed he is voicing the decision of the caucus held only a few days ago. If such be the temper of the opposition, I think it will probably make it necessary for me to resign my determination to go to England, and stay in Canada.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I desire to make just one or two very brief observations in reply to what the Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) has said.

Mr. SPEAKER. Any hon. member who wishes to speak should speak now, for under the rules of the House, the leader of the opposition (Mr. Borden, Halifax) speaks to close the debate.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). The Prime Minister has alluded to the fact that he took his passage six weeks ago, and he intimated some surprise that the conditions to-day are not what he expected at that time they would be at this date. At least that was the impression I took from his remarks, and I do not desire to misquote him. If, in making that statement he alludes to the debate which has been proceeding from day to day for some time upon the proposed trade agreement with the United States, then I would like to inform him that hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House have been taking their turn in that debate, and have had their fair share in it. Although I have not taken the trouble to compute the columns of 'Hansard' that have been occupied by the two sides of the House respectively, I venture the statement that if the right hon. gentleman were to make such research, he would find that as much of the time of this House had been taken up by his own supporters as by hon. gentlemen on this side.

Some hon. MEMBERS. More.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I am corrected by hon. gentlemen beside me who say that more time has been taken up by hon. members on that side of the House. I do not need to go that far; I say that up to the present time the debate has proceeded regularly on both sides of the House, and there was no occasion for the Prime Minister to make what I regarded as an insinuation in expressing surprise that the debate has been so protracted. I would like to say to him further that he did not meet in a very gracious spirit what I regarded as a pretty fair and even generous offer on my part. I said to him that we would consent to the adjournment of this House for two or three, or four months, in order that he might have the opportunity to attend the conference, and the coronation. But I said something more; I said that we would consent to grant such interim supply as would provide for the public necessities of the country in the meantime, and until the session could resume. And the only answer to that offer, is an insinuation from the Prime Minister, and a quotation from some newspaper containing an alleged report of remarks by the hon. member for East Hastings (Mr. Northrup). Well, it does not strike me that that is exactly the spirit in which such an offer should be received.

I would like to quote to the Prime Minister from the observations of his own Minister of Finance in 1907 when this same question was to the fore. The hon. Minister of Finance said:

> There are duties to Canada which can best be performed in Canada, and chiefly in the parliament of Canada; but there are also duties to Canada which can be performed in other parts of the world, and notably in the capital of the empire.

I think this is an occasion when the Prime Minister of Canada might have regard, not only to trade relations with the United States, but to trade relations with this great empire to which we belong What are the subjects which are to be debated at the conference? They are some eighteen in number.

> Merchant shipping and navigation laws.
> Cheaper cable rates.
> All-red route.

A special object of consideration by the right hon. gentleman.

> Imperial Court of Appeal.
> State-owned Atlantic cable and telegraph lines across Canada.
> Imperial representation.
> Commercial co-operation for the encouragement of British manufactures and shipping.
> Emigration and the position of labour exchanges.
> Co-operation between the naval and military forces of the empire and the status of Dominion navies.

There is also the subject of naturalization, although it is suggested that the question of uniformity of naturalization laws is essentially a technical one, and as such may more properly be remitted to a committee of the full conference sitting as a subsidiary conference. Nevertheless, that all-important subject of naturalization is one which should command the attendance of the Prime Minister of Canada in order that the anomalies which now exist, and which exercise a disintegrating influence upon this empire, may be removed at the earliest possible moment.

The Prime Minister suggests the importance of this trade agreement with the United States. I am willing to concede that from his point of view. We, on this side of the House, entertain a precisely contrary view, and, under the privileges of parliamentary institutions in this country, we are entitled to the full expression of our view, and we propose to exercise that right. We have been told by ministers of the Crown that the honour of this country has been pledged to the President and government of the United States of America in connection with that agreement. Well, I do not propose to deal with the controversial aspect of that question except to say that I do not know when the people of Canada gave any mandate to the Prime Minister or the government of this country to pledge the honour of Canada to these proposals. But, I would like to say to the right hon. gentleman that if the honour of this country is pledged to the United States in respect to this matter, it is also pledged to the empire in respect to all the matters which I have just enumerated. It would seem to me that the question which must present itself to the Prime Minister is whether or not our trade and other relations with the United States of America are more important in his mind than our trade and other relations with this empire of which we form a part. I have made an offer to him which is as reasonable an offer, I think, as could be made by any man standing in my place, under which he can attend the Imperial Conference, and go on with his determination, if he persists in it, to force these reciprocity proposals through this House. I have made that proposal to him for two reasons; because I know that his trade proposals appeal to him, but, on the other hand, because our relations to the empire and the importance of Canada's representation in the Imperial Conference appeal to us on this side just as strongly, and more strongly than his trade agreement appears to him. Therefore, conceding to him his right to attempt to force this agreement upon us by his majority if he is in a position to do so, I assert that, without any interference with that right, he would also be able under my proposal to charge, as Prime Minister of Canada, the duty which he owes not only to this country, but to the empire as well so long as he continues to act in that capacity. Under these circumstances, Mr. Speaker, I trust that the Prime Minister will reconsider the intimation which he gave in the concluding portion of his remarks and that Canada, at the approaching Imperial Conference and at the Coronation as well will be represented as it should be represented by its Prime Minister.

Motion to adjourn negatived.

DISTRIBUTION OF SEED GRAIN.

On the orders of the day being called.

Mr. HERRON. I wish to draw the attention of the hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher), and I had hoped also that of the hon. Minister of the Interior (Mr. Oliver), but I am sorry to see that the Minister of the Interior is not in his seat, to a matter that has come to my attention in connection with the supply of seed grain to settlers in the Northwest. I received a communication to-day from a settler in my constituency complaining of the quality and cost of the seed grain supplied by the government to settlers in that vicinity. I have here a sample of the wheat which was supplied, and I suppose that the sample would be one which would appeal more particularly to the Minister of Agriculture. I have also a complaint with reference to the price. As I understand this grain is supplied through the Department of the Interior, and their officials in the Northwest, and the complaint made to me is to the effect that this wheat, laid down at Gleichen, a station on the main line of the Canadian Pacific railway near Calgary, at a cost of $1.25 per bushel is of a rather inferior grade, and from my own knowledge of wheat, grading and price, I would say that it would grade probably No. 2 Northern, and not more than that if it was clean which it is not. It is tainted very badly with weed seeds. I am not capable of judging whether they are of the noxious kind or not, but I presume they are. The wheat is mixed very badly with weed seeds. For the last two or three years wheat of this quality has been sold at the stations in the locality where this wheat is supplied at 75 cents, or at the most, 80 cents a bushel. It seems to me that this is entirely too much to pay for that quality of seed wheat. My correspondent has not given me very full information regarding the seed. Whether it was purchased in Manitoba, or in some of the western provinces, or in Ontario, I have no means of judging. But I think that the two points which I have mentioned, quality and price are worthy of consideration. I shall be glad to hand over the sample to the Minister of Agriculture, and see if he would not consider that it was very injurious to the interests of the Northwest to have seed of that quality supplied and distributed among the farmers of that country. I think the Minister of the Interior would be justified in investigating closely the price charged because, as far as I am capable of judging, it is much above the standard price.

Mr. FISHER. As this seed is distributed to the settlers with whom the Department of the Interior is in close touch, the whole work in connection with the distribution is managed by the Department of the Interior. I have not, therefore, the information at my command at the moment to reply to the hon. gentleman, but I would be very glad if he would let me have a sample of the seed he has, and I would consult with my colleague, the Minister of the Interior, and investigate the matter.

FISHERIES ACT AMENDMENT.

House went into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

Resolved, that it is expedient to provide that the Fisheries Act, chapter 45 of the Revised Statutes, 1906, be amended by enacting that in the province of British Columbia no one shall engage in the manufacture of oil or other commercial products from sea-lions, hair seals, sharks or dog-fish, nor operate a salmon cannery or salmon curing establishment, except under license from the minister; that the site of reduction works must be approved by the minister; that operations must proceed within one year from issue of the license for which annual fees shall be required; that the annual fees for a lobster fishing license be increased and based on the total number of pounds of canned lobsters; that the annual returns to the minister by the owner or manager of a lobster factory, through the inspector of fisheries of the district, shall furnish more details and be submitted not later than the 31st day of May, each year, and penalties for failure to make such returns shall be imposed; and that licenses must be obtained for maintaining lobster pounds, with an annual fee for the same.—Mr. Brodeur.

Hon. L. P. BRODEUR (Minister of Marine and Fisheries). In this resolution we first ask for a provision authorizing the government to enact that in British Columbia no one shall engage in the manufacture of oil or other commercial products from sea lions, hair seals, sharks, or dog-fish, without taking out a license from the department. This has been asked by some people who are willing to take up that industry. So far nothing has been done with regard to the reduction of sea lions and similar mammals. I think we should encourage any person or company willing to start works for the purpose of destroying those mammals, which are a menace to the food fish generally. It has been suggested to us that such a thing could not be done unless we could establish regulations by which the reduction works could be established at a certain distance, one from the other, in order to give each factory an area large enough to ensure a catch which would maintain the reduction works. We have now similar legislation in regard to the whale fisheries, no whale reducing works may be established within a certain distance of an existing reduction works. By having power to license reduction works we can at the same time determine the area within which they may fish and the distance at which other works may be established. This legislation has worked very satisfactorily in connection with the whale fisheries. We are now asked to apply the same regulations to reduction works on the British Columbia coast for the handling of sea lions, hair seals, sharks and dog-fish. The fee proposed is a nominal one, $1. I think there should be no objection to that proposal.

The second proposal is to authorize the government to impose a license upon salmon canning or salmon curing establishments. Some years ago we had in British Columbia a very extensive commission which inquired into the whole question of fisheries in that province. That commission recommended that the salmon canning establishments should be licensed, and the owners of these establishments have themselves asked for the imposition of a license. The license fee proposed is $50. This license is the result of the unanimous recommendation of the commission, and it is accepted, as I have said, by the cannery establishments themselves.

The other change is with regard to the annual fee for lobster fishing establishments. This proposal is the result of the report and recommendation of the Committee on Marine and Fisheries last year. Lobster fishing licenses were the subject of a great deal of discussion in the maritime provinces. For years there were complaints that the regulations were not sufficient and that amendments should be made. The House referred the whole question to the Committee on Marine and Fisheries. The committee sat during the session of 1909. A very long inquiry was then made by the committee, and they suggested to the government that during the recess a commissioner should be appointed to visit the different portions of the maritime provinces and continue the investigation, securing especially the evidence of the fishermen. Dr. Wakeham was appointed to make this investigation. He went through all the maritime provinces and made a report, which has been submitted to the Committee on Marine and Fisheries. The committee at the end of last session recommended some changes in our regulations. These changes have all been carried out by an order in council passed in September last, which was amended some months later with regard to a certain feature. The commission recommended the increase in the licenses which I am now proposing.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). To what extent is the industry of manufacturing oil from dogfish carried on?

Mr. BRODEUR. In the maritime provinces we have dog-fish reduction works exploited by the government at three places. But in the province of British Columbia there are to-day no dog-fish reduction works, properly speaking.

Mr. CROSBY. Will the minister give us some information with regard to the dog-fish reduction works in the maritime provinces—how they are carried on, what is the general result, and under whose charge are they being conducted?

Mr. BRODEUR. In the maritime provinces there are three places where dog-fish reduction works are being carried on—Canso, Shippigan and Clark's Harbour. At each of these places we have an establishment under the control of a superintendent. We purchase the dog-fish from the fishermen, and from them produce two by-products, oil and fertilizer. The fertilizer is offered for sale at a very low price to the farmers, and any balance that is left is advertised for sale. The same procedure is followed with regard to the oil, which we sell at the price offered to us.

Mr. TAYLOR (New Westminster). Is it the intention of the department, after this system is introduced, to offer a bonus for the establishment of works for the manufacture of oil as it did for the establishment of the fertilizer works?

Mr. BRODEUR. We are not proposing any bonus, because we hope that the people who are willing to go into the business may make it a success, as in the case of the whale fisheries.

Mr. TAYLOR (New Westminster). The reason I ask is that it is very essential to the prosperity of the fisheries in British Columbia, particularly those in the vicinity of the Fraser river, that such works should be encouraged. The sea-lions particularly are increasing there to such an extent that the object which the minister has in view will not be accomplished if there are only one or two of these reduction works, or if the work is carried on on a limited scale with the idea of making a profit for the proprietors rather than with the idea of giving the utmost freedom in the reduction of these pests to the salmon fisheries. If the hon. minister had the authority, he might do as he has done in the case of the salmon fisheries, so restrict the number of licenses as to create a monopoly, which has not operated to the best interests of the industry. I would like to hear the minister say in this connection that he will not restrict the number of these places, but that subject to the proper regulation every person who wishes to engage in this industry shall have an equal chance with every other person.

Mr. BRODEUR. I agree with my hon. friend that it is very important that some of these reduction works should be successful, as these dog-fish and sea-lions are a great nuisance to the salmon fisheries. The intention of the department is not to restrict these establishments in such a way that there would not be a sufficient number of works to deal with all the dog-fish that might be found in some localities. I know that in the locality my hon. friend has mentioned this pest has caused considerable disturbance to the salmon fishery, and I am willing to take the necessary steps to encourage any establishment for its reduction.

Mr. TAYLOR (New Westminster). This clause refers also to the licenses of the salmon canneries and salmon-curing establishments. Does it differ in any respect from the present regulations governing the salmon fisheries?

Mr. BRODEUR. Not at all. There was some doubt as to whether or not it would be necessary to have regulations to authorize us to collect these sums, and this is to give us power for that purpose.

Mr. FOSTER. Are the dogfish on the Pacific coast similar to those on the coasts of the maritime provinces?

Mr. BRODEUR. Yes, they are supposed to belong to the same species.

Mr. FOSTER. I understand that scientific authority as well as individual taste have decided that dog-fish is an excellent food. Of course the finest way of getting rid of dog-fish is to make it a popular article of diet, so that fish dealers and fish eaters will be spurred to activity to exterminate the species. The times change in that respect; a few years ago the suggestion to eat sword-fish would be treated something like a suggestion to eat the swords themselves, but sword-fish to-day is a somewhat luxurious food and sells at a high price. Dog-fish are most disreputable looking animals when you see them, and when you put them through a process which is not curative, they are worse than ill looking; but if dog-fish are good to eat you have solved the problem of their continued existence. Has the minister made any efforts to educate public opinion up to getting dog-fish off the index expurgatorius and put on the edible list.

Mr. BRODEUR. I understand that efforts were made some years ago to can dog-fish, but those engaged in the industry put them on the market labelled as whitefish, and although we had no legislative authority to prevent that we discouraged it, in the fear that it would compete with the excellent whitefish of the Great Lakes, and give our excellent whitefish a bad name. I should mention, however, that the intention of those who engaged in the trade was not to sell the dog-fish in Canada, but in a foreign market. Since we have established dog-fish reduction works to make oil and fertilizer, the fishermen who formerly disposed of dog-fish for canning find a ready market for it at the reduction works, and that no doubt has some influence on the discontinuance of the experiment.

Mr. FOSTER. I would suggest to the minister that you might almost as well hang a man as give him a bad name, and when you set up a public enterprise for turning dog-fish into manure no decent Christian wants to have anything to do with a fish that seems to be fit only for that particular purpose. I would suggest that the minister should change the name and call it, say, Pisces Canadensis, and start it off with some fair chance of making a success of itself. Has the minister himself ever eaten any dog-fish?

Mr. BRODEUR. No.

Mr. FOSTER. I have no doubt the minister is prejudiced against it because it is called dog-fish, and you might just as well call it some other name because no one wants to eat dog if he knows it. The scientists say it is a fine fish and it teems in our waters. Why, if you were to see a shoal of dog-fish after you, down off Grand Manan, you would run more quickly than if you were in the Niobe with a hostile fleet chasing you. The minister should, I think, take away the bad name of the thing and give it a start in life, or rather in death.

Mr. BRODEUR. Dog-fish is of course inferior as compared with our other commercial fishes, and being destructive of the superior fish we started reduction works to make some economic use of the dog-fish and to diminish their numbers.

Mr.FRASER. Did the whitefish suffer in competition with the dog-fish?

Mr. BRODEUR. No. The whitefish is a product of the Great Lakes and is not found on the Atlantic coast, so that there was no competition between them. But the canned dog-fish were put on the market under the name of whitefish.

Mr. FRASER. Not by the department.

Mr. BRODEUR. Oh, no; quite the contrary. Some one started in the maritime provinces an establishment for canning dog-fish and they labelled it as whitefish.

Mr. FOSTER. I really think the minister might arrange it in this way: There are practically no whitefish in the maritime provinces. There are a few in some of the lakes, but they are not a commercial quantity. If a fisherman goes up through the lakes and spends a fortnight, he may get enough whitefish to feed him for that time. These fish can never compete with the whitefish of Manitoba, nor would they be likely to compete with the whitefish in Ontario. But let the minister give them some other name—say: 'Sea Whitefish' or 'Maritime Whitefish,' and let them go.

Mr. BRODEUR. But foreign countries which purchase our fish will not be able to make the distinction between sea whitefish and the other.

Mr. FOSTER. Foreign countries do not buy our whitefish.

Mr. BRODEUR. Yes, they are being sold in foreign markets—in the United States they are sold in large quantities. Besides, this is not within our jurisdiction. We have nothing in the law which would authorize us to give the fish a particular name. So far as that is concerned we have no inspection law. It is much to be desired that we should have inspection law, and that is a matter which is engaging, I understand the consideration of the Department of Trade and Commerce.

Mr. FOSTER. I would have the fishery experts make a thorough investigation of it. Let us understand the quality and see if anything can be done.

Mr. TAYLOR (New Westminster). I think if the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster) could see and smell the dog-fish of British Columbia waters the fish would lose a champion, and I do not think that by any other name it could be made to smell sweeter. For the information of the hon. gentleman I may explain that dog-fish are not regarded on the Pacific coast as valuable except by the Japanese, and they will not use them if they can get any other fish. Any measure the minister can take for the extermination of the dog-fish will be very heartily welcomed by those engaged in the fisheries, on the Pacific coast. I would like to ask, going back to the section in connection with the licenses for salmon canneries or salmon curing establishments, whether the minister proposes to make under these regulations a uniform fee for establishments of whatever capacity, or whether he has it in mind to accede to the request of petitioners to him that exception should be made in favour of establishments, curing establishments particularly, carried on in a semi-private way by one or two fishermen. I may remind him, that, as I am informed, he has been petitioned on this subject, and it has been represented to him that hardships are worked on men who wish to cure fish within their own establishments by compelling them to take out a license and pay a fee equal to that paid by a large establishment.

Mr. BLACK. Before the question of the dog-fish is passed, I would like to say a word or two on behalf of that fish. I have had some experience with the dog-fish on my own table and in other homes. I consider the dog-fish one of the best edible fishes we have. Its flesh is fine in appearance, and is of excellent taste, comparing, I think, with the salmon. There is nothing against the dog-fish except its very nasty name, given to it by some ignorant fishermen. It is a bad thing to have a bad name, as some people know, and its bad name is the only thing that I know of—except its lack of beauty—that is the matter with the dog-fish. I have had it served to guests at my table without letting them know what it was; and after receiving high encomiums on its taste I have told them it was dog-fish—and then they were sorry they had breakfasted. But we have no better food fish in our waters, in my opinion, than the dog-fish. Its liver is very valuable for the production of oil which is equal to cod liver oil for medicinal purposes, and its yield is to cod as five to one. The odour of the oil of the dog-fish liver is bad, but that odour is very easily taken out, so that dog-fish liver oil and cod liver oil cannot be distinguished one from the other.

Mr. FOSTER. I would like to ask a question. Am I right in thinking, in reference to the oil taken from the dog-fish, that it is not suffused through the flesh of the animal, but is in the liver?

Mr. BLACK. I have never noticed any rank taste in the flesh. It is an oily fish, but the oil in the liver is not that in the flesh. If it was not for the name, it would be a food fish, there is no doubt. It is something like our Intercolonial railway, which was named by foreigners before confederation, a railway between 'the colonies' of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Quebec—'don't you know'—and the name has stuck to it ever since. I am afraid it has been a hoodoo to it all along.

Mr. BRODEUR. In answer to the question of my hon. friend from New Westminster (Mr. Taylor), it is not our intention to fix different license fees for different sorts of canneries. The fee of $50 seems to be a very small one, and I think could be paid by all the canneries that will be established.

Mr. TAYLOR (New Westminster). I think the minister does not understand. I referred to the inclusion of salmon canning and salmon curing establishments in the same sentence. I speak particularly of salmon curing, which, as the minister knows, is different from canning. A man may carry on salmon curing in his back shed, but not salmon canning. I know the case of a man who attempted to carry on salmon curing in his own premises on a domestic scale, simply by his own labour, and was confronted with a demand for a heavy license fee, the same as if he had a large commercial establishment. It is on behalf of the salmon curer that I was appealing to the minister, and I think his case is deserving of consideration.

Mr. BRODEUR. This is the first time, I think, that the matter has been brought seriously to my attention. I will look into it and see if it is desirable to make the changes to meet the cases mentioned. But I believe the hon. gentleman will admit with me that it is important that we should have some control over these establishments, and the only way we can do it is by license.

Mr. TAYLOR (New Westminster). That is correct, but it is a hardship for these men who have facilities for curing to be told that they must not carry on this operation unless they pay a prohibitive license fee. I would like to refer again to the restriction of the number of establishments. I understood the minister to say that it is not the intention to make any change in the present regulations as to salmon canning. If I understand it, there is a restriction in the number of salmon canning licenses, which works out in this way—the men presently engaged in the salmon canning have formed themselves into an absolutely close corporation and no person aggrieved by the operations of the combine can start any new establishment, because when he applies for a license he is informed by the local officials that the policy of the department is to give no more licenses. The department takes the ground that it is not to the advantage of the industry to have a greater number of canneries. While an argument may be made on that score, yet the minister will see that when, in the only field of production of this class of salmon, he limits the licenses to persons already having canneries and licenses, he creates a monopoly. I would like to ask him whether he is prepared to make his regulations more elastic, and to consider each application for a license on its own merits, without regard to whether or not that man has been in the business before.

Mr. BRODEUR. My hon. friend will see by the regulations we have passed on regard to the canneries that the public is absolutely protected. If there was any suspicion, or any ground for a monopoly by which the fishermen could be in any way affected, of course we are authorized to issue other licenses. But it was represented to the commission, when the commission sat in British Columbia, that the number of canneries which were then existing on the Fraser river especially was large enough. I do not know whether that is correct, my hon. friend is more familiar than I am with the condition of affairs there. He can tell the committee whether he thinks the number of establishments there is sufficient or not. At all events, that was the report made by the commission, and as a result we acceded to the request that no more licenses should be given, on one condition, namely, that if we found that there is a strong suspicion of a monopoly existing, we will certainly exercise the power we have of giving new licenses in order to prevent a monopoly which would be detrimental to the industry itself.

Mr. TAYLOR (New Westminster). The minister doubtless knows that at present there is a monopoly, whether bad or ill, I will not discuss now; but there is an absolute monopoly of the salmon canning industry in British Columbia, allied with the Alaska salmon canners, thus creating an industry protected on all sides by the government that is, perhaps the most profitable industry in connection with fisheries any where in the world. The profits are very large, very easily and quickly made, and with very little risk. I know that the fishermen are subjected to injustice on the Canadian side because of the existence of this monopoly. We think we are superior to the United States in the matter of monopolies and trusts, but they must yield the palm to us in connection with the salmon fisheries. On the Washington side the monopoly is not so complete, as there are quite a few of what are known as independent canneries, which are always available to fishermen who wish to sell their catch to them. The effect on the Washington side is to make the price to fishermen very much larger than it would be otherwise. I do not think that any person except those making financial profits by this operation would suggest to the minister that the fisheries are protected in any way by restriction in the number of licenses to be issued, and there is no reason to suppose that there would be any greater number of fishermen, or any greater quantity of salmon caught, if there were more canneries than there are at present. I do not suggest that there are not enough canneries to can all the fish to be caught along the Fraser river, because it is the work of a very short time to duplicate or to increase to an indefinite quantity the capacity of any cannery. But since no new person can get a canning license, the minister fosters a monopoly which works detrimentally to the men who ought to get whatever benefit may be legitimately derived as their reward for catching the fish.

Mr. BRODEUR. I am surprised to hear that there is a monopoly in the Fraser river. My hon. friend is aware that so far as the Fraser river is concerned, there is an association called the British Columbia Packers' Association which is a very large one. I do not know whether it is successful financially.

Mr. TAYLOR (New Westminster). They are getting on very well indeed.

Mr. BRODEUR. I always understood that of course they are controlling a very large number of canneries on the Fraser river, but there are also some independent canneries. I do not know whether the independent canneries are as large as those under the control of this association.

Mr. TAYLOR (New Westminster). The independent canneries to which the minister refers are largely the work of Scotch capital. The independent packers' and the British Columbia Packers' Association are combined in another association called the Fraser River Canners' Association, which includes both the British Columbia Packers' and those he terms the independent canners.

Mr. BRODEUR. My hon. friend says that all those canneries are in that association.

Mr. TAYLOR (New Westminster). They are all in the Fraser River Canners' Association.

Mr. BRODEUR. That is not the information we have in the department.

Mr. TAYLOR (New Westminster). They control the buying price and the selling price.

Mr. BRODEUR. The information we have in the department is to the effect that there is a British Columbia Canners' Association, and outside of that an independent canneries, and of course the general association of which my hon. friend speaks, the Fraser River Canners' Association. The information we have in the department is to the effect that all the canning establishments of the Fraser river are not included. I am glad the hon. gentleman has brought this matter to my attention, and we will look into it.

Mr. TAYLOR (New Westminster). I would like to make it plain to the minister that the Fraser River Canners' Association is not an investing association at all, but it is an association in which the British Columbia Packers' Association, the great organization there, combined with the independent canners under the name of the Fraser River Canners' Association, with their separate officers.

Mr. BRODEUR. I thought the Fraser River Canners' Association had disappeared, and became merged into the British Columbia Canners' Association.

Mr. TAYLOR (New Westminster). No, it is the other way about. The British Columbia Packers' Association was organized with Toronto capital, by Henry Doyle, seven or eight years ago. Outside of that, the canneries controlled by the Bell-Irving interests have continued to exist, and there is also the St. Mungo cannery on the Fraser river, established by Scotch capital, and which never sold out to the British Columbia Packers. But they are all joined to form the Fraser River Canners' Association, with a paid secretary and an office in Vancouver. From that central office all these canners fix the price at which they will buy and sell their salmon. They are allied with the Alaska Packers' Association and with the operators of the canneries on Puget Sound. The proprietor of several canneries on Puget Sound is the manager of the British Columbia Packers' Association. The minister will see that there is an absolutely close ring—I was going to say, but that is regarded as an offensive term.

Mr. BRODEUR. Cordiality.

Mr. TAYLOR (New Westminster). Yes, an absolutely close association so that they can impose whatever condition they like upon the fishermen as respects the price of fish, and the quantity to be taken. That is another point which might well engage the minister's attention.

Mr. BRODEUR. Who is the secretary of this British Columbia Canners' Association?

Mr. TAYLOR (New Westminster). My last information was that it was Mr. W. D. Burdis, of Vancover. He has been secretary of the Fraser River Canners' Association for several years. I have not heard of any change.

Mr. BRODEUR. The information we had in the department was that Mr. Burdis was secretary of the Fraser River Canners' Association, but that it had changed its name to the British Columbia Canners' Association.

Mr. TAYLOR (New Westminster). Was that this year?

Mr. BRODEUR. About a couple of years ago.

Mr. TAYLOR (New Westminster). I got a circular from them last year and my information is certainly direct up to the close of last year. They have an absolutely close buying and selling combine. It is well known to all engaged in the business out there. Another way that the minister's kindness to this monopoly affects the fishermen is this: When there is more than the ordinary run of fish our fishermen are absolutely prohibited from getting any advantage from that by the limitation placed by these canners upon the number they will take from each boat. As the minister knows, no other canners are allowed to come in, and no other licenses are issued. There are no canneries in reserve to be opened up if there is a glut of fish. There comes an extraordinary run, and every man out fishing will receive 500 or 600 fish in his boat, but when he goes to the cannery wharf he receives notice, and it is the same with every cannery, that the managers have placed a limit of 200 to each boat. That means that they can sell 200 to the canners and must absolutely destroy the other 400. The fisherman cannot even throw the fish into the river because that is against the law.

Mr. BRODEUR. Could he not sell them to the independent canners?

Mr. TAYLOR (New Westminster). There are no independent canners because they are all in this buying and selling combine. On the American side he can sell them to the independent canners, but on the Canadian side he can not. The result is that the fisherman is at the loss of all these fish, and the community loses this valuable product which has to be destroyed because of the regulation of the canners. That goes on every season, and it is the cause of very great heart burning to the fisherman that after he has made an exceptionally large catch he finds that he is deprived by his government of any opportunity of selling the fish he has caught.

Mr. BRODEUR. That is a matter over which we have no control except by way of granting new licenses. We have the power to grant new licenses. If we found that the Fraser river could stand more canneries, and that fishermen were obliged to destroy their fish we would be willing to consider very seriously the granting of new licenses. But, as to the refusal of some of the canners to take more than a certain quantity of fish, that is a matter over which we have no control.

Mr. GOODEVE. Granting for the sake of argument that there is absolutely no monopoly, I would like to hear from the minister what he considers the advantage to be in leaving to a certain number the privilege and right to enjoy a natural resource such as that of our fisheries. It is the encouragement of monopolies of that kind that starts the growth of those enormous trusts that have been of such vital injury to the United States. Not only do these monopolies exist with respect to the fisheries, but with respect to timber and all natural resources of that kind. What is the supposed advantage? Why should I not be able to go down there without any question at all, merely as a matter of absolute right under the statute, and say that I want a license, tender my money and get it? Why should ten men have the right to erect canneries, and the eleventh man be shut out in a supposed free country such as this? What are the reasons for such a regulation?

Mr. BRODEUR. These regulations have been framed upon the report of the Fisheries Commission which sat a couple of years ago, and came to the conclusion that such regulations were in the interests of the fisheries. It may be that the argument of my hon. friend would apply just as well to the case of our regulations generally, or to the restrictions which we have made with regard to the preservation of the fisheries. We adopt regulations for what purpose? For the purpose of protecting the fisheries, for the purpose of preventing the destruction of what I consider a national asset. It was represented to us that if the number of canneries was larger than the requirements of the Fraser river it would mean that perhaps at some future time, not very far distant, the fisheries there would be destroyed. This is a measure which has been adopted for the purpose of protecting the fisheries, but if the fisheries are not treated fairly by these canners, we have the power, under the existing regulations, to prevent any such injustice being done to the fishermen by granting new licenses. Every man will have to apply, and his case will be considered.

Mr. GOODEVE. The minister has not answered the argument at all. As he has said, he has made general regulations for the fisheries, and if that is so the whole country should be treated alike. In this particular case the canners already in business, and who are supposed to know the conditions advise the commission that it would be in the interest of the fisheries to adopt these regulations. Of course they give that advice, and it would be very foolish of them not to. That is the whole argument of the minister now. Then he says that if he finds that those who are in the business now are not able to take all the fish, he may consider the question of letting somebody else in. As my hon. friend from New Westminster (Mr. Taylor) has pointed out, it is an easy matter for the canners already established to enlarge, double or quadruple their capacity, and still hold the monopoly. It is not only unfair to the people of Canada, but it is the very beginning of the most vicious system that it is possible to introduce into any country. The evil of this system has been pointed out by your own Dominion Conservation Commission, and I think that one of the first duties of that commission is to direct attention to this grave danger to the people of Canada. If you take this very question now, the whole cry, from the President down, is that they, through monopoly, have practically destroyed and wasted the natural resources of the United States, and the argument of the minister this afternoon is exactly that argument. I am taking a general stand regardless of details, not going into that question at all, that it is a very vicious system whereby you allow a limited number of men to have the absolute, and sole right of such an enormously profitable industry, and a natural resource that belongs to the people as a whole, a food producer as is suggested by the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Crosby) who is vitally interested.

The hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Taylor) has made out an absolute case. I was down last summer and he had the courtesy and kindness to drive me around to see some of the canneries which were open. Some of them were closed down as it was towards the end of the season. He called my attention to fishermen coming there bringing fish and at that time, he said, unfortunately these canneries were not taking all the fish of these men, only a limited number because there were too many offering, there happened to be an extra late run, they were getting a large number of fish, some of which were being destroyed. That should not be allowed, the regulations should be absolutely general. You cannot place this industry on a par with liquor licenses where there is considered to be a certain evil and, therefore, you limit the traffic, that does not apply here. Here is a food for the people at large, a natural resource belonging to the people, and you say to a certain limited number of men, I do not care whether it is a monopoly or not, that they shall have the sole right to carry on this industry. They thus get established, they grow stronger every season, they accumulate more wealth and power to build up the very trusts which are recognized as an evil in every country in the world, and which we are endeavouring to fight against. I claim that it is the duty of the minister not only to take it into his serious consideration, but absolutely to have free trade as far as establishing these canneries is concerned. My hon. friend has made that point clear in regard to curing. He points out: Here is an individual fisherman with enterprise who by frugality and industry has got an extra boat or has been successful and undertakes to cure a few fish and start to build up an industry. That is the way we have built up all our industries throughout Canada. But immediately the regulations of the department step in and say to him: Unless you pay the full license of one of these great trust magnates, you are not allowed to cure a single fish. In other words there is a penalty on their enterprise, and the enterprising fisherman is immediately choked off. That is a fair argument. My objection to the resolution is that it takes over the power to continue that monopoly and increase it. What is going to be the advantage of a regulation giving certain ones and only certain ones a license to manufacture, for instance, this oil and not allow everybody to enter into that industry? Why have they not all the same free right? Why bring in a resolution providing for an enactment to place them in exactly the same position as you have already placed the fish canning and curing industry? In other words, you are going to make a complete monopoly of the fisheries of British Columbia. The individual fisherman cannot can or cure and now you take power to enact that no man can make oil unless he gets a license, and thus to make a hard and fast, hidebound monopoly of fishing in British Columbia. What is the ground for the proposed monopoly? The hon. member for New Westminster has pointed out exactly how it works and is bound to work on the general principle and I object to that principle because it is vicious.

Mr. BRODEUR. The principle which we adopted concerning the whale fisheries, which we are now proposing to apply to the sea-lion reduction works is based upon the experience of Newfoundland. Newfoundland some years ago started whale reduction works on a very large scale. There was no restriction at all, every one could go and catch whales in every part of the gulf, and in a few years there were the number of reduction works and the consequent fishing became so extensive that the whale fishing was practically destroyed. In order to avoid a repetition of that in Canada we thought it well to adopt this law which was passed some years ago by which we took power to license the reduction establishments for whales and to declare in the statute that a certain area of the Gulf would be practically at their disposal. Reduction works were established at Seven Islands on the north shore. We would not then allow license to another establishment within 100 miles of Seven Islands. Of course if one was established beyond 100 miles they would have the right to go and fish any place in the Gulf, but that was a restriction that prevented the destruction of whales and promised good financial results to the reduction works themselves. In spite of that protection it was found in a few years that this establishment which was licensed at Seven Islands was not a success financially and it had to close. I am informed, however, that it will likely be reopened very soon. If we had permitted at that time every company to go there and carry on the fishery there would have been no success financially, and besides that we would have destroyed the whales, although, of course, it is not of great importance that the whales should be destroyed On the British Columbia coast there are companies or a company which is applying for permission to reduce sea-lions, hair-seals and sharks. This company is willing to go into business, but they say that if they start business in a certain area then in a few years, when they have made a success, some one else may establish himself alongside of them and they may lose the capital invested. Consequently they ask us to establish regulations by which reduction works would not be established in the same area so that the same thing would happen as in the Gulf. It is thought that with some restriction the companies will likely be successful. This is a new industry which would not be started unless they had this protection which they are seeking. I think it worth while to give them an opportunity to start these works. That is the reason for the policy we are now introducing.

Mr. GOODEVE. I cannot see why the principle of the survival of the fittest should not apply there as in the general trade and business of the country. The minister himself said that even when they granted this restriction in the case he named, the industry was not a practical success. He seemed to think that might yet be made a success. There should be a general regulation so that every man would have an equal opportunity. If you insist that it is in the interest of the public to give monopolies of this kind, then you must, to be logical, and in order to secure for the fishermen fair value for their labour, regulate in some way the prices in connection therewith—in other words, regulate the trade. That has certainly not been done, and the neglect to do that leads to the evils that we see on every hand. I do not think that any man who has studied the question fails to realize that the creation of monopolies of this kind has brought about very great and evil results, and that is my chief objection in a general way to this resolution.

Mr. BRODEUR. When my hon. friend applies the word 'monopoly' to the legislation now proposed, I must tell him that that expression is absolutely uncalled-for. The regulations will provide that the licenses shall be for every 50 miles of coast. As there are about 7,000 miles of coast in British Columbia, that certainly could not be considered as a monopoly. So far nobody has been willing to go into the business; but some enterprising men are willing to go into it. It may be a failure or it may be a success; we do not know; but they ask us to give to them the same regulations as we are giving with regard to whales, and we think their request is a fair one, and is not to be considered as one for a monopoly.

Mr. GOODEVE. I am not saying that the resolution itself is a monopoly, but I say that it may lead to a monopoly. I am only pointing out that that has been the practical result in similar cases, in order to warn the hon. minister of the great danger of legislation of this kind, and that it must be very carefully considered. If he finds that there are sufficiently logical reasons advanced for it, then he should be careful to hedge it about with other restrictions and regulations that will protect the general public and the fisheries themselves. I think the hon. member for New Westminster has laid down the basic principle, which is that the actual producer, and not the manufacturer, if I may use that word, is the one we must protect. It is the million fisher-folk in the North Sea that makes the fisheries valuable there, and it is the fisher-folk on the Pacific coast that we should carefully protect.

Mr. BRODEUR. The preservation of the fish too.

Mr. GOODEVE. Yes, because without the fish we would not have the fisher-folk. But the great danger is that in protecting the fish you may be protecting men whose interest is to become a trust or a monopoly as against the fisher-folk.

Mr. BRODEUR. We have the same regulations in British Columbia with regard to the whale fisheries, and so far we have not had sufficient applications for licenses to cover the whole coast.

Mr. TAYLOR. (New Westminster). The minister mentioned a certain application that had been made to him for permission to go into this industry. I would like to know if he has given any promise to those people that no matter who else is refused a license, they will get one.

Mr. BRODEUR. I never made any such promise.

Mr. TAYLOR (New Westminster). They are going it blind, then?

Mr. BRODEUR. Yes, they are going to apply if this legislation is passed.

Mr. TAYLOR (New Westminster). And the minister feels in honour bound to give them a license?

Mr. BRODEUR. Yes.

Mr. TAYLOR (New Westminster). Then the minister creates a monopoly at once.

Mr. BRODEUR. Not at all.

Mr. TAYLOR (New Westminister). Because if you have 7,000 miles of coast line in British Columbia, and one license is allowed for every 50 miles, the minister will not contend that each 50 miles throughout the whole province is of equal value to every other. There must be a choice. For instances, so far as the dog-fish and the sea-otter are concerned, a site that would be infinitely more valuable than any other would be one at the mouth of the Fraser river. Surely the minister has some order of value of these sites. If there are a dozen applications, those persons to whom he has already committed himself will get all the valuable sites, and the rest of us who want to take part in this industry will be told to go away off and choose locations where there are no fish. I think the minister will see that he has told the committee too much, because these regulations are actually laid down to suit certain interests who have promised to go into this business. I think the minister should promise that if he issues these licenses he will put them up to competition so that everybody will have a chance. The Minister of Marine and Fisheries controls only his own department; but as a member of the government he has to do to a certain extent with other departments, and if he will assure us that regulations of this kind will be acceptable throughout all the departments, that might make a difference to some of us. For instance, I know I have a sympathetic listener in the Minister of Inland Revenue, and I would appeal to him. He and I are engaged in the same business, that of producing newspapers. We are bothered by the fact that as soon as we get our business established, some other fellow comes into the field and starts another newspaper and cuts down our profits. Besides the extraordinary size of some of these papers is having an appreciable effect on the supply of pulpwood. If the Minister of Inland Revenue could assure us that he would apply to the Department of Trade and Commerce or some other department, or take authority to limit the number of newspapers, so that we might make whatever profits we chose to make, we might look with a more kindly eye on the proposed fishery monopoly. I do not say that we would; but we are all human, and if the minister should tempt us in that way, there is no knowing what might result in the way of softening our opposition to this proposition. But, joking apart, if the minister is going to limit the number of these licenses, he should advertise for tenders for them.

Mr. GOODEVE.

Mr. BRODEUR. If two applications were made the proposition of my hon. friend might be very well considered, but we have never had more than one application and this did not refer to the Fraser river which my hon. friend does not consider a good place for dog-fish, or sharks, or sea-lions. I do not know a good site would be found at the mouth of the Fraser river, but if an application comes from there it will be considered. My hon. friend from New Westminster (Mr. Taylor), will find that as in the case of the whale fisheries, everybody will be fairly treated and no favouritism shown.

Mr. TAYLOR (New Westminster). What is the present position of the lobster fisheries in British Columbia?

Mr. BRODEUR. We have no lobster canneries so far in British Columbia.

Mr. TAYLOR (New Westminster). This resolution merely anticipates that there will be lobster fisheries in British Columbia?

Mr. BRODEUR. It refers to the Atlantic coast, but of course it is a general law for the whole of Canada.

Mr. TAYLOR (New Westminster). That is what it is intended to be, but I understand the English language and the resolution only applies to British Columbia.

Mr. BRODEUR. The Bill itself will remove any doubt on the point.

Mr. CROSBY. I have been struck with the logic of the arguments advanced by the hon. gentleman from British Columbia. The minister stated there were about 7,000 miles of coast line in British Columbia, and that he intended to grant a license for each 50 miles. Of course, there must be extents of that coast where it would not be worth while placing a factory in 500 miles for any kind of fishing, and the location of a factory must depend on the conditions as to fishing, &c. The fact that you have 7,000 miles of coast would not at all indicate that you would have one applicant for each 50 miles. If an application can be had to establish an industry on that coast would it not be fair to specify a limited time, say three years, for the monopoly, if it is to be a monopoly.

Mr. BRODEUR. It is only one year.

Mr. CROSBY. That would relieve the difficulty somewhat. I understood the minister to say that in Newfoundland they have restrictions on the whale fisheries?

Mr. BRODEUR. I said quite the contrary, and I believe that is why several reduction works have had to be closed.

Mr. CROSBY. When the whale fisheries were first established on the Newfoundland coast and the Newfoundland-Labrador coast, some of those engaged in the industry earned as high as 150 per cent, and some of course earned nothing. People should have an unrestricted opportunity of going into that class of business if they desire to take chances, and I do not think the government need worry itself much about that. The success of the business will depend on the experience, and on the brain and energy that is put into it. When the whale fishery was first established in Newfoundland people were rushing into it with their money just as into a gold mining enterprise, and the chances of gain or loss were about the same. Some became rich, and some lost.

Mr. BRODEUR. What percentage became rich?

Mr. CROSBY. Some of the Scotch firms that went into the business did well and others failed to succeed. The whale business is not now as profitable as it was because the fish are not now so plentiful as they were formerly. The resolution says that the annual fee for lobster fishing licenses shall be increased and based on the total number of pounds of canned lobsters. I did not know that there was any charge previously for a lobster fishing license.

Mr. BRODEUR. The existing legislation provides that the license fee shall be $2 per 100 cases or packages or fraction thereof.

Mr. CROSBY. I know that, but what I said, was that I did not understand the lobster fishermen had to get a license.

Mr. BRODEUR. Lobster establishments have. There is a difference between the lobster establishment and the lobster fishermen. The lobster fisherman has no license to can lobsters—that privilege was taken away from him years ago?

Mr. CROSBY. When I asked the minister if the lobster fishermen had to pay a license, he said. 'yes.'

Mr. BRODEUR. I misunderstood my hon. friend. The lobster fishermen pays no license.

Mr. CROSBY. The resolution is wrong in that particular.

Mr. BRODEUR. The Bill——

Mr. CROSBY. I have before me only the resolution as it appears on the Order Paper, and that is what we are discussing, as I understand. This resolution speaks of curing and canning. Everybody knows there is a great difference. It is quite right that there should be a license for canning food of any kind. But I cannot see why there should be a license for curing fish by smoking, pickling, or otherwise. No license is exacted for this at the present time, and I do not see why there should be any.

Mr. BRODEUR. There has been a mistake in drafting the resolution. What was intended was the cannery license and not the fishing license, for we do not propose to compel the fishermen to pay a license. So, I would propose to strike out the word 'fishing' in the eighth line of the resolution, and substitute the word 'cannery.'

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. CROSBY. I call special attention to this question of curing fish. No license should be imposed for this, and I must strongly oppose any such thing.

Mr. BRODEUR. Under the existing legislation, section 35 of the Fisheries Act, it is provided 'no one shall at any time can or cure,' and so on. Section 36 determines the license which is to be paid for canning or curing. The two words are used, and we propose to leave them as they are.

Mr. LOGGIE. It is limited to salmon curing or canning.

Mr. BRODEUR. No, lobster curing or canning.

Mr. CROSBY. In that case, of course, the word 'curing' in this connection means nothing, for there is no way of curing lobster except by canning. But from the resolution it might apply not only to British Columbia but to other provinces. In that case, the inclusion of the word 'curing' would be of great interest to all who are interested in the fisheries of the maritime provinces or eastern Quebec, for in these places there is practically no salmon canned, it is all sold fresh, or cured by being smoked or otherwise. It would not be fair to ask the fishermen to procure a license for curing fish when the fish speaks for itself when it is presented to the customs.

Mr. BRODEUR. The first part of the resolution deals with the cannery establishments of the province of British Columbia only, and the latter part deals with lobster licenses and nominally covers the whole country, so, in practice it affects only the maritime provinces for only there are lobster canneries in existence. The first part of the resolution uses the words 'curing or cannery,' but this applies only to British Columbia.

Mr. CROSBY. If that is settled, then, I have only a word in regard to the increase of the cost of the licenses. I take it that this license is not intended as a revenue producer, but is merely a nominal fee intended to give the government practical power of regulation. Of course, the increase quoted is not very great, but still it is an increase. Behind the lobster cannery is the lobster fisherman, and the higher you make the fixed expenses of the charges of the cannery, the less the establishment can afford to pay the fisherman. I would suggest that the minister should not increase that fee if he can see his way clear to do so. Then I would like to ask the minister how far we are going to increase these licenses, and whether we are going to do as was suggested in the Marine and Fisheries Committee, and as our fishermen desire, so that a man who catches a lobster will have the right to can that lobster if he wishes. For my part I never could see how a limitation of the number of canning factories, or any other kind of factory, was going to protect the fisheries. I can understand fish in the sea being protected by limiting the number of fishermen, or by using less destructive methods of fishing; but I never could understand how the limiting of the number of canning factories was going to preserve the fish in the sea. Therefore, I stand for as free a regulation as possible regarding the canning of lobsters. I think that a lessening of the number of factories would have no effect on lessening the catch, or on the yearly production of lobsters. When the number of factories is small they frequently force a man who catches a lobster at a certain port to carry it to another port several miles away where he can ship it fresh. At the time of the change there were a number of factories located in different parts of Nova Scotia, and no doubt in Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick, which, when this regulation came into force, simply closed up some of their factories, and said to the fishermen: If you want to sell your lobsters you must bring them to Charlottetown, or you must bring them to Canso, or you must bring them to Yarmouth. Therefore, the lobster fisherman was handicapped from the fact that competition was not keen enough. My hon. friend whom I see opposite is a canner of lobsters, and he knows what a nice thing it is to have that privilege exclusively. I do not blame him for that, but I am speaking for the mass of the fishermen generally. I do not forget the canner altogether, but he is quite able to take care of himself.

Mr. BRODEUR. I may tell my hon. friend that the monopoly he speaks of—

Mr. CROSBY. I would not call it a monopoly.

Mr. BRODEUR. But the restriction which exists in regard to lobster licenses has disappeared by the regulation we have adopted. This question engaged the consideration of the Committee on Marine and Fisheries, and they came to the unanimous conclusion that the restrictions which existed until then should disappear. In the last two years I have changed the regulations in that respect, as they are only departmental regulations, and I gave the privilege of acquiring a license to a number of fishermen combining together who applied for it. Several applications were made, and have been favourably considered. I will tell the reason why the increase was made, and I am voicing the unanimous finding of the Committee on Marine and Fisheries, of which I think my hon. friend is a member. That committee unanimously recommended that, in order to afford additional protection to the lobster fisheries, we should exact a little larger tax upon the canners. I suppose my hon. friend must be pleased to see that we are imposing a larger tax upon the canners, which was the unanimous recommendation of the committee.

Mr. CROSBY. I am not in any way opposed to the canner, I want him to get all the advantage he can. But I do say that if the canner has to pay $5 for a license, he is certainly going to take that out in the price he pays to the fishermen. But I wanted to know more particularly why this additional tax was put on, if it is not intended for revenue purposes, and I do not think it can be. Why should we increase it at all? I think it would be better to leave it as it was before.

Mr. BRODEUR. It was in order to give additional protection to the fisheries.

Mr. CROSBY. I have a letter from Mr. John Berrigan, in the eastern part of Halifax county, who made application for a canning license to the overseer of fisheries there. Mr. Berrigan has written to me that he had not had any response to his application for some time. Perhaps the department would know whether that license has been granted.

Mr. BRODEUR. The superintendent informs me that he has not heard of any such application.

Mr. CROSBY. I will send the letter to the minister.

Resolution reported, read the second time and agreed to.

Mr. BRODEUR moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 185) to amend the Fisheries Act.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first and second times.

POST OFFICE ACT AMENDMENT.

Mr. LEMIEUX moved the second reading of Bill (No. 104) to amend paragraph (l) of section 2, and paragraphs (n) and (o) of section 9 of the Post Office Act.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Will the hon. Postmaster General (Mr. Lemieux) be good enough to give a brief explanation of the nature of the proposed Bill?

Mr. LEMIEUX. Mr. Speaker, I have already given an explanation of the purpose of the Bill, but as it was given some weeks or even months ago, I will be pleased to repeat it. This is a Bill which will bring officially under the jurisdiction of the Post Office Department a new device called The Automatic Stamp Vending Machine. This automatic stamp vending machine has been in use in England, in Germany and in Australia for a certain number of years. I think the invention is an Australian one. The box can be well described, as it has been described by an authority on post offices in England, as a conscience stamp vending box. The reason why this box is called a conscience automatic stamp vending box is because, when you put a cent in the slot, if it is a false coin, the box rejects it. If it is not a current coin of the country it also rejects it, although it might be a good coin in the United States or in England. It is really a remarkable invention. The machine has been in use in Great Britain for a few years. It is aimed to facilitate the sale of stamps in large establishments and in post offices to prevent any rush at the wickets where stamps are sold. For instance, we have already placed in some of the post offices, at Toronto, Montreal, Ottawa, Vancouver and in some of the large hotels, some of these stamp vending machines and the results have been simply marvellous. The benefits accruing from that invention are two-fold. First of all, it prevents a rush at the wickets in what are called rush seasons. At Christmas, it may be, or at Easter, when a huge number of cards and letters is sent through the mails, the public cannot afford to wait. Secondly, it saves to the Post Office Department the large commissions which are being paid to stamp vendors. That, I must say, is a secondary consideration because after all we must expect that those who sell stamps for His Majesty must be paid a certain commission. The purpose of the amendment herein is to enable the department to place at the service of the public, as experience warrants, a device for the automatic sale of stamps. Let me take the first amendment to the Post Office Act. As my hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. Borden, Halifax) is aware a postal box in the street is, according to the Post Office Act, a Post Office by itself. It is defined as such and when we have couriers who are charged with the responsibility of carrying the mails from one office to another, it often happens that on their route they have to take the mails from one, or two or three, or five of the boxes erected on the way. This stamp vending machine can be placed in the street and in the lobbies of large hotels, like the Windsor in Montreal, the Russell in Ottawa, or the new Grand Trunk hotel when it is opened, and in all the large hotels in the country. The moneys deposited in these boxes will be collected by our couriers under certain conditions that will be imposed by the department. Subsection (l) of section 2 defines a post office to embrace any building, room, post office, railway car, street letter box, &c., and the purpose of the amendment is to give street stamp vending boxes the same status. I hope I have made myself clear on that paragraph. Paragraph (n) of section 9 of the Post Office Act empowers the Postmaster General to establish and provide street letter boxes or boxes of any other description for the receipt of mailable matter whenever he deems it necessary and the purpose of the proposed amendment is to give the Postmaster General power to establish and provide boxes for the sale of stamps or other post office supplies whenever he deems it necessary. That is in order to see that the definition of the powers of the Postmaster General cover this additional case in the Post Office Department. Subsection (o) of section 9 of the Post Office Department empowers the Postmaster General to grant licenses, revocable at pleasure, to agents other than regular postmasters for the sale to the public of postage stamps and standard envelopes. My hon. friends will know what standard envelopes mean. It happens that in the Post Office Department we sell to some large firms envelopes which are already stamped. This is in order to facilitate the business of large stores and it is very useful to the public. The purpose of this amendment is to allow of greater flexibility which will redound to the advantage of the department. These licenses, as stated in the section of the Post Office Act to which I refer, are revocable at pleasure. We wish to take away the words 'revocable at pleasure' and for this very obvious reason.

The stamp vending boxes can be purchased by the department, and placed here and there in the country; we have already purchased 50 as a trial, but our inspectors, and our superintendent of post offices, Mr. Ross, state that in certain sections of the country, especially where we have lumber camps, we may have difficulty in getting a regular post office, or even a regular agent for the sale of stamps to lumbermen. My officers say that we might well give the company which manufactures the boxes the privilege of installing those boxes in those remote sections of the country, the company to draw what commission we would pay to agents having stamp vending licenses. Of course the license will always be revocable whenever the Postmaster General, or the officers of the department find it necessary to revoke it, but the company state that they will have difficulty in establishing their business on a firm basis, if the words 'revocable at pleasure' remain in the statute. I am explaining now the three amendments connected with this new machine. I must say that in the opinion of my officers this will be a great public utility. In our cities we have established some on trial, and the results have been simply marvellous. I have here a memorandum from one of my officers:

The Automatic Stamp-Vending Machines will not only prove a great convenience to the public, but in many cases, they meet an an actual necessity. They may be placed at any point where people require stamps in considerable numbers. They can be attached to pillar boxes on the street, in the halls of hotels, at railway stations, or in public buildings, and they are always available. Where access can be had to any of these machines, no person desiring to post a letter, and having the money to buy a stamp, need go disappointed. At any hour of the day or night, at times when even the hotels or drug stores are no longer available, owing to the lateness of the hour, these machines are as ready to do business with poople wishing to post letters as at mid-day. A very great advantage is that it fits in so completely with the habits of the people as regards correspondence. It is the universal practice to put off the posting of one's letters until the mail is ready to close. There is a rush to the stamp vendors, and in spite of every willingness to sell the stamps required, the vendor is unable to accommodate many who apply to him. With automatic sellers near by, the situation is relieved for the vendor, and those desiring stamps are able to get what they want in time to post their letters to catch the outgoing mail.

In the principal cities of Great Britain they are a boon to the public. There is a single box in Liverpool that sells on the average over 2,500 stamps a week, and another in Edinburgh from which the average issued is over 2,800 a week. In the crowded business sections of London, Glasgow, Dublin and Belfast, these automatic stamp sellers are doing thriving businesses to the great advantage of the public in these great centres of population. These machines are simple in construction and not liable to get out of order. One has been in use in the British House of Commons for two years, and has worked during all that time without a single failure.

A peculiar and very valuable feature in these machines is that they reject all spurious or foreign coins without operating the machine.

In 1908, the parliament of Canada authorized the reduction of the rate on drop letters, that is, letters delivered in the city where they are posted; in cities, from 2 cents to one cent per ounce. This reduction has immensely increased the number of letters posted in our cities, and as a consequence the department is grateful for the opportunity which this device offers of serving the public better with the stamps which they want in such largely augmented numbers.

The machines have been set up experimentally in Ottawa, Montreal and Toronto, and have given the utmost satisfaction. Two were placed in the exhibition building in Toronto during exhibition week and were worked at full pitch without a hitch. These machines quite outdid the British average mentioned. On one of the exhibition days, one machine sold 1,500 stamps, while a day or two later another machine sold 3,300 within 14 hours. The British high average, it will be remembered, were 2,500 and 2,800 in a week.

Mr. CROSBY. If a man wanted to buy a one cent stamp, and put in a five cent piece, would he get back four cents in change?

Mr. LEMIEUX. No, but from my own experience I can tell my hon. friend that if you put a 25 cent piece in, the machine will reject it.

Mr. CROSBY. Then I understand that this box does not give any change, but it is necessary to have the right coin to put in the slot?

Mr. LEMIEUX. Yes.

Mr. CROSBY. What is the method of getting one of these boxes? For instance, suppose a hotel-keeper wanted one?

Mr. LEMIEUX. I intend to have special regulations for the leasing of these boxes. Of course, we must be very careful of them, because they are somewhat costly. We must for our climate have a strong metallic box, and we cannot give them away to every Tom, Dick and Harry. They are intended for the benefit of the public in large centres of population, at such rush centres as large hotels and railway stations, and also at remote points such as lumber camps, where we have no agents. I had an application from a large firm in northern Ontario for one of these boxes, and I am just awaiting this legislation in order to place them in some of the lumber camps. It may be asked why we did not adopt a Canadian invention. The officials have been examining these machines for years, and they find the British pattern far the best. It is an Australian invention, and has been adopted by the British authorities and is used on the continent in large centres.

Mr. PERLEY. Do I understand that only Canadian cents can be used?

Mr. LEMIEUX. Yes.

Mr. PERLEY. If a man put in five cents he would not get it back?

Mr. LEMIEUX. It would be returned to him, but he would not get any stamps. It is for one-cent and two-cent stamps—until the happy day comes when we shall require the half-cent stamp, as advocated by my hon. friend from Halton.

Mr. HENDERSON. I was just going to ask the minister whether he has made any provision for the half-cent stamp which we require in the towns?

Mr. LEMIEUX. Later on.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time, and House went into Committee thereon.

At six o'clock, House took recess.

After Recess.

House resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS.

Bill (No. 183) for the relief of Frances Whittington Truesdell.—Mr. Smith (Nanaimo).

POST OFFICE ACT AMENDMENT.

The hour for Private Bills being exhausted the House resumed in committee on Bill (No. 104) to amend paragraph (l) of section 2, and paragraphs (n) and (o) of section 9 of the Post Office Act.—Mr. Lemieux.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Before six o'clock I explained the various sections of the Bill, but if hon. members desire to ask any questions, I shall be glad to give any further information I can.

On section 1—'Street stamp vending box.'

Mr. HENDERSON. It seems to me it would be proper to have a definition of the words 'street stamp vending box.'

Mr. LEMIEUX. We must provide something in the Act to bring this box under the purview of the Post Office Department. The ordinary post office box is a post office for the purpose of the Act, and we wish to have the same declared as regards to the stamp vending box.

Mr. BARKER. So that, for instance, in case there should be a robbery it would come within the Act?

Mr. LEMIEUX. Yes.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. How many of these vending machines are leased, and what amount of money is to be paid?

Mr. LEMIEUX. The machine is not leased but sold to the department. In certain cases machines are not under the entire supervision of the department. This applies to boxes located in distant districts, for instance in lumber camps. The Minister of Labour has several requests from people in lumber camps asking that they should be given the benefit of these boxes because nobody could be appointed postmaster in the deep recesses of our Canadian woods. The machines will be neither leased nor purchased by the department, but authority will be given to the company supplying the boxes to place them under our direction and the company will be held to act as our agents. As my hon. friend is aware, each box is provided with a roller of stamps. The company will buy the stamps from the department, and we will pay to the vendors the ordinary commission we pay to stamp vendors.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. What is the cost of a box?

Mr. LEMIEUX. I think $25 is the cost of the box with one slot. But Dr. Coulter, the Deputy Postmaster General and Mr. Ross, of Toronto, have stated that the experiments we have made this winter with the boxes have shown that the public prefer the double box, one that will sell both one cent and two cent stamps. These double boxes cost about $40 or $50; I can give the exact figure on Monday.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. How many does the minister intend to place?

Mr. LEMIEUX. We will have to create districts, and the demand, whatever it may be, will be met. The public desire to have devices to save time as much as possible. With the increase of population and the extraordinary expansion of letter writing, we have to meet that demand of the public. I do not say how many boxes. I suppose for the first year we will have two or three hundred. But at all events, we will have a sufficient supply.

Mr. HENDERSON. Is this a Canadian invention?

Mr. LEMIEUX. It is a British invention, and I said before six o'clock, that it was the best invention known up to date. That is the opinion of the British experts. At the same time, I may say for the benefit of Canadian inventors that we are not wedded to this particular box, and if they can find a better one we will adopt it. It is a conscientious box. We have never seen a box yet which would give back spurious coin or foreign coin. In this one, if you do not put in a Canadian penny or a Canadian cent, the box rejects it automatically. I intend to bring one of these boxes next week up to the House for the inspection of members. In Australia, in Germany, it has been adopted by the postal authorities. Last year when I was in Liverpool the postmaster showed me one of these boxes which collected, I do not know how many pounds a day.

Mr. KNOWLES. The minister has told us about a machine which will sell stamps for the amount of money, one-cent or two-cents, dropped into the box. Probably the minister knows that in the west there are no coppers nothing but silver money. I would ask him whether he has considered the need of a stamp vending machine that will sell stamps for a five cent piece or a ten cent piece? There is perhaps greater need in the west of such a machine than in the east, for the reason that accommodation provided in the west in a very short time becomes inadequate, and something that would remove the congestion from the stamp vending wicket in the post office building would in a great many towns be much more of a necessity than it is in the east, on account of the more rapid development.

Mr. LEMIEUX. The object of this legislation is precisely to meet that contingency, namely, that in the west, and in cities where there is a rush at certain seasons, we may assist the post office authorities by placing this box in the lobbies. It helps them both in mailing letters, and it saves the government the commission we have been paying to vendors of stamps. With regard to giving change, this box is not adapted for that, but this is the latest device. If later on another better device is found which will sell stamps for a five or a ten cent piece, we will adopt it.

Mr. HENDERSON. Has the minister committed himself to take this machine from only one particular firm, or may he purchase elsewhere if some other invention came out?

Mr. LEMIEUX. Certainly. We are not wedded, as I have said, to this particular automatic machine. I have simply described the latest machine as being the best one yet discovered. But if in the future a Canadian inventor—and there are many Canadians working in that line—discovers a better device, certainly we will adopt it. The same with the rural box. We have adopted the red box called the 'King Edward' box, which, according to experts, is the best up to date box. But if a better one can be found we will certainly adopt it. At present the American authorities have accepted our rural box because they think it is the best.

Mr. KNOWLES. I did not speak of a box that would return the change. What I had in mind was a machine which would return the stamps for five, ten or twenty-five cent piece thrown into it. In the west where we have no coppers, we cannot buy stamps in a less quantity than five cents worth.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Many men are working on this device daily, and if my hon. friend will come to the Post Office Department he will see a number of new devices.

Mr. HAGGART (Winnipeg). The fact that this machine has a conscience will be no embarrassment to the government, I hope. Is there any way by which immoral literature can be rejected?

Mr. LEMIEUX. No, it does not deal with literature.

On the preamble,

Mr. HENDERSON. The Postmaster General will remember that for several years past I have drawn his attention to the fact that in the cities drop letters were reduced from two cents to one cent. This saving was given to those who reside in the cities where there is a street delivery, and I think it is only fair that in rural sections the people should be given an equivalent. I see no better way of doing it than for the minister to give the same reduction on drop letters to people living in country villages and towns that he gives to those living in the cities. The people in the cities have the benefit of a free delivery, but in the country the people have to go to the post office for their mail matter. Yet they have to pay the same postage on a drop letter that is paid in a city where the letter is delivered at the door of the person to whom it is addressed. The minister told me a year or two ago that after he had a year's experience in the working of the one cent drop letter in the cities, he would be prepared to consider the propriety of accepting or rejecting my proposition. I have waited now patiently for more than two years, and I think it is time the country people should get this little benefit. Merchants send out a great many circulars, and half a cent on each circular would, in the course of a year, amount to considerable money. You may say that the government wants the money, but the government is rich and the revenue is abundant. It seems to me that this is something that the Postmaster General might meet the demand of the country in, by giving a half cent rate to medical men, lawyers, merchants and any others who had occasion to mail a good many letters; in fact, give this reduction to any one. There will be no difficulty in buying half cent stamps. If a man could not get a half cent stamp he could buy two and use the new machine the minister might require to have an additional roler so as to turn out half cent stamps.

Mr. LEMIEUX. That difficulty could be got over.

Mr. HENDERSON. That difficulty could be got over. Can the Postmaster General tell me if he can get over the other difficulty?

Mr. LEMIEUX. My hon. friend is very persistent in his efforts for further reduction of the postal rates.

Mr. HENDERSON. I beg my hon. friend's pardon; in the rural section we have not had any reduction for a long time.

Mr. LEMIEUX. My hon. friend must not forget that when Sir William Mulock was in office some years ago, he reduced the rate from three cents to two.

Mr. HENDERSON. But that did not apply to the one cent rate.

Mr. LEMIEUX. A further reduction was made three years ago by myself for drop letters in cities. As to a half cent rate for the rural sections of the country, I may say to my hon. friend, without committing the government or any one, that I am seriously considering this question. Of course, it is a question of revenue and I must be very careful. I must be—well, let me say—conservative in this regard, but, when the proper time comes, if it is at all possible to meet the desires of the rural community, I will certainly be only too happy to grant the reduction. I am seriously considering the matter, but it is not one of the things that can be done in a haphazard way, and we must consider whether the reduction we are giving the people in, for instance, rural mail delivery, and other facilities which we provide, all of which must increase the expenditure, can be supplemented by a further reduction. It is true the revenues are abundant and increasing every year, but at the same time we must not lose sight of the fact that two cents is a very low rate. There is no country in the world where the people pay so little for the carriage of newspapers—one quarter of a cent a pound. Again I say I am studying this question with my officials. I know that the more you reduce the rates the more you are apt to get larger revenues. That is my experience, and that is why I have always been advocating a fair reduction of rates. It has meant for the Post Office Department larger revenues. If we had cheaper rates for cables I think that the cable companies would receive larger revenues. That is my policy and it is the experience of the experts we have in the Post Office Department.

Mr. HENDERSON. The minister refers to the fact that in country places rural mail delivery is being introduced. But the reduction that I have referred to would have no connection with the rural mail delivery. Where I ask for a reduction is where a letter is dropped into the post office and taken out of the same post office, the result being that the department is not put to any expense to carry it to any other place. I think the matter is a very simple one and one that should appeal especially to the Postmaster General. If he could reduced the postage to half a cent to such men as general merchants, I have no hesitation in saying that he would find that he would get just as much revenue out of the half cent rate as out of the cent rate, because I believe they would make a great deal more use of the post office. I am glad to know that the minister has this under his serious consideration. I hope it will become more serious and it will not be long until we realize something out of it.

Mr. KNOWLES. I desire to make a suggestion to the hon. Postmaster General which I hope he will also take under his favourable consideration. It is in regard to the correspondence which members of parliament have during recess. I do not know whether this matter has been brought to the minister's attention before, although I think that probably it has. I can see no reason why members of the House of Commons, carrying on correspondence during the recess upon public business, should not have the facilities of the mail just as well as during the time that the House of Commons is in session. If anything I believe that the correspondence of members in regard to public business is larger during the period of the recess, because, while the House of Commons is in session a member is in Ottawa and goes to the departments personally, and it is because he is away from Ottawa that the correspondence between himself and his constituents increases. I think the thing is right, and that it is in the interest of the member giving the best possible service to his constituents. It necessarily follows that if a member of parliament in carrying on correspondence with his people, has these facilities to which, I think, he has a perfect right, they will get better service; not that any member is going to refrain from writing to his constituents for the sake of the cent or two postage that it may involve, and I do not know that it makes a great difference in that respect, but in this world with most men every dollar counts and it is scarcely fair to ask members to bear this charge themselves. It is nothing more than fair that the country should provide him with these facilities. Of course the question occurs as to how a man is going to draw the line. I do not think that any great practical difficulty is presented by that question. We know that in the United States they have a penalty envelope, that is an envelope specially prepared for that purpose. I do not know that members of the House of Representatives or Senate use it, but I know that the Post Office Department does issue certain penalty envelopes which certain public officers residing away from the capital use. I do not know what the penalty is, it may be $40 or $50 for improper use, but that is immaterial to the principle of the thing.

Mr. HENDERSON.

I do not think that there will be any danger of members of parliament failing to correctly draw the line as between correspondence on public business and corresponence on their own private business. As one who has a large correspondence—and I think all western members have, as I have no doubt all members have—I would suggest to the minister that it would be only doing what is fair, and following the principle that is already adopted while we are in Ottawa to make provision that members of parliament carrying on correspondence in connection with public business with their constituents should have the same facilities during twelve months in the year that they have while parliament is in session.

Mr. LEMIEUX. I will take the suggestion of my hon. friend under very serious consideration. Of course, it has no reference to the present Bill.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Is the minister aware that during the past few days there has been some slight interference with the mails that are coming to the House? I understand that a number of papers which should have been delivered this morning in the Library and in the Senate library did not arrive either by the morning or evening mail. Possibly the minister will make some investigation.

Mr. LEMIEUX. As my hon. friend is aware, the post office in the House of Commons is not under my jurisdiction. It is under the jurisdiction of the committee on internal economy. I am sorry to hear that there has been some mis-sent mail matter, but I will inquire. I found not very long ago that it took more time for a letter mailed in the House of Commons in the evening to reach the Post Office Department next morning than it took for a letter mailed in Montreal to reach my department. I saw the Speaker about it and found that the officers of the post office here closed the mails when the House adjourned, and the mails sometimes were sent only next morning from the Ottawa post office, while they could very well have been sent by the Toronto train until half past eleven at night, and the westbound train from Montreal passing through Ottawa about five o'clock in the morning. The Speaker was kind enough to call the postmaster, and to instruct him, with the help of one additional clerk, to keep the bag open until the early hours in the morning so as to give members the benefit of having their mails sent by those trains. As regards the error of this morning, I will inquire at once and see where the trouble lies.

Mr. HENDERSON. A great many members of this House get copies of their speeches from the Printing Bureau, where the type is already set up, for distribution through the post office. There is a provision in the regulations to this effect:

Members of either the Senate or the House of Commons may during the recess of parliament send by mail free of Canadian postage all papers printed by order of either House.

Will the minister inform me whether a member could during the recess send these copies of his speeches free of postage from the post office where he lives, in case he could not get them from the Bureau until after the House had prorogued.

Mr. LEMIEUX. There is another regulation which permits a member, within a certain time after prorogation, I think a fortnight, to mail public documents, bluebooks, &c., from his home office.

Mr. HENDERSON. I think he can do that all the year round.

Mr. LEMIEUX. As regards the case mentioned, I will look into it and see if I can accommodate the members in that respect. Of course, it is better to have the mailable matter sent in bulk from Ottawa, and distributed from here. If necessary, we can provide some regulation which would meet the contingency mentioned. The trouble is that it might be abused; but of course we must believe in the honour of every member of the House of Commons, and I think I can frame a regulation that would meet the case.

Mr. HENDERSON. If we could have the King's Printer stamp his impress on the copies, then I am quite sure the present regulation would be sufficient.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. I would like to call the minister's attention to a fraudulent use of the mails in western Ontario. In yesterday's London 'Free Press' there is an article in which it is stated:

Letters are finding their way from the United States to all parts of Ontario, offering counterfeit money for sale. These 'greengoods' men choose farmers principally for their victims, and in the letters, picture 'easy money' that can be made if the recipient of the letter will communicate with the man who has the goods.

If the minister would call the attention of the authorities in western Ontario to this matter, it might be of some service.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

SEED CONTROL ACT.

House went into committee on Bill (No. 167), respecting the inspection and sale of seeds.—Mr. Fisher.

On section 1,

Mr. FISHER. This Bill was considered by the Committee on Agriculture, and with the exception of one or two small amendments it passed that committee unanimously.

Mr. HENDERSON. Is the Bill now as recommended by the Committee on Agriculture?

Mr. FISHER. Exactly.

Mr. JAMESON. What is the object of exempting by the operation of sections 6 and 7, certain classes of persons mentioned in section 5?

Mr. FISHER. It is so that farmers may sell to their neighbours without coming under the operation of the Act. That is a provision of the old law.

Mr. JAMESON. I presume that the object of this legislation is to prevent the use of seed which is not pure?

Mr. FISHER. Certainly.

Mr. JAMESON. Does the minister think that by the exception he makes in section 5 that will be accomplished?

Mr. FISHER. Yes, because the neighbours who buy from a farmer have had an opportunity to see the crop growing and they know whether the seed is clean or not. But the dealers sell the seed to purchasers who have no means of knowing how it was grown. This provision has been in the Act since its inception.

Mr. HERRON. Does the case mentioned this afternoon come within the meaning of the Act, so that if the peeople sell wheat for seed, containing a certain percentage of weeds——?

Mr. FISHER. Any grain sold for seeding purposes comes under the operation of this Act.

On section (10a), a name on a paper of seeds must state name and year when filled.

Mr. FISHER. This is an amendment proposed by the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Blain), and accepted by the committee.

Bill reported, read the third time, and passed.

INSPECTION AND SALE ACT.

Bill (No. 153) to amend the Inspection and Sale Act as regards the weight of a bushel and a bag of certain articles.—Mr. Fisher—read the second time, and the House went into Committee thereon.

On section 1,

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. Would the minister explain what changes have been made?

Mr. FISHER. Artichokes were not included in the original Act at all. Beans are the same, 60 lbs. to the bushel. Beets were 60 lbs., and are now made 50. Bituminous coal is the same. Blue grass seed is the same, 14 lbs. Carrots were 60 in the old Act, and they are now made 50. Castor beans are the same. Clover seed is the same. Hemp seed was 49, and it is now made 44. Lime is the same, 70 lbs. Malt is the same, 36 lbs. Onions are the same, 50 lbs. Parsnips were 60, and are now made 45. Potatoes are the same, 60 lbs. Timothy seed is the same, 48 lbs. Turnips were 60 lbs., and are now made 50. All these changes were made at the request of the Vegetable Growers' Associations of Ontario and Quebec. They explain that the weights in the old Act were so high that the ordinary measurement never came up to the weight. They say that the weights now adopted are reasonable, and are in accord with the ordinary measure of a bushel.

Mr. HENDERSON. I understand that the weight of lime is left where it was before. Has the minister ever had any test made as to whether that is the correct weight of a bushel of lime? I remember it was formerly 80 lbs., and I think that was made at the suggestion of some member of the Senate, but it was reduced at my suggestion, and I was wondering whether the minister has ever had it confirmed.

Mr. FISHER. I cannot say that I have officially. I have myself purchased lime and weighed it, and I know it was very rare that you could get a bushel of lime that weighed 80 lbs. I think 70 is the correct weight.

Mr. HENDERSON. We had a test made in this way: I weighed a bushel of lump lime, and then took a bushel of fine lime and threw it in along with the larger pieces, and of course the smaller lime disappeared amongst the larger lumps, but, strange to say, it made no difference in the weight.

On subsection 2,

Mr. SEXSMITH. You provide that a bag of potatoes shall weigh 80 lbs., unless a bag by measure is specially agreed upon. Is that the legal standard?

Mr. FISHER. There is no legal standard to-day for a bag of potatoes, except in the province of Ontario. This will make 80 lbs. the legal standard all over the Dominion.

Mr. HENDERSON. The minister knows that 90 lbs is the correct weight.

Mr. FISHER. I always expected to get 90 lbs. if I bought a bag. But at the same time it has been 80 in the province of Quebec for a long time, and now we make it 80 all over the Dominion. Many representations were made, both to myself and to the Department of Trade and Commerce, asking that the weight be made 80 lbs.

Mr. SEXSMITH. Has 90 lbs. been the legal weight in Ontario?

Mr. FISHER There was no legal weight in Ontario.

Mr. HENDERSON. I assume the minsiter knows why it was made 80 lbs.? In the province of Quebec it was made 80 lbs. because that was the weight of an ordinary bag of potatoes, and that weight was made to conform to the size of the bag. In Montreal I think they use a great many sugar bags, and the farmers who fill them with potatoes find that a bag will hold 90 lbs. So they made the weight 90 lbs. in order to conform to the size of the bag. Under our former legislation that weight was confined to the province of Quebec, and I am not sure but that it should be confined there still, and let 90 lbs. be the legal weight of a bag of potatoes.

Mr. FISHER. There have been a good many smaller bags in use of late years in other parts of the country than Quebec. Strong representations were made from farmers outside of Quebec to reduce the weight of a bag of potatoes to 80 lbs. The regular two-bushel grain bag, which is the well known cotton grain bag, holds two bushels of grain, and will hold 90 lbs. of potatoes if it is well filled and shaken down. But there are many smaller bags used now, and grain is now nearly all sold by weight without reference to bags. Grain is now put into any kind of a bag, whereas it used to be put generally into a two-bushel bag. Now bags vary in size. I know they are with us and I think they are all over the country. There is no fixed standard of capacity for a bag and it, therefore, has been thought well by people who are interested in this trade that a bag of these different things should have a fixed weight. It is proposed that a bag of potatoes shall be 80 lbs.

Mr. THORNTON. The invariable rule has been that a bag of any kind of roots or fruit should be a bushel and a half. Now you depart from that with regard to a great many of the articles that are mentioned in this list. It will deceive the public greatly if this change is made. The change with regard to the weight of a bag of potatoes is a very drastic one.

Mr. FISHER. The only standard that there ever has been for a weight of a bag of any of these articles has been with respect to a bag of potatoes in the province of Quebec. Until now there has been no standard weight for bag of any of these articles.

Mr. THORNTON. What was the practice?

Mr. FISHER. It varied in different parts of the country. I think that in Ontario a bag of potatoes was usually a bushel and a half, or 90 pounds, and in other parts of the country it was not. In the maritime provinces I believe it was 75 pounds, while in Quebec, by the law of the land, it was 80 pounds. These people have requested that it be made uniform all over the country at 80 pounds.

Mr. THORNTON. As far as potatoes are concerned, it is going to lead to very serious difficulty as between buyers and sellers if that rule is adopted.

Mr. SEXSMITH. I agree with my hon. friend from Durham (Mr. Thornton). The standard rule in the province of Ontario, as long as I can remember, has been 90 pounds for a bag of potatoes. The minister says that the ordinary cotton bag used on the farms has to be filled up and well shaken down to hold 90 pounds of potatoes. He has evidently not weighed many potatoes in ordinary cotton bags, because they do not require to be shaken down to get a weight of 90 pounds. But there is a flour bag which is used on the farms, and in order to put 90 pounds into that it has to be shaken down and tied very closely. It will cause a great deal of confusion for some time, throughout Ontario, at least, where the public have been so accustomed to dealing in a 90-pound bag of potatoes, if you adopt 80 pounds as the standard bag it will practically compel the farmer, who sells a bag of potatoes as a bag, to sell by weight. The old standard measure of a bushel and a half to the bag was considered correct, and no doubt was correct. In our part of the country they buy potatoes by the bag at 90 pounds, and it will cause confusion if you bring about this change.

Mr. FISHER. These weights have been fixed upon representations of people interested who have come to us from time to time. A delegation came down to see the Minister of Trade and Commerce in regard to this Bill, and these are the weights fixed upon by them. I have received a great many representations in the way of correspondence which I have transferred to the department of my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce, because, this being an amendment to the Inspection and Sale Act, it comes under his department. I have had a great many representations from different parts of the country, a good many, I think, from Ontario. I do not remember just now where they all came from, but I am sure that some came from Ontario, asking for this change.

Mr. THORNTON. Who comprised the deputation?

Mr. FISHER. They called themselves the vegetables growers of Ontario and the vegetables growers of Quebec.

Mr. THORNTON. Not farmers?

Mr. FISHER. No, they were not farmers.

Mr. THORNTON. Were the dealers interested in the same way?

Mr. FISHER. I think the dealers would be in that deputation. This will not hurt the farmer. It is the purchaser, not the farmer, that will be hurt, if anybody is hurt, because the farmer will be able to sell 80 pounds as a bag in future instead of 90.

Mr. THORNTON. The only objection I can see to it is that it will cause confusion and hard feeling between buyer and seller.

Mr. FISHER. Of course, it may take a little time for the new standard to be understood, but evidently there has been a very positive request for this from the people who seem to be concerned in the trade.

Mr. SEXSMITH. I do not see that it is a great detriment to the farmer, but hundreds of thousands of people will be buying potatoes all over Ontario, they will not know that this new standard has been fixed for the next five years, and they will think that they are getting 90 pounds when they buy potatoes from the grocer, whereas they are only getting 80 pounds.

Mr. NESBITT. Will they not soon adjust themselves to the new conditions? It does take a good sized measure of potatoes to weigh 90 pounds. As a matter of fact, dealers will accustom themselves to this change, and the price will be fixed accordingly.

Mr. FISHER. These weights were also submitted to the officers of the Experimental Farm, Messds. Grisdale and Macoun, and they tested and approved them.

Mr. SEXSMITH. How would they test the weight of a bag? They could test the weight of a bushel, but I do not know how they could test the weight of a bag of 80 pounds.

Mr. THORNTON. What measures did they use in testing the bag?

Mr. FISHER. Of course, for the bushel, they took the regular bushel measure. The first part of this clause provides for the weight of a bushel. I do not know how they tested the weight of the bag.

Mr. THORNTON. What is the size of the bushel with which they made this test?

Mr. FISHER. It is the regular standard bushel. The Inspection and Sale Act says what the bushel is.

Mr. HENDERSON. 2,142 inches, is it not?

Mr. FISHER. I am not sure.

Mr. HERRON. I can understand that if you provide for the use of the bushel measure in filling the bag, it will work all right, but if you do not I am afraid it will result in a great deal of inconvenience. A farmer will not be able to determine very accurately what quantity of potatoes he has in his sack except by having a pair of scales on the farm. A bushel measure is a very cheap article, and he can easily determine the quantity of potatoes that he is putting in the bag with the aid of the bushel measure.

Mr. FISHER. He requires to use scales just as much now as he will if this Bill is passed. The standard of practice in the province of Ontario, I believe, has been 90 pounds, and the 90 pounds is now required as absolutely as the 80 pounds will be.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. I think this may cause great confusion, and that great publicity should be given to the changes made before the Act is put into operation. The coming into force of the Act should be postponed until some future day, perhaps a year from next January.

Mr. FISHER. The proposition to postpone the coming into force of the Act is a reasonable one, but I think that next January would be a sufficient delay.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. The other would be only one crop of potatoes.

Mr. THORNTON. Does it fix the weight of a bushel of apples?

Mr. FISHER. No. I would suggest that we should pass the other clauses of the Bill which are not controversial and leave it in committee until I have an opportunity of consulting the Minister of Trade and Commerce on the question of deferring the coming into operation of the Bill. I have not had charge of the drafting of the Bill.

Mr. SEXSMITH. We should have some definite promise that it will not be brought into force until the 1st of January.

Mr. FISHER. I cannot promise that myself.

On section 2, existing Act repealed,

Mr. FISHER. The royal assent was given during this session to a Bill introduced by the hon. member for Carleton, N.B., (Mr. Carvell) fixing the weight of a barrel of potatoes at 165 pounds. The Minister of Trade and Commerce thought it best to include that enactment under this Bill, and so avoid confusion, and this has been done. This fixes the standard at that weight.

Mr. JAMESON. What is the legal weight of a bag of potatoes in the United States?

Mr. FISHER. I do not know.

Mr. JAMESON. If we are framing our legislation on the American legislation in this matter, we should know just what their standards are.

Mr. FISHER. I shall find that out.

Mr. SEXSMITH. Eighty pounds to a bag, and 165 pounds to a barrel seems inconsistent.

Mr. FISHER. I do not think there is any interchange between the bag and the barrel.

On section 3, weight of barrel.

Mr. HENDERSON. You determine the size of the barrel by the number of pounds. Could you not give the capacity of the barrel by giving the height, and the diameter at the top and middle as with apple barrels?

Mr. FISHER. The reason that the size of the apple barrel is fixed by measurement is that apples vary greatly in weight, according to variety. The summer varieties of apples weigh 10 pounds per barrel less than the winter varieties. That difference does not exist with potatoes.

Mr. SEXSMITH. How is a man buying a barrel of potatoes to know that it is a legal barrel?

Mr. FISHER. If he had any suspicion he would have to weigh it.

Progress reported.

FOREST RESERVES.

Bill (No. 85) respecting forest reserves and parks, read the second time, and House went into committee thereon.

Mr. OLIVER. The major portion of the provisions of this Bill are already contained in the Forest Reserves Act. The most important differences between the Bill and the Act are that provision is made for placing all present forest and park reservations under the provisions of the Forest Reserves Act, and then setting apart, within those forest reservations, park reservations with regard to which the regulations look to the enjoyment by the people of the natural advantages and beauties of those particular sections of the reserves, while the regulations regarding the remainder of the forest reserves look rather to the exclusion of people from them.

Mr. HENDERSON. Will the hon. minister pardon me? I think this is too important a Bill to proceed with in so thin a House. I do not see the men here on either side who are sufficiently acquainted with the matter dealt with in this Bill to deal with it intelligently, and we might as well leave it entirely in the minister's hands and let him put it through himself. If he has some other measure of less importance, I would suggest that he take it up and let this stand to come up in a full House earlier in the day.

Mr. OLIVER. I quite appreciate the point of view of my hon. friend, and I do not wish to minimize the importance of the Bill. I would like to say another word. Besides the provisions which I have mentioned, there is another important feature of the Bill. It sets apart by legislation the Rocky Mountain Park Reserve, extending along the eastern slope of the Rocky Mountains from the boundary until it is crossed by the boundary between British Columbia and Alberta

Mr. THORNTON. Will it be entirely in Alberta?

Mr. OLIVER. Yes. There is a reservation over a great deal of that country, by order in council passed last year; but since that time a careful examination has been made for the purpose of drawing what might be called a fairly scientific boundary between what is properly the park and what is not the park, and this Bill asks that this new boundary be adopted as the boundary of the park which will be set apart by legislative enactment.

Mr. THORNTON. Has the Conservation Commission recommended this Bill or been consulted in the matter?

Mr. OLIVER. The Conservation Commission recommended the setting apart of the reserve on the whole of the eastern slope of the Rocky Mountains, and the Bill is in accordance with that recommendation. I am not aware that the commission made recommendations in regard to any other section of the Bill, because the Act now on the statute-book, which this Bill follows, with the exceptions I have mentioned, was in force before the Conservation Commission came into existence.

Mr. ROCHE. Does this Bill interfere with the present boundaries of the Duck Mountains reserve, the Riding Mountains reserve or the Turtle Mountains reserve?

Mr. OLIVER. I was going to say that besides that reservation, which will include the present reserves of the Kootenay Lakes park, the Rocky Mountains park at Banff, and the Jasper park, a careful examination of the other reserves created by the Act of 1906 has been made, and as a result of that examination there have been some alterations in the boundaries, which I would of course be prepared to state to the House at length. There have been some considerable additions made, in some cases small portions have been taken out of the reserves, and in one case, the Manitoba reserve has been dispensed with altogether, and a considerable area of the Donald Forest reserve it has been decided to throw open to settlement. The legislative features of the Bill are not important, as they do not differ materially from the provisions of the Act now on the statute-book. At the same time, I do not wish to minimize the desirability of the full House having a complete understanding of the Bill, and therefore, in deference to my hon. friend, I would move that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Has the minister any map of the proposed reserve?

Mr. OLIVER. Yes, I have a map which shows all the reserves, with all the alterations and additions, which I can leave on the table for the information of the House between now, and the future consideration of the Bill.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Do these reserves on the eastern slope of the Rocky Mountains comprise pretty nearly all the eastern water-shed of the Rockies?

Mr. OLIVER. Yes, I think they do. In setting apart the reservation we were guided by the principle that land at an elevation of 4,000 feet and over was not suitable for agricultural purposes, though it could still be used for grazing, because the grazing right does not involve alienation of the surface.

Mr. HENDERSON. It is not intended to dispose of the timber on the reserve?

Mr. OLIVER. It is not open to the ordinary demand for timber, but the timber is to be disposed of at the option and on the responsibility of the department when it is mature. The idea is that the timber shall be administered with a view to preservation reproduction rather than to profit but it is not at all intended that the timber shall not be used.

DOMINION LANDS ACT — ORDERS IN COUNCIL APPROVED.

The House went again into committee to consider a proposed resolution that certain orders in council under the Dominion Lands Act, chapter 20 of the statutes of 1908, are approved.

Mr. HENDERSON. This seems to be a pretty big proposition to be taken up at a quarter past ten on Friday night when we were here till five o'clock this morning, and especially when there are only one or two men in the House who can reasonably be supposed to have any knowledge of the matter involved.

Mr. OLIVER. This matter was brought before the House some time ago, and, at the request of the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster), all the orders which approval is asked for were printed, and, of course, have been in the hands of members for several months. I do not wish in this case either to minimize the importance of the matter for which the approval of the House is asked; but I do think that in this as in other cases the House would be warranted in giving its approval, having had an opportunity to fully study these orders. I think that the formal action of the House is all that should be necessary, because the orders have been in operation and the House is well informed as to the facts.

Mr. DOHERTY. I quite recognize that the orders in council have been before us for some time. I got a copy of them quite two months ago. I went over them then and it did strike me that there were some matters of considerable importance and which it might be desirable from my own point of view to have some information. I consulted the representatives of western constituencies better informed in these matters, and they agreed with me. I made some notes on the subject at the time. But I have mislaid that one copy of the resolution. I sent several times for another copy, but was told it was impossible to get them. We are not now in a very good position to take up this resolution, and, in the second place, the western members who are the men really interested in these things are not numerously represented here to-night. I think it would be well not to press the matter under the circumstances.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Why were so small a number of copies printed?

Mr. OLIVER. I think there was an ample number printed for the use that was contemplated. But as this document contains all these orders it may have been found convenient to give them out for general information, and the number of copies printed that would have been ample for the use of the House was not at all sufficient for the more general circulation.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I suppose I must have received a copy, but I confess I did not know that they were distributed. The statutes, if I remember correctly, require that the resolutions shall be passed before the expiration of the session. So it is not really very urgent.

Mr. OLIVER. No, it is business that I wish to have disposed of if possible, but I would not wish to force it.

Mr. HENDERSON

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Would the hon. gentleman send a copy to the member for St. Anne (Mr. Doherty)?

Mr. OLIVER. Yes.

DOMINION LANDS ACT AMENDMENT.

On order for second reading of Bill (No. 107) to amend the Dominion Lands Act.

Mr. OLIVER. This is a Bill for making minor amendments to the Dominion Lands Act, which authorizes the leasing of school lands for revenue purposes towards the school funds. Up to the present time we have been leasing school lands, and there is a question as to our statutory authority to do so. It was thought well to make statutory provision to that end, and a clause was prepared for that purpose. Since notice was given of this Bill, circumstances have arisen that have made it desirable to secure certain other minor amendments to the Act. I now wish to withdraw this Bill, and at the same time to give notice of the introduction of another Bill of the same name, but which would contain certain other additional provisions, in all cases making minor amendments which are considered necessary to the successful operation of the Act. I move, therefore, that Order 18 for the second reading of Bill (No. 107) be discharged.

Motion agreed to.

ERRORS IN FRENCH VERSION OF INLAND REVENUE ACT.

Bill (No. 132) to correct certain clerical errors in the French version of the Inland Revenue Act—Mr. Templeman—read the second time, and House went into committee thereon.

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. In the French version of the Revised Statutes, clause 252, the word 'huit' has been substituted for the word 'quatre.' The consequence is to impose an inland revenue tax of eight cents per gallon instead of four cents. We wish to use the word 'quatre.' This section also amends the French version of section 356 of the said Act by inserting after the word 'loi' in the sixth line thereof, the words 'est coupable d'un acte criminal et,' which words have been left out of the Act.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I was much surprised to see in the report of the Secretary of State so extraordinary a number of errors made in the French version of the statutes. I cannot understand why they should occur so frequently. I think there were in that report two pages of errors in recent statutes. It does seem a remarkable thing that the word 'huit' should be substituted for the word 'quatre' in the French version, and it seems equally remarkable that the very important phrase which the minister has quoted should be left out at the end of a section. I would like to know the meaning of it.

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. There is only one explanation, that is defective translation.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). It is not a translation at all when these important words are left out. But what I cannot understand is how they should occur so frequently.

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. I cannot account for it on any other theory than carelessness somewhere, and I suppose on the part of the translators.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). It seems important that whatever authority is charged with the supervision on this work should see that greater care is used in making the translation. Perhaps the Secretary of State can tell us how it is that these errors occur.

Mr. MURPHY. I cannot give my hon. friend any other information than what he possesses. If there are errors in the printing, it is the fault of the printer.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Some of these errors are attributed in some way to the Printing Bureau. The Secretary of State will remember that in his report there is a long list of errors, I think two pages. I do not know whether they are attributable to the translators or to the Printing Bureau.

Mr. MURPHY. They are attributable to the translators, and they were discovered by the officials of the Printing Bureau in reading the proof.

Mr. DOHERTY. Are the English and French editions of these statutes issued simultaneously?

Mr. MURPHY. Almost.

Mr. DOHERTY. After they are printed, is anybody in a position to compare the two versions and see that they have been printed identically? Is there any system by which these translations are compared? We should not be running the risk of sending out two laws disagreeing with each other.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). The question raised by the member for St. Anne is an important one. Are the statutes passed in this parliament in English and French at the same time, or are they passed in English and a French translation made afterwards? Is there an English version and a French version of statutes at the time they pass this House, and the Senate, and at the time they receive the assent of the Governor in Council? It seems to me that is what should be done. Both languages are the languages of legislation in this country.

Mr. FIELDING. Bills of course are always required to be printed in both languages, and in practice they are. So that at the time, parliament enacted it with that general amendment. I should think that there is no reason why these should not be published in both languages at the same time. Mr. Speaker, who has the supervision of this matter, informs me that he will have a memorandum prepared giving an explanation of this error, and that he will be able to bring it before the House on some future occasion. There is no doubt that is a clerical error in translation.

Mr. JAMESON. This appears to be a Bill to amend the revised statutes of 1906 for the purpose of correcting an error that has occurred in the French version. I would like to ask the minister when it was that this error was discovered, when he first knew of it and why this delay has occurred in bringing in this amendment to make the necessary correction?

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. Personally I have only known of it for the last six months. The Deputy Minister called my attention to it six months ago and he thought it was necessary to amend the French version. How long my deputy has known of it I do not know.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). They have been paying eight cents?

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. No; four cents.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

PROHIBITION OF OPIUM AND OTHER DRUGS.

Consideration of amendments made by the Senate to Bill (No. 97) to prohibit the improper use of opium and other drugs.—Mr. King.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). What are the amendments?

Hon. MACKENZIE KING (Minister of Labour). These amendments do not affect in any way the principle of the Bill. The first amendment is the insertion of the words 'shall be guilty of a criminal offence' in a number of the sections. The law as it stands states that a person doing certain things shall be liable to summary conviction and to a certain fine. The senators thought that it would be just as well to put in the words 'shall be guilty of a criminal offence.' I do not think that they are absolutely necessary, but the Senate seems to think that they will make the meaning clearer and as the prevention of certain evils is the object sought their insertion of these words is in line with the purpose of the Bill I do not see that there can be any objection to it. The second amendment is to section 5 of the Bill, and it is the insertion of the words 'or to a bona fide wholesale druggist' after the word 'dentist' in the 15th line. Section 5 prohibits the sale of certain drugs to any person other than a physician, veterinary surgeon or dentist, except upon conditions prescribed by the Act. It seemed advisable to the Senate to allow the same privilege, in the matter of sale, to a bona fide wholesale druggist and, therefore, they inserted these words.

Mr. DOHERTY. Would not the words 'a druggist carrying on business in a bona fide drug store' cover that?

Mr. KING. A wholesale druggist might not have any drug store at all; he might simply have a place of business and for that reason he comes within a different category. The remaining amendment is to the schedule. The Act specifies certain drugs in the schedule which it shall be unlawful to sell except under certain conditions. These drugs are cocaine, morphine and opium. The Senate thought it well to add, after the words 'cocaine' and 'morphine,' the words 'or any salts or compounds thereof.' That addition was made on the advice of the medical adviser of the Conservation Commission and also on the advice of the director general of public health. The intention of parliament in inserting cocaine and morphine was to deal with these two particular drugs and it was felt that unless the words 'or any salts or compounds thereof' were added a violation of the intention of the Act might result. Then, the Senate provide in addition the words 'eucaine or any salts or compounds thereof.' Eucaine is a comparatively new drug much the same as cocaine and has much the same effect. It is in the nature of a powder which, I believe, is snuffed by people who use it and which has the same destructive effect as cocaine and opium. As these amendments, and particularly the last one, strengthen the Bill, and as they carry out the intention of this House, I am of opinion that they should be agreed to.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. Are these not covered by section 14?

Mr. KING. No; section 14 says that the Governor in Council may add to the schedule of this Act any alkaloids, derivatives or preparations of the drugs named. Eucaine is not one of the drugs named. On the other hand I suppose that any salts or compounds of the drugs named could be added by order in council, but they are I think better specified comprehensively in the Act itself. The Senate thought it better to specify salts and compounds generally in the Bill.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. The section which I have here says that the Governor in Council may add any compounds or substances.

Mr. KING. The hon. gentleman has the Bill as introduced but not as passed. The Bill as passed was changed in some particulars. We confined the list of drugs to cocaine, morphine and opium.

Mr. DOHERTY. I suppose that we can assume that the senators all know what eucaine is, because I must confess that I have no knowledge what it is.

Mr. KING. The suggestion has come from the medical adviser of the Conservation Commission which has to do, enough other things with the conservation of human resourses.

Amendments agreed to.

On motion of Mr. Fielding, House adjourned at 10.42 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

MONDAY, May 1, 1911.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION — HON. FRANK OLIVER.

On the orders of the day being called:

Hon. FRANK OLIVER (Minister of the Interior). Mr. Speaker, before the orders of the day are called, I desire to call your attention to a matter which was brought to the attention of the House on Friday last by the Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). The Prime Minister referred to an article which has appeared in a Toronto paper in which no names were mentioned. Since that time articles have appeared in other papers in which my name is mentioned. I have not yet had an opportunity to consider these articles, but I hope to be able to make some observations in the matter to-morrow.

CORONATION CONTINGENT—LT.-COL. LANDRY.

Hon. RODOLPHE LEMIEUX (Postmaster General). I notice a paragraph in 'La Patrie' of Saturday about the commanding officers of the Coronation Contingent in which it is stated that Hon. Mr. Brodeur and Hon. Mr. Lemieux objected so strenuously in council to the appointment of Lt.-Col. Landry that Sir Frederick Borden was forced to appoint another commanding officer belonging to the Liberal party. I may say that this paragraph, from beginning to end, is without foundation in fact. Lt.-Col. Landry is a personal friend of mine, indeed a college mate of mine. His name never came before me in connection with this matter, and I had nothing to do with the selection of the commanding officer of the Coronation Contingent; in fact, this is the first time I have heard his name mentioned in this connection.

INQUIRIES FOR RETURNS.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). May I ask the Secretary of State (Mr. Murphy) whether or not the return I spoke of the other day has been prepared?

Mr. MURPHY. It has. I have signed it, and I thought it would have been here. I will see that it is brought down before the House rises.

Mr. FOSTER. I desire to ask the Finance Minister (Mr. Fielding) if he has yet given the additions which were asked for in relation to the curator's report?

Mr. FIELDING. There were some supplementary papers, which I thought had been submitted to the House. But, I find they have not been. I will have them printed to-morrow.

Mr. FOSTER. I would like to ask the Secretary of State (Mr. Murphy) if the remainder of the return that was asked for—part was put as a question and part stood as a notice of motion for return—in relation to trade statistics of the most favoured nations and the tariffs on goods going into those countries, is yet ready?

Mr. MURPHY. I have not this yet, but I will have inquiry made this afternoon about it.

NORTH ATLANTIC FISHERIES — ARBITRATION AT THE HAGUE.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I desire to mention to the Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) and the Minister of Justice (Mr. Aylesworth) that I receive occasionally inquiries from different parts of the country for copies of the Hague Award in pamphlet form. People who are instructing students in constitutional law, libraries and institutions of various kinds in different parts of Canada would like very much to be furnished with copies of this award. I would suggest that it be printed, if that has not already been attended to. I think it is eminently desirable that copies of so important a pronouncement should be available for persons in this country who are interested.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I thought this would be included in the sessional papers. I should think it ought to be. But I will make inquiry.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I made some inquiry, but could not learn that it had been printed. My hon. friend from North Toronto (Mr. Foster) tells me that he understands it has been printed.

Mr. FOSTER. What have we in the way of records of the extended proceedings of the Hague Conference? To what extent are they available?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I could not say how many copies we have, but I know we have a full report. I will inquire as to the number of copies.

Sir ALLEN AYLESWORTH. As to copies of the award of the tribunal at the Hague last summer, I have already distributed a very considerable number of copies of the award and proceedings, to every library or institution that has applied to me, and I still have quite a number of copies on hand which I shall be very glad to distribute as necessity may arise.

Mr. FOSTER. For myself personally I should like very much to have a set of this, as a matter of record.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Are we to understand that the Hague Award has been printed and distributed, and that copies are available?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. The award may have been. I will inquire.

NEW ONTARIO AND QUEBEC RAILWAY COMPANY.

House again in Committee of the Whole on Bill (No. 170) to incorporate the New Ontario and Quebec Railway Company.

Mr. GRAHAM. This Bill was before the committee on Friday, and my hon. friend from South Simcoe (Mr. Lennox) asked that it should be allowed to stand.

Mr. LENNOX. I would like to have it stand, for the same reason that I have mentioned, that my hon. friend from Lincoln and Niagara (Mr. Lancaster) is not here, and he is attending to it. I move that the committee rise, report progress, and ask leave to sit again.

Motion agreed to, and progress reported.

GRAIN GROWERS' GRAIN COMPANY, LIMITED.

House in committee on Bill (No. 171) to incorporate the Grain Growers' Grain Company, Limited.—Mr. Rutan.

On section 12, authorized objects or purposes of the company.

Mr. SCHAFFNER. Does this clause permit the company to deal in options?

Mr. STAPLES. I would like an explanation from the member who has the Bill in charge, whether this legislation is similar to that incorporating other grain companies that hold Dominion charters; and also I would like to know whether, under this Bill, the Grain Growers' Grain Company will be permitted to deal in options?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. This Bill comes from the Senate. It has not been looked into, and I think perhaps the committee had better rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again.

Progress reported.

QUESTIONS.

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

JUDGES APPOINTED SINCE 1896.

Mr. LENNOX:

What are the names of the gentlemen appointed as judges by the present government of Canada since they came into power in 1896, the residences of these gentlemen at the time of appointment, the positions to which they were respectively appointed, and in each case where the appointee had a predecessor in the position during the time which the position was vacant?

Sir ALLEN AYLESWORTH. The information asked for in this question would be so voluminous that it had better take the shape of a return. It will take some time to obtain the information as to the residences of the gentlemen appointed, and the date of their appointments.

COOL CHEESE CURING AT BROCKVILLE.

*Mr. TAYLOR (Leeds):

1. Has the government sold the cool cheese curing room at Brockville? If so, at what price?
2. Did the government sell the machinery and fixtures with said building or separately? If separately, at what price?
3. What was the total cost of said building and machinery?
4. What was the total loss on said building and machinery?

Mr. LENNOX.

Mr. FISHER:

1. Yes, $1,241.42.
2. There was no machinery in the building except an elevator which was sold with the building. The lumber consisting of cheese shelves and some tools, chairs, &c., was sold separately, as follows:

Building	$1,075 00
Lumber	116 77
Tools, chairs, &c	19 65
Total	$1,211 42
From former sale of shelving	30 00
Total	$1,241 42

3. $7,553.26.
4. $6,311.84.

In addition to the above revenue from the disposal of the curing room, there should be included about $150 worth of lumber, weighing scales, cheese truck, which the department removed previous to the sale, which is being held for other purposes.

PRICES OF FARM PRODUCTS IN FOREIGN MARKETS.

Mr. LAKE:

What was the average price of beef, mutton, butter, and eggs for export at Buenos Ayres, Bahia Blanca, Sydney, Melbourne, Christchurch, Dunedin and Auckland, respectively, for each of the months of October, November and December, 1910, and January and February, 1911, or at such of these ports for which information is obtainable?

Mr. FISHER:

As the meat and butter exported from Australia and New Zealand is shipped to Great Britain on consignment, there is practically no export market in these countries for these products as the price is absolutely controlled by the English market. As a consequence the papers published in Australia give prominence to English market reports for butter and meats, but print very little information regarding local prices. A similar condition obtains in the Argentine. Great Britain is the market for their frozen and chilled meat which is either consigned or is sold by resident agents of the packing companies.

A few prices of butter and eggs in Australia and New Zealand have been taken from publications received from those countries. The Adelaide quotations have been taken from the report of the manager of the government produce export department as given in the journal of the Department of Agriculture of South Australia. The Sydney and Christchurch quotations have been taken from the Canterbury 'Times,' Christchurch, and the Auckland quotations have been taken from the Auckland Weekly 'News':

If the desire is to compare prices in these countries with prices in Canada it should not be forgotten that the months composing Canada's winter season would be in the Antipodes, the summer.

RECIPROCITY AND TRADE WITH FRANCE.

Mr. LENNOX:

1. If the proposed reciprocity agreement between Canada and the United States becomes law, will the rate of duty on any of our imports from France be in any way affected? If so, upon what articles and what will be the extent of the increase or decrease of the duty in each case?

2. What was the quantity and value of this class of imports, affected as aforesaid, during the last financial year?

Mr. PATERSON:

1. Under the proposed reciprocity arrangement between Canada and the United States there is no increase in the rate of duty on any imports from France. The duties on the following imports of French origin are decreased under the said agreement, viz.:

Item No. Canadian Tariff.	Article.	Rate under the Arrangement.	Rate under French Treaty.

WOLFE ISLAND CUSTOMS OFFICER.

Mr. EDWARDS:

1. Has any person been recommended for the position of customs officer on Wolfe Island? If so, what is the name of the person, by whom was he recommended, and when?

2. Is it the intention of the government to appoint a customs officer on Wolfe Island? If so, when?

Mr. PATERSON.

Mr. PATERSON:

1. There is no recommendation in this matter on the official files of the Department of Customs.

2. There are two Customs officials now on Wolfe Island. It is not the intention of the government, at present, to appoint another Customs officer on that island.

MR. FRANK THIBODEAU.

Mr. BLONDIN:

1. What is the present salary of Mr. Frank Thibodeau, postmaster of St. Maurice, county of Champlain?

2. How much does the government pay him for the carriage of the mail between the post office of that parish and the station of the Canadian Pacific railway?

3. How much does the said Frank Thibodeau receive from the government for his services as assistant guardian of the booms on the St. Maurice?

Mr. LEMIEUX:

1. $174 per annum.

2. $112.50 per annum.

3. $900 per annum, as boom-master on the Three Rivers station.

LIEUT.-COLONEL D. C. F. BLISS.

Mr. TAYLOR (Leeds):

1. Is Lieut.-Colonel D. C. Foster Bliss in the Militia Department? If so, in what capacity and at what rate of pay?

2. If so employed, is he the same person of similar name who was some years ago retired from the militia?

3. By whom was the reappointment of this officer recommended, and why was he originally retired from the militia service?

Sir FREDERICK BORDEN:

1. (a) Yes.

(b) As a temporary employee, compiling certain records of the department.

(c) $116.10 per month.

2. Yes.

3. (a) By the Quartermaster-General.

(b) On account of reduction in the establishment of lieutenant-colonels in the Ordnance Store corps. His services being no longer required in the permanent force.

MOUNTED POLICE—PAY AND ALLOWANCES.

Mr. MARTIN (Regina):

1. What are the rates of pay of constables and non-commissioned officers of the Royal Northwest Mounted Police?
2. What is the value of clothing, provisions and other privileges furnished at the public expense?
3. Is extra pay allowed for special services?
4. Under what conditions are pensions allowed, and what deductions are made from pay towards the pension fund?
5. In general terms, what is the annual value of pay and allowances to constables and non-commissioned officers?
6. Has any difficulty been experienced in obtaining recruits for the police force? If so, what is the cause of such difficulty?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER:

1. Constables, 60 cents to $1 per diem.
Corporals, $1.10 per diem.
Sergeants, $1.25 per diem.
Staff-sergeants, $1.50 to $2 per diem.
2. Constables, $335 per annum.
Corporals, $335 per annum.
Sergeants, $340 per annum.
Staff-sergeants, $345 per annum.
3. (a) Extra pay is granted to members of the force serving in the Northwest Territories and Yukon Territory, as follows:
Constables, 50 cents per diem.
Corporals, 50 cents per diem.
Sergeants, 75 cents per diem.
(b) Working pay to artisans, clerical staff, &c., not exceeding 75 cents per diem, in the provinces of Saskatchewan and Alberta, and not exceeding $1 per diem in the Northwest Territories and the Yukon Territory.
(c) Working pay at 25 cents per diem is granted to constables guarding prisoners employed at outdoor labour.
4. Constables and non-commissioned officers are entitled to pensions for life after the completion of 20 years service, or after 15 years, if incapacitated from the performance of duty by infirmity of mind or body. No deduction is made from their pay towards the pension fund.
5. The annual value of pay and allowances to constables and non-commissioned officers, is as follows—exclusive of extra or working pay included in answer No. 3:
Constables, $554 to $700.
Corporals, $736.50.
Sergeants, $796.25.
Staff-sergeants, $892.50 to $1,075.
6. No difficulty is experienced in obtaining recruits, but the higher rate of wages obtainable in the west induce a number of our best men to purchase their discharge, thus causing a wastage in strength and the necessity of engaging new men.

CANAL AT ST. PETER'S, CAPE BRETON.

Mr. STANFIELD:

1. Is it the intention of the government to construct a new canal at St. Peter's, Cape Breton? If so, when is the work to be commenced?
2. Is the old canal to be abandoned? If so, for what reason?
3. What is the estimated cost of the proposed new canal?

Mr. GRAHAM. $150,000 has been voted by parliament for this work. The details have not yet been decided on. It is estimated that the entire cost of the work will be in the vicinity of $300,000.

CANADIAN REPRESENTATIVE IN FRANCE.

*Mr. MONK:

1. Has the government provided for the replacing of Mr. Fabre for the representation of Canada in France?
2. Who has been appointed for the said representation, and has the government appointed several or only one person?
3. What salaries have been fixed for the person or persons appointed?
4. When will the new functionary or functionaries enter upon the performance of their duties?
5. Besides the fixed salaries will they have a provision for expenses?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER:

1. Yes.
2. Senator Roy, of Edmonton, has been appointed.
3. The salary is $8,000.
4. Immediately.
5. He receives no other remuneration than his salary.

FEDERAL AFFAIRS AT PILES.

Mr. BLONDIN:

1. Has the government received complaints, petitions or notices respecting the administration of federal affairs at Piles, county of Champlain, during the summer and autumn of 1910, and especially a petition of the citizens of Piles, of date 5th August, 1910, requesting a general and public inquiry into federal affairs at Piles? If so, has the government taken action on this petition, and has such inquiry been granted?
2. If so, who represented the government at such inquiry, and what was the result?

Mr. PUGSLEY:

1. Yes.
2. A report has been made by Mr. Roy, the engineer who was appointed to make inquiry. I should say that the hon. member who asks this question (Mr. Blondin), has withdrawn his seal of confidence which was attached to his letter, and therefore I intend to bring down his letter and also the petition and report of Mr. Roy, and lay them on the table of the House.

PENNY BANK ACT AMENDMENT.

Mr. FIELDING moved that the House go into Committee of the Whole on Thursday next, to consider the following proposed resolution:

Resolved, that it is expedient to amend chapter 31, Revised Statutes, The Penny Bank Act, and by such amendment authorize the Minister of Finance to fix and determine the rate of interest that shall be allowed and credited half-yearly on the amounts from time to time at the credit of the accounts of penny banks, incorporated under the provisions of that Act, in the government savings bank or post office savings bank, the rate so fixed and determined not to exceed one per centum in advance of the rate then payable to depositors in the government savings bank or post office savings bank.

He said: I beg to say that His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the consideration of the House.

Motion agreed to.

INDIAN ACT AMENDMENT.

Bill (No. 177) to amend the Indian Act. —Mr. Oliver—read the third time.

Mr. FOSTER. Has the Indian Act passed?

Mr. SPEAKER. Yes.

Mr. FOSTER. Well it has gone through very slick. I have been waiting and watching for it. I would not care to have it go through in that way unless I had an opportunity of moving an amendment to it. We discussed the question the other day, it was up again and the last impression I got from the hon. Minister of the Interior (Mr. Oliver) was that he had said that as these points were brought up he would move that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again. The committee must have sat again; I did not know that. Probably it might be taken as not being read the third time

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. If my hon. friend did not know that the third reading was moved we can recall it and take it up to-morrow.

Mr. OLIVER. I would just like to say that my hon. friend (Mr. Foster) is in error. At one stage of the discussion we did decide as he says, but at the latter end of the discussion we decided to have the Bill reprinted for the third reading, and then, if the hon. member from Montreal. St. Anne, (Mr. Doherty) did not find any objection, it would go to the third reading. I supposed that my hon. friend had no objection, or else there would have been something said about it. I do not wish, however, under the circumstances, to press the third reading.

Mr. FOSTER. All the more so as the hon. member for Montreal, St. Anne, is not here.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. We will take it to-morrow.

Mr. SPEAKER. With the leave of the House Bill (No. 177) stands for third reading.

WAYS AND MEANS—FESTIVAL OF EMPIRE.

Mr. FIELDING moved that the House again go into Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. BURRELL. Mr. Speaker, before you leave the Chair, I would like to read a couple of press despatches and call the attention of the government to a matter of some interest to all Canadians. The first despatch is as follows:

FESTIVAL OF EMPIRE.

Canada's Piece Cut Out as Objectionable to Americans.

London, April 25.—It was learned to-day that it was in consequence of communications between London and Washington, and hints to the Canadian committee, of which Lord Strathcona is president, that a decision is reached to eliminate from the coronation programme Canada's principal contribution to the pageantry 'Festival of the Empire.' The piece which has been in course of preparation at the Crystal Palace, and which called for 600 performers, entitled 'Chateauguay, where Canada was held for the empire,' was intended to represent the defeat of the invading American force in 1812 by a handful of Canadians.

After consideration it was thought that the pageant might wound the susceptibilities of American visitors to the coronation, and it was also suggested that a feeling might be caused in the United States that would endanger the conclusion of the proposed Anglo-American arbitration treaty. Rather than make either event possible the authorities decided to abandon the spectacle.

In a later despatch among several which I have here there is an extract from the London 'Standard' which reads as follows:

The Canadians have an incontestable right to occupy a very prominent and honourable place in the commemoration of the great deeds of empire. This particular incident, a happy selection in many ways, was not a British but a Canadian victory, which was to be fitly celebrated without the least wish to wound American sentiment. We cannot but regret that the scene has been omitted from the pageant at the last moment.

I do not know whether there has been an official programme of the Pageant of Empire issued, but I am sure that it is of interest to all Canadians to know what form Canada's participation in that great spectacle will take and I am also certain that it would be a matter of great gratification to all Canadians to know that the battle of Chateauguay was to be represented in the festival. The House is familiar with the details of that celebrated episode, one, not only of the most brilliant and most heroic, but one of the most decisive battles, with Lundy's Lane, in the whole war of 1812, a war, Sir, which we all know was one distinctly of defence when Canadians of all nationalities met for the common defence of their homes, their soil, and their institutions. I am not going to refer to the details of that encounter but we know perfectly well that it was less than a thousand French Canadians who, under de Salaberry, the gallant leader of the French Canadians, and the equally gallant Macdonald of Glengarry, who, by superior strategy and valour, defeated an overwhelming force of Americans at that time. As I have said, it was a war, not of aggression but of defence. This is literally true as far as Canadians are concerned, and I feel that every member of the House, and every Canadian, recognizes now that it had the most beneficent influence upon Canada's future, because, for the first time, that war, whatever its unjustifiable features may have been, welded together French, English, Scotch, and Irish. All were animated by one common spirit and by the noblest patriotism. I am quite sure that we all agree that stirring incidents of this kind which mark the special epochs in our national development should be commemorated and recognized by all Canadians. It has been finely said that as Canadians look down the corridors of time they will always see the flashes of the musketry and cannon of Lundy's Lane and hear the bugles blow which drove the invaders from the woods of Chateauguay. For these reasons, it is a matter of great regret that a decision has been come to to eliminate a spectacle of this kind at the Festival of Empire, where all races and all portions of the empire will be represented to celebrate the empire's heroic deeds. Neither can I think the House will come to the conclusion that the reasons given for the elimination of the pageant of the battle of Chateauguay are sufficient. We know that in New England there was a general condemnation of that war and I feel sure that the American people have long ago buried any feeling of animosity they entertained at one time. I might point out indeed that our good friends on the south of the line, for whom we have the kindliest feelings, occasionally, not only celebrate victories on their own soil, but come over to ours. In my own town many of our American friends have come over and celebrated the fourth of July right under our noses and on our own territory, and none of us felt any the worse for it. I am inclined to take with a grain of salt, the idea of wounding the feelings of the American people by celebrating the battle of Chateauguay. No Canadian would resent the fact that the Americans celebrate the battle of Bunker's Hill, if they desire to commemorate their own national achievements, and I am sure our American friends would take our celebration of the battle of Chateauguay in the same spirit. If we are to admit the principle that we cannot celebrate national achievements because it hurts the feelings of somebody then we might just as well cut out all celebrations of the kind. I take it that the government has been consulted with reference to these great pageants, and I would like the Prime Minister or the Minister of Agriculture, who sometimes has charge of these things, to explain how it is that an historic event of this kind, dear to the heart of every Canadian and recognized as an noble achievement in Canadian history, is to be eliminated at a time like this when every great deed in the empire's history is to be held up to the admiration of our people.

Hon. SYDNEY FISHER (Minister of Agriculture). The Battle of Chateauguay is one of the historic events in which Canadians have always taken pride, but I may inform my hon. friend that the pageants at the Festival of Empire are under the control and management of the committee in London, and the Canadian government has not been consulted with reference to them. What information we have on the matter is such as my hon. friend has seen in the public press, and whether that is correct or not I cannot say. We are taking part in the Festival of Empire but not in any of the particular pageants which have been proposed by the authorities of the Festival in London. I believe that Lord Strathcona is a member of the executive or management of the Festival of Empire, but just what part he has taken in regard to the pageant I do not know. Whatever he has done in that respect he has done as Lord Strathcona, and not as the High Commissioner for Canada.

Mr. BURRELL. Am I to understand that the government of Canada has not contributed, financially or morally or in any other way?

Mr. FISHER. We are contributing for the general expenses of the Festival of Empire, and possibly part of that may be devoted to the pageants, but the money is put into the hands of the committee in London for their purpose, and I do not know how it has been distributed. We are erecting a Canadian building which will have an exhibit of Canadian products and Canadian resources.

Mr. BURRELL. If the government is very anxious as to how the public money is expended it does seem to me that in an event of this kind they might insist on being consulted.

Mr. FOSTER. I am very glad that my hon. friend (Mr. Burrell) has brought this up. When I read the news item, it struck me as rather—I scarcely knew what word to express it—but I felt that Canada had hardly been used right. History is history, and those who are in charge of pageantry by which history is supposed to be truthfully delineated ought not on such an occasion as this to omit one of the most important and illustrious events in our Canadian history. It does not seem to me that the people of the United States would be likely to be in any way offended by this pageant being carried out true to history. I should not like to think so ill of our friends on the south of the line as to think they would take the least umbrage at seeing a truthful delineation of Canadian history. It seems to me that the omission is pandering to a rather mawkish kind of sentimentality.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Has my hon. friend (Mr. Foster) read the American school books upon the Battle of Chateauguay?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. It is not represented in them as a Canadian victory.

Mr. FOSTER. Then still less should they take objection to it. If my right hon. friend has read the old school books and old histories he probably may have read the new, and he will find that in the last ten or fifteen years the version of these old occurrences between ourselves and the United States has been very greatly modified in being more true to the fact.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I have not read the new books, but I know that in the old American school books the Battle of Chateauguay was never represented as a Canadian victory. For my part, I agree with my hon. friend (Mr. Foster) that this should not be a reason to eliminate the true character of that battle, for I believe that the Americans understand that history is history as has been said by my hon. friend (Mr. Foster). But the matter has been decided; it has not been referred to us, and really officially we have nothing to do with it. We contributed our money to the Festival of Empire which was placed in the hands of the London Committee and perhaps the committee has decided in this way. Had I been a member of the committee I would have decided otherwise.

ST. PETER'S INDIAN RESERVE.

Mr. BRADBURY. I desire to call the attention of the Superintendent General of Indian Affairs to a fact of very great importance to the administration of justice in the province of Manitoba. It will be remembered that some little time ago, while I was discussing the St. Peter's Indian reserve and asking for a Royal Commission to investigate that matter, the Minister of the Interior referred me to the government of Manitoba and said that if there was any prosecution or any investigation it should be made by the government of Manitoba. Other speakers on that side of the House made the same statement. The province of Manitoba guarantees all titles issued under the Torrens system and before the Registrar General of Manitoba can guarantee those titles he must be satisfied that the titles are good. The Indians allege that this surrender was obtained illegally and that the lands, after they had been given to them, were taken from them illegally. Consequently the Registrar General refuses to issue titles until there is a thorough investigation which will place him in a position to say whether or not the title is vested in the present holders. To that end, the government of Manitoba have appointed a Royal Commission for the purpose of determining whether or not the titles are good, and whether the Registrar General would be justified in guaranteeing them. To enable the commission to arrive at a proper conclusion it is necessary that they should have the original documents regarding this surrender. Serious allegations have been made by the Indians. On the strength of these allegations I myself stated in this House that forgery had been committed in the signing of receipts for the patents. This matter cannot be established unless the commission has the original documents. The counsel for the Royal Commission has written to me the following letter which I wish to place on 'Hansard':

Winnipeg, Canada,
19th April, 1911.

Dear Sir,—I have the honour to inclose you copy of letter written by me as counsel for the Royal Commission appointed to investigate the surrender of the St. Peter's reserve addressed to the Hon. Frank Oliver, Minister of the Interior. I also inclose you his reply thereto. Both letters are self-explanatory.

It is absolutely essential that the commission should have production of the original documents in regard to the surrender of this reserve, and since the Minister of the Interior suggests that an order of parliament should be obtained I take the liberty of requesting that you should move for an order of parliament for production of the original documents in connection with this matter before the Royal Commission. Will you be kind enough to advise me of the result.

Yours truly,
H. W. WHITLA,
Counsel for the Commission.

Geo. H. Bradbury, Esq., M.P.,
Ottawa, Ont.

I have here a copy of a letter written by the counsel for the commission to the hon. the Minister of the Interior:

Winnipeg, Canada,
12th April, 1911.

Dear Sir,—By order of the Executive Council of the province of Manitoba a commission has been appointed to investigate and report upon the surrender of the St. Peter's Indian reserve.

The commission has instructed me as counsel to request the production of the records of the Indian Office in relation to that particular reserve. Upon application to Mr. Semmens this morning he stated he would require some authority before he could permit either an inspection or production of the documents. I therefore take the liberty of writing you to ask if you will be good enough to instruct Mr. Semmens, or the agent in charge of the Winnipeg office, to permit an inspection by and to produce to the proper agent of the commissioners all the documents relating to the surrender of the Indian reserve. Trusting that you will see your way clear to give this necessary authority,

I am, yours respectfully,
(Sgd.) H. W. WHITLA,
Counsel for the Commission.

Hon. Frank Oliver,
Minister of the Interior,
c/o Royal Alexandra Hotel, City.

H.W.W./R.

The Minister of the Interior replies as follows:

Winnipeg, April 12, 1911

Dear Sir,—Yours of the 12th of April to hand requesting inspection by a commission appointed by the government of Manitoba of papers connected with the surrender of the St. Peter's Indian reserve.

In reply I beg to say that until otherwise advised, I am not aware that the government of Manitoba has authority to request an inspection of the documents in question.

All documents connected with the transaction of business by the government of Canada can properly be produced for inspection on an order of parliament or of the courts.

I would suggest that the commission take this means of securing the inspection desired.

Yours faithfully,
FRANK OLIVER,

H. D. Whitla, Esq.,
Box 1556, Winnipeg, Man.

Mr. Speaker, my object in bringing this matter before the House is to have these documents produced. I realize that if I place this motion on the order paper, it may be days or weeks perhaps before it is reached, and as my only object is to facilitate the work of this commission—and I am sure that the minister must be as much interested as I or any other man in Canada to see that this matter is cleared up—I would ask the minister if he would accept an order of the House for the production of these papers.

Mr. OLIVER. The facts in connection with this matter are as my hon. friend has stated. I am not desirous of in any way impeding the work of the commission appointed by the government of Manitoba, but, having a certain responsibility in regard to the custody of the documents, I would ask my hon. friend to let the matter rest until to-morrow, when I will be able to give him a definite answer.

EMIGRATION FROM CANADA TO UNITED STATES.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Mr. Speaker, I wish again to direct the attention of the government to the subject of emigration from Canada to the United States to which I alluded last year. At page 5524 of 'Hansard,' of last year, I set forth a statement which appeared in the annual report of the Commissioner General of Immigration for the United States. It appeared from that report that the total immigration into the United States from Canada during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1909, was 96,520, and that, after eliminating certain portions of that immigration which could not be properly classed as actual immigration from Canada to the United States there was found to be a total immigration into the United States from Canada of 61,038, according to the returns made to the Commissioner General of Immigration of the United States and as embodied by him in that report. I also called attention to certain rather important statements in his report of that year, in which he gave reasons why the immigration into the United States from Canada had increased in so marked a degree during the twelve months covered by his report.

I have now the report of the Commissioner General of Immigration for the United States which gives the returns up to June 30, 1910. According to these returns the emigration from the United States to Canada during the twelve months mentioned amounted to 116,377. The report classifies that emigration as follows: United States citizens, 78,697; Canadian citizens, 15,203; other aliens, 22,477; making a total of 116,377. During the same period the emigration from Canada to the United States, according to this report, was as follows: United States citizens, 22,832; Canadian citizens, 44,328; other aliens, 27,336; making a total of 94,496. If these statistics are correct, the balance of immigration into Canada from the United States over the emigration from Canada to the United States was a little less than 22,000, which result, I am bound to say, is one that I would hardly have expected. I do not know whether the hon. the Minister of the Interior has any observations to make on these statistics; I do not know whether they are accepted by the government as accurate. There does not appear to be any official information available in this country as to the number of persons leaving Canada for permanent residence in the United States. In other words, although we have very full, and I believe very complete statistics of immigration into this country, I do not know that we have any statistics of emigration from this country to the United States or elsewhere. Am I correct in that regard?

Mr. OLIVER. Yes.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Well, there may be difficulties in the way of obtaining and preserving such statistics, of which I am not aware, but otherwise I would be very much inclined to think that we might very well follow the example of the United States and compile and publish statistics not only of the immigration into this country, but of the emigration from this country. That is done in the United States in a very complete way. Not only do they keep statistics of all the persons leaving that country, but they classify them as United States citizens, Canadian citizens, and other aliens, so far as those statistics relate to emigration from the United States to Canada. Similarly they divide the emigration from Canada, to the United States into three classes—United States citizens, Canadian citizens, and other aliens. I am bound to say that I think it would be greatly to the advantage of the country if we knew at the present time, as we do not seem to know, from what provinces of Canada, and in what proportion from those provinces, this very large emigration of nearly 95,000 persons has gone during the fiscal year ended the 30th of June, 1910, if the figures of the United States Immigration Department are to be accepted as accurate. We know that at one time there was a very considerable emigration from Canada to the United States, especially from certain of the eastern provinces. We had been led to believe that that emigration had almost wholly ceased; but if these figures are even approximately correct, it is evident that our belief in that regard was not based on a very sure foundation, because it is rather astonishing to find that in a single year no less than 94,496 persons have left Canada for permanent residence in the United States, and that these figures comprise 44,328 Canadian citizens in addition to 22,832 United States citizens, and 27,336 aliens not being citizens of Canada.

Mr. FOSTER. How do their figures of emigration from the United States to Canada compare with our figures?

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). It is a little difficult to compare them on account of the difference in the fiscal year. They give their figures for the year ending the 30th of June, while our figures are given for the year ending the 31st of March. In the United States returns they are given by months. I do not know whether or not ours are so given. However, I thought the matter worthy of some attention from the government, and, therefore, I have brought it to the notice of the House. I would be very glad if the Minister of the Interior would give us any observations which would indicate whether or not these figures are to be accepted as substantially accurate, and, further, whether there are in his opinion any serious difficulties in the way of inaugurating a system by which statistics of emigration as well as immigration may be compiled in this country in the future, for the information of parliament and the people.

Mr. OLIVER. There is no doubt a considerable reciprocity in population between Canada and the United States, and has been for many years, and will continue to be. We try to keep account of the people coming from the United States to Canada with the intention of residing in Canada. We think our figures are accurate or fairly accurate; but it must be quite evident that figures calculated as ours must be, cannot by any possibility be absolutely accurate; they can only be approximately so.

Mr. FOSTER. How do our figures of immigration coming from the United States agree month by month with the United States figures of emigration from the United States?

Mr. OLIVER. I could not give my hon. friend a statement that would have serious value; but I am under the impression that there is a wide divergence between the figures, and it is easy to see how that divergence might take place. We may have one standard of calculation, and they may have an entirely different one. We may consider a person an immigrant, whom they would not rank as such. Their system may be more comprehensive than ours.

Mr. FOSTER. Is the basis the same?

Mr. OLIVER. I am satisfied that the basis is not the same.

Mr. FOSTER. In what is the difference?

Mr. OLIVER. I am not able to give my hon. friend detailed information; I am speaking subject to correction in a general way. When the estimates were up for consideration, this matter was brought to my attention, and I pointed out to the committee then that it was quite possible to secure such information for Canada as was already secured for the United States. It would mean a very considerable increase in the cost of our immigration service and would not produce any immediate or direct beneficial result. So, up to the present time, we have not asked parliament for an appropriation to enable us to make such a count and calculation. It is a serious question for parliament to consider whether the value of the information would be equal to the cost. For my part I think that, up to the present time, we have been well advised to spend our money and energy in dealing with the people who are coming, rather than with the people who are going. We were not able to prevent them from going or we would do so. But by spending our money as we have been doing, we have been enabled, certainly, to bring people here and this has resulted in our material benefit. If a count of people going could reasonably be expected to result in the formulation of a policy that would prevent their going, I could see a sound reason for the expenditure. But unless and until some such policy is in near or further prospect, I should think it was a matter to seriously consider whether we could afford to put the money into the service or not. It will be understood by the House that people move sometimes because of the conditions in which they live, but most generally because of the conditions in the place to which they are going. That is to say, we attract people from the United States and Great Britain, and from other countries of Europe, not so much because of the conditions surrounding those people at home, as because of the advantages they hope to gain in coming to our country. So, the people who leave Canada for the United States, we may reasonably presume, do not leave so much because of the conditions in Canada as because of the expectations they have of conditions in the United States. That being a matter that is not in our control, we cannot be sure that we should be able to frame a policy that would have any serious result, even if we had the information. That is the view that the department has held up to the present time. We are prepared, of course, at any time, to take stock and count of the people who are going out, if parliament is so minded, and is prepared to supply the necessary funds.

Mr. FOSTER. I think that the minister (Mr. Oliver), if he will consider the matter a little, will see that there are a number of good reasons why we should have this information which we evidently lack, according to the figures and statements which have been made and presented by my hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. Borden, Halifax). It is quite as important in its own way to know the stream of people that is leaving us, and from what quarters of the country it is leaving us, so as to get at the reasons for the stream going out from the country, as to know what population is coming to us, and the sources from which it comes. It seems to me there are strong economic reasons for our knowing that state of facts, in order that we may find out the causes of the outflowing stream. I do not think it would involve a great deal of added cost. You have your customs house officers and immigration officers, and they take charge of the stream that comes in, they trace it, number the individuals and forward their reports to the department. The places of ingress into the country, other things being equal, are the places of egress from the other country. Immigrants coming into Canada generally come with effects, and they have to pass the customs, so it is not difficult to keep count of them. Emigrants from this country also take personal effects, and they have to pass the customs line on the other side, and so it is not difficult to number them. But there is another consideration. We are buoyed up by the favourable information of one side only. Every year the minister tells us: Everything is going well; we are spending a great deal of money, but we are getting in many immigrants, settlers who are just that much added to the country.. But it would be a dffierent tale if the minister were to come down and tell us of the number that have left Canada. I do not recollect the numbers shown by our figures who have come in from the United States last year. But suppose we call it a hundred thousand,—I do not think it was one hundred thousand. We have been going on with the idea that we have attracted to us from the United States one hundred thousand people, and so are that much better off. But up comes the United States official—and their officials are well trained and their statistics far ahead of Canadian statistics—who says: Yes, you did get somewhere near one hundred thousand people from the United States, but ninety-four thousand came into the United States from Canada, so that the net gain is very small. We have been pluming ourselves upon despoiling our neighbours of a number of their eligible cultivators and other inhabitants, but it seems to be without any real reason. Now, does not the minister think that in the interest of true knowledge and for the purpose of obtaining complete statistics, which will set forth all the important facts on both sides—and these statistics alone are valuable—we should go far enough in the direction proposed to enable us to get the real results? My hon. friend has stated that in former times great numbers of people went from Ontario and also from the maritime provinces to the United States. The platform orator on the Liberal side says that all this is stopped, and that the stream is now coming from the United States towards this side. But that, it appears from the figures the United States are publishing is a misrepresentation, and when we subtract one figure from the other there is very little difference between the streams; the reciprocity in population which my hon. friend talks about, seems to be about on an equal basis. I think, therefore, the minister should get his statistical branch an order so as to be able to keep account of the population going out and the sources from which it goes, as well as keeping a similar account of the population that comes in. For it would be a great advantage, if a certain stream was going, for instance, from Quebec, or from any other part of Canada, to inquire into the cause for this movement of population. Knowing the reason, and desiring our country to increase in population, not only the Dominion statesman, but the provincial statesman as well, will have a basis for their policies and can plan their work with a view to offseting the movement of the people from our country. Certainly, as it looks, now, it is impossible for us to say whether we are gaining in population as between ourselves and the United States. Certainly, as it looks to me, it is impossible for us to say whether we are gaining much as between ourselves and the United States.

Mr. PATERSON. I do not quite agree with my hon. friend that our statistics are less valuable and reliable than the American statistics. I think we have very good statistics.

Mr. FOSTER. What I intended to say was that our statistics, what we have of them, may be very good; still we are away behind in statistical work as compared with the United States. That has been clearly shown within the last two months.

Mr. OLIVER. I wish to correct the impression my hon. friend has given to the House. We have no statistical branch in our department. The work of our agents is either to induce immigration or to facilitate immigration, and the statistics we gather are merely an incident. The United States, on the other hand, has a statistical branch for the purpose of gathering statistics. We are prepared to establish a statistical branch if parliament orders it. But we have not been authorized to do so, we have not the money to establish it, and we can only get the information such as my hon. friend suggests when parliament gives us the money for that purpose.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Do I understand the hon. gentleman to say that the United States has a distinct statistical branch?

Mr. OLIVER. They have a very much more elaborate service than we have, and the collection of statistics is an important feature of their service. The collection of statistics is a serious part of their immigration service, whereas it is merely incidental in ours.

Mr. PATERSON. The figures quoted by the leader of the opposition did not seem to us as if they could be correct.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Rather unexpected.

Mr. PATERSON. I think so. I do not know what other statistics we could get, or how they might be collected. But you can approximate. If their method is to count every one that goes into their country, of course you get a very large number.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). If the minister will look at the United States immigration report of a year ago, he will obtain full information as to just how they make it up. There were seven classes I think last year, and in making the calculation I did at that time, I omitted three or four of those classes as not properly coming within the general principle of immigration from one country to the other. But taking the four remaining classes last year, I think about 67,000 of actual immigrants went from Canada to the United States. I merely desired to say that full information is given in that report as to the methods they use, and the principles they have adopted in compiling these statistics.

Mr. PATERSON. This question was up a number of years ago when I was on the Agricultural Committee, and then we found great difficulty in reconciling the statistics of the two countries. We had our reports, of so many coming into Canada and so many going out; and actually those reports showed that not only had we lost every immigrant that came into Canada, but we had lost a lot of our actual increase as well. I merely wish to say to the leader of the opposition that if they connect with this statement he has read any account of settlers' effects, it will not prove anything conclusively, because settlers coming to us from the United States might bring with them a larger quantity of effects, and they might be worth a great deal more than effects going from our country into the United States. Now we have the value of household effects returned in our exports going to the United States. These export entries are made by parties who are leaving our country, we collect from the customs the export entries made by the men who are leaving the country. These are declared by the parties going away, and they are supervised by our officers. I only give this as a kind of a rough test to show that there must be some difference in the way the figures are collected in the two countries as read by the leader of the opposition.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Is there a record kept of settlers' effects exported?

Mr. PATERSON. Yes. I say the figures are not conclusive with reference to the number of individuals, but they must be of value as showing that there is a much larger proportion of immigrants from the United States into Canada than from Canada into the United States. For instance, last year, of household effects, there was entered by parties leaving Canada to go to the United States, $2,076,137; while the value of settlers' effects entered as coming from the United States into Canada was $7,613,553, nearly four times as many. Now I say the figures read by the hon. gentleman are not conclusive because they may be varied by circumstances. I cannot think myself that there is anything like the proportion of people leaving Canada to reside permanently in the United States that there is of people coming in from the United States to reside permanently in Canada.

Mr. EMMERSON. I have reason to know that the methods of classification to the south of us are very different from those adopted on this side of the line. It is no use for any one to say that there are not people going from Canada into the United States to reside permanently, as there have been for years. The restlessness of our people would perhaps be one reason. However, whatever the reason may be, there is at times a movement towards the United States. It must be borne in mind that at certain seasons of the year there is a stream of emigration particularly from the maritime provinces, to the other side of the line, and recognized by our people as a movement into the United States, men going temporarily to engage in various occupations. From my own county I know that every spring a good many people, particularly from among the French Acadians, go over into Massachusetts and other New England states to work in the quarries, to engage in farming operations, while they leave their families at home. There are others who go early in the spring to engage with the Gloucester fishermen. They go from Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island and Newfoundland, and during a certain season of the year they are engaged in fishing on board the American ships and sailing under the American flag. They then return. There is an annual stream returning every autumn. Many men who become involved financially in connection with their property go away, engage in certain occupations, make some money, come back and pay off their debts. This fact is perhaps within the knowledge of every member from the eastern provinces and from the province of Quebec. In the fall the men who go from our northern counties in New Brunswick to the state of Maine to engage in lumbering operations can be counted by the thousands. But, they return in the spring. Under the methods pursued by the United States authorities, those whom I have named are classified as immigrants into the United States. Necessarily there must be discrepancies between any record which we may have, or any estimate which we may make, and their record of this incoming and outgoing population. There are unquestionably some who permanently leave the maritime provinces and settle in the United States. That must be so because I believe there are perhaps more Nova Scotians in Boston than there are in the whole city of Halifax. But that has been going on for years and there is this movement back and forth, which is temporary in its nature but which is calculated to mislead.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Does my hon. friend from Westmorland (Mr. Emmerson), mean that these men would be classed as immigrants into the United States when they go into the United States, but that they would not be classed as emigrants from the United States when they return to Canada in the autumn? I am speaking altogether of the United States classification.

Mr. EMMERSON. I think that is the case. They do not keep a record of those that are coming back.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Oh, they do keep some record, because they set it all forth in their statistics, but it may be that they adopt a different principle in one case from that which they adopt in the other, although one would think that they would adopt the same principle.

Mr. EMMERSON. I can speak from personal knowledge with respect to that. The movements from the maritime provinces towards the United States are either over the Maine Central railway or by the steamship lines leaving St. John, Yarmouth, or Halifax. The American authorities take a minute record of every one who goes in through any of these channels. I know, as a matter of fact, that in going, particular inquiry is made of each passenger, of every one who may be on board the train or on board the steamer, but on returning, when they leave Boston or Portland or any of those ports, a record is not taken of those who come back into the maritime provinces. I know that for a fact, and I think it explains in a great measure many of the difficulties that present themselves in thinking out the question or in attempting to reconcile the apparent differences. I can quite appreciate what my hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. Borden, Halifax), has said. We are led to believe that there are a great many coming into Canada, or at least that there have been during the last few years. If it were true that there were those leaving our shores, in great numbers to settle in the United States we might well pause to inquire just what is the net gain that we are making. It would be a very desirable thing, I am sure, to have this record if one could be accurately secured, but it becomes a question of the expense and of the ultimate value of such a record.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. While I in no manner at all challenge the honesty of the statistics of the United States in regard to the exodus of Canadians to the United States, the older members of the House remember, and are fully aware that the accuracy of those statistics was more than once challenged on the floor of this House. Some twenty years ago or thereabouts, the subject of the exodus of Canadians to the United States was one of constant debate in this House. The numbers of Canadians who were then going to the United States was very large, undoubtedly. But I remember distinctly that on a certain occasion—and I am sure that if my hon. friend from North Toronto (Mr. Foster) taxes his memory, he will remember it also—that Mr. John Henry Pope—I just forget the year exactly, but it was about twenty years ago, when he was either Minister of Agriculture or Minister of the Interior—had a special inquiry made into this subject of the exodus from the province of Ontario to the western states. At the beginning of a session, when the matter was again brought up, he gave the result of his inquiry and it was shown that the statistics which were given by the American authorities—I will not say were not reliable—but were altogether contradicted by the inquiry which was made under the authority of Mr. Pope. If I had the time I am sure I could lay my hands upon this volume of 'Hansard,' although I am quite sure that my memory is absolutely accurate in regard to my statement of what occurred on that occasion.

Mr. BLAIN. I think the question the House has been discussing for a short time, introduced by my hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. Borden, Halifax), is a very important one. I remember that last year when my hon. friend the leader of the opposition directed the attention of the hon. Minister of the Interior (Mr. Oliver) to this important question, he startled the House, and, I think caused some surprise among Canadians in every part of Canada. For the last ten years we have heard a great deal of discussion in this House with respect to the large number of people who are pouring into Canada, and during the last four or five years we have had special emphasis placed upon the fact that a very large number of people are leaving the United States and coming into Canada to pursue their agricultural interests. I take that to mean that the agricultural interests of Canada are in a very much better condition than the agricultural interests of the United States. We have been told in this House from time to time that there is practically no class of people leaving Canada, and going to the United States now. In listening to the discussion the other day I noticed that the hon. member for Compton (Mr. Hunt) said in his speech:

> A great many young people in my country are selling the old homesteads and moving across the line.

I suppose then we are to take it, Mr. Speaker, that there are a good many young Canadians leaving Canada still. When I have read the statistics showing the large number of people coming into Canada from the United States I have wondered that this was not a greater cause of alarm to the American people. I was very much surprised that the newspapers in the United States, Congress, the Senate and leading men generally, have not taken up this question more earnestly than they have. The answer, I suppose, is in the figures which my hon. friend the leader of the opposition has presented to the House. They are in a position to know whether they are getting in a sufficient number of people to offset the exodus. The Commissioner of Immigration has been questioned before the Agricultural committee with regard to this matter, and his answer always is that it is practically impossible to keep any record of the large number of Canadians that are going to the United States, but the Minister of the Interior now tells us this can be done if it were not for the expense. In my opinion a reasonable sum of money would be well expended to ascertain actually whether we are the gainers or the losers. Year after year parliament is being misled if the figures given by the leader of the opposition are approximately correct, and I think they are. The Minister of the Interier must no longer delay a thorough investigation into this matter, and if his department requires a small statistical branch for that purpose, parliament would willingly vote the money. After every census we are disappointed at the showing, even though we know a great number of people have come into Canada during the previous ten years, and I have no doubt this is due to the fact that while it is true we are gathering from the United States, it is also true that we are sending in return some of our best people. The Minister of the Interior and the Prime Minister himself should take into consideration the providing of means to ascertain how many Canadians are leaving our shores and going to the United States, so that a remedy may be applied.

Mr. SCHAFFNER. When we were discussing the vote for immigration this question was discussed by members on this side of the House, and I think we demonstrated to the satisfaction of the Minister of the Interior that there should be proper means taken to discover how many Canadians go to the United States year after year. Years ago the Liberals reproached the Conservative party because so many Canadians, and especially those from the maritime provinces, left Canada for the United States, but I believe that the same conditions prevail to-day, and probably in a more intensified form. I understood the Minister of the Interior to tell us when discussing the estimates that he thought the present statistics were unreliable and that steps should be taken to ascertain the real facts, but he seems to have forgotten that promise. The figures given by the Minister of Customs are likely to be explained by the fact that the Canadians who are going to the United States, especially from the maritime provinces, are young men and young women, the best of our land, while those who are coming from the United States to Canada come largely to the three western provinces and are farmers who bring with them their implements and their horses and cattle. As they can buy horses in the United States more cheaply than they can in Canada—a point which bears upon the reciprocity agreement—they bring their horses across the line with them and their cattle too. If we had proper statistics prepared I believe it would be found that as many or probably more of the young people of the maritime provinces are going to the United States than ever before. This is greatly to be deplored because we have lots of room for them in the west, and we want them there.

Mr. MAGRATH. I have no brief to speak for the United States immigration officials or the statistics which they present from year to year, and while I am prepared to believe the statement of the right hon. gentleman that some years ago the statistics were not reliable, yet I believe that the influx of vast numbers of Southern Europeans into that country made it necessary that the authorities should take cognizance of that condition and present the fullest information to the public regarding the character of the immigration, so that to-day I regard their statistics very complete. I am not so much concerned about the completeness of statistics merely to record the movement of people. Immigration is the most important question the people of Canada have to deal with because it means the very lifeblood of the nation. The minister has said that if parliament wishes for fuller statistics he is willing to make the arrangements, and to see that they are secured. In my opinion it is absolutely in the interests of the country that he should take such a course at once. If Canada is the great nation we believe it to be, and if we are going to have vast masses of people pouring into our country, it is in the interest of all the nation that figures should be placed before us representing the exact character of that immigration. In the statistics presented to parliament now we are told of a certain number of United States' citizens coming to Canada. We know that the greater portion of citizens are created in the United States just as they are in Canada, that is through immigration. I, therefore, think that the country of origin should be specified. A citizen from some part of southern Europe goes into the United States, stays there a few years and becomes a citizen of that country. Then if he enters Canada we should have information of the race from which that citizen sprung, in other words the immigration from the United States should state if native born, and if not, from whence they originally came. I think it is absolutely necessary that we should have fuller statistics so that the people throughout the country can study these ethnological questions.

Mr. PERLEY. It is patent that the ministers have shown that their statistics are no good, that they have no statistics of any real value, and I do not think anything has been said by any of them to disprove or cast any doubt on the American statistics brought forward by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Borden). The Minister of Customs (Mr. Paterson) when he rose first, started to say that our statistics were good statistics, but the Minister of the Interior was too quick for him, he rose to interrupt him to prevent him saying something he would be sorry for. He promptly told him that these statistics of the Interior Department were only an incident, that he had no officers to get statistics, and when the Minister of Customs rose afterwards, he did not tell us that the statistics of the Canadian government were good, he had found out that he was mistaken, and was prevented from making a bad misstatement. This merely confirms what was said the other day in a debate regarding statistics about the reciprocity treaty. We then found that this government had no statistics regarding prices, that they never tried to get any, that the American government had plenty of statistics which they have published, and seem to have at their fingers ends. All the information the ministers had was what our good friends on the other side were kind enough to give them.

The Minister of Customs says that this question has come up many times, that he remembers some years ago when he was on the Committee on Agriculture discussing this matter, and he found the statistics very difficult to understand. He said that it sometimes appeared from the figures as if all our immigrants had gone to the United States, and in fact sometimes even part of our natural increase. The member for Souris (Mr. Schaffner) has partially explained this, but to my mind there is another explanation. I think that many people from Europe who come into Canada nominally as immigrants to this country really come here for the purpose of going to the United States. They are counted as immigrants coming into Canada; our friends the government pass great numbers of them, and when they enter the United States they are counted as immigrants going to the United States. We probably all know of our own knowledge that immigrants have come into Canada and stayed here a short time, merely for the purpose of going to the United States. Why do they come here first? They come here on account of our extraordinary system of bonusing immigrants and also on account of the fact that the United States is much more careful in the inspection of immigrants arriving in their ocean ports, New York and Boston, than of immigrants entering from Canada at border points. The Minister of Customs has given some figures with regard to settlers' effects which the member for Souris (Mr. Schaffner) has explained very well. I do not see that these figures disprove the immigration figures which have been quoted from the United States authorities. It is true that many of the immigrants coming into Canada from Europe afterwards go to the United States, and it is quite evident that they will not have, per head, anything like the amount of settlers' effects that the people will who are coming from the western states into Canada, who have been farmers for many years, and who are bringing over all their personal effects. So I do not see that the dollars worth of settlers' effects quoted by the Minister of Customs disprove in any way the statistics which the United States government has provided on this subject. So long as the ministers of the Crown in this House have to admit that they do not know anything about our statistics, that they have no proof whatever that they are of any particular value, just so long they must abide by and agree to these statistics provided by the United States.

Mr. PATERSON. The leader of the opposition did not attach much importance to them apparently.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I said nothing of that kind.

Mr. PATERSON. You doubted them.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). No, I did not seek to challenge them at all. I asked whether or not their accuracy was challenged by this government, or accepted by them. So far as I know the Immigration Department of the United States government is as well organized a department as exists in the world, and I say that after having made some personal investigation of it, because I went to Montreal on one occasion, and spent two days in examining their methods. I am bound to say that any man who takes that trouble to understand their system will be convinced of the truth of what I have said. I would not for a moment cast a doubt on the accuracy of their statistics, but I do not know the principle on which they frame them. I repeat that the results set forth in their report of last year, and of this year were absolutely surprising to me, but that does not mean that I am challenging the accuracy of their statistics. I would be very sorry to do it.

Mr. SHARPE (Lisgar). The Minister of Customs (Mr. Paterson) says the Americans count every person going into the United States. That is what our officers do with every person coming into Canada. If a man from the United States comes into Canada wishing to buy land, he is counted as an immigrant. We find that last year 103,000 came into western Canada, but if you look up the records to see how many took up homesteads, you will see that only 14,000 did so. A great many of these others who came into western Canada simply inspected lands, looked into the conditions there, and if they were not satisfactory, went back without buying, and a great many bought land, and returned to the south.

I rose principally to protest against the immigration of negroes into western Canada. We, with British Columbia, wish to see a white west. We do not wish that kind of immigrants coming into western Canada, and I wish to protest very strongly against this government allowing them to enter western Canada.

Mr. FOSTER. I would like to suggest that we do not meet here another year to discuss this question of immigration and have the Minister of the Interior or the Minister of Customs, ignorant as to whether the same basis of counting is used on the United States side and on the Canadian side. Any clever man, in either of these offices, could go over to the United States and analyse that matter, in company with the officers there, and find out exactly what the differences are, if any. My own opinion is that there is some difference; how far it goes we do not know; but I think it is the first duty of the government to eliminate that lack of information and get to the foundation of fact in reference to it.

Mr. CAMPBELL. It affords me a great deal of pleasure, Mr. Speaker, to realize that the ministry realize their absolute incompetence as compared with the American administration with regard to this item of immigration. For years there have been hundreds of thousands of Americans coming into the Canadian west, and they are among the shrewdest of the farming community from the different states. They have come to better their conditions. For years they have had this ninety millions of population to sell their products to; but they have realized that their condition would be better in Canada under the protection that we have had here in the past. They leave the United States and come to Canada with two or three carloads of stuff. When they leave their own states their horses are worth only $108 a head; when they land them in Canada they are worth $130, $140, or $150. Their milch cows which are worth only $40 a head in the states, are worth $48 when they are landed in Canada. It is the same with their swine, their sheep and any other live stock they have. I do not refer to the conditions that may prevail if my right hon. friend carries through the reciprocity agreement which he proposes, and which we do not propose he shall. These people are wise people; they have been trying to make a livelihood on the other side and have not been successful, and they realize that in Canada they can be successful owing to the protection that they have in this country. They do not want the ninety-million market; they want the market that we have in this country, with the protection that prevails. That is the reason they have been coming here in hundreds of thousands. For that reason, and that reason alone, I would submit to the First Minister that he had better revise his judgment with regard to the farmers of the west and reciprocity. One other matter I wish to refer to, and that is what my hon. friend from Lisgar (Mr. Sharpe), has said with regard to the negro immigration into the Canadian west. It is a question that no man in politics desires to touch, for many reasons, but it is a question that every man in Canada in his heart thinks over. It is a great big question on the other side of the line, and we on this side should do everything in our power to keep it there, because it is a question which, in the minds of many of the deep thinkers of the United States, is going to be one of primest importance to the standing of that country inside of a very few years. It is a matter of the gravest importance, and one that is almost beyond the pale of parliament to discuss—not because it is not worth discussing, but because it is of such great importance that it should be discussed absolutely outside of partisan lines and only in the interest of Canada. It is a matter that I do not wish to touch, and that I would not have referred to had it not been referred to by my hon. friend from Lisgar. I almost regret that it has ever been brought up, not only on this occasion, but on other occasions, because the people of that race have a standing in Canada, and have shown their worth, and we can only judge of their failings as a people by what has occurred in the south. For that reason I do not wish to discuss the question here. I would caution the Minister of the Interior with regard to bringing people into Canada from southern Europe. While we on this side of the House approve of all northern European immigration, we absolutely disapprove of a certain class of southern European immigration as detrimental to the west; and when I say that I have only to quote his own words uttered in this House with regard to the Galician immigration. The bread he cast upon the waters at that time will come back to him bearing fruit in as many folds as he likes.

Mr. STAPLES. One matter to which I think the government should pay a little attention, is the special concessions which an immigrant from the south receives from the various railway companies. A man from across the border gets from them a rate of a cent a mile to any part of the west, while a good Canadian who wishes to make the same trip has to pay the regular rate. Now, that is an unfairness to our Canadians. The same would apply to young men who are coming from the maritime provinces. If they wish to come to the west they have to pay the usual rate, unless they can come on a homeseekers excursion such as occasionally takes place, but, of course, it is not convenient for all to come just when a homeseekers' excursion is leaving. So, this is a clear injustice to the Canadian homeseeker who wishes to locate a homestead in the western provinces. The minister should look into this and see to it that our good Canadians at least are given the same consideration as is given to those who come from across the line.

Mr. OLIVER. As this is a new matter, I desire to say a word at once with regard to it. It is a matter which has engaged the attention of the department. We have discussed it with the railway companies,—and,of course, so far as we are concerned, it is in the control of the railway companies absolutely. We have not been able to induce them to do differently from what they have been doing. They have business reasons of their own for the policy they pursue. The alternative appears to be that if attempt were made to press upon them to give the same conditions to our own people as they give to people from the United States, they would simply withdraw the concessions they give to people from the United States.

Mr. HENDERSON. This subject of immigration is one of great interest, but in the discussion of the last hour and a half it has been one of great disappointment also. I have never given great attention to the study of immigration statistics, but, reading newspaper reports, and listening to the statements of the Minister of the Interior, I have been lead for years to believe that we were gaining, through our immigration system, very large additions to our population, and very considerably so from the United States—at a cost to us of a good deal of money. The Minister of Customs (Mr. Paterson) has thrown some light on that matter this afternoon. He has taken the settlers' effects as a guide. He read from the Trade and Navigation returns showing that last year's settlers' effects from the United States to Canada amounted to $7,613,500, and that settlers' effects from Canada to the United States amounted to $2,076,000. I can well understand the large amount of settlers' effects from the United States into Canada, because the arrivals from the United States in our western provinces almost always carry large quantities of farm machinery, horses, cattle, wagons, &c. But, to my mind, the Minister of Customs may be a little out of the way when he makes the value of settlers' effects the basis of a comparison showing the number of people coming into and going out of the country. The hon. member for Westmorland (Mr. Emmerson) spoke of the migration from the maritime provinces to the United States. From the character of that migration, I should suppose the people going from the maritime provinces had taken very little with them, whereas the people going into the western provinces from the United States bring a great deal. I think it would not be too much to say that the value of the settlers' effects coming into Canada would be three times as much for the average individual as the value of settler's effects carried by the people from the maritime provinces going into the United States. That may be even a little under the mark. If, for the sake of the comparison, we say that the people coming from the United States into our west bring $3.50 in settlers' effects for every $1 that is taken out by our people going from the maritime provinces to the United States, we find that practically we have an equal movement of emigration and immigration. I am a little afraid that that is really the case,—that we are losing just as much as we are gaining. We shall have to await the census returns to see if that can be verified or not. But it does look as though, while the minister is spending a great deal of money and filling up the western country at what we might call the bung-hole, he is neglecting to see how much is running out of the spout from the maritime provinces. From what has been said this afternoon, I am very much afraid that our net gain is very little. I hope the Minister of the Interior will, even if it costs more, carry out some system of keeping track of the people that go out of the country. It cannot be expected that this is to be done without money; but I am not aware that this parliament ever refuses any reasonable appropriation for any purpose of correct and useful statistics. The subject is so interesting and important, that I am sure parliament would gladly provide the money. I was much surprised to learn that no real account is kept of the people going out of the country as well as those coming in. The Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) referred to what had occurred about twenty years ago and what was said on the matter. We all remember the howl of Sir Richard Cartwright, particularly with regard to the exodus. He magnified it to such an extent that I believe he got away beyond the bounds. He talked about the people we were losing and about there being a million native born Canadians in the United States at that time. I do not know whether he got his figures from the American returns or not, but I always thought he magnified them, and magnified them for a purpose. He did it to show that the National Policy had failed. And we have the National Policy to-day, with what hon. gentlemen opposite say are improvements made in it by themselves, yet the population seems to be going out of the country as fast as it was then. I merely rise to voice my opinion in favour of the Minister of the Interior taking steps to get for the future more correct statistics than he has been getting with regard to the people leaving the country.

It would be just as interesting to us to know whether we are losing population as to know whether we are gaining it. My opinion is that we are losing about as much as we are getting, so far as the United States are concerned. No doubt the figures furnished us by the Department of the Interior are fairly correct of the number of people coming in from Great Britain and European countries. We are not losing people going across the water. I trust the minister will take the necessary steps to inform us in the future as to the movement of population both ways, not only from the United States into Canada, but from Canada into the United States.

Motion agreed to, and House went into Committee of Ways and Means.

WAYS AND MEANS — RECIPROCAL TRADE WITH THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. W. B. NANTEL (Terrebonne). (Translation.) Mr. Chairman, the circumstances surrounding this reciprocical convention are somewhat special and very interesting. First, the measure came to us in a very sudden and unexpected manner, as is the government wanted to bring upon parliament and the country a bunch of surprises, as if their intention had been to cause us a surprise. In 1910, it was the War Navy ; in 1911, it is the reciprocity. But not a word had been said during the general election of 1908 of these most vital and serious questions. At the very first session, thanks to the German scare, a ghost sprung for a purpose, we are launched at full steam in the military imperialism, and, in 1910, the German scare being over, the government gave us this famous navy, Canadian at time of peace, British at time of war. In order that the people, especially of the province of Quebec and of the West, should forget the navy, and to distract public opinion, the government brings up the reciprocity.

When the general elections of 1908 were over, and there was no fear of the electorate we went full sail into naval militarism. In 1911 after the famous election of Drummond-Arthabaska, when the salutary fear of the voter began to tell upon the government, they try on something to show that they want to kill commercial imperialism itself. What then of the argument brought during the election of Drummond-Arthabaska, that the government was creating a navy in order to protect our oceanic trade. One more contradiction dont count much with our hon. friends opposite, principally when the cup is full.

Where are those who in Canada, in these last years, ask this reciprocity with our neighbours? The great national policy has caused in this country a great many struggles. Inaugurated in 1878 by Sir John A. Macdonald, modified in 1897, but maintained in principle by this government, as we have been told by the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Sifton), who knows pretty well, because he, along with his collegues at that time, the hon. Minister of Finance took part in this tariff reform ; this national policy, as I said, had been definitively accepted by the two parties and was giving satisfaction to the Canadian people. New cities were springing up everywhere like magic and existing cities were doubling their population.

Mr. DEVLIN (Wright). (Translation.) Since when?

Mr. NANTEL. (Translation.) I say since both parties have agreed to put in force a policy of protection, of moderate protection, it is true, but at any rate a policy of protection. That policy has developed the local market, surely the most profitable for us, and that market, supplemented by the interprovincial trade, takes up almost all of our natural products, that is to say, about 80 or 85 per cent, for local consumption. So that there remains only about 15 or 20 per cent of our surplus production which is sent over to Great Britain through our improved system of transportation which has cost us a great deal of money, and to the United States despite the walls put up by themselves, for they are absolutely in need of some of our products as raw material to feed their industries, for instance, wood for the manufacture of paper, and our hard wheat for their flour mills, stuffs which they are so badly in need of that they would have gladly taken them from us, with or without reciprocity.

Who are they then who are clamouring for this arrangement? You may be sure it was not the manufacturers, or the farmers of Quebec or of Ontario, still less the fruit growers and gardeners. The fruit growers have insisted that there should not be any change in the tariff. The opinion of manufacturers regarding this arrangement is known. Who then was asking for it? The grain growers in the west alone complained. With, as appetizers, the speeches made by the right hon. gentleman the Prime Minister during his trip through the west last summer. They, to the exclusion of all others, asked that our fiscal laws be changed. To the children of the soil the answer was that they came too late. To the grain growers, born in foreign lands, and who only of late years joined the Canadian household, greetings of welcome were extended. Is that because they seem to be the wards of the financial nabob, of the railroad king, James J. Hill? Quite possible. Their demands have been in the main complied with, and yet they are not satisfied. As a matter of fact, what they are after is unrestricted reciprocity. They are quite outspoken in the matter, adding that they will keep on fighting until they get what they are intent on obtaining. It is clear that these gentlemen have a great pull, and at the time of their visit to Ottawa during the winter, it was contended that they had come under the patronage of Hill, and even that the latter had paid their railway fares.

Now, who are these grain growers, and are they so very much to be pitied? Are they humble toilers of the soil, poor fellows who barely manage to eke out a living, like those who formerly in Quebec and Ontario cleared the bush, wielding at times the axe, and at times shouldering the gun to fight away the Iroquois? Not by any means; they are wealthy farmers who migrated from Dakota and elsewhere, and who, after selling their farms at advanced prices, settled in the Canadian west with a view to securing for themselves larger farms at the rate of $10 an acre.

While travelling through the west, during the autumn of 1909, I came across one of these pure-blooded Yankee grain growers in the vicinity of Calgary. I was in company with a lands agent who introduced me to that gentleman farmer. Instead of painfully cutting and turning over the furrow with the help of oxen, as described by the poet, he had recourse to a traction engine, and over his immense domain, everything was done by steam. He had come in the warm season to put in the grain; in the autumn he was to return to see to the threshing and to figure out his thousands of bushels of grain before the wintry weather set in, then he would go down south to enjoy a milder climate, in the vicinity of Los Angeles, where he intended to spend the winter and make the most of life, which as he thought, was very short.

Of course, I do not mean to say that all grain growers are as wealthy as this man; but they are not the most to be pitied amongst Canadians. These grain growers should be treated fairly, and their just requirements complied with, in the same way as those of other members of the great Canadian family; but they should not expect us to subvert and disorganize the fiscal system which is found to be satisfactory to Canada.

The treaty of 1854, which remained in force until 1866, gave rise to discussions which lasted eight years. That famous fiscal arrangement which we are called upon to ratify to-day, has more importance than the treaty of 1854, for as a matter of fact, its scope is wider, and why then should we be expected to dispose of it in the space of a few months. We did not hear of this measure until after New Year's. Ratified in the United States by the House of Representatives, it is now before the Senate. As will be seen, matters are being pushed ahead rapidly. Evidently the grain growers who are the promoters of this move, patronized by Hill, who is interested in the passing of the Bill, have a great deal of pull.

The last person to take a hand in promoting this fiscal measure, was Mr. Bryce, British ambassador at Washington. I shall quote from the 'Gazette' of April 24, 1911, the following extract:

(Text).—Mr. Bryce, ambassador of Great Britain to the United States, has been at Detroit speaking in praise of the Canadian reciprocity arrangement. Lord Sackville, one of Mr. Bryce's predecessors at Washington, twenty-three years ago, was sent home for talking too much about United States political issues. The precedent was not a notably decent one, however, and may be barred by the statute of limitations as to such matters. And Mr. Bryce may be privileged.

(Translation.) As may be seen, great interests are involved in this question, and one might surmise that this reciprocity scheme originated in the minds of the President of the United States, and of the British Ambassador, Mr. Bryce, to favour the political aims of the president of the United States and of the Liberol party, as against the Unionist party in England. Must it be understood that the fate, the destiny of Canada is an incident, a side issue in the political warfare going on between the parties in those countries. The United States are in a state of unrest, there is a crisis impending, while here in Canada business is flourishing. Last autumn, in the United States elections were fought on the question of the cost of living. The Democratic party won out against the Republicans. A change of government is about to be affected; a reform is needed to remedy the present state of things, and the government which is about to come into power, is bound to apply that remedy which is the lowering of the tariff. So that, even should that arrangement not be ratified, there would be a change, and the best proof as to that is that, just now, in the United States Congress, they are discussing the free list, that is an enactment allowing the free entry of goods corresponding practically with that implied in this famous agreement. Consequently, it is likely that had we delayed, we might have obtained, without making any concessions ourselves, the advantages secured through this treaty.

In Canada, where everything is satisfactory, shall we, to help on our neighbours who need medicine, take the same medicine, though in perfect health? For the sake of our neighbours, shall we run the risk of contracting disease?

Now, this agreement is being made with a government about to fall from power. It is a foregone conclusion that before long, there will be a change of government, and as a consequence a change in the tariff, as the Democratic party are on the eve of taking hold of the government. In the meantime, we are going here to considerable pains in view of a state of things which is not at all likely to last very long, a state of things as problematical as a game of bluff, played by these parties in the United States to get hold of power.

An agreement has been gone into with a government which possibly may not be in a position to meet its obligations. True, the House of representatives has approved this agreement, but should the Senate reject it, it would mean to Canada a setback even more humiliating than those we have experienced in former times. Should not our plenipotentiaries have waited a little while and make sure that the government which was a party to this contract would be in a position to carry out their promises?

As I stated a moment ago, this famous question of reciprocity, as well as that concerning the navy, has never been submitted to the people at the general election of 1908. Have we a mandate to settle that reciprocity business? We have at most a general mandate, but no special mandate, since the question has never been submitted to the people. I know that parliament has the right to do anything it pleases. My professor in constitutional law taught that parliament was able to do anything except changing man into woman. Formerly, party leaders made known to the people, in a general election, their policy, the important measures which they proposed to submit to parliament. It is no longer the fashion to-day. The high art consists in not revealing anything to the people, in going through an election in sphinx-like fashion. By-and-by, vital issues are submitted to parliament, as, for instance, the question of the navy and that of reciprocity; then supporters are whipped into line, the benefits of patronage are dangled before their eyes, and everything goes. Later on the electors are acquainted with what has been done, with the heavy expenditure incurred, and the disadvantages incident on a withdrawal from the position taken are emphasized. If the people approve of what has been done, so much the better; all is well that ends well. If the people withhold their approval, well, at any rate, the party will have enjoyed the exercise of power, four or five years in the meantime. That is a simple and practical device. If, in 1908, when, in his most touching tones, he appealed to his compatriots in Quebec, praying that they allow him to carry through his undertaking—the National Transcontinental railway—the Prime Minister had requested them besides to empower him to provide the country with a war navy and to conclude a treaty of reciprocity with the United States would the results have been the same? To say the least, we are justified in having our doubts as to that.

But this agreement is either good or bad. If it is really beneficial, why has it not been concluded for a given period, and why has it not been safeguarded against, put beyond party warfare and intrigue, especially on the other side of the frontier? The treaty of 1854 was passed for a period of ten years; otherwise, our neighbours would not have been long in denouncing it. Enlightened by past experience, our plenipotentiaries, if they were satisfied that they were making a good bargain with uncle Sam, should have laid down a fixed date, ten or twenty years, and thus secure to us the benefit of it for as long a period as possible.

Who then requested for either country the privilege of abrogating the treaty at will? Was it the representatives of the United States or those of Canada? That would be interesting information. Our plenipotentiaries, always careful to withhold from us information in this connection, have not told us about it. If such a clause was included at their request, they certainly blundered, since they were satisfied that the bargain was beneficial to us.

Stability is indispensable in tariff matters and treaties. The weak point in this arrangement is its unstable character. How should Canadians be expected to make preparations for taking advantage of that market, seeing that our neighbours are at liberty to shut them out at a moment's notice?

The mere fact of our making the best of the opportunity offered might be sufficient reason in he eyes of our neighbours to deprive us of that market. It should be evident to all of us that the Americans, having abrogated the treaty of 1854 because they considered that, all things taken into account, we had the best of it, do not make this offer for our own sake. The fact that no definite period is indicated shows that our representatives themselves who concluded the arrangement did not have absolute confidence in that measure and accepted it as something doubtful, and rather risky as regards any benefits it might confer upon us. It is an experiment, implying some risk and uncertainty, and in exchange for that risky and uncertain prospect, we are asked to give up what we possess as a certainty. That fiscal arrangement is a medicine which our plenipotentiaries are desirous that Canada should take, though in good health, while they are themselves unable to give the assurance that the medicine will give good results, or even is perfectly safe. All they can say, is that should the medicine turn out to be noxious, we shall give up taking it.

Another grave defect of that agreement, consists in discriminating against certain classes of the people, refusing to some of them the protection which it ensures to others in such a way as to develop antagonism and cause friction, and that should make it short-lived, if ever it is fit to live. For instance, it refuses protection to the market gardener while it grants it to the grain-grower. Every one knows that there is a great deal of capital invested in market gardening. Market gardeners are actually manufacturers, but this agreement withdraws all protection from them.

However, it is stated that a market of one hundred millions is going to be opened to us. That is all very fine, but it should not be lost sight of that the Americans are a people of producers and exporters of products similar to ours, and on a larger scale than we are ourselves. Without referring to any statistics, I may state, relying on those previously supplied, that the United States are about the country which exports the largest quantities of products similar to those we produce ourselves. Moreover, this agreement opens our doors to twelve other countries against which we are protected for the present by our fiscal laws. True heretofore our trade intercourse with these twelve nations has not been very extensive, but who can foretell what extension such trade may not take when free entry to our market is given them?

The object of the Americans in showing such generosity in this trade arrangement, was to draw to their country our natural products, the raw material, such as pulp wood, wood pulp and our hard wheat, which they cannot do without. Under that trade arrangement, we are running great risk of injuring our local market and interprovincial trade.

For instance, who does not realize to-day the importance of our local market? There is no need of statistics for that object; it is enough to be a consumer, to supply oneself on the Montreal market or elsewhere, to know that the prices which farmers sell at to-day are exorbitant and have reached their top limit. It is not within the memory of a man that from $13 to $15 has been paid for a hundred pounds of pork, $12 for a hundred pounds of beef. The prices of these products could not therefore be higher. If, under this arrangement, it is hoped that such prices will be further increased, then woe to the workingmen and consumers in the cities.

On the other hand, the farmer may suffer from a fall in prices though the competition of products from the Argentine, which is one of the countries to which we give free entry under this arrangement, and which through the conservation of meats in cold storage compartments, will be in a position to cater to our markets, with the result that our farmers may be obliged to sell their own products a little cheaper. To this our opponents answer that the agreement under consideration will have the effect of enabling our farmers to get higher prices, while consumers will get commodities cheaper. These two contentions are difficult of agreement. If sane reasoning cannot show the absurdity of such a stand, it will of itself fall to the ground. If the farmer gets a higher price, surely it must be that the consumer is made to pay that higher price. Nowadays production is very costly, because labour is expensive. Farm help is very dear just now, and there is no means of extending farm operations unless there be more help available.

A few days ago, the hon. member for Montcalm (Mr. Lafortune), while acknowledging that this agreement might interfere with certain occupations, such as that of the market gardeners, contended that the latter, might alter their system of farming and grow hay, for instance, in accordance with the new system advocated in this House; that of the continous growing of hay on the same land.

But those good people who formerly accepted literally the teachings of the Minister of Agriculture surrounded by his agricultural lecturers, and who, in accordance with such teaching, devoted their whole attention and energy to market gardening or to dairying, would be obliged to alter their convictions and accept the agronomic heresies of that same Minister of Agriculture who has become a political partisan; all this in spite of the opinion of the specialist, Professor Robertson, of MacDonald College, who declares that fifty million dollars' worth of butter exhaust the soil less than one thousand tons of hay worth $14,000. Really, our farmers will be very much perplexed if they understand that the American hay market may be taken from them at any moment, whereas they are always sure of selling at all times their fruit, vegetables, butter and cheese.

This agreement, moreover, is bound to disorganize and injure our transportation lines as between the different Canadian provinces, on one hand, and on the other in communicating with outlying countries, more especially with British possessions and even with the capital of the empire; it will become impossible to complete and improve such lines. In this respect the denunciation of the treaty of 1854, by which our neighbours intended to injure and annoy us, has proved a boon. Had that treaty continued in force, would we to-day have those railways and waterways which cross our territory in every direction? They have cost us much money, but we are proud of them, feeling as we do that they are our best asset. Would we then have made such gigantic progress in the building up of the Canadian nation? I say that we would not. Being deprived of the American market, which was then our only market, we were obliged to count upon ourselves alone. We have created our local and interprovincial markets; we have succeeded in reaching the British market, the most important in the world. There still remains for us much to do in that direction in the way of improving and perfecting our national organization. If the bulk of our produce, by reason of the new state of things that it is wished to establish, take a different direction from that which we have devised—perhaps somewhat in opposition to ordinary geographical rules —where will be, in future, the stimulant required to induce us to extend and improve those transportation lines. It is not plain that there will be none? What will become of the Georgian Bay canal and other works of a similar nature? If this agreement were ratified, the trend of trade instead of being east and west would be north and south; the direction would be changed and our product following the waterways of the great lakes would accumulate at St. Paul for the benefit of Americans and to the detriment of our own transportation.

Such a policy implies free trade in natural products and in certain manufactured articles. It is the first step towards absolute free trade in all products; it is a foretaste of free trade not only with the United States but with all countries. To establish and justify free trade in all products, it would be sufficient to resort to the same process and use the same arguments which are set forth in support of the present agreement. It is, therefore, a return to the programme of unlimited reciprocity, the only difference being that it is reached by a more tortuous way. As a matter of expediency, now as in 1897, the principle of protection, is apparently maintained. But, in reality, as I have before stated, this agreement is but a disguised return to the free trade programme of 1891, a return to unlimited reciprocity. It is quite plain that not daring to make such a move openly it is sought to attain the same and by indirect means.

The hon. member for Humboldt (Mr. Neeley) at a meeting of the faithful held at Ottawa, said:

> The manufacturers are not hurt by this agreement, but they realize that once the people taste the sweets of freer trade in natural products, they will demand freer trade in manufactured goods as well.

For my part I believe in the policy of protection, especially in a young country possessing raw material and all the water-power that can be desired; a country, moreover, surrounded by protected states. I cannot accept this agreement, which I consider wrong and dangerous for the country.

Protection saved France, and thanks to protection Germany is threatening Great Britain's commercial supremacy, and even causing the latter some anxiety as to her naval supremacy. I fear those free traders to whom free trade is as a religion. They ardently support the present measure in the hope that it is but the forerunner of a more complete surrender. I have quoted the member for Humboldt. I might also quote the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Ralph Smith). In the course of the debate the hon. member for Red Deer, that paragon of free trade, that proud disciple of Cobden, gave full scope to his free trade ideas under the paternal eye of the hon. the Prime Minister, and as he spoke his chief seemed to drink in each one of his words as if they had sprung from the very fountain of youth. They seemed to make him twenty years younger and bring him back to the times of the 1891 campaign.

In support of this opinion, let me quote from a portion of the letter of Sir Charles Tupper to Mr. Fielding, which is published in to-day's issue of the Montreal 'Gazette,' the title of this article is 'Macdonald versus Laurier' and reads as follows:

MACDONALD VERSUS LAURIER.

> You say that Sir John A. Macdonald was in favour of reciprocity in 1891; but you do not explain that he was fighting a desperate battle to prevent Laurier and Cartwright, who were co-operating with Wiman and Farrer—avowed annexationists—from carrying unrestricted reciprocity with the United States, which involved Canada taking the tariff made at Washington, with its discrimination against Great Britain.
> Have you forgotten that the Hon. Edward Blake left his party on the ground that that policy would end in annexation to the United States, which, at that important crisis, you supported? The policy for which Laurier and Cartwright and Wiman and Farrer were struggling.
> It is true that in the struggle, which cost Sir John A. Macdonald his life, in maintaining British institutions for Canada, we succeeded. But before the election Mr. Laurier made the following solemn declaration:—
> 'I have read the history of unrestricted reciprocity in this way—that every reform has cost to the reformer years of labour, and those years of labour I, for one, am ready to give; and though the Democrats may be defeated in the States, and though Canadians may grow faint-hearted in Canada, the Liberal party, as long as I have anything to do with it, will remain true to the cause until that cause is successful. I will not expect to win in a day, but I am prepared to remain in the cool shades of opposition until the cause has triumphed, and you shall never hear a complaint from me. I tell you the Liberal party will never cease from the agitation until they triumph and obtain continental free trade. We are asked, sometimes, gentlemen, what is the programme of the Liberal party. This is the programme of the Liberal party, to obtain a continental freedom of trade. Success will certainly crown our efforts at no distant day. Fixing our eyes steadily on the goal, we shall go on steadily until we reach it—unrestricted continental reciprocity.

Further in the same letter:

> I am opposed to your agreement with the United States, because Mr. Bayard in 1888 assured Mr. Chamberlain and me that the policy of the Democratic party was to remove as soon as they were able the duties on all the articles in your agreement, and President Taft now sees that he can only secure his re-election policy.
> We owe nothing to the Republican party, and would gain everything without any entangling alliance, which will, I fear, end in the destruction of British institutions in Canada.
> You ventured to claim the prosperity of Canada as due to the Laurier government. You cannot deny that, without confederation and the construction of the Canadian Pacific railway, Canada could not have attained the great position that she has.

Further again:

> Mr. Laurier (now Sir Wilfrid) pledged to tear up protection and triumph on its head and body, succeeded in obtaining power by a Janus-faced policy on the question of race and religion, but not until he had secretly assured the manufacturers that they would be safe in his hands, and then called you to his aid as Finance Minister, and you, having failed in your first effort, which I denounced, succeeded.

At six o'clock, House took recess.

After Recess.

House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. NANTEL. (Translation). Mr. Chairman, when the House rose at six o'clock, I had laid down as a proposition that this commercial agreement was an earnest, a preparatory measure as it were or the coming back to free trade, and in support of this statement, I had quoted extracts from a letter of Sir Charles Tupper, that veteran of Canadian politics who in his 90th year, is by no means willing to allow hon. gentlemen opposite to misrepresent his statements. In support of this view, let me quote a few extracts from a speech delivered a few days ago in New York by the President of the United States, Mr. Taft.

The treaty provides for free trade in all agricultural products; and in rough lumber down to the point planning. It reduced the duties on secondary food products by a very substantial percentage and it makes such reductions on a number of manufactured articles that those engaged in making them have assured us that the reductions will substantially increase the already large Canadian demand for them.

And further on he adds:

We tendered to the Canadian commissioners absolute free trade in all products of either country, manufactured or natural, but the Canadian commissioners did not feel justified in going so far. It is only reasonable to infer, therefore, that with respect to these articles upon which they refused free trade to us, they felt that the profitable price at which they could be sold by our manufacturers in Canada was less than the price at which their manufacturers could afford to sell the same either to their own people or to us. Hence it follows that their refusal to agree to free trade in these articles as we proposed, is the strongest kind of evidence that if we should take off the existing duty from such articles coming into the United States it would not affect in the slightest degree the price at which these articles could be furnished to the public here. In other words, the proposition to put on the free list for entrance all articles that Canada has declined to make free in both countries would not lower the price to the consumer here.

And further on :

It is said that it injures the farmers. I deny it. It is strictly in accordance with the protective principle that we should only have a protective tariff between us and countries in which the conditions are so dissimilar as to make a difference in the cost of production.

The president then entered into an extended argument to prove that conditions of production in Canada were substantially the same as those in the United States. The difference, if any, was in favour of the United States as that had a greater variety of product cotton and corn, and hogs and cattle fed on corn were distinctly better crops in the United States than in Canada, he said, while the difference as to wheat and barley and oats was the same in different parts of both countries

And further again :

He realized he said that the agitation had raised opposition to the agreement. There was one way to clarify the situation, however, and that was to give the agreement a trial. If it were found that there was an injury to the farmers they possessed sufficient control by legislation to cause the ending the agreement, as neither country was bound to continue it indefinitely.

Finally :

There are other natural resources which I need not stop to enumerate, which will become available to us, as if our own, if we adopt and maintain commercial union with Canada, and this is one of the chief reasons that ought to commend the Canadian agreement to the farseeing statesmanship of leaders of American public opinion.

It appears therefore, from this speech delivered by the president, that his intention is to promote free trade between the two countries, not only in natural but also in manufactured products. One of the motives of the agreement is to give Americans free access to our natural resources.

As I am now referring to this question of natural resources, I will remark that this agreement appeals so little to Canada, that the different provinces and more especially three of the most important ones. have adopted restrictive legislation to protect their natural resources.

Let me first mention the provinces of Quebec and Ontario, who have enacted special statutes to protect the export of timber to the United States. And since the present treaty is on its way—it is now being discussed by the United States Senate—New Brunswick has adopted a statute to protect the natural resources of that province against American invasion.

The hon. member for Red Deer, in his speech on this question, spoke enthusiastically of the condition of workmen in Great Britain. He intimated that notwithstanding free trade, British labour is the best paid in Europe.

A most singular fact! If wages are so high in England, why should there be in that country a constantly increasing army of unemployed, offering a most difficult problem for British statesmen? Why are there so many people idle? Why has it become necessary to have recourse to special legislation for the relief of the poor by establishing the system of old age pensions? If free trade is useful in certain respects, it seems also to give rise to many drawbacks. Is not pauperism one of the curses of England? Is it not so serious a problem that statesmen have sought to solve it by the statute voted on the 1st August, 1908, and which in 1909-1910 costs the country two hundred and eighteen millions of francs and in 1910-1911 two hundred and thirty millions? Therefore, the advantages of free trade do not go without serious drawbacks. England, that predestinated country where free trade, like the River Pactolus, was going to bring prosperity, is also the country in which the government is most at a loss to find new sources of taxation to feed the ever growing budget.

Allow me to quote here a few lines from a very interesting book entitled 'The English Crisis.'

Grave still is the downfall which threatens a nation where the people live almost exclusively in cities. It is impossible to travel through England without being struck with the contrast between the labouring masses in the cities and the peasants. Nothing can be more lamentable than the sight of the populace that assembles in Trafalgar Square in winter or that of the masses that fill the political meeting halls in the populous quarters of London; the men are nervous, pale and stunted, alcohol and tea have dissolved their muscles and made them an inferior race. A gulf growing deeper every day separates this populace from the prosperous and wealthy classes trained in the sports of the public schools, and also from the higher class of working men who enjoy leisure and play football. To find that impression of strength formerly resulting from contact with the Anglo-Saxon, one must travel through the rural districts. There, John Bull survives: the yeoman farmer appears, his pipe between his teeth, his hands in his pockets, his broad sole set flat on the ground, his self-satisfied smile showing his confidence in the strength of his fists and of his jaw. It is not surprising that the founder of the Physical Education and Progress League, Sir Lander Brunton, found in the abandonment of farms for the cities, in the drift to the urban centres the primary cause of the degeneracy of the English race.

Protection, properly applied, more than any other fiscal system is calculated to secure the necessary revenue for the development of our country and for the immense works which yet remain to be accomplished in a young country like Canada. We require a large revenue to complete our transportation lines and our national public works. If this agreement were ratified, the hon. the Finance Minister might be unpleasantly surprised when he came to make up his next budget speech.

He figured that the decrease in revenue would reach $2,500,000; but I believe the amount should be doubled to cover the actual decrease. The more satisfactory arrangement is, the more will the revenue fall, and if we are anxious to carry on existing works or to start others, it will be necessary to get the necessary funds.

But it is contended that the arrangement does not concern manufacturers. There is no need for discussing that point; it is perfectly well known to what extent manufacturers are effected: they themselves feel the blow aimed at them and the harm it has done. They are moving accordingly, and are eloquently demonstrating the falsity of that contention. They realize the position in which they have been put, and they have reason to be suspicious. The policy of protection, definitely accepted, in 1897, by both parties, gives satisfaction to all, and they are anxious that it should be maintained. An era of prosperity and a great swing of progress had been the result of its application, but this agreement upsets and turns everything up side down. It deprives us of all control over our tariff legislation, and puts us in many respects under the thumb of our neighbour. It does away with the principles laid down by the right hon. Prime Minister who declared on several occasions that there would be no further change or alteration of the tariff without the parties interested being notified in advance, and an investigation carried on by a commission of experts in connection with which all interests affected would be heard. This agreement does away with those principles and radically changes a large part of the tariff, without putting these people on their guard. If it has been possible to effect those changes, many others may be effected in the future.

I say that this agreement will make us utterly dependent on the Americans as regards our fiscal legislation. I see, for instance, among the articles included in the free list, separators and cream separators which were, it is true, on the free list under the statute, but to which, at the next revision, it might have been possible to ensure legitimate protection. I contend that these apparatus should be protected, even should the only result be to prevent the importation into Canada of inferior makes which are sent from all quarters. As long as this agreement remains in force, we cannot think of protecting that industry without the consent of our neighbours, otherwise the whole agreement falls to the ground.

Then again, that arrangement will prevent American industries requiring our raw material to settle down in Canada; they will build preferably within the territory of the United States. That is only natural; but it means a loss of capital to Canada.

Another objection to that treaty is that we are dealing with a people much stronger than ourselves. A people of one hundred millions against one of eight millions; it is a giant dealing with a dwarf. At the first difficulty which may arise, the dwarf will be overcome. Force overrides right very often. It is always unsafe for the weak to associate with the strong; the story of the iron pot travelling in company with the earthen pot should teach us a lesson; at the first jar the earthen pot goes to pieces. When Canada's population reaches the twenty-five or thirty million mark; when it has completed its system of transportation, and built the Georgian Bay canal, it may then be desirable for us to negotiate a treaty of commerce with the United States. But I believe that until we have reached that point of development, it would be highly imprudent to conclude such an arrangement with our neighbours.

Now, it is stated: this is a new market which is opened to us and we are not in any way deprived of our present markets. That is so, provided this treaty has not the effect of injuring our local market, for this new market can be taken away from us at the very moment when we least expect it. The interprovincial trade is of great value to us, and as evidence I may point out that timothy seed—an article which the farmer cannot do without—is so scarce just now in Montreal that it is selling at $15 a hundred pounds. Why? Because, it appears, the seed sown last year has been shipped to the west to fill orders of the trade in that district. That gives an idea of the importance of the local and interprovincial trade. I believe that if we should lose that market, we would find no equivalent in the one which this arrangement proposes to secure to us.

In respect to loyalty, it is contended that our loyalty to the British flag should not be made dependent on the sale to the Americans of a few bushels of wheat or a few bales of hay, more or less. Quite right. On the other hand, fortunately, the future of Canadian trade, thanks to the energy of our Canadian statesmen, since the abrogation of the treaty of 1854, no longer depends on the sale of these few bushels of wheat or bales of hay to the Americans. Owing to the sacrifices we have made, to the great works we have carried through, we are independent from those who were intent on starving us in 1854. Why should we once more put ourselves at their mercy? We have secured to our products a goodly part of the British market, the best in the world; let us endeavour to retain it and develop it as much as we can.

Are there any who sincerely believe that if the treaty of 1854 had not been repealed, Canada would occupy a position as prominent as that it now occupies. I say no. Had not that treaty been denounced, we would have remained forever under the control of the Americans. That repeal was then beneficial to us. Why should we once more agree to being dictated to by the Americans?

Annexation has been referred to. I for one have no fear of wilful annexation, especially as long as there are in Canada French Canadians having a word to say on the subject, for my fellow-citizens feel that they are fairly dealt with under the protection of the British flag, that their religion, their language and their institutions are secure under the constitution and that they enjoy greater safeguards in the folds of that flag than they likely would in the folds of the stars and stripes. I am aware of all that, but I am also aware that the most prominent of American statesmen who discussed the question of reciprocity in rather reckless fashion made a plea for annexation which should induce us to be careful, and which even statesmen in Germany have considered worth while discussing in their parliament. I am also aware that several of our most prominent Canadians, who are no longer in politics, have pointed to annexation as the inevitable outcome of it all. In any case, if there is no real danger of annexation, it must be admitted that the Americans have not been able to conceal their innermost thoughts in this connection.

However, a real danger is that of the seceding of some of the western provinces, especially if there be no closer control exercised over the character of the immigration going into that part of the country. Americans have been coming into Canada for several years back at the rate of 50,000 or 60,000 per year, on an average. Should those proposals be ratified will the result likely be to attract here a still larger number of Yankee settlers? It seems to me it will. I stated in 1909, on the floor of this House, that this immigration was not of the best and the most desirable type. I say so once more.

Those American railways which have terminals in our country and make themselves at home in our country are another source of danger; they attract our trade as so many suction pumps, and take it to the other side of the line.

A striking fact is that the originator of the policy which is responsible for the two danger points implied in these proposals, the man who more than any other helped to bring them into existence, the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Sifton), has seceded from his leader on this very question, and is fighting the government. It is unfortunate that he did not find his Damascus road at an earlier period.

It is contended that the markets which are open to us to-day will continue to be open to us in the future. Yes, provided they are not injured by the new impulse given to our trade in other directions. It is evident that should the bulk of our trade take the direction of the United States in direct line from north to south, along the various railway lines owned by James Hill, acting as so many suction pumps and drawing our wheat towards the United States flour mills, our railway and steamship lines will be running empty and the companies will soon be tired of carrying on an unprofitable business. It will be found more difficult to undo such a state of things than it would be to prevent its establishment. That is a grevious danger which these proposals will only tend to make worse, a danger to which we should not close our eyes.

The hon. Minister of Finance, speaking the other day at Montreal, said:

> There is a distinct danger that the east and west may be brought into antagonism if not into open hostility.

Further on he added:

> The west is going to dominate Canada and we who live in the east, if we are wise, may as well see that and look ahead.
> What kind of west is it going to be? A wise prudent and sympathetic west, or a rash, reckless and dangerous west.

Yes, the west may turn out to be actually an element of danger, not only from the economic, but from the national point of view. Has not a movement in favour of secession been launched in former days in the maritime provinces for reasons of minor importance if compared with those existing in the west? And the hon. minister wonders what will be the complexion of the west. I say the west will be such as you make it. If you continue bringing into the west Americans by hundreds of thousands, and if you throw them in with other hundreds of thousands of people who have come from all parts of the world, booked at the rate of five dollars a head, a mixture of all nationalities, it is much to be feared that these Americans will remain Americans or will not easily be Canadianized. I think you will hasten and intensify the danger by persisting in that obnoxious immigration policy.

If the east is one day to be controlled by the west, it is incumbent on us to defer and prevent as much as possible that danger, and with a view to making that state of things more bearable, immigration should be more closely scrutinized and a better selection made of those who are destined to rule over us. We should make it a point to direct towards the west settlers from the other provinces of the Dominion; for instance, from Quebec and Ontario, and also from the British Isles, instead of promoting the immigration of American settlers on our soil. If we are bound to be ruled by the west, let us keep an eye on those whom we admit into the country, as foreigners may make trouble for us.

In the midst of that medley of settlers of all nationalities who take up lands in the west, the Yankees who are educated, wily and ambitious, will in the end secure the leadership. Canadianization will progress slowly and may never be accomplished thoroughly and satisfactorily. The stars and stripes will be unfurled as often as the national emblem.

If you give to all these people the advantage of trading more freely with the corresponding States of the Union, than with the Canadian provinces, it is not necessary to peep very far into the future to detect the danger that is awaiting us, to realize its full consequences.

If it is the ultimate destiny of the west to dominate in this country, let us make it our duty to send there only desirable settlers coming from the United Kingdom and from the older provinces of the Dominion. We must deal fairly with those who are there already, but there is no need to spoil them by undue favours the only effect of which would be to give them wrong dispositions. Our aim should be to allure them towards Canada rather than direct them towards the United States.

Mr. Chairman, I will vote against this agreement because I see in it more dangers than real advantages; because the prosperous state of affairs in this country is so general that we are not at liberty to run such risks; because it is desirable, in my opinion, to see the great bulk of our trade to continue by the routes we have opened and maintained at the cost of tremendous sacrifices and energy; because I would rather see the bulk of our commercial transactions done with the people of England than with the people of United States, who at a time that we were in great need of them, have wantonly closed their doors against us, and have put us in the necessity of seeking an outlet for our overproduction upon the English market; because I am satisfied that we will fare better with England than with the United States; because we can always expect fair play from John Bull if we know enough to resist his encroachments, while Uncle Sam might be found wanting in a moment of need. Above all I will vote against this agreement because the electors have not been consulted and have had no occasion to decide upon the advisability of this new policy, no more than upon the naval policy. I consider it a wrong principal not to consult the electorate beforehand upon such important questions, and to appeal to the people afterwards and ask them to ratify what has been done.

Mr. J. G. TURRIFF (Assiniboia). Mr. Chairman, as I represent a constituency that for over 110 miles borders the United States, and one which is settled by 50,000 people, chiefly engaged in agriculture, I feel that I would not be doing justice to the people I represent, or to myself, did I not, even at this late stage of the debate, express the views that I, and the great majority of my people hold upon this question. This is the most important question that has been presented to the consideration of the Canadian people since confederation. Every government in Canada has been in favour of reciprocity, and has done its best to make an agreement such as we have or are about to accomplish now. I am not going to dwell particularly on what was the attitude of the Liberal party, forty, thirty or even ten years ago, and I am still less concerned as to what was the attitude of the Conservative party on this question during these past years. What we have to consider now, and what we have to decide is whether this agreement that has been arranged between the people of the United States and Canada is good for the people of Canada to-day. If it is we ought to put it into force. If it is not we should not put it into force. That is the question that we have to decide in the very near future. We have had a good deal of opposition developed to this agreement, but it has been developed pretty much during the last three months. I remember very well that when my hon. friend the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) read this agreement to the House hon. gentlemen opposite were surprised, they were pleased and they cheered the Finance Minister almost as much on that side of the House as we did on this.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no.

Mr. TAYLOR (Leeds). Not a cheer, not a chirp.

Mr. TURRIFF. Why is all this change being made? Because since that time they have been whipped into line. Now, Mr. Chairman, it has been stated time and again in this House that we should not go on with this agreement because we have no mandate from the people of Canada. I have been through three Dominion elections and on the platform in these elections——

An hon. MEMBER. We will fix you at the next one.

Mr. TURRIFF. Well, if you can do it you are welcome, and I would be very glad to have my hon. friend across the way who has spoken come out, and try it. I was about to say that I have been through three Dominion elections, and on every one of these occasions I advocated reciprocity or better trade relations with the United States. But, I am not the only one to advocate reciprocity or better trade relations with the United States in the last election. My hon. friends opposite did the same thing in my constituency, let me tell you that, Mr. Chairman. The year before the elections, in the fall of 1907, the hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Borden, Halifax), made a tour through the west. He did me the honour of having a meeting in my constituency, at Weyburn—the only meeting he held in southern Saskatchewan —and at that meeting there was a gathering of the clans from east and west, brass bands in attendance, flags flying and everything lovely. In the evening they held a demonstration, and on the principal banner which was stretched across the skating rink were the words 'Reciprocity with the United States.' I am not going to try to make a point against the hon. leader of the opposition, because I do not suppose that he knew anything more about that declaration being put up there than I did. But, it shows that the Conservative party in the west, the year before the last election, which is exactly three and a half years ago now, were in favour of, and advocated reciprocity with the United States. One of the speakers at that meeting referred to the banner, and pointed out the advantages that would flow from a deal of that kind. So, when I say that not only the Liberal party, but the Conservative party have been in favour of that proposition I am stating the absolute facts of the case. It is no discredit to Sir John Macdonald that he did not get reciprocity. He tried his utmost to get it, and it was not his fault that he failed. The failure was due to the fact that the people of the United States at that time were not ready for reciprocity. It was not the fault of the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster) that he did not get reciprocity when he went down to Washington not so very many years ago. Imagine, Mr. Chairman, if you can, the attitude of the hon. member for North Toronto if, this agreement that we have now before us being made available to us by the people of the United States, my right hon. friend the leader of the government (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) had refused to accept it? I can imagine him making this council chamber ring with the denunciation of the party that having an opportunity to get such an agreement for the people of Canada, and would hesitate to take advantage of it.

Let us see for a few minutes who are the people who are opposed to reciprocity. In the first place we have the Manufacturers' Association of Canada; in the second place we have some of the large financial institutions and some of the bankers; and in the third place we have the Conservative party in the House of Commons, not in the country, but in the House of Commons. Let us see to what extent these people are good judges——

Mr. BLAIN. What about the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Sifton)?

Mr. TURRIFF. My hon. friend does not need to ask me about the hon. member for Brandon. I admire and respect the hon. member for Brandon a great deal more than any member on that side of the House does, and if the hon. members on that side of the House had one-tenth of the political honour and honesty of the hon. member for Brandon it would not be three members, as we have on this side of the House who are not in favour of reciprocity, but it would be three dozen on the other side of the House who were in favour of reciprocity. Now, Mr. Chairman, let us see to what extent these people that I have mentioned—the Manufacturers' Association, the financial institutions and the Conservative party in the House of Commons— are good judges of what is good for Canada and what is not good for Canada. You will remember, and every member of this House will have it in mind, that fourteen or fifteen years ago, when the Fielding tariff was first brought in, in 1897, the Manufacturers' Association was up in arms, the financial institutions were up in arms and my hon. friends on the opposite side of the House were up in arms and denounced the Fielding tariff as a tariff that was going to ruin the country, wipe out our manufacturers and, in fact, was the worst piece of legislation that could be put upon the statute-books. Did anything of that kind come to pass? Has not the country continued to progress more and more ever since? The hon. member for Terrebonne (Mr. Nantel), who has just taken his seat, pointed out not five minutes ago that the country was so prosperous that we should not make any changes. The financial institutions took the same course and it turned out that they also were wrong and did not know what was good for Canada. My hon. friends in the House of Commons did the same thing and it turned out that they did not know what was good for Canada. Then, again, when the preference in favour of Great Britain was introduced, every one of these people opposed it in just the same way as being the worst possible that could happen in the interest of the people of Canada, and yet the results were such that even if my hon. friends opposite were in power to-morrow they would not dare lay their sacrilegious hands on that British preference although they opposed it tooth and nail. When this agreement comes into force, as come it will, and when it has been in force for six months, if such an unlikely thing could happen that hon. gentlemen opposite should come to this side of the House, they would no more change that agreement than they would dare change the preference to Great Britain.

I want to say a word or two, and I will be as moderate as I possibly can, to the manufacturers of Canada, and especially to the Manufacturers' Association. If the manufacturers have one great enemy in Canada, in my judgment it is not the Liberal party and it is not this government, but it is the Manufacturers' Association. The Manufacturers' Association have done more to put the people of Canada against the manufacturers than any other individual, or combination, or association could do. Last year, my right hon. friend toured throughout the west, met the farmers, heard their grievances and told them that he would take these matters into consideration. No sooner had he got home than the Manufacturers' Association got up a party to tour the west to counteract the effects that the meetings and delegations of farmers and grain growers might have on my right hon. friend. The result of that was to force the grain growers and farmers of the west to get up the big delegation that came down here last fall to interview the government and try to press home their arguments.

When the delegation from the west was in Ottawa I noticed that hon. gentlemen opposite were very anxious to show them around and to be gracious to them and to say what very fine fellows they were just then. Of course, the delegates were asking for something and these gentlemen opposite thought the government was not going to give it to them, and so they posed as friends of the farmers and the grain-growers. But since this agreement was put before the House which gives the farmers of the west—not all they had asked for in some respects it is true, but in other respects a great deal more than they had asked, and that they had ever expected to get—since then these gentlemen opposite cannot say too much against the Grain Growers' Grain Company which is part and parcel of the Grain Growers' Association of the three prairie provinces. Well, my friends in the west, the grain growers will know how to size up these gentlemen opposite pretty accurately. I want to point out to the manufacturers that this agreement does not hurt them to any extent, and I say further that if there is one class of people on this earth who should favour it and have nothing to say against it, it is the manufacturers of Canada, because, practically, they are left untouched. The result of this agreement will be that the people of Canada will be much more prosperous under it, and will make greater progress in the future than even in the past, in consequence of which there will be a larger market for the manufacturers of eastern Canada. Some people think that we in the west will become a manufacturing people, but personally I do not think so. I think it will always be cheaper to bring manufactured goods to the west than to transport the raw material and manufacture it there, because there is no question that the cost of living is higher in the west than it is in the east, and for many years to come we must be the consuming part of Canada, buying the bulk of the goods that we use from the manufacturers of Ontario and Quebec. It stands to reason that the more people you have in the west and the more prosperous they are the more goods will the Canadian manufacturer sell. As has been pointed out by the Minister of Finance, there are now two million people in the west, and they consume more per capita than the people of other sections of the country because they earn more and they spend more, and inside of ten years it is safe to say that there will be five million people west of the Great Lakes. Now, if the manufacturers of Canada have five million people to supply instead of two millions or less as at present, look at what advantage it will be to them. I want to say to the manufacturers that it will behoove them to just be a little careful because as hon. gentlemen opposite know the people of the three prairie provinces are to a large extent low tariff people whether they are Liberals or Conservatives,—of which we have evidence by certain motions moved by these gentlemen on the other side,—and if the manufacturers insist on looking for trouble they will be very apt to find it in the end. Therefore, in heir own interest the manufacturers ought to be careful. Why, the grain growers, the farmers and the people of the west generally are the most reasonable people on the face of the earth. They want a square deal; they do not want to be hewers of wood and drawers of water for all time to come. The day has gone when you could make a farmer in the west or in the east either believe that protection protects him, but at the same time they are willing to pay their fair share towards meeting the expenses of the country. There are a good many things on which the tariff must be reduced, but if we get this agreement through and secure the American market for the products of the Canadian farmer, we will have made a great step in the right direction, and the people of the west will be reasonably well satisfied. Let me tell you that if this agreement is not carried into effect there will be a general agitation that will never be put down until there is a reduction of the tariff all around, which would take in a great deal more manufactured articles than this agreement deals with. I speak for the western farmers principally—there are gentlemen in this House who can speak for the eastern farmers—I speak for the western farmers in what I say as to this agreement. It has been stated time and again in this House by gentlemen opposite that the American market is not as good as the Canadian market and will therefore be of no advantage to us. Even supposing that were true we do not stand to lose anything. If the American market is lower than the Canadian market we won't ship our goods there, and we do not lose the British market, nor do we lose our home market. But as a matter of fact that is not so. I lived for twenty years on the prairie right near the American boundary, and I make the statement that from the day the territory of Saskatchewan had a bushel of wheat for sale—I do not speak as to the last two years, because I have no personal knowledge as to that period—but previous to the last two years there never was a year during which at some time of the season the Canadian farmer could not draw his wheat across the line and get for it from five cents to ten cents a bushel more than he could get at home.

Mr. CAMPBELL. And pay the duty?

Mr. TURRIFF. No, and under this agreement he won't have any duty to pay.

Mr. CAMPBELL. And he won't get any ten cents more.

Mr. TURRIFF. I am not going to say that wheat should have been ten cents higher on the American side, but I do say that there has never been a year when the big milling associations and the big wheat exporters and domestic buyers have not been able to put the price down below the actual value of the wheat in Canada, and so, by taking it across the line our farmers got better prices. I know what I am talking about, because I have grown wheat in the west and I have bought wheat and I have sold wheat. I do not say that at all times of the year there is that difference or that there will be that difference in the future at all times of the year, but I say there has been a better market generally all along the border line on the American side than on the Canadian side, and we will get the advantage of that when this agreement is put in force. But wheat is not the only article the western farmers have to sell. They grow a great deal of flax and a great deal of barley in my section of the country, and I will give you an actual incident that has taken place.

About a month ago one of my constituents spent a few days with me in Ottawa. He is a farmer in the western portion of my district, an educated and wealthy man, a young man who went out there twelve or fifteen years ago as a school teacher, who has now made enough money to retire easily if he wished to, although he is still a young man. He told me that last year he had as a side crop 2,000 bushels of flax. Last year it cost him exactly $500 in cold cash to put that flax into Duluth, where practically all the flax from that part of the country goes. There is a duty of 25 cents a bushel on flax entering the United States, and that made $500 on his 2,000 bushels, which went into the coffers of the United States treasury. If he could have loaded his car on the American instead of the Canadian side of the line he would have got exactly $500 more for his two carloads of flax than he did get. As he said to me in my house: Do you think you are going to make me more loyal to Great Britain or more loyal to Canada by taking $500 out of my pocket on one side crop in one year? He said, the thing is absurd; if I had that $500 I would not bury it in the earth, that money would have been in circulation and a great deal of it would have got back again to the east in payment for manufactured goods. That is only one farmer; I have scores and scores of farmers who raise from 500 to 2,000 bushels of flax. In the southern portion of the district of Regina there are hundreds of thousands of bushels of flax raised and there will be a great deal more in the future, because if you get a market for your flax without paying 25 cents duty, our farmers will grow a great deal more, and the day will come when we will have to grow less wheat. This very season if we should happen to strike a good crop in the west we will have in the three prairie provinces more wheat for export than Great Britain ever bought in any one year.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Oh, go on with you.

Mr. TURRIFF. My hon. friend says, go on.

Mr. CAMPBELL. That is nonsense.

Mr. TURRIFF. Last year Great Britain bought 163,000,000 bushels of wheat from all over the world.

Mr. AMES. 250,000,000.

Mr. CAMPBELL. 275,000,000.

Mr. TURRIFF. And we will have, if we strike anything like a good crop, more than that much to export. I am not ashamed to acknowledge if I have made a mistake; possibly I have omitted what has gone in in flour. Even admitting, an my hon. friend said, that Great Britain imported over 200,000,000 bushels, at any rate it will be only two or three years until we have 250,000,000 bushels for export. If we take some land out of growing wheat and put it into growing flax, for which there is an immense market in the United States, it will be better for the land, better for the farmer, and better for everybody.

Mr. THORNTON. Does my hon. friend attribute the better price of wheat in the United States to free trade?

Mr. TURRIFF. No, I do not attribute the better price in the past to free trade, because we did not have free trade in wheat in the United States in the past, but we have had a better price there.

Mr. TURRIFF.

Mr. THORNTON. Was it free trade in the United States that made the better price?

Mr. TURRIFF. I never understood that the United States was a free trade country; I always understood they had a tariff, so I do not see the point of my hon. friend's question.

Turning to the question of barley, in my part of the country they grow a good deal of barley. This same constituent told of another case where he would have made more money under an agreement such as this. Three years ago he had 3,000 bushels of barley for sale. There is 30 cents a bushel duty on barley going into the United States. He had to sell that barley at home, and got 48 cents a bushel, a good price for barley at the station; but if he could have loaded that barley on the south side of the line on that very same day on which he sold it for 48 cents he could have got 70 cents, a difference of 22 cents a bushel.

Mr. THORNTON. If the duty was 30 cents a bushel, why was it not worth more on the American than on the Canadian side?

Mr. TURRIFF. Sometimes there is a difference of exactly 30 cents, sometimes more than 30 cents, and sometimes less than 30 cents; on this occasion it was 22 cents, so that he lost on his 3,000 bushels just $660. So that that one farmer on two side crops made $1,160 less than he would have made under such an agreement as is proposed.

Mr. STAPLES. What is that farmer's name?

Mr. TURRIFF. Frank Moffatt of Weyburn, and any one may write to him and he will confirm that statement.

A further advantage under this agreement and the consequent increased growth of barley would arise from the fact that by growing barley you can very often serve the same purpose as by summer fallowing your land, that is you can clean out the weeds before you sow the barley in the spring. If we had a good market in the west for our barley and flax, as well as our wheat, the farmer would be able to rotate his crops, to keep his farm cleaner and to put it in better shape. In addition to that there are millions of acres of land in the northern part of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta that will never be suitable for growing wheat; the soil is right, the moisture is right, but you are subject to summer frosts. By going into the raising of barley there are millions of acres where you can grow barley and have a certainty of good crop where you would not be at all certain of a good crop of wheat. That will be a very very great advantage

Mr. CAMPBELL. Where are those millions of acres?

Mr. TURRIFF. In the northern part of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta.

Mr. CAMPBELL. What part?

Mr. TURRIFF. Just north of where you live, north of the wheat growing belt.

Mr. CAMPBELL. My constituency runs right to the northern boundary of Manitoba and we grow wheat successfully right at the line, and good wheat. My hon. friend must be talking of some place further north, in the frozen Arctic regions.

Mr. TURRIFF. I was talking of the province of Manitoba as my right hon. friend the Prime Minister offered to make it.

Mr. STAPLES. Why didn't he make it?

Mr. TURRIFF. Because the Prime Minister of Manitoba still wants to keep it as a postage stamp on the map for electioneering purposes. It is not only in grain products that the people of the west will benefit. It is also in cattle. I happened to be in the west not long ago, since this discussion began, and I naturally kept my ears open, on the cars and in the hotels and got into discussion more or less with the people, many of whom I did not know—I did not know either their names or their politics and the general impression through the western portion of the country was that it would be worth $6 or $7 a head to them on cattle that were fit to export to have the American market free.

Mr. BLAIN. I thought the consumer paid the duty under the policy of my hon. friend's party.

Mr. TURRIFF. In this case there would be no duty. My hon. friend does not seem to realize yet the meaning of the agreement.

Mr. BLAIN. My hon. friend was pointing out a few moments ago the amount of money a farmer would make on his barley. What I said was that my hon. friend's party had always told the people of Canada that it was the consumer who paid the duty.

Mr. TURRIFF. I am trying to tell my hon. friend that there would be no duty to pay, and that the farmer would get a better price for his products. Now, my hon. friend is a doubting Thomas, and I am going to convince him, if he can be convinced. I was in Winnipeg less than a month ago, and one rancher from Alberta, not far from the boundary line, made the statement that last fall he had sold between 200 and 300 steers to be delivered at the railway—and let me say here that when cattle are sold in the west, it does not matter to whom they are sold, those for export go to Gordon and Ironsides, and those to be butchered go to Pat Burns. Before this man could get his cattle rounded up, twelve of the steers had drifted across to the American side of the line. The boundary line there is not visible, at least, the cattle do not know when they cross it. On each side of the line there is a Cattlemen's Association, and the association in Montana look after all stray cattle, and, as a rule, every stray animal that is fit for market is shipped to the market at once, in order to get it off the grass, which is wanted for the cattle that are not fit for the market. These twelve stray animals were shipped to Chicago, the freight was paid on them, the commission was paid to the man who sold them and exchange was paid on the money coming back, and this rancher on the Canadian side said that a few months afterwards he got a cheque for the twelve steers, and it amounted to exactly $8 a head more than he had got for the cattle that he sold at home. In the face of these facts, what man is going to say that reciprocity is not good for the western farmer?

Mr. CAMPBELL. I am.

Mr. TURRIFF. My hon. friend says he is, but he will have a nice time with his electors. I am delighted to see the hon. gentleman toeing the mark and standing up with his party to vote against reciprocity. I was afraid at one time that our hon. friends opposite from the west were going to vote for it. If they vote against it, I can tell them that many of them will not warm seats in this House in the next parliament.

Mr. CAMPBELL. The fear is mutual. We thought you were going to be with us.

Mr. TURRIFF. I want to say a word or two about some of the bankers. I refer more particularly to the letter written by Sir Edmund Walker. Some ancient said, 'Oh, that mine enemy would write me a letter.' Well, if the Liberal party had sat up every night for a month, I think they could not have made any better literature for themselves than the letter Sir Edmund Walker wrote.

An hon. MEMBER. What about the farmers?

Mr. TURRIFF. I am speaking as a representative of the farmers. If Sir Edmund Walker had given the matter a second thought, he would not have been so ready to fly to the newspapers on the question of reciprocity. If there is any class of people who have been well treated by all governments in Canada it is the bankers. Just let us see what position they occupy; and I am not going to criticise what has been done for them. I believe it has been in the interests of the country generally to give them what they have been given, but there are some things they have been doing that I think are open to criticism. I am going to give some figures which I have taken from the returns in the Canada 'Gazette' of April 20. I find, after deducting the 5 per cent of the circulation which the bankers have to put up to guarantee the notes of all the banks, that the banks of Canada have at the present moment $77,364,134 of bank bills for which they do not pay one cent of interest, they have also deposits of $278,171,792, that do not bear interest, making a total of $355,535,925 which they get from the people of Canada absolutely free of cost; and they get that money to loan it out to you and me or any one else who has to borrow it, at 6 per cent, and when times get a little hard, they charge us 7 per cent. In addition, they have $533,032,466 for which they pay at the outside 3 per cent. Then they have at the present time invested in the United States $149,477,172. As I have said, I quite believe in the policy of putting the banks in a good position. I think it has been all right to give them that currency free. I think it all right for the banks to take that $149,000,000 down to Uncle Sam's territory and use it to move the southern cotton crop and to loan it out on call loans at from two to fifty per cent according to the state of the market; because I realize that if they did not do that, they would have the money more or less idle at home. But what I do object to is that while Sir Edmund Walker took the millions from his bank and sent them to New York and Chicago to make money for his shareholders without affecting their loyalty or the loyalty of himself, he thinks that the farmer, who puts up that money, cannot be allowed to sell a steer, or a horse or a pig, or a carload of barley, or flax in the United States without becoming a disloyal man, ready to disrupt the empire. Did you ever hear anything more absurd in your life?

Some hon. MEMBERS. Never.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. TURRIFF. You are not going to stampede me or rattle me. I got up to say a few things, and I am going to say them. The fact that you like them or the fact that you do not like them will not make any difference.

Now, I wish to take up the question of railways for a minute. The hon. member for Terrebonne (Mr. Nantel), was very much afraid that the railway traffic was going to be diverted to the south. He said that J. J. Hill had a number of lines built on the American side close to the Canadian boundary, and if this amendment went into force, all our traffic would go into the United States. Well, let us look at the situation for a moment. The Canadian Pacific railway, the only transcontinental line in Canada that is completed, has one road from the west to the east. But how many lines has it west of Winnipeg running from Canada into the United States? One would think, to hear hon. members on the other side talk about the disloyalty of trading with the United States, and the danger of ruining the Canadian Pacific railway, that the Canadian Pacific railway would be very anxious to keep away from the United States. But the Canadian Pacific railway has some seven lines, built by themselves without any assistance from Canada, and without any request from the people of Canada to build them, running from Canadian territory into the United States—six or seven lines west of Winnipeg. And the Great Northern railway and the Canadian Northern railway have each two or three lines running into the United States in the same way. Was it disloyal to build these lines running into the United States? And as to our traffic being diverted to the United States, I just want to say this: The Canadian Pacific railway was largely built by the people of Canada. The Grand Trunk railway is being largely built by the people of Canada. The Canadian Northern railway is being largely built by the people of Canada. The Canadian Pacific railway is the only completed road, and it has the shortest line from the prairies of the west to tidewater. It has a line 275 miles shorter than any American road. And if, with the shortest road and with a railway more than half built for them, they cannot carry this traffic as cheaply as the American lines which would have to pay for every dollar of their construction, then the Canadian Pacific railway ought to lose the traffic. If they want to retain the traffic all they have to do is to lower their freight rates. And look at the position: The Canadian Pacific railway is paying not only interest on its bonds and dividends on its preferred stock, but it is also paying 10 per cent on its common stock which is largely composed of water. The Canadian Pacific railway during the last half year set apart as a rest no less than $10,500,000, and in the previous half another $10,000,000; that is, in one year they set aside $20,500,000 as a rest fund. And last year they paid 9 per cent, and they are to pay 10 per cent in the future. So, I say, all they have to do in order to retain the trade of the country is to lower freight rates, and I can assure you their freight rates would stand lowering. I heard of one extraordinary instance, and I want to take advantage of the opportunity now to bring it to the attention of the Minister of Railways. It seems to me it raises the question as to whether the Railway Commission of Canada should not be instructed to look into its tariffs and find out if they are not iniquitous, and not wait for the individual who has suffered injustice to bring a case before them. If a merchant or manufacturer in Ottawa wishes to send a carload of goods, half, let us say of class 5 and the other half class 6, he can ship that to any place from here to Halifax or from here to Port Arthur, paying the carload rate on the higher class. But, if he ships to west of Port Arthur, he cannot get a carload rate at all; he has to pay by the 100 pounds. If that is true—and I believe it is —it is iniquitous, and it is a matter for the Railway Commission to take up, not waiting for anybody who suffers the injustice to bring their attention to it.

Now, when I started to speak I promised some of my friends that I would not occupy more than three-quarters of an hour. I have taken up about that time, and I do not wish to take up any more. I am thoroughly in sympathy with the agreement; I believe it is the best bargain the government of Canada has ever made and that it is a bargain that will lead to increased prosperity for the country. I have been seven years in this House and before that I was often in the gallery a listener. And, so far as I know—and if I am wrong my right hon. friend the leader of the House (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) can correct me—there has never been a year I think, when hon. members opposite did not come forward with resolutions denouncing the policy of the government, and trying to show that the country was not as prosperous as it ought to be. But, since this reciprocity agreement was introduced, hon. members opposite have changed their tune altogether, and, they declare, like the hon. member for Terrebonne, the country is now so prosperous it would be a crime to make any change. If hon. members opposite are right now, they have been wrong for fourteen years. According to the theory of probabilities they were more likely to be honest when they went thirteen times in successive years in one direction than now when, to suit their political exigencies, they try to make out that this is not a good agreement. If there were no politics in this, not one in twenty of them would be against this agreement. So, I hope the right hon. Prime Minister will go right on with this question, pound it right through and not take back water for a moment. It is the will of the people, and we were sent here to represent the people. We believe that this agreement is a right thing; and for my part I am satisfied that if this agreement is put in force, a new era of prosperity will dawn for Canada, even greater prosperity than we have had in the past; and I believe that Canada will grow and thrive and occupy an even higher position in the great sisterhood of nations making up the British Empire to which we are so proud to belong.

Mr. W. H. SHARPE (Lisgar). My constituency in the province of Manitoba is situated a good deal the same as that of the hon. member (Mr. Turriff), who has just taken his seat. My constituency extends along the international boundary for about eighty miles. The farmers in my constituency can see the farmers across the line receiving a higher price for their wheat, they can see the farmers across the line receiving a higher price for their barley, and as my hon. friend says, they also get a higher price for their stockers. I saw the apparent relief that this Bill would give our people, on the 26th day of January when the Finance Minister unfolded this plan to the House. I saw that it would apparently be an advantage to them, I saw that our people might possibly get a better price for those articles. But let me ask, is this the relief that the people of western Canada have been asking for? Is this the relief that they are entitled to? I say no, not by any means. On account of this apparent relief to the people in my constituency, I received many resolutions from the grain growers asking me to support this proposition of reciprocity. but after listening to the discussion in this House and studying the question for myself, I decided that so far as I was concerned I would not support it. Apparently the people in my constituency wanted it; the men who had voted for me and sent me here apparently wanted it. If they wanted it, and I had decided not to vote for it, what was my duty under the circumstances? I made up my mind to go home and to lay the matter plainly before my constituents, and if a majority of my supporters still wanted it, then I was prepared to resign my seat and allow them to send some one else who would vote for it. In order to ascertain their opinion I held four meetings within the local constituencies in the Dominion constituency of Lisgar and gave every person an opportunity to attend the meetings. After I had held those meetings and explained my position fully, I asked all those men who had voted for me in the election of 1908, to remain, as I wished to go into the matter a little more fully with them, and I want to tell you, Mr. Chairman, that after I had laid my ideas before them, there was only one man at all those meetings who stood up and voted for reciprocity, and opposed my stand. Notwithstanding what the hon. gentleman from Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff), has said, I am satisfied that when the people of Canada understand this deal they will reject it entirely. This government has forced through the Autonomy Bill without submitting it to the people, they have forced through the Grand Trunk Pacific deal without submitting it to the people, last year they forced through the Navy Bill without submitting it to the people, but I want to tell the Prime Minister that the Conservative party in this House will not allow this deal to go through until it has been submitted to the people. We are prepared at any time to abide by the will of the people, and we now ask the Prime Minister to submit this question to the people, and I am satisfied that when he does so we will come back from western Canada stronger than we are now.

The hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat has gone into the conditions in western Canada. Who is responsible for those conditions? Why, it is the Prime Minister of this country, who has held the reigns of power during the past fifteen years and has not done one thing yet for the grain growers or farmers of Canada. He has allowed them to be fleeced in every way. Sir, what are the conditions in western Canada at the present time? The beef combine and the pork combine have driven the producers out of business entirely, and that is the chief reason for the high price of those articles in western Canada at the present time. Time and again we have appealed to this government for relief, and they have refused it. Take this cement combine. The government allowed that cement combine to be formed, and helped it through. Our people in western Canada are using more cement every year. In my little town of Manitou we put down cement sidewalks to the value of $13,000 or $14,000 before this cement combine was organized. If we had waited until after the combine had been formed to buy our cement, it would have cost us $1,300 or $1,400 more. My hon. friend from Assiniboia has said that the railway companies are robbing the people of western Canada, and that is true, as every one knows who is acquainted with the conditions. Our people are paying twenty to eighty per cent higher rates than the people are paying on the other side of the line, and the Prime Minister of this country is responsible for it. The wheat combine are manipulating grades and prices and are trimming the farmers, there is no doubt about that. The farmers on the other side of the line get higher prices than we do. Again, the Prime Minister is responsible for that. The implement companies are charging us a third more than they should for our implements, at least we think so. Take a case that occurred at Miami, in the province of Manitoba. Three farmers there who were growing corn wanted to buy a corn binder, and they went to the three different companies who were selling binders in the town of Miami. The Deering Company and the McCormick Company offered to sell a binder for $150. I understand that corn binders are not manufactured in Canada by those companies and these companies import them and pay duty on them. Then these farmers went to the Massey-Harris Company who asked $160 for a binder, the same article, without paying any duty at all. That is the condition of affairs in western Canada at the present time. Is it, therefore, any wonder that the people are ready to grab at anything which looks like relief to them? There is a combine to keep up the prices of every thing they have to buy, and there is a combine to keep down the prices of everything they have to sell. That is the condition the government has allowed to grow up during the past fifteen years. That is the condition the Prime Minister found when he went to western Canada last summer. At every point he was met by a delegation of farmers who asked for relief. But the Prime Minister knew that he and his government were not strong enough to cope with those conditions they had allowed to grow up.

What did he do? Why, Mr. Chairman, he gave us reciprocity with the United States as a cure-all for the troubles in western Canada. The hon. member for North Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt) made the statement that he had it on the authority of the Prime Minister, and the Minister of Finance that they had gone as far as they intended to go in the interests of the producers of this country. Afterwards, when it was put up to the Prime Minister he said, yes, the hon. member for North Oxford had that authority. I want to tell the Prime Minister, and the Minister of Finance that the grain growers of western Canada, the only time they ever had an opportunity of pronouncing upon this proposal, absolutely refused to endorse it. At the time the Minister of Customs and the Minister of Finance were in western Canada, in 1905, they put this proposition up to the grain growers and they refused it unless the duties on everything were lowered to a revenue basis of 17 per cent. I just wish to read the resolution that was submitted to these hon. gentlemen at that time. This was moved by Mr. Andrew Graham, one of our grain growers in western Canada:

Resolved, that in the opinion of the executive of the Manitoba Grain Growers' Association and the Manitoba Live Stock Association, the present tariff on dutiable goods be reduced to a revenue tariff of an average of 17 per cent; that all goods at present on the free list be retained thereon with the addition thereto of all kinds of lumber; that in consideration of this reduction to a revenue tariff we are willing to have all agricultural products placed on the free list.

That was the only proposition that the grain growers of western Canada ever presented to the government of this country, and that is a proposition to which the government refused to accede. It is true that the grain growers, when they were here on the 16th December last, presented a resolution to the government in connection with reciprocity, but there was not one word in any way, shape, or form, in connection with reciprocity in the original resolutions passed by the grain growers associations throughout the western country. Reciprocity was never spoken of in connection with these resolutions until the delegation arrived in the city of Ottawa. I am credibly informed that it is an absolute fact that on the arrival of the grain growers from western Canada a certain gentleman visited the Prime Minister and there was hatched the resolution in connection with reciprocity.

I wish to say a word or two with reference to a publication we have in the city of Winnipeg known as the 'Grain Growers' Guide.' Last fall the 'Grain Growers' Guide' came out with an editorial saying that they were going to send a representative to the press gallery in this House, and that this reporter would give an unbiassed report of everything that took place in regard to western Canada during his term here. But, on the 15th of March this paper came out with a very severe attack on the Conservative members from western Canada. They called us blockers, objectors, obstructors, and they almost called us traitors to the people we represent. They also claimed that we had voted against reciprocity. I want to tell you, Mr. Chairman, that if there is one principle that this paper has stood for during the time in which it has been in existence, from the very first issue that came out, it is the referendum and recall. That is one of the cardinal principles of this 'Grain Growers' Guide,' and I thought for one that if we ever had an opportunity of voting for submitting any question to the people of this country we would get credit for it from this paper, instead of what we did receive. I wish to read the resolution that this paper condemned us so violently for voting for. It was moved by my hon. friend the leader of the opposition, and it reads as follows:

That in the opinion of this House the said resolutions should not be proceeded with until the electors have had an opportunity of pronouncing upon their merits.

We simply wanted to have this reciprocity deal submitted to the people of this country. That is what I voted for, and that is what we all voted for. But, that did not suit the 'Grain Growers' Guide' and they went for us in the manner I speak of. When it came to the question of the terminal elevators, a question that is of vital importance to the grain growers, my hon. friend from Souris (Mr. Schaffner) moved a resolution, every Conservative in this House voted for that resolution, and every reformer voted against it, but the 'Grain Growers' Guide' never mentioned all the names in connection with that proposition whatever. The same thing took place in connection with the chilled meat trade. My hon. friend from East Grey (Mr. Sproule) brought in a resolution in connection with the establishment of a chilled meat trade in this country. Every Conservative voted for it and every Reformer against it, but the 'Grain Growers' Guide' never mentioned all the names in connection with the matter, and how each man voted. They only mentioned the names of those speaking on the different questions. I consider that the 'Grain Growers' Guide' has forfeited the confidence of the grain growers of western Canada. My hon. friend (Mr. Turriff) has said that reciprocity is the most important question that has come before the people of Canada since confederation, but in my humble judgment it is the most important question that has ever come before our people, even including confederation, because as we all know confederation was adopted to unite the different provinces together, and the direct outcome of confederation was the building of the Canadian Pacific railway, which has been followed. through the sacrifices made by the people of Canada during the past forty-two years, by three transcontinental railways which are now almost completed. But, is this reciprocity pact calculated to bind the Canadian communities closer together, is it meant to further build up the interprovincial trade we have established? I say it is not. If it should be carried into effect, Alberta and British Columbia will deal with the western states, Saskatchewan and Manitoba will deal with the Dakotas and Minnesota, Ontario and the eastern provinces will deal with the eastern states, and instead of having our lines running from east to west as now, the outcome will be that our lines will be running north and south. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Turriff) also said that both parties in this country have been trying for many years to get reciprocity with the United States. I wish to say that in my humble judgment, what was good for this country between 1854 and 1866 might be a very bad thing for the country in 1911. Canada is a very difficult country to govern; our seven and a half millions of people are located in a narrow territory, 100 miles wide and 3,500 miles long, and the diversified conditions of commercial interest, and racial distinctions, make it one of the most difficult countries in the known world to govern. But, if we want to build this country up to what we all hope to see it some day, we must in each province be prepared to give and take. We hear from the different provinces a great deal about class legislation. Just look for a moment at what we have been fighting for for western Canada since I have been in this parliament, and what the grain growers asked for on the 16th of December last. They asked for government ownership and operation of the terminal elevators, for government ownership and operation of the Hudson Bay railway, for the establishement of a chilled meat trade throughout western Canada, and these three things alone would cost $75,000,000 or thereabouts. And, while eastern Canada will have to help build up western Canada in these things, there are other things in respect to which the west will help to build up eastern Canada, and there are other things which will be of special advantage to British Columbia, and in which the prairie provinces can assist. We must, therefore, be prepared to give and take in the building up of a great diversified country such as we have in Canada. The Prime Minister has changed his mind a good deal on this reciprocity question since 1899, because in that year he spoke as follows, as reported in 'Hansard':

If we know the hearts and minds of our people at present, I think I am not making too wide a statement when I say that the general feeling in Canada is not in favour of reciprocity. There was a time when Canada would have given many things to obtain the American market; there was a time when the market of the great cities of the union was the only market we had, but these things are past and over now. We are not depending on the American markets now.

That was the idea of the Prime Minister in 1899. The United States left us alone for forty-five years, and absolutely refused to have anything to do with us in trade relations, and why is it they ask at this particular juncture for a reciprocity deal with the people of Canada? The best answer to that question is to be found in the words of President Taft's message to Congress on the 26th of January, 1911, when he said:

The Dominion has greatly prospered. It has an active, aggressive, intelligent people. They are coming to the parting of the ways. In the reciprocal trade agreement numerous additions are made to the free list. These include not only food commodities such as cattle, fish, wheat and other grain, fresh vegetables, fruit and dairy products, but also rough lumber and raw material useful to our own industries. Free lumber we ought to have. By giving our people access to the Canadian forests we should reduce the consumption of our own, which in the hands of a comparatively few owners now have a value that requires the enlargement of our available timber resources.

I think these words of President Taft answer the question a good deal better than I can. I would like to give a short list of the natural resources of Canada that the United States would like to get hold of; it is estimated that we have 500,000,000,000 feet of standing timber; our wheat fields are about 600 miles wide by 1,000 miles long in western Canada; it is estimated that we have 117,000,000 acres of wheat lands, 12,500 miles of coast fishing; 440,000 square miles of fresh water fishing, our coal is estimated at 172,000,000,000 tons, we have produced $260,000,000 worth of gold, our silver mines are the third most important in the world: we have three-fifths of the world's supply of nickel, in 1901 we produced 160,000,000 tons of iron and in 1904 we produced 509,000,000 tons of iron.

We have untold millions of tons of iron. Our water-powers are estimated at 25,000,000, and of fisheries $30,000,000. This is only a partial list for we have in this northern country the greatest undeveloped country in minerals $90,000,000; of timber cut $63,000,000, and of fisheries $30,000,000. This is only a partial list for we have in this northern county the greatest undeveloped country in the known world. It is these natural resources that the United States are after, and these, if this Bill goes through, we will allow them to exploit. Why do they want our natural resources? Theirs are almost gone, they have wasted their natural resources in the past, and now they want the natural resources in this northern country to keep the flame of prosperity going in the United States. Are we prepared to hand over to the United States the prosperity that is coming to Canada? We stand to-day just about where the United States stood 100 years ago, and for my part I say: Keep the natural resources for the Canadian people. They want our hard wheat to mix with their soft wheat to sell in the markets of the world to compete against our wheat. They want our bran and shorts to feed to their cattle and hogs, to compete against our cattle and pork in the markets of the world. But if we want to import any of that same bran and shorts, ground from our own wheat back into our own country to feed our own stock, we must pay a duty on it of 12½ cents.

But some say the United States can do this anyway, by simply taking off the duty. I say if the United States want to do that, let them do it. Why should we pull the rope that will hang ourselves? I am not prepared to do it. But even if they did do that, it would not let in 12 other foreign countries into our markets, nor would it admit all the British possessions throughout the world into the Canadian market while we have only the one market opened to us. These markets will all be closed to the people of Canada and there will be only the one market for us. The countries which will have the same privileges in our market as the United States under this Bill are the following: Austria-Hungary, Argentine Republic, Bolivia, Colombia, Denmark, Japan, Norway, Russia Spain, Sweden, Venezuela and France, besides all the British possessions. In addition to opening our market to these countries, I would point out that we pay in subsidies to steamship companies, plying between Canada and these countries, over $1,000,000 a year, and thus these ships will be able to bring the products of these countries that much cheaper to our markets to compete against our people.

Some say that there is no danger of any of these countries sending anything into Canada. Let us look for a moment at the products shipped by these countries into Canada during 1910, in the face of a fairly high duty:

Article.	Imports.	Canadian duty.
Butter	393,000 lbs.	4c. a lb.
Eggs	884,000 doz.	3c. a doz.
Potatoes	219,000 bush.	20c. a bush.
Cheese	683,000 lbs.	3c. a lb.
Beef (salted)	1,446,000 lbs.	2c. a lb.
Bacon and hams	5,471,000 lbs.	2c. a lb.
Mutton	2,094,000 lbs.	3c. a lb.
Pork (in brine)	8,910,000 lbs.	2c. a lb.
Other meats	1,950,000 lbs.
Sheep	35,844 head.	25 per cent.
Horses	6,759 head.	25 p.c. over value $50.
Cattle	1,012 head.	25 per cent.
Swine	2,760 head.	1½c. per lb.
Barley	167,000 bush.	15c. per lb.
Oats	38,000 bush.	10c. per bush
Wheat	55,000 bush.	12c. per bush
Vegetables	$1,121,000	30 per cent.

This makes a total of about $8,000,000 worth of those products which we imported into Canada last year. I wish to place on 'Hansard' some figures in regard to the surplus production of some of these countries for 1909, because after all it is what these countries export that will indicate the extent of competition this country will have to face.

If the Chairman will allow me to place these figures in 'Hansard' without reading them, I shall be much pleased.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The Chairman has no power in that case. If there is no objection on the part of the House—

Mr. FISHER. There is no objection.

Mr. SHARPE (Lisgar) The figures are as follows:

The United States people do not need our wheat for consumption in the United States, because they are exporters of wheat and flour, as we are and will be for the next 50 or 100 years, as I shall show. They are producing more wheat every year. These figures are taken from 'Reciprocity with Canada,' being the White-book of the United States, on page 94. In 1908 the United States produced 634,000,000 bushels of wheat, in 1909, 664,000,000 bushels, an increase of 30,000,000 bushels; in 1910 they produced 737,000,000, or 72,000,000 bushels more than in 1909; so that they are going on producing more and more wheat every year. This proves that they do not need the wheat of our country for consumption. When the Reform orators go through the country saying that they are opening up the markets of 90,000,000 people for Canada, it sounds pretty good to the people throughout the country; there is no doubt about that. But I would like to ask you, Mr. Chairman, what good are the markets of those 90,000,000 people if they are producing the same goods as we are, year after year, only in far larger quantities. If the markets of those 90,000,000 people are good for the farmers throughout Canada, surely the same markets would be good for the biscuits manufactured by the Minister of Customs or for the coal produced in the province from which the Minister of Finance comes. But we find that they do not want the markets of those 90,000,000 people for their own manufactures or the products of their own province. These 90,000,000 people are exporting the same goods that we are, year after year, only in far larger quantities. I wish to state a few of the items that they are exporting at the present time. In 1908 they exported 151,000,000 bushels of wheat, 37,000,000 bushels of corn, 14,000,000 bushels of oatmeal, 2,333,000 bushels of oats, 8,262,000 bushels of barley, $9,303,000 worth of flaxseed or linseed oil cake, and 437,000 bushels of flaxseed. It is true they are not exporting as much raw material as they did in the past; but when you look up the manufactured articles that they are exporting, you will see that they are exporting more and more of them every year. In 1905 they exported $42,000,000 worth of meal and flour, and in 1908 $66,000,000 worth, an increase of $24,000,000. Look at their exports of live animals and meats. Of live animals they exported in 1906 $49,000,000 worth, and in 1909 $22,000,000 worth, showing that they are not shipping as many live animals. But look at the finished article. Of beef, fresh and cured, they exported in 1905 $47,000,000 worth, and in 1908 $51,000,000 worth. Of pork, cured and fresh, they exported in 1905, $106,000,000 worth, and in 1908 $121,000,000 worth, an increase of $15,000,000. The total animal matter exported in 1905 was $224,000,000 worth, and in 1908 $238,000,000 worth. In the face of these figures, I would like to ask what good the markets of the United States will be to us in Canada. The hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat told us how much better price we would get for our export cattle. I believe that he is very largely correct. For stockers also we would get perhaps a little better price. But take dairy cows, and you will find that they are higher in Manitoba than in North Dakota. The price in North Dakota is from $33 to $39 per head, while in western Canada the price is from $39 to $41 per head. I would like to ask, is it the proper policy for the people of western Canada, or any other part of Canada, to sell their stockers to the United States? I say it is not. If the government would establish what the grain-growers have asked for, and what the Conservative party in this House has voted for, that is, a chilled meat trade throughout western Canada, they would drive out of business the beef combines of western Canada, and secure for the producers there a decent price for the products of their cattle. This deal will let in the beef trust of the United States. I wish to read what the grain-growers had to say on this question, on the 16th of December last, when they were here. They did not ask for reciprocity for their cattle by any means. They asked for the very opposite of that. They prayed the government to keep out the beef trust of the United States, but by this very deal the government are going to allow the beef trust of the United States to come and get control of the markets of Canada. This is what the delegation of the western farmers asked for, as will be found on page 27 of the report:

> We wish also to draw attention to the danger we are in while we leave the opportunity open for the United States meat interest to capture and control the export trade from our country. We contend that it is a very vital importance, if the Canadian meat trade is to grow and prosper as our natural resources will permit, that Canada must have her own route and equipment. Another serious condition arises when from any cause a crop is of poor quality, and there is not sufficient stock in the country to consume it. Still another complication, due to the poor and uncertain price for beef, is the deterioration of our beef animals through crossing of dairy breeds with them and the tendency to careless breeding of inferior stock.
> The farmers, in view of this situation, believe that the remedy for this condition of affairs is the establishment of an export trade in dressed beef.

That is what the western farmers asked for in December last, and you are doing the very opposite. The beef trust of the United States went into the British market a short time ago, and opened stalls throughout England, and they found one of their strongest competitors in a firm called Park Brothers, who could compete with them, and who did compete with them in the selling of meat to consumers in England. The beef trust wanted to get rid of Park Brothers, and what did they do? They started to hunt up where the supply was coming from that Park Brothers were receiving. They went to the Argentine Republic and looked into the conditions there. They found that Park Brothers were getting their cattle from three large ranches in that country, and that they had a contract with these ranches to supply them with meat for five years. But there was a proviso in the contract that if, at any time the ranches were sold, the contract was to be terminated. And what happened? The Beef Trust of the United States bought up these three ranches in the Argentine Republic and put Park Brothers out of business. The meat trust of the United States went to Australia and was going to try and get control there. But the government of Australia met them at the wharf with both hands raised in warning and said: We dont want you; stay away from our country; we want our people to get a fair deal. But this government is satisfied to open our markets freely to the beef trust of the United States. What we need for the beef trade of this country and especially in western Canada is the establishment of chilled meat trade operated and owned by the government, so that our people may be assured of getting a fair deal. They have not been getting a fair deal in the past, but have been robbed time and time again. And, as I have said, this government has been appealed to many times by the beef producers and pork producers of western Canada, but it has always turned a deaf ear to their plea.

Sheep also are higher in price in Canada than in the United States. The price throughout Canada varies from $4 to $7 per head, but in the United States it varies from $3.90 to $5.30. Swine also are higher in Canada than in the United States; the average price throughout Canada is from $10 to $13, while the average price throughout the United States is $10 to $11. The fruit question would be affected by this agreement in a way that would be beneficial to my constituency—no doubt about that. Any person who buys fruit knows that free fruit will be an advantage to western Canada. But, while that is true, it is also true that the fruit growers of British Columbia and the fruit growers of eastern Canada will have to pay their share towards the terminal elevators, and towards the Hudson Bay railway, and towards the establishment of the chilled meat trade. And that being so, surely, the people of western Canada are manly and loyal enough to pay a fair price for their fruit. I was here on the floor of this House when the fifteen hundred fruit growers came into this Chamber and laid their case before the government. I heard them tell about how their work was being ruined by this deal, and I heard them state that they represented capital to the amount of $200,000,000. These men had spent their lives in building up homes and fruit orchards, and they saw that they were to be entirely ruined in one night by this deal. I heard their explanation that the early fruit from the United States would be shipped into Canada, and in that way would kill the market in Canada. For we all know that when a man goes down street in the early fruit season, if he sees a bunch of grapes or other fruit in the window it looks very tempting and there is no doubt that he will pay two or three prices for it. These fruit men claimed that it was from the early crop they made their money, and that the later crop would only pay expenses. And what did the Prime Minister answer these fifteen hundred Canadians who had come to present their requests to him? Was it what it should have been?—Here you are, fifteen hundred Canadians, and I am the Prime Minister of Canada: I will investigate your case, and if what you say is right I will remedy the trouble. That is not the answer they received. On the contrary the answer they received was: Your doom is sealed; the pact is signed, sealed and delivered to the United States people; you are too late; there is no use in your coming to me, if you want relief you must go to Washington, not to Ottawa. I say I know that the people of western Canada are manly enough to pay a decent price for their fruit and to help these men against competition from the United States.

Then, there is the oats question. Of course, there has not been much discussion of this on the other side of the House, because of course oats are higher in Canada than in the United States. The United States in 1910 produced 1,126,765,000 bushels of oats, and the average price to the farmer in the United States was 34 cents a bushel. We produced in Canada 325,500,000 bushels, and the average price to the farmer in Canada was 35 cents a bushel. They produced in South Dakota in the same year 35,075,000 bushels at an average price of 30 cents a bushel. We produced in Manitoba 41,000,000 bushels of oats, and the average price paid the farmer throughout Manitoba was 31 cents a bushel. So, I do not think there is any use wasting more time on that subject.

There has been a good deal of discussion in connection with the barley trade; the question has been taken up by almost every speaker on that side who has spoken on this measure. It would hardly do for me to pass it by without saying a few words. In 1910 the United States produced 162,237,000 bushels of barley.

The average price paid to the farmer throughout the United States for that year was 57 cents per bushel. The United States exported 8,262,961 bushels of barley. We produced in Canada 45,147,000 bushels, and the average price paid to the Canadian farmer was 47 cents per bushel. We exported 1,446,307 bushels. South Dakota produced 20,727,000 bushels, and the average price paid to the farmer was 51 cents. Western members will recollect that last year North Dakota produced very little barley, and they had none to sell, consequently I am using the figures for South Dakota. Manitoba produced 13,836,000 bushels of barley, and the average price paid to the farmer was 39 cents per bushel, or a difference of 12 cents between the price the Manitoba farmer received and the price the South Dakota farmer received. Now, it looks at first sight as if our farmers in western Canada would receive this extra 12 cents per bushel if the duty was taken off. But I wish to direct your attention to this fact, that while the South Dakota farmer received 51 cents a bushel for his barley, the Minnesota farmer, a state lying alongside South Dakota, received 60 cents a bushel for his barley, a difference of 9 cents in two states under the same tariff. In Montana the farmer received 62 cents a bushel, in Wisconsin 64 cents, in Maine 76 cents, or a difference of 26 cents a bushel between the price in South Dakota and the price in Maine. Up to 1894 the duty on barley going into the United States was 30 cents a bushel. In that year it was changed to 30 per cent ad valorem which meant a reduction to about 15 cents a bushel. Now the very year the duty was lowered on barley going into the United States, the price throughout the whole of the United States dropped 11 cents a bushel. Some may claim that this was because of a large crop that year, and I thought perhaps that might be the case. Therefore, I took the three years before the duty was lowered, the three years during which the duty was lowered, and then the three years after the duty was put back to its former point. Let me read again from the White Book called 'Reciprocity with Canada,' at page 101, where I find that in the years 1892, 1893 and 1894 the average price of barley throughout the United States was 44 cents per bushel; during the next three years, 1895, 1896 and 1897, during which the duty was lowered to practically 15 cents a bushel, the average price was 34 cents a bushel. Then at the end of these three years when the duty was put back to 30 cents a bushel, that is for 1898, 1899, 1900, the price throughout the United States went up to 43 cents a bushel. Now I would ask any fair-minded man what would the price of barley be in Canada the moment the duty was taken off entirely? It is my opinion that we would not receive one cent more for our barley in western Canada than we do at the present time if the duty was taken off. According to the official report of the Board of the Agricultural college, it takes three to three and a half lbs. of barley to produce one pound of pork. The 'Farmers' Sun' gives the average price of Canadian pork for the last ten years as $7 per 100 lbs. Taking three and a half lbs. of barley to one lb. of pork would give 96 cents per bushel; taking three lbs. of barley to one lb. of pork would give $1.12 per bushel. So according to these undisputed authorities it works out that the Canadian farmer, by feeding his barley, realizes from 96 cents to $1.12 per bushel, in addition to which he has the by-products to enrich his farm.

Now I wish to deal shortly with the wheat question. Most of our friends think there is not going to be much gain to our farmers on the wheat question if this deal should go through. I will quote from the 'Agricultural Year Book' of the United States, and by the way this is where I get the most of the figures that I have given to-night, except when I have quoted from the 'White Book on Reciprocity with Canada and the United States.' And I find by these records that the United States exported in 1906, 127,000,000 bushels of wheat, and in 1908 it exported 151,000,000 bushels. The average price paid to the farmers throughout Canada was 93 cents a bushel ; the average price paid to the farmer of North Dakota is 90 cents a bushel ; the average price paid to the farmer in Manitoba was 80 cents a bushel. Now these figures look as if there would be some advantage to the farmers of Manitoba if they could get this extra 10 cents a bushel. But I wish to remind you that the millers of Minneapolis are no doubt paying the farmers of North Dakota a premium on their hard wheat at the present time. The moment the markets of the United States are opened to the people of western Canada and our 63,000,000 bushels of surplus wheat are thrown upon their markets this price will go down to an absolute export basis. They will no longer pay a premium on hard wheat at the Minneapolis mills. Take the condition at Morden and Plum Coulee at the present time; the Great Northern have branches in there from the United States and they can ship our wheat through in bond, grind it, ship it out again and it will only involve a duty of about one-quarter of one per cent. Do they pay our people as high a price as they pay in the United States? Not by any means. Our buyers in Manitoba are beating them out at every point. At Plum Coulee our buyers ship by the Canadian route about 100,000 bushels while they only ship 20,000 bushels through the United States. If they wanted our wheat and would pay a price of from 8 to 10 a bushel more they could take all the wheat from every point they touch, but they do not do it. I would like the Minister of Agriculture to explain to us—he took very good care not to touch upon it at the time he made his speech—why it is that the farmers in Quebec received $1.19 a bushel for their wheat while the Ontario farmer only receives 89 cents a bushel. If the Minister of Agriculture will explain that I will give way.

Mr. FISHER. I might be tempted to suggest that we have better wheat in Quebec, but I do not suppose my hon. friend will accept that explanation.

Mr. SHARPE (Lisgar). I do not know. I would like to have it explained any way because it is something that has puzzled me ever since I have seen the figures. The South Dakota farmer received 89 cents a bushel for his wheat while the farmer in Minnesota, the very next state, received 94 cents for his wheat, a difference of five cents a bushel between these two states without any tariff wall at all. The Washington farmer received 78 cents a bushel for his wheat, or two cents a bushel less than we in Manitoba received for ours. The difference between the price that the Washington farmer received, 78 cents. and that which the Minnesota farmer received, 94 cents, is 16 cents a bushel. There is a far greater difference between these two states in the union than there is in the price that the Manitoba farmer receives and the price that the Dakota farmer receives.

We have had several speeches on this question. The hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) touched on the wheat question when he was speaking, and this is what he said in connection with it. You will find it in 'Hansard,' page 3730:

> I do say this, however, that so far as I have been able to examine the matter—and I have looked into it with some care—I cannot see any reason why we should expect any very great increase in the price of wheat for exportation to the United States. There may be a reason, and there may be an increased price, but I am not able exactly to find out how it will come about.

Neither am I. I would like to quote also my hon. friend from Provencher (Mr. Molloy). He represents the next constituency to mine, he knows the conditions in Manitoba just as well as we do, and he has gone on record in connection with this wheat question. What does he say? 'Hansard,' at page 4267, he uses these words:

> I do not pretend that it will increase the price of wheat to the Canadian producer, but I say it will maintain the present prices.

That is as far as he would go. That is as far as any man can expect to go with reference to this arrangement, but I want to tell you, Mr, Chairman, that I am not satisfied with maintaining the price at the present figure. I want to see the Manitoba farmers and the farmers of western Canada get a better price, and the way to do that is by the government owning and operating the terminal elevators. It will mean two or three cents a bushel on all the grain grown in western Canada. More than that I have no hesitation in saying that if the government will own and operate the Hudson Bay railway it will add from four to six cents to the value of every bushel of grain we grow in western Canada. These are the things that I have voted for in this house; these are the things that hon. gentlemen opposite have voted against on every opportunity. In 1905 the amount of wheat produced in the three western provinces was 84,000,000; oats, 78,000,000 bushels; and barley 16,000,000 bushels. In 1908 the production amounted to, wheat, 147,000,000 bushels; oats, 197,000,000 bushels and barley 31,000,000 bushels. The increase in these three years was, wheat, 63,000,000 bushels; oats, 119,000,000 bushels, and barley 14,500,000 bushels. Saying nothing about the amount that we exported in 1905, but taking the amount of the increase alone, put these surplus products on the markets of the United States, and I want to ask you Mr. Chairman, or any fair-minded man, where will the price go in the United States? It is bound to go down; there is no doubt in the world about that. Why are the farmers in North Dakota rising at every point to protest against this deal? It is because they know the moment this deal goes through the premium that they have been receiving in the past will be wiped out, and their price will be put upon an export basis. I say, Mr. Chairman, that the proper policy for the people of Canada is to leave reciprocity alone, remedy the troubles we have at the present time and build Canada up, work out our own salvation and let the people of the United States do the same. I wish to read further the following statement by the Hon. P. C. Knox, and I quote from 'Reciprocity with Canada,' page 6. He says:

> In providing for free wheat we also take into account the facilities which the United States possesses for handling a part of the surplus Canadian crop and thus preventing the demoralization of prices which results through the dumping of large quantities upon the European markets, where the world's price is fixed. The free admission of grain from Canada thus meets the present situation and provides against future contingencies when the Canadian surplus becomes greater by placing the control in the hands of our own grain growers. They have no cause to fear a demoralizing influx under the conditions which will result from the reciprocity agreement.

At page 44, of this book Mr. Wilson, Secretary of Agriculture of the United States says:

> The United States produces surplus wheat above domestic requirements. This surplus production is sold in foreign countries. The price of our exported surplus is governed by the world's requirements, being regulated by the law of supply and demand, and the price of wheat in the United States while we are exporting, is governed by the price at which the surplus is sold, as a general proposition. Occasionally wheat corners may interfere with the law of supply and demand, and temporarily affect the price.
> Distance from markets has much to do with the prices of grain. So this proposition is modified by proximity to markets and cost of transportation. While Canada is exporting wheat or other grains and the United States is also exporting wheat, there is no particular reason why Canadian wheat should come here, unless it be that a mixture of Canadian and American wheat may be desirable on the part of our milling exporters, and our millers may find it profitable to handle the Canadian surplus. But the price to the Canadian for this surplus wheat will be substantially the same whether sold in Europe or the United States. However, if the handling of Canadian wheat by United States railroads, merchants and mills has a tendency to reduce the price it will be reduced to Canadians; and if it should reduce the price of bread to the American consumer, wise statesmanship may find it necessary to do that to avoid greater evils.

At page 46 he says:

> We can handle the Canadian export grain crop with facility. If it is brought inside our borders and milled, as it would be, our dairy men could use with great profit the byproducts of the mills. This is the feature—bran and shorts—that makes dairy products and robs the soil. If we cannot increase our yield to meet the demands of increasing population, free wheat from the nearest fields would be desirable. The influences at work are enabling the American acre to produce more, but it is a question whether this increase will meet the requirements of our rapidly growing population. Wheat growing for sale from the farm, as the pioneer practises it, can only be temporary. The land refuses to yield profitable crops after a few years, when recuperative farming must be resorted to to build up the soil where the soil robber has reduced it by grain growing. This is the reason the older prairie states, turn to grass, corn and domestic animals as soon as they can bring about the change. The United States could with great profit and benefit to the land take all the grains Canada has to sell and devote its land to less exorbitant crops, as is evidenced by the older prairie state farmers who grow no grain to sell, buy their flour and thereby keep up the fertility of the soil. In the western states where the farmer has turned from grain raising for sale to the production of crops to be fed to domestic animals on the farm, the new departure has become so profitable that lands in those states have risen in value to $100 and $200 per acre, and rents from $4 to $6 per acre.

I want to say, Sir, that I have the honour to represent one of the oldest constituencies in the province of Manitoba, and that is mighty good advice to the farmers of my constituency. We have been growing wheat crop after wheat crop in southern Manitoba, and we have come to a time now when we must change our methods, and, therefore, it is that I say that the advice given by Mr. Wilson to the farmers of the United States west is mighty good advice to the farmers of my own constituency. Mr. J. J. Hill has had a good deal to say on this wheat question, and no one has studied it more closely than he. Speaking at St. Paul, Mr. Hill said:

Now, then, what will the imperial federation plan mean to the United States and how will it affect the wheat farmer of the northwest, or of any other section of the country? In the first place, there is this established fact: The surplus of any given commodity fixes its price. It is our surplus wheat we export that fixes the price of our wheat, and that price is fixed in the Liverpool market. That is true of everything we export.

As a local illustration, the difference between the price of wheat at Minneapolis and in Winnipeg is about 5 cents in favour of the northwest. So far well and good. Reciprocity would not materially raise or lower that difference.

Suppose, now, that Canada joins the imperial federation of English colonies, as is proposed. A reasonable differential that England might impose on our wheat would be 15 cents a bushel, and that would mean our wheat growers would find their whole product lowered that much per bushel in value. The average crop is 700,000,000 bushels. Figure it out for yourself. And right on top of that we would face also this proposition: Great Britain would take over practically all of the $200,000,000 in round numbers that Canada now pays us for manufactured articles we export across the border, then add the six hundred and more millions we export to Great Britain, and we find that, if we fail to adopt the reciprocity agreement with Canada and drive it to an imperial federation, we are cheapening our wheat crop annually, say, 15 cents per bushel, and at the same time we are losing $800,000,000 of export business to England and Canada. Can we afford to do this? I say, no, and I think every man who gives this matter the study of the situation due it, will agree with me.

He wants us to step into the reciprocity deal and put it through on this side of the line and say good-bye to the mother land entirely. For my part I am not prepared to do it.

President Taft also made a speech at New York on April 27. He said:

MOST CRITICAL TIME.

'I have said that this was a critical time in the solution of the question of reciprocity,' concluded the president. 'It is critical because unless it is now decided favourably to reciprocity it is exceedingly probable that no such opportunity will ever again come to the United States. The forces which are at work in England and in Canada will derive an impetus from the rejection of this treaty and if we would have reciprocity with all the advantages that I have described and that I earnestly and sincerely believe will follow its adoption, we must take it now or give it up for ever.'

That is the idea of President Taft.

Representative George W. Prince, of Illinois, gave his version of this proposal, and I wish to read a few words from his speech:

I say to our neighbours on the north, be not deceived. When we go into a country and get control of it, we take it. It is our history, and it is right that we should take it if we want it, and you might as well understand it. The Speaker has so said; the party back of him has so said, and it does not deny that that is its desire. Now let us see if the people of Canada believe in reciprocity and annexation.

For my part I am not in favour of that kind of thing; I do not think it is the proper policy for us in this country. I say that we should keep on in the channels in which we have been working during the past 42 years, and build up this country in connection with the British Empire. They talk about opening the market of 90,000,000, who are growing and exporting the same goods that we produce, only in larger quantities. If the government wanted to do anything for our farmers and open up new markets for the people of Canada, why did they not go to some importing countries that would have been of value to us? For instance Switzerland imported in 1908 12,000,000 bushels of wheat, Japan 7,000,000 bushels, Italy 50,000,000 bushels, Germany 77,000,000 bushels, Belgium 69,000,000 bushels, Sweden 7,600,000 bushels, France 13,000,000 bushels. These countries together imported 226,000,000 bushels of wheat in 1908. Here were markets that would have been some good to us, countries consuming just the goods that we have to export. But it is farthest from the minds of the government to open up a market that needs our goods, they want to open the markets of a country that want to take our goods from us and make money in manufacturing them and re-exporting them

I say that, in my opinion, this is not in the best interests of the people of this country. I heard the Finance Minister say some time ago that this deal was made for the masses, and not for the classes, and I wondered at that time whether he remembered the masses when he was paying the classes $17,119,000 of the masses' money in bounties to the steel companies throughout this country. He forgot the masses when he was paying this $17,000,000 out, but now he turns the cry and says he is working for the masses. It is something new if he is.

In 1910, we produced in Canada farm crops amounting to $507,000,000, and dairy products amounting to $98,000,000, a total of $605,000,000. We exported about $105,000,000 worth and we used at home about $500,000,000 worth of those products of the farm. I think that the home market is by long odds the most important market we have, because every bushel of grain that we consume at home takes that much from the markets of the world, and thereby just to that extent raises the world's price and every bushel that we export into the world's markets lowers the price just that much. In 1910 we exported 52,000,000 worth of wheat. Of this $49,000,000 worth went to the British market and $3,000,000 went to other markets. In the same year we exported $1,107,000 worth of barley, of which $744,000 went to the British market and $363,000 went to other markets. In the same year we exported $21,607,000 worth of cheese. We sent to the British market $21,481,000 worth, and $126,000 worth went to other markets. It looks to me as though we had established markets now, and I think that we should remedy any troubles that we may now have, and keep on in the road that we are travelling. Who will benefit by this Bill if it does go through? I say that it will be the American paper trust, the Chicago beef trust, the United States steel company, the Minneapolis milling trusts and James J. Hill's railways. These are the companies and the trusts that will benefit by this Bill if we allow it to go through, not the grain growers of western Canada. When the grain growers were here on December 16 last, they asked for government ownership and operation of the terminal elevators, government ownership and operation of the Hudson Bay railroad, the establishment of a chilled meat trade, the extension of the British preference to 50 per cent, an amendment of the Banking Act and amendments of the Railway Act in connection with cattle guards, and live stock on railways and in relation to freight rates. They also asked for a Bill for the establishment of co-operative societies, and presented their resolution in connection with the tariff. I have worked for and voted for most of these things that they have asked for—in fact, all of them, except the tariff resolution.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou). What does my hon. friend think should be done about the tariff?

Mr. SHARPE (Lisgar). I think there should be a permanent tariff commission appointed which would have absolute control of the tariff of this country. Look at the tariff question in western Canada. A few years ago we had a duty of 35 per cent on agricultural implements coming into that country. It is lowered to-day to 17½ per cent, but we are paying as much for our implements as we did when the duty was 35 per cent. I say there should be a permanent tariff commission appointed to have absolute control over the tariff of this country.

Mr. WILSON (Lennox). Subject to parliament.

Mr. SHARPE (Lisgar). Of course, always subject to parliament. I wish to say that in my meetings in western Canada I have said that I am not a free trader. No man who has voted for me in either of the elections that I have run has ever heard me say anything in regard to free trade with the United States, because I want to say distinctly now that I do not think free trade is the proper policy for Canada at the present time. Take the history of all the great countries of the world to-day. Take England herself, take Germany, take France, take even the United States, what has built these countries up to what they are at the present time? Protection; there is no doubt about it. After they have had years of protection and have grown to what they are at the present time, ready to face the world, they are willing to have free trade with Canada, because they want to get 'control of' the natural resources of this country. I say the policy of this country is protection—as my hon. friend the leader of the opposition has said, adequate protection—all the way through. But we should have some arrangement whereby we can control the manufacturers of this country, and make them sell at a reasonable price to our people. This deal would allow us—I am speaking of my constituency—to benefit perhaps a little on cattle and barley; but we would lose on butter, eggs, cheese, pork of all kinds, mutton, horses, oats, vegetables, swine and sheep. Just take the egg question for a moment. When I was home, my partner, who is running our store, told me that on the 10th of March he went into the city of Winnipeg and offered some eggs he had for sale; and he found a man in Mr. Codville's wholesale house from the United States who offered to lay down eggs in Winnipeg for 21 cents a dozen. We paid 25 cents and were paying that to the farmers throughout my part of the country at that time; and this American offered to deliver absolutely fresh-laid eggs delivered in Winnipeg at 21 cents a dozen, after paying a duty of three cents a dozen and the freight. It meant that we would lose five cents a dozen on every dozen of eggs; and what happened? We had to sell eggs at 20 cents a dozen in our own town. The moment my partner went back to the town of Manitou, he had to put the price of eggs down to 20 cents, and the farmer was the loser. If the duty had been off eggs, they would have been selling them at 17 cents instead of 20.

Now, to sum up. The right hon. the First Minister offers us reciprocity with the United States. He will open the markets of 90,000,000 people who do not want our goods at all, who are growing and exporting the very same goods that we are, and they will only export our goods if we send them over there. Why can't we do it ourselves? I say the policy of Canada is to manufacture these and export them ourselves. Now, what does the Conservative party offer in opposition to that? What have I said, in my feeble way, ever since I have been in this House, and what principle does the Conservative party stand for to-day in opposition to this infernal pact called reciprocity? We as a party stand for government ownership and operation of terminal elevators; government ownership and operation of the Hudson Bay railway; the establishment of a chilled meat trade throughout western Canada; a permanent tariff commission; putting Manitoba on an equal footing with the other provinces of the Dominion. We also will work for and stand for preferential trade within the empire. We will hold Canada for the Canadians. We will welcome all who will come to Canada; but we absolutely refuse to send the prosperity of this country out to others. If they want to enjoy the prosperity of this country, they must come to Canada. Why, Mr. Chairman, the government went into this deal without knowing anything about what they were doing. They had no prices of wheat, horses, cattle or anything along these lines in the different provinces of the Dominion or in the different states of the union. That is proven quite conclusively by the returns brought down some time ago. My brother, the member for North Ontario, asked for a statement showing the average prices of butter and eggs in London, England, for the past five years, in comparison with the prices respectively in the eastern provinces, in Montreal, in Toronto, in Minneapolis, in Chicago, in Detroit, in Buffalo, in Boston and in New York. And this is the answer he received:

File No. 12297.

Trade and Commerce Department,
Ottawa, 25th March, 1911.

Order of the House.

Sir,—I beg to return you herewith your Reference No. 172 for statement showing comparative prices of butter and eggs in London, England, and certain points in Canada and the United States. This department has no information upon the subject. Such average prices of butter and eggs, however, are published in trade papers all over the world which can be referred to by any one desiring the information.

Enclosure.

I have the honour to be, sir,
Your obedient servant,
F. C. T. O'HARA,
Deputy Minister.

Thomas Mulvey, Esq.,
Under-Secretary of State,
Ottawa.

This proves conclusively that they knew nothing about prices, and in every case where we have put them into a corner it has been shown that they knew absolutely nothing of the facts relating to these matters. The Postmaster General (Mr. Lemieux) proved that conclusively some time ago when he was talking about the lobster question. He told the House what a great thing free lobsters would be for the people engaged in that industry in the maritime provinces until I understand the hon. member for Digby (Mr. Jameson) informed the hon. gentleman that lobsters had been on the free list in the United States for a good many years.

I have tried in my feeble way to show to you, Mr. Chairman, and to this House, my ideas of this deal, and the reasons why I cannot see my way clear to support it. And I believe that the people of my constituency will back me up and give me a better majority than before. For the reasons I have given I cannot see my way clear to support this proposition.

Mr. TAYLOR (Leeds) moved that the committee rise, report progress, and ask leave to sit again.

Motion agreed to, and progress reported.

Mr. FISHER moved the adjournment of the House.

Mr. LENNOX. I wish to give notice that, when the House is next moved into Committee of Ways and Means or Committee of Supply, to-morrow, I will move an amendment:

That all the words after the word 'that' in the proposed motion be omitted and the following substituted therefor:—

This House regrets that in permitting the Farmers' Bank of Canada to commence and to continue business, the Minister of Finance and the Treasury Board failed to exercise such proper care and to take such reasonable precautions as were necessary to prevent evasion of the law and to protect the public interest.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). What business will be taken up to-morrow?

Mr. FISHER. I thought we were going on with Ways and Means. If the hon. member (Mr. Lennox) moved that motion —Well, would he have any objection to leaving it over for another day?

Mr. LENNOX. I do not understand why. I propose to move it on motion for Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. FISHER. Probably to-morrow.

Motion agreed to, and the House adjourned at 11.21 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

TUESDAY, May 2, 1911.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

DOMINION LANDS ACT AMENDMENTS.

Mr. OLIVER moved for leave to introduce a Bill (No. 194) to amend the Dominion Lands Act. He said: A Bill has been on the Order Paper for some time to amend the Dominion Lands Act, a minor amendment. After this Bill had been on the Order Paper, we found that it was desirable to make other minor amendments, merely arising out of the fuller operation and further interpretation of the law. The other day, when the original Bill was called, I asked that it be withdrawn so that I might introduce the present Bill.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

FIRST READINGS.

Bill (No. 186) respecting the Joliette and Lake Manuan Colonization Railway Company.—Mr. Dubeau.

Bill (No. 187) respecting a patent of the Boiler Flue Cleaner and Supply Company, Limited.—Mr. Clarke (Essex).

Bill (No. 189) to amend the Juvenile Delinquents' Act, 1908.—Sir Allen Aylesworth.

Bill (No. 190) for the relief of Violet Jane Dakin.—Mr. McCarthy.

Bill (No. 191) for the relief of Hugh Samuel Bell.—Mr. Tolmie.

Bill (No. 192) to provide for increasing the capital stock of the Richelieu and Ontario Navigation Co.—Mr. Bickerdike.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION—HON. FRANK OLIVER.

Hon. FRANK OLIVER (Minister of the Interior). Mr. Speaker, before the orders of the day are called I desire to read an Ottawa dispatch which appeared in the Toronto 'World' of Friday morning last. The dispatch is as follows:

Ottawa, April 27 (Special).—The sensational charges made by a Toronto newspaper against one of the ministers of the federal government at Ottawa was no surprise here. The facts of the case have been pretty well known for some time and it is expected that the matter will come up in parliament at an early date.

It is understood that Hon. Frank Oliver is the minister against whom the charge is made. The story at Ottawa is that Mr. Oliver had an order in council passed on May 8, 1907, giving the Canadian Northern railway the power to select in Saskatchewan the whole of the land granted by the government to the Manitoba and Southeastern, which is the Canadian Northern in Manitoba, in 1890, in all 600,000 acres. In 1907, there were no lands left in Manitoba, it was alleged, and the company was given the right to select its lands in Saskatchewan.

In the same year, $50,000 was deposited from the Manhattan Bank of New York to the Imperial Bank at Edmonton in the name of Mr. Oliver. The exact date was October 3, 1907. About one year later, just before the general election of 1908, the sum of $19,000 was deposited from the Manhattan Bank in the name of Mr. Oliver at the Imperial Bank at Edmonton. It is known that he chequed out this money for campaign purposes.

It will be observed that without making a direct statement the dispatch gives currency to two separate rumours or reports, one relating to a transaction affecting the land grant of the Manitoba Southeastern Railway Company, and the other relating to an account kept in my name in the Imperial Bank of Edmonton. No connection between the land transaction and the bank account is alleged or inferred in words, but there can be no doubt that the two paragraphs have been placed together for the purpose of creating an impression in the public mind that there is some connection —and an improper connection—between them.

So that there may be no misunderstanding of my position I desire to state without qualification that there is no foundation for such an insinuation. In regard to the land transaction mentioned, I desire to say that the action taken by the government was on my recommendation, and that I made the recommendation in pursuance of what I believed to be sound public policy and with due regard to the public interest, and that I received no money, or other consideration for having made that recommendation, or in any way in connection with it. Although no specific charge has been made, I desire that the fullest opportunity shall be given to lay such a charge. I would, therefore, respectfully ask that a special committee may be appointed to hear and inquire into any charge that may be made in connection with the transaction mentioned.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Before going on with the orders of the day, I would like to ask the First Minister the name of the man who made the charge to him that has been referred to by the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Oliver) just now.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Mr. McGillicuddy.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Another question I would like to ask is if the minister will lay on the table of the House all the correspondence with regard to this charge made by Mr. McGillicuddy?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I am just about to move for a committee desired by my hon. friend the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Oliver), and the correspondence will be at the disposal of that committee.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Another question I would like to ask—I presume I am in order. How many interviews had the First Minister with Mr. McGillicuddy, and what took place at those interviews?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. My hon. friend is very inquisitive. I must tell him frankly that I do not remember how many interviews took place. In the article in the 'World' the other day five or six interviews were mentioned, and the time of each interview was given—nineteen minutes, thirteen minutes, and so on. I have no recollection of them. My recollection is, just as I stated, that a certain charge had been made against one of my colleagues, and I said that it could be pressed against him.

Mr. CAMPBELL. What was the nature of the charges preferred by Mr. McGillicuddy?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I stated that the other day.

Mr. CAMPBELL. If that is so, I would like to ask the First Minister, has he made any inquiries as to the source from which those two amounts came, namely, $50,000 and $19,350?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I stated the other day what had taken place, and my hon. friend will find it in 'Hansard.'

Mr. CAMPBELL. I have read 'Hansard' very carefully.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I am not going to make a speech. I would like to ask the First Minister if he has any idea for what purposes those sums were expended, and was such expenditure for political or personal purposes?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I stated the other day, and I repeat to my hon. friend, that I had stated to Mr. McGillicuddy that I believed that friend and colleague was an honest man. and that I would presume he was an honest man until he was proved guilty.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I have asked a very simple question of the First Minister, and his reply to me is not a reply at all. I will prefer the question again so that he will understand it.

Mr. SPEAKER. I must remind the hon. member that there is a way of asking questions prescribed in the rules. It is only a matter of courtesy that a minister can be asked to answer a question at this stage.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Speaker, you surely are not ruling me out of order for asking a legitimate question of the First Minister on a matter of very great public importance. I again ask the First Minister for what purposes were those sums expended, and was such expenditure for political or personal purposes. I think that is a legitimate question, and I would like an answer.

Mr. SPEAKER. Under the rules of the House the hon. member must give two days' notice of such a question before a minister can be asked to answer.

Mr. CAMPBELL. If the right hon. the First Minister—

Mr. SPEAKER. Order. The point cannot be discussed now.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I am not going to discuss the point.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman is out of order.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I wish to ask another question.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Am I in order, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. minister cannot be required to answer if notice is not given of the question.

Mr. CAMPBELL. The question I wish to ask is a perfectly fair question, and I am absolutely within my rights or I would not be standing here. The question is, was the account spoken of, a trust account, and was it so designated? If so, what was the nature of the trust, and on whose behalf?

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. member will have to give notice of his question.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Well, I accept your ruling, Mr. Speaker, but I have a question which I would like to ask. Acting on the precedent of the Hodgins charges, does the First Minister propose any investigation in this matter?

Mr. SPEAKER. Order. Government orders.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege upon the question raised by my hon. friend Mr. Oliver. I move:

That a special committee of five members be appointed to investigate the matter referred to this day by Mr. Oliver, a member of this House, and that the said committee be entrusted with full power to send for persons and papers, and report from time to time.

With regard to the form of motion, I would ask the Clerk to complete it with regard to examining witnesses under oath, and so on.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). The motion is in rather indefinite terms. What does the Prime Minister understand to be the scope of the proposed investigation?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I understand the scope of the investigation to be just what has been mentioned by the Minister of the Interior, that he is charged with having recommended an order in council whereby a certain quantity of lands supposed to be swamp lands were traded for other lands, and that in connection with the matter the sum of $50,000 was paid to Mr. Oliver.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). With regard to the form of the motion, perhaps it might stand over until to-morrow.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I have no objection.

Motion allowed to stand.

CANADIAN CURRENCY IN THE UNITED STATES.

Hon. W. S. FIELDING (Minister of Finance). Mr. Speaker, before you proceed to the orders of the day, I would ask leave to read a letter which takes the form of an answer to a question brought up a few days ago in regard to the circulation of Canadian currency in the United States. An hon. member, I think the hon. member for Argenteuil (Mr. Perley), stated that the Pullman Car Company was refusing to accept our currency, and the general consensus of the House was that a company of that nature, doing a large business in Canada, should not so refuse. One can understand the refusal of some small business men to accept Canadian currency in the United States, but that certainly would not apply to a company of the nature of the Pullman Car Company. In that view I had an inquiry sent to the company, and the company in reply has addressed a letter to my deputy, which I would ask leave to read to the House:

Mr. CAMPBELL

The Pullman Company,
Office of the Vice-President,
Chicago, April 21, 1911.

T. C. Boville, Esq.,
Deputy Minister of Finance,
Ottawa, Ont.

Dear Sir,—Your letter of April 18, addressed to our president, Mr. Lincoln, has been brought to my attention in his absence, and in reply, I write at once to say to you that it is doing an injustice to this company to say that it 'refuses to accept Canadian currency on the United States side of the boundary line.'

It is, and has been for many years, the practice of this company to receive Canadian currency without discount in payment for accommodations in Pullman cars operated in joint through lines between points in this country and points in the Dominion of Canada, such currency not only being received for accommodations between terminals, but also at intermediate points on such lines. Furthermore, it is a common practice to accept Canadian currency at ticket offices in this country without discount in payment for berths and seats in pullman cars.

In order that there may be no uncertainty in the matter, general instructions will be issued by our operating department directing conductors to accept Canadian currency without discount when tendered in payment for berths and seats in our cars.

If specific instances of disregard of these instructions should hereafter come to your attention, and you will give us the details, the proper corrective measures will be taken.

I have the honour to be,
Very truly yours,
(Sgd.) J. S. RUSSELL,
Vice-President.

I think it is only fair to the company that I should read that as a reply touching the point that we discussed a few days ago.

ST. PETER'S INDIAN RESERVE.

Mr. BRADBURY. The Minister of the Interior (Mr. Oliver), promised to give an answer to-day in regard to the production of the original documents in connection with St. Peter's Indian reserve.

Mr. OLIVER. I apologize to my hon. friend. I had some other matters on my mind, and I am unable to give an answer to-day, but I promise surely to give it to-morrow.

AYLWIN IRRIGATION GRANT.

Mr. CAMPBELL. One month ago the Minister of the Interior promised to have brought down at the earliest possible moment the papers with regard to the Aylwin Irrigation grant. I have not got them yet.

Mr. OLIVER. It will take a considerable time to transcribe the papers which are voluminous but the work is in progress and the return will be brought down without undue delay.

Mr. CAMPBELL. When?

Mr. OLIVER. I may be able to answer to-morrow.

CENSUS TAKING.

Mr. FISHER. I wish to say to the leader of the oposition, that the return which he asked for a few days ago, about the census taking in other parts of the world was laid on the table some three weeks ago.

INDIAN ACT AMENDMENT.

Mr. OLIVER moved the third reading of Bill (No. 177) to amend the Indian Act.

He said: This order was held over yesterday because of the absence of the member for Ste. Anne (Mr. Doherty). The hon. gentleman is not now present and if my hon. friend from North Toronto still wishes it held over I have no objection, but I think it would be perfectly safe to allow it to pass.

Mr. FOSTER. Perhaps it would not be asking too much to let it remain over for another day as the hon. member (Mr. Doherty), is not present, and as I, too, have had other things on my mind I have not been able to look into it.

Order allowed to stand.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE FARMERS' BANK.

Mr. FIELDING moved that the House go into Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. HAUGHTON LENNOX (South Simcoe). Before you leave the Chair, Mr. Speaker, I desire to draw your attention again very briefly to the Farmers' Bank. In view of the previous discussion this session it will not be necessary for me to go very deeply into the matter, and I can confine myself to the records contained in certain returns that have been brought down to the House. The Farmers' Bank was incorporated in 1904. I have nothing at all to say in reference to the incorporation of the bank originally. The Bank Act gives them a year in which to organize and get subscriptions, and as they failed to do that within the year they came back to parliament in 1905 and the Banking and Commerce Committee thought well to renew their charter for another year. They came back again in the spring of 1906 and again asked for an extension for another year and they were granted an extension of six months. I recognize that the Minister of Finance has a duty common to all members of the committee to scrutinize the legislation proposed, and I have no doubt he discharged that duty then. It may be that the Minister of Finance, by reason of his position has a greater obligation on him than an ordinary member of the committee, but I am not disposed to urge that view at present more than to say that, having regard to the failure of these people during two years to put themselves in a financial position to transact business, the minister tells us he was reluctant to grant them an extension of time. That was significant only in that the mind of the Finance Minister being set in that direction at that time, we would apprehend that he would remain seized of that idea and that he would exercise even greater diligence and care in scrutinizing the application of the bank for a certificate to do business. Further than that I have nothing to say at all with reference to the propriety or impropriety of incorporating this company. I am not aware that the Minister of Finance mentioned to the House when the Bill came before it finally the difficulties he felt in regard to the extension of time. I would suppose that probably the minister, feeling that it was doubtful whether this company should be granted an extension of time, might have felt it incumbent on him to mention to the House the doubt in his mind. However, I will let that point go. I come, therefore, to deal with the question of granting the certificate and the first point I have to refer to in that connection is the letter of Mr. Leighton McCarthy, which was mailed to the minister on the 8th of October, 1906, from Toronto. I need not read that letter further than to say that Mr. McCarthy assures the minister that grave conditions have arisen requiring careful consideration by the Treasury Board before granting a certificate, and Mr. McCarthy asks that an opportunity be afforded him of discussing the matter with the minister and he mentions that he could come down to Ottawa at any time if the circumstances are urgent, but he would prefer not to come until the following week. That letter was not answered spontaneously, and it was followed on the 11th of October by a telegram from Mr. McCarthy, and that telegram was answered on the same date by the Finance Department. But the letter of the 11th of October to Mr. McCarthy from the department ignores his suggestion that he should be given a personal interview. It intimates that a personal interview is not desired and simply tells Mr. McCarthy to forward his representations and they will receive due consideration. In other words, so far as I can see, the Minister of Finance, to use the phrase of the Prime Minister, was not actuated by any great feeling of curiosity at that time.

We come then to the letter of the 19th October from Mr. McCarthy, an important letter. It says:

I beg to inclose the special endorsement upon a writ of summons in the High Court of Justice of Ontario, which will be issued by Wm. A Dixon and others. The names of about a dozen persons are given as plaintiffs.

This letter was sent to the hon. Minister of Finance in pursuance of what Mr. McCarthy said he wanted to do, namely, to call the attention of the department to certain irregularities and frauds in connection with the obtaining of stock subscriptions for the Farmers' Bank. In that letter Mr. McCarthy points out that this suit is not merely on behalf of those named, but also of other subscribers to shares who come in and join in it. He also goes on to say that not only the grounds alleged in the special endorsement, but other grounds which may be disclosed upon the examination of the alleged subscribers for shares will be furnished. Mr. McCarthy then proceeds to say:

I have received information that the alleged subscribers for shares paid a large sum of money in cash and have signed notes for other large sums of money, and that the persons professing to act in the name of the bank have transferred notes and received the proceeds, and that a deposit either has been made or will be made of the cash received and the proceeds of these notes, or a sufficient amount to make up $250,000.

Mr. McCarthy concludes by saying:

I would be pleased to go to Ottawa upon any appointment you may make for the further consideration of this matter.

This was the second offer from Mr. McCarthy to go to Ottawa and have a personal interview with the minister and disclose to him all the facts and circumstances which prompted Mr. McCarthy to say that the whole business had been initiated in fraud.

It is necessary that we should refer to some of the statements contained in the special endorsement upon the writ which Mr. McCarthy forwarded to the Minister of Finance. This special endorsement says:

That the subscriptions for shares which were procured from the plaintiffs and others were procured through fraud and misrepresentation.

I would like to call the attention of the minister to the fact that this endorsement is not confined to eight or ten, or a dozen names of parties who allege fraud, but it goes on to say that Dr. Stewart was represented as subscribing for shares to the amount of $10,000, whereas in fact he had not subscribed for any shares. That Major Beattie, represented by the inspectors to have consented to act as a director, had not subscribed for any shares, and refused to be a director, and refused to allow his name to be used in anv way in connection with the bank; and that names of others were represented by the inspectors to have consented to act as directors who had not subscribed for any shares, or given any authority for any such publication. Then it goes on to say:

And the plaintiffs allege that the acts and proceedings of the provisional directors were illegal and irregular; that the agents and sollicitors, professing to act under the name and authority of the provisional directors procured a large number of subscribers for shares, and received the sum of about $175,000 more or less on account thereof, and also procured promissory notes to be signed by persons who were subscribing for shares, and these persons were endeavouring to discount these notes for the purpose of meeting the $250,000 that had to be deposited with the government.

Then it goes on:

That persons professing to act under the authority of the provisional directors did unlawfully deduct large sums for alleged services and commissions and other purposes out of the moneys received by them.

And the plaintiffs further allege:

That the shares and the money and the promissory notes procured from them were procured through fraud, deceit and misrepresentation; and that all money, promissory notes and other obligations received as aforesaid by all persons acting or professing to act in the name of and on behalf of the Farmers' Bank of Canada, or of the provisional directors, or any of them, are impressed with a trust in favour of all the subscribers for shares who may desire to come in and become parties to the action.

I read this special endorsement for the purpose of calling the attention of the Minister of Finance to this point, that whilst there were specific allegations with reference to twelve or thirteen who were beginning the proceedings, there were general allegations of fraud, misconduct, irregularities and disregard of the Bank Act as to the transactions generally of the Farmers' Bank and its representatives in obtaining the right to transact business.

It will be noted that Mr. McCarthy asks for an interview, and that his letter of the 19th October was not answered until the 23rd. And it is a significant fact that all through this correspondence, every letter that affected the Farmers' Bank, or Mr. Travers, was acted upon, and answered with an amazing degree of promptitude, whereas everything that interested the public was delayed or ignored.

Replying to this letter to Mr. McCarthy, of the 23rd October, 1906, the deputy minister said:

I beg to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 19th inst. to Mr. Fielding's address respecting the Farmers' Bank of Canada. When application is made by the Farmers' Bank to the Treasury Board for a certificate to enable them to commence business, the representations contained in your letter with its inclosure will be laid before the Board.

That was never done.

Mr. FOSTER. Hear, hear.

Mr. LENNOX. I noticed during the last discussion that it was alleged that probably that was not done. Well, I have here the means of proving absolutely that it was never done. You will note that Mr. McCarthy urged at least twice that he be granted an interview so that he might discuss the whole matter with the minister. As a member of parliament he had a duty to discharge, and he desired to have the minister seized of the whole situation both as regards his clients and the public generally, and the other subscribers to the shares. But for some reason the minister absolutely ignored the petition of one of his own supporters to have this matter investigated in the satisfactory way in which it might have been investigated, if this interview had been consented to. On October 23, Mr. Travers forwards the receipt for that $250,000 deposit, and on October 24, with that promptness which has characterized this branch of the case, the very day upon which it was received, the deputy minister writes acknowledging the receipt of the money and says:

I may say in this connection that opposition has been filed in this department to the granting of a certificate to your bank under section 14 of the Bank Act.

T. C. BOVILLE,
For Deputy Minister of Finance.

On October 29, we have this amazing letter from Mr. Travers:

Toronto, October 29, 1906.

The Hon,
The Deputy Minister of Finance,
Ottawa, Ontario.

Dear Sir,—Yours of the 24th, post-marked October 26, was received here on the 27th.

I was surprised to know that any one had filed an opposition against this bank being granted a certificate.

Would you kindly do me the favour of supplying me with a copy of the said objections, as I do not know up to the present moment wherein we have deviated in the slightest effect from the Bank Act.

W. R. TRAVERS,
General Manager.

At that time, on October 29, when Mr. Travers wrote this letter and on October 30, when it was received in the Department of Finance, the department by perusal of the newspapers to which allusion has been made, possessed full and ample knowledge that that statement was absolutely false, and it is not unimportant that we should keep that point firmly in mind. The Finance Minister knew at that time, as I submit, that the statement of Mr. Travers that he was not aware of any irregularity or any charge that could possibly be made against him was not in accordance with the facts.

On October 30, 1906, a letter was addressed to Mr. Leighton G. McCarthy, as follows:

Ottawa, Oct. 31, 1906.

Leighton G. McCarthy, Esq., K.C., M.P.,
Toronto, Ont.

Dear Sir,—Referring to your letter of the 19th instant, addressed to Mr. Fielding, on the subject of the Farmers' Bank of Canada and the issue of a certificate to that bank to commence business under section 15 of the Bank Act, I notice recently a reference in the newspapers for a judgment given by Judge Anglin in a suit relating to this matter. In view of the decision rendered, I shall be obliged if you will let me know if you still desire the protest contained in your letter to be brought before the Treasury Board upon an application of the Farmers' Bank for a certificate to be considered.

T. C. BOVILLE,
For Deputy Minister of Finance.

That I venture to say is a somewhat remarkable letter. Why did the Deputy Minister write that letter at all? He says he has noticed something in the newspapers, and he, therefore, thinks it is right to ask Mr. McCarthy to withdraw the protest he had entered, and which Mr. McCarthy wanted to supplement by a viva voce interview with the minister. It is worth while to ascertain just what the position was in regard to the newspaper matter. Was the newspaper account one that would allay suspicion, and that would lead the Department of Finance to think that all was right or was it one to add to their suspicion, and give them additional reasons for not granting a certificate? I have taken pains to look into that question, and I find that the case came up in court on Saturday October 27, and the account of it appeared in the Toronto papers, on Monday, October 29. It would reach Ottawa on the evening of Monday, October 29. Again I call attention to the promptness with which the Department of Finance deals with anything that will help Travers to get through this charter. On October 29, items appeared in the Toronto papers. They are sensational items, covering several columns, they are not in the ordinary Osgoode Hall news. The account shows that general fraud was charged, that there was an affidavit by Mr. William Laidlaw, K.C., showing not only specific fraud as affecting his clients, but a general system of fraud in the initiation of the bank. That is what is in the newspapers, and that is what Mr. Boville read. Then it is pointed out in the newspaper accounts that the matter is only tentatively disposed of, that it will not be actually disposed of until the 1st of November, so that the Department is in a hurry as you see. And then, to make it more easy for the department, to call on Mr. McCarthy, as they do, to withdraw his protest against the issue of the certificate, there are such headlines as: Farmers' Bank avoids threatened windup. Plaintiffs bought out. Oath against oath, and things of this kind. I wondered when I read this letter why the Minister of Finance, having promised to lay this matter before the Treasury Board, was so solicitous to have Mr. McCarthy withdraw this charge. But one is more amazed to find that the very account that is referred to in that letter, and which is the only excuse for writing it, is of a nature to intensify the anxiety of the department to have a thorough and full investigation of this matter. They ask Mr. McCarthy if he still wishes to let the Treasury Board know of the pretty general allegations contained in his letter, and they suggest by their letter that he should not press it, because of what they had read in the newspapers; and what they read in the newspapers must have been of the character published in the newspapers, and not of a character on which to base a letter of this kind. Mr. McCarthy was not satisfied, he knew that the suit was not settled. What happened was this, and it is set out in the newspapers: Mr. Lindsay got busy, he hied off into the county of Halton, got hold of the clients of Messrs. Laidlaw and McCarthy without the knowledge of these solicitors, bought them off, and came into court with affidavits that these people were settled with, and Mr. Kappelle, representing the plaintiffs' interests in court, objected. There was no one present representing the general public interest at this proceeding as in the other proceedings in connection with this transaction. The judge said that in as much as it was stated that the whole matter was settled there was no necessity to proceed further, but he would leave the matter for final decision until November 1. Mr. McCarthy does not altogether agree with the department's view. He writes back:

Home Life Building, Victoria St.,
Toronto, November 1, 1906.

T. C. Boville, Esq.,
Acting Deputy Minister of Finance,
Ottawa.

Dear Sir,—With reference to yours of the 31st ultimo, I will be in Ottawa on Monday or Tuesday of next week when I will do myself the pleasure of calling upon you with reference to the subject matter of your letter.

LEIGHTON McCARTHY.

This is another circumstance, I submit, to call the attention of the department to the fact that Mr. McCarthy does not regard it as so simple a matter that he could write back and say 'Yes.' Then, on November 2, Mr. McCarthy writes in this way. And I call your attention to the fact, Mr. Speaker, that this is not the complete withdrawal that the department has asked Mr. McCarthy for. It is a qualified withdrawal, as much as to say, 'my clients are now safe, and, so far as they are concerned, I have no further protest to make; but you know what I said, about the other; it is up to you to do what you like.'

Mr. FOSTER. Is there anything to show that he saw the minister in the meantime?

Mr. LENNOX. Not a syllable. He never did see the minister, so far as we know from anything that has transpired. You see he has it on his mind that he would like to have an interview with the minister; and even after this call-off-your-dog letter from the department, he again says: I would like to go down. Here is the letter to the minister to which I have referred:

Toronto, November 2, 1906.

Honourable W. S. Fielding,
Minister of Finance,
Ottawa.

Dear Sir,—Referring to my letters of the 8th and 9th inst.——

That is an error. It should be 8th and 19th ult.

—with reference to the application for a certificate made on behalf of the Farmers' Bank, I am advised by those who are instructing me that the claims made by them in the action brought have been settled by their subscriptions being taken up by some parties interested in the bank and refunding the money paid by the individuals or returning the notes which had been given. The objections which I made on their behalf to the issue of the certificates are therefore withdrawn. Would you mind, therefore, returning to me the papers which I forwarded to you?

Mark you, there is this important item of information, not only conveyed by the newspapers to the department, but conveyed personally to the Minister of Finance by this letter of Mr. McCarthy, that the persons interested in the bank had been compelled to take over the subscriptions to relieve these parties who had brought the suit, to buy them off and give them up their notes. The newspapers show, further, that they had been compelled to guarantee them against the double liability to which they otherwise would have been subject. So the matter stood on the third of November, when this letter would arrive.

Now, I want to pause here for a moment that we may see what the situation was at that time and of what circumstances the minister had undoubted knowledge on that day. I submit that in the letter of Mr. McCarthy's withdrawal and by the accounts contained in the newspapers there is a full, a sufficient and complete acknowledgment by the persons interested in promoting the Farmers' Bank, that all the allegations contained in Mr. McCarthy's particulars of claim, as forwarded to the minister, so far as these parties are concerned, were absolutely true. There are some other outstanding features that I shoud refer to as having been before the minister on the third of November. The first is, that, having regard to the fact that this matter was up in court before Travers wrote his letter of the 29th of October, the minister had specific and clear information on the 3rd of November that Travers' letter of the 29th of October, saying that he knew of nothing wrong, was absolutely a falsehood. That is one item in reference to Travers. The second item is, that the winding up proceedings had been averted by a compromise, and by a surreptitious buying off of the plaintiffs behind the backs of their solicitors effected through Lindsay and Travers, the Travers who afterwards secured the confidence of the minister. Travers was charged in these proceedings, as reported in the Toronto newspapers, to which Mr. Boville refers, with fraud, with gross dishonesty, and with an evasion of the Bank Act, the charge being made by so eminent a K.C. as William Laidlaw, on oath in court. In that statement of fraud others than the plaintiffs—Robert Noble, Dr. Stewart, Major Beattie, and others —were all affected by the frauds; and notwithstanding the settlement of the suit, all the facts as affecting them remained on record on oath at Osgoode Hall, undisposed of, as the minister knew. That a large proportion of the $250,000 was obtained by discount of notes, as the minister, on the 3rd of November, well knew. That moneys actually collected had been wrongfully, and contrary to the Bank Act, unlawfully diverted to the payment of commission and other improper purposes, and charges by the agents and solicitors of the bank, as the minister knew, and that the agents and solicitors of the bank were acting irregularly, dishonestly, and contrary to the Bank Act, as was alleged on oath, as the minister also knew. All these circumstances, as I submit, existed on the 3rd of November, to the knowledge of the minister, and were, as I submit, important circumstances to make him hesitate—yes, to make him hesitate even to the extent of refusing—to grant the charter even if nothing more had been shown.

But it does not stop there. I said a few moments ago that the statements that Mr. McCarthy asked to have laid before the Treasury Board were never laid before the Treasury Board. I have proof in the letter of 7th November, 1906, in which Mr. Boville says, addressing Mr. McCarthy:

> Referring to your letter of the 2nd instant, in the matter of an application of the Farmers' Bank of Canada for a certificate to commence business, I beg to inclose herewith the papers forwarded with your letter of the 19th October.

Returned on the 7th of November, or some weeks before the application of the Farmers' Bank was made. So we have this point absolutely clear,—these papers were not submitted to the Deputy Minister of Justice, and were not submitted to the Treasury Board. Well, what happened? The funniest thing of all happened. The Deputy Minister, having notified this gem-like character Travers of a difficulty—for he says, 'opposition is offered'—on the 24th of October, is dreadfully afraid he might attempt to explain and create greater difficulty. So having got rid of the evidence of Mr. McCarthy laid before the Minister of Finance, and having refused the repeated offers of Mr. McCarthy to go and discuss the whole matter with the Minister of Finance, on the 7th of November, the very day on which the papers were returned to Mr. McCarthy, Mr. Boville says the coast is clear—not in those words, but in a more definite form. He does it promptly; he says:

> W. R. Travers, Esq.,
> General Manager,
> The Farmers' Bank of Canada,
> Toronto, Ont.
> Dear Sir,—Referring to my letter to you of the 2nd inst., inclosing copy of a letter addressed to Mr. Fielding by Mr. Leighton McCarthy by way of a protest to the granting of a certificate to your bank to commence business, I beg to state that I am advised by Mr. McCarthy that the objections which he made to the issue of a certificate have been withdrawn.

That is not true. Mr. McCarthy had made a series of objections on behalf of his clients, and so far as his clients were concerned, those charges were withdrawn because these people had been bought off. But what I point out is this: Why in the name of common sense, why in the name of the rights of the people, has the Department of Finance to go out of its way to say: Don't answer that letter, don't take any chances, or complicate matters? We have got rid of the McCarthy letter, don't say anything. It is like Alphonse and Gaston. 'Don't commit yourself, my dear Alphonse,' says the Minister of Finance. 'I certainly will not, my dear Gaston,' replies innocent Mr. Travers. Well, that brings the record down to the application. The application was forwarded on the 27th of November, inclosed in a letter from Mr. Travers. It reached here on the 28th of November. We begin to do something then, there is no delay after that. On the 29th Mr. Travers is here, and these papers are here before him. There is his application, there is his affidavit and his declaration verifying it. I need only read two clauses of that declaration, the fourth and the fifth, and these are the two clauses upon which the Department of Finance rely when they are trying to satisfy the Bankers' Association later on:

4. On the 23rd day of October, 1906 (says Travers in his declaration), there had been actually bona fide subscribed 5,757 shares of the capital stock of the Farmers' Bank of Canada, and I have had personal knowledge of the applications and subscriptions, and each and all of the said subscriptions is and are on the printed form of application—a copy of which is now produced and marked Exhibit C to this my declaration, and that the said subscriptions appeared on the stock books of the said bank, and that a sum beyond $250,000 thereof in cash has been actually paid in by the subscribers of the same.

5. Now shown to me and marked Exhibit D to this my declaration is a list of the subscribers to the capital stock of the said bank correctely setting forth as to each subscription the name of the subscriber, his address, the number of shares subscribed for by him, the amount of such shares and the amount paid in thereon. Each of the said subscriptions is a bona fide subscription to the capital stock of the said bank.

That is the statement made on oath by Mr. Travers, and filed with the department. It will be admitted surely that if, to the knowledge of the minister, that declaration was in any substantial matter untrue, it stamped Mr. Travers in such a way that his testimony ought not to be received. What will you say, Mr. Speaker, when I tell you that in that very application, attached to it as exhibit D referred to in the clauses I have just read, in that very list of subscribers are the names of the men who were plaintiffs in that suit, and whose names, it was admitted on oath, were every one of them obtained by fraud? Let me read the names:

John McLeod, Milton, Ont., 1 share, $100, $50 paid; John Sproat, Mansewood, Ont., 100 shares, $10,000, $1,000 paid; Geo. Gastle, Milton, Ont., 10 shares, $1,000, $1,000 paid; Finlay McCallum, Milton, Ont., 10 shares, $1,000, $1,000 paid; W. A. Dixon, Milton, Ont., 50 shares, $5,000, $500 paid; James Murray, of subscribers, are the names of the men Mansewood, Ont., 10 shares, $1,000, $300 paid; John Stewart, Milton, Ont., 10 shares $1,000, $100 paid; Geo. Denoon, Milton, Ont., 20 shares, $2,000, $2,000 paid; Robert Hume, Milton, Ont., 10 shares, $1,000, $100 paid; William McLean, Milton, Ont., 5 shares, $500, $50 paid; Wm. Harris, Milton, Ont., 5 shares, $500, $500 paid.

Yet there had been a suit of which the Minister of Finance and his Deputy Minister had complete knowledge, all of record in their own office, and brought to their knowledge by the newspapers, showing that as regards those eleven names, there was enacted an organized system of fraud. There had been a refund, and these parties had been guaranteed and had been bought off, as the 'Globe' and 'Mail' and other Toronto newspapers, alleged. Yet their names are here as bona fide subscribers. They had given promissory notes, and the money had been refunded, and they had been bought up and silenced, and the fraud was compromised, the felony was compounded by those parties who subsequently came to the Minister of Finance to get this certificate. The next step I need not spend any time upon. The minister forwards a file of the papers to the Deputy Minister of Justice, and the Deputy Minister of Justice says:

As regards the statements of Wm. R. Travers, they are sufficient if they are accepted.

And he leaves it in that way. But even if the Deputy Minister of Justice has made a mistake in this matter, he was not much to blame, because he was not furnished with material upon which to found a judgment upon the merits. I am glad that it is not pretended that the minister submitted anything more to the Deputy Minister of Justice than the mere question as to whether the form of the document as a legal document was sufficient for the purpose. Now we began to have things done promptly again after a considerable lack of promptness. Mr. Travers' application came on the 28th of November; Mr. Travers was here on the 29th November. On the 30th of November we have a letter from Mr. Fielding to Mr. Travers. After referring to his inability to see Mr. Travers the day before, the minister says:

There is a phase of the matter which I should like to bring to your notice so that you may consider it at once. It has been represented to us that in some previous instances where an application was in all respects apparently regular, there was actaully an evasion of the intention of the Bank Act in relation to the paid-up capital. We have been told that in some cases the subscribers did not actually pay in cash but gave notes to the provisional directors which were used to raise the money. On account of information of this kind, which had reached us in relation to a previous case, we deem it proper to scan very closely every application for a certificate which comes to us. I shall be glad to have an assurance that nothing of the kind has taken place in relation to the subscriptions for the Farmers' Bank, but that the amount set forth in the application as having been paid up have in every case been bona fide cash payments.

Alphonse and Gaston come in again. Why did not the Finance Minister talk to this man in a business way? If a man goes into a bank, and they find that he has been guilty of misrepresentation and fraud, and he applies for a loan, the bank manager meets him and says: 'I want this matter cleared up before you can do any business with us; if you show that you are an honest man, we will deal with you; if you cannot show that, you will not have any business dealings with us.' The Minister of Finance, however, was very polite and inoffensive to Mr. Travers in referring to what had been done in some other case, imaginary or real, as much as to say: 'You must not imagine for a moment that we think there was anything wrong in your case, but because there was something wrong in another case, we want to be exceedingly careful, and I shall be glad to have an assurance from you that all is right.' What did the Minister of Finance mean by 'an insurance' in that case? Mr. Travers had made a solemn declaration which in law has all the force and effect of an oath rendering him liable to the penalties of perjury. When the minister dictated that letter, did he mean anything or was it a sham? I will not for one moment believe that he meant a sham; no one knows the Minister of Finance would be mean enough to suggest that. He meant what he said—he meant: 'I want some assurance; I want something better than your declaration; I want some proof that this matter is square and bona fide. I have your declaration; I have your letter of the 29th of October; I know that that letter was false; I have your declaration of the 27th of November; I know that it bears on its face the absolute refutation of its truth; and I want some assurance.' And what happens? The minister meant well; no doubt he did. But smooth Mr. Travers came to the minister, and the minister cross-examined him, he says; and what was the result? The result was nothing. After having determined to have an assurance, which meant some other evidence beyond the evidence of a man whom the records had convicted as being unreliable, he had an interview with that man, and, whether by the persuasion of Mr. Travers or by the persuasion of Mr. Calvert, perhaps the guarantee of Mr. Calvert that Mr. Travers was a superior class of man, and, therefore, eminently reliable, notwithstanding the fact that he had sent a false letter, notwithstanding the fact that he had made a false declaration which was on file in the department at that time, in some way which I cannot understand, which I am not bound to explain, the Minister of Finance decided to let this matter go through—a matter which I believe will be one of continued regret to the House, and the country, and, I have no doubt, to do the minister justice, a matter of regret to him also. Therefore, what we find is this, that instead of having any assurance from Mr. Travers, we have merely his verbal statement to the Minister of Finance, followed by this letter merely for the purpose of record:

Ottawa, November 30, 1906.

The Hon. W. S. Fielding,

In reply to your letter of the 30th of November, I have to say that in the case of the Farmers' Bank of Canada the provisional directors did not raise the money in the way mentioned by you.

What does that mean? It certainly does not meet the letter which the Minister of Finance wrote; and if the cross-examination was no more successful than was the letter elicited afterwards, the tender conscience of Mr. Travers was not very much hurt. The Minister of Finance, when he wrote the letter of the 30th of November, meant what he said. He realized that with the evidences of dishonesty which were spread out upon the record in his own office, he could not and dare not accept the statement of Mr. Travers, and he writes to him for further assurance; but, by some means, I know not what—some means which are very much to be regretted—honest, so far as the Minister of Finance is concerned, I have no doubt at all, but by some unfortunate circumstance, the matter was allowed to go through, notwithstanding the determination of the minister a few hours before that it could not go through without further evidence. That is the most charitable construction I can put upon it. Now, on the same 30th of November, the order in council was made; on the same 30th of November the certificate of the order in council was issued; on the same 30th of November the certificate was transmitted to Mr. Travers, addressed to Toronto, but handed to him here; on the same 30th of November the balance of the deposit, $245,000, was handed over to Mr. Travers; pretty prompt action, with this fortunate circumstance, that if it had been availed of, the Minister of Finance could have prevented the payment of that cheque if he had thought fit to do so. What have we on the 30th of November? We have the letter of the Minister of Finance to Mr. Travers; we have the interview of Mr. Travers with the Minister of Finance; we have the letter of Mr. Travers to the Minister of Finance; we have the order in council made upon the matter—all being carefully submitted to the Treasury Board; we have the certificate issued by the officials of the department; we have the cheque handed over, and the certificate handed over, and the whole matter closed—seven distinct transactions all in one busy day, the 30th of November, when it is urgent that this matter should be closed. This pretty nearly ends the chapter of incidents. We have also on that day the receipt for the cheque from Mr. Travers. On the 30th of November—dated the same day, and possibly here the same day; it could not have reached the Minister of Finance or else he would not do as he did—we have a letter of the 30th November written by Mr. E. S. Clouston, president of the Canadian Bankers' Association, an institution acting under the Bank Act, a branch, so to speak, of the administration of public affairs in Canada; we have a letter from him showing that the representations of Mr. Travers were false. I read that letter:

CANADIAN BANKERS' ASSOCIATION,
INCORPORATED 1900.

Montreal, November 30, 1906.

Farmers' Bank of Canada.

T. C. Boville, Esq.,
Deputy Minister of Finance,
Ottawa.

Dear Sir,—In connection with the application of the Farmers' Bank of Canada for the usual certificate from the Treasury Board, I have reason to believe that the money lodged, or to be lodged, at Ottawa as stock subscriptions, cannot be regarded as paid-up capital, and that a large proportion of the amount necessary to the obtaining of a certificate is a loan made upon the promise of its payment when returned by your department.

Permit me to request that, if only for the protection of the public, the Treasury Board will exercise its right to refuse to issue a certificate if it thinks best so to do, until a thorough investigation has been made into the circumstances stated herein.

E. S. CLOUSTON,
President.

And I may state to you, Mr. Speaker, so as to have it on record, that this statement turns out to be absolutely true—at least $20,000 was borrowed, independently of the amounts that were borrowed on promissory notes, to make up the deposit with the government. Now, Sir, what should the Finance Minister have done? I say in the first place that he should have refused the certificate and that it never should have been issued. The next point I have to make is that even though through improvidence or mistake this certificate was issued in good faith, it was still the duty of the Minister of Finance to see that the result should not be prejudicial to the public. I will not quibble as to the question of cancellation, I will not argue as to the question of a royal commission. Notwithstanding the fact that a royal commission did issue in the insurance case on less grounds than existed here and without consulting parliament, and under the same Act that would have to be invoked in this case, I do not need to argue upon that point. I say that when on the 30th November or the 1st December at latest, the knowledge came to the Finance Minister that he had been deceived, it became the duty of the minister, beyond question, to see that the public should not be defrauded. Can there be any doubt about it? The cheque was not paid; Mr. Travers was a needy man, Mr. Travers was a criminal, the Minister of Finance knew it on the 1st December if he did not know it before, and a criminal is a coward the world over, and the minister had only to telegraph Mr. Travers to come to Ottawa, and he would have come by the first train. And criminal as he was to the knowledge of the minister on the 1st December if not before, the minister had him at his feet, and could have shaken him as a mastiff shakes a terrier, and he could have made him disgorge that cheque in less time than I take to tell you, and he could have made him give up that certificate rather than be landed behind the bars. That was the duty of the minister. I was going to call to your attention, Mr. Speaker, to the peculiar promptness with which everything that facilitated the action of Mr. Travers transpired. I do not want to insinuate for a moment—and I want it to be distinctly understood that in what I say this afternoon I do not make any charge of want of good faith against the minister—but it is a circumstance unfortunate in itself that this fatal rapidity occurred in this particular case when there was every reason for delay, and investigation. There ought to have been such an investigation as would inevitably have prevented the happening of this disaster which will ruin a large number of people in the province of Ontario. Therefore, without imputing to the Minister of Finance any wilful wrong or misconduct or want of good faith, I do think that the Minister of Finance, as a public man in his public capacity, does deserve the censure of this House and of the people of Canada through this House, for the great wrong that has been inflicted upon a large number of deserving people throughout the province of Ontario; many of whom cannot afford the enormous loss entailed upon them. I say so because the minister was warned time and again. The minister is a clever man, we all recognize that—sometimes we think he ought to put it to better account—but he is a clever, astute man, and a warning to such a man ought to have had some effect. He was warned by his own opinion about the matter; he was warned when these men came back a second time for the renewal of their charter, because, as he tells us himself, he realized that having hawked their stock about for two years unsuccessfully, they were not the best class of men to go into the banking business. That should have made him more cautious about investigating before granting the certificate. He was warned by previous cases as to which he writes to Mr. Travers; he was warned by Travers' letter of the 29th October, which from his own knowledge of the circumstances was false; he was warned many times by the hon. member for Halton—and when I say that I do not choose to believe the member for

Halton in preference to the Minister of Finance except upon the broad principle that having faith in both of them as being anxious to tell what is right, I recognize that the member for Halton has fewer charges upon his memory than has the Minister of Finance and also that he is speaking of a fact positive, and the Minister of Finance is only speaking of a matter of recollection. I will say nothing about the warning of Mr. Osler, M.P. for Toronto, because that is in dispute. He was warned by Mr. McCarthy's letters of the 8th and 19th October, and he refused the offers that Mr. McCarthy made to have a personal interview. He was warned by the legal documents explicit, full and direct as to general misconduct, evasion of the Bank Act, and dishonesty, as disclosed in the legal documents forwarded by Mr. McCarthy. He was warned by the newspapers which contained a full account of the fraud by which these Halton farmers had been robbed, and he was warned by the qualified and cautious withdrawal of Mr. McCarthy which was as much as to say: You do as you like, but I want to have it understood that I only withdraw so far as my clients are concerned. And, the Minister of Finance was warned, in a way that I cannot understand his ignoring, by the conclusive falsehoods stamped upon the face of the declaration and application which Mr. Travers filed in his department. This being the case, reluctant as I am to say anything in any degree harsh as regards the Minister of Finance, having great regard for him as a public man, yet realizing as I do that he failed to discharge the duty which he owed parliament in connection with the Farmers' Bank, I beg to move:

That all the words after the word 'that' in the proposed motion be omitted and the following substituted therefor:—

This House regrets that in permitting the Farmers' Bank of Canada to commence and to continue business, the Minister of Finance and the Treasury Board failed to exercise such proper care and to take such reasonable precautions as were necessary to prevent evasion of the law and to protect the public interest.

Hon. W. S. FIELDING (Minister of Finance). There is one passage in the speech of the hon. gentleman's in which I can most heartily agree. It is that in which he said it is deeply to be regretted that the Farmers' Bank was allowed to be organized. Most heartily do I concur in that regret. The occasion is one of these, however, in which it is so much easier to be wise in a later stage than at the beginning. Looking at the matter to-day in the light of recent events, in the light of the failure of the bank, in the light of all the facts that are now known, one naturally comes to the conclusion that the whole transaction was most regrettable. It is, however, very difficult to-day to bring a fair judgment to bear upon an event which was not judged in the light of to-day, but which had to be judged in the light of things as they stood some four years ago.

We had a very full discussion of this subject a short time ago, and so far as I can see my hon. friend has not brought forward any point which was not fully gone into in that discussion. At all events I cannot undertake to add anything to the information before the House, and therefore I do not intend to occupy the attention of the House except very briefly. The granting of this certificate to the bank was no doubt a matter of importance, but I do not think it had exactly the importance which my hon. friend seems to attach to it. But for the granting of the certificate, he said, this bank would not have been organized. That is true, but the same thing may be said regarding many other stages in the Bank's affairs. Had the farmers not subscribed for stock, the bank would not have been organized. Had application not been made for a charter, it would not have been organized. Had the charter not been approved by the Committee on Banking and Commerce, it could not have been organized. Nor would it have been organized had the charter not been approved in this House by hon. gentlemen on both sides. Had the shareholders not met and constituted a board of directors, and had the board of directors not taken all the initial steps required by the Bank Act, the organization of the bank could not have been completed. If any one of these steps had not been taken the bank certainly would not have been organized, because it required each and every one of them to give it a legal standing.

There are several stages in the organizing of a bank, the first of which is the granting of a charter. My hon. friend (Mr. Lennox) has alluded to that as if the government, and the Minister of Finance in particular were specially responsible for the granting of this charter. On reflection, I think he will admit that that is not a fair argument at all. There is a parliamentary sense in which the government have to do with all legislation, but we know that as a matter of fact, in the management of private Bills, the government do not usually interfere. For instance there was a Bill last session in regard to which a number of members of the government happened to unite in its support, and we were told that we were interfering with the privileges of members, and that the government should not interfere in a private Bill. So that the idea that the government had anything in particular to do with the granting of the charter to this bank is an entirely mistaken one. I was a member of the Banking and Commerce Committee. I do not recollect whether my hon. friend was or not.

Mr. LENNOX. I was not. I may say to the hon. minister that I did not address myself at all to the incorporation of the bank, and I agree in all he has said in that connection.

Mr. FIELDING. My hon. friend repeatedly referred to the granting of the charter. He did not dwell on it, I admit, but he said sufficient to imply that in the granting of this charter in the beginning some wrong was done. As a matter of fact that Bill came before the Banking and Commerce Committee like any other private Bill. A charter was granted, then an extension was given, and later on another extension. I was in this position. My hon. friend has represented that for some mysterious reason I was particularly anxious and zealous in having this bank organized, and give Mr. Travers a chance to go into business. Well, those who know anything about the course I took in the Banking and Commerce Committee know that my position was the very reverse. I do not remember the first extension, but I know that I was decidedly unfriendly to the second. I was not unfriendly because I thought there was anything wrong or suspected anything crooked, but simply because I regretted to find a number of farmers undertaking to organize a bank. I was afraid that there were going into a business for which they were not well fitted, and that it might not be a success. I had, however, no reason to suspect anything wrong. When, therefore, the second extension was asked I opposed it. The committee, however, consented to give the six months extension, and that was not the fault of the government or the opposition. I could not say what particular view any member on either side took on that occasion, but I do remember my own, and I know that the committee came to the conclusion that a six months extension should be given. All the members of the committee who gave them that extension are equally responsible with those on this side of the House. When the measure came to the House I do not remember anything particular about it. It travelled the usual course of a private Bill, and all members of the House, irrespective of party who allowed that private Bill to become law, are equally responsible for the granting of the charter.

Now, we come to the question of the certificate. My hon. friend has dwelt upon the letters of Mr. McCarthy. What the record shows is that Mr. McCarthy wrote a letter filing objections to the granting of the certificate, and he was informed that application for the granting of the certificate had not yet been received, but that when the application for the granting of the certificate should come in then his representation would receive consideration and the papers would be submitted to the Treasury Board. The application did come in, but Mr. McCarthy wrote a letter, which is on the record and which my hon. friend read, withdrawing the statements he had made. It is not an unusual thing in the organization of a company to find some shareholders who become discontented and wish to withdraw. Mr. McCarthy, representing some of the shareholders, filed a protest; a little later he withdrew the protest, and asked that the papers be sent back to him. That is the whole story of that matter. My hon. friend said that Mr. McCarthy was very anxious to come to Ottawa and discuss the matter, but we would not let him. The hon. gentleman knows enough of Mr. McCarthy to know that if he wanted to come to Ottawa to see a minister, whether of the present cabinet or any other, Mr. McCarthy would come and see that minister. As a matter of fact, while intimating his willingness to come when necessary, Mr. McCarthy, so far as my recollection goes, did not come to Ottawa. Later on, Mr. McCarthy having withdrawn his objection, proceedings went on towards the granting of the certificate. On a certain date, November 30, the certificate was granted. My hon. friend thinks there was a remarkable and undue haste in the events of that day. Now, once it was decided, whether wisely or unwisely may be a matter of debate, that that certificate should be granted, it would become a mere matter of procedure in the department, and I am certainly far from complaining of my deputy for expediting it. I am of the opinion that once a decision on any point is reached, it is the duty of the officials to carry out that decision as promptly as possible, and if in that instance the deputy minister expedited the transaction I should not see in it anything to suspect; I should, on the contrary, be disposed to commend that official for having carried out as promptly as possible a matter which had been decided by the proper authorities. My hon. friend tried to read into Mr. Boville's letters something mysterious; he implied that Mr. Boville was trying to prevent Mr. McCarthy from coming here. I do not complain of my hon. friend suggesting all sorts of faults on the part of the minister—although he was very kind in his personal references to myself—for after all that is in the game of public affairs; I do think, however, he should not be ungenerous enough to suggest, or imply, that the deputy minister, who is not responsible, I am responsible, in the writing of these letters, whether as to the dates or to the terms, had any other purpose than to do his duty as a public official.

Mr. LENNOX. In whatever I said with reference to Mr. Boville, I regarded him as identical with the minister.

Mr. FIELDING. I am responsible.

Mr. LENNOX—and therefore the minister becomes responsible.

Mr. FIELDING. My hon. friend knows that while a minister is responsible, matters of this sort have very largely to be carried out by his officials. That does not relieve him of responsibility, I am responsible all through; but my hon. friend will see that if there was a conspiracy in this matter not only must I have been a conspirator, but Mr. Boville must have been one also. I shall not quarrel with him if he puts me in that light, but I want him to spare Mr. Boville who is a good official and merely wanted to do his duty.

It has been said that certain allegations were made against the organization of the bank and that they were withdrawn. Then, we have filed an affidavit of Travers and the next day, after we had agreed to grant the certificate, we received a letter from Sir Edward Clouston, President of the Bankers' Association. It has been clearly shown that that letter reached us after the decision had been reached, after the certificate had been delivered to Travers, or at all events had been issued, and I presume it was delivered to Travers. All that that letter contained was a statement of Sir Edward that he had reason to believe that notes were given. Against that we have the affidavit, the sworn statement of Mr. Travers, and Mr. Travers at that time was a reputable man. I want the House to take note of that carefully; it is of the utmost importance. Even if it had been an open question, which it was not, as the certificate had been given and the question was closed, we had then on the one side, the statement of Sir Edward that he had reason to believe that notes were given, and on the other side the sworn affidavit of Travers that the matter was in proper shape, that the money had been paid in cash, and that the conditions of the Bank Act had been complied with. It is easy to-day to treat Travers as a criminal and to say his testimony was worth nothing, but when Travers made that affidavit he was a man of good standing and good repute in the eyes of the world and we had no right to regard him as otherwise. My hon. friend has stated that Travers was at that time a criminal, that he was known to be a criminal, that it had been shown by the public papers in the city of Toronto that Travers was at that time a criminal. We all know in the light of later events that Travers has been convicted and sent to the penitentiary, but it is not correct to say that at that time he was a criminal; he was a man in good standing. We were bound to treat him as such, bound to pay respect to his affidavit, just as we would to the affidavit of any man of repute.

Mr. TAYLOR (Leeds). Were there not eleven names on the affidavit that had been withdrawn?

Mr. FIELDING. I cannot from memory deal with that particular aspect of the question. But there remained the fact that he had given his sworn affidavit that the money was up in cash. That was the essential feature of the whole thing, and his affidavit at that time was just as good as the statement or affidavit of any one else, better than the mere statement of any other gentleman, no matter how eminent, who merely said he had reason to believe. I think it is of the utmost importance in judging of this matter to bear in mind the fact that Travers was at that time a man of good repute. It is the essence of the whole question. As I said, it is difficult now, when Travers is a convicted criminal, to see the transaction in the proper light. My hon. friend says that Travers is not only a criminal now, but was a criminal then, and was known to be so from the published statements in the Toronto papers.

Mr. FOSTER. The minister said in his former speech that he had no knowledge at all of Travers. Had the minister taken any steps to ascertain, from persons who could give him information, Mr. Travers' standing, financial and otherwise?

Mr. FIELDING. No, I made no such special inquiry. I want to show that my view of Travers' good standing must have been the view which prevailed among a good many other men, possibly better qualified than I to judge of it. Travers organized his bank in the city of Toronto. Travers obtained the co-operation of well known, reputable citizens. Mr. Travers was associated with these gentlemen who joined him in the responsibility of the bank. Is it conceivable that, if he was a criminal, these gentlemen of repute in the province of Ontario would have associated themselves with him and made him manager of the bank? Does the hon. gentleman (Mr. Lennox) think that conceivable? I will give him a further point. Mr. Travers, down to the day of the failure of the bank, was regarded by the government of Ontario as a reputable man, for they entrusted him with a considerable sum of the public funds of the province of Ontario. If the government of Ontario, down to a few months ago, at the very time when the bank failed, regarded him as a man of repute, surely, I could not be regarded as mistaken when he came to me if, in the absence of anything to the contrary, I treated him as a man of repute.

Mr. BLAIN. May I be permitted a question? How did the government of Ontario entrust Mr. Travers with their money?

Mr. FIELDING. I see it stated in a public return of liabilities that the province of Ontario had $25,000 in the Farmers' Bank. That is all I know about it.

Mr. BLAIN. Deposited in one of the branches?

Mr. FIELDING. That makes no difference; it was entrusted to the bank of which Mr. Travers was manager, and if he were known as a criminal—not only now, but at that time—is it conceivable that the government of Ontario would have deposited $25,000 in the bank of which he was manager? I am not finding fault with the government of Ontario. I am supposing that what they did, was done, as they believed it, in the public interest. I have no purpose in referring to it except to show that in all these transactions we must regard Mr. Travers as, at that time, a man of repute.

Now, the irregularity of the proceedings was in regard to the taking of notes. I do not wish to minimize that. I quite say that if we had known at that time what we learned later we would have refused the certificate. But there is a misunderstanding abroad as to the results of that. It should be understood that, as I am informed—speaking of what is recorded in the press—nearly all these notes were paid. If there was irregularity at the time the certificate was obtained the notes were paid; the bank had the capital; no man in the province of Ontario has suffered a loss, so far as I know, of a single dollar by reason of the fact that notes were signed instead of putting up cash. The notes were converted, as I understand it, into cash. If that is not the case, I shall be glad to be corrected.

Mr. SPROULE. I understand the minister to say that he was not aware that they were paying their subscribed stock by notes. But did not Mr. McCarthy draw attention to that fact when he stated, in speaking of his clients, that they had been handed back their notes?

Mr. FIELDING. Mr. McCarthy had filed objections, but those objections were withdrawn.

Mr. SPROULE. But he made the statement of which I speak.

Mr. FIELDING. He objected to the issue of the certificate. Later he said: I desire to withdraw my objection; send me back the papers. And the papers were sent back. I merely want to put the case as it stood——

Mr. SPROULE. But there was a clear statement in Mr. McCarthy's letter that notes had been signed.

Mr. FIELDING. But, against that, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Sproule) will see that that apparently was settled. The form in which the matter stood at all events, was that Mr. McCarthy withdrew his objections. And later we have the statement of Mr. Travers on oath that he had his money put up in cash. That was the evidence on which we issued the certificate. Say, if you like, that it was insufficient. In looking back on it now I may say that had I known more I would have looked into the matter more carefully. We can all be wise in the later years. But at that time we had every reason to believe that Mr. Travers was acting in good faith and——

Mr. LANCASTER. Does not the minister know that the statement on which he says he relied was disputed ? It was stated by Travers that Mr. McCarthy had alleged the opposite. True, Mr. McCarthy withdrew his formal objections, but that, surely, did not remove from the minister's mind the knowledge of the fact.

Mr. FIELDING. I understood that Mr. McCarthy's withdrawing put that matter out of the question. Whether it was wise or unwise that is the way it struck me. Reference has been made once or twice to a former member of this House, Mr. Calvert. I wish to say that any hon. gentleman who associates the name of Mr. Calvert with the issue of that certificate does Mr. Calvert an injustice. So little effect did it have on my mind that until I was reminded of it, I did not remember that Mr. Calvert had introduced Mr. Travers to me. But Mr. Calvert, in his conversation, never exchanged a word with respect to the issue of the certificate. He confined himself to the introduction of Mr. Travers—and even the introduction was not necessary, because, of course, no man needs an introduction to a minister when he comes to Ottawa on public business. But I think it only fair to say that I am not conscious that Mr. Calvert ever spoke a word to me concerning the issue of the certificate. So, whatever else is said it is not fair to blame that gentleman, who is not now in parliament, but holds an important public position. My hon. friend (Mr. Lennox) wishes to convey the impression—I do not say unfairly, because the spirit of his remarks was very fair—that throughout this transaction there was a desire on the part of the Finance Department to expedite the matter of issuing the certificate. That was the very opposite to my own mind in the matter. If I erred in this matter, I erred from the fact that I feared that I was perhaps going to do injustice to the farmers who wanted the certificate. I did regret at an early stage that they were going into the business. I should have rejoiced could I have found satisfactory reasons to refuse this certificate. But I found that we had precisely the same evidence before us as had been before us in other cases. And I asked myself: What right have I to say that the farmers shall be refused a certificate when they come to us with the same information and the same evidence as had been furnished in other cases? Cases could be shown, one at all events, in which a certificate was granted without an affidavit at all; I do not say wrongly granted, I am sure it was done in good faith. We have to be governed largely by precedent in these things. If we had refused that certificate and if, in consequence, the bank had been wound up, involving a very serious loss to shareholders who had put their money into it and had incurred the expense of organization, I know what would have followed. These good farmers would have turned round and said: Mr. Fielding was ready enough to grant certificates to other banks, but this was a farmers' bank, we were small men, poor people; we wanted a charter, and we complied with the law and did everything that others had been required to do, yet we were refused. I ask hon. gentlemen opposite, would not that have been the position? I do not pretend to say, looking over this matter, that there is nothing to regret. I do deeply regret it. All I ask is that the gentlemen who consider this subject will endeavour to look at it, not in the light of to-day, but in the light of events as they existed at that time, four and a-half years ago. I ask them to remember the standing of Mr. Travers, to remember that he placed before me all the evidence which any other applicant for a bank certificate usually gave. If the matter is looked at in that light, I think it will be seen that there is no real cause to complain of what was done.

Mr. W. S. MIDDLEBRO (North Grey). I do not intend to say more than a few words on the subject, as the matter was so thoroughly discussed on a former occasion and has been so well covered to-day by my hon. friend from South Simcoe (Mr. Lennox). I think the matter comes down to a question of whether the facts known at the time justified the issue of a certificate. Nor do I wish to find fault with the minister on account of his intentions; I think his intentions were good.

We have the question whether or not the Minister of Finance, acting as the trustee of the people of Canada, exercised the ordinary and usual precaution that a trustee under similar circumstances would exercise, and if he did that, I am prepared to say he has discharged his duties in that regard. In forming a conclusion as to whether he did exercise proper care, we have to find out what was in his mind at the time, because a man is only guilty of an offence according to the knowledge he has in his mind at the time. The Finance Minister admits that he opposed the incorporation of the bank, and he did that because he thought that to incorporate a Farmers' Bank, a bank of that name might lead unsuspecting farmers to banking transactions with which they were unfamiliar. He was opposed to that idea, and when the charter came to be renewed the second time, he would not grant an extension further than six months. I want to point out that the Act granting the extension for six months was passed on the 26th of June, in the year in which the certificate was granted. So that would be prominently in the mind of the Minister of Finance five months afterwards when he granted the certificate. The first point I want to touch upon as giving the minister some evidence of the transactions which were going on in connection with the organization of this bank, is the statement made by the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Henderson). I am of course arguing on a question of memory between the Minister of Finance and the hon. member for Halton. The Minister of Finance says that he has a distinct recollection that nothing was said to him by the member for Halton as to this bank having received some notes in part payment of subscriptions, and that these notes were being discounted for the purpose of raising money to be deposited with the Receiver General. In the first place, I would think that as the Minister of Finance is a very busy man, and as this was a matter which particularly interested the member for Halton, a matter particularly within his own knowledge and affecting his constituents, the presumption is in favour of the memory of the hon. member for Halton as being correct. The member for Halton says himself that he had seen the notes in question which had been given in part payment for subscriptions, he had seen these in the hands of the solicitor, when he says he spoke to the Minister of Finance about it. The Minister of Finance on the other hand says that the member for Halton never spoke to him with reference to it. He admits there were certain conversations between the member for Halton and himself, and that these conversations were confined exclusively to the question of the charter or the organization of the bank. They were, therefore, according to the memory of the minister, confined to that aspect of the case and to what took place in the Banking and Commerce Committee, I presume, where the matter was discussed. Now, if that is the case, how could we consider that to be a private matter? The minister complains of the member for Halton for divulging a private matter.

Mr. FIELDING. No, I did not complain. I said I had no fault to find with the member for Halton.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. I am merely speaking as to the minister's recollection.

Mr. FIELDING. I did not complain of the member for Halton for divulging a private matter, I made no complaint against him on that point.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. Nevertheless the Finance Minister says that the conversations were of such a character as would justify him in characterizing them as private conversations. Is that not right?

Mr. FIELDING. Except as that would imply any reflection on the member for Halton in repeating them.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. My point is that as a matter of recollection, if the conversation between the member for Halton and the Minister of Finance were confined exclusively to what took place in the Banking and Commerce Committee regarding the organization of this bank, that would not be private conversation; therefore when he says that what took place he regarded as private conversation corroborates the belief that what was in the mind of the Minister of Finance was something else, and was not the question of organization of this bank when it was discussed in the Banking and Commerce Committee.

Mr. FIELDING. I said that arose out of my opposition in the Banking and Commerce Committee.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. I think that very fact alone shows that what the member for Halton told the Minister of Finance was something that did not take place in the Banking and Commerce Committee, but was something which the minister might think was of a private nature. The member for Halton says that it was a fact that he had seen the notes given in part payment for subscription of stock in this bank, and that he went to the Minister of Finance and told him this, that he was troubled about the matter, and wished the minister to take some action with regard to it That is the way the matter stands between the Minister of Finance and the member for Halton.

Well, that is the second item of which the Minister of Finance should have taken note. Now I come to the third. A member of this House in whom no doubt the Minister of Finance has absolute confidence, that is, Mr. McCarthy, writes to the Minister of Finance on the 8th of October, and he says to the minister: I am acting for a number of people who are alleged to have subscribed for stock in the Farmers' Bank, and I say their stock has been obtained from them by fraud, I say that notes have been taken from these clients of mine by fraud in payment of their stock, and I want you to do nothing until this matter is thoroughly investigated. Then Mr. McCarthy follows that up by another letter, and this makes the strong point in the whole case against the Minister of Finance. The Minister of Finance has admitted to me in answer to a question I put to him in the House when he was making his statement:

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. In view of the letter written by Mr. McCarthy on the 19th of October, in which he stated that he had brought action on behalf of certain persons, and of the persons who were subscribers to the funds of the bank, does not the minister consider that that was sufficient warrant, notwithstanding the fact that Mr. McCarthy on their behalf subsequently withdrew his objection, for believing that there was irregularity?

Mr. FIELDING. If we had had no later information, I think my hon. friend's criticism would be just, but after that we did receive the solemn declaration of Travers.

Now let us see what the further letter from Mr. McCarthy says, bearing in mind what the Finance Minister has admitted, that he thought the first letter would have justified him in refusing the certificate. The first letter says there has been fraud of the various kinds mentioned in the letter, and of the various kinds mentioned in the writ, that men had been put on there as directors who were not directors, that they had taken notes instead of cash, and they were discounting those notes and putting the proceeds of those notes into the Department of the Receiver General Now the minister says that if that were true he would be justified in withholding the certificate. Mr. McCarthy writes back and says:

I am advised by those who are instructing me that the claims made by them in the action brought have been settled by their subscriptions being taken up by some parties interested in the bank, and refunding the money paid by the individuals, or returning the notes which had been given.

So in what the minister characterizes as a withdrawal by Mr. McCarthy, there is the positive assertion by him that notes were given in payment of stock, and that is illegal according to law. Now, I would like to ask the Finance Minister by what process of reasoning can he characterize that as a withdrawal which places on record the fact that there was an infringement of the Act? I would characterize that as nothing more or less than a confirmation of what had been alleged in the former letter; and I say further, that when Mr. McCarthy made this accusation that certain things had been done, and when the government was told of the return of these securities and notes, it was the most complete proof that the parties had been guilty of the charges Mr. McCarthy had laid against them. Under these circumstances, I do not see how the Minister of Finance could possibly have granted this certificate. Upon that evidence alone the Minister of Finance or his department or his officials did not exercise that ordinary reasonable care and diligence which we expect from ordinary men; but, when they are acting in a judiciary or public character we have a right to expect from them a much greater degree of care and diligence. The courts of this country, upon the question being put to them on that evidence alone, whether the Minister of Finance had exercised that ordinary care and prudence which should be exercised by a trustee would say that he had not, and he would be liable as a trustee or executor for the consequences of that act. But we have more than that. We have the evidence that the Deputy Minister knew, according to a report in a Toronto newspaper, of what had taken place in the court at Toronto; we have the evidence of Mr. Laidlaw, an eminent K. C. of Toronto, who swears in an affidavit that the endorsements sent by Mr. McCarthy were true. That affidavit has been ignored for the affidavit of Mr. Travers; the statements of Mr. McCarthy have been ignored for the statements of Mr. Travers; the judgment of the court in Toronto has been ignored for the statements of Mr. Travers; and the recollection of my hon. friend from Halton has been ignored for the statements of Mr. Travers. All these matters which had come to the Minister of Finance have been ignored in favour of Mr Travers. I would like to ask the minister this question: Was he putting a hypothetical case to Mr. Travers when he said to him: 'It has come to our knowledge that in some cases notes have been given instead of cash for payments of subscriptions'; or was he putting an actual case?

Mr. FIELDING. I will answer my hon. friend. I had heard gossip in banking circles regarding the organization of a previous bank. I had no information beyond the whispers that went around among banking men as to the manner in which a certain bank had been organized.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. I do not know that I would be justified in asking the minister the name of the bank?

Mr. FIELDING. I would not care to give that.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. It seems to me that it makes it all the harder for the Finance Minister to get away from blame in the present case if he had another instance within his own knowledge.

Mr. FIELDING. I do not say I had any knowledge of it. I had heard gossip of that kind in banking circles

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. The minister had heard gossip that another bank had either attempted to do or had done what this bank did. If it had attempted to do the same thing, he must have headed it off, and made it comply with the law. If it had done it, he had the greater reason for looking more deeply into this case before granting a certificate. I would like to point this out to the Minister of Finance. In answer to a question of the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster), he said this:

> There was some gossip in banking circles concerning the Farmers' Bank of which we became aware. I do not see how we can take cognizance of that. There was gossip abroad concerning the Farmers' Bank, I was well aware of it.

Mr. FIELDING. Not as respecting the notes. I had not heard that.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. What was the gossip about?

Mr. FIELDING. The banking fraternity generally, looked on the organization of the Farmers' Bank with suspicion, and there was constant talk about it before they got their charter.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. I adduce that as one more reason why the minister should have hesitated about granting the certificate. The gossip of the banking fraternity, I suppose means the Bankers' Association?

Mr. FIELDING. Not the Bankers' Association, but bankers whom I met. The bankers looked on the organization of the Farmers' Bank as doubtful, as I did myself.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. I can only say that the more information the minister gives me about the rumours concerning the Farmers' Bank, it seems to me all the more reasonable why he should have been more careful in granting the certificate. The Act says in effect that the only two parties to be satisfied are the Finance Minister and the Treasury Board. That is not a question of law. It is only a question of the satisfaction of the Finance Minister and the Treasury Board that all the details of the Act have been complied with that would justify him in granting a certificate. He applied to the Minister of Justice for his opinion. As to what did he want his opinion? As to whether or not the evidence was sufficient to justify him in granting the certificate? If he wanted to get his own opinion corroborated by the Minister of Justice, the only way in which he could get an honest corroboration was to submit to the Minister of Justice all the facts that he himself was possessed of. Now, I ask the Minister of Finance if he said to the Minister of Justice: I have a complaint from Mr. McCarthy to the effect that these subscriptions were obtained by fraud, that some men subscribed for $1,000 stock, and when they came to investigate they found that they were down for $10,000; I have information from Mr. McCarthy that a great many of those who are down for subscriptions did not sign the stock book at all, and that a certain member of parliament whose name was put down as a director had never consented; we have the judgment of the court at Toronto, which practically confirms all these allegations, because these men got judgment against the Farmers' Bank, and got back their money and their notes; I have the evidence of Mr. William Laidlaw, K.C., in an affidavit in which he swears that all these things are true. If the Minister of Finance had submitted all these facts to the Minister of Justice, together with the single affidavit of Mr. Travers, does he think that the Minister of Justice would have written back saying: You are quite justified on the evidence you have submitted in granting the certificate. I venture to say that he would not. All that the Minister of Justice did say was: If you are satisfied with the evidence, you are justified in granting the certificate. So that the matter came back to the judgment of the Minister of Finance himself whether or not he would be justified in granting the certificate. And all this evidence is not what has been discovered since, but is from information which the Finance Minister indisputably had in his possession at the time he granted the certificate, which is not only a certificate that the bank has been properly organized, but is practically a certificate of character to Mr. Travers, because it is a refutation of all the charges made against him, and an intimation to the innocent people of this country that he is all right, that he has complied with the laws of the Dominion of Canada, and that they are perfectly justified in placing their money in the Farmers' Bank of Canada. That is what it amounts to. The Minister of Finance says that because the government of Ontario happened to have a small deposit of $25,000 in the Farmers' Bank, they were satisfied with Mr. Travers. But the answer to that is this. The Ontario government knew that before a bank could get a charter it had to comply with the Dominion Act, and, therefore, they assumed that the Minister of Finance had carried out the Act.

Mr. FIELDING. I did not think they had so much faith in me.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. They had until this question of the Farmers' Bank came up. It was because of the action of the Minister of Finance in allowing the bank to be organized, and in giving them a certificate, and in starting them out to work that the Ontario government made that deposit. I venture to say that had the minister placed in possession of the Ontario government all the facts he had before him when he issued that certificate the Ontario government would never have put a dollar in the Farmers' Bank of Canada.

Mr. FIELDING. The hon. member (Mr. Lennox) said it was published in the Toronto newspapers.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. If the Minister of Finance had told them that Mr. McCarthy had sent this warning that all the allegations contained in the special endorsement had been sworn to by Mr. Laidlaw; if he had told them that the Canadian Bankers' Association had said the certificate was obtained by fraud, does he suppose for a minute that the Ontario government, or anybody else would have entrusted any money to that bank? It was because these irregularities were silenced by the Minister of Finance that the public had confidence in that bank. Apart altogether from the question of intention, the Minister of Finance was not justified in issuing this certificate, and in issuing it under the circumstances he did not exercise ordinary care and prudence which as the holder of a public trust he was called on to exercise, and I think, therefore, the minister is open to the censure of this House.

Mr. DAVID HENDERSON (Halton). I would not have spoken on this occasion were it not for the manner in which my name has become associated with opposition to the granting of this certificate, and I shall crave the indulgence of the House while I endeavour to make my connection with this matter plain. I desire to read two letters, one from the Minister of Finance to Mr. Travers, dated 30th November, and the other the reply from Mr. Travers to that letter, of the same date, and I shall explain why I wish to put these letters on 'Hansard'. The first letter reads:

Minister of Finance, Canada,
Ottawa, November 30, 1906.

W. R. Travers, Esq.,
General Manager of the Farmers' Bank, of Canada,
Russell House, Ottawa.

Dear Sir,—I regret that owing to pressing engagements yesterday, arising out of the budget, I was unable to meet you to consider your application for the issue of a certificate to authorize the Farmers' Bank of Canada to commence business. I shall be glad to see you to-day, at my office, at any time before one o'clock if you can call. Or I might be able to see you later, between four and five, at the House of Commons, if that will be more convenient.

There is a phase of the matter which I should like to bring to your notice so that you may consider it at once. It has been represented to us that in some previous instances where an application was in all respects apparently regular, there was actually an evasion of the intention of the Bank Act in relation to the paid-up capital. We have been told that in some cases the subscribers did not actually pay in cash but gave notes to the provisional directors which were used to raise the money. On account of information of this kind, which has reached us in relation to a previous case, we deem it proper to scan very closely every application for a certificate which comes to us. I shall be glad to have an assurance that nothing of the kind has taken place in relation to the subscriptions for the Farmers' Bank, but that the amounts set forth in the application as having been paid up have in every case been bona fide cash payments.

W. S. FIELDING,
Minister of Finance.

The reply to that is as follows:

Ottawa, November 30, 1906.

The Hon. W. S. Fielding,
Minister of Finance, Ottawa, Ont.

Dear Sir,—In reply to your letter of the 30th of November, I have to say that in the case of the Farmers' Bank of Canada, the provisional directors did not raise the money in the way mentioned by you. You will find the statement put in by me absolutely correct as to the amount of stock subscribed and the amount paid up.

W. R. TRAVERS,
General Manager, Farmers' Bank of Canada.

I now desire to say that I never saw that letter or a copy of it until the return asked for by the hon. member for North Toronto was brought down, but I knew what it contained, and it was known in the county of Halton that such a letter was in existence, and what its purport was. Since our former debate on the Farmers' Bank I have had communications orally and in writing with some of my constituents, and my attention has been called to the fact by different parties, that I had communicated the particulars of my interview to these persons. It is a notorious fact that in the county of Halton to-day there are people who knew the nature of that letter a considerable time ago; one man has known it for a portion of a year, and another man has known it for several years. Now, where did they get that information? They did not get it from the Finance Department, I did not get it from the Finance Department. I got it from the Minister of Finance himself, and I communicated the nature of that letter to people of my county who were interested in the Farmers' Bank, and I got it in the way I have already described in this House. When the Minister of Finance and myself met, the minister communicated to me the fact that he had asked Mr. Travers to write him a letter along the line that is indicated here I assumed, when he told me that, that it was to see whether my previous statement was verified or not with reference to the notes I had seen in the hands of the solicitor. I mention this circumstance, not that it is absolute evidence, but the peculiarity of it is that it was known to men who read what the Minister of Finance said, and that I said that this letter existed, and the very nature of its contents was known. I do not know how much stronger evidence I could get to verify the statement I made at that time. I want to say here with reference to the three interviews I had with the Minister of Finance that in no case did one of these interviews last more than two or three minutes. I do not believe the second interview extended over a minute or a minute and a half, and only the few words that I have mentioned were spoken. The first interview, when I told the minister of these notes, did not extend beyond three minutes, and the later interview very possibly was about the same length of time. But I want to say this now because I had not the opportunity of putting it before the House in the former debate. I want to say now—and I say it with the utmost certainty of its being correct—that not a thing was mentioned at any of those interviews relating to the incorporation of the bank, so that the Minister of Finance must have referred to one set of interviews, and I to another. I am positive that nothing was said regarding the incorporating of the bank at any one of these three interviews. I went to the minister for one purpose only. The bank had been incorporated months before. I think the charter had been passed through this House six or seven months before. Consequently it was not a matter of interest to me at that time how the charter was granted, or who supported it, or who opposed it.

That was a question which did not require to be raised at all and which certainly was not in my mind. The only question in my mind was whether proper proceedings had been taken with regard to the organization of the bank and the granting of the certificate. I went to the Finance Minister with that matter alone in my mind and gave him the information I had. I did not say to him: I warn you. The hon. minister is too intelligent a man for me to say anything of the kind to him. All I did was state the facts which should have been sufficient. The minister knew his duty and it was not for me to point out that duty to him or to say I had come to warn him. In none of these three interviews did we discuss anything in connection with the granting of this charter, so that the only conclusion I can come to—and I have thought over the matter very carefully—is that the minister has in his mind one set of interviews and I have in my mind another set. As I have said already, I am more than justified by the letter written by Mr. Travers to the Minister of Finance, and which the Minister of Finance knew about four and a half years ago. I had never seen the files of the minister nor did I know that such a letter was on them. The only source of information I had was the minister himself who told me the letter had been written.

I have nothing more to say on this question. The facts have been laid before the House by the hon. member for South Simcoe (Mr. Lennox), and the hon. member for North Grey (Mr. Middlebro), and it would be unwise for me to undertake to discuss what may be called a legal question. I am glad to have had the opportunity of making the statement I have made, and I make it with every confidence that it may lead to a solution of what apparently is a difference of recollection in the mind of the Finance Minister and myself.

Mr. H. H. MILLER (South Grey). In referring to the action of the hon. the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding), my hon. friend from North Grey (Mr. Middlebro), used these words: 'He would not grant more than six months extension,' implying that the Minister of Finance went to the meeting of the Banking and Commerce Committee, when the extension of the life of the charter for a year was granted and granted a renewal, not for the year which had been asked for, but for not more than six months. That does not place the Minister of Finance in the true light. The hon. minister was very emphatically opposed to granting any extension whatever. The committee, however, contrary to his wish and advice, insisted upon giving a renewal or extension. When the Minister of Finance could not prevail on the committee to grant no extension at all, he succeeded in getting the extension limited to six months.

Mr. HENDERSON

Mr. BLAIN. Was there a vote in the committee?

Mr. MILLER. No, but it was very apparent that the majority were favourable to granting an extension. Let me say that this is not by any means the only instance in which members of the committee have voted against the advice of the Finance Minister.

Mr. BLAIN. I asked if there was a vote taken in the committee, because the hon. gentleman said that the committee voted the extension.

Mr. MILLER. I do not think I used the word 'voted.' What I said was that the committee insisted on giving an extension. My hon. friend from Halton (Mr. Henderson), will admit that this was not an exceptional case, but that in many other instances the committee has gone against the advice of the Minister of Finance. The responsibility, therefore, for that extension is wholly upon the committee which acted against the advice of the Minister of Finance.

My hon. friend from Halton (Mr. Henderson), says that he has had conversations with the Finance Minister, and there is a dispute between them regarding what took place. No one will doubt the good faith or the word of either the Minister of Finance or the hon. member for Halton, but the hon. member for Halton says to-day: 'I admit that I did not warn the Minister of Finance, nothing that I said could be construed as a warning.'

Mr. HENDERSON. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Miller), should not put words into my mouth which I did not utter. I did not say in so many words to the minister: 'I warn you.' I did not do this because I consider the Minister of Finance too intelligent a man to be talked to in that fashion.

Mr. MILLER. Then when my hon. friend (Mr. Henderson), says that he did not warn the Minister of Finance, he means that he did not use the word 'warn' but did warn him all the same. Well, I would refer my hon. friend to what he said on the 15th of March last. He was then asked why he had not put his remarks in writing so that there could not be any dispute. He said: 'I did not, because once before I got into trouble. I put my remarks in writing and they were made public by a member of the government and were made public with the intention to do me injury.' The Minister of Finance asked him, how could I injure you in this connection? Even if I did wish to injure you, how could I have done it? And the hon. member for Halton said:

It might have been insinuated that I had made an attempt to wreck the bank.

If the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Henderson) who was, as the hon. member for North Grey (Mr. Middlebro) has said, personally interested, as he had constituents concerning whose interests he was 'troubled,' had evidence that indicated to him that there was danger to those gentlemen of his acquaintance, and had been willing as a member of parliament and a man to take some risk, even the risk of ' being accused by some one of a willingness to wreck the bank,' had gone further, had made known all the information he had possessed, had argued the case, he would perhaps have accomplished more than could be accomplished in the half-hearted manner in which he spoke. He desired evidently that the Minister of Finance should take a great deal more responsibility in this case than he was willing to take.

Mr. LANCASTER. Why should he not?

Mr. MILLER. There is no reason why he should. Of course the Minister of Finance has a certain amount of responsibility resting on him because he is Minister of Finance.

Mr. LANCASTER. The whole responsibility.

Mr. MILLER. Not the whole responsibility. The hon. member for Halton (Mr. Henderson) had a responsibility as the member for that constituency, having constituents interested, equal to the responsibility of the Minister of Finance. It has been said that Mr. McCarthy wrote a letter to the minister in which he said that notes had been given for certain stock subscriptions and further that certain subscriptions had been raised from the amounts for which they were really given to larger amounts. What, after all, did that amount to, and how would any other hon. gentleman have been influenced by that statement? Notes had been given for certain stock subscriptions, undoubtedly. There was nothing morally wrong in that, although there may have been, and there was something technically wrong; but if the farmers who had subscribed for stock had taken the same notes to any other bank and discounted them and taken the money to pay for stock, there would have been nothing either morally or technically wrong. The payment by notes is something that might have been done through perfect ignorance and I have no doubt it was done through ignorance on the part of the men who gave the notes and of the men who took them. Nots have been given in payment of insurance premiums, given in good faith, and accepted in good faith by the agents, but payment of the policies has been refused in such cases because the premiums were improperly paid. It has been said that subscriptions were raised. That, of course, was a fraud. If a man subscribed $2,000 worth of stock, and his subscription was increased to $10,000, that would be a fraud, but a fraud on the part of what person? Of Travers necessarily? These subscriptions were taken by agents soliciting subscriptions and getting a certain commission for obtaining them. If they obtained subscriptions for $1,000 and raised them to $10,000 the fraud was theirs, not Travers', and it was not an indication to the Minister of Finance that there was anything wrong in connection with those responsible for the control of the bank or for the obtaining of a license to do business. It was well known that Mr. McCarthy was acting as solicitor for dissatisfied stockholders. He had, I suppose, advised these stockholders that, having given their notes, which was technically illegal, they could get out of their subscriptions, and they used that means of getting out of subscriptions which they were then beginning to fear would not be a profitable investment. The member for Halton pointed out to them that they were incurring not only a liability for their present subscriptions, but also a double liability; with this knowledge they used that technical means of evading their subscriptions or getting back their money. It was well known that Mr. McCarthy was acting for dissatisfied subscribers. I suppose all of those who were dissatisfied at that time became Mr. McCarthy's clients and were made parties to the action.

Mr. LENNOX. He said otherwise in his information.

Mr. MILLER. I am not sure Mr. McCarthy said there were others.

Mr. LENNOX. In his protest to the minister he alleged that he had then certain clients and that many others had been defrauded on the same lines.

Mr. MILLER. I think the writ issued was issued on behalf of those named and of others and of those who might choose to come in and be made parties to the action.

Mr. LENNOX. And mentioned some others.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. McCarthy sends evidence to the Minister of Finance that whether the fraud had been committed by the agents who were soliciting stock subscriptions or by any one else, the dissatisfied subscribers had been satisfied, and that their money or notes had been handed back. The point made by the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster) that Travers' affidavit, when he filed it with a list of shareholders, was a false affidavit, because the names of some of Mr. McCarthy's clients appeared as stockholders, although a few days before Mr. McCarthy had stated that they had parted with and sold their stock, is not well taken. There is no evidence of untruth in that affidavit. Only a few days elapsed between the time of Mr. McCarthy's letter and of Travers' affidavit. Travers could only make that affidavit by taking his list of shareholders from the stock list as recorded in the books of the bank, and a dozen others might have been shareholders whose names would not appear because they had recently purchased stock from other parties for consideration, and the transfers had not been completed in the books of the company. Even although Mr. Travers had known of such transfers he could not say in his affidavit that these people were shareholders; the shareholders for the time were the men whose names were properly entered as shareholders in the bank's stock lists, who had not yet completed the assignment or transfer of their stock on the books. One hon. member to-day said that the granting of a license was equal to a guarantee by the government, and was evidence that the Farmers' Bank was a proper and safe place in which to deposit money. It would be just as logical to say that if the Minister of Agriculture issued a patent on a certain device which was claimed to be able to do certain things, that would be a guarantee by the minister to the people that they might invest their money in the purchase of that device, and that he guaranteed by giving the patent that it would do the work claimed for it. I think this is altogether an unfair attack that does no credit to the gentlemen who make it.

Mr. LANCASTER. You are not the judge.

Mr. MILLER. Hon. gentlemen will judge for themselves, but let me tell hon. gentlemen how other people judge of the attack made on the Minister of Finance. Some little time ago I received a letter from the constituency of an hon.member opposite who had made such an attack. This letter was from a very respectable gentleman who had occupied a very high municipal position, and he said:

> I have never voted other than a Conservative vote in my life, but after reading the attack made by our member on Mr. Fielding, for whom I have the greatest possible respect and for whom the country has the greatest possible respect, I will never again vote for the gentlemen who made that attack.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Name, name.

Mr. MILLER. No; I do not want to make hon. gentlemen on the other side feel too bad, and one of them would feel very bad if I were to publish the name. But, while it is unfair to the Minister of Finance for hon. gentlemen to make these attacks, yet they are doing neither themselves nor their party any good when they make them.

Mr. BLAIN. I think my hon. friend (Mr. Miller) should furnish the name of the gentleman to whom he has referred.

House divided on amendment (Mr. Lennox).

NEW ONTARIO AND QUEBEC RAILWAY COMPANY.

House in committee on Bill (No. 170) to incorporate the New Ontario and Quebec Railway Company.

Mr. LANCASTER. I have an amendment to that Bill, of which notice has been given. The hon. member for Nipissing (Mr. Gordon) is in charge of the Bill, and he is not present. It might not be fair to go on in his absence.

Mr. GRAHAM. I do not know much about the Bill myself, but we postponed it two nights in succession on account of the absence of the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Lancaster).

Mr. LANCASTER. I want to be fair with the hon. member for Nipissing.

Mr. GRAHAM. Well, let it stand.

TORONTO HARBOUR COMMISSION.

House in committee on Bill (No. 175) to amend and consolidate the Acts relating to the harbour of Toronto.

On section 16,

Mr. PUGSLEY. I do not like that section. It gives the corporation power to regulate and control all land and property on the water-front. Is it intended to give the Board of Harbour Commissioners the right to say how any man's property on the water-front of Toronto shall be developed? There is another objection; it is that the Crown is the owner of a considerable area of property on the harbour front, and I do not think this Bill should give the Harbour Commissioners the right to say how that property should be developed. I cannot think that it is the intentioin to make the provision as broad as that. This would compel a man who wanted to improve his wharf property that he owns himself, to go to the Harbour Commissioners and get their consent as to how he shall develop that property. It would also prevent the Crown from developing some fifty acres of land that has been reclaimed in the harbour of Toronto in connection with the recent operations for the construction of the western entrance; property which, if developed would be very valuable, and if it could not be developed, would be of very little value. When the draft Bill was submitted to me, and when I objected to certain provisions which were in the Bill for the transference, by virtue of this proposed Act, to the Harbour Commissioners of Crown property, I did not understand that by agreeing to strike out that provision the Harbour Commissioners should still retain control over the Crown property and be able to say in what manner the Crown should develop it. Of course, my remarks apply as well to private property as to Crown property, but I speak in particular for Crown property. The Crown owns 50 acres of land fronting on Toronto harbour.

Mr. MACDONELL (Toronto). The point which the hon. the Minister of Public Works has just mentioned was fully discussed and considered by the committee, when the Bill was before the committee, and also by the hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Brodeur) both prior to the Bill coming before the committee, and after it was before the committee. The Minister of Marine and Fisheries was present at the meeting during the entire session when this Bill was being considered, and the point was then taken that is now taken by the Minister of Public Works. If the Minister of Public Works will refer to subsection 2 of section 21 he will see that the subsection says that:

No by-law shall have force or effect until confirmed by the Governor in Council and published in the 'Canada Gazette.'

The words which the chairman has just read, and which amend section 16 now, were added for the express purpose of making it emphatic and plain that all the by-laws which are referred to in section 16 have to be confirmed by the Governor in Council under subsection 2 of section 21. When we come to that it will be seen that that subsection requires that these by-laws shall be confirmed by the Governor in Council and published in the 'Canada Gazette.'

Mr. PUGSLEY. It is all very well to say that the by-laws shall be confirmed, but suppose the commission did not choose to make any by-laws in reference to the development of this Crown property; the Crown could not develop its property at all without getting the consent of the Harbour Commissioners. I do not suggest for a moment that that section was framed with the view of preventing development, but I happen to know that the commissioners would like to get hold of the Crown property, and, although I do not suggest that they would desire to do so, if they could prevent the Crown from developing this property either by leasing it, or making other disposition of it, as we might think in the public interest, it certainly would deteriorate very much the value of the property. My hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries is not here, and certainly I would think that before this clause should pass he should have an opportunity of expressing his views upon it. This land I speak of was developed, not by the Department of Marine and Fisheries, but by the department over which I preside, and I would hesitate very much indeed, before I would give to the commissioners the power to control our development of that property. Perhaps this clause might stand and we can go on with the others.

Mr. MACDONELL (Toronto). Quite so; let it stand.

Mr. PUGSLEY.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Clause 16 stands for further consideration.

Progress reported.

GRAIN GROWERS' GRAIN COMPANY, LIMITED.

House again in committee on Bill (No. 171) to incorporate the Grain Growers' Grain Company, Limited.—Mr. Rutan.

On section 13—authorized objects for purposes of the company,

Mr. GERVAIS. Before the committee proceeds with the examination of this clause there are a few remarks that I wish to make. I think the title of the Bill is rather misleading.

Mr. REID (Grenville). What is the title of the Bill?

Mr. GERVAIS. The Bill is entitled: 'An Act to incorporate the Grain Growers' Grain Company, Limited.' If the committee looks at sections 14 and 15 of the Bill it will find that grain growing is the least of the occupations that is being sought to be pursued by this incorporation. I beg leave to be allowed to read a few lines of sections 14 and 15 to show that the promoters of this Bill should have called themselves, not 'The Grain Growers' Grain Company, Limited,' but the 'The General Promoters and Schemers' Company, Limited.'

Mr. GRAHAM. Prove that.

Mr. GERVAIS. Well, I will prove it by reading a few lines from section 14.

14. For the objects and purposes set forth in section 13 of this Act, the Company may—

(a) manufacture, buy, sell, deal in and deal with timber, lumber, hardware, bricks, stone, tiles, wood products of all kinds, building material of every description, and all kinds of merchandise and supplies;

(b) manufacture, develop, transmit, distribute and use pneumatic, hydraulic, electric or other power or force for any purpose for which the same may be used, and manufacture, buy, sell and deal in all machinery, implements and material necessary for the manufacture, development, transmission and distribution of pneumatic, hydraulic, electric or other force: Provided, however, that any distribution or transmission of power or force beyond the lands of the company shall be subject to local and municipal regulations in that behalf.

That reminds me of some Bills that have been rejected in former years by the Private Bills Committee.

(c) purchase, acquire, develop, operate, hold, dispose of, or otherwise turn to account timber lands, timber licenses, coal lands, quarries, water-powers, and other lands for the purposes of the company;

(d) subscribe for, purchase or otherwise acquire, and hold, sell or otherwise dispose of the shares, bonds, debentures or other securities of any bank, or of any printing or publishing company, but in the case of a bank to no greater extent than one-fourth of the capital stock of such bank;

(e) purchase or otherwise acquire, build, operate and charter ships, barges, vessels or other means of transporting passengers and cargo by water;

(f) enter into any arrangement with any authorities, municipal, local or otherwise, that may seem conducive to the company's objects, or any of them, and obtain from any such authority any rights, privileges and concessions which the company may think it desirable to obtain, and carry out, exercise and comply with any such arrangements, rights, privileges and concessions;

I think possibly the company could acquire Indian reserves under this.

(g) acquire or undertake the whole or any part of the business, property and liabilities of any person or company carrying on any business which the company is authorized to carry on or possessed of property suitable for the purposes of the company;

(h) apply for, purchase or otherwise acquire, any patents, licenses, concessions and the like, conferring any exclusive or non-exclusive, or limited rights to use, or any secret or other information as to, any invention which may seem capable of being used for any of the purposes of the company, or the acquisition of which may seem calculated directly or indirectly to benefit the company, and use, exercise, develop or grant licenses in respect of, or otherwise turn to account, the property, rights or information so acquired;

And so it goes on for two pages.

An hon. MEMBER. Is there anything forgotten?

Mr. GERVAIS. Not very much; they are empowered to do lots of other things. Take paragraph (i) for example:

(i) construct, improve, maintain, work, manage, carry out or control any roads, ways, tramways, branches or sidings on lands owned or controlled by the company, bridges, reservoirs, water-courses, wharfs, manufactories, warehouses, elevators, electric works, shops, stores, office buildings, and other works and conveniences, and contribute to, subsidize, or otherwise assist or take part in, the construction, improvement, maintenance, working, management, carrying out or control thereof.

Mr. LANCASTER. They have everything but the parliament buildings.

Mr. GRAHAM. Section (j) is the most useful, they can lend money under it.

Mr. GERVAIS. They can do banking by issuing little notes payable to bearer, by receiving deposits, and by lending and borrowing money either by way of mortgage or upon their own paper. It seems to me I repeat, that the company should not be called 'The Grain Growers' Co., Limited,' but the 'General Promoters and Schemers Co., Limited.'

Mr. LENNOX. Unlimited.

Mr. GERVAIS. Yes.

Mr. TURRIFF. The Bill is all right.

Mr. GERVAIS. It is not all right. It is against the sound parliamentary rule of the British parliament to grant charters right and left of that kind, because such a charter tends to create all kinds of conflicts with individuals and with other companies.

Mr. BICKERDIKE. Can they do banking?

Mr. GERVAIS. Oh, yes; they have power to do a banking business.

Mr. SPROULE. Has this Bill been before the Banking and Commerce Committee?

Mr. GERVAIS. It was referred to the Miscellaneous Private Bills Committee.

Mr. LENNOX. That was because it covers everything?

Mr. GERVAIS. Under the circumstances the consideration of this Bill should be postponed to enable hon. gentlemen to study it and to come to an opinion about the propriety of giving all these extraordinary powers which are sought for by would-be or so-called farmers.

Mr. TURRIFF. There is nothing in this Bill that the company could not get by letters patent any day of the week; there is nothing in the Bill that other companies have not got. The powers asked for are simply for the purpose of the undertaking, and in farming nowadays you have not only the growing of the grain and of farm products, but you have to deal with the disposal of these products. I see no reason on earth why my hon. friend (Mr. Gervais) should want to prevent this Bill going through. He got his Bill through a year ago to incorporate the Retailers' Association, and that same association has been dead against anything that sounds like co-operation in any shape or form. Why should not the farmers, if they desire it, have a company for the disposal to the best advantage of the products they themselves raise? The Bill is fair and reasonable, the name of the Bill is all right, and there is no reason why the committee should not pass it. It was submitted to the Private Bills Committee, and there was an amendment distinctly debarring the company from going into the business of banking in any shape or form.

Mr. SPROULE. I move that the committee rise and report progress, and then the House can send the Bill to the Banking and Commerce Committee.

Mr. RUTAN. There is no reason for that. The Bill has already been before a special committee of the Senate, and also before the Private Bills Committee of this House.

Mr. SPROULE. We have more than once sent Bills to more than two committees.

Mr. RUTAN. The section that refers to banking only allows them to hold a small amount of stock in a bank, and they have no desire to do a banking business. The association cannot hold more than the minority stock in any bank.

Mr. PUGSLEY. While it is true that possibly all the powers contained in this Bill are granted under the Companies Act in letters patent, in this case the difficulty to my mind arises by reason of the name of the company which is called the Grain Growers' Grain Company, Limited. You will observe that the intention is that the shareholders shall be farmers, or their wives and children, or the lessees of farms, and one might naturally assume that the business of the company was limited to dealing in grain. It seems to me objectionable that a company whose name indicates it was formed for a specific purpose, should be given such general powers as are contained in section 14 of this Bill. If the title were of a general nature so that any one taking stock in the company would suppose it were dealing in various kinds of business, that might be different. As my hon. friend from St. James division (Mr. Gervais) says, this section is very broad. True, the company is limited to dealing in these lines of business for the purpose of carrying out the objects mentioned in section 13, but, as a matter of fact, that section does not limit its operations. One can hardly see any line of business in which this company cannot engage, and one can hardly see how the developing of electricity, purchasing timber lands, acquiring water-powers, dealing in lumber, hardware, bricks, stone, tiles and all kinds of merchandise and supplies can be necessary to carry on the business of farming. Section 14 has to do with a line of business entirely different in character from that provided in section 13. I would think that this is a Bill—following out what we did in the case of the Bill incorporating Revillon Freres—which should be sent to the Banking and Commerce Committee.

Mr. SPROULE. Clause D authorizes the company to purchase, or otherwise acquire and sell, bonds, debentures, or other securities of any bank or any printing or publishing company. The company may also acquire ships and electric powers and sell electricity without coming under the Railway Act. It may acquire and develop water-powers, and do all these things I have mentioned without being bound by any of the safeguards we usually attach to corporations seeking charters from us. It seems to me plain that this Bill should go to the Banking and Commerce Committee.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. Is there any business transaction which this company has not power to do under this Bill?

Mr. TURRIFF. I cannot see any object in sending this Bill back to the Banking and Commerce Committee.

Mr. SPROULE. It was never there.

Mr. TURRIFF. I can not see any object in sending it to that committee, because in the Private Bills Committee, an amendment was inserted distinctly prohibiting this company from doing a banking business.

Mr. MEIGHEN. Where is that amendment?

Mr. TURRIFF. It was passed by the Private Bills Committee, and must be in the hands of the Chairman. All the powers asked for are only asked in connection with the business of the company. This Grain Growers' Company is at present dealing in grain and other products of the farm which the members of the company raise on their farms; and if the farmers who established this company wish to go into different lines of goods that they need in conducting their farming operations, why should they not be allowed to do so? Why is this Grain Growers' Company not as much entitled to these powers as any other company which asks for a charter? If it has a great many powers, the chances are it will not use one out of ten, but what harm can there be in giving it these powers? It is not right that this company, representing some 30,000 farmers, should not have power to take over business as it sees fit.

Mr. LANCASTER. Do they want to become a monopoly?

Mr. TURRIFF. No, although they have handled more grain in the past year or two than any other grain company doing business in Winnipeg, and they have handled it to the advantage of the farmers.

Mr. BRODER. They can do business without this Bill.

Mr. TURRIFF. They think they require this Bill, and why not give them what they want? Have they not as good a right as any other combination of men?

Mr. LANCASTER. What combination has ever asked for a Bill like that?

Mr. TURRIFF. There have been lots of Bills passed this and other sessions giving just as large powers.

Mr. LANCASTER. Not one.

Mr. TURRIFF. There have been lots ments in the press within the last four weeks of a company getting a charter by letters patent which confers greater powers than this company asks for. Is there any reason why this company should not get the powers it asks for? To send the Bill back to the Banking and Commerce Committee would be practically to kill it, because it is altogether unlikely that we would be able to get a quorum at that committee again this session. In any event there is a clause which prohibits the company from doing a banking business.

Mr. MEIGHEN. I understood the Minister of Public Works to say that this Bill conferred no greater powers than would, under the Companies Act. If that is the under the operation of the law, be granted case, I do not think that this is the proper time or the proper committee to discuss whether or not these powers should be limited. The Companies Act should be amended, if any change is to take place, because this company is entitled to as much rights as any other. Why did these people not apply in the ordinary course under the Companies Act and secure a charter?

Mr. PUGSLEY. My hon. friend will find a great many charters granted by this parliament which might have been obtained under the Companies Act.

Mr. MEIGHEN. If a Bill containing these powers can be secured under the Companies Act and the government has no discretionary powers to limit charters, it seems to me that the Companies Act is merely a farce, and we might just as well empower this company to do everything, and put all companies on the same footing. The hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff), says he has seen wider powers granted. I am at loss to understand how any wider powers could be granted.

Mr. PUGSLEY. A friend of mine once read a charter granted under the English Companies Act; it specified a great many powers and then it said: And generally to acquire gain by all lawful means.

Mr. MEIGHEN. That would be a very brief translation of this Bill. My point is that if the House stands under the assurance of the government that these powers would, in the ordinary course, pass without any exercise of discretion on the part of the Secretary of State and his department, then we certainly would have no ground to oppose this Bill.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I do not say it would under a name like this which seems to have the appearance of limiting the objects.

Mr. MEIGHEN. That is to say the Secretary of State and his department, by whom these charters are granted, under the Companies' Act, never refuse the powers at all, no matter how wide they are, they pass automatically.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I did not say that.

Mr. MEIGHEN. Then it will need to be explained what wider powers can be granted than are granted in this Bill. I know that in our province if one applies for powers as wide as this, that application passes under review through the proper department at Winnipeg, and those powers are curtailed. There is a discretionary power in that department and it is exercised very frequently. I understand the Minister of Public Works to take the position that no greater powers are granted here than would in ordinary course be granted under the Companies' Act, but that the only restriction is that the title may be deemed a misnomer. With the latter part of his remarks I quite agree, and I cannot see any justification for granting this charter under the name of the Grain Growers' Company. There would be ten names just as appropriate, perhaps 50, and it will undoubtedly lead to the sale of shares under a misapprehension. I cannot see much restriction even in the clause referring to the sale of shares. Any one is allowed to purchase a share who owns a farm. That means any one who owns land whether it is farmed or not, or anybody who has land leased, or the wife or child of any such person. Who can be said to be beyond that pale? Very few of our population, and if any one is beyond the pale and the company need the money, all they have to do is to pass an amendment by a two-thirds majority. The restriction, to my mind, will serve rather an ill than a good purpose. It would seem to me to be better to make it general. While these powers are granted the public should be protected and a more appropriate name should be given. Undoubtedly shares will be purchased under a misapprehension, particularly in view of the fact that we already have a company under the same name under the provincial incorporation with much more restricted powers; and the general apprehension will be that the new company are restricted in the same way, and if the same name is continued shares will be bought under a misconception of the real state of affairs. I would object to the name even under the assurance of the government, and if the assurance is to stand I would say it is time the Companies' Act was reviewed.

Mr. SCHAFFNER. I would again ask if this Bill will enable the company to deal in options?

Mr. PUGSLEY. Certainly not.

Mr. SCHAFFNER. If it does, I would object because the Grain Growers' Grain Company solicit subscriptions all over the country, from farmers and men who do not pretend to be business men or to look very closely into these transactions, and these men may be led into great difficulties and possible loss if this company is permitted to deal in options; were it not for the company soliciting these subscriptions I would not care whether they dealt in options or not. If the Minister of Public Works says this will not permit them to deal in options, I have nothing further to say, but if it does permit them I would like to see an amendment made.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I do not know much about options in grain, but I have read about dealing in options on stock, and I understand that is usually known as stock gambling.

Mr. SCHAFFNER. Exactly.

Mr. PUGSLEY. That is not buying property, and this is limited to buying property.

Mr. LANCASTER. Under section 14, subsection (a) the Bill goes further. It covers any kind of dealing.

For the objects and purposes set forth in section 13 of this Act, the Company may—

(a) manufacture, buy, sell, deal in and deal with timber, lumber, hardware, bricks, stone, tiles, wood products of all kinds, building material of every description, and all kinds of merchandise and supplies.

What is to prevent them buying any sort of option?

Mr. PUGSLEY. As I understand when a man buys an option he does not buy the material of any kind.

Mr. TAYLOR (Leeds). My hon. friend could go to any broker to-morrow and buy 100,000 bushels of wheat to be delivered on June 1st, and pay 3 cents a bushel down on it. Then if the price goes down he has to make his 3 cents good.

Mr. LANCASTER. It is 'buy or deal' in it.

Mr. PUGSLEY. He does not buy the wheat.

Mr. LANCASTER. He deals in it.

Mr. PUGSLEY. No, he makes a bet, he gambles on the prospect of it going up or down. That is prohibited by the statute, and this company cannot do it any more than any individual could legally do it, and if this company attempted to do it, it would be acting outside of its charter, and could be restrained by any stockholder from using its money for betting purposes, for that is all it is. A man bets with a broker that grain will rise or fall, and it is distinctly understood by the broker that he is not to deliver the grain, there is no actual bona fide purchase. If the price goes down he pays a forfeit to the broker, and if it goes up the broker pays a forfeit to him.

Mr. LANCASTER. It may be betting according to what the hon. gentleman says, but if a man buys real estate and pays only a small proportion of the money because he is speculating, my hon. friend could equally well say he is betting. He is betting to a certain extent as to whether the value of the property will go up or down, but the words in this statute are not 'buy, sell or deal in.' If he deals in this in any way, it is not restricted to one sort of buying, selling or dealing. Section 13 shows clearly that these men are not to be limited to dealing in grain, they are going to manufacture everything the farmer uses. And so I suppose they may be asking for a duty on agricultural implements under one part of the section and that the duty be taken off under another. There is the inconsistency of the position that this gentleman gets into when he says that it only has reference to the products of the farm. These men are authorized by section 13 to make any blessed thing under Heaven that a farmer uses. They can manufacture anything in the world. The farmer uses nearly everything that is made that he does not produce himself, and under this section he is enabled to do everything besides farm. I agree with my hon. friend behind me that this Bill is not properly drawn, and ought to be amended in some way.

Progress reported.

WAYS AND MEANS—RECIPROCAL TRADE AGREEMENT WITH THE UNITED STATES.

House again went into Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. GEORGE TAYLOR (Leeds). Mr. Chairman, on the 26th of January the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) brought down a reciprocity agreement made by himself and the hon. the Minister of Customs (Mr. Paterson) with the approval of the right hon. the Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). There was a commission of two sent down to Washington to deal with the Americans. I fancy the Prime Minister was the principal, and that the Minister of Finance agreed with him. It made little difference whether the Minister of Customs did or not. But, I think that while we are discussing this matter, we, on this side of the House, have a right to have these three hon. gentlemen sitting in their places and I ask the minister in charge, whoever he may be—I do not know whether it is the hon. the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Pugsley), or the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue (Mr. Templeman)——

Mr. PUGSLEY. Both.

Mr. TAYLOR (Leeds). Or the hon. the Minister of Labour (Mr. King), but I think it is his duty to inform these gentlemen that we want them present. I propose to ask them some questions, and it is their duty to be here. I ask now the minister in charge of the House to send for these hon. gentlemen.

Mr. KING. I have already sent word to the Prime Minister to let him know that the hon. gentleman is speaking.

Mr. REID (Grenville). Is the Minister of Labour in charge of the House?

Mr. PUGSLEY. If my hon. friend will proceed they will come in no doubt very shortly.

Mr. TAYLOR (Leeds). I think it is due when a gentleman is discussing this question, that these ministers who made this bargain should be present. So far as I am concerned I insist upon it. It is the right of gentlemen speaking to have these gentlemen present.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Question.

Mr. TAYLOR (Leeds). Does the minister tell me that it is not my right or duty to ask these gentlemen to be present?

Mr. PUGSLEY. I would be very sorry to say that to my hon. friend. I understand that my hon. friend the Minister of Finance will not be able to be present this evening, but I will send and find out. Perhaps my hon. friend will proceed, and I will send for him in the meantime.

Mr. TAYLOR (Leeds). I am dealing more particularly with the Minister of Customs, and I do not like to say behind his back what I want to say to his face. I have some very pointed questions to put to the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance, but, if the Minister of Finance is not to be present I shall not insist upon it so far as he is concerned.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I am sure that my hon. friend the Minister of Customs will not mind if my hon. friend does speak behind his back. It will be reported to him.

Mr. TAYLOR. I want him here to answer some questions.

Mr. CARVELL. Carried.

Mr. TAYLOR (Leeds). The hon. member (Mr. Carvell) is not running this institution. The opposition have some rights here although the Minister of Finance said that we had not. But, we are going to insist upon our rights, and we are going to see that these rights are granted to us. These ministers are a little slow in coming, but I will say this that on the 26th of January, when the hon. the Minister of Finance laid his proposition on the table my hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. Borden, Halifax) and other hon. members on this side of the House asked for information, and they have been continuing to ask for it ever since. That information has never been given to us. We have not received anything worthy of the name of information from any of these hon. gentlemen and particularly from the delegates who went to Washington. On the 6th of April my hon. friend from Grenville (Mr. Reid) made a speech and he furnished the House with valuable statistics that are now on record and are available not only to the members of the opposition, but to members of the government who never had the information before and who did not have it when they went to Washington. After the hon. member for Grenville had made an able speech and had placed these statistics on 'Hansard' the hon. the Minister of Customs rose in his place and here is what he said:

I think perhaps it would be just as well to put a little appendix to the statement that will appear at length.

The minister added his appendix to the speech of my hon. friend from Grenville. The late, lamented Sir John A. Macdonald told me and a number of others at one time that no matter how busy he was with the affairs of state he always spent a part of every day talking with his little invalid daughter. Every person knows that Sir John had an invalid daughter and no matter how busy he was he always put in a portion of his time every day in conversation with her. He said that one day he was talking with her and she asked: Papa, why do they call you a minister; you do not preach and you do not pray very much? Sir John said: My dear, there are two kinds of ministers; there are ministers of the Gospel and ministers of State. She said: What is the difference between a minister of State and a minister of the Gospel? He said: My dear, it is the duty of a minister of the Gospel to preach and pray and to tell people how to live so that when they die they will go to Heaven. His daughter said: Then, I suppose it is the duty of the minister of State to teach them how to go to the other place.

Mr. PUGSLEY. What did Sir John say to that?

Mr. TAYLOR (Leeds). I think that the ministers that are occupying these positions to-day are doing it to a very large extent. The Minister of Customs would fill both bills. He pretends to be a minister of State and I understand that he preaches and prays on the Sabbath and directs people to the good place. That reminds me of another story. I live opposite the Thousand Islands, and, some twenty-five or thirty years ago, the different religious denominations established parks there. The Methodists selected a place on Wesley Island and they called it Wesley Park. The Presbyterians selected another place farther down and called it Westminster Park and the Baptists selected another place and called it Round Island Park. The ministers of these different denominations used to meet at these resorts during the summer time. At Round Island Park two Baptist ministers with an oarsman went out one day to have a fish. After being out a short while they got a fish and began disputing about the species to which it belonged. One of them asserted that it was an overgrown sun-fish and the other said that it was a moon fish. Being unable to agree they referred it to the oarsman, and the oarsman who had a nazal twang, like most of the Americans, said: 'Waal, now, down here we call it a Baptist fish. One of the ministers said: Why do you call that a Baptist fish? Well, he says, it is one of those kind that turns bad so quick after coming out of water. I think my hon. friend the Minister of Customs represents that kind of a fish very much, because, although he may preach and pray on Sunday, judging from the speech I am going to read out of the 'Hansard,' I think any one reading or hearing that speech must come to the conclusion that he was not very careful as to the statements he made. I propose now performing a surgical operation upon the minister's appendix, and after I get through dissecting it, I think he will be sorry that he ever added an appendix to the speech of the hon. member for Grenville (Mr. Reid). Any one who listened to that speech or read it must come to the conclusion that the hon. gentlemen was suffering from appendicitis or a malady of some sort. Let me read a little:

Mr. PATERSON. I think, perhaps, it would be just as well to put a little appendix to the statement that will appear at length. I have no objection to it, in fact, I am rather pleased it has gone in. I was going to ask the hon. member what his object is in putting this in.

Mr. TAYLOR (Leeds)

Mr. BARKER. If the hon. gentleman is pleased that they have gone in we need not waste time in discussing it.

Mr. PATERSON. The hon. gentleman attaches importance to it. What I want to point out is that he has placed on 'Hansard' these tables that have taken a very long time to read. His object, I believe, is that this committee may come to an understanding as to the wisdom of this arrangement that has been made. Therefore, it is valuable for that reason. He stated very positively that my colleague and myself went it blind in Washington, we had no figures, and did not know where we were. He said that time and again, and the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Henderson) said it last night. You have been listening for an hour or two to figures that he says are absolutely necessary to get at a proper understanding of this matter. My colleague (Mr. Fielding), and myself, had this in our possession all the time, all the information for all the years, and yet we are told we have gone it blind. We had it, we had it all. More than that, let me remind these gentlemen who complain that we did not have it, that on the day this session opened, I believe before the address was presented to His Excellency, every one of these hon. gentlemen opposite had these figures in his possession.

Mr. REID (Grenville). Where?

Mr. PATERSON. In your desk.

Mr. REID (Grenville). No.

Mr. PATERSON. But here they are, they were taken out of this blue-book which I hold in my hand, taken out of this exactly.

Now there is a statement made by one of these gentlemen that the Prime Minister sent down to Washington to make a bargain with these sharp Yankees. Is that statement correct? I challenge the Minister of Customs or the Prime Minister, I will contribute $100 to any charitable institution in Brantford if that statement is correct. But I will prove that it is not correct. Now here are the statistics the hon. member for Grenville (Mr. Reid) put on record, and if the Minister of Customs or the Prime Minister can produce a blue-book with these figures in it I will send $100 to any charitable institution in the city of Brantford. Here are the satistics: The first statement the member for Grenville put on 'Hansard' was a statement showing 'The quantity and value of the under-mentioned articles entered for consumption in Canada, by countries, during the fiscal years from 1905 to 1910, inclusive.' Then he goes on and reads them: Butter from Great Britain, Australia, Newfoundland, New Zealand, Norway, France, Italy, Turkey and the United States. Can the Prime Minister or the Minister of Customs produce a blue-book that was presented to every member of this House at the opening of the session, containing these statistics? I defy them to do so. There is my proposition. Let him produce the blue-book, and I will make a present to any charitable institution he names. That is the first statement. Then he goes on giving other countries, for all kinds of produce, potatoes, cheese, eggs, bacon, and gives the details for each one from 1905 to 1910. When we get through with that, there is another table 'Exports of Danish produce from Denmark, year ended December 31, 1909.' I have another $100 to give to any charitable institution the Minister of Customs will name if he will produce a blue-book that he presented to the members of the House with that information in. Those statistics were compiled by my hon. friend, and the Minister of Customs had the audacity to get up and say that every member of the House was furnished with them. No wonder I compared him to the gentleman that is teaching the people the road to go to the bad place when he dies. Then the hon. gentleman goes further and says:

Mr. REID (Grenville). That is only one year.

Mr. PATERSON. One year, yes, but we had a knowledge of all the years when we were in Washington. That was the very information these gentlemen have asked for, that they have been cavilling for, they had it on their desks all the time.

He repeats it again. That is that beautiful appendix he was sending out to the people of this country. I will read further:

Mr. BARKER. No.

Mr. PATERSON. The reason I want to put in this appendix is that this goes to the hon. gentleman's constituents with his remarks.

Knowing that the 'Hansard' will go into his constituency, he wanted to have the appendix added to it to show the people what a statesman he was; and no one expects a statesman, or any other minister, of this country, would get up in his place and make statements that are not in accordance with the facts. Every statement he made from beginning to end of his speech is not in accordance with the facts.

Mr. REID (Grenville). Then why did it take several days to prepare it?

Mr. PATERSON. That is what I am coming to. When this goes to the hon. gentleman's constituents with his remarks, and they read my remarks, they will understand that five years ago he had the returns for 1905 which were printed at great expense, and of which three copies were given to him. In 1906, as soon as parliament opened, he had three copies given to him. So in 1907, so in 1908, so in 1909, so in 1910. What I want to bring to the attention of those who read his remarks, especially his own constituents, is the fact that he had these figures in his possession.

He did not have them, never had them, neither did any other hon. gentleman have them until the hon. member for Grenville produced them and read them here in the House. Yet the Minister of Customs will get up and make this kind of a statement.

Mr. PARDEE. Don't get excited.

Mr. TAYLOR (Leeds). I intend to give my hon. friend enough to make him ashamed of it; if he has any conscience at all he would be ashamed to support a minister that would get up and make such statements in the House.

They will say: You have had these figures for five years to study for yourself; when we sent you to parliament, we did not send you there to sit down and do nothing but play around. Why did you not look these things up? They have been printed for you and given to you. I want to say that in the hearing of the constituents of all the hon. gentlemen who are opposite.

Mr. HUGHES. That voice will nearly reach them.

Mr. PATERSON. That voice has been played on just the same as the biscuits have.

That is nice talk for a minister of the Crown.

I wish it was loud enough to reach the ears of all, that they might understand the utter absurdity of the position these hon. gentlemen take, and that their constituents who send them here—and these hon. gentlemen are paid just as much as the minister of the Crown is paid as a member of parliament, and just as much bound to do the work of parliament as is a minister of the Crown—might see that these hon. gentlemen have absolutely neglected their duty and have confessed ignorance with reference to figures that have been given them year by year.

There he repeats it again. Those figures I have quoted have never been given year by year, no one has given the exports of the foreign countries. I have a table of every foreign country that is admitted as a favoured nation. My hon. friend from Grenville gave them all, and placed them all on 'Hansard.'

As to the information you have been clamouring for, you have had it here; you had it all the time. And we had it when we were in Washington making this bargain. Suppose that you had been there, what would you have done?

Mr. HUGHES. I rise to a point of order.

Mr. PATERSON. I have a right to speak——

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Hughes) has a right to state his point of order.

Mr. HUGHES. The hon. minister (Mr. Paterson) has been making reflections upon you, Sir, accusing you of ignorance——

Mr. TALBOT. Is that the point of order?

Mr. HUGHES. If the hon. minister is not referring to you, Sir, but to the hon. member for Grenville (Mr. Reid), he should speak of him as the hon. member for Grenville and not address him directly as 'you.'

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The point of order is well taken, and I think it is well that it should be taken. The habit has grown up of addressing members directly in the second person, which is wrong. A member of parliament should be referred to in the third person, and the Speaker or Chairman addressed.

Mr. PATERSON. I was not aware that I had, perhaps, in the warmth of debate, overlooked that point.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Paterson) will understand that, in speaking as I did, I had reference to a habit that has grown up rather than to his individual infraction of the rule.

Mr. PATERSON. It is one of the wisest rules that a deliberate assembly can adopt, for it tends to avoid anything like personal feeling. I was not aware that I had made the mistake, but having made it, I am sorry.

This is the gentleman we sent down to Washington to deal with these shrewd, sharp Yankees to make a bargain, and who did not know when he made a blunder here in the House, and the Speaker had to correct him.

I was pointing out that hon. gentlemen opposite, as well as hon. gentlemen on this side of the House, are sent to understand and discuss public questions. Under the rules of the House they are provided with information of which it is supposed they will make use. But when we find hon. gentlemen with that information in their possession, some of it in their possession for years, and yet saying that they cannot discuss a public question intelligently because they have not the information, what are we to think? I was going to say that those hon. gentlemen might remember another rule of the House—also a good one. I would remind them that a minister of the Crown is also a member of parliament. He is no better and professes to be no better, or of any higher standing, than any other member. But he is of equal standing with those in this House who oppose him. It is the duty of a minister, when asked a question, to give a courteous answer; that is becoming in a deliberative assembly of gentlemen. But it must not be lost sight of that it is equally incumbent upon every member of the House, in propounding questions to a minister, to propound them as to one who has equal rights with themselves and is equally entitled to courtesy.

What answer did the Minister of Customs give to hon. gentlemen on this side of the House? The member for Algoma rose and said: 'May I ask the Minister of Customs a question?' and he answered: 'No.' And the member for Quebec (Mr. Price) very politely asked if he might ask the minister a question, and the minister said: 'No, sit down,' in that loud voice he has got. I ask him to compare his conduct with the lecture he is addressing to members on this side of the House. I have so many things to say that I will not be able to read all I intended to read, and I do not want to occupy more than two or three hours of the time of the House, but I want to refer to another statement made by the Minister of Customs

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman is referring to a previous debate. The particular speech he is now referring to was ruled out of order by me because the Minister of Customs was at the wrong time referring to the resolution now before the Chair. When we are now discussing this resolution, necessarily a quotation from that speech would not be in order. That particular debate which the hon. member is quoting was ruled out of order.

Mr. TAYLOR (Leeds). Why, my dear friend——

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. TAYLOR (Leeds). Mr. Chairman, the speech here was delivered by the Minister of Customs on this question, and no other question has been before the House since, and I certainly have the right to discuss what the Minister of Customs referred to.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I will hear the hon. gentleman's argument on the point of order.

Mr. TAYLOR (Leeds). My point of order is that I am not referring to a previous debate. The closing paragraph of the Minister of Custom's speech was ruled out of order, but not his whole speech. I am about to refer to the statement made by the Minister of Customs as to what happened at Washington showing why this pact should be put through. I want to obey the rules of the House, and it certainly is my right to quote from 'Hansard' what the Minister of Customs' said:

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. To be in order in quoting a previous debate it must be a previous debate on the same question that is before the Chair. The question before the Chair at the present time is that this resolution be adopted; the question when the Minister of Customs was addressing the House on that occasion was that the House do go into Committee of Ways and Means, and the Minister of Customs in discussing his resolution on that motion was ruled out of order.

Mr. TAYLOR (Leeds). With the Speaker in the Chair?

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. With the Chairman in the Chair as Speaker, and I am now applying the same rule with the reverse conditions. If the hon. gentleman can show me that the previous debate was in committee on the question, he will have the right to quote.

Mr. SPROULE. The Minister of Customs on that occasion was ruled out of order because he was dealing with the very reciprocity resolution that we have now before us, and do you not think, Mr. Chairman, that when we are on the resolution my hon. friend (Mr. Taylor) is quite in order in referring to what the Minister of Customs said. The minister was ruled out of order because he was speaking on the subject now before us, and not on the subject then under consideration.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. When the Minister of Customs was ruled out of order the Speaker was in the Chair, and it so happened at the moment that I was the Speaker. The motion was to go into Committee of Ways and Means, and I ruled the speech of the hon. Minister of Customs out of order because his speech was discussing a resolution that lay before the committee. Having ruled that speech of the Minister of Customs out of order for that reason, now that we are in committee I cannot consider that this is a continuation of that debate.

Mr. SPROULE. Suppose the Minister of Finance referred to these subjects in his Budget speech on a motion to go into supply, would it not be quite in order for an hon. member to quote what reference the Minister of Finance might make to this reciprocity arrangement? The Minister of Customs was ruled out of order because he was anticipating a subject that was on the Order Paper, and now that we have reached that subject on the Order Paper, surely the hon. member (Mr. Taylor) can refer to what the Minister of Customs said.

Mr. REID (Grenville). And the remarks of the Minister of Customs which were ruled out of order were with reference to this very subject which we are now discussing. The amendment was moved, as I understand it, simply for more information, about this very same question. So, to my mind, it is practically the same debate. Do I understand, Mr. Chairman, that you take the ground that, simply because the House divided on the main motion at that time, this is not part of the same debate? With all respect to your judgment, it seems to me it is the same debate.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Does the hon. gentleman (Mr. Reid, Grenville), realize that when a motion is made to go into committee on a certain resolution, the resolution being already before the committee, it is not in order to discuss that resolution to go into committee? That I believe to be the rule of the House, and that is the rule I apply to this case. Having done so, I do not see how I can do otherwise than consider that a previous debate. Having refused the Minister of Customs the right to continue his remarks on the matter before the committee I think I am carrying out the same rule, dealing with reversed conditions.

Mr. SPROULE. But on what ground did you rule the Minister of Customs out of order? It was because he was attempting to deal with a motion that was already on the Order Paper; his remarks applied to a motion which we had not reached, but which was on the paper. We were not then in Committee of Ways and Means, but we are now in Committee of Ways and Means. That is, the Minister of Customs was ruled out because he was attempting to anticipate a motion, and it seems to me that for that very reason, remarks made on this motion now would be proper, because we have reached the motion.

Mr. TAYLOR (Leeds). The Minister of Customs spoke so long that his remarks covered ten columns of 'Hansard'—and all dealing with the questions now before the House, the question of reciprocity—before he was called to order. And you were in the chair at the time, Mr. Chairman. It seems to me that it was all part of this debate, and I shall certainly have to appeal from your ruling. I was reading part of your speech this part of the speech from page 7032 of 'Hansard'——

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Taylor, Leeds), will please not endeavour to proceed with the speech.

Mr. TAYLOR (Leeds). I am only going to refer to these items:

Mr. BOYCE. Will the hon. gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. PATERSON. Oh, no. What did we do with the malt business, if you want a common sample of it?? They had a duty on malt and they said that they wanted their interest guarded. What was done? We left our malt duty on just as it was in the tariff. The American duty was about two and a half times as high as ours and we had the American government reduce their duty to our duty. So, it was with respect to other questions when they came up. We knew this, yet these hon. gentlemen say that we went it blind. They have the information now; let us see all that would happen if these eggs and cheese and butter should be allowed in. Of eggs 750,456 dozen came into this country. This is going to ruin the farmers! If you multiply the dozens by twelve that gives you 9,000,000 of eggs.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. TAYLOR (Leeds). I just read this quotation with reference to eggs and butter, and I will ask you if it is not part of this reciprocity question.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I think it will not be necessary for the hon. gentleman (Mr. Taylor, Leeds), to do that. I have no desire to do injustice to the hon. member or to unduly curtail his remarks. But I am equally bound to see that no injustice is done to the Minister of Customs. This particular point of order is one that is a little unusual and my course not as clear as I have found it sometimes. Still, having ruled the Minister of Customs out of order as referring to a matter which he had no right to discuss at that time, I must, in duty to the rules of the House, and my own position, state that the hon. gentleman is not at liberty to discuss that question which was ruled out of order on that occasion.

Mr. REID (Grenville). I suppose that it could be done with the consent of the House. The Minister of Customs is here. Does he object to having his speech discussed?

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The consent of the House may be obtained by the appeal from my decision, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Taylor, Leeds) spoke of——

Mr. TAYLOR (Leeds). I wish to obey the rules of the House. I appeal to the Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). The Minister of Customs made a speech in answer to my hon. friend from Grenville (Mr. Reid), on a motion to go into Committee of Ways and Means. The Minister of Customs wanted to add an appendix to my hon. friend's speech, and did add some 9 or 10 columns. Some person then called, 'order,' and the Speaker ruled that we had not got into committee—but the Minister of Customs had spoken about 10 columns, as I have said. I want to make a few references to that appendix that he added to the speech of the hon. member for Grenville. And now, you, Mr. Chairman—perhaps properly, but I do not think so, for I do not think that this is a past debate, but simply a continuation of the debate—rule me out of order. I have only a little more to say in reference to the Minister of Customs' appendix.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. TAYLOR (Leeds). That is the title he gave it. And I appeal to the Prime Minister if I should not be allowed to continue my speech.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. My hon. friend (Mr. Taylor, Leeds), has shown the most earnest intentions, when, as he tells us, he wants to perform a surgical operation on my colleague, the Minister of Customs (Mr. Paterson), but I think he will not find it unfair if we follow the rules of the House. They were applied against the Minister of Customs, and I think it not unfair that they should be applied to the hon. member for Leeds. I think that under the circumstances he would be performing what is the duty of every member of the House if he sustains the Chair, except when he thinks the Chair is absolutely wrong.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). What is the particular reason why the speech cannot be referred to?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. The decision has been given by the Chairman.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I have no objection to repeat. The hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Taylor), was quoting and discussing a speech made by the Minister of Customs on a previous occasion. This speech of the Minister of Customs was made on a motion to go into Committee of Ways and Means after an amendment by the hon. member for Argenteuil (Mr. Perley), had been disposed of. After the minister had proceeded some distance—a considerable distance—and had discussed the figures quoted by the hon. member for Grenville, and was proceeding to discuss the matter that is now before this committee, I being in the Chair, called him to order and ruled him out of order, on the ground that he was then, on a motion to go into Committee of Ways and Means, discussing a matter that was already in possession of and before that committee. That ruling was not objected to. Now, while in committee on this resolution the hon. member for Leeds is quoting that speech. My judgment is that I must apply the same rule to him that I applied to the Minister of Customs, and rule that the speech of the Minister of Customs is not a portion of this debate. it having been ruled out of order as not having connection with the debate. For that reason, I think the hon. member for Leeds is not in order in quoting or referring to that speech.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). There seems to be a little confusion, if I may be pardoned for saying so, between the two reasons assigned. It might be objected that the reference is to a past debate and, therefore, was out of order, but I have never known the rule as to a past debate to be carried to that extent in my experience. The debate was upon the very question which we are now discussing in committee, and it is perfectly well known and understood that the various discussions upon different stages of a Bill are all one debate. An analogy might be drawn between such a case and this case in which, after the House has resolved itself into Committee of Ways and Means, reference is sought to be made to the debate on the motion to go into Ways and Means. That is one point. The other point is absolutely distinct. It is involved in the circumstance that the minister himself was ruled out of order. I do not think that that is a good reason for not allowing a reference to the portion of the speech which was delivered before the minister was declared out of order. If the Minister of Customs was permitted to go on to the extent of twelve columns of 'Hansard' in making an argument in favour of these proposals, it would seem remarkable if that portion of his speech, which he did utter before any point of order was raised, and which could have been referred to had it been made in committee, cannot now be referred to because the hon. minister in the end was stopped. It would be a great advantage to an hon. member to go on to the extent of twelve columns of 'Hansard' before being ruled out of order, and then have no one allowed to answer his argument. My hon. friend from Leeds (Mr. Taylor) is simply making reference to the argument which the Minister of Customs used to the extent of twelve pages of 'Hansard' before any question of order was raised. Surely it would be outside the ordinary bounds of fairness that twelve columns of 'Hansard' should be employed by an hon. member of this House and no answer to that argument permitted.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. In answer to my hon. friend, I think I can appeal to his sense of fairness that the ruling is perfectly fair. The question of course is a technical one, and very often technical rules are not easily intelligible, but they are the best that could be devised for the conduct of an assembly such as this. My hon. friend says, and his point has some force, that the Minister of Customs was allowed to proceed some twelve columns in 'Hansard' before he was called to order, and that, if the ruling of the Chairman be held good, the opposition would then have no opportunity to answer. But the opposition might have taken the point of order immediately; and if they did not, the blame is not on the government or any body else, but only on themselves. Very often a speech which is out of order is allowed to proceed for some considerable length before it is challenged. That was the case here.

Mr. TAYLOR (Leeds). No, it was not challenged.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. It was challenged by Mr. Speaker himself. The opposition made no objection, but they might have objected at the very start. The attention of hon. gentlemen opposite was not called to it, but the Speaker noted the point and stopped the minister from going further. The result is the House cannot take that speech into consideration because it was out of order, and the minister was not allowed to complete it.

Mr. TAYLOR (Leeds). He was through practically when called to order, and had begun to flounder.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. That is the opinion of my hon. friend, and perhaps my hon. colleague might have the same opinion of his remarks.

Mr. TAYLOR (Leeds). I ask for a ruling on the point. I have been here twenty-nine years, and never knew of a case of this kind before. There have been many cases in which speeches were made on the motion to go into Supply or Ways and Means, anr references to these speeches have never been challenged. I ask the Chairman to show me the rule.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. It is a well known rule that a previous debate may not be referred to.

Mr. TAYLOR (Leeds). This was not a previous debate.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I have decided that it was and the hon. gentleman is at liberty to appeal from my ruling. In many cases the chairman will not interfere, but takes the spirit and feeling of the House. In the present instance I might possibly have accepted the feeling of the House, but for the fact that the remarks referred were declared out of order. The speech of the Minister of Customs having been stopped by the application of the rule, I feel I would be open to a charge of injustice if I did not apply the same rule in this case.

Mr. PORTER. Is it not a fact that the remarks of the Minister of Customs remain in 'Hansard' as part of the record, and part of the debate upon reciprocity? There is no rule I am aware of by which the remarks of hon. members upon any question may be expunged from the record. It stands there to-day as part of the record. Any body reading the record of the debate upon the question of reciprocity would be obliged to read that in connection with the other in order to have the whole debate. That being so, and there being no process by which it can be expunged from the record, does it not appeal to one as being only fair that so long as it remains there any hon. gentleman discussing that question at a subsequent date might be allowed to refer to what has taken place upon the question. Either the remarks of the Minister of Customs should be expunged or any hon. member should be permitted to deal with those remarks when speaking upon the same question.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The application of the rules of the House will undoubtedly at times work unfairly to some members. The Minister of Customs might, I presume, object to some remarks I have already allowed and if I have been unjust with him any unjustness or unfairness will be a matter of regret to myself as well as to him. But I have felt called upon, as I have told the House, to apply this rule to the hon. member for Leeds, partly because it was the rule of the House and partly because I have ruled against the Minister of Customs on that very subject in the manner I have stated.

Mr. REID (Grenville). The hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Taylor) was trying to explain that the Minister of Customs made a statement that is of record on 'Hansard' to the effect that I had those figures or statements in my possession when the House opened, and my hon. friend was proving that I had not those statements, nor had any hon. member of the House but that I had had them compiled in the Trade and Commerce Department. That being the case, there is no way of having that record on 'Hansard' made right, and so it seems to me that in all fairness we should be allowed to discuss the question in order to put it right. I appeal to the Minister of Customs and to the prime minister that the member for Leeds (Mr. Taylor) ought to have an opportunity of explaining the matter fairly.

Mr. SPROULE. I understand the chairman's ruling to be that the hon. member cannot refer to a previous debate because that debate took place on another motion. Suppose the Minister of Finance delivered his budget speech on a motion to go into Supply. In doing so he might go over the same items that are included in this resolution. He would perhaps refer to the duty on natural products, wheat, rye, oats, etc., and on the conclusion of his speech these duties would become law. Then when we came to discuss the reciprocity pact, although the same subject would be under discussion, any hon. member quoting from the minister's remarks on the budget speech would be out of order according to the ruling of the Chair. In my judgment he would not be out of order because he would be dealing with the same subject.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I desire to be understood as, with all respect, absolutely dissenting from the ruling which has been made. The ruling of His Honour the deputy Speaker would prevent any reference whatever to the speech with which the Minister of Finance introduced this proposal in parliament on the 26th of January. I think it only necessary to mention that to see, if I may use the words, to what absurd conclusions such a decision would bring the committee. The Minister of Finance introduced this whole question to parliament in a speech on going into committee of ways and means. If this ruling is a correct ruling, that a speech made by the Minister of Customs upon a subsequent motion for the same purpose cannot be referred to in committee, then in this committee we cannot refer to a single argument made by the Minister of Finance when he presented the subject to the House. If the rules of the House mean that, and I do not think they do, then the sooner we get some other interpretation put on them the better. I have never understood that the rule as to a previous debate went to anything like that length. I do not think, with all respect, that it does go to that length. Unless it does go to that length then the remarks of the Minister of Customs on that occasion when he was discussing the very subject we are discussing now in this committee, may be properly referred to by my hon. friend from Leeds. These debates have gone on without any check from the Chairman over and over again, during the past two and a half months, upon motion to go into Committee of Ways and Means. I do not know how often they have been referred to in Committee of Ways and Means, but I would not be surprised to find that they have been referred to very often in committee, although they were made on the motion to go into committee. I can understand the logic of regarding all these debates as one debate because they are, after all, one debate; but I cannot understand the logic or principle of saying, for example, that the speech of the Minister of Finance, made upon the introduction of these proposals, cannot be referred to after you once get into committee nor a single argument in that speech answered after you get into that committee. That is the position into which we are likely to be driven if the ruling of His Honour the deputy Speaker is a correct ruling in this respect.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. My hon. friend knows as well as I do that in these matters when a decision is given by a chairman, or by a judge, it is very difficult to have unanimity of opinion among all those concerned. I am sure that my hon. friend, in the course of his career, has very often heard decisions rendered with the soundness of which he was not satisfied. He says that this has been going on for two and a-half months unchecked. But on one occasion it was checked. I was present when the Minister of Customs was called to order and I heard the ruling given by the Chair. I thought at the time that the ruling was, perhaps, questionable—I say that frankly in your presence, Mr. Chairman. But I bowed to the chairman's judgment, recognizing the very able manner in which he discharges his duties. I thought he ought not to have given that decision; but he gave it and I bowed to it, as did everybody on both sides of the House. My hon. friend from Leeds (Mr. Taylor) knows that he has a thousand and one ways in which to challenge the figures of the Minister of Customs if he wishes to do so, but it so happens that the ruling of the Chair is against his referring to the matter on this occasion. And I should hope that, under such circumstances, the ruling of the Chair would be obeyed.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Does not the Prime Minister think that we are at liberty to refer to the speech of the Minister of Finance which was given before going into Committee of Ways and Means?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. The Minister of Customs was cut off and ruled out of order, and I think the same rule should apply to my hon. friend (Mr. Taylor, Leeds) who has the floor.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). But I was asking the Prime Minister if we were precluded from referring to the speech with which the Minister of Finance introduced these proposals, that the speech not having been made in committee but on the motion to go into Committee of Ways and Means?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. The point taken by the chairman was that the matter had been referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and it was not open to discussion in the House on motion to go into Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. TAYLOR (Leeds). I will try to take another opportunity to deal with the speech of the Minister of Customs, as the Prime Minister suggests. You, Mr. Speaker, having ruled, I will obey your ruling. I appealed to the Prime Minister to allow me to speak, but he has refused because he knew I was scoring his Minister of Customs pretty severely, and he took this opportunity to knock me out. However, I am Irish, and an Irishman may be knocked down, but he never stays down. We tried to get some information from the Minister of Customs, in fact I myself put questions on the Order Paper and moved for returns. But the Minister of Customs would not give us information. My hon. friend from North Grey (Mr. Middlebro) moved for a return and this House granted the order—a return showing the quantity and value of butter, eggs, poultry, chilled or frozen meat, bacon, lard, apples, vegetables, wheat, barley, cattle, horses and potatoes imported into Canada during the six months ending March 1, 1911, the countries from which the same were imported and the duty collected thereon. The minister brings that down as a return, but it does not show that there was a pound of butter imported during the time covered by the order of the House. Yet the return that I asked for gives the import of butter for one month. the month of February, at figures 206,000 pounds. And this return of the Minister of Customs says at the bottom, 'chilled or frozen meats not separately provided for in the customs classification of imports.' That is the conduct of the Minister of Customs. I asked for information as to the cheese, butter and eggs imported into Canada during February. This return shows that 119,729 pounds of cheese were imported into Canada in February last. Eggs were imported to the extent of 719,000 dozen. I heard the Minister of Customs say not long ago, that the imports from all these countries would not affect the trade of Canada nor the farmers of Canada. I heard him say that there were 750,000 dozen of eggs imported, and if this were reduced to single eggs and these divided equally among the population it would mean 1⅛ eggs for every man, woman and child in Canada. These are the Minister of Custom's statements. But what are the facts? The figures I have before me show that 725,000 dozen of eggs were imported into Canada in February and three cents a dozen duty paid on them. This was the importation for one month. Multiply that by the twelve months of the year and reduce it to single eggs, and you have 13½ eggs on the average for every person in Canada, instead of 1⅛ eggs, as stated by the Minister of Customs. The same applies to butter. According to the statement I heard him make, the importation was ¾ oz. for each man, woman and child in Canada. But the return he has given me shows an importation of 206,000 pounds in February alone. Multiply this by the twelve months of the year and reduce it to ounces, and you find that it gives an average of 9 ounces to every man, woman and child. Yet the minister says that the appendix which he had added to the statement of the hon. member——

Some hon. MEMBERS. Ch, oh.

Mr TAYLOR (Leeds). If I could have my whole speech added as an appendix to his I would send a copy to each of his constituents, for I would like to show the kind of statements he makes before parliament. Because I am surprised that they should send a gentleman here—and he is retained in the cabinet, too—who makes statements that he knows are not in accordance with the facts—

Mr. PATERSON. May I ask a question?

Mr. TAYLOR (Leeds). No, Sir.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER——'makes a statement which he knows is not in accordance with the facts,' is stronger than is allowed under the rules of the House.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). The hon. gentleman does not say that he knew at the time, but that he now knows, the statement to be incorrect.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. If the gentleman draws that distinction it will be in order.

Mr. TAYLOR (Leeds). I think it is in order, because I make a statement that is true, and I heard the minister make a contrary statement and which I know to be not in accordance with the facts. The same applies to butter.

Mr. PATERSON. I want to make one point, if the hon. gentleman will allow me.

Mr. TAYLOR (Leeds). No, sir, I claim my rights. The minister was asked a question from this side of the House by the hon. member from Quebec West (Mr. Price), and asked politely, and he replied, 'No, sit down.' Now the government have an agent over in New Zealand, and on page 394 of the weekly report of the Trade and Commerce Department, of March 27, here is what their agent reports from New Zealand:

In any event prices are not expected to go much lower, for should they do so the butter could be shipped to other markets such as Vancouver and San Francisco. At the present time there is a keen demand for New Zealand butter at Vancouver, and good prices are offering.

The government had that information before them, and yet they say there is nothing coming into this country from New Zealand. If there is any man in whose statements I have confidence it is the man who is talking about his own business. Now the government have given their case up entirely in so far as this reciprocity pact is concerned, by an hon. member who is supporting them, the hon. member for Huntingdon (Mr. Robb). Here is a comment by a newspaper on a speech of that hon. gentleman, a man who knows his own business, and he tells us how it will affect the farmers. I am surprised that any member from Ontario, after hearing this statement, and knowing how this bargain is going to injure the farmers of Ontario, will still persist in supporting it.

FARMERS WILL NOT GET SAME PRICES UNDER AGREEMENT.

Hon. J. A. Robb, Liberal, Huntingdon, Admits that Best Figure is Secured Now.
Government Afraid to Leave Issue Alone.

Ottawa, Ont., April 19.—(Special.)—Hon. J. A. Robb, the Liberal member from Huntingdon, Que., completely spoiled the case of the government to-day as regards the reciprocity agreement. He is a miller. He admitted that the Ontario farmers got better prices for their wheat than they will get under the agreement. He said the farmers to-day refused to sell their grain at the world's market prices.

'Now,' said Mr. Robb, 'under the reciprocity agreement the millers would be able to go to Chicago and buy grain cheaper,' in other words the Canadian farmers could stew in their own juice.

That is the comment of the newspapers on the statements of one of the government supporters. Now I will read the hon. gentleman's own words in the 'Hansard' :

Under the proposed tariff changes, the United States miller will have the advantage in that he can import a certain percentage of our number one and two hard wheat, blend it with the softer United States varieties, mill it in the United States and market a 30 per cent or 40 per cent best patent at home, export the bakers, on clears, and the price received for his best flour at home will enable the United States miller to sell the lower grades for export at reduced prices. The Canadian miller, having a smaller home market, will be that much handicapped on the export trade.

Again he says:

My hon. friend comes from Ontario. He knows that the millers of Ontario have been at a considerable disadvantage in recent years because the farmers of Ontario refused to deliver their wheat at the market price; that is the market value of the world. The Ontario miller will be able to go into Michigan, Kansas, Missouri, Ohio, anywhere they grow wheat, and buy it at the market price.

There is an hon. gentleman who says that it will ruin the farmers of Ontario, yet the Minister of Customs wants to impose this pact upon them.

Mr. ROBB. Did I say it would ruin the farmers of Ontario?

Mr. TAYLOR (Leeds). You said they could go to the United States and buy wheat cheaper at the world's prices than they could get it at home. I have been quoting from the hon. gentleman's speech in 'Hansard,' pages 7486 and 7487, the Unrevised Hansard.' My hon. friend no doubt has corrected it in the Revised 'Hansard,' because he was ashamed to let such a statement go out. I have not got through with the surgical operation on the Minister of Customs. He is my senior by a few months, and it is not very well for a boy to thrash an old man. But I felt it my duty in the present case to tell the facts that I knew. Now I want to take up the reciprocity question from another point of view. In my opinion we have arrived at the most critical time in the history of Canada since 1891. Then the right Hon. Sir John A. Macdonald appealed to the country and fought his last political battle, and his battle cry was 'Canada for the Canadians. A British subject I was born, and a British subject I will die.'

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. TAYLOR (Leeds). Yes, and there are a good many people who are not British subjects just now. The opposition was then led by Mr. Wilfrid Laurier, and what was his battle cry? It was not Canada for the Canadians,' it was unrestricted reciprocity or commercial union. The hon. Edward Blake, one of the loyal men of Canada, who had been leader of the Liberal party, gave way to Mr. Laurier, who led the party in the fight of 1891. But the hon. Edward Blake would not go into the fight with him, and he wrote a letter to his constituents declining to go into the fight, because he said the policy of the Liberal party would lead to annexation. In 1896 there was another battle fought. Sir John had passed away, and Sir Charles Tupper was leading the government. What was the battle cry in 1896? It was not commercial union, the battle cry of the Liberal party was 'Hands off Manitoba.' That was the only question fought out in 1896, and Mr. Laurier, the present Prime Minister, came into power on that question. How did he act after getting into power? Did he carry out the policy of 'Hands off?' Did he keep his hands off Saskatchewan and Alberta? No, he forced separate schools on Saskatchewan and Alberta, after opposing them being forced on Manitoba. What has been his policy ever since? I quote from the speech of the right hon. gentleman in which he told us what his ambition was:

I hold out to my fellow-countrymen the idea of independence, but whenever the day comes it must come by the consent of both countries, and we shall continue to keep the good feeling and good will of the mother land. If we are true to our record we will exhibit to the world the unique and unprecedented example of a nation achieving its independence by slow degrees, and as naturally as the severing of the ripe fruit from the parent tree. Is there a Canadian anywhere who would not hail with joy the day when we would be deprived of the services of British diplomacy.

There is the gentleman who is to-day prime minister of this country and that is the policy which he laid down then and he has never retracted. What has he ever done to strengthen the bonds that bind us to the British Empire? How did he act in the Boer war? Did he send men?—no, but he allowed England to send them, paid their expenses, and passed an order in council declaring that it would not be a precedent, that it must never happen again. What did he do to help England at the colonial conference of 1902? Did he assist England then? He made an arrangement shortly afterwards for England to hand over the fortifications at Halifax and Esquimalt and to take her soldiers home. Was that strengthening the tie that binds us to the mother country? A number of years ago I took a trip to Victoria and while there I went out to Esquimalt. In a little cove I saw lying three or four of England's bulldogs—ships and armed men kept there simply to say to Russia, Japan and China: You may pass by on these waters but keep your hands off Canada. He drove those boats away, sent those soldiers back home and said: We will take care of ourselves, we are a nation now. The other day an English general reported that the docks at Halifax and Esquimalt were old junk shops. Next he started a Canadian navy without consulting the people. He must establish a Canadian navy and he will not allow Canada to assist England in time of trouble unless the parliament of Canada says so, and he is the parliament of Canada. Let me allude to what is said by one of his own newspapers, 'Le Progrès de Valleyfield':

WHAT SIR WILFRID HAS DONE.

'Le Progres de Valleyfield' (Liberal) thus outlines the triumphs of Sir Wilfrid Laurier:

He paralyzes the efforts of Chamberlain.

He has rendered abortive the intercolonial conference of 1902, designed to submit Canada to heavy military contributions to the empire.

He has not only taken the head of a powerful English general, but has furthermore chased him from the country.

He refers to Lord Dundonald.

He claims for Canada all the privileges of independent action, even to the point of menacing the colonial tie.

He has placed our militia under the command of a Canadian.

He removes him from the will of the English parliament.

He leaves to the decision of Canada's parliament the question of our soldiers fighting outside their country.

He claims for Canada the right of concluding her own treaties.

'Le Progres de Valleyfield' joins with the Toronto 'Globe' in condemning the advice that we 'Keep both hands on the Union Jack.'

This is what his own papers are saying he has done. We are not saying it, but it is the statement of one of his own strong supporters and organs. He was the principal in making this bargain with the United States assisted by the Minister of Finance. I said before that I did not think the Minister of Customs counted because two are a majority and with the premier and the Minister of Finance what could we expect? What could we expect from a man who was responsible for this?

At the Quebec interprovincial conference, the following minute was inserted in the official record of the proceedings, at the instance of Messrs. Fielding and Longley, the Premier and Attorney General of Nova Scotia:

In view of recent movements in the province of Nova Scotia, the representatives of that province desire to place it on record that they participate in the determinations of this conference on the understanding that while they join the representatives of the sister provinces in seeking reforms in matters which are of common interest, they do so without prejudice to the right of the government legislation or people of Nova Scotia to take any course that may in future be by them deemed desirable with a view to the separation of the province from the Dominion.

This is one of the gentlemen who went to Washington to make a bargain and bind Canada without allowing the people an opportunity to speak upon it. Then, the hon. Minister of Finance, speaking at Annapolis, said this:

I believe that the people of Nova Scotia are now even more in favour of separation from the Dominion than on the 15th June last.

The position with regard to a choice between Blake and McDonald was that out of ten issues he would favour Blake, but on the tenth issue he believed he was equally opposed to both. That tenth issue, that of repeal, transcends all others. In closing, he declared his belief that the people of Nova Scotia in every county would assist in throwing off the yoke of Toryism, and that there would be a grand victory in Nova Scotia for Liberalism and repeal.

Mr. WILSON (Lennox). What date was that?

Mr. TAYLOR (Leeds). It was shortly after the Quebec conference. These are the gentlemen who have gone down there and to add respectability they took the Minister of Customs along knowing that they would over-rule the other and that he would have to agree to their conclusions, which he did. What does this bargain mean for Canada? It lets Canada, with its eight million of people, trade with 92,000,000 people in the United States, but it lets 92,000,000 people come in with the same products and trade with Canada. It also lets in thirteen other countries, besides the British colonies, with many millions of trade and places them in competition with eight millions of people. Does it let Canada trade with any other country except the United States and England? Every one of these countries has a high tariff against Canada and we cannot send any of our products into those countries. They have a right to dump their stuff on the Canadian market but Canada cannot send over anything to them. The United States with its ninety-two millions would sell in Canada with its eight millions, twelve American farmers against one Canadian farmer, twelve American invaders against one Canadian defender. The following is a statement of the area and population of the twelve favoured nations:

12 FAVOURED NATIONS.

	Area in Square Miles.	Population.
The Argentine (1908)..	1,117,059	6,484,023
Austria-Hungary	241,197	49,280,000
Columbia..	504,773	4,142,000
Denmark (1909)..	15,052	2,692,000
Japan (1908)..	147,476	52,340,220

Venezuela..	599,358	2,647,000
Bolivia..	650,000	say 2,000,000
	12,161,085	307,982,765

Making 307,982,765 people that we are allowing to come in here with their produce and sell it to the Canadian people.

Mr. SPROULE. On the same terms with the Americans?

Mr. TAYLOR (Leeds). On the same terms with the Americans, duty free, no duty on their grain or produce. It means a territory three times as large as Canada let in for nothing, a foreign population forty times the population of Canada furnished with free trade passes and every one of these living behind high protective walls. Take wheat alone. The following is a statement showing the production of wheat by nine favoured nations in 1908:

PRODUCTION OF WHEAT.

	Bushels.
Switzerland..	3,500,000
Denmark..	4,400,000
Norway..	5,000,000
Sweden..	7,000,000
Japan..	22,500,000
Spain..	120,000,000
Argentine..	193,000,000
Austria-Hungary..	230,000,000
Russia..	570,000,000
	1,155,400,000

We could not get that information from the Minister of Customs or any member of the government, but we are able to learn from our trade and navigation returns what were the exports of the products of the farm from Canada for the year ending 31st March, 1910, and they were as follows:

PRODUCTS OF CANADA EXPORTED FOR THE YEAR ENDING MARCH 31, 1910.

Animals and their products	$ 54,696,630
Fruits	5,598,927
Grain	68,404,421
Flour and meal	16,044,228
Cereal foods	1,690,296
Hay	1,808,470
Hemp	28,303
Hops	28,035
Malt	11,328
Maple sugar	129,046
Syrup	4,572
Nuts	5,765
Clover	844,327
Flax	3,642,476
Grass	78,729
All other	38,851
Straw	25,933
Tobacco leaf	171,481
Trees, shrubs and plants	32,926
Vegetables	1,550,094
Vines	4,939
Other articles	230,458
Total agricultural products exported from Canada, 1910	$102,347,694

Now, the United States exported for the year 1909, $490,000,000 worth of the products of the farm, as follows:

PRODUCE OF THE FARM EXPORTED FROM THE UNITED STATES IN 1909.

Animals	$ 47,000,000
Breadstuffs	216,000,000
Provisions, including meat products	180,000,000
Fruits and nuts	18,000,000
Hides, about	1,000,000
Hops	4,000,000
Vegetables, about	3,000,000
Tobacco, unmanufactured	31,000,000
	$490,000,000

Here we have the United States exporting $490,000,000 worth of farm products or four times the value of farm products of the same kind exported from Canada, and yet we are told it is a boon to get into the United States market. Now, the following tables give the exports of farm products from the Argentine, Austria-Hungary, Denmark, Sweden, Russia, Australia, New Zealand, all of which come into competition with us:

EXPORTS OF FARM PRODUCTS FROM COUNTRIES MENTIONED IN 1908.

Argentine exported in 1908—
Animals (living) to value of	$ 4,120,000
Butter to value of	1,380,000
Bran, about	4,500,000
Wheat and wheat flour to value	165,000,000
Frozen and salted meats to value	24,000,000
	$189,000,000

In 1910 the Argentine exported not less than $200,000,000 or double Canadian farm exports, ($102,000,000).

Austria-Hungary exported in 1908—
Eggs and cheese, more than	$10,000,000
Denmark exported—
Butter (usually $10,000,000)	$ 7,000,000
Sweden exported—
Butter, about	$10,000,000
Russia exported—
Animals to the value of	$ 12,000,000
Butter to the value of	24,000,000
Wheat, wheat flour and barley	200,000,000
Total	$236,000,000

Or 2⅓ times the total exports of the Canadian farms.

AUSTRALIA AND NEW ZEALAND EXPORTED IN 1908.

Australia—
Butter, cheese, eggs and lard, about	$12,000,000
Meat, principally frozen, about	12,000,000
New Zealand—
Meats, about	$16,000,000
Butter and cheese	10,000,000
	$50,000,000

These two countries on four or five items alone, exported farm products equal one half total export of Canadian farms.

These are all countries that will compete with us. And yet, hon. gentlemen opposite, from the Prime Minister down, say, that these countries cannot export anything into Canada. Speaking on this question, the Prime Minister said:

> Perhaps it is just as well now, since I am reviewing all the objections to this agreement, that I should take up another point which has been made against it and which has drawn many a tear from the eyes of some gentlemen sitting on the other side.

He has not a tear to shed for the poor farmers of this country when he is allowing all these countries into the home market to compete with their products.

> I refer to the consequences of the agreement on what are known as the Most Favoured Nation Treaties. There are in existence certain old treaties between England and other countries in which it is provided that if England or any of her colonies should give a preference to any country in the world the same treatment shall be given to certain nations with which England has these old treaties. These treaties were in the past of so little consequence that we never troubled about them, but when in 1896 we found in our way the treaty with Germany and the treaty with Belgium we asked for the renunciation of these treaties. Similar treaties with other countries were not in our way, and, therefore, we did not trouble about them.

That is what the Prime Minister says. When the pact was entered into by the Minister of Customs and the Minister of Finance with the United States they thought they were dealing with the United States alone, and they never thought that all these other countries would be allowed into our markets on the same terms. They lost their heads, they did not dream of it. The Prime Minister goes on to say:

However, all of a sudden these treaties have assumed enormous magnitude in the eyes of some, and a few days ago heard a gentleman on the other side of the House say that we were practically opening our doors to the whole world. Well, the whole world is a big phrase, but let us examine in detail what it is composed of in this sense. The whole world in detail, so far as these treaties are concerned comprises Venezuela, Switzerland, Sweden, Spain, Russia, Japan, Denmark, Colombia, Bolivia (and who ever heard of any trade with Bolivia), Austria-Hungary and the Argentine Republic. Let us see what our trade is with these nations. All told last year we exported to Venezuela $14,000 worth and we actually imported from Venezuela $53,000 worth, a trade which would probably supply the next corner grocery.

Well, it would be a pretty big corner grocery that would dispose of all these things. Is not 101,000 pounds of cheese from Italy more than enough to supply a corner grocery? And all these other countries send in here cheese, butter, mutton, eggs, all of which the Canadian farmers raise. Here is the conclusion of the Prime Minister's speech:

The Argentine, however, is a wheat-growing country, and it exports wheat; but if ever the Argentine Republic sends wheat to Canada, there is no reason why Canada should not send wheat to the Argentine, so that objection is wholly exploded and may be dismissed without further reference.

Just think of the Prime Minister making a statement like that. Does he not know that while under this arrangement the wheat of the Argentine is admitted into Canada free, Canadian wheat has to pay a duty of 25 per cent before we can get it into the Argentine market. What nonsense it is for the Prime Minister to talk about our sending wheat into the Argentine and paying a duty of 25 per cent on it. Now, there did come in a great deal of farm products from these countries, to the Canadian market, and they paid a duty to get into our market, and after paying that duty they competed with our farm products, and what will it be when these foreign products have to pay no duties under this trade agreement? On the 29th of March, I put a question to the Minister of Customs which was answered, and it shows what we may expect with increased imports of the same kind of goods from these countries if this treaty comes into force and they are admitted duty free. I quote from 'Hansard' my question and the reply of the Minister of Customs:

Mr. TAYLOR (Leeds).

IMPORTS OF BEEF, PORK, &c.

Mr. TAYLOR (Leeds):

1. How many barrels, boxes or packages of pork, beef, mutton, lamb and cheese have been imported into Canada during the months of October, November and December, 1910, and for the months of January and February, 1911?

2. What was the weight and value thereof and the countries from which the same were imported?

3. What was the number of pounds of butter and number of dozens of eggs, and the value thereof, and the countries imported from, for the month of February, 1911?

Mr. PATERSON:

1. The department has no record of the number of barrels, boxes or packages of pork, beef, &c., imported, the quantity in pounds, simply being shown.

2. The quantity and value of pork, beef, mutton, lamb and cheese imported into Canada, by countries, during the months of October, November, December, January and February, was as follows:

We had all this cheese coming into this country subject to a duty of 3 cents per pound. These countries will be allowed in the future to send their cheese into our market free of duty to compete with our cheese makers, and yet these gentlemen say that this agreement will not affect this market.

Mr. PATERSON. How much does that amount to apiece?

Mr. TAYLOR (Leeds). The hon. gentleman can add it up himself.

Mr. PATERSON. I did.

Mr. TAYLOR (Leeds). Then you need not ask me. Let me give now the quantity and value of butter imported into Canada:

These paid a duty of 3 cents per dozen and yet competed with the product of our Canadian farms in the Canadian market. Now, we are asked to allow these in free of duty. Eggs can be produced down south in summer and winter, whereas our farmer can only raise them six months in the year. What chance then has our farmer against this American competition? He will have to go out of the business. I know that the Minister of Customs must have voted against this but was overruled by the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance. The Minister of Customs would never have consented to that bargain in the interests of the farmers but he was overruled.

Mr. PATERSON. Do you believe that?

Mr. TAYLOR (Leeds). I certainly do, because I have more confidence in the Minister of Customs, than to think he would be a party to it. But he was overruled by his colleagues and his voice did not prevail, even loud as it is. I would like to refer the right hon. the Prime Minister to the Argentine tariff. If we sent any wheat over there, that wheat would be charged a duty of 25 per cent. I refer the right hon. gntleman to the year-book of 1910, in which he will find my statement corroborated. In 1910 Canada exported:

Animals and their products....	$ 54,696,130
Agricultural products..	102,347,694
Total..	$157,044,224

Canada, with all its production, consumes 80 per cent of that production within its own borders. In 1908 the United States exported:

Animals and their products.. ..	$191,016,582
Agricultural products....	216,494,100
Total	$407,510,682

Or $250,000,000 more than Canada exported. The Argentine Republic exported wheat and flour to the value of $129,286,786. Denmark exported butter, eggs, and dressed meats to the extent of $87,100,000. New Zealand exported meats, butter and cheese to the value of $25,029,889. Australia exported bread stuffs and animal products, $43,895,226. France exported animals, butter, cheese, eggs and potatoes, $35,779,246. All of these will in the future, under this pact, be admitted free into our country, but if we ship any to these countries, our shipments will be charged a duty. Denmark charges a duty on butter of $4.86 per 100 pounds; on cheese, $2.43 per 100 pounds; and so on. Austria-Hungary charges a duty on butter of $2.21 per 100 pounds; on cheese, $5.52 per 100 pounds. New Zealand charges a duty of 20 per cent on butter, cheese and eggs.

This is a gold brick surely, to the farmers of Canada to allow these articles to come in free and compete with ours. What provision did the Minister of Customs make for oleomargarine. A friend of mine was in the states the other day, and there a merchant told him that this time last year he sold 50 tubs of butter to the 12 he sells now and is selling 100 tubs of oleomargarine and only 12 of butter. I believe that oleomargarine is coming in to-day as butter into our market.

Mr. FISHER. No.

Mr. TAYLOR (Leeds). How does the hon. minister know? I am satisfied that we are eating oleomargarine for butter on this side of the line. I am satisfied that only the other day I ate oleomargarine for butter in this city. The minister shakes his head and says, no, but that is like his other statements, he does not know, he cannot know. I know that butter is being imported, and can be imported, after paying the duty, at a profit as compared with our own butter, and it may be oleomargarine for all the Customs Department knows. The government, and their supporters, are trying to make believe that this is a boon for the farmers of this country, and they are running down the manufacturers. The manufacturers and farmers of this country must go hand in hand. What are our manufacturers doing? What are the populations of Toronto, Montreal, Hamilton, Winnipeg? Over one-eighth the entire population of the country, and who is feeding them but the farmers? Are they not to be taken into account? I have a number of extracts which I intended putting on 'Hansard' but shall refrain from doing so. However, there appeared a letter in the press yesterday that to my mind is unanswerable. It is from a gentleman whom the people of Canada respect and love. I refer to a letter written by Sir Charles Tupper, from Bexley Heath, near London, where he is now residing. Sir Charles Tupper sends the following letter to the hon. the Minister of Finance in reply to attacks made upon the writer by the minister:

To the Hon. Mr. Fielding:

Sir,—Now nearly ninety years of age, I had hoped that I was done with political controversy,——

So he ought to have been, he ought to have been let alone by any member of this government or this House; the people of this country will resent an attack upon a gentleman who has attained the ripe old age of 90 years.

—but as you found it easier to misrepresent and disparage a man three thousand miles away than to reply to the unanswerable speech of Mr. Sifton—your former colleague —I am compelled to notice some of your remarks at Montreal on March 27.

I cannot accuse you of want of courage in challenging the statement that you had 'advanced or advocated annexation to the United States, and that that statement was without the shadow or the ghost of a shadow of foundation in truth.

When I was fighting the battle for confederation you were in the employ of Mr. William Annand on the Halifax 'Morning Chronicle,' denouncing Canada and holding it up to public execration.

In 1868, when Joseph Howe, after exhausting in vain every means to defeat confederation, decided to abandon hostility and make the best of it, Mr. Annand proposed to apply to the United States. Mr. Howe rejected his proposal with scorn, but you remained with Mr. Annand and supported those who hounded Howe to his death, and drove him into an untimely grave.

You say that you represent Nova Scotia, but you forget that in the election of 1872 the opponents of confederation were unable to elect a single member to oppose the government, of which Mr. Howe and I were members, and that when in 1886 you carried the province in a desperate attempt to break up the union, I went out to Canada the following year and cured you of your folly by obtaining the support of 16 out of 21 members for the government of Sir John A. Macdonald. So much for your loyalty.

You say: 'Sir Charles Tupper in 1888 went to Washington to seek reciprocity. I find at that time so anxious was Sir Charles Tupper for reciprocity that he offered to give the Americans, in addition to their ordinary exchanges of trade, free access to the fishing privileges of Canada. We give an arrangement which gives everything that Sir Charles Tupper wanted, but we have not given the fisheries of the Dominion of Canada. We have maintained the rights of the people of Canada as owners of the fishing grounds, and the Americans must have a license when they come in, and not have free rights to fish in the waters of Canada.'

These are the depreciatory terms in which you refer to the great services rendered to Canada by Mr. Chamberlain and myself as plenipotentiaries of Her Majesty in 1887-8.

At that time it is well known that the press of the United States, both Republican and Democratic, were denouncing Canada for the alleged brutal treatment of American fishermen in Canadian waters, and, as they said, in violation of the treaty of 1818.

We obtained a treaty which was sent to the Senate by President Cleveland with the declaration that it was a fair and just settlement, and he urged its adoption.

That treaty provided that when American fishermen were allowed to purchase fishing supplies and enjoy transhipment of catch and shipment of crews in Canadian ports, Canadians should be allowed to sell their cargoes of fish in the United States free of any duty.

It also settled the contention as to bays on the terms contended for by Canada. It was accompanied by a modus vivendi providing for a license to American vessels pending the adoption of the treaty, to enjoy these commercial privileges upon payment of $1.50 per ton, and neither under the treaty or the modus vivendi could a fish be caught in Canadian waters by Americans, as Mr. Chamberlain and I refused the urgent appeal for that privilege by the American plenipotentiaries.

The treaty was carried in the Canadian parliament by a unanimous vote, and the modus vivendi has been continuously re-enacted down to the present day.

Why did not the government repeal it if it is a bad thing, why not amend it or repeal it?

President Cleveland was not re-elected, but Mr. Harrison, who defeated him, said in his inaugural address that under the modus vivendi given by Canada all irritation had been removed between the two countries.

If you wish to learn the value of the treaty of 1888, read the handsome reference to it by your colleague, Sir Allen Aylesworth, in the House of Commons, where he stated that our settlement of the bays question had been adopted and made permanent by The Hague arbitration.

The Minister of Finance denounces it, and the Minister of Justice commends it.

You say that Sir John A. Macdonald was in favour of reciprocity in 1891, but you do not explain that he was fighting a desperate battle to prevent Laurier and Cartwright, who were co-operating with Wiman and Farrer—avowed annexationists—from carrying unrestricted reciprocity with the United States, which involved Canada taking the tariff made at Washington with its discrimination against Great Britain.

Have you forgotten that the Hon. Edward Blake left his party on the ground that that policy would end in annexation to the United States.

It appears they have.

Which at that important crisis you supported? The policy for which Laurier and Cartwright and Wiman and Farrer were struggling.

It is true that in that struggle, which cost Sir John A. Macdonald his life, in maintaining British institutions for Canada, we succeeded. But before that election Mr. Laurier made the following solemn declaration:

I have read the history of unrestricted reciprocity in this way—that every reform has cost to the reformer years of labour, and those years of labour I, for one, am ready to give, though the Democrats may be defeated in the States, and though Canadians may grow faint-hearted in Canada, the Liberal party as long as I have anything to do with it, will remain true to the cause until that cause is successful.

He thinks he has gained the point now because he sends the Finance Minister who is like himself, and the Minister of Customs who does not carry weight, to consummate the bargain which he said he would live to carry into effect. The people of this country will let him know, on the contrary, that he has not gained it.

I will not expect to win in a day, but I am prepared to remain in the cool shade of opposition until the cause has triumphed, and you shall never hear a complaint from me. I tell you the Liberal party will never cease for the agitation until they triumph and obtain continental free trade. We are asked, sometimes, gentlemen, what is the programme of the Liberal party. This is the programme of the Liberal party: To obtain a continental freedom of trade. Success will certainly crown our efforts at no distant day. Fixing our eye steadily on the goal we shall go on steadily until we reach it—unrestricted continental reciprocity.

This declaration was made at the Young Men's Liberal Club, Toronto, September, 1889.

He has not changed his policy since he made that declaration, he is standing by it in any way he can get there, but he intends to get there.

I regret that I must now charge you with a wilful misstatement.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Do I understand that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Taylor, Leeds) is quoting from a letter written by Sir Charles Tupper? No letter written by a person outside this House referring to or reflecting on the action of a member or on a speech made in this House may be read in the House The hon. gentleman will not be at liberty to read a letter written by some one outside the House reflecting on proceedings in the House or on any member of the House.

Mr. TAYLOR (Leeds). This is a letter written by Sir Charles Tupper a few days ago.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I will hear what the hon. gentleman has to say.

Mr. TAYLOR (Leeds). ——written by Sir Charles Tupper, a copy of which the Finance Minister has in his possession, and I am quoting that speech verbatim, and I think I have a perfect right to read, because it is repeating history.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman says he is quoting the speech. Does he not mean that he is quoting the letter?

Mr. TAYLOR. Yes, quoting the letter.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I will read the rule on the subject:

Nor is it in order to read articles in newspapers, letters or other communications, whether printed or written, emanating from persons outside the House, and referring to, or commenting on, or denying anything said by a member, or expressing any opinion reflecting on proceedings within the House.

The expressions used in the letter appear to come within this rule.

Mr. TAYLOR (Leeds). In what way?

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The expressions, as I heard them, charged a wilful misstatement against a member of the House. That would be out of order not only under this rule but if applied by one hon. member to another.

Mr. TAYLOR (Leeds). This was not a speech made by a member of this House, but a speech made by a person in Toronto.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The letter emanates from a person outside the House. If it reflects upon a member of this House or upon proceedings in this House, it may not be read.

Mr. TAYLOR (Leeds). It does not reflect upon proceedings that have taken place in this House.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I have not been following the letter closely, but it appeared to me that it did so. If I find—well, I think I should ask the hon. gentleman in accordance with the precedents set, to allow me to see the letter before he proceeds to read it.

Mr. TAYLOR (Leeds). Certainly.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The passage I heard a moment ago appears to be a portion of a letter written by Sir Charles Tupper and addressed to the hon. the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding). He says:

I regret—

No, I think that in justice to all concerned I should not read it for the very reason for which I am stopping the hon. member (Mr Taylor, Leeds). I find in it a reference and a charge that would not be allowed in this House by one member to another, and it cannot be in order when quoted from some one outside the House.

Mr. TAYLOR (Leeds). I bow to your ruling. We will have it printed as an addendum to my speech, so that the whole letter will go to the constituents of the hon. minister. I have a number of other letters; but I have already occupied about two hours, including interruptions, and my hon. friend from Souris (Mr. Schaffner) has to deliver himself to-night, and I will make way for him.

Mr. F. L. SCHAFFNER (Souris). Mr. Speaker, I am sure I hesitate at this late stage of the debate and this late day of the session, to occupy the time of the House. But I feel that it is due to myself and due to the constituency I have the honour to represent that I should not give a silent vote on this important question, fraught with so much that will and must conduce either to the progress and expansion and building up of a greater Canada or to the retrogression, contraction and tearing down of the magnificent structure on which the skilful architects of our country have expended so much industry, energy, labour and capital. I thoroughly agree with the Toronto 'Globe' which said, the other day, that this was the most important and far-reaching issue that had occupied the minds of the people of Canada since confederation. I think that the word 'far-reaching' is exceedingly appropriate to this issue. And when President Taft used the words 'the parting of the ways,' although he used them in a different sense from that in which I wish to apply them, I realize that the events which may occur in connection with this great question may be the parting of the ways for the Dominion of Canada. The hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster) the other day, told us, that history was useful for what it taught us to initiate as well as for what it taught us to avoid. In the history of Canada as in the history of any other great nation, there are certain events which are of great importance and which stand out prominently in its record. While I do not pretend to enumerate these outstanding chapters in the history of our country there are a few to which I shall briefly refer. The first great step in connection with our country, perhaps, was confederation. Then came the National Policy of Sir John Macdonald, the building of the first great transcontinental road, the event of 1891, and now comes adding to the history the event of 1911. Sir, it seems strange to me, and it will seem strange, I think, to the people of this country when it is called to their mind, that hon. gentlemen opposite have all most invariably—not all of them, but a majority—placed themselves in opposition to these great events and great chapters in the history of Canada. Take confederation. Not all hon. gentlemen opposite opposed it. But the very hon. gentleman who introduces into this House now this important change in our national history is the very man who opposed confederation and opposed it for many years. And I propose to place on record the hon. gentleman's history in connection with this great event. For it is singular, as I have suggested, that the same hon. gentleman not only opposed but fought confederation after it became the law of this country, also did his utmost to smash confederation and to take out of it my native province of Nova Scotia together with New Brunswick. Sir, when he was premier of Nova Scotia he refused to adopt legislation for flying the Union Jack on Dominion Day, or for making Dominion Day a school holiday. The hon. gentleman has a record in regard to confederation. He issued a manifesto to the people of Nova Scotia in 1886 in which he said:

If you do this the battle will be fought and won, the enemy dethroned and Nova Scotia set free to enter upon that career of usefulness which nature ever intended should be hers, and hers alone.

People of Nova Scotia, if you have any of that latent fire and enthusiasm which once throbbed in your hearts, and in the hearts of your fathers, let it be awakened and aroused; let the principles of justice and liberty, the love of freedom and of home once more animate and inspire you; let your dearest rights, privileges and institutions be nobly espoused and gallantly upheld; let the vials of your righteous indignation be poured forth against those who would further bind you by that monstrosity of legislation——

What was the monstrosity of legislation? It was the British North America Act, that was a monstrosity of legislation in the eyes of the hon. the Minister of Finance:

——the British North America Act, and let it be said to-day that you have championed the cause of political freedom, that you have thrown off the Canadian monster and emancipated yourselves and your beloved province from the thraldom, the servitude and the bondage of the Canadian union.

Mr. Fielding also headed a secesssionist movement, and in 1886 championed a resolution which had for its object the disruption of confederation. In speaking of that resolution he declared that the maritime provinces had everything to gain by separation from the remainder of Canada that his honest conviction was that confederation had not been satisfactory and that it was the duty of the eastern provinces to place themselves on record and then let the people decide and stand or fall on that issue, i.e., disunion.

Now, Sir, is it strange that I am unable to support an agreement introduced by that hon. gentleman? I may be wrong. Hon. gentlemen on the other side possibly may be right, or they may be wrong, and I may be wrong. But I believe that since confederation no proposition has been introduced into this parliament that will do more to disrupt confederation than the very pact we are called upon to support to-day. I represent a constituency of which I am proud, which extends some 110 miles along the American border, and if there is any constituency in Canada that might benefit to some extent from this agreement, perhaps it is mine. I want to say right here that this government has been derelict in its duty in neglecting to give the people proper information. Had our government taken the pains to obtain proper statistics, had they devoted the energy and the capital that the people of the United States have in procuring information, there would not have been so many long speeches as we have found it necessary to make. On visiting my home the other day I found the people exceedingly eager for information upon this question. They asked what I could refer them to, and I told them that the only information I could give them was obtained from American sources, that our government had absolutely no information that would enable the people of Canada to come to an intelligent conclusion on this question.

I wish now to refer briefly to the great National Policy introduced by Sir John A. Macdonald in 1879. I do not care to take up your time in stating what was said on that great question by hon. gentlemen opposite, by the present Prime Minister of this country, by the Minister of Finance, and many others. You know very well, Mr. Chairman, that Sir Wilfrid Laurier and all his followers at that time did their utmost to discredit the great policy of that great man. They were not successful. Sir John A. Macdonald carried the country, and introduced this great National Policy, a policy that has gone on to this day. Though the present hon. gentlemen when they were in opposition condemned the policy of protection, and Sir Wilfrid Laurier, speaking in Winnipeg, condemned it as a policy of robbery; nevertheless, after these gentlemen came into power in 1896, they adopted that policy of robbery. The question has been asked many times how it was, if they were so opposed to the policy of protection, and so enamoured of the policy of free trade when in opposition, that they still retained the friendship and support of the manufacturing interests. Well, it has been said, and I think very few people will deny it, that the present Prime Minister had a secret compact with the manufacturers of this country. We find him sending a telegram to Toronto saying: 'Who ever else may be hurt, the manufacturers of this country will not be.' We found our friends opposite everywhere opposing this great National Policy.

Now, we come to the building of the first great transcontinental railway. Where did we find our friends opposite on that great question? Did we find them trying to assist in carrying forward that great undertaking? Why, Sir, people talk about the Grand Trunk Pacific being a great undertaking, and so it is, but it does not compare in importance with the Canadian Pacific railway. When that great railway was undertaken there were only 12,000 people west of Winnipeg, and our friends opposite said, Why spend so much money, why tax this country to such an extent to build a railway to British Columbia with only 12,000 people? It is not worth the money. What was the road built for? It was built to cement together the widely extended portions of this great Dominion, it was the child of the Conservative party principally, helped I am glad to say by some of the better Liberals in this country.

I omitted to explain to the House how the disruption of this confederation was prevented. When Mr. Fielding had carried Nova Scotia in the local election, what occurred then? Sir Charles Tupper, a bigger man than Mr. Fielding, and a more patriotic man, carried the Dominion elections in the province of Nova Scotia he gained 16 members out of 21, and that is what preserved this confederation from disruption. I believe that this present reciprocity arrangement with the United States will also tend to the disruption of the Dominion. The building of the first great transcontinental railway, and the events of 1891, when our friends opposite expended all their energy to switch the Canadian people from the great ideal of building up a country of our own, independent of our goods friends to the south of us. Sir, great as these people to the south may be, they are not of our household. They are a foreign nation, and Sir, it is as true of nations as of men that they grow strong, vigorous, and influential by dependence upon themselves, rather than by reliance upon others. I ask you what would have been the result, if in 1891, the policy of commercial union had been sustained by this country. I do not need to refer you, Sir, and the members of this House, to what Canada was in 1891, or to what progress has been made since 1891, but I will ask you if we would have been as great a country to-day if we had linked ourselves up with that great nation rather than depend upon ourselves to build ourselves up through our industries and energies. I certainly believe we would not have been. Because information has not been given to this House it becomes necessary for me to spend some time placing statistics before the House, and before my constituents. I cannot understand two intelligent men, ministers of the Crown, not young men, but men of experience going over to Washington with the meagre amount of information that they seemed to have had. True, when they got there, a hurried message was sent for the Commissioner of Customs, but these hon. gentlemen had devoted no time or expense to collecting facts in order to place themselves in the same position as the foreign nation with which they were negotiating as to information. No hon. gentleman can deny that the information we have to-day in order that we may discuss this important subject comes from Washington and not from our own government. I say it is humiliating; I go further, and I say it is a shame, and a disgrace that our government should have pursued such a course, and Sir, I say, however bold faced the ministers may be, down in their hearts they feel humiliated. Time and again have been asked for information, and they have had, by their acts at least, to confess that they have no information. But, I would remind you we have been able to secure data which condemns from first to last the pact made by these gentlemen so far at least as this country is concerned. I want the people whom I have the honour to represent to know that their government, not having any information, endeavoured to oppose and obstruct the putting of that information upon the records by members on this side of the House unless they went through the formal process of reading statements to the House and reading them for hours after eleven o'clock at night.

Mr. KNOWLES. I understand the hon. gentleman is making his speech for the benefit of his constituents. I wish to ask: Does he want the House to understand that he is representing his constituents as being opposed, generally speaking, to this reciprocity agreement?

Mr. SCHAFFNER. I look after my constituency, and I will be back here, as the member for the constituency, to oppose this compact, and everything in connection with it. The government has given no comparative information, and whatever information has gone out to the people has gone out as a result of the energy of the hon. members on this side of the House. Then, I ask you: Is it not a logical conclusion that, the government having no information, and having supplied no information to the people, it becomes necessary, in the shortest form possible, to read the comparative prices that have been given by other members in the House that our constituents may have at least some opportunity of acquainting themselves with what they are to gain or lose by this agreement. We do not find other countries attempting these great revisions of their tariffs with so little preparation. I have already stated what the Americans have done. We find that Germany, in the last revision of the tariff, employed 20,000 experts to obtain all the information that it was possible to get. We find that the Americans have the comparative prices as regards products, and the increase of values, and that they have almost every minute detail in connection with this question not only on their own side of the line, but on this side of the line from Nova Scotia to Victoria.

Mr. SINCLAIR. Will the hon. gentleman say that it will be necessary to employ experts on agricultural implements from 17½ per cent to 15 per cent?

Mr. SCHAFFNER. I will answer the hon. gentleman's question in this way. Does he consider one item of reduction in our tariff which we should control ourselves in our own country is of as much importance as going to a foreign country dealing with that foreign country, and allowing that foreign country to make and unmake our tariff?

Mr. SINCLAIR. I understand this is a reduction of our own tariff and not of the tariff of a foreign country.

Mr. LENNOX. As long as you understand, it is all right.

Mr. SCHAFFNER. But, Sir, in face of all this we find these two gentlemen going to Washington without an exact knowledge, and that they were wined and dined until they sat down to make the bargain with men primed with all the necessary facts. Had our representatives the comparative information that they should have had if they had done their duty, because, Sir, this whole question relates to markets and prices, they would have hesitated before entering into such a pact as they did. I referred a moment ago to the events of 1891 when we went through an election in connection with commercial union. Fortunately, commercial union did not survive any more than free trade as they have it in England, or unrestricted reciprocity. These have all been illegitimate children of our hon. friends opposite, but every one was strangled in its infancy, just as this will be. They will all meet the same fate, thank Providence, and this country will go on and be just as prosperous in the future as it has been in the past. I think that we on this side of the House are just as pleased as hon. members on the other side to know that we live in a country that is prosperous. The fact that commercial union failed to be placed on the statute-books of Canada in 1891 I claim as one of the reasons why Canada has been so prosperous, and why Canada to-day occupies a position in the minds of all the nations of the world of which we are so proud. I believe it is largely because we refused to accept commercial union, depended upon ourselves, and therefore became strong and vigorous.

The Prime Minister tried to make light of the expression: Let well enough alone, and he had his joke about China, but after all if we are getting along well it is not a very bad idea to be content with our lot rather than take dangerous chances, and on the whole it is often not unwise to let well enough alone. Sir, I do not say, in the sense in which it was intended, 'Let well enough alone,' but I do say, in our advancement, in our progressiveness, let us be Conservative enough to cling to Canadian methods and British institutions. Let us, Sir, keep ourselves free from all entanglements with our friends to the south, so far as the making of tariffs is concerned. Do not let us ever have again to say to a delegation like the fruit growers 'You are too late.'

Now, Mr. Chairman, we had three very interesting delegations here during the present session, and first of all came the farmers from the three prairie provinces. That delegation asked for many things which I am proud to say that since I have been a member of this House I have advocated to the best of my ability. Amongst these things which they asked for and which I have advocated, were terminal elevators, the reduction of the tariff on agricultural implements, the chilled meat industry, and government ownership and operation of the Hudson Bay Railway. Let me say that when I was home last I attended quite a large meeting of farmers and others and I was surprised to find that while there were three grain growers associations represented at tnat meeting, not one of these associations had ever said a word about reciprocity with the United States to the delegates they sent down to Ottawa. I understand, that after these gentlemen arrived in Ottawa one of the leading members connected with the 'Grain Grower Guide' had a consultation with the Prime Minister and it was then that it was decided to add reciprocity to their demands. I assure you Mr. Chairman, that reciprocity has never been talked in that western country.

Mr. SHARPE (Lisgar). We don't want it.

Mr. SCHAFFNER.

Mr. SCHAFFNER. We don't want it and we are not going to have it. I say, Mr. Chairman, that when the third of these delegations came here, fifteen hundred fruit growers pleading on the floor of this House for justice, it was humiliating to hear the Prime Minister say that because of this reciprocity agreement he was powerless to help them. They represented that it was unfair that protection should be taken off what they produced while everything they utilized in the culture of fruit had to pay a high duty and yet the Prime Minister had to tell them they were too late. I say, Sir, that if we have grievances, and we have grievances, if our transportation rates are too high, if one class of the community is overburdened because of special privileges to another class let us not shrink the responsibility of applying a remedy, and finding a solution, within ourselves without looking to a foreign nation for help. I say, Sir, that the time for this reciprocity pact was very inopportune, and what in brief is the story that leads up to it? Everybody knows that a few years ago when the presidential election was on in the United States, promises were made that if Mr. Taft were elected there would be a revision of the tariff downwards. President Taft was elected, but there was no revision of the tariff downwards. Then, in the United States elections of last year a majority of Democrats were returned to Congress, and President Taft seeing trouble ahead, he began to shape his course towards satisfying those who clamoured for a reduced tariff. The Prime Minister of Canada took a trip west last year accompanied by the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) and, following the usual custom it was expected that when the Prime Minister visited portions of the community, addresses would be presented, and flattering tributes paid to the head of the government, and everything pass off lovely, but on this occasion things were not quite so smooth. In fact, there had been so much disturbance that the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) had to chastise some of the audience because of the manner in which they were criticising the record of the Prime Minister. They found there was something doing in the west. He had been for fifteen years prime minister, he had promised the western farmers time and again that the tariff would be reduced and he had broken every promise that he had made in this respect, probably because of the secret contract that had been made with the manufacturers in 1896. He looked around to find some way in which to satisfy the farmers of the west, and he was quick to accept the invitation of President Taft, and they consulted together and brought forth this reciprocity agreement.

I want to say a word or two, because the question is very much debated now, as to whether reciprocity has been the policy of the two parties for many years past, as the Liberals allege. The right hon. the Prime Minister claims that it has always been the policy of his party but it is very well known that some time ago he declared we had bid good-bye to reciprocity. It is also well known that in the general elections of 1900, 1904 and 1908 we heard nothing whatever about reciprocity, unless it were from my hon. friend (Mr. Turriff) who last night told us that he had discussed the question during his campaign. I think my hon. friend must have been very lonely for I do not know of any one else who had anything to say about reciprocity.

I would like to refer to this question as it applies to my own constituency, which is perhaps a fair sample of the agricultural constituencies of the west. We do not grow in that country many of the natural products produced in Ontario or British Columbia, but rely principally upon wheat, barley, horses, hogs and cattle. Let me for a few moments take up the question of wheat, which is perhaps what we depend on in my constituency more largely than any other of the natural products. If my people were to be largely benefited by this proposed pact, I think it would be my duty to support it, although I take this stand, that while a member of this House represents but one constituency in particular, he also represents the whole of Canada, and should endeavour to educate his constituency to the point of being willing to do that which is in the best interests of the whole country. That is the aim I set up for myself, but whether I am able to reach that standard, it is not for me to judge. As wheat is concerned, the United States grows a great deal more today than they can eat. They can only consume a certain quantity, and if they grow 127,000,000 bushels more than that, they must export it. Therefore, I do not see what advantage it is going to be to our farmers to be given free entry for their wheat to the United States. The price of wheat all admit is fixed by the Liverpool market. In fact that has been admitted by two Liberal members, the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Molloy), and the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie). The hon. member for South Wellington said:

I do say this, however, that so far as I have been able to examine the matter—and I have looked into it with some care—I cannot see any reason why we should expect any very great increase in the price of wheat for exportation to the United States. There may be a reason, and there may be an increased price, but I am not able exactly to find out how it will come about.

My hon. friend from Provencher (Mr. Molloy), said:

I do not pretend it will increase the price of wheat to the Canadian producer but I say it will maintain the present price.

Therefore, it seems to be generally admitted in this House that we are only to maintain the present price, and I do not see any great reason why I should be found supporting this pact, because of any benefit it will give us in the marketing of our wheat. If it is only to maintain the present price. But I want something better than maintaining the price. I want, as the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Sharpe), said last night, a better price, and a better price we will never obtain if we tie ourselves to our friends in the south and allow them to handle our wheat instead of handling it ourselves along British channels and through our own channels in this country. Take the delegation which was here last December, one half and more of its time was spent in presenting to the government the needs and desires of the west, regarding terminal elevators. Why do the people out west want terminal elevators? They want them in order to maintain the identity of their wheat and have it reach the market of Liverpool in the same condition as that in which it leaves the farmers. We grow the best wheat in the world. I think the Minister of Agriculture took a little exception to that last night, and thought that perhaps Quebec did, but he had not seen enough of our wheat in the west. Well, we want to protect the identity of that wheat. The miller in Liverpool will pay for his grain what it is worth to him for milling purposes, and if our wheat does not reach the European market in the same condition as that in which it leaves the farmers here, that will have a bad effect upon the price, and our farmers will receive less profit. But how are you going to maintain the identity of our wheat if it goes south? It will then be absolutely impossible for us to do so. I would like to read some of the things that were said in that connection, at the meeting of that delegation:

The value of our wheat depends on its milling qualities, but it depends on its qualities not as it is inspected at Winnipeg, but on its qualities as it is placed on the British, or the ultimate market wherever they may be. And, if, as has been proved, each grade of our wheat is brought down to the lowest point by the mixing of wheat from lower grades, (and we believe it is often brought below it, that is, it is allowed to pass out of the terminal elevators with the minimum point of each grade lower than it would be allowed to pass the inspector at Winnipeg), if this is so, it will be readily understood that the value and the reputation of our wheat on the British market is regraded also, and as the British miller can only afford to pay for wheat according to its milling value, the price is reduced, and being reported back to us, becomes the basis of our market here, and we have to accept a price based on the lowest point of each grade, instead of on the average as it should be, which means a difference of about two cents per bushel.

It has been said that the United States will soon furnish a market for our wheat. Mr. J. J. Hill has been leading us to believe for several years that the wheat production of the United States was growing less and its population increasing, and that consequently we would have in that country a market for our wheat. But this set of statistics, which I am about to read, does not corroborate that. Their production for the last ten years was as follows:

UNITED STATES WHEAT PRODUCTION.

Year.	Bushels.
1901	522,229,505
1902	749,460,218
1903	670,063,008
1904	637,821,835
1905	552,399,517
1906	692,979,489
1907	735,260,970
1908	634,087,000
1909	664,602,000
1910	737,199,000

They are producing more wheat every year. They export about 127,000,000 bushels of wheat. But what could they do? I find that only about 50 per cent of the tillable land of the United States is cultivated and under wheat. I find further that the United States is only producing about 13 bushels of wheat to the acre, while Great Britain is producing 33 bushels. If you work that out you will find that the United States with a proper system of farming by tilling their land, by intensive farming will be able to export not 127,000,000 bushels but over 700,000,000 bushels. That does not look very much as if the United States would soon have to be an importer of wheat for their own consumption. The increase in production in the United States in the 10 years has been 214,000,000 bushels of wheat.

The supporters of this pact make use of the cry that they are opening up a market of 90,000,000 people to our producers. What is the use of a market of 90,000,000 if that 90,000,000 produce everything you produce in very much larger quantities? If these 90,000,000 did not produce sufficient quantities of wheat, butter, hogs, oats, cheese, for their own consumption then certainly you would be opening a market, but when, as is absolutely undeniable, the 90,000,000 have a surplus for export of every one of these products, it is at once seen that the market is of comparatively little value. Many people have been led away by this cry of the opening of that market of 90,000,000, but when the matter is explained to them they say: Well, is that what our government are giving to us? There is nothing to it.

We have much discussion as to whether the tariff on wheat going into the United States really affects the price of wheat. We find that the price of wheat in the various provinces of the Dominion and in various states of the union varies far more than the price between North Dakota and Manitoba. Some of these prices are as follow:

The average price for wheat per bushel, in 1909, in the North Atlantic states, was $1.12; in the South Atlantic states it was $1.17½; What made the difference between the two? Was it the tariff? But there is no tariff whatever, so you have to seek for some other cause to account for the difference. The average value per bushel on the farm, in 1910, for Iowa, was 72 cents; for Missouri, 78 cents; for Tennessee, 90 cents, for Alabama, $1.02; for Oklahoma, 73 cents; for Arkansas, 85 cents, for Oregon, 72 cents; for California, 84 cents; for North Carolina, $1.01; for South Carolina, $1.14.

These differences in price between different states and different provinces, cannot be due to tariff because there is no tariff between the various states or provinces.

I also wish to give some figures of the prices of wheat in the United States for the last ten years. I find they are as follow:

Year.	Average price.
1901	62.04
1902	63.00
1903	69.05
1904	92.04
1905	74.08
1906	66.07
1907	87.04
1908	92.08
Average price for nine years	74½

We find the average for these years has been 74½ cents.

Even at the risk of delaying the House, I wish to refer to the production of wheat of the favoured nations which will benefit by this agreement. That production has been:

	Bushels.
Switzerland	3,500,000
Denmark	4,400,000
Norway	5,000,000
Sweden	7,000,000
Japan	22,500,000
Spain	120,000,000
Argentine	193,000,000
Austria-Hungary	230,000,000
Russia	570,000,000

Wheat from the Argentine can be laid down at Montreal cheaper than we can send it from Winnipeg to Port Arthur, because it all comes by water from the Argentine and it has been a surprise to me how cheaply freight can be carried by water. It costs about 5½ cents to bring a bushel of wheat from the Argentine to Montreal. I may be asked why wheat is to be brought to Montreal from the Argentine. That question came up in my own experience in dealing with terminal elevators. I found that 100,000,000 bushels of wheat went through the elevators at Port Arthur and Fort William, and only about 55,000,000 bushels were exported.

It is very well known that Ontario, Quebec and the maritime provinces produce very little wheat, but eat the wheat of the west. We hope and believe that these provinces are going to increase a very great deal in population. I must say that, however much I appreciate the west, since I began to study this question, I have been struck with the great progress and importance of the two old provinces of Ontario and Quebec. However much we have been doing in the west, when we find that the province of Ontario produced last year $250,000,000 worth of farm products we realize the progress that is being made in this country. These provinces are going to use wheat. But if wheat can be landed in Montreal from the Argentine at 5½ cents a bushel, and it costs us 10 cents a bushel from Winnipeg to Port Arthur, and the additional cost of bringing it to Winnipeg, and then bringing it from Port Arthur to whatever point in the maritime provinces in which it is to be used, the competition is seen to be a very serious matter. I have looked forward to a large market in these old provinces for our Canadian wheat. Hence, I think it most unfair that this government should enter into a compact such as this. When these gentlemen went to Washington, they seemed to have so little information, and to give the matter so little attention, and to regard it of so little importance, I believe there is great doubt whether they ever thought of these favoured nations until after they returned home. It is a most important and most vital question in connection with this whole compact. When the Argentine can send wheat into Montreal for 5½ cents a bushel, is it not something to be alarmed at in connection with the wheat growing industry of this country.

But I cannot dwell any longer on the wheat question. I have here some figures on which I shall enlarge later, bearing on the possibility of trade between Canada and the Australian dominions:

RATES OF DUTY ON CANADIAN PRODUCTS ON IMPORTATION INTO AUSTRALIA.

Articles and tariff rates of duty.
Cattle, $2.43 per head.
Swine, $1.22 per head.
Sheep, 48·6 cents per head.
Wheat, 36·6 cents per 100 pounds.
Barley, 48·6 cents per 100 pounds.
Beans, 36·5 cents per 100 pounds.
Potatoes, 21·7 cents per 100 pounds.
Butter, 6 cents per pound.
Cheese, 6 cents per pound.
Eggs, 12 cents per dozen.
Hay, $4.34 per ton.

RATES OF DUTY ON CANADIAN PRODUCTS ON IMPORTATION INTO NEW ZEALAND.

Cattle, $2.43 each.
Swine and sheep, free.
Barley, 48·6 cents per 100 pounds.
Beans, 18·2 cents per 100 pounds.
Wheat, 18·2 cents per 100 pounds.
Potatoes, 21.7 cents per 100 pounds.
Butter, 20 per cent.
Cheese, 20 per cent.
Eggs, 20 per cent.
Hay, 20 per cent.

Let me now refer very briefly to our hog production—certainly a very important industry. I find that in the United States they have 49,000,000 hogs and in Canada 3,000,000. That is they have sixteen hogs to our one in the slaughter houses of the United States. Hogs in Canada and the United States average about 200 pounds or a little more. The average price in the United States is $6.85 per hundred, or $13.70 for the average hog. The price in Canada is $8.10 per hundred or $16.20 per hog. So, you would have a loss to the Canadian farmer under this agreement of $1.18 per hundred, or the loss of $2.36 per hog. This is on the basis of five years' average for the two places. No man will pretend that the one hog is going to govern the prices for the sixteen hogs; the price will be regulated rather by the sixteen hogs. Let me give you the prices in Chicago and in Ingersoll for the last ten years:

AVERAGE PRICES OF HOGS IN CHICAGO AND IN INGERSOLL—

Year.	Price at Chicago.	Price at Ingersoll.
1901	$5 71	$6 70
1902	6 70½	6 68
1903	5 88	6 07
1904	5 04	5 32
1905	5 18	6 41
1906	6 23	7 17
1907	6 09½	6 85
1908	5 36⅓	6 87
1909	7 53½	8 04
1910	8 59¾	9 11

And now, a few figures showing prices in Chicago and Montreal, respectively:

AVERAGE PRICE OF HOGS IN CHICAGO AND MONTREAL FOR THE FIVE YEARS ENDING DECEMBER 31, 1910:

	Chicago.	Montreal.
1906	$6 20	$7 77
1907	6 10	7 43
1908	5 70	7 10
1909	7 35	8 64
1910	8 90	9 60

I also have some figures in connection with the large amount of hogs which we are delivering from year to year to the packing houses, but these I will not read. These figures were somewhat a surprise to me. I will not give each month, though one thing that struck me as important, was the great regularity for the different months. The total for the year was 1,133,000. Now, if we take cattle, we find that practically the same conditions exist. Let us compare the prices in Chicago and Toronto. Here are the figures:

Comparative prices of cattle in Toronto and Chicago. Table of prices from 1901 to 1910, in the month of May each year:

	Toronto.	Chicago.
1901	$4 25	$3 95
1902	5 25	5 00
1903	4 90	4 06
1904	5 20	4 90
1905	5 70	5 50
1906	5 10	4 00
1907	5 12½	4 00
1908	5 50	5 00
1909	5 75	5 10
1910	7 00	6 25

So we find that cattle in Canada also bring a better price than on the other side, I see no reason to believe that we should gain in that connection by the reciprocity pact. When it comes to horses, we stand to lose a very great deal, not only in Ontario, but in the western provinces. The average price of horses in the United States to-day is about $108, while the average price in Canada is about $130. Not only that, but take my own country, where we used to buy a great many horses, but where to-day, we are exporters of horses. We sell many of them and sell them at good prices. What occurred two years ago? The very same thing that will occur when this pact is signed. We have coming into that country a lot of these western horses, cheap horses, whose coming was exceedingly detrimental to that country. We could not keep them out except through our customs. It was provided that horses of the value of $50 or less had to pay $12.50 in coming in. That absolutely stopped that class of horses coming in.

Of course you would not bring in horses costing $25 and $30 and pay $12.50 duty on them. Hence we have got rid of all that class of horses, and at present I think I may say without boasting that we have in Manitoba as fine a class of working horses as are to be found in any other province in the Dominion. Perhaps when you come to driving horses, we cannot boast much. But it is draught horses that are of commercial value, and there is scarcely a town of 500 or 1,000 people in that country that did not export last year four or five carloads of horses. Now we do not want that trade interfered with, we do not want this pact signed, we do not want this reciprocity in horses after we have spent so long a time in bringing up the splendid class of horses we have to-day, and we don't want these cheap horses coming in, as they will if this pact is signed.

Mr. McCOLL (Northumberland). Where were those horses exported to?

Mr. SCHAFFNER. Perhaps I made a mistake in saying they were exported; I meant to say that they were sent out of Manitoba, sent to British Columbia, Alberta, Rainy River, and other places. Manitoba is doing a large interprovincial trade in horses, and we found them a great benefit last year when the crop was not good There is no question that this pact would destroy absolutely our interprovincial trade in horses. On the question of interprovincial trade, I may remark that last year there was an interprovincial trade of about $14,000,000 between the prairie provinces and British Columbia. Now does any hon. gentleman in this House suppose for one moment that that interprovincial trade will continue, or that it will prosper if this pact is signed? For my part I do not.

I have here a comparison from a United States government report showing that land values rose more rapidly in the Dominion than in the republic:

Between 1900 and 1910:

	Per Cent.
Maine	67
Nova Scotia	181
New Hampshire	37
New Brunswick	120
Vermont	33
Prince Edward Island	70
Quebec	80
Michigan	39
Ontario	43
Minnesota	77
Manitoba	123
Saskatchewan	201
Alberta	185

Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to dwell a little while on the question of these favoured nations. We have favoured nation treaties with the Argentine Republic, Austria-Hungary, Bolivia, Colombia, Denmark, Japan, Norway, Russia, Spain, Sweden, Switzerland, Venezuela. Now we are asked many times: Do we need to fear these favoured nations? They do not send anything into Canada. But I find they do. I find they send a great many million dollars' worth of their products into Canada, even while they have been paying a duty, and it stands to reason that when the duty is taken off their imports will be greatly increased. Take the case of eggs and butter, there is now a duty of 4 cents a pound on butter and 3 cents a dozen on eggs. Take off that duty, and it gives so much more profit to the exporter of those articles into Canada. We have had $30,000,000 worth of the products of those countries coming into Canada, and we may reasonably expect that the trade will greatly increase when the duties are taken off. And we must keep in mind the fact if we wish to send our natural products to any of the countries named we are met with a light tariff, while this pact permits their natural products to come into Canada free. I have a table showing the imports into Canada for home consumption from the most favoured nation countries during the period of six years:

Now we can easily imagine that when the door is thrown open and their goods can enter Canada free of duty, these 307,000,000 people inhabiting the favoured nations will very greatly increase their exports into Canada. The question of eggs is an exceedingly interesting one. The hen seems to be a very valuable bird. I was surprised to learn that the United States, whose greatest natural product is corn, has its second greatest product, eggs. I find that in the month of February alone we imported from the United States over 700,000 dozen of eggs, paying the duty. Australia last year exported $6,000,000, and the Argentine $5,000,000 worth of frozen mutton and other frozen meats. New Zealand exported $17,500,000 of cattle; the Argentine, $4,000,000. These cattle can come directly into Canada, paying no duty. The Argentine exported in 1903 over $4,000,000 worth of cattle, and over $1,500,000 of butter. Austria-Hungary exported of eggs and cheese more than $10,000,000. Denmark, to my great surprise, a little country with a population of 2,500,000, made 169,000,000 pounds of butter, and exported $10,000,000 worth. Russia exported animals valued at $12,000,000, and butter valued at $24,000,000; wheat flour and barley, $200,000,000. Australia and New Zealand, although not favoured nations, will come in under this pact. Australia exported butter, cheese and eggs to the value of $12,000,000. New Zealand sent out $16,000,000 worth of meat, and $12,000,000 worth of butter and cheese. Speaking of wheat, the question has been put up to me that we have been exporting wheat already through the United States. That is quite true, but it has been going through in bond, and that is a very different thing. When wheat goes through bond the by-product could not be utilized in the United States, and had to be sent through bond also. After this pact is signed our wheat will go to the United States to be ground by their millers and the by-product will be sold in the United States for feeding their hogs. If we wish to get any of that by-product returned to Canada, as my hon. friend from Lisgar (Mr. Sharpe) said last night, we will have to pay a duty of 12½ cents per 100 pounds. I would like to place on record a statement of some of the natural resources of Canada as estimated:

Standing timber, 500 billion feet.
Wheat lands, 117 million acres.
Coast fisheries, 12,500 miles.
Fresh water fisheries, 440,000 miles.

Our coal is estimated at 172,000,000,000 tons; we have produced $260,000,000 of gold; silver mines rank third in the world; nickel, we have three-fifths of the world. In 1904, we produced 509,000,000 tons of iron ore and in 1910, $507,000,000; dairy products, $98,000,000; timber cut, $63,000,000; fisheries, $30,000,000.

The United States having been extravagant, according to the confession of President Taft, their resources are becoming scarce, and it is only natural that, although they have ignored us for 40 years, they are now exceedingly anxious to get our raw material. That was well explained by my hon. friend from Dundas (Mr. Broder), the other night. What do they want it for? They want us, with our unskilled labour, to gather up this raw material, send it over to the United States in order that they may employ their skilled labour and machinery in manufacturing it and that they may then send it back to Canada in the form of manufactured articles for which we are expected to pay an increased price. A good illustration of that is afforded by the item of pulpwood. By the employment of unskilled labour it costs $6 to produce a cord of pulpwood. They send that to the United States where, with their skilled labour, they manufacture it and then send it back here and charge us $45 for it. I for one cannot consent to give my vote for a pact which does that for Canada. I would rather that we should continue to build up our country in the way we are now doing. We are not only doing that but we are causing a good deal of worry to men on the other side of the line, like Governor Foss, of Massachusetts, and others. They are not pleased with the fact that Americans are sending their money over here to establish mills and industries. Something like $223,000,000 of American money has been utilized in that way in this country and that fact is worrying these gentlemen very much.

Now, I desire to refer to the question of barley. There has been a great deal said about barley and my hon. friend from Lisgar made some statements that I would not like to make. Before 1893, the duty on barley was 30 cents a bushel. Between 1893 and 1897 the duty was reduced to 15 cents a bushel and the price of barley went down 11 cents. We find that when the duty was raised to 30 cents again the price again increased, and we find that during the three years preceding the lowering of the duty the average price in the United States was 44 cents a bushel and that during the three years since the restoration of the duty the price went up.

There is another important feature in connection with barley that does not perhaps so much appeal to us in the west at this moment, but I think there is no hon. gentleman in this House but will agree with me that we will have to do a little different system of farming in the west. The best thing that ever happened in Ontario was the raising of the duty on barley going into the United States. The Ontario farmers went into hog raising and the Ontario Agricultural College at Guelph informs us that three and a half pounds of barley makes a pound of pork. It is stated that the adoption of this process makes barley worth 97 cents a bushel. It has been flashed all over this country that barley is worth 90 cents in the United States. While we get a much lower figure in Winnipeg, it is very easily explained. In the west, and I believe also in Ontario, they are not growing very much malting barley. I believe that 90 per cent of the barley that is grown is feed barley and there is not a tremendous difference in the price of barley. The barley that is bringing 90 per cent a bushel is malting barley grown in South Dakota.

I would like to say a word in regard to the preference. I believe that British mutual preference would be of very much more benefit to us than any thing in connection with this pact, and I believe that they are rapidly coming to it in the old country. Hon. gentlemen in this House may not agree with me, but the fact is that about 48 per cent of the people of the old country in the last election voted for mutual preference. I would like to read to the House the words of Mr. Balfour:

> There could not be a prelude to controversy more clear and more decisive than that of coming to a friendly arrangement between the mother country and the Dominions, though the Dominions ask for it, and though a vast section of our own population ask for it also. I really cannot imagine on what this is founded. . . They will not treat the colonies better than they treat foreign nations, and that is the broad difference between us. We think that it would be for the benefit of the empire as a whole, for the benefit of the empire as an economic whole, if we did treat our self-governing colonies better than we treat the foreigners. That is the difference between the government and ourselves, and upon that difference I am perfectly certain that in the long run the good sense of the people to which the right hon. gentleman appeals, certainly the verdict of history will be on our side.

That is what Mr. Balfour says in connection with the mutual preference. I call the attention of the House to what Mr. J. J. Hill thinks about it; he says:

> The pending reciprocity treaty before Congress is the most important this country has had before it since the civil war. If, after having Canada waiting for years, they turn her down again, our country will suffer, and one of the hardest hit of our industries will be that of wheat raising. England is waiting and watching for just that thing to happen. Within the fortnight Austen Chamberlain had called up for decision in the British parliament the measures providing an imperial federation for England and her colonies. Suppose that Canada joins the imperial federation of English colonies, as is proposed. A reasonable differential that England might impose upon our wheat would be 15 cents a bushel, and that would mean our wheat growers would find their whole product lowered that much per bushel in value. Great Britain would take over practically all of the $200,000,000 in round numbers that Canada now pays us for manufactured articles, then add the six hundred and more millions we export to Great Britain, and we find that, if we fail to adopt a reciprocity agreement with Canada and drive it to an imperial federation, we are cheapening our wheat crop annually, say, 15 cents per bushel, and at the same time we are losing $800,000,000 of export business to England and Canada.

Now, may I refer to the question of timber. What the Americans would do to Canadian forests may be judged by what they have done to their own. Any one who fifty years ago could have seen the vast extent of virgin timber in the United States, an area of forest which in quality, quantity, variety and value had not its equal in the world, would surely have exclaimed: 'Here is a forest which can supply all the needs of man for all time to come.' Within one short half-century the American people have, before their arable lands were all brought under cultivation, before their population reached 100 millions, so reduced that forest by wasteful exploitation, by fire and by lack of skilful management that they are now seeking access to a foreign supply. Within fifty years the American people, though fewer in number than they are now, though dealing with their own property, have consumed a forest wealth at least thirty times as great as that of Canada at the present day.

The rapid wasteful exploitation of forest areas in the United States has left that country in an unenviable position. With a population twelve times as great as that of Canada the United States has forest resources only four times as great. The timber in the United States will last the people twenty-five to thirty years. The timber of Canada would last them seven years. Combined, the timber of both countries would supply the citizens of both countries under present conditions of use perhaps thirty-five years. There is the secret of the great American desire to secure free Canadian timber, the 'far-sighted policy,' of which President Taft speaks. In the United States the securing of free Canadian timber will have a great effect in giving United States forests a rest.

On the other hand the free entry of Canadian lumber into the United States will have quite different results in Canada. The chief effect will be the hastening of the destruction of Canadian forests. In short the wholesale selling of our timber to the Americans at the present time can only have one result, the denudation of our forests without adequate provision for their renewal, and the subsequent development of a timber famine in Canada.

If I remember correctly the Minister of Customs gave an expression to sentiments that I would rather not hear coming from a minister of the Crown. He told us he was quite willing that the Americans should have our raw material including our timber, but I do not think that such a policy would be in the interests of Canada; on the contrary I believe that such a policy would be most detrimental to our future prosperity.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I shall briefly refer to the transportation question. One of the greatest difficulties of making farming profitable in the west is the high rates for transportation in this country. We have spent a great deal for the construction of Canadian railways, as the following figures will show:

EXPENDITURE ON RAILWAYS UP TO 1910.

Federal government..	$127,000,000
Provincial governments	36,000,000
Municipalities..	18,000,000

The total cash expenditure for railways by the people of Canada since 1878 amounts to nearly $500,000,000. In addition to that the federal and provincial governments guaranteed bonds for railway construction in Canada to the extent of $27,000,000, and in addition to that the various governments federal and provincial have granted in aid of railway construction no less than 55,000,000 acres of the public domain. I have said that one of the great difficulties in making farming profitable in the west is the high cost of transportation, and I say that our way out of that difficulty is not through the south. That is not going to help us. It is just as far from the town in which I live to the seaboard of the States as it is to the seaboard of Canada, and the only way you are going to help us in the matter of transportation is by carrying out the policy advocated by the Conservative party for years, and building the Hudson Bay railway over which there will only be 500 or 600 miles of land haul for our wheat. That, no doubt, will settle the question of transportation and consequently make our wheat more valuable to the farmers. Notwithstanding that the hour is late, I must put on 'Hansard' the remarks made by Sir Wilfrid Laurier when he introduced the measure for the building of the Grand Trunk Pacific, and what he said was true then, and is true to-day. But, why has he changed his mind so frequently, and why did he change his mind so frequently on the tariff before and after he came into power? They say that if you ask an Oriental a question his great desire is to find out what answer you want him to give, and it does seem to me that the right hon. the Prime Minister has an Oriental tinge to his character because he appears to be so anxious to please with his answer that he finds himself in a maze of contradictions. The argument advanced by the First Minister for the building of the Grand Trunk Pacific is absolutely opposed to this reciprocity agreement with the United States. He said in July 10, 1903, 'Hansard' page 7670:

> Now, Sir, we lay it down as a principle, upon which we are to be judged by friend and foe, that we are to have a transcontinental railway, that its terminus must be in Canadian waters, and that the whole line, every inch of it, must be in Canadian territory. We say further that such a line is of necessity to our commercial independence. Sir, I am surprised at the levity displayed by some hon. gentlemen on so grave a question.

The right hon. gentleman was surprised again. He told us at the beginning of the session that there would be an investigation before a change was made in the tariff. The hon. member for Brantford (Mr. Harris) told us that he had the word of the Prime Minister that before any tariff changes were made, there would be an investigation. The right hon. gentleman also said the same thing to the farmers of the west, and in making that declaration, spoke in a constitutional business-like manner. He went on to say:

What have you to say to-day to this? What are your minds running to when you have facts staring you in the face which show you that at this moment Canada is not commercially independent of the United States?

What do you think of that?

The American government granted us the bonding privilege. They granted us the privilege of using their harbours for our imports and exports without paying them tolls and customs dues. But my hon. friends opposite are aware that this privilege has always been held over our heads by the American authorities as a sword of Damocles. My hon. friends on the other side are aware that the abrogation of this privilege has been used again and again as a threat to obtain from us concessions.

Again, he said on July 30:

We consider that it is the duty of all those who sit within these walls by the will of the people to provide immediate measure whereby the products of those new settlers may find an exit to the ocean at the least possible cost, and whereby, likewise, a market may be found in this new region for those who toil in the forests, in the fields, in the mines, in the shops of the older provinces. Such is our duty; it is immediate and imperative. It is not of to-morrow, but of to-day, of this hour and of this minute. Heaven grant that it be not already too late; Heaven grant that whilst we tarry and dispute, the trade of Canada is not deviated to other channels——

When I first began my speech, I referred to the Canadian Pacific railway, which was built when there were very few people in the west, and built under great difficulties, and that road was completed in a shorter time than the contract called for. But here is our great Transcontinental which the government have been building since 1903, and which it not yet built, although all the conditions were most favourable. My right hon. friend then was very much exercised lest the trade of this country might be diverted into other channels:

—and that an ever vigilant competitor does not take to himself the trade that properly belongs to those who acknowledge Canada as their native or their adopted land.

What splendid sentiments those are. They are the kind I like to read:

Upon this question we feel that our position is absolutely safe and secure; we feel that it corresponds to the beating of every Canadian heart.

Mr. SCHAFFNER.

On July 30, page 7671 of 'Hansard,' the right hon. gentleman said:

Let me observe that if we have used American ports it is not because for five months in the year our own ports are ice-bound. Everybody knows that our ports in winter are just as open as the American harbours. Everybody knows, except Mr. Andrew Carnegie and the bulk of American public opinion, that if we have used American ports and the bonding privilege it was not because our harbours were ice-bound in winter, but simply because we had no railways to reach them. In the face of this, are the Canadian parliament and people going to stand on their manhood and place us in such a position that all times of the year, not only by one railway, but by two or more, we shall have access from January to December to our own harbour, and be able to say to our American neighbours: Take off your bonding privilege whenever it suits you, we are comparatively independent.

Again, he said:

Sir, our relations to-day with our American neighbours are friendly; they were never more so, and I hope they will so continue. For my part, I never made any secret of it, I have the greatest possible admiration for the American people. I have always admired their many strong qualities. But I have found in the short experience during which it has been my privilege and my fortune to be placed at the head of affairs, by the will of the Canadian people, that the best and most effective way to maintain friendship with our American neighbours is to be absolutely independent of them.

Does anybody want any better sentiment than that? We could not have anything better.

How is it our neighbours to the south want us so badly just now? They want our natural resources, our raw materials. They have a large population and large industries, and they want to make use of us to feed those industries.

There is another subject to which I would like to refer. I have not waived the flag since I started, I have not referred to the annexation subject, but I should like to quote a few of the statements made in that connection. I propose to read a few of the remarks made on the other side of the line giving the reason why they want this pact. This winter it has been my experience to come in contact with shrewd business men who were spending the winter in the south; and there is not one I met who did not tell me that whenever this pact is spoken of on the other side it is taken to mean annexation. Here is a dispatch in a leading American journal:

Minneapolis, Feb. 12.—In an editorial leader which bears every evidence of Washington inspiration, the Minneapolis 'Journal,' the leading newspaper of the Twin Cities, makes a frantic appeal to congress for the ratification of the reciprocity agreement. The 'Journal' urges that this is for the United States the golden hour of opportunity which, if it passes, may never return. It shares with Hon. Joseph Chamberlain the view that the reciprocity arrangement spells the doom of empire federation and colonial preference, and asserts that the United States has the greatest opportunity 'to unite the continent, to avert future jars and wars, and to change history that has arisen in this generation's time.'

We all have heard of our friend Champ Clark. It was he who let the cat out of the bag, and our opponents have been trying ever since to explain away what he said. He said:

Reciprocity in raw materials, in natural products, and in some of the simpler and more generally used articles of manufacture, as provided for in the pending agreement, is the obvious road to a relation profitable to both countries.

The time, probably the last time, when this can be realized has arrived.

The future union of all parts of the British Empire in a commercial federation is almost certain.

When that shall have been concluded, under a system of preferential advantages securing the English market to the colonial producer of raw materials and food products, and the colonial market to the English manufacturer, it will strike the United States a double blow.

Our best customer, Great Britain, and our third best, Canada, will trade less and less with us and more and more with each other.

And it will then be permanently impossible to repair our error.

Political and economic weather signals indicate that should the present measure fall no other can succeed for many years, if ever.

Then he goes on to speak of the price of wheat.

Representative G. W. Prince, of Illinois, gave his version of the proposal.

I say to our neighbours on the north, be not deceived. When we go into a country and get control of it, we take it. It is our history, and it is right that we should take it if we want it, and you might as well understand it. The Speaker has so said; the party back of him has so said, and it does not deny that that is its desire. Now let us see if the people of Canada believe in reciprocity and annexation.

Only in to-day's paper Mr. Madden, of Illinois says:

My hope is that if we can have closer commercial relations with the people of Canada, he said, some day this relationship may blend the two peoples into the harmonious whole; and that the territory lying north of us may become a part of the United States, as it should be. I have always believed we should be one people, under one flag, and under one form of government; and it will be better for us when such a thing happens, if it ever does.

I might keep on reading such extracts all night.

Just a word as to what we offer, and what we believe to be far better than reciprocity. We stand for an improvement in transportation rates by the building and government operation of the Hudson Bay railway. We stand for the complete identification of our wheat, for maintaining the quality and price by government operation of terminal elevators. To my mind it does not make so much difference who owns a railroad or a terminal elevator, the important point is, who operates it. The whole Conservative party have voted this session for the government operation of terminal elevators. We will soon have a Bill before this House. I am not a prophet, and perhaps I should not prophesy to-night but, so far as I have seen that Bill, it does not meet the exigencies of the case, they stand about where they were before, but I am afraid that every man from the west supporting the government will be found supporting that Bill, for they have voted against the government operation of terminal elevators so far.

We stand to improve our stock, cattle and hog trade through the establishment of a chilled meat industry, which has been moved in this House, and supported by every member of the Conservative party. I consider this, as the 'Globe' has said, the most important crisis in our history since confederation. Once this pact is signed, once it goes into effect I believe it is going to be detrimental to the interests and the nationhood of this great country of ours. One of our friends opposite asked me what my constituents thought. I have not had an opportunity of meeting all my constituents, and I dare say quite a number of them have been in favour of this pact, but if they are in favour of it the only thing they have heard about it is reciprocity, it has not been explained to them, they have not had a proper knowledge of what it means. I know from my own experience, and from that of those who have talked to these men in the west, that every man, when he thoroughly understands this pact, is opposed to it. The hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Sharpe) who held four meetings told me that only one man of the Conservative party who voted for him before stated that he still wanted this pact. That is a splendid record for the west. That is where the government have expected us to fall down, they have been looking for the western members on this side of the House to support this pact. I wish to say honestly that when this thing was first presented to the House on January 26, I thought there was something in it. I thought it would be my duty to support it, but every day since then, to the best of my ability, and with the time at my disposal, I have endeavoured to become familiar with the different facts, and it would take one all night to discuss the whole question. But I believe that if our freight rates are too high, if our wheat is not properly handled, if we have any other grievance, we should, in the name of all that is good and great, settle these difficulties ourselves. We have met as great difficulties in the past. We to-day have a Railway Commission, and I am prepared to give this government great credit for the creation of this commission. They have had two splendid chairmen. Where was there a better man in Canada that Mr. Justice Killam. We thought when he was lost to the commission that no man could be found to fill his place, but it seems to be the impression that Judge Mabee has filled the position, and is doing excellent work. Let them look after the freight rates. I say that the freight rates of this country are too high, but we are not going to get them lowered by turning to the south and asking the United States to help us. Let our commission solve that problem. If the commission have not sufficient power this parliament has power to give them further powers to handle these railway rates as they should. Let us settle all our grievances in the same manner. That to me is a very strong objection and a reason why I cannot possibly support this pact; it does seem to me that by it we are tying ourselves up to our friends to the south.

I would support the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Sharpe) in his statement that the Conservative party is in favour of a permanent tariff commission that will handle this question in the interests of this country. I do not believe in privileged classes as I have said before, and if the manufacturers of this country are getting too high prices, a commission of the proper kind could easily remedy that, such a commission could go into the offices, and into the books of the different manufacturing interests in this country, and find out just what prices would be fair. There may be ignorance in connection with this matter. Our farmers complain that they are paying too much for binders. I think that they are, but it would satisfy the farmers if through a commission we were able to ascertain what was the actual cost of that binder, and what would be a fair profit on it.

Mr. Speaker, in conclusion let me say the attempt of a few men to force the resolution upon the country is contrary to democratic government.

Canada is shaping her own destiny. The request comes from the United States, who had squandered her natural resources to such an extent, that they are face to face with their exhaustion and were, therefore, anxious to get at Canada's raw material in order to relieve the strain on their own.

Sir, we are building up a strong Canadian nationhood. Let us take heed lest we take a false step now that we are so near the goal of our ambitions. Let us take this false step and we may shatter with one stroke all the work of confederation.

When the old treaty was repealed, we were poor in skilled labour, banking capital, in agricultural and in manufactures. To-day we are rich in them all.

The repeal of that treaty threw us upon ourselves and we were roused to action. When the United States, in 1866, flung our poverty in our faces and told us our only choice was annexation or starvation, we refused to accept either, and have proven to the world that we can captain our own ship of state. Let us be friends with our friends to the south, but let us run our own affairs.

Mr. STANFIELD moved that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again.

On motion of Mr. Stanfield, committee rose and reported progress.

On motion of Mr. Fisher, House adjourned at 1.02 a.m., Wednesday.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

WEDNESDAY, May 3, 1911.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

FIRST READINGS.

Bill (No. 188) to confer on the Commissioner of Patents certain powers for the relief of Trussed Concrete Steel Company of Canada, Limited.—Mr. Clarke (Essex).

Bill (No. 193) respecting La Sauvegarde Life Insurance Company.—Mr. Geoffrion.

Bill (No. 195) to incorporate the Western Canal Company.—Mr. Tolmie.

QUESTIONS.

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

PAYMENTS TO MR. TREAU DE COELI.

*Mr. MONK:

1. What was the total amount paid by the government of Canada during the year ended 31st March last to Mr. Treau de Coeli, immigration agent at Belgium?

2. What was the total number of Belgian immigrants that arrived in Canada during the same period?

3. What men were returned to the government by Mr. Treau de Coeli as employed by him for government work during the months of December and February last, how much was paid to said men so employed and what work did they do?

4. What official residence in Belgium did Mr. Treau de Coeli attribute to said men so employed in his report?

Mr. OLIVER:

1. $5,125.87, made up as follows:

Salary of Mr. de Coeli.. ..	$1,558 31
Salaries of staff	716 76
Expenses..	2,850 80
Total	$5,125 87

2. 1,608.

3. One only, Mr. George Mercier, of Dumas, Saskatchewan, employed as a farmer delegate in Belgium for three months, January, February and March, 1911. $394.69 was paid.

4. See answer to 3.

NEWSPAPER STATEMENTS AFFECTING HON. MR. OLIVER.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Pursuant to the notice I gave the House yesterday, I beg to move:

The statement having been made in certain newspapers that on the recommendation of the Hon. Frank Oliver, Minister of the Interior, an order in council was passed on 8th May, 1907, giving the Canadian Northern Railway Company power to select in the province of Saskatchewan 600,000 acres of land in place of lands granted to the Manitoba and Southeastern Railway Company, and that on 3rd October in the same year $50,000 was paid into the Imperial Bank at Edmonton to the credit of Mr. Oliver, and that about one year later the further sum of $19,000 was similarly paid into the same bank to the credit of Mr. Oliver.

And Mr. Oliver having on the second day of May instant stated from his place in this House that no foundation whatever existed for the insinuation or suspicion that the said payments of money or either of them were made on account of the passing of the said order in council or by reason of the making of the said land grant, or in any way in connection therewith or on account thereof.

Resolved, that it be referred to a special committee of five members to investigate and inquire into the truth of the statement, and matters above set forth and that the committee have power to send for persons, papers and records and to examine persons on oath or affirmation, and to report from time to time.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister is now proposing a motion, which, in its effect, is practically the same as the one which he proposed yesterday, although it is not in the same form. The effective words of the motion are, in this case, preceded by a recital which has been read to the House by my right hon. friend. That recital is in these words:

The statement having been made in certain newspapers that on the recommendation of the Hon. Frank Oliver, Minister of the Interior, an order in council was passed on 8th May, 1907, giving the Canadian Northern Railway Company power to select in the province of Saskatchewan 600,000 acres of land in place of lands granted to the Manitoba and Southeastern Railway Company, and that on 3rd October in the same year $50,000 was paid into the Imperial Bank at Edmonton to the credit of Mr. Oliver, and that about one year after the further sum of $19,000 was similarly paid into the same bank to the like credit of Mr. Oliver.

And Mr. Oliver having on the second day of May instant stated from his place in this House that no foundation whatever existed for the insinuation or suspicion that the said payments of money or either of them were made on account of the passing of the said order in council or by reason of the making of the said land grant, or in any way in connection therewith or on account thereof.

Resolved, that it be referred to a special committee of five members to investigate and inquire into the truth of the statement, and matters above set forth and that the committee have power to send for persons, papers and records and to examine persons on oath or affirmation, and to report from time to time.

Before saying a few words about the character of the motion which the Prime Minister proposes, I would like to remark that this is very much of a family quarrel between the supporters of the right hon. gentleman, The Prime Minister introduced the subject into the House last Friday, the 28th of April. He then alluded to a gentleman who had had several interviews with him, and who had made charges against one of his colleagues. He did not at that time name the gentleman who had made the charges, nor did he name the colleague. He did, however, refer to an article which had appeared in the Toronto 'Telegram' of the previous day, the 27th of April, and the Prime Minister in bringing the matter to the attention of the House said this:

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I deem it my duty to call attention to an article which appeared yesterday in the Toronto 'Telegram,' in which direct reference was made to me. The article is a long one, and I need not read it all.

As a matter of fact, the right hon. gentleman read very little of it, and he did not read some of the most important parts. His speech continues as follows:

It will be sufficient to read the matter which has reference to my name. The article proceeds to say that on the 2nd of March this letter was addressed to me.

Then the right hon. gentleman quotes the letter, and one part of that letter quoted is as follows:

Recently evidence has come to me that one of your colleagues is a grafter and a boodler. I shall be in Ottawa for a few days, and am willing to submit the evidence to you as Tarte was willing to submit his evidence of the Langevin-McGreevy boodling to Sir John Macdonald. Should you see fit to take immediate action it would go no further. The alternative would be to place the document, letters and photographs of cheques, &c., in the hands of the opposition.

After quoting that letter, the right hon. gentleman alludes to a letter which was written by his secretary at his direction under date 3rd March, 1911, in which the gentleman who had written this letter to him was informed that the Prime Minister would be in his office at ten o'clock on the following day, Saturday, March 4, and would be ready to see the gentleman who was preferring these charges. Then the right hon. gentleman refers to the interview, and he uses this language:

> The gentleman in question waited on me, as stated in the rest of the letter, several times. Without committing my memory as to the number of times, I know it was more than once, but the tenor of each conversation between us on these occasions was of the same nature. The gentleman in question, with whom I had in former years friendly relations, but with whom I have not been in communication for many years, called on me and gave me the name of one of my colleagues and said that he had lost the confidence of the party, particularly in his own province, that he was a boodler and a grafter, and for these reasons should go out of the government.

Then the right hon. gentleman goes on to state that he had no doubt as to the honesty of his colleague, who was not only a colleague but a personal friend, and that the person who had the interview with him would have to take such steps as he might think fit. To quote the exact language of the right hon. gentleman:

> My informant was free to take such steps as he pleased, to place the papers and documents in the hands of the opposition, and do anything he pleased with them. If my colleague were then proved to be dishonest, he would have to take the consequences, but if not, it was my duty to stand loyally by him. This is the gist of any conversation that took place between us.

The newspaper article to which the right hon. gentleman here alluded comprised nearly a full page of the Toronto 'Evening Telegram,' and purported to set forth the bank account of the Minister of the Interior and to show there that there had been deposited to his credit two sums of money, one on the 3rd of October, 1907, amounting to $50,000; the other on the 11th September, 1909, amounting to $19,350. The newspaper article to which the Prime Minister alluded, so far as I have been able to examine it, did not indicate any source from which these sums were supposed to have been derived, but this article did urge in a very insistent way that the source of these sums should be disclosed, and that an investigation should be held for that purpose. It now appears from a statement made by the Minister of the Interior in this House yesterday that he was the person to whom allusion had been made in the Toronto 'Telegram', and he based his remarks to some extent upon an article which had later appeared in the Toronto 'World', and the right hon. the Prime Minister, in reply to an inquiry from an hon. member on this side of the House, stated that the gentleman who had the interview with him which was alluded to by the Prime Minister on 28th April last, was Mr. McGillicuddy. The hon. the Minister of the Interior in his statement in reference to this matter yesterday did not allude to the article which was brought to the attention of the House by the right hon. gentleman but did allude to a despatch which appeared in the Toronto 'World' of the 28th ult., and which the Minister of the Interior set out in his remarks. There was no reference yesterday by either the Prime Minister or the Minister of the Interior to the article in the 'Evening Telegram' to which the right hon. gentleman had called attention on the previous Friday, nor was there any allusion to the charges or allegations set forth in the various interviews between the Prime Minister and Mr. McGillicuddy. Now, the Prime Minister has thought this newspaper article in the Toronto 'Telegram' worthy of being brought to the attention of the House, and the Minister of the Interior, referring not to that article but to another article which appeared in the Toronto 'World", has challenged a certain suggestion, or suspicion, as it has been called, which appeared in that newspaper; and the Prime Minister basing his action upon the statement in the House of the Minister of the Interior has asked for an inquiry which is absolutely restricted in its terms to the question as to whether the surmise or suspicion contained in the Toronto 'World' is a true or an untrue statement of the source of these moneys. Well, I think it must be apparent to the right hon. gentleman that if this matter is worthy of investigation, that is not the way to investigate it.

There is only one question properly before this House and this country in connection with the matter, and that is: Whether or not the source from which these moneys came was a clean and untainted source. You cannot possibly arrive at a conclusion with regard to that by the inquiry which the right hon. gentleman proposes. Let us assume that there are one hundred sources; and one can easily imagine one hundred sources from which that money may have been derived, and in respect of which the acceptance of that money would be regarded as improper or prejudicial to the public interest. What is the position which the right hon. gentleman takes? Instead of inquiring and investigating as to what the source of the money was, he takes one surmise or suspicion in one newspaper, which probably knows no more about it than any other newspaper in the country, and he declares to this House: We can disprove that, and, therefore, we will investigate that charge. Well, Mr. Speaker, it does not seem to me that that is worthy either of the occasion or of the government or of the Minister of the Interior himself or of this parliament. If there is to be any investigation upon this question, let it be an investigation which will satisfy parliament, and the country that the Minister of the Interior is absolutely free from any charge or suspicion of unworthy motives or unworthy conduct in this matter. That can only be done by disclosing the source from which these sums of money came. It can be settled in five minutes before a committee of this House. If it came from the private resources of the Minister of the Interior, all he has to do is to go before that committee and show that. That will settle the matter for all time. But to go before a committee of this House and say, here is one source as to which an unworthy suspicion is cast, and it did not come from that source, while you leave open to conjecture fifty or a hundred other sources from which the money might have come, surely would not satisfy the conscience of this House, the conscience of the Minister of the Interior or the reasonable desire of the people of this country to have this mystery cleared up in so far as mystery is attached to it. In that connection I would like to say just one word as to some past investigations. I do not know whether the Prime Minister would regard it as a serious thing, an unjustifiable thing, that a conclusive inquiry of the kind I have suggested should be made. I may be told that it is not a right or proper thing to have the deposits of large sums of money to the credit of a minister of the Crown investigated. But I did not hear any very great complaint or any great murmuring from the right hon. gentleman or from any of his colleagues when the bank accounts of my hon. friend from North Toronto (Mr. Foster) and other hon. gentlemen then members of this House were investigated by a Royal Commission which he himself appointed, the books of their bankers brought into court and exposed to the investigation of counsel, and the men themselves called before that commission to be cross-examined not only as to the source from which the moneys had come, but as to the disposition which they had made of those moneys, and that simply for the reason that a cross-examining counsel had some hint given to him that it might be a desirable thing to investigate those bank accounts; and as a matter of fact the investigation was made in more than one instance for reasons altogether out of the legitimate scope of the inquiry. What is the position the Prime Minister takes now? He proposes to select one possible source which he believes can be disproved, and to prevent any further inquiry or investigation into the source or origin of these moneys. Does my right hon. friend seriously think that he will be clearing up this matter or solving this mystery by taking any such course as that? I venture to say, Mr. Speaker, and I say this with all respect, that such an inquiry as the Prime Minister proposes would be a pure farce, and I would not advise any hon. gentleman on this side of the House to have any part in it. It is merely a piece of stage play, made not for the purpose of a real investigation, but for the purpose of disproving a suspicion or conjecture which the right hon. gentleman believes can be easily disproved, and without giving any opportunity whatever to investigate the real source and origin of these sums. Under these circumstances I think I am entirely justified in moving:

That all the words after the word 'that' in the proposed motion be omitted, and the following substituted therefor: A special committee of five members be appointed to inquire into and investigate the charges and allegations set forth and referred to in the statement of the Prime Minister made in this House on Friday, the 28th day of April last, and the charges and allegations set forth and deferred to in the statements of the Hon. Mr. Oliver, Minister of the Interior, and of the Prime Minister, made in this House on Tuesday, the 2nd day of May instant, and that the said committee have power to send for persons, papers and records, and examine witnesses on oath and affirmation and report from time to time.

I propose this motion in this way because I understand in view of the statement of the Prime Minister and the article which he brought to the attention of the House, that it will open up this whole matter for investigation by that committee. That was the intent and desire of the Prime Minister when he made his remarks in this House on the 28th of April last, if he had any real desire or intention of having this matter investigated. A motion of this nature, which is confined to statements made in this House, set forth in speeches of ministers of the Crown in this House, in respect of a matter as to which charges have been made against a minister of the Crown, surely cannot be objected to by any hon. gentleman on the other side of the House. It is quite true, it may bring in allegations and statements set forth in the Toronto 'Evening Telegram,' but that is due to the fact that the Prime Minister himself, having observed these statements, has seen fit to bring them to the attention of the House; and having been brought by him to the attention of the House, they are surely to be taken account of in any investigation which the right hon. gentleman proposes to make in respect of a matter which he himself was the first to introduce. Under the circumstances, Mr. Speaker, I feel it my duty to press this amendment in order that the scope of the proposed inquiry may not be restricted, but may be just as wide as the Prime Minister himself made it when he first spoke in this House on this matter.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Mr. Speaker, I submit to the fairness of members of this House, that the amendment submitted by my hon. friend would not in any way meet the justice of the case and be fair to my hon. friend the Minister of the Interior. It is true that on Friday last I spoke on the matter, but in what respect? I quoted from an article published in the Toronto 'Evening Telegram' of the day before to the effect that a gentleman, with whom I had been formerly acquainted, had stated to me that he could bring charges against one of my colleagues, and the article seemed to take me to task because I had taken no steps to investigate that statement. Well, I drew the attention of the House to the matter simply to inform it that I had told the gentleman who called on me, that if he had any charges to make against my colleague, he should make them. I also called attention to the alternative given in the letter which had been addressed to me, namely, that Mr. Oliver—the gentleman in question—should go out of the cabinet and that would set the matter at rest, or otherwise it would be made public. I replied that I did not consider it my duty to take any notice of charges made in that way and that the gentleman who made them should go on and make them public. So far there was nothing but a general statement. In addressing the House I simply gave it the correspondence which had been placed in my hands. In that correspondence as published no charges were made against anybody by name, no charge was made against anybody in particular, no facts were given. But the following day another newspaper, the Toronto 'World,' made, not a charge, but an insinuation, against my hon. friend and colleague, the Minister of the Interior, Mr. Oliver. That insinuation was to the effect that in the month of May, 1907, he had made a recommendation to council to substitute, for certain lands situated in Manitoba, which had been given as subsidies to a certain railway, certain other lands in the province of Saskatchewan, inferring, though not asserting, that the latter were of greater value than those originally given. This was a specific fact, it was something tangible, but there was no direct charge. Nobody took the responsibility of coming forward and making a charge. There was however, an insinuation based on certain facts set forth in that newspaper. My hon. friend and colleague (Mr. Oliver), might very well have waited. He might very well have said: 'Certain insinuations have been made against me and I am ready to meet an accusation if any be made.' He, however, did not wait for a charge but he said: There is an insinuation made in that newspaper against me and I challenge investigation.

Now, my hon. friend, the leader of the opposition (Mr. Borden), says that the investigation asked for by my hon. friend and colleague, is restricted. But how much more could it be extended? What is there to investigate except this insinuation—not a direct charge at all—that certain lands were improperly substituted for others for the benefit of a certain railway company. It will not do for this House, or the other House, to investigate rumours floating in the air, things which are not tangible, which cannot be taken account of. The moment a specific fact was brought up, and an insinuation based upon it, my hon. friend and colleague said: I deny the insinuation and am prepared to show it is not true. What more could he do? If there is anybody in this House, or out of it, who will bring against my hon. friend and colleague, any specific accusation of any kind whatever, it will be the duty of my hon. friend and colleague to meet that, but here we have nothing of the kind. The article in the 'Telegram' is made up of vague insinuations. In the article of the Toronto 'World,' however, which was published the following day and which referred to this first article in the 'Telegram,' there was the specific fact I have just stated. My hon. friend then comes forward and says he is prepared to show there is no foundation for it.

But my hon. friend, the leader of the oposition (Mr. Borden), says there is something suspicious, there is the possibility that there was $50,000 given for other purposes. But when we have the statement that the $50,000 was given as a consideration for a certain order in council, is it not right and proper that this allegation should be investigated, and that this is the very thing which should be looked into? I submit to the fairness of my hon. friend and everybody else, that my hon. friend and colleague (Mr. Oliver), has taken the only course he could. He did not wait for a charge, but the moment there was an insinuation which could be reached, he asked for the opportunity to show that it had no foundation.

My hon. friend (Mr. Borden), has said that we had no consideration for the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster).

I did not want to bring the name of that hon. gentleman into this matter. A commission was appointed in his case, that commission did its duty according to its lights, and that has nothing to do with this matter. If any one has any charges to make against my colleague, outside of this House or in it, of course it will be the duty of my hon. friend and colleague to meet them.

My hon. friend (Mr. Borden), said a moment ago that the money might have come from a thousand different sources. Certainly it might. But are you going to fish to find out those sources? Is that what my hon. friends would call justice?

Some hon. MEMBERS. Yes.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. If any one has any charge to make regarding the source from which this money has been paid, it is for him to come forward and make a charge. But my hon. friend (Mr. Borden), wants my hon. friend and colleague (Mr. Oliver), to prove a negative, to show that he did not get the money from this source or another.

Mr. BORDEN. I did not say that.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Of course not, but that is what my hon. friend's motion means.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I am sure my right hon. friend has no desire to misquote me. What I said was that the whole question could be cleared up by proving the source from which the money did come.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. There is a specific charge that this money came from a certain source.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. What is the use of saying 'no'? You have the statement in the Toronto 'World.' If the money came from any other source, it would be for the parties claiming that it did, to come forward and make a charge. But my hon. friend's motion asks us to do a thing which is unheard of in parliamentary justice or in any court of law, namely, to force a man to prove his own innocence. My hon. friend wants the Minister of the Interior to go into the box and prove that he is innocent. Well, the rule of law is that the guilt of a man must be proved and not his innocence. That is the basic principle of British justice, and that is the principle on which I rely when I ask that this amendment be not accepted.

Hon. GEO. E. FOSTER (North Toronto). Mr. Speaker, it strikes me that the Prime Minister in his desire to play up quickly and efficiently to the Minister of the Interior has not sufficiently looked at the article in the 'World' or if he has, I think his statement to-day has gone a little beyond what that article would carry it. If I understood the right hon. gentleman correctly, he has made an argument upon what he says was a direct allegation made in the 'World' that the moneys in question came from a certain source. That article reads:

> Ottawa, April 27 (Special).—The sensational charges made by a Toronto newspaper against one of the ministers of the federal government at Ottawa was no surprise here. The facts of the case have been pretty well known for some time, and it is expected that the matter will come up in parliament at an early date.
> It is understood that Hon. Frank Oliver is the minister against whom the charge is made. The story at Ottawa is that Mr. Oliver had an order in council passed on May 8, 1907, giving the Canadian Northern railway the power to select in Saskatchewan the whole of the land granted by the government to the Manitoba and Southeastern, which is the Canadian Northern in Manitoba, in 1890, in all 600,000 acres. In 1907, there were no lands left in Manitoba, it was alleged, and the company was given the right to select its lands in Saskatchewan.

That statement stands by itself, and is complete as far as that transaction is concerned. Then follows another statement:

> In the same year, $50,000 was deposited from the Manhattan Bank of New York to the Imperial Bank at Edmonton in the name of Mr. Oliver. The exact date was October 3, 1907. About one year later, just before the general election of 1908, the sum of $19,000 was deposited from the Manhattan Bank in the name of Mr. Oliver at the Imperial Bank at Edmonton. It is known that he chequed out this money for campaign purposes.

That is the other statement. Where does the Prime Minister get his authority for stating that the Toronto 'World' specifically stated that the money which went into the bank at Edmonton to the credit of the minister was paid to him or into that bank for him by the Canadian Northern railway?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER Hear, hear.

Mr. FOSTER. Will the Prime Minister say whether or not such a statement is made there? He knows it is not. My right hon. friend smiles over this because he is thinking in the back of his head: Well, there are two items placed together so that if anybody wishes to he can infer that what the Toronto 'World' meant was that there probably, if you dug into it, you might find the source from which the money came. But that is not a direct allegation. Two statements are made and persons reading the statements may take a certain inference from their being so placed. But there is a difference between an inference and a direct allegation. My right hon. friend would perhaps have been perfectly right in stating that the two statements were so deftly placed, side by side, that it might lead any one to infer that the money came from the Canadian Northern to the credit of the minister. I would not have found any fault with that statement of the case, but when he tries to make this House or the country believe that the Toronto 'World' made a specific statement, made an allegation that Mr. Oliver received his money from the Canadian Northern railway out of that transaction, he is undertaking a task which he cannot perform in this House, or in the country. No such allegation was made by the 'World.' The minister had to do that in order to find a basis for demanding a committee of inquiry.

With reference to this whole matter the Prime Minister has to-day not gone very lengthily, or very fully into the case but he has made certain statements. He says that the amendment which is moved by my hon. friend the leader of the opposition would not be fair to the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Oliver). What does the amendment call for? It calls for an investigation into the basic facts which were brought out by the Prime Minister himself, and made a public question by the Prime Minister on April 28. This question would not have been before the House as a public matter as it is to-day if it had not been for the action of the Prime Minister himself. The Prime Minister bases his action, so he told this House, on an article which appeared in the 'Telegram' the day preceding, if I remember aright, on April 27. The Prime Minister told this House that having seen and read that article and found what was stated in it, he deemed it of so much importance that he considered it was no longer in the category of a private, or personal matter and he brought it to the attention of this House in order to make his own position fair and clear before the House. How did he make his own position clear? He endeavoured to do so by referring to another gentleman who had nothing to do with the 'Telegram,' and to other information which did not come through the 'Telegram' to him at all, but had come through conversations which took place between Mr. Gillicuddy and himself, conferences more than one, from letters which passed between Mr. McGillicuddy and himself, and from absolute specific charges which were made by McGillicuddy to the Prime Minister himself with reference to the Minister of the Interior. Is not that where the right hon gentleman got his information? Is that not the information on which he based his statement in the House on Friday last? Then why does he need to look to the Toronto 'World' which commented upon certain matters of which the Prime Minister had absolute knowledge from six or seven conferences that he himself had with the man who made the charges? I say then that the basic charge, the only charge in which this House is interested, the only charge in which the country is interested, is the charge made by Mr. Daniel McGillicuddy to the Prime Minister himself, and that charge was that the Prime Minister had a minister in his cabinet who was a grafter and a boodler, and that he had the evidence with him to prove that he was a grafter and a boodler, and he offered that evidence to the Prime Minister as a friend, and a Liberal, and a beneficiary of old times.

Will the Prime Minister deny that? What are the facts, then, that Mr. McGillicuddy laid before the Prime Minister? The facts were admitted by the Prime Minister himself, and the Prime Minister's answer to the specific charges was given before the House. What was the evidence that Mr. McGillicuddy laid before my right hon. friend? Did my right hon. friend, as the keeper of the conscience of his government and the honour of the public men surrounding him, men in whom this country is interested as well, did the Prime Minister look into, investigate and weigh that evidence? Will he say that he did? Or did he refuse to look at that evidence, and spend his time in an endeavour to switch off Mr. McGillicuddy from pursuing a course that he, as a friend of the party, thought it was his duty to pursue in order to cleanse the cabinet of which he was a supporter. Will the right hon. gentleman tell this House now whether he refused or not to look into the evidence which was given by Mr. McGillicuddy, which he had in his hand? Will he say so? I take it from what he said that he refused to look into that evidence. His statement to this House bears me out in coming to that conclusion. He stood on his dignity. His statement to the House is: I told Mr. McGillicuddy that I would not look into the matter, that I would not investigate the matter, that I would not give him a decision on the matter. Why? Because Mr. McGillicuddy said to me: Sir Wilfrid, here are my charges; Sir Wilfrid, here are my proofs. I want you to take these charges and see whether these proofs substantiate them. If they do, I want you to purge your cabinet of the minister against whom I make the charges, and if you do that it will remain a family matter. You and I are both Liberals. I have supported you for many a long year, I have written for you. You have supported me in a way, I was a beneficiary of yours for a time and enjoyed your confidence as a friend of the party, and as such I put this up to you. I say to you now: Investigate this and do your duty, as I consider you ought to do it in this matter. If my proofs are correct and sufficient, then I want you to do your duty by the party. If you do not, I must take them elsewhere, for I am not going to stop with your refusal. That is where my right hon. friend parted company with Mr. McGillicuddy, that is where he showed his keen sense of his duty to the public and the country. Got a little huff on him, stood on his dignity, and shook his fist in the face of Mr. McGillicuddy, and said: Aha, you threaten me, do you, that if I do not take this matter up and look into it you will go to the leader of the opposition? That separates you from me. I will not allow my dignity to be infringed upon in that way. You should have crouched to me, Mr. McGillicuddy; you should have said to me: I your most humble and obedient servant, beg you to look into those things, give your judgment upon them, and then, whatever you tell me to do, I your obedient servant will do. Be sure that it will never go out from the room in which we two are talking about it now. That would have pleased my right hon. friend. Mr. McGillicuddy is a man with a conscience, I suppose, with a history, with a purpose. His own record is one as a Liberal through and through. Having got hold of what he thought was a case of malfeasance in office, having the proofs by which he believed he could substantiate that, he came to his own Prime Minister and asked his Prime Minister to look into it. My belief is that the Prime Minister refused to look into the evidence altogether, and his statement to the House goes to prove it. He told the House the reason why he and Mr. McGillicuddy parted company: I could not stand his putting it up to me in this way; you look into it and it will go no further, but if you do not, I shall have to take it further. I ask my right hon. friend if he will put himself in the place of Mr. McGillicuddy. Suppose we argue it out in this way, that the Prime Minister was in Mr. McGillicuddy's place, that he was in possession of this information, that he had these proofs, that he was an honest man, as we will suppose that the Prime Minister is; and the Prime Minister standing in that position, with these facts and the proof behind him, goes to the man in power and says: In the interest of public life and the purity of public life, I put these things before you as a friend, and I ask you to act upon them. See if the proofs are sufficient to substantiate my charges, and if they are, do your duty. If you refuse I must go further. Will my right hon. friend imagine himself in that position, and then if the man to whom he applies says to him: Well, Sir, I will not treat with you on that ground at all. You tell me that if I do not look into these things you will take them to some one else. If that is your position I refuse to do anything. Would he not, if honest, be bound to say: But I am a man with a public duty, and I refuse to be balked because you decline to look into these things, and investigate them and do what I think is your duty. Would not my right hon. friend be doing his duty if he did that? The simple question I ask my hon. friend is this: Does he believe that Mr. McGillicuddy, not being able to get the Prime Minister to make the investigation, should not persist in going on and getting somebody else to bring force enough to have the investigation made? I do not think my right hon. friend can hold otherwise. The basic fact then is the charge that was made by Mr. McGillicuddy.

Now, what happens? It is extremely farcical, it seems to me. The Minister of the Interior sits tight. I do not blame my hon. friend the Minister of the Interior in sitting tight if he thinks that is the best way to do. The Minister of the Interior, as he sits there, is not a man proved guilty of anything, he sits there perfectly innocent, so far as any proof that is before this House or this country is concerned. He has a perfect right to maintain his innocence and to maintain his position by all the means in his power. But the Minister of the Interior must recollect that he is not a private person. The investigation which was brought by the Prime Minister himself is not an investigation into the private business of the Minister of the Interior. We are simply pressing for a fuller investigation, which will not be abortive but effective, in a matter which the Prime Minister himself brought up because he considered it to be of public importance.

Now, the Minister of the Interior, besides being a man, is a public officer of this country, and the gist of the charges is that the Minister of the Interior had a bank account in which large sums appeared to his credit in two separate amounts, and that these moneys, according to the man who makes the charge, were not properly obtained, and were not properly paid out. That is the charge. There is no other before this House. The Minister of the Interior can dispose of this matter in five minutes if he chooses. We have to take facts as they appear and circumstances as we know them. Few cabinet ministers are rich men; at least, they are not when they start in as cabinet ministers. There have been some exceptions, which, I hope proves the rule, where cabinet ministers have started in most mighty poor, and have come out most mighty rich. Well, as a rule, then, we will say that a cabinet minister generally starts in poor and if he remains honest he generally comes out about as poor, or a good deal poorer, than he started in. The Minister of the Interior is a man like the rest of us, and I do not think lays claim to any great wealth. I do not think he did when he came in as a minister, and I do not believe that he would now. When a bank account is portrayed to the members of this House, and to the people of this country in which a poor cabinet minister gets a deposit of $70,000 in two sums, it makes people think; that is all. My hon. friend the Minister of the Interior will not object to people thinking if the matter is made public. He himself would think if it occurred in the case of another, and he would say: Where under heaven did that man—that poor cabinet minister get a $70,000 deposit to his credit? That would be the natural question which would come to men's minds. He is engaged in politics, he is fighting battles, battles are fought by various weapons; was this one of the weapons with which political battles were fought? Was that a contribution for political purposes put at the minister's credit, where did the money come from, and did he check it out for political purposes? If he did he is amenable to public opinion as a minister in the cabinet taking in large sums of money, putting them to his credit, and using them to fight political battles which is to debauch the electorate. So that, if there was no personal dishonesty at all, if it comes out, or is the fact, that the minister's bank account show these large sums improperly obtained as political contributions, and that he then checks them out in the way of political payments, he is amenable to the Prime Minister, he is amenable to this House, and he is amenable to the country as well.

I said that the minister could settle this in five minutes. He could inform this House in what business he was engaged which brought him in, on these two dates, payments of $50,000, and of $20,000. If he did so it would clarify the position. If that $70,000 was business profits would not the Minister of the Interior settle this whole question and allay all suspicion by immediately rising in the House, and giving the details of the business which brought in these large deposits? Then he can go on and give the details of the checking out in the course of his business. That would settle the matter very largely; that would clarify it. The Minister of the Interior is his own judge as to whether he will take that course, or not. He does not choose to take that course. What course did he take? I am free to say that he took a course which I do not think helps his position before the House, or the country. He really does this, when you bring it down to plain English; he forages around, finds a paper which comments upon the basic charges made by Mr. McGillicuddy to the Prime Minister, and partly brought out in the 'Telegram' article, he finds in one of the newspapers a comment which seems to him to be heaven-sent, two statements side by side without an insinuation, the minister manufactures an insinuation, treats that as a charge, and then asks this House to appoint a committee to investigate his own charge based upon an insinuation. That is all he does. If the minister had said: I received that $70,000 in the way of honest transactions, I deny that there was anything dishonest in it, I am a public man, and this is now a public matter, I invite this House to appoint a committee which shall investigate that, and I will put my bank books, and my cheque books before the committee, it would settle this question in short order. He does not do that. It is as if there is a charge made against a man, and the man against whom the charge is made, not wishing to face it, looks around and says: No, this charge does not suit me at all, and that other charge does not suit me, but here is one that I make myself, and that I would like you to investigate. If every man who had charges against him in the courts or otherwise had latitude allowed him to do that same thing almost anybody could make a very plausible, and good defence.

The Prime Minister leaped to the occasion, and he had his resolution ready to empower a committee to investigate—what?—to investigate a charge that the minister himself made in reference to himself, on two parallel passages, stating what were the facts, but making no insinuations as to what the facts led to, and making no allegations of any kind at all. I think that what ought to be done, if anything is done, and the least that can be done, is to investigate the charges which were made by Mr. McGillicuddy. If the minister will not clear the matter up himself, as he could do in very short order, then let a committee be struck, and let it have the scope to determine whether or not the facts which Mr. McGillicuddy alleges in his charge, and which the Prime Minister thoroughly knows, are well founded, to investigate that to the extent at least of the payments, and deposits in the bank account which evidently form the basis of Mr. McGillicuddy's charges, and which is of the essence of the 'Telegram's' article, and charges so far as they are preferred by the 'Telegram' in that respect.

For, let it be thoroughly understood that the 'Telegram' made no statement with reference to the order in council granting the choice of selecting these lands to the Canadian Northern Railway Company. What the 'Telegram' said is this:

There are theories as to the origin and significance of the deposits of $69,340 on the credit side of the bank account. These theories cannot be tried out in these columns, or in the proceedings that might follow the disclosure of names and identities.

This journal has tried to stick to the facts and leave theories to the parliamentary tribunals that can test such theories. The truth or falsity of the charges which warring Liberals urge against a cabinet minister of their own political faith was tried by Sir Wilfrid Laurier and decided in favour of the cabinet minister. The facts and issue of that trial are matters of public interest. Every minister of the Crown should be prepared to have the origin of his bank deposits shouted from the housetops.

Publicity is the great cure for the ills of public life in Canada, and facts that were forced upon the attention of this journal could not be suppressed without making the 'Telegram' a party to the conspiracy of silence that clothes in the robes of secrecy proceedings that should be fought out and controversies that should be decided in a blaze of publicity.

So that Mr. Speaker, the Toronto 'Telegram' itself was absolutely silent as to the source from which the money came. It exposed the photograph; its letter-press work brought out certain other incidents, and made reference to certain other facts, but the 'Telegram' absolutely said nothing with reference to the order in council, or any other possible source of the money which was deposited to the credit of the minister in the bank account. I, therefore, think that the Prime Minister has not been well advised when he attempts to limit the scope of the investigation to something outside of the 'Telegram' article, and outside of Mr. McGillicuddy's charges, and bases it upon a chance guess; not even a chance guess, but bases it upon two statements of fact made by the Toronto 'World' without any allegation direct or specific that there was a connection between the facts, allowing it to the minister to infer that there is such an insinuation, and such a connection. It seemed to me that the Minister of the Interior has been badly advised in endeavouring to cut out and shut away the real charges and to base his effort at exoneration upon something which was not included in Mr. McGillicuddy's charges so far as we know, and was not included in the Toronto 'Telegram' article. One single word at the end—I am not here as a member of parliament to say that the Minister of the Interior is guilty of any wrong-doing in this matter. I am not here to say so. I would not say so. I am here to state another thing; that I will be glad if the Minister of the Interior shows himself to be absolutely clear in this matter. I have been long enough in public life, and I have had enough iron driven into my soul to know that it is not pleasant for a man's reputation to be put in stake and wrongfully be tried out, and I hope that every man in public life who has any charge brought against him will be able to substantiate the falsity of that charge. I have never had a charge brought against me as to my public life; never once. I believe that I can stand any charge that any man whose face is above clay can make against me in that respect. I have had charges made against my private life, and my private business, and in my opinion very unwarranted ones, and ones which were very unwarrantedly prosecuted; and, there are men in this House that went beyond what any decent Christian should. But, trying to be a decent Christian myself, I have no hard feelings against any man in this House, not one. My character will stand for what it is worth, and what God knows it to be, and for no more and no less. Therefore, I say that I will be glad if the Minister of the Interior shows that this whole thing is a tissue of falsehoods, and has no foundation in fact. But as a friend I would advise him to take hold of this matter frankly, and to lay before this House and the country, or a committee if he chooses, every transaction in that bank account of his. If the business is honest he can afford to do it; if he does not do it, I fear that many men will have a suspicion that he does not do it because he is not able to do it, and that I should be sorry to believe.

Hon. FRANK OLIVER (Minister of the Interior). I wish to offer a very few remarks to this House in regard to this matter so unpleasant to me. My view of the important features of the matter differs materially from the view expressed by my hon. friend (Mr. Foster). It appears to me, Mr. Speaker, that the question which is of interest to the House and of interest to the country is the question as to how those who are charged with the responsibility of administration in this government discharge that responsibility; whether honestly or dishonestly, fairly or unfairly, in the interest of the public or not in the interest of the public. As to what private transactions any person may have it is quite true that when an improper connection is established between these private transactions and public responsibility then the public have an interest and a serious interest, but as long as private transactions are private transactions, as long as they are not connected with public responsibilities, I submit Mr. Speaker, that however, public curiosity may be aroused, however, public interest may be inflamed from other causes or in other ways, these matters are not in any degree in the same class or entitled to the same consideration as the discharge of public responsibilities. In regard to my action, I do not wish the House or the country to understand that I am in any way trying to shirk investigation into any administrative act of mine. The article read by the Prime Minister from the Toronto 'Telegram' did not allude to me specifically, that is to say my name was not mentioned, and there is no evidence in that article that I could put before the House or before the country that there was an allusion to me. Therefore, it was not for me to act. There was an allusion in the article to the Prime Minister, and it was for the Prime Minister to take his own course in regard to that. But when the Toronto 'World' came out specifically mentioning my name and specifically connecting me with an act of administration, which although it did not specifically charge that that act of administration was connected with certain private transactions, still, as my hon. friend will admit, conveyed an insinuation. Now, it is true that I might have been satisfied with denying the insinuation or with saying nothing about it. But I do not know that that would be fair to the House or to the country or to my friends. There was an insinuation, and a serious insinuation, which related to an important administrative act for which I was primarily responsible, and I think it is only right that the country should know and have the earliest opportunity of knowing, what foundation there was for that insinuation. In regard to that my hon. friend the leader of the opposition has suggested—he has been unkind enough to suggest—that the money which was deposited to my credit might have come from a thousand different sources. He was perfectly correct in that. I want to say to the House, what is within the knowledge of the members on both sides, that the transactions of the Interior Department during the six years that I have been at its head have been necessarily of such a character as to make possible the securing of contributions from day to day of large or small amounts. Everybody knows that.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I would like to interrupt the minister for a moment. In the first place, I did not say a thousand. In the second place, I used the word 'hundred' without the slightest idea of making any insinuation or suggestion, but merely by way of argument. I do not want the minister to be under any misapprehension as to that. I was merely saying that if you select one particular source, you do not clear the whole matter up. I did not wish to make any insinuation or suggestion whatever as to matters of fact. It was using that argument only in the way of an illustration.

Mr. OLIVER. I do not wish to press the point. I was only using it as an argument, too.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I was making no insinuation.

Mr. OLIVER. I do not wish to make any suggestion of that kind, but such a view might be drawn from the hon. gentleman's remarks.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I did not intend it.

Mr. OLIVER. I very much appreciate the consideration of the hon. leader of the opposition in making that statement. But what I want to say is this. I have been at the head of the Interior Department for the last six years, and in that time there have been from day to day administrative acts involving values of large and small amounts which might be laid under contribution for political purposes or for any other purpose either private or political. Now, I want to say, so far as I am concerned, that, although the motion before the House has reference to a specific case, the only case with which my name has been specifically connected, I court inquiry, and the fullest inquiry, by parliamentary committee or otherwise, into any administrative act of mine of all the thousands that have taken place, and of all the millions of dollars of value that they have involved. I say I court the fullest inquiry into any of all those thousands of acts, in the House or in the committee or anywhere else; and I want the House distinctly to understand that as far as I am concerned, there is no restriction to the particular charge mentioned, because it was the only specific case in which my name was mentioned.

Now, my hon. friend said that I might clear the whole matter up as to my bank account by a simple statement as to the source from which this money came, and the direction to which it was diverted. I have no doubt that is a fact, that I could take that action, and could clear this whole matter up. But I conceive my duty to be this: I do not think it is in the interest of Canada, I do not think it is in the interest of the public life of Canada, that upon an insinuation based upon theft, and put forward as blackmail, a man in public or private life in Canada should be compelled to expose his private business. I do not think that it would add to the dignity of parliament or to the standing of public life in Canada to say that parliament should be the assistant of thugs and blackmailers by requiring the exposure of a bank account on such a statement as has been put before the public. The committee which has been asked for will have every opportunity to establish any connection that can be established between my bank account and that transaction or any other transaction that may be brought forward in a similar way. But I say I do not think that it would be right or wise or that it would tend to the dignity of parliament, to the standing of public life or to the good of the country, that, because a thug or a blackmailer should make a statement in regard to a man's private bank account, thereupon the authority of parliament should be invoked to expose that bank account to the public, no matter what the consequence might be to the man involved or no matter who might be affected by it. My hon. friend says that I am in public life and I cannot dissociate my personality from my position. That is true; but at the same time I have a responsibility to the public in regard to my public position that I have not in regard to my private transactions. So far as that is concerned, I am absolutely in the hands of parliament, and I ask for an investigation of any public account for which I am responsible to parliament and the country, which affects the welfare and the rights of the country; and I do not make the exposure which my hon. friend suggests for the purpose of clearing up my bank account, for the reason I have stated, that I do not think the public interest, the public welfare or the standing of the public men of Canada would be benefited by my doing so.

Mr. T. S. SPROULE (East Grey). Mr. Speaker, I would not have said anything on this matter but for the fact that I do not think the original motion exactly covers the ground in the information that was given to the House in the first place by the Prime Minister. What was the Prime Minister's statement to the House in regard to this case? He did not give names, but he said:

I deem it my duty to call attention to an article which appeared yesterday in the Toronto 'Telegram,' in which direct reference was made to me. The article is a long one, and I need not read it all. It will be sufficient to read the matter which has reference to my name. The article proceeds to say that on the 2nd of March this letter was addressed to me:

My Dear Sir Wilfrid,—I see that you are having troubles of your own by the defection of the 'young Napoleon' on the trade question and in other ways.

The other ways are the more serious. Only in one instance in the history of Canada has the trade question played a part in making or unmaking governments, and that was in 1878. Neither your government nor any other government will fall except from weakness on the inside. That was what happened to the Tories in 1896. Ministers of the cabinet had become corrupt, and the McGreevy-Langevin scandal, aided by the Manitoba School Bill and cabinet crookedness did the rest.

Then the writer gives information that is of interest to the House to-day:

Recently evidence has come to me that one of your colleagues is a grafter and a boodler. I shall be in Ottawa for a few days, and am willing to submit the evidence to you.

That was the allegation, namely, that one of the Prime Minister's colleagues was a grafter and a boodler. No doubt the writer of that letter told the right hon. gentleman who that colleague was. He also said that he would be in Ottawa in a few days and was prepared to submit the evidence. The writer proceeded to say that should the Prime Minister take immediate action, he would go no further, but in the event of the right hon. gentleman failing to do so, he would place the documents, letters, photographs of cheques, &c., in the hands of the opposition. He thus declared that he had the evidence in his possession. But what did the right hon. the Prime Minister say in his winding up? He said:

This is the position I take, and I leave that position in the hands of parliament and the country.

He thus handed the matter over to parliament and the country and did nothing himself. But on account of another article following that one, which appeared in the Toronto 'World,' the right hon. gentleman took this matter up again, and in pursuance of the article and a statement made by the Minister of the Interior, he proposed that a commission should be appointed to inquire into the allegation contained in the Toronto 'World'—not into the allegations made by this friend of his in that letter which the right hon. gentleman read to this House. The only allegations he deemed it necessary to have the commission inquire into were those published in the Toronto 'World.' But what were the allegations in the letter sent to the Prime Minister and which he read to the House? One of them was that the right hon. gentleman had a colleague who was a grafter and a boodler, and had improperly become possessed of certain moneys which were placed to his credit in the bank, and that certain portions of these moneys were disbursed for improper purposes, and the party who made these allegations said he had the documents to prove them. It seems to me, therefore, that if we appoint a commission of inquiry, that inquiry should be extended to cover these allegations. The right hon. gentleman knows the party who gave him the information, but he did not disclose his name to the House when he said he handed over the whole matter to parliament to deal with. In my opinion the commission of inquiry which we are asked to appoint should be instructed to ascertain whether these allegations are based on fact or otherwise, and should call on the individual who made them to submit those documents, letters, photographs, &c., and other evidence, and let parliament satisfy itself as to the truth of these charges. But if the right hon. the Prime Minister confines the scope of that inquiry to what is contained in another paper which was not before the House at that time at all, he will not satisfy the country that he has done his full duty.

Sir ALLEN AYLESWORTH (Minister of Justice). The question before the House narrows itself into limits that are certainly not of any great breadth. The question is simply as between the motion and the amendment and as to the form in which this matter ought to go to a committee of inquiry. It is to be borne in mind that this committee of inquiry has been asked for by the member of this House who is, so far as personal considerations go, particularly concerned. He has been for the last few days the object of continuous attention on the part of some of the newspapers of this country, and the course he ought to take has necessarily been a question with him to decide. I would ask any one to consider what course he himself would have taken if he had been placed as a public man, in the position in which my hon. friend and colleague, the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Oliver), found himself, when the article was published in the Toronto 'Telegram.' I read that article with some care, and without taking up time to go into detail, I may say that the general impression which it leaves on the mind of the reader—at any rate of a reader without any previous knowledge of the circumstances—is that the writer is purporting to give an account of some investigation or proceedings which have recently, according to his statement, taken place before the Prime Minister in respect to one of the members of his cabinet. In the article no name is mentioned. It could not be said who was hinted at or whose bank account it purported to give. Apart altogether from the fact that no one was in any way specifically attacked, there is, from first to last, no specific charge in it. There is just the general reference to which my hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. Borden), has referred, namely, that the Prime Minister was waited upon by a political friend—name not given—and told that one of the members of his cabinet was a grafter and a boodler.

I ask hon. gentlemen to pause and think, in a spirit of fairness to the man who is now marked out as the one aimed at in that article, how could any one meet such a charge. Would any one suggest that it should be referred to a committee of this House or any tribunal to investigate in order to determine whether or not any individual person was a grafter or a boodler?

If a man writes of another that that other is a thief, then that other person has redress by an action of libel, because there is something specific. But if a man in conversation, or even in writing, limits himself to some vague, unspecified term, which has no recognized meaning in legal terminology, although it may have a perfectly well understood meaning in every day parlance, the position of the man assailed is very different indeed. It may be that it would be libellous, and that it would be the foundation of a civil action for damages, if any newspaper specifically charged a person with being a boodler or a grafter. I do not doubt that under certain circumstances, and if there were facts surrounding the general charge which tended to make it a little more specific, the language would be actionable, but the question was upon the appearance of that article in the 'Telegram' whether or not the Minister of the Interior could, assuming he was the person intended to be referred to, maintain an action for libel against the proprietors of that newspaper with the slightest hope of success. I cannot undertake to say whether or not the publishers of that paper took the precaution to have the manuscript of that article revised by counsel before it appeared, but I cannot help saying, speaking with some experience as a lawyer, that that impression was left on my mind after reading it, for nothing more carefully guarded, more evidently designed to convey an impression without stating it, more plainly intended to be used not merely for political effect, but for the purpose of stabbing an opponent in the dark, and behind the back, without the writer, or the publisher incurring any responsibility for what he did, I can scarcely imagine. It was not many days, not many hours, before the allusions of the article were pointed by the appearance in a contemporary newspaper of something a little more specific. Possibly that was not necessary; it may be that there were rumours and hints in the air, passing from mouth to mouth, and from lip to lip, to enable the average reader of the 'Telegram' article or at least the readers of it who live or are temporarily in this city, to understand who was meant by what was said. But whether or not that is the case it was a very short time before another article appeared which was a little more specific, and which mentioned the name of the person who was meant by the previous article. When that article appeared, I ask gentlemen to pause, and think again, what course the Minister of the Interior could take in regard to it. Was it actionable? Could he, with any hope of maintaining it, bring an action of libel against the publishers of the Toronto 'World'? The article of the 'World' is upon the pages of 'Hansard'; it may be looked at by any one interested, and if it is examined it will be seen that again while there is innuendo and insinuation by the way in which sentences are put together, there is no specific allegation of any wrong-doing; there are simply statements of fact which probably are perfectly true, and it is only by the collocation of them in the manner in which the writer has placed them that any injurious meaning is conveyed by the article in question. The Minister of the Interior, so far as he has redress by legal proceeding in any court, was left as perfectly helpless, notwithstanding the statements in the Toronto 'World' in which his name was used, as he was when the original article appeared in the 'Telegram.'

The only remedy to be thought of for a public man in such a position, was to demand his right that there should be an inquiry into this matter at the hands of a committee of this House. That course the hon. gentleman has promptly taken. The only point of difference at this stage of the matter that I am able to understand is as to the terms of the reference to the committee. Every member, I presume, is agreed in thinking that, after what has happened, a committee ought to be appointed with power to take evidence under oath and to investigate this thing. The question is what should be referred to that committee. I fully concede the handsome spirit in which this matter has been treated to-day by hon. gentlemen opposite so far as I have been able to follow their observations. I am well assured in my own mind that no one in this House, no matter how strong his political feeling may be, desires to pry into a man's private affairs unnecessarily. It is not a matter of individual curiosity, it is not a matter of one of ourselves satisfying his own mind on this subject, but it is a matter of exposing private business affairs to the public knowledge. The 'Telegram' newspaper has purported to publish as its evidence of these transactions what is called a photograph of something, a photograph of the evidence. It has been stated in other newspapers since that photograph appeared that it is not a photograph of the bank account of the Minister of the Interior at the Bank at Edmonton. I have seen the statement that the head officer of the Imperial Bank has so declared, and I think there is certain evidence of that kind upon this photograph of the document. It will be noticed at any rate if any one examines the photograph of the document that the date of that $19,000 transaction is said to be 1909, and notwithstanding the statement, or the appearance on the photograph of the figures 1909 as being the date of that transaction, the whole point of the matter in the various newspapers, so far as that transaction is concerned, has been that it was money used in the general elections of 1908. I think that circumstance demonstrates that the photograph is probably, while a true photograph, not the photograph of an authentic document, and I think that the probabilities will corroborate the statement attributed to the cashier of the bank that this is not a photograph of a bank account. It does not look on the face of it like the work which would appear on a ledger page of a bank, and my theory is in that regard that certainly the bank or any official of the bank would never make public unnecessarily the business of one of its customers. My supposition is that some one has surreptitiously stolen a copy of the account, in other words has sought to make a copy of some ledger account appearing in the books of the bank at Edmonton, and has not copied correctly.

The photograph, of course, does not lie, but the document which has been photographed I feel no doubt is not any page of any ledger of a bank. That, however, is a matter of detail into which I did not intend to digress. I want to say merely this: This account, while it is a private account of the Minister of the Interior, is not his private account in the ordinary sense of the word. It is an account in trust, he is trustee for other persons unnamed and unknown. Is it a matter of mystery that, in connection with some trust estate, a large payment may be made, or large disbursements paid out? It is not at any rate an unusual thing in the handling of many trust accounts. This circumstance, perhaps, increases the difficulty of the position in which the Minister of the Interior finds himself. He is obliged, in a sense, to formulate the charge. He comes before the House and he says to the House: The only specific thing which is here is the collocation of these circumstances in the articles which appeared in the Toronto 'World' by which the ground appears to be laid for an inference or a supposition that the two things are connected, and that I got this money for something connected with the administration of my department; that because 600,000 acres of land was given in Saskatchewan instead of Manitoba to the Canadian Northern railway, and because that was done upon my recommendation as Minister of the Interior, then this $50,000 which came to my account four months afterwards was connected with it and was the result of it. It is perfectly true that he puts those two things together. That is only doing what the mind, perhaps, of every reader would have done the moment his eye ran over the article. It is perfectly true that no man in this House has made any such suggestion. But I ask hon. gentlemen to consider what was the Minister of the Interior to do. Has he not, in putting those two things together in the statement which he made to this House yesterday, stated as fairly as words can state it, the gist of what is insinuated or suggested by the article in the 'World' newspaper? If he has not, if any one has any suggestion of omission or variation in that regard, I am perfectly sure, from what I know of my hon. friend, that it is one he would be very willing to receive. That is the only thing in the nature of a specific charge which has appeared in any way before this House, or anywhere, from first to last, in connection with this matter, and accordingly that is incorporated in the terms of the resolution proposed by the First Minister.

Now, it is the first right of any person who is accused that he should know something specifically of what it is he has to answer. More than that, it is the first right surely of the committee of investigation that it should have, with some reasonable accuracy defined before it that which it has to inquire into. In this case the question for consideration now is properly, as it has been put by hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House, whether a specific thing, which is the only thing specific that can be framed or deduced from the newspaper articles which have appeared, should be the subject of investigation, or whether the matter should go at large pitchforked before a committee of this House, for that committee to inquire whether or not the hon. gentleman is a grafter or a boodler. I think that position only has to be stated to show its unfairness. No one in this House is making any charge, or is desirous of so doing, so far as I understand; no one outside the House is doing so. In those circumstances, can there be any doubt as to the course which this House ought to take in referring this matter to the committee?

Mr. SPROULE. Does not the Minister of Justice regard the charge in the letter read to the House by the First Minister, as a specific charge in connection with which Mr. McGillicuddy said he had the documents and letters and photographs to prove it?

Sir ALLEN AYLESWORTH. I may say that the charge is not in any way a specific charge made before this House, upon the responsibility of Mr. McGillicuddy, even, leaving out of consideration altogether the fact that he is an entire outsider so far as this House is concerned. No member of this House would take the responsibility of repeating that charge. It is in fact nothing more than the general charge which I have referred to, that this man is a grafter and a boodler, and unworthy of a position in the cabinet.

Mr. E. GUSS PORTER (West Hastings). If the House is to take the Minister of the Interior at his word, and we are bound to do so, I cannot understand why so much concern should be exercised by other hon. members of the government to prevent the inquiry which the hon. the Minister of the Interior says he is perfectly willing should take place. There is an inconsistency there which it seems to me calls for some specific answer on the part of the Minister of the Interior. If I understand the Minister of the Interior correctly, he said that he courted the fullest inquiry into any public act of his during the six years that he had occupied the position of Minister of the Interior. This charge that has been made, as I understand it, is a charge against the Minister of the Interior in his public capacity, and not a charge against him as a private individual at all. Now the Minister of Justice, in his remarks he made upon this question, stated that the Minister of the Interior was obliged to formulate a charge against himself; that the newspaper article appearing in the Toronto' World' was the only charge before the House, and that the Minister of the Interior had a right to know what he was charged with. With those statements I beg to take most direct issue. The article, as I understand it, appearing in the 'World' newspaper was nothing more than a repetition—in fact it did not amount quite to that—a reference to the direct charge that had been made to the right hon. the First Minister himself by Mr. McGillicuddy during the interviews he had with that gentleman. It is idle to say that the Minister of the Interior is obliged to formulate a charge upon an insinuation. There is not an insinuation contained in the article in the 'World' newspaper. They do not insinuate that the Minister of the Interior has been guilty of any particular offence, but they make reference to the facts that had been declared before the Prime Minister himself.

If theMinister of the Interior is as anxious as he says that there should be a full investigation of the charge, if there is any charge against him, then it seems to me that he needs to go no further than the interviews which took place between Mr. McGillicuddy and the Prime Minister. There is no uncertainty about the charge.

The charge is there made clearly and distinctly. The minister is charged with being a boodler and grafter, not a boodler and grafter in private life, but a boodler and grafter in public life in connection with these two sums appearing in his bank account, the $50,000 and the $19,300. There is a direct and specific charge and, as has already been pointed out, the Prime Minister himself considered that that was a specific and definite charge against his minister. In the interest of the country the right hon. gentleman thought it his duty to bring it before this parliament. He did not undertake that responsibility or duty without having some evidence before him, and the gentleman who had preferred the charge to the First Minister offered to submit the proof by which he could establish the charge of grafting and boodling against his minister. When evidence is laid before any member of this House, without making any special reference to the right hon. gentleman himself, that is considered sufficient to prove a charge of boodling and grafting against another hon. member of this House, I conceive it to be the duty of any member before whom that evidence is laid, to take the responsibility, just as the right hon. gentleman did, of bringing the matter to the attention of the House. When the right hon. gentleman had a thorough opportunity of viewing that evidence, when the charge was made direct and when he saw fit, in the discharge of his duty, to bring the matter before the House, I think the scope of this inquiry should be wide enough to cover the charge that was made and the evidence that was offered to be submitted.

We have in this case a very remarkable situation. We have, on the one hand, a gentleman who interviewed the Prime Minister saying that he has evidence in his possession which he is ready and willing to submit, and which will be sufficient to prove the Minister of the Interior guilty of the charges to which I have referred. There is no answer to make to that charge. There is no offer in this motion to investigate that charge. The only answer that is made at all is the retort by the Minister of the Interior himself, when he is called a boodler and a grafter, that the man who says that is a thug and a blackmailer. There are the two questions—a boodler and grafter on the one hand, and a thug and blackmailer on the other. It is proposed to settle this question by a reference to a special committee appointed by this government to say whether the Minister of the Interior, in a certain transaction in connection with the Canadian Northern railway, received a certain sum of money or not. The Minister of Justice was quite right when he used the expression that it was just a question here as to how far the motion should be limited. The government have gone to the full extreme, in the motion offered by the Prime Minister himself, when they limit the inquiry in the way in which they do. My hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. Borden, Halifax), has proposed that this motion be amended to such an extent as to permit of the investigation, not of any insinuation, but of the direct charge of which proof has been offered. He has appealed to the right hon. gentleman himself to open it wide enough to admit that evidence, and if it is true, and if it establishes the guilt of the Minister of the Interior, then the consequences must follow. But, if, on the other hand the evidence is not sufficient to establish that charge then the minister goes free and there will be no one in this House happier than myself, because of my personal relations with him, if the minister is acquitted of the charge which has been made against him. But, so long as the position taken by the minister himself is allowed to prevail, I cannot but think that this country, as well as this parliament, will believe that there is something in the situation that it is the desire of the government to hide and to prevent the country from fully knowing.

Mr. W. S. MIDDLEBRO (North Grey). This is a trouble which has arisen within the domestic ranks of the Liberal party, and up to the present time the opposition have in no way interfered with it. But the right hon. Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) thought that there had been sufficient allegations against one of his ministers to justify him in bringing the matter to the attention of the House. The hon. Minister of Justice (Sir Allen Aylesworth) argued for a considerable length of time this afternoon for the purpose of proving that neither the 'World' newspaper nor the 'Telegram,' published in the city of Toronto, contained any direct charge or allegation against the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Oliver), that neither of these two papers contained any assertion which could by any manner of means be construed as a libel. If such were the case, why is it that the Prime Minister of his own action is proposing, in a resolution in this House, a committee for the purpose of investigating something against the Minister of the Interior? It appears to me at any rate that the reason he does that is because a certain gentleman of his own Liberal persuasion came to him and made certain allegations to him in private which were sufficient to justify him, apart from the newspaper allegations altogether, to bring the matter to the attention of the House. The Prime Minister having done that for the first time now asks us to consent to something. He asks us to consent to the nomination of a tribunal for the purpose of trying the charges which were made to him by Mr. McGillicuddy. I would like to ask the Prime Minister here if he would give us the assurance now that the powers of the committee are wide and broad enough to enable it to call upon Mr. McGillicuddy to give the same evidence which he gave, or tendered, to the Prime Minister. If the Prime Minister does not do that it is proof conclusive that he does not expect, and does not intend that this House shall have the same opportunity for investigating the charges which were made to him by Mr. McGillicuddy against the Minister of the Interior that he himself had. There seems to be no answer to that, as the Prime Minister does not reply. Perhaps the Prime Minister will tell us? If he will give us the assurance that the committee which he is appointing now will have full power to investigate and receive the evidence of Mr. McGillicuddy as it was presented to him, or as it was tendered to him. As the Prime Minister does not answer, I see that the Prime Minister does not intend to give us any such opportunity, that he does not intend us to look at the original bank account of which we have seen a photograph, which is the most positive proof we have, although, as the Minister of the Interior himself said, he could, if he chose, allow us to go into his bank books and clear himself, but that he did not intend to do so. If he does not intend to do that he knows that the scope of this resolution is not broad enough to allow Mr. McGillicuddy, or to allow the committee, to produce the evidence which might clear up the matter. I have not had very much experience in parliamentary life, but I would think that if I had a bank book showing $20,000 and $50,000 deposits, I would certainly know where the money came from, and if a charge were made against me in a public newspaper, published in Ontario, accompanied by facsimiles of the bank book, or what are supposed to be facsimiles of the original, showing these deposits, it would be a very simple matter to show where the money came from.

The Minister of Justice says that the fact that the account is marked as a trust account makes it more difficult for the Minister of the Interior to tell where the money came from. There may be more truth in that assertion than we think, and perhaps if we knew the names of the beneficiaries of the trust it would place the matter in a different light than it now presents itself in. Looking at it from the standpoint of the Minister of the Interior, I think I am safe in saying that if this resolution passes, judging by the stand taken by the Minister of the Interior and the Prime Minister, we will not have power to investigate the bank book and therefore, we will not have power to investigate the gravamen of the charge, that two sums of money were received and disbursed by the Minister of the Interior for purposes which were not in accord with the honest discharge of the duties of a minister of the Crown. It would be a very simple matter to allow the committee to investigate whether or not the charges which were read by the Prime Minister are true, and which charges were thought to be of sufficient importance by the Prime Minister himself, to, on his own initiative, bring them to the attention of the House, especially in view of the fact that his own Minister of Justice has said that nothing which was contained in the newspaper statement constituted a libel or a reflection on the Minister of the Interior. Therefore, in bringing the matter into the House the Prime Minister must have had in mind what had been told him by Mr. McGillicuddy, when making the charge.

Mr. E. A. LANCASTER (Lincoln and Niagara). I rise principally to protest against the doctrine, if you call it a doctrine, laid down by the Minister of Justice. I do not know whether the Minister of Justice thinks he was expounding a principle of responsible government which people hold dear in this country, but I did notice that as soon as he delivered his oration or special plea he left the chamber apparently not caring what any one else thought about it. The Minister of Justice has practically undertaken to say that the Minister of the Interior does not know what he is talking about, and he is not satisfied with the statement made by the Minister of the Interior. I was satisfied with it to a certain extent, but I was sorry that the Minister of the Interior did not give the country the hope, by accepting the amendment of the leader of the opposition, that everything was all right with him. I think he should have persuaded his leader, that, in his own interest, the amendment of the leader of the opposition should be accepted. I am assuming at present that the Minister of the Interior is able to clear himself, but unless the inquiry has the scope which the leader of the opposition calls for, it will be impossible for the Minister of the Interior to clear himself either in the House or in the country. If the Minister of the Interior so acts that the people must infer that he is afraid of something, coming out he can only blame himself if people draw the inference that he is guilty. The Minister of Justice thinks that the position taken by the Minister of the Interior is not the safest one for him to take. I do not know whether the Minister of Justice, acting as personal counsel for the Minister of the Interior, advised him to take the position he took to-day, but evidently he is not quite satisfied with that position. The Minister of the Interior told us that his only reason for declining the amendment of the leader of the opposition was that he did not propose that his private bank account should be inquired into for the satisfaction of a thug or a blackmailer. He gives the House to understand that in his humble judgment the bank account in question was a private matter that nobody but himself was concerned in. The Minister of Justice, however, pays him the poor compliment of thinking that is not true, and he points out that on the face of it it is a trust account, and, notwithstanding that it is being advertised in the public press as evidence to show that the Minister of the Interior is a grafter and a boodler, the Minister of Justice undertakes to say that the fact that it is a trust account, and not a private account, is a reason for refusing investigation. The Minister of Justice is the legal adviser of the government, but judging by the breaks he has recently made I have not much hope that the Minister of Justice will ever increase the moral tone or the high standing of cabinet ministers in this country. I regret that the Minister of the Interior has fallen into the unfortunate position of listening to the advice of the Minister of Justice. If the Minister of the Interior can clear himself, as he says he can, then it would have been better for him to act on his own judgment, and to have accepted the amendment of the leader of the opposition. If the Minister of the Interior insists on selecting the issue on which he should be tried, he must expect the people of Canada to think that he is more guilty than I hope he is, and, than at the present moment I believe he is. Knowing the Minister of the Interior as I do, I think he is making a great mistake. I do not want to lose faith in his honour or ability to conduct the affairs of this country as well as any one belonging to his political party can be expected to. I had hoped that he would place himself in a position which would lead us to believe he was innocent, but by adopting the argument of the Minister of Justice, he forces us to think, to use the words of the Minister of Justice, that he should be treated as if he were on trial for a criminal offence. The Minister of Justice contends that he should have certain particulars given to him of what he is charged with, just as if the Minister of the Interior did not know all about it, before any of us on this side knew. Surely the Prime Minister told him what Mr. McGillicuddy said about him, and is not that a complete answer to the suggestion of the Minister of Justice, that nobody knew who was the cabinet minister alleged to be guilty. The Prime Minister knew and it was because the Prime Minister knew, that the matter came before the House at all. The Minister of Justice was disputing the statement of the Minister of the Interior and of the Prime Minister when he led us to infer that he himself does not know from the newspaper articles what minister is accused.

Nobody believes that any one is accused other than the minister whom the Prime Minister mentioned when he brought this matter up in the House. The Minister of Justice does not seriously think that any other member of the cabinet to which he belongs is accused, and it is idle for him to contend that any want of particulars exists, or that the minister accused and everybody else in this House does not know exactly what the charge is and what the investigation is required about. When the Minister of Justice undertakes to say that the Minister of the Interior should be treated as a criminal in any court is, and is entitled to particulars, if he wants to put the matter on that basis, I would point out to him that after the minister has pleaded and said he is not guilty it is altogether too late to ask for particulars. He knows all about what he is charged with, and says he could clear it up by going into the box and giving evidence. But he prefers to stand mute and not tell, and the Minister of Justice says he is not obliged to tell because it has not been put down in black and white exactly what he is charged with. I repeat that the Minister of Justice knows, and the Prime Minister knows; and the Minister of Justice is really finding fault with the Prime Minister for bringing this matter into the House without apparently knowing what the charge was. The Minister of Justice has simply tried to find some technical excuse for preventing an inquiry in regard to the money which the Minister of the Interior is alleged to have handled. If the Minister of Justice wants to have the laws administered properly and investigations carried on in the interest of the people, he ought to have taken a position the very opposite of what he did. I cannot help comparing his stand with the stand taken by ministers of justice like Sir John Thompson in matters of this kind. The Minister of Justice is evidently bound to prevent any investigation that will prevent a recurrence of offences on the part of ministers of the Crown, preferring to leave them in a position where they will be liable to temptation to do what they should not do, because those whom the Minister of the Interior characterizes as thugs and blackmailers can say, 'we can go on and try to do all the evil we can because we have a Minister of Justice who says there will not be any investigation and, therefore, we will not have to go to jail.' That is the position. People who wish to approach ministers of the Crown with a view to corrupting them will be encouraged to do so by the doctrine of the Minister of Justice, because they know that no matter whether they succeed or fail, the Minister of Justice is going at all hazards to attempt to throttle all investigation and prevent the truth coming out. That is the position of the Minister of Justice in supporting the feeble attempt of the Prime Minister to find a reason for rejecting the amendment of the hon. leader of the opposition. The Minister of Justice knows that the Minister of the Interior is charged with having received in round figures $70,000 from some improper source for some improper purposes, and the only way to have that matter cleared up is for the Minister of the Interior to tell the whole truth about it. It does not do for the Minister of the Interior to say that because he does not want to give to the thug or the blackmailer the satisfaction of knowing where he got that money, he is not going to give the evidence, but is going to trust the majority in the House of Commons, led by the Prime Minister, with the Minister of Justice supporting him, to vote down the motion for having all the facts laid before the people, so that the people could see whether he was justified in doing what he has done or not. I regret exceedingly, as a friend of the Minister of the Interior, that he does not accept the proposition of the hon. leader of the opposition. It will be the worst thing he will ever have done as a public man if he allows this matter to go as suggested by the Minister of Justice.

Mr. J. D. TAYLOR (New Westminster). Mr. Speaker, before the House is asked to pronounce upon the resolution before it, for an investigation limited to the article which appeared in the Toronto 'World,' I would like to call attention to several manifest inaccuracies in that article, which show it to be so slipshod in its composition that to go through the form of solemnly investigating it would be simply farcical. I refer more particularly to the concluding paragraph as printed in the official record of yesterday, where it says:

> The exact date was October 3, 1907. About one year later, just before the general election of 1908, the sum of $19,000 was deposited from the Manhattan Bank in the name of Mr. Oliver at the Imperial Bank at Edmonton. It is known that he chequed out this money for campaign purposes.

Now, the article upon which this 'World' despatch is based shows that in these seven lines there are three glaring errors of fact. In the first place, it was not one year later, just before the general election of 1908, that the sum of $19,000 was paid; but it was two years later, and nine months after the general election of 1908. In the next place, it was not deposited from the Manhattan Bank in the name of Mr. Oliver; but, as the photograph shows, it was sent from Ottawa to the bank. In the third place, it is not known that he checked out that money for campaign purposes, because the photograph of the account shows that that money was checked out month by month during nine months of the year 1910 when there was no campaign in progress. Now, it seems to me extraordinary that in view of these inaccuracies, that that one despatch, of all the matter published in this connection, should be picked out as the matter to be investigated. It is extraordinary that this should be suggested, in view of the statement by the minister himself that he is perfectly willing to have all his official transactions placed in the limelight. We are asked to put on the limitation that the person particularly concerned, according to his statement here today, has no desire to have placed on the investigation.

I am, Mr. Speaker, particularly concerned in this connection because of a rumour which I heard in the corridors of this House yesterday. This rumour is to the effect that Mr. Dan McGillicuddy, the informant in this connection, has stated in Ottawa that this $19,000 was paid in connection with a transaction in my own riding. I presume that if he made that statement to other persons in this city, he must have made it to the right hon. the Prime Minister in some one of his several interviews with him. That transaction was not connected in any way with the Canadian Northern railway or swamp lands of Manitoba or lands in Saskatchewan. It has no connection whatever with anything that has been mentioned in this House. I wish that the right hon. the Prime Minister were in his seat now so that he could say whether or not this information was given him by Mr. McGillicuddy, whether or not the fact has slipped his mind, and whether, upon its being recalled to him, it makes any difference to him in the limitation which he seeks to put on this inquiry.

Mr. OLIVER. Might I interrupt the hon. gentleman? I do not know to what transaction he refers, but that does not make any difference. If he will be good enough later on to inform the right hon. the Prime Minister as to what particular transaction it is, I shall ask my right hon. leader to include that subject in the inquiry.

Mr. TAYLOR (New Westminster). That statement is very satisfactory to me, and I may say that it is what I would have expected from the hon. the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Oliver). I am very loathe indeed to have any part in this matter, and I would not have taken any part in it were it not that to be silent, after the information volunteered to me yesterday, would be apt to be misunderstood by the electors whom I represent. I would like to add, however, in consequence of the limitation which the minister has suggested to place upon the scope of the inquiry, that I would not be satisfied to judge this question on the point as to whether or not the transaction I have indicated was one which could be justified in the public interest. The protest against it is that it was of a very harsh character, confiscating the rights of a community on behalf of a private corporation. That matter is before the courts now, and I do not wish to go into it at any length, but would simply say that I understand the defence to be that the transaction was in the end in the public interest. Now it is not sufficient for me to be told that it is in the public interest if it can be established that at the same time as this transaction occurred—and the dates are almost identical—a very large sum was paid into any fund of which the minister was made the trustee by the beneficiaries of that transaction. I think that the scope of the inquiry should be enlarged to show not only whether or not that transaction was in the public interest, but whether the beneficiaries did make a payment of this kind. I would suggest further that a minister of the Crown, in a matter of this kind, occupies another position than that of a colleague of the Prime Minister. I would suggest that he is also an adviser of the Governor General, and that His Excellency is entitled to other information than can be conveyed to him by a resolution of this House refusing this or any inquiry, and that, in my humble judgment, it is the prerogative of a member or members of this House to directly address His Excellency in a matter affecting the honour of one of his advisers.

Mr. OLIVER. I have suggested to my hon. friend that he should specify to the Prime Minister the matter which he wishes to have investigated so that it might be included, in this motion.

Mr. FOSTER. I think it necessary, under the circumstances, that the Prime Minister should be here before we vote. The Finance Minister can send out for him.

Mr. TAYLOR (New Westminster). Now that the right hon. the Prime Minister has returned to his seat, I might be permitted to mention the matter which my hon. friend the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Oliver) has asked to be included in the scope of the investigation. It is this. I stated that information was given me in the corridors of this House yesterday that Mr. Daniel McGillicuddy had said that the second deposit, photographed in the reproduction of the bank account, related to a matter in my own riding. I said that this deposit was coincident with the date of a confiscation of certain property there, and the award of that property to other parties, which matter is before the courts. I said that I did not wish to go into it further than to say that I understood the defence in court by the minister to be that the transaction was in its outcome in the public interest. I said also that this was outside the limitation which the Prime Minister wants to put upon the inquiry, whereupon my hon. friend the Minister of the Interior said he was willing that all his official acts should be brought into the lime light and judged on their merits, and is willing that this particular transaction should be included in the inquiry. I ask the right hon. gentleman whether he would also widen the scope so that this transaction should be included and be judged, not only on the point whether or not it was in the public interest, but whether it be proper that a minister of the Crown should accept under trust—if he did, as rumour says, and I do not vouch for it—concurrently with a transaction of that kind, even though the transaction be shown to be in the public interest ; accept under trust a large sum of money from the beneficiaries by it. It was suggested to me that the Prime Minister might permit that subject to be included in the scope of the inquiry.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. This is a very long statement, and rather involved; I do not know that I understood it accurately, and I would understand it better if I saw it in writing. My hon. friend can make it the subject of a substantive motion of his own.

Mr. TAYLOR (New Westminster). I would remind the First Minister that I premised my statement to the House with the suggestion that the First Minister had already obtained this information from Mr. Daniel McGillicuddy, because I do not think Mr. McGillicuddy would state in one office in town what he would not state in seven interviews in the Prime Minister's office.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. That matter?

Mr. TAYLOR (New Westminster). Yes.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Never heard of it until this day.

Mr. TAYLOR (New Westminster). And as to the statement in writing, of course when we come back at eight o'clock there will be available to the First Minister the 'Hansard' report of what I said to the House.

House divided on amendment of Mr. Borden (Halifax).

Amendment negatived.

At six o'clock, House took recess.

After Recess.

House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. HAUGHTON LENNOX (South Simcoe). Before you proceed further with the motion before the Chair, I wish to call attention to the matter very briefly, and I propose to end with an amendment to the motion moved by the First Minister. I listened attentively to the whole argument, and particularly to the argument advanced by the Prime Minister. Notwithstanding his great skill, I failed to find that the propositions he advanced were convincing, and it seemed to me that the Prime Minister, whether intentionally or otherwise, was grasping at a shadow and avoiding the substance of the difficulty presented to the House. He pointed out that the article that appeared in the 'World' did not at most amount to more than an insinuation. I daresay that is true. The item in the 'World' is merely a comment upon a very distinct and specific charge made in the 'Telegram'; and whilst it may be true, as the Prime Minister says, that what appears in the 'World' is shadowy and indefinite, there is no difficulty about the main article upon which that comment rests. What I would ask the government to do is, not to investigate a comment, not to investigate a mere guess by a newspaper, perhaps one of many guesses made by newspapers throughout Canada, but to investigate the specific charge made against a minister of the Crown. This charge is made definitely in two ways. In the first place, Mr. McGillicuddy went to the Prime Minister and made a definite and clear charge against the Minister of the Interior, made a specific and grave charge against him and demanded an investigation. That matter is before the House, first, by reason of the subsequent publication of it in the 'Telegram,' and secondly, by the statement of the First Minister to the House the other day. As regards the statement of the First Minister, I submit that the whole item appearing in the 'Telegram' was placed before the House by the First Minister, if not by actually reading the whole of it, by reference to it, and, therefore, incorporating it in what he said to the House. So we have this fact upon the statement of the Prime Minister, that a gentleman made a charge against one of his ministers of a very grave offence, and asked for an investigation. The minister in referring to that, therefore, incorporates it, and puts the House in possession of that circumstance. What the Prime Minister says that no name was disclosed in the 'Telegram,' is irrelevant. When Mr. McGillicuddy went to the Prime Minister there was nothing indefinite about who was spoken of. He charged this matter against the Minister of the Interior, mentioning him by name. The First Minister admitted he knew who was being attacked, and he said to Mr. McGillicuddy, I have confidence in my colleague, I will believe in his innocence, and will continue to believe in his innocence until he is proven guilty. That is the position of the matter to-day. So we have a clear and definite charge against the Minister of the Interior by a responsible newspaper in the city of Toronto, made in temperate and guarded language, clearly identified by the subsequent events as to the hon. gentleman to whom it refers, and setting forth in the article the photograph of the bank account, showing that a large sum of money had been actually handled in a way that is not yet accounted for, and we ask that if there is an investigation, it shall not be merely an investigation into a guess by a newspaper, to wit, the 'World,' but that it shall be a bona fide, honest and complete investigation into the source of this money, to ascertain whether the source is an honest one or not.

Now we are not without experience in this House of similar farcical investigations. In the case of the Hodgins investigation, we urged the government to give us a wider scope than they were willing to give us, we urged them to do that in the interest of the public. The First Minister refused, and we had a perfectly farcical investigation as a result, and in the end we were told that everything in regard to the Transcontinental railway was proved to be all right. We had another investigation along somewhat similar lines in the Lumsden charges, narrowed down in the House, narrowed down more completely in the committee, resulting in another statement by a committee of this House that everything was all right. We have the fact that, notwithstanding these two certificates by a committee of this House, upwards of half a milion dollars of over classification, and for over-break and matters of that kind has been disclosed by the gentlemen subsequently appointed, in part at all events, by the government. So we will go on in the same way if the First Minister pursues the same tactics, we will have this farcical investigation, and no practical result will follow. This is a little worse than anything we have had yet in this respect. We start out with an absolutely clear proposition that the government proposes to investigate something that can lead to no result whatever, investigate a mere comment by a newspaper, while we refuse to investigate what it is important to find out, namely, the source from which this money came, what were the purposes to which it was applied, to ascertain whether it was or was not applied to any proper purpose. We have no desire to pry into the private concerns of a minister of the Crown, but in the public interest it is necessary that this matter should be thoroughly investigated. I, therefore, move that all the words after 'that' be left out and the following be substituted therefor:

A Royal Commission do issue for the purpose of inquiring and reporting whether the two sums of $50,000 and $19,350, or thereabouts, alleged to have been deposited to the credit of the Hon. Mr. Oliver, the Minister of the Interior, in a bank at Edmonton, in or about the month of October, 1907, and in the month of December, 1909, were received or obtained by the said the Hon. Mr. Oliver in such manner, under such circumstances or from such sources as would render the said minister's acceptance thereof prejudicial to the public interest.

Mr. A. MEIGHEN (Portage la Prairie). Mr. Speaker, before the question is put, I wish to state the position assumed by myself with regard to the amendment and the previous amendment offered by my hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. Borden, Halifax). In the first place, I am utterly unable to understand what is the general attitude of the government towards charges of this kind appearing in newspapers or otherwise. The hon. Minister of Justice (Sir Allen Aylesworth) has stated that when the 'World's' statement appeared as it did, setting side by side two facts, and leaving the inference that they afforded an explanation of the source of the money that appeared to have been placed to the credit of the hon. Minister of the Interior (Mr. Oliver), the only course open to the Minister of the Interior was to demand an investigation. I have sat long enough in the House to recall a similar state of affairs where the complaints were much more marked not more than two sessions ago. I recall that at that time an hon. member of the cabinet was not only charged in a public document but was found guilty by a judicial tribunal of an offence certainly as great as any contemplated on the present occasion, but I cannot recall that on that occasion upon which the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Pugsley) was charged with malfeasance in connection with his public duty, that the Minister of Justice promulgated any such doctrine as he now holds to be good. He does not appear to have made the suggestion to his colleague on that occasion that he has now made before the Minister of the Interior. It may quite well be that the mere fact that large sums appear to the credit of the bank account of a member of the cabinet is not of itself sufficient foundation for demanding an investigation as to where these moneys came from. Suppose we assume that that is the case, then what is the explanation of the action taken by the right hon. Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) some three days ago? The Prime Minister took the position that such evidence as had been adduced was sufficient for him to make it a public question in this House. That being the case, the whole question was laid open. We are in this position: A newspaper since that time has offered the suggestion that possibly these moneys came from a certain source. The Minister of the Interior says that that requires an investigation. How far is he going to go? Supposing to-morrow another newspaper says that possibly they can trace the origin of that money back to the old days of the timber steals; will the minister have another investigation and inquire as to the correctness of that charge? Then, perhaps another newspaper out in our country will offer a still further suggestion, and I have no doubt he will be able to excite curiosity sufficiently to inquire whether or not these moneys had still another relation to something else in the history of the administration of this government. The minister will be bound, on the very doctrine he has himself laid down, to conduct successive investigations to inquire into every successive guess of every newspaper published in Canada. If we are going to investigate at all, let us have an investigation that has some chance of finality. Let us have one that means something and that will end the question once and for all. If there is nothing to investigate then do not investigate at all. If we are going to offend the dignity of parliament by a logical, sensible, final investigation, surely we will offend it infinitely more by a purely farcical attempt to probe into this case. The Prime Minister has utterly taken the ground from under the position that otherwise would have disclosed some merit taken by the Minister of the Interior. If we are going to do anything let us do something that means something and that will give satisfaction to the country and will, if the Minister of the Interior is right, result in clearing his skirts. I am quite sure there is no special venom on this side of the House towards the minister. I may say there is rather a disposition to believe that if these moneys can be traced to an unclean source it will speak loudly against the character of the government in general perhaps rather than against his own. It seems to me that no greater guilt will be traced to his door than to the door of his colleagues. Therefore, I say, for the good of all concerned, let us have an investigation, not only covering the record of his own department, not only inquiring whether or not the moneys were connected with any certain act of administration of the Department of the Interior, but get at the source, whatever it was, and see whether or not these moneys had anything to do with the general record of the government in the handling of election campaigns and other such business. That is the position I take. If I might presume, let me say this: There is considerable in what the minister says that the mere fact that a bank account shows rather startling credits may not be sufficient to found a parliamentary investigation upon. That may all be, but the Prime Minister has said in this House that these credits have been brought before him in such a way and with the support of evidence that he deems the matter worthy of the attention of parliament. That being the case, the attention of parliament can only properly be called to it and parliament can efficiently exercise its function only by a full investigation. The attention of parliament produces no good result by the kind of investigation that is now proposed. So that, whatever force there would be in the Minister's position is lost; he is robbed of it by the action of the First Minister. Having been so robbed of it he placed himself in the utterly false position of saying that a mere suggestion by a newspaper as to the probable source of the moneys so placed in his credit is sufficient to found an investigation upon to find whether or not that is a lucky guess. That position, to my mind, is utterly untenable, because it would force the minister and parliament to pursue the same course on each subsequent occasion and follow an interminable series of investigations into the mere vagrant guesses of one irresponsible party or another. Therefore, it appears to me that it is the duty of the House to support this amendment as it was the duty of the House to support the other.

House divided on amendment (Mr. Lennox).

Amendment (Mr. Lennox), negatived.

Main motion agreed to.

SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES.

Mr. FIELDING presented a message from His Excellency the Governor General, transmitting supplementary estimates for the year ending March 31, 1911, which on motion, were referred to Committee of Supply.

BANKING AND COMMERCE COMMITTEE.

Mr. MILLER moved that the Select Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce be granted leave to sit while the House is in session.

Mr. HENDERSON. Does the quorum still remain at twenty-one, or has it been reduced?

Mr. MILLER. The House has been asked to reduce the quorum, but has not consented, and the quorum remains at twenty-one. Several meetings have been called, and we have not been able to proceed with business, because of the lack of a quorum.

Motion agreed to.

NAVAL CONSTRUCTION.

Mr. F. D. MONK. Tenders for the construction of cruisers were to have been in yesterday and opened to-day at noon. I wish to ask: who has tendered; do the tenders cover cruisers, or cruisers and destroyers as well; what are the amounts of the tenders; what action, if any, has the government taken upon these tenders?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I understand that tenders have been received and opened; they will be laid on the table of the House in due time.

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND SUPREME COURT.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I wish to ask the Prime Minister if an appointment has been made to the Supreme Court bench of Prince Edward Island, and if so who has been appointed?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Action has been taken, but I am not in a position to say who has been appointed. The information will be in next Saturday's 'Gazette.'

ST. PETER'S CANAL.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I call the attention of the Minister of Railways (Mr. Graham), to a question put on the first of May by the hon. member for Colchester, and the answer given by the minister (Page 8266 unrevised 'Hansard.')

Mr. STANFIELD:

1. Is it the intention of the government to construct a new canal at St. Peter's, Cape Breton? If so, when is the work to be commenced?

2. Is the old canal to be abandoned? If so, for what reason?

3. What is the estimated cost of the proposed new canal?

Mr. GRAHAM.—$150,000 has been voted by parliament for this work. The details have not yet been decided on. It is estimated that the entire cost of the work will be in the vicinity of $300,000.

There appears to have been no answer given to the second part of the question as to whether the old canal is to be abandoned, and if so, for what reason? Will the minister be good enough to supplement his answer?

Mr. GRAHAM. Whether the old canal can be enlarged or whether it would be wiser to construct a new canal is now under consideration by the department, and no decision has been arrived at as to the better method.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). What is the difficulty about using the present canal?

Mr. GRAHAM. I have been informed that if we repair the old canal it would be necessary to close it for a year, and that would be a serious matter.

PUBLIC WORKS DEPARTMENT—TRAVELLING EXPENSES.

Mr. TAYLOR (Leeds). When will the Minister of Public Works bring down the return with reference to the travelling expenses in his department?

Mr. PUGSLEY. The return asked for the expenses of the outside service as well as the inside service, and as there are many hundreds of employees in the department in all sections of the country, the accountant began with the outside service, and reported that it would take several months to complete it. As the returns from the other departments only included the inside service, I thought he had better prepare the return for that service, and that will be completed in the course of a few days.

ST. PETER'S INDIAN RESERVE.

Mr. OLIVER. I wish to offer an apology to my hon. friend from Selkirk. In view of the somewhat strenuous circumstances of to-day, I hope he will excuse my inability to answer his question, as I promised to yesterday. I will give him an answer to-morrow.

INTERNATIONAL JOINT CONTROL OF RATES.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. When will the treaty or agreement be laid on the table of the House, which has been arrived at between the United States and Canada respecting joint control of railway, express, telegraph and telephone rates? I understand such a treaty has been concluded.

Mr. GRAHAM. No such treaty has been concluded.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. Some time ago the minister informed the House that an agreement had been practically arrived at between the Chairman of the Canadian Railway Commission and the Chairman of the Interstate Commerce Commission and would be laid before the House. Has anything further been done?

Mr. GRAHAM. The member for South Simcoe asked the same question a short time ago, and what I said was that the Chairman of the Canadian Railway Board and the Chairman of the Interstate Commerce Commission had met and discussed details which had been reported to the two governments. Further than that, nothing has been done.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. It is alleged outside of the House that nothing further is being done until after the reciprocity agreement has been concluded.

Mr. GRAHAM. That might be alleged.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. Is there any good reason why the treaty should not be consummated now, before the reciprocity agreement?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I suppose I might answer that in the opinion of my hon. friend it might lead to annexation.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. Might I suggest that one reason why it is not brought down is that it will lead the people of this country to believe that it will tend towards annexation.

Mr. CURRIE (North Simcoe). On this same topic, I suppose the minister will have no objection to lay that report on the table, now that he has announced to the House that such a report has been made?

Mr. GRAHAM. Most assuredly we have an objection to laying the report on the table. It is a report made by the representatives of the two governments, and until the government takes action upon it, it would not be proper to lay it on the table.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. I read the details of this treaty in an American magazine six weeks ago. They seem to have in the United States all the details of this treaty, as they usually do of all treaties, while we are kept in the dark.

WAYS AND MEANS—RECIPROCAL TRADE WITH THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. FIELDING moved that the House again go into Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. TAYLOR (Leeds). Mr. Speaker, before you leave the Chair, I want to refer to the fact that last evening I purposed saying a few words in reference to the treaty that has been entered into between this government, and the United States government. Neither of the gentlemen who negotiated the treaty was present in the House, nor was the Prime Minister, who I presume was the chief mover in the whole arrangement.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I was here.

Mr. TAYLOR (Leeds). These three gentlemen were absent. I objected. I thought it was the duty of all of them to be present to defend the agreement which they had made, and to give information to hon. gentlemen on this side of the House at all times while this debate was going on. I inquired of the ministers in charge of the House. There appeared to be three of them—the hon. the Minister of Public Works, the hon. Minister of Inland Revenue, and the hon. Minister of Labour; and I said I did not purpose going on until some one of the trio was present. I said this:

> I think it is due when a gentleman is discussing this question that these ministers who made this bargain should be present. So far as I am concerned, I insist upon it. It is the right of gentlemen speaking to have these gentlemen present.
> Mr. PUGSLEY. I would be very sorry to say that to my hon. friend. I understand that my hon. friend the Minister of Finance will not be able to be present this evening, but I will send and find out. Perhaps my hon. friend will proceed, and I will send for him in the meantime.

From what the Minister of Public Works said about the Minister of Finance I understood that he was not well, and I immediately said that I would not expect him under the circumstances, but that I did expect the Minister of Customs and the Prime Minister. This morning I read in the morning 'Citizen' that the Minister of Finance was occupying a box at the Horse Show last night. That showed the interest that he took in attending to this pact. I went on with the discussion in the absence of the Minister of Customs; but after half an hour or so he came into the House feeling very sore about having been called out of his bed to come up here. He had gone home and gone quietly to bed, and had left this agreement to be taken care of without him, or the Minister of Finance, or the Prime Minister.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I was here the whole time.

Mr. TAYLOR (Leeds). Then I went on and referred to the fact that on the 6th of April the hon. member for Grenville (Mr. Reid) had made a speech with the Speaker in the Chair, and that after having made his speech, he placed on 'Hansard' some valuable statistics containing information that we could not get either from the Prime Minister, or from his diplomats who had gone to the United States to make this bargain. After the hon. member for Grenville had made his speech, the Minister of Customs said: 'I think it would be just as well to put a little appendix to the statement that will appear at length'. I stated then that it was my intention to perform a surgical operation upon that appendix, and to dissect it, and when I got through I thought the hon. Minister of Customs would regret having made the speech he did. Then I went on discussing his speech, and after a time the Chairman of the committee ruled me out of order. Now, Mr. Speaker, I want to know whether I am in order, with the Speaker in the Chair, to discuss a speech made by the Minister of Customs when the Speaker was in the Chair. I was ruled out of order last night because the Chairman said I was referring to a previous debate. If that ruling was correct, I certainly have a right to discuss the speech of the Minister of Customs now, and I purpose doing so.

Mr. SPROULE. It is difficult to perform a surgical operation with the patient absent.

Mr. TAYLOR (Leeds). I had it about half performed when I was called to order. This is what I read from 'Hansard' of the 6th of April:

Mr. PATERSON. I think, perhaps, it would be just as well to put a little appendix to the statement that will appear at length. I have no objection to it, in fact, I am rather pleased it has gone in. I was going to ask the hon. member what his object is in putting this in.

Mr. BARKER. If the hon. gentleman is pleased that they have gone in we need not waste time in discussing it.

Mr. PATERSON. The hon. gentleman attaches importance to it. What I meant to point out is that he has placed on 'Hansard' these tables that have taken a very long time to read. His object, I believe, is that this committee may come to an understanding as to the wisdom of this arrangement that has been made.

I quoted this last night, so I will not refer to it further.

Mr. SPEAKER. I have no objection to the hon. gentleman proceeding, but I would like some understanding to be reached. He is an old member of the House, and I would like him to remember these two rules, that he cannot refer to a previous debate, and that he cannot discuss the subject of reciprocity, which is now before the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. TAYLOR (Leeds). That was the statement made with the Speaker in the Chair. It cannot be out of order in both places—with the Speaker in the Chair and in Committee of the Whole. The speech was delivered with the Speaker in the Chair and in Committee of the Whole, and a cabinet minister cannot escape being criticised in either the one case or the other.

Mr. BELAND. Wait until next fall.

Mr. TAYLOR (Leeds). You do not purpose talking reciprocity until next fall, do you?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Hear, hear.

Mr. TAYLOR. I want to quote this statement taken from page 7032 of 'Hansard'. The minister said:

Oh, no. What did we do with the malt business, if you want a common sample of it? They had a duty on malt and they said that they wanted their interest guarded. What was done? We left our malt duty on just as it was in the tariff. The American duty was about two and a half times as high as ours, and we had the American government reduce their duty to our duty. So, it was with respect to other questions when they came up. We knew this, yet, these hon. gentlemen say that we do not know anything about it, that we went it blind. They have the information now; let us see all that would happen if these eggs and cheese and butter should be allowed in. Of eggs, 750,456 dozen came into this country. This is going to ruin the farmers! If you multiply the dozens by twelve that gives you 9,000,000 of eggs. Thus, every man, woman and child in this country will get an egg and an eighth a year. You asked for information! I am giving it to you and you will not believe it. We have heard about butter; 389,462 pounds of butter came into this Dominion not only from these twelve countries, but from all countries. I reduce it into ounces and I find that 6,231,392 ounces of butter came into this country—three-quarters of an ounce of butter for every man, woman and child in this country in a year! Now that you have that information, do you think it will help you to make up your mind whether you are in favour of this agreement or not? But there is another thing. The cheese industry is going to be ruined! 662,568 pounds of cheese coming into this country! This man Fielding went down there and had President Taft gold brick him!

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. PATERSON. Reduced to ounces it represents a little over 10,000,000. That is worse than the butter, because it is an ounce and a quarter for every man, woman and child in this country in a year.

Now I asked the minister for a return of what came into Canada in the month of February and he gave me the quantity, 119,728 pounds of cheese came in. Great Britain sent us 3,000 pounds; the United States, 11,000; Italy, 101,000 pounds; Germany, 113,000 pounds; Holland, 2,759 pounds, making a total of 119,729 pounds. This came in at a duty of 3 cents per pound. What will that importation amount to when cheese is allowed in free as it will be if this agreement should be ratified? In one month 119,729 pounds came in. Multiply that by twelve and then multiply the total by sixteen, at the rate of sixteen ounces to the pound, and in place of one ounce and a quarter you will have three ounces of imported cheese for each man, woman and child in Canada. That is the statement made by the Minister of Customs.

I made the minister a proposition last night. I said that if he would back up the statement he made in this appendix which he added to the speech of the hon. member for Grenville (Mr. Reid), I would make him a present of $100 for any charitable institution he would name in Brantford.

Mr. PATERSON. I will take it now, if my hon. friend——

Mr. TAYLOR (Leeds). I am not going to be interrupted. When the hon. minister was speaking, a couple of my friends on this side very respectfully asked leave to put him some very respectable questions. My hon. friend from Algoma (Mr. Boyce) wanted to put him a question, but the minister said 'No.' My hon. friend from Quebec West (Mr. Price) asked if he might put a question and the minister said, 'No, sit down.' That was the treatment we received from him, and he is not going to interfere with me when I am performing the surgical operation on his appendix which I told him last night I would perform. The hon. minister said that he had brought down to this House a blue-book at the opening of the session giving all the information which the hon. member for Grenville (Mr. Reid) had given. I say that he cannot produce any blue-book giving the statistics and information which my hon. friend from Grenville gave. If he did produce one, I would make him a present of $100 for any charitable institution in Brantford he might name.

Mr. PATERSON. Here is the blue-book.

Mr. TAYLOR (Leeds). If the hon. gentleman will turn up any page in that blue-book—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hand over the $100.

Mr. TAYLOR (Leeds). If the hon. minister will turn up any page in that blue-book and read from it the exports from British India of animals, fruit, corn, hay, meat or vegetables for the year ending March 31, then I will cheerfully give him the $100, and say that he told the truth. But if he will not, then he told an absolute falsehood to this House.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. SPEAKER. That expression is not parliamentary.

Mr. TAYLOR (Leeds). Then I will cheerfully withdraw it, but I will back it up with the proposition I made. If that information is in that book, the hon. minister will have $100 to give to any charitable institution he pleases.

Mr. FIELDING. My hon. friend must not bet. It is against the law.

Mr. TAYLOR (Leeds). I am not betting. I am simply challenging the minister to make his statement good.

Mr. TURRIFF. You will not let him interrupt.

Mr. TAYLOR (Leeds). Perhaps I had better read the words which the minister used on that occasion. He gave these figures. In the month of February there was imported into Canada butter as follows: From Great Britain, 2,800 pounds; Australia, 15,000 pounds; New Zealand, 181,000 pounds; the United States, 6,000 pounds. Total, 206,472 pounds of butter imported into Canada in February, according to the figures he took from some old blue-book which he had at Washington, and he said that it amounted to three-quarters of an ounce to each man, woman and child. Then he asked how that would affect the butter market. On that butter, however, there is a duty of 3 cents per pound and now the government propose to let it in free. Multiply 206,000 pounds, the amount imported in one month, by twelve, and then multiply the result by sixteen ounces and you get nine ounces for each man, woman and child in Canada, yet the minister said that only three-quarters of an ounce came in for every man, woman and child. That statement is not correct.

Then take eggs. He worked out eggs and said it would give an egg and an eighth to each man, woman and child in Canada. Why in February alone there came into Canada from the United States 719,000 dozens of eggs which paid a duty of 3 cents a dozen. From all countries in that month there came 735,000 dozen eggs and if you multiply that by 12 to get the figure for the year and by 12 to give the number of eggs to the dozen, you get 13½ eggs to each man, woman and child, yet the minister says we only imported 1-⅛. How does that accord with the minister's statement? Here are his words:—

Mr. PATERSON. Reduced to ounces it represents a little over 10,000,000. That is worse than the butter, because it is an ounce and a quarter for every man, woman and child in this country in a year.

Mr. PRICE. How many pounds are coming in when the reciprocity agreement goes through?

Mr. PATERSON. That is what you will have to make up now with the information you are getting. We got this out of the same blue-books that the hon. gentleman had all the time.

Is that correct? Let me ask the Minister of Customs. He had not the information in the blue-books. Then the debate continued:

Mr. REID (Grenville). Give us biscuits too.

Mr. PATERSON. I agree with what the hon. gentleman (Mr. Price), said, when he candidly admitted that as a lumberman this arrangement was in his favour but he was not sent here to represent his own interests. He took the right view of it. No gentleman ever hears me discussing my own business. I do not think it is very good taste to do so.

Mr. HUGHES. Do they not taste well?

Mr. PATERSON. Sometimes some hon. gentlemen want to give the impression that, somehow or other, from my being in the ministry and having something to do with framing the tariff, the duty on that article was by that means raised higher than it was under the previous government. Well now, I am not saying anything about it and I do not want to say anything about it, but if hon. gentlemen entertain that idea they are entertaining an absolutely fallacious one, an untrue one, because the fact is that the duty on that article has been reduced.

It is pretty high yet, it is not on the free list under this agreement.

Mr. PATERSON. It is not as high as on carriages.

Mr. TAYLOR. (Leeds). I will come to carriages. (reading).

It was reduced when we inaugurated our own policy and it is further reduced and largely reduced under this agreement. But, I do not want to talk of my own business. I do not know that it is right. I heard my hon. friend from Yale-Cariboo (Mr. Burrell). and while I sympathize with him if he thinks he is hurt I think it would be better taste for a man to leave the advocacy of business in his own interest to some one who is not connected with it. Therefore you never hear me talk about my own business at all. I find myself maligned. I find statements made in a public manner that give that idea to the people; in fact, it has been absolutely stated in the public prints and I have not taken the trouble to deny it. If it is any fun to hon. gentlemen opposite, if it is a mark of superior wit and wisdom that was manifested by the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster) —I do not think it elevated his position in the House to undertake to picture me sitting on a biscuit box or something—but if it amuses hon. gentlemen opposite, I am sure that I do not begrudge them the merriment it gives them. I do not think I have said as much as this in my life. Of course, I am not connected and I have not been connected in any active way with any business since I took office under my leader,

Mr. HUGHES. Just a sleeping partner.

Mr. PATERSON. I have a little money invested. It has to be invested in something, but as to drawing salary or getting any remuneration, I have never done that. If that company is fortunate enough to have any dividends I hope to share in them the same as you gentlemen do. I do not suppose that you wish me to take what little money I have and wrap it up in a handkerchief.

The hon. gentleman says he has no interest in these biscuits. It is a limited liability Company, he has stock in it. He is not a salaried officer but he may be a director; he has money invested there and it depends on how much that business makes, what the dividend will amount to and if the duty is not kept up he will not draw much dividend. He is a stockholder in a limited liability company as he has a perfect right to be but I ask if the passages I have quoted from his speech would indicate that he is a man qualified to go over to the United States to negotiate a reciprocity agreement with the cleverest men in the United States. I am quoting this because he said he was adding it as an appendix to the address of the hon. member for Grenville, so that his constitutents and the constituents of all hon. gentlemen opposite might read the speech of a statesman, appended to the speech of the hon. member for Grenville (Mr. Reid). Therefore I quote from it because I purpose having it published and sent to each of my hon. friend's constituents because I know he would not send it, he would be ashamed of the speech he made that night, ashamed to send it to his constituents as the speech of a statesman.

I make this statement in the presence of gentlemen. I shall find out whether they are gentlemen or not, I shall find out which of them makes a suggestion of this kind which carries with it the inference that Paterson is in there in his own interest. I agree with the hon. member for Quebec (Mr. Price), that no man should come here to forward his own interests. He is sent here to exercise his best judgment in the interest of the country. I have told you simply how we conducted these proceedings in Washington and how we arrived at our conclusion. When we were at Washington we knew that last year there were 662,568 pounds of cheese imported into Canada, but we knew we exported 180,000,000 pounds,——

Where to? Not to the United States but to the English market.

—and we took it for granted that in view of this we could hold our own in cheese with the United States. As to potatoes, it is true that while 513,735 bushels were imported last year from all sources, we exported 1,923,595 bushels.

Not to the United States. The hon. gentleman would lead the House to believe that we had exported them to the United States.

We exported 780,000 bushels to the United States, which is 150,000 bushels more than we imported. The Finance Minister told you that he did not think it necessary to have statistics on all these things, but we knew about the exports and imports of lumber just as hon. gentlemen opposite could know if they took the trouble to open the blue-books. The hon. gentleman who interrupted me so often knows something about the business, and we knew it too. We knew there was a duty of $1.25 on lumber going into the United States, and we believed from the information we had that it would be a good thing for the lumber interests of this country if without putting a duty on lumber here we could get the Americans to take their duty off lumber, and so far as I am concerned I made up my mind that if we got the Americans to do that, I would agree to it, statistics or no statistics.

Mr. PRICE. Did the hon. gentleman ever consider that the new Congress might possibly make lumber free?

Mr. PUGSLEY. What difference does that make?

Mr. PRICE. It makes all the difference in the world to the lumberman.

Mr. PATERSON. If the Democrats should make lumber free, and this agreement goes through——

The deputy Speaker then ruled the Minister of Customs out of order, but although he was ruled out of order he went on a little further dealing with the same question. I shall not go further because with what I put on 'Hansard' last night and this addition to-day, I feel that I have said sufficient.

Hon. Wm. PATERSON (Minister of Customs). I thought last night that perhaps the complaint was that I was out of order when I was making these remarks. The question arises whether as the hon. gentleman has spoken to-night and brought this matter up I am entitled to reply.

I did not want to be out of order, but I would like to make one or two remarks.

Mr. SPEAKER. I understand, the minister has a perfect right to speak on this point.

Mr. PATERSON. The hon. gentleman has thought fit to make some remarks that were offensive. There is no evidence of talent in any one making offensive remarks, therefore, I will not notice them. I want to set him right on one point, so that, if he is going to spread his speech broadcast, it will not look quite so silly when people read it. He quoted some calculations that I had made. I may be wrong on those calculations, if I am, let any one show that I am wrong, and I will admit it at once. He says I brought down a report which shows that in one month a certain amount of cheese was brought into Canada, and he says if you multiply that amount of cheese by 12 months in the year, you will have a much larger quantity than the minister stated. Well, it would occur to the merest child to ask whether the same amount of cheese came in in each of the other 11 months. I was quoting from the blue-books, I was quoting from the trade and navigation returns, from the documents we have, giving the returns by the year, and not by the month. In those yearly returns the figures the hon. gentleman mentioned are included.

Mr. TAYLOR (Leeds). No, the returns I gave are for February, 1911, and the year he gave was the year ending March 31, 1910.

Mr. PATTERSON. I stand corrected in that, then. But what I was quoting from was the full year's returns, ending 31st March, 1910. Therefore, I was taking a year's returns. The hon. gentleman has not given us the year's imports, he has taken only one month, and then he multiplies it by 12. But supposing none came in, or scarcely any, during the other 11 months, that shows nothing. He must challenge my figures, which every one will admit are the proper basis to take for an argument, and show how much of these goods came into the country during the whole year. I took the last completed year, and if any one will make the calculation and show that I made a mistake, I will stand corrected. I took the returns from the books we had with us in Washington, I made my calculations on these, and I stand by those calculations until some one can prove they are wrong. Every hon. gentleman has the trade and navigation returns for the complete year in his desk, and, therefore, he has the figures. I think you will find that my calculations of the total importations during the whole year would amount to an ounce and a quarter for every man, woman and child in the country. I do not want to follow the hon. gentleman in anything approaching insolence or effrontery. I think it is quite out of taste for him to call in a minister to listen to personal abuse. I have to say here again what I said once before, that I endeavour always to treat every member with the utmost courtesy. But I do not want it to be forgotten that, though I am a minister, I am also a member of parliament, and I have the same right to courtesy that every other member has and no more. But the simple fact that I occupy a seat in the ministry is no justification for any hon. gentleman in this House to think he is at liberty to address to me language that he would not apply to others. Last night I was sent for, and came into the House to listen to him. It is not evidence of very good taste to summon a person from his needed rest to come in here and listen to personal abuse, to be told that he has made statements that are false in their nature, to hear allusions to his business. It is true that I am engaged in a small business, and if any hon. gentleman can point out anything disreputable in connection with it, he is at liberty to do so. But I want to remind the hon. gentleman that in making a remark of that kind, while I may happen to have some money invested in a certain business, it is a very small amount in comparison with what is invested in that business by other men scattered through the Dominion. Therefore, when he endeavours to make out that there is something wrong and disreputable in that business, he is doing an injury, not to me personally, but to men who hold millions of capital invested in this industry.

Mr. TAYLOR (Leeds). I hope the minister is not trying to misrepresent me in insinuating that I said anything implying disrepute in his business. I was simply answering an argument that he himself placed on the 'Hansard' in reference to that business, and he will not find a word in the 'Hansard' that I uttered against his business.

Mr. PATERSON. The hon. gentleman, though, was bold enough to insinuate that I had done something to further my own interest.

Mr. TAYLOR (Leeds). In what way?

Mr. PATERSON. That I had taken care to keep the duty up to a good high figure.

Mr. TAYLOR (Leeds). That is nothing against the business.

Mr. MACDONALD. Are you in favour of protection to the business?

Mr. TAYLOR (Leeds). Of course I am.

Mr. BEST. May I ask the minister a question? Why is it that you expect the farmers to produce wheat without duty, and as soon as it is turned over to the man that makes flour and biscuits out of it you give him a high protection?

Mr. PATERSON. My answer is, because I am trying to give effect to the wishes of the farmers. But I rose simply to show the hon. gentleman the position he is in. He disputes my calculations based on a year's returns which were given as a year's returns, and he presents a return for only one month, and says if you multiply that by 12 the result is so and so. My figures are there, on which I made a comparison. The hon. gentleman has not attempted to meet that. He has attempted to contradict that by taking the imports for one month, neglecting all the other months, and he says he will send that broadcast and that he will send it to my own constituency. For his own sake I would ask him not to do that, because they will look at the returns for themselves and see exactly what I am pointing out to the House. They will see that the hon. gentleman talks about one month in that speech, but takes no note of what came in during the other months. I have no objection, whatever, to any one disputing my figures. If they can show that I am wrong, I am very glad to be corrected, because we do not want to have figures placed before the House that will not bear investigation. But that can be no reason for personal abuse, for attempting to use language that would not be attempted to be used between one gentleman and another, and, as I say, I do not feel particularly pleased that the hon. gentleman should think that he occupies a position in this House which would lead him to send for the Prime Minister and to disturb me from my needed rest in order to come up here to listen to him, not disputing any arguments that I have made, but engaging in a tirade of abuse. That I do object to, and I think it is going beyond the limit. These hon. gentlemen, when they try to injure the business I am in, may do harm but I would tell them that there are millions of capital invested where I have very little, and if the hon. gentleman (Mr. Taylor, Leeds), seeks to create a prejudice against that business he is not hurting me very much, but he will be hurting men all over the Dominion. I see in a paper—true he did not say it—an article in which it was stated that the article of talc had been overlooked, that it was an article that was used in an hon. gentleman's business in order to reduce the cost and cheapen the quality of confectionery—the line I am engaged in. There are millions of capital invested in Canada and in like manufactured goods, and a statement of this kind must have a deteriorating and damaging effect upon the trade, not upon my trade, but on the trade of the men throughout the country who manufacture these goods. I know of no such article being used in the business of any man who is engaged in the trade, but to scatter that statement broadcast over the country, I am sure, must tend to lessen the quantity of the goods that must be sold for people are sensitive, and properly so, with regard to the question of pure foods. Yet, that statement is made to the detriment of millions of capital and of the interest of men who are engaged in this business, strong Conservatives as well as Liberals, without, in so far as I am aware, the slightest shadow of foundation that any such thing takes place.

Mr. BLAIN. May I ask the hon. gentleman if that statement was made in this House?

Mr. PATERSON. No, I say it was made in a newspaper and it was copied into another, I have been told. I am glad that it appeared originally only in one newspaper. But, I am only pointing out the venomous attacks of this kind that are made upon me, and that it is an unfortunate thing for the line of business that I am connected with, because it is doing injury to others engaged in that business. I would ask my hon. friend from London (Mr. Beattie), if he believes there is any such custom as that, and if he believes that such a statement as that made in a newspaper can for one moment be believed? Yet, people may believe it. I, therefore, have made these remarks, not in my own interest so much, because my interest in business is only very slight in comparison with the millions of capital that are invested, but it is an unfair, it is unjust to the community and unjust to the men engaged in this line of business.

I need not say any more. I just rose to put my hon. friend (Mr. Taylor, Leeds), right, and to let the House know that the figures which I gave were based upon calculations that are in the trade and navigation returns, which returns are in the hon. gentleman's possession. I took the number of pounds of butter that were imported during the whole year, I brought them into ounces, I estimated the population at 8,000,000 and I said that if those figures were correct that represented an ounce and a quarter of butter for every man, woman and child in the Dominion, and I pointed out that that amount could not influence the butter market very much. I did the same with cheese and with eggs. The hon. member for Leeds says a certain quantity of butter came into Canada in one month, and then on the supposition, without any foundation for it, that a like quantity had come in during the other eleven months says the figures I gave were incorrect. Hon. gentlemen can check the figures I gave, they have the trade and navigation returns in their possession and, as I said before, if they will check them, and show that I am wrong I will admit that I made a mistake most cheerfully. But, while they stand uncontradicted, for an hon. gentleman to get up and make a calculation without any foundation whatever, to mention that I have uttered a falsehood in the House, an accusation subsequently retracted, and to apply language equally offensive, is to transgress the bounds of that common civility that ought to prevail in this House between one member and another.

Mr. SPROULE. Medical men sometimes find that a patient, after a surgical operation, and especially after an anesthetic has been administered, are rather incoherent in their talk. We have an example of that to-night which is not unusual in the experience of those who belong to the profession to which I happen to belong. The hon. Minister of Customs (Mr. Paterson), has apparently diverted attention to what he was pleased to call a gross abuse of a minister. I do not think that any minister ought to be abused any more than any other member of the House, but I think he did that more for the purpose of drawing attention away from the gravamen of the charge than for any good purpose. What was the gravamen of the charge? It was that the House was desiring to get correct information instead of information that was neither correct nor reliable. Examples were given last night by my hon. friend from Leeds (Mr. Taylor), and repeated to-night. The Minister of Customs deals with the calculation that my hon. friend from Leeds made. He made a calculation showing what would be most likely to happen if the duty were taken off certain articles of food.

Mr. DEVLIN. I would like to know what the question is before the Chair, and what the hon. gentleman is speaking on.

Mr. SPROULE. The question before the Chair, is for the House to go into Committee on Ways and Means. I understand that perfectly well, and if the hon. gentleman was in the House he ought to understand it also.

Mr. DEVLIN. I assume that the Minister of Customs was allowed to speak simply in answer to the hon. member for Leeds.

Mr. SPROULE. Mr. Speaker, I have the floor, and the hon. gentleman has no right to interrupt me. What I say is that we are not given the information we ask for. We charge that the House is misled by the incorrect, unreliable information which is given, and therefore arguments based upon such information must naturally be misleading and unsuitable to the House. Let me give an example of that. I have in my hand a return brought down to the order of the House dated the 3rd March, 1911, showing the quantity and value of butter, eggs, poultry, chilled or frozen meat, bacon, lard, apples, vegetables, wheat, barley, cattle, horses and potatoes imported into Canada during the six months ending March 1, 1911. I have read that return with a great deal of care, and there is no mention in it of the importation of butter. What do the trade and navigation returns show? They show that in the month of October, 1910, there were imported of butter from Great Britain 201, pounds, and from the United States 5,496 pounds, although nothing at all is given in this return. Then, for the month of November, 1910, we find, according to the trade and navigation returns, that we imported from Italy 213 pounds, from the United States 3,917 pounds; for December, from Australia 72,800 pounds, New Zealand 10,000 pounds, United States 5,000 pounds; for January, 1911, Great Britain, 10,000 pounds, Australia 101,920 pounds, New Zealand 115,000 pounds, Asiatic Turkey 142 pounds, United States 2,132 pounds and yet, in that return, there is not a pound mentioned. Is that not misleading the House? Have we not a right to complain of that? I think we have. We do complain that the information we get is not reliable, and that ministers found arguments upon incorrect information. There is another complaint made. The minister said that we have all the information in the trade, and navigation returns, yet the hon. member for Leeds refers to importations from other countries of articles that are not mentioned at all in this return. He gives the exports of other countries that are not in this return, and are not in the trade and navigation returns, and yet the Minister of Customs says that you have all the information in the trade and navigation returns if you will only take the trouble to look it up. That could not be so because they do not make these returns. Then, why make the statement?

Mr. PATERSON. I did not make the statement.

Mr. SPROULE. The minister did make the statement in my presence that every member of this House had every item of this information before him, and yet there is no return before this House that contains that information. That is improper, and the minister is not treating this House with the courtesy to which it is entitled; nor, has he answered the argument advanced on this side of the House by saying something that has no basis in fact. These are the things that we complain of, and these are the things that the country is complaining of.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. I was here the other evening when the discussion arose between the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Taylor) and the hon. Minister of Customs (Mr. Paterson) and I think that pretty nearly the whole question was this: After the hon. member for Grenville (Mr. Reid) had placed his statement on record showing the exports of products such as are covered by the reciprocity agreement from all of these thirteen countries, and from the British colonies, the hon. Minister of Customs (Mr. Paterson) got up and, with the trade and navigation returns in his hand, said that all the information which the hon. member for Grenville had just placed on 'Hansard' was contained in the blue-book which he slapped on his desk. As a matter of fact that is not so, and the Minister of Customs knows, or should know, that this blue-book of which he spoke does not contain the information which the hon. member for Grenville put on record because it does not give all the imports and exports of foreign countries of articles covered by this reciprocity agreement such as we should have in order to know whether these countries can send their products in to compete with our Canadian farmers. I think the Minister of Customs does not desire this debate to proceed upon information that cannot be relied upon.

Mr. PATERSON. The hon member for Grenville said that the facts and figures he was quoting were not in the blue-book, and I said, no, but that the imports and exports of articles that concern our country were there. I would not be positive but I think that if you look at 'Hansard' you will find that the hon. member for Grenville said that with reference to certain figures which he quoted, and which are not in the blue-book. I think that you will find that I said they were not there.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. The minister will know what we were contending for; we wanted to know the total exports of these countries to see whether or not they could possibly compete with the farmers in this country. The minister held up the blue-book, and said that all these figures in the report that my hon. friend from Grenville was putting on 'Hansard' were in the blue-book, we said they were not, and that is the reason why we put them on record.

Mr. PATERSON. As I remember I stated that certain articles which he was giving, having reference to what the hon. gentleman is alluding to, now, were not there, but that all that portion of the information which it was necessary for Canada to have with reference to imports and exports was contained in the blue-book.

Mr. SEXSMITH. The minister was very unfair in selecting the year he did. If you look over the imports of butter from the United States for the last ten years you will find that in 1910 there was only one-tenth of the amount imported from that country that was imported in the year 1909. Now, the minister selects that one year, and he hands it out to the farmers of this country so as to make the quantity of butter the United States have been selling in Canada look small. In 1910 we imported a little over $18,000 worth of butter from the United States, but in 1909 we imported $156,143 worth. The Minister of Customs selected that lean year, and the reason such a small quantity was imported to Canada that year was that butter had been cornered in the United States, and the price had been run up. They held it in cold storage, and did not export it to Canada or anywhere else. But at the present time butter is cheaper in the United States than it is in Canada. Last year the butter was cornered and put in cold storage, and the people in the United States bought oleomargarine in its place. I was in New York state ten days ago, and a big butter dealer told me that last year he sold fifty tubs of butter in a week, but this year he was selling twelve tubs of butter and a hundred tubs of oleomargarine. The corner in butter raised the price so that the public had to buy oleomargarine, and when they were forced to put the butter on the market the bottom had fallen out of the demand for it. A friend of mine in Watertown, a Canadian, who conducts a big grocery business, told me that he had farmers' butter, creamery butter, and oleomargarine and that while eighteen months ago he was selling a much larger percentage of butter than of oleomargarine his invoices showed that at the present time he was selling 18 pounds of oleomargarine to one of butter. If the Minister of Customs had quoted the imports of butter in 1909 instead of 1910 he would have found a great difference. It was unfair for the Minister of Customs to hand out that statement to the farmers of the country because it was calculated to deceive them.

Mr. PATERSON. I do not doubt what the hon. gentleman says about the imports in the previous year, and I dare say that year after year the importation of butter will vary. The reason I took the particular year I did was that I just happened to have the figures for it in my desk. I certainly did not select it intentionally. However, take any year you like and you will find there is not sufficient imported to affect this market.

Mr. TAYLOR (Leeds). If the duty is removed it would.

Motion agreed to, and House went into Committee of Ways and Means.

WAYS AND MEANS—RECIPROCAL TRADE WITH THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. C. A. MAGRATH (Medicine Hat). Mr. Chairman, this reciprocity pact recently entered into by two representatives of the Canadian government with representatives of the government of the United States, and now before us for consideration, is in my judgment the most important question that has ever come before this or any other parliament of Canada. Last year I was disposed to regard the navy question as such, but the question now before us I think predominates in importance. True, the navy question was settled, but not in the best interests of our race. If Canada is going to be one-twentieth as great as some gentlemen are pleased to think, then we are on the high road to meet great and grave issues. Last year we plunged into the navy question, and now we find ourselves imbedded in this national issue at the instance of but two gentlemen in this whole Dominion, and, the result of this arrangement if carried into effect will be that the home market, the best market, the market which takes about eighty per cent of our farm products will be thrown open to practically the whole agricultural world. These two representatives of our government entered into this bargain, a bargain which for example gives the Argentine Republic, exporting as much wheat as practically the United States and Canada combined, free entry into the market of Canada. It would interest me very much to know what it costs to produce a bushel of wheat in the Argentine Republic. We have heard it said that labour there is worth about 64 cents per day, and we know it is worth probably three times that in this country. The position we find ourselves in is that, so far as any information which the government is able to submit to us, we are practically in the dark; we are unable to say what the nature of the competition we are throwing our own farmers against in their own home market. We have heard a great deal recently of statistics, and I was much interested some time ago to hear the hon. member for North Wellington state that if there is any one thing which the Canadian government can learn from the United States government it is their system of collecting statistics. Before the President of the United States entered into this pact, he went about it in an intelligent way. He sent representatives of his government throughout the United States and throughout Canada I am told, and obtained data as to the conditions existing in both countries from the view point of the United States, and with that data before him he entered into these negotiations. And, in placing this pact before the representatives of the people of the United States the President submitted to the Congress three or four messages containing from 100 to 150 pages of printed matter, giving detailed information as to the conditions prevailing in both countries, and of course from the point of view of the United States. That was an intelligent and courteous way to treat the representatives of the people. But in our case we have had but two Canadian representatives come before the representatives of the Canadian people, and tell us that we must accept this pact without having any information on the subject at all. If it was proper for the President of the United States to place before the Congress detailed information of the conditions in that country and especially from their viewpoint, it was the duty of the Canadian government not only to present the statistics from our view-point, but to go further and to show what the conditions are in the Argentine Republic, in Austria-Hungary, in Russia and these other countries which are given free access to our market under this arrangement. We should be told what is the cost of producing a bushel of wheat in Russia and what is the cost of landing Russian wheat in Canada at a profit to the Russian producer, but we are kept absolutely in the dark as to information of that character, and we are called upon to blindly pass this pact. It appears to me that we are giving democratic methods in this country a considerable jolt when the government undertakes to say that the people shall not be permitted to pass upon a question of this character and are going to insist upon the representatives of the people swallowing this measure without treating us with that courtesy to which I contend we are entitled. It has been suggested during the course of this debate that we should bring this question to the people. I am ready, Sir, to see that done, and am willing to go with it. It is possible that political parties are not always ready to go to the people; but the people are always ready for political parties when there is any matter of importance to be brought before them. Frequently I have been constrained to ask myself, what are we doing in this parliament? Surely we are not prepared to admit that it is a question of ins and outs. Is the only aim of a political party to get into power and then strive to remain there even to the extent of breeding parish politics into a science? I have the idea that we are sent here to take part in the development of this young country, to see that the varied interests of this country get a square deal.

In December last we had a visit from farmers who claimed that they had not been getting a square deal, who claimed they had been making their representations to the government of this country for some years past, who claimed that their product had been despoiled, and that much of it had been going to enrich middlemen and others. One of these farmers, Mr. Tregillus, vice-president of the United Farmers of Alberta, made a very strong plea for government terminal elevators on the Pacific. He stated that the first demand for such facilities had been made in 1906. I quote his statement from page 19 of the report:

> Since that time events have transpired and evidence has been acquired by your officers which shows that there is no possibility of the grain trade being placed upon a stable foundation unless all terminal facilities are owned and operated by the government as a public utility.

Other speakers dealing with the elevator question pointed to the fact that the farmer had not been getting his own out of his own product, and they asked for protection. In my opinion their demands were both fair and reasonable. I consider it to be the supreme duty of a government to see that the product reaches the consumer at the least possible cost to the producer. Then they dealt with the cattle industry. Mr. Warner, another Alberta farmer, pointed to the heavy expenditures by way of bounties and bonuses for the development of the industries of this country, and very pertinently asked, why not do something for the farmer in this matter? Those of us who come from the west know that the cattle industry of that country is not in a satisfactory condition. The shipment of cattle long distances by rail and water should be a relic of past ages. It is not humane, Sir. Some weeks ago I asked for return of all information in the possession of the government regarding the cattle business. The Minister of Agriculture very courteously told me that it would take probably two or three years to bring down that information. Well, I suppose the government is to be commended for its energy in that respect; but it appears to me that we have got to a period when we should stop collecting, and do business in the interests of the farmers. One of the farmers' delegates spoke of Dr. Rutherford, who had been dealing with the dressed beef question on August 1st, 1909. This remark is to be found on page 27 of the report:

> It is altogether likely that had it been possible to secure the required capital, that trade would have been inaugurated years ago.

The question in my mind is: Why was something not done towards acquiring the necessary capital for the establishment of the industry Dr. Rutherford refers to? In short, Sir, the farmers' requests in that matter appear to me to be fair and reasonable.

The next question that the farmers' delegates dealt with was the Hudson Bay railway, which they requested should be constructed and operated by the government. We are more or less in the dark as to the future of that undertaking; I refer to the navigation of Hudson Straits. There is only one way to determine that question, and that is to construct the road. If successful, as many of our people appear to think it will be, it will be an immense factor in the development of this young country. In my judgment it will be successful, and even if it should not for the purposes for which it is being constructed, it can at least be used as a trunk line for opening up some of our hinterland. I, therefore, consider that we are justified in building that road. I cannot say that I endorse the public ownership of railways in a young country like Canada, as we have so many other purposes requiring our energies as well as capital; but in this case, as the success of the road from a financial standpoint is somewhat problematical, it appears to me that no corporation would undertake its construction without having the government behind it. Therefore, if the government is to get behind the construction of the Hudson Bay railway, I think the government had better build it and operate it for a few years until we see what the outcome is likely to be. Therefore, I say that the farmers' demands in that regard likewise are fair and reasonable.

The next question that was dealt with was by one of our Alberta farmers, Mr. Bower, who suggested some amendments to the Railway Act. I believe that the hon. member for Portage la Prairie (Mr. Meighen) introduced certain amendments largely along the lines suggested by Mr. Bower. I have confidence in the Railway Board of this country. I believe it stands between the people on one side and the railways on the other, endeavouring to see fair play between both interests. The Railway Board is operating that Act day after day, and is probably more familiar with it and its ills than any other interest in this country. I think it would not be amiss for the government to have these suggested amendments considered by the board and dealt with promptly by the government and by parliament.

The next question that was dealt with by the delegates was certain suggested amendments to the Bank Act. No arguments were brought forward to show why that amendment was necessary, and as the banking institutions of this country must be on a very stable basis, it appears to me that it would be unwise to make any changes without the most careful consideration, and I do not know enough about the question to speak with much positiveness regarding it.

Finally the delegates took up the tariff question, and asked among other things for reciprocity with the United States in farm products as well as agricultural implements. When we attempt to touch the tariff question, there at once arises the question of free trade and protection. We find people convinced that protection is absolutely necessary in a young country like Canada, and we have others who are strongly of the opinion that free trade is the proper policy either in Canada or in any other country. Great Britain is the only world power that indulges in free trade, and we are told that she has never been more prosperous than in recent years. On the other hand we know that every other world power operates under some system of protection and these powers have never had greater prosperity than they are enjoying at present. The great republic to the south of us has made probably greater progress than any other country, and that republic has been operating not only under a protective system but a very high protective system. It is not for me to criticise the character of the protection which that country has had. That is none of my business. It is true that the United States has her trusts and other ills, and that some people lay those ills to the fact that protection exists there. I am not sure about that. I fear that the citizens of the United States have been bending their energies to the acquisition of wealth to the neglect of some other things. If they had been prepared to go into their legislative halls and with the same energy make laws in restraint of trusts, the situation might be different there to-day. In this country I believe we are commencing to suffer from the same thing. Apart from that, free trade Britain has her ills and in plenty too. My attitude on the tariff is not very firm because I regard the tariff not as a question of two or three years' study, and I do not propose to nail my colours to any tariff mast so firmly that I cannot get away from that attitude, if at a later date I conclude through the working of the machinery in my own head, that any other attitude is better in the interests of the people of this country. I know that we have a vast storehouse of virgin wealth in this country. I know that we have raw material in great quantity. I wish to see that raw material converted in this country into the finished product so that we may get the full benefit from what nature has so generously given us. Should we attempt to do that under free trade, I fear we would be contributing to the support of the vast masses of the people in the United States where industrial development has been brought to the highest point of success. Therefore, I believe that a fair measure of protection is necessary to develop the industrial side of this country. It has been said that our industries have been developed. Are we going to say that Canada is to remain where she is to-day? I want to see great industrial centres grow up in our west. I would like to have those engaged in manufacturing to-day in this country expand their energies and establish industries throughout our west and not confine their efforts to any one portion of this country. Industry in the west means labour, labour means population and population means a home market—the very best market we can have. If we had in our west centres such as Minneapolis, Omaha, Chicago and St. Pail, the prices of our farm products there would be much more stable than they can possibly be under existing conditions.

Turning again to the farmers delegation I find on page 38 of their report that they ask in connection with reciprocity:

> That in the event of a favourable arrangement being reached, it be carried into effect through the independent action of the respective governments rather than by the hard and fast requirements of a treaty.

It would be interesting to know what was in the mind of the gentlemen who penned that paragraph. If reciprocity of the character we now have before us is in the best interests of the people, why should it not be hard and fast? But if there be any question as to its not being in the best interests of all the people we should be prepared to go slowly. What right have we to experiment in trade matters when in this intelligent age, we can by investigation conducted in a scientific manner work out results with fair accuracy. No such method was followed by this government. Reference has already been made to the fact that we have no statistics to guide us. Our government did not follow the example set by President Taft who, when he saw he was going to be engaged in negotiations for reciprocity with this country, got busy and had information collected from both countries. If our government had done the same, this pact would not be before us in its present condition. We would not have had a vast number of our fruit farmers here, shortly after the pact was announced, protesting against the manner in which the fruit and vegetable farming industry were being destroyed to a certain extent in this country. My hon. friend the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Oliver) is not here, but I do not think he will challenge the statement I am about to make. He was in the constituency of Medicine Hat, a few days ago. He, there addressed an important gathering of citizens in my home city, Lethbridge. He told them, according to the press reports, that there was substantially nothing in the claim of the fruit farmers that their industry was in any way being injured. But practically at the same time as the hon. gentleman was making that address in Lethbridge, we had the hon. member for Wentworth (Mr. Sealey) presenting an amendment to this committee against the pact that is now before us. My hon. friend from Wentworth is a strong supporter of the government and he would not have taken the action he did unless he believed it was absolutely necessary. What I want to point out is that not only he but every page boy in this House knew that that pact has to go through in its present form and that consequently if his amendment carried it would destroy the pact. What then was his object in doing what he did? He has fruit and vegetable farmers in his constituency but all our fruit and vegetable farmers are not hived in that constituency. He knew that that pact was going to injure that industry both in his own constituency and in a number of other constituencies throughout the country.

I believe, however, that the author of the paragraph referred to had something entirely different in his mind. I believe he suggested independent action so that Canada, the small country, would keep herself clear of any entanglements whereby her large and influential neighbour could not at a later date dominate here in trade matters. In my opinion, the present pact is the most dangerous one that this young country could engage in. It is not of a character that will permit Canada to be absolutely independent as suggested by the farmers' delegation. The pact has a flavour of divorce court proceedings, which, at least in this country, are not agreeable. We are told it may be broken at a moment's notice. While it is true we may change our tariff, it does not destroy the pact so long as the United States continue to keep faith in whole or in part. Can we not then see the position it may land us in? It has been truly said that Canada is placing a noose around her neck by entering this pact, and the string to tighten that noose will not be in our hands. It will be in the hands of our neighbours. On the other hand, a firm treaty for a definite period of time, would, at the end of that period, leave us in exactly the same position as when we entered that pact, namely in absolute control of our own tariff to do our own business for our own people in our own way. Let me suggest a difficulty that we might find ourselves in under this pact. While the proposals resulting in this arrangement emanated from the President of the United States, still the correspondence embodying the terms of the pact was negotiated by the two representatives of our government. In that correspondence there was a direct invitation to the United States to drop her tariff wall, to let, for instance, our wheat free into that country. Now we know that cannot be accomplished without transporation lines; we know that Canadian railways are not going to build down to the boundary and hand over our product to their rivals, the American railways. Then Sir, it means this, if it means anything, that it is a direct invitation to the American railways to come into our country for the product of our farmers. I do not object to that so long as they come in as other foreign capital is coming in at this moment, not under any pact or arrangement between our government, and the government of the country from which that capital comes. I do not wish to put a board fence around this country, but I want to see us keep absolute control of our own affairs. If our western farmers expect to get our grain into the American markets, it appears to me that the American railways must accept the invitation of our country, and build those roads into our country. Nothing can be accomplished by a few trunk lines, because the farmers cannot afford to haul grain more than six or eight miles of railways. Therefore, if it means anything, it means that our western country must be grid-ironed by American railways. I do not, I repeat, object to that; in fact I will be glad to see them come into the country. Then suppose that we break this pact 24 hours after we enter into it, and our neighbours should continue to keep it. Suppose the American railways should grid-iron our country. Suppose that 10 or 15 years hence our government should do something along our boundary that they thought to be in the interests of our people, is it not possible that these American railways would say they had created vested interests in this country? Is it not possible they would say: You invited us to come into your country, we are taking your wheat out, we are taking your timber out, we are taking your fish out, and we have developed a north-bound traffic as well, for we cannot operate with profit without traffic both ways. They would add we developed that north-bound traffic under conditions that prevailed during the time our government had been keeping faith with yours. Then might we not find them saying to us: You have broken faith, you are injuring vested interests. We would say: Nay, they would say: Yea, and probably that yea would be repeated at Washington with the statement that our proposed Act was that of an unfriendly people, which, in diplomatic language, is not agreeable.

While on the subject of railways let me digress to say that I consider railways to be the crying need of our western country. I have constituents who live 50 miles from a railway. I know that they want railways a great deal more than they want any reciprocity of the character before us, and I am prepared to go back to them on that issue. I say that the government has failed to realize the situation in that country. Corporations are building railways through that country, and spending an immense amount of money, but they are going where they please, and how they please; they are jockeying each other for advantage in certain territory. They should, in my opinion, be pulled apart and the government should insist on their spreading their energies over the entire country. If our government had been paying some attention to that feature, the farmers of the west would appreciate that to a much greater extent than this pact now under consideration.

Possibly some one may say that I am playing with shadows when I suggest the foregoing possible entanglement with our neighbours. Can we not learn something from the past? We had a pact in existence in 1854 which was abrogated in 1865, and one of the reasons given by our neighbours for abrogating it was that we had the hardihood to change our tariff in respect to some articles not covered by the treaty. They took the position that because they had entered into a treaty with us, because certain tariff conditions existed at that time, we were not at liberty to change our position in that regard. It seems to me that was travelling a long way to find a reason for abrogating that treaty. I can refer to a case in the past few years. In June, 1902, Congress passed an Act inviting Canada, through Great Britain, to take part in an investigation of international waters. When the Joint International Waterways Commission was completed under that Act by the appointing of three Canadians and three Americans, one of the first questions referred to that commission by our government was a dispute on the St. John river as between interests in Maine and New Brunswick. The dispute had reached an acute stage. What happened? The Canadian section referred it to the American section which in turn consulted its government at Washington, and they were instructed that they were to have nothing to do with the St. John river dispute. The instructions which the American section received from the government at Washington were in the following words:

> The broader interpretation given to the Act by Canadian authorities should be rejected if for no other reason than on account of the smallness of the appropriation for the support of the American section.

In other words our interpretation of ordinary plain English, was to be governed by the amount of money our neighbours saw fit to vote for the use of their section. It appears to me that is an extraordinary position to take. Our government persisted, the matter was placed before the British Ambassador at Washington, who was instructed to take it up with the government of that country, but without success, because his office telegraphed to Ottawa the following:

This government regret they cannot agree with your commission in dealing with the St. John river.

That answer was certainly to the point, it was direct, and what happened? Simply this, that our government had to back down. I am not criticising them for that, because there was no other course open to them. That was done by the right hon. gentleman on the 5th of June, 1905, when he addressed the Canadian section in the following language:

With reference to the opposition raised by the American commission to consider other waters than the waters of the lakes and rivers whose natural outlet is by the River St. Lawrence to the Atlantic ocean, it would be no use to persist in our contention, and the government, therefore, are of the opinion that the commission had better even proceed in this limited way.

Well, it appears to me, that the foregoing is a sufficient evidence that our neighbours will dominate us when it suits their purpose. If we believe one tithe of what we say about the great virgin wealth of this country, if we have confidence in ourselves, then we must know that we have a country loaded with raw material, with water routes equal to the best in the world, with an excellent strategical position in the world of commerce. We will, provided we keep ourselves clear of trade entanglements, be the serious rival of even the most successful and the most prosperous countries of the present time. A more fruitful source for trouble between Canada and her immense neighbour could not be found, than in trade arrangements, especially when that trade is to be the source of the only rivalry that can possibly exist between us.

Now, I would like to consider briefly the economic side of this question. The farmers asked for, amongst other things, reciprocity in farm products as well as in agricultural implements. They are only getting reciprocity, of a character, in agricultural products. We are giving our home market to our neighbours, as well as, practically, to the entire agricultural world. The United States is not attempting to do anything of the kind, and the reduction in agricultural implements is of little or no account. Why does the United States want our farm products? Not to give us better prices than we have been getting. They want our farm products to assist in lowering the prices of such products to the consumers in the United States. Canada exports about 60,000,000 bushels of wheat, while our neighours last year, I think, exported about 151,000,000 bushels.

Supposing for the purpose of argument that Canada exported her 60,000,000 bushels to the United States, then our neighbours would have their own 151,000.000 bushels, plus our 60,000,000, or 211,000,000 bushels which they would have for export to Liverpool. The heavier the stock the United States carries for export purposes, the lower it will force the price of the product in their home market. So there must be a sagging in prices in the United States, governed by the amount of wheat they import from us. But every bushel they import from us displaces a bushel in that country, which has to be shipped out of New York, because they produce much more than they consume. Therefore, their railways and their flour mills will get the benefit of what they import from us, and it will do the double duty of helping to steady or lower prices in their market. as well as to create labour for their railways and their flour mills. Here is what President Taft had to say at Springfield, Illinois, on February 11 last:

To let the wheat of the northwest come down to Minneapolis and Chicago will steady the price of wheat. But that it will in the end substantially reduce the price of wheat fixed for the world in Liverpool, no one familar with conditions will assert.

It will give to the United States much greater control of the wheat market than it has ever had before. It will enable its milling plants to turn Canadian wheat into flour and send abroad the finished product and will stimulate the sale of manufactures and other things that we have to sell in Canada.

Now, Sir, I do not know that we are particularly interested in the United States obtaining control of the wheat market; I do not know that we are particularly interested in the creation of labour for Minneapolis in turning Canadian wheat into flour. We have some people in this country, irrespective of politics, who are strongly of the opinion that Canada is to be the greatest wheat producing country in the world. If there is anything in that statement it appears to me that we might be somewhat ambitious to control the wheat market in this country for our farmer, instead of allowing him to become the agent through which the wheat trust in the United States will take advantage of his product in order to obtain greater control over the wheat products of the farmers in his own country. Some people claim that the United States is rapidly reaching the point when she cannot produce enough to feed her own people. There is absolutely nothing in that. We know that the density of population in that country is about 25 to the square mile, and we know that there are countries in Europe with almost ten times that density of population, producing enough to feed their own people. The United States produce enough to feed her own people and some 17,000,000 over and above her own population; in other words, she can feed her own people and a country twice as populous as Canada.

Now, what is the position in Canada? Not only do we allow American farm products in free, but under the favoured nation treaties practically every other agricultural country in the world. Canada will become absolutely free trade in agricultural products. Free trade, we are told, means the lowest possible prices, so that Canada, like Great Britain—the only two countries in the world—will have open doors for farm products, which means the cheapest farm products. Is it not the height of absurdity to ask the farmer of this country to sell his products in an open market and to buy in a protected market? It certainly does not look good to me.

However, in coming back to my original position, I wish to say that I have the greatest regard for our neighbours to the south of us. Yet if we wish to maintain our own national integrity, if we wish to work cohesion into the four scattered sections now known as Canada, we are positively sure of one safe way to do it—the dignified one, of doing our own business for our own people. Therefore, let us keep clear of business pacts, at least until we have some evidence that there is less selfishness in humanity than exists at the present time.

The pact, Mr. Chairman, that I wish to see consummated is that peace pact between our family and the United States. I wish to pay my tribute to President Taft for his efforts in that direction, because I would like to see that pact so worded that it will allow every civilized people to come in, knowing full well that when we get fifty-one per cent of civilization into such a pact we will have a sure means of reducing the taxes of the people. President Taft addressed a meeting in New York on the 28th instant and made some very significant remarks. I find the following:

I have said that this is a critical time in the solution of the question of reciprocity. It is critical because unless it is now decided favourably to reciprocity, it is exceedingly probable that no such opportunity will ever again come to the United States. The forces which are at work in England and in Canada to separate her by a Chinese wall from the United States and to make her part of an imperial commercial band reaching from England around the world to England again, by a system of preferential tariffs, will derive an impetus from the rejection of this treaty, and if we would have reciprocity with all the advantages that I have described, and that I earnestly and sincerely believe will follow its adoption, we must take it now or give it up for ever.

I do not know that it would be possible to read a more significant statement than that. If President Taft objects to the idea of the Chinese wall between that country and this, he does not appear to have any objection to having a Chinese wall built with Canada and the United States within it, and a part of our own family outside of it because we find that upon the same occasion he stated that:

We tendered to the Canadian commissioners absolute free trade in all products of either country, manufactured or natural, but the Canadian commissioners did not feel justified in going so far.

We do not see any statement from him as to any suggestion of free trade with the other nations of the world. So, I say that it looks as though he would be quite willing to have a Chinese wall built around the two countries. What does his statement mean, that reciprocity must be taken by the United States now or never? It appears to me that it means that Canada has been proceeding along a certain path and, as Mr. Taft stated on another occasion, that Canada had reached the parting of the ways; it means that if we are allowed to continue along that path there may be a vista opened up to us which would tend to continue to draw us along that path. It looks to me as if that was what President Taft had in his mind, and it is a statement that should be considered very carefully by the people of this country. If President Taft in his wisdom believes that if reciprocity is not accepted by the United States now they will never get it from us, he must also believe that there is something a great deal better for us if we continue as we have been going. I find that President Taft stated elsewhere on the same occasion, speaking of the government of this country:

The government is one entirely controlled by the people, and the bond uniting the Dominion and the mother country is light and almost imperceptible. There are no restrictions upon the trade or economic development of Canada which will interfere in the slightest with her carrying out her independent future.

That is evidently what is uppermost in Mr. Taft's mind. That is not my ambition as a Canadian, and I do not believe that is the ambition of the majority of the people of Canada.

Now, there has been some talk about annexation. I believe a number of people in the United States who have been favouring this pact, had in their minds annexation. I consider it as a mark of intelligence on their part. We Canadians should have enough vanity to think that we would not lower the standard of citizenship of the United States if we joined the union, and the addition of our vast virgin wealth would do much to replete the overdrawn stores of that country. However, no one in Canada is looking for annexation. Yet if our neighbours did think seriously of the matter, they could only do it through some trade arrangement. The orthodox way of catching a colt is by coaxing with a handful of oats. It might be interesting to quote Archibald Cary Cooledge from his work on 'The United States as a world power.' Mr. Coolidge was in the diplomatic service of the United States. He was with Secretary Taft to the Philippine Islands in 1905 and 1906, and is now a professor at Harvard University, and when a gentleman attains that position in such a seat of learning, he is capable of doing his own thinking. In referring to the Canadian situation and the abrogation of the Trade Treaty of 1854, he says:

In consequence, when the period for which the trade treaty was made came to an end in 1865, the agreement was not renewed. Justifiable as such action may have been from a commercial point of view, it was none the less short-sighted. If the Americans believed that Canada would one day come into the union, they should have prepared the way for the event——

And how?

—by cultivating close trade relations, even if the weaker state did in the meantime get the greater profit from them. Wise foresight would have dictated the same sort of policy in the United States as was shown by Prussia in her formation of the German Zollverein—a willingness to sacrifice small temporary advantages in favour of large aims for the future. But a popular government is seldom guided by such long views if they mean immediate loss.

It appears to me that President Taft has gotten away from the idea of popular government. Speaking of the resources of the country, Mr. Cooledge says:

* * * *

And grain is not her sole reliance; her forests will be called on more and more to supply the lumber which their depleted American rivals will be unable to furnish; her fisheries, both in the east and in the west, are of untold value; she has copper north of Lake Superior, coal in Nova Scotia and elsewhere, mineral wealth of all kinds in her Rocky mountains only waiting to be exploited, and near the Alaska frontier, the gold of the Klondike. These resources, which are just beginning to be developed, hold forth a brilliant promise for the future.

He then undertakes to discuss the question of Canada remaining in the British empire. He says:

* * * *

There is no doubt that the idea of being an equal member in the community of the largest and most populous empire in the world is one to appeal to the imagination, a magnificient dream, capable of rousing the utmost enthusiasm in those who glory in the greatness of the English name. It is also one which has for the Canadian farmer attractions of a more prosaic kind. Such an empire would pretty certainly be bound together by preferential duties, if not actual free trade between the members and a protective tariff against outsiders, and this will give Canadian wheat a decided advantage on the London market over rival grain from Russia or The Argentine.

Evidently, Sir, that was exactly the mind of President Taft when in his statement in New York the other day he told his people they must take reciprocity now or leave it alone for ever. I continue to quote from Mr. Cooledge:

There is no valid reason for regarding this dream as chimerical simply because the principles which it embodies received a check at the last English election. In one form or another the federation of Greater Britain is quite possible, and, though the issue will not be settled in a day, it bids fair to become within a generation one of the most momentous in politics. From the point of view of the United States there would be no cause to welcome this federation. If it should be based upon internal reciprocity with protection against other nations, American exports, both raw materials and manufactured goods would suffer. So vast are the markets included in the domain of Greater Britain, so imposing is its situation almost everywhere, that if this greatest of empires were to follow a policy of exclusion towards others, it might provoke a league to break its power. In such a league, too, the United States might conceivably have a place; for from the closeness of its relations with British America, it might be forced either to become part of this Greater Britain or as a matter of self-preservation to oppose it. This may be fanciful speculation about the distant future, but it is a fact of the present that the drawing together of Great Britain and Canada is in no sense to the benefit of the United States.

Now, Sir, while I am keenly anxious to see the British family closely cemented together, still I do not see that it should be objectionable to other nations. Canada would be foolish indeed to enter into any pact with another country that might interfere with the cementing process in her own family being proceeded with as time advances. I have faith in our own people. I wish to see some organic union among the British people, not for the purpose of dominating other people, but because I believe it would be best for humanity and best for us. And, when we accomplish that I think there is something even greater for us to look to: the welding together in some form with other peoples, because I have the idea that the Millennium is coming and it will come in that way. So far as this pact is concerned I am opposed to it. I was first disposed to favour it, but the more I revolved it in my mind the less I liked it. I have no interest in any railway in this country; I have not been approached by any interest as to how I should vote in this matter; I have absolutely done my own thinking in connection with it. If it is good for the western country, if it is good for Alberta, it is good for me financially. But, Sir, I question if it is good. In any case, Sir, I do not believe in any suggestion that we are going to place a certain section of our people in the position that they will have to sell in an open market and buy in a protected market.

Mr. ALEXANDER HAGGART (Winnipeg). Mr. Chairman, we are all more or less parochial. Some of us may think we are more cosmopolitan than others. Now, just consider the different elements and communities of which this Dominion, stretching from the Atlantic to the Pacific, is made up. Perhaps the only industry which is common to all the provinces is farming, in its various branches of grain growing, meat producing, dairying, gardening, and so on; but the varying conditions are such that those exclusively engaged in any one of the branches may have little in common with the others. In fact, what would beneficially affect the tillers of the soil in one particular district or in one particular province might have the reverse effect in another. The first impulse of the individual is to consider how a particular measure will perhaps affect his own calling, the business in which his own money is invested, or the locality in which he lives. We are consciously or unconsciously affected by the trade conditions surrounding us, and by the opinions of those whom we respect who are living in the same neighbourhood as ourselves. I will not attempt to be less provincial or parochial than others; but I would be satisfied if I gave a fair and an honest expression of opinion of the best and of the majority of the people amongst whom I live or whom I represent; because I believe that by so doing I would be carrying out the trust that is imposed upon me by those people. I am only one of the community, and I would be satisfied if I gave, as I believe I shall give, the opinion of the people of Winnipeg upon this great and important question. It is not difficult to ascertain what is the opinion of the people of Winnipeg. When these venerable politicians went to Washington, not at the command or instance of the people of the country, but at their own instance or of the instance of the government, the people of Winnipeg watched them closely. They waited for even any rumour that might come from behind the tyled doors where they were in counsel with the Americans, and they were not long in coming to a conclusion and expressing their opinion on the results of those negotiations which were presented to us in the resolution now before this House. As to what was the conclusion of the people of Winnipeg, we have sufficient evidence, and good evidence. We have a legislature there that had come fresh from the people, and after the matter was debated and considered in that legislature, which represented I think fairly the people of Manitoba, they unhesitatingly condemned this compact or proposal which was brought here from Washington by the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Customs. We have another important body of men in that city, the board of trade, consisting of some hundreds of the best business men in that city, men who have grown up with the city, and have become prosperous with its prosperity. Then we have the grain exchange, consisting of a large body of commercial men, able men, clever men. They considered it, and the result of their consideration was that they also condemned this arrangement. I believe that to-day a majority, and a large majority, of the people of Winnipeg are satisfied with the conditions which exist there, the splendid conditions under which the city and they themselves have become prosperous, and they would have to be certain that what was proposed would be an improvement upon the present condition of affairs. Another gentleman whose opinion I think ought to carry some weight with hon. gentlemen opposite is Mr. D. C. Cameron. He is one of the first citizens of Winnipeg he is a wealthy man; he is engaged in a large business; he is first in every progressive and philanthropic enterprise in that city. There is no man in Winnipeg who is more respected than he is, and he is such a man that the supporters of hon. gentlemen opposite in the city of Winnipeg were very glad to have him as their candidate at the last election, and it is just possible, by reason of his standing and by reason of the manner in which he was treated and considered by the city of Winnipeg, that he might have represented that city to-day in this House, were it not for the fact that the poor man was burdened and handicapped by the sins of the gentlemen on the opposite side of the House. I will give another certificate of character to that gentleman. He received at that election nearly 7,000 votes of the people of Winnipeg, more votes than were given to any minister sitting on the opposite side of the House; more than were given to any gentleman sitting behind them. He is known as one of the most progressive gentlemen in the city of Winnipeg, and I will guarantee that he knows more of sane and proper business methods than any brace of gentlemen sitting on the government benches. Now, Montreal, Halifax, St. John, Toronto, Hamilton, London and all the other large and important trade centres of this Dominion were in existence and doing business before and during the old reciprocity treaty and since it was repealed. Winnipeg and Vancouver, too, are the product of the conditions that have existed since that treaty was repealed. I do not want to boast, but I just want to say that the progress that has been made under existing conditions—conditions created by the National Policy and the railway policy of Sir John Macdonald, and the conditions created by that same policy in so far as it has been followed by the present government. Winnipeg, I say, is the result of the conditions that have existed under the policy which both governments of this country have pursued, the policy of interprovincial trade and the establishment of railways running east and west. It is now the third largest city, I believe, in the Dominion. It is practically the connecting link between these important provinces in the east, and the three or four provinces in the west which are greater in area and before long are likely to be greater in importance.

Just let me give some figures to show the progress we are making in the west, which will perhaps be a revelation to many hon. members here who have never been in that country. In 1870 Winnipeg was a little hamlet at the junction of the Assiniboia and Red rivers and its population consisted of about 215 people, living in a few scattered cabins lying outside Fort Garry. Twenty-five years went past, twenty-five years of dearth and hardship. We had the locusts destroying the crops and a series of years in which it was difficult to produce any crop, yet during that twenty-five years the population of Winnipeg increased to 19,000. The next fifteen years were more progressive. In 1910 Winnipeg had a population of 160,000, and in 1911, according to the census taken by the directory men—and I would have more faith in a census taken by the directory men and the assessors of the city than that taken by this government, because I know the kind of officials this government employs to take the census—we have a population of 200,000. There may be a few repeaters in that calculation but I am perfectly within the mark in saying that the population is at least 175,000. We have 59 miles of asphalt pavements, 38 miles of macadam and 27 of cedar block, or a total of 124 miles of good solid substantial pavement. We have 211 miles of graded streets, 81 miles of granolitic sidewalks, 322 miles of plank sidewalks, 177 miles of sewers, 197 miles of watermains, 62 miles of street railway, and 47 miles of beautiful boulevard streets, lined on each side by the finest modern residences. But perhaps what shows more accurately the progress of a city is the amount of money spent every year in the building of residences, warehouses, and factories. In 1909 the building permits in Winnipeg amounted $9,226,000 and in 1910 that was increased to $15,106,450; and if the present progress keeps up, this year we will have under construction buildings to the extent of over $20,000,000.

Winnipeg is not satisfied to be an agricultural and mercantile distributing centre. She wants to be a manufacturing city. Five years ago we produced $8,500,000 worth of manufactured goods. In 1910, five years later, our manufactured products amounted to $36,000,000 and the number of our factories was 236. These factories employed 15,000 artisans with a monthly pay roll of $750,000, and radiating from the city are 22 pairs of railway tracks.

The Americans tried to get our grain trade as well they might because Winnipeg to-day is the largest grain market on this continent. A couple of years ago Minneapolis claimed to be the largest grain market but she has had since to give way to Winnipeg. We have a milling capacity of 40,000 bushels daily, and last year 88,000,000 bushels of grain were brought to Winnipeg, inspected there and shipped from that city. Consider what that means. Consider what bearing the buying and selling of grain has incidentally on other businesses. Bank clearances are sometimes taken as an indication of progress. Well, the bank clearances in Winnipeg amounted last year to the sum of $952,415,182. With such progress, with a city making the substantial growth that Winnipeg is doing, and with this increasing business, I do not think we can come to any other conclusion than that we require better evidence than we have had so far that our progress, should this pact carry, will be greater than it would be under present conditions. Winnipeg has a laudable ambition, not simply to be a distributing point, but a great manufacturing centre, but we are handicapped by the want of fuel. Fuel is the origin of our power and energy now. We bring it from the Rocky Mountains 150 miles to the west and from Pennsylvania 1,500 miles distant to the east. That handicaps us in manufacturing, but we are making a heroic effort to overcome that difficulty. Running along the northeastern part of the province is the Winnipeg river, connecting Lake of the Woods and Lake Winnipeg. That river is of no use for navigation. It tumbles over a succession of falls in the course of 100 miles between those lakes, and we have undertaken to develop one of those falls. On the Winnipeg river a site is being developed which is going to cost four or five million dollars.

The city has been spending on that undertaking half a million dollars every year during the past five or six years, and inside of a year we are promised that 30,000 horse-power will be brought into the city and eventually 60,000 horse-power at the lowest cost, and that will be furnished manufacturers at actual cost for the purpose of encouraging these industries. It is said by the eminent board of engineers that the power can be sold for $18 per horse-power, and that the power to customers can be brought down to $12.50. But before we could take any steps towards building that dam, which is one of the most magnificent municipal works on this continent, we had to build 24 miles of railway for the purpose of getting in the plant and material. We are told that we need not be discouraged, that our manufactures are not to be interfered with by this proposed agreement. The hon. member for South Grey (Mr. Miller), I understand, told his constituents the other day that they might rest assured that manufactures in the town of Hanover had nothing to fear. But we know well that when our farmers have got one concession, they are not going to rest contented. Are the farmers to whom the alleged concession is now to be made to remain quiet? They tell us plainly, no; and this is but the commencement of an agitation greater than that which we witnessed last year. The present concession they will accept only as an instalment. The edge of the wedge is only being entered, and they will not be contented to sell their goods in an unprotected market and be compelled to buy everything they require in a protected market. By this pact, therefore, the government are opening the door for absolute free trade. We have said time and again on this side of the House that the people were never consulted, but my hon. friend the Minister Customs, the other night, in a solemn voice that sounded like the solemn tones of some cathedral bell, told us that the people would be consulted perhaps sooner than we desired. Well, we on this side want that election now. We want the people to be consulted at once. The government cannot bring on the election too soon to suit hon. members in the opposition.

You pass this reciprocity resolution, you pass an Act bringing it into force, it is an accomplished fact; then, after the people have made their adjustments, given up the old markets and tried to form new alliances, you come back to them again now that this is done, you invite them to come back to the old situation. They have made one change, they have suffered loss, there has been dislocation of business and ruin in some cases. Now the agreement is in force and you wish to go back again after you have severed connections with the old customers and have made new alliances with other people. We have been told by the Finance Minister that reciprocity with the United States has, from time immemorial, been the policy of all parties. This has been repeated by some newspapers. There is no question that after the sudden abrogation of that treaty in 1864, the people of Canada would have liked to have had a renewal of that treaty. They had had extensive trade relations with the Americans for the preceding 12 years and were suddenly cut-off from that market. They had not formed new alliances and new trade routes. We had not acquired new markets at that time, we had no communication with the Atlantic in the winter, we were dependent entirely upon the Americans, and our system of transportation was very primitive. But because reciprocity was a good thing at that time, and during the continuation of that treaty and because it was hard to suffer the rebuffs we then suffered when reciprocity was taken away from us without any particular reason being given except that it was not in the interest of the United States, it does follow that it is best now, we set ourselves to acquire new markets for our products and developed our own interprovincial trade, we set to work to build our railways and, perhaps, that is partly the reason why to-day we have the magnificent system of railways that we have, uniting our provinces and strengthening the bonds of confederation. We were told another story by the Prime Minister. He was in error in telling it. He said that in Manitoba in the early eighties, we had an incipient rebellion, and that the cause of that rebellion was that the people of the Northwest wanted to trade with the south, that they wanted to trade north and south. I cannot say that he did not read history aright, he was one of the makers of history at that time, and if he would brush up his recollection he would find that if we had had ten railroads running north and south we could not have made use of them in the absence of trade relations with the south. The same high tariffs were there, the gates were shut. The reason of the little trouble there was that the people of Manitoba wanted competition. They thought the Canadian Pacific railway was charging rates that agriculture would not bear. The merchants in Winnipeg thought they were charging rates on imports that the trade would not bear and they simply wanted competition. The local government finally chartered the Red River Valley railway and the monopoly clause in the Canadian Pacific railway charter was deleted. We had then in power one Joe Martin, subsequently a member of this House, and one Thomas Greenway, who started to build the railway and then transferred it to the Northern Pacific railway, and shouted: We have got competition. They had handed it over to the Northern Pacific, and the competition when they were compelled to disclose it, consisted simply of a letter from the president of the Northern Pacific railway that his road would charge no more to bring wheat to Duluth than the Canadian Pacific railway charged to bring it to Port Arthur. Fortunately for the province of Manitoba that government was in its dying days, and it died and was buried, thank God, and there has never been any resurrection since. Another able government came into power, and they took hold of the railway situation. They had to buy back that railway, built largely with Manitobar money, from the Northern Pacific, and they made a new deal with the Canadian Northern railway by which they controlled the rates, and as a result of which there is in Manitoba to-day more mileage of Canadian Northern railway than there is of Canadian Pacific railway. The Manitoba government have control of the rates, and again there farming now is a paying business. Manitoba benefited, and every province to the west of Manitoba incidentally benefited. The Canadian Northern railway began in Canada, ran through Canadian soil in Canadian territory and terminated in Canadian ports at Port Arthur and Fort William. So that now all our grain instead of going by way of Duluth, by American cities, paying tribute to American railroads, now goes over our own territory through our own ports, over our own railways to the east, through our own elevators, into ocean steamers, to be carried to the markets of the world, or is carried to our own cities to be ground in our own mills to the profit of the whole people of Canada.

The monopoly clause of the Canadian Pacific railway, although irksome, at the time, was not altogether an evil. At this distance of time we must acknowledge the foresight of that great statesman, who desired to make the channels of commerce between the eastern provinces, and the western territory wider and deeper before that great work would be subject to the competition by diversion of our trade to the United States.

Members on this side of the House would welcome the execution of the government's threat of an election. We believe that the opinion of the people is against this pact, and it is only fair that they should have an opportunity of expressing an opinion on it before it becomes law.

I shall touch upon another question which has been referred to by the hon. member for Medicine Hat. With reference to the speech or address of President Taft at New York the other day, I am informed by one who was at that meeting that that address was in manuscript, that it was read closely by the president from that manuscript and that that manuscript was handed to the press. Evidently what he said was said with deliberation and not in the heat and excitement of a debate. I think that address ought to be read carefully by every Canadian, that it ought to be in every Canadian home so that every elector in this country might read it for himself. First the president speaks of wheat, oats and barley. We have heard a great deal of that from northwest Liberal members; they say that we are going to get rich on wheat, barley and oats. Take the province of Manitoba and the states of Dakota and Minnesota, follow that 49th parallel as far west as you like, make an excursion 40 miles to the north amongst our own people, and make another excursion 20 miles or 40 miles to the south, and you will find that, man for man, our farmers are better than the Americans, they are better educated, they are more intelligent, they are more industrious than the men on the other side of the line. Take farm for farm, and you will find that on our side we have better kept farms, we have better field conditions than they have; we have better and more comfortable buildings and farm houses than they have, and our farmers are getting wealthy and making more rapid progress than the Americans. These, Sir, are not the people with whom we should make a trade alliance. Now, with reference to wheat, barley, and oats, we are told that we should vote for this pact because we will get higher prices for our farm products, and at the same time the consumer will get his bread at cheaper prices. Now, let us see what President Taft says:

> With respect to wheat and barley and oats, conditions differ in different parts of Canada and in different parts of the United States. Classing them together as on the whole, the conditions are substantially the same. In prices of farm land the differences are no greater between Canada and the United States than between the different states in the United States. In the matter of farm wages, on the whole, they are about the same.
> It is said that this is an agreement that affects agricultural products more than manufactures. That is true, but if we are to have an interchange of products between the two countries of any substantial amount the chief part of it must necessarily be in agricultural products. As it is, we export to Canada more agricultural products than we receive from her and so it will be afterwards. The effect is not going, in my judgment, to lower the specific prices of agricultural products in our country. It is going to steady them and it is going to produce an interchange of products at a profit which will be beneficial.

How is it going to be beneficial when there is to be no increase in prices? The fact is that we have better prices on our side of the line. About two weeks ago, when I was in Winnipeg, I took up the St. Paul 'Pioneer Press,' which prides itself on the accuracy of its market reports, and I took up the Winnipeg 'Free Press,' which I presume is more accurate in its market reports than it is in its politics, and I compared the prices of the markets in St. Paul and Winnipeg on the same day, and with the exception of wheat, I found that farm products were bringing a higher price in Winnipeg than they were in St. Paul. In St. Paul wheat was two cents higher than it was in Winnipeg. Now, I wish to call attention to an extract in this remarkable speech of President Taft, on the 28th of April. He comes down from his throne, and steps upon the platform, where he talks to the newspaper men, and tells them what kind of a reciprocity gospel he wants them to grind out. There are thousands of them there from all over the United States. Now we have heard people talking annexation, but the spirit that animates the President's remarks is something more than that, it is the spirit of conquest. Now, listen to what he says:

Another and very conclusive reason for closing the compact is the opportunity which it gives us to increase the supply of our natural resources, which, with the wastefulness of children, we have wantonly exhausted.

He is looking with a jealous eye upon the riches God has given us in this Canada of ours. He continues :

The timber resources of Canada which will open themselves to us inevitably under the operation of this agreement are now apparently inexhaustible. I say apparently inexhaustible, for if the same procedure were to be adopted in respect to them that we have followed in respect to our own forests, I presume that they too might be exhausted, but, fortunately for Canada and for us, we and they have learned much more than we realized two decades ago with respect to the necessity for proper methods of forestry and of lumber cutting. And hence we may be safe in saying that under proper modern methods the timber resources open to us in Canada may be made inexhaustible, and we may derive ample supplies of timber from Canadian sources to the profit of Canada and four our own benefit.

There are other natural resources which I need not stop to enumerate which will become available to us as our own if we adopt and maintain commercial union with Canada; and this is one of the chief reasons that ought to commend the Canadian agreement to the farseeing statesmanship of leaders of American public opinion.

But there are other—even broader—grounds than this that should lead to the adoption of this agreement. Canada's superficial area is greater than that of the United States between the oceans. Of course, it has a good deal of waste land in the far north, but it has enormous tracts of unoccupied land or land settled so sparsely as to be substantially unoccupied, which in the next two or three decades will rapidly acquire a substantial and valuable population. The government is one entirely controlled by the people and the bond uniting the Dominion and the mother country is light and almost imperceptible. There are no restrictions upon the trade or economic development of Canada which will interfere in the slightest with her carving out her independent future. The attitude of the people is that of affection toward the mother country, and of a sentimental loyalty toward her royal head. But for practical purposes the control exercised from England by executive or parliament is imponderable.

Then comes that significant peroration in which the president refers to this as a critical time in the solution of the question of reciprocity. He says:

I have said that this is a critical time in the solution of the question of reciprocity. It is critical because, unless it is now decided favourably to reciprocity, it is exceedingly probable that no such opportunity will ever again come to the United States.

Might he not have said: We will never have another opportunity to appeal to a Prime Minister of Canada who is more willing to force this reciprocity pact through parliament than he is to go to the Imperial Conference; we may never have a Finance Minister in the government of Canada again who spent the days of his early manhood in trying to dismember this confederation; and we may never have another Minister of Customs in the government of Canada who will be so easy a mark as long as we protect his cookies and his candies.

The forces which are at work in England and in Canada to separate her by a Chinese wall——

Who built that Chinese wall, and how long has it been there?

——to separate her by a Chinese wall from the United States and to make her part of an Imperial commercial band reaching from England around the world to England again.

The hope, the dream, the vision of better men than those who occupy at present the treasury benches of this country, I hope will be realized, and that the efforts of the present government of Canada to break that commercial bond with England will fail. I am opposed to this reciprocity agreement, and I believe the majority of the people of Canada are opposed to it, and I hope it will not be for the historian in days to come to apply to the present ministry of Canada the words of Shakespeare in Hamlet's soliloquy, and to say : 'The evil that men do lives after them, their good is often interred with their bones.'

Mr. ARTHURS. As the hour is getting late I beg to move the adjournment of the debate.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Go on.

Mr. FIELDING. If the hon. gentleman (Mr. Arthurs) prefers to adjourn we have no objection.

Motion agreed to, and progress reported.

Mr. FIELDING moved the adjournment of the House.

Mr. SPROULE. What business will be taken up to-morrow?

Mr. FIELDING. We will take up the various Bills and resolutions on the Order Paper, all except the Bank Bill, and if there is time afterwards we will resume in Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. SPROULE. Will the Bills be taken up in their regular order?

Mr. FIELDING. Bills and orders; there is quite a number of them.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 11.45 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

THURSDAY, May 4, 1911.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

RAILWAY ACT AMENDMENT.

Hon. GEORGE P. GRAHAM (Minister of Railways and Canals) moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 197) to amend the Railway Act. He said: This Bill is somewhat lengthy, and I shall briefly refer to the changes it is intended to make in the existing Act. In the first clause it is proposed to apply the Act so as to require telegraph, telephone, and express companies to make yearly statements of their business as do the railway companies now. The next paragraph refers to the protection of forests from fire caused by a railway company, and it has been the subject of resolutions by the Conservation Commission, and by the Forestry Association of the Dominion. It was first suggested that the law be made specific and stringent as to what the company should do, but at a meeting between the Chairman of the Conservation Commission, a representative of the western farmers, a member of the Forestry Association, and the Chairman of the Board of Railway Commissioners, this clause was decided upon as meeting all requirements. It makes clear that the Board of Railway Commissioners can compel a railway company to provide facilities for the protection of property contiguous to a railway, to say how many patrolmen should be necessary, what fences should be provided, and to make general rules in this respect. The next clause is to make applicable to telephone, telegraph, and express companies the existing law with reference to railways which names an agent in any locality upon whom notice can be served. The next clause makes clear certain matters as to the location of railways, and that I shall explain on the second reading. The next clause is to provide that lands even though they belong to a railway company and are not for strictly railway purposes, can be treated like lands belonging to any other individual in the matter of expropriation for, say, another railway. The next clause is introduced by arrangement with the Chairman of the Ontario Railway and Municipal Board, and it makes provision by which a joint board can be formed of a member of any provincial board having jurisdiction over these matters, and a member of the Dominion Board of Railway Commissioners, to compel connection to be made between a provincial road and a federal road, and to make provisions for the interchange of traffic.

Mr. LENNOX. Will that be in harmony with the statute recently passed by the Ontario legislature?

Mr. GRAHAM. Yes, but it will apply to any other province having a provincial board organized for similar purposes. The next clause provides for the appraisement of damages to land adjoining or abutting on a highway where the railway has been allowed to run on a highway. There is not in the present law any provision by which the owner of the adjoining property can get damages on account of the railway getting on the highway in front of his property. The next clause is to allow, under general regulations and rules of the Board of Railway Commissioners, wires to cross railways where the railway consents and where the regulations are complied with. At present application has to be made to the board in each case. The next clause is a similar clause with reference to sewers under railways where the railway consents. The next clause has reference to fencing along lines of railway under construction. Under the existing Act the railways do not have to fence unless ordered by the board, and the amendment will be somewhat drastic, and will compel the railways to fence unless excused by the order of the board. It places the onus on the railway companies to prove that it is not necessary for them to fence. It also compels the railway company to fence right of way or take other effectual means, such as cattle-guards to prevent cattle getting on the railway. The next section repeals that clause of the Act which prohibits stock from running within half a mile of a railway. There will be some discussion as to the propriety of this in the older parts of Canada, but on the whole it has seemed to those who have considered it, that it is a wise provision in the interest of the western part of Canada where they have the right to graze on these lands that are not inclosed, and under the present Act it is impossible for them, in many cases, to get redress if their stock is killed. In the older provinces—I can speak more particularly of Ontario—most municipalities, by by-law, forbid cattle running at large on the highways, and they may continue to regulate that matter by by-law if they choose to do so.

Mr. HENDERSON. Will the railways be bound to observe those by-laws?

Mr. GRAHAM. The by-law does not affect the railway; it affects the man who owns the cattle. But I presume that if a cow were on a highway contrary to a by-law of a municipality, it would be there contrary to law, and that would be a factor in deciding the liability of the railway. The next clause, 12, is merely to make clear a section that was passed last year. Section 13 is one giving the Board of Railway Commissioners powers, in addition to the power given to them by the Act as it now stands, to regulate the price of electric power under their jurisdiction. Further, if a person makes application to a company under the control of the board for a certain quantity of power, and the company declines to give it to him, he can appeal to the board for an order on the company to give the power asked for. Section 14 is in reference to returns to the department as to accidents. The statute says that they shall be made semi-annually. They have been made annually, and we are making it clear that an annual return in general terms is all that is required; but I will introduce a clause into the Bill providing that the minister may ask for a return whenever he sees fit. This is to cover two points: first, if a question arises as to an accident in which lives have been lost, in addition to the particulars required by the Board of Railway Commissioners, the minister may deem it wise in the public interest to ask for further particulars. Power is also given to the minister, where complaint is made that a large quantity of stock has been killed, to require a return to be made more frequently than twelve months, so that the matter can be investigated. Complaints have been made by farmers in the west that where stock has been killed, the railway company or some person has frequently buried the carcases, and it has sometimes taken a year or two for the owners to find out where the animals have gone, as no trace is left of them. This clause is desired to enable the department to get the proof of the killing of those animals if it is thought to be in the public interest, as often as may be required. Then we propose to add a section to the Act which is quite drastic and may cause some discussion. The main features of it are that where a railway company has been granted a charter by the parliament of Canada, or where a railway has passed into the ownership of a company holding a charter from the Dominion of Canada, if the line is allowed to become dilapidated to such an extent that it is unsafe to operate, the government may step in and declare that the subsidy granted to the railway company shall become a lien upon it to such an extent that the railway can be sold under it. This power may, perhaps, never, at all events not very often, be exercised; but something is necessary to give the department power to compel railway companies or companies owning railways to keep their line in a fit condition to operate. I beg leave to move the first reading of the Bill.

Mr. MACDONELL (South Toronto). Has the minister dealt, in the Bill, with the question of commutation tickets, so as to prevent railway companies from discriminating in regard to them? I understood that the minister had some sympathy with the municipalities that made their wishes known in that respect, both in the press and by interviewing the government.

Mr. GRAHAM. There is nothing in this Bill in reference to commutation tickets.

Mr. NORTHRUP. Does the section in regard to railways which are allowed to fall into disrepair apply to grants made by the Dominion of Canada in the future or to grants made in the past? In other words, will it be retroactive?

Mr. GRAHAM. That is debatable, as the Bill is drawn.

Mr. HENDERSON. Will the joint board have power to deal with electric roads incorporated by the province of Ontario as well as with electric roads and steam railways incorporated by the Dominion? I think the minister knows the case I refer to—the Hamilton case.

Mr. GRAHAM. The Bill gives power to the board to deal with provincial roads as well as Dominion roads.

Mr. HENDERSON. No matter whether electric or steam?

Mr. GRAHAM. There is no distinction as to the kind of propelling power.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

FIRST READING.

Bill (No. 196) to incorporate the Continental Fire Insurance Company of Canada.—Mr. Molloy.

TRADE RELATIONS WITH GERMANY.

Mr. FOSTER. I would like to ask the right hon. the Prime Minister if there be any truth in the statement I have seen in the newspapers that negotiations are now going on between this government and Germany for an improvement in the trade relations between the two countries?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. There is no truth at all in it.

THE INDIAN ACT.

Mr. OLIVER moved third reading of Bill (No. 177) to amend the Indian Act.

Mr. FOSTER. My contention, when this Bill was brought in, was that the matter should previously go to parliament—that is after the investigations had been made, and before any action was taken regarding this reserve. I see that an amendment has been inserted embodying that idea so that on that point I have no further objection.

Mr. DOHERTY. The hon. minister was good enough the other evening to say that he would consider an amendment I suggested to provide for representation before the courts of such Indians as may be opposed to removal from their reserve. I think the object would be obtained by adding to subsection 3 of section 49A the following words:

And shall assign counsel to represent and act for the Indians who may be opposed to the proposed removal.

Mr. OLIVER. The section as it stands, it seems to me, would permit the judge to take the action my hon. friend suggests, but he desires to make that mandatory.

Mr. DOHERTY. That is one purpose. No doubt the section dealing with the powers of the judge is very large, and it might be contended that under it he will have the power to assign counsel for these Indians. The section reads:

3. The judge shall have the like powers to issue subpoenas, compel the attendance and examination of witnesses, take evidence, give directions, and generally to hear and determine the matter and regulate the procedure as in proceedings upon information by the Attorney General within the ordinary jurisdiction of the court.

I am not prepared to say offhand whether in any proceeding upon information by the Attorney General, the Exchequer Court has the power to assign counsel to act for parties who are not represented by counsel. If there be a special provision to that effect, my amendment would not be necessary; but if not, I do not think that subsection 3 of section 49A would empower the judge to assign counsel to these Indians. It must be remembered that legally the Indians are represented by the Superintendent General of Indian Affairs; but where there is collision between him and the Indians, the Indians ought to be represented by an independent counsel. The machinery of this Bill will never be set in operation except when the Superintendent General and the majority of the Indians differ in opinion, and in such a case the Indians ought to have a special representative. We should not only give the judge the power to permit such representation, but we ought to make it his duty to appoint counsel for the Indians.

Mr. OLIVER. I am quite ready to accept this proposed amendment. I only wish to say that, as I understand the wording of the subsection, adequate provision is made for the appointment of counsel, and as a matter of public policy of course counsel would be appointed. I am quite willing, however, to accept my hon. friend's amendment so that it shall be mandatory on the judge to appoint counsel under certain circumstances. I beg therefore, to withdraw the motion for a third reading .

Motion for third reading withdrawn.

Mr. OLIVER moved that the Bill be referred back to the Committee of the Whole with instructions to amend subsections 3 of section 49A by adding thereto the following words:

And shall assign counsel to represent and act for the Indians who may be opposed to the proposed removal.

Mr. BRADBURY. While I agree in the amendment suggested by the hon. member for St. Anne (Mr. Doherty), I cannot but think that the Indians ought to have something to say in the choosing of counsel. In this Bill the Superintendent General takes power to himself which the department has never had, and which no Superintendent General has ever had. He is taking the power to take away from the Indians their reserves, and thus violating every treaty made with the Indians without giving them the opportunity to protest in any way against it. The amendment moved provides that the judge may assign counsel. In my opinion the counsel ought to be assigned on the recommendation of the band.

The band ought to have something to say as to who shall represent them. The experience I have had with regard to one of the reserves proves to me that it is quite possible a counsel might be chosen to take the Indians part, who may not have the best interests of the Indians at heart. I think that there ought to be some provision made that the Indians may have something to say in the choosing of their own counsel.

There is another phase of the Bill about which I wish to say a word. The first section of this Bill is to amend section 46 of the Indian Act. Now, section 46 reads as follows:

> No portion of any reserve shall be taken for the purposes of any railway, road or public work without the consent of the Governor in Council, and, if any railway, road or public work passes through or causes injury to any reserve, or, if any act occasioning damage to any reserve is done under the authority of an Act of parliament or of the legislature of any province, compensation shall be made therefor to the Indians of the band in the same manner as is provided with respect to the lands or rights of other persons.

I contend that this clause is contradictory. It starts out first by declaring that no portion of the reserve shall be taken for the purposes of any railway, and then it goes on to provide that if any railway, road or public work passes through and injures the reserve, the parties responsible shall be liable for damages. I believe that this part of this section should be rescinded. The amendment proposed by this Bill covers practically everything that is necessary. The change would make the Bill more logical and more easily understood.

As to the Bill as a whole, I desire again to enter my protest against the principle. The Indians are not represented in this House and have no voice in making this legislation. As I said a moment ago, the minister is asking for power greater than any Superintendent General before ever pretended to ask for. And, in view of the surrender of the St. Peter's Indian reserve of which I know something, I cannot hope that the Department of Indian Affairs will administer this proposed new law in a manner to commend itself to the sense of justice of this country. I have no hesitation in saying that under section 49 of the Act, the Indian had some protection, as it remained for the Indian to say whether he was willing to surrender his reserve or not. And while I believe that the Act has been openly violated in connection with the surrender of the St. Peter's Indian reserve, yet the Indian has some redress. But, under the proposition before us, he has no redress; it will not be necessary to consult him in connection with the surrender. When these treaties were made, in most cases the Indians were a power in this country. The treaties had to be lived up to; the Indians were, in many cases, able to compel the white man to keep faith with them. To-day the Indian is weak. The guardian of the Indian, the Superintendent General, is all powerful in this House. This fact is all the greater reason why the parliament should guard carefully and sacredly the interest of the Indian, the wards of the Canadian people. I contend that the power that the Superintendent General is asking for under this Bill is altogether too broad and arbitrary. He is simply taking the power to dispose of people's property and rights without giving them an opportunity to refuse or to lay their views fairly before the court, or even to a protest against the proceeding. In this country, especially in the province of Ontario, we have some bands of Indians who are very intelligent; we have members of these different bands who are just as intelligent as the average member of this House. I think it is almost a crime against everything that is fair to say to such a band of Indians: We will take possession of your reserve in defiance of treaty rights, without giving you an opportunity of being heard or even protesting as to whether you wish to surrender your reserve or not. The minister, a few nights ago, brought in a Bill before this House to confer upon him power to take a reserve in Victoria. That was a special case. I submit that in every such special case that may arise, where the Indians may refuse to surrender their reserve, yet, where it is in the public interest that the Indian reserve should be surrendered, the Superintendent General can come down to parliament with a special Act. He need not take, as he proposes to do under this Bill, the broad power to apply this to every Indian reserve in Canada. It has always been our proud boast that we have treated our Indians fairly. But if this Bill becomes law we may sometimes have a Superintendent General who may not be as zealous for the best interest of the Indians as my hon. friend, yet in his hands would be placed the power to take any Indian reserve in Canada, within the scope of this Bill without giving the Indians the opportunity to make their protest felt. For these reasons, I think that the Bill should be referred to a committee for revision and elimination of some of these powers. If that is not done I would ask at least that the Indians may have the right to nominate the counsel who shall appear before this court to look after their interests.

Mr. OLIVER. I do not wish to traverse again the arguments on the general merits of the Bill. All these were thrashed out very fully when the Bill was up for consideration before, and the House in its wisdom decided that the principle should be adopted. With regard to the propriety of the Indians who object to the proposed readjustment of their affairs being authorized to name their counsel, I think that is a very dangerous proposal, and not in the interest of the Indians themselves. If the sound judgment of the Indians could be depended upon to be exercised in the protection of their own interests, then there would be no necessity for the Indian Act or for the supervision that parliament has placed over them. It is because it is recognized that they cannot be trusted to protect their own interests that this supervision is exercised, and I think it is within the judgment of the House that, under those circumstances to leave the question of the choice of a counsel to represent the Indians, in the hands of the judge of the Exchequer Court, is giving them better protection than to leave the matter at their own choice.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. Does not subsection 1-a cover all the provisions of subsection 1 of the old Act?

Mr. OLIVER. I could not answer that off hand. I substituted this section for the section of the old Act in the belief that this section met the present requirements better than the previous section.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. The minister has not done that. I do not see any provision repealing subsection 1 of the old Bill, and yet this seems to cover and go beyond the old section. This old section is inconsistent. It provides that no portion of any reserve shall be taken for the purpose of any railway, road or public work without the consent of the Governor in Council, and also that if any railroad, road or public work passes through or causes injury to any reserve, compensation must be paid; but it does not say in the latter case that they must have the consent of the Governor in Council, they may be trespassers. That is contradictory, but the section the minister has introduced now fully covers all the powers in the old section, and gives broader powers as well. Therefore, the old section is unnecessary and has not been repealed by the minister.

Mr. OLIVER. The Bill has been referred back to committee, and I would ask it to remain in committee until I have had an opportunity of considering the point raised.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. The phraseology of the present amendment is defective. You have the phrase : 'without the consent of the owner, may with such consent as aforesaid,' &c. That might be read that he shall not take any land without the consent of the owner, and may with the consent of the owner. I think it is intended to refer to the consent of the Lieutenant Governor in Council, occurring earlier in the section.

Mr. OLIVER. Undoubtedly that is the intention, and I think that would be the reading of the section.

Motion agreed to, and House went again into committee on the Bill.

On section 1,

Mr. OLIVER. I think the objection of the hon. member for North Grey is well taken, but it may be overcome by a change of one word so that the introduction of section 1 would read:

Section 46 of the Indian Act, chapter 81 of the Revised Statutes, 1906, is amended by substituting the following subsection for subsection 1 of the said section.

Then, in the following line, strike out the letter 'a' after the figure '1'.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. Would the minister include in his amendment that in subsection 1 the words: 'such consent' where they occur in the seventh line be struck out, and that in lieu thereof the words: 'consent of the Governor in Council' be inserted?

Mr. OLIVER. That will be agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

Mr. SHARPE (Ontario). Could the minister inform the committee how many Indian reserves will be affected by the wording of section 2?

Mr. OLIVER. I could not at the moment, but I think it is only the reserve situated in the city of Vancouver, although I may be mistaken.

Mr. SHARPE (Ontario). How does the minister interpret the word 'adjoining'?

Mr. OLIVER. That the reserve line will touch the line of the corporation.

Mr. SHARPE (Ontario). What is the object and purpose of drawing the line in that way? If the principle is good why not apply it to all reserves? I do not say that the principle should be applied, but if you are taking such arbitrary power to remove reserves in this manner why not apply it to all reserves? The same argument would apply to a rural district where an Indian reserve is situated, as would apply to a city, although perhaps not quite so strongly.

Mr. OLIVER. We recognize that the power asked for is arbitrary, and that it should not be exercised except under exceptional conditions, such exceptional conditions being that the land of the Indians, by reason of their being contained within or adjoining a city, has reached an abnormal value altogether out of comparison with the original value or intention in the setting apart of the reserve, the result being that it is in the interest of the Indians that the townsite value which their reserve has attained should be translated into cash so that they may get the benefit of it rather than that they shall merely continue to occupy land having that value, but of which they are not getting the benefit.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

DEPARTMENT OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS ACT AMENDMENT.

Mr. GRAHAM moved the second reading of Bill (No. 156) to amend the Department of Railways and Canals Act. He said: Mr. Speaker, the object of this Bill is to put upon the statute authority for the establishment of certain funds in connection with the management of the Intercolonial railway. As a matter of fact, these funds have been established in a way for some years. We have a fund, for instance, for the renewal of equipment, that is for the purchase of cars, and another for the renewal of rails. I want to establish one also to facilitate the payment of loss by fire out of revenue where the loss should be paid out of the receipts of the road. In discussing this with the Finance Department, and with the Auditor General it was thought wise to amend the Act to give the department authority to establish these funds, so that there will be no question hereafter about it or about the depositing of money in them, and the payment of money out of them.

Motion agreed to, Bill read the second time, and House went into committee thereon.

On section 1,

Mr. HAGGART (Lanark). Have you at present any trouble in providing renewal of equipment under your general vote? What is the necessity of a suspense account?

Mr. GRAHAM. Each month we set apart a certain sum for this purpose, and if at the end of the financial year this money has not been expended it remains in the fund. The intention is to carry the account on, so that we will have it to pay for, say, work under contract.

Mr. HAGGART (Lanark). You are merely applying the money already voted to the intention of the appropriation?

Mr. GRAHAM. Yes.

Mr. FOSTER. Does it mean that the minister has not to come back for a revote, which has always been considered a salutary check? If the minister has $1,000,000 for a certain purpose, and he has spent $500,000 of it at the end of the year, he would now have to come back to parliament for a revote of the other $500,000? Does this propose that when once there is a vote of $1,000,000 there should be no reference to parliament again until he has expended that money, even though several years should elapse?

Mr. GRAHAM. Hardly that. At present we lay aside $25,000 a month for railway equipment, and that is accounted for. Every railway company has to do something like that in order to carry on its business. The Auditor General thinks that possibly under the statute it is not clear he has the right to allow us to continue to do that. This money is merely to renew equipment out of railway revenue, and there would be little in the fund at the end of the year, but under the present system if there is $30,000 left, we have to pay it back to the consolidated fund and get it revoted.

Mr. FOSTER. The idea of the Bill is probably all right. The minister gave me the impression that the money would not have to be revoted, but I do not see anything in the Bill which would enable him to use the money unless it were revoted. It is, I suppose, a proposal more in the way of keeping the accounts than touching the basis of parliamentary appropriation.

Mr. GRAHAM. We have to keep to the rule in that respect.

Mr. HAGGART (Lanark). How does the Auditor General get rid of the audit of this money?

Mr. GRAHAM. Every dollar expended has to be audited by the Auditor General, when we take a certain amount out of a vote to pay for cars, this makes it legal. He audits every account the same as now.

Mr. HAGGART (Lanark). This Bill does not alter the law of appropriation?

Mr. GRAHAM. I do not think so.

Bill reported, read the third time, and passed.

ST. JOHN VALLEY RAILWAY.

Mr. GRAHAM moved the second reading of Bill (No. 150) to authorize the government of Canada to acquire by lease a certain line of railway in the province of New Brunswick.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). What is this Bill?

Mr. GRAHAM. This is the Bill we discussed very thoroughly on the resolution. The provincial government is guaranteeing the bonds of the St. John Valley railway to the extent of $25,000 a mile, and this Bill provides for its operation by the Intercolonial railway, provided it is constructed. I would like to have the Act on the statutes so that if an arrangement is made by the provincial government with any company we will be at liberty to enter into a contract with them.

Motion agreed to, Bill read the second time, and House went into committee thereon.

On section 1,

Mr. DANIEL. I would like to ask the Minister of Railways and Canals if this clause is in accordance with the Act which was passed by the legislature of New Brunswick. I think that when the resolution was before us some objection was taken to the fact that equipment was not provided for in this Act while it was in the provincial Act.

Mr. GRAHAM. I think there was a question as to the initial rolling stock, it being contended that we had included the initial rolling stock in this Act, while it was not contemplated in the New Brunswick legislation. Personally I am not sure that it is absolutely necessary to retain the initial rolling stock. I find that it would be such a small matter in starting the new line that it is not worth while putting it in the way of the construction of the road or of its operation.

Mr. FOSTER. The minister would be willing to strike that out?

Mr. GRAHAM. I would be willing to omit the rolling stock in order to help out the arrangement.

Mr. HAGGART (Lanark). Will the minister state what is the difference in length between this new line and the Transcontinental line and its connection with St. John? Will he also state what the government have calculated the loss would be, or the difference between what it would cost to run the road and the 60 per cent of the receipts which the government retain?

Mr. PUGSLEY. My hon. friend the Minister of Railways has asked me to reply to the hon. gentleman, because I am familiar with the province of New Brunswick.

Mr. FOSTER. Have you ever heard of this railway before?

Mr. PUGSLEY. Yes, it has pleasant memories for me; I do not suppose I shall ever forget it. This road runs from Grand Falls to St. John, by one of the routes surveyed by the engineers of the provincial government. The distance is 207 miles from Grand Falls to St. John. The Transcontinental goes from Grand Falls to Moncton, and from there the distance back to St. John is 88 miles.

Mr. HAGGART (Lanark). What is the distance by the Transcontinental?

Mr. PUGSLEY. My hon. friend from Carleton (Mr. Carvell) says the distance from Grand Falls to Moncton is 198 miles. This, added to the 88 miles, would make the total distance from Grand Falls to St. John 286 miles. This line reduces the distance about 80 miles. I think the Minister of Railways can answer the question as to the loss better than I can.

Mr. GRAHAM. I think it would be some years before the road would pay its way and pay the 60 per cent. I go further: I think that with the vast majority of branch lines in the maritime provinces that will always be found to be the case. I had not any idea, in making this proposition, that the Intercolonial railway would make a cent out of it. In fact, I have always thought that it would cost the Intercolonial a considerable sum of money to run this road on the 60 per cent ; but, looking at it from the point of view of the convenience of the people who for many years have not been able to get a line of railway through this valley, I thought the people of Canada would be prepared, even at a loss on the operation of the road, to agree to operate it on a 60 per cent basis.

Mr. HAGGART (Lanark). Haven't they a line on the other side of the river running in the same direction between the two points?

Mr. PUGSLEY. They have at certain points; but practically all the way from Woodstock to Fredericton it is 20 or 25 miles back from the river.

Mr HAGGART (Lanark). Is it much longer than this line?

Mr. PUGSLEY. There is one road from Woodstock to St. John which first strikes McAdam. This must be 70 miles from the St. John river. From McAdam to St. John it also keeps away from the river until it reaches Welsford. For the last 14 miles it runs parallel with the river. There is another line from Fredericton to Woodstock running 20 or 25 miles from the river. But there is a very rich country from Woodstock to Fredericton, and also from Fredericton to Welsford, which is entirely without any accommodation. I would suggest that, with the unanimous consent of the House, which I think would be necessary, the provision as to the company providing the initial equipment should be struck out. I am very glad indeed that the Minister of Railways feels that he can properly do that. It is exceedingly desirable that every reasonable effort should be made to secure the earliest construction of this line.

Mr. HAGGART (Lanark). What does the Minister of Railways say? Will this interfere with the contract?

Mr. GRAHAM. It will not. Take line 17, and you will find the words 'with its appurtenances and rolling stock.' Strike out the word 'rolling stock.'

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. It is moved in amendment that the words 'rolling stock' be struck out.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. CROCKET. When the resolution upon which this Bill is founded was before the House I moved an amendment for the purpose of making the resolution agree with the Act passed by the New Brunswick legislature authorizing the Lieutenant Governor in Council to guarantee the bonds of the company. The objection I made to the resolution was that it did not follow the terms of section 1 of the New Brunswick Act. Section 1 of the New Brunswick Act provides that :

No such agreement shall be entered into with any company or corporation for the construction of the said line of railway or the guaranteeing of the said bonds, and no such bonds or debentures shall be guaranteed, unless and until the parliament of Canada shall enact legislation authorizing the granting of a subsidy in aid of the construction of the said railway to the amount of not less than $6,400 per mile, and authorizing the entering by the government of Canada into an independent agreement with such company or corporation and with the government of New Brunswick aforesaid, for the leasing of the said line of railway, when completed, with its appurtenances and rolling stock and for the operation, equipment, maintenance, upkeep and repair by the said government of Canada, as part of the government railway system of Canada for a period of 99 years.

What I wished to have inserted was the word 'equipment.' I understand that the Minister of Public Works and the Minister of Railways objected to the word 'equipment' being inserted in the resolution, and it is not in the Bill. It seems to me that unless this Bill is made to correspond with the terms of the New Brunswick Act, the Lieutenant Governor in Council of New Brunswick will have no power to guarantee the bonds of the company.

Mr. CARVELL. My hon. friend must be in error. If he will read section 1, he will find in it these words: 'Including the supply of additional rolling stock from time to time sufficient to handle the traffic as it may arise, maintenance, upkeep and repair.' It seems to me it is all provided in that section. In my opinion the resolution upon which this Bill is founded really followed the legislation of New Brunswick. I may be wrong, but if the Minister of Railways is willing to eliminate the question of initial rolling stock or rather take that away from the company which builds the road, I can see no reason why the Bill should not be agreed to, because the company must, out of its own funds or the funds received from the sale of bonds or the subsidy, provide for equipment as the Bill now stands. All the Minister of Railways proposes is to eliminate the equipment so that it shall not be necessary for the company to make that expenditure, which makes it that much easier for the company to construct the road and have it operated by the Intercolonial railway.

Mr. CROCKET. My hon. friend from Carleton (Mr. Carvell) will see that these words in section 1 relating to rolling stock and operation are not in accord with the New Brunswick Act; and I do not see how the bonds can be guaranteed by the Governor in Council of New Brunswick until the condition prescribed by section 10 of the New Brunswick Act are fulfilled. That section requires an agreement for the operation, equipment, maintenance, upkeep and repair by the government of Canada. The first section of this Bill differs from the New Brunswick Act in that it does not provide for the equipment of the railway by the government of Canada.

Mr. CARVELL. Even by the New Brunswick Act it is not required that the railway shall be equipped by the government of Canada, but that it shall be equipped by the company, and the company will then hand over to the government of Canada the road with its original equipment. This amendment proposes to relieve the company from the necessity of providing the initial equipment, and I cannot see that that would prevent the government of New Brunswick from guaranteeing the bonds.

Mr. PUGSLEY. This change must be made with the unanimous consent of the House. Let the hon. member for York (Mr. Crocket) draw an amendment relating to the rolling stock, and let the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Carvell) draw one, and make them both agree. In the meantime I would suggest that there should be an additional section to accomplish this purpose. Section 1 authorizes the Governor in Council to enter into a contract with any railway, but there is nothing to authorize the railway company to enter into a contract with His Majesty. I, therefore, move that section 2 be added:

Section 2. It shall be lawful for the board of directors of any railway company under the legislative jurisdiction of the parliament of Canada, with which the Governor in Council proposes to enter into the contract provided for in section 1 of this Bill, to execute said contract, and the same, when so executed pursuant to the order of the said board of directors, shall be legal and binding on the company.

A company ordinarily has not the power to lease its line of railway. This will give that power to any company with which the Governor in Council enters into a contract.

Mr. HAGGART (Lanark). Has this company a Dominion charter?

Mr. PUGSLEY. Yes. It is under the legislative jurisdiction of the Dominion parliament. I move that the following be inserted as section 2 of the Bill:

It shall be lawful for the board of directors of any railway company under the legislative jurisdiction of the parliament of Canada with which the Governor in Council proposes to enter into the contract provided for under section 1 of this Act to execute such contract and the same when so executed pursuant to the order of such board of directors shall be legal and binding on the company.

Mr. HAGGART (Lanark). 'We do not generally empower the directors to do that without the consent of the stockholders?

Mr. PUGSLEY. Well, say 'The Board of Directors with the consent of the shareholders.'

Mr. HAGGART (Lanark). You do not need the unanimous consent?

Mr. PUGSLEY. Put it in this form:

It shall be lawful for the board of directors of any railway company under legislative jurisdiction of the parliament of Canada with which the Governor in Council proposes to enter into the contract provided for in section 1 of this Act, with the consent of the shareholders given at a meeting duly called for the purpose, to execute such contract, and the same when so executed pursuant to the order of such board of directors shall be legal and binding on the company.

Section 2, as amended, agreed to.

Mr. GRAHAM. If my hon. friend from York, New Brunswick (Mr. Crocket), will read what is proposed to be done, I think he will see that it meets his views and that the government proposes to provide the rolling stock. It is proposed to strike out in line 17 the words, 'and rolling stock,' in line 18 the words, 'equipped with initial rolling stock' and in line 20 the word 'additional,' thus making the section read:

The said line of railway with its appurtenances when completed and for the operation, including the supply of rolling stock, from time to time sufficient to handle the traffic as it may arise, maintenance, upkeep and repair by the government of Canada.

That would make it absolutely clear. Then, in the last line of subsection 3, leave out the words 'and equipped.' That would make it even clearer. Subsection 3 then would read :

Each twenty-five miles thereafter, until the line be completed from Grand Falls to St. John.

Mr. CROCKET. Our only object is that the legislation shall make it clear that the government of Canada shall provide the rolling stock. It may be, as the minister has stated, that the amendment he proposes will have the effect. But, in case there might be some doubt, I think the safer course would be to make the provision accord with the language of the New Brunswick Act. Section 1 provides that the Governor in Council of that province could not guarantee the bonds of any company undertaking the construction of this railway until there be an agreement with the government of Canada providing for the operation, equipment, maintenance, upkeep and repair by the government of Canada. This Bill, in its present form, certainly does not provide for that. What would be the objection to making the provision in the terms of the New Brunswick Act? Then, there could be no doubt. What I propose is to move that these words be struck out, and that the words of the New Brunswick Act be inserted in lieu thereof.

Mr. CARVELL. I think there is one objection to that. The words of the New Brunswick Act are found in Section 11:

For the leasing of the said line of railway when completed, with its appurtenances and rolling stock, and for the operation, equipment, maintenance, upkeep and repair by the government of Canada.

The object is to provide that before the government can enter into this agreement the rolling stock must be provided by somebody. As I understand, it is to be built by a company and handed over to the government. Of course, the company, under this arrangement, would not wish to provide the rolling stock. If the hon. gentleman will note the word 'rolling stock' near the bottom of page 41, in the New Brunswick Act, he will see the objection I am raising. Of course, it may be that that would be only an inference, but I am afraid it might be such an inference that some one would say we could not sign that agreement until the rolling stock was there.

Mr. CROCKET. Under the proper construction of section 11 the bonds cannot be guaranteed until there is an agreement for the equipment, maintenance and operation.

Mr. CARVELL. Not by the government of Canada until there is an agreement, with somebody.

Mr. PUGSLEY. With the amendment moved by the Minister of Railways (Mr. Graham) it would read:

And with the government of the province of New Brunswick for the leasing of the said line of railway when completed, with its appurtenances, for the operation, maintenance, equipment, upkeep and repair.

Mr. CROCKET. If it reads in that way it would answer the purpose.

Mr. PUGSLEY. That covers the ground. Even if it is not exactly word for word with the provincial Act I do not think that would make very much difference, because before a lease could be entered into, the provincial Act would have to be altered as it provides that the grade shall be fourtenths of one per cent, while this Act provides that it shall be sufficient if it is up to the general standard of the Transcontinental railway, which would, I think, allow a grade of one per cent. If arrangements could be made I should think everything could be agreed upon, and then any necessary amendment could be made at the next session of the provincial legislature.

Mr. GRAHAM. That suits me.

Mr. HAGGART (Lanark). Are they to provide the rolling stock or the government?

Mr. PUGSLEY. The government, under this amendment.

Mr. HAGGART (Lanark). Does that conform with your resolution? Under that resolution the company have to provide the rolling stock. How can you alter the Bill in a most important point after you pass the resolution?

Mr. PUGSLEY. It is not very important, because it is only in connection with initial equipment, and I stated that I trusted this might go through with the unanimous consent of the House. It is really a matter of enormous importance that this line should be constructed, and I hope that upon consideration my hon. friend will be one of those here who will agree unanimously to this.

Mr. HAGGART (Lanark). I am not making any objection, but it seems to me such a total change from what I understood was the meaning of the resolution, that is that the company should provide the rolling stock. Now we have it that the government have to provide it.

Mr. PUGSLEY. It was only the initial rolling stock. The minister might have that of great or little value.

Mr. HAGGART (Lanark). That would be only hand cars, &c.

Mr. GRAHAM. It is only the initial rolling stock, which would be poor.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Now, will some one follow me. In section 1, strike out the words:

And rolling stock when completed and equipped with initial rolling stock, for the operation, including the supply of additional rolling stock from time to time sufficient to handle the traffic as it may arise.

And insert in lieu thereof the words:

When completed with the appurtenances and for its equipment.

Then it would go on:

For its maintenance, upkeep, &c

That covers it.

Mr. CROCKET. Yes, that covers it.

Mr. GRAHAM. And on the second page, in subsection 3, strike out the words: 'and equipped'.

Mr. CROCKET. I think you want the word 'operation' in there.

Mr. PUGSLEY. 'And for its operation, equipment, maintenance', &c.

Mr. CROCKET. Yes.

Mr. CARVELL. You should strike out the word 'appurtenances' in line 17.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Yes.

Mr. CROCKET. The word 'appurtenances' is in twice.

Mr. CARVELL. Strike it out of the amendment.

Mr. GRAHAM. Yes, take it out of the amendment, and leave it in the original.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Strike out of the amendment the words 'with its appurtenances'.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. It is proposed that all the words in line 17, after the word 'railways', including lines 18, 19 and 20, be struck out, up to the word 'maintenance' in line 21, and that in lieu thereof there be inserted the words 'when completed with its appurtenances, and for its operation and equipment'. Starting from line 15 it will read as follows:

Twenty-five thousand dollars per mile, and with the government of the province of New Brunswick, for the leasing of the said line of railway when completed with its appurtenances and for its operation, equipment, maintenance, upkeep and repair by the government of Canada.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Then it is moved that in subsection 3 the words 'and equipped' be struck out.

Section as amended agreed to, Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

FISHERIES ACT AMENDMENT.

House in committee on Bill (No. 185) to amend the Fisheries Act.—Mr. Brodeur.

On section 1: licenses in British Columbia for making seal or fish oil,

Hon. L. P. BRODEUR (Minister of Marine and Fisheries). When the resolution on which this Bill is based was before the House I explained the object of the Bill. This clause is for the purpose of authorizing the minister to adopt some regulations governing the manufacture of oil from sealions, hair seals, sharks and dog-fish. As I explained the other day, we have had applications from people in British Columbia asking to be authorized to manufacture this product, provided regulations of this kind should be passed.

On section 2: license in British Columbia for salmon factories.

Mr. BRODEUR. This is a provision by which a license fee of $50 shall be charged to canneries in British Columbia. This has been recommended by the British Columbia Fish Commission as explained the other day when we were discussing the resolution.

Mr. CROSBY. Does this apply to the whole of Canada?

Mr. BRODEUR. No, this part only applies to British Columbia.

Mr. TAYLOR (New Westminster). I would like to ask the minister whether he has thought of the objection I made the other day, that this provision against dealing in salmon, and the curing thereof prevents a man curing salmon in his own back yard. Does the minister intend by this law to prohibit the individual fisherman from curing salmon? Is the law in the interest of large corporations who alone are able to pay this fee of $50?

Mr. BRODEUR. It is not intended to prohibit any person from curing fish in his backyard for his own use. For the protection of the salmon canning industry generally, it is absolutely necessary that the fish should be canned and cured under hygienic conditions and one reason why a licence is provided for is that we may have some control over the method of canning and curing.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER.

Mr. TAYLOR (New Westminster). The minister says he does not want to prohibit a man curing his own fish, but as a matter of fact he does prohibit him under this clause, and I would suggest that he should so draft it that his intention be given effect to and that it should not prohibit a man from curing in his own house. I know where a man purposed curing salmon on his own premises, for his own use, and not for commercial purposes, and the officer of the department at New Westminster told him that under this Act he required to take out a license which, the fee being $50, was prohibitive.

Mr. BRODEUR. Was it for his own use?

Mr. TAYLOR (New Westminster). Yes.

Mr. BRODEUR. What the Act has in view are establishments that are curing or canning for commercial purposes.

Mr. TAYLOR (New Westminster). The Act does not so limit it.

Mr. BRODEUR. If the curing was for his own use I can see no objection to it, but certainly these large canneries ought to be licensed so we may see that they are conducted properly.

Mr. FOSTER. You can add the words, 'for commercial purposes.'

Mr. BRODEUR. There would be no objection to that.

Mr. CROSBY. I agree that the government should have such control over large canning establishments as will enable them to ensure that the canning is carried on under sanitary conditions. But, when you add the word 'curing' it means pickling salmon or smoking salmon, and when a person buys pickled or smoked fish he can see what he is buying and there is not the same necessity for taking precautions as in the case of canning. I do not see why a man should have to pay a license fee of $50 because he is going to smoke salmon or put it in barrels even for commercial purposes. Of course the Act does not apply to the Atlantic coast and the people of British Columbia know what they want.

Mr. BRODEUR. The curing establishments we have in mind in British Columbia are large establishments which do not exist in the maritime provinces and they can easily stand a fee of $50. In some cases the curing and canning is carried on in the same establishment. In order to meet the objection raised by the hon. member for New Westminster, I am willing that we should add the words, 'for commercial purposes.'

Mr. DOHERTY. I have diffidence in venturing on this subject, not being a salmon fisherman, but I would ask the minister if these canning establishments are carried on by persons who themselves catch the fish? The minister limits the operation of this Act to the province of British Columbia, and I more than doubt that this parliament has power to regulate trade and commerce in a particular province, because that does not seem to come within the general regulation of trade and commerce confided to us under the British North America Act. If this legislation is under the provision which gives the parliament of Canada control of the inland and coast fisheries, then I do not see how a man who buys salmon and proceeds to can has anything to do with the fishing. It looks to me as if this provision were in the nature of local legislation for British Columbia, as to how people will carry on a particular kind of business in that province.

Mr. SPROULE. You might as well provide for a license to can chickens.

Mr. BRODEUR. Under section 91 of the British North America Act we have the right to regulate the fisheries, and we consider that the number of canning establishments has an effect on the preservation of the fish, because the larger the number of such establishments the greater the number of fish caught. In regulating the canneries we regulate to a certain extent the quantity of fish taken. In most cases in British Columbia the canners also cure the fish. It was the unanimous recommendation of the commission that legislation of this kind should be passed in order to preserve the fisheries.

Mr. DOHERTY. I quite understand that parliament has power to make regulations to preserve the fisheries, but this seems to me to be a somewhat remote method of getting at it. Instead of restricting in some way the quantity of fish to be caught, we take it upon ourselves to prescribe regulations requiring a man to take out a license for a canning establishment, and we actually prescribe that there shall be not more than one such establishment within 50 miles. You are regulating the quantity of fish to be taken by the indirect method of imposing obligations on people who are carrying on businesses in which they handle fish, but which do not seem to me to form any part of the fisheries. If you carried that principle out to its logical conclusion, you might prescribe how many fish stalls there should be on the market in Montreal. It would all work back to the preservation of the fisheries. It seems to be doubtful whether this is an Act to regulate the fisheries, as you are regulating how the fish shall be handled after they have passed out of the fishermens' hands.

Mr. BRODEUR. The salmon of British Columbia is not like the salmon on the Atlantic coast, a large quantity of which is sold in a fresh condition. The sock-eye salmon has to be canned to be placed on the market. Therefore, to reduce the quantity of fish to be caught, which we consider necessary for the preservation of the fisheries, we think the best method is to regulate the number of canning establishments, so that they will not be more numerous than the fisheries can stand. I may say also that we recently came to an agreement with the British Columbia government by which a certain number of fishing boats could be licensed in that province. As a result of our researches, we think this is the best way to conserve the fisheries.

Mr. DOHERTY. As regards the number of boats to do the fishing, that would seem to me to be a part of the fisheries.

Mr. BRODEUR. Canning is just as important.

Mr. DOHERTY. No doubt it is just as important; but when the Act gave you the control of the sea-coast and inland fisheries, did it also give you the right to control the fish after they were caught, and to determine how many should be canned in a particular province? If it did, it seems to me that it would give you the right to determine how many fish any man should eat, because that would work back to the protection of the fisheries.

Mr. SPROULE. Suppose the province, for revenue purposes, imposed a tax of $50 or $100 on each of these establishments, where would you be then?

Mr. BRODEUR. I may inform my hon. friend that they are imposing a tax to-day.

Mr. DOHERTY. The provincial government might also impose a license.

Mr. BRODEUR. Yes, there is no doubt that under the British North America Act the provincial government could impose a license, and it is doing so.

Mr. TAYLOR (New Westminster). I would like to point out to the minister again, as I did the other day, that the effect of this clause is not in any way to preserve the fisheries of British Columbia, that it makes no difference to the fishermen who go out with their nets to catch fish, how many salmon canneries are licensed, that the only effect of this provision is to strengthen the monopoly in the production of this article of food. The regulation providing that no canning establishment may be conducted without a license, coupled with the policy that no license shall be granted to any person not already in the business, continues in British Columbia the monopoly in the salmon-canning business now established; it does not operate to the preservation of the fish, but does operate to the increase of the profits of the canners at the expense of the fishing population of British Columbia. It creates a condition peculiar to that province, and not prevailing in the state of Washington where there are canners independent of the fishing combine. Now, I appeal to the minister to take further information on this subject if he is not possessed of it. I told him the other day, what seemed to be news to him, that there is in British Columbia an absolute fish combine; that all interests there are joined to establish the price which they will pay the fishermen, and the price at which they will sell, and to make for themselves whatever profits they see fit. I told him that this operates harshly on the fishing population, because they had in many instances to destroy a great portion of their catch, and I appeal to him before he puts this Bill through, to make provision in cases of that kind that when the licensed canners would not buy the fish which the fishermen caught, they should have some other market in which to sell them. I reminded him also that he not only prevented them selling their fish on the Canadian side by limiting the number of licenses, but also prescribed an absolute prohibition of export; so that when a Canadian fisherman has 400 or 500 fish in his boat ready to sell, and no Canadian canner will buy them, and when an American canner a few miles away holds out his hand for those fish, the minister says, I prohibit you by force of law taking those fish across the boundary line. That is the condition at present. It does not preserve the fish. On the contrary, it makes the cruel enactment that a man with this valuable property in his possession must destroy it because this government will not allow him to sell it in any quarter. It does not preserve the fish, but attacks the livelihood of the fishermen. In this respect the Canadian government is fostering as tight a monopoly in the production of food as any monopoly in the world. In the enactment of this law we confirm in cold blood what was perhaps an accident at the outset. We are providing absolutely that men with valuable property must destroy that property without getting any benefit to themselves, and for the profit of the salmon canners. The minister gives as a reason for this prohibition that the salmon canning establishments are also curing establishments; but if that is his only reason his purpose will be served by licensing them as canning establishments simply.

Mr. BRODEUR. There are some which are only curing establishments.

Mr. TAYLOR (New Westminster). There are private individuals who wish to go into the curing busines on their domestic premises, but who are prohibited by this because they cannot pay the license fee in competition with the large associations. We find the Minister of Fisheries standing up for the capitalists against the fishermen. The minister should be of all men the first to stand by the poor fisherman who is not able to protect himself. As I see no good that can result from the prohibition of curing salmon without a special license, but much evil, and as, so far as the canners are concerned, every good purpose is served by licensing their establishments as canneries, I move that the words 'or salmon curing establishments' be struck out of the section.

Mr. BRODEUR. My hon. friend's statement with regard to the combine is not at all well founded.

Mr. TAYLOR (New Westminster). In what respect is it not?

Mr. BRODEUR. Because there are several establishments. Take the Fraser river for example, Some are under the control of the British Columbia Packers Association, but there are also several independent concerns who are competing with the larger establishments, and doing fairly well.

Mr. TAYLOR (New Westminster). Will the hon. minister give the names of any of these concerns?

Mr. BRODEUR. Yes, we must have in the department the names of those independent concerns. My hon. friend himself said the other day that there were some.

Mr. TAYLOR (New Westminster). I would like to know the names of any which the minister has in his mind.

Mr. BRODEUR. I am giving the hon. gentleman himself as an authority because the other day he said that there were besides the British Columbia Packers Association some independent concerns. He claimed, however, that most of those independent concerns, and the British Columbia Packers' Association had a sort of board of trade or association like the Manufacturers Association, dealing with their interests generally. I do not suppose that any one would say that the manufacturers are a monopoly because they are members of an association called the Canadian Manufacturers Association. I understand that, so far as the Fraser river canneries are concerned, there is a large company, and some other independent companies which have absolutely independent management, and I do not see why we should call them a monopoly. I may say also that we are not prevented by this legislation from issuing a license to any other company, or association which shows its ability to carry on a curing or canning establishment. Quite the reverse. My hon. friend said the other day that it was pretty evident there was a combine regulating the prices to be paid to the fishermen. Of course if there were any such close combine among the canners, the department would be anxious to come to the rescue of the fishermen, and give them or give any other association a license. We are taking the power to grant licenses simply in order to control more effectively those cannery establishments. To-day we have no control over them. I would be very glad to refuse a license to any company which would go into a combine to the injury of the fishermen. So that instead of opposing this legislation, my hon. friend, who has the interests of the fishermen at heart, should help the government to have it put on the statutes. If there be no legislation at all, what can be done to prevent those men combining amongst themselves? There are, of course, some general laws, but they could not be applied so effectively as this legislation. I might remind my hon. friend that some years ago we passed a law obliging manufacturers to take out a license, and providing that if they should combine to prevent the freedom of trade, we could refuse them licenses. In like manner if those canners should combine for the purpose of depriving the fishermen of their honest, fair profit, it would be the duty of the government to refuse them licenses; and when those people see that they might be deprived of their licenses, they will be careful about forming any such combine.

Mr. TAYLOR (New Westminster). What advice would the minister give now to a fisherman—and this is not a hypothetical case—who catches five or six hundred fish and brings them down to the cannery wharf, and finds a notice put up by the licensed canners to the effect that the limit to-day is 200 fish? What is the fisherman to do with the other three or four hundred?

Mr. BRODEUR. In such a case, these men should immediately apply for a license and they will get it.

Mr. TAYLOR (New Westminster). No doubt, the minister means that. But I would point out to him that it takes perhaps six or seven months at the shortest to get the machinery for a salmon cannery, and the life of the salmon after it is caught is about one day. Therefore, it is simply impossible for the man who brings his six hundred fish to the salmon cannery and finds all but 200 of them left on his hands to secure relief by applying for a license to start a cannery. I wish to tell the minister that the effect of this limitation is not to preserve the fish but to make it necessary that a large quantity of fish must be absolutely destroyed. His combine of canners refuse to buy the fish, the minister will not license any other canners, nor will he permit the export of the fish to the canners on the American side who are perfectly willing to buy these fish at any time. The fishermen can get absolutely no relief from the minister. He protects the combine at every point but refuses to protect the fisherman. I do not think the minister understands the situation. I think if he were on the ground and saw, as I have seen over and over again, large quantities of as fine fish as ever were caught dumped into the river, he would hesitate little about making the necessary regulations. I can assure the minister the effect of these regulations is absolutely cruel to the fishermen of the Fraser, and that they do not operate to preserve the fish but rather to destroy them.

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. My hon. friend from New Westminster (Mr. Taylor) ought to be fair and state to the House why it is that, occasionally, there is a larger catch of fish than can be handled in one day. He has stated that he has seen fishermen come in with four or five hundred fish of which the cannery man would take only one hundred and the other three or four hundred would have to be dumped into the river. I believe it is a fact that on several occasions during the big runs such conditions have existed, because the catch for the day, or for several days in succession, was so great that the canneries could not possibly handle the fish during the twenty-four hours or so which elapse before they spoil. Therefore it was that the surplus had to be dumped into the river. That has occurred on the Fraser during abnormal runs in a big year. It is understood that the big run comes once in four years But in the last fourth year the run was not so large as to bring about these conditions, while in the ordinary years there are not enough fish to keep the canneries operating. Consequently no new canneries have started. The hon. member (Mr. Taylor) says the policy of the department is to keep down the number of canneries, and so it brings about a condition of monopoly. As a matter of fact there have been no applications for canneries on the Fraser river for a number of years. I am quite sure that if my hon. friend or any of his friends want a license for a cannery on the river, the minister will give the subject his best consideration. The hon. gentleman knows that many canneries are not operated, including some owned by the British Columbia Packers. They have been closed down. That has been true for a number of years. But it was unfair to convey the impression to the House that a large number of fish are being dumped into the river as a consequence of the policy of the department in limiting the number of canneries. Every person who has visited the canneries knows that ordinarily, in every fourth year the run is so great that the canneries cannot pack all the fish, and, therefore, take a certain number from each fisherman, which is fair. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Taylor, New Westminster) said something about the prohibition of the export of salmon taken by British Columbia fishermen—that the fishermen are not permitted to sell them to the cannery men on the American side, which would mean the cannery men on the Sound. But that would operate two ways. If the Fraser river fish caught by Canadian fishermen can be taken over and sold to the American cannery men—they would only have a distance of twenty miles or so to go—then the salmon caught in enormous quantities in the traps on the American side of the line should be permitted to come into British Columbia canneries to be canned there. The hon. gentleman knows that the prohibition of the export of fish for that purpose on the Fraser, and the prohibition of the importation of fish to the canneries of that river was agreed to a number of years ago. I believe it is more in the interest of the Fraser fishermen than it is of the Fraser river cannery men. The cannery men especially would be anxious to have it removed, so that they could go down to the traps across the line and buy all the fish they want. The hon. gentleman says these fish are thrown away. That is not always the case. I know, that as a matter of fact, large quantities of fish—I think a whole steamer load—was taken from the Fraser river to a northern cannery to be canned. The hon. gentleman says there is a monopoly among the cannery men of British Columbia. I do not believe there is.

On the Fraser river, there is a combination of cannery men during the season which regulates, as far as the cannerymen can regulate, the price to be paid for fish. That may be a combination, no doubt it is to that extent. But the Fraser river is not the only fishing district in British Columbia; there are more canneries outside of the Fraser than on the Fraser, and there are very many independent cannery men who are not in the British Columbia Packers, which is a group of canners working as one company. There is the Bell-Irving Co., a large, strong company, outside the British Columbia Packers' Co. In the north you have the Wallace Bros., absolutely independent of the British Columbia Packers. Then there is Henry Doyle, J. H. Todd & Son, the original cannery men of the province. These men are not in the British Columbia Packers; they are scattered over the coast from Alaska to the boundary line of the United States, and it is idle to say there is a combination that is operating to the disadvantage of the fishermen or to the enhancement of the price of such a food product as fish. Of course most of our fish is sold in Europe, the consumption in Canada is very small, and the surplus of the United States goes to the English market, where we have to meet it in competition. There is no doubt that the cannery men on the Fraser get together and agree what price they will pay the fishermen for their fish. The price may start at 10 cents, and if it is a scarce year prices go up to 25 cents per salmon, according to the abundance or scarcity of the fish. The cannery men agree that they will pay a uniform price. To that extent there is a combination and that operates against the fishermen. On the other hand, the fishermen combine and say: We will not sell below a certain price. As a matter of fact, the fishermen and the cannery men agree that a fair price shall be paid; in scarce years a high price and in plentiful years a low price. I would suggest that in order not to interfere with the fisherman who wants to cure fish, the words 'for commercial purposes' should be inserted after 'British Columbia,' so that small curing establishments would not be included as curing establishments and be required to pay the license fee of $50.

Mr. TAYLOR (New Westminster). I have no fault to find with the conclusion at which the minister has arrived, but I must take exception to many of the statements he made on his way to that conclusion. I have no objection to curing establishments for commercial purposes being licensed and taxed in this way, but I have very serious objection to what has occurred in the past, that is individual fishermen desiring to cure on a modest scale being refused permission to do so unless they took out a license and paid the same fee as a cannery with a large pack. The minister is far from being posted on the condition of the salmon industry in British Columbia, evidently he has given very little attention to it. I would suggest to him that it is not fair to those who are posted upon the salmon canning industry that he, with his prestige as a minister, should in this House contradict the testimony founded on facts which we are in a position to give. No one stated in this House, what he is at such pains to controvert, that the British Columbia Packers' Association control the industry in British Columbia or on the Fraser river. Five or six times the minister has made the statement that the British Columbia Packers are not the only persons in the industry in British Columbia. I have never heard any one say they were, in fact in the discussion the other day in the minister's absence that fact was made quite plain to every person here. There are on the Fraser river, for instance, three important interests, the British Columbia Packers Association, the A. B. C. Canners Association, the St. Mungo Cannery, and one or two others, all entirely distinct as to ownership and management, but all merged into one absolute combine as to the price to be paid for fish, and as to the price at which they will sell their product. The minister, when enlightening the committee just now, knew about the existence of these three separate associations of canners; evidently he did not know that these three were combined to fix buying and selling prices. In the absence of that knowledge, it is unfair to come to the House and say that no combine exists. Such a combine does exist, not sub rosa, not secretly, but openly; the combination has a public office and a public secretary; it issues to the press as well as to the members of the association day by day and week by week, during the canning season, its reports. We all know of its existence and it amazes me that the minister should say that no such combination exists. I must assume he does it innocently, I believe he does it unintentionally, but it is dangerous for him out of the mass of his misinformation or lack of information to contradict statements made to this committee by way of information. It is idle for the minister to say there is no destruction of fish. We on the scene, on the Fraser river, knows that this goes on all the time, and that the fishermen are absolutely helpless in the face of it. There is no notice given in advance of any limitation to be placed by the canners on the purchase of fish. The fishermen are sent out by the canners to catch all the fish they can get. They go to work at dark, they remain fishing until dawn; they may be rewarded with several hundred fish, and the first intimation they have that they are not to be paid for all their catch is when they arrive at the cannery wharf and see a notice that only a limited quantity of fish, it may be 100 or 200, or any other number arbitrarily fixed, will be bought by that cannery. I say to the minister and his colleague from British Columbia that any fisherman arriving at a wharf who is confronted by that notice has absolutely no recourse.

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. Does that limitation of the number of fish apply to every year, or is it only occasional?

Mr. TAYLOR (New Westminster). The limitation as to the number of fish is put up by the cannery owners at any moment when it suits their purpose to put it up, and that is where the hardship comes in, that there is no certainty on the part of any fisherman when he catches fish that he will have any market for them. The minister does not seem to know that American fish from traps are imported.

At six o'clock, Committee took recess.

After Recess.

Committee resumed at eight o'clock.

On section 2,

Mr. TAYLOR (New Westminster). Mr. Chairman, when the committee rose, I was pointing out a few inaccuracies in the statement, then just made, by the minister from British Columbia. Amongst other matters the minister referred to the fact that under certain conditions fish caught in the traps on the American side might be imported into British Columbia. The minister referred to this possible importation of trap-caught fish as something to be discouraged at all hazards. It so happens that such fish have all along been imported, are every season imported and are canned in the canneries on the Fraser river. This is a sample of how extensive was the knowledge brought to bear on this subject by the minister who undertook to tell the committee that I was astray on the information that I handed out. Under the law as it has stood the fishermen are absolutely prohibited from selling their fish on the American side. They are prohibited from exporting it at all, but the canners have not been prohibited from importing fish. Upon bringing it into the country, it is true, they pay a duty, but as they export the greater part of their product, that duty, minus a very small charge for office fees, is always refunded to them, so that the transaction costs them nothing more than putting up a cheque from the time they bring the fish into the country until the time they export it. The minister from British Columbia, when he mentioned this as something which at all hazards should be prohibited, overlooked the fact that he is giving his warm, enthusiastic, cordial approval to the arrangement which has been made at Washington whereby that which he says should not be brought into the country at all, is to be admitted, not of our own volition, but is to be admitted without any right on our part to interfere in any way with the process under the terms of this treaty, and is to be admitted free of duty. I would ask the minister what he thinks of that and upon what ground he can justify the attitude which he took here to-day of admiration for what he thought was the prohibition of the importation of that fish for canning with his attitude as a member of the government in bringing into effect 'a solemn bargain made with the authorities at Washington. whereby we are compelled to admit fish and have no means of keeping it out of our country unless we abro gate that arrangement.

There is another matter as to which I would like to say a word. It was the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, I think, who referred to this. In answer to my objection that under the regulations as they stand, fishermen are often compelled to destroy their fish, because the canners on the Fraser river have not the capacity to can them and put a limit on the catch, the minister reminded me that these fish are often taken on scows to the Skeena river, there to be canned, and he instanced this as a proof that there is no limitation upon the catch such as I have suggested. The minister omitted to state what is the fact, that when the fish are so bought for transportation to the Skeena river, they are bought at a greatly reduced price, so that the canner gets just as much profit from canning on the Skeena as he would if he canned on the Fraser, but the unfortunate fisherman gets a half or less price compared with that which he would get if there were facilities for canning on the Fraser river. I would like to direct his attention also to a circumstance connected with the restriction permitting only a limited number of licences to be issued to the canners, because he will see that the effect of that supposed precaution on his part for the preservation of the fishery is altogether destroyed so long as persons having a license to can on the Fraser are permitted to take a whole scow load of fish away from that district and can them at far distant places when their licenses were only supposed to apply to fish canned on the Fraser. I would like to point out to the minister also, to show how delusive is the idea that the catch of fish is limited by the number of licenses issued, that canneries vary a great deal in capacity, that under this Act, as I understand it—he may correct me if I am wrong—a cannery of the largest capacity pays the same license as a cannery of the most limited capacity, and that the process of enlarging canneries is so simple that an establishment that has but one unit this year may, next season, consist of two, three, or four units under the same control. Under the regulations now in force, if we have twelve canneries this year of one unit capacity each, we may have next year, under the same license, twelve canneries of four units each, or forty-eight units, making four times the quantity of fish that they may can, and yet the minister states that he is preventing the fish from being caught by prescribing that only the twelve present holders of licenses shall have licenses next year. I ask him what difference it makes to the fish whether we have twelve canneries of four units each or forty eight canneries of one unit each. The capacity would be precisely the same, but the monopoly created by the minister under the present regulations would be entirely destroyed. I think the time is opportune now, when the Bill is before us, for the minister to give this his serious consideration, so that when the fishermen complain, this year or next year, of being unable to sell their fish, they will not be told that an unconsidered provision of the law has brought about this condition, because here we have the whole subject up for review, the minister is fully informed of the present working of his Act, he has abundant opportunity now to correct the evil, he has noticed it and not more than three or four minutes would be required to remove all these disabilities to which I have referred.

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. The argument of my hon. friend (Mr. Taylor, New Westminster), has only one object and that is to establish the fact—if it were a fact—that in some manner or other the department has, by its enactments and regulations, created a monopoly in the fishing industry in British Columbia. I desire to say that is not correct at all. The hon. gentleman stated that all the proprietors of the canneries in British Columbia were in what is known as the British Columbia Canners Association.

Mr. TAYLOR (New Westminster). I have heard that of the British Columbia Canners' Association, and I certainly could not have said so.

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. The Fraser River Canners' Association was merged in what is known as the British Columbia Canners' Association which includes probably one-half of the canners in the province of British Columbia. On the Fraser river where twelve canneries operated last year, eight of these canneries were in the British Columbia Canners' Association, and four were not. The names of the independent canners are: Todd and Sons, Lee Company, Great West Packing Company, and Glen Rose Packing Company. There were twelve canneries operating on the Fraser river, but about three times that number must have closed up because there was not fish enough to go round and probably most of these canneries are owned by the firms who are now operating canneries, particularly the British Columbia Packers. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Taylor, New Westminster) has tried to establish the fact that the canners of British Columbia were combined in an association to regulate the price they shall buy the fish for, and the price they shall sell the fish at. That is not correct, inasmuch as of the 39 canneries that operated in British Columbia last year, only 20 were members of the British Columbia Canners' Association, and 19 were independent or outside the association. The report I have here comes from the secretary of the British Columbia Canners' Association, and is authoritative, and it shows that on the Skeena river—my hon. friend confines his attention to the Fraser river, but that is not the whole of the fishing industry in British Columbia by any means—on the Skeena river there are four members of the association, and four who are not, the independent canners being Todd and Sons, Kildala Packing Company, Wallace Brothers, Limited, and the Skeena River Commercial Company. At Rivers Inlet, there are three members of the association, and three who are not, the latter being Todd and Sons, Kildala Packing Company, Strathcona Packing Company. At Naas river two are members of the association, and two are not; in the outlying districts there are three members of the Canners' Association, and six outside or independent. The fact is, therefore, that one-half of the canners operating in British Columbia are not members of this so-called combine. But as a matter of fact the British Columbia Canners' Association is not a combine in the ordinary sense. As I understand it they are organized largely for the purpose of giving attention to the fishery regulations, keeping in touch with the Department of Fisheries with regard to the fishing regulations, and generally for looking after their own interests. It is true, as my hon. friend says, that at the opening of the fishing season the cannery men regulate if they can the price they are going to pay for the fish during the year, but on the other hand the fishermen who have a union, get together and try to keep the price at a higher rate, and by mutual concession the price is fixed. If the fish are plentiful the price is low, probably ten cents per fish, and if the fish are very scarce the price is high. I have known it to be 25 cents per fish, but I am not very well informed as to the prices. There is no evidence further than I have explained, of a combine to regulate the price paid. The remarks of my hon. friend appply to the Fraser river a little more than to the other districts. On the northern rivers it is true that more Japanese and Indians are engaged in the fishing industry than on the Fraser river where more white men are employed. With respect to the importation of fish for canning purposes, I am aware that some years ago it was a common thing for canners south of the boundary to come into Canadian waters and buy the fish caught on the Canadian side. That was objected to because some of the fishermen were under agreement to sell the fish to our own canners, and it was also undesirable that fish caught in Canadian waters should be taken south of the line to be canned in American canneries and form a portion of their pack. On the other hand some of our cannery men have gone south of the boundary line when fish were scarce in Canadian waters, and bought large quantities from the American traps and canned them at their canneries. That was a mutual interchange of fish. Some years ago the department prohibited the importation of fish from the American traps to be canned in our canneries; the Canadian fishermen having objected to the competition. On the other hand, our fishermen claimed the right to sell their fish to the Americans, if they could get a better price than they were getting from the Canadian canners. After a while the practice was stopped and there was no more selling of Canadian fish caught by Canadian fishermen to be canned in the American canneries. It is quite true that Canadian cannery men can go south of the boundary and buy all the fish they like and pay one cent a pound duty, and bring them to the canneries, and they can export them and probably get a rebate of the duty paid, although my information is that there is nothing of that kind done at the present time. As a matter of fact considering the catch of fish south of the boundary line there is none to sell to the Canadian canneries. If my information is correct that sort of importation of fish for canning purposes has not occurred for years. In my view our fish ought to be canned in our own country, and my friend will admit that if we permit our canners to go to the American traps and buy fish to can in Canadian canneries it would be competing with the catch of the Canadian fishermen and lowering the price of their fish. But, if our cannery men can buy fish from the American traps and bring them into Canada, and pay one cent a pound duty and export that fish and get a rebate of the amount of the duty, I would say to the Minister of Marine and Fisheries that our fishermen ought to be treated equally favourably and be given the advantage of selling their fish to American canners. I do not think the practice prevails at all, and I think my hon. friend will have some difficulty in establishing that fact.

Mr. TAYLOR (New Westminster). I think I made it abundantly plain that I was speaking for the fishermen of my riding, who are the fishermen on the Fraser river, and the Minister of Fisheries seems to be engaged in the rather dubious occupation of drawing a herring across this salmon trail. I made no reference to the fisheries on the Skeena river, which are entirely different from those on the Fraser. The seasons are different, the prices are different, the classes of people employed are different, the methods of the canneries are different. The two fisheries are entirely distinct. The canners on the Fraser river are combined under the name of the Fraser River Canners' Association, or whatever modification of that name has been recently made, as the Minister of Marine and Fisheries told me the other day was the case. The combine is as tight now as it ever was, and was equally so last season. The usual notice was issued at the beginning of the season by all the canners that the canners of the Fraser river would pay such prices for fish, and the same prices prevailed in all the canneries on the Fraser river last season. There is a fish cannery combine, and if the minister does not know about it, I would advise him to pay due attention to the situation there, and the fact will be very soon forced upon his attention. It is nothing to the fishermen on the Fraser river that some of the operators of traps on the coast of Vancouver Island are not in the combine; neither is it anything to them that the conditions are different on the Skeena river. We are concerned about the combine on the Fraser river, and what we ask of the minister is, not that he shall issue more licenses on the Skeena river or allow more traps on the coast of Vancouver Island, but that if any of our interests on the Fraser river desire to open a new cannery, they may be permitted to get a license.

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. May I ask my hon. friend if he knows of any person on the Fraser river or anywhere else who desires to establish another cannery on the Fraser river?

Mr. TAYLOR (New Westminster). Yes, I have known of it, and when they have gone to the Fisheries office at New Westminster and made the preliminary inquiries—because you cannot establish a cannery in a day just as you buy a hat—they have been told that the decision of the department was that no new licenses should be issued.

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. I want to say, then, to my hon. friend that if any decent company wants to establish another cannery on the Fraser river, and makes application to the department for a license, it will have my strong commendation, and I have the word of my hon. friend the minister that he will give it fair consideration.

Mr. TAYLOR (New Westminster). Am I to understand that the explanation of all these large words is that there is to be free trade in canning licenses?

Mr. BRODEUR. What my hon. friend is afraid of, I understand, is monopoly. He is afraid that this legislation is going to bring monopoly. I may tell him that it is quite the reverse. There may be to-day monopoly to a certain extent, though there is not practically, because, as has been stated by my hon. friend the Minister of Inland Revenue, there are on the Fraser river a certain number of canners who are outside and independent of the Association. These companies have formed an association for the purpose of approaching the government and discussing the various questions affecting the fisheries generally, just as we have in all parts of the country various persons engaged in the same trade who have formed an association for the purpose of discussing their mutual interests. That does not mean that they have formed a monopoly. Nobody would say that all the members of the Manufacturers' Association should be called monopolists. I may say to my hon. friend that if there are some people who want a license, and who cannot get justice from the existing canners, they will be welcome; and if on any occasion it is proven that justice has not been rendered to the fishermen, and those fishermen want to form an association and establish a cannery, they will be welcome to a license. The legislation we are proposing to-day is to kill any monopoly. If the canners do not render justice to the fishermen, why should we be called upon to renew their licenses? To-day the ordinary rules of trade are regulating these canneries; there may be a large number or a small number; but in future every cannery will have to come to the government for a license; and if it is found that they do not treat the fishermen fairly and equitably, we shall have an opportunity to force them to render justice. My hon. friend, who claims to be a friend of the fishermen, should welcome this legislation as being in the right direction.

Mr. TAYLOR (New Westminster). The hon. minister says that if complaint were made against the present canners, he would not renew their licenses. Suppose the fishermen made complaint against all the present canners, and the minister refused to renew their licenses, how much better off would the fishermen be? They would be much worse off. What the fishermen want is not that the minister should interfere with the canners, but that he should cease interfering with other people. Then they will be able to keep the canners straight without the minister's intervention. If the canners ill-use the fishermen this year, and the fishermen organize next year to meet the conditions, the canners, with their powerful combination and unlimited capital will so alter the conditions next year as to freeze out the new people, and when they are frozen out, the canners will revert to the old conditions. That is the experience with all combinations of that kind. I would like to point out how weak is the minister's comparison with the Canadian Manufacturers' Association, because there is no license or any other condition required before an investor can have a factory, and create the conditions which entitle him to become a member of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association. There is absolute free trade in factories. All the manufacturers do not belong to the Canadian Manufacturers' Association, and if any outside investor sees a chance of engaging in a business now controlled by any person in that association, he is at perfect liberty to do so.

Whereas in the case of the fisheries, no person ambitious to go into that business can do so unless he has a license from the minister; and for years it has been the policy of the minister to refuse a license to any one outside of those already engaged in the industry. He refers to the fact that many canneries on the Fraser are idle. But why are they idle? Because to create a monopoly, all the canneries on that river which could be purchased, were purchased by the British Columbia Packers' Association. Speaking from memory they purchased about fifty canneries and immediately closed about thirty of them. In New Westminster we had several cannery sites held under long leases from the city, but unfortunately the city did not foresee the possibility of outside capital coming in and buying out those concerns for the purpose of closing them. The British Columbia Packers' Association did close those canneries and made a condition in re-leasing the property that no canneries should be established on it. That was a profitable move from the standpoint of the association, but it did great injustice to the fishermen on the Fraser and the city of New Westminster. The hon. minister loses sight of the fact that all those interests are combined when there is question of fixing the price which will be paid the fishermen for their fish. He knows that in the last big year, when our fishermen might have expected to make a profitable harvest, the price of salmon on the Canadian side was exactly one half of the price which the same people were paying on the American side for identical salmon at the same time. When we got 10 cents per fish, the American fishermen got 20 cents; and when we got 12½ cents per fish, the American fishermen got 25 cents. My hon. friend's department alone is responsible for this condition, and it is a condition which we have only this opportunity of amending before the next big run is on.

Mr. BRODEUR. I am extremely sorry to find that my hon. friend still reiterates the statement that there is a combine in British Columbia, and that the fishermen are not well treated. If there be a combine, how does he account for the fact that there are several men in the business who are not in the association, but are absolutely independent of it? Besides, how is it that during the last three years no one applied for a license for the opening of any new cannery? Several establishments have been closed and my hon. friend says they were closed for the purpose of monopoly. That is contrary to the information we have in the department. The information we have is that these establishments were closed because they did not pay. But if other people wanted to start canneries, why did they not apply for a license? Within the last three years, not one has applied for a license.

Mr. TAYLOR (New Westminster). My information is to the contrary.

Mr. BRODEUR. That is the information I have from the officers of the department.

Mr. TAYLOR (New Westminster). The local inspector does not necessarily report applications for licenses. He has to inform prospective applicants that there is no use in his doing so because he has orders from the minister that no licenses are to be given.

Mr. BRODEUR. If the inspector had an application he would send it to the department. The inspector out there is a very efficient man, who would not refuse a license without referring the application to the department.

Mr. TAYLOR (New Westminster). Is it not a fact that the minister notified the inspector that no new licenses were to be issued?

Mr. BRODEUR. No, we never gave any notification to that effect.

Mr. TAYLOR (New Westminster). I certainly was under that impression. That was stated in this House last year in the course of the session and was not contradicted by the minister.

Mr. BRODEUR. That is not the information I have from the Acting Superintendent of Fisheries. He says that he never gave such instructions.

Mr. TAYLOR (New Westminster). If the minister will say that we shall have free trade in fishing licenses in the future, and that he will give a license to any one who wants to establish a cannery, that will be satisfactory.

Mr. BRODEUR. I shall be very glad to consider any application for a license. So far we have never had any.

Mr. TAYLOR (New Westminster). The minister has never refused an application?

Mr. BRODEUR. No.

Mr. TAYLOR (New Westminster). Why, then, will my hon. friend not remove this harmful impression by saying that he will not refuse a license in any case without some good reason?

Mr. BRODEUR. Certainly any man who applies for a license and proves that it is necessary such a license should be given, will get it.

Mr. TAYLOR (New Westminster). But how can any one prove it is necessary? How can any one tell what the future catch will be? We do not know what fish may be caught. It is an absolutely impossible premise which the minister lays down, and that justifies my suggestion that the reason he will not promise free trade in licenses is because he does not intend to grant new licenses.

Mr. BRODEUR. I can assure my hon. friend that if he has any one who wants a license, let him make the application and it will be duly considered; and if he makes out a good case the license will be granted.

Mr. TAYLOR (New Westminster). I am not here as the advocate of any special privilege or as an applicant for a special privilege for any one. I am speaking for the whole public and maintaining the rights of the fishermen to free trade in salmon licenses.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The amendment is that the words 'Or salmon curing' be struck out of subsection 23a of section 2.

Amendment negatived.

Mr. TAYLOR (New Westminster). The hon. minister from British Columbia (Mr. Templeman) suggested an amendment.

Mr. BRODEUR. I move to add after the words 'British Columbia' the words 'for commercial purposes' to subsection 23a of section 2.

Mr. TAYLOR (New Westminster). Does the minister intend to extend this system to the curing of other varieties of fish, and to other parts of Canada than British Columbia?

Mr. BRODEUR. That is not the intention now.

Mr. JAMESON. That is not the intention under this Bill, but let us understand whether, this principle having been adopted by this parliament, the minister will, later on, introduce legislation which would enable him to place under license any fish curing establishment in any part of Canada, no matter what variety of fish it might handle or what conditions had prevailed up to that time in regard to them.

Mr. BRODEUR. It is not the intention of the department now to make any change of that kind.

Section 2, as amended, agreed to.

On section 3—amending section 36—annual fee for lobster cannery license.

Mr. BRODEUR. This clause is inserted as a result of the recommendation last year of the Committee on Marine and Fisheries.

Mr. JAMESON. What protests have been received by the department in respect to any of the recommendations made by the Committee on Marine and Fisheries last year concerning the lobster fishery? I understand from statements in the press that protests have been made against certain of the recommendations, and, indeed, against some of the regulations framed under the recommendations, more especially that relating to the standard trap. It seems to me, inasmuch as that committee made this report, all the suggestions they did make were to be accepted in their entirety, and any suggestion which they made had reference one to the other. So, if it is not the intention of the department to enforce the matter of standard traps, it seems to me questionable whether it would be the intention of the committee that these other provisions, especially the increase in regard to the license fee should be enforced.

Mr. BRODEUR. So far as the change proposed in this section is concerned I believe no protest has come from any person or company. Some protests were made concerning the date at which we should put in force the regulations concerning the traps. My hon. friend will remember that these questions came up at the opening of this session. (I was going to say last session, because we have already spent some days upon this matter.) I thought I could not deal with these protests without having the matter referred to the Committee on Marine and Fisheries, as all the regulations that had been adopted were adopted upon the recommendation of the committee. Consequently, this complaint was referred to the committee. But the committee recommended —I think unanimously, but at any rate by a large majority—that the change asked for in the date of the coming into force of the regulations should be adopted. This report was made to the House, and as a result of that report I had the regulations amended to cover the recommendations of the committee. Since then I do not remember any complaint made to the department with regard to these recommendations. Perhaps I should except Prince Edward Island, where they have been asking for extensions. But we thought it advisable not to make extensions. The matter seems to be giving satisfaction now.

Mr. JAMESON. My recollection of the newspaper report I saw is that the legislature of Prince Edward Island had passed a resolution condemning in toto the regulation with regard to the standard trap and asking that it be rescinded. To be sure, there can be no active resistance to that regulation at the present time, because, if my memory serves me the regulation as to standard traps is held in abeyance until December 31, 1912. It may be that when that time arrives parliament, or the minister may see fit to either annul the regulation or extend it again indefinitely. If that were done, it seems to me, these other provisions when they were recommended by the committee, were contemplated to come into force simultaneously with the provision regarding the standard trap, might be left out. I would like the minister to state whether the legislature of Prince Edward Island has made a request that the regulation affecting the standard trap should be abolished altogether.

Mr. BRODEUR. I was under the impression that the objection made by the legislature of Prince Edward Island was simply concerning the time limit. It is some time since I read that. But, whether it referred to one or to the other, we thought as that was the deliberate judgment of the committee, we should not make any more changes, and so it will come into force at the time specified in the regulations,

Mr. JAMESON. The minister will remember that when the additional fee was proposed to be placed on the canners of lobsters, it was with the understanding that the revenue derived would be used for the protection of the fisheries. Now, we have this condition of affairs as a result of the postponement of the enforcement of the standard trap regulation—that there is no protection necessary, so far as preventing the taking of small lobsters is concerned. There is, as a matter of fact, no size limit to-day, generally speaking. Therefore, there is nothing to protect in that sense, and it seems unfortunate that the canners of these fish should be penalized by this additional fee when the revenue is not required for the protection of the fisheries.

Mr. BRODEUR. My hon. friend must remember that, in the regulations passed, it was provided that the standard trap would have to be made from January 1 last. So, the recommendations are now in force with regard to the new traps which are being made and so reasons exist for enforcing these regulations to ensure that the new traps are made according to the regulations.

Mr. JAMESON. I understand then from that what the minister has said he will see to it that the regulations affecting the standard trap are enforced from now on, so far as the new traps are concerned.

Mr. BRODEUR. Yes, certainly.

Mr. JAMESON. And that after December 31, 1912, that regulation will be enforced with respect to any of the old traps which may be still in existence.

Mr. BRODEUR. Precisely.

Mr. JAMESON. Is the minister taking any steps to patrol the maritime provinces coast waters, for the purpose of affording additional protection to the lobster fisheries?

Mr. BRODEUR. Yes, we are taking steps in that direction, and will likely ask for a vote of the necessary money.

On section 4: furnishing statistics to the department,

Mr. JAMESON. Has it been the custom of people operating these canning factories to report the number of traps which they fish?

Mr. BRODEUR. Yes, we have been receiving reports.

Mr. JAMESON. I did not know that many operated the traps; in most cases they operate the factories and purchase their fish.

Mr. BRODEUR. We have had reports

On section 5: keeping of lobster pounds.

Mr. BRODEUR. This is a new section to provide that pounds may be established in which lobsters caught during the open season may be placed and sold during the close season. Under the existing law it is illegal to be in possession of lobsters during the close season. This clause worked detrimentally to the interests of our fishermen, and as our close season occurs at a time when lobsters would bring a very high price on the American market, the American fishermen, having no close season, enjoy a great advantage in that market over the Canadian fishermen. Owners of these pounds may sell lobsters which they have caught during the open season, to American fishermen. This traffic must be surrounded with every precaution to avoid breaches of the law, and only after great hesitation and repeated requests have the department adopted this policy. I hope this policy will commend itself to the favourable consideration of parliament and that by it we can give a further advantage to the lobster fishermen.

Mr. JAMESON. On whose recommendation is this being done?

Mr. BRODEUR. On the recommendation of the officers of the department, and at the request of a great number of people who have asked for this year after year.

Mr. JAMESON. How many pounds is it proposed to license?

Mr. BRODEUR. As many as are applied for.

Mr. JAMESON. Will any assistance be given by the government towards the establishment of pounds?

Mr. BRODEUR. No provision is made in that respect. It is expected the revenue the owner will get by selling his lobsters in this way will compensate him for the expense incurred.

Mr. JAMESON. What will be the probable cost of construction?

Mr. BRODEUR. That will vary according to the location, in many cases it will be very slight.

Mr. JAMESON. What would the minister consider a large cost or a small cost?

Mr. BRODEUR. It depends on the location of the pound. There are places where pounds are naturally established, and only some further structures of small account are required.

Mr. JAMESON. As I understand, any person applying for a license will, on payment of an annual license fee of $75, be entitled to receive a license to keep a pound. I agree with the minister's statement that in some places the cost of construction of these pounds may be comparatively small, but such cases will be very few, comparatively speaking. In eastern Nova Scotia a pound was established some years ago, and the gentleman who operated it, informed me that although the situation lent itself naturally to the purpose, the cost of constructing and maintaining it was very considerable. The profit from its operation was not he stated very extensive, although, as I understand, he was receiving from the government a very respectable sum for handling seed lobsters. I know there is another place, in the county of Digby, where, some years ago, there was a pound in operation for the keeping of these lobsters during the close season. I am informed that it cost something like $10,000 to $12,000 to fit that up for the business, although the location was naturally one quite appropriate for the purpose.

But, the feature which presents itself most forcibly to my mind is that there are comparatively few places along our coasts which naturally lend themselves to the purpose which this regulation makes provision for, and that consequently there will be comparatively few people who will be able to avail themselves of the advantages of this amendment to the Act. That means then, in effect, that this particular business will, in different localities, become in the nature of a monopoly. There is, of course, another feature to it, and that is that the American palate is to be satisfied and gratified during the Canadian close season, while the poor Canadian will not be permitted to gratify his appetite, and he, as I understood the minister, will have to forego his dish of lobsters, during some months in the year. If the minister does not propose to make any relaxation with regard to the regulation in that respect it would not be lawful for a person operating a pound to sell these lobsters in the Canadian market during the close season, as he is only permitted to sell for use outside of Canada. The minister, during the discussion which we had some days ago on the subject of the lobster fishery, stated that it was possible for Americans and Canadians to fish for lobsters during the Canadian close season, outside of the three mile limit along the Canadian coast, and sell them in the American market, although they could not at the same time sell them in the Canadian market. It would seem to me that when we admit that that condition is possible, and when we erect these pounds along the coast, whether there be many or few, these two things working together will lend themselves to the violation of the law. The minister knows that there is a very pressing need for the enforcement of a close season, and that without the enforcement of a close season the lobster fishery, if it does not cease to exist, will certainly decline seriously. Indeed, there are many people who think that under existing circumstances the lobster fishery will become depleted, and be a thing of the past before very long. But, it seems to me that there are two dangerous features in connection with this matter. One is that it is bound to create a monopoly in different localities because of the very great expense to which it will be necessary to go to provide these pounds, make them satisfactory, make them safe, make them so that the lobsters can be kept in a healthy and wholesome condition; the other is that where you have these lobsters taken in the open season available to be put in the pounds by the person who is operating or controlling it, you are open to the risk of having lobsters taken outside of the three mile limit, or inside of the three mile limit in all probability, during the close season, and put into that pound surreptitiously. So that, there are these two features which are going to be evident in the operation of this Act when it goes into effect.

I should think that it would be very wise on the part of the minister to have some information, definite and satisfactory, as to the probable cost of the construction of these pounds, and of their maintenance, because, if any person makes application to the department, as I understand it, and that application has the approval of the fishery officer of the department, I take it that the department would be, under ordinary circumstances, in duty bound to issue a license. May I ask the minister whether the department would in every case issue a license to any one applying for it who would be willing to pay the fee?

Mr. BRODEUR. The second objection which my hon. friend has mentioned against this policy——

Mr. JAMESON. I had not concluded my remarks.

Mr. BRODEUR. Oh, I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon.

Mr. JAMESON. Would the minister be good enough to state if the department will grant a license in any case when an application is made for it?

Mr. BRODEUR. Certainly.

Mr. JAMESON. That, it seems to me, is going to be the difficulty. Here you have a large number of people holding licenses from the department, each one of whom would be entitled to be in possession of lobsters during the close season. While I do not think there are a great many pounds, bona fide, which would actually be established, at the same time, the holding of these licenses would, on the face of it, give to the persons possessing them a legal right to be in possession of lobsters during the close season, and there would be a very serious danger of lobsters being taken during the close season under these licenses, although, the licenses, of course, would not be for that purpose, but merely for the purpose of enabling them to keep lobsters taken during the open season in their possession, and to dispose of them outside of Canada during the close season. I merely bring these matters to the attention of the minister because he has regulations intended to protect the lobster fishery, which is a declining fishery, but which is a very valuable one. These suggestions may perhaps be along the lines which he has himself considered, and perhaps he would give to the committee his opinion with regard to these different matters.

Mr. BRODEUR. I may say to my hon. friend (Mr. Jameson) that the fear which he entertains with regard to the possibility of violating the regulations in establishing these pounds has been engaging the very serious consideration of the department for many years, I was telling the committee a few moments ago that years ago we had applications from a number of people asking for the privileges which are now authorized to be given by the legislation under consideration. The department was afraid, as my hon. friend is, that there might be some violation of the regulations, that it would be inciting the people to violate the rules and regulations in the way he has just suggested. However, after giving the matter our most serious consideration, we have come to the conclusion that we should request parliament to give us the necessary authorization to establish these pounds. We will have at each of these pounds a man for the purpose of supervising the operations, and, having an officer in charge of the pound, nothing of an illegal nature can be carried on. There might be some violation, but the man who would do such a thing might incur very serious consequences. The owner of a pound will have to observe the regulations, and if he fails to observe them it is a matter of discretion with us whether we renew his license or not. That will induce him to carry out the regulations properly. In that regard I think that our fears, which appear to have been shared by my hon. friend also, will disappear, and that we may expect very good results from this policy. My hon. friend says that this is going to create a monopoly. I do not see how it can create a monopoly because we will issue licenses to every one who applies. I am informed that the cost of Mr. Baker's pound was $3,800, and I should think that the income to the owner of the pound will be sufficient to give a fair return for the money invested.

Mr. JAMESON. I understand that Mr. Baker's was almost a natural pond, and that the outlay was comparatively speaking small.

Mr. BRODEUR. I have no doubt that in many cases the cost would be greater.

Mr. JAMESON. I understand that it cost Mr. Baker more than the sum mentioned.

Mr. BRODEUR. Mr. Baker stated to the department that it cost him between $3,800 and $3,900. The idea is to sell these lobsters on the American market as well as on the Canadian market, and no lobster will be allowed out of the pound during the close season except on the certificate of the fishery officer. With all these precautions I should think that the law will not be violated and that a new source of revenue will be opened up to our people.

Mr. LOGGIE. Is there any size limit on the lobster taken?

Mr. BRODEUR. No. Berried lobsters will not be permitted to be sold.

Mr. LOGGIE. The small lobsters are now used in the canneries and when the canneries are not in operation they may be put on the Canadian market out of season, which I think is very undesirable. If you put a size limit on the lobster when placed in the pound it would not be so bad.

Mr. BRODEUR. I do not think there is any danger that these small lobsters will be sold as fresh live lobsters. Some years ago, as my hon. friend knows, we abolished the size limit regulation.

Mr. TODD. Coming from a fishing section of the country I wish to say that I heartily endorse this legislation. For a number of years, in my county there has been a great demand for the establishment of private lobster pounds, the idea being that when the lobsters grow in the pound to a large size they will be sold at a much higher price than if sold when taken first from the water. I believe that the license fee provided for in the Bill is none too high. In my section of the country there are places, small and large, where if cheap dams are constructed the lobsters can be held, and there fed and cared for. The size limit in Charlotte county waters is 10½ inches, and no lobster can be taken out of our waters and sold unless it is 10½ inches long or 4¾ carapace measurement. Those who establish these pounds buy live lobsters from the fishermen, and they cannot buy them undersize in our waters. I am sorry to say though that they can bring smaller sized lobsters from the waters of Nova Scotia, and they can keep these fish in the pounds and feed them until they grow to a larger size. The result is that often the growth of the lobster is from 150 to 300 per cent in say two years and by letting them grow to this larger size they get a much higher price for them in the American market. It pays those who own the pounds to keep the lobsters in them, and it pays the fishermen to sell to the pound keepers, and I cannot see how it in any way injures the lobster fishery. The lessees of the pounds have to take their chances on the lobster dying before growing to the increased size. Therefore, as all the risk is put upon the man who obtains the licenses for pounds, as the government is contributing nothing, and as the fishermen are benefited, I feel that the action of the government in this matter is highly commendable. I heartily approve of this measure as I believe it to be beneficial, judging from my own experience in the waters of my county and from what the fishermen have told me.

Mr. JAMESON. How long would the hon. member (Mr. Todd) expect these lobsters to be retained in the pound in order to grow to a marketable size?

Mr. TODD. Possibly the fishermen who put them in the pound would not care to keep them more than a year. I know of one case in Charlotte county waters where they have been kept for about two years. I may say that I have had a letter from one of the lessees of a large pound which comprises about sixty acres and he claims that his company has already lost about ten thousand dollars in lobsters, but a large part of that loss was due to losing eighty or ninety thousand lobsters in one season, not because of death or lack of care, but because they got out over the sea wall. The objection to using such a large body of water for a pound is that they have to use the traps in catching these lobsters as they do in the open sea. In the smaller places little dams could be built so that the water can be lowered, and the lobsters caught in the open season, and the fishermen are not put to the expense and labour of setting traps.

Mr. JAMESON. May I ask my hon friend what the system is in his county with regard to the storage of lobsters; whether the individual fisherman takes them there and puts them in the custody of the person who controls the pound, whether they are taken account of, and accounted for at the end of the season or when they wish to remove them, or whether they are sold to the operator of the pound at the time they are taken there.

Mr. TODD. The fishermen take these lobsters as near the pound as possible, and the licensee then sizes them and pays so much apiece for them. When these 150,000 or 175,000 lobsters were brought from these particular waters, I know, from the lobster canners of my own county, that they were complaining because they had to pay a cent a pound more for them than they did before it was found that the owners of these pounds were buying our lobsters and paying a higher price.

Mr. JAMESON. The proprietor of the pound takes the risk?

Mr. TODD. Takes all the risk.

Mr. JAMESON. I am glad to know, from what the minister says, that the Canadian epicure is also to have an opportunity of getting an occasional lobster during our close season. I understood, when he first explained the purpose of this amendment, that it was the intention only to allow lobsters taken during the close season to be exported. The minister states that an officer will be placed at each one of these pounds to see that there is no infraction of the law. I do not know whether that will entail the employment of additional officers, but I presume that it will. I have this to say with regard to the officers, and I think it will be endorsed by every hon. member of this House who knows anything about the lobster fishery, that the officers whom the minister may appoint for this purpose will have to be a little sharper and keener and more attentive to their duties than the officers who are at present supposedly looking after the lobster fishery. I think there has been very little attempt on the part of the outside officers of the department to protect the lobster industry, and, whether the minister appoints new officers or instructs the present officers to watch these pounds, I hope they will be given to understand that they are to watch them and see that the law is carried out; because I know that at the present time many of the officers of the department are winking at open violations of the law—the taking of lobsters in the close season and the taking of small lobsters at a time when there was a legal size limit. I hope the minister will give these officers to understand that they are to live up to the letter and the spirit of the regulations, because that is the only way in which the lobster fishery can be preserved. This amendment is opening the door to infractions of the law during the close season, and it is only by a rigid enforcement of the regulations that infractions of the law in that regard can be prevented, and the protection of the lobster fishery can be maintained.

The minister says that a license will be granted to any person making application for it. I would like him to inform the committee whether there will be any standard of pound, because I can very well apprehend that there may be individuals who, without having any proper place available for the construction of a suitable pound, men perhaps with the best of intentions, but lacking experience in this matter, may make application, thinking they may be able to carry out the impounding of lobsters in a satisfactory way. The minister may remember that two years ago, when the committee sat to take evidence with respect to the lobstery fishery, and particularly with regard to the impounding of lobsters, one of the witnesses, who knew considerable about the matter, declared that there should be certain standard regulations in regard to these pounds, because the sunlight impinging on the backs of these fish when the water over them was not sufficiently deep to protect them, brought about a sickness which made them unfit for human food or killed them outright. So I presume it will be necessary to fix some standard or have some regulation as to where these lobsters may be impounded, and that it will be on the certificate of some officer in that regard that the license will be issued. I would like the minister to inform the committee as to whether the license will as a matter of fact be granted only after an examination by some officer of the department, and when the department is satisfied that there is a proper pound available, in the possession of, or under the control of the person making the application for the license.

Mr. BRODEUR. We have not yet considered whether we should adopt a standard pound. This is a matter which should be left largely to the man who goes into the business. He will have to make a certain expenditure in order to get a proper pound. Then why should we interfere to prevent him from impounding lobsters in it? He might say that it was an interference with his business. So long as he impounds lobsters and disposes of them legally, that is the only thing with which I think the department should be concerned. We are glad to see a large number of persons going into this business. I think it will be very profitable if properly carried out. Of course, a great deal of latitude will have to be allowed to the man who goes into the business as to the selection of the site and the way he will manage the pound.

Mr. JAMESON. I am glad to have that explanation of the minister, because what I wanted to make clear was this, that in the granting of these licenses there would be no preference shown to one man over another, whatever his local standing or influence might be—I need not, perhaps, say whatever his political leanings might be. But there are some people in the community who have a pull, so to speak. Any man who has the desire to enter into this business, I understand from what the minister says, will have as good an opportunity and right, and stand in as good a position before the minister and the department, as the man who may be more wealthy and more influential—every person will have a fair show and no partiality will be shown.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

MONTREAL HARBOUR COMMISSIONERS ACT.

Bill (No. 48) to amend the Montreal Harbour Commissioners Act, 1894—Mr. Brodeur—read the second time, and the House went into committee thereon.

Mr. BRODEUR. This Bill is for the purpose of correcting an error in the description of the boundary of the harbour of Montreal. In the description the southern boundary is used instead of the eastern boundary.

Mr. DOHERTY. If I understand correctly, the error consists in the fact that what is usually called the southern side is really the eastern side.

Mr. BRODEUR. Yes. We are in the habit of saying that the lower part is the eastern part whereas it is the northern part.

Bill reported, read the third time, and passed.

REGULATION OF THE MANUFACTURE OF EXPLOSIVES.

Bill (No. 79) to regulate the manufacture, storage and importation of explosives—Mr. Templeman—read the second time, and House went into committee thereon.

On section 2,

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. I desire to amend subsection (g) in this respect. That section reads:

'Magazine' means and includes any building, storehouse, structure or place in which any explosive is kept or stored.

The provincial authorities have pointed out that possibly we might be infringing on provincial magazines licensed by the provinces, and after consultation with the provincial authorities we agreed to this amendment:

That after the word 'stored,' the following words be added: 'Other than at or in or for the use of a mine or quarry in a province for which provision is made by the law of the said province.

Mr. JAMESON.

Mr. DOHERTY. As this amendment is made in deference to a suggestion that some portion of the Bill might be an infringement of provincial rights, I should like to point out that this measure save in so far as it deals with the importation of explosives, is clearly something not within the legislative competency of this parliament. This Bill purposes to regulate the way people shall handle explosives, and that has nothing to do with any general regulation of trade or commerce. It undertakes to regulate how any man in his own factory shall handle and deal with explosives and its purpose is the protection of life. It does not seem to me to be anything but a purely local matter in each province, and if you cannot justify it on the ground that it is a regulation of trade and commerce, as the words 'trade and commerce' have been interpreted by the highest authorities—that is, the regulation of some general nature or affecting commercial interchange either between the different provinces or between the provinces and the outside world—I entirely fail to see how you can justify it at all. There is at least one section that makes quite clear how purely local this matter is. I refer to section 10 :

10. No license shall be granted for any factory or magazine hereafter established within the limits of, or within one mile of the limits of any city, town or incorporated village, or elsewhere except with the approval of the municipal corporation or other local authority having jurisdiction, and also with the consent of the minister.

That provision—in itself a most excellent provision—clearly indicates the purely local nature of this legislation. Methods of handling explosives which a man has stored may be perfectly safe in one locality and very dangerous in another; and here you are endeavouring to regulate the handling of explosives by one general law made applicable all over the country. And, because you are seeking to make the law applicable all over the country, I suppose it is inferred that that gives jurisdiction. I would respectfully suggest for the consideration of the minister that that is an unfounded idea. What determines the jurisdiction is the subject matter that is dealt with; and I should certainly be very much interested to know under which of the provisions of section 91 of the British North America Act the minister says he has power to declare how I shall handle explosives in my possession in the particular locality in which I live. So far as this is a licensing Act—for I believe there are provisions requiring licenses—it does seem to me that the provinces certainly would have power to license persons handling explosives. I know that in my own province people have to take out a license for the sale of gunpowder. I think the minister ought to be in a position to point out to us where he finds jurisdiction in this parliament to regulate how people shall carry on their business on their own premises in the locality in which they live. I must confess that, even after some reflection, I have not been able to find the grounds on which this is brought within the jurisdiction of this parliament. I do not say that there are no provisions of the Bill that are within our jurisdiction. The regulation of importation is clearly within the power of this parliament. And there may be other provisions also. But the bulk of the sections seem to me to contain provision to secure purely local ends—to secure people from dangers that may result from the fact that somebody is handling explosives in the course of his business or otherwise in these localities.

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. I would not care to debate the constitutionality of this Bill with my hon. friend (Mr. Doherty). This is a Bill, as he sees, regulating the manufacture, importation and storage of explosives. The Bill was framed by Captain Desborough, the chief director of explosives of Great Britain, who came to this country last summer, spent several months examining the conditions of our powder establishments and presented to my department a full report which has been printed and sent to each member. The Bill was subsequently referred to the Department of Justice. I have conferred with Mr. Newcombe the Deputy Minister of Justice on the point of the power of this parliament to legislate on the manufacture of explosives and the regulation of magazines, and I was advised that there was no doubt that the Bill was constitutional. Great care has been taken in the preparation of the Bill not to trench in any way upon provincial jurisdiction.

Mr. SPROULE. Under what clause of the British North America Act does the minister claim jurisdiction? Was it under 'Trade and Commerce'?

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. Yes, I think he quoted that as one of the clauses that gave this parliament supreme power. I should like to point out that this Bill is the outcome of a strong public demand. The first request we had for legislation by the Dominion parliament on this subject came from the Ontario Department of Mines. It appears to be impossible for any province to control by regulation the manufacture of explosives and to inspect the explosives to ascertain that they were of proper composition and not too easily exploded. There ought to be uniformity in the character of the explosives used if the very numerous accidents, such as we have had in the last twelve months, are to be obviated. After a conference with the manufacturers of explosives in Canada, the contents of this Bill were approved of. The provincial governments were consulted, and we had the very able assistance of Mr. Thomas Gibson, the Deputy Commissioner of Mines for Ontario. We exempt from the jurisdiction of this Bill magazines licensed by a province which has inspectors and the machinery for inspecting magazines. Thus this Bill is really introduced at the urgent demand of several of the provinces, and all the manufacturers and a general public demand. Such catastrophes as have occurred at Sand Point cannot possibly be prevented by any provincial legislation; at least every province would have to pass legislation regulating the character of manufacturing establishments, and would also have to establish an elaborate scientific staff to examine every explosive placed upon the market. The provinces have desired this government to deal with this matter so as to have uniformity.

I would not attempt to argue the constitutionality of some of the Bill's provisions with learned lawyers; I simply state that the Bill has had the endorsation of the Justice Department. It is highly in the public interest if we can avoid such terrible catastrophes as have occurred. The Hull disaster of a year ago is an example. Four tons of virite exploded. The day before the explosion there were 24 tons in the storehouse near Hull, and if the explosion had taken place while the entire quantity was there I am told the foundations of this building would have been shaken, and the walls might have tumbled down. It is a very serious matter. Even if there is a little doubt as to our power to license powder magazines, there is no chance of objection by any province on the ground that we are infringing on their rights, it is not a question that the provinces will be too anxious to assert their right to legislate upon.

Mr. DOHERTY. The anxiety of the provinces to maintain their rights is the smallest consideration. Just because this legislation is of the greatest importance, and because satisfactory legislation for the protection of the public against danger resulting from explosions is highly desirable, these are the very reasons that make it essential we should have effective legislation. If we have not jurisdiction this will not be effective legislation, and it will make no difference if the provinces do ask for it. If the provinces lie back and do not pass the requisite legislation, when the public good requires it, and leave the matter to us, and we have nothing to justify ourselves except that the public good re quires such legislation, that fact will not make our legislation any more effective, and the result will be that we will have legislation which if it were effective would be most desirable but, if ineffective, would be quite useless and our intervention in the matter will simply serve to lull the people whose duty it is to attend to these things, into the idea that they are being attended to. It is precisely because of the great importance of this legislation that it should be effectively made. I have the very highest respect for the opinion of the Justice Department, and of the Deputy Minister of Justice particularly, and I do not want to criticise it, but it would be a certain satisfaction to us, who have some doubts on this subject, if we could be informed upon what provision in law the Deputy Minister of Justice based his opinion. In the very first section we have a provision that no person shall have an explosive in his possession without a license from the minister. If this provision is based upon the jurisdiction of this parliament to deal with the regulation of trade and commerce, I fail to see how this House can impose upon me the necessity of having a license from the minister in order to have an explosive in my possession. That surely has no connection with trade and commerce.

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. My hon. friend will see that that is unless it is an authorized explosive.

Mr. DOHERTY. I am within the provisions of this law if I have it in my possession without any idea of dealing with it in any way. The provisions with regard to selling explosives are open precisely to the same objections. I have great respect for those who have asked for and recommended this legislation and for the provincial authorities, but all of these things constitute no answer to the question that may be raised as to the effectiveness of this legislation. The answer to the objection which will be made will have to be found in the British North America Act, and I think that certainly it is regrettable that we are not to be put in a position to know just in virtue of what power we are taking it upon ourselves to make this legislation.

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. The point that my hon. friend raises is that this Bill prohibits any person from having in his possession or selling explosives. That is true, but its application is to dangerous explosives; that is explosives that have not passed the test for which this Act provides. A chemical and explosive test will be made. All explosives covered by this Bill will be tested by experts, and none but authorized explosives may be sold. While it is in the interest of the public that this should be done, it is in effect, a matter of trade and commerce. No legislation of this kind would be worth anything unless the explosives were tested chemically in order that an unsafe explosive should not be put upon the market. What is or is not a safe explosive can only be determined by experts, and by the expenditure of a considerable amount of money. As to the constitutionality of this measure, I can only speak on the authority of the Deputy Minister of Justice, who told me that the provisions of this Bill were justified and that they were authorized, and that they were necessary to the general safety of the public. There may be a possibility that in granting licenses for magazines operated under provincial legislation we may be trenching upon provincial jurisdiction. But this Bill does not attempt to deal with the general public use of explosives, We are only dealing with the manufacture, transportation and sale of improper or unauthorized kinds of explosives. I have given my hon. friend all the authority that I have for saying that this Bill is within the competence of this House. It is an experiment. There is no legislation of this kind in Canada, and there is very little legislation in any of the provinces regulating the use of explosives. I do not know of any. Some of the provinces have legislation with respect to the way explosives may be stored, but there is nothing in respect to the quality, or the manufacture of explosives which this Bill attempts to regulate. I will have to ask my hon. friend not to press his constitutional point too strongly. The government will take the responsibility, if it is acting unconstitutionally in this matter, and rectify its error at a future time, if we find out that we have made one. But, I believe we have not made one.

Mr. DOHERTY. It may be a little late to rectify an error after the legislation that it is endeavoured to enforce is found to be unworkable. If you are relying on this legislation, when perhaps the jurisdiction is not here to prevent the great evil of the uncontrolled handling of explosives, you are running the serious risk of meeting a situation where you have nothing but the fancied security resulting from illegally enacted legislation. While I do not propose to press the point too far, still it is one which deserves serious consideration, and if the Department of Justice, have given it serious consideration, I suppose they have said the last word on the subject. At all events, I shall be able to feel that I can sleep soundly and that I have no further responsibility in the matter.

Mr. SPROULE. I think that the minister must be a disciple of the late Oliver Mowat. He said at one time that whenever there was a question as to the right of the legislature to legislate upon any subject although he was fully satisfied that it had such a right, still he went on the assumption that it had, went on and legislated and left it to the courts and the people afterwards to determine whether the legislature had or had not that right. He was not very much concerned whether he had authority so long as he honestly believed he had and he went on and legislated.

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. And he enacted a lot of good legislation.

Mr. SPROULE. Yes.

Mr. ARTHURS. If the minister gives the ordinary meaning to the words 'kept and stored' I believe that this legislation will go farther than is contemplated by him. As I read the Bill it would prevent the sale or storage of any cartridges, or percussion caps in any ordinary store in any town in Canada. Let me read clause (g) of section 2:

'Magazine' means and includes any building, storehouse, structure or place in which any explosive is kept or stored.

Section 6 says:

The minister may issue licenses for factories and magazines, and no one shall manufacture, either wholly or in part, or store explosives except in licensed factories and magazines.

Clause 10 provides that:

No license shall be granted for any factory or magazine hereafter established within the limits of, or within one mile of the limits of, any city, town or incorporated village, or elsewhere except with the approval of the municipal corporation or other local authority having jurisdiction, and also with the consent of the minister.

If we take this language in the ordinary way I think it will prevent the sale of ammunition by any hardware store in Canada.

Mr. SPROULE. How is it that the province takes that right to itself? It is only during the last session of the legislature of Ontario that a law was passed prohibiting the sale of firearms, cartridges and such things for the peace and safety of the people. This legislation deals with explosives and firearms. The province must believe that it has the right to do so in the interests of the peace and safety of the people. We are dealing in explosives as well.

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. A great deal of this Act will be put into force by regulation. We will act on the advice of experts. Section 18, paragraph (e) provides that:

The Governor in Council may make regulations for excepting from the operation of this Act shops, stores and other places where small quantities of explosives are kept for use or sale.

There is no desire to interfere with the sale of explosives in stores. My hon. friend refers to the word 'magazine' in the interpretation clause. Of course, powder and cartridge in a country store, or in a city store for that matter, would not be in a magazine to be licensed by this Act.

Mr. ARTHURS. The Bill says that 'magazine' means any place in which any explosive is kept or stored. I do not see where any exception is made.

Mr. SPROULE. I think that the minister's explanation that he is going to do by regulation what he could not do by law is rather a strange assumption of legal power.

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. Well, it is absolutely necessary to make proper regulations in this case.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Shall the proposed amendment to subsection (g) be carried—that at the close of subclause (g) the following words be added:

Other than at or in and for the use of a mine or quarry in a province by which provision is made by the law of such province for the efficient inspection of mines and quarries.

Section, as amended, agreed to.

Mr. TEMPLEMAN moved that the following be inserted as a new clause after clause 2:

This Act shall not apply to the Department of Militia and Defence or to the Department of the Naval Service.

The Department of Militia and Defence secure their ammunition under proper supervision, and they do not want any interference by the Department of Mines.

Mr. BARNARD. Is the Department of Militia and Defence allowed to manufacture and keep unauthorized?

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. No.

Mr. BARNARD. But this Act does not apply to them. Some of the provisions of this Act are framed to prevent injury to certain people living near the manufacturies and storehouses and it would be interesting to know if the Department of Militia is to be allowed to keep storehouses in places dangerous to the people in the neighbourhood. Can the minister say that an explosive belonging to the government would not have the same dire results as an explosive manufactured by private individuals? So far as the Department of Militia is concerned, there is no authorized explosive, because this Act does not apply to it.

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. The Department of Militia and Defence uses English explosives and all English explosives have for years come under a similar provision. There is no explosive sold in England that is not tested and that has not been authorized. The Militia Department uses proper explosives under proper conditions.

Mr. GOODEVE. The minister has not answered the question put by the hon. member for Parry Sound, as to whether it was the intent of the Act to prohibit the sale of ordinary gunpowder in the regular hardware stores?

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. Unquestionably and undoubtedly it is not the intention to prohibit or interfere with the sale of powder in stores except it be that we have machinery in this Act for the inspection and testing of explosives, and there will be no unauthorized explosives allowed to be sold anywhere. This Act will not interfere with their keeping small quantities authorized explosives in an outhouse, or a store, or anywhere else.

Mr. GOODEVE. The interpretation clause says that an explosive means among other things, fireworks, fuses, rockets, percussion caps, cartridges, and ammunition of all kinds, and clause 6 says that the minister may issue licenses for factories and magazines and no one shall manufacture or store explosives except in licensed factories or magazines. The Act certainly would seem to contemplate the prohibition of the sale of powders by small stores. How can the minister reconcile these provisions of the Act, what do they mean?

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. They mean exactly what they say. All that the Bill will have to do with these things is to provide as to the care and safety of the chemical combinations in them. If the Act is not clear that it does not apply to the storage of small quantities of ammunition, gunpowder and so forth by the retail trade or the wholesale trade for that matter, I am quite willing that it should be made clear. The word 'magazine' applies primarily to magazines in connection with manufacturing establishments for the storage of very large quantities of explosives. I read in the papers recently a good deal about a magazine on the Montreal road, within a few hundred yards of a considerable population, where explosives are stored in very large quantities. It is magazines of that kind that this Bill purposes to deal with, and I am quite willing to make it so clear that there will be no reason to interfere with small quantities of explosives kept for sale in stores.

Mr. ARTHURS. Would the minister be willing to have a separate section reading in this way:

Nothing in this Act shall apply to shops, stores or other places where small quantities of authorized explosives are kept for use or sale.

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. Yes.

Mr. GOODEVE. The minister has just explained that 'magaizne,' in his interpretation, means a large magazine for storing large quantities in connection with the manufacture of explosives. But the question is not what his interpretation is if the Bill becomes law. The Bill purports to make the explanation, and it says that 'magazine' means and includes any building, storehouse, structure or place in which any explosive is kept or stored. That is very clear. The Bill also says what an explosive is, and it includes in that term caps, ordinary ammunition and fireworks; so that ordinary ammunition could not be kept in any store or in any room without a license. I may say that I am not objecting to the Bill, because I think the principle of it is a good one.

Mr. ROBB. Will the minister define what a small quantity is?

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. I suppose such quantities as merchants keep.

Mr. BARNARD. A wholesale merchant might keep several tons, while a retail merchant might keep very little.

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. We might strike out 'small quantities' and say 'shops or stores where explosives are kept for use or sale.'

Mr. DOHERTY. The amendment apparently entirely destroys the definition of a magazine as set forth in section 2, or at all events restricts it to places where explosives are kept neither for sale nor for use. It would appear to me that a place where a man kept explosives neither for sale nor for use would be a very restricted number of places. The manufacturer who keeps his explosives in a magazine is keeping them for sale at some period, and this amendment would make the Act utterly inapplicable, no matter how large the quantity was, unless it were kept for sale or use. It seems to me that the amendment is absolutely contradictory of the definition of a magazine in the Bill.

Mr. BUREAU. Why not define the word 'magazine' as including any building in which any explosive is kept or stored except retail stores where explosives are kept for sale, and private houses where explosives are kept for the use of the owner thereof.

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. Better let that clause stand.

On section 3,

3. Except as herein provided, no person shall have in his possession, or import, store, use or manufacture, whether wholly or in part, or sell, any explosive unless such explosive has been declared by the minister to be an authorized explosive.

Mr. BARNARD. We have had to-day a Bill which provides that no one shall go into the salmon canning business without a license. We have on the statutes an Act providing that no one shall go into the whale fishing business without a license. We know that a monopoly was given to one company for the whole whale fishing business. It seems to me we are carrying on this license business a little too far. It is not always easy to get these licenses. There is no prescribed course whereby anybody who wants a license can come to the government and easily get it. It takes a long time, and in a great many instances the license is refused. And sometimes, when friends of the administration find out that other people are applying for the licenses, they come in and the first applicant does not get the license but the friends of the government do.

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. What kind of a license?

Mr. BARNARD. Any kind.

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. Name one.

Mr. BARNARD. I could name one if I chose.

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. This is a very good time to do it.

Mr. BARNARD. I have one case in mind where that fact exactly happened. I would suggest that this matter should be safeguarded in some other way. It seems to me it could be safeguarded by having regulation and inspection with a heavy penalty for violation of the regulations. This matter is of very great importance to the province from which I come. In reading the report of Captain Desborough, and the suggestions he made, it occurs to me that this Bill is going to very materially increase the manufacture of explosives, and so increase the cost to the consumer. The Minister of Inland Revenue (Mr. Templeman) is well aware that the cost of powder is a very serious expense particularly in British Columbia where powder is used so extensively both in the mines and in the clearing of land. While I am not prepared to say that precaution should not be taken for due care and the prevention of explosion, yet, I submit that very great care should be taken that the cost of production is not unduly increased. Captain Desborough, I understand, is an expert in charge of the military powder manufactories in England.

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. Director of explosives.

Mr. BARNARD. At any rate he is connected with the imperial army, is he not?

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. He is an officer on the retired list, but belongs to the Home Office. He is enforcing the Explosive Act.

Mr. BARNARD. At any rate, he is a government official, and the factories he is familiar with——

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. No, he has charge of the inspection of all the manufactories in England.

Mr. BARNARD. At any rate, there can be no doubt that in a closely populated country like England greater precautions are required so far as storing explosives is concerned than in a country like this. In a country of that kind they are more likely to go into more expensive work and operation than is necessary in a sparsely settled country. Therefore, I would suggest to the minister that he should be very careful to see to it that the recommendations of Captain Desborough do not unduly increase the cost of production. It is curious—I do not say that there is any connection between the two facts—but I am informed that just at the time Captain Desborough came here in connection with this manufacture of explosives, a company was formed in England with a capital of $10,000,000 with the idea of making a merger of several large powder companies throughout the Dominion of Canada. And it is obvious, that while there may be, as I say—and I do not suggest that there is any connection between the two facts—but it would be obvious that the more expensive the manufacture of explosives is made, the less danger there is of competition against a trust of that kind.

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. There is no limitation to the number of licenses to be issued. Any person can go into the manufacture of explosives. I have no fear that because we are going to issue licenses and to regulate this business, we shall increase the cost. As a matter of fact, the English explosives are selling for less than others, and they are manufactured under careful regulation. There will be no limitation of the number of manufactories. Under the Department of Inland Revenue there is no limitation of the number of distilleries. You can all have licenses for the manufacture of alcohol if you like, and the same will be true with regard to this other kind of explosives.

Mr. BARNARD. The point I was trying to make is that if the cost of production is increased—as, undoubtedly, it must be—that would have the effect of deterring other people from going into the manufacture. If I read aright the recommendation and report of Captain Desborough, he stated that in manufacturing they put too many machines of one kind in one building, also that too large a quantity of explosives was stored in one building, also that there should be embankments of earth between the different buildings—and generally made a number of recommendations which meant undoubtedly very largely increased cost of manufacture. The manufacture of giant powder and gunpowder, I understand, is a comparatively simple and cheap matter. But if you are going to hedge it about with restrictions of the kind I have indicated, you are going to increase the cost of production and the cost to the consumer. That would make it necessary to have more capital in order to start in the business and would certainly keep others out of it.

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. My hon. friend, I trust, does not wish to continue the present conditions. The conditions of manufacture have been condemned by Capt. Desborough, and the changes are all designed to avoid accidents. In my hon. friend's own country there were two or three disastrous accidents last year. I do not know the cause of those accidents and it is to deal with these questions that this Bill is introduced. As to the increase of cost to the manufacturer a representative of every manufacturer, especially in Eastern Canada, conferred with Capt. Desborough and heartily supported the provisions of the Bill. They are all prepared to continue manufacturing under the conditions of this Bill.

Mr. BARNARD. I hope my hon. friend did not think I objected because the cost to the manufacturer would be increased? Capt. Desborough states that they were not going to disturb to any extent existing plants, and I object to the minister saying I am not in favour of the principle of the Bill. I have not the slightest objection to every attempt being made to safeguard the lives of those engaged in this industry, but we must be careful not to so increase the cost of production as to make the purchase of powder any greater burden than it already is in British Columbia.

Mr. DOHERTY. What is meant by an authorized explosive and how is the declaration that an explosive is authorized to be made?

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. When an explosive has passed the tests prescribed under the supervision of the inspector of explosives, and is approved by him, the minister will declare it an authorized explosive. The chemical composition will be the basic principle of the test.

Mr. BARNARD.

Mr. GOODEVE. I sympathize with the object of the Bill in regard to protecting the lives of those engaged in the manufacture of explosives, and also those who use them; with the largely increasing use of explosives in our various industries, it is essential to have an Act of this nature, so that any criticism I have to make is not because I am opposed to the principle of the Bill. It seems to me that the Bill will interfere with certain provincial rights, and will bring about confusion and conflict where the province has effective legislation. If the Bill was confined to the manufacture of explosives and their use for specific purposes, and did not embrace the sale and stronger of all kinds of explosives, some of these difficulties might be overcome. Has the minister consulted the various provinces to avoid conflict with provincial Acts? Once the Dominion parliament legislates, that legislation will override any provincial Act.

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. The hon. member for St. Anne Division (Mr. Doherty) raised the question of provincial rights, but he has thrown responsibility for the constitutionality of this Bill upon the government, and is not pressing that point. As far as the constitutionality of the Bill is concerned, I am resting entirely upon the opinion of the Deputy Minister of Justice. The Bill was referred to all the provinces, and they were all satisfied with it and were very anxious that a general law for all Canada should be passed by the Dominion parliament.

Mr. MACDONALD. I did not have the opportunity of hearing all the discussion on this Bill, but the remarks that the hon. member made have attracted my attention to the possibility of a conflict of jurisdiction which might arise. In my province we have very complete regulations as to the use of explosives in connection with the mines, and these laws have been found to work very satisfactorily. I trust that the minister has made provision in the Bill, which I regret I have not studied closely, to see that there is no infringement with these regulations as they are already provided, particularly in the mines. Where you have to deal with the coal mining industry, where the lessees and operators of these mines, hold under the Crown, and where the Crown, represented by the government of a particular province, introduces regulations into the leases under which they hold and operate these mines, I think it would not be wise for the federal government to interfere.

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. The Bill does not touch the use of explosives at all either in a quarry, or in railway construction, or in a coal mine. All it aims at doing is to secure the manufacture of as safe an explosive as possible. We purpose putting on the market only authorized explosives.

Mr. SPROULE. Much of what is contemplated by this Bill is done already by municipal by-law under provincial authority. The legislative assembly has given power to the municipalities to pass by-laws regulating this same thing. Therefore, it must be in conflict with provincial legislation and provincial rights to that extent. The minister said, in reference to some observations by my hon. friend from Montreal St. Anne (Mr. Doherty), that we are not making a law to cover this condition, but that we are making regulations to cover it. It is done by regulation. Power to make regulations is under the statute law, and if the statute law is unconstitutional the regulations can certainly have no force or effect. When we are confronted with such an uncertainty as this the government have it in their power to provide a means whereby they can be satisfied. They can make a stated case, send it to the Supreme Court and have the verdict of the court whether this law is wholly constitutional or only partly constitutional. What has the minister to say about that? I think we should have some reply.

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. I do not agree with my hon. friend (Mr. Sproule) at all that we ought to make a stated case. I do not know what stated case we could make or how to bring the case before the Supreme Court. There is no doubt in the minds of my officers that this parliament has power to regulate the manufacture and importation of explosives and the whole purpose of this Bill is to regulate the manufacture, storage and importation of explosives. We believe we have that power, but if we have not that power we will soon find it out when the law is put in force. I think that the best way to get a decision as to the constitutionality of a law of this kind is to put it in force, because we will find out much more quickly in that way than by taking a stated case to the court.

I do not think we are wrong and I do not know that I can say any more to my hon. friend than I have already said, that I am acting on advice with regard to the constitutionality of the Bill, and therefore, I cannot agree with the hon. gentleman that we should drop this Bill and have a stated case. It might take two or three years to get a decision on that point. As a matter of fact, this Bill was intended to be introduced last year, and we have been somewhat criticised for dilatoriness in not having brought it forward sooner. In the meantime there have been two or three most disastrous explosions the fatal results of which might have been avoided if a Bill of this kind had been upon the statute-books.

Mr. SPROULE. It is true that the minister says he has been fortified by the advice of the Justice Department, but this is not the first time that we have found the Justice Department wrong on constitutional questions which have been decided by the Supreme Court. I admit that while the favourable opinion of the Justice Department is a strong justification for legislation along that line when it is clear that there will be a conflict of authority, I think it is ample justification for submitting a stated case to the Supreme Court. The minister says that it would be two or three years before we would be likely to get a verdict. Does he mean to say that the Supreme Court is so impotent and indifferent that it would take two or three years to get a decision from that court? They might decide the case at the first sitting of the court, and consequently it could not be more than six months before the case was decided. I think it would be much better to avoid improper legislation if it can be avoided by stating a case for submission to the Supreme Court than to pass legislation and then afterwards find that a great deal of litigation might result from it, and that we are obliged to go back and abandon what we have done as being unconstitutional or ultra vires.

Mr. ROBB. It will be regrettable if the question of jurisdiction results in failure to safeguard the lives of those engaged in the handling of these dangerous explosives. This is not a new question. It has been before the public for some years and it is recognized that something should be done to safeguard human life. This Bill, as my hon. friend the Minister of Inland Revenue (Mr. Templeman) points out, only deals with the manufacture of dynamite.

Mr. SPROULE. It goes further than that.

Mr. ROBB. It aims at preventing the continual sacrifice of human life by explosions. In the last three years 114 lives were lost from premature explosions on railway construction work in this country. The hon. member for Victoria (Mr. Barnard), a few minutes ago, expressed the fear that this legislation might increase the cost of manufacturing explosives. It seems to me that all Canadians should agree that human life should be of more consideration than dollars. The greatest cost that this country has paid for explosives has been the cost of human life. I hope my hon. friends will not press this question of jurisdiction, but will allow the Bill to go through and see if something cannot be done to safeguard the lives of those who are compelled to handle these dangerous explosives.

On section 4,

Mr. DOHERTY. This is a class of legislation, of which we have had a good deal this session, by which we hand over blindly our legislative power with regard to a particular matter, to the Governor in Council. We say here that no man should have a right to do different things except as permitted by the regulations which are to be made under this Act, and the Governor in Council is empowered to make any regulation he chooses and to impose any conditions whatever upon the permission to be given. When the power of legislation was confided to parliament it was with the idea that parliament should use it and not hand it over blindly to be used by the executive government of the country. I quite understand that there may be details that are better dealt with by regulation than by statutory enactment, but when we simply say that no person should have the right to do the things mentioned here unless he gets permission in accordance with such regulations as the government may make, it seems to me we are going too far in the direction of delegation. The minister must have some idea in his own mind as to what the conditions are on which this permission should be granted and he should put in this Act some definition of what these conditions are, so that we may have even a general idea of what we are doing.

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. I can send my hon. friend the English Act, and there he will see that the regulations are very voluminous and very technical and highly scientific. This Act could not be administered in any other way than under such regulations.

Mr. SPROULE. How would this section affect chemists who are constantly experimenting with these explosives?

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. Permission would be given for keeping a small quantity.

On section 6,

Mr. SPROULE. The municipalities by by-law specify that merchants may keep these explosives in segregated buildings. Would not this section interfere with the municipal authority in that respect?

Mr. CURRIE (Simcoe). The issuing of license pertains to the province, and I do not think the federal government has any power to issue them.

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. We will let that stand.

Mr. ROBB.

On section 7,

Mr. ARTHURS. This clause is open to the same objections that I made to the Bill in the first place. The provisions and definitions in this Bill would make it impossible for any man to bring into Canada a box of cartridges, percussion caps, or fireworks. I do not think it is the intention of the minister to prohibit the importation of cartridges either from Great Britain or the United States.

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. Of course, the intention is to prohibit the importation of explosives that are not authorized. There is no explosive imported from Great Britain that is not authorized.

Mr. ARTHURS. The clause reads, importation of authorized explosives. Under this clause a man would require to have a permit from this government before he could cross the line with a box of cartridges. Is that the intention of the minister? The people dealing in these goods which come from Great Britain would have to get a permit from the minister for every shipment.

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. There is not much use of our testing and inspecting explosives manufactured in Canada, and not permitting any except those authorized to be sold, if we are going to permit explosives that are not authorized to come from another country. All the explosives from Great Britain are authorized, and of course they will be admitted.

Mr. ARTHURS. Do I understand that the intention is to permit the importation only of those explosives authorized by the government and those authorized by Great Britain? Is it the intention to prohibit the importation of explosives from the United States?

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. I am advised that in the United States the government is proceeding along similar lines and has in connection with its geological survey a testing station for explosives, and is now authorizing explosives. Explosives authorized in that way by the United States government would probably be approved of without any further examination by our testing officers. But explosives which are not tested or authorized by the United States government would have to be tested by our testing stations before they could be passed.

Mr. ARTHURS. I do not think the minister understands the objections I am raising. It is simply this. There are a large number of American rifles brought into this country by parties coming in the hunting season. They import cartridges for these rifles, and under this clause they would have to get a permit each time they imported these cartridges, whether authorized or not.

Mr. CURRIE (Simcoe). I think the minister does not perhaps understand the situation. Last season, in the hunting season, a number of hunters had purchased a certain kind of Remington rifle, which took a certain kind of ammunition. Within five or six days of the opening of the season those who endeavoured to secure cartridges for that rifle discovered that they could not obtain them from the hardware stores, and small retail stores and had to wire to the makers in the United States to secure that kind of cartridge. If a case of this kind arose under this Act, the small retailer would have to go to the trouble of getting a permit from the government, which would make it impossible for him to secure these cartridges at the time of the hunting season. I think an exception should be made there. I would like also to ask what is 'the manner authorized by the Railway Act' for transportation of explosives. We all know that the railways are authorized under the Railway Act to transmit ammunition or powder of any kind. If I remember rightly, a terrible explosion occurred on one of the railways at Stratford, in western Ontario. If this Act is to be of any use, I think these regulations should apply directly under this Act, and should not have any reference to the Railway Act. I would like to know if the minister knows what the regulations under the Railway Act are.

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. I confess I am not very familiar with the regulations, which occupy 25 pages. As the transportation of explosives is provided for by the Railway Commission under the Railway Act, we exempt it in this Bill.

Mr. CURRIE (Simcoe). Suppose these regulations of the Railway Act were transgressed by a railway company, and trouble arose, and a suit was brought, what authorization has the Railway Commission under the statute to make these regulations? The most dangerous thing in connection with explosives is the handling of them on the railways, and I think this Act should be made to apply to railways. For instance, a railway is carrying in the summer time dynamite that was made in the United States. It has saw-dust filler. When the warm weather comes the nitroglycerine will thaw out of the saw-dust filler and will leak through the box to the bottom of the car. If a drop of that happens to go on the railway track, there is an explosion and the car goes up in the air. That is what happened at Stratford. If this Act is to be of any use, it should be made to apply to cases like that. I would like to know if the Railway Commission has any power to make these regulations, and if they have the force of law.

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. The Railway Commission, in adopting these regulations, say that under the powers and in pursuance of sections 26, 230, 286 and 287 of the Railway Act, the board approved of these regulations.

Mr. CURRIE (Simcoe). Do these regulations limit the carriage to authorized explosives?

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. This does not refer to authorized explosives.

Mr. CURRIE (Simcoe). Why not have a reference made to those regulations of this Act, and have them authorized under this Act?

Mr. CURRIE (Simcoe). Why not let this clause stand and have a reference making those regulations legal under this Bill?

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. These regulations are legal now. They have been passed by the Railway Commission under the Railway Act.

Mr. ARTHURS. Small arms and ammunitions should be excepted and there should be no necessity for a permit in their case.

Mr. CURRIE (Simcoe). I think that the objection with reference to small arms is valid. The minister seems to be under the impression that unauthorized explosives can be taken into the country without permit. If he will read the section he will find out that permits may issue for the importation of authorized explosives and the unauthorized cannot be brought in at all. A man who tries to bring in 100 rounds of 22 cartridge in his valise or a dozen firecrackers will be liable to a penalty unless he gets a permit. A great number of hunters come from the United States to Ontario and Quebec, and they bring their ammunition. They should not be liable under section 7.

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. But explosives under this Bill are meant explosives in large quantities. Under clause 18 the Governor in Council may make regulations, and he has ample power to exempt small arms and ammunition from the operation of this Bill.

Mr. GOODEVE. Take the two provinces of Quebec and British Columbia, which are largely advertising their game, that is becoming quite an asset of both provinces. They are coming, as the minister knows, all the way from Europe. I was given the names of several who have come on two or three occasions from Germany with a party and who have spent considerable sums of money in order to engage in hunting the large game of British Columbia. I only mention that to indicate the importance of this section, for under this section, when these men arrive, any game warden or any body else can stop them on the border and hold up all their arms and ammunition, and before they can bring a single particle of ammunition in it will be necessary for them to get permission from the government here at Ottawa. I think it would be well that that question should be looked into, because it comes up in so many clauses of the Bill, and a proper section drawn, to cover the point, so that the Bill may be made effective. I think the minister will admit—in fact it is not discussable at all—that this is the effect of the section. This is not a mere objection for the sake of objection from hon. gentlemen on this side, but it is an important question. And, unless the Bill is amended it would lead to considerable trouble, especially as I have already pointed out in these two provinces.

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. I quite agree that ammunition for small arms especially, should be exempted from the operation of the Bill, otherwise it would lead to very considerable confusion. I would assume as a matter of fact—I am only giving this as an opinion—that all ammunition used in small arms should be of the best kind and certainly good enough to be authorized.

Mr. GOODEVE. But, even if authorized it would be necessary to get a permit. That is the difficulty. There should be some way of exempting ammunition for this purpose. I think it would be well for the minister to let this section stand, and draft a section that would cover that point.

Mr. SPROULE. It would seem that the Bill contemplates that, because 'safety cartridges' are defined in the interpretation clause. In making new regulations all you would require would be to provide that safety cartridges may be exempt.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Shall section 7 stand?

On section 8—special permits,

Mr. CURRIE (Simcoe). It does not say to whom this special permit is to be issued. I should think an analyst would be the only one person who would require it.

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. This provides that for purposes of analysis and scientific research a quantity not exceeding two pounds may be imported. The Bill gives permission to anybody to submit an explosive for analysis. Scientific men may want to investigate, and, on payment of a small fee, they may be permitted to import in quantities not exceeding two pounds.

Mr. CURRIE (Simcoe). For chemical analysis two pounds is more than enough.

On section 9—applicants for licenses to furnish plans of factory and premises.

Mr. CURRIE (Simcoe). What authority has the minister to issue licenses? As I understand that under the law the power to grant a license to carry on business remains entirely with the provincial parliament. The law will permit the Dominion government to allow a person to carry on a business, or to prevent him carrying it on. But I do not think it will permit the department to license anybody. If the minister will consult the legal department of the government, I think he will find that he cannot give licenses. That has been tried by this parliament on several occasions, and I understand that the decision has been against it.

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. We discussed that point at considerable length before the hon. member (Mr. Currie, Simcoe) came into the House. I said I would abide by the opinion of the Justice Department that this is a power we have a right to take—the power to license for the purpose of regulating the manufacture.

Mr. BARNARD. Subsection (a) provides that the plan is to be drawn to a scale, and is to include 'also all the lands adjacent thereto on which buildings are erected.'. I understand by lands adjacent thereto the lands of adjoining owners. I would think there would be some limitation on the word 'adjacent.' It might be mistaken to mean ten miles or half a mile.

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. That is the meaning. Of course the interpretation would depend on the configuration of the land. A factory might be placed quite close to a building if there was a small mountain or hill between, possibly within 100 yards, while in a very flat district it might have to be a mile away. I see no reason to specify the distance more closely.

On section 10, factories not to be built near towns, &c.

Mr. PERLEY. Why is the distance of one mile from an incorporated village, &c., stipulated. Are there statistics to show within what distance from a city a factory would be safe?

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. This is copied from the English regulation. They have statistics there, and I presume one mile has been found sufficient. The explosion at Hull was not more than a mile from where we are standing.

Mr. PERLEY. The minister is mistaken; it is nearly a mile and a half from here to Eddy's factory.

Mr. GOODEVE. I think I would move to have that read two miles. As we are giving authority to establish factories without the consent of a municipality, we should make it two miles unless with the consent of the municipality.

Mr. SPROULE. The distance which would be safe must depend largely on the amount of explosives kept.

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. I would move to insert after the word 'jurisdiction' in the 39th line, the words:

Or the government of the province in any province and in a territory where there is no local authority having jurisdiction, and also with the consent of the minister.

That is to meet the view of the government of Ontario.

Mr. DOHERTY. Does the amended section mean that a factory cannot be established within a mile of a city, town, &c., even with the consent of the municipality, that it can only be established a mile away with the consent and that within a mile it cannot be established under any condition?

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. The clause means that it shall not be nearer than one mile.

Mr. DOHERTY. Within a mile there cannot be a factory?

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. No.

Mr. DOHERTY. And more than a mile away they must have the permission of the municipal authority and the minister?

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. That is my understanding.

Mr. SPROULE. Let us understand how that would affect the situation. Hardware stores that sell gunpowder and blasting powder, store it in a building.

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. We have allowed one clause to stand for the purpose of meeting that point.

Mr. SPROULE. But that was with regard to ammunition.

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. Quite true, but we propose to narrow the interpretation so as not to include stores.

Mr. SPROULE. Yes, for otherwise you are in direct conflict with the provincial authorities, because they provide where explosives may be stored, and you may give authority with regard to handling and storing them in a way which under the provincial Act, could not be done.

On section 10: Consent of municipality and minister before license granted.

Mr. GOODEVE. It is suggested that even although a municipality might give consent a mile is very close. It might be necessary to have a two mile limit. Take the city of Ottawa; an outside municipality might give consent to have a factory within a mile although the city would not care to have a large factory of that kind within a mile, and so I think we had better make it 'within two miles.'

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. I do not want to make the conditions too onerous. If the conditions under which the explosive will be required to be manufactured are lived up to, and if by close inspection the danger is minimized, and the quantities of explosives to be kept in buildings are also minimized to the lowest possible extent, the conditions as to the configuration of the ground and the proximity of other buildings being taken into consideration, I would think a mile not too close. I desire to be on the safe side and, on the other hand, I do not want to make conditions that would be too onerous to the manufacturer. I will be guided by the House in that respect, but I think that one mile should stand in the section.

Mr. GOODEVE. I can conceive from what the minister says that it might be a hardship to force a factory to go more than one mile from a village. It says:

Within one mile of the limits of any city, town or incorporated village.

But, it would make a great difference, if it were close to a large city where the damage and loss of life might be much greater. In a small municipality there would not be the same danger as where there were crowded buildings, and a large population. It might read 'within two miles of the limits of any city, or within one mile of the limits of any town or incorporated village.'

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. I would rather not change it.

Mr. CURRIE (Simcoe). There are several cities which are fortified and there are magazines in the fortifications which are used by the dealers of explosives in those cities. How would you work it there?

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. If the magazines are used by the Militia Department it would have no application.

Mr. CURRIE (Simcoe). The magazines of the Militia Department are used by the trade.

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. Then the Bill would operate.

On section 11: Permits for experiments, and testing new explosives.

Mr. CURRIE (Simcoe). Is clause 4 the same as this? Clause 4 reads:

Nothing in this Act shall apply to the making of a small quantity of explosive for the purpose of chemical experiment, and not for practical use or sale.

And this clause provides that:

The minister may, on application and on payment of such fees as are prescribed by regulation, issue a permit to manufacture for experimental purposes or for testing any special blasting operations only, and not for sale, any new explosive upon such conditions and subject to such restrictions as are fixed by the minister.

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. A man might be experimenting with a new explosive. Many are doing that in the hope of getting something newer and better than anything on the market.

Mr. CURRIE (Simcoe). But that is covered in both places.

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. No, clause 4 provides for chemical experiment and the making of explosive for scientific purposes, not for practical use. Section 11 authorizes the minister to issue a permit for manufacture for experimental purposes. An inventor thinks he has a new idea and he wants to experiment in the manufacture of an explosive. It may be permitted by this clause.

Mr. CURRIE (Simcoe). Clause 4 would allow a man to make small quantities of explosives for experimental purposes in his laboratory. He could endeavour to discover a new kind of explosive. In clause 11 you say that if he has paid the fees prescribed by regulation he can manufacture for experimental purposes. I cannot see how these two clauses can work together.

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. They might work together right enough, but one is for the making of a small quantity of explosive, for chemical experiment, and the other is for the testing or manufacturing of blasting powders or explosives for special blasting operations only. The section says that the minister:

May issue a permit to manufacture for experimental purposes or for testing and special blasting operations only, and not for sale.

They are two different permits.

Mr. CURRIE (Simcoe). Is there any difference between 'making' and 'manufacturing?'

Mr. CURRIE (Simcoe).

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. Not much difference.

Mr. CURRIE (Simcoe). Not very much difference. In the one case a man could not make a large quantity of the explosive. It does not limit him as to whether he shall conduct original research or whether he is following in the footsteps of some other experimenter and developing the quality of an explosive which he might not have discovered or made.

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. The object of giving that permission is to allow people to experiment with blasting powder and the producing of a new powder. They must have that permission or they would be prohibited from doing that without a license.

Mr. CURRIE (Simcoe). If you retain section 4 I do not see any necessity for section 11. Under section 4 a chemist can manufacture a small quantity of this explosive in his laboratory, but if he proceeds to test it he will come under the penalties provided in section 11.

Mr. SPROULE. I think it is about time we should adjourn. There is no hope of our being able to get through this Bill to-night.

Progress reported.

FIRST READING.

Bill (No. 201) respecting the Canada National Fire Insurance Co.—Mr. Martin (Regina).

Mr. FIELDING moved the adjournment of the House.

Mr. SPROULE. What business will be taken up to-morrow?

Mr. FIELDING. We propose to move the House into Supply and give priority to a special estimate of the Minister of Railways for the year just closed; and then to take up the estimates of the Minister of Militia.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 12.25 a.m., Friday.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

FRIDAY, May 5, 1911.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

FIRST READINGS.

Bill (No. 198) to incorporate The Quebec and Great Northwestern Railway Company.—Mr. Hodgins.

Bill (No. 199) for the relief of Fanny Mary Healy.—Mr. Knowles.

Bill (No. 200) for the relief of Gertrude Mary Grantham.—Mr. Martin (Regina).

CIVIL SERVICE ACT AMENDMENT.

Mr. PATERSON moved that the House go into committee on Monday next to consider the following proposed resolution:

Resolved, that it is expedient to amend the Civil Service Act and the Acts in amendment thereof, and to provide as follows:

1. As section 39, subsection 2. That a person who has served over three years as a clerk in the outside service of the Customs may be appointed to the rank of senior clerk, subject to such examination on the duties of office and other qualifications as is prescribed by the deputy head in a report to be concurred in by the head of the department. The salary of such senior clerk shall be from $1,200 to $1,600 per annum.

2. That the part of Schedule 'B' of the Civil Service Act which relates to Customs be repealed and the following substituted therefor:

SCHEDULE 'B,' CUSTOMS.

ST. PETER'S INDIAN RESERVE.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. Speaker, before the orders of the day are called, I wish to give my hon. friend from Selkirk (Mr. Bradbury) the information he asked for the other day in regard to the request by the Royal Commission appointed by the Manitoba government for access to the original documents connected with the St. Peter's reserve. The fact that the time has passed when under the rules of the House a motion can be made to secure the production of these papers changes the position somewhat from what it was. There is no desire to prevent the inspection of the papers by the Royal Commission, and at the same time it is desirable that the custody of the original documents should remain here or in the office in Winnipeg with respect to such documents as are there. So that if it will at all answer the purpose of the commission, they will be given, on their formal request, an order which will permit their inspection of the original documents in Winnipeg and the original documents here. If that will not meet their requirements, we will try to make some other arrangement.

Mr. BRADBURY. I would just like to point out to the minister that the object of obtaining these documents is to have them during the taking of evidence. They ought to be in Winnipeg in the custody of one of his own officers. It is impossible for the commission to establish the facts without having them there.

Mr. OLIVER. So that they would remain in our office in Winnipeg and in its custody, but subject to the examination of the Royal Commission. Although that has not been discussed, I think I may say that there will be no difficulty about making that arrangement.

Mr. BRADBURY. Will it be necessary for me to move a resolution?

Mr. OLIVER. No. A formal request from the commission will, I think, be all that is necessary.

Mr. BRADBURY. I think you have that formal request from the counsel. Mr.

Whitla wrote you a letter asking for the production of these documents.

Mr. OLIVER. I hardly think that the form in which we received the request would be sufficient warrant for our acceding to it. I think we are entitled to the courtesy of a formal request from the commission.

Mr. BRADBURY. I will see that you get that.

FEDERAL BUILDINGS IN TORONTO.

Mr. A. C. MACDONELL (South Toronto). Before the orders of the day are proceeded with, I would like to ask the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Pugsley) if it is the intention of the government to erect any general federal buildings in the city of Toronto in connection with the erection of municipal buildings there, with a view to having a large public building erected jointly by the Dominion government and the city? Mention has been made of the matter in the 'Globe' and other papers of Toronto, and if the minister is able to make any statement upon it, I would be very glad if he would do so.

Mr. PUGSLEY. My attention has been called by prominent citizens of Toronto, including Mr. Gourlay, the president of the Board of Trade, to the desirability of considering the question of erecting public buildings, when we do erect them, all upon one of the blocks in that part of the city known, I believe, as 'the Ward.' It is centrally situated, and it has been thought that it would be desirable to place all the public buildings in that locality, but the matter has not been considered by the government for the reason that we have not in contemplation at present the erection of any new buildings in Toronto with the exception of an examining warehouse. It may be that in connection with that building, it would be well to consider this whole subject, but so far that has not been done.

Mr. TAYLOR (New Westminster). I would like to inquire of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Brodeur) whether he has had any further communication from Washington under the International Fisheries Treaty?

Mr. BRODEUR. I have not got any further information on the subject. I have brought the matter, however, to the attention of His Excellency, the Hon. Mr. Bryce, who is going to take up the question with the American authorities.

SUPPLY—THE FISHERIES TREATY.

Mr. FIELDING moved that the House go into Committee of Supply.

Mr. J. D. TAYLOR (New Westminster). Before you leave the Chair, Mr. Speaker, I want to submit to the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Brodeur) some information on the point as to which I inquired just now, and which it seems to me, should have come to his attention a long time ago through some other channel. I have here a copy of the 'Pacific Fisherman' of March last, containing a great deal more information regarding the progress, or want of progress, of these regulations at Washington, than apparently has come to the minister. This paper reports that so far from the condition being as indicated by the hon. minister, namely, that the Senate at Washington was simply considering some unimportant changes as to the mesh allowed—so far from that being the limit of the alterations by the Senate, the American Senate on the contrary has already made the most drastic changes in the regulations submitted to that body by the joint commissioners. Let me read for the information of the House the article in the 'Pacific Fisherman.' It is as follows:

> The International Fishery Treaty, as framed by David Starr-Jordan and Prof. Edward E. Prince, the two commissioners appointed by the United States and Great Britain to formulate regulations for the control of the boundary fisheries of this country and Canada, was given short shrift by the session of Congress which has just adjourned.
> The energetic and logical protests which were made against the terms of this treaty by the fishermen of Puget Sound and Lake Erie had sufficient weight with Congress that the regulations proposed for those two districts were entirely stricken out by the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom the Bill was referred. And even after these objectionable features were removed, the Bill, favourably reported by the committee, owing to the filibustering that was carried on in Congress during the last hours of the session, was never brought to a vote.
>
> The Congressional Record shows that the treaty, which came before Congress in the form of Senate Bill 6119, was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and that, owing to representations made to this committee, regulations 62, 63, 64 and 65, relating to Puget Sound, were entirely stricken out, as were also regulations 45 to 50 included, relating to Lake Erie. Further records state only that this Bill was 'reported with amendment,' which means that it did not come up for vote.
>
> So far as the future of this treaty is concerned, its fate is problematical. The next Congress will be an entirely new session with many new members. The Bill, if again introduced, must necessarily go through all the routine that it has gone through in the last session. It will probably be handled by the committee in the same manner as before, and then, if Congress finds time, it may be passed. It is more than likely that the same representations made by the fishermen, even to a new committee, will have the effect of eliminating the clauses concerning Puget Sound and Lake Erie, and in this event Pacific coast fisheries will have little concern in its further history.

If this be a correct presentation of events in the American Senate—and in the absence of information to the contrary we are entitled to suppose that it is—it seems to indicate an astonishing lack of knowledge on the part of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Brodeur) of, or control over, the events relating to his department. It is no light matter that a treaty solemnly entered into between the governments of Great Britain and the United States should be implemented by Canada, as we did implement it last session, by taking authority for the minister to proclaim regulations whenever the United States was ready to proclaim them, and yet that the minister in charge of the department in Canada should remain indifferent to the fact that he is being played with by the other parties to the treaty, that not only have they committed a breach of international honour by failing during two sessions of Congress to adopt regulations which they were in honour bound to adopt, but they are guilty of a gross breach of their pledge in now undertaking to strike out important provisions in this Act.

I would recall to the minister the events connected with the long protracted negotiations of the two international commissioners. They have been referred to in this House at various times; and although we have had no formal information from the government on the subject and have had to content ourselves with such scraps as we could extract from time to time, by whatever questions we were permitted to ask, it is admitted that the making of these regulations had been a matter of mutual concession. Canada yielded on one point in order to secure an agreement by the Americans on another. It has been held up to us that one of the most valuable considerations we received for the part we allowed the American government in the control of the fisheries arrangements on the lakes, and the Atlantic, was their consent to regulate fishing on Puget Sound where, under present conditions, Canadian salmon are being wantonly destroyed. It has been held up to us by the Minister of Fisheries particularly that this was a most valuable concession to us, that we should overlook on that account many defects in that agreement, and that these regulations should be adopted because it was of so much value to us that we should have regulations in Puget Sound.

But we find that, after we have paid the price of adopting the regulations agreed upon in return for the American promises to regulate the Puget Sound traps, they calmly strike out their regulation of the traps and leave us in the position of having paid a price and getting no return whatever for it. Similarly, no doubt, with regard to Lake Erie. I am not in a position to discuss in detail the effect of striking out these regulations with regard to Lake Erie, but there must be other members of the House who are in a position to point out to the minister wherein the United States gain the advantage by striking out these regulations. It seems to me that the minister is confronted with a most serious duty, the duty of reporting to the other parties to this agreement, that, in an affair of this kind, honour must be observed, and that the time has passed when sharp practice can be indulged in—that this Dominion is not so petty, so inferior, a state that any larger community who have a treaty with us may violate that treaty at their will. They humbug us into making conditions by offering to give us a price, they accept the conditions and then deny us the price. That appears to be what is in progress at Washington just now. So far as we can ascertain our Fisheries Department has paid no attention whatever to the course of these regulations at Washington Only the other day, I inquired of the minister whether alteration was being made in the terms of the regulations. The minister answered in the most indefinite way, with no formal report, with no official statement from Washington to read to the House, and nothing to report except some trifling amendments with respect to the size of mesh of the nets to be used. I would like the minister to explain to the House how it comes that he is without information on these very important matters. Is it not possible for some of his array of officials to follow the course of affairs at Washington, so that the department here and this parliament may be kept advised? Does he consider that when the negotiation is completed his duty is ended? In fact, does not he think that it is the continuing duty of the commissioner especially appointed by the government to follow this treaty through all its ramifications at Washington and to report from day to day or from week to week to the minister, so that he may know what is being done in Congress with the regulations to which he and the government have given their sanction? I would point out further the anomaly of the position in which the minister has placed himself by his course in relation to this treaty compared with the course being followed at Washington. In the Fisheries Committee of this House two years ago I asked the minister that he should have the regulations of the international commission laid before the committee, so that we might examine them, and might call representatives of the fisheries interests to perform for us service similar to the service being performed at Washington, by the representatives of the fisheries interests in various portions of the United States. But the minister took the extraordinary position that we were powerless in this matter, that it did not matter to us what was provided in the regulations, that our part with relation to them was merely to affix the stamp of this parliament to them so that they might become law. I brought the matter up again last session, in this House, with the same result. The minister had not learned wisdom from the example of his contemporaries in the United States, but again told us that it was absolutely impossible that this parliament could have any control over this matter or pronounce on the text of the regulations. As I said, we simply gave the minister power to proclaim the regulations as they were. Now, it is true that the treaty itself provides that both governments shall adopt the regulations as they are presented by this international commission. It is equally true that the treaty provides that the regulations as framed should not be altered until they have first been proclaimed and we have learned by experience in what respect they should be changed. But if the United States Senate is allowed to vary the terms of the treaty and of the signed recommendations of the commissioners, why should not the parliament of Canada have the same privilege. Why should we always remain in an inferior position, a position which is bound to work to our disadvantage in every arrangement we have with the United States, because we are not allowed to take the initiative in any proposition in connection with joint undertakings, but are allowed simply to scrutinize what is put forward by the United States government, put forward with their inner consciousness of the effect of their well studied propositions, communicated only to one or two officials of our government, while we in this parliament agree to take a leap in the dark, and adopt them as presented. I dissent from the minister's theory that parliament must sit here helpless and allow the interests of the country to be sacrificed to the interests of our neighbours in this connection and in many similar arrangements that we have with the American government. I would make another appeal to the minister, because it is of the utmost importance to the salmon industry in British Columbia that we should have some form of regulations for trap fishing in Puget Sound. I would also like him to place the matter forcibly before the British Ambassador at Washington, the official primarily responsible for this treaty. For, as the correspondence shows he urged the treaty upon this government, with rather more persistence than we should like to see, until at last he committed this government to it. If he was so insistent that we should enter into this treaty with the United States, it seems to me we have a claim upon him to be equally insistent in representing to the government of the United States that they must observe international honour in this matter. That they must regard every undertaking of the treaty, and that if it appears to them that the treaty is so defective as to call for amendment by the American Senate, or for direction by the Senate to the American commissioner, the door should be left equally wide open to us, that we might consider these regulations in every detail, take advantage of our experience and have the same right to freedom to make alterations in that treaty as the Americans are assuming. I appeal to the minister whether he will not rouse himself from his lethargy in this matter, whether he will not become the master of this item of his departmental work and see to it that we reassert and resume the control over our fisheries, which in my opinion, we should never have relinquished.

Hon. L. P. BRODEUR (Minister of Marine and Fisheries). The subject which the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Taylor) has brought to the attention of the House. I am glad he has given me the opportunity of making some explanations of the situation in regard to this freshwater boundaries fisheries treaty. The treaty was made nearly three years ago, and it provided for the appointment of a commission composed of one man representing the United States and one man representing Canada. Dr. David Starr Jordan was appointed on the American side, and Professor Prince was appointed by Canada. They went to work, and visited the country from one end to the other, and adopted regulations which, though not absolutely drastic, were in the right direction. We must bear in mind that it is, far more difficult for the American authorities to make concessions in the regulations than it is for Canada. The American authorities are to some extent checked by the different states. Those regulations concerning the fisheries were made formerly by the various states interested, and it was expected to be a difficult thing to get the states to agree to certain concessions in the regulations. However, regulations were passed and were accepted by the Canadian government, and also by the United States government, and then they had to be submitted to the United States Senate. It is contended in the United States that the Senate, along with the president, is part of the treaty making power, and consequently the regulations had to be submitted to the Senate. My hon. friend says that he cannot understand why the treaty had to be submitted to the United States Senate, when it has not to be submitted to the Canadian parliament. This makes it necessary for me to point out to him that the cases of the two countries are absolutely different. In Great Britain, under British institutions, the treaty making power is vested in the King. The King can sign any treaty and make it valid without its being submitted to parliament, that is, any treaty which does not affect Canadian interests.

Mr. SPROULE. If the Canadian parliament desired to pass upon that treaty would not that desire be granted by the British government?

Mr. BRODEUR. The rule in Great Britain, which is also recognized in Canada, is that a treaty which does not affect taxation or commercial relations has not to be submitted to the British parliament. There are treaties made frequently in Great Britain which do not affect taxation or the payment of money, and such treaties can be made by the King without its being necessary to submit them to parliament. When a treaty not affecting taxation or commercial relations is signed by the King, it becomes obligatory throughout the empire. Now the same rule applies to treaties which affect Canada. If it is a treaty which does not concern our commercial relations and which does not require the payment of any money or levy taxation upon the subject, it may be signed by the King, and it immediately becomes operative without the consent of the Canadian parliament. But with other treaties which do affect taxation, a different rule prevails. For instance, take the treaties with France in 1893 and in 1907, those were submitted to the Canadian parliament. So was the treaty with Japan, because it affected taxation. This rule is adopted according to the underlying principle of British institutions that no taxation shall be levied without the consent of parliament.

In the United States the situation is not the same. The President of the United States is not the treaty making power. He negotiates, either through his Secretary of State or by himself directly, but a treaty thus agreed upon has no effect until it is assented to by the Senate of the United States. In respect to treaties, therefore, the United States Senate fulfils the functions which are discharged by the British government. In the United States, the treaty making power being vested in the president and in the Senate conjointly, a treaty must receive the assent of the Senate before it can come into force. There have been several treaties made affecting Canada which have been assented to by the President of the United States, but which did not receive the assent of the Senate. If I remember rightly, the treaty negotiated in 1873 was accepted by the president, but was not assented to by the Senate, and, therefore, it did not come into force. The same with regard to the treaty of 1888 which was negotiated by Mr. Chamberlain and Mr. Bayard; that treaty was signed by the president and Secretary of State, but it was not assented to by the Senate.

Now with regard to the treaty which is under consideration, it is claimed by the American authorities that the regulations, in order to have force and effect, must be submitted to the treaty making power, namely, the president and the Senate. The president has sent a message to the Senate approving of the regulations under the treaty, with the exception of one clause therein concerning Lake Huron. My hon. friend referred to Lake Erie, but I think he was mistaken. The slight change which was mentioned in the message of the president related to Lake Huron, and not to Lake Erie. It is not, however, a matter of much importance.

The Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate had this subject under consideration and they made a report, I suppose, to the United States Senate. If I am rightly informed these proceedings before the Foreign Relations Committee are generally secret, and I do not know how far the information which my hon. friend has conveyed to the House is correct. But, I think, on the whole it is substantially correct that the United States Senate—or not the United States Senate, because the Senate have not passed judgment upon it—but the Committee on Foreign Relations made a report to the Senate during the last session. As far as the government of the United States are concerned, I may say to my hon. friend that when I was there last winter I took up the question with the representatives of the Secretary of State, and it was understood that with a little amendment which was suggested concerning the size of the mesh to be used on some part of Lake Huron, the United States government would be willing to accept these regulations. There were also some slight changes in regard to the size of the mesh used on Lake Ontario which was, I think, in the interest of our own fishermen. The United States government have, in so far as I can see, fulfilled that part of their obligation. It is now only for the United States Senate to pass judgment upon the regulations which are before them. My hon. friend has stated that we are not doing our duty. I think his charge in that respect is absolutely unfounded. Can we interfere with the power of the United States government or the United States Senate to pass judgment upon these regulations, to approve of this treaty or not?

Can we make any remonstrance to the American authorities?

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. I notice that by article 3 of the original treaty it is provided as follows:

The two governments engage to put into operation and to enforce by legislative action, with as little delay as possible, the regulations, restrictions and provisions, with appropriate penalties, proposed by the commission.

That article has been adopted by the United States Senate and by the Dominion of Canada. Does not the minister think that when once the United States Senate has bound itself in honour to abide by the regulations which the commissioners shall make, it ends its executive duties and must, therefore, accept such regulations as were made by the commission?

Mr. BRODEUR. The information which was given to me by the representatives of the government there, was that they maintain that the treaty-making power in the United States Senate is still in existence with regard to the consideration of these regulations, that it was part of their powers under the constitution, and that, therefore, the United States government could not force the Senate to take any action.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. But the treaty has been made as far as that is concerned, and one of the express terms of the treaty was that they were to abide by the express terms of the treaty.

Mr. BRODEUR. Yes.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. Now, when the commissioners make regulations they are going back and altering those regulations. If they have a right to do that we have a right to do the same thing.

Mr. BRODEUR. The government of the United States have done their part, but the other branch of the treaty-making power have not seen fit to pass judgment upon the treaty or the regulations that are before them.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. I think that my hon. friend perhaps has not grasped my meaning. The very body that is now attempting to amend these regulations—the Senate—is the very body that said previously: We will abide by such regulations as are made by the commission. Now, when they attempt to interfere with these regulations they are going back on the treaty which they formerly made, and if they have a right to say first: 'We will abide by what the commissioners do,' and then turn around and say: 'We will not abide by what they do,' this parliament has a right to do the same thing, and we should have the right now to revise these regulations.

Mr. BRODEUR. These regulations are not in force yet in Canada.

Mr. FOSTER. Was the treaty ratified by the United States Senate?

Mr. BRODEUR. The first treaty, yes.

Mr. FOSTER. Then they have no right in the world to change it.

Mr. BRODEUR. It is claimed that they have the power to legislate in reference, not only to the original document which was signed, but also with reference to the regulations which were to be submitted to them. That is their contention.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Did the minister understand when he asked parliament to ratify these regulations by Act of parliament?

Mr. BRODEUR. Yes, because we were bound by the treaty ourselves. The treaty-making power, as far as we are concerned, lies with the King. When the King signs a treaty of that kind we are bound by it, and we have no right to amend a treaty made by the King.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I understand that perfectly. Apparently I have not made myself plain. The minister asked this parliament to ratify these regulations because His Majesty had agreed by treaty to do that. That is correct, is it not?

Mr. BRODEUR. We simply provided by legislation for the necessary power to carry out these regulations. We did not ratify the treaty. My hon. friend will find that the legislation which was passed last year was not legislation to ratify the treaty, but it was legislation providing two things: First, the necessary money to carry out the regulations, and, secondly, the necessary power for the Department of Marine and Fisheries to carry out the regulations. That is all we passed last year, so that there was no ratification by this parliament of the treaty itself because it was not necessary. The only ratification was by the King, and that treaty having been made by the King we are bound by it. My hon. friend (Mr. Middlebro) asks why, under these circumstances, should we not amend our regulations? I have explained that as far as we are concerned we have no right to amend these regulations.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. I would like to understand it. I understand that a treaty was ratified by the United States Senate and the British government on our behalf. If that is not so, it is entirely news to me. I understand the treaty has been ratified by both powers providing for the making of regulations, and that both parties agreed to abide by whatever regulaitons the commission would make.

Mr. BRODEUR. Precisely, and the United States government maintain that the United States Senate have the same powers to pass judgment upon these regulations as they had to pass judgment upon the first treaty that was signed. That is the contention of the American authorities.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. Can the minister point to any provision in the treaty which says that, notwithstanding the Senate has delegated it powers to a commission to make regulations, and has agreed to abide by the treaty and to put into operation the regulations made by the minister, it shall also have the right to revise its whole action and mutilate the regulations to suit itself?

Mr. BRODEUR. I am not ready to pass judgment upon the United States constitution. That is a matter for them to decide and it is not a matter for us to decide. I am obliged to take the situation as it is. As far as we are concerned the situation is this: The treaty has been made by the King. It was not necessary that that treaty should be ratified by this parliament because it came into force as far as this country was concerned willingly or unwillingly.

Mr. JAMESON. May I ask the minister if that treaty was not made with the consent and concurrence of this government?

Mr. BRODEUR. Certainly.

Mr. JAMESON. Certainly it was.

Mr. BRODEUR. I do not want to say that we are not responsible for this treaty. We are responsible for this treaty. The treaty has been made as far as we are concerned. Now, on the other side, one of the branches of the treaty-making power does not ratify it. My hon. friend says that we should take the necessary steps to make a remonstrance. I do not think it is a case where we should interfere. Our interference, instead of doing good, might do harm. I am afraid that the reflections my hon. friend has to-day cast on the American authorities, instead of helping along this treaty will have a contrary effect.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. If the minister said to his deputy minister: I will abide by what you do, and in pursuance of that the deputy does something, would the minister have the right to say later on: I shall not abide by what you have done: that is the same position.

Mr. BRODEUR. It is not the same thing at all.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. Exactly the same.

Mr. SPROULE. I wonder how the minister can be sincere in his statement that he was glad to have an opportunity to explain the situation in respect to this matter, in view of the fact that more than once has he refused to give information on the subject when asked to do so in this House. This treaty was entered into three years ago, and time after time since he has refused to take the House into his confidence upon the plea that it would not be proper to give information until the negotiations were completed.

Mr. BRODEUR. I never refused to give any information that I had. When the regulations were passed I brought them down right away.

Mr. SPROULE. I have heard the minister more than once give the curt reply that he could not give that information or bring down the papers.

Mr. BRODEUR. All the papers are before the House.

Mr. SPROULE. Since when?

Mr. BRODEUR. Long ago.

Mr. SPROULE. I heard them refused not very long ago. We are told by the Minister of Finance that we cannot change a word in the reciprocity agreement before the House because the treaty-making power belongs to the mother country and not to us, but still we are supposed to have a say in what commercial treaties are made in our interest. Just as we are advised with regard to the reciprocity treaty so the Minister of Marine tells us that we cannot change a word or an item in these regulations, although on the other hand the United States Senate declare that they are at perfect liberty to change the treaty in any way they please. It seems to me that there is inconsistency there. If we have the right to ratify it surely we have the right to change it.

Mr. BRODEUR, The trouble is that we have not the right to ratify it.

Mr. SPROULE. I was speaking with regard to the reciprocity pact, and it seems to me we have the right to change that. and if the United States Senate will not ratify it with the changes we have made they can do just as they like about it. I do not think that the ministers of the Crown set before parliament the clear rights which this parliament enjoys and may exercise. The fishing industry of Canada is of very great importance not only to eastern Canada and western Canada, but to central Canada as well. I represent a district that is very deeply interested in the fishing rights of the Georgian Bay, and the waters connected therewith. There is a great value involved in our fisheries, not only on account of the money value of the fish themselves, but of the large number of people who are engaged in and connected with the industry, and who have for years been waiting for the government to do something in their behalf. The fisheries will remain a most valuable asset to Canada, and a permanent asset, if they are wisely protected and proper efforts made to replenish them. I hold, Sir, that the government is not showing the live interest in that industry which its importance deserves. The people of Canada think that the government are indifferent and dilatory in the matter and indifference and carelessness on the part of those charged with the responsibility of protecting and replenishing our fisheries will some time or other be punished by the people. We on this side of the House have endeavoured to spur the government on to activity in dealing with our fishing interests, but so far we have not been able to succeed, and the people interested are suffering because of the lethargy of the government. We have unfortunately only a joint national interest in these fisheries, and it behoves us to make the best we can of that joint interest. The ministers took this subject up many years ago, and they have been dabbling with it ever since. It is true that these international affairs move slowly, but I would like now to ask the minister if he can tell me how many years ago it is since the negotiations commenced with the United States government with a view to reaching an amicable understanding as to what should be done for the perpetuation and protection of these fisheries.

Mr. BRODEUR. If I remember rightly, the question was taken up by the Joint High Commission which sat in 1898 and 1899, and it has been taken up since.

Mr. SPROULE. That is in accord with my own imperfect remembrance, that it was taken up 11 or 12 years ago. From time to time various questions have been asked with a view of ascertaining what has been done and with a view of spurring on the government to act with greater alacrity and with a stronger desire to bring these negotiations to a satisfactory conclusion; but we are to-day in practically the same position that we were in many years ago. Our fisheries are being injured and wasted, and they are not being protected or restocked as they should be, either in Canada or the United States. One of the provisions of that treaty was that both parties to the agreement were to exercise their best endeavours to restock these waters as rapidly as possible from year to year. Has that been done? Is any attention being paid to it? It is true, we have a few fish hatcheries in our country, and we are endeavouring in a half-hearted and unbusinesslike way to restock these waters; but we are not doing all that could be done. Neither of the contracting parties to that agreement is pretending to live up to it or to carry it out according to its letter and spirit. The treaty was signed in April, 1908. It is now 1911, and nothing has been done yet. That treaty provided that an International Commission should make regulations. That International Commission was appointed, and during the year succeeded in making what they thought were suitable regulations. Those regulations were made two years ago. What has been done in the meantime to carry them out? How many efforts have this government made to induce the American government to bring this matter to a finality? The Minister of Fisheries said: 'When I was in Washington last winter I spoke to them about it.' That is the only evidence we have that he showed any desire or made any effort to have the negotiations brought to such a conclusion that the regulations would be put into operation and carried out. Does that look like interest in what Canada is very much interested in? It seems to me that it does not. Then, certain regulations were to be made by the International Fisheries Commission. They were made, and were signed by David Starr Jordan for the United States and by Prof. Prince for Canada, in May, 1909. Now we are in May, 1911, and during those two years practically nothing has been done on our part. But what has been done by the United States? The Senate have taken the matter up, and in the meantime they have so mutilated and nullified these regulations that they are of little value. I take the regulation with regard to the Great Lakes, which includes the Georgian bay and that part of the country which I represent, and what do I find? I find that the Senate have either repealed or struck out the regulation prohibiting net fishing along the boundary line in Lake Erie. The regulations with regard to the construction of pound nets have also been struck out by the Senate of the United States.

Mr. BRODEUR. I am not aware that the United States has passed legislation on the subject. Perhaps my hon. friend is better informed in that respect than I am.

Mr. SPROULE. The information I have is that they have nullified these regulations.

Mr. BRODEUR. Not the Senate.

Mr. SPROULE. Well, what power has the right to do it except the Senate?

Mr. BRODEUR. A committee has reported that to the Senate, but the Senate, I am informed, has not taken any action.

Mr. SPROULE. What I am saying would apply to the committe of the Senate whose duty it is to revise these regulations.

Mr. BRODEUR. It would not be fair to the United States Senate to say that they have accepted the committee's report. I do not think they have taken any action upon it.

Mr. SPROULE. The committee has taken action so far, that they have considered and have failed to agree to these regulations. Therefore, so far as our interest in them is concerned, they are practically dead to us at the present time. Trap nets were prohibited by the regulations, but that regulation is nullified. The regulation prescribing the size of the mesh of the net has been nullified or destroyed also. The regulation regarding the amount of netting that may be done is struck out as well. These regulations on every subject have been practically nullified by that committee. Now, we are told that we are in honour bound to live up to this treaty, which was made on our behalf; that as a nation we have to maintain a high national dignity and are in honour bound to observe it in every respect. But is it not strange that one of the contracting parties is bound by it, while the other contracting party is at liberty to mutilate in any way they like, or pay no attention to it? At the same time, we must sit here in silence and be told that we have not the information before us, and cannot discuss the matter in this House because the treaty has not yet been dealt with by the Senate of the United States. The information goes out to the people of the United States, while we are denied the right to inquire into it or debate it in this House. One of the recommendations of the committee is:

It is recommended that the artificial propagation of the various food fishes in the treaty waters be continued by both countries and developed to the fullest possible extent and with the highest possible degree of efficiency. This work is regarded as of vital moment to the preservation and maintenance of the most valuable species of fishes.

Are we living up to that? Not at all. Is the United States? Not at all. So far as I am informed, no efforts are being made by either country to live up to it. We are treating it as though it were a dead letter. It is true, it is only a recommendation; but it is a recommendation by the commission who made regulations to protect and perpetuate these fishes, and this regulation is considered by them as important for that purpose. Two years have elapsed, and nothing whatever has been done. Why has not some effort been made on our side to enforce these regulations? Are we to allow these important and valuable fisheries to be gradually depleted, because we cannot get the Americans to act? I think we should show some determination to have these waters protected. The fisheries in Lake Erie and Georgian bay are of great interest to our people. They are of vital interest to the fishermen in that section, and these fishermen desire to get information and know exactly where they stand. Why have we not done anything? Has the minister been as zealous in looking after the interests of the people in that part of the country as he should be? I think not. The United States, he tells us, have not yet finally accepted the treaty and, therefore, we can do nothing. But what has our government done to expedite their acceptance? So far as we know, it has done nothing, and we are denied the right to get information or to debate this question because the United States Senate has not finally dealt with it. It seems to me that we should be just as free as the United States Senate to discuss this question, and that it is the duty of the minister to give us every item of information in his possession just as though these regulations had been ratified long ago. We are just as much entitled to that information, and to discuss the matter as we are with regard to the reciprocity pact now before this House.

This matter is in the hands of two parties and we are denied any information regarding it. What is done may be for our benefit or otherwise, but we do not know and are denied the means of finding out until such time as our hands will be tied and we shall have to abide by the agreement no matter what the consequences may be. That is how the representatives of the people are treated in this House, and the situation in which we find ourselves is a very pitiable one. We are told that we are debarred from doing anything at present by a high national code of honour, but the United States have not observed that high code of honour which is to be binding on us. If the other party is not willing to abide by it, are we bound to observe it? We are told that the regulations cannot be amended in any direction by us, but they can be by the other side. That seems to me very unfair. Is it not about time that we brought this childish play to an end and dealt with this matter in an intelligent, businesslike and courageous way, consistent with our own dignity? The government, however, are committed to a policy of drift. They are willing to let things drift in an indifferent haphazard way from year to year until our fisneries will be destroyed. But were the government to do their duty, they would not allow a moment longer to pass without seeing that our interests were protected. Has the minister given us any evidence that he has been remonstrating with the United States or submitting to them the great desirability of bringing this thing to a finality? If he has not he should do so without any further delay. In any event he should let us know whether anything is being done. If he is unable or unwilling to do anything, then let the House take hold of the matter and discharge the important duty incumbent on it as a parliament, of looking after the interests of Canada.

Mr. FOSTER. I want to get an understanding of this thing. I have been listening to the debate so far and especially to the minister's statement, and I am not quite sure whether I have the facts of the case correctly or not. Suppose we try to get the matter clearly in our minds. A treaty has been made between Great Britain and the United States. There is no doubt about that. That treaty has been ratified by the United States Senate. Am I right in that?

Mr. BRODEUR. Yes, the former treaty has been ratified by the United States, but not the regulations.

Mr. FOSTER. I am not asking anything about the regulations. I am asking whether or not a treaty made between Great Britain and the United States has been ratified by the United States?

Mr. BRODEUR. Yes.

Mr. FOSTER. Then the treaty has been ratified by both the powers concerned. If that treaty has been ratified by the United States, and if all the forms of the American constitution have been complied with, and if all that is required by the British constitution has been met, that treaty is binding on both the United States and Great Britain and the latter acting on behalf of the Dominion of Canada, so far as these fisheries are concerned. Then all we have to do is ask what the terms of the treaty are; and if we find certain things as articles in that treaty binding and absolute, neither Great Britain nor the United States has any right to vary these. Either power has the right to ask for a revision of the treaty or, under the terms of the treaty, has the right to denounce it; but until either is done, neither Great Britain nor the United States has anything else to do than live up to the terms of the treaty. The minister will not contravene that position? He says nothing, but I know he could not. A treaty would not be worth the paper on which it is written if, after it had been solemnly agreed to and ratified, either one or the other could do as it liked with regard to carrying it out.

I want to ask another question. Article first is as follows:

The times, seasons and methods of fishing in the waters contiguous to the United States and Canada as specified in article 4 of this convention, and the nets, engines, gear, apparatus and plant which may be used therein shall be fixed and determined by uniform and common international regulations, restrictions and provisions.

Both powers agreed to that, and to that end agreed to appoint, within three months after this convention is proclaimed, a commission to be known as the International Fisheries Commission, consisting of one person named by each government. Both powers are bound by that and should live up to it.

Article 2. It shall be the duty of the International Commission——

Not the duty of the United States government; not the duty of the British government acting by way of the Dominion government; not that, but—— —the duty of the International Fisheries Commission, within six months after being named, to prepare a system of uniform and common international regulations for the protection and preservation of the food fishes in each of the waters prescribed in article 4 of this convention, which regulations shall embrace close seasons, limitations as to the character, size and manner of use of nets, engines, gear, apparatus and other appliances; a uniform system of registering by each government in waters where requird for the more convenient regulation of commercial fishing by its own citizens or subjects within its own territorial waters or any such part of such waters; an arrangement for concurrent measures for propagation of fish, and such other provisions and measures as the commission shall deem necessary.

So, it is not the British parliament, nor the British government, nor the American administration, nor the United States Senate, which is to do these several things; it is the duty of the International Fisheries Commission to do them, and under the treaty nobody else can do what is laid down there to be done by that commission. Now, the International Fisheries Commission—I want to be sure I am right—has met, has agreed upon these regulations, and has reported these regulations to the two governments? I am correct in that?

Mr. BRODEUR. Yes.

Mr. FOSTER. Very well, they have done their duty. Now, what does article 3 say?

Article 3. The two governments engage to put into operation and to enforce by legislation and executive action, with as little delay as possible——

What?

—the regulations, restrictions and provisions with appropriate penalties for all breaches thereof; and the date when they shall be put into operation shall be fixed by the concurrent proclamations of the Governor General of the Dominion of Canada in Council and of the President of the United States.

The Senate has nothing to do with regulations. The Senate, when it ratified that treaty made its last utterance on these regulations——

Mr. BRODEUR. But——

Mr. FOSTER. Wait a moment; let me finish my argument—made its last utterance on these regulations when it solemnly agreed, by the two-thirds majority necessary under their constitution, to put the matter into the hands of the International Fisheries Commission. When it did that, it divested itself of all authority in changing or making any of these regulations. They made an article of the treaty which provided how the regulations were to be brought into force. That is, the two governments were to bring them into force by proclamation—not proclamation of the Senate of the United States, or of this parliament, but proclamation of the President of the United States, and of the Governor General of the Dominion of Canada in Council.

Mr. BRODEUR. After the legislation being passed.

Mr. FOSTER. What legislation?

Mr. BRODEUR. It is mentioned in the clause the hon. gentleman read. It required some legislation to be passed by the United States authorities.

Mr. FOSTER. For what purpose?

Mr. BRODEUR. For this purpose: The administration of the fisheries was formerly under the control of the different states of the United States. By the treaty which was made concerning these boundary waters, these waters passed under federal control. It required, then, some legislation on the part of the federal authorities to carry out these regulations. It required also an appropriation of money.

Mr. FOSTER. That does not throw any light on the subject we were discussing, nor has it anything to do with the matter. What we were discussing, and what was brought up by my hon. friend from New Westminster was that regulations provided for under the treaty, and made by the International Fisheries Commission are proposed to be changed by the United States Senate. The two governments are not to make or alter regulations, but only to put into operation the regulations made by the International Commission. It is not to be understood or allowed that the Senate should change the regulations made by the commission. But then comes in what the minister has been talking about—that in order to have proper legislation for the enforcement, the administration is to have regard to the different states that have rights and powers in the matter, and to endeavour to get a unity of enforcement. Does the minister contend that that provides that the Senate of the United States, the body that ratified the treaty may go back upon the regulations which were made by the International Commission and change these regulations? I do not think he can pretend that. Now, have these regulations been put in operation by concurrent proclamation, or have they not?

Mr. BRODEUR. No, they have not been.

Mr. FOSTER. There is, therefore, no proclamation and consequently up to this time, the regulations made by the International Fisheries Commission are a dead letter. That is where the matter stands?

Mr. BRODEUR. Yes.

Mr. FOSTER. Now, what seems to me the unwarranted thing—and I say that with all due respect—is that a committee of the Senate of the United States, evidently with the idea of bringing up the regulations before the Senate for amendment after proposing changes in these regulations themselves. That is quite open to the Senate, and this treaty is torn into ribbons. There is here a provision by which a revision of these shall be made, if they are not satisfactory. Article 5 says:

The International Fisheries Commission shall continue in existence so long as this convention shall be in force, and each government shall have the power to fill, and shall fill from time to time, any vacancy which may occur in its representation on the commission. Each government shall pay its own commissioner, and any joint expenses shall be paid by the two governments in equal moieties.

The next section deals with a change of opinion which might occur with either of the parties:

The regulations, restrictions and provisions provided for in this convention——

Namely, those made by the International Fisheries Commission. not by the Senate, not by the Dominion of Canada, but by the International Fisheries Commission.

—shall remain in force for a period of four years from the date of their executive promulgation——

So that after the executives promulgate these, there is no power to destroy this convention, and those regulations remain for a period of four years.

—and thereafter until one year from the date when either the government of Great Britain or of the United States shall give notice to the other of its desire for their revision.

There is where you have a chance for revision. After these remain in power for four years, if one power says, 'we do not like them, notice is given, and they may be revised, and then the Senate may have something to say about it.' Either one of the contracting parties may refuse to abide by such regulations, and in such a case the treaty will become of no effect.

Mr. BRODEUR. The hon. gentleman says the matter could be referred to the Senate. I call his attention to the fact that this particular clause simply speaks of 'the governments.' I would not like to admit just now that the United States Senate would have the right even to revise, because the treaty simply speaks of 'the governments.'

Mr. FOSTER. (Reading):

And thereafter until one year from the date when either the government of Great Britain or of the United States shall give notice to the other of its desire for their revision——

Then revision can commence.

—and immediately upon such notice being given the commission shall proceed to make a revision thereof.

Not the Senate. My hon. friend is quite right. The Senate even then has no power to revise.

Mr. BRODEUR. It would be a question whether, in such a case, the Senate would have the right. It has been contended by the American authorities, and it has been so stated to me by them, that in every case under these different sections where the action of the government is involved or required, this action is to be exercised, not by the government alone, as we understand it here, by the president and his cabinet, but with the concurrence of the United States Senate. That is their contention.

Mr. FOSTER. Even suppose that contention is correct——

Mr. BRODEUR. I do not say it is correct, but that is their contention.

Mr. FOSTER—the time has not arrived for that, and will not until four years after the promulgation.

Immediately upon such notice being given, the commission shall proceed to make a revision thereof, which revised regulations, if adopted and promulgated by the Governor General of Canada in Council and by the President of the United States, shall remain in force for another period of four years and thereafter until one year from the date when a further notice of revision is given as above provided in this article.

If there be a revision by that International Fisheries Commission, which revision, if agreed to by the two executives, must then be promulgated, the Senate may then put in a claim that they are to advise the president as to whether he shall agree, and they may exercise their right in that advice. But until four years after the promulgation of this set of regulations which has been made by the International Fisheries Commission, the Senate does not seem to me to have lost power under this treaty to alter, change or interfere in any way with those regulations.

It shall, however, be in the power of the two governments, by joint or concurrent action upon the recommendation of the commission to make modifications at any time in the regulations.

To make modifications at any time in the regulations. That they can not do on their own initiative, it must be on the recommendation of the commission alone. So it seems to me that under the present condition of things the minister's stand is not a clear one. He has failed to inform us that he has taken objection to the contention of the United States authorities.

Mr. BRODEUR. I may say to my hon. friend that when this matter was brought to the attention of Mr. Bryce and myself, who were there together, we understood that in speaking of 'government,' the word meant what we understand it to mean here. But we were informed by the counsel of the Secretary of State, that in such a question it would require not only the action of the government, but the action of the Senate, because the Senate was a part of the treaty-making power.

Mr. FOSTER. That is in case of revision. But there is no chance for revision until four years shall have passed.

Mr. BRODEUR. But then action can only be taken after the proclamation, according to section 3.

Mr. FOSTER. Well, I have given the articles in the treaty, and they are as plain as words can be, and it seems to me they leave us in an unsatisfactory position. Of course, the minister may say that these regulations have not yet gone into effect on either side, and consequently they are not operative. But the sole reason of the treaty was to get at an understanding, and to provide a machinery which would protect the fisheries, and keep that inestimable resource of both countries in good condition, and prevent depletion of what is so great a source of food for the people of both countries. My hon. friend from Grey stated that here you have three full years after the treaty has been made, and you have not yet had the official proclamation of these regulations——

Mr. BRODEUR. It is not our fault.

Mr. FOSTER—and as a consequence of that, you have a hesitation and loss in the fisheries.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I would like to say one or two words. Let me state at the outset that I would not presume for a moment to interpret the constitution of the United States contrary to the views of those who make it their study. What I say, therefore, must be taken subject to the consideration that the constitutional lawyers of the United States must be presumed to understand their own constitution, and that what we say in regard to it is only our own understanding of the meaning of the language. It seems to me that when the United States Senate ratified this treaty, then the treaty became just as binding upon the United States as it was binding upon Canada by the ratification of His Majesty the King. I would have thought that, under the circumstances, the regulations themselves would not become subject to the ratification of the Senate except in so far as the treaty itself plainly stated that such ratification was to take place. For example, it might be that at the end of the four year period such ratification for a further period might be necessary under the terms of the treaty. What did the treaty amount to? It simply amounted to this, that the government of Canada, through His Majesty the King, and the government of the United States entered into a treaty by which they agreed that these regulations should be according to the arbitrament and decision of the tribunal which the treaty appointed. That is the meaning of the treaty it it means anything. After these regulations have been made by the duly constituted tribunal it is said that the Senate of the United States claims the right under its treaty-making powers to revise them. I do not know whether I am correct in that. The Senate of the United States might interfere in two ways. It might interfere, as one of the legislative bodies of the United States, by declining to pass legislation enforcing these regulations unless some amendment were made in the regulations themselves. It would possess that power, and it could exercise that power, although such exercise would not be in accordance with the terms of the treaty, just the same as this parliament might decline to implement the treaty that had been made. That is one thing, but that is not what I understand is being done at the present time. The Senate of the United States is not interfering in that way, but it is interfering under that clause of the constitution which vests in the Senate a portion of the treaty-making power of the United States. It does not seem to me conceivable, subject to the superior wisdom of the constitutional lawyers of the United States, that that particular thing would be possible. Let me illustrate. Suppose the United States and Great Britain entered into a treaty by which they referred claims by the United States against Great Britain, or by Great Britain against the United States, to the arbitrament and determination of a particular tribunal. Such a treaty would not be binding upon the United States until it had been ratified by the Senate in accordance with the provisions of their constitution, but after it had been once ratified, it would be thoroughly binding upon the United States, and it would be imposible for the Senate of the United States, after the award had been made by the tribunal to which these claims had been referred, to say: We have now the right, under the treaty-making powers of the constitution, to vary and alter that award. If it could not do that, and it is plain to me that it could not, in the case of the arbitration by which I have illustrated my argument, then it seems to me equally impossible that it should do so in the case which the minister has brought to the attention of the House to-day. I would like to ask, in conclusion, from the minister, whether it is by virtue of the ordinary legislative power of the Senate, or whether it is by virtue of the treaty-making power of the Senate, that these regulations are now alleged to be subject to modification?

Mr. BRODEUR. That is the point upon which I have no definite information, but I assume, by reason of the message which was sent to the Senate, that it is being dealt with under the treaty-making power. I am under the impression that that is the way in which it is being dealt with, because the matter has been referred to a committee on foreign relations, and I would, therefore, be inclined to think that the Senate has been acting in its capacity as a part of the treaty-making power. But, as I have said, I have no definite information on that point.

Mr. FOSTER. Has the minister the resolution which was introduced in the Senate?

Mr. BRODEUR. I think we have. I think it was sent to the department by the British ambassador. I may inform the House that this morning I discussed this question with Mr. Bryce myself.

Mr. JAMESON. Mr. Speaker, this matter has been discussed in this House on more than one occasion, and I think its importance is sufficient warrant for the discussion which has heretofore taken place. The question as to whether or not the United States Senate has the right under the constitution of the United States to revise the regulations which have been made by the commissioners appointed under the treaty of 1908 is of course a question which no person in this House to-day can speak with authority upon. The minister himself says that he is not positive upon the question, and, indeed, it is one that the United States Senate, I suppose, must settle for itself. But, at all events, there is this to be said that the people of this country and, I believe I may say the minister himself, when the treaty was entered into, and when the commissioners were appointed, believed that when these commissioners made their report, when they framed their regulations, nothing was left except to give the necessary legislative authority to the regulations and to provide for their enforcement.

I do not think that it was anticipated by any person in this country at least, whatever may have been in the mind of the Senate of the United States, or of the United States administration, that these regulations should be subject to review. I remember two years ago, when this very question of these regulations was discussed in this House, that I asked the minister why it was that we had not had the privilege, and why it was that the people interested, in this country, had not had the privilege of inspecting and approving these regulations, and the answer of the minister was that these regulations were drafted under the treaty, that we were bound by the regulations as framed, and that as a consequence we must give legislative sanction to them when they were brought down. The minister defended the ground which he then took very vigorously, although at the time I felt it would have been much better, had the people who were interested in the fisheries, and who probably could have given a great deal of assistance to the Canadian commissioner at least, had an opportunity of seeing the tentative draft of the regulations before they became official.

Now, the minister has said that the government of the United States have discharged their obligations in this matter. Perhaps they have in his view, but I do not think that we, who have been watching the proceedings for the last two years, can altogether agree with him in that, and I regret that the minister should seem to think that my hon. friend from New Westminster (Mr. Taylor), who introduced this matter and who spoke, I think, with great moderation under the circumstances, made remarks which were not appropriate to the occasion. I do not think that it is wise for us to sit silent while the United States takes advantage of us in these matters, and I think that the minister himself has yielded too gracefully to their request for further time, if they made it, or if he has permitted them to take further time without asking formally for it I think it is well that the matter should be brought to their attention in some formal way, so that they will understand that the people of this country expect that they, as well as ourselves, are bound by the terms of the treaty.

The changes which the United States Senate committee thought desirable to make in these regulations should, I think, be brought to the attention of the House. I do not know if the Minister of Marine is aware of the action which the Senate committee took. I am not sure if he knows what the present position of this matter is, whether it has been sent to a committee of the present Senate, or whether it has been left in abeyance since the adjournment of the late Congress. The 'Pacific Fisherman' an American paper devoted to fishing interests, in its issue of March, 1911, says that the Senate committee proposed to strike from the regulations framed by Professor Prince and Professor Starr Jordan, the Canadian and American representatives, the following clauses: namely, clauses 45 to 50 inclusive, and clause 62 to 65 inclusive. I shall read these clauses in order that the House may appreciate the importance of the changes which the United States Senate committee proposes. The following are the clauses which are recommended to be stricken out:

45. Net fishing along the boundary line in Lake Erie prohibited. No fishing with nets shall be permitted in Lake Erie within one-half mile of the international boundary.

46. Construction of pound nets. No pound nets shall be set within these treaty waters unless so constructed as to have in the middle of the back of the crib, reaching from the top to the bottom thereof, a vertical strip of netting, which shall hang squarely, the width of which strip shall not be less than one-half the width of the back of the crib, and the mesh of which shall not be less than two and three-quarter inches, extension measure, as actually used in fishing.

In those waters lying to the northward of a line drawn from Cape Hurd, in the province of Ontario, to Thunder Bay Light, in the state of Michigan, such vertical strip shall have a mesh of not less than three and one-eighth inches, extension measure, as actually used in fishing.

The above restrictions shall take effect January 1, 1911.

No web of fine mesh (locally called an apron), or any other device which may reduce the means of escape of small fishes through the meshes, shall be used in the crib of a pound net in these treaty waters.

47. Location of pound nets. The leader of a pound net shall be made visible, there shall be a gap of at least fifty feet open and clear to the bottom between one pound net and the next of the series when set in linear order, and there shall be a lateral passageway or distance of not less than one thousand feet between one series of pound nets and the next on either side.

Not more than seven pound nets belonging to one person shall be set in a linear series.

No part of this regulation shall be so constructed as to interfere with recognized proprietary rights.

48. Trap nets prohibited. No concealed, movable trap net shall be used in these treaty waters. On and after January 1, 1912, no trap net of any kind shall be used for the capture of fish in these treaty waters.

49. Mesh of nets. No gill net or other movable net of less than four and three-fourths inches mesh, extension measure, as actually used in fishing, shall be drawn, set, placed, or maintained for whitefish or lake trout in these treaty waters.

No gill net or other movable net of less than three and one-eighth inches mesh, extension measure, as actually used in fishing, shall be drawn, set, placed or maintained in Lake Erie, or less than two and one-half inches mesh in Lake Huron, Lake Superior and Lake Ontario, for fish other than whitefish or lake trout.

The above restrictions shall take effect on and after January 1, 1911.

No gill net shall be drawn, set, placed or maintained within one-half mile of any pound net in these treaty waters.

50. Amount of netting. Not more than thirty thousand yards of netting, linear measure, shall be set in these treaty waters at any one time by one tug, and not more than eight thousand yards by one sail boat, except in the waters of Lake Huron and Lake Superior, where not more than sixty thousand yards shall be set by one tug, and not more than eighteen thousand yards shall be set by one sail boat.

62. Close season for salmon. From August 25th to September 15th in each year, both days inclusive, no salmon or steelhead shall be fished for, killed or captured for commercial purposes in these treaty waters; provided, however, that in the waters to the westward of a line drawn southward from Gonzales Point to the shore of the state of Washington, silver salmon or coho salmon, may be fished for, killed or captured from September 1st to September 15th in each year, both days inclusive.

63. Weekly close season for salmon and steelhead. From six o'clock Saturday morning to six o'clock on the Monday morning next succeeding, no salmon or steelhead shall be fished for, killed or captured in these treaty waters.

It is, however, provided that in the waters to the westward of a line drawn southward from Gonzales Point to the shore of the state of Washington the weekly close season shall begin twelve hours earlier, and shall end twelve hours earlier.

64. Construction of pound nets. All pound nets or other stationary appliances for the capture of salmon or steelhead shall be so constructed that no fish whatever shall be taken during the weekly close season. The erection or addition to the pound net of a jigger is prohibited.

65. Location of pound nets. All pound nets shall be limited to a length of twenty-five hundred feet, with an end passageway of at least six hundred feet between one pound net and the next in linear series, such distances being measured in continuation of the line of direction of the leader of such net, and a lateral passageway of at least twenty-four hundred feet between one pound net and the next.

On and after January 1, 1911, the mesh in pound nets shall be four inches in extension in the leader and not less than three inches in other parts of the net.

Now, Mr. Speaker, anybody who is familiar with fishery regulations will at once see that these clauses, recommended to be stricken out of the regulations by the Senate committee, are very important for the preservation of the fisheries, and from the information we have of the manner in which the fisheries have heretofore been conducted, we know that the enforcement of regulations similar to these I have read are absolutely necessary for the protection of the fisheries in these boundary waters. We have had some previous experience with the United States in regard to questions of this sort, and that experience leads us to believe that these matters should be looked after with very great care by the Canadian government. The difficulty which we experience in these matters is that after we arrive at an understanding with our neighbours, and after we, in perfect good faith, carry out what we regard to be the true intent and meaning of that understanding, we find, much to our surprise, that they have had an entirely different conception of the matter from that which prevailed with us. I would like to ask the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries whether, at the time this treaty was entered into, and the approval of this government was secured for it, it was understood by this administration that the United States Senate would have the right to revise these regulations which were framed by the commission appointed under the treaty.

Mr. BRODEUR. That question was not considered at all at the time.

Mr. JAMESON. Then I may gather from that, that the minister is as much surprised at the action of the United States Senate in that connection as are other members of this House. I assume that if the minister had known that the United States Senate were going to revise the action of the commissioners, he would have imparted that information to the House two years ago, when this matter was discussed; and the very fact that it was not understood is an evidence of the other undoubted fact, that all our dealings with the United States are entered into without a full and complete knowledge of where they are going to land us. I think in matters of such vital importance as this—important to the fisheries and important to the people interested in the fisheries—there should be no room for misunderstanding; and that when this country agrees to a treaty entered into by Great Britain on our behalf with the United States, it should be with a knowledge of where that treaty is going to lead us, where it is going to leave us, and what we are going to get under it.

Now, so far as we are concerned, these regulations, I presume, cannot be reviewed. I will ask the minister, however, whether or not, in view of the situation which has unexpectedly developed in the United States, we can give to our commissioner, or, if not, to his department, or, if not to his department, then has this parliament, the right also to make changes and alterations in these regulations.

Mr. BRODEUR. There is no doubt that under the treaty the regulations might be revised with the consent of this government and the treaty-making power of the United States.

Mr. JAMESON. Then may I ask the minister if he is giving consent to the alterations which are being imposed by the United States Senate?

Mr. BRODEUR. Certainly not. I may say, however, with regard to one of the changes, concerning part of Lake Huron which is a result of a difference in the size of the mesh, I stated to the American authorities that we would have no objection to have an amendment made; but it was of no importance.

Mr. JAMESON. Then we reach this conclusion, that while we on this side of the border can only make changes in these regulations with the consent of the United States Senate, they on the other side of the border can mutilate or alter them in any way they choose without obtaining the consent either of the government of Canada or of this parliament.

Mr. BRODEUR. But the amendment could not be put in force except with the consent of the Canadian government.

Mr. JAMESON. I can quite understand that, but in this case they are not proposing to add to, but are striking out.

Mr. BRODEUR. The same thing.

Mr. JAMESON. Not exactly the same thing. Consequently we would have a skeletonized form of these regulations, none of the remaining regulations, perhaps, being objectionable to us, and yet the form and substance of them, necessary in order that the fisheries should be conserved, being stricken out. So that I do not suppose that the minister will say at this moment that if these changes, which have been recommended by a Committee of the United States Senate, are made by the Senate, he will take the responsibility of refusing to proclaim the regulations in force in this country. Perhaps the minister may have reached that conclusion, and, if so, will state it.

Mr. BRODEUR. No, I have not considered that point at all.

Mr. JAMESON. That certainly indicates a very unfortunate position for Canada, for Canadian fishermen, and for the people of this country generally. Can the minister state at this time in what stage the regulations are in the United States Senate, or whether they have yet been submitted to the new Senate?

Mr. BRODEUR. I do not know whether they have been submitted this session or not. I do not think they have.

Mr. JAMESON. I gather from what the minister says that the government on this side of the line have practicaly decided to abandon the regulations, as they do not seem to be in touch with the United States Senate. When the regulations come back here, they may be in such a skeletonized form that they will be simply worthless, as I think they are now. Consequently the advantages which we had hoped at one time we would get under properly-framed regulations, will be lost to the people of this country and to our fisheries. In my view, there is in this matter a question of international faith at stake. I believe that we should adopt a firmer policy in our dealings with the United States. I do not think we should consent to have them trifling with the administration of this country. It seems to me that they consider the government of Canada to be a pretty easy mark, from the manner in which they have been conducting themselves with respect to these regulations; and almost every other case in which we have had dealings with them of late, has indicated a similar disposition on their part and a similar state of mind on the part of the government of that country. In the meantime, the question is, how are we going to protect and conserve the fisheries which were to be protected under these regulations? It seems to me that the whole thing has so far fallen to the ground. It is a most regrettable thing that matters should have reached the stage at which they are.

I trust that the government will take the very earliest opportunity to see that whatever is going to be done under this treaty, in connection with these regulations, is done, and is reported promptly to this parliament, and that any rights which we may have under that treaty are preserved to the people of this country.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. I would like to ask the minister whether or not legislative action is required for the purpose of putting into operation these regulations? If so, whether or not the ratification by the United States Senate can be considered as legislative action on the part of the United States or whether ratification is required by both the Senate and the House of Representatives. Article 3 of the treaty reads:

> The two governments engage to put into operation and to enforce by legislation and executive action the regulations.

The United States Senate have passed an Act ratifying the regulations subject to these changes they are making. I desire to know whether or not that is legislative action as required by the treaty.

Mr. BRODEUR. I do not know whether the United States Senate, in considering these regulations, has acted by virtue of its jurisdiction as a branch of the treaty-making power.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. Does the hon. minister know whether the House of Representatives has sanctioned the regulations.

Mr. BRODEUR. No, it has not.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. This article says that the regulations require to be sanctioned by legislative action, and I would assume that means legislation by both Houses. It is the intention that these regulations, after going through the Senate, shall go to the House of Representatives for legislative sanction?

Mr. BRODEUR. The official information that I have is that a message was to be sent by the President of the United States recommending the necessary legislation and the adoption of regulations. I have no other information on the subject.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. Does the minister know whether or not the British House of Commons has taken legislative action?

Mr. BRODEUR. No legislative action was required on the part of the British authorities because the matter concerned Canada alone. It was contemplated in the treaty that the legislation mentioned in article 3 should be passed by the Dominion parliament, and that has been done.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. So far as Canada is concerned, evidently we are absolutely bound by the regulations passed by the joint commissioners and the United States are not.

Mr. BROEUR. Nobody is bound to-day, because no final action has been taken and no proclamation has been issued.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. Suppose Congress should pass the regulations mutilated as they are, would we be bound by them?

Mr. BRODEUR. Certainly not. It would be for us to consider whether those amendments should be accepted or not.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. Who would have the power to alter the regulations—the commission or this government?

Mr. BRODEUR. It is provided in the treaty that the regulations may be revised by the two governments on the recommendation of the commission. It would be for this government to decide whether there was such a recommendation on the part of the commissioners.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. The hon. minister knows that such recommendation can only be made after four years. I think it is time this House should protest against being placed in the unfair position in which we are. That position seems to be that while the United States agreed to abide by whatever regulations might be made by this commission, and while we agreed to be similarly bound, yet the United States Senate is now mutilating these regulations to suit itself. Both countries having delegated their powers to that commission to make those regulations, all that remained to be done was to ratify them and neither country had any power to amend, yet we find the United States Senate amending the regulations to suit themselves. I want to protest against another thing in connection with this treaty, and that is this. Apparently the United States make public the contents of the treaties long before we have any information here as to what is contained in them. In the present instance these regulations made by the Joint Commission, as the Minister of Marine and Fisheries knows, were published and sent broadcast throughout the United States long before we in Canada knew anything about them. I had a copy of the regulations from an outside source long before I could procure them from this government. Then take the other case, that of the International Commission which it is proposed to establish and place in charge of railway rates, express rates, telephone rates and telegraph rates. Down to this day, we have no information from the government regarding the contents of the report on this subject. I asked for that information three months ago, but so far we have never had any information of what that report contained. The matter is a very important one, the establishment of an International Commission to regulate international railway rates, express, telephone and telegraph rates. Yet although we have no information from this government and none can be obtained from it, there appeared three months ago in the American 'Review of Reviews' a full exposition of the contents of that report. The 'Review of Reviews' went on to state this:

It is expected that with the reciprocity treaty there will also be submitted to Congress the text of some sort of traffic agreement with Canada to regulate the railroad business over the border. . . . The report of Chairman Knapp, concurred in by Chairman Mabee, and presented to the Secretary of State on the last day of December, contains recommendations of such importance to those of our citizens who are interested in trade and travel across the border that we herewith summarize its most important points.

The writer of that article, as far back as last February, went on to summarize and give details of the contents of that report which our Minister of Railways (Mr. Graham) said the other evening had not been divulged and that he was not at liberty to say anything about it. Notwithstanding the statement, this report was published last February in the 'Review of Reviews.' The article goes on to say:

The proposed treaty provides for a tribunal to enforce and administer its provisions to be known as the International Commerce Commission, and which shall consist of four members, namely, the chairman of the Interstate Commerce Commission and the chief commissioner of the Board of Railway Commissioners of Canada for the time being, a member of the Interstate Commerce Commission to be appointed by the President of the United States, and a member of the Railway Commissioners of Canada to be appointed by the Governor General of Canada in Council. The powers conferred upon and the authority given to this commission in respect of international carriers would correspond to those exercised by the Interstate Commerce Commission in respect of interstate carriers within the United States.

The provisions of such a treaty should apply to telegraph, telephone and express companies and such companies should be subject as respect to international business to the authority of the International Commerce Commission.

Then it goes on to give other particulars. What I want to emphasize more particularly is this, that while we on this side are prepared to preserve secrecy regarding state documents, commissions or agreements, on the other side they are made public at once: and in that way they get an advantage over us with respect to treaties of that kind.

Mr. BRODEUR. With regard to the regulations which have been passed, I am not aware that the American authorities published them in advance.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. I myself saw a copy of these proposed regulations. It came into my possession from a fisherman in my locality who got it from an American fisherman. That was the first intimation I had of what these regulations were.

Mr. BRODEUR. That must be a mistake. I may state what actually occurred in that connection. Professor Starr Jordan sent a draft prepared by himself to be considered by the different states interested. This draft, for reasons unknown, was published by the Ontario government as an official document, but it did not contain the official regulations which were adopted later on, as absolutely different ones were adopted.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. They were draft regulations, and the copy I had was marked confidential, yet it was being circulated throughout the United States. My hon. friend from New Westminster (Mr. Taylor) says they were published in the press of the state of Washington.

Mr. BRODEUR. But they are not the regulations adopted later on by the commission. It was merely a draft which was sent out by Dr. Starr Jordan, but which was not accepted by the commission.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. That is exactly what we complain of. The draft of the regulations was sent all through the United States to receive the approval or disapproval of their fishermen, before we had the draft here, or an opportunity to consult our fishermen or to receive the advice of our own commissioner.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. If I understand the matter, my hon. friend finds fault with us because the results of the negotiations that we had with our American neighbours were disclosed by the American authorities and were not disclosed by us. That is the point the hon. gentleman makes against us. Let me tell my hon. friend that the American system is to divulge everything in matters of diplomacy even before they have got through, while the British system is to disclose nothing until the agreement has been put through, and the thing has become official by the signature of the parties. My hon. friend apparently, has a weakness for the American system. If I understand aright, he would change the British for the American system. But we do not want to do that, either on this occasion or on any other. We are not in favour of annexation; we want to remain British. I think my hon. friend ought not to try to induce us to go out of our way to favour the adoption of American methods.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. We do not want reciprocity in that kind of conduct. But if it is the custom of the American government to disclose these documents contrary to the British system, it is the duty of our government to get the information from the United States as quickiy as possible after they publish it so that we may be in as good a position as they are in that regard. These regulations, I understand, were a compromise. The commissioners of the two countries sat down together and eventually agreed upon a certain set of regulations. Now, the compromise is being taken up by the United States Senate, and they are proceeding to amend it to suit themselves, as I contend, in direct contradiction of the terms of the treaty.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not know that the information has been given to the House, but as I have not the information, I would like to ask a question either of the Prime Minister or of the Minister of Railways. What authority was ever given to Chairman Mabee that led to his conference with Mr. Knapp? Was it a mere conference of good neighbourhood, or was there official direction and instruction?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I cannot say at the moment, but my impression is that it was a purely friendly conference to ascertain whether the two countries could agree on a common system of that kind.

Mr. FOSTER. And not authorized by the government?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I could not say positively, for I do not remember at the moment, but I could ascertain.

Motion agreed to, and House went into Committee of Supply.

SUPPLY.

Railways and Canals—Collection of Revenue —Intercolonial Railway—Further amount required, $353,000.

Hon. GEO. P. GRAHAM (Minister of Railways). This is for the adjustment of accounts, and does not provide for further expenditure except as it takes from the revenue of last year a certain amount which we wish to pay for rolling stock and other items. When the estimate for the current expenditure of the year on the Intercolonial railway was made up, it was on information available last autumn. In the supplementary estimates an amount was voted of $250,000 to add to that. As I said to the committee at the time, I was asking to be allowed to pay out of revenue a further sum of $200,000 for rolling stock. I thought I had got an estimate in the supplementaries, but evidently I had not. Then, there was $76,000 to pay out of revenue for the estimated value of the property lost by the fire at Campbellton. That was a new departure; we were taking it out of revenue. But evidently I did not get the vote for it. Further there was $58,000 increase of wages under the schedule, and this was unforeseen to a certain extent, at least at the close of the year we did not have the amount in our minds. Then there is a small balance to make up the $350,000. The only effect is that it will reduce the amount that would appear as surplus revenue of last year.

Mr. BARKER. Do I understand that no part of this vote will, under any circumstances, go to capital account?

Mr. GRAHAM. None of it.

Mr. BARKER. It is probably a reduction of what seems to be your profits on operation?

Mr. GRAHAM. Yes, it reduces our surplus.

Mr. EDWARDS. Are the locomotives bought for the Intercolonial railway always bought by tender?

Mr. GRAHAM. Always.

Mr. CROCKET. Do I understand that part of this is to be applied to the purchase of rolling stock to replace what was destroyed at Campbellton?

Mr. GRAHAM. No, but $76,000 is the estimated value of the buildings destroyed at Campbellton, and we are taking that amount out of revenue this year to apply toward the new buildings.

Mr. CROCKET. Was no rolling stock destroyed in Campbellton?

Mr. GRAHAM. Yes, but it will be replaced out of revenue.

Mr. CROCKET. What was the value of rolling stock destroyed there?

Mr. GRAHAM. I have not the figures before me, but I placed them on 'Hansard' at the time I put through my Supply.

Allowances—Active militia, $110,000.

Sir FREDERICK BORDEN (Minister of Militia and Defence). I have distributed for the information of the committee a memorandum which gives a pretty full explanation of the different items making up these main estimates. Perhaps it would be well for me to say a few words generally before proceeding to the items, and in doing so I will detain the committee but a few minutes. It is well known that in June last Canada was visited by one of the principal military authorities in the British Empire, Sir John French, the Inspector General of the British forces, who came here in accordance with an arrangement, I might say an understanding, made as long ago as 1902, when the Canadian ministers were in England attending the Colonial Conference, as it was then called. They sent a memorandum to the Colonial Secretary indicating the course which Canada was prepared to take with reference to matters of defence, and pointing out that so far as military defence was concerned, we would be glad to have the benefit from time to time of an inspection of the Canadian forces by a distinguished British general. This is the first opportunity since that time that we have had the advantage of such an inspection.

Now, I am not going fully into the report of Sir John French, as no doubt questions will be asked as the different items are under consideration. But on the fourteenth page of the memorandum which has been laid before the members, special reference is made to recommendations of Sir John French, the Inspector General of the British forces, and I wish to confine my observations at the moment to the two points especially referred to in the memorandum. First, the question of organization, secondly, the training and education of the officers and the force generally. I may perhaps observe that Sir John French, being Inspector General of the forces of the empire, and being a soldier and a great general, naturally looks at all troops which he inspects from the point of view of efficiency as an armed force ready for active service. That was his point of view, and naturally perhaps, he was to some extent disappointed, or at any rate would be disappointed, with the Canadian militia as a force of that kind. We in Canada know perfectly well that the Canadian militia has never been a force ready to go to war, that has not been the principal idea in its organization. In fact it is only within a very short time, three or four years, that any such idea would have been suggested in connection with the militia. The purpose of the militia has been to aid, to assist, the British army when difficulties occurred in Canada. The British authorities have always maintained in Canada British forces in different portions of the country up to a very short time ago. In 1905 the last of the British troops were withdrawn from this country, from Halifax and Esquimalt, and Canada then assumed the direct responsibility for the defence of her own territory, thereby relieving the British taxpayer from responsibility in that connection. Previous to that time, while a British force was maintained in Canada, the Canadian government did not pretend to keep up many of the administrative branches of an army. There was always at Halifax or at Esquimalt the nucleus of an army which could supply, when required, the necessary administrative branches. After the troops were withdrawn from Halifax and Esquimalt, or about that time, it became necessary for the Canadian militia to organize the different administrative services, and that has been done, so that to-day in that respect, and in every respect, to some extent at least, we have in Canada a force able to take the field if necessary.

I was saying that Sir John French would naturally be disappointed if he expected to find a force absolutely ready to take the field for active service. We did not expect that, he probably did not expect it. But he was asked to make a frank criticism and report of what he found, and of the remedies which he would suggest, and that I am happy to say he has done. I may say that his report is very satisfactory indeed to the military men of Canada. General Lake, who was here at the time, felt quite satisfied with Sir John French's criticisms. One of the recommendations, or one of the criticisms perhaps I had better say, which Sir John French made, was that our organization was not what it ought to be, that is to say, he found that our peace organization was not such as would lend itself to the best efficiency if the force were ever required to take the field. If we are maintaining a military force at all it must be with a view of having it prepared in the event—much as we would regret it and unlikely as it may be—of war, but still a force which would be fit to take the field if required. The objection which he has made was that the different branches of the force were scattered, that there was not a proper balance in the strength of the different branches as between infantry, artillery, and cavalry, and he recommended that instead of the large commands and the districts which we have had for many years—long before I came into office—we should have divisions established, and that each division should contain within itself all the branches including infantry, cavalry, artillery and the administrative services of the army sufficient to defend completely the particular portion of the country included in the division. This proposal, fortunately, can be carried out without any serious difficulty and I will read here the words of the memorandum which are, as a matter of fact, the words of the present general who succeeded Sir Percy Lake—Major General Mackenzie.

> This reorganization can be effected with practically no dislocation of the existing system, as each divisional command will include one or more of the present military districts. The result of this change will be to place under each divisional commander the troops to form the division he would command on mobilization and tend to associate, during training, the units which would work together as a division in the field.

I do not know that I need enlarge at all upon that.

Mr. FOSTER. How many districts are there now?

Sir FREDERICK BORDEN. Thirteen. But I may say by way of explanation that General French has separated eastern Canada from what he calls western Canada, in his report.

Mr. FOSTER. What is the line of division?

Sir FREDERICK BORDEN. It is the lakes. He proposes to leave western Canada under the districts as they are at present. The particular organization of which I am now speaking refers exclusively to eastern Canada, that is Ontario, or most of it, Quebec and the maritime provinces.

Mr. DANIEL. How many divisional commands are there?

Sir FREDERICK BORDEN. There will be six divisions in eastern Canada. At the present time there are ten districts so that it really means a diminution in the number.

Mr. DANIEL. Will the minister give the boundaries of the different divisional commands of eastern Canada while he is on the subject?

Sir FREDERICK BORDEN. Yes. There will be three divisions in Ontario. One of these divisions will include two military districts. The province of Quebec is also divided into two divisions in place of the three districts which now separate the different parts of the province. The maritime provinces will be one division. As a matter of fact at the present time they are put under one larger command, but they are divided, and have been for many years, into three districts.

Mr. DANIEL. In the divisional command are all the officers who administer that division in the time of peace assembled at headquarters, or are there some remaining as they have been in different places, say in Prince Edward Island, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick?

Sir FREDERICK BORDEN. No, all the staff officers are at the head of the division.

Mr. DANIEL. They will all be removed to Halifax then?

Sir FREDERICK BORDEN. Yes. The other strong point which Sir John French made was that the training, or the education, both at the schools and in the camps, was not up to date, and he made some suggestions with regard to these matters, which will be carried into effect and which, I think, are very desirable. As a result of his criticisms, I am glad to say, that Major General Mackenzie is giving special attention to this matter. He proposes to take pains to see that officers from the permanent force shall be sent to the different parts of the country where they may be required in order to give the officers of the active militia an opportunity of learning their duties, so that they will be able to take their positions in the different units, regiments, &c., throughout the country, with advantage to themselves and to the militia generally.

Mr. FOSTER. What form will that instruction take?

Sir FREDERICK BORDEN. It is being carried out now, and we hope that during the present financial year it will be in full operation.

Mr. FOSTER. The officers of the permanent force are held at the disposal of the department to do this work?

Sir FREDERICK BORDEN. Yes.

Mr. FOSTER. In what way do they do it? Do they hold schools or do they drill individually, or do they teach?

Sir FREDERICK BORDEN. There are two or three ways. One plan is that the officers of different regiments throughout the country belonging to the active militia shall go to the schools to live in barracks, and pass through the necessary course of study. Another plan is to send men from the permanent force to the officers because the best of our officers perhaps are those who are men actively engaged in civil life, and cannot afford to leave for four or six weeks, or even three weeks It always has been to some extent done, but it is proposed to do it more than ever; that competent teachers shall be sent from the permanent force to teach the officers at their own homes and, of course, in camp.

Mr. SPROULE. Is that the improved method of training and education recommended by Sir John French?

Sir FREDERICK BORDEN. His reference there means up-to-date methods. For instance, Sir John French objected that the old-time method of marching past and presenting arms and all that sort of thing was a waste of time, and that instead of that the men in the different regiments should be taught the newer system of manoeuvres on a larger scale, conditions having entirely changed.

Mr. SHARPE (Ontario). Will there be no marching past in future?

Sir FREDERICK BORDEN. Not very much. The public are very much interested in the marching past, and they like to spend a day in camp and see it, and it will be continued for one day or so in the year, but to nothing like the extent it used to be.

At six o'clock, House took recess.

PRIVATE BILLS.

NEW ONTARIO AND QUEBEC RAILWAY.

House in committee on Bill (No. 170), to incorporate the New Ontario and Quebec Railway Company.—Mr. Gordon (Nipissing).

On section 1,

Mr. LANCASTER. This Bill raises the very-much discussed question of provincial rights, but it goes a good deal further, in the sense of having much less excuse for being brought into this parliament, than any other Bill that I have seen here, with the exception, perhaps, of one or two water-power Bills which have been much discussed. The purpose of the Bill is to incorporate a company professedly to build a railway from just outside the limits of the province of Ontario, in the province of Quebec at Lake Abitibi, across the northern part of Ontario for about 160 miles, traversing that part of northern Ontario which is being developed in the matter of railways by the government of Ontario at great expense to the people of the province, and by a policy which is just in its infancy, but in which a large amount of the assets of the province is involved. This professed main line, if it can be called such, does not traverse any part of the province of Quebec, and is practically of no use to that province. It is apparently put into the province of Quebec just as an excuse for this company coming to this parliament to get a charter. Then it proceeds 160 miles into that part of northern Ontario which is being developed at great expense to the people of Ontario by the Temiskaming and Northern Ontario railway, which is a people's railway, projected for and by the people for that purpose. The object of this company is manifest, I think, from the fact that it asks authority to build two little branch lines, one running northeast and southwest, and the other north and south, right in the territory traversed by the Timiskaming and Northern, each of these lines being only 25 miles in length. Evidently that is the whole purpose of this railway company. If a charter should be granted for these two little lines, it should be got from the Ontario legislature. Under subsection 10 of section 92 of the British North America Act provincial legislatures have full power in regard to the following matters:

Local works and undertakings, other than such as are of the following classes:

(a.) Lines of steam or other ships, railways, canals, telegraphs and other works and undertakings connecting the province with any other or others of the provinces, or extending beyond the limits of the province.

(b.) Lines of steamships between the province and any British or foreign country.

(c.) Such works as, although wholly situate within the province, are before or after their execution declared by the parliament of Canada to be for the general advantage of Canada or for the advantage of two or more of the provinces.

Unless some of these conditions exist, the province has full power to incorporate a company for building these railways. A representative of the Ontario government appeared before the Railway Committee when this Bill was under consideration there, and stated that the Ontario government objected to this road being built, believing that it was not bona fide in regard to the so-called main line of 160 miles, and they asked for some guarantee that that line was going to be built. No guarantee was forthcoming other than the statement that the company intended to build it. It struck me that there was a guarantee that could be given, and I have therefore, given notice of an amendment which I will move if the committee thinks the Bill should pass at all. In these matters it is surely up to us to find out what the bona fides of a railway company are. We are surely not going to give a company a charter to build a railway through one province just from the threshold of another, if they do not intend to build it, but if they are simply using it as an excuse for getting a charter to build a provincial road. If this company, under the pretense of building an interprovincial railway, while intending to build only two little bits of railway wholly in the province of Ontario, secure a charter from this parliament, and then never build the road which alone gives them a right to come here, they would in that way perpetrate what is virtually a fraud both on this parliament and on the provincial legislature. If the House is with me in that view, it will not pass this Bill. But if it does not go with me that far, then when we come to section 7 I will move my amendment, which is to the effect that the company shall not be allowed to build these little roads unless they first build the so-called main line. If they are not going to build that road, they should not have the charter from this parliament. If they are going bona fide to build it, they should not object to my amendment.

On section 7,

Mr. BARKER. I should like to hear the hon. gentleman who is in charge of this Bill make some answer to the remarks that have just been made by the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Lancaster). We have here a main line which may be of very considerable importance, and we have two short lines which can be of no use, I think, to this Dominion, so far as public service is concerned, unless the main line is built. I would like to know why there should not be a provision here that they might make the two short lines or branches after they have completed the main line. We ought to have some explanation of that.

Mr. GORDON (Nipissing). The member for Lincoln (Mr. Lancaster), was speaking when I came in, and I inferred from his remarks that his principal trouble was that he is afraid that the people who are at the back of this railway are not going to build it. Now, if they are going to build the main line and also these branches, I presume he would have no objection. He stated, I think, that the Ontario government required some kind of a guarantee that these people would go on and build this road. I would like to know what kind of a guarantee they should give other than asking for this charter. These people intend to build both the main line and the branches, and I think it is better to allow them to build either their branches or the main line, whichever they choose to build first, whichever will be most advantageous to themselves. I think if the member for Lincoln knew as well as I do how badly railroads are needed in that country, and what a great advantage they would be, instead of opposing a Bill like this, he would do everything he could to further it. I may say for his information, as well as for the information of the House, that the country up there is a great agricultural country, and unless it is developed by railroads it will remain as it always has been, of no use to any person. I think this is a very important road, and should be built. I have heard no good reason given why the branch lines should not be included, and certainly I have heard from the hon. member for Lincoln no good reasons for objecting to this Bill.

Mr. LANCASTER. I thought I had made it quite clear that I was contending for a different thing entirely from what the hon. gentleman has spoken of. I did not contend that this road should not be built, I only said that I wanted to be sure that this was not a trick played upon us by pretending to build a main line which they did not intend to build, and building the branches first and stopping there. I did not say the road was not needed, I do not want to retard railway development. But I want to make sure that this whole road is going to be built, and I want the big part of the road to be built first before the branches are built, because the branches, if built alone, are purely provincial matters and are to connect with a purely provincial railway. This Bill provides that the road is to be built from a point on the National Transcontinental railway in the province of Quebec, and then southerly around the east end of upper Lake Abitibi, which is in the province of Ontario, a total distance of 160 miles, and all in the province of Ontario except two or three miles.

If the promoters are sincere and intend building the whole of the railway, they will show their sincerity by accepting the amendment I am about to propose. I am heartily anxious to help them to build the whole of the road but do not want them never to touch the main line of 160 miles, which might be of some use to the Dominion as a Dominion road, and content themselves with building these two little branch lines of 25 miles each. The most vicious interference with provincial rights would be to incorporate a little railway 25 miles long, purely provincial, to connect with another provincial railway, a railway provincially owned, and in no sense under the control of this parliament. If the company want a charter for those two branch lines, they can get it from the Ontario legislature. Surely we are not doing a wise thing in incorporating against the protest of the province of Ontario, two little bits of provincial railway of 25 miles each to connect with a provincially owned and controlled railway. I beg therefore to move the following amendment to be inserted as section 2:

2. The powers of construction granted by paragraphs (b) and (c) of this section shall not be exercised until the line of railway authorized by paragraph (a) shall have been constructed to the respective junctions on that line to which the lines authorized by said paragraphs (b) and (c) are to extend.

Mr. NESBITT. The same argument which my hon. friend has used now was used in the Railway Committee, and the committee decided that as this was a peculiar section of country, and very probably the road would be built largely in the mining interests, we should give the company a charter. This is a peculiar section of the country, and it is very probable that these branch lines may require to be built first to accommodate people settling there. Therefore, the Railway Committee saw fit to give the charter to build the branch lines first.

Mr. BARKER. There are two arguments of which I am growing tired. One is that we have done a thing before, and therefore must do it again. The other is that a thing has been done in a committee, and therefore must be adopted in this House. In the committee we are told that a thing has been done before, and that is given as an excuse why we should do it again,—no question whether it is right or wrong, but only that it was done before—

Mr. NESBITT. If the hon. gentleman will allow me, I did not say that it should be done because it had been done before.

Mr. BARKER. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Nesbitt) said that it had been done in committee and therefore we should do it here.

Mr. NESBITT. That is what I said.

Mr. BARKER. The argument is precisely the same. Now, we have here a system of responsible government. It is useless for the ministers to profess that they are responsible only for government measures. Everybody knows that the ministry is responsible for the legislation of this House. Session after session we are deliberately violating the constitution of Canada, and the government know it. It is not done in so many words, but it is done. What would be said if I introduced a Bill in this House to construct a railway from Labrador to the western coast of British Columbia, with power at any or every point along that distance to construct twenty-five mile branches? Would not the allegation that such a thing was reasonable be something such as you would address to the occupants of a madhouse? But what worse would that be than what we have here? The gentleman asks a charter to run a line from one province to another, with two branches. And he objects—and it is important for members of the House to consider whether this shows good faith or bad faith—he objects to a clause being put in that he shall not make the branches until he has made the main line. What can more clearly show that this is an attempt to evade the constitution? Why the veriest simpleton in the country will understand that he wants the right to build the branches, and that is all he cares about. We have the Minister of Railways (Mr. Graham) here. I believe that he is trying to improve the railway law of this Dominion, and I think he has already done a great deal to improve that law. I ask him, what does he think of this deliberate, this evidently wilful and intentional attempt to break through the constitution? I have no interest in this matter, and do not know anybody connected with the company. But I appeal to the House to consider whether the man who promotes this Bill and professes to want to build a line from a point in Quebec to a point in Ontario with two branch lines, and says he must construct the branch lines first, is not deliberately trying to evade the provisions of the constitution. Are we in this House not to use common sense? Why do they try to evade the provisions of the constitution under which we live? I do not care a snap of my finger about the individual interest. The gentleman who is promoting this Bill is a friend of mine, and sits on our own side of the House. But I do not think that is a reason why I should act and vote contrary to the law of the land as I am asked to do. Why should not he put in a provision that if these parties want to build a branch line, they must make it a branch to an existing railway—that is they must build the trunk first, and then the branch?

Mr. GORDON (Nipissing). I think it is a disgrace to the intelligence of this House for any member to talk in that way about something that, as I believe, he does not know much about. Suppose the Transcontinental railway were completed from the junction to mileage 940, and not completed to mileage 1,000. And suppose one of these lines starts from one mileage, and the other from the other mileage, would there be common sense in the builders of the roads hauling stuff 60 miles by team to commence the building of another road? Is it not common sense to begin building a road from a point at which you have railway communication?

Mr. LANCASTER. If the hon. gentleman (Mr. Gordon, Nipissing) wants an answer, this is the answer: There is a good deal less sense in parliament deliberately granting a charter under pretense of it being a Dominion railway, for two 25 mile roads that are entirely in Ontario. The hon. gentleman has not yet learned that the province of Ontario has power to incorporate railway companies. He proceeds entirely on the argument that if you do not hold a Dominion charter you have to haul stuff by horses. He does not know that Ontario has power to build railways, to build any railway entirely within the limits of the province and neither does he know that if the railway is entirely within the limits of the province this parliament has no jurisdiction to incorporate it at all. The hon. gentleman had better ask leave to withdraw this Bill, communicate with the promoters, and suggest that they take the Bill before the provincial authorities. As my hon. friend from Hamilton (Mr. Barker) says, it makes no difference whether this road is five or 125 miles long, if it is entirely within the province. The hon. gentleman promoting this Bill argues that he must have the right to build these two little branch lines—he calls them branch lines although I believe they constitute the only road that will ever be built —that he must be allowed to build a road 25 miles long, but he does not realize that if they are in the province of Ontario not only is the province of Ontario the power to authorize their building, but this parliament has no power to authorize them to do anything. I repeat my hon. friend can do everything that he wants to do, without horses, without an automobile, without carts, under a provincial railway charter, and if my hon. friend knows that, probably he will see the necessity of accepting the suggestion, or else going to the province of Ontario, and getting his charter to build this line in all 50 miles long, which is entirey within the province of Ontario.

An hon. MEMBER. Carried.

Mr. LANCASTER. I think we should have some idea from the minister how he views this matter. This may have to be a precedent. The House will have to decide upon this on the third reading. We cannot allow it to go through in a casual way, the House will have to take the responsibility ultimately, and if four other hon. gentlemen will stand up with me on the third reading we will divide upon it. I think the minister ought to say what the policy of the government is with reference to railways of this kind.

Mr. GRAHAM. I am interested in this discussion, because this is the first I have heard of this Bill. I confess I do not know much about it, because I was not in the committee. I hardly understand that it is divided into a main and two branch lines; it is rather divided into three sections. As a matter of practical railway construction I could understand a situation where it would be wise and, from a practical construction point of view, absolutely necessary to build the branch first.

Mr. BARKER. Is there any pretense of that here?

Mr. GRAHAM. I do not know; I am trying to get information. The Timiskaming and Northern Ontario railway is not a branch of the Grand Trunk Pacific, but it will serve my illustration very well. It would have been very difficult on one section of the construction of the Grand Trunk Pacific to get supplies in if we had not had the Timiskaming and Northern Ontario railway to take them up. That branch, if we might call the Timiskaming and Northern Ontario a branch for the moment, was constructed before the Grand Trunk Pacific. If it had all been under one charter I imagine the construction company would have built that branch before attempting to construct the main line, in order to carry in its supplies. I could understand a situation where the cost of a railway could be materially reduced by building a branch line first in order to get the supplies in. I do not know whether that is the situation in this case or not. I am afraid that I am somewhat of a sinner—if sinner it can be called—in leaning to the view that it is better in the interests of the people and in the interests of transportation to have as many railways as possible under federal jurisdiction. I have had some experience during the last year. We have some railways under provincial jurisdiction—I am not speaking particularly of the province of Ontario now—to which the federal parliament has given aid. There is one case I have in my mind where a railway became so badly out of repair that it could not be operated and operations ceased. The rails were actually taken up, and there seemed to be no power on earth to stop the taking up and carting away of these rails by the owner of the road, although this parliament had given possibly $6,000 a mile towards the construction of the road. I am introducing legislation now with the object of effecting a remedy in such cases, but I found, in endeavouring to draw a clause, that we have no power within this parliament to deal with any road except those operating under a charter granted by the federal authority, or which has passed into the hands of a company that derives its power from the federal authority. That is one reason why I am very anxious to have all the railways possible brought under federal jurisdiction if it can be done without straining the constitution to the breaking point.

Mr. BARKER. Why to the breaking point?

Mr. LANCASTER. Where is the breaking point?

Mr. GRAHAM. I believe the constitution was devised for the good of the people.

Mr. LANCASTER. As the fellow says, 'which people,' the provincial people or the Dominion people?

Mr. GRAHAM. All the people. I think that the Board of Railway Commissioners for Canada is the best machinery to be found in the world for the control of railways. I do not think it has an equal anywhere, and I think I am serving the interest of the people if I can get as many railways as possible under that jurisdiction. Take this railway, for instance, I see the view point of my hon. friend, and I do not like to think that we are being deceived in granting a charter for some line that there is no intention of constructing, but that the charter is merely to be used for the construction of two small lines. It is not in my recollection that we have ever challenged the bona fides of a company when it places a plan before us which shows an interprovincial line, or when it gives good reasons why the line should come under federal jurisdiction. The hon. member for Hamilton (Mr. Barker), says that the application for the charter is fraudulent. I would not like to go that far. Perhaps I am too kind hearted, but I always give a fellow the benefit of the doubt, till I prove that he is wrong.

Mr. LANCASTER. It does not look it if he does not accept my amendment.

Mr. GRAHAM. That may be the judgment of some, but perhaps the promoter says that he proposes to build the whole of the line covered by his charter, but it may be more convenient perhaps for financial reasons, or in connection with construction to build one of the proposed branch lines first, in order to facilitate the construction of the main line. The Bill can not get through to-night, and I will have an opportunity to look into it. I do not know anything about it, I was not at the committee, and I always hesitated to go against the finding of a committee particularly when I was not there and when I am not in as good a position to express an opinion as those who were present.

Mr. LANCASTER. The attendance at the committee was small, the yeas and nays were not taken but the majority was very close for carrying the Bill and rejecting the amendment.

Mr. NESBITT. My memory is that there were only one or two against it.

Mr. LANCASTER. It is neither polite nor fair for the hon. member to say that. I moved the amendemnt and half a dozen spoke in favour of it, and they certainly would have voted as they spoke, but as no vote was taken we cannot prove to a demonstration what the vote was. My hon. friend is entirely wrong in saying there were only one or two against it.

Mr. BARKER. Surely the Minister of Railways is not to set up his individual opinion against the clear terms of the British North America Act. If a railway asks a charter from the Atlantic to the Pacific, and wanted 25 miles in every province over that distance, surely the hon. gentleman would not force on parliament his individual opinion that the federal authority should take everything it could under its jurisdiction.

Mr. GRAHAM. If my hon. friend's illustration were carried out he would get into a position where he would have no jurisdiction constitutionally or in any other way. As the Dominion we have jurisdiction in every province.

Mr. BARKER. The contention of the hon. minister in this respect is not in accordance with the clear terms of the constitution.

The order for private Bills having expired, the House resumed in Committee of Supply.

SUPPLY.

Sir FREDERICK BORDEN. I wish to make one or two more observations to conclude my general remarks with reference to the reorganization under Sir John French's scheme. This reorganization will not result in any considerable increase in the votes of money required; in fact, it will not result in any increase whatever. During the three years past and the present year the estimates show practically no increase whatever. It is proposed to carry out the general scheme of reorganization without materially increasing the vote. For the past six or seven years we have had an annual vote of about $1,300,000 for the purpose of purchasing equipment of various kinds, including artillery, saddlery, rifles, &c., and it is proposed under this scheme of Sir John French to go on at precisely the same rate. We will increase the artillery and cavalry—the only two branches of the service to be increased—precisely as we are able to purchase the necessary equipment with the annual vote of $1,300,000. That is the only other general observation I have to make with regard to the proposed reorganization.

Mr. BARKER. A great many people in Ontario have been anxious to know how far the report of Sir John French went. Was it with regard to a general reorganization or with regard to the personnel of the militia. Did he express any opinion as to the rank and file, as to the regimental officers, and as to the higher staff?

Sir FREDERICK BORDEN. Sir John French spoke very highly of the rank and file; he spoke very highly of the officers; he spoke particularly well of the artillery; he was not so well pleased with the cavalry or with the infantry. But, on the whole, I think it is fair to say that he considered, in view of the short time of the annual drill, that the Canadian militia made a very good showing, and that with some changes which he suggested—some of which we can carry out, and some of which we will not be able to carry out—an effective force may be hoped for within a reasonable time.

Mr. DANIEL. Will the 3rd New Brunswick Regiment of Artillery drill this year?

Sir FREDERICK BORDEN. Yes.

Mr. DANIEL. There must be some misunderstanding about that.

Sir FREDERICK BORDEN. It was to have been disbanded, but I understand it is to be reorganized before the annual camp this year.

Mr. DANIEL. What is to be reorganized?

Sir FREDERICK BORDEN. The battery to which my hon. friend refers.

Mr. DANIEL. They do not require any reorganization. I do not suppose there is a corps in the whole Dominion of Canada that is in better condition and has had better report for efficiency than the 3rd Regiment of Artillery. It has had a high record for years, and why this corps should have been dropped from the list of those to be drilled this year, I do not understand. Evidently the commanding officer has come to the conclusion, I presume with some good reason, that his corps was not to be drilled this year, and I shall read the order he issued.

3rd 'New Brunswick' Regiment, Canadian Artillery. Regimental orders by Lieut.-Col. John B. M. Baxter, commanding.

St. John, N.B., May 4, 1911.

1. In view of the fact that this regiment has not yet been ordered to perform annual training this year it is desirable that its organization should be preserved intact and that all ranks should endeavour, by the exercise of voluntary spirit, to maintain the corps in the state of efficiency which has been its pride for years.

2. The first battery of artillery in St. John was founded 118 years ago to-day. Since that time the artillery organization in this city and province has been continuous, and since 1860 there has not been a year when the regiment has not been on parade.

3. Under these circumstances the O.C. the regiment desires that all ranks shall join in performing voluntary drill during the coming season, paying particular attention to infantry drill and ceremonial, as the regiment will probably have several opportunities of appearing in public. It is to be distinctly understood that no one has authority to promise that any pay will be granted for the services so performed.

4. Roll books of attendance will be kept posted as usual. Recruits who are willing to serve on these terms will be accepted. O. C.'s batteries will make the usual arrangements for drill nights and other details.

5. The N.C.O.'s and men are particularly reminded that they are not in any way released from their obligation to serve in the militia by reason of the corps not being ordered to perform annual training. Any who may wish to join or serve in any other corps may apply for discharge in the usual way.

6. All ranks are specially reminded that it is not consistent with discipline in any way to criticise the action of their military superiors.

7. The officers of the regiment will attend a special service at St. Paul's church on the day of His Majesty's coronation. The hour, to be named afterwards, will be as nearly as possible that of the ceremony in Westminster Abbey. Full dress will be worn.

By order,
Major, Adj., 3rd Regt. C.A.

The name of the adjutant is not given here. It is quite evident from that order, issued by the commanding officer of this corps, that he must have had reason for believing that his corps was not going to perform annual drill this year. I do not know when the orders for annual drill are issued, but I presume that it has been customary to issue them previous to the present date. Of course, if the minister states that the corps is to drill, this adjutant must be labouring under a considerable misapprehension, and I would be glad to hear from the minister that the corps will be on the roster for drill as it always has been. While on my feet I would like to remind the minister that this corps is one of I think only three in the whole Dominion of Canada which, while it has been thoroughly efficient for years, a corps in which I take a great interest myself, having belonged to it for over twenty years, and one which I think stands as well on the records made by the inspectors who have inspected the various regiments as any corps in the Dominion, appears to be picked out in some way, so that it has not even one representative officer, non-commissioned officer or man—on the contingent which is to be taken to the coronation. I think there is good reason to ask the minister why this corps should not be granted the same privilege, if it is to be called such, that is given to every other corps, I believe, in the Dominion. If my memory serves me, the minister stated in his place in this House that there would be one representative of every corps in the Dominion in that coronation contingent. This corps, although it was asked to name one from each battery, named the men, but none has been chosen.

Sir FREDERICK BORDEN. The committee will of course understand that it is impossible for me to keep in touch with the doings of each one of the 150 or 200 corps throughout the Dominion. I know Colonel Baxter, who is one of the most enthusiastic and keenest officers in Canada, and is a personal friend of my own. I am rather surprised, if matters are in the melancholy condition in which my hon. friend from St. John paints them, that Colonel Baxter had not intimated the fact to me, because he has not hesitated in the past, when he thought things were not being done as they ought to be done, to ask my direct intervention, and I have had the very great pleasure on more than one occasion of giving it. I did not know until my hon. friend mentioned the fact that there was any difficulty of any kind with the 3rd Battery in so far as the coronation contingent is concerned. I shall be greatly surprised if it turns out that this regiment was not asked to send men. There were no non-commissioned officers invited to be sent; but men were to be chosen from every corps according to a certain rule laid down, and from those men, when they assemble at Quebec, non-commissioned officers will be selected. I will look into that matter at once. The selection of officers is an entirely different matter. We have about 40 officers to select from the active militia of Canada out of over 3.000 and from between 100 and 200 different corps, so that it is absolutely out of the question that we should select an officer from every corps or from perhaps one in ten.

Mr. DANIEL. The minister mistakes me if he thinks I made any such suggestion.

Sir FREDERICK BORDEN. I understood my hon. friend to say that this is one of the few corps which have been slighted in the selection of officers.

Mr. DANIEL. As far as having any representative either officer, non-commissioned officer or man.

Sir FREDERICK BORDEN. As to the men, I agree that the matter must be investigated, but as to officers not at all. The province of New Brunswick has the very great honour of supplying the commandant of the coronation contingent. When I made up an estimate of the number of officers which should be sent from each province, it was then decided that the number from New Brunswick would be two. Colonel Maclean was selected as commandant, and Captain MacKee of the New Brunswick artillery was selected.

Mr. DANIEL. What for?

Sir FREDERICK BORDEN. The Moncton battery.

Mr. DANIEL. How long has that been in existence?

Sir FREDERICK BORDEN. I do not know. He was selected because he had distinguished himself in South Africa, and wore the South African medal. He was selected by General Drury, who commands the maritime provinces.

Mr. DANIEL. What will the minister do with regard to having a representative from that corps on the contingent?

Sir FREDERICK BORDEN. Is my hon. friend sure that the colonel of that regiment was not asked to select men for the coronation contingent?

Sir FREDERICK BORDEN.

Mr. DANIEL. I have my information direct from the colonel himself.

Sir FREDERICK BORDEN. That he was not asked to do it?

Mr. DANIEL. That he was asked to name three men, one from each battery, and that he did so, but that not one of them was selected. He felt, and the whole corps feel, that they have been slighted. I believe I am correct in saying that the minister declared it was the intention that each corps should have a representative, in which case this corps is an exception, and some explanation is due.

Sir FREDERICK BORDEN. It is not an exception, and my hon. friend has admitted that the colonel was asked to make a selection. If he did not make any, that was his fault.

Mr. McLEAN (Sunbury). My hon. friend from St. John (Mr. Daniel) is under some misapprehension. I was told this evening by Colonel Baxter that he had been asked by the department to select men to go on the contingent, but that not seeing his regiment's name in the general order, he thought that had been cancelled. I asked him why he did not bring the matter to the attention of the department, and he said that he intended to do that today, but was not able to see the proper officer.

Mr. DANIEL. I am not labouring under any misapprehension at all, though my hon. friend may be. I am simply repeating the statement that the colonel made to me. If he has found out something else since, I did not know it. He told me that no man had been selected from his corps to go on the contingent.

Mr. McLEAN (Sunbury). Although he had sent in the names?

Mr. DANIEL. He named one from each of the three batteries, and those names were sent in. But not one of them was selected.

Mr. McLEAN (Sunbury). No notices have been sent out to the men who have been selected from the different corps, but I understand they will be sent out in a day or two.

Mr. DANIEL. If one of those men be selected, that will be satisfactory.

Sir FREDERICK BORDEN. I have no doubt but that the three men have been selected, and are going on the contingent.

Mr. BARKER. There are some others of us who may have some little discussion with the minister on this subject, and perhaps we might take up this item and resume the discussion on some other item.

Sir FREDERICK BORDEN. There will be a special item brought down on Monday to provide the necessary money to take the contingent to England, and that will be a very convenient time to discuss the coronation contingent generally.

Mr. DANIEL. What about the annual drill?

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. That will come up more appropriately on resolution 81.

Mr. PERLEY. The minister has made a general statement, and there is a good deal of matter which we want to discuss in a general way.

Sir FREDERICK BORDEN. I would suggest that we might pass a few items and allow any discussion concerning them on any other item. There is one item, that of the annual drill, which I want carried, as we cannot have our annual drill without it, and that drill will be coming on in a very few days.

Mr. PERLEY. We have no desire to make any obstruction to the providing of money for the annual drill of our militia. If the minister will undertake that any question regarding annual drill may be asked on any other item that will be satisfactory, and when we next go into committee we may discuss the general question and the minister's statement.

Sir FREDERICK BORDEN. I would like item 80 passed as well, because that involves payment to officers in the active militia and is connected with the annual drill.

Mr. DANIEL. Is there any increase in these allowances this year?

Sir FREDERICK BORDEN. I think not. There is a decrease of $15,000.

Mr. MADDIN. I would like to ask the hon. minister what considerations prompted him in making appointments to the coronation contingent from the 78th regiment in Pictou? And why Captain J. W. Macdonald, 78th regiment. I would like to know what prompted the minister to appoint this young man, who has not yet attained his majority, and was only appointed last fall to a commission.

Sir FREDERICK BORDEN. The young gentleman served in camp last year. he had passed all his military examinations, and is well reported upon by his senior officer. And, so far as I know, he is an admirable representative of the 78th regiment. He certainly has the right name to entitled him to represent a highland regiment.

Mr. MADDIN. I would inquire further if, when this matter comes up on Monday, we may discuss this aspect of the matter—a general discussion?

Sir FREDERICK BORDEN. General discussion, of course.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Shall item 80 carry?

Mr. DANIEL. On that consideration. It is with great regret that I came downstairs to-night. I think that, under all the circumstances we might not have met at all this evening, considering that half the House, or nearly half—and the better half I may say—are employed so very pleasantly elsewhere. But I think we will give the minister all his annual drill vote if he will close up shop.

Sir FREDERICK BORDEN. Quite satisfied.

Some resolutions reported.

On motion of Mr. Fisher. House adjourned at 9.33 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

MONDAY, May 8, 1911.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

FURTHER SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES.

Mr. FIELDING presented a message from His Excellency the Governor General transmitting supplementary estimates for the year ending 31st March, 1912, which on motion were referred to the Committee of Supply.

TRADE RELATIONS WITH GERMANY.

Mr. FOSTER. Before the orders of the day are called, I would like to call the attention of the right hon. Prime Minister to what appears to be a more definite statement regarding a matter I brought up the other day. In the morning paper I read the following:

The 'Standard's' Berlin correspondent wires: An understanding has been arrived at between Canada and Germany that negotiations for a reciprocal commercial treaty shall take place after Canada's commercial relations with United States have been regulated by the treaty now in sight. When the tariff war between Canada and Germany was terminated last year both governments agreed it was desirable to bring about a reciprocal commercial pact in the near future. At that time the Canadian and German governments concurred in the view that negotiations for a German-Canadian commercial treaty could not ensue until reciprocity had been established between Canada and United States.

Another portion of the dispatch says:

The truth is when the last tariff arrangement with the Dominion was effected in February, 1910, it was planned to renew the negotiations at no distant date for a definite treaty, but it was understood on both sides that such negotiations could only begin after Canada had regulated the tariff relations with the United States.

The assertion is also made that a definite understanding has been had between the two countries to that effect.

Mr. FIELDING. There is no understanding and there are no negotiations. I have no doubt the German government will be glad to open negotiations, but we have no such negotiations and no understanding as to when they will be taken up.

INQUIRY FOR RETURN.

Mr. RHODES. When may I expect a return with reference to the Parrsboro post office which was ordered on the 16th of January last?

Mr. PUGSLEY. I think that was brought down some little time ago. I shall make inquiry.

THE NEW ONTARIO AND QUEBEC RAILWAY COMPANY.

House in committee on Bill (No. 170) to incorporate the New Ontario and Quebec Railway Company.—Mr. Gordon, Nipissing.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The question is on amendment to section 7.

Mr. LANCASTER. That was an amendment which I submitted on Friday evening and which the Minister of Railways, who is not present, promised to consider. The question was how far we should interfere with provincial rights, and the minister said he would consider that point before the Bill came up again. I see that the promoter of the Bill (Mr. Gordon) is not here either. I am prepared to submit my amendment, but do not want to take advantage of anybody's absence.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. The Minister of Railways is confined to his room to-day, and the Bill, therefore, better stand.

Progress reported.

TORONTO HARBOUR.

House in committee on Bill (No. 175) to amend and consolidate the Acts relating to the Harbour of Toronto.—Mr. Macdonell.

Mr. MACDONELL. The Bill, with the exception of section 16, passed this committee. Section 16 was held over for the consideration of the Minister of Public Works. Some point arose in that connection which seemed to call for investigation; and possibly since the committee last sat, the Minister of Public Works has seen the Minister of Marine and Fisheries and may be able to make a statement.

Mr. PUGSLEY. When I made a few remarks on this Bill at the last meeting of the committee, I was not aware that all the powers of regulating and developing the harbour front could only be exercised by the Harbour Commissioners by by-law, which must be submitted to the approval of the Governor in Council. And considering that amendment, I have no further objection to offer to the section.

Bill reported, read the third time, and passed.

GRAIN GROWERS' GRAIN COMPANY.

House again in committee on Bill (No. 171) to incorporate a Grain Growers' Grain Company, Limited.—Mr. Rutan.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The Bill has been considered in committee and sections 1 to 12 inclusive have been carried.

On section 13,

Mr. FOSTER. When this Bill was before the committee on a previous occasion the sections up to the point you have named, Mr. Chairman went through without anybody, seemingly, paying atention to the matter. Some questions that were asked found no answer. This is an important Bill, and somebody ought to take responsibility with reference to it. The powers asked for are very wide, and I am not sure whether the government has looked into the matter.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. We have looked into it. The Minister of Public Works (Mr. Pugsley) has gone into the matter, and I think he satisfied himself that the powers given under this Bill, though certainly very wide, are not wider than the company could have obtained by simply applying to the Under Secretary of State for letters patent of incorporation. The Senate has looked carefully into it, and, though the powers are wide, yet, for the reason I having given or for some other reason, the Senate have not thought it right to refuse the powers. And, so far as I can see no interest can be prejudiced by the measure. Certainly no representations on the subject having been made to me. The House, no doubt, will hear from the promoter.

Mr. RUTAN. The Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) has stated about all that is to be said on the matter, except perhaps on one point. The other evening, when the Bill was before the committee, some objection was raised to the powers respecting banking. But the Bill as it is now in your hands, Mr. Chairman, includes a new section which reads as follows:

18. Nothing in this Act shall be deemed to authorize the company to issue any note payable to the bearer thereof or any promissory note intended to be circulated as money or as the note of a bank, or enter into the business of banking or insurance or railway construction or operation under the provisions of the Railway Act.

Mr. FOSTER. The statements that the powers are not wider than those which may be got under the Companies' Act without recourse to parliament is not altogether a recommendation of this Bill. I do not know how much supervision the Finance Department exercises or what responsibility it takes with reference to the issuing of these charters, but certainly most extraordinary powers have been given to companies as I have noticed them going through the 'Canada Gazette.' I think it is an axiom that will be pretty well assented to that the title of a Bill ought to be an indication of the powers granted under it, so that one who reads the title may thereby understand generally what the Bill is intended to do. Now the title of this Bill is 'An Act to Incorporate the Grain Growers' Grain Company.' But when you look at the Bill you find that it goes away beyond grain, and by what connection or process of logic I do not know. Here is section 13:

The objects or purposes of the company shall be to produce, manufacture, import, export, buy, sell, deal in and deal with all cereals——

Now, that is grain, and comes fairly within the limts of the title. It goes on:

—fruit, vegetable, animal, or other products of the farm——

That does not go very far away, for it all comes from the farm and there is a logical connection.

—all products or by-products thereof——

That is logical also.

—and all machinery, implements, goods, wares and merchandise which may be used in the production and manufacture of products of the farm,——

That also has a connection with the purposes of the Bill.

—and all articles, substances and things which may be utilized in the said production or in the maintenance, cultivation, improvement and development of farms.

That seems to me to go almost as wide as the horizon. It would enable them to become a plough manufacturing company or a harvester company, or a company for the production of anything that may be used on the farm. It will make them almost universally a manufacturing company. A man is not (in the Northwest) likely to go out to work without a shirt on his back, and it might be logically taken from these powers that if a shirt was necessary to a man working the company would have a perfect right to go into the manufacturing of shirts, to clothe farmers when they work, and the same with shoes caps and other articles of wear. It goes on:

And, without restricting the generality of the foregoing expressions——

That is a pretty rich phrase. After taking in the universe, you say you do not want to be restricted because there may be other universes that you may wish to conquer. There may be abstruse problems relating to the farms of the future, such as the manufacture of sunlight, or the using of the vital forces——

Sir FREDERICK BORDEN. Sunbeams from cucumbers.

Mr. FOSTER. Oh, if they wanted to manufacture sunbeams they would annex the Premier (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), and their factory would be complete.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I wish you would appreciate that.

Mr. FOSTER. I do.

And, without restricting the generality of the foregoing expressions, to carry on the business of a farmer in all its branches.

Now, section 14 goes on. And, really, has the Prime Minister looked into this at all?

For the objects and purposes set forth in section 13 of this Act, the company may:

(a.) Manufacture, buy, sell, deal in and deal with timber——

It may become a timber company.

—lumber,——

It may become a lumber company.

—hardware,——

It may become a general hardware company.

—bricks, stone, tiles, wood products of all kinds, building materials of every description, and all kinds of merchandise and supplies.

It may become a haberdashery, anything, almost, in the wide world in the way of merchandise and supplies. It goes on:

(b.) Manufacture, develop, transmit, distribute and use pneumatic, hydraulic, electric or other power or force for any purpose for which the same may be used——

Now there would be a logical connection if it were allowed to engage in the manufacture of these things as an agent or instrument of the farm; but it is only restricted by the phrase 'for the objects and purposes set forth in section 13.' In fact, it does not only not restrict, but it carries away from it any possible restriction.

—for any purpose for which the same may be used——

They may become an electric lighting company to supply electric light for a town; they may become a hydraulic company, a pneumatic company, and may lay tubes for the transmission of merchandise all through the country, not for the sake of spouting grain or other products of the farm, but 'for any purpose whatsoever.'

—and manufacture, buy, sell and deal in all machinery, implements and material necessary for the manufacture, development, transmission and distribution of pneumatic, hydraulic, electric or other force: Provided, however, that any distribution or transmission of power or force beyond the lands of the company shall be subject to local and municipal regulations in that behalf.

(c.) Purchase, acquire, develop, operate, hold, dispose of or otherwise turn to account timber lands, timber licenses, coal lands, quarries, water-powers and other lands for the purposes of the company;

(d.) Subscribe for, purchase or otherwise acquire and hold, sell or otherwise dispose of the shares, bonds, debentures or other securities of any bank, or of any printing or publishing company, but in the case of a bank, to no greater extent than one-fourth of the capital stock of such bank.

That is a strange power to give to a grain company.

(e.) Purchase or otherwise acquire, build, operate and charter ships, barges, vessels or other means of transporting passengers and cargo by water.

That clause is not limited to the purposes of this company, it is widened until there is no restriction upon it at all. They may become a shipbuilding or ship running company for the transportation of passengers and freight other than those necessary for their own operation.

(f.) Enter into any arrangement with any authorities, municipal, local or otherwise, that may seem conducive to the company's objects, or any of them——

May seem conducive to themselves.

—and obtain from any such authority any rights, privileges and concessions which the company may think it desirable to obtain and carry out, exercise and comply with any such arrangements, rights, privileges and concessions.

(g.) Acquire or undertake the whole or any part of the business, property and liabilities of any person or company carrying on any business which the company is authorized to carry on, or possessed of property suitable for the purposes of the company.

The company is authorized practically to carry on every business; they are not only authorized to carry on any business, but to enter into financial arrangements for the sake of the company, into buying, selling and the like of that.

(h.) Apply for, purchase or otherwise acquire, any patents, licenses, concessions and the like, conferring any exclusive or non-exclusive, or limited rights to use, or any secret or other information as to any invention which may seem capable of being used for any of the purposes of the company——

That is for any purpose whatsoever.

—or the acquisition of which may seem calculated directly or indirectly to benefit the company, and use, exercise, develop or grant licenses in respect of, or otherwise turn to account, the property, rights or information so acquired.

It seems to me that is wide enough to send them up to the Yukon and get gold concessions.

(i.) Construct, improve, maintain, work, manage, carry out or control any roads, ways, tramways, branches or sidings on lands owned or controlled by the company,——

Not only gives them the right to own any kind of lands, any kind of concessions, but it gives them every particular privilege.

—bridges, reservoirs, water courses, wharfs, manufactures, warehouses, elevators, electric works, shops, stores, office buildings and other works and conveniences, and contribute to, subsidize or otherwise assist or take part in, the construction, improvement, maintenance, working, management, carrying out or control thereof.

Pretty wide power that is.

Mr. CLARKE (Essex). That is the standard called for in the Ontario Act.

Mr. FOSTER. What does my hon. friend think about the wideness of the powers? Can he imagine anything that they cannot do?

(j.) Lend money to customers and others having dealings with the company——

That is, they may lend not simply to their own people, they are authorized to lend money generally, no restrictions to whom they may lend.

Mr. RUTAN. That clause has been amended in the committee.

Mr. FOSTER (reading):

—and guarantee the performance of contracts by any such persons; notwithstanding the provisions of section 167 of the Company's Act.

(k) Draw, make, accept, endorse, discount, execute and issue promissory notes, bills of exchange, bills of lading, warrants and other negotiable or transferable instruments.

There is no limit to it.

(l.) Sell or dispose of the undertaking of the company, or any part thereof, for such consideration as the company may think fit, and in particular, for shares, debentures or securities of any other company having objects altogether or in part similar to those of the company.

How large a part? A very infinitesmal part, I suppose.

(m.) To do all or any of the above things as principals, agents, contractors, trustees or otherwise, and either alone or in conjunction with others.

(n.) To do all such other things as are incidental or conducive to the attainment of the objects or purposes of the company.

It struck me as I read that over that, although such things may have passed this parliament, it is an exceedingly wide franchise to give to a grain growers' company or any other company. I suppose some good-hearted individuals will be ready to say that I oppose this Bill because it belongs to the grain growers, that they are introducing it. I give every privilege to any person to make that assertion who wishes. I am used to that kind of thing, and it doesn't bother me a bit. I do not go as far as the Minister of Finance went the other day, when he intimated that almost he would let a poor thing go through rather than have somebody say that he didn't like to do a thing for a certain class of people. I think that legislation like this is extremely dangerous. Time was in this House when no legislation like that could possibly go through, and that not very long ago. But the government must take the responsibility. Mine is but a voice in the wilderness, but it will be raised for a moment to direct the attention of the treasury board, if they take any interest in these things, to the almighty powers that are being given to this company.

Mr. MEIGHEN. I quite agree with the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster) in his remarks as to the wideness of the powers granted by this charter. When the Bill was last before the committee I drew attention to the same feature, and was then assured by the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Pugsley) that the same powers would have been granted automatically if the company had applied under the Companies' Act. To that assurance there is now added a further assurance to the same effect by the Prime Minister. Consequently, while I cannot but sanction many of the remarks by the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster) as to the danger of such almost indiscriminately wide powers passing this House, still I must again take the point that, under the assurance to which I have referred, this is not the stage at which to take the objection. If this company, merely by application under the Companies' Act, could secure all the powers granted in this Bill, surely I would not be justified in saying to them: If you come openly before parliament individually and make application we will shut you out of powers that you might have got automatically under the Act that we have ourselves passed. Surely such a position on the part of parliament would be inconsistent and unreasonable. If there are dangers in the general granting of such utterly limitless powers as this Bill provides, then the place to remedy that condition, and to curtail the powers is in the Companies' Act itself.

Mr. LANCASTER. Does the hon. gentleman think that if they have all these powers they should have them under the name of the Grain Growers' Grain Company?

Mr. MEIGHEN. I was coming to that point. I have said nothing that can be urged as an argument in favour of the title of the Bill, in fact to my mind the gravest point of danger in all this legislation is in chartering a company with indiscriminately wide powers under a distinctive name. In that way the public is liable to be deceived. It may tax the ingenuity of the promoter of the Bill, it may even tax the still greater ingenuity of the fathers of the Bill, to provide a name that can be called distinctive and at the same time can be called a safe one for the proposed company to assume, but an attempt should be made to make such name better conform to the general character of the charter. It seems to me that the word 'grain' when it occurs the second time in the title of the company, might very well be omitted in favour of something more general; the grain feature of the purposes of the company is surely well enough to emphasize in the expression 'Grain Growers.' So if the difficulty as to name could be met it seems to me that parliament would not be justified in raising further objection to the Bill, on the general ground at least.

The applicants for this charter are just as much entitled to secure it as any other applicants; consequently if parliament—and I believe the assurances we have are correct, that a reference to the 'Canada Gazette' will show that as wide powers are granted under the Companies' Act—if parliament by its Act confers on individuals the right to go to our Department of State and secure just as wide powers as these, then, we have no justification for stepping in and in an individual case refusing the powers asked. The only objection that I take is as to the title. Under that title I fear shares will be purchased with an assurance as to the purposes of the company that really is a false one. The point is doubly important when we remember that heretofore in Manitoba a company under the very same name has been operating, and that company is much more restricted in its powers than this company will be.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Is my hon. friend sure of that? The promoter of the Bill tells me that the powers are wider than these.

Mr. MEIGHEN. How can you make them wider?

Mr. PUGSLEY. They could be made wider. In this Bill the powers given by section 14, must be exercised solely for the purpose of carrying out the objects and purposes set forth in section 13. There is a limitation. I have only the word of my hon. friend who is in charge of the Bill as to the powers granted by the Manitoba charter being wider, and he tells me they are wider. I have not seen the Manitoba charter.

Mr. MEIGHEN. The Minister of Public Works says that one clause of the charter provides that the powers therein granted shall only be utilized in so far as they serve the general purpose of the company, and argues that that is a restriction. If the general purposes of the company are utterly unlimited, how is that a restriction?

Mr. PUGSLEY. They are not unlimited under section 13.

Mr. MEIGHEN. My reason for saying that the Manitoba powers are not as wide is that I have myself, as solicitor, applied to the Provincial Secretary's Department at Winnipeg, where the charter of the original company would be granted, and I know that if the application made anything like so large a demand on the generosity of that department, the powers asked would be very seriously curtailed before the charter was issued. I have not examined this particular charter, but I would be surprised if the powers under which they have been operating are as wide as those contained in this Bill. The company in Manitoba has done business for many years, and the scope of its business has been limited to such pursuits as should be contemplated under the old title. It is evidently the intention of the company to widen the scope of its operations, as I gather from other sources than the Bill. If that is the intention, the title of the Bill should be altered. I do not think that is raising an insuperable objection, and I have no intention of raising such an objection. My objection is one that could, within reason be overcome, and if it is overcome any opposition, if it may be called opposition, that I have raised to the Bill would be at once withdrawn.

Mr. MARTIN (Regina). I cannot see the force of the objection raised by the hon. member for Portage la Prairie, to this company being incorporated under the name of the Grain Growers Grain Company, Limited, for the obvious reason he mentioned, that the company has been doing business in Manitoba, under a joint stock company charter, and I believe in Alberta, under a foreign company's license, for almost five years. I am not positive that they have been doing any business in Saskatchewan, but they have acquired certain assets in Alberta, and certain large assets in Manitoba. To my mind it would be manifestly unfair for parliament to change the name of the company after it has been doing business with that name for five years.

Mr. FOSTER. A name exactly similar?

Mr. MARTIN (Regina). Yes. The statement made by the Minister of Public Works with respect to the powers granted to this company by the government of Manitoba being as wide as the powers contained in this Bill is, to my mind, perfectly correct.

Mr. FOSTER. In what year was that charter granted?

Mr. MARTIN (Regina). I have here what purports to be a copy of the letters patent granted by the Provincial Secretary of Manitoba, and dated July 20, 1906, almost five years ago. It is a copy of the charter of the Grain Growers' Grain Company, Limited, which is the same name as we are asked to grant, under the proposed Act of incorporation. I beg to call attention to some of the powers granted in the charter of the Grain Growers' Grain Company, Limited—the same name exactly—and it will be seen that these powers are exactly the same as asked for in this Bill. They have power to buy, handle, and deal in all kinds of grain and seed, both as owners and agents; power to manufacture, buy, handle, and deal in agricultural implements and machinery, coal, coal oil, gasoline, and a large list of other commodities; power to acquire by purchase, lease or otherwise, with the consent of the owners, mines, mining lands, minerals, of all kinds; power to acquire by purchase, lease, or otherwise, with the consent of the owners, water-powers, water-power rights and privileges; and to develop for the purposes of the company or lease, or sell, electrical, steam, pneumatic gas, hot-air, and all descriptions of power. There is a clause here permitting them to manufacture bicycles and automobiles which one would not expect the farmers of Canada to deal in. The original letters patent contain everything contained in the purposed Bill, and why should parliament curtail the powers they have for five years enjoyed under a provincial charter? Although the powers asked for are wide, they are properly limited by section 18 prohibiting them from building railroads, which the hon. member for Prince Albert asks to add to the Bill. There is no reason why the Bill should not go through with that amendment.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. If this were purely an abstract question I would be disposed to agree very generally with my hon. friend from North Toronto. The wide powers asked for by this company have shocked his Conservative principles, and I tell him frankly that they shock my Liberal principles, or rather the principles I learned in the school I was brought up in. But my hon. friend (Mr. Foster) must observe that the ideas in which he and I have been brought up have been very much enlarged of late years. When first the creation of corporations became somewhat general, parliament was very chary in the granting of charters, and the powers given were severely scrutinized, and restricted practically to the special object for which incorporation was sought. But the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) knows that in his experience, as in mine, there has been an everincreasing tendency to widen these powers until now we give to companies, as he has said, a sort of omnibus charter to do any kind of business at all. When you look into the rationale of the thing, I do not think there can be any danger in granting these wide powers except the possible danger of deceiving the public.

Mr. FOSTER. That is a very great danger.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. It is. But the public is educated to the change, and it is realized now that if you authorize a grain company the title would not at all deceive those who deal with that company into the belief that its powers would be restricted to operations in grain. There would be no deception of the public because it is now generally known that there are wider powers granted than the title would indicate. This company has been granted already powers by the legislature of Manitoba, and we are now asked to confirm these powers, but with certain restrictions added. I understand that in the western states you can file your application to build a railway at the Capitol and some officer corresponding to our Secretary of State looks into the matter, and the charter is granted as a matter of course.

Mr. FOSTER. Without any guarantees?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. So I am told. I understand that some such powers were sought by this Bill, but that is further than I would go, and that, I think, parliament should go. The granting of such wide powers may be contrary to the views of my hon. friend (Mr. Foster), and, perhaps, contrary to my own views, but the western farmers and the western people generally, are disposed to seek corporate powers which we would never think of asking for in the east. It may be that we will have to advance to the same views as they have. Though this granting of wide powers in charters has been going on for some time, it has not come to my notice that it has produced any ill results.

Mr. FOSTER. I admit there is something in what my right hon. friend has said, although I do not admire his dialectics in this respect. He says that I am a Conservative and that he used to be.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Oh, no, I never said that.

Mr. FOSTER. Well, there is more than a modicum of truth in that, if history informs us correctly, but I think that even he is not quite liberal enough to swallow so extensive a programme with so modest a name. My chief objection is the possible danger of deception because of the wide divergence between the name of the company and what it may do. There are two forces in the world: one Liberal, and the other Conservative, and if you go through the world's history it is difficult to award the palm to either as being the most beneficial to the race.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. It is not difficult for me.

Mr. FOSTER. It would be if my right hon. friend studied it a bit. The maddish projects of Liberalism have been nipped in the bud by the quantum of Conservatism which has always existed in the world, and which I hope always will. On the other hand, Conservatism advances from year to year, because changed conditions necessitate a widening process in the application of old principles of Conservatism. I hope the day will never come when there will not be these two forces in the world, the one tending to restrict mad, headlong haste, and the other tending to stretch out and broaden that which would otherwise be cribbed, cabined and confined.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. And in the interests of the people, progress and advancement must come.

Mr. FOSTER. These two forces have their cycles; one comes down and the other goes up, and they keep their balance pretty well, and so my right hon. friend had better prepare for the balance which will swing the other way pretty soon. I sound the note of warning that this Bill represents Liberalism gone too far. They cannot carry on all these projects without getting money, and they appeal for money under the distinctive guise of a grain company and under that distinctive badge ninety-nine men out of a hundred will subscribe to it because of its purpose in that respect. There is great danger that under a certain guise a company could carry on almost every kind of operation under the sun. To show my right hon. friend just what took place, I may say that in my time, and it was not so very long ago, a company was restricted to the simple purpose indicated by its name, and even subsidiary operations were not allowed, because they were not considered a legitimate part of that purpose. That idea has completely passed away. Such has been the extension of work in the world that the next step was to allow not only the prime object of the company, but what might be subsidiary thereto, and what might be necessary for its operation. That was a legitimate and fair extension, and I am willing to go as far as that principle can extend. But I think it is dangerous to put a big company, which acts as a grain company, into the business of mining, stock-buying and all that sort of thing. I think that goes beyond where we ought to go, and I take exception, mildly but still firmly, to the idea that because some other legislature has granted extraordinary rights and powers, therefore we should do it. I am sorry the Finance Minister is not here, because I would like to inquire of him whether there is any supervision at all over these companies who are getting charters without coming to parliament, or any revision of the powers asked for by them. I am loth to take the statement of the Prime Minister, and of the Minister of Public Works that company charters have been granted equally wide with this. Some very wide ones, I know, have been granted, but I think it would trouble them to find one as wide as this is. I would like to know whether the government applies any supervising machinery at all to keep within bounds the companies that ask for charters without coming to this House. Does the Companies' Act require that a return should be made to the government of the operation of these companies?

Mr. PUGSLEY. Only as to loan companies, I think.

Mr. FOSTER. I think it is well worth consideration whether every one of these companies should not be required to make a return to the government.

Mr. CLARKE (Essex). There is a Bill before the House this session making provision for that. I do not think that under the Bill the companies are bound to supply the returns, but they may be called for.

Mr. FOSTER. I am stating my general objection to the granting of these wide powers in this Bill. If it is allowed to pass, the government will have to take the responsibility, and it will not be in the power of the First Minister, or of the Minister of Finance, to say that I am equally responsible, because I did not object to the Bill when it went through parliament.

Mr. PUGSLEY. My hon. friend has called attention to a difficulty that might arise by reason of the name. I may say that that is the only objection I saw to the Bill; but, on considering the matter, I do not see that we could choose a name for the company if my hon. friend in charge of the Bill was not willing to have the name changed. I do not see why we should refuse these powers, which are substantially the same as were contained in the charter granted by the Manitoba legislature, and they are no wider than the powers that might properly be given by letters patent issued by the Secretary of State.

Mr. FOSTER. Does my hon. friend know that, or is that a general statement?

Mr. PUGSLEY. I know that, because when I was Attorney General in the government of New Brunswick, I took objection for some time to the granting of wide powers, and my attention was called to the powers granted for years by the Dominion government, and also by other provinces. The government of Ontario is the chief sinner in this respect, if there is any sin about it.

Mr. FOSTER. It used to be, I know.

Mr. PUGSLEY. The province of Ontario first gave these broad powers. My hon. friend made a very pleasant speech in regard to the Prime Minister and his own Conservatism. I presume that if my hon. friend saw that the present government of Ontario had recognized and granted a license to a company incorporated by the parliament of Great Britain conferring upon it practically the same powers as are contained in this Bill, he would say that was Conservatism enough.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not take my Conservatism from anybody.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Let me call attention to a license which has been granted by the government of Ontario, as late as the 15th of April of the present year, to the Alberta Land Company, to do business in the province of Ontario. It is incorporated, says the notice published in the 'Ontario Gazette,' by the parliament of the United Kingdom of Great Britain, and it is given the power first, to acquire lands; secondly, to improve the lands; thirdly, to stock the same; to go into the buying of all kinds of stock, cattle, sheep and produce; to buy, manufacture, sell and deal in all kinds of goods, chattels, merchandise and effects; to carry on the business of farmers, graziers, meat and fruit preservers, planters, miners, metallurgists, quarry-owners, brick makers, builders, contractors for the construction of works, both public and private, merchants, importers and exporters, printers, publishers, ship-builders ship-owners brokers and any other businesses which may seem calculated, directly or indirectly, to develop the company's property or business; to search or prospect, excavate, quarry, dredge for ores, and to extract, reduce and treat the same by any process whatsoever; to pay for any property or business in shares or debentures; to sell, lease, license, mortgage, turn to account or otherwise dispose of any of the property, concessions, rights or privileges of the company; to exercise within the province of Ontario all such powers under the laws of Ontario. There you find a company incorporated under the name of a land company, and yet given the power to engage in mining, quarrying, buying and selling merchandise of all kinds, owning ships and doing a large business, which could in no way be associated by the investor with the business of carrying on a land company.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman will not say that it is at all as wide as this Bill.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Substantially so, because if you take this Bill you will find that after all section 13 is the one which sets out the objects of the company. These are limited to manufacturing and dealing in cereals, fruit, vegetable, animal or other products of the farm, all products or by-products thereof, and all machinery, implements, goods, wares and merchandise which may be used in the production and manufacture of products of the farm, and all articles, substances and things which may be utilized in the said production or in the maintenance, cultivation, improvement and development of farms. All these are pretty closely connected with the foregoing business of farming. Then, 'without restricting the generality of the expressions, to carry on the business of farming in all its branches.' When we come to section 14, you will see a limitation. It may not be very perfect, but still it is a limitation. 'For the objects and purposes set forth in section 13 of the Act, the company may do certain things.' It seems to me that in the bona fide carrying out of the powers contained in section 14, the directors must always have in mind the purposes and objects set forth in section 13. They may build electric railways through their properties, develop electricity to supply their farms with motive power, buy steamers for the purpose of carrying grain produced by their operations, to the different markets of the world, and do all these things connected with the carrying out of the object mentioned in section 13.

Mr. BLAIN. Is the hon. gentleman taking his politics from the province of Ontario now?

Mr. PUGSLEY. I did not know there were any politics in this. I am surprised at the suggestion of my hon. friend.

Mr. HAGGART (Winnipeg). It seems to me that one of the objections is that this is a very small name for a large company. I give this suggestion to the promoter. Call it the almighty powers of the grain growers.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Hear, hear. There is something in that.

Mr. FOSTER. I would suggest that there ought to be one extension of the powers to be given this company. It ought to have the power to manufacture M. P.s of the Liberal persuasion.

Mr. STAPLES. What is the reason this company has made application to this House for a charter? Why did it not apply for letters patent?

Mr. RUTAN. The only reason is that they were taking over a growing concern, the Grain Growers' Company, and assuming all its liabilities, and took this method of getting a charter.

Mr. BARKER. The only reason why the company did not ask for a charter from the Secretary of State is because, when a charter is granted by the Secretary of State, the company is bound to make returns to the provincial government. The right hon. gentleman is probably aware that there is a Bill before a special committee for weeks, and a great deal of care has been taken to secure such returns as will give to the shareholders in these companies the fullest information; but by getting the charter asked for here they will not be under the obligation of disclosing their proceedings.

On section 14,

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The section (b) has been amended to read as follows:

(b) manufacture, develop, transmit, distribute and use pneumatic, hydraulic, electric or other power or force for any purpose for which the same may be used, and manufacture, buy, sell and deal in all machinery, implements and material necessary for the manufacture, development, transmission and distribution of pneumatic, hydraulic, electric or other power or force: Provided, however, that any distribution or transmission of power or force beyond the lands of the company shall be subject to section 247 of the Railway Act and so far as applicable to the Electricity Inspection Act of 1907, and the local and municipal regulations in that behalf.

Mr. NESBITT. In all of these companies we put in a clause that they cannot do anything of that kind without the consent of the municipality by by-law. But the words here 'shall be subject to local and municipal regulations' are not as strong as permission expressed by by-law.

Mr. MACDONELL. In the Railway Committee, Bills for the incorporation of railway companies are always safeguarded with provisions to the effect mentioned by the hon. member for Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt).

Mr. CLARKE (Essex). The clerk of the committee says that this is the standard clause taken from the other Bills.

Mr. MACDONELL. There is power here not only to manufacture, but also to distribute electrical energy. That distribution would involve the right to distribute in the usual way by wires and poles. Yet there is no provision as to the assent of the municipality for entering or crossing highways or public places. These safeguards have been put in Bills in the Railway Committee. And, unless section 247 of the Railway Act covers the regulation of rates to be charged for power, there is no provision to limit through the Board of Railway Commissioners the rates to be charged by the company, for electrical energy. And the same in regard to telegraph and telephones —there is no regulation either of rates nor is there any safeguard of the rights of municipalities.

Mr. NESBITT. These precautions are provided in other charters. There was one the other day that the Finance Minister sent back to get this clause put in. And this one should be treated the same as the others.

Mr. CLARKE (Essex). So it is. The committee has that in.

Mr. NESBITT. I do not so understand it. Section 247 of the Railway Act does not cover it—certainly does not cover the question of charges.

Mr. CLARKE (Essex). It was the clerk of the committee who had this prepared, and he said it was a standard clause put in the other Bills.

Mr. FOSTER. I think the objection is well taken by my hon. friend from South Toronto (Mr. Macdonell). There does not seem to be any control over this company as to entering the bounds of municipalities, nor is there any safeguard as to the rates to be charged. There is no reason why the safeguards put in other Bills should not be put in this.

Mr. MARTIN (Regina). Does not the hon. member for South Toronto (Mr. Macdonell) think that the clause subject to local and municipal regulations in that behalf would prevent the company from distributing power within any municipality unless it got the authority of a by-law?

Mr. FOSTER. I have been in the Railway Committee and have seen the committee jump like a panther on a clause in a Bill which did not provide in the most explicit way for the guarding of municipal rights. That safeguarding of municipal rights, so far as my experience goes, has been expressed in this way. Then, again, it does not say anything as to rates. Here is a company which is going to carry on telephones and telegraphs and the transmission of intelligence, and there is absolutely no control over its rates. We must be consistent. No matter for whom the Bill is we must have these safeguards put in.

Mr. LANCASTER. If the purpose of the amendment is to bring in the whole of section 247 of the Railway Act, then, both hon. gentlemen are partly right. I have the section before me, and it proposes that the consent of the municipality must first be obtained. But, unfortunately for the powers of municipalities this section provides that, if the consent is not given, the Board of Railway Commissioners may override a municipality and grant the power desired. Personally, I do not think that a municipality ought to be shorn of its power over its highways. I think they are the best judges in this matter. The section is a very long one, with many subsections, but I will read the parts that apply:

When any company is empowered by special Act of the parliament of Canada to construct, operate and maintain, lines of telegraph, or telephone or for the conveyance of light, heat, power or electricity, the company may, with the consent of the municipal council or other authority having jurisdiction over any highway, square or other public place, enter thereon for the purpose of exercising the said powers, and, as often as the company thinks proper, may break up and open any highway, square or other public place, subject, however, in the following provisions:

It then proceeds to lay down a lot of rules with regard to wires, and poles, supervision by an officer of a municipal council, and so on, until we come to subsection (g):

Whenever any city, town or incorporated village is desirous of having lines of telegraph, or telephone, or lines for the conveyance of light, heat, power or electricity, placed under ground, the board may,——

That is the Board of Railway Commissioners:

—may, on the application of such city, town or incorporated village, and on such terms and conditions as the board may prescribe, require the company to thus place its lines or wires under ground, and abrogate the right given by this section, or by the special Act, to carry lines on poles, in such city, town or incorporated village.

That is a section for the benefit of municipalities. Where the company does not serve the municipality they can apply to the board. Then the converse is provided:

If the company cannot obtain such consent from such municipal council or other authority, the company may apply to the board for leave to exercise such powers, and upon such application shall submit to the board a plan of such highway, square, or other public place, showing the proposed location of such lines, wires and poles.

Then it goes on that the board may, notwithstanding the refusal to consent of the municipality, allow the matter to be so done:

Mr. FOSTER. How about the regulation of rates?

Mr. LANCASTER. That is under another section. Then, at the end of the section it is provided:

Nothing contained in this section shall be deemed to authorize the company to exercise the powers therein mentioned for the purpose of selling or distributing light, heat, power or electricity in cities, towns or villages, without the company having first obtained consent therefore by a by-law of the municipality.

There is another quasi-protection so far as cities, towns and villages are concerned, but not to all municipalities. There are many other municipalities whose roads are valuable to them, municipalities in an embryo state, but growing. I think that all municipalities ought to be protected, whether in their infancy or in an advanced state of growth. But, because of the want of satisfactory provisions, or to meet some complication, we do sometimes insert a general clause providing that these things are only to be done by consent of the municipality expressed by by-law. We also make a distinct provision that rates and charges are to be subject to the control of the Railway Commission. I think we ought to put that clearly in this Bill. I do not offer an amendment at this stage, but I would suggest that the amendment before the Chair be so worded that the consent of the municipalities be obtained, and that the rates be subject to the control of some authority.

Mr. PUGSLEY. How would it do to put in a clause like this:

Provided, however, that in no case shall the company place any poles in or upon any highway, or stretch any wires along such highway or over any public square or park without the consent of the municipal council in which the same is situated.

That would still send it to the board for regulation.

Mr. FOSTER. But it does not meet the question of rates.

Mr. PUGSLEY. But it makes it subject to the local municipal regulations. They would make a condition of having reasonable rates before they would give consent.

Mr. NESBITT. I agree with the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Lancaster) that the two standard clauses usually put in Bills should be put in this Bill.

Mr. MACDONELL. There are two regular clauses spoken of as the standard clauses. One is in regard to the consent of the municipality to the company stringing its wires, or erecting poles upon, or across any highway, or public place; then there is another clause with regard to rates. I think these clauses should be put in, and for that purpose I would suggest that this subsection (b) be allowed to stand.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Let us report progress, and have these two standard clauses drawn up.

Mr. FOSTER. I think that is wise. If anybody ought to be tender about the rights of municipalities and reasonable rates it is the grain growers. I do not see why there should be any objection to inserting these two standard clauses.

Mr. RUTAN. I see no objection to letting the section stand over for the purpose of inserting these clauses. But we can go on with the rest of the Bill,

On subsection (d),

Mr. FOSTER. What is the purpose of this clause:

Subscribe for, purchase or otherwise acquire, and hold, sell or otherwise dispose of, the shares, bonds, debentures, or other securities of any bank, or of any printing or publishing company.

What does the Grain Company propose in that?

Mr. RUTAN. This company owns a publication called the 'Grain Growers' Guide,' that is a part of their business.

Mr. FOSTER. But that is their own paper. Here they have authority to take over other papers, it gives them authority to buy up every newspaper in the northwest.

Mr. RUTAN. They have the same right as other people with regard to that.

Mr. FOSTER. It is funny that a Grain Company is becoming a great publishing company.

Mr. MACDONELL. It seems to me an improper thing to give an ostensible grain company power to embark in the banking business by allowing them to purchase shares, or stocks in a bank to the extent of one-fourth of their capital. They can use the bank for the purpose of exploiting funds, for the purpose of dealing in grain; and they have an additional power of being able to build up a press and publish papers which could be used for the purpose of advancing or depressing prices. This company are also dealers in, and buyers of grain. It seems to me a most unusual thing to give a company power to do all these things under one corporation. They can exploit the funds of a bank, and deal in grain, and by their press they can exploit public opinion for the purpose of raising or depressing markets.

On subsection (e),

Mr. MACDONELL. There should be the same clause with regard to the regulation of rates that I spoke of in regard to subsection (c).

Mr. PUGSLEY. You do not regulate rates on vessels. No other vessels have their rates regulated.

Mr. MACDONELL. I think where railway companies are given charters, as they are in the Railway Committee from day to day, and where these companies have also navigation powers, the Railway Board has the power to regulate the rates.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I think my hon. friend is in error as to that. Where a subsidy is granted the government may make some provision, not otherwise.

Mr. FOSTER. Does the Minister of Public Works say that the present Railway Commission has not a right to regulate rates for a railway which does business by land and by water?

Mr. PUGSLEY. I understand we have no power to regulate rates on the steamers. When subsidies are granted the government make certain provisions, but I do not think the Railway Commission has any power to regulate steamship rates.

Mr. FOSTER. That is a rather important point because the purpose of the Railway Commission to regulate the rates might be entirely set at nought, provided you had a railway company which also ran ships, if there was no power to regulate the water passage.

Mr. PUGSLEY. That would not apply to this company because they do not build railways.

Mr. FOSTER. They are getting powers here to carry passengers.

Mr. PUGSLEY. There is a clause that nothing herein contained shall give them power to build railways. They are expressly barred from building railways.

Mr. LANCASTER. Section 333 of the Railway Act is important in view of what has been said by the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster). In this section the word 'company' of course means a railway company. The section reads:

> Subsection 3. If the company owns, charters, uses, maintains or works, or is a party to any arrangement for using, maintaining or working vessels for carrying traffic, by sea or inland water, between any places or ports in Canada, and if any such vessel carries traffic between a port in Canada reached by such company and a port in Canada reached by the railway of another company, the vessel and the railway of either company shall be deemed to constitute a continuous route in Canada within the meaning of this section.

Thus the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster) is right, and the minute you allow this company to do business in water carriage you should put them under the control of the Railway Commission.

Subsection (e) allowed to stand.

On subsection (g), power to acquire other companies.

Mr. LANCASTER. That is a very wide section. Is not the minister afraid of a combination? This might lead to a huge monopoly.

Mr. PUGSLEY. That is the usual clause.

Mr. LANCASTER. If that is the general Act it ought to be amended. The danger is the very simplicity and wide nature of the language. We are authorizing this company to do everything except practise medicine and law, and now we are saying that in all these lines of business they may buy up everybody in opposition to them.

Mr. PUGSLEY. That is what is always done in letters patent; the company being incorporated may acquire the business and undertaking of any company authorized to carry on a similar business. I venture to say that the same powers will be found in the charter of incorporation of the Canada Cement Company. It is the usual clause in commercial or industrial companies.

Mr. LANCASTER. I do not think we should pass the section without further consideration. I doubt if the Grain Growers' Company wish to be made into a huge monopoly like that.

Mr. PUGSLEY. If they wanted to buy out a flour mill would it be any more harm than for them to build a new mill?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes. Suppose you have only two companies operating in a certain way and have competition between them, then the minister's question answers itself; you allow one company to buy out the other, and you immediately lose all competition and have a monopoly.

Mr. NESBITT. It is not necessary to buy them out in order to have no competition, so far as price is concerned.

Mr. FOSTER. My point is that if a person is a strong opponent to monopolies, he should oppose this section because it has a decidedly monopolistic tendency. If they have capital enough they can buy out every single business, and you would have most certainly a most complete monopoly. It would not be possible to frame a more monopolistic clause. I leave it to my hon. friend for Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt) if that is not so.

Mr. NESBITT. I think the clause is too wide, and that all similar clauses in all these Bills are too wide, but I think we should commence the reform by revising the Companies Act. Take all these mergers that have been formed in the last few years, and they just last until some one else has time to build a factory. I do not believe there is any particular danger in this clause, but I do think, generally speaking, that all such clauses are wrong from a legislative standpoint.

Mr. PUGSLEY. When, earlier in the session, I called attention to a similar clause in the McClary Manufacturing Company's Bill, promoted by my hon. friend (Mr. Beattie), my remarks got no sympathy from either side of the House.

Mr. FOSTER. Were I here you would have mine.

Mr. PUGSLEY. The McClary Bill authorized the company to purchase the stock of any other company which manufactures any goods similar to those manufactured by the McClary Company.

Mr. LANCASTER. There is a vast distinction between that provision, and the provisions of this Bill. That company was engaged in manufacturing stoves, and it was authorized to acquire any company similarly engaged.

Mr. PUGSLEY. A monopoly in stoves would be hurtful.

Mr. LANCASTER. This Bill authorizes the grain growers to do everything except build railways or practise law or medicine. You allow this company to buy up everything that is in its road, and you create an evil tenfold greater than that which the Minister of Public Works says existed in the McClary case.

Mr. PUGSLEY. The House did not think there was anything wrong in the McClary case.

Mr. LANCASTER. Is the minister so modest that he will recede from his opinion, and now say that what is tenfold worse than the McClary case, is right?

Mr. RUTAN. The very day this Bill passed the Private Bills Committee, the McClary Company was given the right to purchase an interest in every retail business throughout the country, and no objection was raised. That is much more dangerous than any provision of this Bill. The McClary Company are doing business with retail merchants throughout the whole country, and if they get into the debt of the McClary Manufacturing Company they, the company, can say: 'We must protect ourselves, and we will insist on you giving us an interest in your business,' a power which tends to enable them to monopolize the retail business throughout the country.

Mr. LANCASTER. And under this Bill the grain growers can buy up a retailer, or a wholesaler, or any one else that comes in their road.

Mr. RUTAN. This is not an opportune time to say that the farmers, who are the Grain Growers Company, should not be given the same privilege as is given to others. I do not see why a manufacturing company should be allowed this power, and why it should be refused to farmers.

Mr. LANCASTER. This Bill says that they are going to do everything else except farming. They are going to deal in real estate, and have a printing house, and run banks. I am as good a friend of the farmer as is the hon. gentleman, or anybody else, but when a farmer ceases to be a farmer, and is not satisfied with growing grain and dealing in grain, but wants to do everything else except farming, then he has no right to come here and plead for sympathy because he is a farmer. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Rutan), comes here and pleads, that under the name of a farmers association they can rope people in just as in the case of the Farmers' Bank. When farmers are acting as farmers they deserve our sympathy, and encouragement, and support, but when they cease to be farmers they should go on the same plane as other people.

Mr. FOSTER. The clause in the McClary Bill makes provision as to the conditions under which the company may do these things, such as authorization by by-law, and a meeting of directors, and so on. These appear to be salutary conditions.

Mr. PUGSLEY. The McClary Bill allows the directors to do it, and in this case the shareholders have to do it.

Mr. CLARKE (Essex). If the provisions of the Bill are not satisfactory in that respect, they can be made so.

Mr. FOSTER. I wish the hon. member for Essex would keep that in mind as we go through the clauses of the Bill.

Mr. CLARKE (Essex). It is all very well to talk about creating a monopoly, but there is another view which may be taken. The apparent object of this Bill is that the farmers desire to cut out the middlemen. For instance, instead of getting their lumber from a sawmill they may manufacture it themselves, and in like manner they take power to manufacture agricultural implements, and such necessaries which, under the present conditions, they have to purchase from other concerns. No doubt if this association is a success every farmer will become a member of it, and if they find a sawmill in a small town in the west where there is only room for one sawmill, they can buy that mill out by agreement with the owner rather than start another mill which would be ruinous to both. If it is a necessity for one to sell, and the other to purchase there can be no harm in giving this company power to purchase.

Mr. HAGGART (Lanark). Does not the hon. gentleman see that the legitimate inference to be drawn from his argument is pure socialism? Is that the object of the hon. gentleman, or diversity of trade and occupation in the country?

Mr. TURRIFF. The farmers in the west not only grow grain, but afterwards have to dispose of it. The experience of the western farmers for a good many years has been that in disposing of their crop, more especially their wheat, to the ordinary purchasers of grain, they were not able to get the full value of the grain when it left their hands owing to combinations among the purchasers or middlemen. The farmers organized themselves into this Grain Growers' Grain Company, and for two or three years past they have been handling the grain to a large extent through this company, with the result that they have been able, owing to the fact that this association has about 30,000 members in the three prairie provinces, to get nearer to the full value of their crops than they ever did before. The company was in a position to handle a large enough proportion of the crop to prevent other buyers organizing and putting down the price as formerly. The farmers have learned, by their experience in organizing and co-operating among themselves, that they can get better prices for the goods they have to sell than they could without the organization; and they now come to this parliament to get authority to go a little further in co-operation, in order to cut out the middleman on some of the articles that they use in connection with the operation of their farms. It has been pointed out that they may not succeed if they go into too many lines of business, and that the shareholders may lose in the end. While that is true, why should we sit in judgment and say that 30,000 farmers shall not be allowed to do that if they want to do it? In the final result they have to depend on the honour and honesty and ability of their own men whom they put in charge to carry on this work, just as any other corporation has to do. You cannot take the responsibility away from the shareholders. They elect their directors, and they have to abide by the consequences. I have no reason to doubt that this Grain Growers' Grain Association Company will be able to handle the purchasing of the various articles needed by the farmers, and do it as well as they have handled the selling of wheat in the past. They come here and ask for certain powers which are not greater than have been given in dozens of other cases, and I do not think we would be justified in refusing to grant their request. At the same time I think all the restrictions that we impose on other companies should be imposed on this company.

On section 14, subsection (j),

Mr. FOSTER. What is section 167 of the Companies' Act?

Mr. CLARKE (Essex). That provides that the company cannot lend money to its directors.

Mr. LANCASTER. Why should this company be allowed to do that when other companies cannot?

Mr. CLARKE (Essex). Their idea, as stated in the committee, was that they might make advances on grain before the crop was ready for the market. The committee has amended the clause so as to limit the amount that they can lend.

Mr. FOSTER. There must be a principle involved in 167, I would like to know what it is?

Mr. PUGSLEY. The clause is 'No company shall loan any of its funds to any shareholder.' That is the whole section.

Mr. LANCASTER. That is very necessary to prevent a great evil—to prevent what we know means fraud. This company has no more right to do that than any other.

Mr. CLARKE (Essex). The people they are dealing with are almost all members of this company.

Mr. LANCASTER. That would apply to any company. If a company manufactures or does a banking business or anything else, its own shareholders are its best customers.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Banks can lend money to their own shareholders.

Mr. LANCASTER. There is a reason for that which does not exist in this case. This company has the power to do everything under the sun, which is all the more reason why there should be some restriction put on it. It may guarantee the performance of contracts by other persons, although we have guarantee companies specially chartered for that purpose.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I think that the clause allowing the company to guarantee the performance of contracts should be struck out. I would suggest that this clause be allowed to stand over also for consideration. I do not see much objection to authorizing the company to lend money to its shareholders. It might be most desirable for the farmers that they should be able to obtain loans from this company on their warehouse receipts for grain.

Mr. BLAIN. Why not restrict the advances to the shipping of grain alone?

Mr. PUGSLEY. That can be considered when we deal with the clause again.

On subsection (l),

Sell or dispose of the undertaking of the company, or any part thereof, for such consideration as the company may think fit, and in particular for shares, debentures or securities of any other company having objects altogether or in part similar to those of the company.

Mr. LANCASTER. Why emphasize that section by these words 'in particular?'

Mr. CLARKE (Essex). That is a standard clause in the Act.

On subsection (n),

Do all such other things as are incidental or conducive to the attainments of the objects or purposes of the company.

Mr. LANCASTER. Can any one tell us what are the objects and purposes of this company?

Mr. PUGSLEY. That is a standard clause.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Section 14 is carried with exception of subsections (b), (e) and (f).

On section 15, subsection 2,

Nothing in this section contained shall limit or restrict the borrowing of money by the company on bills of exchange or promissory notes made, drawn, accepted or endorsed by or on behalf of the company.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I am sorry I shall have to oppose this subsection. It makes the borrowing power unlimited. Under the Companies' Act there is a limitation, and the borrowing and issuing of debentures is limited to a certain proportion of the paid up capital stock. I think that under the Companies' Act there is a limitation of the power to issue debentures to a certain portion of the capital stock. If there is not there ought to be. I know there is in the Provincial Joint Stock Companies' Acts. Under the provision now before us, the company might issue debentures for many times the capital stock. The limitation ought not to exceed two-thirds the paid-up capital stock of the company.

Mr. NESBITT. I think the lenders will control that.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I would like to have that clause stand to have it amended.

Mr. MACDONELL. This clause is exactly in the words of the Joint Stock Companies' Act.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I have in mind the New Brunswick Act, which is taken from the Ontario Act. It may have been amended

Mr. CLARKE (Essex). Yes, formerly it was limited.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Section 15 stands for further consideration.

On section 17: Superannuation, pension funds, &c.,

Mr. NESBITT. This section is peculiarly worded.

The company may, on resolution adopted by a vote of shareholders present or represented by proxy at any general meeting of the company——

—and so on. On these conditions they may establish these pension funds. It should provide at least for a two-thirds majority. As it stands it means nothing but a majority of those present.

Mr. LANCASTER. I would ask the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Pugsley), is it usual to give companies powers of this kind? I confess I do not know. It looks to me like affording an opportunity for some people to vote money into their own pockets under the name of superannuation or pension fund.

Mr. PUGSLEY. It is certainly unusual. I understand the railway companies do it, and the banks.

Mr. LANCASTER. Why should an omnibus company like this have such powers? That is one of the difficulties in granting these wide and varied powers,—it makes every concession granted to the company all the more dangerous.

Mr. FOSTER. This seems to be an innovation.

Mr. NESBITT. Something new every day.

Mr. LANCASTER. They justified the general clauses of this Bill by appealing to the Companies' Act. And now, they ask something that is not in the Companies' Act at all.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I think it had better stand.

Mr FOSTER. See what it allows them to do. They need not have the vote of any particular number of shareholders.

Mr. MARTIN (Regina). They must be notified.

Mr. FOSTER. Yes, but anybody who has had experience in companies knows how easy it is for interested parties to get proxies and carry a vote. I do not think this power should be given at any rate until this company shall have some experience. When it gets into working order, if it wants to come back and get a superannuation system under proper conditions it should have an opportunity to do so.

Mr. NESBITT. I would like to see the clause stand until it can be redrafted,—make it conditional upon a vote of two-thirds of the shareholders or something like that.

Mr. LANCASTER. I do not want, by silence, to seem to agree to that proposition. I do not think that such a power should be given to this company at all. It practically makes it an insurance association. Why should they not have safeguards that are required by other concerns of that kind? Why should there not be, as the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster) says, a certain experience of this company sufficiently long for us to know that there is need of this system? I want to find out what this company is really doing before adding this clause.

Mr. FOSTER. When you come down to the fact of the matter, what are you doing? By this clause you are making an insurance company without any of the safeguards.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Stand.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Shall I report progress on this Bill? I think, perhaps, I should mention to the committee that any proposed amendments to this Bill should be given notice of lest they should infringe the rule.

Progress reported.

CANADA WEST LOAN CORPORATION.

House in committee on Bill (No. 169) to incorporate the Canada West Loan Corporation.

On section 7,

Mr. FOSTER. I would like to call the attention of the hon. gentleman who has this Bill in charge, that this section brings up the same thing we have discussed in reference to the Bank Act. As this is a loan company, and is no less important than a bank in many respects, it would seem as if this required more notice:

And no certificate shall be given until the board of directors has been elected as required by this Act, nor until it has been shown to the satisfaction of the Minister of Finance that at least $500,000 of the capital stock of the company have been subscribed.

The amounts outlined by the Finance Minister for the Bank Act have put in the word 'bona fide' before the word 'subscribed.' I think these words should be added after the 'capital stock of the company':

Have been bona fide subscribed, and at least $100,000 thereof have been paid.

That is, of the sum bona fide subscribed. What you want to make sure of is that there should not be a fake subscription, and that the amendment which goes in as a certificate of deposit, should be of actual moneys bona fide subscribed and paid in, and not borrowed on notes and securities, as in the case of the Farmers' Bank.

Mr. McCRANEY. I do not see any need of it, but I have no objection to the hon. gentleman's suggested amendment. The clause is the usual one which has been inserted in the other company Bills.

Mr. FOSTER. Perhaps it does not make any difference provided everything is honestly carried out. But it was thought to be of so much importance that the Finance Minister has outlined that as one of the necessary amendments to the Bank Act; and one can see where it might be made use of if there was a suspicion that things were not properly carried out.

Amendment agreed to.

On section 30,

Mr. LENNOX. Why is this company exempted from the requirement to use the word 'limited' after the name of the company?

Mr. McCRANEY. It is not usual with loan companies.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I am inclined to think that the word 'limited' ought to be used to convey to the public the knowledge that there is not an unlimited liability of the shareholders. Of course, the use of the word 'corporation' signifies to the public that the company is incorporated, but does not signify that it is limited as to its liability.

Mr. MILLER. The word 'limited' is not used in connection with financial corporations, such as trust companies and loan companies.

Mr. FOSTER. Perhaps the minister would let this Bill stand, as I have received one or two representations with reference to it which I have not yet had an opportunity of looking at. I do not want to put anything in the way of its passing.

At six o'clock, committee took recess.

After Recess.

Committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. McCRANEY. My hon. friend from South Simcoe (Mr. Lennox) asked if I could obtain any information as to why the word 'limited' has not been used as a rule in Acts passed by this House for the incorporation of loan and trusts companies. I inquired from the Superintendent of Insurance, through whose hands this legislation passes, and he told me that he knows no special reason, but that the custom has been to omit the word 'limited' in the title. I can only suggest to my hon. friend that as corporations of this character are not trading companies, but loan and trust companies, the public is put on its guard as to the character of the business carried on. I would point out further that if a loan company were receiving money, the argument for the use of the word 'limited' might be strong, but the money it receives, apart from what it may get on deposit—concerning which safeguards are put in such a Bill—is from bond and debenture holders who are well-to-do people, and usually very well advised. I shall give my hon. friend the names of a number of loan companies which have been incorporated by this parliament within recent years, and none of which have the word 'limited' in the title. I have not come across any name which does include the word in the list of trust companies. There were incorporated in the year 1890 the Colonial Investment and Loan Company; 1903, the Acadia Loan Company, and the Eastern Canada Loan and Saving Company; in 1898, the Central Canada Loan and Saving Company; in 1899, the Canada Permanent and Western Canada Mortgage Corporation; in 1906 the Huron and Erie Loan and Savings Company; in 1910, the Pioneers Loan Company, and the Northern Loan Company; and this session, the Hudson Bay Mortgage Corporation. Then the following trust companies: In 1893 the Eastern Trust Company; in 1894, the Toronto General Trust Corporation; in 1905, the Title and Trust Company; in 1907, the Western Trust Company; in 1908, the Prairie Provinces Trust Company, and the Prudential Trust Company. In the titles of none of these is the word 'limited'.

Mr. LENNOX. My hon. friend has gone to a good deal of trouble and has shown what the general practice is, whether it be a good practice or not, and I shall not make any further objection on that score.

Mr. FOSTER. A number of the Ontario companies that I know have the word 'limited'

Mr. McCRANEY. If my hon. friend will look through the recent statutes of Ontario, he will not find that any loan companies have been incorporated by the Ontario legislature at all. I have looked through the last five years, and have not found any. I presume that the companies prefer getting their charters in this House.

Mr. FOSTER. I asked that this Bill stand over, but I find that the representations I had were with regard to another company.

Bill reported, read the third time, and passed.

CASUALTY COMPANY OF CANADA.

House in committee on Bill (No. 174) to incorporate the Casualty Company of Canada.—Mr. Martin (Regina).

Mr. MACDONELL. I regret that the Minister of Finance is not here. He was not in the Banking and Commerce Committee when this Bill was before it. I would suggest that this Bill stand until he is here, as the name of this company is of considerable importance, and I should like to have his opinion concerning it.

Mr. MARTIN (Regina). I do not see why this Bill should be allowed to stand. There was a representative of the Finance Department in the Banking and Commerce Committee, and that committee adopted this Bill.

Mr. MACDONELL. I think my hon. friend will make more headway with his Bill if he will allow it to stand until the Minister of Finance is here.

Mr. OLIVER. In view of the statement made by my hon. friend in whose name the Bill stands, I do not see why we should insist on the presence of the Minister of Finance. If it is absolutely necessary that he should be here, we can send for him rather than have the Bill lose its place on the Order Paper.

Mr. MACDONELL. I think that, in the interests of the promoters of the Bill, and the public, the Minister of Finance should be here.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I would suggest to my hon. friend that he should make any objections he has to the Bill, and then the committee will consider whether it should stand over. The Bill, as I understand it, passed the committee of which the Minister of Finance is a member. I think we should learn that there is some objection to the Bill before we allow it to stand over.

Mr. MACDONELL (South Toronto). The objection made in the committee was to the fact that this company is seeking incorporation under a name which, if not similar to that of another company, would be apt to be confused with it, and in the interest of the older company, which has been established in a similar business for several years, and in the interest of the public who are interested in avoiding the confusion of names, my purpose in making the motion was that the Minister of Finance might be aware of this similarity of names.

Mr. PUGSLEY. What is the name of the other company?

Mr. MACDONELL. The Canadian Casualty and Boiler Insurance Company, known commonly as 'The Canadian Casualty Company.' The present company seeks incorporation under the name of 'The Casualty Company of Canada.' I think the Bill should stand until the opinion of the Minister of Finance is had on the subject.

Mr. MARTIN (Regina). I know that the opinion of the Finance Department was available at three or four meetings of the Senate Committee, and at least one or two of the Banking and Commerce Committees of this House. I submit that we should be in no better position to judge concerning the name if we had the Minister of Finance here. It is a matter of opinion. The facts are that this company advertised in the 'Canada Gazette'——

Mr. MACDONELL (South Toronto). Let the motion be put and disposed of, and then we can go on.

Mr. MARTIN (Regina). I do not see why we should not consider the merits on this motion. This company advertised in the 'Canada Gazette' its intention to apply for incorporation under the name 'The Lloyds' Casualty Company of Canada.' Before the Senate Committee an Ottawa solicitor, representing the Lloyds' Plate Glass Company, of New York, opposed the granting of the name 'Lloyd's.' The Senate Committee held three successive meetings, and finally gave this company the name. 'The Casualty Company of Canada.' The Bill was reported to this House and referred to our Committee on Banking and Commerce. That committee discussed the name and finally decided that the company was entitled to the name 'The Casualty Company of Canada.' The hon. gentleman (Mr. Macdonell, Toronto) says there is a similarity between the names 'The Casualty Company of Canada' and 'The Canadian Casualty and Steam Boiler Insurance Company.'

Mr. MACDONELL (Toronto). There is no word 'steam' in the company's name.

Mr. MARTIN (Regina). My instructions are that there is in it the word 'steam,' but if I am mistaken it does not make any difference. My hon. friend (Mr. Macdonell, Toronto) says that the company opposing our name is generally known as 'The Canadian Casualty Company.' That is not our fault. As the solicitor for this corporation said before the Banking and Commerce Committee, that company is really travelling under an alias, and has no status, under that alias, to oppose the name of this company. In any case, the Canadian Casualty and Boiler Insurance Company, I understand, has been bought and is run as a side-show by a Scottish company, known as the General Accident Insurance Corporation. These being the facts, and it being merely a matter of opinion whether the names are similar or not, I think the Bill should be proceeded with.

Mr. FOSTER. It has been usual, where there has been a dispute about a name, to get the opinion of the Minister of Finance. I do not see that there would be anything to find fault with if we were to take up all the sections of this Bill except the first, which deals with the name, but to leave that until the Bill could be taken up again with the Minister of Finance here. There is no disposition to prevent the passing of the Bill.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I have made inquiry of the Superintendent of Insurance, who is in attendance, and he tells me that the matter was thoroughly threshed out before the Banking and Commerce Committee, and that it was decided to leave the name exactly as it is. He tells me also that the Minister of Finance has left no information with him that he desires to express any opinion with regard to the recommendation of the committee. I do not see why we might not dispose of the Bill this evening. It seems to me there is no similarity in the names of these companies, and no likelihood of confusion. What weighs with me is that the committee, after discussion and careful consideration, decided to recommend the Bill with this name.

Mr. BLAIN. I was present when this matter was discussed in the Banking and Commerce Committee. The Minister of Finance was not in his place. True, the Finance Department was represented. As my hon. friend from North Toronto (Mr. Foster) has pointed out, it is usual, when a similarity of names arises, that the Minister of Finance is questioned in the House with regard to the matter. Surely the hon. member who has charge of the Bills will not press it. If it is not put through tonight that will not interfere with its passage, and it is only fair to the committee to have a statement from the Minister of Finance on the question. Surely, if the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Pugsley) had looked closely at these names he would not have said that there is no similarity. One company is known as 'The Canadian Casualty Company,' and the other 'The Casualty Company of Canada.' Surely it will not be said that there is not great similarity between these names. It is usual, as I have said, in cases of this kind, to have a statement from the Minister of Finance.

Mr. LENNOX. I certainly think the suggestion of the hon. member from North Toronto (Mr. Foster) should be accepted. The Minister of Finance usually has strong feeling on the question of names of companies. He has on many occasions, both in committee and in the House, expressed himself very clearly and strongly on such matters. And we are all of the opinion that it is unfortunate if the name given to a new company leads to confusion with some existing company. Now with great deference to the Minister of Public Works, I hardly think he is right. The words that catch the ear and arrest the attention are that this company, which we propose to incorporate, is a casualty company and a Canadian company, The Casualty Company of Canada; the other words in reference to boiler insurance are likely in ordinary language to be left out. The company may preserve its identity, it may print all its papers properly, and sign its letters with the full name of the company; and yet the public, speaking of the company, may abbreviate it and speak of this as The Canadian Casualty Company, although it is a Casualty Company of Canada, so that after a little while one company will be confused with the other, to the great disadvantage of the companies themselves and of the public. The Minister of Finance has communicated to this company his objection to this incorporation, and we assume that he still maintains his objection. I do not think we should have this unseemly difference in the cabinet; I think the expressed opinion of the Minister of Finance ought to be concurred in.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Do I understand my hon. friend to say that the Minister of Finance has sent word to this committee of his objections to the Bill? I have not so understood it. If that were the case, I would yield my view at once to the view of the Minister of Finance.

Mr. LENNOX. No; I was saying that the Minister of Finance had expressed himself clearly through his representative in the committee, and we are bound to assume that he is still of the same opinion. That being the case, I think his colleagues in the cabinet ought to defer to his judgment in this matter, as it pertains more especially to his department. I understand that his representative was in the committee and expressed himself as opposed to the name.

Mr. MARTIN (Regina). That is not correct. In the Senate committee when this Bill was considered, the present name was given to this company, with the consent of the Superintendent of Insurance, the representative of the Finance Department. If I thought that the Minister of Finance was at all opposed to this name, I would not attempt to press the Bill. I do not wish to be discourteous to the hon. member for North Toronto; but the only reason I have for asking that the committee proceed with this Bill is that I have to leave for the west in two or three days, and may not have another opportunity of bringing it forward.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I have authority from the Department of Finance to say that the Senate committee examined this very question which is now under discussion as to whether the name of this company was liable to be confounded with the name of another company, which I understand is the Boiler and Casualty Company; and that the contention that there was a conflict between the names was rejected, and the present name was accepted. I understand also that objection was taken in the committee of this House, and that the present name was accepted upon a division in the committee. I understand that the Superintendent of Insurance was present in the committee as representing the Department of Finance, and that he raised no objection to the present Bill. Therefore it is not exactly correct to say that the Minister of Finance does not concur in this legislation.

Mr. LENNOX. Of course I accept the Prime Minister's version of the case as he understands it, but I do not understand him to say that he has had any direct communication with the Minister of Finance in the matter. I am informed by some gentlemen around me that they understand that the Minister of Finance does not approve of the name.

Mr. PUGSLEY. On what does my hon. friend base that statement?

Mr. LENNOX. I am so informed.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I think my hon. friend is misinformed.

Mr. LENNOX. I gather it from members of the House in whom I have great confidence. I may say to my hon. friend who is promoting the Bill, that we do not wish to prevent his Bill going through; I want him to get his Bill through. But I do not think that what is suggested by the member for North Toronto will have the effect of preventing this Bill going through. We will probably reach it again before he leaves.

Mr. MILLER. I do not think any members of the House whom the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. Lennox) has spoken of as informing him that the Minister of Finance is opposed to the Bill, will get up in their places and say that they have heard him so express himself. The member for Simcoe argued a few minutes ago that there ought not to be any division in the cabinet on this matter, and that because the representative of the Minister of Finance is opposed to the name, therefore the other members of the cabinet ought also to be opposed to it.

Mr. LENNOX. It is not as bad as that.

Mr. MILLER. Now when he finds that the superintendent of insurance, representing the Minister of Finance, expressed himself favourably to the name, will he still think that there ought not to be a division in the cabinet, although the committee did agree with the opinion thus obtained?

Mr. MEIGHEN. I think there is a valid objection to the name, no matter what the opinion of the Minister of Finance is, and also no matter what confusion may arise with the name of any other company. The name which is proposed for this company is simply the Casualty Company of Canada. Now the casualty business is one line of business, the banking business is another line, the trust business is another line, and so on all through the commercial life of the country. It seems to me it would be well to forbid any company using a name like this in any line of business. The Minister of Finance set a good example in connection with a bank which proposed to monopolize the name The Bank of Canada. It would also be just as objectionable to incorporate a company calling itself The Trust Company of Canada, whether there was any other similar named company in existence or not. It would seem to me also to afford an unfair advantage to any other company to be allowed to call itself The Loan Company of Canada, or to any set of incorporators to be called The Life Insurance Company of Canada. In all these cases I think so comprehensive a name gives them an undue advantage over other similar companies. So, even though there were no other companies, or no special circumstances, the better course for this parliament to pursue would be to forbid to any company so unfair an advantage as would be given by allowing them to use this name. But in this case there is an additional objection. There is a company now in existence known as the Canadian Casualty and Boiler Insurance Company. That is an additional objection, but in the very nature of things a similar objection would lie to almost any attempt to assume so comprehensive a name as this. For instance if a company asked to be known as the Life Insurance Company of Canada, objection would at once be taken that there would be confusion with the Canada Life Assurance Company. It is argued by the hon. member for Regina (Mr. Martin) that because the first company, the Canadian Casualty and Boiler Insurance Company, has the additional 'Boiler Insurance Company', it is distinguishable. No doubt to a lawyer and those familiar with the company it is very readily distinguishable, but as the hon. member knows, the general public do not like writing long names, and as a matter of fact, the company will be known by the first part of its name almost invariably. I have been furnished with a series of envelopes selected out of one mail of the Canadian Casualty and Boiler Insurance Company. Seven of these are addressed to the Canadian Casualty Company, Toronto, and one of them is a letter addressed in typewriting from another large company in Toronto, so it can easily be understood how the ordinary man would address them. The hon. member for Regina (Mr. Martin) says that is not the fault of the applicants for this Bill. Certainly it is not, who would suggest it was? But it is similarly not the fault of this company. I am instructed that this company never signs itself or refers to itself as the Canadian Casualty Company, but it is rooted in human nature that they should be so addressed. There will inevitably be confusion, and that confusion means a direct financial loss to the existing company. The Minister of Finance strongly opposed the use of a comprehensive title like this in the case of a bank, and he was upheld by the House. Surely there could be no objection to the name applied for by the incorporators of the bank now known as the Banque Nationale of Canada that will not apply to this one. If the Minister of Finance had a policy at that time, the same policy must apply in this case. We should not allow any company in any line of business to say that it was the company of that line of business of Canada. We should adopt that as a first principle in legislation of this kind. If there was some other adjective such as the Casualty and Guarantee Company of Canada the objection would be partly overcome, but a casualty business is one line of business, and no company should be allowed to say that it is the Casualty Company of Canada. To my mind that is the extreme limit of error.

Mr. HAGGART (Winnipeg). I differ from the hon. member for Portage la Prairie (Mr. Meighen). I think the distinction is sufficiently clear, and if the present casualty company allowed themselves to be called by the two first words of their name, and they write letters or allow themselves to be so addressed without calling attention to the error, it is their fault. I think the House is going too far in the direction in which my hon. friend would lead it, it is too exacting already. Casualty is a general term, and in how many companies do we find such general terms, as British, Canadian, Western, Eastern, Northern, Dominion, National? I suppose casualty means no more than insurance, a casualty contract would be an indemnity contract, and when we see those two names written on sign boards, one the Casualty Company of Canada, and the other the Canadian Casualty and Boiler Insurance Company, there is no confusion. I would favour giving this name. I think the applicants are entitled to it, and that those objecting have not shown a sufficient cause.

Mr. MACDONELL. It would be well, perhaps, to ascertain how these people lit upon this name. In the first place, in their published advertisement of their intention to apply for this Bill they gave the name of Lloyd's Casualty Company. In that they were treading on the corns of Lloyd's Limited and Lloyd's Limited appeared before the Senate Committee and objected. This Bill was initiated in the Senate. In the Senate Committee the objection was taken, and it was quite apparent it was well taken, and the promoters of this Bill cast about to find some other name. In a moment, before the committee and without any published notice to anybody, without notice to the Canadian Casualty and Boiler Insurance Company or anybody else, this name was settled upon and taken.

It is absurd—that is a strong word to use, but I think it is well applied—it is absurd to say that there is no similarity between these two names. This company seeks incorporation under the name of the Casualty Company of Canada, and the name of the old company is the Canadian Casualty and Boiler Insurance Company, and as has been abundantly proven the Canadian Casualty and Boiler Insurance Company is known generally to the public as the Canadian Casualty Company and is very generally addressed that way through the mail. The hardship of passing the Bill in this shape is that you have this old insurance company engaged in the casualty business in the city of Toronto, and this new company, proposing to embark in an identically similar business, with its head office in the same city, takes a name that is bound to be confused with the other. There is no reason whatever why these people should want to be incorporated under this name unless it be that they desire to acquire the name for the purpose of sharing in the good will of the business of the existing company. I am not suggesting that, but it certainly looks as though such were the case. This House may not have much to do with the confusion that may arise in the business of the two companies, but it certainly has to do with the protection of the public and in the public interest such a name should not be given the new company. There is, of course, the larger objection that this House would never incorporate a company under the name of the 'The Railway Company of Canada' or 'The Steamship Company of Canada,' and there is no reason why they should incorporate an insurance company under such a name. The Minister of Finance has years of experience in dealing with just such cases as this, and I am satisfied that if he were here he would share my opinion. I do not agree with the statement of the chairman of the committee that the Finance Department agreed to this name. The Bill was before the committee twice; on the first occasion the representative of the department was adverse, and on the last occasion when he was asked squarely what was his opinion he said he had no opinion to offer. There is no desire to force these people into any particular name, but I think they should make their reputation under their own name and not under the name of a company established in business.

Mr. BLAIN. If the chairman of the Banking and Commerce Committee will say that the Minister of Finance has been consulted and that he offered no objection to this name I will be satisfied.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I am informed that the Minister of Finance was not consulted. I am informed by the Superintendent of Insurance that the matter was discussed before the Senate Committee, and they rejected the objection. I am informed further that in the committee of this House the objection was overruled by a majority vote, and by the Senate Committee unanimously. I am also informed by the Superintendent of Insurance that whilst there may be some doubt he raises no objection.

Mr. MACDONELL (Toronto). Let me inform the right hon. the Prime Minister of the exact facts. There was no objection made in the Senate Committee because there was no notice given, and no one knew until it was suggested by a senator present what name this company would get. The people whose business is now being invaded had no notice and could not take objection in the Senate Committee, but they brought their objection before the Commons Committee and the vote was almost a tie. It was felt by many that had the Finance Minister been present and given his opinion the result would be otherwise.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I understand that before the Senate Committee the Superintendent of Insurance suggested the name, and there was no objection.

Mr. MACDONELL (Toronto). There was no objection by the Casualty Company at that time because they did not know.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. The question is not new and no one can be taken by surprise. The question was discussed in the Senate Committee on the suggestion of the Superintendent of Insurance, and objection was taken before the House Committee upon the application of the other parties interested, so that it has been passed upon by the committees of both Houses. The rule is, unless there is a very grave error, to agree with the report of the committee.

Mr. BLAIN. If the Bill passes now it will pass without the consent of the Minister of Finance, whose duty it is to look into matters of this kind, and who holds strong views on this very point. It is very important that before this Bill passes the opinion of the Minister of Finance should be obtained.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I think all will agree that there is no parity whatever between this case and the case of the Bank of Canada mentioned by the hon. member for Portage la Prairie. The name proposed in that Bill was 'The Bank of Canada,' and as the capital was largely taken from France it was thought that such a name would suggest to the people of Europe an idea which the character of the bank would not justify. It might be thought that La Banque du Canada was on a parity with La Banque de France or the Bank of England, that is to say, that it had some state connection. That was the objection taken by my hon. friend and colleague the Minister of Finance. In this case there is nothing of the kind to be apprehended.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not know whether the right hon. gentleman was here or not when I made the suggestion that, as the Minister of Finance was not here, and as there seemed to be some question about the matter, we might pass the other sections of the Bill and leave simply the section which has reference to the name until the Minister of Finance can be questioned about it.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. As the Bill will come up again to-morrow, I think my hon. friend from Regina might accept the suggestion of my hon. friend from North Toronto.

Section allowed to stand.

On section 7,

Mr. FOSTER. I would suggest that before the word 'subscribed' there should be put the words 'bona fide,' and after the words 'thirty-five thousand dollars' there should be put the word 'thereof' and the word 'thereon' should be omitted. These are in line with the emendation we made to-day in another Bill.

Mr. MILLER. I would suggest that the words 'bona fide' should be inserted also in the other subsections of this section.

Amendments agreed to.

Mr. FOSTER. With reference to the use of the word 'limited,' I have the Ontario sessional papers which show that that word is very much more used in connection with the names of companies than the impression given to the House this afternoon would lead us to expect. I find, for instance: Brantford Trust Company (Limited), British Canadian Loan and Investment Company (Limited), Brockville Loan and Savings Company (Limited), Canada Landed and National Investment Company (Limited), Canadian Northern Prairie Lands Company (Limited), Guardian Trust Company (Limited), Imperial Loan and Investment Company of Canada (Limited), London and Canadian Loan and Agency Company (Limited), London and Western Trusts Company (Limited), Mercantile Trust Company of Canada (Limited), National Trusts Company (Limited), North British Canadian Investment Company (Limited), North of Scotland Canadian Mortgage Company (Limited), Real Estate Loan Company of Canada (Limited), Scottish American Investment Company (Limited), Scottish Ontario and Manitoba Land Company (Limited), Trusts and Guarantee Company (Limited), Union Trust Company (Limited), Walkerville Land and Building Company (Limited). I wish again we had the Minister of Finance here, so that he could explain to us when in his opinion the word 'limited' should be used with reference to these corporations. The Canadian Loan Company seems to be on a line with these companies in Ontario to whose names the word 'limited' is attached.

Mr. McCRANEY. Was the hon. gentleman here when I quoted the names of loan and trust companies which had been incorporated by this parliament and as to which the word 'limited' was not made a part of the name?

Mr. MILLER. Taking up the 'Monetary Times' and going through the list of loan company advertisements, I find the Canada Permanent Mortgage Corporation, the Huron and Erie Loan and Savings Company the Hamilton Provident and Loan Society. none of which has the word 'limited.' The next is the London and Canadian Loan and Agency Company, Limited. Then follow a number without the word 'limited'—the Toronto Mortgage Company, the Standard Loan Company, the Reliance Loan and Savings Company of Ontario, the Agricultural Savings and Loan Company of London, Ontario, the Ontario Loan and Debenture Company, the Dominion Savings and Investment Society. In all about a dozen without the word 'limited,' and I do not think they all have Dominion charters.

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READINGS.

Bill (No. 164) for the relief of Walter Harvey Kirkland.—Mr. Martin (Regina).

Bill (No. 180) for the relief of Mary Kathleen Crittenden.—Mr. Rhodes.

Bill (No. 181) for the relief of Pauline Winslow Saunderson.—Mr. Carvell.

Bil l(No. 182) for the relief of Nellie Bridgland Morrison.—Mr. Harris.

Bill (No. 183) for the relief of Francis Whittington Truesdell.—Mr. Smith (Nanaimo).

REVILLON FRERES TRADING COMPANY.

House in Committee on Bill (No. 158) to incorporate Revillon Freres Trading Company.—Mr. Devlin.

On section 8,

8. The property and assets of Revillon Brothers, Limited, to be vested in the company incorporated by this Act shall be deemed to be and consist of the properties specified in the schedule to this Act; but nothing in this Act shall affect the rights of any creditors of the said Revillon Brothers, Limited.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I would like to call the attention of the committee to this section, also to sections 6, 9 and 11. In the first place, I presume the committee has considered the matter, and I would hesitate to criticise their action in passing this Bill. But it strikes me as about as extraordinary a Bill as I have ever seen. This Bill purports to vest by Act of parliament all the assets of another company in a new company, and it repeals the charter of the old company, it revokes and annuls the letters patent, and repeals the statute passed in 1906 confirming these letters patent.

Mr. FOSTER. Is that the new company or the same?

Mr. PUGSLEY. Another company. Each company has a separate existence and may have separate liabilities. Then by section 9 it seems to recognize another company; still it is a company incorporated in France, and whose assets are alleged by this Bill to be handed over to the new company, whereas this Bill does not hand over the assets of the French company at all, but only the assets of the company which was incorporated by letters patent in 1904. In this case it may be all right, there may be no creditors, but what we do to-day may be a precedent for legislation to-morrow. Suppose there was a man who had a claim against the existing company and a suit was pending; the moment this statute comes into force the charter of the existing company is annulled, its letters patent become void, the statute recognizing these letters is repealed, and there is no old company in existence; so the man would find himself out of court at once. It is true his rights are protected by a provision that this company shall be liable for the debts of the old company, but every man's suit would be discontinued. It seems to me the proper course would be to authorize the existing company to convey their properties to the new company by the proper conveyance, and then make this company liable for the debts of the existing company, and make provision that any suits pending might be carried to a conclusion in the name of the old company, but that the new company should be liable for judgments which might be obtained. But by this statute we wipe out at once, by a stroke of the pen when this statute comes into force, the charter of the old company, and wipe out all suits that might be pending. It strikes me as entirely new legislation, and objectionable.

Mr. BARKER. I was on the committee when this Bill was brought up, and I certainly felt as the Minister of Public Works has just said. The applicants for the Bill were two gentlemen of very high professional reputation, Mr. Lafleur and Mr. McDougall, and there was an indisposition to doubt the correctness of the measure, because these gentlemen were vouching for it. The whole story was of the most intricate character. There had been two blunders, apparently, in the course of the existence of these companies. The first charter appeared to be a blunder, then there was another blunder, and this was an effort to redeem the two blunders, and put the corporations upon another footing. Feeling the importance of the matter, I suggested in the committee that we should appoint a committee of four legal gentlemen to act with the counsel and go over this Bill with extreme care, and see that now, after all the troubles they had been involved in, we did not make another and a worse blunder still. I do not think it was possible for any member of the committee clearly to understand what they were doing. I have no doubt whatever that the promoters of the Bill, the legal gentlemen present, were strictly truthful in everything they said, and said nothing they did not know. But I think also that the committee were responsible, and I felt that we ought not to act entirely on the opinion of the legal gentlemen present. I was not able, on the statements made there, either to approve or disapprove of the Bill. I can only say that as a member of that committee, and now sitting in the House, I have no more idea whether the passing of the Bill will produce the result that was intended, than I have as to whether there are inhabitants in Mars. I doubt whether any member of the committee thoroughly understood it. It was passed largely upon the reputation of the two legal gentlemen who were present, and who had been acting all through for the Revillon Frères Trading Company, Limited. There is a Revillon Frères in France, and there is a chartered Revillon Brothers under a charter issued by the Secretary of State, and there is now this Bill. Who will be who by and by, I do not know. I am not surprised that the minister is in doubt about it, and I do not think that any member of the committee has the slightest idea what it means. I think that for the sake of the reputation of parliament something should be done. I do not think we are justified in passing legislation that we do not understand. I think it ought to be referred to a special committee, who would report to the general committee. That is what I suggested before, but my view was not accepted by the committee.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. As the promoter of the Bill is not here, and the objections of my hon. friend seem to be very serious, I would move that the committee rise, report progress, and ask leave to sit again.

Mr. FOSTER. Has my right hon. friend any suggestion to make in the way of getting this where it can be intelligently dealt with? It is rather stunning to hear a competent member of that committee say that he does not know any more about this Bill than he does about the people in Mars; and I do not think the Minister of Customs knows any more about it, either, than he does about the people in Mars. I am sure, in reading this Bill, I do not know anything about it.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. If anything comes from Mars, my hon. friend the Minister of Customs will look after it, I know. In the meantime, the suggestion made by the member for Hamilton seems to be the most sensible one under the circumstances. The promoter of the Bill not being here, I suggest that the committee rise and report progress.

Mr. HENDERSON. I can fully endorse everything my hon. friend from Hamilton (Mr. Barker) has said. It was the most confused Bill I ever saw come before the committee, and I think the committee were just about as confused after the Bill was passed as when we took it up. I think it would be advisable for this committee to take some step to put this Bill in a form that it would be workable, at any rate.

Mr. BARKER. I do not think there was a member present in the committee who wanted to interfere with the Bill; we only wanted to do what was right, but we did not know what we were doing.

Mr. MILLER. As I understand it, the Revillon Frères were a French company having a charter and doing business in many countries in Europe. They desired to do business in Canada, and they applied to the Secretary of State under the Companies' Act for a charter. That charter was granted, and it was a very peculiar charter, a copy of which was produced before the committee. The charter stated that all the property of Revillon Frères, the French firm, should thereafter be vested in Revillon Brothers, the Canadian company. It did not even limit the property so vested to the Canadian property, but that all the property of Revillon Frères should be vested in Revillon Brothers, the Canadian company. I asked Mr. Lafleur the solicitor for the promoters why they did not ask for legislative authority to have the Canadian company convey their Canadian property to the new company. It appears that when Revillon Brothers were incorporated in 1904 there was no application filed, that there were no provisional directors named, and that the charter vested the property of Revillon Frères in the Canadian company, but the Canadian company had no entity and no directors who could convey the property. The French company is really the whole company. They supplied all the caprtal, they did business in Canada under the name of Revillon Brothers, under a charter granted by the Secretary of State and without any one finding fault for a number of years. The Bank of Montreal who were their bankers suddenly said: We do not think you have the right to carry on business in this way, and we will not advance you any further money because the charter granted by the Secretary of State conveys nothing to anybody, there being no directors, and they have never organized and could never organize under that charter. They answered: We will get the French company to endorse our paper, but the bank said: That is worthless because the French company have vested all their property in the Canadian company, and, therefore, it is divested from them and nobody has it. It was absolutely impossible for the Canadian company to reconvey, and the only thing that could be done was to get this Act of parliament vesting the property in the new company.

Mr. FOSTER. I think the hon. gentleman (Mr. Miller) had better sleep over it, and find another explanation.

Mr. MILLER. My hon. friend might not understand it, but most members of the committee did.

Mr. FOSTER. I do understand that, according to the hon. gentleman (Mr. Miller) the Dominion government issued a charter to nobody for nothing. They granted a charter to a company which had no directors provisional or otherwise.

Mr. MILLER. That is quite right.

Mr. FOSTER. And consequently it was not worth the paper it was written on, and yet it was given to conduct a large business. That is pretty good proof that there is something wrong in a department which would issue such a charter.

Mr. MILLER. I am not defending the charter; I am simply stating the facts.

CANADA NATIONAL FIRE INSURANCE COMPANY.

Mr. MARTIN (Regina) moved the second reading of Bill (No. 201) respecting the Canada National Fire Insurance Company.

Mr. McCRANEY. There is a corporation having its head office at Saskatoon which bears the name of the Canadian National Insurance Company. I have a wire from the company to-day asking when this matter will be considered in the Banking and Commerce Committee, because they wish to have some of their directors present at the committee. I hope that the chairman of the committee can give an appointment to-night, so that I may wire the Saskatoon people to be down here when that committee meets.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time.

QUESTIONS.

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

RELEASE OF VICTOR DINI.

* Mr. NORTHRUP:

1. Is the government aware that on the 21st of February last, 1911, one Victor Dini was sentenced by His Honour Judge Bazin of Montreal, to twenty-three months imprisonment for stealing $4,000 from the Dominion Express Company?

2. Is it a fact that the said Victor Dini, as alleged, has since been liberated from prison? If so, by whose order was he liberated?

3. Was he pardoned or liberated on a ticket of leave, for what reason was he liberated or pardoned, and on whose recommendation?

Sir ALLEN AYLESWORTH:

1. The answer to the first question is in the affirmative, with this qualification that the statement in the question is the first intimation which has been made to the Department of Justice as to the amount of the loss, or as to the name of those who suffered the loss.

2. Dini was released from close custody on March 31, under order of His Excellency the Governor General upon license to serve the remainder of his sentence at large subject to the conditions prescribed by the Ticket-of-Leave Act.

3. On the recommendation of the Minister of Justice, upon the statement that the prisoner was seriously ill as the result of a recent surgical operation, and that detention in prison would be dangerous to his life—the certificate of the jail surgeon as to the prisoner's physical condition, and stating that he was likely to become strangulated at any time, and the recommendation of the convicting police magistrate, who stated that Dini had always enjoyed a good reputation, that his offence was the result of inexperience in business, and that the sentence he had undergone was, for the prisoner, a sufficient punishment.

PURCHASE OF SUB-TARGETS.

Mr. SHARPE (Ontario):

1. How many sub-targets have been purchased, at what price and what is the total expenditure to date?
2. Who are the officers of the company with whom the government has contracted in regard to the purchase of these sub-targets?
3. Has the government contracted to purchase any specified number of these sub-targets? If so, how many, and upon what terms?
4. To what use are the sub-target guns put at present time?

Sir FREDERICK BORDEN:

1. (a) Five hundred and fifty-two (552).
(b) $250 each; except for 200 machines purchased in 1907 at $249.25.
(c) $137,850.
2. The only officer of the company known to the department at present is Mr. George I. Riddell, the manager.
3. No contract has been made for the supply of any additional number of these machines.
4. For the preliminary musketry training of the militia and cadets.

NATIONAL TRANSCONTINENTAL RAILWAY—CUSTOMS DUTIES.

Mr. LENNOX:

Does the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company pay the regular customs duties, or any customs duties, upon goods, supplies and material imported by them and entering into the construction of the western division of the Transcontinental railway?

Mr. PATERSON. The Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company pays the regular customs duties upon goods, supplies and material imported for and entering into the construction of the Western Division of the Transcontinental railway.

JOHN R. BARLOW.

Mr. LENNOX:

Is there a Mr. John R. Barlow in the service of the government or the geological Department as a surveyor? If so, what is his address?

Mr. TEMPEMAN. There is no person of the name of John R. Barlow in the employ of the Geological Survey.

Sir ALLEN AYLESWORTH.

NICOLET PUBLIC WORKS.

Mr. PAQUET:

1. What is the total amount paid each year since 1907 up to this date for works done at River Godfroy, River Nicolet, and at the post office at Nicolet, to John O'Shaunessy?
2. What is the amount of stone purchased by the government from John O'Shaunessy during the year 1910 for the works at Sorel?
3. How many toise of stone, at what price, and what is the name of the person who measured this stone?

Mr. PUGSLEY:

	River Godfroy.	Nicolet Harbour.	Nicolet Public Building.
1906-07	$4,271	Nil.	Nil.
1907-08	Nil.	$ 77 50	"
1908-09	"	159 00	$3,703 55
1909-10	"	93 00	457 68
1910-11	"	Nil.	Nil.
	$4,271	$329 50	$4,161 23

2 and 3. Nothing from this department..

NICOLET CUSTOMS COLLECTIONS.

Mr. PAQUET:

1. What was the total amount collected at the Nicolet customs office for each of the fiscal years, 1906-7, 1907-8, 1908-9, 1909-10 and 1910-11?
2. What was the amount paid to the collector of customs at Nicolet for each fiscal year from 1906 to 1911?

Mr. PATERSON:

1. The total amount collected at the Nicolet customs office was as follows: 1906-07 (9 months), $372.71; 1907-08, $10,-464.02; 1908-09, $5,358.53; 1909-10, $1,284.53; 1910-11, $697.89.
2. The amount paid to the collector of customs at Nicolet for each fiscal year was as follows: 1906-07 (9 months), $300; 1907-08, $466.68; 1908-09, $700; 1909-10, $700; 1910-11, $700.

NICOLET POST OFFICE.

Mr. PAQUET:

Has the government received a petition from Nicolet asking for the construction of an annex to the post office, for the occupation of the postmaster?

Mr. PUGSLEY. No.

INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY MAIL SERVICE.

Mr. PAQUET:

1. Does the government know, as alleged, that the mail clerks on the Intercolonial, as well as on the Delaware road, between Nicolet and Montreal, are accustomed to permit their friends to travel in the mail cars?
2. If so, is the government going to permit this abuse to continue longer or have it discontinued?

Mr. LEMIEUX. 1 and 2. The government is not aware that mail clerks on the Intercolonial or on the line between Nicolet and Montreal, permit their friends to travel in mail cars, as such action on the part of clerks is against the rules and regulations, and any violation thereof is followed by the suspension of the clerk at fault. In 1905 one clerk, running between Montreal and Nicolet, was dismissed and one suspended for three months for violation of this rule.

NICOLET MILITARY ACCOMMODATION.

Mr. PAQUET:

Does the government intend to put the military arsenal of the 80th battalion in the upper story of the post office, as well as the office of Weights and Measures, as proposed at the time of the building of the post office at Nicolet?

Mr. PUGSLEY. There is no military arsenal at Nicolet. The Minister of Militia informs me that this question may relate to the use of a part of the public building for an armoury. This may be considered as answer to the question.

RIVER NICOLET DREDGING.

Mr. PAQUET:

What is the amount voted for the dredging of the River Nicolet from the mouth of the River St. Laurent up to the bridge of the village, and is this work to be done by day labour or by contract?

Mr. PUGSLEY. This work will be done by contract and paid for from the general vote for dredging, provinces of Quebec and Ontario.

LEGALIZATION OF MARRIAGES.

Mr. TAYLOR (Leeds):

1. Has the Dominion government to legalize or validate any or every marriage solemnized anywhere in Canada?
2. Has the government taken any steps to ascertain the power of this parliament in that regard?
3. If not, does the government propose to take any steps for that purpose?
4. Has the opinion of the law officers of the Crown been asked or obtained upon this question?
5. Does the government propose to obtain the opinion of the law officers of the Crown thereon?

Sir ALLEN AYLESWORTH:

1. The government does not consider that it possesses any such power.
2, 3, 4 and 5. The government has not considered the advisability of taking any of the courses suggested.

POST OFFICE ACT AMENDMENT.

Mr. LEMIEUX moved that the House go into Committee to-morrow to consider the following proposed resolution:

Resolved, that it is expedient to amend the Post Office Act by providing (a) for annual increases to the salaries of the superintendents of city post offices until a maximum salary of $2,500 is reached; and (b) for raising the minimum and maximum salaries of railway mail clerks to $500 and $1,400 respectively; and making the yearly increases for all railway mail clerks $100 instead of $50 until a salary of $800 has been reached.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. LEMIEUX moved that the House go into committee to-morrow to consider the following proposed resolution:

Resolved, that it is expedient to amend the Civil Service Act by:—

(a) changing the classification of the clerks in the city post offices, offices of the post office inspectors, office of superintendent of railway mail service, and in the money order exchange offices by abolishing the stampers and sorters class and fourth class clerkships, and substituting therefor third class clerkships, ranging from $500 to $1,000, and divided into two classes known as third class 'A' and 'B.'

(b) abolishing the junior and senior second class clerkships and substituting therefor classes 'A' and 'B' of the second class, and increasing the maximum of the class formerly known as junior second, and now known as class 'B,' to $1,200, and increasing the maximum of class 'A,' corresponding with the former senior second class, to $1,400.

(c) dividing the first class clerkships into divisions 'A' and 'B' with maximum salaries of $1,800 and $1,600, respectively, and increasing the minimum of the first class clerkships from $1,200 to $1,400, and creating a new class of clerks to be known as chief clerks in the city post offices, subject to certain restrictions.

(d) improving the position of office superintendents in city offices, and changing what was formerly a fixed salary of $1,800 to a minimum of $1,800 and a maximum of $2,500.

(e) providing for the employment of temporary clerks in the above named offices for a period of not more than one year, at a fixed salary of $500, and temporary helpers to meet the exigencies of the service at a salary not exceeding $2.50 a day.

(f) increasing the salaries of certain inspectors, assistant inspectors and superintendents of railway mail service in recognition of years of service.

Motion agreed to.

SUPPLY—PASQUA'S INDIAN RESERVE —CLAIMS FOR DAMAGE.

Mr. FIELDING moved that the House go into Committee of Supply.

Mr R. S. LAKE (Qu'Appelle). Mr. Speaker, before you leave the Chair I wish to call the attention of the Minister of the Interior in his capacity as Superintendent General of Indian Affairs to a matter that has been brought to my notice quite recently. It has reference to certain damage done by a fire caused by a steam threshing machine operated by government officials on Pasqua's Indian Reserve, which is situatd near Fort Qu'Appelle, on the 29th of October, 1910. At the time the threshing was taking place the wind was blowing a perfect gale. Practically all the machines in the neighbourhood shut down though another fire was caused by one of the machines which continued threshing that day. The fire, according to my informant, burned the separator, and was allowed to run out over the country, doing damage which was estimated by the North West Mounted Police to amount to between $8,000 and $10,000. Mr. Nichol, the Indian Agent, who at the time was in charge of the machine, was summoned by the North West Mounted Police for allowing the fire to run at large. He appeared before a justice of the peace at Fort Qu'Appelle, and was fined the sum of $25 for the offence. My informant informs me that the inspector of Indian Agencies, Mr. W. M. Graham, took occasion to go through the district and inquire as to the amount of damage which had been caused by the fire which took place after the burning of the machine. It is stated that he made an estimate of the losses, and sent that estimate to Ottawa. Several settlers made application to be reimbursed for the losses they sustained; and the only word they had from Ottawa was to the effect that the department did not consider themselves responsible. Now, it is well known all through the North West that it is a very dangerous thing to continue threshing with a steam threshing outfit when there is a very high wind blowing. On such occasions very few farmers will allow threshing to go on, as the number of accidents that occur from that cause are very numerous; but when such accidents do occur, the responsibility is placed on the owner of the threshing machine to see that all damages which result to the people are paid. In the same neighbourhood as the case I mention a fire starting from a threshing machine of Mr. Guy May got away and burned several bins of wheat and oats belonging to his neighbours, and he had to pay for the damages done. Mr. May had some excuse, perhaps, for threshing on that particular day. It seems that he had only five acres of crop to finish his whole season's work, and on such occasions men will try to finish their threshing. But I am rather at a loss to understand why a government official should consider it necessary to take risks under such circumstances, and to continue threshing on a day on which the wind was so extremely high. The fire in question burned out a number of settlers in the neighbourhood. I have a list of some of them, but not a complete list. Three of those settlers have written to me asking me to try to get the government to consider the losses they have sustained and to reimburse them. It seems to me that when a fire of that sort is caused by the recklessness or carelessness of a government official, the government who employ that official should be in the same position as the owner of a private threshing machine, who in similar cases is required to reimburse those who suffer loss in consequence of his recklessness or neglect. One of my correspondents writes me to this effect:

I have practically lost all my grain and buildings, and it seems strange that I cannot get common justice from the Interior Department, when it was proved that it was their employees who caused it. This is the second time that I have lost grain and buildings by fire from the same cause. I came to Canada from England with a little capital and bought this farm. Now I have nearly lost it all by these fires.

Another man wrote to me that he had lost two-thirds of his crop, which was threshed and in the granaries. Yet another writes about the considerable losses that he sustained. I know that settlers living in the neighbourhood of Indian reserves frequently suffer very seriously from fires which accidently or carelessly start on these reserves. I presume this is due mainly to the fact that there are very few settlers on the reserve, and a very small amount of land is broken up, and the fires get great headway before they are brought under control. In this particular case the fire started from a threshing machine which was being operated by an employee of the government, who was threshing the grain of the Indians. The fire must have been a terrible one because it jumped across both railway tracks at a point where there is a siding and continued unchecked on the other side of the line. I thought it necessary to bring this matter up to-day as rumors are current that the government are likely to move an adjournment or prorogation before very long; and it is only within the last day or two that the facts have come into my possession and the sufferers have asked me to bring this matter up. This fire occurred in the end of last October, and it is very desirable that the payment of damages should not be delayed. If these people have suffered these losses owing to the fault of the government, they should be reimbursed immediately. A great deal of hardship has been inflicted on a number of innocent individuals, and they consequently are perfectly entitled to compensation just as much as they would be, had the fire been set by the owner of a private threshing machine or some one in his employ. I hope the Superintendent General of Indian Affairs (Mr. Oliver) will have the matter looked into and give orders that the government pay whatever damages have been inflicted.

Mr. W. M. MARTIN (Regina). Like my hon. friend from Qu'Appelle (Mr. Lake) I have a good deal of sympathy with the farmers who suffered such severe loss by the prairie fire that started on the Indian reserve. This matter was brought to my attention some two or three months ago, and I at once wrote the Deputy Superintendent General of Indian Affairs. I wrote to him on two or three occasions giving him all the facts. In my opinion, under similar circumstances a private individual who owned that threshing machine would be responsible, because there was evidently negligence on the part of those who were handling it. But unfortunately the government does not stand in the same position as a private individual in respect of damages. On referring to the file in connection with this matter, I find that it was referred by the Indian Department to the Justice Department, and the following opinion was given by the latter:

Sir,—Replying to your letter of the 15th December, 1910, in which you request to be advised whether your department is liable for the claims of various persons for loss of property by fire which originated, it is alleged, from the negligence of those in charge of a threshing outfit on the Qu'Appelle Agency, Saskatchewan, I have the honour to say that I am not aware of any grounds on which your department could be held liable for such negligence, if proven.

There is, therefore, a great difference between the liabilities of a private individual in a case of this kind and the liability of the government. Not having met with much success in the Indian Department, I saw the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Oliver) who took the position that the department did not want to shelter itself behind a technicality of the law, but would be willing to pay damages if they were assessed. The great difficulty, however, even if negligence were proven, lay in the assessing of the damages. Were an action in damages brought against the government in the Exchequer Court it would not succeed; but it is possible that an action against the man who was running the threshing machine—and running it on a day when the wind was so high that it was absolute folly to do so—would hold good; and the Minister of the Interior was good enough on one occasion to suggest that if an action were brought against this man, and he was held responsible, the department would stand behind him, and pay the damages. Of course when a man has had his crop destroyed by fire, the crop is always worth twice as much as he would have realized out of it. The whole difficulty is in the assessment of the damages, and that is the position taken by the department to-day.

Mr. PORTER. I cannot see on what grounds the Deputy Minister of Justice distinguishes between the liability of an individual who is running the machne and the liability of the owner of the machine.

Mr. MARTIN (Regina). The difference is this, that the government cannot be held responsible for wrong done by one of its servants, unless there be some statutory obligation.

Mr. PORTER. That seems to be the opinion of the Deputy Minister of Justice, but upon what authority does he base it? I do not know of any such distinction.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). What is the distinction?

Mr. PORTER. That when the government employs an agent to operate a machine, and that machine causes damages, the agent would be responsible but not the government.

Mr. MARTIN (Regina). On the well known principle that the King can do no wrong.

Mr. LAKE. What practical steps would the Minister of the Interior suggest that these settlers should take? The fire caused a great amount of damages and suffering to these individuals, and that fire was due to the fault of a government employee. I would ask the minister what action these sufferers should take, in order to prove their loss and be paid compensation?

Mr. OLIVER. As my hon. friend from Regina (Mr. Martin) has said, I have had several discussions with him, and the conclusion arrived at was that in order to avoid the difficulty which was stated by the Department of Justice to stand in the way, the parties should take proceedings directly against the individual at fault, who was in charge of the machine, and was also an employee of the government, with the understanding that any damages assessed against him the government will be prepared to pay on getting a vote from parliament. The position is an unfortunate one in which the settler stands at present, but it is one we ourselves cannot avoid, the law being as it is. But by the procedure that I suggest, it seems to me that would be avoided, and the payment of the claim would be a matter of policy which I would recommend the government to recommend to the House and, for which I am sure, the House would provide in due course. I wish it distinctly understood that the department does not wish, as a matter of policy, to avoid the responsibility which would rest upon it if, instead of a department it was an individual and damage had resulted to private citizens from any act for which it is responsible.

The difficulty about settling and awarding damages as a departmental matter must strike any one who gives the subject attention. It is not wise for any branch of the government to undertake to adjudicate over its own matters which, under other circumstances, would be decided on by an action in court. There is room for all sorts of discussion as to motives, and as to the result which would be achieved by such procedure; and it seems to me that, in the interest of both the country on the one hand and of the sufferers on the other hand, the responsibility should be decided by an impartial tribunal, and amount of damages should be assessed by such a tribunal. Such a tribunal, of course, are the courts of the country, if the matter can be brought before them; and it seems to me the matter can be brought before them in the way I suggest. At first, as the House has been informed, the question was asked the Department of Justice: Can we deal with this matter in the ordinary course? We were informed we could not. The matter was then taken up for further consideration with the result I have indicated

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). The principle that the Crown is not responsible for the negligence of its servants has been very largely cut down by legislation in this country, in connection with the operation of the Intercolonial railway and in connection with public works. And I do not think it has been further extended by statute, certainly not so far as I am aware. As to the case to which the minister refers, it is highly probable that the servant guilty of the negligence himself would be liable. But what the minister suggests, I understand, is that action should be brought against him. and then the Crown should take into consideration whether they should pay?

Mr. OLIVER. Yes.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). That does not seem a very satisfactory or definite attitude. In the first place, if these men have suffered damages by the negligence of another person, that damage ought to be made good, even though the person who caused it was a servant of the Crown when he did it. There is no reason why this farmer should be out of pocket by reason of the negligence of another person, simply because that other person happened to be a servant of the Crown. Some person ought to reimburse him; and, if the Crown is disposed to take cognizance of the matter, they ought to say: Go on and make your case against this man who was acting as our servant. and if you make out that he was guilty of negligence in the course of his work, we will see that it is paid, and the cost of the action also. It does not seem to me to be dealing with this farmer in a fair way to say, after he has gone to the trouble and expense of an action against the party: We will take it into consideration.

Mr. OLIVER. I do not wish to be understood as leaving the matter in the position which my hon. friend (Mr. Borden, Halifax) has suggested. But he understands that in my place I cannot bind the government, nor can I bind parliament to vote the money. But I am, on the responsibility of my position, stating what is the policy of the government in this particular case. And, of course, that is binding upon the government so far as its recommendation to parliament is concerned. If we could go further I would be glad to do it, but that is as far as I can go, and I should think it would be satisfactory.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax) If the minister means that the government will submit an estimate to parliament of the amount of damage, that is perfectly satisfactory.

Mr. OLIVER. Yes.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). If I understand he is simply dealing with the technical consideration that he is not able to bind parliament, yet I think the government undertakes to bind parliament with matters of more importance, or rather, not undertakes to bind parliament, but undertakes to submit to parliament and carry through, which is much the same thing.

Mr. PORTER. Might I suggest, as a way out of this difficulty, that if the department is satisfied that this is a case deserving of compensation, and in view of the fact that a collective action could not be brought, but that there would have to be separate or individual action on behalf of every one of these farmers, which would mean great expense, the government, instead of going through the forms of trial in each case, should appoint an assessor to assess the damages for all the farmers and then submit an estimate to parliament to pay these damages. That would avoid the trouble of individual trial. And some of these people may not be in a position to incur the expense of a trial. But if the government, recognizing its liability, would take the course I suggested I think it would overcome the difficulty.

Mr. OLIVER. While the suggestion of my hon. friend (Mr. Porter) could be adopted, I do not think it is wise, as I have already said, either in the interests of the country or in the interests of the claimant, that the amount of the damages should be settled in that way. I am satisfied that my hon. friend (Mr. Bradbury) who sits beside the hon. member for West Hastings (Mr. Porter) will suggest to him that if the government undertook to make an assessment of the damages, the assessment might be varied according to the political predilections of the claimant rather than the merits of the case. I think it is fairer to everybody and in everybody's interest that there should be full opportunity given to have the matter brought to court and tried out in the ordinary way, so that there may be no question about the rights of the country or of the individual being affected by anything but the merits of the case.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Is the negligence admitted?

Mr. OLIVER. No; I forgot to mention that point. There is no actual admission of negligence in the proceedings that have gone forward so far against the man who operated the engine. When the fire took place a summons was issued against the agent of the reserve; he was brought up and pleaded guilty and was fined $25. But the agent was not on the reserve on that day, so that his plea of guilty, while it may have had some merit in some way, did not really bear upon the point, it did not bring the question to an issue. It was a general allegation, and he made a general plea of guilty. But my hon. friend will understand that it was not a satisfactory solution of the question. The question of whether the man who ran the engine was directly responsible, has not really been tried out yet.

Mr. LAKE. Would not the fact that a high gale was blowing at the time be sufficient evidence of negligence? Any one knowing that country would say so.

Mr. OLIVER. That question illustrates my point. Courts exist for the purpose of doing justice between man and man, that is their primary object, and that question was the very question the courts should decide; it should not be a question of the judgment of one of the interested parties.

Mr. BARKER. It seems to me the minister puts the case in this way: There has been damage done to some farmers, and he will not take the trouble to investigate for himself, and ascertain whether the government is responsible, but the proper way is for the courts to decide the question. That is very well for the legal profession, they must have every case fought out in court, with law costs for the plaintiff and law costs for the defendant, and then the government will pay the damages. Why should not the minister inquire into the facts, and if he finds there is negligence why should he call a jury to pass upon it? That question comes up every day with railway companies, and they have to pay. They do not insist upon providing law costs on both sides of the case before they pay. Surely the hon. gentleman can take the trouble to ascertain whether the agent of the government was wrong or not, and if he finds he was wrong he will pay these damages.

Mr. LENNOX. This is one of the special cases in which the minister might depart from what he says is a general rule, and a very good rule. The minister says that as a general rule it is not a good thing for the government to take matters of this kind in hand, and settle them without a lawsuit to establish the liability, and the amount of damages. The minister says he has not actually admitted the liability, and technically he has not. His agent admitted liability, and was fined, but he was not there when the fine occurred, and negligence consequently has not been established. There is the fact, I understand, of a very high gale, and it was negligence to run the machine at all in such a gale. Now, if the minister is satisfied that it is a case in which the government ought to pay these people, he does not need to stand on technicalities. This matter has been before the House and the House I think is of the opinion that there ought to be compensation. Why then have a lawsuit about it? I would suggest that the minister have an investigation to ascertain the facts. Let him appoint a judge to look into this matter. I think there has been sufficient negligence to justify the country in paying these farmers. If the minister thinks that there has been negligence, then he need not refer that point to the judge, but let him refer the question of how much damages in each case was sustained. I would not under such circumstances recommend the minister to refer the question of negligence to the judge, but to ask the judge to take evidence as to the amount of damages. It has been suggested to me that a farmer might recover only $200 or $300. But there are some farmers who cannot bring an action at all, and when the minister is here, and has the whole parliament as his advisers, I think he can act upon their advice and make this an exceptional case.

Mr. MACDONALD. I am at loss to understand how my hon. friend from Simcoe (Mr. Lennox) who is a good lawyer, could undertake to say that he has heard enough about this case to give judgment upon it, and that the minister would be justified in dispensing with the usual preliminaries of legal proceedings before he settles these claims. If the Department of Justice has investigated this matter thoroughly, and has advised that there is no negligence, then there is no right of action.

Mr. LENNOX. I quite agree with the hon. gentleman (Mr. Macdonald) if the facts are as he understands them, that is that the Department of Justice has advised that there is no negligence. I understood that all the Justice Department were consulted about was the question of liability on the technical point as to whether the government were liable for the negligence of their servant, and that they advised they were not. If the Department of Justice took the facts into consideration, and said on the evidence as well as the law that there was no liability it would assume a different position.

Mr. MACDONALD. I have here the letter of Mr. Newcombe, in which he says:

I have the honour to say that I am not aware of any grounds on which your department could be held liable for such negligence, if proven.

The opinion of the Department of Justice upon that question seems to me to close the door as far as the minister is concerned, and the proposition he has made appears to me very reasonable. When dealing with this question of claims, it is all very well to say: It is a good general rule, but we must make an exception. I do not think that, sitting here as members of parliament and hearing the facts presented, ably as they were, by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle, we are able to form a judgment which ought to be arrived at only by a court of competent jurisdiction which could determine whether there was negligence as a matter of fact or within the law. My hon. friends cannot blow hot and cold. We frequently hear them complain that the departments have settled claims by appointing commissioners, but here is a case where the minister takes the course they have advocated. The minister is prepared to treat these gentlemen fairly and to recognize any verdict given in the case after a thorough investigation by a court. That is the proper way to deal with claims, and it is not right to make exceptions.

Mr. BARKER. Would the hon. member say from the papers who paid the fine?

Mr. OLIVER. The fine has not been paid.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Every one understands that the Crown is not liable for the negligence of its servants; we got beyond that an hour ago. The minister was considering what he could do in case negligence was proven by a servant of the Crown, by submitting an estimate to parliament.

Mr. MACDONALD. The question was whether there was any negligence.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I agree for the most part that the Crown should determine these matters by some tribunal. On the other hand if there was a perfectly plain case, if the negligence was so clear that no question of its existence could be raised, it would be of no use to send the matter to the courts, if for instance a man took off his spark arrester in a gale.

Mr. OLIVER. Because it was a windy day it does not follow that negligence is established. My information is that the thresher was working in the shelter of the woods, and for that reason it was believed to be safe. If that is the case, there is sufficient doubt to warrant it being referred to court.

Mr. BRADBURY. In case the courts found there was no negligence, then would the minister do anything to help the farmers, or drop the case? As a matter of equity, the farmers should be compensated.

Mr. SPEAKER. The discussion is very irregular at this stage, and I will have to stop it.

LABOUR CONDITIONS ON THE NATIONAL TRANSCONTINENTAL RAILWAY.

Mr. LENNOX. I wish to call the attention of the Minister of Labour to an item in the Toronto 'News' of Saturday. It is headed:

Robbing Foreign Labourers on the Transcontinental Railway—Startling charges from Port Arthur that stores are used to swindle hard-working foreigners who leave in debt after months of toil.

The article states that labourers are advertised for, $2.50 a day being offered. Upon arrival at the point where they are directed to apply they are told there is no employment. Then whilst they are deliberating, it is suggested to them that not being able to obtain work in the ordinary way at wages, they had better become subcontractors, and that a few of them should band together as subcontractors. They agree and then work for weeks and months, perhaps for six months, under a contractor as subcontractors. During that time, they get their supplies at a small store which belongs to the contractor. These facts are said to have been ascertained by the counsel at Port Arthur, who investigated the matter and obtained a considerable amount of evidence. The 'News' states that it has in its possession a good deal of material upon which to found its article, that these men, after moving solid rock and loose rock and all the rest of it for six months, working harder and longer than they would by the day, and imagining they are making money, finish their contract, their account is made up, they are credited for the work they have done and debited for the supplies they have received, and the result is that they are found not to be entitled to anything but are in debt. It is said that the contractor generally comes to the rescue to the extent, that being anxious to get rid of them he transports them to civilization, adding the cost of their passage to their indebtedness. Thus, having worked for six or seven months very hard, they receive practically no compensation. The "News' says they have copies of these accounts in their possession, and adds:

This is the story which the Port Arthur council will tell to the Labour Department at Ottawa. The story will be substantiated by all the figures, contract forms, &c., of a representative case. The foreigners in the particular case to be submitted to the Labour Department bought ten cakes of rough soap, a very laudable thing to do.

For this soap they were charged ten cents per cake, almost enough to make them cease using that article altogether.

Shovels cost these men at the stores $2.50 each; one sack of potatoes, $4; flour, $6; coarse towels, 80 cents a pair; a tin dipper, $1; jam, $1.05 a pail; dynamite, for two cases, $24; lamp chimneys, 25 cents, and so on through a long list with one overcharge piled upon another.

I hope there will be a thorough investigation into these statements in this newspaper. This is not by any means the first rumour that the workmen are being swindled by the contractors, and if there is found to be any foundation for that rumour, I trust the investigation will be general.

Mr. PORTER. I had a case in court only two weeks ago, the action being between a contractor and three subcontractors and the facts as stated in this newspaper were sworn to by witnesses and corroborated by the accounts produced in court. The contractors took the work at a certain price, re-let to subcontractors, furnished them with supplies and material, and when at the end of the operation a statement of account was asked for, each of the three sub-contractors was found to be in debt rather than having anything to his credit.

Hon. MACKENZIE KING (Minister of Labour). Cases of this kind have been brought to the attention of the department, and on investigation the complaints have been reported to be well founded in some cases and the contractors obliged to redress the grievances, while in other cases there appeared to have been much exaggeration. I have no notice that the particular complaint referred to by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Lennox) has as yet been brought to the attention of the department. I have seen some reference to it in the newspapers, and I had intended having it looked into irrespective of a formal complaint, but as a rule it is advisable that the government should wait until its attention is directed to these difficulties. The government has recognized the necessity of a somewhat closer supervision of these construction camps, and an appropriation has been passed for the appointment of one or two officers whose duty it will be to look into just such cases as this.

Mr. PORTER. I will be pleased to give the minister the names of the contractor and subcontractor in the case I have mentioned.

Motion agreed to, and House went into Committee of Supply.

SUPPLY.

Royal North West Mounted Police—pay of force, $340,000.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. This is the same vote as last year except that the pay of the force is increased by $10,000 and the subsistence by $10,000.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). How many men are there?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Six hundred and forty-nine men, but this vote is estimated for 700 men which we intend to have.

Mr. LAKE What is paid by the two provinces?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Seventy-five thousand dollars each.

Mr. PERLEY. Some of the force lost their lives recently on a trip to the Yukon. I have not been able to understand why they were sent on this journey. Will the Prime Minister explain?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. The policy has been to keep a constant patrol in the remote parts of the Dominion—the Hudson Bay, the mouth of the Mackenzie river, Fort Churchill, Fort McPherson—which patrol carries the mail and gathers information. We have been very lucky up to the present time; this is the first casualty.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Inspector Fitzgerald was a native of Halifax, and had very long and very distinguished service.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Hear, hear.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). The unfortunate fatality is greatly to be regretted. What is the distance between the two posts they were travelling between?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Three hundred and fifty miles from Fort McPherson to Dawson.—Inspector Fitzgerald was a very good officer, and the men under him were good men.

Mr. PERLEY. Do I understand that these men were making the trip in the ordinary discharge of their duty?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Yes.

Mr. LAKE. Can the department say what was the cause of the fatality?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. The diaries kept by the men have been received at Regina and are now on their way to Ottawa. They will give the particulars.

Subsistence, forage, fuel, light, clothing, contingencies, &c., $341,666.67.

Mr. PORTER. Is the number of the force increasing or diminishing?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. It has remained stationary for the last five or six years. We thought at one time that it would be possible to decrease the force, as the provinces might take over their municipal police business. But we find a great reluctance on the part of the settlers in the provinces of Saskatchewan and Alberta to see the force reduced in any way. It is difficult for us to reduce it. We are under contract with the governments of Alberta and Saskatchewan by which they pay us $75,000 each per year for the services of the police. I am afraid we may have to increase the force, because, as settlers go in beyond the limits of the provinces the force has to be extended. Settlement is now going on north of Edmonton in the Peace river and Mackenzie River districts, and I am sure that we shall have to extend the force in those two districts. Whether we shall be able to reduce it I have serious doubts. At the present time the men are distributed as follows: In Alberta, five divisions and ninety-nine detachments; in Saskatchewan, four divisons and eighty-nine detachments; in the Yukon, one division and ten detachments; in the Northwest Territories, one division and five detachments. A division is a settled place in which there is an officer and several men; a detachment consists of one or two or three policemen at a particular point. These men are in the midst of the settlers, ready to give information on almost every point, and to assist them in various ways. For instance, if a settler loses an animal, he goes to a policeman, and the policeman looks after it. If a fire takes place, the settlers go to the police for assistance. In a multitude of ways the police are of great utility to the settlers. Under present circumstances, if any change takes place, it will be in the direction of increasing rather than diminishing the force.

Mr. PORTER. I have heard the force spoken of with great commendation; but in travelling through that country it has occurred to me that as the provinces become more settled, the officers might be more and more transferred to the outlying districts, and in that way the force might be decreased.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I also have travelled in the two provinces, and I have not yet heard it suggested that the force should be diminished at all in either of the provinces. On the contrary, I think it was suggested that if we were to reduce the force which we have in these two provinces, there would be loud protests.

Mr. RHODES. What oath of office, if any, is required from the officers of the force? What I wish to know particularly is, are any aliens employed on the force?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. No, British subjects only.

Mr. LAKE. What is the nature of the oath that a man has to take on enrollment?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. The oath of allegiance, nothing else.

Mr. BRADBURY. I would like to ask the right hon. gentleman what is the number of the patrol at the head of Lake Winnipeg, and what are their duties?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. We have a force stationed at Hudson bay, and in winter time the patrol is from Hudson bay to Lake Winnipeg.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). What is the distribution of the force?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. In the Hudson Bay district, 12 men, no horses, 41 dogs—they are at Churchill and Fullerton; in Athabasca and Mackenzie district, 39 men, 34 horses, 27 dogs; in the Regina district, 192 men, in the Maple Creek district, 39 men; in the Dauphin district, 60 men; in the Battleford district, 38 men; in the Macleod district, 63 men; in the Calgary district, 40 men; in the Prince Albert district 66 men; in the Edmonton district, 51 men; in the Lethbridge district, 12 men. So that the whole force is practically distributed all over the continent, from Macleod near the boundary line up to the mouth of the Mackenzie river, to Hudson bay and Dawson city.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). What particular use is made of the men at Regina, Calgary, Macleod and other cities and large towns?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. The station at Regina is the central station for all the force. At a station like Maple Creek there is an inspector, and a body of men, and there are a certain number of stations throughout the district with one or two or three men at each station, all under the command of and in touch with one officer.

Mr. LAKE. Is the location of the various detachments absolutely in the hands of the commanding officer of the Mounted Police within the area of the two provinces, or do the local governments exercise any control as to the various places where the men shall be located?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. The whole distribution of the force is absolutely in the hands of Commander Perry, the commissioner.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). What I do not quite understand is this: Take Regina, a city of 20,000, and Calgary, a city of 40,000, why should you have detachments of the police there? If there be any place in the Northwest where the people should be able to take care of themselves as in eastern Canada it should be in those large centres. I thoroughly appreciate the very great importance of this force, and the great work it has done, and I am not suggesting that it should be decreased, but I do not understand why we should have a detachment in Regina or Calgary any more than in Ottawa.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. At Regina we have 192 men. Regina is the capital of the province, and a trading post for all the forts. Recruits are brought to Regina and there drilled and prepared for their work. At Calgary we have some 49 men. All these men are not kept in the city of Calgary, but are distributed throughout the district. In the Calgary division there is a certain number of detachments, and the men are distributed throughout the division. We have so many men at Calgary, and so many men at Regina, but these do not cover only each city but the whole radius.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Every one realizes the necessity for this force, and I am not prepared to say that the necessity for it has decreased, or that the force should be decreased, or that it should not be increased. But I would like to know on what principle the government acts in maintaining or not maintaining it in any particular district. Take the district between Regina and the American boundary. You have population pouring in there, the country becoming pretty thickly settled, under what conditions do you take your force away from there and transfer it to some more remote district, less thickly populated?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. The divisions were made long ago. Take the country between Regina and the American boundary, we have a division at Lethbridge, another at Macleod, and another at Calgary. At each of these places we have barracks. We may decrease or increase the number of men at each station according as there may be crime, or fear of raid or invasion by cattle raiders, and the force is increased or decreased at each place according to the judgment of the commissioner. Sometimes we are asked to send a contingent where there is trouble expected on account of a strike. There is no fixed rule as to how the force is to be moved. That is left to the judgment of the officer in charge.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). On what principle do you act in determining that the ordinary civil authorities shall be responsible for the prevention and detection of crime on the one hand, or that the Northwest Mounted Police shall be responsible on the other hand. For instance, about a year ago the posse comitatus of various counties in Ontario or Quebec was employed in chasing half a dozen criminals who roamed through the woods, and finally some of them were captured. It would be very convenient if we had a force of the mounted police to do this, but here it is done by the ordinary civil authorities. How do you get at the proper responsibility when you consider undertaking a duty of that kind?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. When the western provinces were organized we made an agreement with them under which each province pays us $75,000 a year, and we look after the administration of justice. We are at their service, and the Attorney General commands the services of the police when needed.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). The mounted police had in the first instance an authority or initiative. They did not wait for the warrant from the ordinary civil authority, but the inspectors issued warrants and the men served them. Is that initiative still retained?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Yes. When the police were organized the officers were all justices of the peace, and also some of the non-commissioned officers, and they were continued in that capacity by the provincial government, so that there was no conflict.

Mr. PERLEY. If each province paid in proportion to the number of men in it, it would pay a much larger sum than $75,000.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. That is quite possible.

Mr. PORTER. Is it a fact that the Northwest Mounted Police officers do the ordinary police work of the city where located? Take Calgary the city to which the Prime Minister has just referred. I am informed that in that city the Northwest Mounted Police do the ordinary patrol duty of the city.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I understand that at the present time Calgary and Regina have their own city police.

Mr. PORTER. They have some, but it is said that the Northwest Mounted Police perform that duty as well.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I understand that Calgary and Regina have their own police who look after city ordinances. But in case of a crime against the common law, the services of the Northwest Mounted Police may be still required. We are still bound, under our agreement, to act when asked by the Attorney General of the province.

Mr. PERLEY. Was the arrangement with the provinces made for any considerable time?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. For five years.

Mr. PERLEY. From what date?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. We had an arrangement for five years, and we renewed it last year.

Mr. MARTIN (Regina). I would like to substantiate what the Prime Minister has said with regard to the policing of the city of Regina. True, the headquarters of the Mounted Police are located within the town limits of the city of Regina, and usually a large number of policemen are stationed there. I think that there is also a small Mounted Police station maintained there that is absolutely separate from the police organization of the city and maintained for Mounted Police purposes alone. We have our own police organization headed by the chief and with constables under him. I cannot make it too plain that the two organizations are separate and distinct. I had not intended to take part in this discussion, but while I am on my feet I desire to say a word further. Representations have been made to me with regard to the pay given to the constables of the Northwest Mounted Police. I do not speak of the pay given to the officers, but in my opinion the pay given to the constables is not sufficient to induce the best men to go into the Mounted Police, and remain as policemen. We, who come from western Canada know that the cost of living is higher than in the east. I put some question on the Order Paper with respect to the pay of the Mounted Police, and I find that of the constables is from 60 cents to $1 per diem, and a living allowance estimated by the department to be worth $335 per annum. The department estimates the pay of the constables as beginning at $554 and increasing to $700 in the course of five years. That pay is not as much as the ordinary constable is given in the ordinary towns in the province of Saskatchewan, and not by any means as much as the ordinary constable obtains in the city of Regina. I asked if any difficulty had been experienced in the obtaining of recruits, and the reply was that no difficulty is experienced, but the rate of wages in the west induces a number of the best men to purchase their discharge. The reason is that they can obtain better positions by acting as constables in the various towns. It may be a good thing for the Northwest Mounted Police to educate constables for the towns of the west, but unless we give additional pay, as things are, I fear we cannot obtain the best men for the Mounted Police force.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Up to the present time, we have had no difficulty in getting the number of men required, and it is, I believe, the universal testimony that the force is a high class one, and that the quality of the men could not be better. The men start on 60 cents a day and increase gradually until they reach an average sum, with allowance, of $700 a year. My hon. friend (Mr. Martin, Regina) must remember also that when a man has served 20 years in the Royal Northwest Mounted Police he is entitled to a pension. I know of some men who started early in life who served 20 years, and, when a little over 40 had a pension,—which, of course, they had well earned, and which the country did not grudge. I think that, on the whole, with the pay, the allowance, and the pension in addition we have been able to keep the force on a very high footing, indeed. We are exposed to lose men, and we do lose some men, because of the attractions offered to young and vigorous men in the west in business, or farming, or other occupations. But I think the pay is reasonable.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I am glad to hear the Prime Minister say that the standard of the force is kept up. It ought to be kept up, and so far as I am concerned, if it were necessary to increase the pay to keep up the standard of the force, I would not hesitate to support an increase for that purpose.

Mr. LAKE. What is the practice of the department in regard to obtaining supplies? For instance, at the headquarters at Regina a large amount of clothing and provisions must be provided. What is the practice of the department in regard to the matter?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. All supplies are obtained by tender and the order is given to the lowest competitor. This applies to all except 25 per cent; there is a certain amount of small items which, as my hon. friend (Mr. Lake) knows, could not be obtained by tender.

Mr. TAYLOR (Leeds). It is now 11.30, and time to adjourn.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Oh, no. We are just on the eve of working.

Mr. TAYLOR (Leeds). I did not understand that the hon. gentleman wanted much work done. I thought he wanted in bulk—

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. But I do not want to lose my time. There are items I want to put through.

Mr. TAYLOR (Leeds). I thought the arrangement was to give a certain amount in bulk——

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. We shall get a certain amount of bulk, I hope. But surely we are not to lose time?

Mr. TAYLOR (Leeds). There is lots of other work to go on with, to clear the Order Paper.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I hope to do that, but we cannot do it if we stop at 11.30.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). The difficulty is that we do not get very good notice of the work that is coming up. On Friday night we were told that Bills were to be taken up, and after that, railway estimates. Later we were told that militia estimates were to be taken up. Finally, the Prime Minister takes up his own estimates.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. No, the militia estimates were taken up on Friday night. We said that Bills would be taken up in the afternoon and Supply afterwards. We should have gone on with the estimates of the Minister of Railways (Mr. Graham), but that hon. gentleman being confined to his house, I thought that, as I shall be leaving for Great Britain, I would ask my hon. friend to take up my estimates.

Mr. PERLEY. After the House rose on Friday night, I was speaking to the Minister of Agriculture, and he mentioned an item of the Minister of Customs which had already been passed that day, and the Minister of Agriculture said he did not know that item had been passed. So he said: We will take up the estimates of the Minister of Militia on Monday after we get through with Bills.

Mr. TAYLOR (Leeds). There are gentlemen here who are prepared to discuss militia, but some gentlemen who wish to discuss the North West Mounted Police are not here.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Very well, there are some items for pensions on page 45 to which no one will take exception, and we will pass them and then rise.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). What business will be taken up to-morrow.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Bills first, then Trade and Commerce, Customs and Excise.

Some resolutions reported.

On motion of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, House adjourned at 11.36 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

TUESDAY, May 9, 1911.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

FOREST RESERVES AND PARKS.

House again in Committee on Bill (No. 85) respecting forest reserves and parks.—Mr. Oliver.

Hon. FRANK OLIVER (Minister of the Interior). This Bill was before the committee on a previous occasion, when somewhat full explanations were made in regard to it, and a map was laid upon the table which would give, perhaps, a clearer explanation than anything I could say. That map will be laid on the table again in a few minutes. Unless another resumé of the purposes of the Bill is required, I would suggest that it be taken up clause by clause.

Mr. PERLEY. The minister might explain the general purposes of this Bill.

Mr. OLIVER. I have just stated that I explained the Bill at some length on a previous occasion, but if another explanation is required, of course, I can repeat. The Bill is practically a revision of the present Forest Reserves Act. Perhaps the most important feature of it is that which sets apart by statute the eastern slope of the Rocky mountains as a forest reserve. Certain parts of that area are now under reservation. The Rocky Mountains Park, of which Banff is the capital, is a reservation by Act of Parliament—a park reservation, not a forest reserve. The Waterton Lakes reserve is a reserve by Act of parliament. The large area of which Jasper House might be called the capital is under reservation by order in council as a forest park. It is proposed to place the whole of the eastern slope of the Rocky mountains, including these reservations, in the position of a forest reserve, under restrictions as to surface occupation and regulations as to the protection of timber which prevail in regard to all other forest reserves under the present Forest Reserves Act. But this Bill contains a provision which differs from the existing Forest Reserves Act in this—that any portion of the area included in a forest reserve may be placed under the additional restrictions or provisions which would enable that particular area to be used as a park or pleasure resort. These are the two distinctive features of the Bill.

Mr. HERRON. Does the government own all the timber that is going to be protected?

Mr. OLIVER. There may be some small isolated areas taken up by settlers. There are certain small areas which we propose to take out of reservation. On examination it has been found that they do not meet the conditions considered desirable in a forest reserve, and we think the public interest is best served by withdrawing them. Besides the reserves shown on the main map, there are reserves in the railway belt of British Columbia which are shown on another sheet.

Mr. MAGRATH. Is there not a reserve on the American boundary of Alberta? And has not some effort been made to have some other regulations on both sides of the line?

Mr. OLIVER. None that have come to my attention. Any representations that have been made have looked to securing the setting apart of the reservation on our side. With that done, perhaps some question of uniform regulations might come up.

On section 2,—lands in schedule withdrawn from sale and occupancy,

Mr. FOSTER. What area is included in these reserves, and of the total what portion is on the Rocky mountains' slope?

Mr. OLIVER. Under this Bill there are twenty-four reserves, with an aggregate area of 16,760,640 acres, as compared with twenty-one reserves, with an area of 3,379,200 acres under the present Act.

Mr. FOSTER. Within those sections that are set apart and are within these boundaries, are there any private ownerships, leases or anything of that kind?

Mr. OLIVER. There are some mineral claims in this proposed Rocky Mountain reservation, and there may be an occasional settler. But the number of settlers is very limited, and of course their right would have to be dealt with; and there are some timber limits.

Mr. HERRON. As the minister is aware, there are a number of settlers in some of these reserves, and is it the intention of the government to let them remain in peaceful possession where they are now, or to remove them?

Mr. OLIVER. It depends on circumstances. If the settlers have gone upon the reservation after it was declared a reservation, then they are not recognized as having any right, and are subject to summary removal. But if there are settlers now in legitimate occupation of land covered by a reservation at the time the reservation is declared, then of course they are dealt with on the basis of that right, whatever it may be. There is no intention or desire on the part of the government to interfere unduly with any man's right. But if parliament, in its wisdom, sanctions the action of the government in setting apart a certain reservation, and if, in pursuance of the purpose of parliament, it becomes necessary to clear that area of settlers, then of course that clearance must be effected, always having due regard to the value of the rights of the settlers. If a man has a right, and it is the will of parliament that he shall not retain that right, then he must be compensated.

Mr. HAGGART (Winnipeg). I understand these reserves will only be declared as such when this Bill becomes law. There is no declaration of reservation yet, is there?

Mr. OLIVER. These lands will only become a reservation when this Bill becomes law. But there are now a number of reservations under the existing Act which will be included under the terms of this Act when it becomes law. In the territory that is put under this Act, rights existent at the time of the passing of the Act of course must be recognized.

Mr. BRADBURY. Are there any timber limits held under license and abutting on these reserves?

Mr. OLIVER. Yes, there are timber licenses both abutting on the reserve and included in the reserve. The owner of a timber license would be in just the same position as the owner of a mineral right or a surface right. Whatever rights he had he would retain, or else be compensated for them.

Mr. BRADBURY. Do I understand the minister to say that the holder of a timber license may still retain his right in that reservation?

Mr. OLIVER. Yes.

Mr. BRADBURY. These timber licenses will not be expropriated by the government?

Mr. OLIVER. It has not been the policy to expropriate them. Of course we propose to handle the timber question in these reservations when we get to it, and have the means, and we propose to handle the timber question in a more detailed manner than we have yet been able to do. But up to the present time, we have not interfered with the right of limit holders whose limits happen to be included in the various reserves. Of course they are subject to more stringent regulations in regard to preservation from fire than the general regulations governing reserves. So far as they have a proprietary right, we have not interfered and do not propose to interfere with that right.

Mr. FOSTER. Will the minister tell the House how many acres of timber reserves there are in this portion now set off?

Mr. OLIVER. I think I would be safe in saying that the area is the difference between the area of the existing reserve, and the total area of the proposed reserve; that is to say, roughly speaking, the area of the Rocky Mountain forest reserve, if my information is correct, will be about 13,000,000 acres.

Mr. FOSTER. Does the minister mean to say that of this whole reserve of 16,000,000 acres odd, some 13,000,000 acres are already held by timber licensees?

Mr. OLIVER. Oh, no.

Mr. FOSTER. That is the question I asked.

Mr. OLIVER. I could not answer that question offhand. But I would say that the land held by licensees at the present time is not all in proportion the proposed total area.

Mr. FOSTER. Approximately.

Mr. OLIVER. I do not think I could give that just now. The area of this reservation is very large, it includes the whole of the eastern slope of the Rocky Mountains. Therefore, the area that could possibly be timbered under conditions suitable for commercial operations is very small as compared with the total area.

Mr. FOSTER. Has the minister any information which he could give to the House as to the proportion of that which is timbered?

Mr. OLIVER. Not now, but I could get it. We have gone into the matter fully, we have very detailed information, and any question in regard to the area or quantities I can give at a later date.

Mr. FOSTER. What the House ought to have, and what would be useful, is, in the first place, the area which is fairly well timbered, and the area which is not timbered but which is suitable for planting or forestation. These two figures put together would give us the area suitable for forest land. We might have 16,000,000 acres and a very small proportion, or a comparatively large proportion of it, might be land which might be useful for the purpose for which a forest reserve was set apart, namely, that timber may be grown on it, and that all the atmospheric and climatic effects may be gained from it.

Mr. SCHAFFNER. I suppose that these timber licenses were granted before these reserves were set apart?

Mr. OLIVER. Yes.

Mr. SCHAFFNER. Have any been granted since?

Mr. OLIVER. No.

Mr. SCHAFFNER. And will not be?

Mr. OLIVER. And will not be. We do not propose to hold the timber which is in these forest reserves from use, but we propose to inaugurate a policy which will look to the utilization of the timber and to the reforestation or continued forestation of the land. We have not arrived at that point yet but we hope to do so. In a great measure the public requirements are met by the holders of timber licenses inside and outside the forest reserves, but our purpose, in dealing with the timber in the reserves is, first, the economic utilization of the timber which is useful for commercial purposes and, next, the reproduction of timber so that there shall be a continuous supply.

Mr. SCHAFFNER. That puts a little different face upon the question of these timber reserves and rather changes our ideas. What is the primary object that the minister has in mind in setting apart these timber reserves?

Mr. OLIVER. The primary object is to conserve the sources of water supply by the protection and production, or reproduction, of timber or wood around the sources of the water supply. It is to be supposed that the sources are elevated areas, otherwise hills, and, they being elevated areas, are not the most desirable areas for agricultural purposes. We propose to utilize that land which is, under ordinary conditions, either waste or of much lesser value in this work of conserving the water supply, and at the same time to reproduce the timber growth for the benefit of the dwellers on the prairies surrounding these areas.

Mr. SCHAFFNER. I understand that the primary object in setting apart these reserves is to conserve moisture and rainfall. What idea can the minister have in his mind when he wants to utilize the timber that is at present growing on these reserves? The minister must not lose sight of the fact that if this timber is once utilized it will be very difficult if not impossible to reproduce it. I think that the minister will agree with me that that will be the result in the case of most of these reserves. If what the minister has stated is the primary object, it seems to me that it is not good policy that this timber should be utilized, and that he should depend upon the reproduction of the timber for the purpose of conserving moisture. I cannot see what good object the minister has in his mind.

Mr. OLIVER. Of course, we are quite aware that we cannot eat our cake and have it too, that we cannot take coal out of a coal mine and still have the coal mine; but we do know that we can grow wheat on a certain area one year, harvest the crop, grow wheat again on that same area next year and continue the process indefinitely. So, by the present existence of forest growth and the proved adaptability of the area to the growth of forest trees, we have hoped and we believe, judging from the experience of other countries, that we will be in a position to harvest our crop of timber and reproduce that crop.

Mr. SCHAFFNER. How long does it take to reproduce average kinds of timber? I assume that it takes some years anyway.

Mr. OLIVER. It depends upon the kind of timber. Poplar will reproduce in fifteen or twenty years, spruce takes much longer and other kinds of timber will take a still longer time. I am not suggesting that we can harvest our crop this year and again harvest another crop next year. We have to take it according to the term of years that intervenes before the next crop will be matured, but still I believe it is possible to harvest those trees in the forest which have attained their maturity, or their reasonable maturity, leaving the trees which have not yet attained that maturity to be harvested within a few years after that when they shall have attained their maturity. With a tree, as with an animal, or with any crop, up to a certain period of its life, its growth will be faster than at any other period, so that, after having arrived at a certain period in life, whether it be an animal or a tree, the growth will be very slight. We believe that when a tree has arrived at the period when its growth has done its quickest work in the production of timber, that is the time to harvest the crop and leave room for the neighbouring tree also to come up to that standard of growth. That is the theory of forestry as I understand it.

Mr. SCHAFFNER. The minister has undertaken quite an important work, and he will require to use a very great deal of judgment as to which of the reserves he shall utilize in the manner he has stated. Certainly none of the reserves on the prairie can be utilized in that way. I have brought the question of our own Turtle Mountain reserve before the House on several occasions, but I shall not say anything particularly with regard to it to-day. I may say that the policy of the minister in retaining these timber areas for the purpose of conserving moisture is a very laudable one, indeed, and one to which governments might long ago have given their attention with beneficial results, but I am not much in favour of a policy of destroying the timber on these reserves, and depending upon the reproduction of the forest growth. I think the minister will have to use a great deal of judgment in deciding as to what timber he shall destroy. What he says about the life of a tree, and the life of a man is all very well, but the comparison does not extend any great distance. I repeat, that it will require a great deal of judgment as to what timber shall be destroyed in the expectation that it will reproduce itself.

Mr. OLIVER. I quite appreciate everything that my hon. friend has said, and I may say that we are hastening slowly in this matter. We are studying the conditions as they exist in our own country. We have a vast mass of information with regard to forestry, and forest reproduction in other countries. What applies in other countries may not apply in our own, and for that reason we are studying the question very carefully to see what the possibilities are. We hope that we will be able to work out a system such as they have adopted in other countries of harvesting our crop, and still having another crop to harvest, all the while protecting the sources of water supply as they can only be protected by some measure of forest growth. We must always recognize that timber in our own western country is of special value. It is worth so much per thousand feet, but it is worth a great deal more than any actual economic value in the settlement of the country. While it is desirable that we should see that the sources of our water supplies are preserved it would not be possible for the government—at least I do not think it would be possible—to sit tight and say: We will not allow this timber to be utilized. I know that in order to meet public opinion, even if we had no other reason, we would have to provide for the utilization of the timber as it reached the point when it was most useful as a commercial article.

Mr. SCHAFFNER. Will it be your object to select only timber which has fully matured, leaving the younger timber an opportunity to grow? License holders will not be allowed to cut down acre after acre of timber, young and old.

Mr. OLIVER. That is absolutely our policy, that is the ideal we are working to, but of course we have to meet the immediate pressure of public opinion, of the settler who wants wood and wants building logs. We are at the same time doing our best to consider the proper conservation and reproduction of the timber. I want to assure my hon. friend that the idea he has expressed is exactly the object of our administration of the forestry branch.

Mr. BRADBURY. That is a very old clause in the timber limits, there has been such a provision for the last 30 years, that no timber shall be taken below a certain size. How much of this area is now held under license by timber men, how much has been operated and who are the licensees in each reserve?

Mr. OLIVER. As I said to the hon. member for North Toronto, I have not that information under my hand, but we have it in the department and I shall produce the figures within a day or two.

Mr. BRADBURY. In case of a man holding a timber license in the area which you are including in the reserve, does he contribute anything towards the protection of his timber?

Mr. OLIVER. Certainly, limit holders under any circumstances, must pay a share of the cost of fire protection.

Mr. BRADBURY. Nothing special is added for the protection when the area is taken within the park?

Mr. OLIVER. No, the limit holder does not ask to have his timber included in the forest reserve, and I do not see that we would be justified in placing him under any penalty because of our adopting this policy.

Mr. BRADBURY. What inspection is provided to insure the carrying out of the regulations as to the size of timber to be cut and the protection of the reserves from fire by the removal of brush from the cutting of the timber? The regulations under which they are allowed to operate in the reserve ought to be stringent and strictly enforced.

Mr. OLIVER. It is the intention and policy of the department, to see that the cutting of timber inside the forest reserves is done in conformity, not only with the license that has been issued, but also with our general regulations for cutting timber within forest reserves. We pay men to enforce those regulations, and if they do not do their duty they ought to be fired.

Mr. BRADBURY. Is there any provision for replanting areas that have been cut over, or are the government simply protecting the younger trees that are left growing? More timber has been destroyed in Canada than has been used by the people, and the fires which have caused this destruction are often caused by brush left on the ground that has been cut over. Are the government providing for the protection of this timber by having the brush removed or destroyed?

Mr. OLIVER. The cutting within the reserves is expected to be done under the special regulations which are applicable to the forest reserves. We have not entered upon a policy of replanting in the areas that have been cut over. So far, we have contented ourselves with providing as well as we may for the opportunity of the younger growth to develop and for its protection. We have made some small experimental efforts in seeding and planting, but the committee will understand that with 16,000,000 acres of forest reserves, the resources of Canada are not adequate to undertake a general policy of reforestation.

Mr. HAGGART (Winnipeg). This is legislation in the right direction which will have the sympathy of every member in this House. I suppose that the details of the regulations for the prevention of destruction and for reforestation will be the subject of the rules and regulations that may be made from time to time by the department?

Mr. OLIVER. Yes.

Mr. HERRON. When the Waterton Lakes Reserve was set apart I understood that it was the policy of the government to set apart a townsite within the reserve. Is that still the intention? Will the government survey a townsite, and by lease or in any other way give outsiders an opportunity of going in to establish a town or places of business and recreation within the limits of the reserve?

Mr. OLIVER. The case of the Waterton lakes reserve is one of the cases not provided for in the existing Act which we hope to provide for in the present Bill. The Waterton reserve is a forest reserve, the primary purpose of which is to preserve the timber growth and prevent occupation by people. Under the present Bill we propose to take power to withdraw or cut out of any forest reserve any certain area to be brought under proper regulations for occupation. Under the present Act we are not legislatively empowered to deal with the Waterton reserve or with other like reserves as they require to be dealt with if used for purposes of recreation; but under the present Bill we shall have full authority to set apart a portion of a reserve as a place of recreation, and deal with it as may seem best. My hon. friend said something as to places of business. It may as well be understood at the beginning that it is not proposed that these parts of reserves set apart for purposes of recreation shall be primarily places of business. There will be no business there except such as is absolutely necessary for the recreation of the people. That is the principle that is embodied in the Bill.

Mr. HERRON. I wish specially to urge on the minister that provision be made for settlers to have access to a portion of the timber at all times. I refer particularly to the dry or half-dead timber. It is hard to make regulations which would be just to everybody, but I think there might be more liberal regulations with regard to that than we have had in the past. I think the minister might make provision for the removal of dry timber up to a certain size for firewood and building purposes. It would be an advantage not only to the homes of the country, but to the timber area, to have it cleared of dry timber, which is liable to cause fire and to make it spread. I would like to know what the minister proposes in that regard.

Mr. OLIVER. I cannot at the present time give my hon. friend the details of our regulations; but we quite appreciate the desirability of getting rid of the dry timber. At the same time, we have to use a certain amount of care in giving people permission to enter a reserve and take timber. As between the two objects we have in view, the preservation of the good timber and the useful application of the dead timber, I want my hon. friend to understand that the Department of Forestry has quite a busy time. It is our desire to have the timber which has reached its growth, even if it is not killed by fire, but all the more if it is, utilized as freely as possible, always having regard to the proper protection of the timber generally.

Mr. HERRON. While I would strongly recommend liberal regulations in that regard, I am aware that it is often overdone. There are many cases in which settlers unduly draw away timber without making a proper use of it, at great loss to their neighbours. So that while I would recommend liberal regulations, I would also recommend that the department see to it that those who are over-zealous do not get more than their fair share.

Mr. GORDON (Nipissing). I am sorry to have to differ a little with my hon. friend from Macleod (Mr. Herron); but if such a regulation were enforced, there would be great danger of there being more dry timber to handle than there is at present. I also am in favour of giving the settlers every possible advantage, but I would rather provide for them getting green timber, for the simple reason that I think it would be putting a premium upon unscrupulous people seeing that they always have dry timber ahead.

Mr. OLIVER. That is one of the difficulties of the situation, and the department is very well versed in the different sides of the question. As a settler myself, I have had to fight the government of Canada for the right to cut timber, and I have backed other people in doing so. Nobody appreciates the value to the settler of the right to cut timber for his own use, and nobody will go further to protect him in that than I will. On the other hand, the wisdom of the country, as expressed by parliament, is that the timber shall be protected, that certain laws shall be enforced, and it is my duty loyally to carry out that expressed will. I put the matter frankly before the House, and only say that the situation is very delicate and very difficult, but we bring to the discharge of the responsibility the best information we have and the best good-will both to the settler and to the wisdom of parliament in declaring the reserve.

Mr. GORDON (Nipissing). Something has been said about reforestation. In my opinion too much is said on that subject. What this government and other governments which control timber should emphasize the most, and what they emphasize the least, is the preservation of the small timber. If the small timber of the country had the protection which it should have, until such times as the country is in a position to spend more money for reforestation than it is at present, the better it would be for the country. In many parts of the country the small timber is not marketable, but it has probably taken fifty or seventy-five years to grow. This is the timber which should be protected, and the more we do in the line of protecting that timber and the sooner the department gets down to that basis, the sooner posterity will reap the benefit.

Mr. HERRON. After this Bill passes, and a forest reserve is set aside, what steps are to be taken to increase the park reserve in the forest reserves. On whose recommendation will that be done? Are the local governments to be consulted with reference to setting aside park reserves or game reserves? There is a reserve close to the boundary line, which, if protected, would be a great place for shooting big game, such as bears, and mountain sheep, and goats. I hope that a large portion of this forest reserve will be set aside as a game or park reserve for that purpose. Will the local governments be consulted?

Mr. OLIVER. All forest reserves are game preserves under this Act, that is to say, so far as the jurisdiction of the Dominion government extends. It is our intention to patrol these reserves, and exercise our rights of proprietorship in the protection of game. We of course will have to come to an arrangement with the provincial governments regarding any general law concerning game, and that we hope to do as the occasion arises. As regards the setting apart of areas within the forest reserves as park reserves, it will not be necessary to consult any particular person or government. Whenever it appears to the department that the need exists, it will be within the rights of the department to make a recommendation to council setting apart a certain area as a park reserve and bringing it under direct regulations which will make that particular area available to the public as a pleasure resort.

On section 4,

The said reserves shall, subject to the direction of the Minister of the Interior, be under control and management of the director of forestry or such other person as is from time to time selected for that purpose by the Governor in Council.

Mr. FOSTER. What powers does the minister propose to give to the director? Does he propose just to work this as a department?

Mr. OLIVER. Yes.

Mr. FOSTER. And the director of forestry becomes simply a clerk in the department?

Mr. OLIVER. Yes.

Mr. FOSTER. Is there any mutuality of advice and consultation outside of the department between the management of these reserves and the Forestry Conservation Commission?

Mr. OLIVER. There is no direct connection. Of course all the information which the Conservation Commission collects regarding forestry work in all the provinces, and in other countries as well will be available to the forestry branch of the Interior Department just as all the information of the forestry branch is available to the Conservation Commission.

Mr. FOSTER. So that practically it will be under the system of patronage the same as every other department of the government. Will the Civil Service Act apply to the officers of the forestry branch?

Mr. OLIVER. To those who are in the city of Ottawa, of course it will, but until the Civil Service Act is made to apply to the outside service, it will not apply to those outside.

Mr. HERRON. Will the hon. minister allow any further homestead entries within the bounds of these reserves?

Mr. OLIVER. No.

Mr. HERRON. Will stock be allowed to graze within the areas contained in these forest reserves? Has any complaint been made to the minister personally with reference to sheep being driven into that locality under consideration?

Mr. OLIVER. As set out very clearly in clause 2, there will be no homestead entries within the forest reserves. There will be no ownership, no alienation of surface rights. With regard to grazing, it is contemplated that grazing will be allowed within a forest reserve, where it is thought that such a right may be granted without prejudice to the special purpose of the growth of timber. We have not yet, however, arranged any policy in that connection. Complaints have come to my personal attention that too many sheep were being driven into the foothills for grazing, but I have also had demands from the owners of the sheep to be allowed to drive them into the foothills for that purpose. That is one of the nice little questions in the same class as the question of settlers timber, and a good many others. There are two sides to it, and each one thinks that his side is the only one. My hon. friend may be sure that the men who do not want the sheep among the foothills, and those who do, can be depended on to bring their claims and alleged rights to the attention of the Interior Department.

Mr. GOODEVE. Under what authority are these licenses for sheep grazing granted and what regulations are proposed?

Mr. OLIVER. We have not yet decided upon any regulation regarding grazing within these park reserves. Sheep at present have no right to graze within the area covered by this Bill. Under the law certain portions of the prairie country are set apart as sheep grazing areas, and sheep are allowed to graze on public lands within these areas, but none of them are in the Rocky Mountain district. Any sheep grazing in the mountain or foothills are outside the protection of the law.

Mr. GOODEVE. Is there anything in the Act to provide a certain section in which sheep can be allowed to graze?

Mr. OLIVER. It will be in the right of the minister or the Governor in Council to provide regulations under which, if it is thought wise, sheep may be allowed to graze within that area. As I have said, no decision has yet been reached. We do not feel that we have enough information on the subject to warrant us in formulating a policy as to grazing within that area. But once the Bill is passed, if it is passed, we will undertake, of course, to go into the matter very fully and decide what is to be done.

Mr. GOODEVE. Is it only by order in council that certain areas may be used for sheep grazing? As I understand it there is no authority given in this Bill to allow the department to use these as sheep grazing areas. I would like to know where the minister has his contemplated authority.

Mr. OLIVER. In section 16, subsection (b). The word 'cattle' is used there, but I am under the impression that for the purposes of the law, sheep would be included under that term.

Mr. GOODEVE. Then, I will leave the discussion of that until we come to the section referred to. I consider it very important, if the minister so understands it, that the matter should be carefully considered in this House. Speaking for myself, I have very strong objections to leaving with the minister or the Governor in Council such powers as these. It is a great liberty for the minister to exercise, to say who shall and who shall not use the public domain for his individual advantage. What I claim is that regulations of that kind should be general and every man should have an equal right.

Mr. OLIVER. The objection of my hon. friend (Mr. Goodeve) does not lie especially against this Bill, but against all the law regarding the administration of land in all the three prairie provinces, for, at the present time, the disposition of grazing rights is a matter of regulation by the Governor in Council throughout the total area. This Bill does not change the existing conditions, but merely carries it on.

Mr. GOODEVE. That is the reason I asked my first question, as to whether the government would have this right under the present Bill. Apparently, according to the minister, we are giving him that right. It is to guard against it that I raised the question, but, as it does not come under this clause, I will reserve further discussion on the matter.

Mr. SPROULE. What does the government propose to do with timber leases within the territory covered by this Bill? One method of granting these rights was what might fairly be regarded as a perpetual lease, which I think is a radically wrong principle. There was a provision in the lease to the effect that the lease should be renewable from year to year as long as there was merchantable timber standing on the tract. It is only necessary, then, for the holder of the limit to leave a few trees of merchantable timber here and there to secure a renewal of his lease. Is there any provision either in this Bill, or elsewhere that would enable the government to cancel that lease? In most of the leases it provides that if the land is needed for settlement it may be taken, but I am not sure that there is such a provision in the leases to which I have referred. If part of these areas is covered by leases of that kind, what does the government propose to do with them?

Mr. OLIVER. As I have already said, it is not the intention of the government to interfere with rights existing at the time of the inclusion of a certain area within a forest reserve. If a man has a homestead right, he holds it—even if he is a squatter before survey, he holds his right. And the timber-limit holder keeps his rights to his limit as if the reserve had not been created, with this difference, that under the Act, in the handling of his business on his limit he must conform to the special regulations which the government considers it desirable to enforce within the forest reserve. Otherwise, there is no interference or intention of interference with the rights held by a party before the reserve was made.

Mr. SPROULE. I understood that the government contemplated taking over some of these timber reserves and converting them into parks. That is what we were told in the discussion of a Bill some years ago, and I presume that there would be a similar clause in this Bill. Is it the intention of the government to take over any of these old timber reserves and keep them for park purposes, allowing no cutting of timber to go on?

Mr. OLIVER. We have no present intention of interfering with licensees beyond the point I have mentioned—to require them to conform the conduct of their affairs on the limit to the regulations of the reserve. We do not desire to interfere with what may be called their vested rights. If we did, it would simply mean a burden upon the public treasury, which, at the present time, with so many responsibilities in connection with forest reserves we hardly think we would be warranted in imposing.

Mr. TURRIFF. One word with reference to the point raised by the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) that the license holder by leaving a few trees on a limit or part of a limit could make his lease perpetual. I may say that there is also a clause which says that the department may give the licensee notice with regard to any portion of the reserve on which there is only a little timber that he must take the timber off within a specified time. This done, the government has the right to withdraw it. So, the licensee cannot retain the lease of an area on which there is practically no timber if the department does not wish him to retain it.

Mr. SPROULE. I remember putting the question directly when these were under consideration before, and the answer I got from the government was that as long as there was merchantable timber there they could not cancel the lease, making it practically perpetual. I think such a lease is one of the most absurd business transactions a government could perpetrate, to the injury of the people. We have example after example in the province of Ontario of leases given thirty, forty and fifty years ago; the original leaseholders have died and the family own them still, practically holding them for ever. Timber has gone up in value six or seven times, but the royalty to the Crown is just the same as it was forty or fifty years ago. I regard it as piracy, it is little less than highway robbery of the people's property, and it is improper and wrong for any government or Governor in Council to grant leases in that way. There are leases in that country, according to the interpretation of that law by good lawyers in this House, grazing leases, held practically forever. There are timber licenses which will be held practically forever, as long as there is merchantable timber on the land. That any government should give leases of that kind is contrary to reason and common sense.

On section 5,

Mr. GOODEVE. Is it the intention of the minister to appoint as forest rangers men having certain qualifications and technical training? This section leaves it optional with the minister.

Mr. OLIVER. It leaves it optional, and I do not know that we can make it any better. What is wanted is a man who knows when a fire starts and knows how to stop it. If we can get such a man, who is willing to do the best that is in him, we are doing as well as it is possible to do. The country is getting good service from such men. Our difficulty is to find such men, even without any restrictions. Under the present circumstances, the less restriction there is upon our freedom of appointment, the better men we are likely to get.

Mr. GOODEVE. Nearly all the universities in the country have forestry departments, and are turning out trained foresters. It would be a great advantage to the government to have as forest rangers men who have some knowledge and training in the science of forestry. A man may have ever so good an intention, he may be honest and all that, and yet be of little service as a firefighter because of lack of training. In certain conditions in our forests, a man requires to have a considerable amount of knowledge to be a good fire fighter.

On section 11: Act does not apply to land to which Crown has no title.

Mr. SPROULE. There is no provision that enables you to take this land if it has not become denuded. If the leaseholder does not see fit to take off the standing, merchantable timber, he can hold it as long as he wishes. The annual growth of timber would cover a very heavy rate of interest on the money invested, even if he held it for a hundred years.

Mr. OLIVER. It is not the purpose of this Bill to interfere with existing rights. If we undertook to interfere with vested rights we would raise a great many questions which are not pertinent to the purpose in hand, and are not now to be dealt with in this Bill. We have carefully avoided raising that issue. The policy or impolicy of the granting of the original form of license is not a matter that necessarily comes into this Bill. We take the licenses as we find them and we do not interfere with the rights under them.

Mr. SPROULE. You take power to expropriate in several clauses.

On section 12: timber licenses.

Mr. FOSTER. Has the minister thought about extending that to officials in the department?

Mr. OLIVER. I do not understand the point.

Mr. FOSTER. It refers to the purchase of timber, does it not?

Mr. OLIVER. No.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. Is not section 12 inconsistent with section 10? Section 10 says that:

> The Governor in Council may secure from the holder of any title to or interest in any land within the limits of a forest reserve a waiver in writing, &c.

Mr. SPROULE. And section 7 as well.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. Section 12 says that the Governor in Council may not.

> Neither the Governor in Council nor the minister * * is authorized * * to expropriate.

Also, as my hon. friend from East Grey (Mr. Sproule) points out, section 7 gives power to expropriate any land in the reserve. Standing timber is, in law, considered land, and, therefore, would come within section 10.

Mr. OLIVER. My hon. friend is in error. Section 10 is provided for the case where certain land is owned within a reserve and by reason of it being owned outside of the Crown any regulation which the Crown might make with regard to the protection of game would not apply on that particular area. It is merely to provide for the effective enforcement of any game protection that the Dominion might see fit to inaugurate within the limits of a reserve provided an arrangement can be made with the private holders, as section 10 contemplates. It might easily be that the government could not arrange with a private owner to dispose of his actual right and yet might make an arrangement to provide for a waiving of his right in so far as game protection is concerned and allow of effective protection throughout the entire reserve. This has no connection whatever with the abrogation of proprietary rights. Section 12 is a provision that was inserted in the present Act at the suggestion of my hon. friends opposite who rather thought at that time that there might be a possibility that the extraordinary powers of acquirement which are given to the Governor in Council might be used to the undue advantage of the owners of timber limits, and a provision was put in to say that the rights of limit holders should not be acquired. I hardly think that the section is necessary, but we simply preserve it in this Bill, as it was in the original. We have no objection to its being there, as we do not think it would be a wise policy to undertake to acquire these timber limits. We had not that in contemplation when we framed this Bill, and therefore, we preserved this section in the Bill.

Mr. SPROULE. In reference to the protection of game, does the minister contend that a private owner has the right to say we shall not protect game if we are so disposed?

Mr. OLIVER. Yes.

Mr. SPROULE. If I understood him correctly, he said that provided the Governor in Council thought it desirable to protect game the carrying out of that policy is subject to the rights that a private individual possesses. How does a private person become possessed of the right to control game under a timber license or a grazing license?

Mr. OLIVER. We are not thinking of those cases so much as of the fact that the Hudson Bay Company own two sections in every township within these forest reserves and they have not disposed of their right. They may not be willing to dispose of their right at the present time but they possibly might be willing to waive their right with regard to the game in order that the protection that we might establish in the reserve would be efficient Otherwise, owning these sections of land, they could, in spite of this government, so long as they were in compliance with the law of the province, lease shooting rights or do anything else they pleased upon these areas, and, therefore, could set at naught our efforts for the special protection of game within these reserves.

Mr. SPROULE. How could the Hudson's Bay Company do that any more than a private individual could?

Mr. OLIVER. Any private individual who owned the title to his land, if it were included within a forest reserve, could say to us, when we undertook to make a special arrangement with him for the protection of game. I am subject to the laws of the province in regard to game, I am not subject to any guardianship of yours, I do not know you in the transaction, this is my land, I treat the game on the land as my property and I will not allow you to interfere with it. We have made this provision, so that, while we would not expect possibly to make such an arrangement with a small private holder, we have thought that probably we could make such an arrangement with the Hudson Bay Company.

Mr. SPROULE. It appears to me to be an anomaly, that might be very awkward to handle in the future, to draw a distinction between a private owner in observing the game laws and the Hudson Bay Company, allowing one to ignore the law and compelling the other to observe it. We have regulations with regard to game in that country, have we not, under the Land Act?

Mr. OLIVER. The province legislates with regard to the protection of game. As proprietors of the land we have the right to deal with the game on that land, but we have not the right to legislate generally speaking with regard to game except upon our own land. We have no right to legislate with regard to game on another man's land.

Mr. SPROULE. I always thought that the laws that we had regarding game applied to all land held by the Crown as well as land held by the Hudson Bay Company. I did not understand there was any distinction; my idea was that if you made a law to protect game, it protected the game whether on a Hudson Bay lot or on a government lot, so long as the government had the constitutional right to make the law, and so with the provinces within their sphere.

Mr. OLIVER. The Dominion has not a constitutional right to make a game law applicable to any property except what the Dominion owns. The province has a right to make a game law which applies to all land, including Dominion land, so that when parties own land within the area of a reserve in which we desire especially to protect game and exercise our rights as proprietors it is quite clear that those who have a proprietary right as against us, are not under our regulations.

Mr. SPROULE. You have control of all territory not coming under the control of the provinces. If in that territory you pass a law providing a close season for prairie chickens, that would apply to all land whether owned by the Hudson Bay Company or any one else.

On section 13, protection from fire along railways under construction.

Mr. OLIVER. This section is extraordinary in its character. It is not properly a part of the Forest Reserves Act, but as it is a matter that would come under the Forestry administration and is intimately related to the protection of forests, it was thought well to introduce it into the Act. The section here given is an amendment of a corresponding section in the existing Act, the difference being that in the present Bill we make the section applicable to railways in operation, while in the existing Act it applies only to railroads under construction. I wish to withdraw section 13, and to substitute section 10 of the present Act, which applies only to railroads under construction. In the amendments to the Railway Act recently introduced by the Minister of Railways (Mr. Graham) provision was made for the control by the Railway Commission of the protection from fire along all railway lines in operation. When this Bill was drafted that provision had not been made, but as that provision is to be incorporated in the Railway Act I think it advisable that this section should be withdrawn.

Mr. PERLEY. I understand the present Act applies to Dominion lands which have been erected into forest reserves. It might be wiser for this government to have a special clause in this Bill, with reference to railways in operation, which would be different from the clause which the Minister of Railways would put in force against all the railways in the country; in other words, a railway going through a forest reserve might well be subjected to more stringent conditions in reference to fire protection than a railway in the ordinary country.

Mr. OLIVER. Since this matter has been taken up and the responsibility is distinctly placed upon the railway company to guard against the setting of fires, there is no greater necessity for precautions where the railway runs through a forest reserve than where it runs through valuable private property. I think that the special protection which is adequate in the one case is adequate in the other. I think it is better to leave the matter as it is in the Railway Act with the provision in this Act that is now the law in reference to railways within forest reserves. I have a further amendment which I would like to propose if the House agrees to the new section 13.

Mr. PERLEY. What are the provisions in the amendment to the Railway Act with reference to railways in operation through forest reserves?

Mr. OLIVER. The Bill is before the House and I am not absolutely familiar with its terms. The main point is that the railway companies are themselves required to pay for the patrolling of their own lines in operation.

Mr. PERLEY. The entire cost?

Mr. OLIVER. I cannot say whether they pay the entire cost or only half the cost. But they have to pay for the patrolling of their own line in operation, whether inside of a forest reserve or outside.

Mr. SCHAFFNER. In this connection I wish to make a few remarks in regard to fires on these reserves. I think the minister will agree with me that one of the most difficult things to contend with in connection with these reserves is their protection from fire. There should be some better method of protecting them, in the interest not only of the reserves themselves, but of adjacent property. I think the minister said it was possible for the department to control the game reserves in these forest reserves. That may be, but I think it would be better for the department in that respect to work in harmony with the provincial governments, who control the game reserves. Fires are often caused on these reserves by hunters. Nearly every year the Turtle Mountain reserve is burned over. Last fall a fire started on this reserve and extended to the private property of a poor man named Balfour, of Bannerman, and destroyed everything he had, including 100 tons of hay, his house and other property. The matter is before the department; I do not know whether it has come to the notice of the minister himself or not. We had a somewhat parallel case before the House last night, in regard to a fire caused by a threshing engine. It was considered that because that fire extended beyond the limits of the Indian reserve, the government was liable for the damage done to private property, and would be willing to pay it. I think the same thing applies to this case. This man's property was destroyed from a fire which originated in the Turtle Mountain timber reserve. I ask that an investigation be made as to the origin of the fire, and the extent to which it destroyed private property, and if the minister finds that the fire originated on the property of the government, and extended to this poor man's property, he should be compensated for the damage done.

Mr. OLIVER. The case mentioned by my hon. friend is hardly parallel with that which was under discussion last night. In that case the allegation was that the fire and the resulting damage was due to the carelessness of an employee of the government, and therefore, as in the case of a private individual there would be a legal responsibility, if the government had a similar responsibility it should not avoid paying the cost. In the case mentioned by my hon. friend, it is not alleged that the fire was due to the carelessness of an employee of the government. It merely started on government property. I think we had very much better go out of the forest reserve business, and go out of it quickly than to assume the responsibility for every fire that might start on any one of these reserves. I think that would be assuming a responsibility altogether beyond the strength of the Dominion government to carry.

Mr. SCHAFFNER. If these prairie reserves were fenced, and were leased for grazing purposes, I believe the danger from fire would be greatly obviated. Every year a large amount of grass grows on these reserves, and in the summer it becomes dry and forms a great fuel for fire. If cattle were allowed to graze on the reserve, it would be a benefit to the farmers, and be at the same time a great protection from fire.

Mr. OLIVER. That view of the case has been presented, and we hope to try it out very shortly, and I think the reserve my hon. friend mentions is one we have particularly in mind. Of course, our experiment may not be successful; it may be found that the cattle will destrov the young growth. Representations have been made to us that the grazing of the cattle would be a protection from fire, and would not injure the young growth. At any rate, we hope to try the experiment on a small scale before long.

Mr. PERLEY. The Railway Bill to which the minister refers does not seem to be printed yet. I have not seen the amendment, but I doubt if it extends to five miles on each side of the track; it is probable that it refers only to the right of way. While I agree with the minister that private timber is as worthy of protection as government timber, at the same time this parliament has special interest in protecting its own timber, and these forest reserves, I understand, are especially necessary on account of the watersheds. The whole reason for setting the Rocky Mountain park on the eastern slope aside as a forest reserve is to protect the rivers of the hon. minister's own province, so that this parliament has a special interest in protecting the timber in that section. It would be a national disaster if that timber should be burnt. Even if the railway companies are to pay compensation in case of damages, that would by no means make up for the national loss should there be a big fire. While this section provides for taking care of the timber, and while the railways are to provide certain protection for five miles on either side of the track, my impression is that the Railway Act will not go that far. I submit to the minister, if he wants to keep the timber on the eastern slope of the Rockies, that it would be better to have some special provision more stringent and extending a greater distance from the railway than the Minister of Railways probably thinks advisable.

Mr. OLIVER. I am under the impression that when we have laid upon the railway companies, as the Minister of Railways proposes, the burden of patrolling all their lines in operation, we are asking as much as is fair from them, and it is for us to take efficient measures for the protection of the property of the Crown at the distance my hon. friend suggests. We only propose this measure not knowing what is to be included in the Railway Act. I desire that the railway companies shall bear a fair share of the burden of fire protection because certainly they are the most incorrigible and persistent fire setters, but I do not wish to be unfair to them. We lay the burden upon the railway corporations very strongly under this Bill during construction. Then during operation, I think that the Board of Railway Commissioners is really the proper authority to have control, and I would prefer to leave the matter in that way for the present. I propose, however, to add another clause to read as follows:

Every fire-ranger appointed to patrol a line of railway under construction or in operation shall be furnished by the person constructing or operating such railway with free transportation on all trains running on such railway, whether passenger, freight or construction trains, while in the discharge of his duty.

So thus we shall take that advantage of the railways by compelling them to transport free our men engaged in the fire protection service.

Mr. PERLEY. I am not desirous in any way of imposing heavier burdens on the railway companies. I had no intention of claiming that the railway companies should pay a larger share than the minister is providing in this Bill, but what I was concerned about is the efficiency of the protection. I thought that since we have not the proposed clause in the Railway Act before us, it would be wise to go a little slowly until we find out whether the Minister of Railways is providing in his Bill as efficient protection to the national parks as this measure proposes.

Mr. OLIVER. When we ask from the railways the same protection in the parks that we ask everywhere else, we ask as much as we should, and it will be for the forestry branch of the Interior Department to see that, over and above that, efficient protection is given. If, after this new provision of the Railway Act comes into operation, we still find that the railway companies are not bearing their fair share of the expense, it will be quite in order to make a further change. But I think we are going as far as we are warranted now if the House will adopt the further provision which I have just moved, and which will compel the railways to give our patrolmen free transportation.

Mr. HERRON. If this clause should pass, would it include only the officer in charge of the fire-patrol or also the men fighting the fire? For instance a number of men might be brought for a distance of ten or twenty miles to fight the fire.

Mr. OLIVER. This will apply to every one employed. 'Every fire-ranger appointed to patrol.'

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The following amendment is proposed:

Every fire-ranger appointed to patrol a line of railway under construction or in operation shall be furnished by the person constructing or operating such a railway with free transportation on all trains running on said railways, whether passenger, freight or construction trains, while in the discharge of his duties.

Mr. OLIVER. Call that section 14, and then renumber all the others.

Mr. HERRON. Would a settler, for instance, who was ordered out to fight a fire, be an officer in the sense meant by the Bill?

Mr. OLIVER. I am afraid he would not. I would not like again, when introducing a new principle such as this, to carry it too far. If we do not find the clause sufficient, we can go further another time. We are making a long step in advance in this Bill, and the Railway Act over what we have had before.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. Does not that give an inspector very large powers of travel over a railway? He might travel on the Canadian Pacific railway from the Atlantic to the Pacific, and say he was in the discharge of his duties. Should not this free transport be limited to within the confines of the reserve of which he is inspector?

Mr. OLIVER. This section does not apply merely to the reserve, but to anywhere in the Dominion where there are fires to combat.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. Would a ranger appointed in British Columbia have the right to go down to Manitoba to look after a fire there?

Mr. OLIVER. I would think not. I think that the words 'in the discharge of his duties' place a sufficient limit. That means within the limits of his patrol.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. I should think it would be better to say 'within the limits of his jurisdiction.'

Mr. OLIVER. That would be all right. Mr. Chairman, will you make the change suggested by the hon. member (Mr. Middlebro)?

Mr. SPROULE. Suppose the railway was not one under federal charter, but under provincial charter?

Mr. OLIVER. I am under the impression that this section would apply just the same. I am very well satisfied that it ought to; and, so far as this parliament has jurisdiction, it will. I think this parliament has sufficient jurisdiction, but, if it has not, we cannot do better than adopt this provision, anyway.

Mr. SPROULE. When members of parliament and senators were given the right to travel on railways, it was held that this parliament could only give that right so far as railways under federal jurisdiction were concerned. Will you be able to go further in the case of a fire ranger than you did in the case of a member of parliament? Here are two provinces, Saskatchewan and Alberta, each of which has power to charter railways. They are building railways through federal property. Fire rangers would be employed along these railways to prevent fire. If we have not the right to give authority to a member of parliament to travel on a provincial railway, would we have that right to give authority in this other case?

Mr. OLIVER. I think that, all things considered, and it being a case in which it is conceded that private and public property is being protected from these very railways, I think that in the public interest we should assume that we have the power.

Mr. SPROULE. I would rather hear the opinion of some eminent lawyer on that subject, for it seems to me if we have not the right in one instance we have not it in the other. It does not depend upon a question of protecting property, constitutionally we have the right or we have not the right.

Mr. OLIVER. I do not quite see the point the hon. gentleman (Mr. Sproule), makes. If we have not this right, we do not need to say we have not it; but by declaring it, if we have it, it becomes effective, I think it will not be wise to enact any exception to this provision; I do not think it is called for.

Mr. SPROULE. What I contend is this: When we were dealing with the question of members of this House and of the Senate travelling on railways, I think, it was agreed that we had not the power to deal with provincial railways. If we have control for that purpose, it seems to me we cannot possibly have the right of control for this purpose.

Mr. OLIVER. I am not learned in the law, any more than my hon. friend (Mr. Sproule), but I think the two purposes are radically different. In the case of the transportation of members of parliament, the railway could not be assumed to have any direct interest or responsibility, whereas in the case of the protection of property from fire, the railway has a direct interest and responsibility. And it seems to me, that the conditions being as they are, our business is to say that they shall carry these fire-rangers, and it is for them to say they will not if they do not wish to.

Mr. SPROULE. It might be all right in equity, but in law I think both cases would be the same.

Mr. PERLEY. If we pass this legislation and a locally chartered railway wishes for free right of way across the Dominion forest reserve, it must apply to the minister, who could make it conditional that they shall comply with this law.

Mr. SPROULE. That would be all right, but it would be done by negotiation.

Mr. PERLEY. Yes, when we pass the legislation it may be made applicable to them by negotiation, whereas, if this were not in the Bill, the minister might not have the necessary power.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. I think that as to railways actually constructed under provincial charter, we should not have the right to impose conditions on them. But in the case of a provincially chartered railway wanting to go through the reserve, it could be made a condition that they shall comply with the Act.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The proposed section reads:

> Every fire-ranger appointed to patrol along the line of a railway under construction or in operation shall be furnished by the person constructing or operating such railway with free transportation on all trains running on such railway through the district for which he is appointed and while in the discharge of his duty, whether they are passenger, freight or construction trains.

Mr. ROCHE. Are there any mounted policemen attached to the Interior Department and looking over the forest reserves? I believe that was a case in years gone by?

Mr. OLIVER. No.

Section, as amended, agreed to.

On section 14,

Mr. HERRON. Under this clause will any person be prohibited from carrying arms within a reserve? Are the regulations in this clause going to govern the carrying of arms?

Mr. OLIVER. These are not regulations; the regulations will be made by the Governor in Council from time to time. This is a measure for the enforcement of the regulations.

Mr. BARNARD. In reference to subsection 3, will the forest ranger have a right to search any house in the reserve without a warrant?

Mr. OLIVER. It is a question how far we are warranted in carrying the jurisdiction of these forest rangers. If we are going to take efficient measures for the protection of the game, we must have some authority outside the limits of the reserve. Perhaps ten miles is too far, I am not going to insist upon that, but they should be allowed some jurisdiction outside the boundaries of the reserve if there is to be efficient protection of the game.

Mr. BARNARD. How does the minister arrive at the distance within which he can search for arms? If you are going outside the reserve at all, you must have some reason for stopping within the prescribed distance.

Mr. OLIVER. I cannot give any reason why we should either go as far as ten miles, or less. This is an arbitrary right which we consider necessary for efficient protection of the game, and when we are giving such an arbitrary right we should not extend it to any great distance. It is a matter of opinion whether the distance should be limited to ten miles, or five miles, or whether it should exist at all.

Mr. SPROULE. If the Hudson Bay Company sells their land, it will be to provide owners, and how are you going to deal with those people to prevent them from having a gun?

Mr. OLIVER. We have in a previous section of the Bill taken authority to purchase, or even to expropriate, such rights within the reservation, either to acquire them by purchase, by exchange or by expropriation. Already under the Act of 1896 in relation to these reservations, we have spent a considerable amount of money in buying out the rights of settlers, homesteaders and even squatters, for the reason that we must have the ownership of the land in order that we may exercise proper jurisdiction for the protection of game. In regard to the Hudson Bay Company, they have not disposed of any of their lands within the reserve. Since we passed the Act of 1896 they have retained their land, and they are in negotiation with the government on the subject of an exchange of that land, but so far we have not yet reached a conclusion. It is hoped that later on we will be able to make a fair exchange with the Hudson Bay Company, so that their rights within the reservation will pass entirely to us.

Mr. PERLEY. Is the minister taking steps to see that no squatters go on this reserve in future? If a man goes there and builds a house, what instructions does the department give its officers in regard to such a person?

Mr. OLIVER. The instructions are to secure his removal by mild means if possible, and if not possible, to take legal proceedings to eject him. So far we have not had to take such proceedings very often, because when people find that they must go they go without being forced. But that is one of the many features of the administration of this law that is anything but pleasant.

Mr. PERLEY. I can understand that. The reason I ask is that I have known good provincial laws placed on the statute-book under which no man had a right to squat on Crown lands, but it was broken every day because there was no enforcement of the law to prevent squatting.

Mr. OLIVER. If my hon. friend had been here in previous sessions, or at a previous time, he would have heard some strong complaints as to the action taken by the department in this respect. My apology at that time was that we were instructed by parliament to clear the reserve, and we had to clear it.

Mr. PERLEY. Those references were to squatters that were previously on the land, were they not?

Mr. OLIVER. Squatters who had gone on the land after the reservation had been declared. The reservation was declared by departmental order, and squatters came on even after that departmental order had been given, and they had to be disposed of.

Mr. SPROULE. In what position will the federal authority be, provided a provincial authority pass game laws in conflict with those of the federal authority? A good deal of this land will be in the province of Alberta, which has a right to pass its own game laws. What will happen if there is a conflict of authority between the province and the Dominion in regard to game laws?

Mr. OLIVER. I think not. The whole purpose in setting apart this reserve, in so far as game is concerned, is to preserve the game. Therefore, any law of the province that contemplates the prevention of the killing of game at some time or other will be acceptable to the Dominion, in this way, that the Dominion will not be anxious to issue authority to kill game at a time when the province says it shall not be killed. There will be no conflict between the two authorities in that way. The only difference will be that under our law there may be greater restrictions against the killing of game than there would be under the provincial law. We will operate within the provincial law and therefore, there will be no conflict. If we undertook to operate outside of the provincial law and authorized the killing of game when the provincial law said it should not be killed there would be a conflict, but so long as we keep within the provincial law and not only say that game shall not be killed, when the province says it shall not be killed, but that it shall not be killed at other times, there can be no danger of a conflict.

Mr. SPROULE. There might be conflict if the provincial law should set aside as a time for the killing of game the time that you say shall be a close season. The question that naturally arises is, who has the authority to pass the game laws? It is admitted that the province has. To assume that the game laws will be exactly the same always will be assuming something that is not likely to happen. It seems to me that there would be very great chances of a conflict of authority.

Mr. OLIVER. I will guarantee that there will be no conflict

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. Under the provisions of this section, while a fire-ranger may be permitted to seize an animal fifty miles from the reserve, he could not search for an animal ten miles from the reserve, and very often they require to search before they can make a seizure.

Mr. OLIVER. There is a radical difference between the right of search and the right of seizure. The right of seizure has not in any degree the same objection as the right of search. The right of search is a very objectionable authority to give unless under special circumstances. It is contrary to the principle that every man's house is his castle and all that sort of thing, and it is an authority that should be given very sparingly. It is quite different from the right to seize an article which, if it is known to have been taken in trespass, certainly should be seized wherever it may be found.

Mr. BARNARD. I think the minister is quite right in what he says, but that is hardly the spirit of his Act because he has also provided that, although you can search ten miles outside for guns and ammunition, you can only seize these articles within the reserve, which is rather a direct answer to the argument he has made.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. If you found them outside the reserve you could not seize them at all.

Mr. OLIVER. I hardly follow the hon. gentleman.

Mr. BARNARD. You say in the second part of subsection 2 'and within a reserve may seize all fire arms, ammunition, explosives,' &c., while subsection 3 gives power to search for anything mentioned in subsection 2 ten miles outside the reserve. The search will be unavailing because you could not seize.

Mr. OLIVER. I do not know that it is absolutely necessary that these things should be seized if found outside, but it should be known who has the timber, mineral, birds and fish and if found they can be seized.

Mr. BARNARD. But you do not take the power to search for these. You take the power to search for that which you cannot seize and you take the power to seize that which you cannot search for.

Mr. OLIVER. My hon. friend is mistaken. Paragraph 3 says:

For the purpose of searching for anything mentioned in subsection 2 of this section, any forest ranger may, without warrant or legal process, enter and search any house, dwelling, structure or camp within a reserve, or within ten miles of the boundary of a reserve.

Paragraph 2 provides that:

Any forest ranger may seize, whether within a reserve or elsewhere, all timber cut or removed, all mineral removed, all animals, birds and fish captured or killed.

Mr. BARNARD. But there is a limitation of the right after that.

Mr. OLIVER. That is perfectly clear.

Mr. BARNARD. Read the remainder of the section.

Mr. OLIVER. By the remainder of the section he is not authorized to seize the articles mentioned outside of the reserve. I do not know if that is necessary. It should be known who owns these articles and who handles them, so that if it is necessary to identify any person who is concerned in breaking the law on the reserve the authorities will have that information.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. Is it the intention of the minister to give power to search ten miles outside of a reserve for articles which the ranger could not seize?

Mr. OLIVER. For articles which you can seize, and there is no exception in the case of articles that you cannot seize. I cannot see any reason why, in the interest of the preservation of game, it is not altogether desirable that the ownership and the place of hiding and keeping of these articles should not be known even if it were not necessary to seize them.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. Suppose I have a gun hanging innocently in my house ten miles outside of the reserve, what right would you have to search my house and find that I have a gun when you cannot seize it?

Mr. OLIVER. If there is a suspicion that my hon. friend is poaching on the reserve, a suspicion which cannot be verified otherwise, and if it is desirable that the game guardian should know that my hon. friend has a gun, he should have the right to make a search. Yet, it would not be right that my hon. friend's gun should be taken from him on that ground.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. That is an infringement of the principle that the minister laid down a few minutes ago that every man's home is his castle. Even if that gun has been illegally used in the reserve, while you may search for it, you cannot seize it when you have found it.

Mr. OLIVER. I do not wish to adopt the principle in the Bill of seizing these implements mentioned outside of the reserve, but I do wish to maintain the principle of seizing the result of the use of these weapons when found outside the reserve. I think my hon. friends are drawing the case very finely when they make the objection they do.

On section 15: Lands withdrawn from reserve for railway purposes.

Mr. ROCHE. Has there been any addition to the Duck or Riding Mountain reserves or any subtraction from the same?

Mr. OLIVER. We are proposing to add to the Duck Mountain reserve, by the terms of this Bill, a very considerable area to the west of the reserve. There has been no addition to the Riding Mountains reserve, and I do not think there has been any withdrawal from it.

Mr. ROCHE. The reason I ask the question is that I have had some correspondence with the department with regard to a petition that was sent in by some of the residents of the municipality of Boulton, in the province of Manitoba, with regard to the withdrawal of certain lands that form part of the municipality of Boulton, and which are within the Riding Mountain timber reserve. The petition reads as follows:

To the Hon. the Minister of the Interior—

We, the undersigned reeve and councillors of the municipality of Boulton, humbly showeth that townships twenty-four and twenty-five in range twenty-seven west of the first principal meridian are in the Riding Mountain timber reserve. The municipality of Boulton comprises townships twenty-two to twenty-eight in ranges twenty-six and twenty-seven west, and is cut in two by these townships, causing much inconvenience and unnecessary expense to settlers in their intercourse on account of there being no road through these townships. These townships are as fit for settlement as the townships north, which are thickly settled, there being no timber of any commercial value on either of them. These townships if thrown open would be settled in a very short time, principally by friends of the settlers adjoining them, who are very anxious that they should be thrown open. By throwing these townships open the western boundary of the reserve would be straightened, thus insuring its permanency. And by these townships being settled there would be more inducement for a much needed railway to come through the municipality.

We, therefore, humbly ask that you in your wisdom may see fit to throw these townships open.

And your petitioners will ever pray.

Signed on behalf of the council and ratepayers of the municipality of Boulton.

WM. HEMBROFF,
Reeve.
JOHN MINN,
JONAS P. FIELD,
Councillors.
EDWARD ARMSTRONG,
Secretary-treasurer.

I understand the minister did send an inspector last winter to make an inspection of that reserve, and in this connection I received a letter dated March 21 from Shelvin, Manitoba, which reads:

At a public meeting held at Shevlin on March 20, a resolution was passed unanimously that our member, Dr. W. J. Roche, be requested to bring in a Bill to amend the Forest Reserves Act to withdraw a part of township 25, range 27, west of the 1st meridian.

Whereas, these lands being more suitable for farming purposes than forestry purposes as can be proved by the earnest desire of settlers constantly squatting upon them, by the large amount of farm produce they raise on these lands and that is raised by the farmers on the adjoining lands. As the main line of the Canadian Northern railway runs through this township 25, it is most desirable for the saving of the growing timber that it should be settled upon on the south side of its tracks, thus giving a fire protection to the growing timber.

Here is how it relates to this particular section:

The Shevlin siding on this railway being in the reserve, we cannot have access to receive any railroad benefits through being liable to prosecution by the forestry officials.

In other words, there is a siding within this reserve on the railway and the people apparently cannot get access to this siding for fear of being prosecuted for trespassing on the reserve.

The municipality of Boulton being diverted by townships 24 and 25 in the forest reserve, we are debarred from municipal privileges, causing discontent and deserted homesteads.

Having been promised that it was the intention of the Minister of the Interior to withdraw these lands at this session of parliament, but no action having been taken by him in this matter, we respectfully request you to bring this Bill in for us to give us the relief we desire.

This was duly proposed, seconded and carried.

I had a communication from the department stating they had caused an inspection to be made of the lands referred to, and the inspector apparently did not approve of their being thrown open for settlement. In answer to that I received the following letter dated March 21, 1911:

Yours of the 16th received, and in reply beg to inform you that an inspection of these lands was made last January, when it was 40 below and two or three feet of snow on the ground, after ordering a few squatters off of the sections that the Hon. Minister of the Interior had promised them would be withdrawn from this forest reserve. And spending an hour or so on the reserve, after such a thorough and full investigation and under such favourable circumstances they made a full and honest report contradicting all that has been said and written by hundreds of persons who have petitioned in favour of them being opened, and the resolutions that have been passed by the municipalities interested in the withdrawal of these lands from the reserve. We claim that there is no better land for ranching or mixed farming and grain growing in Manitoba than these sections we are asking to be opened.

We earnestly desire you to bring this matter up in the House and bring in a Bill to amend the Forest Reserve Act, to withdraw a part of township 25, range 27, west of the 1st meridian, in the Riding Mountain forest reserve, thus giving us free access to the Canadian Northern railway, and putting it outside of the forest reserve, as was done in other cases.

Hoping you will give this matter you earnest support and push it through the House at this session is the sincere wish of the electors of Marquette.

I have also had several communications from individuals, and councillors, the reeves, all urging that the lands be thrown open and taking direct issue with the inspector who inspected the lands at a most unfavourable season, according to this letter. Apparently the settlers, who are best acquainted with the nature of the lands, claim that they are especially well suited for mixed farming; and it would straighten the reserve and allow the municipality that is now cut in two to be made compact. The settlers would also derive the full advantage from the railway siding of which they are now deprived. Has the minister caused any subsequent inspection to be made in view of communications that have reached his department recently?

Mr. OLIVER. The two townships mentioned were included in the first reserve made by departmental order about 1900. They have been under reservation ever since, and the objections that have been urged against the reservation are the objections which are to be urged against every forest reserve that is established anywhere in the Dominion. The man or settlement established next a reserve does not want the reserve there for obvious reasons. I am glad my hon. friend has brought this matter up because that is a side of the question that does not strike the average member of parliament; but, the member who has a reserve in his constituency understands that each forest reserve is necessarily a cause of irritation to the settlers immediately adjacent to the reserve. Under all the circumstances I cannot hold out any prospect of the withdrawal of the two townships mentioned.

In regard to the small corner of one township where the Canadian Northern enters the reserve, we had the inspection made to which my hon. friend alludes and to which the settlers in the vicinity object. The inspector is as positive in his view as the settlers are in their view, and it seems to me, in view of the very positive representations made by the inspector, that we would not be warranted in asking parliament to withdraw the sections at this time. I had hoped that this Bill would have been passed during the winter and so assumed that it would not be possible to have a second inspection of the ground made after the snow was off the ground; otherwise I should have had a second inspection made. Under the circumstances I did not see that I could do anything but accept the representations of the inspector. I think it is an unsafe principle to adopt that when we have set aside reserves by Act of parliament, have spent large amounts in securing the removal of people from the reserves, have held out to all the world that they are going to be reserves, we should then undertake to throw them open unless there is a very well established case.

Mr. ROCHE. Apart from the general objection of settlers in a district to the establishment of a forest reserve near them, there is in this case that very strong objection on the part of the municipality from a municipal standpoint. It is a serious thing for a municipality to be cut in two and not have any settlement between the two sections of it; it causes all taxes for schools, roads and bridges to fall upon a smaller number of people than would otherwise be the case, and, therefore, they cannot secure the improvements they would desire. I would urge this objection more strongly from the municipal standpoint than from the individual standpoint. What is the name of the inspector who made the inspection?

Mr. OLIVER. I cannot give the name offhand. I can give it later on.

On section 16,

Mr. OLIVER. I wish to move to add after the word 'cattle' at the end of the third line on page 5, the words 'or other animals,' so that horses or sheep may be grazed if it is thought well.

Mr. GOODEVE. While nearly all of the subsections of this section have primary reference to the protection of the park, and, therefore, are quite necessary and quite within the prerogatives and rights of the Governor in Council, this remark does not apply to subsection (b), which has to do with an entirely different matter. It refers to certain special privileges which may be granted at the will of the minister. Nearly all of them are very valuable privleges, for instance: 'The cutting and removal of timber, the working of mines, quarries and mineral deposits, the removal of sand, gravel, earth, stone or any other material, the pasturage of cattle or other animals.' The minister has stated the difficulty that he has found in dealing with persons who desire special privileges; and yet by this subsection he is asking for an unlimited, arbitrary and extremely valuable power. This section names privileges, which I do not hesitate to say would run up to millions of dollars in value, which it is proposed to place arbitrarily in the hands of the minister. If this Bill passes he becomes an absolute czar in regard to the granting of these privileges. I do not think this parliament should place any man in that position. In the past such absolute power in the hands of a minister has led to a great deal of trouble, and many instances have occurred in which its exercise has been very much to the injury of the public domain. Private individuals have been able to make large gains, in some cases immense fortunes, in cases exactly parallel to this. Hon. gentlemen know that some years ago there were scandals in regard to leases granted to certain men in the western provinces. Yet by this Bill we are placing in the hands of one man the sole authority to grant similar privileges. One man might go to the minister, and ask for the special privilege of grazing sheep or cattle, and might apparently make out a good case for it. Another man who came afterwards might have an equal right, but in the mind of the minister might not make out an equally good case, and be refused. I say this power is a dangerous power to place in the hands of any man. I think the minister should first submit to parliament the regulations which he proposes to apply to these matters, and they should be such that all men would be placed on an equal basis.

Mr. OLIVER. What the hon. member has said is absolutely true. But the responsibility supposed to be assumed here by the Governor in Council and laid on the shoulders of the minister is exactly the responsibility he has now, and for my part, I do not know any other way of handling the business under the circumstances. All these matters mentioned in subsection (b) of section 16 are now under the same control, throughout the three prairie provinces, the Northwest Territories and the Yukon Territory, and always have been. So that the condition is not new. It is a condition which has prevailed for many years. The particular objection to providing by statute for each of these matters mentioned in subsection (b) is that we are undertaking the administration of a new responsibility for a purpose which is only in embryo in the public mind, which has not yet been worked out to a detailed conclusion.

We do not know yet how best we can carry on the business in these several parts so as to get the best result. We have to provide to use the timber and at the same time provide for the protection and reproduction of the timber. Then we have to provide for the mineral development and make that provision under such restrictions as will still protect the timber. We must also make provision that the public shall not have the free right of ingress and egress, but that, under certain restrictions, they shall have the enjoyment of these parks. I need not say more to show that in dealing with a new condition, we cannot be expected to provide legislation which will prove in every respect satisfactory; and under the circumstances, it is much better to administer by order in council so that regulations may be adopted from time to time as the conditions change and our information increases.

At six o'clock, House took recess.

After Recess.

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS.

House in committee for the further consideration of certain Bills.

Mr. NORTHRUP. Mr. Chairman, there are a number of Bills on the Order Paper for their second reading, and I am informed that unless they pass their second reading to-night they cannot possibly pass before the 24th of May. If the committee should rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again, these Bills, none of which are contentious, I believe, could be given their second reading. Only two or three minutes' time would be occupied, and then the committee could resume the consideration of these other Bills. I move that the committee rise, report progress, and ask leave to sit again this day.

Motion agreed to.

SECOND READINGS.

Bill (No. 203) respecting certain Patents of Munderloh and Company, Limited.—Mr. Gordon (Kent).

Bill (No. 204) respecting the Cariboo, Barkerville and Willow River Railway Company.—Mr. Smith (Nanaimo).

Bill (No. 205) respecting the Canada Cement Company, Limited.—Mr. Northrup.

Bill (No. 206) respecting the Chatham, Wallaceburg and Lake Erie Railway Company.—Mr. Gordon (Kent).

HIGH RIVER, SASKATCHEWAN AND HUDSON BAY RAILWAY COMPANY.

Mr. MARTIN (Regina) moved the second reading of Bill (No. 202) to incorporate the High River, Saskatchewan and Hudson Bay Railway Company.

Mr. SPROULE. This is one of the exploiting Bills a number of which we have had in this House before. I think we cannot take too early opportunity to express our dissent from the whole thing. The idea of building a canal from Nipigon to Hudson bay, as is proposed in this Bill, must seem so absurd to one who knows anything about the matter that we can hardly entertain that idea with patience. But if that were the real purpose and intention, whether it would result to the good of the country or not, it would not be so bad. But any one who has given the slightest consideration to the matter, I think, must have come to the conclusion that this is simply an exploiting Bill to get hold of water-powers and other privileges that belong to the country, under the pretext of building a canal. Personally I am entirely opposed to it, and will avail myself of every opportunity to oppose it so long as it is in this House.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time.

NEW ONTARIO AND QUEBEC RAILWAY COMPANY.

House again in committee on Bill (No. 170) to incorporate the New Ontario and Quebec Railway Company.—Mr. Gordon (Nipissing).

Mr. LANCASTER. When this Bill was up on Monday last, the Minister of Railways (Mr. Graham) said he would take the matter under consideration and declare his policy with regard to it. This Bill involves the question of provincial rights, which is surely an important matter. But, as the Minister of Railways is not here I do not see how we can proceed. I am prepared to debate my amendment to the Bill, but I suppose we ought to hear from the minister first.

Mr. PUGSLEY. What does the gentleman in charge of the Bill say? I do not think that the Minister of Railways and Canals desires the Bill to stand, and I am sure that his view is, that as this Bill has passed the Railway Committee, it should be accepted by the House. I know also that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Graham) is strongly in favour of having railways under Dominion authority as far as possible. The railways connect with trunk lines, and are linked up in a general railway system, and it is desirable in the opinion of the minister that all should be brought under the Railway Commission. I am sure that, unless there is something very exceptional about this Bill, he would favour going on with it.

Mr. GORDON (Nipissing). I submit that there is nothing exceptional about this Bill making it necessary to hold it over. With regard to the objection of the hon. member for Lincoln and Niagara (Mr. Lancaster) there is one point I might mention. The branch line we are proposing starts in from mileage 1,000 of the Transcontinental railway. But I do not think that the hon. gentleman is aware that the Transcontinental railway is already built to a little east of that point, and the other line starts in from mileage 940. It will be some time before the Transcontinental is built to that point, and, in the meantime, these gentlemen say they are getting legislation passed to build this road, and, as mentioned in clause (b) they can get at the line from both ends, which they cannot do by going over the line which the hon. member for Lincoln and Niagara desires that they should build first.

Mr. LANCASTER. I have had some experience of railway legislation in this House, and I know the views of the Minister of Railways, perhaps, as well as does the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Pugsley). The Minister of Railways, quite properly, sometimes changes his views when he hears matters discussed. After hearing this discussed the other evening and noting what I said with regard to this measure interfering with provincial rights, he said he desired to take the matter into consideration. If he authorizes the Minister of Public Works to say that he would favour the passage of this Bill, why we can debate the matter. I think the Minister of Railways should be here to say whether he does not think that the amendment I have proposed is a good one. The Minister of Railways has gone further than I was proposing to go with some charters that interfere with provincial rights. I am not opposing the building of this road, but I am trying to prevent a trick being played upon the country by this company getting Dominion legislation to control a railway that ought to be a purely provincial railway. I think it would be well for the committee to rise and report progress on this Bill, or at least wait until the Minister of Railways himself comes in when we can discuss it with him.

Motion to rise, negatived.

Mr. LANCASTER. Hon. gentlemen will notice, by reading this Bill, that the railway's eastern terminus is just across the boundary line between Quebec and Ontario, and runs southerly down the easterly side at Lake Abitibi and then into Ontario, a total distance of 160 miles. If that clause were not in the Bill no one would pretend that this was anything but a provincial railway. The rest of the railway is the so-called branch lines, about 25 miles long each, running down to connect with the Timiskaming and Northern Ontario Provincial Railway, a railway owned and operated by the government of Ontario. If these two branch lines, 25 miles long, were all that there is in this Bill, no one would say that it was necessary to come here; because they are not only entirely within the province of Ontario, but almost entirely within one county. The representatives of the Ontario government who appeared before the Railway Committee contended that if this company did not intend to build anything but these two 25-mile strips of railway they had no occasion to come here at all to get a charter, because these two small lines should be controlled entirely by the provincial government. The Ontario government, through its representatives, asked that some guarantee should be given that this other line of railway running to the east side of Lake Abitibi would really be built. No one could suggest any form of guarantee that would be practicable. I thought the solution would be to pass this Bill, but with the express condition that they are not to build these two branch lines until they first build their main line, which line is their only excuse for coming to this parliament at all. Let them first undertake to build this main line 160 miles long, before they undertake to build the two branch lines. Now, if the promoters of this Bill are bona fide and really intend to build the main line, they cannot object to such a provision as that. Therefore, I thought it wise to put upon the Votes and Proceedings a notice that I would move to amend section 7, so as to oblige them to prove their bona fides in coming to this parliament by building their main line first. The amendment is to add to section 7, as subsection 2, the following:

The powers of construction granted by paragraphs (b) and (c) shall not be exercised until the line of railway authorized by paragraph (a) shall have been constructed to the respective junctions on that line to which the lines authorized by the said paragraphs (b) and (c) are to extend.

Paragraphs (b) and (c) are the two little branch lines which, as I have already explained, have each a length of 25 miles. This railway starts from a point on the Timiskaming and Northern Ontario railway, which is a provincial railway, to the carrying on of which the whole of the provincial assets of Ontario are pledged, a railway inaugurated before the present government was in power and continued by the present government, a railway to which both sides of party politics in Ontario are committed and which is being extended and carried on, for the development of the northern part of Ontario, by the present provincial government, for the benefit of and at the expense of the people.

Mr. GORDON (Nipissing). This will be a feeder for it.

Mr. LANCASTER. If it is a feeder for it why do they not get a provincial charter? The hon. gentleman wants to feed a provincial railway with a federal railway. If it is going to be a feeder for it, can he not trust the common sense of the authorities of Ontario to give him a charter? My hon. friend, and those behind him should go to the province of Ontario and get a charter, and build the railway if it is going to be a feeder for a railway owned by the provincial government. How is this railway to be controlled? My hon. friend will be in a condition of chaos. I am a better friend to him than perhaps he thinks, because I point out to him that if it is going to be a feeder for a provincially-owned railway, the Dominion Railway Commission cannot have anything to do with the freight rates upon it. My hon. friends show their want of bona fides by such a contention. If it were a provincial railway which was not owned and operated by the province as a government railway, through traffic would be controlled by the authority of this parliament. Let me read section 8 of the Dominion Railway Act:

> Every railway, steam or electric street railway or tramway, the construction or operation of which is authorized by special Act of the legislature of any province, and which connects with or crosses or may hereafter connect with or cross any railway within the legislative authority of the parliament of Canada, shall, although not declared by parliament to be a work for the general advantage of Canada, be subject to the provisions of this Act relating to:
> (a) the connection or crossing of one railway or tramway with or by another, so far as concerns the aforesaid connection or crossing;
>
> (b) the through traffic upon a railway or tramway and all matters appertaining thereto;
>
> (c) criminal matters, including offences and penalties; and,
>
> (d) navigable waters.
> Provided that in the case of railways owned by any provincial government the provisions of this Act with respect to through traffic, shall not apply without the consent of such government.

The provisions of this Act, as to through traffic, are not to apply to such a road as the Timiskaming and Northern Ontario railway, and yet my hon. friend says that he is going to make this proposed road a feeder to the Timiskaming and Northern Ontario railway. Under our Railway Act, the minute we pass this Act for this purpose through traffic cannot be controlled by the Dominion authorities. Look at the chaos and the trouble that gets the people into. Here is a Dominion charter granting the right to construct what he says should be a feeder to a provincially-owned railway, and because it is a provincial government railway the Railway Commission will have no power whatever over the through traffic with which my hon. friend is going to feed the Timiskaming and Northern Ontario railway. Here we have these two little branches 25 miles in length beginning at a point on the government railway, and running within 25 miles of it in one direction and 25 miles of it in another, on a slant till they reach the line that they say they are going to build in order to get a Dominion charter. The amendment which I move is one which every hon. gentleman should support whether he is in favour of all railways being controlled by Dominion authority, as the Minister of Public Works indicates, or whether he is in favour of the provincial authorities controlling provincial railways, which they should do under the British North America Act. It is all very well for the minister to say that he believes in going as far as he can in putting all railways under the authority of the Dominion parliament, but when he says that he is willing to break the constitution because the constitution is that, when a railway is entirely within a province——

Mr. PUGSLEY. If it breaks the constitution we cannot do it.

Mr. LANCASTER. This government has broken the constitution.

Mr. PUGSLEY. No.

Mr. LANCASTER. Yes. This government has been breaking the constitution, if not every session, certainly every parliament, since I have had the honour of having a seat in this House. This government broke the constitution when it introduced the Naval Bill, because it failed to place the navy under the control of the King.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Does my hon. friend realize that if that is done the legislation must be ultra vires, and that it would be out of the power of this parliament to legislate contrary to the constitution?

Mr. LANCASTER. Look at the position the minister puts himself in. He is quite willing to concede that he is breaking the constitution, and he will pass this Bill because it may be held to be ultra vires.

Mr. PUGSLEY. No, no.

Mr. LANCASTER. Well one thing or the other; the Minister of Public Works would make a much more creditable argument, in my opinion, if he would undertake to show that I am wrong in what I say about the British North America Act, but, the minister concedes that I am right, that the Bill is ultra vires and he argues that it should pass because the courts could declare it ultra vires. Is that the principle upon which we should pass legislation?

Mr. PUGSLEY. That is not what I was speaking about.

Mr. LANCASTER. The hon. gentleman said that I was right in stating that the Bill would be ultra vires.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I hate to take the precious time of the committee, but my hon. friend evidently intends to take up all there is to spare so that it does not make much difference. I was directing my remarks to what the hon. gentleman said with regard to previous legislation which had been promoted by this government. He said that this government, during every parliament, had broken the constitution. What I wish to say is that it is impossible for parliament to break the constitution. Parliament can legislate and if it is within its legislative authority it is all right; the constitution is not affected in any way.

Mr. LANCASTER. If it is not within its legislative authority under the constitution it is all wrong, and if it is within its legislative authority it is all right. I suppose the minister will have enough logic about him to admit that, although he does not always have very much logic in this House, and particularly on private Bills.

Mr. PUGSLEY. The hon. gentleman has a great deal.

Mr. LANCASTER. The hon. gentleman is very fond of stating one side of a question, and denying the converse of that statement, although it must of necessity follow from his own statement.

Mr. PUGSLEY. This Bill is entirely within the legislative authority of this parliament in its present form.

Mr. LANCASTER. It is provided that it is a bona fide application. If the minister looks at the route he will find that the railway provided for in clause (a) starts at the east side of Lake Abitibi, and makes a little curve in order to get into the province of Ontario, and then comes southerly down the east side of the lake. There is no place there where it can do business. The two other lines each 25 miles long are entirely within the province of Ontario. The provincial authorities allege that they have every reason to believe that this railway does not intend to do anything but construct the lines authorized under clauses (b) and (c), and for these lines they should certainly not receive a charter from this parliament. We would be doing no more than is right and just to the people of Ontario by adopting my amendment that there should be no construction of the railways provided for under clauses (b) and (c) until they have first constructed the line authorized by clause (a), which is the only excuse for their coming here. If they are going to construct the line authorized by clause (a) then they should be obliged to accept the amendment of which I gave notice on Friday, but they should not be allowed to get a Dominion charter to construct the other two lines until they have constructed that line.

Mr. SPROULE. If there were no other reason against this Bill than the fact that the provincial government sent its representative here to remonstrate with the federal government as to the unwisdom of passing this measure, that is a sufficiently strong reason why we should refuse to pass it. I do not think we should always endeavour to place ourselves in antagonism to the provincial governments. Those governments, I think, are properly believed to have prior rights in this country. They were in existence before the federal government was formed. They gave up a part of their rights to permit the federal government to be formed, but others they maintained for their own purposes, and one of these is the right to grant authority by incorporation of a company to build railways within their own boundaries. It was in pursuance of that right that the provincial government opposed this Bill, because the railway it proposes to charter is in reality only a provincial railway, and what is tacked on to it is tacked on simply to bring it within the jurisdiction of the federal parliament. I can see no other reason for it. Now, I think it is our duty to examine these proposals very carefully when they are submitted to us, and bring our judgment to bear on the question as to whether or not they are an interference with provincial railway, and what is tacked on to avoid such interference as far as possible; and when we have not only the circumstances surrounding this proposed railway to indicate that it is a provincial railway, but the fact that the provincial government sent its representative here to remonstrate against it, saying that it would be injurious to the province's system of railways and to its aim, we should be very slow to encroach on the domain of the province in that respect. Now, this railway has a main line and two branches. All railways are expected to build their main line first. The branches of this railway could never be successfully operated in connection with it, if they were ever intended to be operated with it, until the main line were built. The proposal of my hon. friend from Niagara (Mr. Lancaster) is that the company shall build the main line to the point where the branches branch off, and then build the branches. If they build the main line, which is within federal jurisdiction, that would be an evidence that they had a bona fide purpose in coming here for the charter. But the proposed railway, I contend, is only a device to circumvent the rights of the province—to get the right under a federal charter to build a railway in the province which should be built under a provincial charter if it is built at all. I do not think we should support that device or play into their hands. It seems to me that we should have sufficient respect for the province to give it fair play in the situation. The province has inaugurated its own railway policy and system. Why was the Timiskaming and Northern railway carried away back into the wilds of that country? It was done for two or three purposes: First, to open up the country for settlement, and, secondly, to supply the needs of the country in connection with the opening up of new mines. Since the Cobalt mines were found in that country, the provincial government has exerted itself to its utmost to give the people railway facilities. It has now its railway in operation. It goes into a country where there is not a very good supply of railway traffic to support a railway, and unless it has feeders it must be a financial failure to the province. When a province undertakes to build its own railway system, it should not make the same fatal mistake and blunder that the federal government did, when it built the Intercolonial railway as a main trunk line and failed to provide feeders for it in the shape of branch lines. The province, desiring to profit by the mistakes of the federal government in this respect, when they mapped out their railway system in these northern wilds, made up their minds to throw out a branch line whenever a new mine was opened up or a new settlement took place. They are doing that at very great expense to the province, and some of these branches may not pay for a long time to come. But there is no locality in that country suffering badly for the need of a railway, and, therefore, there is no strong argument why another railway should come in and share with the provincially-owned railway in the traffic of that country. They want to have a paying railway at as early a date as possible, and, therefore, do not look with unconcern on any company or any other scheme that is calculated to take away the traffic that rightly belongs to that railway. What is here proposed? This railway has three lines. At first it starts from the Transcontinental railway at a point in the province of Quebec in order to bring it under the federal parliament. Then it goes across the boundary line into Ontario, and then starts its branch line from the Northern Ontario railway, a government-owned railway, to take away the freight that properly belongs to that road. The Ontario government are prepared to build a line into this locality just as soon as a railway is needed there. Why then grant a charter to any company for the purpose of building a branch line which will take away from the traffic of a provincial-owned railway? That is unjust to the province.

The hour for Private Bills having expired the committee rose and reported progress.

FOREST RESERVES AND PARKS

House again in committee on Bill (No. 85) respecting Forest Reserves and Parks —Mr. Oliver.

On section 16,

Mr. GOODEVE. When the House rose at six o'clock I was very glad to hear the Minister of the Interior agree with me regarding the great responsibility which will devolve upon him in this connection, and also with regard to the immense value of the natural resources of which this measure will give him the absolute control. He said that he agreed in every particular with the remarks I made, but gave as a reason for having this section in the Bill the fact that the administration of these resources has been carried on in a similar manner by this government before, and that there was great difficulty in making general regulations which would restrict and control the giving away of these various resources. It does not appeal to me as a sound reason that because this government allowed certain things to occur previously they should continue that policy. If that policy has been shown to be injurious to the public interest, and to have resulted in abuses, we ought to endeavour to change it, and prevent this abuse in the future. That is why I should like to see this particular clause cut out.

This clause refers, amongst other things, to mineral deposits. The hon. minister will remember that the Dominion Mining Institute has for years taken special exception to the administration by the Department of the Interior of mineral deposits in the lands under its control. So strongly do they feel on this point that there has not been a year, when it has not been brought up at their annual meeting. They have appealed to the Mines Department to bring in a Bill setting forth fixed regulations governing the disposal of minerals on Dominion government lands. We had that question up in the Mines Committee, of which the hon. member for Rainy River (Mr. Conmee) is chairman, but I regret that so far that committee has not brought in a Bill dealing with this matter. I remember one instance cited by the Dominion Mining Institute. Certain capitalists had sent out prospectors into that northern country, and had them there two years at heavy expense. These inspectors found certain indications of value, and the parties made application to the Interior Department, but after considerable delay they were informed that they could not obtain the mining rights. They withdrew in disgust their prospectors, and said that under such conditions no man would undertake to prospect in that country. I give that simply as an illustration. The same thing has occurred with regard to the cutting of timber. I cannot see why this government should not have fixed general regulations for the disposal of timber in these park reserves. Let them regulate the manner of cutting so as to save the young trees, and let them throw open the cutting of the timber to public auction, and give every one a fair chance. Let them give the cutting of the timber to the men who comply with the regulations, and whose tenders are the highest. In that way the feeling that there is undue favouritism would be removed, the department would be relieved of much responsibility, and the public would have greater confidence in the administration of these reserves. Without going further into this argument, I think the minister will see the force of some regulation of that nature being imposed before we give him the absolute control of resources of such great value.

This Bill also deals with water-power sites and power transmission. A few years ago these things were considered of not much value, not only in Canada, but in most places; but to-day the use of electrical energy from water-power has made such advances that it is probably one of the most valuable of our resources. We can readily understand therefore how men will endeavour to get control of the water-powers which are on these reserves. The main argument made for this reserve on the eastern slope of the Rockies is that it controls the headwaters of the magnificent rivers and other water-powers we have there, so that any one will see that the clause we are now considering is dealing with resources of immense value. And one should not have to emphasize the necessity of our having a standard set of regulations governing them, so that applicants for water rights would know the exact conditions under which they could obtain them, the rates fixed, the length of time they could have the use of them, &c. It is not a sufficient answer for the minister to say that it is difficult to make such regulations. We are here to discharge our duties and responsibilities, no matter how difficult, and see that the public is protected. We know what our own commission appointed by this government has said regarding these water-powers, and the necessity of protecting them. I submit that we should not pass this clause as it stands, but that the minister should be prepared to give this parliament some idea of what regulations he proposes to adopt in the disposing of these various natural resources mentioned in this section.

Mr. OLIVER. I do not know that I can add anything to what I said before the House rose at six o'clock. I said then that the whole of the provisions of the subsection to which my hon. friend alludes are already in force under the same jurisdiction, and are applied to the whole of the territory that is under federal control. We are not asking for something in this Bill that is not already conferred upon and exercised by the same authority that is alluded to in the Bill. If my hon. friend thinks that what has been practicable during the last fifteen or twenty years in regard to the whole country is not applicable to this small section of it, then of course he may call for legislation in regard to that particular part. But as I said before, the fact that we are undertaking to work out a theory and a policy in regard to forest and water conservation, dealing with a matter which is as yet in embryo, and which must be worked out according to experience gained—I say under those circumstances his demand that there should be cast into legislative form all the various regulations that are required in the administration of the resources mentioned under this section, is scarcely a reasonable one, and is not one that he would consider reasonable if he were in my position. As to the water-power regulations, my hon. friend is surely aware that all water-powers under the control of the Dominion government are subject to well defined regulations, which are admitted by all who have studied them to have conserved the public interest on the one hand and the development of power on the other, and which are generally admitted to be more satisfactory than anything else that has been attempted in any country in the world. I do not think under these circumstances we are asking too much in asking that the same authority under which all these natural resources are administered throughout the Northwest Territories and the Yukon should be exercised on this reservation.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. This is a more important provision than appears at first sight. The Bill covers an area of 16,000,000 acres of land, Dominion lands, grazing lands and mineral lands, and I have no doubt that the minister is given power under this section to dispose of timber, minerals and other resources representing a value of perhaps four or five hundred million dollars. So we are giving to the Governor in Council, which of course means the government, the absolute power to dispose in such manner as they see fit of the assets of this country worth four or five hundred million dollars. Now it is an admitted principle that parliament should have control over its own assets, and that the most democratic form of government is that which submits to parliament the proposed disposition of the country's assets. Under the proposed section I conceive that the minister would have the right for instance to dispose of all the gold, silver, copper and other minerals, on these nine reserves in the province of British Columbia. In addition to that, the minister would have the right to make leases for any length of time he should deem proper of all the timber limits contained on this reserve, also of all grazing rights for cattle and other animals. In the province of Manitoba there are five reserves where there are valuable timber and grazing rights, and probably mineral rights; in Saskatchewan six reserves, and in Alberta four reserves, 24 reserves altogether, containing some 16,000,000 acres of land. Now that gives to the Governor in Council, and to the Minister of the Interior particularly, very large powers. I should think that the minister would like to protect himself against the encroachments of some of his whilom friends, and in order to do that, I should think he would desire some uniform standard regulations with regard to each proposed concession; just for instance, as we have a model clause when we are granting charters to railway companies, and a model clause when we are granting charters to telephone companies. There are model clauses to which every proposed company seeking incorporation has to submit. In the same way I think the minister could put a provision of that kind in the proposed section 16. If you do that, then, if you are going to offer a mineral lease, if you are going to offer a concession for sale, all you have to say to the purchaser is: Here are the rules and regulations we have made with respect to mineral rights or mineral leases for this reserve; we are going to put that up for sale by auction on a certain day, you will have the same right to tender as any one else. After being duly advertised for sale the inference is that the government will get a fair price for the concession. The same rule will apply to all other concessions put up by the minister, because the minister admits that this section gives him the power to make regulations, and it is admitted that he will make regulations. Now if he does that with regard to each concession, why not go a step further and say that the sale of this concession under this regulation shall be by public auction, so that the public may have a right to tender. I see no objection to that, and for that purpose I propose that the following amendment be inserted at the end of subsection (c):

Provided that prior to the exercise of any of the powers in this subsection contained, a uniform standard giving the conditions and terms of sale for each class of concession shall be imposed, and that the intention to dispose of such concession shall be duly advertised, and such concession shall be sold by public auction under such standard conditions and terms.

There is another section of the Act which says that the regulations which are to be made under this must be submitted to parliament. So in this way we will get the regulations submitted to parliament and approved, and then we will have standard written uniform regulations that he who runs may read. Every man who proposes to buy a concession will know the exact conditions of sale, and when you put a concession up by public auction, with all the conditions attached to it, it will be sold to the highest bidder. I do not think you can apply any more just or reasonable principle to the sale of the assets of the country, or one that will better assure to the public the highest price of the asset you intend to sell. I ask the minister in all earnestness to allow me to make this amendment. I would point out that the principle is adopted so far as the regulations are concerned. These regulations are to be submitted to parliament, and the minister should go one step further and adopt the principle of sale by public auction, and this amendment will carry out that provision.

Mr. OLIVER. My hon. friend from Kootenay (Mr. Goodeve), and my hon. friend from North Grey (Mr. Middlebro), seem not to be exactly at one in their consideration of this section. My hon. friend from Kootenay states that there should be legislative provision covering the disposition of the rights to these several natural resources. My hon. friend from North Grey is willing that these should be disposed of by regulation, but the regulation must provide that they shall be disposed of by auction. My hon. friend from North Grey seems to be under the impression that we have not any regulation, that he who runs may read, under which our natural resources are disposed of.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. The minister has misunderstood me. I have read the old Act, and I knew that there were regulations. But they are not specific as under this Act. You have no Act which says that the concession must be sold by public auction. But we have that principle in connection with our public works—where the amount involved is beyond a certain amount there must be public advertisement and tender. Why should the same principle not hold when selling assets worth millions and millions of dollars?

Mr. OLIVER. That only shows how difficult it is to understand something that a man is not familiar with. There are certain natural resources, the rights to which it is perfectly feasible and proper to dispose of by public auction. But there are certain other natural resources, the rights to which should not be disposed of by public auction.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. Can the minister give us an instance of each?

Mr. OLIVER. Of course, that is what I propose to do. We do dispose now of rights to timber by public auction—that is what our regulations provide for. So far as that is concerned the rights of the public, and also of the individual who undertakes to utilize these materials are conserved. That is considered to be in the public interest. But when it is a matter of disposing of mineral rights, I think the hon. gentleman will search the world in vain for a case in which mineral rights are disposed of by public auction.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. Why, the Ontario government sold a mineral right by public auction, and received a million and a quarter for it.

Mr. SPROULE. And it was given away by that government's predecessors.

Mr. OLIVER. I can only say that in my humble judgment the way to deal with mineral rights is the same as to deal with land rights, and that is to give them away. I think that is sound public policy.

Mr. LENNOX. That is the way they used to do in Ontario.

Mr. OLIVER. I am here to say, and to argue the point if necessary, that the best way in the public interest to dispose of mineral rights—speaking of rights to precious metals—is to give them away. And that is the way to dispose of public lands—to give the land away. I do not know that we need discuss the reasons for that. But, just as my hon. friend (Mr. Middlebro), holds one view, I hold the other, and, judging by the lines of administration which prevail throughout the world, my view is favoured by the majority. Now, with regard to water-power rights, in my humble judgment it would not be wise in the public interest to dispose of them by auction sale. The advantage to the public in connection with water-power rights is in the abundance and cheapness of the power that can be produced.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. But cannot the hon. gentleman attain that object by regulating rates? Put on a stringent regulation if you like and then offer the concession for sale.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO.

Mr. OLIVER. Under the regulations we have, provision is made for regulating rates at which power shall be sold, and there is also provision for regulating the rental that shall be paid by the lessee for the use of the power. It must be obvious that,if that right is sold by public auction and a sum of money is paid by the lessee for the right, the ultimate user of the right is the man who must pay that money. What I judge to be the great benefit of the utilization of power is the quantity that can be produced and the cheapness with which it can be supplied, and, just in proportion as you charge a price for the right to produce that power, you lay an additional tax upon the consumer. In my humble judgment, that is not sound public policy. I am quite aware that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Middlebro) has as good a right to his opinion as I have to mine. He represents one view, the national treasury, while I represent the other view, the public interest.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. I am representing the view of getting rid of political favouritism by putting these rights up to public competition.

Mr. OLIVER. So far as that is concerned, the hon. gentleman will find that, under the regulations of other countries than Ontario there is no room for political favouritism if the regulations are administered as they should be. And that there are regulations for the disposal of water-powers where there is equally no room for political favouritism. The question of political favouritism is not necessarily settled by an auction sale, nor does it necessarily appear when an auction sale does not take place. I am willing to accept the principle of auction sale when that principle is in the public interest, but, from my point of view, it is not wise to accept the principle of auction sale in the matter of mineral rights or water-power rights, or, for that matter grazing rights.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. Does not the hon. minister see that there is a great difference between a mine and a farm? Does not he see that it is in the public interest that the farm should be settled, because you thereby increase the productiveness of the land and add to your population? But to give away mineral rights, as the minister suggests, for nothing, though they may be worth two or three millions—surely he must see that it would be better, in the public interest, to secure the two or three milion for the benefit of the treasury rather than leave it in the hands of private individuals. For that is what it means when the minister says he would give away a mineral right rather than sell it. In other words, he would sooner give a couple of million dollars into the hands of—I will not say a friend, but a private individual—instead of securing it for the public interest. I certainly differ from the minister on that point. There is a clear distinction between farming land and a mine. In the case of a water-power, in spite of what the hon. minister says, he can make regulations as stringent as he likes in the public interest, and then sell a concession to the highest bidder.

Mr. OLIVER. But the price he will give will have to come out of the consumer just the same.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. But if you give it to the lessee for nothing, what is the advantage?

Mr. OLIVER. But it is on the principle of regulating the rates at which power may be sold, thus bringing the price down to the lowest possible point. And everybody knows that on cheap power the prosperity of industry in which machinery is used depends.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. In one case you rely upon him to whom you give it to bring the price to the lowest possible point, but in the other case you make the regulations as severe as you choose in the interest of the public and sell it by public auction. You know then whether you are getting just what it is worth or not.

Mr. SPROULE. It struck me that the argument of the minister in justification of this clause was a very weak one. He says we have this principle in the Land Act, that we have been administering public rights under that law and we are only going a little further, but doing the same thing. Let him ask himself for a moment what has been our experience under what he is pleased to call the correct principle? Did it turn out good or bad? Look at the administration of the timber berths in the country. What has that been? We have had the greatest public scandals ever perpetrated in Canada, absolute piracy, dishonesty, thievery, fraud and what belonged to the whole people was converted to the use of a few individuals improperly and dishonestly, under the very law and the very principle that he is defending to-night. In my judgment our experience of the past is the strongest argument possible why we should devise some other means for dealing with these matters in future because that which has been pursued in the past has not been a success. It has been admittedly a failure, and that is known from one end of Canada to the other.

There is another reason why I think there is a good deal of force in the argument of my hon. friend from North Grey. What we are dealing with is not our own. It belongs to the people. What are the government? They are the trustees for the time being, handling the assets of the people, and like every other trustee who is dealing with something in the nature of a trust they are bound to make the very best possible use of the asset that they can in order to give the largest return to the owners. Are they doing that by this system? Are they doing it when they are acting in this way? The hon. gentleman says that he would give away a mine as well as he would give away land. Suppose that by an accident of Providence, or whatever you like to call it, there is great wealth stored away in small compass in the ground; it belongs to the Dominion of Canada and the Minister of the Interior is the party who is entrusted with the duty of seeing that it is administered in such a way as to bring to the owners the largest return. Yet he says that he would give it away. That is not getting the largest return from it. The party who works it is entitled to a reasonable profit out of his labour and out of the money invested in it, but the return to him is likely to be more than a dozen profits on his operations. Who is entitled to the return over and above what is a reasonable profit? Are not the owners entitled to that—the people of Canada? Therefore I say that when it is handled in trust it should be the duty of the trustees to handle it so as to get the largest returns for the owners, and when they are doing that, in my judgment they are doing what is good business, and they are following out a principle that is universally admitted to be the proper principle for every trustee to be guided by in administering a trust. The minister said something with reference to mines. He believed in giving them away. When I can get the attention of the minister with all the many attractions elsewhere, I will address myself to the subject. When a minister is in charge of a Bill and a member is endeavouring to criticise the measure, and is addressing himself to the subject, he is entitled to receive the attention of the minister.

Mr. OLIVER. I wish to apologize to the hon. gentleman by saying that I was asking my hon. friend (Mr. Nesbitt) on my right—

An hon. MEMBER. You have no right to ask a question.

Mr. OLIVER. I was asking my hon. friend on my right a question to bring to my mind a point that my hon. friend was speaking on at the moment. It was not any lack of attention to what he was saying, but I was wishing to keep myself informed as to the thread of the hon. gentleman's discourse.

Mr. SPROULE. If that is the explanation I will exonerate the hon. gentleman from any desire to be discourteous, but I thought that I saw him trying to attract the attention of other hon. gentlemen around him.

Mr. NESBITT. I take the opportunity of endorsing what the hon. minister has said.

Mr. OLIVER. I am afraid my hon. friend is too suspicious.

Mr. SPROULE. I do not know that the endorsement comes with very good grace from the hon. gentleman. I was just trying to give an example of the two systems. The late Sir Oliver Mowat and his successor, Mr. Ross, seemed to have the same idea with regard to the administration of a trust that the Minister of the Interior has to-night, and in pursuance of that they took the mines of Ontario and absolutely gave them away to their own friends.

Mr. McLEAN (Huron). No, no.

Mr. SPROULE. I say yes; and the history of it is so plainly written on every page of the late government's record, that he who runs may read, if he were only half blind, and then he would not be any worse than the hon. member for Huron when it comes home to him. What was the result? They were borrowing money to carry on the affairs of the government of the province, they were squandering the assets of the province, and when the change of government was made it was found that they had given away four-fifths of the valuable mines in Ontario. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have order.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I think the hon. gentleman has good order.

Mr. SPROULE. When I hear men talking in ordinary conversational style I hardly think it is good order. I was saying that they had given away nearly four-fifths of the valuable mines when the present government came in. What did they do? They took a small portion of a lake, they took remnants, they took mines here and there, endeavoured to find out the value of these mines, advertised them for sale and they got as high a value as they could for them. What did they bring back to the people of the province of Ontario between the time that the preceding government went out and they came into power—a period of about seven years? There has been derived from these mines between $5,000,000 and $6,000,000. That belongs to the province of Ontario, whereas, similar resources were being squandered by the predecessors of the present government. This result has been accomplished by virtue of a change in policy that recognized it to be the duty of trustees to use the trust confided to their care to bring back the largest return to the owners. What are they doing to-day? One of those mines alone is bringing over $70,000 a year that was not bringing $100 a year when the present government came into power. This revenue was being given away and the same principle obtained with regard to nearly all the valuable mines in Ontario. To-day the province is getting a large return from them and the result is that although the government are spending more in the interest of the people of the province they are still able to carry on the affairs of the province with great success, and they are doing it greatly to the benefit of the people. They are doing that by virtue of a different method of administering the trust confided to them than that proposed by the Minister of the Interior, and it should be a strong argument in favour of the wisdom of trying to handle that which is given to you in trust in such a way that it brings the largest returns to the owners for whom that trust is being administered.

By carrying it out in this way you are not likely to do that. Our experience in the past is the best evidence of this, and I know of no better criterion by which to judge the future than the experience of the past. What has been the experience of the past under the law the minister is defending to-night? It has been one of wasteful extravagance and dishonesty. I am free to admit that under regulations properly carried out in the spirit and letter we might get a much better return than we have got in the past under many regulations. Not only was the law bad because it was on a wrong principle, but the regulations were not properly enforced, and the result was great loss to the Dominion of Canada in the administration of timber limits, of mines and grazing leases. Yet, the minister can see no reason for a change now. To my mind the history of the past is the very strongest reason why we should endeavour to devise some other way whereby we could handle what belongs to the Dominion of Canada in a better way than it has been handled in the past, and to bring to the country a larger return for it.

Mr. DOHERTY. If the regulations referred to be the regulations made under the Land Act, and if the government are exercising the power of regulating the entire question of how rights are going to be acquired under the Lands Act, by a system of regulations made by the government over a period of thirty years past, it would seem to me that the government ought to be in a position to know what are proper regulations to make, and if the government are in that position I fail to see why they do not propose to this House to enact those regulations into law. I understood from the minister that the reason why it was considered necessary that the government should have conferred upon it power to control these matters, was that the whole thing was in embryo, quite a new thing, something which could not now be elaborated and provided with a permanent system. I was struck with this position as going a great way to justify this departure from the sound principle that the control of the acquisition of these rights ought properly to be determined by this parliament, but if the government has been prescribing by regulations for a period of thirty years the manner of disposal and acquisition of similar rights I do not grasp how it could be said that the whole matter is in that embryonic condition in which it would be impossible to formulate and lay before the House just the regulations required for that purpose. There seems to me to be a contradiction between the two positions taken by the minister. Is it intended that existing regulations under the Lands Act shall govern the acquisition of the rights with which we are now dealing in this particular portion of the country that is to be set aside as a forest reserve?

Mr. OLIVER. It is intended that the regulations at present applicable to these rights in other sections of the country shall be made applicable to the same purposes within the proposed reserve, but with such changes as are considered necessary in order to carry out the special purpose of this reservation. It is the special purpose of this reservation that makes the new condition which is not thoroughly understood and which makes it impossible to apply the regulations as they are, and have been in use in the rest of the country. My hon. friend argues that we should have our regulations which apply to the country generally put in statutory form, but the underlying principle of these regulations, in regard to mineral rights particularly, was reversed in 1907 and 1908 so that the present regulations have only been in force since that time. They have not been thoroughly worked out, and the fact that they were reversed in 1907 and 1908 from the regulations prevailing before is evidence of what I have already said that in the formative condition it is desirable that there should be a freer means of meeting new conditions and new situations as they arise than is provided by definite legislation.
